49 U.S.C.S. § 1378(b) (1) mandates rejection of the transaction (A) if it would result in a monopoly or would be in furtherance of any combination or conspiracy to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize the business of air transportation in any region of the United States; or (B) the effect of which in any region of the United States may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly, or which in any other manner would be in restraint of trade, unless the board finds that the anticompetitive effects of the proposed transaction are outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting significant transportation conveniences and needs of the public, and unless it finds that such significant transportation conveniences and needs may not be satisfied by a reasonably available alternative having materially less anticompetitive effects.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Procedural Matters > Jurisdiction > Exclusive Jurisdiction

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Regulated Industry Mergers

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Transportation Law > Air & Space Transportation > US Civil Aeronautics Board

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Primary Jurisdiction

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Jurisdiction Over Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Jurisdiction Over Actions > Exclusive Jurisdiction

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > State Court Review

Transportation Law > ... > US Federal Aviation Administration > Notices & Orders > Judicial Review

HN5[] Jurisdiction, Exclusive Jurisdiction

The Department of Transportation's approval of an acquisition is subject to review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, upon the appeal by any person with a substantial interest in the approval. 49 U.S.C.S. app. § 1486(a). The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia shall have exclusive jurisdiction to review the determination of the Civil Aeronautics Board or the Department of Transportation. 49 U.S.C.S. app. § 1486(d).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > Antitrust Issues

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > General Overview

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The burden antitrust plaintiffs must bear to establish concerted activity is that there must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the manufacturer and the non-terminated distributors were acting independently. In addition, plaintiffs should present direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the manufacturer and others had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > General Overview

Evidence > Inferences & Presumptions > Inferences

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

HN7[] Summary Judgment, Opposing Materials

Although on summary judgment, the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion the antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence so that conduct consistent with permissible competition as well as illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy. Instead, a plaintiff must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inference of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed the plaintiff. When plaintiffs' claim makes no economic sense, plaintiffs must come forward with more persuasive evidence to support their claim than would otherwise be necessary.

Torts > ... > Fraud & Misrepresentation > Negligent Misrepresentation > General Overview

HN8[] Fraud & Misrepresentation, Negligent Misrepresentation

Normally, the knowing false representation must be of a past or present material fact. Consequently, a representation as to a future act is an insufficient basis to support an action for fraud merely because the represented act or event does not take place. It is true, however, that a misrepresentation of a present intent to perform a specific act in the future could amount to fraud. Plaintiffs must show that the promisor had no intention to perform at the time the promise was made.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Mandatory ADR

Civil Procedure > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > General Overview

HN9[] Alternative Dispute Resolution, Mandatory ADR

The Arbitration Act establishes that a court must apply federal law to resolve the issue of whether the question of fraud in the inducement is itself an arbitrable controversy.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Contracts Law > Contract Conditions & Provisions > Arbitration Clauses

Civil Procedure > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > General Overview

Contracts Law > ... > Affirmative Defenses > Fraud & Misrepresentation > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Mandatory ADR

HN10[] Contract Conditions & Provisions, Arbitration Clauses

The federal law principles governing the arbitrability of fraud in the inducement claim are well settled. If the claim is fraud in the inducement of the arbitration clause itself, an issue which goes to the making of the agreement to arbitrate, the federal court may proceed to adjudicate it. The language and policy of the Arbitration Act, however, requires that allegations of fraud in the inducement of the entire contract be considered arbitrable. Since plaintiffs' claim is directed at fraud in the inducement as the entire contract, this claim is subject to the arbitration clause.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > Arbitrability

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Waiver & Preservation of Defenses

Civil Procedure > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Pretrial Matters > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Mandatory ADR

HN11[] Arbitration, Arbitrability

Whether the parties agreed to arbitrate is determined by applying federal substantive law of arbitrability. Questions of arbitrability must be addressed with a healthy regard for the federal policy favoring arbitration. The Arbitration Act establishes that, as a matter of federal law, any doubts concerning the scope of arbitrable issues should be resolved in favor of arbitration whether the problem at hand is the construction of the contract language itself or an allegation of waiver, delay, or like defense to arbitrability.

Counsel: [*1] Gray, Plant, Mooty, Mooty & Bennett, P.A., by DANIEL R. SHULMAN of Minneapolis, Minnesota, and Alioto & Alioto by JOSEPH M. ALIOTO of San Francisco, California, appeared on behalf of plaintiffs.

Zuckert, Scoutt, Rasenberger & Johnson by FRANK J. COSTELLO and JAYME I. RIZZOLO of Washington, D.C., and Corporate Counsel for Northwest Airlines, Inc., by PAUL L. DINGER of Eagan, Minnesota, appeared on behalf of defendants NWA, Inc., and Northwest Airlines, Inc.

Winston and Strawn by DAN K. WEBB and ROBERT G. FOSTER of Chicago, Illinois, and Robins, Zelle, Larson & Kaplan by ELLIOT S. KAPLAN of Minneapolis, Minnesota, appeared on behalf of defendant Simmons Airlines, Inc.

Opinion by: ALSOP

Opinion

ORDER

DONALD D. ALSOP, CHIEF U. S. DISTRICT JUDGE

The above entitled matter came on for hearing on April 14, 1988, upon the motions of defendants NWA, Inc., and Northwest Airlines, Inc. (hereinafter referred to collectively as NW), and defendant Simmons Airlines, Inc. ("Simmons") for summary judgment.

I. BACKGROUND.

On December 23, 1985, plaintiffs [1] entered into a regional airline service agreement with NW. Pursuant to the agreement, FBA would provide regional air service at Detroit for NW as [*2] a NW Airlink beginning in February, 1986. The agreement further provided that FBA would be the exclusive regional airline for NW at Detroit unless FBA chose not to service a particular route. Either party could terminate the agreement without cause upon six months' notice. In addition, the agreement contained a mandatory arbitration clause.

Prior to the execution of the regional airline agreement with FBA, NW had been exploring the possible acquisition of Republic Airlines, Inc. ("Republic"). There were several meetings in December, 1985, between NW and Republic executives regarding possible acquisition. There is no evidence in the record, however, that NW and Republic had reached even a tentative agreement concerning the acquisition prior to December 23, 1985. On January 23, 1986, NW and Republic publicly announced their agreement to a proposed acquisition of Republic by NW subject to approval by the Department of Transportation ("DOT")

The proposed acquisition, if approved, created a dilemma [*3] for NW regarding regional airline service at Detroit. This is so because Republic had a regional airline agreement with Simmons at Detroit. The agreement was executed on December 26, 1984, and could not be terminated by either party until October 29, 1988. Similar to the [1] Remaining plaintiffs are former owners of Fischer Brothers Aviation, Inc. See the court's order dated October 20, 1987. Plaintiffs will be hereinafter referred to collectively as FBA.

NW agreement with FBA, the Republic/Simmons agreement granted Simmons the right to be the exclusive regional airline for Republic at Detroit unless Simmons chose not to service a particular route. [2]

Between the public announcement of the proposed acquisition and the DOT approval which occurred on August 12, 1986, NW did not make any expressed commitments to the NW/Republic regional airlines, although it indicated to both FBA and Simmons that if the acquisition was approved, NW was hopeful that there would be a role for all regional airlines. Following DOT approval of the acquisition, both Simmons and FBA notified NW in writing that they intended to enforce the exclusive rights provision contained in their respective contracts. Shortly [*4] thereafter NW requested that the four regional airlines at Detroit and Minneapolis/St. Paul attend a meeting on August 19, 1986, in Minneapolis, to discuss the status of NW/Republic regional airlines.

At the August 19 meeting Mr. Magary of NW informed the representatives of the regional airlines that NW wanted the carriers to mutually agree on the division of routes at Detroit and Minneapolis/St. Paul. Mr. Magary further stated that NW did not want to be directly involved in the negotiations between the two sets of airlines but would do what it could indirectly to facilitate the division. Magary said that NW would not get involved in secret proposals and private discussions with individual airlines.

During the meeting NW distributed a proposed route division for the Detroit and Minneapolis/St. Paul markets. Simmons, FBA and Mesaba verbally objected to the proposal at the meeting. Later in the month of August Mesaba and Express mutually agreed to a division of the routes at Minneapolis/St. Paul.

Immediately after the meeting, Mr. Murray and Mr. Piper, representatives of Simmons, met privately with Magary and Mr. Abbott, another representative of NW. According to participants' recollections, [*5] first Murray indicated that Simmons expected to be compensated for any routes it gave up to FBA. After Magary rejected any such payment, Murray then asked Abbott if NW would have any objection to Simmons attempting to acquire FBA, to which Abbott had no objection.

Between the August 19 meeting and when NW sent FBA notice of termination on September 24, 1986, there were numerous meetings, telephone conversations and written correspondences between FBA, Simmons and/or NW. The interactions proceeded along two lines, sometimes simultaneously, one concerning dividing the routes at Detroit and the other involving the sale of FBA to Simmons. Instead of reciting every alleged interaction between FBA, Simmons and/or NW and each party's sometimes diverging interpretation of what took place during the interactions, or indeed whether the interaction occurred at all, the court will address with specificity in the discussion portion of this order the factual issues that, according to the plaintiffs, preclude summary judgment on the plaintiffs' various legal claims.

Ultimately, FBA and Simmons did not mutually agree on either the division of routes or the sale of FBA to Simmons. Following a September [*6] 22-23, 1986, meeting held in Chicago and attended by representatives of Simmons and FBA [3], NW sent a written notice of termination to FBA on September 24 and Simmons revoked its offer to purchase FBA for approximately 3.3 million dollars on the same day.

Following the notice of termination, NW informed FBA that although NW was still interested in reaching an Airlink agreement with FBA, Simmons would have the right of first refusal on any routes at Detroit. Consequently, NW determined which Detroit routes Simmons did not want to service, and offered those routes to FBA. The other significant item of negotiation was the prorate formula for dividing fares between NW and Simmons.

The negotiations continued over several months but ultimately NW and FBA did not enter into a new regional airline service agreement, and on February 4, 1987, NW discontinued the negotiations when it saw no hope in resolving their differences and it learned that FBA had retained an attorney to sue NW. FBA terminated its operations as a regional airline for NW on March 24, 1987, six months following the notice of termination. [*7] On May 26, 1987, FBA was sold to Midway Airline for 2.235 million dollars.

---

[2] NW was confronted with essentially the same problem at Minneapolis/St. Paul. NW had a pre-existing contract with Mesaba while Republic had a pre-existing contract with Express.

[3] Mr. Rasmusson, a representative of NW, also attended portions of this meeting.

II. DISCUSSION.

Plaintiffs assert nine different statutory or common law claims against one or both defendants. Because defendants' motions for summary judgment raise issues unique to many of the claims, each claim will be discussed separately.

Although the textual standard for granting summary judgment has remained unchanged for many years, [4] two recent Supreme Court cases interpreting Rule 56 have refined its application. In Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S. Ct. 2505 (1986), the Supreme Court equated the standard for granting summary judgment to the standard for granting a directed verdict, noting that the difference is primarily the time when the respective motions are made. Id. at 2513. Consequently, HN1[] a genuine issue of material fact does not exist if it would be unreasonable for a jury, construing the evidence in a light most favorable to the non-moving party, to find for the non-moving party on the disputed factual issue.

[*8] In Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 106 S. Ct. 2548 (1986), the Supreme Court indicated that HN3[] a non-moving party in a summary judgment motion has an affirmative obligation to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of each essential element to that party's case on which that party will bear the burden of proof at trial, if the existence of that element is brought into issue by the moving party. Id. at 2548. In neither of these cases did the Supreme Court modify the longstanding requirement that the district court give the non-moving party the benefit of all reasonable inferences that can be drawn from the underlying facts. See Trnka v. Elanco Products Co., 709 F.2d 1223, 1225 (8th Cir. 1983).

A. Antitrust Claims.

Plaintiffs, in essence, assert four separate antitrust claims. They claim the acquisition of Republic by NW constitutes an unlawful contract or combination that restrains trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and attempts to or does create a monopoly in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Next, plaintiffs claim that NW and Simmons conspired to restrain trade in violation of Section 1 and conspired to monopolize or [*9] attempt to monopolize the Detroit regional airline market in violation of Section 2.

1. Northwest's Acquisition of Republic.

In response to plaintiffs' claims that the acquisition of Republic by NW violated Section 1 and 2, NW argues that plaintiffs are precluded from collaterally attacking the lawfulness of the Republic acquisition because the acquisition was subject to mandatory administrative review from which appeal could have been taken to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. 49 U.S.C. app. § 1378 (1982 & Supp. 1985). The Federal Aviation Act requires DOT approval of acquisitions similar to that proposed by NW. HN4[] Section 1378(b) (1) mandates rejection of the transaction:

(A) if it would result in a monopoly or would be in furtherance of any combination or conspiracy to monopolize or to attempt to monopolize the business of air transportation in any region of the United States; or

(B) the effect of which in any region of the United States may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly, or which in any other manner would be in restraint of trade, unless the Board finds that the anticompetitive effects of the proposed [*10] transaction are outweighed in the public interest by the probable effect of the transaction in meeting significant transportation conveniences and needs of the public, and unless it finds that such significant transportation conveniences and needs may not be satisfied by a reasonably available alternative having materially less anticompetitive effects.

---

[4] HN2[] Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c), the district court should grant summary judgment only "if the pleadings, depositions and answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law."

In addition, approval of the transaction should be denied if it would not be consistent with the public interest.

All interested persons can participate in the approval process, including the hearing before the Civil Aeronautics Board ("CAB"). In the instant case, participants included eight other airlines, the Minneapolis/St. Paul Metropolitan Airport Commission, the Michigan Department of Transportation, and the Antitrust Division of the United States Department of Justice. The Justice Department opposed the acquisition. HN5[] The DOT approval of the acquisition is subject to review by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, upon the appeal by any person with a "substantial interest" in the approval. 49 U.S.C. app. § 1486(a). The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia shall have "exclusive jurisdiction" [*11] to review the determination of the CAB or the DOT. 49 U.S.C. app. § 1486(d).

Relying on Supreme Court and Court of Appeals decisions interpreting statutory procedures similar to the above-mentioned procedures, NW asserts that FBA had the opportunity to challenge the acquisition and is precluded from relitigating identical issues in a second forum.

The seminal case in this area of law is City of Tacoma v. Taxpayers of Tacoma, 357 U.S. 320 (1957). In City of Tacoma, the City applied for a license under the Federal Powers Act to construct and operate a hydro-electric power plant by damming the Cowlitz River. The project necessarily involved the condemning of a fish hatchery owned by the state of Washington. The State objected to the issuance of the license, and following an administrative hearing conducted by the Federal Power Commission, the City was awarded the license. The State appealed the decision, but the Court of Appeals affirmed. Subsequently the City commenced a state action for a judgment declaring valid a bond issue to finance the project, and the state court enjoined the City. The Washington Supreme Court affirmed on the grounds that the City was not authorized to [*12] condemn state-owned property.

The Supreme Court reversed, noting that the language of the Federal Powers Act, which is essentially the same language as that contained in the Federal Aviation Act, vested exclusive review of the Commission's decision in the Court of Appeals. Consequently, the Court reasoned that the parties were precluded from relitigating all issues "inhering in the controversy," which included the issue before the Washington state courts.

In a more recent case, the Supreme Court broadened the holding of City of Tacoma to preclude relitigation, not only by persons who participated in the administrative proceeding and appeal therefrom, but also persons whose interests were at stake and had an opportunity to participate in the administrative proceeding and seek appeal therefrom. Port of Boston Marine Terminal Ass'n. v. Rederiaktiebolaget Transatlantic, 400 U.S. 62, 72 (1970). See also North American Savings Ass'n. v. Federal Home Loan Bank Board, 755 F.2d 122 (8th Cir. 1985).

Plaintiffs' claims challenging the lawfulness of the Republic acquisition on antitrust grounds are essentially the same issues resolved by the CAB in the administrative proceeding from [*13] which appeal was not taken. Certainly, FBA had a "substantial interest" in the approval within the meaning of the Act. Accordingly, the holding of City of Tacoma and Marine Terminal encompass the facts of the present case and preclude the plaintiffs from collaterally attacking the acquisition. This is so, despite the fact that plaintiffs chose not to participate in the administrative proceeding. [5]

[*14] 2. Conspiracy to Violate Section 1 and Section 2.

---

[5] The court recognizes and is troubled by the dilemma imposed upon a person in the plaintiffs' position as a result of the court's ruling. FBA was in the awkward position of having to choose between risking its present and future business relationship with NW by opposing the acquisition in the administrative proceeding or be precluded from relitigating the antitrust issues at a future date. Nevertheless, the court feels constrained to abide by the precedent established by the Supreme Court and the Eighth Circuit. Moreover, the court appreciates the countervailing economic and societal benefits derived from attaching finality to issues resolved by administrative agencies and Courts of Appeals.

An additional aside concerns the failure of the DOT to grant NW immunity pursuant to 49 U.S.C. § 1384. Statutory immunity, however, is a separate and distinct issue from the preclusion issue raised by NW.

In response to plaintiffs' claims that NW and Simmons conspired to violate Section 1 and Section 2, both defendants seem to focus their argument on plaintiffs' alleged failure to proffer sufficient evidence of concerted activity, although each defendant raises alternative grounds for rejecting plaintiffs' claims, such as the restraint of trade was reasonable or that there was no antitrust injury. The court agrees that plaintiffs have not provided sufficient evidence of a conspiracy to violate Section 1 and Section 2 that injured FBA. The court will not rule on defendants' alternative arguments for rejecting plaintiffs' antitrust claims, other than to note that upon cursory review of these alternative arguments, the court is skeptical that any of these grounds could support a motion for summary judgment.

Any discussion regarding concerted activity in the context of Section 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act should begin with Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Right Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752 (1983). In Monsanto the defendant, a manufacturer of agricultural chemicals, refused to renew plaintiff's distributorship because, according to defendant, [*15] plaintiff failed to adequately train its salesmen and promote sales to customers. Plaintiff argued and the Court of Appeals agreed that evidence of numerous complaints to defendant by competing distributors about plaintiff's price-cutting practices was sufficient evidence to establish a conspiracy to set prices.

First, the Supreme Court emphasized that in distributor termination cases a manufacturer "generally has a right to deal, or refuse to deal, with whomever it likes, as long as it does so independently." Id. at 760-61. This is so, despite the fact that in many cases unilateral nonprice restrictions are inherently anticompetitive and restrain trade, although the focus of the restraint is on intrabrand competition. Then the court expressed concern that the positive economic benefits of nonprice restrictions would be seriously eroded if ambiguous evidence such as normal and indeed necessary distributor/manufacturer communications is allowed to create an inference of concerted activity. To protect against such erosion, the Monsanto Court HN6[] elevated the burden antitrust plaintiffs must bear to establish concerted activity. The Court stated that "[t]here must be evidence that [*16] tends to exclude the possibility that the manufacturer and the non-terminated distributors were acting independently." Id. at 764. In addition, "plaintiffs should present direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the manufacturer and others 'had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.'" [6] Id.

More recently the Supreme Court has reaffirmed the elevated evidentiary standard adopted in Monsanto, in Matsushita Elec. Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio, 475 U.S. 574, 588 (1985). In Matsushita, the plaintiffs alleged that defendants conspired to monopolize a particular market through predatory pricing. The Court stated that HN7[] although "'on summary judgment, the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts . . . must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion . . .' [the] antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence . . . so [*17] that conduct consistent with permissible competition as well as illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy." Id. at 587-88 (citations omitted). Instead, a plaintiff "must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inference of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed [the plaintiff]. Id. at 588. Moreover, the Court stated that when plaintiffs' claim makes no economic sense, plaintiffs "must come forward with more persuasive evidence to support their claim than would otherwise be necessary." Id. at 587.

It is in the shadow of Monsanto and Matsushita that the court reviews the plaintiffs' alleged inferences. [7] In their memorandum, plaintiffs seem to offer two alternative arguments in support of finding concerted activity. [8] First,

---

[6] "A common scheme" requires that evidence "be presented both that the distributor communicated its acquiesence or agreement, and that this was sought by the manufacturer." Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 764 n. 9.

[7] The United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit has followed the holding of Monsanto. See, e.g. Lomar Wholesale Grocery, Inc. v. Dieter's Gourmet Foods, Inc., 824 F.2d 582, 589 (8th Cir. 1987); Famous Brands, Inc. v. David Sherman Corp., 814 F.2d 517, 523 (8th Cir. 1987); Pumps & Power Co. v. Southern States Industries Inc., 787 F.2d 1252, 1256-57 (8th Cir. 1986).

[8] Plaintiffs' second argument is addressed in footnote 13.

plaintiffs argue that NW and Simmons conspired to terminate FBA if FBA did not consent to the market division demanded by Simmons. In their memorandum, plaintiffs list 16 "items of evidence" that they allege establishes the existence of the conspiracy. Upon careful review of the 16 "items of evidence," however, the court concludes [*18] that the proffered "evidence" does not establish a reasonable inference of conspiracy in light of the competing inference of independent action.

While the court intends to review plaintiffs' list of "evidence" in some detail, the "evidence" contained in numbers 1, 3, 4, 5 and 16 will not be discussed because the facts or conduct described in these numbered items are consistent with a unilateral decision by NW to terminate FBA. [9] [*19] Moreover, the "evidence" contained in numbers 8 and 14 are not sufficiently specific to allow a response. [10] The record is too voluminous to locate inconsistencies other than those referred to in the plaintiffs' memorandum.

Plaintiffs' "item of evidence" number 2 refers to "Simmons' admission that it demanded certain markets exclusively, with the knowledge that the result of its demand would be the exclusion of Fischer Brothers." Simmons' demand of exclusivity, standing alone, does not evidence conspiracy. Indeed, FBA admits to making a similar demand. Moreover, plaintiffs' statement regarding Simmons' state of knowledge is not evidence but merely a conclusory allegation.

Plaintiffs' "item of evidence" number 7 refers to a "secret" meeting between NW and Simmons that was held after the September 12 meeting in Minneapolis and before the September 22-23 meeting. The purpose of the meeting was to define the scope of the Detroit market, and reach a proposed agreement between Simmons and NW on dividing the market. Plaintiffs argue that this meeting shows NW and Simmons agreed that [*20] FBA was going to be terminated. Viewed in context, however, the meeting shows nothing of the sort.

As stated above, the "secret" meeting occurred after the September 12 meeting wherein FBA agreed in principle to sell its airline to Simmons but before the September 22-23 meeting. Moreover, the NW memo dated September 22 that summarized the discussions at the "secret" meeting stated, "[t]he outcome of the meeting seems to be that Simmons will acquire Fischer Brothers and use their airplanes for expansion." Brewer deposition at 46-47 (emphases added). Accordingly, the meeting and particularly the memorandum summarizing the meeting is inconsistent with or at least neutral concerning plaintiffs' allegation of conspiratorial termination.

In "item of evidence" numbers 10 and 12 plaintiffs state that NW's conduct in light of its opinion that it had no contractual duties or obligations to Simmons provides evidence of a conspiracy to terminate FBA. To support this conclusion plaintiffs relied on the deposition of Terry L. Hall, corporate counsel for NW. In his deposition, Hall states that prior to actual merger, NW did not have any contractual duties or obligations to Simmons or Express. [*21] Hall went on to indicate, however, that it was his opinion that when the acquisition was completed, NW would be contractually obligated to Simmons and Express. Accordingly, item numbers 10 and 12 misrepresent NW's position regarding NW's contractual obligations to Simmons, and provides no support to plaintiffs' claim of conspiratorial termination.

---

[9] Plaintiffs' "item of evidence" numbers 1, 3, 4, 5 and 16 read as follows:

1. Northwest's admission that it terminated Fischer Bros. for failure to reach an agreement with Simmons;

3. Northwest's financial interest in Simmons, and its desire to sell its interest at a profit;

4. the personal relationship between Rasmusson and the principals of Simmons;

5. the presence of Rasmusson at the September 22-23 meetings in Chicago; and

16. the filing of Simmons' cross-claim against Northwest as a "friendly lawsuit."

[10] Plaintiffs' "item of evidence" numbers 8 and 14 read as follows:

8. the inconsistency between the testimony of Rasmusson and the Simmons' principals; and

14. the credibility problems and discrepancies in testimony of major witnesses in this case, including Rasmusson, Magary, Hall, Rothmeier, Abbott, Murray, and Piper.

Plaintiffs "item of evidence" number 11 refers to NW's "admission that it permitted Simmons to exercise veto power over any route to be given to FBA prior to the September 24 cancellation." Essentially, both Simmons and FBA had veto power over any proposed route division offered by the other because NW stated the division of routes should be mutually agreeable to both the regional carriers in the particular market. Second, NW denies that prior to September 24, Simmons had the type of one-sided "veto power" plaintiffs suggest. Consequently, the only evidence regarding such "veto power" is the testimony of FBA officials. This testimony, however, is contradicted somewhat by the telephone conversations surreptitiously taped by plaintiffs which do not suggest NW believed Simmons had the type of one-sided "veto power" plaintiffs are intimating.

[*22] Plaintiffs' strongest "evidence" of concerted activity is contained in item numbers 6, 13 and 15. Construing the information contained in item numbers 6, 13 and 15 in a light most favorable to plaintiffs, plaintiffs have established that after Simmons and FBA failed to reach a specific agreement concerning the sale of FBA, Simmons contacted NW, NW sent a notice of termination to FBA, and Simmons revoked its offer to purchase FBA. [11]

Standing alone, this evidence might allow a fact finder to draw the inference that NW agreed to terminate FBA at Simmons' urging. NW asserts and the court agrees, however, that the inference of conspiracy suggested by plaintiffs is unreasonable in light of the competing inference of independent action suggested by NW. NW's claim of independent action is also responsive to plaintiffs' sole remaining "item of evidence," item number 9. [*23] [12]

NW asserts that following the acquisition of Republic, it was confronted with the undesirable, from its perspective, situation of having two regional carriers serving overlapping routes at Detroit and Minneapolis/St. Paul. NW had several options available to remedy the situation. First, NW could have terminated the contract of one of the two carriers, either lawfully by satisfying the notice requirement if such a provision existed, or by breaching the contract, hence subjecting itself to a breach of contract action. Second, NW could have unilaterally decided how the routes were to be divided among the carriers, and impose this division upon the carriers, again exposing itself to a breach of contract action given the exclusivity provisions contained in most if not all of the contracts. Third, NW could have requested that the carriers mutually agree to divide the routes between themselves, with the implicit understanding that if no mutual agreement was reached, then Northwest would be forced to [*24] choose one of the two previously mentioned methods of resolving the situation. [13] NW claims that it chose to implement the third option. As evidence of this choice, NW notes that Mesaba and Express mutually agree on a division of the routes at Minneapolis/St. Paul.

[*25] NW further asserts that it became evident following the September 22-23 meeting in Chicago that FBA and Simmons were not going to mutually agree upon either the division of routes or the sale of FBA to Simmons. Consequently, NW was forced to decide whether to divide the routes itself and impose this division upon FBA and Simmons or terminate FBA. [14] Unilaterally imposing a route division on FBA and Simmons would have exposed

---

[11] Both defendants refute the contentions in plaintiffs' items 6, 13, and 15. NW argues that it was one of the Fischer brothers who contacted Rasmusson following the breakdown in negotiations, while Simmons argues that it did not find out about the notice of termination until several weeks following the actual notice.

[12] Plaintiffs "item of evidence" number 9 reads as follows:

9. the inability of Northwest to present a coherent, consistent explanation of the decision to terminate Fischer Bros.;

[13] As the court interprets the plaintiffs' memorandum, FBA argues that this third alternative also constitutes concerted activity. In other words, plaintiffs seem to argue that by requesting FBA and Simmons to divide the Detroit routes and by terminating FBA because a mutually agreeable division was not accomplished, the request and the termination, even if the termination was unilateral, constitutes a conspiracy. The court disagrees.

While it might be that if Simmons and FBA agreed to divide routes, such conduct might establish concerted activity in a suit brought by a passenger alleging increased fares as a result of the territorial allocations, FBA's alleged injury does not flow from the attempted agreement to divide the Detroit routes. Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 586 (conspiracy must have caused plaintiffs to suffer an antitrust injury); Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-o-Mat Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489 (1977). Instead, the alleged injury was caused by the termination, and if such termination was the result of a unilateral decision by Northwest, then there is no concerted activity for which FBA has an injury.

NW to a breach of contract action by both carriers because of the exclusivity provisions contained in their respective contracts. Accordingly, NW argues that the language of the respective contracts explains and justifies its unilateral decision to terminate FBA.

In sum, plaintiffs have failed to provide evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that NW acted independently when terminating FBA. Consequently, plaintiffs' inference of conspiracy is unreasonable [*26] in light of the competing inference of independent action. Moreover, plaintiffs have not provided sufficient direct and circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that NW and Simmons had a conscious commitment to a common scheme to terminate FBA.

B. Claims for Interference with Prospective Advantage and Interference with Contract.

In their first amended complaint, plaintiffs allege that Simmons intentionally "enticed" NW to breach its contract with FBA. In addition, plaintiffs allege that both defendants conspired to interfere with FBA's "prospective advantage." With regard to plaintiffs' claim of interference with prospective advantage, [15] both defendants erroneously assumed plaintiffs' claim was directed at FBA's business relationship with NW. Instead, plaintiffs' counsel informed the court at oral argument [16] that the claim was directed at defendants' alleged interference with FBA's business relationships with its future customers.

[*27] Both of the above tort claims are based upon an alleged agreement between NW and Simmons to terminate FBA. Plaintiffs, however, have simply failed to create a factual issue regarding the existence of an agreement to terminate FBA. The court concurs with Simmons' suggestion that the disposition of plaintiffs' tort claims should follow the disposition of plaintiffs' antitrust claims. Without a conspiracy to terminate FBA, NW had legal justification to invoke the termination provision of the contract, [17] and Simmons can rely on Restatement (Second) of Torts § 768(1) (1979).

C. Fraud Claim.

Plaintiffs [*28] allege that NW fraudulently misrepresented its intention to perform under the FBA contract. HN8[] Normally, the knowing false representation must be of a past or present material fact. See Florenzano v. Olson, 387 N.W.2d 168, 174 n. 4 (Minn. 1986). Consequently, a representation "as to a future act is an insufficient basis to support an action for fraud merely because the represented act or event does not take place." Vandeputte v. Soderholm, 216 N.W.2d 144, 147 (Minn. 1974). It is true, however, that a misrepresentation of a present intent to perform a specific act in the future could amount to fraud. Id. Plaintiffs must show that the promisor (NW) had no intention to perform at the time the promise was made. Id.

Based upon the record before the court, plaintiffs have failed to show that at the time NW entered into the contract with FBA it had no intention to comply with the terms of the contract, including the exclusivity provision. NW and Republic had yet to reach an agreement concerning acquisition. Moreover, any such agreement would be subject to DOT approval. These contingencies prevented any certainty concerning the inability of NW to comply with the [14] NW did not consider terminating Simmons because, unlike the FBA contract, the Simmons contract did not allow for termination without cause upon giving six months' notice. Instead, the Simmons contract could not be terminated until October 29, 1988, without breaching the terms of the contract.

---

[15] Interference with prospective advantage is also known as wrongful interference with business relationships and interference with contractual relations. See Wild v. Rarig, 234 N.W.2d 775, 790-91 n. 16 (Minn. 1975).

[16] For some unknown reason, plaintiffs' memorandum did not address the issue of interference with prospective advantage.

[17] In addition, plaintiffs' tort claim against Northwest is subject to mandatory arbitration which is now time-barred. The "arising out of or relates to" language of the arbitration clause includes tort, as well as contract claims, which involve a significant aspect of the contractual relationship. Cf. Morgan v. Smith, Barney, Harris, Upham & Co., 729 F.2d 1163, 1167 (8th Cir. 1984). Plaintiffs' claim that Northwest interfered with FBA's prospective advantage by terminating the FBA contract pursuant to a conspiracy is a dispute that arises out of or relates to the contract.

exclusivity [*29] provision. Perhaps more important, NW could have complied fully with the exclusivity provision, if following DOT approval but prior to integration with Republic, it would have unilaterally terminated FBA's contract pursuant to the termination provision contained in the contract.

In addition, plaintiffs' fraud claim is subject to mandatory arbitration which is now time-barred. Contrary to plaintiffs' assertions otherwise, HN9[] the Arbitration Act establishes that a court must apply federal law to resolve the issue of whether the question of fraud in the inducement is itself an arbitrable controversy. Moses H. Cone Hospital v. Mercury Const. Corp., 460 U.S. 1, 24-25 (1983); Prima Paint Corp. v. Flood & Conklin Mfg. Co., 388 U.S. 395, 402-404 (1967).

HN10[] The federal law principles governing the arbitrability of fraud in the inducement claim are well settled. If the claim is fraud in the inducement of the arbitration clause itself--an issue which goes to the "making" of the agreement to arbitrate--the federal court may proceed to adjudicate it. Prima Paint, 388 U.S. at 403-404. The language and policy of the Arbitration Act, however, requires that allegations of fraud in the inducement [*30] of the entire contract be considered arbitrable. E.g. Moses H. Cone, 460 U.S. at 24; Prima Paint, 388 U.S. at 404. Since plaintiffs' claim is directed at fraud in the inducement as the entire contract, this claim is subject to the arbitration clause.

D. Breach of Contract and Breach of Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing.

In their first amended complaint, plaintiffs allege NW breached the FBA contract by failing to comply with the exclusivity and expansion provisions. In addition, plaintiffs allege NW's conduct constituted a breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing implied by the contract. NW argues that these claims are subject to mandatory arbitration which is now time-barred. [18] Plaintiffs argue that FBA was not required to arbitrate its contract claims.

[*31] The court must determine whether the parties agreed to arbitrate their dispute. Mitsubishi Motors v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, 473 U.S. 614, 626 (1984). As indicated above, HN11[] whether the parties agreed to arbitrate is determined by applying "federal substantive law of arbitrability. . ." Moses H. Cone, 460 U.S. at 24. That body of law counsels:

That questions of arbitrability must be addressed with a healthy regard for the federal policy favoring arbitration. . . The Arbitration Act establishes that, as a matter of federal law, any doubts concerning the scope of arbitrable issues should be resolved in favor of arbitration whether the problem at hand is the construction of the contract language itself or an allegation of waiver, delay, or like defense to arbitrability.

Moses H. Cone, 460 U.S. at 24-25.

Plaintiffs offer three arguments against enforcement of the arbitration clause. First, plaintiffs assert that the language of the arbitration clause itself make arbitration inapplicable given the facts of this case. Specifically, plaintiffs emphasize the language that "[a]ny dispute . . . which cannot be resolved amicably by the Parties shall be referred to arbitration within [*32] 120 days of the date of the alleged breach." Plaintiffs argue that after NW's various breaches of the expressed and implied terms of the contract, NW deceitfully led FBA to believe that their dispute could be resolved amicably. Plaintiffs further argue that when they discovered NW did not intend to resolve the dispute amicably, 120 days had lapsed since the date of the various breaches. Accordingly, plaintiffs contend the "resolved amicably" language makes the arbitration clause inapplicable in the present case.

---

[18] The arbitration clause reads, in part, as follows:

(a) Any dispute, controversy or claim between the Parties, as to which there are no other necessary or indispensable parties, arising out of or relating to this Agreement, including its breach, or the transactions contemplated by this Agreement, which cannot be resolved amicably by the Parties, shall be referred to arbitration within 120 days of the date of the alleged breach occurred.

While the court is somewhat troubled by the ambiguous "resolved amicably" language contained in the arbitration clause, as indicated, federal policy regarding arbitration requires resolving any close question in favor of arbitrability. With that federal policy in mind, the court rejects the plaintiffs' interpretation of the arbitration clause in question. The court finds either of two alternative interpretations of the arbitration clause more reasonable given the language of the arbitration provision and the federal policy underlying arbitration.

First, the language could be interpreted to require plaintiffs to request arbitration within 120 days of the breach if not resolved [*33] by then, even though the parties are continuing their effort to resolve the dispute amicably. Second, the language could be interpreted to require plaintiffs to request arbitration within 120 days after it became apparent that the dispute would not be resolved amicably. Based on either interpretation, plaintiffs have failed to comply with the arbitration provision.

Next, plaintiffs argue that Simmons is a necessary and indispensable party to the breach of contract claims. In response, NW refers the court's attention to Helzberg's Diamond Shops, Inc. v. Valley West Des Moines Shopping Center, Inc., 564 F.2d 816 (8th Cir. 1977), a decision authored by this court while sitting by designation with the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. Upon reviewing Helzberg, the court finds it on all fours with the instant case. In Helzberg the court held that "a person does not become indispensable to an action to determine rights or obligations under a contract simply because that person's rights or obligations under an entirely separate contract will be affected by the result of the action." Id. at 820.

Finally, plaintiffs argue that NW waived its right to arbitration [*34] and is estopped from asserting arbitration as a defense to FBA's contract claims. The typical waiver case involves a litigant attempting to rely on an arbitration clause in the eleventh hour of the litigation process. See, e.g. National Foundation for Cancer Research v. A. G. Edwards & Son Inc., 821 F.2d 772 (D.C. Cir. 1987); Price v. Drexall Burnan Lambert Inc., 791 F.2d 1156 (5th Cir 1986); Reid Burton Const. v. Carpenters Dist. Council, 614 F.2d 698 (10th Cir. 1980). A court must consider whether the conduct of the party invoking the arbitration clause was clearly inconsistent with that party's intent to arbitrate.

In the present case, NW's conduct is perfectly consistent with its right to invoke the arbitration clause as a bar to plaintiffs' contract claims. Contrary to plaintiffs' intimations otherwise, NW had no obligation to seek arbitration within the 120-day time limitation. It is FBA who is the alleged aggrieved party, not NW. NW expressly asserted its arbitration defense in its answer to plaintiffs' complaint, and its participation in the lawsuit does not amount to a waiver of this defense.

Based upon the file as presently constituted and the foregoing discussion, [*35] IT IS ORDERED That defendants' motions for summary judgment are granted.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED That the Clerk enter judgment as follows:

JUDGMENT

IT IS ORDERED, AJUDGED AND DECREED That plaintiffs William R. Fischer, The Estate of Betty L. Fischer, Montford R. Fischer and Bonita G. Fischer have and recover nothing on their claims against defendants NWA, Inc, Northwest Airlines, Inc., and Simmons Airlines, Inc., and their claims shall be dismissed with prejudice.

DATED: June 9, 1988.

Telerate Sys., Inc. v. Caro

United States District Court for the Southern District of New York

June 10, 1988, Decided

No. 85 Civ. 9132 (DNE)

Reporter

689 F. Supp. 221 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5445 ; 8 U.S.P.Q.2D (BNA) 1740 ; Copy. L. Rep. (CCH) P26,292; 64 Rad. Reg. 2d (P & F) 1491

Telerate Systems, Inc., Plaintiff, v. Marshall Caro and Programit, Inc., Defendants terminal, database, subscribers, customers, Defendants', monopoly power, trade secret, monopolization, copying, users, market power, fair use, protocol, infringement, likelihood of success, relevant market, merits, registration certificate, software, preliminary injunction, tying arrangement, monopoly, products, specific intent, interchangeability, interception, unauthorized, connected, display, network

Core Terms

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN1[] Injunctions, Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

The standard for the issuance of a preliminary injunction is a showing of (a) irreparable harm and (b) either (1) likelihood of success on the merits or (2) sufficiently serious question going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation and a balance of hardships tipping decidedly toward the party requesting the preliminary injunctive relief.

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Torts > ... > Contracts > Intentional Interference > Elements

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

HN2[] Evidence, Burdens of Proof

To establish tortious interference with contract under New York law, a plaintiff must prove that: 1) there is a valid contract between the plaintiff and a third party; 2) the defendant knew of the contract; 3) the defendant intentionally and improperly procured the breach of that contract; and 4) damages resulted therefrom.

Contracts Law > Defenses > Ambiguities & Mistakes > General Overview

Contracts Law > Contract Interpretation > General Overview

HN3[] Defenses, Ambiguities & Mistakes

Where two parties disagree as to the meaning of a contract term does not necessarily establish that the contract is ambiguous.

Copyright Law > Copyright Infringement Actions > Civil Infringement Actions > Burdens of Proof

Copyright Law > Copyright Infringement Actions > Civil Infringement Actions > General Overview

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Elements > General Overview

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Elements > Ownership

HN4[] Civil Infringement Actions, Burdens of Proof

A plaintiff in a copyright case must prove two elements: (1) ownership of the copyright; and (2) infringement by the defendant.

Copyright Law > Scope of Copyright Protection > Formalities > General Overview

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Presumptions > General Overview

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Presumptions > Validity of Copyright

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Presumptions > Validity of Facts

Copyright Law > ... > Formalities > Deposit & Registration Requirements > General Overview

Copyright Law > ... > Deposit & Registration Requirements > Registration > General Overview

Copyright Law > ... > Deposit & Registration Requirements > Registration > Registration Certificates

HN5[] Scope of Copyright Protection, Formalities

A copyright registration certificate made before or within five years after first publication of the work shall constitute prima facie evidence of the validity of the copyright and of the facts stated in the certificate. 17 U.S.C.S. § 410(c).

Copyright Law > ... > Deposit & Registration Requirements > Registration > Registration Certificates

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > Discretionary Powers

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Presumptions > Validity of Copyright

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Presumptions > Validity of Facts

Copyright Law > Scope of Copyright Protection > Formalities > General Overview

Copyright Law > ... > Formalities > Deposit & Registration Requirements > General Overview

HN6[] Registration, Registration Certificates

It is within the court's discretion to determine the evidentiary weight to be afforded a registration certificate dated more than five years after the first date of publication. 17 U.S.C.S. § 410(c).

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Presumptions > General Overview

HN7[] Civil Infringement Actions, Presumptions

The sale of copying equipment, like the sale of other articles of commerce, does not constitute contributory infringement if the product is widely used for legitimate, unobjectionable purposes. Indeed, it need merely be capable of substantial noninfringing uses.

Copyright Law > ... > Fair Use > Fair Use Determination > Factors

Copyright Law > ... > Defenses > Fair Use > General Overview

HN8[] Fair Use Determination, Factors

The Copyright Act, 17 U.S.C.S. § 107, provides that the fair use of a copyrighted work is not an infringement of copyright. Section 107 also provides four factors that a court must consider in determining whether a particular use is fair: 1. the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a commercial nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes; 2. the nature of the copyrighted work; 3. the amount and substantiality of the portion used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole; and 4. the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work.

Copyright Law > ... > Defenses > Fair Use > General Overview

HN9[] Defenses, Fair Use

Although a commercial use does not by itself defeat a defense of fair use, every commercial use of copyrighted material is presumptively an unfair exploitation of the monopoly privilege that belongs to the owner of the copyright.

Copyright Law > ... > Defenses > Fair Use > General Overview

HN10[] Defenses, Fair Use

The crux of the profit/non-profit distinction is whether the user stands to profit from exploitation of the copyrighted material without paying the customary price.

Copyright Law > ... > Defenses > Fair Use > General Overview

HN11[] Defenses, Fair Use

Although a court, in deciding the question of fair use, may consider whether a work is original, imaginative, or creative, it may also consider whether the work represents a substantial investment of time and labor made in anticipation of financial return.

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Presumptions > General Overview

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Elements > General Overview

HN12[] Civil Infringement Actions, Presumptions

This effect on the market element requires proof either that a particular use is harmful, or that if it should become widespread, it would adversely affect the potential market for the copyrighted work. A plaintiff need not show actual present harm, nor need it show with certainty that future harm will result.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Overview & Legal Concepts > Privacy > Radio Communications

Communications Law > Federal Acts > Federal Communications Act > General Overview

Communications Law > Overview & Legal Concepts > Theft of Services > Radio Communications

HN13[] Privacy, Radio Communications

No person receiving, assisting in receiving, transmitting, or assisting in transmitting, any interstate or foreign communication by wire or radio shall divulge or publish the existence, contents, substance, purport, effect, or meaning thereof, except through authorized channels of transmission or reception to any person other than the addressee, his agent, or attorney. 19 U.S.C.S. § 119.

Communications Law > Federal Acts > Telecommunications Act > General Overview

HN14[] Federal Acts, Telecommunications Act

In order to establish liability under 47 U.S.C.S. § 605 a defendant must have intercepted or aided in the interception of, and divulged or published or aided the divulging or publishing of, a communication transmitted by the plaintiff.

Communications Law > Federal Acts > Telecommunications Act > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Criminal Offenses > Illegal Eavesdropping > General Overview

HN15[] Federal Acts, Telecommunications Act

Courts have held that the act of viewing a transmission that the viewer was not authorized to receive constitutes a publication.

Torts > Business Torts > General Overview

Trade Secrets Law > Trade Secret Determination Factors > Business Use

Torts > Business Torts > Unfair Business Practices > General Overview

Trade Secrets Law > Trade Secret Determination Factors > Continuous Use

Trade Secrets Law > Protected Information > General Overview

HN16[] Torts, Business Torts

A trade secret may consist of any formula, pattern, device or compilation of information which is used in one's business, and which gives him an opportunity to obtain an advantage over competitors who do not know or use it. A trade secret is a process or device for continuous use in the operation of the business.

Torts > Business Torts > Unfair Business Practices > General Overview

HN17[] Business Torts, Unfair Business Practices

It is clear that computer software is protectable under the law of trade secrets.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Trade Secrets Law > Protection of Secrecy > Absolute & Relative Secrecy

Torts > Business Torts > Unfair Business Practices > General Overview

Trade Secrets Law > Protection of Secrecy > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Protection of Secrecy > Reasonable Measures > Confidentiality Agreements & Restrictive Covenants

HN18[] Protection of Secrecy, Absolute & Relative Secrecy

Although a trade secret cannot be widely known absolute secrecy is not required. The Second Circuit requires that a trade secret be veiled in sufficient secrecy that except by use of improper means, there would be difficulty in acquiring the information.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Fraud > Wire Fraud > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Fraud > Computer Fraud > General Overview

HN19[] Fraud, Wire Fraud

Unauthorized phone access to a computer supports a wire fraud conviction where the computer source code is considered property.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Injunctions

Torts > ... > Contracts > Intentional Interference > Remedies

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

HN20[] Injunctions, Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

A preliminary injunction is a proper remedy in cases alleging a tortious interference with contract.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Violations

HN21[] Tying Arrangements, Clayton Act

Under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, and Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 14, the elements that will establish that a tying arrangement is per se illegal are: 1) effect on a not insubstantial amount of interstate commerce; 2) a tying and a tied product; 3) sufficient market power to enable the seller to coerce the buyer to accept the tied product and actual coercion; and 4) anticompetitive effects in the tied market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN22[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

The requirement that a not insubstantial amount of interstate commerce be affected in the tied market is a de minimis requirement. The relevant inquiry is the absolute dollar amount of the goods affected in the tied product market, as opposed to the proportion of the entire product market that the affected goods comprise. The Supreme Court has held amounts ranging from as little as $ 60,800 to be not insubstantial. The Second Circuit has held that $ 60,000 would definitely meet the substantiality threshold.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN23[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

To determine whether two distinct products exist in an alleged tying arrangement, the court should focus on the character of the demand for each product rather than on the function of the products.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN24[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

The Supreme Court has stated that the essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. Accordingly, not every refusal separately to sell two products is a restraint of trade. Only those refusals to sell products separately that impose an unreasonable restraint on trade. Arrangements that meet the characteristics of a per se illegal tie-in are presumptively unreasonable and therefore objectionable under the antitrust law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

HN25[] Sherman Act, Claims

To establish a claim for illegal monopolization, a party must show that the alleged monopolist possesses monopoly power in the relevant market, and that it has the intent to monopolize.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN26[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, provides that every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN27[] Relevant Market, Product Market Definition

The party alleging the monopoly violation bears the burden of establishing the relevant market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN28[] Relevant Market, Product Market Definition

The term "monopoly power" only has meaning if applied to a particular market. Defining the relevant market requires, at a minimum, determining the relevant product market and the relevant geographic area of competition. A market definition is necessary to determine whether the alleged monopolist has sufficient market power to meet the monopoly threshold.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN29[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

The standard the United States Supreme Court has enunciated as guiding the determination the parameters of a product market is the reasonable interchangeability test. The test of reasonable interchangeability comprises consideration of three issues. The first issue is functional interchangeability -- the degree to which various products are able to perform the same functions. A second aspect is reactive interchangeability. This concept represents the effect that a change in price of product X has on the demand for product Y. A third aspect is supply substitutability which refers to the extent to which producers would be willing to shift their resources from production of product X to production of product Y in response to price changes in product market Y, the alleged monopolized market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN30[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

A party asserting a claim of attempted monopolization must prove specific intent to monopolize and a dangerous probability of monopolization.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Acts & Mental States > Mens Rea > Specific Intent

HN31[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

A claim for attempted monopolization requires proof of specific intent to monopolize because conduct falling short of monopoly, is not illegal unless it is part of a plan to monopolize, or to gain such other control of a market as is equally forbidden. To make it so, the plaintiff must prove what in the criminal law is known as a specific intent; an intent which goes beyond the mere intent to do the act. Proof of such specific intent may be inferred from conduct of the seller, documentation, or industrial background. It may also be proved directly where internal memoranda or statements by employees indicate such a specific intent.

Counsel: [1] Leventhal & Senter, Washington, District of Columbia, Meredith S. Senter, of counsel, Hartman & Craven, New York, New York, Gary Stahl, of counsel, Ropes & Gray, Washington, District of Columbia, for Plaintiff.

Milberg, Weiss, Bershad, Specthrie & Lerach, New York, New York, Jared Specthrie and Sanford P. Dumain, of counsel, Fryer, Ross & Gowen, New York, New York, Hugh N. Fryer, of counsel, for Defendants.

Judges: Edelstein, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: EDELSTEIN

Opinion

[*1741] [*223] OPINION AND ORDER

EDELSTEIN, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

Plaintiff, Telerate Systems, Inc. ("Telerate"), a provider of financial information, has moved preliminarily to enjoin the defendants, Programit, Inc. ("Programit"), and its chairman and chief executive officer, Marshall Caro ("Caro"), from selling, manufacturing, and distributing a software package called "Excel-A-Rate." Plaintiff claims that defendants have 1) violated the copyright laws; 2) misappropriated plaintiff's trade secrets; 3) interfered with contracts between Telerate and some of their customers; and 4) violated the Telecommunications Act. [1] Defendants have cross-moved preliminary to enjoin plaintiff from disconnecting [2] Excel-A-Rate users from the Telerate network. Defendants contend that plaintiff has violated the federal antitrust laws. Plaintiff's motion is granted. Defendants' motion is denied. [2]

BACKGROUND

Telerate is a provider of computerized financial information. Specifically, plaintiff provides "real time" prices, rates, and other information for various financial instruments and commodities, as well as a news wire. Programit is a computer software development company that has manufactured and sold a program [3] it calls "Excel-A-Rate." The "Excel-A-Rate" program permits a subscriber to use a personal computer ("PC") to receive and to analyze the financial information provided by Telerate.

Plaintiff offers access to its database by several different methods. The most commonly used access method is through the Standard Telerate Network ("STN"). STN uses a number of telephone "party lines," [*224] each of which serves up to 16 subscribers. Each of the 16 parties on the line uses a terminal, called the Standard Telerate Terminal, which is leased to them by Telerate. Terminals on the STN may both receive and transmit data. The STN is the focus of this lawsuit.

[*1742] Plaintiff also offers access to its database through the STN "party lines" using a subscriber's own equipment, typically a personal computer ("PC"). See Cowles Reply Affid. paras. 16, 17. [3] To use this "hybrid" service, a subscriber must obtain permission from Telerate, which then supplies the subscriber with a floppy disk to program the PC. This service is more expensive than the STN service using the Telerate terminal.

[4] The information in the Telerate database may also be received using Standard Output Protocol ("SOP") service. Under SOP service, a Telerate regional computer is connected directly by a point-to-point communication line to the customer's computer. Telerate does not provide a terminal to SOP customers. SOP subscribers not only can receive data, but also may store the data, process it and display it on multiple screens that are connected to their computer. This service is significantly more expensive than STN and is economical only if a number of terminals are used.

Telerate also offers Telerate Access Service ("TAS"). TAS subscribers use their own terminals and access the database through Tymnet, a private network. As under the "hybrid" STN service, Telerate provides a TAS subscriber with a floppy disk containing a program that allows access to the system.

---

[1] The complaint also contains a Lanham Act claim and state law theft of services and unfair competition claims. Although these claims were not addressed at the hearing on the motion for a preliminary injunction, plaintiff has reserved the right to pursue these claims at trial.

[2] Plaintiff moved to supplement the record with additional affidavits. Defendants oppose this motion. The court has considered this additional material, however, the additional material did not affect the outcome of the motion.

[3] Richard J. Cowles is Executive Vice President of Telerate.

Telerate also offers two related services: Broadcast Service, whereby subscribers receive information via satellite and Sideband Service by which subscribers receive information through an FM radio link. Under these two access modes, the customer uses his own equipment, usually a PC, and a floppy disk provided by Telerate. These [5] two services do not allow access to the entire database. Telerate also provides access to its database through other financial information networks by means of such other networks' equipment, and has also provided a number of multi-drop "party lines" to a company in Canada that relicenses access to the ultimate consumer.

Plaintiff advised defendants that it considered the use of the Excel-A-Rate to be a violation of the Standard Telerate Agreement, which is the contract between Telerate and STN subscribers. Plaintiff has also advised subscribers that have informed Telerate of plans to install Excel-A-Rate that this would constitute a violation of the standard agreement.

The standard Telerate agreement provides that the subscriber shall not move Telerate equipment and that no foreign equipment shall be interfaced with Telerate equipment. For a fee, Telerate will waive this provision and permit subscribers to attach equipment to the Telerate terminal including a printer or a PC using the Excel-A-Rate program.

Excel-A-Rate

The Excel-A-Rate program permits an STN subscriber to receive Telerate data through a PC rather than a Telerate Terminal. Excel-A-Rate enables the PC to [6] emulate the Telerate Terminal because it contains the Standard Telerate Protocol ("STP"). A protocol is a series of procedures and conventions that govern communications between a computer and various terminals linked to that computer. See Affidavit of Anthony Sabatini, Jr. para. 2 ("Sabatini Affid."). [4] Put another way, the protocol tells the computer "how" as opposed to "what" to communicate. See Sabatini Affid. para. 2.

A PC equipped with Excel-A-Rate does more than the basic Telerate terminal. In addition to simply sending, receiving, and displaying data, Excel-A-Rate permits the user continuously to update data requests and also to obtain a hard copy of the data. Excel-A-Rate also allows the subscriber to copy the data onto a disk and analyze the [*225] data. Further, Excel-A-Rate enables the user to attach additional terminals to the system.

Defendants have marketed Excel-A-Rate as a "way to get the most from [7] Telerate." See Plaintiff's Ex. 4. A fact sheet distributed by defendants describes the Excel-A-Rate as a software package that replaces the Telerate terminal and enables a subscriber to connect a PC directly to the Telerate data line. Defendants promotional literature has also focused on the updating and copying features of the program.

Relationship Between Caro and Telerate

From late 1980 until early 1983, defendant Caro worked for Telerate as a consultant. Caro's first project was to develop a terminal that would permit a user to obtain multiple page updates of data and to display them on multiple screens. As part of this project, Caro worked on a written description of the Standard Telerate Protocol. In order to create this document, Caro was given access to the STP. In May of 1981, Caro completed the description of the STP. The completed document contained the following legend:

> [1743] Copyright 1981 by Telerate Systems Incorporated. All rights reserved. The information contained herein is proprietary and may not be reproduced in whole or in part without the explicit written permission of Telerate Systems Incorporated.

Caro was also involved in a number of other [8] projects for Telerate including: writing a description and implementation guide for the SOP; development of a PC terminal that would use the STP; work on a "driver" for a

---

[4] Anthony Sabatini, Jr. is Vice President for Systems Development of Telerate.

PC that would use a standard industry protocol; and work on documenting a broadcast protocol. Sabatini Reply Affid. para. 62. The PC terminal project and the broadcast protocol project both involved access to the STP.

I. PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

In this circuit, HN1[] the standard for the issuance of a preliminary injunction is a showing of "(a) irreparable harm and (b) either (1) likelihood of success on the merits or (2) sufficiently serious question going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation and a balance of hardships tipping decidedly toward the party requesting the preliminary injunctive relief." Kaplan v. Board of Educ., 759 F.2d 256, 259 (2d Cir. 1985); accord Patchogue Nursing Center v. Bowen, 797 F.2d 1137, 1141 (2d Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1030, 107 S. Ct. 873, 93 L. Ed. 2d 828 (1987).

LIKELIHOOD OF SUCCESS ON THE [9] MERITS

A. TORTIOUS INTERFERENCE WITH CONTRACT

HN2[] To establish tortious interference with contract under New York law, plaintiff must prove that:

1) there is a valid contract between the plaintiff and a third party; and

2) the defendant knew of the contract; and

3) the defendant intentionally and improperly procured the breach of that contract; and

4) damages resulted therefrom.

Forty Exchange Co. v. Cohen, 125 Misc. 2d 475, 481-82, 479 N.Y.S.2d 628, 633 (N.Y. Civ. Ct. 1984); see Universal City Studios, Inc. v. Nintendo Co., 797 F.2d 70, 75 (2d Cir. 1986).

There is no dispute that there is a valid contract between the plaintiff and its subscribers. Further, it is clear that defendants had knowledge of the contract as a result of the work performed for Telerate and based on letters from Telerate advising defendants of the contracts. It is also clear that defendants induced subscribers to use the Excel-A-Rate program instead of the Telerate terminal. The defendants' advertising and "fact sheets" pointedly seek to have subscribers disconnect [10] their Telerate terminals and use a PC to perform functions that the terminal cannot. Finally, the use of Excel-A-Rate will cause delays in response time for requested information. This delay damages the performance of the system and diminishes plaintiff's reputation. If the delays are frequent many subscribers are likely to switch [*226] to another information provider. This satisfies the fourth element of the test.

The only dispute regarding this claim centers on the meaning of the Telerate contract. Depending on the interpretation, the use of Excel-A-Rate may or may not constitute a breach of the agreement. If it is a breach, defendants may be found to have induced that breach and the third element of the claim will be satisfied.

The standard contract provides in part that:

> 1. Subscriber shall pay Telerate . . . monthly fees . . . for the Services. . . which include the equipment and information comprising the Services. . . . The terms of this Agreement shall commence on the date following installation of the equipment. . .
>
> 6. The equipment may not be moved, modified, or interfaced with any other equipment without Telerate's prior written consent. Subscriber shall [11] be responsible for all physical loss or damage to the equipment used to deliver Services to its premises unless such loss or damage is due entirely to the fault or negligence of Telerate. . . .

Telerate contends that the contract is violated in two ways. First, in order to install the PC, the Telerate terminal must be disconnected and moved. Second, if the telephone lines that are used to transmit the date to the users location are deemed to be "Telerate Equipment," attaching the PC to the telephone lines will constitute an unauthorized interface.

Excel-A-Rate is designed to be connected directly to the telephone data line. [5] Testimony of Marshall Caro, Tr. at 177. Thus, the installation of Excel-A-Rate would require the user to move the Telerate Terminal, which would violate the contract.

[*1744] [12] With respect to plaintiff's second claim under the contract, it is disputed whether the data lines constitute "Telerate Equipment." Defendants contend that the "equipment" referred to in the contract means only the Telerate terminal.

The court finds that the contract is not ambiguous regarding the meaning of "equipment." HN3[] While the two parties disagree as to the meaning of the term, this does not necessarily establish that the contract is ambiguous. Libra Bank Ltd. v. Banco Nacional De Costa Rica, 570 F. Supp. 870, 893 (S.D.N.Y. 1983). The court finds that the term "equipment" includes all equipment used to deliver the service to the customer including the main computer, the terminal lines and the terminal. [6] This definition is consistent with paragraph six of the contract which uses the term "equipment" with the phrase "used to deliver Services to its premises." The equipment therefore constitutes more than simply the on-site Telerate terminal and includes all of the equipment needed to deliver the service.

[13] Given this definition of "equipment" the use of Excel-A-Rate constitutes a breach of the agreement in that foreign equipment, specifically the PC, is interfaced with the Telerate data line. Plaintiff has established a likelihood of success on the merits of the interference with contractual relationship claim.

B. COPYRIGHT CLAIM

Plaintiff claims that defendants have violated the federal copyright laws by selling Excel-A-Rate and inducing purchasers to violate plaintiff's copyright by copying the Telerate database with Excel-A-Rate. Defendants assert that plaintiff does not hold a valid copyright. In the alternative, defendants claim that even if there is a valid copyright, there is no infringement of [*227] plaintiff's display right because Excel-A-Rate users have not publicly displayed the database. Defendants also argue that the copying of the database by Excel-A-Rate users constitutes a fair use. Finally, defendants oppose this claim by asserting that they cannot be found vicariously liable for any violation of the copyright laws by Excel-A-Rate users.

1. Prima Facie Copyright Infringement Claim

[14] HN4[] A plaintiff in a copyright case must prove two elements: (1) ownership of the copyright; and (2) infringement by the defendant. See Nimmer on Copyright § 13.01. HN5[] A copyright registration certificate "made before or within five years after first publication of the work shall constitute prima facie evidence of the validity of the copyright and of the facts stated in the certificate." 17 U.S.C. § 410(c). Thus, the existence of a registration certificate shifts to the defendant the burden of disproving plaintiff's ownership of the copyright. Plaintiff has produced a certificate of registration and contends that it has thereby established a prima facie case of copyright ownership. See Complaint Ex. 1.

Defendants, however, allege that plaintiff has failed to establish a prima facie case because the true date of first publication was more than five years before the registration certificate. First, defendants indicate that Telerate has been in business since 1970 and the registration certificate recites October 18, 1985 as the date of first publication. Defendants [15] reason that the database must have been first published more than five years prior to the date of registration, which was October 25, 1985. Second, defendants contend that because the database is constantly updated it "is patently inconsistent . . . that the copyright for the database at that given time was registered on October 25, 1985." Defendants' Memorandum in Opposition at 42 ("Defendants' Memo"). Accordingly, the defendants conclude that plaintiff has not established a prima facie case of copyright ownership.

---

[5] The Excel-A-Rate PC may also be attached to one of the ports of the Telerate Terminal. This hook up does not permit the Excel-A-Rate to perform some of the additional features noted previously. It is clear that this method of attaching the Excel-A-Rate would be in violation of any interpretation of the Standard Agreement.

[6] As discussed infra at 234, the product Telerate subscribers purchase is access to the Telerate database. The system and all the equipment necessary to provide that access is better viewed as one entity.

First, defendants' position is merely conjecture. Defendants have adduced no evidence that would suggest a different date of first publication for the database than the date stated on the registration certificate. Consequently, because the registration certificate is prima facie evidence of the facts stated in it, see 17 U.S.C. § 410(c), the certificate is prima facie evidence that the date of first publication is October 18, 1985. Defendants have failed to disprove that fact, thus the court finds that plaintiff has established a prima facie case of copyright ownership.

Moreover, [16] HN6[] it is within the court's discretion to determine the evidentiary weight to be afforded a registration certificate dated more than five years after the first date of publication. See 17 U.S.C. § 410(c). Under the Copyright Act of 1909, which was in effect until 1978, a registration certificate was prima facie evidence of a copyright, regardless of the date of first publication. See Nimmer on Copyright § 12.11[A]. The [1745] 1976 Act added the five year requirement because "the longer the lapse of time between publication and registration the less likely to be reliable are the facts stated in the certificate." H.Rep. No. 1476, 94th Cong., 2d Sess., 156, reprinted in 1976 Code Cong. and Admin. News 5659, 5772-73. The court, however, finds no reason to consider the plaintiff's registration certificate unreliable. Accordingly, the court would, in any event, accept the date of first publication on the registration certificate for purposes of establishing a prima facie case under 17 U.S.C. § 410(c). [7]

[17] The defendants also assert substantive defenses to the claim of copyright infringement. Defendants contend that they are not liable for infringement under a theory of vicarious liability or contributory infringement [8] [*228] as alleged by the plaintiff. Second, defendants assert the defense of fair use. Finally, defendants claim that they are authorized to display publicly Telerate's database. [9]

2. Vicarious Liability

It is undisputed that the defendants in this case have not themselves copied the Telerate database. [18] Plaintiff, therefore, bases its claim on a theory of vicarious liability. Telerate alleges that, by providing the means by which its customers may copy Telerate's database, defendants are vicariously liable for the alleged infringement by its customers. Defendants contend that vicarious liability is unavailable in copyright actions.

In Sony Corporation of America v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 464 U.S. 417, 78 L. Ed. 2d 574, 104 S. Ct. 774 (1984), the Supreme Court addressed the issue of vicarious liability in the context of a copyright case. In Sony, two producers who held copyrights on a substantial number of motion pictures and television programs sought damages and an injunction against the Sony Corporation of America ("Sony"), a manufacturer of home video recorders. The case turned on whether Sony could be held liable for the clearly unauthorized copying of plaintiffs' copyrighted works by the purchasers of Sony video recorders. In the absence of specific statutory guidance, the Supreme Court analogized to the field of patent law and concluded that:

> [19] HN7[] The sale of copying equipment, like the sale of other articles of commerce, does not constitute contributory infringement if the product is widely used for legitimate, unobjectionable purposes. Indeed, it need merely be capable of substantial noninfringing uses.

Sony, supra, 434 U.S. at 442 (emphasis added).

Defendants contend that the Sony Court "explicitly rejected" the theory of contributory infringement. This is simply not true. The Court clearly stated that contributory infringement is available in cases in which it is necessary to protect a copyright holder's statutory monopoly by extending it to protect against copying devices. See Sony, supra, 434 U.S. at 442. The Court was careful to note that the main issue is to balance the interests of the copyright

---

[7] Even if the certificate were in fact found to have been issued more than five years after the actual date of first publication, the court would be inclined to give the certificate the weight of prima facie evidence, as permitted under Section 410(c).

[8] The theory of vicarious liability in the context of intellectual property is alternatively called "contributory infringement."

[9] The defendants also assert the defense of unclean hands defense by alleging that the plaintiff has violated the federal antitrust laws. Because the court finds that defendant did not demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits of those claims, the unclean hands defense is unavailing and, accordingly, not considered in the instant discussion.

holder against the rights of others freely to engage in unrelated areas of commerce. See id. Accordingly, the Court settled on the fairly strict standard that to sustain a claim of contributory infringement a plaintiff must demonstrate that a defendant's product has no "substantial noninfringing uses." Id.

The defendants contend that Excel-A-Rate has "at least one [20] significant use . . . which cannot conceivably be termed 'infringing,'" namely that it "enables Telerate's customers to use a personal computer to analyze the data received by Telerate." Defendants' Memo at 32. The data, however, must be copied by the program in order to analyze it. Contrary to defendants' contention, therefore, the suggested noninfringing use is in fact the primary infringing activity -- copying. Quite clearly, absent a valid defense, copying is an infringement of copyright. Accordingly, the court proceeds to evaluate the defense of fair use asserted by the defendant.

3. Fair Use Defense

HN8[] The Copyright Act provides that "the fair use of a copyrighted work . . . is not an infringement of copyright." 17 U.S.C. § 107. Section 107 also provides four factors that a court must consider in determining whether a particular use is fair:

> 1. the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a [*229] commercial [1746] nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes;
> 2. the nature of the copyrighted work;
>
> 3. the amount and substantiality [21] of the portion used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole; and
> 4. the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work.

17 U.S.C. § 107 (1)-(4).

a. Purpose and Character of Use

Telerate customers copy the information provided by Telerate primarily to analyze it and to apply the analysis in the financial markets. The purpose of the infringers' use of Telerate's work is thus for private commercial gain. HN9[] Although a commercial use does not by itself defeat a defense of fair use, "every commercial use of copyrighted material is presumptively an unfair exploitation of the monopoly privilege that belongs to the owner of the copyright." Sony, supra, 464 U.S. at 451. Further, "the HN10[] crux of the profit/non-profit distinction is . . . whether the user stands to profit from exploitation of the copyrighted material without paying the customary price." Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc. v. Nation Enterps., 471 U.S. 539, 562, 85 L. Ed. 2d 588, 105 S. Ct. 2218 (1985) [22] (emphasis added). It appears that plaintiff normally charges customers for the privilege of copying portions of its database and accordingly, it is likely that plaintiffs would prevail on the first factor of the fair use defense.

b. Nature of the Copyrighted Work

The defendants claim that the Telerate database is a compilation and therefore is "more susceptible to a finding of fair use." Defendants' Memo at 35. HN11[] Although the court, in deciding the question of fair use, may consider whether a work is original, imaginative, or creative, it may also consider whether the work represents "a substantial investment of time and labor made in anticipation of financial return." MCA, Inc. v. Wilson, 677 F.2d 180, 182 (2d Cir. 1981). The work in question appears to have some elements of both -- that is, it may not be imaginative or creative in a literary sense, but it does represent a significant investment of time and effort for the sole purpose of financial return. Accordingly, the nature of plaintiff's work dictates a result neither in favor nor against a finding of fair use.

[23] c. Amount and Substantiality of Portion Used

The defendants assert in conclusory fashion that "only a small portion of Telerate's database can be copied at any time" and that "typically, only several pages out of the database of over 20,000 pages are of interest to the viewer." Defendants' Memo at 35. The defendants thus conclude that the portion of the database used by the alleged infringers is minor and points toward a finding of fair use.

In considering the third factor of the fair use defense, a court must consider not only the quantitative but also the qualitative substantiality of the copying. See Nimmer, Nimmer on Copyright para. 13.05[A][3] at 13-79. The database in question is, as defendants admit, designed to be used and read one page at a time. Its essence is the price quotations of various securities and newsletter-type of information. It is misleading therefore to suggest that copying only a few pages of 20,000 total pages of information on the database is not substantial. Although as a purely quantitative matter such use is not substantial, qualitatively, copying those few pages may be substantial in light of the structure and typical use of the database. [24] Thus, it seems likely that plaintiffs would prevail on the issue of substantial use.

d. Effect on the Market

HN12[] This element "requires proof either that a particular use is harmful, or that if it should become widespread, it would adversely affect the potential market for the copyrighted work." Sony, 464 U.S. at 451. Plaintiff need not show actual present harm, nor need it show with certainty that future harm will result. *Consumers Union of the United States, [230] Inc. v. General Signal Corp., 724 F.2d 1044, 1050 (2d Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 823, 83 L. Ed. 2d 45, 105 S. Ct. 100, 224 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 616 (1984). Defendants contend that the copying feature of Excel-A-Rate does not adversely affect the potential market for Telerate's database. To the contrary, defendants suggest that the claimed improvement in service Excel-A-Rate produces may actually increase the market for Telerate. This argument is unavailing for two reasons.

First, Telerate also provides an optional copying feature with its service, for which it charges [25] a separate fee. The standard Telerate service does not include copying. Thus, defendants' product allows customers to use Telerate's database in a manner that exceeds the purpose contemplated by the agreement between the standard service user and Telerate. [1747] Consequently, it is fair to conclude that Telerate loses the opportunity to charge for the privilege of copying its database.

Second, the use of Excel-A-Rate is likely to impair service to other Telerate subscribers on the same party line. See supra at 225. Therefore, the unauthorized copying of the database by the defendants' product may result in a deterioration of service to Telerate customers, which may in turn erode Telerate's market by damaging its reputation for reliability. Accordingly, it is likely that plaintiff will prevail on the factor of effect on the market.

e. Fair Use Summary

In summary, it appears that factors one, three, and four enumerated in Section 107 weigh against a fair use defense. Although the factors of Section 107 are merely illustrative and not exhaustive, see Nimmer, Nimmer on Copyright para. 13.05[A] at 13-66 to 13-67, at this stage of the case, those factors suggest that, at a minimum, [26] plaintiffs have demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits of its copyright infringement claim.

C. TELECOMMUNICATIONS ACT

Plaintiff asserts that defendants' sale of the Excel-A-Rate program is a violation of Section 705 of the Communications Act. 47 U.S.C. § 605. [10] Section 705(a) is composed of four sentences containing various prohibitions. Plaintiff contends that defendants have violated the first and fourth sentences. The first sentence provides that:

> Except as authorized by Chapter 119, Title 19, HN13[] no person receiving, assisting in receiving, transmitting, or assisting in transmitting, any interstate or foreign communication by wire or radio shall divulge or publish the existence, contents, substance, purport, effect, or meaning thereof, except through authorized channels of transmission or reception, (1) to any person other than the addressee, his agent, or attorney. . . .

[27] HN14[]

---

[10] Congress amended the Telecommunications Act in 1984 and redesignated Section 605 as Section 705. Nevertheless, Section 705 is still codified at 47 U.S.C. § 605.

In order to establish liability under the first sentence of Section 705, the defendant must have (1) intercepted or aided in the interception of, and (2) divulged or published or aided the divulging or publishing of, a communication transmitted by the plaintiff. See California Satellite Systems v. Seimon, 767 F.2d 1364, 1366 (9th Cir. 1985); Note, The Piracy of Subscription Television: An Alternative to the Communications Law, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 935940-41 (1983) [hereinafter Piracy of Television]. Further, the signal must not have been intended for the general public. See 47 U.S.C. 605(a).

In this case, it is uncontested that Excel-A-Rate users have intercepted a communication transmitted by the plaintiff that was not intended for the general public. There are, however, two issues relating to the claim under the first sentence: (1) whether there has been an unauthorized interception of the communication; and (2) whether there has been any publication or divulging of the communication. See Eastern Microwave, Inc. v. Doubleday Sports, Inc., 691 F.2d 125, 127 (2nd Cir. 1982). [28]

It is uncontested that Excel-A-Rate users have intercepted a communication transmitted by the plaintiff that was not [*231] intended for the general public. Although not conceded, it is equally apparent that the Excel-A-Rate permits a Telerate subscriber to receive unauthorized communications. The Standard Telerate Agreement provides that the subscriber shall not interface any foreign equipment with or move Telerate equipment. As discussed with respect to the tortious interference with contract claim, the use of the Excel-A-Rate constitutes a breach of the Standard Telerate Agreement. See supra at 231. Therefore, the receipt of information using the Excel-A-Rate is unauthorized.

The Excel-A-Rate user does not necessarily divulge or publish the transmission received to any third party. Nevertheless, courts applying Section 705 have employed a legal fiction to bring sellers and manufacturers of interception devices within the scope of this section of the statute. Piracy of Television, supra, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. at 946-47; see Brown & Helland, Section 605 of the Communications Act: Teaching A Salty Old Dog New Tricks, 34 Cath. U.L. Rev. 635, 664 (1984). [29] HN15[] Courts have held that the act of viewing a transmission that the viewer was not authorized to receive constitutes a publication. See, e.g., California Satellite Systems v. Seimon, 767 F.2d 1364, 1366 (9th Cir. 1985); National Subscription Television v. S & H TV, 644 F.2d 820, 826 (9th Cir. 1981); Ciminelli v. Cablevision, 583 F. Supp. 158, 164 (E.D.N.Y. 1984) (appendix reprinting ruling from the bench in Cablevision v. Annasonic Electronic Supply, No. CV-83-5159 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 10, 1984)); Cox Cable Cleveland Area, Inc. v. King, 582 F. Supp. 376, 380 (N.D. Ohio 1983). While [1748] this legal fiction has been criticized by commentators, see e.g. Brown & Helland, supra, 54 S. Cal. L. Rev. at 946-47, it is consistent with the broad scope that Congress has indicated should be given to the statute, 130 Cong. Rec. S14286 (daily ed. Oct. 11, 1984) (statement of Sen. Packwood), reprinted in 1978 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 4746; see also Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986, H.R. Rep. No. 647, 99th [30] Cong., 2d Sess. 22 (1986) (Communications Act might have some limited application to interception of data transmissions and electronic mail by private parties). Further, by interpreting the statute in this manner, it includes within the scope of this section activities that should be prohibited and might otherwise not be covered by any statute. See Ciminelli, 583 F. Supp. at 164. Under these circumstances, the court will continue to employ this legal fiction.

The viewing of the data by the Telerate subscriber using Excel-A-Rate, therefore, constitutes a publication within the meaning of the statute. Further, the use of the Excel-A-Rate product in conjunction with a personal computer to receive Telerate data is not an "authorized channel" of transmission and thus a violation of Section 705. Thus, plaintiff has established a likelihood of success on the merits of the claim relating to the first sentence on Section 705 and accordingly, the court need not address the plaintiff's alternative claim under § 705.

D. MISAPPROPRIATION OF A TRADE SECRET

With regard to trade secrets, New York has adopted the approach of the Restatement of Torts (1939). [11] Q-Co Industries, Inc., v. Hoffman, 625 F. Supp. 608, 616 (S.D.N.Y. 1985). [31] See Delta Filter Corp. v. Morin, 108 A.D.2d 991, 992, 485 N.Y.S.2d 143, 144 (3rd Dep't 1985). The Restatement states that HN16[] "[a] trade secret may consist of any formula, pattern, device or compilation of information which is used in one's business, and which gives him an opportunity to obtain an advantage over competitors who do not know or use it. . . . A trade secret is a process or device for continuous use in the operation of the business." Restatement of Torts § 757 comment b.

[*232] The STP would appear to be the type [32] of "process or device" typically considered a trade secret. It is at the heart of the operation of plaintiff's business and is akin to a formula or pattern. See Sabatini Affid. at 28. Further, HN17[] it is clear that computer software is protectible under the law of trade secrets. See University Computing Co. v. Lykes-Youngstown Corp., 504 F.2d 518, 534 (5th Cir. 1974); Q-Co., supra, 625 F. Supp. at 617. Finally, the STP confers a competitive advantage on Telerate by permitting it to provide access to its database in a secure and cost effective manner. See Affidavit of Richard J. Cowles at 12 ("Cowles Affid."). Even a slight competitive edge will satisfy this requirement of trade secret protection. See Sheridan v. Mallinckrodt, Inc., 568 F. Supp. 1347, 1352 (N.D.N.Y. 1983). Nevertheless, defendants contend that the STP is not a trade secret because (1) the STP was not sufficiently "secret," and (2) the STP is not particularly complex and could have been reproduced through reverse engineering. For the reasons set forth below the court [33] disagrees and finds that there is a likelihood that plaintiff will successfully prove that its STP is a trade secret that defendants misappropriated.

Defendants contend that STP was not veiled in sufficient secrecy to constitute a trade secret because defendant Caro was not informed the STP was a trade secret, no written confidentiality agreement was executed between Telerate and Caro, and the STP was revealed to various outside parties. HN18[] Although a trade secret cannot be widely known, see Ferber v. Sterndent Corp., 51 N.Y.2d 782, 433 N.Y.S.2d 85, 412 N.E.2d 1311 (1980), absolute secrecy is not required. See Sheridan, supra, 568 F. Supp. at 1352; Q-Co, supra, 625 F. Supp. at 617; General Aniline & Film Corp. v. Frantz, 50 Misc. 2d 994, 272 N.Y.S.2d 600, 608 (Sup. Ct. 1966); Fairchild Engine and Airplane Corp. v. Cox, 50 N.Y.S.2d 643, 62 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 98 (Sup. Ct. 1944). The Second Circuit requires that a trade secret be veiled in sufficient secrecy that "'except by use of improper means, there would [34] be difficulty in acquiring the information.'" Q-Co Industries, supra, 625 F. Supp. at 617 (quoting A.H. Emery Co. v. Marcan Products Corp., 389 F.2d 11, 16 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 835, 21 L. Ed. 2d 106, 89 S. Ct. 109, 159 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 799 (1968)); see also [1749] Sheridan, supra, 568 F. Supp. at 1352.

Telerate has taken substantial measures to safeguard the secrecy of the STP that indicate that the STP was a secret, including restricting access to the STP by company employees, enforcing corporate policy against disclosure of trade secrets, and protecting the allegedly secret information by requiring a password to access the computer files as well as physically guarding the computer installation 24 hours a day. See Delta Filter Corp. v. Morin, 108 A.D.2d 991, 993, 485 N.Y.S.2d 143, 145 (3rd Dep't 1985). Further, Caro's steadfast denials of knowledge of the secrecy of the STP is curious when it is considered that the document he authored for Telerate, which describes in detail the STP, bears a legend that the information therein contained is proprietary in nature and may not be reproduced [35] without the express consent of Telerate.

The defendants also contend that one competent engineer, without guidance, could have discovered within one month the STP by reverse engineering. Defendants cite Kewanee Oil Co. v. Bicron Corp., 416 U.S. 470, 477, 40 L. Ed. 2d 315, 94 S. Ct. 1879 (1974) for the proposition that "the ability to use reverse engineering to discover the purported trade secret negates a finding of liability for misappropriation." Defendants' Memo at 58. Defendants mischaracterize the citation to Kewanee. The case actually stands for the proposition that the law does not protect the owner of a trade secret from "discovery by fair and honest means such as independent invention, accidental disclosure, or by so-called reverse engineering." See Kewanee, supra, 416 U.S. at 476. Defendants do not contend, however, that the STP was discovered entirely by reverse engineering; rather, defendants claim that the [11] The Restatement (Second) of Torts does not treat the law of misappropriation of trade secrets because the Council of the American Law Institute determined that reliance on tort principles in the field of trade regulation had diminished as the field has evolved into an independent area of the law. See Restatement (Second) of Torts, Introductory Note to Division Nine.

STP could have been discovered by reverse engineering. The possibility of discovery by "fair and honest methods" does not preclude the finding of a trade [*233] secret. At best, such possibility is one factor to consider [36] in determining the novelty of the alleged trade secret.

Further, the proper focus of inquiry is not whether an alleged trade secret can be deduced by reverse engineering but rather, whether improper means are required to access it. Plaintiff has restricted access to the STP code by limiting the equipment that could be connected to its datalines. Under the terms of the Telerate Agreement, no equipment capable of reading the SOP can be hooked up without Telerate's consent.

Defendants indicate that a data scope was connected to a customer's data line so that the STP could be obtained. See Testimony of Marshall Caro, Tr. at 171. The use of a datascope is in violation of the Telerate Agreement because Telerate Equipment would have to be moved to attach the data scope and the data scope was interfaced with Telerate equipment. See supra at 226. The interception of the SOP through an unauthorized hookup of a line monitor is not a proper means of accessing the code. See Ward v. Superior Court of the State of California, 3 Comp. L. Rep. 206 (Cal. Super. Ct. 1972); see also United States v. Seidlitz, 589 F.2d 152 (4th Cir. 1978), cert. denied [37] , 441 U.S. 922, 60 L. Ed. 2d 396, 99 S. Ct. 2030 (1979) (unauthorized HN19[] phone access to computer supports wire fraud conviction where computer source code considered property under statute); Hancock v. Decker, 379 F.2d 552 (5th Cir. 1967) (conviction for computer program theft under Texas law).

Accordingly, the term "reverse engineering" is not a talisman that may immunize the theft of trade secrets. The relevant inquiry remains whether the means used to obtain the alleged trade secret, including reverse engineering, were proper. It appears that these means were not likely proper in the instant case. The court therefore finds that plaintiff's have demonstrated a likelihood of establishing that the STP is a trade secret that was misappropriated by the defendants.

E. IRREPARABLE HARM

Plaintiff claims that the use of the Excel-A-Rate program affects the level of performance of other users on the STN. Specifically, plaintiff contends that Excel-A-Rate slows the response time for page requests and in some instances has disrupts services. To support these claims, [38] plaintiff relied on the testimony of an expert in queuing theory. The court accepts the testimony of the expert as representing Excel-A-Rate's potential impact on the Telerate network. According to the expert, the response time would be increased by 20% if two Excel-A-Rate terminals were attached in place of Telerate terminals on a normal 16 terminal party line. See Testimony of Dr. Howard Lee Morgan, Tr. at 45. The expert also noted that if one Excel-A-Rate terminal was attached with the automatic page request feature, the response time would be approximately 15 seconds and if two Excel-A-Rate terminals are attached the response time would go up to two minutes. See id. at 44. The two minute waiting period would certainly be unacceptable for any person wishing to use the information in the financial markets.

[*1750] If the use of Excel-A-Rate is not enjoined, there will certainly be a degradation in the performance of the Telerate system. The effect of this degradation of service cannot be compensated in monetary terms and therefore satisfies the irreparable harm prong of the test.

Moreover, plaintiff's copyright claim creates a presumption of irreparable injury. See e.g., Apple Computer, Inc. v. Franklin Computer Corp., 714 F.2d 1240, 1254 (3d Cir. 1983), [39] cert. dismissed, 464 U.S. 1033, 79 L. Ed. 2d 158, 104 S. Ct. 690 (1984); Atari, Inc. v. North Am. Philips Consumer Elecs. Corp., 672 F.2d 607 (7th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 880, 74 L. Ed. 2d 145, 103 S. Ct. 176 (1982); American Metro. Enterps. v. Warner Bros. Records, Inc., 389 F.2d 903, 90 (2d Cir. 1968). It is also clear that HN20[] a preliminary injunction is a proper remedy in cases alleging a tortious interference with contract. See Sperry & Hutchinson Co. v. Berkeley, 44 Misc. 2d 331, 253 N.Y.S.2d 700 (1963), aff'd, 22 A.D.2d 762, [*234] 254 N.Y.S.2d 231 (1964). Thus, even without the evidence supplied by the expert, it is clear that there is sufficient irreparable harm to satisfy the standard for a preliminary injunction.

II. DEFENDANTS' CROSS-MOTION

Defendants have cross-moved for a preliminary injunction alleging that Telerate has violated the federal antitrust laws. Specifically, defendants contend that Telerate (1) engaged in an illegal tying arrangement; (2) maintained [40] an illegal monopoly; and (3) attempted to create and maintain an illegal monopoly. The court will now evaluate the likelihood of defendants' success on the merits of these three claims. [12]

A. Tying Claim

The defendants claim that Telerate has committed a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 (1982), and Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14 (1982), by engaging in an illegal tying arrangement. HN21[] The elements that will establish that a tying arrangement is per se illegal are:

1. Effect on a "not insubstantial" amount of interstate commerce; [41]
2. A tying and a tied product;
3. Sufficient market power to enable the seller to coerce the buyer to accept the tied product and actual coercion;
4. Anticompetitive effects in the tied market.

See Yentsch v. Texaco, Inc., 630 F.2d 46, 56-57 (2d Cir. 1980); R & G Affiliates, Inc. v. Knoll Intern., Inc., 587 F. Supp. 1395, 1398-99 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (Weinfeld, J.).

1. Effect on Interstate Commerce

HN22[] The requirement that a "not insubstantial" amount of interstate commerce be affected in the tied market is a de minimis requirement. The relevant inquiry is the absolute dollar amount of the goods affected in the tied product market, as opposed to the proportion of the entire product market that the affected goods comprise. See Fortner Enterps., Inc. v. United States Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 502, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495, 89 S. Ct. 1252 (1969). The Supreme Court has held amounts ranging from as little as $ 60,800 to be "not insubstantial." See United States v. Loew's, Inc., 371 U.S. 38, 49, 9 L. Ed. 2d 11, 83 S. Ct. 97 (1962). [42] The Second Circuit has held that $ 60,000 would definitely meet the substantiality threshold. See Yentsch v. Texaco, 630 F.2d 46, 58 (2d Cir. 1980). Although the parties have not set forth the dollar amount of commerce affected in the tied product market, it is apparent from the fact that 16,000 Telerate terminals have been installed, see Cowles Affid. para. 2, that a "not insubstantial" amount of commerce is involved in this case.

2. Two Products

Programit contends that Telerate's STP lines are a tying product and the terminals it provides to its STN customers are a tied product. The court disagrees.

HN23[] To determine whether two distinct products exist in an alleged tying arrangement, the court should focus on the character of the demand for each product rather than on the function of the products. See Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 4 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 19, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1983). In this case, the demand for Telerate's database cannot readily be distinguished from the demand for the STN terminal.

When customers subscribe [43] to the Telerate service they are purchasing access to the continuously updated database Telerate maintains. The STN service is one of several modes of access that Telerate provides to its database and it is the only one that requires subscribers to use the STN terminal provided by Telerate. See supra at 223-224. How the data is displayed cannot be differentiated [1751] from the data itself. To the subscriber, the value of the service [*235] is the form of the information a customer receives. In other words, there is no demand for Telerate terminals distinct from the demand for access to the Telerate database.

---

[12] Based on the court's finding that plaintiff has made a showing of irreparable harm, the balance of hardships could not tip decidedly in favor of defendants. Accordingly, to prevail on their motion for a preliminary injunction, defendants must demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits.

When a customer subscribes to Telerate STN service, it bargains for a certain output of information at a given price. Excel-A-Rate users obtain benefits not available to regular STN customers because of the enhanced features of Excel-a-rate. Thus, Excel-A-Rate users get a different product than the STN users get -- they get more information for their dollar. In fact, this notion was the primary marketing tool employed by Programit. See, e.g., Plaintiff's Ex. 4-7.

Consequently, because the product purchased is information in a particular format, and because the format [44] of the information depends on the display terminal, the court finds that the STN terminal and the Telerate database information are not separate products for antitrust purposes.

3. Market Power and Coercion

HN24[] The Supreme Court has stated that "the essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms." Jefferson Parish, supra, 466 U.S. at 12; see United States Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enterps., 429 U.S. 610, 620, 51 L. Ed. 2d 80, 97 S. Ct. 861 (1977). Accordingly, not every refusal separately to sell two products is a restraint of trade. Only those refusals to sell products separately that impose an unreasonable restraint on trade. Arrangements that meet the characteristics of a per se illegal tie-in are presumptively unreasonable and therefore objectionable under the antitrust law. See e.g., Arizona v. Maricopa County Med'l Soc'y, 457 U.S. 332, 342-43, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48, 102 S. Ct. 2466 (1982) [45] (discussing rationale of per se rule); Northern Pac. R. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514 (1958) (discussing areas in which per se rule has been applied); International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U.S. 392, 396, 92 L. Ed. 20, 68 S. Ct. 12 (1947) (declaring tying arrangements per se illegal).

Coercion is most commonly inferred from what is commonly referred to as "market power" -- the ability of a seller to force a buyer to behave on the basis of considerations other than those relevant in a competitive market. In other words, a plaintiff must establish that the purported illegal tying arrangement displaced the usual market forces, such as price, quantity, and quality.

In this case, there is no indication that Telerate has forced its customers to do anything. Although its standard STN contract requires the use of STN terminals, these terminals are not a prerequisite to receiving information from the Telerate database. Telerate provides several modes of access to its database, and STN is the only one that requires the use of an STN terminal. Thus, customers are free to subscribe to a service other than STN if [46] they do not want to lease the Telerate terminal.

Moreover, the STN service may also be used with the customer's own computer, provided that Telerate is informed. See Cowles Reply Affid. paras. 16, 17. This service is, however, more expensive than the basic STN subscription. Nevertheless, merely charging a higher price for the tying product is not equivalent to restraining competition in the market for the tied product. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 13. Exploitation of market power to increase the price of the tying product is not necessarily contrary to the competitive goal sought by the Sherman Act, because, presumably, the higher price is justified by some discernible competitive advantage that the tying product has over other products.

Defendants rely heavily on the Ninth Circuit's opinion in Digidyne v. Data General, 734 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 473 U.S. 908, 87 L. Ed. 2d 657, 105 S. Ct. 3534 (1985). Data General involved litigation between rival computer manufacturers. The defendant in that case, Data General, [*236] manufactured a computer system called NOVA, consisting of a central processing [47] unit ("CPU") and a disk operating system called RDOS. The operating system contained the basic commands for operating the system. Data General refused to license the RDOS to all except the purchasers of its NOVA hardware. The Ninth Circuit held that such a refusal was a per se illegal tying arrangement.

The Ninth Circuit focused on the market power and coercion element of a tying arrangement. It concluded that the special attraction of the RDOS, the copyright protection it enjoys, the fact that it is a trade secret, and the fact that purchasers were often locked into the RDOS because of previous investment in application software induced purchasers to choose the NOVA system to give them access to the RDOS based software. Abandoning NOVA would mean scrapping not only the hardware, but the software as well. Consequently, it would have been prohibitively expensive to switch from RDOS, thereby effectively ruling out [1752] an abandonment of the NOVA system. Programit's argument consists primarily of analogizing the facts of Data General to the facts of the instant case. The analogy, however, is inapposite. The basis for Data General's market power and coercion was its customers' inability [48] to switch systems. In other words, Data General's customers were forced to purchase NOVA CPU's and some peripherals to obtain what they really wanted: the RDOS based software. In the instant case, Telerate does not condition access to its database on the leasing of terminals from it. Rather, Telerate offers a variety of methods of access to its database that provide various formats and options. What Telerate is doing is selling access to its database and it is not promoting sales or leases of computer hardware.

Consequently, the court finds that Programit has not demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits regarding Telerate's market power or actual coercion on the part of Telerate.

4. Anticompetitive Effects in the Tied Market

The requirement that the party claiming an illegal tie-in prove anticompetitive effects in the tied market is essentially a requirement of harm. Because Telerate's "tying" of products is not per se illegal the effects of such "tying" are necessarily not "anticompetitive." Accordingly, this factor need not be further considered at this stage of the case.

5. Summary of Tying Claim

Accordingly, the court finds that defendants have failed [49] to demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits of its tying claim.

B. Monopoly Claim

Defendants also allege that plaintiff, Telerate, has violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, which proscribes monopolization and attempted monopolization. [13] [50] HN25[] To establish a claim for illegal monopolization, a party must show (1) that the alleged monopolist possesses monopoly power [14] in the relevant market, and (2) that it has the intent to monopolize. See United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966); Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 275 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1093, 62 L. Ed. 2d 783, 100 S. Ct. 1061 [*237] (1980). Defendants apparently contend that Telerate has unlawfully used its alleged monopoly power in the market for its database [15] to distort competition in a second market, namely the market for terminals that interact with the Telerate system.

1. Monopoly Power

---

[13] HN26[] Section 2 of the Sherman Act provides in relevant part:

> Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony . . .

15 U.S.C. § 2.

[14] A party may establish monopoly power directly or, more commonly, indirectly by demonstrating that the alleged monopolist has a large share of the relevant product market. The first step in proving market share is the definition of the relevant product market. Defining the relevant market involves determining the various contours of that market: product, geographic area, and time. Further, HN27[] the party alleging the violation bears the burden of establishing the relevant market. In this case, defendants have failed to carry their burden of establishing what is the relevant market. See generally Kintner, Federal Antitrust Law §§ 12.2-12.4.

[15] A complete discussion of the relevant market is set forth below.

HN28[] The term "monopoly power" only has meaning if applied to a particular market. Defining the relevant market requires, at a minimum, determining the relevant product market [51] and the relevant geographic area of competition. A market definition is necessary to determine whether the alleged monopolist has sufficient market power to meet the "monopoly" threshold. See United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 571, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966).

In this case, the defendants first contend that the relevant market is the "provision of computerized data relating to transactions in United States Government securities." See Defendants' Proposed Findings of Fact para. 46. The defendant bases its assertion that Telerate has monopoly power in this alleged market on three items of evidence. First, defendant cites a Dean Witter research note, see Plaintiff's Ex. 1, which concludes Telerate "dominates the U.S. market for its type of service." See Defendants' Conclusions of Law at 12. Second, defendants assert that Telerate's marketing officer, Scott Rumbold, agreed to the characterization in the Dean Witter report, thereby admitting that Telerate dominates the United States market. See Defendants Ex. 3. Third, defendants contend that Telerate's prospectus and 10K [1753] statement filed with the SEC support a finding of monopoly [52] power by indicating that Reuters is the only company with comparable services and it has only a limited market share in the United States.

The court is not convinced that defendants have demonstrated a likelihood of success in establishing that Telerate has monopoly power in the market for "computerized data relating to transactions in United States Government securities," which defendants contend is the relevant market. See Defendants' Proposed Findings of Fact para. 46. Defendants' reliance on the Dean Witter report, as well as Mr. Rumbold's acquiesence in the conclusions of that report, is misplaced. That report was prepared by Dean Witter to recommend the purchase of Telerate stock. The report does not establish the relevant market within which Telerate operates; rather it was intended as a prognosis of future performance of the company's stock. [16]

[53] In any event, the court does not find the Dean Witter research note to be probative of market power. The document bears a legend stating that the "accuracy or completeness [of the sources of the report] is not guaranteed." Moreover, it cannot be considered an expert opinion because its author has not been qualified as such. Finally, the report was put together to recommend the purchase of Telerate stock, rather than to define the relevant market.

HN29[] The standard the Supreme Court has enunciated as guiding the determination the parameters of a product market is the "reasonable interchangeability" test first set forth in United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 100 L. Ed. 1264, 76 S. Ct. 994 (1956) and more fully developed by subsequent case law. See United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966); United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963); International Boxing Club of New York, Inc. v. United States, 358 U.S. 242, 3 L. Ed. 2d 270, 79 S. Ct. 245 (1959). [54] The test of reasonable interchangeability comprises consideration of three issues. The first issue is "functional interchangeability" -- the degree to which various products are [*238] able to perform the same functions. A second aspect to reasonable interchangeability is reactive interchangeability, also known as cross-elasticity of demand, in economic jargon. Simply stated, this concept represents the effect that a change in price of product X has on the demand for product Y. See e.g., du Pont, supra, 351 U.S. at 380-81. A third aspect to reasonable interchangeability is supply substitutability -- a concept similar to cross-elasticity of demand but applied to the supply side of a market. Supply substitutability refers to the extent to which producers would be willing to shift their resources from production of product X to production of product Y in response to price changes in product market Y, the alleged monopolized market.

The defendants have not attempted to satisfy the reasonable interchangeability test in any way. Rather, as noted above, the defendants, relying on third-party statements regarding market dominance, purported admissions, and

---

[16] It is amusing to note that the report observes that Telerate "dominates the U.S. market for its type of service" without describing the relevant market. In the same breath, the report indicates that Merrill Lynch and IBM are introducing a competing financial information service "[that] has certainly exerted a negative influence."

Telerate's [55] profits, seek to prove Telerate's monopoly power directly without discussing the relevant market. The defendants support this approach by contending that market definition and analysis is not necessary when "there are no other discoverable facts establishing the existence and degree of market power." See Defendant's Proposed Findings Fact at 14 (citing Areeda & Turner, Antitrust Law 330 at para. 507 (Vol. II 1978)). The court disagrees.

Defendants have cited Areeda & Turner out of context. If direct proof of monopoly power were practicable, it would be preferable to the market analysis approach. The direct proof Areeda & Turner discuss in their treatise is direct economic proof, namely, demand and supply curves. Direct proof of monopoly power does not mean, however, testimony or physical evidence of opinions regarding the seller's market power. Demand and therefore, cost curves are very difficult to establish accurately, and market analysis provides the most convenient and accurate secondary measure of monopoly power.

In a further attempt to prove directly Telerate's purported monopoly power, defendants cite Telerate's operating income as secondary proof of Telerate's market [56] power. [17] Indeed, one indicium of monopoly power is the reaping of so-called monopoly profits, which are evidenced by returns on capital invested that exceed the returns required to attract capital to that industry or market. In practice, however, such real economic returns [1754] on capital are difficult to measure and the proper methods of measuring economic profits are much disputed. See Areeda & Turner, supra, para. 512c at 337. Further, one must be careful not to confuse excess returns on capital with high accounting profits. Accounting profits are affected by accounting conventions regarding depreciation, valuation of assets, and categorization of expenses as current or capital expenses. Consequently, citing accounting profits without more is unsatisfactory proof of monopoly profits, and in turn of monopoly power.

[57] The defendants also contend that Telerate possesses monopoly power in "the market for data terminals and terminal related software that interconnect with its financial market information network." Defendants' Proposed Findings of Fact at 26-27. [18] Defendants base their claims of monopoly power in the peripherals market on their allegations that Telerate possesses monopoly power in the market for provision [*239] of data of United States Government securities. Because this court has already determined that Programit and Caro have failed in their burden of establishing the relevant market for Telerate's service it must necessarily reject the further conclusion that Telerate has monopoly power in the peripherals market. In addition, the defendants have failed to present any evidence that would address the requirements of the Supreme Court's "reasonable interchangeability" test and have, therefore failed to carry their burden with respect to the peripherals market as well.

[58] In summary, it appears that defendants have failed to demonstrate a likelihood of success in establishing, with sufficient definiteness to satisfy the requirements of Section 2 under the relevant case law, the contours of the market in which it claims Telerate possesses monopoly power. Defendants, therefore, have also failed to show that Telerate possesses monopoly power. Accordingly, defendants' claim that Telerate has committed a violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act by unlawfully exercising monopoly power must fail.

C. Attempted Monopolization

HN30[] A party asserting a claim of attempted monopolization must prove: (1) specific intent to monopolize; and (2) a dangerous probability of monopolization. See Times Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 626, 97 L. Ed. 1277, 73 S. Ct. 872 (1953); Swift v. United States, 196 U.S. 375, 49 L. Ed. 518, 25 S. Ct. 276 (1905);

---

[17] Defendants claim, based on the Dean Witter report discussed earlier, that plaintiff's operating income "exceeded 50%" in 1982, 1983, 1984, and 1985. See Defendants' Findings of Fact at 13 para. 38. Telerate, by its executive vice-president Richard J. Cowles, claims that its pretax profits are declining and totalled 42% for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985. See Cowles Reply Affid. para. 14.

[18] In their memorandum of law, defendants do not contend that Telerate possesses monopoly power in the market for peripherals that interface with its database; rather, defendants' argument is that Telerate has used its alleged monopoly power in the database market to distort competition in the peripherals market. Nevertheless, in its proposed findings of fact defendants advance the argument that Telerate possesses monopoly power in the peripherals market.

Northeastern Telephone Co. v. American Telephone and Telegraph Corp., 651 F.2d 76, 85 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 943, 71 L. Ed. 2d 654, 102 S. Ct. 1438 (1982).

[59] 1. Specific Intent to Monopolize

HN31[] A claim for attempted monopolization requires proof of specific intent to monopolize because as Judge Learned Hand stated:

> "Conduct falling short of monopoly, is not illegal unless it is part of a plan to monopolize, or to gain such other control of a market as is equally forbidden. To make it so, the plaintiff must prove what in the criminal law is known as a 'specific intent'; an intent which goes beyond the mere intent to do the act."

United States v. Aluminum Corporation of America, 148 F.2d 416, 431-32 (2d Cir. 1945). Proof of such specific intent may be inferred from conduct of the seller, documentation, or industrial background. It may also be proved directly where internal memoranda or statements by employees indicate such a specific intent. See Buffalo Courier-Express, Inc. v. Buffalo Evening News, Inc., 601 F.2d 48, 54-55 (2d Cir. 1979).

Defendants assert that Telerate's conduct demonstrates its intent to monopolize the market for terminals accessing its database. Specifically, defendants [60] note that (1) Telerate changed its protocol in March 1985, which eliminated the ability to keep two pages of data simultaneously updated; (2) Telerate threatened to terminate service to customers who purchased defendants Excel-A-Rate system; (3) Telerate harassed and intimidated defendant Programit's customers with calls from top executives; and (4) Telerate's chairman has threatened to "bury" Programit in expensive and protracted litigation and Telerate's executive vice-president has stated that Telerate would never deal with the defendants. See Defendants' Proposed Findings of Fact at paras. 91-94 at 28-29.

The plaintiff, Telerate, has asserted that its actions were prompted by concern for the integrity of its database system. It contends that unrestricted use of the Excel-A-Rate system will lead to unbearable delays in service to the non-Excel-A-Rate customers on each party line. Further, Telerate has presented testimony that it has no intention [1755] of entering or competing in the peripheral equipment market and that its main interest is in concentrating on its data dissemination business.

Defendants contend that Telerate instituted the March 1985 change in its protocol merely [61] to disrupt the Excel-A-Rate service. The court finds, however, that Telerate instituted the protocol change for legitimate business reasons. The executive [*240] vice-president of Telerate, Richard J. Cowles, testified that the protocol change was prompted by concern that the updating of multiple pages would unacceptably increase the response time for page requests by customers. Further, defendants contention that the protocol change degraded the Telerate service in order to disrupt the main feature of Excel-A-Rate is untenable. As noted above, Telerate has presented testimony that it is not interested in entering the computer peripherals market. In any event, it is clear that Telerate's primary business and the source of its acknowledged success stems from its database and its reputation for reliability. To conclude that in order to "monopolize" the market for computer terminals with access to its own database, Telerate would degrade its own service is not plausible in light of all the evidence adduced at the hearing. Accordingly, the court does not find that the protocol change supports defendants' allegation of specific intent to monopolize.

The court also finds that the [62] threats to terminate service to those customers that used the Excel-A-Rate service were justified by Telerate's legitimate concern for the performance of its service. Further, Telerate believed in good faith that it was exercising its rights pursuant to what it perceived to be a breach of the service contract, which, under Telerate's interpretation, prohibited the moving of any Telerate equipment. Finally, the court finds that even if the alleged threats to "bury" Programit in a "protracted and complex litigation" were credible, they would be insufficient to demonstrate an intent to monopolize.

Accordingly, the court finds that defendants have failed to demonstrate a likelihood of establishing that Telerate had the specific intent to monopolize the market for computer peripherals connected with its database system.

2. Dangerous Probability of Monopolization

Dangerous probability of monopolization requires proof of market power in the relevant market sufficient to warrant application of the antitrust laws. This element, like the proof of monopoly power in the related offense of monopolization, is established by analysis of the relevant market. The record is more sparse [63] on the issue of market definition than in defendants' monopolization claim.

Defendants seem to proceed on two theories regarding Telerate's market power. First, defendants contend that Telerate is seeking to "leverage" its monopoly power in the market for "computerized data relating to transactions in United States Government securities," into the market for data terminals and related software. This argument is clearly unavailing as the court has already found that defendants have failed to carry their burden of establishing Telerate's alleged monopoly power in the market for its database. Second, defendants contend that the relevant market is the market for data terminals that connect to a United States Government securities information network. There has been no evidence adduced as to why this is a relevant market or submarket. Moreover, this market definition relies on the market definition for the database, which the court has previously found not to be properly proved by defendants.

The court finds that defendants have also failed in their burden of establishing the "dangerous probability" prong of the attempted monopolization claim. Accordingly, the defendants have failed [64] to demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits of its attempted monopolization claim.

SUMMARY

Plaintiff has demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits of its claims of copyright infringement, misappropriation of trade secrets, interference with contract, and violations of the Telecommunications Act. Plaintiff further will suffer irreparable harm if a preliminary injunction does not issue. Thus, plaintiff has satisfied the requirements for issuance of a preliminary injunction. Defendants have failed to demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits of their antitrust claims. Consequently, [*241] they have not satisfied the requirements for a preliminary injunction.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction is hereby granted and defendants' cross-motion is denied.

SO ORDERED.

DATED: New York, New York June 10, 1988

Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head

Supreme Court of the United States

February 24, 1988, Argued ; June 13, 1988, Decided

No. 87-157

Reporter
486 U.S. 492 *; 108 S. Ct. 1931 ; 100 L. Ed. 2d 497 ; 1988 U.S. LEXIS 2629 *; 56 U.S.L.W. 4539; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,062

ALLIED TUBE & CONDUIT CORP. v. INDIAN HEAD, INC.

Prior History: [1] CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT.

Disposition: 817 F.2d 938, affirmed.

Core Terms

immunity, conduit, standard-setting, electrical, government action, antitrust liability, products, steel, anti trust law, anticompetitive, polyvinyl chloride, antitrust, state and local government, publicity campaign, organizations, codes, marketplace, private association, decisionmaking, associations, benefits, Sherman Act, railroads, boycott, genuine, private organization, legislative action, political activity, restraint of trade, economic interest

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN1[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

Concerted efforts to restrain or monopolize trade by petitioning government officials are protected from antitrust liability under the doctrine established by Noerr. The scope of this protection depends, however, on the source, context, and nature of the anticompetitive restraint at issue. Where a restraint upon trade or monopolization is the result of valid governmental action, as opposed to private action, those urging the governmental action enjoy absolute immunity from antitrust liability for the anticompetitive restraint.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN2[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

Where, independent of any government action, an anticompetitive restraint results directly from private action, the restraint cannot form the basis for antitrust liability if it is "incidental" to a valid effort to influence governmental action. The validity of such efforts, and thus the applicability of Noerr immunity, varies with the context and nature of the activity. A publicity campaign directed at the general public, seeking legislation or executive action, enjoys antitrust immunity even when the campaign employs unethical and deceptive methods. But in less political arenas, unethical and deceptive practices can constitute abuses of administrative or judicial processes that may result in antitrust violations.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN3[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

In whatever forum, private action that is not genuinely aimed at procuring favorable government action is a mere sham that cannot be deemed a valid effort to influence government action.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Higher Education & Professional Associations > General Overview

HN4[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

Typically, private standard-setting associations include members having horizontal and vertical business relations. Undoubtedly members of such associations often have economic incentives to restrain competition and that the product standards set by such associations have a serious potential for anticompetitive harm. Agreement on a product standard is, after all, implicitly an agreement not to manufacture, distribute, or purchase certain types of products. Accordingly, private standard-setting associations have traditionally been objects of antitrust scrutiny. When, however, private associations promulgate safety standards based on the merits of objective expert judgments and through procedures that prevent the standard-setting process from being biased by members with economic interests in stifling product competition, those private standards can have significant procompetitive advantages. It is this potential for procompetitive benefits that has led most lower courts to apply rule-of-reason analysis to private associations.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN5[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Absent a showing to the contrary, a government acts in the public interest. A private party, on the other hand, may be presumed to be acting primarily on his or its own behalf. The dividing line between restraints resulting from governmental action and those resulting from private action may not always be obvious. But where persons unaccountable to the public impose the restraint and without official authority, many of whom have personal financial interests in restraining competition, the U.S. Supreme Court has no difficulty concluding that the restraint has resulted from private action.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

HN6[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The Noerr doctrine does not immunize every concerted effort that is genuinely intended to influence governmental action. If all such conduct were immunized, competitors would be free to enter into horizontal price agreements as long as they wished to propose that price as an appropriate level for governmental ratemaking or price supports. Horizontal conspiracies or boycotts designed to exact higher prices or other economic advantages from the government would be immunized on the ground that they are genuinely intended to influence the government to agree to the conspirators' terms. Firms could claim immunity for boycotts or horizontal output restrictions on the ground that they are intended to dramatize the plight of their industry and spur legislative action.

Lawyers' Edition Display

Decision

Antitrust exemption for efforts to influence government action held not applicable to attempt to influence fire protection association's promulgation of private electrical code routinely incorporated into law.

Summary

A manufacturer of plastic electrical conduit sought to have the National Fire Protection Association (NFPA)--a private, voluntary association representing industry, labor, firefighters, and others--list such conduit as an acceptable alternative to steel conduit in the NFPA's triennially revised National Electrical Code (NEC), which code is routinely adopted into law by many state and local governments and is widely accepted by insurers, contractors, and others as identifying acceptable electrical products. Manufacturers of steel conduit and other interested parties agreed among themselves to recruit numerous individuals to join the NFPA, pay those individuals' expenses, and organize those individuals at the NFPA annual meeting as a bloc vote against the proposal to include plastic conduit in the 1981 NEC; and they were successful in defeating that proposal. The plastic conduit manufacturer then filed an action against the steel conduit interests in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, which action alleged that those interests had unreasonably restrained trade in the electrical conduit market in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1). The jury, determining that the interests had subverted the NFPA's consensus standard-making process even though they had not actually broken any NFPA rules, found the interests liable and awarded to the plaintiff manufacturer damages for profits which that manufacturer had lost as a result of the effect which the exclusion of plastic conduit from the 1981 NEC had in the marketplace of its own force, though not for any damages resulting from the adoption of the NEC by government entities. The District Court, however, set aside the jury's verdict on the ground that the interests' actions were subject to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine--which protects petitioning of the government from scrutiny under the Sherman Act--because (1) the NFPA was akin to a legislature, and (2) the interests had genuinely sought, through acceptable political methods, to influence the NFPA and thereby influence the government entities which adopt the NEC. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, vacating the District Court's judgment and remanding with instructions to reinstate the jury's award, declined to extend the Noerr-Pennington doctrine to (1) the lobbying of private "quasi-legislative" bodies or (2) efforts to indirectly influence government action through such bodies (817 F2d 938).

On certiorari, the United States Supreme Court affirmed. In an opinion by Brennan, J., joined by Rehnquist, Ch. J., and Marshall, Blackmun, Stevens, Scalia, and Kennedy, JJ., it was held that the conduct of the steel conduit interests, despite its political impact, was not immune from federal antitrust liability under the Noerr doctrine, since (1) as to the immunity accorded those who merely urge the government to restrain trade, the NFPA--being (a) without official authority, (b) unaccountable to the public, and (c) composed in part of persons having economic incentives to restrain trade--could not be treated as a "quasi-legislative" body simply because legislatures routinely adopt the NEC; and (2) as to the immunity accorded to private restraints which are incidental to a valid effort to influence governmental action, an economically interested party, exercising decisionmaking authority in formulating a product standard for a private association that comprises market participants, enjoys no Noerr immunity from any antitrust liability flowing from the effect the standard has of its own force in the marketplace.

White, J., joined by O'Connor, J., dissented, expressing the view that the Noerr doctrine protects participants in private organizations such as the NFPA that regularly propound and publish health and safety standards for a variety of products and industries and then present these standards to state and local governments for the purpose of having them enacted into law.

Headnotes

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §29 > combination to influence government action -- formulation of private electrical code -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[1A][] [1A]LEdHN[1B][] [1B]LEdHN[1C][] [1C]LEdHN[1D][] [1D]LEdHN[1E][] [1E]LEdHN[1F][] [1F]

The conduct of manufacturers of steel electrical conduit, and other interested parties, in attempting to influence a private fire protection association's promulgation of electrical systems product standards so as to prevent the recognition of plastic conduit as an acceptable alternative to steel conduit--by agreeing among themselves to recruit numerous individuals to join the association and vote as a bloc against a proposal to include plastic conduit in the standards--is not immune from federal antitrust liability under the doctrine of Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v Noerr Motor Freight, Inc. (1961) 365 US 127, 5 L Ed 2d 464, 81 S Ct 523, which protects concerted efforts to restrain or monopolize trade by petitioning government officials, even though the association's standards are widely adopted into law by state and local governments; such conduct does not enjoy the immunity accorded under the Noerr doctrine to those who merely urge the government to restrain trade, since the association--being (1) without official authority, (2) unaccountable to the public, and (3) composed in part of persons having economic incentives to restrain trade--cannot be treated as a "quasi-legislative" body simply because legislatures routinely adopt its standards; nor does Noerr immunity apply on the theory that the exclusion of plastic conduit from the standards is incidental to a valid effort to influence government action by influencing a source from which many governments derive their laws, since the context and nature of the conduct at issue make it the type of commercial activity that has traditionally had its validity determined by the antitrust laws, rather than the kind of political activity which the Noerr doctrine is designed to protect; where, as here, an economically interested party exercises decisionmaking authority in formulating a product standard for a private association that comprises market participants, that party enjoys no Noerr immunity from any antitrust liability flowing from the effect the standard has of its own force in the marketplace. (White and O'Connor, JJ., dissented from this holding.)

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9 > petitioning government officials -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[2][] [2]

Concerted efforts to restrain or monopolize trade by petitioning government officials are protected from federal antitrust liability, but the scope of this protection depends on the source, context, and nature of the anticompetitive restraint at issue.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9 > petitioning government -- public restraint -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[3][] [3]

Where a restraint upon trade or monopolization is the result of valid governmental action, as opposed to private action, those urging the governmental action enjoy absolute immunity from antitrust liability for the anticompetitive restraint.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9 > petitioning government -- private restraint -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[4A][] [4A]LEdHN[4B][] [4B]LEdHN[4C][] [4C]LEdHN[4D][] [4D]LEdHN[4E][] [4E]

Where an anticompetitive restraint results directly from private action, independent of any government action, that restraint cannot form the basis for federal antitrust liability if it is incidental to a valid effort to influence governmental action, but the mere fact that an anticompetitive activity is also genuinely intended to influence governmental action is not alone sufficient to render that activity immune from antitrust liability; the validity of efforts to influence government action, and thus the applicability of this immunity, varies with the context and nature of the activity, so that a publicity campaign directed at the general public, seeking legislation or executive action, enjoys antitrust immunity even when the campaign employs unethical and deceptive methods, whereas in less political arenas, unethical and deceptive practices can constitute abuses of administrative or judicial processes that may result in antitrust violations; private action that is not genuinely aimed at procuring favorable government action is a mere sham that cannot be deemed a valid effort to influence government action.

EVIDENCE §173 > presumption as to motive -- private parties -- government -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[5][] [5]

It may be presumed, absent a showing to the contrary, that a government acts in the public interest; private parties, on the other hand, may be presumed to be acting primarily on their own behalf.

APPEAL §1662 > effect of decision on other grounds -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[6A][] [6A]LEdHN[6B][] [6B]

Given the United States Supreme Court's conclusion--in an action by a manufacturer of plastic electrical conduit who (1) alleges that parties interested in the marketing of steel electrical conduit violated 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1) by conspiring to improperly influence a private fire protection association to exclude plastic conduit from its electrical systems product standards, which standards are routinely adopted into law by many state and local governments, and (2) has obtained a jury verdict for damages based on the effect the exclusion had in the marketplace of its own force, as opposed to the effect of the standards' adoption into law--that the conduct of the steel conduit interests is not immune from federal antitrust liability under the rule relating to concerted efforts to restrain or monopolize trade by petitioning government officials, the Supreme Court need not decide whether, or to what extent, the efforts of the steel conduit interests to publicize the stigma which plastic conduit suffered by being excluded from the standards--which efforts may have exacerbated the independent market effect of the exclusion--alter the incidental status of the resulting anticompetitive harm.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9 > immunity for petitioning government -- sham exception -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[7A][] [7A]LEdHN[7B][] [7B]

With regard to the doctrine that concerted efforts to restrain or monopolize trade by petitioning government officials are immune from federal antitrust liability, the "sham" exception to that doctrine does not cover the activity of an antitrust defendant who genuinely seeks to achieve a governmental result but does so through improper means.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §29 > influencing industry standards -- compliance with rules -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[8][] [8]

The validity, under the federal antitrust laws, of efforts by manufacturers of steel electrical conduit and other interested parties to influence a private fire protection association's promulgation of electrical systems product standards so as to prevent the recognition of plastic conduit as an acceptable alternative to steel conduit, is not established solely by the literal compliance of those parties with the rules of the association, since the hope of procompetitive benefits from the promulgation of such private standards depends upon the existence of safeguards sufficient to prevent the standard-setting process from being biased by members which have economic interests in restraining competition; an association cannot validate the anticompetitive activities of its members simply by adopting rules that fail to provide such safeguards.

Syllabus

The National Fire Protection Association -- a private organization that includes members representing industry, labor, academia, insurers, organized medicine, firefighters, and government -- sets and publishes product standards and codes related to fire protection. Its National Electrical Code (Code), which establishes requirements for the design and installation of electrical wiring systems, is routinely adopted into law by a substantial number of state and local governments, and is widely adopted as setting acceptable standards by private product-certification laboratories, insurance underwriters, and electrical inspectors, contractors, and distributors. Throughout the relevant period, the Code permitted the use of electrical conduit made of [*2] steel. Respondent, a manufacturer of plastic conduit, initiated a proposal before the Association to extend Code approval to plastic conduit as well. The proposal was approved by one of the Association's professional panels, and thus could be adopted into the Code by a simple majority of the members attending the Association's 1980 annual meeting. Before the meeting was held, petitioner, the Nation's largest producer of steel conduit, members of the steel industry, other steel conduit manufacturers, and independent sales agents collectively agreed to exclude respondent's product from the 1981 Code by packing the annual meeting with new Association members whose only function was to vote against respondent's proposal. After the proposal was defeated at the meeting and an appeal to the Association's Board of Directors was denied, respondent brought suit in Federal District Court, alleging that petitioner and others had unreasonably restrained trade in the electrical conduit market in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. The jury found petitioner liable, but the court granted a judgment n.o.v. for petitioner, reasoning that it was entitled to antitrust immunity under the doctrine of [*3] Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523. The Court of Appeals reversed.

Held: Noerr antitrust immunity does not apply to petitioner. Pp. 499-510.

(a) The scope of Noerr protection depends on the source, context, and nature of the anticompetitive restraint at issue. Where a restraint is the result of valid governmental action, as opposed to private action, those urging the governmental action enjoy absolute immunity from antitrust liability for the anticompetitive restraint. In this case, the relevant context is the standard-setting process of a private association without official authority that includes members having horizontal and vertical business relations and economic incentives to restrain competition. Such an association cannot be treated as a "quasi-legislative" body simply because legislatures routinely adopt its Code, and thus petitioner does not enjoy the immunity afforded those who merely urge the government to restrain trade. Pp. 499-502.

(b) Nor does Noerr immunity apply to petitioner on the theory that the exclusion of plastic conduit from [*4] the Code, and the effect that exclusion had of its own force in the marketplace, were incidental to a valid effort to influence governmental action. Although, because a large number of governments routinely adopt the Code into law, efforts to influence the Association's standard-setting process are arguably the most effective means of influencing legislation regulating electrical conduit, and although Noerr immunity is not limited to "direct" petitioning of government officials, the Noerr doctrine does not immunize every concerted activity that is genuinely intended to influence governmental action. There is no merit to the argument that, regardless of the Association's nonlegislative status, petitioner's efforts to influence the Association must be given the same wide berth accorded legislative lobbying or efforts to influence legislative action in the political arena. Pp. 502-504.

(c) Unlike the publicity campaign to influence legislation in Noerr, petitioner's activity did not take place in the open political arena, where partisanship is the hallmark of decisionmaking, but took place within the confines of a private standard-setting process. The validity of petitioner's [*5] efforts to influence the Code is not established, without more, by petitioner's literal compliance with the Association's rules, for the hope of the Code's procompetitive benefits depends upon the existence of safeguards sufficient to prevent the standard-setting process from being biased by members with economic interests in restraining competition. An association cannot validate the anticompetitive activities of its members simply by adopting rules that fail to provide such safeguards. At least where, as here, an economically interested party exercises decisionmaking authority in formulating a product standard for a private association that comprises market participants, that party enjoys no Noerr immunity from any antitrust liability flowing from the effect the standard has of its own force in the marketplace. Pp. 505-510.

Counsel: Marvin E. Frankel argued the cause for petitioner. With him on the briefs were Robert M. Heller, Arthur B. Kramer, and Debora K. Grobman.

Fredric W. Yerman argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief were Michael Malina, Randolph S. Sherman, and Richard A. De Sevo. *

---

* Briefs of amici curiae urging reversal were filed for the State of Illinois by Neil F. Hartigan, Attorney General, and Robert E. Davy, Jr., Assistant Attorney General; and for the Western Fire Chiefs Association et al. by William J. Meeske and Alexander D. Thomson.

Briefs of amici curiae urging affirmance were filed for the United States et al. by Solicitor General Fried, Assistant Attorney General Rule, Deputy Solicitor General Cohen, Deputy Assistant Attorney General Starling, Paul J. Larkin, Jr., Robert B. Nicholson, John J. Powers III, Marion L. Jetton, Robert D. Paul, and Ernest J. Isenstadt; and for the State of Alaska et al. by Robert Abrams, Attorney General of New York, O. Peter Sherwood, Solicitor General, and Lloyd E. Constantine, Susan Beth Farmer, Elizabeth M. O'Neill, and George W. Sampson, Assistant Attorneys General, Grace Berg Schaible, Attorney General of Alaska, Richard D. Monkmon, Assistant Attorney General, Robert K. Corbin, Attorney General of Arizona, John Steven Clark, Attorney General of Arkansas, Jeffrey A. Bell, Deputy Attorney General, John Van de Kamp, Attorney General of California, Andrea Ordin, Chief Assistant Attorney General, Thomas P. Dove, Deputy Attorney General, Duane Woodard, Attorney General of Colorado, Thomas P. McMahon, First Assistant Attorney General, Joseph I. Lieberman, Attorney General of Connecticut, Robert M. Langer, Assistant Attorney General, Warren Price III, Attorney General of Hawaii, Robert A. Marks, Supervising Deputy Attorney General, Thomas J. Miller, Attorney General of Iowa, John Perkins, Deputy Attorney General, James E. Tierney, Attorney General of Maine, Stephen L. Wessler, Assistant Attorney General, J. Joseph Curran, Jr., Attorney General of Maryland, Michael F. Brockmeyer, Assistant Attorney General, Frank J. Kelley, Attorney General of Michigan, Louis J. Caruso, Solicitor General, Robert C. Ard, Jr., Assistant Attorney General, Hubert H. Humphrey III, Attorney General of Minnesota, Cary Edwards, Attorney General of New Jersey, Laurel A. Price, Deputy Attorney General, Lacy H. Thornburg, Attorney General of Judges: BRENNAN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which REHNQUIST, C. J., and MARSHALL, BLACKMUN, STEVENS, SCALIA, and KENNEDY, JJ., joined. WHITE, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which O'CONNOR, J., joined, post, p. 511.

[6]

Opinion by: BRENNAN

Opinion

[*495] [502] [1934] JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

LEdHN[1A][] [1A]Petitioner contends that its efforts to affect the product standard-setting process of a private association are immune from antitrust liability under the Noerr doctrine primarily because the association's standards are widely adopted into law by state and local governments. Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961) (Noerr). The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that Noerr immunity did not apply. We affirm.

I

The National Fire Protection Association (Association) is a private, voluntary organization with more than 31,500 individual and group members representing industry, labor, academia, insurers, organized medicine, firefighters, [*7] and government. The Association, among other things, publishes product standards and codes related to fire protection through a process known as "consensus standard making." One of the codes it publishes is the National Electrical Code (Code), which establishes product and performance requirements for the design and installation of electrical wiring systems. Revised every three years, the Code is the most influential electrical code in the nation. A substantial number of state and local governments routinely adopt the Code into law with little or no change; private certification laboratories, such as Underwriters Laboratories, normally will not list and label [*496] an electrical product that does not meet Code standards; many underwriters will refuse to insure structures that are not built in conformity with the Code; and many electrical inspectors, contractors, and distributors will not use a product that falls outside the Code.

[1935] Among the electrical products covered by the Code is electrical conduit, the hollow tubing used as a raceway to carry electrical wires through the walls and floors of buildings. Throughout the relevant period, the Code permitted using [*8] electrical conduit made of steel, and almost all conduit sold was in fact steel conduit. Starting in 1980, respondent began to offer plastic conduit made of polyvinyl chloride. Respondent claims its plastic conduit offers significant competitive advantages over steel conduit, including pliability, lower installed cost, and lower susceptibility to short circuiting. In 1980, however, there was also a scientific basis for concern that, during fires in high-rise buildings, polyvinyl chloride conduit might burn and emit toxic fumes.

Respondent initiated a proposal to include polyvinyl chloride conduit as an approved type of electrical conduit in the 1981 edition of the Code. Following approval by one of the Association's professional panels, this proposal was scheduled for consideration at the 1980 annual meeting, where it could be adopted or [503] rejected by a simple majority of the members present. Alarmed that, if approved, respondent's product might pose a competitive threat to steel conduit, petitioner, the Nation's largest producer of steel conduit, met to plan strategy with, among others, members of the steel industry, other steel conduit manufacturers, and its independent [*9] sales agents. They collectively agreed to exclude respondent's product from the 1981 Code by packing the up-coming annual meeting with new Association members whose only function would be to vote against the polyvinyl chloride proposal.

---

North Carolina, Richard H. Carlton, Assistant Attorney General, Anthony J. Celebrezze, Jr., Attorney General of Ohio, Dave Frohnmayer, Attorney General of Oregon, LeRoy S. Zimmerman, Attorney General of Pennsylvania, Eugene F. Wayne, Chief Deputy Attorney General, James E. O'Neil, Attorney General of Rhode Island, Roger A. Tellinghuisen, Attorney General of South Dakota, Jim Mattox, Attorney General of Texas, Mary F. Keller, Executive Assistant Attorney General, John J. White, Assistant Attorney General, David L. Wilkinson, Attorney General of Utah, Kenneth O. Eikenberry, Attorney General of Washington, John R. Ellis, Deputy Attorney General, Tina Kondo, Assistant Attorney General, Charles G. Brown, Attorney General of West Virginia, Mark D. Kindt, Deputy Attorney General, Donald J. Hanaway, Attorney General of Wisconsin, and Kevin J. O'Connor, Assistant Attorney General.

Combined, the steel interests recruited 230 persons to join the Association and to attend the annual meeting to [*497] vote against the proposal. Petitioner alone recruited 155 persons -- including employees, executives, sales agents, the agents' employees, employees from two divisions that did not sell electrical products, and the wife of a national sales director. Petitioner and the other steel interests also paid over $ 100,000 for the membership, registration, and attendance expenses of these voters. At the annual meeting, the steel group voters were instructed where to sit and how and when to vote by group leaders who used walkie-talkies and hand signals to facilitate communication. Few of the steel group voters had any of the technical documentation necessary to follow the meeting. None of them spoke at the meeting to give their reasons for opposing the proposal to approve polyvinyl chloride conduit. Nonetheless, with their solid vote in [*10] opposition, the proposal was rejected and returned to committee by a vote of 394 to 390. Respondent appealed the membership's vote to the Association's Board of Directors, but the Board denied the appeal on the ground that, although the Association's rules had been circumvented, they had not been violated. [1]

In October 1981, respondent brought this suit in Federal District Court, alleging that petitioner and others had unreasonably restrained trade in the electrical conduit market in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. 26 Stat. 209, 15 U.S. C. § 1. A bifurcated jury trial began in March 1985. Petitioner conceded that it had conspired with the other [*11] steel interests to exclude respondent's product from the Code and that it had a pecuniary interest to do so. The jury, instructed under the rule of reason that respondent carried the burden of showing that the anticompetitive effects of petitioner's actions outweighed any procompetitive benefits of standard [*498] setting, found petitioner liable. In answers to special interrogatories, the jury found that petitioner did not violate any rules of the Association and acted, at least in part, based on a genuine belief that plastic conduit was unsafe, but that petitioner nonetheless [1936] did "subvert" the consensus standardmaking process of the Association. App. 23-24. The jury also made special findings that petitioner's actions had an adverse impact on competition, were not the least restrictive means of expressing petitioner's opposition to the use of polyvinyl [504] chloride conduit in the marketplace, and unreasonably restrained trade in violation of the antitrust laws. The jury then awarded respondent damages, to be trebled, of $ 3.8 million for lost profits resulting from the effect that excluding polyvinyl chloride conduit from the 1981 Code had of its own force [*12] in the marketplace. No damages were awarded for injuries stemming from the adoption of the 1981 Code by governmental entities. [2]

[13] The District Court then granted a judgment n.o.v. for petitioner, reasoning that Noerr immunity applied because the Association was "akin to a legislature" and because petitioner, "by the use of methods consistent with acceptable standards of political action, genuinely intended to influence the [Association] with respect to the National Electrical Code, and to thereby influence the various state and local legislative bodies which adopt the [Code]." App. to Pet. for [*499] Cert. 28a, 30a. The Court of Appeals reversed, rejecting both the argument that

---

[1] Respondent also sought a tentative interim amendment to the Code, but that was denied on the ground that there was not sufficient exigency to merit an interim amendment. The Association subsequently approved use of polyvinyl chloride conduit for buildings of less than three stories in the 1984 Code, and for all buildings in the 1987 Code.

[2] Although the District Court was of the view that at trial respondent relied solely on the theory that its injury "flowed from legislative action," App. to Pet. for Cert. 31a, the Court of Appeals determined that respondent was awarded damages only on the theory "that the stigma of not obtaining [Code] approval of its products and [petitioner's] 'marketing' of that stigma caused independent marketplace harm to [respondent] in those jurisdictions permitting use of [polyvinyl chloride] conduit, as well as those which later adopted the 1984 [Code], which permitted use of [polyvinyl chloride] conduit in buildings less than three stories high. [Respondent] did not seek redress for any injury arising from the adoption of the [Code] by the various governments." 817 F.2d 938, 941, n. 3 (1987) (emphasis added). We decide the case as it was framed by the Court of Appeals.

the Association should be treated as a "quasi-legislative" body because legislatures routinely adopt the Code and the argument that efforts to influence the Code were immune under Noerr as indirect attempts to influence state and local governments. 817 F.2d 938 (1987). We granted certiorari to address important issues regarding the application of Noerr immunity to private standard-setting associations. [3] 484 U.S. 814 (1987).

[14] II

LEdHN[2][] [2]LEdHN[3][] [3]LEdHN[4A][] [4A]HN1[] Concerted efforts to restrain or monopolize trade by petitioning government officials are protected from antitrust liability under the doctrine established by Noerr; Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 669-672, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965); and California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609 (1972).The scope of this protection depends, however, on the source, context, and nature of the anticompetitive restraint at issue. "Where a restraint upon trade or monopolization is the result of valid governmental action, as opposed to private action," those urging the governmental action enjoy absolute immunity from antitrust liability for the anticompetitive restraint. Noerr, 365 U.S. at 136; see also Pennington, supra, at 671. In addition, HN2[] where, independent of any government action, the anticompetitive restraint [*15] results directly from [505] private action, the restraint cannot form the basis for antitrust liability if it is "incidental" to a valid effort to influence governmental action. Noerr, supra, at 143. The validity of such efforts, and thus the applicability of Noerr immunity, varies with the context and nature of the activity. A publicity campaign directed at the general public, seeking legislation or executive action, enjoys antitrust immunity even [1937] when the campaign employs unethical [*500] and deceptive methods. Noerr, supra, at 140-141. But in less political arenas, unethical and deceptive practices can constitute abuses of administrative or judicial processes that may result in antitrust violations.[4] California Motor Transport, supra, at 512-513.

[16] In this case, the restraint of trade on which liability was predicated was the Association's exclusion of respondent's product from the Code, and no damages were imposed for the incorporation of that Code by any government. The relevant context is thus the standard-setting process of a private association. HN4[] Typically, private standard-setting associations, like the Association in this case, include members having horizontal and vertical business relations. See generally 7 P. Areeda, Antitrust Law P1477, p. 343 (1986) (trade and standard-setting associations routinely treated as continuing conspiracies of their members). There is no doubt that the members of such associations often have economic incentives to restrain competition and that the product standards set by such associations have a serious potential for anticompetitive harm. [5] [*18] See American Society of Mechanical Engineers, Inc. v. Hydrolevel Corp., 456 U.S. 556, 571, 72 L. Ed. 2d 330, 102 S. Ct. 1935 (1982). Agreement on a product standard is, after all, implicitly an agreement not to manufacture, distribute, or purchase certain types of products. Accordingly, private standard-setting associations have [*17] traditionally been objects of antitrust scrutiny. See, e. g., ibid.; Radiant Burners, Inc. v. Peoples Gas Light & Coke Co., 364 U.S. 656, 5 L. Ed. 2d 358, 81 S. Ct. 365 (1961) (per curiam). See also FTC v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, [*501] 476 U.S. 447 (1986). When, however, private associations promulgate safety standards based on the merits of objective expert judgments and through procedures that prevent the standard-setting process from being biased by

---

[3] We also granted certiorari on the issue whether, if not immune under Noerr, petitioner's conduct violated the Sherman Act, but we now vacate our grant of that issue as improvident.

[4] LEdHN[4B][] [4B]

Of course, HN3[] in whatever forum, private action that is not genuinely aimed at procuring favorable government action is a mere sham that cannot be deemed a valid effort to influence government action. Noerr, 365 U.S. at 144; California Motor Transport, 404 U.S. at 511.

[5] "Product standardization might impair competition in several ways. . . . [It] might deprive some consumers of a desired product, eliminate quality competition, exclude rival producers, or facilitate oligopolistic pricing by easing rivals' ability to monitor each other's prices." 7 P. Areeda, Antitrust Law P1503, p. 373 (1986).

members with economic interests in stifling product competition, cf. Hydrolevel, supra, at 570-573 (noting absence of "meaningful safeguards"), those private standards can have significant procompetitive advantages. It is this potential for procompetitive benefits that has led most lower courts to apply rule-of-reason [506] analysis to product standard-setting by private associations. [6]

LEdHN[1B][] [1B]LEdHN[5][] [5]Given this context, petitioner does not enjoy the immunity accorded those who merely urge the government to restrain trade. We agree with the Court of Appeals that the Association cannot be treated as a "quasi-legislative" body simply because legislatures routinely adopt the Code the Association publishes. 817 F.2d, at 943-944. Whatever de facto authority [*19] the Association enjoys, no official authority has been conferred on it by any government, and the decisionmaking body of the Association is composed, at least in part, of persons with economic incentives to restrain trade. See Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 707-708, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777, 82 S. Ct. 1404 (1962). See also id., at 706-707; Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 791-792, 44 L. Ed. 2d 572, 95 S. Ct. 2004 (1975). "We may presume, HN5[] absent a showing to the contrary, that [a government] acts in the public interest. A private party, on the other hand, may be presumed to be acting primarily on his or its own behalf." Hallie v. Eau Claire, 471 U.S. 34, 45, 85 L. Ed. 2d 24, 105 S. Ct. 1713 (1985). The dividing line between restraints resulting from governmental action and those resulting from private action [*502] may not always be obvious. [7] But where, as here, the restraint is imposed by persons unaccountable to the public and without official authority, many of whom have personal financial interests in restraining competition, we have no difficulty [*20] concluding that the restraint has resulted from private action.

[21] LEdHN[1C][] [1C]LEdHN[6A][] [6A]Noerr immunity might still apply, however, if, as petitioner argues, the exclusion of polyvinyl chloride conduit from the Code, and the effect that exclusion had of its own force in the marketplace, were incidental to a valid effort to influence governmental action. Petitioner notes that the lion's share of the anticompetitive effect in this case came from the predictable adoption of the Code into law by a large number of state and local governments. See 817 F.2d at 939, n. 1.Indeed, petitioner argues that, because state and local governments rely so heavily on the Code and lack the resources or technical expertise to second-guess it, efforts to influence the Association's standard-setting process are the most effective means [507] of influencing legislation regulating electrical conduit. This claim to Noerr immunity has some force. The effort to influence governmental action in this case certainly cannot be characterized as a sham given the actual adoption of the 1981 Code into a number of statutes [*22] and local ordinances. Nor can we quarrel with petitioner's contention that, given the widespread adoption of the Code into [*503] law, any effect the 1981 Code had in the marketplace of its own force was, in the main, incidental to petitioner's genuine effort to influence governmental action. [8] And, as petitioner persuasively argues, the claim of Noerr immunity cannot be dismissed on the ground that the conduct at issue involved no "direct" petitioning of government officials, for Noerr itself immunized a form of "indirect" petitioning. See Noerr (immunizing a publicity campaign directed at the general public on the ground that it was part of an effort to influence legislative and executive action).

---

[6] See 2 J. von Kalinowski, Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation §§ 6I.01[3], 6I.03, 6I.04, pp. 6I-6 to 6I-7, 6I-18 to 6I-29 (1981) (collecting cases). Concerted efforts to enforce (rather than just agree upon) private product standards face more rigorous antitrust scrutiny. See Radiant Burners, Inc. v. Peoples Gas Light & Coke Co., 364 U.S. 656, 659-660, 5 L. Ed. 2d 358, 81 S. Ct. 365 (1961) (per curiam). See also Fashion Originators' Guild of America, Inc. v. FTC, 312 U.S. 457, 85 L. Ed. 949, 61 S. Ct. 703 (1941).

[7] See, e. g., California Motor Transport, supra, at 513 (stating in dicta that "conspiracy with a licensing authority to eliminate a competitor" or "bribery of a public purchasing agent" may violate the antitrust laws); Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 671, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585, and n. 4 (1965) (holding that immunity applied but noting that the trade restraint at issue "was the act of a public official who is not claimed to be a co-conspirator" and contrasting Continental Ore); Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 707-708, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777, 82 S. Ct. 1404 (1962); 1 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law P206 (1978) (discussing the extent to which Noerr immunity should apply to commercial transactions involving the government). See also Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 791-792, 44 L. Ed. 2d 572, 95 S. Ct. 2004 (1975); Continental Ore, supra, at 706-707.

[23] LEdHN[4C][] [4C]Nonetheless, the validity of petitioner's actions remains an issue. HN6[] We cannot agree with petitioner's absolutist position that the Noerr doctrine immunizes every concerted effort that is genuinely intended to influence governmental action. [1939] If all such conduct were immunized then, for example, competitors would be free to enter into horizontal price agreements as long as they wished to propose that price as an appropriate level for governmental ratemaking or price supports. But see Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 324 U.S. 439, 456-463, 89 L. Ed. 1051, 65 S. Ct. 716 (1945). Horizontal conspiracies or boycotts designed to exact higher prices or other economic advantages from the government would be immunized on the ground that they are genuinely intended to influence the government to agree to the conspirators' terms. But see Georgia v. Evans, 316 U.S. 159, 86 L. Ed. 1346, 62 S. Ct. 972 (1942). Firms could claim immunity for boycotts or horizontal output restrictions on the ground that they are intended to dramatize the plight of their industry [*24] and spur legislative action. Immunity might even be [*504] claimed for anticompetitive mergers on the theory that they give the merging corporations added political clout. Nor is it necessarily dispositive that packing the Association's meeting may have been the most effective means of securing government action, for one could imagine situations where the most effective means of influencing government officials is bribery, and we have never suggested that that kind of attempt to influence the government merits protection. We thus conclude that the Noerr immunity of anticompetitive activity intended to influence the government depends not only on its impact, but also on the context and nature of the activity.

Here petitioner's actions took [508] place within the context of the standard-setting process of a private association. Having concluded that the Association is not a "quasi-legislative" body, we reject petitioner's argument that any efforts to influence the Association must be treated as efforts to influence a "quasi-legislature" and given the same wide berth accorded legislative lobbying. That rounding up supporters is an acceptable and constitutionally protected [*25] method of influencing elections does not mean that rounding up economically interested persons to set private standards must also be protected. Nor do we agree with petitioner's contention that, regardless of the Association's nonlegislative status, the effort to influence the Code should receive the same wide latitude given ethically dubious efforts to influence legislative action in the political arena, see Noerr, 365 U.S. at 140-141, simply because the ultimate aim of the effort to influence the private standard-setting process was (principally) legislative action. The ultimate aim is not dispositive. A misrepresentation to a court would not necessarily be entitled to the same antitrust immunity allowed deceptive practices in the political arena simply because the odds were very good that the court's decision would be codified -- nor for that matter would misrepresentations made under oath at a legislative committee hearing in the hopes of spurring legislative action.

[*505] LEdHN[1D][] [1D]What distinguishes this case from Noerr and its progeny is that the context and nature of petitioner's [*26] activity make it the type of commercial activity that has traditionally had its validity determined by the antitrust laws themselves. True, in Noerr we immunized conduct that could be characterized as a conspiracy among railroads to destroy business relations between truckers and their customers. Noerr, supra, at 142.But we noted there:

---

[8] LEdHN[6B][] [6B]

The effect, independent of government action, that the 1981 Code had in the marketplace may to some extent have been exacerbated by petitioner's efforts to "market" the stigma respondent's product suffered by being excluded from the Code. See 17 F.2d at 941, n. 3. Given our disposition infra, we need not decide whether, or to what extent, these "marketing" efforts alter the incidental status of the resulting anticompetitive harm. See generally Noerr, 365 U.S. at 142 (noting that in that case there were. "no specific findings that the railroads attempted directly to persuade anyone not to deal with the truckers").

"There are no specific findings that the railroads attempted directly to persuade anyone not to deal with the truckers. Moreover, all the evidence in the record, both oral and documentary, deals with the railroads' efforts to influence the passage and enforcement of laws. Circulars, speeches, newspaper articles, editorials, magazine articles, memoranda and all other documents discuss in one way or another the railroads' charges that heavy trucks injure the roads, violate the laws and create traffic hazards, and urge that truckers should be forced [1940] to pay a fair share of the costs of rebuilding the roads, that they should be compelled to obey the laws, and that limits should be placed upon the weight of the loads they are permitted to carry." 365 U.S. at 142-143.

In light of those findings, [*27] we characterized the railroads' activity as a classic "attempt . . . to influence legislation by a campaign of publicity," an "inevitable" and "incidental" effect of which was "the infliction of some direct injury upon the interests of the party against whom the campaign is directed." Id., at 143. The essential character of such a publicity campaign was, we concluded, political, and could not be segregated from the activity's impact on business. Rather, the plaintiff's cause of action simply embraced the inherent possibility in such political fights "that [509] one group or the other will get hurt by the arguments that are made." Id., at 144. As a political activity, special factors counseled against regulating the publicity campaign under the antitrust laws:

[*506] "Insofar as [the Sherman] Act sets up a code of ethics at all, it is a code that condemns trade restraints, not political activity, and, as we have already pointed out, a publicity campaign to influence governmental action falls clearly into the category of political activity. The proscriptions of the Act, tailored as they are for the business world, are not at all appropriate [*28] for application in the political arena. Congress has traditionally exercised extreme caution in legislating with respect to problems relating to the conduct of political activities, a caution which has been reflected in the decisions of this Court interpreting such legislation. All of this caution would go for naught if we permitted an extension of the Sherman Act to regulate activities of that nature simply because those activities have a commercial impact and involve conduct that can be termed unethical." Id., at 140-141 (footnote omitted).

In Noerr, then, the political context and nature of the activity precluded inquiry into its antitrust validity. [9]

[29] LEdHN[7A][] [7A]Here the context and nature of the activity do not counsel against inquiry into its validity. Unlike the publicity campaign in Noerr, the activity at issue here did not take place in the open political arena, where partisanship is the hallmark of decisionmaking, but within the confines of a private standard-setting process. The validity of conduct within that process has long been defined and circumscribed by the antitrust laws without regard to whether the private standards are likely to be adopted into law. See supra, at 500. Indeed, because private standard-setting by associations comprising firms with horizontal and vertical business relations is permitted at all under the antitrust laws only on the [*507] understanding that it will be conducted in a nonpartisan manner offering procompetitive benefits, see ibid., the standards of conduct in this context are, at least in some respects, more rigorous than the standards of conduct prevailing in the partisan political arena or in the adversarial process of adjudication. The activity at issue here thus cannot, as in Noerr, be characterized [*30] as an activity that has traditionally been regulated with extreme caution, see Noerr, 365 U.S. at 141, or as an activity that "bear[s] little if any resemblance to the combinations normally held violative of the Sherman Act," id., at 136. And petitioner did not confine itself to efforts to persuade an independent decisionmaker, cf. id., at 138, 139 (describing the immunized [510] conduct as "mere solicitation"); rather, it organized and orchestrated the actual exercise of the Association's decisionmaking authority in setting a standard. [1941] Nor can the setting of the Association's Code be characterized as merely an exercise of the power of persuasion, for it in part involves the exercise of market power. The Association's members, after all, include consumers, distributors, and manufacturers of electrical conduit, and any agreement to exclude polyvinyl chloride conduit from the Code is in part an implicit agreement not to trade in that type of electrical conduit. Cf. id., at 136. Although one could reason backwards from [9] Similarly in California Motor Transport any antitrust review of the validity of the activity at issue was limited and structured by the fact that there the antitrust defendants were "us[ing] the channels and procedures of state and federal agencies and courts." 404 U.S. at 511; see also id., at 512-513.

the legislative impact of the Code to the conclusion that the conduct at [*31] issue here is "political," we think that, given the context and nature of the conduct, it can more aptly be characterized as commercial activity with a political impact. Just as the antitrust laws should not regulate political activities "simply because those activities have a commercial impact," id., at 141, so the antitrust laws should not necessarily immunize what are in essence commercial activities simply because they have a political impact. [10]

[32]

[*508] LEdHN[4D][] [4D]NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1215, 102 S. Ct. 3409 (1982), is not to the contrary. In that case we held that the First Amendment protected the nonviolent elements of a boycott of white merchants organized by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and designed to make white government and business leaders comply with a list of demands for equality and racial justice. Although the boycotters intended to inflict economic injury on the merchants, the boycott was not motivated by any desire to lessen competition or to reap economic benefits but by the aim of vindicating rights of equality and freedom lying at the heart of the [511] Constitution, and the boycotters were consumers who did not stand to profit financially from a lessening of competition in the boycotted market. Id., at 914-915. Here, in contrast, [*509] petitioner was at least partially motivated by the desire to lessen competition, and, because of petitioner's line of business, stood to reap substantial economic benefits [*33] from making it difficult for respondent to compete. [11]

LEdHN[1E][] [1E] LEdHN[8][] [8] [*34] Thus in this case the context and nature of petitioner's efforts to influence the Code [1942] persuade us that the validity of those efforts must, despite their political impact, be evaluated under the standards of conduct set forth by the antitrust laws that govern the private standard-setting process. The antitrust validity of these efforts is not established, without more, by petitioner's literal compliance with the rules of the Association, for the hope of procompetitive benefits depends upon the existence of safeguards sufficient to prevent the standard-setting process from being biased by members with economic interests in restraining competition. An association cannot validate the anticompetitive activities of its members simply by

[10] LEdHN[7B][] [7B]

It is admittedly difficult to draw the precise lines separating anticompetitive political activity that is immunized despite its commercial impact from anticompetitive commercial activity that is unprotected despite its political impact, and this is itself a case close to the line. For that reason we caution that our decision today depends on the context and nature of the activity. Although criticizing the uncertainty of such a particularized inquiry, post, at 513, the dissent does not dispute that the types of activity we describe supra, at 503-504, could not be immune under Noerr and fails to offer an intelligible alternative for distinguishing those nonimmune activities from the activity at issue in this case. Rather, the dissent states without elaboration that the sham exception "is enough to guard against flagrant abuse," post, at 516, apparently embracing the conclusion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit that the sham exception covers the activity of a defendant who "genuinely seeks to achieve his governmental result, but does so through improper means." Sessions Tank Liners, Inc. v. Joor Mfg., Inc., 827 F.2d 458, 465, n. 5 (1987) (emphasis in original). Such a use of the word "sham" distorts its meaning and bears little relation to the sham exception Noerr described to cover activity that was not genuinely intended to influence governmental action. 365 U.S. at 144. See also P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P203.1a, pp. 13-14 (Supp. 1987). More importantly, the Ninth Circuit's approach renders "sham" no more than a label courts could apply to activity they deem unworthy of antitrust immunity (probably based on unarticulated consideration of the nature and context of the activity), thus providing a certain superficial certainty but no real "intelligible guidance" to courts or litigants. Post, at 513. Indeed, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the very activity the dissent deems protected was an unprotected "sham." 827 F.2d at 465.

[11] LEdHN[4E][] [4E]

Although the absence of such anticompetitive motives and incentives is relevant to determining whether petitioner's restraint of trade is protected under Claiborne Hardware, we do not suggest that the absence of anticompetitive purpose is necessary for Noerr immunity. As the dissent points out, in Noerr itself the major purpose of the activity at issue was anticompetitive. Post, at 512-513. Our statement that the "ultimate aim" of petitioner "is not dispositive," supra, at 504, stands only for the proposition that, at least outside the political context, the mere fact that an anticompetitive activity is also intended to influence governmental action is not alone sufficient to render that activity immune from antitrust liability.

adopting rules that fail to provide such safeguards. [12] The issue of immunity in this case thus collapses into the issue of antitrust liability. Although we do not here set forth the rules of antitrust liability governing the private standard-setting process, we hold that at least where, as here, an economically interested party exercises decisionmaking authority in formulating a product standard for a private association that comprises market [*35] participants, that [*510] party enjoys no Noerr immunity from any antitrust liability flowing from the effect the standard has of its own force in the marketplace.

LEdHN[1F][] [1F]This conclusion does not deprive state and local governments of input and information from interested individuals or organizations or leave petitioner without ample means to petition those governments. Cf. Noerr, 365 U.S. at 137-138. See also California Motor Transport, 404 U.S. at 510.Petitioner, and others concerned about the safety or competitive threat of polyvinyl chloride conduit, can, with full antitrust immunity, engage in concerted efforts to influence those governments through direct lobbying, publicity campaigns, [*36] and other traditional avenues of political expression. To the extent state and local governments are more difficult to persuade through these other avenues, that no doubt reflects their preference for and confidence [512] in the nonpartisan consensus process that petitioner has undermined. Petitioner remains free to take advantage of the forum provided by the standard-setting process by presenting and vigorously arguing accurate scientific evidence before a nonpartisan private standard-setting body. [13] And petitioner can avoid the strictures of the private standard-setting process by attempting to influence legislatures through other forums. [*511] What petitioner may not do (without exposing itself to possible antitrust liability for direct injuries) is bias the process by, as in this case, stacking the private standard-setting body with decisionmakers sharing their economic interest in restraining competition.

[37] The judgment of the Court of Appeals is Affirmed.

Dissent by: WHITE

Dissent

JUSTICE WHITE, with whom JUSTICE O'CONNOR joins, dissenting.

Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961), held that the Sherman Act should not be construed [1943] to forbid joint efforts by railway companies seeking legislation that would disadvantage the trucking industry. These efforts for the most part involved a public relations campaign rather than direct lobbying of the lawmakers and were held not subject to antitrust challenge because of the fundamental importance of maintaining the free flow of information to the government and the right of the people to seek legislative relief, directly or indirectly. Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed.

---

[12] Even petitioner's counsel concedes, for example, that Noerr would not apply if the Association had a rule giving the steel conduit manufacturers a veto over changes in the Code. Tr. of Oral Arg. 41-42.

[13] The dissent mistakenly asserts that we today hold that Noerr immunity does not apply to mere efforts to persuade others to exclude a competitor's product from a private code. See post, at 514-516. Our holding is expressly limited to cases where an "economically interested party exercises decisionmaking authority in formulating a product standard for a private association that comprises market participants." Supra, at 509 (emphasis added); see also supra, at 506-507 (relying in part on the distinction between activity involving the exercise of decisionmaking authority and market power and activity involving mere attempts to persuade an independent decisionmaker). Cf. Noerr, 365 U.S. at 136. The dissent also mistakenly asserts that this description encompasses all private standardsetting associations. See post, at 515. In fact, many such associations are composed of members with expertise but no economic interest in suppressing competition. See, e. g., Sessions, supra, at 461, and n. 2.

2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965), and California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609 (1972), applied the rule to efforts to seek executive action and to administrative and adjudicative proceedings.

The Court now refuses to apply the rule of these cases [*38] to the participants in those private organizations, such as the National Fire Protection Association (NFPA), that regularly propound and publish health and safety standards for a variety of products and industries and then present these codes to state and local authorities for the purpose of having them enacted into law. The NFPA and those participating in the code-writing process will now be subject to antitrust liability if their efforts have anticompetitive effects and do not withstand scrutiny under the rule of reason. Believing that this [513] result is a misapplication of the Noerr decision and an improvident construction of the Sherman Act, I respectfully dissent.

[*512] This case presents an even stronger argument for immunity than did Noerr itself. That decision turned on whether the design or purpose of the conduct was to obtain or influence the passage or enforcement of laws. The Court concedes that petitioner's actions in this case constituted a "genuine effort to influence governmental action," ante, at 503, and that this was its "ultimate aim," ante, at 504. In Noerr, the publicity campaign was dispersed widely among the public in a broad [*39] but necessary diluted attempt to move public opinion in hopes that government officials would take note and respond accordingly. The campaign apparently had some influence on the passage of tax laws and other legislation favorable to the railroads in New Jersey, New York, and Ohio, and procured the Governor's veto of a bill that had been passed in Pennsylvania. See 365 U.S. at 130; see also 155 F. Supp. 768, 777-801 (ED Pa. 1957). Here, the NFPA actually drafted proposed legislation in the form of the National Electrical Code (NEC) and presented it countrywide. Not only were petitioner's efforts in this case designed to influence the passage of state laws, but there was also a much greater likelihood that they would be successful than was the case in Noerr. This is germane because it establishes a much greater likelihood that the "purpose" and "design" of petitioner's actions in this case was the "solicitation of governmental action with respect to the passage and enforcement of laws," 365 U.S. at 138.

Rather than directly confronting the severe damage that today's decision does to the Noerr doctrine, the majority asserts that the [*40] "ultimate aim" of petitioner's efforts "is not dispositive." Ante, at 504. That statement cannot be reconciled with the statements quoted earlier from Noerr, where it was held that even if one of the major purposes, or even the sole purpose, of the publicity campaign was "to destroy the truckers as competitors," 365 U.S. at 138, those actions were immunized from antitrust liability because ultimately they were "directed toward obtaining governmental action," [*513] id., at 140. The majority later doubles back on this statement, and suggests that it is important in this case that "petitioner was at least partially motivated by the desire to lessen competition, and . . . stood to reap substantial economic benefits from making it difficult for respondent to compete." Ante, at 509. It need hardly be said that all of this was also true in Noerr. Nobody condones fraud, bribery, [1944] or misrepresentation in any form, and other state and federal laws ensure that such conduct is punishable. But the point here is that conduct otherwise punishable under the antitrust laws either becomes immune from the operation of those laws when [*41] it is part of a larger design to influence the passage and enforcement of laws, or it does not. No workable boundaries to the Noerr doctrine are established by declaring, and then repeating at every turn, that everything depends on "the context and nature of" the activity, [514] ante, at 504, 505, 506, 509, if we are unable to offer any further guidance about what this vague reference is supposed to mean, especially when the result here is so clearly wrong as long as Noerr itself is reputed to remain good law. One unfortunate consequence of today's decision, therefore, is that district courts and courts of appeals will be obliged to puzzle over claims raised under the doctrine without any intelligible guidance about when and why to apply it.

If there were no private code-writing organizations, and state legislatures themselves held the necessary hearing and wrote codes from scratch, then business concerns like Allied, together with their friends, could jointly testify with impunity about the safety of various products, even though they had anticompetitive motives in doing so. This much the majority concedes, as it does that the major purpose of the code-writing organizations [*42] is to influence legislative action. These days it is almost a foregone conclusion that the vast majority of the States will adopt these codes with little or no change. It is untenable to consider the code-writing process by such organizations as the NFPA as too far removed [*514] from the legislative process to warrant application of the doctrine announced in Noerr and faithfully applied in other cases. This was the view of Judge Sneed and his colleagues on the Ninth Circuit in Sessions Tank Liners, Inc. v. Joor Mfg., Inc., 827 F.2d 458 (1987), and the reasons they gave for applying Noerr in this context are much more persuasive than anything to the contrary the majority now has to offer.

The Court's decision is unfortunate for another reason. There are now over 400 private organizations preparing and publishing an enormous variety of codes and standards. State and local governments necessarily, and as a matter of course, turn to these proposed codes in the process of legislating to further the health and safety of their citizens. The code that is at issue in this case, for example, was adopted verbatim by 25 States and the District of Columbia; [*43] 19 others adopted it with only minor changes. It is the most widely disseminated and adopted model code in the world today. There is no doubt that the work of these private organizations contributes enormously to the public interest and that participation in their work by those who have the technical competence and experience to do so should not be discouraged.

The Court's decision today will surely do just that. It must inevitably be the case that codes such as the NEC will set standards that some products cannot satisfy and hence in the name of health and safety will reduce or prevent competition, as was the case here. Yet, putative competitors of the producer of such products will now think twice before urging in the course of the code-making process that those products not be approved; for if they are successful (or even if they are not), they may well become antitrust defendants facing treble-damages liability unless they can prove to a court and a jury that they had no evil motives but were merely "presenting and vigorously arguing accurate scientific evidence before a nonpartisan private standard-setting body," ante, at 510 (though with the knowing and inevitable result [*44] of eliminating competition). In [515] this case, for example, even [*515] if Allied had not resorted to the tactics it employed, but had done no more than successfully argue in good faith the hazards of using respondent's products, it would have inflicted the same damage on respondent and would [1945] have risked facing the same antitrust suit, with a jury ultimately deciding the health and safety implications of the products at issue.

The Court's suggestion that its decision will not affect the ability of these organizations to assist state and local governments is surely wrong. The Court's holding is "that at least where, as here, an economically interested party exercises decisionmaking authority in formulating a product standard for a private association that comprises market participants, that party enjoys no Noerr immunity from any antitrust liability flowing from the effects the standard has of its own force in the marketplace." Ante, at 509-510. This description encompasses the structure and work of all such organizations as we now know them. The Court is saying, in effect, that where a private organization sets standards, the participants can be sued [*45] under the antitrust laws for any effects those standards have in the marketplace other than those flowing from their adoption into law. But the standards will have some effect in the marketplace even where they are also adopted into law, through publicity and other means, thus exposing the participants to liability. Henceforth, therefore, any private organization offers such standards at its peril, and without any of the breathing room enjoyed by other participants in the political process.

The alternative apparently envisioned by the Court is that an organization can gain the protection of the Noerr doctrine as long as nobody with any economic interest in the product is permitted to "exercis[e] decisionmaking authority" (i. e., vote) on its recommendations as to particular product standards. Insisting that organizations like the NFPA conduct themselves like courts of law will have perverse effects. Legislatures are willing to rely on such organizations precisely because their standards are being set by those who [*516] possess an expert understanding of the products and their uses, which are primarily if not entirely those who design, manufacture, sell, [*46] and distribute them. Sanitizing such bodies by discouraging the active participation of those with economic interests in the subject matter undermines their utility.

I fear that exposing organizations like the NFPA to antitrust liability will impair their usefulness by inhibiting frank and open discussion of the health and safety characteristics of new or old products that will be affected by their codes. The Court focuses on the tactics of petitioner that are thought to have subverted the entire process. But it is not suggested that if there are abuses, they are anything more than occasional happenings. The Court does speculate about the terrible practices that applying Noerr in this context could lead us to condone in future cases, ante, at 503-504, but these are no more than fantasies, since nothing of the sort occurred in the wake of Noerr itself. It seems to me that today's decision is therefore an unfortunate case of overkill.

Of course, the Noerr immunity is not unlimited and by its terms is [516] unavailable where the alleged efforts to influence legislation are nothing but a sham. As the Ninth Circuit held, this limitation is enough to guard against [*47] flagrant abuse. In any event, occasional abuse is insufficient ground to render the entire process less useful and reliable. I would reverse the judgment below and remand for further proceedings.

References

54 Am Jur 2d, Monopolies, Restraints of Trade, and Unfair Trade Practices 108

24 Am Jur Trials 1, Defending Antitrust Lawsuits

15 USCS 1

US L Ed Digest, Restraints of Trade, Monopolies, and Unfair Trade Practices 9, 29

Index to Annotations, Lobbying; Noerr-Pennington Doctrine; Restraints of Trade and Monopolies

Annotation References:

"Sham" exception to application of Noerr-Pennington doctrine, exempting from federal antitrust laws joint efforts to influence governmental action. 71 ALR Fed 723.

Application of doctrine exempting from federal antitrust laws joint efforts to influence legislative or executive action. 17 ALR Fed 645.

Beer Wholesalers, Inc. v. Miller Brewing Co.

Court of Appeals of Minnesota

June 14, 1988 ; June 21, 1988, Filed

No. C5-88-285

Reporter
426 N.W.2d 438 *; 1988 Minn. App. LEXIS 597 ; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,108

Beer Wholesalers, Inc., Appellant, Wallace C. Bohrer, Sr., Plaintiff, v. Miller Brewing Company, et al., Respondents, East Side Beverage Company, Defendant

Subsequent History: Review denied by Beer Wholesalers, Inc. v. Miller Brewing Co., 1988 Minn. LEXIS 699 (Minn., Aug. 24, 1988)

Writ of certiorari denied Beer Wholesalers, Inc. v. Miller Brewing Co., 489 U.S. 1039, 109 S. Ct. 1173, 103 L. Ed. 2d 235, 1989 U.S. LEXIS 606 (1989)

Prior History: [1] Appeal from District County District Court, Hon. William B. Christensen, Judge.

Disposition: Affirmed.

Core Terms

distributor, prices, beer, trial court, renew, termination, distributorship, conspiracy, manufacturer, summary judgment, notice, retail, price-fixing, Wholesalers, nonrenewal, terms, coercion, covenant, modified, Brewers, costs, tortious interference, acquiesced, appears, argues, cases

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Contracts Law > Contract Modifications > General Overview

HN1[] Contracts Law, Contract Modifications

Whether a pre-existing agreement has been modified depends on the parties' objective manifestations, not their subjective understanding.

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > Good Cause

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > Notice Requirements

HN2[] Termination, Good Cause

The Beer Brewers and Wholesalers Act, Minn. Stat. § 325B.01-.17 (1977), provides that contracts between brewers and distributors will automatically renew unless good cause exists for termination or nonrenewal; a distributor will have 90 days after written notice to rectify any deficiencies; and a brewer may not sell beer to a distributor who intends to distribute that beer in a territory already covered by another distributor.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Contracts Law > Types of Contracts > Covenants

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Causes of Action > Fiduciary Duties > Good Faith & Fair Dealing

HN3[] Types of Contracts, Covenants

Every non-sales contract contains an implied covenant of good faith which requires that one party not make the other's performance impossible.

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

HN4[] Causes of Action, Restraints of Trade

Minn. Stat. § 325.8013 (1976) makes unlawful any contract, combination, or conspiracy between two or more persons in unreasonable restraint of trade. A contract, combination, or conspiracy between two or more persons in competition for the purpose or with the effect of affecting, fixing, controlling or maintaining the market price of any commodity is deemed to restrain trade unlawfully. Minn. Stat. § 325.8015 (1976) (now codified as Minn. Stat. § 325D.53, subd. 1 (1986)).

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Resale Price Maintenance

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Contracts Law > Defenses > Illegal Bargains

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

HN5[] Vertical Restraints, Resale Price Maintenance

Under federal antitrust law, vertical resale price maintenance is per se illegal, and written contracts which fix retail prices are proscribed. Although a manufacturer can lawfully announce resale prices in advance without eliciting an "agreement," it may not secure adherence to suggested prices by means which go beyond mere declination to sell to a customer who will not observe announced policy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > Antitrust Issues

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > General Overview

HN6[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

In cases where a manufacturer terminates a distributor for possibly price-related motivations, and the distributor asserts that he was terminated as part of a price-fixing conspiracy, the distributor must show (1) the existence of an agreement or conspiracy; and (2) a causal connection between the agreement and the termination.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

HN7[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

An unlawful conspiracy can be established if a manufacturer coerces a distributor into a retail price schedule and the distributor acquiesces. In such cases, an agreement to fix prices can be inferred from the parties' behavior. However, more than a showing that the distributor conformed to the suggested price is required. There must be evidence that the manufacturer sought such conformity and the distributor communicated its acquiescence. Evidence that a distributor changed its prices in response to coercion may meet this standard.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

HN8[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

In order to establish a nationwide conspiracy to fix prices by a manufacturer, a distributor would have to show that the manufacturer's price policy (1) was firmly enforced; (2) applied to all distributors; and (3) was acquiesced in by most of them.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Abuse of Discretion

Civil Procedure > ... > Costs & Attorney Fees > Costs > General Overview

HN9[] Standards of Review, Abuse of Discretion

An award of the costs of discovery depositions is within the discretion of the trial court and will not be reversed absent a clear abuse of discretion.

Syllabus

1. Evidence was insufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact on claims of breach of contract, fraudulent inducement, tortious interference, and violation of Minnesota antitrust and beer wholesalers acts.

2. Trial court did not abuse its discretion in taxing cost of depositions of appellant's chief officers.

Counsel: John A. Cochrane, John E. Thomas, St. Paul, Minnesota, for Appellant.

J. Marquis Eastwood, David Y. Trevor, Dorsey & Whitney, Minneapolis, Minnesota, for Respondents.

Judges: Lansing, Presiding Judge, Randall, Judge, and Kalitowski, Judge.

Opinion by: LANSING

Opinion

[*439] When Miller did not renew its beer distributorship, Beer Wholesalers, Inc. (BWI), brought this action alleging various statutory violations and common law claims. The trial court entered summary judgment dismissing all claims, and BWI appeals. We affirm.

FACTS

On October 8, 1973, Miller Brewing and BWI signed a distributorship agreement which provided that

> [1] Miller would sell beer to the distributor "in such quantities as Distributor shall order and Miller shall accept."
>
> [2] the contract [2] would automatically be renewed "unless either party hereto shall, not less than ninety (90) days prior to the end of the initial term of this Agreement, give written notice to the other party of election not to renew this Agreement." No reason was required for nonrenewal of the contract.
> [3] the distributor's rights were fully set forth in the written contract.
> [4] the distributor got unrestricted, non-exclusive territory in which to distribute, unless limited by state law.
> [5] the agreement could be modified only by a writing signed by two Miller officers, although specific provisions could be waived by conduct of the party waiving compliance.

On June 28, 1978, more than 90 days before the expiration of the contract, Miller [*440] notified BWI of its intention not to renew the contract, citing various deficiencies in BWI's operation. BWI responded to the list of dissatisfactions item by item. During the final 90 days of the contract, BWI made several attempts to explain and correct the listed deficiencies, but Miller did not change its decision and the distributorship agreement expired on October 8, 1978.

BWI then brought this suit against Miller and East Side Beverage Company, [3] a BWI competitor, alleging violations of the Beer Brewers and Wholesalers Act, contract law, tort law and antitrust law, and requesting compensatory damages of $ 26.6 million and punitive damages of $ 5 million plus costs and attorney's fees. East Side settled and was dismissed in 1985.

BWI appeals the entry of summary judgment dismissing its claims against Miller and also challenges the trial court's taxation of costs.

ISSUES

1. Did the trial court err in granting summary judgment for Miller?

2. Did the trial court abuse its discretion in taxing costs?

ANALYSIS

I

BWI and Miller do not dispute the existence or terms of the October 1973 distributorship agreement. BWI contends, however, that the agreement was modified by the notice of termination and Miller's subsequent conduct and that Miller breached the modified contract and an implied covenant of good faith; tortiously interfered with BWI's customers; fraudulently induced it to improve its distributorship in the hope of having it renewed; and violated Minnesota antitrust and beer wholesalers statutes.

A. Breach of contract.

The written agreement expressly provided that it could be modified only by a writing signed by two [4] Miller officers, and there is no evidence that Miller waived either its right not to renew the agreement or the provision requiring a writing for modification. BWI argues that Miller's July 1978 notice of intention not to renew, which was signed by two Miller officers, gave rise to a new contract between the parties, the terms of which were established by a course of dealing between the parties during July, August and September 1978.

Although BWI does not state specifically the terms of the alleged modification, BWI appears to argue that Miller offered to renew if BWI remedied the listed deficiencies and that BWI accepted that offer by continuing to distribute Miller beer and even adding new accounts. BWI further asserts that this modified agreement was breached by Miller's bad faith conduct after the notice of nonrenewal by failing to specify deficiencies, failing to stop another distributor selling beer in BWI's territory, failing to deliver beer orders, discontinuing manufacture of a brand of beer, and not renewing the agreement.

HN1[] Whether a pre-existing agreement has been modified depends on the parties' objective manifestations, not their subjective understanding. See Pine River [5] State Bank v. Mettille, 333 N.W.2d 622, 626 (Minn. 1983). In this case, as the trial court pointed out in its memorandum, Miller's conduct accorded with the terms of the written agreement. Although the nonrenewal letter listed BWI's alleged deficiencies, nothing in its language implies a promise to renew BWI if the deficiencies were corrected. Miller's conduct in reviewing BWI's attempts to correct the deficiencies also does not imply a promise to renew the distributorship in the absence of objective evidence that Miller offered to change its decision. On this evidence, the trial court did not err in granting Miller summary judgment on the breach of contract claim.

B. Beer Brewers and Wholesalers Act.

In 1977 the Minnesota legislature passed HN2[] the Beer Brewers and Wholesalers Act, Minn. Stat. § 325B.01-.17 (1977). The Act provides, in pertinent part, that contracts [*441] between brewers and distributors will automatically renew unless good cause exists for termination or nonrenewal; a distributor will have 90 days after written notice to rectify any deficiencies; and a brewer may not sell beer to a distributor who intends to distribute that beer in a territory already [6] covered by another distributor. The Act was expressly made applicable to all contracts in existence on May 28, 1977.

The trial court determined, on the basis of the Minnesota Supreme Court's decision in Jacobsen v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 392 N.W.2d 868 (Minn. 1986), that the Act did not govern the contract between Miller and BWI. In Jacobsen the provisions of the Act directly contradicted specific provisions of the contract between Jacobsen and Anheuser-Busch, and the court held that the Act, "applied retroactively to a preexisting agreement between a brewer and a wholesaler as mandated by Minn. Stat. § 325B.15 does unconstitutionally impair the parties' rights and obligations set forth in that preexisting agreement." Id. at 875.

The Jacobsen court's holding was not limited to the facts of the case before it nor to the specific provision of the act dealing with ownership transfers, and it precludes retroactive application of the Act to the October 8, 1973, contract between BWI and Miller. Because Miller's notice of nonrenewal did not extend the contract by modification, BWI cannot bring the distributorship agreement within the governance [7] of the Act. The trial court did not err in finding that it could not constitutionally apply the Act to the parties in this case.

BWI further asserts that because Miller acted in accordance with the Act (listing BWI's deficient performance and giving 90 days' notice of intent not to renew) and received benefits from the law (BWI's solicitation of unnamed new accounts in the last 90 days of the contract), Miller should be estopped from challenging the Act's constitutionality.

Although the supreme court has held that a taxpayer cannot simultaneously challenge a provision of the tax code when seeking benefits under the same provision, see Gale v. Commissioner of Taxation, 228 Minn. 345, 352-53, 37 N.W.2d 711, 716 (1949), that holding has not extended to other constitutional challenges. For example, a party was allowed to challenge two provisions of the Dram Shop Act in a suit seeking benefits under the act. Wegan v. Village of Lexington, 309 N.W.2d 273 (Minn. 1981). Even if the court had found that Miller sought benefits under the Act, Miller would not necessarily have been precluded from challenging the Beer Law's constitutionality.

[8] In addition, the alleged "benefit" asserted was that BWI continued to market Miller beer during the 90-day period in the hope of avoiding nonrenewal. The written contract already obligated BWI to "aggressively market and sell Miller beer." Because Miller received only what it was contractually entitled to, it cannot be said to have invoked the Act so as to preclude a constitutional challenge.

C. Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing.

BWI argues that Miller breached an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing governing the distributorship agreement, citing Arnott v. American Oil Co., 609 F.2d 873 (8th Cir. 1979), and Bain v. Champlin Petroleum, 692 F.2d 43 (8th Cir. 1982). Both cases involved franchises, were decided under the laws of other states, and addressed whether arbitrary termination breached the quasi-fiduciary duty imposed on franchisors by law.

BWI's reliance on American Warehousing v. Michael Ede Management, Inc., 414 N.W.2d 554 (Minn. Ct. App. 1987), is similarly misplaced. Although the court held that HN3[] every non-sales contract contains an implied covenant of good faith which requires that one [9] party not make the other's performance impossible, that implied covenant did not extend to the performance of actions outside the scope of the written agreement. Id. at 557-58.

BWI's claims of breach of this covenant do not present evidence that Miller made the 1973 contract impossible to perform. [*442] Most of BWI's complaints relate to activities that occurred during the 90 days after Miller's notice of nonrenewal which made the "terms" of Miller's June 28 letter impossible to follow. Because the June 28 letter and activities of the next 90 days did not constitute a new contract, Miller's motives in failing to renew the agreement are immaterial. See Wild v. Rarig, 302 Minn. 419, 441-42, 234 N.W.2d 775, 790 (1975). The trial court did not err in granting summary judgment on this claim.

D. Fraudulent Inducement.

BWI alleges that before it became a Miller distributor, a Miller representative said that Miller intended to allow BWI to "keep the brand" so long as sales were increasing and that, at Miller's urgings, BWI added computer equipment, trucks, personnel and accounts. Because BWI cites no cases in support of this claim, the precise [10] legal theory on which it relies is unclear. As the trial court noted, remarks from the Miller representative did not rise to the level of an offer and BWI's other activity was already expected under the 1973 contract.

The only misrepresentation alleged is Miller's declaration of intent to let BWI keep the distributorship so long as sales were increasing. BWI provides no evidence to support that allegation and does not allege that the declaration was falsely made to induce BWI to enter into the agreement, or that BWI was justified in relying on the statement in spite of the conflicting terms of the express written agreement. On these facts, the trial court did not err in concluding that BWI failed to raise a genuine issue of fact on this claim.

E. Defamation and Tortious Interference.

BWI bases its tortious interference and defamation claims on evidence that a retailer told BWI that a Miller representative had made a specific derogatory remark about BWI to the retailer. The trial court correctly held this evidence inadmissible hearsay insufficient to raise a fact issue on the tortious interference claim. See American Warehousing, 414 N.W.2d at 558.

As BWI points [11] out, the statement by Miller to the retailer, if used to show that Miller made a derogatory statement and not to prove BWI's deficiencies, would not be hearsay. But BWI advances the retailer's statement to prove the matter asserted for purposes of defamation and tortious interference, and it is therefore hearsay. Minn. R. Evid. 803(3), the state-of-mind exception on which BWI also relies, specifically excludes statements of memory to prove the fact remembered, and no reason appears why, in the decade since this litigation commenced, BWI could not have obtained this evidence in admissible form. The trial court did not err in granting summary judgment on this claim.

BWI's other claims of tortious interference are based on Miller's failure to deliver enough beer, discontinuing manufacture of a particular brand, and other activities which were clearly permitted under the parties' distributorship agreement. The trial court correctly concluded that BWI failed to present disputed material facts to support this claim.

F. Minnesota Antitrust Law.

HN4[] Minn. Stat. § 325.8013 (1976) makes unlawful any "contract, combination, or conspiracy between two or more persons in unreasonable restraint of [12] trade." A "contract, combination, or conspiracy between two or more persons in competition * * * for the purpose or with the effect of affecting, fixing, controlling or maintaining the market price * * * of any commodity" is deemed to restrain trade unlawfully. Minn. Stat. § 325.8015 (1976) (now codified as Minn. Stat. § 325D.53, subd. 1 (1986)).

HN5[] Under federal antitrust law, vertical resale price maintenance is per se illegal, and written contracts which fix retail prices are proscribed. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 407-08, 55 L. Ed. 502, 31 S. Ct. 376 (1911). Although a manufacturer can lawfully announce resale prices in advance without eliciting an "agreement," it may not secure adherence to suggested prices [*443] "by means which go beyond * * * mere declination to sell to a customer who will not observe * * * announced policy." United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29, 43, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505, 80 S. Ct. 503 (1960).

Much of the litigation in this area involves HN6[] cases in which a manufacturer terminates a distributor for possibly price-related motivations, and the distributor asserts that he was terminated as part of a price-fixing conspiracy. In such cases the distributor [13] must show (1) the existence of an agreement or conspiracy; and (2) a causal connection between the agreement and the termination. In this case BWI alleges three unlawful combinations: (1) between itself and Miller; (2) between Miller and East Side; and (3) between Miller and distributors nationwide.

A. Miller-BWI.

HN7[] An unlawful conspiracy can be established if a manufacturer coerces a distributor into a retail price schedule and the distributor acquiesces. Albrecht v. The Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145, 150 n.6, 19 L. Ed. 2d 998, 88 S. Ct. 869 (1968). In such cases, an agreement to fix prices can be inferred from the parties' behavior. However, under Monsanto Corp. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp, 465 U.S. 752, 764 n.9, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984), "more than a showing that the distributor conformed to the suggested price" is required. There must be evidence that the manufacturer sought such conformity and the distributor communicated its acquiescence. Evidence that a distributor changed its prices in response to coercion may meet this standard. See Isaksen v. Vermont Castings, Inc., 825 F.2d 1158, 1164 (7th Cir. 1987).

BWI argues that Miller coerced it into changing its prices on two [14] occasions:

(1) In September 1977 a Miller representative told BWI to set the price for domestic Lowenbrau at $ 8.56 per case so that the retail price to consumers would be $.50 per six-pack over the price of Michelob. However, BWI's normal gross profit margin of 22 percent would have required a price of $ 9.30 per case. The Miller representative told BWI that that price "would be the rape of the Miller Brewing Company" and that marketing research showed that Lowenbrau had to be sold at 50 cents per case over Michelob. Under this "coercive threat," BWI priced Lowenbrau at $ 8.75.

(2) In January-February 1978 Miller raised its prices to wholesalers, and BWI raised its prices in February. On April 20, 1978, Miller announced another price raise effective June 1. In late May, a Miller representative asked BWI when they were going to raise prices and said if they didn't raise prices soon, Miller would think they didn't need the money and raise its prices to BWI. In mid-June, East Side raised its prices, and BWI raised them shortly thereafter to a level about ten percent below East Side's. On June 28, 1978, Miller sent BWI the termination letter.

BWI does not allege any other instances in [15] which it changed its prices in response to "coercion" by Miller, and the cited examples do not raise a genuine issue of fact on the existence of a price-fixing agreement between Miller and BWI. In neither incident did BWI fully comply with Miller's price "demands," and in the second incident no specific price was even demanded. BWI cites no authority allowing implication of an "agreement" to fix prices where the ultimate price is less than demanded, and the only "coercion" in the facts alleged by BWI appears to have been an unserious remark.

Additionally, BWI's theory is contradictory in that it argues that it had an agreement with Miller on prices, but was terminated because of its refusal to fix prices. At least one court has approved summary judgment dismissing a claim based on such "mutually exclusive" theories when there was no other evidence of coercion. Filco v. Amana Refrigeration, Inc., 709 F.2d 1257, 1266 (9th Cir. 1983); compare Yentsch v. Texaco Inc., 630 F.2d 46, 54-55 (2d Cir. 1980) (strong evidence of wide-spread coercion).

B. Miller-East Side.

BWI appears to allege that East Side participated in a price-fixing conspiracy [16] [*444] with Miller by dumping bad Lowenbrau in BWI's territory to give Miller a pretext for terminating BWI. However, BWI has produced no evidence that East Side knew of Miller's alleged price-fixing plan, or that it dumped the beer in order to aid that plan. See Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 764 ("there must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that manufacturer and nonterminated distributors were acting independently"); Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988) (agreement between manufacturer and nonterminated distributor to terminate a price-cutting distributor is per se illegal only if they also agree on price).

Because BWI does not even allege that East Side and Miller agreed on a price, and East Side may have been independently trying to get rid of bad beer, summary judgment on this claim was appropriate.

C. National Conspiracy.

Finally, BWI claims that Miller was engaged in price-fixing nationwide. There is evidence that Miller conducted extensive research to determine the best market price for Lowenbrau and tried to pressure BWI to set the price accordingly. It also appears that [17] the two pricing chapters in Miller's Lowenbrau Marketing Manual no longer exist.

BWI also lists four instances of pricing pressures in addition to the two to which it acquiesced: (1) a Miller representative tried to get BWI to price Miller Lite at the same price as Schlitz Light and stated that he would deny having tried to get BWI to lower prices; (2) a representative tried to get the price of Miller Lite reduced; (3) a representative asked BWI if it was going to run a price-off promotion; and (4) a representative told BWI that it would not allow it co-op money unless BWI went along with the terms of the co-op (BWI did not go along, but received the co-op money in full).

The last two incidents do not appear coercive, but the first two tend to show that Miller pressured BWI to change its prices. This case is thus distinguishable from Monsanto and Business Electronics, in which the only evidence of price-fixing consisted of termination in response to complaints by competing dealers.

Nonetheless, HN8[] in order to establish a nationwide conspiracy to fix prices, BWI would have to show that Miller's price policy (1) was firmly enforced; (2) applied to all distributors; and (3) was [18] acquiesced in by most of them. Yentsch, 630 F.2d at 52. The evidence does not raise a genuine issue of fact on these elements. Although the existence of a price policy could be inferred from the disappearance of the price section of the manual and there is evidence that Miller attempted to influence BWI's prices, the record is devoid of evidence that Miller coerced other distributors or that they adhered to any pricing policy.

Under Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 762-63, manufacturers do have a legitimate interest in retail prices, and the existence of an agreement to fix them may not be inferred from ambiguous evidence. This case does not present sufficient evidence of coercion and acquiescence to satisfy BWI's burden of producing evidence that reasonably tends to prove the existence of a common scheme.

Because we conclude that BWI has failed to raise a genuine issue as to any of the alleged price-fixing conspiracies, we do not address whether such conspiracies would be unlawful per se under Minn. Stat. § 325.8015, which on its face applies only to agreements among competitors.

II

BWI argues that the trial court abused its discretion in taxing costs [19] against BWI. Specifically, BWI claims that almost $ 6,000 of the $ 6,300 costs awarded Miller were for depositions described as cumulative, duplicative, unnecessary and rarely cited in the trial memos.

HN9[] An award of the costs of discovery depositions is within the discretion of the trial court and will not be reversed absent a clear abuse of discretion. Striebel v. Minnesota State High School League, 321 N.W.2d 400, 403 (Minn. 1982). An award of [*445] costs for discovery depositions of the plaintiff's two chief officers falls within the discretion of the court.

DECISION

Affirmed.

End of Document

McLaughlin v. Liu

United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit

December 9, 1987, Argued and Submitted ; June 14, 1988, Filed

No. 87-5669

Reporter

849 F.2d 1205 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 7945 ; 109 Lab. Cas. (CCH) P35,077; 28 Wage & Hour Cas. (BNA) 1137

Ann McLaughlin, Secretary of Labor, U.S. Department of Labor, * Plaintiff-Appellee, v. Joe H. Liu, Individually and Doing Business as J L Fashions, Defendants-Appellants

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the Central District of California, D.C. No. CV-85-5462, James M. Ideman, District Judge, Presiding.

Core Terms

summary judgment, overtime, direct evidence, piecework, circumstantial evidence, nonmoving party, credibility, premium, sworn, material fact, implausibility, non-movant, summary judgment motion, pay period, conspiracy

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN1[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

If the factual context renders respondents' claim implausible -- if the claim is one that simply makes no economic sense -- respondents must come forward with more persuasive evidence to support their claim than would otherwise be necessary.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > General Overview

Evidence > ... > Testimony > Credibility of Witnesses > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Trials > Jury Trials > Province of Court & Jury

HN2[] Judgments, Summary Judgment

* Ann McLaughlin is substituted for her predecessor, William Brock, III, as Secretary of the Department of Labor. Fed. R. App. P. 43(c)(1).

