Mr. Serfecz, joined by First Chicago Trust,² brought this action against Jewel, [*595] American Properties,³ United Skates,⁴ and the developers and operators of the Elk Crossing Mall.⁵ That complaint claimed that the defendants conspired to devalue and to destroy Grove Mall in order to eliminate competition in the retail grocery and shopping center markets. The plaintiffs contend that the defendants conspired to keep the Jewel rental space empty, to prevent a major anchor tenant from taking over Jewel's rental space, to obstruct Mr. Serfecz's attempt to redevelop Grove Mall, and to coerce Grove Mall tenants to leave and move across the street to Elk Grove Mall. The plaintiffs maintain that the alleged conspiracy is part of an overall marketing strategy of restricting the use of property in order to keep out competitors and to restrain trade. In Counts I and II of their complaint, plaintiffs alleged defendants violated § 1 and § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2. In Count III plaintiffs allege Jewel's

¹The district court had jurisdiction of Counts I and II under 15 U.S.C. § 26 and 28 U.S.C. § 1337. The district court had supplemental jurisdiction over Counts III and IV under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a). On January 10, 1995, the district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on Counts I, II, III and part of IV. The court did not grant summary judgment as to the portion of Count IV claiming breach of lease due to an unlawful use of the premises. Pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 54(b), the district court determined that there was no reason to delay entry of final judgment in favor of defendants on all claims except the unlawful use claim in Count IV or to delay appeal from that judgment.

²First Chicago Trust Company of Illinois, Trustee of Trust No. 684 is the title holder of Grove Mall. Joseph Serfecz is the beneficial owner of the trust.

³American Properties, Inc. is the company that manages properties owned and rented by Jewel.

⁵The complaint lists five defendants connected with the development of Elk Crossing Mall: Patrick F. Daly and Associates, Inc., the architect for Elk Crossing Mall; D.E.I., Inc., the contract purchaser of the land on which the Elk Crossing Mall was built; Dalan/Jupiter, Inc., a developer of Elk Crossing Mall; Mid-America Real Estate Corporation, the leasing agent for Dalan/Jupiter, Inc. and Elk Crossing Mall; and Patrick F. [6] B. The Antitrust Laws: The Relevant Statutory Provisions

Section One of the Sherman Act HN1 prohibits anticompetitive activities designed to restrain unreasonably trade and bans "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Section Two prohibits monopolistic practices and provides sanctions for "every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 2.

Section Four of the Clayton Act defines the class of persons who may bring a private suit under the antitrust laws. Section Four provides:

HN2 Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee. 15 U.S.C. § 15. The Supreme Court has held that HN3 "Congress did not [7] intend the antitrust laws to provide a remedy in damages for all injuries that might conceivably be traced to an antitrust violation." Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., 405 U.S. 251, 263 n.14, 31 L. Ed. 2d 184, 92 S. Ct. 885 \(1972\). HN4 The language of § 4 has been construed to limit the parties who may bring an antitrust action to (1) those who have suffered the type of injury that the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and (2) those whose injuries are a result of defendant's unlawful conduct. Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 \(1977\). The Court, focusing on Congress' intent to have antitrust laws construed in light of the common law, also has read § 4 to contain a proximate cause element, denying standing to plaintiffs whose injuries are indirect or secondary. Associated Gen. Contractors, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 540-46, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 \(1983\). HN5 The Court has identified several factors to be considered in determining whether a plaintiff is the proper party to bring a private action under the antitrust laws: (1) the causal connection between the antitrust violation and the plaintiff's injury; [*596] (2) the nature of the plaintiff's injury and the relationship between the plaintiff's [8] injury and the type of activity sought to be redressed under the antitrust laws; and (3) the speculative nature of the plaintiff's claim for damages and the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages. C. The District Court Proceedings

The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the antitrust claims. With respect to the monopolization of the retail grocery market claim, the court held that the plaintiffs lacked antitrust standing. The court held that the plaintiffs had presented enough evidence for a trier of fact to find that Jewel acted deliberately to prevent a competitor from occupying Jewel's rental space and to find a causal connection between the absence of a grocery store anchor tenant and the demise of Grove Mall. The court concluded that plaintiffs' injury was, nevertheless, too indirect to confer standing with respect to the retail grocery market. With respect to the retail shopping center market, the court determined that the plaintiffs had standing, [9] but that they had failed to establish a genuine issue of triable fact as to the existence of the conspiracy among the defendants to restrain trade and to monopolize sales and development in this market.

The district court also granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on the malicious prosecution claim. It held that plaintiffs had failed to allege a special injury. The court additionally granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on the breach of lease claim insofar as the plaintiffs' claim was based upon Jewel's failure to continue operating as a grocery store at Grove Mall. The court denied the defendants' motion to the extent that the plaintiffs' claim was based upon the illegal use provision of the lease. It determined that the broad nonrestrictive wording of the illegal use provision prohibited using the premises to violate the antitrust laws. The court reasoned that, although the plaintiffs lacked antitrust standing to recover damages for the monopolization of the grocery market, they did have standing, as parties to the lease, to sue for breach of the lease provision relating to violations of the law, arguably including violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. In the [10] district court's view, "use of the leased premises in furtherance of a Section 2 antitrust violation could indeed constitute a breach of the lease." Mem. Op. at 38. As we have noted earlier, supra n.1, this issue is not before us today.

A. The Antitrust Claims

The Sherman Act was enacted "to assure customers the [11] benefits of price competition, and . . . protect[] the economic freedom of participants in the relevant market." Associated Gen. Contractors, 459 U.S. at 538; see Sanner v. Board of Trade, 62 F.3d 918, slip op. at 15 (7th Cir. 1995). In this case, there are two relevant markets--the retail grocery market and the retail shopping center market. HN8[[↑]] In order to maintain an antitrust [597] action, plaintiffs must establish that they (1) have suffered an antitrust injury and (2) are the proper plaintiffs to maintain an antitrust action with respect to each of these markets. See Local Beauty Supply, Inc. v. Lamaur Inc., 787 F.2d 1197, 1202 (7th Cir. 1986); In re Industrial Gas Antitrust Litig., 681 F.2d 514, 515 (7th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1016 (1983).

1. The Retail Grocery Market

The district court determined that plaintiffs had presented enough evidence to permit a trier of fact to conclude that defendants had acted deliberately to prevent a competitor from occupying Jewel's rental space and that the absence of a grocery store anchor tenant was a significant cause of Grove Mall's decline. A private antitrust plaintiff, however, does not acquire standing merely [12] by showing that he was injured by the defendant's conduct. In addition to establishing a link between the defendant's acts and the plaintiff's injuries, the Supreme Court has held that:

HN9[[↑]] Plaintiffs must prove antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful. The injury should reflect the anticompetitive effect either of the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation. It should, in short, be "the type of loss that the claimed violations . . . would be likely to cause."

Brunswick Corp., 429 U.S. at 489 (citations omitted). This test focuses on the connection between the purpose of the antitrust laws (protecting market competition) and the alleged injury. When the plaintiff's injury is linked to the injury inflicted upon the market, such as when consumers pay higher prices because of a market monopoly or when a competitor is forced out of the market, the compensation of the injured party promotes the designated purpose of the antitrust law--the preservation of competition.

It is not contested that Mr. Serfecz brings this action neither [13] as a consumer nor as a competitor in the retail grocery market, but as a lessor of rental space to competitors in this market. HN10[[↑]] Suppliers to direct market participants typically cannot seek recovery under the antitrust laws because their injuries are too secondary and indirect to be considered "antitrust injuries." Southwest Suburban Bd. of Realtors, Inc. v. Beverly Area Planning

Ass'n, 830 F.2d 1374, 1379 (7th Cir. 1987); see also Stamatakis Indus. v. King, 965 F.2d 469, 471 (7th Cir. 1992) ("[A] producer's loss is no concern of the antitrust laws, which protect consumers from suppliers rather than suppliers from each other."); Bodie-Rickett & Assocs. v. Mars, Inc., 957 F.2d 287, 290-91 (6th Cir. 1992) (holding that injury to broker through loss of commission was not "antitrust injury"). In Southwest Suburban, a trade association that provided listing services to real estate brokerage firms alleged that the defendants conspired to boycott, and encouraged customers to boycott, the plaintiff's listing service. Consequently, the trade association was unable to provide a comprehensive listing of properties to its subscribers. The defendants allegedly had taken action directly against [14] the trade association to reduce the value of its listing in order to exclude non-preferred brokers from the real estate brokerage services market. The court held, however, that the defendants' anti-competitive practice was directed at the members of the trade association, not the trade association itself, and that any injury to the trade association, as a supplier of listing services, was too remote from the antitrust violation to confer standing. Southwest Suburban, 830 F.2d at 1379. We believe that the plaintiffs are in a similar position to that trade association and are best characterized as suppliers to the market participants, retail grocery stores and grocery purchasers.

In Southaven Land Co. v. Malone & Hyde, Inc., 715 F.2d 1079 (6th Cir. 1983), our colleagues in the Sixth Circuit held that an owner-lessor of retail commercial space did not have standing to maintain an antitrust action against a grocery store retailer who would not release its rental space to allow the plaintiff to lease the space to a different grocery store. The plaintiff claimed that the defendants intended to monopolize the retail [*598] grocery market by destroying the site as a location for the operation of [15] a retail grocery outlet. The Sixth Circuit held that the plaintiff's injury (rental devaluation) as a supplier of retail space to direct participants in the retail grocery market was not "sufficiently linked to the pro-competitive policy of the antitrust laws." Southaven, 715 F.2d at 1087; see also Rosenberg v. Cleary, Gottlieb, Steen & Hamilton, 598 F. Supp. 642 (S.D.N.Y. 1984) (holding that owner and developer of shopping mall alleging defendants conspired to keep it from opening a grocery store by filing state court lawsuits and preventing building permits from being issued lacked standing because developer was not a direct participant in the retail grocery market).

Here, the plaintiffs' injury is not the direct effect of the defendants' anticompetitive conduct. Assuming Jewel's goal was to gain control of the retail grocery market in Elk Grove, Illinois, we do not believe that the damages claimed by plaintiffs (devaluation of Grove Mall) present the type of anticompetitive injury that the antitrust laws were intended to remedy. See Sanner, Nos. 94-2139, 94-2152, slip op. at 14-15 (7th Cir. Aug. 7, 1995).

Even if plaintiffs' injury could be characterized as an antitrust injury, [16] this factor alone would not confer standing: HN11[] "From the class of injured persons suffering an 'antitrust injury' only those parties who can most efficiently vindicate the purposes of the antitrust laws have antitrust standing to maintain a private action under § 4." In re Industrial Gas Antitrust Litig., 681 F.2d at 516. "The existence of an identifiable class of persons whose selfinterest would normally motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement diminishes the justification for allowing a more remote party . . . to perform the office of a private attorney general . . . [particularly when denying standing] is not likely to leave a significant antitrust violation undetected or unremedied." Associated Gen. Contractors, 459 U.S. at 542. Our decisions have recognized the need to balance the interests of deterrence through private antitrust enforcement and avoidance of excessive treble damages litigation. "An appropriate balance is achieved by granting standing only to those who, as consumers or competitors, suffer immediate injuries with respect to their business or property, while excluding persons whose injuries were more indirectly caused by the antitrust [17] conduct." In re Industrial Gas Antitrust Litig., 681 F.2d at 520. If the competing grocery stores have been precluded from the market and injured by defendants' actions, their injuries would be direct and they could maintain an antitrust action against the defendants. See Southwest Suburban, 830 F.2d at 1379-80; Southaven, 715 F.2d at 1086-87; In re Industrial Gas Antitrust Litig., 681 F.2d at 520. Similarly, grocery consumers could maintain an action if defendants' actions stifled competition allowing defendants to engage in monopoly pricing in the retail grocery market.⁶ [18] Suppliers of rental space to grocery retailers are not the proper parties to maintain an antitrust action with respect to the defendants' alleged monopolistic and anticompetitive activities in the retail grocery market.⁷ In sum, we hold that these plaintiffs [*599] do not have the requisite direct injury to have standing to assert that Jewel has monopolized, or conspired with others to monopolize, the retail grocery market. We express no opinion on whether, in a suit brought by another plaintiff who can show the requisite direct injury, such allegations could be established.

[19] 2. Retail Shopping Center Market

The plaintiffs' antitrust allegations are not limited to the retail grocery market. They also allege that the defendants had conspired to restrain trade and to monopolize sales in the retail shopping center market. Here, the district court quite correctly determined that the plaintiffs, who are direct participants in this market, alleged an injury that is sufficiently direct to give them standing.

Section One of the Sherman Act prohibits the formation of any "contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 1. HN12¹² To establish a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, plaintiffs must provide, therefore, evidence that "tends to exclude the possibility of independent action by the [defendants]." Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 768, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 \(1984\). Because there is often only a fine line separating [*20] unlawful concerted action from legitimate business practices, "conduct [that is] as consistent with permissible competition as with illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy." Wauwatosa Realty Co., 906 F.2d 1167 \(7th Cir. 1990\)](#), we set forth our approach HN13¹³ to evaluating the legal sufficiency of the evidence in antitrust conspiracy cases. We first review the evidence of conspiracy submitted by the plaintiff. Next, we examine whether the defendants have offered evidence that tends to show that the conduct which forms the basis of the plaintiff's complaint is as compatible with the legitimate business activities of the defendant as it is with illegal conspiracy. Finally, if we determine that this analysis leaves the evidence of conspiracy ambiguous, we determine whether the plaintiff can point to any evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the defendants were pursuing their legitimate independent interests. Plaintiffs submit that Jewel and the Elk Crossing defendants engaged in a conspiracy to restrain trade in the retail shopping center market. They point out that both Jewel [21] and the Elk Crossing defendants had a compelling motive to eliminate Grove Mall as a competitor. They also note that the Elk Crossing defendants built Elk Crossing without investigating the possibility that Grove Mall would be redeveloped and emerge as a competitor. They further point out that Jewel and the Elk Crossing defendants have built other shopping centers with Jewel as an anchor tenant, where Jewel obtained restrictions precluding the use of its old leasehold location as either a retail food store or a drug store.

[*600] Plaintiffs submit that defendants conspired to have Jewel anchor Elk Crossing while preventing a major anchor tenant from taking over Jewel's rental space in order to block Mr. Serfecz's attempt to redevelop Grove Mall. The anticompetitive conduct about which the plaintiffs complain involves two separate activities--Jewel's move to Elk Crossing and Jewel's attempted sublease to United Skates and refusal to relinquish its leasehold interest. The defendants have provided evidence showing that Jewel's move to Elk Crossing is compatible with their legitimate business interests. Jewel argues that its move to Elk Crossing was based upon legitimate business concerns; Elk [22] Crossing offered Jewel a new, updated, and larger space and the ability to open a companion Osco drugstore; Jewel could not operate a drugstore in Grove Mall because Walgreens possessed the exclusive right to operate a drugstore at Grove Mall. The Elk Crossing defendants argue that their interest in Jewel is based upon the desirability of Jewel/Osco as an anchor tenant for a neighborhood shopping center. Elk Crossing and Jewel therefore have proffered legitimate business reasons for Jewel's decision to move to Elk Crossing and for Elk Crossing's desire to have Jewel as a tenant.

Jewel's actions relating to its Grove Mall lease are more problematic. The plaintiffs argue that Jewel attempted to sublet to United Skates in order to destroy Grove Mall as a retail shopping center because a roller rink anchor tenant is inconsistent with that use. The plaintiffs contend that Jewel, knowing that the lease prohibited subleases that would increase insurance rates absent the owner's consent, initiated the state declaratory judgment action in order to discourage potential retailers interested in subleasing the space and to tie up the plaintiffs in litigation. Jewel counters that its attempted [23] sublease to United Skates was based on its desire to earn rent on the vacant space; it makes no argument, however, with regard to the continued payment of rent for the vacant space. Moreover, Jewel's explanation does not offer any legitimate business justification for its failure to minimize its rental payments on vacant space by accepting Mr. Serfecz's offer to pay United Skates rent or to release Jewel from the lease. Although this lack of explanation on Jewel's part may evidence an anticompetitive motivation on its part, it does not permit, by itself, an inference of a conspiracy on the part of Jewel with the owners of Elk Crossing. Absent some showing that Jewel has held onto its lease with Grove Mall because of an agreement with the Elk Crossing defendants, we cannot say that the record supports a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. We therefore turn to the remainder of the plaintiffs' contentions in order to determine if they have demonstrated that the record raises a genuine issue of triable fact as to an agreement between Jewel and Elk Crossing.

We turn first to the evidence of motive. The plaintiffs argue that Jewel and the Elk Crossing defendants both had a compelling [24] motive to destroy Grove Mall as a viable competitor. According to plaintiffs, the value of Elk Crossing is inflated because of a lack of alternate space and competitors. Therefore, the Elk Crossing owners have been able to charge high rental prices, obtain a multimillion dollar mortgage and permit the Elk Crossing partners to withdraw $ 7 million in excess value within two years after the mall was completed. The lack of competition also has permitted Jewel to reap the benefits of having a "captive population" because it is the only retail grocery store in the area. Both defendants certainly have a motive to pursue their respective economic objectives free of competition from a redeveloped Grove Mall. However, it is important to note that proof of motive is of limited utility in this context. HN14↑ Although a lack of motive may be evidence that parties did not conspire, the presence of an economic motive is of very little probative value. See Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 596-97 ("Lack of motive bears on the range of permissible conclusions that might be drawn from ambiguous evidence: if petitioners had no rational economic motive to conspire, and if their conduct is consistent with other, equally [25] plausible explanations, the conduct does not give rise to an inference of conspiracy."). The mere existence of mutual economic advantage, by itself, does not tend to exclude the possibility of independent, legitimate [*601] action and supplies no basis for inferring a conspiracy. Riverview Inves., Inc. v. Ottawa Community Improvement Corp., 899 F.2d 474, 483-84 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 855, 112 L. Ed. 2d 117, 111 S. Ct. 151 (1990). We agree with the district court that the mere confluence of economic interests between the parties does not establish, standing alone, the existence of a conspiracy.

The plaintiffs next argue that defendants built Elk Crossing knowing that there would be no competition from Grove Mall. They presented testimony that one of the key concerns of a developer planning to build a shopping center is the presence of current or future competition. Kenneth Leonard, a real estate consultant, testified that he knew of no reputable, knowledgeable developer or chain store who did not consider the threat of competition a most important consideration when undertaking a development project. Neither Jewel nor the Elk Crossing defendants have produced evidence that a market analysis or feasibility study [26] was conducted concerning possible future competition.⁸ The Elk Crossing defendants argue that they had no incentive to do such a study or analysis and dispute the importance of conducting such studies. The failure of the Elk Crossing developers to take the precautionary step of undertaking a market study is not, in our view, sufficiently indicative in itself of an agreement to justify denial of summary judgment. This evidence could not support a jury finding of conspiracy between the Elk Crossing owners and Jewel. It raises, at best, the "metaphysical doubt" that Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 585, counsels is not sufficient to submit the issue to a jury. We agree with the district court that the fact that the defendants believed that Elk Crossing would be able to compete successfully with the less modern mall across the street does not supply a basis for inferring a conspiracy.

[27] Plaintiffs also point to two instances in which Patrick F. Daly and his architectural firm have engaged in "similar conduct" with Jewel in developing other shopping centers. The first is the Hickory Hills shopping center. In 1985, Patrick F. Daly & Associates, Inc. was employed as the architectural firm for the shopping center, and Mr. Daly had an ownership interest in the development. Prior to the development of Hickory Hills, Jewel was located across the street and when Jewel moved it obtained a restriction on its former leasehold location. The second instance is the Scharrington Square shopping center in Schaumburg, Illinois. Patrick F. Daly & Associates, Inc. was employed as the architectural firm and Mr. Daly had an ownership interest in the development.⁹ Prior to the development of Scharrington Square, Jewel had been located in a nearby shopping center. Jewel obtained a restriction on the old leasehold location so that the premise could not be leased to any person or entity whose primary business was either the retail sale of food or prescription drugs.

[28] The plaintiffs can point to no evidence showing Daly's involvement with Jewel's negotiations of the lease restrictions. The fact that Daly's architectural firm has worked on a number of shopping centers that are anchored by Jewel and that Daly has invested in these shopping centers create an inference of Daly's ability to attract business more than it creates an inference of a conspiracy.

The plaintiffs describe their theory of the case in these terms:

The Elk Crossing defendants have an on-going relationship with Jewel. The Elk Crossing defendants build and own new shopping centers in locations where Jewel [*602] has an old store nearby. Jewel moves into the new center and sterilizes the old location.

Appellants' Br. at 41. Plaintiffs have failed to connect Daly's actions with Jewel's actions, and neither set of actions, standing alone or in tandem, is evidence for inferring a conspiracy.

The evidence of record fails to show that, if the case were submitted to a trier of fact, there would be sufficient evidence to justify a judgment for the plaintiffs. HN15 [↑] Although, at the summary judgment stage, we must

⁸ Leonard testified that the documents that the defendants produced for review contained no information as to competition. In regard to the absence of documents relating to competition, Leonard testified that: "It is so strange that this one critical piece of information that everybody else in the world looks to as being vital, that they agonize endlessly over, nobody, two of the most sophisticated people around, supposedly didn't even mention it. Here the plaintiffs' case is built on a metaphysical doubt on a metaphysical doubt. There is simply no evidence that precludes the possibility of independent action. Id. at 597 n.21. In this context, the absence of that evidence deprives the plaintiffs of a reasonable case that would support a jury verdict. *Alvord-Polk, Inc. v. F. B. The Malicious Prosecution Claim

In February 1990, Mr. Serfecz learned that Jewel was negotiating a sublease with United Skates, who wished to operate a roller skating rink on the premises. Mr. Serfecz wrote Jewel and explained his opposition to the sublease. He believed that, under the terms of the lease, Jewel could not sublease without prior written consent to any tenant whose operation would cause an increase in insurance rates. Jewel responded by stating that it believed that it had the right to sublet the premises as long as [30] the proposed sublease was for a lawful purpose. It offered to reimburse Mr. Serfecz for any increase in the insurance premium. Mr. Serfecz changed the locks to the premises and Jewel brought a declaratory judgment action against Mr. Serfecz in state court regarding its right to sublease to United Skates. The trial court granted Mr. Serfecz's motion for a directed verdict, and the Illinois appellate court affirmed. Jewel Cos. v. Serfecz, 204 Ill. Dec. 63, 641 N.E.2d 22 (Ill. App. Ct. 1991). On appeal before this court, plaintiffs maintain that the suit was brought solely for the purpose of harassment, intimidation, and interference with the redevelopment of Grove Mall, and they charged Jewel with malicious prosecution.

HN16 [↑] The Illinois courts have long disfavored actions for malicious prosecution and have sought to encourage a policy of open access to the courts. Levin v. King, 271 Ill. App. 3d 728, 648 N.E.2d 1108, 1110, 208 Ill. Dec. 186 (Ill. App. Ct. 1995); Keefe v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 166 Ill. App. 3d 316, 519 N.E.2d 955, 956, 116 Ill. Dec. 740 (Ill. App. Ct. 1988). In order to establish malicious prosecution, a claimant must show that: (1) the action was terminated in plaintiff's favor; (2) the action was brought maliciously and without probable cause; and (3) the plaintiff suffered [31] "special injury" or special damage beyond the usual expense, time or annoyance in defending a lawsuit. Levin, 648 N.E.2d at 1110; Keefe, 519 N.E.2d at 956. The district court determined that the plaintiffs were able to show that the declaratory judgment action was terminated in their favor. It also concluded that they had provided sufficient evidence to create a factual dispute as to whether the action was brought maliciously and without probable cause. However, according to the court, they were unable to show special injury. We agree.

HN17 [↑] Under Illinois common law, special injury is usually "identified with an arrest or seizure of property or some constructive taking or interference with the person or property." Levin, 648 N.E.2d at 1110. "[A] showing of interference with property 'is satisfied only if a court issues a provisional remedy such as attachment, an order of arrest or an injunction.'"¹⁰ [*603] Equity Assocs., Inc. v. Village of Northbrook, 171 Ill. App. 3d 115, 524 N.E.2d 1119, 1124, 121 Ill. Dec. 71 (Ill. App. Ct. 1988) (quoting Tedeschi v. Smith, Barney, Harris, Upham & Co., 548 F. Supp. 1172, 1174 (S.D.N.Y. 1982), aff'd, 757 F.2d 465 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 850, 88 L. Ed. 2d 122, 106 S. Ct. 147 (1985)). In Illinois, the court's focus [32] rests upon the peculiar effect of the suit upon plaintiff's right to use the property; special injury in civil cases will not be found unless the injuries emanate directly from the impact of the issues allegedly wrongfully litigated. Compare Bank of Lyons v. Schultz, 78 Ill. 2d 235, 399 N.E.2d 1286, 35 Ill. Dec. 758 (Ill. 1980) (holding that injunction restraining distribution of life insurance proceeds for more than nine years to widowed beneficiary sufficient interference with property to satisfy special injury requirement) and Norin v. Scheldt Mfg. Co., 297 Ill. 521, 130 N.E. 791 (Ill. 1921) (concluding that prosecution of involuntary bankruptcy created basis for malicious prosecution claim because of the unusual and far reaching impact of a bankruptcy action on property rights) with Keefe, 519 N.E.2d at 957 (determining that public record of unsatisfied judgment and impairment of credit rating as a result of pending litigation did not satisfy special injury requirement). The injuries that plaintiffs allege are lost rental payments and the devaluation and inability to redevelop Grove Mall. These allegations of damages are insufficient to satisfy the special injury requirement. Allegations of loss of potential tenants, of institutional [33] lending commitments, and of the earnings and appreciation of a building complex are inadequate to satisfy the special injury requirement. See Equity Assocs., Inc., 534 N.E.2d at 1122.

C. The Breach of Lease Claim

Plaintiffs also allege that Jewel has breached paragraph 28 of the lease by using the premises solely for the purpose of keeping the anchor space dark. Paragraph 28 provides that the "lessee shall use the leased premise only for operation of a grocery supermarket." The plaintiffs state that "the gist of [our] argument concerning paragraph 28 is that Jewel is using the premises to stifle competition and not to operate [34] a grocery supermarket." Reply Br. at 21. This argument is, at best, an extension of plaintiffs' argument that Jewel has breached the lease by using the premises for an unlawful purpose, a claim which is still pending in the district court.

Paragraph 28 is a typical use-restriction [35] provision delineating the permissible uses of the leased premises. We do not believe paragraph 28 supports plaintiff's claim that a use-restriction as to the sale of groceries restricts the defendants from leaving the store vacant. Allowing a store to remain vacant is different from opening a hardware or music store on the leased premises, and we believe it is the latter and not the former that paragraph 28 was meant to address.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the decision of the district court is affirmed.

Dissent

CUDAHY, Circuit Judge, dissenting. This is a difficult case. Much of the relevant case law and the various guides to standing it contains may be read at least superficially to support the result reached by the majority. The alleged injury here is "indirect" in the sense that Serfecz is not a [*604] competitor in the retail grocery market nor, obviously, a consumer. Yet the economic reality is that Serfecz has suffered a more calculable and a more substantial injury from Jewel's allegedly anti-competitive conduct than would a plaintiff whose injuries were in theory direct. In fact, if Serfecz's suit fails for lack of standing, there is not much realistic [36] hope of anyone else's taking up the cudgels. This is certainly a relevant, though not necessarily dispositive, factor in the analysis.

It is unlikely that a grocery store competitor (or here potential competitor) of Jewel would challenge Jewel's conduct in retaining its hold on its abandoned store. With all the thousands of possible locations available in the Chicago area, it is doubtful that a competitor would undertake an expensive and prolonged lawsuit to gain entry to one of them--and one already subject to Jewel's strong competition, at that. This would be true even if, as is alleged here, Jewel played dog in the manger with other store locations as well.

Lessee shall not use the demised premise for any unlawful purpose nor shall it commit waste. It shall comply with all lawful requirements of the local Board of Health, Police and Fire Departments, and state and federal authorities, respecting the manner in which it uses the leased premises.

R.22, Ex.7 at 1. The district court found that use of the premises in furtherance of a § 2 antitrust violation could constitute a breach of the lease and denied defendant's motion for summary judgment as to this claim.

A customer would be even more unlikely to sue since her damages would be slight and very difficult to prove. On the other hand, Serfecz has lost his anchor tenant and been precluded from getting another. The consequent decline in the value of his shopping center involves not only a substantial loss but one more easily calculable than losses to potential competitors or to consumers. Serfecz may be in theory only a supplier to a potential competitor but his evident loss is much more likely to be the basis of a lawsuit than the [37] putative loss of one "directly" injured.

Judge Grady, whose summary judgment decision we review here, expressed doubt and frustration about the result to which he felt driven by the cases. He expressed the view that competitors of Jewel or its consumers would not in fact be in a position to challenge the alleged anticompetitive conduct here. Judge Grady expressed his concerns as follows:

Is there an identifiable class of potential plaintiffs who might be better suited than Serfecz by virtue of their more direct injuries to bring suit and whose self-interest would motivate them to do so? In the case most directly on point, Southaven, the Sixth Circuit rather summarily concluded that consumers or other market participants would be more appropriate plaintiffs to seek a remedy for restraint of trade or monopolization in the grocery market. While, in theory, we agree with the Sixth Circuit, we lack that court's confidence that either of these two groups of potential plaintiffs would be sufficiently motivated to actually bring suit. We suggest that Serfecz might be correct that a competing grocery store not yet operating in the area, such as Dominicks, would be more likely to forgo [38] a location than to incur the high startup costs of litigation. Indeed, according to plaintiffs, the fact is that no competitor has filed an antitrust lawsuit against Jewel although there is evidence that Jewel has been restricting locations throughout Illinois for the last ten years. As regards a consumer suit, the degree of harm suffered by an individual consumer as a result of reduced competition in the grocery market in Elk Grove Village would probably not be sufficiently great to give him incentive to sue. Thus, we fear that there is a high risk that a significant antitrust violation will go unremedied if we do not grant plaintiffs standing to sue in this case. Mem. Op. at pp. 19-20.

Admittedly, the prospect of there being no enforcement of the antitrust laws here if the present suit fails is not dispositive, but it should weigh significantly in the scales. "An antitrust standing determination is ultimately a product of the particularities of each case." Sanner v. Board of Trade, 62 F.3d 918, slip op. at 15 (7th Cir. 1995). "McCready and Associated General Contractors exemplify that innumerable elements, including proximity and directness, constitute [39] proper areas of inquiry" in determining antitrust standing. Southaven Land Co., Inc. v. Malone & Hyde, Inc., 715 F.2d 1079, 1085 (6th Cir. 1983). This case is a far cry from Associated General Contractors, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983), where the injury to the plaintiff union was far more speculative than any injury to landowners (customers) and other contractors (competitors) to whom [*605] coercion was applied in that case. Certainly these landowners and other contractors could readily have sued had they in fact been injured. That is not the case here.

I believe that this case is distinguishable from much of the precedent because Jewel as an anchor tenant in a shopping center occupies a dual role. It is no doubt a competitor in the retail grocery market. But it (or its replacement if one is permitted) is also an essential ingredient of a successful shopping center. Jewel's refusal to permit competition is therefore in and of itself a fatal blow to the viability of the center. The issue is whether Serfecz has "antitrust" standing and I am persuaded that he does in these limited circumstances--even though the injury to him is indirect. Cf. Greater Rockford [40] Energy & Technology Corp. v. Shell Oil Co., 998 F.2d 391 (7th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 127 L. Ed. 2d 375, 114 S. Ct. 1054 (1994).

Southaven Land Co., cited by the majority, is factually on point but reaches a result opposite to the one I advocate here. However, that case conceded that, "a finding or concession that [the lessor] is not a direct participant in the relevant market is not dispositive of the § 4 'standing' issue." 715 F.2d at 1086. The Sixth Circuit went on to conclude that the injury to the lessor of grocery store facilities was not "inextricably intertwined" with the injury to the retail grocery market so as to make the analysis in Blue Shield of Virginia v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149, 102 S. Ct. 2540 (1982), controlling. I think the analysis of the Sixth Circuit up to, but not including, its final step is correct. I disagree, however, on the question whether the injury to the retail grocery market here is inextricably intertwined with the injury to Serfecz and the Grove Mall. If, as is alleged, Jewel retained its lease on the empty store in the Grove Mall with intent to monopolize the retail grocery business in the area, it is difficult to see how damage to the Mall would not have been foreseeable and [41] inevitable. Therefore, I believe that the one injury is inextricably intertwined with the other. Injury to the Mall is surely more calculable than injury to a potential competitor not yet present in the market. Cf. Hoopes v. Union Oil Co., 374 F.2d 480 (9th Cir. 1967).

In the case before us, Judge Grady found:

Without elaborating in any detail, we believe that plaintiffs in the present case have presented enough evidence for the trier of fact to find a causal connection between the absence of a grocery store anchor tenant and the slow demise of the Grove Mall. There is also evidence that Jewel acted deliberately to prevent a competitor from occupying the space in the Mall. Mem. Op. at 7.

It is also true that there is no problem of duplicative recovery here because Serfecz presumably could recover the loss in value of his shopping center due to his inability to redevelop it, as well as lost rental income. A potential competitor, on the other hand, could recover the unrelated amount of lost profits, and a consumer could recover damages due to higher prices. On balance, therefore, I believe that Serfecz has antitrust standing and should be allowed to proceed.

I therefore [42] respectfully dissent.

The crucial inquiry with regard to standing is whether the plaintiff has alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to warrant his or her invocation of the court's jurisdiction and to justify exercise of the court's remedial powers on his or her behalf. Second, an essential element of the standing inquiry is that the party or parties seeking standing suffered an actual or threatened injury as a result of the defendant's wrongful conduct, and that the injury is fairly traceable to the defendant's actions.

HN11 [blue downward arrow] Civil Procedure, Remedies

The equitable doctrine of election of remedies is not a rule of substantive law but rather is a technical rule of procedure or judicial administration. Election of remedies is the act of choosing between two or more concurrent but inconsistent remedies based upon the same state of facts. Ordinarily a plaintiff need not elect, and cannot be compelled to elect between inconsistent remedies during the course of trial. If, however, a plaintiff has unequivocally and knowledgeably elected to proceed on one of the remedies he or she is pursuing, he or she may be barred recourse to the other. The doctrine acts as a bar precluding a plaintiff from seeking an inconsistent remedy as a result of his or her previous conduct or election.

[*56] [31] OPINION OF THE COURT BY MOON, C.J.

This is a case involving real estate fraud and statutory unfair practices. plaintiffs-appellees Lawrence Cieri, Jr. and Janis Cieri (collectively, the Cieris) purchased a residence from defendants-appellees Joseph and Violet Yamaji (collectively, the Yamajis). In the transaction, defendants-appellants Leticia Query and Leticia Query Realty, Inc. (collectively, the Query entities) served as the Yamajis' licensed real estate broker. Immediately after moving into the residence, the Cieris discovered undisclosed plumbing problems, and they subsequently filed suit against the Yamajis and the Query entities for tortious breach of contract, fraud/misrepresentation, and unfair or deceptive trade acts or practices in violation of Hawai'i Revised Statutes (HRS) chapter 480. [2] By special verdict, a jury found Query individually liable for fraud and for violating HRS § 480-2; the jury exonerated the Yamajis and Leticia Query Realty of any wrongdoing.

Pursuant to the jury's special verdict, the trial court entered judgment against Query for $ 10,878.00 in treble damages, $ 12,252.00 in attorneys' fees, and $ 851.36 in costs. Query appeals the amount of the judgment and the court's denial of her motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict (JNOV). For the following reasons, we affirm.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Facts

On September 21, 1989, the Cieris and the Yamajis signed a Deposit, Receipt, Offer and Acceptance (DROA) form for the sale of the Yamajis' twenty-year-old residence to the Cieris. The Yamajis did not live in the residence [*57] [32] and had been renting the property to others for some time. The Query entities had served as the property manager for the property, screening potential renters, collecting rents, making mortgage payments, and reporting problems to the Yamajis. They also ordered and made payments for necessary repairs to the property as directed by the Yamajis.

Mr. Yamaji testified at trial that the property had always been used for [3] rental, and, for the last three years prior to its sale, the residence was rented by the Milliners. Mr. Milliner testified at trial that there were drainage problems with a toilet in one of the bathrooms, that the washing machine would back up and flood the garage, and, when it rained heavily, water often leaked into the family room. Mr. Milliner also testified that, due to problems with the washing machine, flooding occurred approximately once a month during the last two years of his residency. Query was contacted on each occasion, and, according to Mr. Milliner, "responded quickly" by calling plumbers. Query and Mr. Milliner also advised the Yamajis about the problems on several occasions.

Receipts, admitted into evidence at trial, indicated that plumbers had visited the residence on October 15, 1988, December 30, 1988, and April 17, 1989. Problems were found with the laundry washer line, the main bathroom toilet, and a bathtub drain.

In June 1989, because the rental income was becoming insufficient to cover the mounting insurance and mortgage costs, the Yamajis decided to sell the property. Query recommended that, before selling the property, certain repairs be made to the house [4] by the Yamajis, including repairs to the plumbing system. Mr. Yamaji testified that, among other repairs that he had done himself, including raising the family room floor and installing a new shake roof, he had hired a plumber to repair the washer hose.

On September 17, 1989, the Yamajis entered into an exclusive-right-to-sell listing agreement with Leticia Query Realty to sell the residence. The Yamajis, with the assistance of Query, filled out a "Sellers Real Property Disclosure Statement" (the disclosure statement), dated September 29, 1989, in conjunction with the DROA. Question 3-d of the disclosure statement asked: "Have there been any problems with the plumbing (including solar systems, septic tank, or other), electrical, water and/or gas?" Question 1-c asked: "Have you ever had any leaks repaired?" The answers to both questions were "no." The Cieris and Yamajis both signed the disclosure statement. At trial, Mr. Yamaji and Query explained that they had answered the questions in the negative in part because they considered the water in the family room to be "seepage" and the washer and bathtub incidents to be "maintenance" rather than "problems."

Although the sale was to [5] close on December 1, 1989, the Yamajis agreed to let the Cieris move in three days early, subject to prorated rent and an early occupancy agreement. On November 30, 1989, a backup in a second floor bathroom flooded the house and seeped downstairs, damaging the carpet. The Cieris notified Mr. Yamaji, who notified Query, who in turn called a plumber.

Two days later, on December 2, 1989, after Mrs. Cieri used the washing machine, water apparently backed up from the sewage line and flooded the garage. Mr. Cieri testified that human waste was in the water and that the house smelled badly. According to Query, there was some question whether the December 2, 1989 problem was caused by a preexisting condition, or by damage made by the plumber two days earlier on November 30, 1989. The plumbing eventually was fixed, but the Cieris had to relocate for three days and thereby incurred various expenses.

B. Prior proceedings

On November 23, 1990, the Cieris filed suit against the Yamajis and the Query entities for: (1) tortious breach of contract; (2) fraud/misrepresentation; and (3) unfair and deceptive trade practices under the HRS chapter 480. At trial in February 1993, although the [6] jury found that the Yamajis and Query had made false representations to the Cieris, the jury determined that: (1) only Query "[made] the false representation with the [*58] [33] intent to defraud";² (2) the Cieris relied on Query's misrepresentations;³ [7] (3) the fraud/misrepresentation on the part

In answer to question No. 11 on the special verdict form, which asked the jury to determine "the amount of [the Cieris'] damages as a result of the breach of contract,⁶ [8] fraud, and/or deceptive acts or practices," the jury awarded the sum of $ 3,626.00.⁷ The jury also awarded $ 7,950.00 for punitive damages.

Pursuant to the jury's special verdict, the trial court, on April 6, 1993, initially entered a judgment in the amount of $ 10,878.00 ($ 3,626.00 trebled) pursuant to HRS § 480-13\(b\)\(1\) (Supp. 1992).⁸ The Cieris and Query subsequently filed cross-motions to alter the judgment, or for a JNOV, or for a new trial, arguing that under the Intermediate Court of Appeals' (ICA) decision in Eastern Star v. Union Building Materials, 6 Haw. App. 125, 712 P.2d 1148 \(1985\), the court must award the highest damages chosen by the jury as between fraud and the HRS § 480-2 claim.⁹ In Eastern Star, the ICA held that, HN1[↑] where an award is made under HRS § 480-13 and punitive damages are also awarded for common law courts, "the recovery should be either treble damages or punitive [9] damages, whichever is the greater amount." 6 Haw. App. at 142, 712 P.2d at 1160 (emphasis in original).

⁵ Question No. 9 on the special verdict form and the jury's response stated:

Question No. 9. Did either Leticia Query or Leticia Query Realty commit a deceptive act or practice?

Leticia Query Realty

⁶ In answer to question No. 1 on the special verdict form, the jury found that the Yamajis did not breach their contract with the Cieris.

⁸ HN2[↑] HRS § 480-13\(b\) provides:

(b) Any consumer who is injured by any unfair or deceptive act or practice forbidden or declared unlawful by section 480-2:

(1) May sue for damages sustained by the consumer, and if the judgment is for the plaintiff, the plaintiff shall be awarded a sum not less than $ 1,000 or threefold damages by the plaintiff sustained, whichever sum is the greater, and reasonable attorneys fees together with the costs of suit; and

(2) May bring proceedings to enjoin the unlawful practices, and if the decree is for the plaintiff, the plaintiff shall be awarded reasonable attorneys fees together with the cost of suit.

⁹ Although the Cieris and Query both relied on the principals announced in Eastern Star, they disagreed as to its application. The Cieris contended that, under HRS § 480-13, an award of attorneys' fees is mandatory and, therefore, must be included in the calculus of the "greater amount" of recovery dictated by Eastern Star; Query disagreed and argued that an award of attorneys' fees is not considered when determining the "greater amount" of recovery. See infra section II.B.

[10] [*59] [34] On May 7, 1993, the trial court held a hearing on the cross-motions. At the hearing, counsel for the Cieris -- confronted with Eastern Star -- opted for the award for fraud and punitive damages, totaling $ 11,576.00 ($ 3,626.00 plus $ 7,950.00). The court therefore ruled that judgment be entered in that amount.

Thereafter, counsel for the Cieris attempted to recover attorneys' fees on the fraud claim, and the parties filed supplemental memoranda. On September 28, 1993, the court reversed its prior position and entered a new judgment in the amount of $ 10,878.00 in treble damages, $ 12,252.00 in statutory attorneys' fees, and $ 851.36 in costs. Query timely appeals from this judgment.

II. DISCUSSION

A. Statutory Unfair or Deceptive Acts or Practices

Query first argues that the trial court erred in basing the amount of the judgment on the Cieris' claim under HRS chapter 480, because the Cieris do not qualify as "consumers" under HRS § 480-1 and therefore do not have standing to sue for unfair or deceptive acts or practices. Preliminarily, however, we take this opportunity to discuss the scope of the applicability of HRS § 480-2, which proscribes "unfair or deceptive [11] acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce" (emphasis added), as it pertains to the transaction and the defendants at issue in this case.

HN3 [↑] An interpretation of a statute is a question of law reviewed de novo. Mehau v. Reed, 76 Hawai'i 101, 112, 869 P.2d 1320, 1331 \(1994\).

1. The "Trade or Commerce" Requirement of HRS § 480-2

a. Federal Beginnings

The genesis of Hawai'i's consumer protection statute is in federal antitrust law. Although the federal arsenal of antitrust laws is comprised of several differently worded statutes of varying scope that have generated volumes of case law, all of the acts have a common focus on trade, commerce, and business, and all share a concern for the preservation of unrestrained economic competition and free trade. See, e.g., Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 \(1973\) ("Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce . . . is declared to be illegal." (Emphasis added.)); Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13 \(1973\) ("It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate [12] in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, where either or any of the purchases involved in such discrimination are in commerce . . . and where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them." (Emphasis added.)); Standard Oil Co. v. FTC, 340 U.S. 231, 249, 95 L. Ed. 239, 71 S. Ct. 240 \(1951\) (In passing the antitrust laws, "Congress was dealing with competition, which is sought to protect, and monopoly, which is sought to prevent."); 1 E. Kintner, Federal Antitrust Law, § 1.1, 1 (1980) ("The antitrust laws of the United States are rooted in a commitment to the promotion of free enterprise and the existence of competition in the marketplace."). This underlying concern with trade, commerce, or business is perhaps best expressed by an early pronouncement of the United States Supreme Court, analyzing the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, et seq., wherein the Court stated:

The Sherman Act was [13] designed to be a comprehensive charter of economic liberty aimed at preserving free and unfettered competition as the rule of the trade. It rests on the premise that the unrestrained interaction of competitive forces will yield the best allocation of our economic resources, the lowest prices, the highest quality and the greatest material progress, while at the same time providing an environment [conducive] to the preservation of our democratic political and social institutions. But even were that premise open to question, [*60] [35] the policy unequivocally laid down by the Act is competition. And to this end it prohibits "Every contract, combination . . . or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States."

Northern Pac. R.R. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 4-5, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514 (1958).¹⁰

[14] Hawai'i's antitrust and consumer protection law is an amalgam of the various prohibitions contained in the federal law; however, our consumer protection provisions bear the most resemblance to the 1938 amendments to Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (FTCA). Originally, the 1914 version of the FTCA limited the power of the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) to prevent "unfair methods of competition." Act of Sept. 26, 1914, ch. 311, § 5, 38 Stat. 719. In 1938, however, Congress amended section 5 of the FTCA to give the FTC express authority over "unfair or deceptive acts or practices." Act of March 21, 1938, ch. 49, § 3, 53 Stat. 111, amending Act of Sept. 26, 1914, ch. 311, § 5, 38 Stat. 719, codified at 15 U.S.C. § 45\(a\)\(1\) \(1982\). The 1938 amendment "created direct protection of consumer interests on a par with market competitors, heralded increased activity of the FTC in all aspects of commercial advertising with an interstate effect, and spurred parallel efforts by the states." VII E. Kintner, Federal Antitrust Law, § 49.1, 124 (1988).

b. The "Trade or Commerce" Requirement in the Development of Hawai'i's Consumer Protection Law

Embodying in Hawai'i's virtually [15] word-for-word adoption of the prohibitions contained in the Sherman, Clayton, and FTC acts is the federal antitrust laws' focus on commerce, the economy, and competition. In 1965, in an effort to "provide the Attorney General with much needed authority to bring proceedings to enjoin unfair and deceptive business practices by which consumers are defrauded and the economy of the State is harmed," Hse. Stand. Comm. Rep. No. 55, in 1965 House Journal, at 538, the state legislature passed a provision, then codified as Revised Laws of Hawai'i (RLH) § 205A-1.1 (1965) and recodified today as HRS § 480-2 (Supp. 1992).¹¹ RLH § 205A-1.1 was, and HRS § 480-2 is, virtually identical to section 5 of the FTCA and provided, very simply, that "unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce are hereby declared unlawful." RLH § 205A-1.1; see also Island Tobacco Co. v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 63 Haw. 289, 300, 627 P.2d 260, 268 \(1981\) (HRS § 480-2 is "a virtual counterpart of § 5(a)(1) of the [FTCA].").

[16] From the outset, it was clear that the focus of what would eventually be the spearhead of [*61] [36] Hawai'i's consumer protection law was on trade, commerce, and business:

¹⁰ An undercurrent in federal antitrust law, as hinted at by the above-quoted language from Northern Pacific, is, in the event of a conflict between the goal of preserving competition and the "populist" goals of "the best allocation of our economic resources, the lowest prices, the highest quality and the greatest material progress, while at the same time providing an environment [conducive] to the preservation of our democratic political and social institutions," Northern Pacific, 356 U.S. at 4, that the "populist" goals must yield. See, e.g., Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 \(1962\) ("Taken as a whole, the legislative history [of the Clayton Act, § 7] illuminates congressional concern with the protection of competition, not competitors, and its desire to restrain mergers only to the extent that such combinations may tend to lessen competition."); 1 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law, P 103, 7 (1978) ("There is little if anything in the cases that suggests the courts have in fact been willing to pursue populist goals at the expense of competition and efficiency. . . . If anything, they support the priority of competition and its efficiency goals.").

¹¹ HN4 [↑] HRS § 480-2 provides in pertinent part:

§ 480-2 Unfair competition, practices, declared unlawful. (a) Unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce are unlawful.

(b) In construing this section, the courts . . . shall give due consideration to the rules, regulations, and decisions of the Federal Trade Commission and the federal courts interpreting section 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. 45\(a\)\(1\)), as from time to time amended.

(d) No person other than a consumer, the attorney general or the director of the office of consumer protection may bring an action based upon unfair or deceptive acts or practices declared unlawful by this section.

Your committee recognizes, as did the Congress of the United States in 1914 when it enacted the Federal Trade Commission Act, that it is impractical to enact a law prohibiting each unfair method of competition or unfair or deceptive act or practice in the conduct of trade and commerce after the need therefor comes to light. In explaining the need for the broad language of the Federal Trade Commission Act, Congress said:

It is impossible to frame definitions which embrace all unfair practices. There is no limit to human inventiveness in this field. Even if all known practices were specifically defined and prohibited, it would be at once necessary to begin over again. If Congress were to adopt the method of definition, it would undertake an endless task. It is also practically impossible to define unfair practices so that the definition will fit business of every sort in every part of this country. Whether competition is unfair or not generally depends upon the surrounding circumstances of the particular case. [17] What is harmful under certain circumstances may be beneficial under different circumstances.

The hundreds of unfair business practices which have been effectively stopped under the authority of the Federal law attest of Congress' wisdom in doing more than merely enumerating and prohibiting the then known unfair business practices. A law similar in effect to the Federal law was enacted by the State of Washington in 1961. Your committee is informed that the Washington law, like the Federal law, has been most effective in dealing with unfair and deceptive business practices.

Hse. Stand. Comm. Rep. No. 55, in 1965 Hse. Journal, at 538 (emphasis added); see also Hse. Stand. Comm. Rep. No. 267, in 1965 Hse. Journal, at 603 ("Your Committee concludes that a law similar in effect to the federal law dealing with unfair and deceptive business practices is essential to a State-sponsored fair business program in Hawaii.").

The focus on trade, commerce, and business is also reflected in HRS § 480-13, which sets out the cause of action for violations of HRS § 480-2. Prior to its amendment in 1987, HRS § 480-13 stated in pertinent part:

§ 480-13 Suits [18] by persons injured; amount of recovery, injunctions. (a) Any person who is injured in the person's business or property by reason of anything forbidden or declared unlawful by this chapter:

(1) May sue for damages sustained by the person, and, if the judgment is for the plaintiff, the plaintiff shall be awarded a sum not less than $ 1,000 or threefold damages by the plaintiff sustained, whichever sum is the greater, and reasonable attorneys fees together with the cost of suit; provided that no showing that the proceeding or suit would be in the public interest (as those terms are interpreted under section 5(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act) is necessary when the party against whom the proceeding or suit is brought is a merchant as that term is defined in chapter 490.

HRS § 480-13 (1985) (emphasis added) [hereinafter, the language underscored above is referred to as the public interest/merchant requirement]. Thus, in order to have had standing to bring an action under the 1985 version of HRS § 480-13, a plaintiff was required to demonstrate either that the suit was in the "public interest" or that the defendant was a "merchant." This requirement was linked [19] to the focus of the statutory scheme on competition. As the ICA noted in Beerman v. Toro Manufacturing Corp., 1 Haw. App. 111, 118, 615 P.2d 749, 754 \(1980\), "the legislative history to §§ 480-2 and 480-13 makes clear that the paramount purpose of both statutes is to prevent deceptive practices by businesses that are injurious to other businesses and consumers." (Emphasis added.)

In 1987, the state legislature passed Act 274, 1987 Haw. Sess. L., Act 274, §§ 1-5 at 834-40 (Act 274), in part to ease the burden on the state attorney general's limited resources. Act 274, inter alia, marshalled the assistance of the general public in combating the perpetration of unfair and deceptive acts [*62] [37] in trade and commerce and allowed members of the consuming public to act as "private attorneys general" to enforce HRS §§ 480-2 through 480-13. See Sen. Stand. Comm. Rep. No. 1056, in 1987 Senate Journal, at 1345 ("Your Committee also believes that private enforcement of antitrust laws is beneficial to the judicial process as it discourages violations and eases the burden on the attorney general's limited resources.").

To this end, Act 274 created a new HN5 HRS § 480-2\(d\), which provides [20] that " no person other than a consumer, the attorney general or the director of the office of consumer protection may bring an action based upon unfair or deceptive acts or practices declared unlawful under this section." By so doing, the legislature principally sought to preclude HRS § 480-2's applicability to "private disputes between businesspersons." See Sen. Stand. Comm. Rep. No. 1056, in 1987 Senate Journal, at 1345 (" Your Committee has amended the bill as follows: . . . Provided that suits based upon unfair or deceptive acts or practices under section 480-2 may be brought only by consumers, the attorney general, or the office of consumer protection, in effect precluding its application to private disputes between businesspersons.").

HN6 HRS § 480-1 (Supp. 1992) defines "consumer" as "a natural person who, primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, purchases, attempts to purchase, or is solicited to purchase goods or services or who commits money, property, or services in a personal investment."

Act 274 also eliminated the public interest/merchant requirement in HRS § 480-13 and added a new section, HRS § 480-13\(b\) specifically concerning recovery under HRS I^{21} § 480-2. See Sen. Conf. Comm. Rep. No. 105, in 1987 Senate Journal, at 872 ("your Committee has made numerous amendments which include the following: . . . Amended section 480-2 . . . by providing that it shall not be necessary to show that the proceeding or suit brought under this section would be in the public interest."). Indeed, HRS § 480-2\(c\) (Supp. 1992) now provides that " no showing that the proceeding or suit would be in the public interest (as these terms are interpreted under section 5(b) of the Federal Trade Commission Act) is necessary in any action brought under this section."

The 1987 amendments to HRS chapter 480, therefore, had significant ramifications for the individual consumer in Hawai'i. In addition to aiding in the enforcement of HRS chapter 480 to benefit and preserve economic competition, the principal personal effect of the 1987 amendments to HRS chapter 480 on the individual was to allow "consumers," who had been the victims of unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce, a means to seek recompense for purely individual wrongs; the principal social effect of the amendments was to reinforce the consumer protection [22] aspects of HRS chapter 480.

2. Relative to the Query Entities, the Transaction at Issue in the Present Case Involved Conduct in "Any Trade or Commerce."

Despite the significant changes to the statute, the emphasis of the 1987 amendments did not inject a new purpose into HRS chapter 480 and, most importantly, did not detract nor retreat from any of the purposes associated with trade, commerce, and business previously discussed above. HRS § 480-2's prohibition of "unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce" and HRS chapter 480's concomitant focus on trade, commerce, and business remained and continues to frame the applicability of the statutory scheme in general.

However, as previously stated, Query argues on appeal that the Cieris do not have standing as "consumers," pursuant to HRS § 480-1, to sustain an action for unfair or deceptive acts or practices. As a threshold issue, however, we must first address whether the defendants in this case engaged in "conduct in any trade or commerce" with respect to the transaction at issue.

Heretofore we have not had occasion to address the independent significance of the terms "trade or commerce" [23] in HRS § 480-2. However, insofar as many, if not most, of the several states' consumer protection statutes, [*63] [38] including Hawai'i's, have a common genesis in the federal antitrust statutes, we look to other jurisdictions for guidance.

In Lantner v. Carson, 374 Mass. 606, 373 N.E.2d 973 (1978), the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts held that Section 2 of Massachusetts' consumer protection statute, General Laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts chapter 93A (chapter 93A), which is identical to HRS § 480-2, "is not available where the transaction is strictly private in nature, and is in no way undertaken in the ordinary course of a trade or business." Id. at 608, 373 N.E.2d at 975. In Lantner, the plaintiffs had purchased a private residence from the defendants-sellers.¹² Shortly after the plaintiffs' occupancy of the residence, several problems arose, including problems related to a defective water system and chimney. Plaintiffs repaired the defects and brought suit against the defendants-sellers for, inter alia, the cost of the repairs.

[24] Noting that section 2 of Massachusetts' consumer protection statute proscribed "unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or business," the Massachusetts court rejected plaintiffs' argument that Massachusetts' consumer protection statute is "broad enough to reach any type of commercial exchange, regardless of the nature of the transaction or the character of the parties involved," and that "the remedial provisions of the statute should be available to the consumer who purchases from an individual homeowner, regardless of the fact the transaction is not in pursuit of the seller's ordinary course of business." The court held that "the proscription in section 2 [of the consumer protection act] of 'unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce' must be read to apply to those acts or practices which are perpetrated in a business context." Id. at 611, 373 N.E.2d at 977 (emphasis added).