Credibility determinations are jury functions, not those of a judge ruling on a motion for summary judgment. The evidence of the non-movant is to be believed.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > Evidentiary Considerations

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Implausible Claims

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Evidence > Admissibility > Circumstantial & Direct Evidence

HN3[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

On summary judgment in inquiry is authorized into the implausibility of inferences from circumstantial evidence, particularly in antitrust conspiracy cases, not an inquiry into the credibility of direct evidence.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Evidence > Inferences & Presumptions > Inferences

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN4[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

The plaintiff resisting a summary judgment motion must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inference of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN5[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

Courts should not permit factfinders to infer conspiracies when such inferences are implausible, because the effect of such practices is often to deter procompetitive conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

HN6[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

Lack of motive bears on the range of permissible conclusions that might be drawn from ambiguous evidence: if petitioners had no rational economic motive to conspire, and if their conduct is consistent with other, equally plausible explanations, the conduct does not give rise to an inference of conspiracy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN7[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

Plaintiffs alleging an antitrust conspiracy involving predatory pricing can only avoid summary judgment if they produce evidence tending to exclude the possibility that petitioners underpriced respondents to compete for business rather than to implement an economically senseless conspiracy.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > Evidentiary Considerations

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Discovery > Methods of Discovery > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Nonmovant Persuasion & Proof

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Materiality of Facts

HN8[] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

At the summary judgment stage of the litigation, the judge does not weigh conflicting evidence with respect to a disputed material fact. Nor does the judge make credibility determinations with respect to statements made in affidavits, answers to interrogatories, admissions, or depositions. These determinations are within the province of the factfinder at trial. Therefore, at summary judgment, the judge must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party: if direct evidence produced by the moving party conflicts with direct evidence produced by the nonmoving party, the judge must assume the truth of the evidence set forth by the nonmoving party with respect to that fact.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN9[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

Inferences from circumstantial evidence must also be drawn in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Inferences may be drawn from underlying facts that are not in dispute, such as background or contextual facts, and from underlying facts on which there is conflicting direct evidence but which the judge must assume may be resolved at trial in favor of the nonmoving party. Assuming the existence of these underlying facts, however, an inference as to another material fact may be drawn in favor of the nonmoving party only if it is rational or reasonable and otherwise permissible under the governing substantive law.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN10[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

If the nonmoving party produces direct evidence of a material fact, the court may not assess the credibility of this evidence nor weigh against it any conflicting evidence presented by the moving party. The nonmoving party's evidence must be taken as true. Inferences from the nonmoving party's specific facts as to other material facts, however, may be drawn only if they are reasonable in view of other undisputed background or contextual facts and only if such inferences are otherwise permissible under the governing substantive law. This inquiry ensures that a genuine issue of material fact exists for the factfinder to resolve at trial.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > Evidentiary Considerations

Evidence > Relevance > Preservation of Relevant Evidence > Exclusion & Preservation by Prosecutors

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN11[] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

Where there is no direct evidence of a conspiracy, the defendant may discharge its summary judgment burden by proffering a plausible and justifiable alternative interpretation of its conduct that rebuts the plaintiff's allegation of conspiracy. And again where an antitrust plaintiff's allegation of a conspiracy is based solely on indirect evidence that is capable of inferences of both lawful and unlawful behavior, the plaintiff must produce some evidence tending to exclude the possibility that the defendant acted independently.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Evidence > Types of Evidence > Circumstantial Evidence

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Materiality of Facts

HN12[] Summary Judgment, Opposing Materials

It is of course permissible on summary judgment to assess the plausibility of a legal argument, as opposed to assessing the weight or credibility of direct evidence of a material fact.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > Evidentiary Considerations

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN13[] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

The party opposing a motion for summary judgment, with evidence competent under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, is to be believed; it is for the jury at trial, not for the judge on a pretrial motion, to decide whose evidence is more credible. A judge assessing the persuasiveness of evidence presented on a motion for summary judgment may discount such evidence as unspecific or immaterial, but not as unbelievable.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > Evidentiary Considerations

Governments > Courts > Judges

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN14[] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

Since direct evidence concerning a historical fact therefore hinges on the witness' credibility and cognitive abilities, a true conflict concerning such evidence is exclusively within the province of the jury. A conflict of direct evidence concerning a material historical fact may never be settled by the judge on a motion for summary judgment. If the conflict concerns indirect evidence, the judge must make an initial determination that the inference to be drawn is a reasonable one, although it is in this area that the power of a judge under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 is most unclear.

Counsel: Edwin M. Rosenberg, Los Angeles, California, for the Defendants-Appellants.

Gerald F. Krizan, United States Department of Labor, Washington, District of Columbia, for the Plaintiff-Appellee.

Judges: James R. Browning, Chief Judge, Procter Hug, Jr. and Stephen Reinhardt, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: BROWNING

Opinion

[*1206] BROWNING, Chief Judge:

The district court granted summary judgment to the Secretary in an action for violation of the overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), 29 U.S.C. § 201 et seq., during the period from February 1, 1983 to June 28,

1985. [1] The Secretary's showing in support of the motion consisted of two items. The first was a government investigator's affidavit with accompanying photocopies of Liu's original piecework records for the biweekly pay period ending April 6, 1985. These records demonstrated that during this pay period Liu did not pay an overtime premium for overtime work; rather, each employee's total earnings were exactly equal to the value of the piecework he or she produced during all of the hours worked in [2] that period. The second item upon which the Secretary relied was Liu's response to the Secretary's Requests for Admissions, in which Liu agreed with the statement that "employees paid piecework were paid only piecework." [2]

In opposition to the motion for summary judgment, Liu relied on his sworn declaration in which he asserted that he had paid an overtime premium for piecework performed during overtime hours for all pay periods except the period ending April 6, 1985, and that during this one period he had deviated [3] from his practice of prior and subsequent pay periods on the mistaken advice of an accountant friend whom he named. Liu attached a "piecework register" purporting to show a dollar amount of piecework performed by each employee which was less than the total compensation paid to employees who had worked overtime by an amount equal to overtime premiums properly calculated. Liu asserted in his declaration that his piecework register and payroll records were accurate. He also submitted sworn answers to interrogatories stating he paid the proper overtime premium and describing the manner in which the premium was calculated -- a method the Secretary concedes was the proper one for calculating overtime for employees paid on a piecework basis. [3]

The issue is whether the evidence [4] created a conflict that could only be resolved at trial regarding the central issue of whether an overtime premium was paid during pay periods other than that ending April 6, 1985. [4]

The Secretary argues the district court was authorized to grant summary judgment [*1207] by Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986), because Liu's sworn declaration and sworn answers to interrogatories were "implausible." [5] The Secretary relies on the following language from the Matsushita opinion:

---

[1] The district court granted summary judgment against Liu on the issue of waiver of his defense under 29 U.S.C. § 260 and on the government's charge that he had violated the FLSA's record-keeping requirements. These rulings are not challenged on appeal.

[2] This statement cannot be viewed as conclusively admitting that no overtime premium was paid. It could reasonably be read as indicating that employees who were paid on a piecework basis did not also receive hourly wages. This reading is confirmed by Liu's denial of Requests Nos. 8 and 9, which asked in a more straightforward fashion whether Liu's records showing the payment of an overtime premium were false.

[3] The Secretary complains that Liu's opposition to the summary judgment motion relied upon materials in the record before the filing of that motion, rather than presenting affidavits. However, it is well-established that a party opposing summary judgment may rely on material already on file in the case. See 10A C. Wright, A. Miller & M. Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2722 at 55-56 (2nd ed. 1983).

[4] We affirm the grant of summary judgment to the extent it found Liu in violation of the FLSA overtime requirements for the April 6, 1985 pay period.

[5] The Secretary points to several circumstances casting doubt on Liu's defense. Liu destroyed the current records of employees' piecework earnings despite FLSA regulations which require preservation of such records for three years, (see 29 C.F.R. § 516.5), thereby shifting the burden of producing evidence to Liu under Anderson v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., 328 U.S. 680, 687-88, 90 L. Ed. 1515, 66 S. Ct. 1187 (1946). Liu claims to have changed his pay computation practices only during the single two-week pay period for which the Secretary had obtained original piecework records, and admitted to the violations for the single pay period only after it was revealed that the Secretary had copies of the piecework tickets and all of the piecework computations for that period. Liu claims he abandoned his long-practiced method of computing overtime for this two-week period on the casual advice of a friend, and offers no explanation for returning to it. The district court also noted that Liu's "piecework register" may not have been prepared until after the litigation had begun.

> It follows from these settled principles that HN1[] if the factual context renders respondents' claim implausible -- if the claim is one that simply makes no economic sense -- respondents must come forward with more persuasive evidence to support their claim than would otherwise be necessary.
>
> Id. at 587.

[5] In a case such as this in which the opposition to a motion for summary judgment rests upon sworn statements, the Secretary's reading of Matsushita would abrogate the long-standing rule that credibility may not be resolved by summary judgment -- a rule reiterated in Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 106 S. Ct. 2505 (1986), within ninety days after Matsushita was filed: HN2[] "Credibility determinations . . . are jury functions, not those of a judge . . . ruling on a motion for summary judgment. . . . The evidence of the non-movant is to be believed. . . ." Id. at 255.

It is clear from the Matsushita opinion that the Court was not speaking of direct evidence, but of circumstantial evidence. Matsushita HN3[] authorizes an inquiry on summary judgment into the "implausibility" of inferences from circumstantial evidence, particularly in antitrust conspiracy cases, not an inquiry into the credibility of direct evidence. [6]

[6] This case does not involve inferences from circumstantial evidence. Liu's [*1208] sworn statements that he calculated and paid overtime in accordance with the requirements of law are direct evidence of the central fact in dispute. Liu does not ask that inferences be drawn in his favor, but that his testimony be taken as true. To this he is clearly entitled under Anderson ("The evidence of the non-movant is to be believed," 477 U.S. at 255) and a host of other decisions. [7] Summary judgment cannot be justified in the face of such evidence.

Our opinions on summary judgment subsequent to Anderson and Matsushita have honored the difference between weighing direct evidence and refusing to draw unreasonable inferences from circumstantial evidence. We have upheld summary judgment on the basis of Matsushita's "implausibility" standard only where the non-movant relied on inferences from circumstantial evidence. [8] We analyzed the distinction explicitly and at some length in T. W.

---

[6] In Matsushita the Court noted the absence of direct evidence of a predatory pricing conspiracy. 475 U.S. at 583. Left only with circumstantial evidence, the Court stated that "antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case." Id. at 588. In such a case, the Court said HN4[] the plaintiff resisting a summary judgment motion "must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inference of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents." Id. The Court noted that in Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 763, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984), "we emphasized that HN5[] courts should not permit factfinders to infer conspiracies when such inferences are implausible, because the effect of such practices is often to deter procompetitive conduct." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 593. "Thus, mistaken inferences in cases such as this one are especially costly, because they chill the very conduct the antitrust laws are designed to protect." Id. at 594. The Court noted that the only "direct evidence" of a predatory pricing conspiracy on which the lower court relied was direct evidence of subsidiary combinations which at most was only circumstantial evidence of the overall predatory pricing conspiracy plaintiffs sought to prove. Id. at 595-96. The Court reviewed this circumstantial evidence and concluded it did not establish a plausible motive to engage in the alleged predatory pricing conspiracy. Id. at 596. HN6[] "Lack of motive bears on the range of permissible conclusions that might be drawn from ambiguous evidence: if petitioners had no rational economic motive to conspire, and if their conduct is consistent with other, equally plausible explanations, the conduct does not give rise to an inference of conspiracy." Id. at 596-97. The Court concluded that HN7[] plaintiffs alleging an antitrust conspiracy involving predatory pricing can only avoid summary judgment if they produce evidence "tend[ing] to exclude the possibility that petitioners underpriced respondents to compete for business rather than to implement an economically senseless conspiracy." Id. at 597-98 (citations and quotations marks omitted).

[7] See 10A Wright, Miller & Kane, supra, § 2727 at 128 n. 6 (citing cases).

Elec. Serv. v. Pacific Elec. Contractors Ass'n, 809 F.2d 626, 630-31 (9th Cir. 1987). We noted that HN8[] at the summary judgment [7] stage of the litigation,

> "the judge does not weigh conflicting evidence with respect to a disputed material fact. . . . Nor does the judge make credibility determinations with respect to statements made in affidavits, answers to interrogatories, admissions, or depositions. . . . These determinations are within the province of the factfinder at trial. Therefore, at summary judgment, the judge must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party: if direct evidence produced by the moving party conflicts with direct evidence produced by the nonmoving party, the judge must assume the truth of the evidence set forth by the nonmoving party with respect to that fact.
>
> Id. (citations omitted).

Turning to inferences from circumstantial evidence, we said:

> HN9[] Inferences must also be drawn in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. . . . Inferences may be drawn from underlying facts that are not in dispute, such as background or contextual facts . . ., and from underlying facts on which there is conflicting direct evidence but which the judge must assume may be resolved at trial in favor of the nonmoving party. Assuming the existence of these underlying facts, [8] however, an inference as to another material fact may be drawn in favor of the nonmoving party only if it is "rational" or "reasonable" [*1209] and otherwise permissible under the governing substantive law.
>
> Id. at 631 (citations omitted).
>
> We continued:
>
> HN10[] If the nonmoving party produces direct evidence of a material fact, the court may not assess the credibility of this evidence nor weigh against it any conflicting evidence presented by the moving party. The nonmoving party's evidence must be taken as true. Inferences from the nonmoving party's "specific facts" as to other material facts, however, may be drawn only if they are reasonable in view of other undisputed background or contextual facts and only if such inferences are otherwise permissible under the governing

---

[8] In California Arch. Bldg. Prod., Inc. v. Franciscan Ceramics, Inc., 818 F.2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1987), we upheld summary judgment against plaintiffs who claimed that defendant defrauded them by encouraging them to buy more goods but keeping its plans to close secret. Stressing that "there is no direct evidence -- no 'smoking gun'", we noted that "had Franciscan planned to close, it is unlikely that it would have undertaken these expensive projects. It is also unlikely that Franciscan would go to such lengths merely to encourage the dealers to buy more tile. No economic incentive to act in that manner exists. Therefore to avoid the stigma of implausibility, the evidentiary burden of the dealers is heavy." Id. at 1470.

In Richards v. Neilsen Freight Lines, 810 F.2d 898 (9th Cir. 1987), we affirmed summary judgment in reliance on Matsushita where there was no direct evidence of the antitrust conspiracy and the circumstantial evidence "was as consistent with permissible competitive behavior as with illegal conspiracy." Id. at 904. We explained that Matsushita addressed inference-drawing: "the only inferences permitted . . . are those that are reasonable given the substantive law which is the foundation for the claim or defense. . . . In the context of the case before us, the substantive law is the law of antitrust, and if the claim makes no economic sense, a speculative inference from the jury will not help it. In such an instance, the record on summary judgment must contain further persuasive evidence if it is to support the claim." Id. at 902. See also The Jeanery, Inc. v. James Jeans, Inc., 849 F.2d 1148, slip op. at 6388, 6398, 6407, 6412-13 (1988); Wilcox v. First Interstate Bank of Oregon, N.A., 815 F.2d 522, 525-28 (9th Cir. 1987)(sustaining the grant of JNOV on weak circumstantial evidence of a price fixing conspiracy).

United States v. King Features Entertainment, Inc., 843 F.2d 394, 399 (9th Cir. 1988) is not to the contrary. The sole issue in that case was whether a contract interpretation was plausible, which "is a matter of law." Id. at 398. HN12[] It is of course permissible on summary judgment to assess the plausibility of a legal argument, as opposed to assessing the weight or credibility of direct evidence of a material fact.

> substantive law. This inquiry ensures that a "genuine" issue of material fact exists for the factfinder to resolve at trial.
>
> Id. at 631-32.

We reiterated HN11[] "where there is no direct evidence of a conspiracy, the defendant may discharge its summary judgment burden by proffering a 'plausible and justifiable' alternative interpretation of its conduct that rebuts the plaintiff's allegation of conspiracy." Id. [9] at 632 (emphasis added). And again "where an antitrust plaintiff's allegation of a conspiracy is based solely on indirect evidence that is capable of inferences of both lawful and unlawful behavior, the plaintiff must produce some evidence tending to exclude the possibility that the defendant acted independently." Id. (emphasis supplied).

[10] Other circuits also have explicitly noted that Matsushita's implausibility analysis is confined to drawing inferences from circumstantial evidence. See Arnold Pontiac-GMC, Inc. v. Budd Baer, Inc., 826 F.2d 1335, 1338 (3d Cir. 1987) (reversing summary judgment and distinguishing Matsushita because "here plaintiff, unlike the plaintiffs in Matsushita, has produced direct evidence of a conspiracy"). In Leonard v. Dixie Well Serv. & Supply, Inc., 828 F.2d 291 (5th Cir. 1987), the Fifth Circuit reversed a summary judgment based upon the district court's conclusion that the movant's documentary showing on the central issue of fact was "unreasonable" in contrast to the "inaccurate and imprecise recollections" of the testimony of the non-movant and his witnesses on the same issue. Id. at 293. Noting Matsushita's doctrine that "a judge may require parties making an 'implausible' claim to 'come forward with more persuasive evidence to support their claim than would otherwise be necessary' to avoid summary judgment" (id. at 294), Judge Rubin emphasized, "The Supreme Court has not, however, approved summary judgments that rest on credibility determinations." Id. [11] He continued:

> HN13[] The party opposing a motion for summary judgment, with evidence competent under Rule 56, is to be believed; it is for the jury at trial, not for the judge on a pretrial motion, to decide whose evidence is more credible. A judge assessing the "persuasiveness" of evidence presented on a motion for summary judgment may discount such evidence as unspecific or immaterial, but not as unbelievable. Id. [9]

Because Liu's sworn statement that he paid the proper overtime premium was [12] "direct evidence of a material fact" (T. W. Electric, 809 F.2d at 631), the district court erred in granting summary judgment to the Secretary.

AFFIRMED IN PART, REVERSED IN PART and REMANDED.

End of Document

---

[9] See also Note, Summary Judgment and Circumstantial Evidence, 40 Stan L. Rev. 491, 494-95 (1988)("HN14[] Since direct evidence concerning a historical fact therefore hinges on the witness' credibility and cognitive abilities, a true conflict concerning such evidence is exclusively within the province of the jury. . . . [A] conflict of direct evidence concerning a material historical fact may never be settled by the judge on a motion for summary judgment. . . . If the conflict concerns indirect evidence, the judge must make an initial determination that the inference to be drawn is a reasonable one, although it is in this area that the power of a judge under Rule 56 is most unclear."

R.C. Bigelow, Inc. v. Unilever N.V.

United States District Court for the District of Connecticut

June 15, 1988, Decided ; June 15, 1988, Filed

Civil No. B-88-299 (JAC)

Reporter

689 F. Supp. 76 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5679 ; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,095

R.C. Bigelow, Inc. v. Unilever N.V., Thomas J. Lipton, Inc., Celestial Seasonings, Inc. and Kraft, Inc.

Core Terms

predatory, pricing, antitrust, allegations, tea, proposed acquisition, monopoly power, distributors, Deposition, herbal, genuine issue of material fact, anti trust law, defendants', injunctive, retail, summary judgment motion, no evidence, competitors, schematics, suppliers, raw

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Materiality of Facts

HN1[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Genuine Disputes

In order to grant a motion for summary judgment, the court must determine that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). A material fact is one whose resolution will affect the ultimate determination of the case. A factual dispute is genuine when the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

HN2[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

The party opposing summary judgment must provide a factual basis for its allegations and may not rely on mere speculation or conjecture as to the true nature of the facts.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN3[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

In determining whether a material issue of fact exists, the court must resolve all ambiguities and draw all inferences against the party moving for summary judgment.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Damages

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Injunctions

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN4[] Remedies, Damages

Section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 26, provides injunctive relief for private parties threatened with loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Commercial Law (UCC) > Sales (Article 2) > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN5[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Only a private plaintiff threatened with antitrust injury has standing to sue under 15 U.S.C.S. § 26. In other words, a private plaintiff must allege threatened loss or damage of the type the antitrust laws were designed to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN6[] Regulated Practices, Trade Practices & Unfair Competition

Because the antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition, not competitors, only harm stemming from a reduction in competition qualifies as injury cognizable under the antitrust laws. Activity which seeks to reduce competition is also referred to as "anticompetitive" or "predatory."

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

HN7[] Regulated Practices, Monopolies & Monopolization

It is clear that the mere possession of monopoly power does not ipso facto condemn a market participant.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

HN8[] Regulated Practices, Monopolies & Monopolization

The plaintiff must not simply be a competitor of an alleged monopolist; rather, the plaintiff must show antitrust injury.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Discrimination > General Overview

HN9[] Regulated Practices, Price Discrimination

Predatory pricing has been authoritatively defined as pricing below an appropriate measure of cost for the purpose of eliminating competitors in the short run and reducing competition in the long run. The appropriate measure of cost is prices below reasonably anticipated marginal cost.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Discrimination > General Overview

HN10[] Regulated Practices, Price Discrimination

Claims of threatened injury from predatory pricing must be evaluated with care since predatory pricing schemes are infrequently attempted and their success is inherently uncertain.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN11[] Regulated Practices, Trade Practices & Unfair Competition

Proof that an entity will commit bad acts is difficult to provide at the preliminary injunction stage. This is not to say, however, that once those bad acts occur, relief cannot be had. The antitrust laws provide treble damage recovery for competitors who successfully attack anticompetitive activities.

Counsel: Paul Windels, Jr., Anthony A. Dean, (Windels, Marx, Davies & Ives), New York, New York, Counsel for Plaintiff.

Richard Orr, (Tyler Cooper & Alcorn), New Haven, Connecticut, Counsel for Defendants Thomas J. Lipton, Inc., Celestial Seasonings, Inc. and Kraft, Inc.

Richard J. Wertheimer, (Arnold & Porter), Washington, District of Columbia, Counsel for Defendant Thomas J. Lipton, Inc.

Tefft W. Smith, (Kirkland & Ellis), Chicago, Illinois, Counsel for Defendants Celestial Seasonings, Inc. and Kraft, Inc.

Judges: [1] Jose A. Cabranes, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: CABRANES

Opinion

[*77] RULING ON MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

JOSE A. CABRANES, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

Plaintiff R.C. Bigelow, Inc. ("Bigelow"), the nation's third largest producer of herbal tea, seeks to enjoin a proposed merger of the two largest producers of herbal tea in the country. The question presented is whether Bigelow has made a sufficient showing of "antitrust injury" to establish standing under section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 26.

Bigelow brings this action for injunctive relief against Unilever N.V. ("Unilever"), Thomas J. Lipton, Inc. ("Lipton"), Celestial Seasonings, Inc. ("Celestial"), and Kraft, Inc. ("Kraft"), [1] pursuant to section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 26. Bigelow alleges that the proposed acquisition [2] by Lipton of Celestial will substantially lessen competition and create a monopoly in the national market for herbal teas, thereby [*78] threatening Bigelow with serious loss and damages. Defendants have moved for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff lacks standing to assert its claim for injunctive relief. [2]

[3] On May 31, 1988, the court entered a temporary restraining order upon the consent of defendants Lipton, Celestial and Kraft enjoining defendants from carrying out the proposed transaction until either defendants' dispositive motion is granted, or a trial on the merits now scheduled for June 20, 1988 is concluded. A hearing on the motion for summary judgment was held on June 10, 1988. At that hearing, the parties represented that, if necessary, they were ready to proceed to a trial on the merits, and that no new or additional discovery would be necessary. See Certified Official Transcript of Hearing of June 10, 1988 (filed June 13, 1988) ("Transcript") at 61-63, 67-68. Accordingly, the motion for summary judgment is ripe for decision.

I.

HN1[] In order to grant a motion for summary judgment, the court must determine that there is no "genuine issue as to any material fact" and that "the party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). A "material" fact is one whose resolution will affect the ultimate determination of the case. See Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 2510, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). A factual dispute is "genuine" when "the evidence is such that a [4] reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." Id. HN2[] The party opposing summary judgment must provide a factual basis for its allegations and may not rely on "mere speculation or conjecture as to the true nature of the facts." Knight v. United States Fire Insurance Co., 804 F.2d 9, 12 (2d Cir.

---

[1] Celestial is a subsidiary of Kraft, and Lipton is a subsidiary of Unilever. Although Unilever has neither entered an appearance in this case nor responded in any other manner, the parties are in agreement that Unilever's presence in this action is unnecessary at this stage of the proceedings. See Certified Official Transcript of Hearing of June 10, 1988 (filed June 13, 1988) ("Transcript") at 13-14.

[2] Defendant originally filed a document entitled "Defendants' Memorandum in Opposition to Plaintiff's Request for a Temporary Restraining Order." At the hearing of May 31, 1988, the defendants agreed that that memorandum was, in effect, a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, and agreed to have the court consider the documents as such. At the same time, the court and the parties agreed on a schedule for expedited discovery prior to a hearing on defendants' motion and, if necessary, a hearing on plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction. Rule 12(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that if, on a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, "matters outside the pleading are presented to and not excluded by the court, the motion shall be treated as one for summary judgment." At the hearing of June 10, 1988, the parties agreed that the court might treat the pending motion as one for summary judgment. See Transcript at 15.

1986), cert. denied, 480 U.S. 932, 107 S. Ct. 1570, 94 L. Ed. 2d 762 (1987). HN3[] In determining whether a material issue of fact exists, the court must resolve all ambiguities and draw all inferences against the moving party. See Anderson, 106 S. Ct. at 2509-11. Accordingly, the court must determine whether plaintiff has raised a genuine issue of material fact with respect to the threshold standing issue of "antitrust injury."

II.

HN4[] Section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 26, provides injunctive relief for private parties "threatened [with] loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws." In Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 107 S. Ct. 484, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1986), the Supreme Court held that HN5[] only a private plaintiff threatened with "antitrust injury" has standing to sue under section 16. In other words, "a private plaintiff must allege threatened loss or damage 'of the type the antitrust [5] laws were designed to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful.'" 107 S. Ct. at 491 (quoting Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977)). HN6[] Because the antitrust laws "were enacted for 'the protection of competition, not competitors,'" Brunswick, 429 U.S. at 488 (quoting Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962)) (emphasis in Brown), "only harm stemming from a reduction in competition qualifies as injury cognizable under the antitrust laws." Adams v. Pan American World Airways, Inc., 264 U.S. App. D.C. 174, 828 F.2d 24, 26 (D.C.Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 961, [*79] 108 S. Ct. 1225, 99 L. Ed. 2d 425 (1988). Activity which seeks to reduce competition is also referred to as "anticompetitive" or "predatory." See Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 2857, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985). In this case, therefore, the question is whether the proposed acquisition of Celestial by Lipton poses a threat of harm to Bigelow resulting from anticompetitive or predatory activity.

It is undisputed that the acquisition of Celestial by Lipton will result in Lipton's control of at least 80% of the market in herbal teas. [3] See Exhibit 9 to Affidavit of [6] Clayton A. Prugh (filed June 9, 1988) ("Prugh Affidavit"); Transcript at 20. A post-acquisition market share of 80% is more than sufficient to establish a prima facie showing of "monopoly power." See United States v. Waste Management, Inc., 743 F.2d 976, 981 (2d Cir. 1984). HN7[] It is clear, however, that "the mere possession of monopoly power does not ipso facto condemn a market participant." Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 275 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1093, 62 L. Ed. 2d 783, 100 S. Ct. 1061 (1980); see also Northeastern Telephone Co. v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 651 F.2d 76, 84-85 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 943, 71 L. Ed. 2d 654, 102 S. Ct. 1438 (1982). As the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit recently observed, "in Cargill, the [Supreme] Court required that HN8[] the plaintiff not simply be a competitor of an alleged monopolist; rather, the plaintiff must show antitrust injury." Phototron Corp. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 842 F.2d 95, 100 (5th Cir. 1988). Accordingly, the mere fact that Lipton will possess monopoly power after the proposed acquisition is not a sufficient showing that Lipton will exercise that power in a way that will cause antitrust injury to Bigelow. [7] See also 3 P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law para. 710 (Supp. 1987) ("Mere monopoly pricing is not a violation of the Sherman Act.").

It is arguable that a showing of monopoly power would be sufficient if it were also shown that Lipton was acting with predatory intent when it sought to acquire Celestial. See Aspen Skiing, 105 S. Ct. at 2857 & n.28. Bigelow contends that Lipton intends to acquire Celestial in order to secure monopoly power and thereafter drive plaintiff out of the herbal tea market. In support of this contention, Bigelow argues that Lipton has paid "a substantial premium over the realistic value of Celestial" and is prepared to pay this premium as a means to obtaining monopoly power. Memorandum of Law in Support of Plaintiff's Motion for a Preliminary Injunction (filed May 26, 1988) at 14. Bigelow has also submitted evidence showing that Lipton approached Bigelow one week after the proposed acquisition was announced expressing an interest to buy Bigelow. See Affidavit of David C. Bigelow (filed [8] May 30, 1988) ("Bigelow Affidavit") at para. 34. In plaintiff's view, this evidence demonstrates that Lipton was acting with predatory intent when it sought to acquire Celestial.

---

[3] Defendants agreed to assume for the purposes of this argument that the relevant market is "herbal tea" as opposed to "tea." See Transcript at 18.

There is nothing in the record, however, to indicate why the proposed purchase price for Celestial ought to be regarded as excessively high. More important, there is nothing in the record to suggest that Lipton was willing to pay a substantial premium in order to obtain monopoly power. To the contrary, there is evidence showing that Celestial was sold to Kraft four years earlier at a price within reasonable range of the price now being offered by Lipton. See Deposition of David W. Frost (filed June 9, 1988) at 15. Indeed, the president of plaintiff, David C. Bigelow, has testified that he would be willing to sell his own company (whose market share is less than a third of Celestial's) for a substantially greater sum than Lipton is offering to pay for Celestial. See Deposition of David C. Bigelow (filed June 10, 1988) ("Bigelow Deposition") at 253; Plaintiff's Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Defendants' Motion to Dismiss (filed June 9, 1988) ("Plaintiff's Memorandum") at 3. Mr. Bigelow also [9] observed, with reference to the [*80] high value of his own company, that "franchises [sic] are very valuable today. I don't have to tell you. Franchises like Bigelow, Lipton, and Celestial [are] strongly valuable." Id. Finally, the evidence in the record supports Lipton's position that the purchase price reflects in part Lipton's expected cost savings and efficiencies. See Exhibit 13 to Prugh Affidavit; Attachment 3 to Affidavit of Andrew M. Rosenfield (filed June 10, 1988) at Exhibit 1. Without some factual showing that Lipton's purchase price reflects a payment for monopoly power, plaintiff's allegations of predatory intent remain speculative.

Plaintiff has also submitted several of Lipton's internal memoranda for the purpose of demonstrating Lipton's intent to "eliminate competition" in the herbal tea market. See Exhibits 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24 to Prugh Affidavit. However, these memoranda indicate nothing more than general competitive intent to "play hardball" with the competition. Bigelow Deposition at 158. They do not suggest that Lipton intended to "eliminate competition" by any means other than fair competition. To the contrary, the evidence demonstrates that Lipton [10] simply intended to engage in "vigorous competition." Cargill, 107 S. Ct. at 492. Without evidence that Lipton's acquisition of Celestial is an attempt "to exclude rivals on some basis other than efficiency," Bigelow's allegations of predatory intent must fail. R. Bork, The Antitrust Paradox 138 (1978).

Although plaintiff has failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact regarding Lipton's intent in acquiring Celestial, plaintiff may nevertheless establish "antitrust injury" if it can show that there is a substantial likelihood that Lipton will engage in predatory activity after the acquisition. In this regard, Bigelow alleges several predatory practices in which Lipton is likely to engage, with resulting antitrust injury. These are: (a) predatory pricing; (b) improper control over retail store shelf space and promotional schemes; (c) improper control over distributers to retail stores; and (d) improper control over suppliers of raw herbs.

A.

HN9[] Predatory pricing has been authoritatively defined by the Supreme Court as "pricing below an appropriate measure of cost for the purpose of eliminating competitors in the short run and reducing competition in the long run." Cargill, [11] 107 S. Ct. at 493. Our Court of Appeals, in turn, has defined the appropriate measure of cost as "prices below reasonably anticipated marginal cost." Northeastern Telephone, 651 F.2d at 88. The Supreme Court has warned that "HN10[] claims of threatened injury from predatory pricing must . . . be evaluated with care," Cargill, 107 S. Ct. at 495 n.17, since predatory pricing schemes are infrequently attempted and their success is "inherently uncertain." Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 1357, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). [4]

Although plaintiff alleges that Lipton will engage in selective and temporary price reductions for at least some brands to a level below cost, [12] see Bigelow Affidavit at 22, plaintiff has nevertheless failed to submit any evidence whatsoever in support of this allegation. To the contrary, Mr. Bigelow stated in his deposition that he has "no idea what prices will do" after the proposed acquisition. Bigelow Deposition at 137. Upon being asked "what specifically, if anything, do you believe that Lipton will do in the marketplace for herb tea upon the consummation of [4] The Supreme Court has also noted that "the mechanism by which a firm engages in predatory pricing -- lowering prices -- is the same mechanism by which a firm stimulates competition; because 'cutting prices in order to increase business often is the very essence of competition . . . mistaken inferences . . . are especially costly, because they chill the very conduct the antitrust laws are designed to protect.'" Cargill, 107 S. Ct. at 495 n.17 (quoting Matsushita, 106 S. Ct. at 1360).

[the proposed acquisition]", Mr. Bigelow responded, "If I were to answer that, I mean it would just be pure speculation on my part . . . as to what I would anticipate that they would do. I have no idea how they are going to manage the two companies." Id. at 138. Plaintiff's [*81] counsel concedes that plaintiff has submitted no evidence of past instances of predatory pricing, see Transcript at 52, and there is no evidence in the record to suggest a present intent to engage in any such activity in the future. The evidence relied upon by plaintiff in this case is similar to that found insufficient by the Supreme Court in Cargill, where the Court observed that the "evidence" of predatory pricing consisted "only of four passing references . . . to the possibility [13] that [defendant's] prices might dip below cost." Cargill, 107 S. Ct. at 494. The Court found such evidence to "fall far short of establishing an allegation of injury from predatory pricing." Id. Similarly, plaintiff's unsupported and contradictory allegations of predatory pricing in this case are insufficient to establish a threat of antitrust injury. [5]

B.

In addition to predatory pricing, Bigelow argues that Lipton will induce supermarket chains to decrease [14] or eliminate the amount of shelf space and the promotional schemes allocated to Bigelow. It has submitted evidence of Lipton's prior use of "planograms," or store shelf schematics, in support of its claim that Lipton will attempt to influence improperly retail stores. See Exhibits 33, 35 to Prugh Affidavit. Bigelow contends that Lipton, because it would command a monopoly share of the herbal tea market, could effectively require retailers to adopt these self-serving schematics or planograms.

The only material which Bigelow has submitted in support of this allegation, however, is a letter from its attorney to the Federal Trade Commission which sets forth a list of retail chain stores which allegedly have adopted Lipton's tea department schematic. See Exhibit 35 to Prugh Affidavit. However, standing alone, this information, if taken as true for the purposes of this motion, fails to raise a genuine issue of material fact with respect to whether Lipton will improperly compel retail store chains to adopt its schematics. Indeed, defendants have submitted an affidavit by Zip Lemmerman, Senior Vice President, Merchandising, for Pathmark Supermarkets, in which Mr. Lemmerman states [15] that "it is Pathmark, and not Lipton or any other supplier, which decides shelf location and how much space each product will receive in the allocation." Affidavit of Zip Lemmerman, Exhibit 3 to Defendants' Memorandum in Opposition to Plaintiff's Request for a Temporary Restraining Order (filed May 31, 1988). Bigelow does not contend that planograms are per se illegal, but rather, that Lipton will employ such schematics in an illegal manner. Without some evidence of a prior history of such behavior, however, or a present intent to engage in such behavior in the future, Bigelow has failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact on this claim. [6]

C.

Plaintiff also alleges as predatory activity that Lipton will exercise improper control over distributors and suppliers. With respect to distributors, Bigelow submitted no evidence that Lipton will attempt to interfere improperly [16] with plaintiff's distributors. Indeed, Mr. Bigelow views these distributors as "loyal" to his company. Bigelow Deposition at 191. He noted that his company has "a longstanding relationship with these distributors and we are very, [*82] very strong with these people." Id. at 190. In fact, Mr. Bigelow stated that his distributors would have "no reason" at this time to anticipate reducing or eliminating their services to plaintiff. Id. at 187-88.

D.

---

[5] Even if the court were to have found that plaintiff had raised a genuine issue of material fact with respect to whether there was a substantial likelihood that Lipton would engage in predatory pricing, plaintiff has failed to submit any evidence raising a genuine issue concerning Lipton's ability to absorb the market shares of its competitors once prices have been cut, and the barriers to entry in the market when prices are subsequently raised to supracompetitive levels. These factors are also essential to a claim of predatory pricing, see Cargill, 107 S. Ct. at 494 n.15, and plaintiff's failure to raise genuine issues of material fact with respect to them would also be fatal to its claim of predatory pricing.

[6] Indeed, David C. Bigelow testified at his deposition that he does not expect Lipton to increase the amount of advertising and promotions for herbal tea previously expended by Lipton and Celestial. See Bigelow Deposition at 182. Mr. Bigelow even suggested that there might be a reduction. See id. at 247.

With respect to suppliers, plaintiff contends that the proposed acquisition poses a threat that Lipton will exercise improper control over the raw herb market. Again, however, Bigelow's allegations lack factual support in the record. No evidence in the record has been brought to the court's attention to support Bigelow's claims that it will suffer any shortage of raw materials as a result of the proposed acquisition. Although Bigelow has submitted evidence suggesting that the raw herb market suffers from "major world shortages," Exhibit 29 to Prugh Affidavit, there is no evidence suggesting that Lipton will intentionally interfere with plaintiff's supply of raw herbs during these times of shortage. Accordingly, the court finds that [17] plaintiff has failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact concerning Lipton's alleged predatory control over distributors and suppliers.

III.

As the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has observed, "Cargill has imposed significant barriers to competitor attempts to enjoin merger transactions." Phototron Corp., 842 F.2d at 102. "HN11[] Proof that an entity will commit bad acts is difficult to provide at the preliminary injunction stage. This is not to say, however, that once those bad acts occur, relief cannot be had. The antitrust laws provide treble damage recovery for competitors who successfully attack anticompetitive activities." Id. Although Bigelow asserts that at a later date it will be nearly impossible to unscramble the proverbial "scrambled eggs" of antitrust lore, see Plaintiff's Memorandum at 19, it is the case that Bigelow will nonetheless have an action for treble damages and injunctive relief for any antitrust injuries that it may suffer. [7] Having failed at this preliminary stage to raise a genuine issue of material fact with respect to whether it is threatened with antitrust injury, plaintiff's claim must fail. Accordingly, defendants' motion for summary [18] judgment must be granted.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, defendants' motion for summary judgment is granted.

It is so ordered.

Dated at New Haven, Connecticut, this 15th day [19] of June, 1988.

End of Document

---

[7] At oral argument, counsel for plaintiff contended that plaintiff would not have a remedy at law if Lipton were to engage in the alleged activity because the alleged predatory activity would be too difficult to prove. See Transcript at 55-56. If plaintiff concedes that he would not be able to prove that he had suffered antitrust injury once the alleged illegal activity occurred, then it is difficult to understand how the court could find that a substantial likelihood now exists that plaintiff will suffer antitrust injury in the future. Cf. Cargill, 107 S. Ct. at 490 (noting that "it would be anomalous . . . to read the Clayton Act to authorize a private plaintiff to secure an injunction against a threatened injury for which he would not be entitled to compensation if the injury actually occurred").

Christianson v. Colt Indus. Operating Corp.

Supreme Court of the United States

April 18, 1988, Argued ; June 17, 1988, Decided

No. 87-499

Reporter

486 U.S. 800 *; 108 S. Ct. 2166 ; 100 L. Ed. 2d 811 ; 1988 U.S. LEXIS 2733 *; 7 U.S.P.Q.2D (BNA) 1109; 56 U.S.L.W. 4625; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,081; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 3d (Callaghan) 452

CHRISTIANSON ET AL. v. COLT INDUSTRIES OPERATING CORP.

Prior History: [1] CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FEDERAL CIRCUIT.

Disposition: 822 F.2d 1544, vacated and remanded.

Core Terms

patents, patent law, district court, petitioners', patent-law, cases, court of appeals, cause of action, well-pleaded, antitrust, courts, law of the case, invalid, trade secret, monopolization, decisions, appellate jurisdiction, jurisdictional issue, federal patent law, federal law, infringement, accessories, manufacture, proprietary, adherence, customers, litigated, lawsuit, lack jurisdiction, summary judgment

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Jurisdiction Over Actions > Exclusive Jurisdiction

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > Statutory Sources

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Jurisdiction Over Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > State Court Review

Patent Law > Jurisdiction & Review > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN1[] Jurisdiction Over Actions, Exclusive Jurisdiction

28 U.S.C.S. § 1295(a)(1) grants the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit exclusive jurisdiction over an appeal from a final decision of a district court of the United States if the jurisdiction of that court was based, in whole or in part, on 28 U.S.C.S. § 1338. Section 1338(a), in turn, provides that the district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action arising under any Act of Congress relating to patents.

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Federal Questions > General Overview

Patent Law > Jurisdiction & Review > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN2[] Subject Matter Jurisdiction, Federal Questions

In order to demonstrate that a case is one "arising under" federal patent law, the plaintiff must set up some right, title or interest under the patent laws, or at least make it appear that some right or privilege will be defeated by one construction, or sustained by the opposite construction of these laws.

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Federal Questions > Substantial Questions

Constitutional Law > ... > Jurisdiction > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Federal Questions

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Jurisdiction > General Overview

Patent Law > Jurisdiction & Review > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN3[] Federal Questions, Substantial Questions

A district court's federal-question jurisdiction extends over only those cases in which a well-pleaded complaint establishes either that federal law creates the cause of action or that the plaintiff's right to relief necessarily depends on resolution of a substantial question of federal law, in that federal law is a necessary element of one of the well-pleaded claims. Linguistic consistency demands that 28 U.S.C.S. § 1338(a) jurisdiction likewise extends only to those cases in which a well-pleaded complaint establishes either that federal patent law creates the cause of action or that the plaintiff's right to relief necessarily depends on resolution of a substantial question of federal patent law, in that patent law is a necessary element of one of the well-pleaded claims.

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Jurisdiction > General Overview

Patent Law > Jurisdiction & Review > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN4[] Civil Infringement Actions, Jurisdiction

Under the well-pleaded complaint rule, as appropriately adapted to 28 U.S.C.S. § 1338(a), whether a claim "arises under" patent law must be determined from what necessarily appears in the plaintiff's statement of his own claim in the bill or declaration, unaided by anything alleged in anticipation or avoidance of defenses which it is thought the defendant may interpose.

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Jurisdiction > General Overview

Patent Law > Jurisdiction & Review > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN5[] Civil Infringement Actions, Jurisdiction

A case raising a federal patent-law defense does not, for that reason alone, "arise under" patent law, even if the defense is anticipated in the plaintiff's complaint, and even if both parties admit that the defense is the only question truly at issue in the case. Nor is it necessarily sufficient that a well-pleaded claim alleges a single theory under which resolution of a patent-law question is essential. If, on the face of a well-pleaded complaint there are reasons completely unrelated to the provisions and purposes of the patent laws why the plaintiff may or may not be entitled to the relief it seeks, then the claim does not "arise under" those laws. Thus, a claim supported by alternative theories in the complaint may not form the basis for 28 U.S.C.S. § 1338(a) jurisdiction unless patent law is essential to each of those theories.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Patent Law > ... > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Section 2 of the Sherman Act condemns every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize. 15 U.S.C.S. § 2.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN7[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN8[] Pleadings, Amendment of Pleadings

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(b).

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Preclusion of Judgments > Law of the Case

HN9[] Preclusion of Judgments, Law of the Case

The doctrine of the law of the case posits that when a court decides upon a rule of law, that decision should continue to govern the same issues in subsequent stages in the same case. This rule of practice promotes the finality and efficiency of the judicial process by protecting against the agitation of settled issues.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Clearly Erroneous Review

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Preclusion of Judgments > Law of the Case

HN10[] Standards of Review, Clearly Erroneous Review

The law-of-the-case doctrine merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to reopen what has been decided, not a limit to their power. A court has the power to revisit prior decisions of its own or of a coordinate court in any circumstance, although as a rule courts should be loathe to do so in the absence of extraordinary circumstances such as where the initial decision was clearly erroneous and would work a manifest injustice.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > Statutory Sources

Constitutional Law > The Judiciary > Jurisdiction > General Overview

Governments > Courts > Creation & Organization

HN11[] Jurisdictional Sources, Statutory Sources

Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers.

Lawyers' Edition Display

Decision

Court of Appeals for Federal Circuit held not to have jurisdiction over appeal from District Court where complaint asserted antitrust claims for which patent law theory was not necessary to success.

Summary

Three days after the leading manufacturer of the M16 rifle had voluntarily dismissed patent infringement claims which it had brought in the United States District Court for the Central District of Illinois against one of its former employees, who had started a business of selling M16 parts, the former employee brought an action in the District Court against the manufacturer, seeking (1) damages and injunctive and equitable relief for the manufacturer's violations of 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 and 2), and (2) actual and punitive damages under state law for the manufacturer's tortious interference with his business relationships. In the complaint, the former employee alleged that he had been driven out of the business of selling parts for the M16 by the manufacturer's litigation tactics and communications to others, including representations by the manufacturer to several of the former employee's current and potential customers that the former employee was misappropriating the manufacturer's trade secrets. The complaint also included allegations stating that unless the manufacturer's basic and improvement patents relating to the M16--many of which had already expired--were invalid, anyone with ordinary skill in the rifle-making art was able to use the technology of the patents upon their expiration. The manufacturer answered, interposing the defense that its conduct was justified by a need to protect its trade secrets, and asserting counterclaims which arose out of the former employee's alleged misappropriation of such trade secrets. Prior to trial, the former employee moved for summary judgment, expressly raising for the first time the contention that the manufacturer's patents relating to the M16 were invalid from their inception for failure to meet the "enablement" and "best mode" requirements of 35 USCS 112. Because of such invalidity, the former employee argued, the trade secrets which the patents should have disclosed lost any applicable state-law protections, and were invalid with respect to the former employee's claims to which such invalidity was material, including (1) his monopolization claim under 2 of the Sherman Act, based on the manufacturer's lawsuit and letters to his competitors, and (2) his "group-boycott" claim under 1 of the Sherman Act, in that virtually all his suppliers and customers had agreed with the manufacturer to stop doing business with him. The District Court granted the former employee's summary judgment motion (609 F Supp 1174), and subsequently entered an order stating that (1) nine of the manufacturer's already-expired patents relating to the M16 were invalidated from their inception, and (2) all of the manufacturer's trade secrets regarding the M16, whether connected with the patents or not, were void and unenforceable, and technical information relating to such trade secrets was to be made available to the former employee (613 F Supp 330). The manufacturer appealed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit. The former employee moved to transfer the appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, on the ground that the claims of the complaint in the action did not "arise under" a federal patent statute, and thus that the Federal Circuit did not have jurisdiction of the claim under 28 USCS 1295(a)(1), which incorporates 28 USCS 1338 by reference. In an unpublished order, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit granted the transfer motion. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, raising the issue of its jurisdiction over the appeal sua sponte, concluded that the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit had been "clearly wrong," and transferred the appeal back to the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit (798 F2d 1051). On retransfer, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit (1) adhered to its prior conclusion that it lacked jurisdiction over the appeal, and stated that the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit had exhibited a monumental misunderstanding of the patent jurisdiction granted to the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, (2) ruled that it nevertheless would address the merits of the appeal in the "interest of justice," and (3) reversed the summary judgment which the District Court had granted to the former employee (822 F2d 1544).

On certiorari, the United States Supreme Court vacated the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit and remanded with instructions to transfer the case to the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. In an opinion by Brennan, J., expressing the unanimous view of the court, it was held that (1) pursuant to the well-pleaded complaint rule, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit did not have jurisdiction over the manufacturer's appeal, since a patent law issue, while arguably necessary to at least one theory under both the former employee's monopolization and group-boycott antitrust claims, was not necessary to the overall success of either claim, in that there were reasons completely unrelated to the provisions and purposes of patent law why the former employee might or might not be entitled to the relief he sought under both claims; (2) the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit was not obliged to adopt the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit's analysis of the jurisdictional issue as the law of the case; and (3) the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, upon properly concluding that it lacked jurisdiction, should not have decided the merits anyway "in the interest of justice."

Stevens, J., joined by Blackmun, J., concurred, expressing the view that if the question whether a claim arises under the patent laws is asked at the end of a trial in order to decide whether the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has appellate jurisdiction, the answer may be different than if the question had been asked at the outset to decide whether a Federal District Court has jurisdiction to try the case.

Headnotes

APPEAL §228 > Federal Circuit jurisdiction -- claims "arising under" patent laws -- antitrust claims -- remand -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[1A][] [1A]LEdHN[1B][] [1B]LEdHN[1C][] [1C]LEdHN[1D][] [1D]LEdHN[1E][] [1E]

The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit does not have appellate jurisdiction, pursuant to its authority under 28 USCS 1295(a)(1), to review a final decision of a Federal District Court based in whole or in part on 28 USCS 1338--which provides, in 1338(a), that District Courts have original jurisdiction of civil actions "arising under" any Act of Congress relating to patents--where a patent law issue, while arguably necessary to at least one theory under (1) a monopolization claim under 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 2) and (2) a group-boycott claim under 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1), both of which were raised in District Court in the plaintiff's antitrust count, which was the only complaint count arguably involving such issues, is not necessary to the overall success of either claim; accordingly, the United States Supreme Court will (1) vacate, for lack of jurisdiction, a judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit which, while disavowing the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's appellate jurisdiction in a case retransferred to it by the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit--after the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit had found the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's initial transfer to it under 28 USCS 1631 to be "clearly wrong"--improperly proceeded to reach the merits anyway "in the interest of justice," and (2) remand the case to the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit with instructions to transfer the case to the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

COURTS §257 > federal question jurisdiction -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[2][] [2]

Under 28 USCS 1331, a Federal District Court's federal question jurisdiction extends over only those cases in which a well-pleaded complaint establishes either that the federal law creates the cause of action or that the plaintiff's right to relief necessarily depends on resolution of a substantial question of federal law, in that federal law is a necessary element of one of the well-pleaded claims.

COURTS §289 > federal question jurisdiction -- patent laws -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[3][] [3]

A Federal District Court's jurisdiction under 28 USCS 1338 extends only to those cases in which a well-pleaded complaint establishes either that the federal patent law creates the cause of action or that the plaintiff's right to relief necessarily depends on resolution of a substantial question of federal patent law, in that patent law is a necessary element of one of the well-pleaded claims.

COURTS §289 > federal question jurisdiction -- patent laws -- anticipation of defenses -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[4][] [4]

Under the well-pleaded complaint rule, as appropriately adapted to 28 USCS 1338, whether a claim "arises under" patent law must be determined from what necessarily appears in the plaintiff's statement of his own claim in the bill or declaration, unaided by anything alleged in anticipation or avoidance of defenses which it is thought the defendant may interpose; a case raising a patent law defense does not, for that reason alone, "arise under" patent law, even if the defense is anticipated in the plaintiff's complaint, and even if both parties admit that the defense is the only question truly at issue in the case.

COURTS §289 > REMOVAL OF CAUSES §67 > federal question jurisdiction -- patent laws -- omission of necessary patent claims -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[5A][] [5A]LEdHN[5B][] [5B]

Merely because a claim makes no reference to federal patent law does not necessarily mean that the claim does not "arise under" patent law within the meaning of 28 USCS 1338; just as a plaintiff may not defeat removal, for lack of general federal question jurisdiction, by omitting to plead necessary federal questions in a complaint, so a plaintiff may not defeat 1338 jurisdiction by omitting to plead necessary federal patent law questions.

COURTS §289 > federal question jurisdiction -- patent laws -- alternative theories -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[6][] [6]

It is not necessarily sufficient, for purposes of securing jurisdiction under 28 USCS 1338, that a well-pleaded claim alleges a single theory under which resolution of a patent law question is essential; if on the face of a well-pleaded complaint there are reasons completely unrelated to the provisions and purposes of the patent laws why the plaintiff may or may not be entitled to the relief it seeks, then the claim does not "arise under" those laws for purposes of 1338; thus, a claim supported by alternative theories in the complaint may not form the basis for 1338 jurisdiction unless patent law is essential to each of those theories.

COURTS §289 > federal jurisdiction -- patent laws -- monopolization claim -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[7A][] [7A]LEdHN[7B][] [7B]LEdHN[7C][] [7C]

A claim in a Federal District Court action that the leading manufacturer, seller, and marketer of M16 rifles engaged in conduct constituting monopolization against a former employee who operated a business of manufacturing and selling M16 parts, in violation of 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 2), does not "arise under" the federal patent laws within the meaning of 28 USCS 1338 where, although one theory of relief advanced by the former employee involves a patent law issue--namely, that the manufacturer made false assertions in its letters and pleadings that the former employee was violating its trade secrets, when such trade secrets were not protected under state law because the manufacturer's M16 patents were invalid under 35 USCS 112--there are other reasons completely unrelated to the provisions and purposes of federal patent law why the former employee may or may not be entitled to the relief he seeks under the monopolization claim, including the facts, as disclosed in the complaint, (1) that the manufacturer authorized the former employee's use of the trade secrets to some extent, and (2) that most of the manufacturer's alleged monopolization conduct--which included the use of inapplicable court orders, misrepresentations that such orders protected its proprietary data, and the filing of a prior lawsuit against the former employee in bad faith so as to urge current and potential customers to refrain from doing business with the former employee--could be deemed wrongful apart from the truth or falsity of the manufacturer's accusations that the former employee had infringed the manufacturer's trade secrets.

COURTS §289 > federal jurisdiction -- patent laws -- group boycott claim -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[8A][] [8A]LEdHN[8B][] [8B]

A claim in a Federal District Court action that the leading manufacturer, seller, and marketer of M16 rifles, engaged in conduct constituting a group boycott, in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1), by agreeing with virtually all suppliers and customers of a former employee who operated a business of manufacturing and selling M16 parts to refrain from transacting further business with the former employee, does not "arise under" the federal patent laws within the meaning of 28 USCS 1338 where, notwithstanding the former employee's attempt to prove the unreasonableness of the alleged agreement--under the theory that its purpose was to protect the manufacturer's trade secrets from infringement by the former employee, but that the manufacturer had no trade secrets to infringe since the patents giving rise to the proprietary information protected were invalid under 35 USCS 112--the complaint contains alternative, nonpatent theories of relief on its face, including the theory that the alleged agreement was unreasonable because the manufacturer had authorized the former employee to use the trade secrets.

COURTS §255 > federal question jurisdiction -- well-pleaded complaint -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[9][] [9]

The well-pleaded complaint rule for determining federal question jurisdiction under 28 USCS 1331 focuses on claims, and not theories of entitlement to relief.

APPEAL §228 > COURTS §255 > Federal Circuit jurisdiction -- well-pleaded complaint -- patent laws -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[10A][] [10A]LEdHN[10B][] [10B]

The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit cannot assert appellate jurisdiction over an appeal under 28 USCS 1295(a)(1), notwithstanding the well-pleaded complaint rule, based on a derivation from the congressional policy of creating a Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit with exclusive jurisdiction over certain patent cases, that Congress' goals would be better served if such jurisdiction were instead fixed by reference to the case actually litigated; since a Federal District Court's jurisdiction is determined by reference to the well-pleaded complaint, not the well-tried case, the referent for the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction under 1295(a)(1) must be the same, and the legislative history of the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit's jurisdictional provisions confirms that focus; the United States Supreme Court has no more authority to read 1295(a)(1) as granting the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit jurisdiction over an appeal where the well-pleaded complaint does not depend on patent law, than to read 28 USCS 1338 as granting a District Court jurisdiction over such a complaint.

APPEAL §228 > Federal Circuit jurisdiction -- patent laws -- implied cause of action -- consent of parties -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[11A][] [11A]LEdHN[11B][] [11B]

The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit does not have appellate jurisdiction, notwithstanding the well-pleaded complaint rule, to review a Federal District Court summary judgment on grounds that summary judgment papers gave rise to an implied cause of action under 35 USCS 112, a federal patent statute--in which case the pleadings were amended by the consent of the parties to include such cause of action under Rule 15(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure--where, although the papers focused almost entirely on patent law issues, (1) there was no evidence of any consent among the parties to litigate the new patent law claim, but rather such issues fell squarely within the purview of theories of recovery, defenses, and counterclaims that the pleadings in the case already encompassed, and (2) the District Court never intimated that the patent issues were relevant to any cause of action other than those raised expressly in the complaint.

APPEAL §228 > COURTS §632 > Federal Circuit -- determination of jurisdiction -- law of the case -- effect of transfer -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[12A][] [12A]LEdHN[12B][] [12B]

The United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit cannot assert appellate jurisdiction over an appeal from a Federal District Court judgment, notwithstanding the well-pleaded complaint rule, based on principles of the law of the case--pursuant to a determination by the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, on transfer from the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, that the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit had jurisdiction over the appeal--where (1) the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, to which the appeal had first been taken, was the first to decide the jurisdictional issue by transferring the case to the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, even though the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit did not explicate its rationale for transferring the case--which meant that the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, and not the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, had departed from the law of the case, (2) even if the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit's decision was the law of the case, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit did not exceed its power in revisiting the jurisdictional issue and concluding that the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit's decision was "clearly wrong," and (3) law of the case did not bind the United States Supreme Court in reviewing the decisions below.

APPEAL §1766 > law of the case -- coordinate courts -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[13][] [13]

Under the doctrine of the law of the case, when a court decides upon a rule of law, that decision should continue to govern the same issues in subsequent stages in the same case; such rule of practice, promoting the finality and efficiency of the judicial process by protecting against the agitation of settled issues, applies as much to the decisions of a coordinate court in the same case as to a court's own decisions, since the policies supporting the doctrine apply with even greater force to transfer decisions than to decisions of substantive law--otherwise, transferee courts that feel entirely free to revisit transfer decisions of a coordinate court could threaten to send litigants into a vicious circle of litigation.

APPEAL §1766 > law of the case -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[14][] [14]

The law of the case doctrine turns on whether a court previously decided upon a rule of law, not on whether, or how well, it explained its decision; the doctrine expresses the practice of the courts generally to refuse to reopen what has been decided, and is not a limit to their power; a court has the power to revisit prior decisions of its own or of a coordinate court in any circumstance, although as a rule courts should be loathe to do so in the absence of extraordinary circumstances, such as where the initial decision was clearly erroneous and would work a manifest injustice.

APPEAL §1766 > law of the case -- Supreme Court review -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[15][] [15]

The doctrine of the law of the case cannot bind the United States Supreme Court in reviewing decisions below, and a petition to the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari can expose the entire case to review; just as a Federal District Court's adherence to the law of the case cannot insulate an issue from appellate review, a Federal Court of Appeals' adherence to the law of the case cannot insulate an issue from the Supreme Court's review.

APPEAL §228 > Federal Circuit -- authority where jurisdiction is lacking -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[16][] [16]

Where the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has correctly concluded that it lacks jurisdiction, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has no authority to reach the merits anyway "in the interest of justice"; under 28 USCS 1631, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has authority to make a single decision upon concluding that it lacks jurisdiction--whether to dismiss the case or, "in the interest of justice," to transfer it to a Federal Court of Appeals that has jurisdiction.

COURTS §161 > statutory jurisdiction -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[17][] [17]

Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers.

APPEAL §1766 > COURTS §632 > law of the case -- transfer -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[18][] [18]

Under law of the case principles, if a transferee Federal Court of Appeals can find the transfer decision by another Court of Appeals plausible, the transferee court's jurisdictional inquiry is at an end.

Syllabus

The principal statutes involved in this case, which arises from a jurisdictional dispute between Courts of Appeals, are 28 U.S. C. § 1295(a)(1) -- granting the Federal Circuit exclusive jurisdiction over an appeal from a final decision of a federal district court "if the jurisdiction of that court was based, in whole or in part, on" 28 U.S. C. § 1338 -- and § 1338(a), which grants the district courts original jurisdiction of any civil action "arising under" any federal statute relating to patents. Respondent (Colt), which is the leading manufacturer, seller, and marketer of M16 rifles and their parts and accessories, held and developed patents relating to the rifle, and has maintained the secrecy [*2] as to specifications essential to the mass production of interchangeable M16 parts. Petitioner Christianson, a former Colt employee, established a corporation (also a petitioner), and began selling M16 parts. Colt joined petitioners with other defendants in a patent-infringement lawsuit, but ultimately voluntarily dismissed its claims against petitioners. In the meantime, Colt notified several of petitioners' current and potential customers that petitioners were illegally misappropriating Colt's trade secrets, and urged them to refrain from doing business with petitioners. Petitioners then brought this antitrust action against Colt in Federal District Court for violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The complaint alleged, inter alia, that Colt's letters, litigation tactics, and other conduct drove petitioners out of business. Petitioners later amended the complaint to assert a second cause of action under state law for tortious interference with their business relationships. Colt asserted a defense that its conduct was justified by a need to protect its trade secrets and countersued on a variety of claims arising out of petitioners' alleged misappropriation of M16 patent [*3] specifications. Petitioners filed a motion for summary judgment raising a patent-law issue -- related to the validity of Colt's patents -- to which the complaint only obliquely hinted. The District Court awarded petitioners summary judgment as to liability on both the antitrust and the tortious-interference claims. On Colt's appeal, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit held that it lacked jurisdiction and transferred the appeal to the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. The Seventh Circuit, however, raising the jurisdictional issue sua sponte, concluded that the Federal Circuit was "clearly wrong" and transferred the case back. The Federal Circuit, although concluding that the Seventh Circuit's jurisdictional decision was "clearly wrong," addressed the merits in the "interest of justice," and reversed the District Court.

Held:

1. The Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit would not have jurisdiction of the appeal of a final judgment in this case under 28 U.S. C. § 1295(a)(1), since the action is not one "arising under" the patent statutes for purposes of § 1338(a). Pp. 807-813.

(a) In order to demonstrate that a case [*4] is one "arising under" federal patent law the plaintiff must set up some right, title, or interest under the patent laws, or at least make it appear that some right or privilege will be defeated by one construction, or sustained by the opposite construction, of those laws. Section 1338(a) jurisdiction extends only to those cases in which a well-pleaded complaint establishes either that federal patent law creates the cause of action or that the plaintiff's right to relief necessarily depends on resolution of a substantial question of federal patent law, in that patent law is a necessary element of one of the well-pleaded claims. A case raising a federal patent-law defense does not, for that reason alone, "arise under" patent law, even if the defense is anticipated in the complaint, and even if both parties admit that the defense is the only question truly at issue in the case. Nor is it necessarily sufficient that a well-pleaded claim alleges a single theory under which resolution of a patent-law question is essential. If on the face of a well-pleaded complaint there are reasons completely unrelated to the provisions and purposes of the patent laws why the plaintiff may or may not [*5] be entitled to the relief it seeks, then the claim does not "arise under" those laws. Pp. 807-810.

(b) Petitioners' antitrust count can readily be understood to encompass both a monopolization claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act and a group-boycott claim under § 1. The patent-law issue, while arguably necessary to at least one theory under each claim, is not necessary to the overall success of either claim. Even assuming, without deciding, that the validity of Colt's patents is an essential element of petitioners' monopolization theory rather than merely an argument in anticipation of a defense, the well-pleaded complaint rule focuses on claims, not theories, and just because an element that is essential to a particular theory might be governed by federal patent law does not mean that the entire monopolization claim "arises under" patent law. Examination of the complaint reveals that the monopolization theory (on which petitioners ultimately prevailed in the District Court) is only one of several involved, and the only one for which the patent-law issue is even arguably essential. Since there are reasons completely unrelated to the provisions and purposes of federal patent law [*6] why petitioners may or may not be entitled to the relief sought under their monopolization claim, the claim does not "arise under" federal patent law. The same analysis obtains as to petitioners' group-boycott claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act. Pp. 810-813.

2. Nor does reference to congressional policy compel a finding of Federal Circuit jurisdiction. One of Congress' objectives in creating the Federal Circuit was to reduce the lack of uniformity and uncertainty of legal doctrine in the administration of patent law. Although arguably Congress' goals might be better served if the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction were to be fixed by reference to the case actually litigated, nevertheless, Congress determined the relevant focus when it granted Federal Circuit jurisdiction on the basis of the district courts' jurisdiction. Since the latter courts' jurisdiction is determined by reference to the well-pleaded complaint, not the well-tried case, the referent for the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction must be the same. The legislative history of the Federal Circuit's jurisdictional provisions confirms that focus. Pp. 813-814.

3. Federal Circuit jurisdiction here cannot be based on *Federal [7] Rule of Civil Procedure 15(b) by deeming the complaint amended to encompass a new and independent cause of action -- an implied cause of action under the patent laws. Even assuming that a court of appeals could furnish itself a jurisdictional basis under such theory, there is simply no evidence of any "express or implied consent" among the parties, as required by the Rule, to litigate a new patent-law claim. Although the summary judgment papers focused almost entirely on patent-law issues that petitioners deemed fundamental to the lawsuit, those issues fell squarely within the purview of the theories of recovery, defenses, and counterclaims that the pleadings already encompassed. Pp. 814-815.

4. There is no merit to the contention that the Federal Circuit was obliged to adopt the Seventh Circuit's analysis of the jurisdictional issue as the law of the case. The law-of-the-case doctrine applies as much to the decisions of a coordinate court in the same case as to a court's own decisions, and the policies supporting the doctrine apply with even greater force to transfer decisions than to decisions of substantive law. However, the Federal Circuit, in transferring the case to the [*8] Seventh Circuit, was the first to decide the jurisdictional issue. That the Federal Circuit did not explain its rationale is irrelevant. Thus, the law of the case was that the Seventh Circuit had jurisdiction, and it was the Seventh Circuit that departed from the law of the case. Moreover, the doctrine merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to reopen what has been decided, not a limit on their power. Thus, even if the Seventh Circuit's decision was law of the case, the Federal Circuit did not exceed its power in revisiting the jurisdictional issue, and once it concluded that the prior decision was "clearly wrong" it was obliged to decline jurisdiction. Most importantly, law of the case cannot bind this Court in reviewing decisions below. Pp. 815-818.

5. The Federal Circuit, after concluding that it lacked jurisdiction, erred in deciding to reach the merits anyway "in the interest of justice." Courts created by statute only have such jurisdiction as the statute confers. Upon concluding that it lacked jurisdiction, the Federal Circuit had authority, under 28 U.S. C. § 1631, to make a single decision -- whether to dismiss the case or, [*9] "in the interest of justice," to transfer it to a court of appeals that has jurisdiction. The rule that a court may not in any case, even in the interest of justice, extend its jurisdiction where none exists has always worked injustice in particular cases -- especially in the situation where, as here, the litigants are bandied back and forth between two courts, each of which insists that the other has jurisdiction. Such situations inhere in the very nature of jurisdictional lines, for few jurisdictional lines can be so finely drawn as to leave no room for disagreement on close cases. However, the courts of appeals should achieve the end of quick settlement of questions of transfer by adhering strictly to principles of law of the case. Under those principles, if the transferee court can find the transfer decision plausible, its jurisdictional inquiry is at an end. Pp. 818-819.

Counsel: Stuart R. Lefstein argued the cause for petitioners. With him on the briefs were Spiro Bereveskos and John C. McNett.

Anthony M. Radice argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief were Joseph C. Markowitz, Kim J. Landsman, and Robert L. Harmon.

Judges: BRENNAN, J., delivered the opinion for [*10] a unanimous Court. STEVENS, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which BLACKMUN, J., joined, post, p. 819.

Opinion by: BRENNAN

Opinion

[*803] [822] [2171] JUSTICE BRENNAN delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1111] LEdHN[1A][] [1A]This case requires that we decide a peculiar jurisdictional battle between the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit and the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. Each court has adamantly disavowed jurisdiction over this case. Each has transferred the case to the other. And each insists that the other's jurisdictional decision is "clearly wrong." [*804] 798 F.2d 1051, 1056-1057 (CA7 1986); 822 F.2d 1544, 1551, n. 7 (CA Fed. 1987). The parties therefore have been forced to shuttle their appeal back and forth between Chicago and the District of Columbia in search of a hospitable forum, ultimately to have the merits decided, after two years, by a Court of Appeals that still insists it lacks jurisdiction to do so.

I

Respondent Colt Industries Operating Corp. is the leading manufacturer, seller, and marketer of M16 rifles and their parts and accessories. [*11] Colt's dominant market position dates back to 1959, when it acquired a license for 16 patents to manufacture the M16's precursor. Colt continued to develop the rifle, which the United States Army adopted as its standard assault rifle, and patented additional improvements. Through various devices, Colt has also maintained a shroud of secrecy around certain specifications essential to the mass production of interchangeable M16 parts. For example, Colt's patents conceal many of the manufacturing specifications that might otherwise be revealed by its engineering drawings, and when Colt licenses others to manufacture M16 parts or hires employees with access to proprietary information, it contractually obligates them not to disclose specifications.

Petitioner Christianson is a former Colt employee who acceded to such a nondisclosure agreement. Upon leaving respondent's employ in 1975, Christianson established petitioner International Trade Services, Inc. (ITS), and began selling M16 parts to various customers domestically and abroad. Petitioners' business depended on information that Colt considers proprietary. Colt expressly waived its proprietary rights [2172] at least as to some [*12] of petitioners' [823] early transactions. The precise scope of Colt's waiver is a matter of considerable dispute. In 1983, however, Colt joined petitioners as defendants in a patent-infringement lawsuit against two companies that had arranged a sale of M16's to El Salvador. [*805] Evidence suggested that petitioners supplied the companies with certain M16 [1112] specifications, and Colt sought a court order enjoining petitioners from any further disclosures. When the District Court declined the motion, Colt voluntarily dismissed its claims against petitioners. In the meantime, Colt notified several of petitioners' current and potential customers that petitioners were illegally misappropriating Colt's trade secrets, and urged them to refrain from doing business with petitioners.

Three days after their dismissal from the lawsuit, petitioners brought this lawsuit in the District Court against Colt "pursuant to Section 4 . . . (15 U.S. C. § 15) and Section 16 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S. C. § 26) for damages, injunctive and equitable relief by reason of its violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S. C. §§ 1 [*13] & 2) . . . ." App. 7. The complaint alleged that Colt's letters, litigation tactics, and "othe[r] . . . conduct" drove petitioners out of business. In that context, petitioners included the following obscure passage:

> "18. The validity of the Colt patents had been assumed throughout the life of the Colt patents through 1980. Unless such patents were invalid through the wrongful retention of proprietary information in contravention of United States Patent Law (35 U.S. C. § 112), in 1980, when such patents expired, anyone 'who has ordinary skill in the rifle-making art' is able to use the technology of such expired patents for which Colt earlier had a monopoly position for 17 years.
>
> "19. ITS and anyone else has the right to manufacture, contract for the manufacture, supply, market and sell the M-16 and M-16 parts and accessories thereof at the present time." Id., at 9.

Petitioners later amended their complaint to assert a second cause of action under state law for tortious interference with their business relationships. Colt interposed a defense that [*806] its conduct was justified by a need to protect its trade secrets and countersued [*14] on a variety of claims arising out of petitioners' alleged misappropriation of M16 specifications.

Petitioners' motion for summary judgment raised only a patent-law issue obliquely hinted at in the above-quoted paragraphs -- that Colt's patents were invalid from their inception for failure to disclose sufficient information to "enable any person skilled in the art . . . to make and use the same" as well as a description of "the best mode contemplated by the inventor of carrying out his invention." 35 U.S. C. § 112. Since Colt benefited from the protection of the invalid patents, the argument continues, the "trade secrets" that the patents should have disclosed lost any state-law protection. Petitioners therefore argued that the District Court should hold that "Colt's trade secrets are invalid and that [their] claim of invalidity shall be taken as established with respect to all claims [824] and counterclaims to which said issue is material." App. 58.

The District Court awarded petitioners summary judgment as to liability on both the antitrust and the tortious-interference claims, essentially relying on the § 112 theory articulated above. In the process, [*15] the District Court invalidated nine of Colt's patents, declared all trade secrets relating to the M16 unenforceable, enjoined Colt from enforcing "any form of trade secret right in any technical information relating to the M16," and ordered Colt to disgorge to petitioners all such information. 613 F. Supp. 330, 332 (CD Ill. 1985).

Respondent appealed to the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which, after full briefing and argument, concluded that it lacked jurisdiction and issued an unpublished order transferring the appeal to the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. See 28 U.S. C. § 1631. The Seventh Circuit, [2173] however, raising the jurisdictional issue sua sponte, concluded that the Federal Circuit was "clearly wrong" and transferred the case back. 798 F.2d at 1056-1057, 1062. [*807] The Federal Circuit, for its part, adhered to its prior jurisdictional ruling, concluding that the Seventh Circuit exhibited "a monumental misunderstanding of the patent jurisdiction granted this court," 822 F.2d at 1547, and was "clearly wrong," id., at 1551, n. 7. Nevertheless, the [*16] Federal Circuit proceeded to address the merits in the "interest of justice," id., at 1559-1560, and reversed the District Court. We granted certiorari, 484 U.S. 985 (1987), and now vacate the judgment of the Federal Circuit.

II

LEdHN[1B][] [1B]As relevant here, 28 U.S. C. § 1295(a)(1) HN1[] grants the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit exclusive jurisdiction over "an appeal from a final decision of a district court of the United States . . . if the jurisdiction of that court was based, in whole or in part, on [28 U.S. C.] section 1338 . . . ." [1] Section 1338(a), [1113] in turn, provides in relevant part that "the district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action arising under any Act of Congress relating to patents . . . ." Thus, the jurisdictional issue before us turns on whether this is a case "arising under" a federal patent statute, for if it is then the jurisdiction of the District Court was based at least "in part" on § 1338.

[17] A

LEdHN[2][] [2] LEdHN[3][] [3]In interpreting § 1338's precursor, we held long ago that HN2[] in order to demonstrate that a case is one "arising under" federal patent law "the plaintiff must set up some right, title or interest under the patent laws, or at least make it appear that some right or privilege will be defeated by one construction, [*808] or sustained by the opposite construction of these laws." Pratt v. Paris Gas Light & Coke Co., 168 U.S. 255, 259, 42 L. Ed. 458, 18 S. Ct. 62 (1897). See [825] Henry v. A. B. Dick Co., 224 U.S. 1, 16, 56 L. Ed. 645, 32 S. Ct. 364 (1912). Our cases interpreting identical language in other jurisdictional provisions, particularly the general federal-question provision, 28 U.S. C. § 1331 ("The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States"), have quite naturally [*18] applied the same test. [2] See Gully v. First National Bank in Meridian, 299 U.S. 109, 112, 81 L. Ed. 70, 57 S. Ct. 96 (1936) (the claim alleged in the complaint "must be such that it will be supported if the Constitution or laws of the United States are given one construction or effect, and defeated if they receive another") (citations omitted). HN3[] A district court's federal-question jurisdiction, we recently explained, extends over "only those cases in which a well-pleaded complaint establishes either that federal law creates the cause of action or that the plaintiff's right to relief necessarily depends on resolution of a substantial question [2174] of federal law," Franchise Tax Board of California v. Construction Laborers Vacation Trust, 463 U.S. 1, 27-28, 77 L. Ed. 2d 420, 103 S. Ct. 2841 (1983), in that "federal law is a necessary element of one of the well-pleaded . . . claims," id., at 13. Linguistic consistency, to which we have historically adhered, demands that [*19] § 1338(a) jurisdiction likewise extend [*809] only to those cases in which a well-pleaded complaint establishes either that federal patent law creates the cause of action or that the plaintiff's right to relief necessarily depends on resolution of a substantial question of federal patent law, in that patent law is a necessary element of one of the well-pleaded claims. See 822 F.2d at 1553-1556; 798 F.2d at 1059-1061.

[20] LEdHN[4][] [4] LEdHN[5A][] [5A]The most superficial perusal of petitioners' complaint establishes, and no one disputes, that patent law did not in any sense create petitioners' antitrust or intentional-interference claims. Since no one asserts that federal jurisdiction rests on petitioners' state-law claims, the dispute centers around whether patent law "is a necessary element of one of the well-pleaded [antitrust] claims." See Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 813, 92 L. Ed. 2d 650, 106 S. Ct. 3229 (1986). Our cases, again

---

[1] Colt's appeal to the Federal Circuit actually invoked 28 U.S. C. §§ 1292(a)(1) and (c)(1), which together grant the Federal Circuit exclusive jurisdiction over appeals from interlocutory orders "granting, continuing, modifying, refusing or dissolving [an] injunctio[n]," § 1292(a)(1), "in any case over which the court would have jurisdiction over an appeal under section 1295," § 1292(c)(1).

[2] Colt correctly points out that in this case our interpretation of § 1338(a)'s "arising under" language will merely determine which of two federal appellate courts will decide the appeal, and suggests that our "arising under" jurisprudence might therefore be inapposite. Since, however, § 1338(a) delineates the jurisdiction of the federal and state courts over cases involving patent issues, the phrase (like the identical phrase in § 1331) "masks a welter of issues regarding the interrelation of federal and state authority and the proper management of the federal judicial system." See Franchise Tax Board of California v. Construction Laborers Vacation Trust, 463 U.S. 1, 8, 77 L. Ed. 2d 420, 103 S. Ct. 2841 (1983) (footnote omitted). See also Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 810, 92 L. Ed. 2d 650, 106 S. Ct. 3229 (1986) ("Determinations about federal jurisdiction require sensitive judgments about congressional intent, judicial power, and the federal system").

mostly in the § 1331 context, establish principles for both defining the "well-pleaded . . . claims" and discerning which elements are "necessary" or "essential" to them. HN4[] Under the well-pleaded complaint rule, as appropriately adapted to § 1338(a), whether a claim "arises under" patent law "'must be determined from what necessarily appears in the plaintiff's statement of his own claim in the [*21] bill or declaration, unaided by anything [826] alleged in anticipation or avoidance of defenses which it is thought the defendant may interpose.'" Franchise Tax Board, supra, at 10 (quoting Taylor v. Anderson, 234 U.S. 74, 75-76, 58 L. Ed. 1218, 34 S. Ct. 724 (1914)). See Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149, 53 L. Ed. 126, 29 S. Ct. 42 (1908). Thus, HN5[] a case raising a federal patent-law defense does not, for that reason alone, "arise under" patent law, "even if the defense is anticipated in the plaintiff's complaint, and even if both parties admit that the defense is the only question truly at issue in the case." Franchise Tax Board, supra, at 14. [3] See also Merrell Dow, supra, at 808.

[1114] [*22] [*810] LEdHN[6][] [6]Nor is it necessarily sufficient that a well-pleaded claim alleges a single theory under which resolution of a patent-law question is essential. If "on the face of a well-pleaded complaint there are . . . reasons completely unrelated to the provisions and purposes of [the patent laws] why the [plaintiff] may or may not be entitled to the relief it seeks," Franchise Tax Board, 463 U.S. at 26 (footnote omitted), then the claim does not "arise under" those laws. See id., at 26, n. 29. Thus, a claim supported by alternative theories in the complaint may not form the basis for § 1338(a) jurisdiction unless patent law is essential to each of those theories.

B

LEdHN[1C][] [1C] LEdHN[7A][] [7A] LEdHN[8A][] [8A]Framed in these terms, our resolution of the jurisdictional issue in this case is straightforward. Petitioners' antitrust count can readily be understood to encompass [*23] both a monopolization claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act and a group boycott claim under § 1. The patent-law issue, while arguably necessary to at least one [2175] theory under each claim, is not necessary to the overall success of either claim.

LEdHN[7B][] [7B]Section 2 of the Sherman Act HN6[] condemns " every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize . . . ." 15 U.S. C. § 2. The thrust of petitioners' monopolization claim is that Colt has "embarked on a course of conduct to illegally extend its monopoly position with respect to the described patents and to prevent ITS from engaging in any business with respect to parts and accessories of the M-16." App. 10. The complaint specifies several acts, most of which relate either to Colt's prosecution of the lawsuit against petitioners or to letters Colt sent to petitioners' potential and existing customers. To make out a § 2 claim, petitioners would [*811] have to present a theory under which the identified conduct amounted to a "willful [*24] acquisition or maintenance of [monopoly] power as distinguished from growth or development [827] as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-571, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966). Both the Seventh Circuit and Colt focus entirely on what they perceive to be "the only basis Christianson asserted in the complaint for the alleged antitrust violation, " 798 F.2d at 1061; see Brief for Respondent 32 -- namely, that Colt made false assertions in its letters and pleadings that petitioners were violating its trade secrets, when those trade secrets were not protected under state law because Colt's patents were invalid under § 112. Thus, Colt concludes, the validity of the patents is an essential element of petitioners' prima facie monopolization theory and the case "arises under" patent law.

LEdHN[9][] [9]We can assume without deciding that the invalidity of Colt's patents is an essential element of the foregoing monopolization theory rather than merely an argument in anticipation of a defense. [*25] But see 822 F.2d at 1547. The well-pleaded complaint rule, however, focuses on claims, not theories, see Franchise Tax Board,

---

[3] LEdHN[5B][] [5B]

On the other hand, merely because a claim makes no reference to federal patent law does not necessarily mean the claim does not "arise under" patent law. Just as "a plaintiff may not defeat removal by omitting to plead necessary federal questions in a complaint," Franchise Tax Board, supra, at 22 (citations omitted); see Federated Department Stores, Inc. v. Moitie, 452 U.S. 394, 397, n. 2, 69 L. Ed. 2d 103, 101 S. Ct. 2424 (1981); id., at 408, n. 3 (BRENNAN, J., dissenting), so a plaintiff may not defeat § 1338(a) jurisdiction by omitting to plead necessary federal patent-law questions.

supra, at 26, and n. 29; Gully, 299 U.S. at 117, and just because an element that is essential to a particular theory might be governed by federal patent law does not mean that the entire monopolization claim "arises under" patent law.

LEdHN[7C][] [7C]Examination of the complaint reveals that the monopolization theory that Colt singles out (and on which petitioners ultimately prevailed in the District Court) is only one of several, and the only one for which the patent-law issue is even arguably essential. So far as appears from the complaint, for example, petitioners might have attempted to prove that Colt's accusations of trade-secret infringement were false not because Colt had no trade secrets, but because Colt authorized petitioners to use them. App. 9-10 ("Contrary to the permission extended to ITS to sell Colt parts and accessories [*812] and in violation of the anti-trust laws . . . Colt has embarked upon a course of conduct . . [*26] . to prevent ITS from engaging in any business with respect to parts and accessories of the M-16"). In fact, most of the conduct alleged in the complaint could be deemed wrongful quite apart from the truth or falsity of Colt's accusations. According to the complaint, Colt's letters also (1) contained "copies of inapplicable court orders" and "suggest[ed] that these court orders prohibited [the recipients] from doing business with" petitioners; and (2) "falsely stat[ed] that 'Colt's right' to proprietary data had been 'consistently upheld in various courts.'" Id., at 10. Similarly, the complaint alleges that Colt's lawsuit against petitioners (1) was designed "to contravene the permission previously given"; (2) was "pursued . . . in bad faith by subjecting [petitioners] to substantial expense in extended discovery procedures"; and (3) was [1115] brought only to enable Colt "to urge customers and potential customers of [petitioners] to refrain from doing business with them." Id., at 10-11. Since there are "reasons completely unrelated to the provisions and purposes" of federal patent law why petitioners "may or may not be entitled to the [2176] relief [they] see[k]" [*27] under their monopolization claim, Franchise Tax Board, supra, at 26 [828] (footnote omitted), the claim does not "arise under" federal patent law.

LEdHN[8B][] [8B]The same analysis obtains as to petitioners' group-boycott claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act, which provides that HN7[] "every contract, combination . . ., or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce . . . is declared to be illegal," 15 U.S. C. § 1. This claim is set forth in the allegation that "virtually all suppliers of ITS and customers of ITS have agreed with Colt to refrain from supplying and purchasing M-16 parts and accessories to or from ITS, which has had the effect of requiring ITS to close its doors and no longer transact business." App. 11. As this case unfolded, petitioners attempted to prove that the alleged agreement was unreasonable because its purpose was to protect Colt's trade secrets from petitioners' infringement and, given the patents' [*813] invalidity under § 112, Colt had no trade secrets [*28] to infringe. Whether or not the patent-law issue was an "essential" element of that group-boycott theory, however, petitioners could have supported their group-boycott claim with any of several theories having nothing to do with the validity of Colt's patents. Equally prominent in the complaint, for example, is a theory that the alleged agreement was unreasonable not because Colt had no trade secrets to protect, but because Colt authorized petitioners to use them. Once again, the appearance on the complaint's face of an alternative, nonpatent theory compels the conclusion that the group-boycott claim does not "arise under" patent law.

III

LEdHN[10A][] [10A] LEdHN[11A][] [11A] LEdHN[12A][] [12A]Colt offers three arguments for finding jurisdiction in the Federal Circuit, notwithstanding the well-pleaded complaint rule. The first derives from congressional policy; the second is based on Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(b); and the third is grounded in principles of the law of the case. We [*29] find none of them persuasive.

A

LEdHN[10B][] [10B]Colt correctly observes that one of Congress' objectives in creating a Federal Circuit with exclusive jurisdiction over certain patent cases was "to reduce the widespread lack of uniformity and uncertainty of legal doctrine that exist[ed] in the administration of patent law." H. R. Rep. No. 97-312, p. 23 (1981). Colt might be correct (although not clearly so) that Congress' goals would be better served if the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction were to be fixed "by reference to the case actually litigated," rather than by an ex ante hypothetical assessment of the elements of the complaint that might have been dispositive. Brief for Respondent 31. Congress determined the relevant focus, however, when it granted jurisdiction to the Federal Circuit over "an appeal from . . . a [*814] district court . . . if the jurisdiction of that court was based . . . on section 1338." 28 U.S. C. § 1295 (a)(1) (emphasis added). Since the district court's jurisdiction is determined by reference to the well-pleaded complaint, not the well-tried case, [*30] the referent for the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction must be the same. The legislative history of the Federal Circuit's jurisdictional provisions confirms that focus. See, e. g., H. R. Rep. No. 97-312, supra, at 41 (cases fall within the Federal Circuit's patent jurisdiction "in the [829] same sense that cases are said to 'arise under' federal law for purposes of federal question jurisdiction"). In view of that clear congressional intent, we have no more authority to read § 1295(a)(1) as granting the Federal Circuit jurisdiction over an appeal where the well-pleaded complaint does not depend on patent law, than to read § 1338(a) as granting a district court jurisdiction over such a complaint. See Pratt, 168 U.S. at 259.

B

LEdHN[11B][] [11B]Colt suggests alternatively that under [2177] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(b) [4] we should deem the complaint amended to encompass a new and independent cause of action -- "an implied cause of action under section 112 of the patent laws." Brief for Respondent 28. Such a cause of action, which Colt finds in petitioners' summary judgment [*31] papers, would plainly "arise under" [1116] the patent laws, regardless of its merit. See 822 F.2d at 1566 (Nichols, J., concurring and dissenting).

We need not decide under what circumstances, if any, a court of appeals could furnish itself a jurisdictional basis unsupported by the pleadings by deeming the complaint [*815] amended in light of the parties' "express or implied consent" to litigate a claim. *Fed. Rule Civ. [32] Proc. 15(b). In this case there is simply no evidence of any consent among the parties to litigate the new patent-law claim that Colt imputes to petitioners. Colt points to nothing in petitioners' summary judgment motion expressly raising such a new cause of action, much less anything in its own motion papers suggesting consent to one. See App. 57-58. True, the summary judgment papers focused almost entirely on the patent-law issues, which petitioners deemed "basic and fundamental to the subject lawsuit." Id., at 57. But those issues fell squarely within the purview of the theories of recovery, defenses, and counterclaims that the pleadings already encompassed. Petitioners recognized as much when they moved the District Court to hold that their "claim of [patent] invalidity shall be taken as established with respect to all claims and counter-claims to which said issue is material." Id., at 58. Thus, the patent-law focus of the summary judgment papers hardly heralded the assertion of a new patent-law claim. See, e. g., Quillen v. International Playtex, Inc., 789 F.2d 1041, 1044 (CA4 1986); 6 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1493, [*33] p. 466 (1971). Moreover, the District Court never intimated that the patent issues were relevant to any cause of action other than the antitrust and intentional-interference claims raised expressly in the complaint; the court four times linked its judgment to "liability on Counts I and II," without any reference to the hypothetical Count III that Colt imputes to petitioners. 609 F. Supp. 1174, 1185 (CD Ill. 1985) See also 613 F. Supp. at 332.

[*830] C

LEdHN[13][] [13]Colt's final argument is that the Federal Circuit was obliged not to revisit the Seventh Circuit's thorough analysis of the jurisdictional issue, but merely to adopt it as the law of the case. See also 822 F.2d at 1565 (Nichols, J., concurring and dissenting). "As most commonly defined, HN9[] the doctrine [*816] [of the law of the case] posits that when a court decides upon a rule of law, that decision should continue to govern the same issues in subsequent stages in the same case." Arizona v. California, 460 U.S. 605, 618, 75 L. Ed. 2d 318, 103 S. Ct. 1382 (1983) [*34] (dictum). This rule of practice promotes the finality and efficiency of the judicial process by "protecting against the agitation of settled issues." 1B J. Moore, J. Lucas, & T. Currier, Moore's Federal Practice P0.404[1], p. 118 (1984) (hereinafter Moore's).

---

[4] HN8[] Rule 15(b) provides in relevant part:

"When issues not raised by the pleadings are tried by express or implied consent of the parties, they shall be treated in all respects as if they had been raised in the pleadings. Such amendment of the pleadings as may be necessary to cause them to conform to the evidence and to raise these issues may be made upon motion of any party at any time, even after judgment; but failure to so amend does not affect the result of the trial of these issues."

Colt is correct that the doctrine applies as much to the decisions of a coordinate court in the same case as to a court's own decisions. See, e. g., Kori Corp. v. Wilco Marsh Buggies & Draglines, Inc., 761 F.2d 649, 657 (CA Fed.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 902, 88 L. Ed. 2d 229, 106 S. Ct. 230 (1985); Perkin-Elmer Corp. v. Computervision Corp., 732 F.2d 888, 900-901 [2178] (CA Fed.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 857, 83 L. Ed. 2d 120, 105 S. Ct. 187 (1984). Federal courts routinely apply law-of-the-case principles to transfer decisions of coordinate courts. See, e. g., Hayman Cash Register Co. v. Sarokin, 669 F.2d 162, 164-170 (CA3 1982) (transfer under 28 U.S. C. § 1406 (a)); Skil Corp. v. Millers Falls Co., 541 F.2d 554, 558-559 (CA6) (alternative holding) (transfer under 28 U.S. C. § 1404 [*35] (a)), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1029, 50 L. Ed. 2d 631, 97 S. Ct. 653 (1976); 1B Moore's PP0.404[4.-5], 0.404[8]. Cf. Hoffman v. Blaski, 363 U.S. 335, 340-341, n. 9, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1254, 80 S. Ct. 1084 (1960) (res judicata principles did not limit power of Court of Appeals to reconsider transfer decision not upset by coordinate court). Indeed, the policies supporting the doctrine apply with even greater force to transfer decisions than to decisions of substantive law; transferee courts that feel entirely free to revisit transfer decisions of a coordinate court threaten to send litigants into a vicious circle of litigation. See Hayman, supra, at 169; Chicago & N. W. Transp. Co. v. United States, 574 F.2d 926, 930 (CA7 1978). Cf. Blaski, supra, at 348-349 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). [5]

[36] [*817] LEdHN[12B][] [12B] LEdHN[14][] [14] LEdHN[15][] [15]Colt's conclusion that jurisdiction therefore lay in the Federal Circuit is flawed, however, for three reasons. First, the Federal Circuit, in transferring the case to the Seventh Circuit, was the first to decide the [1117] jurisdictional issue. That the Federal Circuit did not explicate its rationale is irrelevant, for the law of the case turns on whether a court previously "decide[d] upon a rule of law" -- which the Federal Circuit necessarily did -- not on whether, or how well, it explained the decision. Thus, the law of the case was that the Seventh Circuit had jurisdiction, and it was the Seventh [831] Circuit, not the Federal Circuit, that departed from the law of the case. Second, HN10[] the law-of-the-case doctrine "merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to reopen what has been decided, not a limit to their power. [*37] " Messenger v. Anderson, 225 U.S. 436, 444, 56 L. Ed. 1152, 32 S. Ct. 739 (1912) (Holmes, J.) (citations omitted). A court has the power to revisit prior decisions of its own or of a coordinate court in any circumstance, although as a rule courts should be loathe to do so in the absence of extraordinary circumstances such as where the initial decision was "clearly erroneous and would work a manifest injustice." Arizona v. California, supra, at 618, n. 8 (citation omitted). Thus, even if the Seventh Circuit's decision was law of the case, the Federal Circuit did not exceed its power in revisiting the jurisdictional issue, and once it concluded that the prior decision was "clearly wrong" it was obliged to decline jurisdiction. Most importantly, law of the case cannot bind this Court in reviewing decisions below. A petition for writ of certiorari can expose the entire case to review. Panama R. Co. v. Napier Shipping Co., 166 U.S. 280, 283-284, 41 L. Ed. 1004, 17 S. Ct. 572 (1897). Just as a district court's adherence to law of the case cannot insulate an issue from appellate review, a court of appeals' adherence to the [*38] law of the case cannot insulate an issue from this Court's review. See *Messenger, [818] supra, at 444; Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Wolf Brothers & Co., 240 U.S. 251, 257-259, 60 L. Ed. 629, 36 S. Ct. 269 (1916).

IV

LEdHN[1D][] [1D] LEdHN[16][] [16] LEdHN[17][] [17]Our agreement with the Federal Circuit's conclusion that it lacked jurisdiction, compels us to disapprove of its decision to reach the merits anyway "in the interest of justice." 822 F.2d at 1559. HN11[] " [2179] Courts created by statute can have no jurisdiction but such as the statute confers." Sheldon v. Sill, 49 U.S. 441, 8 HOW 441, 449, 12 L. Ed. 1147 (1850). See also Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Risjord, 449 U.S. 368, 379-380, 66 L. Ed. 2d 571, 101 S. Ct. 669 (1981). The statute confers on the Federal Circuit authority to make a single [*39] decision upon concluding that it lacks jurisdiction -- whether to dismiss the case or, "in the interest of justice," to transfer it to a court of appeals that has jurisdiction. 28 U.S. C. § 1631.

---

[5] There is no reason to apply law-of-the-case principles less rigorously to transfer decisions that implicate the transferee's jurisdiction. Perpetual litigation of any issue -- jurisdictional or nonjurisdictional -- delays, and therefore threatens to deny, justice. But cf. Potomac Passengers Assn. v. Chesapeake & Ohio R. Co., 171 U.S. App. D.C. 359, 363, n. 22, 520 F.2d 91, 95, n. 22 (1975).

The age-old rule that a court may not in any case, even in the interest of justice, extend its jurisdiction where none exists has always worked injustice in particular cases. Parties often spend years litigating claims only to learn that their efforts and expense were wasted in a court that lacked jurisdiction. Even more exasperating for the litigants (and wasteful for all concerned) is a situation where, as here, the litigants are bandied back and forth helplessly between two courts, each of which insists the other has jurisdiction. Such situations inhere in the very nature of jurisdictional lines, for as our cases aptly illustrate, few jurisdictional lines can be so finely drawn as to leave no room for disagreement on close cases. See, e. g., K mart Corp. v. Cartier, Inc., 485 U.S. 176, 99 L. Ed. 2d 151, 108 S. Ct. 950 (1988); United States v. Hohri, 482 U.S. 64, 96 L. Ed. 2d 51, 107 S. Ct. 2246 (1987).

[40] LEdHN[18][] [18]That does not mean, however, [832] that every borderline case must inevitably culminate in a perpetual game of jurisdictional ping-pong until this Court intervenes to resolve the underlying jurisdictional dispute, or (more likely) until one of the parties surrenders to futility. Such a state of affairs would undermine public confidence in our judiciary, squander [*819] private and public resources, and commit far too much of this Court's calendar to the resolution of fact-specific jurisdictional disputes that lack national importance. "Surely a seemly system of judicial remedies . . . regarding controverted transfer provisions of the United States Code should encourage, not discourage, quick settlement of questions of transfer . . . ." Blaski, 363 U.S. at 349 (Frankfurter, J., dissenting). The courts of appeals should achieve this end by adhering strictly to principles of law of the case. See supra, at 816. Situations might arise, of course, in which the transferee court considers the transfer "clearly erroneous." Arizona v. California, 460 U.S. at 618, n. 8. But [*41] as "the doctrine of the law of the case is . . . a heavy deterrent to vacillation on arguable issues," 1B Moore's P0.404[1], at 124, such reversals should necessarily be exceptional; courts will rarely transfer cases over which they have clear jurisdiction, and close questions, by definition, never have clearly correct answers. Under law-of-the-case principles, if the transferee court can find the transfer decision plausible, its jurisdictional inquiry is at an end. See Fogel v. Chestnutt, 668 F.2d 100, 109 (CA2 1981) ("The law of the case will be disregarded only when the court has 'a clear conviction of error'") (citation omitted), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 828 [1118] (1982). While adherence to the law of the case will not shield an incorrect jurisdictional decision should this Court choose to grant review, see supra, at 817-818, it will obviate the necessity for us to resolve every marginal jurisdictional dispute.

LEdHN[1E][] [1E]We vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit and remand with instructions to transfer the case to the Court of Appeals for the [*42] Seventh Circuit. See 28 U.S. C. § 1631.

It is so ordered.

Concur by: STEVENS

Concur

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE BLACKMUN joins, concurring.

In a seminal case construing federal-question jurisdiction, Justice Cardozo wrote that "what is needed is something of [*820] that common-sense accommodation of judgment to kaleidoscopic situations which characterizes the law in its treatment of [2180] problems of causation . . . a selective process which picks the substantial causes out of the web and lays the other ones aside." Gully v. First National Bank in Meridian, 299 U.S. 109, 117-118, 81 L. Ed. 70, 57 S. Ct. 96 (1936). Although I agree with the Court's conclusion in this case that appellate jurisdiction is in the Seventh Circuit rather than the Federal Circuit, I write separately to emphasize that a common-sense application of Justice Cardozo's dictum requires that the answer to the question whether a claim arises under the patent laws [833] may depend on the time when the question is asked. More specifically, if the question is asked at the end of a trial in order to decide whether the Federal Circuit has appellate [*43] jurisdiction, the answer may be different than if it had been asked at the outset to decide whether a federal district court has jurisdiction to try the case.

When Congress passed the Federal Courts Improvement Act in 1982 and vested exclusive jurisdiction in the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit to resolve appeals of claims that had arisen under the patent laws in the federal district courts, it was responding to concerns about both the lack of uniformity in federal appellate construction of the patent laws and the forum-shopping that such divergent appellate views had generated. Nonetheless, its definition of the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction did not embrace all cases in which a district court had decided a patent-law question. Instead, it adopted a standard that requires the appellate court to decide whether the jurisdiction of the district court was based, in whole or in part, on a claim "arising under" the patent laws. [1]

[44] [*821] The question whether a claim arises under the patent laws is similar to the question whether a claim arises under federal law. Although there is no single, precise, all-embracing definition of either body of law, the "vast majority" of cases that come within either "grant of jurisdiction are covered by Justice Holmes' statement that a 'suit arises under the law that creates the cause of action.' Thus, the vast majority of cases brought under the general federal-question jurisdiction of the federal courts are those in which federal law creates the cause of action." Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 808, 92 L. Ed. 2d 650, 106 S. Ct. 3229 (1986) (citation omitted). In this case it is clear that the causes of action asserted by petitioners were created by the antitrust laws and not the patent laws. Congress did not create an express cause of action to enforce § 112 of the patent laws, and I find no merit in respondent's suggestion that we should recognize an implied cause of action under § 112. Accordingly, I agree with the Court's conclusion that the issue of wrongful retention of proprietary information that became the focus [*45] of this case under § 112 of the patent laws could not confer appellate jurisdiction in the Federal Circuit, because the issue [834] arose as a defense rather than as a claim. [2]

[46] [*822] [2181] [1119] To the extent that Part III-A of the Court's opinion does nothing more than abjure the notion that the Federal Circuit has jurisdiction over patent-law issues as well as claims, I am thus in complete agreement. However, in rejecting respondent's contention that "Congress' goals would be better served if the Federal Circuit's jurisdiction were to be fixed 'by reference to the case actually litigated,' rather than by an ex ante hypothetical assessment of the elements of the complaint that might have been dispositive," ante, at 813, the Court's opinion might be read as suggesting that whether patent claims are properly before the Federal Circuit on

---

[1] Title 28 U. S. C. § 1295(a)(1) grants the Federal Circuit appellate jurisdiction over final decisions of federal district courts whose jurisdiction "was based, in whole or in part, on section 1338 of this title." Title 28 U.S. C. § 1338(a), in turn, grants the federal district courts "original jurisdiction of any civil action arising under any Act of Congress relating to patents . . . ." As the Court correctly states, ante, at 807-810, § 1338 jurisdiction, like § 1331 jurisdiction, is over claims, not issues. See H. R. Rep. No. 97-312, p. 41 (1981) ("Cases will be within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit in the same sense that cases are said to 'arise under' federal law for purposes of federal question jurisdiction. Contrast, Coastal States Marketing, Inc. v. New England Petroleum Corp., 604 F.2d 179 (2d Cir., 1979) [Temporary Emergency Court of Appeals properly has jurisdiction over issues, not claims, arising under the Economic Stabilization Act]").

In this context, it is important to note that the "well-pleaded complaint" rule helps ferret out claims from issues, and says nothing about whether such separation should be made only on the basis of the original complaint.

[2] Indeed, since it seems plain that no implied cause of action exists under § 112 -- which, after all, merely describes the nature of the specifications that must be included with a patent application -- a plaintiff's attempt at gaining federal-court jurisdiction through a claim arising under § 112 would be properly rejected under the "artful pleading" doctrine. See, e. g., Skelly Oil Co. v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 339 U.S. 667, 673-674, 94 L. Ed. 1194, 70 S. Ct. 876 (1950) ("To sanction suits for declaratory relief as within the jurisdiction of the District Courts merely because, as in this case, artful pleading anticipates a defense based on federal law would contravene the whole trend of jurisdictional legislation by Congress, disregard the effective functioning of the federal judicial system and distort the limited procedural purpose of the Declaratory Judgment Act"); Federated Department Stores, Inc. v. Moitie, 452 U.S. 394, 397, n. 2, 69 L. Ed. 2d 103, 101 S. Ct. 2424 (1981) (District Court properly found that respondents "had attempted to avoid removal jurisdiction by 'artful[ly]' casting their 'essentially federal law claims' as state-law claims"); Caterpillar Inc. v. Williams, 482 U.S. 386, 397, 96 L. Ed. 2d 318, 107 S. Ct. 2425 (1987) ("artful pleading" doctrine cannot be invoked by party attempting to justify removal on the basis of facts not alleged in the complaint); 14A C. Wright, A. Miller, & E. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 3722, pp. 266-276 (1985); see also Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 92 L. Ed. 2d 650, 106 S. Ct. 3229 (1986) (incorporation of federal standard in state-law private action, when no cause of action, either express or implied, exists for violations of that federal standard, does not make the action one "arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States").

appeal should be determined by examining only the initial complaint and not by ascertaining whether a patent claim in fact was litigated in the case. Such an approach would assume that whether a case "arises under" the patent laws turns on the same considerations whether one is determining the Federal Circuit's appellate jurisdiction or a federal district court's original jurisdiction. But although *28 U.S. C. [823] § 1338(a) provides the basis for both types of jurisdictional [*47] assessment, I think it clear that Congress could not have intended precisely the same analysis in both instances. Two simple examples will illustrate the point.

If a patentee should file a two-count complaint seeking damages (1) under the antitrust laws and (2) for patent infringement, the district court's jurisdiction would unquestionably be based, at least in part, on § 1338(a). If, however, pretrial discovery convinced the plaintiff that no infringement had occurred, and Count 2 was therefore dismissed voluntarily in advance of trial, the case that would actually be litigated would certainly not arise under the patent laws for purposes of appellate jurisdiction. Even though the district court's original jurisdiction when the complaint was filed had been based, in part, on § 1338(a), the case would no longer be one arising under the patent laws for purposes of Federal [835] Circuit review when the district court's judgment was entered. Conversely, if an original complaint alleging only an antitrust violation should be amended after discovery to add a patent-law claim, and if the plaintiff should be successful in proving that its patent was valid and infringed but unsuccessful [*48] in proving any basis for recovery under the antitrust laws, the district court's judgment would sustain a claim arising under the patent laws even though the complaint initially invoking its jurisdiction had not mentioned it, and an appeal would properly lie in the Federal Circuit.

Whether the complaint is actually amended, as in the previous example, or constructively amended to conform to the proof, see Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 15(b), [3] Congress' goal of ensuring [*824] that appeals of patent-law [2182] claims go to the Federal Circuit would be thwarted by determining that court's appellate jurisdiction only through an examination of the complaint as initially filed. That approach would enable an unscrupulous plaintiff to manipulate appellate court jurisdiction by the timing of the amendments to its complaint. The Court expressly leaves open the question whether a constructive amendment could provide the foundation for Federal Circuit patent-law jurisdiction, see ante, at 814-815, [4] and says nothing on the subject whether actual amendments to the complaint can [1120] so suffice. But since respondent has asked us to rule in its favor on the ground that petitioners' complaint [*49] added a patent-law claim through constructive amendment, I think we should make it perfectly clear that even though respondent's approach to the jurisdictional question is sound, its application of that approach to this case fails because the claim that was actually litigated did not arise under the patent laws. Nevertheless, since what the Court has written is not inconsistent with this view, I join its opinion.

[50]

References

60 Am Jur 2d, Patents 1131-1133

2 Federal Procedure, L Ed, Appeal, Certiorari, and Review 3:301.5; 26 Federal Procedure, L Ed, Patents 60:1062

28 USCS 1295(a)(1), 1338(a)

---

[3] "Rule 15. Amended and Supplemental Pleadings.

"(b) Amendments to Conform to the Evidence. When issues not raised by the pleadings are tried by express or implied consent of the parties, they shall be treated in all respects as if they had been raised in the pleadings. Such amendment of the pleadings as may be necessary to cause them to conform to the evidence and to raise these issues may be made upon motion of any party at any time, even after judgment; but failure so to amend does not affect the result of the trial of these issues. . . ."

[4] "We need not decide under what circumstances, if any, a court of appeals could furnish itself a jurisdictional basis unsupported by the pleadings by deeming the complaint amended in light of the parties' 'express or implied consent' to litigate a claim. Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 15(b)."

US L Ed Digest, Appeal 228

Index to Annotations, Court of Appeals; Patents

Annotation References:

Application of doctrine of law of the case to review by one federal Court of Appeals of determination by another federal Court of Appeals. 74 ALR Fed 878.

Erroneous decision as law of the case on subsequent appellate review. 87 ALR2d 271.

Nat'l Ass'n of Pharm. Mfrs., Inc. v. Ayerst Labs.

United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit

November 30, 1987, Argued ; June 22, 1988, Decided

No. 87-7710

Reporter

850 F.2d 904 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 8710 ; 7 U.S.P.Q.2D (BNA) 1530 ; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,113; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 3d (Callaghan) 547

The National Association of Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, Inc., and Zenith Laboratories, Inc., Plaintiffs-Appellants, v. Ayerst Laboratories, Division of/and American Home Products Corporation, Pharmacists Planning Service, Inc. and Frederick S. Mayer, Defendants, Ayerst Laboratories, Division of/and American Home Products Corporation, Defendant-Appellee

Subsequent History: As Amended.

Prior History: [1] Appeal from a judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Kram, Judge, following an order entered by Buchwald, Magistrate, dismissing appellants' complaint, which charged antitrust and Lanham Act violations.

Disposition: Reversed and remanded.

Core Terms

propranolol, generic, pharmacists, post-MI, Lanham Act, dispense, monopolization, summary judgment, antitrust, motion to dismiss, indications, Sherman Act, manufacturers, monopoly, anti trust law, matter of law, advertising, lack standing, pharmaceutical, substitution, deceptive, pleadings, labeling, damages, factors, matters, patient, drugs, sales, anticompetitive conduct

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Motions for Summary Judgment > General Overview

HN1[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

To determine whether the district court properly converted a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) or Rule 12(c) motion into a motion for summary judgment, the essential inquiry is whether the appellant should reasonably have recognized the possibility that the motion might be converted into one for summary judgment or was taken by surprise and deprived of a reasonable opportunity to meet facts outside the pleadings.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN2[] Summary Judgment, Supporting Materials

Even where only the party moving to dismiss has submitted extrinsic material such as depositions or affidavits, the opposing party may be deemed to have had adequate notice that the motion to dismiss would be converted.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Damages

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > General Overview

HN3[] Remedies, Damages

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 15.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN4[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 26.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN5[] Private Actions, Standing

To recover damages under 15 U.S.C.S. § 15 or to qualify for injunctive relief under 15 U.S.C.S. § 26, a plaintiff must show more than simply an injury causally linked to an antitrust violation; instead, plaintiffs must prove antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > General Overview

Commercial Law (UCC) > Sales (Article 2) > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN6[] Private Actions, Standing

A demonstration of antitrust injury is necessary, but not always sufficient, to establish standing under 15 U.S.C.S.§§ 15, 26, because a party who has suffered or is threatened with antitrust injury may not be a proper plaintiff for other reasons. Among the "other reasons" that might limit a plaintiff's right to recover are the directness or indirectness of the asserted injury; the existence of an identifiable class of persons whose self-interest would normally motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement; the speculativeness of the alleged injury; and the difficulty of identifying damages and apportioning them among direct and indirect victims so as to avoid duplicative recoveries.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > General Overview

HN7[ ] Private Actions, Standing

An organization can claim standing on behalf of its members if it meets three conditions: (1) if its members would otherwise have standing to sue in their own right; (2) if the interests it seeks to protect are germane to the organization's purpose; and (3) if neither the claim asserted nor the relief requested requires the participation of individual members in the lawsuit.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Designation of Origin > Elements of False Designation of Origin

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > Trade Dress Protection > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Advertising > General Overview

HN8[ ] False Designation of Origin, Elements of False Designation of Origin

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 1125(a).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

HN9[ ] Consumer Protection, False Advertising

A plaintiff must allege more than "mere subjective belief" about damages; what matters is whether a commercial party has a reasonable interest to be protected against the alleged false advertising.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > Lanham Act > Standing

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Monopoly Power

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

HN10[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

Monopoly in and of itself is not unlawful. Instead, the offense of monopoly under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, consists of two elements: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power, as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

HN11[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

To prevail on an attempted monopolization claim, a plaintiff must prove three elements: (1) anticompetitive or exclusionary conduct; (2) specific intent to monopolize; and (3) a dangerous probability" that the attempt would have succeeded. Proof of the first element of an attempted monopolization claim, anticompetitive conduct, may be used to infer the second element, specific intent to monopolize; and when coupled with proof of monopoly power, evidence of anticompetitive conduct may also prove a dangerous probability of success.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Advertising that emphasizes a product's strengths and minimizes its weaknesses does not, at least unless it amounts to deception, constitute anticompetitive conduct violative of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

HN13[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A plaintiff asserting a monopolization claim based on misleading advertising must overcome a presumption that the effect on competition of such a practice was de minimis. The presumption is based on the perception that, while there is no redeeming virtue in deception, there is a social cost in litigation over it.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

HN14[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A plaintiff may overcome the de minimis presumption by cumulative proof that the representations were (1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset by rivals.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Designation of Origin > Elements of False Designation of Origin

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > Trade Dress Protection > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Unfair Competition > Federal Unfair Competition Law > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Advertising > General Overview

HN15[] False Designation of Origin, Elements of False Designation of Origin

To prevail on a misrepresentation claim under the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1125(a), a plaintiff must prove that the defendant misrepresented an inherent quality or characteristic of the defendant's product.

Counsel: Milton A. Bass, Esq., New York, New York, (I. Scott Bass, Leslie B. Levine, Bass & Ullman, New York, New York, of Counsel), for Plaintiffs-Appellants.

Mark J. Spooner, Esq., Washington, District of Columbia, (Stuart J. Land, Louis M. Bograd, Rebecca E. Swenson, Arnold & Porter, Washington, District of Columbia, John C. Fleming, Jr., Bruce J. Banks, American Home Products Corporation, New York, New York, of Counsel), for Defendant-Appellee.

Judges: Pierce, Miner, and Davis, * Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: PIERCE

Opinion

[*1531] [*906] PIERCE, Circuit Judge:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, Kram, Judge, [1532] entered pursuant [2] to an order of United States Magistrate Buchwald, dismissing appellants' complaint. The underlying dispute began in January, 1986, when appellee Ayerst Laboratories, Inc. ("Ayerst"), a division of American Home Products Corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of brand name pharmaceuticals, sent a letter (the "January 1986 Letter" or the "Letter") to pharmacists throughout the United States discussing the merits of substituting a generic drug, propranolol hydrochloride ("propranolol"), for Ayerst's brand name product, Inderal. In response, appellants Zenith Laboratories, Inc. ("Zenith"), a manufacturer of generic drug products, and the National Association of Pharmaceutical Manufacturers ("NAPM"), an organization that represents generic drug companies, commenced the present action, alleging that Ayerst's publication of the January 1986 Letter constituted an unfair trade practice in violation of § 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a) (1982). Zenith also claimed separately that publication of the Letter constituted an unlawful act of monopolization, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2 (1982). Ayerst moved to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary [3] judgment. Upon consideration thereof, Magistrate Buchwald held that appellants lacked standing to assert their claims under both federal antitrust law and the Lanham Act. In the alternative, [*907] the magistrate held that, on the basis of the undisputed facts of the case, appellants could not prevail on either claim as a matter of law. For the reasons stated below, we reverse and remand.

* Honorable Oscar H. Davis, United States Circuit Judge, United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, sitting by designation. Judge Davis participated in oral argument in this case and voted, before his death on June 19, 1988, in favor of the result reached in this opinion.

BACKGROUND

In 1967, the Food and Drug Administration ("FDA") first authorized Ayerst to market Inderal, the active ingredient of which is propranolol, for the treatment of arrythmia, a heart condition. Ayerst later obtained approval to market Inderal for the treatment of several other conditions, including hypertension and angina. In September 1983, Ayerst obtained approval to label and market Inderal for the treatment of persons who have suffered a prior heart attack; this is known as "post-myocardial infarction" or "post-MI" treatment. Until 1984, Ayerst was the only company authorized by the FDA to market propranolol for medicinal purposes.

In 1984, Congress amended the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act ("FD & C Act"), 21 U.S.C. § 355 et seq., and the federal patent laws, Title 35, U.S.C., by enacting [4] the Drug Price Competition and Patent Term Restoration Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-417, 98 Stat. 1585, also known as the Waxman-Hatch Act (the "Act"). The main purpose of the Act was to make available more low cost generic drugs by establishing a procedure for FDA approval of generic drugs. See 21 U.S.C. § 355(j) (Supp. III 1985); H.R. No. 98-857. In addition, the Act extended the effective patent term available for companies that suffer the effect of delays incurred by product testing and regulatory approvals. 35 U.S.C. § 156 (Supp. III 1985). Further, the Act provided that, if the FDA authorized any new use for an existing drug between January 1, 1982, and the date of enactment of the statute (September 24, 1984), the creator of the drug would have the exclusive right to label and market the drug for that indication until two years after the enactment date (that is, until September 24, 1986) -- regardless of whether the underlying patent otherwise would have expired, and regardless of whether generic competitors could market the drug for other uses. See 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(4)(D)(v) (Supp. III 1985). Thus, when Ayerst's patent on propranolol expired in 1984, its competitors, including [5] Zenith, began marketing generic propranolol for medicinal purposes. However, since Ayerst had obtained approval to market Inderal for a new use -- post-MI treatment -- between January 1982 and September 1984, Ayerst had the exclusive right under the Act to market its propranolol product for this use until September 1986.

According to Joseph Mahady, who served as American Home Products' Group Product Director for Inderal, Ayerst's January 1986 Letter was part of an ongoing "public debate within the pharmaceutical and medical communities regarding the merits of substitution" of generic products for brand name drugs. In October 1985, Martec Pharmaceuticals, the company for which Zenith distributes propranolol, sent a letter to California pharmacists stating that Martec/Zenith generic propranolol was "therapeutically equivalent" to Inderal, and that pharmacists could dispense Martec's propranolol "without fear." Soon afterwards, Lederle Laboratories, a division of American Cyanamid Company, sent a letter to pharmacists throughout the United States stating that "Lederle propranolol 'is considered to be therapeutically equivalent to Inderal registered.'" In response, Ayerst sent the January 1986 [6] Letter, which reads as follows:

> Dear Pharmacist:
>
> As you know, INDERAL registered is the only brand of propranolol HC1 tablets indicated to reduce mortality post-MI. Recently, [1533] questions have been raised on the significance of this exclusive claim to practicing pharmacists, particularly as it relates to potential liability resulting from substitution on INDERAL prescriptions.
>
> Some generic manufacturers may tell you that the indication for which a drug is prescribed is confidential between the physician and the patient. We feel that the pharmacist is an equal member of the health care team, a respected professional who shares in protecting the [*908] health of the patient. Therefore, a brief review of the implications of exclusive labeling is appropriate.

> The issue of possible liability associated with dispensing a generic drug for an indication not included in its labeling has not been resolved in the courts. It's not possible to determine, in advance, the outcome of a suit which may arise from such a situation. It is clear, however, that litigation is troublesome, expensive and will generate adverse publicity. Although some generic product manufacturers may be willing to indemnify for monetary [7] awards, no company could adequately compensate you for the trouble and negative publicity that may result from a court case.
> We believe that, consistent with prudent pharmacy practice, you will want to dispense INDERAL tablets, the only propranolol product with the approved indication for reduction of mortality post-MI. * If you know the patient is being treated for this condition, dispense only INDERAL. If you are considering substitution and don't know the condition being treated, take a few minutes to discuss the subject with your patient and the prescribing physician. Ayerst Laboratories considers pharmacists to be important members of the health-care profession. We support your need to be informed about critical issues regarding drug selection, and hope that we've helped to clarify the important issue of exclusive labeling.
> Sincerely,
> Marvin A. Heuer, MD
> * See enclosed for prescribing information.

In response to the January 1986 Letter, William V. Purvis, an official at the FDA's Office of Drug Standards, Division of Drug Advertising and Labeling, sent a letter (the "FDA Letter") to Ayerst in February 1986, claiming that the FDA regarded the January 1986 Letter to be [8] false and misleading, in violation of § 502(a) of the FD & C Act, 21 U.S.C. § 352(a) (1982). The FDA raised three objections to the January 1986 Letter. First, the agency charged that Ayerst's use of the word "approved" (as in "We believe . . . you will want to dispense INDERAL tablets, the only propranolol . . . with the approved indication") violated § 301 (l) of the FD & C Act, 21 U.S.C. § 331 (l) (1982), which prohibits in any advertisement relating to a drug any representation or suggestion that the drug is approved or meets the requirements of § 505 of the FD & C Act, 21 U.S.C. § 355 (1982). Second, the agency stated that it regarded the January 1986 Letter's discussion of pharmacists' liability to be "an attempt to intimidate pharmacists to always dispense Inderal." The agency also took issue with the Letter's failure to "inform[] pharmacists that many states have enacted legislation that exempt [sic] pharmacists from liability through 'good faith' practice of generic substitution." Finally, the FDA Letter disputed Ayerst's suggestion that "If you know the patient is being treated for [post-MI], dispense only INDERAL." The FDA viewed this statement "as falsely suggesting [9] that pharmacists must dispense Inderal for this condition," even though "there are no laws, that we [the FDA] are aware of, requiring the pharmacists to take such action."

In June 1986, NAPM and Zenith commenced an action for damages and injunctive relief in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, alleging, inter alia, that Ayerst's publication of the January 1986 Letter constituted an unfair trade practice, in violation of § 43 (a) of the Lanham Act, because (1) the Letter was false and misleading, and (2) Ayerst intended that the Letter would impair the sales of generic propranolol. Appellants also claimed that Ayerst violated the Lanham Act by participating in the funding of "CUREP," an organization that allegedly "falsely describ[ed] propranolol," and that Ayerst engaged in other "attempts to falsely compare Inderal and generic competitors to an extent and at such times as are not presently known to plaintiffs." In addition, Zenith separately claimed that Ayerst engaged in the foregoing acts (1) to monopolize the sale of propranolol; (2) to eliminate and suppress competition in propranolol; (3) to inhibit potential competitors from entering the [10] [*909] market for propranolol; and (4) to perpetuate unlawfully a patent monopoly, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2. [1] By stipulation [1534] of the parties, Judge Kram ordered all pretrial matters, including motions of a substantive nature, referred to Magistrate Buchwald.

In October 1986, Ayerst moved to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment on both the Lanham Act and antitrust claims. Following a pretrial conference in January 1987, Magistrate Buchwald denied Ayerst's motion for summary judgment on the Sherman Act claim, on the ground that there remained genuine issues of material fact as to the characteristics of the market in which Inderal competes. The magistrate reserved judgment on all other issues, however, and later, on April 30, 1987, issued an opinion and order granting judgment in favor of Ayerst. The magistrate held, first, that Zenith lacked standing [11] to assert its antitrust claim because it "d[id] not have a protectable [sic] interest in the sale of propranolol for post-MI indications." Second, the magistrate held that appellants lacked standing to assert their Lanham Act claim, because they lacked a "reasonable interest to be protected." In addition, the magistrate reasoned that "Ayerst's alleged conduct does not amount to anticompetitive conduct as a matter of law," and that the "allegations in plaintiffs' complaint simply do not allege a misrepresentation" sufficient for purposes of the Lanham Act claim. Judge Kram subsequently entered a judgment in favor of Ayerst pursuant to the magistrate's order. All causes of action having been dismissed herein and final judgment entered, this appeal followed.

---

[1] Ayerst initially sought injunctive relief against and damages from two other parties as well, Pharmacists Planning Service, Inc. and its president, Frederick S. Mayer. Pursuant to a stipulation among the parties, Judge Kram dismissed the action as to each without prejudice on June 23, 1987.

DISCUSSION

I. Consideration of Matters Outside the Complaint

On appeal Zenith and NAPM argue that the magistrate erred by considering certain matters outside the complaint in deciding Ayerst's motion. According to appellants, the complaint "clearly alleges that: (a) the [January 1986] Letter effectively said to pharmacists that Ayerst's product was therapeutically superior to the generic and that they should not dispense generic [12] propranolol for any indications (not just [post-]MI); and (b) the Letter was . . . false and misleading." Appellants object to the magistrate's conclusions that the January 1986 Letter (1) "fairly states that the issues discussed are open ones"; (2) was sent "in the context of an ongoing public debate"; (3) was part of Ayerst's efforts "to compete aggressively on the merits"; (4) was in response to other letters; and (5) was, as a matter of law, not deceptive. Before we can address appellants' argument, we must discuss at some length precisely what extrinsic materials the magistrate considered.

On October 29, 1986, Ayerst filed a "notice of motion and motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment." The notice of motion stated, first, that "since the Complaint fails to state a claim against defendant upon which relief can be granted, this action should be dismissed pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.'" [2] In the alternative, the notice of motion claimed that "since there are no genuine issues as to any material facts regarding this action, and since defendant is entitled to judgment on this action as a matter of law, summary judgment [13] should be granted pursuant to [*910] Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure."

Accompanying the notice of motion were two affidavits. The first affidavit (the "Mahady Affidavit"), which was signed by the aforementioned Joseph Mahady, claimed that the January 1986 Letter was merely part of an ongoing public debate relating to generic drugs. Copies of the letters sent by Martec Pharmaceuticals and Lederle Laboratories, as well as Ayerst's January 1986 Letter, were appended as exhibits to the Mahady Affidavit. [14] The second affidavit (the "Gooen Affidavit"), which was signed by Ayerst executive Steven M. Gooen, was submitted as evidence of Ayerst's lack of monopoly power. The Gooen Affidavit claimed that Inderal competed with many other drugs, including "other beta-blockers and drugs from many other therapeutic classes," and concluded that Inderal had between an 8.5% and 29.2% share of the relevant market.

In support of its motion, Ayerst filed a memorandum of law and, in accordance with [1535] Local Rule 3(g) of the Civil Rules of the Southern District of New York, a "Statement of Material Facts as to Which There is No Genuine Issue to be Tried" ("Rule 3(g) Statement"). With respect to the Lanham Act claim, Ayerst's memorandum of law argued that: (1) the injury alleged in the complaint was not legally cognizable under the Lanham Act; (2) the January 1986 Letter made no false representations; and (3) the January 1986 Letter made no representations relating to the inherent quality or characteristics of Inderal. With respect to the antitrust claim, Ayerst argued that (1)

---

[2] As Ayerst notes on appeal, technically the motion should have been styled as a Rule 12(c) motion for judgment on the pleadings, because the notice of motion was filed after Ayerst had filed its answer to the complaint. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b); Falls Riverway Realty v. Niagara Falls, 754 F.2d 49, 53 (2d Cir. 1985). Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h)(2), however, a defense of failure to state a claim may be raised in a Rule 12(c) motion for judgment on the pleadings, and when this occurs the court simply treats the motion as if it were a motion to dismiss. See, e.g., George C. Frey Ready-Mixed Concrete, Inc. v. Pine Hill Concrete Mix Corp., 554 F.2d 551, 553 & n.2 (2d Cir. 1977).

Zenith had failed to allege two of the essential elements of a monopolization claim: (a) what the relevant market was, and (b) that [15] Ayerst possessed monopoly power; and (2) in the alternative, summary judgment was appropriate because the undisputed facts demonstrated that Ayerst did not possess monopoly power. Finally, Ayerst's Rule 3(g) Statement claimed that there was no genuine issue of material fact as to Inderal's market share in the various markets in which Inderal competes. In response, appellants submitted, inter alia, a motion to compel discovery on the issue of Inderal's market share, and two memoranda of law in opposition to Ayerst's motion.

As noted above, in February, 1987, Magistrate Buchwald denied summary judgment on the antitrust claim, reasoning that, despite the allegations set forth in the Gooen Affidavit and the Rule 3(g) Statement, the determination of the relevant market in which Inderal competes raised a disputed factual issue. While Zenith claimed that the relevant market was the market for propranolol, Ayerst argued that the relevant market was the market for all "beta blockers," a class of pharmaceutical products that includes propranolol as well as certain other drugs. In denying summary judgment on this aspect of Zenith's claim, the magistrate also denied Ayerst's motion to compel [16] discovery on this issue as moot. Given that the magistrate denied Ayerst's motion for summary judgment on the market share issue, we do not understand Zenith to be arguing on appeal that the magistrate erred by considering the allegations set forth in the Gooen Affidavit.

In all other respects, however, appellants claim that "the Complaint [was] the only document that should have been examined." [3] In response, Ayerst claims that the magistrate's consideration of matters outside the pleadings in effect converted the motion to dismiss into a motion for summary judgment. Ayerst notes that, in connection with a motion to dismiss pursuant [*911] to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), or a motion for judgment on the pleadings pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(c), when "matters outside the pleadings are presented to and not excluded by the court, the motion shall be treated as one for summary judgment and disposed of as provided in Rule 56, and all parties shall be given reasonable opportunity to present all material made pertinent to such a motion by Rule 56." See, e.g., Villante v. Department of Corrections, 786 F.2d 516, 521 (2d Cir. 1986); Goldman v. Belden, 754 F.2d at 1066 (2nd Cir. 1985). HN1[] To determine whether the district court [17] properly converted a 12(b)(6) or 12(c) motion into a motion for summary judgment, "the essential inquiry is whether the appellant should reasonably have recognized the possibility that the motion might be converted into one for summary judgment or was taken by surprise and deprived of a reasonable opportunity to meet facts outside the pleadings." In re G. & A. Books, Inc., 770 F.2d 288, 295 (2d Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1015, 106 S. Ct. 1195, 89 L. Ed. 2d 310 (1986). Resolution of this issue depends largely on the facts and circumstances of each case. In re G. & A. Books, 770 F.2d at 295.

[18] Several factors suggest that appellants should have been on notice that Ayerst's motion to dismiss might be converted into a motion for summary judgment. As this court has noted previously, "even HN2[] where only the party moving to dismiss has submitted extrinsic material such as depositions or affidavits, the opposing party may be deemed to have had adequate notice that the motion to dismiss would be converted." Id. (citing Condon v. Local 2944, United Steelworkers of America, 683 F.2d 590, 593-94 (1st Cir. 1982), and Cook v. Hirschberg, 258 F.2d 56, 57-58 (2d Cir. 1958)). Among the factors suggesting that appellants were on notice are the following: (1) Ayerst styled its motion as [1536] a "motion to dismiss or, in the alternative, for summary judgment" (emphasis added); (2) the Mahady and Gooen affidavits were filed on the very same date as the notice of motion; and (3) Ayerst argued, in its memorandum of law, that as a matter of law the January 1986 Letter was not deceptive, and in so arguing Ayerst quoted extensively from the Letter itself and the other exhibits attached to the Mahady Affidavit. Additionally, we note that appellants have been represented by counsel throughout this [19] litigation and are therefore not entitled to the deference which on occasion we have extended to pro se litigants who have claimed that a summary judgment conversion caught them by surprise. See, e.g., Chandler v. Coughlin, 763 F.2d 110, 113 (2d Cir. 1985); Beacon Enters. v. Menzies, 715 F.2d 757, 767 (2d Cir. 1983).

---

[3] Technically, the January 1986 Letter, which was submitted as an exhibit to the Mahady Affidavit, was a matter outside the pleadings. If appellants had appended the Letter as an exhibit to the complaint, however, or had expressly incorporated the Letter by reference into the complaint, the pleadings would be deemed to include the Letter. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 10(c); Goldman v. Belden, 754 F.2d 1059, 1065-66 (2d Cir. 1985). Nonetheless the complaint clearly refers to the Letter, and there is no dispute as to the Letter's terms. Moreover, appellants did quote the entire text of the Letter in one of their memoranda of law in opposition to Ayerst's motion. Under these circumstances, we believe that the magistrate was authorized to treat the Letter as if it had been incorporated by reference into the complaint.

Nevertheless, despite the foregoing considerations, certain other factors lead us to conclude that appellants were not adequately notified that the magistrate would consider matters outside the pleadings. We note first that Ayerst's Rule 3(g) Statement addressed only the issue of Inderal's market share. Accordingly, appellants might reasonably have believed that Ayerst would not seek summary judgment on the other issues. Second, an affidavit Ayerst submitted on December 17, 1986, in opposition to appellants' motion to compel discovery stated that "the only facts beyond the pleadings raised by Ayerst's pending motion are certain facts identifying Ayerst's share of the market in which Inderal competes." Again, we conclude that appellants might reasonably have understood this statement to mean that Ayerst was seeking summary judgment on the market share issue only. [20] Third, we note that appellants stated in their memorandum of law in opposition to Ayerst's motion to dismiss the Lanham Act claim that they planned "to take discovery as to the impression Ayerst intended as a factor in determining whether the falsity [of the January 1986 Letter] did not relate to Inderal," but only if they survived the pending motion to dismiss. In other words, appellants made clear that they did not consider the motion then before the court to be a motion for summary judgment, except with respect to the market share issue. Accordingly, in our view conversion of the motion into a motion for summary judgment would have been inappropriate unless appellants had been timely notified that their impression was mistaken. We therefore hold that the [*912] magistrate erred by failing to notify appellants that she would be considering the contents of the Mahady Affidavit in connection with Ayerst's motion to dismiss.

II. Standing

A. Antitrust Standing

In relevant part, § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15 (1982), states that HN3[] "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court [21] of the United States . . ., and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained. . . ." Likewise, § 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 26 (1982), states that HN4[] "any person . . . shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief . . . against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws. . . ." Although a literal reading of these sections would provide a remedy to "any person" injured by an antitrust violation, courts have limited the scope of these provisions to particular classes of plaintiffs and for the redress of particular forms of injury. Thus, HN5[] to recover damages under § 4 or to qualify for injunctive relief under § 16, a plaintiff "must show more than simply an 'injury causally linked' to" an antitrust violation; "instead, 'plaintiffs must prove antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 107 S. Ct. 484, 489, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1986) (quoting Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-0-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977) (emphasis in original)). Moreover, HN6[] a demonstration of antitrust injury is necessary, [22] but not always sufficient, to establish standing under § 4 or § 16, because a party who has suffered or is threatened with antitrust injury may not be a proper plaintiff for other reasons. Cargill, 107 S. Ct. at 489 nn. 5-6. Among the "other reasons" that might limit a plaintiff's right to recover are the directness or indirectness of the asserted injury; the existence of an identifiable class of persons whose self-interest would normally motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement; the speculativeness of the alleged injury; and the difficulty of identifying damages and apportioning them among direct and indirect victims so as to avoid duplicative recoveries. See Associated General Contractors v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 540-45, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983).

In the present case, Zenith claims that "Ayerst intended by the [January 1986 Letter] to cause pharmacists to refrain from dispensing generic propranolol, to the benefit of sales of Inderal." Thus, according to the magistrate, the complaint states that the January 1986 Letter caused Zenith financial injury in two ways: first, by discouraging pharmacists from dispensing Zenith's generic [1537] [23] propranolol for post-MI treatment; and second, by discouraging pharmacists from dispensing the drug for indications other than post-MI treatment. The magistrate reasoned, however, that Zenith lacked standing to assert a claim based on Ayerst's alleged disparagement of the use of propranolol for post-MI treatment, because the Waxman-Hatch Act specifically prohibited Zenith from labeling or advertising its generic propranolol for post-MI indications until September, 1986. Thus, "even assuming arguendo a physician's right to dispense generic propranolol for post-MI patients and a pharmacists's right to substitute generic propranolol," the magistrate stated that Zenith would be "merely the incidental beneficiary of the acts of those third parties" with no legal right to recover for lost sales under § 4. In addition, the magistrate held that Zenith lacked standing to assert a claim based on the effect of the January 1986 Letter on the sale of propranolol for indications other than post-MI treatment, because "the causal connection between the Ayerst letter which states only dispense Inderal for post-MI patients, and Zenith's sales of generic propranolol for other purposes is too slender [24] as a matter of law to allow plaintiffs [sic] standing (emphasis in original)."

[*913] We disagree with the magistrate's conclusion that Zenith lacks standing to assert its antitrust claim. With respect to Zenith's claim that the Letter discouraged pharmacists from dispensing generic propranolol for post-MI treatment, we note that the magistrate was correct in stating that federal law prohibited Zenith from promoting or labeling its generic propranolol for post-MI indications. Nevertheless, nothing in the Waxman-Hatch Act prohibited Zenith from benefiting from the decisions of pharmacists to prescribe the generic drug for post-MI use. Indeed, Zenith's complaint states that, under the laws of all fifty states and the District of Columbia, "a pharmacist may or must dispense a generic substitute for a prescription drug unless the physician indicates that substitution is prohibited." If this allegation is true, then in our view Zenith's loss of revenue from sales of propranolol for post-MI indications constitutes an injury "of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent." In other words, so long as neither federal nor state law prohibited the substitution of generic propranolol for post-MI [25] indications, we believe that Zenith had a protectible interest in deriving revenue from the sale of propanolol for this use.

The cases cited by the magistrate and by Ayerst in support of the opposite view are distinguishable because, in each case, the alleged antitrust violations would have prevented the plaintiffs from receiving income to which they had no legal right. For example, in Cottonwood Mall Shopping Center, Inc. v. Utah Power & Light Co., 440 F.2d 36, 38 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 857, 30 L. Ed. 2d 99, 92 S. Ct. 107 (1971), the court held that the operator of a shopping center could not assert an antitrust claim that an electrical utility had attempted to monopolize the market for electrical power at the center and had interfered with the operator's contracts to furnish electrical power on its own to mall tenants, but only because the operator itself had no right to provide electrical service until it had received permission from the state public service commission. Likewise, in Heath v. Aspen Skiing Corp., 325 F. Supp. 223, 232-33 (D. Colo. 1971), the court held that a skiing instructor lacked antitrust standing to assert a right to conduct an independent ski school on lands to which [26] the defendant corporations held Forest Service permits, but only because the instructor himself had no right to use the lands until he had obtained his own Forest Service permit. By contrast, in the present case, Zenith has alleged that it had a legal right to derive income from the sale of generic propranolol for post-MI treatment during the relevant time period, even though it had no right to market its product for this use. Under these unusual circumstances, we believe that Cottonwood Mall and Heath are inapposite.

In addition, we believe that Zenith's claim relating to sales of propranolol for post-MI treatment satisfies the second prong of the antitrust standing requirement under the "additional factors" set forth in Associated General Contractors. Given the allegation that the January 1986 Letter discouraged the use of propranolol for post-MI treatment, we think the resulting injury to generic manufacturers would be "direct," rather than speculative; we perceive no identifiable class of persons, apart from generic manufacturers, whose self-interest would motivate them to file suit against Ayerst; and we perceive no insurmountable problem in apportioning damages, in the event [27] that Zenith were to prevail, so as to avoid duplicative recoveries.

Finally, we conclude that the magistrate erred by concluding that Zenith lacked standing to assert its claim that Ayerst violated the Sherman Act by discouraging pharmacists from dispensing generic propranolol for indications other than post-MI treatment. According to Magistrate Buchwald, the factors enunciated in Associated General Contractors weighed against Zenith because: (1) the causal connection between the alleged violation and the resulting injury was [1538] too remote, given that the Letter only directed pharmacists to avoid substitution for post-MI treatment; (2) the alleged injury was "indirect" and speculative; and (3) permitting the claim to [*914] go forward would risk duplicative recovery or complex damages apportionment. We disagree. Zenith claims that the Letter discouraged pharmacists from dispensing the generic drug altogether because, in many instances, pharmacists are not aware of the condition for which a physician has prescribed a given drug. Assuming, arguendo, that publication of the Letter violated the antitrust laws, we believe that Zenith has standing to assert that the Letter injured it in the manner [28] alleged. We do not find Zenith's alleged loss of sales for conditions other than post-MI treatment so inherently "remote," "speculative, " "indirect" or duplicative as to justify a finding that Zenith lacks antitrust standing to challenge the Letter.

B. Lanham Act Standing

1. Organizational Standing

As the magistrate noted, NAPM is a trade association for the generic pharmaceutical industry, and HN7[] can therefore claim standing on behalf of its members if it meets three conditions: (1) if its members would otherwise have standing to sue in their own right; (2) if the interests it seeks to protect are germane to the organization's purpose; and (3) if neither the claim asserted nor the relief requested requires the participation of individual members in the lawsuit. See International Union, United Automobile Workers v. Brock, 477 U.S. 274, 282, 91 L. Ed. 2d 228, 106 S. Ct. 2523 (1986) (citing Hunt v. Washington State Apple Advertising Comm'n, 432 U.S. 333, 343, 53 L. Ed. 2d 383, 97 S. Ct. 2434 (1977)). We agree with the magistrate's conclusion that NAPM meets the second prong of this test, because "any violation of law which infringed on the use of generic drugs would certainly harm the membership of NAPM and damage the interests germane to [29] its purpose." We also agree that NAPM satisfies the third condition stated above, because "the plaintiffs have requested injunctive relief [and] there is no requirement of participation by individual members of NAPM in this lawsuit." NAPM's standing to litigate its claim therefore hinges on the first condition noted above, whether the members of NAPM have standing to sue in their own right. Consequently, since Zenith is a member of NAPM, NAPM has standing to the same extent that Zenith does. We turn now to consider whether Zenith, and concomitantly NAPM, has standing to assert the Lanham Act claim.

2. Zenith's Lanham Act Standing

Under § 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a) (1982), HN8[] "any person who shall . . . use in connection with any goods or services . . . any false description . . . and shall cause such goods or services to enter into commerce, . . . shall be liable to a civil action by any person . . . who believes that he is or is likely to be damaged by the use of any such false description or representation." Although the statute is intended to be broadly construed, see, e.g., PPX Enters. v. Audiofidelity, Inc., 746 F.2d 120, 124 (2d Cir. 1984), HN9[] a plaintiff must [30] allege more than "mere subjective belief" about damages; "what matters is whether a commercial party has a 'reasonable interest to be protected' against the alleged false advertising." Id. at 125.

For essentially the same reasons that lead us to disagree with the magistrate's decision that Zenith lacked antitrust standing, we disagree with her ruling that appellants lack standing to assert their Lanham Act claim. The magistrate concluded that her "discussion of standing under the anti-trust laws [was] equally applicable" to the issue of Lanham Act standing, because appellants had no "reasonable interest to be protected" under either the Clayton or Lanham Acts. For the reasons stated above, however, we conclude that appellants' alleged interest in benefiting from sales of generic propranolol is a legally protectible interest, even though appellants had no legal right to market their product for post-MI treatment. We therefore hold that appellants have standing under the Lanham Act, and we turn now to consider whether appellants have alleged sufficient facts in support of their claims.

III. Zenith's Monopolization Claim

Although Magistrate Buchwald ruled that the complaint should [31] be dismissed for lack of antitrust and Lanham [*915] Act standing, she considered in the alternative the merits of appellants' claims. Turning first to the Sherman Act claim, the magistrate correctly noted that HN10[] monopoly in and of itself is not unlawful. Instead, the offense of monopoly under § 2 of the Sherman Act consists of two elements: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power, as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident. Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 596 n.19, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467, 105 S. Ct. 2847 (1985) (citing United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966)). Alternatively, HN11[] to prevail on an attempted monopolization claim, a plaintiff must prove three elements: (1) anticompetitive [1539] or exclusionary conduct; (2) specific intent to monopolize; and (3) a "dangerous probability" that the attempt would have succeeded. International Distrib. Centers v. Walsh Trucking Co., 812 F.2d 786, 790 (2d Cir. 1987). Proof of the first element of an attempted monopolization claim, anticompetitive conduct, may be used to infer [32] the second element, specific intent to monopolize; and when coupled with proof of monopoly power, evidence of anticompetitive conduct may also prove a dangerous probability of success. Northeastern Tel. Co. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 651 F.2d 76, 85 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 943, 71 L. Ed. 2d 654, 102 S. Ct. 1438 (1982).

Applying the foregoing standards to the present case, the magistrate held that Zenith's § 2 claim was deficient in two respects. First, the magistrate stated "that Ayerst's alleged conduct does not amount to anticompetitive conduct," or the willful maintenance of a monopoly, because the January 26 Letter was not deceptive "as a matter of law." Second, she concluded that Zenith had failed to allege that Ayerst possessed monopoly power, as is required to state a claim for monopolization, or that Ayerst posed a dangerous probability of successfully implementing a monopoly, as is required to state a claim for attempted monopolization. For purposes of our analysis, we address these conclusions in reverse order.

Considering first the issue of monopoly power, we note that the magistrate made the following observations:

> While plaintiffs [sic] allege that the intent of Ayerst's conduct [33] was to obtain or maintain a monopoly in the manufacture and sale of propranolol, plaintiffs do not allege its success. Absent this allegation, we can only proceed on an attempted monopolization theory. However, to prevail on that theory, plaintiffs must demonstrate "that the defendant has a dangerous probability of monopolizing the market." . . . Plaintiffs have failed to make this necessary allegation of Ayerst's probable success in monopolizing the propranolol market.

We disagree. Paragraph 61(d) of the complaint clearly alleges that Ayerst engaged in certain anticompetitive acts to "unlawfully perpetuate a patent monopoly in the sale of propranolol." (Emphasis added.) Ayerst could not "perpetuate" a monopoly unless the monopoly already was in existence. See Webster's Third New Int'l Dictionary 1685 (1981) (defining "perpetuate" as "to . . . preserve from extinction [or] cause to last indefinitely").

Turning next to the element of anticompetitive conduct, we note that the magistrate concluded, after considering several factors, that Ayerst had not willfully maintained a monopoly. First, she noted that "Ayerst was the recipient of exclusivity protection afforded by the Government and [34] designed to encourage its research efforts" during the period at issue. She observed that, until September 1986, Inderal was "admittedly the only propranolol which [was] indicated for the treatment of post-MI patients." From these facts the magistrate concluded that Ayerst's efforts to distinguish itself on this basis were merely competition on the merits. Second, in response to appellants' contention that the January 1986 Letter was false and misleading, and thus could not be characterized as competition on the merits, Magistrate Buchwald [*916] noted that only deceptive advertising can constitute anticompetitive conduct. According to the magistrate, however, the January 1986 Letter was not deceptive as a matter of law, and therefore Ayerst's decision to send the Letter was not anticompetitive. Finally, the magistrate concluded that "one letter sent in the context of an ongoing debate between the generic pharmaceutical manufacturers and brand name manufacturers . . . is insufficient to violate the antitrust laws."

In response to the foregoing conclusions Zenith argues, first, that the magistrate erred to the extent she considered matters outside the pleadings. For the reasons stated in Section [35] I of this opinion, we agree. In our view, Magistrate Buchwald should not have relied, as she did, on the Mahady Affidavit to conclude that the January 1986 Letter was "sent in the context of an ongoing debate" and therefore was insufficient to constitute a violation of the antitrust laws.

Zenith's claim that the magistrate erred in holding that the January 1986 Letter was not deceptive is somewhat more difficult to assess. As Zenith notes, the complaint alleges that the January 1986 Letter was false and misleading because it effectively told pharmacists that Inderal was therapeutically superior to generic propranolol, and that generic propranolol should not be dispensed for any indications. As noted above, however, we deem the January 1986 Letter to be part of the pleadings. We therefore cannot fault the magistrate for considering whether the Letter was false and misleading in the manner alleged in the complaint; the question before us is whether the magistrate was correct in concluding, as a matter of law, that publication of the Letter did not violate the Sherman Act.

As this court has recognized, HN12[] "Advertising that emphasizes a product's strengths and minimizes its weaknesses does [36] not, at least unless it amounts to deception, constitute [1540] anticompetitive conduct violative of § 2 [of the Sherman Act]." Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 287-88 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1093, 62 L. Ed. 2d 783, 100 S. Ct. 1061 (1980). Accordingly, HN13[] a plaintiff asserting a monopolization claim based on misleading advertising must "overcome a presumption that the effect on competition of such a practice was de minimis." Id. at 288 n.41 (citing 3 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law para. 738a, at 278-79 (1978) ("Areeda & Turner")). The presumption is based on the perception that, while "there is no redeeming virtue in deception, . . . there is a social cost in litigation over it." Areeda & Turner para. 738a, at 278. Thus, "because the likelihood of a significant impact upon the opportunities of rivals is so small in most observed instances -- and because the prevalence of arguably improper utterance is so great -- the courts would be wise to regard misrepresentations as presumptively de minimis for § 2 purposes." Id. at 279. Professors Areeda and Turner suggest that HN14[] a plaintiff may overcome the de minimis presumption "by cumulative proof that the representations [37] were [1] clearly false, [2] clearly material, [3] clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, [4] made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, [5] continued for prolonged periods, and [6] not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset by rivals." Id.; see also International Travel Arrangers, Inc. v. Western Airlines, 623 F.2d 1255, 1262-64, 1268 (8th Cir. 1980) (publication of advertisement that was directed at general public and that was materially false and misleading, and that was part of a campaign against travel agents organizing charter flights, held to violate the Sherman Act).

Taking the above factors into consideration, we believe that the magistrate should not have dismissed Zenith's claim that publication of the Letter violated § 2. As noted, the FDA found the Letter to be false and misleading in certain respects; and, in our view, Zenith should be allowed to go forward with the discovery process to substantiate its claim that the Letter was clearly false, clearly material, and clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance. Moreover, Zenith might yet be able to be prove that the Letter was not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset. [38] On the [*917] other hand, we are inclined to agree with Ayerst that pharmacists are likely to have some knowledge of the subject matter discussed in the Letter, and that the representations set forth in the Letter were made, and could only have been made, for the short period of time during which Ayerst retained an exclusivity right under the Waxman-Hatch Act. Nevertheless, we believe that in the present case the several factors we have noted above cannot be adequately evaluated until the discovery process has moved forward to a greater extent than it has thus far. We therefore reverse the dismissal of Zenith's claim that publication of the January 1986 Letter violated the Sherman Act, though without prejudice to the filing of a motion for summary judgment at some future stage of the litigation. [4]

[39] IV. The Lanham Act Claim

As appellants note, § 43(a) of the Lanham Act encompasses more than than literal falsehoods. "The truth or falsity of the advertisement usually should be tested by the reactions of the public." American Home Prods. v. Johnson & Johnson, 577 F.2d 160, 165 (2d Cir. 1978). Nevertheless, HN15[] to prevail on a misrepresentation claim under § 43(a) of the Lanham Act, a plaintiff must prove that the defendant misrepresented an "inherent quality or characteristic" of the defendant's product. See, e.g., Vidal Sassoon, Inc. v. Bristol-Myers Co., 661 F.2d 272, 278 (2d Cir. 1981).

[4] The magistrate also held that Zenith's antitrust claim relating to Ayerst's funding of CUREP "falls woefully short of the use of 'third-party advertising,' which, in this context, by itself would not 'constitute a violation of the Sherman Act.' Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 141, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961)." In our view, this finding was inappropriate on a motion to dismiss. Summary judgment may be appropriate, however, if discovery indicates that this "advertising" does not overcome the de minimis presumption.

In our view, appellants should be given the opportunity to develop their evidence that the January 1986 Letter misrepresented the inherent quality or characteristics of Inderal. Appellants claim that the Letter conveyed the false impression that Inderal is therapeutically superior to generic propranolol; whether or not pharmacists construed the Letter in this manner cannot be determined on consideration of a motion to dismiss. We therefore reverse the judgment in favor of Ayerst on the Lanham Act claim.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the judgment of the district court is reversed [40] and this case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

In re Super Premium Ice Cream Distribution Antitrust Litigation

United States District Court for the Northern District of California

June 23, 1988, Decided ; June 23, 1988, Filed

MDL Docket No. 682, No. C-85-6553 CAL 218

Reporter

691 F. Supp. 1262 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12553 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,162

In Re Super Premium Ice Cream Distribution Antitrust Litigation; This document relates to: ALL CASES

Core Terms

ice cream, distributor, termination, summary judgment, products, brands, summary judgment motion, cause of action, parties, relevant market, manufacturers, antitrust, genuine, monopoly power, conspiracy, distribute, geographic, interbrand, dealer, material fact, Sherman Act, customers, marketing, compete, retail, cases, alleged conspiracy, antitrust claim, anti trust law, allegations

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Motions for Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN1[] Summary Judgment, Opposing Materials

The parties opposing summary judgment must do more than simply show that there is some doubt as to material facts. They must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. And where the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for the opposing parties, there is no genuine issue for trial.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Materiality of Facts

HN2[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Genuine Disputes

The inquiry in determining whether to grant summary judgment is whether there is a genuine issue of material fact to be tried.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Nonprice Restraints

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Price Fixing

HN3[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing

The per se illegality rule does not apply to non-price vertical restraints.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN4[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The applicable analysis in a case involving the termination of a dealer is under the rule of reason, and not under the per se rule.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > Antitrust Issues

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > General Overview

HN5[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Injury to competition, rather than injury to a competitor, is indispensable to a claim under the Sherman Act § 1. Harm to a terminated distributor can result from termination, but that harm does not necessarily mean that there has been an antitrust violation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

HN6[] Sherman Act, Defenses

Once allegations of conspiracy made in the complaint are rebutted in a summary judgment motion by probative evidence supporting an alternative interpretation of a defendant's conduct, the plaintiff must come forward with specific factual support of its allegations of conspiracy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Nonprice Restraints

HN7[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing

A manufacturer is free to impose a non-price restraint on a dealer so long as there is no pernicious economic effect on interbrand competition. A manufacturer's attempt to prevent "free riding" on its marketing efforts for the benefit of other lines which the distributor is selling is both legitimate and lawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

HN8[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Actual Monopolization

The elements of a monopolization claim are: (1) possession of monopoly power in the relevant market, (2) willful acquisition or maintenance of that power, and (3) causal antitrust injury.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Acts & Mental States > Mens Rea > Specific Intent

HN9[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

The elements of a claim of attempted monopolization are: (1) specific intent to control prices or destroy competition in the relevant market, (2) predatory or anticompetitive conduct directed to accomplishing the unlawful purpose, and (3) a dangerous probability of success.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN10[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

In analyzing the relevant product market, the appraisal is one of cross-elasticity of demand or the reasonable interchangeability of commodities.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN11[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Gradations among various qualities of ice cream are not sufficient to establish separate relevant markets for the purposes of determining market power.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

HN12[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

An alleged conspiracy between a corporate parent and its wholly owned subsidiary is legally insufficient.

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Franchise Relationships > General Overview

Torts > ... > Prospective Advantage > Intentional Interference > Elements

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Interference With Business Relations

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Prospective Advantage > General Overview

HN13[] Distributorships & Franchises, Franchise Relationships

General expectations of relationships with potential distributors, retail customers, or franchisees do not constitute economic relationships sufficient for protection under the common law of interference with prospective advantages and interference with contractual relationships.

Judges: [1] Charles A. Legge, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: LEGGE

Opinion

[*1263] OPINION AND ORDER FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

CHARLES A. LEGGE, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

Cross motions for summary judgment have been made by all of the present parties [*1264] to this litigation, Haagen-Dazs, Double Rainbow and Two Count. The motions were briefed, argued and submitted. The court has reviewed the moving and opposing papers, the factual record on which the motions and oppositions are based, the record in the case, the arguments of counsel, and the applicable authorities. The court directs that summary judgment be entered in favor of Haagen-Dazs and against Double Rainbow and Two Count, as discussed below.

The Cases

This multi-district litigation presently consists of three actions. No. C-85-6553 is brought by Haagen-Dazs against Double Rainbow and Two Count. Haagen-Dazs seeks a declaration that its arrangements with its distributors do not violate law, and that certain acts of Double Rainbow constitute unfair competition under California law. No. C-

86-0853 is brought by Double Rainbow against Haagen-Dazs. It alleges violations of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and two common law torts. Action No. C-87-2471 is brought by Two Count against Haagen-Dazs. It alleges [2] violations of California's Cartwright Act, breach of contract, unfair business practices under California statute, and three state law torts.

All three of these actions have one central issue: Whether Haagen-Dazs can lawfully have exclusive distribution. That is, whether Haagen-Dazs can sell only to distributors who agree not to sell competing brands of ice cream. The central facts are simple and undisputed. Two Count was formerly a Haagen-Dazs distributor. When Two Count decided to sell other brands of ice cream competing with Haagen-Dazs, including Double Rainbow ice cream, Haagen-Dazs advised Two Count that it would terminate Two Count as a distributor unless Two Count agreed to handle only Haagen-Dazs. Two Count declined to do so. Haagen-Dazs then terminated Two Count and obtained another distributor. Haagen-Dazs believes that exclusive distribution is in compliance with law, while Two Count and Double Rainbow contend that exclusive distribution violates state and federal antitrust laws.

The Summary Judgment Motions

Discovery is virtually completed. A trial date had been set, but was vacated for the making and determination of these summary judgment motions.

In its summary [3] judgment motion, Haagen-Dazs in essence seeks complete summary judgment against Double Rainbow and Two Count on their claims against Haagen-Dazs. In No. C-86-0853, it seeks summary judgment on Double Rainbows' three antitrust claims and two common law claims. It also seeks summary judgment in No. C-87-2471 on Two Count's state antitrust claims, breach of contract claim, and three common law claims. In its own action, No. C-85-6553, Haagen-Dazs seeks a declaration that its distribution arrangements do not violate law. [1] Double Rainbow and Two Count oppose Haagen-Dazs' motion, and seek summary judgment of their own declaring (a) that the relevant market is "super premium" ice cream, and (b) that by virtue of collateral estoppel, Haagen-Dazs' policy of exclusive distribution is coercive.

The Factual Record

Since discovery has been completed, the parties have been able to submit to the court an extensive factual record. In evaluating that factual record, and its effect on these summary judgment motions, the court is guided by the principles for evaluating [4] summary judgment motions in antitrust cases stated by the United States Supreme Court in Matsushita Elec. Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio, 475 U.S. 574, 585-588, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986). HN1[] The parties opposing summary judgment, here primarily Double Rainbow and Two Count, must do more than simply show that there is some doubt [*1265] as to material facts. They must come forward with "specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial." Id. at 587 (emphasis in original). And where the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for the opposing parties, there is no genuine issue for trial. [2] Id. The record in this case demonstrates that most of the material facts are indeed undisputed.

Haagen-Dazs [3] manufactures and sells ice cream products and other frozen deserts, including Haagen-Dazs brand ice cream. Its products are sold to distributors, who in turn resell them to grocery [5] stores, restaurants and other retailers. Haagen-Dazs ice cream is (a) made of high quality natural ingredients, (b) contains a low volume of

[1] The court does not interpret Haagen-Dazs' motion to seek summary judgment on its second cause of action in No. C-85-6553.

[2] Haagen-Dazs has filed objections to certain portions of Double Rainbow's and Two Count's factual record. The objections are based on various evidentiary grounds. The court has reviewed each of the objections, and believes that each is well taken. The objections are therefore sustained.

[3] Haagen-Dazs is a wholly owned subsidiary of The Pillsbury Company. Haagen-Dazs and The Pillsbury Company are collectively referred to here as Haagen-Dazs.

air, and (c) is high in butterfat. These three characteristics cause Haagen-Dazs' ice cream to be referred to in the industry as "super premium" or "luxury" ice cream. Haagen-Dazs was the first such high quality ice cream to be distributed throughout the United States.

Two Count is a wholesale distributor of ice cream. It sells to retail outlets located throughout Northern California. It buys products from various manufacturers and resells them to retailers for Two Count's own account.

Double Rainbow manufacturers and sells its own brands of ice cream products, which are of a quality that competes with Haagen-Dazs' ice cream.

Haagen-Dazs' marketing strategy is that its products be distributed only in accordance with its announced marketing policies and procedures. Pursuant to its marketing policies, Haagen-Dazs refuses to sell its products to any distributor who also sells another brand [6] of ice cream that Haagen-Dazs regards as comparable and competitive, based on such considerations as quality, image, packaging, price, and public perception. Haagen-Dazs' policy of distributor loyalty, or exclusive distribution, was announced to its distributors as early as 1981.

Two Count became a distributor of Haagen-Dazs ice cream in Northern California in 1976. The arrangements between Two Count and Haagen-Dazs were oral. No term of duration was stated or agreed upon by implication. For many years, Two Count exercised its best efforts to establish and build sales of Haagen-Dazs products in Northern California. However, in February 1985 Two Count entered into a written distribution agreement with Double Rainbow, providing for Two Count's distribution of Double Rainbow's ice cream. Two Count was aware of Haagen-Dazs' policy that if a distributor represents brands competing with Haagen-Dazs, that would create a conflict of interests unacceptable to Haagen-Dazs. Two Count was aware, prior to agreeing to distribute Double Rainbow's products, of Haagen-Dazs' distribution policies and that Haagen-Dazs was concerned about Two Count's handling competitive lines such as Double Rainbow. [7] The agreement between Two Count and Double Rainbow required Two Count to exert its best efforts in distributing Double Rainbow products, and contained a minimum purchase requirement of one million pints in the years 1985 and following. Two Count did not inform Haagen-Dazs of this arrangement until after Two Count and Double Rainbow executed their written contract. Two Count then advised Haagen-Dazs that it intended to distribute Double Rainbow products, in order to generate additional sales volume for Two Count.

In March 1985, Haagen-Dazs confirmed that Two Count was undertaking distribution of Double Rainbow products. In May 1985 Haagen-Dazs notified Two Count that effective August 1, 1985, the distribution arrangements between Haagen-Dazs and Two Count would end. The distribution [*1266] arrangements did end on that day. Haagen-Dazs terminated Two Count because, in Haagen-Dazs' opinion, Two Count's distribution of Double Rainbow created a conflict of interests that impaired Haagen-Dazs' ability to effectively compete, and permitted Double Rainbow to "free ride" on Haagen-Dazs' goodwill, reputation, and distribution.

Haagen-Dazs initially replaced Two Count with another distributor, but [8] that arrangement was terminated in 1986, and Haagen-Dazs now does its own distributing in this area. Two Count has continued to represent Double Rainbow. Two Count also handles Steve's, Perche No!, and Bud's brands of quality ice creams. Two Count's sales have substantially increased since Haagen-Dazs ceased dealing with Two Count and Two Count has devoted itself to the other brands. Double Rainbow has also been able to find distributors in other areas of the United States where it competes with Haagen-Dazs.

Haagen-Dazs makes other assertions of fact which Double Rainbow and Two Count oppose. It is therefore necessary to examine the record of those asserted facts, using the standard defined by the U.S. Supreme Court in Matsushita. HN2[] The inquiry is of course whether there is a genuine issue of material fact to be tried. Most of Haagen-Dazs' record is based upon documents and witness testimony which it obtained from Double Rainbow and Two Count. In addition, Haagen-Dazs has submitted an affidavit of Jerry A. Hausman, a professor of economics, which sets forth his findings from the record that he reviewed. Double Rainbow and Two Count have not submitted an affidavit by an expert witness, [9] and they base their opposition upon testimony and documents obtained in discovery.

Vertical Restraints and Dealer Terminations

Subsequent to the filing of these cases, several important appellate decisions have been made regarding vertical restraints under the antitrust laws.

The United States Supreme Court recently discussed the issue in Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808, 108 S. Ct. 1515 (1988). The Court reaffirmed its position that alleged vertical restraints which do not constitute price fixing are to be judged under the rule of reason. The Court said that HN3[] the per se illegality rule does not apply to such non-price restraints. [4] The Court also noted that in such a setting interbrand competition is the primary concern of the antitrust laws.

This court also has the guidance of the recent Ninth Circuit decision Rutman Wine Co. v. E. & J. Gallo Winery, 829 F.2d 729 (9th Cir. 1987). Rutman was a dealer termination case, involving non-price commercial activities, which were alleged to be violations of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The court of appeals affirmed the district [10] court's dismissal of the action for failure to state a cause of action. The court of appeals stated that HN4[] the applicable analysis was under the rule of reason, and not under the per se rule. Id. at 734. The court also reaffirmed the principle that HN5[] injury to competition, rather than injury to a competitor, is indispensable to a claim under section 1. Id. The court recognized that harm to a terminated distributor can result from termination, but that harm does not necessarily mean that there has been an antitrust violation. The court also affirmed dismissal of the section 2 allegations, because the defendant did not possess monopoly power in the relevant geographic market, and the plaintiff had not sufficiently alleged a specific intent to monopolize. Id. at 736. The analysis of the Ninth Circuit in Rutman is particularly relevant to the antitrust claims between Haagen-Dazs and Two Count, and this court is particularly guided by the discussion on pages 734-736 of Rutman.

In another recent decision, OSC Corp. v. Apple Computer Inc., 792 F.2d 1464 (9th Cir. 1986), the Ninth Circuit again affirmed a summary judgment in a dealer termination case. The termination was [11] challenged under section 1 of the Sherman Act. [*1267] Summary judgment was granted and was affirmed on the ground that the claimants had not presented a record sufficient to support a reasonable finding in their favor. In regard to the burden of proof, the court stated: HN6[] "Once allegations of conspiracy made in the complaint are rebutted by probative evidence supporting an alternative interpretation of a defendant's conduct, the plaintiff must come forward with specific factual support of its allegations of conspiracy." Id. at 1467. The court reaffirmed that dealer termination cases involve the rule of reason and not the per se rule, and that injury to the terminated dealer is not enough to prove injury to competition. Id. at 1469.

The Ninth Circuit specifically stated in OSC that HN7[] a manufacturer "is free to impose a non-price restraint on a dealer so long as there is no pernicious economic effect on interbrand competition." Id. The court also stated that a manufacturer's attempt to prevent "free riding" on its marketing efforts for the benefit of other lines which the distributor is selling is "both legitimate and lawful" Id. at 1468.

In addition, in A. H. Cox Co. v. Star Machinery [12] Co., 653 F.2d 1302, 1306-1307 (9th Cir. 1981), the Ninth Circuit affirmed a summary judgment against a distributor, stating that it is widely recognized that in most circumstances dealer terminations or substitutions do not adversely affect competition in a market.

Two Count and Double Rainbow attempt to avoid the application of the above principles by reliance on Industrial Bldg. Materials, Inc. v. Interchemical Corp., 437 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1971). From that case they contend that this court should look beyond the termination of the distributorship and view the charges in the context of an attempt to monopolize and a conspiracy. However, as will be discussed below, there is no evidence to support the allegation of conspiracy. In addition, the insufficiency of the monopoly charges are also discussed below.

---

[4] Price restraints are not involved in this case.

In any event, it is clear from a reading of the Ninth Circuit cases together that the mere discharge of a distributor is not itself a violation of the antitrust laws. Double Rainbow and Two Count must establish more. Basically they must establish an injury to competition. However, they have not done so. They have not made a sufficient showing of a genuine issue of fact regarding [13] an antitrust injury. In fact, the record establishes that there is increasing interbrand competition. Two Count continues to represent Double Rainbow and other manufacturers, and has prospered. Double Rainbow has been able to obtain other distributors nationwide. Haagen-Dazs' market share, on the other hand, has declined in several respects. Two Count and Double Rainbow have not established that competition has suffered because Haagen-Dazs terminated Two Count, whether the relevant geographic market is a nationwide market or the San Francisco Bay Area. Separate distribution has led to increased and successful interbrand competition.

Monopoly

Two Count and Double Rainbow argue that Haagen-Dazs has a monopoly, or is attempting to monopolize, in violation of section 2 of the Sherman Act and the California Cartwright Act.

HN8[] The elements of a monopolization claim are: (1) possession of monopoly power in the relevant market, (2) willful acquisition or maintenance of that power, and (3) causal "antitrust" injury. Rutman, 829 F.2d at 736. HN9[] The elements of a claim of attempted monopolization are: (1) specific intent to control prices or destroy competition in the relevant market, (2) [14] predatory or anticompetitive conduct directed to accomplishing the unlawful purpose, and (3) a dangerous probability of success. Id. The claims of Two Count and Double Rainbow fail here because there is no genuine issue of material fact that Haagen-Dazs has monopoly power in a relevant market, or any intent to control prices or destroy competition in a relevant market, or any dangerous probability of success.

The first factor is the necessity to define the relevant product market. Haagen-Dazs [*1268] contends that the relevant product market is all frozen desserts, or at least all ice creams. Two Count and Double Rainbow contend that it is super premium ice creams. While the issue of relevant market is generally a fact question for a jury, Syufy Enterprises v. American Multi Cinema Inc., 783 F.2d 878, 882 (9th Cir. 1986) in this case there is no genuine issue of material fact for the jury in that regard.

The U.S. Supreme Court has said that HN10[] in analyzing the relevant product market, the appraisal is one of cross-elasticity of demand; that is, the reasonable interchangeability of commodities. United States v. DuPont & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 394-95, 404, 100 L. Ed. 1264, 76 S. Ct. 994 (1956); Brown Shoe Co. v. United [15] States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962). As stated, Haagen-Dazs ice creams are distinguishable, at least for purposes of marketing, by the fact that they have higher butterfat content, lower air volume, and more natural ingredients. Haagen-Dazs' internal documents support the claim that its products have high customer recognition and sales because of those characteristics. However, it is clear from the record that HN11[] gradations among various qualities of ice cream are not sufficient to establish separate relevant markets for the purposes of determining market power. Courts have repeatedly rejected efforts to define markets by price variances or product quality variances. Such distinctions are economically meaningless where the differences are actually a spectrum of price and quality differences. See, e.g., Brown Shoe, 370 U.S. at 326; United States v. Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co., 253 F. Supp. 129, 145-6 (N.D. Cal. 1966), affm'd 385 U.S. 37, 17 L. Ed. 2d 35, 87 S. Ct. 240 (1967); Ron Tonkin Grand Turismo v. Fiat, 637 F.2d 1376, 1379-80 (9th Cir. 1981) cert. denied, 454 U.S. 831, 70 L. Ed. 2d 109, 102 S. Ct. 128 (1981); JBL Enterprises v. Jhirmack Enterprises, Inc., 509 F. Supp. 357, 371-2 (N.D. Cal. 1981); Beatrice Foods v. FTC, [16] 540 F.2d 303, 309-310 (7th Cir. 1976).

That is this case. The record demonstrates that all grades of ice creams compete with one another for customer preference and for space in the retailers' freezers. Double Rainbow and Two Count have not shown that any of the differences among ice cream products, such as physical or price differences, have antitrust significance. They have not presented sufficient facts to create an issue of fact that people who buy so called "super premium" or "luxury" ice creams do not buy others which are lower in the spectrum of price or quality. And to the contrary, Haagen-Dazs has established a record that permits no reasonable inference other than that the relevant market is ice cream generally. There is significant overlap among the various grades and brands. All grades of ice cream compete for both retail shelf space and for consumers' attention. The various adjectives used to describe brands of ice creams do not alone establish separate markets.

Because of this conclusion regarding the product market, the court need not discuss the relevant geographic market extensively. In fact, the parties mention the geographic market only in passing. Since the relevant [17] product market is all ice creams, what evidence there is before this court establishes no meaningful distinctions in result depending upon whether the geographic market is nationwide or the San Francisco Bay Area. That is, Haagen-Dazs has too small a share of either geographic market to approach monopoly power or to establish any dangerous probability of such monopoly power. For example, Haagen-Dazs' statistics indicate that its share of the ice cream market in the San Francisco area is only four to five percent. The parties present no direct statistics on a nationwide market. And Two Count and Double Rainbow's statistics do not demonstrate any monopoly power, or reasonable probability of monopoly power, in any geographic market. [5] [*1269] The record also demonstrates the absence of any power on the part of Haagen-Dazs [18] to exclude competitors. It instead affirmatively demonstrates that competitors are entering the market and obtaining significant market shares. These facts are evidenced in part by the success which Two Count, Double Rainbow, and other manufacturers of alleged super premium ice cream have had in obtaining market shares. As noted from the above authorities, one of the key elements for analysis is the degree of interbrand competition. The record is abundantly clear, beyond any contrary determination which could reasonably be made by a jury, that there is extensive interbrand competition, and that such competition has been increasing.

Estoppel

Double Rainbow and Two Count argue that Haagen-Dazs is collaterally estopped from denying that its exclusive distribution policy is illegal, and from denying that its conduct is coercive. In doing so, they rely upon a decision of the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, Ben and Jerry's Homemade v. Haagen-Dazs, 693 F. Supp. 1256 (D.Mass. 1987). However, that decision does not have the collateral estoppel effect that Two Count and Double Rainbow seek. First, that decision was made on the application by that plaintiff [19] for a preliminary injunction. It was not a final adjudication which is entitled to collateral estoppel effect. Kuzinich v. County of Santa Clara, 689 F.2d 1345, 1350-51 (9th Cir. 1982). In addition, the decision was based primarily, if not entirely, upon the breach of a written settlement agreement between the plaintiff there and Haagen-Dazs. It was not an adjudication of alleged violations of the antitrust laws. The settlement agreement at issue there is not at issue in this case.

Conspiracy

Two Count and Double Rainbow also argue that there was a conspiracy between Haagen-Dazs and other parties, and that the existence of a conspiracy is a defense to Haagen-Dazs' summary judgment motion.

However, the record does not establish any genuine issue of material fact on the existence of any conspiracy. One argument is that there was a conspiracy between Haagen-Dazs and its parent Pillsbury. However, HN12[] an alleged conspiracy between a corporate parent and its wholly owned subsidiary is legally insufficient. Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628, 104 S. Ct. 2731 (1984). In addition, Double Rainbow and Two Count have apparently conceded in their briefs that there is insufficient [20] evidence to establish any conspiracy between Haagen-Dazs and any other manufacturer or distributor to keep Double Rainbow or Two Count out of the market. Two Count and Double Rainbow have simply not come forward with a specific factual showing to support their allegations of conspiracy, as required by the Ninth Circuit's holding in OSC. 792 F.2d at 1467.

[5] Double Rainbow's and Two Count's statistics refer to the San Francisco Bay Area, using only super premium ice creams as the product market. Those statistics appear to be flawed, because of their exclusion of some alleged super premium brands. And even those statistics show that Haagen-Dazs' share of the alleged super premium market has dropped from 1984 through 1987.

Based upon the relevant authorities, and upon the record in this case, which establishes either undisputed facts or facts as to which there is no genuine issue, the court concludes that summary judgment should be granted (a) in favor of Haagen-Dazs and against Two Count on Two Count's two antitrust claims, and against Double Rainbow on Double Rainbow's three antitrust claims, (b) and in favor of Haagen-Dazs against Two Count and Double Rainbow on the first cause of action in C-85-6553.

Common Law Claims

Two Count has also alleged common law claims. One is an alleged breach of the distribution agreement between Haagen-Dazs and Two Count. However, that contract was oral, contained no term of duration, and was terminable at will. Two Count argues that the agreement was [*1270] to last in perpetuity because Two Count was "assured that it would [21] grow with Haagen-Dazs." But that is legally insufficient. See Alpha Distrib. Co. v. Jack Daniel Distillery, 454 F.2d 442, 447-8 (9th Cir. 1972) cert. denied, 419 U.S. 842, 42 L. Ed. 2d 70, 95 S. Ct. 74 (1974); Connelly v. Venus Foods, Inc., 174 Cal. App. 2d 582, 585-6, 345 P.2d 117 (1959). Even if the agreement were interpreted as being more than "at will," and required good cause for termination, the record establishes that there was good cause. Two Count's taking on competitive lines of ice cream was good cause. Two Count's obligation was at least to use its best efforts on behalf of Haagen-Dazs, and when Two Count agreed to also use its best efforts on behalf of competitor Double Rainbow, Haagen-Dazs was justified in terminating the distribution agreement. There is no doubt that Haagen-Dazs gave reasonable notice to Two Count of the termination, and the court does not understand Two Count to be complaining about the method or reasonableness of the notice of termination.

Two Count's other state law allegations are unfair business practices, interference with prospective advantages, interference with contractual relationships, and breach of the covenant of good faith. They are based upon Two Count's allegation that [22] Haagen-Dazs somehow interfered with Two Count's relationships with its customers and suppliers. However, discovery has not substantiated those allegations. There is not sufficient evidence in the record to support an allegation of such interference. And as stated, Two Count has increased its number of brands, its customers and its revenues.

Double Rainbow also makes common law allegations of interference with prospective advantages and interference with contractual relationships. Again, however, there is not sufficient evidence to support those allegations. [6] The undisputed record shows that although Haagen-Dazs is in competition with Double Rainbow, it has not unlawfully interfered with Double Rainbow's contractual relationships or its prospective business advantages. There is no material evidence that the contract between Double Rainbow and Two Count has been interfered with by Haagen-Dazs Nor is there any evidence of interference with any contract that Double Rainbow had with any other customers. Double Rainbow's general argument of possible inference with potential distributors, retail customers or franchisees is not legally sufficient. HN13[] Such general expectations do not constitute [23] economic relationships sufficient for protection. Blank v. Kirwan, 39 Cal. 3d 311, 330, 216 Cal. Rptr. 718, 703 P.2d 58 (1985); Buckaloo v. Johnson, 14 Cal. 3d 815, 828, 122 Cal. Rptr. 745, 537 P.2d 865 (1975).

Conclusion

In summary, Haagen-Dazs terminated Two Count because Haagen-Dazs has a marketing policy of requiring exclusive distribution, which Two Count violated by agreeing to distribute the ice creams of Double Rainbow, as well as other brands that compete with Haagen-Dazs. Haagen-Dazs was legally entitled to terminate Two Count.

---

[6] From the briefs in the summary judgment motions, the court does not understand Double Rainbow to argue that it has shown sufficient facts to contest Haagen-Dazs' motion on these common law claims.

Double Rainbow and Two Count have not provided sufficient evidence from which a reasonable trier of fact could find any violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, Section 2 of the Sherman Act, or the California Cartwright Act, or could find in favor of Double Rainbow and Two Count on their state law claims.

Competition in the ice cream market is flourishing, and interbrand competition is intense. Antitrust lawsuits are no substitute for such true competition. The public interest is protected by such competition, [24] and antitrust suits are only an adjunct to promoting that public interest in cases where competition has been improperly curtailed. When there is, as here, real and intense competition, antitrust suits are simply not for the purpose of protecting a distributor's or a competitor's economic desires.

[*1271] IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED as follows:

(1) The motion for summary judgment by Double Rainbow in action C-86-0853 is denied.

(2) The motion for summary judgment by Two Count in action C-87-2471 is denied.

(3) The motion of Haagen-Dazs for summary judgment is granted as follows:

(a) In C-86-0853, in favor of Haagen-Dazs and against Double Rainbow on all causes of action.

(b) In C-87-2471, in favor of Haagen-Dazs and against Two Count on all causes of action.

(c) In C-85-6553, in favor of Haagen-Dazs and against Double Rainbow and Two Count on the first cause of action.

(4) The court understands that there is a second cause of action in C-85-6553 by Haagen-Dazs alleging unfair competition. But the court does not interpret Haagen-Dazs' motion for summary judgment to address that cause of action. If Haagen-Dazs wishes to proceed with that cause of action, it should advise the court and the parties, [25] and a status conference will be scheduled to set dates for the prosecution of that cause of action. If, in view of the above rulings, Haagen-Dazs wishes to abandon that cause of action, it should file with this court and serve on the parties a proposed form of judgment which is consistent with this opinion and which states that Haagen-Dazs is dismissing the second cause of action of C-85-6553.

Health Care Equalization Committee of Iowa Chiropractic Soc. v. Iowa Medical Soc.

United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit

August 31, 1987, Submitted ; June 24, 1988, Filed

Nos. 86-2588, 87-1015

Reporter
851 F.2d 1020 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 8783 ; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,107; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 3d (Callaghan) 647

Health Care Equalization Committee of the Iowa Chiropractic Society as assignee of its members, Appellant, v. Iowa Medical Society, Iowa Hospital Association; Blue Shield of Iowa; Blue Cross of Iowa, Appellees. American Medical Association, American Hospital Association, Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals; Clarence H. Denser, Jr., M.D.; Joseph A. Sabatier, Jr., M.D.; H. Doyl Taylor; Donald C. Young, M.D.; and Nelson H. Chesney, M.D., American College of Radiology, Appellee. Health Care Equalization Committee of the Iowa Chiropractic Society as assignee of its members, Appellee, v. Iowa Medical Society, Iowa Hospital Association; Blue Shield of Iowa; Blue Cross of Iowa; Appellants. American Medical Association; American Hospital Association; Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals; Clarence H. Denser, Jr., M.D.; Joseph A. Sabatier, Jr., M.D.; H. Doyl Taylor; Donald C. Young, M.D.; and Nelson H. Chesney, M.D.

Subsequent History: Petition for Rehearing and Petition for Rehearing En Banc Denied September 20, 1988.

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Iowa.

Core Terms

contracts, subscribers, healthcare services, district court, chiropractors, state action doctrine, provider, chiropractic, monopolize, insurance business, McCarran-Ferguson Act, insured, contacts, group boycott, allegations, supervision, antitrust, factors, osteopathic physician, hospital service, Sherman Act, summary judgment motion, personal jurisdiction, healthcare, participating, coverage, boycott, exempt, physicians and surgeons, surgical services

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN1[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

The court finds nothing in the language of the Sherman Act or in its history which suggests that its purpose was to restrain a state or its officers or agents from activities directed by its legislature. In a dual system of government in which, under the Constitution, the states are sovereign, save only as Congress may constitutionally subtract from their authority, an unexpressed purpose to nullify a state's control over its officers and agents is not lightly to be attributed to Congress.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

HN2[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

Only two factors make up the test for protection under the state action doctrine: First, the challenged restraint must be one clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed as state policy; second, the policy must be actively supervised by the State itself.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

HN3[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

The active supervision prong of the test for protection under the state action doctrine requires that state officials have and exercise power to review particular anticompetitive acts of private parties and disapprove those that fail to accord with state policy.

Healthcare Law > Managed Healthcare > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Insurers

HN4[] Healthcare Law, Managed Healthcare

See Iowa Code § 514.

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Insurers

HN5[] Antitrust Actions, Insurers

Iowa Code § 514 on its face removes any discretion or business judgment with respect to coverage by health care service corporations of chiropractic services.

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Facilities

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Insurers

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Covenants not to Compete > General Overview

HN6[] Antitrust Actions, Facilities

It is not necessary for Iowa Code § 514 to expressly compel health care service corporations to exclude chiropractors from their service plans in order for the corporations to be protected by the state action doctrine. A private party acting pursuant to an anticompetitive regulatory program need not point to a specific, detailed legislative authorization for its challenged conduct.

Healthcare Law > Managed Healthcare > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Insurers

HN7[] Healthcare Law, Managed Healthcare

It is clear from the language and history of Iowa Code § 514 that the exclusion of chiropractors from health care service plans was not merely contemplated by the State of Iowa, but compelled.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Insurers

HN8[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

Iowa Code § 514 satisfies both prongs of the state action test.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > McCarran-Ferguson Act Exemption

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Industry Practices > Federal Regulations > Antitrust Regulations

Insurance Law > Industry Practices > General Overview

HN9[] Exemptions & Immunities, McCarran-Ferguson Act Exemption

15 U.S.C.S. § 1013(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act does not express a congressional intent to subject state-authorized boycott activity to the antitrust laws where conducted as part of a state-regulated "business of insurance."

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > McCarran-Ferguson Act Exemption

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Industry Practices > Federal Regulations > Antitrust Regulations

HN10[] Exemptions & Immunities, McCarran-Ferguson Act Exemption

The McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C.S. §§ 1011-1015, removes from antitrust scrutiny all conduct which is (1) part of the "business of insurance," (2) regulated by state law, and (3) not in the form of coercion, intimidation, or boycott.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > McCarran-Ferguson Act Exemption

HN11[] Exemptions & Immunities, McCarran-Ferguson Act Exemption

The Supreme Court sets forth three factors to examine in determining whether a particular practice is part of the "business of insurance": (1) whether the practice has the effect of transferring or spreading a policyholder's risk, (2) whether the practice is an integral part of the policy relationship between the insurer and the insured, and (3) whether the practice is limited to entities within the insurance industry. While each of these factors is a relevant consideration in evaluating whether a practice is part of the "business of insurance," none of these criteria is necessarily determinative in itself.

Civil Procedure > ... > Service of Process > Methods of Service > Foreign Service

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Service of Process > Methods of Service > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Service of Process > Methods of Service > Service on Corporations

HN12[] Methods of Service, Foreign Service

If a foreign corporation commits a tort in whole or in part in Iowa against a resident of Iowa, such acts shall be deemed to be doing business in Iowa by such foreign corporation for the purpose of service of process or original notice on such foreign corporation under this section, and, if the corporation does not have a registered agent or agents in the state of Iowa, shall be deemed to constitute the appointment of the secretary of state of the state of Iowa to be its true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful process or original notice in actions or proceedings arising from or growing out of such tort. Iowa Code § 617.3.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN13[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, In Personam Actions

In determining whether there are sufficient minimum contacts to satisfy due process, the court focuses on the relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation. This inquiry involves a consideration of five factors: (1) the nature and quality of the defendant's contacts with the forum state; (2) the quantity of the defendant's contacts with the forum state; (3) the relation of the cause of action to the defendant's contacts with the forum state; (4) the interest of the forum state in providing a forum for its residents; and (5) the convenience of the parties.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Appropriateness

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Appellate Review > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Motions for Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN14[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Appropriateness

Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e), when a motion for summary judgment is made and supported as provided in this rule, an adverse party may not rest upon the mere allegations or denials of the adverse party's pleading, but the adverse party's response, by affidavits or as otherwise provided in this rule, must set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. If the adverse party does not so respond, summary judgment, if appropriate, shall be entered against the adverse party.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Workers' Compensation & SSDI > Administrative Proceedings > Fraud

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Motions for Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN15[] Workers' Compensation, Fraud

Summary judgment procedure is properly regarded not as a disfavored procedural shortcut, but rather as an integral part of the Federal Rules as a whole, which are designed 'to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action. To survive a motion for summary judgment, the non-moving party must establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the moving party entered into an illegal conspiracy that caused the non-moving party to suffer a cognizable injury. Second, the issue of fact must be genuine. When the moving party has carried its burden of demonstrating the absence of a genuine issue of material fact, its opponent must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. The non-moving party must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Trials > Judgment as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Movant Persuasion & Proof

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN16[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 case. To survive a motion for summary judgment or for a directed verdict, a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently. Most significantly for this case, the non-moving party must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed" the non-moving party.

Counsel: For Appellant, Flenn L. Norris, Des Moines, Iowa.

For Appellee, Craig Graziano, Des Moines, Iowa, for Blue Cross/Blue Shield.

Bennett A. Webster, Des Moines, Iowa, for Iowa Hospital Assn.

Charles A. Treat, Chicago, Illinois, for American College of Radiology.

Judges: McMillian, John R. Gibson and Fagg, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: McMILLIAN

Opinion

[*1021] McMILLIAN, Circuit Judge.

The Health Care Equalization Committee (HCEC) appeals from a final judgment entered in the District Court [1] for the Southern District of Iowa dismissing its antitrust claims against Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Iowa (the Blues) and the American College of Radiology (the ACR), granting summary judgment in favor of the Iowa Hospital Association (the IHA), and denying its motion for summary judgment on its group boycott claim. *Health Care Equalization [1022] Comm. v. Iowa Medical Society, 501 F. Supp. 970, 984-86, 988-91, 993-95 (S.D. Iowa 1980) (HCEC v. IMS); id., Civ. No. 79-381-A, slip op. at 2-5, 8-10 (Aug. 4, 1986). For reversal, HCEC argues that the district court erred in (1) dismissing its antitrust claims against the Blues by finding them exempt from the [2] antitrust laws under the state action doctrine and the McCarran-Ferguson Act; (2) dismissing the ACR for lack of personal jurisdiction; (3) granting summary judgment in favor of the IHA; and (4) denying its motion for summary judgment on its group boycott claim. For the reasons discussed below, we affirm.