In so holding, the Lantner court reasoned that:

An individual homeowner who decides to sell his [or her] residence stands in no better bargaining position than the individual consumer. Both parties have rights and liabilities [25] established under common law principles of contract, tort, and property law. Thus, arming the "consumer" [with chapter 93A] in this circumstance does not serve to equalize the positions of buyer and seller. Rather, it serves to give superior rights to only one of the parties, even though as nonprofessionals both stand on an equal footing.

Id. at 612, 373 N.E.2d at 977. The Lantner court, however, did not further elucidate on what would constitute a "business context."

Subsequently, in Begelfer v. Najarian, 381 Mass. 177, 409 N.E.2d 167 (1980), the plaintiffs-borrowers brought an action seeking a declaration that a promissory note executed by them in favor of defendant-lender and his wife, was void due to a violation of the Massachusetts usury statute. The plaintiffs-borrowers also contended that the violation of the statute was an unfair and deceptive act that in turn constituted a violation of chapter 93A. As in Lantner, the Massachusetts high court determined that chapter 93A did not apply to the lender-defendant because the transaction did not occur [26] in a "business context." The court explained that the question whether a transaction took place in a "business context" was an issue of fact that required assessment of factors such as: (1) the nature of the transaction; (2) the character of the parties involved; (3) the activities engaged in by the parties; (4) whether similar transactions had been undertaken in the past; (5) whether the transaction was motivated by business or for personal reasons (as in the sale of a home); and (6) whether the participant played an active part in the transaction. Id. at 190-91, 409 N.E.2d at 176.

The Begelfer court further specifically noted that chapter 93A did not require that "a commercial transaction must take place only in the ordinary course of a person's business or occupation before its participants may be subject to liability under [chapter 93A]." Id. at 191, 409 N.E.2d at 176. Nevertheless, the court reasoned that the transaction did not occur in a "business context" because: (1) [*64] [39] the defendants' participation in the real estate transaction underlying the loan was minimal; (2) the defendants had no voice in negotiating the terms of the loan; (3) the payments on the loan [27] were made to an agent and not directly to the defendants; (4) the defendants were solicited by other investors to participate in the loan; and (5) the defendants were not active in the management of the loan.¹³

Later, in Lynn v. Nashawaty, 12 Mass. App. Ct. 310, 423 N.E.2d 1052 (1981), the Massachusetts Appeals Court further explained the nature of the "business context" requirement. In Lynn, the plaintiffs had purchased a stationery store from the defendants. The defendants had represented to the plaintiffs that there would be $ 13,000.00 worth of inventory on the store premises at the time of the consummation of the sale. However, the plaintiffs alleged that the inventory was overvalued and brought an action under Chapter 93A for unfair or deceptive acts or practices.

¹² The plaintiffs in Lantner had employed a real estate broker who was not named as a defendant in the case.

[28] On appeal, the defendants argued that, based upon Lantner, Chapter 93A did not apply to "isolated transactions." The Appeals Court rejected the defendants' argument and distinguished Lantner, holding that " the sale of a business or business assets by a businessperson is not the same as the sale of a home by an individual homeowner." Id. at 313-14, 423 N.E.2d at 1054.

Massachusetts law is therefore uniform in excepting individual sellers of residential real estate from the Massachusetts consumer protection act when such sales do not fall within a "business context," as dictated by the "conduct in trade or commerce" language in Massachusetts General Laws chapter 93A, § 2. The exception, however, has not been similarly applied in situations involving real estate brokers and salespersons dealing in sales of residential real estate. For example, in Mongeau v. Boutelle, 10 Mass. App. Ct. 246, 407 N.E.2d 352 \(1980\), the defendant-real estate broker, prior to execution of a purchase and sale agreement by the plaintiff-purchaser of a certain parcel of land, misinformed the plaintiff as to the acreage of the parcel and failed to disclose that the property was encumbered [29] by a right of way, facts that the broker either knew or should have known. Subsequent to the plaintiff-purchaser's discovery of the defects, he refused to proceed with the purchase and forfeited his deposit. Thereafter, the plaintiff-purchaser brought suit against the defendant-broker, alleging claims based on common law fraud and violation of chapter 93A. As a real estate broker involved in the transaction, the defendant-broker did not dispute the applicability of chapter 93A to him, but asserted that a prior action brought by the plaintiff-purchaser for common law fraud against the individual sellers, stemming from the same transaction, barred the action against him. The trial court dismissed the action. On appeal, the Massachusetts Appeals Court held that the allegations against the defendant-broker were sufficient to state a claim under chapter 93A and remanded the action to the trial court for factual findings on the common law fraud claim.

Similarly, in Nei v. Burley, 388 Mass. 307, 446 N.E.2d 674 \(1983\), the plaintiffs-buyers purchased a house lot from the defendants-sellers. The defendants-sellers engaged the defendant-broker to market the lot. In their complaint, the [30] plaintiffs-buyers alleged, inter alia, that the defendants-sellers and the defendant-broker had represented to them that the land was suitable for a house and that it had passed percolation and high water tests. After the purchase, the presence of a high water table forced the plaintiffs-buyers to truck considerable amounts of fill and soil to the lot to raise its level so that the septic sewer system would meet the requirements of the applicable sanitary code. The counts of the complaint, based on chapter 93A, were tried before a judge without a jury, who ruled in favor of all of the defendants. On appeal, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts affirmed, holding that: (1) the defendants-sellers were not subject to liability under chapter 93A because they were not engaged in trade or business; and (2) although [*65] [40] the chapter 93A cause of action was properly brought against the broker, the plaintiffs-buyers failed to adduce sufficient evidence at trial to prove the causation element of the claim.

As did the courts in Lantner, Begelfer, Lynn, Mongeau, and Nei, we similarly interpret HRS § 480-2 to require that, in order to fall within the purview of HRS chapter [31] 480, a claim for alleged unfair and deceptive acts or practices against an owner-seller must stem from a transaction involving "conduct in any trade or commerce," similar to the Massachusetts courts' definition of the concept of "business context." The question whether a transaction occurs within a "business context," thus implicating the applicability of HRS chapter 480 to an individual owner-seller, must be determined on a case-by-case basis by an analysis of the transaction.

In view of the general scarcity of real estate in Hawai'i, and its concomitant high costs, see, e.g., Housing Fin. and Dev. Corp. v. Castle, 79 Haw. 64, 80, 898 P.2d 576, 592 \(1995\), many purchasers of residential real estate utilize and rely on brokers for their expertise and resources, including access to data in locating properties as well as determining pricing of "comparables" as a basis for negotiations. Thus, a party who engages a broker or salesperson to represent him or her in a real estate transaction has a considerable advantage over a party who is not so represented. Accordingly, in the context of the Query entities, in particular, and real estate brokers and salespersons, in general, [32] we believe that real estate brokers and salespersons, unlike individual sellers, are generally subject to liability under HRS chapter 480.

As implicitly recognized by the Massachusetts courts, the broker's or salesperson's role in facilitating every real estate transaction in which he or she participates necessarily involves "conduct in any trade or commerce," namely, the systematic sale or brokering of interests in real property. Thus, it is unnecessary to engage in a case-by-case analysis in determining whether a real estate transaction, purportedly involving unfair or deceptive acts or practices by a broker or salesperson who represents a party to such transaction, occurs in a "business context." Consequently, we hold as a matter of law that a broker or salesperson actively involved in a real estate transaction invariably engages in "conduct in any trade or commerce." Accordingly, the Query entities were properly subject to liability pursuant to HRS chapter 480.

3. Standing to Sue as "Consumers" Under Chapter 480

a. Real Estate or Residences Do Not Constitute "Goods" Under HRS § 480-1

Relying on [Kona Hawaiian Associates v. The Pacific Group, 680 F. Supp. \[33\] 1438 \(D. Haw. 1988\)](#), Query asserts that the Cieris do not have standing to bring an action under HRS chapter 480 because they do not qualify as "consumers" under HRS § 480-1. As previously noted, HRS § 480-1 defines "consumer" as "a natural person who, primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, purchases, attempts to purchase, or is solicited to purchase goods or services or who commits money, property, or services in a personal investment." Query submits that, because real estate or residences do not qualify as "goods," the Cieris are not "consumers."

In Kona Hawaiian, the seller of a hotel brought a multi-count suit against a prospective purchaser and the purchaser's partners, asserting, inter alia, a claim for unfair and deceptive trade practices based on a violation of HRS § 480-2. The United States District Court for the District of Hawai'i granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants-purchasers, holding that the plaintiff-seller had failed to state a claim under HRS § 480-13 because the defendants-purchasers were not "merchants" under HRS § 480-13. The Kona Hawaiian court reasoned that the defendants-purchasers were not "merchants" because [34] "a real estate transaction involving the sale of a hotel, is not a transaction involving goods or services. Accordingly, in this transaction . . . the [purchaser's partners] are not merchants within the meaning of [chapter 480]." Id. at 1453.

[*66] [41] Query asserts that, because the present case similarly arises from a real estate transaction involving the sale of a residence, the trial court should have granted her motion for JNOV on the HRS § 480-2 claim. The Cieris argue that Kona Hawaiian is distinguishable for two reasons: first, the real estate transaction at issue in Kona Hawaiian dealt with a transaction between the seller and purchaser directly, not between the purchaser and a real estate broker; and second, Kona Hawaiian's ultimate holding concerned whether the seller of the property was a "merchant" under HRS § 480-13 prior to 1987. We disagree with the Cieris.

Pursuant to Kona Hawaiian, we hold that real estate or residences do not qualify as "goods" under HRS § 480-1, and the Cieris therefore do not have standing as "consumers" to bring a claim alleging a violation of HRS chapter 480 for the real estate transaction at issue in the present case as [35] purchasers of "goods."

In reaching its conclusion that real estate or residences do not qualify as "goods," the Kona Hawaiian court relied on Lacey v. Edgewood Home Builders, Inc., 446 A.2d 1017 \(R.I. 1982\), and Wendling v. Cundall, 568 P.2d 888 \(Wyo. 1977\), both of which dealt with the question whether a real estate transaction would qualify as a transaction in "goods." In those cases, the Supreme Courts of Rhode Island and Wyoming relied upon the definition of "goods" located in each state's version of section 2-105 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).¹⁴ Both Rhode Island and Wyoming's versions of section 2-105 are identical to Hawai'i's version, codified in HN7 HRS chapter 490, which provides that:

"Goods" means all things (including specially manufactured goods) which are movable at the time of identification to the contract for sale other than the money in which the price is to be paid, investment securities, (Article 8) and things in action. "Goods" also includes the unborn young of animals and growing crops and other identified things attached to realty as described in the section on goods to be severed from realty.

HRS § 490:2-105(1) (1985). [36] Like Rhode Island and Wyoming's versions of section 2-105, the reference to real estate or residences are conspicuously absent from Hawai'i's version of section 2-105.

We therefore agree with the analysis in Kona Hawaiian and hold that, for purposes of determining whether a plaintiff has standing to sue for unfair and deceptive trade acts or practices as a "consumer" pursuant to HRS § 480-13, real estate and residences are not "goods" as that term is utilized in HRS § 480-1.

b. The Cieris Do Not Have Standing as "Consumers" by Allegedly Having Been "Solicited to Purchase" Brokerage Services By Query.

Alternatively, the Cieris maintain that they have standing as "consumers" under HRS § 480-1 because they allegedly were "solicited to purchase" brokerage services by Query. The infirmity in the Cieris' position, however, is threefold: First, the Cieris did not plead any claims for relief against Query on such grounds, nor did they allege any facts in support of such grounds in [37] their complaint. It is well settled that HN8[[↑]] "the crucial inquiry [with regard to standing] . . . is whether the plaintiff has alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to warrant his [or her] invocation of . . . [the court's] jurisdiction and to justify exercise of the court's remedial powers on his [or her] behalf." Hawaii's Thousand Friends v. Anderson, 70 Haw. 276, 281, 768 P.2d 1293, 1298 (1989) (citations, quotation marks and original emphasis omitted, emphasis added).

Second, an essential element of the standing inquiry is, inter alia, that the party or parties seeking standing "suffered an actual or threatened injury as a result of the defendant's wrongful conduct," and that "the injury is fairly traceable to the defendant's actions." Pele Defense Fund v. Paty, 73 Haw. 578, 593, 421 I*671 837 P.2d 1247, 1258 (1992) (emphasis added), cert. denied, 122 L. Ed. 2d 671, U.S. , 113 S. Ct. 1277 (1993); see also Pele Defense Fund v. Puna Geothermal Venture, 77 Hawai'i 64, 70, 881 P.2d 1210, 1216 (1994) (To show standing, a plaintiff must "clearly demonstrate [] an "injury in fact . . . traceable to the challenged [38] action." (emphasis added)). We do not believe that the injury as pled in this case -- namely, the Cieris' incurring repair costs for the plumbing problems purportedly undisclosed by the defendants -- occurred "as a result of," or is "fairly traceable" to, Query's allegedly fraudulent representations regarding Query's capacity to serve as the Cieris' broker in a transaction where she also represented the seller.

Finally, as evinced by the scope and character of the interrogatories on the special verdict form, the issue of dual agency or allegedly fraudulent statements made by Query relating to her solicitation of the Cieris was not before the jury. For example, all interrogatories on the special verdict form relating to breach of contract, misrepresentation, fraud, and deceptive acts or practices fall under the general heading of "claims relating to plumbing." Moreover, the interrogatory regarding the amount of damages on the special verdict form provides: "What is the amount of Plaintiffs' damages as a result of the breach of contract, fraud, and/or deceptive acts or practices relating to the plumbing of the home?" (Emphasis added.)

c. The Cieris Have Standing as "Consumers" [39] Because They "Committed Money in a Personal Investment."

The Cieris also maintain that they qualify as "consumers" under HRS § 480-1 because they committed money in a "personal investment." The dispositive question, therefore, is whether real estate or residences qualify as "personal investments" as the term is used in HRS § 480-1. Based on a review of the statutory language and the legislative history, we answer in the affirmative and hold that, by purchasing the home at issue in the present case, the Cieris committed money in a personal investment, and accordingly have standing as "consumers."

It is well settled that, HN9[[↑]] when construing a statute, this court's "foremost obligation is to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the legislature, which is to be obtained primarily from the language contained in the statute itself." Crosby v. State Dep't. of Budget & Fin., 76 Hawai'i 332, 340, 876 P.2d 1300, 1308 (1994) (citation omitted), cert. denied, U.S. , 115 S. Ct. 731 (1995). Moreover, "where the language of the statute is plain and unambiguous, our only duty is to give effect to its plain and obvious meaning." [State v. Ramela, 77 Hawai'i \[40\] 394, 395, 885 P.2d 1135, 1136 \(1994\)](#) (citation omitted).

"Invest" is defined in pertinent part as "to put (money) to use, by purchase or expenditure, in something offering profitable returns, esp. interest or income." The Random House College Dictionary, at 702 (Rev. ed. 1979). We believe that, as previously noted, real estate is, particularly in Hawai'i, both scarce and expensive. As a result, the purchase of real estate or a residence likely is the largest "investment" a person in Hawai'i may make in a lifetime.

We further believe that, contrary to Query's contentions, real estate may be purchased with an intent to reside on the parcel of property and, concurrently, with an intent to hold the property in anticipation of an appreciation in the parcel's resale value. Accordingly, absent legislative intent to the contrary, we believe the plain and obvious meaning of the term "personal investment" includes real estate or residences.

As previously noted, in 1987, the legislature amended HRS chapter 480 to allow suits based on unfair or deceptive acts or practices under HRS § 480-2 to be brought only by consumers, the attorney general, or the office of consumer protection. [HRS \[41\] § 480-1](#)'s definition of "consumer" was amended to include "a natural person who, primarily for personal, family, or household purposes . . . commits money, property or services in an investment." The legislative history, however, did not provide any insight as to the legislature's intent regarding the scope of the term "investment."

[*68] [43] In 1990, the legislature amended HRS § 480-1 by adding the word "personal" to modify the term "investment." As amended, the section provides that a "consumer" is a "natural person who . . . commits money, property, or services in a personal investment." HRS § 480-1 (Supp. 1992) (emphasis added). The relevant legislative history provides that:

The purpose of this bill is to amend Section 480-1, Hawaii Revised Statutes, by changing the definition of "consumer."

Your Committee heard testimony in favor of this bill from an attorney in private practice. He testified that the reference to "investors" in the definition of "consumer" has been subject to two Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals cases, both of which held that the Legislature did not intend that investment matters were covered in antitrust cases. He further stated his view that the inclusion [42] of investors in either a consumer protection or anti trust act created a paradox, since investment matters are subject to Chapter 485 and, therefore, investment matters should not be intermingled in an antitrust or consumer protection law.

The Department of Commerce and Consumer Affairs (DCCA), the Honolulu Police Department (HPD), and another attorney in private practice opposed this bill.

The DCCA testified that the definition of "consumer" in Chapter 480 was a distinct approach to consumer protection, and that the word "investment" was not restricted to securities, but includes other types of ventures.

Background information was given for the definition [of "consumer"] by an attorney who stated that when the definition of "consumer" was formulated, the Office of Consumer Protection (Division of DCCA) wanted to insure that people who had invested in bogus financial schemes would be covered by Section 480-2. An example is the Ronald Rewald investment case.¹⁵ [45] He further stated that although he believed that businesses fighting other businesses should not be able to use consumer fraud statutes against one another, unsophisticated and potentially gullible consumers [43] should be protected from investment fraud situations by recourse to the remedies in Section 480-2.

Your Committee believes that one of the purposes for the definition of "consumer", as formulated in Section 480-2, was to address the consumer investment fraud situation, such as the Rewald situation. However, the language of the definition may be overboard and not limited to situations of investment fraud schemes to consumers. Therefore, your Committee has amended the bill by inserting the word "personal" before the word "investment" to clarify that the provision is to protect individual consumers, rather than businesses.

Hse. Stand. Comm. Rep. No. 716-90, in 1990 House Journal, at 1113 (emphasis added). Query argues that the import of the legislative history was to emphasize that securities were included within the scope of the term "investment." We agree. However, the legislative history does not evince an intent on the part of the legislature to preclude the inclusion of real estate or residences within the scope of the term "investment." Moreover, HN10 [HRS chapter 480 is a remedial statute, which is "to be construed liberally in order to accomplish the purpose for [44] which [it was] enacted. . . . Remedial statutes are liberally construed to suppress the [perceived] evil and advance the [enacted] remedy." Dawes v. First Ins. Co. of Hawai'i, Ltd., 77 Hawai'i 117, 123, I44] I*69] 883 P.2d 38, 44, reconsideration denied, 77 Hawai'i 489, 889 P.2d 66 (1994) (citation and some brackets omitted). Based on the foregoing, we hold that real estate or residences qualify as "personal investments" pursuant to HRS § 480-1. Accordingly, the Cieris qualify as "consumers" who "committed money in a personal investment," and therefore have standing to sue under HRS chapter 480.¹⁶

B. The Eastern Star Case and the "Greater Amount" of Recovery

1. A Choice of Remedies

Having concluded that the Cieris qualify as "consumers" and have standing to sue under chapter 480, we next address the choice of remedies issue raised by Eastern Star. In Eastern Star, the ICA held that:

Despite our holding above [that 480-2 does not supersede common law fraud], we agree . . . that an award of both treble damages and punitive damages for the same act constitutes improper double recovery. . . . The recovery should be either treble damages or punitive damages, whichever is the greater amount.

6 Haw. App. at 142, 712 P.2d at 1159-60 (citations omitted and emphasis in original).

Under Eastern Star, [46] a plaintiff proving both fraud and unfair or deceptive acts or practices violations of HRS § 480-2 cannot recover for fraud and punitive damages, on the one hand, and treble damages, on the other; rather, the plaintiff must elect a remedy. By so holding, Eastern Star restates well-settled law and is consistent with both state and federal court interpretations of state unfair practices statutes and federal antitrust laws. See, e.g., Hale v. Basin Motor Co., 110 N.M. 314, 320, 795 P.2d 1006, 1012 (1990) ("recovery of both statutory treble damages and punitive damages based upon the same conduct would be improper.... Here, the possibility was open to the court to consider both treble damages under the Unfair Trade Practices Act and, if proven, a punitive damage award for fraud. The [plaintiffs] could accept the greater of the two awards."); Fineman v. Armstrong World Indus., 980 F.2d 171, 218 (3d Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 122 L. Ed. 2d 677, U.S. , 113 S. Ct. 1285 (1993) ("[plaintiff] must elect between recovering under either tort law with any punitive damages or under its antitrust claim with its treble damages."); see also Annotation, Plaintiff's [47] Rights to Punitive or Multiple Damages When Cause of Action Renders Both Available, 1 A.L.R. 5th 449 (1992 and Supp. 1994).

¹⁶ Having concluded that the Cieris have standing to sue under HRS chapter 480 and that the trial court properly applied HRS chapter 480 to the present case, we need not reach the Cieris' argument that they are "indirect purchasers" and thus qualify as "consumers."

Applying these principles to the present case, we face two issues: (1) whether statutory attorneys' fees are included in determining the "greater amount" of recovery; and (2) if so, whether the Cieris are precluded from obtaining the greater amount under the election of remedies doctrine. We address each issue in turn.

2. Statutory Attorneys' Fees As A Portion of Recovery

Query, relying on a literal interpretation of Eastern Star, argues that the trial court had no choice but to award damages for the common-law count ($ 3,626.00 for fraud plus $ 7,950.00 for punitives, for a total of $ 11,576.00) because the total is greater than the statutory treble damages ($ 3,626.00 trebled, or $ 10,878.00). She argues that the ICA was aware that statutory attorneys' fees were awardable, but made no mention of such fees in Eastern Star.

On the other hand, the Cieris argue that under HRS § 480-13\(b\)\(1\), attorneys' fees are mandatory. See HRS § 480-13(b) ("the plaintiff shall be awarded a sum not less than $ 1,000 or threefold damages by the [48] plaintiff sustained, whichever sum is the greater, and reasonable attorneys' fees together with the costs of suit." (emphasis added)). They maintain that the reasoning expressed in Eastern Star indicates that the court should base the award to the plaintiff on whichever theory results in a greater amount of recovery, and mandatory attorneys' fees necessarily comprise a portion of the statutory recovery [*70] [45] for purposes of calculating the "greater amount" of recovery. We agree.

In Town East Ford Sales v. Gray, 730 S.W.2d 796 \(Tex. Ct. App. 1987\), the Texas Court of Appeals faced precisely the same issue. In that case, the plaintiff, who had purchased an automobile, brought suit for common-law fraud and statutory unfair practices against the seller and prevailed. In resolving the same choice of remedy issue on appeal, the Town East court noted that it "must decide whether we may consider attorney's fees and court costs in determining which cause of action affords [plaintiff] the greater relief." Id. at 812. The court reasoned that, because attorneys' fees and costs are mandatory when a consumer prevails under the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act (DTPA), such fees [49] and costs "are considered a part of the consumer's relief under the statute." Id. Therefore, the court held that, "for the purposes of determining which cause of action affords the greater recovery, we may consider attorney's fees as part of the consumer's recovery under the DTPA." Id. The court accordingly awarded statutory treble damages and fees and costs of $ 51,869.31, which exceeded the common law fraud award of $ 4,906.05 in actual damages plus $ 15,000.00 in punitive damages.

Similarly, in Kelco Disposal, Inc. v. Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vermont, 845 F.2d 404 \(2d Cir. 1988\), aff'd, 492 U.S. 257, 106 L. Ed. 2d 219, 109 S. Ct. 2909 \(1989\), the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed an award of over $ 6,000,000.00 in punitive damages on a state law tort claim for intentional interference with contractual relations because the award exceeded the $ 153,438.00 in treble damages and $ 212,500.00 in attorneys' fees and costs under 15 U.S.C. § 15. Kelco presents the opposite factual situation from the present case: the common law tort claim provided the higher recovery. In denying an award of attorneys' fees on the tort/punitive damages claim, the Kelco court reasoned [50] that:

Where, as here, the prevailing party elects a remedy provided by state law, and thereby forgoes its treble damage award, it should forgo the entire remedy provided by federal law, including attorneys' fees. Attorneys' fees are an integral member of the federal remedy. . . . In any event, its $ 6 million dollar punitive damage award should provide an adequate fund from which [plaintiff] may pay its attorneys' fee without discomfiture.

845 F.2d at 411 (emphasis added).

We agree with the rationale as set forth in the line of authority represented by Town East and Kelco. As correctly noted by the Cieris, under Hawai'i's statutory scheme, awards of attorneys' fees are mandatory. We therefore hold that the trial court properly included the amount of attorneys' fees in the calculation of the greater amount of recovery. Thus, pursuant to Eastern Star, because the trial court's award of $ 10,878.00 in treble damages, $ 12,252.00 in attorneys' fees, and $ 851.36 in costs, exceeds $ 11,576.00, ($ 3,626.00 for fraud plus $ 7,950.00 in punitive damages), the trial court's judgment based on the Cieris' statutory unfair practices claim was proper.

¹⁷ [51]

3. The Cieris' Are Not Estopped From Recovering Statutory Damages and Attorneys' Fees

Query argues that, under the election of remedies doctrine, the Cieris irrevocably chose to recover under the common law, and by so doing, they either waived, or are estopped from, obtaining statutory damages and attorneys' fees. We disagree.

Query asserts that the Cieris' counsel "elected" recovery under the [52] fraud count at the May 7, 1993 hearing on the motions to alter judgment. The transcript of the hearing provides in pertinent part:

[*71] [46] The Court: You've read [Query's counsel's] Motion for [JNOV]?

Cieris' counsel: Yes, I have.

The Court: And . . . he addresses the issue of the judgment amount. And he does some analysis based upon the Eastern Star case, all right.

Cieris' counsel: That's correct, Your Honor.

The Court: Do you disagree with his interpretation?

Cieris' counsel: Your Honor, I don't disagree with the interpretation, however, there is still a question regarding, I believe, Eastern Star states that treble damages or punitive damages, the greater of the two would be awarded. In that sense, I would agree with the decision.

The Court: So what is your position as to what the judgment should be? In your memoranda it seems that you're still asking for both punitive and treble.

Cieris' counsel: We would revise that somewhat to bring it into line with the decision in Eastern Star and request that the amendment be that the punitive damages be awarded pursuant to the jury verdict as it is the greater of the amount awarded as treble [53] damages.

The Court: Okay. So what is the amount that you believe that you should be awarded in the judgment?

Cieris' counsel: Okay. The special damages award of $ 3,650 plus punitive damages of $ 7,950.

The Court: All right. So you're saying that it should be the total of $ 11,576?

Cieris' counsel: That's correct, Your Honor.

Cieris' counsel: Your Honor, just to clarify that point, nothing has been withdrawn regarding the treble damages portion, it is just that if the punitive damages are not awarded to plaintiff then the treble damages award should stand.

The Court: All right. It's not my understanding that he's withdrawing anything.

All right. With regard to Plaintiff's Motion to Alter or Amend the Judgment, the motion is granted insofar as the judgment shall be amended to reflect an award in the amount of $ 11,576 which reflects the total of the special damages of $ 3650, and the punitive damages of $ 7,950, which sum is greater than the treble damages. The treble damages being $ 10,878.

As noted previously, the trial court later reversed itself and awarded the treble damages and attorneys' fees.

Query argues that [54] the Cieris' attorney only requested statutory recovery after he realized that he could not recover attorneys' fees on the fraud claim. She contends that the Cieris chose their remedy and cannot vacillate between inconsistent positions and remedies.

HN11 [+] The equitable doctrine of election of remedies is "not a rule of substantive law but rather is a technical rule of procedure or judicial administration." Airgo v. Horizon Cargo Transp., 66 Haw. 590, 593, 670 P.2d 1277, 1280 (1983) (quoting 25 Am. Jur. 2d Election of Remedies § 1 (1966)).

Election of remedies is the act of choosing between two or more concurrent but inconsistent remedies based upon the same state of facts. Ordinarily a plaintiff need not elect, and cannot be compelled to elect between inconsistent remedies during the course of trial. . . . If, however, a plaintiff has unequivocally and knowledgeably elected to proceed on one of the remedies he [or she] is pursuing, he [or she] may be barred recourse to the other. . . . [The doctrine] acts as a bar precluding a plaintiff from seeking an inconsistent remedy as a result of his [or her] previous conduct or election.

Wallis v. Superior [55] Court, 160 Cal. App. 3d 1109, 1114, 207 Cal. Rptr. 123 (1984) (emphasis added and internal citations omitted).

[*72] [47] Reviewing the "election" by the Cieris' counsel, it can hardly be said that he chose "unequivocally and knowledgeably." The Cieris' counsel specifically noted that "nothing has been withdrawn regarding the treble damages portion," and the court agreed that "it's not my understanding that he's withdrawing anything." The election was thus not "unequivocal."

Furthermore, prior to this opinion, whether attorneys' fees were considered as part of the statutory recovery for purposes of the choice of remedies was unsettled under Hawai'i law. Moreover, the trial court itself changed its decision twice, ultimately arriving at the correct conclusion. Therefore, the election was also not "knowledgeable." Accordingly, we hold that the Cieris are not estopped from recovering under their statutory claim.

C. Sufficiency-of-Evidence Issues

1. Fraud and Punitive Damages

Query next argues that the trial court erred in denying her motion for JNOV, or in the alternative, for new trial, asserting that there was no legal or factual basis to support a verdict for punitive damages or a finding of [56] fraud. Because we have held that the trial court properly entered judgment on the HRS chapter 480 claim and not the common-law fraud count, we need not reach these issues. Moreover, Query does not appeal the jury's specific finding that her behavior was "a deceptive act or practice" distinct from a finding of fraud.

2. Special Damages

Query next argues that the trial court erred in denying her motion for JNOV or for new trial because the jury erroneously calculated the amount of special damages. The jury awarded the Cieris $ 3,626.00, which represents the expenses from the sewer breakdown incurred by the Cieris after moving in, including costs of food and living expenses incurred while the sewer was being repaired.¹⁸ Receipts were submitted for each expense. Query argues that it was clear from the testimony in the case and the conduct of the Cieris during the case that the food expenses were, at best, distorted and, at worst, fabricated. We disagree.

[57] Query claims that the special damages should be $ 3,388.72 (as opposed to $ 3,626.00), but bases the difference on exhibits that were not submitted into evidence. If the exhibits were not submitted, the jury should not have considered them in making the award. However, defendant's exhibit A-8, which was admitted into evidence and available for the jury to consider, indicates that the Cieris' damages were $ 3,625.89. We hold that the jury's verdict is supported by substantial evidence.

3. Amount of Attorneys' Fees

¹⁸ The jury chose not to award $ 6,800, representing the cost of replacing the entire sewer line.

Finally, Query contests the amount of attorneys' fees awarded by the trial court under HRS § 480-13\(1\). The reasonableness of an award of attorneys' fees is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Booker v. Midpac Lumber Co., Ltd., 65 Haw. 166, 171, 649 P.2d 376, 380 \(1982\).

Query questions the form of the billing sheets, essentially arguing that the entries are not detailed enough. She also argues that the amount of $ 12,252.00 is disproportionate to the actual award of special damages of $ 3,626.00. Query notes that the Cieris did not prevail against Leticia Query Realty, Inc., Mr. Yamaji, or Mrs. Yamaji. Thus, she argues that the fees should be limited to twenty-five [58] percent of the amount requested, at most.

Subsequent to the trial, the Cieris' counsel submitted verified affidavits and standard billing sheets for attorneys' fees of $ 22,475.00, as well as an additional $ 4,468.81 for fees generated by the Cieris' previous counsel. The trial court apparently reduced the amount sought by half, treating Mr. and Mrs. Yamaji as one party, and the Query entities as another. Because the Cieris prevailed against Query but not against the Yamajis, it was proper, although not required, [*73] [48] for the trial court to have reduced the fee recovery by fifty percent. See, e.g., Reazin v. Blue Cross and Blue Shield, 899 F.2d 951, 980 \(10th Cir.\) (under antitrust laws, such apportionment is not required), cert. denied, 497 U.S. 1005, 111 L. Ed. 2d 752, 110 S. Ct. 3241 (1990). With respect to Query's claim of disproportionality, contrary to her argument, the amount of fees need not be restricted to the amount of actual damages. Cf. The Second Circuit has repudiated the idea that some special pleading is required in antitrust cases, and the law of this circuit has been clear ever since. A short plain statement of a claim for relief which gives notice to the opposing party is all that is necessary in antitrust cases, as in other cases under the federal rules.

Under the Sherman Act, a particular arrangement may be per se illegal, or illegal pursuant to a "rule of reason" analysis. Courts apply a per se rule only to agreements or practices which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable, and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use. The legality of all other arrangements is governed by a rule of reason, which invites a more open inquiry into, and a balancing of, such factors as the power of the defendants, the effects of the arrangement, its possible redeeming virtues, and the availability of alternative ways of achieving any legitimate objectives with fewer threats to competition.

HN8 Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A tying arrangement is an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different, or tied, product. A seller violates the antitrust laws through a tying arrangement when it uses its market power over one product to "force" a consumer to purchase a second product.

A "per se" illegal tying arrangement requires proof of the following five elements: (1) a tied and a tied product; (2) actual coercion by the seller that forced the buyer to accept the tied product; (3) sufficient economic power in the tying product market to coerce purchaser acceptance of the tied product; (4) anticompetitive effects in the tied market; and, (5) involvement of a "not insubstantial" amount of interstate commerce in the tied market.

HN11 [blue icon] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A seller's use of strong persuasion, encouragement, or cajolery to the point of obnoxiousness to induce the buyer to buy its full line of products does not amount to actual coercion. Rather, actual coercion is present only if the seller goes beyond persuasion and conditions its buyer's purchase of one product on the purchase of another product. Of course, not every refusal to sell two products separately can be said to restrain competition. The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of the tied product.

Economic power is the most crucial element of an illegal tying arrangement. To sufficiently allege such economic power in the tying product market, a complaint must allege either that the seller's share of the market is high, or that the seller has some advantage not shared by his competitors in the market for the tying product.

Under the Sherman Act, as a threshold matter there must be a substantial potential for impact on competition in the tied market in order to justify per se condemnation of an alleged tying arrangement. If only a single purchaser were "forced" with respect to the purchase of a tied item, the resultant impact on competition would not be sufficient to warrant the concern of antitrust law.

Under the Sherman Act, "substantial" in the context of a tying arrangement means "substantial enough in terms of dollar-volume so as not to be merely de minimis." For purposes of determining substantiality, a court measures the total volume of sales tied by the "policy" under challenge, not merely the portion of the total accounted for by the particular plaintiff who brings suit. There is no magic number that definitively establishes whether a plaintiff has foreclosed a "not insubstantial" amount of potential sales for the tied product. For purposes of determining whether the amount of commerce foreclosed is too insubstantial to warrant prohibition of the practice, the relevant figure is the total volume of sales tied by the sales policy under challenge, not the portion of this total accounted for by the particular plaintiff who brings suit.

antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent, and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful. The antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition, not competitors. In other words, it is injury to the market, not to individual firms, that is significant.

Under the rule of reason, the plaintiff must demonstrate a precise harm to competition caused by defendants' activities. This is in contrast to his or her counterparts who rely on a per se approach, under which several courts have found that a restraint of trade is presumed.

[*366] MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

HURLEY, District Judge

Presently before the Court is a Motion to Dismiss by Suburban Paraco Corporation ("Defendant"), pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) ("Rule 12(b)(6)"), for failure to state a claim for an illegal tying arrangement. For the reasons set forth below, Defendant's motion is denied.

Background

In July 1991, McGraw Street Realty Corporation ("McGraw") and Defendant entered into an agreement by which Defendant would sell to McGraw a propane-handling facility ("the Shirley Facility").¹ (See Compl. P 19; [*367] Delorio Sept. 2, 1994 Affid. P 5.) Audell and McGraw (collectively, "Plaintiffs") allege that the sale of the Shirley Facility was expressly conditioned upon the execution of a supply contract between Audell and Defendant ("the Propane Agreement"). (See Compl. PP 19-20, 21.) Plaintiffs indicate that the Propane Agreement provided that Audell would purchase [*2] "its minimum requirements of propane" as well as specified transportation services from Defendant. (Compl. PP 23-24.)

Plaintiffs filed the instant suit in August 1994, alleging that Defendant violated the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq. Specifically, Plaintiffs contend that the requirement by Defendant that Audell purchase propane and transportation services from Defendant as a condition to McGraw's purchase of the Shirley Facility constitutes a tying arrangement prohibited by the Sherman Act. (Compl. P 26.)

DISCUSSION

HN1[] A Complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim, "unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80, 78 S. Ct. 99 [^{31}] (1957); see also Austern v. Chicago Bd. Options Exch., Inc., 898 F.2d 882, 885 (2d Cir 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 850, 112 L. Ed. 2d 107, 111 S. Ct. 141 (1990). HN2[] In reviewing the sufficiency of a Complaint, the Court takes the plaintiff's allegations as true and construe them in a light most favorable to the plaintiff. Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 236, 40 L. Ed. 2d 90, 94 S. Ct. 1683 (1974) (citing Conley, 355 U.S. at 45-46); Stewart v. Jackson & Nash, 976 F.2d 86, 87 (2d Cir. 1992).

In short, HN3[] a Complaint should be summarily dismissed pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) "only if it is clear that no relief could be granted under any set of facts that could be proved consistent with the allegations." Hishon v. King & Spalding, 467 U.S. 69, 73, 81 L. Ed. 2d 59, 104 S. Ct. 2229 (1984) (citing Conley, 355 U.S. at 45-46). With these principles in mind, the Court turns to a discussion of the issues in the case at bar.

I. Pleading Requirements for Antitrust Claims

As an initial matter, the Court addresses Defendant's argument that "the ordinary notice theory of pleading is not sufficient when measuring the sufficiency of complaints brought under [4] the antitrust laws." (Def.'s Mem. Supp. at 3.) Specifically, Defendant contends that because antitrust cases are considerably more complex than negligence or contract actions, the Federal Courts do require plaintiffs to plead with some particularity each of the elements of the claims alleged for relief identified, including a statement of matters and their relation to each other.

(Id.)

Plaintiffs, however, disagree with Defendant's contention that there is a heightened standard of pleading for antitrust cases. (Pls.' Mem. Opp. at 9.) Plaintiffs are correct. In 1957, HN4 [↑] the Second Circuit "repudiated the idea that some special pleading is required in antitrust cases, and the law of this Circuit has been clear ever since." See Three Crown Ltd. Partnership v. Caxton Corp., 817 F. Supp. 1033, 1047 \(S.D.N.Y. 1993\) (citing Nagler v. Admiral Corp., 248 F.2d 319, 322-23 \(2d Cir. 1957\)) (footnote omitted). "[A] short plain statement of a claim for relief which gives notice to the opposing party is all that is necessary in antitrust cases, as in other cases under the Federal Rules." George C. Frey Ready-Mixed Concrete, Inc., 554 F.2d 551, 554 \(2d Cir. 1977\) (citations [5] omitted).

In short, the Court finds that there is no heightened pleading requirement for antitrust claims.

II. Section 1 of the Sherman Act

The instant Complaint alleges a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. In part, that section provides as follows:

HN5 [↑] Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal.

[*368] 15 U.S.C. § 1. HN6 [↑] "While 'the Sherman Act speaks of restraint of trade in absolute terms, it has long been established that § 1 proscribes only unreasonable restraints.'" Reborn Enters., Inc. v. Fine Child, Inc., 590 F. Supp. 1423, 1436 \(S.D.N.Y. 1984\) (quoting Borger v. Yamaha Int'l Corp., 625 F.2d 390, 396 \(2d Cir. 1980\), in turn citing Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 55 L. Ed. 619, 31 S. Ct. 502 \(1911\)), aff'd, 754 F.2d 1072 (2d Cir. 1985).

HN7 [↑] Under the Sherman Act, a particular arrangement may be per se illegal, or illegal pursuant to a "rule of reason" analysis. Id.

Courts apply a per se rule only to "agreements or practices which because of their pernicious [6] effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use."

Id. (quoting Northern Pac. Ry. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514 \(1958\)).

The legality of all other arrangements is governed by a rule of reason, "which invites a more open inquiry into, and a balancing of, such factors as the power of the defendants, the effects of the arrangement, its possible redeeming virtues, and the availability of alternative ways of achieving any legitimate objectives with fewer threats to competition."

Id. (citation omitted and emphasis added).

III. Illegal Tying Arrangement

HN8 [↑] "A tying arrangement is 'an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product.'" Yentsch v. Texaco, Inc., 630 F.2d 46, 56 \(2d Cir. 1980\) (quoting Northern Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. 1, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514). "A seller violates the antitrust laws through a tying arrangement when it uses its market [7] power over one product to 'force' a consumer to purchase a second product." Gonzalez v. St. Margaret's House Hous. Dev. Fund Corp., 880 F.2d 1514, 1516 \(2d Cir. 1989\) (citing Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 12, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 \(1984\)).

If the Complaint presently under attack contains sufficient allegations to support either a per se violation of the Sherman Act or a violation based upon a "rule of reason" approach, the instant motion must be denied. However, counsel have framed the issue as whether or not the Complaint states a cause of action solely with respect to a per se analysis. Accordingly, the Court addresses that issue initially, and then reviews the Complaint's sufficiency under the alternate approach of "rule of reason."²

[8] A. Per Se Illegal Tying Claim

HN9 A "per se" illegal tying arrangement requires proof of the following five (5) elements:

- (1) a tied and a tied product;
- (2) actual coercion by the seller that forced the buyer to accept the tied product;
- (3) sufficient economic power in the tying product market to coerce purchaser acceptance of the tied product;
- (4) anticompetitive effects in the tied market;³ and
- (5) involvement of a "not insubstantial" amount of interstate commerce in the tied market.

See, e.g., Yentsch, 630 F.2d at 56-57 (citations omitted); see also Telerate Sys., Inc. v. Caro, 689 F. Supp. 221, 234 \(S.D.N.Y. 1988\); Consolidated Terminal Sys., Inc. v. ITT World Communications, Inc., 535 F. Supp. 225, 231 \(S.D.N.Y. 1982\).

[*369] 1. Existence of a Tying and a [9] Tied Product

The first element of an illegal tying arrangement is the existence of a tying and a tied product. E.g., Yentsch, 630 F.2d at 56. The Complaint alleges that the sale of the Shirley Facility was expressly conditioned upon the execution of a supply contract between Audell and Defendant by which Defendant agreed to sell, and Audell agreed to purchase, a supply of propane and services for the transportation of propane. (See Compl. PP 17-24.)

Upon review of the Complaint, the Court finds that it adequately alleges the existence of a tying product, the Shirley Facility, and tied products, propane supply and propane transportation. See, e.g., Yentsch, 630 F.2d at 56-57.

2. Actual Coercion by Seller

The second element of an illegal tying arrangement is actual coercion by the seller that forces the buyer to purchase the tied product. E.g., Unijax, Inc. v. Champion Int'l, Inc., 683 F.2d 678, 685 \(2d Cir. 1982\). Defendant suggests that the Complaint does not adequately allege such coercion. Specifically, Defendant argues that there is a complete absence of any coercion by Paraco. In fact, nowhere in the Complaint [10] is it alleged that Plaintiffs were "coerced" into buying the Shirley Facility nor is there any factual allegation to be found (and therefore provided) within the four corners of the Complaint.

² Even though Plaintiffs' Complaint will stand if either a per se or a "rule of reason" violation is properly alleged, the proof at trial may differ depending on which theory is pursued by Plaintiffs. See Phillip E. Areeda, Antitrust Law § 1728(b) (1991) ("The per se rule is . . . a shortcut that allows us to condemn a restraint as unreasonable without the usual inquiries."). For that reason, the above-indicated bifurcated analysis will be undertaken.

(Def.'s Mem. at 6-7 (emphasis in original).) A review of the Complaint reveals that Defendant is mistaken.

The Complaint contains the following allegations:

(Compl. P 17.)

Rather, Paraco required as a condition of the sale that Audell simultaneously agree to certain provisions regarding the purchase and transportation of propane.

(Compl. P 18.)

The sale of the Shirley Facility was expressly conditioned upon the execution by the parties of a "Propane Agreement."

(See Compl. P 20.)

The Propane Agreement provides . . . that "the execution and closing of this Agreement and the contemporaneous agreement for the sale of the Shirley Facility are each conditioned upon each other".

The Second Circuit has explained that HN11[] a seller's "use of 'strong persuasion, encouragement, or cajolery to the point of obnoxiousness to induce . . . [the buyer] to buy its [11] full line of products' does not . . . amount to actual coercion." See Unijax, 683 F.2d at 685 (citation omitted). Rather, "actual coercion . . . is present only if the [seller] goes beyond persuasion and conditions its [buyer's] purchase of one product on the purchase of another product." See id. (citation omitted and emphasis added).

Of course, "not every refusal to sell two products separately can be said to restrain competition." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 11. "The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of the tied product . . ." Id. Such control, or leverage, will be the next element of a claim for a per se illegal tying arrangement, to be discussed at infra, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14982, at *6-8.

In any event, the Court finds that by alleging that Defendant conditioned its sale of the Shirley Facility upon the purchase by Audell of propane and transportation services, Plaintiffs have sufficiently pleaded the element of actual coercion.

3. Economic Power in the Tying Product Market

The third element of an illegal tying arrangement [12] is that the seller had sufficient economic power in the tying product market to coerce purchaser acceptance of the tied product. See, e.g., Yentsch, 630 F.2d at 57. At least one court has indicated that such [^{*}370] HN12[] economic power "is the most crucial element" of an illegal tying arrangement. 305 E. 24th Owners Corp. v. Parman Co., 714 F. Supp. 1296, 1305 \(S.D.N.Y. 1989\) (citing Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 12), aff'd, 994 F.2d 94 \(2d Cir. 1993\).

To sufficiently allege such economic power in the tying product market, a Complaint must allege either that the "seller's share of the market is high," Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 17, . . ., or that "the seller has some advantage not shared by his competitors in the market for the tying product. Yentsch, 630 F.2d at 58 (citing [United States Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enters. \["Fortner II"\], 429 U.S. 610, 51 L. Ed. 2d 80, 97 S. Ct. 861 \[1977\]](#)).

See 305 East 24th Owners Corp., 714 F. Supp. at 1305-06 (emphasis added).

Plaintiffs suggest that they have sufficiently alleged both that Defendant has a high market share and that Defendant has some advantage not shared by its competitors in the [13] market for propane-handling facilities. (See Pls.' Mem. Opp. at 13.) Because, as discussed in detail below, the Court finds that the Complaint insufficiently alleges the fifth element of a per se claim (involvement of a "not insubstantial" amount of commerce), see infra, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14982, at *15-19, the Court need not rule upon the sufficiency of the allegations as to the third element. The Court, however, notes that it finds more persuasive Plaintiffs' argument that they have sufficiently alleged that Defendant had an advantage not shared by its competitors,⁴ than it does Plaintiffs' argument vis-a-vis their allegations as to Defendant's market share.

4. Anti-Competitive Effects In The Tied Markets

HN13[] Courts in this Circuit have not been [14] uniform in their holdings as to whether or not anticompetitive effects in the tied market is a distinct element of a per se illegal tying claim. Compare Blaine v. Meineke Discount Muffler Shops, Inc., 670 F. Supp. 1107, 1113 \(D. Conn. 1987\) (allegation of anticompetitive effect not required because such effects are presumed) and Nordic Bank PLC v. Trend Group, Ltd., 619 F. Supp. 542, 558 \(S.D.N.Y. 1985\) (allegation of anticompetitive effects not required) with Telerate Sys., Inc., 689 F. Supp. at 234 (anticompetitive effects as distinct element), Posa, Inc. v. Miller Brewing Co., 642 F. Supp. 1198, 1209 \(E.D.N.Y. 1986\) (distinct element), and Consolidated Terminal Sys., 535 F. Supp. at 231; see also Gonzalez, 880 F.2d at 1516-17 (anticompetitive effects is distinct element of per se claim) and Konik v. Champlain Valley Physicians Hosp., 733 F.2d 1007, 1017 (2d Cir.) (anticompetitive effects not listed as distinct element), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 884, 83 L. Ed. 2d 190, 105 S. Ct. 253 (1984).

In any event, the Court need not, and does not decide this matter because, as detailed below, Plaintiffs have not sufficiently alleged the final element [15] of a per se illegal tying claim.

5. Involvement of a "Not Insubstantial" Amount of Interstate Commerce in the Tied Market

"The Supreme Court has stated that HN14[] as a threshold matter there must be a substantial potential for impact on competition in the tied market in order to justify per se condemnation of an alleged tying arrangement." Gonzalez, 880 F.2d at 1518 (citing Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 16). "If only a single purchaser were 'forced' with respect to the purchase of a tied item, the resultant impact on competition would not be sufficient to warrant the concern of antitrust law."⁵ Id. (quoting Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 16).

[16] [*371] "The Supreme Court has defined HN15[] 'substantial' in this context as 'substantial enough in terms of dollar-volume so as not to be merely de minimis.'" Id. (citing Fortner Enters., Inc. v. United States Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 501, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495, 89 S. Ct. 1252 \(1969\) ("Fortner I")). "For purposes of determining substantiality, a court measures the total volume of sales tied by the 'policy' under challenge, not merely the portion of this total accounted for by the particular plaintiff who brings suit." Id. (citing Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 502).

The Second Circuit has indicated that "there is no magic number that definitively establishes whether a plaintiff has foreclosed a 'not insubstantial' amount of potential sales for the tied product." Gonzalez, 880 F.2d at 1518. The Supreme Court has provided the following guidance:

For purposes of determining whether the amount of commerce foreclosed is too insubstantial to warrant prohibition of the practice, . . . the relevant figure is the total volume of sales tied by the sales policy under challenge, not the portion of this total accounted for by the particular plaintiff who brings suit.

[17] Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 502.

Although "the threshold for satisfying this [final] prong is low," 305 E. 24th Owners Corp., 714 F. Supp. at 1308, the Court finds that the Complaint in the case at bar insufficiently alleges this element. The Complaint is devoid of any allegation as to the total volume of sales tied by the allegedly illegal tying arrangement. It merely alleges, without further detail or explanation, that "plaintiffs have been injured in their business or property by reason of defendant's illegal tie-in requirements in the sum[s] of $ 240,000" and $ 375,000. (Compl. PP 31, 33.) Again, however, the relevant inquiry is not the amount of damages allegedly suffered as a result of an illegal arrangement, but the volume of sales tied by that arrangement.

It may be that by these allegations Plaintiffs are suggesting that the total volume of sales of propane tied by the allegedly illegal arrangement at issue is $ 240,000, and that the total volume of transportation services tied by the allegedly illegal arrangement is $ 375,000. (See Compl. PP 27, 31, 33.) Such figures would appear to implicate a "not insubstantial" amount of commerce. See, e.g., Gonzalez, 18] 880 F.2d at 1518. However, a Complaint should not invite such extrapolation. Rather, HN16[↑] it should "contain . . . a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. . . ." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) (emphasis added). In short, the Complaint does not sufficiently allege that the amount of commerce allegedly foreclosed is "not insubstantial."

The Court's inquiry does not end here, however, for as previously discussed, HN17[↑] "even if plaintiff fails to make a showing to establish a tying arrangement which is unlawful per se, he still 'can prevail on the merits whenever he can prove, on the basis of a more thorough examination of the purposes and effects of the practices involved, that the general standards of the Sherman Act have been violated.'" Posa, 642 F. Supp. at 1210 (quoting Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 500) (further citations omitted); see also Consolidated Terminal Sys., 535 F. Supp. at 231 ("To make out a tie-in claim under the rule of reason it need not satisfy all the criteria laid down in cases like Yentsch, which dealt with per se claims.") (citations omitted). Thus, the Court now turns its attention to whether or not the Complaint [19] sufficiently alleges a claim for a tying arrangement that is illegal pursuant to the "rule of reason."

B. "Rule of Reason" Illegal Tying Claim

HN18[↑] "The rule of reason standard 'focuses directly on the challenged restraint's impact on competitive conditions.'" Capital Imaging Assocs., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs., Inc., 725 F. Supp. 669, 677 (N.D.N.Y. 1989) (quoting National Soc'y of Professional Eng'r's v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 688, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637, 98 S. Ct. 1355 (1977)). "It is not enough for the plaintiff to show that it was harmed in its capacity as a competitor. [*372] " Id. Rather, "plaintiffs must prove antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Id. (emphasis and alteration in original) (quoting Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977)). "The antitrust laws were enacted for 'the protection of competition, not competitors.'" Id. (emphasis in original) (quoting Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962)). [20] "In other words, 'it is injury to the market, not to individual firms, that is significant.'" Id. (quoting Klamath-Lake Pharm. Ass'n v. Klamath Med. Serv. Bureau, 701 F.2d 1276, 1292 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 822, 78 L. Ed. 2d 96, 104 S. Ct. 88 (1983)).

The courts in this Circuit have not been uniform in describing the type of allegations that a Complaint must include to sufficiently state a claim for a tying arrangement that is illegal pursuant to the "rule of reason." For example, the Court in Retail Serv. Assocs. v. ConAgra Pet Prod. Co., indicated that HN19[↑] to adequately allege a "rule of reason" claim, a complaint must allege a contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade, 759 F. Supp. 976, 979 (D. Conn. 1991), as well as "the relevant product market and . . . how the net effect of the alleged violation is to restrain trade in the relevant market." Id. (internal quotations omitted) (citing North Jersey Secretarial School, Inc. v. McKiernan, 713 F. Supp. 577, 583 (S.D.N.Y. 1989)).

Courts in the Northern District have "held that HN20[] to adequately allege a restraint of trade under the rule of reason, a plaintiff 'must at least suggest the size [21] of the relevant product and geographic markets, the amount of competition foreclosed, and how the acts of the defendants affected that competition.'" Capital Imaging Assocs., 725 F. Supp. at 677 (quoting Jim Forno's Continental Motors, Inc. v. Subaru Distrib. Corp., 649 F. Supp. 746, 754 \(N.D.N.Y. 1986\)).

Nonetheless, certain core elements appear in the various "rule of reason" discussions, including the need for allegations identifying the relevant market, as well as the adverse effect on that market caused by the defendant's anticompetitive conduct.⁶

[22] A juxtapositioning of the Complaint in the case at bar against the above standards indicates that Plaintiffs have adequately alleged an illegal tying agreement under the "rule of reason." The relevant markets are identified as the markets for the sale of propane within Suffolk County and for the transportation of propane within Suffolk County. (See Compl. P.28.) The adverse impact of the alleged tying agreement is delineated in, inter alia, the following paragraph of the Complaint:

- (a) Audell has been prevented from purchasing propane at lower prices than that charged by Paraco from suppliers other than Paraco;
- (b) Competitors of Paraco in the sale of propane have been prevented from selling propane to Audell;
- (c) Audell has been prevented from utilizing the services of propane transporters other than Paraco, including itself, at prices lower than or equal to that of Paraco;
- (d) Competitors of Paraco in the transportation of propane have been prevented from selling their services to Audell.

(Compl. P 27.) In short, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged a tying arrangement that is illegal pursuant to a "rule of reason."

[23] Conclusion

Based upon the foregoing analysis, the Court denies Defendant's Motion to Dismiss.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c) provides that summary judgment is proper if the pleadings, depositions, answer to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue of material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

HN2 Case & Controversy Requirements, Actual Controversy

The non-movant's burden of showing a genuine issue of material fact is not satisfied with some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts, by conclusory allegations, or by only a scintilla of evidence. Further, factual controversies are resolved in favor of the nonmoving party, but only when there is an actual controversy, that is, when both parties have submitted evidence of contradictory facts.

HN3 Entitlement as Matter of Law, Genuine Disputes

In essence, the inquiry performed in a motion for summary judgment is the threshold inquiry of determining whether there is the need for a trial; whether, in other words, there are any genuine factual issues that properly can be resolved only by a finder of fact because they may reasonably be resolved in favor of either party.

HN4 Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Where a party seeks dismissal for failure to state a claim, the moving party has the burden of showing that plaintiff can prove no set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint which would entitle it to relief. The purpose of a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(6\) motion is to test the sufficiency of the complaint, not to decide the merits of the case, even if it appears on the face of the pleadings that a recovery is very remote and unlikely. The court must accept all well-pleaded factual allegations in the complaint as true and view the allegations in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. Motions to dismiss for failure to state a claim are viewed with disfavor and rarely granted.

HN5 Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

In addition to the burden of proving there are genuine issues of material fact, to survive a summary judgment on a claim alleging conspiracy under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, the evidence must tend to exclude the possibility that the defendants acted independently.

HN6 [] Summary Judgment, Opposing Materials

On summary judgment, the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion. But antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 case. Thus, conduct as consistent with permissible competition as with illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy. To survive a motion for summary judgment or for a directed verdict, a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently. Respondents, in other words, must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents.

HN8 [] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The Noerr-Pennington extends to the approach of citizens, to administrative agencies, and to courts. A complaint that shows a sham is not entitled to immunity when it contains allegations that one group sought to bar competitors from meaningful access to adjudicatory tribunals and so to usurp the decision making process by instituting proceedings and actions, with or without probable cause, and regardless of the merits of the cases.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > Sham Exception

HN9[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

There is a two-part definition of sham litigation. First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. If an objective litigant could conclude that the suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, the suit is immunized under Noerr-Pennington, and an antitrust claim premised on the sham exception must fail. Only if a challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation. Under the second prong, the court should focus on whether the baseless lawsuit conceals an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor through the use of the governmental process as opposed to the outcome of that process as an anticompetitive weapon.

[*1157] ORDER AND REASONS

Pending before the Court is "Defendant's Second Motion for Summary Judgment," filed by Skrmetta Machinery Corporation, which was taken under submission on a previous date without oral argument. After reviewing the memoranda of the parties, the record and the applicable law, the Court GRANTS the motion in part and DENIES the motion in part.

Background

Defendant Skrmetta Machinery Corporation (hereinafter "Skrmetta") moves for summary judgment on all claims of plaintiff Laitram Machinery (hereinafter "Laitram").

Laitram filed suit in November 1992 against three defendants, Seafood Equipment Development Corporation, a Florida corporation (hereinafter "SEDCO"); Carnitech A/S, a Danish corporation; and Skrmetta. The lawsuit, as amended in December 1992 (R.Doc. 2) alleges federal antitrust law violations, Louisiana antitrust law violations, and violations of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125\(a\), based upon alleged false representations about Laitram's products and [3] alleged patent coverage for defendant's products. The lawsuit also seeks declaratory judgment that Laitram was not infringing on a patent allegedly assigned to SEDCO. Further, Laitram alleges claims pursuant to the Louisiana Unfair Trade Practices Law, LSA-R.S. 51:1405 et seq., and claims of defamation and conspiracy to defame pursuant to Louisiana law.¹

The suit arises out of an alleged conspiracy between Skrmetta, SEDCO and Carnitech to harm Laitram by alleging to Laitram's customers that Laitram had used trade secrets for a shrimp processing machine, the rights of which had allegedly been assigned to SEDCO. The alleged conspiracy also related to the bringing of a frivolous lawsuit in Florida as to the alleged [4] violation of the trade secrets agreement at issue.

[*1158] Laitram has since settled its claims against SEDCO and Carnitech (R.Docs. 33 and 83), and the only remaining defendant is Skrmetta.

Skrmetta seeks summary judgment as to alleged antitrust violations of Count I, brought under 15 U.S.C. § 1,² for two reasons. First, Skrmetta argues that the Noerr-Pennington doctrine³ immunizes its activities, if any were taken.

² This section provides, in pertinent part: "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal. . . ."

Second, Skrmetta argues that there is no genuine issue of material fact that Ray, through whom Skrmetta, the corporation, allegedly acted, participated in any conspiracy. Skrmetta also relies on this latter argument in support of its motion as to the state antitrust violations and the alleged Lanham Act violations.

[5] Skrmetta next contends that it is entitled to summary judgment on the claim of the invalidity, unenforceability and noninfringement of Laitram's shrimp processing machine of the patent assigned to SEDCO because it has neither procured nor has any interest in this patent.

As to Laitram's state-law claims, Skrmetta first contends that there is no genuine issue of material fact that Raphael Skrmetta did not engage in acts that constitute a claim under the Louisiana Unfair Trade Practices Act, LSA-R.S. 51:1405.A. and 1409. As to the claim of defamation, Skrmetta submits that Laitram has failed to state a claim under Louisiana law.

In opposition, Laitram argues that there are genuine issues of material fact which show that Ray Skrmetta, acting on behalf of Skrmetta, participated in the conspiracy to restrain trade with SEDCO and Carnitech against Laitram. Additionally, the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is inapplicable for two reasons. First, the doctrine does not extent to act of writing letters to Laitram's customers alleging violation of trade secrets. Second, the trade secrets lawsuit falls within the "sham" exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine.

As to the Lanham Act violations, [6] Laitram contends that the genuine issues of material fact as to Ray Skrmetta's participation with SEDCO and Carnitech preclude summary judgment on this claim. Similarly, Laitram submits that there are genuine issues of material fact as to whether Ray Skrmetta's actions on behalf of Skrmetta rise to a level such that they violate the Louisiana Unfair Trade Practices Act.

Finally, Laitram argues that it has stated a claim of defamation and conspiracy to defame against Skrmetta.

Laitram offers no opposition, however, to Skrmetta's motion as to Court IV of the amended complaint alleging invalidity, unenforceability and noninfringement of the patent assigned to SEDCO. Therefore, for reasons which will be set forth herein, the Court grants Skrmetta's motion for summary judgment as to Count IV of the amended complaint.

Law and Application

I. Standard of Review

Although styled as a motion for summary judgment, Skrmetta's motion is hybrid in that it seeks summary judgment as to most counts but seeks dismissal for failure to state a claim as to the defamation count under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12\(b\)\(6\). Thus, the Court must apply two standards of review.

As to those counts on which summary judgment [7] is sought, Rule 56\(c\) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure HN1³ provides that summary judgment is proper "if the pleadings, depositions, answer to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue of material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." HN2⁴ The non-movant's burden of showing a genuine issue of material fact "is not satisfied with 'some metaphysical doubt as to the material" facts,' by 'conclusory allegations,' or by only a 'scintilla' of evidence." Little v. Liquid Air Corporation, 37 F.3d 1069, 1075 \(5th Cir. 1994\)(en banc). Further, "factual controversies [are resolved] in favor of the nonmoving party, but only when there is an actual controversy, that is, when both parties have submitted evidence of contradictory facts." Id.

HN3⁵ In essence, "the inquiry performed is the threshold inquiry of determining whether there is the need for a trial -- whether, in other words, there are any genuine factual issues that properly can be resolved only by a finder of fact because they may reasonably be resolved in favor of either party." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 [8] U.S. 242, 250, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 2511, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 \(1986\).

As to those counts on which Skrmetta HN4 seeks dismissal for failure to state a claim, the moving party has the burden of showing that plaintiff can prove no set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint which would entitle it to relief. Baton Rouge Building and Construction Trades Council AFL-CIO v. Jacobs Constructors, Inc., 804 F.2d 879, 881 (5th Cir. 1986), citing Hishon v. King & Spalding, 467 U.S. 69, 104 S. Ct. 2229, 2233, 81 L. Ed. 2d 59 (1984). The purpose of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion is to test the sufficiency of the complaint, not to decide the merits of the case, even if it "appear[s] on the face of the pleadings that a recovery is very remote and unlikely." Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 236, 94 S. Ct. 1683, 1686 40 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1974). The court must accept all well-pleaded factual allegations in the complaint as true and view the allegations in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. American Waste & Pollution Control Company, Inc. v. Browning-Ferris, Inc., 949 F.2d 1384, 1386 (5th Cir. 1991). Motions to dismiss for failure to state a claim are viewed with disfavor [\[9\]](#) and rarely granted. Tanglewood East Homeowners v. Charles-Thomas, Inc., 849 F.2d 1568, 1572 (5th Cir. 1988).

II. Antitrust Allegations

A. Conspiracy

HN5 In addition to the foregoing principles against which a motion for summary judgment is tested, "to survive a summary judgment on a claim alleging conspiracy under [15 U.S.C. § 1], the evidence must tend to 'exclude the possibility' that the defendants acted independently." Culberson, Inc. v. Interstate Electric Company, Inc., 821 F.2d 1092, 1093 (5th Cir. 1987), quoting Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio, 475 U.S. 574, 588, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 1356, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986).⁴

[10] On the basis of these principles, the Court finds that a genuine issue of material fact exist that precludes summary judgment.

Skrmetta concedes that Ray Skrmetta met with Roy Ellis-Brown of SEDCO and expressed the opinion that Laitram's shrimp cooking machine copied Ellis-Brown's machine (the rights of which allegedly had been assigned to SEDCO). (Skrmetta's Statement of Material Facts, attached to the instant motion, R.Doc. 226.) Skrmetta also concedes that Skrmetta provided Ellis-Brown a copy of a publicly disseminated brochure on Laitram's shrimp-cooking machine and provided a list of Laitram customers using the shrimp cooking machine to the Florida corporation's attorney upon request. Id. However, Skrmetta argues that these facts do not constitute evidence of a conspiracy between Skrmetta with SEDCO or Carnitech. [*1160] Additionally, Skrmetta contends the trade-secrets lawsuit was filed by the Florida corporation upon its own determination after consulting with its attorney and not in reliance on or with the help of Ray Skrmetta or Skrmetta the corporation. Id.

Laitram counters with specific facts which the Court finds create a genuine issue of material fact. First and foremost, [\[11\]](#) according to the affidavit of G. Charles Lapeyre (attached as Exh. 2 to Laitram's opposition memorandum, R.Doc. 229), before the trade-secrets lawsuit was filed, Raphael Skrmetta called Lapeyre and stated "we've got you

⁴ In Matsushita, the Supreme Court stated:

Respondents correctly note that HN6 "on summary judgment the inferences to be drawn from the underlying facts . . . must be viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion." But antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case. Thus, . . . conduct as consistent with permissible competition as with illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy. To survive a motion for summary judgment or for a directed verdict, a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of § 1 must present evidence that "tends to exclude the possibility" that the alleged conspirators acted independently. Respondents . . . in other words, must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents.

Id. at 587-88, 106 S. Ct. at 1356 (citations omitted).

now," referring to the trade-secrets issue. Id., paragraph 15. This contention -- taken with the conceded facts set forth above -- constitutes a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Ray Skrmetta conspired with SEDCO and Carnitech in bringing the lawsuit. Further, in a letter written to the attorney for the Florida corporation in December 1992, Ray Skrmetta states that "he would prefer a court decision for the future conduct of Laitram" and invites the attorney to call on him "for all help possible." Id., Exh. 37. Although these words seemingly are innocent, the inferences drawn from these words in the context of Skrmetta's statement to Lapeyre and in view of the uncontested facts constitute evidence that, for purposes of summary judgment, excludes the possibility that Skrmetta, SEDCO and/or Carnitech acted independently. Matsushita, supra. This is not a mere semantic quibble. As a result, "there are . . . genuine factual issues that properly can be [12] resolved only by a finder of fact because they may reasonably be resolved in favor of either party." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. 242, 250, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 2511, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202.

Skrmetta also seeks summary judgment on Count II of the amended complaint, which alleges violations of state antitrust laws. Federal jurisprudence regarding federal antitrust law provides persuasive interpretations for the state antitrust law. Reppond v. City of Denham Springs, 572 So. 2d 224, 228, n. 2 (La. App. 1st Cir. 1990), citing Louisiana Power & Light v. United Gas Pipeline, 493 So. 2d 1149 (La. 1986). Therefore, because the Court finds that summary judgment is inappropriate on federal antitrust allegations, as set forth above, Skrmetta's motion for summary judgment on Laitram's claims of state antitrust violations also must be denied.

B. Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

Skrmetta contends that its participation in the trade-secrets lawsuit, if any, is protected by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. HN7 According to this doctrine, "those who petition government for redress are generally immune from antitrust liability." Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., [13] 508 U.S. 49, 56, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 1926, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1993), citing Noerr, supra.

In California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, we elaborated on Noerr in two relevant respects. First, we HN8 extended Noerr to "the approach of citizens . . . to administrative agencies . . . and to courts." Second, we held that the complaint showed a sham not entitled to immunity when it contained allegations that one group of highway carriers "sought to bar . . . competitors from meaningful access to adjudicatory tribunals and so to usurp the decision making process" by "instituting . . . proceedings and actions . . . with or without probable cause, and regardless of the merits of the cases."

HN9 The Supreme Court has established a "two-part" definition of "sham" litigation. Id. at 60, 113 S. Ct. at 1928.

First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. If an objective litigant could conclude that the [14] suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, the suit is immunized under Noerr, and an antitrust claim premised on the sham exception must fail. Only if a challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation. Under this second part of our definition of sham, the court should focus on whether the baseless lawsuit conceals "an attempt to [*1161] interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor" through the "use [of] the governmental process -- as opposed to the outcome of that process -- as an anticompetitive weapon."

Professional Real Estate Investors, 508 U.S. at 61, 113 S. Ct. at 1928 (citations omitted)(editing in original).

Applying the Noerr-Pennington doctrine as explained in Professional Real Estate Investors to the present case, the Court finds that summary judgment is inappropriate for two reasons. First, the alleged conspiracy involves more than just the filing of the trade-secrets lawsuit but also the sending of three letters to Laitram's customers, informing them that Laitram's shrimp cooking machine incorporated trade secrets from its own patent and infringed [15] on the Florida corporation's shrimp cooking machine patent. (Exhs. 39-41, attached to Laitram's memorandum in opposition, R.Doc. 229.)⁵ The Noerr-Pennington doctrine does not extend to sending letters to a competitor's customers alleging violation of trade secrets and infringement of patents.

[16] The second reason that the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is inapplicable is that there exists a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the trade-secrets lawsuit was a sham. According to one part of the opinion of one of Laitram's experts, which is based on SEDCO's answers to interrogatories in the trade-secrets lawsuit, the alleged trade secrets are essentially the same as those elements of Claim 1 of the patent for the shrimp cooking machine held by the Florida company. (Report of George N. Starr, p. 9, Exh. 3, attached to Laitram's memorandum in opposition, R.Doc. 229.) As such, the expert contends that there can be no trade-secret protection and/or violation because the information was disclosed in a U.S. patent. Id. Although Laitram provides no citation for this legal principle in its memorandum, the expert's statement appears to be an accurate assessment of the law. See, e.g., Syntex Ophthalmics, Inc. v. Tsuetaki, 701 F.2d 677, 683 (7th Cir. 1983), citing Sears Roebuck & Co. v. Stiffel Co., 376 U.S. 225, 84 S. Ct. 784, 11 L. Ed. 2d 661 (1964) and Compcorp Corp. v. Day-Brite Lighting, Inc., 376 U.S. 234, 84 S. Ct. 779, 11 L. Ed. 2d 669 (1964); Sanford Redmond, [17] Inc. v. Mid-America Dairymen, Inc., 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2376, 1992 WL 57090 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) at 2 ("HN10[↑] to the extent plaintiff's trade secrets were the subject of a valid patent, those secrets were disclosed at the time the patent issued").

Therefore, there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the Florida corporation objectively could have concluded that its trade-secrets suit was "reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome." Professional Real Estate Investors, 508 U.S. at 60, 113 S. Ct. at 1928.

Additionally, for the same reasons that the Court found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Skrmetta participated in the antitrust conspiracy, it naturally follows that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the possibly baseless trade-secrets lawsuit concealed "an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor," Id., quoting Noerr, 365 U.S. at 144, 81 S. Ct. at 533.

Therefore, Skrmetta's motion for summary judgment on the basis of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine fails.

III. Lanham Act Violations

As noted, Laitram also claims violations of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a), which provides, [18] in pertinent part:

HN11[↑] any person, who, on or in connection with any goods or services . . . uses in commerce [1162] any . . . false or misleading representation of fact, which -- shall be liable in a civil action by any person who believes that he or she is or is likely to be damaged by such act.
 (A) is likely to cause confusion, or to cause mistake, or to deceive another as to the affiliation, connection, or association of such person with another person, or as to the origin, sponsorship, or approval of his or her goods, services or commercial activities by another person . . .

In Taquino v. Teledyne Monarch Rubber, 893 F.2d 1488, 1490 (5th Cir. 1990), the Fifth Circuit recognized the elements necessary to establish a Lanham Act violation via implication through recognition of a district court opinion. HN12[↑] There must be a false statement of fact about the product; the statement deceived or had the capacity to deceive a substantial segment of potential customers; the deception is material, i.e., it is likely to ⁵The Court notes that Skrmetta does not object to the authenticity of any of the documents referred to herein as exhibits attached to Laitram's memorandum in opposition, presumably because they were produced in discovery. As such, the Court relies on them in finding that there are genuine issues of material fact under Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(c).

The Court also notes that the three letters written to Laitram's customers also requested that these entities cease and desist from using Laitram's infringing equipment until they sign a license agreement SEDCO. (Exhs. 39-41, attached to Laitram's memorandum in opposition, R.Doc. 229.) Laitram alleges that Skrmetta participated in the conspiracy because Ray Skrmetta, among other things, provided the names of these customers to the Florida corporation's attorney. Id., Exh. 37.

influence the purchasing decision; the alleged deceiver must have put the products into interstate commerce; and the complainant has been or is likely to [\[19\]](#) be injured as a result. Id. at 1500.

Skrmetta seeks summary judgment on the basis that there is no showing that Skrmetta used in commerce a false or misleading description or representation of fact likely to cause mistake or deception as to Laitram's products. "Ray Skrmetta merely met privately with Ellis-Brown, and provided information that SEDCO could investigate and then act upon or not at is own option." (Skrmetta memorandum in support of motion, R.Doc. 226, p. 19.) Laitram counters that "in concert with Skrmetta" and Carnitech, SEDCO made false representations to Laitram's customers as to patent infringement in interstate commerce. (Laitram memorandum in opposition, R.Doc. 229, p. 33.)

Although the evidence as to Skrmetta's specific participation in the sending of the letters appears to be limited to Skrmetta's providing the Florida corporation's attorney with the names of Laitram's customers and offering "all help possible" (Exhs. 35 and 37, respectively), this evidence coupled with the questions of fact as to the overall role played by Skrmetta acting through Ray Skrmetta in this series of events precludes summary judgment on the Lanham Act claim.⁶ Construing all inferences [\[20\]](#) in favor of Laitram on this motion for summary judgment, the Court finds that there is a genuine issue of material fact that prohibits entry of summary judgment on the Lanham Act count. There are factual questions more appropriately decided by a jury. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, supra.

IV. Declaratory Judgment

In its amended complaint, as noted, Laitram seeks declaratory judgment as to invalidity, unenforceability and noninfringement of the patent the rights of which are held by SEDCO. Skrmetta [\[21\]](#) seeks summary judgment on the basis that it has never procured or had any interest in this patent. Laitram does not oppose Skrmetta's motion on this issue. The Court finds that, because the Florida corporation has been dismissed from this matter following settlement (R.Doc. 33), and, further, because there is no allegation in the amended complaint that Skrmetta owns any interest in the patent allegedly held by SEDCO, Skrmetta is entitled to summary judgment on this issue.

V. Unfair Trade Practices

Under Louisiana law, HN13[↑] "unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in the conduct of any trade or commerce are hereby declared unlawful." LSA-R.S. 51:1405.A. HN14[↑] A private right of action exists to recover actual damages and attorneys' fees. LSA-R.S. 51:1409.A.

HN15[↑] What constitutes unfair trade practices is left up to the courts. A trade practice is unfair when it offends public policy and [\[*1163\]](#) when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous, or substantially injurious to consumers.

Jessen v. Wimberly, 610 So. 2d 252, 257 \(La. App. 3rd Cir. 1992\); American Waste, 949 F.2d at 1391. Notwithstanding this seemingly broad standard, [\[22\]](#) HN16[↑] the Unfair Trade Practices Act has been construed as "penal in nature and subject to reasonably strict construction." Bryant v. Sears Consumer Financial Corporation, 617 So. 2d 1191, 1196 \(La. App. 3rd Cir. 1993\).

Because the Court has found that there exists a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Skrmetta through Ray Skrmetta participated in a conspiracy with SEDCO and Carnitech to sue Laitram and/or send allegedly false letters to Laitram's customers, as set forth above, the Court finds that summary judgment as to the unfair trade practices claim is improper. This decision is again underscored by Ray Skrmetta's statement, as reported by G. Charles Lapeyre in his affidavit, that "we've got you now," referring to the trade-secrets lawsuit. (Exh. 2, Paragraph 15, attached to Laitram's memorandum in opposition, R.Doc. 229.) Construing the inferences from this fact and those other facts delineated earlier in favor of Laitram, there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Skrmetta engaged in "immoral, unethical, oppressive, [or] unscrupulous" conduct that "offends public policy." Bryant, 617 So. 2d at 1196.

VI. Defamation and Conspiracy to Defame

The [23] final issue is whether Count VI of Laitram's amended complaint states a claim under Louisiana law. In this count, Laitram incorporated all of the previous factual allegations of its complaint and alleges that the letters sent to its customers were false and defamatory and were published with malice. (Paragraphs 46 and 47, R.Doc. 2.) Further, "on information and belief," the amended complaint alleges that Carnitech conspired with SEDCO to publish the false and defamatory statements. Id., Paragraph 48. Finally, as to this count, the amended complaint alleges that "Laitram has been damaged . . . as a result of defendants' defamation and conspiracy to defame." Id., Paragraph 49 (emphasis added).

Skrmetta argues that Count VI fails to state a claim against it because the letters were sent by SEDCO and because the allegations specifically allege a conspiracy between SEDCO and Carnitech, both of which have been dismissed from this matter after settlement. (R.Docs. 33 and 83.) In opposition, Laitram contends that, notwithstanding the specific allegation of conspiracy between SEDCO and Carnitech with no reference to Skrmetta, all of the other paragraphs of the complaint incorporated [24] by reference set forth the basis for the conspiracy to defame that includes Skrmetta.

Construing the complaint liberally, and accepting all well-pleaded factual allegations in favor of Laitram, as the Court must, see Scheuer, supra, the Court finds that Laitram's amended complaint states a claim for conspiracy to defame against Skrmetta because it alleges that Laitram was damaged as a result of all defendants' conspiracy to defame. Although the Court believes that such a claim is stated by the slimmest of margins in light of the specific allegation of conspiracy between Carnitech and SEDCO, it is nevertheless stated. Conceivably, Laitram can prove a set of facts consistent with the allegations that all defendants conspired to defame Laitram, which would entitle it to relief. Thus, Skrmetta's motion fails.⁷

[25] VII. Conclusion

Because there are genuine issues of material fact, the Court denies summary judgment as to Counts I, II, III and V. However, because there is no opposition from Laitram and because there is no genuine issue of material fact that Skrmetta holds any interest in the patent that is the subject of the declaratory judgment sought in Count IV, the Court will grant summary judgment as to this Count. Finally, the Court finds [*1164] that Count VI states a claim against Skrmetta for defamation and/or conspiracy to defame.

Accordingly,

IT IS ORDERED that Skrmetta Machinery Corporation's "Second Motion for Summary Judgment" is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

New Orleans, Louisiana, this 29th day of September, 1995.

OKLA JONES II

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

End of Document

⁷ The Court would reach the same decision if Skrmetta's contention were tested under the standard for summary judgment. Because there are genuine issues of material fact as to the extent of Skrmetta's participation in the publication of the letters to Laitram's customers, as set forth above, summary judgment would be improper on this issue.

HN1 [down arrow] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

A tying agreement is an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier. Such an arrangement is illegal under antitrust law if the seller has appreciable economic power in the tying product market and if the arrangement affects a substantial volume of commerce in the tied market.

HN2 Sherman Act, Claims

In order to establish the per se illegality of a tying arrangement, a plaintiff must show: (1) the tying arrangement is between two distinct products or services (products only under § 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 14); (2) the defendant has sufficient economic power in the tying market to appreciably restrain free competition in the market for the tied product; and (3) a not insubstantial amount of interstate commerce is affected. Alternatively, a plaintiff, even if it cannot show per se illegality, may prevail on an illegal tying claim under the rule of reason. A plaintiff can still prevail on the merits if he can prove that the general standards of the Sherman Act have been violated following a more thorough examination of the purposes and effects of the practices involved. Under both the per se and rule of reason analyses, a plaintiff must show, as a threshold matter, that there is a substantial danger that the tying seller will acquire market power in the tied product market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > General Overview

HN3 Monopolies & Monopolization, Attempts to Monopolize

Generally, the filing of a lawsuit cannot be used as the basis for antitrust liability. Even if a party subjectively intends to disrupt competition via legal action, if such lawsuit is objectively reasonable it is not a sham and may not be used to evidence antitrust activity. Evidence of anticompetitive intent or purpose alone cannot transform otherwise legitimate activity into a sham. Thus, the two-part test for defining sham litigation is: (1) the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits; and (2) the lawsuit conceals an attempt to directly interfere with the business relationships of a competitor.

HN4 Scope, Monopolization Offenses

Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, prohibits attempted monopolization but does not define it. The conduct of a single firm is unlawful under § 2 only when it threatens actual monopolization. Thus, the plaintiff must prove three elements: (1) the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct; (2) a specific intent to monopolize; and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power. To determine whether there is a dangerous probability of monopolization, a court must consider the relevant market and the defendant's ability to lessen or destroy competition in that market.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

INTRODUCTION

Plaintiff, RX Systems, Inc., filed a nine-count amended complaint ¹ against defendant, Medical Technology Systems, Inc., alleging an attempted monopolization under 15 U.S.C. § 2 (Counts I and II), an illegal tying arrangement under 15 U.S.C. § 14 (Counts V and VI) and various Illinois state law claims (Counts III, IV, VII, VIII and IX). Jurisdiction is premised upon 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332 and 1337. Defendant has moved to dismiss Counts I, II, V and VI pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 12\(b\)\(6\) and seeks dismissal of the state law counts because "federal jurisdiction of [those] claims is dependent upon the federal antitrust counts."

[*2] FACTS

The following facts are taken from the allegations of plaintiff's amended complaint and are treated as true for purposes of defendant's motion to dismiss. Both plaintiff and defendant manufacture and sell pill packages known as "punch cards" or "blister packs." Plaintiff has been in the business since 1979 and defendant since the mid-1980's. There are also other unidentified pill card manufacturers. Plaintiff, defendant and the other manufacturers compete in interstate commerce.

The pill cards manufactured and sold by plaintiff and defendant are reasonably interchangeable by buyers and are sold to retail, institutional and in-house pharmacies throughout the United States. This constitutes the "Pill Card Product Market."

Within the pill card product market exists a submarket of institutional and in-house pharmacies that dispense large quantities of medication and purchase large amounts of pill cards. Most of the institutional and in-house pharmacies using pill cards also utilize machines which mechanically fill and heat-seal pill cards. The machines permit faster and more efficient filling of pill cards.

The institutional and in-house pharmacy market is distinct from [*3] the retail market because it has a higher average purchase volume than retail pharmacies and their customers have different needs. The institutional and in-house pharmacies only purchase pill cards which can be filled by using a filling machine.

From the late 1980's through 1993, defendant was the sole manufacturer of the filling machines. Plaintiff began manufacturing and selling its own machine in 1993. The machines sold by plaintiff and defendant are reasonably interchangeable by customers for the same purpose. Currently, defendant has more than ninety percent of the machine market and plaintiff has less than five percent of the market. No other producers of the machines have yet entered the market.² Thus, it is alleged that defendant currently possesses monopoly or near-monopoly power in the filling machine market.

[*4] It is further alleged in Count I that defendant has used its monopoly power in the filling machine market in an attempt to monopolize the institutional submarket. Defendant has willfully and knowingly attempted to exclude competitors, in that it has attempted to impose contractual restrictions on the modification of its machines and the use of templates, which would permit the machines to be used to fill pill cards other than those sold by defendant. Such restrictions are unrelated to any legitimate business considerations and substantially restrain trade. Plaintiff also alleges in Count I that defendant has attempted to enforce such contractual provisions or discourage pharmacies from challenging them by filing a suit in the circuit court of Lee County, Illinois, against the Dixon pharmacy, alleging that the pharmacy did not have the right to alter defendant's machine or use templates. It is further alleged that in certain instances, including the lawsuit, defendant attempted to restrict pharmacies from modifying or using templates even when those pharmacies have no contractual relationship with defendant.

Defendant has also brought a tortious interference with contract case against [*5] plaintiff in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida, alleging that plaintiff induced the Dixon pharmacy to break its contract with defendant. That suit seeks money damages from plaintiff as well as an injunction to prevent plaintiff from attempting to procure the business of any pharmacy currently using defendant's machine. Plaintiff alleges that by such conduct defendant has sought to discourage plaintiff and any other competitors from aiding pharmacies in overcoming the improper restrictions defendant seeks to impose on the modifications of defendant's machines or the use of templates.

It is further alleged in Count I that the above-described conduct of defendant constitutes predatory conduct in support of a scheme of attempted monopolization and demonstrates defendant's intent to monopolize the institutional and in-house submarket. As a result of defendant's activity, there is a dangerous probability that defendant has, or soon will, attain the power to exclude plaintiff and other competitors from the submarket. Specifically, if defendant prevents pharmacies from modifying its machines or using templates, then the pharmacies will be effectively limited [*6] to using defendant's pill cards, and defendant will be able to raise its prices. Market inefficiencies that have resulted from defendant's conduct which prevent pharmacies from choosing plaintiff's pill cards, permit defendant's to charge higher prices for its pill cards and limits the product choices of pharmacies. Plaintiff has lost profits and faces the potential loss of its continued opportunity to compete for sales of pill cards within the submarket.

Plaintiff also alleges an illegal tying arrangement. According to Count V, defendant has tied the sale of its machines to institutional pharmacies on the condition they also purchase defendant's pill cards. It has accomplished this by requiring, as part of the conditions for purchasing a machine, that the pharmacy buying the machine agree not to modify the machine in away that it could use plaintiff's pill cards or to use templates that would fit plaintiff's pill cards.

Specifically, defendant requires purchasers to sign a sales agreement which bars the purchaser from making any modifications to the machine and prohibits the purchaser from allowing anyone else to modify the machine. A sales agreement, included as an exhibit to the [*7] amended complaint, provides, In pertinent part:

"Warranty

² Defendant interprets these allegations, contained in paragraph 21 of the amended complaint, to state that there are other manufacturers of filling machines in the market. The court does not find defendant's interpretation to be reasonable, however. The fact that defendant and plaintiff possess less than one-hundred percent of the market does not reasonably imply that any other manufacturer has a market share, especially when paragraph 21 expressly states that "no other producers of filling/sealing machines have yet entered the market."

During the 90 day period of warranty, all components and accessories are fully guaranteed for the particular purpose of the design and fitness and shall be warranted free and clear from defects in material and workmanship. All warranties are cancelled if any unauthorized repairs are made by any person not authorized by MTS or the use of any parts or accessories not authorized by MTS, mishandling, modification or damaged by unreasonable use including failure to provide reasonable and necessary maintenance.

MTS shall have full and free access to the equipment to provide warranty service.

All equipment returned to manufacturer shall be F.O.B. Destination.

Exclusions

The warranty provided by MTS under this agreement does not include:

- Repair of damage caused by use of the machine for other than its intended purpose.
- Repairs of damage caused by accident, disaster, transportation, neglect, misuse or alterations."

Defendant also has attempted to prohibit pharmacies from using substitute templates. Without the use of such templates, pill cards manufactured by plaintiff and others cannot be used [*8] in defendant's machine.

It is further alleged that filling machines and pill cards are separate products and it is not essential that they be tied to each other. Furthermore, defendant has significant market power in the machine market, having sold more than ninety-percent of the filling machines currently in use. Because filling machines cost approximately $ 9,000,³ pharmacies cannot readily replace defendant's machines with those of a different manufacturer. As a result, most pharmacies necessarily purchase pill cards from defendant.

It is further alleged that defendant's efforts at imposing contractual restrictions on its customers, which are unrelated to any legitimate business considerations, substantially restrain trade by preventing pharmacies that have purchased defendant's machines from utilizing plaintiff's and other competitors' [*9] pill cards by requiring those pharmacies to pay more for defendant's pill cards. It is also alleged that the two legal actions instituted by defendant are designed to enforce the contractual provisions and discourage pharmacies from challenging those restrictions.

Plaintiff claims that defendant's conduct constitutes an illegal tying arrangement in that defendant, through use of its monopoly power in the machine market, improper terms in the sales agreements, improper assertions to customers and the Dixon pharmacy suit, has improperly required owners of its machines to purchase defendant's pill cards and no others. Such conduct affects interstate commerce in that, if defendant succeeds, pharmacies throughout the United States will be deprived of free competition in the submarket and plaintiff will be deprived of the opportunity to sell its pill cards to owners of defendant's machines. Further, market inefficiencies have resulted from defendant's conduct which prevents pharmacies from choosing plaintiff's pill cards, permits defendant to charge higher prices for its pill cards and limits the product choices of pharmacies within the submarket. Plaintiff has lost profits and faces the [*10] potential loss of the continued opportunity to compete for pill card sales.

CONTENTIONS

Defendant contends the federal antitrust counts should be dismissed because plaintiff has failed to allege the essential elements of either an attempted monopolization or an illegal tying arrangement. Defendant seeks dismissal of those counts with prejudice because plaintiff has already had one opportunity to replead and has done so unsuccessfully. Defendant also seeks dismissal of the remaining state law claims because, if the federal claims are dismissed, there is no jurisdictional basis remaining for the state law [*11] claims.

³Curiously, the sales agreement submitted as an exhibit to plaintiff's amended complaint shows a cost for that particular machine of $ 6,690 less a ten percent discount.

Plaintiffs responds that it has in fact alleged the necessary elements of both attempted monopolization and illegal tying. Specifically, plaintiff points to the allegations that defendant has attempted to impose contractual restrictions on the modification of its machines and prohibited use of templates which are unrelated to any legitimate business considerations along with its filing of the two lawsuits related to the sales agreements as stating a claim under the federal antitrust statutes.

DISCUSSION

As an initial, but crucial, matter, defendant asserts that there is a heightened pleading standard for antitrust complaints, relying on Sutliff, Inc. v. Donovan Cos., Inc., 727 F.2d 648 (7th Cir. 1984). Sutliff does not, as defendant suggests, create a heightened pleading standard in antitrust cases. Rather, Sutliff merely reiterates, albeit in the antitrust context, the need for a complaint to contain sufficient factual allegations to sustain a recovery under some viable legal theory. Id. at 654. Put another way, the pleader who claims an antitrust violation, just like any other plaintiff, cannot evade these pleading requirements by attaching a bare [*12] legal conclusion to the facts he narrates. Id. If the facts he pleads do not at least outline an antitrust violation, he will get nowhere by dressing them up in the language of antitrust. Id. As later explained by the author of Sutliff, Judge Posner, "Sutliff is simply another of those cases in which the plaintiff pleaded himself out of court." Hammes v. Aamco Transmissions, Inc., 33 F.3d 774, 782 (7th Cir. 1994). An inference of a heightened pleading requirement in antitrust cases should not be drawn from Sutliff, especially after Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 122 L. Ed. 2d 517, 113 S. Ct. 1160 (1993). Id. Consequently, this court rejects defendant's assertion that a heightened pleading standard applies to plaintiff's amended complaint. Nonetheless, the court will carefully scrutinize the allegations, as it should under Rule 12(b)(6), to determine if plaintiff could prevail under its alleged theories of liability.

As another preliminary matter, and one not raised by the parties, the court must clarify what law applies to plaintiff's illegal tying claim. Plaintiff has chosen to proceed under 15 U.S.C. § 1*131 14. See Town Sound and Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 473 n.2 (3d Cir. 1992) (while technically section 3 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 14) is written to cover exclusive dealing contracts, Congress also intended it to cover tying arrangements); Virtual Maintenance, Inc. v. Prime Computer, Inc., 735 F. Supp. 231, 233 (E.D. Mich. 1990) (a tying agreement that pertains to products can violate either section 1 of the Sherman Act or section 3 of the Clayton Act). The parties here have, in part, applied caselaw arising under section 1 of the Sherman Act to plaintiff's tying claim based on section 3 of the Clayton Act. The court will also apply those cases as the parties point to, and the court is aware of, no reason why such law should not apply.

I. Tying Agreement

HN1 A tying agreement is an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 2079, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992). Such an arrangement is illegal under [*14] antitrust law if the seller has appreciable economic power in the tying product market and if the arrangement affects a substantial volume of commerce in the tied market. See id. (citing Fortner Enter., Inc. v. United States Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 503, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495, 89 S. Ct. 1252 (1969)). HN2 In order to establish the per se illegality of a tying arrangement, a plaintiff must show: (1) the tying arrangement is between two distinct products or services (products only under section 3 of the Clayton Act); (2) the defendant has sufficient economic power in the tying market to appreciably restrain free competition in the market for the tied product; and (3) a not insubstantial amount of interstate commerce is affected. Carl Sandburg Village Condominium Ass'n No. 1 v. First Condominium Dev. Co., 758 F.2d 203, 207 (7th Cir. 1985).

Alternatively, a plaintiff, even if it cannot show per se illegality, may prevail on an illegal tying claim under the rule of reason. Carl Sandburg, 758 F.2d at 210 (citing Fortner Enter., Inc., 394 U.S. at 499-500). A plaintiff can still prevail on the merits if he can prove that the general standards of the Sherman Act have been [*15] violated following a more thorough examination of the purposes and effects of the practices involved. Id. The goal of the antitrust laws in the tying context is to prevent the economically harmful effects of tie-ins in cases where a seller's power in the market for the tying product is used to create additional power in the market for the tied product. Id. (citing Jefferson Parish Hospital Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 1571, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984) (O'Connor, J., concurring, joined by Burger, C.J., Powell, J., and Rehnquist, J.)). Under both the per se and rule of reason analyses, a plaintiff must show, as a threshold matter, that there is a substantial danger that the tying seller will acquire market power in the tied product market. Id. (citing Jefferson Parish, 104 S. Ct. at 1571-72).

Turning to the amended complaint here, plaintiff's tying claim fails for two reasons. First, plaintiff's claim is clearly dependent upon a contractual provision contained in a sales agreement between defendant and the purchasers of its machines. That agreement, which is included as part of plaintiff's amended complaint, does not demonstrate, however, that [*16] a tying agreement concerning defendant's machine and defendant's pill cards existed.

The sales agreement does not expressly require a buyer to purchase only defendant's pill cards nor does it expressly prohibit purchase of plaintiff's, or any other competitor's, pill cards. Neither does it compel such a result by implication. The warranty provision conditions the efficacy of the warranty on a buyer's not modifying or altering the machine or using any unauthorized parts or accessories. Such language is a long way from requiring a buyer to purchase pill cards from defendant as a condition of purchasing defendant's machine. A purchaser remains free to buy pill cards from other suppliers and modify the machine accordingly so long as it is willing to forego the protections provided by the warranty. Such an approach would not be unreasonable as the warranty period provided in the agreement was for only ninety days. Furthermore, a potential customer of defendant retains the ultimate choice of whether to purchase one of defendant's machines under the sales agreement and can opt to purchase a machine from plaintiff.⁴ The sales agreement simply does not constitute a tying arrangement, illegal [*17] or otherwise.⁵

Nor do the alleged lawsuits to enforce, or to dissuade from enforcement, the warranty provisions of the sales agreement constitute a tying arrangement. *HN3*⁶ Generally, the filing of a lawsuit cannot be used as the basis for antitrust liability. Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Indus., Inc., 508 U.S. 49, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 1926 (1993) (citing Eastern R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 F^{2d} 181 S. Ct. 523 (1961)). Even if a party subjectively intends to disrupt competition via legal action, if such lawsuit is objectively reasonable it is not a sham and may not be used to evidence antitrust activity. Id. Evidence of anticompetitive intent or purpose alone cannot transform otherwise legitimate activity into a sham. 113 S. Ct. at 1927. Thus, the two-part test for defining sham litigation is: (1) the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits; and (2) the lawsuit conceals an attempt to directly interfere with the business relationships of a competitor. Id. at 1928.

In the present case, plaintiff has not alleged that the two lawsuits by defendant are objectively a sham. At best, plaintiff has merely alleged a subjective bad faith on the part of defendant in bringing the suits. That is not enough. Defendant may file suit to thwart plaintiff as a competitor so long as the suit is otherwise objectively reasonable. The fact that the lawsuits arise out of the warranty provision of the sales agreement does not make them objectively a sham. Especially, as this court has found the warranty provision [*19] does not constitute a tying arrangement. Accordingly, the court dismisses Counts V and VI of the amended complaint without prejudice.

II. Attempted Monopolization

HN4 [↑] Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, prohibits attempted monopolization but does not define it. Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247, 113 S. Ct. 884, 889 (1993). The conduct of a single firm, such as defendant here, is unlawful under section 2 only when it threatens actual monopolization. 113 S. Ct. at 890. Thus, the Supreme Court has established three elements that a plaintiff must prove: (1) the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct; (2) a specific intent to monopolize; and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power. Id. at 890-91. To determine whether there is a dangerous probability of monopolization, a court must consider the relevant market and the defendant's ability to lessen or destroy competition in that market. Id. at 891.

Here, plaintiff has generally alleged that defendant's activities constitute predatory conduct in a scheme of attempted monopolization and that defendant intended to monopolize the institutional market for [*20] pill cards. The amended complaint further concludes that as a result of defendant's conduct there is a dangerous probability that defendant has, or soon will, attain the power to exclude plaintiff and others from the institutional market.

These general allegations are, however, belied by the specific factual allegations that underlie them. Including a warranty provision in a sales agreement that conditions the efficacy of that provision on not modifying or altering the machine does not demonstrate predatory conduct, an intent to monopolize or a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power. Similar provisions commonly exist in the business world. There is nothing unusual or unreasonable about only warranting a product if it remains in its original, unaltered form. The fact that such a provision results in a buyer only being able to use certain other products with the principal product is a matter of design choice and function. If a buyer wanted to utilize different subproducts (in this case pill cards), all it need do is purchase a different type of machine. There is nothing out of the ordinary about a manufacturer designing a product that can only be used (without modification) [*21] with products also made by that same manufacturer. That is the essence of the competitive spirit that drives our economic system.

The law directs itself not against conduct which is competitive, even severely so, but against conduct which unfairly tends to destroy competition itself. Spectrum Sports, 113 S. Ct. at 892. As a result, courts have been careful to avoid constructions of section 2 which might chill competition, rather than foster it. Id. It is sometimes difficult to distinguish robust competition from conduct with long-term anticompetitive effects. Moreover, single firm conduct is unlike concerted activity under section 1 which is fraught with anticompetitive risk. Id.

At best, plaintiff's allegations here reflect nothing more than an individual business concern's efforts to increase its market share. In a competitive sense, the appropriate response by plaintiff should be an effort to sell more of its machines and, hence, more of its pill cards, or possibly, sell pill cards that fit defendant's machine. There is nothing in plaintiff's allegations that remotely suggest that defendant has engaged in any activity or conduct that would prevent plaintiff from doing [*22] so. While plaintiff points to the price of defendant's machines in arguing that it would be cost prohibitive for institutional users to replace their machines with plaintiff's, that allegation is vastly insufficient to state a claim of attempted monopolization, even when viewed with the other allegations. Similarly, absent any allegations that the two lawsuits are objectively baseless, they also do not support plaintiff's claim of attempted monopolization. This is simply a case where plaintiff has pleaded itself out of court. Therefore, the court dismisses Counts I and II of the amended complaint without prejudice.

III. State Law Claims

Defendant seeks dismissal of the state law claims should this court dismiss the federal antitrust counts, apparently treating the state law claims as supplemental. See 28 U.S.C. § 1367. Plaintiff, however, has claimed as its jurisdictional basis for those claims diversity jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1332. As such, the court lacks the direction to dismiss the state law claims under section 1367. Nonetheless, the court dismisses the state law claims without prejudice as plaintiff has failed to allege the jurisdictional amount [*23] and it cannot be reasonably inferred from the amended complaint.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the court dismisses the amended complaint without prejudice.

BOYLE, Francis J., Senior Judge

Defendants, the Town of Johnston and Ralph aRusso, moved to dismiss the amended verified complaint pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(6\). The [2] Court referred the motion to a Magistrate Judge for a Report and Recommendation. The Magistrate Judge issued his Report on April 18, 1995, recommending that the motion to dismiss be granted and that Rule 11 sanctions be imposed on plaintiffs and plaintiffs' counsel. This Court heard Plaintiffs' objection to the Magistrate's Report and Recommendation. At that time the Court requested that the parties submit supplemental memoranda addressing the legislative history of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO). The Magistrate Judge also issued a second Report and Recommendation in which he recommended that the Motion to Dismiss submitted by Dominic DeConte should be granted as to all defendants. After consideration of the memoranda and argument, the Court adopts the recommendation of the Magistrate Judge that the complaint be dismissed as to all defendants. Rule 11 sanctions, however, will not be imposed.

I. FACTS

Because this is a motion pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(6\) for failure to state a claim, the facts are drawn from the verified amended complaint and in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs. See [Correa-Martinez v. Arrillaga-Belendez, \[3\] 903 F.2d 49, 51 \(1st Cir. 1990\)](#). The facts, in accord with this standard, may be stated as follows.

Plaintiff, Roma Construction Company, is a Florida Corporation whose chairman is Anthony [*80] Compagnogne. Plaintiff, Peter Zanni, is a developer residing in Rhode Island.

In 1986, Harry and Russell DePetrillo were in the process of acquiring property in the Town of Johnston called Oak Hill Estates. They planned to develop this property into a residential subdivision which would ultimately comprise 50 homes and have an expected value of $ 5 million. Early in this venture, upon seeking certain approvals and reviews, the DePetrillos encountered problems with officials employed by the Town of Johnston. After a meeting with some of the defendant officials, the DePetrillos agreed to pay a $ 40,000 bribe in $ 10,000 installments in order to secure the timely grant of all necessary approvals from the town.

Sometime in 1986, plaintiffs Peter Zanni and Roma Construction Company entered into a partnership agreement with the DePetrillos whereby the plaintiffs obtained a two-third's interest in the Oak Hill Properties. In December of 1990, the plaintiffs received approval from the Rhode Island Department [4] of Environmental Management for the Oak Hill property. This approval was a prerequisite for its application to the Town of Johnston for further sewer and water permits. Although the plaintiffs satisfactorily completed this application to the Town of Johnston in early 1991, defendant Iannazzi, a town official, refused to sign this application for several months.

It was at this point that the plaintiffs became aware of the DePetrillos agreement to pay bribes to the defendants in return for their cooperation. Thereafter, plaintiff Peter Zanni met with defendant Benjamin Zanni, a member of the Johnston town council. Benjamin Zanni informed him that $ 40,000 was outstanding on the bribe. Plaintiff Peter Zanni agreed to continuing bribing the town officials by making $ 10,000 installments. After the first of the installments was paid, defendant Iannazzi signed the sewer and water application.

In July of 1991, plaintiff Peter Zanni's attorney requested $ 10,000 to bribe Johnston town officials in order to secure official approval of another development project at Belknap Farms. Peter Zanni paid this bribe and approval for the Belknap Farms development was given in August of 1991.

This [5] scenario was repeated in late 1991. Plaintiffs were having a difficult time obtaining town permission for a certain manhole for the Oak Hill development. Plaintiff Peter Zanni called defendant Benjamin Zanni and was told that approval had not been forthcoming until another $ 10,000 installment was paid. Peter Zanni paid this amount and the next day the manhole was approved.

In the Fall of 1992, defendant Anthony Izzo asked an Oak Hill Partnership employee Mike Casale for the next bribe installment of $ 10,000. Izzo repeated this request to Casale in the Spring and Summer of 1993.

In November of 1993, the plaintiffs sold almost all of their assets in the Oak Hill Partnership. On August 29, 1994, plaintiffs filed this action against the defendants seeking damages for the diminution in value of their interests in the Oak Hill Estates property as well as exemplary damages, attorney's fees and costs pursuant to the RICO Act.

II. ANALYSIS

A. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12 (b)(6) Standard.

HN1[A civil complaint seeking money damages should not be dismissed for failure to state an actionable claim unless it plainly appears that the plaintiffs can prove no set of facts which would entitle [6] them to recover. See Miranda v. Ponce Federal Bank, 948 F.2d 41, 44 (1st Cir. 1991), citing Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80, 78 S. Ct. 99 (1957). Furthermore, the question must be resolved in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs with any doubt resolved on their behalf. See Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 236, 40 L. Ed. 2d 90, 94 S. Ct. 1683 (1974).

B. The Purpose of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act.

HN2[Section 1964, Title 18 of the United States Code provides that "any person injured in his business or property by reason of violation of . . . [the RICO statute] . . . may sue therefor in a United States district court and shall recover threefold damages . . ." Although [*81] this may appear to create a private action without limitations, for any person injured by such a violation, this Court must consider whether Congress intended such an open ended meaning. See Holmes v. Securities Investor Protection Corp. et al., 503 U.S. 258, 265-66, 117 L. Ed. 2d 532, 112 S. Ct. 1311 (1992); Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 529-30, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, [7] 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983). As the Supreme Court stated in Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins, 490 U.S. 228, 241, 104 L. Ed. 2d 268, 109 S. Ct. 1775 (1989): "We need not leave our common sense at the doorstep when we interpret a statute."

The language and the legislative history of the RICO Act, codified at 18 U.S.C. § 1961 et seq., illustrate that Congress intended that RICO both eradicate "organized crime from the social fabric" by divesting 'the association of the fruits of the ill-gotten gains", Genty v. Resolution Trust Corp., 937 F.2d 899, 910 (3rd Cir. 1991), quoting United States v. Turkette, 452 U.S. 576, 585, 69 L. Ed. 2d 246, 101 S. Ct. 2524 (1981), and to provide innocent victims with proper redress. See Organized Crime Control: Hearings on S.30 Before the Subcomm. No. 5 of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 91st Cong., 2nd Sess. 519-520 (1970) (statement of Hon. Sam Steiger, U.S. Rep.).

Through RICO, Congress granted certain powers to the United States District Courts which allowed the seizure of ill-gotten property and the forced divestment of interests in similar activities as well as the award of treble damages. See 18 U.S.C. §§ 1963, [8] 1964 (1984). The legislative history also shows that Congress intended not only to strike at the wrongdoers but to protect the innocent and provide them with adequate compensation. Although it appears that Congress did not consider the exact circumstances that now face the Court, it is clear from the record that the civil remedies provided by the statute were designed to protect innocent parties only.

The RICO statute was passed by both houses of Congress as part of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 (O.C.C.A.), P.L. 91-452. The "Findings and Purpose" of the Organized Crime Bill states that "Congress finds that . . . organized crime activity in the United States . . . harms innocent investors and competing organizations." S. 30, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. (1970). Moreover, the sponsor of the provision that eventually created a private civil remedy, Rep. Samuel Steiger, stated, "I want to make it very clear that the record we are making here is a record of significance. It is the intent of this body, I am certain, to see that innocent parties who are the victims of organized crime have a right to obtain proper redress." 116 Cong. Rec. H35346-47 (Oct. 7, 1970) (statement of Rep. Steiger).

C. [9] The Plaintiffs Are Not Innocent Victims

Plaintiffs strenuously argue that they fit within the class of persons meant to be protected by the RICO statute; that they are victims of an extortion scheme to which they had no viable alternative but to comply and that this scheme caused delays which diminished the value of their investment in Oak Hill Properties.

HN3[] Rhode Island General Law § 11-7-4 makes it illegal to give a bribe to a public official. That section states that "no person shall corruptly give . . . any gift or valuable consideration to . . . any public official as an inducement or reward for doing or forebearing to do . . . any act in relation to the business of . . . the state, city or town of which he or she is an official." R.I. Gen. Laws § 11-7-4 (1994). Although it is not necessary to determine here whether the plaintiffs are criminally liable under this section of the Rhode Island General Laws, it is important to note that denial of the defendants' purported extortion defense is correct as a matter of policy. See Model Penal Code § 240.1, commentary at 41 (1980). Commentary to section 240.1 of the Model Penal Code addresses this issue. The commentary to the [10] Model Penal Code states that, the private citizen who responds to an official's threat of adverse action by paying money to secure more favorable treatment evidences thereby a willingness to subvert the legitimate processes of government. It is not acceptable to pay . . . under-the-table [82] compensation to a public servant, even if such payment is required in order to obtain official action rightfully due. Such conduct constitutes a degree of cooperation in the undermining of governmental integrity that is inconsistent with the complete exonerations from criminal liability.

Model Penal Code § 240.1, commentary at 41 (1980).

The plaintiffs here are neither innocent nor victims. According to the verified amended complaint, the plaintiffs agreed to pay a $ 40,000 bribe in order to assure timely processing of the permits and approvals necessary for the development of the Oak Hill Estates properties. When first approached they had the opportunity, and more importantly the obligation, to avoid whatever damage may have resulted from the extortionate demands by reporting the defendants to the appropriate law enforcement officials.¹ Instead they chose another course whereby, [11] over a period of many months, they continued to make installment payments on this illegal $ 40,000 graft whenever they needed another approval or permit from the Johnston officials.

¹ Indeed, the plaintiffs may not be able to recover damages under RICO because their purported damages may not have been proximately caused by the defendants' actions but rather by the plaintiffs' failure to timely report the extortion to the authorities. See Holmes v. Securities Investor Protection Corp. et al., 503 U.S. 258, 117 L. Ed. 2d 532, 112 S. Ct. 1311 (1992) (Supreme Court found that HN4[] the imposition of civil remedies pursuant to the RICO Act required the defendant's acts to be the proximate cause as well as cause in fact of the plaintiff's injuries).

This Court is aware that plaintiff Zanni vigorously argues that he is a victim, not a collaborator. Furthermore, plaintiff Zanni uses his alleged innocence to propose that a motion to dismiss cannot be supported by the equitable defense of in pari delicto.² Plaintiff [12] contends that RICO is modeled after § 4 of the Clayton Act, and because the Supreme Court generally does not permit in pari delicto defenses in antitrust, then by extension, neither should this Court in RICO cases.

However, Plaintiff's analogy [13] to antitrust law is not satisfactory because the public policy aims of antitrust law, such as § 4 of the Clayton Act, and RICO are different. Private antitrust litigation serves the public interest of economic competition. Admittedly, the anti-competitive plaintiff who receives treble damages may be "no less morally reprehensible than the defendant, but the law encourages his suit to further the overriding public policy in favor of competition." Bieter Co. V. Blomquist, 848 F. Supp. 1446, 1448 \(D.Minn. 1994\) (developer brought RICO charges against former town officials), quoting Perma Life Mufflers, Inc. V. International Parts Corp., 392 U.S. 134, 139, 20 L. Ed. 2d 982, 88 S. Ct. 1981 \(1968\). Rather than encouraging a positive result, i.e., competition, Plaintiff's view of RICO would encourage crime, obviously a negative result.

The court in Bieter Co. was careful to point out that the defendants did not claim Bieter was involved in the same alleged bribery for which Bieter sought relief. 848 F. Supp. at 1450. Here, the complaint portrays plaintiffs and defendants as merely opposite sides of the same filthy lucre. The plaintiffs were completely involved in the illicit venture [14] as were the defendants. There is no bribery unless there is someone willing to pay it. Plaintiff had a plethora of administrative and judicial remedies available to enforce their legitimate claims. Rather, they chose a "short cut" and greased the outstretched palm. Plaintiffs provided the grease.

In contrast to antitrust laws, a private cause of action under RICO is calculated to [*83] discourage criminal acts and to compensate victims. This divergence of policy reasons, renders the Plaintiff's analogy unpersuasive. Permitting the plaintiff to recover in this action would, as demonstrated hereafter, encourage crime and would certainly not compensate victims, a purpose not attributed to Congress.

D. Allowing Plaintiffs To Recover Would Subvert the Purpose and Policy of the RICO Act

Allowing wrongdoers, such as the plaintiffs, to recover treble damages under RICO would subvert the twofold purpose of that act, to eliminate the economic incentives driving organized crime and to compensate the innocent victim. Such a result would provide no incentive for those approached by public officials for illegal payments to report such activity to law enforcement. Persons, such as the plaintiffs, [15] could engage in bribery of public officials with full knowledge that if the bribery scheme (viewed as an effort to expedite official approval) broke down for whatever reason, they could seek a treble return on their illicit, but failed investment, from those with whom they once illegally dealt. It would be a no loss situation for criminal activity. It would be a pay now and recover later deal.