I

HCEC is a committee of the Iowa Chiropractic Society, and an assignee of the claims of one hundred and twenty Iowa chiropractors. In 1979 HCEC brought this action against the Blues, the ACR, the IHA, and other defendants [2] alleging violations of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2. [3] HCEC charged that the defendants had conspired in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act to eliminate or prevent the growth of the chiropractic profession through a group boycott or concerted refusal to deal with chiropractors. HCEC alleged that the boycott was manifested in many ways, including (1) refusal to permit medical doctors to refer patients to chiropractors, to accept patient referrals from chiropractors, or to treat patients in cooperation with chiropractors; (2) [3] denial of access to hospitals and hospital services to chiropractors; (3) attempts to block accreditation of chiropractic educational institutions; (4) promotion of public statements critical of chiropractors; and (5) refusal to include coverage for chiropractic services in health care service plans. Additionally, HCEC alleged that the Blues monopolized, attempted to monopolize, and conspired to monopolize the "health care insurance business in Iowa" in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

[4] After approximately eight months of discovery, the Blues filed a motion to dismiss the antitrust allegations as to them. The Blues claimed to be exempt from the federal antitrust laws under the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1011-1015, and the state action doctrine of Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 350-52, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S.

---

[1] The Honorable William C. Stuart, United States Senior District Judge for the Southern District of Iowa.

[2] HCEC also named as defendants the American Medical Association, the American Hospital Association, the Iowa Medical Society, the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, then Iowa Commissioner of Public Health Norman L. Pawlewski, H. Doyl Taylor, Donald C. Young, M.D., Nelson H. Chesney, M.D., Clarence R. Denser, Jr., M.D., and Joseph Sabatier, Jr., M.D. As a result of various settlement agreements and unappealed orders of the district court, these defendants are no longer parties to this lawsuit.

[3] HCEC also alleged violations of (1) the Iowa common law of tort due to interference with prospective business relations, and (2) 42 U.S.C. § 1983. In 1986 the district court granted HCEC's motion to dismiss its tortious interference claim, Health Care Equalization Comm. v. Iowa Medical Soc'y, Civ. No. 79-381-A (S.D. Iowa Aug. 4, 1986) (HCEC v. IMS), and entered summary judgment in favor of all defendants on the § 1983 claim. Id. (Aug. 8, 1986) (the Blues); id. (Aug. 13, 1986) (remaining defendants). HCEC does not appeal from these orders.

Ct. 307 (1943). The ACR filed a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. [4] In a comprehensive ruling, the district court held that the Blues were exempt from the § 1 group boycott claim due to the state action doctrine, HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at 988-91, and from the § 2 monopolization claim on the basis of the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1011-1015. Id. at 993-95. The district court also granted the ACR's motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction because the ACR did not have sufficient minimum contacts with Iowa to satisfy the requirements [*1023] of the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. Id. at 980-82.

[5] Discovery involving the remaining defendants and claims proceeded throughout the early 1980s and ended in January 1986. Both HCEC and the IHA then moved for summary judgment on the group boycott claim. On August 4, 1986, the district court denied HCEC's motion for summary judgment, adopting a rule of reason approach to group boycott claims involving professional associations, and granted the IHA's motion for summary judgment because the undisputed facts revealed that the IHA was not involved in the alleged group boycott. [5] This appeal followed.

II

HCEC's first point on appeal is that the district court erred in dismissing its group boycott and monopolization claims against the Blues under the state action doctrine and the McCarran-Ferguson Act. We turn first to the state action doctrine.

A

The Blues are non-profit health care service corporations organized under Iowa Code Chapters [6] 504 and 504A and governed by Iowa Code Chapter 514 in the administration of their health care service plans. These plans provide an alternative to traditional health insurance plans and revolve around two sets of contracts: provider contracts and subscriber contracts. Subscriber contracts obligate the Blues to provide to subscribers for a fixed fee various health care services through participating health care providers. Through the provider contracts, the Blues are obligated to reimburse participating health care providers for their fees and expenses in providing health care services to the Blues' subscribers. The history and development of the Blues is described in greater detail in Group Life & Health Insurance Co. v. Royal Drug Co., 440 U.S. 205, 239-243, 59 L. Ed. 2d 261, 99 S. Ct. 1067 (1979) (Brennan, J., dissenting). HCEC focuses its group boycott claim on the failure of the Blues to include chiropractors within their health care service plans--that is, the failure to include chiropractic services among those health care services which the Blues are obligated to provide under their subscriber contracts.

The Blues defend this exclusion by pointing to the regulatory framework governing health care service [7] corporations set forth in Iowa Code Chapter 514, which the Blues assert mandates the exclusion of chiropractors. Thus, the Blues argue that the actions complained of by HCEC are actually those of the State of Iowa and therefore not subject to the Sherman Act under the state action doctrine.

In analyzing the Blues' defense under the state action doctrine, we begin with Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S. Ct. 307 (1943). There, a raisin producer sought to enjoin the enforcement of an agricultural marketing program administered pursuant to state legislation intended to create price supports for various commodities, including raisins. The Court assumed for purposes of analysis that the program would have anti-competitive effects, but nevertheless concluded that Congress did not intend the Sherman Act to apply to the program because it "derived its authority and its efficacy from the legislative command of the state and was not intended to operate or become effective without that command." Id. at 350. The Court based its decision both on federalism concerns and the legislative history of the Sherman Act.

[4] All defendants joined in a motion to dismiss on the ground that HCEC lacked standing and the capacity to bring this lawsuit. The district court denied this motion. HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at 976-80. Appellees assert that the district court erred in denying this motion and raise this point of error in what purports to be a cross-appeal (No. 87-1015). Because it would be unnecessary to reach this argument if we affirm the district court on all aspects of appellant's appeal, we construe appellees' argument to be in the nature of an alternative basis for affirmance. We dispose of this issue infra, note 16.

[5] The district court certified its November 5, 1980, and August 4, 1986, rulings for interlocutory appeal. See 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). Because all other defendants have been dismissed, these rulings have become final; accordingly, we exercise jurisdiction over this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

> HN1[] We find nothing in the language of the Sherman Act or in its history which suggests that its [8] purpose was to restrain a state or its officers or agents from activities directed by its legislature. In a dual system of government in which, under the Constitution, the states are sovereign, save only as Congress may constitutionally subtract from their authority, [*1024] an unexpressed purpose to nullify a state's control over its officers and agents is not lightly to be attributed to Congress.

Id. at 350-51.

After more than thirty years, the Court returned to the state action doctrine in a series of cases. Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 791, 44 L. Ed. 2d 572, 95 S. Ct. 2004 (1975) (minimum fee schedule issued by county bar association and enforced by state bar, an administrative agency, not protected by state action doctrine because fee schedule not "compelled by direction of the State acting as a sovereign"); Cantor v. Detroit Edison Co., 428 U.S. 579, 49 L. Ed. 2d 1141, 96 S. Ct. 3110 (1976) (state's neutral acceptance of public utility's program of providing free light bulbs not protected by state action doctrine); Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 53 L. Ed. 2d 810, 97 S. Ct. 2691 (1977) (state action doctrine protects state supreme court enforcement of disciplinary rules prohibiting attorney advertising); City of Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light [9] Co., 435 U.S. 389, 55 L. Ed. 2d 364, 98 S. Ct. 1123 (1978) (state action doctrine protects acts of municipalities only where undertaken pursuant to clearly articulated state policy of displacing competition by regulation); New Motor Vehicle Board v. Orrin W. Fox Co., 439 U.S. 96, 58 L. Ed. 2d 361, 99 S. Ct. 403 (1978) (same); California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233, 100 S. Ct. 937 (1980) (Midcal) (state legislated resale wine-pricing maintenance program not protected by state action doctrine because, although restraint clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed as state policy, not actively supervised by the state itself).

In Sound, Inc. v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 631 F.2d 1324 (8th Cir. 1980), this court distilled from the above cases four factors relevant to the application of the state action doctrine. [6] These factors were applied by the district court in its 1980 ruling that the Blues' conduct was protected under the state action doctrine.

[10] The law regarding the state action doctrine has not remained static since the district court's rulings. In Southern Motor Carriers Rate Conference, Inc. v. United States, 471 U.S. 48, 85 L. Ed. 2d 36, 105 S. Ct. 1721 (1985) (Southern Motor Carriers), and 324 Liquor Corp. v. Duffy, 479 U.S. 335, 107 S. Ct. 720, 93 L. Ed. 2d 667 (1987) (324 Liquor Corp.), the Court clarified the doctrine by holding that HN2[] only the two factors considered in Midcal make up the test for protection under the state action doctrine: "First, the challenged restraint must be 'one clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed as state policy'; second, the policy must be 'actively supervised' by the State itself." Midcal, 445 U.S. at 105 (quoting City of Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. 389, 410, 55 L. Ed. 2d 364, 98 S. Ct. 1123 (1978) (plurality opinion)); see also 324 Liquor Corp., 107 S. Ct. at 725; Southern Motor Carriers, 471 U.S. at 57. Most recently in Patrick v. Burget, 486 U.S. 94, 56 U.S.L.W. 4430, 4432, 100 L. Ed. 2d 83, 108 S. Ct. 1658 (1988) (Patrick), the Court noted that "the HN3[] active supervision prong of the Midcal test requires that state officials have and exercise power to review particular anticompetitive acts of private

---

[6] The four factors set forth in Sound, Inc. were:

> [1] The existence and nature of any relevant statutorily expressed policy; [2] the nature of the regulatory agency's interpretation and application of its enabling statute, including the accommodation of competition by the regulator; [3] the fairness of subjecting a regulated private defendant to the mandates of antitrust law; and [4] the nature and extent of the state's interest in the specific subject matter of the challenged activity.

Id. at 1334.

parties and disapprove those that fail [11] to accord with state policy." Although the four-factor test of Sound, Inc. applied by the district court has been superseded, we conclude that the Blues are protected by the state action doctrine under the current two-pronged test.

Turning first to state policy, we conclude that HN4[] Iowa Code Chapter 514 [7] reflects a [*1025] clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed state policy to displace competition with regulation in the health care service corporation industry, and provides an extensive and complex regulatory framework for the activities of health care service corporations such as the Blues. Section 514.1 authorizes such corporations to administer four types of plans: (1) a hospital service plan "whereby hospital service may be provided by the said corporation or by a hospital with which it has a contract for such service, to such of the public who become subscribers to said plan under a contract which entitles each subscriber to hospital service"; (2) a medical and surgical service plan "whereby medical and surgical service may be provided at the expense of said corporation, by duly licensed physicians and surgeons, dentists, podiatrists, osteopathic physicians, or osteopathic [12] physicians and surgeons, to subscribers under contract, entitling each subscriber to medical and surgical service, as provided in said contract"; (3) a pharmaceutical plan; and (4) an optometric plan.

Under § 514.5, hospital service corporations are authorized to contract with subscribers "for the rendering of hospital service to any of its subscribers with hospitals maintained and operated by the state or any of its political subdivisions, or by any corporation, association, or individual." This section also authorizes medical service corporations to "enter into contracts with subscribers to furnish medical and surgical service through physicians and surgeons, dentists, podiatrists, osteopathic physicians, or osteopathic physicians and surgeons."

Chapter 514 does not stop at merely specifying the types of contracts that health care service corporations may enter into. Under § 514.7, any contracts between a health care service corporation and its subscribers are "at all times" subject to the [13] approval of the Iowa Commissioner of Insurance (the Commissioner). Similarly, § 514.8 provides:

> The contracts by any [health care service] corporation with participating hospitals for hospital service or with participating physicians and surgeons, dentists, podiatrists, osteopathic physicians, or osteopathic physicians and surgeons for medical and surgical service, or with participating pharmacies for pharmaceutical service, or with participating optometrists for optometric service shall at all times be subject to the approval of the commissioner of insurance.

The articles of incorporation of the health care service corporation itself, as well as any subsequent amendments thereto, are subject to the approval of the Commissioner. § 514.3. The Commissioner must also approve the rates charged to subscribers, § 514.6, approve all acquisition and administrative costs of the corporations, § 514.11, arbitrate any disputes between a corporation and its providers, § 514.13, and supervise any dissolution, merger or liquidation of a health care service corporation, § 514.14. Under § 514.17, the legislature has further specified the minimum number of each type of health care provider which [14] must be under contract with the corporation. Finally, all health care service corporations must report annually to the Commissioner under § 514.9, and are subject to examination under § 514.10. In sum, Chapter 514 regulates every aspect of the health care service corporation industry from the structure, expenditures, and contracts of the corporations to the rates that they may charge their subscribers.

HCEC argues, however, that even if the Blues are protected by the state action doctrine to the extent that their conduct is pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 514, they are nevertheless liable for their boycott of chiropractors because the exclusion of chiropractors from health care service plans is not contemplated or compelled by Chapter 514. [8] We agree with the district [*1026] court's reasoning in rejecting this argument because "Chapter HN5[]

---

[7] All discussions of Iowa Code Chapter 514, unless otherwise noted, refer to the Chapter as it read in 1979 at the time of HCEC's suit. Subsequent amendments are discussed where relevant.

[8] HCEC also appears to argue that the Blues were not obligated to exclude chiropractors because they sometimes made reimbursements to their subscribers for services performed by nonparticipating providers. The district court rejected this argument because, in its view, such reimbursements are permissible under Chapter 514. HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at 990-91.

514 on its face removes any discretion or business judgment with respect to coverage by health care service corporations of chiropractic services." HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at 990.

[15] As a threshold matter, we note that HN6[] it is not necessary for Chapter 514 to expressly compel health care service corporations to exclude chiropractors from their service plans in order for the corporations to be protected by the state action doctrine. Southern Motor Carriers, 471 U.S. 48, 85 L. Ed. 2d 36, 105 S. Ct. 1721. "A private party acting pursuant to an anticompetitive regulatory program need not 'point to a specific, detailed legislative authorization' for its challenged conduct." Id., 471 U.S. at 64 (quoting Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. 389, 415, 55 L. Ed. 2d 364, 98 S. Ct. 1123 (1978) (plurality opinion)) It is sufficient that the legislature "'contemplated the kind of action complained of.'" Lafayette, 435 U.S. at 415 (plurality opinion) (citation omitted); see also Capital Telephone Co. v. New York Telephone Co., 750 F.2d 1154, 1162 (2d Cir. 1984). Here, however, HN7[] it is clear from the language and history of Chapter 514 that the exclusion of chiropractors from health care service plans was not merely contemplated by the State of Iowa, but compelled.

Health care service corporations were first authorized to provide medical and surgical service plans to subscribers in 1945. [9] 1945 Iowa Acts Ch. 209, [16] § 1. This law limited the authorized plans to the services of "physicians and surgeons, osteopathic physicians, or posteopathic physicians and surgeons." Id. The legislature on several occasions has expanded this authorization to include other services. Dental services were added in 1955. 1955 Iowa Acts Ch. 244, § 1. In 1965 podiatric services were added. 1965 Iowa Acts Ch. 397, § 1. Pharmaceutical services were added in 1967, 1967 Iowa Acts Ch. 369, § 1, and two years later optometric services were added. 1969 Iowa Acts Ch. 271, § 1. It was not until 1986, however, that the Iowa legislature chose to include chiropractic services within those services authorized to be provided by health care service corporations. 1986 Iowa Acts Ch. 1180, § 3. We agree with the district court that "the omission of any mention of chiropractic coverage [until 1986] in Chapter 514 directly suggests that the legislature intended to prohibit coverage of their activities by health care service corporations." HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at 990.

This interpretation of Chapter 514 is [17] supported by opinions issued by both the Attorney General and the Governor of Iowa. In March 1979 the Iowa Attorney General stated:

> Being creatures of statutes, service corporations under Section 514.1 can contract for these services only and only with those persons or entities listed in Chapter 514; hospitals or corporations, associations, or individuals providing hospital service; physicians and surgeons; dentists; podiatrists; osteopathic physicians and surgeons; pharmacies; and optometrists.

Op. Att'y Gen. (Mar. 31, 1979). Later that year, Governor Robert D. Ray opined that "eligibility for [chiropractic] benefit under Chapter 514 is prevented as a matter of law" and "eligibility for Blue Cross and Blue Shield benefits must be by statutory revision." II Iowa Admin. Bull., No. 9, at 527 (1979). Iowa law as of 1980 clearly excluded chiropractic services from coverage in health care service corporations. We therefore conclude that the Blues' conduct in excluding chiropractors from their health care service plans was undertaken pursuant to a clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed policy of the State of Iowa.

Turning to the second prong under Midcal, active state supervision, [18] we conclude [*1027] that Iowa actively supervises the health care service corporations' conduct under its regulatory scheme. Not only does the statute require each corporation to report annually to the Commissioner and remain subject to examination, but the Commissioner also approves every contract entered into by the corporations, including the actual rates charged to the subscribers. The Commissioner's role and authority in reviewing contracts and rates is quite different from the regulatory programs considered in Midcal, 324 Liquor Corp., and Patrick, where the Court found no active state supervision. In those cases, the state neither established nor reviewed the alleged anticompetitive conduct, and did not "monitor market conditions or engage in any 'pointed reexamination' of the program." Midcal, 445 U.S. at 106 (quoting Bates v. State Bar, 433 U.S. 350, 362, 53 L. Ed. 2d 810, 97 S. Ct. 2691 (1977)); see Patrick, 56 U.S.L.W.

We do not find the question of whether the Blues in practice reimbursed their subscribers for the services of nonparticipating providers to be particularly relevant to the question of whether Chapter 514 authorizes the Blues to include chiropractors within their plans.

[9] Chapter 514, as originally enacted in 1939, authorized hospital service plans only. 1939 Iowa Acts Ch. 222, § 1.

at 4432; 324 Liquor Corp., 107 S. Ct. at 726 (1987). Here, by contrast, the Commissioner's supervision is extensive and continuing, and is much more than a "gauzy cloak of state involvement" cast over the health care service corporations' activities. Cf. Midcal, 445 U.S. [19] at 106 (state legislated resale wine-pricing maintenance program not actively supervised by state itself). The Commissioner reviews all contracts of the Blues and has the authority to disapprove any provider contracts between the Blues and chiropractors. We thus conclude that HN8[] Iowa Code Chapter 514 satisfies both prongs of the Midcal state action test. The district court did not err in holding that the Blues' compliance with the legislative mandate of Iowa to "refuse to deal" with chiropractors is exempt from antitrust scrutiny under the state action doctrine. [10]

[20] B

We next consider HCEC's argument that the district court erred in dismissing its § 2 monopolization claim against the Blues under the McCarran-Ferguson Act. HCEC alleged that the Blues had monopolized, attempted to monopolize, and conspired to monopolize "the health care insurance business in Iowa." Specifically, HCEC alleged that the Blues "have taken over coverage of groups of patients previously afforded third party coverage for chiropractic services by private insurers, thereby creating an economic bias favoring competing medical doctors, depriving the insured Iowans of a reasonable election between chiropractic and medical health care, and depriving [HCEC's assignors] of patients and income." The district court dismissed these allegations, concluding that the Blues were exempt from scrutiny under § 2 of the Sherman Act pursuant to the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1011-1015, because the Blues were engaged in the "business of insurance" and regulated by state law. HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at 993-95.

[*1028] The HN10[] McCarran-Ferguson Act removes from antitrust scrutiny all conduct which is (1) part of the "business of insurance," (2) regulated by state law, and (3) not in the [21] form of coercion, intimidation, or boycott. 15 U.S.C. §§ 1012(b), 1013(b); Hahn v. Oregon Physicians Service, 689 F.2d 840, 841-42 (9th Cir. 1982); Virginia Academy of Clinical Psychologists v. Blue Shield, 624 F.2d 476, 483 (4th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 916, 67 L. Ed. 2d 342, 101 S. Ct. 1360 (1981). The first question is thus whether the Blues' conduct in allegedly monopolizing the market for health care services in Iowa is part of the "business of insurance." The Supreme Court has set forth HN11[] three factors to examine in determining whether a particular practice is part of the "business of insurance": (1) whether the practice has the effect of transferring or spreading a policyholder's risk, (2) whether the practice is an integral part of the policy relationship between the insurer and the insured, and (3) whether the practice is limited to entities within the insurance industry. Union Labor Life Insurance Co. v. Pireno, 458 U.S. 119, 129, 73 L. Ed. 2d 647, 102 S. Ct. 3002 (1982); Group Life & Health Insurance Co. v. Royal Drug Co., 440 U.S. 205, 59 L. Ed. 2d 261, 99 S. Ct. 1067 (1979). While each of these factors is a relevant consideration in evaluating whether a practice is part of the "business of insurance," "none of these criteria is necessarily determinative [22] in itself." Pireno, 458 U.S. at 129.

---

[10] Implicit in this holding is our view that HN9[] § 1013(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act does not express a congressional intent to subject state-authorized boycott activity to the antitrust laws where conducted as part of a state-regulated "business of insurance." This question was left open by the Supreme Court in St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Barry, 438 U.S. 531, 554, 57 L. Ed. 2d 932, 98 S. Ct. 2923 n.27 (1978) ("We have no occasion here to decide whether the element of state regulatory direction or authorization of the particular practice, absent in this case, is a factor to be considered in the definition of 'boycott' within the meaning of [15 U.S.C. § 1013(b)], or whether it comes into play as part of a possible defense under the 'state action' doctrine as elaborated in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S. Ct. 307 (1943), and its progeny"). But see Ballard v. Blue Shield, 543 F.2d 1075, 1079 (4th Cir. 1976) ("Section 1013(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act expresses congressional intention to subject boycotts by insurance companies to the Sherman Act. Consequently, there can be no justification for utilizing the principles of Parker v. Brown to impute a contrary intent to Congress.") (footnote omitted). Ballard made clear that West Virginia law specifically authorizes the defendant companies to insure the costs of chiropractic treatment, but the defendants elected not to provide this coverage. 543 F.2d at 1079. It seems to us unduly anomalous to suggest that Congress, in a statute intended to exempt state-regulated insurance practices from the antitrust laws, see Royal Drug, 440 U.S. at 218 n.18, intended to subject to the antitrust laws conduct by insurance companies that would be exempt from scrutiny if engaged in by any other entity.

In applying these three factors to the present case, we emphasize that we consider only the § 2 aspect of HCEC's complaint which alleges that the Blues have monopolized the Iowa health insurance market, thereby injuring HCEC by reducing the market share of those insurance companies who cover chiropractic services. These allegations are essentially aimed at the contractual relationship between the Blues as insurers and their Iowa subscribers as insureds. We conclude that these contracts with subscribers, and the extent to which the Blues may have attained a dominant position in the market for these contracts, are an integral part of the "business of insurance" within the meaning of the McCarran-Ferguson Act.

The contracts between the Blues and their subscribers clearly have the effect of transferring or spreading a subscriber's risk. Subscribers pay a fixed premium to the Blues, unrelated to the actual health care expenses which are borne by the Blues. This is a classic insurance relationship. In this respect, the Blues' contracts with their subscribers may be sharply contrasted with their contracts with participating health care providers. [23] In Royal Drug, the Court characterized the Blues' contracts with their providers as "merely arrangements for the purchase of goods and services by Blue Shield." Royal Drug, 440 U.S. at 214. The Court also observed that provider contracts were not between the insurer and the insured, but rather involved the insurer and a third party. Id. at 215-16. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the provider contracts were not a part of the "business of insurance" under the McCarran-Ferguson Act. Id. The Court was careful, however, to distinguish the Blues' provider contracts from their subscriber contracts: "This is not to say that the contracts offered by Blue Shield to its policyholders, as distinguished from its provider agreements . . ., may not be the 'business of insurance' within the meaning of the [McCarran-Ferguson] Act." Id. at 230 n.37. This distinction was also noted in the dissenting opinion of Justice Brennan:

> I start with common ground. Neither the Court nor the parties challenge the fact that the . . . policy offered by Blue Shield to its policyholders -- as distinguished from the contract between Blue Shield and the [providers] -- is the "business of insurance." [24] Whatever the merits of scholastic argument over the technical definition of "insurance," the policy both transfers and distributes risk. The policyholder pays a sum certain -- the premium -- against the risk of the uncertain contingency of illness, and if the company has calculated correctly, the premiums of those who do not fall ill pay the [*1029] costs of benefits above the premiums of those who do.

Id. at 239 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (citation omitted). We find this distinction to be of critical importance in assessing whether the Blues' subscriber contracts are the "business of insurance." Unlike the provider contracts, pursuant to which the Blues merely procure services from providers for their subscribers, the subscriber contracts involve the sharing and spreading of risk.

Turning to the second and third factors under Pireno, it is clear that the contracts between the Blues and their subscribers are "an integral part of the policy relationship between the insurer and the insured" and that these contracts are "limited to entities within the insurance industry." Indeed, these contracts are the policy relationship between the insurer and insured, and, by definition, are limited [25] to insurance entities. We conclude that the contractual relationship between the Blues and their subscribers is part of the "business of insurance" within the meaning of the McCarran-Ferguson Act.

Focusing on the second aspect of exemption under the McCarran-Ferguson Act, we have little difficulty in concluding that the contractual relationship between the Blues and their subscribers is regulated by state law. As discussed above, these contracts, as well as the rates contained in them, are approved by the Iowa Commissioner of Insurance. See Iowa Code, §§ 514.6,.7. Finally, HCEC's claim that the Blues monopolized, attempted, and conspired to monopolize the Iowa health care insurance market does not allege that the Blues' conduct took the form of coercion, intimidation, or boycott within the meaning of the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1013(b). [11] Accordingly, we conclude that the district court did not err in dismissing HCEC's § 2 monopolization claim against the Blues as exempt under the McCarran-Ferguson Act.

[26] III

HCEC's next point on appeal is that the district court erred in granting the ACR's motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. HCEC asserted jurisdiction over the ACR pursuant to the Iowa long-arm statute, [12] which provides in relevant part:

> HN12[] If a foreign corporation . . . commits a tort in whole or in part in Iowa against a resident of Iowa, such acts shall be deemed to be doing business in Iowa by such foreign corporation for the purpose of service of process or original notice on such foreign corporation under this section, and, if the corporation does not have a registered agent or agents in the state of Iowa, shall be deemed to constitute the appointment of the secretary of state of the state of Iowa to be its true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful process or original notice in actions or proceedings arising from or growing out of such . . . tort.

Iowa Code § 617.3 (Supp. 1988). The district court assumed, for purposes of its analysis, that the ACR's alleged conduct fell within the Iowa long-arm statute, but concluded that the exercise of personal jurisdiction over the ACR would not be consistent with due process. HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at [27] 984-86.

On the basis of unrebutted testimony, the district court found the following facts regarding the ACR's contacts with Iowa:

> [*1030] ACR has no office in Iowa, is not licensed to do business in Iowa, has no agent or property in Iowa, makes no purchases in Iowa, and has held no seminars, workshops or other meetings in Iowa. The governing body of the organization, the Board of Chancellors, has never met in Iowa and no employees of ACR reside in Iowa. Even though [HCEC] alleges in its resistance that ACR is involved in an ongoing process of certifying radiologists and hospitals, it offers no supporting evidence. The Court finds on the basis of [a] supplemental affidavit attached to ACR's reply memorandum that ACR is not involved in the licensing, certifying or accreditation of hospitals or radiologists. ACR has less than 1% of its membership residing in Iowa. It makes membership mailings but does not "solicit, [28] advertise, promote, or otherwise conduct any of its activities in Iowa", although some of its mailings go to persons who are not members.

Id. at 980-81. [13] The district court concluded that these facts did not demonstrate sufficient "minimum contacts" between the ACR and the State of Iowa so that the assertion of personal jurisdiction over the ACR would be

---

[11] HCEC did not allege that the Blues' boycott of chiropractors was related to the alleged monopolization by the Blues of the health care insurance market. We also understand HCEC to allege that the Blues attempted and conspired with their co-defendants to monopolize the health care provider market by refusing to include chiropractors within their health care service plans. In view of our holding in Part IIA that this conduct was exempted from liability on HCEC's boycott claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act due to the state action doctrine, we similarly conclude that the allegations under § 2 of the Sherman Act of attempt and conspiracy to monopolize by the same conduct were also properly dismissed under the state action doctrine.

[12] HCEC also asserted jurisdiction over the ACR pursuant to § 12 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 22. The district court concluded that this provision did not support jurisdiction over the ACR, HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at 980-82, and HCEC has not appealed from this ruling.

[13] Although HCEC was allowed eight months in which to conduct discovery relevant to its assertion of jurisdiction over the ACR, HCEC apparently presented no evidence in opposition to the ACR's motion to dismiss. Although HCEC argues that evidence discovered several years after the district court dismissed the ACR as a party suggests that it had jurisdiction over the ACR, we will not consider on appeal a theory of jurisdiction or evidence which was not before the district court and which was developed consistent with "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." Id.; see International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316, 90 L. Ed. 95, 66 S. Ct. 154 (1945).

[29] HN13[] In determining whether there are sufficient minimum contacts to satisfy due process, we focus on the "'relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation.'" Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408, 414, 80 L. Ed. 2d 404, 104 S. Ct. 1868 (1984) (quoting Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186, 204, 53 L. Ed. 2d 683, 97 S. Ct. 2569 (1977)); Institutional Food Marketing Assocs., Ltd. v. Golden State Strawberries, Inc., 747 F.2d 448, 455 (8th Cir. 1984). This inquiry involves a consideration of five factors: (1) the nature and quality of the defendant's contacts with the forum state; (2) the quantity of the defendant's contacts with the forum state; (3) the relation of the cause of action to the defendant's contacts with the forum state; (4) the interest of the forum state in providing a forum for its residents; and (5) the convenience of the parties. Institutional Food Marketing, 747 F.2d at 455; Scullin Steel Co. v. National Ry. Utilization Corp., 676 F.2d 309, 313 n.4 (8th Cir. 1982). The first three factors are of paramount importance. Id.; Aaron Ferer & Sons Co. v. American Compressed Steel Co., 564 F.2d 1206, 1210 n.5 (8th Cir. 1977).

Reviewing the nature and quality of the ACR's contacts with [30] Iowa, we agree with the district court that "the only contacts ACR had established with Iowa related to the existence and servicing of resident members" of the ACR. HCEC v. IMS, 501 F. Supp. at 985. The quality of these contacts was nothing more than the residence of ACR members in Iowa and the mailing of materials related to membership into the state. Under the second factor, the ACR's contacts with Iowa were also quite limited. About one hundred and twenty ACR members reside in Iowa, making up less than one percent of the total ACR membership. The third factor is equally unsupportive of jurisdiction because the ACR's contacts with Iowa, i.e., the residence of members and membership mailings, are greatly attenuated from HCEC's allegations against the ACR. These allegations center on the ACR's adoption of a code of ethical principles for its members based upon the Principles of Medical Ethics of the American Medical Association, which prohibits professional association with chiropractors. HCEC draws no direct connection between the [*1031] ACR's adoption of its code of ethical principles and the ACR's limited activities in Iowa. We do not find any considerations that suggest that the [31] ACR's "'conduct and connection with the forum State are such that [the ACR] should reasonably [have] anticipate[d] being haled into court there.'" Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 474, 85 L. Ed. 2d 528, 105 S. Ct. 2174 (1985) (quoting World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286, 292, 62 L. Ed. 2d 490, 100 S. Ct. 559 (1980)). We hold that the district court did not err in concluding that it could not exercise personal jurisdiction over the ACR on HCEC's allegations. [14]

IV

HCEC's third argument is that the district court erred in granting summary judgment to the IHA. HCEC alleged in its complaint that the IHA, as a "state-wide trade association in the health care field" and "an affiliated constituent society of the AMA composed of hospitals in the State of Iowa," conspired to boycott chiropractors by refusing to permit its member hospitals "to deal in goods or services with chiropractic doctors operating within the terms of their Iowa licenses." The IHA denied [32] these allegations in an affidavit asserting that (1) the IHA is not affiliated with the AMA, (2) the IHA has absolutely no authority or control over its member hospitals either in promulgating rules for its member hospitals or in determining the policies of its member hospitals with regard to staff or clinical privileges, and (3) the IHA has no rules or policies against the granting of staff or clinical privileges to chiropractors. HCEC, which failed to depose any representative of the IHA, attempted to rebut the IHA's affidavit with evidence tending to show that on one occasion a representative of one hospital met with a representative of the IHA regarding an application by a chiropractor for hospital privileges. The district court concluded that this evidence after the ACR had been dismissed as a party. Universe Tankships, Inc. v. United States, 528 F.2d 73, 76 (3d Cir. 1975); Ludwig v. Marion Laboratories, Inc., 465 F.2d 114, 117 (8th Cir. 1972).

---

[14] Because we conclude that the ACR did not have sufficient minimum contacts with Iowa to satisfy due process requirements, we do not reach the district court's assumption that the ACR's alleged conduct fell within the Iowa long-arm statute, Iowa Code § 617.3.

failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact precluding the entry of judgment under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 [15] in favor of the IHA.

[33] We begin our consideration of the district court's application of Rule 56 with a review of recent Supreme Court decisions on the legal standards applicable to motions for summary judgment in antitrust cases. The Court has said that "summary HN15[] judgment procedure is properly regarded not as a disfavored procedural shortcut, but rather as an integral part of the Federal Rules as a whole, which are designed 'to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action.'" Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 327, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265, 106 S. Ct. 2548 (1986) (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 1). To survive a motion for summary judgment, the non-moving party "must establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether [the moving party] entered into an illegal conspiracy that caused [the non-moving party] to suffer a cognizable injury." Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 585-86, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986) (citations omitted). "Second, the issue of fact must be 'genuine.' When the moving party has carried its burden [of demonstrating the absence of a genuine issue of material fact], its opponent must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material [34] facts." Id. at 586 (citations omitted). "The non-moving party must come forward with 'specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.'" Id. at 587 (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e)) (emphasis in Matsushita). [*1032] HN16[] Finally, "antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case. . . . To survive a motion for summary judgment or for a directed verdict, a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of § 1 must present evidence 'that tends to exclude the possibility' that the alleged conspirators acted independently." Id. at 588 (quoting Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984)). Most significantly for this case, the non-moving party "must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed" the non-moving party. Id.

In applying the above principles to the facts before us, we conclude that summary judgment was properly entered. HCEC's evidence to the effect that an IHA-member hospital once consulted the IHA about a chiropractor seeking staff privileges does not rise above the level of [35] a "metaphysical doubt" as to whether IHA, an entity with no other connections to the other members of the alleged conspiracy, was actually engaged in a conspiracy to boycott chiropractors. HCEC's evidence certainly did not tend to exclude the possibility that the IHA acted independently or in a manner that could not have harmed HCEC. On the evidence in the record, an inference of conspiracy is no more reasonable than an inference that the IHA was not a part of any concerted activity to boycott chiropractors. The district court did not err in "secur[ing] the just, speedy and inexpensive determination" of this action by granting summary judgment in favor of the IHA.

V

The judgment of the district court is affirmed. [16]

End of Document

---

[15] Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e) provides, in relevant part:

> HN14[] When a motion for summary judgment is made and supported as provided in this rule, an adverse party may not rest upon the mere allegations or denials of the adverse party's pleading, but the adverse party's response, by affidavits or as otherwise provided in this rule, must set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. If the adverse party does not so respond, summary judgment, if appropriate, shall be entered against the adverse party.

[16] Because our disposition of this case leaves no defendants remaining in the case, HCEC's allegation that the district court erred in denying its motion for summary judgment is moot. We similarly have no occasion to consider appellees' argument as an alternative ground for affirmance that HCEC lacks standing or the capacity to bring this suit. Accordingly, "cross-appeal" No. 87-1015 is dismissed. [36]

LexisNexis®

Drabbant Enterprises, Inc. v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co.

United States District Court for the District of Delaware

June 27, 1988

Civil Action No. 88-215 LON

Reporter
688 F. Supp. 1567 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7236 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,175

DRABBANT ENTERPRISES, INC., a Delaware corporation, t/a PAREE CLAREE BEAUTY SALON, and FRONT STREET PROPERTIES, a New York general partnership, and DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE OF THE STATE OF DELAWARE, as Parens Patriae of the Citizens of the State of Delaware Residing In and Around the Milford Area, and on behalf of the Town of Milford, Plaintiffs, v. THE GREAT ATLANTIC & PACIFIC TEA COMPANY, INC., a Maryland corporation, Defendant

Disposition: [1] The motion for a preliminary injunction is denied.

Core Terms

shopping center, lease, restrictive covenant, supermarket, market share, premises, geographic, monopoly, tenants, monopolization, preliminary injunction, Fresh, probability of success, probability, departure, covenant, food, consumers, interstate commerce, deposition, memorandum, Sherman Act, imminent, markets, concerted action, anticompetitive, distance, argues, occupy, irreparable injury

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Contracts Law > Types of Contracts > Covenants

Real Property Law > Encumbrances > Restrictive Covenants > General Overview

HN1[] Types of Contracts, Covenants

Covenants to restrict land use are enforced only if reasonable and equitable. Under certain circumstances, restrictive covenants that protect the grantee from competition from competitors will be upheld so long as they are reasonable in both scope and geography.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN2[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

The Delaware Antitrust Act, Del. Code Ann. tit. 6, § 2113, requires that the state law be construed in harmony with the interpretation of the federal antitrust law.

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN3[] Injunctions, Grounds for Injunctions

The standards for granting or denying a motion for a preliminary injunction are well established. A preliminary injunction is not granted as a matter of right. It is an extraordinary remedy and must be sparingly granted. In order to obtain a preliminary injunction, the moving party must show (1) a reasonable probability of eventual success in the litigation, and (2) that irreparable injury will ensue if relief is not granted. In addition, the court may consider (3) the possibility of harm to other interested persons from the grant or denial of relief, and (4) the public interest. Merely establishing a risk of irreparable harm is not enough. Rather, the moving party has the burden of proving a clear showing of immediate irreparable injury.

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN4[] Injunctions, Grounds for Injunctions

Where the moving party is asserting what is essentially economic injury, he must meet a more stringent standard to show that the harm is peculiar or special. Where the alleged harm is economic, the threshold of peculiarity that the proposed action threatens must be high, because purely economic injuries are generally compensable and do not require injunctive relief. The court went on to note that particularized proof of the direct harm caused by the defendant was necessary in order for the plaintiffs to demonstrate that the threatened injury was sufficiently peculiar.

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > General Overview

Torts > ... > General Premises Liability > Types of Premises > Stores

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN5[] Injunctions, Grounds for Injunctions

Purely economic injuries are generally compensable and do not require injunctive relief.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

In order for the court to have jurisdiction over a federal antitrust claim, the allegedly illegal conduct must either be in the flow of interstate commerce or, though occurring on a local level, substantially affect interstate commerce. The second test is considered from the perspective of whether the local activity has a significant impact on competition in commerce and whether the commerce so affected is substantial in volume.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Real Property Law > Encumbrances > Restrictive Covenants > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN7[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Sherman Act

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, provides that every contract, combination or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states is declared to be illegal. Although the statute's language seems all encompassing, the court construes it as prohibiting only those contracts or combinations which unreasonably restrain competition. Consequently, plaintiffs must prove: (1) that the defendants contracted, combined, or conspired among each other; (2) that the combination or conspiracy produced adverse, anti-competitive effects within relevant products and geographic markets; (3) that the objects of and the conduct pursuant to the contract or conspiracy were illegal; and (4) that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of the conspiracy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN8[] Sherman Act, Claims

In order for the plaintiffs to be granted relief based upon a Sherman Act violation under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, the plaintiffs must show a probability of success of establishing all of the requisite elements of such a claim. In particular, the plaintiffs must establish that the defendant was involved in concerted action in its attempt to restrain trade. In order to do this, the plaintiffs must present evidence from which the trier of fact could reasonably infer that the defendant and others had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective. There must be direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the defendants and others had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN9[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

For purposes of evaluating a Sherman Act claim under 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, the relevant geographic and product markets must be established.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN10[] Sherman Act, Claims

In order for the plaintiffs to establish that the defendant violated the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, by achieving a monopoly, the plaintiffs must show: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant geographic and product markets; and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of superior product, business acumen or historic accident. The court recognizes that market share is a primary indication of whether monopoly power exists.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN11[] Sherman Act, Claims

In order for the plaintiffs to establish a Sherman Act claim under 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 for attempted monopolization, they must show: (1) a specific intent to monopolize; and (2) the consequent dangerous probability of success within the relevant geographic and product markets. As to proving the requisite intent, the court explains that a mere intention to prevail over rivals or improve market position is insufficient. Even an intent to perform acts that can be objectively viewed as tending toward the acquisition of monopoly power is insufficient, unless it also appears that the acts were not predominately motivated by legitimate business aims.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

While market share may be considered by a court in determining whether there is a dangerous probability of monopoly under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, it is not determinative. The court may also consider other market characteristics such as the strength of the competition, the probable development of the industry, the barriers to entry, the nature of the anticompetitive conduct and the elasticity of consumer demand.

Counsel: William Prickett, Esquire (argued), Norman L. Pernick, Esquire and Joseph Grey, Esquire of Prickett, Jones, Elliott, Kristol & Schnee, Wilmington, Delaware, Attorneys for Plaintiffs.

Donald J. Wolfe, Esquire (argued), Willie J. Marsden, Jr., Esquire, Arthur L. Dent, Esquire and David L. Baumberger, Esquire of Potter Anderson & Corroon, Wilmington, Delaware, Attorneys for Defendant.

Michael F. Foster, Esquire, State Solicitor, and William W. Erhart, Esquire (argued), Department of Justice, Wilmington, Delaware, as Parens Patriae of the Citizens of the State of Delaware, residing in and around the Milford Area, Town of Milford.

Judges: Longobardi, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: LONGOBARDI

Opinion

[*1568] LONGOBARDI, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

I. NATURE OF THE PROCEEDINGS

On April 21, 1988, Front Street Properties, a New York general partnership, ("Front Street") and Drabbant Enterprises, Inc. ("Drabbant") filed a lawsuit against the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company ("A&P") seeking a preliminary injunction and declaratory relief. Plaintiffs seek to enjoin A&P from enforcing a restrictive covenant in its lease. In addition, Plaintiffs are also seeking a declaration that the restrictive covenant is unenforceable and that Defendant [2] is in breach of its lease due to its abandonment of the leased premises. On May 23, 1988, the Court granted a motion by the Attorney General of the State of Delaware to intervene on behalf of the citizens of Milford.

Briefing on Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction has been completed on an accelerated basis and oral argument [*1569] was heard on June 9, 1988. What follows is the Court's decision on Plaintiffs' motion.

II. BACKGROUND

The Milford Shopping Center was built in 1961. Safeway Stores, Inc. ("Safeway") was the first supermarket tenant in the shopping center. Approximately two months after Safeway entered into its lease, A&P entered into the lease at issue for other space in the shopping center. This lease contained, among other covenants, the following restrictive covenant:

> The lessor obligates himself not to lease, rent or permit to be occupied as a supermarket, grocery store, meat market, produce store or dairy store, except bakery and Safeway Food Market of 14,845 square feet, any property owned or to be owned by him within 2,000 feet of the demised premises herein described during the term of this lease or any extension thereof. This shall be taken as a covenant [3] running with the land that is or may be owned by the lessor within 2,000 feet of the demised premises, not merely a personal obligation of the lessor.

(hereinafter the "Restrictive Covenant"). The A&P lease was amended several times over the life of its term. One of the amendments that impacts upon this litigation extended the term an additional fifteen years, granted A&P the right to renew for four additional five year periods and reflected the subsequent enlargement of the leased premises.

In 1977, Safeway chose not to continue its lease. It moved to a new location in the Milford Village Shopping Center ("Milford Village") approximately two miles from the Milford Shopping Center.

In October, 1979, the landlord notified A&P that it intended to lease the old Safeway premises to B. Green, Inc. ("B. Green") in order to place another supermarket in the shopping center. A&P, however, sought to enforce the Restrictive Covenant against B. Green. Although B. Green brought an action in state court seeking to have the Restrictive Covenant declared unenforceable, the suit was subsequently dismissed without prejudice.

The Milford Shopping Center was bought in 1986 by Front Street, a Plaintiff [4] in this action. All of the leases in the shopping center were reviewed by Andrew Kaplan, a general partner of Front Street.

In April, 1987, A&P renewed its lease for five years but began looking for an alternate site for its supermarket. As a result, A&P opened discussions with Safeway for the purchase of three of its stores, including the one in Milford Village. In June of 1987, A&P transferred control of the property in the Milford Shopping Center to its wholly-owned division, Super Fresh. As a result, the store was converted to a Super Fresh store. In July, 1987, A&P completed its purchase of the Safeway property in Milford Village. On August 28, 1987, A&P closed down its Super Fresh operations in the Milford Shopping Center and moved the operations to the newly purchased property in the Milford Village. Since that time, A&P has paid its rent on the leased premises at the Milford Shopping Center but has kept it empty and has insisted on its continued right to enforce the Restrictive Covenant on the premises formerly occupied by the Safeway store.

In the interim, Plaintiff Front Street was able to let the old Safeway property in the Milford Shopping Center to an auto parts store. [5] In February of this year, Front Street filed a complaint in the Justice of the Peace Court of the State of Delaware, in and for Kent County, against A&P for summary possession of the property. Plaintiff voluntarily dismissed the action. At the same time, Front Street has been searching for a new supermarket tenant for the old Safeway premises in the Milford Shopping Center and has successfully negotiated with its auto parts tenant to move the auto parts store to an alternate location in the shopping center at Plaintiff's option. On April 28, 1988, Plaintiffs filed this action seeking relief from A&P's actions based upon federal and state claims.

III. CONTENTIONS OF THE PARTIES

A. State Law Claims

Plaintiffs set forth a number of arguments in support of their claim that Defendant [*1570] A&P is unreasonably and illegally enforcing its Restrictive Covenant. Plaintiffs first argue that the Restrictive Covenant applies to any "property" within 2,000 square feet of the A&P premises except the 16,275 square feet formerly occupied by Safeway Food Market. Docket Item ("D.I.)" 21, at 50-51. Plaintiffs contend that the plain meaning of the words used in the covenant require such a reading [6] and that it is illogical to argue, as does the Defendant, that the exemption from the use restriction would only apply to the Safeway business rather than the property itself. Moreover, even if the language could be construed as ambiguous, it is settled law in Delaware that any ambiguity in a restrictive covenant is to be resolved in favor of unrestricted land use.

Plaintiffs alternatively argue that the Restrictive Covenant as interpreted by Defendant is unenforceable as a matter of Delaware law. HN1[] Covenants to restrict land use are enforced only if reasonable and equitable. No one disputes that under certain circumstances restrictive covenants which protect the grantee from competition from competitors will be upheld so long as they are reasonable in both scope and geography. However, the Restrictive Covenant in question, if it is interpreted to exempt only the now defunct Safeway store, would be unreasonable and inequitable. Plaintiffs contend that A&P can claim no legitimate purpose for continuing to enforce the Restrictive Covenant under the present circumstances. Because A&P has vacated the Milford Shopping Center without any intention of ever returning or subleasing its premises [7] to another supermarket, Plaintiffs contend A&P cannot now be heard to enforce the Restrictive Covenant because the covenant cannot possibly compromise A&P's now defunct operation in the Milford Shopping Center. Id. In all other respects, Plaintiffs contend, the Restrictive Covenant is unreasonable.

Plaintiffs next contend that they are entitled to summary possession because A&P is in breach of its lease. D.I. 21 at 59. The lease which A&P signed with Front Street's predecessor in 1961 provided that A&P would operate as an "anchor tenant" in the Milford Shopping Center "for the purpose of a general merchandise business." D.I. 25A at 9. On November 12, 1971, the original lease was amended to read in pertinent part "lessee shall continue to occupy the premises under the terms of the extended lease . . . ." Id. (emphasis added). A&P, they allege, is in breach of its lease because it has, without warning, deliberately vacated its premises which, under the lease, it had a duty to continuously occupy and operate as an anchor tenant. They also allege that the economic viability of the satellite stores depends upon the continued operation of at least one supermarket.

Plaintiffs further [8] argue that A&P has breached its duty of good faith and fair dealings. Plaintiffs contend that A&P has acted in bad faith both with respect to its obligations under the lease as well as with regard to its dealings with the other tenants and consumers at the Milford Shopping Center. In support of its argument, Plaintiffs contend that while A&P has been looking for an alternate site for its supermarket for over ten years, it never intimated that fact to the Plaintiffs or the consumers in Milford. D.I. 21 at 67. Moreover, once A&P vacated their premises in the Milford Shopping Center abruptly and without notice, A&P persisted in making no affirmative efforts to assign or sublet the premises until Plaintiffs initiated its summary possession action in February of 1988. Id. at 68. In conclusion, Plaintiffs argue that A&P's breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealings alone warrants a cancellation of its lease and an immediate return of its premises to Front Street.

Defendant, on the other hand, argues that Plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate a probability of success on any of their state law claims. Defendant first argues that its lease with Front Street contains neither [9] an express nor an implied covenant to continuously operate a supermarket on the premises. While Defendant concedes that its lease provides that it shall "continue to occupy the premises" in the Milford Shopping Center, that language does not impose [*1571] upon A&P the duty to continuously operate a supermarket on the premises. Rather, a temporary vacancy of the leased property is permissible while A&P seeks a subtenant. D.I. 25 at 22.

Defendant further contends that, in the absence of express language in the lease, the Court should not imply a covenant of continuous operation. Moreover, because A&P is free to assign or sublet the premises, it would be inconsistent to impose a duty upon A&P to continuously operate its business throughout the term of its lease. Id. at 32. Finally, the Defendant argues that Plaintiff Front Street's other leases with smaller tenants contain express covenants to continuously operate and, therefore, had Front Street intended to impose such an obligation upon A&P, it could have so provided by express language.

Defendant next argues that the Restrictive Covenant is both enforceable and reasonable. The language which exempts the Safeway Store from the Covenant's [10] restrictions on the use of property surrounding A&P's premises is clear and unambiguous. The Restrictive Covenant clearly prohibits Front Street from leasing the former Safeway premises to a tenant for use as a grocery or food store during the term of A&P's lease. D.I. 25 at 34. The language of the Restrictive Covenant which excepts Safeway Food Market and Bakery from the use restrictions clearly refers only to those entities and not to the property itself.

Defendant next contends that the Restrictive Covenant is enforceable under Delaware law. Delaware courts consistently uphold restrictive covenants so long as they are reasonable under the circumstances. A&P contends that the Restrictive Covenant is limited in scope and geography and that it continues to serve a useful and valid purpose. Finally, Defendant argues that it has not breached any implied duty of good faith which Plaintiffs argue is engrafted upon every contract. D.I. 25 at 57-58. On the contrary, Plaintiffs are attempting to impose a new set of contractual obligations which are nowhere to be found in A&P's lease. In addition, Plaintiffs' repeated assertions that A&P agreed in its lease to operate as an "anchor tenant" [11] are unsupported by the terms of the lease itself. Therefore, Plaintiffs' argument as to any alleged breach of an implied duty of good faith must necessarily fail.

B. Federal Claims

The Plaintiffs allege that the Defendant has violated Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2. [1] As to three common elements of their several theories to support their contention, the Plaintiffs argue that this Court has jurisdiction to hear their antitrust claims and that they have presented enough facts to establish the relevant geographic and product markets. First, the Plaintiffs contend that this Court has jurisdiction over their federal claims because the enforcement of the Restrictive Covenant both occurs in and substantially effects interstate commerce. D.I. 21 at 33. In support of their position, Plaintiffs point out, inter alia, that a national supermarket chain's anti-competitive conduct has a substantial effect on interstate commerce; that the food sold in Defendant's stores originates from all over the country and is distributed to its stores in the Philadelphia division from warehouses in New Jersey and Maryland. The Restrictive Covenant at issue, they contend, is [12] a feature in many of the Defendant's supermarket leases and the Restrictive Covenant is directed at Defendant's competitors who ship goods in interstate commerce. Id. at 33-36.

The second and third common elements of the federal claims are their relevant markets. The Plaintiffs maintain that the relevant geographic market is the Milford Shopping Center. This proposition, they [1572] allege, is supported by the fact that the Milford Shopping Center is a small town shopping center that serves many senior and young families; that the other two shopping centers in the town are "significantly inconvenient" because of the distance and transportation barriers; and that the Milford Shopping Center is intended to be a one-stop-shopping center. D.I. 21 at 37-38; D.I. 26 at 27. [13] The Plaintiffs do suggest, alternatively, that if this Court should not agree with the Plaintiffs' position, then the Court should consider the town of Milford itself as the relevant geographic market. D.I. 21 at 38 n. Third, the Plaintiffs assert that the relevant product market is the "sale at retail of goods typically sold in supermarkets and grocery stores, including meats, produce, diary, bakery and household items." Id. at 36. [2]

Having set forth the necessary jurisdictional predicate and the relevant markets for the antitrust analysis, Plaintiffs argue that the Defendant has violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Plaintiffs attempt to satisfy the concerted action requirement for a Section 1 claim by suggesting, alternatively, that A&P has conspired with its wholly-owned subsidiary, Super Fresh, or that A&P has conspired with Safeway. Id. at 32 n.*; D.I. 26 at 30. If this Court should find concerted action, it is argued that the Defendant's conduct fails the rule of reason test. The Plaintiffs ask the Court to consider, inter alia, the facts [14] that (1) A&P exercised its option to renew the lease even though its move to another location was imminent; (2) that A&P suddenly vacated its Milford Shopping Center premises; (3)

---

[1] Plaintiffs complaint also sets forth violation of the Delaware antitrust laws, 6 Del.C. §§ 2101-2114. HN2[] The Delaware Antitrust Act requires that the state law be construed in harmony with the interpretation of the federal antitrust law. 6 Del.C. § 2113. Consequently, this Court's discussion and decision with regard to the Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims shall dictate the ruling in the Plaintiffs' state antitrust claims.

[2] The parties agree that the relevant product market is the retail food store market. Compare D.I. 25 at 55 n* with D.I. 21 at 36.

that the Defendant's motive in maintaining its lease and enforcing the Restrictive Covenant is anti-competitive; (4) that the complained of conduct has a devastating effect on the consumers in the community because A&P effectively controls the alternate supermarket locations, thus depriving many families of a local supermarket and raising prices; and (5) that A&P's absence from the Milford Shopping Center makes the enforcement of the Restrictive Covenant unreasonable and obviates the possible original economic justification for its existence. D.I. 21 at 38-47.

The Plaintiffs also allege a violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act in that the Defendant has monopolized and attempted to monopolize the retail sale of food goods in the relevant geographic market. D.I. 21 at 48. Although the claims of monopoly and attempted monopoly are separate and distinct claims, the Plaintiffs' analysis seemingly combines the two. Plaintiffs argue that they can show intent to monopolize through testimony of A&P which reveals [15] A&P's intent to capture 28% of the market share, as well as through Defendant's conduct. Furthermore, Plaintiffs contend that A&P's attempted enforcement of the Restrictive Covenant satisfies the requirement of showing an overt act aimed at achieving monopolization. Id. at 49. Finally, under this broad allegation of a Section 2 violation, Plaintiffs maintain that they can establish a dangerous probability of A&P achieving monopolization since the Defendant admits it hoped to achieve a 28% market share in Milford since Defendant "no doubt intends to aggressively attempt to increase its share of the Milford market of food dollars" and since Acme, which presently possesses 36% of the market share "could also possibly leave Milford or suffer serious deterioration of market share, in which case A&P is positioned to fall into a monopoly position." D.I. 21 at 49; D.I. 26 at 33-34.

Needless to say, the Defendant raises several arguments in support of its denial that it has violated the Sherman Act. [3] A& [1573] P contends that this Court must conclude that the relevant geographic market is the Milford area for two reasons: the Plaintiffs' own market share data is based upon this assumption and it [16] is unreasonable to conclude that a consumer would only look to the Milford Shopping Center for the goods sought. D.I. 25 n.

The Defendant argues, furthermore, that the Plaintiffs' Section 1 claim must fail for two reasons. First, the Plaintiffs are unable to prove concerted action [17] between A&P and either Super Fresh or Safeway. Id. at 50; D.I. 29 at 47-48. Second, the Restrictive Covenant satisfies the rule of reason test since it only applies to the Milford Shopping Center and alternative sites are available.

Similarly, the Defendant maintains that Plaintiffs' Section 2 claims must also fail. The Defendant argues that, as a matter of law, Plaintiffs' Section 2 monopolization claim must fail because Plaintiffs allege that A&P has captured only 28% of the market. D.I. 25 at 56. Furthermore, relief cannot be granted on the attempted monopolization claim because Plaintiffs have failed to establish the requisite intent and dangerous probability that A&P will be successful in achieving a monopoly. Id. at 57.

IV. DISCUSSION OF LAW

HN3[] The standards for granting or denying a motion for a preliminary injunction are well established. A preliminary injunction is not granted as a matter of right. Norfolk Southern Corp. v. Oberly, 594 F. Supp. 514, 519 (D.Del. 1984), citing Eli Lilly and Co. v. Premo Pharmaceutical Labs., 630 F.2d 120, 136 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1014, 66 L. Ed. 2d 473, 101 S. Ct. 573, 208 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 88 (1980). It is an extraordinary remedy and must be sparingly granted. Norfolk Southern [18] Corp., 594 F. Supp. at 514, citing Dorfmann v. Boozer, 134 U.S. App. D.C. 272, 414 F.2d 1168 (D.C.Cir. 1969); Wyrough & Loser, Inc. v. Pelmor Laboratories, Inc., 376 F.2d 543, 547 (3d Cir. 1967). In order to obtain a preliminary injunction, the moving party must show "(1) a reasonable probability of eventual success in the litigation, and (2) that irreparable injury will ensue if relief is not granted. In addition, the court may consider (3) the possibility of harm to other interested persons from the grant or denial of relief, and (4) the public interest." Kennecott Corp. v. Smith, 637 F.2d 181, 187 (3d Cir. 1980), citing Constructors Ass'n of Western Pennsylvania v. Kreps, 573 F.2d 811, 815 (3d Cir. 1978); Delaware River Port Auth. v. Transamerican Trail. Tr., Inc., 501 F.2d 917, 919-20 (3d Cir. 1974). Merely establishing a risk of irreparable harm is not enough. ECRI v. McGraw-Hill, Inc., 809 F.2d 223, 226 (3d Cir. 1987). Rather, the moving party has the burden of proving a "clear showing of immediate irreparable injury." Id., quoting Continental Group, Inc. v. Amoco Chem. Corp., 614 F.2d 351, 359 (3d Cir. 1980).

[3] Initially the Defendant raised the issue of whether the Plaintiffs Drabbant and Front Street had standing to raise the antitrust claims because the Plaintiffs were not injured by the alleged antitrust conduct and the damages allegedly suffered were speculative. D.I. 25 at 48. The Defendant's brief was docketed with the Court on May 24, 1988. On May 23, 1988, this Court granted the motion allowing the Attorney General of the State of Delaware to intervene as a party plaintiff on behalf of the Delaware citizens residing in and around the Milford area and the town of Milford. D.I. 24. At oral argument, counsel for the Defendant asked this Court not to rule on the standing issue since the Attorney General intervened. Transcript, D.I. 29 at 46. The Defendant did, however, seek to preserve this issue for briefing before trial, in particular as to the Plaintiffs Drabbant and Front Street. Id. at 46-47.

Moreover, HN4[] where the moving party is asserting what is essentially [19] economic injury, he must meet a more stringent standard to show that the harm is peculiar or special. In Coca-Cola Bottling of Elizabethtown v. Coca-Cola Co., 668 F. Supp. 906, 910 (D.Del. 1987), the court held that where the alleged harm is economic, "the threshold of 'peculiarity' that the proposed action threatens must be high, because purely economic injuries are generally compensable and do not require injunctive relief." The court went on to note that particularized proof of the direct harm caused by the defendant was necessary in order for the plaintiffs to demonstrate that the threatened injury was "sufficiently peculiar." Id.

In the instant case, the Court finds that the harm which the Plaintiffs allege they are suffering is primarily economic in nature. The loss of business and customers the tenants in the Milford Shopping Center are allegedly suffering and will continue to suffer is necessarily economic. [*1574] This Circuit has consistently held that "HN5[] purely economic injuries are generally compensable and do not require injunctive relief." Coca-Cola Bottling, 668 F. Supp. at 910. See also ECRI, 809 F.2d at 226 ("We have never upheld any injunction where the claimed [20] injury constituted a loss of money, a loss capable of recoupment in a proper action at law.") (citations omitted). Therefore, as discussed infra, the harm must be sufficiently peculiar and special to justify the extraordinary form of relief Plaintiffs are requesting.

In support of their assertion that A&P's actions will cause Plaintiffs irreparable harm, Plaintiffs rely upon three affidavits. The affiants attest to the fact that the Milford Shopping Center "from its inception in 1961 . . . was intended to operate with two supermarket anchor tenants." Affidavit of Orville W. Shockley, D.I. 17, para. 7; see also Affidavit of Clara Drabbant, D.I. 16, para. 5; Affidavit of Jack A. Nylund, D.I. 18, para. 7. In light of that fact, Plaintiffs contend that, with the departure of the first Safeway store in 1977 and now A&P's departure in August of 1987, the loss to the shopping center is "extremely adverse." D.I. 16, para. 9. The affiants also assert that A&P's departure "continues to have a serious negative effect on the Milford Shopping Center, its tenants . . . as well as the community area of Milford." Id., P 10. See also D.I. 18, para. 9.

Plaintiffs also contend that they [21] are facing the possibility of bankruptcy if A&P is allowed to continue its anticompetitive policies. In support of their claim, Plaintiffs' affidavits attest to the fact that the future of the Milford Shopping Center is "very dark" and potentially "financially ruinous" because of A&P's actions. Unless an anchor supermarket tenant is allowed to operate in the shopping center, many of the tenants, including Plaintiff Drabbant, will face "possible insolvency." D.I. 16, paras. 7, 9, 11; D.I. 17, para. 10; D.I. 18, paras. 8, 10. Significantly, however, Plaintiffs have produced no facts to support such generalized assertions of potential bankruptcy. Also, Plaintiffs have produced no specific evidence to show how A&P's actions are directly causing them harm. For example, they have not produced any financial data or other facts to substantiate what must be characterized as hyperbole. The Court has no evidence of the extent or amount of harm Plaintiffs will suffer. Based upon the record before this Court, it is impossible to conclude that "damages when ascertained according to legal rules, would not be a just and reasonable substitute." A.L.K. Corporation v. Columbia Pictures Industries, [22] Inc., 440 F.2d 761, 763 (3d Cir. 1971). Therefore, in the absence of more specific proof of the peculiar nature of the harm Plaintiffs will suffer if a preliminary injunction is not granted, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have not sustained their burden. "Mere assertions of dire economic effects cannot, without some concrete proof, meet the irreparable harm standard." Coca-Cola Bottling, 668 F. Supp. at 913.

Furthermore, not only have Plaintiffs failed to show irreparable injury but the record is devoid of proof that the harm they will suffer is immediate or imminent. The affidavits submitted by Plaintiffs make reference to the "great potential" possibility of bankruptcy or the "possible insolvency" facing the satellite tenants. D.I. 16, paras. 9, 11; D.I.

18, paras. 10, 11. While Ms. Drabbant also avers that "the present tenants will be driven out of business, rendered insolvent and/or bankrupt", this statement, like others similar to it, is completely unsubstantiated. D.I. 16, para. 15. [4] The affidavits are facially inconsistent in that the alleged harm appears simultaneously to be both immediate and potential. Moreover, Mr. Kaplan, a partner of Front Street, testified that, [23] if he continues to lose [*1575] money at the present rate, "Front Street will have to borrow money, without a doubt, if it doesn't want to go into foreclosure." Deposition of Andrew Scott Kaplan, D.I. 30 at 162-63. If Plaintiffs can borrow money, it is difficult to see how bankruptcy is imminent.

Furthermore, the affidavits themselves reveal the fact that any alleged harm Plaintiffs will suffer cannot be imminent and solely as a result of Defendant's actions. Mr. Shockley states that as early as 1977, when the Safeway Supermarket left the shopping center, "the effect of losing this tenant, and of the owner's inability to relet this space to another supermarket tenant was adverse to the economic well being and viability of the Milford [24] Shopping Center." D.I. 17, para. 9. Thus, as far back as 1977, Plaintiffs were predicting the demise of the shopping center. If the Milford Shopping Center was facing adverse economic conditions as far back as 1977, the Court finds it difficult to understand how Plaintiffs are presently suffering a new and imminent harm. While the Court is not unaware that, with the passage of time and the departure of A&P as well as other tenants, those adverse economic conditions may have worsened, the Court is unpersuaded that the harm is imminent and solely a result of A&P's present actions.

In order for the Plaintiffs to demonstrate their need for a preliminary injunction because of the imminent harm they are facing, they must also show that it is A&P's actions which are harming them. If A&P is not the cause of their injury, then a preliminary injunction enjoining A&P's actions would be pointless. While the Plaintiffs' affidavits repeatedly state that A&P's departure is the cause of their harm, they offer no concrete evidence to support that allegation. Indeed, Plaintiffs' repeated assertions that the Milford Shopping Center "from its inception" was intended to operate with two anchor supermarket [25] tenants are unsupported in the record. D.I. 17, para. 7. Neither A&P's lease nor any other source of evidence supports the proposition that A&P was to be an "anchor tenant." Specifically, Mr. Kaplan testified that during 1987, Front Street suffered a loss of $ 37,000. D.I. 30 at 89. A&P, however, was operating its supermarket during eight months of that year. Moreover, Mr. Kaplan could not recall whether or not Front Street had ever shown a profit during any of the quarters in 1987. Id. Therefore, the losses suffered by Front Street during 1987 are not clearly attributable to A&P's departure. Indeed, Mr. Kaplan stated that the only profits Front Street ever made since its purchase of the Milford Shopping Center was a total of $ 3,700 in 1986. Id. at 90. Mr. Kaplan also testified as further proof of the harm Plaintiffs are suffering that, in the first quarter of 1988, Front Street suffered a loss of $ 20,000. Id. at 89. The Court finds such evidence unpersuasive. Because of Front Street's record of losses prior to A&P's departure, the fact that in 1988 it suffered a $ 20,000 loss for the first quarter does not establish that A&P was the cause. In addition, because of Safeway's [26] departure in 1977, it is unclear what adverse economic effect that supermarket's departure (as opposed to A&P's) had on the shopping center. Whether the presence of the Restrictive Covenant kept it vacant or whether other economic factors were at work is not revealed in the present record.

The evidence presented does not paint a picture of a thriving and profitable shopping center that has suddenly faced an economic decline due to the departure of one of its supermarket tenants. Rather, the evidence suggests that the Milford Shopping Center had been operating at a loss even when A&P was present in the shopping center. Based upon the foregoing facts, therefore, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden of showing that A&P's departure and enforcement of its Restrictive Covenant is threatening Plaintiffs with imminent bankruptcy.

---

[4] Other similarly unsupported statements include the following:

> Prospective tenants will be irretrievably lost to vacant stores in the shopping center;
>
> Present tenants will likely refuse to renew leases as they expire;
>
> Revenues to tenants, including the Beauty Shop, and Front Street, will continue to be incalcuably depressed; and damages suffered by consumers caused by the lack of competition will be impossible to calculate.

D.I. 16, para. 15.

In addition to the Court's determination that Plaintiffs have failed to establish irreparable injury, the Court is also not persuaded that the balance of equities tips in favor of granting Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction. Absent a showing [*1576] that the injury of which Plaintiffs allege is both immediate and irreparable, the [27] Court is unwilling to exercise its power of granting an extraordinary remedy at this preliminary stage in the litigation. The harm to the Defendant were a preliminary injunction granted at this stage outweighs any potential injury Plaintiffs may suffer as a result of A&P's actions. Moreover, as this Court has held, "if relief were to be granted, the status quo would not be maintained and the Plaintiffs would have gained everything they would have gained after a trial on the merits." Norfolk Southern, 594 F. Supp. at 523.

While the Court need not reach the issue of the probability of success on the merits as to Plaintiffs' state law claims, as indicated at oral argument, there are elements of Plaintiffs' position which require serious attention by the Defendant. The more noteworthy factual underpinings of Plaintiffs' argument include the plain meaning of the amended lease provision requiring that the Defendant "shall continue to occupy the leased premises", A&P's actions in attempting to find a new tenant and, finally, the limited scope of the Restrictive Covenant derived either from its plain meaning or from the ambiguity of the terms used.

V. PLAINTIFFS' ANTITRUST CLAIMS

While [28] declining to reach the probability of success as to Plaintiffs' state law claims, the interests of judicial economy compel the Court to decide the probability of success of Plaintiffs' antitrust claims. Plaintiffs' failure to establish irreparable injury would be sufficient to deny the motion for a preliminary injunction.

A. Jurisdiction Over Plaintiffs' Sherman Act Claims

HN6[] In order for this Court to have jurisdiction over the Plaintiffs' federal antitrust claims, the allegedly illegal conduct must either be in the flow of interstate commerce or, though occurring on a local level, substantially affect interstate commerce. Harold Friedman Inc. v. Thorofare Markets, 587 F.2d 127, 132 (3d Cir. 1978). The second test is considered from the perspective of "whether the local activity has a significant impact on competition in commerce and whether the commerce so affected is substantial in volume." Id. In Harold Friedman, the court considered the facts that the exclusivity clause at issue was used by Thorofare in other leases; that Thorofare enforced the covenant against a potential out-of-state tenant; and the fact that the value of the goods traveling through interstate [29] commerce to Friedman's and Thorofare's stores was substantial. Id. at 134-35. The Third Circuit also went on to explain:

> As the corporate practices of such supermarket chains as Thorofare amply demonstrate, the retail sale of food and household commodities is no longer effectuated solely through neighborhood grocery stores that order their supplies independently from local wholesalers. Although the consumer outlets necessarily must serve discrete localities, the trend is toward increased concentration in the intrastructure that administers and supplies the local stores. Therefore, when a large interstate supermarket chain is in the picture, anticompetitive activities directed at an individual store will inevitably have a substantial effect upon the flow of goods across state lines to either the victimized establishment or the firm that is engaged in the anticompetitive practice, if not to both. Where, as here, such interstate supermarket industry is involved, it cannot be said that the "relationship to interstate commerce is too tenuous in a practical sense to warrant federal control."

Id. at 136 (footnotes omitted). Consequently, the court concluded that there was jurisdiction [30] to hear the Sherman Act claims.

The Defendant is a large interstate supermarket chain. The Super Fresh division supermarkets are supplied by warehouses in New Jersey and Maryland and they supply the stores in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware by shipping the products in interstate commerce. Deposition of Julian J. DiFiore, D.I. 32 at 35. The products that are gathered in these warehouses come from locations across the country. Id. [*1577] The Restrictive Covenant at issue in this case, furthermore, is similar to ones used by A&P and its assignees in other states. See Berkeley Dev. v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea, N.J.Super.L., 214 N.J. Super. 227, 518 A.2d 790 (1986); Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company v. Bailey, Pa.Super., 421 Pa. 540, 220 A.2d 1 (1966). In light of the holding in Harold Friedman and the aforementioned factors, this Court concludes that Defendant's conduct substantially affects interstate commerce thus satisfying the jurisdictional predicate of the Sherman Act.

B. Plaintiffs' Section 1 Claim

HN7[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides that "Every contract, combination . . . or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States . . . is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. [31] § 1. Although the statute's language seems all encompassing, the case law developing Section 1 construes it as prohibiting only those contracts or combinations which unreasonably restrain competition. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514 (1958); Malley-Duff & Associates v. Crown Life Ins. Co., 734 F.2d 133 (3d Cir. 1984). Furthermore, Section 1 does not preclude independent action. Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984). Consequently, for A&P's enforcement of the Restrictive Covenant to constitute a violation of Section 1, the Plaintiffs must prove:

> (1) that the defendants contracted, combined, or conspired among each other; (2) that the combination or conspiracy produced adverse, anti-competitive effects within relevant products and geographic markets; (3) that the objects of and the conduct pursuant to the contract or conspiracy were illegal; and (4) that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of the conspiracy.

Martin B. Glauser Dodge Co. v. Chrysler Corp., 570 F.2d 72, 81 (3d Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 913, 56 L. Ed. 2d 413, 98 S. Ct. 2253 (1978).

HN8[] In order for Plaintiffs to be granted relief based upon a Section 1 violation, the [32] Plaintiffs must show a probability of success of establishing all of the requisite elements of such a claim. In particular, the Plaintiffs must establish that A&P was involved in concerted action in its attempt to restrain trade. Edward J. Sweeney & Sons, Inc. v. Texaco, 637 F.2d 105 (3d Cir. 1980); Harold Friedman, Inc. v. Kroger Co., 581 F.2d 1068 (3d Cir. 1978). In order to do this, the Plaintiffs must present evidence from which the trier of fact could reasonably infer that A&P and others "had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective." Edward J. Sweeney & Sons, Inc., 637 F.2d at 111, citing Klein v. American Luggage Works, Inc., 323 F.2d 787, 791 (3d Cir. 1963); United States v. Standard Oil Co., 316 F.2d 884, 890 (7th Cir. 1963); see also Monsanto Co., 465 U.S. at 768 (there must be direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the defendants and others "had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.").

The Plaintiffs attempt to establish concerted action by seeking to prove that A&P conspired with either Super Fresh, its wholly owned subsidiary, [33] or Safeway. As a matter of law, a parent corporation is incapable of conspiring with its wholly owned subsidiary for purposes of a Section 1 violation. Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628, 104 S. Ct. 2731 (1984). Consequently, if Plaintiffs' Section 1 claim is to survive, they must show that there is a reasonable probability that they will be successful in establishing that A&P and Safeway had a "conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective."

The Plaintiffs argue that they have established concerted action because A&P made it a condition of its purchase of the Safeway store in the Milford Village that it be able to protect its lease in the Milford Shopping Center and Safeway aquiesced and consented thereto in its sale of the store. D.I. 26 at 30. The Plaintiffs base [*1578] their theory upon deposition testimony and a memorandum written by Mr. DiFiore. Unfortunately for the Plaintiffs, the evidence relied upon does not reveal Safeway's conscious commitment to the scheme of enforcing the lease and Restrictive Covenant for the unlawful objective of restraining trade. The memorandum written by Mr. DiFiore upon which Plaintiffs rely was written to [34] F. X. Leonard, head of real estate for A&P and J. Y. Mariner, acting vice president of real estate for A&P at the time. D.I. 20A, Exhibit 1(4). [5] At his deposition, Mr. DiFiore explained that the memorandum was sent to these two men. D.I. 32 at 53. No mention is made in the deposition that Safeway was a recipient of this memorandum. Furthermore, Mr. DiFiore's deposition does not reveal that Safeway was aware of A&P's intent to restrain trade or committed to that end. The deposition testimony reveals only that the precondition of the validity of the Milford Shopping Center lease was agreed to by a director of real estate for A&P, not by Safeway. D.I. 32 at 54. Furthermore, DiFiore agreed with Plaintiffs' counsel's characterization of this memorandum as merely a reminder to the people in A&P's real estate division that they had agreed that the Milford Shopping Center lease would be enforceable. [6]

[5] The Plaintiffs latch upon the language "one of the conditions by which the Milford Safeway purchased by Super Fresh was agreed to was that the old Milford Super Fresh location would be totally protected." D.I. 20A, Exhibit 1.

[35] Thus, rather than this memorandum appearing as the "smoking gun" upon which Plaintiffs may build its Section 1 claim, it actually begins to look like an intra-corporate memorandum memoralizing an intracorporate condition imposed upon the purchase of the Safeway property in the Milford Village. Rather than implicating Safeway and recharacterizing the innocent appearance of this memorandum, the deposition testimony only reinforces the intra-corporate nature of the memorandum and the "condition." Safeway is never mentioned as a participant to this agreement. The Plaintiffs, furthermore, have not presented any evidence, either in the form of testimony or documents, from Safeway to support the contention that Safeway made a "conscious commitment to a common scheme to achieve an unlawful objective."

Consequently, on the record before this Court on the Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction, this Court must conclude that the Plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden of showing a probability of success in establishing concerted action between A&P and Safeway to restrain trade. Plaintiffs' failure to carry their burden on probability of success on the merits obviates the need to [36] discuss irreparable injury.

C. Plaintiffs' Section 2 Claims

Plaintiffs allege two claims under Section 2: monopolization and attempted monopolization. HN9[] For purposes of evaluating both claims, the relevant geographic and product markets must be established. Tasty Baking Co. v. Ralston Purina, Inc., 653 F. Supp. 1250 (E.D.Pa. 1987), and cases cited therein. For the purposes of this motion, the parties seem to agree on the relevant product market. This Court, [*1579] therefore, must determine the relevant geographic market.

(1) The Geographic Market

The determination of the relevant geographic market results from analyzing competition. Borough of Lansdale v. Philadelphia Elec. Co., 692 F.2d 307, 311 (3d Cir. 1982). It is the area in which "a potential buyer may rationally look for the goods and services he or she seeks." Pa. Dental Ass'n v. Medical Serv. Ass'n of Pa., 745 F.2d 248, 260 (3d Cir. 1984); Borough of Lansdale, 692 F.2d at 311. It is a question of fact concerning which the Court must

---

[6] The pertinent part of the dialogue between Plaintiffs' counsel and Mr. DiFiore is set forth below:

> Q. But you are missing my question. It says here that Mr. DiFiore said, "One of the conditions by which the Milford Safeway," I guess you left out the word was purchased, was "purchased by Super Fresh was agreed to was that the Old Milford Super Fresh location would be totally protected."
>
> What I want to know is who agreed to the condition? Was it Farley? Was it Leonard?
>
> Was it A&P? Who had the responsibility for seeing that that condition was fulfilled?
>
> A. Real estate.
>
> Q. Okay. And that would be Farley on your level and Leonard on the next?
>
> A. Yes.
>
> Q. And by that you meant, look, we agreed to buy the Milford Safeway place provided you people would guarantee that the former location would be totally protected; is that right?
>
> A. Yes.
>
> Q. And you are just reminding them of that now; is that right?
>
> A. Yes.

D.I. 32 at 55.

recognize the commercial realities of the issue at question resolved on a case by case basis. Borough of Lansdale, 692 F.2d at 311. [7]

[37] The parties dispute whether the geographic market should be the Milford Shopping Center or the town of Milford. This Court finds that the Plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden of showing a probability of success of establishing that the relevant geographic market is the Milford Shopping Center. The thrust of the Plaintiffs' argument is that the Milford Shopping Center should be considered the relevant geographic market since it serves the immediate community within walking distance of the stores. D.I. 21 at 37. More specifically, it serves those consumers who are senior citizens or less mobile. The other two supermarkets, A&P's Super fresh and its competitor, Acme, are two miles away from the Milford Shopping Center. [8] Hence, Plaintiffs argue, it is not within walking distance for those in the community around the Milford Shopping Center. Furthermore, Plaintiffs assert that there are traffic barriers around the Milford Village which cut down on its accessability. D.I. 21 at 37. To support their position, Plaintiffs cite to three affidavits they filed with the Court. Each of these remarkably similar affidavits make bald assertions. Two of the affidavits state:

> Many of the [38] people in this area are young families as well as senior citizens and other than some local corner operations Mom and Pop stores and convenience markets, the only other places to shop for food and grocery items are Super Fresh and Acme stores in the shopping centers that border the west most sites of the corporate limits of the City of Milford.

Compare D.I. 18, para. 9 with D.I. 16, para. 10. The third affidavit merely states that because the Acme and Super Fresh are two miles from the Milford Shopping Center they present "a significant inconvenience for many consumers in Milford, many of whom are elderly and depend on the convenience of the Milford Shopping Center to satisfy their daily needs." D.I. 17, para. 11. Thus, the Court is presented with statements by these three affiants in addition to the statements made in the Plaintiffs' brief. The Plaintiffs do not suggest that their affiants are experts upon whose opinion this Court may rely. [9] [40] Nor do the Plaintiffs [*1580] present the Court with any demographic data or statistics which would reveal the age of the community, those who own cars in the area, the distances traveled by those who use the Acme or Super Fresh, or other data [39] that would assist the Court in making its determination. [10] In light of the evidence presented at this time on the Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary

---

[7] Two commentators set forth the following factors to consider:

> Definition of the relevant geographic market depends on the commercial realities of the community in which the shopping center is located. Factors to be considered include: the area which the center serves; the location and number of competing centers or "free standing" retail outlets within that area or in reasonably close proximity; and factors such as physical barriers, traffic flow patterns, zoning restrictions, locations of suppliers and shifts in the consumer population.

Reilly & Keys, The Antitrust Aspects of Restrictive Covenants in Shopping Center Leases, (ICSC 1986), 22.

[8] There seems to be some dispute over the distance of the Super Fresh from the Milford Shopping Center. The Defendant alleges, without citing affidavits or deposition testimony, that the Super Fresh is approximately one mile away. D.I. 25 at 5. The Plaintiffs, on the other hand, submit affidavits all stating, in the exact same wording, that the nearest supermarkets, presumably the Super Fresh and Acme, are two miles away. D.I. 16, para. 10; D.I. 18, para. 9. For purposes of this motion, the Court will assume, without deciding, that the Super Fresh in the Milford Shopping is two miles away from the Milford Shopping Center.

[9] In point of fact, the affiants are: (1) a president of his own insurance agency who leases space in the Milford Shopping Center; (2) the president and chief executive officer of the Southern Delaware Chamber of Commerce; and (3) the vice president of the corporation which operates a beauty shop in the Milford Shopping Center. The latter two are those that submit the remarkably similar testimony.

[10] The Plaintiffs do submit a petition attached to one affidavit. D.I. 17. While petitioners are effective in the political process, their impact is lessened in a court of law which adjudicates and preserves the rights of individuals, even if it is against the voice of the majority. In this instance, the people signed a petition stating: "We want and must have a food store in Milford Shopping Center. If you feel the same, please sign this petition below. Your help and support is greatly appreciated, by all of the tenant [sic] of the Shopping Center." Id. Thus, rather than providing the Court with the much needed demographic information, the Plaintiffs have supplied a list of those who feel that they want a food store in the Milford Center. The importance of the petition is undermined, injunction, this Court must conclude that the Plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden of showing a probability of success in establishing the Milford Shopping Center as the relevant geographic market. [11]

[41] For the purpose of this motion, however, this Court concludes that the Defendant will probably be successful in establishing the town of Milford as the relevant geographic market. It appears that the commercial realities of this situation support this conclusion. The Defendant's own business perspective on moving from the Milford Shopping Center to the Milford Village indicates that it considered the town of Milford as the market in which it must increase its market share. D.I. 20A, Exhibit 1. In point of fact, when the Plaintiffs discuss the Defendant's market share for purposes of its Section 2 claim, they use the market share percentage based upon the town of Milford. See D.I. 21 at 40, 49. Furthermore, the Court recognizes that the distance of two miles between A&P and Acme's location and that of the empty property may not be great enough to establish the Milford Shopping Center as a distinct geographic market; rather, the distance of only two miles indicates that these locations should be considered as falling into one geographic market. The Plaintiffs unintentionally note two characteristics of this situation which supports this conclusion. The Plaintiffs characterize the [42] two shopping centers which separately contain the Super Fresh and Acme as "regional" shopping centers. D.I. 21 at 37. The concept of these two shopping centers being regional ones creates the inference that those who shop there come from distances greater than two miles. The region which they serve implicitly encompasses the same population market as that which the Milford Shopping Center serves. Secondly, the Plaintiffs themselves recognize that those who signed the petitions submitted to the Court come from the town of Milford. D.I. 26 at 28. It has not been disputed that the A&P in the Milford Village serves the town of Milford. Furthermore, the petitions reveal that a supermarket in the Milford Shopping Center would serve the people in the town of Milford. Therefore, if both shopping centers serve the same group of consumers, it seems reasonable to [*1581] conclude that one geographic market encompasses these two shopping centers: the town of Milford. For these reasons, the Court concludes that the probability of success in establishing the town of Milford as the relevant geographic market weighs in favor of the Defendant.

(2) Plaintiffs' Monopoly Claim

HN10[] In order for Plaintiffs to establish [43] that Defendant has violated Section 2 by achieving a monopoly, Plaintiffs must show: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant geographic and product markets; and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of superior product, business acumen or historic accident." Pa. Dental Ass'n, 745 F.2d at 260, citing United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966). The courts have recognized that market share is a primary indication of whether monopoly power exists. Id.

As a matter of law, the Plaintiffs have failed to show a reasonable possibility of success on the monopoly claim. The Plaintiffs, by relying upon the Defendant's own projections, recognize that the Defendant, at the most, has achieved a 28% market share. D.I. 21 at 48. In an attempt to build up this percentage, the Plaintiffs assert that A&P "no doubt intends to aggressively attempt to increase its share of the Milford market of food dollars, by capturing a significant portion of the 'leakage' estimated by it at 25%, as well as a part of Acme's 36% market share." D.I. 26 at 34. The market share data relied upon by Plaintiffs [44] are projections of market share A&P wanted to achieve after moreover, after a quick perusal of the petition reveals that people outside of the Plaintiffs' asserted geographic area have signed them. If people outside of the Plaintiffs' geographic market are willing to travel to the Milford Shopping Center, why should the court assume that those in the community around the Milford Shopping Center are unable to travel two miles to the Milford Village?

---

[11] In their brief, Plaintiffs state that the "'one-stop-shopping' aspect of a functioning and viable Milford Shopping Center also reconfirms the almost obvious fact that the Milford Shopping Center itself represents the relevant geographic market in this case." D.I. 21 at 38. For support, Plaintiffs cite Reilly & Keys at 22 and State of Maryland v. Lee's Sport, Inc., 1981-2 Trade Cases, para. 64,365 (Md.Cir.Ct. 1981). The Court finds this unpersuasive. First, Reilly and Keys refer to the "one-stop shopping" asset in shopping centers as an aspect that defines a "unique product market." Reilly & Keys at 22. Secondly, State of Maryland v. Lee's Sport, Inc. is an Assurance of Discontinuance which does not constitute an admission by any of the parties with respect to any issue of fact or law except as provided in the Maryland Commercial Law Code Annotated, section 11-206(c). Lee's Sport, Inc., 1981-2 Trade cases P 64,365 at 74,686.

opening the Super Fresh in the Milford Village. See D.I. 20A, Exhibit 1. Thus, at the most, these are statistics indicating what Defendant hoped to achieve as opposed to what it now possesses. In any event, for purposes of the monopoly claim, it can be assumed that the Defendant has captured 28% of the market share. This is not enough to indicate monopoly power. In Pa. Dental Ass'n, the Third Circuit affirmed the District Court's holding that, as a matter of law, a 32%-35% market share was insufficient to establish monopolization. Pa. Dental Ass'n, 745 F.2d at 261; See also Outboard Marine Corp. v. Pezetel, 461 F. Supp. 384 (D.Del. 1978) (35% insufficient to establish monopolization). Consequently, this Court must conclude that Plaintiffs would probably fail to establish monopolization at a trial on the merits.

(3) Plaintiffs' Attempted Monopoly Claim

HN11[] In order for Plaintiffs to establish their Section 2 claim of attempted monopolization, they must show: "(1) a specific intent to monopolize; and (2) the consequent dangerous probability of success within the relevant geographic and product markets." Pa. [45] Dental Ass'n, 745 F.2d at 261; Kellam Energy, Inc. v. Duncan, 668 F. Supp. 861, 888 (D.Del. 1987); Tasty Baking Co., 653 F. Supp. at 1267. As to proving the requisite intent, the Third Circuit has explained that "a mere intention to prevail over rivals or improve market position is insufficient. Even an intent to perform acts that can be objectively viewed as tending toward the acquisition of monopoly power is insufficient, unless it also appears that the acts were not 'predominately motivated by legitimate business aims.'" Pa. Dental Ass'n, 745 F.2d at 260-61, quoting Times- Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 627, 97 L. Ed. 1277, 73 S. Ct. 872 (1953).

The Court is not completely persuaded that the Plaintiffs will establish the requisite intent for their attempt to monopolize claim. The Plaintiffs rely on several passages from the deposition testimony to show that A&P is maintaining its lease and enforcing the Restrictive Covenant in order to prevent competition with its new Super Fresh store. See, e.g., D.I. 33 at 29-30, 37-38, 48; D.I. 32 at 27-31, 56-59; D.I. 35 at 29. Plaintiffs' claim, however, is that Defendant is attempting to monopolize the retail sale of food goods [46] in the town of Milford. The Defendant's major competition, with 36% of the market share if the Defendant achieved its goal of 28%, is [*1582] Acme. Thus, it seems that if Plaintiffs were to clearly establish the intent to monopolize, Plaintiffs should produce evidence of A&P's intent to drive Acme out of the market. Plaintiffs have not done so. Thus, while the evidence presented is compelling, it does not appear to address the entire picture of the Defendant's intent to monopolize the relevant product market in the town of Milford.

Nevertheless, if it is conceded that the Plaintiffs may have possibly established the requisite intent, they have failed to carry their burden of showing a probability of success in establishing a dangerous probability that A&P will succeed in achieving a monopoly position. HN12[] While market share may be considered by a court in determining whether there is a dangerous probability of monopoly, it is not determinative. Kellam Energy, Inc., 668 F. Supp. at 891. The court may also consider other market characteristics such as "the strength of the competition, the probable development of the industry, the barriers to entry, the nature of the anticompetitive conduct [47] and the elasticity of consumer demand." International Distribution Centers, Inc. v. Walsh Trucking, 812 F.2d 786, 792 (2d Cir. 1987), cited with approval in Kellam Energy, Inc., 668 F. Supp. at 891; see also Tasty Baking Co., 653 F. Supp. at 1270.

The Plaintiffs rely upon the market share data to support this element of their claim. D.I. 21 at 49. The Plaintiffs point to the Defendant's possible 28% market share and ask the Court to speculate as to what would happen if A&P should capture some of the share from the "Mom and Pop" stores and if Acme possibly left Milford or suffered a deterioration in market share. These hypotheses, highly speculative as they are, do not appear to be a significant evidentiary basis for carrying the burden for the issuance of a preliminary injunction. On the other hand, it is true that this Court has held that a 35% market share supports a dangerous probability of success in achieving a monopoly. Outboard Marine Corp., 461 F. Supp. at 404. [12] Plaintiffs, however, have failed to explain to this Court

---

[12] It is important to note, however, that in Outboard Marine Corp., the defendants conceded for the purpose of the motion to dismiss that 35% market share constituted a "reasonable probability of success." Outboard Marine Corp., 461 F. Supp. at 404.

how Outboard Marine Corp. may apply to these facts and the significance or insignificance of the disparity between a 35% market share and [48] a 28% market share.

The make-up of the market at issue also suggests that the Plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden. According to Defendant's analysis of projected market share, Acme would possess 36% of the market, Meatland, 11%; Super Fresh, 28%; and the "Mom and Pop" stores ("leakage" according to the experts), 25%. Plaintiffs have failed to explain to this Court how there is a dangerous probability that A&P would become a monopoly when one of its competitors has a greater share of the market. The Plaintiffs themselves admit, furthermore, that part of the urgency for this preliminary injunction is that if the owner of the Milford Shopping Center cannot lease the old Safeway property to Meatland, someone will build them a store in Milford. D.I. 30 at 160, 164. It is difficult for this Court to conclude there is a dangerous probability of A&P gaining a monopoly when evidence presented by the Plaintiffs suggests that [49] someone is willing to build a store for Meatland in the geographic market at issue. Considering the present state of the competition and the possibility of even more, cautions against concluding that A&P can gain a monopoly. If that were not enough, Plaintiffs additionally fail to provide the Court with information on the probable development of the industry, the elasticity of consumer demand or the strength of the present competition. [13] Consequently, for the reasons [*1583] stated above, this Court concludes that the Plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden of showing a probability of success in proving a dangerous probability of A&P successfully gaining a monopoly. As a result, Plaintiffs may not be granted relief on their Section 2 claim of attempted monopoly.

For all these reasons, the motion for a preliminary injunction [50] is denied.

End of Document

---

[13] It seems that the barriers to entry in this product market would be great, although Plaintiffs did not present evidence on this factor. The evidence presented by Plaintiffs, however, indicates that in this particular case, someone is willing to attempt to surmount whatever entry barriers that do exist and provide Meatland a place from which to operate in Milford.

Lease Lights, Inc. v. Public Service Co.

United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit

June 27, 1988, Filed

No. 86-1797

Reporter
849 F.2d 1330 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 8669 ; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,112

Lease Lights, Inc.; Jack R. Seay, d/b/a Seay Electric Company; Knight Lights Company, Inc.; and Protective Lighting, Inc., Plaintiffs-Appellees, v. Public Service Company of Oklahoma, a corporation, Defendant-Appellant. Oklahoma Corporation Commission, Amicus Curiae

Subsequent History: As amended July 27, 1988.

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Oklahoma, D.C. No. 77-C-417-E.

Core Terms

lighting, immune, outdoor, rates, supervised, state action doctrine, regulation, state action, monopolization, electricity, motor carrier, antitrust, public utility, leased, plaintiffs', compulsion, regulatory agency, rate charged, state policy, ratemaking

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Exemptions

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > Scope

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > State Regulation

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN1[] Scope, Exemptions

The state action doctrine allows state legislatures to formally command that certain areas of commerce be exempt from the provisions of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq. It includes the requirement that state legislatures compel the immune behavior. A state must compel, rather than merely prompt or allow, anticompetitive conduct for state action immunity to be conferred.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Transportation Law > Interstate Commerce > Restraints of Trade

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Filed Rate Doctrine > General Overview

HN2[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

While compulsion by the state is the best evidence of a state policy to displace competition, immunity is justified if a state merely permits the conduct to occur. This test is satisfied by showing (1) the challenged behavior is sanctioned by a clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed state policy, and (2) the state actively supervises the private anticompetitive conduct at issue. The first element of the test does not require legislation explicitly authorizing the challenged conduct, but only an indication by the state that it intends to displace competition with regulation in the particular area of commerce.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Filed Rate Doctrine > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Pipelines & Transportation > Electricity Transmission

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Antitrust Issues > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Energy & Utilities Law > Federal Oil & Gas Leases > Local & State Regulation

Energy & Utilities Law > Leases & Licenses > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Utility Companies > Rates > General Overview

HN3[] Exemptions & Immunities, Filed Rate Doctrine

The Oklahoma Constitution gives the Oklahoma Corporation Commission (Commission) the power to regulate public utilities, including all gas, electric, heat, light, and power companies. Okla. Const. art. IX, § 34. The legislature has given the Commission general supervision over all public utilities that supply the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat or light with gas and the electric current for light, heat or power. Okla. Stat. tit. 17, § 151 (1981). Within this domain, the Commission has the power to prescribe rules, requirements and regulations affecting the utilities' services, operation, and the management and conduct of their business. Okla. Stat. tit. 17, § 152. The Commission also establishes and enforces rates "as may be reasonable and just." Okla. Const. art. IX, § 18. These constitutional and statutory provisions indicate a clear intent by the state to supplant the market for leased outdoor lighting with active regulation by the Commission.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Filed Rate Doctrine > General Overview

HN4[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

The constitutional invalidity of an attempted state regulation is not an appropriate basis for disregarding state action immunity. There should be a defense for those reasonably relying on the appearance of legality when a state agency's exercise of power is unauthorized.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

HN5[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

To prove attempted monopolization, plaintiffs must show: (1) a relevant market in which the alleged attempt occurred; (2) a dangerous probability of success in monopolizing the relevant market; (3) a specific intent to monopolize; and (4) conduct in furtherance of such an attempt.

Counsel: Jack I. Gaither (Bruce D. Gaither with him on the brief), Tulsa, Oklahoma, for Plaintiffs-Appellees.

Jeffrey H. Howard of Davis, Graham & Stubbs (Floyd L. Walker and James F. Bullock of Pray, Walker, Jackman, Williamson & Marlar, Tulsa, Oklahoma; and Robert H. Harry, Denver, Colorado, with him on the briefs), Washington, District of Columbia, for Defendant-Appellant.

Lindil Fowler, General Counsel, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, on the brief, for Amicus Curiae.

Judges: Logan, Moore, and Baldock, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: MOORE

Opinion

[*1331] MOORE, Circuit Judge.

The Public Service Company of Oklahoma (PSO) appeals from the jury verdict that it monopolized a sector of the leased outdoor lighting market in Tulsa, Oklahoma. PSO argues its conduct was controlled and supervised by the Oklahoma Corporation Commission (the Commission) until 1985 and may not be the subject of an antitrust action under the state action doctrine. PSO further urges that plaintiffs fail to prove sufficient non-immune conduct to support the claim of attempted monopolization. We hold that the state action doctrine protects those actions by PSO [2] which were actively supervised by the Commission. In addition, we believe plaintiffs have failed to present adequate evidence of non-immune behavior by PSO to show an attempt to illegally monopolize the market for leased outdoor lighting in Tulsa. We therefore reverse the judgment of the district court.

I.

PSO is a public utility engaged in the generation, transmission, and delivery of [*1332] electricity in parts of eastern and southwestern Oklahoma. [1] PSO also sells and leases 175 and 400 watt outdoor lights in Tulsa, Oklahoma. The Commission, a state agency, supervises the rates charged by PSO for leasing outdoor lights to the public and for providing electricity to competing light services. In 1975, the Commission ordered PSO both to reduce the rates charged to the public for its outdoor lighting service and to restructure its rate system for providing electricity by replacing the flat annual fee with an outdoor metered rate. As a result, PSO reduced its leasing rates in Tulsa by about four percent (from $ 4.00 to $ 3.85 for 175 watt lights), while substantially increasing the rates charged to contractors for electricity used in their competing light services.

[3] Four electrical contractors brought this action in 1977, alleging that this order was the economic equivalent of an "atomic bomb." They claimed PSO sought to drive them out of business in order to monopolize the outdoor lighting market in the Tulsa area. PSO unsuccessfully moved for summary judgment, asserting its challenged conduct was immune from antitrust attack under the state action doctrine. The district court held that the state action immunity doctrine was still developing and no consistent test had emerged. In 1981, the action proceeded to a two-week jury trial during which the court directed a verdict against the plaintiffs for failing to satisfy the jurisdictional requirement of a Sherman Act violation by showing PSO's activities had a substantial impact on interstate commerce. This court reversed, holding that plaintiffs had made a prima facie showing of a sufficient nexus between PSO's actions and interstate commerce. See Lease Lights v. Public Serv. Co. of Okla., 701 F.2d 794 (10th Cir. 1983). In a second trial in 1984, the jury awarded plaintiffs trebled damages exceeding $ 2 million. The court added over $ 500,000 in attorney fees and costs. PSO appeals from this [4] judgment.

[1] Electric power is also provided in Oklahoma by three other investor-owned utilities and by 31 rural electrical cooperatives.

II.

A.

PSO's main argument is that its rate changes should be immune from antitrust attack. As first conceived by the Supreme Court in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S. Ct. 307 (1943), HN1[] the state action doctrine allowed state legislatures to formally command that certain areas of commerce be exempt from the provisions of the Sherman Act. The Court subsequently developed the requirement that state legislatures compel the immune behavior. In Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar Ass'n, 421 U.S. 773, 44 L. Ed. 2d 572, 95 S. Ct. 2004 (1975), for example, the Court struck down a minimum fee schedule enforced by the state bar, holding that there existed neither a state law nor a state supreme court decision requiring the establishment of a rigid price floor in the fees attorneys could charge their clients. Similarly, in Cantor v. Detroit Edison Co., 428 U.S. 579, 49 L. Ed. 2d 1141, 96 S. Ct. 3110 (1976), the Court decided that state regulation of Detroit Edison's distribution of electricity did not confer state action immunity on its anticompetitive actions in the market for the sale of light bulbs. State regulation alone, according to the Court, was insufficient to show that a party's anticompetitive conduct is being commanded by the state government. [5] As in Goldfarb, the Court in Cantor required a state to compel, rather than merely prompt or allow, anticompetitive conduct for state action immunity to be conferred.

Plaintiffs now urge us to adhere to the compulsion requirement set forth in these decisions. They ignore, however, that the Supreme Court has explicitly softened the previously stringent requirements for state action immunity. In Southern Motor Carriers Rate Conference v. United States, 471 U.S. 48, 85 L. Ed. 2d 36, 105 S. Ct. 1721 (1985), the United States challenged a joint ratemaking procedure used by three motor carrier rate bureaus, arguing [*1333] that the procedure could not be immune under the state action doctrine because it was not compelled by the four states in which the bureaus operated. The Court refused to adhere to the compulsion requirement. HN2[] While compulsion by the state is the best evidence of a state policy to displace competition, according to the Court, immunity is justified if a state merely permits the conduct to occur. This test is satisfied by showing 1) the challenged behavior is sanctioned by a clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed state policy, and 2) the state actively supervises the private anticompetitive [6] conduct at issue. 471 U.S. at 57 (citing California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n v. Midcal Aluminum, 445 U.S. 97, 105, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233, 100 S. Ct. 937 (1980)). The first element of the test does not require legislation explicitly authorizing the challenged conduct, but only an indication by the state that it intends to displace competition with regulation in the particular area of commerce. Id. at 64.

The Court held the rate bureaus met these requirements. Both parties agreed that the regulatory agencies in the four states actively supervised the collective ratemaking activities. Furthermore, three of the four states had statutes permitting collective ratemaking by common carriers. The fourth state, Mississippi, gave the regulatory agency authority to regulate common carriers by granting it the power to prescribe "just and reasonable rates" for the intrastate transportation of general commodities. This language, the Court stated, expressed the legislature's intent that intrastate trucking rates be determined by a regulatory agency, rather than by the market. Therefore, plaintiffs' collective ratemaking in each of the four states was protected by state action immunity.

The test employed in Southern Motor [7] Carriers to replace the compulsion requirement has received consistent recognition by the Court as the proper standard to determine the applicability of state action immunity. [2] Indeed, on

---

[2] While the Court first articulated the test in the Midcal Aluminum decision, it also approved the compulsion requirement in that case. Needless to say, after Midcal Aluminum the federal courts were in complete confusion regarding which test to adopt. In Southern Motor Carriers, the Court for the first time clearly rejected the compulsion requirement. See Comment, Private Parties every occasion that the Court has considered state action immunity during the past three years, it has invoked the Southern Motor Carriers test rather than the compulsion test. See, e.g., 324 Liquor Corp. v. Duffy, 479 U.S. 335, 93 L. Ed. 2d 667, 107 S. Ct. 720 (1987) (New York's liquor pricing system does not fall within state action exemption to antitrust laws because the statute, even though "clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed as state policy," does not provide for active supervision by the state). Recently, for example, the Court held that the state action doctrine did not protect Oregon physicians from antitrust liability for their activities on hospital peer-review committees because state officials did not have the power to review the findings of these committees, and therefore the "active supervision" prong of the Southern Motor Carriers test was not satisfied. See Patrick v. Burget, 486 U.S. 94, 108 S. Ct. 1658, 100 L. Ed. 2d 83 (1988).

[8] We have dwelled on Southern Motor Carriers and its progeny because these decisions are dispositive of the instant case. First, we believe there exists a clearly articulated state policy to regulate the market for leased outdoor lights. HN3[] The Oklahoma Constitution gives the Commission the power to regulate public utilities, which it defines as "all gas, electric, heat, light, and power companies. . . ." Okla. Const. art. IX, § 34 (emphasis added). Pursuant to this authority, the legislature has given the Commission general supervision over all public utilities that supply "the production, transmission, delivery, or furnishing of heat or light with gas [and the] . . . electric current for light, heat or power." See Okla. Stat. tit. 17, § 151 (1981) (emphasis added).

[*1334] Within this domain, the Commission has the power to prescribe "rules, requirements and regulations, affecting [the utilities'] services, operation, and the management and conduct of their business." Okla. Stat. tit. 17, § 152. The Commission also establishes and enforces rates "as may be reasonable and just." Okla. Const. art. IX, § 18. The constitution states that the authority of the Commission to prescribe [9] these rates is paramount; rates which are inconsistent with the Commission's rates "shall be unlawful and void." Id. To carry out this mandate, the Commission may exercise "full visitorial and inquisitorial power to examine . . . public utilities . . . ." Okla. Stat. tit. 17, § 152. Furthermore, the Commission must periodically conduct detailed rate investigations and continually oversee public utilities' compliance with rate schedules which include fuel adjustment clauses. Okla. Stat. tit. 17, §§ 252, 263. We hold that these constitutional and statutory provisions indicate a clear intent by the state to supplant the market for leased outdoor lighting with active regulation by the Commission.

We also believe the Commission has used this grant of authority to closely supervise the outdoor lighting services provided by public utilities, including PSO. The Commission has regulated the outdoor lighting market in Oklahoma for twenty years. It currently imposes a thorough set of guidelines upon the lighting services of thirty-three public utilities operating within Oklahoma. Moreover, the Commission until 1985 closely regulated the rates charged by PSO for its outdoor lighting services. [10] From 1977 to 1985, PSO submitted monthly reports to the Commission of its compliance with the fuel adjustment clause in its outdoor lighting rates. When PSO applied to reduce its Tulsa lighting charge from $ 4.00 to $ 3.95 a month for a 175 watt light (while raising the cost of its service in rural areas), the Commission conducted three days of public hearings involving extensive testimony and over 100 exhibits. After considering the evidence, the Commission rejected PSO's request and chose instead to reduce PSO's rate to $ 3.85. Thus, the lower rate charged by PSO for its outdoor lighting service in Tulsa, which plaintiffs claim destroyed their business, was compelled by an independent decision of the Commission that PSO could not disobey.

B.

Plaintiffs emphasize that the Oklahoma Supreme Court overturned the Commission's outdoor lighting rates in December 1983, finding that PSO's lighting business "is not used or useful to the ratepayers as a whole, and thus its investment may not be included in its general rate base." Public Serv. Co. of Okla. v. Oklahoma Corp. Comm'n, 688 P.2d 1274, 1281 (Okla. 1983) (PSO). [3] We hold that this decision did not alter PSO's responsibility [11] to comply with rates mandated by the Commission before 1984. HN4[] The constitutional invalidity of the attempted and State Action Immunity to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act After Southern Motor Carriers Rate Conference, 24 Houston L. Rev. 311, 333 (1987).

---

[3] As a result of this decision, the Commission decontrolled the rates for PSO's outdoor lighting service in April 1985.

state regulation is not an appropriate basis for disregarding state action immunity. E.g., Llewellyn v. Crothers, 765 F.2d 769, 774 (9th Cir. 1985). Rather, there should be a defense for those reasonably relying on the appearance of legality when a state agency's exercise of power is unauthorized. See P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law para. 212.4b, at 132 (Supp. 1987). To rule otherwise would require regulated industries to seek judicial review of every order of a regulatory agency to ensure that compliance does not later subject them to antitrust liability.

In this case, neither the Commission nor PSO had any reason to anticipate that outdoor lighting rates could not be included in PSO's rate base. Until the 1984 decision, the Oklahoma Supreme Court had never overturned a decision by the Commission involving the outdoor lighting of a regulated utility. Indeed, the court affirmed the 1975 "atomic bomb" order challenged in the instant [12] case in Chickasha Cotton Oil Co. v. Oklahoma Corp. Comm'n, 562 P.2d 507 (Okla.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 829, 54 L. Ed. 2d 88, 98 S. Ct. 110 (1977). The court [*1335] also stated one year before PSO, "the duty of the Commission to supervise, regulate and control the charges and rates of public utilities is constitutionally mandated." Cartwright v. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co., 662 P.2d 675, 679 (Okla. 1983). [4]

[13] For these reasons, we conclude that PSO's rate changes meet the test for state action immunity set forth in Southern Motor Carriers. Indeed, PSO's case for immunity is even stronger than the arguments successfully espoused in Southern Motor Carriers, since in that case, regulatory agencies merely allowed the challenged collective ratemaking by trucking companies. Individual common carriers remained free to submit individual rate proposals to the Public Service Commissions. 471 U.S. at 52. In the instant case, however, the Commission compelled the challenged conduct by rejecting PSO's requested rates and establishing its own price after extensive, formal hearings were held. As mentioned, the Court held in Southern Motor Carriers that compulsion is the best evidence of a state policy to displace competition. 471 U.S. at 62. Therefore, we hold that PSO's actions pursuant to the Commission's rate orders are immune from antitrust attack under the state action doctrine. [5]

[14] III.

The remaining issue is whether plaintiffs proved sufficient non-immune conduct to support the verdict. HN5[] To prove attempted monopolization, plaintiffs must show: 1) a relevant market in which the alleged attempt occurred; 2) a dangerous probability of success in monopolizing the relevant market; 3) a specific intent to monopolize; and 4) conduct in furtherance of such an attempt. Shoppin' Bag of Pueblo v. Dillon Cos., 783 F.2d 159, 161 (10th Cir. 1986). Once immunity is recognized, PSO argues, it should be shielded from all complaints regarding the rate changes resulting from the 1975 order and from any other conduct which was mandated by the Commission. PSO believes that once the immune conduct is extirpated from plaintiffs' prima facie case, nothing remains of plaintiffs' contentions from which a reasonable jury could find predatory conduct satisfying the latter three elements of attempted monopolization.

---

[4] Furthermore, the 1984 decision may reasonably be interpreted as only requiring evidence that outdoor lighting is useful to the ratepayers, rather than as a limit on the Commission's jurisdiction to regulate the outdoor lighting market. Based on this interpretation, the Commission reconfirmed in December 1985 that the outdoor lighting provided by PSO's neighboring utility, Oklahoma Gas and Electric Company, should continue to be regulated. The Commission distinguished the PSO case on the ground that Oklahoma Gas and Electric's outdoor security lighting earned a "higher than system average rate of return" and was not subsidized by the other service classes. See In the Matter of the Application of Oklahoma Gas and Electric Company, OCC Cause No. 29450, Order No. 290658, p.10 (Dec. 20, 1985). We note that the interpretation of the public utility laws by the expert agency charged with enforcement of these laws should be given persuasive weight. E.g., Gambrel v. Kentucky Bd. of Dentistry, 689 F.2d 612 (6th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1208, 75 L. Ed. 2d 441, 103 S. Ct. 1198 (1983).

[5] PSO also believes it is insulated from liability by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, which precludes application of the Sherman Act to an entity's efforts to obtain favorable treatment from the government, even if its goals are anticompetitive. Given our holding on PSO's state action immunity claim, we need not address this issue.

We agree. Plaintiffs complain of a series of rate changes by PSO for its outdoor lighting service from 1973 to 1983, including the 1975 "atomic bomb" rate order. Yet each of these rate orders are immune under the state action doctrine because the Commission consistently [15] established and supervised the rates charged by PSO during this period.

Several of plaintiffs' remaining allegations also concern conduct that is immune under the state action doctrine. For example, plaintiffs argue that PSO has an unfair advantage because, unlike private contractors, it is authorized by state and local authorities to install lighting without a state or municipal license. However, PSO did not cause these regulations to be adopted and is immune from attack based [*1336] on the licensing requirements of state and local law, since these regulations are clearly articulated and actively supervised by the government.

For the same reason, plaintiffs' complaint that PSO refused to allow them to attach their lights to PSO's poles without a permit is untenable. Franchise agreements require plaintiffs to have a municipal permit before using PSO's poles; they expressly declare that PSO is "authorized to allow others having a permitted right granted by the City of Tulsa to attach facilities to its poles and structures." (Emphasis added.) Again, there is no evidence that these regulations are a sham or that city franchise agreements should not be immune from attack under the antitrust [16] laws. See Rural Elec. Co. v. Cheyenne Light, Fuel & Power Co., 762 F.2d 847 (10th Cir. 1985) (requirements in city franchise agreement are immune from challenge under the state action doctrine).

Plaintiffs' final claim is that PSO unreasonably delayed hooking up their lights. While this alleged behavior is not immune under the state action doctrine, we believe plaintiffs have failed to show the delay resulted from a policy of discrimination. The only testimony on this issue was from a customer of plaintiffs who attributed the delay in the hookup of his light to the need to install an intermediate pole to bridge the distance between the existing electrical service and his light. Furthermore, PSO only had three work crews to serve 71,000 customers, and hooking up new commercial installations was a lower priority than restoring interrupted service or servicing new residential customers. We believe, therefore, there is no evidence that hookups for PSO's outdoor lighting customers received priority over hookups for other outdoor lighting installations. We hold that plaintiffs have failed to show either a specific intent to monopolize or nonimmune conduct in furtherance of the attempted [17] monopolization. [6] Accordingly, the district court's judgment is REVERSED.

End of Document

---

[6] Because of our holding, we need not address whether plaintiffs satisfied the first two elements of attempted monopolization. We note, though, that to satisfy the second element, plaintiffs must show there existed a dangerous probability of PSO succeeding in monopolizing the relevant market by proving it had the ability to control prices and exclude competition. E.g., Shoppin' Bag of Pueblo, 783 F.2d at 164. This would have been a very difficult task, given the fact that the Commission dictated to PSO both the price it could charge for leasing outdoor lights and the electricity rates it could levy on competing contractors. Cf. Bright v. Moss Ambulance Serv., 824 F.2d 819, 824 (10th Cir. 1987) (activity which is protected by state action immunity may not be the basis for allegations of improper market power).

Dreiling v. Peugeot Motors of America, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit

June 28, 1988, Filed

Nos. 85-1823, 85-1880, 85-2628, 85-2735

Reporter
850 F.2d 1373 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 8913 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,125

Lloyd J. Dreiling and Steven J. Dreiling, Plaintiffs, L. J. Dreiling Motor Company, Inc., a Colorado corporation, Plaintiff-Appellant/Cross-Appellee, Podoll & Podoll; Richard B. Podoll; Burns & Figa; Hugh A. Burns and Phillip S. Figa, Appellants/Cross-Appellees, v. Peugeot Motors of America, Inc., a Delaware corporation, Defendant-Appellee/Cross-Appellant, Automobile Peugeot, a French corporation; Peugeot, S.A., a French corporation and Chrysler Corporation, a Delaware corporation, Defendants-Appellees

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Colorado, (D.C. No. 81-C-911), JIM R. CARRIGAN, D.C. Judge.

Core Terms

dealers, summary judgment, termination, district court, discovery, attorney's fees, fraudulent, genuine issue, conspiracy, dealership, antitrust, warranty claim, good faith, Sherman Act, anticompetitive, manufacturer, replace, intimidation, franchise, amended complaint, antitrust claim, coercion, restrain, alleges, argues, contract claim, ambiguous, promise

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Appropriateness

Civil Procedure > Discovery & Disclosure > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Pretrial Matters > Continuances

HN1[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Appropriateness

Although under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f) summary judgment should be refused where the nonmoving party has not had the opportunity to discover information that is essential to his opposition, this protection arises only if the nonmoving party files an affidavit explaining why he or she cannot present facts to oppose the motion. Where a party opposing summary judgment and seeking a continuance pending completion of discovery fails to take advantage of the shelter provided by Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f) by filing an affidavit, there is no abuse of discretion in granting summary judgment if it is otherwise appropriate.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN2[] Summary Judgment, Supporting Materials

The party filing the affidavit opposing summary judgment must show how additional time will enable him to rebut movant's allegations of no genuine issue of fact. If the party fails to make this showing, he cannot claim the protection of Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f), and the court will accordingly assume that both parties have had ample opportunity for discovery.

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > General Overview

Governments > Courts > Judges

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Appellate Review > Standards of Review

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Movant Persuasion & Proof

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Trials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > De Novo Review

HN3[] Judicial Officers, Judges

A dispute about a material fact is genuine if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party. The trial judge is not to weigh the evidence to determine the truth of the matter, but instead must ask whether a fair-minded jury could return a verdict for the plaintiff on the evidence presented. In making the decision, the trial judge must consider all the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Thus, the trial judge must deny motions for summary judgment when reasonable jurors might disagree, even though the judge as trier of fact would find for the moving party. The appellate court apply this same standard as it reviews de novo whether genuine issues exist.

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Duties & Liabilities > Causes of Action & Remedies > Breach of Contract

Contracts Law > Breach > General Overview

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Duties & Liabilities > Unlawful Acts of Agents > General Overview

Contracts Law > ... > Affirmative Defenses > Fraud & Misrepresentation > General Overview

HN4[] Causes of Action & Remedies, Breach of Contract

In a breach of contract action, where a plaintiff produces no evidence demonstrating that a defendant had knowledge of admitted fraudulent warranties claims that resulted in its termination of the contract, the actions of the plaintiff's agent in making the fraudulent claims were imputed to the plaintiff, and the defendant thus could terminate the contract without breaching it. Therefore, with respect to the breach of contract claim, no genuine factual issue remains.

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

Contracts Law > Breach > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Causes of Action > Fiduciary Duties > Good Faith & Fair Dealing

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Crimes Against Persons > Coercion & Harassment > Elements

HN5[] Distributorships & Franchises, Termination

The Dealers Day in Court Act, 15 U.S.C.S. §§ 1221-1225, creates a new cause of action, other than for breach of contract, which did not theretofore exist, in cases where a manufacturer is guilty of coercion and intimidation in its dealings with its franchise holders, regardless of whether the franchise is terminated. The act requires automobile manufacturers to act in good faith in terminating, cancelling, or not renewing the franchise. 15 U.S.C.S. § 1222. The term "good faith" is defined narrowly in 15 U.S.C.S. § 1221(e) so that actionable conduct must clearly involve coercion or intimidation or threats of coercion or intimidation.

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > ... > Causes of Action > Fiduciary Duties > Good Faith & Fair Dealing

HN6[] Distributorships & Franchises, Termination

Coercion or intimidation must include a wrongful demand that will result in sanctions if not complied with.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Evidence > Inferences & Presumptions > General Overview

HN7[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 case.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN8[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

To survive a motion for summary judgment in an antitrust action, the plaintiff must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Contracts Law > Defenses > Ambiguities & Mistakes > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN9[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

Under a two-part evidentiary test for summary judgment in antitrust conspiracy cases, the court must answer the following questions: (1) is the plaintiff's evidence of conspiracy ambiguous, i.e., is it as consistent with the defendants' permissible independent interests as with an illegal conspiracy; and, if so, (2) is there any evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the defendants were pursuing these independent interests?

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN10[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

Per se rules of illegality are appropriate only when they relate to conduct that is manifestly anticompetitive. The substitution of one distributor for another is not manifestly anticompetitive. If a manufacturer decides on his own to substitute one dealer for another his decision to sell exclusively to a new dealer does not amount to an antitrust "conspiracy" with the latter.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN11[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Section 1 of the Sherman Act, codified at 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, prohibits agreements with either the purpose or effect of restraining competition unreasonably.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN12[] Sherman Act, Claims

The four elements of a claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act, codified at 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, include: (1) The plaintiff must demonstrate a combination or conspiracy to monopolize; (2) there must be overt acts done in furtherance of the combination or conspiracy; (3) the defendants must have a specific intent to monopolize; and (4) the combination or conspiracy must have an appreciable effect upon commerce.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Sanctions > Baseless Filings > General Overview

HN13[] Remedies, Costs & Attorney Fees

Federal courts possess the inherent authority to assess attorney's fees when the losing party has acted in bad faith, vexatiously, wantonly, or for oppressive reasons. This sanction may attach in any bad-faith lawsuit, whether unreasonably filed or improperly continued. The bad-faith exception for the award of attorney's fees is not restricted to cases where the action is filed in bad faith. "'Bad faith" may be found, not only in the actions that led to the lawsuit, but also in the conduct of the litigation.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

Torts > ... > Types of Damages > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Sanctions > Baseless Filings > General Overview

HN14[] Remedies, Costs & Attorney Fees

The bad-faith exception to the general rule that attorney's fees may not be recovered requires more than a showing of a weak or legally inadequate case, and more than a finding of negligence, frivolity, or improvidence.

Counsel: Richard B. Podoll of Podoll & Podoll, and Phillip S. Figa (Hugh A. Burns with him on the briefs) of Burns & Figa, Denver, Colorado, for L. J. Dreiling Motor Company, Inc., Podoll & Podoll, Richard B. Podoll, Burns & Figa, Hugh A. Burns, and Phillip S. Figa.

Philip E. Johnson (Morris B. Hoffman with him on the brief) of Mosley, Wells, Johnson & Ruttum, Denver, Colorado, for Peugeot Motors of America, Inc.

John B. Moorhead (Timothy R. Beyer with him on the brief) of Baker & Hostetler, Denver, Colorado, for Chrysler Corporation.

Judges: Logan, Barrett, and Timbers, * Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: LOGAN

Opinion

[*1375] LOGAN, Circuit Judge.

* Honorable William H. Timbers, Senior United States Circuit Judge, United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, sitting by designation.

In 1981, Peugeot Motors of America, Inc. terminated the franchise of L. J. Dreiling Motor Co., Inc. (Dreiling) on the asserted ground that Dreiling had submitted approximately $ 32,000 worth of fraudulent warranty claims. Shortly thereafter Dreiling sued, seeking damages for this termination on antitrust and [2] other grounds. On November 1, 1982, the district court dismissed Dreiling's claim under the Automobile Dealers Day in Court Act (the Dealers Act), 15 U.S.C. §§ 1221-1225, that Peugeot [1] failed to act in good faith in terminating Dreiling's dealership. Dreiling later [*1376] amended its complaint to add Chrysler as a defendant; and soon thereafter it filed a fourth and final amended complaint asserting that the fraudulent warranty submissions were "merely a pretext, and in fact [Peugeot] engineered or participated in the creation of their ground for termination," and that the termination actually was part of a nationwide conspiracy between Peugeot and Chrysler Corporation (Chrysler) to replace existing Peugeot dealers with Chrysler dealers. Plaintiff's Fourth Verified Amended Complaint, II Supp. R. Tab 21, at 12. The complaint alleged that (1) Peugeot breached its contract with Dreiling; (2) Chrysler tortiously interfered with Dreiling's and Peugeot's contractual relations; (3) Peugeot and Chrysler violated § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, by agreeing to restrain trade; and (4) Peugeot and Chrysler violated § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, and § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. [3] § 18, by merging unlawfully.

In 1985 the district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on all claims, L. J. Dreiling Motor Co. v. Peugeot Motors of America, Inc., 605 F. Supp. 597 (D. Colo. 1985), and subsequently ordered Dreiling and its attorneys to pay Chrysler's attorney fees. Dreiling has appealed the summary judgment, arguing that the trial court denied sufficient opportunity for discovery, and that genuine issues of fact remained with respect to the Dealers Act claim and the claims contained in the fourth verified complaint. Dreiling and its attorneys also assert that the trial court abused its discretion in granting Chrysler attorney's fees against Dreiling [4] and the attorneys personally. Peugeot on cross-appeal claims that the court erred in denying its motion for attorney's fees.

I

Adequacy of Discovery

Dreiling first argues that the "Opinion of the District Court unfairly granted summary judgment after extremely limited discovery." Dreiling's Opening Brief at 15. Defendants vigorously contest Dreiling's characterization of the extent of discovery; this characterization also is at odds with the district court's finding:

> "Discovery has been extensive. Plaintiffs served hundreds of written interrogatories and requests for production of documents on Peugeot. Seventeen depositions have been taken, ten by Dreiling and seven by Peugeot. At the preliminary injunction hearing on June 26, 1981, ten witnesses testified for about six hours. Numerous affidavits and exhibits have been submitted by both sides in support of various motions. While one would not measure the worth of the Mona Lisa by the weight of the paint, it merits notice that the court file in this case is approximately fifteen inches thick, and this does not include most of the documents produced by discovery."

605 F. Supp. at 600.

We need not decide whether discovery was sufficient, [5] as Dreiling failed to alert the district court to this issue in a proper manner. HN1[] Although the Supreme Court has held that, under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f), "summary judgment [should] be refused where the nonmoving party has not had the opportunity to discover information that is essential to his opposition," Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 250 n. 5, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 106 S. Ct. 2505 (1986), this protection arises only if the nonmoving party files an affidavit explaining why he or she cannot present facts to oppose the motion. Weir v. Anaconda Co., 773 F.2d 1073, 1082 (10th Cir. 1985). "Where a party opposing summary judgment and seeking a continuance pending completion of discovery fails to take advantage of the shelter provided by Rule 56(f) by filing an affidavit, there is no [*1377] abuse of discretion in granting summary judgment if it is otherwise appropriate." Pasternak v. Lear Petroleum Exploration, Inc., 790 F.2d 828, 832-33 (10th Cir. 1986).

---

[1] The complaint named three members of the Peugeot corporate family: Peugeot Motors of America, Inc. ("PMA"), a Delaware corporation; Peugeot, S.A. ("PSA"), a French corporation; and Automobiles Peugeot ("AP"), a French corporation. PSA owns one hundred percent of AP. PSA owns ten percent of PMA and AP owns the remaining ninety percent. Chrysler owns approximately fifteen percent of PSA. Except when differentiation is relevant, the Peugeot corporate family will be denominated simply as "Peugeot."

Even if we considered Dreiling's Memorandum Brief in Opposition and Dreiling's general statements at hearings about its inability to take depositions of the highest officers of Chrysler and Peugeot as affidavits, [2] see Weir, 773 F.2d at 1083; Pasternak, [6] 790 F.2d at 833, they would be insufficient to satisfy the requirements of Rule 56(f) for a continuance to permit additional discovery. The Memorandum Brief argues only that summary judgment is not appropriate because genuine issues of fact remain. Instead of contending that additional discovery is necessary to raise a genuine issue, the brief concludes: "Plaintiff desires to get this case to trial at the earliest possible date and would request that this court immediately set a trial date . . . ." II Supp. R. Tab 27, at 19. The other statements simply express the hope that depositions of the high officers will turn up something useful to Dreiling's case. We have held that HN2[] "the party filing the affidavit must show how additional time will enable him to rebut movant's allegations of no genuine issue of fact." Patty Precision v. Brown & Sharpe Mfg. Co., 742 F.2d 1260, 1264 (10th Cir. 1984). Having failed to make this showing Dreiling cannot claim the protection of Rule 56(f), and we will accordingly "assume that both parties have had ample opportunity for discovery." Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. at 250 n. 5.

[7] II

Genuine Issues of Fact

We must now address whether "genuine issues" remain with respect to Dreiling's claims. The Supreme Court, in Liberty Lobby, held that HN3[] a dispute about a material fact is genuine "if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." 477 U.S. at 248. The trial judge is not to weigh the evidence to determine the truth of the matter, but instead must ask "whether a fair-minded jury could return a verdict for the plaintiff on the evidence presented." Id. at 252. In making the decision, the trial judge must consider all the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Redhouse v. Quality Ford Sales, Inc., 511 F.2d 230, 234 (10th Cir. 1975). Thus, the trial judge must deny motions for summary judgment when reasonable jurors might disagree, even though the judge as trier of fact would find for the moving party. On appeal, we apply this same standard, Weir, 773 F.2d at 1079, as we review de novo whether genuine issues exist.

A. Breach of Contract

Although Dreiling argues on appeal that it "never admitted the existence of fraudulent warranty claims," Dreiling's Opening Brief at 16, the record [8] is to the contrary. Paragraph 22 of its original Verified Complaint, I Supp. R. Tab 1, at 4, concedes that

> "between the dates of March, 1980, and December, 1980, Defendant Lou Bartlett submitted fraudulent warranty claims to Defendant Peugeot Motors of America, Inc., using the forms of Plaintiff, the L. J. Dreiling Motor Company, Inc., and purportedly submitting said fraudulent warranty claims as an authorized representative of Plaintiff the L. J. Dreiling Motor Company, acting within the scope of his employ."

Although subsequent amended complaints excluded this admission, Dreiling's counsel confessed the fraud at an April 17, 1984, hearing. Moreover, counsel admitted that Dreiling "got the money for those fraudulent claims." IV Supp. R. 22.

Section 25 C.1.f. of the Dealer Agreement states that Peugeot may terminate the dealership in the event of "any materially false or fraudulent claim or statement relating to . . . warranty repairs. . . ." I Supp. R. Tab 1, Exh. A (emphasis added). [*1378] In the face of the admitted fraudulent warranty claims, Peugeot's termination of the dealership does not breach the dealer agreement.

---

[2] Dreiling's familiarity with Rule 56(f) is evidenced by the filing of a Rule 56(f) motion and affidavit in response to an earlier motion for summary judgment.

Dreiling nevertheless contends that a genuine issue of fact [9] still remains as to whether the wrongdoing of its agent would be imputed to Dreiling. As the district court characterized Dreiling's argument,

> "Dreiling argues correctly that [Restatement (Second) of Agency] section 261 presumes an innocent third party and is inapplicable where a third party had actual notice and knowledge of an agent's wrongful conduct. There is a factual dispute as to when Peugeot gained knowledge of Bartlett's fraudulent submissions. Plaintiff alleges that in September 1980 Joseph DiStefano, a Dreiling employee, told William McMullin, the Peugeot central zone service representative, that some 'funny business' was going on in Bartlett's submission of Peugeot warranty claims. Dreiling argues that Peugeot had actual knowledge of Bartlett's fraud as of September 1980 and that his conduct after that time cannot be imputed to the dealership."

605 F. Supp. at 611. HN4[] Dreiling, however, has produced no evidence demonstrating that Peugeot had knowledge of the admitted fraudulent warranties claims made before September 1980. Bartlett's actions, as an agent, in making the fraudulent claims from March to September 1980 are imputed to Dreiling, and Peugeot thus could terminate [10] the dealership without breaching the contract. With respect to the breach of contract claim, no genuine factual issue remains.

B. Tortious Interference with Contract Relations

The Colorado Court of Appeals in Carman v. Heber, 43 Colo. App. 5, 601 P.2d 646 (1979), set forth the five elements for a tortious interference of contract claim under Colorado law, including the requirement that "action by the defendant [induced] a breach of the contract." Id., 601 P.2d at 647. Because we have concluded that summary judgment for the breach of contract claim was appropriate, we must find a fortiori that there is no genuine issue that Chrysler's action induced a breach. We affirm summary judgment on this claim.

C. Dealers Day in Court Act

Our affirmance of summary judgment on the breach of contract claim does not, by itself, resolve whether genuine issues of fact remain for Dreiling's Dealers Act claim. HN5[] The Dealers Act "creates a new cause of action, other than for breach of contract, which did not theretofore exist, in cases where a manufacturer is guilty of coercion and intimidation in its dealings with its franchise holders, regardless of whether the franchise is terminated." Hanley [11] v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 433 F.2d 708, 710-11 (10th Cir. 1970). The act requires automobile manufacturers "to act in good faith . . . in terminating, cancelling, or not renewing the franchise," 15 U.S.C. § 1222. The term "good faith" is defined narrowly in § 1221(e), Autohaus Brugger, Inc. v. Saab Motors, Inc., 567 F.2d 901 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 946, 56 L. Ed. 2d 787, 98 S. Ct. 2848 (1978), so that "actionable conduct must clearly involve 'coercion or intimidation or threats of coercion or intimidation . . . .'" Gage v. General Motors Corp., 796 F.2d 345, 351 (10th Cir. 1986) (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 1221(e)).

Dreiling contends that Peugeot used the fraudulent warranty claims as a pretext for terminating the dealership and that "a genuine issue of material fact exists concerning whether the franchise . . . was terminated as a result of the Chrysler-Peugeot agreements." Dreiling's Reply Brief at 10. To support this argument Dreiling points to evidence that Peugeot may have known about the fraudulent warranty claims as early as September 1980 but waited until May 1981 before terminating the dealership.

Dreiling may have had a Dealers Act claim had it shown that Peugeot used its knowledge of fraudulent [12] warranty claims and the threat of termination to coerce Dreiling into accepting higher sales objectives. See I Supp. R. Tab 1, Exh. G, H [*1379] (evidence of coercion). It is arguable that under § 1222 manufacturers cannot use even material breaches as pretexts for coercing or intimidating dealers. See York Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc. v. Chrysler Credit Corp., 447 F.2d 786, 791 (5th Cir. 1971) ("The Dealers Day in Court Act contemplates a cause of action even upon the assertion of legal rights if there is a failure of good faith in the exercise thereof."). But see Gage, 796 F.2d at 351 ("The exercise of these legal rights cannot amount to coercion, intimidation or threats as a matter of law."). Dreiling, however, was terminated even after it had accepted the higher sales objectives, thus undercutting any argument that the threat of termination was used to coerce this acceptance.

Further, Dreiling argues only that Peugeot terminated its dealership so that it could be replaced by a Chrysler dealership. Under this theory, the termination was an end in itself. HN6[] "Coercion or intimidation must include 'a wrongful demand which will result in sanctions if not complied with.'" Fray Chevrolet [13] Sales, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 536 F.2d 683, 685 (6th Cir. 1976) (quoting Ship & Shore Motors, Inc. v. British Leyland Motors, Inc., 1974-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P75,102 (D.N.J. 1974). As alleged, Peugeot's termination was not used to coerce or intimidate Dreiling. The allegations thus do not state a claim for relief under the Dealers Act.

D. Antitrust Allegations

Historically, summary judgment has been disfavored in antitrust litigation. In Poller v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 368 U.S. 464, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458, 82 S. Ct. 486 (1962), the Supreme Court concluded that "summary procedures should be used sparingly in complex antitrust litigation where motive and intent play leading roles, the proof is largely in the hands of the alleged conspirators, and hostile witnesses thicken the plot." Id. at 473; see also Umdenstock v. American Mortgage & Investment Co. of Oklahoma City, 495 F.2d 589, 592 (10th Cir. 1974). [3] [14] In 1986, however, the Supreme Court reversed the denial of summary judgment in a major predatory pricing decision, Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986). "The Supreme Court's reversal was based on its conclusions: 1) that the predatory pricing conspiracy was so economically implausible that the defendants had no motive to engage in it; and 2) that the evidence of an agreement to enter into this conspiracy was indirect and ambiguous." Instructional Systems Development Corp. v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 817 F.2d 639, 646 (10th Cir. 1987). Although Matsushita upheld the traditional view that on summary judgment the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion, the opinion is important because it held that HN7[] "antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588. Also it held that HN8[] to survive a motion for summary judgment the plaintiff "must present evidence 'that tends to exclude the possibility' that the alleged conspirators acted independently." Id. (quoting Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite [15] Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984)).

[*1380] 1. Sherman Act § 1

Dreiling alleges that Chrysler and Peugeot violated Sherman Act § 1 by entering into a multifaceted agreement in which, inter alia, Chrysler agreed not to compete with Peugeot if Peugeot would terminate some of its dealers and replace them with Chrysler dealers. [4] The alleged agreement thus consisted of a horizontal component -- the promise by Chrysler not to produce competing cars; and a vertical component -- Peugeot's promise to hand over the dealerships to Chrysler. The district court analyzed each part separately.

As to the horizontal component, the district court [16] found that Dreiling had failed to produce sufficient evidence of Chrysler's promise not to produce competing cars:

---

[3] In Umdenstock, we reversed summary judgment on an antitrust claim because there was inadequate opportunity for discovery. That decision went on to state, "On the record presented we cannot say with certainty that plaintiffs can prove no facts which would entitle them to the requested relief." Id. at 592. Dreiling has interpreted this statement to require the district courts in deciding motions for summary judgment "to determine whether other facts could exist," Dreiling's Opening Brief at 28 (emphasis in original), that would create a genuine issue. Even if this were the holding of Umdenstock, it has been overruled by Liberty Lobby. The questions of sufficiency of discovery and existence of genuine issues are distinct. If the sufficiency of discovery is not at issue, the trial judge should not speculate whether additional evidence could justify a trial but instead should determine whether the present record "is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. at 248.

[4] The Burns and Figa law firm argues that the district court erred in granting Chrysler summary judgment because "Chrysler produced no evidence or affidavits that it played no role in Dreiling's termination." Burns & Figa Opening Brief at 14. The Supreme Court has recently rejected this argument in Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265, 106 S. Ct. 2548 (1986), finding "no express or implied requirement in Rule 56 that the moving party support its motion with affidavits or other similar materials negating the opponent's claim." Id. at 323 (emphasis in original).

"Dreiling's allegation of Chrysler's agreement not to manufacture competing automobiles is similarly unfathomable. Dreiling's only support for this latter allegation is the following language from the preamble to the May 30, 1980 Agreement:

'Whereas CC [Chrysler Corporation] has determined that, in the light of the distinct character of the EIR [expensive import registration automobile] market, the distribution of Peugeot Vehicles via a selected number of CC dealers as herein contemplated will not be competitive with the distribution via these same dealers of the vehicles which CC currently distributed or plans to distribute during the term of this Agreement but will, in fact, strengthen these dealers to the benefit of CC and said dealers; . . . .'

But this is no agreement not to compete; rather, it is a statement of the fact that Chrysler and Peugeot did not then compete."

605 F. Supp. at 602 (emphasis in original). [5]

[17] In Gibson v. Greater Park City Co., 818 F.2d 722 (10th Cir. 1987), this circuit distilled from Matsushita HN9[] a two-part evidentiary test for summary judgment in antitrust conspiracy cases:

"(1) is the plaintiff's evidence of conspiracy ambiguous, i.e., is it as consistent with the defendants' permissible independent interests as with an illegal conspiracy; and, if so, (2) is there any evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the defendants were pursuing these independent interests."

Gibson, 818 F.2d at 724. As to the first part, Dreiling's evidence of a horizontal conspiracy not to compete is, at best, ambiguous. As the district court correctly observed, the preamble to the May 30 agreement reflected the absence of contemporaneous competition between Peugeot and Chrysler, not an intent to suppress competition in the future. As to the second part of the test, the preamble is perfectly consistent with the defendants' permissible interests in a joint venture, and Dreiling adduces no additional evidence that "tends to exclude the possibility that the defendants were pursuing these independent interests." Id.

Dreiling's appeal of the § 1 summary judgment [18] then must rise or fall on whether genuine issues remain as to the second part of the Chrysler-Peugeot agreement, regarding Peugeot's alleged promise to "terminate existing Peugeot dealerships to protect Chrysler dealerships who were [*1381] to acquire the Peugeot franchise . . . ." Fourth Verified Amended Complaint, II Supp. R. Tab 21, at para. 7-8. In analyzing whether the evidence of this theory supports a triable claim, we agree with the district court that the rule of reason governs this part of the agreement. See 605 F. Supp. at 604. HN10[] "Per se rules of illegality are appropriate only when they relate to conduct that is manifestly anticompetitive." Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 49-50, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977). The substitution of one distributor for another is not manifestly anticompetitive. See Ace Beer Distributors, Inc. v. Kohn, Inc., 318 F.2d 283, 287 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 922, 11 L. Ed. 2d 166, 84 S. Ct. 267 (1963); ABA Antitrust Law Section Monograph No. 9, 26-27; see generally, Posner, The Next Step in Antitrust Treatment of Restricted Distribution Per Se Legality, 48 U. Chi. L. Rev. 6 (1981). If a manufacturer "'decides on his own to substitute one dealer for another . . . [19] his decision to sell exclusively to a new dealer does not amount to an antitrust "conspiracy" with the latter . . . .'" Fuchs Sugars & Syrups, Inc. v. Amstar Corp., 602 F.2d 1025, 1030 (2d Cir.) (quoting Bowen v. New York News, Inc., 522 F.2d 1242, 1254 (2d Cir. 1975), cert.

[5] The district court also concluded that Dreiling lacked standing to object to the alleged Chrysler-Peugeot agreement. It stated:

"Furthermore, Dreiling's alleged injury, its termination as a Peugeot franchisee, could not have been caused by these alleged horizontal market division aspects of the agreement between Chrysler and Peugeot." 605 F. Supp. at 602. We do not reach the standing issue, because we agree that Dreiling has not established a genuine issue of horizontal conspiracy.

denied, 425 U.S. 936, 48 L. Ed. 2d 177, 96 S. Ct. 1667 (1976)), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 917, 100 S. Ct. 232, 62 L. Ed. 2d 172 (1979).

The district court found that Peugeot had not promised to replace existing Peugeot dealers with Chrysler dealers, 605 F. Supp. at 605-07, and regarding the agreements that Chrysler and Peugeot did make, the court found "neither an anticompetitive intent nor an anticompetitive purpose." Id. at 605. The district court correctly noted that HN11[] § 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits agreements with either the purpose or effect of restraining competition unreasonably. 605 F. Supp. at 608; see United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 224 n.59, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 60 S. Ct. 811 (1940); L. Sullivan, Antitrust at 194 ("If either the purpose or effect of a practice evaluated under the rule of reason is sufficiently adverse to competition to outweigh any benefits, the conduct is deemed unreasonable."). In reviewing the issue de novo, we conclude that summary [20] judgment is appropriate.

In its complaint, Dreiling alleges that defendants restrained the sale and purchase of expensive import registration automobiles (EIRs) within Colorado and throughout the United States. But Dreiling has not demonstrated how replacing Peugeot with Chrysler dealers would restrain trade in the EIR market. As to effect, Dreiling presented no plausible theory of how the dealer replacement would restrain either the manufacture or distribution of automobiles. "Dealings between a manufacturer and its agents may be arbitrary, unfair, or lacking in good business judgment, but, without more, they will not violate the Act." Kestenbaum v. Falstaff Brewing Corp., 575 F.2d 564, 571 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 909, 59 L. Ed. 2d 457, 99 S. Ct. 1218 (1979). The record contains no evidence that the dealer replacement would reduce competition in either manufacturing or sales. Cf. Bowen, 522 F.2d at 1254-56 (newspaper illegally agreed with exclusive franchise dealers to eliminate competition from nonexclusive dealers).

Just as Dreiling's counsel has failed ex post to enunciate a plausible theory of anticompetitive effect, the record does not show that the agreement was motivated by [21] any anticompetitive purpose. Dreiling complains that its inability to show purpose is due to the district court stay of discovery, which "allowed absolutely no discovery against Chrysler . . . ." Dreiling's Opening Brief at 4 (emphasis in original). While summary judgment should rarely be granted prior to discovery against one defendant, we again feel bound to consider the record as it stands absent a Rule 56(f) affidavit. Moreover, Dreiling's failure even to assert a plausible anticompetitive effect leads us to agree with the district court that the possibility that proposed discovery of high-ranking Peugeot and Chrysler representatives would reveal an anticompetitive purpose "is so remote that it cannot defeat this grant of summary judgment . . . ." 605 F. Supp. at 609.

[*1382] In sum, we discern no genuine issues of fact regarding either horizontal or vertical restraints in violation of Sherman Act § 1.

2. Sherman Act § 2 and Clayton Act § 7

Dreiling contends that Chrysler's acquisition, in 1978, of approximately fifteen percent of PSA's stock constitutes a combination by Chrysler and Peugeot to monopolize the EIR market in Colorado and the United States, in violation of Sherman Act [22] § 2 and Clayton Act § 7. This court set forth HN12[] the four elements of a § 2 claim in Olsen v. Progressive Music Supply, Inc., 703 F.2d 432 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 866, 78 L. Ed. 2d 172, 104 S. Ct. 197 (1983): (1) The plaintiff must demonstrate a combination or conspiracy to monopolize; (2) there must be overt acts done in furtherance of the combination or conspiracy; (3) the defendants must have a specific intent to monopolize; and (4) the combination or conspiracy must have an appreciable effect upon commerce. Id. at 436-38.

We agree with the district court that Dreiling has not shown an appreciable effect upon commerce. Although it has adduced evidence of its own termination, Dreiling has not produced any evidence of a wide-scale substitution of Chrysler-Peugeot dealers for other existing Peugeot dealers. Dreiling similarly lacks even a scintilla of evidence to support its assertion that this lawsuit dissuaded Chrysler and Peugeot from pursuing the alleged plot to terminate the existing Peugeot dealers. The case reduces to the termination of Dreiling, and only Dreiling. We do not believe, under the relevant Supreme Court standards, that the replacement of one dealer constitutes a sufficient impact [23] upon commerce to state a § 2 claim. See United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 225, 91 L.

Ed. 2010, 67 S. Ct. 1560 (1947); Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 97 L. Ed. 1277, 73 S. Ct. 872 (1953).

We also affirm the district court's summary disposition of the Clayton Act count. Having chosen the sale of EIRs as the line of commerce, Dreiling must come forth with evidence both of Chrysler's presence as a competitor in the EIR market and of market power by Peugeot and/or Chrysler. Dreiling failed not only to discharge this burden but also to suggest how additional discovery and a full trial would develop these critical elements.

III

Attorney's Fees

Despite the American rule that each party shall bear its own litigation expenses, HN13[] federal courts possess the inherent authority to "assess attorneys' fees . . . when the losing party has 'acted in bad faith, vexatiously, wantonly, or for oppressive reasons . . . .'" Alyeska Pipeline Service Co. v. Wilderness Society, 421 U.S. 240, 258-59, 44 L. Ed. 2d 141, 95 S. Ct. 1612 (1975) (quoting F.D. Rich Co. v. United States ex rel. Industrial Lumber Co., 417 U.S. 116, 129, 40 L. Ed. 2d 703, 94 S. Ct. 2157 (1974)). This sanction may attach in any bad-faith lawsuit, whether unreasonably filed or improperly continued:

> "The [24] bad-faith exception for the award of attorney's fees is not restricted to cases where the action is filed in bad faith. '"Bad faith" may be found, not only in the actions that led to the lawsuit, but also in the conduct of the litigation.' Hall v. Cole, 412 U.S. 1, 15, 36 L. Ed. 2d 702, 93 S. Ct. 1943 (1973)."

Roadway Express, Inc. v. Piper, 447 U.S. 752, 766, 65 L. Ed. 2d 488, 100 S. Ct. 2455 (1980). Both client and counsel may be held liable for attorney's fees. Id. Recognizing that illiberal use of the sanction might discourage the zealous advocacy of difficult cases, we trust the imposition of attorney's fees to the cautious discretion of the district court, Mertsching v. United States, 704 F.2d 505, 506 (10th Cir.) (per curiam), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 829, 78 L. Ed. 2d 108, 104 S. Ct. 105 (1983), after fair notice to the parties and a hearing on the record. Roadway Express, 447 U.S. at 767; Rosewitz v. Latting, 689 F.2d 175, 178 (10th Cir. 1982). We note, however, that HN14[] the bad-faith exception to the [*1383] general rule that attorney's fees may not be recovered requires more than a showing of a weak or legally inadequate case, and more than a finding of negligence, frivolity, or improvidence. Cornwall v. Robinson, 654 F.2d 685, 687 (10th Cir. 1981). It is [25] a narrow exception indeed. With this in mind we review the district court's assessment of fees against Dreiling and its counsel, Burns & Figa and Podoll & Podoll, in favor of Chrysler and its refusal to assess such fees in favor of Peugeot.

Peugeot made its claim for attorney's fees after the district court had decided all claims in its favor on summary judgment. The district court carefully weighed its interests in being free of frivolous claims and in being open and amenable to consider creative claims put forth in good faith. Noting that the court itself had recommended Dreiling retain counsel experienced in antitrust law, and complimenting the reputation and experience of Burns & Figa, who were retained before preparing the third and fourth amended complaints, the court ruled, "I can't say that an attorney in good faith reviewing this matter would not have proceeded." V. Supp. R. 40. It therefore denied Peugeot's motion.

But at the same time the court granted Chrysler's motion for attorney's fees, finding that adding Chrysler as a defendant was "not well-grounded in fact, the case [was] not warranted by existing law, or any good faith argument for the extension, modification or [26] reversal of existing law and rather it was interposed for improper purposes." V. Supp. R. at 36-37. It declared that Chrysler's joinder "was a last-minute desperate attempt to bring in somebody to try to keep the ship afloat and get some walking money into the case. . . ." Id. at 36.

We hold the district court correctly denied fees to Peugeot but wrongfully granted them to Chrysler. We believe, as the court stated with respect to Peugeot's request, that a reasonable attorney who faced these facts might well have filed the suit. The reassertion of the Dealers Act and interference-with-contract claims in connection with an alleged conspiracy was questionable in light of the court's having already dismissed, in a different context, the Dealers Act and contract claims against Peugeot; they were not, however, precluded by the earlier dismissal.

Further, we agree with the district court that Dreiling's antitrust claims against Peugeot were not so frivolous as to justify attorney's fees as a sanction. But we cannot agree with the district court that the antitrust claims against Chrysler were inherently less meritorious than the antitrust claims against Peugeot. The court itself approved [27] the addition of Chrysler as a party defendant, after Chrysler's agreements with Peugeot had been mentioned from the outset, and the court suggested obtaining experienced antitrust counsel like Burns & Figa. In fact, Dreiling's third and fourth amended complaints, asserting antitrust claims against Chrysler and Peugeot based upon the several agreements between those defendants, seem to us considerably more meritorious on their face than what had been earlier alleged against Peugeot alone. Because the legal essence of the antitrust claims was that Peugeot and Chrysler combined or conspired to restrain trade, we believe that the attorney's fee award either should have been granted in favor of both defendants or in favor of neither.

The principal infirmity of the antitrust claims came about not at the time of pleading but later, when Dreiling by its counsel failed to support its request for additional discovery with Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f) affidavits, and when counsel misconceived the burden of production of evidence to avoid summary judgment. These defalcations, however, became clear only after Matsushita, Celotex and Liberty Lobby, each of which were decided after the court's [28] grant of summary judgment. As noted, Matsushita heightened the antitrust plaintiff's burden with its holding that summary judgment is proper for a defendant when the evidence is indirect, ambiguous and consistent with defendant's permissible interest. Liberty Lobby clarified that the mere existence of some factual dispute will not defeat a motion for summary judgment; the court must ask itself whether a fair-minded jury [*1384] could return a verdict on the evidence presented. Finally, Celotex held that a party defendant moving for summary judgment need not support its motions by affidavits or other evidence negating the plaintiff's claim. These principles, freshly enunciated by the Supreme Court, have played an important part in our upholding the summary judgments by the district court. Although we do not wish to imply that these claims necessarily should have survived summary judgment under the state of the law at that time, it is only through the benefit of hindsight that the claims, and counsel's actions, could appear to be so unreasonable as to justify sanctions.

Considering the narrowness of the exception to the American rule against attorney's fee awards, that not even [29] objectively frivolous claims advanced in subjective good faith justify fee awards, we must reverse the district court's award of Chrysler's fees while affirming its denial of fees to Peugeot.

The judgment is AFFIRMED in all respects except the award of attorney's fees to Chrysler. As to that aspect it is REVERSED.

End of Document

LexisNexis

Gould v. Sacred Heart Hosp.

United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida, Pensacola Division

June 29, 1988, Decided ; June 29, 1988, Filed

PCA No. 86-4392-RV

Reporter

1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17434 *; 1988 WL 1017208

JEFFREY L. GOULD, M.D., and LOIS VIRGINIA GOULD, Plaintiffs, v. SACRED HEART HOSPITAL OF PENSACOLA; HOBGOOD, POST and BALCHUNAS, M.D., P.A.; ALBERT A. POST, M.D.; S. RANDALL HOBGOOD, M.D.; NORMAN W. HAINES, JR., M.D.; JAMES R. HARDMAN; and RICHARD ZEILER, Defendants

Core Terms

radiology, termination, conspiracy, alleges, by-laws, privileges, staff privileges, medical staff, monopolize, revoke, tying arrangement, regulations, antitrust, business relationship, conspired, patients, employment contract, licensed, tortious interference, public policy, concerted, reasons, recommendation, contracts, employees, annual, staff, defamatory statement, defendants', commerce

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

On a motion to dismiss, the district court must accept the facts alleged in the complaint as true and interpret them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN2[] Complaints, Requirements for Complaint

To state a claim in federal court, the pleader need only provide a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2).

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN3[] Pleadings, Rule Application & Interpretation

To give fair notice, the complaint must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain a recovery under some viable legal theory.

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Licenses

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Facility & Personnel Licensing > Revocation & Suspension

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Facility & Personnel Licensing > General Overview

HN4[] State & Territorial Governments, Licenses

See Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0115(1).

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Accreditation

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Facility & Personnel Licensing > General Overview

Public Health & Welfare Law > ... > Providers > Types of Providers > Hospitals

HN5[] Business Administration & Organization, Accreditation

See Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0115(1).

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Facility & Personnel Licensing > General Overview

HN6[] Business Administration & Organization, Facility & Personnel Licensing

The procedures proscribed in Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0115 do not apply where a hospital is not acting under the good cause rationale within the meaning of the statute.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Facility & Personnel Licensing > General Overview

HN7[] Business Administration & Organization, Facility & Personnel Licensing

See Fla. Stat. ch. 395.002(9).

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN8[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

See Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0115.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN9[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

Fla. Admin. Code Ann. r. 10D-28.56(1)(f) prohibits a hospital from acting on a request for appointment or reappointment to its medical staff or from dismissing a staff member without prior referral to the medical staff for their recommendation.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN10[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

Fla. Admin. Code Ann. r. 10D-28.58(2)(d) provides in pertinent part that a medical staff recommendation for the withdrawal of a staff member's privileges must be preceded by a thorough investigation by the medical staff or a committee thereof, with the subject member being given the right of hearing before the medical staff or a committee thereof.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Facility & Personnel Licensing > General Overview

HN11[] Business Administration & Organization, Facility & Personnel Licensing

When a statute establishes a licensing system, the terms of the statutory license are necessarily defined by the statute. Thus, the authority to revoke the license exists only to the extent conferred by the statute. If the statute sets out the grounds for revocation, there is no authority to revoke except for those grounds.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN12[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0115 was designed simply to define the types of disciplinary actions to which the protections set out in other parts of ch.395.0115 apply.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN13[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0115 provides for two forms of protection: (1) it affords medical staff members certain procedural guarantees, ch. 395.0115(1); and (2) it provides licensed facilities, their medical staffs, and others limited immunity from liability. Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0115(2).

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN14[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

The protections of Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0115 do not apply to all actions by a hospital against its medical staff members. They apply, instead, only to the suspension, denial, revocation, or curtailment of staff privileges for good cause, such as incompetence, negligence, or significant mental or physical impairment.

Contracts Law > Defenses > Public Policy Violations

HN15[] Defenses, Public Policy Violations

When a particular contract, transaction, or course of dealing is not prohibited under constitutional or statutory provision, or prior judicial decision, it should not be struck down on the ground that it is contrary to public policy, except it be clearly injurious to the public good or contravene some established interest of society.

Contracts Law > Contract Interpretation > Ambiguities & Contra Proferentem > General Overview

Labor & Employment Law > Employment Relationships > General Overview

Contracts Law > Defenses > Ambiguities & Mistakes > General Overview

HN16[] Contract Interpretation, Ambiguities & Contra Proferentem

An unambiguous contract provision can be interpreted as a matter of law, while an ambiguous provision raises a question of fact as to the parties' intent. The preliminary question of whether an ambiguity exists is a question of law. A contract is not rendered ambiguous merely because the parties disagree as to its paper construction.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Labor & Employment Law > Employment Relationships > Employment Contracts > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Dismissal > Involuntary Dismissals > Failure to State Claims

HN17[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Mere expectations are insufficient to create a binding term of employment.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Torts > ... > Concerted Action > Civil Conspiracy > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Criminal Offenses > Racketeering > General Overview

HN18[] Conspiracy, Elements

Not all conspiracies are independently actionable in tort. The distinguishing features of an independently actionable conspiracy are: (1) some peculiar power of coercion possessed by the conspirators by virtue of their combination, which power an individual would not possess; and (2) a malicious purpose to harm the plaintiff.

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Business Relationships > General Overview

Torts > Business Torts > General Overview

Torts > Business Torts > Commercial Interference > General Overview

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

HN19[] Commercial Interference, Business Relationships

A contract is sufficient, but not necessary, evidence of a business relationship. A tortious interference claim is designed to redress the loss of the advantage of a business relationship. The causation question, therefore, is not necessarily whether the interference induced a breach of contract, but more generally, whether it caused a loss of the gain the plaintiff would have received absent the interference. The plaintiff must establish that if the defendant had not meddled in his business relationship he would have profited from that relationship.

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

HN20[] Commercial Interference, Contracts

Parties to an employment relationship cannot be liable for interference with the relationship.

Labor & Employment Law > Employment Relationships > Employment Contracts > Breaches

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

HN21[] Employment Contracts, Breaches

An employee is properly treated as a third-party to the employer's business relationship with the plaintiff if he was not acting on his employer's behalf; i.e., in the interest of the employer, when he interfered with the relationship, even though the interference was pursuant to his authority as an employee.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > General Overview

Torts > ... > Concerted Action > Civil Conspiracy > General Overview

HN22[] Inchoate Crimes, Conspiracy

Tortious interference pursuant to a conspiracy, unlike the independent tort of conspiracy, requires proof of an independent wrong or tort.

Torts > Intentional Torts > Defamation > Procedural Matters

Torts > Intentional Torts > Defamation > General Overview

HN23[] Defamation, Procedural Matters

Federal law determines the specificity with which a plaintiff must plead a defamation claim.

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

Torts > Intentional Torts > Defamation > Procedural Matters

Torts > Intentional Torts > Defamation > General Overview

HN24[] Pleadings, Rule Application & Interpretation

The operative test for determining the requisite degree of specificity for pleading a defamation claim remains whether the allegation gives the defendant fair notice of the plaintiff's claim and the ground upon which it rests.

Torts > Intentional Torts > Defamation > General Overview

HN25[] Intentional Torts, Defamation

A private individual cannot recover for defamation without proof that the defamatory statement was published with some culpable disregard for its truth.

Family Law > Marital Duties & Rights > Causes of Action > Loss of Consortium

Torts > ... > Malicious Prosecution > Elements > Malice

Torts > ... > Types of Losses > Loss of Consortium > General Overview

Torts > ... > Types of Losses > Loss of Consortium > Spouses

HN26[] Causes of Action, Loss of Consortium

The right to recover for loss of consortium also exists wherever such loss is caused by another's wrongful act intentionally inflicted, as for example, a malicious prosecution of the wife, or a defamation of her character.

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN27[] Pleadings, Rule Application & Interpretation

The plaintiff must plead enough data so that each claim of the alleged antitrust violation can be properly identified, although the alleged facts need not be spelled out with exactitude.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN28[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Certain tying arrangements are per se violations of the antitrust laws. The essential character of a per se violation lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. The existence of forcing, i.e., the seller's use of its market power in one market to impair competition in another, must be probable or likely.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN29[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

The tying arrangement must foreclose a substantial volume of commerce from competitors in the market for the tied product. When the seller lacks the degree of market power needed to force customers to purchase an unwanted tied product, an antitrust violation cannot be established per se, but only by proof of an unreasonable restraint on competition in the relevant market. An unreasonable restraint on competition may be shown through direct evidence of diminished competition in the relevant market, or through indirect evidence of anti-competitive effect, such as an adverse impact on the price, quantity, or quality of the tied product.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN30[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Under the rule of reason, an unlawful tying arrangement may be established by proof that the tying arrangement unreasonably restrained competition. Such proof is inherently dependent on often complex economic analysis. A plaintiff cannot be expected to set out in his complaint the economic underpinnings of a rule of reason claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Damages

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > US Department of Justice Actions > Civil Actions > General Overview

HN31[] Remedies, Damages

Only members of a conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce can be liable under § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, for treble damages.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Geographic Market Definition

HN32[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing

An exclusive dealing contract is not unlawful unless performance of the contract will probably foreclose competition in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected. In other words, the opportunities for other traders to enter into or remain in that market must be significantly limited by the contract. The amount of commerce affected cannot be determined in the abstract, such as by calculating its dollar amount, but only by reference to the total amount of commerce in the relevant product/geographic market. Thus, the substantiality test requires a determination of the line of commerce and the geographic area of effective competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

HN33[] Regulated Practices, Trade Practices & Unfair Competition

The antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition, not competitors. An antitrust cause of action does not exist merely for restraint of an individual's trade, but only where a restraint of trade in a relevant market occurs.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

HN34[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

Group boycotts are among those restraints which, because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue, are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal per se.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Practices Governed by Per Se Rule > Boycotts

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

HN35[] Practices Governed by Per Se Rule, Boycotts

Not all concerted refusals to deal are group boycotts subject to per se condemnation. The per se approach generally has been limited to situations involving concerted efforts to deny competitors relationships; e.g., supplies or customers, they need to effectively compete. Therefore, unless access to the withheld relationships is needed for the plaintiff to effectively compete, a refusal to deal should be scrutinized under the rule of reason.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN36[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A complaint that does not set out the facts which warrant the conclusion that an antitrust conspiracy existed will not survive a motion to dismiss.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Monopolization Offenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

HN37[] Scope, Monopolization Offenses

Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, prohibits monopolization, attempted monopolization, and conspiracy to monopolize. The elements of monopolization are: (1) The possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

HN38[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Actual Monopolization

Monopoly power acquired through skill or luck, not exclusionary or anti-competitive practices, is not unlawful. Exclusionary behavior includes practices which tend to impair the opportunities of rivals and which either do not advance competition or unnecessarily restrict it.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

HN39[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Actual Monopolization

A monopolization claim does not require proof of a specific intent to monopolize. However, evidence of intent to monopolize is relevant to the question of whether the defendant's conduct was exclusionary or anti-competitive.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Geographic Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN40[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Actual Monopolization

The existence of monopoly power can only be evaluated in the context of the relevant product and geographic market. Determining the relevant market is a question of fact.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

HN41[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

Unlike a monopolization claim, conspiracy and attempt to monopolize require evidence of a specific intent to monopolize. Specifically, to establish an attempt to monopolize, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant: (1) had the specific intent to monopolize, (2) took overt acts in furtherance of a scheme to monopolize, and (3) had a dangerous probability of success.

Judges: [*1] Roger Vinson, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: VINSON

Opinion

ORDER

This case arises out of the decision of defendant Hobgood, Post and Balchunas, M.D., P.A. ("P.A."), a professional corporation of physicians exclusively designated to provide radiology services at defendant Sacred Heart Hospital of Pensacola ("Sacred Heart" or "hospital"), to terminate the employment of plaintiff Jeffrey L. Gould, M.D. ("the plaintiff"). The plaintiffs' 45-page, 15-count complaint names Sacred Heart, the P.A., three physicians, and two hospital administrators as defendants. The complaint contains counts alleging termination of radiology staff privileges and termination of employment without the process due under state law, various regulations, and hospital by-laws. It also contains counts alleging breach of contract, conspiracy to deprive the plaintiff of his right to practice medicine, conspiracy to tortiously interfere with the plaintiff's contracts and business relationships, defamation, loss of consortium, violations of Section 1 and 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and violations of the Florida Antitrust Act of 1980.

The defendants have all moved to dismiss (docs. 11,14 18). Additionally, defendants [*2] P.A., Albert A. Post, M.D., S. Randall Hobgood, M.D., Sacred Heart, James R. Hardman, and Richard zeiler have filed motions to strike the plaintiff's affidavit and portions of the plaintiff's memorandum (docs. 34,37).

I. The Alleged Facts

HN1[] On a motion to dismiss, I must accept the facts alleged in the complaint as true and interpret them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. Ancata v. Prison Health Services, Inc., 769 F.2d 700, 703 (11th Cir. 1985). Accordingly, the facts relevant to the instant motions are those set out in the complaint and its attachments, see Rule 10(c), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which are as follows.

At all times material to this suit, the plaintiff was a physician licensed to practice medicine in Florida, and was board certified in diagnostic radiology. On January 1, 1973, he was appointed to the medical staff of Sacred Heart. In September of 1974, Sacred Heart asked Gould to form a new radiology department at the hospital. Gould, Hobgood, Post, and a Dr. Brown formed a professional corporation of physicians, now known as Hobgood, Post & Balchunas, M.D., P.A., to operate the radiology department.

In 1974, the P.A. and Sacred Heart executed [*3] a contract (complaint, attachment A) which made the P.A. the exclusive provider of radiology services at the hospital. Under the contract, the hospital agreed to appoint to its medical staff all physician employees of the P.A. who received the affirmative recommendation of the credentials and executive committees of the medical staff, but only physician employees of the P.A. The contract authorized Sacred Heart to appoint a physician member of the P.A. to serve as chairman of the radiology department with responsibility to the hospital and its medical staff for professional and administrative supervision of the radiology department's operations. In addition, the contract required the P.A. to directly bill its patients, and specifically precluded the P.A. from incurring any liability on behalf of the hospital. Finally, the contract stated that the physician members of the P.A. were not employees of the hospital.

The P.A. elected Gould as its first president, and, on July 1, 1975, the hospital appointed him chairman of the radiology department. However, Gould did not enter into an employment contract with the P.A. until August 19, 1977 (complaint, attachment B), although the term [*4] of his contract was from January 1, 1976 to January 1, 1977, "and from year-to-year thereafter . . . unless either party gives the other written notice at least thirty (30) days prior to the end of the annual term . . . ." (para. 2) The P.A. could terminate the plaintiff's employment contract only upon the occurrence of one or more enumerated events constituting "cause" (para. 9).

On November 10, 1981, Gould was elected president of Sacred Heart's medical staff. Pursuant to the hospital's by-laws, Gould, as president of the medical staff, became an ex officio member of the hospital's executive committee and chairman of the medical staff's quality assurance committee.

The complaint alleges that, in personal conversations during the latter half of 1981, Gould recommended certain oil field exploration investments to defendants Hobgood, Post and Norman W. Haines, Jr., M.D. These defendants acted on the recommendation, but, early in 1982, their investments became "a financial burden" and they became "very dissatisfied" with them (para. 18c). On November 30, 1982, the P.A.'s board of directors voted to terminate Gould's employment, effective January 1, 1983. The P.A. notified the plaintiff [*5] of its decision in compliance with the notice requirement in the plaintiff's employment contract, "written notice at least thirty (30) days prior to the end of the annual term." (Complaint, attachment D). On December 21, 1982, after learning of his dismissal from the P.A., Gould approached the hospital's head administrator and requested permission to continue his radiology practice at the hospital. Two days later, the administrator denied his request.

Therefore, these operative facts seem to be clear: the hospital was contractually bound to utilize only radiologists employed by the P.A.; plaintiff Gould's employment contract with the P.A. could be terminated without cause by the P.A. upon written notice at least 30 days prior to the end of the annual employment term; and the P.A. complied with this provision in terminating the plaintiff.

II. The Law and Discussion.

A. Count I

The initial difficulty presented by Count I is in determining what claim it purports to assert. [1] The count is located in the complaint under the heading "Failure To Provide Due Process." The terminology of this heading suggests that the plaintiff in Count I is purporting to state a claim under the *due [6] process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States or under the corresponding clause of the Constitution of the State of Florida (Article I, Section 9). Consistent with this interpretation, Count I contains language associated with a substantive or a procedural due process claim. (paras. 24,29) Nevertheless, I can fairly conclude that the claim the plaintiff is attempting to state in Count I is that Sacred Heart, through Hardman, Zeiller, and others, and pursuant to a conspiracy among all defendants, terminated the plaintiff's radiology privileges without following the procedures required by Chapter 395, Florida Statutes, the by-laws of Sacred Heart, the Regulations of the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals in Florida, and the Regulations of the Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services ("HRS"). [2]

[*7] HN2[]

To state a claim in federal court, the pleader need only provide "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief . . . ." Rule 8(a)(2), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The purpose of this requirement is to give the defendant "fair notice of what the plaintiff's claim is and the grounds upon which it rests." Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47, 78 S.Ct. 99, 2 L.Ed. 2d 80 (1957). HN3[] To give fair notice, the complaint "must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain a recovery under some viable legal theory." In re Plywood Antitrust Litigation, 655 F.2d 627, 641 (5th Cir. Unit A 1981) (emphasis in original).

[1] The difficulty is not occasioned because the claim is too tersely stated. The 45-page complaint in general cannot be characterized as a "short and plain statement" of the plaintiff's claims. Rule 8(a)(2), F.R.Civ.P.

[2] The plaintiff clearly has not stated a constitutional due process claim as there is no allegation in the complaint indicating that any defendant was acting under color of state law or was involved in state action. See 42 U.S.C. § 1983; Lugar v. Edmondson, 457 U.S. 922, 929, 101 S.Ct. 2744, 73 L.Ed.2d 482 (1982); Florida Canners Association v. State, 371 So.2d 503 (Fla. 2d DCA 1979), aff'd sub nom, Coca-Cola Co., Food Division, Polk County v. State, 406 So.2d 1079 (Fla. 1981). The defendants' argument that Count I should be dismissed because Gould assertedly has no property interest in continued radiology privileges at Sacred Heart, thus, is misdirected to the extent that it assumes there has been a constitutional due process claim asserted.

These principles of pleading indicate that Count I does not state a claim. Obviously, a material element of the asserted claim in Count I is a violation of the enumerated laws and rules. The facts alleged in the complaint, however, do not indicate that the termination of the plaintiff's radiology privileges was in violation of these laws and rules.

(1) The alleged basis of the termination [*8] . Conspicuously absent from Count I is an allegation of the reason Sacred Heart terminated or purported to terminate the plaintiff's radiology privileges. None of the complaint's allegations suggests that the hospital ostensibly or in fact acted for reasons covered within Chapter 395, Florida Statutes (1981), or the regulations promulgated thereunder. To the contrary, the plaintiff alleges in Count VI that the termination of his privileges was not for cause. Specifically, the plaintiff alleges there that, in furtherance of a conspiracy among the defendants and others, the P.A. dismissed him, and Sacred Heart terminated his radiology privileges, "without justification or cause, but for reasons other than his inability to provide competent, high quality, medical attention and as a consequence of their dissatisfaction with an investment in which Dr. Gould recommended they become involved." (para. 55) [3]

[*9] (2) The scope of the subject laws and rules. Chapter 395, Florida Statutes (1981), provides for the licensing and regulation of hospitals in Florida. The only part of the Chapter that applies to revocations of staff privileges is HN4[] Section 395.0115, which governs actions by a "licensed facility [4] . . . to suspend, deny, revoke, or curtail the privileges of any staff member for good cause . . . ." § 395.0115(1) (emphasis added). [5] HN5[] Under the statute, "the procedures for such actions shall comply with the standards outlined by the Joint Committee on Accreditation of Hospitals, the Accreditation Association for Ambulatory Health Care, and the Medicare/Medicaid conditions of participation." § 395.0115(1) (emphasis added). This language unambiguously demonstrates that HN6[] the procedures proscribed in Section 395.0115 do not apply where a hospital is not acting under the "good cause" rationale within the meaning of the statute.

---

[3] Although in this allegation the plaintiff attributes the dissatisfaction with his investment advice to all the defendants, in paragraph (18) he identifies only Hobgood, Post, and Haynes as the defendants who received and acted on this advice.

[4] HN7[] A "licensed facility" is "a hospital or ambulatory surgical center licensed in accordance with [Chapter 395]." § 395.002(9).

[5] HN8[] Section 395.0115 reads:

(1) The governing board of any licensed facility, after considering the recommendations of its medical staff, is authorized to suspend, deny, revoke, or curtail the staff privileges of any staff member for good cause, including, but not limited to:

(a) Incompetence.

(b) Negligence.

(c) Being found to be a habitual user of intoxicants or drugs to the extent that he is deemed dangerous to himself or others.

(d) Being found liable for medical malpractice by a court of competent jurisdiction.

(e) Mental or physical impairment which may adversely affect patient care.

However, the procedures for such actions shall comply with the standards outlined by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, the American Osteopathic Association, the Accreditation Association for Ambulatory Health Care, and the 'Medicare/Medicaid Conditions of Participation.'

(2) There shall be no liability on the part of, and no cause of action of any nature shall arise against, any licensed facility, its governing body and governing body members, medical staff, or disciplinary body, or its agents or employees for any action taken in good faith and without malice in carry out the provisions of this section.

Section 395.0115 was amended in 1985 by Chapter 85-175, Section 3, after the incidents occurred which gave rise to this suit. The parties do not contend that the amendment applies retroactively, and, thus, I apply Section 395.0115 as it existed when it was allegedly violated.

[*10] Similarly, the facts alleged in the complaint do not show that the regulations of HRS pertaining to terminations of staff privileges [i.e., Sections 10D-28.56(1)(f) and 10D-28.58(2)(d), Florida Administrative Code (984)] apply here. In relevant part, HN9[] Section 10D-28.56(1)(f) prohibits a hospital from acting on a request for appointment or reappointment to its medical staff or from dismissing a staff member "without prior referral to the medical staff for their recommendation . . . ." [6] At first reading, it may appear that this regulation applies to any dismissal of a staff member, and, therefore, would apply to the plaintiff's loss of radiology privileges, regardless of the basis of Sacred Heart's action. However, the regulation's requirement of medical staff consultation logically indicates that the regulation is applicable only to dismissals for reasons relating to the subject physician's ability to competently practice medicine. The benefit of such consultation regarding matters unrelated to professional competence (e.g., where, as is alleged here, the hospital intends to terminate staff privileges [*11] for contractual reasons) would be minimal or non-existent. The only reasonable construction, therefore, is that HRS intended Section 10D-28.56(1)(f) to apply only to dismissals relating to a physician's ability to practice medicine, where consultation with the medical staff would assist the hospital's decision-making.

This interpretation is consistent with a HRS' authority under Chapter 120, and Section 395.005, [*12] Florida Statutes (1985). The latter statutory section authorizes HRS to promulgate and enforce rules "to implement the provisions of this part [part 1 of Chapter 395, Sections 395.001-395.25]." HRS' regulations pertaining to reductions in staff privileges should be read in light of the agency's limited statutory mandate. It must be assumed that HRS promulgated the regulations mindful that its authority was solely to implement the provisions of part 1 of Chapter 395.

As noted above, the sole provision in Chapter 395 relating to reductions in staff privileges is section 395.0115, which provides only for "good cause" reductions. In accordance with its limited mandate, HAS presumably has promulgated regulations which do no more than implement Section 395.0115. Thus, the agency's regulations governing reductions in staff privileges are properly interpreted to regulate only reductions for "good cause."

The only other HRS regulation governing reductions in staff privileges is HN10[] Section 10D-28.58(2)(d), which provides in pertinent part that a medical staff recommendation for the withdrawal of a staff member's privileges must be preceded by "a thorough investigation by the medical staff [*13] or a committee thereof, with the subject member being given the right of hearing before the medical staff or a committee thereof." The procedures required by Section 10D-28.58(2)(d) expressly apply to a recommendation of the medical staff or a committee thereof. The complaint does not indicate that such a recommendation was made. Therefore, the complaint also fails to allege that the termination of the plaintiff's radiology privileges violated Section 10D-28.58(2)(d).

The complaint also fails to allege facts which demonstrate that any of the procedures prescribed in Sacred Heart's by-laws applied to the termination of the plaintiff's radiology privileges. Article III, Section 3(a) of those by-laws permits Sacred Heart to reduce a doctor's clinical privileges "only after there has been a recommendation from the Medical and Dental Staff as provided in these by-laws." Under Article VI, Section 1(c), the curtailment of clinical privileges must be based upon "the direct observation of care provided, review of the records of patients treated in this or other hospitals, review of the records of the medical and dental staff which document the evaluation of the member's participation in the [*14] delivery of medical care, and the results of a health status examination in accordance with Article V, Section (b)." Article VII governs only "corrective action" where a physician's conduct is "considered to be lower than the standards of the Medical or Dental Staff or to be disruptive to the operation of the hospital . . . ." Finally, the appellate procedures set out in Article VIII apply only when a physician receives notice of a recommendation of the executive committee or, in some instances, of a decision of the hospital, that adversely affects his status as a member of (or applicant for) the medical staff.

---

[6] While it is not entirely clear, it appears that the plaintiff does not allege that he was dismissed from Sacred Heart's medical staff; rather, he alleges only that his radiology privileges at the hospital were revoked. while revocations of staff privileges are not covered by the literal language of Section 10D-28.56(1)(f), it is unlikely that HRS intended the regulation to reach dismissals but not curtailments of staff privileges. This interpretation is fortified by the reference in Section 10D-28.58(2)(d), a coordinate regulation, to "withdrawal of any privileges of a member of the medical staff . . . ."

Each of these by-law provisions concerns adjustments to clinical privileges based on the subject physician's professional performance and abilities. Moreover, Article VIII applies only when a physician has received the specified notice. The complaint's allegations, thus, do not show that these provisions governed the termination of his radiology privileges.

The claim in Count I for a violation of Sacred Heart's by-laws is also deficient because of an absence of authority which permits a plaintiff to sue directly under a hospital's by-laws. To be sure, a doctor may bring a breach [*15] of contract claim to enforce those by-laws on the theory that the by-laws constitute a contract between the hospital and its medical staff. See Lawler v. Eugene Wuesthoff Memorial Hospital, 497 So.2d 1261, 1264 (Fla. 5th DCA 1986). But this does not support a claim that the by-laws themselves are actionable (on a non-contract theory of recovery).

The availability of a contract claim also obviates the need to bring a separate claim directly under the by-laws. The plaintiff can, and has, sued Sacred Heart in contract to enforce Sacred Heart's by-laws. (See Count V) Thus, even if Count I presented a legally cognizable claim against Sacred Heart for a violation of its by-laws, that claim would merely duplicate a clearly recognized claim, asserted in Count V, for breach of contract. See Rule 12(f), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. [7]

[*16] In sum, the above discussion of Chapter 395, the HRS regulations, and Sacred Heart's by-laws shows that the complaint is devoid of any allegation that affirmatively indicates the applicability of that statute and the related rules. On the other hand, however, its allegations do not preclude the possibility that the laws and rules applied to the termination of the plaintiff's radiology privileges. The plaintiff has alleged merely that Sacred Heart terminated those privileges in fact without cause. He has not alleged, however, that the hospital did not purport to terminate the plaintiff for cause. Under the allegations of the complaint, it is possible, for example, that the hospital told the plaintiff that his radiology privileges were being revoked because of his asserted incompetence in order to mask an actual, but improper, motive. In such a situation, where the hospital is ostensibly revoking a staff member's privileges for his alleged incompetence, or other "cause," the physician is entitled to the procedural protections of Section 395.0115.

I have found no reported decision addressing the question of whether Section 395.0115 encompasses this situation. However, I believe my construction [*17] of that statutory section is consistent with its purpose. Logic suggests that one of its purposes in providing procedural protection was to prevent sham "for cause" revocations of staff privileges. Because the procedures insure that the hospital has a solid evidentiary basis for its decision, it prevents a hospital from acting ostensibly for cause, but actually for improper motivations, where a finding of cause is unsupportable.

(3) The Weathers principle. The plaintiff argues that he has stated a claim in Count I for a violation of Section 395.0115 on the ground that the statute prohibits revocations of staff privileges for any reasons other than those set out in the statute. His contention is based on the principle, articulated in In re Weathers, 31 So.2d 543 (Fla. 1947), that "[w]here a board or officer is granted the right and power to revoke a license for certain named reasons, causes, or crimes, set out in the statutes, a license may not be revoked for any other or different cause or causes not clearly within the provisions of the statutes . . . ." 31 So.2d at 544 (quoting Kentucky State Board of Dental Examiners v. Crowell, 294 SW 818, 819). I am not persuaded, [*18] however, that this principle should govern the interpretation of Section 395.0115, or that it has any application under the facts of this case.

HN11[] when a statute establishes a licensing system, the terms of the statutory license are necessarily defined by the statute. Thus, the authority to revoke the license exists only to the extent conferred by the statute. If the statute sets out the grounds for revocation, there is no authority to revoke except for those grounds. It follows that the principle enunciated in In re Weathers, supra, properly applies to the revocation of a statutory license. See In re Weathers, supra; Federgo Discount Center v. Department of Professional Regulation, 452 So.2d 1063, 1066 (Fla. 3rd DCA 1984); Bach v. Florida State Department of Dentistry, 378 So.2d 34, 36 (Fla. 1st DCA 1980); State v. Board of Business Regulation, 304 So.2d 473, 476-77 (Fla. 1st DCA 1974). However, I conclude that it should not, and does not, apply here.

[7] The plaintiff makes no mention in his memorandum in opposition to the instant motions of the regulations of the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. Nor has he furnished this Court with a copy of the portions on which he relies. Thus, I must assume that he no longer intends to rely upon them. Moreover, there is some question whether a private cause of action exists for a violation of those regulations.

The authority to revoke hospital staff privileges predates the enactment of Section 395.0115. Subject to the terms of its contract with a physician, a hospital has always possessed the authority to revoke that doctor's [*19] staff privileges. See Smith v. Piezo Technology and Professional Administrators, 427 So.2d 182, 184 (Fla. 1983). Therefore, although Section 395.0115(1) states that a licensed facility "is authorized" to suspend, deny, revoke, or curtail staff privileges, that statutory provision did not confer on hospitals in Florida any authority that they did not already possess. It follows that the purpose of this language could not have been to grant hospitals the authority to revoke or curtail staff privileges. Rather, as demonstrated by the structure of HN12[] Section 395.0115, it was designed simply to define the types of disciplinary actions to which the protections set out in other parts of Section 395.0115 apply.

HN13[] Section 395.0115 provides for two forms of protection: (1) it affords medical staff members certain procedural guarantees [§ 395.0115(1)]; and (2) it provides licensed facilities, their medical staffs, and others limited immunity from liability [§ 395.0115(2)].

HN14[] Under Section 395.0115, these protections do not apply to all actions by a hospital against its medical staff members. They apply, instead, only to the suspension, denial, revocation, or curtailment of staff privileges for [*20] good cause, such as incompetence, negligence, or significant mental or physical impairment. Section 395.0115 limits the scope of its protections by setting out in subsection (1) the actions which are subject to those protections. These actions are then simply referenced in the parts setting out the protection. For example, Section 395.0115(1) provides that "the procedures for such actions shall comply with [certain enumerated] standards . . . ." (emphasis added) Similarly, subsection (2) immunizes a licensed facility, its medical staff members, and others from damages "for any action taken without intentional fraud in carrying out the provisions of this section." (emphasis added) In short, Section 395.0115, read as a whole, indicates that the language in subsection (1) "authorizing" licensed facilities to suspend, deny, revoke, or curtail staff privileges was not intended to confer authority, but merely to define the scope of the protections afforded in other parts of Section 395.0115.

This statutory construction compels the conclusion that the legislature did not intend for Section 395.0115 to set out the exclusive grounds for suspending, denying, revoking or curtailing staff [*21] privileges. [8]

This reasoning applies with equal force to the HRS regulations and Sacred Heart's by-laws. Accordingly, Count I is DISMISSED for failure to state a claim.

B. Count II

In Count II of the complaint, the plaintiff challenges the P.A.'s termination of his employment contract. He alleges that the P.A. violated the same laws and rules enumerated in Count I by terminating the plaintiff's contract without following the procedures prescribed in those laws and rules. He appears to argue that the public policy of the state of Florida obligated [*22] the P.A. to comply with those procedural requirements. His argument is grounded on the following reasoning:

The Florida Legislature (apparently through enactment of Chapter 395) has indicated that it is the public policy of the state to provide members of hospital medical staffs in Florida with due process before restrictions on their staff privileges may be imposed. Exclusive contracts between a hospital and a professional association allow this public policy to be circumvented in the situation where the P.A. dismisses a physician employee pursuant to contract. The plaintiff apparently concludes that, because the hospital is contractually bound to withdraw the physician's privileges, it is encumbent upon the P.A. to provide the physician process in accordance with Florida's public policy.

---

[8] Under the plaintiff's interpretation, Section 395.0115 would effectively bar a hospital from entering into an exclusive contract with a professional association. Given the recognized benefits to the public of such arrangements [see, e.g., Jefferson v. Parish Hospital District No. 2, 466 U.S. 2, 43-44, 104 S.Ct. 1551, 80 L.Ed.2d 2 (1984) (O'Connor, J., concurring)], I find nothing to indicate that the legislature intended Section 395.0115 to prohibit such contracts.

I am not persuaded by this novel argument. Preliminarily, I point out that, by its terms, neither Chapter 395 nor the rules thereunder applies to the P.A. Section 395.0115 expressly applies to a "licensed facility," which is defined in the statute as "a hospital or ambulatory surgical center licensed in accordance with [Chapter 395]," Section 395.002. Likewise, the relevant provisions of HRS' regulations [*23] apply specifically to a hospital "governing authority," Section 10(d)-28.56, and a hospital "medical staff," Section 10(d)-28.58. Finally, the sections of Sacred Heart's by-laws pertaining to adjustments in clinical privileges expressly apply only to certain named physicians, departments, and committees in the hospital's administrative heirarchy, such as the governing board and the Executive Committee. See Article III(3)(a), Article VI(1)(c), Article VII, Article VIII.

The concept of public policy is sometimes utilized as the basis to declare a contract or one of its provisions void. See, e.g., John's Pass Seafood Co. v. Weber, 369 So.2d 616 (Fla. 2d DCA 1979). The legal justification for invalidating a contract on public policy grounds was clearly articulated by the Supreme Court of Florida in Bituminous Casualty Corp. v. Williams, 17 So.2d 98 (Fla. 1944):

It is only in clear cases that contracts will be held void as contrary to public policy as it is a matter of great public concern that freedom of contract be not lightly interfered with. HN15[] When a particular contract, transaction, or course of dealing is not prohibited under constitutional or statutory provision, or prior [*24] judicial decision, it should not be struck down on the ground that it is contrary to public policy, except it be clearly injurious to the public good or contravene some established interest of society. Courts, therefore, should be guided by the rule of extreme caution when called upon to declare transactions void as contrary to public policy and should refuse to strike down contracts involving private relationships on this ground, unless it be made clearly to appear that there has been some great prejudice to the dominant public interest sufficient to overthrow the fundamental public policy of the right to freedom of contract between parties sui juris.

17 So.2d at 101-02 (citations omitted).

The plaintiff has not identified the contract which he is challenging on public policy grounds. Presumably, it is the combined effect of the two contracts involved in this case: the exclusive contract between the P.A. and Sacred Heart and plaintiff's employment contract with the P.A. The former contract permitted the hospital to revoke his staff privileges without following the procedures proscribed in Section 395.0115, and the latter contract allowed the P.A. to dismiss him at the end of his [*25] annual term of employment.

Neither contract facially violates Section 395.0115 or its implementing regulations. Cf. Burroughs Corp. v. Sun Togs of Miami, Inc., 472 So.2d 1166 (Fla. 1985). Thus, either contract can be invalidated on public policy ground only if "it be clearly injurious to the public good or contravene some established interest of society." Bituminous Casualty Corp. v. Williams, supra, 17 So.2d at 101.