Instead of supplying innocent victims of organized crime with compensation, the civil remedies provided by the RICO Act would become de facto an insurance windfall for those who willingly engage in illegitimate schemes. Moreover, in this reading of the act, the Court heeds the congressional admonition that RICO be "liberally construed to effectuate its remedial purposes." RICO, s. 904(a), 84 Stat. 947 (1970). It is the plaintiffs' construction that would, in the end, turn the purpose of the act on its head by rewarding criminal wrongdoers and actually inciting criminal activity through an economic incentive of treble damages.

Such a result is contrary to the intent of Congress and the policy of the act and thus cannot be permitted.

E. Plaintiff's Section 1983 Claim

² In pari delicto means "in equal fault" and is a common law doctrine which bars a plaintiff's recovery due to his own wrongful conduct. This defense is grounded on two premises: "first, that courts should not lend their good offices to mediating disputes among wrongdoers; and second, that denying judicial relief to an admitted wrongdoer is an effective means of deterring illegality." Bateman Eichler, Hill Richards, Inc. V. Berner, 472 U.S. 299, 306, 86 L. Ed. 2d 215, 105 S. Ct. 2622 \(1985\) (holding that in pari delicto not available defense for securities violations unless plaintiff bears equal responsibility for violation). See also Sullivan v. National Football League, 34 F.3d 1091 \(1st Cir. 1994\), cert. denied, 1995 WL 75506 (U.S. 2/27/95).

Count III avers [16] that defendants aRusso, DeConte, Izzo, Zanni, Iannazzi and the Town of Johnston were acting under the color of state authority and municipal practice and deprived the plaintiffs of property and rights in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

HN5 [↑] Section 1983 imposes liability on any person who acts under color of state law, deprives another rights or privileges guaranteed under the Constitution or laws of the United States. 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Municipalities may be considered "persons" under the law. Monell v. City of New York Dept. Of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, 694, 56 L. Ed. 2d 611, 98 S. Ct. 2018. "The constitutional deprivation must have its origin in what can fairly be said to be a policy of a municipality." Manor Healthcare Corp. V. Lomelo, 929 F.2d 633, 637 \(11th Cir. 1991\) (finding no § 1983 liability for town due to mayor's bribery).

HN6 [↑] Generally, a plaintiff must show two predicates in a § 1983 claim against a municipality: (1) that the policy was so well settled and widespread that the policy-making officials had actual or constructive knowledge of it and yet did nothing; and (2) the custom or policy was the cause of, or moving force behind, plaintiffs' constitutional [17] deprivation. Bordanaro v. McLeod, 871 F.2d 1151, 1156 \(1st Cir. 1989\). In the facts alleged, there is no evidence that the Town of Johnston had any policy endorsing or advocating extortion and the acceptance of bribes by town officials.

It may be argued that Mayor aRusso's actions, or acquiescence, constituted a town policy under which a plaintiff could recover. HN7 [↑] "An unconstitutional policy or custom may be inferred from a single decision or act...the isolated action must be taken by a municipal official with 'final policy-making authority' in the relevant area of the city's business." Rodriguez v. Furtado, 771 F. Supp. 1245, 1257 \(D.Mass. 1991\) (internal citations omitted), citing, City of St. Louis v. Praprotnik, 485 U.S. 112, 99 L. Ed. 2d 107, 108 S. Ct. 915 \(1989\). In the present state of this action, there is no indication in the record of the extent of the Mayor's authority in the [*84] Town of Johnston. See Manor Healthcare Corp. V. Lomelo, 929 F.2d 633 \(11th Cir. 1991\). The extent of the Mayor's authority remains a fact in issue.

Even assuming arguendo that there was a de facto municipal policy of extortion promulgated by aRusso and perpetrated by the other [18] named defendants, the plaintiffs cannot succeed in their § 1983 claim because the alleged policy is not the cause of any constitutional harm.

HN8 [↑] There must be a "direct causal link" between a municipal policy or custom and the alleged constitutional violation to find any § 1983 liability. City of Harris v. Canton, 489 U.S. 378, 385, 103 L. Ed. 2d 412, 109 S. Ct. 1197 \(1989\). See also Chaudhry v. Prince George's County, MD, 626 F. Supp. 448, 453 \(D.Md 1985\). Yet in this case, the "casual link" or "moving force" behind any perceived constitutional violations is the plaintiffs' own actions, that is their continual, voluntary payment of bribes to the defendants. Simply said, any substantive or procedural deprivations are the fault of the plaintiffs. Perhaps a bribery demand by municipal officials in order to facilitate zoning, permits, and the like, deprives a citizen of constitutional due process rights; however, once payment is made the citizen becomes the "causal link" and essentially waives any future right to protest, using 42 U.S.C. § 1983 as a vehicle.

Because the plaintiffs cannot provide any "moving force" or "casual link" other than their active complicity, there is [19] not sufficient causation to sustain a § 1983 claim. Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Count III is granted.

F. Plaintiff's State Law Claims

The state law claims in Count IV-VI, Rhode Island RICO statutes §§ 7-15-2, 7-15-4 and R.I.G.L. § 9-1-2, are dismissed for lack of supplemental jurisdiction. See Judicial Improvements Act of 1990, 28 U.S.C. § 1367\(c\).

G. Rule 11 Sanctions

HN9 [↑] Rule 11 sanctions may be imposed when an attorney presents a claim or files an action "not warranted by existing law or by a nonfrivolous argument for the extension, modification, or reversal of existing law or the establishment of new law." Fed.R.Civ.P. 11\(b\). The conduct in this case does not warrant Rule 11 sanctions. The Magistrate's Report and Recommendation is not adopted with regard to sanctions.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, the Report and Recommendation of the Magistrate Judge is adopted as stated in this opinion. The complaint is hereby dismissed as to all defendants.

[*654] RYDER, Acting Chief Judge.

Frank Morsani and the Tampa Bay Baseball Group (TBBG) seek review of the trial court's dismissal of their complaint alleging tortious interference with advantageous contractual and business relationships and antitrust violations in connection with their attempt to acquire a major league baseball team. We hold that the trial court erred in its dismissal for failure to state a cause of action for tortious interference because the complaint sufficiently alleged that the appellees [2] exceeded the scope of their approval [*655] rights. We further conclude that the antitrust exemption for baseball is limited to the reserve clause. Because our decision renders the third and fourth issues moot, we do not address them. Accordingly, we reverse the dismissal and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Appellants were plaintiffs in a multi-count suit against sixty defendants, nearly all of whom were associated with major league baseball in one capacity or another at the relevant times. The complaint alleged that the defendants had tortiously interfered with various contractual rights and advantageous business relationships which the plaintiffs had developed over the years in their efforts to acquire ownership of a major league baseball team in Tampa, Florida, and, that, by conspiring together to prevent the plaintiffs from succeeding in that endeavor, the defendants had violated Florida's antitrust laws.

The trial court dismissed the complaint as to fifty-eight of the sixty defendants pursuant to a motion for failure to state a cause of action pursuant to Florida Rule of Civil Procedure 1.140\(b\)\(6\). The plaintiffs and the remaining two defendants stipulated [3] without prejudice to the plaintiffs' rights to challenge the propriety of the final judgment itself, that the two defendants would be deemed included in the order of dismissal.

Counts I through III of the complaint alleging tortious interference correspond to the plaintiffs' attempts to purchase a team through negotiations with owners of Minnesota Twins, Inc. and Texas Rangers, Ltd. and to acquire an expansion team, respectively. Count IV alleged that the defendants' acts of tortious interference constituted an antitrust violation.

HN1 Our function when reviewing an order of dismissal entered pursuant to [Rule 1.140\(b\), Florida Rules of Civil Procedure, is confined to whether the trial court properly concluded that the complaint did not state a cause of action. In reaching that determination, we must take the pleaded facts as true and we are not concerned with the quality of the allegations or how they will ultimately be proved.

Troupe v. Redner, 652 So. 2d 394, 395 \(Fla. 2d DCA 1995\), citing Cook v. Sheriff of Collier County, 573 So. 2d 406, 408 \(Fla. 2d DCA 1991\).

The complaint alleges that in 1982, Morsani attended the major league baseball winter meetings, [4] expressed his desire to purchase a major league baseball team and sought advice from various defendants concerning the team's purchase and relocation to the Tampa Bay area. Upon the defendants' advice, TBBG was formed. Various defendants told the plaintiffs that they would support and approve the sale of the Minnesota Twins, Inc. to them if they would secure a site to build a major league baseball stadium in the Tampa Bay area. At an expense in excess of $ 2 million, the plaintiffs secured a long-term lease with the Tampa Sports Authority for the construction of a baseball stadium and entered into negotiations with the shareholders of Minnesota Twins, Inc. for the purchase of their stock.

In 1984, the owners of 51% of the stock of Minnesota Twins, Inc., Calvin Griffith and Thelma Griffith-Haynes, agreed to sell their controlling interest to the plaintiffs for approximately $ 24 million on condition that they first buy H. Gabriel Murphy's 42.14% minority interest in the corporation. The plaintiffs then negotiated and entered into a fully-executed written contract with Murphy for the purchase of his interest, at a purchase price of $ 11.5 million. The contract provided that its closing [5] was conditioned upon prior approval by the owners of other American League teams, as the Constitution of the American League required, and any other approvals which might validly be required. Thereafter, with full knowledge of these agreements, various of the defendants conspired together and used improper means to prevent the plaintiffs from consummating their purchase. They caused Griffith and Griffith-Haynes to sell their 51% interest to Carl Pohlad. They also demanded that the plaintiffs assign their contract with Murphy to Pohlad, and that Murphy consent to the assignment. At the time this assignment was demanded, the value of the minority interest purchased by the plaintiffs had increased from $ 11.5 million to $ 25 million.

[*656] The plaintiffs balked at the demand and sought payment for the $ 13.5 million increase in value of the contract, as well as reimbursement of the $ 2 million previously expended, as a condition to assigning the contract to Pohlad. The relevant defendants then threatened the plaintiffs. These threats were that plaintiffs would never own an interest in a major league baseball team, and that there would never be a major league baseball team in the Tampa Bay [6] area, unless the plaintiffs assigned the contract as demanded and accepted only $ 250,000.00 for the assignment, and, further, that they agree to forebear pursuing any legal remedies for the additional $ 15 million plus in damages in exchange for obtaining an ownership interest in another major league baseball team in time to begin the 1993 season. In exchange for the promise of another team, the plaintiffs assigned their contract to Pohlad.

The complaint also alleged that in 1988, several defendants informed the plaintiffs that they would support and approve the sale of Texas Rangers, Ltd. to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs then reached an agreement with Eddie Gaylord for the purchase of his 33% interest in the partnership, and entered into a written contract with Eddie Chiles for the purchase of his 58% controlling interest in the partnership. Thereafter, with full knowledge of these agreements, various defendants conspired together and used improper means to prevent the plaintiffs from consummating their purchase. They caused both Gaylord and Chiles to breach their agreements with the plaintiffs in favor of a Texas investor. They then, again, threatened the plaintiffs that they [7] would never own an interest in a major league baseball team, and that there would never be a major league baseball team in the Tampa Bay area, unless the plaintiffs agreed to forbear pursuing any legal remedies in exchange for obtaining an ownership interest in another major league baseball team in time to begin the 1993 season. In exchange for the renewed and continuing promise of another team, the plaintiffs once again withheld their claims.

Some of the defendants informed the plaintiffs in 1988 that, consistent with the prior promises made to obtain their forbearance, the plaintiffs would be awarded an expansion team in time to begin the 1993 season. Thereafter, various defendants conspired together and used improper means to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining the promised team. In 1989, they interfered with the plaintiffs' advantageous business relationships by demanding that one of the investors in TBBG relinquish his interest as a condition of obtaining the team, and thereby reduced the corporation's financial viability. The defendants then prohibited the plaintiffs from obtaining any additional financial backing from persons or entities not located in the Tampa Bay area, [8] including Sam Walton. These interferences reduced the financial viability of the plaintiffs well below that of a competitor group led by H. Wayne Huizenga, and effectively eliminated the plaintiffs from contention for the promised expansion team which began the 1993 season as The Florida Marlins in Miami.

HN2[] To establish the tort of interference with a contractual or business relationship, the plaintiff must allege and prove (1) the existence of a business relationship under which the plaintiff has legal rights, (2) an intentional and unjustified interference with that relationship by the defendant and (3) damage to the plaintiff as a result of the breach of the business relationship. Serafino v. Palm Terrace Apartments, Inc., 343 So. 2d 851 \(Fla. 2d DCA 1976\).

The appellants acknowledge that HN3[] a cause of action for tortious interference does not exist against one who is himself a party to the contract allegedly interfered with. United of Omaha Life Ins. Co. v. Nob Hill Associates, 450 So. 2d 536, 539 \(Fla. 3d DCA\), review dismissed and denied, 458 So. 2d 273, 274 \(Fla. 1984\). They urge, however, that none of the defendants except Calvin Griffith and Thelma Griffith-Haynes [9] owned stock in Minnesota Twins, Inc., and only they and Gabriel Murphy could contract to sell their stock in the Twins to the plaintiffs. They further contend that the various defendants' approval rights do not make them parties to the contract.

The trial court concluded that the existence of the defendants' approval rights made them, as the leagues and teams, the [*657] source of the business opportunity allegedly interfered with, and, therefore, were incapable of interference. See Genet Co. v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 498 So. 2d 683 \(Fla. 3d DCA 1986\). Genet, however, is distinguishable because the brewer's decision to disapprove the proposed transfer was based entirely on business considerations. No malice was shown. Here, the appellants have alleged the use of threats, intimidation and conspiratorial conduct.

HN4[] It is clear that the privilege to interfere in a contract because of a financial interest is not unlimited. Frank Coulson, Inc.-Buick v. General Motors Corp., 488 F.2d 202 \(5th Cir. 1974\). The better view is that it is necessary for the interfering party to have a financial interest in the business of the third party which is in the nature of an investment in order [10] to justify the interference. . . . Furthermore, a privilege to interfere with a third party's conduct does not include the purposeful causing of a breach of contract.

Yoder v. Shell Oil Co., 405 So. 2d 743, 744 \(Fla. 2d DCA 1981\), review denied, 412 So. 2d 470 \(Fla. 1982\).

HN5[] Where there is a qualified privilege to interfere with a business relationship, the privilege carries with it the obligation to employ means that are not improper. McCurdy v. Collis, 508 So. 2d 380, 384 \(Fla. 1st DCA 1987\). As the appellants have pleaded their cause of action, the defendants' approval rights were exercised outside the context of the proper exercise of their rights. See Peacock v. General Motors Acceptance Corp., 432 So. 2d 142 \(Fla. 1st DCA 1983\). We conclude, therefore, that Counts I, II and III state a cause of action for tortious interference with advantageous contractual and business relationships and reverse their dismissal.

Turning to the antitrust claim, the defendants, relying on the United States Supreme Court decisions supporting baseball's exemption from antitrust laws, Federal Baseball Club of Baltimore v. National League, 259 U.S. 200, 42 S. Ct. 465, 66 [11] L. Ed. 898 (1922); Toolson v. New York Yankees, Inc., 346 U.S. 356, 74 S. Ct. 78, 98 L. Ed. 64 (1953); and Flood v. Kuhn, 407 U.S. 258, 92 S. Ct. 2099, 32 L. Ed. 2d 728 (1972), argued that these cases exempt from the antitrust laws the entire business of baseball. The trial judge thoroughly reviewed those cases and a more recent case pertinent to the antitrust cause of action, Piazza v. Major League Baseball, 831 F. Supp. 420 (E.D. Pa. 1993). In Piazza, Judge Padova concluded that the precedential value of the trilogy of Supreme Court decisions regarding baseball's exemption is limited to the reserve system. Although the trial judge here found Judge Padova's decision well-reasoned, he ultimately concluded that he was bound by the decision of the Fifth District in Butterworth v. National League of Professional Baseball Clubs, 622 So. 2d 177 (Fla. 5th DCA 1993), which granted a petition to set aside the state's civil investigative demands pursuant to state antitrust law. On appeal, the Florida Supreme Court answered in the negative the following question certified by the Fifth District as one of great public importance:

Does the antitrust exemption for baseball [12] recognized by the United States Supreme Court in Federal Baseball Club of Baltimore . . . and its progeny exempt all decisions involving the sale and location of baseball franchises from federal and Florida antitrust law?

Butterworth, 622 So. 2d 177, 178. The trial judge below did not have the benefit of the Florida Supreme Court's decision which reversed the appellate court and held that federal and state antitrust laws applied to decisions involving sales and locations of baseball franchises, and that the antitrust exemption for baseball extended only to the reserve system. Butterworth v. National League of Professional Baseball Clubs, 644 So. 2d 1021 (Fla. 1994).

The appellees argue that despite the Florida Supreme Court's pronouncement in Butterworth, the Commerce Clause bars application of state antitrust laws to interstate professional sports leagues even in the absence of a baseball antitrust exemption. We disagree. HN6 [↑] State antitrust laws not in direct conflict with federal antitrust laws are neither preempted nor precluded by any federal considerations. Postema v. National League [*658] of Professional Baseball Clubs, 799 F. Supp. 1475 (S.D.N.Y. [13] 1992), reversed in part on other grounds, 998 F. 2d 60 (2nd Cir. 1993); California v. ARC America Corp., 490 U.S. 93, 109 S.Ct. 1661, 104 L. Ed. 2d 86 (1989). Reversed and remanded.

[*711] ORDER RE: REMAND TO STATE COURT

These related jurisdictional matters were taken under submission on September 22, 1995. After reviewing the materials submitted by the parties and the case file, the Court hereby REMANDS these actions to state court.

I. Background

A. Procedure

On July 21, 1995, Plaintiff PATRICIA BORGESON, on behalf of herself [2] and all others similarly situated, filed a Complaint against ARCHER-DANIELS-MIDLAND CO. ("ADM"), CARGILL, INC. ("Cargill"), A.E. STALEY MANUFACTURING CO. ("Staley"), AND CPC INTERNATIONAL, INC ("CPC"), in the Los Angeles County Superior Court.¹ Also on July 21, 1995, Plaintiff NEDRA GOINGS, on behalf of herself and all others similarly situated, filed a Complaint against the same Defendants in the Orange County Superior Court.

On August 25, 1995, Defendant Staley filed a Notices of Removal, asserting diversity jurisdiction over these actions under 28 U.S.C. § 1332.² After receiving Staley's Notices of Removal of the Borges case, the Court issued an Order to Show Cause ("OSC") why the action should not be remanded to state court for failing [3] to show a proper basis for federal court jurisdiction.³ The Court listed two grounds for its OSC. First, Staley failed to show that the other defendants (Cargill, ADM, and CPC) had joined in the removal. Staley has satisfied the Court's concern on this ground.⁴ Second, and more importantly, the Court ordered Staley to show that the requirements for diversity jurisdiction were satisfied.

[4] On September 11, 1995, Defendant Staley filed a Response to OSC re: Remand. On September 15, 1995, Plaintiff filed a Memorandum of Points and Authorities in Response [*712] to OSC re: Remand, in support of remand to state court.⁵ On September 22, 1995, Defendant Staley filed a Reply.⁶

On September 11, 1995, Defendants filed a joint motion before the Judicial Panel on Multi-District Litigation to transfer this action and others to the Southern District of Iowa for coordinated and consolidated pretrial proceedings. On September 29, 1995, Plaintiffs in the actions filed a response.

B. Plaintiff's Allegations

In both the Borges and Goings Complaints, Plaintiffs allege as follows:

1.) At least as early as July 1992 and through the present, [5] Defendants entered into and have engaged in a contract, combination, and conspiracy to suppress competition and unreasonably restrain commerce and trade, by

² The Goings action was originally assigned to Judge Phaelzer in this district. On September 26, 1995, the Goings case was transferred to this Court.

³ The Borges OSC was issued on August 31, 1995. However, the Goings action was not transferred to this Court's docket until September 26, 1995. Therefore, the Court's OSC only related to the Borges case. Because the Goings and Borges cases are fundamentally identical, this Court's Order will apply to both matters.

⁵ On September 15, 1995, Plaintiff Goings joined in the Response by Plaintiff Borgeson to the OSC, supporting remand to state court.

fixing the prices of high-fructose corn syrup and/or its by-products ("corn syrup") sold to consumers in the State of California. Corn syrup is a corn-derived sweetener sold in pure form and used in most soft drinks, as well as some baked goods and other food products. There is no substitute for corn syrup in the production, manufacture, distribution, and sale of many consumer products. Corn syrup is a fungible product, and the corn syrup produced by one company is completely interchangeable with that of any other company.

2.) As a result Defendants' conduct, the price of corn syrup has increased in recent years at a substantially faster rate than the price of the raw materials.

3.) During the relevant time period, Defendants have sold many millions of dollars of corn syrup in the United States, and a significant portion of those sales has occurred in the State of California.

4.) Because of Defendants' conduct, there are significant barriers to new competitors wishing to enter the corn syrup industry.

5.) In [6] 1992, Mark E. Whitacre ("Whitacre"), an executive of ADM, agreed to cooperate with a federal investigation into possible antitrust law violations after company officials had asked him to participate in collusive pricing agreements. Since that time, Whitacre has recorded hundreds of conversations and meetings involving employees of Defendants ADM, Cargill, Staley, and CPC.

6.) In June and July of 1995, the national press reported that Defendants were the subject of a major criminal antitrust investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation ("FBI"). ADM is the primary target of the federal investigation. Numerous managers and executives of ADM, as well as each of the other Defendants, have received subpoenas and/or have had search warrants executed against them. A grand jury in Chicago has begun hearing evidence as a result of that investigation.

7.) As a result of Defendants' alleged wrongdoing, corn syrup prices have remained at an artificially high and uncompetitive level. In addition, competition for the sale of corn sweetener products has been unreasonably restrained in the State of California.

8.) Therefore, the prices that Plaintiffs and other members of the [7] classes have paid are higher than the prices would be in a free and competitive market.

Plaintiffs pray for the following relief: an order certifying these actions as class actions, with Plaintiffs as the representatives of the classes and Plaintiffs' counsel as class counsel; judgment that the acts of the Defendants constitute unlawful and unreasonable restraint of trade and unfair competition; treble damages; fees; costs; disgorgement and restitution; and, such other relief as the Court deems just and proper.

II. Discussion

A. Removal Jurisdiction Standard

HN1 When an action could have been brought originally in federal court based on diversity jurisdiction, see 28 U.S.C. § 1332, a district court has removal jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1441. District courts have original jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 [*713] where the civil action is between citizens of different states, and the amount in controversy exceeds $ 50,000. In a class action, only the domicile of the class representative (plaintiff) is considered, rather than that of the class members. William W. Schwarzer, et al., Federal Civil Procedure Before Trial P 10:394 (citing Supreme Tribe [8] of Ben Hur v. Cauble, 255 U.S. 356, 65 L. Ed. 673, 41 S. Ct. 338 \(1921\); see also Friedman v. Meyers 482 F.2d 435 \(2nd Cir. 1973\)). For the purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a corporation is deemed to have two (2) states of citizenship--its state of incorporation and the state wherein it has its principal place of business. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332\(c\)\(1\).

HN2 [↑] On removal, the burden of establishing grounds for federal jurisdiction rests on the defendant. Indeed, there is a "strong presumption" against removal jurisdiction. See Gaus v. Miles, Inc., 980 F.2d 564, 566 \(9th Cir. 1992\). Accordingly, when there is doubt as to removability, it is resolved in favor of remanding the case to state court. Schwarzer, et al., supra, P 2:606 (citing Gaus, 980 F.2d 564; Shamrock Oil & Gas Corp. v. Sheets, 313 U.S. 100, 85 L. Ed. 1214, 61 S. Ct. 868 (1941)).

B. Analysis

1. Diversity of Citizenship

Plaintiffs Borgeson and Goings are citizens of the State of California. Defendant STALEY is incorporated in the state of Delaware and its principal place of business is in Illinois. Defendant ADM is a Minnesota Corporation with its principal place of business in [9] the State of Illinois.⁷ Defendant CPC is a Delaware Corporation with its principal place of business in New York. Since no Defendant is a citizen of the same state as the Plaintiff, and the Court need not consider the citizenship of defendants sued under fictitious names (Does), there is diversity of citizenship. 28 U.S.C. § 1441\(a\) ("For purposes of removal. . .the citizenship of defendants sued under fictitious names shall be disregarded.").)

2. Amount in Controversy

Defendant Staley argues that the amount in controversy requirement can be satisfied in one of two ways. First, Staley asserts that the entire amount of the attorneys' fees should be allocated to the named Plaintiffs, giving the Court jurisdiction over their [10] claims, and that the Court should then assert supplemental jurisdiction over the other members of the classes based on 28 U.S.C. § 1367. Alternatively, Defendant Staley contends that punitive damages should be considered a "common and undivided" interest shared by all the class members, giving the Court jurisdiction over both of the entire classes.

a. The Validity of the United States Supreme Court's Decision in Zahn v. Int'l. Paper Co.

Defendant Staley's argument that all attorneys' fees should be attributed to the named Plaintiffs, and that the Court should use supplemental jurisdiction, contradicts the rulings in Zahn v Int'l Paper Co., 414 U.S. 291, 38 L. Ed. 2d 511, 94 S. Ct. 505 \(1973\), and Goldberg v. CPC Int'l, Inc., 678 F.2d 1365, 1366-67 \(9th Cir. 1982\), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 945 (1982). Staley first argues that Zahn has been legislatively overruled, and, because the Goldberg court relied on Zahn, suggests that Goldberg is no longer sound authority. The Court must therefore address the threshold issue of the validity of the Supreme Court's decision in Zahn.

i. Zahn and its History

In [Snyder v. Harris, 394 U.S. 332, \[11\] 22 L. Ed. 2d 319, 89 S. Ct. 1053 \(1969\); reh'g denied 394 U.S. 1025, 23 L. Ed. 2d 50, 89 S. Ct. 1622 \(1969\), the United States Supreme Court was faced with the issue of whether the 1966 amendments to \[Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23\]\(#\) changed the law regarding the aggregation of claims in class actions. In Snyder the Supreme Court consolidated two cases, one in which a shareholder brought a class action against corporation directors, \[*714\] and the other in which a customer brought a class action against a gas company to recover alleged overpayment. Both cases involved separate and distinct claims, and no member of the class alleged damages satisfying the amount in controversy \(at that time \$ 10,000\).](#)

⁷ In their Notice of Removal, Defendant STALEY states that Defendant ADM is a Delaware corporation, when in fact, Defendant ADM is a Minnesota corporation. Notice of Removal, p.4, P 7. However, this misstatement is irrelevant for the purposes of determining diversity jurisdiction.

In its opinion, the Snyder Court traced the development of the jurisdictional amount in controversy requirement since the first congressional grant of jurisdiction in 1789. The Court emphasized that HN3¹ the long-standing judicial interpretation has been that "separate and distinct claims of two or more plaintiffs cannot be aggregated in order to satisfy the jurisdictional amount requirement". Id. at 334-35. In a case with two or more plaintiffs, aggregation is permitted [\[12\]](#) only when the plaintiffs "unite to enforce a single title or right in which they have a common and undivided interest". Id. at 335.

In deciding that the 1966 amendments to Rule 23 did not change the rules of aggregation, the Supreme Court reasoned that the doctrine of aggregation of claims was not and had never been based on the categories of Rule 23, nor on any rule of procedure. Rather, the doctrine is in fact based on the Supreme Court's interpretation of "matter in controversy," within the meaning of the diversity statute. Id. at 336. The Supreme Court's interpretation of "matter in controversy" dates back to 1911, and has been applied to class actions since 1939. Id. at 336-37. Congress, well aware of the Supreme Court's settled interpretation of the language, has never changed the wording of the statute, despite its numerous increases of the actual "amount" required for jurisdiction. Id. at 338-39.

In Zahn, the Court was presented with a similar, yet distinct question. In Zahn, the main plaintiffs satisfied the amount in controversy requirement, but the rest of the class did not. On these facts, the Zahn Court refused to extend diversity jurisdiction [\[13\]](#) to the remaining members of the class. In essence, the Court again found that the amount in controversy requirement could not be aggregated or shared.

In reaching its decision, the Zahn Court specifically reaffirmed the reasoning of the Snyder court. 414 U.S. at 293-302. Acknowledging that Snyder involved class actions in which no member of the class had claims that satisfied the amount in controversy requirement, the Zahn court stated "there is no doubt that the rationale of that case controls this one". Zahn, 414 U.S. at 300. In sum, the Snyder rule holds that separate and distinct claims may not be aggregated for the purposes of the amount in controversy requirement, thus forcing the remand of cases in which no member of the class meets the amount in controversy requirement. Zahn follows Snyder by requiring the dismissal of class members who do not meet the amount in controversy requirement, even if some members do. Zahn, 414 U.S. at 300; see also Clark v. Paul Gray, Inc., 306 U.S. 583, 83 L. Ed. 1001, 59 S. Ct. 744 \(1939\) (dismissing from the suit all plaintiffs who did not have a sufficiently large claim).

In addition, the Zahn [\[14\]](#) Court reasoned that if Congress wanted to change the Supreme Court's interpretation of the statutory language, there would have been some "express statement" to that effect in either the amendments or in the official commentaries. Zahn, 414 U.S. at 302. In the absence of such an express statement, the Supreme Court declined to alter its prior rulings.

ii. The Effect of the Judicial Improvements Act of 1990

In 1990, Congress passed the Judicial Improvements Act of 1990 ("the Act") amending 28 U.S.C. § 1367 to create "supplemental" jurisdiction out of pendent and ancillary jurisdiction. HN4¹ Section 1367 now states in relevant part:

- (a) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c) or as expressly provided otherwise by Federal statute, in any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction, the district courts shall have supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States [\[*715\]](#) Constitution. Such supplemental jurisdiction shall include claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional [\[15\]](#) parties.

28 U.S.C. § 1367 \(a\) (emphasis added). HN5¹ This broad grant of jurisdiction is limited by subsection (b) which specifies the circumstances in which the district courts shall not have jurisdiction.⁸ [\[16\]](#) In addition, the grant is limited as otherwise provided in federal statutes (such as 28 U.S.C. § 1332). Congress' creation of supplemental jurisdiction has led many to question the validity of prior Supreme Court rulings such as Zahn and Snyder.⁹

Defendant Staley asserts that the supplemental jurisdiction amendments legislatively [\[17\]](#) overruled the Supreme Court's decision in Zahn. The Ninth Circuit has not yet spoken on this issue. In support of its position, however, Staley cites a recent Fifth Circuit case, In re: Abbott Laboratories, 51 F.3d 524 \(5th Cir. 1995\) reh'g and sug. reh'g en banc denied, 65 F.3d 33, 1995 WL 522975 \(5th Cir. 1995\), which involved a similar class action based on state antitrust violations. In Abbott, the Fifth Circuit reasoned that because the restrictions listed in subsection (b) do not refer to Rule 23 or class actions, then class actions must be included in the general rule of subsection (a). That would mean that district courts would have supplemental jurisdiction over the claims of class members who did not meet the amount in controversy requirement. Abbott, 51 F.3d at 527-28. This interpretation directly contradicts the Supreme Court's Zahn ruling.

In reaching its conclusion, the Abbott court applied a plain meaning approach to statutory interpretation, declining to examine the legislative history of the Act. Indeed, the Fifth Circuit reached this conclusion even though the legislative history clearly indicates that Congress did not intend to overrule Zahn [\[18\]](#) or Snyder. The House Report accompanying the Act states that "district courts may exercise supplemental jurisdiction, except when to do so would be inconsistent with the jurisdictional requirements of the diversity statute." H.R. Rep. No. 734, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. 29 (1990), reprinted in 1990 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6860, 6875. In addition, supplemental jurisdiction "is not intended to affect the jurisdictional requirements of 28 U.S.C. § 1332 in diversity-only class actions, as those requirements were interpreted prior to Finley v. [United States, 490 U.S. 545 \(1989\)]." Id. at 6875.¹⁰ Further, the House Report cites Supreme Tribe of Ben Hur and Zahn as representing the pre-Finley interpretation. Id. at 6875 & n.17. The Abbott court stated that it is improper to search the legislative history for congressional intent unless the statute is unclear or ambiguous. Abbott, 51 F.3d at 528-29 (citations omitted). Other than the Fifth Circuit case, the Court has found only a few district court cases finding that Section 1367 legislatively overrules Zahn.¹¹ However, a plethora of cases hold that Zahn is untouched by the supplemental jurisdiction amendments.¹² See, e.g. Duet v. Lawes, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4755, 87, 1994 WL 151095, at *2 (E.D. La. 1994) (holding that Zahn is not overruled based on argument that the claims of the co-plaintiffs are part of the initial civil action, not "other claims" and therefore Section 1367 does not apply to the claims of co-plaintiffs); LeRoy Cattle Co., Inc. v.

In any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction founded solely on section 1332 of this title, the district courts shall not have supplemental jurisdiction under subsection (a) over claims by plaintiffs against persons made parties under Rule 14, 19, 20, or 24 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or over claims by persons proposed to be joined as plaintiffs under Rule 19 of such rules, or seeking to intervene as plaintiffs under Rule 24 of such rules, when exercising supplemental jurisdiction over such claims would be inconsistent with the jurisdictional requirements of section 1332.

¹⁰ In Finley the Supreme Court prevented a plaintiff who had satisfied original subject matter jurisdiction under the Federal Tort Claims Act from adding a transactionally-related state claim against a different, non-diverse defendant.

¹¹ See, e.g. Lindsay v. Kvortek, 865 F. Supp. 264 \(W.D.Pa. 1994\) (determining based on a plain language reading of the statute that Section 1367 legislatively overrules Zahn; case did not involve a class action); Garza v. National Am. Ins. Co., 807 F. Supp. 1256, 1258 \(M.D. La. 1992\) (same); Patterson Enter., Inc. v. Bridgestone/Firestone, Inc., 812 F. Supp. 1152, 1154 \(D. Kan. 1993\) (same); Booty v. Shoney's, Inc., 872 F. Supp. 1524 \(E.D. La. 1995\) (holding that if the requirements of § 1367\(a\) are met and the case does not fit one of the exceptions enumerated in (b), the district court has jurisdiction; case was not a class action).

Fina Oil & Chemical Co., 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4802, 1994 WL 151105 (D. Kan. 1994) (holding Zahn is not overruled and noting that Congress could not list Rule 23 in subsection (b) because to do so would have the effect of overruling the Supreme Court's decision in Supreme Tribe, that only named parties have to meet the diverse citizenship requirement); Stoumen v. Public Service Mut. Ins. Co., 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4021, 1994 WL 111355 (E.D. Pa. 1994) (upholding Zahn based on an examination of the legislative history and agreement with the reasoning in the preponderance of district courts that have reached a like decision); Clement v. Occidental Chem. Corp., 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12387, *19, 1994 WL 479155, *11-20 (E.D. La. 1994) (examining the legislative history to find that the Act does not weaken the Zahn doctrine); Leung v. Checker Motors Corp., 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17174, *5, 1993 WL 515470, *2 (N.D. Ill. 1993) ("Although this provision does not directly [20] address the issue of supplemental jurisdiction over original plaintiffs whose claims do not meet the jurisdictional requirements, . . . the implication is that plaintiffs without an independent ticket of entry to federal court should not be able to get into federal court by "piggybacking" onto other claims which do satisfy the jurisdictional requirements."); Griffin v. Dana Point Condominium Ass'n, 768 F. Supp. 1299, 1301-02 & n.4 (N.D. Ill. 1991) ("a close look at both the language of the statute and its legislative history teaches that the new provision does not change the old law in this area at all.").

[22] Furthermore, it is evident that the plain language of subsection (a) is entirely consistent with Zahn. Through the incorporation of the language "or as expressly provided otherwise by federal statute", Congress specifically included as an exception to § 1367 (a) any other federal statute, including § 1332 (and its most relevant judicial interpretations Zahn and Snyder) (emphasis added). Despite references to diversity jurisdiction and § 1332, and with full knowledge of the Supreme Court's long-standing interpretation of that language, nowhere in the Act did Congress change the language of § 1332. In choosing once again to keep the language of § 1332 in its original form, Congress reaffirmed the Supreme Court's historical treatment of the language "matter in controversy".

Taking into account the plain language of § 1367, the purpose of the Act (as expressed in the legislative history), and the fact that Congress has raised the amount in controversy limit steadily over the years, without [*717] ever indicating that the Supreme Court's interpretation of the "matter in controversy" in class actions was contrary to Congressional intent, the Court finds no basis for [23] holding that Zahn has been legislatively overruled. Therefore, the Court, unpersuaded by Defendant Staley's arguments, must follow the established rule that in a class action involving separate and distinct claims, every member must satisfy the requirements of § 1332 in order for a federal court to exercise diversity jurisdiction over the entire class action.¹³

Defendant Staley argues that the amount in controversy requirement can be met for the named Plaintiffs in these cases by attributing all the attorneys' fees to them. Defendant Staley suggests that the Court should be persuaded on this issue by the Fifth Circuit's reasoning in Abbott, 51 F.3d at 526. This argument directly contradicts Ninth Circuit authority holding that attorney's fees must be attributed to each member on a pro rata basis, and more specifically that attorneys' fees cannot be aggregated for jurisdictional purposes. Goldberg v. CPC Int'l, Inc., 678 F.2d 1365, 1366-67 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 945 (1982); Czechowski v. Tandy Corp., 731 F. Supp. 406, 409-10 (N.D. Cal. 1990).

[24] b. Common and Undivided Interest

HN7 While the general rule is that claims cannot be aggregated in order to satisfy the amount in controversy requirement, there is a long-recognized exception to this rule. When parties have a "common and undivided" interest, claims can be aggregated to satisfy the amount in controversy requirement. Zahn, 414 U.S. at 293; Snyder, 394 U.S. at 334. Staley asserts that punitive damages are the "common and undivided" interest of all members of the class, and should therefore be aggregated to establish the necessary amount in controversy.

The Ninth Circuit has stated that claims are properly aggregated only when the claims "derive from rights which [the plaintiffs] hold in group status." Potrero Hill Community Action Comm. v. Housing Authority, 410 F.2d 974 \(9th Cir. 1969\); see also Eagle v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 769 F.2d 541 \(9th Cir. 1985\), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1084, 89 L. Ed. 2d 721, 106 S. Ct. 1465 (1986); United States v. Southern Pac. Trans. Co., 543 F.2d 676 \(9th Cir. 1976\); Snow v. Ford Motor Co., 561 F.2d 787 \(9th Cir. 1977\). In Potrero, the Ninth Circuit held that because each Plaintiff's rights [25] arose from the contract between each plaintiff and the Housing Authority, their rights were individual rather than common and undivided. Potrero, at 978. Potrero is analogous to the facts before the Court in this case: here, each member of the class derives his or her claim from individual purchases of corn syrup. The Ninth Circuit has further stated that even though plaintiffs' claims may present common questions of law and fact, if the statute authorizing the cause of action bestows the right on the individual, not the group, then plaintiffs' claims arise from their individual rights rather than their group status. Southern Pacific, 543 F.2d at 683. See also Kasky v. Perrier Group of America, Inc., 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21177, 1991 WL 577038 \(S.D. Cal. 1991\) (reaffirming the validity of the Ninth Circuit's opinion in Southern Pacific).

HN8 In addition to establishing a public cause of action (enforced by the State Attorney General), the Cartwright Act gives a private right to sue for damages and treble damages to each person who suffers harm. West's Ann. Cal.Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 16750 et seq. (1987). The plain language of the Cartwright Act demonstrates that the California legislature [26] intended to vindicate individual rights through private causes of action.¹⁴ Therefore, each purchaser of corn syrup could theoretically sue individually for treble damages under the Cartwright Act.

Furthermore, in order to determine whether the claims may be aggregated, the [*718] Court must first characterize the claim under the law in the state that creates the cause of action. Eagle, 769 F.2d 541. Defendant asserts that the Court should find persuasive the reasoning of a Fifth Circuit case that finds that punitive damages are a common and undivided interest. See Allen v. R & H Oil & Gas Co., 63 F.3d 1326, 1995 WL 509350 \(5th Cir. 1995\). In Allen, the Fifth Circuit stated that under Mississippi law, 1) punitive damages are fundamentally collective; 2) the nature of punitive damages is to punish the wrongdoer and to protect society; 3) the benefits are meant [27] to accrue to society; 4) because it is within the discretion of the judge or jury to award or withhold them, plaintiffs do not have a claim of right to punitive damages; and, that this unique nature of punitive damages requires:

"that the full amount of alleged damages be counted against each plaintiff in determining the jurisdictional amount. As punitive damages are collective awards, each plaintiff has an integrated right to the full amount of the award."

Allen v. R & H Oil & Gas Co., 63 F.3d at 1333, 1995 WL 509350, at *4 (5th Cir. 1995). California law attributes those same qualities to punitive damages. See Chronicle Publishing Co. v Legrand, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20225, 1992 WL 420808 \(N.D. Cal. 1992\) (discussing and summarizing California law on punitive damages).

Staley asserts that Goldberg is no longer sound authority due to the Goldberg court's reliance on Zahn. As discussed above, Zahn is still good authority; therefore, so is Goldberg. Because the Court finds the doctrine of Zahn to be unaffected by the Act, thereby erasing any grounds for the extension of supplemental jurisdiction in this case, Defendant Staley's arguments on the subject of attorneys' fees are irrelevant.

¹⁴ The Cartwright Act provides for group rights through the public cause of action. West's Ann. Cal.Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 16750 et seq. (1987).

However, in the cases before the Court, the Plaintiffs seek only the treble damages authorized in the Cartwright Act. Plaintiffs do not seek "punitive damages."¹⁵ While treble damages are punitive in nature, and therefore a portion of the Fifth Circuit's discussion of punitive damages would apply to them with equal force, the Cartwright Act gives plaintiffs a specific right to these damages. The fact that treble damages [28] are guaranteed distinguishes the instant case from the Fifth Circuit case, in which punitives were left to the discretion of the court or jury. Here, each individual plaintiff could sue for treble damages independently. This differentiates the instant case from the Fifth Circuit's holding in Allen.

In addition, even if the Court [29] were to analogize treble damages to punitive damages, the Ninth Circuit has not ruled on the issue of whether punitive damages constitute a common and undivided interest, and the district courts that have addressed the subject are split in their decisions. A case from the Northern District of California held that punitive damages are a common and undivided interest that could be used to satisfy the amount in controversy requirement. However, the district court also held that jurisdiction was proper on an alternative ground. See In re: Northern Dist. of California "Dalkon Shield" IUD Products Liability Litigation, 526 F. Supp. 887 (N.D. Cal. 1981).¹⁶ However, the Court is reluctant to be guided by the Northern District court's reasoning because that court based its punitive damages holding on Berman v. Narragansett Racing Association, Inc., 414 F.2d 311 (1st Cir. 1969). The Ninth Circuit specifically disapproved Berman, stating that it had probably been overruled by Zahn. United States v. Southern Pacific Trans. Co., 543 F.2d 676, 683 (9th Cir. 1976).

[30] Moreover, district courts in the Central and Southern Districts of California have held that members of a class do not have a common and undivided interest in punitive [*719] damages. See Smiley v. Citibank (South Dakota), NA., 863 F. Supp. 1156 (C.D. Cal. 1993) (Credit cardholder brought putative class action in state court seeking damages and injunctive relief against credit card issuer, alleging that issuer's practice of charging late fees violated California law); Kasky v. Perrier Group of America, Inc., 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21177, 1991 WL 577038 (S.D. Cal. 1991) (Class action brought against Perrier on allegations of misrepresentation through advertising and product labelling).

Because of the difference in nature between punitive damages and the treble damages involved in this case, the Court is not inclined to accept the reasoning of the Allen court. Further, even if one were to analogize treble damages to punitive damages, the Court still concludes that treble damages cannot be aggregated for the purposes of the amount in controversy requirement. The treble damages in these cases must be attributed pro rata to each member of the classes for the purposes of determining if the amount in controversy [31] requirement has been met.

Nowhere in the Complaints, the Notices of Removal, or in Defendant Staley's Response to the OSC is it alleged that each individual class member has a claim, including treble damages and attorneys' fees, that exceeds $ 50,000. Rather, in asserting diversity jurisdiction as a basis for removal jurisdiction, Defendant Staley relies on the above theories to either change the amount in controversy requirement or to consider the treble or punitive damages as a "common and undivided" interest. Having found neither of Defendant's theories persuasive, the

¹⁶ It has been argued that the Ninth Circuit impliedly gave its approval to the Northern District court's reasoning, but when the Ninth Circuit vacated and remanded that decision, the Ninth Circuit said only that the district court asserted "jurisdiction on the basis of diversity of citizenship" without stating whether jurisdiction was proper and if so, on which of the two (2) alternative grounds. In re: Northern Dist. of California "Dalkon Shield" IUD Products Liability Litigation, 693 F.2d 847, 849 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1171 (1983).

Court finds that Plaintiff fails to satisfy the amount in controversy requirement. The Court therefore has no jurisdiction over these cases.

IV. Conclusion

For all of these reasons, the Court hereby REMANDS these cases to state court.

HN2 [] Ripeness, Tests for Ripeness

Questions of ripeness turn on the fitness of the issues for judicial decisions and the hardship to the parties of withholding consideration. The ripeness inquiry involves a balancing of the interests of the party seeking relief from an alleged or perceived injury with the court's interest in postponing review until the question arises in a more concrete fashion. Ripeness issues, by their very nature, require a subtle and subjective assessment.

[*143] MEMORANDUM OPINION

This case comes before the court on remand from the Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. On August 17, 1990, Harold D. Johnson, M.D., an African-American obstetrician-gynecologist, filed a discrimination lawsuit in this court against Greater Southeast Community Hospital of Washington, D.C. ("Greater Southeast" or "Hospital") as well as some individually named defendants. In his complaint, Dr. Johnson set forth a number of antitrust, civil rights, and tort claims involving defendants' alleged conspiracy to terminate his Medical Staff membership and patient privileges at Greater Southeast, Johns Hopkins Health Plan ("Johns Hopkins"), United Health Services, and Columbia Hospital for Women Medical Center ("Columbia Hospital") because of his race. Complete dismissal of this case without prejudice was granted by Judge Revercomb on December 12, 1990. The court ruled that none of Dr. [2] Johnson's claims were ripe for adjudication because Dr. Johnson had not been officially terminated by Greater Southeast.¹ On December 13, 1991, the D.C. Circuit reversed the dismissal and remanded the case for additional fact-finding on the issue whether plaintiff's membership and privileges had been terminated. Johnson v. Greater Southeast Community Hosp. Corp., 293 U.S. App. D.C. 1, 951 F.2d 1268, 1273 \(D.C. Cir. 1991\). This court was further instructed to consider plaintiff's claims in the event that they were cured of any ripeness defect. The court now addresses the issues presented on remand.

I.

BACKGROUND

Harold D. Johnson, M.D., is a board-certified physician who specializes in obstetrics and gynecology. His relationship with Greater Southeast Community Hospital began with his appointment to the Active Medical Staff of the Hospital in 1981. In addition to Staff membership, the appointment provided Dr. Johnson [3] with hospital privileges that permitted him to present his patients for hospitalization and treatment at Greater Southeast. From 1981 until 1988, Dr. Johnson applied for, and was granted, reappointment to the Active Medical Staff and continued hospital privileges without limitation. In January 1989, however, the Chairman of the Hospital's Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology, Victor Nelson, M.D., reported to the Medical Staff Executive Committee ("MSEC") that he had become aware of some issues related to the quality of health care being received by Dr. Johnson's patients. The MSEC established a six-member ad hoc committee to investigate Dr. Johnson's practice.

The MSEC completed its investigation on August 14, 1989 and concluded that Dr. Johnson should be subjected to "a severe reprimand, focused review, [and] concurrent monitoring and supervision of surgical cases for a minimum of 24 months." Johnson v. Greater Southeast Community Hosp. Corp., 903 F. Supp. 140, Memorandum Opinion ("Mem. Op.") at 4 (D.D.C. Dec. 12, 1990). Three days later, the Medical Staff President, Odell [*144] McCants, M.D., notified Dr. Johnson that the MSEC's recommendation would be reviewed by the Hospital [4] Board of Directors, but that in the meantime, the MSEC had placed Dr. Johnson on summary suspension.

An informal hearing before the MSEC to discuss the summary suspension issue was held on August 21, 1989. At the hearing, the MSEC asked Dr. Johnson if he would be willing to accept the MSEC's recommendation for close monitoring and supervision. Dr. Johnson indicated that he would, and signed an agreement setting forth the terms of the monitoring and supervision program on August 23, 1989. Following the signing of the agreement, the MSEC rescinded Dr. Johnson's summary suspension. After further review and approval of the MSEC's actions by both the Hospital Board of Directors and the Board's Quality Assurance Committee, the Board of Directors convened to render a final decision regarding Dr. Johnson's case on October 19 and 23, 1989. At some point during September 1989, Dr. Johnson submitted an application to Greater Southeast for reappointment to the Active Medical Staff for the 1990-91 cycle. The Hospital took no action on the reappointment application.

During the October meetings, the Board considered two courses of action. The first option considered was to retain Dr. Johnson on [5] the Medical Staff subject to the 24-month monitoring and supervision program. The Board, however, chose to exercise the second option of terminating Dr. Johnson's membership and medical privileges altogether. Nevertheless, Dr. Johnson was allowed to continue his practice subject to the monitoring and supervision agreement while he pursued any hearing or appeal rights pursuant to the Hospital's by-laws. On October 24, 1989, the President of the Hospital, Thomas Chapman, informed Dr. Johnson of the Board's decision to terminate his privileges, and indicated that Dr. Johnson would have forty-five days in which to request a formal hearing. Chapman also conveyed to Dr. Johnson the Board's determination that "pending your decision concerning a formal hearing, and during any hearing proceedings, your Medical Staff membership and privileges may continue under the monitoring agreement you signed on August 23, 1989." Id. at 6.

Dr. Johnson requested a formal hearing on the matter. Kurt Darr was appointed Hearing Officer, and hearings were conducted on February 15 and 16, 1990. The hearings were scheduled to resume on March 22, 1990. On March 21, 1990, Dr. Johnson filed an action for breach [6] of contract against Darr in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, alleging that Darr's decision, in his capacity as Hearing Officer, to permit the Hospital to call an independent expert witness violated the Hospital's bylaws. Dr. Johnson's request for immediate injunctive relief was denied, and the hearing continued on the next day as planned. However, the case against Darr remained pending in Superior Court.

The final day of hearings was scheduled for April 5, 1990. However, Darr notified the parties on April 4 that he would not complete the hearing until the lawsuit in Superior Court was resolved. On April 18, 1995, Dr. Johnson served each member of the Hospital Board of Directors with a brief requesting that the Board reconsider its decision to terminate his Medical Staff membership and privileges. The Board voted to refrain from making any final decision regarding Dr. Johnson's status at the Hospital until the completion of the hearings and the filing of the Hearing Officer's report.

On May 8, 1990, the Superior Court dismissed Dr. Johnson's lawsuit against Darr as unripe. Darr nevertheless refused to continue the administrative proceedings until the parties stipulated [7] that the proceedings were covered by the immunity provisions of the Health Care Quality Improvement Act of 1986, 42 U.S.C.A. § 11111 \(1988\) ("HCQIA"). Although the Hospital agreed to stipulate, Dr. Johnson refused. Darr subsequently resigned as Hearing Officer on August 2, 1990.

Prior to Darr's formal resignation Dr. Johnson applied for reappointment to the Courtesy Staff of Columbia Hospital. As part of the reviewing procedure, Columbia Hospital requested that Greater Southeast forward copies of the patient histories at issue during Greater Southeast's investigation of Dr. Johnson's practice along with a [*145] questionnaire completed by Dr. Nelson. Dr. Johnson submitted Columbia Hospital's request to Dr. Nelson by certified mail. According to Dr. Johnson, Dr. Nelson failed to respond promptly, which resulted in the temporary suspension of his privileges at Columbia Hospital.

On August 10, 1990, Greater Southeast contacted Dr. Johnson through counsel to determine how he wished to proceed in light of the Hearing Officer's resignation. The Hospital proposed that the existing hearing record be submitted to the Board so that the Board might make a final determination as to Dr. Johnson's status [8] at Greater Southeast. Dr. Johnson responded by filing this lawsuit on August 17, 1990.

In his complaint, Dr. Johnson alleged a number of antitrust, civil rights, and tort violations.² Dr. Johnson's antitrust claims are all rooted in the allegation that the Hospital and certain named defendants conspired to remove him from the existing market of obstetricians by: (1) terminating his Medical Staff membership and privileges at Greater Southeast; (2) precluding him from gaining privileges at Johns Hopkins and United Health Services; and (3) interfering with his reappointment at Columbia Hospital. Dr. Johnson maintained that these actions constituted a clear restraint on trade and commerce in inpatient obstetrical services in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2 \(1988\), and the comparable provisions of the District of Columbia Code, D.C. Code Ann. §§ 28-4502, 28-4503 (1981).

² Dr. Johnson's claims were filed against Greater Southeast as well as individually named defendants. At the time of the filing of the complaint, plaintiff had separated the individually named defendants into two classes. The first class -- "Individual Non-Medical Defendants" -- included: Thomas Chapman, President of the Greater Southeast Community Hospital; Raymond Turner, M.D., President for Medical Affairs; Mary Lou Meyers, Vice President and General Counsel of Greater Southeast. Complaint P 12. The second class of defendants -- "Individual Medical Defendants" -- included: Mahmood Mohamadi, M.D., Chairman of the Credentials Committee and member of the Hospital Board of Directors; Odell McCants, M.D., President of the Medical Staff; Victor Nelson, M.D. Chairman of the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology; William R. Coyle, M.D., member of the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology; and Gail Van Wingerden, M.D., member the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology. Complaint P 14. One final defendant -- Edward Hinman, member of the Hospital Board of Directors -- was not classified. Complaint P 13.

Since the initiation of this suit, plaintiff's claims against Mr. Darr, Dr. Mohamadi, and Dr. Van Wingerden have been dismissed. Plaintiff's antitrust claims remain pending against Greater Southeast and all remaining defendants. Complaint PP 43, 47, 50. Plaintiff's civil rights were originally filed and remain pending against Greater Southeast, and individual defendants Chapman, Turner, Mayers, Hinman, McCants, and Nelson. Complaint PP 56, 61. Plaintiff's claim of tortious inducement to breach was originally filed and remains pending only against defendant Hinman. Complaint P 67.

[9] Dr. Johnson also alleged a series of civil rights violations. Dr. Johnson claimed that the defendants refused to contract with him on racially neutral grounds, in violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, 42 U.S.C. § 1981 and the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1985. In addition, Dr. Johnson claimed that the defendants unlawfully discriminated against him in the terms, conditions, and privileges of his employment, in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e and the District of Columbia Human Rights Act, D.C. Code § 1-2512 (1981), by their refusal to grant him unrestricted Medical Staff membership and hospital privileges, and their failure to act on his 1989 reappointment application.

Finally, Dr. Johnson claimed that Dr. Edward Hinman, the principal advocate for termination of Dr. Johnson's membership and privileges at Greater Southeast, violated the common law of the District of Columbia when he tortiously induced the Hospital to breach its appointment contract with him by terminating his Staff membership and hospital privileges.

Defendants first moved for dismissal and, in the alternative, for summary judgment on all of Dr. Johnson's [10] claims primarily on the grounds that the claims were not ripe for adjudication because the Hospital had not completed its administrative termination proceedings. Dr. Johnson then moved for summary judgment on the civil rights claims, arguing that the defendants had failed to [*146] meet the burden of articulating a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason that would explain their collective actions against him. The district court denied plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on his civil rights claims and granted defendant's motion to dismiss all claims based on a finding that "because plaintiff's privileges and membership at the hospital remain intact, subject to the monitoring program agreed to by the plaintiff, the plaintiff has suffered no injury which is ripe for judicial consideration at this time under either antitrust law, civil rights law, or in tort." ³ Mem. Op., at 10.

[11] Dr. Johnson appealed the dismissal of his lawsuit and the denial of his motion for partial summary judgment on the civil rights claims. The D.C. Circuit reversed this court's dismissal of Dr. Johnson's case and remanded it for additional fact-finding on the issue whether Dr. Johnson's membership and privileges were in fact terminated at the time of the appeal. The court also instructed this court to consider any of Dr. Johnson's claims that did not suffer a ripeness defect.⁴

II.

DISCUSSION

A. Ripeness: Antitrust Claims

The Court of Appeals remanded the case to the district court for "additional fact-finding on the key jurisdictional fact of whether appellant's Medical Staff membership and privileges at the Hospital have been terminated." See Johnson, 951 F.2d at 1273. [12] The D.C. Circuit was concerned that plaintiff's privileges, although intact at the time of the court's dismissal of plaintiff's case, might have terminated with the expiration of the monitoring and supervising agreement. "If they have, [plaintiff's] claims of injury stemming from his termination no longer suffer any ripeness defect and the court should go on to consider them on the merits." Id. (footnote omitted). The D.C. Circuit held that plaintiff's civil rights claims did not suffer any ripeness defect and instructed the court to proceed directly with consideration of these claims. However, the court reserved judgment as to the ripeness of defendant's antitrust claims. This court therefore begins with an inquiry into whether plaintiff's antitrust claims still suffer a ripeness defect.

HN1[¹] Questions of ripeness "go to the power of the federal courts to entertain disputes, and to the wisdom of their doing so." Renne v. Geary, 501 U.S. 312, 316, 115 L. Ed. 2d 288, 111 S. Ct. 2331 (1991). In Abbott Lab. v. Gardner, 387 U.S. 136, 18 L. Ed. 2d 681, 87 S. Ct. 1507 (1967), the Supreme Court set forth a practical formula for the resolution of ripeness questions. According to [13] the Court, HN2[¹] questions of ripeness turn on "the fitness of the issues for judicial decisions" and "the hardship to the parties of withholding consideration." Id. at 149. The ripeness inquiry involves a balancing of the interests of the party seeking relief from an alleged or perceived injury with the court's interest in postponing review until the question arises in a more concrete fashion. Ripeness issues, by their very nature, require a subtle and subjective assessment. As the D.C. Circuit noted in Continental Airlines, Inc. v. Civil Aeronautics Bd., 173 U.S. App. D.C. 1, 522 F.2d 107 (D.C. Cir. 1975) "The law of ripeness, once a tangle of special rules and legalistic distinctions, is now very much a matter of common sense." 522 F.2d at 124. The court went on to remark: "We do not pretend that the science of assessing an issue's ripeness is an exact one." Id. at 128.

The ripeness doctrine derives ultimately from the requirement in Article III of the United States Constitution that federal courts decide only cases and controversies. As the D.C. Circuit aptly pointed out in DKT [*147] Memorial Fund Ltd. v. Agency for Int'l Dev., 281 U.S. App. D.C. 47, 887 F.2d 275 (D.C. Cir. [14] 1989), HN3[¹] "the question of ripeness goes to our subject matter jurisdiction" 887 F.2d at 298 (quoting Duke City Lumber Co. v. Butz, 176 U.S. App. D.C. 218, 539 F.2d 220, 221 n.2 (D.C. Cir. 1976)). If a claim is unripe, federal courts lack subject matter jurisdiction and the complaint must be dismissed. See S. Pac. Transp. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 922 F.2d 498, 502 (9th Cir. 1991). HN4[¹] The question of ripeness is of such importance that federal courts are required to raise it sua sponte even though the parties do not. See, e.g., Nationwide Mut. Ins. Co. v. Cisneros, 52 F.3d 1351, 1361 (6th 1995) Cinel v. Connick, 15 F.3d 1338, 1341 (5th Cir. 1994); Acierno v. Mitchell, 6 F.3d 970, 974 (3rd Cir. 1993); Volvo N. Amer. Corp. v. Men's Int'l Prof. Tennis Council, 857 F.2d 55, 63 (2nd Cir. 1988).

There is clear precedent for dismissal of antitrust claims on ripeness grounds. See, e.g., Unity Ventures v. Lake County, 841 F.2d 770 (7th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 891, 102 L. Ed. 2d 216, 109 S. Ct. 226 (1988); Suburban Trails, Inc. v. New Jersey Transit Corp., 800 F.2d 361 (3rd Cir. 1986); United States Steel Workers v. U.S. Steel Corp., 492 F. Supp. 1 (N.D. Ohio 1980). [15] Furthermore, there is considerable precedent for dismissal of antitrust claims where the plaintiff has commenced a suit in federal court prior to completion of a hospital's internal peer review procedures. In Cooper v. Amster, 645 F. Supp. 46 (E.D. Pa. 1986), aff'd, 845 F.2d 1010 (3rd Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 852, 102 L. Ed. 2d 110, 109 S. Ct. 138 (1988), a physician claimed that two hospitals and three physicians violated § 1 of the Sherman Act by failing to refer emergency patients to him. The court, in dismissing plaintiff's action for lack of jurisdiction, stated: "It is little enough to ask that plaintiff get a definitive no from the hospital before he comes to court for an injunction, treble damages, and the whole panoply of Sherman Act relief." Id. at 47. In Colorado Chiropractic Council v. Porter Memorial Hosp., 650 F. Supp. 231 (D. Colo. 1986), a group of chiropractors and several hospitals demanded $ 20 million in damages under antitrust laws for defendant's failure to grant them hospital privileges. The court dismissed plaintiff's claim as "remote and speculative and not ripe for adjudication." Id. at 236. Similarly, in Hendrix v. Poonai, [16] 662 F.2d 719 (11th Cir. 1988), hospital officials sought a declaratory judgment that the hospital would be immune from antitrust claims if it were to deny a physician's pending application for readmission to staff membership. In affirming the district court's dismissal of the claim, the Eleventh Circuit noted that "in this case, the federal courts can become involved, if at all, only after the decision is made to deny Dr. P.V. Poonai's readmission application." Id. at 722.

In the judgment of this court, plaintiff's antitrust claims simply are not ripe for review. Plaintiff asserts that he was injured by the termination of his hospital membership and privileges. However, there is no evidence that plaintiff's membership and privileges have in fact been terminated. It is undisputed that as of August 23, 1989, plaintiff retained his Active Medical Staff membership and full hospital privileges at Greater Southeast, subject only to administrative monitoring and supervision of his surgical cases as set forth in the agreement signed by the plaintiff on that day. It is equally undisputed that immediately before and during the arbitration hearing, Dr. Johnson retained his Medical Staff [17] membership and privileges. Plaintiff was notified by the President of the Hospital of the Board's determination that "pending your decision concerning a formal hearing, and during any hearing proceedings, your Medical Staff membership may continue under the monitoring agreement you signed on August 23, 1989." Letter of Thomas Chapman to Plaintiff of Oct. 24, 1989 (emphasis added). Plaintiff displayed similar knowledge of his continuing privileges in his request for an arbitration hearing: "This notice is submitted with the understanding that Dr. Johnson will retain his medical privileges at the Greater Southeast Community Hospital until such time as the termination proceedings are concluded and there has been a final decision on the proposed termination." Letter from Plaintiff to Thomas Chapman of Dec. 6, 1989. The arbitration hearing in which the termination issue was being discussed [*148] stalled midstream with the resignation of the Hearing Officer, Kurt Darr. No official recommendation was made by Darr as to whether plaintiff's membership and privileges should or should not be terminated. In the absence of a definitive recommendation, the Hospital Board of Directors has refused [18] to make a final decision to terminate Dr. Johnson's membership and privileges. It is clear, then, that plaintiff's Medical Staff membership and hospital privileges remain in effect.

Plaintiff contends that his Staff membership and hospital privileges expired by operation of law on August 23, 1991 when the Hospital failed to grant or deny his application for reappointment to the Medical Staff within the 120-day period prescribed by D.C. Code Ann. § 32-1307(f) (1981) following the termination of the monitoring and supervision agreement. Plaintiff's argument, however, misconstrues the statutory provision. Nowhere does § 32-1307(f) indicate, let alone suggest, that a health professional's staff membership or clinical privileges automatically terminate following the expiration of the 120-day period. Section 32-1307(f) regulates appointment applications and the speed at which applications for reappointment are to be acted upon. The provision imposes on the hospital an obligation to act on an application within 120 days. To invoke § 32-1307(f), plaintiff must submit an application for reappointment and provide evidence that the hospital failed to act on the application within 120 days. [19] Following the expiration of the 120-day period, plaintiff would be able to file suit under the statute to enforce hospital review of the pending application, and, if successful, plaintiff would be entitled to an appointment to the Medical Staff.

Section 32-1307(f) appears wholly inapplicable to the present proceedings. HN5[¹⁵] The expiration of plaintiff's monitoring and supervision agreement with the hospital cannot be said to trigger § 32-1307(f). When plaintiff's monitoring and supervision agreement expired, plaintiff returned to full and unencumbered membership and privilege status. In accordance with the letter sent by the President of the Hospital, plaintiff's membership and privileges were intended to remain at this level until the termination of the administrative proceedings. The court therefore finds that plaintiff's Medical Staff membership and privileges were terminated neither by administrative proceeding nor by operation of law.

The gravamen of Dr. Johnson's alleged injury is that he was unable to present patients for treatment at the hospital. Dr. Johnson has provided no evidence whatsoever that this ever occurred. At no point has Dr. Johnson indicated that he presented a [20] patient for treatment that was summarily turned away from Greater Southeast. HN6[¹⁶] Where a physician officially retains his hospital privileges and, consequently, his ability to admit patients to the hospital, the physician cannot sustain a claim of injury based solely on the allegation that he would not be permitted to exercise his privileges if he had wished to do so. Plaintiff must do more than speculate. At a minimum, plaintiff must show some failed attempt to exercise his privileges. Dr. Johnson never presented a patient for treatment at the Greater Southeast during this period. Had Dr. Johnson done so, and been unable to secure the patient's admittance to the hospital, there is little doubt that this would constitute actionable harm. However, the court will not infer injury in the absence of such an evidentiary showing. Since plaintiff still has the ability to admit patients to the hospital, the significance of the antitrust claims in terms of actual damages or ability to prove damages evaporates. In light of plaintiff's failure to make a sufficient showing of injury, the court finds plaintiff's antitrust claims unripe for review and therefore not justiciable in federal court. Accordingly, [21] plaintiff's antitrust claims under the

Sherman Act, with respect to his Staff membership and hospital privileges as Greater Southeast, shall be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.⁵

Plaintiff also alleged that defendants conspired to preclude his membership in the [*149] Johns Hopkins Health Plan and United Health Services, and to interfere with his application to the Courtesy Staff at Columbia Hospital. The D.C. Circuit correctly pointed out that if plaintiff were able to prove such a conspiracy, plaintiff would be entitled to damages under § 4 of the Clayton Act, regardless of whether plaintiff's membership and privileges had been terminated at Greater Southeast. See Johnson, 951 F.2d at 1275.

HN7 Plaintiff bears the burden of pleading and proving [22] an illegal conspiracy under the Sherman Act. To do so, plaintiff must: (1) demonstrate that each defendant made a conscious commitment to an illegal conspiracy; (2) present competent evidence that each defendant took acts in furtherance of that conspiracy; and (3) make a showing that the conspiracy was the proximate cause of antitrust injury to the plaintiff. See Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 \(1986\); Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 \(1984\); Cooper v. Forsyth County Hosp. Auth., Inc., 789 F.2d 278 \(4th Cir. 1985\), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 972, 93 L. Ed. 2d 418, 107 S. Ct. 474 (1986).

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that defendants conspired to preclude his membership from Johns Hopkins and United Health Services. In July 1989, Greater Southeast entered into an exclusive agreement with Johns Hopkins to provide in-patient services to the Plan's subscribers in the District of Columbia. At the same time, Greater Southeast entered into a separate agreement with United Health Services, an affiliate of Greater Southeast, to offer prepaid health care [23] services to members of Johns Hopkins. In September 1989, plaintiff's applications for membership in the Johns Hopkins and in United Health Services were denied on quality of patient care grounds.

The D. C. Circuit construed plaintiff's pleadings on this matter as alleging a separate conspiracy -- that is, in addition to conspiring to preclude plaintiff's membership and privileges from Greater Southeast, defendants also conspired to prevent plaintiff from being able to contract with Johns Hopkins and United Health Services. Plaintiff's pleadings, however, plainly indicate that the allegations regarding Johns Hopkins and United Health Services were intended to serve as examples of acts "in furtherance of said combination and conspiracy [to boycott plaintiff from maintaining Medical Staff membership and privileges at Greater Southeast]" and were not intended to allege a separate conspiracy. Complaint P 45. Plaintiff therefore did not allege a separate antitrust claim regarding Johns Hopkins and United Health Services, but rather supported his existing antitrust claims with evidence of the denial of his application to these two Plans. The court, however, has dismissed as unripe [24] the antitrust claims that this evidence was intended to support. Accordingly, the court need not consider the evidence of the denial of plaintiff's applications any further.

It should be noted, however, that if plaintiff had intended alleged a separate conspiracy, he has provided little, if any, evidence in support of it. Plaintiff provided no evidence that any defendant made a conscious commitment to such a conspiracy. Moreover, plaintiff made no showing that defendants' conduct was linked in any way to the Johns Hopkins and United Health Services appointment decisions. In fact, plaintiff fails to allege that defendant engaged in any conduct whatsoever with respect to Johns Hopkins and the United Health Services. The court therefore finds in the alternative that, if plaintiff's allegations regarding the appointment decisions made by Johns Hopkins and United Health Services were intended to constitute a separate antitrust claim, defendants would be entitled to summary judgment because plaintiff failed to make a sufficient showing that defendants in fact conspired to preclude plaintiff from obtaining membership in Johns Hopkins and United Health Services.

Plaintiff also alleged in [25] his complaint that defendants conspired to interfere with defendant's application for reappointment at Columbia Hospital. According to plaintiff, the Credentials Committee of Columbia Hospital asked plaintiff to secure a completed [*150] questionnaire from the Chief of Obstetrics and Gynecology at each hospital at which he had privileges. Plaintiff provided the questionnaire to defendant Nelson and alleges that defendant Nelson failed to return the questionnaire in a timely fashion. Plaintiff contends that he suffered antitrust injury as a result.

The facts, as set forth in plaintiff's complaint, fail to properly allege an antitrust conspiracy. As an initial matter, it is unclear under plaintiff's recitation of the facts whether any other defendants conspired with Dr. Nelson to delay Dr. Nelson's response. Plaintiff provided no evidence that the other defendants were aware of Dr. Nelson's conduct or that each of them had made conscious commitment to support Dr. Nelson in that regard. Moreover, plaintiff's alleged conspiracy implicated the conduct of only one of the defendants. Plaintiff made his request to the Chief of the Obstetrics and Gynecology department, and it was the Chief of the [26] department that delayed in his response. Plaintiff simply has not demonstrated that any defendant other than Dr. Nelson engaged in conduct in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy. Thus, plaintiff also failed to make a sufficient showing of multiplicity to sustain his conspiracy allegations. Accordingly, the court shall grant defendants' motion for summary judgment dismissing plaintiff's claims involving Columbia Hospital.⁶

[27] B. Civil Rights Claims

Defendants filed a number of dispositive motions during May of 1993, including a motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's civil rights claims.⁷ Thereafter, the parties became mired in discovery disputes. In the meantime, plaintiff filed a motion to stay the briefing schedule so that he could continue discovery. On January 31, 1995, the court denied plaintiff's motion to stay the briefing schedule and advised plaintiff that he would have 30 days from the date of the court's Order in which to file oppositions to defendants' dispositive motions; otherwise, the court would treat defendants' motions as conceded.

The following week, plaintiff filed a motion for reconsideration and for extension of time. Plaintiff's counsel indicated that, due to ongoing and incomplete discovery and the press of litigation [28] in other cases, she would be unable to meet the court ordered filing deadline. In a court Order dated April 12, 1995, the court granted plaintiff's motion to extend the deadline for filing oppositions an additional four months until June 1, 1995. However, the court made clear in the Order that "this date will not be further enlarged." Id.

Despite a clear pronouncement from this court that no additional time to respond would be granted, plaintiff failed to oppose four of defendants' motions for summary judgment by the June 1, 1995 deadline.⁸ On June 2, 1995, plaintiff filed a motion for a trifurcated briefing schedule and an enlargement of time in which to file his opposition. Two weeks later, plaintiff filed a motion for leave to file an opposition to defendants' motion for summary judgment on the civil rights claims, out of time. Plaintiff's counsel reiterated many of the same arguments asserted [*151] in her previous request for extension of time, including the press of litigation in other cases. Plaintiff's counsel also indicated that the briefing schedule set up by the court placed "an unfair burden" upon plaintiff and plaintiff's counsel to require an "instantaneous response" [29] to defendant's motions. Plaintiff's counsel therefore requested leave of court to file plaintiff's oppositions out of time.

⁶ It should be noted that, even if plaintiff's antitrust claims were ripe for adjudication, the court would nevertheless be compelled to grant defendants' motion for summary judgment on all antitrust claims because plaintiff did not oppose any of them, except for defendants' motion for summary judgment on the grounds of HCQIA immunity. Although plaintiff opposed defendants' original motion for summary judgment, which was filed prior to the appeal, plaintiff did not oppose any of defendants' subsequent motions for summary judgment on all antitrust claims filed after the case was remanded to this court for further proceedings. Under local Rule 108(b), a court may treat an unopposed motion for summary judgment as conceded by the non-moving party.

⁸ These four motions were: Motion of Defendants for Summary Judgment on Counts I, II, III, and IV of the Complaint; Motion for Defendants for Summary Judgment on Antitrust Claims For The Absence of Antitrust Injury; Motion of Defendants For Summary Judgment on Civil Rights Claims; and Motion of Defendant Edward J. Hinman, M.D., For Summary Judgment on Count VI.

Plaintiff's contention that the Order required an "instantaneous response" is completely unfounded. All of defendants' motions for summary judgment, including defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's civil rights claims, had been pending before this court for nearly two years when plaintiff's June 1, 1995 due date expired. Plaintiff was served with defendants' motion for summary judgment on the civil rights claims on April 27, 1993, and from that point forward, was in a position to prepare a response. Moreover, even [30] if plaintiff had ignored the defendants' motion when it was served, plaintiff was made aware of the need to respond to the motion five months prior to the June 1, 1995 deadline in the Court's January 31, 1995 Memorandum Opinion.

What is more disturbing about plaintiff's argument, however, is his claim that the June 1, 1995 deadline set forth in the April 12, 1995 Order is "an unfair burden" on plaintiff and plaintiff's counsel. Plaintiff seems to have forgotten that the April 12, 1995 Order granted plaintiff's request for an extension of time, and that the June 1, 1995 due date, which plaintiff now decries as "an unfair burden," was a date selected and requested by plaintiff. In plaintiff's own words:

Plaintiff Harold D. Johnson, M.D., hereby moves this Court for 90-day enlargement of time, to and including June 1 1995, in which to respond to Defendant's motions for summary judgment in this proceeding.

Plaintiff's Feb. 7, 1995 Mot. Enlarg. Time, at 1 (emphasis added). The court's April 12, 1995 Order provided the exact relief sought by plaintiff. It is simply preposterous that plaintiff now claims that this relief is an "unfair burden" imposed on him by [31] this court.

Plaintiff has had more than ample time to prepare oppositions to defendants' dispositive motions, including the motion for summary judgment on civil rights claims. Plaintiff was served with defendants' motion for summary judgment on civil rights claims over two years ago. Since then, plaintiff has had a substantial opportunity to prepare an opposition. Moreover, even if plaintiff had not prepared an opposition before 1995, this court by its January 31, 1995 Order made plaintiff aware of the need to respond to defendants' motion. Furthermore, plaintiff's request for an additional extension until June 1, 1995 to file an opposition to defendants' motion was granted. The latter Order cannot be construed as placing "an unfair burden" on plaintiff now that plaintiff failed to meet his own filing deadline. The court made clear in the Order that no more extensions would be granted. Accordingly, the court shall deny both plaintiff's motion for a trifurcated briefing schedule and enlargement of time, and plaintiff's motion for leave to file out of time an opposition to defendants' motion for summary judgment on civil rights claims.⁹

[32] The court shall grant Defendant's unopposed motion for summary judgment dismissing all civil rights claims as conceded pursuant to local Rule 108(b). Moreover, for the reasons set forth below, the court would be compelled to grant defendants' motion for summary judgment on the civil rights claims even if defendants' motion was not treated as conceded.

1. Claims Under the Civil Rights Acts of 1866 and 1871

Plaintiff alleged that the defendants refused to contract with him on racially neutral grounds, in violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1866, 42 U.S.C. § 1981, and the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1985. Under the facts of this case, however, plaintiff fails to state a claim under either § 1981 or § 1985. The determinative issue with respect to plaintiff's § 1981 claim is whether the defendants' conduct violates federal [*152] rights secured by the Civil Rights Act of 1866, 42 U.S.C. § 1981. HN8 [↑] Section 1981 provides in pertinent part as follows:

Any persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts. . . as is enjoyed by white citizens

Id. at § 1981\(a\). [33] The scope of this provision was recently addressed by the Supreme Court in Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 491 U.S. 164, 105 L. Ed. 2d 132, 109 S. Ct. 2363 \(1989\). In Patterson, a black woman had been employed for 10 years as a teller and file coordinator at a credit union until she was laid off. She then filed a §

1981 lawsuit alleging that her employer harassed her, failed to promote her to the position of accounting clerk, and then discharged her, all due to her race. The Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that racial harassment was not actionable under § 1981 because the provision expressly prohibits discrimination only in the making and enforcement of contracts. The provision does not apply to conduct which occurs after the formation of a contract and which does not interfere with the right to enforce established contractual obligations. See id. at 170. The Court stated:

HNg[↑] The statute prohibits, when based on race, the refusal to enter into a contract with someone, as well as the offer to make a contract, only on discriminatory terms. But the right does not extend, as a matter of either logic or semantics, to conduct by the employer after the contract [34] relation has been established, including breach of the terms of the contract or imposition of discriminatory working conditions. Such postformation conduct does not involve the right to make a contract.

Id. at 176 - 77. The D. C. Circuit expressly adopted the Patterson decision in Gersman v. Group Health Ass'n, Inc., 289 U.S. App. D.C. 332, 931 F.2d 1565 (D.C. Cir. 1991), vacated and remanded, 502 U.S. 1068, 117 L. Ed. 2d 127, 112 S. Ct. 960, aff'd on remand, 975 F.2d 886 (D.C. Cir. 1992).¹⁰ In Gersman, the D.C. Circuit addressed the issue whether allegations of "failure to renew" satisfy a plaintiff's need to demonstrate a "refusal to contract" under § 1981. Plaintiff argued that the parties were free to modify the price term under the existing contract, and defendants' alleged failure to consider a new price structure constituted a refusal to contract under § 1981. The court, however, observed that HN10[↑] § 1981 is only applicable when a new contractual relationship is contemplated. Contract modification, by contrast, is governed by the existing contract. Thus, defendant's actions, which resulted in the termination of the contractual relationship, were not actionable under § 1981. See 931 F.2d at 1573. In dismissing plaintiff's § 1981 claim, the Gersman court stated:

We agree with the majority of Circuits who have held that, under Patterson, HN11[↑] § 1981 does not apply to contract terminations. We find this conclusion appropriate in terms of the language of both § 1981 and the Patterson opinion. The Court was clear in stating that HN12[↑] § 1981 does not apply to conduct which occurs after the formation of a contract and which does not interfere with the right to enforce established contract obligations."

Id. at 1571 (citation omitted).

[36] Dr. Johnson's § 1981 claim is analogous to plaintiff's claim in Gersman. The claim is styled as a refusal "to enter into a contract with plaintiff on racially neutral terms" and a refusal "to allow plaintiff to contract with Defendant Hospital on the same basis as white' physicians were permitted to contract." Complaint, PP 56 and 57. However, it is clear from plaintiff's recital of the facts that the conduct at issue occurred after the formation of plaintiff's appointment contract with Greater Southeast.

Plaintiff alleged that he had a continuing contractual relationship with Greater Southeast for nearly a decade. "From 1981 until 1988, he [plaintiff] applied for, and was [*153] granted, reappointment to the Active Medical Staff without limitation or incident." Complaint P 22. Defendants supposedly violated § 1981 when they modified plaintiff's hospital privileges by requiring him to comply with the monitoring and supervision program and when defendants allegedly failed to take action on plaintiff's 1989 application for reappointment. See Complaint PP 23, 30. However, Defendants' conduct in both instances is clearly postformation, and as such, is simply not actionable [37] under § 1981. Patterson recognized the existence of a new contractual relationship only where there is a "new and distinct relation between employee and the employer." Gersman, 931 F.2d at 1565 (quoting Patterson, supra, 491 U.S. at 185). Plaintiff's relationship with Greater Southeast remained substantially the same as it always existed. His Staff membership and privileges continued, subject only to the two-year monitoring and supervision agreement.

¹⁰ The Supreme Court granted certiorari, but did not reach the merits of the decision. It simply vacated the judgment and remanded the case to the Court of Appeals for consideration of what impact the newly enacted Civil Rights Act of 1991 might have on the decision. In Gersman II, the court affirmed the district court's dismissal of plaintiff's § 1981 claims based on the Patterson decision. 975 F.2d 886, 887 (D.C. Cir. 1992).

Following the expiration of the agreement, plaintiff retained full Staff membership and privileges. At no point did either plaintiff or Greater Southeast consider the signing of the monitoring and supervision agreement to be the creation of a "new" contractual relationship. The court therefore rejects plaintiff's argument that the signing of the monitoring and supervision agreement constitutes a "making" of a new contract under § 1981.

The court also rejects plaintiff's argument that Greater Southeast's alleged refusal to act on plaintiff's application for reappointment is actionable under § 1981. The court in Gersman ruled that HN13 renewals, like postformation modifications, were governed by the existing contract. Accordingly, [\[*38\]](#) the Court held that allegations of failure to renew a contract were not actionable under § 1981. See id. at 1573. The Gersman court is not alone in holding that claims for failure to renew a contract fall outside the scope of § 1981. See, e.g., Artis v. Hitachi Zosen Clearing, Inc., 967 F.2d 1132 (7th Cir. 1992); Hull v. Cuyahoga Valley Joint Vocational School Dist. Bd. of Ed., 926 F.2d 505 (6th Cir. 1991), cert denied, Hull v. Schuck, 501 U.S. 1261, 115 L. Ed. 2d 1080, 111 S. Ct. 2917 (1991); Brereton v. Communications Satellite Corp., 735 F. Supp. 1085 (D.D.C. 1990), appeal dismissed without op., 925 F.2d 488 (D.C. Cir. 1990). Because the substance of the facts alleged in the complaint plainly implicates postformation conduct which is not actionable under § 1981, the court would be compelled to grant defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's § 1981 claims.

Plaintiff also claimed that defendants Conduct violated the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1985. HN14 Section 1985 provides in pertinent part:

If two or more persons . . . conspire . . . for purpose of depriving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons [\[*39\]](#) of equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges and immunities under the laws . . . the party so injured or deprived may have an action for recovery of damages occasioned by such injury or deprivation, against any one or more of the conspirators.

Id. at § 1985(3).¹¹ In Great Amer. Fed. Sav. & Loan Assoc. v. Novotny, 442 U.S. 366, 60 L. Ed. 2d 957, 99 S. Ct. 2345 (1979), the Supreme Court observed that HN15 § 1985\(3\) was a purely remedial in nature, embodying no substantive rights of its own. See id. at 372. Consequently, the claimant must demonstrate that the defendant's conduct violated the rights, privileges, and immunities under the Fourteenth Amendment that § 1985\(3\) was intended to vindicate. In this case, plaintiff asserted that his rights under § 1981 were violated, and that such a violation gives rise to a § 1985 remedy. Plaintiff is correct that HN16 § 1981 a violation of federal rights secured by § 1981 may serve as the basis of a § 1985 claim. See, e.g., Alder v. Columbia Historical Society, 690 F. Supp. 9 (D.D.C. 1988); Thompson v. Int'l Assoc. of Machinists, 580 F. Supp. 662 (D.D.C. 1984). [\[*154\]](#) However, as discussed above, plaintiff failed to state [\[*40\]](#) a claim under § 1981. Furthermore, violations of Title VII, discussed infra, may not be redressed through § 1985. See Novotny, supra, at 378. Plaintiff therefore has not set forth any allegations that would entitle him to the remedy provided by § 1985. Accordingly, the court would be compelled to grant defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's § 1985 claim.

2. Title VII Claim

Plaintiff also alleged that defendants unlawfully discriminated against him in the terms, conditions, and privileges of his employment in violation [\[*41\]](#) of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e, by their refusal to grant him unrestricted Medical Staff membership and hospital privileges and their failure to act on his application for reappointment to the Medical Staff.¹² [\[*42\]](#) Defendants moved for summary judgment with respect to these

(a) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer -- claims on the grounds that Title VII applies only to employment relationships, and no employment relationship has been implicated in this case. Defendants first presented the undisputed fact that at no point was Dr. Johnson ever employed by Greater Southeast.¹³ Defendants went on to argue that the relationship between physician and patient is not one of employment, but more closely aligned to that of an independent contractor. Because no employment relationships were implicated in this case, the defendants urged the court to grant its motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's Title VII claim.

Plaintiff conceded that he had never been employed by Greater Southeast, and therefore was not entitled to employee protection in the traditional sense under Title VII. However, plaintiff argued that Title VII also applies to conduct that interferes with employment relationships like the physician-patient relationship, and that Greater Southeast's conduct interfered with his ability to service his patients. Under this latter theory, plaintiff claims he is entitled to Title VII coverage.

Plaintiff relies principally on the D.C. Circuit's opinion in Sibley Memorial Hosp. v. Wilson, 160 U.S. App. D.C. 14, 488 F.2d 1338 (D.C. Cir. 1973). In Sibley, plaintiff-appellee Wilson, a male private duty nurse, sued Sibley Memorial Hospital for allegedly discriminating against him in violation of Title VII. The plaintiff was not an employee of the hospital, but rather was listed with an independent nurses' registry. Patients at the defendant-hospital who required [43] the services of a private duty nurse would submit a request to a hospital staff person, who would then notify the nurse's registry. The registry matched the request with the name of an available nurse. The nurse would be informed of the assignment and report directly to the patient's room. On two occasions, when the requesting patient was female and Wilson was "matched" by the registry, the hospital's supervisory nurses refused to let him report to the patient. The court, in holding that the relationship between Wilson and Sibley Memorial Hospital was sufficient to bring the case within the ambit of Title VII, stated:

We think it significant that the Act has addressed itself directly to the problems of interference with the direct employment by labor unions and employment agencies-institutions which have not a remote but a highly visible nexus with the creation and continuance of direct employment relationships between third parties.

448 F.2d at 1342. Dr. Johnson argued that the relationship between physician and patient could be similarly characterized as one of employment, and that Medical Staff membership [*155] and privileges at Greater Southeast provide clear employment [44] opportunities for practicing physicians. Dr. Johnson therefore concluded that he was entitled to protection under Title VII because control over the access to such employment opportunities lies squarely in the hands of the Hospital.

Dr. Johnson's attempt to align his claim with the claim upheld in Sibley is not persuasive because, unlike the nurse in Sibley, Dr. Johnson's relationship with his patients is not one of employment. In Spirides v. Reinhardt, 198 U.S. App. D.C. 93, 613 F.2d 826 (D.C. Cir. 1979), the court addressed the question of how employee status is determined under Title VII. Writing for the panel, Judge McGowan reasoned that the determination should turn on an "analysis of the economic realities" of the work relationship." 613 F.2d at 831. Judge McGowan elaborated on this analysis:

This test calls for application of general principles of agency to undisputed or established facts. Consideration of all the circumstances surrounding the work relationship is essential, and no one factor is determinative. Nevertheless, the extent of the employer's right to control the "means and manner" of the worker's performance is the most important factor to review [45] here If an employer has the right to control and direct the work of an individual, not only as to the result achieved, but also as to the details by which that result is achieved, an employer/employee relationship is likely to exist.

(1) to fail or refuse to hire or discharge any individual, or otherwise discriminate against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions or privileges of employment

Id. HN19[] An "employer" is defined in 42 U.S.C. § 2000e(b) as a "person engaged in an industry affecting commerce who has fifteen or more employees" Id. HN20[] An "employee" is simply "an individual employed by an employer. . . ." Id. at § 2000e(f).

¹³ Plaintiff acknowledged in his deposition that he has never been an employee of the Greater Southeast. See Dep. of Plaintiff, p. 481.

Id. at 831 - 32 (footnotes omitted). It is beyond dispute that a patient does not control the "manner and means" of a physician's medical services. The practice of medicine is a highly specialized and skilled occupation. A patient simply cannot exercise the sort of detailed control over the "manner" of a physician's work that is normally found in an employer-employee relationship. The same is true for the "means" by which a physician practices medicine. Patients do not provide the equipment that is used by physicians in treating them. Patients do not provide physicians with the office space and examining rooms in which to practice.

The absence of such control suggest that the relationship between physician and patient is more aptly characterized as an independent contractor relationship. The lack of control over a contracted worker is the distinguishing feature of an independent contractor. According to the Restatement (Second) of [46] Agency (1958), a servant [more recently termed "employee"] is an agent employed by a master to perform service in his affairs whose physical conduct in the performance of the service is controlled or is subject to the right of control by the master." Id. at § 2 (emphasis added). In contrast, HN21¹⁴ an independent contractor is "a person who contracts to work with another to do something for him but who is not controlled by the other nor subject to the other right of control with respect to his physical conduct in the performance of the undertaking." Id. (emphasis added).

An analysis of the physician-patient relationship in light of the other evaluative criteria set forth in Spirides also point decidedly toward an independent contractor relationship. The court indicated that reviewing courts should consider: (1) the kind of occupation, and whether the work is supervised or conducted by a specialist without supervision; (2) the skill required to perform the work; (3) whether the "employer" or individual in question furnishes the equipment used and the place of work; (4) the length of time the person has worked; (5) the method of payment (i.e. by time or by the job); (6) [47] the method by which the work relationship is terminated (i.e. by one or both parties, with or without notification and explanation); (7) whether worker is eligible for annual leave; (8) whether work is an integral part of the "employer's" business; (9) whether the work accumulates retirement benefits; (10) whether the "employer" pays social security taxes; and (11) the intention of the parties. See Spirides, supra, at 832.

HN22¹⁴ An evaluation of the physician-patient relationship under these criteria indicates a classic independent contractor relationship: (1) a physician's work is normally conducted without supervision by the patient; (2) the practice of medicine is a highly skilled and specialized profession; (3) neither the equipment nor the place of work is provided by the patient; (4) a physician's work with respect [*156] to individual patients is usually brief and/or episodic; (5) the method of payment varies with patient and the particular services rendered; (6) the work relationship can be terminated at will by either the patient or the physician; (7) no annual leave is provided by the patient; (8) the services provided by the physician are typically not an integral part of the [48] work of the patient; (9) the patient provides no retirement benefits for the physician; (10) the patient pays no social security taxes; and (11) patients generally do not intend to become a physician's employer. Since plaintiff's status is that of an independent contractor and not an employee, he may not invoke Title VII as a basis for his claim against the Hospital.¹⁴

[49] Moreover, even if the law of agency was such that a physician could be construed as an employee of his patients, it is unclear under the facts of this case whether Greater Southeast's exercise of authority over the allocation of staff membership and hospital privileges at Greater Southeast sufficiently interfered with Dr. Johnson's ability to take on "employers"/patients so as merit coverage of Dr. Johnson's claims under Title VII. In Sibley, the hospital prevented plaintiff from entering into employment relationships with patients by blocking plaintiff's physical access to his potential employers. The hospital therefore had complete control over plaintiff's ability to secure potential employment. This is not true for Dr. Johnson. Unlike the nurse in Sibley, Dr. Johnson's access to potential patient-employers is not controlled by the Hospital. Greater Southeast may control the premises on which Dr. Johnson may wish to practice medicine, but the hospital has absolutely no control over Dr. Johnson's ability to secure patients and to enter into employment relationships with the patients. Although Medical Staff membership and hospital privileges at Greater Southeast certainly [50] facilitate the doctor-patient relationship -- particular if patients prefer to be treated at Greater Southeast rather than some other hospital -- Greater Southeast, in its discretionary granting of membership and privileges, in no way robs Dr. Johnson of his ability to secure patient, or present them for treatment at other medical facilities.

It is also worth noting that HN23[¹] a Title VII claim is not always cognizable where the defendant "control[s] access to such employment." Id. at 1342 (emphasis added). Although "control" is an important aspect to be considered, it is neither the sole nor determinative factor as to whether a particular claim falls under the purview of Title VII. For example, a licensing board has the power to deny an applicant the ability to earn a living at his chosen profession. A licensing board, by its very existence, has complete control over access the regulated professional job market. Despite this control, such boards have been routinely held not to be employers. See, e.g., Haddock v Bd. of Dental Examiners, 777 F.2d 462 (9th Cir. 1985); Woodard v. Virginia Bd. of Bar Examiners, 598 F.2d 1345 (4th Cir. 1979) (per curiam); [Tyler v. \[51\] Vickery](#), 517 F.2d 1089 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 940, 49 L. Ed. 2d 393, 96 S. Ct. 2660 (1976); Nat'l Org. for Women v. Waterfront Comm'n of New York Harbor, 468 F. Supp. 317 (S.D.N.Y. 1979).

Plaintiff's theory of Title VII coverage requires that he allege and prove some link between the defendants' actions and some employment relationship involving himself. Plaintiff has failed to make this connection. Plaintiff admitted that he was never an employee of Greater Southeast. Furthermore, no employer-employee relationship is implicated in physician's medical practice at Greater Southeast. Thus, defendants would be entitled to summary judgment on plaintiff's Title VII claim.

3. D.C. Human Rights Act Claims

Plaintiff alleged violations of the District of Columbia Human Rights Act, [*157] D.C. Code § 1-2512 (1981), based on the same set of facts. Like the federal civil rights laws, HN24[¹] the District's statute outlaws employment discrimination and conspiracies to deprive persons of their rights. However, in light of the court's dismissal of plaintiff's federal claims, this court has no jurisdiction over plaintiff's municipal law claims. The only basis for this court's jurisdiction [52] over plaintiff's D.C. Human Rights Act claims is the court's discretionary exercise of pendent jurisdiction. HN25[¹] A federal court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over municipal law claims when such claims are so inextricably intertwined with the facts and circumstances giving rise to the federal claims that they "form part of the same case or controversy under Article III." 28 U.S.C. § 1337. However, in light of the court's decision to grant defendants' motions for summary judgment on all of plaintiff's federal claims, the court has no basis to exercise pendent jurisdiction. See United Mineworkers v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218, 86 S. Ct. 1130 (1966). HN26[¹] There must be a valid federal claim against each defendant for whom plaintiff seeks to present a claim of pendent jurisdiction under the D.C. Human Rights Act. See, e.g., Brereton, supra; Byrd v. Pyle, 728 F. Supp. 1 (D.D.C. 1989); Clifton Terrace Assoc. v United Technologies, 728 F. Supp. 24 (D.D.C. 1990), aff'd in part and vacated in part, 289 U.S. App. D.C. 121, 929 F.2d 714 \(D.C. Cir. 1991\). With no such federal claims remain in the litigation, this court is prevented from exercising pendent jurisdiction over plaintiff's local [53] claims. Accordingly, the court shall dismiss plaintiff's claims under the D.C. Human Rights Act for lack of jurisdiction.

C. Tortious Inducement of Breach of Contract

Plaintiff alleged that defendant Hinman "intentionally, willfully, and tortiously induced a breach of contract between Plaintiff and Defendant Hospital in that he caused Defendant Hospital arbitrarily to terminate Plaintiff's Medical Staff membership and privileges." Complaint P 68. Plaintiff's claim is grounded in the common law of tort, and as such, is a pendent claim in this federal litigation. In light of this court's decision to dismiss all of plaintiff's federal claims, this court has no basis to exercise subject matter jurisdiction over plaintiff's common law tort claim. See United Mineworkers, supra. Accordingly, plaintiff's tort claim against defendant Hinman shall be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction.¹⁵

[54] III.

CONCLUSION

A separate Order summarizing all the above shall issue this date.

Royce C. Lamberth

United States District Judge

DATE: 10-19-95

ORDER

For the reasons set forth in the accompanying Memorandum Opinion, it is hereby ORDERED that:

1. Plaintiff's antitrust claims involving Greater Southeast community Hospital ("Greater Southeast"), Johns Hopkins Health Plan ("Johns Hopkins"), and United Health Services contained in Counts I, II, and III of the Complaint are DISMISSED sua sponte for lack of ripeness.
2. All of defendants' pending motions for summary judgment on antitrust claims involving Greater Southeast, Johns Hopkins, and United Health Services are DISMISSED as moot.
- [*158] 3. Defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's antitrust claims involving Columbia Hospital for Women Medical Center ("Columbia Hospital") contained in Count I of the Complaint is GRANTED.
4. Plaintiff's antitrust claims involving Columbia Hospital are DISMISSED with prejudice.
5. Plaintiff's motion for issuance of a trifurcated briefing schedule and enlargement of time in which to respond to defendants' motions for summary judgment is DENIED.
6. Plaintiff's motion for [55] leave to file an opposition to defendants' motion for summary judgment on civil rights claims out of time is DENIED.
7. Defendants' motion to strike plaintiff's opposition to defendants' motion for summary judgment on civil rights claims and all accompanying papers filed out of time is DENIED as moot.

¹⁵ Even if the court had jurisdiction to hear the matter, plaintiff's claim still fails as a matter of law because defendant Hinman engaged in his allegedly tortious conduct on behalf of Greater Southeast and therefore lacks the "third party" status required for this cause of action. See Press v. Howard University, 540 A.2d 733, 736 (D.C. 1988). In affirming the trial court's dismissal of plaintiff's tortious interference claim, the D.C. Court of Appeals stated:

The individual defendants, all of whom were officers of the University, were acting as agents of the other party to the contract, and . . . the University through their actions could not tortiously interfere with its own contract.

Id. at 763. The court's decision in Press is supported by ample authority. See Newman v. Legal Serv. Corp., 628 F. Supp. 535, 541 (D.D.C. 1986); Donohoe v. Watt, 546 F. Supp. 753, 757 (D.D.C. 1982), aff'd, 230 U.S. App. D.C. 70, 713 F.2d 864 (1983); Wilmington Trust Co. v. Clark, 289 Md. 313, 327-330, 424 A.2d 744, 754-755 (1981); W. Keeton, Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts § 129, at 990 (5th Ed. 1984).

8. Defendants' unopposed motion for summary judgment on all civil rights claims (Counts IV and V of the Complaint) is GRANTED as conceded pursuant to local rule 108(b).

9. Plaintiff's civil rights claims (Counts IV and V of the Complaint) are DISMISSED with prejudice.

10. Plaintiff's tort claim against defendant Hinman (Count VI of the Complaint) is DISMISSED for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

SO ORDERED.

[*547] FINAL JUDGMENT AND CONSENT DECREE

The States of New York, Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, Wyoming, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and the United States Virgin Islands ("Plaintiff States" or "Plaintiffs" or "States") have filed a Complaint for damages and injunctive relief on their own behalf and as parens patriae on behalf of natural person citizens residing in the Plaintiff States who purchased Reebok Products, as defined in the Complaint herein, during the period of the alleged conspiracy, against the Defendant Reebok International Ltd. and The Rockport Company (collectively "Defendant") alleging violations of federal [*548] and state antitrust laws. Defendant denies the allegations stated therein.

Plaintiffs and Defendant desire to resolve any and all disputes arising from the Complaint. These parties have entered into a Settlement Agreement which has been filed with the Court and is incorporated by reference herein. In full and final settlement of the claims set forth in the Complaint, Defendant has agreed to pay compensatory damages and administration costs as set forth in the Settlement Agreement executed on April 25, 1995 (the "Settlement Agreement"). Defendant has also agreed to entry of this Final Judgment and Consent Decree. Plaintiffs have agreed to execute Releases of their [*548] claims against Defendant and to release the claims of natural persons residing in the States who have not excluded their claims, in accordance with the terms of the Settlement Agreement.

Notice of the Settlement was given pursuant to Court order in accordance with 15 U.S.C. § 15c and the requirements of due process. The Notice was the best notice practicable under the circumstances.

An opportunity to be heard was given to all persons requesting to be heard in accordance with this Court's orders. The Court reviewed the [*548] terms of the Settlement, the submissions of the parties in support of it, and the comments received in response to the notice. After a hearing held on October 13, 1995, the Court approved the Settlement Agreement on 10/20/95, and determined it to be in all respects fair, reasonable and adequate. Said Order, which expressly excludes from the Settlement those natural person citizens who elected to opt-out of the Settlement, was entered on 10/20, 1995.

NOW, THEREFORE, without trial or adjudication of any issue of law or fact, before the taking of any testimony at trial, without the admission of liability or wrongdoing by Defendant and upon the consent of the parties hereto,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED:

I

JURISDICTION

The Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of this action and the parties hereto. The Complaint raises claims against Defendant under Section 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 1), Section 4 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 15), Section 4C of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 15c), and Section 16 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 26). Jurisdiction lies in this Court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 15. The Complaint also raises pendent state claims [4] for equitable and other relief.

II

DEFINITIONS

As used in this Final Judgment and Consent Decree:

- a. "Dealer" means any person, corporation or firm not owned by Reebok that in the course of its business sells Reebok Products in or into the United States of America;
- b. "Defendant" or "Reebok" means Reebok International Ltd. and its affiliates, parents, subsidiaries, divisions and other organizational units of any kind, including The Rockport Company, that sold Reebok and Rockport Products as defined herein, their successors and assigns and their present and former officers, directors, employees, agents, representatives and other persons acting on their behalf;
- c. "Reebok Products" means all Reebok and Rockport brand footwear products offered for sale to consumers located in the Plaintiff States or to Dealers.
- e. "Plaintiffs" or "Plaintiff States" means the State of New York and any other State, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the United States Virgin Islands which opt to enter into the Settlement Agreement as provided in Section IX thereof, in their sovereign capacity and as parens patriae on behalf of all natural person citizens of such Plaintiff States who [5] have purchased Reebok Products during the period of the alleged conspiracy (January 1, 1990 to and including December 31, 1994);
- f. "Resale Price" means any price, price floor, price ceiling, price range, or any mark-up formula, or margin of profit used by any Dealer for pricing any Reebok Products. Such term includes, but is not limited to, any suggested, established or customary resale price, as well as the retail price advertised, promoted or offered for sale by any Dealer.

APPLICABILITY

This Final Judgment and Consent Decree shall apply to the parties to this lawsuit.

INJUNCTION

- A. For a period of five (5) years from the date this Final Judgment and Consent Decree [*549] is entered, Reebok will not enter into any contract, combination, conspiracy, agreement or arrangement with any Dealer to fix, lower, raise, peg, maintain or stabilize the Retail Prices at which Reebok Products are advertised and sold to end-user consumers.
- B. For a period of five (5) years from the date this Final Judgment and Consent Decree is entered, Reebok will not terminate, suspend or fail to fill orders of any Dealer of Reebok Products or reduce the supply of or discriminate in delivery, [6] credit or other terms provided to any Dealer of Reebok Products in order to secure or attempt to secure any commitment or assurance from any Dealer, or to coerce said Dealer, to adhere to any of Reebok's suggested retail pricing policies for Reebok Products. Notwithstanding the foregoing, Reebok retains the right to terminate unilaterally any Dealer for lawful business reasons that are not inconsistent with this or any other paragraph of this Final Judgment and Consent Decree.

C. Within thirty (30) days after the date the Final Judgment and Consent Decree is entered, Reebok will send the letter affixed as Attachment B to the Settlement Agreement to all of its then current Dealers of Reebok Products.

D. For a period of five (5) years from the date this Judgment is entered, Reebok shall notify its Dealers of Reebok Products that it is their right to determine independently the prices at which they will advertise and sell Reebok Products to end-user consumers. Reebok shall provide this notice by affixing a notice of disclosure (the "Disclosure") to every list of suggested retail prices and minimum advertised prices for any Reebok Products printed subsequent to the date of entry of this [7] Judgment and provided to Dealers. The Disclosure shall clearly and conspicuously state the following on any list, advertising, book catalogue or promotional material for Reebok Products where Defendant has suggested any Resale Price to any Dealer:

ALTHOUGH [REEBOK INTERNATIONAL LTD.] or [THE ROCKPORT COMPANY] MAY SUGGEST RESALE PRICES FOR PRODUCTS, RETAILERS ARE FREE TO DETERMINE ON THEIR OWN THE PRICES AT WHICH THEY WILL ADVERTISE AND SELL [REEBOK] OR [ROCKPORT] PRODUCTS.

E. This Final Judgment and Consent Decree shall not be construed in any way to limit the right of Reebok to preannounce or suggest to its Dealers or distributors retail prices for Reebok Products and to unilaterally refuse to deal with those who fail to comply or to engage in any other behavior that is otherwise permitted by federal and state antitrust laws. Accordingly, if a cooperative advertising program established and maintained by Reebok does not violate federal or state antitrust laws, it will not constitute a violation of the injunctive provisions herein.

F. The Plaintiff States, and all natural person citizens residing in those States who purchased Reebok Products during the period January [8] 1, 1990 - December 31, 1994 (except citizens who have timely and properly requested exclusion) are permanently barred and enjoined from prosecuting against Reebok, Rockport, their affiliates, parents, subsidiaries, divisions and other organizational units of any kind, and their present and former directors, officers, employees, agents, representatives and other persons acting on their behalf, successors and assigns, and against the John Doe defendants or any other Dealer not named as a defendant, any of the claims foreclosed or released in accordance with the Settlement Agreement, including any claim regarding the conduct alleged in the complaint.

COMPLIANCE

For purposes of determining and securing compliance with this Final Judgment and Consent Decree, duly authorized representatives of the Plaintiff States shall be permitted upon thirty (30) days prior written notice:

a. Reasonable access during normal office hours to any and all relevant and non-privileged records and documents in the possession, custody, or control of Defendant which relate to any of the matters contained herein or in the Settlement Agreement.

[*550] b. Subject to the reasonable convenience of Defendant to [9] conduct interviews of any of the directors, officers, employees, agents, and any other persons acting on their behalf, each of whom may have counsel present, relating to any non-privileged matter contained herein or in the Settlement Agreement.

c. Defendant retains the right to object to any request under paragraphs (a) or (b) above within ten (10) days after its receipt on the grounds that the request is not reasonable, or not relevant to the matters contained herein or in the Settlement Agreement, or otherwise is not in accordance with law. Any such objection shall be directed to this Court for a ruling, with service by mail of the objection upon the State of New York.

d. The violation of any of the terms of Paragraph IV(A) of this Final Judgment and Consent Decree shall constitute a violation of federal and state antitrust laws for which civil remedies may be sought by the New York State Attorney General or the Attorney General of the State in which the violation occurred pursuant to 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 15, 15c and 26 and relevant state antitrust law upon application to this Court.

e. If the Attorney General of any Plaintiff State determines that Defendant has violated the terms [\[10\]](#) of Section IV of this Final Judgment and Consent Decree, he shall give Defendant written notice of the violation and Defendant shall have fifteen (15) working days to respond in writing. If the State is not satisfied with Defendant's response, it shall notify Defendant in writing and Defendant shall have fifteen (15) working days to cure such non-compliance. If after such time Defendant has not cured the violation to the State's satisfaction, the State may seek penalties for contempt for violation of any paragraph of this Final Judgment and Consent Decree and with respect to alleged violations of Section IV (A) may seek the civil remedies referred to in Section V (d).

JURISDICTION RETAINED

Without affecting the finality of this Final Judgment, jurisdiction shall be retained by this Court for the purpose of enabling any party hereto to apply for such further orders and directions as may be necessary or appropriate for the construction or enforcement of this Final Judgment and Consent Decree, the ruling upon any objection made pursuant to Section V, the modification of any of the provisions hereto to the extent such modification is permitted, and the remedy of a violation of [\[11\]](#) any of the provisions contained herein. This Court shall have the authority to specifically enforce the provisions of this Final Judgment and Consent Decree.

VII

On the fifth anniversary date of this Final Judgment and Consent Decree, said Final Judgment and Consent Decree shall automatically terminate without any action by either party or the Court.

So ordered this 20th day of October, 1995.

HN1 [blue icon] Trials, Judgment as Matter of Law

The standards governing consideration of a motion for judgment as a matter of law, whether considered before or after submission of the case to the jury, are as follows: Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the party against whom the motion is made, a directed verdict is proper if reasonable minds could only come to a conclusion against the non-movant. In coming to this conclusion neither the credibility or weight of the evidence should be considered. Furthermore, a post-verdict motion for judgment as a matter of law will be considered only if a similar motion was made before the jury charge. Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(a\)\(2\) and 50\(b\). Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59 states that a new trial may be granted for any of the reasons for which new trials have been granted in actions at law in the courts of the United States. Specific grounds for new trial can include: that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, that the damages are excessive, or that for other reasons the trial was not fair, and that the motion may also raise questions of law arising out of substantial errors in the admission or rejection of evidence or the giving or refusal of instructions.

HN2 Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

The grant of a new trial falls within the trial court's discretion to act to prevent a miscarriage of justice. This broad discretion vested in the trial court in deciding a Fed. R. Civ. P. 59 motion for new trial extends to motions predicated upon the sufficiency of the evidence and errors in jury instructions. Fed. R. Civ. P. 61 makes clear that the court must disregard any error or defect in the proceeding which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties. It provides, in pertinent part that no error in either the admission or the exclusion of evidence and no error or defect in any ruling or order or in anything done or omitted by the court or by any of the parties is grounds for granting a new trial unless refusal to take such action appears to the court inconsistent with substantial justice. The court at every stage of the proceeding must disregard any error or defect in the proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties.

HN3 Judgment as Matter of Law, Directed Verdicts

Fed. R. Civ. P. 50 controls the court's decision whether to grant a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(a\)\(2\) specifies the requirements for a motion for directed verdict: Motions for judgment as a matter of law may be made at any time before submission of the case to the jury. Such a motion shall specify the judgment sought and the law and the facts on which the moving party is entitled to judgment. Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(b\) governs the renewal of this motion after trial: Whenever a motion for a judgment as a matter of law made at the close of all the evidence is denied or for any reason is not granted, the court is deemed to have submitted the action to the jury subject to a later determination of the legal questions raised by the motion. The plain language of the Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(b\) thus indicates that a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is nothing more than the renewal of a previous motion for directed verdict; it follows that no new grounds can be asserted in the renewed motion.

HN4 Judgment as Matter of Law, Directed Verdicts

Amended Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(a\)\(2\) retains the requirement that a motion for judgment be made prior to the close of the trial, subject to renewal after a jury verdict has been rendered. The purpose of this requirement is to assure the responding party an opportunity to cure any deficiency in that party's proof that may have been overlooked until called to the party's attention by a late motion for judgment. The second sentence of Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(a\)\(2\) does impose a requirement that the moving party articulate the basis on which a judgment as a matter of law might be rendered. The articulation is necessary to achieve the purpose of the requirement that the motion be made before the case is submitted to the jury, so that the responding party may seek to correct any overlooked deficiencies in the proof. The revision thus alters the result in cases in which courts have used various techniques to avoid the requirement that a motion for directed verdict be made as a predicate to a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(b\) retains the concept of the former rule that the post-verdict motion is a renewal of an earlier motion made at the close of the evidence. It remains useful as a means of defining the appropriate issue posed by the post-verdict motion. A post-trial motion for judgment can be granted only on grounds advanced in the pre-verdict motion.

HN5 Trials, Judgment as Matter of Law

Although erroneous jury instructions can provide the basis for ordering a new trial, Fed. R. Civ. P. 51 flatly requires parties to call such alleged errors to the attention of the trial court: No party may assign as error the giving or the failure to give an instruction unless that party objects thereto before the jury retires to consider its verdict, stating distinctly the matter objected to and the grounds of the objection.

HN6 Trials, Judgment as Matter of Law

An appellate court may enter judgment as a matter of law despite a failure to object to a jury instruction at trial if the instruction erroneously stated the law and the evidence presented at trial was insufficient as a matter of law to support a jury verdict under the correct statement of the law. A defendant would be entitled to judgment as a matter of law if it could show both: (1) that the court erroneously failed to instruct the jury that plaintiff could prevail only if they showed that a state lawsuit was a "sham," and (2) that the evidence at trial was insufficient as a matter of law to establish that the state lawsuit was a "sham."

A principle of law often referred to as the Noerr-Pennington doctrine holds that business interests may combine and lobby to influence the legislative, executive, or judicial branches of government or administrative agencies without violating the antitrust laws, because such activities are protected by the first amendment right of petition. Although the doctrine applies regardless of the motives of the petitioners, it is not without exception. The Supreme Court has carved out a narrow "sham" exception to this doctrine, which covers cases where the defendant intended to use the petitioning process merely to harass the plaintiff.