Section 395.0115's requirement that actions to revoke or modify staff privileges comply with certain procedural standards can hardly be characterized as being bound up with the "public good" or an "established interest of society." Id. at 101. The procedural requirement obviously is designed, not to protect the welfare of the general public, but to protect the much more limited professional and financial interests of physicians who enjoy or seek to obtain hospital staff privileges. A contract that permits the circumvention of this requirement, thus, is not clearly injurious to the public good or some established societal interest. [9]

---

[9] I note that while the P.A.'s contract with Sacred Heart, which was signed by the plaintiff on behalf of the P.A., enables the hospital to summarily revoke staff privileges under certain circumstances, that is not its only effect. The contract also provides advantages to the hospital, patients, and members of the P.A. See Jefferson Parish Hospital District No. 2 v. Hyde, supra, 466 U.S. at 43 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

[*26] I conclude, therefore, that neither contract at issue here is void as against public policy. I further conclude that the P.A. was not obligated by contract, statute, or public policy to afford the plaintiff any "due process," other than 30 days' written notice specified in the contract, before allowing his annual employment contract to expire. The notice was given as required. Accordingly, Count II is DISMISSED, for failure to state claim.

C. Count III

In Count III, the plaintiff alleges that the P.A. breached his employment contract when it terminated the contract without cause as defined in paragraph (9) of the contract. A review of the contract and the allegations of the complaint, however, unambiguously demonstrates that no breach occurred.

In paragraph (2), the contract defines its term:

The term of this employment contract shall be from January 1, 1976, to January 1, 1977, and from year-to-year thereafter, under the same terms and conditions hereof (except for salary and expense reimbursement which may be changed upon oral agreement of the parties) unless either party gives the other written notice at least thirty (30) days prior to the end of the annual term, that the [*27] employment is to terminate.

Paragraph (9) of the contract specifies the grounds upon which the P.A. may terminate the contract:

The occurrence of any one or more of the events listed below shall constitute cause for the Board of Directors to terminate this contract with the employee and upon affirmative vote of a majority of the Board of Directors, this contract shall be terminated by the corporation and the employee shall cease to be employed: [9 events are listed].

Attached to the complaint as Exhibit D is a copy of a letter from Post to the plaintiff dated November 30, 1982. The expressed purpose of the letter was to give the plaintiff "written notice that [his] employment with the corporation [would] terminate effective January 1, 1983." In the letter, Post certified that he personally delivered the letter to Gould on November 30, 1982.

Significantly, the letter does not indicate that the plaintiff's employment contract was terminated pursuant to paragraph (9); rather, it states that the plaintiff's employment with the corporation was terminated, in the manner specified in paragraph (2).

This conclusion is consistent with the P.A.'s decision to make the effective date of the [*28] plaintiff's dismissal January 1, 1983, and to certify that the notice of dismissal was delivered to the plaintiff on November 30, 1982. These dates were undoubtedly chosen in order to comply with the notice provision of paragraph (2). Specifically, the P.A. selected January 1, 1983, as the effective date of the plaintiff's termination because that was the terminal day of his annual employment term as specified in the contract. I recognize that the term "from January 1 . . . to January 1" may present an issue of whether it encompasses more than one year. The use of "to" instead of "through" makes it clear to me that the contract was for a calendar year term. Since the plaintiff was notified of his dismissal on November 30, 1982, he was given the requisite 30 days' notice. In short, the letter of November 30, 1982, indicates that the P.A. dismissed the Plaintiff by not renewing his annual contract in accordance with paragraph (2) of the complaint, not by terminating the contract pursuant to paragraph (9).

This conclusion conflicts with the plaintiff's allegation in Count III that the P.A. terminated his contract. In this situation, where there is a disparity between an allegation in [*29] the complaint and an attached document, the document controls. Dyal v. Union Bag - Camp Paper Corp., 263 F.2d 387, 393 (5th Cir. 1959); 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure, § 327 at 492-93 (1969).

Under the express and unambiguous terms of the contract, the plaintiff's employment could be terminated at the end of an annual term merely upon 30 days' written notice. [10] The letter of November 30, 1982, constitutes such

---

[10] HN16[] An unambiguous contract provision can be interpreted as a matter of law, while an ambiguous provision raises a question of fact as to the parties' intent. Scott Paper Co. v. Taslog, Inc., 638 F.2d 790, 796 (5th Cir. 1981). The preliminary question of whether an ambiguity exists is a question of law. Freeman v. Continental Gin Co., 381 F.2d 459, 465 (5th Cir. 1967).

notice. Thus, the contract and the attached exhibits affirmatively demonstrate that the plaintiff's termination did not breach the contract.

[*30] However, the plaintiff by affidavit states that he signed the contract with the understanding and intention that under the contract he could be terminated only for the causes listed in paragraph (9). (Doc. 30) In motions to strike the affidavit, the defendants argue that the affidavit should not be considered by this Court because, among other things, it contravenes the parol evidence rule. I agree.

As I discussed in note (10) supra, paragraph (2) of the complaint is clear and unambiguous. The plaintiff cannot now attempt to change its meaning through his affidavit. See, e.g., Jaffee v. Jaffee, 394 So.2d 443, 446 (Fla. 3d DCA 1981); Pearson v. Pearson, 342 So.2d 1018, 1019 (Fla. 4th DCA 1977); Smith Engineering and Construction Co. v. United States Fidelity and Guarantee Co., 199 So.2d 302, 304 (Fla. 1st DCA 1967).

The affidavit thus presents facts which would be inadmissible under the parol evidence rule. Accordingly, it may not be considered on this motion. See Rule 12(b), F.R.Civ.P.; Rule 56(e) ("affidavits . . . shall set forth such facts as would be admissible in evidence . . . .").

The plaintiff also urges by allegation and argument that he "had an expectancy [*31] that his contract would continue for so long as he provided competent medical service to the P.A. . . . ." (Complaint, para. 42) According to the plaintiff, this expectancy is enforceable in contract. However, the plaintiff's position is not supported by the law in Florida. The Second District Court of Appeal in Muller v. Stromberg Carlson Corp., 427 So.2d 261 (Fla. 2d DCA 1983), considered and rejected a similar argument on the ground that HN17[] "[m]ere expectations are insufficient to create a binding term of employment." 427 So.2d at 268; see Maguire v. American Family Life Assurance Co., 442 So.2d 321, 323 (Fla. 3rd DCA 1983). Count III is also DISMISSED, for failure to state a claim.

D. Count IV

In Count IV, the plaintiff alleges that "[a]s a consequence of the requirements of the Agreement between Sacred Heart and the P.A., the requirements of Chapter 395 of the Florida Statutes and the By-Laws of the hospital for which the P.A. was the exclusive contracting agent to provide radiology services, the employment contract between the P.A. and Dr. Gould required, expressly or implied in law, P.A. to comply with the By-Laws of Sacred Heart prior to terminating that employment." [*32] (para. 46) The plaintiff sues the P.A. in this Count for breach of contract on the ground that it allegedly dismissed the plaintiff without complying with Sacred Heart's by-laws.

A careful review of the plaintiff's contract with the P.A. reveals no contract language that even arguably incorporates or obligates the P.A. to adhere to Sacred Heart's by-laws. I must conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff's allegation in the alternative that his employment contract expressly required the P.A. to comply with those by-laws is frivolous. See Associated Builders, Inc. v. Alabama Power Co., 505 F.2d 97, 100 (5th Cir. 1974).

Nor do I find any legal basis for the plaintiff's allegation that the P.A. had an implied in law contractual obligation to comply with the by-laws. The plaintiff makes no attempt in his memorandum in opposition to the subject motions to explain the legal foundation for this allegation. He simply points out that he has made the allegation. Apparently, he believes that the allegation must be accepted as true for purposes of this motion. However, on a motion to dismiss, unsupported conclusions of law are not admitted. E.g., Stanton v. United States, 434 F.2d 1273, [*33] 1276 (5th Cir. 1970).

I can conceive of no legal principle under which Sacred Heart's by-laws would be incorporated into the plaintiff's employment contract with the P.A. If the plaintiff is asserting that the P.A.'s contractual obligation to follow the by-laws arose because of public policy, that assertion is rejected for the reasons discussed earlier in this order. Accordingly, Count IV is DISMISSED, for failure to state a claim.

A contract is not rendered ambiguous merely because the parties disagree as to its paper construction. Id. I find that paragraph (2) of the plaintiff's employment contract unambiguously establishes that with proper notice the employment relationship was terminable at will at the end of the annual contract term.

E. Count V

The plaintiff alleges in Count V that he had a contract with Sacred Heart which required the hospital to adhere to its by-laws. On the reasoning set out in the earlier discussion of Count I, Count V is also DISMISSED, for failure to state a claim.

F. Count VI

Neither in Count VI nor in his memorandum in opposition to the instant motions does the plaintiff plainly articulate the legal theory on which Count VI is premised. Apparently, because Count VI is located under the heading "Tortious Interference," some of the defendants have interpreted the Count to attempt to state a claim for tortious interference with a contractual or business relationship. However, read in light of Counts VII-IX, which clearly purport to set forth claims for [*34] tortious interference with contractual and business relationships, Count VI seems to me to assert a claim for the independent tort of conspiracy. Moreover, under the facts alleged in the complaint a claim for conspiracy exists, the plaintiff is entitled to proceed on that claim, regardless of whether he has explicitly pled that theory of recovery. See Thompson v. Allstate Insurance Co., 476 F.2d 746, 749 (5th Cir. 1973); 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1219 (1969). The pertinent inquiry then is whether the complaint alleges facts which are actionable as a civil conspiracy.

According to the allegations in Count VI, the defendants and others conspired ultimately to destroy the plaintiff's ability to practice medicine in Pensacola. In furtherance of this conspiracy, the plaintiff alleges, the P.A. terminated his employment and Sacred Heart revoked his staff privileges. In paragraph (56), the plaintiff alleges:

The Defendants knowingly conspired together and with other unnamed persons for the purpose of destroying Dr. Gould's ability to practice medicine in Pensacola, Florida. In as much as, on information and belief, the other hospitals in the Pensacola, [*35] Florida, area also had exclusive arrangements with contracting physicians to provide radiology services, when the Defendants conspired to terminate his contract with the P.A., which had the exclusive contract at Sacred Heart to provide radiology service, and to terminate his medical staff privileges to provide radiology services at Sacred Heart there was no other hospital facility in Pensacola at which Dr. Gould could practice his specialty.

HN18[] Not all conspiracies are independently actionable in tort. See Snipes v. West Flagler Kennel Club, Inc., 105 So.2d 164, 165-66 (Fla. 1958). The distinguishing features of an independently actionable conspiracy are: (1) "some peculiar power of coercion possessed by the conspirators by virtue of their combination, which power an individual would not possess;" and (2) a malicious purpose to harm the plaintiff. Churruca v. Miami Jai-Alai, Inc., 353 So.2d 547, 549-50 (Fla. 1977). I find that the plaintiff has not stated a claim for civil conspiracy because the allegations of the complaint indicate that the power to coerce or injure the plaintiff as alleged did not arise by virtue of the defendants' alleged combination. Instead, that power resided [*36] in the P.A. alone on the basis of its "at-will" contract with the plaintiff.

Under the facts as alleged in the complaint, the P.A. had power, absent any type of conspiracy, to "destroy" the plaintiff's ability to practice medicine at Sacred Heart. Alone, it could have terminated the plaintiff's employment, and this would have necessitated Sacred Heart, under its contract with the P.A., to revoke the plaintiff's radiology privileges.

Thus, the plaintiff has not alleged any facts which show that the alleged coercion against the plaintiff wad possible only through concerted action by the defendants. To the contrary, the facts alleged in the complaint affirmatively demonstrate that the power to "destroy" the plaintiff's radiology practice at Sacred Heart did not depend on concerted action by the defendants. See Margolin v. Morton F. Plant Hospital Association, Inc., 342 So.2d 1090 (Fla. 2d DCA 1977).

It could be argued that because only the P.A. could unilaterally wrought the destruction of the plaintiff's radiology practice at Sacred Heart, Count VI should not be dismissed as to the other defendants, who could achieve that outcome only by conspiring with the P.A. However, my research [*37] has uncovered no reported decision of a Florida court which has extended the independent tort of conspiracy to such a situation. In each case, the power to coerce or injure the plaintiff was not possessed by any of the defendants alone, and did not arise until the defendants acted in concert. See Churruca v. Miami Jai-Alai, Inc., supra; Margolin v. Morton F. Plant Hospital Association, Inc., supra; Snipes v. West Flagler Kennel Club, Inc., supra. In fact, the Supreme Court of Florida in Churruca, supra, expressly held that a conspiracy is actionable in tort only "if the plaintiff can show some peculiar power of coercion possessed by the conspirators by virtue of their combination, which power an individual would not possess . . . ." 353 So.2d at 550 (emphasis added).

Accordingly, Count VI is DISMISSED, for failure to state a claim.

G. Count VII

Count VII asserts claims against each defendant except the P.A. for conspiracy to tortiously interfere and actual interference with the plaintiff's employment contract with the P.A. The defendants argue, inter alia, that a breach of that contract is an essential element of the plaintiff's claim, and that the complaint [*38] indicates that the P.A. did not breach the contract.

(1) Tortious interference. while interference with a contractual relationship and interference with a business relationship are treated as distinct torts in Florida, it is apparent that the former is subsumed in the latter. Florida courts have held that HN19[] a contract is sufficient, but not necessary, evidence of a business relationship. See, e.g., Tamiami Trail Tours, Inc. v. Cotton, 463 So.2d 1126, 1127 (Fla. 1985). A tortious interference claim is designed to redress the loss of the advantage of a business relationship. See R. C. Hilton Associates, Inc. v. Stan Musial and Biggie's, Inc., 702 F.2d 907, 909 (11th Cir. 1983) (applying Florida law). The causation question, therefore, is not necessarily whether the interference induced a breach of contract, but more generally, whether it caused a loss of the gain the plaintiff would have received absent the interference. See United Yacht Brokers, Inc. v. Gillespie, 377 So.2d 668, 672 (Fla. 1979). The plaintiff, of course, must establish that if the defendant had not meddled in his business relationship he would have profited from that relationship. See, id. at 672; [*39] Landry v. Hornstein, 462 So.2d 844, 846-47 (Fla. 3d DCA 1985).

Therefore, the issue here is whether the plaintiff has adequately alleged that the defendants interfered with an advantageous business relationship between him and the P.A. [11] The plaintiff alleges that he had an employment relationship with the P.A. He also alleges that the defendants conspired to and did induce the P.A. to terminate that relationship. His allegations that he had provided high quality radiology services to the satisfaction of the P.A. reasonably infer that his annual employment contract would have been renewed but for the defendants' conspiracy. Accordingly, I find that Count VII states a claim for tortious interference with a business relationship.

[*40] (2) Third-party to the contract. This conclusion, however, does not end my inquiry. I must also determine which defendants may be sued on this theory. Under established law in Florida, HN20[] parties to an employment relationship cannot be liable for interference with the relationship. Muller v. Stromberg Carlton Corp., 427 So.2d 266, 271 (Fla. 2d DCA 1983); Buckner v. Lower Florida Keys Hospital District, 403 So.2d 1025, 1028 (Fla. 3rd DCA 1981). Under this principle, the P.A. obviously cannot be (and has not been) sued in Count VII. However, whether Hobgood and Post, as employees and shareholders of the P.A., also fall within the scope of this principle is a more difficult question.

The dispositive rule in Florida has been that if an employee (or other agent) of the entity which has the business relationship with the plaintiff is exercising his authority as an employee when he interferes with the relationship, he is considered a party to the relationship. See, e.g., Rabren v. Gulf Towing Co., 434 So.2d 340, 341 (Fla. 2d DCA 1983); Buckner v. Lower Florida Keys Hospital District, supra, 403 So.2d at 1028; West v. Troelstrup, 367 So.2d 253, 255 (Fla. 1st DCA 1979); [*41] Covert v. Terri Aviation, Inc., 197 So.2d 12, 13 (Fla. 3rd DCA 1967). However, in Sloan v. Sax, 505 So.2d 526 (Fla. 3rd DCA 1987), the Third District Court of Appeal recognized an exception to this rule. The court held that HN21[] the employee is properly treated as a third-party to the employer's business relationship with the plaintiff if he was not acting on his employer's behalf. (i.e., in the interest of the employer) when he interfered with the relationship, even though the interference was pursuant to his authority as an employee. 505 So.2d at 528. Thus, on the basis of an allegation that the breach of the plaintiff's contract was harmful to the defendant's employer, the court determined that the "third-party" requirement was satisfied. Id. Because I can discern no "persuasive indication" that the Supreme Court of Florida would reject the exception set out in Sloan v. Sax, supra, I must apply that exception in this case. See Studstill v. Borg Warner Leasing, 806 F.2d 1005, 1007 (11th Cir. 1986).

---

[11] I note that Count VII alleges that the defendants conspired to interfere with the plaintiff's "contract and employment relation." (para. 66) (emphasis added). This language reveals the plaintiff's intention to sue for interference with his relationship with the P.A. generally, and not merely as defined by his employment contract. Cf. Thompson v. Allstate, supra, 476 F.2d at 749.

The complaint alleges facts which demonstrate that the plaintiff's termination was detrimental to the P.A. The plaintiff alleges that his termination financially benefited [*42] Hobgood and Post because they then shared the P.A.'s revenues that previously had been allocated to the plaintiff. (para. 63) This allegation suggests that the two defendants had their own interests, not the P.A.'s, in mind when they decided to terminate the plaintiff's employment. More importantly, the complaint alleges that the plaintiff had provided high quality radiology services to the P.A.'s patients (para. 62), that the plaintiff was the only employee of the P.A. who could provide certain special radiology services required by some of the P.A.'s patients (para. 73), and that the quality of the P.A.'s services substantially declined after the plaintiff's dismissal (para. 93(g)). I conclude, therefore, that under the factual allegations of the complaint, Hobgood and Post should not be treated as parties to the plaintiff's employment relationship with the P.A., and that Count VII states a claim against them for tortious interference with the relationship.

(3) Conspiracy. The plaintiff alleges in Count VII that the tortious interference was pursuant to a conspiracy among the defendants and others. HN22[] This type of conspiracy, unlike the independent tort of conspiracy discussed [*43] in part II(E), supra, requires proof of an independent wrong or tort. See American Diversified Insurance Services, Inc. v. Union Fidelity Life Insurance Co., 439 So.2d 904, 906 (Fla. 2d DCA 1983). The conspiracy is simply a means of spreading liability among all co-conspirators for a wrong done by only some conspirators in furtherance of the conspiracy. See Donofrio v. Matassini, 503 So.2d 1278, 1281 (Fla. 2d DCA 1987); Nicholson v. Kellin, 482 So.2d 931, 939 (Fla. 5th DCA 1985). Since I have concluded that Count VII states a claim for tortious interference, I further conclude that it also states a claim for conspiracy to so interfere. Therefore, the defendants' motions to dismiss are DENIED as to Count VII.

H. Count VIII

In Count VIII, the plaintiff alleges that Haines, Hobgood, Post, the P.A. and other unnamed persons conspired to and did intentionally and unjustifiably interfere with the plaintiff's relationship with Sacred Heart. According to the allegations in Count VII, that relationship was an employment relationship evidenced by an express or implied contract under which the hospital extended radiology privileges to the plaintiff.

I find that the facts alleged [*44] in the complaint are sufficient to state a claim that the plaintiff had an advantageous business relationship with Sacred Heart in the form of radiology privileges and that the defendants tortiously interfered with that relationship. Accordingly, for the reasons outlined in the discussion of Count VII, I conclude that Count VIII presents a legally sufficient claim for tortious interference with a business relationship. [12]

[*45] I. Count IX

---

[12] Since the conspiracy is alleged to include others besides the P.A., Hobgood, and Post, the conspiracy does not run afoul of the principle that a corporation cannot conspire with its employees. See Buckner v. Lower Florida Keys Hospital District, supra, 403 So.2d at 1029. I also note that the defendants named in Count VIII may be able to show that their interference was justified. "Justification," however, is a defense to liability for tortious interference. See, e.g., Wackenhut Corp. v. Maimone, 389 So.2d 656, 657-58 (Fla. 4th DCA 1980). Because the factual basis for that defense does not appear on the face of the complaint and its attachments, I cannot rule on that defense on a motion to dismiss. See Oaxaca v. Roscoe, 641 F.2d 386, 391-92 (5th Cir. Unit A 1981); 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1277 (1969).

Count IX asserts another tortious interference claim. It alleges that the plaintiff had continuing business relationships with his patients and physicians in the Pensacola community, and that, pursuant to these relationships, the plaintiff received referrals and repeat business. The plaintiff also alleges in Count IX that the defendants conspired to and did interfere with these relationships in two ways: (a) they prevented the plaintiff from practicing radiology at Sacred Heart; and (b) one or more of the defendants made derogatory and untrue statements about the plaintiff's honesty and professional abilities.

On facts similar to the ones alleged here, the Fifth District Court of Appeals in Lawler v. Eugene Wuesthoff Memorial Hospital Association, supra, upheld the trial court's dismissal of a claim for interference with a business relationship. In that case, the defendant hospital allegedly had maliciously terminated the plaintiff physician's staff privileges. This action, the plaintiff alleged, had damaged his relationships with his patients and doctors in the community. The district court rejected the plaintiff's claim because "the alleged interference with [*46] these relationships was only an indirect consequence of the termination of [the plaintiff's] staff privileges." 497 So.2d at 1263.

This reasoning is fully applicable here. The P.A.'s termination of the plaintiff's employment and the hospital's termination of his radiology privileges, while directly affecting the plaintiff's relationships with the P.A. and the hospital, only indirectly interfered with his relationships with his patients and other doctors in the Pensacola community. Only direct interference with a business relationship is actionable. See McCurdy v. Collis, supra, 508 So.2d at 383.

However, the plaintiff argues that his alleged relationships with patients and physicians were directly affected by the defendants' alleged derogatory statements. Nevertheless, this general allegation of interference is defective because it fails to allege which of the defendants made the alleged derogatory statements. See Conley v. Gibson, supra, 355 U.S. at 47. Accordingly, Count IX is DISMISSED, for failure to state a claim.

J. Count X

In Count X, the plaintiff alleges that from October 1982 through January 1983 Hobgood, Post, and Haines told "doctors and others" that the plaintiff [*47] had "wrongfully appropriated P.A. funds to his own use," that he was "not providing competent radiology services to patients or physicians," and that he was "not carrying on his share of the responsibilities of the radiology practice of the P.A." (para. 88(a)). The plaintiff further alleges that those statements were made maliciously and without legal justification, and were false when made. In addition, he alleges that the statements caused him to suffer pecuniary loss, mental anguish, and injury to his professional and personal reputation.

The defendants press for dismissal of this count on the ground that it does not allege the elements of defamation with sufficient factual specificity. In the defendants argue that the complaint fails to allege: (1) the specific defamatory statements, (2) that the defendants made the statements without reasonable care as to their truth or falsity, and (3) the identity of those to whom the statements were published.

Preliminarily, I point out that while Florida law determines the elements of a defamation claim, federal law [specifically, Rule 8(a)(2), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure] supplies the standard for pleading that claim. See Caster v. [*48] Hennessey, 781 F.2d 1569, 1570 (11th Cir. 1986); 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1204 (1969).

Hence, HN23[] federal law determines the specificity with which the plaintiff must plead the alleged defamatory statements. On this issue, there is scant guidance available in the decisions of this Circuit. See Olan Mills v. Enterprise Publishing Co., 210 F.2d 895, 897 (5th Cir. 1954). Federal courts generally are divided over the requisite degree of specificity. See 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure, § 1245 (1969). However, courts have tended to adopt a stringent approach, see id. at 217, with some requiring that the defamatory statement be alleged in haec verba, Asay v. Hallmark Cards, Inc., 594 F.2d 692, 699 (8th Cir. 1979). HN24[] The operative test, however, remains whether the allegation gives the defendant "fair notice of the plaintiff's claim and the ground upon which it rests." Conley v. Gibson, supra, 355 U.S. at 47; see Caster v. Hennessey, supra, 781 F.2d at 1570. Applying this standard, I conclude that Count X adequately sets out the alleged defamatory statements. while the plaintiff does not reproduce these statements [*49] verbatim, he does allege their substance with reasonable specificity.

I reach a different conclusion, however, with regard to whether the complaint properly alleges the defendants' negligence. In Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 94 S.Ct. 2997, 41 L.Ed. 2d 789 (1974), the Supreme Court of the United States held that the states cannot allow HN25[] a private individual to recover for defamation without proof that the defamatory statement was published with some culpable disregard for its truth. 418 U.S. at 347. In response to Gertz, Florida has changed from a strict to a negligence standard of liability; a plaintiff must prove that the defendant published the statement with negligent disregard for its truth or falsity. See Boyles v. Mid-Florida Television Corp., 431 So.2d 627, 634 (Fla. 5th DCA 1983); Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Ane, 423 So.2d 376, 383 (Fla. 3d DCA 1982). The complaint in this case does not allege directly or by inference that the defendants knew or should have known of the falsity of their defamatory statements.

Finally, I find that the plaintiff's allegations regarding publication of the statements lack sufficient specificity. In *Caster v. Hennessey, [50] supra, the Eleventh Circuit found that the plaintiff's defamation claim was supported by adequate allegations of publication. The complaint in that case alleged in relevant part that the defamatory statement "was communicated to personnel within the defendant hospital and prospective employers." 781 F.2d at 1570. In this case, however, the plaintiff has alleged only that the defamatory statements were told to "doctors and others." (para. 88(a)) This allegation provides little notice to the defendants as to whom the alleged defamatory statements were made. In particular, the word "others" does not eliminate anyone from being a possible recipient.

For the above reasons, Count X is DISMISSED, for failure to state a claim.

K. Count XI

In this Count, plaintiff Lois Virginia Gould seeks to recover for loss of her husband's consortium. She alleges that the defendants' tortious interference with her husband's business relationships, their defamation of his reputation, and their failure to afford her husband due process when he was dismissed caused her to lose her husband's consortium. The defendants urge dismissal of this Count on the ground that loss of consortium is actionable only [*51] when the claimant's spouse either suffers physical injury or, as a result of intentional infliction of emotional distress, suffers mental anguish.

The Supreme Court of Florida has not directly confronted the issue raised here. However, in Food Fair, Inc. v. Anderson, 382 So.2d 150 (Fla. 5th DCA 1980), a Florida appellate court approved a claim by the plaintiff husband for loss of his wife's consortium, where the wife was suing the defendants for fraud and deceit. After acknowledging that in most cases the husband's claim for loss of consortium is based on the wife's physical injuries, the court held that "HN26[] 'the right to recover [for loss of consortium] also exists wherever such loss is caused by another's wrongful act intentionally inflicted, as for example, a malicious prosecution of the wife, or a defamation of her character.'" 382 So.2d at 155 (quoting 41 Am. Jur. 2d Husband and Wife § 451 at 379 (1968)).

Assuming that Food Fair, Inc. v. Anderson is an accurate statement of the law of Florida, I find that Count XI states a claim thereunder. The motions to dismiss are DENIED.

L. Count XII

The plaintiff argues that Count XII states claims under Section 1 of the Sherman [*52] Act, Title 15, United States Code, Section 1, for an unlawful tying arrangement and an unlawful exclusive dealing arrangement. The defendants assert that Count XII should be dismissed on several grounds.

It is now well established that the liberal pleading philosophy embodied in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure applies equally to pleading an antitrust claim. Quality Foods de Centro America, S.A. v. Latin America Agribusiness Development Corp., 711 F.2d 989, 995 (11th Cir. 1983). In fact, because of the factual nature of most antitrust cases, "summary procedures should be used sparingly . . . ." Poller v. CBS, 368 U.S. 464, 473, 82 S.Ct. 486, 7 L.Ed.2d 458 (1962). Nevertheless, HN27[] the plaintiff must plead "enough data . . . so that each claim of the alleged antitrust violation can be properly identified," Quality Foods, supra, 711 F.2d at 995, although the alleged facts "need not be spelled out with exactitude . . . ." Id. See Lombard's, Inc. v. Prince Manufacturing, Inc., 753 F.2d 974, 975 (11th Cir. 1985).

(1) Tying arrangement. In Jefferson Parish Hospital District No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 104 S.Ct. 1551, 80 L.Ed.2d (1084), the Supreme Court of the [*53] United States considered a challenge under Section 1 of the Sherman Act to an exclusive contract between a hospital and a firm of anesthesiologists. As the defendants have recognized, Hyde provides the analytical framework for determining whether the plaintiff has stated a claim for an unlawful tying arrangement. I begin my discussion, therefore, with a review of that case.

The plaintiff in Hyde was a board-certified anesthesiologist. His application for admission to the medical staff of the defendant hospital was denied because of the hospital's contract with a professional medical corporation providing that all anesthesiological services required by the hospital's patients would be performed by the corporation's physician employees. The plaintiff sued for declaratory and injunctive relief on the ground that the exclusive contract violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals found that the contract gave rise to an unlawful tying arrangement, but the Supreme Court reversed. In reversing, the Supreme Court set out the following method of analysis.

HN28[] Certain tying arrangements are per se violations of the antitrust laws. 466 U.S. at 10. [*54] The "essential character" of a per se violation "lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms." 466 U.S. at 12. The existence of "forcing," (i.e., the seller's use of its "market power" in one market to impair competition in another) must be "probable" or "likely." [13] Id. at 15, 16. In addition, HN29[] the tying arrangement must foreclose "a substantial volume of commerce" from competitors in the market for the tied product. Id. at 16. when the seller lacks the degree of market power needed to force customers to purchase an unwanted tied product, an antitrust violation cannot be established per se, but only by proof of an unreasonable restraint on competition in the relevant market. Id. at 17-18. An unreasonable restraint on competition may be shown through direct evidence of diminished competition in the relevant market, id. at 29, or through indirect evidence of anti-competitive effect, such as an adverse impact on the price, quantity, or quality of the tied product, id. at 30-31.

[*55] It is evident from the above discussion of Hyde that the two methods of establishing an unlawful tying arrangement involve different elements of proof. The essence of a per se violation is the existence of "forcing," while the rule of reason approach focuses on the anti-competitive impact of the tying arrangement. Because of these differences, the two methods of proof should be treated as separate claims for purposes of the instant motions. In that way, the defendants will have fair notice of the nature of the defense they will be called upon to prepare. See Conley v. Gibson, supra, 355 U.S. at 47. I must separately determine, therefore, whether the plaintiff has properly alleged either method of recovery.

(a) Per se violation. The facts alleged in Count XII fall short of establishing the elements of a per se violation. Specifically, the complaint fails to allege that Sacred Heart "possesses sufficient economic power in the tying [service] market to coerce buyer acceptance of the tied [service]." Tic-X-Press, Inc. v. Omni Promotions Co., 815 F.2d 1407, 1414 (11th Cir. 1987). To be sure, the plaintiff alleges that "Sacred Heart possesses the market power necessary to [*56] require its patients to use the radiology services of P.A. and its employee physicians." (para. 93(c)) (emphasis added). But, this is nothing more than an allegation that the hospital's medical services and the P.A.'s radiological services are tied together; i.e., that those medical services can only be purchased together with radiological services. [14]

---

[13] The market power needed for forcing can exist, for example, when the seller's share of a market is high or when it offers a unique product that competitors are unable to provide. Id. at 17.

[14] This allegation would be sufficient if Sacred Heart was the sole provider of the tying services in the relevant market. The plaintiff, however, has not made such a claim. See Seidenstein v. National Medical Enterprises, 769 F.2d 1100, 1106 (5th Cir.

Not every refusal to sell two products separately can be said to restrain competition." Jefferson Parish Hospital District No. 2 v. Hyde, supra, 466 U.S. at 11. As the Supreme Court observed in Hyde:

Only if patients are forced to [*57] purchase [the professional association's anesthesiological] services as a result of the hospital's market power would the arrangement have anti-competitive consequences. If no forcing is present, patients are free to enter a competing hospital and use another anesthesiologist . . . .

Id. at 25.

The plaintiff must plead and prove, therefore, that, because of some advantage Sacred Heart has in the market for the tying services, patients in the relevant geographic market are forced to purchase the P.A.'s radiological services on terms that could not be exacted in a completely competitive market. See United States Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enterprises, Inc., 429 U.S. 610, 620, 97 S.Ct. 861, 51 L.Ed.2d 80 (1977).

I realize that the plaintiff has alleged that "Sacred Heart provides certain medical services not generally available at other hospitals in the Pensacola, Florida, area on a basis generally affordable to the general public such as pediatric services." (para. 93(c)) (emphasis added). This allegation could be interpreted as alleging that Sacred Heart has market power over the sale of "certain medical services." But the use of the word "certain" deprives the defendants [*58] of fair notice of what the tying services are. This defect is not cured by saying that those services include pediatric services. Moreover, there is no indication that some or all pediatric services are only sold together with radiological services. In addition, the allegation in paragraph 93(c) is made more vague and ambiguous by the use of the word "generally." Finally, the plaintiff inconsistently alleges in paragraph 93(j) that the tying services are "Sacred Heart's medical services." Cf. Lombard's, Inc., supra, 753 F.2d at 975.

For the above reasons, the claim in Count XII for a per se unlawful tying arrangement is DISMISSED.

(b) Rule of reason. HN30[] Under the rule of reason, an unlawful tying arrangement may be established by proof that the tying arrangement unreasonably restrained competition. Hyde, supra, 466 U.S. at 29. Such proof is inherently dependent on often complex economic analysis. See, id. at 34 (O'Connor, J., concurring). A plaintiff cannot be expected to set out in his complaint the economic underpinnings of a rule of reason claim. In this case, the plaintiff has alleged the existence of a tying arrangement and anti-competitive effect (para. 37). [*59] Thus, I conclude that Count XII states a claim for an unlawful tying arrangement under the rule of reason. [15]

[*60] (c) Defendants. As the plain language of Section 1 of the Sherman Act indicates, HN31[] only members of a conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce can be liable under Section 4 of the Clayton Act, Title 15, United

1985). I also point out the implausibility of the plaintiff's allegation that all of Sacred Heart's other medical services are tied to the P.A.'s radiological services.

[15] The defendants argue that the only alleged restraint on competition engendered by the tying arrangement is the plaintiff's exclusion from the radiological services market in Pensacola, and that under Hyde, this effect does not, as a matter of law, constitute an unreasonable restraint on competition.

It may be that the plaintiff is basing his allegation that the tying arrangement adversely affected the price, quality, and quantity of radiological services in Pensacola solely on the fact that the arrangement allegedly prevented him from practicing radiology in Pensacola. However, that is not a necessary construction of the complaint, and, on a motion to dismiss, I must interpret the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. Ancata v. Prison Health Services, Inc., 769 F.2d 700, 703 (11th Cir. 1985).

It is true that the Supreme Court in Hyde observed that the exclusive contract in that case merely reduced a patient's choice of anesthesiologists at the defendant hospital from five to four doctors, and concluded, apparently, that that was not a legally significant anti-competitive effect. 466 U.S. at 30-31. But the Hyde Court certainly did not hold that a limitation on choice was the only relevant anti-competitive impact. The Court also (unsuccessfully) looked in the record for evidence of an adverse effect on the price or quality of anesthesiological services. Id. at 31 n.52.

States Code, Section 15, for teble damages. See Virtue v. Creamery Package Co., 227 U.S. 4, 32, 33 S.Ct. 214, 57 L.Ed. 391 (1913). The only allegation of a conspiracy in Count XII is the conclusory statement that defendants and others conspired to restrain interstate trade. (para. 93) The Count is devoid of an allegation indicating how any of the individual defendants participated in this conspiracy.

The agreement that creates the unlawful tying arrangement is not the contract between the P.A. and Sacred Heart. Hyde, supra, 466 U.S. at 18 n.28. That contract is nothing more than an arrangement whereby the P.A. supplies all the hospital's needs for radiological services. See, id. The contract raises only an exclusive dealing question. It is the hospital's agreements with its patients, which require them to use the P.A. for their radiological needs, that constitute the unlawful tying arrangement. Id.; Imperial Point Colonnades Condominium v. Manguarian, [*61] 549 F.2d 1029, 1042-43 (5th Cir. 1977).

This case differs from the typical tying arrangement where one defendant sells both the tying and the tied product. Here, as in Manguarian, one defendant provides the tying product or service and another the tied product or service. In that situation, although only one defendant is a party to the tying agreement (in this case, Sacred Heart), both defendants may be held liable "as members of a conspiracy to restrain trade by means of a tying arrangement." Manguarian, supra, 549 F.2d at 1043 (emphasis in original). Given the relationship of the P.A. to the tying arrangements in this case, it is reasonable to infer for purposes of the instant motions that the P.A. is a member of such a conspiracy. I am also willing to give plaintiff the benefit of the inference, in light of the fact that the P.A. is a closely held corporation, that Hobgood and Post "shape[d] corporate intentions" with respect to the P.A.'s participation in the alleged conspiracy, and that Count XII, therefore, also states a claim against those defendants. See Brown v. Donco Enterprises, Inc., 783 F.2d 644, 646 (6th Cir. 1986).

I reach the same conclusion with respect [*62] to defendants Haines, Hardman and Zeiler. In Count XIII, the plaintiff alleges that Haines, Hobgood, and Post met with Hardman, Zeiler and other Sacred Heart employees in an effort to persuade them not to permit the plaintiff to continue practicing radiology at the hospital after his dismissal from the P.A. Interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, these meetings could be viewed as actions in furtherance of the alleged tying arrangement conspiracy.

(2) Exclusive dealing arrangement. The plaintiff's claim against the defendants for an unlawful exclusive dealing arrangement is grounded on an allegation that the Sacred Heart/P.A. contract and similar contracts at other hospitals in Pensacola "erected barriers to entry into the market for the provision of radiological services in Pensacola, Florida." (para. 93(k)).

HN32[] An exclusive dealing contract is not unlawful unless performance of the contract will "probab[ly] . . . foreclose competition in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected." Tampa Electric Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 327, 81 S.Ct. 623, 5 L.Ed.2d 580 (1961). In other words, "the opportunities for other traders to enter into or remain [*63] in that market must be significantly limited" by the contract. Id. at 328. The amount of commerce affected cannot be determined in the abstract (such as by calculating its dollar amount), but only by reference to the total amount of commerce in the relevant product/geographic market. Id. at 329. Thus, the substantiality test requires a determination of "the line of commerce" and the geographic "area of effective competition." Id.

In this case, the complaint does define a line of commerce and a geographic area in which the Sacred Heart/P.A. contract and the other contracts in question operated. The plaintiff also alleges that the contracts raised significant barriers to entry into that market. This allegation could be read to infer that the contracts established barriers to entry because they foreclose competition in a substantial portion of the relevant market. But even construing the allegation this way, Count XII does not state an exclusive dealing claim. Count XII lacks an allegation that the P.A./Sacred Heart contract alone had the forbidden anti-competitive effect. while the structure of the entire market in which the contract operates is relevant in determining [*64] the exclusive dealing arrangement's impact on competition, see id. at 329, 334, the defendants' liability cannot arise from exclusive contracts at other hospitals, see Hyde, supra, 466 U.S. at 30 n.51.

Accordingly, the claim in Count XII that the defendants entered into an unlawful exclusive dealing arrangement is DISMISSED, for failure to state a claim.

M. Count XIII

The operative allegations in Count XIII appear to be as follows. The defendants conspired to restrain the radiological trade of the plaintiff and other non-P.A. radiologists by selecting the P.A. as the exclusive provider of radiological services at Sacred Heart and by refusing to permit non-members of the P.A. to practice radiology at the hospital. Acts taken in furtherance of this conspiracy caused several anti-competitive effects, including a decrease in the availability and selection of competent and complete radiological services at Sacred Heart, and an adverse impact on the quality and price of such services. The conspirators also impaired the ability of the plaintiff and others similarly situated to practice their profession in Pensacola. In addition, the defendants conspired to boycott the plaintiff's [*65] radiological services and intended to prevent the plaintiff from practicing radiology in Pensacola. They met with various Sacred Heart employees as well as physicians in the community who referred patients to radiologists, in an attempt to persuade these employees and physicians to boycott the plaintiff's services. Haines, Hobgood, and Post met with Hardman, Zeiler, and other Sacred Heart employees to convince them not to allow the plaintiff to practice radiology at the hospital after his dismissal from the P.A.

The plaintiff contends that these allegations state claims under Section 1 of the Sherman Act for conspiracy to unreasonably restrain his trade and conspiracy to boycott his radiological services. It is not clear whether the plaintiff purports to state a separate claim for "conspiracy to unreasonably restrain his trade." The cases on which he relies suggests that the only claim asserted in Count XIII is conspiracy to boycott his professional services. In either event, I conclude that he has not stated a claim for a conspiracy to restrain his own trade.

The Supreme Court of the United States recently reaffirmed the well established principle that "HN33[] the antitrust laws . . . were [*66] enacted for 'the protection of competition, not competitors.'" Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. , 107 S.Ct. 484, 93 L.Ed.2d 427, 435 (1986) (quoting Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S.Ct. 690, 50 L.Ed.2 701 (1977)) (emphasis in original). It follows that an antitrust cause of action does not exist merely for restraint of an individual's trade, but only where a restraint of trade in a relevant market occurs. That is not to say that an antitrust plaintiff need not show an injury to his "business or property," 15 U.S.C. § 15, or that under certain circumstances injury to competition generally is sufficiently certain to follow an injury to the plaintiff's business that only the latter injury must be proven, see, e.g., Radiant Burners, Inc. v. Peoples Gas Light and Coke Co., 364 U.S. 656, 81 S.Ct. 365, 5 L.Ed.2d 358 (1961); Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 213, 79 S.Ct. 705, 3 L.Ed.2d 741 (1959) (per curiam). Nevertheless, "the sole aim of antitrust legislation is to protect competition . . . ." Gordon v. New York Stock Exchange, 422 U.S. 659, 689, 95 S.Ct. 2598, 45 L.Ed.2d 463 (1975). [*67] [16]

(1) Group boycott. HN34[] Group boycotts are among those restraints "which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal [per se]," Northern Pacific Railroad Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 78 S.Ct. 514, 2 L.Ed.2d 545 (1958). See FTC v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, 476 U.S. , 106 S.Ct. 2009, 90 L.Ed.2d 445, 456 (1986); Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery and Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 105 S.Ct. 2613, 86 L.Ed.2d 202 (1985). HN35[] However, not all concerted refusals to deal are group boycotts subject to per se condemnation. The Supreme Court has recently cautioned that "the category of restraints classed as group boycotts is not to be expanded indiscriminately . . . ." FTC v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, supra, 476 U.S. [*68] at , 90 L.Ed.2d at 456. The per se approach generally has been limited to situations involving concerted efforts to deny competitors "relationships" (e.g., supplies or customers) they need to effectively compete. Pacific Stationery, supra, 472 U.S. at 294. Therefore, unless access to the withheld "relationships" is needed for the plaintiff to effectively compete, a refusal to deal should be scrutinized under the rule of reason. See id. at 297.

[16] Even if such a claim existed, it would not appear to entitle the plaintiff to any relief he could not obtain under one of his other anti-trust claims.

In this case, there is an alleged refusal to deal. The plaintiff alleges that Sacred Heart refused to allow him to practice radiology at the hospital. [17] However, it is not clear whether the plaintiff adequately establishes a concerted refusal to deal. Group boycotts, of course, do not encompass a unilateral refusal to deal. See Klor's v. Broadway-Hale Stores, supra, 359 U.S. at 212; American Key Corp. v. Cole National Corp., 762 F.2d 1569, 1578 (11th Cir. 1985).

[*69] In the typical group boycott, the refusal to deal is prompted through coercion. Usually, a group of firms with market power threatens to boycott suppliers or customers in order to induce them not to do business with a competitor. See FTC v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, 476 U.S. at __, 90 L.Ed.2d at 457; Weiss v. York Hospital, 745 F.2d 786, 819 (3rd Cir. 1984). This coercion makes the refusal to deal "concerted." However, the refusal to deal can be "concerted" in the absence of coercion. It is "concerted" whenever the refusal to deal is induced by competitors of the plaintiff, by whatever means. Weiss v. York Hospital, supra, 745 F.2d at 819. In accordance with this principle, the Third Circuit in Weiss found concerted action where the defendant Hospital's refusal to admit the plaintiff to its medical staff was not procured through coercion, but by virtue of the medical staff's control over the hospital's admission decisions. Id. Specifically, the medical staff was able to "induce" the hospital to refuse to admit Weiss because the staff, in effect, made the decision for the hospital.

In this case, the complaint says little about whether Hobgood or Post [*70] (alone, or in a conspiracy with others) induced Sacred Heart to refuse to allow the plaintiff to compete with them at the hospital. For example, nowhere does the plaintiff allege that the P.A.'s exclusive contract prompted the hospital to revoke the plaintiff's radiology privileges. In fact, the plaintiff's allegation that Sacred Heart has permitted other physicians to retain clinical privileges in violation of an exclusive contract suggests that the P.A./Sacred Heart contract was not the basis of the hospital's decision in this case.

Nor is concerted action indicated by the allegation that Haines, Hobgood, and Post met with some Sacred Heart employees to persuade them not to allow the plaintiff to retain his radiology privileges after his dismissal from the P.A. There is no indication in the complaint that Sacred Heart succumbed to this persuasion.

The plaintiff also alleges that "[t]he defendants by their actions conspire to have Sacred Heart refuse to permit Dr. Gould or other non-P.A. physicians to provide radiology services at Sacred Heart." (para. 95(b)) While this allegation indicates that Hobgood and Post, in combination with the other defendants, may have induced Sacred Heart [*71] to revoke the plaintiff's staff privileges, I conclude that it is impermissibly vague. HN36[] A complaint that does not set out the facts which warrant the conclusion that an antitrust conspiracy existed will not survive a motion to dismiss. Lombard's, Inc. v. Prince Manufacturing, Inc., supra, 753 F.2d at 975. The conclusory allegation of conspiracy in Count XIII, therefore, does not adequately notify the defendants of the manner in which Sacred Heart was induced to revoke the plaintiff's radiology privileges.

Accordingly, Count XIII is also DISMISSED. [18]

---

[17] I note that this is the only refusal to deal which the plaintiff has properly alleged. While the plaintiff has also alleged that the defendants met with various physicians to persuade them not to refer their patients to the plaintiff, there is no allegation that these physicians responded to the defendants' persuasion.

[18] The defendants argue that even if the plaintiff is able to state a claim for a group boycott, that claim should be evaluated under the rule of reason because, as the Supreme Court has recognized, "[t]he public service aspect, and other features of the professions, may require that a particular practice, which could properly be viewed as a violation of the Sherman Act in another context, be treated differently." Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 787 n.17, 95 S.Ct. 2004, 44 L.Ed.2d 572 (1975). In order to have the analytical flexibility to consider the unique characteristics of the professions, the defendants seem to contend, the rule of reason must govern. See Hackett v. Metropolitan General Hospital, 465 So.2d 1246 (Fla. 2d DCA 1985). This issue cannot be resolved on a motion to dismiss. However, I point out that group boycotts characteristically are "not justified by plausible arguments that they were intended to enhance overall efficiency and make markets more competitive." Pacific Stationery, supra, 472 U.S. at 294. If the defendants can show, therefore, that the refusal to deal arose, for example, from an arrangement which improved the quality of radiological services provided at Sacred Heart, then it appears that their conduct would be judged under the rule of reason. See Arizona v. Maricopa County Medical Society, 457 U.S. 332, 349, 102 S.Ct. 2466,

[*72] N. Count XIV

The plaintiff alleges that the P.A. monopolized, and that all defendants conspired to monopolize, "the market for the provision of radiological services at Sacred Heart" by barring non-members of the P.A. from practicing radiology at the hospital, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, Title 15, United States Code, Section 2. The plaintiff urges that he also has stated a claim in this Count for an attempt to monopolize.

HN37[] Section 2 of the Sherman Act prohibits monopolization, attempted monopolization, and conspiracy to monopolize. 15 U.S.C. § 2; North Mississippi Communications, Inc. v. Jones, 792 F.2d 1330, 1335 (5th Cir. 1986). The elements of monopolization are:

(1) The possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.

United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S.Ct. 1698, 16 L.Ed.2d 778 (1966). See Ad-Vantage Telephone Director Consultants, Inc. v. G.T.E. Directories Corp., No. 85-3970, Westlaw at 25 (11th Cir., Aug. 27, 1987).

Thus, HN38[] monopoly [*73] power acquired through skill or luck, not exclusionary or anti-competitive practices, is not unlawful. See Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 596, 602, 105 S.Ct. 2847, 86 L.Ed.2d 467 (1985); United States v. Griffith, 334 U.S. 100, 107, 68 S.Ct. 941, 92 L.Ed. 1236 (1948); Northeastern Telephone Co. v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 651 F.2d 76, 84-85 (2d Cir. 1981). Exclusionary behavior includes practices which tend to impair the opportunities of rivals and which either do not advance competition or unnecessarily restrict it. Aspen Skiing Co., supra, 472 U.S. at 605 n.32 (quoting 3 P. Areeda & D. Turner Antitrust Law 78 (1978)). A firm that attempts to exclude competitors on some basis other than efficiency has engaged in predatory conduct. Id. at 605.

On the theory that "'no monopolist monopolizes unconscious of what he is doing,'" Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., supra, 472 U.S. at 602 (quoting United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F.2d 416, 432 (2d Cir. 1945)), HN39[] a monopolization claim does not require proof of a specific intent to monopolize. See United States v. Griffith, supra, 334 [*74] U.S. at 105. However, evidence of intent to monopolize is relevant to the question of whether the defendant's conduct was exclusionary or anti-competitive. Aspen Skiing Co., supra, 472 U.S. at 602.

HN40[] The existence of monopoly power can only be evaluated in the context of the relevant product and geographic market. Walker Process Equipment v. Food Machinery and Chemical Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 177, 86 S.Ct. 347, 15 L.Ed.2d 247 (1965). Determining the relevant market is a question of fact. Ad-Vantage Telephone Director Consultants, supra, at 26.

HN41[] Unlike a monopolization claim, conspiracy and attempt to monopolize require evidence of a specific intent to monopolize. Specifically, to establish an attempt to monopolize, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant:

(1) had the specific intent to monopolize, (2) took overt acts in furtherance of a scheme to monopolize, and (3) had a dangerous probability of success.

---

73 L.Ed.2d 48 (1982); National Society of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 696 & n.22, 98 S.Ct. 1355, 55 L.Ed.2d 637 (1978).

North Mississippi Communications, Inc. v. Jones, supra, 792 F.2d at 1335.

See Great Escape, Inc. v. Union City Body Co., 791 F.2d 532, 540 (7th Cir. 1986).

The elements of a Section 2 conspiracy to monopolize are:

(1) The existence of a specific intent to [*75] monopolize; (2) the existence of a combination or a conspiracy to achieve that end; (3) overt acts in furtherance of the combination or conspiracy; and (4) an effect upon a substantial amount of interstate commerce.

North Mississippi Communications, Inc., supra, at 1335.

See Great Escape, Inc., supra, at 540-41.

Upon a careful review of the allegations in Count XIV, I conclude that the plaintiff has stated claims for monopolization, attempted monopolization, and conspiracy to monopolize, and the defendants' motions are DENIED as to Count XIV.

O. Count XV

In this Count, the plaintiff reasserts the foregoing antitrust claims under the Florida Antitrust Act of 1980, Section 542.15, et seq., Florida Statutes (1985). The Florida statute adopts the body of antitrust law developed by the federal courts under the Sherman Act. Ad-Vantage Telephone Director Consultants, supra, at 25. However, under the Florida Antitrust Act, the plaintiff is not required to prove an effect on interstate commerce.

Id. at 30.

Since the claims asserted in Count XV, thus, must be analyzed under the same law as I applied in ruling on the federal antitrust claims, Count XV is DISMISSED [*76] to the extent and for the reasons provided above.

III. Conclusion

The defendants' motions to dismiss and to strike are GRANTED to the extent set out above. The plaintiff is granted leave to file an amended complaint, consistent with this order, within 15 days.

DONE AND ORDERED this 29th day of June, 1988.

Clamp-All Corp. v. Cast Iron Soil Pipe Inst.

United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit

June 30, 1988

No. 87-1697

Reporter
851 F.2d 478 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 8940 ; 7 U.S.P.Q.2D (BNA) 1429 ; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,115

Clamp-All Corporation, Plaintiff, Appellant, v. Cast Iron Soil Pipe Institute, et al., Defendants, Appellees

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, Hon. Rya W. Zobel, U.S. District Judge.

Disposition: Affirmed.

Core Terms

couplings, prices, products, pipe, firms, competitors, practices, hubless, costs, price list, specification, anticompetitive, district court, certifying, advertisement, charges, anti trust law, low price, predatory, consists, standard-setting, interdependent, monopolization, manufacturers, unlawfully, antitrust, trademark, benefits, helps, sales

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > General Overview

HN1[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

"Predatory pricing" occurs when a firm sets its prices temporarily below its costs, with the hope that the low price will drive a competitor out of business, after which the "predatory" firm will raise its prices so high that it will recoup its temporary losses and earn additional profit, all before new firms, attracted by the high prices, enter its market and force prices down.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > General Overview

HN2[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

Ordinarily the measure of a "predatory price" is price below "incremental cost," where the addition to total cost (to the firm) of producing and selling additional output would exceed the return from selling that additional output.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN3[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

The Sherman Act prohibits agreements, and the courts almost uniformly hold, at least in the pricing area, that individual pricing decisions (even when each firm rests its own decision upon its belief that competitors will do the same) do not constitute an unlawful agreement under Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > General Overview

HN4[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

A "basing point" pricing scheme essentially amounts to a device that could help a group of firms in a concentrated industry "police" interdependent pricing practices, practices that help them keep prices above competitive levels without the need for any formal price agreement.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > General Overview

HN5[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

"Basing point pricing" systems have normally been found unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Miscellaneous Offenses > Gambling > Elements

HN6[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

The only important element for a court to examine at the request of a competitor is the low price. Where a plaintiff does not show that the low price is unlawfully low, there is no reason to believe the low price is not self sustaining, there is no reason to believe it requires "external financing," and there is no reason to believe that any "price fixing" on any other products has anything significant to do with the matter.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN7[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The "rule of reason" limits the Sherman Act's literal words by forbidding only those arrangements the anticompetitive consequences of which outweigh their legitimate business justifications, though certain anticompetitive practices, such as price fixing, so typically lack justification as to be per se unreasonable.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN8[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

"Anticompetitive" has a special antitrust meaning. It refers not to actions that merely injure individual competitors, but rather to actions that harm the competitive process. And, the law assesses both harms and benefits in light of the Sherman Act's basic objectives, the protection of a competitive process that brings to consumers the benefits of lower prices, better products, and more efficient production methods.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN9[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

Activity that harms competitors because it lowers production or distribution costs or provides a better product carries with it an overriding justification.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN10[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

There could be special circumstances, showing, in an individual case, that the standard setting serves no legitimate purpose, or that it is unnecessarily harmful. But the plaintiff would have to show the existence of such circumstances.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN11[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

In deciding an antitrust claim, courts must take account of the importance of permitting parties to express their views freely before regulatory authorities.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN12[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

Joint efforts to influence public officials do not violate the antitrust laws even though intended to eliminate competition, but efforts to influence private standard-setting organizations may violate antitrust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

HN13[] Consumer Protection, False Advertising

The law does not automatically require a firm to publish unfavorable test results.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

HN14[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Cartels & Horizontal Restraints

All members of an industry should be eligible for membership in a trade association, but membership can be limited to those operating at a certain level in the distribution chain.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

HN15[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Actual Monopolization

A plaintiff must show "exclusionary conduct" in respect to its monopolization or attempted monopolization claims.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Designation of Origin > Elements of False Designation of Origin

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > Trade Dress Protection > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Advertising > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Designation of Origin > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > Lanham Act > General Overview

HN16[] False Designation of Origin, Elements of False Designation of Origin

See the Lanham Act § 43, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1125(a).

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Designation of Origin > Palming Off

Trademark Law > Conveyances > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Designation of Origin > General Overview

Trademark Law > ... > Federal Unfair Competition Law > Lanham Act > General Overview

Trademark Law > Causes of Action Involving Trademarks > Infringement Actions > General Overview

HN17[] False Designation of Origin, Palming Off

The First Circuit narrowly interprets the Lanham Act to apply only to those sorts of unfair business practices or false statements that are of the same economic nature as those which involve infringement or other improper use of trade-marks, e.g., palming off one's goods as those of another.

Counsel: Richard S. Harrell with whom Ronald E. Harding and Weston, Patrick, Willard & Redding, P.A. were on brief for Appellant.

John J. Curtin, Jr., with whom William G. Southard, Jody E. Forchheimer, Eve Jacobs-Carnahan, Bingham, Dana & Gould, John M. Harrington, Jr., Thomas H. Hannigan, Jr., Ropes & Gray, Alan R. Hoffman, M. Eric Schoenberg, Lynch, Brewer, Hoffman & Sands, Mark W. Pearlstein, Goodwin, Procter & Hoar, Henry P. Sailer, Elizabeth Foote, Covington & Burling, John F. Tener, Theodore Tucci and Robinson & Cole were on brief for Appellees.

Andrew M. Higgins and Casner, Edwards & Roseman on brief for Appellee American Brass & Iron Foundry.

Judges: Campbell, Chief Judge, Breyer and Selya, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: BREYER

Opinion

[*1430] [*481] BREYER, Circuit Judge.

The plaintiff in this antitrust action, Clamp-All Corporation, sued the Cast Iron Soil Pipe Institute ("CISPI") and several of its members, charging that they had unlawfully restrained trade in (or monopolized or attempted to monopolize) [2] the sale of hubless pipe couplings by means of improper pricing, improper behavior in respect to "quality-certification" provided by state and private organizations, and other improper trade practices. 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 & 2 (1982), 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a) (1982). The district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on the pricing (and certain other) counts, and, after hearing all the plaintiff's evidence, directed a verdict in defendants' favor; the plaintiff appeals. We have examined the lengthy record and conclude that the district court was correct. No reasonable jury could have found facts sufficient to show a violation of the antitrust laws. We therefore affirm the court's judgment.

I

To understand this highly fact-based appeal, one must keep in mind the following background:

1. Hubless couplings are used to join segments of pipe, such as water pipe or sewer pipe.

2. Several different manufacturers have made, and still make, various kinds of pipe couplings. The old fashioned method of joining segments of pipe apparently was to make one end slightly larger than the other, and then to fit the small end of one segment into the large end of the other. The larger opening was [3] called the "hub" and the smaller end the "spigot." We think they looked about like this:

[SEE ILLUSTRATION IN ORIGINAL]

The newer method of joining pipe segments keeps both ends the same size. A sleeve fits around the two ends to be joined and a metal band holds the sleeve in place.

3. CISPI is a trade association of pipe manufacturers, all of whom sell, and many of whom also make, a particular type of coupling known as a CISPI coupling. It consists of a simple sleeve of the sort described. It fits between lugs each placed a bit away from the end of each pipe segment (perhaps they help hold the sleeve in place). We think the CISPI coupling looks something like this:

[SEE ILLUSTRATION IN ORIGINAL]

CISPI introduced hubless couplings to the market in 1963. CISPI controlled the patent on its coupling until 1984, licensing CISPI members to make and sell it.

4. Clamp-All is one of several firms that make competing pipe couplings. The Clamp-All and CISPI couplings appear quite similar, but the list price of Clamp-All's coupling is typically four to five times that of CISPI's, and the Clamp-All coupling will outperform the CISPI coupling in certain respects: it is wider, which makes [4] it [*482] more secure and enables it to withstand greater water pressure; it is made of more durable (and more expensive) materials; and it is somewhat easier to install.

5. Exactly what share of the total market for water pipe couplings (outside of Massachusetts) CISPI couplings account for is a matter in dispute. Everyone agrees that CISPI's share is large, but they agree, too, that several companies other than Clamp-All and CISPI members sell a significant number of couplings. Inside Massachusetts, where Clamp-All had a monopoly for several years because only its coupling met the state's performance standard, Clamp-All controls about 65 percent of the coupling market. [1431]

Basically, Clamp-All charges that its relative lack of success outside Massachusetts is due to various anti-competitive (indeed, anti-Clamp-All) practices employed by CISPI members; otherwise, says Clamp-All, its sales record elsewhere would resemble its record in Massachusetts. The CISPI defendants deny all anti-competitive behavior; they add that Clamp-All's Massachusetts success reflects Clamp-All's own, partly successful, efforts to convince certifiers and regulators to keep the less expensive CISPI coupling out of the [5] state.

Our concern here is with Clamp-All's charges, not CISPI's. We have proceeded to evaluate the legal merits of Clamp-All's many different claims as follows. First, we have read the record, marshalling the evidence in respect to each charge. Second, we have assumed a set of facts as favorable to Clamp-All, in respect to each charge, as the evidence will reasonably permit. See Goldstein v. Kelleher, 728 F.2d 32, 39 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 852, 83 L. Ed. 2d 107, 105 S. Ct. 172 (1984). Third, we have determined, as a matter of law, see 2 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law para. 315b (1978) [hereafter Areeda & Turner], whether that version of the facts reveals a violation of the antitrust laws; whether, for example, it shows predatory pricing, Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986), or an "unreasonable restraint of trade," Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 55 L. Ed. 619, 31 S. Ct. 502 (1911).

We conclude that the facts do not show an antitrust violation. To explain our conclusions, we shall group Clamp-All's many charges into three categories: those concerning pricing practices, those concerning CISPI efforts to influence certification [6] standards, and those concerning allegedly unreasonable marketing practices.

II

The significant evidence that we have found in respect to CISPI's pricing practices consists of the following:

1. The defendants published identical list prices for various products including couplings. One defendant testified that the prices on the list established a "defined differential" among different sizes of pipe, couplings, and related equipment.

2. Two CISPI firms, Tyler and American Brass & Iron Foundry ('AB & I'), firms that were defendants in this case initially, but which were no longer defendants at the time of trial, had price lists that showed "returns" to the firm to be less than "costs." To be more specific, the Tyler price list, in respect to "hubless couplings," showed in the column entitled "Return FOB Taylor" ".67," and in the column entitled "average unit cost," the figure ".78." In respect to AB & I's couplings, the evidence was conflicting. Although the category marked "Sales" was lower than that marked "Cost," the category marked "Unit Price" was higher than that marked "Unit Cost."

3. Two witnesses testified that Tyler's president once said at a CISPI meeting in 1981 that Tyler, [7] the industry price leader, would not raise its prices until Central Foundry went out of business. A month later, Central Foundry did go out of business; Tyler then raised its prices, and the other CISPI members followed Tyler's lead.

4. Clamp-All's expert testified that CISPI members gave discounts on a geographical [*483] basis, which discounts did not reflect delivery cost differences, but, rather, reflected a "multiple basing point pricing scheme."

We conclude that this evidence does not show unlawfully low prices, prices that could hurt Clamp-All. Clamp-All comes closer to showing unreasonably high CISPI prices, but any such showing may reflect no more than an industry concentrated enough for each firm to set prices "interdependently" (each firm, aware that competitors will quickly match price cuts, may keep its prices high); and higher than competitive prices help Clamp-All rather than hurt it. See Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 583. We now consider each of Clamp-All's pricing claims in greater detail.

a. Clamp-All suggests that this evidence shows unlawful "predatory pricing." As we explained in detail in Barry Wright Corp. v. ITT Grinnell Corp., 724 F.2d 227 (1st Cir. 1983), [8] however, HN1[] "predatory pricing" occurs when a firm sets its prices temporarily below its costs, with the hope that the low price will drive a competitor out of business, after which the "predatory" firm will raise its prices so high that it will recoup its temporary losses and earn additional profit, all before new firms, attracted by the high prices, enter its market and force prices down. Id. at 232-35; see Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588-95. We said that HN2[] ordinarily the measure of a "predatory price" is price below "incremental cost." Barry Wright, 724 F.2d at 232-33. That is to say, the addition to total cost (to the firm) of producing and selling additional output would exceed the return from selling that additional output.

The evidence in the record is insufficient to show such pricing by defendants here. For [1432] one thing, the product price lists from Tyler and AB & I contain no explanation about what the numbers on them mean. Indeed, Tyler's list refers to a vast number of different products and contains many products in respect to which the number in the "NET FOB" column is lower than that in the "AVERAGE UNIT COST" column. Yet, the plaintiffs do not argue that Tyler was [9] pricing large numbers of its products, including such products as thumbscrews, seal gaskets, seal lubricants, plugs, and something called a "No-hub San Tee," at predatory levels. Perhaps the list shows that Tyler, like a hardware store owner, keeps records that allocate certain costs (such as rent or electricity) among related products proportionately, but then Tyler recovers different amounts of those costs from the sales of different products. (A hardware store owner does not set prices to recover precisely the same percentage of his rent from the sale of each bolt, garden tool, or lightbulb; rather, he sets prices so that he recovers the totality of his overhead from the totality of all his sales with different products likely making different contributions.) Be that as it may, we do not see how a jury could know, without more precise evidence or an explanation, what either Tyler's or AB & I's price lists show, nor do we see how it could rest a conclusion of "price below incremental cost" on a few such unexplained lists alone. Nor does plaintiff correct the evidentiary deficiency by pointing to Tyler's president's remark at the 1981 CISPI meeting, for that remark (and subsequent [10] conduct) simply shows (at best) a price increase after the demise of a competitor; it does not significantly help show that the relevant prices were unlawfully low to begin with.

For another thing, neither Tyler nor AB & I were defendants at the time of trial. Thus, plaintiff had to use this price list evidence to show that other firms set prices below their incremental costs. The fact that hubless couplings were simple products with similar costs may tend to show that Tyler's and AB & I's cost/price ratios and defendants' were the same. But, the equally important facts that Tyler and AB & I made many related products; that many costs of producing these products were likely related (e.g., shared overhead); that present defendants produced a different mix of products; and that each of their product by product cost relationships (e.g., comparative shares of overhead or other common costs) were therefore likely [*484] different from Tyler's and AB & I's, together make Tyler's and AB & I's price lists close to worthless as evidence that any of these other firms (the present defendants) priced couplings below its own incremental costs. The district court correctly concluded that [11] a jury could not find, without impermissible speculation, that these defendants priced couplings below their costs, whether defined as "incremental costs" or any other arguably appropriate cost measure.

b. Appellant, taking an opposite tack, next argues that identical price lists and testimony about a "defined differential" indicate an agreement among CISPI defendants to fix prices, presumably higher than competitive prices. (The defendants, selling identical products, would not need to agree to keep prices low; a price cut by any one of them would likely force the others to follow.) Of course, any such agreement, by keeping coupling prices up, would likely help the plaintiff, not hurt it. See Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 583.

This is not to say that the evidence here would permit a jury to find any such agreement. Even if one assumes that the similar prices on the lists do not simply reflect ordinary forces of competition at work among firms selling virtually identical products, the price lists still show no more than what defendants concede: that each firm, acting individually, copied the price list of the industry leader. A firm in a concentrated industry typically has reason [12] to decide (individually) to copy an industry leader. After all, a higher-than-leader's price might lead a customer to buy elsewhere, while a lower-than-leader's price might simply lead competitors to match the lower price, reducing profits for all. One does not need an agreement to bring about this kind of follow-the-leader effect in a concentrated industry. See 6 Areeda & Turner paras. 1432-33. And, the fact that the CISPI firms often set prices that deviated from their price lists helps support the inference that the similarity of price lists reflects individual decisions to copy, rather than any more formal pricing agreement.

Courts have noted that HN3[] the Sherman Act prohibits agreements, and they have almost uniformly held, at least in the pricing area, that such individual pricing decisions (even when each firm rests its own decision upon its belief that competitors will do the same) do not constitute an unlawful agreement under section 1 of the Sherman Act. See, e.g., Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 822 F.2d 246, 253-54 (2nd Cir. 1987); North Carolina v. Chas. Pfizer & Co., 384 F. Supp. 265 (E.D.N.C. 1974), aff'd, 537 F.2d 67 (4th Cir.), cert. [13] denied, 429 U.S. 870, 97 S. Ct. 183, 50 L. Ed. 2d 150 (1976); 6 Areeda & Turner para. 1433; cf. Aubin v. Fudala, 782 F.2d 280, 286 (1st Cir. 1983) (similar analysis in criminal conspiracy context [1433]). That is not because such pricing is desirable (it is not), but because it is close to impossible to devise a judicially enforceable remedy for "interdependent" pricing. How does one order a firm to set its prices without regard to the likely reactions of its competitors? See 6 Areeda & Turner paras. 1432-33; 3 Areeda & Turner para. 840. The district court pointed out that the evidence here, consisting of little more than the price lists, would not permit a finding of more than such individual, interdependent, price setting. We agree.

c. Appellant points to the testimony of its expert, who said that the price lists show an agreement to follow HN4[] a "basing point" pricing scheme. Such a scheme essentially amounts to a device that could help a group of firms in a concentrated industry "police" interdependent pricing practices, practices that help them keep prices above competitive levels without the need for any formal price agreement. As just mentioned, in principle, each firm in such an industry may set its [14] prices knowing that a price cut would be quickly matched by others; each would also know that stable high prices, maintained by all firms, would benefit all. But, the problem for such firms (at least in principle) is that each also knows that for it alone the best of all possible worlds is to attract customers through a small price cut not matched [*485] by the others. Since all know this, how can they keep each other from cutting prices? How can they guarantee that industry prices stay high? How can they prevent the forces of competition from breaking out, with one or another firm yielding to the temptation to cut its own prices while hoping the others will not match the low price? Each firm realizes that any formal communication with its competitors about such matters could lead to antitrust prosecution and a finding of a traditional agreement. But each fears that, without such communication, its competitors will "chisel" on the tacit pricing arrangement, perhaps through secret or selective price cuts (which from the public's point of view should be encouraged). See United States v. Container Corp. of America, 393 U.S. 333, 21 L. Ed. 2d 526, 89 S. Ct. 510 (1969).

In principle, "basing point pricing" [15] is a practice that might help firms stop (what from the public's perspective would be desirable) "chiseling." It does so when firms in the industry typically sell many different, related products, in many different geographical markets, all at different prices, a fact that makes it that much more difficult for each firm to know whether its competitors may be "chiseling," say, by "swallowing" some of the freight costs. A "basing point" pricing system involves all firms charging identical freight costs (irrespective of plant location or actual freight costs) to any point in the United States. The "freight prices" charged are those that a railroad or trucker would set from a single, fixed location (say Chicago), not from where each plant is actually located. Such a system makes it far easier for each firm to know the "freight cost" that a competitor is "supposed" to charge its customers, thereby making it easier for each firm to detect whether a competitor is charging a particular customer a lower price for the product. To that extent, "basing point pricing" helps each firm detect "chiselers"; it lessens the fear of each that others may be "chiseling"; and it thereby helps them all maintain [16] prices above competitive levels. (It also tends to permit firms to release "safely" any "competitive impulse," by selling, at greater expense and with less profit, to more distant locations all without changing the apparent price of the product, thereby helping further reinforce the stability of an industry's "high price" practices.) For these reasons, HN5[] "basing point pricing" systems have normally been found unlawful. See 6 Areeda & Turner para. 1435f; Federal Trade Commission v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683, 92 L. Ed. 1010, 68 S. Ct. 793 (1948). Indeed, in the case of "basing point pricing," unlike simple "interdependent price setting," agencies, believing they can devise an appropriate remedy, have forbidden the practices even when the firms adopt it "interdependently," without any traditional agreement (perhaps through gradual, tacit evolution in the industry). See Triangle Conduit & Cable Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 168 F.2d 175 (7th Cir. 1948), aff'd by an equally divided Court sub nom. Clayton Mark & Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 336 U.S. 956, 93 L. Ed. 1110, 69 S. Ct. 888 (1949) (Federal Trade Commission held basing point pricing unlawful even though there was no agreement).

Our description of [17] "basing point pricing," while simplified, is sufficient to show that the evils of the practice lie in its tendency to help firms keep prices high, not low. Thus, if such a practice existed in respect to couplings, it kept CISPI prices high, making it easier for Clamp-All to compete. Clamp-All cannot base its damage suit upon a scheme that helps it sell its product. Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 583.

d. Finally, Clamp-All adds together its first and second theories. It argues that the defendants behaved unlawfully by agreeing to charge high prices on some products, and then used the proceeds of their high price sales to finance below cost coupling prices. The short answer to this claim, however, is that HN6[] the only important element here for a [1434] court to examine at the request of a competitor is the low price. If that price is unlawfully low, if, for example, it is a predatory price, it does not ordinarily matter whether the money to pay for the resulting temporary loss comes [*486] from a bank account, a legacy, a lottery prize, or the proceeds of a price-fixing conspiracy in respect to another product; regardless of financing source, the practice would be unlawful. Where, however, [18] as here, a plaintiff does not show that the low price is unlawfully low, there is no reason to believe the low price is not self sustaining, there is no reason to believe it requires 'external financing,' and there is no reason to believe that any "price fixing" on any other products has anything significant to do with the matter. See Shore Gas and Oil Co. v. Humble Oil & Refining Co., 224 F. Supp. 922, 926-27 (D.N.J. 1963). We do not see how a dubious kind of "financing source" could, in and of itself, convert a lawful low price into an unlawful one.

III

We turn next to Clamp-All's claims that the CISPI defendants agreed to engage in certain unreasonably anticompetitive activities, in violation of Sherman Act § 1. In evaluating these claims, one must keep in mind the special antitrust meaning of the terms "reasonable" and "unreasonable," a meaning that draws its content from the basic objectives of antitrust law's "rule of reason." The Supreme Court adopted the "rule of reason" in order to provide an intellectually, administratively, and legally satisfactory way to limit the Sherman Act's broad language, which, if taken literally, might forbid all agreements, good and bad, [19] that were in any sense at all "in restraint of trade." See United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U.S. 290, 41 L. Ed. 1007, 17 S. Ct. 540 (1897). Chief Justice White pointed out (with only slight exaggeration) that without some such limitation, the Sherman Act might be taken as forbidding virtually "every conceivable contract or combination . . . anywhere in the whole field of human activity." Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 60, 55 L. Ed. 619, 31 S. Ct. 502 (1911). HN7[] The "rule of reason" limits the Act's literal words by forbidding only those arrangements the anticompetitive consequences of which outweigh their legitimate business justifications, 7 Areeda & Turner para. 1500 at 362-63, though certain anticompetitive practices, such as price fixing, so typically lack justification as to be per se unreasonable. 7 Areeda & Turner para. 1509.

HN8[] "Anticompetitive", too, has a special meaning. It refers not to actions that merely injure individual competitors, but rather to actions that harm the competitive process. Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 319-20, 328-34, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962); see Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488-89, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977). And, the [20] law assesses both harms and benefits in light of the Act's basic objectives, the protection of a competitive process that brings to consumers the benefits of lower prices, better products, and more efficient production methods. See Interface Group, Inc. v. Massachusetts Port Authority, 816 F.2d 9, 11-12 (1st Cir. 1987); 7 Areeda & Turner para. 1502.

The joint practices and agreements that appellant attacks here are not per se unreasonable. Thus, appellant must show that the likely anticompetitive effects of these practices outweigh their business justifications, or at least that the defendants might achieve any legitimate business objectives in a significantly less restrictive way. 7 Areeda & Turner para. 1505b.

A

Clamp-All's major attack concerns CISPI's promulgation of a standard called the 310 Designation. That standard is entitled

Specifications for

> CAST IRON SOIL PIPE INSTITUTE'S APPROVED COUPLING FOR USE IN CONNECTION WITH HUBLESS CAST IRON SOIL PIPE AND FITTINGS FOR SANITARY STORM DRAIN, WASTE AND VENT PIPING APPLICATIONS

The specification consists of several pages of detail. It also states,

> Several different types of hubless joints or couplings are available [21] for use in hubless cast iron systems. . . . It is the purpose of this specification . . . to furnish [*487] information as to the approved characteristics of one of such type couplings which is approved by the Institute [CISPI].

And, it states on the first page,

> Members of the Institute who are licensed to use the Institute's Collective Mark CI NO-HUB and who sell hubless couplings manufactured by or for them which conform fully to this Specification may indicate their membership in the Institute and their conformance with this Specification by marking such couplings with the Institute's Collective Mark CI NO-HUB.

CISPI successfully persuaded various private standard-setting bodies, as well as state and local plumbing code authorities, to make reference to the 310 Designation as the kind [1435] of coupling that would meet their respective standards.

a. Appellants seem to say that CISPI's very promulgation of this standard and its efforts to secure its adoption by certifying authorities amounts to an unreasonable restraint of trade. We do not see how that can be so. The standard, in specifying what counts as a CISPI coupling, provides a relatively cheap and effective way for a manufacturer [22] or a buyer to determine whether a particular coupling is, in fact, (generically considered) a CISPI coupling. The adoption by certifiers helps users quickly and effectively determine that a particular coupling (which meets CISPI standards) also meets state, local, or private certifiers' standards of acceptability. The joint specification development, promulgation, and adoption efforts would seem less expensive than having each member of CISPI make duplicative efforts. On its face, the joint development and promulgation of the specification would seem to save money by providing information to makers and to buyers less expensively and more effectively than without the standard. It may also help to assure product quality. If such activity, in and of itself, were to hurt Clamp-All by making it more difficult for Clamp-All to compete, Clamp-All would suffer injury only as a result of the defendants' joint efforts having lowered information costs or created a better product. See George R. Whitten, Jr., Inc. v. Paddock Pool Builders, Inc., 508 F.2d 547, 558 & n. 19 (1st Cir. 1974). And, that kind of harm is not "unreasonably anticompetitive." It brings about the very benefits [23] that the antitrust laws seek to promote. That is to say, HN9[] activity that harms competitors because it lowers production or distribution costs or provides a better product carries with it an overriding justification.

Of course, what we have just written is true of 'legitimate' standard-setting activity. See Whitten, 508 F.2d at 558 n. 19. HN10[] There could be special circumstances, showing, in an individual case, that the standard setting at issue serves no legitimate purpose, or that it is unnecessarily harmful. Id. (antitrust claim stated if market participant who establishes proprietary specifications coerces a standard-setting organization or conspires with it to get the specification officially adopted, or if it prevents competitors from competing for approval). But the plaintiff would have to show the existence of such circumstances; and, the plaintiff has not done so here. The best it can do is point to the word "approved" in the specification ("it is the purpose of this specification . . . to furnish information as to the approved characteristics of one of such type couplings which is approved by the Institute.") and to argue that that single word might mislead users into thinking [24] that CISPI is a disinterested certifying organization, providing "approvals" for all hubless couplings, thereby hurting Clamp-All, unless, as Clamp-All seems to argue, CISPI considered Clamp-All's coupling for "approval" as well, see Radiant Burners, Inc. v. Peoples Gas Light & Coke, 364 U.S. 656, 5 L. Ed. 2d 358, 81 S. Ct. 365 (1961); 2 J. von Kalinowski, Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation, § 6I.01 (1988); Wachtel, "Products Standards and Certification Programs," 13 Antitrust Bull. 1, 13 (1968).

The dispositive answer to this argument is that the record contains no significant evidence that the word "approved" misled anyone. The specification itself makes clear what it is, a specification that applies to CISPI-type hubless couplings, [*488] not to all hubless couplings. It contains no other language that might make one think that CISPI was some kind of general certifying organization. Buyers of hubless couplings are builders, plumbers, or contractors -- reasonably sophisticated users -- and there is no testimony that any of them was fooled. Plaintiff's best evidence consists of a comment by its expert that "people who normally use these things . . . could easily be misled," but, on cross examination, [25] that same expert conceded that he had not talked to normal coupling users in forming that particular opinion. In our view, that opinion alone, so lacking in foundation, cannot take the issue of "being fooled" to the jury. And, if CISPI was not (or at least was not thought to be) a general certifying organization, why must it develop a specification for, or somehow "certify," a competitor's quite different product? After all, General Motors need not certify the quality of a Toyota, nor need a group of film producers certify the quality of competing live television programs.

b. Clamp-All argues that CISPI defendants prevented an important "standard-setting and approval-granting" organization, the American Society of Sanitary Engineers ("ASSE"), from approving a hubless coupling performance standard that would have benefitted Clamp-All. In theory, one can understand how joint activity of the kind Clamp-All alleges could be unreasonably anticompetitive. Suppose, for example, the ASSE was about to adopt a performance standard that both CISPI and Clamp-All could have met; suppose further that ASSE's adoption of such a standard would have led to the adoption of a similar standard by hosts [26] of local and state regulatory, and private certifying authorities. Then Clamp-All simply could have pointed to the standard (and [1436] its compliance) to show a contractor that its product was approved, just as CISPI does in states that have referenced the 310 Designation. If CISPI prevented the adoption of such a standard, it may have acted unreasonably.

The key word here, however, is "may." Certifiers may reasonably believe that they can do their job properly (a job that benefits consumers) only if all interested parties are allowed to present proposals, frankly present their views, and vote. Thus, we do not see how plaintiff could succeed on its antitrust claim unless (at a minimum) CISPI both prevented ASSE from adopting a national performance standard that would have benefitted Clamp-All and did so through the use of unfair, or improper practices or procedures. See Indian Head, Inc. v. Allied Tube & Conduit Corp., 817 F.2d 938 (2nd Cir.) (antitrust claim stated where defendant conspired with other steel companies to block the approval of plaintiff's product by a national certifying organization; defendant acted within the letter of the organization's rules, but [27] violated their spirit by paying for and packing a meeting with voters who had little to no professional interest in the subject matter), aff'd, 486 U.S. 492, 108 S. Ct. 1931, 100 L. Ed. 2d 497 (1988) (affirming denial of Noerr-Pennington immunity for defendant's effort to influence private standard-setting organization; dismissing certiorari in respect to whether defendant's conduct was an unreasonable restraint of trade). HN11[] In deciding whether this is so, courts must take account of the importance of permitting parties to express their views freely before regulatory authorities. See Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961); United Mine Workers of America v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 670, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965) HN12[] ("Joint efforts to influence public officials do not violate the antitrust laws even though intended to eliminate competition" (emphasis added)); cf. Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., 486 U.S. 492, 108 S. Ct. 1931, 100 L. Ed. 2d 497 (1988) (efforts to influence private standard-setting organizations may violate antitrust laws).

The record here does not contain evidence sufficient to warrant presenting Clamp-All's [28] claim to the jury. It shows that in 1979, at Clamp-All's request, the ASSE formed a subcommittee to write a hubless coupling standard. Clamp-All proposed a four-tier standard (rating couplings by their ability to withstand varying levels [*489] of water pressure). Initially, when only one CISPI representative was present, the subcommittee recommended a three-tier standard (which was also beneficial to Clamp-All). CISPI then decided to offer a single tier standard, which both the CISPI and Clamp-All couplings would have met. It wrote its members and urged them to attend the next meeting. At that next meeting, with six CISPI members attending out of a total of sixteen, the subcommittee changed its mind and voted for CISPI's proposed standard. The ASSE eventually decided not to accept its subcommittee's recommendation, and it took no further action.

We can find no concrete evidence in the record that CISPI acted improperly. The record here is unlike that in Indian Head, where the defendant "packed" the meeting by hiring lay voters in numbers that unfairly gave it overrepresentation. Nor is there concrete evidence that the submission of CISPI's proposal caused (or even influenced) ASSE's [29] decision not to adopt any standard. Clamp-All points to a single statement by CISPI's general counsel that the CISPI one-tier proposal was "not really a performance standard." We do not see how that statement shows a significant abuse of ASSE's procedural standards or practices. Rather, as far as the record is concerned, CISPI acted within the letter and the spirit of the ASSE rules in presenting its proposal and urging its members to attend the meeting.

B

Clamp-All claims that the defendants have jointly engaged in several unreasonably anticompetitive "business practices." For the most part these claims amount to charges of state-law business torts, not violations of the federal antitrust laws. Whitten, 508 F.2d 547 at 560-62. We assume that point aside, however, for the sake of argument, and because of appellant's later Lanham Act claim, see pp. 491-92, infra. We have examined the evidence in respect to each alleged act, and we conclude that no reasonable jury could find a significant, unreasonably anticompetitive business practice that harmed Clamp-All.

a. Appellants say that CISPI marketed its trademarked pipe, fittings, and couplings together as a system, thereby deceptively [30] suggesting that Clamp-All's coupling would not fit the system. The evidence appellant presented to show deception consisted of an advertisement that said:

> You cannot afford to use any other coupling but the CISPI stainless steel couplings for a COMPLETE CI NO-HUB system.

We have no reason to believe that CISPI's advertisement was significantly misleading [1437] in the industry context. This language is of a kind characterized in Whitten, 508 F.2d at 556, as mere "sellers' talk." Moreover, CISPI aimed the advertisement at a technical audience, which would likely know enough not to find it significantly misleading in respect to whatever suggestion it might have made that Clamp-All's coupling would not fit the "system." (See the discussion under 'e' below.) We do not see how a jury, without more evidence than this vaguely worded advertisement, could find otherwise.

b. Appellant says that CISPI advertises its collective mark, CI NO-HUB, as a sign of quality, but, in fact, that advertising is deceptive because CISPI does not control the quality of the product. Clamp-All adds that there are "numerous examples of defective products bearing the CI NO-HUB trademark."

The record, however, [31] contains only evidence of failures of CISPI fittings (curved pieces of pipe used to change the direction of the flow); it does not contain any evidence of any failure of any CISPI coupling. Appellant points to a Davidson Laboratory test as evidence, but that test shows that Clamp-All's more expensive coupling withstood strong water pressure more successfully than CISPI's; it did not show that CISPI's coupling was defective. Given the evidence, the logical links between "defective fittings," "no quality control," and "deceptive trademark use" in [*490] respect to coupling sales are too farfetched to warrant submission to the jury.

c. Clamp-All says that CISPI published test results favorable to its products but did not publish unfavorable test results. But HN13[] the law, as far as we are aware, does not automatically require a firm to publish unfavorable test results.

Clamp-All adds that the favorable report -- the PTL report -- was misleading. The district court did not permit appellant to introduce that report, however, because it said the jury would not understand its significance without the help of an expert (and appellant had not designated an expert to testify about the report). We [32] confess that we cannot understand the relevance of Clamp-All's complaint about the report. (It has something to do with the fact that the report explained that the ends of the pipes used in the test were "uncoated," but it did not explain that the ends were "machined off"). Our own inability to understand the relevance of Clamp-All contention leads us to conclude that the district court acted well within its powers in not admitting the report without expert explanation. See J. Weinstein & M. Berger, 3 Weinstein's Evidence para. 702[02] and cases cited at 702-9 n. 3 (1987).

d. Appellant says that CISPI members sometimes used the wrong trademark: they used the words "NO-HUB" instead of "CI NO-HUB." The only evidence that this is so, however, consisted of two of the defendants' price lists where the words "NO-HUB" appeared. The district court, noting that the lists contained all sorts of errors, concluded that this evidence would not permit a jury to find an intentional use of the wrong mark. We believe the court was correct.

e. Clamp-All says that CISPI improperly injured its reputation, first, by delivering (on several occasions during a six-month period) defective fittings to [33] a site where contractors were using Clamp-All couplings, and second, by stating (at a press conference) that the Clamp-All coupling does not properly fit the CISPI system. The record presents uncontradicted evidence, however, that defective fittings are fairly common in the industry and that CISPI couplings tolerate common defects in the fittings, but Clamp-All couplings do not. That being so, a jury could not find, on the basis of this evidence, any deliberate plan to sabotage Clamp-All or its reputation, of a sort that could rise to the level of an antitrust violation. See Whitten, 508 F.2d at 560-62.

f. Clamp-All argues that CISPI should have allowed it to become a member. CISPI, however, is an association of pipe and fitting manufacturers, some, but not all, of whom also make CISPI couplings. Clamp-All does not make pipe or fittings (or, for that matter, CISPI couplings). There is, therefore, nothing unreasonable about CISPI's not accepting Clamp-All for membership. See generally 2 J. von Kalinowski, Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation § 6I.02 (1988) HN14[] (all members of an industry should be eligible for membership, but membership can be limited, for example, to "those [34] operating at a certain level in the distribution chain").

We add two final points in respect to Clamp-All's antitrust claims. First, we cannot guarantee that we have found every bit of supporting evidence in the fourteen volumes of record. We have, however, examined the record with care, particularly those parts of it that the parties cited, and we are convinced there is no other evidence that could have made a difference to our conclusion. Second, appellant also brought charges of monopolization and attempted monopolization. 15 U.S.C. § 2 (1982). We have assumed, for the sake of argument, that CISPI manufacturers account for a large share of the coupling industry, but that they do not account for all, [1438] or nearly all, its sales. (The district court properly refused to allow plaintiff's expert to present precise market share figures because that expert based his opinion significantly upon a few unmemorialized telephone calls, and estimated the reliability of his model as between "1 percent and 99 percent," Fed. R. Evid. 403; see, e.g., American Bearing Company, Inc. v. Litton Industries, Inc., 540 F. Supp. 1163 (E.D. Pa. [*491] 1982), aff'd, 729 F.2d 943 (3rd Cir.), cert. denied, [35] 469 U.S. 854, 83 L. Ed. 2d 112, 105 S. Ct. 178 (1984).) That being so, the same reasons that have led us to find appellant's case inadequate in respect to the unreasonableness (or anticompetitive tendencies) of its § 1 "anticompetitive practice" claims and its pricing claims, lead us to conclude that HN15[] it could not show "exclusionary conduct" in respect to its monopolization or attempted monopolization claims. See 3 Areeda & Turner para. 626 at 83, cited in Barry Wright, 724 F.2d at 230.

IV

The appellant's complaint also asserted a violation of § 43 of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a) (1982), which reads, in relevant part, as follows:

> HN16[] Any person who shall affix, apply, or annex, or use in connection with any goods or services, a false designation of origin, or any false description or representation, . . . shall be liable to . . . any person who believes that he is or is likely to be damaged by the use of any such false description or representation.

The complaint alleged that "defendants have used false descriptions or representations in connection with the sale of hubless couplings." The district court dismissed this count of the complaint on the ground that HN17[] this circuit's previous opinions have narrowly [36] interpreted the Lanham Act to apply only to those sorts of unfair business practices or false statements that "are of the same economic nature as those which involve infringement or other improper use of trade-marks," e.g., palming off one's goods as those of another. Samson Crane Co. v. Union National Sales, Inc., 87 F. Supp. 218, 222 (D. Mass. 1949), aff'd per curiam, 180 F.2d 896 (1st Cir. 1950); see also Litton Systems, Inc. v. Whirlpool Corp., 728 F.2d 1423, 1444-45 (Fed. Cir. 1984); Quabaug Rubber Co. v. Fabiano Shoe Co., 567 F.2d 154, 160 (1st Cir. 1977) ("The basis for an action under this section is use of a mark in interstate commerce which is likely to cause confusion or to deceive purchasers concerning the source of the goods [(emphasis added)]").

Appellant concedes it cannot meet this standard. But it notes that other circuits have adopted more liberal views of the statute, some indicating that it in essence creates a private right of action for ordinary "false advertising." See U-Haul International, Inc. v. Jartran, Inc., 681 F.2d 1159 (9th Cir. 1982); Johnson & Johnson v. Carter-Wallace, Inc., 631 F.2d 186 (2nd Cir. [37] 1980); L'Aiglon Apparel, Inc. v. Lana Lobell, Inc., 214 F.2d 649 (3rd Cir. 1954); see generally 2 J. McCarthy, Trademark and Unfair Competition § 27:4 (2nd ed. 1984). Appellant also points to cases where we have cast doubt on the validity of Samson Crane. See Pignons S.A. de Mecanique v. Polaroid Corp., 657 F.2d 482 (1st Cir. 1981) (plaintiff sought overturning of Samson Crane; court acknowledged merit of plaintiff's position, but declined to express an opinion); Electronics Corporation of America v. Honeywell, Inc., 487 F.2d 513, 514 (1st Cir. 1973) ("in relying on the district court opinion, we do not indicate necessary agreement with its conclusion that palming off is not an essential element of a Lanham Act claim"); see also Camel Hair and Cashmere Institute of America, Inc. v. Associated Dry Goods, 799 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1986) (harm is of traditional "protection of proprietary mark" variety, but does not involve palming off). Appellant asks us to reconsider the validity of Samson Crane in light of our, and other circuits', subsequent cases.

After examining the record, however, we have concluded that this is not an appropriate case [38] in which to reconsider the validity of Samson Crane. Appellant had an opportunity to present its "false advertising" evidence in support of its antitrust claim, and we assume it did so. See pp. 489-90, supra. In light of that evidence, we believe it undesirable to prolong the case, for, even were we to reconsider Samson Crane and remand, it seems unlikely that appellant could win its action. We therefore continue to assume the validity of Samson Crane, and postpone its reconsideration for another day.

Finally, we affirm the pretrial dismissal of defendant American Brass & Iron [*492] Foundry on jurisdictional grounds for substantially the reasons noted by the district court. Appellant makes various other claims, which we find completely without merit. The judgment of the district court is Affirmed.

United States v. Seluk

United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts

July 5, 1988, Decided

Criminal No. 88-107-K

Reporter

691 F. Supp. 525 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6788 **

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, v. JOSEPH SELUK, Defendant

Core Terms

lawmaking, Sentencing, courts, delegation, guidelines, powers, sentencing guidelines, Parole, judicial branch, decisions, substantive law, separation-of-powers, sentencing decision, executive branch, fashioning, regulation, forbidden, functions, branch of government, initiative, rulemaking, cases, legislative power, characterization, cooperative, placement, agencies, delegation of authority, decisionmaking, challenges

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

HN1[] Constitutional Law, Separation of Powers

Accepting a label without examination of its substantive implications is precisely the kind of formalism in applying the doctrine of separation of powers that has been rejected. Fidelity to the caution against formalism requires an appraisal of the reality of how powers and functions have been allocated and exercised among the three branches in the system that had evolved up to the time of enactment of the statute at issue, as well as how they are allocated and will be exercised under the statute.

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Grand Juries > Investigative Authority > Authority of Courts

Criminal Law & Procedure > Commencement of Criminal Proceedings > Grand Juries > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Grand Juries > Investigative Authority > Authority of Jury

Governments > Courts > Authority to Adjudicate

HN2[] Judicial Officers, Judges

Judicial officers (including Article III judges) are not limited to performing the adjudicatory function of deciding cases and controversies. Their acknowledged powers and duties of office include non-adjudicatory tasks. Among such functions are disciplinary supervision of both bench and bar, rulemaking ancillary to the administration of the courts, and other functions, including supervision of grand juries and initiation of contempt proceedings, that do not necessarily or directly involve adversarial proceedings within a trial or appellate court.

Criminal Law & Procedure > Postconviction Proceedings > Parole

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Ranges

HN3[] Postconviction Proceedings, Parole

All three branches of government have long exercised significant powers over the scope and extent of punishment of persons convicted of crimes. Indeed, one of the explicit premises of enactment of the Sentencing Reform Act, 28 U.S.C.S. § 991, et seq., was that the meaning of a sentence declared by a judge (within the very loose constraints imposed by Congress, despite its acknowledged power to enact more rigorous limitations upon sentencing range) had been obscured by the power of the Parole Commission to release a prisoner after he or she had served only a small part of the period of confinement announced as the judge's sentence. Thus, congress, courts, and the Parole Commission have substantially shared control in fact over the punishment imposed upon each individual defendant.

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

HN4[] Constitutional Law, Separation of Powers

The work of the Sentencing Commission is in essence prospective substantive lawmaking because it is developing guidelines for application in the future to reasoned rather than purely discretionary sentencing decisions. This reality, however, is not dispositive of a separation-of-powers challenge.

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

Criminal Law & Procedure > Postconviction Proceedings > Parole

Governments > Legislation > Enactment

HN5[] Sentencing, Sentencing Guidelines

The Sentencing Reform Act (SRA), 28 U.S.C.S. § 991, et seq., very sharply curtailed the executive branch's discretion as to length of the sentence of an individual offender by abolishing the Parole Commission. Also, it substantially reduced the exercise of discretion case by case in the judicial branch. These choices by congress are choices to enact a law that affects the severity of punishment for crime in a deeper way than merely setting statutory minimum and maximum terms of imprisonment. The SRA imposes much greater substantive constraints on the discretion of judges and others. The imposition of these substantive-law constraints upon individual sentencing decisions is lawmaking that is well within the scope of congress' legislative power unless the method congress chose to implement them is forbidden.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Case & Controversy Requirements > General Overview

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedent

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

HN6[] Justiciability, Case & Controversy Requirements

The Constitution does not require that any statute be a complete prescription for the area of law it addresses. By necessity, because of the limitations of human foresight, every lawmaking pronouncement by every entity that makes law is an incomplete statement of the law on the subject addressed. No precedent, no rule, and no statute ever answers all substantive law questions related to the subject matter it addresses. All lawmaking -- whether by congress, by courts, or by other governmental entities -- is to some degree left to further development. In part, further development occurs as the law is applied case by case. This is an inherent characteristic of the common law system in which each decision becomes precedent. In part also, however, further development occurs in other ways. One set of examples appears in judicial decisions that overrule precedent prospectively only, not retroactively even as to the case before the court. It may be observed that what the court declares in such instances about the future is not said in deciding the case or controversy then before the court. Nevertheless, the declaration about the future is, as a practical matter, effective lawmaking. A second set of examples appears in developments that follow a congressional authorization for agency development of "regulations" that have substantive and not merely procedural consequence.

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Legislative Controls > Implicit Delegation of Authority

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Administrative Law > Agency Rulemaking > Informal Rulemaking

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Legislative Controls > General Overview

HN7[] Legislative Controls, Implicit Delegation of Authority

If the court determines that in enacting a statute congress has not directly addressed the precise question at issue, the court does not simply impose its own construction on the statute, as would be necessary in the absence of an administrative interpretation. Rather, if the statute is silent or ambiguous with respect to the specific issue, the question for the court is whether the agency's answer is based on a permissible construction of the statute. The power of an administrative agency to administer a congressionally created program requires the formulation of policy and the making of rules to fill any gap left, implicitly or explicitly, by congress. If congress has explicitly left a gap for the agency to fill, there is an express delegation of authority to the agency to elucidate a specific provision of the statute by regulation.

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Presentment & Veto

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

HN8[] Administrative Law, Judicial Review

All legislative powers granted shall be vested in a congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. U.S. Const. art. I, § 1. Interpreting this section of the Constitution as totally prohibiting participation of executive and judicial officials in lawmaking, however, would be disregarding the provisions of U.S. Const. art. I, § 7, under which no enactment by congress becomes law before it is presented to the President and either approved by him or disapproved by him and repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House. Moreover, the third branch, exercising the constitutional power of judicial review, also has a lawmaking role in determining whether a statute enacted by congress and approved by the President is enforceable in cases and controversies before the courts. Thus, the Constitution as a whole does not support the argument that all lawmaking functions are a part of the "legislative powers" vested exclusively in congress. Neither the text of the Constitution nor the opinions construing it may properly be understood as supporting the argument that the label "legislative," in the U.S. Const. art. I, § 1 sense, is aptly applied to all actions of courts and agencies in filling the interstices of constitutionally permissible statutory initiatives.

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Legislative Controls > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Delegation of Authority

Administrative Law > Judicial Review > General Overview

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Executive Controls

Governments > Federal Government > General Overview

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

HN9[] Separation of Powers, Legislative Controls

Executive action under legislatively delegated authority that might resemble "legislative" action in some respects is not subject to the approval of both houses of congress and the president for the reason that the constitution does not so require. That kind of executive action is always subject to check by the terms of the legislation that authorized it; and if that authority is exceeded it is open to judicial review as well as the power of congress to modify or revoke the authority entirely. A one-house veto is clearly legislative in both character and effect and is not so checked; the need for the check provided by U.S. Const. art. I, §§ 1, 7, is therefore clear. Congress' authority to delegate portions of its power to administrative agencies provides no support for the argument that congress can constitutionally control administration of the laws by way of a congressional veto.

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > US Department of Justice Actions > Criminal Actions > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Commerce Clause > Interstate Commerce > Stimulation of Commerce

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

HN10[] Constitutional Law, Congressional Duties & Powers

By enactment of the Sentencing Reform Act, 28 U.S.C.S. § 991, et seq., congress has initiated a dramatic change in the law of criminal sentencing. Substantive rules and obligations of reasoned choice and reasoned explanation now become central to each sentencing decision. When such a congressional initiative is taken, a new body of substantive law must be developed. In this instance, most of the traditional methods of developing the new body of law -- including the method of case-by-case development in courts -- would plainly be impractical. congress has chosen instead a method closer to those used in relation to such substantive law areas as price regulation, trade regulation, and environmental protection. The precise method chosen is not exactly like any previously used, but neither, for example, was the method chosen for price regulation when congress first determined, in the exercise of its constitutionally authorized power, that compelling national interests would be best served by price controls. The fact that this method of filling out the interstices of statutory law is to some degree innovative does not alone establish that it violates principles of separation of powers explicit or implicit in the Constitution.

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

HN11[] Constitutional Law, Separation of Powers

The Constitution does not require three airtight departments of government. The separation of powers inquiry is not so much a review of theoretical abstractions of "who ought to do what" as it is a pragmatic analysis of the extent to which an act by one branch of government prevents another from performing its assigned duties and disrupts the balance among the coordinate departments of government. When judged by fidelity to the objectives of separation-of-powers doctrine -- preservation of the independence of each branch of government and protection against aggrandizement in any branch that would disturb the balance among them -- the Sentencing Reform Act, 28 U.S.C.S. § 991, et seq., survives a challenge on the ground of excessiveness of delegation.

Business & Corporate Law > Cooperatives > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

HN12[] Business & Corporate Law, Cooperatives

The Constitution does not require three airtight departments of government. If all three branches are to participate in the task of developing substantive law, then sealing off each branch's participation from that of the other two, and requiring the three to act one at a time, in a succession of moves and countermoves to preserve a balance of powers, is more likely to impede than to advance the objective. Separation-of-powers doctrine places constraints upon cooperative efforts and joint decisionmaking, but it does not forbid them. Cooperative efforts shall not produce impediments to any branch's exercise of its powers and shall not produce aggrandizement that disturbs constitutional checks and balance. But no part of the text of the Constitution, and no principle implicit in it, forbids cooperative activity in which each branch preserves the integrity of its powers and representatives of two or all three branches, acting together, expedite lawmaking and enhance its quality. While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity.

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

HN13[] Constitutional Law, Separation of Powers

Under the Sentencing Reform Act (SRA), 28 U.S.C.S. § 991, et seq., judges who participate in the work of the Sentencing Commission are not engaged in a constitutionally-forbidden "sharing" of judicial power with officials of the executive branch, nor are the latter "sharing" executive power with judge-members of the Commission. Each member, though participating in the work of the Commission, remains free to exercise that member's executive or judicial function without impairment. Of course, the lawmaking of the Commission under legislatively delegated authority thereafter affects individual case decisions in the judicial branch as well as further action implementing the SRA in the executive branch. It does so, however, only in the sense that law constrains the exercise of all powers in all three branches. Thus, the judiciary's later acceptance of the Commission's guidelines as law that controls individual case decisions is no more a demonstration of a forbidden "sharing" of power than is the judiciary's acceptance of statutes and administrative regulations as law that controls later judicial decisions, so long as the statutes do not offend constitutional mandates and the regulations do not offend either constitutional or statutory mandates.

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Census > Composition of United States Congress

Governments > Courts > Judges

Administrative Law > Separation of Powers > Executive Controls

Constitutional Law > The Presidency > Removal of Officials

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

Governments > Federal Government > US Congress

HN14[] Census, Composition of United States Congress

For the Sentencing Commission, judge-commissioners are appointed and removed by the President and serve on the Commission with two non-voting members of the executive branch. Although the particular composition congress chose for the Commission is not a "traditional" one, there is nothing in the Constitution that explicitly or implicitly bars such a composition. Nor is there any convincing argument that the joint service of executive and judicial officers on this Commission will impair the functioning of either branch. Congress had a rational basis for determining that the experience and insight of judges, developed from their judicial experience, would be useful in the work of the Commission. Because judge-members bring to this work a perspective characteristic of the judicial branch, it may even be said that their functioning on the Commission may appropriately be characterized as "judicial" in a broad sense. But, the judge-commissioners are not acting in an adjudicatory capacity when performing their Commission duties. Constraints applicable to influences upon performance of an adjudicatory function are therefore not apt. Nor is there any reasoned basis for determining that service on the Commission would disqualify judge-members from future judicial service generally. Recusals incident to service on the Commission do not impermissibly impair judicial performance.

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

HN15[] Constitutional Law, Separation of Powers

There is no injury to a defendant when he claims that the sentencing guidelines as a whole are unconstitutional and fails to show some way in which placement of the Sentencing Commission in the judicial branch causes injury to him that would not have occurred had the Commission been designated either as an agency of the executive branch or as an independent agency.

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Census > Composition of United States Congress

Governments > Federal Government > Executive Offices

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Separation of Powers

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

HN16[] Census, Composition of United States Congress

Neither executive nor judicial power is threatened by the participation of members of both these branches in the Sentencing Commission's work. Also, the Presidential power to remove individual members of the judiciary from membership on the Commission does not affect a person's continued service as a member of the judicial branch, even when no longer a member of the Commission. Although perhaps unprecedented, the composition of membership of the Commission does not appear to be a threat to the constitutional balance of powers. The limited degree of Presidential control over the Commission and its membership does not amount to a violation of constitutional principles of separation of powers.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Procedural Due Process > Scope of Protection

Criminal Law & Procedure > Sentencing > Sentencing Guidelines > General Overview

HN17[] Procedural Due Process, Scope of Protection

The work of the Sentencing Commission "dictates" a sentence only in the sense that law always dictates results in judicial decisionmaking. That consequence is, of course, the essence of a government of laws, in contrast with totally discretionary decisionmaking by each individual adjudicator. It plainly is true that in enacting the Sentencing Reform Act (SRA), 28 U.S.C.S. § 991, et seq., congress, with an explicit purpose of reducing sentencing disparity, has chosen to cause criminal sentencing decisions to be guided by law to much greater extent than in previous practice, and to correspondingly less extent to be determined by the exercise of discretion. That is a choice congress was constitutionally free to make. That choice is not offensive to due process standards.

Judges: [1] Robert E. Keeton, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: KEETON

Opinion

[*526] ROBERT E. KEETON, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

The defendant, scheduled to be sentenced under mandatory sentencing guidelines promulgated by the United States Sentencing Commission pursuant to the Sentencing Reform Act ("SRA" or "the Act"), 28 U.S.C. § 991 et seq., challenges the constitutionality of the Act and the guidelines as a whole. I conclude that the challenge lacks merit.

The defendant has not challenged separately any of the particular provisions that bear upon his sentence, and of course, I do not consider whether one or more among the many provisions within the guidelines may be held unconstitutional as applied in other circumstances, even though the guidelines as a whole survive challenge.

I. Summary of Contentions

The defendant contends that the creation of the Sentencing Commission, pursuant to the SRA, violates the Constitution in five ways. The first four are arguments that the SRA violates the doctrine of separation of powers because (1) through this Act Congress has assigned legislative power to a body (the Sentencing Commission) that not only is outside the legislative branch but also is part of the judicial branch, (2) the SRA makes an excessive [2] delegation of legislative power, (3) the inclusion of three federal judges on the Commission threatens the independence and impartiality of the judiciary, and (4) the President's control over the Commission makes its members [*527] (including judges) subservient to the executive branch. The final argument is that (5) the sentencing guidelines deny due process by unduly restricting defendants' right to present information relevant to sentencing.

Essentially similar arguments, though with variations in detail, were presented to and rejected by Judge Mazzone in United States v. Alves, 688 F. Supp. 70 (D. Mass.1988), and a number of other district courts, see, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 682 F. Supp. 1033 (W.D. Mo.), cert. granted sub nom. United States v. Mistretta, 486 U.S. 1054, 100 L. Ed. 2d 920, 108 S. Ct. 2818, 56 U.S.L.W. 3848 (1988); United States v. Chambless, 680 F. Supp. 793 (E.D. La. 1988); United States v. Ruiz-Villanueva, 680 F. Supp. 1411 (S.D. Cal. 1988). Decisions of other courts, even greater in number, sustained the challenge to constitutionality. See, e.g., United States v. Tolbert, 682 F. Supp. 1517 (D. Kan. 1988); United States v. Estrada, [3] 680 F. Supp. 1312 (D. Minn. 1988); United States v. Frank, 682 F. Supp. 815 (W.D. Pa. 1988); United States v. Arnold, 678 F. Supp. 1463 (S.D. Cal. 1988). I concur in the conclusions reached by Judge Mazzone in Alves, the only other case thus far decided in this district, and I write further only to consider the basic premises of the separation-of-powers and due-process arguments emphasized in the submissions before me and to address some points not explicitly addressed in the Alves opinion and others cited above as sustaining the SRA.

Underlying the first and second of the defendant's contentions is the characterization of the Commission's power to develop sentencing guidelines as a "legislative" power. This characterization is the foundation for contentions that the power may not be exercised by either the executive or the judicial branch of government, that the delegation made by Congress in this case is constitutionally excessive, and that, therefore, delegation to a commission placed in the judicial branch is twice forbidden -- both because of the extent of the delegation and because the SRA attempts to delegate to a commission that it purports to place [4] in the judicial branch.

In response, first, the government argues that fashioning sentencing guidelines is essentially "executing" law rather than "making" law, and is analogous to the function previously performed by the Parole Commission, which served the objective of reducing disparity in sentences entered by hundreds of different judges by applying guidelines that it developed for general use and then applied case by case. Second, the Commission responds that governmental entities in the judicial branch, as well as administrative agencies (whether treated as part of the executive branch or as "independent" agencies) have an acknowledged power to promulgate rules affecting their administration, procedures, and operations, and that the sentencing guidelines developed by the Commission and challenged here are constitutionally permissible under this inherent rulemaking power. As to placement of the Commission in the judicial branch, the government does not oppose a ruling that this is impermissible but argues that this provision is severable. Counsel for the Commission, as amicus, defends the placement of the Commission in the judicial branch as well as all other features of the Act.

[5] In order to assess the defense contentions and the responses of the government and the Commission, one must consider what is the most appropriate description of the nature of the function of fashioning sentencing guidelines such as those promulgated by the Commission and to what extent this function is like or unlike powers traditionally exercised in various branches of government, including agencies unknown in earlier years of our constitutional history but used with increasing profusion and variety in the last half century.

II. "Legislative," "Rulemaking," and "Lawmaking" Powers

At the outset, it may be observed that advocates of contrasting views predictably use different terminology with contrasting tendencies as hidden persuaders. Characterizing the power to develop sentencing guidelines as a "legislative" power encourages one to conclude that this power belongs only in the legislative branch. Similarly, [*528] on the other side, characterizing this power as a "rulemaking" power encourages one to conclude that it is an inherent power of every court, administrative agency, and commission.

HN1[] Accepting such an intuitive leap from a label adopted without examination of its substantive implications, [6] however, is precisely the kind of formalism in applying the doctrine of separation of powers that the Supreme Court has rejected. Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 443, 53 L. Ed. 2d 867, 97 S. Ct. 2777 (1977); Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 121, 46 L. Ed. 2d 659, 96 S. Ct. 612 (1976) (per curiam); see also Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 1988 U.S. LEXIS 3034, 59-64, 101 L. Ed. 2d 569, 108 S. Ct. 2597 (1988). Fidelity to the Court's caution against formalism requires an appraisal of the reality of how powers and functions have been allocated and exercised among the three branches in the system that had evolved up to the time of enactment of the SRA, as well as how they are allocated and will be exercised under the Act.

Defendant characterizes the Commission's work as nonjudicial. Citing Hayburn's Case, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 409, 1 L. Ed. 436 (1792), and United States v. Ferreira, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 40, 52, 14 L. Ed. 42 (1852), defendant argues that the Supreme Court has recently explained these early cases as holding "that executive or administrative duties of a nonjudicial nature may not be imposed on [Article III] judges." Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 123, 46 L. Ed. 2d 659, 96 S. Ct. 612 (1976). Defendant also calls attention to the declaration in Springer v. Phillipine Islands, 277 U.S. 189, [7] 72 L. Ed. 845, 48 S. Ct. 480 (1928), that "unless otherwise expressly provided or incidental to the powers conferred, . . . the judiciary cannot exercise either executive or legislative power." Id. at 201-02; see also Keller v. Potomac Electric Power Co., 261 U.S. 428, 444, 67 L. Ed. 731, 43 S. Ct. 445 (1923) (declaring legislation prescribing legislative function for Supreme Court invalid).

The defense argument continues that under Article III, Section 2, of the Constitution, the power of judges is narrowly and precisely limited to deciding cases and controversies. See Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 488, 67 L. Ed. 1078, 43 S. Ct. 597 (1923); Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 55 L. Ed. 246, 31 S. Ct. 250 (1911).

If interpreted in this restrictive way, however, these precedents would invalidate much of the traditional work of Article III judges. Indeed, defendant has recognized that HN2[] judicial officers (including Article III judges) are not limited to performing the adjudicatory function of deciding cases and controversies. Their acknowledged powers and duties of office include nonadjudicatory tasks. Among such functions are disciplinary supervision of both Bench and Bar, rulemaking "ancillary to the administration of the courts," In re Certain Complaints Under [8] Investigation, 783 F.2d 1488, 1505 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 477 U.S. 904, 91 L. Ed. 2d 563, 106 S. Ct. 3273 (1986), and other functions, including supervision of grand juries and initiation of contempt proceedings, that "do not necessarily or directly involve adversarial proceedings within a trial or appellate court," Morrison, 487 U.S. 654, 1988 U.S. LEXIS 3034 at 48 n.20, 101 L. Ed. 2d 569, 108 S. Ct. 2597.

Defendant argues, however, that the judiciary may not "take part in the formulation of substantive law. See Sibbach v. Wilson & Co., 312 U.S. 1, 14, 61 S. Ct. 422, 85 L. Ed. 479 (1941)." Defense Memorandum (Docket No. 13), page 9.

This broad assertion that courts and Article III judges may not "take part in the formulation of substantive law" is a vulnerable link in the defense chain of reasoning.

The premise that courts may engage in prospective "procedural" rulemaking but never in prospective "substantive" rulemaking not only is inconsistent with American legal tradition but also is flawed on theoretical grounds.

True, there was a time when prevailing legal theory suppressed the fact that courts make law. Among the grandest of all legal fictions was the notion that courts merely interpret and apply law either previously made by statute or simply existing as a "brooding [9] omnipresence" in the absence [*529] of any statute in point. For at least a half century now, however, a more candid view of legal process has prevailed. Courts regularly "take part in the formulation of substantive law" in a variety of ways. First and most notably, they do so daily by making decisions that, under the common law system, are precedents. Of course, one might describe as retroactive the kind of lawmaking that is incident to recognition of judicial decisions as precedents; however, the law thus made not only determines the legal consequences of the past events involved in the case before the court but also is controlling, as precedent, over past events involved in cases yet to be decided as well as future events.

Subtler, perhaps, but even more influential as a factor in prospective lawmaking, is the court's duty (and not merely authority) to disclose reasons for its judgments. A candid disclosure of reasons inevitably says more about what law will be applied in future cases than need be said to decide the case at hand if the court were willing to state a reason of narrower scope than the more broadly applicable reason that did in fact influence the court to decide as [10] it did.

Even today, as well as in time past, a common way of describing the lawmaking that occurs in judicial opinions -- perhaps even the most common way of describing it -- maintains formally the legal fiction that courts "find" law and do not "make" it. Thus, it is said that when a court decides one way first and later overrules that decision and applies the newly recognized substantive rule retroactively, the court did not "make" either the "old" or the "new" rule. Rather in its later decision the court "found" what the law had been all along, though for a time it had been incorrectly perceived. Cf. Venturelli v. Cincinnati, Inc., 850 F.2d 825 (1st Cir.1988) (applying recent product liability precedents retroactively to the manufacturing in 1947 of industrial machinery that contributed to an injury in 1981; "courts typically apply newer understandings of 'old' legal standards to 'old' sets of facts"; "they normally treat law as 'found,' not 'made'"). Nevertheless, in exceptional circumstances overruling decisions are given prospective effect only and are not even applied to the case before the court. See, e.g., Great Northern Ry. v. Sunburst [11] Oil & Refining Co., 287 U.S. 358, 363-66, 77 L. Ed. 360, 53 S. Ct. 145 (1932). Somewhat more frequently, overruling decisions are given prospective effect principally; that is, the newly-fashioned rule is applied to the case before the court, and thus retroactively as to that one past set of events, but otherwise is applied prospectively only. See, e.g., Linkletter v. Walker, 381 U.S. 618, 14 L. Ed. 2d 601, 85 S. Ct. 1731 (1965) (declining to apply the rule of Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 6 L. Ed. 2d 1081, 81 S. Ct. 1684 (1961), which overruled Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 93 L. Ed. 1782, 69 S. Ct. 1359 (1949), to other cases finally decided before Mapp). Both Sunburst (in a civil context) and Mapp-Linkletter (in a criminal context) are illustrations of lawmaking with respect to issues that incontrovertibly had substantive impact. Also, the types of decisionmaking they illustrate are prospective substantive lawmaking not only in practical effect but in form as well.

Other illustrations of prospective lawmaking involve the fashioning of "supervisory rules" that might be distinguished as procedural rather than substantive. See, e.g., Mary Ann Pensiero, Inc. v. Lingle, 847 F.2d 90 (3d Cir. 1988) (vacating sanctions award under Fed. R. Civ. P. 11; adopting [12] "as a supervisory rule" a requirement that all motions for Rule 11 sanctions be filed in the district court before the entry of a final judgment). Even decisions involving exercise of a court's supervisory powers, however, demonstrate that judicial power to make law is not limited to making law coincidentally, under the doctrine of stare decisis, by deciding a case or controversy. Rules of procedure are rules of law -- even if strictly procedural law rather than substantive law.

Moreover, along the spectrum from what is incontrovertibly substantive to what is incontrovertibly procedural, more distinctions have been drawn in precedents and in practice than simply one bright line dividing the universe of instances into two [*530] groups, one totally substantive in nature and the other totally procedural. Different definitions of substantive-procedural distinctions have been fashioned to serve the different objectives relevant to different contexts. See, e.g., Hanna v. Plumer, 380 U.S. 460, 471, 14 L. Ed. 2d 8, 85 S. Ct. 1136 (1965); Sibbach, 312 U.S. at 9-14.

Also, even among different contexts in which it is agreed that rulemaking is substantive rather than procedural, the particular nature and function [13] of the substantive rulemaking bears upon the extent to which it is constitutionally permissible for substantive lawmaking to occur outside the legislative branch. The law of criminal sentencing is among the clearest historical examples of a field in which much substantive lawmaking did occur, before enactment of the SRA, in the courts and, through the work of the Parole Commission, in the executive branch.

HN3[] All three branches of government have long exercised significant powers over the scope and extent of punishment of persons convicted of crimes. Indeed, one of the explicit premises of enactment of the SRA was that the meaning of a sentence declared by a judge (within the very loose constraints imposed by Congress, despite its acknowledged power to enact more rigorous limitations upon sentencing range) had been obscured by the power of the Parole Commission to release a prisoner after he or she had served only a small part of the period of confinement announced as the judge's sentence. Thus, Congress, courts, and the Parole Commission have substantially shared control in fact over the punishment imposed upon each individual defendant. See Geraghty v. United States Parole Comm'n, [14] 719 F.2d 1199, 1211 (3d Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1103, 80 L. Ed. 2d 133, 104 S. Ct. 1602 (1984).

I do not rest my judgment upon either (1) the assertion that fashioning sentencing guidelines is essentially "executing" law rather than "making" law, or (2) the assertion that fashioning sentencing guidelines is no more than an exercise of inherent "rulemaking" power. To accept either of those contentions would be at least problematic, and probably incorrect. Cf. Estrada, 680 F. Supp. at 1327-29 (holding that the guidelines are substantive and -- contrary to the conclusion I have reached -- for that reason are unconstitutional). I conclude that in any event it would be inappropriate to accept those contentions in view of the Supreme Court's caution against formalism in analysis of separation-of-powers issues.

I accept as reality that HN4[] the work of the Sentencing Commission is in essence prospective substantive lawmaking because it is developing guidelines for application in the future to reasoned rather than purely discretionary sentencing decisions. This reality, however, is not dispositive of the separation-of-powers challenge. In order to decide whether participation of Article III judges in the kind [15] of lawmaking that is involved in the work of the Sentencing Commission is forbidden by separation-of-powers principles, we must examine more closely both the nature of this lawmaking and how it compares with other developments in our constitutional tradition.

III. Incomplete Substantive Lawmaking and Delegation

HN5[] The SRA very sharply curtailed the executive branch's discretion as to length of the sentence of an individual offender by abolishing the Parole Commission. Also, it substantially reduced the exercise of discretion case by case in the judicial branch. These choices by Congress are choices to enact a law that affects the severity of punishment for crime in a deeper way than merely setting statutory minimum and maximum terms of imprisonment. The SRA imposes much greater substantive constraints on the discretion of judges and others. The imposition of these substantive-law constraints upon individual sentencing decisions is lawmaking that is well within the scope of Congress' legislative power unless the method Congress chose to implement them is forbidden. One of the defense challenges to the method centers on the incompleteness of the congressional mandate. That is, the defense [16] argues that the new substantive law enacted in the [*531] SRA is so incomplete (and thus depends so much on further lawmaking by other branches) that it offends constitutional constraints.

HN6[] The Constitution, however, does not require that any statute be a complete prescription for the area of law it addresses. By necessity, because of the limitations of human foresight, and not merely by choice, every lawmaking pronouncement by every entity that makes law is an incomplete statement of the law on the subject addressed. No precedent, no rule, and no statute ever answers all substantive law questions related to the subject matter it addresses. All lawmaking -- whether by Congress, by courts, or by other governmental entities -- is to some degree left to further development.

In part, further development occurs as the law is applied case by case. This is an inherent characteristic of the common law system in which each decision becomes precedent.

In part also, however, further development occurs in other ways. One set of examples, noted in Part II above, appears in judicial decisions that overrule precedent prospectively only, not retroactively even as to the case before the court. See, e.g., [17] Sunburst, 287 U.S. 358, 77 L. Ed. 360, 53 S. Ct. 145 (1932). It may be observed that what the court declares in such instances about the future is not said in deciding the case or controversy then before the court. Nevertheless, the declaration about the future is, as a practical matter, effective lawmaking.

A second set of examples appears in developments that follow a congressional authorization for agency development of "regulations" that have substantive and not merely procedural consequence. One striking instance is a regulation of the Environmental Protection Agency, in relation to a matter to which expert knowledge and perception of the agency was relevant. A regulation of the agency was treated, both in essence and in legal theory, as having substantive-law effect and with the consequence that courts must defer to the agency's way of filling a gap in the statutory lawmaking. As the Court stated in Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694, 104 S. Ct. 2778 (1984):

> HN7[] If . . . the court determines [that in enacting a statute] Congress has not directly addressed the precise question at issue, the court does not simply impose its own construction on the statute, as would be necessary [18] in the absence of an administrative interpretation. Rather, if the statute is silent or ambiguous with respect to the specific issue, the question for the court is whether the agency's answer is based on a permissible construction of the statute.
>
> "The power of an administrative agency to administer a congressionally created. . . program requires the formulation of policy and the making of rules to fill any gap left, implicitly or explicitly, by Congress." Morton v. Ruiz, 415 U.S. 199, 231, [39 L. Ed. 2d 270, 94 S. Ct. 1055] (1974). If Congress has explicitly left a gap for the agency to fill, there is an express delegation of authority to the agency to elucidate a specific provision of the statute by regulation.

Id. at 843-44 (footnotes omitted) (emphasis added).

The functioning of the Parole Commission during recent decades may be considered an even more dramatic and relevant illustration of congressional authorization for agency (in this instance, an agency in the executive branch) development of rules or regulations with substantive impact -- impact over the length of the deprivation of liberty in individual cases. That is, by a process that occurred apart from its making decisions on individual applications [19] for parole, the Parole Commission developed "guidelines" for its parole decisions. Then, in deciding upon individual applications presented after those guidelines were in place, it generated "precedents" (though in a sense less precise and constraining than judicial precedents).

In upholding the statute authorizing the Parole Commission's fashioning of parole guidelines for prospective application, the Third Circuit observed:

> [*532] Yet, even if the statute could be construed as delegating some legislative power to the Commission, we think that compared to other administrative law precedents it withstands constitutional attack. Courts have consistently upheld much more expansive delegations of authority to agencies to regulate the conduct of members of the public. See, e.g., Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414, 64 S. Ct. 660, 88 L. Ed. 834 (1944) (price controls imposed under Emergency Price Control Act of 1942); Sunshine Anthracite Coal Co. v. Adkins, 310 U.S. 381, [84 L. Ed. 1263, 60 S. Ct. 907] (1940) (sales tax imposed under Bituminous Coal Conservation Act); United States v. Gordon, 580 F.2d 827 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1051, 99 S. Ct. 731, 58 L. Ed. 2d 711 (1978) (drug control standards established by the Comprehensive [20] Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act). In fact, the Supreme Court has declared statutes unconstitutional on the basis of an improper delegation of a legislative function on only two occasions. See Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 55 S. Ct. 837, 79 L. Ed. 1570 (1935); Panama Refining Co. v. Ryan, 293 U.S. 388, 55 S. Ct. 241, 79 L. Ed. 446 (1935).

Geraghty, 719 F.2d at 1212-13.

Defendant's argument that the SRA attempts an unconstitutional delegation of "legislative" power, formal though the argument is, cannot be dismissed lightly. Indeed, it derives from the language of the Constitution.

> HN8[] All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Art. I, § 1 (emphasis added). Interpreting this section of the Constitution as totally prohibiting participation of executive and judicial officials in lawmaking, however, would be disregarding the provisions of Article I, § 7, under which no enactment by Congress becomes law before it is presented to the President and either approved by him or disapproved by him and repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House. Moreover, the third branch, [21] exercising the constitutional power of judicial review, also has a lawmaking role in determining whether a statute enacted by Congress and approved by the President is enforceable in cases and controversies before the courts. Thus, the Constitution as a whole does not support the argument that all lawmaking functions are a part of the "legislative Powers" vested exclusively in Congress.

Neither the text of the Constitution nor the opinions construing it may properly be understood as supporting the argument that the label "legislative," in the Article I, § 1 sense, is aptly applied to all actions of courts and agencies in filling the interstices of constitutionally permissible statutory initiatives. This conclusion is supported by a close examination of what was said and done by the Court in INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 77 L. Ed. 2d 317, 103 S. Ct. 2764 (1983).

The government has cited Chadha in support of the contention that the work of the Sentencing Commission in fashioning guidelines is "executive" because it is merely a part of "executing" the laws on criminal sentencing enacted by Congress. As already noted, I reject that contention and recognize that fashioning sentencing guidelines is lawmaking. [22] Nevertheless, when the Court in Chadha referred to the Attorney General's "exercise of legislatively delegated authority," id. at 952-53, it was not using "legislative" in a sense limited to the Article I, § 1 sense of exercise of a power that only Congress can exercise. If "legislative" were used in a sense limited to the exercise of "Powers" that only Congress could exercise, Congress could not delegate any "legislative" authority and all purported "legislatively delegated authority" would be forbidden.

The conclusion that the Court, in Chadha, was not using "legislative" in such a narrow sense is reinforced by attention to the nature of the issue before the Court in that case. The decision of the Court was that a "one-House veto" was unconstitutional. The Court observed:

> The Constitution sought to divide the delegated powers of the new Federal Government into three defined categories, [*533] Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, to assure, as nearly as possible, that each branch of government would confine itself to its assigned responsibility. The hydraulic pressure inherent within each of the separate Branches to exceed the outer limits of its power, even to accomplish [23] desirable objectives, must be resisted.

Id. at 951. A footnote in Chadha responded to the contention of Congress that affirming the Court of Appeals decision against the one-House veto "will sanction 'lawmaking by the Attorney General . . . .'" Id. at 953 n.16. "Why," the brief presenting the contention of Congress asked, "is the Attorney General exempt from submitting his proposed changes in the law to the full bicameral process?" Id. It was in this context that the Court quoted the observation that "in the framework of our Constitution, the President's power to see that the laws are faithfully executed refutes the idea that he is to be a lawmaker," Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 587, 96 L. Ed. 1153, 72 S. Ct. 863 (1952), and added that "when the Attorney General performs his duties . . . he does not exercise 'legislative' power." Chadha, 462 U.S. at 953 n.16. The footnote concludes:

> HN9[] Executive action under legislatively delegated authority that might resemble "legislative" action in some respects is not subject to the approval of both Houses of Congress and the President for the reason that the Constitution does not so require. That kind of Executive action is [24] always subject to check by the terms of the legislation that authorized it; and if that authority is exceeded it is open to judicial review as well as the power of Congress to modify or revoke the authority entirely. A one-House veto is clearly legislative in both character and effect and is not so checked; the need for the check provided by Art. I, §§ 1, 7, is therefore clear. Congress' authority to delegate portions of its power to administrative agencies provides no support for the argument that Congress can constitutionally control administration of the laws by way of a congressional veto.

Chadha, 462 U.S. at 953-54 n.16 (emphasis added).

Two points are to be underscored. First, the Court treats recognized examples of "legislatively delegated authority" as instances of Congress' authorized delegation of "portions of its power." Whether we should call the exercise of that delegated power "legislative" action (as defendant might assert) or "executive" action (as the government asserts), or should describe it in some other way, may surely be debated. In no event, however, can it be denied that the delegation of a portion of Congress' power and the exercise of that power [25] are things the Court has determined to be constitutionally permissible. The second point to be underscored, because of its bearing upon the relevance of Chadha to issues in the present case, is that the provision struck down in Chadha would have disturbed the balance of powers because of the absence of the "check" explicitly provided in two sections of Article I of the Constitution. In the present case, no comparable or analogous disturbance by the SRA of the constitutionally declared balance of powers has been identified.

The force of any contention that Chadha is precedent against the constitutionality of the SRA depends on the assertion that all "lawmaking" is an exercise of "legislative" power and that all condemns "lawmaking" by any branch other than Congress. To read Chadha in this way, however, would be to disregard the Court's explicit recognition of "Congress' authority to delegate portions of its power," id., as it regularly does when it chooses to enact a statute establishing legal rules that are quite general and leaves to other branches the task of completing the lawmaking thus initiated.

The conclusion reached here is supported also by the Court's emphasis, [26] in Morrison, not upon "characterization" of the functions of an agency but upon "the real question" as to whether one branch is given a power that impedes another branch's ability [*534] to perform its constitutional duty. 487 U.S. 654, 101 L. Ed. 2d 569, 108 S. Ct. 2597, 1988 U.S. LEXIS 3034 at 64.

With the foregoing generalizations about incomplete substantive lawmaking as background, I turn next to a closer examination of the kind of lawmaking that the SRA has initiated.

IV. Distinctive Characteristics of Lawmaking by the Sentencing Commission

Given the great freedom Congress has with respect to how it informs itself about all matters relevant to pending proposals for legislation, I conclude that Congress might have chosen to create a commission to study the problems of criminal sentencing and to propose sentencing guidelines. Congress might then have enacted guidelines generally like those that have been promulgated by the Sentencing Commission pursuant to the SRA. In reaching this conclusion, I have not considered and need not consider whether one or another among many details of the guidelines may be subject to challenge on other grounds beyond those addressed in this Opinion. The case before me presents no such challenge to [27] any particular guideline. Instead, the defense challenge is to the guidelines as a whole.

The issue now to be addressed is whether Congress, rather than itself enacting sentencing guidelines, and from time to time amending them as needs for amendment become apparent, may instead create a commission (and the particular form of commission created by the SRA) to perform this function, subject always to congressional intervention should Congress choose to override, for the future at least, some part or all of the Commission's lawmaking through development and amendment of sentencing guidelines.

The general acceptance and apparent assumption of constitutionality of the functioning of the Parole Commission in recent decades is again relevant. That has been an instance in which Congress chose to enact a statute which has been treated as authorizing a commission (in the executive branch) to develop guidelines and amend them from time to time, and as well to apply them decisionally ("adjudicatively," one might say) case by case. Those guidelines were not in form constraints upon the exercise of discretion by judges in individual sentencing decisions, but in substance they did effect [28] very deep constraints. For example, when a judge had determined that a sentence of confinement for ten years was appropriate, the Parole Commission could drastically alter the substantive effect of that sentence by releasing the prisoner on parole after only a third of the time had been served.

Thus, the power of the Parole Commission to fashion guidelines with such deep substantive impact was a power of lawmaking to fill interstices of the incomplete lawmaking of Congress. The statutes prescribed some firm constraints (such as maximum limits on sentences for particular offenses) upon the discretion of courts and of the Parole Commission, but left courts free to exercise very substantial discretion in individual sentencing decisions. Also, the statutes left courts free to perform the function of interstitial lawmaking in construing the statutes and to some limited extent in fashioning rules such as those developed in the small body of appellate decisions regarding sentencing. Finally, the statutes left to the Parole Commission (by "delegation," if one chooses that characterization) both an additional lawmaking function in developing guidelines and an additional decisional function [29] (with potential precedential effect) in applying them case by case. The set of lawmaking functions of the Parole Commission was less extensive than the lawmaking function of the Sentencing Commission under the SRA, but they are nevertheless analogous in nature.

Our constitutional history includes many illustrations in which the function of further lawmaking of such extensive scope as that involved here has been left to courts, rather than to agencies or commissions. Illustrative are the very generalized standards prescribed in antitrust legislation, which left courts to develop the more precise meaning of the standards. See, e.g., I Areeda & Turner, Antitrust Law para. 106 [*535] (1978) ("Inexplicit Statutes and Unilluminating Legislative History").

I conclude that the delegation of a lawmaking function to the Sentencing Commission presents a debatable issue of first impression because in no previous instance has Congress made such an extensive delegation as in the SRA to a commission or agency, rather than to courts.

Strongly material to the resolution of this issue of first impression is the distinctive nature of the federal law of criminal sentencing. As observed in Part II above, [30] this body of law definitely includes substantive rules of law and not procedural rules only. Nevertheless, the substantive law of criminal sentencing, as it existed before enactment of the SRA, was unique in significant respects. Indeed, among the candidates for recognition as the most distinctive area of federal substantive law, patent, bankruptcy, and immigration law would rank high, but federal sentencing law as it existed before enactment of the SRA was still more distinctive and in a way especially relevant to the issue presented by the challenge to constitutionality of the SRA.

The point is illustrated dramatically by the contrasting sources of useful advice available to a trial judge considering a pending sentencing decision. As to matters involving most areas of law, the judge's most useful help in thinking through all relevant considerations comes from briefs and arguments of advocates and consultation with law clerks. In contrast, as to sentencing decisions before the SRA was enacted, briefs and memoranda were seldom filed and law clerks skilled in legal research and analysis would have little to offer in consultation, other than common sense and good judgment. The judge, [31] if seeking experience-based advice beyond that provided by oral submissions of counsel, would turn to probation officers, who as likely as not would have had no formal legal training. In short, the strictly legal aspects of sentencing were quite limited and rarely in dispute. The more powerful influences on sentencing decisions were expressed not in rules of law but in factors weighed in the exercise of discretion. So strong was this tendency that appellate review was rare, both in theory and in practice. The sentencing decision was in most respects an exercise of discretion unconstrained by any duty of reasoned choice and reasoned explanation.

HN10[] By enactment of the SRA, Congress has initiated a dramatic change in the law of criminal sentencing. Substantive rules and obligations of reasoned choice and reasoned explanation now become central to each sentencing decision. When such a congressional initiative is taken, a new body of substantive law must be developed -- just as, for example, a new body of antitrust law had to be developed after enactment of the Sherman Act in 1890. In that instance, Congress left the development of that new body of law to the courts. In this instance, most [32] of the traditional methods of developing the new body of law -- including the method of case-by-case development in courts -- would plainly be impractical. Congress has chosen instead a method closer to those used in relation to such substantive law areas as price regulation, trade regulation, and environmental protection. The precise method chosen is not exactly like any previously used, but neither, for example, was the method chosen for price regulation when Congress first determined, in the exercise of its constitutionally authorized power, that compelling national interests would be best served by price controls. The fact that this method of filling out the interstices of statutory law is to some degree innovative does not alone establish that it violates principles of separation of powers explicit or implicit in the Constitution.

HN11[] "The Constitution does not require three airtight departments of government." Geraghty, 719 F.2d at 1210 (citing Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. at 443).

> The separation of powers inquiry is not so much a review of theoretical abstractions of "who ought to do what" as it is a pragmatic analysis of the extent to which [33] an act by one branch of government prevents another from performing its assigned [*536] duties and disrupts the balance among the coordinate departments of government. Nixon, 433 U.S. at 443, 97 S. Ct. at 2790.

Geraghty, 719 F.2d at 1211.

When judged by fidelity to the objectives of separation-of-powers doctrine -- preservation of the independence of each branch of government and protection against aggrandizement in any branch that would disturb the balance among them -- the Sentencing Reform Act survives the defense challenge on the ground of excessiveness of delegation.

V. Joint Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Participation in Developing Sentencing Guidelines

The caution against formalism encourages closer scrutiny also of what I believe to be an implicit premise of some of the separation-of-powers arguments advanced as a challenge to the constitutionality of the SRA. To expose this issue, let us accept the point that it would be unfair to characterize the defense contentions as asserting that governmental powers are distributed among three airtight compartments, with lawmaking power allocated only to the legislative branch. Rather, let us understand the argument to be [34] twofold. First is the argument that the degree of lawmaking power left to the Sentencing Commission by the SRA is excessive. That is the point addressed immediately above. Second, and remaining to be examined further, is the argument that the particular method of exercise of that power by the Sentencing Commission under the SRA is forbidden because it involves the cooperation of participants from all three branches of the government in the work of the development of sentencing guidelines pursuant to the SRA.

It is true that sentencing guidelines that serve as substantive law constraints upon the discretion of judges in making sentencing decisions in particular cases, developed under the SRA, are the product of lawmaking activity in all three branches. As shown in Part III above, it was not novel for Congress to take an initiative that was in itself incomplete and required further lawmaking in other branches of the government. It cannot be plausibly denied, however, that the particular method that the SRA provides for implementation of the congressional initiative differs in one significant way from traditional methods. The work of the Commission involves -- and in a way that is unprecedented [35] -- cooperation, consultation, and joint action by persons currently holding positions in the executive and judicial branches. Is this kind of cooperative, joint action forbidden by separation-of-powers principles? Is joint action of this kind to be distinguished from the participation of all three branches in successive steps proceeding from congressional initiative, through issuance of administrative regulations with substantive impact, to judicial decisionmaking with precedential effect?

Joint action such as the SRA mandates would be forbidden if one took as a premise that government in our separation-of-powers system is a process in which all inter-branch joint decisionmaking is forbidden and the participation of separate branches must always occur in separate steps. Joint action would be forbidden, also, if one took as a premise a fixed-sum view of governmental powers under which the sum of governmental powers to achieve a governmental objective is neither increased nor decreased by the way those powers are allocated and exercised. Under each of these premises, powers would merely be redistributed by cooperative action, one branch giving up to another some of its legitimate powers [36] in order to reach an accommodation that produces a joint decision -- such as a lawmaking decision on sentencing guidelines.

Each of these premises, however, is basically at odds with the established principle that HN12[] "the Constitution does not require three airtight departments of government." Geraghty, 719 F.2d at 1210 (citing Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. at 443). If all three branches are to participate in the task of developing substantive law, then sealing off each branch's participation from [*537] that of the other two, and requiring the three to act one at a time, in a succession of moves and countermoves to preserve a balance of powers, is more likely to impede than to advance the objective. Separation-of-powers doctrine places constraints upon cooperative efforts and joint decisionmaking, but it does not forbid them. Cooperative efforts shall not produce impediments to any branch's exercise of its powers and shall not produce aggrandizement that disturbs constitutional checks and balance. But no part of the text of the Constitution, and no principle implicit in it, forbids cooperative activity in which each branch preserves the integrity of its [37] powers and representatives of two or all three branches, acting together, expedite lawmaking and enhance its quality.

> While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity.

Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635, 96 L. Ed. 1153, 72 S. Ct. 863 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring) (quoted with approval in Morrison, 487 U.S. 654, 1988 U.S. LEXIS 3034 at 69, 101 L. Ed. 2d 569, 108 S. Ct. 2597).

In short, the exercise of governmental powers is not a rigid process in which any agreement or accommodation necessarily represents some surrender of legitimate power by at least one branch. Cooperation, if conducted in a way that does not offend the underlying principles and objectives of separation of powers, is constitutionally permissible.

The Court in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 41 L. Ed. 2d 1039, 94 S. Ct. 3090 (1974), made the point that "'the judicial power of the United States' vested in the federal courts by Article III, § 1 of the Constitution . . . [cannot] be shared with the Executive branch," id. at 704 (emphasis added), the Chief Executive cannot "share [38] with the Judiciary the veto power," id. (emphasis added), and Congress cannot "share with the Judiciary the power to override a Presidential veto," id. (emphasis added). Nevertheless, the Court, focusing on substantive concerns rather than mere form, held in Nixon that the prohibition of sharing of power implicit in separation-of-powers doctrine does not insulate the exercise of the power of each branch in a way that would sustain a claim of absolute Presidential privilege of immunity from judicial process in all circumstances. "The separate powers were not intended to operate with absolute independence." Id. at 707. The Court rejected the broad claim of privilege because the recognition of such a privilege "would upset the constitutional balance of a 'workable government' and gravely impair the role of the courts under Art. III." Id.

HN13[] Under the SRA, judges who participate in the work of the Sentencing Commission are not engaged in a constitutionally-forbidden "sharing" of judicial power with officials of the executive branch, nor are the latter "sharing" executive power with judge-members of the Commission. Each member, though participating in the work [39] of the Commission, remains free to exercise that member's executive or judicial function without impairment. Of course, the lawmaking of the Commission under "legislatively delegated authority" thereafter affects individual case decisions in the judicial branch as well as further action implementing the SRA in the executive branch. It does so, however, only in the sense that law constrains the exercise of all powers in all three branches. Thus, the judiciary's later acceptance of the Commission's guidelines as law that controls individual case decisions is no more a demonstration of a forbidden "sharing" of power than is the judiciary's acceptance of statutes and administrative regulations as law that controls later judicial decisions (so long as the statutes do not offend constitutional mandates and the regulations do not offend either constitutional or statutory mandates).

HN14[] Focusing upon particular characteristics of the Sentencing Commission, defendant argues that judge-commissioners will find it impossible to maintain their [*538] independence and impartiality in the courtroom when they are appointed and removed by the President and serve on the Commission with two non-voting members of [40] the executive branch, including the Attorney General. Although the particular composition Congress chose for the Commission is not a "traditional" one, defendant has pointed to nothing in the Constitution that explicitly or implicitly bars such a composition. Nor has any convincing argument been made that the joint service of executive and judicial officers on this Commission will impair the functioning of either branch.

Congress had a rational basis for determining that the experience and insight of judges, developed from their judicial experience, would be useful in the work of the Commission. Because judge-members bring to this work a perspective characteristic of the judicial branch, it may even be said that their functioning on the Commission may appropriately be characterized as "judicial" in a broad sense. But, the judge-commissioners are not acting in an adjudicatory capacity when performing their Commission duties. Constraints applicable to influences upon performance of an adjudicatory function are therefore not apt.

Nor has any reasoned basis been advanced for determining that service on the Commission would disqualify judge-members from future judicial service generally. [41] As Judge Mazzone has stated, "although the participation of judges on some types of extra-judicial agencies may possess some ability to affect the impartiality of particular judges, service on the Commission does not carry that risk." Alves, 688 F. Supp. at 77.

I concur also in Judge Mazzone's conclusion that recusals incident to service on the Commission do not impermissibly impair judicial performance. Id.

VI. Placement of the Sentencing Commission and Presidential Control

Perhaps more than any of the other arguments of either party in this matter, the defense contention regarding placement of the Commission in the judicial branch depends on accepting the view that form is critically important to the matter at issue. The Sentencing Commission has responded that placing the Commission in the judicial branch may be seen in part as merely a "housing," "housekeeping," "budgetary," or "administrative" choice. Whether or not any of these particular characterizations should be accepted, the underlying point that this choice does not affect the substantive rights of the defendant is valid unless placement of the Commission in the judicial branch has substantive implications in [42] relation to one of the other constitutional challenges.

I conclude that no such substantive implication has been identified. HN15[] Defendant shows no injury to himself when he claims only that the sentencing guidelines as a whole are unconstitutional and fails to show some way in which placement of the Commission in the judicial branch causes injury to him that would not have occurred had the Commission been designated either as an agency of the executive branch or as an independent agency.

With one exception, no reasoned basis has been advanced for determining that substantive implications are involved in the formal placement of the Sentencing Commission in the judicial branch. The exception is the argument that the Commission must be placed in one or another of the branches of government recognized in the Constitution and wherever it is placed it will have members from at least one other branch serving outside their branch. This is, in substance, a formal argument that the separation-of-powers doctrine not only forbids aggrandizement that threatens the balance of powers fashioned in the Constitution but also forbids joint decisionmaking by officials of different branches, even when they [43] respectively surrender no power.

One of the decisions sustaining defense challenges to the SRA has reasoned:

> In Bowsher [v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 106 S. Ct. 3181, 92 L. Ed. 2d 583 (1986),] an officer of the legislative branch was not allowed to serve in the executive branch; nor should a member of the judiciary serve in that capacity.

[*539] United States v. Molander, 683 F. Supp. 701, 707 (W.D. Wis. 1988). In Bowsher, however, the Court reasoned that Congress had reserved "for itself the power of removal of an officer charged with the execution of the laws" by means other than impeachment and that "to permit the execution of the laws to be vested in an officer answerable only to Congress would, in practical terms, reserve in Congress control over the execution of the laws." 478 U.S. at 726, 106 S. Ct. at 3188. No comparable threat to the constitutional balance of powers appears here. HN16[] Neither executive nor judicial power is threatened by the participation of members of both these branches in the Commission's work. Also, the Presidential power to remove individual members of the judiciary from membership on the Commission does not affect a person's continued service as a member [44] of the judicial branch, even when no longer a member of the Commission. Although perhaps unprecedented, the composition of membership of the Commission does not appear to be a threat to the constitutional balance of powers. I conclude that the constitutional challenges to the membership of the Commission and to its placement in the judicial branch cannot be sustained.

I concur in Judge Mazzone's determination that the limited degree of Presidential control over the Commission and its membership does not amount to a violation of constitutional principles of separation of powers. Id. at 14-15.

In summary, I conclude that the defense challenges to the guidelines on separation-of-powers grounds lack merit.

VII. Due Process

In summarizing his due process contentions, defendant argues that "the work of the Commission . . . essentially dictates the sentences to be imposed on the vast majority of federal criminal defendants." Defense Memorandum (Docket No. 13), page 5. The reality, however, is that HN17[] the work of the Commission "dictates" only in the sense that law always dictates results in judicial decisionmaking. That consequence is, of course, the essence of a "government of laws," [45] cf. Mass. Const. Pt. I, Art. XXX, in contrast with totally discretionary decisionmaking by each individual adjudicator. It plainly is true that in enacting the SRA Congress, with an explicit purpose of reducing sentencing disparity, has chosen to cause criminal sentencing decisions to be guided by law to much greater extent than in previous practice, and to correspondingly less extent to be determined by the exercise of discretion. That is a choice Congress was constitutionally free to make. That choice is not offensive to due process standards.

For the foregoing reasons, defendant's several challenges to the constitutionality of the sentencing guidelines are denied.

LexisNexis

Genetic Systems Corp. v. Abbott Laboratories

United States District Court for the District of Columbia

July 13, 1988, Decided ; July 13, 1988, Filed

Civil Action No. 87-1722

Reporter

691 F. Supp. 407 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7039 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,142

GENETIC SYSTEMS CORPORATION, Plaintiff, v. ABBOTT LABORATORIES, et al., Defendants

Core Terms

Regions, blood, competitors, allegations, group boycott, Sherman Act, conspiracy, suppliers, monopolize, conspiring, purchaser, horizontal, amended complaint, screening, summary judgment, motion to dismiss, transfusion, Counts, concerted, tests, conspiracy to monopolize, tortious interference, plaintiff's claim, anti trust law, blood supply, contracted, specific intent, Clayton Act, vertical, entity

Counsel: [1] Counsel for Plaintiff: Ronald A. Stern, Esq., Hughes, Hubbard & Reed, Washington, District of Columbia, and Jerome G. Shapiro, Esq. (pro hac vice, New York Office).

Counsel for Defendant Abbott Laboratories: Thomas W. Queen, Esq., Wiley, Rein & Fielding, Washington, District of Columbia, Mark E. Barmak, Esq., Association General Counsel, Litigation, Abbott Park, Illinois.

Counsel for Defendant The American National Red Cross: John H. Shenefield, Esq., Robert S. Scholssberg, Esq., Michael S. Kelly, Esq., Washington, District of Columbia.

Judges: Joyce Hens Green, District Judge.

Opinion by: GREEN

Opinion

[*409] MEMORANDUM OPINION

JOYCE HENS GREEN, DISTRICT JUDGE.

This matter now comes before the Court on the motion of defendant The American National Red Cross ("Red Cross") to dismiss or for summary judgment on all four counts of asserted against it in the amended [1] [2] complaint and the motion of defendant Abbott Laboratories ("Abbott") to dismiss or for summary judgment on the fourth, [2] fifth, and sixth claims of the amended complaint. For the reasons set forth below, the motions of the Red Cross and Abbott are granted.

[1] The Court granted plaintiff's motion for leave to amend the complaint on March 9, 1988, but expressly declined to comment at that time on the sufficiency of plaintiff's new allegations. Order, Mar. 9, 1988, at 4. The Court also advised the parties that it would stay its consideration of defendants' then-pending motions to dismiss several counts of the original complaint (referred to herein as "Defendants' First Motion") until the completion of briefing on defendants' motions to dismiss the counts added by the amended complaint ("Defendants' Second Motion"). Id. at 5.

I. Factual Background [3]

The Red Cross, established as a corporation by Congress in 1905, 36 U.S.C. § 1, supplies 55% of the approximately eleven million pints of blood donated annually for transfusions in the United States. [4] The Red Cross has established 56 blood service regions ("Red Cross Regions") to assist in the collection of blood for transfusion. [5] [4] The regions work with the local Red Cross chapters under the direction and supervision of the Red Cross National Headquarters. [6] The chapters and blood service regions are not separate corporations and are not allowed to be constituted as separate legal entities. [7] [3] The Red Cross Regions, like the Red Cross chapters, all operate pursuant to the same license granted to the Red Cross by the Food and Drug Administration. [8] The Red Cross has the authority to dictate the method of operation of each Red Cross Region and the products it may purchase. [9]

Transfusion blood donated to the Red Cross and independent blood centers is screened for transmissible diseases, including hepatitis [10] [5] and the HTLV antibody [*410] (AIDS). [11] To support its testing program, the Red Cross annually contracts with private suppliers of blood testing equipment. For many years, Abbott has been the exclusive or dominant supplier of equipment used for screening transfusion blood. [12] From 1978 to 1984, when the only virus for which transfusion blood was routinely screened was hepatitis, Abbott supplied equipment for virtually all hepatitis tests [13] and was the exclusive supplier to the Red Cross. In recent years, however, other competing

---

[2] Abbott joins in the Red Cross's motion to dismiss or in the alternative for summary judgment on Count IV of the original complaint, which is identical to Count IV of the amended complaint.

[3] As defendants have consistently pointed out, much of the factual discussion presented by Genetic Systems in its oppositions to defendants' motions will not be relevant until the merits of this action are tried and the "rule of reason" is applied. Some of those factual allegations are nonetheless presented here to provide context for the discussion that follows.

[4] Amended Complaint, para. 8; Declaration of Terrance J. Bieker, Vice President, Sales and Marketing, Genetic Systems Corporation ("Bieker Decl."), para. 4. The remainder of the blood for transfusion is collected by more than 150 independent blood centers.

[5] Declaration of Stephen H. Richards, Secretary and General Counsel of The American National Red Cross ("Richards Decl."), paras. 7-8.

Plaintiff has referred to the Red Cross' Blood Service Regions as "affiliates" and, sometimes, as chapters. Red Cross "chapters" are, however, entities distinct from the Regions, and the Red Cross Regions are not considered "affiliates." Supplemental Declaration of Victor W. Schmitt, Vice President, Medical Operations, The American National Red Cross ("Schmitt Supp. Decl.") para. 3. The term "affiliation" is used by the Red Cross in paragraph 4 of its 1987 contract with Abbott to refer to independent non-Red Cross blood centers to which Abbott may agree to extend the contract prices in the event the Red Cross and the independent center enter into a cooperation agreement. Id. para. 11. As further discussed below, however, no such extension has been made to date nor are any would-be affiliates parties to the Red Cross-Abbott contract. Id.

[6] Richards Decl. para. 8.

[7] Richards Decl. para. 10.

[8] Schmitt Supp. Decl. para. 2.

[9] Id. para. 5.

[10] Amended Complaint, para. 11; Bieker Decl. para. 7.

[11] Id. para. 9.

[12] Amended Complaint, para. 10.

[13] The two hepatitis tests are Hepatitis B Surface Antigen ("surface") and Hepatitis B Core Antibody ("anti-core").

suppliers, including plaintiff Genetic Systems Corporation ("Genetic Systems") [14] and E.I. duPont de Nemours, Inc. ("duPont") have entered the market. [15] The circumstances leading up to the contract that prompted this litigation -- an exclusive two-year contract between the Red Cross and Abbott for testing equipment -- involve disputed facts that will be outlined here only for contextual purposes.

In February 1986, when Abbott was the exclusive supplier to the Red Cross of hepatitis and AIDS test equipment, the Red Cross Task Force To Evaluate Infectious Disease Test Kits compared the AIDS tests of several different suppliers, including those of Genetic Systems [16] and Abbott. [17] The Task Force called Genetic Systems' AIDS test the "test of choice" and recommended that, upon FDA approval, Genetic Systems "be given the largest market share (not less than 80% of total collections)." [18] The Task Force recommended against any exclusive arrangement with Abbott, expressed strongly that the "microplate" technology offered by Genetic Systems was superior to the "bead" technology offered by Abbott, and concluded that the Red Cross should [6] encourage development of the former type of test equipment. [19]

In April 1986, an internal Red Cross survey indicated that twenty-two of the Regions (accounting for more than 2.8 million pints) ranked Genetic Systems as their first choice of suppliers, and twenty-nine (accounting for 2.6 million pints) ranked Abbott as their first choice among suppliers of testing equipment. [20]

By the Summer of 1986, the Red Cross had contracted with Abbott, Genetic Systems, and duPont to supply blood screening test equipment for the period July 1, 1986 through June 30, 1987. After discussions with the Red Cross Regions, the Red Cross determined that six of its fifty-six Regions would be supplied test equipment from Genetic Systems. [21] This volume represented 15% of the AIDS tests performed by the Red Cross and was the first major contract for a Genetic [7] Systems product. [22] The Red Cross contracted with Abbott to supply the remaining approximately 85% of the 21.6 million tests for hepatitis and AIDS for the same 1986-87 contract period. [23]

[*411] In July 1986, studies presented at the National Institutes of Health Conference on AIDS indicated that the Abbott AIDS test then in use by the Red Cross was less sensitive to detecting contaminated blood than the test of Genetic Systems. [24] That same month, Victor W. Schmitt, Vice President of Medical Operations of the Red Cross, inquired of Genetic Systems how long it would take for it to supply all Red Cross Regions with their requirements for

---

[14] Genetic Systems is a subsidiary of Bristol-Meyers, Inc. Amended Complaint, para. 2.

[15] When the complaint was filed, Genetic Systems enjoyed an 8% market share; this has now apparently declined to 5-6%. Amended Complaint, para. 27; Bieker Decl. para. 19.

[16] Genetic Systems' AIDS test received approval from the Food and Drug Administration in February 1986. Bieker Decl., para. 9.

[17] Amended Complaint, para. 12.

[18] Declaration of Jay Kelly Wright, counsel for Genetic Systems, ("Wright Decl."), Exh. 8 (ANRC 03283-84).

[19] Id. at (ANRC 03284-86).

[20] Id., Exh. 15 (ANRC 02828).

[21] Schmitt Supp. Decl. para. 7.

[22] Bieker Decl. para. 11.

[23] Abbott received a contract for 100% of the Red Cross' "surface" hepatitis test (for one year), 100% of the Red Cross' "anti-core" hepatitis test (for two years), and 85% of the AIDS tests (for one year). Declaration of Richard A. Gonzales, Marketing Manager, U.S. Field Operations, Diagnostics Division, Abbott Laboratories ("Gonzales Decl."), para. 18; Schmitt Supp. Decl. 6, Exh. 1 (July 1, 1986 contract between the Red Cross and Genetic Systems).

[24] The National Institute of Health "Multicenter AIDS Cohort Study" found that "the Abbott test missed significantly more AIDS-contaminated blood samples in the study than the Genetic Systems test." Bieker Decl. para. 10. Abbott disputes the validity of that study, Gonzales Decl. para. 32, and claims that the second phase of the study demonstrated that the Abbott test was in fact superior to that of Genetic Systems. Gonzales Decl. paras. 32-33.

AIDS tests. [25] Genetic Systems [8] advised the Red Cross that it could do so within four weeks. [26] In the meantime, the Red Cross continued to use the Abbott test and Abbott sought FDA approval of a new, "improved" AIDS test.

By November 1986, the Red Cross was aware that the new Abbott test would not be available until December 1986; that availability date was later delayed to January 1987. [27] The Red Cross became frustrated at the regulatory delays, however, and developed various strategies in response to the problem. [28] Initially, the Red Cross adopted a "contingency plan" under which it would become a "co-investigator" with Abbott to facilitate [9] licensure by the Food and Drug Administration. [29] This contingency plan was never put into effect, [30] however, and the Red Cross adopted a second contingency plan to purchase blood test equipment from alternative suppliers. [31] This second plan was also never implemented because Abbott's new test received FDA approval in January 1987. [32]

One month after Abbott received approval for its new test, the Red Cross received proposals from Genetic Systems, Abbott, and duPont to supply the Red Cross' requirements for AIDS and the two hepatitis tests for a multi-year period commencing July 1, 1987. [33]

[10] The record clearly reflects, and defendants do not deny, that a variety of views, some "strongly held and sharply conflicting," [34] [11] emerged within the Red Cross as to the desirability of contracting with the various test equipment suppliers for the next contract period. For example, in March 1987, the Red Cross Task Force found that the test kits of Genetic Systems, DuPont, and Abbott "all appear to perform with comparable sensitivity and specificity at this time" and would be "acceptable" [35] but recommended that Genetic Systems continue to have a "significant part" of the Red Cross' AIDS test business in light of the [*412] dissatisfaction with the Abbott test in 1986. [36] The Task Force concluded that it was important for Genetic Systems to "remain competitive in this field and continue to develop improved microplate reagents and equipment." [37] Several Red Cross administrators expressed strong support for extending a contract to Genetic Systems over Abbott. [38] After considering the relative

---

[25] Bieker Decl. para. 11; Supplemental Declaration of Terrance J. Bieker ("Bieker Supp. Decl.") para. 3(A).

[26] Id.

[27] Wright Decl., Exh. 10 (ANRC 02967), Exh. 11 (ANRC 02969).

[28] Transcript of Oral Argument, October 5, 1987 ("Tr.") at 4-5; Wright Decl., Exh. 10 (ANRC 02967).

[29] Tr. at 5; Wright Decl., Exh. 10 (ANRC 02967).

[30] Second Supplemental Declaration of Victor W. Schmitt ("Schmitt Second Supp. Decl.") at para. 3.

[31] Tr. at 5; Wright Decl., Exh. 11 (ANRC 02969).

[32] Red Cross' Reply on First Motion, at 5; Tr. at 5.

[33] Bieker Decl. para. 12. The Red Cross invited Genetic Systems to bid for both the hepatitis surface and the anticore tests, but the latter only for the period commencing July 1, 1988 because Abbott already had the contract with the Red Cross to supply the anti-core test until that time. Genetic Systems' bid was also conditioned upon FDA approval of its anti-core test. At the time the proposals were solicited, only Abbott was licensed for all three tests. Declaration of Victor W. Schmitt ("Schmitt Decl.") para. 6 (Schmitt notes that all three suppliers sought to be the sole supplier of AIDS tests for the Red Cross).

[34] Red Cross' Reply to Defendants' First Motion, at 5.

[35] Wright Decl., Exh. 13 (ANRC 02887); see also Schmitt Decl. para. 8.

[36] Wright Decl., Exh. 12 (ANRC 02434-35).

[37] Id.

benefits and costs of the various bids (facts highly disputed in this litigation), [39] the Red Cross determined to award the contract exclusively to Abbott for a two-year period.

On May 5, 1987, the Red Cross informed Genetic Systems that it had decided to enter into an agreement with Abbott effective July 1, 1987 through June 30, 1989 for the supply of all the Red Cross' requirements for the fifty-six Regions for the three blood [12] tests. [40] Under the contract, the Red Cross Regions order directly from Abbott and pay for the tests pursuant to their budgets that have been approved by the Red Cross. [41]

In addition to the test kits, [42] Abbott is to supply the Red Cross Regions with a data management system ("DMS"), which analyzes the data from all the Red Cross' routine tests, "at no charge" during the contract period. [43] [13] After the contract expires, the regions will be required to pay a separate leasing charge for continued use of the DMS in the event that they switch to a supplier other than Abbott. [44] Currently, DMS is not compatible with the test instrumentation of other suppliers, but under the contract, Abbott agrees to make DMS compatible. [45]

In short, Genetic Systems contends that the two-year exclusive contract between Abbott and the Red Cross effectively froze Genetic Systems out of the market for blood test equipment and has jeopardized the company's ability to survive as a competitor. With this sketch of the facts in mind, defendants' arguments that plaintiff has either failed to state or [14] cannot prove the alleged violations of the antitrust laws shall be examined.

[*413] II. Analysis

A. Plaintiff's Allegations

---

[38] See Wright Decl., Exh. 13 (ANRC 02887) (Memorandum of Dr. S. Gerald Sandler, Associate Vice President, Medical Operations of the Red Cross); id., Exh. 14 (ANRC 03299) (Memorandum of Dr. Frans Peetoom, Director of Blood Services, Red Cross Pacific Northwest Region); id., Exh. 16 (ANRC 02898).

At the same time, the record reflects that Abbott itself appeared to have some doubts about the quality of the new test. See Declaration of Dennis G. Terez, counsel for Genetic Systems (March 7, 1988) ("Terez Decl."), Exh. 5 (A01405 - Confidential), Exh. 6 (A03192 - Confidential), Exh. 7 (A02630 - Confidential).

[39] Schmitt Decl. para. 15; see Memorandum Opinion, June 29, 1987, at 14-15 & nn. 23-24; see also Plaintiff's Opposition to Defendants' First Motion, at 19-20.

[40] Bieker Decl. para. 14.

[41] Schmitt Supp. Decl. para. 10.

[42] Another part of the contract challenged by Genetic Systems provides that Abbott will reduce the price on its existing contract with the Red Cross that ended June 30, 1988 for the anti-core test. Bieker Decl. para. 15(a); Gonzales Decl. para. 26.

[43] Plaintiff contends that the DMS was a "give away" under the contract, but according to the Red Cross and Abbott, the contract did not provide a separate charge for the DMS because that the cost of the DMS was part of the total contract price. Schmitt Decl. para. 12. Genetic Systems' proposal was identical in this respect. Id. PP 11-12; Wright Decl., Exh. 2 (ANRC 03025).

The Red Cross estimates the total value of this portion of the contract to be $ 4.3 million for the two-year period, plus $ 7 million in labor savings. Wright Decl., Exh. 23 (ANRC 03013).

[44] Id., Exh. 3 (ANRC 02170). While plaintiff characterizes this charge as a significant "penalty" amounting to as much as $ 2.8 million per year for all Regions, creating a strong disincentive for the Regions to switch away from Abbott, Second Supplemental Memorandum of Plaintiff, at 7, Bieker Supp. Decl. para. 7, Abbott claims that it is merely "reasonable compensation" for Regions' continued use of the DMS system. Abbott's Reply on Defendants' First Motion, at 4. The contract provides that the monthly leasing charge will range from $ 960 to $ 2580 per center depending on whether the Region chooses an alternative supplier for only one or all three of the tests. Wright Decl., Exh. 3 (ANRC 02170).

[45] Wright Decl., Exh. 3 (ANRC 02170); Bieker Supp. Decl. paras. 6, 7; Gonzales Decl. para. 24, 27; Schmitt Decl. para. 13.

In the amended complaint, plaintiffs allege six counts, two against Abbott alone and four against both defendants:

I. Against Abbott for violation of Sherman Act § 2 in that Abbott's conduct constitutes a monopolization and an attempt to monopolize;

II. Against Abbott and the Red Cross for violation of Sherman Act § 1 in that the conduct of Abbott and the Red Cross constitutes a "contract, combination . . . or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce";

III. Against Abbott and the Red Cross for violation of Clayton Act § 3 in that the conduct of Abbott and the Red Cross constituted an exclusive dealing arrangement the effect of which may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly;

IV. Against Abbott and the Red Cross for per se violation of Sherman Act § 1 in that the conduct of Abbott and the Red Cross constitutes a concerted refusal to deal, and an unlawful conspiracy of combination to boycott plaintiff with respect to purchases of transfusion blood screening equipment by Red Cross affiliates, which are capable of choosing [15] independently between Abbott and plaintiff as competing suppliers;

V. Against Abbott and the Red Cross for violation for Sherman Act § 2 in that the conduct of Abbott and the Red Cross constitutes monopolization, conspiracy to monopolize, and an attempt to monopolize; and

VI. Against Abbott for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage and unfair competition in that Abbott engaged intentionally and maliciously to deprive plaintiff of actual and prospective business relationships, advantages, and opportunities.

Plaintiff also now alleges in the amended complaint the existence of two relevant product markets: (1) the market for transfusion blood screening equipment and (2) the "supply of blood for transfusions and the services associated with such supply." [46]

Defendant Red Cross moves to dismiss or in the alternative for summary judgment on all four counts asserted against it (II-IV), and Abbott moves to dismiss or for summary judgment as to only Counts IV, V, and VI of the amended complaint.

B. Standards of Review

In viewing a motion to dismiss, a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it "appears [16] beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80, 78 S. Ct. 99 (1957). The factual allegations of the complaint must be presumed true and liberally construed in favor of plaintiff. Ramirez de Arellano v. Weinberger, 240 U.S. App. D.C. 363, 745 F.2d 1500, 1506 (D.C. Cir. 1984), vacated on other grounds, 471 U.S. 1113, 86 L. Ed. 2d 255, 105 S. Ct. 2353 (1985); 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil 2d, § 1357, at 594 (1969). If the court considers matters outside the pleadings in determining the existence of disputed issues of material fact, then a motion to dismiss should be converted into a motion for summary judgment. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b).

Summary judgment is appropriate when there is "no genuine issue as to any material fact." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56; Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 2511, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). In considering a motion for summary judgment, the "evidence of the non-movant is to believed, and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor," id. 106 S. Ct. at 2513, but at the same time, Rule 56 places a burden on the nonmoving party to "go beyond the pleadings and by her own affidavits, [17] or by the 'depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file,' designate 'specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.'" *Celotex [414] Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 2553, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986).

When discovery is incomplete, a court should decline to grant summary judgment if the nonmoving party demonstrates that further discovery may reveal additional facts showing disputed issues of material fact for trial. See 10A, C. Wright, A. Miller & M. Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil 2d, § 2741, at 549 (1983); Celotex,

---

[46] Amended Complaint, paras. 23-24.

106 S. Ct. at 2554-55; see also Cowan v. J.C. Penney Co. Inc., 790 F.2d 1529, 1532 (11th Cir. 1986). In the instant case, discovery has commenced and a substantial number of documents have been produced, but depositions have been stayed pending resolution of the parties' motions to dismiss or for summary judgment. [47] Of course, the incompleteness of discovery is not a consideration where plaintiff's allegations are not adequately pleaded or where only an issue of law is involved. As discussed further below, plaintiff has raised a number of disputed issues, on some of which it claims it needs additional discovery, but has failed [18] to show the necessary materiality of those facts to the issues now before the Court. While such disputes may well be relevant to any future "rule of reason" analysis, that does not preclude dismissal on the counts now at issue.

C. Counts II and III: Violation of Sherman Act § 1 -- Conspiracy in Restraint of Trade and Violation of Clayton Act § 3 -- Exclusive Dealing Contract

In Count II of the amended complaint, Genetic Systems asserts that Abbott and the Red Cross violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act, which prohibits a "contract, combination . . . or conspiracy in restraint of trade of commerce." Plaintiff further alleges in Count III that the conduct of Abbott and the Red Cross constituted an exclusive dealing arrangement in violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act. The Red Cross, but not Abbott, moves to dismiss or for summary judgment on both counts. The thrust of the Red Cross' motion is that a buyer in an exclusive dealing contract cannot be held liable under Section 3 of the Clayton Act, and that, absent liability under that section, a claim for violation of the Sherman Act [19] Section 1 cannot stand. The Court agrees.

Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14, provides that:

> It shall be unlawful for any person . . . to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods . . . on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods . . . of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Though few courts have ever addressed the issue, [48] plaintiff has not pointed to any case where a court found a purchaser liable for an exclusive dealing contract, and it appears from the plain language of the statute, the relevant legislative history, and the observations of commentators that Section 3 does not impose liability on purchasers for exclusive dealing contracts. See McGuire v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 399 F.2d 902 (9th Cir. 1968) ("Here, [the defendant] is not the seller and consequently no cause of action is created against it"); 2 E. Kintner, The Legislative History [20] of the Antitrust Laws and Related Statutes, 1425 (1978) (reprinting 51 Cong. Rec. 9388 (daily ed. May 28, 1914)); [49] [21] [*415] 3 J. von Kalinowski, Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation, § 12.02[3] (1988) ("Section 3 itself does not define the words 'any person' except to indicate that he must be a seller or a lessor."); IV E. Kintner, Federal Antitrust Law, § 32.10 & n. 89 (1984) ("only sellers and lessors are subject to [Section 3's] prohibitions") (citing McGuire, 399 F.2d at 906). [50] This conclusion, drawn from the clear import of the [48] See McGuire v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 399 F.2d 902, 906 (9th Cir. 1968) ("While no case which holds to this effect has been drawn to our attention, the language of the statute seems plain.").

---

[47] Order, April 19, 1988; see Plaintiff's Second Supplemental Memorandum at 2 n.2.

[49] Representative Seldomridge commented: "This provision, as I read it, seems to affect the seller of goods and not the purchaser."

Plaintiff's argument that this portion of the legislative history is not relevant because the term "contract for sale" was not then included in the statute is unpersuasive since that term does not alter, but merely broadens, the obvious intent of Section 3, which is directed at the conduct of sellers.

[50] The argument of Genetic Systems that the Red Cross should not be dismissed from this action because it is a properly joined party, Plaintiff's Opposition to the First Motion of the Red Cross, at 27-30, is without merit since joinder rules do not override the substantive requirements of the antitrust laws that form the basis for this Court's jurisdiction over plaintiff's claims. Carroll v.

statutory language, is also consistent with the fundamental antitrust concept that the alleged sins of sellers should not be visited on buyers because of the risk of chilling competition. See Coastal Transfer Co. v. Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., 833 F.2d 208, 211 (9th Cir. 1987); Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1108-09 (7th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1054, 84 L. Ed. 2d 821, 105 S. Ct. 1758 (1985).

In the face of the Red Cross' argument that buyers cannot be liable under Section 3, plaintiff seeks to characterize the Red Cross as more than solely a purchaser. Plaintiff contends that it is entitled to challenge "the totality of the Red Cross' conduct in eliminating the competition of Genetic Systems with full knowledge of the risks inhering in placing the responsibility for blood safety solely in Abbott's hands. That conduct includes, but is clearly not limited to, the signing of the 1987 contract." [51] For example, Genetic Systems suggests that the Red Cross entered into "active collaboration" with [22] Abbott when the Red Cross adopted (although it never implemented) a plan to become co-investigator with Abbott on its "improved" AIDS test. Plaintiff further contends that the Red Cross "knowingly joined" in the exclusionary contract with Abbott and thus violated the antitrust laws. [52] For the reasons discussed above and further below, this attempt to fit the square conduct of the Red Cross into the round hole of Section 3 cannot succeed. These characterizations of a purchaser's conduct do not change its competitive contracting posture, and plaintiff has cited no case where a purchaser has been considered a proper defendant in an exclusive dealing contract case under Section 3 of the Clayton Act or Section 1 of the Sherman Act. [53]

[23] Accordingly, the Red Cross is entitled to dismissal of Count III based on the Clayton Act, Section 3. This conclusion and the same reasoning also mandates the dismissal of Count II alleged against the Red Cross brought under the broader proscription [54] of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. [55] [*416] Here, too, the absence of any cases holding purchasers liable for exclusive dealing contracts under Section 1 confirms the implicit intent of Congress.

[24] D. Count IV: Per Se Violation of Sherman Act § 1 -- Concerted Refusal to Deal and Group Boycott

Plaintiff alleges in Count IV a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act in that the conduct of the Abbott and the Red Cross constitutes a concerted refusal to deal or unlawful group boycott by the Red Cross and its "affiliates." Defendants contend that plaintiff has failed to state a claim because no horizontal agreement to restrain trade can be demonstrated. The Court is persuaded that plaintiff's claim fails as a matter of law.

Brotherhood of R.R. Trainmen, 417 F.2d 1025, 1027 (1st Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 1039, 25 L. Ed. 2d 650, 90 S. Ct. 1359 (1970); Letmate v. Baltimore and Ohio R.R., 311 F. Supp. 1059, 1062 (D. Md. 1970).

51 Plaintiff's Opposition to Defendants' First Motion, at 31.

52 Id. at 32.

53 In response to the Court's request at oral argument that plaintiff cite any cases holding a purchaser liable, plaintiffs pointed to footnote 51 of the Supreme Court opinion in Jefferson Parish Hospital District No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1984). Genetic System's Supplemental Memorandum at 1. In a case involving an exclusive dealing contract between a hospital and a firm of anesthesiologists, the Court rejected the plaintiff's contention that the hospital was engaged in a per se illegal tying arrangement but commented in a footnote that, had the plaintiff presented such proof, "the contract" might have been illegal under the Sherman Act, Section 1. The Court's general observation, however, obviously provides no guidance on the issue of purchaser liability since it suggest only that "the contract" might be found violative of the antitrust laws.

54 See Tampa Electric Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 335, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580, 81 S. Ct. 623 (1961) (if a requirements contract is not within the broader proscription of Section 3 of the Clayton Act, it is not forbidden by Section 1 of the Sherman Act); American Motor Inns, Inc. v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 521 F.2d 1230, 1239 (3d Cir. 1975) (exclusive dealing arrangement legal under Clayton Act would "a fortiori be lawful under the less restrictive provision of the Sherman Act").

55 Plaintiff's arguments based on the plain language of provision are similarly unavailing with respect to Section 1. See National Society of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 687-88, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637, 98 S. Ct. 1355 (1978) ("One problem presented by the language of § 1 of the Sherman Act is that it cannot mean what it says.").

Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1. It is well-settled that Section 1 was intended to prohibit only "unreasonable" restraints of trade. National Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Board of Regents of University of Oklahoma, 468 U.S. 85, 98, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70, 104 S. Ct. 2948 (1984); Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 55 L. Ed. 619, 31 S. Ct. 502 (1911). Ordinarily, concerted action under Section 1 is analyzed under the "rule of reason," Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, [25] Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 49, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977), however, the courts have identified certain limited categories of anticompetitive conduct that have such a "pernicious effect on competition and lack any redeeming virtue" as to make them illegal per se without a case-by-case evaluation. Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 1519, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988). These include horizontal and vertical price fixing agreements, division of markets between competitors, tying arrangements, and certain collective refusals to deal or "group boycotts." E.A. McQuade Tours, Inc. v. Consolidated Air Tour Manual Comm., 467 F.2d 178, 186 (5th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1109, 34 L. Ed. 2d 690, 93 S. Ct. 912 (1973) (citations omitted). These categories are narrow, however, and the conclusive presumption of invalidity imposed by the per se rule is not to be lightly indulged. Smith v. Pro Football, Inc., 193 U.S. App. D.C. 19, 593 F.2d 1173, 1181 (D.C. Cir. 1978).

Group boycotts found sufficiently repugnant to justify per se treatment can be categorized in three groups: (1) horizontal agreements among traders to exclude direct competitors, see, e.g., Eastern States Retail Lumber Dealers' Ass'n v. United States, 234 U.S. 600, [26] 58 L. Ed. 1490, 34 S. Ct. 951 (1914); (2) vertical combinations that are "widespread" in nature to exclude competitors of some members of the combination, see, e.g., Klor's Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741, 79 S. Ct. 705 (1959); and (3) combinations designed to influence trade practices of boycott victims rather than to eliminate them as competitors. Worthen Bank & Trust Co. v. National BankAmericard, Inc., 485 F.2d 119, 124 (8th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 918, 39 L. Ed. 2d 473, 94 S. Ct. 1417 (1974). Plaintiff in this case asserts that the group boycott was of the second type -- a vertical group boycott -- consisting of plaintiff's direct competitor Abbott and the purchasers of plaintiff's product, the Red Cross and the Red Cross Regions. The caselaw and the facts do not, however, support plaintiff's allegations that the conduct of these entities constitutes a group boycott.

A mere exclusionary agreement between businesses at different levels of competition does not necessarily constitute the type of "vertical" agreement determined to be an illegal per se group boycott. A vertical group boycott, in the absence of price fixing (which is not alleged here), is actually somewhat of a misnomer since it is really an [27] "admixture of the horizontal," *Products Liability Insurance Agency, Inc. v. [417] Crum & Forster Insurance Co., 682 F.2d 660, 663 (7th Cir. 1982), that is, plaintiff must still show that "multiple manufacturers or multiple distributors" were involved in the alleged conspiracy. Id. at 663 (emphasis added) (citing Com-Tel, Inc. v. DuKane Corp., 669 F.2d 404, 412-13 (6th Cir. 1982)). The only distinction appears to be that some vertically related entity is also involved in the alleged boycott.

Klor's, relied on heavily by plaintiff, was, in fact, "not a case of a single trader refusing to deal with another nor even of a manufacturer and a dealer agreeing to an exclusive dealership," but rather involved a "wide combination consisting of manufacturers, distributors, and a retailer" that moved the conduct from the "rule of reason" arena to the realm of per se invalidity. Klor's, 359 U.S. at 212; see Products Liability, 682 F.2d at 665. The lower courts have indeed interpreted Klor's to require more than a unilateral agreement, see, e.g., McQuade, 467 F.2d at 186-87 (describing the agreement between the manufacturers, the wholesalers, and a retailer [28] in Klor's as a "three cornered" agreement), and the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed that Klor's involved a "horizontal combination . . . at the manufacturer and wholesaler levels." Business Electronics Corp., 108 S. Ct. at 1525 (emphasis added). Thus, in the absence of concerted horizontal action, a group boycott cannot be alleged. See Lomar Wholesale Grocery, Inc. v. Dieter's Gourmet Foods, Inc., 824 F.2d 582, 590 (8th Cir. 1987) ("refusal to deal involving no concerted action between horizontal competitors does not constitute per se unlawful group boycott"), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1010, 98 L. Ed. 2d 658, 108 S. Ct. 707 (1988); Westman Commission Company v. Hobart International, Inc., 796 F.2d 1216, 1224 n.1 (10th Cir. 1986) ("For a group boycott to exist, there must be an agreement among conspirators whose market positions are horizontal to each other."); Kreuzer v. American Academy of Periodontology, 237 U.S. App. D.C. 43, 735 F.2d 1479, 1490-92 (D.C. Cir. 1984); Dunn & Mavis, Inc. v. Nu-Car

Driveaway, Inc., 691 F.2d 241, 244-45 (6th Cir. 1982); Products Liability, 682 F.2d at 665; Worthen Bank & Trust Co., 485 F.2d 119; McQuade Tours, 467 F.2d at 187-88, cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1109, 34 L. Ed. 2d 690, 93 S. Ct. 912 [29] (1973) (no per se group boycott where no allegation that defendant airlines conspired with competitors of plaintiff tour operators); Pro Football, 193 U.S. App. D.C. 19, 593 F.2d 1173, 1179-80 ("'group boycott' designation . . . is properly restricted to concerted attempts by competitors to exclude horizontal competitors; it should not be applied, and has never been applied by the Supreme Court to concerted refusals that are not designed to drive out competitors but to achieve some other goal").

In sum, merely alleging a "vertical" group boycott does not relieve plaintiff of its obligation to show a combination or conspiracy by more than one entity at the same level of competition. Thus, here, since plaintiff has not alleged that any of its competitors other than Abbott were involved in the exclusionary contract, plaintiff can only survive the motion to dismiss by alleging that such an agreement was reached at the purchaser level, i.e., by the Red Cross and its Regions. Although plaintiff makes such an allegation in the amended complaint, the Court finds it defective as a matter of law because the Red Cross is legally incapable of conspiring with its Regions in the purchase of blood testing [30] equipment.

Plaintiff's argument that the Red Cross and its Regions are capable of conspiring for purposes of Sherman Act Section 1 [56] is, as the Red Cross has consistently, vigorously, and correctly contended, without merit because the Red Cross and its Regions are clearly considered one entity for antitrust purposes. The Supreme Court made evident in Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628, 104 S. Ct. 2731 (1984), that a parent corporation is incapable of conspiring [*418] with its wholly-owned subsidiaries within the meaning of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. [57] [33] Concomitantly, unincorporated divisions of a corporation cannot conspire with the corporation itself. [58] Id. at 770. That "actions taken by an unincorporated division in concert with the management of its corporation do not, under the cases, constitute a conspiracy" has, in fact, been taken for granted in antitrust law. 2 Von Kalinowski, Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation, § 6.01[2] n.62 (1988). The cases suggested by plaintiff to the contrary are inapposite. In Poller v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 109 U.S. App. D.C. 170, 284 F.2d 599, 603 (D.C. Cir. 1960), rev'd on other grounds, 368 U.S. 464, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458, 82 S. Ct. 486 (1962), the majority [31] of the Court of Appeals held that CBS could not conspire with its unincorporated but autonomous divisions, and the Supreme Court "avoided the question by finding the requisite plurality of action from allegations of a conspiracy between the corporation and an outsider." 2 Von Kalinowski, supra, § 6.01[2] n.62; see also Rothery Storage & Van Co. v. Atlas Van Lines, 253 U.S. App. D.C. 142, 792 F.2d 210, 214-15 (D.C. Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1033, 107 S. Ct. 880, 93 L. Ed. 2d 834 (1987) (finding Copperweld inapplicable because agents of Atlas were independent and separately incorporated and, alternatively, because Atlas' board of directors consisted of some of its actual or potential competitors); Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum Comm'n v. National Football League, 726 F.2d 1381 (9th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. National Football League v. Oakland Raiders, 469 U.S. 990, 83 L. Ed. 2d 331, 105 S. Ct. 397 (1984) (28 separately owned NFL teams not part of common parent corporation held capable of conspiring). While the inquiry as to the corporate status of the Red Cross and its Regions may be factual in nature, Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum, 726 F.2d at 1387, under 56 Plaintiff's Memorandum in Support of its Request for a Temporary Restraining Order, at 37 ("In conjunction with and at the behest of Abbott, Red Cross had joined with the Regional Blood Services Centers to boycott Genetic Systems' test kits.").

---

57 The Court in Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 763, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628, 104 S. Ct. 2731 (1984), expressly rejected the line of reasoning that had arisen from the Court's prior "ambiguous" holding in United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 227-28, 91 L. Ed. 2010, 67 S. Ct. 1560 (1947), that the "corporate interrelationships of the conspirators . . . are not determinative of the applicability of the Sherman Act." The Copperweld Court expressly held that the affiliation of the defendants in Yellow Cab was irrelevant because the original acquisitions of the cab companies by a controlling shareholder "were themselves illegal." 467 U.S. at 761 (emphasis in original). The Court went on to distinguish other prior decision that "seemed to acquiesce in the intra-enterprise conspiracy doctrine," id. at 766, and cleared the precedential deck for confirming a bright line test for the conspiratorial ability of corporations.

58 The Court also held that officers and employees of the same firm cannot provide "the plurality of actors imperative for a § 1 conspiracy." Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 769.

Copperweld, the inquiry need only be brief, as the essential fact is undisputed: [32] the Red Cross Regions are not separate corporations.

Plaintiff does not contest that the Red Cross is a corporation and that the Regions are not separately incorporated. [59] Plaintiff argues, nonetheless, that since the Regions exercise autonomy in certain business decisions (e.g., in employment matters), [60] they should be considered separate entities capable of conspiring with the Red Cross. This type of challenge is, however, clearly precluded by Copperweld: "At least when the subsidiary is wholly owned, these factors [measuring 'separateness'] are not sufficient to describe a separate economic entity for purposes of the Sherman Act. These factors simply describe the manner in which the parent chooses to structure a subunit of itself." 467 U.S. at 772 n.18. Even were such a functional inquiry proper, it would not resuscitate plaintiff's claim in this case since the Red Cross, not its Regions, exercises ultimate contracting authority over contracts to purchase blood test kits. [61] Indeed, [*419] here, plaintiff's complaint stems from the fact that the Red [34] Cross exercised complete control over its Regions in selecting Abbott over Genetic Systems for the two-year contract. Thus, plaintiff cannot sustain its claim that the Red Cross could have conspired with its own Regions in boycotting Genetic Systems.