The National Labor Relations Act § 7 guarantees employees the right to self-organization, to form, join, or

The right of access to the courts is an aspect of the First Amendment right to petition the government for redress of grievances. Accordingly, the antitrust laws do not prohibit the filing of a lawsuit, regardless of the plaintiff's anticompetitive intent or purpose in doing so, unless the suit was a "mere sham" filed for harassment purposes. This same First Amendment right should inform its construction of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA). The filing and prosecution of a well-founded lawsuit may not be enjoined as an unfair labor practice, even if it would not have been commenced but for the plaintiff's desire to retaliate against the defendant for exercising rights protected by the NLRA.

HN15 [blue document icon] Trials, Judgment as Matter of Law

If there is a genuine issue of material fact that turns on the credibility of witnesses or on the proper inferences to be drawn from undisputed facts, it cannot be concluded that the suit should be enjoined. When a suit presents genuine factual issues, the state plaintiff's First Amendment interest in petitioning the state court for redress of his grievance, his interest in having the factual dispute resolved by a jury, and the state's interest in protecting the health and welfare of its citizens lead the courts to construe the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), as not permitting the National Labor Relations Board (Board) to usurp the traditional factfinding function of the state-court jury or judge. Hence, if a state plaintiff is able to present the Board with evidence that shows his lawsuit raises genuine issues of material fact, the Board should proceed no further with the unfair labor practice proceedings under NLRA §§ 8(a)(1)-8(a)(4), but the Board should stay those proceedings until the state-court suit has been concluded.

The National Labor Relations Board must refrain from deciding genuinely disputed material factual issues with respect to a state suit, it likewise must not deprive a litigant of his right to have genuine state-law legal questions decided by the state judiciary.

HN17 [blue document icon] Formal Adjudicatory Procedure, Hearings

When presented with an unfair labor practice claim that also seeks to enjoin the employer's prosecution of a state court lawsuit against the union or its members, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), must stay its proceedings if the state suit has arguable merit, regardless of the employer's motivation for bringing the suit. Once the state court litigation has ended, however, the NLRB may proceed as follows: In instances where the NLRB must allow the lawsuit to proceed, if the employer's case in the state court ultimately proves meritorious and he has judgment against the employees, the employer should also prevail before the NLRB, for the filing of a meritorious lawsuit, even for a retaliatory motive, is not an unfair labor practice. If judgment goes against the employer in the state court, however, or if his suit is withdrawn or is otherwise shown to be without merit, the employer has had its day in court, the interest of the state in providing a forum for its citizens has been vindicated, and the NLRB may then proceed to adjudicate the National Labor Relations Act §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(4) unfair labor practice case. The employer's suit having proved unmeritorious, the NLRB would be warranted in taking that fact into account in determining whether the suit had been filed in retaliation for the exercise of the employee's National Labor Relations Act § 7 rights.

HN18 [blue icon] Reviewability, Exhaustion of Remedies

If a state court action utterly lacks merit, the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), may properly enjoin it. Moreover, federal interests may be freely asserted once the state court litigation has ended and the threat of interference no longer exists. At that point, a federal authority may find that the state court lawsuit was filed in bad faith, even if it was not so lacking in merit as to warrant an earlier injunction. Indeed, termination of the state court suit diminishes the NLRB's obligation to examine that suit's allegations for any signs of possible merit. The NLRB instead may rely on the disposition of the state court action, even if it was not disposed of on the merits. A state lawsuit therefore could survive summary judgment and nevertheless be deemed meritless by the NLRB, so long as the suit did not ultimately terminate in the plaintiff's favor.

The question of whether the claims raised in a prior action, and raised again as counterclaims in another case, have a reasonable basis is beyond doubt a jury issue. Among the issues that must be considered in determining "reasonableness" is the subjective intent of the plaintiffs in initially bringing their claims. It is the question of reasonableness upon which the parties' rights will diverge.

At a session of said Court, held in the U.S. Courthouse, Detroit, Michigan on OCT 23 1995

PRESENT: Honorable Gerald E. Rosen, United States District Judge

I. INTRODUCTION

Plaintiffs, members of a political caucus known as "rank and file teamsters" or [*1072] "RAFT" within Teamsters Local 243, instituted this action against Defendants, members of a political caucus known as "Esser-Cinci" within Local 243 and Local 243 itself, claiming that Defendants deprived Plaintiffs of their right to free expression, as protected by the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act ("LMRDA," or "Landrum-Griffin Act"), 29 U.S.C. 411\(a\)\(2\). In particular, Plaintiffs claim that the individual Defendants filed a retaliatory defamation, libel, and slander action against them in state court. The [2] individual Defendants, whose state court defamation case was dismissed, filed a defamation counterclaim against Plaintiffs in the instant matter.

The case was tried before a jury on June 21 through 25, 1993. At the close of Plaintiffs' case, Defendants made an oral motion for directed verdict, which was denied by the Court. On July 15, 1993, after a jury rejected Defendants' defamation counterclaim and returned a verdict in favor of Plaintiffs in the amount of $ 30,000, Defendants filed the instant motion seeking judgment as a matter of law on Plaintiffs' Landrum-Griffin Act claim, or, in the alternative, a new trial.

While this motion was pending, this Court was informed that Mr. Francis J. Kortsch, counsel for Defendant Local 243, had been suspended from the practice of law by the State of Wisconsin prior to the trial. Because Mr. Kortsch's admission to practice in this Court was premised on his good standing in his home state of Wisconsin, this Court conducted a hearing to determine what action, if any, was necessitated by Mr. Kortsch's Wisconsin suspension. As a consequence, Mr. Kortsch was barred from continuing his representation of Defendant Local 243, and consideration of [3] the instant motion was delayed until Local 243 could obtain new counsel.¹ On November 1, 1994, Defendant Local 243's new counsel filed a supplemental brief in support of Defendants' motion. Plaintiffs responded to the brief filed by Mr. Kortsch on August 11, 1993, and to the supplemental brief on December 5, 1994; Defendant Local 243 replied on December 9, 1994.

Next, on April 3, 1995, the individual Defendants filed a motion for relief from judgment, or in the alternative for a stay of execution of that judgment. The individual Defendants assert that it was "understood by all" throughout the trial that liability for Plaintiffs' LMRDA claims could rest only with Defendant Local 243. By order dated April 24, 1995, this Court granted the motion for a stay of execution pending resolution of Defendants' outstanding motions.

Having considered all of the documents filed by the [4] parties, as well as the arguments made by their counsel at a hearing held on this matter on August 23, 1995, and for the reasons stated below, the Court hereby denies Defendants' request for judgment as a matter of law or for a new trial, and denies the individual Defendants' motion for relief from judgment.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

HN1 [↑] The standards governing consideration of a motion for judgment as a matter of law, whether considered before or after submission of the case to the jury, are as follows:

Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the party against whom the motion is made, a directed verdict is proper if reasonable minds could only come to a conclusion against the non-movant. In coming to this conclusion neither the credibility or weight of the evidence should be considered.

Littlejohn v. Rose, 768 F.2d 765, 770 \(6th Cir. 1985\), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1045, 106 S. Ct. 1260, 89 L. Ed. 2d 570 (1986). Furthermore, a post-verdict motion for judgment as a matter of law will be considered only if a similar motion was made before the jury charge. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(a\)\(2\) and 50\(b\).

¹ After the hearing, this Court also found Mr. Kortsch in contempt of Court for violation of his obligation under Local Rule 111.1(b).

Turning to the motion for new trial, Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59 states that "[a] new trial may be granted . . . for any of the reasons for which new trials have been granted in actions at law in the courts [*1073] of the United States . . ." Specific grounds for new trial can include:

that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, that the damages are excessive, or that for other reasons the trial was not fair, and that the motion may also raise questions of law arising out of substantial errors in the admission or rejection of evidence or the giving or refusal of instructions.

11 Charles A. Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure § 2805, at 37-38 (1973).

HN2 [↑] "The grant of a new trial . . . falls within the trial court's discretion to act to prevent a miscarriage of justice." Fryman v. Federal Crop Ins. Corp., 936 F.2d 244, 248 \(6th Cir. 1991\). This broad discretion vested in the trial court in deciding a Rule 59 motion for new trial extends to motions predicated upon the sufficiency of the evidence and errors in jury instructions. See City of Cleveland v. Peter Kiewit Sons' Co., 624 F.2d 749 \(6th Cir. 1980\). See generally C. Wright and A. Miller, 11 Federal Practice [6] and Procedure § 2818 and cases cited therein.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 61 makes clear that the court must disregard any error or defect in the proceeding which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties. It provides, in pertinent part:

No error in either the admission or the exclusion of evidence and no error or defect in any ruling or order or in anything done or omitted by the court or by any of the parties is grounds for granting a new trial . . . unless refusal to take such action appears to the court inconsistent with substantial justice. The court at every stage of the proceeding must disregard any error or defect in the proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties.

The Court will apply the above principles in deciding Defendants' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial.

III. ARGUMENTS OF THE PARTIES

Defendants make several arguments in support of their motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or for a new trial. In their initial brief (filed by Francis Kortsch on July 15, 1993), they argue:

- I. Lack of subject matter jurisdiction because the state court litigation, [7] however construed, does not constitute "discipline" under § 411 of the Landrum-Griffin Act.
- II. Insufficient evidence of union complicity in preparing or advancing the state court action.
- III. Insufficient evidence that the state court action was filed for an improper purpose.
- IV. Failure to exhaust internal union remedies.

In a supplemental brief (filed by Defendant Local 243's new counsel on November 1, 1994), Defendants also argue:

- V. Because the First Amendment protects the right of citizens to petition the courts for redress of grievances, the commencement of a public proceeding against a union member can never constitute an actionable infringement of his rights, or at most can constitute an infringement only if it is a "sham" proceeding.

As a result of this alleged failure of the Court to properly construe the law, Defendant Local 243 argues that improper jury instructions were given.

In addition to attacking the merits of these contentions, Plaintiffs also contend that arguments I, IV and V should not be addressed by this Court due to Defendants' failure to raise these points of law in their initial motion for directed verdict,² and [8] their failure to object to the jury instructions.

² Although the parties refer to the motion raised by Defendants at the close of Plaintiffs' case-in-chief as a "motion for directed verdict," the 1991 amendments to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 50 abandoned the term "directed verdict" in favor of the more precise term "judgment as a matter of law." See Fed. R. Civ. P. 50\(a\) Advisory Committee's Note (1991 Amendment). However, because the parties have employed the "directed verdict" terminology, the Court, rather than standing on linguistic formalities, adopts the parties' terminology when discussing this motion.

[*1074] Regarding the individual Defendants' motion for relief from judgment, Defendants contend that the trial was conducted with the implicit understanding, by all parties, that only Defendant Local 243 could be held liable for any infringement of Plaintiffs' rights under Title I of the Landrum-Griffin Act. Accordingly, the individual Defendants conclude that the judgment of this Court holding all [*9] of the Defendants liable reflects a "clerical mistake" that should be corrected by issuing an amended judgment naming only Defendant Local 243. Plaintiffs respond that their complaint properly named both the individual Defendants and Local 243, and that their trial brief explicitly asserted the joint and several liability of the Local and the members of "Esser-Cinci."

IV. ANALYSIS

A. THIS COURT WILL ADDRESS DEFENDANTS' ARGUMENTS DESPITE THEIR FAILURE TO RAISE THEM IN THEIR MOTION FOR DIRECTED VERDICT OR TO OBJECT TO THE JURY INSTRUCTIONS.

Defendants' motion for directed verdict after the completion of Plaintiffs' case-in-chief rested exclusively on the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to establish either union complicity or improper motive in filing the state lawsuit. Furthermore, Defendants did not object to the jury instructions given by the Court. Plaintiffs contend that because arguments I, IV, and V above were not raised in Defendants' motion for directed verdict, they may not be raised in a subsequent motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Moreover, to the extent that argument V above asserts that the jury was improperly instructed, Plaintiffs [*10] argue that Defendants' failure to object to the jury instructions at trial bars them from objecting to those instructions in a post-trial motion.

HN3 [↑] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 50 controls this Court's decision whether to grant a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Rule 50\(a\)\(2\) specifies the requirements for a motion for directed verdict:

Motions for judgment as a matter of law may be made at any time before submission of the case to the jury. Such a motion shall specify the judgment sought and the law and the facts on which the moving party is entitled to judgment.

Rule 50\(b\) governs the renewal of this motion after trial:

Whenever a motion for a judgment as a matter of law made at the close of all the evidence is denied or for any reason is not granted, the court is deemed to have submitted the action to the jury subject to a later determination of the legal questions raised by the motion.

The plain language of the Rule thus indicates that a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is nothing more than the renewal of a previous motion for directed verdict; it follows that no new grounds can be asserted in the renewed motion. The Advisory [*11] Committee adopted this straight forward interpretation in its discussion of the 1991 amendments to the Rule, and also explained the purpose behind the Rule's requirements:

HN4 [↑] Paragraph (a)(2) retains the requirement that a motion for judgment be made prior to the close of the trial, subject to renewal after a jury verdict has been rendered. The purpose of this requirement is to assure the responding party an opportunity to cure any deficiency in that party's proof that may have been overlooked until called to the party's attention by a late motion for judgment

The second sentence of paragraph (a)(2) does impose a requirement that the moving party articulate the basis on which a judgment as a matter of law might be rendered. The articulation is necessary to achieve the purpose of the requirement that the motion be made before the case is submitted to the jury, so that the responding party may seek to correct any overlooked deficiencies in the proof. The revision thus alters the result in cases in which courts have used various techniques to avoid the requirement that a motion for directed verdict be made as a predicate to a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict . [*12] . . .

[*1075] [Rule 50\(b\)] retains the concept of the former rule that the post-verdict motion is a renewal of an earlier motion made at the close of the evidence It remains useful as a means of defining the appropriate issue posed by the post-verdict motion. A post-trial motion for judgment can be granted only on grounds advanced in the pre-verdict motion.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 50 Advisory Committee's Note (1991 Amendment) (citations omitted) (emphasis added). Therefore, the Advisory Committee Notes -- not to mention the language of the Rule itself -- clearly support Plaintiffs' contention that this Court should not consider any arguments Defendants raised only in their "renewed" motion.

In response, Defendants argue that "technicalities" should not foreclose their presentation of new arguments, and that these new arguments in any event are only "minor variances" from the points raised in their motion for directed verdict. However, most of the cases cited by Defendant in support of this position involve only the failure of a party to renew its motion for judgment as a matter of law at the close of all the evidence. See, e.g., Miller v. American President Lines, Inc., [\[*131\] 989 F.2d 1450, 1465 \(6th Cir. 1993\)](#); Riverview Invs., Inc. v. Ottawa Community Improvement Corp., 899 F.2d 474, 477-78 \(6th Cir. 1990\); Boynton v. TRW, Inc., 858 F.2d 1178, 1185 \(6th Cir. 1988\). Those cases thus did not need to address the possibility of prejudice to the party opposing the motion, because that party was properly advised of the basis for the motion in the earlier motion for directed verdict.

Two cases, however, do offer some support for Defendants' argument. First, in National Indus., Inc. v. Sharon Steel Corp., 781 F.2d 1545, 1549 \(11th Cir. 1986\), the court found that a renewed motion for judgment as a matter of law presented arguments that were "closely related" to those raised in the initial motion. The court further stated that "even if the subject matters of the two motions were much farther apart, we would not read Rule 50(b) so narrowly as [the opposing party] urges us to do." 781 F.2d at 1549. Reasoning that Rule 50 is designed to ensure that the party opposing a motion is adequately informed of the basis for the motion, the court found that "there is nothing in the record to suggest an ambush or sandbagging." 781 F.2d at 1549. Similarly, [\[14\]](#) the court in Parkway Garage, Inc. v. City of Philadelphia, 5 F.3d 685, 691 \(3d Cir. 1993\), found Rule 50 satisfied where the moving party's "implicit" and "oblique" references to an issue were sufficient to put the opposing party on notice that the issue was contested.

Because Defendants' first "new" argument -- i.e., that state court litigation does not constitute "discipline" under the Landrum-Griffin Act -- presents a purely legal issue, and because Defendants' counsel referred at trial to a case that considers this argument, Defendants assert that Plaintiffs were given sufficient notice of this argument to satisfy Rule 50. This Court notes as an initial matter that Defendants' new theory can in no way be construed as a "minor variance" from the grounds asserted in their motion for directed verdict. However, because it appears unlikely that Plaintiffs' presentation of their case would have been any different had Defendants asserted this argument earlier, the Court will address the merits of the argument.

Defendants' most recent argument -- i.e., that Plaintiffs could not establish actionable infringement of their rights under the Landrum-Griffin Act without at least showing [\[15\]](#) that Defendants' state lawsuit was a "sham" -- presents a closer question. In its broadest form, the argument rests on the purely legal question whether bringing a lawsuit can ever constitute infringement of Landrum-Griffin rights. If this Court were to answer this question in the negative, Plaintiffs' claims under the LMRDA would be foreclosed, regardless of any additional evidence Plaintiff could have presented at trial. In that event, Plaintiffs would not have been deprived of any meaningful opportunity to cure defects in their case.

Defendants' argument can also be construed as turning on the more fact-based question whether Plaintiffs could show that the state lawsuit was a "sham" proceeding. Had Plaintiffs been aware of this argument during the trial, they might have tailored [\[*1076\]](#) their presentation of evidence bearing on Defendants' motives for bringing the state action to more squarely assert that the state suit was indeed a "sham." This Court is reluctant to speculate that earlier articulation of this theory would have had no effect on Plaintiffs' case. Cf. Francis v. Clark Equip. Co., 993 F.2d 545, 555 \(6th Cir. 1993\) (construing Rule 50 as dictating that "the nonmoving [\[16\]](#) party must be apprised of the dispositive issues and afforded an opportunity to present any available evidence").

If Defendants' argument is viewed as a failure to properly instruct the jury, however, a different analysis pertains. HN5 Although erroneous jury instructions can provide the basis for ordering a new trial, Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 51 flatly requires parties to call such alleged errors to the attention of the trial court:

No party may assign as error the giving or the failure to give an instruction unless that party objects thereto before the jury retires to consider its verdict, stating distinctly the matter objected to and the grounds of the objection.

Because Defendants failed to object to the jury instructions in time to give the Court an opportunity to cure any defects, Rule 51 appears to preclude this Court's consideration of Defendants' most recent theory.

A Supreme Court case, however, offers Defendants the possibility of avoiding the Rule 51 bar by combining two contentions. In Boyle v. United Technologies Corp., 487 U.S. 500, 513-14, 108 S. Ct. 2510, 2519, 101 L. Ed. 2d 442 \(1988\), the Court found that HN6¹ an appellate court may enter [\[*17\]](#) judgment as a matter of law despite a failure to object to a jury instruction at trial if the instruction erroneously stated the law and the evidence presented at trial was insufficient as a matter of law to support a jury verdict under the correct statement of the law. Boyle thus suggests that Defendants would be entitled to judgment as a matter of law if they could show both: (1) that the Court erroneously failed to instruct the jury that Plaintiffs could prevail only if they showed that the state lawsuit was a "sham," and (2) that the evidence at trial was insufficient as a matter of law to establish that the state lawsuit was a "sham." In considering the second point, though, this Court again runs afoul of the difficulty discussed above in its Rule 50 analysis: Plaintiffs' evidence might have been different had they been properly apprised of Defendants' contention during the trial.³

[\[*18\]](#) In short, this Court's survey of the relevant Rules and case law has failed to uncover any clear support for the proposition that a trial court may address an argument presented for the first time in a post-trial motion, particularly when that argument turns partly on factual determinations. Accordingly, this Court appears to be precluded from considering Defendants' most recent argument. However, because this is a close question, and because the argument can be construed as turning on purely legal issues, this Court believes that the most appropriate course of action is to address the merits of Defendants' theory.⁴

B. THE STATE COURT LAWSUIT NEED NOT HAVE BEEN "DISCIPLINE" WITHIN THE MEANING OF § 411(a)(5) TO CONSTITUTE A VIOLATION OF § 411(a)(2).

HN7¹ Title [\[*19\]](#) I of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act, [29 U.S.C. \[*1077\] §§ 411-415](#), provides a number of protections to union members, including the right to free speech and assembly, the right to sue, and the right not to be improperly disciplined. Section 411\(a\)\(2\) -- the subsection upon which Plaintiffs rely -- provides:

Every member of any labor organization shall have the right to meet and assemble freely with other members; and to express any views, arguments, or opinions; and to express at meetings of the labor organization his views, upon candidates in an election of the labor organization or upon any business properly before the meeting, subject to the organization's established and reasonable rules pertaining to the conduct of meetings: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to impair the right of a labor organization to adopt and enforce reasonable rules as to the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution and to his refraining from conduct that would interfere with its performance of its legal or contractual obligations.

³ Although Boyle does not address this concern, the case upon which Boyle relies, City of St. Louis v. Praprotnik, 485 U.S. 112, 119-20, 108 S. Ct. 915, 921-22, 99 L. Ed. 2d 107 \(1988\), specifically notes that the party claiming error in a jury instruction had raised and preserved the relevant legal issues by filing a pretrial motion for summary judgment, a motion for directed verdict, and a motion for judgment notwithstanding the law. The opposing party thus was put on notice, both before and during the trial, of the issues involved in the dispute over the jury instruction. Defendants here cannot show that Plaintiffs were similarly apprised of Defendants' most recent argument. Cf. Graham v. Davis, 279 U.S. App. D.C. 341, 880 F.2d 1414, 1420 \(D.C. Cir. 1989\) (distinguishing Praprotnik on the ground that the party objecting to jury instructions had at best raised the underlying legal issues by submitting proposed instructions during the trial that stated the law differently).

Defendants, in their initial post-trial brief, argue that § 411\(a\)\(2\) protects a member's rights to [\[20\]](#) free speech only as defined by the Act, and that the Act does not create a right to commit an intentional tort such as defamation against union officials. Because defamatory statements are not protected by the Act, Defendants surmise that Local 243's state court defamation suit could not have constituted "discipline" of Plaintiffs within the meaning of § 411\(a\)\(5\).⁵ In addition, although Defendants strenuously deny that there was any union complicity in the decision to bring the state court defamation action, they argue that the Union nonetheless would have been justified in taking action to protect its image with its rank-and-file members, because lack of trust among members "would interfere with its performance of its legal or contractual obligations" within the meaning of § 411\(a\)\(2\).

[\[21\]](#) These arguments are flawed for several reasons, not the least of which is the fact that the jury found Defendants' defamation claim to be without merit. Furthermore, it is unclear how the allegedly defamatory nature of Plaintiffs' statements bears on the propriety of the Union's disciplinary procedures.⁶ Surely disciplinary procedures, should a union choose to employ them, must conform to the dictates of § 411\(a\)\(5\) regardless of the offensive nature of the union member's conduct. Finally, even if Local 243 were correct in its contention that § 411\(a\)\(2\) authorizes a response to Plaintiffs' statements because of their potential to interfere with the Local's ability to function as an institution, § 411\(a\)\(2\) also makes clear that establishment of appropriate rules and initiation of disciplinary proceedings pursuant to those rules would have been the appropriate course of action.

[\[22\]](#) In their supplemental brief, Defendants attempt to establish the relevance of § 411\(a\)\(5\) to the instant matter by directing the Court's attention -- for the first time -- to two cases involving the filing of civil or criminal complaints against union members. In Morrissey v. National Maritime Union of America, 544 F.2d 19, 22 \(2d Cir. 1976\), a union member who opposed the established union leadership attempted to distribute pamphlets expressing his point of view at the union hall in violation of a posted sign indicating that only union publications could be distributed inside the hall. After Morrissey was asked to stop and refused to do so, he was arrested and charged with disorderly conduct and criminal trespass. 544 F.2d at 22. Both charges were eventually dismissed, and Morrissey then brought a civil suit pursuant to §§ 411\(a\)\(2\) and \(5\) against the union and several of its officials. 544 F.2d at 22. He argued that actions taken by union officials "in prohibiting and preventing him from distributing the pamphlets in the Union Hall deprived him" of his free speech rights [\[*1078\]](#) under § 411\(a\)\(2\), and that "their causing his arrest constituted improper disciplinary action in [\[23\]](#) violation of 29 U.S.C. § 411\(a\)\(5\)." 544 F.2d at 22 (quoting Morrissey v. National Maritime Union, 397 F. Supp. 659, 663 \(S.D.N.Y. 1975\)). The jury returned a general verdict finding that the defendants had violated § 411\(a\) of the Landrum-Griffith Act, without specifying whether the violation had been of § 411\(a\)\(2\) or § 411\(a\)\(5\) or both. 544 F.2d at 23.

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit first found that the evidence adduced at trial was sufficient to support a verdict against the defendants under § 411\(a\)\(2\). 544 F.2d at 23-24. The defendants had argued that their conduct fell within the § 411\(a\)\(2\) proviso that permits unions to "adopt and enforce reasonable rules." 544 F.2d at 23. The court, however, agreed with the trial court that it was unnecessary to inquire into the reasonableness of the rule posted in the union hall, because that rule was posted by an individual union officer without first having been "adopted" by the union within the meaning of the § 411\(a\)\(2\) proviso. 544 F.2d at 24.

Nevertheless, the Morrissey court reversed the general verdict for the plaintiff, based on its conclusion that the defendants had not violated § 411\(a\)\(5\) of the [\[24\]](#) Landrum-Griffith Act. 544 F.2d at 25-26. The court reasoned that because the focus of § 411\(a\)\(5\) is to provide due process protections before a union may discipline its members, that subsection does not extend to proceedings such as criminal prosecutions where the judicial system will provide the necessary procedural protections:

No member of any labor organization may be fined, suspended, expelled, or otherwise disciplined except for nonpayment of dues by such organization or by any officer thereof unless such member has been (A) served with written specific charges; (B) given a reasonable time to prepare his defense; (C) afforded a full and fair hearing.

⁶ This assumes that § 411\(a\)\(5\) has some relevance to this case, a proposition that will be explored later in this opinion.

The scope of the prohibition is best illuminated by Congress' statement of the conditions that will overcome it. Congress desired to provide "safeguards against improper disciplinary action," not to outlaw union discipline. A union may "otherwise discipline" a member, just as it may fine, suspend or expel him, if it has served him with written specific charges, has given him a reasonable time to prepare his defenses, and has afforded him a full and fair hearing. At least in this context, the phrase "otherwise disciplined" must be limited to types of punishment where compliance with these conditions is feasible. The compulsory steps would take weeks, even months. The "otherwise disciplined" phrase could thus not have been meant to cover a decision to call a policemen to remove a member from a union's premises.

We do not say, of course, that "discipline" [25] may not be involved in union sanctions arising from incidents that would otherwise be violations of law, cf. International Bhd. of Boilermakers v. Hardeman, 401 U.S. 233, 91 S. Ct. 609, 28 L. Ed. 2d 10 (1971) (expulsion following assault on union official). We do say that Congress could not have been thinking of a case like this where the union chooses to invoke the processes of law and the arrested union member will have his full range of procedural protections in the courts. If the decision to have him arrested and prosecuted is itself unjustified, he will have other legal remedies, as this case demonstrates [i.e., a malicious prosecution claim]; Title I has no preemptive effect on such remedies, [29 U.S.C. § 413]. We thus conclude it was error for the judge to have allowed the jury to find the defendants liable for violating [§ 411(a)(5)].

544 F.2d at 26 (emphasis added) (footnote omitted). Thus, contrary to Defendants' contention, Morrissey did not hold that pursuit of a state court action cannot be considered an act in violation of § 411(a)(2); rather, that court held that a state prosecution could not be considered discipline for purposes of determining [26] violations of § 411(a)(5).

Similarly, in the second case cited by Defendants, Phillips v. International Assoc. of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, 556 F.2d 939, 941 (9th Cir. 1977), the issue was "whether malicious prosecution of a civil suit by a labor organization or its officers acting in their official capacity against a member constitutes 'discipline' within the meaning of § 411(a)(5)." Relying on Morrissey, supra, the court concluded that malicious prosecution is not "discipline" within the meaning of the Act. 556 F.2d at 941-42. The court reasoned:

Judicial process will assure [a union member] that before judgment is rendered he [*1079] will have notice of the specific charges on which the suit is based, time to prepare a defense and a full and fair hearing, and, if the judicial process was invoked improperly against the union member, he will have the full range of remedies provided by law.

556 F.2d at 941. Morrissey and Phillips, therefore, both stand for the proposition that when a union decides to bring charges against a member through the judicial system, as opposed to through union disciplinary procedures, there is no need for [27] the procedural protections afforded to union members by § 411(a)(5).

This Court finds it unnecessary to address the Morrissey - Phillips construction of § 411(a)(5), because the principle announced in those cases concerning § 411(a)(5) simply is not applicable to the instant matter. Plaintiffs did not allege, nor did they argue before the jury, that the state court action filed against them by the individual Defendants constituted "discipline" within the meaning of § 411(a)(5). They do not claim that they were denied procedural protections. Rather, they claim that their substantive free speech rights, as protected by § 411(a)(2), were infringed by a retaliatory lawsuit designed to stop them from speaking out in the future. Nothing in Morrissey or Phillips defeats this claim. See Murphy v. International Union of Operating Eng'rs, 774 F.2d 114, 121-22 (6th Cir. 1985) (citing Morrissey but still finding that "a suit may be brought to redress an infringement of section 411 rights even if no improper 'discipline' is shown").

Indeed, after addressing and rejecting a § 411(a)(5) claim, Phillips recognized that a retaliatory lawsuit may form the basis of [28] a Title I infringement claim. 556 F.2d at 942. The plaintiffs in Phillips alleged that the union had filed suit against them in order to prevent them from prosecuting actions they previously had filed against the union in a state court and before the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB"). 556 F.2d at 940. As union members, their right to file such actions is protected by § 411\(a\)\(4\).⁷ The Phillips court thus considered "whether the bringing of the malicious civil actions [by the union] . . . can be said to have limited the right of [the union member plaintiffs] to institute or to continue" NLRB and court actions protected by § 411\(a\)\(4\). 556 F.2d at 942. After noting that in a previous case, Operating Eng'rs Local Union No. 3 v. Burroughs, 417 F.2d 370 (9th Cir. 1969), the Ninth Circuit had found that disciplining a member through imposition of a fine for bringing a suit against the union constituted a violation of § 411\(a\)\(4\), the court stated:

It is thus established that the taking of retaliatory action against the member for having brought suit can operate to limit the right of that member to institute suit under this subsection. The fact that in Burroughs [29] the union retaliation was by union discipline for violation of a formal union rule, while here it was by way of malicious court actions, does not affect the result. If a union member's right to sue is to have any meaning, courts must be ever vigilant in protecting that right against indirect and subtle devices as well as against direct and obvious limitations.

556 F.2d at 942 (footnote omitted). Accordingly, the court reversed a lower court ruling dismissing the plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a claim under § 411\(a\)\(4\). 556 F.2d at 942.

[30] As in Phillips, the Plaintiff union members in the instant matter seek protection of Title I rights that have allegedly been infringed [*1080] through a retaliatory lawsuit. Here, the rights that they seek to protect are those free speech rights protected under § 411\(a\)\(2\). Clearly, the threat of a lawsuit and its attendant financial burdens could suppress those protected rights. Consequently, this Court concludes that Plaintiffs' claim of a violation of their § 411\(a\)\(2\) rights was properly presented to the jury.

C. SUFFICIENT EVIDENCE OF UNION COMPLICITY WAS AVAILABLE FOR SUBMISSION OF THE CASE TO A JURY.

Defendants, in both their original and supplemental briefs, attack the evidence concerning union complicity, arguing that it was insufficient for the jury to conclude that Local 243 participated in the state court action filed against Plaintiffs. Their attack seeks to discredit the available circumstantial evidence by examining it in a piecemeal fashion. Although any one of these pieces of evidence by itself might be insufficient for a finding of complicity, the evidence as a whole certainly was sufficient for the jury to conclude that the lawsuit was advanced and [31] supported by the Union. Because this Court cannot say that no reasonable jury could find in Plaintiffs' favor, granting judgment as a matter of law would be inappropriate. Furthermore, because this Court, upon reviewing the record, does not have a firm conviction that the jury reached the wrong conclusion, granting a new trial would be inappropriate. Indeed, the Court is convinced that the jury properly weighed the evidence.

In its May 27, 1993, Opinion and Order denying Defendants' motion for summary judgment, this Court relied principally upon four pieces of evidence of union complicity to preclude summary judgment: (1) a newspaper article in the Detroit Free Press in which a "Teamster spokesman" is quoted as saying that the purpose of the lawsuit was to "temper" Plaintiffs in the upcoming union election; (2) the fact that all of the members of the executive board of Local 243 participated in the state court litigation; (3) Defendant Union's admission in paragraph fourteen of its answer to the complaint that some work associated with the lawsuit was performed on Union time, and (4) the fact that some of this work was performed at Union offices. Further, it was alleged and then proven [32] that a union organizer, Thomas Ziembovic, effected service of process on Plaintiffs. At trial, the jury was presented with evidence concerning all of these items, with the exception of the Detroit Free Press article, which was excluded from the case.⁸ Consequently, this Court concludes that the jury's finding of union complicity was supported by the evidence.

⁷  Section 411\(a\)\(4\) states:

No labor organization shall limit the right of any member thereof to institute an action in any court, or in a proceeding before any administrative agency, irrespective of whether or not the labor organization or its officers are named as defendants or respondents in such action or proceeding, or the right of any member of a labor organization to appear as a witness in any judicial, administrative, or legislative proceeding, or to petition any legislature or to communicate with any legislator: Provided, That any such member may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures (but not to exceed a four-month lapse of time) within such organization, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organizations or any officer thereof: And provided further, That no interested employer or employer association shall directly or indirectly finance, encourage, or participate in, except as a party, any such action, proceeding, appearance, or petition.

[33] D. SUFFICIENT EVIDENCE OF IMPROPER MOTIVE WAS AVAILABLE FOR SUBMISSION OF THE CASE TO A JURY.

As with complicity, Defendants attack the evidence concerning improper motive in a piecemeal fashion, and fail to mention some of its more damaging aspects. The Court is confident that the jury reasonably found that the state lawsuit was filed with an improper motive. The timing of the lawsuit and Defendants' failure to prosecute it were telling indicia of that motive. Defendants brought the state court defamation action in the midst of a union election campaign in which Plaintiffs were opposing them. After the election was over and Defendants had won, they then largely failed to pursue their suit or participate in discovery. Indeed, several of the Defendants were involuntarily dismissed from the state court litigation due to their failure to appear for depositions. The remaining litigants eventually abandoned the action despite the fact that they had survived a motion for summary [*1081] disposition. Their failure to pursue the defamation action to its conclusion strongly suggests that their motive was improper. The jury so found, and this Court does not believe such a finding to [34] be against the weight of the evidence.

Relying on Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 94 S. Ct. 2997, 41 L. Ed. 2d 789 (1974) Defendant Union also argues that the jury should have been instructed that Plaintiffs must prove retaliatory motive by clear and convincing, as opposed to preponderant, evidence. Gertz held that public figures, who often intentionally seek public attention, may not recover for alleged defamation by a news organization absent a showing, by clear and convincing evidence, that the organization had at least a reckless disregard for the truth. 418 U.S. at 342, 94 S. Ct. at 3008. Defendant Union asserts that the decision of the individual Defendants to file a lawsuit, like the decision of a publisher to print information about public figures, is protected by the First Amendment. It follows, according to Defendant, that proof of improper motive must be by clear and convincing evidence.

Among the reasons cited by the Gertz Court as justification for imposing a heightened standard of proof on public figures who elect to bring defamation suits against news organizations, the Court pointed to significant differences between public and private figures [35]⁹ and the need for protection of the press. 418 U.S. at 342-44, 94 S. Ct. at 3008-09. Neither of these concerns is present here. Moreover, Gertz held that the high standard of proof and degree of malice required in public figure defamation cases need not be extended to cases involving private figures. 418 U.S. at 345-46, 94 S. Ct. at 3010. Rather, "so long as they do not impose liability without fault, the States may define for themselves the appropriate standard of liability for a publisher or broadcaster of defamatory falsehood injurious to a private individual." 418 U.S. at 347, 94 S. Ct. at 3010. Because Plaintiffs are not public figures, Defendant Union's reliance on Gertz is without merit.

The [36] Gertz Court's First Amendment analysis is also inapplicable here because of the sources of the competing rights at issue. Although the First Amendment defines the right of the individual Defendants to bring a defamation suit, Title I of the LMRDA grants Plaintiffs the free speech rights they seek to vindicate in the instant suit. Nothing in § 411\(a\)\(2\) requires an elevated standard of proof, nor is there any case law which even implies that such a standard should apply.¹⁰ In this situation, the Court sees no basis, either in law or policy, to insist upon such a standard.

⁸ In an effort to determine whether the "Teamster spokesman" quoted in the Detroit Free Press article truly was a spokesperson for the Union, the reporter who wrote the article was subpoenaed to testify concerning the source of the comment attributed to that spokesperson. After a hearing, the Court found that the reporter could not be compelled to divulge his source, and the reporter refused to do so voluntarily. Because the comment in the article was offered both for its truth -- i.e., that the purpose of the state lawsuit was to "temper" Plaintiffs -- and to show union complicity in the lawsuit, and because, pursuant to the Court's ruling, neither basis for admission could be established, the Court excluded the article on both foundation and hearsay grounds.

E. EXHAUSTION OF INTERNAL UNION REMEDIES IS NOT REQUIRED.

Next, the Court rejects Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs' [\[37\]](#) failure to exhaust internal union remedies should bar their action.¹¹ As an initial matter, HN10[] the exhaustion requirement under Title I of the Landrum-Griffin Act plainly is permissive, not mandatory: "any such [labor organization] member may be required to exhaust reasonable hearing procedures . . . within such organization, before instituting legal or administrative proceedings against such organizations or any officer thereof . . ." 29 U.S.C. § 411 (emphasis added); see also NLRB v. Industrial Union of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, 391 U.S. 418, 88 S. Ct. 1717, 1723, 20 L. Ed. 2d 706 \(1968\) ("We conclude that 'may be required' is not a grant of authority to unions more firmly to police their members but a statement of policy that the public [\[*1082\]](#) tribunals whose aid is invoked may in their discretion stay their hands . . . while the aggrieved person seeks relief within the union."); Bise v. International Bhd. of Elec. Workers, 618 F.2d 1299, 1303 \(9th Cir. 1979\) ("The requirement of exhaustion of union remedies is a matter within the sound discretion of the courts." (footnote omitted)), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 904, 101 S. Ct. 279, 66 L. Ed. 2d 136 \(1980\).

[\[38\]](#) This Court thus invokes its discretion to waive the exhaustion requirement in this case. In support of this decision, the Court notes that a number of courts have singled out free speech actions as warranting waiver of the exhaustion requirement. See, e.g., Bradford v. Textile Workers, 563 F.2d 1138, 1140-41 \(4th Cir. 1977\) (recognizing exception to exhaustion requirement when free speech rights are implicated); Koenig v. Clark, 536 F. Supp. 753, 762 \(D.N.J. 1982\) (excusing exhaustion requirement in part because "plaintiff's allegations against the union and its officers include interference with protected speech rights"). The reason for such special concern for free speech claims is obvious. Congress passed the Landrum-Griffin Act to police internal union affairs. Although a union and its officers may be well-equipped to review discipline imposed for other forms of alleged misconduct, claims involving speech -- especially when that speech is critical of current union leadership -- often will demand independent review to ensure a just outcome.

In addition, this Court believes that by not raising the exhaustion issue prior to this motion, Defendants have waived it. See [\[39\] International Bhd. of Boilermakers Local 1603 v. Transue & Williams Corp.](#), 879 F.2d 1388, 1396 n.3 \(6th Cir. 1989\) (failure to plead limitations defense until post-trial motion constituted waiver of that defense).

F. COMMENCEMENT OF A LAWSUIT MAY CONSTITUTE INFRINGEMENT OF LANDRUM-GRIFFIN RIGHTS.

Relying on Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 \(1961\), United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 \(1965\), California Motor Transp. Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 92 S. Ct. 609, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642 \(1972\), and other cases, Defendant Local 243 argues in its supplemental brief that, by virtue of First Amendment protection, the bringing of a civil lawsuit can never be considered a violation of the Landrum-Griffin Act, or, alternatively, that it can be considered a violation of the Act only if it was a "sham" proceeding. The Local argues that, at the very least, the jury should have been told that they could find in favor of Plaintiffs only if they first determined that the state court lawsuit was a complete sham.¹² Defendant Local 243 further contends [\[40\]](#) that the Court exacerbated its failure to properly instruct the jury by submitting Defendants' defamation counterclaim to the jury at the same time, thereby implicitly instructing the jury that it was possible to find in favor of Plaintiffs while also determining that Defendants' defamation claim was meritorious.

Noerr and Pennington, supra, taken together, establish HN11[¹²] a principle of law often referred to as the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. "That doctrine holds that business interests may combine and lobby to influence the legislative, executive, or judicial branches of government or administrative agencies without violating the antitrust laws, because such activities are protected by the first amendment right of petition." Eaton v. Newport Bd. of Educ., 975 F.2d 292, 298 (6th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 508 U.S. 957, 124 L. Ed. 2d 674, 113 S. Ct. 2459 (1993). Although [41] the doctrine applies "regardless of the motives of the petitioners," 975 F.2d at 298, it is not without exception. "The Supreme Court has carved out a narrow 'sham' exception to this doctrine, which covers cases where the defendant intended to use the petitioning process merely to harass the plaintiff." 975 F.2d at 298.

[*1083] In Bill Johnson's Restaurants, Inc. v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 731, 103 S. Ct. 2161, 76 L. Ed. 2d 277 (1983), the Supreme Court discussed the parameters of the "sham" exception within the context of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). The question before the Court in that case was "whether the National Labor Relations Board may issue a cease-and-desist order to halt the prosecution of a state-court civil suit brought by an employer to retaliate against employees for exercising federally-protected labor rights, without also finding that the suit lacks a reasonable basis in fact or law." 461 U.S. at 733, 103 S. Ct. at 2165 (emphasis added). The case arose when an employee of Bill Johnson's Restaurants was fired after engaging in union organizing activities. 461 U.S. at 733, 103 S. Ct. at 2165. The discharged employee filed unfair labor practice charges with the [42] NLRB, and, with the aid of fellow employees, began a picketing campaign at the restaurant that included distribution of a leaflet alleging wrongdoing by restaurant management. 461 U.S. at 733-34, 103 S. Ct. at 2165. The restaurant and three of its co-owners filed a complaint in state court seeking injunctive relief from the picketing activity and damages for, among other things, allegedly libelous statements made in the leaflet. 461 U.S. at 734, 103 S. Ct. at 2165. In response to this state court litigation, the former employee filed additional charges with the NLRB, claiming that the restaurant had filed the state suit in retaliation for her protected activities, including her initial decision to file charges with the NLRB. 461 U.S. at 734-35, 103 S. Ct. at 2165. The General Counsel for the NLRB issued a complaint against the restaurant alleging unfair labor practices.¹³ 461 U.S. at 735, 103 S. Ct. at 2165.

[43] After noting that the broad scope of the NLRA provided some support for the Board's position that a civil lawsuit can be an unfair labor practice, and thus can be enjoined, if it is pursued with a retaliatory motive, the Court cited "weighty countervailing considerations." 461 U.S. at 740-41, 103 S. Ct. at 2168-69. In particular, the Court discussed its development of the "sham" exception in an earlier case arising under antitrust law:

In California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 510, 92 S. Ct. 609, 611, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642 (1972), we recognized that HN13[¹⁴] the right of access to the courts is an aspect of the First Amendment right to petition the Government for redress of grievances. Accordingly, we construed the antitrust laws as not prohibiting the filing of a lawsuit, regardless of the plaintiff's anticompetitive intent or purpose in doing so, unless the suit was a "mere sham" filed for harassment purposes.

¹³ Those allegations were based on a provision in the NLRA defining unfair labor practices by an employer. See HN12[¹⁵] 29 U.S.C. § 158(a). That provision states, in relevant part:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer--

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in section [7 of the Act];

* * * * *

(4) to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this Act.

Section 7 guarantees employees "the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, . . . and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection." 29 U.S.C. § 157.

461 U.S. at 741, 103 S. Ct. at 2169 (citation omitted). HN14[] The Court reasoned that this same First Amendment right should inform its construction of the NLRA, and concluded:

The filing and prosecution of a well-founded lawsuit may [44] not be enjoined as an unfair labor practice, even if it would not have been commenced but for the plaintiff's desire to retaliate against the defendant for exercising rights protected by the Act.

461 U.S. at 741-43, 103 S. Ct. at 2169-70 (emphasis added).

Apart from its desire to protect the First Amendment right of employers to seek redress in state court, the Court in Bill Johnson's [*1084] cited two additional factors that entered into its decision. First, the Court was concerned with limiting the power of the federal government to interfere with state court litigation. The Court recognized a "substantial state interest 'in protecting the health and well-being of its citizens.'" 461 U.S. at 742, 103 S. Ct. at 2169 (quoting Farmer v. United Bhd. of Carpenters & Joiners, Local 25, 430 U.S. 290, 303, 97 S. Ct. 1056, 1065, 51 L. Ed. 2d 338 \(1977\)). Second, the Court recognized that because the NLRB is powerless to grant relief to employers, "if the Board is allowed to enjoin the prosecution of a well-grounded state lawsuit, it necessarily follows that any state plaintiff subject to such an injunction will be totally deprived of a remedy for an actual injury." 461 U.S. at 742, 103 S. Ct. at 2169 (citing Linn v. Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53, 63, 86 S. Ct. 657, 663, 15 L. Ed. 2d 582 \(1966\)).

After announcing a general rule and discussing its underlying bases, the Court described the steps the NLRB should take "in evaluating whether a state-court suit lacks the requisite basis." 461 U.S. at 744, 103 S. Ct. at 2170. The Court held:

HN15[] If there is a genuine issue of material fact that turns on the credibility of witnesses or on the proper inferences to be drawn from undisputed facts, it cannot, in our view, be concluded that the suit should be enjoined. When a suit presents genuine factual issues, the state plaintiff's First Amendment interest in petitioning the state court for redress of his grievance, his interest in having the factual dispute resolved by a jury, and the State's interest in protecting the health and welfare of its citizens, lead us to construe the Act as not permitting the Board to usurp the traditional factfinding function of the state-court jury or judge. Hence, we conclude that if a state plaintiff is able to present the Board with evidence that shows his lawsuit raises genuine issues of material fact, the Board should proceed [46] no further with the § 8(a)(1)-§ 8(a)(4) unfair labor practice proceedings but should stay those proceedings until the state-court suit has been concluded.

461 U.S. at 745-746, 103 S. Ct. at 2171 (footnotes omitted). In a footnote, the Court suggested that the NLRB consult the standards used by courts to decide motions for directed verdict and summary judgment. 461 U.S. at 745 n.11, 103 S. Ct. at 2171 n.11. Furthermore, "HN16[] just as the Board must refrain from deciding genuinely disputed material factual issues with respect to a state suit, it likewise must not deprive a litigant of his right to have genuine state-law legal questions decided by the state judiciary." 461 U.S. at 746, 103 S. Ct. at 2172 (footnote omitted).

Accordingly, HN17[] when presented with an unfair labor practice claim that also seeks to enjoin the employer's prosecution of a state court lawsuit against the union or its members, the NLRB must stay its proceedings if the state suit has arguable merit, regardless of the employer's motivation for bringing the suit. Once the state court litigation has ended, however, the NLRB may proceed as follows:

In instances where the Board must allow the lawsuit to proceed, [47] if the employer's case in the state court ultimately proves meritorious and he has judgment against the employees, the employer should also prevail before the Board, for the filing of a meritorious lawsuit, even for a retaliatory motive, is not an unfair labor practice. If judgment goes against the employer in the state court, however, or if his suit is withdrawn or is otherwise shown to be without merit, the employer has had its day in court, the interest of the State in providing a forum for its citizens has been vindicated, and the Board may then proceed to adjudicate the § 8(a)(1) and §

8(a)(4) unfair labor practice case. The employer's suit having proved unmeritorious, the Board would be warranted in taking that fact into account in determining whether the suit had been filed in retaliation for the exercise of the employee's § 7 rights.

Bill Johnson's, 461 U.S. at 747, 103 S. Ct. at 2172 (emphasis added); see also Johnson & Hardin Co. v. NLRB, 49 F.3d 237, 242-243 (6th Cir. 1995); Diamond Walnut Growers, Inc. v. NLRB, 53 F.3d 1085, 1089 (9th Cir. 1995) ("Although . . . the mere lack of a [*1085] lawsuit's success does not by itself establish retaliation, it [48] may be taken into account along with other factors in determining retaliatory motive."); NLRB v. International Union of Operating Eng'r's, Local 520, 15 F.3d 677, 679 (7th Cir. 1994) ("If a union's lawsuit has been finally adjudicated and the union has not prevailed, its lawsuit is deemed meritless." (footnote omitted)).

In sum, although Bill Johnson's proscribes federal interference with arguably meritorious state court actions, the Court did not completely forbid federal involvement. HN18[¹⁸] If a state court action utterly lacks merit, the Board may properly enjoin it. Moreover, and more to the point in the instant matter, federal interests may be freely asserted once the state court litigation has ended and the threat of interference no longer exists. At that point, a federal authority may find that the state court lawsuit was filed in bad faith, even if it was not so lacking in merit as to warrant an earlier injunction. Indeed, the Court in Bill Johnson's found that termination of the state court suit diminishes the Board's obligation to examine that suit's allegations for any signs of possible merit. The Board instead may rely on the disposition of the state court action, [49] even if it was not disposed of on the merits. A state lawsuit therefore could survive summary judgment and nevertheless be deemed merit less by the Board, so long as the suit did not ultimately terminate in the plaintiff's favor.

The principles announced in Bill Johnson's readily extend to cases like the instant one that involve alleged retaliation for exercise of Landrum-Griffin Act rights. In particular, none of the concerns that prompted the Supreme Court's limitation of NLRB power to enjoin state lawsuits is present here. Plaintiffs do not seek an injunction to halt prosecution of a state action; rather, they seek compensation for the injury they suffered as a result of previously concluded litigation. Accordingly, "the interest of the State in providing a forum for its citizens has been vindicated." Bill Johnson's, 461 U.S. at 747, 103 S. Ct. at 2172.

Moreover, Defendants' First Amendment right of access to the courts has not been diminished in any way. Defendants had their day in state court; they chose to withdraw their lawsuit well before the instant action was filed. Beyond that, by pursuing their defamation claims anew in this Court, Defendants further vindicated [50] their First Amendment rights. Unlike the NLRB, this Court has the power to compensate the individual Defendants for Plaintiffs' allegedly tortious conduct toward them. The jury simply chose not to.

Furthermore, although Bill Johnson's does not require an express finding that a previously concluded lawsuit was a "sham" proceeding, this Court has already determined that the record amply supports a determination that the state court action initiated by Defendants was a "sham" brought only for the purpose of harassment. As discussed above, not only did the individual Defendants withdraw from the suit after the election was over, but they also refused to participate in discovery or submit to depositions, despite the fact that they were the parties who had initiated the suit.

These indications of an improper motive thus distinguish the instant case from Eaton v. Newport Bd. of Educ., 975 F.2d 292 (6th Cir. 1992), in which the court invoked the Noerr-Pennington doctrine to shield the defendants from liability. The plaintiff in Eaton had been discharged from his position as a school principal, and he alleged that this discharge resulted in part from actions taken by two defendants, [51] the Kentucky Education Association ("KEA") and its managing agent, in support of their belief that Eaton should be dismissed for having made a racist remark. 975 F.2d at 296-97. Eaton claimed that the defendants had organized a demonstration against him at a school board meeting, and that the KEA had threatened to file a lawsuit against the school board if they did not fire him. 975 F.2d at 295. The court held that the defendants were entitled to judgment as a matter of law:

All of the actions taken by the defendants, even if everything Eaton says is true, are simply not actionable because they are all protected by the first amendment. In short, what Eaton attempts to characterize as a conspiracy is more accurately [*1086] and commonly known as free expression and political organizing.

975 F.2d at 297.

Defendant Local 243 argues that Eaton controls the instant case because the filing of the state lawsuit by the individual Defendants was protected by the First Amendment. However, the tort of malicious prosecution belies Defendant's broad reading of Eaton; litigants are subject to tort liability for bringing groundless suits notwithstanding their First Amendment rights. [\[52\]](#)¹⁴ Defendant's contention also overlooks the "sham" exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. The Eaton court expressly found that the "sham" exception did not apply in that case, because the defendants had intended to achieve a permissible goal, the plaintiff's discharge, rather than intending "to use the petitioning process merely to harass the plaintiff." 975 F.2d at 298. In contrast, the jury here found that Defendants filed their state lawsuit to retaliate for Plaintiffs' exercise of their § 411\(a\)\(2\) rights, rather than to achieve the permissible object of recovering for injuries resulting from Plaintiffs' alleged defamation.

[\[53\]](#) Finally, this Court finds no irreconcilable conflict between Plaintiffs' claims under the Landrum-Griffin Act and Defendants' defamation claims. Defendants' state court litigation having terminated, the jury needed only to determine whether that litigation was commenced with an improper motive. As Bill Johnson's demonstrates in its description of the NLRB's course of action once a state lawsuit has ended, the jury here was not required to examine the underlying merits of Defendants' state lawsuit in order to resolve Plaintiffs' claims. Bill Johnson's suggests that the jury would have been precluded as a matter of law from finding that the state lawsuit was improperly brought only if Defendants had prevailed in that earlier suit. Because they did not, the question of Defendants' motives in bringing the earlier suit was left to the jury. The possible merit of that earlier suit was at most a factor the jury was free to consider in determining whether Defendants' motives were improper. Thus, although there may be some common issues, the merit of Defendants' defamation claims is a distinct question from Defendants' motives in bringing the state lawsuit.

Another district [\[54\]](#) court recently reached a similar conclusion under a nearly identical set of facts. In Morris v. Scardelletti, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12559, No. 94-3557, 1995 WL 508210 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 21, 1995), the court considered the defendants' argument that their First Amendment right to bring a lawsuit shielded them from liability in the plaintiffs' LMRDA claims. The defendants had asserted pendent state law defamation claims in a previous federal action, but those claims had been dismissed for want of jurisdiction after the federal claims were settled. 1995 WL 508210 at *1. The defendants then reasserted their state law claims as counterclaims in the instant suit, in which the plaintiffs charged that the defendants' prior suit was filed to retaliate against the plaintiffs' rival union activities, and thus infringed their Title I rights. 1995 WL 508210 at *1. The court rejected the defendants' argument that summary judgment should be granted because the prior action "had a reasonable basis in law and fact," and thus was protected activity under the First Amendment.

HN19 The question of whether the claims raised in [the prior action], and reraised as counterclaims here, have a reasonable basis is beyond doubt a jury issue. [\[55\]](#) Among the issues that must be considered in determining "reasonableness" is the subjective intent of the [defendants] in initially bringing their claims. As we made clear [in an earlier opinion], the First Amendment rights of the defendants are in conflict with the Title I rights of the plaintiffs. It is the question of reasonableness upon which the parties' rights will diverge. If [\[*1087\]](#) the plaintiffs successfully prove that the intent of the defendants was to retaliate against them for their rival union activities, the jury would be within its bounds to conclude the plaintiffs suffered an abridgement [of] their Title I rights.

Dual remedies are appropriate because a State has a substantial interest in deterring the filing of baseless litigation in its courts, and the Federal Government has an equally strong interest in enforcing the federal labor laws. The Federal Government need not rely on state remedies to ensure that its interests are served.

1995 WL 508210 at *1 (emphasis added). The court also found that factual disputes precluded summary judgment for the plaintiffs on their LMRDA claims and the defendants' counterclaims. 1995 WL 508210 at *3. Morris thus supports this Court's determination that Plaintiffs' LMRDA claims were not precluded by Defendants' First Amendment protections, but instead were properly submitted to the jury along with Defendants' defamation claims.

In conclusion, because the individual Defendants' state court defamation claims were dismissed without a finding [56] in their favor, the jury's determination that the state lawsuit infringed Plaintiffs' § 411\(a\)\(2\) rights was consistent with the law. This is so, contrary to Defendant Local 243's argument, even absent an express finding that the state lawsuit was a "sham." Accordingly, this Court finds no error in its jury instructions.

G. THIS COURT PROPERLY ASSESSED LIABILITY AGAINST THE INDIVIDUAL DEFENDANTS AS WELL AS DEFENDANT LOCAL 243.

The individual Defendants' motion for relief from judgment is easily disposed of. Defendants correctly note that the Rule upon which they rely permits correction of judgments only on the basis of "clerical mistakes." Fed. R. Civ. P. 60\(a\). Citing various passages from the trial transcript, Defendants contend that the assessment of liability against the individual Defendants for violation of the Landrum-Griffin Act represents such a "clerical mistake," or at least an error that is utterly mechanical and apparent from the record. According to Defendants, the trial transcript shows that the parties and this Court all understood that only Defendant Local 243 could be held liable under Plaintiffs' LMRDA claims.

The trial transcript reflects no such [57] common understanding. Instead, the passages cited by Defendants reflect the Court's understanding that the individual Defendants could be held liable for infringement of Plaintiffs' Title I rights only if, as the Court explicitly instructed the jury, the individual Defendants "were acting under the color of union authority" or were otherwise aided by the Local in filing their state lawsuit. (Trial Tr., June 25, 1993, at 136). The passages quoted by Defendants thus show that union complicity was an element of Plaintiffs' LMRDA claims, and that the individual Defendants consequently would have been free of liability if Plaintiffs had failed to establish that element. Those passages, however, neither state nor even imply that the individual Defendants would be free of liability regardless of Plaintiffs' showing of complicity.

Indeed, this Court has previously found in this same litigation that actions under Title I of the Landrum-Griffin Act can be pursued against individuals as well as unions. Clark v. Esser, 821 F. Supp. 1230, 1235 \(E.D. Mich. 1993\). The individual Defendants' belief that they were exempt from liability thus is especially unavailing here. Regardless [58] of whether the individual Defendants were generally aware that they were subject to liability for Title I violations, they were expressly advised by this Court that they could be held liable under Plaintiffs' particular claims. Moreover, Plaintiffs specifically asserted in their trial brief that Defendant Local 243 and the individual Defendants would be jointly and severally liable for damages should Plaintiffs prevail. Finally, Plaintiffs' understanding that both the Local and the individual Defendants were subject to liability can certainly be implied from Plaintiffs' naming of all of the Defendants in their initial complaint.

The individual Defendants cannot hope to overcome these plain declarations of joint liability among all of the Defendants by claiming an unstated "common understanding" to the contrary. If the individual Defendants believed that they were legally exempt from liability, they would have been well advised to seek dismissal from the case on that basis. If, on the other hand, they believed that the facts could not establish their liability as individuals, the jury finding of union complicity shows that this belief was [*1088] not shared by the trier of fact. Accordingly, [59] this Court rejects as utterly without merit the individual Defendants' contention that they were erroneously named in the Court's judgment.

V. CONCLUSION

907 F. Supp. 1069, *1088 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17286, 59

NOW, THEREFORE, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that Defendants' Motion for Judgment Notwithstanding the Verdict or in the Alternative for a New Trial be DENIED, and that the individual Defendants' Motion for Relief from Judgment also be DENIED.

POOLE, Circuit Judge:

Appellants, cable television operators Colony Communications, Inc. ("Colony") and Palmer Communications, Inc. ("Palmer"), [\[2\]](#) interlocutorily appeal the district court's denial of their motion to dismiss on federal preemption grounds competitor Total TV's diversity action. We granted permission to appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292\(b\), and we affirm.¹

I. Background

Colony is a franchised cable operator that provides cable television services in California and other parts of the United States. Before it was purchased by Colony, Palmer was also a franchised cable operator in California. They are subject to federal regulation as franchised cable operators, under both the Cable Communications Policy Act of 1984, 47 U.S.C. §§ 521 et seq. \(1988\)(amended 1992), and the Cable Television Consumer Protection and Competition Act of 1992, 47 U.S.C. §§ 521 et seq. \(Supp. IV 1992\)(collectively "the Cable Acts"). Total TV operates as a "cable television dealer" and [\[3\]](#) competes with Colony and Palmer for certain private customers² in the Coachella Valley of Riverside County, California, but is not subject to federal regulation of its subscriber rates because it is a non-franchised dealer.

This action was originally filed in California state court by Total TV, which maintains that appellants are attempting to drive it out of the Coachella Valley by engaging in below-cost predatory pricing with the intent to destroy competition in violation of the California Unfair Practices Act ("UPA"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17043.³ Total TV seeks monetary damages and an injunction prohibiting appellants from continuing [\[4\]](#) their predatory pricing. Colony and Palmer claim that such relief would prohibit them from charging their current rates, effectively regulating them in contravention of the Cable Acts.

The action was removed by the appellants to the Central District of California on the basis of diversity of citizenship. Colony and Palmer then filed a motion to dismiss Total TV's complaint pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(6\), based on the express preemption provisions of the Cable Acts. On May 28, 1993, the district court issued a tentative motion granting the motion to dismiss. However, after ordering additional briefing, [\[*301\]](#) the district court issued an order on September 20, 1993, denying the appellants' motion to dismiss on preemption grounds. [\[5\]](#) On December 20, 1993, the district court certified that order for interlocutory appeal, and on January 21, 1994, we granted appellants' petition to review the order.

II. Rate Regulation

HN2⁴ We review de novo a dismissal for failure to state a claim pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(6\). Everest and Jennings, Inc. v. American Motorists Ins. Co., 23 F.3d 226, 228 \(9th Cir. 1994\). All allegations of material fact are taken as true and construed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Id. We also review de novo the district court's decision regarding preemption. See Aloha Airlines, Inc. v. Ahue, 12 F.3d 1498, 1500 \(9th Cir. 1993\) (reviewing the district court's determination that ERISA preempted a state law claim); Holman v. Laulo-Rowe Agency, 994 F.2d 666, 668 \(9th Cir. 1993\) (reviewing the district court's determination that FCIA preempted all state law claims).

¹ The motion of the California Cable Television Association to file an amicus curiae brief on behalf of appellants is granted. The brief submitted on May 2, 1994 is deemed filed.

² These so called "private customers" live in private or gated communities represented by homeowner associations. The associations enter into contracts with cable television operators to provide service throughout the communities. The associations are billed directly for cable service and typically pass the costs onto the individual residents as part of the monthly dues.

The issue of whether the Cable Acts preempt state laws is one of first impression in this Circuit. The 1992 Act provides in relevant part: "HN3[⁴] no federal agency or state may regulate the rates for the provision of cable services." 47 U.S.C. § 543\(a\)\(1\) (Supp. IV 1992).⁴ We hold that the Cable Acts do [\[6\]](#) not preempt the provisions of the UPA that Total TV invokes because these provisions do not regulate appellants' rates. The UPA is "not a price fixing statute at all. It merely fixes a level below which the producer or distributor may not sell with intent to injure a competitor." People v. Gordon, 105 Cal. App. 2d 711, 234 P.2d 287, 292 \(Cal. 1951\) (quoting Wholesale Tobacco Dealers Bureau Inc. v. National Candy & Tobacco Co., 11 Cal. 2d 634, 82 P.2d 3, 15 \(Cal. 1938\)).

Even assuming that Total [\[7\]](#) TV receives the relief it requests, Colony's and Palmer's prices will not be regulated directly and, as long as they do not act with discriminatory purpose, they will be free to "sell [their] merchandise at any price [they] please in the ordinary course of business." Food & Grocery Bureau of So. Cal. v. United States, 139 F.2d 973, 974 \(9th Cir. 1943\). Therefore, the UPA provisions in question do not operate to regulate rates within the meaning of the Cable Acts' preemption clause. Nowhere in the legislative history of either Act is there a suggestion that "rate regulation" includes predatory pricing or price discrimination measures.

Our conclusion is bolstered by the D.C. Circuit's recent decision affirming the F.C.C.'s interpretation that the prohibition of negative option billing is "a consumer protection provision rather than rate regulation." Time Warner Entertainment Co. v. FCC, 56 F.3d 151, 194 \(D.C. Cir. 1995\). The D.C. Circuit concluded that the statutory prohibition of negative option billing did not preempt, but rather coexisted with, state consumer protection laws. Id. at 192-93. Like the UPA, the negative option laws are directed at the seller's conduct [\[8\]](#) rather than the seller's actual rates. Because they do not directly affect rates, they are not rate regulations.

Appellants' reliance on Storer Cable Communications v. City of Montgomery, Ala. is misplaced. 806 F. Supp. 1518, 1542-44 \(M.D. Ala. 1992\) (holding that an ordinance regulating rates charged to subscribers was preempted by the 1984 Cable Act). The statute at issue in Storer not only set particular cable television rates, but was directed specifically at the cable industry in clear violation of the Cable Acts.⁵ Id.

[\[9\]](#) [\[*302\]](#) III. Preemption

HN5[⁴] The Supremacy Clause invalidates state laws that "interfere with, or are contrary to" federal law. See U.S. Const., Art. VI, cl. 2; Hillsborough County, Fla. v. Automated Medical Labs., 471 U.S. 707, 712-13, 85 L. Ed. 2d 714, 105 S. Ct. 2371 \(1985\) (quoting Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. \(9 Wheat.\) 1, 211, 6 L. Ed. 23 \(1824\)). There are three types of federal preemption of state statutes: (1) express preemption; (2) implied preemption; and (3) preemption that arises because the federal and state statutes conflict, making compliance with both impossible. Hillsborough County, 471 U.S. at 713. We consider only the theory of express preemption in this appeal.⁶

[10] In determining the preemptive scope of the Cable Acts, we must discern and effectuate Congressional intent. Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 112 S. Ct. 2608, 2617, 120 L. Ed. 2d 407 (1992) ("the purpose of Congress is the ultimate touchstone' of preemption analysis") (quoting Malone v. White Motor Corp., 435 U.S. 497, 504, 55 L. Ed. 2d 443, 98 S. Ct. 1185 (1978)). The Cable Acts were passed to foster competition in the cable industry. See Time Warner, 56 F.3d at 184 ("The government's interest in regulating cable rates is evident - protecting consumers from monopoly prices charged by cable operators who do not face effective competition.").

The UPA complements, not undermines, the Cable Acts. Like the Cable Acts, the UPA was designed to "encourage competition, by prohibiting unfair . . . and discriminatory practices by which fair and honest competition is destroyed or prevented." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17001. Thus, the Cable Acts do not preempt the UPA because the federal laws and the state law share the same purpose. See Inglis v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 668 F.2d 1014, 1050 n.62 (9th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 825, 74 L. Ed. 2d 61, 103 S. Ct. 57, 103 S. Ct. 58 (1982).

Although under certain circumstances federal regulations have been held [11] to explicitly preempt generally applicable state statutes, see, e.g., Alliance Shippers, Inc. v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., 858 F.2d 567, 569-70 (9th Cir. 1988) (claims brought under California state antitrust statutes preempted by Staggers Railway Act), Congress clearly did not intend the Cable Acts to preempt generally applicable state antitrust laws such as the UPA. By stipulating in § 543(a) of the 1984 Cable Act that a federal agency may not "regulate the rates" for cable services, Congress revealed its intent to limit preemption of state law under the Cable Acts. See 47 U.S.C. § 543(a) (1988) (amended 1992). The Supreme Court has differentiated between the phrases "regulate" and "related to regulation." See Morales v. Trans World Airlines, Inc., 504 U.S. 374, 377, 119 L. Ed. 2d 157, 112 S. Ct. 2031 (1992) and Pilot Life Ins. Co. v. Dedeaux, 481 U.S. 41, 47, 95 L. Ed. 2d 39, 107 S. Ct. 1549 (1987). The former is associated with a more limited preemptive intent. The latter phrase, which is not used in § 543(a), signifies a broad preemptive purpose sufficient to preempt state laws of general application such as the UPA. Other courts have held similarly regarding the preemptive scope of § 543. See Cable Television Ass'n v. Finneran, I121 954 F.2d 91, 101 (2d Cir. 1992) ("the language of the preemption clause at issue [e.g. § 543(a)] fails to evince an intention to carve out a wide area free of state regulation").

Most importantly, the legislative history of the Cable Acts cements our belief that they were not meant to preempt laws of general applicability. In its amendment to the 1992 Act, Congress quite explicitly stated that it did not intend the Cable Acts to dilute enforcement of statutes like the UPA. Congress noted that "nothing in the Cable [*303] Television Consumer Protection Act of 1991 shall be construed to alter or restrict in any manner the applicability of any Federal or State antitrust law." 47 U.S.C. § 521 note, 106 Stat. 1503 ("§ 27").⁷ Senator Metzenbaum's comment that the amendment makes "clear that cable companies will still be fully subject to the antitrust laws," also supports our conclusion that the intent of 47 U.S.C. § 543(a)(1) was not to preempt statutes such as the UPA. 138 Cong. Rec. S654-01, S661 (daily ed. Jan 30, 1992).⁸ When the intent of Congress is as clear and well-defined as it

MR. METZENBAUM: The third matter that has been of concern to me has to do with the question of whether or not this act would in any way provide an exemption from the antitrust laws. The amendment [§ 27] makes it clear that cable companies will still be fully subject to the antitrust laws.

The amendment is actually needed because S. 12 [the 1992 Cable Act] contains provisions which are designed to prevent anticompetitive conduct by cable companies and some cable companies might very well argue that Congress intended to have the procompetitive regulatory provisions of S. 12 serve as a substitute for the antitrust laws. This amendment will prevent needless litigation over this issue by clarifying that the antitrust laws still apply in full to the cable industry.

is here, we "must give effect to [that] unambiguously expressed intent. . . ." Chevron USA Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 842-43, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694, 104 S. Ct. 2778 (1984).

[14] Giving effect to § 27 will not effectively nullify § 543(a)(1). There is a wide range of competitive rates that a cable company could establish that are neither excessive nor below cost. As the district court noted, § 27 and § 543(a)(1) can be reconciled by giving effect to both sections through a reasonable interpretation based on the history and purpose of the Cable Acts. We adopt the district court's suggestion that "in light of the clear mandate of Section 27 that state antitrust laws not be preempted, § 543(a)(1) applies only to those situations involving a statute (or local ordinance) directly aimed at the cable industry and affecting or regulating rates."

Appellants' argument that § 27 has no application outside the scope of the 1992 Act because § 543(a)'s express preemption of state rate regulation predicated the 1992 Cable Act is without merit. Section 27 was not added to the 1992 Act to change the preemptive scope of § 543. Exempting rate regulation under the 1984 Act from antitrust laws but then removing that immunity in the 1992 Act would leave an intervening window of eight years. That eight year period not only runs directly counter to the legislative history, [15] but is also plainly impractical.

Lastly, § 556(c) of both Cable Acts, which provides that "any provision of law of any State . . . which is inconsistent with this chapter shall be deemed to be preempted and superseded," is not relevant in this instance because the UPA is consistent with the Cable Acts. Section 556(c) is simply a recognition that Congress did not intend to fully occupy the field of cable television regulation. Because the purposes of the Cable Acts and the state antitrust laws are consistent, [*304] and a hypothetical conflict is not a sufficient basis for preemption, the UPA is not preempted by § 556(c). See Inglis, 668 F.2d at 1049.

AFFIRMED.

End of Document

. . . It is my understanding that this amendment is in accord with the intention of the managers of the bill, and if that is the case, I am prepared to move forward with this amendment.

MR. INOUYE: Madam President, the amendment before us is the result of over 10 hours of discussions and consultations involving the distinguished Senator from Ohio, several members of the committee, and countless numbers of staff people.

We have studied the amendment very carefully, and we find that it is acceptable.

MR. DANFORTH: Madam President, after discussing this matter with Senator Metzenbaum earlier in the day, we have discussed it with the staff of the Judiciary Committee . . . The amendment is not objectionable . . .

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The amendment (No. 1518) was agreed to.

If the intent of Congress is clear, that is the end of the matter; for the court, as well as the agency, must give effect to the unambiguously expressed intent of Congress. But if the statute is silent or ambiguous with respect to the specific issue, the question for the court is whether the agency's answer is based on a permissible construction of the statute.

[*1363] WALD, Circuit Judge: Petitioners Cleveland Electric Illuminating Company, Ohio Edison Company, and Toledo Edison Company ("Licensees") seek review of an order by the United States Nuclear Regulatory Commission ("NRC" or "Commission") denying their applications to suspend antitrust conditions imposed on two nuclear power plants owned by Licensees. The City of Cleveland, American Municipal Power-Ohio, and the City of Brook Park ("Cleveland") also appeal a separate order by the Commission denying their challenge to its statutory authority to suspend antitrust conditions. We affirm the Commission's order denying Licensees' suspension applications. We also hold that Cleveland has not demonstrated it was aggrieved by the ruling it challenges, and therefore dismiss Cleveland's petition [3] without reaching the merits.

I. BACKGROUND

HN1  The Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, ("AEA" or "Act") authorizes the NRC to impose remedial conditions on a nuclear power plant if "activities under the [plant's operating] license would create or maintain a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws." AEA, 42 U.S.C. § 2135\(c\)\(5\) \(1988\) ("§ 105(c)"). HN2[ To ensure that conditions are imposed as necessary, the Act directs the NRC to seek a recommendation from the Attorney General and make a finding as to whether the plant's activities will have an adverse antitrust impact, before issuing a license. Id.

A. Initial License Proceedings

As required by the Act, the NRC considered potential antitrust problems during the initial license proceedings for the two plants owned by Licensees, the Perry Nuclear Power Plant and the Davis-Besse Nuclear Power Station, Toledo Edison Co., 10 N.R.C. 265 \(1979\), aff'g as modified 5 N.R.C. 133 \(1977\). Because the Commission's findings are relevant to the question of whether the license conditions can be retained even though the power produced by these stations turned out to be higher in cost than power from alternative sources, [\[4\]](#) we discuss those proceedings in some detail.

In its order imposing antitrust conditions on the plants, the Commission first made extensive findings of fact about ongoing anticompetitive acts by the Licensees that were directed against smaller electric utilities in the region competing with Licensees for sale of wholesale and retail power. The three Licensees who are petitioners in this proceeding, along with two other neighboring electric utilities who did not join petitioners' suspension request, formed a regional power pool called the Central Area Power Coordination group ("CAPCO"). The purpose of CAPCO was to "coordinate installation of generation and transmission in order to further reliability and to take advantage of scale economies." 5 N.R.C. at 152. Each CAPCO member dominated generation, transmission, and sale of electric energy within its particular service area, controlling between 94% and 100% of all generating capacity and transmission facilities, and accounting for between 94% and 100% of retail and wholesale sales. 5 N.R.C. at 153-54. This dominance was maintained, in part, by the companies' decision to operate as a unified system. CAPCO members coordinated their operation [\[5\]](#) through connections among all of the utilities ("interconnection"); sharing of power reserves during times of shortage, maintenance outages, and construction; and exchange and sale of various types of power at low rates. 5 N.R.C. at 154-55. CAPCO companies also engaged in coordinated development, constructing shared generating units and transmission facilities according to a joint plan. 5 N.R.C. at 153.

Not only did CAPCO members realize the legitimate benefits of economies of scale and coordinated operation, but more importantly, they used this arrangement to forestall competition from other smaller utilities in the region. CAPCO members avoided competition among themselves, through either explicit agreements or failure to solicit customers of fellow CAPCO utilities. 5 N.R.C. at 143, 190-95, 214-17. They denied competing utilities membership in the power pool and refused to make available to competitors any of the benefits of interconnection, including sharing of reserves and exchanges of emergency or economy rate power. 5 N.R.C. at 144 n.9, 224-25, 227-31. [\[*1364\]](#) CAPCO utilities also refused to "wheel" power, or transport it from outside utilities across their transmission lines, to competing [\[6\]](#) utilities inside CAPCO territory. 5 N.R.C. at 144 n.9. Due to economic and regulatory constraints, competitors could not construct their own duplicative transmission lines and, without CAPCO's cooperation, could not obtain access to outside power sources. 5 N.R.C. at 156-58. These competitors were often left with only one option--buying power from CAPCO utilities for resale--but CAPCO companies would sell their power only if competitors agreed to rate-fixing and other unfair and anticompetitive terms. 5 N.R.C. at 167-68, 177-78, 180-82, 200-03.

After examining these facts, the Commission concluded that the market structure created by CAPCO members through their formation of an exclusive power pool gave them the ability to prevent competing utilities from gaining access to the benefits of coordinated operation and economy of scale which they themselves enjoyed, and that this ability had, in fact, been used to create and maintain a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws. 5 N.R.C. at 238-41, 255; 10 N.R.C. at 281. The cooperative arrangement made this situation possible even though the power offered by CAPCO companies was higher in price than the power of competing smaller utilities. [\[7\]](#) 5 N.R.C. at 166 ("Rates and quality of service were and are the principal elements of competition between these utilities, with Cleveland traditionally offering lower rates and CEI greater reliability." (citations omitted)).

Pursuant to § 105(c), the Commission also determined that a substantial nexus existed between this anticompetitive situation and the construction of the nuclear plants at issue: the significant increase in generating capacity provided by the plants¹ would strengthen CAPCO's dominance of the regional electric power industry. 5 N.R.C. at 238-39 ("Within the [CAPCO territory], the generation of the nuclear units ineluctably will have a substantial effect on the supply and cost of power for each of the five Applicant companies."). Specifically, the new units would enhance Licensees' competitive position by "producing economies of scale and ... providing for long term generation costs well under average system costs which could be obtained either compared to the cost of operating their present generating equipment or in comparison to new generation relying upon fossil fueled units." 5 N.R.C. at 143. Additionally, the Commission found a strong link between plans [8] to construct new nuclear plants and plans to expand transmission facilities. The new plants would be cost-effective only if the CAPCO companies agreed to build additional shared high voltage transmission lines, and these extra transmission facilities, in turn, would make it even more difficult for smaller utilities to build alternative transmission systems. 5 N.R.C. at 156, 240. In sum, the Commission found, construction of the plants was "calculated to further increase [Licensees'] dominance" and thus maintained a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws. 5 N.R.C. at 144. Although the Commission expected that nuclear power would be low-cost and thus particularly advantageous to Licensees, its conclusions also rested on the degree to which the existing market structure allowed Licensees to control competitors' power supply options. 5 N.R.C. at 238-41.

[9] As a remedy, the NRC imposed antitrust conditions on the plants' licenses that were designed to ameliorate the competitive advantages conferred on licensees by ownership of the plants. 10 N.R.C. at 278. These conditions prohibited Licensees from making the sale of wholesale power or the coordination of services contingent upon agreements to allocate customers, forgo alternative power supplies, or refrain from participating in Commission antitrust proceedings. The conditions also required Licensees to connect their transmission lines with those of their competitors; wheel power for competitors; open up membership in CAPCO to competitors in the CAPCO territory; sell various types of power to competitors on the same terms offered to CAPCO members; share power reserves with interconnected facilities [*1365] that generate their own power; and give competitors access to power generated by Licensees' nuclear plants. 10 N.R.C. at 296-99.

B. Current Proceedings on Licensees' Request to Suspend Antitrust Conditions

Almost a decade later, Licensees filed applications with the NRC to suspend these § 105 license conditions. The Licensees claimed that, contrary to the expectations which had [10] motivated passage of § 105 antitrust protections, the cost of nuclear power far exceeded the cost of power from alternative sources. Thus, the Licensees argued, ownership of a nuclear plant could not confer any of the competitive advantages that Congress had feared and, given this turn of events, § 105(c) prohibited the NRC from retaining antitrust conditions on a nuclear plant that generated high cost power. After NRC staff rejected these applications for suspension, see Notice of Denial, 56 Fed. Reg. 20,057 (May 1, 1991), Licensees petitioned for a hearing on the denial.

At this juncture, Cleveland entered the proceedings to oppose Licensees' hearing request, arguing that the NRC had no statutory authority to consider applications for suspension of antitrust license conditions. Alternatively, Cleveland sought to intervene in any hearing held on the applications so that it could oppose the requested suspensions. The Atomic Safety and Licensing Board ("Licensing Board") dismissed Cleveland's petition on the grounds that the NRC did have authority to grant Licensees a hearing and to modify antitrust conditions subsequent to issuance of a license, and granted Cleveland's request [11] to intervene. Ohio Edison Co., 34 N.R.C. 229, 238, 239-45 (1991) (Prehearing Conference Order). Cleveland appealed the Licensing Board's rejection of its challenge to the Commission's authority to suspend, and the Commission affirmed that authority under several sections of the AEA. Ohio Edison Co., 36 N.R.C. 47, 59 (1992). Cleveland now petitions for review of that decision by this court.

¹The combined generating capacity of CAPCO members prior to construction of the plants was approximately 13,000 megawatts, and CAPCO anticipated that the new plants would add an extra 4,500 megawatts. 5 N.R.C. at 143.

In a subsequent stage of the proceedings, the Licensing Board considered the "bedrock" legal issue presented by the parties:

Is the Commission without authority as a matter of law under Section 105 of the Atomic Energy Act to retain the antitrust license conditions contained in an operating license if it finds that the actual cost of electricity from the licensed nuclear power plant is higher than the cost of electricity from alternative sources, all as appropriately measured and compared? ²

The Board ruled that neither the plain meaning of § 105(c), the provision's legislative history, general principles of antitrust law, nor prior NRC cases required a threshold showing of low-cost power production in order to maintain antitrust conditions challenged by a licensee. 36 [12] N.R.C. at 289-306. The Commission declined to accept Licensees' petition for review of the Board's decision, thereby converting the ruling into final agency action. See 10 C.F.R. § 2.786(c) (1995).

Licensees now appeal the NRC's ruling on the "bedrock" legal issue. They argue that the Commission ignored the plain meaning of § 105(c) by asserting the authority to maintain antitrust conditions on the operation of [13] a plant even when the cost of the nuclear power generated is higher than that of alternative sources of power. Cleveland also appeals the Commission's rejection of its challenge to the NRC's statutory authority to consider requests to suspend conditions under any circumstances. In response to Cleveland, the NRC contends that since Cleveland basically prevailed in the underlying proceeding which refused to suspend the conditions, it is not a "party aggrieved" as required by the Hobbs Act. 28 U.S.C. §§ 2342(4), 2344 (1988). We consider each challenge in turn.

[*1366] II. "BEDROCK" LEGAL ISSUE

The parties involved in the proceedings below formulated one issue for the NRC to address in considering Licensees' suspension application: Does § 105(c) permit the NRC to retain antitrust conditions on the operation of a nuclear plant when the cost of power generated by the plant is higher than the cost of power from available alternative sources? ³ In reviewing the NRC's answer to this question, we begin with the familiar principles of Chevron, which instruct that:

HN3 [↑] If the intent of Congress is clear, that is the end of the matter; for the court, as well as the agency, must give effect [14] to the unambiguously expressed intent of Congress.... [But if] the statute is silent or ambiguous with respect to the specific issue, the question for the court is whether the agency's answer is based on a permissible construction of the statute.

It should be noted that at oral argument, counsel for the Licensees contended that the NRC should have examined another variable in considering the "bedrock" issue: the cost of alternative sources of power, coupled with other factors such as their reliability and accessibility. Licensees did not explore this issue in their briefs, and were in fact able to point to only one oblique reference in their reply brief to this expanded definition of "alternative." It might be the case that if other utilities have not only cheaper sources of power, but also equivalent reliability and access to transmission facilities, more expensive power from a nuclear plant could not pose a competitive threat and § 105(c) conditions would not be needed. That question, however, was not considered by the NRC, and it is not before this court now.

Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 842-43, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694, 104 S. Ct. 2778 (1984). As explained in greater detail below, we certainly cannot find in § 105(c) any clear signal that a threshold showing of low-cost power production is or is not required in order to retain antitrust conditions on a license under § 105(c), and so we proceed to the second step of Chevron to examine whether the NRC's construction of that provision was reasonable and consistent with the purpose and structure of the Act and relevant legislative history. Ultimately, we find the NRC's interpretation of § 105(c) permissible.

[15] A. Chevron Step One

Paradoxically, both Licensees and the NRC contend that Congress has clearly spoken to the question of whether § 105(c) requires a preliminary finding of low-cost power production as a prerequisite to antitrust conditions. HN4↑ In determining whether clear intent exists, we look to the language of the statute, as well as "the language and design of the statute as a whole." ⁴ Fort Stewart Schools v. FLRA, 495 U.S. 641, 645, 109 L. Ed. 2d 659, 110 S. Ct. 2043 (1990) (quoting K Mart Corp. v. Cartier, Inc., 486 U.S. 281, 291, 100 L. Ed. 2d 313, 108 S. Ct. 1811 (1988)); Tataranowicz v. Sullivan, 294 U.S. App. D.C. 322, 959 F.2d 268, 276 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (citing McCarthy v. Bronson, 500 U.S. 136, 139, 114 L. Ed. 2d 194, 111 S. Ct. 1737 (1991); Crandon v. United States, 494 U.S. 152, 158, 108 L. Ed. 2d 132, 110 S. Ct. 997 (1990)), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 963 (1993).

[16] [*1367] Focusing their argument on the phrase in § 105(c)(5) that grants authority to impose conditions if "activities under the license" have an adverse antitrust impact, Licensees argue that these four words restrict the NRC's antitrust authority to situations where it can demonstrate that the actual operation of the plant creates or maintains an anticompetitive situation. Licensees claim that since electricity is a fungible commodity, the only difference between electricity generated by their nuclear plants and that from alternative sources is cost. Thus, ownership of a nuclear plant which generates more costly power than that of competitors necessarily imposes a competitive disadvantage, rather than enhancing the owner's competitive position on that basis. Licensees urge us to conclude that as a matter of law, any invocation of § 105(c) requires a preliminary showing that the power generated by the licensed plant is lower in cost than power from available alternative sources. There is a ready response to that argument.

Had Congress intended to require a threshold showing of low-cost power production before allowing the NRC to regulate under § 105(c), or had it determined that high-cost [17] plants could not pose a competitive threat, we believe it would have phrased that intent much more precisely. As it is, no reference at all is made to the cost of power in § 105(c). In fact, the plain language of § 105(c) undercuts Licensees' argument. As the initial license proceedings surrounding these plants well demonstrate, various plant "activities," such as generation of power that increases a utility's total capacity and reliability, or the construction of transmission facilities that make a new plant economically feasible, may further strengthen a utility's position in the regional electricity market, regardless of the cost of power generated by the plant. The words chosen by Congress allow a linkage of the NRC's antitrust authority to these kinds of "activities," rather than making it contingent only upon power costs.

Conversely, the NRC asserts that § 105(c)(5) clearly instructs the NRC to engage in a traditional antitrust analysis, as opposed to considering the higher cost of power as a threshold barrier beyond which no further analysis is necessary. It pins this claim on three other subsections of § 105 that discuss the Commission's regulatory authority. The NRC contends [18] that these provisions refer to utility behavior, not just cost, and argues that we must construe § 105(c)(5) in a similar manner. The NRC first directs our attention to § 105(c)(2), which directs the Commission to consider a "licensee's activities or proposed activities" in determining whether a second antitrust review is necessary before issuance of an operating permit. 42 U.S.C. § 2135\(c\)\(2\). Because that provision refers to "proposed activities," the Commission argues, it must encompass more than changes in cost of power, which can never be wholly within the licensee's control. While this provision does make clear that the statute does not limit the NRC to considerations of cost in assessing the need for a second antitrust review, neither does it clearly prohibit the NRC from imposing a threshold requirement of low-cost power production should it determine that low cost was an indispensable ingredient to any finding of anticompetitive impact. The NRC also points to §§ 105(a) and (b), which warn that the NRC's antitrust authority does not relieve licensees from compliance with other antitrust laws and require the NRC to report violations of those laws, as bolstering its argument [19] that Congress did not intend to limit interpretation of "activities" to considerations of cost alone. 42 U.S.C. §§ 2135\(a\), \(b\). We do not see how these provisions compel or even advance the reading of § 105(c)(5) that the NRC advocates. The NRC's efforts to construe § 105(c) as an unambiguous directive not to impose a low-cost threshold for antitrust conditions fails as well.

B. Chevron Step Two

If, then, § 105(c) does not clearly require a threshold showing of low-cost power production in order to retain antitrust conditions, we must defer to the NRC's interpretation if it is reasonable and consistent with the statutory scheme and legislative history. Chevron, 467 U.S. at 845 (if HN6[↑] agency's interpretation "represents a reasonable accommodation ... , we should not disturb [*1368] it unless it appears from the statute or its legislative history that the accommodation is not one that Congress would have sanctioned" (quoting United States v. Shimer, 367 U.S. 374, 383, 6 L. Ed. 2d 908, 81 S. Ct. 1554 \(1961\))). We find the NRC's construction reasonable, and thus we affirm its denial of Licensees' suspension applications.⁵

[20] This question comes to us in a somewhat awkward posture. Licensees explicitly elected not to argue that the circumstances justifying the original imposition of § 105 conditions no longer existed, choosing instead to present only the "bedrock" legal question of whether the NRC is ever permitted to retain conditions when a nuclear plant's power costs more than power from alternative sources.⁶ Thus, Licensees have not attempted to show that under this particular scenario, the high-cost power generated by their plants does not have any anticompetitive impact, despite the other advantages of reliability and coordination that they enjoy. Nor has the NRC sought to prove that in this specific context, operation of Licensees' plants still confers a competitive advantage, regardless of cost. As a result, we are left to consider the near-hypothetical question posed by the "bedrock" issue without the benefit of extensive factual development in a concrete situation.

[21] For Licensees to persuade us that the NRC's interpretation of § 105(c) is unreasonable, they must show that there is no set of circumstances where a plant producing high-cost power could contribute to a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws. Licensees contend that the power generated by a nuclear plant is a fungible commodity which must compete with electricity from other sources; if power from a licensee's nuclear plant costs more than power from alternative sources, then licensees are necessarily disadvantaged vis-a-vis their competitors and cannot pose an anticompetitive threat. This analysis, however, with its exclusive focus on the cost of power, totally ignores other factors that may affect the competitive position of any producer. See LAWRENCE A. SULLIVAN, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF ANTITRUST 74-93 (1977) (factors indicating market power include market concentration, entry barriers, firm conduct, excessive profits, rigid pricing policies, price discrimination, and firm size). More to the point, it ignores several factors that the NRC considered dispositive in finding anticompetitive behavior on the part of these very Licensees when it first imposed antitrust conditions.

[22] In the initial proceedings, the NRC identified a number of competitive advantages accruing to Licensees from their participation in the CAPCO power pool, all of which predated construction of the nuclear plants at issue here and existed despite the pivotal fact that even then, CAPCO's power was more costly than that of competing utilities. As previously discussed, the Commission at the time of the initial licensing found that Licensees had almost complete dominance over the generation, transmission, and sale of electric power in the CAPCO territory. It also found that Licensees had exercised this power in an anticompetitive fashion: they had refused to wheel competitors' power or allow them access to transmission facilities for carrying alternative sources of power; prevented competitors from joining the CAPCO pool, sharing power reserves, or selling or exchanging [*1369] various types of power at low rates; and denied them the economies of scale and other benefits of coordinated planning and construction.

The Commission ruled that these circumstances constituted a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws, and that the resulting increase in CAPCO's generating capacity and transmission [23] facilities would enhance Licensees' market position and its ability to maintain entry barriers which precluded full participation by competing utilities. Licensees offer no compelling reason why these same factors that led the NRC to find a situation inconsistent with antitrust laws should not now be sufficient to maintain antitrust authority under § 105(c). Licensees still exercise market control in the CAPCO territory, and the power generated by the nuclear plants contributes to that dominance by providing increased total capacity and greater reliability. Nuclear power may be higher in cost than available non-nuclear power, but just as higher-cost power generated by Licensees before construction of the nuclear plants did not prevent them from controlling competitors' power supply options, higher-cost power from a nuclear plant could have the same anticompetitive effect. Expanded transmission facilities built as part of the nuclear construction program further strengthen Licensees' ability to deprive competitors of access to alternative power sources. Absent the license conditions, there is no intrinsic reason why Licensees could not again use their market dominance to weaken and [24] eliminate competitors, despite the higher cost of their power. Thus, we determine that the NRC reasonably answered the "bedrock" question in deciding that a threshold showing of lower cost nuclear power was not required as an indispensable prerequisite of retaining antitrust conditions.⁷

Licensees also [25] contend that the NRC's interpretation is inconsistent with § 105's legislative history, pointing to several instances where witnesses appearing before Congress during hearings on § 105(c)⁸ stated their belief that nuclear power would prove to be a cheap source of power. The NRC does not contest this point, acknowledging that "at one time the Commission and ... Congress ... anticipated that the electricity produced at nuclear facilities would be lower cost as compared to alternative sources." 36 N.R.C. at 296 (NRC denial of Licensees' suspension applications). Congress' mistaken assumptions about the relative costs of nuclear power, however, do not resolve the "bedrock" question. Even if Congress did believe that nuclear plants would generate a wealth of cheap power, it gave no indication in text or committee reports that the success of that prediction was in any way the touchstone of § 105(c) authority. The Joint Committee Report, for example, makes no mention of cost at all, either as a background presumption informing the boundaries of the NRC's antitrust authority, or as a necessary prerequisite for exercise of that authority. Report By the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, [26] H.R. REP. NO. 1470, 91st Cong., 2d. Sess. 15 (1970). See Power Reactor Development Co. v. International Union of Elec., Radio & Mach. Workers, 367 U.S. 396, 409, 6 L. Ed. 2d 924, 81 S. Ct. 1529 (1961) (noting "peculiar responsibility and place of the Joint Committee" in developing statutory scheme); accord Alabama Power Co. v. NRC, 692 F.2d 1362, 1368 (11th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 816, 78 L. Ed. 2d 85, 104 S. Ct. 72 (1983). Thus, the legislative history of § 105(c) does not alter [1370] our conclusion that the NRC reasonably interpreted that provision in the proceeding below.⁹

⁷ Our determination that § 105(c) does not require the NRC to focus solely on the cost of nuclear power accords with the position of the one other circuit that has considered the scope of the NRC's antitrust authority under § 105(c). In Alabama Power Co. v. NRC, owners of a nuclear plant argued that the NRC could examine only the direct activities of a licensed plant in assessing whether antitrust conditions were appropriate, rather than evaluating prior anticompetitive activities by the licensee as well. 692 F.2d 1362, 1367-68 \(11th Cir. 1982\), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 816 (1983). The court held that a § 105(c) analysis necessitates a "broad inquiry using all available information." Id. at 1368.

⁸ In 1970, Congress amended the Atomic Energy Act, enacting the current version of § 105(c)(5). Act of Dec. 19, 1970, Pub. L. No. 91-5160, § 6, 84 Stat. 1472, 1473.

[27] III. NRC'S STATUTORY AUTHORITY TO SUSPEND ANTITRUST CONDITIONS

Cleveland asks us to reverse the Commission's ruling that it has authority to modify antitrust license conditions imposed pursuant to § 105(c). Because we decide that Cleveland did not satisfy the statutory requirements for appealing the final order of an administrative agency, we do not pass on the question.

HN7 The Hobbs Act permits "any party aggrieved by [a] final order"¹⁰ of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to file a petition for review in the appropriate court of appeals. 28 U.S.C. § 2344. In determining when a party is aggrieved, this circuit has recognized only a few exceptions to the general rule that "a party may not appeal from a disposition in its favor." Showtime Networks, Inc. v. FCC, 289 U.S. App. D.C. 348, 932 F.2d 1, 4 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (citing cases). Cleveland claims that it falls within the exception set forth in International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers v. ICC, 274 U.S. App. D.C. 103, 862 F.2d 330 (D.C. Cir. 1988) ("IBEW"). In IBEW, the court permitted petitioner union IBEW to challenge the ICC's jurisdiction to review arbitration awards, even though it had prevailed on the merits of the specific arbitration award before [28] the ICC. 862 F.2d at 334. The court found IBEW's plight extraordinary because arbitration proceedings were a central component of the union's operation, IBEW would be forced to litigate numerous future arbitration awards before the ICC, without any opportunity for resolution of its jurisdictional claim until it lost an arbitration proceeding on the merits and could appeal. This threat of repeatedly having to pursue disputes with employers was sufficient to render IBEW aggrieved, despite its victory on the merits of the individual case. Cf. Shell Oil Co. v. FERC, 310 U.S. App. D.C. 312, 47 F.3d 1186, 1202 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (IBEW exception inapplicable where petitioner would not incur "virtually inevitable and repeating costs" in future litigation before reviewing agency).

[29] The risk of future litigation by Licensees over the antitrust conditions at issue in this case seems neither so inevitable nor of such a magnitude as to bring Cleveland within the IBEW exception. Cleveland does claim that repeat litigation over the conditions is virtually guaranteed because of the past adversarial relationship between the parties. But while it is of course possible that Licensees will renew their efforts to suspend the antitrust conditions through a claim of "changed circumstances" and in such an event, Cleveland may find it necessary to return to court to defend the restrictions, see Respondents' Br. at 19 (discussing Cleveland's remedies if Licensees should seek a future modification of antitrust conditions), IBEW requires more. It demands a showing of an "inevitable and repeating" course of litigation, between the same parties, all based on a single jurisdictional issue. We find the inchoate threat of another round of litigation about these conditions based on a new theory not to rise to the level of potential harm incurred by the labor union petitioners in IBEW. Accordingly, Cleveland is not a "party aggrieved," and we dismiss its petition for [30] review.

To determine whether there is a reasonable probability of a substantial lessening of competition, the courts focus on whether the merger will cause the merged entity to have enough market power such that it could profitably increase prices. Whether the merger will cause an anticompetitive effect is not the kind of question which is susceptible of a ready and precise answer in most cases.

To rebut plaintiff's case, the defendants may produce nonstatistical evidence, which casts doubt on the persuasive quality of the statistics to predict future anticompetitive consequences. Factors, which courts have previously considered to be relevant, include ease of entry into the market, the trend of the market either toward or away from concentration, and the continuation of active price competition.

If defendants are successful in rebutting plaintiff's statistical evidence, plaintiff then has the burden of presenting additional evidence that the merger will lessen competition and this burden merges with the ultimate burden of persuasion, which remains with plaintiff at all times.

In determining the relevant geographic market, the court must determine the market in which the seller operates and to which the purchaser can practicably turn for supplies. The analysis must focus not merely on where patients have gone for acute inpatient services, but where they could practicably go should the merged entity become anticompetitive. This requires a fluid analysis. It is not sufficient to take a snapshot of the current situation and define the relevant geographic market to be synonymous with the current service areas of the defendants.

[*971] OPINION and ORDER

The United States has brought this action under the antitrust laws. The defendants, Mercy Health Services and Finley Tri-States Health Group, Inc. own Mercy Health Center (Mercy) and Finley Hospital (Finley), respectively. Mercy and Finley are the only two general acute care hospitals in Dubuque, Iowa. The two hospitals have agreed to form a partnership, Dubuque Regional Health Services (DRHS), which all parties acknowledge constitutes a merger for purposes of antitrust analysis. On June 10, 1994, the government filed a complaint seeking injunctive [2] relief against the merger as a violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1. The parties agreed to waive a preliminary injunction hearing in order to proceed to trial on the matter. After expedited discovery, the matter was tried to the bench. Two weeks of testimony was heard and several hundred items were moved into evidence.

I. Findings of Fact

A. Hospital Background

Dubuque is situated within Dubuque County, Iowa, which in 1993 had a population of 86,403. Dubuque lies on the Mississippi River, at a point where Iowa adjoins the southwestern portion of Wisconsin and the northwestern portion of Illinois.

Mercy is an acute care hospital which, in 1994, had approximately 320 staffed beds, 9980 acute care patient discharges and an average daily census of 127. Mercy's acute care commercial discharges for 1994 were estimated to be 3622 and the average daily acute care commercial census was 44. Finley is also an acute care hospital and, in 1994, was estimated to have 124 staffed beds, 5247 acute care patient discharges and an average daily census of 63. Finley's acute care commercial discharges for 1994 [3] were estimated to be 2175 and the average daily acute care commercial census was 21.

There are seven rural hospitals in the area: Galena-Stauss Hospital in Galena, Illinois, 15 minutes from Dubuque, has 25 licensed beds and an average daily census of 3. Southwest Health Center in Platteville, Wisconsin, 30 minutes from Dubuque, has 35 licensed beds and an average daily census of 11. Lancaster Memorial Hospital in Lancaster, Wisconsin, 30 minutes from Dubuque, has 35 licensed beds and an average daily census of 10. Delaware County Memorial Hospital in Manchester, Iowa, 40 minutes from Dubuque, has 58 licensed beds and an average daily census of 12. Jackson County Public Hospital in Maquoketa, Iowa, 30 minutes from Dubuque, has 99 licensed beds and an average daily census of 12.4. Guttenberg Memorial Hospital in Guttenberg, Iowa, 40 minutes from Dubuque, has 37 licensed beds and an average daily census of 7. Finally, Central Community Hospital in Elkader, Iowa, 60 minutes from Dubuque, has 29 licensed beds and an average daily census of 3-4.

These hospitals primarily serve patients who are closer to the rural hospital than to any other hospital. The rural hospitals mainly provide [4] primary care services and do not provide the breadth of services Mercy and Finley offer. Guttenberg provides the largest array of services in that it offers 68% of the same Diagnosis Related Groups (DRGs)¹ Mercy and Finley provide. Galena-Stauss has the smallest array of services, providing care for only 11.5% of the same DRGs Mercy and Finley provide.

[*972] There are several regional hospitals within 70 to 100 miles of Dubuque which generally offer the same or greater range of services as provided by Mercy and Finley. Allen Memorial Hospital in Waterloo, Iowa has 194 staffed beds and an average daily census of 145. Covenant Medical Center in Waterloo, Iowa has approximately 322 staffed acute care beds with an average daily census of 173. St. Luke's Methodist Hospital in Cedar Rapids, Iowa has 441 staffed beds with an average daily census of 284. Mercy Medical Center in Cedar Rapids, Iowa has [5] 353 staffed beds and an average daily census of 193. St. Mary's Medical Center in Madison, Wisconsin has 345 staffed beds and an average daily census of 265. Freeport Memorial Hospital in Freeport, Illinois has 143 staffed beds and an average daily census of 70. University of Wisconsin Hospital and Clinics in Madison, Wisconsin has 496 staffed beds and an average daily census of 386. Meriter Hospital in Madison, Wisconsin has 429 staffed beds and an average daily census of 258. The University of Iowa Hospitals and Clinics in Iowa City, Iowa (UIHC) has 868 staffed beds and an average daily census of 677.

Mercy and Finley's patient bases are composed of individuals covered by government insurance programs, traditional indemnity insurance and managed care payers. Managed care payers include health maintenance organizations (HMO's), and preferred provider organizations (PPO's). HMO's generally charge a set fee which covers all of an enrollee's health care needs, including hospitalizations. HMO's generally restrict the doctors and hospitals from which an enrollee can receive care to those physicians and hospitals providing a discounted rate to the HMO. HMO's often work with the hospitals [6] when an enrollee is hospitalized to insure that the costs of the hospitalization remain as low as possible. HMO's may have their own clinics to which enrollees are obligated to go for office visits and most outpatient needs. HMO's generally stress preventative care and require preapproval prior to being hospitalized in order to keep the rate of hospitalizations low.

PPO's generally negotiate discounted rates with physicians and hospitals and then require their enrollees to receive their care from the discounted care providers or risk being denied reimbursement. PPO's generally do not have their own clinics and do not stress preventative care. In contrast to the managed care payers, the indemnity health insurers have not traditionally attempted to gain discounted rates from physicians or hospitals.² Instead, these traditional insurers cover a percentage of the health care costs with the remainder being paid by the insured. HMO's and PPO's have only recently established themselves in Iowa, but already 25% of Mercy and Finley's patients are covered by managed care payers. Of the remaining 75% of Mercy and Finley's inpatients, 50% are covered by Medicare and Medicaid and the other [7] 25% are covered by traditional indemnity insurance.

¹A DRG is a numerical code indicating the treatment provided to a patient or his diagnosis and severity of his illness.

²The traditional indemnity insurers are now beginning to demand and receive discounts. In addition, traditional insurers, such as Blue Cross/Blue Shield, have formed their own PPO or HMO.

A hospital will discount its stated charges to managed care payers in order to entice the managed care entity to send more enrollees to their hospital for inpatient care. Mercy currently gives discounts to the following managed care entities: Medical Associates, Heritage National Health Plan, Self-Insured Systems Corporation (SISCO), Alliance Select PPO (a Blue Cross plan), HMO of Wisconsin, Wisconsin Education Association Insurance and the Affordable Health Plan. Finley contracts with Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Iowa, Alliance Select PPO Program (a Blue Cross plan), Heritage National Health Plan, Inc., Heritage Preferred, Medical Associates HMO, HMO of Wisconsin, Blue Cross of Illinois PPO, BeefAmerica Operating Co., ProAmerica Network, Inc., American Health Care Advisory [8] Association, Hospice of Dubuque County, and Collaborative Medical for Religions (a charitable contribution).

Medical Associates is a physician-owned medical practice which operates the Medical Associates HMO in the Dubuque area. The HMO has approximately 30,000 enrollees. The Medical Associates HMO accounts for 11-12% of Mercy's net revenues. Physicians [*973] employed by Medical Associates refer patients to Mercy for inpatient and outpatient care constituting approximately 80% of Mercy's yearly revenue. Heritage National Health Plan operates a PPO which covers 5,000 lives in the Dubuque area. Nationally it covers 280,000 persons. It accounts for 2-3% of Mercy's net revenues. SISCO is a third-party payer which administers self-insured employee health plans and also contracts for reduced rates for some of its employer-customers. Blue Cross has a state-run managed care plan in which it offers the hospital a contract on a "take it or leave it" basis. The hospital can either agree to the stated rates or not be on the plan's preferred provider list. It accounts for 8-9% of Mercy's net revenues. Affordable accounts for less than 1% of Mercy's revenues. HMO Wisconsin accounts for less than 0.5% [9] of Mercy's revenues. Medicare and Medicaid account for 46-47% of Mercy's net revenues. Traditional indemnity insurance accounts for 26% of Mercy's net revenues.

Medical Associates has a clinic in Dubuque in which it sees patients for regular office visits. It also operates an outpatient clinic in Dubuque which directly competes with Mercy and Finley for outpatient procedures. In addition to its Dubuque Clinic, Medical Associates has permanent facilities in Bellevue, Iowa; East Dubuque, Illinois; and Galena, Illinois. It operates outreach clinics in Bellevue, Iowa; Dyersville, Iowa; Lancaster, Wisconsin; Maquoketa, Iowa; Platteville, Wisconsin; Boscobel, Wisconsin; Elkader, Iowa; Guttenberg, Iowa; Manchester, Iowa; Oelwein, Iowa; Darlington, Wisconsin; Clinton, Iowa; and Monticello, Iowa. These outreach clinics are primarily conducted in order to obtain secondary referrals for Medical Associates' specialists.

B. Health Care Market Trends

Traditionally, hospitals competed on the basis of amenities and perceptions of quality. Only in the last ten to fifteen years have hospitals begun to compete on the basis of price. To a large degree, this competition has occurred because [10] of the arrival of managed care. These large purchasers shop on the basis of price and are able to induce hospitals to discount stated charges in return for the managed care payer's promise to direct a larger volume of patients to the hospital. Hospitals must employ cost containment measures in order to become more cost efficient so that they can afford to give discounts to the managed care payers. Competition for Medicare, Medicaid and traditional indemnity patients still occurs on the basis of amenities and perceptions of quality.

Managed care entities are capable of inducing their enrollees to receive inpatient care at a specific hospital. The entity does this in one of the following ways: (1) by only paying the hospitalization costs if the enrollee is treated at a specified hospital, or (2) by requiring the enrollee to pay a higher percentage of the enrollee's hospitalization costs (a co-pay) if the enrollee chooses to be hospitalized at a non-preferred hospital. Managed care entities are gaining sophistication in their ability to induce patients to be hospitalized at a preferred hospital. However, the managed care entities do not always show price sensitivity when they establish [11] requirements. For example, Medical Associates may be charged a lower rate by one hospital for a certain DRG, however, the physicians who admit the patients may not be aware of the rate differential and consequently do not encourage patients to go to the cheaper hospital.

Traditionally, when people decided where to receive inpatient care, they considered the following factors: where their physician had hospital privileges and could therefore take care of them during the hospitalization; what hospital was convenient; the reputation of the hospital; and the amenities the hospital offered. Patients have only recently added out-of-pocket expenses to this list. (Traditional indemnity insurance covered a specific portion of the fees no matter which hospital was utilized and patients generally had little knowledge of whether hospital prices varied for their specific hospitalization needs.)

The advent of managed care has resulted in individuals also considering what their out-of-pocket expenses will be. Under traditional indemnity insurance a certain percentage of a hospitalization is covered without regard to the hospital used. Managed care enrollees [974] are much more aware of their out-of-pocket [*12] expenses resulting from a hospitalization because the policies generally state that expenses incurred at certain hospitals will either not be covered or will require a higher co-pay.

People who continue to be covered by either traditional insurance or by Medicare and Medicaid remain largely insensitive to price differentials. The government dictates hospital fees for the care of Medicare and Medicaid patients, and such fees are often below the cost of providing the services. This causes "cost shifting" of the costs of these services to non-Medicare and non-Medicaid patients. Patients covered by traditional indemnity insurance have been charged full charges which take into account the need to cost shift. Even though managed care groups negotiate with the hospitals for rates below full charges, the rates are greater than those charged Medicare and Medicaid patients and include some cost shifting.

Price competition is important among the managed care groups. Generally, the managed care payer will negotiate the best rates and the greatest discounts possible with area hospitals and physician groups. Based on the rates obtained, the managed care payer determines the premium it must charge [*13] enrollees for services. The managed care group next approaches businesses to try to convince them to offer their managed care plan to their employees. Thirty-five to 40% of the managed care premium is due to inpatient hospital charges, so the rates negotiated with the hospitals significantly impact the premium charged by the managed care payer and affects the cost competitiveness of the managed care entity receiving the discount.

Hospitals contract at discounted rates with the managed care entity when it feels the managed care payer can induce its enrollees, through financial incentives or otherwise, to use the contracting hospital. A hospital will generally only contract with the managed care entity if it feels that (1) by giving a discount, the managed care entity will shift a higher volume of patients to the hospital, or (2) by refusing to give a discount, the managed care entity will shift a significant volume of patients away from the hospital.

Managed care plans influence which physicians and hospitals an enrollee chooses by offering incentives to use certain care providers (i.e., a reduction in co-pay or a total waiver of co-pay), by requiring a co-pay if the enrollee uses [*14] a different care provider or hospital, or by simply requiring the enrollee to use designated hospitals and care providers to receive reimbursement.

Along with the rise of managed care has come the increased use of outpatient services for procedures which traditionally required overnight hospitalization. The length of hospital stays are also becoming significantly shorter because of the increased use of home care and because managed care payers closely monitor the length of time an enrollee is hospitalized. This results in less hospital utilization and a decrease in the average daily census. Because hospitals have high fixed costs, the loss of patient volume requires hospitals to broaden their service area in order to maintain patient census and resulting cash flow.

Prior to the trend in shorter and fewer hospitalizations and to the advent of cost competition, hospitals had their own "catchment area" from which they drew their patients and from which other hospitals generally did not try to encroach upon the residing population. The main competition between regional hospitals was in the "fringe area," the area half-way between two regional hospitals. However, the competitive market [15] has changed and is continuing to change at a rapid pace.

Hospitals, needing to maintain their patient volume, have begun to establish outreach efforts in the fringe areas as well as deep in the heart of what used to be considered another hospital's catchment area. The efforts include the establishment of hospital owned clinics and the purchase of physician practices in towns up to 50-60 miles from the hospital. These clinics have succeeded in capturing patients and referring them to their associated hospital for inpatient care.

Outreach efforts also include clinics established by private physicians' groups. The physician clinics are used to broaden the referral base for the clinic's various specialties. [*975] The clinics refer patients back to the hospital where the physicians have admitting privileges for inpatient and outpatient services. Consequently, when a physicians' group extends its market area by opening an outreach clinic, it also extends the market area of the hospital with which the group is associated. Once an outreach clinic is established, the hospital and specialty referral patterns from the community where it is located change significantly within a short period of time [16] (often within two months). Clinics can generally be established in a matter of weeks as they are often opened in existing hospitals or clinics. Both hospital and physician-owned clinics have proven they induce outreach patients to receive hospital care at the associated hospital, even if another regional hospital is closer.

There is a great deal of evidence showing that these national trends exist in the Dubuque area. Mercy's inpatient volume decreased by approximately 15% from 1990 to 1994. In order to maintain its present patient volume and revenues, Mercy must gain market share in what it considers its "secondary market," the area outside of Dubuque County. This can only be done on a significant level by establishing outreach clinics. Mercy has not established any of its own outreach clinics, but depends on the managed care payers which use Mercy to do so -- primarily Medical Associates.