[35] Implicitly recognizing the necessity to show the horizontal nature of its group boycott allegation, plaintiff argues alternatively that Abbott and the Red Cross are in fact in a horizontal relationship not because they are direct competitors (for clearly they are not), but because the Red Cross at one time adopted a contingency plan to become a co-investigator with Abbott for the purposes of securing the FDA license for Abbott's "improved" AIDS test. This argument, while creative, is unpersuasive. First, plaintiff does not deny that the "contingency plan" was never implemented. Furthermore, by the time Abbott had received FDA approval for its new test, the Red Cross had adopted a "second" contingency plan that called for obtaining AIDS tests from another supplier had Abbott's new test not received approval, [62] negating plaintiff's assertion that Abbott wandered into the suppliers' arena. Even assuming that the Red Cross' co-investigator status would have raised a fact issue as to whether it should be assimilated to the position of a seller and competitor with plaintiff (an illogical conclusion because even as a "co-investigator," the Red Cross would still have been a purchaser [36] in relation to Genetic Systems), that contingency never occurred. The Red Cross was never put in a position horizontal to plaintiff.

Plaintiff suggests as a second theory that a horizontal agreement to boycott can be found between the Red Cross and non-existent, unidentified independent blood centers to which the Red Cross may extend Abbott's pricing should they choose to "affiliate" with the Red Cross under the 1987-89 contract. Again, this argument is unavailing. At most, the agreement provides only that Red Cross may extend Abbott's prices to the affiliated centers; they would not, however, be bound to deal exclusively with Abbott. [63] In addition, the Red Cross has not yet entered into any "letters of cooperation" with any independent centers under the Abbott contract, nor has plaintiff alleged that such agreements are imminent. Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 130, 23 L. Ed. 2d

---

[59] Richard Decl. para. 10.

[60] Wright Decl., Exh. 28 (ANRC 1058). The fundamental corporate operations of the Regions (including budget, licensing, and contracting) are, however, directly controlled by the Red Cross. Richards Decl. paras. 7, 8, 10; Schmitt Supp. Decl. paras. 2, 3, 10.

[61] Schmitt Supp. Decl. para. 5. Plaintiff seeks to dispute this statement by pointing to its 1986 contract to supply only 6 of the 56 Regions. The contract itself, however, supports defendants' position because it makes clear that Genetic Systems was contracting with "the Red Cross" and not with the Regions.

Schmitt Supp. Decl. para. 6, Exh. 1. The Red Cross determined which of the 56 Regions would be supplied the tests from Genetic Systems. Id. para. 7. That the regions may individually order quantities under the contract, establish their own delivery schedules, and individually pay for their equipment, Bieker Decl. para. 11, Schmitt Supp. Decl. para. 10, does not transform them into independent contracting entities for antitrust purposes.

[62] Wright Decl., Exh. 11 (ANRC 02969).

[63] Tr. at 9, 17; Wright Decl., Exh. 3 para. 4.

129, 89 S. Ct. 1562 (1969). [64] Thus, plaintiff has not shown that the "affiliation" provision of the contract supports its claim of a group boycott.

In [37] conclusion, plaintiff has failed to allege or to support its allegations that the conduct of Abbott, the Red Cross, and the Red Cross Regions constituted a group boycott in per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Count IV, therefore, must be dismissed in its entirety.

E. Count V: Violation of Sherman Act § 2 -- Conspiracy to Monopolize

Plaintiff alleges for the first time in the amended complaint that Abbott and the Red Cross engaged in a monopoly, conspiracy to monopolize, and an attempt to monopolize in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. [65] [38] Plaintiff's theory is that the two defendant participated in a single conspiracy to assist each other in pursuing their monopolization objectives in their respective markets -- for Abbott, the blood [*420] test kit market and, for the Red Cross, the transfusion blood supply market. [66] Both defendants argue that such an allegation of interdependent intent to conspire, even assuming plaintiff's allegations are true, is not recognized in antitrust law and move to dismiss. [67] Again, the Court finds itself in agreement with defendants.

A plaintiff must demonstrate the existence of four elements to state a claim for conspiracy to monopolize: (1) the existence of a combination or conspiracy to monopolize; (2) overt acts done in furtherance of the combination or conspiracy; (3) an effect upon an appreciable amount of interstate commerce; and (4) a specific intent to monopolize a designated segment of commerce. Association of Retail Travel Agents, Ltd. v. Air Transport Ass'n of America, 635 F. Supp. 534, 538 (D.D.C. 1986); Bowen v. New York News, Inc., 522 F.2d 1242, 1258 (2d Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 936, 48 L. Ed. 2d 177, 96 S. Ct. 1667 (1976).

As a preliminary matter, the Court finds that Genetic Systems, as neither a competitor nor a purchaser in the blood supply market, lacks standing to challenge any alleged antitrust violations of the Red Cross in that market. In Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 545-46, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983), the Supreme Court [39] emphasized that not every person injured by an antitrust violation has standing to bring an action. Noting that the plaintiff in that case was "neither a consumer nor a competitor in the market in which trade was restrained," id. at 539, the Court found that the plaintiff, a union, lacked standing to challenge an agreement reached by members of the defendant organization to not hire union workers. As in the instant case, the Supreme Court concluded in Associated General Contractors that:

> the [plaintiff's] allegations of consequential harm resulting from a violation of the antitrust laws, although buttressed by an allegation of intent to harm the [plaintiff], are insufficient as a matter of law. Other relevant factors -- the nature of [plaintiff's] injury, the tenuous and speculative nature of the relationship between the alleged antitrust violation and the [plaintiff's] alleged injury, the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages, and the existence of more direct victims of the alleged conspiracy --weigh heavily against judicial enforcement of the [plaintiff's] antitrust claim.

Id. at 545. [68] See also Eagle v. Star-Kist Foods, Inc., 812 F.2d 538, 543 [40] (9th Cir. 1987); General Industries Corp. v. Hartz Mountain Corp., 810 F.2d 795, 809 (8th Cir. 1987); Eastway Construction Corp. v. City of New York,

---

[64] Tr. at 8, 17; Schmitt Supp. Decl. para. 11.

[65] Plaintiff makes the identical claim in Count I, but against only Abbott. Essentially, Count V is only a "conspiracy" claim as to both defendants.

[66] Amended Complaint, para. 23-24.

[67] Defendants do not move for summary judgment on this Count, but only for dismissal. Red Cross' Reply on Second Motion, at 2; Abbott Reply on Second Motion, at 3.

[68] The principles enunciated in Associated General Contractors have been firmly applied by the Court of Appeals for this Circuit. See, e.g., Adams v. Pan American World Airways, Inc., 264 U.S. App. D.C. 174, 828 F.2d 24, 26-31 (D.C. Cir. 1987) (rejecting 762 F.2d 243, 254 (2d Cir. 1985). Similarly, in this case, plaintiff is admittedly not a competitor, nor a consumer, in the blood supply market. Genetic Systems' allegations of harm to it from any monopolization by the Red Cross in the blood supply market are, not surprisingly, vague and speculative; [69] [*421] clearly, there are more direct victims of such monopolization should the allegation prove well-founded -- for example, the several hundred independent blood centers, which "compete" with the Red Cross. Plaintiff, accordingly, does not have standing to complain about alleged antitrust violations committed by the Red Cross in the blood supply market. At most, plaintiff has standing to complain about the alleged conspiracy by Abbott and the Red Cross to monopolize the market for blood screening test equipment. That claim, too, however, suffers from its own fatal defects.

The weakness of plaintiff's allegation in Count V is evident from the strained antitrust theory proffered to the Court. Unable to allege or show [41] that the Red Cross had a specific intent to monopolize a market in which it does not participate (the test equipment market), plaintiff suggests that the alleged intent of the Red Cross to monopolize the blood supply market can somehow be transferred and combined with Abbott's alleged intent to monopolize the blood screening equipment market. That argument is wholly unpersuasive. As defendants contend, Genetic Systems cannot create a whole conspiracy in this case that is greater than the sum of its parts.

The Supreme Court recently confirmed that a plaintiff cannot avoid the pleading requirements of a claim for conspiracy to monopolize by constructing a theory or evidence of conspiracies in related markets. In Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986), the plaintiff, a domestic producer of televisions, argued that a group of Japanese manufacturers had engaged in several conspiracies, one of which was to monopolize the market in which plaintiff competed. The Court rejected the proposition that evidence of other conspiracies was adequate to support a claim of conspiracy to monopolize the domestic market under Section 2: "The argument [42] is a mistake. However one decides to describe the contours of the asserted conspiracy -- whether there is one conspiracy or several -- respondents must show that the conspiracy caused them an injury for which the antitrust laws provide relief . . . . That showing depends in turn on proof that petitioners conspired to [harm competition] in the American market, since the other conduct involved in the alleged conspiracy cannot have caused such an injury." Id. at 584 n.7. Accordingly, Genetic Systems must demonstrate, with respect to the market in which it has standing (the blood screening equipment market) that defendants had the specific intent to cause it antitrust injury and took overt acts in furtherance of that intent. Here, plaintiff has failed to make sufficient factual allegations.

[43] That the Red Cross may desire to exercise monopolistic control over the national blood supply does not support plaintiff's claim that it contracted with Abbott with the specific intention of causing competitive injury to Genetic Systems or the blood screening equipment market. Plaintiff's attempt to bolster its legal arguments with speculative economic theory is unpersuasive. [70] [44] As the Court observed in Matsushita, "evidence that petitioners conspired to raise prices in Japan provides little, if any, support for respondents' claims: a conspiracy to increase profits in one market does not tend to show a conspiracy to sustain losses in another." Id. at 595-96. [71] standing argument of suppliers of labor to transatlantic air transportation market), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 961, 99 L. Ed. 2d 425, 108 S. Ct. 1225 (1988).

---

[69] Amended Complaint, para. 8 ("Red Cross has an objective, however, of controlling the total supply of transfusion blood in the United States"). Even the statements of the Red Cross highlighted by plaintiff, however, do not suggest the sinister motive suggested by plaintiff. See Wright Decl., Exh. 4 (ANRC 1050) (a purpose of the Red Cross is "to participate in the national effort to develop and maintain an integrated, not-for-profit blood supply system for the United States"), Exh. 5 (ANRC 1060) ("Members of regional blood services management have a responsibility to expand the program whenever a need is evident"), and Exh. 6 (ANRC 1197) ("efforts to achieve and sustain total supply/total service must be reflected in all Red Cross regional planning").

[70] See Declaration of Terry A. Hausman, Professor of Economics, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

[71] The handwritten notes from a meeting between the Red Cross and Abbott stating that the Red Cross considered the contract to "link the most key component of [the Red Cross'] operations public confidence in the safety of the blood supply,' with the fortunes and capabilities of Abbott," Wright Decl., Exh. 1 (ANRC 03296), do not strengthen plaintiff's allegations because, like plaintiff's other "facts," it does not show specific intent to cause antitrust injury.

The absence of specific intent allegations renders a conspiracy to monopolize claim legally insufficient. Association for Intercollegiate Athletics for Women v. NCAA, 236 U.S. App. D.C. 311, 735 F.2d 577, 586 n.13 (D.C. Cir. 1984); see also Superturf, Inc. v. Monsanto Co., 660 F.2d 1275, 1283 (8th Cir. 1981) (plaintiff failed to show that defendant's [*422] alleged coconspirator "shared its specific intent to create a monopoly").

Plaintiff responds that it has alleged that defendants had "mutual purposes and intended effects," [72] including that Genetic Systems be excluded as a competitor of Abbott. Mere use of the word "intent," however, does not constitute a factual allegation of specific intent. Plaintiff's claim that "all of the conspiratorial activity alleged in the complaint is related to the injury suffered by Genetic Systems in the market for transfusion blood screening equipment," [73] reveals the vagueness of plaintiff's theory and does not remedy this legal deficiency. Plaintiff's complaint is not supported by meaningful factual allegations. Association of Retail Travel Agents, 635 F. Supp. at 538; Mizlou Television Network [45] Inc. v. National Broadcasting Co., 603 F. Supp. 677, 684 (D.D.C. 1984). Furthermore, that a purchaser such as the Red Cross would conspire with a supplier such as Abbott to facilitate the supplier's monopolization of the market to allow, for example, the supplier to charge the purchaser "non-competitive, monopoly prices" is sufficiently implausible to limit any inference of an antitrust violation. [74] Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 594; see also Car Carriers Inc., 745 F.2d at 1110 (in "considering a motion to dismiss the court is not required to don blinders and ignore commercial reality"); see also Dunn & Mavis, 691 F.2d at 244-45; Coastal Transfer, 833 F.2d at 211 (rejecting plaintiff's claim that defendant purchaser intended to harm competition in seller's market as "illogical"). Since the essential element of intent is lacking, the Court need not address whether plaintiff has sufficiently alleged overt acts by defendants.

[46] In short, plaintiff does not have standing to complain about any attempt by the Red Cross to monopolize the blood supply market. The Red Cross' intent cannot be theoretically transferred from one market to another. As to the test equipment market, plaintiff has failed to allege any specific intent on the part of the Red Cross to assist Abbott's monopolization. Accordingly, Count V must be dismissed.

F. Count VI: Tortious Interference with Prospective Economic Advantage and Unfair Competition

Plaintiff's last claim is under state law [75] against only Abbott for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage and unfair competition, that is, plaintiff claims that Abbott intentionally and maliciously deprived plaintiff of actual and prospective business relationships, advantages, and opportunities in entering into the contract with the Red Cross. Abbott moves to dismiss (or for summary judgment) on the basis that plaintiff has not adequately pled or supported its allegations.

---

[72] Amended Complaint, para. 20.

[73] Plaintiff's Opposition to Defendants' Second Motion, at 16.

[74] Plaintiff argues at length that Count V involves issues of fact, such as "plausibility," that cannot be properly decided as a motion to dismiss. For the reasons discussed above, however, the Court finds that the motion raises only issues of law and plaintiff's arguments that defendants have presented misleading facts or that further discovery would support its claim are irrelevant.

Indeed, plaintiff itself apparently recognized this at the onset of this case when its Vice President for Sales and Marketing, Terrance Bieker, commented that "while Abbott's actions may offer the Red Cross an apparent temporary economic benefit, in the long run Abbott's actions deprive the Red Cross of the benefits of competitively-determined prices and product quality." Bieker Decl. para. 17. The declaration of plaintiff's economist attempts to explain the theoretical rationality that could have motivated the Red Cross, but fails to persuade that such speculation is allowed under the antitrust laws.

[75] Plaintiff cites the laws of several jurisdictions -- the District of Columbia (the headquarters of the Red Cross), Illinois (the headquarters and principal facility of Abbott Laboratories), and Washington State (all of Genetic Systems' facilities) -- but has not yet indicated on which State's law it relies. For present purposes, however, any distinctions among these jurisdictions' laws are irrelevant.

[47] To establish a claim for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage, a plaintiff ordinarily must plead (1) the existence of a valid business relationship or expectancy, (2) knowledge of the relationship or expectancy on the part of the interferer, [*423] (3) intentional interference inducing or causing a breach or termination of the relationship or expectancy, and (4) resultant damage. See, e.g., Fishman v. Estate of Wirtz, 807 F.2d 520, 545 (7th Cir. 1986); Richard Short Oil Co., Inc. v. Texaco, Inc., 799 F.2d 415, 419 (8th Cir. 1986); Rickards v. Canine Eye Registration Foundation, Inc., 704 F.2d 1449, 1456 (9th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 994, 78 L. Ed. 2d 683, 104 S. Ct. 488 (1983); Belden Corp. v. Internorth, Inc., 90 Ill. App. 3d 547, 552, 413 N.E.2d 98, 101, 45 Ill. Dec. 765 (1980). "Unfair competition" is essentially an unprivileged interference with prospective advantage. Business Equipment Center, Ltd. v. De-Jur Amsco Corp., 465 F. Supp. 775, 778 (D.D.C. 1978); Belden, 413 N.E.2d 98, 101-02, 90 Ill. App. 3d at 552. "Motive or purpose to disrupt ongoing business relationships is of central concern in a tortious interference case . . . and a strong showing of intent is [48] required to establish liability." Rickards, 704 F.2d at 1456. A general intent to interfere or knowledge that conduct will injure the plaintiff's business dealings is insufficient to impose liability. Id. A competitor's conduct must be more egregious, for example, it must involve libel, slander, physical coercion, fraud, misrepresentation, or disparagement. Business Equipment Center, 465 F. Supp. at 788; PPX Enterprises v. Audio Fidelity Enterprises, Inc., 818 F.2d 266, 269 (2d Cir. 1987); Belden, 90 Ill. App. 3d at 553, 413 N.E.2d at 103.

A thorough review of the amended complaint fails to surface any allegations sufficient to support plaintiff's claim for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage. While plaintiff does allege that it had a valid business relationship or expectancy in business with the Red Cross, [76] its allegations that Abbott intentionally interfered, induced, or caused a breach or termination of this relationship or expectancy are too vague to withstand defendants' motions. At most, the amended complaint alleges that the Red Cross solicited proposals from both Abbott and Genetic Systems and that Abbott realized that an exclusive [49] contract with the Red Cross would substantially exclude Genetic Systems from the market for blood screening equipment. [77] As even the cases relied on by plaintiff make clear, however, such knowledge or such effect alone, without allegations of intent to interfere by Abbott, cannot support plaintiff's claim. See also Royal Typewriter Co. v. Xerographic Supplies Corp., 719 F.2d 1092, 1105 (11th Cir. 1983) (competition for business does not constitute tortious interference); Nifty Foods Corp. v. The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., Inc., 614 F.2d 832, 838 (2d Cir. 1980) (no tortious interference where no evidence that sole motive was to inflict injury or of unlawful means used). Plaintiff's antitrust claims do not alone excuse the necessity for plaintiff to fulfill the pleading requirements of this independent state law claim. Count VI must be dismissed.

III. Conclusion

Accordingly, after full consideration of the parties' pleadings and motions, the declarations of record, the exhibits, and for the reasons set forth above, it is hereby

ORDERED that the motion of the Red Cross to dismiss Counts [50] II, III, IV, and V of the amended complaint be and it hereby is granted; it is

FURTHER ORDERED that the motion of Abbott to dismiss Counts IV, V, and VI of the amended complaint be and it hereby is granted; it is

FURTHER ORDERED that the Red Cross is hereby dismissed as a defendant from this action; and it is FURTHER ORDERED that Genetic Systems and Abbott, by counsel, must attend the status call scheduled for July 15, 1988 at 9:15 a.m., to discuss further proceedings on the remaining Counts I, II, and III of the complaint.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

---

[76] Amended Complaint, paras. 14-17.

[77] Amended Complaint, para. 20(a).

West Allis Memorial Hospital, Inc. v. Bowen

United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit

December 9, 1987, Argued ; July 14, 1988, Decided

No. 87-1974

Reporter

852 F.2d 251 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 10011 **

WEST ALLIS MEMORIAL HOSPITAL, INC., a Wisconsin non-profit corporation, Plaintiff-Appellant, v. OTIS BOWEN, in his capacity as Secretary of the United States Department of Health and Human Services, along with his successors, agents, servants, employees and attorneys; EDWIN MEESE, in his capacity as Attorney General of the United States, along with his successors, agents, servants, employees and attorneys; and ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL, INC., a Wisconsin non-profit corporation, along with its officers, agents, servants, employees and attorneys, Defendants-Appellees

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin. No. 87-C-0053 -- Terence T. Evans, Judge.

Core Terms

district court, enjoin, unfair competition, injunctive relief, preliminary injunction, antitrust, preliminary injunctive relief, injunction, merits, common law claim, present case, provisions, criminal prosecution, fail to demonstrate, irreparable harm, parties, courts

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Abuse of Discretion

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Clearly Erroneous Review

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > De Novo Review

HN1[] Standards of Review, Abuse of Discretion

In reviewing the decision of a district court to grant or deny a preliminary injunction, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit continues to invoke the phrase "abuse of discretion" in articulating the applicable standard. Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a), the district court is required to make findings of fact and conclusions of law in support of its decision to grant or refuse preliminary injunctive relief. The ultimate decision, however, rests within the court's discretion. The district court's findings of fact are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a); with the legal conclusions subject to de novo review. A factual or legal error may alone be sufficient to establish that the court abused its discretion in making its final determination. However, in the absence of such an error, the district judge's weighing and balancing of the equities should be disturbed on appeal only in the rarest of cases.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > Public Interest

HN2[] Injunctions, Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

A party seeking a preliminary injunction bears the burden of showing: (1) that it has no adequate remedy at law; (2) that it will suffer irreparable harm if the preliminary injunction is not issued; (3) that the irreparable harm it will suffer if the preliminary injunction is not granted outweighs the irreparable harm the defendant will suffer if the injunction is granted; (4) that it has a reasonable likelihood of prevailing on the merits; and (5) that the injunction will not harm the public interest.

Contracts Law > Types of Contracts > Lease Agreements > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Bribery > Commercial Bribery > Elements

Public Health & Welfare Law > Social Security > Medicaid > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Crimes Against Persons > Bribery > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Criminal Offenses > Fraud > General Overview

HN3[] Types of Contracts, Lease Agreements

42 U.S.C.S. § 1395nn(b)(2)(B) provides that whoever knowingly and willfully offers or pays any remuneration (including any kickback, bribe, or rebate) directly or indirectly, overtly or covertly, in cash or in kind to any person to induce such person to purchase, lease, order, or arrange for or recommend purchasing, leasing, or ordering any item or service for which payment may be made in whole or in part under this subchapter shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $ 25,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Appellate Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN4[] Appeals, Appellate Jurisdiction

Every federal appellate court has a special obligation to satisfy itself not only of its own jurisdiction, but also that of the lower courts in a cause under review. When the lower court lacks jurisdiction, an appellate court has jurisdiction on appeal, not of the merits but merely for the purpose of correcting the error of the lower court in entertaining the suit.

Civil Procedure > ... > Federal & State Interrelationships > Federal Common Law > General Overview

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

Governments > Legislation > Statutory Remedies & Rights

HN5[] Federal & State Interrelationships, Federal Common Law

A strong presumption exists against the creation of such implied rights of action. The factors which a court should consider in determining whether such a right exists include: (1) whether the plaintiff is one of the class for whose especial benefit the statute was enacted; (2) whether there is any indication of legislative intent, explicit or implicit, either to create such a remedy or to deny one; (3) whether it is consistent with the underlying purpose of the legislative scheme to imply such a remedy for the plaintiff; and, (4) whether the cause of action was one traditionally relegated to state law. The ultimate question, however, is whether Congress intended to provide such a right in enacting the statute.

Governments > Federal Government > Claims By & Against

Governments > Legislation > Statutory Remedies & Rights

HN6[] Federal Government, Claims By & Against

Where a statute is framed as a general prohibition or command to a federal agency, as it is in the present case, a private right of action will seldom be implied.

Public Health & Welfare Law > Social Security > Medicare > General Overview

HN7[] Social Security, Medicare

See 42 U.S.C.S. § 1320a-7b(b)(3).

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Miscellaneous Offenses > Nuisances > General Overview

Real Property Law > ... > Remedies > Injunctions > General Overview

HN8[] Remedies, Injunctions

There are three recognized exceptions to the equitable doctrine against enjoining criminal activity: national emergencies, widespread public nuisances, and where a specific statutory grant of power exists authorizing injunctive relief.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > General Overview

HN9[] Remedies, Injunctions

There is a heavy presumption against enjoining pending or threatened criminal prosecutions. In the absence of a showing of exceptional circumstances, a federal court generally will not use its equitable powers to prevent the enforcement of a criminal statute which is concededly valid and constitutional.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN10[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 26.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN11[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

See Wis. Stat. Ann. § 133.16.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN12[] Jurisdiction, Jurisdictional Sources

When exercising pendent jurisdiction over the state law claims, the district court has the same equitable powers as the state court.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN13[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

Under Wisconsin law, injunctive relief is available to a private entity in an action for unfair competition based on misappropriation. Injunctive relief is also statutorily provided for under Wis. Stat. Ann. § 100.20 which prohibits unfair methods of competition in business, although it appears from the language of the statute that only the state has the authority to seek such relief.

Counsel: Robert H. Friebert, Friebert, Finerty & St. John, South Carolina, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Attorneys, for Plaintiff.

Kathy L. Nusslock, Cook & Franke, South Carolina, Milwaukee, Wisconsin; John J. Meyer, AUSA (Patricia J. Gorence-USA), Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Attorneys, for Defendants.

Judges: Cummings and Flaum, Circuit Judges, and Grant, Senior District Judge. *

Opinion by: GRANT

Opinion

* Honorable Robert A. Grant, Senior District Judge for the Northern District of Indiana, is sitting by designation.

[*252] ROBERT A. GRANT, SENIOR DISTRICT JUDGE

West Allis Memorial Hospital, Inc. ("West Allis") brought suit against St. Luke's Hospital, Inc. ("St. Luke's"), the Secretary of Health and Human Services, Otis Bowen, and the Attorney General of the United States, Edwin Meese (the "federal defendants"), challenging the applicability of the Medicare-Medicaid antifraud provisions of 42 U.S.C. § 1395nn(b)(2)(B) to a program instituted and advertised by St. Luke's and known as "Freedom 55/65." [1]

[2] The "Freedom 55/65" program was commenced on or about January 1, 1987, [2] and offers a number of advantages to Medicare patients who enroll in the program. This lawsuit focuses on but one of those advantages -- the waiver of the deductible and coinsurance obligations of Medicare patients who receive items or services from St. Luke's in the event the patient does not have supplemental insurance which would otherwise pay those obligations. The waiver program applies to items and services covered under both Medicare Part A and B. [3]

[3] As a competitor for Medicare patients in the Milwaukee area, West Allis fears the effects St. Luke's waiver program will have on its ability to remain competitive. West Allis maintains that it is prepared to meet that threat by implementing its own waiver program, but believes such a program to be violative of the anti-fraud provisions [*253] of 42 U.S.C. § 1395nn(b)(2)(B) and fears criminal prosecution under the statute if it chooses to implement such a program.

Fearing the loss of business on the one hand, and the risk of prosecution on the other, West Allis turned to the courts for resolution of its dilemma. In its complaint, West Allis alleges that St. Luke's waiver program is violative of not only § 1395nn(b)(2)(B), but also federal and state antitrust laws, and the Wisconsin common law against conspiracy, tortious interference with prospective contractual relations, and unfair competition. West Allis moved for preliminary injunctive relief against St. Luke's under each count of the complaint, and for alternative injunctive relief against the federal defendants under § 1395nn(b)(2)(B). With respect to the § 1395nn claim, West Allis asked that the district court either declare St. [4] Luke's waiver program violative of the statute and enjoin St. Luke's continuation of that program, or alternatively declare such programs nonviolative of § 1395nn(b)(2)(B) and enjoin the federal defendants from enforcing the provisions thereof against Medicare providers such as West Allis which may seek to implement a similar program.

A hearing on West Allis' motion for preliminary injunction was conducted on January 23, 1987, and on May 28, 1987, the district court issued an order denying the motion in its entirety. West Allis Memorial Hospital, Inc. v. Bowen, 660 F. Supp. 936 (E.D. Wis. 1987). This appeal followed.

I. Standard of Review

HN1[] "In reviewing the decision of a district court to grant or deny a preliminary injunction, this court has continued to invoke the phrase 'abuse of discretion' in articulating the applicable standard." Darryl H. v. Coler, 801 F.2d 893, 897 (7th Cir. 1986); see also Baja Contractors, Inc. v. City of Chicago, 830 F.2d 667, 674 (7th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 993, 108 S. Ct. 1301, 99 L. Ed. 2d 511 (1988). Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a), the district court is required to make findings of fact and conclusions of law in support of its decision to grant or refuse preliminary [5] injunctive relief. The ultimate decision, however, rests within the court's discretion. Baja

[1] In 1987, § 1395nn was repealed and the statute renumbered and amended by §§ 4 and 14 of the Medicare and Medicaid Patient and Program Protection Act of 1987, 42 U.S.C. § 1320a-7b.

[2] The "Freedom 55/65" program was commenced prior to the August 18, 1987 enactment of the Medicare and Medicaid Patient and Program Protection Act. While the language of § 1320a-7b(b)(2)(B) is virtually identical to that of former § 1395nn(b)(2)(B), we will continue to refer throughout our discussion to § 1395nn as it existed prior to its 1987 amendment.

[3] Medicare Part A provides insurance coverage for inpatient hospital care and certain other kinds of medical services. See 42 U.S.C. § 1395c, et seq. Medicare Part B (outpatient services) provides for a system of optional supplemental insurance for medical care not covered under Medicare Part A. See 42 U.S.C. § 1395j, et seq.

Contractors, 830 F.2d at 674; Lawson Products, Inc. v. Avnet, Inc., 782 F.2d 1429, 1436-37 (7th Cir. 1986). The district court's findings of fact are reviewed under the clearly erroneous standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a); with the legal conclusions subject to de novo review. Baja Contractors, 830 F.2d at 674; Manbourne, Inc. v. Conrad, 796 F.2d 884, 887 (7th Cir. 1986); Lawson Products, 782 F.2d at 1437. "[A] factual or legal error may alone be sufficient to establish that the court 'abused its discretion' in making its final determination. . . . However, in the absence of such an error, the district judge's weighing and balancing of the equities should be disturbed on appeal only in the rarest of cases." Lawson Products, 782 F.2d at 1437. We review the district court's denial of a preliminary injunction in the present case with these principles in mind.

II. Discussion

West Allis, as HN2[] the party seeking a preliminary injunction, bears the burden of showing:

> (1) that it has no adequate remedy at law; (2) that it will suffer irreparable harm if the preliminary injunction [6] is not issued; (3) that the irreparable harm it will suffer if the preliminary injunction is not granted outweighs the irreparable harm the defendant will suffer if the injunction is granted; (4) that it has a reasonable likelihood of prevailing on the merits; and (5) that the injunction will not harm the public interest.

Baja Contractors, 830 F.2d at 675; Manbourne, Inc., 796 F.2d at 887; Roland Machinery Co. v. Dresser Industries, Inc., 749 F.2d 380, 386-88 (7th Cir. 1984). Under the "sliding scale" approach adopted by this circuit, the likelihood of success that West Allis needs to show will vary inversely with the degree of harm it will suffer if the injunction is not granted. Illinois Psychological Ass'n v. Falk, 818 F.2d 1337, 1340 (7th Cir. 1987); Brunswick Corp. v. [*254] Jones, 784 F.2d 271, 275 (7th Cir. 1986); Roland Machinery Co., 749 F.2d at 387. If, however, "both parties are likely to suffer the same amount of irreparable harm, so far as estimation is possible, then likelihood of success becomes decisive." Dynamics Corp. of America v. CTS Corp., 794 F.2d 250, 252 (7th Cir. 1986), rev'd on other grounds, 481 U.S. 69, 107 S. Ct. 1637, 95 L. Ed. 2d 67 (1987).

A. Medicare [7] Fraud: 42 U.S.C. § 1395nn(b)(2)(B)

West Allis sought preliminary injunctive relief against St. Luke's waiver program under HN3[] 42 U.S.C. § 1395nn(b)(2)(B) which provides:

> Whoever knowingly and willfully offers or pays any remuneration (including any kickback, bribe, or rebate) directly or indirectly, overtly or covertly, in cash or in kind to any person to induce such person -- to purchase, lease, order, or arrange for or recommend purchasing, leasing, or ordering any item or service for which payment may be made in whole or in part under this subchapter . . . shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $25,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

In denying the preliminary injunction, the district court assumed, without specifically finding, that great irreparable harm would be suffered by West Allis if the injunction were to be denied, but concluded that there was "almost no likelihood that West Allis [would] succeed on the merits," because it could not show any entitlement to the injunctive relief sought. West Allis Memorial Hospital, 660 F. Supp. at 938-39. In so ruling, the court relied on a long-standing doctrine that [8] "equity will not enjoin the commission of a crime," and found that no exception to that doctrine was warranted under the circumstances. Id. at 939-40. The district court therefore did not reach the ultimate issue of whether St. Luke's waiver program was violative of § 1395nn(b)(2)(B).

West Allis contends on appeal that the district court abused its discretion when it found that it could not employ its equitable powers to enjoin the criminal activity complained of. While West Allis acknowledges that courts generally will not enjoin a crime, it maintains that the present case falls within one of the recognized exceptions to that doctrine under which a court may enjoin criminal activity when statutorily authorized to do so. United States v.

Jalas, 409 F.2d 358, 360 (7th Cir. 1969). Arguing that such authority exists under § 1395nn, and that the statute creates an implied private right of action in favor of Medicare providers, West Allis concludes that the denial of the preliminary injunction constitutes a reversible error of law. We do not agree.

While the district court did not address the issue of standing under an implied right of action, our review must begin at that point, [9] for the power of the federal courts to entertain an action is not unlimited. As the Supreme Court recently noted in Bender v. Williamsport Area School District, 475 U.S. 534, 89 L. Ed. 2d 501, 106 S. Ct. 1326 (1986):

> HN4[] Every federal appellate court has a special obligation to "satisfy itself not only of its own jurisdiction, but also that of the lower courts in a cause under review," . . . . Mitchell v. Maurer, 293 U.S. 237, 244, 79 L. Ed. 338, 55 S. Ct. 162 (1934). See Juidice v. Vail, 430 U.S. 327, 331-332, 51 L. Ed. 2d 376, 97 S. Ct. 1211 (1977) (standing). . . . "[When the lower court] lack[s] jurisdiction, we have jurisdiction on appeal, not of the merits but merely for the purpose of correcting the error of the lower court in entertaining the suit." United States v. Corrick, 298 U.S. 435, 440, 80 L. Ed. 1263, 56 S. Ct. 829 (1936) (footnotes omitted).

475 U.S. at 541.

To the extent West Allis asserts standing under § 1395nn, based on a perceived implied private right of action, we find its arguments unpersuasive. HN5[] A strong presumption exists against the creation of such implied rights of action. Community & Economic Development Ass'n of Cook County, Inc. v. Suburban Cook County Area Agency on Aging, 770 F.2d 662, 664 (7th Cir. 1985). The factors which a court [*255] should consider in determining [10] whether such a right exists include: (1) whether the plaintiff is "one of the class for whose especial benefit the statute was enacted"; (2) whether there is "any indication of legislative intent, explicit or implicit, either to create such a remedy or to deny one"; (3) whether it is "consistent with the underlying purpose of the legislative scheme to imply such a remedy for the plaintiff"; and, (4) whether "the cause of action was one traditionally relegated to state law." Cort v. Ash, 422 U.S. 66, 78, 45 L. Ed. 2d 26, 95 S. Ct. 2080 (1975) (citations omitted). The ultimate question, however, is whether Congress intended to provide such a right in enacting the statute. Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Russell, 473 U.S. 134, 145-48, 87 L. Ed. 2d 96, 105 S. Ct. 3085 (1985); Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith v. Curran, 456 U.S. 353, 377-78, 72 L. Ed. 2d 182, 102 S. Ct. 1825 (1982); Cort v. Ash, 422 U.S. at 78; City of Evanston v. Regional Transportation Authority, 825 F.2d 1121, 1123 (7th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1005, 108 S. Ct. 697, 98 L. Ed. 2d 649 (1988).

In the present case, we find that neither the structure of § 1395nn nor its legislative history suggests that Congress intended to provide a private remedy to Medicare providers such as West Allis which may be injured [11] as a result of a competitor's noncompliance with the provisions of that statute. The Secretary of Health and Human Services is charged with the administration of the Medicare program pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1395kk. He is aided in that endeavor by the Attorney General, whose duty it is to enforce the laws and Constitution of the United States. HN6[] Where a statute is framed as a "general prohibition or command to a federal agency," as it is in the present case, a private right of action will seldom be implied. City of Evanston v. Regional Transportation Auth., 825 F.2d at 1123, quoting Rapid Transit Advocates v. Southern California Rapid Transit District, 752 F.2d 373, 376 (9th Cir. 1985). The legislative history of § 1395nn further supports the conclusion that it is the Government, and not private parties, which is charged with the enforcement of the Medicare program where it identifies the purpose of § 1395nn as:

> Legislation to amend the Social Security Act to strengthen the capability of the Government to detect, prosecute, and punish fraudulent activities under the Medicare and Medicaid programs. . . .

1977 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 3039, 3040. (Emphasis added). Whether [12] this purpose would be better achieved by arming providers such as West Allis with the authority to enforce the provisions of § 1395nn is a judgment better left to Congress. See Drake v. Honeywell, Inc., 797 F.2d 603, 611 (8th Cir. 1986).

Finding no intent on the part of Congress to create a private right of action in favor of West Allis, "we need not carry the Cort v. Ash inquiry further." Northwest Airlines, Inc. v. Transport Workers, 451 U.S. 77, 94 n.31, 67 L. Ed. 2d 750, 101 S. Ct. 1571 (1981); see also Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co., 473 U.S. at 148. The resolution of the question of standing also obviates the need for this court to determine whether a waiver program such as St. Luke's violates the language of § 1395nn(b)(2)(B) -- an issue which Congress has clearly recognized and chosen to deal with in its own way. [4]

[13] [*256] Even assuming West Allis had the requisite standing to bring an action under § 1395nn, we would concur with the district court in finding that no exception to the equitable doctrine against enjoining criminal activity was warranted. HN8[] There are three recognized exceptions to the doctrine: national emergencies, widespread public nuisances, and where a specific statutory grant of power exists authorizing injunctive relief. United States v. Jalas, 409 F.2d at 360. West Allis does not contend that it falls within the first two exceptions, and we find nothing in the language of § 1395nn which would authorize the issuance of an injunction against violators thereof. Absent such specific statutory authority, the district court was powerless to enter the injunctive relief requested.

We find that West Allis' claim for preliminary injunctive relief against the federal defendants is similarly without merit. In denying such relief, the district court found: (1) that equity jurisprudence barred the court from acting to restrain a criminal prosecution where the movant had an adequate remedy at law, and the only harm suffered was the "anxiety, cost, and inconvenience of having to defend against [14] a criminal prosecution," Trainor v. Hernandez, 431 U.S. 434, 52 L. Ed. 2d 486, 97 S. Ct. 1911 (1977); (2) that "West Allis ha[d] only the remotest of chances . . . of being prosecuted if it institute[d] a waiver program" and therefore lacked standing to seek injunctive relief against any prospective criminal prosecution; and, (3) that even assuming that West Allis was sufficiently threatened with prosecution to establish standing, the court should defer to the Department of Justice in determining who should be prosecuted under § 1395nn where, as here, the statute itself was not challenged as constitutionally invalid. West Allis Memorial Hospital, 660 F. Supp. at 940.

We find no error in the district court's ruling. Even if we assume, as did the district court, that West Allis has established the requisite standing, HN9[] there is a "heavy presumption against enjoining pending or threatened criminal prosecutions." Downstate Stone Co. v. United States, 651 F.2d 1234, 1238 (7th Cir. 1981). In the absence of a showing of exceptional circumstances, a federal court generally will not use its equitable powers to prevent the

---

[4] Section 14(a) of the Medicare and Medicaid Patient and Program Protection Act of 1987 amending former § 1395nn (now § 1320a-7b) provides:

> HN7[] The Secretary of Health and Human Services, in consultation with the Attorney General, not later than 1 year after the date of the enactment of this Act [Aug. 18, 1987] shall publish proposed regulations, and not later than 2 years after the date of the enactment of this Act shall promulgate final regulations, specifying payment practices that shall not be treated as a criminal offense under section 1128B(b) of the Social Security Act [42 U.S.C. § 1320a-7b(b)] and shall not serve as the basis for an exclusion under section 1128(b)(7) of such Act. Any practices specified in regulations pursuant to the preceding sentence shall be in addition to the practices described in subparagraphs (A) through (C) of section 1128B(b)(3) [42 U.S.C. § 1320a-7b(b)(3)].

See Pub. L. 100-93 § 14(a), Standards for Anti-Kickback Provisions; Regulations, set out as a note under 42 U.S.C. § 1320a-7b. In enacting § 14(a), Congress recognized that the statutory language of § 1395nn(b)(2)(B) "has created uncertainty among health care providers as to which commercial arrangements are legitimate, and which are proscribed," S. Rep. No. 109, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. 25, reprinted in 1987 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 682, 707, and expressed its intention to deal with the problem. Once enacted, the HHS regulations will be entitled to the same judicial enforcement accorded Congressional legislation. Batterton v. Francis, 432 U.S. 416, 425 n.9, 53 L. Ed. 2d 448, 97 S. Ct. 2399 (1977); United States v. Mersky, 361 U.S. 431, 437-38, 4 L. Ed. 2d 423, 80 S. Ct. 459 (1960).

enforcement of a criminal statute which is concededly valid and constitutional. See Spielman [15] Motor Sales Co., Inc. v. Dodge, 295 U.S. 89, 95, 79 L. Ed. 1322, 55 S. Ct. 678 (1935); Downstate Stone Co., 651 F.2d at 1238; Ivy v. Katzenbach, 351 F.2d 32, 34-35 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 958, 15 L. Ed. 2d 362, 86 S. Ct. 437 (1965). West Allis has failed to demonstrate that such circumstances exist in the present case, and that judicial interference is warranted.

B. The Antitrust and Common Law Claims

The district court summarily denied West Allis' claim for preliminary injunctive relief under each of the remaining seven counts of the complaint, stating that:

> Although the requests brought under the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, the Wisconsin Antitrust Act, and the Wisconsin common law are on somewhat different footing, they also rely on the fact that St. Luke's is allegedly committing a crime in order to, for instance, attempt to monopolize the market.

West Allis Memorial Hospital, 660 F. Supp. at 940. [5] The court's decision was [*257] presumably based on its previous conclusion that it was powerless to enjoin the commission of a crime. In so ruling, however, the district court failed to recognize that authority may exist under each of West Allis' remaining claims for the issuance of an injunction.

To the extent West [16] Allis has demonstrated a viable claim under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2, independent of its claim under the Medicare fraud provisions of 42 U.S.C. § 1395nn(b)(2)(B) (a matter which the parties dispute), the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 26, expressly provides the court with the statutory authority to enjoin the criminal activity complained of. [6]

[17] Wisconsin law provides similar relief for violations of its antitrust laws. W.S.A. § 133.16 specifically provides that:

> HN11[] Any circuit court may prevent or restrain, by injunction or otherwise, any violation of this chapter. The department of justice, any district attorney or any person by complaint may institute actions or proceedings to prevent or restrain a violation of this chapter, setting forth the cause and grounds for the intervention of the court and praying that such violation, whether intended or continuing be enjoined or prohibited. When the parties informed against or complained of have been served with a copy of the information or complaint and cited to answer it, the court shall proceed, as soon as may be in accordance with its rules, to the hearing and

---

[5] With respect to West Allis' claim under section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, which was added in an amended complaint and made the subject of a supplemental motion for preliminary injunction, the district court concluded that:

> The illegal conduct which forms the basis for the Sherman Act claim is the violation of section 1395nn. Accordingly, for the reasons stated in denying the original request for a preliminary injunction, the [supplemental] request is denied.

West Allis Memorial Hospital, 660 F. Supp. at 941.

[6] 15 U.S.C. § 26 provides in pertinent part:

> HN10[] Any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties, against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws . . . when and under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage is granted by courts of equity, under the rules governing such proceedings, and upon the execution of proper bond against damages for an injunction improvidently granted and a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate, a preliminary injunction may issue.

determination of the case; and pending the filing of the answer to such information or complaint may, at any time, upon proper notice, make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as is just. . . .

HN12[]

When exercising pendent jurisdiction over the state law claims, the district court has the same equitable powers as the state court. See United Mine Workers v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 726, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218, 86 S. Ct. 1130 (1966) (federal courts exercising [18] pendent jurisdiction bound to apply state substantive law). The district court erred in failing to recognize that antitrust activity may be enjoined under both federal and state law, and in so doing committed an error of law. [7]

While West Allis makes several conclusory statements about the power of the district court to enjoin activity which may also violate Wisconsin common law, it specifically addresses only its claim of unfair competition, and generally abandons its remaining common law claims, making only cursory arguments in its reply brief. The burden was on West Allis to demonstrate an abuse of discretion on the part of the district court with respect to each of its claims. In failing to present any authority for its proposition that a state court, and thus the district court, was empowered to enjoin a common law conspiracy or tortious [19] interference with a prospective contractual relation, West Allis failed to meet that burden. We accordingly limit our discussion to West Allis' claim of unfair competition.

St. Luke's does not dispute the availability of injunctive relief under the Wisconsin [*258] common law against unfair competition, but argues that unfair competition is limited to misappropriation and that West Allis has failed to demonstrate elements of a misappropriation claim, and has thus failed to demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits of its claim.

HN13[] Under Wisconsin law, injunctive relief is indeed available to a private entity in an action for unfair competition based on misappropriation. See Mercury Records v. Economic Consultants, 91 Wis.2d 482, 283 N.W.2d 613 (Wis. App. 1979). Injunctive relief is also statutorily provided for under W.S.A. § 100.20 which prohibits unfair methods of competition in business, although it appears from the language of the statute that only the state has the authority to seek such relief.

Whether injunctive relief would be available to West Allis only in an action based on misappropriation, or is available when other methods of unfair competition are alleged, and whether [20] West Allis has sufficiently demonstrated a reasonable likelihood of success on the merits of its unfair competition claim are questions better left for the district court to determine. We find merely that in denying the preliminary injunction without recognizing that authority may exist under state law for the issuance of an injunction the district court committed an error of law.

While it would appear from the extensive arguments presented on appeal that the parties would prefer de novo review by this court of the merits of West Allis' antitrust and common law claims, we regretfully cannot oblige. Our de novo review is limited to legal issues and conclusions. See Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians, 476 U.S. 747, 757, 90 L. Ed. 2d 779, 106 S. Ct. 2169 (1986); Baja Contractors, Inc. v. City of Chicago, 830 F.2d at 674; Faheem-El v. Klincar, 814 F.2d 461, 467 (7th Cir. 1987). Even then we may decide the merits of legal issues which were not addressed by the district court only when the facts on which those conclusions must be based are not in dispute. Faheem-El, 814 F.2d at 467. In the present case, there are a number of factual disputes which

---

[7] The type of factual and legal analysis which was required in the present case is similar to that undertaken in Ball Memorial Hospital, Inc. v. Mutual Hospital Insurance, Inc., 603 F. Supp. 1077 (S.D. Ind. 1985), aff'd, 784 F.2d 1325 (7th Cir. 1986) (a case which we find to be similar in many respects to that presented by West Allis).

prohibit our consideration of the legal [21] issues presented by West Allis' antitrust and unfair competition claims -- disputes which were not resolved by the district court in making its findings of fact. [8]

By limiting its legal analysis to only one of the five factors necessary to support preliminary injunctive relief, the district court leaves us with but one alternative -- to reverse its decision with respect to West Allis' federal and state antitrust claims, and its common law claim of unfair competition, and remand for further consideration. [9] See American Can Co. v. Mansukhani, 742 F.2d 314, 326 (7th Cir. 1984) ("When the district court's error is the very predicate of its order, the order must be reversed as an improvident exercise of the court's discretion.")

[22] III. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, we now AFFIRM the decision of the district court in part, and REVERSE AND REMAND in part. Finding that West Allis lacks the requisite standing to assert a claim against St. Luke's under 42 U.S.C. § 1395nn(b)(2)(B); that the statute does not provide the injunctive relief which West Allis seeks; and that West Allis has failed to demonstrate extraordinary circumstances warranting injunctive relief against the federal defendants, we AFFIRM the district court's denial [*259] of preliminary injunctive relief under § 1395nn(b)(2)(B). We also AFFIRM the decision of the district court with respect to West Allis' common law claims of conspiracy and tortious interference with prospective contractual relations, as West Allis has failed to demonstrate any abuse of discretion on the part of the district court with respect to those claims. We, however, REVERSE the district court's denial of preliminary injunctive relief with respect to West Allis' federal and state antitrust claims and its common law claim of unfair competition, and REMAND for further consideration.

End of Document

[8] Factual disputes exist, for example, as to the size of the "relevant market" and extent of the parties' "market share" (facts which go to whether St. Luke's is capable of monopolizing trade under 15 U.S.C. § 2); and as to whether St. Luke's and Good Samaritan, both owned by the same parent corporation, are capable of conspiring to restrain trade in violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1.

[9] While we do not require that a district court address each of the five factors necessary to support a preliminary injunction in every case in which such relief is denied, see Curtis v. Thompson, 840 F.2d 1291, 1297 (7th Cir. 1988), by limiting its analysis to a single factor, the district court has seriously restricted the scope of review on appeal -- a result which might have been avoided by a more detailed analysis and consideration of each of the factors.

LexisNexis®

FTC v. Illinois Cereal Mills, Inc.

United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division

July 18, 1988, Decided

No. 88 C 4891

Reporter

691 F. Supp. 1131 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7552 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,191

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, Plaintiff, v. ILLINOIS CEREAL MILLS, INC., ELDERS IXL LIMITED, and ELDERS GRAIN, INC., Defendants

Core Terms

corn, products, industrial, dry, acquisition, geographic, markets, percent, ships, concentration, producers, preliminary relief, competitors, customers, merger, FTC Act, shipments, grits, firms, rescission, Consumer, merits, preliminary injunction, HSR Act, memorandum, parties, Grain, four-firm, food, consummated

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Transportation Law > Rail Transportation > Rates & Tariffs

HN1[] Railroads & Rail Transportation, Rates & Tariffs

The Staggers Rail Act of 1980, 49 U.S.C.S. § 10101 et seq., deregulating the rail and trucking industries, has made negotiated transportation rates for long distance rail and truck shipments the norm in the dry corn milling industry.

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Premerger Notifications

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Business Considerations > Securities Laws

HN2[] Antitrust, Premerger Notifications

The Hart-Scott-Rodino Act (HSR Act) provides that before stock or asset acquisitions of a particular size can be consummated, both the prospective sellers and purchasers must comply with certain reporting and waiting requirements. 15 U.S.C.S. §§ 18a(a)-(b). The purpose of the HSR Act is to provide the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice with information and time necessary to determine whether a proposed transaction, if consummated, may violate antitrust laws.

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Business Considerations > Securities Laws

HN3[] General Business Considerations, Securities Laws

The statutory coverage of the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act turns on three tests, all of which must be satisfied before the Act applies. First, one of the parties must be engaged in commerce or in activities affecting commerce. 15 U.S.C.S. § 18a(a)(1). Second, the parties must meet the size-of-person test set forth in 15 U.S.C.S. § 18a(a)(2). Third, the size of the transaction must exceed one of two specified thresholds. 15 U.S.C.S. § 18a(a)(3). One such threshold is passed when the total amount of securities or assets acquired exceeds $ 15 million.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Federal Trade Commission Act > Remedies > Injunctions

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > Public Interest

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Remedies

Antitrust & Trade Law > Federal Trade Commission Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > US Department of Justice Actions > Civil Actions > Injunctions

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > US Federal Trade Commission Actions > Remedial Powers > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > US Federal Trade Commission Actions > Remedial Powers > Federal Trade Commission Act

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN4[] Remedies, Injunctions

The Federal Trade Commission (Commission) is empowered under of the Federal Trade Commission Act, § 13(b), 15 U.S.C.S. § 53(b), to seek preliminary relief pending the completion of administrative proceedings challenging a merger or acquisition. Because preliminary injunctive relief is an extraordinary and drastic remedy, such relief is granted only upon a showing by the Commission that a substantial likelihood of success on the merits exists, that preliminary injunctive relief is the only available means of ensuring the availability of a final remedy, and that the public interest favors the issuance of preliminary relief. To demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits, the Commission must prove: not that the merger in question may possibly have an anti-competitive effect, but rather that it will probably have such an effect. And the government must have demonstrated a likelihood that it can meet this burden.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > US Federal Trade Commission Actions > Remedial Powers > Federal Trade Commission Act

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

Antitrust & Trade Law > Federal Trade Commission Act > Remedies > Injunctions

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > US Federal Trade Commission Actions > Judicial Review

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > US Federal Trade Commission Actions > Remedial Powers > General Overview

HN5[] Remedial Powers, Federal Trade Commission Act

Because a preliminary injunction blocking or rescinding an acquisition will often spell doom for the transaction, the Federal Trade Commission (Commission) must establish that the preliminary injunction sought is necessary to ensure the availability of an effective final remedy and that divestiture after the completion of proceedings on the merits would not provide suitable relief. In addition to the foregoing, the Commission must show that the equities favor issuing the relief sought. 15 U.S.C.S. § 53(b). Essentially, this requires the Commission to establish that the harm to the parties and to the public resulting from the preliminary injunction is outweighed by any harm to competition that would occur in the period between denial of a preliminary injunction and a final adjudication on the merits.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Scope

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

The Clayton Act, § 7, prohibits a corporation engaged in commerce from acquiring the assets of another corporation engaged in commerce where such acquisition may substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in a particular line of commerce in any section of the United States. 15 U.S.C.S. § 18.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > Federal Trade Commission Act

Banking Law > Federal Acts > Federal Trade Commission Act > Unfair Competition & Practices

Antitrust & Trade Law > Federal Trade Commission Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Federal Trade Commission Act > Scope

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

HN7[] Trade Practices & Unfair Competition, Federal Trade Commission Act

The Federal Trade Commission Act (FTC Act), § 5 makes all unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce unlawful. 15 U.S.C.S. § 45. Any act or practice which is prohibited by antitrust laws is viewed as an unfair method of competition under of the FTC Act § 5 .

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN8[] Relevant Market, Product Market Definition

The Supreme Court outlined a two-step process for product market analysis. First, the outermost boundaries of a product market are identified by determining reasonable interchangeability of use or cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it. Cross-elasticity of demand measures how far buyers will go to substitute one commodity for another. After the outer boundaries of a product market are defined, further analysis is required to determine whether well-defined submarkets exist which, by themselves, may constitute separate product markets for antitrust purposes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN9[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

The boundaries of individual product markets may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's particular characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors. The overriding principle in this two-step analysis is to identify meaningful competition where it actually exists.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN10[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Cross-elasticity of supply or production substitutability may also play a role in defining product markets for antitrust analyses. The cross-elasticity of supply refers to the capability of other production facilities to be converted to produce a substitutable product.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

HN11[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

In addition to defining a relevant product market, the Clayton Act, § 7 requires a determination of the effects the acquisition is likely to have on a section of the country or relevant geographic market.

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust, Market Definition

Analysis of a merger's competitive significance begins with consideration of market shares of the combined firms and proceeds from there to a review of qualitative factors to determine whether the merger poses a significant threat to competition.

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

HN13[] Mergers & Acquisitions Law, Antitrust

Among the qualitative factors most important to consider in assessing the potential for a merger to cause competitive harm are the difficulty of entry into the market and other market characteristics that may be conducive to interdependent or noncompetitive behavior.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN14[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

As concentration in a particular product and geographic market increases, greater is the likelihood that parallel policies of mutual advantage not competition, will emerge.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Market Definition

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

HN15[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Concentration is commonly measured by calculating both the four-firm concentration ratio and the more sensitive Herfindahl-Hirschman Index. Under either method, the acquisition at issue raises concentration significantly in an already highly concentrated market.

Communications Law > ... > Regulated Practices > Introducing Competition > Signal Carriage

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > General Overview

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Merger Guidelines

HN16[] Introducing Competition, Signal Carriage

Difficulty of entry is a factor, which increases concern over competitive effects of an acquisition. High entry barriers may be a signal that a particular merger carries a potential for impairing competition, but barriers need not reach some predetermined level before an anticompetitive effect becomes possible.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN17[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Major producers recognize that entry into the industrial corn milling industry requires the construction of a large and expensive facility. Recent and past experience has shown that a new entrant cannot come into the market without first securing substantial contracts to minimize the risk.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN18[] Injunctions, Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

Once a substantial likelihood of success on the merits is demonstrated, the court must consider whether the equities favor the issuance of preliminary relief and if so what type of relief is necessary and appropriate.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN19[] Injunctions, Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

Although private interests may be considered when balancing equities, they are subordinate to public interests and cannot alone support the denial of preliminary relief.

Counsel: [1] Ronald B. Rowe, Esq., Timothy T. Hughes, Esq., Federal Trade Commission, Chicago, Illinois, David C. Shonka, Esq., Norris Washington, Esq., Patricia Shapiro, Esq., Federal Trade Commission, Washington, District of Columbia, appeared on behalf of the Plaintiff.

James H. Sneed, Esq., David Marx, Jr., Esq., Lizbeth Levinson, Esq., McDermott, Will & Emery, Chicago, Illinois, appeared on behalf of Defendant Illinois Cereal Mills, Inc.

Kael B. Kennedy, Esq., Kirk D. Messmer, Esq., Matkov, Salzman, Madoff & Gunn, Chicago, Illinois, Eugene Meigher, Esq., Arent, Fox, Kintner, Plotkin & Kahn, Washington, District of Columbia, appeared on behalf of Defendant Elders.

Judges: Nicholas J. Bua, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: BUA

Opinion

[*1133] MEMORANDUM ORDER

NICHOLAS J. BUA, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

Before this court is plaintiff's motion for preliminary relief under § 13(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act and plaintiff's motion for reconsideration of this court's denial of leave to file an amended complaint to add a claim under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act. For the reasons stated herein, plaintiff's motion for reconsideration of leave to file a Hart-Scott-Rodino Act claim is denied, but plaintiff's motion for preliminary relief in the form of injunction ordering rescission of the consummated acquisition [2] of Lincoln Grain Company's assets by defendant Illinois Cereal Mills, Inc., from defendant Elders Grain, Inc., is granted subject to conditions described below.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. Background

1. Defendant Illinois Cereal Mills, Inc., ("ICM") is a Delaware corporation having its principal place of business in Illinois. (Plaintiff's Exhibit ("PX") 1.) ICM owns and operates industrial dry corn mills in Indianapolis, Indiana and Paris, Illinois. (Id.) Defendant Elders Grain, Inc., ("Elders") is a wholly owned subsidiary of Elders IXL, Ltd., an Australian corporation, and is licensed to do business in Illinois. (PX 2.) Elders owns and operates the Lincoln Grain Company ("Lincoln") in Atchison, Kansas. (Id.) Lincoln is also an industrial dry corn mill. (Id.)

2. In early June 1988, ICM purchased certain dry corn milling assets of Lincoln from Elders. (See PX 45-49.) According to the purchase agreement, ICM acquired a dry corn mill and approximately 90 rail cars for $ 14 million. (See PX 45.) In addition, ICM procured a five-year option for $ 100,000 to purchase a 21-million-bushel grain elevator located adjacent to the dry corn mill and entered into an agreement [3] to lease one sixth of the space in the elevator for $ 250,000 a year plus handling charges. (See PX 46-49.)

[*1134] 3. On June 6, 1988, plaintiff Federal Trade Commission ("Commission") instituted the present action seeking either rescission of the Lincoln asset sale or the appointment of a receiver to operate and manage the acquired assets pending the outcome of administrative litigation before the Commission. (See Complaint.) Elders' parent company, Elders IXL Ltd., was initially named in the complaint as a defendant but was later voluntarily dismissed by the Commission.

4. The complaint alleges that ICM's purchase of Lincoln's dry corn milling assets violates § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act ("FTC Act"), 15 U.S.C. § 45, because the acquisition may substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in the relevant product and geographic markets. (Complaint at para. 12.) The complaint alleges the relevant product market consists of all major products produced by dry corn milling for food use and defines the relevant geographic market as the United States. (Id. at para. 13.) The complaint asserts that the Lincoln asset [4] acquisition may substantially lessen competition in the relevant markets by eliminating actual and potential competition between ICM and Elders and facilitating anticompetitive interdependent conduct among remaining competitors in the dry corn milling business. (Id. at para. 14.) The effect of the foregoing conditions, according to the complaint, increases the likelihood that competitors will increase prices and decrease output both in the near future and long term. (Id.) The complaint avers that the re-establishment of Lincoln as a viable independent competitor after the conclusion of administrative litigation poses serious if not insurmountable difficulties and a strong likelihood of substantial interim harm to competition exists if the sale is not enjoined or rescinded. (Id. at para. 15.) Asserting that the Commission possesses a substantial likelihood of success on the merits and the entry of preliminary relief is in the public interest, the complaint requests a preliminary injunction pursuant to § 13(b) of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 53(b), rescinding the sale of Lincoln's milling assets by Elders to ICM or appointing a receiver to manage the assets as an independent [5] concern pending administrative litigation before the Commission.

5. Chief Judge Grady, sitting as emergency judge, denied the Commission's motion for a temporary restraining order on June 6, 1988. (See FTC v. Illinois Cereal Mills, No. 88 C 4891 (N.D. Ill. June 6, 1988).) Hearings on the Commission's motion for a preliminary injunction were scheduled for June 9 and 10. The morning of June 9, prior to presenting its case-in-chief, the Commission moved to amend its complaint to add a claim under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act ("HSR Act"), 15 U.S.C. § 18a(g)(2). Under its proposed § 18a(g)(2) claim, the Commission sought rescission of the noted asset sale on the grounds that defendants failed to comply with the preacquisition notice and waiting requirements of the HSR Act because the actual value of the Elders-ICM transaction exceeded the Act's $ 15 million reporting threshold. Because permitting the proposed amendment would have necessitated additional discovery and resulted in delay of the hearing, the Commission's motion to file an amended complaint was denied. (See FTC v. Illinois Cereal Mills, No. 88 C 4891 (N.D. Ill. June 9, 1988).)

6. After receiving testimony, exhibits and [6] written arguments from the parties, this court issued a minute order on June 14, 1988, granting the Commission's motion for rescission of the acquisition pending administrative litigation. (See FTC v. Illinois Cereal Mill, No. 88 C 4891 (N.D. Ill. June 14, 1988).) However, the rescission order was stayed pending appeal of this court's decision to the Seventh Circuit. (Id.) During the interim period, the terms of an agreed hold separate order were to apply. (Id.) The Commission's motion for reconsideration of its motion to amend its complaint adding HSR Act claims, however, was denied. (Id.) Finally, it was indicated that a memorandum order containing findings of fact and conclusions of law would follow. (Id.)

[*1135] II. Dry Corn Milling Industry

7. The dry corn milling industry is composed of two segments, each of which serves a different type of customer. (PX 1 at para. 4.) "Industrial" dry corn mills typically process yellow corn into a variety of products used by food producers who manufacture a wide spectrum of food products for resale to the public. (Id.) "Consumer" dry corn mills process mostly white corn into products packaged for consumption by the general [7] public. (Id.)

8. An industrial dry corn mill removes the outer covering or "bran" of the corn and separates the soft portion or "germ" from the remainder of the kernel. (PX 1 at para. 4; Tr. at 123.) Further processing reduces certain parts to "grits," while other parts are ground into meal and flour. (PX 1 at para. 4.) The milling process ultimately produces three classes of products: prime products, hominy feed, and corn oil. (Id.)

9. Prime products, listed in decreasing order of size, include flaking grits, brewer's grits, corn meal, and corn flour. (PX 1 at para. 5.) Prime products derive from the degermed portion of the kernel. (Id.) Flaking grits, the largest particles produced in the milling process, are used in the manufacture of corn flakes for breakfast cereal. (Id.) Brewer's grits, the second largest particle size produced, are used in the process of brewing beer. (Id.) Corn meal and corn flour, the third and fourth largest size particles, are used in a variety of food applications such as baking mixes, snacks, and cereals. (PX 1 at paras. 5, 10.) Some industrial dry corn mills further process the granulations and produce products such as pregelatinized corn [8] flour ("pregel"), used in the manufacture of certain cereals, and corn/soya/milk ("CSM"), which is purchased by the United States Government for use in various PL480 feeding programs in foreign countries. (PX 1 at para. 14.)

10. Hominy feed and corn oil are considered by-products of the milling process. Corn oil is extracted from the germ of the corn after being severed from the kernel and is used in the manufacture of margarine and as a cooking oil. Hominy feed is a collection of unused portions of the processed corn and is sold as livestock food. (PX 1 at para. 6.)

11. Whenever a corn miller attempts to make grits of a particular particle size, the miller not only gets that size, but also a series of smaller grit particles with some meal and flour. (PX 1 at para. 5.) Generally, those prime products most difficult to make, such as flaking grits, command the highest price while smaller particle products, such as meal or flour, bring the lowest prices. (PX 1 at para. 12.)

III. Relevant Product Market

12. With few exceptions, industrial dry corn mills can reconfigure their processing equipment to produce all prime products used by food processors. (PX 1 at paras. 11, 15; PX 4 at [9] paras. 7, 12; PX 8 at 1; Tr. at 71-75, 86.)

13. Six industrial dry corn milling concerns produce over 90 percent of all relevant prime products sold in the United States: (1) Bunge Corporation ("Bunge"), with facilities in Danville, Illinois and Crete, Nebraska; (2) J.R. Short Milling Company in Kankakee, Illinois ("J.R. Short"); (3) Archer Daniels Midland Company in Shawnee Mission, Kansas and Milwaukee, Wisconsin ("ADM"); (4) Quaker Oats Company in Cedar Rapids, Iowa ("Quaker Oats"); (5) Elders' Lincoln Grain Company in Atchison, Kansas; and (6) ICM in Paris, Illinois, and Indianapolis, Indiana. (PX 1 at para. 16; PX 4 at para. 9, PX 31; Tr. at 12-14, 29, 71, 82.)

14. The industrial dry corn milling industry is presently operating in a state of substantial excess capacity. (PX 1 at para. 15; PX 4 at para. 15.)

15. Consumer dry corn mills relative to industrial mills are small in size and produce corn meal and corn flour products which are not degermed. The germed products produced by consumer mills are typically packaged in five- to ten-pound bags and sold in grocery stores. Purchasers of industrial milled prime products cannot use germed corn products because an adverse effect [10] on the quality of the final product produced would result. Industrial [*1136] dry corn millers and customers do not consider the products produced by consumer mills as adequate substitutes for industrial milled prime products. (PX 1 at para. 4; PX 4 at para. 10; Tr. 19-20, 27, 76.)

16. Consumers using prime products produced by industrial dry corn mills generally cannot shift to other products in response to a small but significant nontransitory price increase. A sustained ten-percent price increase of prime products would not induce product substitution to any appreciable degree. (PX 1 at para. 10; PX 22 at para. 18; PX 24 at para. 6; Tr. at 10, 28-29, 45, 73-75.) The unique texture, taste, "mouth feel," and other qualities of dry milled prime products simply cannot be duplicated by another grain or food product. (PX 1 at para. 10.)

IV. Relevant Geographic Market

17. Major industrial dry corn mills are located in or near the corn belt states of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska. Most large industrial mills operate a series of country grain elevators where corn is purchased directly from farmers and stored for use by the mills. Location of the industrial mills and the elevators [11] in corn producing areas allows dry millers to avoid purchasing corn from commercial terminal elevators where the particular quality of corn needed for dry milling is difficult to guarantee. (PX 1 at para. 4.) To ensure only top quality corn is used, industrial mills attempt to control the corn from its acquisition from the farmer to arrival at the mill. (Id.)

18. Access to railroad lines is also an important factor in the success of an industrial mill. (PX 1 at paras. 17, 18.) Although major industrial mills ship some of their product by truck, the majority of industrial dry corn products are shipped by rail. (PX 1 at para. 18.) Rail shipments can take any one of three forms. Depending on the needs and location of the particular customer, products may be packaged in bags of 100 pounds or more and shipped by box car or piggyback. In other cases the products are shipped bulk in hopper cars. (PX 26; PX 28; PX 30.)

19. Shippers incur a penalty or surcharge each time a "break" in the railroad system occurs, or each time a rail car must be transferred from one rail carrier to another. (Tr. at 128-29.) Although breaks result any time a shipper is unable to reach a desired destination [12] on one rail line, the Mississippi River, by virtue of geographic divisions in the rail industry, is commonly where a break occurs. (Tr. at 131.) Thus, with few exceptions, shippers generally incur a freight penalty each time the Mississippi River is crossed. (Id.)

20. The average cost of a break in a rail shipment is equal to about two to four percent of the delivered price of the product shipped. (PX 41; Tr. at 131-32.)

21. Shipment patterns of industrial mills reveal that substantial quantities of dry milled corn products travel across the Mississippi River. Elders' Lincoln mill ships over nine percent of its production of prime products east of the Mississippi River; Bunge's Danville, Illinois mill ships 61 percent of its flaking grit production west of the Mississippi River; Bunge's Crete, Nebraska dry corn mill ships 61 percent of "other grits and meal" east of the Mississippi River; ADM Milling, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin ships 17 percent of all of its dry milled corn products west of the Mississippi River; and J.R. Short, in Kankakee, Illinois ships over 36 percent of its brewer's grits production west of the Mississippi River. (PX 1 at para. 20; PX 31; Tr. 105-06, 114-15, [13] 164.) In contrast, ICM ships only 1 percent of its production west of the Mississippi River. (See PX 1 at para. 8; PX 31; Tr. at 164-65.)

22. Buyers and sellers in the industrial dry corn industry perceive that all large industrial mills are significant competitors in a market that spans both east and west of the Mississippi River. (PX 2 Spec. 2 at 5, 9, 14, 18, Spec. 3 at 1; PX 4 at para. 9; PX 6 at 49-51, 69; PX 26 at 4; PX 28 at Schedule H; PX 39; Tr. 32-37, 48-49, 77-81, 113-15.)

23. Elders and ICM have identified each other as "principal competitors," and each ships products into several states served by the other. (See PX 1 at para. 16; PX 2; PX 3; [*1137] PX 6 at 51; PX 26 at 4; but cf. PX 1 para. 8.) ICM and Elders bid to supply corn meal for USDA programs to the same locations east of the Mississippi River. In many cases, Elders' Lincoln mill bids lower than ICM in the east. (PX 3 at 84; Tr. at 184.)

24. Elders advertises that it markets its dry corn products on a nationwide basis. (PX 16; PX 39.) Presently, Elders ships its products to over 18 states east of the Mississippi River. (PX 2 Spec. 3 at 1.) In addition, Elders identifies over 19 ICM customers as prospective new [14] customers. (PX 12; Tr. 105.)

25. The Sales Staff Supervisor for Elders' Lincoln mill testified at a Commission investigative hearing that he perceived ICM to be a "major competitor." (PX 6 at 48, 69.) Lincoln's Traffic Manager testified at a Commission investigative hearing that Lincoln served customers in the east and estimated that 30 to 40 percent of Lincoln's shipments went to locations east of the Mississippi River. (PX 5 at 35; see also PX 31.)

26. HN1[] The Staggers Rail Act of 1980, 49 U.S.C. § 10101 et seq., deregulating the rail and trucking industries, has made negotiated transportation rates for long distance rail and truck shipments the norm in the dry corn milling industry. (See PX 5; PX 28; PX 41; Tr. at 78-81; 181-87.)

27. Buyers of industrial milled prime products located in the east indicate that a ten-percent increase in price by mills situated east of the Mississippi would induce them to increase purchases from western mills. (Tr. at 10, 32-33, 44-49.)

28. Likewise, a significant but nontransitory price increase by western mills to customers west of the Mississippi would result in increased shipments from eastern mills. (PX 41.)

29. Notwithstanding the [15] foregoing, an internal memorandum prepared by an FTC lawyer in connection with Bunge's attempt to purchase Lincoln from Elders in May 1988, discusses tentative national and western markets for dry corn mill products. (Defendant ICM's Exhibit ("DX") 3.)

V. Competitive Effects

30. ICM is the second-largest industrial dry corn mill operator in the United States. (PX 19.) The acquisition of dry corn milling operations of Elders represents an acquisition of the fifth-largest industrial dry corn mill operator in the United States. (PX 19.) The transaction combines two of only six significant industrial dry corn millers in the United States. (PX 19.)

31. Two methods of measuring industry concentration exist for purposes of merger analysis. The first is the four-firm concentration ratio. The second, which is set forth in the Department of Justice Merger Guidelines, 2Trade Reg. Rep. (CCH) para. 4500 et seq. (1982) ("Merger Guidelines"), is the Herfindahl-Hirchman Index ("HHI"). (Tr. 66-67.)

32. The four-firm concentration ratio method adds the shares of the top four firms in a given product and geographic market. (Tr. at 67.) Assuming that the relevant product market is all industrial [16] milled prime products and the relevant geographic market is the United States, the postacquisition four-firm concentration ratio increases from 79 percent to 88 percent. (PX 19.) Thus, the increase in concentration resulting from ICM's acquisition of Lincoln's milling assets is 9 percent. (Id.) Additionally, the acquisition elevates ICM's market share from 23 percent to 32 percent. (Id.)

33. The HHI is premised upon the economic principle that both the distribution of market shares among the leading firms and the composition of the market outside of the leading firms are significant in assessing the likelihood of tacit collusion or interdependent, noncompetitive conduct in a market. [1] The fewer the number of firms, [*1138] the easier a collusive arrangement can be achieved. See Merger Guidelines, supra, Para. 4493 at 6879-13. Markets with HHI below 1000 are generally characterized as "unconcentrated," while markets with HHI between 1000 and 1800 are "moderately concentrated " and markets with HHI in excess of 1800 are "highly concentrated." Id. (Tr. at 68-69.)

[17] 34. Again assuming the relevant product and geographic markets are all industrial milled prime products sold in the United States, the postacquisition HHI is 2606. (PX 19.) This represents an increase of 480 over the preacquisition HHI of approximately 2100 (PX 19; Tr. at 82.)

---

[1] The Herfindahl-Hirschman Index, or HHI, is a measure of market concentration. It is calculated by squaring the market share of each firm competing in the market and then summing the resulting numbers. For example, for a market consisting of three firms with shares of 50, 30, and 20 percent each, the HHI is 3800 (50<2>+30<2>+20<2>=3800). The HHI takes into account the relative size distribution of the firms in a market. It approaches zero when a market is served by a large number of firms of relatively equal size, and reaches its maximum of 10,000 when a single supplier exists in the market. The HHI increases both as the number of firms in the market decreases and as the disparity in size among those firms increases. See Merger Guidelines, supra, at para. 4493.

35. Industrial dry corn mills are expensive to build and, if they fail, have little salvage value. (PX 1 at para. 18.) Entry into the industrial dry corn milling industry requires the construction of the large facility to economically compete with existing firms. (PX 1 at para. 17; PX at para. 17; PX 22 at para. 9; Tr. at 84, 134-35.) Recent experience has shown that a new entrant cannot successfully penetrate the market without first securing substantial contracts to minimize the risk. (PX 22.) Because a new manufacturer is not likely to find the necessary sales volume prior to constructing a mill facility, de novo entry into the industrial dry corn milling industry is unlikely. (Tr. at 134-35.) Even in the event of a small but significant increase in price for a nontransitory period of time, prospects for entry into the industrial dry milling industry are remote. (Tr. at 83, 134-35.)

36. Elders acquired [18] Lincoln in August 1987. As part of the transaction, Elders acquired Lincoln's mill facility in Atchison, Kansas and numerous grain elevators located in the midwest. (Defendant Elders' Exhibit ("DEX") 1 at para. 2.) Elders considers the dry corn mill assets to represent only ten percent of the total cost of the Lincoln acquisition. (DEX 1 at para. 3.) At the time it purchased Lincoln, Elders possessed no experience in operating an industrial dry corn mill and did not intend to retain the milling facilities for any appreciable period of time. (Id.) Since acquiring Lincoln, several key management personnel of the mill have left the company. Elders has filled these vacancies with prior Lincoln employees possessing little experience in the management of a dry corn mill. (DEX 1 at para. 5.)

37. Lincoln presently ships over 90 percent of its prime products to customers located west of the Mississippi River (DX 9.)

38. ICM is generally regarded as an efficient technologically innovative producer of dry corn milled products. (DX 11 at para. 5.) ICM intends to implement certain modifications in the Lincoln mill which are expected to result in significant cost savings and allow the Lincoln [19] facility to compete more effectively for business in the western United States. (DX 11 at para. 5.)

39. To the extent that any of the foregoing findings of fact are deemed to be conclusions of law, they are hereby adopted as conclusions of law.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. Jurisdiction

1. Jurisdiction is conferred on this court by § 13(b) of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 53(b). Venue is proper in this district under § 13(b) of the FTC Act and 28 U.S.C. § 1391(c). Elders and ICM are engaged "in commerce," as defined in § 4 of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 44, and § 1 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 12.

II. Commission's Motion to Add a HSR Act Claim

2. The Commission seeks to amend its complaint against defendants to include a claim under the HSR Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18a. HN2[] The HSR Act provides that before stock or asset acquisitions of a particular size can be consummated, both the prospective sellers and purchasers must comply with certain reporting and waiting requirements. 15 U.S.C. § 18a(a)-(b). The purpose of the HSR Act is to provide the [*1139] Commission and the Department of Justice with information and time necessary to determine whether a proposed transaction, if consummated, may violate antitrust [20] laws.

3. HN3[] The statutory coverage of the HSR Act turns on three tests, all of which must be satisfied before the Act applies. First, one of the parties must be engaged in commerce or in activities affecting commerce. 15 U.S.C. § 18a(a)(1). Second, the parties must meet the size-of-person test set forth in 15 U.S.C. § 18a(a)(2). Third, the size of the transaction must exceed one of two specified thresholds. 15 U.S.C. § 18a(a)(3). One such threshold is passed when the total amount of securities or assets acquired exceeds $ 15 million. Id.

4. The parties agree that applicability of the Act to the Lincoln acquisition turns on whether the third test set forth in § 18a(a)(3)(B) is met. The Commission essentially contends that the purchase-lease-option agreement between Elders and ICM is a sham and that the actual value of the Lincoln asset acquisition exceeds the $ 15 million threshold. Elders and ICM argue, however, that legitimate business reasons existed for structuring the transaction in the manner in which it was consummated. Moreover, Elders and ICM vigorously contest the Commission's position that procuring an option to purchase an asset should be viewed as acquiring the asset [21] for purposes of HSR Act compliance.

5. As indicated earlier, the Commission's motion for leave to amend its complaint was denied on June 9, 1988. The basic rationale for this court's ruling stemmed from the fact that permitting the proposed amendment would have required postponement of the preliminary injunction hearing to allow defendants adequate time for discovery and preparation. Elders and ICM did not receive notice of the Commission's intent to add a HSR Act claim until the very eve of the scheduled preliminary injunction hearing. Thus, prejudice to ICM and Elders would have resulted if the HSR Act amendment was allowed and the preliminary hearings were not delayed. Considering the foregoing factors and both sides' interest in prompt determination of the Commission's motion for preliminary relief under § 13(b) of the FTC Act, this court determined that allowing the Commission to amend its complaint the morning of the scheduled preliminary injunction hearing was inappropriate.

6. Nothing contained in the Commission's motion for reconsideration persuades this court to the contrary. As earlier indicated, the Commission has succeeded in obtaining preliminary relief on its claim that [22] the Lincoln asset sale is likely to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in the markets for industrial milled prime products in the United States. Thus, even if the Commission had obtained leave to file its amended complaint and had succeeded in proving a HSR violation, it would have been entitled to no relief greater than that awarded under its § 13(b) claim. As such, the Commission's motion for reconsideration of its motion to amend its complaint is denied. [2]

III. Standards for Preliminary Relief Under § 13(b) of the FTC Act

7. HN4[] The Commission is empowered under § 13(b) of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 53(b), to seek preliminary relief pending the completion of administrative proceedings challenging a merger or acquisition. Because preliminary injunctive relief is an "extraordinary and drastic remedy," FTC v. Great Lakes Chemical Corp., 528 F. Supp. 84, 86 (N.D. Ill. 1981), such relief is granted only upon a showing by the Commission that a substantial likelihood of success on the merits exists, that preliminary injunctive relief is the [23] only available means of ensuring the availability of a final remedy, and that the public interest favors the issuance of preliminary relief. See FTC v. Weyerhaeuser Co., 214 U.S. App. D.C. 254, 665 F.2d 1072, 1076 (D.C. Cir. 1981); United States v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles, 575 F.2d 222, 226 (9th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom., Aqua Media, Ltd. v. United States, 439 U.S. 959, [*1140] 58 L. Ed. 2d 351, 99 S. Ct. 362 (1978); FTC v. Great Lakes Chemical Corp., 528 F. Supp. at 87.

8. To demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits, the Commission must prove:

> not that the merger in question may possibly have an anti-competitive effect, but rather that it will probably have such an effect. And the Government must have demonstrated at this stage in the case a likelihood that it can meet this burden.

FTC v. Great Lakes Chemical Corp., 528 F. Supp. at 86.

9. HN5[] Because a preliminary injunction blocking or rescinding an acquisition will often spell doom for the transaction, the Commission must establish that the preliminary injunction sought is necessary to ensure the availability of an effective final remedy and that divestiture after the completion of proceedings on the merits would not provide suitable relief. [24] FTC v. Great Lakes Chemical Corp., 528 F. Supp. at 99.

10. In addition to the foregoing, the Commission must show that the equities favor issuing the relief sought. 15 U.S.C. § 53(b). Essentially, this requires the Commission to establish that the harm to the parties and to the public resulting from the preliminary injunction is outweighed by any harm to competition that would occur in the period between denial of a preliminary injunction and a final adjudication on the merits. FTC v. Great Lakes Chemical Corp., 528 F. Supp. at 86.

---

[2] In reaching this conclusion, however, this court expresses no opinion on the merits of the Commission's proposed amendment.

IV. Likelihood of Success Under § 7 of the Clayton Act and § 5 of the FTC Act

11. The Commission attacks ICM's acquisition of Lincoln's dry corn milling assets from Elders under § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and § 5 of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45. Section 7 of HN6[] the Clayton Act prohibits a corporation engaged in commerce from acquiring the assets of another corporation engaged in commerce where such acquisition may substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in a particular line of commerce in any section of the United States. 15 U.S.C. § 18. Section 5 of HN7[] the FTC Act makes all unfair methods of competition and unfair or [25] deceptive acts or practices in commerce unlawful. 15 U.S.C. § 45. Any act or practice which is prohibited by antitrust laws is viewed as an unfair method of competition under § 5 of the FTC Act. See FTC v. Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 106 S. Ct. 2009, 2016, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1986).

12. The Commission's complaint asserts that ICM's purchase of Lincoln's dry corn milling assets may substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in the market for industrial milled prime products in the United States. Thus, the Commission premises its § 5 claim on an alleged violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act. Accordingly, the requirements for demonstrating a § 7 violation must be addressed before assessing whether the Commission has shown a likelihood of success on the merits.

13. To ultimately succeed on its Section 7 claims, the Commission must first establish the relevant product and geographic markets and then prove that the effect of the acquisition may substantially lessen competition within those markets. Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 324, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962).

A. Relevant Product Market

14. In Brown Shoe Co., HN8[] the Supreme Court outlined a two-step process for product market analysis. First, the outermost boundaries of a product market are [26] identified by determining reasonable interchangeability of use or cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it. Id. at 325. See also United States v. Continental Can Co., 378 U.S. 441, 447-49, 12 L. Ed. 2d 953, 84 S. Ct. 1738 (1964); United States v. E.I. duPont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 394-95, 400-01, 404, 100 L. Ed. 1264, 76 S. Ct. 994 (1956) (cross-elasticity of demand measures how far buyers will go to substitute one commodity for another). After the outer boundaries of a product market are defined, further analysis is required to determine whether well-defined submarkets [*1141] exist which, by themselves, may constitute separate product markets for antitrust purposes. Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 325. The HN9[] boundaries of such individual product markets may be determined by examining such practical indicia as "industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's particular characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors." Id. The overriding principle in this two-step analysis is to identify meaningful competition where it actually exists. United States v. [27] Continental Can Co., 378 U.S. at 449.

15. In Brown Shoe Co., the Supreme Court also noted that HN10[] cross-elasticity of supply or production substitutability may also play a role in defining product markets for antitrust analyses. Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 325 n.42. The cross-elasticity of supply refers to the capability of other production facilities to be converted to produce a substitutable product. Rothery Storage & Van Co. v. Atlas Van Lines, Inc., 253 U.S. App. D.C. 142, 792 F.2d 210, 218 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

16. Evidence presented by the Commission shows that industrial dry corn mills possess the ability to configure their operations to produce all prime products used by food processors. See Findings of Fact ("FF") para. 12, supra. Thus, the simple fact that certain industrial mills do not currently produce each type of prime product presently marketed does not alter the analysis of which firms should be included in assessing the cross-elasticity of supply.

17. Six firms capable of manufacturing the relevant products produce over 90 percent of the prime products sold in the United States. See FF para. 13, supra. These firms are Bunge, ICM, ADM, Quaker, Elders (Lincoln), and [28] J.R. Short. Id. A number of smaller dry corn mills with extremely limited output capacities supply the remaining prime products sold in the United States. Id.

18. Consumer dry corn mills compared to industrial dry corn mills are considerably smaller and typically do not possess facilities for manufacturing degermed corn products. See FF para. 15, supra. Thus, they are not viewed as potential suppliers of prime products.

19. Consumers using prime products produced by industrial mills cannot shift to other products in response to a small but significant nontransitory price increase. See FF para. 16, supra. Testimony of purchasers of prime products reveals that a sustained ten-percent increase in the price of prime products would not induce product substitution to any appreciable degree due to the particular qualities dry milled corn adds to their food products. Id. Because the use of germed corn products by food processors adversely affects the quality of the food products they produce, food processors do not consider the products manufactured by consumer mills as being viable substitutes for industrial milled prime products. See FF para. 15, supra

[29] 20. Applying the principles of cross-elasticity of supply and demand to the facts in the present case, this court determines that the relevant product market consists of all prime products for food use produced by industrial dry corn mills. Although the Commission also believes that each type of prime product constitutes a separate product submarket, the Commission's evidence and arguments essentially embrace the theory that the broader market definition of all prime products is the proper "line of commerce" for purposes of § 7 analysis. Accordingly, this court's discussion will focus on the effect the challenged acquisition is likely to have on competition in the market for industrial milled prime products.

B. Relevant Geographic Market

21. HN11[] In addition to defining a relevant product market, § 7 requires a determination of the effects the acquisition is likely to have on a section of the country or relevant geographic market.

22. In the present case, the parties are sharply divided on the proper definition of the relevant geographic market. The Commission takes the position that a national market for industrial milled prime products exists. Elders and ICM, however, assert [*1142] that the [30] Mississippi River marks a sharp delineation between separate eastern and western markets for industrial milled prime products. They contend that producers in the east and west are unable to significantly compete with each other because of special transportation costs incurred when shipping goods by rail over the Mississippi River.

23. According to the Court's opinion in Brown Shoe Co., the geographic market selected must correspond to the "commercial realities of the industry and be economically significant." Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 336-37. The inquiry employed under this standard does not focus on where the parties to an impending merger or acquisition do business or where they presently compete, but rather it focuses on where, within the area of competitive overlap, the effect of the merger or acquisition on competition will be direct and immediate. United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l. Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 357, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963). Simply stated, the question centers on where sellers operate and where purchasers can practicably turn for supplies. United States v. Phillipsburg Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 399 U.S. 350, 357-58, 26 L. Ed. 2d 658, 90 S. Ct. 2035 (1970). The scope of the relevant geographic market includes [31] the area in which sellers of the relevant product can increase price or cut output without triggering a flow of supply into the area from outside it. See RSR Corp. v. FTC, 602 F.2d 1317, 1323 (9th Cir. 1979).

24. Applying the foregoing analysis to the facts in the present case compels the conclusion that a nationwide geographic market for prime products exists: All producers are located relatively close to one another, they ship their products nationally, customers look to each of them for supplies and producers consider each other to be competitors. See FF paras. 21-28, supra.

25. Elders and ICM's contention that separate eastern and western geographic markets exist rests on the assertion that freight penalties incurred when crossing the Mississippi River make such shipments cost prohibitive. Because shipments across the Mississippi River typically involve a break in rail service requiring the services of a second railroad at a special premium, Elders and ICM contend that mills located on opposite sides of the Mississippi are unable to effectively compete with each other. Defendants contend that ICM's own shipment patterns are indicative of this barrier to nationwide [32] competition and that statements by other industrial mills support the existence of separate eastern and western geographic markets. Additionally, Elders and ICM note that an internal memorandum prepared by a Commission attorney in connection with Bunge's unsuccessful attempt to acquire Lincoln in June 1988 recognizes a western geographic market for prime products.

26. Elders and ICM's arguments, however, fail to convince this court that separate geographic markets for industrial milled prime products exist on each side of the Mississippi. First, under Elders and ICM's theory, producers are limited to competing for customers that are located in areas where single-line rail shipments are possible. An examination of shipment records for several industrial mills reveals that even when shipping products to locations on the same side of the Mississippi, multiple rail services frequently are employed. See e.g., PX 26 at Ex. 3; PX 28 at Ex. F; PX 30 at Ex. IV. Although ICM's Paris, Illinois mill is only serviced by Conrail, eastern shipments from its Paris facility commonly involve two or more railroads. See PX 2 at Ex. 3. Thus, breaks in rail service are commonly encountered when shipping [33] goods to all areas of the nation, not just those instances when the Mississippi River is crossed.

27. Elders and ICM's argument concerning freight barriers is also undercut by the current shipping practices of most industrial mills. Although ICM currently rail ships only one percent of its products to locations west of the Mississippi River, rail shipment patterns of other major industrial mills indicate that ICM is atypical. Most major industrial mills rail ship substantial amounts of their prime products [*1143] across the Mississippi River. See FF para. 21, supra.

28. Though mills west of the Mississippi tend to ship most of their products to western locations and mills east of the Mississippi tend to ship to eastern locations, the fact remains the nearly all major industrial mills compete for customers on a national basis. All major industrial mills consider each other principal competitors, and consumers view industrial mills on both sides of the Mississippi as viable suppliers of prime products. See FF 22-23, supra. Customers buying prime products from producers east of the Mississippi would, in the face of a sustained ten-percent price increase by eastern mills, turn [34] to western producers for their purchases. Id. This type of response indicates that regional price increases are likely to fail and that the market which buyers are able to turn for prime products is national in scope. Thus, the fact that ICM presently ships only one percent of its prime products west of the Mississippi does not dictate that two geographic markets exist.

29. ICM and Elders attempt to support their assertion of separate eastern and western markets with citations to statements by various producers concerning their perceived competitors. First, testimony by ICM's chief executive officer and president is highlighted to underscore that freight penalties limit eastern producers, like ICM, from competing for business west of the Mississippi. Next, ICM and Elders note statements by the presidents of J.R. Short and Agricor, Inc., a small industrial dry corn mill in Marion, Indiana, which purportedly support the existence of two geographic markets.

30. Careful scrutiny reveals, however, that during the Commission's investigation of Bunge's proposed acquisition of Lincoln from Elders, ICM submitted statements to the Commission which listed Bunge's mill in Crete, Nebraska [35] and Elder's mill in Atchison, Kansas as being among its "principle competitors." See PX 26 at 4. Similarly, the president of J.R. Short listed all major western mills as primary competitors in his report to the Commission. See PX 30 at § 9. The portion of the president's report highlighted by defendants simply states that J.R. Short's area of competition with competing producers is "principally east of the Mississippi River." Id. However, the fact that J.R. Short ships over a third of its brewer's grits production west of the Mississippi clearly indicates that J.R. Short competes with other producers outside its self-defined area of competition in the east. Statements by Agricor's president, although supportive of defendant's position, must be placed in proper context. Agricor, relative to the six major industrial mills, is extremely small and ships only a small percentage of its products by rail. See PX 22; PX 35. Agricor is further differentiated in that one customer located 90 miles from its mill, purchases over half of its production. Given these distinctions, Agricor's marketing practices can hardly be accepted as typical among major industrial mills. Thus, Agricor's assessment of geographic markets in which it is capable of competing does [36] not compel the conclusion that separate eastern and western geographic markets exist.

31. Finally, Elders and ICM point to a Commission memorandum prepared in connection with its investigation of Bunge's unsuccessful attempt to purchase Lincoln earlier this year which discusses national and western markets for prime products. Although the memorandum appears to explore the possibility that the western United States might constitute a separate geographic market for analyzing Bunge's proposed acquisition of Lincoln, the language contained in the memorandum makes clear that any such geographic definitions were purely tentative in nature. No conclusions regarding the relevant geographic market were ever made in the memorandum. In fact, the memorandum unequivocally indicates that United States might be the proper geographic market for purposes reviewing the Bunge proposal for antitrust concerns. Thus, the memorandum offers little actual support for defendants' market definitions.

32. Though Elders and ICM's assertion of eastern and western geographic markets cannot be summarily dismissed, the weight [*1144] of evidence presented in this case clearly supports this court's finding of a national geographic [37] market for industrial milled prime products. As the relevant product and geographic markets are defined, the next step is to determine the likely effects of the transaction at issue.

C. Competitive Effects

33. HN12[] Analysis of a merger's competitive significance begins with consideration of market shares of the combined firms and proceeds from there to a review of qualitative factors to determine whether the merger poses a "significant threat to competition." Merger Guidelines, 2 Trade Reg. Reg. Rep. (CCH) para. 4503; Statement of the FTC Concerning Horizontal Mergers, [Jan.-June 1982 Special Supplement] Antitrust & Trade Reg. Rep. (BNA) No. 1069 at 5-12 (June 12, 1982) ("FTC Statement"). See also United States v. General Dynamics Corp., 415 U.S. 486, 39 L. Ed. 2d 530, 94 S. Ct. 1186 (1974); Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp. v. F.T.C., 652 F.2d 1324 (7th Cir. 1981). Among HN13[] the qualitative factors most important to consider in assessing the potential for a merger to cause competitive harm are the difficulty of entry into the market and other market characteristics that may be conducive to interdependent or noncompetitive behavior. FTC Statement, supra; see also Posner, Antitrust Law*: An Economic* [38] Perspective, 55-61 (1976).

34. The Supreme Court has observed that HN14[] as concentration in a particular product and geographic market increases, "greater is the likelihood that parallel policies of mutual advantage not competition, will emerge." United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 377 U.S. 271, 280, 12 L. Ed. 2d 314, 84 S. Ct. 1283 (1964). See also United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 363, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1964). "This conclusion rests upon the theory that where rivals are few, firms will be able to coordinate their behavior, either by overt collusion or implicit understanding, in order to restrict output and achieve profits above competitive levels." FTC v. PPG Industries, Inc., 255 U.S. App. D.C. 69, 798 F.2d 1500, 1503 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

35. HN15[] Concentration is commonly measured by calculating both the four-firm concentration ratio and the more sensitive Herfindahl-Hirschman Index ("HHI"). Id. Under either method, the acquisition at issue raises concentration significantly in an already highly concentrated market. After acquiring Lincoln's milling assets, ICM will control slightly more than 32 percent of the relevant market. See FF para. 32, supra. The postacquisition four-firm concentration ratio jumps from [39] 79 percent to 88 percent. Id. Similarly, the preacquisition HHI of 2114, which itself denotes a highly concentrated market, increases some 480 points to 2606 when the Lincoln asset sale is recognized. See FF paras. 33-34, supra.

36. The concentration levels here exceed levels found in other cases in which courts have found a violation of Section 7. In some cases, such concentration levels established a prima facie case of illegality. See RSR Corp. v. FTC, 602 F.2d at 1324-25 (four-firm concentration 72.40 percent, combined share 19.18 percent); Liggett & Meyers, Inc. v. FTC, 567 F.2d 1273, 1275-76 (4th Cir. 1977) (four-firm concentration 54.44 percent, combined share 15.4 percent); United States v. General Dynamics Corp., 415 U.S. 486, 39 L. Ed. 2d 530, 94 S. Ct. 1186 (1974) (four-firm concentration 43 percent, combined share 23.2 percent; prima facie showing of illegality rebutted by other factors).

37. HN16[] Difficulty of entry is a factor which increases concern over competitive effects of an acquisition. FTC v. Procter & Gamble Co., 386 U.S. 568, 579, 18 L. Ed. 2d 303, 87 S. Ct. 1224 (1967); United States Steel Corp. v. FTC, 426 F.2d 592 (6th Cir. 1970); Marathon Oil Co. v. Mobil Corp., 530 F. Supp. 315, 325 [40] (N.D. Ohio 1981), aff'd 669 F.2d 378 (6th Cir. 1980). As the Second Circuit observed in Fruehauf Corp. v. FTC, 603 F.2d 345, 357 (2d Cir. 1979), "high entry barriers may be a signal that a particular merger carries a potential for impairing competition, but barriers need not reach some predetermined level before an anticompetitive effect becomes possible."

[*1145] 38. Industrial dry corn mills are expensive to build and, if they fail, have little salvage value. See FF para. 35, supra. HN17[] Major producers recognize that entry into the industrial corn milling industry requires the construction of a large and expensive facility. Id. Recent and past experience has shown that a new entrant cannot come into the market without first securing substantial contracts to minimize the risk. Id. The most recent example of de novo entry is Agricor's construction of a corn mill in Marion, Indiana in 1983. Agricor entered the market only after it had secured a long-term commitment from Miles Laboratories, and even then it took Agricor more than three years to negotiate with Miles, construct its plant, and produce marketable brewer's grits. See PX 1; PX 22. Similarly, ICM began [41] construction of its Evans, Illinois dry corn mill in 1976. See PX 1 at para. 17. It did not complete construction until 1982, and did not conclude the shakedown and modifications of the mill until 1985 -- nearly nine years after the project was started. Id. In addition, the testimony of Mr. Wiggins, ICM's Chief Executive Officer, regarding the likelihood of de novo entry and entry through the conversion of wheat mills is highly probative. Mr. Wiggins testified that entry is difficult, time consuming, expensive and unlikely. See Tr. at 134-35.

39. In sum, the evidence presented shows the Commission possesses a significant likelihood of ultimate success on the merits. Facts adduced at the hearing indicate that ICM and Elders compete against each other for a significant number of the same customers. See FF para. 24, supra. ICM's acquisition of Lincoln's milling assets will thus eliminate existing and future competition between the two firms. Prior to ICM's purchase of Lincoln's milling assets, the industrial dry corn milling industry was highly concentrated. Sharp postacquisition increases in the four-firm concentration ratio and the HHI strongly support the Commission's [42] assertion that the challenged acquisition is likely to result in anticompetitive conduct among remaining producers of industrial milled prime products. Moreover, given the noted cost and time barriers for de novo entry, little chance exists that new suppliers of prime products will appear in the event of a small but significant nontransitory price increase. Although ICM's expertise in industrial milling may result in significant cost savings at the Lincoln facility, it does not follow that competition in the relevant market will be enhanced. The weight of evidence presented in this case suggests, rather, that ICM's purchase of Lincoln's milling assets will allow remaining competitors to overtly or tacitly coordinate their behavior to restrict output and achieve profits above competitive levels.

V. Public Interest

40. HN18[] Once a substantial likelihood of success on the merits is demonstrated, the court must consider whether the equities favor the issuance of preliminary relief and if so what type of relief is necessary and appropriate. FTC v. Weyerhaeuser Co., 665 F.2d at 1076; United States v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles, 575 F.2d at 226; FTC v. Great Lakes [43] Chemical Corp., 528 F. Supp. at 86-87, 99. An examination of the facts in the present case indicates that the public interest will be benefited by a grant of preliminary relief. As discussed above, ICM's acquisition of Lincoln's milling assets creates a strong likelihood that producers will engage in anticompetitive conduct causing the price of industrial milled prime products to rise above competitive levels. The challenged transaction thus poses a direct and immediate threat to the public in the form of higher prices for prime products and the food products derived therefrom.

41. Elders and ICM resist the conclusion that the equities favor the issuance of preliminary relief with two basic arguments. First, defendants note that Elders acquired Lincoln in 1987 to obtain its grain elevators and desired to sell Lincoln's dry corn mill because it lacked any experience operating such a facility. Since ICM possesses considerable expertise in producing high quality prime products and Elders does not, defendants argue that the Lincoln facility will be a more efficient producer under ICM and that the public [*1146] will benefit by increased competition in the western United States. Elders and ICM's [44] second argument underscores the financial and economic hardships both firms will face if the challenged transaction is rescinded or otherwise enjoined.

42. Elders and ICM's first argument fails to persuade this court because it rests heavily on the assumption that eastern and western geographic markets for prime products exist. As earlier defined, the relevant geographic market for measuring the effect of the challenged transaction is the United States. Even assuming Elders is unable to efficiently operate the Lincoln mill, it does not follow that competition in the relevant geographic market will be enhanced by the challenged acquisition. Rather than lower prices for consumers, the likely result of the Lincoln acquisition will be greater mill profitability. Thus, Elders and ICM fail to demonstrate that public will be adversely affected if the transaction is rescinded or enjoined.

43. Defendants' second argument concerns only private interests which will be harmed if the Commission's motion for preliminary is granted. HN19[] Although private interests may be considered when balancing the equities, they are subordinate to public interests and cannot alone support the denial of preliminary [45] relief. FTC v. Weyerhaeuser Co., 214 U.S. App. D.C. 254, 665 F.2d 1072, 1083 (D.C. Cir. 1981). As such, Elders and ICM are unable to defeat the Commission's motion on the grounds that their private financial and economic interests will be impaired if preliminary relief is granted.

44. As this court concludes that the Commission possesses a significant likelihood of success on the merits and public equities favor the issuance of preliminary injunction, the final issue to be addressed is what type of relief is necessary to preserve an adequate remedy should the Commission ultimately prevail on its claim that the acquisition violates § 7 of the Clayton Act.

VI. Preliminary Relief

45. One of the principal reasons for enjoining mergers is the historic difficulty of determining how to split an ongoing operation into two viable entities when attempting to enforce a divestiture order after the fact. This persistent problem has been long recognized by courts, and is the underlying reason for the Commission's authority to seek preliminary relief under Section 13(b) of the FTC Act. FTC v. PPG Industries, Inc., 255 U.S. App. D.C. 69, 798 F.2d 1500, 1507-08 (D.C. Cir. 1986); FTC v. Warner Communication, Inc., 742 F.2d 1156, 1165 [46] (9th Cir. 1984). Because most acquisitions present the probability that owners will commingle and consolidate corporate assets and operations, reliance upon an ability to "unscramble the eggs" following a full administrative adjudication is generally misplaced. Id.; see also FTC v. Rhinechem Corp., 459 F. Supp. 785, 790 (N.D. Ill. 1978).

46. In the present case, Elders and ICM argue that difficulty exists in applying the foregoing principles because the "eggs have already been cracked." ICM completed its acquisition on Lincoln's milling assets on June 5, 1988 and has assumed operation of the mill. As a result, Elders and ICM assert that confidential trade information has been exchanged and rescission will not return the parties to their original positions. These facts, however, do not restrict this court from granting preliminary relief pending administrative litigation. See FTC v. Southwest Sunsites, Inc., 665 F.2d 711 (5th Cir. 1982) (asset freeze entered pending completion of administrative proceedings to ensure availability of effective final remedy); FTC v. Weyerhaeuser Co., 208 U.S. App. D.C. 366, 648 F.2d 739 (D.C. Cir. 1981) (acquisition ordered rescinded pending appellate review [47] where parties consummated challenged transaction prior to resolution of appeal); SEC v. Keller Corp., 323 F.2d 397 (7th Cir. 1963) (temporary receiver appointed on showing of likely success).

47. The facts in the instant case reveal that ICM and Elders were well aware that the Commission possessed serious reservations about the legality of the Lincoln sale before it was consummated. Letters from Commission attorneys requesting that Elders and ICM refrain from closing the Lincoln sale until the Commission's antitrust concerns were judicially resolved fell on deaf ears. See PX 27. In fact, the record [*1147] strongly suggests that the parties advanced the tentative closing date to a Sunday afternoon to thwart the Commission's attempt to block the sale. Elders and ICM chose to accept the risk that a court might later agree with the Commission's assessment of possible § 7 violations and order the transaction be set aside. The fact Elders and ICM decided to persevere in the face of such uncertainty is not a valid reason for denying preliminary relief.

48. If the Commission succeeds on the merits of its case, the only suitable relief appears to be divestiture. Given the nature of the assets [48] acquired, any loss of competition resulting from the challenged transaction could only be remedied by transferring Lincoln's milling facilities to an independent party. Because of the small number of competitors presently existing in the industrial milling industry, serious difficulties could arise in finding a suitable buyer after a divestiture order. Moreover, ICM intends to consolidate operations at the Lincoln facility and eliminate personnel whose functions are mirrored by existing ICM employees. If ICM is allowed to maintain the Lincoln mill during the pendency of administrative litigation which often exceeds several years in duration, see FTC v.

Occidental Petroleum Corp., 1986-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) para. 67,071 at 62,516 (D.D.C. 1986), important personnel will be lost, and Lincoln's ability to function as an independent competitor after divestiture will be jeopardized. Thus, to preserve the viability of divestiture as an ultimate remedy, an order appointing a trustee to manage the acquired assets or rescinding the sale is required.

49. Evidence received during hearings on the Commission's motion made clear that appointing a trustee to manage milling operations pending administrative [49] litigation would likely spell doom for the continued existence of Lincoln as a viable competitor. Many of Lincoln's key management personnel have left and locating a qualified trustee, due to the small size of the dry corn milling industry, would be difficult if not impossible. Thus, appointment of a trustee would not be prudent in the present case.

50. Rescission of the consummated transaction is the only preliminary remedy which will ensure the availability of adequate relief after a trial on the merits and preserve competition pending the resolution of administrative litigation. Continuation of the present hold separate order during years of administrative proceedings before the Commission will only multiply uncertainty about the future of the Lincoln mill and restrict ICM and Elders from pursuing other business opportunities. However, ordering immediate rescission of the challenged transaction before Elders and ICM exhaust their right to appeal would result in unnecessary transaction costs if this court's decision is later reversed. Given the nature of this case, the Circuit Court is likely to afford prompt attention to any appeal of this decision. Because the potential for harm [50] to competition during appeal is minimal under the present hold separate order, rescission of the challenged transaction is stayed pending exhaustion of appeal to the Seventh Circuit. During the interim period, the terms of the agreed hold separate order dated June 14, 1988 will apply.

51. To the extent that any of the foregoing conclusions of law are deemed to be findings of fact, they are hereby adopted as findings of fact.

VII. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Commission's motion for reconsideration of leave to file a claim under § 18a(g)(2) of the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act is denied, but motion for preliminary relief in the form of an injunction ordering rescission of the consummated acquisition of Lincoln's milling assets by defendant ICM from defendant Elders is granted. Execution of the rescission order is stayed, however, pending exhaustion of appeal to the Seventh Circuit.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Corrosion Resistant Materials Co. v. Steelite, Inc.

United States District Court for the District of New Jersey

July 19, 1988, Decided ; July 20, 1988, Filed

Civil Action No. 84-2337

Reporter

692 F. Supp. 407 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7580 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,359

CORROSION RESISTANT MATERIALS CO., Plaintiff, v. STEELITE, INC., OXHANDLER STRUCTURAL ENTERPRISES, INC., CHRIS ANDERSON ERECTING CORP. and JOHN DOE CORPORATION, Defendants Subsequent History: [1] As Amended August 17, 1988.

Core Terms

distributors, summary judgment, engineered, terminated, quotation, manufacturer, Sherman Act, vertical, prices, siding, Counts, partial summary judgment, Resistant, antitrust, products, dealer, metal, summary judgment motion, defense motion, unit price, lump sum, Corrosion, genuine, roofing, new construction, material fact, conspiracy, panels

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > Partial Summary Judgment

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN1[] Summary Judgment, Supporting Materials

Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(b) provides that a party against whom a claim is asserted may, at any time, move with or without supporting affidavits for a summary judgment in the party's favor as to all or any part thereof.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN2[] Summary Judgment, Supporting Materials

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c).

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Movant Persuasion & Proof

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN3[] Summary Judgment, Opposing Materials

The party moving for summary judgment has the burden of establishing that there exists no genuine issue of material fact. Once that burden is met, the opposing party must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. In particular, the non-moving party is required to set forth specific facts which show that a genuine issue exists; said party cannot rest upon the mere allegations or denials of its pleadings.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN4[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

A dispute involving a material fact is "genuine" only if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury would return a verdict for the non-moving party.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Appropriateness

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Scintilla Rule

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN5[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Appropriateness

At the summary judgment stage, a judge's function is not himself to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter but to determine whether there is a genuine issue for trial. However, if the evidence is 'merely colorable' or is 'not significantly probative,' summary judgment may be granted.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Remedies > Damages

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > Evidentiary Considerations

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Industry Practices > Federal Regulations > Antitrust Regulations

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Remedies > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN6[] Remedies, Damages

Although the summary judgment hurdle is a difficult one to meet in an antitrust suit, it is by no means insurmountable. To survive a motion for summary judgment, a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of the Sherman Act § 1, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently. Respondents, in other words, must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN7[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

A vertical restraint is not illegal per se unless it includes some agreement on price or price levels.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Nonprice Restraints

HN8[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Vertical agreements on resale prices are per se illegal. Within the context of vertical non-price restraints, however, the scope of per se illegality is much narrower. This distinction is based on the conclusion that vertical nonporous restraints have not been shown to have "such a pernicious effect on competition" and to be so "lacking in redeeming value" as to justify per se illegality.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN9[] Regulated Practices, Trade Practices & Unfair Competition

See N.J. Stat. Ann. § 56:9-3.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN10[] Regulated Practices, Trade Practices & Unfair Competition

See N.J. Stat. Ann. § 56:9-18.

Counsel: Toner, Dibenedetto & Schiffenhaus, By: John F. Crane, Esq., Roseland, New Jersey, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

Smith, Stratton, Wise, Heher & Brennan, By: William J. Brennan, III, Esq., Suzanne M. McSorley, Esq., Princeton, New Jersey, Attorneys for Defendant, Steelite, Inc.

Gary J. Langer, Esq., New York, New York, Attorney for Defendant, Oxhandler Structural Enterprises, Inc.

Judges: Wolin, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: WOLIN

Opinion

[*408] WOLIN, United States District Judge.

In this antitrust action defendant Steelite, Inc. renews its motion for partial summary judgment on Counts One and Four of the Complaint based on the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988). For the following reasons defendant's motion is granted.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

A. The Parties

Defendant Steelite, Inc. ("Steelite") is a Pennsylvania corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of materials for the construction industry. Specifically, Steelite manufactures roll-formed metal roofing and siding panels which are generally used in the construction of warehouses, manufacturing plants and other commercial or industrial facilities. Steelite also manufactures ventilation [2] equipment for such facilities and resells the fasteners and other equipment needed to install its roofing and siding panels.

Defendant Oxhandler Structural Enterprises, Inc. ("Oxhandler") is a construction contractor engaged primarily in the business of packaging and providing the labor, material and engineering services necessary to erect both the structural components of buildings and the exterior finishes for such structures. Oxhandler has been an authorized dealer-erector of Steelite's building materials since the mid-1970's.

Plaintiff Corrosion Resistant Materials Co. ("CRMC") is a dealer engaged in the business of buying, selling and distributing corrosion resistant building materials. Between 1977 and September 20, 1983 (at which point Steelite terminated its relationship with CRMC), CRMC was an authorized distributor of Steelite's roll-formed metal roofing and siding panels.

B. The Steelite Distribution and Marketing System

Steelite sells its building materials through authorized distributors who fall into two categories: materials-only distributors, like CRMC, and dealer-erectors, like Oxhandler. The materials-only distributors, as their name suggests, provide material [3] (i.e., metal roofing and siding panels and fasteners) to their customers who, in turn, make other arrangements to install (i.e., "erect") the materials. On the other hand, dealer-erectors provide materials, labor, engineering services and/or installation expertise to their customers.

[*409] The ultimate consumers of Steelite products likewise fall roughly into two classes: those who are maintaining and/or repairing existing structures (the "maintenance" market) and those who are building new facilities (the "new construction" market). Although Steelite sells the same materials through its distributors in both the maintenance and the new construction markets, these materials are usually sold differently in each market.

In the maintenance market, Steelite materials are usually sold to the maintenance department of the owner of a commercial or industrial facility or to a contractor who has been awarded a maintenance or repair contract. In the new construction market, however, roofing and siding are usually sold on a competitive bid basis through architects and engineers to contractors. [1] In both the maintenance and the new construction markets, Steelite's sales representatives and its [4] distributors make every effort to identify pending or planned projects on which Steelite materials can be used and to persuade those responsible for the purchasing decision to choose Steelite products rather than products manufactured by one of Steelite's competitors.

C. Steelite's Pricing and Quotation Systems

Steelite periodically provides its distributors with price lists which set forth the price for standard Steelite products (i.e., standard base metals and gauges, profiles, colors and coatings) and it also directs distributors to consult Steelite's headquarters in Pittsburgh for pricing on engineered sales or for the price of "non-standard, non-stocked" items (i.e., items for which [5] Steelite does not ordinarily stock the raw materials or for which Steelite must schedule a special run at its mill).

As a general rule, when a project will require standard Steelite products only, Steelite distributors can prepare and submit bids to supply these materials without consulting Steelite. If the Steelite distributor is awarded a contract on such a project, said distributor need only place an order with Steelite for the necessary materials. However, those projects which require non-standard materials, engineering services or more than 100 squares of roofing or siding (one "square" is equal to 100 square feet) are treated differently. If the order is for more than 100 squares Steelite encourages, and for those orders involving engineered or non-standard materials it requires, the distributor to consult Steelite's Inside Sales Department or its Engineered Sales Department to obtain a price quotation.

The Steelite Inside Sales Department provides "unit price quotations" to Steelite distributors. A unit price quotation is the price quotation for a specified quantity of a particular material (that specification requires reference to the type and gauge of base metal, the profile [6] of the panel, the color, the coating, if any, and the finished lengths of the panels). The Engineered Sales Department, on the other hand, provides "engineered lump sum" price quotations to Steelite distributors. To obtain an engineered lump sum quotation from Steelite, the distributor must provide Steelite with the job construction and siding plans. These plans are reviewed by Steelite engineers who then prepare a price quotation based on determinations of the necessary materials required to complete a given job. [2]

Steelite will provide unit prices or engineered lump sum prices for any job. However, once a distributor requests an engineered price on a particular job, Steelite will not quote (or sell) at a price calculated purely on a unit price basis because, as already noted, the preparation of the engineered price in and of itself increases costs to Steelite.

[*410] D. The Termination of CRMC

CRMC began as a materials-only distributor of Steelite products in 1977. Sometime thereafter Steelite and CRMC entered into an oral distribution arrangement. Purportedly, this contract was terminable at will [7] by either party. Subsequently, the relationship between Steelite and CRMC began to deteriorate. [3]

The situation between Steelite and CRMC worsened when, in April 1983, three Steelite distributors (including CRMC and Oxhandler) submitted construction plans and specifications for an airplane hangar construction job (the "IBM Job") and asked Steelite to prepare an engineered lump sum price quotation for the siding required. On or about May 10, 1983, Steelite forwarded the price quotation to the appropriate distributors.

---

[1] As a result of this market structure, Steelite distributors must sometimes sell" Steelite products twice. First they must persuade the architect or engineer (who will specify which materials must be used on the job) to specify a Steelite product or an "approved equal" for the roofing or siding. Then, when the job is let for bids, the distributor must persuade the general contractor or its subcontractor that he should use a Steelite product and not an "approved equal" on the project.

[2] This quotation also reflects cost of engineering services provided by Steelite.

[3] According to Steelite, CRMC paid its bills late, placed unrealistic production demands on Steelite and generally abused Steelite personnel.

Lecesse Bros., the general contractor on the IBM Job, did not award the siding sub-contract to any of the Steelite distributors. Instead, Lecesse apparently awarded the siding contract to Independent Metal Systems, Inc. ("IMS"), which was not a Steelite distributor.

Subsequently, on or about July 28, 1983, Oxhandler called Steelite's Engineered Sales Department and told them that IMS had asked Oxhandler to provide Steelite materials for the IBM Job. Oxhandler requested that Steelite reprice its engineered lump sum quotation [8] by deducting certain auxiliary items. [4] It appears that on the same day, CRMC called Steelite's Inside Sales Department and requested a unit price quotation (as opposed to an engineered price quotation) on certain material for the "Independent Metals Job." [5]

Steelite soon discovered that CRMC had obtained both an engineered lump sum and a unit price on the same job. Basically, this was "the straw that broke the camel's back," and during the month of August 1983, Steelite made the decision to terminate CRMC's distributorship. Thus, on or about September 30, 1983, Steelite notified CRMC of its termination.

II. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On June 14, 1984, CRMC filed [9] a five count complaint against defendants Steelite, Oxhandler, Chris Anderson Erecting Co. [6] and John Doe Corp. The first count alleged violations by all defendants of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, and the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15. The second count claimed defendant Steelite violated the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13. The third count contends that the remaining defendants violated the Robinson-Patman Act. The fourth count alleges that all defendants violated the New Jersey Antitrust Law, N.J. Stat. Ann. 56:9-3. The fifth count avers that all defendants committed the common law tort of unlawful interference with plaintiff's business relationship.

On October 31, 1984, Steelite moved for summary judgment on count two of the complaint, which motion was subsequently withdrawn. Thereafter, CRMC moved for partial summary judgment as to liability but not damages on the first count only insofar as that count alleged a Sherman Act violation. Steelite also cross-moved for partial summary judgment as to the first, second and fourth counts. Oxhandler joined [10] with Steelite in defense against CRMC's partial summary judgment motion, but it did not join in Steelite's own motions for partial summary judgment. In an Opinion and Order dated May 1, 1986 (and filed as of May 2nd), Judge Barry denied both CRMC's motion for partial summary [*411] judgment and also Steelite's cross-motion for partial summary judgment as to the fourth count and the Sherman Act claims of the first count.

Presently, and in light of the Supreme Court's May 2, 1988 opinion in Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988), Steelite now renews its motion for summary judgment as to counts one and four of the complaint.

III. DISCUSSION

A. Summary Judgment Standard -- Matsushita

HN1[] Rule 56(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides, in pertinent part that "[a] party against whom a claim . . . is asserted . . . may, at any time, move with or without supporting affidavits for a summary judgment in the party's favor as to all or any part thereof." And upon receipt of such motion by the court, HN2[] Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(c) provides that:

---

[4] In light of Steelite's policy not to provide unit prices once it had quoted engineered prices, Oxhandler represents that it did not ask for unit prices on the IBM Job.

[5] The IBM Job was also known as the Independent Metals Job, and it appears that the Steelite employee who received the CRMC request had not worked on the Oxhandler engineered lump sum price quotation for the IBM Job, and thus did not recognize the material requested as material for a job in which Steelite had already quoted an engineered lump sum.

[6] Defendant Chris Anderson Erecting Co. was voluntarily dismissed by CRMC per Stipulation and Order dated August 8, 1985.

> The judgment sought shall be rendered forthwith if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, [11] and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law . . . .

HN3[] The moving party has the burden of establishing that there exists no genuine issue of material fact. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. 242, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). Once that burden is met, the opposing party "must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 1356, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986) (citations omitted) In particular, the non-moving party is required to set forth specific facts which show that a genuine issue exists; said party cannot rest upon the mere allegations or denials of its pleadings. Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. at 248, 106 S. Ct. at 2510. The Liberty Lobby Court also observed that HN4[] a dispute involving a material fact is "genuine" only "if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury would return a verdict for the non-moving party." Id. [7]

[12] Furthermore, in considering a summary judgment motion, all evidence submitted must be viewed in a light most favorable to the party opposing the motion. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 475 U.S. at 586, 106 S. Ct. at 1356-57. HN6[] Although the summary judgment hurdle is a difficult one to meet, in an antitrust suit it is by no means insurmountable:

> To survive a motion for summary judgment . . . a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of § 1 [of the Sherman Act] must present evidence 'that tends to exclude the possibility' that the alleged conspirators acted independently. [Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 1471, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984)]. Respondents in this case, in other words, must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents. See [First National Bank of Arizona v. Cities Service Co., 391 U.S. 253, 280, 88 S. Ct. 1575, 1588, 20 L. Ed. 2d 569 (1968)].

Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 475 U.S. at 586, 106 S. Ct. at 1357. But see Poller v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 368 U.S. 464, 473, 82 S. Ct. 486, 491, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458 (1962) (summary judgment should [13] be used sparingly in complex antitrust litigation).

B. The Initial Denial of Summary Judgment -- Cernuto

As already noted, defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Count 1 has previously [*412] been considered and denied by Judge Barry. See Corrosion Resistant Materials Company v. Steelite, Inc., Civil No. 84-2337, slip op. at 6-11 (D.N.J. 1986). [8] [15] Judge Barry, in denying defendant's motion, found that although there was no direct evidence of improper motives on the part of the defendant, there existed genuine issues of material fact whether a jury could infer a per se violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. Corrision Resistant Materials, slip op. at 9. [9] In [7] Accordingly, in Equimark Commercial Finance Co. v. C.I.T. Financial Services Corp., 812 F.2d 141 (3d Cir. 1987), the Third Circuit noted:

---

> HN5[] At the summary judgment stage, a 'judge's function is not himself to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter but to determine whether there is a genuine issue for trial.' . . . However, if the evidence is 'merely colorable' or is 'not significantly probative,' summary judgment may be granted . . . .

812 F.2d at 144 (quoting Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. at 248, 106 S. Ct. at 2511).

[8] Judge Barry also denied plaintiff's cross-motion for summary judgment on Count 1. She held that even if an inference of impermissible discrimination had occurred, plaintiff produced no evidence definitively establishing a per se conspiracy between defendants Steelite and Oxhandler. Corrosion Resistant Materials, slip op. at 5-6.

determining the standards for establishing a per se violation, Judge Barry relied on the Third Circuit's opinion in Cernuto, Inc. v. United Cabinet Corp., 595 F.2d 164 (3d Cir. 1979):

> Given the alleged anti-competitive and arguably horizontal impact of United's [i.e., the manufacturer's] decision, and given the price orientation of the alleged conspiracy, we cannot say that a per se violation of the [Sherman Act] may not be shown. If Cernuto [i.e., the terminated distributor] can prove at trial [14] that United, Lappin and Famous conspired to protect Famous [i.e., a non-terminated distributor] from price competition by Cernuto, and that United and Lappin terminated Cernuto at Famous' request and in pursuit of a price related end, then it can prevail on a price-fixing theory notwithstanding its failure to show any impact on competition [in the relevant product market].

Corrosion Resistant Materials, slip op. at 11 (quoting Cernuto, Inc. v. United Cabinet Corp., 595 F.2d at 170). The Cernuto court, although noting that proof of either defendant's unilateral marketing decision or that price was not the defendant's sole motivation would probably render the per se rule inappropriate, overturned the district court's grant of summary judgment because "in reviewing a grant of summary judgment - we must assume that the facts are otherwise." 595 F.2d at 170.

It is clear, therefore, that under the Cernuto formulation a plaintiff need not prove the existence of an agreement in order to avoid a defendant's motion for summary judgment. Even though a "mere coincidence of factors" or "mere evidence of an opportunity to conspire" would not withstand the scrutiny of a summary judgment motion under Cernuto, Judge Barry concluded that "some evidence of concerted action" would defeat such a motion. Corrosion Resistant Materials, slip op. at 10 (citing Tunis Bros. Co., Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 763 F.2d 1482 (3d Cir. 1985); Fragale & Sons Beverage Co. v. Dill, 760 F.2d 469 (3d Cir. 1985); Seaboard Supply Co. v. Congoleum Corp., 770 F.2d 367 (3d Cir. 1985)). Accordingly, Judge Barry held that a plaintiff could establish per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act simply by showing that the object of a conspiracy was the price-related [16] end of the elimination of a price-cutting competitor of a non-terminated distributor.

C. Defendant's Renewed Motion for Summary Judgment -- Business Electronics

In Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., the Supreme Court acknowledged that there existed:

> [A] conflict in the Courts of Appeals regarding the proper dividing line between the rule that vertical price restraints are illegal per se and the rule that vertical nonprice restraints are to be judged under the rule of reason.

U.S. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1517 (footnote omitted). On the one hand, the Fifth, Seventh, Eighth and Tenth Circuits applied the rule that in order to avail himself of the per se rule, a plaintiff must establish that between the manufacturer and dealer defendants there existed an "express or implied [*413] agree[ment] to set . . . prices at some level, though not a specific one." Id. at 1518 (citing Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 780 F.2d 1212, 1218 (5th Cir. 1986)). On the other hand, the Third and Ninth Circuits have disagreed; these circuits followed the rule that a plaintiff can prevail on a price-fixing theory on the lesser showing that defendants [17] acted in pursuit of a price-related end. See Business Electronics, U.S. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1517. The Supreme Court, in affirming the Fifth Circuit (and thereby effectively overruling the Third and Ninth Circuits), held that HN7[] "a vertical restraint is not illegal per se unless it includes some agreement on price or price levels." Id. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1524.

In light of the Supreme Court's holding in Business Electronics, defendant Steelite has renewed its motion for summary judgment for the reason that Cernuto, upon which Judge Barry relied, has been reversed. Business Electronics, U.S. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1517, n. 1. Steelite maintains that plaintiff cannot, as a matter of law, show that the contract or conspiracy between Steelite and Oxhandler included an express or implied agreement to maintain resale prices. In response, plaintiff contends that the reversal of Cernuto aside, the Business Electronics case did not impose a burden on the plaintiff to prove that an express agreement on price existed, but rather, that a plaintiff need only prove "an express or implied agreement to set resale prices at some level." U.S. [18] at , 108 S. Ct. at 1517.

---

[9] In arriving at this conclusion, Judge Barry placed strong emphasis on a series of letters in which defendant Steelite expressed concern as to competition between its distributors in the New York metropolitan area. See infra notes 10 and 11 (setting forth relevant portions of said letters).

D. Vertical Restraints of Trade -- GTE Sylvania, Monsanto and Business Electronics

HN8[] Vertical agreements on resale prices are per se illegal. Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502 (1911). Within the context of vertical nonprice restraints, however, the scope of per se illegality is much narrower Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977). This distinction is based on the Supreme Court's conclusion "that vertical nonprice restraints ha[ve] not been shown to have such a 'pernicious effect on competition' and to be so 'lack[ing] [in] . . . redeeming value' as to justify per se illegality." Business Electronics, U.S. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1519 (quoting GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S. at 58, 97 S. Ct. at 2561 (quoting Northern Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 78 S. Ct. 514, 518, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958))). Moreover, the Business Electronics court noted that:

> We have been solicitous to assure that the market-freeing effect of our decision in GTE Sylvania is not frustrated by related legal rules. In Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., [19] 465 U.S. 752, 763, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 1470, [79 L. Ed. 2d 775] (1984), which addressed the evidentiary showing necessary to establish vertical concerted action, we expressed concern that' i f an inference of such an agreement may be drawn from highly ambiguous evidence, there is considerable danger that the doctrin[e] enunciated in Sylvania . . . will be seriously eroded.' See also id., at 761, n. 6, 104 S. Ct. at 1469, n. 6. We eschewed adoption of an evidentiary standard that 'could deter or penalize perfectly legitimate conduct' or 'would create an irrational dislocation in the market' by preventing legitimate communication between a manufacturer and its distributors. Id. at 763, 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1470.

U.S. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1520.

Thus, in light of GTE, Sylvania, Monsanto, and most recently, Business Electronics, it is clear that in the instant case plaintiff must be able to point to some evidence that defendants Steelite and Oxhandler conspired to fix prices. In support of this assertion, plaintiff sets forth the following facts: (1) Oxhandler complained to Steelite that there were too many distributors in the New York metropolitan area and that materials-only distributors [20] were getting a "free ride" on Oxhandler's promotional efforts on Steelite's behalf in the new construction market; (2) Oxhandler's subsequent request for an exclusive distributorship of Steelite products in the metropolitan New York area; (3) a meeting, in May 1983, between Steelite and Oxhandler [*414] where representatives of each company met at Newark Airport to discuss Oxhandler's complaints; (4) a letter to Oxhandler memoralizing Steelite's policy of providing job names on certain price inquiries; [10] and (5) Steelite's termination of CRMC as a distributor. [11]

[21] It was essentially these facts, as applied under the Cernuto rule, that caused Judge Barry to determine that plaintiff may have been unlawfully terminated. However, even considering all of the above-noted facts, this Court notes that plaintiff has failed to allege, as required under Business Electronics, that Steelite in any way forced its

---

[10] In pertinent part, this letter provides

> In an effort to minimize competition with other Steelite distributors in your area, the following steps have been taken. Both [CRMC] and Long Island Tinsmith Corp. will be required to give Steelite's Inside Sales a job name on all inquiries over 100 squares.

Letter from Steelite to Oxhandler dated June 14, 1983 (Exhibit F to Plaintiff's Motion for Summary Judgment before Judge Barry).

[11] CRMC was terminated as of a letter dated September 20, 1983, which provides in pertinent part:

> Steelite has found that certain of its distributors are competing against each other with increasing frequency on the same jobs. This has resulted in confusion in the market place [sic] and a loss of business for Steelite and its distributors.

Letter from Steelite to CRMC (Exhibit B to plaintiff's Brief in Opposition to defendant's current Motion for Summary Judgment).

distributors to sell at a certain price level. Further, there is no allegation, or subsequent proof, of any Steelite/Oxhandler price agreement following the termination of CRMC, at which point Oxhandler became an exclusive dealer of Steelite products in the New York metropolitan area. [12] Thus, merely because Steelite terminated CRMC, even if due to an agreement with Oxhandler, CRMC has failed to establish the existence of any genuine issue of fact such that summary judgment may now be avoided. To hold otherwise in the instant case, in light of Business Electronics, "would threaten to dismantle the doctrine of GTE Sylvania." U.S. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1521.

[22] Finally, this Court notes that plaintiff's argument that plaintiff intends to establish a violation of the Sherman Act by introducing at trial circumstantial evidence as to an implied agreement between Steelite and Oxhandler clearly runs counter to the logic, and indeed the law, of Business Electronics. The Supreme Court acknowledged that:

> Any agreement between a manufacturer and a dealer to terminate another dealer who happens to have charged lower prices can be alleged to have been directed against the terminated dealer's "price cutting." In the vast majority of cases, it will be extremely difficult for the manufacturer to convince a jury that its motivation was to ensure adequate services, since price cutting and some measure of service cutting go hand in hand.

U.S. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1521. Further, the Court recognized that:

> [A] manufacturer that agrees with one dealer to terminate another for failure to provide contractually-obligated services, exposes itself to the highly plausible claim that its real motivation was to terminate a price cutter.

Id.

Despite these inherent "risks," however, the Business Electronics Court did not agree with [23] "the proposition that vertical price agreements generally underlie agreements to terminate a price cutter [because] that proposition is simply incompatible with the conclusions of GTE Sylvania and Monsanto." Id. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1523. Moreover, the Court noted that the concept of eliminating a "free-rider," as noted in GTE Sylvania and Monsanto, actually accomplishes a beneficial economic result. U.S. at , 108 S. Ct. at 1522-23. Accordingly, in light of the fact that plaintiff [*415] does not make the factual showing necessary to support the inference of an agreement to set prices, either express or implied, defendant's motion for summary judgment as to Count 1 of the Complaint must be granted. [13]

E. State Law Claims

HN9[🡅] The New Jersey Antitrust Act, N.J.Stat.Ann. § 56:9-3, provides that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, [24] or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce, in this State, shall be unlawful." HN10[🡅] Moreover, Section 56:9-18 of the Act provides that it "shall be construed in harmony with ruling judicial interpretations of comparable Federal antitrust statutes and to effectuate, insofar as practicable, uniformity in the laws of those states which enact it." See also Pomanowski v. Monmouth County Board, 89 N.J. 306, 312-13, 446 A.2d 83 (1982) (federal caselaw under Sherman Act useful for developing analytical framework for restraint-of-trade question under New Jersey Antitrust Act).

---

[12] In an attempt to address this deficiency, plaintiff moved to amend the Final Pre-Trial Order by including the following paragraph:

> (W) This agreement between Steelite and Oxhandler to terminate plaintiff included an implied understanding that Oxhandler would set its prices at a level satisfactory to Steelite.

This motion was denied at oral argument, however, in light of plaintiff's failure to show "manifest unjustice". Ely v. Reading Co., 424 F.2d 758, 764 (3d Cir. 1970).

[13] In passing, this Court also notes that John Grochowski, CRMC's president, acknowledged that Steelite had never placed any price restrictions on CRMC and also that he had no knowledge as to any possible agreement between Steelite and Oxhandler. See Exhibit A to McSorley Affidavit dated June 2, 1988.

Thus, in light of the fact that plaintiff does not challenge the articulated policy that the New Jersey Antitrust Act should be interpreted "in harmony" with the interpretations of the Sherman Act, this Court is similarly constrained to grant summary judgment in favor of defendant as to Count 4 of the Complaint. See Glasofer Motors v. Osterlund, Inc., 180 N.J. Super. 6, 23, 433 A.2d 780 (App. Div. 1981) (no per se rule applied to vertical nonprice restrictions).

IV. CONCLUSION

In light of the fact that Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp. appears to overturn Cernuto, Inc. v. United Cabinet Corp., and for all [25] of the reasons above-noted, defendant Steelite, Inc.'s motion for summary judgment as to Counts 1 and 4 of the Complaint is hereby GRANTED. As noted by plaintiff, Count 5 (unlawful interference with a business relationship) still remains at issue and the parties shall proceed to trial thereon as of August 22, 1988.

An appropriate order shall issue.

Dated: July 19, 1988

ORDER DISMISSING COUNTS I AND IV OF THE COMPLAINT

This matter having been opened to the Court by Smith, Stratton, Wise, Heher & Brennan, attorneys for defendant, Steelite, Inc. ("Steelite") (William J. Brennan, III, Esq., appearing), upon notice to Kuttner, Toner & DiBenedetto, attorneys for plaintiff, Corrosion Resistant Materials Co. (John F. Crane, Esq., appearing), on motion for an Order pursuant to Rule 56(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure entering summary judgment in favor of Steelite on Counts I and IV of the Complaint, and the Court having heard the argument of counsel, and having considered the papers presented to the Court, and good cause having been shown,

IT IS, on this 19th day of July, 1988:

ORDERED, that the motion of defendant Steelite, Inc. for summary judgment on Counts I and IV of the Complaint [26] be and hereby is granted; and it is further ORDERED, that Counts I and IV of the Complaint be and hereby are dismissed with prejudice.

LexisNexis®

Winter Hill Frozen Foods & Services, Inc. v. Haagen-Dazs Co.

United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts

July 19, 1988, Decided

Civil Action No. 88-0009-XX

Reporter
691 F. Supp. 539 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8019 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,182

WINTER HILL FROZEN FOODS AND SERVICES, INC., Plaintiff, v. THE HAAGEN-DAZS COMPANY, INC., THE PILLSBURY CO., INC., PAUL'S DISTRIBUTORS, INC., DAIRI FARMS, INC., INTERNATIONAL ICE CREAM CORP., and B & K DISTRIBUTORS, INC., Defendants

Core Terms

manufacturer, ice cream, distributors, products, market power, sales, Sherman Act, frozen food, termination, vertical, effects, unreasonable restraint, summary judgment, rule of reason, market share, defendants', competitor, retailers, asserts, genuine, prices, summary judgment motion, anti trust law, anticompetitive, nonprice, unfair

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Discovery > Methods of Discovery > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

HN1[] Discovery, Methods of Discovery

Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, the party seeking summary judgment must inform the court of the basis of its motion and identify those portions of the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, which demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Discovery > Methods of Discovery > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Methods of Discovery > Interrogatories > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN2[] Summary Judgment, Supporting Materials

Where the nonmoving party will bear the burden of proof on an issue at trial, Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e) requires the nonmoving party to go beyond the pleadings and by her own affidavits, or by the depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, designate specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.

Civil Procedure > ... > Discovery > Methods of Discovery > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

HN3[] Discovery, Methods of Discovery

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c).

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > Affidavits

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Supporting Materials > General Overview

HN4[] Supporting Materials, Affidavits

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN5[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

HN6[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

See Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93, § 4 (1984).

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

HN7[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

A manufacturer generally has a right to deal, or refuse to deal, with whomever it likes, as long as it does so independently.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN8[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

A mere unilateral refusal to deal, without more, is not cognizable under § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN9[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

When the manufacturer's actions go beyond mere announcement of his policy and the simple refusal to deal, and he employs other means which effect adherence to his resale prices, the countervailing consideration, the right of the manufacturer to decide with whom to deal, is not present and therefore he has put together a combination in violation of the Sherman Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

HN10[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

The boundary separating the Colgate doctrine - the simple unilateral refusal to deal - from the non-simple unilateral refusal to deal is the presence of a contract, combination, or conspiracy, that is, either an express, implied or tacit agreement among two or more parties, or an involuntary acquiescence to one party's trade restraining policy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > US Federal Trade Commission Actions > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Violations

HN11[] Public Enforcement, US Federal Trade Commission Actions

Where a manufacturer's refusal to deal either promotes or enforces a trade policy which is unreasonable per se, the manufacturer's refusal is a per se violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN12[] Sherman Act, Claims

Even where such a combination contract or conspiracy exists, there is not necessarily a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. The complainant must still prove that the manufacturer's policy constitutes an unlawful restraint of trade.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

HN13[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

There is a distinction between a non-simple unilateral refusal to deal and a concerted refusal to deal, which is also known as a "group boycott." A concerted refusal to deal is defined as an agreement by two or more persons not to do business with other individuals, or to do business with them only on specified terms. Direct evidence of an explicit agreement that restricts dealing with a third party is not necessary for finding "concerted action."

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN14[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Horizontal Refusals to Deal

Evidence of a contract, combination or conspiracy does not, without more, violate § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. Rather, there must be compelling proof that the refusal to deal was motivated by anticompetitive purposes, or will produce an anticompetitive effect.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Nonprice Restraints

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > Antitrust Issues

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN15[] Vertical Restraints, Nonprice Restraints

Regardless whether a combination or conspiracy between a manufacturer and its dealer exists, the court must analyze whether a particular trade policy or practice imposes an unreasonable restraint on competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > Memoranda in Opposition

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

HN16[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Where the plaintiff does not allege any agreements or practices which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use, the per se rules do not apply.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN17[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Under the rule of reason, the true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; and the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN18[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The fact-finder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > Antitrust Issues

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Nonprice Restraints

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > General Overview

HN19[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In the context of distributorship/dealership terminations, manufacturers are generally permitted a wide latitude to discontinue relationships with distributors, to determine the profile of its distributorship, and to otherwise establish vertical nonprice restraints.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > Antitrust Issues

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Termination > General Overview

HN20[] Sherman Act, Claims

A plaintiff asserting that a distributorship termination violates § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, must present facts proving that competition has been injured rather than merely a competitor.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Nonprice Restraints

HN21[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Where there are vertical nonprice restraints, a threshold inquiry in rule of reason analysis is whether the defendant has market power.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN22[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Market power is often defined as the power to raise prices significantly above the competitive level without losing all of one's business, and market power is often inferred from the control of a substantial percentage of the sales in a market carefully defined in terms of both product and geography.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN23[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In the context of evaluating whether a particular competitor has market power, the competitor's declining market share is evidence that such competitor lacks such power, although it is not dispositive.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN24[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Under the rule of reason inquiry, the court must compare the negative effects of the restraint on intrabrand and interbrand competition, if any, with any alleged positive effects on interbrand competition stemming from the restraints.

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Prospective Advantage > General Overview

Torts > Business Torts > Commercial Interference > General Overview

HN25[] Commercial Interference, Prospective Advantage

To establish a claim for interference with advantageous business relations, the plaintiff must show: (1) a business relationship or contemplated contract of economic benefit; (2) the defendant's knowledge of such relationship; (3) the defendant's intentional and malicious interference with it; (4) the plaintiff's loss of advantage directly resulting from the defendant's conduct. Such conduct must have been done without justification. Justification is established when (a) the actor has an economic interest in the matter with reference to which he wishes to influence the policy of the other, (b) the desired policy does not unlawfully restrain trade, and (c) the means employed are not wrongful.

Torts > Business Torts > Unfair Business Practices > General Overview

HN26[] Business Torts, Unfair Business Practices

In considering whether a plaintiff has established a claim for unfair practice under Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93A, the court must consider: (1) whether the practice is within at least the penumbra of some common-law, statutory, or other established concept of unfairness; (2) whether it is immoral, unethical, oppressive, or unscrupulous; (3) whether it causes substantial injury to consumers, competitors, or other businessmen.

Counsel: [1] James C. Donnelly, Jr., Robert L. Hamer, Joan O. Vorster, Mirick, O'Connell, DeMallie & Lougee, Worcester, Massachusetts

Lawrence G. Green, Neill E. Silverman, Perkins, Smith, Arata & Howard, Boston, Massachusetts

Local Counsel: Philip J. MacCarthy, Worcester, Massachusetts

Richard Wegener, The Pillsbury Company, Minneapolis, Minnesota

William Miller, Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, San Fransisco, California

Stanley Gorrinson, Washington, District of Columbia

Stanley Rudman, Dana Rodin, Rubin & Rudman, Boston, Massachusetts

Judges: William G. Young, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: YOUNG

Opinion

[*541] MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

WILLIAM G. YOUNG, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

Winter Hill Frozen Foods and Services, Inc. ("Winter Hill"), a frozen food distributor, brought this action against The Haagen-Dazs Company, Inc. ("Haagen-Dazs"), an ice cream manufacturer, The Pillsbury Co., Inc. ("Pillsbury"), the corporate parent of Haagen-Dazs, and the New England distributors of Haagen-Dazs products, [1] alleging that the defendants' refusal to sell Haagen-Dazs products to Winter Hill is an unlawful restraint of competition in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. sec. 1, and various state laws. This matter is presently before the Court on the motions by defendants Haagen-Dazs, Pillsbury, and International for summary judgment [2] pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 56.

I. BACKGROUND

The plaintiff Winter Hill, a Massachusetts corporation with a usual place of business in Westborough, Massachusetts, is engaged in the distribution of a full line of frozen food products to retailers in New England, New York and New Jersey ("the New England area"). Winter Hill carries approximately 1,900 frozen food items, 400 of which are ice cream products and frozen desserts. In the New England area, there are at least 189 other distributors of frozen foods.

The defendant Haagen-Dazs, a New Jersey corporation with a usual place of business in Woodbright, New Jersey, manufactures ice cream and frozen desserts products including Haagen-Dazs brand ice cream, which are distributed nationally via company-owned and selected independent distributors. Haagen-Dazs is a wholly owned subsidiary of the defendant Pillsbury, a Delaware corporation with a principal place of business in Minneapolis, [3] Minnesota.

The defendants Paul's, Dairi Farms, International and B & K are independent authorized distributors of Haagen-Dazs products in the New England area. Although Dairi Farms and International also carry some non-dessert frozen foods, these four defendants are primarily ice cream distributors. In addition to these four distributors, Haagen-Dazs also sells its ice cream to approximately 50 independent distributors in the New England area.

Beginning in 1983, Winter Hill purchased Haagen-Dazs ice cream products from the distributor B & K and then resold the ice cream to its customers; at that time, Winter Hill was not an authorized Haagen-Dazs distributor. In 1985, Haagen-Dazs undertook to identify and correct various weaknesses in its distribution system, including those instances where its product was being sold to frozen food or warehouse distributors. [2] At this time, Haagen-Dazs

---

[1] These distributors and co-defendants are Paul's Distributors, Inc. ("Paul's"), Dairi Farms, Inc. ("Dairi Farms"), International Ice Cream, Inc. ("International"), and B & K Distributors, Inc. ("B & K")(collectively, the "New England distributors.").

[2] Haagen-Dazs states that it does not want its product distributed by frozen food or warehouse distributors whose primary stake is in products other than ice cream. Affidavit of James E. Richards at 2. It thereby seeks to maintain the focus of the independent distributor on the Haagen-Dazs product and thus to secure the greatest amount of freezer space for the product. Id.

learned that B & K was selling the Haagen-Dazs product to Winter Hill, but it believed that Winter Hill's sales of ice cream were minor and only to military purchasers. Affidavit of Michael L. Baily at 10.

[4] [*542] After learning the extent of Winter Hill's sales to the military, Haagen-Dazs decided that B & K should not continue to supply ice cream to Winter Hill, and on August 1, 1987, Haagen-Dazs wrote B & K requesting that it discontinue sales to Winter Hill effective October 1, 1987. B & K's sales of Haagen-Dazs to Winter Hill ended on November 30, 1987.

Paul's, Dairi Farms and International have never sold -- and have refused to sell -- Haagen-Dazs ice cream to Winter Hill.

On January 20, 1988, Winter Hill brought this action against the named defendants to preliminarily enjoin these defendants' refusal to deal with, and to sell Haagen-Dazs products to, Winter Hill. In the complaint, Winter Hill alleges:

1) the agreement between Haagen-Dazs and its distributors to refuse sales of Haagen-Dazs products to Winter Hill is an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. sec. 1 ("Count I");

2) the agreement between Haagen-Dazs and its New England distributors to refuse sales of Haagen-Dazs products to Winter Hill is an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93, sec. 4 ("Count II");

3) Haagen-Dazs' conduct constitutes a tortious [5] interference with Winter Hill's contractual relations and advantageous business relationships with its existing customers ("Count III"); and

4) Haagen-Dazs' conduct constitutes unfair acts or business practices in violation of Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93A, secs. 2 and 11 ("Count IV").

On February 16, 1988, the Court denied Winter Hill's motion for preliminary injunction without prejudice, and denied Haagen-Dazs' and Pillsbury's motion to dismiss the complaint on February 22, 1988. Defendants Haagen-Dazs, Pillsbury, and International now move the Court, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c), for summary judgment on the grounds that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that they are entitled to judgment as matter of law.

II. DISCUSSION

HN1[] Pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, [3] the party seeking summary judgment must inform the court of the basis of its motion and identify those portions of "the pleadings, depositions, answers to

---

Apparently, this battle for the limited amount of freezer space is an important element of distributing ice cream in the highly competitive frozen food and frozen desserts business. See Affidavit of Michael L. Baily at 4. Mr. Baily, vice president, sales, of Haagen-Dazs, explained:

> All products that occupy freezer space compete for that space. Ice creams compete against frozen pizza and vegetables. Only the winners -- in terms of consumer takeaway -- are awarded adequate shelf space. . .
>
> . . . Haagen-Dazs believes the frozen foods distributor has a substantially greater conflict of interest -- if he fights for additional space for ice cream, he has to give up space that is occupied by the other frozen foods he sells.

Id. at 5-6.

Moreover, Haagen-Dazs asserts that it prefers to have its distributors sell only to retail accounts, not to subdistributors, because Haagen-Dazs has no contractual or other control over subdistributors. Id. at 9.

[3] Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 provides, in relevant part:

> . . .

interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any," which demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). HN2[] Where, [6] however, the nonmoving party will bear the burden of proof on an issue at trial, "Rule 56(e) . . . requires the nonmoving party to go beyond the pleadings and by her own affidavits, or by the 'depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file,' designate 'specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.'" Id. at 324; see Moody v. Maine Central R.R. Co., 823 F.2d 693, 694 (1st Cir. 1987); Jako v. Pilling Co., 670 F. Supp. 1074, 1076 (D. Mass.1987), vacated and rev'd in part, 848 F.2d 318 (1st Cir. June 8, 1988). [*543] Cf. Hahn v. Sargent, 523 F.2d 461, 464 (1st Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 904, 47 L. Ed. 2d 754, 96 S. Ct. 1495 (1976)(nonmovant must establish by substantial evidence the existence of an issue of fact that is both genuine and material).

[7] A. Counts I and II -- The Alleged Antitrust Violations.

Winter Hill asserts that the agreement between Haagen-Dazs and its distributors to refuse to sell Haagen-Dazs products to Winter Hill is an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of both Section 1 of the Sherman Act, [4] 15 U.S.C. sec. 1, and Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93, sec. 4. [5] In order to survive this motion for summary judgment, Winter Hill must establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the defendants entered into an illegal conspiracy that caused Winter Hill to suffer a cognizable injury. See Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 585-86, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). Winter Hill asserts that the material issues of disputed fact are the following: 1) whether Haagen-Dazs has gone beyond the "mere announcement of a policy" and "simple refusal to deal;" 2) whether Haagen-Dazs has achieved "market power," i.e., the ability to set prices which are higher than the competition without losing the ability to sell its products; 3) whether the vertical restriction against sales to Winter Hill is harmful to competition either at the interbrand or intrabrand level, and 4) whether

---

> HN3[] (c) Motion and Proceedings Thereon. . . . The judgment sought shall be rendered forthwith if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.
>
> . . .
>
> HN4[] (e) Form of Affidavits; Further Testimony; Defense Required. Supporting and opposing affidavits shall be made on personal knowledge, shall set forth such facts as would be admissible in evidence, and shall affirmatively that the affiant is competent to testify to the matters stated therein. . . . The court may permit affidavits to be supplemented or opposed by depositions, answers to interrogatories, or further affidavits. When a motion for summary judgment is made and supported as provided in this rule, an adverse party may not rest upon the mere allegations or denials of the adverse party's pleading, but the adverse party's response, by affidavits or as otherwise provided in this rule, must set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. If the adverse party does not so respond, summary judgment, if appropriate, shall be entered against the adverse party.

[4] Section 1 provides, in relevant part:

> HN5[] Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal.

15 U.S.C. sec. 1 (1982).

[5] Section 4 of the Massachusetts Antitrust Act provides:

> HN6[] Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce in the commonwealth shall be unlawful.

Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 93, sec. 4 (West 1984). This statute is construed in harmony with Section 1 of the Sherman Act, and the same principles and analysis under the federal claim apply to this particular state law claim. See Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 93, sec. 1 (West 1984). Therefore, Winter Hill's state antitrust claims are subsumed by this discussion of federal antitrust law.

[8] such harm to competition outweighs any benefit resulting from the restriction. Winter Hill's Memorandum in Opposition to Defendants' Motions for Summary Judgment at 2-3 (hereinafter "Winter Hill's Memorandum in Opposition to Summary Judgment"). On Counts I and I, Winter Hill does not succeed.

1. The Refusal to Deal.

It is a well established [9] principle of antitrust law that HN7[] "[a] manufacturer . . . generally has a right to deal, or refuse to deal, with whomever it likes, as long as it does so independently." Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984)(citing United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992 [1919]) and United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29, 80 S. Ct. 503, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505 [1960]). The Colgate Court explained:

> The purpose of the Sherman Act is to prohibit monopolies, contracts and combinations which probably would unduly interfere with the free exercise of their rights by those engaged, or who wish to engage, in trade and commerce -- in a word to preserve the right of freedom to trade. In the absence of any purpose to create or maintain a monopoly, the act does not restrict the long recognized right of trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal. And, of course, he may announce in advance the circumstances under which he will refuse to sell.

250 U.S. at 307. Therefore, HN8[] a mere unilateral refusal to deal, without more, is not [10] cognizable under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. See, e.g., Parke, Davis, 362 U.S. at 37; Fuchs Sugars & Syrups, Inc. v. Amstar Corp., 602 F.2d 1025, 1033 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 917, 62 L. Ed. 2d 172, 100 S. Ct. 232 [*544] (1979); Butera v. Sun Oil Co., 496 F.2d 434, 437 n.7 (1st Cir. 1974).

All refusals to deal, however, are not beyond the reach of the antitrust laws. The Supreme Court has explicitly ruled that

> HN9[] When the manufacturer's actions, as here, go beyond mere announcement of his policy and the simple refusal to deal, and he employs other means which effect adherence to his resale prices, this countervailing consideration [the right of the manufacturer to decide with whom to deal] is not present and therefore he has put together a combination in violation of the Sherman Act.

Parke, Davis, 362 U.S. at 44. HN10[] The boundry separating the Colgate doctrine -- the simple unilateral refusal to deal -- from the non-simple unilateral refusal to deal is the presence of a "contract, combination, or conspiracy:" that is, either an express, implied or tacit agreement among two or more parties, or an involuntary acquiescence to one party's trade restraining policy. See generally [11] 2 Kinter Federal Antitrust Law sec. 10.22 at 137 (1980). [6] [12] In this context, the Supreme Court has ruled repeatedly that HN11[] where a manufacturer's refusal to deal either promotes or enforces a trade policy which is unreasonable per se, the manufacturer's refusal is a per se violation of Section 1. E.g., Federal Trade Comm'n v. Beech-Nut Packing Co., 257 U.S. 441, 42 S. Ct. 150, 66 L. Ed. 307 (1922)(holding that a company's refusal to deal with those dealers who did not observe resale prices violated Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act); United States v. Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., 321 U.S. 707, 723, 64 S. Ct. 805, 88 L. Ed. 1024 (1944)(holding that "more . . . than mere acquiescence of wholesalers" to a resale price maintenance scheme constituted a violation of Section 1); Parke, Davis, 362 U.S. 29, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505, 80 S. Ct. 503 (ruling that when a manufacturer goes beyond the mere announcement of a pricing policy [i.e., having the wholesalers terminate the sales to those retailers who do not abide by the policy], an unlawful combination in violation of Section 1 exists). [7]

---

[6] Yet, HN12[] even where such a "combination contract or conspiracy" exists, there is not necessarily a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act; the complainant must still prove that the manufacturer's policy constitutes an unlawful restraint of trade. See 2 Kinter Federal Antitrust Law sec. 10.20 at 133.

[7] The Court notes that HN13[] there is a distinction between a non-simple unilateral refusal to deal and a concerted refusal to deal, which is also known as a "group boycott." See Horsley, Per Se Illegality and Concerted Refusals to Deal, 13 B.C. Indus. & Com. L. Rev. 484 (1972). A concerted refusal to deal is defined as "an agreement by two or more persons not to do business

HN14[] Evidence of "a contract, combination or conspiracy," however, does not, without more, violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act. See, e.g., A. H. Cox & Co. v. Star Machinery Co., 653 F.2d 1302, 1305-06 (9th Cir. 1981) (Kennedy, J.); Muenster Butane, Inc. v. Stewart Co., 651 F.2d 292, 298 (5th Cir. Unit A, July, 1981); Fuchs Sugar, 602 F.2d at 1030. Rather, there must be compelling proof [13] that the refusal to deal was motivated by anticompetitive purposes, or will produce an anticompetitive effect. See, e.g., Oreck Corp. v. Whirlpool Corp., 579 F.2d 126, 133 (2d Cir.)(en banc), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 946, 99 S. Ct. 340, 58 L. Ed. 2d 338 (1978) ("Something more than an agreement between [a manufacturer and a distributor] must be shown. The agreement becomes violative of Section 1 of the Sherman Act only if it is anticompetitive in purpose and effect -- in sum, it must be tested by the rule of reason.") (emphasis in original); Westman Comm'n Co. v. Hobart Int'l, Inc., 796 F.2d 1216, 1223 (10th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 486 U.S. 1005, 108 S. Ct. 1728, 100 L. Ed. 2d 192 (1988); cf. Local Beauty Supply, Inc. v. Lamaur, Inc., 787 F.2d 1197, 1200 (7th Cir. 1986)(holding that otherwise lawful non-price mechanism agreements between a manufacturer and a distributor may be rendered per se unlawful [*545] if imposed as part of an illegal scheme to fix prices). Therefore, HN15[] regardless whether a combination or conspiracy between a manufacturer and its dealer exists, this Court's analysis is based upon the fundamental premise of antitrust law: whether a particular trade policy or practice [14] imposes an unreasonable restraint on competition. [8] [15] More precisely, the central issue in this case is whether a manufacturer's termination of an unauthorized distributor constitutes an unreasonable restraint on competition. [9] The Court rules that it does not.

2. Distributorship/Dealership Terminations.

HN17[] Under the Rule of Reason, the standard for lawful trade practices has been described as follows:

> The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine [16] that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is with other individuals, or to do business with them only on specified terms." Note, Concerted Refusals to Deal Under the Federal Antitrust Laws, 71 Harv. L. Rev. 1531 (1958). Although direct evidence of an explicit agreement that restricts dealing with a third party is not necessary for finding "concerted action," this Court cannot find sufficient evidence of a "boycott" in this particular case.

[8] This Court, therefore, need not address the issue of whether there exists a "contract, combination or conspiracy" between Haagen-Dazs and the New England distributors in the present case.

If, however, this Court were to decide this issue, there must be "something more than evidence of complaints [from the nonterminated distributors] . . . there must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the manufacturers and nonterminated distributors were acting independently." Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984); see Bruce Drug, Inc. v. Hollister, Inc., 688 F.2d 853, 856-57 (1st Cir. 1982). "The antitrust plaintiff should present direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the manufacturer and others 'had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.'" 465 U.S. at 764 (quoting Edward J. Sweeney & Sons, Inc. v. Texaco, Inc., 637 F.2d 105, 111 [3d Cir. 1980], cert. denied, 451 U.S. 911, 68 L. Ed. 2d 300, 101 S. Ct. 1981 [1981]). Moreover, the plaintiff must present evidence "both that the distributor communicated its acquiescence or agreement, and that this was sought by the manufacturer." Id. at 764 n.9. Furthermore, the finding that an unlawful conspiracy exists cannot be supported by the mere fact that the court determines that the business reasons for certain trade practices are pretextual. See Bruce Drug, 688 F.2d at 857. Applying these evidentiary standards to the case at bar, it does not appear that Winter Hill has presented sufficient evidence to support the finding of a conspiracy; the Court, however, does not rule on this particular issue.

[9] Winter Hill concedes that this case is governed by the "Rule of Reason," not the per se rules of antitrust illegality. See Winter Hill's Memorandum in Opposition to Defendants' Motions for Summary Judgment at 14 (hereinafter, "Winter Hill's Memorandum in Opposition to Summary Judgment"). HN16[] Since Winter Hill does not allege any "agreements or practices which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use," Northern Pacific Ry. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958), the per se rules do not apply. See Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 49-50, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977).

> applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts.

Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 49 n.15, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977)(quoting Chicago Bd. of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 38 S. Ct. 242, 62 L. Ed. 683 [1918] [Brandeis, J.]). Simply, HN18[] "the fact-finder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition." Continental T.V., 433 U.S. at 49 (footnote omitted).

HN19[] In the context of distributorship/dealership terminations, manufacturers are generally permitted a wide latitude to discontinue relationships with distributors, to determine the profile of its distributorship, and to otherwise establish vertical nonprice restraints. See, e.g., Chandler Supply Co. v. GAF Corp., 650 F.2d 983, 989 (9th [17] Cir. 1980) (manufacturer [*546] was dissatisfied with the franchisee's service); Edward J. Sweeny & Sons, 637 F.2d at 110 (franchisee's service stations had produced a number of customer complaints); White v. Hearst Corp., 669 F.2d 14, 18-19 (1st Cir. 1982)(manufacturer had decided to establish an in-house method of distribution). The policy for allowing manufacturers to establish certain vertical nonprice restraints is basic: such restrictions may have pro-competitive effects. Addressing the manufacturer's decision to impose vertical nonprice restraints, the Supreme Court stated:

> New manufacturers and manufacturers entering new markets can use the restrictions in order to induce competent and aggressive retailers to make the kind of investment of capital and labor that is often required in the distribution of products unknown to the consumer. Established manufacturers can use them to induce retailers to engage in promotional activities or to provide service and repair facilities necessary to the efficient marketing of their products. Service and repair are vital for many products. . . . The availability and quality of such services affect a manufacturer's goodwill and the competitiveness [18] of his product. Because of market imperfections such as the so-called 'free-rider' effect, these services might not be provided by retailers in a purely competitive situation, despite the fact that each retailer's benefit would be greater if all provided the services than if none did.

Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 1519-20, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988)(quoting Continental T.V., 433 U.S. at 55). The Supreme Court, in Continental T.V., explained that, although vertical restrictions reduce intrabrand competition by limiting the number of sellers of a particular product, "vertical restrictions promote interbrand competition by allowing the manufacturer to achieve certain efficiencies in the distribution of his products." [10] 433 U.S. at 54. Therefore, HN20[] a plaintiff asserting that a distributorship termination violates Section 1 of the Sherman Act must present facts proving that competition has been injured rather than merely a competitor. Rutman Wine Co. v. E. & J. Gallo Winery, 829 F.2d 729, 734 (9th Cir. 1987). In this regard, it must be stressed that the antitrust laws were not established for the protection of a [19] particular competitor, rather the protection of competition. See Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977). Under the rule of reason analysis, Winter Hill's antitrust claims cannot survive the defendants' motions for summary judgment on the ground that, as matter of law, there is not sufficient evidence establishing the existence of antitrust injury.

---

[10] The Continental T.V. Court further noted that market efficiency is not the only permissible reason for a manufacturer to exercise control over the sales and servicing of a product. 433 U.S. at 55 n.23. "As a result of statutory and common-law developments, society increasingly demands that manufacturers assume direct responsibility for the safety and quality of their products. . . . The legitimacy of these concerns has been recognized in cases involving vertical restrictions." Id. In the present case, Haagen-Dazs asserts that "ice cream requires more careful handling than other frozen foods. Because ice cream is perishable and sensitive to changes in temperatures, distribution involves a risk that the product may be mistreated." Affidavit of Michael L. Baily at 7. The Court thus acknowledges that the quality and safety of the product constitute a basis for vertical non-price restrictions.

[20] First, Winter Hill asserts that Haagen-Dazs has market power in the super premium ice cream market, [11] and that such market [*547] power allows Haagen-Dazs to raise its prices above those of the competition. [12] Affidavit of Harold R. Rudnick at 2 (hereinafter, "Rudnick Aff. I"); Rudnick Aff. II at 5-9. HN21[] Where there are vertical nonprice restraints, some circuits have ruled that a threshold inquiry in rule of reason analysis is whether the defendant has market power. See, e.g., Assam Drug Co. v. Miller Brewing Co., 798 F.2d 311, 315-16 (8th Cir. 1986); Hennessy Indus. Inc. v. FMC Corp., 779 F.2d 402, 404-05 (7th Cir. 1985). HN22[] Market power is often defined as the "'power to raise prices significantly above the competitive level without losing all of one's business,'" Valley Liquors, Inc. v. Renfield Importers, Ltd., 822 F.2d 656, 666 (7th Cir. 1987)(quoting Valley Liquors, Inc. v. Renfield Importers, Ltd., 678 F.2d 742, 745 [7th Cir. 1982] [Valley I], cert, denied, 484 U.S. 977, 108 S. Ct. 488, 98 L. Ed. 2d 486 [1987]), and market power is often inferred from the control of a "'substantial percentage of the sales in a market carefully defined in terms of both product and geography.'" [21] Id. (quoting Valley I, 678 F.2d at 745). Based upon those facts that Winter Hill presented to this Court, there is insufficient evidence to raise a genuine issue of material fact regarding Haagen-Dazs' market power.

[22] Winter Hill asserts that Haagen-Dazs has a 43% market share of the super premium ice cream market in New England. [13] A 43% market share, however, does not alone establish that Haagen-Dazs has market power. See Nifty Foods Corp. v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 614 F.2d 832, 841 (2d Cir. 1980)(market share declining from 54.5% to 33% over five years insufficient to establish market power); Broadway Delivery Corp. v. United Parcel Service of America, Inc., 651 F.2d 122, 129 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 968, 102 S. Ct. 512, 70 L. Ed. 2d 384 (1981)(market share below 50% is rarely evidence of monopoly power). Cf. Graphic Prod. Distrib., Inc. v. Itek Corp., 717 F.2d 1560, 1570 (11th Cir. 1983)(70-75 per-cent market share constitutes sufficient evidence of market power). Moreover, HN23[] in the context of evaluating whether a particular competitor has market power, the competitor's declining market share is evidence that such competitor lacks such power, although it is not dispositive. See Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 273 n. 11 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1093, 100 S. Ct. 1061, 62 L. Ed. 2d 783 (1980). From the A. C. Nielson data regarding the [23] sales

---

[11] For the purposes of this opinion, super premium ice cream is defined as that ice cream containing all natural ingredients, with a higher butterfat and a lower air content than other ice creams. See Declaration of Jerry A. Hausman at 4; Affidavit of Harold R. Rudnick in Opposition to the Motion by the Pillsbury Company and the Haagen-Dazs Company, Inc. for Summary Judgment at 3 (hereinafter, "Rudnick Aff. II"). Furthermore, the super premium ice cream is sold only in pints and for prices which are higher than other ice creams. See Rudnick Aff. II at 3. In the New England area, the super premium ice cream market includes the following brands of ice cream: Haagen-Dazs, Frusen Gladje, Ben & Jerry's, and Steve's.

[12] As a preliminary matter, the Court does not decide the issue whether there in fact exists a separate market for super premium ice cream; rather, it assumes arguendo that such a market does exist.

If the Court were to decide this issue, the evidentiary burden falls on the plaintiff Winter Hill to establish a well-defined relevant market upon which anticompetitive actions had a substantial impact. See Kartell v. Blue Shield of Massachusetts, Inc., 582 F. Supp. 734, 742 (D. Mass. 1984), reversed and vacated in part on other grounds, 749 F.2d 922 (1st Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1029, 85 L. Ed. 2d 322, 105 S. Ct. 2040 (1985). To demonstrate the separate existence of a super premium ice cream submarket, Winter Hill must prove those submarket elements such as "industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors." Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962) (footnote omitted). Given these requisite factors for determining the existence of a submarket, this Court concludes that the two affidavits of Harold Rudnick would be insufficient to establish a distinct market for super premium ice cream. Moreover, in similar litigation filed in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, Judge Legge ruled that "all grades of ice cream compete for both retail shelf space and for consumers' attention," and there is not, therefore, a separate market for super premium ice cream. In re Super Premium Ice Cream Distribution Antitrust Litigation, 691 F. Supp. 1262, 1268 (N.D. Cal. June 23, 1988). The Court, however, does not decide this issue.

[13] Harold Rudnick, president of Winter Hill, asserts that the market shares of the super premium ice creams in New England from December, 1986 through November, 1987 are the following: Haagen-Dazs - 43%, Ben & Jerry's - 41%, Frusen Gladje - 8%, and Steve's - 8%. Rudnick Aff. II at 10. Haagen-Dazs, however, notes that in the October - November, 1987 reporting period, Haagen-Dazs' market share was only 39%, while Ben & Jerry's was 45%. Declaration of Jerry A. Hausman at 10.

of ice cream in New England, the Court notes that Haagen-Dazs' market share in [*548] the super premium ice cream market declined from 61% in 1985 to 50% in 1986 to 43% in 1987. See Exhibit E, Declaration of Jerry A. Hausman. Therefore, the data concerning both Haagen-Dazs' historical and current market shares demonstrates that Haagen-Dazs indeed lacks market power in the super premium ice cream market, [14] and thus would preclude the need to further balance the competitive effects of Haagen-Dazs' restraint under rule of reason analysis. See Assam Drug, 798 F.2d at 316.

[24] Regardless, however, of this Court's conclusion that Haagen-Dazs lacks market power, the Court further rules that Winter Hill has failed to prove that there are anti-competitive effects resulting from terminating sales of Haagen-Dazs products to Winter Hill. HN24[] Under the rule of reason inquiry, the Court must compare the negative effects of the restraint on intrabrand and interbrand competition, if any, with any alleged positive effects on interbrand competition stemming from the restraints. See Graphic Prods. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1571. Winter Hill asserts that the price of a pint of Haagen-Dazs ice cream at Pease Air Force Base near Portsmouth, New Hampshire, has increased from $ 1.49 to $ 1.60, and at Griffiss Air Force Base near Syracuse, New York, the price has risen from $ 1.49 to $ 1.70. Winter Hill's Memorandum in Opposition to Defendants' Motions for Summary Judgment at 26. Winter Hill also alleges that B & K approached Trucchi's Supermarket, a Winter Hill customer in Raynham, Massachusetts, and proposed to charge $ 12.50 per case of Haagen-Dazs ice cream, a 21% increase over Winter Hill's price of $ 10.29 per case. Id. In short, these isolated examples of price increases [25] in Haagen-Dazs ice cream products are insufficient to establish that there are anti-competitive effects resulting from Winter Hill's termination. Accordingly, this Court grants the motions for summary judgment of Haagen-Dazs, Pillsbury and International on the antitrust claims, Counts I and II.

B. Count III -- Interference with Advantageous Business Relations.

HN25[] As for this claim, Winter Hill must show "'(1) a business relationship or contemplated contract of economic benefit; (2) the defendant's knowledge of such relationship; (3) the defendant's intentional and malicious interference with it; (4) the plaintiff's loss of advantage directly resulting from the defendant's conduct.'" Comey v. Hill, 387 Mass. 11, 19, 438 N.E.2d 811 (1982)(quoting J. Nolan, Tort Law sec. 72, at 87 [1979]). Such conduct, however, must have been done without justification. Justification is established when "'(a) the actor has an economic interest in the matter with reference to which he wishes to influence the policy of the other and (b) the desired policy does not unlawfuly restrain trade . . . and (c) the means employed are not wrongful.'" Moffat v. Lane Co., 595 F. Supp. 43, 49 (D. Mass. 1984)(quoting [26] Restatement (Second) of Torts sec. 771 [1977]). Haagen-Dazs, Pillsbury and International have proved that 1) they have an economic interest in the matter, see Affidavit of Michael L. Baily (Haagen-Dazs [*549] and Pillsbury), Affidavit of Bruce C. Ginsberg (International), 2) the conduct does not unlawfully restrain trade, see Section II (A), supra, and 3) the conduct was not wrongful pursuant to Moffat, 595 F. Supp. at 49. Accordingly, the actions of the defendants Haagen-Dazs, Pillsbury and International were justifiable and, therefore, the Court grants their motions for summary judgment on Count III.

C. Count IV -- Unfair Competition.

---

[14] Winter Hill further contends that Haagen-Dazs' market power stems from its ability to raise prices above competitive levels without losing customers, and states, "Haagen-Dazs is the price leader and is usually sold in supermarkets at prices which are more than 10 cents per pint above the price of any other super premium ice cream. Special flavors are priced 10 to 15 cents higher than that." Rudnick Aff. II at 9. First, the Court questions Mr. Rudnick's conclusion that Haagen-Dazs is the price leader where Winter Hill's October 14, 1987 order guide contains the following suggested retail prices for 16-ounce packages of frozen desserts: Howard Johnson -- $ 1.79, Dole -- $ 1.98, Tofutti -- $ 2.79, Haagen-Dazs - $ 1.89, Frusen Gladje - $ 2.08, Mousse d'Jour - $ 1.99, and Steve's - $ 2.19. Affidavit of Michael L. Baily, Exhibit B. Second, and more importantly, this conclusory statement of the pricing differentials in the super premium ice cream market, which is not supported by specific factual data, is insufficient evidence that Haagen-Dazs is in fact the price leader in the market. Cf. United States v. Hall, 424 F. Supp. 508, 533-34 (W. D. Okla. 1975)(holding that a motion requesting a trial judge to disqualify himself and the affidavit in support thereof were insufficient in part due to their conclusory nature), aff'd, 536 F.2d 313 (10th Cir.) cert. denied, 429 U.S. 919 97 S. Ct. 313, 50 L. 2d 285 (1976).

HN26[] In considering whether Winter Hill has established an unfair practice under Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93A, the Court must consider "'1) whether the practice . . . is within at least the penumbra of some common-law, statutory, or other established concept of unfairness; 2) whether it is immoral, unethical, oppressive, or unscrupulous; 3) whether it causes substantial injury to consumers (or competitors or other businessmen).'" PMP Associates, Inc. v. Globe Newspaper Co., 366 Mass. 593, 596, 321 N.E.2d 915 (1975)(quoting 29 Fed. Reg. 8325, 8355 [1964]); [27] see also Moffat, 595 F. Supp. at 49. The case law is clear that the defendants' conduct does not fall within the scope of unfairness prohibited by Section 93A.

Accordingly, the Court grants the motions for summary judgment of Haagen-Dazs, Pillsbury and International on all counts of the complaint.

Allen-Myland, Inc. v. International Business Machines Corp.

United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania

July 21, 1988, Decided ; July 22, 1988, Filed

Civil Action No. 85-6166

Reporter

693 F. Supp. 262 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7582 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,193

ALLEN-MYLAND, INC. v. INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS MACHINES CORPORATION

Core Terms

upgrades, prices, installation, large scale, mainframes, leasing company, relevant market, warranty, machines, percent, conversion, customers, products, economic power, technology, cycle, fabrication, memory, buyers, market power, tying product, estimates, compete, seller, costs, third party, manufacturing, calculation, contends, export

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

HN1[] Tying Arrangements, Clayton Act

A tie exists when a seller refuses to sell a product, the tying product, alone and insists that any buyer who wants it must also purchase another product, the tied product. The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., does not prohibit tying; it prohibits contracts in restraint of trade. Only a tying arrangement that imposes an unreasonable restraint of trade is unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

HN2[] Tying Arrangements, Clayton Act

Certain tying arrangements are per se unlawful under the antitrust laws; that is, they are deemed unreasonable as a matter of law and "no specific showing of unreasonable competitive effect is required. A tying arrangement that does not warrant per se condemnation may be found to violate the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., under a rule of reason analysis. Per se rules and the rule of reason are mechanisms employed to form a judgment about the competitive significance of the restraint.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN3[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

To establish a per se tying violation, plaintiff must show: (1) the existence of two separate and distinct products or services and an agreement conditioning the sale of the tying product to the purchase of the tied product, (2) that the seller possesses sufficient economic power with respect to the tying product to restrain free competition appreciably in the market for the tied product; and (3) that the seller has thereby foreclosed a not insubstantial amount of interstate commerce in the tied product. An inquiry into the legality of a tying arrangement under the per se rule requires an elaborate economic analysis.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN4[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Where the buyer is free to take either product by itself there is no tying problem even though the seller may also offer the two items as a unit at a single price. However, even when the products are sold separately, the per se rule may apply if the option is not viable.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN5[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Application of the per se rule against tying requires proof that the seller possesses economic power in the market for the tying product. The degree or form of economic power that must be established has been described in various ways. Proof of the existence of monopoly power is not required. In short, the issue is whether the seller has some advantage not shared by his competitors in the market for the tying product.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN6[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. Proof of a seller's power to force involves proof that the seller enjoys significant market power or a dominant market position.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN7[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Market share is calculated by reference to a relevant product and geographic market. Briefly stated, the outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross -- elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it. The purpose of market definition is to determine whether market power exists; therefore, market definitions must account for all factors affecting the ability of the defendant to raise prices or restrict competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN8[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Substitutes exist for every product and a relevant market definition cannot meaningfully encompass that infinite range; therefore, the circle must be drawn narrowly to exclude any other product to which, within reasonable variations in price, only a limited number of buyers will turn. However, it is also improper to require that products be fungible to be considered in the relevant market. The relevant market definition must include all commodities reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes. It must include all producers which have the ability - actual or potential - to take significant amounts of business away from each other.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN9[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

It is not the perceptions of manufacturers but those of consumers which are most salient in the determination of market boundaries.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN10[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

The absence of significant entry barriers in a given market or industry suggests that firms operating in the market or industry lack market power, even when they enjoy appreciable market shares. Conversely, the greater the barriers faced by a new entrant, the more probable it is that control of a particular market share would enable defendant to exercise monopoly power.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN11[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Technological progress or innovation in an industry generally reflects the presence of economic competition in the market, and is generally inconsistent with the wielding of undue economic power by a firm or group of firms in the industry.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN12[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Even absent a showing of market dominance, the requisite economic power may, under special circumstances, be inferred from the desirability or uniqueness of the tying product.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN13[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Proof of acceptance of a burdensome or uneconomic offer of a "tied" product is some evidence of coercion, but such proof alone does not establish, prima facie, the coercion element of a tying claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN14[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Neither the uniqueness of a product nor the fact that it is patented alone establishes the requisite economic power. A patent holder has no market power in any relevant sense if there are close substitutes for the patented product. Similarly, factual uniqueness is insufficient as a matter of law to establish market power. If competitors can design and offer a package similar to defendant's product for a similar cost, there is no barrier and no market power, and hence no special advantage for purposes of establishing uniqueness.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN15[] Relevant Market, Product Market Definition

Within a broad market, well-defined submarkets may exist which, in themselves, constitute product markets for antitrust purposes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN16[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

The boundaries of a relevant submarket may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN17[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition, not competitors.

Evidence > Admissibility > Statements as Evidence > Compromise & Settlement Negotiations

HN18[] Statements as Evidence, Compromise & Settlement Negotiations

Fed. R. Evid. 408 codifies a trend in case law that permits cross-examination concerning a settlement for purpose of impeachment.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN19[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

Per se condemnation of a tying arrangement may be warranted when the seller possesses the degree or kind of market power that enables it to force customers to purchase a second product (which the buyer either does not want at all or would prefer to purchase elsewhere on different terms) in order to obtain the tying product. Proof of a per se unlawful tying arrangement requires proof of the existence of two separate and distinct products or services.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN20[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

If the product in the second market would be accepted anyway, because of its own merit then, of course, no leverage is involved; there is no use of the seller's market power.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN21[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

There is no per se rule against tying arrangements unless a substantial volume of commerce is foreclosed thereby. The controlling consideration is whether a total amount of business, substantial enough in terms of dollar volume so as not to be merely de minimis, is foreclosed to competition by the tie.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Higher Education & Professional Associations > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

HN22[] Regulated Industries, Higher Education & Professional Associations

Even if not per se unlawful, a business practice may violate the antitrust laws if it is found to impose an unreasonable restraint on competition under the Rule of Reason analysis. The Rule of Reason focuses directly on the challenged restraint's impact on competitive conditions. It entails an analysis of the purposes and effects of an allegedly anticompetitive practice.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN23[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

A finding of illegality under the Rule of Reason presupposes a determination that the effect upon competition in the marketplace is substantially adverse. The percentage of business controlled by defendant and the strength of the remaining competition are relevant considerations.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN24[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

While the antitrust laws regulate conduct, as distinguished from intentions, the reason for adopting the particular remedy and the purpose or end sought to be attained are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse, but because knowledge or intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN25[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In order to establish a cause of action under either a per se or rule of reason analysis, the plaintiff must demonstrate both that the antitrust laws were violated and that it suffered fact of damage in consequence of that violation. Plaintiff must show a violation of the antitrust laws, the fact of damage, and some indication of the amount of damage.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN26[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

It is as unlawful to prevent a person from engaging in a business as to drive him from it. Generally, a potential competitor has standing if he can show a genuine intent to enter the market and a preparedness to do so.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN27[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

In order to prevail under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, plaintiff must prove that defendant's conduct constitutes a contract, combination, or conspiracy which unreasonably restrains trade.

Counsel: [1] Bancroft Haviland, Esq., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Robert G. Levy, Esq., Berryl Speert, Esq., Allan Hillman, Esq., Cynthia Leppert, Esq., Frank, Bernstein, Conaway & Goldman, Baltimore, Maryland, for Plaintiff.

Thomas D. Barr, Evan R. Chesler, Robert N. Feltoon, Kaare Phillips, Cravath, Swaine & Moore, New York, New York, K. Robert Conrad, John H. McKeon, Jr., Conrad & O'Brien, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Howard Webber, Steven M. Edwards, James G. Szymanski, Davis, Markel & Edwards, New York, New York, for Defendant.

Judges: Thomas N. O'Neill, Jr., United States District Judge.

Opinion by: O'NEILL

Opinion

[*266] MEMORANDUM

THOMAS N. O'NEILL, JR., UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

AMI brought this action asserting federal and state law claims against IBM, [1] which filed several counterclaims. [2] The parties agreed to try the liability aspect of AMI's claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act [3] [3] separately. AMI's claim has two parts: [4] AMI alleges that IBM's net pricing policy constitutes an unlawful tying arrangement and that IBM's Installation and Warranty Service Charge constitutes an unreasonable restraint of trade. The issues were tried before me non-jury; [5] this memorandum [2] constitutes my findings of fact and conclusions of law. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a). Jurisdiction over the Section 1 claims is based on 28 U.S.C. § 1337. Suit is brought pursuant to Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15.

NET PRICING

An IBM 308X net priced upgrade is an MES (Miscellaneous Equipment Specification) or feature (a specific set of computer products) that is installed in an IBM model 308X computer by removing parts from the computer and replacing them with different parts. Ritchie, Tr. 1076-77; Rizzo, Tr. 1188-90. Generally, the purpose of any up grade (308X upgrades included) is to enhance the performance of the computer, often to increase the capabilities of a used computer to match the performance level [*267] of a newer model. Upgrades include model upgrades (MIPS upgrades), increases in memory capacity (memory upgrades), and increases [4] in the number of computer channels (channel upgrades). See Ritchie, Tr. 1077; Bigando, Tr. 1232; Lynn, Dep. Tr. 62.

---

[1] In Count I of the complaint, AMI charges IBM with violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1; in Count II, with a violation of Section 2, 15 U.S.C. § 2; in Count III, with unfair competition; and in Count IV, with tortious interference with business relationships and prospective business relationships. At trial, AMI dismissed with prejudice Count III of its complaint. AMI, Opening Statement, Tr. at 3.

[2] In its first counterclaim, IBM charges AMI with breach of contract; in the second counterclaim, with tortious interference with the performance of contracts; and in the third, fourth, and fifth counterclaims, with copyright infringement.

[3] Section 1 of the Sherman Act states: "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal. . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 1.

[4] AMI's Section 1 claim contains a third part, based on IBM's alleged interference with AMI's ability to acquire parts from independent firms, see Complaint, para. 28(b), but the parties agreed not to raise this issue at the initial trial.

[5] This case was initially assigned to the Honorable Clarence C. Newcomer, U.S. District Court Judge for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. It was reassigned to me on January 28, 1987. Trial began on February 3, 1987.

IBM 308X net priced upgrade contracts provide that the installation and removal of parts is to be performed by IBM employees, and that the removed parts become the property of IBM and are returned to the company. [6] [5] Ritchie, Tr. 1086-87; Rizzo, Tr. 1188-90; Levin, Tr. 78-80, 744; PX 139; PX 140; PX 138. IBM issues its net priced upgrade customers a credit for the parts removed by IBM engineers during the installation of a net-priced MES. E.g., Levin, Tr. 78; PX 457; PX 145. A customer who purchases a net priced upgrade from IBM is not charged separately for the labor associated with performing the upgrade. See DX 829. The customer receives a single price quotation for the final, installed product. [7]

IBM's 308X product line consists of 14 models with a performance power range of 3 to 30 million instructions per second (MIPS), and a price range of $ 960,000 (3083E) to $ 6,300,000 (3084Q). See DX 1799. Upgrades are net priced only if they involve the removal and return of parts (such as TCMs) [8] from the [6] upgraded computer. The majority of MIPS upgrades, [9] see Levin, Tr. 78, and numerous memory upgrades [10] are net priced by IBM.

[7] Upgrades which do not require the removal of TCMs or other parts (such as the 3083J to 3081K model upgrade) are not net priced and are optionally available from IBM on an SWRPQ basis; i.e., without IBM's labor included. [11] An upgrade purchased on an SWRPQ basis may be installed by third parties, such as AMI, or by IBM, if the customer chooses and pays for the service. All 308X channel upgrades and many memory upgrades are available on an SWRPQ basis.

[*268] AMI asserts that IBM's net pricing of 308X upgrades constitutes an unlawful tying arrangement under Section 1. As ultimately defined by AMI, the alleged tying product consists of the IBM parts necessary to fabricate and install the equivalent of 308X net priced upgrades, and the tied product consists of the [8] engineering

---

[6] IBM decided to apply net pricing to the 308X line of computers in 1980. The first 308X computer (the 3081D) was announced in November of 1980. DX 1799. However, IBM also had a net pricing policy with respect to the earlier line of 303X computers; many, perhaps all, 303X MIPS upgrades were net priced. See A.P.F. at para. 118; Allen, Tr. 286-288. Net pricing was first implemented in the late 1960's. Ritchie, Tr. 1078. AMI challenges net pricing only as it applies to the 308X line of computers.

[7] Computer manufacturers other than IBM generally quote a single price for the parts and labor included in upgrades. See English, Tr. 1566-67 (Burroughs); Ramsburg Dep. Tr. 6-7 (Control Data Corporation); Nielson Dep. Tr. 7 (NCR); Ikezoye, Dep. Tr. 6-7 (Hewlett Packard); Gibbs, Dep. Tr. 5-6 (Prime Computer); Edstrom, Dep. Tr. 4-5 (Amdahl Corporation); see also MacNaughton Study, DX 1634, pp. 1-3. AMI "often" or "usually" charges its customers a single price for parts and labor when it installs an upgrade or feature for its customers. See, e.g., Lewis, Tr. 492, 502, 1735; Smith, Tr. 613-14; Loria, Tr. 676. UCS (Ultimate Computer Services), one of AMI's principal competitors, "normally" also charged a single price for an installed upgrade or feature. LaRocca, Tr. 1164-65.

[8] TCMs (Thermal Conductor Modules) will be discussed in greater detail below. See infra pp. 278-280, 283. Here I note only that the recovery of TCMs from 308X computers being upgraded was a major reason for implementing the net pricing policy. E.g., Armstrong, Tr. 902.

[9] The following 308X model (MIPS) upgrades are net priced: 3081 D to 3801 K; 3081 G to 3081 K; 3081 GX to 3081 KX; 3081 K to 3084 Q; 3081 KX to 3084 QX; 3082 16 and 24 to Q 48; 3082 X 16 and X 24 to X 48; 3083 B to 3083 J; 3083 B to 3081 G; 3083 B to 3081 K; 3083 BX to 3081 GX; 3083 BX to 3083 JX; 3083 E to 3083 B; 3083 E to 3083 J; 3083 EX to 3083 BX; 3083 JX1 to 3081 KX1. See PX 127 at 39895; see also Levin, Tr. 78-79; Allen, Tr. 291-292.

[10] The following 308X memory upgrades are net priced: 3081G 16, G 24, and G 32 to G 48; 3081 G 16, G 24, and G 32 to G 64; 3081 K 16, K 24 and K 32 to K 48; 3081 K 16, K 24 and K 32 to K 64; 3081 GX1 to 3081 GX2; 3081 GX2 to 3081 GX3; 3081 KX1 to 3081 KX2; 3081 2 to 3081 KX3; 3083 BX0 to 3083 BX1; 3083 BX2 to 3083 BX3; 3083 EX to 3083 EX1; 3083 EX2 to 3083 EX3; 3083 JX0 to 3083 JX1; 3083 JX2 to 3083 JX3; 3084 Q 32, Q 48 and Q 64 to Q 96; 3084 Q 32, Q 48 and Q 64 to QC8; 3084 QX 3 to 3084 QX 4; and 3084 QX 4 to 3084 QX 6. See PX 127 at 39895; see also Levin, Tr. 78-79. Allen, Tr. 291-292.

[11] It is unclear what "SWRPQ" stands for. As Mr. Gibson of IBM stated, "don't ask me what an SWRPQ means, it really doesn't mean anything. But it is simply the MES or an RPQ for that matter priced without IBM labor . . . ." PX 377 at 89707.

services involved in the fabrication and installation of such upgrades. [12] AMI's Post-Trial Reply Memorandum of Law (hereinafter "A.R.M.") at 9.

[9] I.

HN1[] A tie exists when a seller refuses to sell a product (the tying product) alone and insists that any buyer who wants it must also purchase another product (the tied product). See L. Sullivan, Handbook of the Law of Antitrust § 150, at 431 (1977). "The Sherman Act does not prohibit 'tying', it prohibits 'contract[s] . . . in restraint of trade'." Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 21 n.34, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1984). Only a tying arrangement which imposes an unreasonable restraint of trade is unlawful.

HN2[] Certain tying arrangements are per se unlawful under the antitrust laws; that is, they are deemed unreasonable as a matter of law and "no specific showing of unreasonable competitive effect is required." Fortner Enterprises v. United States Steel, 394 U.S. 495, 498, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495, 89 S. Ct. 1252 (1969) ("Fortner I"); see generally Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514 (1958) [10] (respecting per se unlawful arrangements in general: "There are certain agreements or practices which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use."). [13] [11] A tying arrangement which does not warrant per se condemnation may be found to violate the Sherman Act under a rule of reason analysis. [14] Hyde, 466 U.S. at 17-18; Bogus v. American Speech & Hearing Ass'n, 582 F.2d 277, 287 (3d Cir. 1978). Per se rules and the rule of reason are mechanisms "employed 'to form a judgment about the competitive significance of the restraint.'" NCAA 468 U.S. at 103 (quoting National Soc'y of Prof. Engineers v. United States, [*269] 435 U.S. 679, 692, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637, 98 S. Ct. 1355 (1978)).

II.

AMI contends that IBM's net pricing of 308X upgrades is per se unlawful. A.M. at 15. HN3[] To establish a per se tying violation, plaintiff must show: 1) the existence of two separate and distinct products or services and an agreement conditioning the sale of the tying product to the purchase of the tied product; 2) that the seller possesses

---

[12] In its complaint, AMI defined the tying product as the parts needed to upgrade IBM large scale main frame computers, and the tied product as IBM installation service. Complaint, at para. 28(a). During the course of litigation, AMI also defined the tied product as the engineering labor necessary to reconfigure IBM large scale main frames, see Plaintiff's Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law (hereinafter "A.P.F.") at para. 151, or the engineering services necessary to perform net priced reconfigurations of IBM's large scale main frame computers. See Plaintiff's Post-Trial Memorandum of Law (hereinafter "A.M.") at 44.

IBM's net pricing applies only to certain upgrades sold new by IBM. Reconfiguration activities include services as to which IBM's net pricing policy does not apply (e.g., upgrades with used parts, removals and reinstallations of customer-owned parts or upgrades, cycle conversions and refurbishments). See, e.g., PX 105, p. 76525; Levin, Tr. 64; Gibson, Dep. Tr. 35-36. When used by AMI to refer to the tied product, the term reconfiguration must mean only those activities to which net pricing applies.

[13] "The rationale for per se rules in part is to avoid a burdensome inquiry into actual market conditions in situations where the likelihood of anticompetitive conduct is so great as to render unjustified the costs of determining whether the particular case at bar involves anticompetitive conduct." Hyde, 466 U.S. at 15 n.25 (citations omitted). However, the per se doctrine in tying cases has always required an elaborate economic analysis. See id. at 34 (O'Connor, J., concurring). "There is often no bright line separating per se from Rule of Reason analysis. Per se rules may require considerable inquiry into market conditions before the evidence justifies a presumption of anticompetitive conduct." National Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Bd. of Regents of U. of Oklahoma, 468 U.S. 85, 104 n.26, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70, 104 S. Ct. 2948 (1984).

[14] Four justices in Hyde, including Chief Justice Burger and Justice Powell, asserted that all tying arrangements should be analyzed under the rule of reason. 466 U.S. at 35 (O'Connor, J., concurring). Many scholars agree. See Will v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., 776 F.2d 665, 671 n.2 (7th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1129, 106 S. Ct. 1659, 90 L. Ed. 2d 201 (1986).

sufficient economic power with respect to the tying product to restrain free competition appreciably in the market for the tied product; and 3) that the seller has thereby foreclosed a "not insubstantial" amount of interstate commerce [12] in the tied product. See, e.g., Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551; Fortner I, 394 U.S. 495, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495, 89 S. Ct. 1252; Columbia Pictures Indus. v. Redd Horne, Inc., 749 F.2d 154 (3d Cir. 1984); Bogus, 582 F.2d 277 (3d Cir. 1978). The Supreme Court's decision in Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551, suggests that an inquiry into the legality of a tying arrangement under the per se rule requires an elaborate economic analysis.

I conclude that IBM's net pricing policy does not warrant per se condemnation. AMI has failed to establish that IBM possesses the requisite market power. AMI has also failed to prove that it, or anyone, has been foreclosed from a viable business opportunity as a result of IBM's conduct. [15] My finding that AMI has not been deprived of a viable business opportunity implicates several of the concerns underlying the Sherman Act and the per se rule against tying in particular.

[13] A.

HN5[] Application of the per se rule against tying requires proof that the seller possesses economic power in the market for the tying product. The degree or form of economic power which must be established has been described in various ways. The Supreme Court, however, has consistently held that proof of the existence of monopoly power is not required.

In Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 611, 97 L. Ed. 1277, 73 S. Ct. 872 (1953), in an attempt to define the requisite economic power, the Court referred to "the wielding of monopolistic leverage", or the exploitation by a seller of "his dominant position in one market to expand his empire into the next." This language was "construed" in Northern Pacific as requiring only "sufficient economic power to impose an appreciable restraint on free competition in the tied product." 356 U.S. at 11. "The source from which the power is derived [*270] and whether the power takes the form of a monopoly or not" were said to be irrelevant. Id. In Fortner I, the Court explained [14] that "economic power over the tying product can be sufficient even though the power falls far short of dominance and even though the power exists only with respect to some of the buyers in the market." 394 U.S. at 502-03. For purposes of assessing economic power, the Court stated that the proper focus is "whether the seller has the power to raise prices, or impose other burdensome terms such as a tie-in, with respect to any appreciable number of buyers within the market." [16] 394 U.S. at 504. In United States Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enterprises, Inc.,

[15] Notwithstanding net pricing, buyers could acquire new 308X upgrade parts from IBM, without IBM installation service included, on an over the counter (OTC) basis. See, e.g., Levin, Tr. 89-97; PX 455; PX 456; PX 457. IBM contends that its sale of the alleged tying and tied products separately precludes application of the per se rule against tying. Post Trial Oral Argument, Chesler, Tr. 69-70; see Northern Pacific, 356 U.S. at 6 n.4. ("Of course, HN4[] where the buyer is free to take either product by itself there is no tying problem even though the seller may also offer the two items as a unit at a single price."). However, even when the products are sold separately, the per se rule may apply if the option is "not viable." Advance Business Systems & Supply Co. v. SCM Corp., 415 F.2d 55, 62 (4th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 920, 25 L. Ed. 2d 101, 90 S. Ct. 928 (1970)

It appears that IBM's OTC prices for TCMs were not available until late 1983. See PX 609; PX 261; PX 269; Smith, Dep. Tr. 158-59. Once established, the OTC prices for 308X upgrade parts typically exceeded the sum of IBM's price for the net priced upgrade and the value of the parts removed from the upgraded machine. Levin, Tr. 89-97; PX 128A-P. For example, in 1983, a 308D machine sold for $ 3 million and a 308K sold for $ 3.6 million. A D to K net priced upgrade sold for $ 600,000. PX 455. The OTC price for the parts required to perform D to K upgrade was $ 4.58 million. Id. The price structure encouraged buyers to buy net-priced upgrades rather than the parts alone for installation by third parties, such as AMI. Although the disparity between the OTC parts prices and the prices for net-priced 308X upgrades was not always as great as in the D to K example (especially when the value of the parts removed and returned to IBM is taken into account), see PX 456; PX 457; PX 458, and may have allowed for third-party installation in special circumstances, the OTC option was not, on the whole, sufficiently viable to preclude application of the per se rule. This does not mean that the OTC pricing structure was itself unreasonable or unlawful. See infra, pp. 296-297.

[16] Despite the language contained in Fortner I, the Court later observed that the treatment of the law on market power in Fortner I was in some ways less "far-reaching" than in Northern Pacific and United States v. Loew's Inc., 371 U.S. 38, 9 L. Ed. 2d 11, 83

429 U.S. 610, 620, 51 L. Ed. 2d 80, 97 S. Ct. 861 (1977) ("Fortner II"), the Court repeated that there is no requirement "that the defendant have a monopoly or even a dominant position throughout the market for a tying product." Instead, the focus of attention is on "whether the seller has the power, within the market of the tying product, to raise prices or to require purchasers to accept burdensome terms that could not be exacted in a completely competitive market." Id. (footnote omitted). "In short," said the Court, the issue is "whether the seller has some advantage not shared [15] by his competitors in the market for the tying product." Id.

In its most recent tying decision, the Court emphasized the importance of proof that the seller has "some special ability - usually called 'market power' - to force a purchaser to do something that he would not do in a competitive market." Hyde, 466 U.S. at 13-14. [16] The focus is on the seller's power to "force" or "coerce":

> HN6[] The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms.

Id. at 12. Proof of a seller's power to force involves proof that the seller enjoys "significant market power", id. at 26, or a "dominant market position." Id. at 27.

1.

AMI relies in part on evidence of IBM's market share to support its contention that IBM possesses sufficient economic power to compel application of the per se rule. HN7[] Market share is calculated by reference to a relevant product and geographic market. [17] Briefly stated, "the outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross -- elasticity of demand [17] between the product itself and substitutes for it." Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962). "The purpose of market definition is to determine whether market power exists"; therefore, "market definitions must account for all factors affecting the ability of the [defendant] to raise prices or restrict competition." Weiss v. York Hosp., 745 F.2d 786, 826 (3d Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1060, 84 L. Ed. 2d 836, 105 S. Ct. 1777 (1985).

For purposes of determining IBM's economic power with respect to the tying product, AMI defines the relevant market as the market for large scale main frame computers. E.g. A.P.F. at para. 251. According to AMI, a large scale main frame computer is one that is, at the time of its introduction into the market place, among the largest in [*271] memory capacity, the fastest in computing [18] speed, and the most expensive of computers available. Levin, Tr. 752. Large scale mainframes, says AMI, typically are priced in excess of $ 1.75 million. [18] [19] Levin, Tr. 753. IBM's revenues from the sale of new large scale mainframes (including MES sales) [19] from 1981 to 1985 exceeded $ 16 billion (1981: $ 1.918 billion; 1982: $ 3.07 billion; 1983: $ 3.589 billion; 1984 $ 3.807 billion; 1985: $ 3.666 billion). PX 482; PX 15; PX 48. Based on AMI's definition of what constitute non-IBM large scale main frames [20] and its calculation of the revenues received by firm's selling such products, IBM's share of revenues of all sales

---

S. Ct. 97 (1962) (copyright), which could be read to make actual market power irrelevant. See United States Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enterprises, Inc., 429 U.S. 610, 620 n.13, 51 L. Ed. 2d 80, 97 S. Ct. 861 (1977) ("Fortner II") (quoting Dam, 1969 Supreme Court Review, 25-26). Fortner I did not change the requirement of proof of "market power in the sense of power over price." Id.

[17] There is no dispute concerning AMI's definition of the relevant geographic market.

[18] Prior to trial, AMI defined large scale mainframe computers as "electronic data processing systems with a typical systems price in excess of $ 1 million". See AMI's Answers to IBM's Third Set of Interrogatories, No. 2 (Dec. 31, 1986).

[19] The MES sales included in the calculation consist of IBM sales of MIPs upgrades (model upgrades), memory upgrades, channel upgrades, and other features. A.P.F. at para. 3, 14. Between 1982 and 1986, IBM's revenues from the sale of 308X MIPS upgrades exceeded $ 2 billion. DX 3001B.

[20] Although AMI includes IBM MES sales in its calculation of IBM large scale mainframe revenues, it does not appear to include non-IBM upgrade sales in the calculation of non-IBM large scale mainframe revenues. If such upgrades are sold by IBM's competitors, it is a mistake to exclude the revenues they generate.

of new large scale mainframes was 70.2% in 1981, 78.0% in 1982, 79.0% in 1983, 78.6% in 1894, and 75.9% in 1985. PX 482; PX 15, PX 48. Also based on AMI's definition of what constitute non-IBM large scale main frames, IBM's share of total shipments of large scale main frames (presumably shipment of MESs is included in IBM figures) was 61.0% in 1981, 70.1% in 1982, 76.0% in 1983, 74.5% in 1984, and 65.0% in 1985. PX 483; PX 15, PX 48.

Standing alone, AMI's market share evidence tends to show that IBM enjoys substantial economic power. However, AMI's definitions of large scale mainframes and the relevant market are flawed in several respects and tend to overstate IBM's market share and power. [21]

[20] AMI does not expressly include upgrades of large scale main frame computers in its relevant market definition, but does include IBM's revenues from the sale of 308X upgrades in its calculation of IBM's share of the purported relevant market. If it is AMI's contention that upgrades do not belong in the relevant market, then AMI's calculation of IBM's share of the relevant market must be reduced accordingly. However, upgrades of large-scale main frame computers belong in the relevant market. Professor Richard C. Levin, AMI's expert economist, included parts and labor required to upgrade large scale main frame computers in the relevant market consisting of large scale main frame computers. Levin, Tr. 750-51. According to Prof. Levin, the parts and services required for an upgrade, and the upgrade that they together produce, can under certain circumstances be a substitute for a new machine; and "the prices of upgrades are constrained to some extent by the . . . prices of computers themselves." Id. If upgrades were excluded from the relevant market definition, AMI would have to be excluded from the market, since AMI does not sell large scale mainframes. See Levin, Tr. 792.

[21] At trial, Prof. Levin acknowledged that the International Data Corporation report on which AMI relied to determine what computers are large scale main frame computers, see Levin, Tr. 783, omits "scores, indeed hundreds of computers available in the marketplace today which have as much or more MIP capacity" as some IBM computers which appear in the survey. Levin, Tr. 786-87; 789. AMI's reliance on IBM documents (PX 15; PX 48) also raises doubts concerning the reliability of AMI's market share data, since it is unclear that [*272] the documents were intended fully to reflect IBM's competition from other manufacturers of large scale mainframe computers. To the extent that AMI's market share evidence reflects the IDC's classification scheme, such evidence tends to overstate IBM's share of the relevant market because it fails to include non-IBM revenues from products which may fairly be described as large scale mainframe computers.

Even if AMI's market share evidence properly accounted for all sales of new large scale mainframes, a relevant market consisting solely of large scale main frame computers (and upgrades) is unduly narrow for purposes of assessing IBM's economic power [22] and tends to overstate it.

HN8[] Substitutes exist for every product and a relevant market definition "cannot meaningfully encompass that infinite range;" therefore, "the circle must be drawn narrowly to exclude any other product to which, within reasonable variations in price, only a limited number of buyers will turn." Times Picayune, 345 U.S. at 612 n.31 (including general and classified newspaper advertising and excluding advertising placed in other communications media in New Orleans). However, it is also improper "to require that products be fungible to be considered in the relevant market." United States v. E.I. duPont deNemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 394, 100 L. Ed. 1264, 76 S. Ct. 994 (1956) (including cellophane and all flexible wrapping materials in same relevant market in Section 2 case). The relevant market definition must include all "commodities reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes. . . ." Id. at 395. It must include all producers which "have the ability - actual or potential - to take significant amounts [23] of business away from each other." Smithkline Corp. v. Eli Lilly & Co., 575 F.2d 1056, 1063 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 838, 58 L. Ed. 2d 134, 99 S. Ct. 123 (1978). Prof. Levin substantially agreed with these statements of the considerations pertinent to market definition, see Levin, Tr. 171, and acknowledged that products may be in the same relevant market when they are alternatives only "under certain circumstances", or when the pricing of one product constrains the pricing of another only "to some extent." Id. at 750-51.

[21] The flaws are discussed more fully below. Here I note only that AMI's market share data are limited to new large scale mainframe sales, whereas AMI's alleged relevant market is not limited to new large scale mainframes. It consists of new as well as used large scale mainframes. IBM's share of sales of new computers only partly reflects IBM's power in a market consisting of all largescale mainframes, including those owned by leasing companies and marketed in competition with IBM.

To support its relevant market definition, AMI relies heavily on IBM documents which AMI contends demonstrate that IBM recognizes a separate market for large scale main frame computers. See A.M. at 76-77. IBM "Significant Win/Loss Reports" (SWLRs) were monthly reports prepared by IBM's marketing divisions and furnished to IBM's Chairman and members of IBM's Management Committee. Armstrong, Tr. 909-910; Levin, Tr. 756, 800. The SWLRs stated, for each reported competitive situation, the IBM product offering, the competitive product offering(s) faced by IBM, and whether IBM won or lost the sale. Levin, Tr. 756. [24] Prof. Levin examined a sample of SWLRs covering the periods December 1980 through September 1981, April and June 1983, December 1984, January 1985, February 1985, May 1985, and June 1985. Id. at 759. For each reported situation in which the IBM product offering was a large scale mainframe (a 3033 product, a 308X product, or MES upgrade of such a product), Prof. Levin classified the reported competitive alternative as a large scale or mid-scale computer, based on the International Data Corporation's "Large Scale Computer Census" classification scheme. Id at 757-59. In 281 out of 288 (or 97.6%) reported cases in which the IBM offering was a large scale mainframe, the competitive alternative was also a large scale mainframe or an upgrade to a large scale mainframe. Id; PX 480. The competitive alternatives included leasing company placements of new or used large scale mainframes, and leasing company offerings of upgrades or reconfigurations of large scale mainframes. [22]

[25] [*273] The usefulness of IBM's SWLRs and Prof. Levin's analysis of them to support AMI's relevant market definition is limited by several considerations. IBM regarded SWLRs as poor and unrepresentative indicators of actual market activity, and discontinued their use. See Armstrong, Tr. 910-13; see also Quinlan, Tr. 1050-53, 1057-59; DX 2201. [23] Nevertheless, assuming that SWLRs accurately reflect actual market activity, they show a large number of situations in which non-IBM large scale main frame computers (included by AMI in its relevant market definition) competed with IBM computer offerings which AMI does not include in its market definition. [24] AMI's reliance on only those instances in which the large scale mainframe offering was an IBM computer, rather than a non-IBM computer, is inconsistent with the relevant market definition it advances. Finally, it is worth remembering that HN9[] "it is not the perceptions of manufacturers but those of consumers which are most salient in the determination of market boundaries." Columbia Metal Culvert Co. v. Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., 579 F.2d 20, 30 [26] (3d Cir.) cert. denied, 439 U.S. 876, 58 L. Ed. 2d 190, 99 S. Ct. 214 (1978) (footnote omitted) (Section 2).

The evidence compels [27] the conclusion that AMI's asserted market definition is untenably narrow. AMI improperly excludes from its market definition a host of products which provide reasonable alternatives to purchases of large scale mainframe computers and upgrades and constrain IBM's ability to raise the prices of these products or exclude competition. The result is that IBM's market power is significantly less than AMI contends, even before evidence relevant to assessing IBM's economic power other than demand substitutability evidence is considered.

a.

---

[22] AMI relies on other IBM documents also reflecting competitive situations involving IBM offerings of large scale mainframes or upgrades to such computers. Although it is not clear who examined the documents, AMI contends that they yield results consistent with Prof. Levin's conclusions based on IBM SWLRs. See A.F. paras. 273-275.

[23] With respect to documents in the preceding footnote, AMI acknowledges that IBM's SWLR's reflect a relatively small percentage of competitive situations. According to the documents, IBM shipped 83 computers per month, and reported 30 situations per month. The documents do not establish the number of competitive situations involving IBM which did not result in a sale and which were not reported. Nor is it clear that every competitive situation which resulted in a sale was reported.

[24] The same is true with respect to the competitive activity AMI asserts is reflected in the numerous IBM documents neither sampled nor discussed by Prof. Levin. It appears that large scale mainframes competed with products outside AMI's market definition in approximately fifteen percent of all competitive instances in which at least one of the offerings was a large scale mainframe.

AMI's proposed market definition fails to account for the competition IBM faces from companies offering large scale main frame computers for lease. AMI acknowledges the presence of such competition, see A.P.F. at para. 21 and the evidence cited therein, [25] but fails to incorporate it into the relevant market definition. An economically meaningful market definition must include all the products and services that actually or potentially compete with IBM products in question or constrain IBM's pricing and product decisions. Levin, Tr. 171.

[28] Leasing companies, such as Comdisco and CMI, purchase computer equipment from manufacturers and lease it to users. From a consumer's standpoint, they are an alternative source of computer equipment. They compete with IBM. See Lewis, Tr. 452-3; LaRocca, Tr. 1209; Phillips, Tr. 1586; Pontikes, Dep. Tr. 16; Walker, Dep. Tr. 19-20. Leasing companies own approximately 40 percent of all large scale mainframe computers, as defined by AMI. Levin, Tr. 764-65, 858-9. Prof. Levin testified that IBM's share of the market would be reduced by an amount he was unable to determine if leasing companies were taken into account in AMI's market definition. See Levin, Tr. 837-38, 764, 804. If leasing company transactions involving computers comparable and in many cases identical to the large scale mainframes marketed by [*274] IBM are included in the relevant market, and the market is measured on a "transaction basis", [26] IBM's share of the market, according to Prof. Almarin Phillips, who testified for IBM as an expert economist, drops to 34.4 percent. Phillips, Tr. 1600-11; DX 1923. Prof. Phillips testified that such a share would not reflect "overwhelming" activity in the market on IBM's [29] part. Id. at 1611.

AMI relies on United States v. Aluminum Company of America, 148 F.2d 416 (2d Cir. 1945) to support its exclusion of leasing companies from the relevant market. See A.R.M. at 79-86. In Alcoa, upon consideration of the defendant company's market position over a period of years and based on the conclusion that the production of "secondary" ingot was as much within Alcoa's control as the production of the "virgin" ingot from which it was derived, the Court decided to disregard "secondary" competition in its calculation of Alcoa's market share. 148 F.2d at 425. Unlike the situation in Alcoa, there is evidence in this case that leasing companies, which also lease non-IBM equipment, effectively compete with IBM and constrain IBM's ability to set prices or exclude competition in the market [30] for new large scale main frame computers. See e.g., A.P.F. para. 29 and the evidence cited therein. Leasing companies, therefore, properly belong in the relevant market applicable to this litigation. See ILC Peripherals Leasing Corp. v. IBM Corp., 458 F. Supp. 423, 428 (N.D. Cal. 1978), aff'd sub nom. Memorex Corp. v. IBM Corp., 636 F.2d 1188 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 452 U.S. 972, 69 L. Ed. 2d 983, 101 S. Ct. 3126 (1981) ("Memorex II"). [27]

[31] b.

As shown below, AMI also improperly excluded from its relevant market definition other products and services which offer potential buyers reasonable and viable alternatives to the purchase (or leasing) of large scale mainframe computers or upgrades to such computers. Their availability in the marketplace constrains IBM's power to command noncompetitively high prices and restricts IBM's ability to impose unwanted or burdensome terms on an appreciable number of buyers interested in acquiring computer systems or enhancing the performance of existing computer systems. These alternatives also pressure IBM to keep up with the market's growing technological demands. See e.g., Phillips, Tr. 1585.

---

[25] Prof. Levin acknowledged that "leasing companies are competitors of IBM when they market IBM manufactured equipment in competition with IBM." Levin, Tr., 764-65; see also id. at 758.

[26] Prof. Levin also has measured market shares on a transaction basis, Levin, Tr. 842-45, which appears to be an acceptable measurement standard. See DX 1665 p.3.

[27] Even if leasing companies were to be excluded from the relevant market definition, so that IBM's market share would not decline accordingly, the significant constraints they impose on IBM's market behavior must enter into any proper assessment of the significance of IBM's market share. See In re IBM Peripheral EDP Devices Antitrust Litigation, 481 F. Supp. 965, 979 (N.D. Cal. 1979), aff'd sub nom. Transamerica Computer Co. v. IBM Corp., 698 F.2d 1377 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 955, 78 L. Ed. 2d 329, 104 S. Ct. 370 (1983).

Thus, AMI incorrectly excluded many smaller capacity computers manufactured both by companies which do and companies which do not also manufacture large scale mainframe computers as defined by AMI. See Levin, Tr. 796-800. AMI excludes these products from the relevant market in part because the IDC report on which Prof. Levin relied did not classify them as large scale mainframes, and in part because AMI contends that there is only limited evidence of substitutability between these [32] smaller computers and large scale mainframes. Id., at 759-60, 782. For purposes of this action, the reliability of the IDC report is suspect. See supra. p. 271. The evidence shows sufficient competition between the smaller computers and large scale mainframes to require their inclusion in the relevant market.

At trial, marketing executives and users of complex computer systems acknowledged a trend toward "distributed data processing", in which smaller capacity computers are used in conjunction with or in place of large scale mainframes. Mr. Quinlan, President of IBM's North Central Marketing Division, discussed the increasing phenomenon, perhaps beginning in the 1970's, of "hierarchal systems" and "distributed [*275] systems" involving combinations of large computers, smaller computers, and terminals. Quinlan, Tr. 1043-44. Such systems provide alternatives to the acquisition of large scale main frames, as the situation involving J.C. Penney illustrates. Id. He also referred to instances in which the smaller computers (which, in fact, tend to be quite large) are "clustered" to look like and perform functions comparable to those performed by IBM's large scale mainframes. [33] He referred to numerous instances (e.g., involving DuPont Research and Carrier Corporation) in which the smaller computers (excluded from AMI's market) competed successfully against IBM large scale mainframes. Id. at 1050-53, 1058-59; see DX 2201. Mr. Armstrong, IBM's Senior Vice President and Director General of IBM Europe, gave several examples of such competition, including the New York Stock Exchange's replacement of its IBM System 360 Model 50 computer (included in AMI's market) with over 200 Tandem "mini-computers" (excluded from AMI's market). Armstrong, Tr. 897-98. An executive of Core States Financial Corporation testified that his company moved away from using IBM large scale mainframes for at least one application, and opted for a system of multiple computers manufactured by Tamden and not included in AMI's market. Shah, Tr. 1516-20. A Hewlett Packard executive stated that his company's HP 3000 product line of computers (excluded from AMI's market) competes with IBM 308X computers in part because of a trend toward decentralized processing. Ikezoye, Dep. Tr. 4-6. An NCR official expressed a similar view. Nielson, Dep. Tr. 4-5; see English, Tr. 1557, 1565 (illustration [34] of trend toward decentralized processing, involving Federal Mogul Corporation); DX 1786. A study entitled "Long Range Computing Strategy Report" prepared for Kent State University by Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Company in 1984 discussed the "trend away from older, large single processing systems . . . towards systems based on large number of small processors with local intelligence, linked by communications." DX 360, pp. 4-5, 49-52. Kent State's Director of Informations Systems testified that Kent State ultimately replaced a Burroughs model 6812 computer (included in AMI's market) with an IBM 3081D, but not without seriously considering purchasing a system of clustered DEC VAX 11/785 computers (excluded from AMI's market). McKinley, Tr. 1487-90, 1494-90.

There were many instances in which systems of smaller computers provided alternatives to large scale mainframe computers; the instances involved wide-ranging computer applications in different commercial settings. Such competition cannot be considered marginal. IBM considered the competition significant. In 1975, it reviewed one hundred of IBM's largest accounts and concluded that a significant number of customers, "almost two-thirds, [35] were concluding to off-load their systems, their large systems to competitive distributed processing systems," Armstrong, Tr. 887-94; DX 1632, none of which are included in AMI's market. Prof. Levin's assertion that such competition is limited and therefore excludable from the market is unsupported by the record.

The same is true with respect to fault tolerant processing, in which smaller capacity computers are used essentially in parallel to ensure continuous processing capability for applications frequently performed by large scale mainframes. AMI excludes fault tolerant computers from its relevant market on the theory that they occupy a "specialized market nitch." See A.P.F. at para. 269; Levin, Tr. 802. The weight of the evidence, however, was to the contrary and compels their inclusion in the market. See Shah, Tr. 1517-21, 1524, 1530; Quinlan, Tr. 1055-56, 1059-63.

c.

AMI's relevant market also improperly fails to include peripheral products such as storage devices, input/output devices, disk drives or disk tapes. Storage devices store data for later access by the central processing unit (CPU). Input devices feed data to the CPU; output devices receive or accept data [36] from the CPU. Disk drives and desk tapes may perform all three functions.

[*276] AMI acknowledges that "external data storage devices are in a limited sense technological substitutes for the internal memory of a large scale mainframe." A.P.F. at para. 278. AMI excludes storage devices from the relevant market in part because it contends that they are not economic substitutes in the sense that their prices constrain the pricing power of a hypothetical monopolist of large scale mainframes. Levin, Tr. 761-62. AMI takes substantially the same position with respect to computer software, the programs that enable computer systems to function and perform a variety of tasks, A.P.F. at para. 279, which AMI excludes from the market. AMI's assertions are inconsistent with the evidence. Mr. Beckwith, IBM's Director of Service, testified that IBM always considers the peripheral products offered by competitors when IBM arrives at a "competitive price" for its computers. Beckwith, Tr. 1279-83. Input/output devices particularly are among the various "components" IBM examines to determine the price of its products. Id. Competitive software offerings also influenced IBM pricing decisions, [37] Beckwith, Tr. 1279-83, and at least one computer user testified concerning the "trade offs" between software and hardware. McKinley, Tr. 1493.

There is a more fundamental reason for including peripheral products and software (systems software and application software) in the relevant market than the fact that they constrain IBM's pricing decisions with respect to large scale mainframes. As discussed below, peripheral products and software provided significant and reasonable alternatives to a wide variety of upgrades and modifications of large scale mainframes. See, e.g., Staire, Dep. Tr. 19-20; Armstrong, Tr. 876-78. Other such alternatives which AMI's market definition also failed to take into account include smaller computers used to offload applications from large scale mainframes (including computers smaller than those previously discussed); devices for adding memory, speed, or capacity to processors; and computer service bureaus, which are companies providing data processing services to others. Further, AMI's market definition, to the extent that it includes upgrades at all, appears limited to MIPS upgrades. A.P.F. at para. 291. Such a limitation also is unwarranted and [38] inconsistent with the evidence.

According to Charles I. Staire, Consultant to B.F. Goodrich, there are "many different ways," to enhance the performance capabilities of a computer system. Staire, Dep. Tr. 3-4, 19-20. Mr. Armstrong testified that a buyer interested in increasing the capacity of a computer system will consider "all of [the] elements that make up the computer systems in order to determine what is the most efficient way, most economical way to solve his problem." Armstrong, Tr. 876-78. Among the possibilities are increases in the computer's memory capacity and channel speed, and improvements in the computer software or peripheral devices like disk drives or disk tapes. Id. Mr. McKinley of Kent State added disk storage and main memory components as an alternative to upgrading the CPU of a 3081D computer. McKinley, Tr. 1500-01. Bipin Shah of Core States Financial Corporation postponed an upgrade or the purchase of a larger computer by improving "inefficiencies in the software," in communications, and in disk drive utilization. Shah, Tr. 1523. Thomas English of Federal Mogul testified that his company has "upgraded the CPUs from one model to the next, but usually [39] before [the company] get[s] to that it's a memory upgrade, it is adding channels, it is adding other I/O [input/output] devices, disk, tape, so forth." English, Tr. 1565-66. Gary Smith of CMI testified that alternatives to upgrading a computer, in the sense of adding a MIPS upgrade, include replacing the computer, adding a second computer, adding additional memory, adding additional I/O devices, and off-loading work to other computer systems including those operated by service bureaus. Smith, Tr. 605-06. Robert Van Hellemont of Thomson McKinnon Securities stated that, "rather than upgrading," a user can "add increased memory," add "increased discs or tape storage," offload "application to service [bureaus]", or offload "applications onto some number of other smaller computer systems." Van [*277] Hellemont, Dep. Tr. 7, 76-79. Numerous other witnesses testified similarly. Harry Myland, one of the founders of AMI, acknowledged that a user "has a variety of options" to upgrading a CPU, including "memory upgrades or feature designs," "channel adds," and "internal speed improvements." Myland, Dep. Tr. 62, 187. Such components, enhancements, and available services permit users [40] at least to postpone buying upgrades of CPUs or larger (new or used) computers for a significant period of time. Phillips, Tr. 1587. A market definition which ignores such competition is unrealistic.

d.

A box swap, which typically refers to the purchase of a new machine and the sale of an old one, is the "functional" and physical equivalent of an upgrade. See Levin, Tr. 170-72, 766. Box swaps can also be performed with used machines; for example, with machines owned by leasing companies. Allen, Dep. Tr. 59-60; Myland, Dep. Tr. 189-90; Van Hellemont, Dep. Tr. 76-77. Users seek box swaps or upgrades at roughly the same time in the life cycles of computers actually in place. See Lewis, Tr. 1718-19, 1727-28. Although AMI has shown that a box swap is not an alternative to a 3081K to 8084Q upgrade, box swaps are viable alternatives to most MIPs upgrades and should therefore be included in the relevant market definition. [28]

[41] e.

Upgrades using parts provided by the customer, or by a leasing company from a machine of one of its lessees, also provide computer users with important alternatives to new upgrades or new machines. See Levin, Tr. 744-45. At his deposition, Mr. Allen acknowledged that the existence of 308X donor parts impacted on a user's decision to purchase new upgrades from IBM. Allen, Dep. Tr. 964. As with box swaps, upgrades using parts taken from other machines may yield physically and functionally identical results to the purchases of new upgrades. Levin, Tr. 171, 182-83. The viability of used-parts upgrades as an alternative to upgrades performed with new parts may be limited, in practical terms, by the relative scarcity of necessary used parts, especially those needed for MIPs upgrades. Levin, Tr. 110-12; Allen, Tr. 339-40. However, the evidence does not support their total exclusion. [29] See, e.g., Levin, Tr. 182-83. For example, between 1983 and 1986, AMI performed 237 (out of 244) 308X memory upgrades or downgrades, and 137 (out of 138) 308X channel upgrades or downgrades, with parts removed from and reinstalled on existing equipment. See DX 1363, pp. 8792-94, 9276-78; [42] 8977; DX 1894D; DX 1894 B; DX 1894C; DX 1363, pp. 8543-44; DX 1895C. CMI also goes into the "user community" to purchase "memory, features, machines, and upgrades". Loria, Dep. Tr. 228-29; see also Nolin, Dep. Tr. 85-86 (AMI); LaRocca, Tr. 1165-67 (UCS).

f.

IBM's market share declines steeply from the figure suggested by AMI if the relevant market definition is expanded, as the evidence requires, to include (at least to some extent) leasing companies, smaller capacity computers, peripheral products (storage devices, input-output devices, etc.), [43] memory upgrades, channel upgrades, software, and service bureaus. Prof. Phillips, IBM's market expert, while not attempting to measure IBM's share of a strictly defined market, see Phillips, Tr. 1594-95, established that IBM accounted for: 20.3 percent of the "value of shipments of [electronic data processing] products worldwide from U.S. plants plus software and service revenues"; 30.8 percent of 1984-1985 [*278] "shipments of general purpose digital computers with the unit value" exceeding $ 250,000 (recorded at FOB platform; the actual installed retail price of such computers exceeded $ 1 million); and 32.2 percent of the "data processing revenues from the top one hundred firms who [had] data processing revenue" for 1984 and 1985. [30] Phillips, Tr. 1596-1600; DX 1749, DX 1751; DX 1753. AMI did not attempt to measure IBM's share of any market other than the untenably narrow relevant market it advanced at trial. Although market share is

---

[28] Prof. Levin acknowledged that box swaps can under certain circumstances be alternatives to upgrades, Levin, Tr. 182, and appeared to include box swaps in the relevant market. Levin, Tr. 766. But see Id. at 743-49. AMI excludes box swaps.

[29] Including used-part upgrades and service bureaus, and to a lesser extent, box swaps, in the relevant market may raise analytical problems similar to those involved in the decision to include leasing companies in the market. See Transamerica, 481 F. Supp. at 979. As with leasing companies, I find that a meaningful market analysis must take these alternatives into account, whether or not they are included in the relevant market definition.

[30] Prof. Phillips' figures tend to understate IBM's market share to the extent that he includes competition from maintenance companies, which IBM contends belong in the relevant market, I.P.F. at para. 103, and AMI correctly excludes. The figures tend to overstate IBM's market share to the extent that, in DX 1749, they fail to reflect revenues from leasing companies. See Phillips, Tr. 1597-98. Prof. Phillips offered no opinion concerning the proper definition of the relevant market. Phillips, Tr. 1584, 1594.

but one measure of a firm's economic power and should be considered in light of other market factors, it seems clear that market shares in the range suggested by Prof. Phillips do not support a finding that a company possesses sufficient [44] economic power to apply the per se rule against tying arrangements. E.g., Hyde, 466 U.S. at 26-27 & n.43 (30 percent share in market for tying product not enough to constitute market power); Times Picayune, 345 U.S. at 611-13 (30 to 40 percent not enough); Ball Memorial Hosp., Inc. v. Mutual Hospital Ins. Inc., 784 F.2d 1325, 1330-31, 1334-37 (7th Cir. 1986) (over 50 percent not enough).

2.

The analysis so far has focused on what may be described [45] as demand substitutability or cross-elasticity. A thorough analysis of a firm's economic power also takes into account such considerations as: supply substitutability; other aspects of market structure, general market performance; and the market performance of the defendant company. An examination of important market and industry characteristics further supports the conclusion that IBM lacks the requisite economic power.

HN10[] The absence of significant entry barriers in a given market or industry suggests that firms operating in the market or industry lack market power, even when they enjoy appreciable market shares. See, e.g. United States v. Waste Management, Inc., 743 F.2d 976, 983-84 (2d Cir. 1984); Ball Memorial Hosp., 784 F.2d at 1335. [31] Conversely, "the greater the barriers faced by a new entrant, the more probable it is that control of a particular market share would enable defendant to exercise monopoly power." [32] In re IBM Peripheral, 481 F. Supp. at 976 (footnote omitted). The evidence established substantial entry [33] and [46] growth of competition in the data processing industry embraced by the correctly defined relevant market.

A number [47] of companies other than IBM manufacture a wide range of computers having the processing power of IBM large scale mainframe computers. Several of these (including Digital Equipment Corporation, Data General, Hewlett Packard, Tandem, and NCR) were admittedly excluded from the report upon which Prof. Levin relied to determine what constitute large scale mainframes. See Levin, Tr. 786-87, 789; 796-800. AMI has not offered evidence of the market shares any of these individual competitors enjoy.

[*279] The number of computer leasing companies competing with IBM in the market for large scale mainframes has grown during recent years. Kenneth Pontikes, a founder of Comdisco, one of the world's largest leasing companies, [34] Robertson, Tr. 707, testified that there were over 500 leasing companies in operation in 1986, Pontikes, Dep. Tr. 17, up from only about a "handful" in 1970. See DX 2168, p.7. The comparable growth of the Computer Dealers and Lessors Association supports Mr. Pontikes' assertion. See DX 2168, p. 7; LaRocca, Tr. 1207. Comdisco enjoyed considerable growth between fiscal years 1982 and 1986, when it reported a net profit of $ 79 million on revenues totaling [48] $ 902 million (Comdisco reported net profits of $ 29 million on revenues of $ 415 million for fiscal year 1982). Pontikes, Dep. Tr. 6-7. CMI, another major leasing company, reported revenues of $ 140 million for 1982, and $ 284.7 million for 1985. DX 1073, p., 4; DX 2168, p. 21; Smith, Dep. Tr. 187-88; DX 1071 p. 6.

---

[31] Prof. Phillips testified that "even if a firm had 100 percent of the market today, if there aren't any impediments to entry, that would effectively preclude that firm from having market power." Phillips, Tr. 1577-78. I do not need to evaluate this opinion.

[32] I agree with AMI that "the capacity 'to force' [for purposes of invoking the per se rule against tying] does not require the existence of monopoly power in a defined relevant market." A.M. at 36; see supra, p. 270. The market and industry characteristics I examine here are indicia of market power in general, not just monopoly power. See, e.g., Phillips, Tr. 1577-1600.

[33] There is evidence of firms departing the market as well, in part reflecting the rapid technological developments taking place in the market: "As [technology] provides a new opportunity, it usually forecloses an old one." Phillips, Tr. 1581-82.

[34] In terms of IBM list price, Comdisco owns approximately $ 7 billion in IBM equipment. Pontikes, Dep. Tr. 11. Comdisco has a larger inventory of 308X computers than it ever had of 303X computers. Id.

The number of companies, like AMI, engaged in the business of converting and modifying computer equipment also has grown in recent years. AMI itself illustrates the relative ease of entry into the field. It was formed in 1973 with an initial investment of $ 1,500. Allen, Dep. Tr. 216-18; Ade, Dep. Tr. 92; Myland, Dep. Tr. 4, 63. AMI reported earnings of $ 15 million for the period 1973 to 1981, and over $ 53 million in the time period covered by the complaint. See DX 1821A. In 1984, AMI employed [49] approximately 30 "field engineers", [35] [50] DX 1922, and declined an acquisition offer by CMI for $ 20-$ 30 million. Myland, Dep. Tr. 440-46. UCS, which engaged in the conversion and modification of computer equipment, was founded in 1972 by five persons and an initial capitalization of a "couple [of] thousand dollars." LaRocca, Tr. 1161-64, 1168-75. In 1985, TRW, Inc. acquired UCS for $ 7.5 million up front plus a contingency payment estimated in excess of $ 3 million over a three-year period. Id. at 1177-79. UCS's business experienced its greatest growth and success during the time period covered by AMI's complaint. [36] Id.; see also Harnett, Tr. 1750-51.

3.

The characteristics of the data processing industry and IBM's market performance also undermine AMI's contention that IBM possesses the economic power necessary to impose per se liability. HN11[] Technological progress or innovation in an industry generally reflects the presence of economic competition in the market, and is generally inconsistent with the wielding of undue economic power by a firm or group of firms in the industry. See, e.g., Greyhound Computer Corp. v. IBM Corp., 559 F.2d 488, 497 (9th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1040, 54 L. Ed. 2d 790, 98 S. Ct. 782 (1978). The data processing industry has enjoyed impressive technological growth in recent years. "Enormous technological change in computer hardware has occurred in recent years . . . and [51] customers are now able to obtain substantially increased computer power at less cost than was ever possible before." DX 360, p. 10; see also, DX 380, p. 21. In a 1986 report, Burroughs, a company which competes with IBM, see A.P.F. at para. 283, characterized the "information systems industry" as "highly competitive" and observed that competition [*280] in recent years has "intensified as the members of the industry, including many new competitors, have increased the number of products offered." PX 188, p. 5. [37] Control Data Corporation, which also competes with IBM, see A.P.F. at para. 281, reported in 1986 that "the market for general purpose electronic digital computer systems [was] highly competitive," PX 245, p. 3, and that "rapid technological change in the computer industry [had] intensified in recent years as a result of shortened product life cycles and increasing foreign and domestic competition." Id. at 5.

[52] IBM has contributed greatly to the rapid rate of technological innovation in the industry. Prof. Levin acknowledged that "IBM's success in the data processing industry is attributable in part to its role as one of the leading innovators in [the] economy." Levin, Tr. 866. IBM's development of the TCM technology central to this litigation provides a good illustration. IBM spent over a billion dollars and over one thousand man-years of labor to develop the TCM and TCM board. [38] Toole, Tr. 1008. As Prof. William J. Baumol, who testified as an expert economist for IBM, said, IBM's development of the TCM technology was "forced by market pressures, which were demanding quicker, easier, simpler, more reliable installation, which competitors were approximating at the very same time and which IBM was forced to do." Baumol, Tr. 1658-59.

---

[35] The level of employee skill required for a firm to compete successfully is a relevant entry barrier consideration. See Transamerica, 481 F. Supp. at 976. According to Mr. Chisholm of AMI, anyone capable of doing "field-engineering" type work is capable of doing "installation, discontinuance, upgrades and refurbishment." Chisholm, Dep. Tr. 44. Mr. Myland of AMI testified that "anyone with a knowledge a little over basic doorbell circuitry . . . can do feature enhancement, modification, and additions on IBM equipment." Myland, Dep. Tr. 59.

[36] A survey conducted on IBM's behalf concluded that the number of companies engaged in "conversion, upgrade, downgrade activity" grew from 10 in 1970 to nearly 100 in 1985. See Phillips, Tr. 1589.

[37] While recognizing the presence of competition in the industry, Burroughs described IBM as the "dominant competitor". Id.

[38] IBM's research and development expenditures for 1982-1985 totalled $ 15.5 billion and consumed approximately 9 percent of IBM's gross income over that period of time. DX 1924.

[53] IBM's price/performance improvement record also reflects the presence of strong competitive forces in the relevant market. In 1952, IBM announced its 701 computer, which had a price-performance measurement of.02 MIPs per $ 1,000,000. In 1981, IBM announced its 3081K, which employed TCM technology and had a price/performance ratio of 3.1 MIPS per $ 1,000,000 - an increase of over 1500 percent. Granito, Tr. 939-40; DX 1793; see also DX 2021. The 3081K computer represented an increase of more than 120 percent over IBM's 303U computer, announced four years earlier. See DX 1793. Further, IBM's computers were priced with sensitivity toward the "competitive environment" in which the company operated. Ross, Tr. 1364, 1390-91 Prof. Levin acknowledged that one measure of market power is a firm's ability "to move the price [of its products] around without constraint from products outside the market." [39] Levin, Tr. 781-82. IBM lacked such power.

[54] 4.

AMI's contention that IBM possesses sufficient power to justify per se condemnation of IBM's net pricing policy relies heavily on the asserted "uniqueness" of the TCM technology incorporated into the 308X (and 3090) product line. [40] HN12[] Even [*281] absent a showing of market dominance, the requisite economic power may, under special circumstances, be inferred from the desirability or uniqueness of the tying product. See, e.g., United States v. Loew's, 371 U.S. 38, 45, 9 L. Ed. 2d 11, 83 S. Ct. 97 (1962).

[55] IBM obtained a patent for its TCM technology in 1976. PX 598; Granito, Tr. 978-79. TCMs are the "building blocks" or "brains" of the 308X and 3090 computers. Pontikes, Dep. Tr. 29-30; Allen, Dep. Tr. 373-75. They are the critical components of the computer hardware needed to perform 308X upgrades (especially MIPs upgrades); that is, they are the critical components of the alleged tying product. According to AMI, "the uniqueness and sufficiency of economic power of the tying product, parts (TCMs) for net priced 308X MIPS upgrades, are independently established by the existence of patented TCM technology." A.M. at 40.

Contrary to AMI's assertion, HN14[] neither the uniqueness of a product nor the fact that it is patented alone establishes the requisite economic power. Hyde, 466 U.S. at 37 n. 7 (O'Connor, J., concurring) ("A common misconception has been that a patent or copyright, a high market share, or a unique product that competitors are not able to offer suffices to demonstrate market power.") At least one Court has rejected "any absolute presumption of market power for [56] copyright or patented product. . . ." [41] A.I. Root Co. v. Computer Dynamics, Inc., 806 F.2d 673, 676 (6th Cir. 1986). But see Digidyne Corp. v. Data General Corp., 734 F.2d 1336, 1340 n.4 (9th Cir. 1984) ("When the tying product is patented or copyrighted . . . sufficiency of economic power is presumed."), cert. denied, 473 U.S. 908, 87 L. Ed. 2d 657, 105 S. Ct. 3534 (1985). [42]. "[A] patent holder has no market power in any [39] Prof. Levin asserted that another measure of a firm's market power is its rate of return, measured on a stock market valuation basis. Levin, Tr. 860-61. Courts have relied on evidence of a defendant's profit record on the theory that persistent excess profits are inconsistent with market competition. See, e.g., duPont, 351 U.S. at 404. The evidence concerning IBM's rate of return on stock to stockholders does not warrant the conclusion that IBM possesses market power. Compare DX 1215 (IBM) with DX 1352 (AMI).

---

[40] AMI also relies on the fact that large numbers of customers have accepted the tie. See A.M. at 40. This argument requires proof that, at least as to an appreciable number of buyers in the relevant market, net pricing imposed an unwanted or burdensome condition of sale. See Fortner I, 344 U.S. at 503-04. As AMI acknowledges, the argument also requires evidence that "no factor other than the economic power of the seller explains this acceptance." A.M. at 35; see Fortner II, 429 U.S. at 618 n.10; see also Ungar v. Dunkin' Donuts of America, Inc., 531 F.2d 1211, 1225 (3d Cir.) cert. denied, 429 U.S. 823, 50 L. Ed. 2d 84, 97 S. Ct. 74 (1976) (proof HN13[] of acceptance of a burdensome or uneconomic offer of a "tied" product is some evidence of coercion, but such proof alone does not establish, prima facie, the coercion element of a tying claim.) Accepting the continued viability of the reasoning in Fortner I, AMI's argument fails for lack of evidentiary support, as is discussed below. See infra pp. 291-292.

[41] At most, a patent is prima facie evidence of the necessary market power. See Times-Picayune, 345 U.S. at 611 n.30, quoting Standard Oil Co. of Cal. v. United States, 337 U.S. 293, 307, 93 L. Ed. 1371, 69 S. Ct. 1051 (1949). But see Hyde 466 U.S. at 37 n.7. Countervailing evidence must be considered.

relevant sense if there are close substitutes for the patented product." Hyde, 466 U.S. at 37 n.7 (O'Connor, J., concurring); see also Northern Pacific, 356 U.S. at 10 n.8 ("Of course it is common knowledge that a patent does not always confer a monopoly over a particular commodity.") Similarly, one Court has held that "factual uniqueness" is insufficient as a matter of law to establish market power. Will, 776 F.2d at 672; accord, Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 505 n.2 ("Uniqueness confers economic power only when other competitors are in some way prevented from offering the distinctive product themselves."); see also Fortner II, 429 U.S. at 620-21 [57] (the kind of uniqueness considered relevant in tying product cases requires proof that the seller possesses some special "advantage not shared by his competitors"). If competitors can design and offer a package similar to defendant's product for a similar cost, there is no barrier and no market power, and hence no special advantage for purposes of establishing "uniqueness". Will, 776 F.2d at 673.

[58] IBM freely licenses its TCM patent. See Granito, Tr. 987. Further, the great majority of TCM's are owned and controlled by the leasing companies, which compete with IBM and which own 90 percent of all 308X machines sold by IBM. See DX 1847; PX 25. AMI and other companies engaged in the business of upgrading IBM 308X computers use TCMs owned by the leasing companies to perform conversion and modifications. Companies [*282] such as Amdahl, Burroughs, Cray, CDC, and others, which AMI acknowledges compete with IBM in its narrowly defined market for large scale mainframe computers, see, e.g., A.P.F. at paras. 273-64, presumably manufacture computer parts comparable to IBM's TCMs in terms of price and processing power. Even if no such comparable products exist, AMI has not shown that IBM's competitors are somehow prevented from developing products to rival the TCM.

I conclude that the factual uniqueness of IBM's TCMs, which admittedly represent a major technological advance and reflect the increasing demand for technological innovation in the data processing industry, does not warrant an inference that IBM possesses sufficient economic power to impose per se liability. [59] The inference of market power is especially unwarranted where IBM's share of the relevant market is not exceptionally high and other market factors suggest the presence of economic competition in the field.

B.

"Within [HN15[]] a] broad market, well-defined submarkets may exist which, in themselves, constitute product markets for antitrust purposes." Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962). AMI also seeks to establish the requisite economic power by reference to a relevant submarket comprised of the parts and services required for the conversion and upgrade of large-scale mainframe computers. [43] A.P.F. at para. 285.

[60] HN16[] The boundaries of a relevant submarket "may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes,

---

[42] The court in Digidyne also stated that the requisite economic power may be inferred from the tying product's uniqueness, and that, therefore, "it should seldom be necessary in a tie-in sale case [involving a unique product] to embark upon a full-scale factual inquiry into the scope of the relevant market for the tying product and into the corollary problem of the seller's percentage share in that market." Id. Digidyne has been criticized on several grounds, see e.g., Data General Corp. v. Digidyne Corp., 473 U.S. 908, 87 L. Ed. 2d 657, 105 S. Ct. 3534 (White, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari); Will, 776 F.2d at 673 n.4, and I decline to follow it.

[43] AMI also refers to a submarket consisting of upgrades and modifications of IBM large scale mainframe computers. See A.M. at 57, 81. A submarket definition limited to IBM's own product line is untenable. Prof. Levin denied the existence of such a submarket. Levin, Tr. 772-74. Courts have generally rejected market definitions limited to the defendant's products. See, e.g., Seidenstein v. National Medical Enterprises Inc., 769 F.2d 1100, 1106 (5th Cir. 1985); Domed Stadium Hotel, Inc. v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 732 F.2d 480, 488 (5th Cir. 1984); Edward J. Sweeney & Sons, Inc. v. Texaco, Inc., 637 F.2d 105, 117-18 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 911, 68 L. Ed. 2d 300, 101 S. Ct. 1981 (1981); Coleman Motor Co. v. Chrysler Corp., 525 F.2d 1338, 1349 (3d Cir. 1975). Further, the facts of this case do not support a conclusion contrary to the general rule, as my discussion of AMI's proffered submarket definition shows.

and specialized vendors." Brown Shoe, 370 U.S. at 325. The evidence precludes a finding that parts and services required for the conversion and upgrade of large mainframes constitute a submarket distinct from the market consisting of large scale mainframe computers. [44]

There was considerable evidence of competition between, and cross-elasticity of demand for, upgrades and a variety of products, including the large scale mainframes themselves. See supra pp. [61] 271-277. For example, Mr. Chisholm of AMI acknowledged that, "as a general matter, a new box is an alternative to an upgrade. . . ." Chisholm, Dep. Tr. 34. Upgrades and large scale mainframes are reasonable alternatives serving similar data processing needs. The price-sensitivity evidence is especially important. [45] Upgrade prices constrain the prices of new large scale processors; IBM set its net upgrade prices to equal the price differentials of its 308X computers so that customers would not buy one product at the exclusion of the other. See e.g., supra note 15; DX 1861; see also Levin, Tr. 163-64. Finally, IBM upgrades and mainframes are built at the same manufacturing plants and are generally [*283] installed by comparably skilled engineers.

[62] AMI's evidence of IBM's economic power within the alleged submarket also is inadequate. AMI asserts that IBM possesses power in the relevant submarket because IBM performed 2,070 308X MIPs upgrades (of which 1,874 were net-priced), while AMI performed only 16 (of which 11 were equivalent to IBM net-priced upgrades). A.P.F. at para. 299; see also PX 465; Levin, Tr. 110-11. Were there proof of the existence of a relevant submarket consisting solely of upgrades and conversions, or especially of a submarket comprised exclusively of upgrades and conversions of IBM computers, then such evidence might support the inference of power AMI seeks to draw. However, AMI has failed to establish the existence of the prerequisite submarket.

C.

There are separate grounds for concluding that per se condemnation of net pricing is unwarranted. The amount and value of labor involved in performing 308X MIPS upgrades is insignificant compared to the value of the requisite upgrade parts. As a result, AMI has not been foreclosed from a viable business opportunity by IBM's policy.

1.

A major design objective for the TCM and TCM board technology (the TCMs are plugged into the TCM board) was to enable [63] alterations to 380X computers to be performed relatively quickly and with little labor. Granito, Tr. 925-27, 950, 979-81. There is ample evidence that IBM attained the desired result. The TCM technology allowed 308X upgrades to be performed considerably faster, with fewer parts involved, and with less risk of malfunctions than was possible with previous technologies, including the technology embodied in IBM's 303X product line. See Granito, Tr. 951-57; Brong, Dep. Tr. 80; Broomall, Dep. Tr. 68; Morrow, Dep. Tr. 163-65. For example, the labor required to add 1.1 MIPS to a 3033S processor (to convert it to a 3033N) was up to 20 times greater than the labor required to add 2 MIPS to a 3083E processor (to convert it to a 3083B). See Chisholm, Dep. Tr. 62-68; DX 1799.

The resulting and dramatic decline in the amount and value of labor required to perform 308X upgrades has redefined the niche in the computer market occupied by AMI. This decline has eliminated business opportunities once available. By itself, such a result does not offend the antitrust laws. HN17[] The antitrust laws were enacted [64] for "the protection of competition, not competitors." [46] Brown Shoe, 370 U.S. at 320. The value of the labor content of 308X MIPS upgrades is de minimus for antitrust purposes.

---

[44] Prof. Levin failed to recognize a distinction between a market consisting of conversions and upgrades of large scale mainframes, and a market comprised of the large scale computers themselves. Levin, Tr. 774-76.

[45] In Columbia Metal Culvert Co. v. Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., 579 F.2d 20, 28 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 876, 58 L. Ed. 2d 190, 99 S. Ct. 214 (1978) upon which AMI relies, evidence that price differentials did not significantly impact on customer preferences supported the argument that distinct submarkets existed.

[46] See also ILC Peripherals v. International Business Machines Corp. (Memorex I), 448 F. Supp. 228, 233 ("Just as buggy whip manufacturers had to face the fact that the invention of the automobile meant the end of their market as they had known it, this

IBM's Director of Finance, Alan Ross, prepared a chart setting forth, among other things, IBM's calculations of the value of the labor content of all 308X MIPS upgrades performed during the years relevant to the complaint. See DX 1805A. Mr. Ross used 1985 MES prices and the 1985 hourly rate for field installation labor. Based [65] on Mr. Ross's calculations, the value of the labor content of the upgrades averaged 1.2 percent of the net MES price. See DX 3001. With respect to all but the D to K upgrade, the value of the labor content equalled or was less than 1.2 percent of the net price of the MES. [47] Id.

At his deposition, Larry Allen, AMI's President, stated that if IBM sold the parts required for an E to B upgrade for $ 417,600 (i.e., at a price reflecting a reduction of $ 2,400 from the net MES price of $ 420,000, to account for the value of IBM labor not [*284] provided), it would not present AMI with a viable opportunity to compete with IBM. Allen, Dep. Tr. 938-39; see also Allen, Tr. 371. AMI would not be able to compete with IBM if the value of the labor content of the E to B upgrade were.6 percent [66] of the net MES price for the upgrade. See also Allen, Dep. Tr. 968-69 (B to K upgrade). Nor would AMI, according to Mr. Allen, be able to compete with IBM if the value of the labor content of a 308X MIPS upgrade equalled.9 percent of the net upgrade price. Allen, Dep. Tr. 968 (B to J upgrade); Allen, Tr. 372. Contrary to his deposition testimony, Mr. Allen stated at trial that the same parts prices and labor content figures would, in fact, present AMI with a viable business opportunity. See Allen, Tr. 369-372. I regard Mr. Allen's trial testimony on this subject as hyperbolic. I credit his deposition testimony, and not his trial testimony.

At trial, Mr. Allen also testified that AMI would be presented with a viable business opportunity if it were able to buy 308X MIPS upgrade parts from IBM without IBM labor included at prices reflecting a labor content value equal to 1.2 percent of the net MES price. Allen, Tr. 373-74. Mr. Allen's testimony contradicted his earlier statement that no service organization, including AMI, could survive on a 1.87 percent return on its investment in parts needed to perform upgrades. See DX 2066. [48] [68] I do not credit Mr. Allen's testimony [67] that AMI could survive on a 1.2 percent rate of return on its investment in upgrade parts. See also infra note 68. There was no other evidence that AMI could survive on such a rate of return. [49] If AMI were to buy the upgrade parts from IBM at IBM's "MES price without labor" [50] (see DX 1805A, Column 6), it would not, on the whole, be able to perform the upgrades and charge customers what IBM charges for the same upgrades on a net price basis and still recover what AMI would regard as an acceptable profit. [51]

---

new disk storage technology will have a serious impact on the market for customer-removable disk products. However, the antitrust laws were not designed to insure the maintenance of the status quo for any competitor.")

[47] The value of the labor content also exceeded 1.2 percent of the value of the net priced MES with respect to the CX to EX upgrade, see DX 3001, but the number of such upgrades performed (2)is insignificant.

[48] In July, 1984, during settlement discussions, AMI declined IBM's offer to sell AMI 308X upgrade parts without IBM labor included at prices below IBM's net MES prices. Mr. Allen wrote: "On 3081 quantities ordered on your contract as presented, AMI would spend over three million dollars. Our maximum return on this purchase would be $ 65,000. That makes a 1.87 percent return on our investment. I am quite confident that no service organization can survive on that profit margin." DX 2066; see Allen, Tr. 374-75. DX 2066 is admissible for impeachment purposes under Fed. R. Evid. 408. See, e.g., Reichenbach v. Smith, 528 F.2d 1072, 1075 (5th Cir. 1976) ("Rule HN18[] 408 codifies a trend in case law that permits cross-examination concerning a settlement for purpose of impeachment."); Stainton v. Tarantino, 637 F. Supp. 1051, 1080-82 (E.D. Pa. 1986).

[49] At his deposition, Mr. Allen asserted that he could not state what AMI would regard as an acceptable rate of return on its investment in parts. See Allen, Tr. 378-79.

[50] Such prices are lower than IBM's net MES prices, against which Mr. Ross's labor content percentages are calculated. Thus, the figures in DX 1805A, Column 7, slightly understate what AMI's rate of return would be if it bought IBM parts at the SWRPQ price and installed upgrades at prices charged by IBM for net priced upgrades.

[51] I reach this conclusion, and my final decision, without consideration of DX 2069 and AMI's response thereto. However, I note that, on October 10, 1985, AMI rejected IBM's settlement offer to sell AMI numerous net priced MESs without IBM labor included at prices consistent with Mr. Ross's calculations. See A.P.F. at paras. 310, 312; DX 2069. Although Fed. R. Evid. 408 limits the [69] Were IBM required to price and sell 308X upgrade parts and labor separately, it would not be required to sell the parts at a price lower than the difference between the MES net prices and Mr. Ross's figures for the value of the labor content of 308X upgrades, provided that Mr. Ross's calculations allow IBM to recover its direct and indirect labor costs, plus a reasonable profit. [52] IBM 308X upgrade parts sold at such prices would not present AMI with a viable [*285] business opportunity. Unless Mr. Ross's estimates are unduly low, AMI has not been forceclosed from a viable business opportunity as a result of net pricing.

AMI argues that "the labor content [70] of net priced MIPs upgrades, as estimated by IBM, is significantly understated," A.T.M. at 46, and that IBM's estimated value of the labor content is "unrealistically low." Id. at 47. [53] Of course, where two products are sold only as a package, it is difficult to ascertain the true cost of either. See Hyde, 466 U.S. at 15.

a.

Mr. Ross's figures are based on the pricing methodology that is used by IBM to determine its SWRPQ prices for memory and model upgrades. Ross, Tr. 1369, 1381-82; see also Granito, Tr. 984; Beckwith, Tr. 1284-96, 1298, 1358. IBM sells the J to K MIPS upgrade (which does not require the removal of TCMs) optionally on an SWRPQ basis at the price listed on Mr. [71] Ross's chart. It is IBM's actual SWRPQ price. IBM used the same method to determine the value of the labor component of the other MESs which IBM sells only on a net priced basis. See Ross, Tr. 1881-82. Thus, although the calculations for upgrades other than the J to K upgrade were made for trial purposes, the methodology employed was not. As Mr. Ross's chart explains, the labor content of every MIPS upgrade is determined by: 1) taking the average installation hours for each upgrade from IBM's field service cost estimates; 2) multiplying those hours by the 1985 field installation rate for IBM labor; 3) adding 7 percent for travel time and 10 percent for contingency; and 4) subtracting $ 100 for handling. See Ross, Tr. 1378-79, 1381-83, 1396-97; DX 1805A; DX 2215.

As AMI contends, IBM's figures underestimate the value of the alleged tied product because Mr. Ross's estimates account only for field installation labor. AMI's definition of the tied product includes all engineering labor required to perform the upgrade, including the engineering services performed prior to the installation of the upgrade. The fabrication work not taken into account by Mr. Ross's estimates includes [72] planning (e.g., determining the computer's E.C. level) [54] and diagnostic work, and the revision of the (upgraded) computer's microcode. [55] Levin, Tr. 64-66. Fabrication work may require a different degree of skilled labor than is required by field installation work. See Gibson, Dep. Tr. 333-34; Beckwith, Tr. 1316-17.

---

admissibility of evidence of settlement discussions, AMI included the fact that it declined IBM's 1985 settlement offer in its Proposed Findings of Fact and, thus, may have waived any objection to its admissibility.

[52] Prof. Levin acknowledged that, if IBM's labor content figures enable IBM to recover all costs associated with the properly defined service component of upgrades, plus a profit, then IBM would be under no obligation to set its prices at a level at which AMI could earn a profit. Levin, Tr. 218-19; see also Baumol, Tr. 1697; Ross, Tr. 1398-99.

[53] AMI does not assert that IBM's labor component prices are "predatory"; i.e., below cost. AMI suggests, however, that IBM transfers profits from its sale of the parts required to perform upgrades to its sale of the labor services involved. A.R.M. at 39. There is no evidence to support this assertion.

[54] The EC (engineering change) level of a machine must be determined before building the upgrade. The EC levels of machines may differ even within the same model. See Allen, Tr. 251-52. IBM installs ECs at no charge to the customer. Granito, Tr. 963-65.

[55] Microcode contains programs which support each configuration of a 308X computer and control various computer functions. Allen, Tr. 251-52; Zartler, Dep. Tr. 63. In order to reconfigure a 308X computer, it is necessary to modify the machine's microcode. See Allen, Tr. 251-53, 267-70. Such modification may involve the alteration of one to sixty microcode diskettes. Id. at 252-53, 268-69.

Although the amount and quality [73] of fabrication work needed to perform 308X upgrades is relatively small and considerably less than it was with respect to prior technologies as a result of the TCM technology and the automated Machine Level Control System, see Ross, Tr. 1384-85; Bigando, Tr. 1236-39; Granito, Tr. 961-62, 976-77; Beckwith, Tr. 1285, 1300-01, 1316-17, an adjustment must be made to Mr. Ross's figures to account for the work. [56] (I discuss the necessary adjustments below. See infra p. 287). Otherwise, and except for what AMI calls the "IBM test", which IBM does not do, IBM's estimate of the labor component of 308X upgrades, reflected in Mr. Ross's calculations, includes all the activities which AMI asserts are [*286] necessary to perform the upgrade. See Beckwith, Tr. 1292-94. [57]

[74] AMI also contends that the hourly rate contained in Mr. Ross's estimates understates the actual value of the labor ("installation" and "fabrication") required to perform upgrades, in part because the $ 165/hr rate reflects IBM's standard hourly rate for maintenance services (on a time and materials basis) and not the rate IBM used when it performed upgrades on an RPQ basis. A.M. at 47; see Lewis, Tr. 499-500. AMI ignores the fact that the hourly rate used by Mr. Ross was the rate actually used by IBM to determine the SWRPQ price of the J to K upgrade. Further, IBM uses the same customer engineers to perform upgrades as it uses to do maintenance work. Beckwith, Tr. 1284-96, 1298, 1358; Granito, Tr. 984. The $ 165/hr rate enables IBM to recover its labor costs plus a profit. Ross, Tr. 1381-82. The prices used by Mr. Ross are IBM's real prices for the services provided. See Beckwith, Tr. 1284-94.

AMI argues that IBM's $ 165/hr rate is significantly lower than the rate reflected by the prices AMI and IBM obtained for "reconfiguration" services using donor or customer-owned parts. [58] During the relevant years, AMI performed eleven upgrades equivalent to 308X MIPS upgrades [75] using customer-owned parts, and received considerably more than $ 165/hr. See PX 466; Levin, Tr. 110-11. AMI's evidence that IBM charged and obtained upgrade prices reflecting hourly labor rates greater than Mr. Ross's estimates, however, is unpersuasive. [59]

[76] AMI asserts that IBM would have charged Comdisco $ 50,000 to perform a "Q-split", making IBM's effective hourly rate $ 1000. A.P.F. at para. 156; see Lewis, Tr. 1714-15; see also DX 2268; DX 1579. IBM's hours to perform a Q-split are 50.6. See DX 1579. A "Q-split" involves separating an IBM Q mainframe into two model 3081K computers operating independently. See DX 2268. There is no evidence that IBM performed the Q-split (AMI did it for $ 30,000), Lewis, Tr. 492-93, 1714-15, and a Q-split is not an upgrade. What IBM would charge for the labor component of a reconfiguration which is not a model upgrade is of little relevance to the issues in this litigation. More importantly, AMI's calculation of IBM's effective hourly rate incorrectly assumes that the $ 50,000 price reflected only IBM's labor charges; in fact, IBM's labor charges accounted for less than twenty percent of the total price. See DX 1579.

---

[56] IBM argues that fabrication work, to the extent not already included in Mr. Ross's figures, is trivial; see IBM's Proposed Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law at para. 260; however, I do not think that it can be overlooked.

[57] IBM's estimates of the labor hours required to upgrade 308X computers are generally the same as AMI's, and in some cases exceed AMI's estimates - even though IBM does not include (and AMI does include) the time needed to perform what AMI describes as "IBM test" and "Determining Parts". See DX 1580 (especially, p. 90654); DX 1805; PX 447-58; PX 447-60; PX 447-62; PX 447-68; see also Chisholm, Dep. Tr. 62-67; cf. DX 1926.

[58] AMI contends that this is the "best method" to determine the value of the allegedly tied engineering services, A.M. at 44, since it reflects customer demand. AMI argues that "[Mr.] Ross's estimates do not . . . reflect the value of reconfiguration service in the marketplace." A.R.M. at 32. However, IBM's SWRPQ price for the J to K upgrade, which is based on a $ 165 hourly rate for installation labor, is IBM's actual competitive price in the market.

[59] At best, AMI has shown that on several occasions it was able to perform the equivalent of IBM 308X MIPs upgrades while charging substantially more for its labor services than IBM. However, IBM showed that, based on AMI admissions (.9 rate of return and 3 percent inventory costs, see infra), AMI would have had no viable business opportunity even if it would have been able to command the higher prices and perform the upgrades. See DX 3000.

AMI also established that IBM requested $ 200,000 to perform a "Q to K/K to Q" reconfiguration for Comdisco, see Lewis, Tr. 1714-15, which AMI estimates requires 85.5 hours of engineering labor. See PX 447-68; Allen, Tr. 264-66. IBM estimates 105 hours. [77] See DX 2281 at 2; DX 2282 at 2; DX 2283 at 2; DX 2284 at 2; DX 2268A (the exhibits show the FE hours involved in the requisite activities). Comdisco paid AMI $ 80,000 to do the "Q to K/K to Q" reconfiguration. Lewis, Tr. 1714-15. AMI implies, but does not assert, that IBM's hourly rate for services required to perform a "Q to K/K to Q" reconfiguration [*287] exceeds $ 2000. However, the $ 200,000 price quotation included the price of necessary parts; the effective hourly rate was about $ 200. See DX 1579 at 3; DX 2281 at 2; DX 2282 at 2; DX 2284 at 2; DX 2268A; DX 2279.

AMI also contends that Mr. Ross's estimates understate the true labor content of 308X MIPs upgrades because they "do not take account of the fact that a net priced MES sold by IBM includes the labor content of one year of warranty service." A.M. at 47. AMI's argument appears to be that the labor involved in performing 308X MIPS upgrades (previously defined as "installation" and "fabrication" labor) also includes the labor component of the warranty maintenance service provided with IBM net priced upgrades. Although AMI has relied on various definitions of the tied product during the course of litigation, [78] see supra note 12, it never advanced such a definition prior to trial and cannot pursue it at this time. Cf. Johnson v. Trueblood, 629 F.2d 287, 294-95 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 999, 68 L. Ed. 2d 200, 101 S. Ct. 1704 (1981). Furthermore, AMI provided no evidence concerning the labor content of IBM's warranty maintenance service. The prices of IBM's maintenance agreements do not equal IBM's costs for providing the service.

The evidence compellingly showed that technological advances incorporated in the 308X computer system have reduced the amount of labor involved in performing 308X MIPs upgrades [60] to an amount which is insignificant and de minimus for antitrust purposes. With a modification to account for "fabrication" labor, I adopt Mr. Ross's estimates of the labor content of 308X MIPS upgrades. I also credit Mr. Ross's assertion that IBM's $ 165 hourly rate for installation services allows it to recover its labor costs plus a reasonable profit. Therefore, were I to require IBM to sell the parts involved in such upgrades without IBM labor included, I would not require IBM to sell the parts at a price reflecting a greater [79] reduction from IBM's current net price than that suggested by Mr. Ross's figures, after adjusting for fabrication work. [61]

b.

To reflect more accurately the amount (and quality) of the labor component of 308X MIPS upgrades as AMI has defined it, Mr. Ross's figures must be adjusted to include fabrication work. Prof. Levin testified that Mr. Ross's "installation" figures had to be adjusted by as much as 65 percent. See Levin, Tr. 105-09; see also PX 462; PX 463; PX 464; PX 416; PX 425. The evidence does not warrant such an increase. [62] Prof. Levin's estimates of the [80] "fabrication" component of 308X MIPs upgrades relies on IBM prices for certain memory and channel upgrades performed by IBM with customer-owned parts between December 1983 and November 1984, from which AMI calculated the percentage of the total labor attributable to "fabrications and support (non-installation) activities." See A.P.F. at para. 168. Prof. Levin's estimates expressly include more than just fabrication activities and do not involve model (MIPS) upgrades. The reliability of the methodology and the figures, for purposes of calculating the fabrication component of 308X MIPS upgrades, is therefore suspect.

---

[60] Although the focus has been on MIPS upgrades, my analysis applies to all 308X upgrades involving TCM technology. Half of all memory upgrades were net priced, but not all of them involved the TCM technology; some used the predecessor MST technology.

[61] Nor would I require IBM to sell the necessary parts on an OTC basis at an aggregate price lower than the price suggested by Mr. Ross's estimates, after adjusting for fabrication.

[62] Even if Mr. Ross's figures were increased by 65 percent, AMI would not have a viable business opportunity if only a few of the expenses AMI would necessarily incur to perform the work were taken into account. See DX 3001; DX 1927; see also Levin, Tr. 197-204; Ross, Tr. 1392-96.

Furthermore, the field engineering prices relied upon by Prof. Levin were "corrected" by IBM, see Ross, [81] Tr. 1387-89, and made "more competitive" in 1984, before [*288] this action was brought. [63] See PX 377 at 89707. Mr. Ross relied upon the corrected, "more competitive", and uncontested 1985 prices. See Ross, Tr. 1387-89; DX 2091; PX 410; PX 422; PX 464. Prof. Levin knew that IBM had changed the prices he used to arrive at the 65 percent adjustment figure, but made no attempt to adjust the figure to reflect IBM's corrected prices. Levin, Tr. 119-22, 125-28, 131-33. IBM did and, using Prof. Levin's methodology, determined that non-installation (including fabrication) services accounted for 11 (not 65) percent of the total labor involved in performing upgrades. See Ross, Tr. 1398-99; PX 410; PX 422; PX 464; DX 3001A. This is the most accurate estimate produced at trial and I adopt it. Mr. Ross's figures, which excluded the amount of labor represented by fabrication work, must therefore be increased by 11 percent to account for the total labor (as defined by AMI) involved in 308X MIPS upgrades.

[82] c.

Using IBM's 1985 labor and MES prices, adjusting Mr. Ross's calculation of the labor component by 11 percent, and taking into account a few of the expenses (inventory and transportation costs) AMI would incur if it performed all MIPS upgrades IBM performed during the relevant years, [64] one can assess the impact on AMI's business if IBM unbundled its sales of 308X MIPS upgrade parts and labor, and AMI bought the parts from IBM and acquired all of IBM's MIPS upgrade business. [65] [83] AMI would lose over $ 35 million. See DX 3001A. [66]

AMI disputes IBM's assertion that AMI would always incur inventory holding costs of 3 percent of the upgrade purchase price. [67] A.R.M. at 36. The 3 percent figure is based on an interest rate of 12 percent and a holding period of 3 months. See PX 379, at 19, 21; Allen, Tr. 378. AMI's principal argument is that AMI would not incur such costs if AMI's major customers, the leasing companies, instead of AMI, purchased and stored the parts for subsequent use. A.R.M. at 37. AMI does not deny that it would incur inventory holding costs if it had to warehouse the parts itself. AMI stored 303X parts it acquired from IBM for subsequent installations, and incurred the 3 percent inventory carrying cost. Levin, Tr. 195, 199. Further, Mr. Allen stated that AMI would incur the 3 percent inventory cost [84] if it "were permitted to compete in this market of [308X] net [*289] priced MESs." Allen Tr. 377-78; see also DX 197 (AMI inventory of MESs it owned). I therefore conclude that it is appropriate to include such holding costs among AMI's expenses.

---

[63] AMI suggests that IBM's lower and "more competitive" SWRPQ installation labor price of $ 165/hr. was designed to prevent third party installation of IBM features bought on an SWRPQ basis. See A.R.M. at 35 n*. AMI relies on a 1983 memorandum by Mr. Gibson in which he states, "Since third parties see an opportunity here, we should re-examine the SWRPQ price," and "It appears the $ 221 effective rate is high and allows enough of an umbrella for a third party to install the MES." PX 151. The memorandum, however, refers to a 303X feature, not a 308X upgrade, see id., and the effective hourly rate was not $ 221/hr, as Mr. Gibson assumed, but $ 161/hr. See PX 440 (stating that if the $ 161 hourly rate were to be modified, it should be increased to $ 186/hr.). Furthermore, absent proof of below-cost pricing, it would not be unlawful for IBM to "reexamine" its prices in order to compete more effectively.

[64] Additional expenses which AMI would incur include: the increased labor costs required to perform the additional upgrades (this amount would be large, see Houghton, Tr. 1453-56; Beckwith, Tr. 1302-03; Baumol, Tr. 1650-51; Ross, Tr. 1396; DX 1776A); additional expenses for marketing and inventory management; increased expenses for property, plant, and equipment; additional inventory insurance; and added interest expenses. See Houghton, Tr. 1453-56; Baumol, Tr. 1650-55; DX 1925.

[65] If AMI took over only a portion of IBM's business, its revenues and expenses would be adjusted accordingly, and the impact on AMI's business would be proportionately the same.

[66] The only way AMI could engage in the 308X upgrade business profitably, were the needed parts sold without IBM labor, would be if customers were willing to pay a substantial premium for AMI's services. The record does not support a finding that such a possibility exists. See infra. pp. 290-291.

[67] AMI does not appear to contest IBM's assertion, which is supported by the record, that AMI would incur out of pocket travel expenses equivalent to $ 1,500 per transaction. See Levin, Tr. 203; PX 379, at 20-21.

AMI's business prospects would not be greatly improved if its anticipated inventory costs were reduced from 3 percent to 2 percent (to reflect a shorter holding period) and actual IBM prices (rather than 1985 prices) for 308X upgrade labor and MESs (net-priced) for the period 1982 to 1986 are considered. [68] [85] In such event, AMI would lose over $ 26 million. [69] See DX 3001B; Ross, Tr. 1400-01.

My conclusion that AMI has no viable business opportunity concerning 308X upgrades excludes from the analysis at least as many considerations favorable to IBM as to AMI. For example, I have not further adjusted Mr. Ross's figures concerning the value of the labor component of 308X upgrades to reflect an arguably greater level of skill that may be involved in fabrication work. See supra p. 283. [70] On the other hand, I have not included in my assessment of AMI's business opportunities a range of additional and evidently considerable expenses which AMI would incur proportionately to the amount of IBM upgrade business it took over. See supra note 64. These refinements would not change the fact that technological advancements have so reduced the amount of labor involved in performing 308X MIPS upgrades that it represents a relatively insignificant percent of the value of the associated hardware.

[86] 2.

HN19[] Per se condemnation of a tying arrangement may be warranted when the seller possesses the degree or kind of market power that enables it to force customers to purchase a second product (which the buyer either does not want at all or would prefer to purchase elsewhere on different terms) in order to obtain the tying product. Hyde, 466 U.S. at 17-18. Proof of a per se unlawful tying arrangement requires proof of the existence of two separate and distinct products or services. I have already concluded that AMI has failed to show that IBM possesses the requisite economic power to force or coerce buyers. My findings that the value of the labor content of 308X MIPs upgrades is negligible and that IBM's net pricing has not precluded AMI from engaging in a viable business are relevant to the issue of the existence of two separate products.

"Whether one or two products are involved turns . . . on the character of the demand for the two items." Hyde, 466 U.S. at 19; see also, Will, 776 F.2d at 671 n.1 ("A tie involves products [87] that may be sold in separate markets."). In this case, no unlawful tying arrangement can exist unless there is sufficient demand for the labor service involved in performing 308X upgrades, separate from the demand for the requisite parts, to identify a distinct product market in which it is efficient to offer the former separately from the latter. See Hyde, 466 U.S. at 21-22.

AMI has failed to establish the requisite separate demand for the services it defines as the tied product. [71] The evidence [*290] is especially lacking with respect to end-users of 308X computers. Although some expressed an interest in having a choice among suppliers of upgrades, see, e.g., Shah, Tr. 1529-30; English, Tr. at 1567-69, most expressed no interest in having 308X upgrade parts and labor provided separately. End-users tended to view the parts and labor as a single product. William E. McKinley, of Kent State University, testified that he was "very definitely not interested in having parts arrive from one source and installation arriving from another source."

---

[68] If actual IBM prices for 308X labor and net priced MESs are used instead of Mr. Ross's original figures, which applied 1985 prices for both through the period 1982 to 1986, the average labor content of all MES upgrades would be.8 percent of the purchase price of the net priced MES, see DX 3001B; i.e., an amount lower than Mr. Ross's estimate of 1.2 percent, and lower than the.9 percent deemed unprofitable by AMI.

[69] If actual prices during the 1982-1986 period are used, and the 3 percent inventory cost figure retained, AMI would lose over $ 48 million.

[70] I relied on Prof. Levin's methodology, which made no distinction between the quality of installation and fabrication labor, but measured only the additional quantity of labor associated with fabrication work.

[71] At trial, AMI counsel acknowledged that if the value of the labor content of 308X upgrades were de minimus, the two products would be considered a "single product": If that were the case, "what the customer really wants is the feature. He doesn't care about the installation." AMI Opening Statement, Tr. 10-12. AMI counsel stated that "$ 2400 out of a much larger cost for the feature" would be de minimus. Id. That is the case involving the E to B 308X upgrade. See DX 1805A.

McKinley, Tr. 1503-04. Bipin Shah, of Core States Financial Corporation, testified that he did not "shop around for [88] parts and labor." His company asks for a single "upgrade price, total, end to end . . . you come in and do the whole job and you quote a price on that." Shah, Tr. 1526. Thomas English, of Federal Mogul Corporation, had no interest in separately acquiring the parts for upgrades and shopping around for installation services. English, Tr. 1566-67. Thomas Druding, Computer Configurations Specialist for City of Philadelphia, testified that he was not aware of any situation in which the City had requested separate prices for upgrade parts and installation. Druding, Dep. Tr. 9-11. First Pennsylvania Bank of Philadelphia purchased J to K upgrade parts (which IBM sells SWRPQ) from one source and used AMI to install the upgrade, but did not purchase the parts from IBM or another company which could also install the upgrade. Wilde, Dep. Tr. 26-34. David Ness, of TV Guide, testified that he was uncertain but thought he would be interested in purchasing 308X upgrade parts without the labor included if his company's technical staff had the skill to perform the upgrade. Ness, Tr. 1550.

[89] Unlike end-users, leasing company witnesses expressed a desire for alternative sources of upgrade parts and labor. CMI Executive Vice President Gary Smith distinguished between the parts and labor involved in an upgrade, and said CMI wanted the option of having "IBM or . . . somebody else do the work." Smith, Tr. 579. Melvin Lewis of Comdisco testified that Comdisco wanted IBM to price parts and labor separately. [72] Lewis, Tr. 478-79, 1717. Comdisco wished to have the choice of having AMI install upgrades using parts (features) purchased from IBM without IBM labor included because of the greater "flexibility" AMI provided. See Lewis, Tr. 456-57, 476-78, 480-82, 548-49. CMI also regarded AMI's relatively prompt reconfiguration service as important. See Smith, Tr. 581-82.

[90] Although there was evidence of demand on the part of some leasing companies for separately-provided 308X upgrade labor, AMI failed to establish the existence of demand for such labor at the prices AMI would admittedly have to charge in order to provide the service. For AMI to engage in the business of providing 308X upgrade services (based on the schedule of upgrade parts prices IBM would be entitled to set), it would have to charge considerably more than IBM for essentially the same service.

There is insufficient evidence of demand for upgrade labor at prices AMI would have to charge to support a conclusion that a competitive market for 308X upgrade labor does or could exist. Leasing companies have purchased virtually no 308X model, memory, or channel upgrades without IBM labor included (in order, for instance, to have AMI install the upgrade) when such upgrades were available on an SWRPQ basis (which roughly equals the price IBM would be entitled to charge for its parts). [73] See DX 2265; DX 1063; DX 1584. Every J to K upgrade purchased by [*291] CMI and Comdisco was bought with IBM installation service included even though IBM also sold the feature on an SWRPQ basis. [91] [74] See Lewis, Tr. 1720; Smith, Dep. Tr. 130-33. AMI bought only two J to K upgrades from IBM (out of 142 such upgrades sold by IBM) on an SWRPQ basis between 1982 and 1985. Allen, Tr. 382. AMI installed only one of the two J to K upgrades; it used the parts of the second J to K upgrade to perform a B to J upgrade. See Allen, Dep. Tr. 1252, 1256-57; DX 79; DX 137; DX 1363, p. 8333. One of the reasons why AMI was uninterested in buying more SWRPQ J to K upgrades from IBM was the price. Allen, Tr. 374-75, 380-83; DX 1805; DX 1401 at 16-23, 42, 45, 56.

---

[72] In the majority of instances when Comdisco sells an upgrade to an end user, it does not quote a separate price for the installation labor involved in the upgrade; it sells the user a "result that includes both the parts and the labor." Lewis, Tr. 502-03. CMI also generally charges its upgrade customers a single price for the parts and the installation labor. Smith, Tr. 613-14; see also, Loria, Tr. 674-76. CMI's customers generally request a single price for the installed upgrade. Smith, Tr. 614.

[73] The "MES Price(s) Without Labor" set forth in DX 1805 fail to deduct for installation labor and would have to be reduced accordingly.

[74] Witnesses from CMI and Comdisco testified that neither company knew that IBM sold upgrades (including the J to K) without IBM labor included. See Lewis, Tr. 1721; Loria, Tr. 654-58; 660-61; Smith, Tr. 611-13. I do not credit such testimony, as there was documentary evidence (requests for IBM "SW" prices) to the contrary. DX 2265 (Smith); DX 2261, DX 2262, DX 2263 (Loria); DX 2260, DX 2266 (Lewis). Further, the SWRPQ procedure has existed since 1975. DX 2219. SWRPQ prices are readily available from IBM. See Ross, Tr. 1371-72; Robertson, Tr. 693-94; Ritchie, Tr. 1114, 1120. AMI acknowledged that SWRPQ prices are made available from IBM when specifically requested. A.P.F. at para. 99.

[92] AMI produced evidence that Comdisco used AMI to install a number of MESs even though Comdisco had bought the MESs from IBM with IBM installation labor included. See Lewis, Tr. 545-46, 500-01. However, Mr. Lewis of Comdisco explained that he would use AMI installation service only if it were "lesser than, the same as, or in rare exceptions, only a slight premium above the prevailing IBM list price." Lewis, Tr. 549. Using an E to B upgrade as an example, Mr. Lewis testified that he would not regard an AMI hourly rate of $ 1500 for installation service as only slightly greater than an IBM hourly rate of $ 180 or $ 200. [75] Lewis, Tr. 1724. Mr. Smith of CMI testified that, other things being equal, he did not wish to pay 10, 20 or 30 times more than necessary to obtain installation service. Smith Tr. 607-09. When AMI performed a J to K upgrade for CMI with the J to K upgrade parts AMI bought from IBM on an SWRPQ basis in 1984, it charged CMI the same price IBM would have charged for the installed upgrade; it did not charge a premium. See DX 55; DX 57; PX 1-y at 140, 836.

[93] 3.

The evidence that leasing companies would not select AMI's more expensive installation services if IBM unbundled the sale of 308X features and labor is relevant also to the issue of IBM's economic power. AMI sought to establish that IBM possesses the requisite market power to warrant per se condemnation by reference to the "substantial volume of purchases of unwanted IBM engineering service as a result of net pricing. . . ." A.R.M. at 25. For example, AMI contends that, absent net pricing, Comdisco "would utilize AMI or other third party fabricators to fabricate and install a significant number of upgrades." A.P.F. at para. 106.

AMI's position requires proof that buyers considered the requirement of buying IBM labor a burdensome term of the 308X upgrade sales agreement and would not have purchased IBM's labor but for IBM's requirement that they do so. See Northern Pacific, 356 U.S. at 7-8 ("The very existence of this host of tying arrangements is itself compelling evidence of the defendant's great power, at least where, as here, no other explanation has been offered for the existence of these restraints."); Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 503-04 [94] (The "concern is whether the seller has the power to raise prices, or impose other burdensome terms [*292] such as a tie-in, with respect to any appreciable number of buyers within the market."); Advance Business Systems & Supply Co. v. SCM Corp., 415 F.2d 55, 69 (4th Cir. 1969) ("Acquiescence in the burdensome term by an appreciable number of customers gives rise to an inference" of economic power.); cert. denied, 397 U.S. 920, 25 L. Ed. 2d 101, 90 S. Ct. 928 (1970).

The evidence established that buyers who complained about having to purchase IBM labor along with upgrade parts assumed that they could obtain installation labor from alternative sources, such at AMI, at prices comparable to or competitive with those of IBM. Based on the evidence, I conclude that no buyer would have regarded the purchase of IBM labor as "unwanted" or "burdensome" had it known of the disparity of prices at which IBM and AMI would provide installation labor if IBM discontinued net pricing. Absent net pricing, buyers would likely continue to use IBM installation services. Therefore, proof of the purchase of IBM's labor by buyers opposed to net pricing does not establish [95] that IBM possesses the economic power to "force" or "coerce" buyers into buying a product they do not want. "If HN20[] the product in the second market would be accepted anyway, because of its own merit then, of course, no leverage is involved; . . . there is no use of the seller's market power." Ungar v. Dunkin' Donuts of America, Inc., 531 F.2d 1211, 1218 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 823, 50 L. Ed. 2d 84, 97 S. Ct. 74 (1976); see also Fortner II, 429 U.S. at 618 n.10 (The approach to establishing economic power suggested in Advance Business Systems "depends on the absence of other explanations for the willingness of buyers to purchase the package. . . ."). [76]

---

[75] Using customer-owned parts, AMI charged Comdisco between $ 25,000 and $ 30,000 for installing an E to B upgrade, requiring approximately 20 man hours. Lewis, Tr. 1723. Based on Mr. Ross's calculations, the value of IBM installation service for an E to B upgrade, requiring about 13 man hours of labor, see DX 1926, is $ 2,400. DX 1085A. Based on these facts and Mr. Lewis' assertions, it is fair to conclude that Comdisco would not select AMI over IBM to install a new E to B upgrade if it had the choice. In view of this evidence, I do not accept AMI's assertion at closing argument that leasing companies "don't care whether the service costs $ 2400 or $ 20,000." Post Trial Oral Argument, Levy, at 30.

[76] Even if there had been proof of acceptance by buyers of burdensome terms, such proof would be evidence of coercion, but would not, alone, "suffice to establish, prima facie, the coercion element of an illegal tie-in claim." Ungar, 531 F.2d at 1225.

[96] 4.

HN21[] There is no per se rule against tying arrangements "unless a substantial volume of commerce is foreclosed thereby." Hyde, 466 U.S. at 16; see also Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 501 (The "controlling consideration is . . . whether a total amount of business, substantial enough in terms of dollar volume so as not to be merely de minimis, is foreclosed to competition by the tie.").

If Mr. Ross's unadjusted estimate of the value of the labor component of 308X MIPS upgrades is used, and that amount is multiplied by the number of such upgrades performed by IBM during the relevant time period, and those figures are added, the sum ($ 23,158,000) approximates the total value of the allegedly tied product. [77] See PX 461; Levin, Tr. 104. Mr. Ross's figures are based on 1985 prices for IBM labor and net-priced MESs. See DX 3001A. If the average of actual IBM net MES prices and labor prices for the relevant period are used, and the value of the fabrication component is taken into account, the result ($ 20,639.261) is a closer approximation of the total [97] value of the allegedly tied upgrade labor. DX 3001B.

Were the sole "relevant figure" the "dollar volume of all sales of the tied item", as AMI contends, A.R.M. at 31, I would conclude that AMI had satisfied the requirement of substantiality of effect on interstate commerce. See, e.g., International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U.S. 392, 395-96, 92 L. Ed. 20, 68 S. Ct. 12 (1947) ($ 500,000); Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 502 ($ 190,000). However, the per se rule's substantiality requirement reflects a concern with "impact on competition" and the amount of commerce foreclosed. See Hyde 466 U.S. at 16. [78] AMI has not shown that it engaged [*293] in an activity foreclosed by IBM's net pricing. Upgrade [98] services on 308X computers were materially different from upgrade work on predecessor computer systems. Nor has AMI shown that it would have engaged in the 308X upgrade business but for net pricing. AMI has failed to establish the "adverse impact on competition" with which the antitrust laws are concerned "because no portion of the market which would otherwise have been available to other sellers has been foreclosed" by IBM. See Hyde, 466 U.S. at 16.

D.

[99] HN22[] Even if not per se unlawful, a business practice may violate the antitrust laws if it is found to impose an unreasonable restraint on competition under the Rule of Reason analysis. See, e.g., Hyde, 466 U.S. at 29; Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 503. AMI contends that IBM's net pricing is unlawful under the Rule of Reason. A.M. at 49. "The Rule of Reason . . . focuses directly on the challenged restraint's impact on competitive conditions." National Soc'y of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 688, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637, 98 S. Ct. 1355 (1978). It entails an analysis of the purposes and effects of an allegedly anticompetitive practice. See United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106, 179, 55 L. Ed. 663, 31 S. Ct. 632 (1911).

HN23[] A finding of illegality under the Rule of Reason "presupposes a determination . . . . that the 'effect upon competition in the marketplace is substantially adverse.'" Columbia Metal, 579 F.2d at 26 (footnote omitted). [100] The percentage of business controlled by defendant and the strength of the remaining competition are relevant considerations. See Times-Picayune, 345 U.S. at 615. I have already concluded that IBM large scale mainframe computers and upgrades to such computers face considerable competition from a variety of data processing products and services, the effect of which is to deprive IBM of the power to raise prices or impose burdensome terms, such as tie-ins, on buyers. See NCAA, 468 U.S. at 110 n.42 ("The 'reasonableness' of a particular alleged restraint often depends on the market power of the parties"; market power is one test of reasonableness). The availability of wide-ranging alternatives to IBM net priced upgrades (and the parts involved in the upgrades) [79] precludes a finding that IBM's net pricing policy has any appreciable anticompetitive effect on the market as a whole. See Great Escape, Inc. v. Union City Body Co., 791 F.2d 532, 537-38 (7th Cir. 1986); Will, 776 F.2d at 671-74; A.I. Root, 806 F.2d 673; Robert's Waikiki U-Drive, Inc. v. Budget Rent-A-Car Systems, 732 F.2d 1403, 1408 (9th Cir. 1984). [101] Prof. Levin acknowledged that if there existed economically viable, reasonable, or realistic alternatives to IBM 308X upgrades, any anticompetitive effects of the alleged tie would be substantially mitigated if not completely eliminated. See Levin, Tr. 153-55; accord Baumol, Tr. 1645.

---

[77] The $ 23 million figure only approximates the total value of the allegedly tied labor component in part because it excludes fabrication labor and includes the value of the labor component of J to K upgrades, which were optionally available on an SWRPQ basis.

[78] In Fortner I the Court stated that the "relevant figure is the total volume of sales tied by the sales policy under challenge, not the portion of this total accounted for by the particular plaintiff who brings suit." 394 U.S. at 502. AMI's portion of the foreclosed volume of commerce is not at issue here. The Fortner I Court did not consider the situation in which the plaintiff bringing suit has failed to show it would or could have engaged in the commercial activity allegedly foreclosed by the tie.

AMI has also failed to establish that net pricing has an anticompetitive impact on the market for 308X upgrade labor services. See Hyde, 466 U.S. at 29 (requirement that plaintiff prove that the contract "unreasonably restrained competition" involves "an inquiry into the actual effect of the exclusive [102] contract on competition among anesthesiologists."); see also Pitchford v. Pepi, Inc., 531 F.2d 92, 101 (3d Cir. 1975). The amount of labor involved in performing 308X MIPS upgrades is, for antitrust purposes, negligible, [*294] and AMI has failed to show that it could compete with IBM for the provision of 308X upgrade services if a market for such services existed as a result of IBM's discontinuation of net pricing. The evidence also warrants the conclusion that no other third party fabricator would be able to compete effectively. See Baumol, Tr. 1645-46.

Although AMI has failed to establish that IBM's net pricing policy had an appreciable adverse impact on competition, it is desirable under the Rule of Reason analysis to review IBM's reasons for implementing 308X net pricing:

> HN24[] While the antitrust laws regulate conduct, as distinguished from intentions, . . . "the reason for adopting the particular remedy [and] the purpose or end sought to be attained . . . are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable [103] regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge or intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences."

Alberta Gas Chemicals Ltd. v. E.I. duPont de Nemours & Co., 826 F.2d 1235, 1251 (3d Cir. 1987) (Becker, J., dissenting) (quoting Chicago Bd. of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 62 L. Ed. 683, 38 S. Ct. 242 (1918)); see Times Picayune, 345 U.S. at 615 (Reasonableness inquiry under Section I focuses in part on "whether the action springs from business requirements or purpose to monopolize."); see also NCAA 468 U.S. at 104 n.26 (tying arrangements "may have procompetitive justifications that make it inappropriate to condemn without considerable market analysis."). But see H & B Equipment Co. v. International Harvester Co., 577 F.2d 239, 246 (5th Cir. 1978) ("Absent anticompetitive effect, an unlawful intent will not establish a rule of reason violation. . . .").

1.

IBM introduced evidence of legitimate business justifications for its 308X net pricing policy. In addition, Michael Armstrong, the IBM executive who decided in 1980 to apply net pricing to [104] the 308X product line, testified that IBM's management did not consider the impact net pricing might have on third party fabrication and installation activity, in part because it regarded the amount of labor involved as trivial. Armstrong, Tr. 903-05. I credit Mr. Armstrong's testimony.

The principal goal sought to be served by net pricing was the prompt and proper return of TCMs removed from upgraded 308X computers. Reusability was a key design objective incorporated into the TCM technology. See Armstrong, Tr. 902-03, 904-05; Toole, Tr. 1012-13; Ross, Tr. 1365-67; DX 1136, p. 2. By 1978, IBM assumed that a large portion of the TCMs to be used in 308X computers, upgrades, and field spares would come from TCMs removed from installed equipment and converted into equivalent-to-new (ETN) condition. The reusability of TCMs was "critical to the pricing" of the 308X product line. Ross, Tr. 1365-66; DX 1136, p. 2. IBM assumed that 25 to 30 percent of the total component demand for the 308X series would be met with reused components. Ross, Tr. 1366.

---

[79] Besides buying net-priced upgrades, buyers wishing to increase their data processing capabilities may: buy replacement or additional computers of various sizes and processing power; add input/output devices; select appropriate software; install upgrades with used parts; subcontract to computer services and service bureaus; and to a more limited extent, swap machines or upgrades. See supra pp. 271-277.

The ETN program allowed IBM to maximize its supply of 308X machines and upgrades, and reduce unit cost, in part by avoiding having to [105] construct additional manufacturing facilities. See Ross, Tr. 1365-67; Toole, Tr. 1011. But for the reusability of TCMs, IBM "would have not been satisfying the market requirements." Armstrong, Tr. 902-03. An IBM official testified that, in 1980, IBM faced a shortage of supply of TCMs and that, but for the ETN program, the effect of the shortage on the 308X program would have been "unquantifiable but devastating." Toole, Tr. 1017.

IBM has converted tens of thousands of TCMs into ETN condition and reused them in 308X processors and upgrades. See Ross, Tr. 1366. It is faster and less expensive to ETN a TCM than to build a new one: a TCM can be ETN'd in one or two weeks on IBM's manufacturing line (involving about 25 operations) as opposed to 6 to 9 months to make a new one (involving about 325 operations). Toole, Tr. 995-96; [*295] Granito, Tr. 949; DX 1850. The ETN procedure costs IBM less than $ 6000 per TCM. Toole, Tr. 1028-29; Baumol, Tr. 1691. The manufacturing cost of a TCM is $ 12,000. [80] Granito, Tr. 981-82. Once ETN'd, TCMs are marketed as if new and sold at prices for new TCMs. Toole, Tr. 1008-09, 1030-31.

[106] The success of the ETN program, critical to the marketing and pricing of TCMs, depended on the proper handling of removed TCMs and a careful monitoring of the number and types of operations performed on them. Granito, Tr. 945-47; Ross, Tr. 1412. According to Mr. Ross, IBM could reuse TCMs only "if we knew and we got them back on a timely manner and we understood the . . . precise condition of those TCM's" when they were returned. Ross, Tr. 1412. "It is the number of times those TCMs are plugged and unplugged and capped and uncapped that is critical, and without knowing which machine they came from, we would have no assurance as to their quality or their usability." Id. Since 1979, IBM has tracked each manufactured TCM by serial number to be certain that each TCM is reused within the guidelines established for TCM reuse. Granito, Tr. 946-47. TCMs exceeding IBM's reusability guidelines are scrapped. Id.

IBM could not rely on other parties to observe the TCM handling guidelines necessary to preserve the reusability of TCMs, or even to return parts removed during the installation of a net priced upgrade. See, e.g., Van Hellemont, Dep. Tr. 174-76; Allen, Dep. Tr. 88-89, [107] 527-28, 1324-35; DX 88; DX 89; DX 90; Smith, Dep. Tr. 214-15. Further, as an IBM official explained, the credit-for-return system suggested by AMI as a replacement to net-pricing was unworkable. See Ross, Tr. 1377-78. AMI offered no testimony on the subject of a credit-for-return system.

IBM's net pricing policy was and is a legitimate and reasonable way to ensure the prompt and proper return of TCMs needed to sustain the ETN program and the commercial success of the 308X line of products. [81] Net pricing facilitated the development and marketing of TCM technology, and thereby enhanced technological progress and economic competition in the data processing industry. Given the existence of legitimate reasons for net pricing, and the fact that its procompetitive effects outweigh its virtually nonexistent anticompetitive impact, I conclude that AMI's rule of reason challenge to net pricing fails.

[108] 2.

Although I find that the record as a whole does not support AMI's assertion that net pricing was IBM's "solution to third party fabricator competition", see A.M. at 13, there is some evidence tending to suggest the contrary. Most important is the fact that IBM applies net pricing to numerous 308X memory upgrades that do not require the return of TCMs. [82] Lewis, Tr. 1738. IBM's net pricing of such upgrades is inconsistent with IBM's principal stated

---

[80] This figure does not include IBM's TCM research and development costs. Granito, Tr. 982.

[81] It is worth repeating that IBM requires the return of removed TCMs only when a new net-priced upgrade is bought from and installed by IBM. Over 90 percent of IBM's 308X computers are privately owned; the owners of those computers can do as they wish with their TCMs. See DX 1847; PX 25; see also Baumol, Tr. 1692-93.

[82] The evidence does not establish the total value of net priced 308X memory upgrades which incorporate only the older MST technology, but AMI counsel put the figure in the "many millions of dollars" range. A.R.M. at 2. IBM does not dispute AMI's justification for net pricing and therefore raises doubts about IBM's motives. See, e.g., White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 270 n.9, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738, 83 S. Ct. 696 (1963) (Brennan, J., concurring) (Restriction on competition which is broader than reasonably necessary to achieve defendant's legitimate needs "invites suspicion."). However, not all such memory upgrades are net priced (only those involving the removal of other key parts are), and no 308X channel upgrade (also not requiring the return of TCMs) is [*296] net priced. AMI does not claim that IBM's net pricing of non-TCM 308X memory upgrades constitutes a distinct antitrust violation, and there was little evidence at trial concerning [109] memory upgrades.

What AMI regards as direct evidence of IBM's anticompetitive intent is minimal and does not outweigh the ample evidence of IBM's legitimate business reasons for implementing net pricing. AMI established that IBM knew that at least one major leasing company was dissatisfied with IBM MES delivery and installation schedules, see A. Carr, Dep. Tr. 249, 26, 32-33, 80-81, 97-99, that IBM was aware of increased third party installation activities, and that IBM considered how to respond to such activities. For example, Mr. Gibson stated in an IBM internal memorandum dated April 19, 1983, that it "has become apparent [110] that more and more MESs are being installed by third parties . . . ." PX 137. However, Mr. Gibson testified that he was referring to the installation of SWRPQ upgrades, which are not affected by net pricing. Gibson, Dep. Tr. 191-192. Similarly, Mr. Biggar, President of IBM's Field Engineering Division (FED), reported in December, 1982, that employees in the division raised "concerns regarding third party installing IBM MESs on IBM systems", including the concern that third parties were able "to cut the price on installation" of MESs sold without IBM labor included, and that some of the concerns had to be resolved "in order for FED to maintain the feature installation business in a competitive and professional manner." PX 277. However, the memorandum does not state whether it refers to 308X or 303X equipment, or both, or whether it involved model, memory, or channel upgrades.

As the preceding examples illustrate, most if not all of the documents and statements upon which AMI relies to show that net pricing reflected anticompetitive designs have limited probative value because they were made or written on unknown dates or over two years after IBM decided to implement net pricing. [83] [111] It is also unclear whether much of the evidence involves 308X upgrade activities; 303X upgrade work; general reconfiguration work; or removal and reinstallation activity involving customer owned parts and equipment. See PX 119; PX 275. Such removal and reinstallation activity is unrelated to IBM's net pricing policy.

3.

IBM also offered evidence of procompetitive justifications for its OTC price structure, discussed supra note 10, and its serial number designation [112] policy, under which customer orders for IBM features, model conversions, or RPQs had to be accompanied by a designation of the serial number of the machine on which the ordered parts were to be installed. See DX 1325, p. 1; PX 168, p. 1; PX 377, pp. 89712-13; Ritchie, Tr. 1090-93. The policy did not apply to OTC parts. Neither practice individually is the basis of a claim by AMI, [84] and neither practice, alone or in conjunction with the other, or with net pricing, imposes an unreasonable restraint of trade.

a.

---

assertion that, in 1984, IBM's revenues from the sale of all net priced memory upgrades exceeded $ 70 million. See A.P.F. at para. 79.

[83] For example, AMI refers to the fact that the following question was posed to Mr. Armstrong at an IBM presentation in 1982: "Should IBM resist third party expansion into labor intensive activities, such as feature/model addition and removal, equipment relocation and maintenance?" PX 119 at 48690; see also PX 275; Gibson, Dep. Tr. 376-77. AMI also introduced an IBM Agenda containing "RECOMMENDATIONS" for "ACTIONS ON RECONFIGURATION" in which the following appears: "NET PRICED MESs INSTALLED BY IBM." PX 272. The document is undated.

[84] For example, AMI does not discuss the serial number designation policy in its post-trial memorandum of law. In its post-trial reply memorandum, AMI states that it would have no complaint concerning the serial number requirement if "parts are available from IBM as a viable alternative." A.R.M. at 35.

IBM priced the TCMs comprising an upgrade so that the aggregate price of the TCM's equalled or exceeded the price of the upgrade. IBM sought to ensure that customers would not buy the parts instead [113] [*297] of the upgrades they comprised, [85] since IBM's profit projections for the 308X line of products were based in part on its sale of 308X upgrades. See Ross, Tr. 1370-75.

In some cases the upgrade price is well below the aggregate TCM price because some of the TCMs are also used in other, more expensive upgrades and were priced based on those upgrade prices. See Ross, Tr. 1373. IBM's OTC pricing structure provided a reasonable mechanism to facilitate IBM's recovery of its substantial investment in 308X technology. See Ross, Tr. 1376. Prof. Baumol testified that it was proper and often necessary to price parts at a level equal to or exceeding the price of the completed product the parts make up, especially in industries (such as the data [114] processing industry) where continued technological progress depended on the recovery of research and development expenditures. Baumol, Tr. 1667-68; see also Levin, Tr. 862-63.

AMI essentially contends that the OTC price for the parts of an upgrade must be less than the upgrade price by an amount equal to the value of the fabrication and installation labor involved in the upgrade. See Levin, Tr. 80-81, 96-97, 156-57, 165. Even if there were legal support for the proposition, [86] because AMI is not entitled to an aggregate parts price that is below the upgrade net price by an amount greater than the price of the service component, the aggregate parts price to which AMI would be entitled under such a theory would leave too small a margin for AMI to offer upgrade services in competition with IBM.

[115] b.

IBM announced its serial number designation policy in June of 1979. The policy "applies to everyone", Ritchie, Tr. 1094, including AMI, leasing customers, and end-users. See Loria, Tr. 639, 670; Bigando, Tr. 1242-43. Prior to 1979, purchasers were permitted to and did order features against "zero serial numbers", see PX 169, a practice which enabled purchasers, especially leasing companies, to inventory IBM MESs. In April, 1979, Mr. Gibson of IBM reported that 41 percent of all MESs ordered from IBM were for "zero serial numbered MES orders." PX 169 at 50883. Prof. Levin testified that IBM's policy inhibited "the flexibility of leasing companies", and limited "their ability to respond in a speedy fashion" to customer needs. Levin, Tr. 82-83. A Comdisco official stated that the serial number requirement gave his company "fits" and cut down on its "flexibility". Pontikes, Dep. Tr. 49-50. Yet there was evidence that leasing companies and other third parties were able to inventory parts despite IBM's policy. See, e.g., DX 197; Nolin, Dep. Tr. 59-60, 68-69. The large number of IBM computers owned by the leasing companies provided them with a valuable source of necessary [116] parts and machines against whose serial numbers to order and redesignate ordered parts from IBM. See A.P.F. at para. 197; Robertson, Tr. 725-26, 727-28; A. Carr, Dep. Tr. 197-200, 202-03, 283-84.

The legitimate business interests of IBM served by the serial number designation policy are not outweighed by the leasing companies' desire for greater flexibility. Mr. Ritchie of IBM testified that the policy was implemented in part to address planning and production problems faced by IBM as a result of the large number of speculative orders for MESs the company received: IBM "had a backlog of orders which - many of which never got installed." Ritchie, Tr. 1092-93; see also PX 377, at 89712-13. The serial number designation policy is also an integral part of IBM's computerized system for keeping track of [*298] information critical to maintaining, updating, and reconfiguring IBM computers. IBM's Machine Level Control (MLC) records, which are kept on the basis of machine serial numbers, enable IBM to perform numerous tasks accurately and promptly, including: assembling particular features or model conversions (MESs); providing appropriate EC's (modifications periodically installed [117] on computers

---

[85] Similarly, the net priced upgrade prices were set so as not to impact adversely on IBM's sale of processors. Ross, Tr. 1370-71, 1375; see also Levin, Tr. 163-64. Upgrade prices equalled the price-differentials of computer models. See DX 1861.

[86] I am aware of no decision in which a non-predatory price was found to violate the antitrust laws because it was too high. See, e.g., Kartell v. Blue Shield, Inc., 749 F.2d 922, 927 (1st Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1029, 85 L. Ed. 2d 322, 105 S. Ct. 2040 (1985); Fairdale Farms, Inc. v. Yankee Milk, Inc., 715 F.2d 30, 32 (2d Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 1043, 79 L. Ed. 2d 174, 104 S. Ct. 711 (1984).

to correct design difficulties); and shipping the appropriate parts involved in upgrades. See Bigando, Tr. 1235-41; Nolin, Dep. Tr. 126-27; Chisholm, Dep. Tr. 95; PX 377 at 89708, 89717; Granito, Tr. 964; Morrow, Dep. Tr. 149. When the serial number and desired configuration change are "loaded" into the MLC system, the system automatically identifies the parts, instructions, microcode diskettes, and any ECs required to install the upgrade. Bigando, Tr. 1238-40. Thus, the compatability and proper functioning of IBM upgrades depends largely on the accuracy of IBM's MLC records. See, e.g., PX 377, at 89708; Lewis, Tr. 523; Allen, Tr. 251-52.

That there may be arguably comparable ways to maintain updated MLC records, see Beckwith, Tr. 1340, does not, contrary to AMI's assertion, see A.P.F. at para. 203, make IBM's policy unreasonable. Similarly, IBM's acknowledgment, in April 1979, soon before announcement of the policy, that 41 percent of the MESs ordered from IBM were "zero serial numbered MES orders", does not, given IBM's valid explanations for the policy, support an inference that the policy, alone or in conjunction with other IBM practices, reflected [118] an anticompetitive design.

E.

HN25[] In order to establish a cause of action under either a per se or rule of reason analysis, AMI "must demonstrate both that the antitrust laws were violated and that it suffered 'fact of damage' in consequence of that violation." Pitchford v. Pepi, Inc., 531 F.2d 92, 98-99 (3d Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 935, 49 L. Ed. 2d 387, 96 S. Ct. 2649 (1976); accord Response of Carolina, Inc. v. Leasco Response, Inc., 537 F.2d 1307, 1320 (5th Cir. 1976) (plaintiff must show a violation of the antitrust laws, the fact of damage, and some indication of the amount of damage).

Because I conclude that AMI has failed to establish that IBM's net pricing policy was unlawful, I need not address IBM's contention, see IBM's Post-Trial Memorandum of Law (hereinafter "I.M.") at 15, that AMI has failed to prove it suffered an "actual injury" or an "antitrust injury", i.e., an "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent . . . ." See Cargill Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 107 S. Ct. 484, 490, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1986). [119] However, I note that my finding that IBM's net pricing policy did not deprive AMI of viable business opportunity would seem to preclude a finding that AMI suffered the requisite injury to its "business or property", see Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, even if net pricing were somehow unlawful.

INSTALLATION AND WARRANTY SERVICE CHARGE

AMI contends that IBM's Installation and Warranty Service Charge (IWSC), which became effective on June 30, 1980, PX 67, unreasonably restrained trade in violation of Section 1. A.M. at 62-63. Payment of the IWSC entitled IBM customers to installation and warranty service on IBM computers or MESs bought in the United States or Puerto Rico and shipped to a foreign country during the initial twelve-month period following the sale. [87] PX 67; DX 1381, at 85598; DX 2221, p. 42; DX 1532, at 2. The legality of IBM's IWSC is determined under a rule of reason analysis. See, e.g., Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977) (legality of vertical restrictions limiting territories in which products are resold is to be determined under Rule of Reason). [120]

[*299] I.

Prior to the implementation of the IWSC, IBM's standard U.S. purchase agreements (for computers and MESs) provided for the installation of the machine and a twelve-month period of limited warranty service (including the replacement of failed parts). See PX 608 at 3. The agreements excluded warranty coverage for computers installed outside the U.S. or Puerto Rico. [88] See, e.g., DX 2121 at 3; Ritchie, Tr. 1097; Beckwith, Tr. 1306. Notwithstanding

---

[87] The IWSC also applied to IBM equipment purchased abroad and installed (or reinstalled) in the U.S. or Puerto Rico. The main issue at trial was the legality of the IWSC as it affected exports from the United States.

[88] After institution of the IWSC, IBM's standard purchase agreements continued to contain "essentially . . . the same limited warranty." Ritchie, Tr. 1102; see also, DX 2121, at 3; DX 829, at 1; DX 2124, at 5.

the limitation, IBM, as a matter of practice and generally at no additional cost to its customers, see PX 67, continued to provide warranty service on exported machines through its offices abroad. Ritchie, Tr. 1097. IBM's practice was consistent with that of other U.S. Computer manufacturers. PX 71.

[121] A "very substantial" and rapid increase in the movement of IBM computers from the U.S. to foreign and primarily European countries in early 1980 precipitated IBM's announcement of the IWSC, and its discontinuation of the practice of extending warranty service at no extra cost to equipment shipped abroad. Ritchie, Tr. 1097-98; Beckwith, Tr. 1307; Rizzo, Tr. 1213. If buyers wanted fixed-cost IBM installation and warranty service abroad, they had to pay the IWSC. In July, 1980, IWSC fees ranged from 10 to 14 percent of the purchase price of 303X machines, or between $ 250,000 and $ 724,000. PX 452; Levin, Tr. 70. The IWSC did not provide for a rebate or refund of the price of the limited warranty service included in the purchase price, but did give the customer a credit for the out-of-pocket costs saved by IBM if the machine was not initially installed in the country of purchase (IBM kept whatever mark-up there was for the installation service). See Levin, Tr. 72-73. [89]

[122] The increase in the number of customer shipments of IBM computers in early 1980 reflected an international currency imbalance which made it profitable for IBM customers, such as leasing companies, to buy IBM computers in the U.S. and market them in a number of foreign countries in competition with IBM. [90] See, e.g., Lewis, Tr. 466-67; Levin, Tr. 69. Comdisco, for example, in early 1980, purchased new IBM equipment in the U.S. to market in Europe. Lewis, Tr. 467; see also PX 61. The addition of IBM's IWSC to the purchase price of a new computer made the export of the machine commercially less attractive and reduced the flow of on-warranty equipment shipped by leasing companies.

Computers purchased in the U.S. and installed in Europe (or in parts of Japan) had to undergo electric cycle conversions in order to function on foreign [123] electrical currents. [91] Allen, Tr. 282-83; Levin, Tr. 60-61. In 1980, AMI was engaged in the business of performing cycle conversions on IBM large scale mainframes. Allen Tr. 283; Lewis, Tr. 459; Smith, Tr. 594. The decline in the shipping activities of the leasing companies resulted, at least temporarily, in a loss of business opportunity for AMI. See Allen, Tr. 386.

In 1981, AMI itself became interested in the cross-border shipment of new IBM computers. AMI considered buying two 308X computers abroad at European prices and marketing them in the U.S. Allen, Tr. 285. According to Mr. Allen, the IWSC costs of $ 355,630 for one machine and $ 345,080 for the other made the import and cycle conversion [*300] of the computers economically unattractive. [92] Allen, Tr. 285-86.

[124] II.

AMI contends that IBM's IWSC policy had the unlawful purpose and effect of preventing AMI (and other third party fabricators) from performing cycle conversions of new IBM computers and leasing companies from exporting, importing, and marketing those machines in competition with IBM. See A.P.F. at para. 218. AMI also claims that it too was prevented by the IWSC from engaging in the business of cross-border shipments of new IBM computers.

---

[89] Due to the difficulties of administering the IWSC and the number of customer complaints about the policy, especially from leasing companies, IBM discontinued the IWSC as of January 1, 1985. DX 2220, at 16; PX 56, at 1; PX 60; Beckwith, Tr. 1308; Ritchie, Tr. 1101; Robertson, Tr. 700. Although AMI criticizes IBM's post-IWSC policy, it does not assert a claim based upon it.

[90] Third party leasing companies, such as Comdisco and CMI, competed with IBM for the placement of large scale mainframe computers with end users in foreign markets. PX 71.

[91] Large scale mainframes operate on 60 cycle electric power in the U.S., and on 50 cycle electric power in Europe and parts of Japan. Lewis, Tr. 459

[92] Although the machines on which AMI requested IWSC quotations were more expensive (in U.S. dollars) to buy in Europe than were equivalent machines in the U.S., Allen Tr. 393; Levin, Tr. 228-29, Mr. Allen hoped to be able to sell them at a price exceeding the difference because of the relatively short supply of the computers in the U.S. Allen, Tr. 285, 391-92. Mr. Allen testified that "the customers who wanted these machines were willing to pay a premium." Allen, Tr. 285.

A.R.M. at 56. IBM argues that AMI lacks standing to challenge the IWSC under either theory. I.M. at 43-44. I disagree.

A.

HN26[] It is "as unlawful to prevent a person from engaging in a business as to drive him from it." 2 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law, § 335 c at 174 (1978); see also Bubar v. Ampco Foods, Inc., 752 F.2d 445, 450 (9th Cir.); cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1018, 87 L. Ed. 2d 616, 105 S. Ct. 3481 (1985); Grip-Pak, Inc. v. Illinois Tool Works, Inc., 694 F.2d 466, 474-475 (7th Cir. 1982); cert. denied, 461 U.S. 958, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1317, 103 S. Ct. 2430 (1983); [125] Hecht v. Pro-Football, Inc., 187 U.S. App. D.C. 73, 570 F.2d 982, 994 (D.C. Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 956, 57 L. Ed. 2d 1121, 98 S. Ct. 3069 (1978). Generally, "a potential competitor has standing if he can show a genuine intent to enter the market and a preparedness to do so." Bubar, 752 F.2d at 450; see also Grip-Pak, 694 F.2d at 474-75 (plaintiff "may be able to recover lost profits as a manufacturer even though it has not yet started manufacturing, it it had reasonable prospects of doing so which [defendant] snuffed out.").

AMI has made the necessary showing. AMI had experience in the cycle conversion business and had converted IBM computers for shipment abroad. In 1981, AMI had customers who were interested in two 308X computers which could not be purchased in the U.S. without delays. The customers were willing to pay a premium to obtain the machines promptly and AMI considered importing and cycle converting two computers from Europe to meet their needs. AMI regarded fixed-cost IBM warranty service coverage as necessary to the success of the deal, and the only way to obtain such warranty service [126] from IBM at the time was to pay the IWSC. See Levin, Tr. 75-76. AMI therefore requested and received an IWSC RPQ from AMI's IBM salesman. The added cost of the IWSC (and AMI cycle conversion service) exceeded the premium the customers were willing to pay. Allen, Tr. 284-86. These facts establish AMI's intent and preparedness to purchase computers for cycle-conversions and cross-border sales, even though AMI did not pay the IWSC. [93]

B.

AMI also has standing to challenge the IWSC by virtue of its participation [127] in the cycle conversion business. U.S. manufactured IBM computers could not be marketed abroad without undergoing cycle conversions, and the cycle conversion business depended on the exportation of computers. AMI performed cycle conversions for Comdisco, CMI, Standard and Chartered Leasing, Techtronics, Volkswagen of America, and other companies. Allen, Tr. 283; Lewis, [*301] Tr. 459; Smith, Tr. 594. The cycle conversion business was profitable for AMI. See Allen, Tr. 286. AMI typically charged between $ 70,000 and $ 80,000 for each conversion. Id. Comdisco regarded AMI's work as excellent, and CMI used AMI for all of its cycle conversion work. Lewis, Tr. 459-60; Smith, Tr. 594. Prior to the implementation of the IWSC, AMI performed cycle conversions on new IBM computers. See Allen, Tr. 386. IBM's IWSC inhibited but did not preclude the cross-border shipment of new IBM computers by the leasing companies and limited AMI's cycle conversion business.

The IWSC's impact on AMI's business was not, contrary to IBM's assertion, too remote or speculative to grant AMI standing to sue. [94] The alleged injury to AMI's business was, under AMI's theory, "inextricably intertwined [128]

---

[93] I need not agree with AMI that there existed no viable substitute for IBM service warranty under the IWSC to conclude that AMI has standing to test the legality of IBM's policy. The focus of the standing inquiry under Section 4 is not "whether a business practice violates the antitrust laws, but whether a particular plaintiff may recover damages from the effects of the arguably unlawful practice on him or her." Bogus v. American Speech & Hearing Ass'n, 582 F.2d 277, 284 (3d Cir. 1978).

[94] IBM does not contend that granting standing to AMI will create the risk of duplicative recovery involved in Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707, 97 S. Ct. 2061 (1977) and Merican, Inc. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 713 F.2d 958 (3d Cir. 1983) cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1024, 79 L. Ed. 2d 682, 104 S. Ct. 1278 (1984). IBM's position is that AMI was an insufficiently "direct" victim of the alleged harm to allow it to recover damages. See I.M. at 43; see also Associated General Contractors, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 540, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983). That AMI, as a business with the injury (IBM) sought to inflict" on the leasing companies. See Blue Shield of Va. v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 484, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149, 102 S. Ct. 2540 (1982). The harm to AMI's business was forseeable to IBM. See id. at 479. The IWSC impacted directly on AMI's business. See Bravman, 552 F.2d at 100. AMI was "within that area of the economy . . . endangered by a breakdown of competitive conditions" allegedly resulting from the IWSC. Blue Shield, 457 U.S. at 480 (quoting In re Multidistrict Vehicle Air Pollution M.D.L. NO. 31, 481 F.2d 122, 129 (9th Cir. 1973)).

[129] III.

HN27[] In order to prevail under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, AMI must prove that IBM's IWSC constitutes a "contract, combination . . . or conspiracy" which unreasonably restrains trade. See 15 U.S.C. § 1. AMI has failed to make either showing.

A.

AMI does not contend that IBM engaged in a conspiracy. AMI argues that the existence of the necessary contract or combination was established by evidence that IBM obtained the unwilling agreement of third parties, including leasing companies, to pay the IWSC. See A.R.M. at 52. According to AMI, IBM thereby entered into an unlawful contract or combination. See id. at 55.

The flaw in AMI's contention is that payment by third parties of the IWSC, and thus the formation of a contract or combination, did not adversely impact on AMI's business. Under AMI's theory, payment of the IWSC enabled third parties to export IBM computers, and this favored AMI's cycle conversion business. Thus, AMI performed cycle conversions on new IBM computers in 1984, after AMI's customers paid the IWSC. Beckwith, Tr. 1310; Allen, Tr. [130] 389-90. Although AMI may have been better off without the IWSC, it was not harmed when leasing companies paid the IWSC. What AMI contends injured its business was IBM's 1980 announcement that it would discontinue providing warranty service (at no extra cost) to U.S. machines exported during the initial twelve-month warranty period, since the announcement of the IWSC stemmed the flow of third party shipments. The alleged harm derived not from the contract or combination, as in the principal cases upon which AMI relies, see Albrecht v. Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145, 19 L. Ed. 2d 998, 88 S. Ct. 869 (1968); United States v. Parke, Davis & Co., 362 U.S. 29, 4 L. Ed. 2d 505, 80 S. Ct. 503 (1960), but from IBM's unilateral decision [*302] and policy. [95] IBM independently instituted the IWSC, and such independent action is not proscribed by Section 1. See, e.g., Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984).

[131] B.

AMI contends that "the IWSC had the purpose and effect . . . of eliminating" competition in foreign commerce. A.M. at 62. Assuming that AMI established the existence of a contract or combination under Section 1, I find, based on "all of the circumstances of [the] case," see GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S. at 49, that AMI has failed to prove that the IWSC constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade.

Although implementation of the IWSC dissuaded some leasing companies and AMI from shipping new IBM computers or MESs in competition with IBM, the IWSC's overall impact on competition was insufficiently adverse to support a finding of illegality. AMI has neither defined the relevant market allegedly affected by the IWSC nor attempted to measure the IWSC's impact on such a market. While lack of proof of a relevant market is not fatal to AMI's claim, see Federal Trade Commission v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 460, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445, engaged in cycle conversions, did not (like the leasing companies) compete with IBM in the placement of computers with end-users is nondispositive. See, e.g., Bravman v. Bassett Furn. Industries, Inc., 552 F.2d 90, 96 (3d Cir. 1977).

---

[95] To the extent that AMI contends that IBM's enforcement of the IWSC (by collecting third party IWSC payments) was necessary to underscore the seriousness of IBM's IWSC announcement and produce the allegedly desired chilling effect on third party shipments, I would regard the argument as too speculative to establish the existence of the necessary contract or combination.

106 S. Ct. 2009 (1986), an inquiry into market power and market structure helps determine the competitive impact of a challenged business practice under the Rule of Reason. See e.g., Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628, 104 S. Ct. 2731 (1984). [132]

Even as to companies which the evidence shows competed or were in a position to compete with IBM for the placement of IBM computers abroad, the IWSC did not impose an unreasonable restraint of trade. IBM did not condition the sale of its computer equipment upon payment of the IWSC. Nor did IBM require payment of the IWSC as a condition to the installation abroad of a machine bought in the United States. See Ritchie, Tr. 1099; see also Lewis, Tr. 532-33. Payment of the IWSC was optional. See DX 1381, at 2; see also Baumol, Tr. 1670-72, 1695-96. As an alternative to purchasing warranty service from IBM on an IWSC basis, customers interested in buying IBM computers in the U.S. and placing them abroad, and also interested in having them covered by warranty services, could: provide the installation and/or maintenance services themselves; obtain installation and/or maintenance services on a fixed-cost or time and materials basis from third-party service companies; or obtain such services from IBM on a time-and-materials basis. PX 57; PX 607G at at 24-25; Ritchie, Tr. 1099; DX 1381 at 2. [96] Based on evidence that end-users preferred fixed-price maintenance service over [133] maintenance service on a time-and-materials basis, see Smith, Tr. 594-95, third-party fixed-cost installation and/or maintenance services provided the most viable alternative to paying the IWSC. [97] A number of companies were engaged in the provision of such services. See DX 1351 (e.g., pp. 6-10); Phillips, Tr. 1589-94.

Payment of the IWSC reduced but did not eliminate the business opportunity created by the currency imbalance. For example, in July, 1980, despite the IWSC, a differential exceeding $ 800,000 remained between the European and U.S. price (in U.S. dollars) [134] for a typical 303X computer. PX 517, at 2; PX 452, see also PX 592, at 85635.

[*303] AMI acknowledges that during the relevant time period "there were instances when it might have proved economically feasible to export machines from the United States even after paying the IWSC," A.P.F. at para. 225, but adds that these potential opportunities were closed by delays resulting from IBM's policy of quoting IWSC prices solely on a "request for price quotation (RPQ) basis." Id. Although he never requested an IWSC RPQ, see Smith, Tr. 615, Gary Smith of CMI testified that "the response time [for obtaining an IWSC RPQ] was too long." Id. at 592-93. Mr. Ritchie of IBM acknowledged that third parties interested in IWSC quotes complained about delays attributable to the RPQ process. Ritchie, Tr. 1148-49. However, there is no evidence that such delays resulted from anything other than IBM's inability to determine the appropriate IWSC more quickly. An IWSC was determined on a case by case RPQ basis and was prorated for the number of months remaining on the product's initial warranty. Lewis, Tr. 461-62; Smith, Tr. 592; Ritchie, Tr. 1095; DX 2221 at 42-43; PX 67. The IWSC [135] was intended to reflect IBM's costs for providing warranty service abroad, and calculation of the IWSC depended on several variables, including the country in which the machine would be installed, the model type, and the machine's particular configuration. See DX 2221, at 42; PX 67, at 1; Levin Tr. 73-74. "The [IWSC RPQ quotes] could vary with different configurations." PX 73, at 1. IBM therefore did not publish a price list of IWSC charges. Mr. Smith of CMI testified that he told IBM that if he were to place an RPQ for an IWSC, he would need a response within a matter of hours. Smith, Tr. 616. There is no evidence that IBM could satisfy such a request.

The IWSC's impact on the shipping activities of leasing companies is difficult to assess but does not appear to have been preclusive. CMI, with offices in Geneva, Paris, London, Frankfurt, and Munich, continued to import and export used IBM machines (i.e., machines off the initial warranty coverage and therefore not subject to the IWSC) after implementation of the IWSC, but did not import or export new computers. Mr. Smith of CMI testified that the IWSC "kept us" from importing or exporting new equipment. Smith, Tr. 595. [136] However, it is unclear that CMI imported or exported new IBM equipment prior to the implementation of the IWSC. See Smith, Tr. 593-94. Mr.

---

[96] For computers bought in the U.S. and installed abroad, it was impossible to obtain IBM fixed-cost installation and/or maintenance service in the first year after the purchase of the machine without paying the IWSC. Levin, Tr. 75-76.

[97] Third party installation and/or maintenance services may not have been perfect substitutes for IBM fixed-cost warranty services, see Lewis, Tr. 469, but they were a reasonable alternative.

Lewis of Comdisco testified that Comdisco did not import or export new IBM MESs or features after institution of the IWSC "because of the RPQ surcharge", Lewis, Tr. 465-66; see also PX 61, but also stated that Comdisco "imported at least one" IBM computer under warranty during the IWSC period. Lewis, Tr. 538. He also acknowledged the possibility that Comdisco shipped other on-warranty computers during the same period. Lewis, Tr. 539.

The IWSC's impact on AMI's business was no more harmful. AMI continued to perform cycle conversions for leasing companies on used IBM equipment after the implementation of the IWSC, Allen, Tr. 286; indeed, its cycle conversion business grew during the IWSC period. See Allen, Tr. 286, 386-87; DX 1875; DX 1875A. Further, despite Mr. Allen's assertion that AMI's cycle conversion work on new IBM computers "in essence" stopped with the introduction of the IWSC, Allen, Tr. 283, AMI performed cycle conversions on new IBM computers in 1984 and performed more of such conversions in that year than in 1985, the year [137] IBM discontinued the IWSC. Beckwith, Tr. 1310; Allen, Tr. 389-90.

C.

AMI has also failed to establish that IBM's purpose in implementing the IWSC was anticompetitive. The weight of the evidence supports IBM's assertion that it instituted the IWSC in order to accommodate a growing number of customer requests for warranty service on exported machines and to recover substantial unanticipated costs associated with providing such service. IBM's one-year limited warranty on new machines expressly excluded coverage on machines placed outside the U.S. or Puerto Rico during the initial one-year period. See supra, pp. 298-299. [*304] The main reason for the warranty limitation was IBM's desire "to supply IBM products and services through the IBM organization operating in the country where those products are installed or services rendered." DX 2221, p. 42; PX 67 p. 1. Mr. Robertson of IBM testified that "IBM sells equipment in the United States for installation and use within the United States." Robertson, Tr. 699.

The purchase price of new IBM machines subject to the limited warranty included only a price for installation and warranty services to be provided in the country in which [138] the equipment was bought. Nevertheless, prior to the implementation of the IWSC, largely due to the fact that there were not a great number of cross-border shipments, IBM generally provided installation and warranty services to computers exported from the United States to Europe or Japan (and vice versa) during the initial warranty period at no additional cost. Ritchie, Tr. 1097. However, IBM never altered its express limited warranty provision or policy. DX 2221 at 42; PX 67 at 1. The increase in the cross-border movement of IBM equipment by IBM customers (including leasing companies) resulted in increased costs to IBM and disrupted IBM's planning for the provision of warranty and maintenance services. The avowed purpose of the IWSC, supported by the evidence, was to compensate IBM for the additional costs of providing installation and warranty services in a country other than the country of purchase, and to recover for IBM the associated, additional administrative expenses. See Ritchie, Tr. 1094 -- 95; Beckwith, Tr. 1307-08; DX 2221, at 42; PX 67, at 1. The IWSC reflected IBM's cost of providing services for a machine during the remaining portion of the initial warranty period [139] that the machines would be outside of the United States. Id.; see also Levin, Tr. 73-74.

AMI's assertion that the IWSC amounted to a double charge for IBM installation and warranty service is unsupported by the evidence. Prof. Levin acknowledged that IBM gave customers a credit for its savings on out-of-pocket expenses if the new computer were placed initially in a country other than the country of purchase. IBM, therefore, did not charge customers twice for the costs of one IBM installation. Also, IBM incurred costs of planning for, and ensuring, warranty service (and the necessary administrative organization) in the country of sale whether or not the customer transferred the IBM equipment to another country. The cross-border shipment of the machine resulted in similar and additional costs for IBM for which it was not compensated by the original purchase. Ritchie, Tr. 1094-95; Beckwith, Tr. 1307-08; DX 2221, at 42; PX 67, at 1. AMI has not shown that the price of warranty service included in the original sales price compensated IBM for the warranty service provided abroad.

In an effort to show that the purpose of the IWSC was not to recover unexpected additional costs, AMI [140] refers to the disparity between the IWSC quotes it received in 1981 for two 3081 D16 computers ($ 355,630 and $ 345,080) and IBM's 1985 price for fixed-cost maintenance services on similar computers in the U.S. ($ 63,801 per machine). A.R.M. at 49. Assuming that AMI's calculation of the fixed-cost maintenance service is accurate (there was no trial testimony on the subject), AMI's comparison is of minimal probative value because the two services compared are fundamentally different, involve computer equipment at different product-cycle stages, and are performed pursuant to contracts imposing distinct obligations on IBM. [98] See PX 69.

IBM refused to disclose to Comdisco the methodology and underlying details concerning the calculation of the IWSC. See PX 64 at 81598; PX 69 at 81593; PX 72 at 2221. IBM [141] denied Comdisco's offer to pay IBM's actual, additional costs and its request to be able to purchase IBM's standard fixed-cost maintenance services during the first year of a new machine. See [*305] PX 64; PX 72 at 2221. IBM's denial of the latter request was based in part on the fact that the IWSC and the standard maintenance agreements provide for different services. See PX 69. These facts do not raise sufficiently serious doubts about the legitimacy of IBM's asserted business justification for the IWSC to support a finding that the policy was unreasonable or unlawful.

AMI's other attempts to establish that the IWSC reflected an anticompetitive purpose also fail. A handwritten, internal IBM memorandum regarding "Cross Border Transaction Proposal - Concerns and Recommendations" stated "There is an implicit assumption that 3rd party conversion will be eliminated." See PX 50 at 3918. AMI argues that the document shows that IBM intended the IWSC to eliminate third party cycle conversion activity. See A.M. at 65. However, although the document mentions "installation and warranty RPQ", it nowhere expressly refers to the IWSC and AMI produced insufficient evidence [142] linking the document to the IWSC. AMI's interpretation of the memorandum does not follow from a reading of it. Further, the document is dated May 17, 1982, nearly two years after IBM instituted the IWSC.

Another handwritten document captioned "Objective" states, "Support country integrity through marketing and product supply", and "Prevent the non-IBM export of new machines." See PX 68. AMI contends that the document reflects IBM's desire to prevent, through implementation of the IWSC, the cycle conversion of new IBM equipment and the resulting competition from leasing companies exporting cycle converted equipment from the U.S. to Europe. A.M. at 64, 65. The document is undated and unsigned, and nowhere refers to the IWSC or any type of warranty service. AMI has failed to connect the document to IBM's IWSC. [99]

[143] AMI also relies on an unsigned IBM document, dated November 12, 1984 (over four years after announcement of the IWSC) and consisting of numerous pages, one of which contains the following language: "Opportunity Analysis"; "Cross Border"; "IWSC is an Inhibitor (308X)." See PX 592 at 85633. Although at least two pages of the document expressly refer to the IWSC, (see PX 592, pp. 85633, 85635) and one contains apparently incriminating words, the document provides AMI with little support because AMI made no attempt at trial (or through discovery) to shed light on the meaning of the document or the page on which AMI relies. The disjointed language to which AMI refers is too thin a basis upon which to rest antitrust liability. [100]

[144] * * * *

---

[98] As with IBM's OTC prices for 308X upgrade parts, to the extent that AMI asserts an independent claim on the theory that the IWSC price was unlawfully high, such a claim fails under the Sherman Act.

[99] At his deposition, Paul J. Rizzo, Vice Chairman of IBM and a member of IBM's Management Committee, stated that he was involved in the decision to institute the IWSC, Rizzo, Dep. Tr. 107-108, and that he thought the handwriting on PX 68 was his own. Id. at 105-06. At trial, Mr. Rizzo testified that although the handwriting on PX 68 was similar to his handwriting, he was positive that he was not the author of PX 68 and could therefore not recall any of the circumstances surrounding the document. See Rizzo, Tr. 1195-1199. Mr. Rizzo stated that the document was written by Phillip Guthoff, a member of IBM's Comparable Planning Staff, in 1980. Neither party called Mr. Guthoff as a witness. I find that Mr. Rizzo's trial testimony was credible.

[100] As concerns the IWSC, this case is unlike Eiberger v. Sony Corp., 622 F.2d 1068 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied sub nom., Simplot v. Strobl, 474 U.S. 1006, 88 L. Ed. 2d 459, 106 S. Ct. 527 (1985), upon which AMI relies. For example, in Eiberger, Sonam exacted warranty service payments from its distributors even when no warranty services were provided. The warranty fees were designed and operated as penalties to enforce territorial restrictions. There was also an admission by a Sonam official that the warranty fees provided a "good system" "to protect our dealer's territory." Id. at 1073.

For the foregoing reasons, judgment will be entered in favor of IBM and against AMI on AMI's Section 1 claims based on IBM's net pricing policy and Installation and Warranty Service Charge.

ORDER

AND NOW, 21st this day of July, 1988, for the reasons set forth in the accompanying Memorandum, it is hereby ORDERED that judgment is entered in favor of IBM and against AMI on AMI's Section 1 claims based on IBM's net pricing policy and Installation and warranty Service Charge.

Kowalski v. Chicago Tribune Co.

United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit

May 13, 1988, Argued ; July 22, 1988, Decided

No. 88-1626

Reporter
854 F.2d 168 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 11094 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,173; 15 Media L. Rep. 2451

RICHARD J. KOWALSKI and HOFFMAN NEWS AGENCY, et al., Plaintiffs-Appellants, v. CHICAGO TRIBUNE COMPANY, Defendant-Appellee

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern District. Nos. 88 C 321, 88 C 172--James F. Holderman, Judge.

Core Terms

distributors, termination, arbitration, contracts, newspaper, injunction, antitrust, preliminary injunction, merits, equitable relief, anti trust law, independent distributor, agency contract, monetary relief, publisher, percent, retail

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN1[] Injunctions, Grounds for Injunctions

A request for a preliminary injunction is evaluated in accordance with a sliding scale approach: the more the balance of irrevocable harms inclines in the plaintiff's favor, the smaller the likelihood of prevailing on the merits he need show in order to get the injunction.

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN2[] Injunctions, Grounds for Injunctions

The requirement that a plaintiff show that its chances for winning on the merits are better than negligible is a necessary rather than sufficient condition for a grant of a preliminary injunction.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN3[] Injunctions, Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

A prerequisite to a preliminary injunction, as to other forms of equitable relief, is a showing that the plaintiff's remedy at law is inadequate.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Communications > Sherman Act

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Covenants not to Compete

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

HN4[] Communications, Sherman Act

Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, forbids a newspaper publisher to fix the retail price of newspapers distributed by independent distributors, even if the object of the price fixing is to prevent the distributors from exploiting the monopoly power conferred on them by the publisher's granting them exclusive territories.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

HN5[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

The consignor's setting of the price at which the consignee is to sell the consignor's goods is a form of illegal price fixing.

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Breach of Contract

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Injunctions

HN6[] Causes of Action, Breach of Contract

The strength of a plaintiff's case does not change the requirement of showing that the remedy at law (damages) is inadequate; one could have an open-and-shut case on the merits, yet if one's legal remedy were adequate one, would not be entitled to a preliminary (or any) injunction.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations > General Overview

International Law > Dispute Resolution > Arbitration & Mediation > General Overview

International Trade Law > General Overview

HN7[] Private Actions, Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations

Claims under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, a statute whose remedial provisions are closely modeled on those of the antitrust laws, are arbitrable.

Counsel: Paul E. Slater, Sperling Slater & Spitz, P.C., Chicago, Illinois, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

James A. Klenk, Sonnenschein, Carlin, Nath & Rosenthal, Chicago, Illinois, Attorneys for Defendant.

Judges: Bauer, Chief Judge, and Cudahy and Posner, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: POSNER

Opinion

[*169] POSNER, Circuit Judge.

Eighty-four former distributors of the Chicago Tribune brought this suit against the Tribune's publisher, charging breach of contract and violation of the antitrust laws. The district court refused to grant a preliminary injunction, and the plaintiffs (apart from those who have settled) have appealed. See 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1).

Early in this decade the plaintiffs signed contracts making them independent distributors of the Tribune in defined areas, mostly in Chicago's suburbs. This meant that the plaintiffs bought copies of the newspaper from the defendant and resold them to home subscribers and other retail purchasers in their areas. The contracts are uniform and contain elaborate provisions regarding termination--a feature that was [2] necessary since the contracts were to run for ten years. Each contract authorizes the Tribune Company to terminate it "at any time upon thirty days' written notice if such termination is made pursuant to notification sent simultaneously to [all the distributors], announcing a change by Publisher in its method of sale and distribution," provided that the publisher simultaneously "offer[s] to Distributor an alternate means of participation in servicing subscribers in Distributor's Area of Primary Responsibility, either as agent or employee." But the Tribune Company must compensate a terminated distributor for the loss of his contractual rights. If the parties cannot agree on the value of those rights the matter must be submitted to arbitration for a determination of their value, and if the arbitrator decides that the termination was not for "just cause" he is to add 20 percent to the distributor's compensation, as damages. The contracts make arbitration the "exclusive remedy to resolve any dispute concerning the termination of a Distributor," the distributors having "expressly" waived any "right to any remedy in a court of law." Finally, the contracts forbid the arbitrators to reinstate [3] a terminated distributor.

[*170] In the fall of last year the Tribune Company announced that it was going over to a "delivery agent" system, and offered the plaintiffs agency contracts in place of their independent-distributor contracts, which it announced it was terminating. Under the agency contract the Tribune Company would fix the retail price of the Tribune, assume the risk of loss or nonpayment of newspapers, assume the responsibility for customer complaints, and purchase and lease back the principal assets of the (former) distributors. The plaintiffs declined the offer and instead brought this suit to enjoin their termination, contending that it is part of an illegal price-fixing scheme (presumably embodied in the agency contracts), and also a breach of contract because the change from independent distribution to agency distribution is not a change in the publisher's "method of sale and distribution." The Tribune Company has replaced the plaintiffs with new agents, each of whom handles a small number of subscribers and has signed the agency contract that the plaintiffs refused to sign. The parties agree that the plaintiffs can still obtain arbitration if they are dissatisfied [4] with the defendant's valuation of their lost rights under the terminated contracts.

HN1[] A request for a preliminary injunction is evaluated in accordance with a "sliding scale" approach: the more the balance of irrevocable harms inclines in the plaintiff's favor, the smaller the likelihood of prevailing on the merits he need show in order to get the injunction. See, e.g., Curtis v. Thompson, 840 F.2d 1291, 1296 (7th Cir. 1988); American Hospital Supply Corp. v. Hospital Products Ltd., 780 F.2d 589, 593-94 (7th Cir. 1986). The common sense of the approach is shown by the limiting case, in which the injunction would do no harm at all to the defendant but denial of the injunction would wreak massive and irrevocable harm on the plaintiff; even if the plaintiff had only a modest chance of prevailing when the case was fully tried, it would make sense to grant the injunction pending the trial, against the chance that he might win after all. The plaintiffs in this case rely heavily on this approach, arguing that unless their chance of winning is "less than negligible" they ought to get the injunction. This is a garbled version of the circuit's standard, which is that the plaintiff must [5] show that its chances "'are better than negligible.'" Roland Machinery Co. v. Dresser Industries, Inc., 749 F.2d 380, 387 (7th Cir. 1984). But there is a deeper problem with the plaintiffs' argument: they have failed to show that the injunction is necessary to avert any harm to them, let alone to avert massive harm not offset by comparable harm to the defendant if the injunction is granted. HN2[] The requirement that a plaintiff show that its chances for winning on the merits are better than negligible is a necessary rather than sufficient condition for a grant of a preliminary injunction.

The terms of the distribution contracts, entered into by mature businessmen who do not claim to have been hoodwinked or coerced, scotch any contention that the plaintiffs face irreparable harm--harm not fully compensable by an award of monetary relief by the arbitrators--as a result of the termination of the contracts. Contemplating the possibility that the defendant might terminate these contracts with only thirty days' notice, and the consequences if it did so, the plaintiffs agreed that if that happened their only remedy would be to seek a monetary award by an arbitrator--even if the Tribune Company [6] was acting wrongfully, that is, was breaking the contracts rather than terminating them in accordance with their terms. The plaintiffs could have negotiated for some form of equitable relief in the event of termination but they evidently decided that monetary relief would be adequate and expressly waived any other form of remedy. They argue now that they never surrendered their right to seek equitable relief from a court in the event of an unjust termination, but we cannot understand how this jibes with the provision in the agreements that makes arbitration the parties' "exclusive remedy to resolve any dispute concerning the termination of a Distributor" (emphasis added). In any event, both the elaborate provisions for monetary relief in the distributor agreements and the disavowal [*171] of equitable relief in the arbitration clause of the agreements are powerful evidence that the plaintiffs believed that financial compensation--which they can still obtain in arbitration--was an adequate remedy for the termination of the agreements.

HN3[] A prerequisite to a preliminary injunction, as to other forms of equitable relief, is a showing that the plaintiff's remedy at law is inadequate. See [7] id. at 386. The principle embraces a case such as this, where the plaintiffs agreed that monetary relief in arbitration would be the only remedy for a breach of contract. Compare Auburn News Co. v. Providence Journal Co., 659 F.2d 273, 277 (1st Cir. 1981). Their present argument that arbitration would be "a hollow formality" unless the Tribune Company is enjoined from terminating the distributorship contracts itself rings hollowly, since the arbitral remedy in the contracts envisages that the distributor has been terminated and forbids the arbitrator to reinstate a terminated distributor, whether on a permanent or interim basis.

The waiver of judicial remedies in the distributorship contracts may or may not embrace a request for an injunction to correct a violation of the antitrust laws (more on this later), but if it does not, still that would not affect our evaluation of the issue of irreparable harm. A single injury is alleged: the termination of the distributor contracts. Whatever the theory on which the plaintiffs seek equitable relief, the remedial provisions in the agreements show that their remedy at law (as we may for these purposes describe monetary relief in arbitration) [8] is adequate. This is not to say that the remedy specified in a contract is always the truest measure of a party's injury in the event of breach; the refusal of courts to enforce contractual penalty clauses, see, e.g., Lake River Corp. v. Carborundum Co., 769 F.2d 1284, 1288-92 (7th Cir. 1985), suggests it is not. In this case, however, there is no reason to doubt either the propriety or the adequacy of the remedial measures to which the plaintiffs agreed in the distributorship contracts.

A brief consideration of the merits, intended to be tentative rather than definitive, will provide additional reasons for our conclusion that the plaintiffs have not made out a case for a preliminary injunction. The merits of the contract claim seem threadbare. The contract authorizes the Tribune Company to terminate distributors merely upon announcing a change in the method of distribution, and there can be no serious doubt that the method was changed; distribution by employees, by agents, and by independent distributors are well-known alternative methods of distribution in the newspaper industry. See, e.g., Paschall v. Kansas City Star Co., 727 F.2d 692, 695 (8th Cir. 1984) (en banc); [9] Auburn News Co. v. Providence Journal Co., supra, 659 F.2d at 275; Knutson v. Daily

Review, Inc., 548 F.2d 795, 800-01 (9th Cir. 1976); Newberry v. Washington Post Co., 438 F. Supp. 470, 473 (D.D.C. 1977); Oppenheim & Shields, Newspapers and the Antitrust Laws 72-74 (1981). If the method did not change, it is hard to see why the plaintiffs refused to accept reclassification as agents. And even if the termination of the plaintiffs was unauthorized, all that would follow is that they are entitled to 20 percent more money from the arbitrators; there would be no grounds for their asking a district court for an injunction.

The merits of the plaintiffs' antitrust claim are somewhat more substantial. In Albrecht v. Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145, 19 L. Ed. 2d 998, 88 S. Ct. 869 (1968), the Supreme Court held that HN4[] section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, forbids a newspaper publisher to fix the retail price of newspapers distributed by independent distributors, even if the object of the "price fixing" is to prevent the distributors from exploiting the monopoly power conferred on them by the publisher's granting them exclusive territories. The decision has been much criticized, both in general and with specific [10] reference to the newspaper industry, see Hovenkamp, Vertical Integration by the Newspaper Monopolist, 69 Ia. L. Rev. 451 (1984), for disserving consumer interests; and its authority has been cast in doubt by later decisions of the Supreme Court. In particular, as we noted in [*172] Jack Walters & Sons Corp. v. Morton Building, Inc., 737 F.2d 698, 706 (7th Cir. 1984), at the time Albrecht was decided the granting of exclusive territories to dealers was unlawful per se and therefore did not provide an attractive excuse for placing a lid on the dealers' prices. Now that such imposition is no longer unlawful per se--indeed, now that the Supreme Court is highly sympathetic to efforts by manufacturers to control the distribution of their product, see, e.g., Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988)--it may be a valid excuse. The Court in Business Electronics cited Albrecht, but only for the definition of agreement, and not for the proposition that placing a ceiling over dealers' prices should be equated to placing a floor under those prices.

The plaintiffs have tacked Albrecht to another much critized decision, Simpson v. Union [11] Oil Co., 377 U.S. 13, 12 L. Ed. 2d 98, 84 S. Ct. 1051 (1964), which treated HN5[] the consignor's setting of the price at which the consignee was to sell the consignor's goods as a form of illegal price fixing. We have interpreted Simpson as limited to cases where the agency relationship has no other purpose than to circumvent the rule against price fixing. See Illinois Corporate Travel, Inc. v. American Airlines, Inc., 806 F.2d 722, 725 (7th Cir. 1986); Morrison v. Murray Biscuit Co., 797 F.2d 1430, 1437-38 (7th Cir. 1986). No such showing has yet been made here. Moreover, we can find no case where an agency agreement has been successfully challenged on antitrust grounds because it prevented the agent from raising his price. The facts of this case suggest why. Because most of a newspaper's revenues come from advertising rather than newspaper sales (80 percent, in the case of the Chicago Tribune), because advertising revenues depend on circulation, and because circulation is greater the lower the retail price of the newspaper, the Tribune Company has a vital interest in the cheap and effective distribution of its newspaper to the consuming public. It was not satisfied with the independent-distributor [12] system, and after replacing its independent distributors in the City of Chicago with agents was able to bring down the retail price of the paper by 21 percent in the areas formerly served by those distributors. The result was a 23 percent increase in circulation in those areas, and a hefty increase in advertising revenues. The consumer, who occupies center stage in the contemporary jurisprudence of antitrust, was made better off, and so were the Tribune Company and the agents who replaced the distributors. The distributors were made worse off but only because their method of distribution was more costly (or at least higher-priced) than the agency system.

Although Simpson teaches that a manufacturer cannot circumvent the rule against price fixing just by calling independent distributors "agents," the agency contracts that the Tribune Company has substituted for the independent-distributor contracts create a bona fide agency rather than just a new nomenclature. The distributors bore the risks of loss of newspapers and of nonpayment by subscribers; those risks have now been shifted to the publisher, who also now deals directly with complaining customers and owns the assets used in [13] the distribution-delivery function. If the new agents resemble the old distributors in the basics of their operations and service, equally the old distributors resemble employees of the Tribune Company who deliver the newspaper in parts of Chicago; all methods of distributing the same product have features in common. Consignment selling is a familiar and legitimate method of distribution; it was not outlawed by Simpson, see Morrison v. Murray Biscuit Co., supra, 797 F.2d at 1438, and is essentially the method adopted by the Tribune Company.

Since Albrecht and Simpson have not been overruled we hesitate to suggest that the merits of the plaintiffs' antitrust claim are "less than negligible," but that is not the test, and, even if it were, the plaintiffs would not have shown an entitlement to a preliminary injunction. HN6[] The strength of a plaintiff's case does not change the requirement of showing that the remedy at law [*173] (damages) is inadequate; one could have an open-and-shut case on the merits, yet if one's legal remedy were adequate one would not be entitled to a preliminary (or any) injunction. This observation is highly pertinent in the present case, a case in which [14] the antitrust claim merges into the breach of contract claim. The plaintiffs are arguing that the Tribune Company terminated the distributor contracts because it wanted to fix prices, an unlawful motive inconsistent with "just cause" for termination. But, if so, the contracts spell out the remedies (including a 20 percent surcharge) and establish that equitable relief is unnecessary to protect the plaintiffs' interests.

An argument could be made that arbitrators are not authorized to decide questions of federal antitrust law with binding effect, and at one time the argument would have carried the day, see, e.g., Applied Digital Technology, Inc. v. Continental Casualty Co., 576 F.2d 116, 117 (7th Cir. 1978); American Safety Equipment Corp. v. J.P. MaGuire & Co., 391 F.2d 821, 825-27 (2d Cir. 1968)--but no longer. We took a first, cautious step away from the doctrine of the nonarbitrability of antitrust issues in University Life Ins. Co. v. Unimarc Ltd., 699 F.2d 846, 850-51 (7th Cir. 1983) (by rejecting the corollary doctrine that arbitration must be stayed when antitrust issues "permeate" the issues to be arbitrated), and the Supreme Court rejected the doctrine altogether, [15] for international transactions, in Mitsubishi Motors Corp. v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc., 473 U.S. 614, 87 L. Ed. 2d 444, 105 S. Ct. 3346 (1985). Recently the Court relied on Mitsubishi in holding that HN7[] claims under RICO (the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act), a statute whose remedial provisions are closely modeled on those of the antitrust laws, are arbitrable. See Shearson/American Express, Inc. v. McMahon, 482 U.S. 220, 107 S. Ct. 2332, 96 L. Ed. 2d 185 (1987). Since RICO has nothing to do with international commerce, it seems unlikely after McMahon that the principle of Mitsubishi can be confined to international transactions. At all events, the plaintiffs in this case are in no position to argue against the arbitration of their antitrust claim when they tell us that far from wanting to reserve that claim for judicial determination they want the arbitrators to decide it and award them treble damages.

This suggests a further problem with the request for preliminary relief. Ordinarily such a request is designed to maintain the status quo pending a full trial of the plaintiff's claim. But what the plaintiffs are really seeking in this case is relief ancillary to arbitration. They want to be reinstated in the [16] hope that if the arbitrators find a violation of the antitrust laws this finding can be used to induce the Tribune Company to rescind the change in its system of distribution. Yet in the distributor contracts the plaintiffs voluntarily surrendered any right to reinstatement. They want arbitration under the contract but do not want to abide by the limitations on the arbitrators' powers.

The order denying the request for a preliminary injunction is

AFFIRMED.

Ocean State Physicians Health Plan, Inc. v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield

United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island

July 27, 1988, Decided

C.A. No. 86-0598-B

Reporter

692 F. Supp. 52 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8639 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,161

OCEAN STATE PHYSICIANS HEALTH PLAN, INC., ET AL., PLAINTIFFS, v. BLUE CROSS & BLUE SHIELD OF RHODE ISLAND, DEFENDANT

Core Terms

buyer, prudent, subscribers, damages, coverage, contractual relationship, estimated, participating, antitrust claim, anti trust law, Sherman Act, marketing, anticompetitive, enrollment, market share, contracts, market power, antitrust violation, healthcare, non-participating, rates, competitors, resigned, Pools, compensatory damages, financing, relevant market, monopoly power, profits, costs

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Jury Trials > Right to Jury Trial > Actions in Equity

Civil Procedure > Trials > Jury Trials > Jury Deliberations

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Damages > Monetary Damages

HN1[] Right to Jury Trial, Actions in Equity

In actions which blend claims for both legal relief in terms of monetary damages and equitable relief by way of injunction, a jury shall first determine the issue of damages.

Civil Procedure > Trials > Judgment as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN2[] Trials, Judgment as Matter of Law

The standard of review in setting aside a jury verdict is narrow. In determining the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the court must evaluate the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs. But the plaintiffs are not entitled to unreasonable inferences based on speculation and conjecture. A motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict should be granted when as a matter of law, no conclusion but one can be drawn. Therefore a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict should be denied if after reviewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs and drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor, there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict. A jury verdict supported by the evidence may not be set aside simply because the judge would have reached a different result.

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > Motions for New Trials

HN3[] Judicial Officers, Judges

The standard of review for granting a new trial is not as stringent as for granting a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. But the trial judge may not set aside a verdict simply because he or she would have reached a different verdict. In granting a motion for a new trial the judge must find that the verdict is against the clear weight of the evidence, or is based upon evidence which is false, or will result in a clear miscarriage of justice.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Damages

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Industries > Communications > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Costs & Attorney Fees > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Remedies > Damages

HN4[] Clayton Act, Claims

Section 15 of the Sherman Act, more commonly known as Section 4 of the Clayton Act, provides that a plaintiff can recover threefold the damages he sustains and the cost of the suit, including attorney's fees if the plaintiff shows an injury in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws. 15 U.S.C.S. § 15. To establish an antitrust violation, plaintiffs must show that defendants engaged in monopolization acts in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Penalties

Torts > Business Torts > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Scope

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Damages

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Clayton Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Monopolization Offenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Penalties

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > US Department of Justice Actions > Criminal Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Damages > Monetary Damages

HN5[] Clayton Act, Penalties

Section 2 of the Sherman Act defines the criminal violation of monopolization and its penalties. 15 U.S.C.S. § 2. But the mere existence of a violation cannot support a private action under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. Plaintiffs must show that they suffered an injury to business or property as a result of the antitrust violation. What constitutes an injury to business or property is less than clear. The words "business or property" refer to commercial interest. However, injury to business or property is defined in terms of a tautology. Since Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides a money damages remedy, it must be an injury which the jury is able to quantify in dollars. It is the kind of injury that the antitrust laws were designed to prevent, namely damage as a result of anticompetitive conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN6[] Private Actions, Remedies

Plaintiffs do not have to prove that the antitrust violation was the sole cause of the injury. But the Plaintiffs must show a causal relationship between the injury and the violation. Furthermore, the plaintiffs must prove some indication of the amount of damages. Thus, to be liable under the antitrust laws means that one has to violate the antitrust laws and that violation has resulted in an injury to the business or property of the plaintiff, i.e., there was fact of damage.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN7[] Private Actions, Remedies

To establish that defendant violated antitrust laws the plaintiff must prove the following elements by a preponderance of the evidence: 1) the defendant had monopoly power in a relevant market; 2) that the defendant willfully acquired or maintained that power through restrictive or exclusionary conduct; 3) that defendant's activities occurred in or affected interstate commerce; and 4) that plaintiff was injured in its business or property because of defendant's restrictive or exclusionary conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

HN8[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Actual Monopolization

The terms "monopoly power" and "market power" are generally used interchangeably. "Monopoly power" is the power to control prices or exclude competition in a relevant market. The relevant market is the "area of effective competition" where the defendant operates. Relevant market is identified by the product and its interchangeability plus the geographic area. Usually the trier of fact defines the relevant market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > General Overview

HN9[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

It is not a requirement to an antitrust suit that plaintiff and defendant be in the same relevant market. Plaintiff, however, must meet the standing requirement that it alleged that it suffered an injury to its business or property as a result of the defendant's conduct. 15 U.S.C.S. § 15. The First Circuit requires that the person injured by the alleged antitrust violation be within a target area, which draws a line and excludes persons whose injuries are too remote.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Facilities

Insurance Law > Industry Practices > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > General Overview

HN10[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Actual Monopolization

Courts must consider the market share of the alleged monopolist as an important factor in determining the existence of monopoly power. In unregulated industries, courts measure market power by defining the relevant product and geographic market and compute the defendant's market share. In a regulated industry, such as health care insurance, a heavy reliance on market share statistics probably would be an inaccurate or misleading indication of monopoly power. Thus, the size of a regulated company's market share should be a point of departure in determining the existence of monopoly power. Other factors such as size of competitors, degree of barriers to entry, pricing trends and practices and technological superiority may be considered in determining market power. A monopoly power analysis must focus directly on the defendant's ability to control prices or exclude competition. It is essential to also keep in mind the fact that the antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition, not competitors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN11[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

The use of monopoly power, however lawfully acquired, to foreclose competition, to gain a competitive advantage, or to destroy a competitor, is unlawful under the Sherman Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

HN12[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Actual Monopolization

Regarding a monopoly, exclusionary conduct includes behavior that not only (1) tends to impair the opportunities of rivals, but also (2) either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way.

Torts > ... > Contracts > Intentional Interference > Elements

Torts > Business Torts > Commercial Interference > General Overview

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Prospective Advantage > General Overview

HN13[] Intentional Interference, Elements

To establish a claim for tortious interference with a contractual relationship, plaintiff must prove by the preponderance of the evidence that a contract existed, that the alleged wrongdoer knew of the contract, that the wrongdoer's interference was intentional, and that damages resulted from it. The plaintiff must show that the defendant intended to do harm without justification. The defendant has the burden of proving sufficient justification for an interference.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Injunctions

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > Irreparable Harm

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Damages

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Prioritizing Resources & Organization for Intellectual Property Act

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > Public Interest

HN14[] Remedies, Injunctions

Section 16 of the Clayton Act, reads in part that any person or corporation shall be entitled to sue for injunctive relief against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage. 15 U.S.C.S. § 26. Injunctive relief is available to private parties when the traditional equity principles are met and there is a demonstration of a threatened injury. The traditional elements that a moving party must show for injunctive relief are: 1) irreparable harm to the plaintiff if the injunction is not granted, 2) inadequacy of a legal remedy, 3) that the public interest will not be adversely affected by granting the injunction; 4) that the harm to plaintiff outweighs any harm to the defendant by granting the injunction. But in order to prevail, plaintiff must demonstrate a significant threat of injury from an impending violation of the antitrust laws. Plaintiff need only show a threat on injury, not an actual injury.

Counsel: [1] Thomas A. Lynch, Lynch and Greenfield, Providence, Rhode Island, William G. Kopit, Mark E. Lutes, Stuart Gerson, Epstein, Becker, Borsody & Green, P.C., Washington, District of Columbia, for Plaintiffs.

Patrick Quinlan, Quinn, Shectman & Teverow, Providence, Rhode Island, Julius C. Michaelson, Providence, Rhode Island, for Plaintiff-Intervenors.

Steven E. Snow, James Purcell, Partridge, Snow & Hahn, Providence, Rhode Island, for Defendant.

Judges: Francis J. Boyle, Chief United States District Judge.

Opinion by: BOYLE

Opinion

[*54] FRANCIS J. BOYLE, CHIEF UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Defendant, Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island, has been charged by Plaintiffs with restraint of trade and monopolization in violation of both federal and state law. After trial, a jury awarded Plaintiffs compensatory damages in the total amount of $ 2,693,437 and punitive damages in the amount of $ 250,000 for wrongful interference with contractual relationships, and found that Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island was guilty of monopolization but awarded it no damages. Now pending are the Defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the antitrust and tortious interference with contractual relationships claims. In the alternative, the Defendant seeks a new trial [2] only on the interference with contractual relationships claims and not on the antitrust claims. Plaintiffs seek injunctive relief and an additur on the antitrust claims. In addition, the Defendant filed a counterclaim against the Plaintiff-Intervenors, the Physicians and Surgeons Association of Rhode Island, Inc. and thirteen individual members of the class, to prevent the Plaintiff-Intervenors from collectively negotiating fees with Blue Cross. [1]

---

[1] The Physicians and Surgeons Association of Rhode Island and nineteen individual physicians intervened seeking injunctive relief and monetary damages against Defendant Blue Cross, a claim dismissed at trial. The Defendant Blue Cross also claimed against the Plaintiff-Intervenors alleging that Plaintiff-Intervenors violated Section One of the Sherman Act by conspiring to Plaintiffs claimed that the Defendant violated Sections One and Two of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2 (Supp. 1986), violated the analogous Rhode Island Antitrust Statutes, R.I. Gen. [3] Laws § 6-36-1 to 26 (Supp. 1985), and breached the common law duty not to wrongfully interfere [*55] with contractual relationships. The Plaintiff Ocean State Physicians Health Plan, Inc. and the Plaintiff class of physicians sought monetary damages against the Defendant due to Blue Cross's business programs which for short hand purpose of reference are called prudent buyer, adverse selection, and HealthMate. Plaintiffs claimed that those programs were unlawful. Plaintiffs saught a permanent injunction prohibiting Defendant from using its prudent buyer and HealthMate programs.

THE PARTIES

The Plaintiffs, Ocean State Physicians Health Plan, Inc. (Ocean State) and Anthony J. Kazlauskas and Jeffrey C. Winters, on behalf of the class of physicians, commenced suit against the Defendant Blue Cross & Blue Shield in September 1986. The class of physicians was defined by a court order dated April 2, 1987 to include "all physicians who contract with Ocean State to provide physicians services and who are also reimbursed by Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island for the provision of physician services to defendant's subscribers." The Defendant, Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island, is a non-profit hospital and medical services corporation which [4] provides insurance for hospital and medical expenses.

Ocean State is a health maintenance organization (HMO) with headquarters in Warwick, Rhode Island. As an independent practice association type HMO, Ocean State contracts with physicians to provide medical care to its subscribers; Ocean State then pays its contracted physicians on a fee for service basis. Initially, subscribers paid little or no additional cost other than the premium paid to the HMO. The physicians' practice remained independent from the HMO.

In 1980, Ocean State submitted its license application to the Rhode Island Department of Health. It began operation by offering hospital and physicians costs coverage to employee groups of twenty-five or more. Originally, Medserco, a St. Louis based company managed Ocean State. Presently, United HealthCare, a Minnesota based company, manages Ocean State and is its single principal shareholder owning 20% of the stock. The remaining 80% of shares are held by some of the physicians who provide services to Ocean State subscribers. New Ocean State participating physicians pay up to $ 1,000 to contract with Ocean State to provide health services to Ocean State subscribers.

Ocean [5] State is a federally qualified HMO. It determines its rates based on a community rating method. 42 U.S.C. Section 300e-1(8) provides that an HMO may choose to group by individual or family but within the chosen group, rates are to be equal subject to adjustment factors, such as age and sex. State law permits Blue Cross & Blue Shield to base its premiums for employer groups on the prior actual experiences of each particular insured group.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND - PROCEDURAL

In April 1987, the Court granted Plaintiffs Winters' and Kazlauskas' motion for class certification after the Defendant failed to object. The class, as noted, included all physicians who contract with Ocean State and who are also reimbursed by Blue Cross & Blue Shield. It was estimated that 900 physicians were certified as members of the class.

Although in their original complaint Plaintiffs did not request a jury trial, they subsequently demanded a jury trial. At the conclusion of Plaintiffs' case, the Court granted the Defendant's motion for a directed verdict on all claims under Section One of the Sherman Act against Ocean State and the class of physicians. The Court also granted Blue Cross & Blue Shield's motion [6] for a directed verdict against the Plaintiff-Intervenors. At the conclusion of the case, the jury returned a verdict finding Blue Cross & Blue Shield liable to both Ocean State and the class of physicians on the Section Two antitrust claims. The jury, however, awarded no damages. On the claim of tortious collectively negotiate with Blue Cross and sought injunctive and declaratory relief. There is no present threat to negotiate; therefore, the claim is denied as premature.

---

interference with contractual relationships, the jury found Blue Cross & Blue Shield liable [*56] to Ocean State and awarded compensatory damages of $ 947,000 and punitive damages of $ 250,000. The jury also found Blue Cross & Blue Shield liable to the class of physicians on the interference with contractual relationships claim and awarded $ 1,746,437 in compensatory damages.

Pending before the Court are both equitable and legal claims. Plaintiffs move for a permanent injunction against prudent buyer and HealthMate. In addition, they seek an additur to the class of physicians on the antitrust claim. Defendant moves for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the antitrust claims and intentional interference with contractual relationships claims. In the alternative, the Defendant seeks a new trial on the claims of interference with contractual relationships.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

For [7] many years Blue Cross of Rhode Island and Blue Shield of Rhode Island were the unchallenged leading health care financing organizations in Rhode Island. Blue Cross of Rhode Island was incorporated in the 1930's as a non-profit hospital service corporation that provided insurance coverage for hospital services. Blue Shield of Rhode Island was incorporated later and limited its insurance coverage to payment of physician charges. Blue Cross of Rhode Island and Blue Shield maintained separate Boards of Directors, reserves, and auditing of financial statements.

Under an administrative services agreement, however, Blue Cross provided management and staff for Blue Shield. Usually Blue Cross and Blue Shield policies were marketed together as a package to employers. Occasionally, an employer could purchase Blue Cross coverage alone, but employees were not permitted to purchase only Blue Shield coverage. Neither Blue Cross nor Blue Shield were marketed with other health insurance.

In 1971, Rhode Island Group Health Association (RIGHA) a group model Health Maintenance Organization (HMO) entered the Rhode Island health care financing market. A group model HMO employs physicians to serve the medical [8] needs of its subscribers. Services are usually provided at a fixed location and this was initially true of RIGHA. RIGHA had little impact on Blue Cross & Blue Shield's share of the market. RIGHA entered into an agreement with Blue Cross & Blue Shield whereby RIGHA would purchase hospital services through Blue Cross. Thus, RIGHA enjoyed Blue Cross & Blue Shield hospital discounts; while Blue Cross & Blue Shield benefited because they then claimed RIGHA subscribers within their membership and thereby increased their claimed size of the market. As a result, Blue Cross was further able to negotiate favorable agreements for the cost of hospital care.

In addition, RIGHA entered into a joint marketing agreement with Blue Cross & Blue Shield to coordinate marketing activities. Both agreements were terminated in March 1982, after a newspaper article disclosed the arrangement. There was testimony, however, that the sharing of hospital and physician discounts continued through May 1986.

In 1980 at the time Ocean State applied to the Rhode Island Department of Health for licensing as an HMO, Blue Cross & Blue Shield continued to dominate the health care financing market. Blue Cross & Blue Shield [9] controlled a very large percentage of the market. Competition from other health care financing insurers was virtually non-existent. RIGHA was then the only licensed HMO in Rhode Island and its market share was minimal.

Although Blue Cross & Blue Shield researched the financial background of Medserco, Ocean State's original management company, and considered using that information to discredit Ocean State's regulatory application, it did not do so. Blue Cross and Blue Shield took an active interest in Ocean State's licensing procedure, but did not oppose the application. Subsequently Ocean State's application was approved.

At about the same time Blue Cross and Blue Shield were negotiating a merger. In 1982, after two years of negotiations the two companies merged to form one corporation, Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode [*57] Island, [hereinafter Blue Cross & Blue Shield] which provided both hospital and physician insurance coverage. One Board of Directors and one Chief Executive Officer managed the new corporation.

In addition, the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island enacted the Health Maintenance Organization Act of 1983, R.I. Gen. Laws §§ 27-41-1 et seq. (Supp. 1986), [10] which was modeled after the federal HMO Act, 42

U.S.C. § 300e-9 (Supp. 1986). Rhode Island is unique in the large percentage of employees covered by employer provided health plans. The State Act incorporates a dual choice provision which requires employers to offer a licensed qualified HMO as an employee choice for health insurance if an HMO provides services in the area where the employee resides. Blue Cross & Blue Shield challenged this dual choice provision as inconsistent with provisions of the federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA). See 29 U.S.C. §§ 1001-1461 (Supp. 1987). In Blue Cross of R. I. v. Cannon, 589 F. Supp. 1483 (D.R.I. 1984), the suit was dismissed because it was not ripe; however, it was noted that the employer's obligation to provide an HMO alternative is subject to the condition precedent of a request by an eligible HMO to be included in the health insurance offering.

As of the Spring 1986, Blue Cross & Blue Shield was faced with a serious competitive problem. While Blue Cross & Blue Shield lost approximately 30,000 of its 543,015 enrollees; Ocean State's enrollment exceeded the most optimistic expectations and had grown to 70,000. Blue [11] Cross & Blue Shield's loss of enrollment was attributed to its increased premium rates and to its lack of an HMO plan which would provide more coverage than traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield.

Rates had to be increased because Blue Cross & Blue Shield was experiencing financial difficulties. Its cash reserves had dropped below the State law requirement, which requires Blue Cross & Blue Shield to maintain an available cash supply sufficient to pay all operating expenses and claims for not less than a 1 1/2 month period. See R.I. Gen. Laws § 27-19-6 (Supp. 1986). Payments of claims exceeded Blue Cross & Blue Shield's estimates and the amount of revenue generated through premiums was not sufficient to cover Blue Cross & Blue Shield's anticipated costs. Blue Cross & Blue Shield had to raise its premium rates. The increased rates further contributed to its loss of enrollment which further required higher rates to cover the losses due to enrollees dropping out.

Although Blue Cross & Blue Shield dominated the health care financing industry, the loss of enrollment created concern. There was conflicting testimony at trial about Blue Cross & Blue Shield's market share.

Plaintiffs claimed that Blue Cross & Blue Shield controlled 80% of the market. Defendant [12] did not dispute that it was the largest health care cost insurer in Rhode Island, but would not agree that it controlled 80% of the market. Ocean State claimed that 656,650 persons in Rhode Island were eligible to procure private health coverage and that 543,015 persons selected Blue Cross & Blue Shield coverage. Therefore, according to Plaintiffs' calculations Blue Cross & Blue Shield's enrollment share was 82.7%.

Defendant downwardly adjusted this estimate of its market share by making three adjustments to the market share calculation. First, the estimated number of members covered under a family contract was reduced from 3.4 persons to 2.8 persons, which resulted in a 17.64% reduction of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's enrollment share. Next, duplicate coverage was factored into the calculation. The Defendant had assumed that 12% of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's enrollees had duplicate coverage with another Blue Cross & Blue Shield plan and that 8% of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's enrollees had duplicate coverage with another company. Thus, adjustments to the market reduced Blue Cross & Blue Shield's market share to 62.8%. Finally, Blue Cross & Blue Shield assumed the Rhode Island employment [13] base was 10% greater than reflected in the Rhode Island population count because more workers [*58] came into the State to work than left the State to work. So Blue Cross & Blue Shield estimated that the total population eligible to select Blue Cross & Blue Shield coverage was 722,315 persons (the Rhode Island population 656,650 + the non-state resident workers 65,665). With the foregoing adjustments, Blue Cross & Blue Shield's market share was 57.1%. The Defendant, although it disputed the Ocean State estimate of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's market share, agreed that it had a substantial share of the market. This was an admission of the obvious. Blue Cross & Blue Shield is clearly the major provider of private health care cost payment in Rhode Island and thus it is the major factor in the competitive market. It clearly had market power. The issue here is whether or not it exercised that power unlawfully.

Both Blue Cross & Blue Shield and Ocean State were experiencing financial problems at about the same time during the Spring and Summer of 1986. Blue Cross & Blue Shield was facing enrollment losses and increased premiums; while Ocean State's operating costs were exceeding its income. Both Ocean [14] State and Blue Cross & Blue Shield had to make changes and adopt new programs. Blue Cross & Blue Shield responded with the prudent buyer policy, adverse selection, and HealthMate. Ocean State went through a major reorganization, increased the amount of payment subscribers were required to pay for services rendered, and created a program called Speciality Incentive Pools (SIPS).

In May 1986, the Blue Cross & Blue Shield's Board of Directors approved a three prong approach to deal with Blue Cross & Blue Shield's loss of enrollment and financial difficulties. The plan included (1) implementing the "prudent buyer policy," (2) instituting "adverse selection rating factors" and (3) marketing of a new product, which was ultimately called "HealthMate." Blue Cross & Blue Shield submitted a series of riders to the classic hospital and medical service plans to the Department of Business Regulations, (DBR), State of Rhode Island for its approval. The DBR approved the new HealthMate product, which was known as the "Z Plan," "Maps Plus," and "Plan 100 Plus." HealthMate provided 15% more coverage than standard Blue Cross & Blue Shield. It included hospital and medical service plans plus other coverage [15] such as office visits, prescription drugs, student rates, and "good health" benefits. Under HealthMate, subscribers must use participating physicians otherwise the plan would not pay for physician services. In addition, all Blue Cross & Blue Shield participating physicians are required to provide services under HealthMate and to accept the HealthMate payment as payment in full if they wished to remain Blue Cross & Blue Shield participating physicians.

HealthMate was first offered to employees of the State of Rhode Island in July, 1986. This is the largest single group of employees covered by an employer health plan in Rhode Island, and no doubt, that fact prompted the creation of HealthMate. The Department of Administration, the State agency which awarded contracts for health coverage, extended its open enrollment season for selecting a health plan so that HealthMate could be offered. Later, HealthMate was offered to other experience rated groups. HealthMate was never offered alone as a health insurance plan, but was only marketed as an alternative to traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield if a competing HMO was also being considered as a health insurance option. Today, HealthMate is [16] offered to all employer groups with more than 50 employees.

HealthMate was marketed with financial incentives for employers. If the employer paid the full cost of its employees' health insurance, HealthMate was offered at the same rates as traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield. If employees were required to contribute to their coverage, then HealthMate was offered at 5% below the cost of traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield. Ocean State claimed that between June 1986 and August 1987, it lost profits of $ 58,550 because of the head to head marketing and low cost of HealthMate. In addition, Ocean State estimated a $ 59,041 future loss of profits through June 1988.

[*59] To support the tiered pricing for HealthMate and traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield coverage, Blue Cross & Blue Shield approved an adverse selection policy on June 1, 1986. Blue Cross & Blue Shield implemented the adverse selection policy without approval from the Department of Business Regulation (DBR). In October 1986, DBR ordered Blue Cross to cease using the adverse selection policy until it obtained DBR approval. On November 12, 1986, the DBR approved the adverse selection factors and Blue Cross resumed use of the adverse [17] selection policy.

Blue Cross & Blue Shield was concerned that it would be adversely selected by subscribers if other health plans were offered. "Adverse selection" is jargon which means exactly the opposite of what it says. It has nothing to do with selection of Blue Cross. It is the opposite, the selection of a competitor by a Blue Cross subscriber. It means that Blue Cross & Blue Shield was concerned that it would lose its best (least expensive) members. It was concerned that it would lose a large percentage of its younger/healthier subscribers to a different company with a more comprehensive preventive health plan and be left with an older, less healthy population, causing its claims costs per subscriber to increase. Thus to reflect this possible increase in cost per subscriber, adverse selection factors were applied.

Under the adverse selection policy, employers were offered three different rates for Blue Cross & Blue Shield indemnity coverage. Employers would be charged the lowest rate if the employer only offered traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield coverage. If the employer offered traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield, a competing HMO and HealthMate, then the rate for traditional [18] Blue Cross & Blue Shield would be at a middle level. If an employer offered traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield and a competing HMO but refused to offer HealthMate, then the highest rate for traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield coverage would be charged.

Adverse selection rate differentials were determined based on a formula which Blue Cross & Blue Shield designed. The formula incorporated two estimates. The first estimate was called the health factor, which concluded that HMO enrollees, on the average, would be 22% healthier (22% less expensive) than the aggregate membership of the employed group.

The second estimate in the adverse selection calculation was Blue Cross & Blue Shield's estimate of the number of subscribers that might enroll in competitive health plans. The estimate was not based on Blue Cross & Blue Shield's prior experience of subscribers switching health coverage but on Blue Cross & Blue Shield's projection. Ocean State contended that Blue Cross & Blue Shield overestimated the number of subscribers who would be lost to competing HMOs, causing the adverse selection calculation to be higher than what was necessary to ensure that its premiums reflected its costs.

In [19] February 1987, the Department of Business Regulations (DBR) released a study of the number of Blue Cross & Blue Shield enrollees that switched to HMOs. It found that fewer enrollees dropped traditional Blue Cross & Blue Shield coverage and replaced it with HMO coverage than Blue Cross & Blue Shield had projected. Many employers complained to DBR about the substantial increase in their premiums, partly due to the adverse selection factors, and they threatened to discontinue Blue Cross & Blue Shield coverage. In February 1987, Blue Cross & Blue Shield decided to base its calculation of losses to competing HMOs upon actual lost enrollment. Thus, the second estimate factor in the adverse selection calculation was adjusted as of February 1987.

Ocean State asserted that the overestimate of loss of subscribers to competing HMO artificially increased price differential which discouraged employers from offering a competing HMO, such as Ocean State. Furthermore, Ocean State claimed that the rate differentials were designed to discourage employers from offering competing health insurance options, or alternatively to force employers to offer HealthMate [*60] if a competing health plan was an option.

[20] Meanwhile, the financial circumstances of Ocean State were also under stress. As a new HMO, Ocean State decided in 1983 that it would withhold 20% of the physicians' fee until the end of the year at which time if Ocean State's operational expenses were in the black then the withholding would be paid to the physicians. This was seen as an incentive to its contracted physicians to keep health care costs low. In 1984 Ocean State returned the withhold to physicians. In 1985, however, Ocean State retained the withhold because cost of operating exceeded Ocean State's estimates. This action occurred in 1986.

Ocean State memberships had risen astronomically, but the rate of increase began to level off. In the spring and summer of 1986, it began to experience financial concerns not different from those of Blue Cross & Blue Shield. Ocean State initiated a drastic management change on July 1, 1986, and designed new incentives for physicians to maintain costs. Not coincidentally, these initiatives were roughly coincident with Blue Cross's trilogy of programs, HealthMate, adverse selection and prudent buyer.

In an effort to control expenses and hopefully to provide a dividend to its physician [21] members, Ocean State implemented the Speciality Incentive Pools (SIPs) as of November 1, 1986. Speciality Incentive Pools is another instance of jargon. It simply means that the physician would be paid his or her full charge rather than only 80% of the charge, if there was enough money left in the pool at the end of the year to do so. Ocean State divided participating physicians into specialty categories. Each specialty was allotted a certain sum of money as its operating budget. Physicians were paid 80% of their charges. If expenses for the specialty category did not exceed estimated operational cost, then the remaining funds in the specialty category would be divided among physicians in that group. Each specialty group had a very good reason to provide services at the lowest cost; thus, the name Speciality Incentive Pools. The 1986 operational cost exceeded Ocean State's estimates. Therefore, nothing additional was paid to participating physicians through the Speciality Incentive Pools.

Blue Cross & Blue Shield expressed concern that physicians were giving greater discounts to Ocean State than to Blue Cross & Blue Shield. In response to the March 25, 1986, decision of Ocean State [22] to retain the 1985 withholdings, Blue Cross & Blue Shield announced the prudent buyer policy on June 6, 1986. The policy, however, did not become effective until November 1, 1986.

Prudent buyer is more jargon. What it means is that Blue Cross & Blue Shield would not pay more to a physician than what the physician was willing to accept for performing the same services for another health care cost provider, including Ocean State. Thus, if physicians were accepting 80% of their charges as payment in full from Ocean State, then Blue Cross would also pay only 80% of physicians charges, as payment in full. Plaintiffs asserted that the prudent buyer policy was fashioned after Blue Cross & Blue Shield's hospital participation policy. Under that policy Blue Cross & Blue Shield participating hospitals who offered competitors discounts, which were comparable or better than the approximate 13% discount provided Blue Cross & Blue Shield, were threatened with termination of their status as participating providers. The hospital participation policy had been successfully implemented and permitted Blue Cross to buy hospital services at the lowest rate.

Under the prudent buyer policy, Blue Cross & [23] Blue Shield would not pay more for physician services than the lowest payment the physician accepted for such services. At trial Blue Cross & Blue Shield contended that it was only trying to get the best price for its subscribers. Blue Cross & Blue Shield required physicians to document that the fees the physicians charged Blue Cross & Blue Shield were the lowest that the physicians charged for that particular service. If a physician failed to document by September 15, 1986 that he or [*61] she was not charging Blue Cross & Blue Shield more than he or she was charging its competitors, then Blue Cross & Blue Shield reduced its reimbursement to the physician by 20%. There was evidence that Blue Cross & Blue Shield understood the ramifications of the prudent buyer policy. A handwritten note by a Blue Cross & Blue Shield management employee stated that "not one guy in the state isn't going to know the implication of signing with Ocean State." Plaintiffs made much of this observation.

Plaintiffs contended that approximately one-third of Ocean State's participating physicians resigned from Ocean State as a result of the prudent buyer policy. Testimony was, however, that physicians resigned for [24] many reasons. Some physicians claimed they resigned because they were concerned about the effect of the prudent buyer policy upon their Blue Cross & Blue Shield patients. Others claimed that they could not afford to have their Blue Cross & Blue Shield payments cut by 20%. It is clear that some physicians resigned from Ocean State because of the prudent buyer policy, but is also abundantly clear that the actual number was far less than that contended by Ocean State.

Because about 350 of its 1200 participating physicians resigned, Ocean State claimed that it had to pay for the services of more non-participating physicians in order to provide physician services to its members at a level comparable to the level which existed before the physicians resigned. Although the physicians resignations represented a cross section of specialties, Ocean State contended that certain specialties were harder hit, such as cardiac surgery. Thus, Ocean State had to buy more services from non-participating physicians, which was more expensive. As a result, Ocean State contended that it incurred greater cost for providing physician services to subscribers. Therefore, Ocean State claimed that due to the prudent [25] buyer policy, it had to pay an additional $ 946,260 to non-participating physicians between January 1987 and March 1987.

In addition, Ocean State contended that the reduction of participating physicians caused a reduction in subscribers. There was testimony that some subscribers dropped Ocean State when their personal physicians resigned from Ocean State. Ocean State would not pay the physician for services rendered to the patient and the patient would have to pay the physician without reimbursement from Ocean State. Ocean State claimed it lost $ 597,016 in profits on enrolled members who dropped Ocean State between November 1986 and August 1987.

Ocean State presented evidence that under the prudent buyer policy, Blue Cross & Blue Shield withheld more than $ 1,900,000 from Ocean State's 1200 participating physicians. The certified class, however included an estimated 900 physicians. During the time between implementation of the prudent buyer policy and the class certification, more than 300 physicians resigned from Ocean State. Those physicians who had prudent buyer withholds but were not participating physicians of Ocean State in April 1987 did not meet the definition of the class [26] certification. The certified class of physicians claimed Blue Cross & Blue Shield withheld $ 1,425,000 from it.

Blue Cross & Blue Shield acknowledged that under the prudent buyer policy between January 1, 1987 and May 30, 1987 it withheld $ 2,058,769.58. During this period, providers requested $ 682,351.36 in refunds. Blue Cross & Blue Shield estimated that the refund payments would be $ 136,470.27 per month. Blue Cross & Blue Shield estimated that it would withhold $ 2,838,199.34 between November 1, 1986 and June 30, 1987. The refund estimates for this eight month period were $ 1,091,762.17. Thus, Blue Cross & Blue Shield's projected prudent buyer savings during this eight month period would be $ 1,746,437.17.

Blue Cross & Blue Shield contended that the prudent buyer policy, adverse selection policy, and the marketing of HealthMate were exercises of good business judgment. Blue Cross & Blue Shield asserted that Ocean State's financial loss were due to both its being a young HMO and mismanagement. [*62] There was testimony that all young HMOs lose money in the initial years. Between June and July 1986, Ocean State attempted to reduce financial losses by switching its underwriters to United [27] HealthCare, reducing the management fee, replacing its Chief Executive Officer, and instituting co-payments for office visits. There was conflicting testimony whether those changes were sufficient to put Ocean State in the black. Blue Cross & Blue Shield contended that between June 30, 1986 and September 30, 1986, Ocean State had profits of $ 227,123. It contended that by the end of 1986, Ocean State's profits were $ 698,348. Thus, Blue Cross & Blue Shield claimed that adverse selection, HealthMate, and the prudent buyer policy did not cause Ocean State to lose money. Ocean State, however, asserted that those figures were deceptive and did not accurately reflect the impact of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's actions.

Ocean State claimed that it incurred a $ 809,158 loss involving hospital discounts between January 1984 through May 1986; a $ 597,016 loss of profits on enrolled members who terminated their coverage with Ocean State between November 1986 and August 1987; a $ 117,591 loss of potential profits on possible state employee enrollees who did not contract with Ocean State due to the State of Rhode Island's contract with Blue Cross which offered HealthMate, between June 1986 and June [28] 1988. Ocean State asserted that it lost $ 173,013 from expected profits which failed to materialize because of Blue Cross's actions. Thus, Ocean State claimed it lost a total of $ 1,696,798 due to Blue Cross's anticompetitive actions. The physicians class claimed it lost $ 946,760 between January 1987 and March 1987 due to Ocean State's payments to non-participating physicians and $ 1,900,000 due to the prudent buyer policy. They claimed a total loss of $ 2,846,260. The jury verdicts, however, awarded $ 947,000 to Ocean State and $ 1,746,437 to the Plaintiff class of physicians.

The jury's verdicts in this action are at variance with the proof. On the third try, after the jury had been returned to the jury room twice for reconsideration of its verdict, the jury returned a verdict for Plaintiffs on its Section 2 Sherman Act claims, but failed to award any damages. The jury awarded damages against Blue Cross & Blue Shield on the claims of intentional interference with advantageous relationships on behalf of Ocean State in the amount of $ 947,000 compensatory damages and $ 250,000 punitive damages and for the class of physicians in the amount of $ 1,746,437 in compensatory damages.

The [29] jury deliberated two days before returning a verdict finding Blue Cross & Blue Shield "Guilty" on both counts, the Section 2 Sherman Act violation and the common law tort of interference with advantageous relations. Initially, the jury awarded each Plaintiff, Ocean State and the class physicians, compensatory damages of $ 2,693,437 (not coincidentally $ 1,746,437 + 947,000) and punitive damages of $ 250,000. Ocean State and the class of physicians suffered different injuries and damages. It was thus highly unlikely that each Plaintiffs' award for damages would be exactly the same. Recognizing that more than mere coincidence could be a factor, the Court explained the purpose of each verdict form and that the jury must award damages separately for each Plaintiff and for each claim based on the evidence.

After further deliberation, the jury returned the second set of verdict forms. It again found Blue Cross & Blue Shield "Guilty" as to both the antitrust claims and the interference with contractual relationships claims brought by both Ocean State and the class of Physicians. On the verdict form for Ocean State v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield, the jury listed compensatory damages of $ 947,000 [30] and punitive damages of $ 250,000. On the verdict form for the class of physicians, the jury listed compensatory damages of $ 1,746,437. Neither of the second set of verdict forms stated whether the award was for damages on the antitrust claim or for interference with contractual relationships claim or both. The jury was then instructed that the verdict must clearly state the specific claims upon which it awarded damages.

[*63] After further deliberation, the jury returned its third set of verdict forms. The total amount of the damage awards equaled the same amount as the second verdict forms. The verdict form for Ocean State v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield stated that as to the Section 2 of Sherman Act claim, Blue Cross & Blue Shield was guilty but awarded no damages. As to the interference with contractual relationships, the jury found Blue Cross & Blue Shield guilty and awarded Ocean State compensatory damages of $ 947,000 and punitive damages of $ 250,000. On the verdict form for the Class of Physicians v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield, the jury found Blue Cross & Blue Shield guilty of the Section 2 of the Sherman Act claim, but awarded no damages. On the interference with contractual relationships [31] claim, the jury found Blue Cross & Blue Shield guilty and awarded the class of physicians compensatory damages of $ 1,746,437.

The Defendant contends that the compensation award to Ocean State is based on the Plaintiffs' Exhibit 776 (for identification) prepared by one of Plaintiffs' damages expert and used by her as a basis for her testimony. In this the Defendant is clearly correct. Exhibit 776 is a three column simulated spreadsheet. The headings for the columns were lost profits, (Ocean State) lost hospital discounts, (Ocean State) and lost payments for the physicians' class. Under the heading lost payment to the physicians' class was a subsection entitled payments by OSPHP to non-participating physicians 1/87 - 3/87. This section reported $ 946,260 payments Ocean State made to non-participating physicians between January 1987 and March 1987. Plaintiffs' evidence is that $ 946,260 represents payments by Ocean State to "Non-Participating Physicians 1/87 - 3/87 $ 946,260." The jury simply rounded to the next nearest thousand the $ 946,260 payment to non-participating physicians to arrive at the $ 947,000 and erroneously awarded it to Ocean State.

The payment Ocean State made to [32] non-participating physicians between January and March 1987, was not a loss to Ocean State. This much the Plaintiffs must concede because they themselves claim this loss for the class of physicians. This money would have been returned to participating physicians. Ocean State budgeted the $ 946,260 to the Speciality Incentive Pools (SIPS's). Ocean State was required to pay the $ 946,260 to either the physicians in the SIPS pools if the Speciality Incentive Pools' costs were less than the amount budgeted or if the Speciality Incentive Pools' costs exceeded Ocean State's estimates, then the $ 946,260 would have been used to reduce the Speciality Incentive Pools' excess costs. Either way, Ocean State itself could not have lost money because of payments to physicians who were not Ocean State participating physicians. The losses due to Ocean State's payments to non-participating physicians was suffered by Ocean State participating physicians. They would have received the $ 946,260, if Ocean State had not had to pay that amount to non-participating physicians.

The Defendant also contends that the compensatory damages award to the certified class of physicians is based on another Plaintiffs' [33] Exhibit, Plaintiffs' Exhibit 563. Exhibit 563 was an in house Blue Cross & Blue Shield document dated June 30, 1987 and entitled projected prudent buyer savings. Blue Cross & Blue Shield estimated that the prudent buyer policy would save a net amount of $ 1,746,437.17 over an eight month period. It appears that the jury rounded the $ 1,746,437.17 by omitting the 17 cents and based its awarded to the class of physicians on the amount of money Blue Cross & Blue Shield intended to save with the prudent buyer policy.

Exhibit 563 is Plaintiffs' evidence of the amount of money Blue Cross & Blue Shield expected to save due to the prudent buyer policy. It, however, does not indicate the damages the certified class of physicians incurred as a result of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's interference with their contractual relationships. The class was composed of physicians who were under contract to Ocean State and were also reimbursed by Blue Cross & Blue Shield. The withheld payments were payments Blue Cross & Blue Shield did not make to Blue Cross & [*64] Blue Shield physicians. Ocean State contracted physicians therefore had no right to receive the withheld payments, except if they also participated [34] in Blue Cross & Blue Shield and their payments had been reduced by Blue Cross & Blue Shield. Since Blue Cross & Blue Shield had many more participating physicians than Ocean State, there is no basis to conclude, as the jury did, that the withheld payments belonged to Ocean State physicians who were reimbursed by Blue Cross & Blue Shield. It is inappropriate to conclude that the certified class of physicians must have incurred losses equal to Blue Cross & Blue Shield's prudent buyer savings.

DISCUSSION

Standard of Review

HN1[] In actions which blend claims for both legal relief in terms of monetary damages and equitable relief by way of injunction, a jury shall first determine the issue of damages. Beacon Theatres, Inc. v. Westover, 359 U.S. 500, 3 L. Ed. 2d 988, 79 S. Ct. 948 (1959); Dairy Queen, Inc. v. Wood, 369 U.S. 469, 479, 8 L. Ed. 2d 44, 82 S. Ct. 894 (1962); Wallace Motor Sales v. American Motor Sales Corp., 780 F.2d 1049, 1066 (1st Cir. 1985). The effect of a jury's determination as in this instance is significant. Here the jury returned a verdict that the Defendant Blue Cross & Blue Shield was guilty of violating Section 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 2). The jury declined, after three attempts, to assess monetary damages. Generally [35] speaking, it has been held that since the legal issues are to be heard first in an action under Section 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 2), findings by the jury in the damages action, also involved in the application for equitable relief, are binding upon the trial court in its later consideration of the facts involved in equitable relief applications. Florists' Nationwide Tel. Del. Net. v. Florists' Tel. Del. Assn, 371 F.2d 263, 271 (7th Cir.) cert. denied, 387 U.S. 909, 18 L. Ed. 2d 627, 87 S. Ct. 1686 (1967); Calnetics Corp. v. Volkswagen of America, Inc., 532 F.2d 674, 690 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 940, 50 L. Ed. 2d 309, 97 S. Ct. 355 (1976).

Indeed, the parties in this action, although in disagreement on almost every issue, seem to be in agreement on this aspect, to the effect that this Court is bound by the jury's determination of the factual issues. Thus, Plaintiffs are able to assert that the jury has concluded that Defendant's business practices of the prudent buyer policy, selective marketing of Healthmate, and its adverse selection policy were anti-competitive and illicit activity contrary to the purpose of the Sherman Act to provide competition, and, that these determinations bind this Court. Of course, Blue Cross & [36] Blue Shield argues that since no damages were awarded, Plaintiffs have failed to prove injury, and therefore, the Sherman Act counts fail. However, before the Court determines to what extent it is bound by the findings of the jury, it will first determine if the jury verdict is supported by the evidence at all.

HN2[] The standard of review in setting aside a jury verdict is narrow. In determining the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the Court must evaluate the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs. Rios v. Empresas Lineas Maritimas Argentinas, 575 F.2d 986, 989 (1st Cir. 1978). But the plaintiffs are not entitled to unreasonable inferences based on speculation and conjecture. See Carlson v. American Safety Equip. Corp., 528 F.2d 384 (1st Cir. 1976); Schneider v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 401 F.2d 549, 555 (8th Cir. 1968). A motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict should be granted ". . . when as a matter of law, no conclusion but one can be drawn." CVD, Inc. v. Raytheon Co., 769 F.2d 842, 849 (1st Cir. 1985) (citing United States v. Articles of Drug Consisting of the Following, 745 F.2d 105, 113 (1st Cir. 1984), cert. denied sub nom., [37] 470 U.S. 1004, 84 L. Ed. 2d 379, 105 S. Ct. 1358 (1985)), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1016, 89 L. Ed. 2d 312, 106 S. Ct. 1197 (1986). Therefore a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict should be denied if after reviewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs and drawing [*65] all reasonable inferences in their favor, there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict. Engine Specialties, Inc. v. Bombardier Ltd., 605 F.2d 1, 9 (1st Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 446 U.S. 983, 64 L. Ed. 2d 839, 100 S. Ct. 2964 (1980); CVD, Inc., 769 F.2d at 849. A jury verdict supported by the evidence may not be set aside simply because the judge would have reached a different result. See Coffran v. Hitchcock Clinic, Inc., 683 F.2d 5, 6 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1087, 74 L. Ed. 2d 933, 103 S. Ct. 571 (1982).

HN3[] The standard of review for granting a new trial is not as stringent as for granting a judgment notwithstanding the verdict. But the trial judge may not set aside a verdict simply because he or she would have reached a different verdict. Borras v. Sea-Land Serv., Inc., 586 F.2d 881, 887 (1st Cir. 1978). In granting a motion for a new trial the judge must find that "the verdict is against the clear weight of the evidence, or is based upon evidence which is false, or will result in [38] a clear miscarriage of justice." Milone v. Moceri Family, Inc., 847 F.2d 35 (1st Cir. 1988); see CVD, Inc., 769 F.2d at 848 (citing Coffran 683 F.2d at 6).

The Court will first determine whether there is sufficient evidence to support the jury verdict on the antitrust claims and the claims for the interference with contractual relationships. Then the Court will address the applications for injunctive and declaratory relief.

ANTITRUST CLAIMS

With respect to the Defendant's motion for judgment n.o.v. on the antitrust claims, it asserts two legal theories. First, the Defendant contended that the jury's findings of "no damages" for the antitrust claims indicated that no injury resulted to Plaintiffs' business or property as a result of antitrust violations. Thus, it contends no liability arose for a private damage action under the Clayton Act, Section 4. 15 U.S.C. § 15 (Supp. 1988). Noting that the Plaintiffs suffered no injuries as a result of the Defendant's conduct, Defendant concludes that Plaintiffs failed to prove all elements of an antitrust violation requested the Court to enter judgment in its favor on the Sherman Act Section 2 claims.

Defendant's [39] argument warrants some attention as a ground for granting Defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the antitrust claims. Plaintiffs filed this action seeking treble damages under Section Fifteen of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15. (Supp. 1988). It is a remedial provision of the Sherman Act. See Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 485, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977). It frequently has been called the private attorney general provision of the antitrust laws because a private Plaintiff rather than the government may maintain an action for an alleged antitrust violation. See, e.g., Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., 405 U.S. 251, 262, 31 L. Ed. 2d 184, 92 S. Ct. 885 (1972); Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 131, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129, 89 S. Ct. 1562 (1969); United States v. Borden Co., 347 U.S. 514, 518, 98 L. Ed. 903, 74 S. Ct. 703 (1954). HN4[] Section Fifteen of the Sherman Act, more commonly known as Section Four of the Clayton Act, provides that a Plaintiff can recover threefold the damages he sustains and the cost of the suit, including attorney's fees if the Plaintiff shows an injury in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws. See 15 U.S.C. § 15 (Supp. 1988). So for Plaintiffs [40] to prevail on their antitrust claims, they must prove ". . . a violation [of the antitrust laws] and additionally show to a reasonable degree of certainty that there has been injury to them by reason of the violation." See International Travel Arrangers, Inc. v. Western Air Lines, Inc., 623 F.2d 1255, 1270 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1063, 66 L. Ed. 2d 605, 101 S. Ct. 787 (1980). To establish an antitrust violation, Plaintiffs must show that Blue Cross & Blue Shield engaged in monopolization acts in violation of Section Two of the Sherman Act. HN5[] Section Two of the Sherman Act defines the criminal violation of monopolization and its penalties. 15 U.S.C. § 2 (Supp. 1988). But the mere existence of a violation [*66] cannot support a private action under Section Four of the Clayton Act. See Gray v. Shell Oil Co., 469 F.2d 742, 749 (9th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 412 U.S. 943, 37 L. Ed. 2d 403, 93 S. Ct. 2773 (1973). Plaintiffs must show that they suffered an injury to business or property as a result of the antitrust violation. See Hawaii, 405 U.S. at 262. What constitutes an injury to business or property is less than clear. The words "business or property" refer to commercial interest. See id. at 264. However, injury to business [41] or property is defined in terms of a tautology. Since Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides a money damages remedy, it must be an injury which the jury is able to quantify in dollars. It is the kind of injury that the antitrust laws were designed to prevent, namely damage as a result of anticompetitive conduct. See Brunswick Corp., 429 U.S. at 489. HN6[] Plaintiffs do not have to prove that the antitrust violation was the sole cause of the injury. See Zenith Radio Corp., 395 U.S. 100, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129, 89 S. Ct. 1562. But the Plaintiffs must show a causal relationship between the injury and the violation. See id. at 114 n.9. Furthermore, the Plaintiffs must prove some indication of the amount of damages. See, e.g., Construction Aggregate Transport, Inc. v. Fla. Rock Indus., 710 F.2d 752, 782 (11th Cir. 1983); Larry R. George Sales Co. v. Cool Attic Corp., 587 F.2d 266, 270 (5th Cir. 1979); Terrell v. Household Goods Carriers' Bureau, 494 F.2d 16, 20 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 987, 42 L. Ed. 2d 260, 95 S. Ct. 246 (1974). Thus, "to be 'liable ' under the antitrust laws . . . means that one has to violate the antitrust laws and that violation has resulted in an injury to the business or property of the plaintiff, [42] i.e., there was fact of damage." Response of Carolina, Inc. v. Leasco Response, Inc., 537 F.2d 1307, 1320 (5th Cir. 1976).

The jury's award of no damages on the antitrust claims indicates that they found that the Plaintiffs were not damaged by an antitrust violation. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia confronted a similar situation. See Association of Western Rys. v. Riss & Co., 112 U.S. App. D.C. 49, 299 F.2d 133, 134-35 (D.C., 1962) cert. denied, 370 U.S. 916, 8 L. Ed. 2d 498, 82 S. Ct. 1555 (1962). There the jury returned a verdict against the Defendant but did not award any damages. See id. The Court of Appeals concluded that the verdict plainly meant that the Defendants conspired but that the conspiracy did not damage the Plaintiff. See id. at 135. As a result, the court held that Plaintiff had not proved its claim because it failed to show damages. See id.

In this matter, the jury's determination of no damages means exactly that. The Court must conclude that Plaintiffs failed to sustain their burden of showing damages to their business or property as a result of an antitrust violation. With this conclusion in mind, the result is preordained. Thus, Plaintiffs have not proved their treble damage [43] antitrust claims and the Defendant is entitled to a judgment notwithstanding the verdict on those claims.

Defendant's second theory is that it is entitled to entry of judgment in its favor as a matter of law on the remaining antitrust claims. Blue Cross argues that there was insufficient evidence to establish antitrust violations because of the prudent buyer policy, selective marketing of HealthMate, and adverse selection policies. Therefore, the Defendant reasons that the Court is required to enter judgment in its favor as a matter of law. A more in depth analysis of prudent buyer, adverse selection, and the selective marketing of HealthMate is needed before conclusions may be drawn on whether they separately or collectively violate antitrust laws.

First, Blue Cross contends that the McCarron-Ferguson Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1011-1015, exempted adverse selection and the selective marketing of HealthMate from the antitrust laws. The Defendant claims that adverse selection and HealthMate constituted the business of insurance regulated by state law; therefore, those programs were exempt under the Sherman Act. On the other hand, Plaintiffs claim health service corporations are not in the business [44] of insurance so they are not eligible for the McCarron-Ferguson exemption [*67] to the antitrust laws. There is substantial support for the Plaintiffs' contention. See Group Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Royal Drug, 440 U.S. 205, 59 L. Ed. 2d 261, 99 S. Ct. 1067 (1979). There is respectable authority to the contrary. See Health Care Equalization Comm. v. Iowa Medical Soc'y, 851 F.2d 1020, 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 13192, No. 87-1015 (8th Cir. June 24, 1988). However, as it is made clear hereafter there is no need to presently resolve this conflict.

The question is whether or not the prudent buyer policy, adverse selection and the selective marketing of HealthMate violate antitrust laws. HN7[] Plaintiffs must prove the following elements by a preponderance of the evidence:

> First, the Defendant had monopoly power in a relevant market;
>
> Second, that the Defendant willfully acquired or maintained that power through restrictive or exclusionary conduct;
>
> Third, that Defendant's activities occurred in or affected interstate commerce; and
>
> Fourth, that Plaintiff was injured in its business or property because of Defendant's restrictive or exclusionary conduct.

See, e.g., United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966); Forro Precision, Inc. v. [45] Intern. Business Mach. Corp., 673 F.2d 1045, 1058 (9th Cir. 1982); Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 272-76 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1093, 62 L. Ed. 2d 783, 100 S. Ct. 1061 (1980).

HN8[] The terms "monopoly power" and "market power" are generally used interchangeably. P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law, § 529 at 388 (1978). "Monopoly power" is the power to control prices or exclude competition in a relevant market. United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391, 100 L. Ed. 1264, 76 S. Ct. 994 (1956). The relevant market is the "area of effective competition" where the defendant operates. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 337 U.S. 293, 299 n.5, 93 L. Ed. 1371, 69 S. Ct. 1051 (1949). Relevant market is identified by the product and its interchangeability plus the geographic area. See Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 336-37, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962); United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 399, 100 L. Ed. 1264, 76 S. Ct. 994 (1956). Usually the trier of fact defines the relevant market. See International Boxing Club, Inc. v. United States, 358 U.S. 242, 245, 3 L. Ed. 2d 270, 79 S. Ct. (1959).

Blue Cross contended that as between the class of physicians and Blue Cross they are not in the same relevant market. Physicians were not sellers of [46] health insurance and therefore in reality are not head to head competitors of Blue Cross. Without a relevant market existing between Blue Cross and the class of physicians, Blue Cross claimed it could not engage in anticompetitive acts which could harm the class. The only effect if at all on the class due to Blue Cross's actions, it contends is indirect. In addition, Blue Cross hypothesized that even if it possessed 100% share of the health care financing market, the physician class would not have any antitrust claim because it derives only a small portion of its income from Blue Cross insureds. Noting that physicians are paid from many sources including Medicare, Medicaid, commercial insurance carries, self-insured employers, and patients directly, Blue Cross claims that there was no evidence that Blue Cross represented any more than 30% of the dollar purchase of physician services. Thus, it contends, it could not possess monopoly power and could not have engaged in anticompetitive conduct.

Defendants are confusing relevant market with standing to sue. HN9[] It is not a requirement to an antitrust suit that plaintiff and defendant be in the same relevant market. See Blue Shield of Va. [47] v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 478-81, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149, 102 S. Ct. 2540 (1982). Plaintiff, however, must meet the standing requirement that it allege that it suffered an injury to its business or property as a result of the Defendant's conduct. See 15 U.S.C. § 15 (1982). The First Circuit requires that the person injured by the alleged antitrust violation [*68] be within a target area, which draws a line and excludes persons whose injuries are too remote. See Engine Specialties, Inc. v. Bombardier Ltd., 605 F.2d 1, 17-19 (1st Cir. 1979).

The class of physicians have asserted an injury to their business or property as a result of the alleged antitrust violation, i.e. the loss of reimbursement from the SIP's pool because of payments to non-participating physicians. Their alleged injury is within the target area. Thus, the class of physicians have standing to sue even though they may not be participants in the same relevant market as Blue Cross & Blue Shield.

Blue Cross & Blue Shield acquired its market share before Ocean State's creation. The undisputed evidence is that Blue Cross & Blue Shield was for years essentially the sole private health care cost insurer in the State of Rhode Island. Not only did Blue Cross [48] & Blue Shield have a better "mousetrap," it had the only "mousetrap" in town. As time went on, the industry changed with the development of health maintenance organizations. Rhode Island Group Health Association (RIGHA) appeared in 1971. Its physicians were employed by RIGHA and a subscriber was required to select a RIGHA physician. This plan had some disadvantage from the point of view of the subscriber, who heretofore, had been accustomed to free selection of his or her own physician. Ocean State was a natural progression of the Health Maintenance format. It entered into contracts with almost half the physicians in the State of Rhode Island, providing patients with a wider choice of their respective physicians. It is obvious that a natural tension would develop between Blue Cross & Blue Shield and Ocean State and that physicians would seek the continuance of both plans in order that they could contract with both plans. It is not without significance that it was not Blue Cross & Blue Shield customers who have complained. The Plaintiffs are Ocean State and some physicians. The market involved is a market which provides means to finance health care. There is no proof that competition [49] for physician services has been affected, or that any payment to which a physician is entitled has been lost. The claim is that purchasers of health insurance have been corralled by Blue Cross & Blue Shield to the competitive disadvantage of its competitors. The genesis of this complaint is the response of Blue Cross & Blue Shield to market conditions and the circumstances extant in the spring, summer and fall of 1986.

Both Blue Cross & Blue Shield and Ocean State were facing difficult financial conditions in the spring of 1986. They were both losing money. The largest single contract involving the employees of the State of Rhode Island was due for competitive bids at the end of June 1986. At that time Ocean State had not been able to return the 20% it had retained from its contracted physicians for the calendar year 1985. Thus, Ocean State physicians, who had also contracted with Blue Cross, charged 20% less to Ocean State than the same physicians had charged Blue Cross for precisely the same services. In this mix, Blue Cross & Blue Shield created its Healthmate plan, originally called "Z Plan", "MAPS PLUS", and "PLAN 100 PLUS". Blue Cross & Blue Shield's market share permitted it [50] to develop both the prudent buyer policy, adverse selection, and HealthMate.

"The connection between market share and market power if far from clear." See P. Areeda, supra at 328. Size alone does not violate the Sherman Act. United States v. United States Steel Corp., 251 U.S. 417, 64 L. Ed. 343, 40 S. Ct. 293 (1920). HN10[] Courts, however, must consider the market share of the alleged monopolist as an important factor in determining the existence of monopoly power. See, e.g., United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384

U.S. 563, 570-71, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966); American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 797, 90 L. Ed. 1575, 66 S. Ct. 1125 (1946); United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F.2d 416, 424 (2d Cir. 1945). In unregulated industries, courts measure market power by defining the relevant product and geographic [*69] market and compute the defendant's market share. See Southern Pacific Communications v. American Tel. & Tel., 238 U.S. App. D.C. 309, 740 F.2d 980, 1000 (D.C. Cir. 1984), (citing (United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391, 100 L. Ed. 1264, 76 S. Ct. 994 (1956)), cert. denied 470 U.S. 1005, 84 L. Ed. 2d 382, 105 S. Ct. 1361 (1985). In a regulated industry, such as health care insurance, a heavy reliance on market share statistics probably would be an inaccurate or misleading [51] indication of monopoly power. See Southern Pacific Communications, 740 F.2d at 1000; MCI Communications Corp. v. American Tel. and Tel. Co., 708 F.2d 1081, 1107 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 891, 78 L. Ed. 2d 226, 104 S. Ct. 234 (1983). Thus, the size of a regulated company's market share should be a point of departure in determining the existence of monopoly power. Id. at 1107. Other factors such as size of competitors, degree of barriers to entry, pricing trends and practices and technological superiority may be considered in determining market power. See, e.g., United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 96 F.T.C. 650, 762 (1980); International Distrib. Centers, Inc. v. Walsh Trucking Co., Inc., 812 F.2d 786 (2d Cir. 1987); Fishman v. Estate of Wirtz, 807 F.2d 520, 532-39 (7th Cir. 1986). A monopoly power analysis must focus directly on the defendant's ability to control prices or exclude competition. MCI Communications Corp., 708 F.2d at 1107. It is essential to also keep in mind the fact that the antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition, not competitors. See Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977) (citing Brown [52] Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962)).

The evidence established that Blue Cross provides in Rhode Island private nongovernment health care financing for a major market share. It is not contended that because of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's dominant market position, it has charged its customers, the persons insured by Blue Cross & Blue Shield more than they should have been charged. There is no suggestion that Blue Cross & Blue Shield has not obtained the best economic benefit for its subscribers. Indeed, the complaint is at bottom that because of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's market power, it has been able to get a better deal for medical services than Ocean State and that because of its market power, physicians have the awful choice of yielding to its fee schedule or losing their patients who are Blue Cross & Blue Shield subscribers. At the same time the evidence is clear that Blue Cross & Blue Shield face intense competition from Ocean State and RIGHA. Also, insurance companies with national bases are becoming more involved in the Rhode Island market. Large employers have become self insurers. Thus, although Blue Cross & Blue Shield has market power, it is not without [53] limit. There is a competitive market. The argument goes that since so many persons are enrolled in Blue Cross & Blue Shield in the State of Rhode Island what it does must be considered in the context of its market power. So much is true. The question is did it use its obvious market power in an anti-competitive manner? See, e.g., Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467, 105 S. Ct. 2847 (1985); United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966); Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143, 96 L. Ed. 162, 72 S. Ct. 181 (1951); see also United States v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 110 F. Supp. 295 (D.Mass. 1953), aff'd, 347 U.S. 521, 98 L. Ed. 910, 74 S. Ct. 699 (1954).

What is anti-competitive activity is not a matter that has been clearly defined. There are some significant signposts along the way, but the route is not so clearly marked that departures are unavoidable. It is blandly stated that HN11[] "the use of monopoly power, however, lawfully acquired, to foreclose competition, to gain a competitive advantage, or to destroy a competitor, is unlawful under the Sherman Act." 54 Am.Jur.2d § 42, at 692 (citing Home Placement Service, Inc. v. Providence Journal Co., 682 F.2d 274 (1st Cir. 1982), cert. denied, [54] 460 U.S. 1028, 75 L. Ed. 2d 500, 103 S. Ct. 1279 [*70] (1983)). But what is the anticompetitive behavior which must be condemned? Theorists have not done much to illuminate the essential elements. Thus, Areeda talks in terms of exclusionary conduct not competitive on the merits and not more restraint than reasonably necessary to maintain competition. P. Areeda, supra, para. 655(b) n. at 72-73. Courts have adopted Areeda's definition of HN12[] exclusionary conduct which includes "behavior that not only (1) tends to impair the opportunities of rivals, but also (2) either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way." See, e.g., Aspen Skiing Co., 472 U.S. at 605 (citing 3 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law para. 626b at 78 (1978)); Barry Wright Corp. v. ITT Grinnell Corp., 724 F.2d 227, 230 (1st Cir. 1983) (citing 3 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law para. 626 at 83 (1978)); [Instructional Sys. Dev. Corp. v. Aetna Cas. and Sur. Co., 817 F.2d 639, 649 (10th Cir. 1987)] (citing 3 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law para. 625b (1978)).

It is crucial to differentiate "between practices which tend to exclude or restrict competition . . . [from practices [55] that result from] the success of a superior product, a well-run business, or luck, on the other [hand].", the very essence of competition. Aspen Skiing Co., 472 U. S. at 604. Examples of the effect of competition on the merits are non-exploitative pricing, hioher output, improved product quality, energetic market penetration, successful research and development, and cost-reducing innovations. See Aspen Skiing Co., 472 U.S. 585, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467, 105 S. Ct. 2847; United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F.2d 416 (2d Cir. 1945). Blue Cross & Blue Shield has historically been very successful. On the other hand, Ocean State's penetration of the market has been phenomenal. With these general principles in mind, the specific aspects of Blue Cross & Blue Shield's adverse selection, HealthMate, and prudent buyer policies must be examined.

Adverse selection is criticized because it is claimed that the number of subscribers who it was estimated would leave Blue Cross was too high. The obvious import of this circumstance would be to increase the cost of Blue Cross & Blue Shield. It is a curious argument indeed by a competitor that Blue Cross & Blue Shield was charging too much for its product. Competitors could [56] hardly be injured by an increase in price. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 583, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986). What is more significant is that no one disputes that adverse selection was a fact. Healthier persons would tend to enroll in an HMO. If they did so, then without doubt Blue Cross & Blue Shield would be left with more expensive subscribers. The dispute posited by Plaintiffs is that fewer subscribers would leave Blue Cross & Blue Shield than Blue Cross & Blue Shield estimated. This is hardly the basis of an antitrust claim. Certainly, business people have some area of reasonable and responsible legitimate judgment. This is such an instance.

HealthMate is the result of research and development which concluded that HMO's will have a major role in health care financing in the future. Although HealthMate is not an HMO, it was Blue Cross's attempt to provide a health care financing plan comparable to an HMO until Blue Cross could establish an HMO program. Antitrust laws support the introduction of new products, such as HealthMate, because it encourages competition. See Berkey Photo, Inc., 603 F.2d at 263. If Blue Cross & Blue Shield were foreclosed by the Sherman [57] Act from competing in an HMO format, the Plaintiff Ocean State would then have the major HMO market share in Rhode Island. This use of the Sherman Act would produce obvious anticompetitive effects.

The selective marketing of HealthMate does not negate the policy reason for encouraging HealthMate. Offering HealthMate as an option to subscribers who are eligible for Ocean State, is head to head competition between Ocean State and Blue Cross and that competition benefits consumers by providing them with alternative health care financing options. It is only because of Ocean State's decision not to [*71] compete that the product is not offered elsewhere. Ocean State seeks, therefore, to benefit from its lack of competitive effort in areas where for reasons to its advantage it decides not to compete.

With respect to the prudent buyer program, Plaintiffs asserted that there was sufficient evidence to show that the prudent buyer program was exclusionary. They contended that the prudent buyer had the purpose and effect of maintaining the Defendant's monopoly power and was not a legitimate money saving policy. Noting the testimony of Ronald Battista, Senior Vice President of Professional Relations [58] at Blue Cross & Blue Shield, that prudent buyer was not designed to produce savings for Blue Cross, Ocean State concluded that prudent buyer had an anticompetitive purpose. Relying on Blair Suellentrop's, Chief Executive Officer of Ocean State, testimony regarding the decline in Ocean State's enrollment and resignation of participating physicians, Ocean State concluded that the prudent buyer policy was instituted to harm Ocean State. Indeed, it was Ocean State who claimed that the testimony of Ronald Battista, Blair Suellentrop, and Douglas McIntosh, Chief Executive Officer of Blue Cross & Blue Shield, established sufficient evidence to show that the prudent buyer program was anticompetitive.

On the contrary, Mr. Battista's and Mr. McIntosh's testimony indicated that prudent buyer was instituted to assure that Blue Cross's payments to physicians were not more than Ocean State's payments to physicians. There was no evidence that securing comparable fees for physician services resulted in any anticompetitive effect or impaired Ocean State's competitive opportunities. That the policy had the effect of harming Ocean State was inevitable, but was from the point of view of the consumer [59] clearly understandable. The harm that came Ocean State's way was the resignation of some of its physicians, and claimed increased costs. This harm has to do with the market for physicians' services and the election by physicians of a course which they considered most beneficial to their financial point of view. As a naked proposition, it would seem silly to argue that a policy to pay the same amount for the same services is anticompetitive, even on the part of one who has market power. This, it would seem, is what competition should be all about.

Relying on Kartell v. Blue Shield of Mass., Defendant claimed that prudent buyer was a legitimate defense under a "most favored nations clause" which was designed to protect Blue Cross from paying more for the same services than competitors. 749 F.2d 922 (1st Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1029, 85 L. Ed. 2d 322, 105 S. Ct. 2040 (1985). Blue Cross analogized the prudent buyer policy of this case with the no balance billing policy in Kartell. See id. In Kartell, the First Circuit held that Blue Cross was a purchaser of health services and as such had the right to require participating physicians not to balance bill patients who are Blue Cross subscribers. [60] Id. Blue Cross argued that as a purchaser of health services it has a lawful right to bargain with its suppliers, the physicians, for the best possible price terms. Blue Cross is a purchaser of health services. The more Blue Cross's activities resemble a purchaser the less likely that they are unlawful. See id. at 925. As a legitimate buyer, Blue Cross is entitled to use its market power to get the best price for the services it purchases. See id. at 929. Therefore, the prudent buyer policy is clearly not anticompetitive and does not violate the antitrust laws.

Indeed, if Plaintiffs are correct in their contention that the prudent buyer policy is anticompetitive, it is impossible not to come to the same conclusion regarding Ocean State's SIPS plan. There is no principle of antitrust law which would deny a business practice to any entity with market power and permit that practice on the part of the competitor who does not have market power. To hold prudent buyer anticompetitive would have given and would give Ocean State an unfair competitive advantage in the market, a result which is antithetical to the purpose of the Sherman Act and economically detrimental to health care [61] consumers.

[*72] The Defendant's motion for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict is granted on the antitrust claims. The adverse selection programs, prudent buyer program, and the selective marketing of HealthMate are not anticompetitive and do not violate the antitrust laws. There can be no conclusion other than that these programs benefit consumers and represent legitimate responses to competitive conditions.

ADDITUR

The physicians' class seeks a $ 1.9 million dollar additur on the antitrust claim. Relying on the testimony of Thomas Aman and Ronald Battista, Defendant's witnesses, who both testified that Blue Cross retained at least $ 1,900,000 from Ocean State participating physicians, Plaintiffs concluded that there was no valid dispute concerning the Blue Cross withhold. Therefore, the $ 1,900,000 that Blue Cross withheld may be considered as the damage for the antitrust violation. In light of the jury's verdict and the Court's determination of the Defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the antitrust claim, Plaintiffs' motion for additur must be denied.

INTERFERENCE WITH CONTRACTUAL RELATIONSHIPS

Next, it is necessary to determine whether the prudent buyer, [62] adverse selection, or the selective marketing of HealthMate interfere with the contractual relationships between Ocean State and its participating physicians. Plaintiffs claimed that Ocean State and the class of physicians incurred damages under their contracts due to the Defendant's actions. Ocean State argued that its advertising budget had to be increased beyond what it expected to spend and above the average advertising expenditures for HMO of its size. Ocean State claimed it incurred additional advertising expenses of $ 335,000 due to Blue Cross & Blue Shield's actions and the subsequent negative publicity. In addition, Ocean State claimed that it lost profits of $ 173,013 because prospective members did not enroll due to the Defendant's actions. Ocean State, also, contended that it incurred unbudgeted expenses of up to $ 1,053,740 to retain physicians in certain specialties. The jury did not award any of these claimed damages to Ocean State.

The class of physicians claimed that the money Blue Cross & Blue Shield withheld caused the class to suffer damages. In addition, plaintiffs contended that the class of physicians lost $ 946,760, which represented the additional moneys Ocean [63] State paid to non-participating specialists. These damages were erroneously awarded to Ocean State.

Defendant claimed that it did not interfere with Ocean State's contractual relationships with the class of physicians. It asserted that there was no evidence that any act by Blue Cross & Blue Shield made more difficult the performance of the Ocean State contracts or lessened their value. Blue Cross & Blue Shield, also, contended that the class' contracts were not terminated, breached, or altered in any sense.

The Defendant argued that the jury awards on the interference with contractual relationships were not based on evidence. Furthermore, Defendant claimed that the $ 947,000 the jury awarded Ocean State represented lost payments to the physicians' class and that Ocean State never claimed that amount as its damages. Therefore, the Defendant contended that the evidence does not support an award of $ 947,000 to Ocean State.

Blue Cross & Blue Shield argued that the $ 1,746,437 awarded to the class of physicians represented Blue Cross & Blue Shield's estimated savings through the prudent buyer plan for an eight month period. It did not represent the damages to the class of physicians. [64] The Defendant's contentions have substantial basis. Although the class claims that the $ 1,746,437 equals its damages the class ignores the fact that many physicians who are not in the class were among those from whom full payment [*73] was withheld. The Defendant further contends that there was no evidence from which a reasonable jury could award any damages.

The Rhode Island Supreme Court defined the basic elements of a claim for tortious interference with contractual relationships in Smith Dev. Corp. v. Bilow Enter. Inc., 112 R.I. 203, 211, 308 A.2d 477, 482 (1973). Later cases have adopted these elements for a claim of tortious interference with prospective contractual relationships. See, e.g., Roy v. Woonsocket Inst. for Sav., 525 A.2d 915, 919 (R.I. 1987); Mesolella v. City of Prov., 508 A.2d 661, 670 (R.I. 1986); Federal Auto Body Works, Inc. v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 447 A.2d 377, 380-81 (R.I. 1982). HN13[] Plaintiff must prove by the preponderance of the evidence that a contract existed, that the alleged wrongdoer knew of the contract, that the wrongdoer's interference was intentional, and that damages resulted from it. Smith Dev. Corp., 112 R.I. at 211, 308 A.2d [65] at 482. The Plaintiff must show that the Defendant intended to do harm without justification. Mesolella, 508 A.2d at 670. The Defendant has the burden of proving sufficient justification for an interference. Smith Dev. Corp., 112 R.I. at 211, 308 A.2d at 482.

The Plaintiffs have met their burden of proving that contracts existed between Ocean State and Ocean State participating physicians and that Blue Cross knew of these contracts. The Plaintiffs, however, have failed to present any evidence that Blue Cross intentionally interfered with the contracts by implementation of the prudent buyer program, adverse selection, and the selective marketing of HealthMate. The only evidence was that some physicians perceived it to be their economic advantage to terminate their relationship with Ocean State in accord with the terms of their agreement with Ocean State because of the prudent buyer policy. Translating this circumstance into an intentional interference by Blue Cross & Blue Shield with a contractual relationship is quite clearly absurd. Blue Cross & Blue Shield announced what it was willing to pay. Some physicians, not willing to give Blue Cross & Blue Shield a discount, resigned [66] from Ocean State as permitted by their contract with Ocean State. There is no evidence of intentional interference with the contracts between the class of physicians and Ocean State. Further, prudent buyer, adverse selection, and the selective marketing of HealthMate were justified courses of action that Blue Cross undertook as appropriate competition so that its subscribers would not be further burdened. Absent these programs, Blue Cross would pay more to the same physicians for their services than Ocean State. Blue Cross & Blue Shield would be subject to additional expense because of healthier subscribers transferring to an HMO because Blue Cross subscribers would lack a program comparable to Ocean State's coverage. It is obvious that Blue Cross acted with justification and therefore, the prudent buyer policy, adverse selection, the selective marketing of HealthMate were without doubt, justified responses to competitive conditions. Defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the interference of contractual relationships must be and is granted.

Further, the jury verdict that Defendant was liable on the claim of tortious interference with contractual relationships was [67] against the clear weight of the evidence that Blue Cross justifiably instituted the prudent buyer policy, adverse selection, and the selective marketing of HealthMate. Also, the damages awarded by the jury were inappropriate. A new trial is required to prevent injustice. Giving full respect to the jury's determination, the Court is left with the firm conviction that a mistake has been committed in that damage amounts have been awarded to parties who are not entitled to them. Therefore, Defendant's motion for a new trial on the intentional interference with contractual relationships is also granted.

INJUNCTIVE RELIEF

Plaintiffs and Defendant seek injunctive relief. Plaintiffs move to enjoin Blue Cross from continuing the prudent buyer program [*74] or implementing a similar program and to restrain the marketing of HealthMate. The Defendant moves to enjoin the Plaintiff-Intervenors from engaging in the illegal practices alleged and to restrain the Physician and Surgeons Association of Rhode Island, Inc. from negotiating or attempting to negotiate collectively physician fees with Blue Cross.

Although Plaintiffs and Defendant seek equitable relief for different purposes, the burdens of proof [68] are the same for each moving party. Congress enacted Section 16 of the Clayton Act to permit private actions for equitable relief. 15 U.S.C. § 26 (Supp. 1988). HN14[] Section 16 of the Clayton Act, reads in part: "any person . . . [or] corporation. . . shall be entitled to sue for injunctive relief . . . against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws . . . under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 26. (Supp. 1988). Injunctive relief is available to private parties when the traditional equity principles are met and there is a demonstration of a threatened injury. See, e.g., Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., 405 U.S. 251, 260, 31 L. Ed. 2d 184, 92 S. Ct. 885 (1972); Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 130, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129, 89 S. Ct. 1562 (1969); CIA. Petrolera Caribe, Inc. v. ARCO Caribbean, Inc., 754 F.2d 404, 407-08 (1st Cir. 1985). The traditional elements that a moving party must show for injunctive relief are: 1) irreparable harm to the Plaintiff if the injunction is not granted, 2) inadequacy of a legal remedy, 3) that the public interest will not be adversely affected by granting the [69] injunction; 4) that the harm to Plaintiff outweighs any harm to the Defendant by granting the injunction. But in order to prevail, Plaintiff must "demonstrate a significant threat of injury from an impending violation of the antitrust laws." See id. at 130. Plaintiff need only show a threat on injury not an actual injury. See Zenith Radio Corp., 395 U.S. at 130; CIA. Petrolera Caribe, Inc., 754 F.2d at 407-08.

Plaintiffs have failed to show that adverse selection, the prudent buyer policy, or HealthMate have threatened loss or damage to their business or property because of violations of the antitrust laws for the reasons heretofore stated. Therefore, Plaintiffs' motion for a permanent injunction against prudent buyer policy and HealthMate is denied.

With respect to the Defendant's counterclaim for injunctive relief, it is premature. There is no evidence that the Plaintiff-Intervenors or their officers, directors, agents, or employees engaged in any illegal practice. Furthermore, there is no evidence that the Physicians and Surgeon Association of Rhode Island negotiated or attempted to negotiate collectively with Blue Cross concerning physicians' fees. Thus, Defendant's [70] motion for a permanent injunction against the Plaintiff-Intervenors is denied.

DECLARATORY RELIEF

Plaintiffs also seek a declaratory judgment against the alleged acts which violate the Sherman Act. Defendant seeks a declaratory judgment against the Plaintiff-Intervenors from collectively negotiating fees to be paid by Blue Cross. The nature of the parties' claims is equitable. In light of the Court's previous ruling on the equitable claims, the Court denies declaratory relief to Plaintiffs and Defendant.

CONCLUSION

Defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is granted on both the antitrust claims and the interference with contractual relationships claims. Defendant's motion for a new trial is granted on the claims of intentional interference with contractual relationships. Plaintiffs' motion for additur is denied because there is no antitrust violation. Plaintiffs' motion for a permanent injunction against the prudent buyer program and HealthMate is denied because Plaintiffs' failure to show a prospective injury. The Defendant's counterclaim [*75] against the Plaintiff-Intervenors is denied because it is premature.

New York Public Interest Research Group, Inc. v. Insurance Information Institute

Supreme Court of New York, New York County

August 3, 1988

No Number in Original

Reporter
140 Misc. 2d 920 *; 531 N.Y.S.2d 1002 ; 1988 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 499 ***

New York Public Interest Research Group, Inc., et al., Plaintiffs, v. Insurance Information Institute, Defendant

Core Terms

advertisements, commercial speech, Lawsuit, Crisis, misleading, consumers, pamphlets, advertising campaign, insurance industry, insurance company, deceptive, commercial transaction, false advertising, deceptive act, noncommercial, manufactured, plaintiffs', motivation, practices, conveys, damages, vaccine, awards, polio

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > General Overview

HN1[] Consumer Protection, Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices

N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 349(a) provides that deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any business, trade or commerce or in the furnishing of any service in this state are hereby declared unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive Labeling & Packaging > State Regulation

HN2[] Consumer Protection, False Advertising

N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 350 provides that false advertising in the conduct of any business, trade or commerce or in the furnishing of any service in this state is hereby declared unlawful. "False advertising" is defined as advertising, including labeling, which is misleading in a material respect. In determining whether any advertising is misleading, there shall be taken into account (among other things) not only representations made by statement, word, design, device, sound or any combination thereof, but also the extent to which the advertising fails to reveal facts material in the light of such representations with respect to the commodity to which the advertising relates under the conditions prescribed in said advertisement, or under such conditions as are customary or usual.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

Legal Ethics > Legal Services Marketing > Advertising

HN3[] Consumer Protection, False Advertising

N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 350-d confers a cause of action under section 350 upon individuals who are injured by false advertising.

Governments > Legislation > Interpretation

Governments > Legislation > Effect & Operation > Prospective Operation

Governments > Legislation > Types of Statutes

HN4[] Legislation, Interpretation

Remedial statutes require liberal construction and application, to spread their beneficial results as widely as possible.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Pretrial Judgments > Judgment on Pleadings

HN5[] Pretrial Judgments, Judgment on Pleadings

In considering a motion to dismiss based on pleadings alone, the court must presume that the allegations of the complaint are true.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > Counsel > Right to Counsel > General Overview

HN6[] Consumer Protection, Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices

N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 349(h) provides that in addition to the right of action granted to the attorney general pursuant to this section, any person who has been injured by reason of any violation of this section may bring an action in his own name to enjoin such unlawful act or practice, an action to recover his actual damages or fifty dollars, whichever is greater, or both such actions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

HN7[] Consumer Protection, False Advertising

N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 350-d(3) provides that any person who has been injured by reason of any violation of section 350 or section 350-a of this article may bring an action in his own name to enjoin such unlawful act or practice, an action to recover his actual damages or fifty dollars, whichever is greater, or both such actions.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN8[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

When legislation proscribes conduct against a class, a bona fide and nationally recognized organization may represent the class of persons who can claim to be aggrieved under that legislation.

Constitutional Law > ... > Freedom of Speech > Commercial Speech > Advertising

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Freedoms > Freedom of Speech > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Freedom of Speech > Commercial Speech > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Freedom of Speech > Commercial Speech > Misleading Speech

HN9[] Commercial Speech, Advertising

Commercial speech which is false or misleading can be regulated and restricted.

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Freedoms > Judicial & Legislative Restraints > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Freedoms > Freedom of Speech > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Freedom of Speech > Commercial Speech > General Overview

HN10[] Fundamental Freedoms, Judicial & Legislative Restraints

Where noncommercial speech is involved, its content may not be suppressed because the speaker is biased or her or his conclusions erroneous or inaccurate.

Constitutional Law > ... > Freedom of Speech > Commercial Speech > General Overview

HN11[] Freedom of Speech, Commercial Speech

If, within a commonsense reading, an advertisement is obviously intended to promote sales, it is commercial speech. If a public message or discussion is incorporated, it is still commercial speech. If, however, the advertisement is a direct comment on a public issue, unrelated to proposing any particular commercial transaction, it is protected.

Headnotes/Summary

Headnotes

[*1] Consumer Protection -- False Advertising -- Insurance Industry Media Campaign

1. General Business Law §§ 349 and 350, which prohibit deceptive practices in the conduct of any business and false advertising, are applicable to advertisements sponsored by an insurance industry communications organization which asserted that the quality of every American's life is threatened by large awards handed down in personal injury actions arising out of malpractice, negligence and products liability, since section 349 applies to "deceptive * * * practices in the conduct of any business" and by its own definition, defendant organization's "business" is to provide information about the insurance business; thus any action by defendant in disseminating deceptive information about the insurance industry would violate the statute. Moreover, inasmuch as there is no dispute that the communications in issue constitute "advertising" within the meaning of section 350, and given that the allegations of falsity contained in plaintiffs' complaint must be deemed to be true on defendant's motion to dismiss, a cause of action for false advertising has been pleaded pursuant to section 350.

Parties -- Standing -- [*2] Action to Restrain False Advertising -- New York Public Interest Research Group -- Plaintiffs in Personal Injury Actions

2. In an action for money damages and to restrain allegedly false advertising sponsored by an insurance industry communications organization which asserted that the quality of every American's life is threatened by large awards handed down in personal injury actions arising out of malpractice, negligence and products liability, plaintiffs, the New York Public Interest Research Group and individual plaintiffs in personal injury actions, have standing to sue under General Business Law §§ 349 and 350, since the Group qualifies as a bona fide organization dedicated to serving the interests of general public welfare, as it is a not-for-profit, tax-exempt organization with tens of thousands of members and sections 349 and 350 were enacted to protect the general public, which includes members of the Group, from deceptive acts or practices. Moreover, the individual plaintiffs arguably fall within the zone of interest to be protected by the statutes since, if their allegations are deemed true, they either have settled or will settle their cases for amounts less [3] than their actions would otherwise be worth or received or anticipate receiving jury verdicts below their cases' worth as a result of the effect of defendant's advertising on people who would comprise juries in civil actions.

Consumer Protection -- False Advertising -- Protected Speech -- Communication by Insurance Industry

3. Advertisements sponsored by an insurance industry communications organization which asserted that the quality of every American's life is threatened by large awards handed down in personal injury actions arising out of malpractice, negligence and products liability are not primarily commercial speech, and thus are subject to the full protection of the First Amendment, since they do not propose a commercial transaction in that they are generally not directed to potential buyers of the advertiser's product; the advertisements seek to influence the public, as potential voters, to encourage particular legislative action, and, as potential jurors, to award lower verdicts in personal injury cases, and seek to improve the image of the insurance industry. While the purposes of the advertisements clearly inure to the economic benefit of the insurance industry, [4] the primary purpose of the advertisements is not to propose commercial transactions between defendant organization or its constituent insurance companies and the viewers or readers of the advertisements, but to influence a variety of public debates. Accordingly, any regulation of the advertisements based on their alleged falsity is constitutionally impermissible.

Counsel: Debevoise & Plimpton for defendant.

Jacob D. Fuchsberg Law Firm for plaintiffs.

Judges: Kristin Booth Glen, J.

Opinion by: GLEN

Opinion

[*921] [1003] OPINION OF THE COURT

This case presents important questions concerning the scope of sections 349 and 350 of the General Business Law (prohibiting deceptive practices and false advertising), standing to sue for violation of those statutes, and the applicability of First Amendment protection to an insurance industry advertising campaign which purports to tie rising insurance costs to "the Lawsuit Crisis." These issues arise on a motion to dismiss the complaint brought by defendant Insurance Information Institute (I.I.I.) pursuant to CPLR 3211 (a) (7).

PARTIES AND BACKGROUND

Defendant describes itself as a "non-profit educational and [*922] communications organization dedicated to improving public [5] understanding of the property [1004] and casualty insurance business and to providing information * * * about issues of relevance to the insurance business. I.I.I. is supported by more than 300 insurance companies and has been in existence for over twenty-five years." Plaintiffs consist of New York Public Interest Research Group, Inc. (NYPIRG), and three individuals. As alleged in their amended complaint, NYPIRG "is a not-for-profit membership corporation * * * [whose members] include approximately 30,000 citizens in communities throughout New York State besides 150,000 student members * * *. NYPIRG, in furtherance of its broad concern for the public welfare, among other things, investigates and, as appropriate, addresses problems of common concern before the judicial, legislative and executive branches of our State Government. In particular, NYPIRG conducts research and makes recommendations concerning the interests of the public and of the members of NYPIRG in insurance-related issues and in the proposed changes in the civil justice system advocated by the insurance industry." The individual plaintiffs are all plaintiffs in other, personal injury, lawsuits. [1]

[*6] In their complaint, plaintiffs plead three causes of action relating to I.I.I.'s multimedia advertising campaign, which I.I.I. refers to as the "Lawsuit Crisis". The magazine and newspaper ads, and the television spots all assert that the quality of every American's life is threatened by the existence of a "Lawsuit Crisis"; that is, that huge numbers of people suing doctors, pharmaceutical companies, municipalities, etc., for personal injuries due to malpractice, negligence, etc., that these personal injury plaintiffs are receiving huge jury awards, that, because of these awards, which are paid, in the final analysis by insurance companies, the insurance companies must raise their premiums for liability insurance, or deny coverage. This "crisis," in turn, according to the ads, causes, among other things, obstetricians to cease delivering babies, pharmaceutical companies to discontinue manufacturing lifesaving [*923] drugs (e.g., polio vaccine), and municipalities to close down playgrounds, firehouses, afterschool programs, etc.

Plaintiffs allege that the statements made in defendant's advertisements distort the truth, and conceal material facts. Their three causes of action [7] plead that I.I.I.'s "Lawsuit Crisis" advertising campaign

(1) constitutes a deceptive act or practice within the meaning of section 349 of New York's General Business Law;

(2) constitutes false advertising within the meaning of General Business Law § 350; and,

(3) by knowingly violating these statutes, seeks to corrupt the legal system by prejudicing prospective jurors against injured victims, thus preventing injured plaintiffs from "obtaining impartial justice."

Plaintiffs specifically allege that they have been injured by defendant's "Lawsuit Crisis" advertising campaign because the ads "have deceived the public, including but not limited to members of NYPIRG * * * [and] have injured NYPIRG [1] by impeding, impairing and defeating NYPIRG's efforts [to educate and advise the public] by forcing NYPIRG to [expend] additional time and money to counteract defendant's deception; and [2] by damaging NYPIRG's recruitment of new members." With regard to the individual plaintiffs, the amended complaint alleges that defendant's advertisements "have deceived the jury pool, with the result that the eventual [juries in the individual

---

[1] Jeanne King, as administratrix of Anna Katz's estate, is involved in a medical malpractice action against the hospital in whose emergency room Anna Katz died; James Carroll, as guardian ad litem for his son, has commenced a negligence action against the drunk driver who allegedly caused Kevin's permanent, totally disabling injuries; and Denise Hostettler has brought an action charging medical malpractice and hospital negligence for the injuries sustained at birth by her son, who is blind, deaf, and totally helpless.

plaintiffs' respective personal injury actions] will compensate [8] [their injuries] inadequately or not at all." Plaintiffs seek injunctive relief and money damages for each statutory violation.

[1005] I.I.I. predicates its motion to dismiss [2] on three grounds: (1) the statutes do not apply to lobbying efforts such as defendant's; (2) plaintiffs lack standing under the statutes; and (3) the "Lawsuit Crisis" advertising campaign constitutes non-commercial, protected speech under the First Amendment.

THE STATUTES

Defendant relies upon Genesco Entertainment v Koch (593 F Supp 743, 752 [SD NY 1984]) for the proposition that sections 349 and 350 should be construed narrowly to apply only to [*924] "an ordinary or recurring consumer transaction." Defendant's reliance is misplaced. Genesco concerned a dispute over the renting of Shea Stadium by [9] Genesco for a country and western music concert. The District Court Judge found that the concert was a "'single shot transaction' * * * not of a recurring nature [and] without ramifications for the public at large". (Supra, at 752.) This is clearly distinguishable from the case at bar: I.I.I.'s advertisements were broadcast and published numerous times and were focused on the "public at large." Moreover, the Genesco court acknowledged that it was construing the statutes without any guidance from New York State courts. Not only is Genesco distinguishable on its facts, the statutes themselves clearly require a different result in this case.

HN1[] Section 349 (a) of the General Business Law provides: "Deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any business, trade or commerce or in the furnishing of any service in this state are hereby declared unlawful."

HN2[] Section 350 of the General Business Law provides: "False advertising in the conduct of any business, trade or commerce or in the furnishing of any service in this state is hereby declared unlawful." "False advertising" is defined as "[Advertising], including labeling, which is misleading in a material respect; and in determining [10] whether any advertising is misleading, there shall be taken into account (among other things) not only representations made by statement, word, design, device, sound or any combination thereof, but also the extent to which the advertising fails to reveal facts material in the light of such representations with respect to the commodity to which the advertising relates under the conditions prescribed in said advertisement, or under such conditions as are customary or usual." (General Business Law § 350 [a]; emphasis supplied.)

Until the enactment of section 350-d of the General Business Law, in 1984, only the New York State Attorney-General had the right to bring suit for the violation of section 350. HN3[] General Business Law § 350-d confers a cause of action under section 350 upon individuals who are injured by false advertising. In amending the act to provide private rights of action, the Legislature created new substantive rights by providing relief for conduct which was not unlawful under the common law or statute. (See, Freschi v Grand Coal Venture, SD NY, May 28, 1982 [No. 81 Cir 4331 (RSW)], slip opn, at 5 ["By eliminating the element of intent, enabling prospective enjoinment, [*925] [11] creating a private right of action for individual consumers and allowing the court to award treble damages in cases of willful violations, § 349 substantively redefines the meaning of consumer fraud actions, alters the proof required to make out a successful claim, and thereby creates liabilities, penalties and forfeitures that 'would not exist but for (the) statute'"]; Ludmer v Franklin Career Search Intl., NYLJ, Dec. 8, 1981, at 12, col 6 [Sup Ct, Kings County, Nov. 19, 1981]; Geismar v Abraham & Strauss, 109 Misc 2d 495, 498-499 [Dist Ct, Suffolk County 1981].)

I.I.I.'s main argument against the applicability of the General Business Law to the [1006] instant media campaign is that these statutes have never before been applied to a situation like the one presented here. While that may be true, that fact alone does not prevent article 22-A of the General Business Law from applying here. General rules of statutory construction and the particular legislative history [3] of these statutes support and indeed require an expansive reading which would clearly encompass the instant case.

[2] Plaintiffs filed their original complaint on June 18, 1986, which I.I.I. answered on August 7, 1986. Plaintiffs filed their amended complaint on September 16, 1986, to which I.I.I. responded by serving the instant motion.

[*12] Both General Business Law §§ 350 and 349 qualify as remedial statutes: they "[givee] a mode of remedy for a wrong where an injured person had none or an ineffective remedy under the prior system of law." (McKinney's Cons Laws of NY, Book 1, Statutes § 35; see also, McKinney's Cons Laws of NY, Book 1, Statutes §§ 321, 342.) HN4[] Remedial statutes such as these require liberal construction and application, "to spread their beneficial results as widely as possible". (McKinney's Cons Laws of NY, Book 1, Statutes § 54 [a].) In addition, the court must "consider the mischief sought to be remedied and should favor the construction which will suppress the evil and advance the remedy". *(Matter of Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v [926] State Tax Commn., 80 AD2d 675, 677 [3d Dept], affd 55 NY2d 758 [1981]; McKinney's Cons Laws of NY, Book 1, Statutes §§ 54, 95.)

The Legislature specifically chose to word these statutes broadly. "As stated by the Act's drafting committee, the Act was designed to include 'all economic activity' within the ambit of its statutory phrase 'business, trade or commerce or the furnishing of any service.'" (Note, New York [13] Creates a Private Right of Action to Combat Consumer Fraud; Caveat Venditor, 48 Brooklyn L Rev 509, 543 [1982].) Thus, the Act was envisioned "as a mechanism to protect the public from 'all' deceptive acts and practices." (Caveat Venditor, op. cit., at 544; see, Beslity v Manhattan Honda, 120 Misc 2d 848 [1st Dept 1983]; Governor's mem on approval of L 1970, ch 43, 1970 NY Legis Ann, at 472; mem of Attorney-General, 1970 NY Legis Ann, at 92.)

Section 349 applies to "[deceptive] acts or practices in the conduct of any business". (General Business Law § 349 [a]; emphasis added.) By its own definition, defendant's "business" is "to [provide] information * * * about * * * the insurance business." Any action by defendant in disseminating information about the insurance business that is deceptive would thus violate section 349. (See, Sulner v General Acc. Fire & Life Assur. Corp., 122 Misc 2d 597, 599-601 [Sup Ct, NY County 1984] [Baer, J.].) General Business Law § 349 thus applies to defendant's advertisements.

There is no dispute that the communications at issue here constitute "advertising" within the meaning of [14] General Business Law § 350. If defendant's advertising "is misleading in a material respect * * * [or] fails to reveal facts material" to the subject matter of the advertisements (General Business Law § 350-a), then it violates General Business Law § 350.

HN5[] In considering a motion to dismiss based on pleadings alone, the court must presume that the allegations of the complaint are true. (See, O'Henry's Film Works v Nabisco, Inc., 112 AD2d 825 [1st Dept 1985].)

Plaintiff's allegations, if true, include that defendant is the mouthpiece of the insurance industry, that defendant is deliberately deceiving the public, through its advertising campaign, about the nature and [1007] cause of the current "insurance crisis" (that is, the high cost and unavailability of liability insurance); that the purported "Lawsuit Crisis" is a "myth manufactured by the insurance industry" to "prejudice * * * juries [*927] and judges, subvert our judicial system and * * * undermine the right to a jury trial."

Plaintiffs contend that the entire "Lawsuit Crisis" campaign is predicated on a falsehood. While defendant's ads convey the distinct impression that the American judicial system is choked [15] with personal injury litigation,

---

[3] For the legislative history, see especially Note, New York Creates a Private Right of Action To Combat Consumer Fraud: Caveat Venditor (48 Brooklyn L Rev 509, 559 [1982] [Caveat Venditor], citing Report of the Committee on New York State AntiTrust Law of the AntiTrust Law Section of the New York State Bar Association: A Proposed New State Law Making Deceptive Acts or Practices Unlawful, 1968 NYSBA AntiTrust L Symposium 114, 129 [CCH ed]). Caveat Venditor contains a lengthy and detailed analysis of the Act, including all relevant legislative history and a comprehensive analysis of similar and identical statutes throughout the United States. The article points out that because the Act provides no internal guidance with respect to the meaning of its terms, and that few cases have been decided interpreting the Act, that interpretive guidance must be sought from the Act's legislative history, New York Rules of Construction, and analogous statutes and the case law decided under them. (Caveat Venditor, op. cit., at 519-525.)

plaintiffs observe that, according to the National Center for State Courts, while total civil filings did actually increase from 1978 to 1981, the total actually decreased from 1981 to 1984. In addition, plaintiffs argue, defendant's advertisements are aimed at the average person who lacks sophisticated legal knowledge, and defendant exploits this ignorance by carefully concealing the distinction between claims filed and actual damage awards. If plaintiffs' claims are true, defendant's ads are "misleading in a material respect", and violate General Business Law § 350. (General Business Law § 350-a.)

In addition to the defendant's alleged deception of the general public about the existence of a "Lawsuit Crisis", plaintiffs discuss various individual advertisements and all of which, they argue, contain numerous misleading statements and false impressions. One of I.I.I.'s advertisements claims that obstetricians, driven by fear of malpractice claims, have stopped delivering babies; that, as a result, women have difficulty finding a doctor. Plaintiffs report that, in fact, according to the Statistical Abstract of the United States, the number [16] of obstetricians/gynecologists in the United States increased by more than 50% from 1970 to 1982.

Another advertisement conveys the frightening idea that some members of the clergy have stopped counseling their parishioners because they are afraid of lawsuits. Petitioners contend, and defendant does not dispute that, in fact, no member of the clergy has ever been held liable for clerical malpractice.

Another of defendant's advertisements states that "Only one [company] still makes the vaccine for polio * * *. It's a symptom of the lawsuit crisis." This ad conveys the idea that there had once been many manufacturers of polio vaccine, that all but one have since withdrawn from the market because of huge jury awards, and that there currently is, or will presently be, a shortage of polio vaccine. According to plaintiffs, defendant carefully omits the information that while only one company was making polio vaccine in 1974, there are now two, and a third, moreover, is actively seeking [*928] to enter the market and has a license application pending. If true, this would constitute an omission of facts material to the subject of the advertisement.

If these and plaintiffs' other [17] allegations are deemed true, which they must be for the purposes of the instant motion, plaintiffs' complaint states a cause of action under General Business Law §§ 349 and 350 and is legally sufficient in this respect. (Guggenheimer v Ginzburg, 43 NY2d 268, 275 [1977]; General Business Law §§ 349, 350, 350-a.)

STANDING

In addition, I.I.I. moves to dismiss the complaint on the ground that plaintiffs lack standing. This branch of its motion must also be denied.

HN6[] Section 349 (h) of the General Business Law provides, in pertinent part: "In addition to the right of action granted to the attorney general pursuant to this section, any person who has been injured by reason of any violation of this section may bring an action in his [1008] own name to enjoin such unlawful act or practice, [18] an action to recover his actual damages or fifty dollars, whichever is greater, or both such actions."

HN7[] Section 350-d (3) of the General Business Law, as well, provides, in pertinent part: "Any person who has been injured by reason of any violation of section three hundred fifty or three hundred fifty-a of this article may bring an action in his own name to enjoin such unlawful act or practice, an action to recover his actual damages or fifty dollars, whichever is greater, or both such actions."

Defendant argues that plaintiffs do not constitute a "person who has been injured" within the meaning of these statutes. The Court of Appeals has held, however, that HN8[] when "legislation proscribes conduct against a class," a "bona fide and nationally recognized organization" may represent the class of persons who can "'[claim] to be aggrieved'" under that legislation. (National Org. for Women v State Div. of Human Rights, 34 NY2d 416, 419-420 [1974].) NYPIRG qualifies as a bona fide organization dedicated to serving the interests of general public welfare as it is a not-for-profit, tax-exempt organization with tens of thousands of members. Article 22-A of the General Business Law, moreover, exists to protect the general public (which includes members of NYPIRG) from deceptive acts or practices.

In addition, the individual plaintiffs arguably fall "within [*929] the zone of interest to be protected by the statute", and can be found to have standing to sue. [4] (Matter of Fritz v Huntington Hosp., 39 NY2d 339, 346 [1976]; see also, Matter of District Attorney of Suffolk County, 58 NY2d 436, 442 [19] [1983] ["the contemporary rule is that a party has standing to enforce a statutory right if its abuse will cause him injury and it may fall within the 'zone of interest' protected by the legislation"].)

Accordingly, plaintiffs have standing to maintain this action.

FIRST AMENDMENT ISSUES

The most critical issue raised by defendant is whether enforcement of the statutes would impermissibly burden I.I.I.'s speech and violate the First Amendment. The threshold determination is whether I.I.I.'s advertisements constitute commercial or noncommercial speech. HN9[] Commercial speech which is false or misleading can be regulated and restricted (e.g., Central Hudson Gas & Elec. v Public Serv. Commn., 447 U.S. 557, 563 [1980]), while the government is powerless [20] to regulate noncommercial speech based on its truth or falsity.

HN10[] Where noncommercial speech is involved, our long-standing First Amendment jurisprudence provides that its content may not be suppressed because the speaker is biased or her/his conclusions erroneous or inaccurate, since "the people in our democracy are entrusted with the responsibility of judging and evaluating the relative merits of conflicting arguments" (First Natl. Bank of Boston v Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 791 [1978]). The lesser protection for "commercial" speech is the result of more than a decade of Supreme Court jurisprudence which has simultaneously brought commercial speech within the ambit of the First Amendment and defined and described the levels of protection such speech should be accorded.

Protection of Commercial Speech.

Prior to its decision in Virginia Pharmacy Bd. v Virginia Consumer Counsel (425 U.S. 748 [1976]) the court had held that commercial speech was exempt from the protection of the First Amendment based on the commercial motivation of the speech rather than its content (e.g., Valentine v Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52, 54 [1942] [purely [21] commercial advertising is merely [*930] the pursuit of "gainful occupation"]). This focus on the profit motive as rendering commercial speech unworthy of protection began to be replaced with an increasing scrutiny of content (e.g., New York Times Co. v Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 [1009] [1964]; Pittsburgh Press Co. v Human Relations Commn., 413 U.S. 376 [1973]). [5] The final reversal came in Virginia Pharmacy where the court held that purely commercial speech, when truthful, is entitled to First Amendment protection because of its value to individual consumers and the general public. It was thus not the motivation of the speaker or, as the court later held in First Natl. Bank (supra), the identity of the speaker, but the fact that the information conveyed, although doing no more than "'[proposing] a commercial transaction'" added to the sum total of ideas and information employed by the citizenry in making economic, as well as political choices. (Virginia Pharmacy Bd. v Virginia Consumer Counsel, supra, at 762.)

[*22] The underlying bases of the speaker/content distinction are fully debated in the several opinions which constitute the decision in First Natl. Bank (supra), holding that the State may not regulate speech simply because the speaker is a corporation. The differing and sometimes conflicting values which the First Amendment serves

---

[4] If their allegations are deemed true, they either have settled or will settle for amounts less than their actions would otherwise be "worth", or received or anticipate receiving jury verdicts below their cases' "worth" as a result of defendants campaign.

[5] In Pittsburgh Press Co. v Human Relations Commn. (413 U.S. 376), the court considered an ordinance which generally prohibited a newspaper from carrying help wanted ads in gender-designated columns. The court distinguished purely commercial advertisements merely "[proposing] a commercial transaction" from advertisements expressing an editorial position on matters of social or political concern. (Supra, at 385.) In making this distinction, the court signaled its shift from the economic motivation of the speaker to the content of the speech. (Supra, at 386-387.)

were also explicitly considered in that case. Three major purposes of the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech have been identified. These are:

1) furtherance of the individual's ability of self-expression and thought (see, e.g., Whitney v California, 274 U.S. 357, 375 [1927] [Brandeis and Holmes, JJ., concurring]);

2) furtherance of an open marketplace of ideas (see, e.g., Abrams v United States, 250 U.S. 616, 630 [1919] [Holmes and Brandeis, JJ., dissenting]; Milton, Areopagitica, A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing to the Parliament of England [1644]); and

3) furtherance of intelligent, self-government in a democratic [*931] system (see, e.g., Meiklejohn, Political Freedom [1960]; Emerson, The System of Freedom of Expression, at 7 [1970]).

Obviously, as Justice [23] White's dissent pointed out, the first of these interests is not implicated where corporate (or commercial) speech is involved (supra, at 804-805). The majority opinion, written by Justice Powell, stressed the second, noting "[the] inherent worth of the speech in terms of its capacity for informing the public does not depend upon the identity of its source, whether corporation, association, union, or individual" (supra, at 777).

The majority drew an analogy to the commercial speech cases, writing that "They illustrate that the First Amendment goes beyond protection of the press and the self-expression of individuals to prohibit government from limiting the stock of information from which members of the public may draw. A commercial advertisement is constitutionally protected not so much because it pertains to the seller's business as because it furthers the societal interest in the 'free flow of commercial information'" (supra, at 783).

This analysis also explains why nontruthful commercial speech is not protected -- because it does not increase the amount of information which consumers may employ in making their economic decisions. Unlike political speech of questionable [24] accuracy [6] commercial speech is protected precisely because it increases the truthful information available to consumers (see, [1010] Central Hudson Gas & Elec. v Public Serv. Commn., 447 U.S. 557, 563 [1980], supra ["(t)he First Amendment's concern for commercial speech is based on the informational function of advertising * * * (c)onsequently, there can be no constitutional objection to the suppression of * * * messages that do not accurately inform the public"]).

The court in Virginia Pharmacy (supra) expressly recognized that the First Amendment did not interfere [25] with a "State's dealing effectively" with the problem of "deceptive or misleading" commercial speech, even when it is "not provably false, or even wholly false". (Supra, at 771.) The State may constitutionally insure "that the stream of commercial information [flows] cleanly as well as freely" (supra, at 772).

[*932] This position was restated and amplified in Bates v State Bar of Ariz. (433 U.S. 350, 383 [1977], supra) where the court wrote: "Advertising that is false, deceptive, or misleading of course is subject to restraint * * *. Since the advertiser knows his product and has a commercial interest in its dissemination, we have little worry that regulation to assure truthfulness will discourage protected speech * * *. And any concern that strict requirements for truthfulness will undesirably inhibit spontaneity seems inapplicable because commercial speech generally is calculated. Indeed, the public and private benefits from commercial speech derive from confidence in its accuracy and reliability. Thus, the leeway for untruthful or misleading expression that has been allowed in other contexts has little force in the commercial arena." [26] (See also, Linmark Assocs. v Willingboro, 431 U.S. 85, 97 [1977].)

This discussion of the reasons for the protection and regulation of commercial speech is necessary because of the lack of any "bright line" test in determining what is or is not commercial speech (e.g., Zauderer v Office of

---

[6] It is precisely in this political area, as Justice Powell wrote, that "'the state has a special incentive to repress opposition and often wields a more effective power of suppression'" (First Natl. Bank of Boston v Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 777, n 11, quoting Emerson, Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment, at 9, and citing Meiklejohn, Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government, at 24-26).

Disciplinary Counsel, 471 U.S. 626, 637 [1985] ["More subject to doubt, perhaps, are the precise bounds of the category of expression that may be termed commercial speech"]). Such determination can finally be made only by reference to the underlying principles and analyses of the court's commercial and corporate speech decisions.

Determination of whether Speech is Commercial.

Beside its notion of commonsense difference, the Supreme Court has generally looked at the primary purpose of the expression (see, e.g., Friedman v Rogers, 440 U.S. 1, 11-13, and at 12, n 11 [1979]), finding it commercial if it predominantly invites a commercial transaction (e.g., Central Hudson Gas & Elec. v Public Serv. Commn., supra, at 561; Virginia Pharmacy Bd. v Virginia Consumer Counsel, supra, at 771, n 24). The [27] fact that otherwise commercial speech includes information on an opinion concerning a matter of public concern or an ongoing debate does not remove its primary commercial character or entitle it to greater protection than it might otherwise have. ( Central Hudson Gas & Elec., supra, at 563, n 5.) [7]

[*933] [*28] [1011] In Bolger v Youngs Drug Prods. Corp. (463 U.S. 60 [1983]) the court attempted to enumerate some of the characteristics to be considered in determining whether speech was commercial or noncommercial. At issue there were pamphlets on the use of contraception and the prevention of venereal disease which were circulated by the manufacturer of Trojan-brand condoms, who was identified on each of the pamphlets. The court held that

1) the mere fact that the pamphlets were conceded to be advertisements -- that they were paid for by the advertiser -- was insufficient to compel a conclusion that they were commercial speech;

2) the reference to specific products manufactured by the advertiser did not, in and of itself, render the pamphlets commercial speech; [8] and [*29] 3) an economic motivation for mailing the pamphlets was not sufficient to turn them into commercial speech.

The presence of all three factors, however, compelled the court's conclusion that the pamphlets were commercial speech. *(*Supra, at 67-68.) Specific language in the pamphlets which informed potential consumers where condoms could be purchased and gave detailed descriptions of various Trojan-brand condoms persuaded the court that the company was not engaged in the type of "direct comment * * * on public issues" deserving of the "full panoply" of constitutional protections. *(*Supra, at 68.) The primary purpose of the pamphlets was to sell condoms to their recipients; the discussion of related issues of public interest was insufficient to change their character for purposes of First Amendment analysis.

[*934] The dividing line is thus clear. HN11[] If, within a commonsense reading, an advertisement is obviously intended to promote sales, it is commercial speech. If a public message or discussion is incorporated, it is still

---

[7] The court there ruled on a Public Service Commission ban of advertising promoting the use of electricity, but considered whether a different result would occur if the promotional advertising included discussion of environmental concerns or other "'questions frequently discussed and debated by our political leaders.'" ( Central Hudson Gas & Elec. v Public Serv. Commn., 447 U.S. 557, 563, n 5.) It held that advertising which "links a product to a current public debate" does not thereby become entitled to constitutional protection afforded noncommercial speech. *(*Supra, at 563, n 5.) It wrote "[Advertisers] enjoy the full panoply of First Amendment protections for their direct comments on public issues. There is no reason for providing similar constitutional protection when such statements are made only in the context of commercial transactions" *(*supra, at 563, n 5).

[8] To be categorized as commercial, speech does not have to refer to a specific brand or manufacturer; "a trade association may make statements about a product without reference to specific brand names", and this can constitute commercial speech. ( Bolger v Young Drug Prods., 463 U.S. 60, 67, n 13, citing National Commn. on Egg Nutrition v Federal Trade Commn., 570 F2d 157 [7th Cir 1977], cert denied 439 U.S. 821 [1978].) In the latter case the Seventh Circuit upheld regulation of commercials promoting the sale of eggs by attempting to defuse fear of health hazards due to their high concentration of cholesterol.

commercial speech. If, however, the advertisement is a direct comment on a public issue, unrelated to proposing any particular commercial transaction, [30] it is protected. This analysis must now be applied to the advertisements at issue on this motion.

THE ADVERTISEMENTS

The materials dissemninated by I.I.I. consist of various print advertisements and television commercials which, according to I.I.I., seek to "focus public attention on problems created by our current civil litigation system and to initiate and advance discussion of tort reform * * *. Each advertisement asks the reader or viewer to become informed about the civil justice system and possibilities for its improvement." Each advertisement conveys effectively that a "Lawsuit Crisis" exists, that the high cost or unavailability of liability insurance is due solely to an explosion of lawsuits, and that insurance companies have no responsibility for rising premiums or the unavailability of insurance. As described by defendant, "[each] advertisement offers the reader or viewer a free report, which describes reform proposals and provides the names and addresses of various involved organizations." These are two examples of voice-over scripts for the television commercials:

"The future of high school sports is unclear.

"Today, schools are thinking about canceling football [31] and other major sports.

"What are the reasons? Lawsuits are costing more and more. Insurance costs are rising. Some officials think it just isn't worth it.

"What can be done? Call for this free report.

[1012] "Learn how to protect your rights.

"Learn how to stop paying the price.

"Our cities are in a bind.

"Money needed for fire fighters, police and other services is being used to pay the price of The Lawsuit Crisis.

"New York City says lawsuits may soon cost as much as the fire department.

"Some California cities face an estimated two hundred [*935] million dollars in lawsuits. The money has to come from somewhere.

"Call for this free report. [9] Learn how to protect your rights and help fight The Lawsuit Crisis.

" [32] Learn how you can stop paying the price."

DISCUSSION

When analyzed for the factors set forth in Bolger (supra) and the justification for limiting the protection of commercial speech to truthful communication, it becomes clear that the advertisements at issue here are not primarily commercial speech within the meaning of existing case law. Most critically, the advertisements do not "propose a commercial transaction" since they are generally not directed to potential buyers of the advertiser's product. The ads address issues of malpractice, product and municipal liability insurance which undoubtedly affect the prices readers ultimately pay for various services (medical care paid to health care providers, governmental services financed by taxes, etc.) but they do not, except incidentally, [10] reach the direct consumers of those insurance products.

---

[9] The "free report" referred to is a slickly done, nine-page pamphlet with the name and logo of the Insurance Information Institute, "A nonprofit action and information center", at the top of the cover. Page 1 contains a message from the president of I.I.I. which includes the following: "America's insurance companies are deeply concerned about the lawsuit crisis. The high cost of lawsuits leads to higher insurance premiums, which leads to higher taxes, and disruptions to our daily lives and businesses."

[*33] The purpose of the advertisements is complex, but reflects at least three major aims. One is to influence the public, as potential voters, to encourage legislative action (such as the bills which have been pending in our Legislature relating to caps on judgments, etc.) [11] which will decrease payments made by the insurance companies. A second purpose may well be to encourage readers and viewers, as potential jurors, to decrease plaintiffs' recoveries by awarding lower verdicts. [12] A third is to [*936] generally improve the image of the insurance industry which is under criticism for many reasons unrelated to payments made as part of the litigation process. [13]

[*34] All of these purposes clearly inure to the economic benefit of the insurance industry, but as the earlier discussion demonstrates, it is not economic motivation, but commercial content which deprives potentially untruthful speech of full First Amendment protection. [14]

[*35] Because the primary purpose or purposes of the ads are not the proposal of a commercial transaction between the defendant [1013] (or its constituent insurance companies) and the viewers or readers of the ads, and because their primary purpose is to influence a variety of public debates (whether or not truthfully), I find that they are not commercial speech and are thus [*937] subject to the full protection of the First Amendment. [15] Any regulation based on their alleged falsity [16] is thus constitutionally impermissible. Accordingly, defendant's motion to dismiss is granted.

---

[10] Doctors, CEOs of drug manufacturers, and governmental officials may be among the readers and viewers, but they are presumably an extremely small percentage and the ads are obviously not directed to them in their "consumer" capacity.

[11] For a discussion of recent and pending legislation relating to malpractice rates, see, e.g., Kramer and Moore, Medical Malpractice -- Comment on New Legislation, NJLJ, Aug. 1, 1988, at 3, col 1.

[12] Voir dire of jurors in civil cases now frequently includes questions directed to this advertising campaign, and a large number of potential jurors indicate both that they are aware of and influenced by the advertisements.

[13] For example, in March of this year the Attorneys General of seven States, including New York, filed a mammoth antitrust suit against numerous insurance companies alleging conspiracy to restrain competition and manipulate the cost of commercial general-liability insurance during the so-called "insurance crisis" (An Avalanche of Lawsuits Descends on Insurers, Business Week, Apr. 11, 1988, at 60). Rather than spiraling jury awards, as the insurance industry claims, the Attorneys General attribute the "crisis" to "boycotts, threats, intimidation, and other coercive conduct" by the defendants. (Op. cit., at 61.)

[14] A strong argument can be made the other way, and has indeed been expressed in concurring or dissenting opinions in some of the major Supreme Court cases. Looking to the First Amendment interest which involves maximizing speech and speakers, for example, Justice White has pointed out that the sheer market power of some speakers can, in this technologically dominated age, effectively monopolize debate to the end of actually decreasing available speech. Thus, he argues, since corporations are the creatures of the state whose special treatment has allowed them to amass "economic power which may * * * dominate not only the economy but also the very heart of our democracy, the electoral process" their speech should be subject to regulation to avoid their "threatening the role of the First Amendment as a guarantor of a free marketplace of ideas" (First Natl. Bank of Boston v Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 809-810 [White, J., dissenting]). One model for regulation of corporate speech which might alleviate this problem involves corporate subsidization of alternate viewpoint (see, e.g., Richards, The Jurisprudential Sin of Treating Differents Alike: Emergence of Full First Amendment Protection for Corporate Speakers, 17 Mem St U L Rev 173, 177 [1987]) but the Supreme Court's sharply divided decision in Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v Public Utils. Commn. (475 U.S. 1, reh denied 475 U.S. 1133 [1986]) has dashed hopes for any immediate approval of such speech-enhancing regulation. The choices about commercial and corporate speech made by the current Supreme Court majority are, however, binding on this and other courts, and must be followed here.

[15] Indeed, these "debate-influencing" advertisements would seem to be precisely the sort the court anticipated as entitled to protection in Central Hudson Gas & Elec. v Public Serv. Commn. (447 U.S. 557, 565, n 7).

[16] Other courts which have been confronted with similar insurance industry campaigns have upheld claims of First Amendment privilege (Quinn v Aetna Life & Cas. Co., 616 F2d 38 [2d Cir 1980] [Per Curiam], affg 482 F Supp 22 [ED NY 1979] [dismissing action to enjoin insurance company from running ads claiming that tort claims resulted in excessive jury awards]; but see, Quinn v Aetna Life & Cas. Co., 96 Misc 2d 545 [Sup Ct, Queens County 1978] [same parties in State court; court held First Amendment would not protect advertisement to the extent it might contain misleading advertising contravening plaintiffs' rights to an impartial jury]; cf., Rutledge v Liability Ins. Indus., 487 F Supp 5 [WD La 1979]).

[*36]

End of Document

---

Odishelidze v. Aetna Life & Casualty Co.

United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit

August 3, 1988

No. 87-1901

Reporter

853 F.2d 21 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 10209 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,167; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 3d (Callaghan) 1410

ALEXANDER ODISHELIDZE, Plaintiff, Appellant, v. AETNA LIFE & CASUALTY CO., ET AL., Defendants, Appellees

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, Hon. Jose Antonio Fuste, U.S. District Judge.

Core Terms

diversity jurisdiction, enterprise, employees, vacate, principal place of business, reconsideration motion, allegations, antitrust, district court, racketeering, subsidiaries

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

For purposes of § 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, the activities of a corporation and its wholly owned subsidiaries are viewed as that of a single enterprise. Because unilateral action is not prohibited by § 1 of the Sherman Act, the actions of a parent corporation, its subsidiaries or sister corporations, and its employees cannot be considered concerted action. This rule applies to sister corporations owned by a third entity and to officers or employees of those corporations.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Racketeering > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations Act > Elements

Torts > Vicarious Liability > Corporations > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Racketeering > Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations Act > General Overview

HN2[] Racketeer Influenced & Corrupt Organizations Act, Elements

Under 18 U.S.C.S. § 1962(c) the "person" alleged to be engaged in a racketeering activity (the defendant, that is) must be an entity distinct from the "enterprise." Under § 1962(c) the enterprise is not liable. It is only a person, or one associated with an enterprise, not the enterprise itself, who can violate the provisions of the section.

Civil Procedure > ... > Diversity Jurisdiction > Citizenship > Business Entities

Constitutional Law > The Judiciary > Jurisdiction > Diversity Jurisdiction

Civil Procedure > ... > Diversity Jurisdiction > Citizenship > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN3[] Citizenship, Business Entities

Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(1) requires a complaint to set forth a short and plain statement of the grounds upon which the court's jurisdiction depends. In a properly pleaded diversity action against a corporate defendant, plaintiff will advert to both factors set out in 28 U.S.C.S. § 1332(c), the place of incorporation and principal place of business.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Jurisdiction Over Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

HN4[] Pleadings, Amendment of Pleadings

Although Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(h)(3) states that whenever it appears that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court shall dismiss the action, courts should heed the admonition of Fed. R. Civ. P. 15 to allow amendments "freely" if it appears possible that plaintiff can correct the jurisdictional defect.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Diversity Jurisdiction > Citizenship > General Overview

HN5[] Pleadings, Amendment of Pleadings

Amendment to show that diversity jurisdiction actually exists, although defectively pleaded, is specifically allowed by 28 U.S.C.S. § 1653 which provides that defective allegations of jurisdiction may be amended, upon terms, in the trial or appellate courts. This statute is normally construed liberally so as to avoid dismissals of complaints on technical grounds. Thus, such technical defects in jurisdictional pleadings usually are not fatal.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > Altering & Amending Judgments

Civil Procedure > ... > Diversity Jurisdiction > Citizenship > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Motion Practice > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > General Overview

HN6[] Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

Although a final judgment has already been entered dismissing the complaint, plaintiff is not barred from seeking to cure defective jurisdictional allegations where a motion for reconsideration and to vacate judgment was timely motion under Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b).

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > Altering & Amending Judgments

Constitutional Law > The Judiciary > Jurisdiction > Diversity Jurisdiction

Civil Procedure > ... > Diversity Jurisdiction > Citizenship > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Abuse of Discretion

HN7[] Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

A motion for relief from a final judgment pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 60(b) is addressed to the discretion of the district court, may be granted only under exceptional circumstances, and may be reviewed only for abuse of discretion. In light of 28 U.S.C.S. § 1653, amendment should be permitted, rather than dismissal, whenever it appears that a basis for federal jurisdiction can be stated. Where a motion for reconsideration and to vacate judgment includes the amendments necessary to correctly allege jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C.S. § 1332(c), and there unquestionably is diversity jurisdiction, it is an abuse of discretion for the district court to deny the motion for reconsideration and to vacate judgment.

Counsel: Harry Anduze Montano on brief for Appellant.

David P. Freedman, Edgar Cartagena-Santiago, Jorge I. Peirats, and O'Neill & Borges on brief, for Appellees.

Judges: Campbell, Chief Judge, Coffin and Selya, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by: PER CURIAM

Opinion

[*22] Appellant, Alexander Odishelidze, commenced an action in the district court for the District of Puerto Rico on November 18, 1985. He asserted jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331 (federal question) and 1332 (diversity). He alleged violations of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c), the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, and various state law claims. Odishelidze also asserted pendent jurisdiction regarding the state law claims. As defendants, Odishelidze named Aetna Life & Casualty Co., and its subsidiaries Aetna Variable Annuity Life Insurance Compana [sic] a.k.a. and/or d.b.a. Aetna Life Insurance and Annuity Company, Aetna Financial Services, Inc. and Aetna Life Insurance Company; in addition, he named as individual defendants William O. Bailey, Dean E. Wolcott, James [2] R. Bailey, Thomas L. West and Stanley W. Thompson -- all officers or employees of the above corporations.

BACKGROUND

Odishelidze, a resident of Puerto Rico, was an exclusive general agent for Aetna in Puerto Rico from 1971 to 1976 and from 1978 until 1982. In 1981, as part of a reorganization of its operations, Aetna decided to close all of its general agencies throughout the country. As a result, Aetna, in 1982, terminated Odishelidze's general agency and offered him a position as the manager of a newly created office within Aetna -- the Puerto Rico Personal Financial Security Division Marketing Office. In this position, Odishelidze was an employee of Aetna. In 1984, Aetna decided to close the Puerto Rico marketing office. According to Aetna, it offered Odishelidze a position in Florida, but Odishelidze turned it down and was discharged. However, Odishelidze alleges that his employment was terminated in 1984 after he unsuccessfully attempted to secure adequate conditions for his San Juan office.

Basically, Odishelidze claims that Aetna accomplished the termination of the general agencies by fraudulent misrepresentations and inducements concerning salary and other benefits he would [3] receive as an employee. He alleges that defendants conspired to deprive him of his "vested interests, property and contractual rights" as an exclusive agent. See Complaint, para. 14. This "concerted activity" allegedly was in restraint of trade because general agents were frozen out or boycotted while Aetna gained more control of the market. Odishelidze also claimed that this same behavior violated RICO because the fraudulent representations were "racketeering activities" carried out through use of the wires and mail, see 18 U.S.C. § 1961(1)(B), and harmed him in his business. See id. § 1964(c).

On May 8, 1986, Aetna moved to dismiss the complaint for, among other reasons not relevant here, failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6). Aetna addressed both the state and federal claims in its Rule 12(b)(6) motion. On August 26, 1987, the district court dismissed the complaint. Odishelidze v. Aetna Life & Casualty Co., 668 F. Supp. 94 (D.P.R. 1987). It found that Odishelidze had failed to state both a cognizable antitrust claim and an actionable civil RICO cause of action. It also found that diversity jurisdiction was lacking [4] due to the averment in Odishelidze's complaint that "Aetna Life and Casualty Co. is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Connecticut, with its principal place of business in Puerto Rico." See 668 F. Supp. at 96 n. 2 (emphasis in [*23] original). [1] The court, therefore, did not consider the merits of the state law claims, dismissing them for lack of pendent jurisdiction. Id. at 95, 99. It also ordered the complaint dismissed "for failure to plead a cognizable claim under federal jurisdiction" and noted that the dismissal was "without prejudice of Odishelidze filing another action in the proper local forum." Id. at 99 (emphasis added).

On September 15, 1987, Odishelidze filed a motion for reconsideration and to vacate judgment. In addition to rearguing his antitrust and RICO claims, he argued that diversity jurisdiction did in fact exist. He stated that the information in paragraph 3 of his complaint that Aetna Life & Casualty Co. had its principal place of business in "Puerto Rico" was a typographical error and that the paragraph was meant to read that [5] the principal place of business of Aetna Life & Casualty Co., as with all the other corporate defendants, was in Connecticut, thereby creating proper diversity jurisdiction. The court denied this motion, without opinion, on September 23, 1987. On September 23, Odishelidze filed a timely notice of appeal both from the original dismissal of his complaint and the denial of his motion for reconsideration.

DISCUSSION

1. The Federal Claims

We affirm the dismissal of Odishelidze's antitrust and RICO claims. As for the antitrust claim, Odishelidze's failure to state a "contract, combination. . . or conspiracy" is obvious and fatal to his § 1 claim. [2] Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628, 104 S. Ct. 2731 (1984). Copperweld clearly rejected the

---

[1] All the subsidiaries were noted to be citizens of Connecticut. See Complaint, paras. 3-6.

[2] 15 U.S.C. § 1 provides in relevant part:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any contract or engage in any combination or conspiracy hereby declared to be illegal shall be deemed guilty of a felony. . . .

intra-enterprise conspiracy doctrine. That is, HN1[] for § 1 purposes, the activities of a corporation and its wholly owned subsidiaries are viewed as that of a single enterprise. Id. at 771. Because unilateral action is not prohibited by § 1 of the Sherman Act, Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984), the actions of a parent corporation, its subsidiaries or sister corporations, and its [6] employees cannot be considered concerted action. See VII P. Areeda, Antitrust Law paras. 1464(f), 1470 (1986) (Copperweld holding applies to sister corporations owned by a third entity and to officers or employees of those corporations, citing cases).

As for Odishelidze's RICO claim, it is clear that HN2[] under § 1962(c) [3] the "person" alleged to be engaged in a racketeering activity (the defendant, that is) must be an entity distinct from the "enterprise;" under § 1962(c) the enterprise is not liable. Schofield v. First Commodity Corp. of Boston, 793 F.2d 28, 29-30 (1st Cir. 1986). That is, the Aetna companies and their officers or employees (the named defendants) cannot be the entity that conducts its own affairs through a pattern of racketeering activity. Id. at 30. Throughout [7] his brief and pleadings below, Odishelidze has continued to characterize the enterprise as Aetna and its subsidiaries and employees without specifically identifying a defendant, distinct from the enterprise, which conducted the enterprise's activities through a pattern of racketeering activity. For example, in paragraph 28 of his complaint, Odishelidze states:

> The defendant corporation and its named subsidiaries, its officers, directors, and employees, to wit: Aetna [*24] Life and Casualty Company; Aetna Variable Annuity Life Insurance Company; Aetna Financial Services, Inc.; Aetna Life Insurance Company; William O. Bailey; Dean E. Wolcott; James R. Bailey, Thomas L. West; Edward F. Dwight; Stanley W. Thompson and other [sic] agreed and entered as employees and agents of the defendant enterprise into a pattern of activities directed to defraud plaintiff. . . ."

As the court in Schofield stated, "'It is only a person, or one associated with an enterprise, not the enterprise itself, who can violate the provisions of the section.'" Id. at 30 (quoting Van Schaick v. Church of Scientology of California, 535 F. Supp. 1125, 1136 (D.Mass. 1982)).

[8] 2. Diversity Jurisdiction

HN3[] Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(1) requires a complaint to set forth "a short and plain statement of the grounds upon which the court's jurisdiction depends. . . ." Under this standard, Odishelidze's complaint technically is defective because it erroneously designates the principal place of business of Aetna Life & Casualty Co. as Puerto Rico instead of Connecticut. [4] See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c); District of Columbia v. Transamerica Insurance Co., 254 U.S. App. D.C. 374, 797 F.2d 1041, 1043-44 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (in a properly pleaded diversity action against a corporate defendant, plaintiff will advert to both factors set out in § 1332(c) -- place of incorporation and principal place of business). HN4[] Although Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(h)(3) states that "whenever it appears . . . that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court shall dismiss the action," courts should heed the admonition of Fed.R.Civ.P. 15 to allow amendments "freely" if it appears possible that plaintiff can correct the jurisdictional defect. See 3 J. Moore, Moore's Federal Practice para. 15.10 (2d ed. 1985) (footnote omitted).

[9] Indeed, HN5[] amendment to show that diversity jurisdiction actually exists, although defectively pleaded, is specifically allowed by 28 U.S.C. § 1653 which provides that "defective allegations of jurisdiction may be amended, upon terms, in the trial or appellate courts." See Moore, supra, para. 15.09, at 15-102. This statute is

---

[3] 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c) provides:

It shall be unlawful for any person employed by or associated with any enterprise engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce, to conduct or participate, directly or indirectly, in the conduct of such enterprise's affairs through a pattern of racketeering activity or collection of unlawful debt.

[4] Although not raised by the district court, the complaint also is defective as to the subsidiaries because Odishelidze states only that they are "citizens" of Connecticut and does not say where they are incorporated. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c).

normally construed liberally so as to avoid dismissals of complaints on technical grounds. Topp v. CompAir, Inc., 814 F.2d 830, 832 n. 2 (1st Cir. 1987) (citation omitted). Thus, such technical defects in jurisdictional pleadings usually are not fatal. Id.

HN6[] Even though a final judgment had already been entered dismissing Odishelidze's complaint, he is not barred from seeking to cure the defective jurisdictional allegations. See Moore, supra, para. 15.10. His motion for reconsideration and to vacate judgment was a timely motion under Fed.R.Civ.P. 60(b). Although not designated as such, and although no formal request to amend was included in his motion, we will treat Odishelidze as having requested the court to vacate its judgment to allow him to cure the jurisdictional defects in his original complaint.

HN7[] "A motion for relief from a final judgment [10] pursuant to Rule 60(b) is addressed to the discretion of the district court, Dankese v. Defense Logistics Agency, 693 F.2d 13, 15 (1st Cir. 1982), may be granted only under exceptional circumstances, Lepore v. Vidockler, 792 F.2d 272, 274 (1st Cir. 1986), and may be reviewed only for abuse of discretion, Browder v. Illinois Department of Correction, 434 U.S. [257, 263 n. 7, 98 S. Ct. 556, 54 L. Ed. 2d 521 (1978)]. . . ." Rivera v. M/T Fossarina, 840 F.2d 152, 156 (1st Cir. 1988). In this situation, the Rule 60(b) motion must be considered in light of 28 U.S.C. § 1653. Averbach v. Rival Manufacturing Co., 809 F.2d 1016, 1019 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 482 U.S. 915, 107 S. Ct. 3187, 96 L. Ed. 2d 675, 484 U.S. 822, 108 S. Ct. 83, 98 L. Ed. 2d 45 (1987). Indeed, amendment should be permitted, rather than dismissal, whenever it appears that a basis for federal jurisdiction can be stated by plaintiff. 5 C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1214 (1969).

[*25] Odishelidze's motion for reconsideration and to vacate judgment includes the amendments necessary to correctly allege jurisdiction under § 1332(c). He states in the motion that all the corporate defendants were incorporated in the state of Connecticut and have their principal [11] places of business there. Moreover, defendants do not contest the amended jurisdictional allegations and have never argued that diversity jurisdiction does not exist in this case. Because there unquestionably is diversity jurisdiction, we find that it was an abuse of discretion for the district court to deny Odishelidze's motion for reconsideration and to vacate judgment. Cf. Moore, supra, para. 15.10, at 15-104 n. 2 (abuse of discretion to deny leave to amend on granting dismissal when plaintiff could have stated a claim, and cases cited).

Indeed, we find that a formal amendment of the complaint is not necessary at this stage. See Wright & Miller, supra, § 1214 (when court can readily recognize existence of diversity jurisdiction, amendment of complaint not always required) (footnote omitted). We therefore vacate both the district court's order denying Odishelidze's motion to reconsider the diversity issue and the judgment dismissing the complaint for failure to plead diversity jurisdiction. We affirm, however, the court's refusal to reconsider and vacate its judgment of dismissal of the antitrust and RICO claims. [5] The case is remanded to the district court with instructions to [12] treat the defective allegations of diversity jurisdiction as cured and to consider the remaining state law claims.

So ordered.

End of Document

---

[5] Because of the view we take of the antitrust claim, see text supra, we need not address the district court's intimation, 668 F. Supp. at 97 n. 4, concerning the scope of the "business of insurance" for McCarran-Ferguson Act purposes. We take no view of whether or not that term embraces matters germane to insurer-agent relationships. See Group Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Royal Drug Co., 440 U.S. 205, 224-25, 59 L. Ed. 2d 261, 99 S. Ct. 1067 n. 32 (1979) (leaving question open); Thompson v. New York Life Ins. Co., 644 F.2d 439, 443 (5th Cir. 1981) (similar).

[Crane & Shovel Sales Corp. v. Bucyrus-Erie Co.]

United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit

December 17, 1987, Argued ; August 4, 1988, Decided ; August 4, 1988, Filed

No. 87-3030

Reporter

854 F.2d 802 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 10579 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,166

CRANE & SHOVEL SALES CORPORATION, Plaintiff-Appellant, v. BUCYRUS-ERIE CO., BUCYRUS CONSTRUCTION PRODUCTS, NORTHWEST ENGINEERING CO., JERRY A. MOSS, CHARLES SANFORD, GPS EQUIPMENT, Defendants-Appellees

Prior History: [1] On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio.

Core Terms

distributor, manufacturer, Anti-Trust, restraint of trade, conspiracy, distributorship, anticompetitive, vertical, elimination, interbrand, intrabrand, machinery, terminated, substitution, allegations, district court, horizontal, rule of reason, supplier, anti trust law, jilted, competitor, illegality, exclusive distributor, distributing, territorial, conspired, products, rights, Beer

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

See the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, § 1, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > General Overview

HN2[] Sherman Act, Claims

To establish a claim under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, § 1, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, a plaintiff must establish that the defendants contracted, combined or conspired among each other, that the combination or conspiracy produced adverse, anticompetitive effects within relevant product and geographic markets, that the objects of and conduct pursuant to that contract or conspiracy were illegal and that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of that conspiracy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

HN3[] Private Actions, Remedies

The essential elements of a private antitrust claim must be alleged in more than vague and conclusory terms to prevent dismissal of the complaint on a defendant's Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > Price Fixing

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

HN4[] Cartels & Horizontal Restraints, Price Fixing

Horizontal conspiracies involve agreements among competitors at the same level of competition to restrain trade, such as agreements among manufacturers to fix prices for a given product and geographic market, or among distributors to fix prices for a given market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

HN5[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

Vertical conspiracies, on the other hand, involve agreements between competitors at different levels of competition to restrain trade, such as agreements between a manufacturer and its distributors to exclude another distributor from a given product and geographic market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN6[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

Vertical distribution restraints are to be tested under the rule of reason, and are no longer barred under a per se rule.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > General Overview

HN7[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

A manufacturer's substitution of one distributor for another has been classified as a vertical restraint of trade case.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > General Overview

HN8[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing

Interbrand competition is the competition among the manufacturers of the same generic product -- television sets in this case -- and is the primary concern of antitrust law. The extreme example of a deficiency of interbrand competition is monopoly, where there is only one manufacturer. In contrast, intrabrand competition is the competition between the distributors -- wholesale or retail -- of the product of a particular manufacturer.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

HN9[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing

A complaint which does no more than state commercial disappointment at losing a distribution contract with a manufacturer fails to allege restraint of trade.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN10[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Conspiracy to Monopolize

A complaint charging restraint of trade based on a manufacturer's substitution of one distributor for another must allege anticompetitive effect at the inter-brand level to survive a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion for failure to state a violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, § 1, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > Dismissal > Involuntary Dismissals > Failure to State Claims

HN11[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN12[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Per se rules of illegality are appropriate only when they relate to conduct that is manifestly anticompetitive. There are certain agreements or practices which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use.

Counsel: Egidijus Marcinkevicius, Algis Sirvaitis & Assoc., Cleveland, Ohio, S. Melvin Kociubes, Cleveland, Ohio, Attorneys, for Appellant.

Edward C. Schmidt, Bucyrus-Eric Co., Roy A. Powell, Rose, Schmidt, Chapman, Duff & Hasley, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Paul Michael Pohl (Bucyrus-Erie) Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue, Cleveland, Ohio, Eric M. Oakley, Frances Floriano Goins, Squire, Sanders & Dempsey, Cleveland, Ohio, Attorneys for Appellees.

Judges: Jones, Wellford, and Boggs, Circuit Judges. Boggs, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court, in which Jones, Circuit Judge, joined. Wellford, Circuit Judge, (pp. 18-20) delivered a separate concurring opinion.

Opinion by: BOGGS

Opinion

[*803] BOGGS, Circuit Judge.

Plaintiff-appellant Crane & Shovel Sales Corporation (Crane) appeals the district court judgment granting dismissal pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) of its complaint alleging that defendants-appellants Bucyrus-Erie Co. (B-E), Bucyrus Construction Products (BCP), Northwest Engineering Co., Jerry A. Moss (Moss), Charles Sanford (Sanford), and GPS Equipment Corporation (GPS) restrained trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust [2] Act, and Chapter 1331 of the Ohio Revised Code (analogous state antitrust law.) [1] This case presents

[1] Crane also filed claims under the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 (otherwise known as the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO)), 18 U.S.C. § 1964, and state law theories of unfair competition, breach of fiduciary duty and intriguing questions concerning the legal sufficiency of an antitrust complaint. For the reasons set forth below, we affirm.

I

On May 16, 1986, Crane filed a complaint in district court essentially alleging that the defendants violated the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, and analogous state antitrust law, by conspiring to effect its termination as the distributor of BCP construction machinery parts, and the termination of all other similarly situated distributors for the Ohio and West Virginia area, and in causing an exclusive territorial distributorship for those parts to be given to GPS, a corporation [3] formed shortly after Crane was terminated as a BCP distributor. While the defendants dispute certain facts in the complaint, we, for the purpose of reviewing a granted 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, assume those facts to be true.

As the complaint states, in March 1984 plaintiff Crane, an Ohio corporation engaged in the business of selling parts for and making repairs to cranes and other construction equipment, was the distributor of construction machinery parts produced by defendant B-E. B-E was a manufacturer of construction equipment and other industrial products with its principal place of business in South Milwaukee, Wisconsin. On March 15, 1985, BCP, a manufacturer of construction equipment and other products with its principal place of business in Green Bay, Wisconsin, bought the construction machinery division of B-E, and permitted Crane to continue distributing the construction machinery parts made by its newly acquired division. Defendant BCP is a division of defendant-appellee Northwest Engineering Company, which is not alleged to have been an active participant in any conspiracy to restrain trade.

[*804] Sometime before February 20, 1986, defendant Moss ceased employment with B-E, [4] and began employment with BCP as its Chief Operating Officer. On February 20, 1986, Moss, on behalf of BCP, orally advised Crane that after April 15, 1986 it could no longer distribute BCP construction machinery parts. This oral advice was confirmed by letter dated February 26, 1986. Crane alleged that it had distributed BCP parts without written contract, and without problem, for about one year before BCP indicated that Crane could no longer sell those parts for it. Crane further alleged that it had invested considerable time and money in the distribution of these parts in reliance on oral assurances from BCP that it would continue to use Crane as its distributor. Moss, an employee of B-E in its construction machinery division before B-E sold that division to BCP, Crane alleged, followed the product line to its new owner. Only thereafter, Crane stated in the complaint, was it terminated as a distributor of BCP construction machinery parts.

In March 1986, GPS was formed. Moss was both a substantial shareholder and an officer of GPS. Defendant Sanford was also a substantial shareholder and officer of GPS, and, from the complaint, it appears had no interest in or employment with B-E, [5] BCP, or Northwest Engineering. In March 1986, GPS was made the exclusive distributor of BCP construction machinery parts for the states of Ohio and West Virginia. Crane specifically alleged that BCP and the other defendants conspired to terminate Crane's distributorship rights "so that a new distributorship, with whom defendant Moss has an economic interest, could take over plaintiff (Crane's) business." After April 15, 1986, Crane's distributorship rights were permanently terminated. According to Crane's complaint, all of these actions were "entered into with the purpose and effect of eliminating plaintiff as a competitor and to destroy the business of plaintiff."

II

On June 10, 1986, B-E filed a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted on the federal and state antitrust claims. On August 5, 1986, Northwest Engineering Company, Moss, Sanford, and GPS filed similar motions. Each defendant argued, inter alia, that Crane had failed to state a cause of action under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and analogous state law regarding their actions as alleged in the complaint.

---

trust, misrepresentation, breach of good faith, and promissory estoppel. The district court ruled against Crane on the RICO claim, and Crane failed to appeal that ruling to this court. We express no view as to the validity of any of these claims.

On December 8, 1986, the district court granted all of the [6] motions to dismiss. In the district court's view, Crane had simply failed to allege sufficient facts to establish a conspiracy to restrain trade under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. Regarding B-E, it stated that "there is no inference that this court can find to include B-E in an alleged conspiracy." The district court concluded that "the sole fact that defendant Moss had been a B-E employee in the construction machinery division before B-E sold it to BCP does not indicate any present interest B-E has in the distribution of BCP product," nor does it indicate any violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act on Moss's part.

The district court held that Crane's allegations that BCP conspired with Moss and Sanford to exclude Crane from distributing construction machinery parts were too general to state a conspiracy in restraint of trade under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. In the district court's view, "the substitution of one distributor for a product with another distributor does not in itself restrain trade within the meaning of the [Sherman Anti-Trust] statute." It stated that "[a] refusal to deal does not become illegal under the Sherman Act unless 'it produces an unreasonable restraint of [7] trade, such as price fixing, elimination of competition or the creation of a monopoly,'" quoting from Ace Beer Distributors, Inc. v. Kohn, 318 F.2d 283, 287 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 922, 11 L. Ed. 2d 166, 84 S. Ct. 267 (1963). The fact that Moss, a former employee of B-E and at the time Chief Operating Officer of BCP, was interested in GPS which was awarded an exclusive distributorship of BCP construction machinery parts, did not, in the district [*805] court's view, distinguish Crane's case from a classic "jilted distributor" case for which no recovery under Section 1 of the Sherman Act is available. As to GPS, the district court found it was not in existence at the time the decision was made by Moss to terminate Crane as a distributor of BCP construction machinery parts, and so could not have been part of a conspiracy to restrain trade. We are in essential agreement with the district court's analysis and conclusions, and accordingly assess that complaint in terms of its allegations of restraint of trade.

III

Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act states that HN1[] "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or [8] with foreign states, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1. In Davis-Watkins Co. v. Service Merchandise, 686 F.2d 1190, 1195-96 (6th Cir. 1982), we held that HN2[] "to establish a claim under section 1, the plaintiff must establish that the defendants contracted, combined or conspired among each other, that the combination or conspiracy produced adverse, anticompetitive effects within relevant product and geographic markets, that the objects of and conduct pursuant to that contract or conspiracy were illegal and that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of that conspiracy." (citation omitted).

HN3[] The essential elements of a private antitrust claim must be alleged in more than vague and conclusory terms to prevent dismissal of the complaint on a defendant's 12(b)(6) motion. Hohensee v. Akron Beacon Journal Publishing Co., 174 F. Supp. 450, 452 (N.D. Ohio 1959), aff'd, 277 F.2d 359 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 364 U.S. 914, 5 L. Ed. 2d 227, 81 S. Ct. 277 (1960). Since either conspiracy or restraint of trade is an essential element of a Section 1 Sherman Anti-Trust claim, failure to allege either one justifies dismissal of an antitrust claim. Havoco of America, Ltd. v. Shell Oil Company, 626 F.2d [9] 549, 557 (7th Cir. 1980) (insufficient allegations of anticompetitive effect); Stewart v. Hevelone, 283 F. Supp. 842, 845 (D.C. Neb. 1968) (insufficient allegations of conspiracy).

Courts have discerned two major types of antitrust conspiracies to restrain trade: horizontal and vertical. HN4[] Horizontal conspiracies involve agreements among competitors at the same level of competition to restrain trade, such as agreements among manufacturers to fix prices for a given product and geographic market, or among distributors to fix prices for a given market. HN5[] Vertical conspiracies, on the other hand, involve agreements between competitors at different levels of competition to restrain trade, such as agreements between a manufacturer and its distributors to exclude another distributor from a given product and geographic market.

In Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977), the Supreme Court held that HN6[] vertical distribution restraints are to be tested under the rule of reason, and would no longer be barred under a per se rule. In Com-Tel, Inc. v. Dukane Corp., 669 F.2d 404, 408 (6th Cir. 1982), we recognized that the Supreme Court in Sylvania "reinstated the rule [10] of reason for vertical distribution restraints."

In Oreck Corporation v. Whirlpool Corporation, 579 F.2d 126, 131 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 946, 58 L. Ed. 2d 338, 99 S. Ct. 340 (1978), the Second Circuit, in essential agreement with our analysis, stated the following:

> It is important to distinguish between "horizontal" restraints, i.e. agreements between competitors at the same level of market structure, and "vertical" restraints, i.e. combinations of persons at different levels of the market structure, such as manufacturers and distributors. Horizontal restraints alone have been characterized as 'naked restraints of trade with no purpose except stifling competition,' . . . and, therefore, per se violations of the Sherman Act. On the other hand, while vertical restrictions may reduce intrabrand competition by limiting the number of sellers of a particular product, competing for a given [*806] group of buyers, they also promote interbrand competition by allowing a manufacturer to achieve certain efficiencies in the distribution of its products. . . . They are, therefore, to be examined under the rule of reason standard. (citations omitted)

Since different antitrust principles apply depending [11] on whether a given restraint of trade is either horizontal or vertical, classification is thus critically important. HN7[] A manufacturer's substitution of one distributor for another has been classified by this Circuit as a vertical restraint of trade case, and, pursuant to Supreme Court command, has tested such a case under the rule of reason.

We have consistently held that a complaint which simply alleges that a manufacturer substituted one distributor for another fails to state a violation of the rule of reason, unless it also alleges anticompetitive effect at the interbrand level. In Sylvania, 433 U.S. at 523 n.19, the Supreme Court explained the distinction between interbrand competition and intrabrand competition:

> HN8[] Interbrand competition is the competition among the manufacturers of the same generic product -- television sets in this case -- and is the primary concern of antitrust law. The extreme example of a deficiency of interbrand competition is monopoly, where there is only one manufacturer. In contrast, intrabrand competition is the competition between the distributors -- wholesale or retail -- of the product of a particular manufacturer.

In Dunn & Mavis, Inc. v. Nu-Car [12] Driveaway, 691 F.2d 241, 243-44 (6th Cir. 1982), we held that HN9[] a complaint which does no more than state commercial disappointment at losing a distribution contract with a manufacturer fails to allege restraint of trade. Specifically, we stated that "since the complaint does not allege facts suggesting that Chrysler's refusal to deal had any significant anti-competitive effect on the market, there is no rule of reason case alleged." 691 F.2d at 245.

Similarly, in Ace Beer Distributors, Inc. v. Kohn, Inc., 318 F.2d 283 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 922, 11 L. Ed. 2d 166, 84 S. Ct. 267 (1963), we held that a complaint which essentially alleged that a brewery substituted one territorially exclusive distributor for another territorially exclusive distributor was insufficient to state a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. In explaining the insufficiency of the complaint, we stated that "there is no allegation or contention that the beer of other breweries was not just as available in that area after the change in distributors as it was before." 318 F.2d at 287 (emphasis supplied).

In Fray Chevrolet Sales, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., we upheld the district court's dismissal [13] of an antitrust claim on a summary judgment motion "because the substitution of one distributor . . . for another . . . does not eliminate or materially diminish the existing competition . . . and, in our opinion, is not an unreasonable restraint of trade." 536 F.2d 683, 686 (quoting Ace Beer, 318 F.2d at 287). The Fray court's reliance on Ace Beer suggests that the substitution of one distributor for another has no necessary effect on competition at the interbrand level. In Fray, we also quoted from B & B Oil & Chemical Co. v. Franklin Oil Corp., 293 F. Supp. 1313, 1317 (E.D. Mich. 1968) in which the district court said that the "'opinions have been unanimous . . . in holding that a manufacturer's changes in his distribution system, vertical realignments, or transfers, do not offend anti-trust laws.'" Ibid.

Other Circuits have adopted similar principles. In Oreck, the Second Circuit held that an agreement between a manufacturer and a distributor "becomes violative of § 1 of the Sherman Act only if it is anticompetitive in purpose or effect -- in sum, it must be tested by the rule of reason." 579 F.2d at 133. The Fifth Circuit held that even if a conspiracy between [14] a supplier and its distributor to eliminate another distributor were proven, the supplier would not have violated the antitrust laws. H & B Equipment Co. v. International Harvester Co., 577 F.2d 239 (5th Cir. 1978). The Fifth Circuit has stated that "a supplier's termination of a distributor or dealer is not [*807] a violation of the antitrust laws as long as interbrand competition acts as a 'significant check on the exploitation of intrabrand market power.'" Muenster Butane, Inc. v. Stewart Co., 651 F.2d 292, 297 (5th Cir. 1981) (quoting Continental T.V., 433 U.S. 36, 52 n. 19, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977) (other citations omitted). The Tenth Circuit held that "the evil to be avoided is . . . not the reduction of intrabrand competition." Westman Commission Co. v. Hobart International, 796 F.2d 1216, 1229 (10th Cir. 1986).

Thus, Sixth Circuit precedent, supported by antitrust law in other Circuits, makes clear that HN10[] a complaint charging restraint of trade based on a manufacturer's substitution of one distributor for another must allege anticompetitive effect at the interbrand level to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion for failure to state a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

IV

Under [15] Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 525, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983), we must assume the truth of the allegations in a complaint when assessing its legal sufficiency. We are also bound by the principle set forth in Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80, 78 S. Ct. 99 (1957), that "in appraising the sufficiency of the complaint we follow, of course, the accepted rule that HN11[] a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief."

At the outset, we state our agreement with the district court that B-E's involvement in any conspiracy to restrain trade is far too remote as alleged in the complaint to warrant serious treatment. The mere fact that Moss had once been a B-E employee does not, as the district court held, mean that B-E played any role in the alleged restraint of trade.

Crane initially maintains on appeal that its complaint stated that BCP and other defendants eliminated all distributors of BCP construction machinery parts, and therefore sufficiently alleged an illegal restraint of trade under [16] Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. However, as we read it, the complaint implies that Crane was the only distributor of BCP construction machinery parts, before being replaced by GPS. (See Complaint, 5-6, para. 19 ("new exclusive distributor for the states of Ohio and West Virginia.")) Indeed, the name of no other distributor appears anywhere in the complaint. The Fifth Circuit has stated that "the law is clear that merely changing from one exclusive distributor to another is permitted." Aladdin Oil Co. v. Texaco, Inc., 603 F.2d 1107, 1117 (5th Cir. 1979).

Crane contends, however, that it had met this Circuit's standard for stating a Section 1 Sherman Anti-Trust Act violation because its complaint alleged the elimination of "all intrabrand competition in [a] two state area." Crane attempts to distinguish the "jilted distributor" precedent of this Circuit by suggesting that its situation involves the elimination of an entire set of distributors, whereas precedent involves the substitution of one distributor for another. Crane essentially suggests that its case involves the elimination of all intrabrand competition, whereas in the other cases the level of intrabrand [17] competition remained the same as before the dealer substitution, since one distributor is simply being substituted for another. However, even if we assume the complaint to state the elimination of a plurality of distributors, and therefore the elimination of intrabrand competition, we hold that the complaint nevertheless fails to allege restraint of trade under Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

By suggesting that alleging the elimination of all intrabrand competition is tantamount to stating anticompetitive effect, Crane implicitly suggests that this Circuit adopt a per se test of illegality under Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act for the situation in which a manufacturer "jilts" all of its distributors, and subsequently awards an exclusive distributorship [*808] for a given product and geographic market to another distributor.

Crane fails to recognize, however, that the Supreme Court has admonished that > HN12[] per se rules of illegality are appropriate only when they relate to conduct that is manifestly anticompetitive. . . . "There are certain agreements or practices which because of their pernicious effect on > competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively [18] presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use."

> Continental T.V., Inc., 433 U.S. at 49-50 (quoting Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514 (1958) (footnote omitted)).

We believe that even the manufacturer's elimination of all distributors with the subsequent awarding of an exclusive distributorship to another distributor falls below the "manifestly anticompetitive" standard enunciated by the Supreme Court, and so accordingly decline Crane's implicit invitation to adopt a per se test of illegality regarding this kind of vertical restraint of trade. We find the "jilted distributor" cases sufficiently broad to accommodate the situation of a manufacturer's elimination of all intrabrand competition on the facts of the case at bar.

Were a per se test of illegality necessarily applied to elimination of all intrabrand competition by a manufacturer, we fear that procompetitive vertical restraints may be seriously deterred. E.g., see Bork, Vertical Restraints: Schwinn Overruled, 1977 Sup.Ct.Rev. 171, 181-82; see also Posner, The Next Step in [19] the Antitrust Treatment of Restricted Distribution: Per Se Legality, 48 U.Chi.L.Rev. 6, 23-26 (1981) (vertical restrictions on intrabrand competition generally should be legal per se). As a result of the exclusive distributorship arrangement with GPS, BCP may be able to increase its ability to compete with other brands of construction machinery parts. Nothing to the contrary is stated, or implied in the complaint.

In Davis-Watkins, 686 F.2d at 1196, we stated that "restraints imposed by a manufacturer or supplier upon its distributors or retailers, so-called 'vertical' restraints, are generally found to be potentially beneficial to interbrand competition." To be sure, the consequence of the establishment of an exclusive distributorship is that a consumer in Ohio and West Virginia must deal with defendant GPS Equipment or not deal at all. However, we do not agree that an exclusive territorial distributorship of the kind alleged in the complaint is necessarily inimical to consumers, or violative of the antitrust laws. See Easterbrook, Vertical Arrangements and the Rule of Reason, 53 Antitrust L.J. 135, 140-53 (1984) (restricting dealerships may increase competitive ability). [20] See also Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 1519, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988) ("the scope of per se illegality should be narrow in the context of vertical restraints.")

Second, Crane vigorously argued on appeal that since "Moss holds an independent personal stake in destroying plaintiff's distributorship as it would profit GPS and him personally and eliminate competition," the decision to terminate Crane had a horizontal element, and thus differed from the classic jilted distributor case which is tested under the rule of reason. In its main brief and supplemental brief, Crane argued that its case was not a jilted distributor case since it involved "a one-half owner and officer of an exclusive territorial distributorship, who is also a high level management official of the manufacturer and franchiser."

In Tunis Brothers Company, Inc. v. Ford Motor Company (Tunis I), 763 F.2d 1482, 1498 (3rd Cir. 1985) [2] the Third Circuit [*809] stated that the duality of position or interest of a manufacturer's employee(s) with its distributor or distributors benefiting from the manufacturer's refusal to deal, may create a situation which is neither purely vertical nor purely horizontal. [21] Tunis I suggested that the Supreme Court in Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984) recognized a critical difference "between accepted supplier actions such as pursuing market strategies, whereby a supplier seeks to compete with other manufacturers by imposing 'reasonable' vertical restraints, and those actions of a supplier taken at the direction of its distributor." 763 F.2d at 1497. The Third Circuit went on to explain that "in the latter situation, the restraint becomes primarily horizontal in nature in that one distributor is seeking to suppress its competition by utilizing the power of a common supplier." Ibid.

---

[2] This case was vacated by the Supreme Court in light of Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corporation, 475 U.S. 574, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986). See Ford Motor Company v. Tunis Brothers Co., Inc., 475 U.S. 1105, 89 L. Ed. 2d 909, 106 S. Ct. 1509 (1986). Tunis I was therefore not available to the district court in the instant case as guidance or authority in ruling on the 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. In Tunis Brothers Company, Inc. v. Ford Motor Company, 823 F.2d 49 (3rd Cir. 1987) (Tunis II), the court held that Matsushita did not require a different result and reaffirmed its original 1985 decision. However, we remain unconvinced that either Tunis I or Tunis II requires a per se test to be applied to the facts as alleged in Crane's complaint.

[22] However, we do not agree that we are required to adopt a per se test of illegality for the situation alleged in Crane's complaint. The mere fact that a manufacturer's employee has an interest in a corporation which, subsequent to elimination of an entire set of distributors, is awarded an exclusive distributorship by the manufacturer, does not necessarily mean that the actions of the manufacturer "were taken at the directions of its distributor," nor does it necessarily mean that the "distributor is seeking to suppress its competition by utilizing the power of a common supplier." Indeed, nothing in Crane's complaint suggests that the decision made by BCP and Moss to terminate Crane's distributorship rights, or any other distributor's rights, and subsequently to award an exclusive distributorship to the newly formed GPS corporation, was anything other than a legitimate business decision made for BCP's economic benefit. The fact that Crane's distributorship rights were permanently terminated by that decision, and that consequentially economic injury occurred to Crane, does not necessarily make a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, even if Moss participated in that [23] decision.

Crane's unsupported allegation that "defendants (sic) actions had no economic justification and were based on a course of self-dealing to eliminate plaintiff as a competitor" (Complaint, 8, para. 30) is insufficient to allege any illicit objective under Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act in any alleged activity among BCP, Moss, Sanford and GPS. While "inherent conflicts of interest and self-dealing [may] permeate the actions undertaken by defendant, Moss," they do not amount to illicit objectives under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, and are remediable by shareholder derivative suits, or other means. In our view, this does not necessarily mean that Moss's actions had anticompetitive effect or purpose, and should therefore be measured under a per se test. Therefore, despite Moss's duality of interest in BCP and GPS, Crane's case should be governed by the rule of reason case principles articulated in previous cases, which require a further allegation of anticompetitive purpose or effect at the interbrand level to state a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act.

Indeed, if illegality of this distributorship arrangement could be made out by alleging that [24] it was not in the manufacturer's best interest, it would seem that every such arrangement could be challenged on the same ground. Courts have no expertise to make such judgments, and certainly antitrust liability cannot be premised on improvident business decisions.

In our view, Crane's complaint does nothing more than suggest the possibility of incidental economic benefit to Moss and Sanford stemming from their ownership interest in GPS. For example, Crane argued on appeal that "all competition concerning [*810] the retail sale of these products was eliminated in Ohio and West Virginia by the chief operating officer of the manufacturer for his own personal gain." Crane, however, overlooks the possibility that the decision to award GPS exclusive distributorship rights may increase BCP's ability to compete with other brands of construction machinery parts, and thus, far from violating the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, would indeed further one of its major purposes, the promotion of interbrand competition to the ultimate benefit of consumers. Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988). "Even though refusals to deal limit intrabrand competition, they are likely [25] to benefit consumers by increasing interbrand rivalry." Hobart International, 796 F.2d at 1227.

What seems obvious from Crane's complaint, and argument on appeal, is that elimination of intrabrand competition by a manufacturer is its sole concern. In our view, the complaint merely alleges that plaintiff as distributor, and for the sake of argument, any other similarly situated distributors, were injured when terminated by BCP from distributing BCP construction machinery parts. Because the complaint neither necessarily alleges anticompetitive effect at the interbrand level, in addition to, or in connection with the elimination of all distributors at the intrabrand level, nor any anticompetitive purpose with respect thereto, it is, in our opinion, indistinguishable from the classic "jilted distributor" case set out in Dunn & Mavis, Ace Beer, and Fray Chevrolet, despite Crane's vigorous argument to the contrary.

The complaint states that "plaintiff has been injured in its business and has already suffered and will suffer substantial damages including the destruction of a majority of its business." The complaint states that "the conspiracy . . . [was] entered into with [26] the purpose and effect of eliminating plaintiff as a competitor and to destroy the business of plaintiff." Absent an allegation of anticompetitive purpose or effect at the interbrand level, we hold that this states nothing more than "commercial disappointment" of the eliminated distributors under Dunn & Mavis. Without an allegation of anticompetitive purpose or effect on the interbrand level, Crane's situation is analogous to Fray Chevrolet where one car dealership was substituted for another, or Ace Beer where one beer distributor was substituted for another. Every distribution choice by a manufacturer could be either a good or bad decision from a business standpoint, but the antitrust laws have never been intended to police such a choice, absent any allegation that such choice is part of a scheme to create monopoly market power by the manufacturer, [3] or which is based on, or causes, anticompetitive effect at the interbrand level.

While Crane relies on paragraph 26 of its complaint, which states that the defendants "engaged in [27] an unlawful combination and conspiracy to restrain and monopolize interstate trade and commerce in violation of 15 U.S.C. Section 1," to support its contention on appeal that it had sufficiently stated the restraint of trade element, we regard that as an unsupported conclusory allegation. "Legal conclusions, deductions or opinions couched as factual allegations are not given a presumption of truthfulness." 2A Moore's Federal Practice para. 12.07 [2.-5] (2d ed. 1987).

Therefore, the judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.

Concur by: WELLFORD

Concur

WELLFORD, Circuit Judge, concurring.

I concur in the result reached and with much of what is said by Judge Boggs. At oral argument, appellant conceded its case was weakest against Bucyrus-Erie ("B-E"), which appeared to be sued because its former employee, appellee Moss, was the alleged principal actor in the conspiracy or scheme to do away with appellant as a distributor. The allegations against B-E otherwise are very vague and general with [*811] respect to its part in the alleged conspiracy. The complaint itself concedes that B-E's association with appellant and with the products which it distributed ended almost a year before appellant was advised that its [28] distributorship was terminated. There is simply an insufficient allegation that B-E engaged in the alleged antitrust conspiracy and there was no error in granting B-E a judgment on the pleadings. Havoco of America Ltd. v. Shell Oil Co., 626 F.2d 549 (7th Cir. 1980).

With respect to GPS Equipment ("GPS"), it is conceded that this defendant corporation did not come into existence until after the termination of Crane. GPS was simply a successor distributor in due course in the territory previously served by appellant, and it was alleged to be an exclusive distributor. In appellant's brief at pages 16 and 17, it is stated with regard to GPS:

> Nowhere in the complaint is it alleged that GPS was formed by defendant BCP. The only allegations in the complaint are that defendant Moss, an employee of BCP and Charles Sanford, not an employee of BCP, are the two shareholders of defendant GPS Equipment . . . . the thrust of plaintiff's complaint is that GPS was not a division or wholly owned subsidiary of BCP, but rather a separate entity set up by defendant Moss and Sanford as part and parcel of the conspiracy to restrain trade.

As a separate and unformed entity at the time of appellant's [29] termination, with no ownership connection with BCP, Northwest, or B-E, there is an insufficient allegation to state a cause of action for antitrust violation against [3] See Posner, The Next Step in the Antitrust Treatment of Restricted Distribution: Per Se Legality, 48 U.Chi.L.Rev. 6, 16 (1981).

GPS. The case was therefore properly dismissed as to GPS which had no being or existence so that it could then conspire with anyone.

This is a case of an alleged reshuffling of a vertical type by substitution of one form of distribution of one particular brand for another form of distribution. The complaint does not allege, even conclusorily, any decrease in intrabrand competition. This issue is raised for the first time in Crane's appellate brief. We need not consider or decide this contention, then, and I see no need to discuss it. Furthermore, appellant did not adequately allege any anticompetitive effect of the substitution of another distribution at the interbrand level. Its allegations state an effect only upon itself as a competitor. Therefore, with respect to the remainder of the defendants, the only element of this controversy that could separate it from the typical "jilted distributorship" kind of case is the injection of Moss into the picture. Unless somehow the existence of Moss converts the alleged restraint [30] of trade into a horizontal type thus rendering it perhaps anticompetitive per se, there is nothing but cursory conclusions of anti-competitive conduct here asserted, and the case must fail. See Ace Beer Distributors v. Kohn, Inc., 318 F.2d 283, 287 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 922, 11 L. Ed. 2d 166, 84 S. Ct. 267 (1963), and Rutman Wine Co. v. E & J Gallo Winery, 829 F.2d 729 (9th Cir. 1987).

Judge Boggs' analysis of this case under the rule of reason approach seems to me correct and appropriate. See Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977). Moss held positions with both B-E and GPS, and at the pertinent time before termination of appellant, had not yet formed GSP. There is no sufficient factual allegation made by appellant that he or any of the defendants acted for reasons apart from economic justification or for illicit horizontal objectives. There was no allegation about illegal price constraints. Appellant's reliance upon Tunis v. Ford Motor Co., 823 F.2d 49 (3d Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1060, 108 S. Ct. 1013, 98 L. Ed. 2d 979 (1988), based upon Moss' alleged "independent personal stake" seems insufficient particularly in light of Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics [31] Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 56 U.S.L.W. 4387, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988), and the general rule that a corporation and its own officers cannot legally conspire.

I, accordingly, join in the affirmance of the dismissal of this action.

End of Document

Bolt v. Halifax Hosp. Medical Ctr.

United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit

August 8, 1988

Nos. 84-3256, 84-3603

Reporter
851 F.2d 1273 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 10795 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,174; 26 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. (Callaghan) 780

Richard A. BOLT and Richard A. Bolt, M.D., Plaintiffs-Appellants, v. HALIFAX HOSPITAL MEDICAL CENTER, et al., Defendants-Appellees

Subsequent History: Vacated December 1, 1988. Rehearing and Rehearing in Banc Granted December 1, 1988.

Prior History: [1] Appeals from the United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida.

Disposition: Affirmed in part, Reversed in part, and Remanded.

Core Terms

conspiracy, medical staff, executive committee, district court, exemption, credentials, privileges, decisions, staff privileges, revoke, directed verdict, supervision, antitrust, grounds, courts, judicial review, recommendation, reappointment, involvement, staff member, peer review, state action, community-wide, conspiring, elevation, Sherman Act, regulation, voted, concerted action, medical society

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN2[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

In order to answer affirmatively the question of whether a contract, combination, or conspiracy existed, there must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the defendants were acting independently.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A hospital and the members of its medical staff are all legally capable of conspiring with one another.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN4[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The Sherman Act does not prohibit states from imposing restraints on competition. This interpretation of the Sherman Act is what is known as the state action doctrine.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN5[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

To ensure that the state action doctrine is used to immunize only those activities that are truly the product of state regulation, a rigorous two-prong test is applied when a private party claims entitlement to the exemption. First, the challenged restraint must be one clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed as state policy. Second, the conduct in question must be "actively supervised" by the state itself.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Facility & Personnel Licensing > Revocation & Suspension

HN6[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

See Fla. Stat. ch. 395.065(1) (1981).

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Facility & Personnel Licensing > Personnel Licensing

HN7[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

Fla. Stat. § 395.0653(3) (1981) requires every licensed hospital to set standards and procedures to be applied by the hospital and its medical staff in considering and acting upon applications for staff membership or professional privileges.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN8[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

Fla. Admin. Code r. 10D-28.56(f) (1981) expressly states that no action shall be taken by the hospital's governing board without prior referral to the medical staff for their recommendation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Peer Review > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Peer Review > Peer Review Statutes

HN9[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The state does not actively supervise the termination of hospital staff privileges unless a state official has and exercises ultimate authority over private privilege determinations. A state official has this kind of authority only if he or she has power to review private peer-review decisions and overturn a decision that fails to accord with state policy.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Peer Review > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN10[] Business Administration & Organization, Peer Review

Fla. Stat. § 458.337(1)(b) (1981) requires notification of the Florida Board of Medical Examiners (Board), a state agency, whenever a physician has been disciplined by a licensed hospital or medical staff of said hospital. Nothing in this provision, however, indicates that the Board has power to overturn a peer review decision.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Peer Review > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN11[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

It is irrelevant that the state of Florida may exercise some form of supervision over the kind of procedures used in conducting peer review; the relevant question is whether the state has authority to overturn the privileges determination itself.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN12[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Judicial review may constitute active state supervision for purposes of the state action exemption.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN13[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Judicial review cannot constitute active state supervision unless it is available on an established basis and is of a sufficiently probing nature. To be sufficiently probing, the scope of judicial review must first of all encompass the fairness of the procedures used in reaching the decision. Furthermore, it must involve consideration of whether the criteria used by the decisionmakers were consistent with state policy and whether the decision had a sufficient basis in fact.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Injunctions

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > Restrictions

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN14[] Equitable Relief, Injunctions

A physician whose staff privileges at a hospital have been revoked has a cause of action for injunctive relief. In articulating the basis for this cause of action, the courts have relied on a contract theory.

Evidence > Privileges > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN15[] Evidence, Privileges

Hospital bylaws are deemed to constitute a promise that termination of staff privileges will be based on fair procedures, valid criteria, and sufficient evidence -- a promise that is enforceable by way of a cause of action for injunctive relief against the hospital.

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN16[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

See Fla. Stat. ch. 395.0653(3) (1981).

Healthcare Law > Business Administration & Organization > Hospital Privileges > General Overview

HN17[] Business Administration & Organization, Hospital Privileges

The Florida Administrative Code provides that the governing authority in fulfilling its responsibility shall be organized under approved written bylaws, rules, and regulations which shall provide for the appointment, reappointment, or dismissal of members of the medical staff, and a procedure for hearing and appeal. Fla. Admin. Code r. 10D-28.56(1)(f) (1981).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN18[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Evidence of conscious parallelism does not permit an inference of conspiracy unless the plaintiff establishes that each defendant that engaged in the parallel action acted contrary to its economic self-interest. What this means is that the plaintiff must establish with respect to each defendant that it would have been unreasonable in a business sense for that defendant to engage in the challenged conduct unless it had assurances from the other defendants that they would take the same action.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Facilities

HN19[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The mere opportunity to conspire among antitrust defendants is insufficient to permit the inference of conspiracy.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Abuse of Discretion

Evidence > Relevance > Exclusion of Relevant Evidence > Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

HN20[] Standards of Review, Abuse of Discretion

Under Fed. R. Evid. 403, relevant evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of confusion of issues or misleading the jury. A trial court's ruling pursuant to rule 403 will not be disturbed absent an abuse of discretion.

Evidence > Relevance > Exclusion of Relevant Evidence > Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

HN21[] Exclusion of Relevant Evidence, Confusion, Prejudice & Waste of Time

The availability of other means of proof should be considered in determining whether evidence should be excluded under Fed. Evid. R. 403. Fed. Evid. R. 403, advisory committee's note.

Counsel: Donald E. Christopher, Orlando, Florida, Clark Havighurst, Duke University School of Law, Durham, North Carolina, Hal K. Litchford, Litchford, Christopher & Milbrath, P.A., Orlando, Florida, Attorneys, for Plaintiffs-Appellants.

Raymond A. Haas, Haas, Boehm, Brown, Orlando, Florida.

J.O. Eubanks, Richard B. Rosier, Smalbien, Eubanks, Johnson, Rosier & Bussey, Daytona Beach, Florida, for Smith.

Ronald Harrop, Gurney & Handley, Orlando, Florida, for Smith/Roberson.

Harold C. Hubka, Atty., Daytona Beach, Florida, Clint Batteron, Atty., David A. Donohoe, Washington, District of Columbia, for Halifax.

McVay Voght, J. Charles Ingram, Hannah, Marsee, Beik & Voght, Orlando, Florida, for Daytona, Humana, Boye, Marino.

James E. Slater, Atty., Orlando, Florida, for Stose.

William E. Loucks, Atty., Daytona Beach, Florida, for Volusia County.

G. Bruce Hill, Janet W. Adams, Adams & Hill, Orlando, Florida, for Ormond Beach Hospt.

Judges: Tjoflat and Kravitch, Circuit Judges, and Tuttle, Senior Circuit Judge.

Opinion by: TJOFLAT

Opinion

[*1275] TJOFLAT, Circuit Judge:

In this case, a physician whose medical staff privileges were revoked at each of three hospitals brought suit against the hospitals, members of their medical [2] staffs, and a local medical society, alleging violations of the federal antitrust laws. The [*1276] district court entered directed verdicts for all the defendants, and the physician now appeals. We affirm in part and reverse in part.

I.

In 1979, Dr. Richard A. Bolt arrived in Daytona Beach, Florida, intending to practice surgery there. Upon his arrival, he applied for staff privileges at three area hospitals, Daytona Community Hospital (DCH), Halifax Hospital Medical Center (HHMC), and Ormond Beach Memorial Hospital (OBMH). DCH is a subsidiary of Humana, Inc., which owns and operates several hospitals throughout the United States. HHMC is operated and funded through a special taxing district of the state of Florida. OBMH is operated as a private, nonprofit organization.

With respect to staff privileges, each hospital's bylaws were essentially the same. Only a physician who had been granted staff privileges could use the hospital's facilities. A physician would receive privileges upon obtaining an "appointment." An appointment lasted for one year; at the end of the year, the physician would be considered for "reappointment" for another one-year term. During the first two appointment terms, [3] the physician would be a probationary member of the medical staff. Then, at the end of the two years, he or she could apply for elevation to active staff membership. When the physician applied for elevation, three outcomes were possible: reappointment and elevation, reappointment for another year without elevation (in which case the physician could apply again for elevation the following year), or denial of reappointment.

The bylaws delineated a specific process for decisions affecting staff privileges, including decisions concerning reappointment and elevation to active staff membership. First, a credentials committee, composed of active staff members, would make a recommendation based on the physician's medical charts and other pertinent information. That recommendation would be taken up by an executive committee, also composed of active staff members. The executive committee would conduct a more extensive investigation and then reach a decision. If the executive committee reached a decision adverse to the physician under consideration, the physician could appeal to a judicial review committee, which had the discretion to conduct its own investigation; like the credentials and executive [4] committees, the judicial review committee would be composed of active staff members. The recommendations that emerged from the various committees would in every case ultimately be considered by the hospital's governing board, which was responsible for reaching the final decision.

In the fall of 1979, DCH, HHMC, and OBMH each granted Dr. Bolt an initial appointment. Dr. Bolt understood that, pursuant to the bylaws of each hospital, he would remain on probationary status until the fall of 1981, at which time he would be considered for elevation to active staff membership. In the fall of 1979, Dr. Bolt also applied for and was granted provisional membership in the Volusia County Medical Society (VCMS), a local professional organization for physicians.

On September 10, 1981, the DCH credentials committee met to consider whether Dr. Bolt should be reappointed and elevated to active staff membership. In its report to the executive committee, the credentials committee recommended that Dr. Bolt's reappointment be conditioned on his agreement to seek psychiatric counseling through the Impaired Physicians Program, a program operated by the Florida Medical Association. On September 22, the executive [5] committee sustained the credentials committee's recommendation, and notified Dr. Bolt that his name had been forwarded to the Impaired Physicians Program. Dr. Bolt immediately responded that he would not participate in the program, and the executive committee thereafter voted to deny reappointment. [1]

[*1277] The day after the DCH executive committee notified Dr. Bolt of its decision to forward his name to the Impaired Physicians Program, the OBMH credentials committee met and voted to recommend that Dr. Bolt be denied reappointment. The OBMH executive committee sustained the credential committee's recommendation on October 27. [2]

[6] Meanwhile, sometime in September, [3] the HHMC credentials committee met and voted to recommend that Dr. Bolt be denied reappointment. The executive committee subsequently voted to sustain the recommendation, and notified Dr. Bolt of its decision on October 13.

Thus, during the months of September and October of 1981, the executive committees at all three hospitals took action against Dr. Bolt. Over the following several months, Dr. Bolt prosecuted appeals at all three hospitals. At HHMC, the judicial review committee found no reason to disagree with the executive committee's decision, and the board of trustees subsequently voted to ratify that decision. At DCH, the judicial review committee did disagree with the executive committee's decision; in fact, it voted to reappoint Dr. Bolt unconditionally. The board of trustees rejected the judicial review committee's decision, however, and ratified the executive committee's decision. Finally, at OBMH, the proceedings before the judicial review committee were still pending at the time Dr. Bolt instituted this suit, and Dr. Bolt has not pursued those proceedings to their conclusion.

In March [7] 1982, Dr. Bolt filed a complaint in the district court containing federal antitrust claims, federal constitutional claims, federal contract claims, and a variety of pendent state law claims. Named as defendants were DCH, [4] [8] HHMC, OBMH, the Volusia County Medical Society, and five physicians: Dr. Richard Boye, Dr. Ralph Marino, Dr. Alvin Smith, Dr. Shedrick Roberson, and Dr. Willis Stose. [5] Each of the individual defendants had played some official role in the privileges decision at one of the hospitals. Dr. Boye, chief of staff at DCH, had served on DCH's credentials and executive committees; he had also served on DCH's board of trustees. Dr. Marino, chief of surgery at DCH, had served on DCH's credentials and executive committees. Dr. Smith, chief of staff at HHMC, had served on HHMC's credentials and executive committees. Dr. Roberson, chief of surgery at HHMC, had served on HHMC's executive committee. Finally, Dr. Stose, chief of surgery at OBMH, had served on OBMH's credentials and executive committees.

---

[1] Apparently, Dr. Bolt's existing appointment was not yet due to expire, and he therefore continued to admit patients to DCH for some time after the executive committee's decision. Subsequently, however, the executive committee voted to suspend Dr. Bolt's privileges for the remainder of the term of his existing appointment.

[2] At the time of the decision, Dr. Bolt's existing appointment at OBMH was apparently not yet due to expire. In addition to denying reappointment, the executive committee summarily suspended Dr. Bolt's privileges for the remainder of the term of his existing appointment.

[3] The record does not reveal the precise date.

[4] Also named as a defendant was Humana, Inc., DCH's parent corporation. When we refer in this opinion to DCH in its capacity as a defendant, we mean both DCH and Humana, Inc.

[5] Also named as defendants were Dr. C.R. DeArmas, Jr. and Dr. Thurman Gillespy, Jr. The district court dismissed Drs. DeArmas and Gillespy before trial, and Dr. Bolt does not challenge that ruling in this appeal.

This appeal concerns only Dr. Bolt's federal antitrust claims; we relegate our discussion of his other claims to the margin. [6] [9] [*1278] As to the antitrust claims, Dr. Bolt alleged that the defendants had conspired, along with unnamed coconspirators, to restrain competition in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 (1982). [7] Specifically, Dr. Bolt alleged the existence of three separate conspiracies: one involving DCH and the members of its medical staff who took part in the DCH peer review decision to revoke his privileges, one involving HHMC and the members of its medical staff who took part in the peer review decision there, and one involving DCH, HHMC, OBMH, [8] the members of their staffs who took part in their peer review decisions, and VCMS.

Before trial, the district court convened a hearing to resolve several pending motions. One of these was a motion by the defendants concerning the order of proof at trial. Noting that a claim under section 1 of the Sherman Act requires proof of (1) a contract, combination, or conspiracy, and (2) restraint on competition, [9] the

---

[6] The federal antitrust claims were contained in count I of the complaint. Count II contained claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1982). Citing several defects in the procedures the defendants used in reaching their decisions to revoke his staff privileges, Dr. Bolt alleged in count II that the defendants had deprived him of his fourteenth amendment rights to due process and equal protection of the laws.

Count III was styled "federal contractual claims." In that count, Dr. Bolt alleged that the three hospitals, as participants in the federal Medicare program, had a contractual obligation to the United States government to comply with certain federal regulations pertaining to peer review procedures. Dr. Bolt alleged that the three hospitals had failed to comply with these regulations and had therefore breached their contractual obligation to the United States government, and that he, as a third party beneficiary, had suffered an actionable harm.

Counts IV through X contained a variety of state law claims. In count IV, Dr. Bolt alleged that when he was first granted probationary privileges by the three hospitals, each hospital implicitly promised that his privileges would be terminated according to the procedures set out in the hospital's bylaws. Each hospital, Dr. Bolt alleged, had breached that promise, and Dr. Bolt requested the court to enter an injunction requiring the hospitals to reinstate his privileges. Count V contained claims for interference with prospective economic advantage. Count VI contained claims under Florida antitrust laws. Count VII contained claims for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Count VIII contained a claim for slander, and counts IX and X each contained a separate claim for libel.

After the parties joined issue, the defendants moved the district court, pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 56, to enter summary judgment on all counts. The court denied summary judgment on the federal antitrust claims and the state law claims. It granted summary judgment on the section 1983 claims, but only insofar as those claims pertained to DCH, VCMS, Dr. Boye, Dr. Marino, and Dr. Stose. As to those defendants, the court held that the requisite state action was missing. As to the section 1983 claims against the remaining defendants -- HHMC, Dr. Smith, and Dr. Roberson -- the court indicated that it would defer ruling on the motion for summary judgment, and would sever the claims so that the parties could proceed to trial on the federal antitrust and state law claims.

The parties thus proceeded to trial. As explained in the text, the district court ordered Dr. Bolt to present his evidence of conspiracy first. After he had done so, the defendants moved the district court for directed verdicts on the federal antitrust claims, and the court granted the motions. The court thereafter granted the pending motions by HHMC, Dr. Smith, and Dr. Roberson for summary judgment on the section 1983 claims. Having thus disposed of all the federal claims, the court dismissed the state law claims without prejudice.

[7] Dr. Bolt also alleged that the defendants had conspired to engage in a monopoly in violation of 15 U.S.C. § 2 (1982). Our discussion of the conspiracy aspect of Dr. Bolt's section 1 claims applies equally to the conspiracy aspect of his section 2 claims.

[8] Although the complaint alleges a conspiracy involving HHMC and members of it medical staff, and another conspiracy involving DCH and members of its medical staff, it does not allege yet another separate conspiracy involving OBMH and members of its medical staff. This may be because the OBMH governing board had not taken final action against Dr. Bolt at the time he instituted this lawsuit. In any event, the OBMH defendants, OBMH and Dr. Stose, are identified in the complaint only as taking part in the larger conspiracy involving all three hospitals, members of their medical staffs, and VCMS.

[9] Section 1 provides as follows:

defendants [10] requested the district court to require Dr. Bolt to present his evidence regarding the "contract, combination, or conspiracy" element first. The defendants urged that this course would be an efficient one; if Dr. Bolt's evidence of concerted action proved insufficient to go to the jury, the district court could enter directed verdicts for the defendants at the close of that evidence, thus saving Dr. Bolt from presenting unnecessarily his evidence of restraint on competition. The district court agreed that this would be an efficient way to proceed, and accordingly ruled that Dr. Bolt would be required to present his evidence of concerted action first.

The defendants also moved the district court to rule prior to trial that any evidence attacking the merits of the staff privileges decisions at the three hospitals would be inadmissible. Dr. Bolt proposed to show, through the testimony of Dr. Edward R. [*1279] Woodward, chairman of the department [11] of surgery at the University of Florida Medical School, that at least some of the hospitals' stated grounds for their actions against him were pretextual. Specifically, Dr. Bolt wished to attack as pretextual those grounds that pertained to specific medical cases in which he had been involved; he informed the court that Dr. Woodward had reviewed the medical files for those cases and was prepared to testify that no legitimate basis existed for the charges leveled against Dr. Bolt. The district court rejected the proffer, ruling that the Woodward testimony would not be admitted.

The case proceeded to trial before a jury. Dr. Bolt put on his evidence of conspiracy first, as required by the district court's pretrial ruling. At the close of this evidence, the defendants moved the court to enter directed verdicts pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 50(a). The court granted the motions, ruling that Dr. Bolt had failed to adduce evidence of a "contract, combination, or conspiracy," within the meaning of section 1 of the Sherman Act, sufficient to take the case to the jury. Dr. Bolt now appeals, attacking the district court's evaluation of the sufficiency of the admitted evidence as well as its exclusion [12] of the proffered Woodward testimony.

II.

In this appeal, we are concerned only with the "contract, combination, or conspiracy" element of Dr. Bolt's section 1 claims; as explained above, the district court based the directed verdicts solely on the perceived deficiency of Dr. Bolt's evidence in that regard. Due to the ordering of proof mandated by the district court, Dr. Bolt had no opportunity to present evidence pertaining to how the defendants' actions restrained competition. Our focus on appeal is therefore a narrow one: With respect to the "contract, combination, or conspiracy" element of Dr. Bolt's section 1 claims, was the evidence -- that which was admitted and that which should have been admitted -- sufficient to take the case to the jury? HN2[] In order for us to answer that question affirmatively, "there must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that [the defendants] were acting independently." Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 1471, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984).

As we have already noted, Dr. Bolt alleged the existence of three separate conspiracies: (1) a conspiracy involving DCH and members of its medical staff, (2) a conspiracy [13] involving HHMC and members of its medical staff, and (3) a conspiracy involving DCH, HHMC, OBMH, members of their medical staffs, and VCMS. For the sake of convenience, we will refer to these alleged conspiracies as the DCH conspiracy, the HHMC conspiracy, and the community-wide conspiracy. In its memorandum order, the district court discussed only the community-wide conspiracy. Since the court entered directed verdicts in favor of all defendants on all of Dr. Bolt's antitrust claims, however, we must assume that the court found the evidence wanting with respect to each of the conspiracies alleged in the complaint. Our task in this appeal, then, is to determine if the evidence regarding any of the three alleged conspiracies was sufficient to allow the case to go to the jury.

After oral argument, we requested the parties to brief an issue they had not addressed in their original briefs: whether the defendants were exempt from federal antitrust liability under the state action doctrine of Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 63 S. Ct. 307, 87 L. Ed. 315 (1943). The parties responded to our request, and we are now

---

HN1[] Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal. . . .

15 U.S.C. § 1 (1982).

prepared to address that issue. [10] Thus, we organize our analysis as follows. [14] We treat each of the alleged conspiracies separately, and ask first whether the defendants identified as coconspirators in the [*1280] particular conspiracy are exempt from antitrust liability under the state action doctrine. If the defendants are not exempt, we proceed to evaluate the evidence pertinent to the conspiracy to determine whether it was sufficient to withstand the motions for directed verdict. We begin with the DCH conspiracy.

A.

The alleged coconspirators in the DCH conspiracy were DCH and the members of its medical staff who took part in the DCH peer review decision to revoke Dr. Bolt's privileges. [11] Preliminarily, we note that the directed verdicts would certainly have been proper if, as a matter of law, the DCH defendants were [15] legally incapable of concerted action within the meaning of section 1 of the Sherman Act. We perceive no basis, however, for holding that the members of a medical staff are legally incapable of conspiring with one another. Each such member practices medicine in his individual capacity; each is a separate economic entity potentially in competition with other physicians. See Weiss v. York Hosp., 745 F.2d 786, 814 (3d Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1060, 105 S. Ct. 1777, 84 L. Ed. 2d 836 (1985); Cooper v. Forsyth County Hosp. Auth. Inc., 789 F.2d 278, 282 (4th Cir.) (Motz, J., concurring), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 972, 107 S. Ct. 474, 93 L. Ed. 2d 418 (1986). Additionally, we perceive no basis for holding that a hospital is legally incapable of conspiring with the members of its medical staff. Relying on the rule that a corporation cannot conspire with its officers and directors, see, e.g., Harvey v. Fearless Farris Wholesale, Inc., 589 F.2d 451, 455 & n. 7 (9th Cir. 1979), some courts have held that a hospital likewise cannot conspire with its medical staff for purposes of section 1 liability. See, e.g., Weiss, 745 F.2d at 815-17; Buckner v. Lower Florida [16] Keys Hosp. Dist., 403 So.2d 1025, 1029 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1981). We find this analogy faulty, and we decline to embrace it. The traditional rule regarding corporations is based on considerations unique to the corporate context. Theoretically, a "conspiracy" involving a corporation and one of its agents would occur every time the agent performs some act in the course of his agency, for such an act is deemed by the law to be an act of the corporation. Thus, the rule that a corporation is incapable of conspiring with its agents is necessary to prevent erosion of the principle that section 1 does not reach unilateral acts. A hospital and the members of its medical staff, in contrast to a corporation and its agents, are legally separate entities, and consequently there is no similar danger that what is in fact unilateral activity will be bootstrapped into a "conspiracy." In sum, then, we hold that HN3[] a hospital and the members of its medical staff are all legally capable of conspiring with one another.

[17] We therefore turn to the question whether the DCH defendants are exempt from antitrust liability under the state action doctrine. DCH is a private hospital. The state action exemption, in its inception, applied only in suits against state officers. See Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 63 S. Ct. 307, 87 L. Ed. 315 (1943). The Supreme Court, however, has come to recognize that the exemption may apply in suits against private parties under some circumstances.

In Parker, a raisin producer filed an action against a California state official to enjoin enforcement of the state's Agricultural Prorate Act, which created a program "to restrict competition among the growers [of raisins] and maintain prices in the distribution of their commodities to packers." Id. at 346, 63 S. Ct. at 311. Recognizing that the state's program was anticompetitive, the Supreme Court nevertheless found no violation of federal antitrust law, concluding that "nothing in the language of the Sherman Act or in its history . . . suggests that its purpose was to restrain a state or its officers from activities directed by its legislature." Id. at 350-51, 63 S. Ct. at 313. Thus, the Court [*1281] interpreted HN4[] the Sherman Act [18] as not prohibiting states from imposing restraints on competition. This interpretation of the Sherman Act is what has become known as the state action doctrine.

---

[10] HHMC raised the state action defense in the district court, but the court deferred ruling on HHMC's motion for summary judgment on that point. We address the issue here in keeping with the principle that we may affirm a district court's ruling on a ground upon which the district court did not rely. The applicability of the state action exemption is a purely legal question. We take judicial notice of the applicable Florida statutes and case law.

[11] Of the DCH staff members who participated in the peer review decision, two are named as defendants in this case: Dr. Boye and Dr. Marino. In this opinion, we sometimes refer to these defendants and DCH collectively as "the DCH defendants."

Although Parker involved a suit against a state official, the Supreme Court subsequently recognized that the state action exemption may also apply in a suit against a private party. See, e.g., Southern Motor Carriers Rate Conference, Inc. v. United States, 471 U.S. 48, 58-59, 105 S. Ct. 1721, 1727, 85 L. Ed. 2d 36 (1985). Since state economic regulation obviously entails regulation of private conduct, the Court has reasoned that the state action exemption would lose much of its force if the federal government or a private litigant could always enforce the Sherman Act against the regulated private parties. At the same time, the Court has recognized that extending the state action doctrine to private parties creates the danger that private parties, by merely invoking "a gauzy cloak of state involvement," California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n v. Midcal Aluminum, 445 U.S. 97, 106, 100 S. Ct. 937, 943, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233 (1980), will attempt to use the doctrine to immunize what are essentially private restraints on competition. HN5[] [19] To ensure that the state action doctrine is used to immunize only those activities that are truly the product of state regulation, the Court has developed a rigorous two-prong test to be applied when a private party claims entitlement to the exemption. First, "the challenged restraint must be 'one clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed as state policy.'" California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n, 445 U.S. at 105, 100 S. Ct. at 943 (quoting City of Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. 389, 410, 98 S. Ct. 1123, 1135, 55 L. Ed. 2d 364 (1978)). Second, the conduct in question "must be 'actively supervised' by the State itself." Id. It is this two-prong test that the DCH defendants must satisfy if their involvement in the DCH conspiracy is to be deemed immune from antitrust liability.

We have little difficulty concluding that Florida law expressed [12] a clearly articulated policy sanctioning the kind of peer review DCH used in reaching its decision to revoke Dr. Bolt's privileges. Fla.Stat. § 395.065(1) (1981) provided that "HN6[] the medical staff of any [licensed hospital] is authorized to suspend, deny, revoke, or curtail the staff privileges of any staff member [20] for good cause." HN7[] Fla.Stat. § 395.0653(3) (1981) required every licensed hospital to "set standards and procedures to be applied by the hospital and its medical staff in considering and acting upon applications for staff membership or professional privileges." (Emphasis added.) HN8[] Fla.Admin.Code Ann. r. 10D-28.56(f) (1981) expressly stated that "no action shall be taken [by the hospital's governing board] without prior referral to the medical staff for their recommendation."

The question whether Florida actively supervised peer review determinations is a somewhat more difficult one. In Patrick v. Burget, 486 U.S. 94, 108 S. Ct. 1658, 1664, 100 L. Ed. 2d 83 (1988), the Supreme Court held that "HN9[] the State does not actively supervise [the termination of hospital staff privileges] unless a state official has and exercises ultimate authority over private privilege determinations." A state official has this kind of authority only if he or she has "power [21] to review private peer-review decisions and overturn a decision that fails to accord with state policy." Id. In support of their assertion that Florida actively supervised peer review determinations, the DCH defendants cite HN10[] Fla.Stat. § 458.337(1)(b) (1981), which required notification of the Florida Board of Medical Examiners, a state agency, whenever a physician "has been disciplined . . . by a licensed hospital or medical staff of said hospital." Nothing in this provision, however, indicates that the Board has power to overturn a peer review decision. The apparent purpose of the notification requirement is to enable the Board to take further [*1282] disciplinary action if it deems such further action appropriate. We have no reason to believe that the Board has ever purported to overturn a private peer review decision. [13] Thus, we must look elsewhere for active state supervision.

[22] A possible supervisory authority is the state judiciary. To date, the Supreme Court has found active state supervision only in cases involving supervision by a state agency, see, e.g., Southern Motor Carriers, or by a state supreme court charged with regulating the professional conduct of the members of its bar. Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350, 97 S. Ct. 2691, 53 L. Ed. 2d 810 (1977). The Court has left open the question whether

---

[12] The state law relevant to our inquiry is that which was in effect when the defendants engaged in the challenged conduct. See Tambone v. Memorial Hosp. for McHenry County, Inc., 825 F.2d 1132, 1134-35 (7th Cir. 1987).

[13] HN11[] It is irrelevant that the state of Florida may have exercised some form of supervision over the kind of procedures DCH used in conducting its peer review; the relevant question is whether the state has authority to overturn the privileges determination itself. Patrick, __ U.S. at __, 108 S. Ct. at 1663.

judicial review in the context of a traditional lawsuit may constitute active state supervision. Patrick, __ U.S. at __, 108 S. Ct. at 1664-65.

We perceive no principled basis for distinguishing traditional judicial review from agency review, however. The purpose of the active state supervision requirement is to ensure that the conduct in question is in fact the product of state regulation. A state may choose to regulate private economic activity through a state agency; it may just as readily choose to regulate such activity through its courts. Indeed, regulation through the judiciary may be more likely to ensure accurate implementation of the state's policy, for courts are especially well suited to divine, interpret, and enforce [23] legislative policy.

To be sure, agency review and judicial review do differ in some respects. For instance, agency review is a creature of express statutory authorization, whereas judicial review may or may not be. Additionally, agency review, unlike traditional judicial review, may be automatic in the sense that the agency may be statutorily obligated to review every decision within its jurisdiction, regardless of whether an aggrieved party has actually lodged a complaint.

Noting these differences, however, does not detract from our conclusion that HN12[] judicial review may constitute active state supervision for purposes of the state action exemption. That judicial review may be provided without express legislative authorization does not make that review any less a form of regulation by the state. It is sufficient if the legislature clearly articulates a policy and then acquiesces in the courts' implementation of that policy. Legislatures undoubtedly presume that courts will enforce the policy they articulate without express direction to do so. Further, that judicial review is not automatic in the sense that it must be triggered by the affirmative act of an aggrieved party does not make [24] the state's supervision any less effective. A legislature may conclude that the most efficient way for the state to achieve its regulatory goals is to review only those cases in which a complaint has been lodged; it may quite legitimately presume that parties who believe they have been injured by conduct inconsistent with state policy will act on their self interest and seek redress for the wrong that has been worked against them. In terms of the state achieving its regulatory goals, then, the global result will likely closely approximate the result that would be reached if the state reviewed each decision as a matter of course.

Of course, HN13[] judicial review cannot constitute active state supervision unless it is available on an established basis and is of a sufficiently probing nature. To be sufficiently probing, the scope of judicial review must first of all encompass the fairness of the procedures used in reaching the decision. Furthermore, it must involve consideration of whether the criteria used by the decisionmakers were consistent with state policy and whether the decision had a sufficient basis in fact. Our review of the Florida case law convinces us that such review is available [25] in the Florida courts.

[*1283] Florida courts have recognized that HN14[] a physician whose staff privileges at a hospital have been revoked has a cause of action for injunctive relief. In articulating the basis for this cause of action, the courts have relied on a contract theory. Florida courts have reasoned that when a physician forms a professional relationship with a hospital, the hospital promises that the relationship will not be terminated unless certain conditions are satisfied, those conditions being expressed, either explicitly or implicitly, in the hospital's bylaws. See, e.g., Margolin v. Morton F. Plant Hosp. Ass'n, 348 So.2d 57, 57 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1977); see also Lawler v. Eugene Wuesthoff Memorial Hosp. Ass'n, 497 So.2d 1261, 1263-64 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1986); Palm Beach-Martin County Medical Center, Inc. v. Panaro, 431 So.2d 1023, 1024-25 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1983). At the time pertinent to our inquiry, DCH's bylaws established, as required by Florida law, [14] procedures for the termination of staff privileges. HN15[] Such bylaws, the case law indicates, are deemed to constitute a promise that termination of staff privileges will be based on fair procedures, valid criteria, and sufficient [26] evidence -- a promise that is enforceable by way of the cause of action for injunctive relief against the hospital. [15] [28] Courts have, for instance, frequently reviewed staff privileges decisions to ascertain whether they were reached by way of fair procedures. See, e.g., Dance v. North Broward Hosp. Dist., 420 So.2d 315 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1982). They have also reviewed the criteria used in reaching the decisions to determine whether those criteria are consistent with state policy. See, e.g., Sarasota County Public Hosp. Bd. v. Shahawy, 408 So.2d 644 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1981); cf. Hackett v. Metropolitan Gen. Hosp., 422 So.2d 986 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1982) (physician's complaint, which alleged that hospital had taken action in violation of statute pertaining to medical staff privileges, stated cause of action). Finally, courts have reviewed the sufficiency of the evidence relied upon by the decisionmakers. See, e.g., North Broward Hosp. Dist. v. Mizell, 148 So.2d 1, 5 (Fla. 1962) (remanding for finding as "proof of facts reasonably requiring suspension"); Horgan v. South Broward Hosp. Dist., 477 So.2d 617, 617 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1985) ("We have reviewed the record and find that [27] it contains competent, substantial evidence to support the administrative action taken."); Dance, 420 So.2d at 316 ("There was adequate evidence upon which to base the permanent suspension."); Shahawy, 408 So.2d at 647 (remanding for finding as to whether the privileges termination decision "was supported [*1284] by competent substantial evidence"). [16]

[14] Fla.Stat. § 395.0653(3) (1981) provided that "HN16[] the governing body of every hospital shall set standards and procedures to be applied by the hospital and its medical staff in considering and acting upon applications for staff membership or professional privileges." HN17[] The Florida Administrative Code provided that "the governing authority in fulfilling its responsibility shall be organized under approved written bylaws, rules and regulations which shall . . . provide for the appointment, reappointment, or dismissal of members of the medical staff, and a procedure for hearing and appeal." Fla.Admin.Code Ann. r. 10D-28.56(1)(f) (1981).

In sum, we find that Florida courts provide judicial review of staff privileges decisions that is sufficiently probing to constitute active state supervision: the courts will review the fairness of the procedures, the validity of the criteria used, and the sufficiency of the evidence. [17] Because the DCH defendants have therefore established both prongs of the state action exemption test, we affirm the directed verdicts for these defendants with respect to their involvement in the DCH conspiracy.

[29] B.

---

[15] Florida courts have recognized this cause of action for injunctive relief even though Fla.Stat. § 395.065(2) (1981) provides that "there shall be no liability on the part of, and no cause of action of any nature shall arise against, any hospital . . . for any action taken in good faith and without malice [in conducting peer review pursuant to Florida law]." One Florida court has explained this apparent inconsistency in the following way:

> Section 395.065(2) expressly concerns itself with "liability," which we construe to mean responsibility for damages proximately resulting from a tort. We also construe the subsequent phrase in the same subsection, "cause of action of any nature," as referring to and limited by the word "liability." Were we to construe this subsection as completely eliminating any cause of action of any nature against a hospital which gave such inadequate notice of the reasons reappointment was not being recommended, but without malice, then any determinative hearing could be held by the hospital with complete immunity, notwithstanding the physician's substantial inability to prepare therefor. Similarly, any arbitrary and capricious, but not malicious action taken upon an application for reappointment would go totally unanswered. Article I, section 21, Florida Constitution, will not tolerate that happening, as it provides: "The courts shall be open to every person for redress of any injury. . . ."

Carida v. Holy Cross Hosp., Inc., 427 So.2d 803, 806 n. 6 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1983).

[16] The standards for reviewing staff privileges decisions are the same for public and private hospitals. Carida v. Holy Cross Hosp., Inc., 427 So.2d 803, 805 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1983); see also Lawler v. Eugene Wuesthoff Memorial Hosp. Ass'n, 497 So.2d 1261, 1264 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App. 1986).

[17] We are confident that this form of review was available at the time Dr. Bolt's privileges were revoked. We acknowledge that some of the Florida cases we have cited were decided after the events in this case occurred. Those cases, however, reinforce or elaborate upon the principles stated in the earlier cases; they do not represent departures from prior law. We note that Dr. Bolt was obviously aware when he filed his complaint in the district court that the cause of action for injunctive relief was cognizable under Florida law. The pendent state claim alleged in count IV of his complaint, see supra note 6, is based on that cause of action.

The HHMC conspiracy is of the same nature as the DCH conspiracy. The alleged coconspirators are HHMC and the members of its staff who participated in the HHMC peer review decision to revoke Dr. Bolt's privileges. [18] The state action exemption applies here for the same reasons that it applies with respect to the DCH defendants' involvement in the DCH conspiracy. [19] Accordingly, we affirm the directed verdicts for the HHMC defendants with respect to their role in this conspiracy.

[30] C.

Finally, we come to the alleged community-wide conspiracy. The alleged coconspirators here are DCH, HHMC, OBMH, the members of their medical staffs who participated in the decisions to revoke Dr. Bolt's staff privileges, and VCMS. Dr. Bolt's allegation is that these defendants conspired to drive him out of the Daytona Beach medical community. Again, we begin with the state action exemption question. VCMS makes no claim to the exemption. We concluded above that the exemption is available to the DCH defendants with respect to their role in the DCH conspiracy, and to the HHMC defendants with respect to their role in the HHMC conspiracy. We reach a different conclusion, however, as to the involvement of these defendants in the community-wide conspiracy. We reach that conclusion based on the defendants' patent inability to establish the first prong of the state action exemption test: clearly, Florida has articulated no policy favoring participation by any of the DCH or HHMC defendants in a multi-hospital scheme to rid a medical community of a particular physician. This reasoning applies equally to the OBMH defendants.

Having concluded that the state action exemption cannot be claimed [31] by any of the defendants with respect to the community-wide [*1285] conspiracy, we turn to the question whether the district court erred in concluding that the evidence of concerted action was insufficient to send the case to the jury. We divide our discussion of the evidence into two parts. First, we discuss the evidence that relates to the alleged involvement of the three hospitals and members of their medical staffs. We then examine separately the evidence that relates to the alleged involvement of VCMS.

1.

a.

The admitted evidence relating to the alleged involvement of the three hospitals and members of their medical staffs can be broken down into three categories: (1) evidence of parallel action, (2) evidence of inter-hospital communication, and (3) direct evidence that the decisionmakers at the three hospitals agreed among themselves to take concerted action to drive Dr. Bolt out of the Daytona Beach medical community.

We have already described the evidence of parallel action. To repeat, during the months of September and October of 1981, the executive committee at each of the three hospitals voted to recommend that Dr. Bolt be denied both elevation to active staff membership and reappointment.

---

[18] Of those members of the HHMC staff who participated in the peer review decision, two are named as defendants in this case: Dr. Smith and Dr. Roberson. In this opinion, we sometimes refer to these defendants and HHMC collectively as "the HHMC defendants."

[19] HHMC is not a private hospital like DCH; rather, it is a "special district" created by the Florida legislature. See 1979 Fla.Laws 577. As such, HHMC may be more akin to a municipality than a private person for purposes of state action exemption analysis. In Town of Hallie v. City of Eau Claire, 471 U.S. 34, 105 S. Ct. 1713, 85 L. Ed. 2d 24 (1985), the Supreme Court held that it is sufficient for a municipality to establish that it acted pursuant to a clearly articulated state policy; unlike a private person, a municipality need not also establish active state supervision. Id. at 46-47, 105 S. Ct. at 1720. Because we conclude that both clear articulation and active state supervision are present in this case, we do not decide whether HHMC should be treated as a municipality rather than a private person. Cf. Hospital Dev. & Serv. Corp. v. North Broward Hosp. Dist., 619 F. Supp. 535 (S.D.Fla. 1985) (Florida special district treated as municipality for purposes of state action exemption analysis).

[32] The evidence of inter-hospital communication logically falls into three subcategories. First, there was evidence that the individual defendants had ample opportunity to communicate among themselves about Dr. Bolt. Each of the individual defendants held staff privileges at more than one of the three hospitals; most of them held staff privileges at all three. Second, there was evidence of actual inter-hospital conversations about Dr. Bolt. For example, Dr. Smith, chief of staff at HHMC, approached Dr. Boye, chief of staff at DCH, in January 1981 and suggested to Dr. Boye that he encourage Dr. Bolt to seek counseling through the Impaired Physicians Program. [20] Third, there was evidence that each hospital's executive committee based its decision, at least in part, on alleged misconduct by Dr. Bolt that occurred at one of the other two hospitals. For example, after the HHMC executive committee voted to revoke Dr. Bolt's privileges, it sent him a letter listing eight grounds for its decision; three of those grounds pertained to incidents that occurred at DCH. And Dr. France, chief of staff at OBMH, told Dr. Bolt that the OBMH executive committee had based its decision solely on incidents [33] that occurred at DCH and HHMC.

Dr. Bolt's testimony was the only evidence offered as direct evidence that the decisionmakers at the three hospitals had agreed among themselves to drive Dr. Bolt out of the Daytona Beach medical community. Dr. Bolt testified that Dr. Marino, chief of surgery at DCH, told him that he, Dr. Marino, had told the DCH credentials committee that Dr. Stose, chief of surgery at OBMH, had told him that "They're going to get rid of [Dr. Bolt] at [HHMC]; therefore, we got to talk about getting rid of him at [OBMH]." Dr. Bolt also testified that Dr. Marino told him that he, Dr. Marino, had told the DCH Credentials Committee "Listen, here's the plan. They're going to get rid of him at [HHMC]. That means we're going to get rid of him at [OBMH] and I think because other [34] two hospitals are going to get rid of him, we've got to seriously think of getting rid of him at [DCH]."

We conclude that this body of admitted evidence was not sufficiently probative of conspiracy to withstand the motions for directed verdicts. With regard to the evidence of conscious parallelism, the rule in this circuit is that HN18[🡅] such evidence does not permit an inference of conspiracy unless the plaintiff establishes that each defendant that engaged in the parallel action acted contrary to its economic self-interest. [*1286] See Pan-Islamic Trade Corp. v. Exxon Corp., 632 F.2d 539, 559 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 927, 102 S. Ct. 427, 70 L. Ed. 2d 236 (1981). [21] What this means is that the plaintiff must establish with respect to each defendant that it would have been unreasonable in a business sense for that defendant to engage in the challenged conduct unless it had assurances from the other defendants that they would take the same action. This record, in its present state, does not contain evidence of this nature.

[35] The evidence of inter-hospital communication is also insufficient to permit an inference of conspiracy. It is well settled that HN19[🡅] the mere opportunity to conspire among antitrust defendants is insufficient to permit the inference of conspiracy. Cooper v. Forsyth County Hosp. Auth. Inc., 789 F.2d 278, 281 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 972, 107 S. Ct. 474, 93 L. Ed. 2d 418 (1986); see also Feldman v. Jackson Memorial Hosp., 571 F. Supp. 1000, 1008 (S.D.Fla. 1983), aff'd, 752 F.2d 647 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1029, 105 S. Ct. 3504, 87 L. Ed. 2d 635 (1985); Oreck Corp. v. Whirlpool Corp., 639 F.2d 75, 79 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1083, 102 S. Ct. 639, 70 L. Ed. 2d 618 (1981). That the defendants may have talked among themselves about Dr. Bolt's difficulties at the various hospitals is also insufficient to permit an inference of conspiracy. Cf. Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 763-64, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 1470-71, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984); Maple Flooring Mfrs. Ass'n v. United States, 268 U.S. 563, 45 S. Ct. 578, 69 L. Ed. 1093 (1925); Cement Mfrs. Protective Ass'n v. United States, 268 U.S. 588, 45 S. Ct. 586, 69 L. Ed. [36] 1104 (1925). The same is true with regard to the evidence that the executive committees may have based their decisions on Dr. Bolt's misconduct at the other hospitals. Such evidence does not permit an inference of conspiracy unless there is some indication that the defendants' actions were attributable to reasons other than legitimate, independent business reasons. [22] The evidence admitted at trial contains no such indication.

[20] Additionally, in December 1981, Dr. Boye appeared in proceedings before the HHMC judicial review committee in connection with its review of the HHMC executive committee's decision to revoke Dr. Bolt's privileges. Dr. Marino, chief of surgery at DCH, also appeared at the proceedings. Dr. Patel, chief of staff at OBMH, testified at the September 10, 1981 meeting of the DCH credentials committee.

[21] In Bonner v. City of Prichard, 661 F.2d 1206, 1209 (11th Cir. 1981) (en banc), this court adopted as binding precedent all decisions of the former Fifth Circuit handed down prior to October 1, 1981.

Finally, the out-of-court statements by Dr. Marino fail to evidence the kind of multi-hospital conspiracy that Dr. Bolt alleges. The statements were properly [37] admitted against Dr. Marino as an admission by a party-opponent. See Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(2). The statements merely established, however, that Dr. Marino told the DCH credentials committee (1) that he was aware that the OBMH executive committee was considering revoking Dr. Bolt's privileges based on what had occurred at HHMC, and (2) that since the other two hospitals were considering revoking or had already revoked Dr. Bolt's privileges, DCH should consider doing the same. At most, these statements evidence that the DCH credentials committee had knowledge of Dr. Bolt's difficulties at the other hospitals and that it may have based its own recommendation at least in part on that information. [23]

In sum, none of the evidence admitted at trial permits an inference of a multi-hospital conspiracy. Viewed in a light most favorable to Dr. Bolt, the evidence merely establishes that decisionmakers at each one of the three hospitals based their decisions at least in part on matters that occurred [38] at the other two hospitals. As we have explained, such evidence by itself does not [*1287] permit an inference of conspiracy. Thus, unless the district court erroneously excluded admissible evidence that is probative of conspiracy, we must affirm the directed verdicts.

b.

Dr. Bolt contends that the district court erred in forbidding him from introducing the testimony of his expert witness, Dr. Woodward. As already noted, Dr. Bolt proposed to use Dr. Woodward's testimony to attack as pretextual some of the grounds upon which the defendants had based their respective decisions. Dr. Bolt's proffer to the district court was as follows. First, he indicated that the evidence showed that all three hospitals had based their individual decisions in part on two incidents, both occurring at DCH, in which Dr. Bolt's medical or professional judgment had been called into question. [24] [40] Dr. Bolt proposed to show that the medical staff at DCH had investigated the incidents and had made certain findings upon which it then based its decision to revoke Dr. Bolt's privileges. He proposed to show that the results of the DCH investigations were subsequently used by the medical staffs at HHMC and OBMH as bases for [39] their own decisions to revoke Dr. Bolt's privileges. Dr. Woodward was prepared to testify that he had reviewed the facts underlying the DCH investigations and had concluded that no reasonable medical practitioner would have reached the conclusions that the DCH investigators reached. [25] By showing that [22] A hospital might have a number of legitimate independent business reasons for disciplining a staff physician based on his or her misconduct at another hospital. For example, a hospital may, under some circumstances, incur tort liability for its failure to screen carefully its professional staff. See, e.g., Elam v. College Park Hosp., 132 Cal.App.3d 332, 340-47, 183 Cal.Rptr. 156, 161-65 (1982). That a hospital failed to take action against a staff member when it knew or should have known of that member's misconduct at another hospital might very well be relevant to this species of liability.

---

[23] Dr. Bolt places unwarranted emphasis on Dr. Marino's use of the word "plan." Placed in context, the reference is to a proposed course of action at DCH, not to some multi-hospital scheme.

[24] It is not clear whether all three executive committees drew up formal lists of charges; if they did, Dr. Bolt did not introduce those documents into evidence. He did introduce a letter he received from the HHMC executive committee in which the committee cited the two DCH incidents as grounds for its own decision. As to the OBMH executive committee, the evidence shows only that it relied on unspecified incidents that occurred at DCH; no evidence was introduced showing that the OBMH executive committee relied specifically on the two DCH incidents in question. Nonetheless, we think that the jury could infer from the evidence before it that the OBMH executive committee did rely on those incidents; the evidence does show that an administrator at OBMH contacted an administrator at DCH and requested information from Dr. Bolt's DCH disciplinary file. Of course, the OBMH defendants will have the opportunity to show, on remand, that they did not rely on DCH incidents, or that the DCH incidents upon which they did rely did not include the two incidents to which Dr. Woodward's testimony pertains.

[25] The first of the two cases involved a patient at DCH named Maribelle Winn. Mrs. Winn died at DCH while under the care of Dr. Smith, Dr. Bolt, and Dr. Smith's medical partner, Dr. Ruben. Soon after Mrs. Winn's death, Dr. Bolt telephoned her surviving daughters and told them that their mother would not have died but for the negligent care she received from Drs. Smith and the findings of the DCH investigations were entirely baseless, and by showing that the decisionmakers at all three hospitals [*1288] had relied on those findings, Dr. Bolt hoped to establish the existence of a conspiracy among the three hospitals and members of their medical staffs.

[41] The defendants objected to the proffered testimony on two grounds. First, they objected on relevancy grounds. They argued that the proffered evidence failed, as a matter of law, to raise an inference of conspiracy. Second, they argued that even if the evidence were relevant, it should be excluded because it would unnecessarily confuse the jurors, who would be forced to consider a cumbersome body of facts pertaining to medical cases lacking a direct relationship to the subject matter of the antitrust litigation. The district court apparently found both these arguments persuasive. [26]

[42] We conclude that the district court erred to the extent its exclusion of the Woodward testimony was based on relevancy grounds. As we explained above, the fact that the defendants relied on reports emanating from the other hospitals, standing alone, does not permit an inference of conspiracy. Reliance on such reports may be supported by entirely legitimate, independent business reasons. [27] An altogether different case is presented, however, if conclusions contained in the reports were so baseless that no reasonable medical practitioner, considering the same set of facts, would have reached those conclusions. In such a case, the party who relied on the reports can no longer readily point to any legitimate, independent business reason for doing so, and a factfinder may infer that the party, along with other parties who similarly relied on the same baseless conclusions, were engaged in a scheme to use the conclusions to achieve a common illicit end. In other words, such evidence would

---

Ruben. This action by Dr. Bolt apparently enraged Dr. Smith; in his deposition, Dr. Smith remarked that he could have "pinned [Dr. Bolt's] ass to the front door with [his] fist."

Some time later, Dr. Schildecker, a pathologist at DCH and a member of the DCH executive committee, conducted an investigation of the Winn death. Dr. Schildecker's conclusion was that Drs. Smith and Ruben had engaged in no wrongdoing. It appeared, therefore, that Dr. Bolt had acted maliciously and unprofessionally when he called the Winn daughters and told them that their mother had died because of negligent treatment by Drs. Smith and Ruben. Dr. Bolt's behavior in connection with the Winn case was apparently used by the executive committee at each hospital (including the executive committee at HHMC, where Dr. Smith was chief of staff) as a ground for revoking Dr. Bolt's privileges. See supra note 24.

Dr. Woodward was prepared to testify, based on his review of the Winn medical file, that the treatment Mrs. Winn received from Drs. Smith and Ruben was in fact so grossly inadequate as to amount to negligent homicide. From this testimony, a factfinder could conclude that the charge leveled against Dr. Bolt in connection with the Winn matter -- that he had acted maliciously and unprofessionally when he telephoned the Winn daughters -- was without foundation.

The second case involved another DCH patient, one Harold Schmidt. Some time after undergoing abdominal surgery, Mr. Schmidt's surgical incision burst open. Alerted to the problem, Dr. Bolt went directly to Mr. Schmidt's room and proceeded to pass retention sutures through the wound, without first giving Mr. Schmidt any form of anesthesia. The Schmidt incident, like the incident involving the Winn death, was apparently used by all three executive committees as a ground for revoking Dr. Bolt's privileges. See supra note 24. Dr. Woodward was prepared to testify, based on his review of the Schmidt medical file, that Dr. Bolt's actions were entirely proper in light of the patient's condition.

[26] The district court apparently believed moreover that Dr. Bolt was precluded, as a matter of law, from attacking the factual basis of any of the grounds upon which the hospitals relied. In the court's view, this would constitute a form of forbidden "de novo review." We are frankly at a loss as to the legal basis for this particular concern. In its memorandum opinion, the court cited Sosa v. Board of Managers of Val Verde Memorial Hosp., 437 F.2d 173 (5th Cir. 1971), as support for its views concerning "de novo review." Sosa involved a physician who sued the board of a state hospital, claiming that the board had violated the due process and equal protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment in denying his application for staff privileges. Reduced to its essentials, the case involved two issues: whether the criteria the board used to judge the plaintiff's application was arbitrary and capricious, and whether the plaintiff had been afforded procedural due process, i.e., notice and a hearing. In the context of this antitrust case, Dr. Bolt is attacking neither the hospitals' procedures nor the substance of the criteria they purported to apply. Sosa is plainly inapposite.

[27] See supra note 22.

"tend[] to exclude the possibility that [the defendants] were acting independently." Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1471.

That the hospitals additionally relied [43] on other, unrelated grounds for their decisions does not change our analysis. The inference of concerted action remains. It might well be expected that coconspirators would take steps to obscure the direct outlines of their complicity; one way to do that would be for each to supplement the pretextual grounds upon which all relied with other, unrelated grounds. Indeed, if Dr. Bolt can establish that the common grounds were pretextual, evidence that the other, unrelated grounds were themselves baseless may also be probative of conspiracy. [28]

We recognize that the trial court may have based its exclusion of the Woodward testimony on the alternative ground that the testimony would unnecessarily confuse the jurors. HN20[] Under Fed.R.Evid. 403, relevant evidence "may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of . . . confusion of issues[] or misleading the jury." A trial court's ruling pursuant to Rule 403 [44] will not be disturbed absent an abuse of discretion. See Hendrix v. Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., 776 F.2d 1492, 1501 (11th Cir. 1985). Assuming that the district court relied on Rule 403 as [*1289] a basis for its ruling, we find such an abuse here.

First, as the preceding discussion shows, the trial judge misunderstood the legal import of the proffered evidence; in his mind, the evidence had no probative value as a matter of law. Laboring under this misapprehension, the judge obviously could not have made a sound judgment whether the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of jury confusion.

Even if the judge had appreciated the legal import of the evidence, we would still conclude that exclusion under Rule 403 was improper. The advisory committee notes to Rule 403 suggest that HN21[] the "availability of other means of proof" should be considered in determining whether evidence should be excluded under the rule. It is highly unlikely that Dr. Bolt can prove pretext, and thus conspiracy, other than by way of the route he proposes; antitrust conspiracies are nearly always proved through circumstantial evidence. Other courts have found an abuse of discretion where [45] the probative value of the excluded evidence is high and no other evidence is reasonably available to prove an essential element of a claim or defense. See, e.g., Breidor v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 722 F.2d 1134, 1140-41 (3d Cir. 1983). We similarly find an abuse of discretion here. We are confident that any danger of jury confusion can be avoided by proper limiting instructions. See Fed.R.Evid. 105.

2.

The evidence relating to the alleged involvement of the Volusia County Medical Society in the community-wide conspiracy was as follows. VCMS was a local professional organization which published a periodical known as The Stethoscope. The December 1981 edition of this periodical contained an article, authored by the society's president, entitled "The Problem Physician." The article mentioned no particular physician by name, but discussed generally the problems associated with physicians whose abrasive personalities disrupt the delivery of medical care in the hospital context.

In his brief, Dr. Bolt describes the Stethoscope article as a clarion call to all physicians to band together to drive him out of the Daytona Beach medical community. Thus, the Volusia County Medical [46] Society, through its publication, allegedly became an active ringleader in the community-wide conspiracy.

We agree with the district court that this evidence is insufficient to permit the inference that the Volusia County Medical Society engaged in concerted action with the other defendants. First, Dr. Bolt's evidence failed to show that the article was directed at him in particular; his conclusion that the author wrote the article with him in mind is pure speculation. More importantly, the supposed "clarion call" was published in December of 1981 -- after the executive

---

[28] We note that the OBMH governing board has apparently yet to take final action against Dr. Bolt. On remand, evidence that no such action has been taken at OBMH would be probative of whether the OBMH defendants participated in the community-wide conspiracy.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -EndFootnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - committees at the three hospitals had already taken action against Dr. Bolt. The evidence of that the Volusia County Medical Society played any part in the community-wide conspiracy was plainly insufficient to withstand the motion for directed verdict.

III.

To summarize, we affirm the directed verdicts in favor of the DCH defendants with respect to their involvement in the DCH conspiracy, and in favor of the HHMC defendants with respect to their involvement in the HHMC conspiracy. We hold, however, that the district court erred in directing verdicts in favor of the DCH defendants, the HHMC defendants, and the OBMH [47] defendants with respect to their involvement in the community-wide conspiracy. We affirm the directed verdict in favor of VCMS.

We do not hesitate to say that the district court's handling of this case was unfortunate. The better course would have been to defer ruling on the motions for directed verdicts until after Dr. Bolt had presented his entire section 1 case. In their briefs, the defendants vigorously argue that Dr. Bolt must prove, as part of his section 1 case, that their actions actually [*1290] restrained competition; they contend that the directed verdicts were proper because the evidence adduced at trial is wholly deficient in this regard. Whatever the theoretical merits of their legal arguments, the fact remains that the district court entered the directed verdicts before Dr. Bolt reached that part of his case involving restraint on competition. We reiterate that our focus in this appeal has been a narrow one: whether Dr. Bolt's evidence with respect to the "contract, combination, or conspiracy" element of his section 1 claims was sufficient to withstand the motion for directed verdicts. Other potential legal issues in this case are better left for resolution on the basis of [48] a more fully developed record.

AFFIRMED in part, REVERSED in part, and REMANDED.

Colonial Penn Group, Inc. v. American Asso. of Retired Persons

United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania

August 8, 1988, Decided ; August 8, 1988, Filed

Civil Action No. 83-4911

Reporter

698 F. Supp. 69 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8745 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,354

COLONIAL PENN GROUP, INC., Plaintiff, v. AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF RETIRED PERSONS and OLSON-TRAVELWORLD, LTD., Defendants

Core Terms

advertising, relevant market, anticompetitive, competitor, alleges, products, travel, compete, antitrust, endorsed, essential facilities doctrine, monopolization, homeowners

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A § 1 Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, action requires proof of four elements: (1) an unlawful, (2) contract, combination, or conspiracy, (3) that produces adverse, anticompetitive effects within the relevant market, and (4) that proximately causes plaintiff's injuries. Generally, plaintiff must prove the challenged activity has an anticompetitive effect; however, certain categories of conduct that unjustifiably restrict competition are per se unlawful. The most obvious example is price fixing. The Supreme Court has cautioned against a knee-jerk announcement of a per se rule prohibiting an activity in favor of a threshold determination of whether the challenged activity is likely to have anticompetitive effects.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN2[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Under the so-called "essential facilities doctrine," plaintiff must prove four elements: (1) existence of a facility whose use is essential to market entry; (2) duplication of the facility is not practicable; (3) access to the facility can be provided without interfering with the use by plaintiff's competitor and (4) existence of an agreement between the facility owner and plaintiff's competitor that prevents equitable sharing.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

HN3[] Sherman Act, Claims

For a § 1 Sherman Act claim, there must be proof of a conspiracy to restrain trade; a unilateral decision to deny access does not violate § 1. This is necessarily so since a monopolist may deal with whomever it pleases provided it has no purpose to restrain trade or further its own interests in the relevant market, and even where it has an interest, it may establish a business justification for its actions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN4[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A facility is only essential where it is vital to competitive viability, i.e., competitors can not effectively compete in the relevant market without it.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN5[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

An owner of an essential facility normally has an unfettered right to refuse to deal with anyone except when it has an economic interest in the relevant market or otherwise limits access for anticompetitive reasons and it has little business justification for its conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

It is the impact upon competition, not a particular competitor that the antitrust laws are designed to protect.

Counsel: [1] Patrick T. Ryan, Esq., John Chesney, Esq., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Mary E. Kohart, Esq., for Plaintiff.

For AARP, by: Arthur H. Kahn, Esq., Schnader, Harrison, Segal Lewis, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, by: James P. Mercurio, Esq., Arent, Fox, Kintner, Plotkin, Kahn, Washington, District of Columbia.

For Olson-Travelworld, Ltd., By: Deborah F. Cohen, Esq., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Frank R. Krok, Esq., Oak Brook, Illinois.

Judges: J. William Ditter, Jr., United States District Judge.

Opinion by: DITTER, JR.

Opinion

[*71] MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

J. WILLIAM DITTER, JR., UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

In this case, the publisher of several magazines targeted to older persons has refused to accept plaintiff's advertising and, instead, has accepted advertising by plaintiff's rivals. This antitrust action against the publisher and plaintiff's rivals followed.

With the parties consent, I am treating the motion of defendant-publisher, American Association of Retired Persons ("AARP"), for sanctions (document #10) as a motion to dismiss plaintiff's antitrust claims. In response to the motion, plaintiff, Colonial Penn Group, Inc., has identified its antitrust claims as being for: (1) a concerted refusal to deal under section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1; (2) an attempted monopolization in violation of section 2 of the Sherman [2] Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2; and (3) monopolization in violation of section 2.

Accepting as true the allegations in the complaint, I conclude that plaintiff's antitrust claims as pleaded are sufficient to survive the motion to dismiss. As I will explain more fully, however, a critical inquiry central to each claim is whether advertising in the AARP publications is essential to competition in the relevant markets for plaintiff's products [1] and whether AARP's alleged refusal to permit plaintiff to advertise in its publications has an anticompetitive effect in these markets. These questions require a determination of the relevant markets, defendants' actual or prospective power in the relevant markets, and whether advertising in the AARP publications is vital to competition in a particular market as contrasted with being merely advantageous to plaintiff's business. While plaintiff has alleged the proper elements, I am skeptical of its ability to make a prima facie evidentiary showing to support these allegations. Accordingly, I will order the parties to complete discovery on the issues identified in this opinion. If appropriate, defendant may then move for summary judgment.

[3] Colonial Penn alleges that AARP, Olson-Travelworld, Inc., and Hartford Insurance Company have conspired to restrain competition for travel services and homeowners and automobile insurance in the relevant markets in this way: AARP publishes three magazines or newsletters ("AARP publications") for its members, who have grown to represent a significant portion of the over-fifty age group. Prior to 1979, AARP only allowed advertising in the publications for products or services that it [*72] endorsed. During this period, AARP endorsed the services of Colonial Penn or its related companies for travel and homeowners insurance programs designed to meet the needs of AARP members. In 1979, AARP changed its policy and permitted general advertising except for products it still

---

[1] Plaintiff alleges that the relevant products are travel services and homeowners and automobile insurance and that the relevant markets for these products are for persons over the age of fifty. In addition, plaintiff further attempts to limit these markets to AARP members. As plaintiff points out, determination of the relevant market, as there can be only one relevant market for each product, is a fact-specific question focusing on the cross-elasticity of demand for plaintiff's products and their reasonable substitutes. See, e.g., United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966). Moreover, plaintiff, to show that AARP members comprise a discrete market segment, must show distinguishing characteristics of AARP members from the broader population of persons over the age of fifty. Merely defining the relevant market by the readership of the AARP publications without further distinction is plainly insufficient and an exercise in circular reasoning; i.e., defining a market merely by a publication's readership begs the question of whether that publication is an essential facility. In any event, as this is a fact question, this opinion will speak generically in terms of the "relevant market."

endorsed, which included travel services, as well as homeowners and automobile insurance. Unfortunately, from Colonial Penn's perspective, AARP endorsed the programs of defendant Olson-Travelworld, Inc. and Hartford Insurance Company for those services. Consequently, Colonial Penn argues that defendants' actions and the exclusion of the advertisements for its travel services, homeowners, and automobile insurance programs from [4] the AARP publications violates the antitrust laws. In addition, plaintiff, in an effort to add a horizontal nature to the alleged conspiracy, asserts that AARP competes in the markets for travel and insurance products along with Colonial Penn, Olsen, and Hartford because it receives from Olson and Hartford a percentage of revenues and premiums on the endorsed products.

A. Section 1 claims

Plaintiff alleges that AARP, Olson, and Hartford have conspired to restrain trade by refusing it access to advertising space in the AARP publications, access which is essential to effective competition in the sale of insurance and travel programs in the relevant markets. Plaintiff argues that its section 1 claim should be analyzed under both a per se and a rule of reason approach.

HN1[] A section 1 action requires proof of four elements: (1) an unlawful, (2) contract, combination, or conspiracy, (3) that produces adverse, anticompetitive effects within the relevant market, and (4) that proximately causes plaintiff's injuries. E.g., Arnold Pontiac v. GMC, 786 F.2d 564 (3d Cir. 1986). Generally, plaintiff must prove the challenged activity has an anticompetitive effect; however, certain [5] categories of conduct that unjustifiably restrict competition are per se unlawful. The most obvious example is price fixing. The Supreme Court has cautioned against a knee-jerk announcement of a per se rule prohibiting an activity in favor of a threshold determination of whether the challenged activity is likely to have anticompetitive effects. Business Electronics v. Sharp Electronics, 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988); Northwest Wholesale Stationers v. Pacific Stationery, 472 U.S. 284, 105 S. Ct. 2613, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1985); see also Seaboard Supply Co. v. Congoleum Corp., 770 F.2d 367 (3d Cir. 1985) (per se approach only applicable to "classic boycotts," i.e., concerted action designed to exclude a person or group from a market or to accomplish some anticompetitive effect).

In Northwest Wholesale, the Court examined the actions of a wholesale cooperative to expel members from the cooperative and held that such conduct is not the type that is likely to have an anticompetitive effect unless "the cooperative possesses market power or exclusive access to an element essential to effective competition." Northwest Wholesale, 105 S. Ct. at 2621. Here, plaintiff [6] alleges that advertising in the AARP publications is necessary to compete in the relevant markets for travel services and homeowners insurance. HN2[] Under the so-called "essential facilities doctrine," plaintiff must prove four elements: (1) existence of a facility whose use is essential to market entry; (2) duplication of the facility is not practicable; (3) access to the facility can be provided without interfering with the use by plaintiff's competitor and (4) existence of an agreement between the facility owner and plaintiff's competitor that prevents equitable sharing. Hecht v. Pro-Football, 187 U.S. App. D.C. 73, 570 F.2d 982, 992-93 (1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 956, 57 L. Ed. 2d 1121, 98 S. Ct. 3069 (1978); Century Air Freight v. American Airlines, 597 F. Supp. 564 (S.D.N.Y.), [2] aff'd, [*73] 738 F.2d 418 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1073, 83 L. Ed. 2d 507, 105 S. Ct. 566 (1984).

---

[2] Case law indicates that satisfaction of the essential facilities doctrine leads to per se liability under section 1, see, e.g., Hecht, 570 F.2d at 993 n.45, primarily because foreclosure of essential access to a market a fortiorari leads to an anticompetitive effect. It is clear, however, that HN3[] for a section 1 claim, there must be proof of a conspiracy to restrain trade; a unilateral decision to deny access does not violate section 1. This is necessarily so since a monopolist may deal with whomever it pleases provided it has no purpose to restrain trade or further its own interests in the relevant market, e.g., Official Airline Guides v. FTC, 630 F.2d 920, 927 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 917, 67 L. Ed. 2d 343, 101 S. Ct. 1362 (1981), and even where it has an interest, it may establish a business justification for its actions. See Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 2858, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985); P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law, para. 736.2f (Supp. 1986). Here, plaintiff alleges both a conspiracy among AARP, Olson, and Hartford and that AARP has an interest in the relevant markets by virtue of its agreements with Olson and Hartford thus raising per se liability. Resolution of these questions, however, requires further factual development.

[7] HN4[]

A facility is only essential where it is vital to competitive viability, i.e., competitors can not effectively compete in the relevant market without it. Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 89 L. Ed. 2013, 65 S. Ct. 1416 (1945) (competition in certain regions seriously restrained where potential competitors of AP members not permitted to buy news from AP); Home Placement Service, Inc. v. Providence Journal, 682 F.2d 274 (1st Cir. 1982) (advertisements in classified section of largest regional newspaper essential to compete in the rental referral services market), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1028, 75 L. Ed. 2d 500, 103 S. Ct. 1279 (1983). See generally, P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law, para. 736.2b (Supp. 1986) (facility is not essential if plaintiff can effectively compete without it). Thus, critical to this inquiry is the definition of the relevant markets, whether advertising in the AARP publications is necessary to compete effectively in those markets, and whether this facility can be duplicated.

Plaintiff alleges that advertising in the AARP publications is the only effective means to market its products to persons over the age of fifty, or the more discrete market of AARP members, and that advertising is necessary [8] to compete in the relevant markets thus raising the essential facilities doctrine. Amended Complaint § 23(c). AARP contends that there are other means of advertising to and reaching the relevant markets and that its refusal to accept plaintiff's advertising has no anticompetitive effect because defendants do not possess any power in these markets. See generally, Areeda & Hovenkamp, supra, at 736.2d. These arguments, while appealing, raise factual questions appropriate for a jury to consider, or if no material facts are in dispute, for disposition by a motion for summary judgment.

Plaintiff also seems to allege per se liability under a classic group boycott or refusal to deal among competitors theory. As a preliminary matter, it is unlikely that AARP is a competitor of either Olson or Hartford simply by virtue of its agreements to endorse their products and to share a percentage of their revenues or premiums. Moreover, plaintiff has not alleged that AARP was a potential competitor or entrant into either relevant market so that its agreements with Olson and Hartford could have restricted competition by eliminating a competitor from the field. In any event, in the absence [9] of proof of the essential facilities doctrine, defendants' conduct is not the type likely to have an anticompetitive effect, Northwest Wholesale, supra; and accordingly, should be judged under the rule of reason under which plaintiff must show an adverse effect on competition in the market. Garshman v. Universal Resources Holding Inc., 824 F.2d 223, 231 (3d Cir. 1987).

B. Section 2 claims

Plaintiff's section 2 claims are a further assertion of the essential facilities doctrine shrouded in monopoly terms rather than those of conspiracy. Plaintiff alleges that AARP has monopolized an essential facility, advertising, and that it has monopolized or attempted to monopolize the relevant markets for travel and insurance products by refusing access to this facility.

See Otter Tail Power Co. v. United States, 410 U.S. 366, 377-79, 35 L. Ed. 2d 359, 93 S. Ct. 1022 (1973); MCI Communications Corp. v. American Telephone [*74] & Telegraph Co., 708 F.2d 1081, 1133 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 891, 78 L. Ed. 2d 226, 104 S. Ct. 234 (1983). HN5[] An owner of an essential facility normally has an unfettered right to refuse to deal with anyone except when, as alleged here, it has an economic interest in the relevant market or otherwise limits access [10] for anticompetitive reasons and it has little business justification [3] for its conduct. See, e.g., Home Placement Service, Inc. v. Provident Journal Co., supra; Official

---

[3] Professors Areeda and Hovenkamp have theorized that in a monopoly situation, compulsory dealing, while not favored generally, would not ordinarily restrict desirable activities where the integration of two facilities involved a "no benefit" integration. P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law, para. 1736.(2f) (Supp. 1986).

Aptly, they illustrate a "no benefit" integration by "a monopoly newspaper that happens to own one of a town's two department stores and that refuses to accept advertising from the rival store . . . . Requiring the newspaper to publish the rival's ads . . . would not reduce the incentives of [ ] [the monopolist] with respect to newspapers . . . ." Id. at p. 528. In their illustration, it is

Airline Guides v. FTC, 630 F.2d 920 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 917, 67 L. Ed. 2d 343, 101 S. Ct. 1362 (1981).

As emphasized [11] by AARP, HN6[] it is the impact upon competition, not a particular competitor such as plaintiff, that the antitrust laws are designed to protect. Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977). Plaintiff alleges that defendants' actions have the necessary adverse impact on competition. I must accept this as true despite my skepticism as to plaintiff's portrayal of AARP's overwhelming power, domination, and control over advertising to the relevant markets. I will, however, order the parties to undertake discovery on the elements identified in this memorandum particularly the relevant markets, whether plaintiff can satisfy the elements of the essential facilities doctrine, and whether AARP possesses a monopoly over advertising to the relevant markets. If the evidence does not support plaintiff's allegations on these facts, summary judgment will be appropriate.

ORDER

AND NOW, this 8th day of August, 1988, upon consideration of the motion of American Association of Retired Persons for sanctions, which I am treating as a motion to dismiss with the parties' consent, the motion is denied for the reasons set forth in the accompanying memorandum. It is further ordered that a [12] phone conference, initiated by counsel for plaintiff, shall be held on Thursday, August 18, 1988, at 9:30 a.m., to discuss discovery deadlines and plaintiff's motion for expedited discovery.

End of Document

---

clear that the refusal to permit advertising by the rival store inhibits competition since there are only two stores in the market and the newspaper monopolizes advertising access.

Sandcrest Outpatient Services, P.A. v. Cumberland County Hospital System, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit

June 8, 1988, Argued ; August 10, 1988, Decided

No. 87-1713

Reporter
853 F.2d 1139 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 11031 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,184; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 3d (Callaghan) 1476; 1988 WL 82194

SANDCREST OUTPATIENT SERVICES, P.A., Plaintiff-Appellant v. CUMBERLAND COUNTY HOSPITAL SYSTEM, INC.; SUNHEALTH MANAGEMENT CORPORATION; JOHN BRIGGS; FRANKLIN CLARK; WAYNE WHETSELL; DOUG HENLEY; PERRY HARMON; TOM MCCUTHCHESON, Defendants-Appellees

Subsequent History: Petition for Rehearing and Suggestion for Rehearing In Banc Denied September 15, 1988.

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina, at Fayetteville. Terrence W. Boyle, District Judge. CA-86-95-3.

Core Terms

local government, board of trustees, ad hoc committee, district court, immunity, by-laws, Staff, medical staff, damages, official capacity, emergency room, Antitrust, discovery, renewed, appointed, injunctive relief, employees, recommend, argues, entitled to immunity, government official, motion to amend, supervision, conspiracy, amend, summary judgment motion, grant summary judgment, summary judgment, antitrust suit, damage suit

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Governments > Local Governments > Employees & Officials

HN1[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 35(a).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Governments > Local Governments > Claims By & Against

Governments > Local Governments > Employees & Officials

HN2[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 36(a).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

HN3[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

In determining whether anticompetitive conduct engaged in by private parties should be entitled to immunity, the United States Supreme Court has held that the challenged restraint must be one "clearly articulated" and affirmatively expressed as state policy, and the anticompetitive conduct must be "actively supervised" by the state itself.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

HN4[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

To satisfy the "clear articulation" requirement of the state action test it is sufficient if the provisions in question plainly show that the legislature contemplated the kind of action complained of.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

HN5[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

To satisfy the active supervision prong of the test, it is necessary only for the state to exercise ultimate control over the challenged anticompetitive conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Governments > Local Governments > Duties & Powers

Governments > Local Governments > Employees & Officials

HN6[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

An affirmative grant of explicit authority is not required for an employee or government official to be acting in an official capacity under the Local Government Antitrust Act of 1984, 15 U.S.C.S. § 34 et seq.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

HN7[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

The phrase "acting in an official capacity" includes those lawful actions, undertaken in the course of a defendant's performance of his duties, that reasonably can be construed to be within the scope of his duties and consistent with the general responsibilities and objectives of his position.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

Governments > Local Governments > Duties & Powers

Governments > Local Governments > Employees & Officials

HN8[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

The standards for determining whether a defendant acted in an official capacity, or were directed by government officials or employees acting in an official capacity, are objective ones. These standards do not include a consideration of the defendant's intentions. The court considers only the objective questions: (i) whether, in light of the authority invested in a local government, its officials or employees, the actions complained of are lawful and taken within the scope of their authority; or (ii) whether, if the defendant is not a local government official or employee, the actions are directed by a local government or one of its officials or employees acting within the scope of his authority.

Civil Procedure > Sanctions > Baseless Filings > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > Leave of Court

HN9[] Sanctions, Baseless Filings

Denial of leave to amend a complaint must be based on a showing of prejudice, bad faith, futility, or dilatoriness associated with the motion.

Counsel: Elizabeth Fairbank Kuniholm (John R. Edwards, Marian R. Hill, Tharrington, Smith & Hargrove, on brief) for Appellant.

Michael Terry Medford (Howard E. Manning, Manning, Fulton & Skinner, on brief); John Gilbert Shaw (Clark, Shaw, Clark, Lingle & Anderson, J. Phil Carlton, David W. Long, Susan Kelly Nichols, Poyner & Spruill; John Huske Anderson, James G. Billings, Robin K. Vinson, Smith, Anderson, Blount, Dorsett, Mitchell & Jernigan; Richard T. Boyette, Theodore B. Smyth, Patterson, Dilthey, Clay, Cranfill, Sumner & Hartzog, on brief) for Appellees.

Judges: Powell, Associate Justice (Retired), United States Supreme Court, sitting by designation; Wilkinson, Circuit Judge, and Butzner, Senior Circuit Judge.

Opinion by: POWELL

Opinion

[*1140] POWELL, Associate Justice:

The issue presented is whether the district court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of appellees on the question whether they were entitled to immunity from damages pursuant to the Local Government Antitrust Act of 1984. We also consider whether it was improper for the district court to [2] have stayed all discovery, and whether the district court abused its discretion in denying appellant leave to amend its complaint to seek injunctive relief. We affirm the district court in all respects.

[*1141] I

Appellant, Sandcrest Outpatient Services, P.A. ("Sandcrest"), is a professional association of emergency room physicians that, from March 1, 1981 until February 28, 1986, provided physician services for the emergency room at Cape Fear Valley Medical Center (the "Medical Center"), a county hospital owned and operated by appellee Cumberland County Hospital System, Inc. ("Hospital System"). [1] The Hospital System is a nonprofit corporation that was created, pursuant to North Carolina law, to act as an agency and instrumentality of Cumberland County in operating county-owned hospitals. See N.C. Gen. Stat. § 131-90, et seq. (1981 ed.) (currently codified, as amended, N.C. Gen. Stat. § 131E-1, et seq. (1986)). On December 11, 1985, John Plyler, the director of the Medical Center and the representative of SunHealth Management Corporation ("SunHealth") - a corporation that had managed the Medical Center since the fall of 1985 - announced at an executive session of the hospital's [3] Board of Trustees that the Sandcrest contract would not be renewed when it expired on February 28, 1986. A discussion followed, and the next day Plyler informed Sandcrest that its contract would not be renewed. On January 20, 1986, in response to the presentation of a petition signed by 25% of the active medical staff, Dr. Briggs, the Chief of Staff of the Medical Center and a member of the Board of Trustees of the Hospital System, called a special meeting of the medical staff as required by the Medical Staff Bylaws. At the meeting, Briggs explained that the Sandcrest contract would not be renewed and that several emergency room groups had submitted proposals. He advised that an ad hoc committee of staff physicians had been appointed to examine the various bids that had been submitted.

On January 22, 1986, two days after the staff meeting, the hospital executed an agreement with Coastal Emergency Services, [4] Inc. for the provision of emergency room services for three years, commencing March 1, 1986. On November 10, 1986, Sandcrest filed this action alleging that appellees -- the Hospital System, SunHealth, Dr. Briggs and the members of the ad hoc committee -- had violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 75-1 of the North Carolina Unfair And Deceptive Trade Practices Act by engaging in a conspiracy to restrain trade. Specifically, appellant alleged that appellees engaged in a group boycott against it, and that they refused to deal with it as part of a conspiracy to prevent the renewal of its contract to provide physician services to the emergency room at the Medical Center. Sandcrest's complaint sought damages and reasonable attorney's fees and costs.

Appellees filed motions to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(1) and (6), asserting that the complaint failed to allege a sufficient nexus between the alleged conspiracy and its impact on interstate commerce. Sandcrest filed a motion to amend the complaint to add additional allegations regarding a nexus with, and effect on, interstate commerce. Appellees subsequently filed a joint motion for summary judgment asserting, inter alia, [5] immunity from suit pursuant to the Local Government Antitrust Act of 1984. On May 6, 1987, in response to a motion by appellees, the district court ordered a stay of all discovery. On July 10, 1987, the court denied appellant's request for limited relief from the stay order. On July 24, 1987, appellant filed a second motion to amend the complaint, seeking to add claims for injunctive relief against all appellees.

On September 3, 1987, the district court allowed appellant's first motion to amend the complaint, granted summary judgment in favor of all defendants on the ground that the appellees were entitled to immunity under the Local Government Antitrust Act, denied appellant's second motion to amend the complaint, and dismissed appellant's pendent state claim. This appeal followed.

[*1142] II

Congress enacted the Local Government Antitrust Act of 1984, 15 U.S.C. § 34, et seq., ("LGAA" or the "Act") in order to broaden the scope of antitrust immunity applicable to local governments. This was a response to the filing of "an increasing number of antitrust suits, and threatened suits, that could undermine a local government's ability to govern in the public interest." H.R. Rep. No. 965, 98th [6] Cong., 2d Sess. 2, reprinted in 1984 U.S. Code

---

[1] Documents in the record contain references to the Board of Trustees of Cumberland County Hospital System, Inc. and the Board of Trustees of Cape Fear Valley Hospital, Inc. It is clear, however, and not disputed, that these Boards are one and the same. See App. at 86-89.

Cong. & Admin. News 4602, 4603. [2] The Report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, in considering the problem of antitrust suits facing local governments, noted that:

> More than one hundred Federal antitrust suits seeking treble damages are now pending against cities, counties, townships and virtually every other type of local government. Dozens of local government activities are being challenged, ranging from zoning decisions to the regulation of garbage collection, airport concessions, and parking lots.

S. Rep. No. 593, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 2 (1984). The Senate Report concluded that it was necessary to enact a statute that would "allow local governments to go about their daily functions without the paralyzing fear of antitrust lawsuits. . . ." Id. at 3. Both the House and the Senate, however, were careful to observe that the immunity being provided to local governments was immunity from suits for damages, and not immunity from suits seeking injunctive relief. See id. at 5-6; H.R. Rep. No. 965, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 2, reprinted in 1984 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 4602, 4603.

[7] It was in the light of the above purpose that, in 1984, Congress enacted 15 U.S.C. §§ 34-36. Section 35(a) HN1[] provides, in relevant part, that no damages . . . may be recovered . . . from any local government, or official or employee thereof acting in an official capacity." Section 36(a) HN2[] provides immunity from damages for any person when the claim is "based on any official action directed by a local government, or official or employee thereof acting in an official capacity." Appellant has not appealed the district court's determination that the Hospital System is a local government unit. Therefore, on the antitrust question, we assume that the Hospital System is a government unit and address, in this light, only whether the district court correctly concluded that the other appellees also were entitled to immunity under the Act. [3]

A

Article Six, Section One of the Hospital System's by-laws provides that the Board of Trustees [8] will employ a "Director" with the "concurrence" of the Board of Commissioners of Cumberland County, and that the Director will be the executive officer of the Board and its official spokesman. (App. at 103). In addition, the Director will assume responsibility, among other things, for the "proper operation and management of [the hospital]" and "comphrensive planning on a continuous basis for the future hospital needs of Cumberland County and development of the ways and means to meet these needs." Id. In the early fall of 1985, the Hospital System entered into a contract with appellee SunHealth for the management of the Medical Center. Pursuant to this contract, John Plyler, an employee of SunHealth, was named Director.

Appellant argues that SunHealth is not covered by immunity under the Local Government Antitrust Act because only the Board of Trustees had authority to terminate Sandcrest's affiliation with the hospital and to decide on its replacement, and therefore the actions taken by Plyler were [*1143] unauthorized and subject to a damage suit. Appellant's claim against SunHealth rests on the announcement by Plyler to the Board of Trustees that "the Sandcrest contract for providing [9] physician services to the emergency room at [the Medical Center] would not be renewed when it expired on February 28, 1986" (app. at 323), and on Plyler's statement to the Board that because the decision had already been made he "saw no need to have the Board of Trustees act on that decision." (App. at 324). Appellant also asserts that Plyler's alleged involvement in the appointment of an ad hoc committee to review bids for Sandcrest's replacement was improper. We disagree and find that SunHealth, acting through its

---

[2] In Community Communications Co., Inc. v. City of Boulder, 455 U.S. 40, 70 L. Ed. 2d 810, 102 S. Ct. 835 (1982) and City of Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. 389, 55 L. Ed. 2d 364, 98 S. Ct. 1123 (1978), the Supreme Court narrowed the scope of immunity from suit available to local governments under the Parker doctrine.

[3] As this issue is dispositive, we do not reach the substantial questions whether the alleged anticompetitive conduct had an effect on interstate commerce or whether appellant has adequately alleged a "conspiracy" under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1.

employee Plyler, is entitled to immunity from damages as a "person" engaged in "official action directed by a local government, or official or employee thereof acting in an official capacity." 15 U.S.C. § 36(a). [4]

[10] In interpreting the meaning of the phrase "directed by a local government, or official or employee thereof," we are guided by the statement of the Conference Report to the Local Government Antitrust Act. The Report, explicitly agreed to by both houses of Congress, explains that the phrase "official action directed by" found in Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 351, 87 L. Ed. 315, 63 S. Ct. 307 (1943) and subsequent cases interpreting it, "shall apply by analogy to the conduct of a local government in directing the actions of non-governmental parties, as if the local government were a state." H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 1158, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 3, reprinted in 1984 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 4602, 4627.

HN3[] In determining whether anticompetitive conduct engaged in by private parties should be entitled to immunity, the Supreme Court has held that "the challenged restraint must be 'one clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed as state policy,'" California Retail Liquor Dealers Assn. v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97, 105, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233, 100 S. Ct. 937 (1980) (quoting Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. 389, 410, 55 L. Ed. 2d 364, 98 S. Ct. 1123 (1978) (opinion of Brennan, J.)), and the anticompetitive conduct "must be 'actively supervised' by the [11] State itself." Id. (quoting Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. at 410). The Court has held that HN4[] to satisfy the "clear articulation" requirement of the state action test it is sufficient if the provisions in question plainly show that the legislature contemplated the kind of action complained of. Town of Hallie v. City of Eau Claire, 471 U.S. 34, 44, 85 L. Ed. 2d 24, 105 S. Ct. 1713 (1985). Explicit authorization is not required. Id. HN5[] To satisfy the active supervision prong of the test, it is necessary only for the State to exercise ultimate control over the challenged anticompetitive conduct. Patrick v. Burget, 486 U.S. 94, 108 S. Ct. 1658, 1668, 100 L. Ed. 2d 83 (1988). In other words, this prong of the test requires that "state officials have and exercise power to review particular anticompetitive acts of private parties and disapprove those that fail to accord with state policy." Id.

We find that Plyler's action on behalf of SunHealth meets both prongs of this test. The Hospital System by-laws do not prohibit the Director from recommending the termination of a contractual relationship with an outside medical group or from recommending that the Board enter into a contract for the provision of medical services [12] with a particular association. As Director of the Medical Center, Plyler's level of involvement in the operation and improvement of the Medical Center's emergency room services was consistent with his broad authority and responsibility under the Hospital System's by-laws. See supra at slip op. p. 7. Although appellant focuses on the [*1144] fact that it would have been consistent with the by-laws for the Executive Committee or medical staff to have become involved in this matter, the by-laws do not delegate such responsibility either explicitly or exclusively to either of these groups. We find that action taken by SunHealth and complained of by appellant was authorized under the by-laws and within the contemplation of the Board of Trustees. [5] As to the "active supervision" prong of the test, not only was the Board of Trustees aware of Plyler's activities, it had authority to approve or disapprove of them, and the Board ultimately exercised that authority by considering and approving the award of the emergency room service contract to another group. [6] [4] The record does not contain sufficient information for us to determine whether SunHealth can be classified as an "employee" of the Hospital System for purposes of immunity under Section 35 of the LGAA. It may be that, due to the fact that its relationship with the Medical Center was through a management contract, SunHealth cannot be classified as an employee. Nevertheless, we need not resolve this issue because, as stated above, we find that SunHealth was entitled to immunity from damages under Section 36 of the LGAA.

---

[5] These facts also compel the conclusion that Plyler's conduct amounted to "official action" within the meaning of Section 36.

[6] Appellant's amended complaint explicitly alleges that all the appellees, including the Board of Trustees of the Hospital System, participated in the refusal to renew Sandcrest's existing contract and the refusal to allow it to bid for an additional term. App. 51-53. The affidavit of Dr. Meek, a former member of the Board of Trustees, makes clear that Plyler did not advise the Board that it lacked authority to countermand his decision not to renew Sandcrest's contract. He merely stated that "he saw no need to have the Board of Trustees act on that decision." App. 323-324. In fact, Meek, as a member of the Board, voiced his opposition to Plyler's decision not to renew Sandcrest's contract, and resigned. Despite Meek's arguments, the Board acquiesced in Plyler's

[13] In light of the record, the district court acted properly in granting summary judgment on the issue of SunHealth's immunity under the LGAA.

B

Dr. Briggs, another appellee, was Chief of Staff of the hospital and a member of the Board of Trustees. Clearly he was an employee of a local government. Appellant argues, however, that Dr. Briggs is not entitled to immunity under the LGAA because he "was acting outside the scope of any authority he might have had as Chief of Staff or as a member of the medical staff. . . ." Appellant's Brief at 32-33. More specifically, appellant asserts that Briggs was not acting "in an official capacity" when he appointed the ad hoc committee to receive and review bids from applicants for the emergency room contract. Appellant argues that whether Sandcrest's contract should be renewed, and provision for adequate medical care in the emergency room at the Medical Center, are matters specifically delegated to the medical staff or to the Executive Committee of the medical staff. We disagree, and find that Briggs had authority to act, and acted, in an official capacity in appointing the ad hoc committee.

The Hospital System by-laws provide that the Board [14] of Trustees "shall assure that the physicians and dentists granted practice privileges in the hospitals shall organize into a medical and dental staff under staff by-laws approved by the Board of Trustees." (App. at 105). The "Medical Staff By-laws" provide that the Chief of Staff "shall serve as the chief administrative officer of the Medical Staff" (app. at 231), and that his duties include: (i) acting in coordination and cooperation with the Director in all matters of mutual concern within the hospital; (ii) appointment of committee members to all standing, special, and multi-disciplinary medical staff committees except the Executive Committee; and (iii) reporting to the Board of Trustees on the performance and maintenance of quality with respect to the medical staff's delegated responsibility to provide medical care. (App. at 231).

It is true that the by-laws provide that the duties of the Executive Committee include representing and acting on behalf of the medical staff, providing a liaison between the medical staff, the Director and the Board of Trustees, and making recommendations on hospital management matters to the Board of Trustees through the Director. But, contrary to [15] appellant's assertion, nothing in the by-laws indicates that the Executive Committee has exclusive authority to establish committees or [*1145] that the Chief of Staff is prohibited from establishing such committees in furtherance of his duties as the chief administrative officer of the medical staff. Appellant is correct that the by-laws do not affirmatively grant the Chief of Staff "the independent responsibility for making any decisions or recommendations regarding the delivery of medical care at the hospital." Appellant's Brief at 14-15. But we think, in view of the broad authority necessarily granted the Chief of Staff, it would be unreasonable to assume that he could act only pursuant to explicit authorization.

Our position that HN6[] an affirmative grant of explicit authority is not required for an employee or government official to be acting in an official capacity under the LGAA is consistent with the position taken by the Second Circuit. See Montauk-Caribbean Airways, Inc. v. Hope, 784 F.2d 91, 94 (2d Cir. 1986). The Second Circuit based its conclusion on a finding that, in light of the legislative history, Congress intended that the phrase "acting in an official capacity" be given [16] broad meaning. Id. We believe that, on its face, HN7[] the phrase "acting in an official capacity" includes those lawful actions, undertaken in the course of a defendant's performance of his duties, that reasonably can be construed to be within the scope of his duties and consistent with the general responsibilities and objectives of his position. This interpretation is also supported by the legislative history. [7] decision, and it approved and authorized the replacement of Sandcrest. It is clear that the Board had and exercised ultimate control over the conduct of Plyler complained of by appellant.

---

[7] The original House version of the LGAA provided immunity for claims based on the "official conduct of a local government." See, e.g., H.R. 6027, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 3(a), 130 CONG. REC. H8469-8470 (daily ed. August 6, 1984). "Official conduct of a local government" was defined as "any action or inaction of a local government, or its officials, employees or agents, that [they] could reasonably have construed to be within the . . . authority of such local government." Id. at § 2(2). The Judiciary Committee House Report explains: "The definition of official conduct allows room for good faith errors by local government officials in conducting the public business." H.R. Rep. No. 965, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 20-21, reprinted in 1984 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 4602, 4621.

[17] In the instant case, Briggs merely set up an ad hoc committee to review, assess, and recommend to the Board of Trustees a final disposition on the awarding of a contract to an emergency room service group. Moreover, appellant's various complaints allege that Briggs' appointment of an ad hoc committee was carried out "in combination with the Board of Trustees." (App. at 7, 52, 173). Significantly, neither Briggs nor the ad hoc committee made a final decision on the awarding of the contract. As we have noted, the Board of Trustees considered and approved the contract with Coastal Emergency Services, Inc. on January 22, 1986. (App. at 313). We conclude that Briggs' conduct was well within the scope of his official responsibilities as the chief administrative officer of the medical staff. No genuine issue of material fact exists to justify the denial of summary judgment on this question.

C

The members of the ad hoc committee are appellees in this case based solely on the fact that they served on the committee. Appellant argues first that these private doctors are not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of immunity under Section 36 because their appointment to the [18] committee was unauthorized. Appellant also contends that there is a factual issue as to whether the committee's activities were taken pursuant to a clearly articulated government policy with active supervision by the local government, an official, or an employee of the local government. [*1146] We find these contentions to be without merit. [8]

As discussed previously, Dr. Briggs was acting in his official capacity when he appointed the members of the ad hoc committee, and appellant has alleged that the Board of Trustees . . . participated in setting up such a committee. See supra at slip op. p. 14. Also, this committee's function was purely advisory. It is clear that the Board of Trustees possessed the power to supervise and review the work of the ad hoc committee, and, in fact, the Board actively exercised that power by approving the recommendation of the committee at its meeting on January 22, 1986. (App. at 313).

Appellant argues finally on this issue that there is [19] a factual dispute as to "whether the private defendants exerted so much influence on the Board of Trustees that the decision not to renew Sandcrest and to employ Coastal can be seen as effectively those of the private defendants." Appellant's Brief at 33. But appellant's initial complaint and the first and second amended complaints explicitly allege that the members of the ad hoc committee, "acting in combination with the Board of Trustees, Briggs and Plyler, secretly determined not to renew Sandcrest's contract. . . ." (App. at 8, 52, 173) (emphasis added). The complaints are devoid of any allegation that the private defendants controlled the decision of the Board of Trustees, and the record contains no evidence from which it could be inferred that the ad hoc committee exercised undue influence over the Board of Trustees.

The district court properly granted summary judgment on the issue of immunity as to all appellees.

D

Appellant makes a final argument on the issue of immunity for SunHealth, Briggs, and the ad hoc committee members. It argues that, even if appellees' conduct may be considered in a technical sense to have been undertaken within the scope of their authority [20] and under adequate supervision, the LGAA does not protect them. Appellant insists that appellees were participants in an unauthorized conspiracy, and therefore, in reality, their actions were unauthorized and outside the scope of the LGAA's protection.

Although the term "official conduct of a local government," and its definition, were replaced with the undefined phrase "official capacity" in the final version of the LGAA, the House legislative history informs our construction of the phrase "official capacity" by highlighting the concerns of the legislature in drafting the Act. Moreover, the term "official capacity" was contained in the Senate version of the bill, see, e.g., S. 1578, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. § 2(b)(1), 130 CONG. REC. S13574 (daily ed. October 4, 1984), and the Senate Judiciary Committee Report explains: "The intent of [this] provision is to insure that local government officials performing their normal, lawful functions will not be personally responsible for damages when the local government itself is not." S. Rep. No. 593, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 8 (1984). This definition is broad and consistent with the House legislative history.

[8] As with SunHealth, we need not determine whether the individual doctors who made up the ad hoc committee were officials or employees of the county because the immunity provided by Section 36 of the LGAA is dispositive.

If this view were accepted, the fundamental purpose underlying the LGAA's immunity provisions would be substantially undercut. See infra at slip op. pp. 21-22. The basic actions challenged by appellant were the failure to renew its contract to provide emergency room services and the selection of a competitor to provide such services. It must be conceded that hospitals lawfully may make management decisions of this kind, and that the making of such decisions are within the scope of authority of the hospital and its board of trustees. Appellant's argument that allegations of a conspiracy convert otherwise authorized conduct into unauthorized conduct would require consideration of whether the subjective motives or intentions of appellees were to benefit themselves rather than the hospital. The LGAA makes no provision for consideration of a defendant's motives, and an allegation that an act was done pursuant to a conspiracy is akin to an allegation [21] that it was done in bad faith or with malice. Cf. Dorman v. Higgins, 821 F.2d 133, 139 (2d Cir. 1987) (claim that a probation officer prepared a false presentence report was properly dismissed on grounds of immunity).

III

Appellant argues that, even if summary judgment was appropriate in light of the present record, it was improperly prejudiced by its inability to obtain discovery necessary to oppose the motion. Appellant asserts that without discovery it had little or no access to important facts relating to the authority of the "private defendants" and the specifics of the process by which [*1147] Sandcrest was forbidden to compete for the renewal of its contract.

We recognize that to determine whether government officials or employees were acting in an official capacity, plaintiffs, in this type of case, must have access to the facts that are relevant to the scope of authority vested in those officials and employees. Also, in order to determine whether the conduct of a private "person" was "directed" by a local government or an official or employee thereof, a plaintiff is entitled to know the facts relevant to assessing the degree of supervision exercised by government officials or [22] employees over the actions of that person. In this case, however, appellant has failed to demonstrate that it was prejudiced by the district court's stay of discovery. The relevant facts were available. Appellant had in its possession the affidavit of an eye witness to the meeting of the Board of Trustees where Plyler spoke about not renewing Sandcrest's contract with the hospital. (App. at 322-325). It also had knowledge of the fact that Dr. Briggs, acting in combination with the Board of Trustees, appointed an ad hoc committee to evaluate and recommend a new emergency room service group, that the ad hoc committee carried out this function, and that the Board of Trustees acted on its recommendation. Moreover, Sandcrest had access to the by-laws of the medical staff and the Hospital System, and the record contains the relevant minutes of the Board of Trustees meetings. The appellant is not entitled to further discovery merely because the relevant evidence fails to support his claim. The discovery process should not become merely a "fishing expedition." Cf. MacKnight v. Leonard Morse Hospital, 828 F.2d 48, 52 (1st Cir. 1987).

Discovery is of particular concern when [23] immunity defenses under the LGAA are at issue. This statute was enacted in 1984, in the words of Congressman Seiberling, "to free our local government officials of the burden of antitrust damage suits so that they may govern in the public interest." 130 CONG. REC. H8470 (daily ed. August 6, 1984) (statement of Rep. Seiberling). See supra at slip op. pp. 5-6. Appellant nevertheless contends that the LGAA was enacted only to protect local governments from the damages actually awarded and not to protect local governments from the suits themselves. In making this argument, appellant correctly points out that Congress sought to preserve the right of a private individual to sue for injunctive relief. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 593, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 6-7 (1984); H.R. Rep. No. 965, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 18, reprinted in 1984 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 4602, 4619. Appellant is incorrect, however, when it states that in providing immunity only from damages, Congress was unconcerned with protecting local governments, and their officials and employees, from the burden of defending damage suits. As Congressman Rodino, a principal sponsor of the bill, noted at the time the House was considering [24] passage of the LGAA:

> There has, in the last 6 years, been a striking increase in the number of private antitrust suits brought against local governments. Although few of these suits have resulted in judgments against local governments, the costs of litigation and the widespread concern with antitrust liability, including the possibility of treble damage judgments, may have severely undercut local officials' ability to govern in the public interest.

Id. at H8474 (emphasis added).

The Supreme Court's decision in Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 73 L. Ed. 2d 396, 102 S. Ct. 2727 (1982) provides guidance as to how courts should approach a suit for damages under the LGAA. Harlow involved a suit for civil damages against senior aides and advisors of the President of the United States who were alleged to have participated in a conspiracy to violate the constitutional and statutory rights of the plaintiff. The Court held that these officials were entitled to immunity from damage suits if their conduct did not violate "clearly established" statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. Id. at 818. In discussing the need to provide qualified immunity to government [25] officials, the Court explained:

> [*1148] It cannot be disputed seriously that claims frequently run against the innocent as well as the guilty - at a cost not only to the defendant officials, but to society as a whole. These social costs include the expenses of litigation, the diversion of official energy from pressing public issues, and the deterrence of able citizens from acceptance of public office.

Id. at 814 (emphasis added). The Court added that the objective immunity standards it was setting forth "should avoid excessive disruption of government and permit the resolution of many insubstantial claims on summary judgment." Id. at 818. The rationale of the Harlow decision applies to antitrust suits against local governments and their officials or employees. [9] The evidence contained in the record before us is more than adequate to justify the district court's determination, and it is difficult to conceive of any evidence that appellant could have introduced to undermine this conclusion.

[26] HN8[] The standards for determining whether appellees acted in an official capacity, or were directed by government officials or employees acting in an official capacity, are objective ones. As previously discussed, these standards do not include a consideration of the defendant's intentions. The court considers only the objective questions: (i) whether, in light of the authority invested in a local government, its officials or employees, the actions complained of were lawful and taken within the scope of their authority, see supra at 13; or (ii) whether, if the defendant is not a local government official or employee, the actions were directed by a local government or one of its officials or employees acting within the scope of his authority. See supra at slip op. pp. 8-9. An inquiry into a defendant's subjective intent would, in many cases, require broad-ranging discovery and a trial on the merits. Accord Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. at 815-817. This would be incompatible with the underlying purpose of the LGAA, that is to protect such defendants not only from damages but also from the expense and time required to litigate such a case.

In view of the allegations contained in the complaint [27] and the facts that were available on the motion for summary judgment before the district court, it cannot be said that the district court abused its discretion in deciding the motion for summary judgment without allowing appellant further discovery.

IV

Finally, appellant argues that the district court abused its discretion by refusing to allow appellant leave to amend its complaint to include a claim for injunctive relief. Appellant emphasizes that Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a) provides that leave to amend pleadings "shall be freely given when justice so requires." Moreover, although a district court's decision to deny leave to amend a pleading rests within its sound discretion, this Circuit has held that HN9[] denial of leave to amend a complaint must be based on "a showing of prejudice, bad faith, futility, or dilatoriness associated with the motion." Ward Electronics Service v. First Commercial Bank, 819 F.2d 496, 497 (4th Cir. 1987). Under the facts of this case, we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion.

---

[9] Although Harlow involved qualified immunity from damages and the LGAA provides absolute immunity when the terms of the statute are met, the important point is that a court should strive to resolve the immunity issue as early as possible, with a minimum of expense and time to the parties. This is necessary in order to further the purpose underlying the provision of immunity.

Appellant's motion to add a claim for injunctive relief to its complaint was its second motion to amend the complaint. This [28] motion was made 18 months after the last event giving rise to the causes of action in this case, more than 8 months after the filing of the initial complaint, and five months after the filing of the first motion to amend the complaint. And yet, the motion at issue does not seek to add more particularized or newly discovered facts to [*1149] the complaint or to plead a different cause of action. Rather, it seeks merely to add a request for an additional remedy that appellant was or should have been aware of from the outset. For at least 8 months appellant was content to litigate this case based solely on a claim for damages. As a result, in formulating their litigation strategy, appellees were justified in concentrating on an immunity defense. Their various discovery motions and the joint motion for summary judgment were prepared within the context of a damage suit only. In fact, appellant's second motion to amend the complaint followed on the heels of appellees' well-supported joint motion for summary judgment based on immunity under the LGAA. Thus, the proposed amendment appears to have been an after-thought by appellant, possibly prompted only by the concern that it would lose on the summary [29] judgment motion. Cf. Witmeyer v. Kilroy, 788 F.2d 1021, 1024 (4th Cir. 1986).

Moreover, based on the allegations of the complaint, it is difficult to understand how the injunctive relief sought by appellant would substantially further the vindication of its rights. Appellant's request for an order "prohibiting the defendants from engaging in anticompetitive conduct in the future" (app. at 183), is overly broad. Moreover, neither the allegations contained in the complaint nor the evidence of record support an inference that appellant needs an order compelling the Hospital System to give it "sufficient notice" or to "allow [it] to submit a bid" upon the expiration of Coastal's contract. Id.

Therefore, in light of the facts that: (i) appellant appears to have been dilatory in filing the second motion to amend the complaint, and (ii) the proposed amended complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to demonstrate that justice favors allowing appellant to assert its claim for injunctive relief, we hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying appellant leave to amend his complaint for a second time.

V

The judgment of the district court granting summary judgment [30] in favor of appellees on the issue of immunity under the Local Government Antitrust Act of 1984 and denying appellant's second motion to amend the complaint is affirmed.

Kerasotes Michigan Theatres, Inc. v. National Amusements, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit

August 12, 1988, Decided ; August 12, 1988, Filed

No. 87-1887

Reporter

854 F.2d 135 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 11077 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,179; 11 Fed. R. Serv. 3d (Callaghan) 1545

KERASOTES MICHIGAN THEATRES, INC., Plaintiffs, Counter Defendants-Appellees, v. NATIONAL AMUSEMENTS, INC., Defendant, Counter Plaintiff-Appellant, GEORGE G. KERASOTES, ANTHONY A. KERASOTES, MARJORIE KERASOTES, LOUIS G. KERASOTES, JOHN G. KERASOTES, ROBERT A. KERASOTES, DENNIS KERASOTES, DAN STONE, KERASOTES INDIANA THEATRES, INC., KERASOTES ADMINISTRATION COMPANY, KERASOTES ILLINOIS THEATRES, INC., KERASOTES MISSOURI THEATRES, INC., KERASOTES IOWA THEATRES, INC., LOUIS KERASOTES CORPORATION AND GEORGE G. KERASOTES CORPORATION, Counter Defendants-Appellees

Subsequent History: Petition for Rehearing by the Original Hearing Panel Denied October 3, 1988.

Prior History: [1] On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan.

Core Terms

monopoly power, leverage, theatres, films, anti trust law, counterclaim, monopoly, Sherman Act, antitrust

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

When reviewing a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion, an appeals court must accept as true all factual allegations in the complaint.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Pleadings > Rule Application & Interpretation

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A court must deny the motion to dismiss unless it can be established beyond a doubt that the complainant can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief. In an antitrust action, moreover, the complaint need only allege sufficient facts from which the court can discern the elements of an injury resulting from an act forbidden by the antitrust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Facilities

HN3[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

Leveraging is the use of monopoly power in one market to amplify or leverage a position in another competitive market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

HN4[] Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

To run afoul of the antitrust laws, it is not necessary that the party attempting to leverage its monopoly power from a given market into a second market possess monopoly power or dominant market position in that second market.

Counsel: Eugene Driker, argued, Elaine Fieldman, Ellen M. Nerring, Barris, Sott, Denn & Driker, Detroit, Michigan, Attorneys for Appellant.

H.C. Goplerud, David A. Ettinger, argued, Honigman, Miller, Schwartz & Cohn, Detroit, Michigan, John T. Walton, Jr., Detroit, Michigan, Joseph Giffin, Chadwell & Kayser, Ltd., Chicago, Illinois, Attorneys for Appellee.

Judges: Martin and Wellford, Circuit Judges; and Gibbons, District Judge. *

Opinion by: MARTIN, JR.

Opinion

[*136] BOYCE F. MARTIN, JR., Circuit Judge.

National Amusements, Inc., appeals from the Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal of its antitrust counterclaim brought against Kerasotes Michigan Theatres, Inc. Because we believe National's claim was improvidently dismissed, we reverse.

National and Kerasotes are the sole motion picture exhibitors in the Flint, Michigan area. Each owns a significant number of theatres in other cities. Litigation between these parties commenced when Kerasotes filed suit alleging that National had used its economic leverage in areas other than Flint to obtain [2] exclusive exhibition rights to films in Flint. In response to this claim, which suit is still in the pre-trial stages, National asserted a counterclaim that Kerasotes had used its monopoly and market position in other geographical regions to coerce distributors into providing them first run films in the Flint area. The district court dismissed National's counterclaim, however, under F. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). 658 F. Supp. 1514. This was done before any discovery was taken on the counterclaim.

* The Honorable Julia S. Gibbons, United States District Judge for the Western District of Tennessee, sitting by designation.

Kerasotes began competing in the Flint area in late 1984 when it purchased four indoor movie theatres. The four theatres have eleven screens. At the time, National owned and operated two indoor theatres having a total of ten screens. According to the counterclaim, which in an appeal from a dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) must be accepted as true, Kerasotes' theatres are old and poorly run whereas National's theatres are among the most luxurious in the country. National alleges that after Kerasotes purchased these theatres, Kerasotes sought to avoid competing with National by trying to arrange a "split" with National for the showing of certain films. After failing in this effort, National alleges, Kerasotes began to [3] use its monopoly position in other geographical markets to obtain films in the Flint market, films Kerasotes would not have otherwise been able to obtain. National alleges in its counterclaim that Karasotes' behavior violated Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act as well as Michigan antitrust statutes.

The district court dismissed these claims, holding that because Kerasotes did not possess a dominant position in the Flint market where it competed with National, Kerasotes' behavior could not have been injurious to competition. Thus, Kerasotes was insulated from antitrust liability. On appeal, National argues only that the district court erred in dismissing its claim that Kerasotes had attempted to leverage its monopoly position in violation of section 2 of the Sherman Act.

Motions made pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) test whether a cognizable claim has been adequately alleged in a complaint. Rule 8(a) sets out the requirement that pleadings must contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. . . ." Thus, HN1[] when reviewing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, we must accept as true all factual allegations in the complaint. Windsor v. The Tennessean, 719 [4] F.2d 155, 158 (6th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 826, 83 L. Ed. 2d 50, 105 S. Ct. 105 (1984). As we stated in Nishiyama v. Dickson County, Tenn., 814 F.2d 277, 279 (6th Cir. 1987), HN2[] a "court must deny the motion to dismiss unless it can be established beyond a doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." In an antitrust action, moreover, "the complaint need only allege sufficient facts from which the court can discern the elements of an injury resulting from an act forbidden by the antitrust laws." Newman v. Universal Pictures, 813 F.2d 1519, 1522 (9th Cir. 1987).

We believe National has adequately alleged a viable antitrust cause of action sufficient at least to defeat a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal. Kerasotes' alleged behavior, using its dominant market position [*137] in non-Flint areas to obtain first run films in Flint, which they would not have been able to obtain in a competitive process, does indeed constitute "leveraging," which is forbidden by the antitrust laws. In White and White, Inc. v. American Hospital Supply, Co., 723 F.2d 495, 506 (6th Cir. 1983), we defined HN3[] leveraging as "the use of monopoly power in one market to amplify [5] or 'leverage,' a position in another competitive market." HN4[] To run afoul of the antitrust laws, it is not necessary that the party attempting to leverage its monopoly power from a given market into a second market possess monopoly power or dominant market position in that second market. As the Second Circuit stated:

> [A] firm violates section 2 by using its monopoly power in one market to gain a competitive advantage in another, albeit without an attempt to monopolize the second market. . . . there is no reason to allow the exercise of such power to the detriment of competition, in either the controlled market or any other. That the competition in the leveraged market may not be destroyed but merely distorted does not make it any more palatable. Social and economic effects of an extension of monopoly power militate against such conduct.

Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 275 (2nd Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1093, 62 L. Ed. 2d 783, 100 S. Ct. 1061 (1980).

We continue to find highly persuasive the Supreme Court's treatment of such leveraging behavior in its opinion in United States v. Griffith, 334 U.S. 100, 92 L. Ed. 1236, 68 S. Ct. 941 (1948). The Supreme Court declared:

> It is indeed 'unreasonable, per se, [6] to foreclose competitors from any substantial market.' The antitrust laws are as much violated by the prevention of competition as by its destruction. It follows a fortiori that the use > of monopoly power, however lawfully acquired, to foreclose competition, to gain a competitive advantage, or to destroy a competitor, is unlawful. A man with a monopoly of theatres in any one town commands the entrance for all films into that area. If he uses that strategic position to acquire exclusive privileges in a city where he has competitors, he is employing his monopoly power as a trade weapon against his competitors.

334 U.S. at 107-108.

We find the behavior discussed above by the Supreme Court to be virtually indistinguishable from that alleged by National to have been committed by Kerasotes. Such behavior is considered to be a "misuise of monopoly power under the Sherman Act" because it results in the licensing "on a non-competitive bases [of films] in what would otherwise be competitive situations." Id.

We do not believe the passage of time since the Supreme Court decided Griffith has produced any changes in our understanding of economics that militates that we abandon our view [7] that such leveraging behavior constitutes a violation of the antitrust laws. Our improved understanding of economics has led the courts and others to recognize that there may be justifiable explanations and positive results from dealer termination agreements and other vertical agreements. Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 56 U.S.L.W. 4387, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808, 108 S. Ct. 1515 (1988). In the case at hand, however, while the alleged agreement between Kerasotes and its film distributors is vertical, the effect is exclusively horizontal. The sole purpose for such an agreement is to extend a business' dominance from one market into a second market, without having to achieve that dominance in the second market by developing a superior product or as the result of other legitimate competitive advantages.

We expressly reject the district court's reasoning that leverage or the abuse of monopoly power is not actionable when the offender has not yet acquired a dominant position in the affected market. As the Supreme Court stated, "the Sherman Act has consistently been read to forbid all contracts and combinations 'which tend to create a monopoly,' whether 'the tendency is a creeping one' or [8] 'one that proceeds at [*138] full gallup". Klor's v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 213-214, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741, 79 S. Ct. 705 (1959); see also, Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., supra, 603 F.2d at 275. Products that may be inferior should not be allowed to prosper in a particular market as a result of its producer's exploitation of its monopoly position in a second market. Under such situations, potential economic or competitive gains are not identifiable. This is, of course, most clearly so where the alleged offender has used coercion in the market where it validly possesses monopoly power to further extend that power to a second market. Finally, we observe that the antitrust laws prohibit not just the possession of monopoly power but also attempts to restrain trade and impede competition. Thus, it is not determinative that Kerasotes may not presently enjoy a dominant market power position in Flint, the affected market. Furthermore, it cannot be doubted that Kerasotes' alleged conduct, if proven, had a negative impact on competition.

Because we believe that National adequately alleged a section 2 violation of the Sherman Act, that portion of the district court opinion dismissing this so called "leveraging" [9] claim pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) is hereby reversed.

Dunnivant v. Bi-State Auto Parts

United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit

August 15, 1988

No. 87-7652

Reporter
851 F.2d 1575 *; 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 11137 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,181

Sam DUNNIVANT, d/b/a Sammy's Auto Parts, Plaintiff-Appellant, v. BI-STATE AUTO PARTS; Ardmore Parts; Mid-State Distributing Company; Don's Foreign Auto Electric; Parts Industry Corporation; Parts Distributors Warehouse, Inc., Auto Electric Service of Huntsville, Inc., Harris Welding Supply; Billy Harris, individually; and Paul Spence, individually and as a partner d/b/a Ardmore Parts, and W.C. Butler and Shirley Butler, individually and as partners d/b/a Harris Welding Supply; Mid-State Automotive Distributors, Inc., and S & S Parts Distributors Warehouse, Inc., Thomas W. Harris and Doyle Posey, individually and d/b/a Bi-State Auto Parts, Defendants-Appellees

Prior History: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama.

Disposition: Affirmed.

Core Terms

suppliers, retailers, business relationship, oxygen, automotive parts, summary judgment, district court, conspiracy, terminate, antitrust, correctly, customers, independent action, do business, Sherman Act, concerted, vertical, reasons, anti trust law, genuine issue, competitors, complaints, cylinders, inventory, averaged, merchant, selling, nonmoving party, specific facts, conscious

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

See 15 U.S.C.S. § 1.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Remedies > Damages

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Remedies > General Overview

HN2[] Remedies, Damages

In order to meet a properly supported motion for summary judgment, a plaintiff seeking damages for Sherman Act section 1, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, violations must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators were acting independently. The nonmoving party must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. Mere complaints of illegal conspiracy that are equally consistent with permissible competition, without more, do not support even an inference of conspiracy. There must be direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the parties had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN3[] Summary Judgment, Burdens of Proof

The plaintiff has the burden of producing evidence which creates a material issue of fact for trial.

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Denial of Allegations

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN4[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Denial of Allegations

See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e).

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > General Overview

HN5[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

When the moving party has carried its burden, its opponent must do more than simply show that there is metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. The nonmoving party must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. Where the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for the nonmoving party, there is no genuine issue for trial.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN6[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a section 1 case, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. Indeed, conduct as consistent with illegal conspiracy as with permissible competition does not support an inference of antitrust conspiracy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

[HN7] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

The plaintiff in an action under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 must produce evidence which establishes a genuine issue as to whether there was a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > Exclusive Dealing

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

[HN8] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

It is well established that a merchant, whether he be a manufacturer, distributor, wholesaler, or retailer, may choose with whom he will do business and with whom he will not do business; such action generally does not violate the antitrust laws. Thus, the manufacturer can deal or not deal with customers for reasons sufficient to itself. Implicit in the freedom to deal exclusively with one merchant, of course, is the freedom to refuse to deal with a competitor of that merchant.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

[HN9] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Conduct as consistent with permissible competition as with illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > Exclusive Dealing

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

[HN10] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

Exclusive dealing does not give rise to antitrust liability. To create a triable issue under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, one has to show concerted anticompetitive conduct by a plurality of actors, in an unlawful arrangement.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN11[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Implicit in the freedom to deal exclusively with one merchant is the freedom to refuse to deal with the competitor of that merchant.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Business & Corporate Law > Distributorships & Franchises > Causes of Action > Restraints of Trade

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN12[] Regulated Practices, Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade

Antitrust law makes a distinction between concerted and independent action. Independent action is not proscribed. Distributors of merchandise have a right to select their customers and to refuse the sale of goods to anyone for reasons sufficient to themselves.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN13[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Avoidance of summary judgment in an antitrust action under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 is achieved only where the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of competing inferences of independent action or collusive action.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > Nonprice Restraints

HN14[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Vertical agreements on resale prices are per se illegal. The court, however, is careful to narrow this per se rule. Vertical nonprice restraints had not been shown to have such a pernicious effect on competition as to justify per se illegality. The legality of arguably anticompetitive conduct should be judged primarily by its market impact. If interbrand competition exists, this will afford a safeguard against any attempt to exploit intrabrand market power. Vertical nonprice restraints allow suppliers of commerce to earn sufficient profit margins to promote desired services to its customers.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Opposing Materials > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Vertical Restraints > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN15[] Sherman Act, Claims

Proof of parallel behavior alone does not establish a prima facie case of a Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., violation. In order to avoid a motion for summary judgment, a plaintiff must come forward with significant probative evidence supporting its theory of conscious parallelism with some "plus" factor which tends to indicate the absence of independent action. In addition, it must be shown that the decisions not to deal are contrary to the defendants' economic self-interest so as to raise an issue of good faith business judgment.

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Business Relationships > General Overview

Torts > Business Torts > General Overview

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

HN16[] Commercial Interference, Business Relationships

In Alabama, a defendant will not be liable where it acted for legitimate economic reasons. Bona fide business competition is a justification for intentional interference with a competitor's business.

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Contracts > General Overview

Torts > Business Torts > General Overview

HN17[] Commercial Interference, Contracts

Competition in business, even though carried to the extent of ruining a rival, constitutes justifiable interference in another's business relations and is not actionable.

Counsel: Charles A. Dauphin, Kearney Dee Hutsler, Baxley, Dillard & Dauphin, Attorneys, for Plaintiff-Appellant.

L. Tennent Lee, III, Cleary, Lee, Morris, Smith, et al., Huntsville, Alabama, for Harris Welding Supply.

Thad G. Long, Michael J. Brandt, Bradley, Arant, Rose & White, Birmingham, Alabama, for Auto Electric Service.

Barry A. Ragsdale, James A. Harris, Jr., Sirote, Permutt, et al., Birmingham, Alabama, for Parts, Inc.,

James Francis, Decatur, Alabama, for Harris, Posey and Bi-State Auto Parts.

John McQuiston, II, Goodman, Glazer, Grenner, Schneider & McQuiston, For S & S Auto Parts, Inc.

Ernest L. Potter, Huntsville, Alabama, For Paul Spence adD Ardmore Parts, Attorneys for Paul Spence and Ardmore Parts.

Judges: Hatchett and Cox, Circuit Judges, and Gibson, * Senior Circuit Judge.

Opinion by: HATCHETT

* Honorable Floyd R. Gibson, Senior U.S. Circuit Judge for the Eighth Circuit, sitting by designation.

Opinion

[*1577] HATCHETT, Circuit Judge:

In this Sherman Act antitrust case, we apply the teachings of Helicopter Support Systems v. Hughes Helicopter, 818 F.2d 1530 (11th Cir.1987) to affirm the district court's ruling that no violation of the Sherman Act occurred [2] as a result of the proof developed in this case.

FACTS

In October, 1982, Sam Dunnivant, the appellant, opened an automotive parts store (Sammy's Auto Parts) in Ardmore, Alabama, and continued operation until March, 1985. Three other automotive retail [*1578] businesses were also located in Ardmore: Ardmore Parts, Inc. (Spence), Bi-State Auto Parts, and the Otasco Store. Ardmore has a population of less than 2,000.

S & S Auto Parts (S & S), Auto Electric Service, Inc. (Auto Electric), Don's Foreign Auto Electric, Inc. (Don's Foreign Auto), and Mid-State Automotive Distributors, Inc. (Mid-State) are suppliers of automotive parts in the Ardmore area. Dunnivant contacted these suppliers in an effort to stock automotive parts. Initially, Dunnivant could not find a supplier who delivered in Ardmore to sell him automotive parts. As a result, Dunnivant purchased parts from suppliers in Huntsville, Alabama, and transported the parts to his store in Ardmore.

Dunnivant also sold oxygen and acetylene which he purchased from Thompson Welding and Supply in Gurley, Alabama. Alabama Oxygen provided Thompson Welding with oxygen supplies. Because Dunnivant's customers brought their empty gas cylinders to Ardmore [3] Parts (Spence), Paul Spence complained to Alabama Oxygen Company. Spence was accountable to Alabama Oxygen for cylinders used in retail sales and sought to avoid liability for cylinders -- valued at $ 200 -- purchased from Dunnivant. Spence advised Alabama Oxygen that he would no longer purchase its cylinders because of its business with Dunnivant. To appease Spence, Alabama Oxygen advised Thompson Welding and Supply that it could no longer sell to Dunnivant. [1] Dunnivant then attempted to purchase oxygen from Harris Welding Supply Company. Harris Welding decided against conducting business with Dunnivant because it was also in the retail market; the oxygen market averages only $ 300 a month; and Spence had promised Harris Welding all of his business. As a result, Dunnivant discontinued oxygen sales.

In March, 1984, Auto Electric, a supplier to the three retail competitors, began selling automotive parts to Dunnivant, but Dunnivant was still required to supplement his inventory through purchases from Huntsville, Alabama. On April 3, 1984, Paul Spence returned parts and accessories to Auto Electric for credit asserting that he could [4] no longer do business with Auto Electric because of its business relationship with Dunnivant. Spence's purchases from Auto Electric during the three months prior to April, 1984 averaged over $ 1000 per month. Notwithstanding Spence's actions, Auto Electric remained Dunnivant's primary supplier for thirteen months after the loss of the Spence account. During this period, Dunnivant never stocked a full line of inventory and purchased goods only as needed, averaging $ 403 per month in merchandise. Because of Dunnivant's refusal to stock inventory, Auto Electric terminated business relations with Dunnivant and reestablished a business relationship with Spence. Again, Dunnivant attempted to contact suppliers who delivered automotive parts in Ardmore. The suppliers either advised Dunnivant of existing agreements with retailers in Ardmore or determined that Ardmore's small market made a business relationship unprofitable. Because it was economically unfeasible for Dunnivant to continue to transport parts from Huntsville, and because suppliers refused to sell parts to Dunnivant, he went out of business.

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

---

[1] Alabama Oxygen is not a party to this action.

Dunnivant filed this lawsuit alleging violations of sections 1 and 2 [5] of the Sherman Antitrust Act (see 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2) and tort claims against his competitors for interference with business relations. All appellees except Mid-State filed motions to dismiss, and Auto Electric and S & S filed motions for summary judgment. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of all appellees except Mid-State. The district court held that Dunnivant "failed to come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial . . . and that [Dunnivant] has failed to present evidence . . . to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators were acting independently." Dunnivant failed to [*1579] take a default judgment against Mid-State, and the district court dismissed the complaint for lack of prosecution. Dunnivant filed this appeal.

The issues are: (1) whether the district court applied an improper standard of review in granting summary judgment; (2) whether the evidence shows a concerted refusal to deal; and (3) whether the retailers tortiously interfered with Dunnivant's business relations.

HN1[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of [6] trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In Helicopter Support Systems v. Hughes Helicopter, 818 F.2d 1530 (11th Cir.1987), this court held that HN2[] in order to meet a properly supported motion for summary judgment, a plaintiff seeking damages for Sherman Act section 1 violations must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators were acting independently. Helicopter, 818 F.2d at 1533-34 (citing Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 1470, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, reh'g denied, 466 U.S. 994, 104 S. Ct. 2378, 80 L. Ed. 2d 850 (1984)); see also Commuter Transportation Systems, Inc. v. Hillsborough County Aviation Authority, 801 F.2d 1286, 1291 (11th Cir.1986) (where this court in a nonprice fixing case applied the Monsanto standard requiring plaintiff to present evidence excluding the possibility of independent action). "The nonmoving party must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial." Hillsborough, 801 F.2d at 1291 (citing Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., Ltd. v. [7] Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986)). Mere complaints of illegal conspiracy that are equally consistent with permissible competition, without more, do not support even an inference of conspiracy. Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1470; Helicopter, 818 F.2d at 1533. There must be "direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the [parties] 'had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.'" Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1471 (quoting Edward J. Sweeney & Sons, Inc. v. Texaco, Inc., 637 F.2d 105, 111 (3rd Cir.1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 911, 101 S. Ct. 1981, 68 L. Ed. 2d 300 (1981)). [2]

Dunnivant argues that the district court impermissibly shifted the burden of proof to him, the nonmoving party, requiring evidence of the alleged [8] conspiracy. The Supreme Court has long settled burden of proof issues in antitrust actions. In First National Bank v. Cities Service Co., 391 U.S. 253, 289-90, 88 S. Ct. 1575, 1592-93, 20 L. Ed. 2d 569 (1968), the plaintiff brought an action against defendants for conspiracy to boycott plaintiff's sale of Iranian oil in violation of federal antitrust laws. The Supreme Court affirmed the district court's grant of summary judgment holding that HN3[] the plaintiff has the burden of producing evidence which creates a material issue of fact for trial. HN4[] Rule 56(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure states that "an adverse party may not rest upon the mere allegations or denials of the . . . pleadings, but . . . must set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial." As in Cities Service Co., the district court in this case, on the record before it, correctly placed the burden of producing evidence which creates a triable issue upon the nonmoving party. The Supreme Court in Matsushita noted:

[2] As in Monsanto, we do not suggest that complaints in antitrust cases have no probative value. We only suggest that the burden of proof remains on the antitrust plaintiff to introduce sufficient evidence to exclude the possibility of independent action. See Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 764 n. 8, 104 S. Ct. at 1471 n. 8.

> HN5[] When the moving party has carried its burden . . . its opponent must do more than simply show that there is metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. . . . The nonmoving party [9] must come forward with 'specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.' . . . [*1580] [And], where the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for the nonmoving party, there is no 'genuine issue for trial.' [Footnote omitted] [citations omitted].

Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 586-87, 106 S. Ct. at 1356-57; cf. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). [3] Further, the district court correctly required Dunnivant to present evidence to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently. See Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1470. HN6[] Antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a section 1 case. Indeed, conduct as consistent with illegal conspiracy as with permissible competition does not support an inference of antitrust conspiracy. See Helicopter, 818 F.2d at 1533.

I. Application [10] of Standard

To facilitate a proper understanding of Dunnivant's antitrust claims, we must analyze the business relationships between the various parties as to both vertical and horizontal behavior. The first class of appellees consists of suppliers of automotive parts or bottled oxygen. The second class of appellees consists of Dunnivant's retail competitors, Ardmore Parts (Spence) and Bi-State Auto Parts.

A. Suppliers

1. Auto Electric

In March, 1984, Auto Electric began selling automotive parts to Dunnivant and was the only supplier that delivered parts to Dunnivant in Ardmore. Dunnivant was still required to supplement his inventory through purchases from Huntsville. Spence returned parts to Auto Electric advising it that he could no longer do business with Auto Electric because of its business with Dunnivant. Auto Electric subsequently terminated business relations with Dunnivant and reestablished a business relationship with Spence. In support of his conspiratorial claim, Dunnivant proffered the testimony of William Posey, a former employee of Auto Electric, who testified that the only reason Auto Electric terminated business relations with Dunnivant was due to pressure from [11] Paul Spence.

The district court correctly found that Dunnivant failed to produce specific facts to exclude the possibility that Auto Electric acted independently. Posey's affidavit is consistent with Auto Electric's position of discontinuing sales to Dunnivant. The record is undisputed that Auto Electric remained Dunnivant's primary supplier for thirteen months after the loss of the Spence account. Auto Electric had independent business reasons to terminate its business relationship with Dunnivant: Dunnivant never stocked a full line of inventory, purchased goods only as needed, and averaged $ 403 per month in merchandise. Spence's purchases from Auto Electric during the three months prior to termination averaged $ 1,000 per month.

Dunnivant's assertion that Spence acted with collusive intent is not sufficient. Dunnivant has failed to produce evidence which tends to exclude the possibility of independent action on behalf of Auto Electric. See Helicopter, 818 F.2d at 1533-34. Dunnivant HN7[] must produce evidence which establishes a genuine issue as to whether there was "a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective." Monsanto, 465 U.S. at [12] 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1471 (quoting Sweeney, 637 F.2d at 111). Given Dunnivant's erratic purchases and refusal to stock inventory, Auto Electric had independent business reasons to terminate its relationship with Dunnivant and reestablish a business relationship with Spence. Auto Electric did not contact Spence about resuming their business relationship until after it discontinued selling merchandise to Dunnivant. In [3] Notwithstanding the district court's interpretation of the proper legal standard, this court must independently review the district court's order granting summary judgment. Thrasher v. State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., 734 F.2d 637, 638 (11th Cir.1984).

---

Construction Aggregate Transport, Inc., v. Florida Rock Industries, Inc., 710 F.2d 752 (11th Cir.1983), this court held:

> HN8[] It is well established that a merchant, whether he be a manufacturer, distributor, wholesaler, or retailer, may choose [*1581] with whom he will do business and with whom he will not do business; such action generally does not violate the antitrust laws. Thus, the manufacturer can deal or not deal with customers 'for reasons sufficient to itself.' . . . Implicit in the freedom to deal exclusively with one merchant, of course, is the freedom to refuse to deal with a competitor of that merchant. [Citations omitted.]

Florida Rock Industries, Inc., 710 F.2d at 772; see also Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 752, 104 S. Ct. at 1464; United States v. Colgate and [13] Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307, 39 S. Ct. 465, 468, 63 L. Ed. 992 (1919). Again, "HN9[] conduct as consistent with permissible competition as with illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588, 106 S. Ct. at 1357. Dunnivant has failed to meet the Monsanto standard, and the district court correctly granted summary judgment in favor of Auto Electric.

2. S & S Auto Parts, Parts Incorporated, and Don's Foreign Auto

Each of the above-named appellee suppliers had an existing relationship with either Spence or Bi-State prior to this action. S & S Parts (PDW) is a "CarQuest" distributor of automotive parts. [4] Paul Spence is the only "CarQuest" automotive parts dealer in Ardmore, Alabama and PDW does business exclusively with Spence. Although the franchise agreement between PDW and Spence does not require that PDW sell only to Spence, PDW's policy in small towns is to sell only to its designated dealers. PDW asserts that this policy is in its best economic interest because it prevents multiple deliveries, small transactions, and credit risks.

Parts Incorporated [14] (PI) is a wholesale automotive parts supplier. PI supplies automotive parts to Bi-State pursuant to an associate agreement which provides an incentive program for retailers and does not restrict PI from selling parts to others. Harvey Miller, PI's general manager, met with Dunnivant on two occasions expressing apprehension as to whether Dunnivant's account would be profitable given the overall volume of business in the area. Miller also expressed a desire to be loyal to his customer, Bi-State.

Don's Foreign Electric, Inc. sells foreign car parts to retailers. Donald Sanders, the owner, stated in his affidavit that Dunnivant's representative contacted him in regard to conducting future business. Although Sanders initially gave his approval concerning the new business, he thereafter rejected a business relationship because of Dunnivant's interest in an adjacent garage business. Sanders has a policy against selling to anyone in the garage business because such a person or entity would be in direct competition with Sanders's other customers. Sanders also based his decision not to sell to Dunnivant on practical business considerations. [5]

[15] Dunnivant argues that Spence and Bi-State conspired with the above-named suppliers to boycott his operation in violation of antitrust laws. Upon review of the record, we find no concerted action. HN10[] Exclusive dealing does not give rise to antitrust liability. "To create a triable issue under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, [one has] to show concerted anticompetitive conduct by a plurality of actors, in . . . an unlawful arrangement." Aquachem Co., Inc. v. Olin Corp., 699 F.2d 516, 520 (11th Cir.1983) (other citations omitted); see generally Annotation, Refusals to Deal as Violations of the Federal Antitrust Laws, 41 A.L.R.Fed. 175 (1979). Dunnivant presents no evidence that the retailers threatened or coerced the above-named suppliers in a concerted arrangement. "HN11[] Implicit in the freedom to deal exclusively with one merchant . . . is the freedom to refuse to deal with the competitor of that merchant." *Florida [1582] Rock Industries, 710 F.2d at 773. The appellee suppliers had legitimate business freedom to deal exclusively.

---

[4] "CarQuest" represents a specific line of automotive parts.

[5] We are cognizant of Dunnivant's assertion that he has no business interest in the adjacent garage; however, this contention is irrelevant to our analysis. Our focus is centered on whether the suppliers autonomously exercised unilateral action.

HN12[] Antitrust law makes a distinction between concerted and independent action. Independent action [16] is not proscribed. Distributors of merchandise have a right to select their customers and to refuse the sale of goods to anyone for reasons sufficient to themselves. See Colgate, 250 U.S. at 307, 39 S. Ct. at 468. See also Aviation Specialties, Inc. v. United Technologies Corp., 568 F.2d 1186, 1192 (5th Cir.), reh'g denied, 570 F.2d 1391 (1978).[6] The depositions and affidavits in the record indicate the suppliers made independent business decisions. Thus, the district court correctly granted summary judgment for the suppliers.

3. Harris Welding

Likewise, we find that Dunnivant's evidence of a conspiracy between Spence and Harris Welding is insufficient. Harris Welding articulated several business reasons for refusing to do business with Dunnivant. First, Harris Welding felt it was economically imprudent to provide Dunnivant with oxygen service because it was also in the retail market and the limited retail market in Ardmore averaged only $ 300 per month. [17] In addition, Harris Welding suffered losses when individuals failed to return cylinders -- valued at $ 200 each -- and refused to pay for them. Dunnivant did not assess a rental charge on the cylinders. Moreover, Harris had a long-time business relationship with Spence, and Harris's decision to deal exclusively with Spence is reasonable. Although Spence may have entertained monopolistic aims in the Ardmore oxygen market, HN13[] avoidance of summary judgment is achieved only where "the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of competing inferences of independent action or collusive action. . . ." Helicopter, 818 F.2d at 1533 (citing Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588, 106 S. Ct. at 1357). Harris Welding's refusal to terminate an eleven-year business relationship with Spence suggests nothing illegal; Spence had been a reliable customer. The district court correctly granted summary judgment for Harris Welding.

B. Retailers

No evidence exists to establish an illegal horizontal relationship between the appellee retailers, Spence and Bi-State. The record is devoid of any evidence indicating collusion or concerted action by the two retailers. Although we are aware of Spence's complaints to suppliers [18] concerning their business relations with Dunnivant, this does not alter our conclusion. It is of no moment that Spence's independent actions may have caused Dunnivant economic harm. See Garment District, Inc., v. Belk Stores Services, Inc., 799 F.2d 905 (4th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 486 U.S. 1005, 108 S. Ct. 1728, 100 L. Ed. 2d 193 (1988) (where the court in applying the Monsanto standard held that termination may be justified in order to avoid losing a disgruntled customer); see also Golf City, Inc., v. Wilson Sporting Goods, Co., Inc., 555 F.2d 426 (5th Cir.1977). We emphasize that mere complaints are not sufficient proof where the complaints are equally consistent with both an independent and a collusive interpretation. Dunnivant must produce evidence which tends to exclude the possibility of unilateral action. Helicopter, 818 F.2d at 1534. In this case, Dunnivant has failed to meet the standard.

II. Vertical Competition

The Supreme Court has long established that HN14[] vertical agreements on resale prices are per se illegal. See Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502 (1911). The Court, however, is careful [19] to narrow this per se rule. See Continental TV, Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 58, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 2561, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977) (where the Supreme Court refused to extend per se illegality to vertical nonprice [*1583] restraints). In Business Electronics Corporation v. Sharp Electronic Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988), the Supreme Court held that "vertical nonprice restraints had not been shown to have such a 'pernicious effect on competition' . . . as to justify per se illegality." Sharp, 108 S. Ct. at 1519 (quoting Northern Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 78 S. Ct. 514, 518, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958)). "The legality of arguably anticompetitive conduct should be judged primarily by its 'market impact.'" Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 762, 104 S. Ct. at 1470 (citing GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S. at 51, 97 S. Ct. at 2558). If interbrand competition exists, this will afford a safeguard against "any attempt to exploit intrabrand market power." Sharp, 108 S. Ct. at 1520; cf. Baxter, The Viability of Vertical Restraints Doctrine, 75 Calif.L.Rev. 933, 948-49 (1987). Vertical nonprice restraints allow suppliers of commerce to earn [20] sufficient profit margins to promote desired services to its customers. Sharp, 108 S. Ct. at 1521.

---

[6] In Bonner v. City of Prichard, 661 F.2d 1206 (11th Cir.1981) (in banc), the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals adopted as precedent the decisions of the former Fifth Circuit issued before October 1, 1981.

In this case, the suppliers have a legitimate business interest to ensure that its retailers are competent and willing to promote their products. Indeed, the quality of service has a direct bearing on the goodwill of the suppliers or manufacturers. See Sharp, 108 S. Ct. at 1520; GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S. at 55, 97 S. Ct. at 2560. This necessarily requires initial capital investment for advertising and other functions to promote sales. In a competitive marketplace, it is imperative that merchants be allowed the autonomy to exercise independent judgment in order to facilitate this end. To infer conspiracy from terminations or refusals to deal would, in effect, "deter or penalize perfectly legitimate conduct. . . ." Sharp, 108 S. Ct. at 1520 (citing Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 763-64, 104 S. Ct. at 1470). Further, we are satisfied that sufficient competition exists in Ardmore to act as a "significant check" on any attempt to exploit the parts market.

III. Conscious Parallelism

Dunnivant also attempts to link the appellee suppliers with the appellee retailers on a theory of conscious [21] parallelism. He argues that each of the individual suppliers was aware of the retailers' conspiratorial objective, thereby constituting a violation of the Sherman Act. HN15[] Proof of parallel behavior alone does not establish a prima facie case of a Sherman Act violation. In order to avoid a motion for summary judgment, a plaintiff must come forward with significant probative evidence supporting its theory of conscious parallelism with some "plus" factor which tends to indicate the absence of independent action. In addition, it must be shown that the decisions not to deal were contrary to the defendants' economic self-interest so as to raise an issue of good faith business judgment. See Aviation Specialties, 568 F.2d at 1192; see generally Theatre Enterprises, Inc. v. Paramount Film Distributing Corp., 346 U.S. 537, 74 S. Ct. 257, 98 L. Ed. 273 (1954). In this case, because the record clearly indicates economically sound business reasons for the suppliers not to deal with Dunnivant, and because Dunnivant is unable to set forth any significant probative evidence which might suggest to the contrary, his allegation of parallel behavior alone does not establish a prima facie [22] case. See generally First National Bank v. Cities Service Co., 391 U.S. 253, 88 S. Ct. 1575, 20 L. Ed. 2d 569 (1968).

IV. State Claim

Dunnivant also asserts a state tort claim against the appellee retailers. Dunnivant argues that under Alabama law the actions of the retailers caused tortious interference with his business relationships. In Griese-Traylor Corp. v. First National Bank of Birmingham, 572 F.2d 1039 (5th Cir.1978), this court held that "HN16[] in Alabama, a defendant will not be liable where it acted for legitimate economic reasons. Bona fide business competition is a justification for intentional interference with a competitor's business." Griese, 572 F.2d at 1045. In Beasley-Bennett Electric Co. v. Gulf Coast Chapter of National Electrical Contractors Assn., 273 Ala. 32, 134 So.2d 427 (1961), the plaintiff advanced essentially the same claim Dunnivant now asserts. In Beasley, the plaintiff asserted unlawful [*1584] interference with his business relations where defendant/contractors refused to do business with the plaintiff and told other construction companies that if they accepted bids from the plaintiff, the defendants would not give any bids to these companies [23] in the future. The Alabama Supreme Court held that these allegations were insufficient. The court added that "HN17[] competition in business, even though carried to the extent of ruining a rival, constitutes justifiable interference in another's business relations, and is not actionable. . . ." Beasley, 134 So.2d at 429; see, e.g., Battles v. San Ann Service, Inc., 441 So.2d 925, 928 (Ala.Civ.App.1983). In light of this authority, we are persuaded that Dunnivant cannot recover on his state tort claim.

CONCLUSION

Although summary judgment should be used cautiously in antitrust cases, the district court correctly granted the appellees' motions in this case. Poller v. CBS, Inc., 368 U.S. 464, 82 S. Ct. 486, 7 L. Ed. 2d 458 (1962). To permit an agreement to be inferred merely from the existence of complaints, or even from the fact that a termination resulted from such complaints, could deter or emasculate legitimate conduct. Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 763-64, 104 S. Ct. at 1470-71; see also Sharp, 108 S. Ct. at 1520. As the Supreme Court correctly noted in Cities Service:

> While we recognize the importance of preserving litigants' rights to a trial on their claims, we are not prepared [24] to extend those rights to the point of requiring that anyone who files an antitrust complaint setting forth a valid cause of action be entitled to a full-dress trial notwithstanding the absence of any significant probative evidence tending to support the complaint.

Cities Service Co., 391 U.S. at 290, 88 S. Ct. at 1593.

Because we find no concerted activity, Dunnivant's procedural claim against supplier/Mid-State is dismissed as moot. Accordingly, the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the appellees is affirmed.

AFFIRMED.

Sollenbarger v. Mountain States Tel. & Tel. Co.

United States District Court for the District of New Mexico

August 15, 1988, Decided

Civil Action No. 87-1485-SC

Reporter
121 F.R.D. 417 *; 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13538 ; 1988-2 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,301

Roger SOLLENBARGER, Raleigh K. Gardenhire, Charles Wheeler and Peter Naumburg, for themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. MOUNTAIN STATES TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO., d/b/a Mountain Bell, a Colorado corporation, Defendant

Core Terms

customers, notice, contracts, class action, class certification, plaintiffs', relevant market, parties, antitrust, monopolization, predominance, class member, voidable contract, region, cases, void, member of the class, discovery, omissions, damages, pendent, merits, individual notice, contract law, misrepresentations, users, named plaintiff, pendent claim, certification, phone service

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN1[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

The class-action device was designed as an exception to the usual rule that litigation is conducted by and on behalf of the individual named parties only. Class relief is peculiarly appropriate when the issues involved are common to the class as a whole and when they turn on questions of law applicable in the same manner to each member of the class. For in such cases, the class-action device saves the resources of both the courts and the parties by permitting an issue potentially affecting every class member to be litigated in an economical fashion under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Judicial Discretion

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Judges > General Overview

HN2[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The trial judge's task in reviewing a motion to certify a class is to concentrate on the facts at the core of the dispute and determine the common legal and factual basis, if any, of the controversy without addressing the merits. The trial judge cannot rule on the merits of the controversy when examining a Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 motion.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Judicial Discretion

HN3[] Class Actions, Judicial Discretion

The decision on class certification involves considerations that are enmeshed in the factual and legal issues comprising the plaintiff's cause of action. The trial judge must rigorously scrutinize plaintiffs' various claims and consider if they are amenable to adjudication on a class-wide basis.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Judicial Discretion

HN4[] Class Actions, Judicial Discretion

Whether a case should be allowed to proceed as a class action involves intensely practical considerations, most of which are purely factual or fact-intensive. Each case must be decided on its own facts, on the basis of practicalities and prudential considerations.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Certification of Classes > Decertification

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Judicial Discretion

HN5[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The decision to certify a class is not set in stone; the trial court retains the power to decertify or modify the class at any time prior to final judgment. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(1).

Civil Procedure > Parties > Joinder of Parties > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Numerosity

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN6[] Parties, Joinder of Parties

All class actions must satisfy the prerequisites of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) which states that one or more members of a class may sue or be sued as representative parties on behalf of all only if (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable ["numerosity"], (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class ["commonality"], (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class ["typicality"], and (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class ["adequacy"]. The putative class must also satisfy one of the provisions of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b).

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Superiority

HN7[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

To satisfy the Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3), a court must find that the questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, ["predominance"] and that a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy ["superiority"]. The matters pertinent to the findings include: (A) the interest of members of the class in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions; (B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by or against members of the class; (C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; (D) the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action ["managability"].

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Class Attorneys > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Attorneys > General Overview

HN8[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Competence of counsel is one portion of the Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4) adequacy test for certification of a class. The adequacy requirement looks at both the class representatives and their counsel.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN9[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Predominance

A class action is maintainable under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) only if there is a finding that common questions predominate over individual issues. Since this obviously is a more stringent standard than that prescribed by Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2), rule 23(a)(2) is satisfied any time the court finds that the rule 23(b)(3) test is met.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN10[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

The typicality requirement for class certification under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3) assures that the claims of the representative party are similar enough to the claims of the class so that he will adequately represent them. The class representative must possess the same interest and suffer the same injury as the class members. However, the claims of the representative and the class need not be identical. Different fact patterns or amounts of damages will not necessarily defeat typicality.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

HN11[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A Sherman Act monopolization claim plaintiff must show that the defendant had (1.) monopolization power, (2.) over the relevant geographic and product market, (3.) gained by exclusionary or anti-competitive means that (4.) causes an injury cognizable under antitrust law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Claims

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN12[] Clayton Act, Claims

Monetary injury, standing alone, may be injury in one's property within the meaning of § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15. Thus, the fact that a petitioner was deprived of only money, albeit a modest amount, is no reason to conclude that she did not sustain a property injury. Nor does her status as a consumer change the nature of the injury she suffered or the intrinsic meaning of property in § 4. Consumers of retail goods and services have standing to sue under § 4.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Parker State Action Doctrine > General Overview

HN13[] Exemptions & Immunities, Parker State Action Doctrine

The state action defense shields anti-competitive conduct by private parties when state policy condones the conduct and the state actively supervises the conduct.

Civil Procedure > ... > Preclusion of Judgments > Full Faith & Credit > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Relations Among Governments > Full Faith & Credit

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > Pendent Claims

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Judicial Discretion

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Preclusion of Judgments > General Overview

Constitutional Law > Relations Among Governments > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Procedural Due Process > General Overview

Constitutional Law > ... > Fundamental Rights > Procedural Due Process > Scope of Protection

HN14[] Preclusion of Judgments, Full Faith & Credit

A multistate class action raises constitutional choice of law problems. The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and the full faith and credit clause of article IV, § 1 of the Constitution are not violated if the law of the forum state is not in conflict with that of any other jurisdiction connected to the suit. If the laws of the various states involved in the suit are in conflict, the court must then consider if an exercise of personal jurisdiction over the foreign state parties is appropriate.

Contracts Law > ... > Affirmative Defenses > Fraud & Misrepresentation > General Overview

HN15[] Affirmative Defenses, Fraud & Misrepresentation

A misrepresentation is an assertion that is not in accord with the facts. Concealment and in some cases non-disclosure of a fact are equivalent to such an assertion. A misrepresentation may have three distinct effects under the rules stated in this Chapter. First, in rare cases, it may prevent the formation of any contract at all. Second, it may make a contract voidable Third, it may be the grounds for a decree reforming the contract.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN16[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

The mere fact that the various members of the class will benefit unevenly is no such conflict as will preclude the maintenance of a class action.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Class Members > Named Members

HN17[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

The mere fact that some class members may not wish to become members of the class or pursue claims against the defendant does not indicate that their interests are antagonistic to those of the named plaintiffs or the remainder of the class, so that class action treatment would be inappropriate.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

HN18[] Class Actions, Prerequisites for Class Action

Every member of the class need not be in a situation identical to that of the named plaintiff. It is to be recognized that there may be varying fact situations among individual members of the class and this is all right so long as the claims of the plaintiffs and the other class members are based on the same legal or remedial theory.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN19[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The predominance inquiry under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) for the certification of a class is essentially a pragmatic decision by the district judge to determine if one or more of the central issues in the action are common to the class. The requirement ensures that claims of class members will be so similar that prosecution by a few members of the class will be fair and dictates that a court balance the interests of the litigants. The Tenth Circuit interpretation of rule 23(b)(3) focuses on the existence of a common nucleus of operative facts.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Judicial Discretion

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > Pendent Claims

HN20[] Class Actions, Judicial Discretion

If there is to be an error made, let it be in favor and not against the maintenance of the class action, for it is always subject to modification should later developments during the course of the trial so require.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Judicial Discretion

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Notice of Class Action

HN21[] Class Actions, Judicial Discretion

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2) provides that in any class action pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3), the court shall direct to the members of the class the best notice practicable under the circumstances, including individual notice to all members who can be identified through reasonable effort. To comport with due process individual notice must be sent to all class members whose names and addresses may be ascertained through reasonable effort.

Civil Procedure > ... > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > Supplemental Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN22[] Subject Matter Jurisdiction, Supplemental Jurisdiction

A determination to assume pendent jurisdiction is not irrevocable. The issue whether pendent jurisdiction has been properly assumed is one which remains open throughout the litigation. Pretrial procedures or even the trial itself may reveal a substantial hegemony of state law claims, or likelihood of jury confusion, which could not have been anticipated at the pleadings stage.

Counsel: [1] George Gary Duncan, Duncan & Gabell, Santa Fe, New Mexico, Robert J. Dyer, III, Stutz, Dyer, Miller & Delap, Denver, Colorado, for plaintiffs.

Seth D. Montgomery, Victor R. Ortega, Bradford V. Coryell, Montgomery & Andrews, P.A., Santa Fe, New Mexico, Dale Harris, Carole Jeffery, Davis, Graham and Stubbs, Denver, Colorado, for defendant.

Judges: Frank G. Theis, United States District Judge.

Opinion by: THEIS

Opinion

[*420] OPINION AND ORDER

FRANK G. THEIS, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

This matter comes before the court on plaintiffs' motion for certification of a plaintiff class under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) and defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiffs' pendent state law claim. The proposed class includes all present and past customers of Mountain Bell ("MB") who contracted for inside wire maintenance service ("IWMS") between 1982 and the present. Dkt. no. 47, para. 8(a). Plaintiffs contend MB monopolized IWMS in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, and that IWMS contracts are void or voidable under state contract law. The maintenance contracts at issue cover the wire that runs from the exterior of a house, through the walls, to the phone jack on an interior wall where the customer plugs a phone in. The court received extensive briefs and exhibits and [2] heard oral arguments on the class certification question. The court denied, though, MB's request for an evidentiary hearing on class certification. Dkt. no. 77. The court is now prepared to rule on the pending motions.

A short history of IWMS litigation against MB is helpful background information. In fall 1987, the state of Colorado filed suit against MB over the sale of IWMS in Colorado; the case quickly settled. Dkt. no. 47, para. 9(b)(4); Dkt. no. 51, para. 6. Plaintiffs filed the instant suit in New Mexico as a class action on behalf of New Mexico MB IWMS customers in December 1987. The complaint included state and federal antitrust, voidable contract, fraud and New Mexico statutory consumer protection counts. Dkt. no. 1. Two months later, plaintiffs amended their complaint: they expanded the geographic scope of the suit from New Mexico to all seven states MB operates in (Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Wyoming, Utah); they expanded the class definition from those who contracted for IWMS by the negative option method (described below) to all IWMS customers; they dropped the state antitrust and consumer protection law counts; they retained the federal antitrust [3] and pendent state law fraud and voidable contract claims. Dkt. no. 18. The court granted the motion to file the first amended complaint. Dkt. no. 45. The court granted MB's motion, however, to stay discovery on the seven state class action prior to class certification. Id. at 13. Plaintiffs' counsel filed state statutory and common law actions in three of the seven states, New Mexico, Colorado, and Montana, in late 1987 or early 1988 to toll the statute of limitations in those states. Tr. of Oral Argt. at 25.

IWMS contracts are a by-product of the deregulation of the telephone industry. Prior to 1982, MB, like all regional telephone companies, provided all facets of phone service and billed the customer with a single monthly charge. The one charge included an amount for MB's maintenance of the inside wire; however, the monthly bill did not break out the components of the single monthly charge. After a 1982 FCC order, all regional phone companies had to terminate some types of phone services, repairing phones for instance, while other services, like IWMS, became optional for customers. Phone customers could contract with MB for IWMS, do the work themselves or hire a third [4] party to service the inside wire. Plaintiffs allege MB devised a plan to monopolize IWMS contracts and continue to provide IWMS to its customers, despite the optional nature of the service. Dkt. no. 47 at paras. 16-30.

The named plaintiffs are four New Mexico residents who began phone service prior to 1982 and allegedly were victims of the first phase of MB's alleged monopolization plan. All plaintiffs assert they initially contracted with MB for IWMS via the "negative option" or "opt out" method. [*421] Sollenbarger Depo. at 7-9; Naumburg Depo. at 16; Wheeler Depo. at 12, 61; Gardenhire Depo at 14-15. MB sent out negative option notices to its customers in the seven states with the monthly billing statement in late 1982 or early 1983. The labels, negative option and opt out, describe the choice MB gave its customers in the notice: you will continue to have an IWMs contract unless you notify us that you do not want an IWMS contract.

Plaintiffs assert the opt out contract is void or voidable and part of MB's monopolistic conduct because: (1.) customers contracted for IWMS if they did nothing; (2.) MB knew that few customers would read the notice MB sent with the regular monthly billing, and [5] MB would retain a dominant share of IWMS contracts; (3.) if a customer read the notice, it did not adequately convey the optional nature of the service or provide IWMS contract terms. Dkt. no. 47 at paras. 17-19.

Three of the four class representatives, Sollenbarger, Naumburg, and Wheeler, allege injury from the second and ongoing pattern of reportedly illegal conduct by MB. Plaintiffs contend MB maintains its monopolistic control over IWMS contracts with new customers and those who change service (hereinafter "movers") by failing to disclose material information about IWMS in its oral representations to movers when they begin phone service with MB. Id. at para. 21. These three plaintiffs changed service at some time after the negative option sale and had personal contact with an MB customer service representative. The three named plaintiffs remember conversations with customer representatives but do not recall questions about IWMS. Sollenbarger Depo at 16-17, 54 ("well, typically, I'm the kind of guy that would not order a maintenance contract."); Wheeler Depo. at 66, 69-76; Naumburg Depo. at 18-21, 28, 52 (Naumburg is a real estate broker and called MB a number of times.).

[6] All four named plaintiffs participated in the third phase of MB's allegedly illegal conduct. Between 1982-87, state utility regulatory commissions had authority to regulate IWMS. After January 1, 1987, an FCC order completely deregulated IWMS. In late 1986 or early 1987 MB informed all of its customers, except Montana customers, about the end of government regulation over IWMS and that MB would send IWMS agreements to them in a short time. Dkt. no. 67 at 9, paras. 11-13. Plaintiffs allege MB failed to send out the promised agreements until late in the next year, continued to use the negative option sales method and failed to provide material information in the contract it did sent out. Dkt. no. 47 at paras. 23-29.

Plaintiffs' second and third counts arise under state voidable contract and fraud law. The state law counts allegedly arise from the same facts that support the monopolization claim of count I. Dkt. no. 47, Counts II and III; Tr. of Oral Argt. at 22 ("We've got identical facts for both claims."), 27.

MB's answer to the first amended complaint denied the substantive allegations of plaintiffs' complaint. Dkt. no. 51 at paras. 1-22. MB counterclaimed on an unjust enrichment [7] theory. MB contends that if a plaintiff class is certified and liability is ultimately assessed against MB, it should receive a set off against each plaintiff's recovery for the value of the service calls it performed. Id. at 9-10.

After addressing both the voidable contract and fraud claims in its two briefs on class certification, Dkt. nos. 33 & 73, plaintiffs' counsel apparently abandoned the fraud claim at oral argument. Counsel relied exclusively on contract law that allows a party to void a contract previously entered into because of material omissions in the contract terms, Restatement (Second) of Contracts §§ 159, 160, 162-164, 167; 12 Williston on Contracts § 1515 at 480, § 1515C at 495 (W. Jaeger ed. 1970). Tr. of Oral Argt. at 17, 71-72. Counsel also stated, "it's not an active fraud case, its a concealment case, and it's concealment in relationship to inducement of a contract." Id. at 19 and 14-15. Plaintiffs also relied exclusively on the contract theory in its response to the Motion to Dismiss the Pendent Claims. The court's analysis of the state law claim proceeds on the theory advocated [*422] by counsel at and after oral argument.

The court will address the documentary [8] evidence submitted by the parties in various sections below.

I. CLASS ACTION PRINCIPLES

A class action suit is a unique procedural device to efficiently litigate issues common to a large number of parties. The Supreme Court recently explained the purpose of class action suits:

> HN1[] The class-action device was designed as 'an exception to the usual rule that litigation is conducted by and on behalf of the individual named parties only.' Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 700-701 [61 L. Ed. 2d 176, 99 S. Ct. 2545]. Class relief is 'peculiarly appropriate' when the 'issues involved are common to the class as a whole' and when they 'turn on questions of law applicable in the same manner to each member of the class.' Id., at 701. For in such cases, 'the class-action device saves the resources of both the courts and the parties by permitting an issue potentially affecting every [class member] to be litigated in an economical fashion under Rule 23.'

Gen. Tel. Co. of the Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 155, 72 L. Ed. 2d 740, 102 S. Ct. 2364 (1982) (citations omitted).

HN2[] The trial judge's task in reviewing a motion to certify a class is to "concentrate on the facts at the core of the dispute and determine the common legal and factual basis, if [9] any, of the controversy without addressing the merits." Thompson v. Midwest Found. Indep. Physicians Ass'n., 117 F.R.D. 108, 109 (S.D. Ohio 1987). The district judge cannot rule on the merits of the controversy when examining a Rule 23 motion. "We find nothing in either the language or history of Rule 23 that gives a court any authority to conduct a preliminary inquiry into the merits of a suit in order to determine whether it may be maintained as a class action. Indeed, such a procedure contravenes the Rule. . . ." Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 177, 40 L. Ed. 2d 732, 94 S. Ct. 2140 (1974).

The district court cannot divorce itself, however, from the plaintiff's cause(s) of action. HN3[] The decision on class certification "involves considerations that are 'enmeshed in the factual and legal issues comprising the plaintiff's cause of action.'" Falcon, 457 U.S. at 160 (citations omitted). The trial judge must "rigorously" scrutinize plaintiffs' various claims and consider if they are amenable to adjudication on a class-wide basis. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 161; McCarthy v. Kleindienst, 239 U.S. App. D.C. 247, 741 F.2d 1406, 1412 n.6 (D.C. Cir. 1984); Joseph v. Gen. Motors Corp., 109 F.R.D. 635, 638 (D. Colo. 1986).

[10] The district judge enjoys a wide amount of discretion when deciding whether a suit should proceed as a class action. The Tenth Circuit explained that HN4[] "whether a case should be allowed to proceed as a class action involves intensely practical considerations, most of which are purely factual or fact-intensive. See [United States Parole Comm'n v.] Geraghty, 445 U.S. [388,] at 402-03 [100 S. Ct. 1202, 63 L. Ed. 2d 479 (1980)]. Each case must be decided on its own facts, on the basis of 'practicalities and prudential considerations.' Id. at 406 n.11." Reed v. Bowen, 849 F.2d 1307, 1309 (10th Cir. 1988).

HN5[] The decision to certify a class is not set in stone; the trial court retains the power to decertify or modify the class at any time prior to final judgment. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(1) ("An order under this subdivision . . . may be altered or amended before the decision on the merits."); Falcon, 457 U.S. at 160 ("Even after a certification order is entered, the judge remains free to modify it in the light of subsequent developments in the litigation." (footnote omitted)); In re School Asbestos Litigation, 789 F.2d 996, 1011 (3rd Cir. 1986) ("[A] district court must necessarily enjoy wide discretion, [11] and we are not inclined to reverse a certification before the district judge has had an opportunity to put the matter to a test. We point out the critical fact that certification is conditional. [*423] When, and if, the district court is convinced that the litigation cannot be managed, decertification is proper."), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 852, 107 S. Ct. 182, 318, 93 L. Ed. 2d 117 (1986).

Plaintiffs must demonstrate that the requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 are satisfied. Rex v. Owens ex rel. Oklahoma, 585 F.2d 432, 435 (10th Cir. 1978); Albertson's, Inc. v. Amalgamated Sugar Co., 503 F.2d 459, 463 (10th Cir. 1974). HN6[] All class actions must satisfy the prerequisites of Rule 23(a):

> One or more members of a class may sue or be sued as representative parties on behalf of all only if (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable ["numerosity"], (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class ["commonality"], (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class ["typicality"], and (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class ["adequacy"].

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a).

The putative [12] class must also satisfy one of the provisions of Rule 23(b). Plaintiffs assert compliance with Rule 23(b)(3):

> HN7[] the court finds that the questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, ["predominance"] and that a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy ["superiority"]. The matters pertinent to the findings include: (A) the interest of members of the class in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions; (B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by or against members of the class; (C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; (D) the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action ["managability"].

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

II. CLASS CERTIFICATION

Several of the Rule 23(a) requirements are not in dispute. First, the numerosity criterion is not challenged by MB. Plaintiffs estimate the seven state class includes at least three million current MB customers and an unknown number [13] of past customers. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1) is satisfied. Second, the competence of plaintiffs' counsel is not questioned by MB or the court. Dkt. no. 33, Ex. C (affidavits of class counsel). HN8[] Competence of counsel is one portion of the Rule 23(a)(4) adequacy test. Secretary of Labor v. Fitzsimmons, 805 F.2d 682, 697 (7th Cir. 1986); Jenkins v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 782 F.2d 468, 472 (5th Cir. 1986) ("The 'adequacy' requirement looks at both the class representatives and their counsel.").

The court also finds that some of the requirements of Rule 23(a) are subsumed within other provisions of the Rule; therefore, the court need not discuss them in separate sections to faithfully and fully examine the entire class certification issue. First, Professors Wright, Miller and Kane approve of reviewing the Rule 23 (a)(2) commonality question while analyzing the Rule 23(b)(3) question of predominance of common issues to the class and named representatives. They explain: HN9[] "An action is maintainable under Rule 23(b)(3) only if there is a finding that common questions predominate over individual issues. Since this obviously is a more stringent standard than that prescribed by Rule 23(a)(2), [14] subdivision (a)(2) would be satisfied any time the court finds that the subdivision (b)(3) test is met." 7A C. Wright, A. Miller & M. Kane, Federal Practice & Procedure § 1763 at 227 (2d ed. 1986) (hereinafter Federal Practice). The court will address the commonality arguments within the Rule 23(b)(3) discussion.

The second merger of tests within Rule 23(a) involves the (a)(3) requirement of typicality and the (a)(4) requirement that the named representative adequately represent the entire class. See Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157 n.13. The tests merge because "'if the representatives' claims are not typical of the class, they cannot adequately protect the interests [*424] of the absent class members.'" Spivak v. Petro-Lewis Corp., 118 F.R.D. 504, 509-10 (D. Col. 1987) (citing Kas v. Financial Gen. Bankshares, Inc., 105 F.R.D. 453, 461 (D.D.C. 1984)). The court finds Falcon and Spivak persuasive and will not burden this lengthy opinion with a repetitive section. The court will focus on the subdivision (a)(3) test.

A. MONOPOLIZATION CLAIM

MB attacks the antitrust count with three typicality arguments. Dkt. no. 67 at 17-27. HN10[] The typicality requirement "assures that the [15] claims of the representative party are similar enough to the claims of the class so that he will adequately represent them." 7A Federal Practice § 1768 at 232-33. The class representative must "'possess the same interest and suffer the same injury' as the class members." East Texas Motor Freight System Inc. v. Rodriguez, 431 U.S. 395, 403, 52 L. Ed. 2d 453, 97 S. Ct. 1891 (1977) (citation omitted). The similarity in interests between the representative parties and the rest of the class insures an absence of conflict between the two groups. In re Texas Int'l. Sec. Litig., 114 F.R.D. 33, 44 (W.D. Okla. 1987). The existence of significant antagonistic interests between the representatives and the class would defeat class certification.

Albertson's Inc. v. Amalgamated Sugar, 503 F.2d 459, 463 (10th Cir. 1974). The claims of the representative and the class need not be identical, though; different fact patterns or amounts of damages will not necessarily defeat typicality. Texas Int'l. Sec. Litig., 114 F.R.D. at 44; Joseph v. Gen. Motors Corp., 109 F.R.D. 635, 640 (D. Col. 1986); 7A Federal Practice § 1764 at 235-41.

HN11[] A Sherman Act monopolization claim plaintiff must show that the defendant [16] had (1.) monopolization power, (2.) over the relevant geographic and product market, (3.) gained by exclusionary or anti-competitive means that (4.) causes an injury cognizable under antitrust law. 15 U.S.C. §§ 2, 15; United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966).

MB's first typicality argument attacks the relevant market requirement. MB contends the relevant market is not the seven state region or even the seven separate states MB serves. Instead, MB insists at least 200 relevant markets exist within the seven states. MB's theory is that the relevant market area is localized. A competing IWMS company could only provide efficient and effective service to each large town in the region or portions of a metropolitan area. Hence, MB divides the seven states into 200 relevant markets based on centers of population.

MB proffered an expert witness to explain their relevant market theory to the court. Dkt. nos. 59, 72. The court denied an evidentiary hearing on this point because the relevant market, either geographic or product, is almost exclusively a fact question for the jury. Dkt. no. 77 at 3; Westman Comm'n. Co. v. Hobart Int'l. Co., 796 F.2d 1216, 1220 [17] (10th Cir. 1986); Cackling Acres, Inc. v. Olson Farms, Inc., 541 F.2d 242, 245-6 (10th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1122, 51 L. Ed. 2d 572, 97 S. Ct. 1158 (1977); Telex Corp. v. Int'l. Business Mach., 510 F.2d 894, 915 (10th Cir. 1975) (per curiam), cert. dismissed, 423 U.S. 802, 46 L. Ed. 2d 244, 96 S. Ct. 8 (1975); Colorado Interstate Gas Co. v. Natural Gas Pipeline Co., 661 F. Supp. 1448, 1463 (D. Wyo. 1987); Assoc. of Indep. Television Stations, Inc. v. College Football Assoc., 637 F. Supp. 1289, 1300 (W.D. Okla. 1986); ABA Antitrust Section, Antitrust Law Developments 113-14 (2d ed. 1984).

The court feared that at an evidentiary hearing the parties would have marshaled a "battle of the experts" on the relevant market issue. A fact specific documentary hearing would switch the court from the permissible inquiry of seriously examining plaintiffs' legal theory in the context of class action litigation, as required by Falcon, into the impermissible realm of a mini-trial on a merits issue that is precluded by Eisen. The testimony proffered by MB would have gone to the heart of an issue that could completely eliminate the monopolization claim and remove the jurisdictional basis for the voidable contract [18] [*425] claim. Plaintiffs would have had to vigorously defend the relevant market point to prevent a total dismissal of their suit. The court could not countenance this scenario in light of Eisen and the stay on merits discovery.

Moreover, plaintiffs' claim of a single market of seven states or seven markets defined by state boundaries is colorable under existing law and facts. In two different cases, the Supreme Court approved nationwide or regional relevant market determinations in situations where the defendant provided localized service. Otter Tail Power Co. v. United States, 410 U.S. 366, 35 L. Ed. 2d 359, 93 S. Ct. 1022 (1973); United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966). The Grinnell Court considered an allegation of monopolization of fire and police alarm service stations. The stations were the sole, centralized receiving points for fire and police alarms in cities across the country. The Court approved the district court's finding of a national relevant market:

> The activities of an individual station are in a sense local as it serves, ordinarily, only that area which is within a radius of 25 miles. But the record amply supports the conclusion that the business of providing such a service [19] is operated on a national level. There is national planning. The agreements we have discussed covered activities in many States. The inspection, certification and rate-making is largely by national insurers. The appellant ADT [a Grinnell Corp subsidiary with a 73% share of the national market] has a national schedule of prices, rates, and terms, though the rates may be varied to meet local conditions.

Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. at 575.

The Otter Tail Court let stand the jury's conclusion that a three state relevant market existed. 410 U.S. at 369-70. Otter Tail Power Company competed in 510 towns within its multistate relevant market against the local municipal power entities and nearby rural electric cooperatives for the exclusive rights to retail electricity in the municipality. Id. The numerous local arenas of competition did not defeat a regional definition of the relevant market.

Plaintiffs' limited discovery on this merits issue has produced some probative documents. While MB argues that there are 200 relevant markets, it analyzes IWMS participation on a state-wide basis, Dkt. no. 31, Ex. C (79% participation rate for each state MB services in a April 13, 1984 memo), [20] or a region-wide basis, Dkt. no. 73, Ex. H at 0033709 ("Presently [October 1984], about 80% of our residence customers have a basic wire maintenance plan with Mountain Bell."). When discussing the problems of notifying IWMS subscribers about the complete deregulation of IWMS, an MB manager described MB activity by states, not by smaller regions. Dkt. no. 73, Ex. J. MB's Idaho general counsel described legal problems in state-wide terms. Dkt. no. 33, Ex. D.

In short, MB's state or region-wide activity, even with numerous local service outlets, may fall within the parameters of Grinnell Corp. or Otter Tail. The court at this juncture cannot and should not determine this point. Foltz v. U.S. News & World Report, Inc., 106 F.R.D. 338, 341 (D.D.C. 1984) ("In view of the fact that the plaintiffs have presented a colorable case on the merits, the sufficiency of their fraud allegations does not enter into the class certification equation."); In re Indep. Gasoline Antitrust Litig., 79 F.R.D. 552, 561 (D. Md. 1978) ("The possibility that plaintiffs will not be able to prove their allegations at trial is not a proper basis for denying class certification." (citations omitted)).

[21] MB's legal authority on this point is inapposite. MB cites three cases for the unremarkable proposition that if numerous local markets exist the court could not certify a class because the class members from each market would have antagonistic interests. Dkt. no. 67 at 21. The cited cases are easily distinguishable. This court is not faced with readily apparent, distinct relevant markets such as the "36 warehouses [auction barns] in 11 geographic markets" that the court considered in Windham v. [*426] American Brands, Inc., 565 F.2d 59, 62 (4th Cir. 1977) (en banc), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 968, 56 L. Ed. 2d 58, 98 S. Ct. 1605 (1977), or the exclusive franchise territory agreements between the defendant brewers and their wholesalers in Vasiliow Co. v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 117 F.R.D. 345, 347 (E.D.N.Y. 1987).

In Abrams v. Interco Inc., 719 F.2d 23, 29-30 (2d Cir. 1983), plaintiffs did not allege a pattern of price fixing in their proposed nationwide consumer class action. Without an allegation of anti-competitive conduct common to all plaintiffs or significant guidance from the trial court on its reasons for rejecting class certification, the Abrams court concluded innumerable local markets existed for [22] the 3500 dealers of consumer items like Florsheim shoes and London Fog coats. Id. at 30-31. The court is confronted here with allegations of a region-wide monopolization plan, for one product and an easily identified plaintiff class.

MB's second antitrust typicality argument concerns the "antitrust injury" prong of a monopolization claim. MB cites to and quotes from several cases that enunciate a standard definition of the type of injury a monopolization plaintiff must suffer, i.e.: an "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent. . . ." Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488-89, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977); Dkt. no. 67 at 25. If MB is implicitly arguing that plaintiffs have not suffered an injury covered by § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, MB is incorrect. The Court in Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 60 L. Ed. 2d 931, 99 S. Ct. 2326 (1979), not cited by MB, expressly resolved any doubt that customers could suffer an antitrust injury. The Reiter Court explained:

> HN12[] Monetary injury, standing alone, may be injury in one's 'property' within the meaning of § 4 [of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15]. Thus, the fact that petitioner Reiter was deprived of only money, [23] albeit a modest amount, is no reason to conclude that she did not sustain a 'property' injury.
>
> Nor does her status as a 'consumer' change the nature of the injury she suffered or the intrinsic meaning of 'property' in § 4. That consumers of retail goods and services have standing to sue under § 4 is implicit in our decision in Goldfarb v. Virginia State Bar, 421 U.S. 773, 780, 782 [44 L. Ed. 2d 572, 95 S. Ct. 2004] (1975).

Reiter, 442 U.S. at 340-41 (emphasis added). A consumer antitrust class action that seeks to recover money is permissible. 15 U.S.C. § 15.

The more obvious thrust of MB's typicality argument is that if the plaintiff class is splintered into 200 relevant markets, the antitrust injury to members of the class is not identical and typicality is shattered. Dkt. no. 67 at 26. MB's argument hinges on the court accepting its relevant market theory. The court did not decide the relevant market question; MB's antitrust injury argument founders on this rocky, unresolved question. Additionally, as explained below, see slip op. at pp. 26-27, the possibility that plaintiffs could recover different amounts of damages does not destroy typicality. Dkt. no. 67 at 26-7, pts. 3 & 4.

MB also asserts that its state action [24] affirmative defense precludes class certification under the typicality test. Dkt. no. 67 at 21-4. HN13[] The state action defense shields anti-competitive conduct by private parties when state policy condones the conduct and the state actively supervises the conduct. Patrick v. Burget, 486 U.S. 94, 56 U.S.L.W. 4430, 4431, 100 L. Ed. 2d 83, 108 S. Ct. 1658 (1988) (citations omitted). The state action defense raises a common question of law with a single standard to the entire seven state proposed class; it is not particular to any one state or potential subgroup, like movers. MB is correct that the defense may eliminate some states from the class for the period prior to the end of government regulation, December 31, 1986. Dkt. no. 51 at 7; Dkt. no. 67 at 24. MB's ability to raise a potentially valid defense in some or all of the states for a significant but finite portion of time is not an obstacle to class certification, though. The defense may cause the composition of the class to [*427] change significantly at some later date but this does not alter the class certification inquiry. The claims of the named representatives are typical of the class.

MB does not challenge any of the remaining elements [25] of Rule 23 concerning the monopolization count. The court independently finds that Rule 23(b)(3) is met. The common questions of law, the elements of the monopolization claim fully enumerated and partially discussed above, dwarf, rather than merely predominate over, any individual questions. Second, the class action is a superior vehicle for this suit. The court agrees with the Supreme Court's percipient observation:

> "The aggregation of individual claims in the context of a class-wide suit is an evolutionary response to the existence of injuries unremedied by the regulatory action of government. Where it is not economically feasible to obtain relief within the traditional framework of a multiplicity of small individual suits for damages, aggrieved persons may be without any effective redress unless they may employ the class action device.

Deposit Guaranty Nat'l. Bank v. Roper, 445 U.S. 326, 339, 63 L. Ed. 2d 427, 100 S. Ct. 1166 (1980) (emphasis added). The monopolization claim is a suitable Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) class action.

B. VOID OR VOIDABLE CONTRACT CLAIM

1. Conflicts in State Law

Plaintiffs assert one pendent state law claim: the IWMS contracts are void or voidable under the Restatement (Second) [26] of Contracts §§ 159, 160, 162-64, 167. The court's first task is to determine if New Mexico contract law is similar to contract law in the other states in the proposed class. HN14[] A multistate class action raises constitutional choice of law problems. The due process clause of the fourteenth amendment and the full faith and credit clause of article IV, § 1 of the Constitution are not violated if the law of the forum state "is not in conflict with that of any other jurisdiction connected to this suit." Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 816, 86 L. Ed. 2d 628, 105 S. Ct. 2965 (1985). If the laws of the various states involved in the suit are in conflict, the court must then consider if an exercise of personal jurisdiction over the foreign state parties is appropriate. Shutts, 472 U.S. at 823; In re Seagate Technologies Sec. Litig., 115 F.R.D. 264, 271-72 n.14 (N.D. Cal. 1987); In re Computer Memories Sec. Litig., 111 F.R.D. 675, 686 (N.D. Cal. 1986). The court is convinced the laws of the seven states are not in conflict and the personal jurisdiction analysis is not required.

The court's analysis of the multiple state choice of law problem is guided by an opinion of the Supreme Court decided after [27] the parties completed briefing the class certification question. Sun Oil Co. v. Wortman, 486 U.S. 717, 56 U.S.L.W. 4601, 100 L. Ed. 2d 743, 108 S. Ct. 2117 (1988). The Wortman Court clarified the standard on when foreign state law is in sufficient conflict with forum state law to violate either the due process clause or the full faith and credit clause. The Constitution is not violated if "a state court misconstrue(s) the law of another State.

Rather, our cases make plain that the misconstruction must contradict law of the other State that is clearly established and that has been brought to the court's attention." Id. at 4605. The court reiterated more broadly that "relief cannot be granted in this Court [for constitutional violations because of conflicting state law] unless decisions plainly contradicting the Kansas court's interpretations were brought to the Kansas court's attention." Id. at n.4 (emphasis added).

The court does not find any "clearly established" or "plainly contradictory" contract law in the foreign states that conflicts with the relevant law of the forum state. Plaintiffs rely on a number of sections of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts to void or make [28] voidable the IWMS contracts because of material omissions of fact in all phases of MB's IWMS operations. The introductory note to the topic gives an overview of these sections:

> HN15[] A misrepresentation is an assertion that is not in accord with the facts (§ 159). Concealment (§ 160) and in some cases [428] non-disclosure (§ 161) of a fact are equivalent to such an assertion. A misrepresentation may have three distinct effects under the rules stated in this Chapter. First, in rare cases, it may prevent the formation of any contract at all (§ 163*). Second, it may make a contract voidable (§ 164). Third, it may be the grounds for a decree reforming the contract (§ 166).

Restatement (Second) of Contracts at 424 (Introductory Note) (1981).

The New Mexico Supreme Court upheld a trial court's reformation of a contract based on Second Restatement section 166. Chromo Mountain Ranch Partnership v. Gonzales, 101 N.M. 298, , 681 P.2d 724, 726 (1984). While section 166 is not the remedy provision plaintiffs would prefer, the Chromo Mountain court's adoption of the section is solid evidence of the New Mexico court's acceptance of the definitional sections plaintiffs do rely on. Restatement [29] (Second) of Contracts §§ 159-161 (1981). The forum state uses the law plaintiffs rely on.

Other courts within the class area also apply the relevant sections from the Second Restatement of Contracts. Morris v. Achen Const. Co., Inc., 155 Ariz. 512, ..., 747 P.2d 1211, 1213 (1987) (en banc) (the court cited to Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 167 ["When a Misrepresentation Is an Inducing Cause"] in distinguishing two causes of action); Hampton v. Cowen Agency, Inc., 154 Ariz. 14, , 739 P.2d 1331, 1332-33 (1987) (court reversed summary judgment based on Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 164); I.M.A., Inc. v. Rocky Mountain Airways, Inc., 713 P.2d 882 (Colo. 1986) (en banc) (court recognized rescission of a contract based on mistake or misrepresentation, Restatement (Second) of Contracts §§ 153, 164(1)); Colorado Plasterers' Pension Fund v. Plasterers' Unlimited, Inc., 655 F. Supp. 1184, 1186-87 (D. Colo. 1987) (Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 163); Connecticut Gen. Life Ins. Co. v. Dredge, 746 F.2d 1420, 1425 (10th Cir. 1984) (construing Utah law, the court voided a contract based on Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 164(2)), cert. [30] dismissed, 478 U.S. 1050, 92 L. Ed. 2d 789, 107 S. Ct. 38 (1986); In re Universal Clearing House Co., 77 Bankr. 843, 857 (Bankr. D. Utah 1987) (contract invalid under Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 164).

The court was unable to find relevant decisions from three jurisdictions of the proposed class: Idaho, Montana and Utah. The lack of law in these states is not problematic. The law in those states is not "clearly established" or contradictory to the forum state's law; therefore, no violation of the Constitution is possible under the Wortman standards. 56 U.S.L.W. at 4605 & n.4. The court also does not find that the application of certain provisions of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts to the three states is a radical step. The Restatement is widely accepted contract law. Id. at 4605 n.4 (the Court referred to "standard contract law" and cited the Restatement (Second) of Contracts); Robertson v. Clayton Brokerage Co. of St. Louis, 587 F. Supp. 678, 685 (N.D. Ga. 1984) ("It is hornbook law that a party who is induced to enter into a contract on the basis of fraudulent misrepresentations by the other party may treat the contract as voidable. Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 164 (1979)."). [31] An application of plaintiffs' contract law theory to the entire class would not violate the Constitution.

MB relies on Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 69(1)(b) for its defense that the negative option customers intended to contract with MB by their silence. Dkt. no. 67 at 44. This section and its identical predecessor, Restatement of Contracts § 72(1)(b), equate silence with acceptance when (1) the offeror manifests his or her desire to allow assent by silence or inaction and (2) the offeree intends his or her silence or inaction to signify acceptance.

New Mexico and three other states in the MB region have adopted either the relevant First or Second Restatement provision. United Leasing v. Commonwealth Land Title Agency of Tuscon, Inc., 134 Ariz. 385, , 656 P.2d 1246, 1250-51 (1982); Vogt v. Madden, 110 Idaho 6, , 713 P.2d 442, 444-5 (1985); Raton [*429] Wholesale Liquor Co. v. Besre, 49 N.M. 121, , 158 P.2d 295, 298 (1945) (Restatement of Contracts § 72); Garcia v. Middle Rio Grande Conservancy Dist., 99 N.M. 802, , 664 P.2d 1000, 1005 (1983), ("Silence is acceptance of a contract only when there is [32] a duty to speak.") cert. denied, 99 N.M. 740, 663 P.2d 1197 (1983); Russell v. Texas Co., 238 F.2d 636, 642 (9th Cir. 1956) (Montana law, Restatement of Contracts § 72(2)), cert. denied, 354 U.S. 938, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1537, 77 S. Ct. 1400 (1957).

The courts in two other states have either adopted a position almost identical to the Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 69(1) or expressed a willingness to adopt § 69. Brooks Towers Corp. v. Hunkin-Conkey Constr. Co., 454 F.2d 1203, 1207 (10th Cir. 1972) (applying Colorado law) ("When the relations between the parties justify the offeror's expectation of a reply or where a duty exists to communicate either an acceptance or rejection, silence will be regarded as an acceptance."); R.J. Daum Constr. Co. v. Child, 122 Utah 194, , 247 P.2d 817, 821 (1952) (the court cites Restatement of Contracts §§ 58-60, which refers to § 72); Frandsen v. Gerstner, 26 Utah 2d 180, , 487 P.2d 697, 700 (1971) (the court relied on Restatement of Contracts §§ 61, 64 & 73).

The lack of relevant law from Wyoming is not a problem under the constitutional choice of law analysis. First, the Constitution is violated only when clearly established foreign state law conflicts with forum [33] state law. Wortman, 56 U.S.L.W. at 4605. Second, the two identical Restatement provisions represent the continuous interpretation of contract law by American legal scholars for at least fifty years. MB's law is neither novel nor radical.

An application of the contract law relied on by the parties would not violate the due process clause or the full faith and credit clause. Wortman, 56 U.S.L.W. at 4605; Shutts, 472 U.S. at 816.

2. Customers Who Used IWMS

MB attacks the contract claim in the same way it attacked the antitrust count: lack of typicality between the representatives and the class members. One distinction MB draws is between IWMS customers who exercised their rights under their IWMS contracts (hereinafter "users") and those who did not, a group which includes all the named plaintiffs. Dkt. no. 67 at 27-30. MB asserts that its unjust enrichment counterclaim for services rendered under the IWMS contracts will consume all of and perhaps in some cases amount to more than the users' damages, if plaintiffs win on liability. The users, who may recover a small amount or have to pay MB because of the suit, are allegedly in conflict with the named parties, who [34] presumably will recover much more. Id.

The court's short response is "that HN16[] the mere fact that the various members of the class will benefit unevenly is no such conflict as will preclude the maintenance of a class action." Albertson's, Inc. v. Amalgamated Sugar Co., 503 F.2d 459, 464 (10th Cir. 1974); accord In re Texas Int'l. Sec. Litig., 114 F.R.D. 33, 44 (W.D. Okla. 1987) ("[A] disparity in the damages claimed by the representative parties and the other members of the class" does not defeat typicality.)

Second, MB's argument that users are satisfied customers, Dkt. no. 67 at 28, and thus have interests antagonistic to the disgruntled representatives is remarkably similar to an argument rejected in Joseph v. General Motors Corp., 109 F.R.D. 635 (D. Colo. 1986). The car manufacturer in Joseph disputed the typicality of a plaintiff class of all owners of certain model cars with allegedly defective engines because some members of the class undoubtedly liked their cars and would not want to sue GM. The Joseph court's response is correct: HN17[] "The mere fact that some class members may not wish to become members of the class or pursue claims against GM does not indicate [35] that their interests are antagonistic to those of the named plaintiffs or the remainder of the class, so that class action treatment would be inappropriate." Id. at 640.

The court is sensitive to MB's claim that antagonistic interests between users and [*430] non-users defeats typicality, Amalgamated Sugar, 503 F.2d at 463-64, and of the constitutional dimension of this concern, Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U.S. 32, 44, 85 L. Ed. 22, 61 S. Ct. 115 (1940). Dkt. no. 67 at 29. The due process problems identified by the Court in Hansberry, though, are embodied in the requirements of [Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3)] [typicality], (a)(4) [adequacy of representation] and (c)(2) [notice required in (b)(3) class actions]. [Blackie v. Barrack, 524 F.2d 891, 910 (9th Cir. 1975)]; See [In re Four Seasons Sec. Laws Litig., 502 F.2d 834, 842-43 (10th Cir. 1974)]. The court desires to comply with the Constitution and the Rule.

The distinction between this case and Amalgamated Sugar and Hansberry is the degree and apparentness of the purported conflicts between the representatives and the class. The Hansberry class consisted of groups diametrically opposed -- some wanted to enforce a racially discriminatory covenant [36] and some did not. [Hansberry, 311 U.S. at 44]. The Amalgamated Sugar facts are closer to this case but not controlling. The plaintiffs in Amalgamated were the purchasers of raw sugar from defendant's sugar processing plant, e.g. bakers, food processors and retail grocery chains. [503 F.2d at 461]. The Amalgamated Sugar court upheld a denial of class certification. The court realized that if it granted plaintiffs' request to change defendant's pricing system from one with eleven zones to a system based on actual miles from defendant's plant, some plaintiffs would immediately get a windfall competitive advantage. [Id. at 464]. The price for raw sugar would vary within the original zone system, based on a plaintiff's location within a zone, and some competitors would instantly have cheaper sugar. The court justified its denial of class certification on the conflicts of interest created by the disparate effects on competition inherent in plaintiffs' case. No effect on competition is present in this case and the certainty of extreme disparity in benefits is also not assured.

The parties hotly dispute whether any user would have to return money to MB and the amount that a user's [37] damages would be reduced by a service call. Compare MB's view, Dkt. no. 67 at 28, 29 n.6 with plaintiffs' computations, Dkt. no. 73 at 10 n.7. The court will not wade into this factual morass. Instead, the court adopts the stance taken by other courts that when the facts are more fully developed and a significant conflict between users and the rest of the class is apparent, the court can exclude the users from the class entirely or create a subclass for users. [Roper v. Consurve, Inc., 578 F.2d 1106, 1116 (5th Cir. 1978)], aff'd, [Deposit Guaranty Nat'l. Bank v. Roper, 445 U.S. 326, 339, 63 L. Ed. 2d 427, 100 S. Ct. 1166 (1980)]; [In re Indep. Gasoline Antitrust Litig., 79 F.R.D. 552, 559 (D. Md. 1978)].

3. Contracts Formed by the Negative Option Sale and Those Formed Later via Oral Representations

MB asserts the plaintiff class lacks typicality because of the differences in the two broad methods class members used to contract with MB for IWMS: the negative option sale in 1982 and 1983 and thereafter through oral discussions with MB customer representatives. Dkt. no. 67 at 30-33. Tenth Circuit law on typicality does not demand identical factual circumstances. [Milonas v. Williams, 691 F.2d 931, 938 [38] (10th Cir. 1982)] (HN18[]) "Every member of the class need not be in a situation identical to that of the named plaintiff. [Rich v. Martin Marietta Corp., 522 F.2d 333, 340 (10th Cir. 1975)]"), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1069, 75 L. Ed. 2d 947, 103 S. Ct. 1524 (1983); [Penn v. San Juan Hospital, Inc., 528 F.2d 1181, 1189 (10th Cir. 1975)] ("It is to be recognized that there may be varying fact situations among individual members of the class and this is all right so long as the claims of the plaintiffs and the other class members are based on the same legal or remedial theory.") (emphasis added). The court finds the Penn court's formulation of the typicality test of different facts but the same legal theory persuasive and dispositive here.

Plaintiffs allege they will prove after discovery that MB failed to disclose material facts that would affect all customers' decisions [*431] to contract for IWMS during all phases of IWMS sales. In addition to the omissions concerning the initial negative sale related above, plaintiffs allege omissions or concealment of facts in MB's billing practices. As MB admits, even though plaintiffs paid for IWMS each month, MB explained only once each year in Colorado that the "unregulated" [39] charge on the monthly bill was for IWMS. Dkt. no. 67 at 35. Plaintiffs document that in New Mexico no charge for IWMS appeared on monthly bills until July 1987 and then only under the shibboleth of "unregulated." Dkt. no. 73 at 28 n.16.

Plaintiffs' claim of omissions in the oral representations to customers by MB representatives since 1983 may have some class-wide validity. An MB memo in late 1987 reveals that in an unknown number of states its customer representatives did not tell customers IWMS was optional. The memo also details a change in customer relations: "Colorado is currently ending the sales by telling the customer that the maintenance plans are optional." Dkt. no. 73, Ex. I. A 1984 memo to MB customer representatives states cryptically that " much of the time the customer actually has a need not to know." Dkt. no. 31 at Ex. D, p. 1.

The court surmises that these practices, a failure to bill or bill with adequate specificity and a failure to represent that IWMS is optional in oral solicitations or to make that disclosure at a meaningless time, could support void or voidable contract claims under the relevant Restatement (Second) of Contracts provisions. While two basic [40] fact patterns emerge, the legal theory to remedy each is the same. The typicality requirement explained in Penn v. San Juan Hospital, 528 F.2d 1181, 1189 (10th Cir. 1975), is satisfied.

The court does not quarrel with the propositions found in the decisions MB cites on this issue, Dkt. no. 67 at 32-33; however, the court does not find them applicable on the instant facts. The named plaintiffs in the two district court cases MB cites wanted to proceed on different legal theories than the rest of the class. Bartelson v. Dean Witter and Co., 86 F.R.D. 657, 661 (E.D. Pa. 1980) (sex discrimination versus race discrimination); Amswiss Int'l Corp. v. Heublein, Inc., 69 F.R.D. 663, 667 (N.D. Ga. 1975) (in federal securities fraud litigation, affirmative misrepresentation claim representative is required to prove different elements than non-disclosure claim class members). These two decisions are consistent with Penn.

MB's reliance on East Texas Motor Freight System, Inc. v. Rodriguez, 431 U.S. 395, 52 L. Ed. 2d 453, 97 S. Ct. 1891 (1977) is equally unavailing. The Rodriguez Court held that in an employment discrimination suit over defendant's promotion policy and practice for a certain position, [41] the representatives, who were not qualified for the relevant promotion, could not represent a class of drivers who were qualified for the position. The Rodriguez holding represented a reaffirmation of the often repeated rule that the representative must "'possess the same interest and suffer the same injury' as the class members." Id. at 404 (citations omitted). The proposed class meets this definition: they all possess equivalent IWMS contractual interests and suffered the same injury -- allegedly they entered into void or voidable IWMS contracts.

MB makes a related argument that the named plaintiffs are not typical because their claims are factually broader than the rest of the class. Dkt. no. 67 at 47-48. The representatives, MB accurately states, do not remember reading the 1982 opt out notices or remember discussing IWMS with MB sales representatives when three of the four named plaintiffs changed phone service at some time after 1982. Id. MB is mistaken that plaintiffs complaint does not encompass these claims. Several paragraphs in the first amended complaint allege complete omissions during all stages of IWMS contract sales, Dkt. no. 47 at paras. 19, 27-29, as [42] well as omissions of material fact. Id. at paras. 18, 20-21, 23-26. Second, the factual differences in the allegedly deceptive practices asserted by the representatives and the rest of the class do not destroy typicality. Partial omissions are subsumed within complete omissions. The [*432] contract claims of the negative option and affirmative, orally solicited customers are sufficiently typical to allow class certification. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3). With typicality satisfied, the court finds further that the named representatives will adequately represent the class, Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4). See Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157 n.13; Spivak v. Petro-Lewis Corp., 118 F.R.D. 504, 509-10 (D. Col. 1987)

4. Customer Notice

MB's arguments on commonality and predominance, Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2), (b)(3), focus on the allegedly individual questions of contract intent and reliance that purportedly stem from the various types of notices it sent to customers in the seven states at various times. Dkt. no. 67 at 33-9, 49-54. The parties' contentions on this issue are capsulized in the following excerpt from a September 1987 MB internal memo concerning customer response to MB's August 1987 [43] IWMS notice to Colorado customers:

> The notification is a maintenance agreement in the form of what legal people call a negative option contract. That means that if the customer didn't before -- and doesn't now -- take action, the billing remains in effect and we continue the coverage. This notice has made customers aware that this charge has been part of their bill all this time -- and they don't like it.
>
> The product managers sent the mailing at the behest of our lawyers, who said it might be a good idea to avoid any future risk of antitrust implications by letting customers know of the deregulation and their choices. But they left it up to the product managers to make the final decision.

> According to John Gonzales, the notice has caused a flurry of calls to the business offices (over 6,000 as of yesterday). The customers are incensed because they were not aware they have been paying for wire maintenance all this time. John says 40 percent of the callers are canceling their contracts. So, we have an impact on both business office call volumes and on the bottom line.
>
> Another problem, as Tony Seese-Bieda explains it, is that inside wire was deregulated January 1, yet we are just now getting [44] the notice out in Colorado. Very few people remember the bill insert we sent them the first of the year alerting them to this change and saying the agreement would be sent to them "next month." And who knows how many even saw that first bill insert? (Notice is also currently going out in Utah, New Mexico and Malheur. Utah and New Mexico are sending it out in small bunches -- not all at once. Utah says about 20 percent of their calls to the business office are on this subject and 80 percent are canceling the service.)
>
> When Wyoming sent notice last spring, they had a lot of complaints and cancellations, also. Montana much earlier included inside wire among a list of other products and services being deregulated and it got relatively little notice. Also earlier, Idaho went to great lengths to inform its customers of the change and allow customers to affirm their desire to sign up. There was positive reaction.

Dkt. no. 73 at Ex. J (first emphasis in original).

In addition to MB's acknowledgment in the above memo of the possible inadequacy of the negative option notice and MB's potential liability for its conduct, plaintiffs point to other documents identified after minimal discovery [45] to blunt the multiple notice defense on a class-wide basis. First, they cite a finding from a 1984 MB marketing survey in Colorado: 71 percent of the MB customers interviewed stated they did not have an IWMS contract when 80 percent of MB Colorado customers did have IWMS contracts. Id. at Ex. H, pp. 0033711-12. Second, MB's customers in the seven states subscribed to IWMS at a 79 percent rate after the initial negative option sale, while in Oregon, a state where the public utility commission mandated an affirmative option sale of IWMS, 16.5 percent of the customers subscribed to IWMS. Id. at 28-29; Dkt. no. 31, Ex. C.

MB, on the other hand, accentuates the differences in the notices customers received [*433] in the seven states: Colorado and New Mexico customers received five notices during the relevant time period while Utah customers received the fewest, one; notices went out at different times, although the court notes that most notices are in two categories -- the negative option sale and the post-deregulation sale in late 1986 and 1987; state regulatory agencies approved some IWMS notices; and the court notes significant differences in the quality of notice given to customers [46] in the various states. Compare the first notices in Arizona and Wyoming with those in New Mexico and Idaho. Dkt. no. 67 at Ex.'s 2, 32 & 23, 16.

MB argues that "it cannot be subjected to a trial in which a broad, erroneous generalization [about inadequate notice] is applied to every customer." Id. at 35. The different notices in each state preclude commonality on the issue of contractual intent in the proposed seven state class, MB asserts. Under the Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 69(1)(b), the question of whether silence is acceptance is based on the offeree's intent. If the class members in the different states received notices with various contents, the proposed seven state class could not have reached a common point on contractual intent, MB surmises. Furthermore, customers throughout the class contracted for IWMS at different times and therefore received different amounts of notices. For example, a customer with service from 1982 or before to the present in New Mexico would have received five notices while a customer that started service in Montana in 1986 would have received two notices. Thus, even within a state, MB concludes, no common questions of contractual [47] intent can exist.

The result is a Sisyphian or never ending task for the court. MB proposes that the court would have to preside over legal proceedings estimated to last several hundred years: All plaintiffs would come before the court for a mini-trial on what notice they received, what their reaction to the notice was and whether they decided to contract for IWMS by remaining silent. Dkt. no. 67 at 51; Tr. of Oral Argt. at 41-42, 47-48.

While Methuselah could sit on the proceedings MB envisions, this court could not. The specter of lengthy proceedings is not dispositive, though. The court is not convinced every plaintiff will have to visit the courthouse. First, the scenario MB envisions would clearly contravene the requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) that common questions of law or fact predominate over individual questions. HN19[] The subsection (b)(3) predominance inquiry is essentially a "pragmatic" decision by the district judge to determine if "one or more of the central issues in the action are common to the class." 7A Federal Practice § 1778 at 528, 529. The requirement ensures that claims of class members will be so similar that prosecution by a few members of the class [48] will be fair and dictates that a court balance the interests of the litigants. 7A Federal Practice § 1777 at 518-19. The Tenth Circuit interpretation of subsection (b)(3) focuses on the existence of a "common nucleus of operative facts." Esplin v. Hirschi, 402 F.2d 94, 99 (10th Cir. 1968); Joseph v. General Motors Corp., 109 F.R.D. 635, 641 (D. Col. 1986).

The Tenth Circuit formulation of the (b)(3) predominance standard in Esplin of a common nucleus of facts is consistent with the explanation by the Advisory Committee to the 1966 revisions of Rule 23 on when a common law fraud class action is appropriate. The Committee instructed courts to determine if the defendant's fraudulent activity was common to the class:

> (A) fraud perpetrated on numerous persons by the use of similar misrepresentations may be an appealing situation for a class action, and it may remain so despite the need, if liability is found, for separate determination of the damages suffered by individuals within the class. On the other hand, although having some common core, a fraud case may be unsuited for treatment as a class action if there was material variation in the representations made or in [49] the kinds or degrees of reliance by the persons to whom they were addressed.

39 F.R.D. 69, 103 (1966).

The court believes the predominance test is satisfied. A common course of conduct [*434] to omit material information that would make the IWMS contracts void or voidable is colorable at this juncture. The ability of plaintiffs to succeed on the merits is not at issue now. Foltz v. U.S. News & World Report, Inc., 106 F.R.D. 338, 341 (D.D.C. 1984); In re Indep. Gasoline Antitrust Litig., 79 F.R.D. 552, 561 (D. Md. 1978). First, the evidence discussed above reveals that MB had some knowledge that customers were wholly unaware of the existence of IWMS contracts in 1984 and 1987 in Colorado. Discovery, stayed on the merits pending class certification, may prove that customers in the other states were as unaware of the existence or terms of IWMS contracts as Colorado customers.

Second, a common nucleus of facts on nondisclosure is colorable because MB may coordinate operations in the seven state region. MB's claim of wholly separate operations in each state is undercut by the language in several MB memorandums cited by plaintiffs. They indicate that MB's operations in each state were [50] not wholly independent. MB also listed the identical percentage of IWMS customers in all seven states in 1984. Plaintiffs' claim of a region wide plan to omit material information is also buttressed by the experience of MB's sister company in Oregon. In that state, the public utility regulatory body mandated an affirmative option contract and customers in large part refused to contract for IWMS. If plaintiffs can show a coordinated, region-wide operation by MB to omit material facts, plaintiffs may satisfy the provisions of Restatement (Second) of Contracts §§ 159-164.

To satisfy the predominance inquiry and rebut MB's claim of individual issues on the contract claim, plaintiffs rely on a line of authority that creates a rebuttable presumption of reliance on material misrepresentations in a class action voidable contract situation. Brickyard Homeowners' Assoc. Management Comm. v. Gibbons Realty Co., 668 P.2d 535, 543 (Utah 1983); Vasquez v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. 3d 800, 94 Cal. Rptr. 796, , 484 P.2d 964, 973 (1971); 12 Williston on Contracts § 1515 at 480, § 1515C at 495 (W. Jaeger, ed. 1970). The court notes that an inference of reliance is logical in an omission of [51] material facts situation because of the difficulty in proving what the party would have done if it had had the relevant information. The court also recognizes the Supreme Court's broad approval of presumptions in cases like this one where "direct proof . . . . is rendered difficult" and "considerations of fairness, public policy, and probability, as well as judicial economy" make presumptions "useful." Basic Inc. v. Levinson, 485 U.S. 224, 108 S. Ct. 978, 990, 99 L. Ed. 2d 194 (1988).

The court, however, agrees with MB that the creation of a rebuttable presumption does not solve the predominance of common questions problem; it merely begs the predominance question. Tr. of Oral Argt. at 46-47. First, the courts in Vasquez and Brickyard Homeowner' assumed a common set of misrepresentations to the plaintiff class. 484 P.2d at 973; 668 P.2d at 543. Second, the defendant must be able to set up a class wide defense in rebuttal.

As stated above, the court believes plaintiffs may be able to show class wide omissions of fact in all IWMS transactions after discovery. The presumption of reliance would then be helpful to plaintiffs but not dispositive of the formation of contract issue. The further development of the [52] facts on the void/voidable contract question will determine whether this issue is ultimately submitted to a jury as a class action.

MB relies principally on two cases from other circuits, Simer v. Rios, 661 F.2d 655 (7th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 917, 72 L. Ed. 2d 177, 102 S. Ct. 1773 (1982) and In re Hotel Telephone Charges, 500 F.2d 86 (9th Cir. 1974), to support its contention that issues of intent and reliance are individual questions and per se preclude class certification. Dkt. no. 67 at 36-38, 50-54. The court finds neither case persuasive. The Simer decision is inapplicable for two reasons. First, MB's extensive quotations from Simer are all taken from a dicta section of the opinion. The district court and the Seventh Circuit determined class certification was improper because it was impossible to identify the plaintiff class. Simer, 661 F.2d at 669-71. The Simer [*435] court's entire discussion of how and why individual questions preclude predominance of common questions, Id. at 671-77, was entirely unnecessary for resolution of the appeal. MB cites only to the predominance section. Furthermore, the Seventh Circuit discussed the (b)(3) requirements without the benefit [53] of the parties raising the issue below, the district court passing on the question or the parties briefing or arguing the point on appeal. Id. at 671 n.28. This court finds legal discourse created in a vacuum -- without the benefit of arguments, briefs or a decision below -- of little value.

Second, the dicta portions of Simer MB relies on are also not analogous to the instant facts. The proposed class in Simer consisted of all indigent persons who failed to apply for a subsidized utilities program because of an invalid, overly restrictive federal regulation. The court found that the two critical issues remaining in the case were not amenable to class treatment because they concerned the state of mind of each plaintiff. The first issue was a rehash of the identity problem decided earlier in the opinion. The Seventh Circuit found it impossible to divine who might have applied for energy assistance grants if the regulation was properly drawn. Simer, 661 F.2d at 669-71 & 673. The identity of the proposed class is not at issue in the instant litigation. The second state of mind issue identified by the Simer court was damages: What damages did the plaintiff suffer [54] because of his or her perceived inability to apply for utility assistance. Id. at 673, 675. Damages are also easily calculated in this case. Simer is not controlling.

The Ninth Circuit in In re Hotel Telephone Charges, 500 F.2d 86 (1974), reversed class action certification on a class with two claims -- antitrust conspiracy and fraud. Hotel Charges, as another court recognized, "involved 'virtually every manageability question possible.'" Six Mexican Workers v. Arizona Citrus Growers, 641 F. Supp. 259, 267 (D. Ariz. 1986). The plaintiff class consisted of nearly forty million persons with an average recovery of two dollars per person. The defendants included forty-seven hotel chains and approximately six hundred individual hotels. Hotel Charges, 500 F.2d at 88. The debilitating manageability concerns found in Hotel Charges are not present here. The defendant class is one corporation instead of many, and the plaintiff class is smaller, easier to identify and each class member has a much larger claim. Second, the lack of common misrepresentations by the hundreds of entities in Hotel Charges is not apparent here. MB made all the representations and the plaintiffs [55] may show after completion of discovery that all representations lacked material facts about IWMS.

While the court is not totally free of doubt on the predominance of common questions in the pendent claim, the court agrees with the Tenth Circuit that HN20[] "if there is to be an error made, let it be in favor and not against the maintenance of the class action, for it is always subject to modification should later developments during the course of the trial so require." Esplin v. Hirschi, 402 F.2d 94, 99 (10th Cir. 1968); accord In re School Asbestos Litig., 789 F.2d 996, 1011 (3rd Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 852, 107 S. Ct. 182, 318, 93 L. Ed. 2d 117 (1986); Spivak v. Petro-Lewis Corp., 118 F.R.D. 504, 506 (D. Col. 1987); see Gen. Tel. Co. of the Southwest v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 160, 72 L. Ed. 2d 740, 102 S. Ct. 2364 (1982) ("Even after a certification order is entered, the judge remains free to modify it in the light of subsequent developments in the litigation.")

The court views the Tenth Circuit's instruction in Esplin persuasive here for several reasons. First, the facts of this case are not yet fully developed. Discovery on the merits has been stayed. A grand scheme by MB to omit material facts may or may not develop [56] from the admissible evidence. The applicability of class wide proof may go from colorable to plausible or to untenable. In stark contrast, the Tenth Circuit refused to apply the Esplin 'err in favor of certification' reasoning when the facts of the litigation would not change by discovery or subsequent proceedings. Wilcox v. Commerce Bank of Kansas City, [*436] 474 F.2d 336, 344 (10th Cir. 1973). Second, the court may reduce the number of states in the class after ruling on the state action defense. A change in the states included in the class could significantly alter the ease or difficulty of class wide proof. Third, the court continues to have the power to decertify the class, Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(1), or to entertain a subsequent motion for summary judgment or to dismiss. The class certification decision is not carved in stone tablets.

The court finds that the predominance of common questions test of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) is met.

5. Superiority

Finally, the court considers the second test of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3): Is a class action suit a superior method to adjudicate the controversy? The court concludes that a class action is a fair and efficient method for resolving plaintiffs' [57] claims. Plaintiffs have small claims that they could not effectively litigate on an individual basis. Without the class action procedure, plaintiffs would have no remedy for the allegedly void or voidable contracts. 7B Federal Practice § 1781 at 25. The efficacy of resolving all plaintiffs' claims in a single proceeding is beyond discussion. MB's arguments on the lack of common questions and conflicting state law, Dkt. no. 67 at 56-57, are discussed elsewhere in this opinion. The pendent claim satisfies Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

III. NOTICE

The parties dispute both who should receive individual notice within the class and how plaintiffs should send individual notice to the class. The dispute about who should receive individual notice concerns past customers of MB. MB's records are based on telephone numbers, though, not customers' names. MB keeps computerized records of all telephone numbers for approximately six months. For customers who changed telephone numbers or telephone service at a telephone number more than six months earlier, information about the customer and the number is available on microfiche. The information on microfiche is accessed by putting each fiche [58] in a machine for viewing and then manually recording information from the viewing screen. Dkt. no. 33 at 36-39. Plaintiffs propose to provide notice to all inactive customers, those whose telephone numbers are on microfiche, by publication. MB contends plaintiffs must retrieve each inactive customers' name from the microfiche records and give them individual notice.

HN21[] The Rule provides that in any (b)(3) class action, "the court shall direct to the members of the class the best notice practicable under the circumstances, including individual notice to all members who can be identified through reasonable effort." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2). In the seminal case interpreting Rule 23 (c)(2), the Court held that to comport with due process " individual notice must be sent to all class members whose names and addresses may be ascertained through reasonable effort." Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 173, 40 L. Ed. 2d 732, 94 S. Ct. 2140 (1974). The hallmark of the notice inquiry in cases before and after Eisen is reasonableness. See Tulsa Professional Collection Services, Inc. v. Pope, 485 U.S. 478, 108 S. Ct. 1340, 1344, 99 L. Ed. 2d 565 (1988); Mullane v. Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., 339 U.S. 306, 314, 94 L. Ed. 865, 70 S. Ct. 652 (1950).

The court [59] accepts plaintiffs argument that it is unreasonable for plaintiffs to retrieve the names of all inactive customers for the past five years from MB's microfiche telephone number records. The task MB proposes is unreasonable because it is futile; it would not provide notice to more customers. First, if a customer moved within MB's seven state region during 1982-87 and is currently a phone customer, he or she will receive notice as a current customer. Second, if a customer discontinued service with MB and moved out of the region, MB's records would not provide plaintiffs with a current address. If plaintiffs sent notice to a non-current address, the inactive customer would not receive notice.

[*437] Third, the number of past customers who discontinued service and did not move out of MB's region or resume service with MB in another part of the seven state area is quite small. In 1987, nearly ninety-three percent of Americans had phone service. Farmer's Almanac (1988). Of those who do not now have phone service, the number that had phone service, discontinued it and stayed at the same address is undoubtedly small. Moreover, the cost of retrieving the names of all past customers and sending [60] out first-class individual notice to them is patently unreasonable in light of the limited benefit this gargantuan task would provide. The court finds that publication notice to inactive customers complies with Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2).

The second notice question is how plaintiffs should provide individual notice to the class members who are current MB customers. Plaintiffs propose to send notices out via MB's monthly billing statements. The Court in Oppenheimer Fund v. Sanders, 437 U.S. 340, 355 n.22, 57 L. Ed. 2d 253, 98 S. Ct. 2380 (1978), generally approved of the arrangement plaintiffs propose. This arrangement is permissible if the defendant can perform some or all of the tasks related to providing notice with greater ease than plaintiffs. Id. at 356-57.

The Oppenheimer Fund test is easily met in this case. The alternative to MB stuffing inserts in its monthly bills, a service MB sells to businesses for 2.1 cents per insert, is unreasonably difficult and expensive. Plaintiffs would have to create a computer program to retrieve all the current customers and their addresses, purchase envelopes and postage, transfer the current customers' addresses to the envelopes, and stuff an insert into the envelopes. [61] This alternative process would cost more than ten times as much, in postage alone, than including an insert in MB's monthly billing. The limited increase in awareness of the suit this method would provide to the class does not warrant the drastic increase in cost. Plaintiffs may provide individual notice to the current class members by placing an insert into MB's monthly bills.

The court will review the content of the individual notice and the publication notice and review the amount MB will charge plaintiffs for sending out notices at a later date.

IV. MOTION TO DISMISS PENDENT CLAIM

After the hearing on class certification, MB filed a motion to dismiss plaintiffs' pendent state claims. Dkt. nos. 85 & 86. The court issued an order on July 14 which stayed resolution of the class certification question until full briefing on the motion to dismiss. Dkt. no. 88. The parties have now fully briefed the additional question, and the court is prepared to rule.

The parties agree that the court has jurisdiction to hear the pendent claim but differ over whether the court should exercise its discretion to hear it. The inquiry is governed by the Supreme Court's now well known enumeration of [62] the relevant factors in United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 726-27, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218, 86 S. Ct. 1130 (1966). Like a decision on class certification, HN22[] a determination to assume pendent jurisdiction is not irrevocable. "(T)he issue whether pendent jurisdiction has been properly assumed is one which remains open throughout the litigation. Pretrial procedures or even the trial itself may reveal a substantial hegemony of state law claims, or likelihood of jury confusion, which could not have been anticipated at the pleadings stage." Id. at 727.

The court first finds that "considerations of judicial economy, convenience and fairness to litigants" do exist and support a decision to retain the pendent claim. Id. at 726. Plaintiffs seek to go to trial in one forum on a suit that concerns MB's conduct in seven states. Obviously, the procedure plaintiffs envision is the most economical. The cost of discovery in time and money for depositions, interrogatories and the production of documents will be the least with one plaintiff class that encompasses all seven states instead [*438] of seven plaintiff class actions in seven states. Under plaintiffs' proposal, the federal court in one state is burdened with [63] a protracted suit. If the pendent claim is dismissed, plaintiffs in seven states would have to file state court actions. Although this suit is complex, the court finds that the judicial systems in the seven state region would on the whole have considerably less work if the pendent claim is retained with the federal action.

The court also finds plausible at this point plaintiffs contention that the evidence it will introduce to support the pendent contract claim and the antitrust claim will be largely coextensive. The omissions of material fact which the voidable contract claim rests on will also demonstrate MB's exclusionary or restrictive conduct under the monopolization count, plaintiffs assert. The lack of significant additional trial time to prove the pendent claim is important. While the benefits to the court of economy and convenience are substantial, the court must also consider other factors. Id. at 726-27.

MB argues that the pendent claims would cause immense jury confusion. Dkt. no. 86 at 4-10 & Dkt. no. 95 at 3-4. The court does not find this contention as troublesome as MB does. First, some of the possible confusion MB notes is eliminated by plaintiffs not pressing [64] the fraud claim. As noted above, see p. 421, plaintiffs focused on the void or voidable contract count at oral argument and in their Response to the Motion to Dismiss, Dkt. no. 95. Second, also as described above, see slip op. at pp. 21-26, the law on the voidable contract claim is similar enough in the foreign states and the forum state to pass constitutional choice of law analysis. The similarity in the substantive contract law eliminates much of the complex decision making matrix MB uses to argue against the assertion of pendent jurisdiction. Third, if the factual circumstances are as divergent as MB claims, the case will not proceed to the jury as a class action. With these points mooted or muted, MB's jury confusion contention lacks force.

The parties also spend much of their time on damages issues. Dkt. no. 87 at 4-7; Dkt. no. 95 at 4-9. First, they dispute whether a contract measure of damages like restitution is permissible under antitrust law and if the restitution-antitrust damages remedy is available without the pendent claim in the case. As MB notes, these issues are not germane at this time. Dkt. no. 95 at 6. Second, MB is concerned that one or two states allow punitive damages [65] on a contract action. Dkt. no. 95 at 5 n.1. MB argues that the potential use of this remedy improperly expands and complicates the damages section of the action. The specter of this problem in a minority of states does not carry particular weight at this juncture with the court. The court notes that plaintiffs may lack after discovery sufficient facts to support a punitive damages claim in those states. Also, MB's state action defense may remove the federal claim covering those states to which the contract claim is appended and totally eliminate those states from the plaintiff class. The court can deal with the punitive damages problem, if it arises, at a later date.

The court does not believe this is the "exceptional" case where it should decline to exercise its jurisdictional power over the pendent claims. Phillips v. Smalley Maintenance Services, Inc., 711 F.2d 1524, 1531 (11th Cir. 1983); 13B Federal Practice § 3567.1 at 144 (1984). The extensive amount of resources of both the judiciary and the parties saved by continuing the case in its current posture, rather than causing plaintiffs to file seven class actions, is an extremely important consideration. The court does [66] not discount lightly MB's concern about the lack of case law on point in several states. Dkt. no. 95 at 12-13. The court is not surprised that this situation has not arisen previously because of the recent break up of AT&T. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts provisions plaintiffs and defendant rely on are not radical shifts in the law. They are both direct descendents of the original Restatement. If some of the arguments MB asserts ultimately materialize, the court always retains the power to alter this decision. [*439] Gibbs, 383 U.S. at 727. The motion to dismiss is denied.

IT IS BY THE COURT THEREFORE ORDERED that the Motion to Certify the Plaintiff Class is granted on the monopolization and voidable contracts counts. IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Motion to Dismiss Pendent Claims is denied.

At Wichita, Kansas, this 12th day of August, 1988.

Williams Elec. Co. v. Honeywell, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit

August 15, 1988

Nos. 87-3235, 87-3402

Reporter

1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 19543 *; 854 F.2d 389; 1988-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P68,109

WILLIAMS ELECTRIC COMPANY, INC., Plaintiff-Appellant, v. HONEYWELL, INC., and John Geis, Defendants, J.V. Clark Electric Company, Inc., and William Warren Harmon, Defendants-Appellees. WILLIAMS ELECTRIC COMPANY, INC., Plaintiff-Appellant, v. HONEYWELL, INC., J.V. Clark Electric Company, Inc., William Warren Harmon, Defendants, John Geis, Defendant-Appellee.

Subsequent History: Later proceeding at Williams Electric Co. v. Honeywell, Inc., 772 F. Supp. 1225, 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10659 (N.D. Fla., 1991)

Prior History: [*1] Appeals from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida.

Williams Electric Co. v. Honeywell, Inc., 847 F.2d 741, 1988 U.S. App. LEXIS 12721 (11th Cir. Fla., 1988)

Disposition: Judgment of district court reversed.

Core Terms

Electric, personal jurisdiction, subcontracts, district court, negotiations, antitrust, contacts, long-arm, minimum contact, forum state, violations, tortious

LexisNexis® Headnotes

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Minimum Contacts

HN1[] Jurisdiction, Jurisdictional Sources

In order for the district court to exercise personal jurisdiction, sufficient "minimum contacts" with Florida must be present to satisfy due process requirements. The contacts must also meet the requirements of the Florida long-arm statute.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > General Overview

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedent

HN2[] Jurisdiction, Jurisdictional Sources

The United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit has adopted as precedent the decisions of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit rendered prior to October 1, 1981.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN3[] Jurisdiction, Jurisdictional Sources

A court cannot exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant solely on the basis of his employer's contacts with the forum state.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN4[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, In Personam Actions

A defendant's status as an employee does not somehow insulate him from jurisdiction. The critical inquiry is whether the individual defendant can incur personal liability for his acts in the forum.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > General Overview

HN5[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Clayton Act

Under the Clayton Act an individual employee can be held liable for any illegal actions he authorized, ordered, or in which he participated while acting in his corporate capacity, 15 U.S.C.S. § 24.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Minimum Contacts

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN6[] In Personam Actions, Minimum Contacts

In determining if the assumption of personal jurisdiction over a non-resident defendant comports with due process, a two-part analysis must be made. The court must first ascertain whether defendants purposefully established "minimum contacts" with the forum state. If the requisite minimum contacts do exist, the court must then decide whether the forum's exercise of personal jurisdiction over the non-resident defendants would offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice."

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Minimum Contacts

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN7[] In Personam Actions, Minimum Contacts

The Supreme Court of the United States has noted that there are two types of personal jurisdiction: specific and general.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Minimum Contacts

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN8[] In Personam Actions, Minimum Contacts

Specific jurisdiction derives from a party's contacts with the forum that are related to the cause of action.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Subject Matter Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN9[] Jurisdiction, Subject Matter Jurisdiction

General personal jurisdiction is grounded on the defendant's contacts with the forum that are unrelated to the litigation. General personal jurisdiction comports with due process only if the defendant's contacts with the forum state are "continuous and systematic."

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN10[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, In Personam Actions

A forum may exercise personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant if that defendant purposefully directs its activities at the residents of the forum state. Such a purpose occurs when a meeting in the forum state involves significant negotiations of important terms of a contract.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Minimum Contacts

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN11[] In Personam Actions, Minimum Contacts

When minimum contacts have been established, often the interests of the plaintiff and the forum in the exercise of jurisdiction will justify even the serious burdens placed on the defendant.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > Constitutional Limits

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN12[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, Constitutional Limits

The Florida long-arm statute requires more activities or contacts to confer personal jurisdiction than those demanded by the Constitution.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > Jurisdictional Sources > General Overview

Torts > Procedural Matters > Commencement & Prosecution > In Personam Jurisdiction

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

Torts > Procedural Matters > Commencement & Prosecution > General Overview

HN13[] Jurisdiction, Jurisdictional Sources

The long-arm statute, Fla. Stat. ch. 48.193(1)(b) (1985), allows a federal district court in Florida to exercise personal jurisdiction over any person who commits a tortious act within Florida.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

Torts > Business Torts > Unfair Business Practices > General Overview

HN14[] Private Actions, Remedies

Given the unreasonable effect antitrust violations have on competition, such activity is tortious (11th Cir.).

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

Torts > Procedural Matters > Commencement & Prosecution > In Personam Jurisdiction

Torts > Procedural Matters > Commencement & Prosecution > General Overview

HN15[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, In Personam Actions

For personal jurisdiction to attach under the "tortious activity" provision of the Florida long-arm statute, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the non-resident defendant committed a substantial aspect of the alleged tort in Florida. Such a showing is properly made by establishing that the activities in Florida "were essential to the success of the tort."

Counsel: FOR APPELLANT: Bert Moore, Moore and Moore, P.A., Niceville, FL.

FOR APPELLEE: Robert P. Gaines, Beggs and Lane, Pensacola, FL. Judith W. Simmons, Foley & Lardner, Tampa, Florida. William C. Owen, CARLTON, FIELDS, WARD, ETC. P.A., Tallahassee, FL.

FOR JOHN GEIS, APPELLEE: James M. Landis, Carolton, Fields, ward, etc. P.A., Tampa. FL.

Judges: Before HILL, Circuit Judge, HENDERSON *, Senior Circuit Judge, and MURPHY , District Judge.

Opinion

CORRECTED OPINION

Williams Electric Company, Inc. ("Williams Electric"), a Florida corporation, appeals from the dismissal of its complaint against J.V. Clark Electric Company, Inc. ("Clark Electric"), John Geis and William Warren Harmon by the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida for lack of personal jurisdiction. We reverse.

On September 24, 1982, the United States Air Force awarded Williams Electric a prime [*2] contract for the construction of a new electrical switching station at Sheppard Air Force Base in Wichita Falls, Texas. A provision of this contract required that all work on the Energy Monitoring and Control Systems ("EMCS") at the base be completed as recommended by or under the supervision of Honeywell, Inc. ("Honeyell"), who originally had installed the EMCS.

Honeywell insisted on tying any recommendations to Williams Electric to a subcontract to purchase Honeywell products for the EMCS portion of the contract and for certain sections of the contract that were unrelated to EMCS. Honeywell also required Williams Electric to enter into a subcontract with Clark Electric, a Texas corporation, for the installation of Honeywell EMCS products at the switching station.

Before these proposed subcontracts were executed, Harmon and Geis, representing Clark Electric and Honeywell respectively, met with Harvey Williams, the president of Williams Electric, in Okaloosa County, Florida. During this meeting, Geis disclosed to Williams that if his company did not enter into a subcontract with Clark Electric, then Honeywell would not sign an agreement with Williams Electric. The district court [*3] found that, during these negotiations in Okaloosa County, material changes were made to the proposed subcontracts. These subcontracts were then executed in Florida.

On November 6, 1986, Williams Electric filed this action in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida against Honeywell, Clark Electric, Geis and Harmon alleging federal and Florida antitrust violations. Honeywell answered the complaint and is not a party to these appeals. Clark Electric and Harmon moved to quash service of process because they claimed the district court lacked personal jurisdiction over them. Geis filed a motion to dismiss on the same ground. After a hearing, the district court granted the appellees' motions.

HN1[] In order for the district court to exercise personal jurisdiction over Geis, Harmon and Clark Electric, sufficient "minimum contacts" with Florida must be present to satisfy due process requirements. International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316, 66 S. Ct. 154, 158, 90 L. Ed. 95, 102 (1945). The contacts must also meet the requirements of the state long-arm statute. See Gold Kist, Inc. v. Baskin-Robbins Ice Cream Co., 623 F.2d 375, 377 (5th Cir. 1980). [*4] [1]

Harmon and Geis maintain that the court cannot exercise personal jurisdiction over them because they acted in their representative, not individual, capacities. Indeed, HN3[] a court cannot exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant solely on the basis of his employer's contacts with the forum state. Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 790, 104 S. Ct. 1482, 1487, 79 L. Ed. 2d 804, 813 (1984). However, as Calder explained, HN4[] a defendant's "status as [an] employee does not somehow insulate [him] from jurisdiction." Id. The critical inquiry is whether the individual defendant can incur personal liability for his acts in the forum. Delong Equipment Co. v. Washington Mills Abrasive,

* See Rule 34-2(b), Rules of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

 Honorable Harold L. Murphy, U.S. District Judge for the Northern District of Georgia, sitting by designation.

1 In Bonner v. City of Prichard, 661 F.2d 1206, 1207 (11th Cir.1981), HN2[] the Eleventh Circuit adopted as precedent the decisions of the Fifth Circuit rendered prior to October 1, 1981.

840 F.2d 843, 852 (11th Cir.1998). In Delong, this court, in finding jurisdiction over an [*5] individual defendant in an antitrust action brought under the same provisions as the one brought by Williams Electric, observed that HN5[] under the Clayton Act an individual employee could be held liable "for any illegal actions he authorized, ordered, or in which he participated" while acting in his corporate capacity. Id. (citing 15 U.S.C. 24). Therefore, we reject the contention of Harmon and Geis that their representative status puts them beyond the reach of the Florida court's jurisdiction. We assess their contacts with Florida just as we examine Clark Electric's contacts. HN6[] In determining if the assumption of personal jurisdiction over a non-resident defendant comports with due process, a two-part analysis must be made in accordance with the dictates of International Shoe and its progeny. We must first ascertain whether Harmon, Geis and Clark Electric purposefully established "minimum contacts" with the forum state. Id. at 316, 66 S. Ct. at 158, 90 L. Ed. at 102; Morris v. SSE, Inc., 843 F.2d 489, 492 (11th Cir.1998). If the requisite minimum contacts do exist, we must then decide whether the forum's exercise of personal jurisdiction [*6] over the non-resident defendants would offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." International Shoe, 326 U.S. at 316, 66 S. Ct. at 158, 90 L. Ed. at 102; Asahi Metal Industry Co. v. Superior Court of California, 480 U.S. 102, 107 S. Ct. 1026, 1033, 94 L. Ed. 2d 92, 105 (1987); Morris, 843 F.2d at 492.

HN7[] The Supreme Court of the United States has noted that there are two types of personal jurisdiction: specific and general. Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408, 414-15 n. 8, 104 S. Ct. 1868, 1872 n. 8 & 9, 80 L. Ed. 2d 404, 411 n. 8 & 9 (1984). Here we are only concerned with the exercise of specific jurisdiction over the defendants. HN8[] Specific jurisdiction derives from a party's contacts with the forum that are related to the cause of action.Id. at 414 n. 8, 411 n.8. [2] For the purpose of this litigation the appellees' sole contact with Florida occurred when Harmon, on behalf of Clark Electric, and Geis, representing Honeywell, met with Williams in Okaloosa County, Florida in 1983. The question becomes whether this single incident is of such a nature [*7] that the corporations and their representatives "should reasonably [have] anticipated being haled into court [in Florida]." World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286, 297, 100 S. Ct. 559, 567, 62 L. Ed. 2d 490, 501 (1980).

Williams Electric contends that the alleged antitrust violations constitute an intentional tort, and, therefore, it is reasonable that Harmon, Geis and Clark Electric would anticipate being held accountable for such behavior in Florida. Alternatively, the appellant insists that even if the purported illegal conduct cannot be characterized as an intentional tort, the significant negotiations [*8] that occurred in Florida are sufficient minimum contacts with that state to satisfy the due process clause.

HN10[] A forum may exercise personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant if that defendant purposefully directs its activities at the residents of the forum state. Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 472, 105 S. Ct. 2174, 2182-83, 85 L. Ed. 2d 528, 540-41 (1985). This court has observed that such a purpose occurs when "[a] meeting in the forum state … involves 'significant negotiations of important terms'" of a contract. Sea Lift, Inc. v. Refinadora Costarricense Petroleo, S.A., 792 F.2d 989 (11th Cir. 1986) (quoting Neiman v. Rudolf Wolff & Co., 619 F.2d 1189, 1194 & n. 5 (7th Cir.1980)). Given the directive of Sea Lift, we conclude that, for the purposes of our due process analysis, Harmon, Geis and Clark Electric consciously directed their activities toward Florida, thus availing itself of the "benefits and protections" of Florida law. Burger King, 471 U.S. at 475-76, 105 S. Ct. at 2184, 85 L. Ed. 2d at 542-43. Geis and Harmon, representing Honeywell and Clark, went to Florida to negotiate terms [*9] of two proposed subcontracts. As a result of these negotiations, the district court found that material changes were incorporated into the proposed subcontracts. Williams Electric then signed the subcontracts under protest. These events indicate that "significant negotiations of important terms: occurred during the meeting in Okaloosa County, Florida. Thus, by going to Florida to negotiate with Williams Electric, the defendants intentionally availed

---

[2] HN9[] General personal jurisdiction is grounded on the defendant's contacts with the forum that are unrelated to the litigation. General personal jurisdiction comports with due process only if the defendant's contacts with the forum state are "continuous and systematic." Sea Lift, Inc. v. Refinadora Costarricense de Petroleo, S.A., 792 F.2d 989, 992 (11th cir. 1986).

themselves of the "benefits and protections" of that state's laws. Consequently, the exercise of personal jurisdiction by the district court in Florida would not offend the due process clause. [3]

The appellees argue that [*10] the district court's finding that material changes to the proposed subcontracts occurred in Florida is clearly erroneous. They insist that the final agreement, which was executed in Florida, left the proposed subcontracts, which were drafted in Texas, essentially unchanged. We disagree. The record reveals that the subcontracts, executed in Florida, reflected changes in the timing of the commencement of the project, the work to be completed, and responsibility for the payment of the bond and the timing of Williams Electric's payments to the subcontractors. From an examination of this evidence, we are not left with the "definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, North Carolina, 470 U.S. 564, 573, 105 S. Ct. 1504, 1511, 84 L. Ed. 2d 518, 528 (1985).

Having found sufficient minimum contracts with Florida, we turn next to whether the exercise of personal jurisdiction over the appellees would offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. As the Supreme Court has noted, HN11[] "when minimum contacts have been established, often the interests of the plaintiff and the forum in the exercise of jurisdiction [*11] will justify even the serious burdens placed on the defendant." Asahi Metal Industry Co. v. Superior Court of California, Solano County, 480 U.S. 102, 114, 107 S. Ct. 1026, 1034, 94 L. Ed. 2d 92, 105-06 (1987). Such burdens are justified in this case.

Although the defendants would be compelled to travel to Florida to defend this lawsuit, modern improvements in transportation and communication significantly lessen this hardship. See World-Wide Volkswagen v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286, 292-93, 100 S. Ct. 559, 564, 62 L. Ed. 2d 490, 498-99 (1980). More significant is the purposeful journey to Florida to conduct important contract negotiations. This deliberate choice placed the defendants on notice that they were subject to suit in Florida. Harmon, Geis and Clark Electric could have acted differently had they wanted to alleviate that risk. Id. at 297, 100 S. Ct. at 567, 62 L. Ed. 2d at 501. Finally, because Williams Electric is a Florida corporation, the appellees cannot maintain that the forum state does not have significant interests in this dispute. See Asahi, 480 U.S. at 114-15, 107 S. Ct. at 1034, 84 L. Ed. 2d at 106. In [*12] Sum, Harmon, Geis and Clark Electric have failed to "present a compelling case that the presence of some other considerations would render jurisdiction unreasonable" given the existence of minimum contacts. Burger King v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 477, 105 S. Ct. 2174, 2185, 85 L. Ed. 2d 528, 544 (1985).

Our inquiry does not end here, however, we must also examine whether the forum's exercise of personal jurisdiction over the defendants would satisfy HN12[] the Florida long-arm statute, which requires more activities or contacts to confer personal jurisdiction than those demanded by the Constitution. Mallard v. Aluminum Co. of Canada, Ltd., 634 F.2d 236, 241 (5th Cit.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 816, 102 S. Ct. 93, 70 L. Ed. 2d 85 (1981).

HN13[] The relevant portion of the long-arm statute allows a federal district court in Florida to exercise personal jurisdiction over any person who "commits a tortious act within [Florida]." [4] Williams Electric maintains that the negotiation and execution in Florida of contracts that allegedly violate antitrust laws constitute sufficient contacts to establish jurisdiction under the tortious activity provision [*13] of the long-arm statute. The appellees reply that if a tort was committed, then it was committed in Texas, where the alleged conspiracy to violate antitrust laws had its genesis.

First, we must decide whether the alleged violations of the federal and Florida antitrust laws constitute "tortious behavior" within the meaning of the Florida long-arm statute. Although this court's predecessor has held that federal antitrust law "does not purport to afford remedies for all torts committed by or against persons engaged in interstate commerce," Larry R. George Sales Co. v. Cool Attic Corp., 587 F2d 266, 272 (5th Cir.1979) (construing

[3] In Sea Lift, this court found that the defendants had not purposefully availed themselves of the protections and benefits of the forum. Unlike the negotiations that occurred in this case, the meeting that took place in the forum state in Sea Lift involved a "boilerplate" contract that was not negotiated. 792 F.2d at 993-94.

[4] Fla.Stat. § 48.193(1)(b) (1985).

the Sherman Act), antitrust violations do encompass some business torts. A.D.M. Corp. v. Sigma Instruments, Inc., 628 F.2d 753, 754 (1st Cir.1980). HN14[] Given the unreasonable effect these violations have on competition, we conclude that such activity is tortious. [5]

[*14] HN15[] For personal jurisdiction to attach under the "tortious activity" provision of the Florida long-arm statute, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the non-resident defendant "committed a substantial aspect of the alleged tort in Florida." Watts v. Haun, 393 So.2d 54, 56 (Fla. Dist.Ct.App.1981). The court in Watts noted that such a showing is properly made by establishing that the activities in Florida "were essential to the success of the tort." Id. at 56. In its complaint Williams Electric alleged, inter alia, that Honeywell and Clark agreed to tie Honeywell's recommendations to Williams Electric's signing of a subcontract with Clark. Until this subcontract was negotiated and executed, events which occurred in Florida, there was no resulting damage to Williams Electric. We agree with Williams Electric that the negotiation and execution of the subcontracts were essential to the success of the tort. The district court, then, had personal jurisdiction over the principal actors in the procurement of the subcontracts pursuant to the Florida long-arm statute.

Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is REVERSED.

End of Document

[5] See Bangor Punta Operations, Inc. v. Universal Marine Co., Ltd., 543 F.2d 1107, 1109 (5th cir. 1976) (violation of the Lanham Act constitutes federal tort of unfair competition); see also Albert Levine Associates v. Bertoni & Cotti, 314 F. Supp. 169, 171 (S.D.N.Y.1970) (violation of Clayton Act is a tort).