C. Other Findings of Fact

Additional findings of fact are made under the Conclusions of Law section and throughout the legal analysis. In addition, attached as Appendix A, are the facts to which the parties have stipulated.

II. Conclusions of Law

A. Anti-trust [17] Analysis

Section 7 of the Clayton Act HN1[] provides, in part, that "no person . . . shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another person . . . where . . . the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition." 15 U.S.C. § 18 \(1973 & Supp. 1995\); United States v. E.I. duPont de Nemours & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 589, 77 S. Ct. 872, 875, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1057 \(1957\) (Section 7 is "designed to arrest in its incipiency . . . the substantial lessening of competition . . ."). HN2[] To meet the requirement of Section 7, the government must show a reasonable probability that the proposed transaction would substantially lessen competition in the future. FTC v. University Health Inc., 938 F.2d 1206, 1218 \(11th Cir. 1991\); FTC v. Warner Communications, Inc., 742 F.2d 1156, 1160 \(9th Cir. 1984\). Section 1 of the Sherman Act requires the same analysis. 2 Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 304c., at 9 (1995); United States v. Rockford Mem. Corp., 898 F.2d 1278, 1281-86 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 920, 112 L. Ed. 2d 249, 111 S. Ct. 295 (1990).

HN3[] To determine whether there is a reasonable probability of a substantial lessening of competition, the courts have focused [18] on whether the merger will cause the merged entity to have enough market power such that it could profitably increase prices. Whether the merger will cause an anticompetitive effect is not "the kind of question which is susceptible of a ready and precise answer in most cases." United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 362, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 1740, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915 \(1962\). Generally, the plaintiff attempts to prove its case by showing that the merged entity will have a large percentage of the relevant market such that, either individually or through collusion, its hold over the market will enable it to profitably raise prices above competitive levels. HN4[] The government may make a prima facie showing that the merger will result in anticompetitive effects by showing that the merged entity will have an undue share of the relevant market. Id., at 363; University Health, Inc.,

938 F.2d at 1218. Thus HN5 before a court can determine the effect of a merger on competition, it must first define the relevant market.

HN6 The relevant market is defined by identifying those "producers that provide customers of defendants' . . . firms with alternative sources for the defendants' [19] product or service." 2A Phillip E. Areeda, Herbert Hovenkamp & John L. Sowle, Antitrust Law P 530a, at 150 (1995). HN7 A properly defined market excludes other potential suppliers [*976] (1) whose product is too different (product dimension of the market) or too far away (relevant geographic market) and (2) who are not likely to shift promptly to offer defendants' customers a suitably proximate alternative. Id. "Those who can readily shift into offering such a product are in the market." Id.

HN8 Although a great deal of emphasis is placed on market share statistics, they are not conclusive indicators of anticompetitive effects. United States v. General Dynamics, 415 U.S. 486, 498, 94 S. Ct. 1186, 39 L. Ed. 2d 530 (1974). HN9 If the government is able to make a prima facie case, the defendants can overcome the presumption of illegality by showing that the market-share analysis gives an inaccurate reflection of the acquisition's probable effect on competition within the relevant market. United States v. Citizens & Southern Nat'l Bank, 422 U.S. 86, 120-21, 95 S. Ct. 2099, 45 L. Ed. 2d 41 (1975). To rebut the government's case, the defendants may produce "nonstatistical evidence which casts doubt on the [20] persuasive quality of the statistics to predict future anticompetitive consequences." University Health Inc., 938 F.2d at 1218 (quoting Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. FTC, 652 F.2d 1324, 1341 (7th Cir. 1981)). Factors which courts have previously considered to be relevant include "ease of entry into the market, the trend of the market either toward or away from concentration, and the continuation of active price competition." Id. HN10 When determining whether a merger will have an anticompetitive effect, the court must view the merger functionally within the context of its industry's "structure, history, and probable future." General Dynamics, 415 U.S. at 498 (quoting Brown Shoe v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 322 n. 38, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962)).

HN11 If the defendant is successful in rebutting the government's statistical evidence, the government then has the burden of presenting additional evidence that the merger will lessen competition and this burden "merges with the ultimate burden of persuasion, which remains with the government at all times." University Health Inc., 938 F.2d at 1219 (quoting United States v. Baker Hughes Inc., 285 U.S. App. D.C. 222, 908 F.2d 981, 983 (D.C. Cir. 1990)).

[21] B. Relevant Product Market

The parties have agreed that the relevant product market is acute care inpatient services offered by both Mercy and Finley. This definition excludes inpatient psychiatric care, substance abuse treatment, rehabilitation services, and open-heart surgery. This limits the product market to those services for which Mercy and Finley currently compete for inpatients.

C. Relevant Geographic Market

HN12 The burden is on the government to prove the relevant geographic market. Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 113 S. Ct. 884, 890, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993). The relevant market is hotly disputed by the parties. The government asserts that the geographic market includes Dubuque County, Iowa and a half-circle with a 15 mile radius extending from Dubuque County's eastern edge into Illinois and Wisconsin. This geographical area would include Mercy, Finley and Galena-Strauss Hospital. Currently, 88% of the patients within the market use the three hospitals within the market. Only about 2% of the 88% use Galena- Stauss; the remainder uses Mercy and Finley. Approximately 76% of the patients at the three hospitals come from within the market.

[22] The defendants asserts that the proper geographic market includes Mercy, Finley, the seven closest rural hospitals and the regional hospitals situated in Cedar Rapids, Waterloo, Iowa City, Davenport, and Madison. Mercy and Finley's market share of the patients within this geographical area is approximately 10%. The government does not contest that if this is the relevant market, the merger is not illegal.

The parties dispute whether the government has properly defined the relevant geographic market by trying to show whether DRHS could (1) profitably raise prices by 5% to managed care entities, or (2) profitably raise prices by completely eliminating present [*977] discounts to managed care entities. In the event the court finds the government has not met its burden as to the proposed geographic market, the government has proposed an alternative market encompassing only the City of Dubuque.

The government defined its market based on (1) the views of the major purchasers of health care services in the Dubuque area, (2) where physicians have privileges, (3) the views of physicians, and (4) patient flow data. Looking at the views of the major managed care providers in the Dubuque area, [23] the government finds it significant that Medical Associates HMO and the Heritage Plan both feel their health care plans must include one of the Dubuque hospitals in order for the plan to be marketable to Dubuque employers. The government argues this is evidence that there is no market substitute for the Dubuque hospitals.

The government then looked at the overlap of physicians who were currently on staff at the area hospitals. The government showed that there is a great deal of physician staff overlap between the staffs of Mercy and Finley, but very little between the rural hospitals and Mercy or Finley. Seventy-six percent of Mercy's physicians were shown to be on staff at Finley and over 90% of Finley's physicians were on staff at Mercy. The government concludes from these statistics that (1) those patients who currently use a physician with privileges at Mercy and Finley cannot switch to a rural hospital due to their loyalty to their physician and their physician's inability to admit them at a rural facility, and (2) Mercy and Finley are seen by physicians as being comparable hospitals as physicians are willing to work out of either of them. By contrast, Dubuque physicians are [24] not willing to work out of the rural hospitals, hence the rurals are not comparable and therefore they are not substitutes for Mercy and Finley.

The government also asserts that Dubuque physicians would not seek privileges at the rural hospitals as they do not see the rural hospitals as being able to provide the broad range of services which the majority of their patients require and because the rurals are not adequately staffed and do not have the equipment to do many inpatient surgical procedures.

The government then goes on to look at the inflow and outflow of patients from the market. The "Elzinga-Hogarty" test was employed by the government to argue that the relevant geographical market was quite limited. This test looks at the empirical data to determine (1) the area from which the hospitals draw their patients and (2) where the residents in that area go for hospital care. When both numbers are at 90%, the market definition is said to be "strong". Numbers at 75% are said to constitute a "weak" market definition. Robert Pitofsky, New Definitions of Relevant Market and the Assault of Antitrust, 90 Columbia Law Rev. 1805 (1990), Elzinga & Hogarty, The Problem of Geographic [25] Market Delineation Revisited: The Case of Coal, 23 Antitrust Bull. 1, 2 (1978).

Looking at the government's proposed market definition -- Dubuque County and a fifteen mile radius into Illinois and Wisconsin -- 76% of Mercy's and Finley's inpatients come from within this defined market, and 88% of those residing within the market seek care within the market. Shrinking the market to include only the City of Dubuque, 55% of Mercy and Finley's inpatients come from within the market and 91% of those residing in Dubuque seek hospital care at either Mercy or Finley. Defining the market as a twenty-five mile radius around Dubuque, 85% of Mercy's and Finley's patients come from within the market and 89% of those persons within the market seek care inside the market. Broadening the market to a 35 mile radius around Dubuque, 89% of Mercy and Finley's inpatients come from within the market and 82% of the persons within that market seek care at Mercy or Finley.

Finally, the government asserts that the regional hospitals are not in the relevant geographic market as they only compete for patients at the "fringes," the area located at the midpoint between Dubuque and a particular regional hospital. [26] The government reasons that people will not travel greater distances than necessary for inpatient care and, therefore, only those patients at the midway point between two regional hospitals could be [*978] induced to switch hospitals due to price concerns. The government concludes that DRHS would have the ability to raise prices as the rurals do not act as a competitive alternative to DRHS and the regional centers are only a competitive force at the fringes of Mercy's and Finley's service areas and therefore could not induce enough people to switch hospitals to defeat a price rise by DRHS.

The defendants criticize the government's market definition as being dependent on incorrect assumptions, and as not accounting for current market trends. The defendants also assert that the government's geographical market is too small because a 5% price increase would be easily defeated by patients who would choose to travel to other hospitals for cheaper care. In reaching this result, the defendants challenge the government's assumptions of strong doctor-patient loyalty, that outreach clinics only have an effect on hospital use at the fringes of a hospital's service area, and that there are significant [27] barriers to entry into this market.

1. Analysis of the Relevant Geographic Market

The court finds that the government's case rests too heavily on past health care conditions and makes invalid assumptions as to the reactions of third-party payers and patients to price changes. The government's case also fails to undergo a dynamic approach to antitrust analysis, choosing instead to look at the situation as it currently exists within a competitive market.

HN13[] In determining the relevant geographic market, the court must determine "the market in which the seller operates and to which the purchaser can practicably turn for supplies." Tampa Elec. Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 327, 81 S. Ct. 623, 628, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (1960); Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. at 359. The analysis must focus not merely on where patients have gone for acute inpatient services, but where they could practicably go should DRHS become anticompetitive. Bathke v. Casey's General Stores, Inc., 64 F.3d 340, 345 (8th Cir. 1995); Morgenstern v. Wilson, 29 F.3d 1291, 1295-1296 (8th Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 130 L. Ed. 2d 1068, 115 S. Ct. 1100 (U.S. 1995). This requires a fluid analysis. It is not sufficient to take [28] a snapshot of the current situation and define the relevant geographic market to be synonymous with the current service areas of the defendant hospitals. See, Bathke, 64 F.3d at 345; Morgenstern, 29 F.3d at 1295; In the Matter of Hospital Corporation of America, 106 F.T.C. 361, 466 (1985), aff'd, Hospital Corporation of America v. FTC, 807 F.2d 1381 (7th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 481 U.S. 1038, 95 L. Ed. 2d 815, 107 S. Ct. 1975 (1987); Drs. Steuer & Latham v. Nat. Med. Enterprises, 672 F. Supp. 1489, 1511 (D.S.C. 1987), aff'd, 846 F.2d 70 (4th Cir. 1988).

HN14[] In order to determine the actual geographic market, current market behavior must be put into a dynamic analysis which looks at possible competitive responses from other hospitals, third party payers and consumers. In this light, it is important to note that the government's reliance on HN15[] the Elzinger-Hogarty test is merely a starting point -- it states where Mercy and Finley are currently attracting patients and the area from which most patients seek services from either Mercy or Finley. This is the snapshot of the market as it exists under current conditions and does not pretend to answer the question of what would happen if there was [29] an attempt to exercise market power by one of the market participants. See Robert Pitofsky, New Definitions of Relevant Market and the Assault of Antitrust, 90 Colum. L. Rev. 1805 (1990).

The government's case in general makes the mistake of relying too heavily on past conditions in the hospital industry and discounts the effects of outreach efforts, the strong emphasis that regional hospitals place on expanding their service areas and the willingness of managed care enrollees to make changes in their health care for financial reasons.

The government's case relies on several assumptions and conclusions that are not supported by the evidence. One of the assumptions is that there is strong doctor-patient loyalty. This assumption supports the argument that patients cannot be enticed [*979] to use a non-Dubuque hospital because the patient already has a Dubuque doctor to whom the patient is very loyal.

There are several problems with this assumption. First, the evidence shows that many hospital patients do not have an established physician relationship, or, are admitted by a specialist who is not the patient's regular physician.

Secondly, the evidence does not support a finding [30] of strong patient-physician loyalty that prevents patient shifting for financial reasons. The medical professionals testified there is a large amount of patient shifting that occurs when an employer changes or modifies a health insurance plan so as to encourage usage of a particular physician or group of physicians. Testimony also shows that managed care entities have been very successful in enrolling patients in HMO's that require switching physicians or agreeing to be seen by any available physician.³

The government's assertion that the outreach clinics have little effect on hospitalization patterns is also erroneous. There are several communities where referral practices have been dramatically altered due to outreach efforts. Most notably Manchester, Independence and Clarion, Iowa. While the effect of the [31] outreach clinics has not been quantified, the fact that they are established is significant as it is only through the generation of inpatient and outpatient referrals that these clinics become profitable. Outreach efforts have been characterized by the regional hospitals as being pivotal in their efforts to expand patient volume at a time when all other trends are causing them to lose volume. In other words, without growth in these areas most hospitals acknowledge they would incur a significant decrease in revenue. The start-up of outreach clinics cannot be justified based solely upon the direct business they obtain on site. They are economically justified due to the increased referrals they bring to the physicians and hospitals sponsoring them. Outreach clinics generally attract patients from a fifteen mile radius and these clinics have been established within twenty-five miles of Dubuque. 18.8% of Mercy and Finley's patients come from within fifteen miles of an outreach clinic associated with another regional hospital.

The government attempts to argue that outreach clinics are only effective in shifting patients from the fringe areas to other hospitals as people will not agree [32] to be hospitalized at a hospital a significant distance away from their home and family. The government argues that most hospitalizations require two pre-operative visits to the hospital, the actual hospitalization and two or three post-operative visits to the hospitals and patients will not want to incur the expense and inconvenience of travel for these visits. However, the evidence was clear that one reason why the outreach clinics are so effective in altering hospitalization practices is because the pre- and post-operative visits take place at the outreach clinic and the patient is only required to travel to the hospital for the actual surgical procedure.

In fact, people will use outreach clinics which are associated with hospitals that are a significant distance from their hometown. To illustrate, the Platteville and Lancaster areas are 25 miles from Dubuque and sixty to seventy miles from Madison, Wisconsin, yet Medical Associates, which refers persons back to Dubuque for inpatient care, meets strong competition in these communities from the Dean Clinic which refers its patients to St. Mary's Hospital in Madison.

The fact that the residents of southwest Wisconsin are willing [33] to drive to Madison for their inpatient needs also shows that the government's assumption that persons within twenty-five miles of Dubuque will only go to Dubuque for their inpatient needs is an incorrect assumption. The government has also failed to account for the fact that there are several zip codes within 25 miles of Dubuque which currently send over one-third of their inpatients to other hospitals. Looking at the zip codes encompassing Cuba City, Wisconsin; Galena, Illinois; New Vienna, Iowa; Potosi, Wisconsin; and Hazel Green, Wisconsin, there were 930 discharges in a six month period from these zip codes and only [*980] 560 were discharged from Mercy or Finley (60.2%). 179 of these discharges were to hospitals other than Mercy, Finley, the seven rurals or the University of Iowa (19.2%). Obviously, these persons are already being attracted to hospitals outside the immediate area. Discharges from these five zip codes account for 7.7% of Mercy and Finley's total discharges.

The main point made by the government which the court does agree with is the inability of the rural hospitals to prevent DRHS from acting in an anticompetitive manner. The government argues that it would not be [34] feasible for more patients to use the rural hospitals as the rural hospitals are not equipped to handle anything but the least complicated hospitalizations. The defendants counter that the rural hospitals are a practicable alternative as they have a great number of empty beds and are capable of meeting the needs of a significant number of inpatients.

Due to the high utilization rates of some of the rurals by those in the same zip code as the hospital, many of the rurals can apparently care for a wide range of diagnoses. For example, in the zip code encompassing Guttenberg,

Iowa, where Guttenberg Hospital lies, 178 out of 269 hospitalizations were at the Guttenberg hospital (66.1%). Further, Guttenberg Hospital has cared for inpatients hospitalized for 68% of the DRGs for which Mercy and Finley admit patients. However, in the zip code encompassing Galena, Illinois, where Galena-Stauss lies, only 93 out of 340 hospitalizations were at Galena-Stauss Hospital (27.3%) and Galena-Stauss has admitted patients for only 27% of the DRGs for which Mercy and Finley admit patients. Therefore, the rural hospitals have a wide divergence as to each's ability to care for more patients than are currently [35] hospitalized there.

This evidence shows that the rural hospitals are technically qualified to meet the hospitalization needs of more patients than currently choose to go there. However, other barriers exist to prevent greater utilization of the rurals, the largest barrier being individual attitudes toward the rurals. Persons living any distance from the rurals simply do not seek them out for care. For example, despite the high utilization rate by the population living within the same zip code as Guttenberg Hospital, in the rest of Clayton County, in which the Guttenberg hospital lies, only 92 out of 579 hospitalizations were at the Guttenberg Hospital (15.8%). In all of Jo Davies County, in which Galena, Illinois is a part, there were 63 out of 702 hospitalizations at Galena-Stauss (8.9%). Further, a survey done by Jackson County Public Hospital in Maquoketa found they were significantly used by persons within 20 miles of the hospital, but not by persons of any greater distance.

Another barrier to the rurals taking on a greater patient volume is the difficulty the rurals have in obtaining qualified doctors and nursing staff willing to live and work in a rural community. It is not [36] at all apparent that the rurals could attract the staff necessary to expand patient volume.

Further evidence that the rurals could not significantly expand their utilization rate is that Mercy and Finley do not consider the rurals as competitors. Both Mercy and Finley look to the rurals as a source of referrals for the services that the rurals do not provide and try to cooperate with the rurals in order to capture some of this referral business. While the rurals could conceivably capture some patients should the managed care payers give incentives for their use, it does not appear to be a large percentage of the current population using Mercy and Finley.

2. 5% Price Increase

The government also argues that there are no competitors who could defeat a 5% price increase by DRHS and that therefore, the merger would result in an anticompetitive effect. The 1984 Merger Guidelines instituted the 5% test -- suggesting that if a merged entity could sustain a 5% price rise for approximately one year, the merger should be enjoined as a violation of the antitrust laws. The government concluded that a 5% price increase would be profitable, in large part, due to the following assumptions: [37] (1) people have strong loyalties to their doctors and will not switch hospitals as this [*981] would entail switching doctors, (2) the outreach clinics only influence behavior in the "fringe areas" between two regional hospitals, and (3) persons within twenty-five miles of Dubuque will only use Dubuque hospitals.

Both parties agreed that for a 5% price increase to be unprofitable, DRHS would have to lose 8% of its present population. The government asserts that this will not happen as (1) at most, 4% of those within twenty-five miles of Dubuque would shift to a non-Dubuque hospital, and (2) at most, 3.2% of the 13% of Dubuque patients living outside this 25 mile radius might shift. The government argues that those within twenty-five miles of Dubuque would not shift as they would not travel outside of Dubuque for health care needs partly because they would find it inconvenient, and partly because a shift would necessitate changing physicians which most would be unwilling to do.

The government broke down the 13% of Mercy and Finley's patients who reside outside the 25 mile radius into categories and found that the following persons would be unlikely to switch in the event of a 5% price [38] rise: (1) the .6% admitted who reside completely outside the area (e.g. California), (2) the 1.2% who are admitted through the emergency room whom the government assumes happened to be in the Dubuque area when their emergency arose, (3) the 1.1% who are admitted by Medical Associates physicians because these patients will not change hospitals due to their loyalty to their physicians and because their physicians only have privileges at Mercy and Finley, and (4) the 3.6% who were admitted by their Dubuque primary care physician, who the government assumes will not switch because they have ties to Dubuque and that particular doctor. The government asserts of the remaining 6.5% who do not fall in any of the above categories, only half, or 3.2% would switch.

The court finds the government's numerical conclusions to be incorrect, again due to the government's assumption of strong patient-physician loyalty and the government's erroneous belief that persons within twenty-five miles of Dubuque will not travel outside of Dubuque for hospital care. Adding in the percentages which the government excluded due to these assumptions puts the total of those likely to switch in the event of a 5% price [39] rise at a number higher than the 8% necessary to make the price rise unprofitable.

3. Elimination of Managed Care Discounts

The government contends the more likely scenario is that DRHS would reduce or eliminate all current discounts to managed care entities resulting in a 15-30% increase in prices. The evidence was that such a price increase would have to be countered by a 20-35% loss of patients to make such a price increase unprofitable. The government asserts that with a total abandonment of managed care discounts, to defeat a price rise, DRHS would have to lose all of its patients residing outside of the government's proposed market area (24%) and perhaps a number of those residing within the market area. The government argues that it is inconceivable that such a large exodus from the Dubuque hospitals would occur.

The government presumably relies on its assumptions that persons within twenty-five miles of Dubuque will not shift to other facilities, that outreach clinics are largely irrelevant to the analysis, and that there is strong doctor-patient loyalty preventing shifting. For the reasons stated above, the court has already found that these assumptions are erroneous.

[40] The government continues to fail to look at the merger within the context of current market trends. All evidence is that there is a great deal of competition for health care dollars -- including stiff competition between the managed care entities. As hospitalization costs account for approximately 40% of an HMOs' fee, a 15-30% price increase in hospitalization rates would equate to a 6-12% increase in the cost of an HMO. HMOs which could avoid this increase would be much more cost competitive and presumably would be able to attract more enrollees. Therefore, if DRHS acted in a noncompetitive manner, an HMO that could successfully induce Dubuque area residents to use alternative hospitals would be at a significant cost advantage.

[*982] The government asserts that those within twenty-five miles of Dubuque cannot be induced to travel outside of Dubuque for health care, however, the court finds to the contrary for several reasons: (1) a significant portion of the population already chooses to go outside Dubuque for health care, (2) managed care entities have successfully shifted patients in the past, and (3) managed care enrollees are increasingly willing to travel for financial savings.

[41] Turning to the first point, already, a significant number of Dubuque residents use the University of Iowa Hospitals and Clinics ("UIHC"), a ninety mile drive, due to quality concerns. The government asserts that these persons are only going to the University of Iowa for health care that cannot be obtained in Dubuque, and supports this assertion by testimony from doctors stating that they only send patients to the UIHC for care unavailable in Dubuque. However, 63% of Dubuque residents using the UIHC are self-referrals who are not going to the UIHC on the referral of a Dubuque doctors. Further, the zip code data shows a widely varied use of the UIHC across zip codes, indicative of the defendants' position that persons are not going only for care unavailable in Dubuque. Presumably, if persons were only using the UIHC for care unavailable in Dubuque, the percentages of persons going to the UIHC from each zip code would be fairly equal.

There was also testimony that a plastic surgeon from Cedar Rapids successfully induces Dubuque residents to travel to Cedar Rapids for plastic surgery by offering them lower prices on the surgery and hospitalization. Plastic surgery is not often covered [42] by private health insurance and therefore persons wanting plastic surgery have to pay for the full cost out of their own pocket.

A final example of persons traveling outside of Dubuque for health care needs is that of a Dubuque physician who successfully directs cardiac patients needing catheterization, angioplasty and open heart surgery to Iowa City.

Although this is reportedly done for political reasons and not for price considerations, it nevertheless does show that persons can be induced to travel from the Dubuque area for inpatient care available in Dubuque.

There is also evidence that managed care entities can successfully induce Dubuque residents to use other regional hospitals for their inpatient needs. Heritage shifted patients in need of open heart surgery and substance abuse treatment from Dubuque to Waterloo and Davenport in a successful attempt to obtain lower prices from Mercy in these service areas. The government vehemently argues that this evidence is irrelevant as these are services outside the product market and that there is no evidence that people who would switch for these services would switch for the services within the relevant product market. The court [43] finds, however, that it may rely on this evidence for two reasons: (1) the evidence is that it is generally harder to induce people to travel for the longer term hospital care necessitated by these services than for the type of hospital care within the relevant product market, and (2) there is no evidence that patients distinguish these types of care when considering whether to travel for hospital care. The main basis for the government's assertion that people inside Dubuque will not travel for hospital care is that they have not done so in the past, they are not willing to go to the extra expense of having to travel and put their families through the expense and inconvenience of having to stay in a hotel to be near them during their hospitalization, and they do not want to switch physicians. Persons traveling for substance abuse treatment and open heart surgery would apparently have these same concerns, yet they are traveling.

Finally, the court turns to the third point -- that financial incentives can induce people to travel. Many witnesses testified that employees are more willing to travel now that they are covering a greater portion of their health care costs. Survey results [44] indicate that, for less than $ 1000.00, Dubuque residents could be induced to travel to another hospital for care. The government disputes the reliability of the surveys, but the survey outcomes are confirmed by the testimony of officers within the managed care [*983] corporations and employers purchasing health care plans.

For example, Doug Sesterhahn testified that SISCO has induced enrollees to travel an hour to an hour-and-a-half for health care by providing financial incentives. Mr. Sesterhahn also testified that he felt SISCO could provide incentives that would induce Dubuque employees to go to Platteville and Southwest Medical Center for care. James Thompson felt that for some categories of patients -- nonsurgical, cancer care and heart care patients -- a $ 200 incentive would be enough to induce some Dubuque residents to travel to another regional center for their care. While he was unsure as to the numbers of persons who would travel for a $ 200 inducement, Mr. Thompson also testified that, with financial inducements of between $ 500-1000, Heritage could shift patients from inside Dubuque to the regional hospitals for many services in the relevant product market.

The average [45] full charge for inpatient hospitalization at Finley and Mercy is approximately $ 6,000. Thus, the current 20% discount to managed care payers averages $ 1,200. If that discount was eliminated at DRHS but available at one of the regional hospitals, the managed care payers would be able to offer a very significant financial incentive in order to get patients to travel. The managed care payers could include a Dubuque hospital in their health care package but also impose different co-pay requirements between the DRHS hospital and regional hospitals so as to induce travel by enough patients to defeat the price increase.

The court must also consider the present trend in hospitalizations toward shorter and fewer hospital stays requiring hospitals to enter into intense competitions for an increased population base. The court finds it relevant that the regional hospitals are in an intense competition to increase the population base from which they draw patients due to the trend in shorter hospital stays and less frequent stays. Mercy has recognized, beginning with its long range plan of 1990, that, to maintain its average daily patient census, it is dependent on increasing its base of patients [46] residing beyond Dubuque County. DRHS would be under similar pressures. The current state of hospital competition would require that DRHS strongly attempt to expand the use of its hospital by those persons outside Mercy and Finley's traditional catchment areas. If DRHS raised its prices so as to become noncompetitive with other institutions, it would not be able to expand beyond its traditional service area.

The court also notes that 23.7% of Mercy and Finley's patients currently reside in a zip code in which 33% of the residents within that zip code currently use a hospital other than Mercy or Finley. In addition there are an additional 5.9% of Mercy and Finley's patients coming from other zip codes which lie within 15 miles of a regional outreach location. The government makes no attempt to state why these individuals would not be able to switch hospitals in the event of a 15-30% price rise.

4. City of Dubuque as the Relevant Market

The government has offered an alternative geographic market. It contends that the City of Dubuque is a geographic market within which DRHS would be able to exercise market power because Dubuque residents will not travel to the rurals or other [47] regional hospitals for hospital care that is available in Dubuque. While this is a much smaller area than DRHS would service, it may be the relevant market if it is a significant market area and DRHS could successfully exert market power over this group. See, Rebel Oil Co. v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 51 F.3d 1421, 1434 (9th Cir. 1995) (citing Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 518.1b, at 534 (Supp. 1993) (geographic HN16[↑] market can be shown by showing resulting market power over any group of buyers)). HN17[↑] To be the relevant market, there must not be any other supplier of inpatient services who could constrain the price raising capability of DRHS to purchasers of inpatient services who reside within the City of Dubuque. See Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp P 518.1d, at 538 (Supp. 1993).

HN18[↑] The validity of a horizontal merger must be determined based on the merger's [*984] "effect on competition generally in an economically significant market." Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 335. How large a market must be to be economically significant has never been fully addressed. See 2A Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp P 530e, at 154 (1995). However, the Supreme Court [48] in Brown Shoe Co. found that, HN19[↑] under some circumstances the relevant geographic area may be as small as a single metropolitan area. Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 337. The court went on to explain:

HN20[↑] The fact that two merging firms have competed directly on the horizontal level in but a fraction of the geographic markets in which either has operated, does not, in itself, place their merger outside the scope of § 7. That section speaks of "any... section of the country," and if anticompetitive effects of a merger are probable in "any" significant market, the merger -- at least to that extent -- is proscribed.

370 U.S. at 337. The issue is "where, within the area of competitive overlap, the effect of the merger on competition will be direct and immediate." Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. at 357. For purposes of this analysis, the court will assume Dubuque is large enough to be an economically significant geographic area for purposes of the antitrust laws.

The government's argument that hospital services are local and that persons residing within Dubuque will not go elsewhere for hospital services is largely based upon the government's perception of inpatients' [49] desires for the convenience of a local hospitalization for themselves and for their family members who will be visiting them. The government analogizes the present case with that of Philadelphia National Bank. The government contends that hospital services, like the banking services at issue in Philadelphia National Bank are local in nature and that people want the convenience of a local hospital. 374 U.S. at 358 ("The factor of inconvenience localizes banking competition as effectively as high transportation costs in other industries.").

The government next argues that this geographical region is relevant as DRHS could raise prices to all managed care enrollees within the immediate Dubuque area while providing more favorable pricing to those persons that might possibly switch to other hospitals. It is the government's contention that managed care entities cannot get residents of Dubuque to use hospitals outside of Dubuque, and therefore, the merger would substantially lessen competition to those persons residing within the immediate Dubuque area. The government relies heavily on its assertion that residents of Dubuque will not travel for medical care available in Dubuque. [50] However, the court finds, as stated above, that Dubuque residents have in the past traveled for their health care needs and would travel in the future should DRHS prices become noncompetitive.

Much was made of the "Ottumwa Situation" -- in that the government argued that the two hospitals in Ottumwa, Iowa were allowed to merge and upon merger, promptly eliminated the discounts to the managed care entities in the area. While the court does not find that there was sufficient evidence presented on the Ottumwa merger to determine how closely the facts behind the Ottumwa merger reflect those of DRHS, the court does note significant differences -- the regional hospitals were not targeting areas around Ottumwa for expansion, to this date there has been little outreach activity in the Ottumwa area, and Ottumwa is further from other regional hospitals than is Dubuque.

The court does recognize that other courts have discounted the ability of third party payers to prevent price rises. See University Health, Inc., 938 F.2d at 1213; Hospital Corp. of America, 807 F.2d at 1391. These courts found that large insurers who "purchase" hospital services on behalf of their insured merely pass [51] any increased cost on to the consumer. In University Health Inc., the court found that the third party payer could not refuse to reimburse its insured because it deemed the price of the hospital services was too high. University Health Inc., 938 F.2d at 1213. However, these cases did not focus on managed care entities, but focused instead on traditional indemnity insurers. In the case at hand, the defendants have shown that the third party payers of [*985] interest in this matter -- the managed care entities -- can cause their enrollees to shift to other hospitals if prices at one hospital are too high, thus avoiding having to pay the higher price and providing strong incentive for the anticompetitive hospital to lower its charges.

Further, the competition has become fierce between HMO's. If an HMO were merely to pass on increased hospitalization costs to enrollees, it will lose enrollees to plans that offer a cheaper rate. This pattern has been evidenced in Platteville, Wisconsin, an area where Medical Associates HMO has met strong competition from competing plans.

Even assuming Dubuque residents would not shift in the event of a price increase by DRHS, the government has also [52] failed to establish that DRHS could successfully initiate a price discrimination program. Mr. Thompson testified in general terms that it would be possible for the hospitals to price discriminate on the basis of where a patient resided, but no one established the mechanics of how this would work. Generally, managed care payers contract with the hospitals at one price, but it is conceivable that they could either 1) establish different prices according to which employer the inpatient was insured through, or 2) establish different prices according to where the inpatient resided. If the hospital were to price discriminate by employer, this would presumably lead to the same rate being offered to all Dubuque employees without regard to where they reside. However, a substantial number of persons employed in Dubuque reside significant distances from Dubuque and would presumably have greater access to alternative hospital care. These employees would shift from using a managed care plan that used DRHS to a plan using other hospitals. The government did not address how many employees reside outside of Dubuque and therefore would shift to managed care entities with presumably lower premiums. [53] Without any quantification, it is only speculation on the government's part that such a program would be feasible.

Should DRHS attempt the other option, charging different rates based on where the employee resides, this would appear to require complex accounting by both the managed care entity and the hospital. The government has not attempted to prove that employers would agree to offer the same plan to its employees at different rates depending on where the employee resides nor has it proven that the managed care payers would agree to offer such plans. Again, that such a plan is feasible is mere speculation on behalf of the government.

Further, looking specifically at those managed care entities that currently receive discounts off their hospitalizations from Mercy or Finley, there is little evidence to support the government's contention that discounts to these businesses could profitably be eliminated if the hospitals merge. Mercy gives discounts to Medical Associates, Heritage National Health Plan, SISCO, Blue Cross Alliance, HMO of Wisconsin, Wisconsin Education Association Insurance and the Affordable Health Plan.

Presumably discounts to the two Wisconsin companies would [54] have to be maintained as there is substantial competition for the residents of southwest Wisconsin. Also, the discount to Blue Cross Alliance could not be eliminated as it offers a contract with hospitals on a "take it or leave it" basis and DRHS would either have to accept its terms or deny admittance to Blue Cross Alliance enrollees. That leaves Self Insured Systems Corporation (SISCO), Heritage National Health Plan and Medical Associates. As discussed above, Heritage has shown it has the general ability to transfer patients out of the Dubuque area to another regional hospital so it could prevent DRHS from denying it a discount. It is uncertain where SISCO's enrollees come from, but assuming they do all come from the immediate Dubuque area, it is not apparent that they could not transfer patients as does Heritage. The government has asserted no reason why SISCO would be less effective at altering hospitalization patterns than is Heritage. If SISCO did not have the patient volume to enable it to adequately threaten DRHS into maintaining discounts, presumably another managed care entity with the volume to obtain discounts could win some of SISCO's accounts and the end user of the [986] hospital [^{55}] services -- the enrollee would still have competitive options for hospitalization.

The government argues that Medical Associates would not shift patients to other hospitals because it is physician owned and prefers to use only the physician services of its Dubuque physicians. Shifting patients to other hospitals would require it to also pay outside physicians for services provided to their enrollees while hospitalized at a non-Dubuque hospital. However, HN21[↑] the antitrust laws protect competition, not competitors. Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S. Ct. 690, 697, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 \(1977\). If DRHS were to refuse to give Medical Associates a discount, but did give discounts to other managed care entities who would shift patients, Medical Associates would soon lose many of its enrollees as it would no longer be price competitive.

However, the more likely scenario would be that DRHS would continue to give discounts to Medical Associates as it would be very dependent on Medical Associates to perform outpatient services at DRHS and to attract inpatients through its outreach efforts. In 1991, Mercy recognized that because of fewer and shorter hospitalizations, its patient [*^{56}] volume was decreasing and it needed to increase its market share of the population base outside of Dubuque County. Mercy has focused on its relationship with Medical Associates as the major method of attracting new populations. As a would-be large purchaser of DRHS's services, Medical Associates could also bargain for discounts from DRHS through threats to discontinue use of DRHS outpatient services. Currently 1/3 of Medical Associates payments to both Mercy and Finley are for outpatient services, many of which Medical Associates could potentially perform at its own facilities if DRHS prices discriminated against it.

D. Distinction from Rockford

The plaintiff relies heavily on United States v. Rockford Mem. Corp., 898 F.2d 1278 \(7th Cir. 1990\), to argue that it is ridiculous to conceive of a relevant geographic market area encompassing more than a few counties. The Rockford Mem. Corp. court stated that:

But for the most part, hospital services are local. People want to be hospitalized near their families and homes, in hospitals in which their own -- local -- doctors have hospital privileges [The defendants'] proposal is ridiculous -- a ten-county [*^{57}] area in which it is assumed (without any evidence and contrary to common sense) that Rockford residents, or third party payors, will be searching out small, obscure hospitals in remote rural areas if the prices charged by the hospitals in Rockford rise above competitive levels.

Id. at 1285. The evidence in this case shows, however, that the Rockford Mem. Corp. assumptions are not correct. There is strong evidence of (1) individuals' willingness to travel, given price incentives, (2) patient-doctor loyalty is not strong enough to overcome price differentials, and (3) there are options other than the rural hospitals should DRHS raise prices. A further distinction is that the Rockford Mem. Corp. case did not discuss how outreach clinics can impact on hospital accessibility and choice.

The court also wishes to note that other hospital merger cases have not considered the impact of outreach clinics in their discussions of barriers to entry into the relevant geographic market. Most hospital cases have stated the inability to build new hospitals as a strong barrier to entry. See University Health, Inc., 938 F.2d at 1211. The parties to this dispute have stipulated [*^{58}] that no new hospital would be built in the tri-state area within the relevant time frame. However, entry would not necessitate the building of a new hospital, but merely requires that another entity be able to enter a market it was not previously servicing. The regional hospitals are able to do this through the establishment of outreach clinics.

E. Probability of a Reduction in Quality of Care

The government also attempts to argue that DRHS will be able to lessen the quality of the health care provided due to the market power it will obtain through the merger.

[*987] The government contends that by no longer remodeling its facilities and providing "free" infant car seats, this would be a price increase to inpatients. However, the free give away of car seats and the condition of the hospital room itself is unrelated to the hospitals decision to give a discount, and does not appear to have any relation to where a managed care entity sends its patients. The "amenities" competition has gone on for some period of time prior to the advent of price competition between hospitals and the court finds that it is mainly used for public relations purposes and possibly to attract persons [59] covered by indemnity insurance, Medicare, and Medicaid, who are not price conscious. The government has not shown that these amenities improve the quality of health care received and it can certainly be argued that they unnecessarily add to health care costs. Further, even if not giving away car seats or failing to remodel can be considered a price increase, the government has not shown these to be significant price increases for purposes of antitrust analysis.

F. Conclusion

The government has failed to establish the relevant geographical area and hence has failed to establish that the merger of Mercy and Finley Hospitals will likely result in anticompetitive effects.

III. Defendants' Affirmative Defenses

Since HN22 the government has failed to carry its burden in this case, the defendants are not required to prove their affirmative defenses. However, in order that the record is complete in this matter, the court will address the two affirmative defenses which remain in this case. Based upon the defendants' post-trial submissions, the defendants are still asserting two affirmative defenses: (1) that the efficiencies which result from the merger will outweigh any [60] anticompetitive effects which may result from the merger; and (2) the hospitals nonprofit status will prevent anticompetitive behavior. For the reasons stated below, the court finds that the defendants have failed to meet their burden as to each of these defenses.

A. Efficiencies Defense

The courts have recognized that HN23 in an appropriate case, "... a defendant may rebut the government's prima facie case with evidence showing that the intended merger would create significant efficiencies in the relevant market." University Health, Inc., 938 F.2d at 1222. The parties dispute the proper standard of proof which is required to establish an efficiencies defense. The government argues that the defendants are required to establish such a defense by clear and convincing evidence. The defendants counter by arguing that case law only requires the normal preponderance of the evidence standard to apply. The court concludes, however, that for purposes of this case, the HN24 defendants have failed to meet even the lower burden of showing an efficiencies defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

The irony of this case is, that while the government has failed to meet its burden of showing [61] that the merger will result in anticompetitive behavior in the relevant market, the court must conclude that the defendants have fallen far short in several respects in proving the efficiencies which it claims will result from the creation of DRHS. The defendants have failed to meet this burden in several significant respects: (1) a merger is not required to achieve many of the efficiencies;⁴ (2) implementation of the steps necessary to achieve the efficiencies is highly speculative; and (3) the Gallagher Report overstates the efficiencies which can be achieved.

Each side presented an efficiencies expert who prepared various reports and testified at trial. The defendants presented Duncan Gallagher, a senior manager at Peat Marwick & Co., as their expert. The government countered with a [62] report and testimony of Dr. Robert Taylor. On balance, the testimony and report of Dr. Taylor is far more persuasive and credible.

⁴ It is generally accepted that if the efficiencies may be obtained through a method which would not limit competition, then they may not be used as a valid defense. See University Health Inc., 938 F.2d at 1222 n.30.

[*988] Mr. Gallagher estimates that the total operating efficiencies that can be achieved as a result of the merger are approximately $ 5.2 million per year. However, approximately $ 2.1 million of that figure represents savings from "best practices." Best practices is somewhat of an illusive concept. Generally it can be defined as an attempt by hospitals to become more efficient in utilization of resources and the avoidance of duplication of expenses. Best practices can be contrasted from general attempts at efficiencies by its focus on physician practices. The defendants argue that as a merged entity they can review items such as the number of x-rays a particular physician may order and compare that number to practices of other physicians in order to determine the number of tests which are most efficient while still maintaining patient care. This efficiency becomes the "best practice."

Based upon the evidence and testimony, including Dr. Taylor's analysis, it is apparent there are a number of flaws with the best practices analysis used by Mr. Gallagher. [63] First, Mr. Gallagher concedes that this is the first time he has ever used best practices as a part of an efficiencies analysis in a hospital merger case. This points out one of the fundamental flaws with the analysis, that is, that there is little evidence a merger is necessary in order to implement the best practices savings the hospitals hope to achieve. Even one of the defendants' own witnesses, Gary Gutzko, testified that best practices does not require a merger. The hospitals argue that they need to merge in order to create a database for every department in the hospital. Dr. Taylor points out, however, there are a multitude of alternative databases available which can be used to compare the practices at Mercy and Finley in order to achieve optimum efficiencies.

There is also a serious question about the methodology used in determining the savings from best practices. Mr. Gallagher stated that the numbers he came up with for the best practices were essentially those given to him by Terry Steele.

In summary, I find the testimony of Dr. Taylor is more credible on the issue of the efficiencies which can be achieved from the merger. Dr. Taylor's report shows that the optimum [64] efficiencies which can be achieved from the merger total approximately $ 2 million per year for both operating and capital expenses.

The defendants argue that even if the $ 2 million figure of Dr. Taylor's is used, that the efficiencies outweigh any alleged anticompetitive effects from the formation of DRHS. However, the hospitals proof of its abilities to implement the efficiencies is also lacking. The government argues that the whole efficiencies issue is speculative because the DRHS Board has made no decision as to which actions will be taken in order to implement any of the changes which will result in the efficiencies. The government's argument is not well founded in this regard. The DRHS Board cannot come into existence until the merger is approved and becomes effective. Consequently, the DRHS Board can make no decisions at this time as to how it is going to operate the merged entity. The testimony shows that the proposed members of the DRHS Board are serious about obtaining optimum efficiencies from the merger and will do everything within their power to achieve all the potential efficiencies that may result from the merger.

The more serious problem, which was not adequately [65] addressed by the hospitals, is the ability of the DRHS Board to impose on the physicians and other parties the type of changes that will be required in order to achieve the efficiencies outlined in either the Gallagher or Taylor reports. As an example, both reports envision efficiencies being achieved by merging all of the obstetrical services at Finley Hospital. It is highly questionable as to whether the DRHS Board can impose such a change on the medical community given the strong opposition of Medical Associates to the merger, and the unwillingness of Medical Associates physicians to use Finley for obstetrical services when Finely offered the Medical Associates HMO a substantial discount if more Medical Associates' patients were directed to Finley. Given the fact that Medical Associates physicians were not willing to use Finley Hospital when they had a strong personal financial incentive to do so, leads to the conclusion [*989] that there very likely will be significant opposition to eliminating the obstetrics unit at Mercy Hospital.

In summary, if the government had been successful in showing anticompetitive effects from the merger, the hospital efficiencies defense must fail. The evidence [66] is inadequate to warrant a finding of maximum potential efficiencies in any amount in excess of the $ 2 million found by Dr. Taylor in his report. Moreover, there is a lack of evidence on behalf of the hospitals as to their actual ability to implement proposed efficiencies.

B. Non-Profit Status

The hospitals have also asserted as a defense their non-profit status and procompetitive intent. The hospitals cite United States v. Carilion Health Sys., 707 F. Supp. 840, 849 (W.D.Va.), aff'd without op., 892 F.2d 1042 (4th Cir. 1989), for the proposition that the non-profit status of the hospitals can be considered in determining whether the hospitals would act in an anticompetitive manner. The government points out, this is a questionable legal proposition. No other courts have explicitly adopted this theory of defense. Moreover, the facts in this case would not support the defense even if it were legally viable.

The government has presented substantial evidence to demonstrate that Mercy Hospital, in particular, has operated in a fashion similar to a for-profit corporation. Mercy Health Center of Dubuque is an operating division of Mercy Health Services of Detroit, [67] Michigan. The evidence shows that in recent years Mercy Hospital of Dubuque has been required to return approximately 30% of its profits to the parent corporation. This figure has totaled approximately $ 1.5 million to $ 2 million per year over the past several years. Obviously, the operations of the parent corporation cannot be funded out of a percentage of the profits if there are no profits generated by the Dubuque subsidiary. This is not a criticism of the payment of money to the Detroit parent. There are legitimate business and charitable reasons for the payments to the parent corporation. However, the fact remains that the practical effect of the funds transfer is to operate the hospital as the functional equivalent of a profit making subsidiary of an out-of-state corporation.

The court does not mean to imply by this decision that there is any evidence of an intent to act in an anticompetitive manner by any of the parties to the proposed merger. To the contrary, the testimony of proposed Board members such as Don Moody, is extremely credible. Individuals such as Mr. Moody and other proposed members of the DRHS Board have only the highest motives in proposing this merger. It [68] is clearly their intent to provide high quality and efficient health care to the Dubuque community. However, the fact remains, that for antitrust analysis, the court must assume that new and different Board members can take control of the corporation, and that if there is the potential for anticompetitive behavior, there is nothing inherent in the structure of the corporate board or the non-profit status of the hospitals which would operate to stop any anticompetitive behavior.

ORDER

Accordingly,

It Is Ordered:

Plaintiff's request for an injunction to block the merger of Mercy Health Center and Finley Hospital is denied. Judgment shall enter for the defendants.

Done and ordered this 27th day of October, 1995.

/s/ Michael J. Melloy, Chief Judge

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

APPENDIX

In addition to the findings of facts within the body of the opinion are these additional facts which the parties stipulated were correct.

1. Mercy and Finley, located six blocks apart, are the only general acute care hospitals in Dubuque and are the largest general acute care hospitals within a 70-mile drive of Dubuque.
2. Mercy has 302 licensed acute care (excluding skilled [69] nursing, rehabilitation, intermediate, psychiatric and substance abuse) beds excluding Dyersville, and in 1993 it had net inpatient revenues of approximately $ 44 million.

[*990] 3. Finely has 141 licensed acute care beds (excluding skilled nursing care beds) and, for its 1993 fiscal year, had net inpatient revenues of approximately $ 21 million.

4. Mercy and Finley are each financially sound and viable institutions; they have fund balances in excess of $ 45 million and $ 30 million, respectively.

5. In April, 1994, the president of Mercy agreed that Mercy is financially healthy.

6. The assessment of the president of Mercy in April, 1994, that Mercy is financially healthy is true.

7. In April, 1994, the vice-president of finance of Mercy agreed that Mercy is in good, reasonable financial shape, and there are no key indicators of performance in Mercy's 1994 to 1996 Budget Report that he has any particular concern about.

8. The assessment of the vice-president of finance of Mercy in April, 1994, that Mercy is in good, reasonable financial shape is true.

9. In April, 1994 the president and chief executive officer of Finley stated that Finley has a Standard and Poors Rating of A-, [70] which he agreed meant that Standard and Poors assesses Finley's financial condition to be strong.

10. Health Care Investment Analysts, Inc. and Mercer Management Consulting, Inc. issued a report in 1994 citing Finley as one of the 25 most efficient hospitals in the United States with fewer than 250 beds.

11. The proposed Mercy/Finley combination is not required to maintain the financial soundness or viability of either hospital.

12. The staff list provided to the Department of Justice by Mercy indicated that there were 173 physicians on the active medical staff. On December 31, 1993, Mercy had 168 physicians, including at least 15 surgeons, on its active medical staff.

13. The staff list provided to the Department of Justice by Finley indicated that there were 137 physicians on either its active or provisional medical staff (20 of these physicians had provisional privileges). On December 31, 1993, Finley had 144 physicians, including at least 11 surgeons, on its active medical staff.

14. In its 1993 fiscal year, Mercy had approximately 8,000 acute-care patient discharges (i.e., all discharges except for skilled nursing, intermediate care, rehabilitation, psychiatric and substance [71] abuse discharges), and its average daily census of such acute-care patients was approximately 110.

15. In its 1993 fiscal year, Finley had approximately 4,500 acute-care patient discharges (i.e., all discharges except for skilled nursing discharges), and its average daily census of such acute-care patients was approximately 67.

16. The Department of Justice filed a verified complaint on June 10, 1994 seeking to prevent the merger of Mercy and Finley and to have the transaction adjudged to be a violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1.

17. In providing inpatient hospital services, both Mercy and Finley regularly receive substantial health care insurance reimbursement payments and shipments of equipment and supplies from outside of Iowa. For example, in 1993 Mercy paid more than $ 6 million to vendors located outside Iowa for supplies or services used by Mercy, and Finley paid more than $ 5 million to vendors located outside Iowa.

18. Mercy and Finley are each engaged in interstate commerce.

19. Mercy and Finley are each engaged in activities substantially affecting interstate commerce.

20. The [72] United States has met its burden of proof on the issue of "effect on interstate commerce."

21. The Court has jurisdiction over the subject matter of this lawsuit under Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1.
22. Mercy and Finley are subject to the personal jurisdiction of this Court.
23. Mercy and Finley each provide high quality general inpatient acute care services to consumer-patients and having reputations [*991] among local physicians and the public for doing so.
24. Mercy and Finley each will be able to provide consumer-patients with high quality general inpatient acute care services even if the proposed combination does not take place.
25. Third-party payers of acute care inpatient services provided by Mercy and Finley include traditional indemnity health care insurers, managed care plans, the federal Medicare program and the Medicaid programs of the states of Iowa, Illinois and Wisconsin.
26. In April, 1994, the vice-president of finances of Mercy, who is that hospital's primary officer with responsibility for contracting with managed care companies, agreed that one of the effects of managed care payers not paying Mercy's full charges is to put incentives [73] on Mercy to be more cost effective.
27. In a Preliminary Official Statement, dated November 23, 1993, relating to a new bond issue, Finley represented to the public that of the eight metropolitan areas in Iowa, only one area had a lower rate of adjusted expense per hospital admission than Dubuque and of the 31 metropolitan areas in the States of Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota and South Dakota, only 3 areas had a lower rate of adjusted expense per hospital admission, according to the American Hospital Association.
28. Finley's management made the above-summarized representation concerning how the adjusted expenses per hospital admission in Dubuque compares to other metropolitan areas in Iowa and elsewhere to demonstrate how effective Finley is at controlling hospital costs, and Finley's management had a good faith basis for believing these representations to be true.
29. The creation of DRHS will end the competition between Mercy and Finley on price, quality and otherwise.
30. Outpatient care usually is less expensive than inpatient care.
31. In April 1994, the president and chief executive officer of Finley agreed that outpatient care is generally [74] less costly than inpatient care.
32. The assessment of the president and chief executive officer of Finley, in April, 1994, that outpatient is generally less costly than inpatient care is true.
33. During the past decade, there have been major advances in medical technology including diagnostic and therapeutic equipment, medications, anesthetics, surgical techniques, monitoring systems, and other medical equipment. These advances have made it possible for services that once were appropriately and safely performed only on an inpatient basis to be performed on an outpatient basis -- in outpatient clinics, surgery centers and doctors' offices.
34. There are certain medical procedures for which many third-party payers that do business with Mercy and Finley will reimburse hospitals only if the particular procedure is performed on an outpatient basis, unless some specific medical condition requires inpatient admission.
35. In conjunction with developing criteria for mandatory outpatient procedures, many third-party payers may also require "pre-admission certification" of inpatient admissions, which is a procedure designed to confirm the appropriateness of inpatient care for the treatment [75] of the patient's diagnosis. After evaluating the patient, the third-part payer may conclude that a course of outpatient treatment is appropriate, rather than the generally more costly inpatient treatment. In such an instance, the third-party payer may refuse to reimburse hospitals for any charges rendered in connection with uncertified patients.

36. Third-party payers that do business with Mercy and Finley often conduct concurrent and post-discharge utilization review. Concurrent review is the process by which current inpatients are evaluated by health professionals retained by third-party payers to determine when the patient should be discharged and treated as an outpatient. Post-discharge utilization review is a process used by many third-party payers to evaluate [*992] retrospectively the propriety of admission and decide whether or to what extent to reimburse hospitals.

37. Presently and in the foreseeable future, there are limitations from a medical perspective, upon the types of patients and the types of illnesses and medical conditions that can be treated appropriately through outpatient services. There are patients who require services and monitoring that are too intensive to [76] be done on an outpatient basis; in addition, for certain types of procedures especially surgical ones, some inpatient hospital care is necessary after the procedure is performed, so that they cannot be performed appropriately on an outpatient basis.

38. If a patient's admission to a hospital is not medically justified then, pursuant to implementation of utilization review procedures, third-party payers may refuse to pay for the patient's use of such services.

39. Many patients who receive inpatient hospital care cannot be treated safely and effectively on an outpatient basis.

40. In part, as a result of the utilization review procedures of third-party payers for patients who are hospitalized today at Mercy and Finley, outpatient services are not a good substitute for the hospital services that are provided only by acute-care hospitals on an inpatient basis.

41. It is unlikely that any new general acute care hospital will be established in the Dubuque area in the foreseeable future.

42. Iowa's CON statute likely would prevent any new general acute care hospital from being established in Dubuque in the foreseeable future.

43. It is unlikely that any new general acute care [77] hospital will be established in the foreseeable future in Illinois within twenty miles of Dubuque, Iowa.

44. It is unlikely that any new general acute care hospital will be established in the foreseeable future in Wisconsin within twenty miles of Dubuque, Iowa.

45. The creation of DRHS does not fit within the "safety zones" as set forth in the Statements of Antitrust Enforcement Policy in the Health Care Area issued September 15, 1993 by the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission.

46. Mercy and Finley do not contend that the proposed combination is justified by virtue of "the failing company defense."

47. Each of Mercy and Finley has a 24 hour emergency room and trauma center, 24 hour operating rooms, a mobile MRI, a CT scanner and an occupational health program.

48. The hospitals' have stated in both their "Vision Statement" and Partnership Agreement that the purpose in forming DRHS is to":

a. provide joint governance and management of the Hospitals in order to reduce duplicative services and expenditures, strengthen the Hospitals' ability to contract for managed care and enhance the quality of care provided by the Hospitals;

b. enable [78] the Hospitals to reduce their respective overall costs, to more effectively and economically provide efficient and integrated quality hospital services, and to perform the purposes for which each was formed and operated;

c. enable the Hospitals to compete more effectively, better serve the citizens of Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota and Wisconsin, and offer a broader range of services and programs;

d. provide needed health care services, own and operate facilities to provide such services, and take such actions as are necessary or appropriate in connection with providing such services and owning and operating such facilities.

49. Medical Associates Clinic, P.C. is a competitor of Mercy and Finley for some but not all out-patient services, and would be a competitor of DRHS for some but not all out-patient services if DRHS was formed.

50. A competitor (meaning a competitor for the services of the hospital whose prices are posited to be higher or lower) of Mercy and Finley could, other things being equal, benefit from the hospitals' charging higher [*993] prices and could, other things equal, be harmed by the hospitals' charging lower prices, since such a competitor can take advantage [79] of higher prices and gain more business at the expense of the hospitals and could lose business if the hospitals' prices are lower.

51. A competitor (meaning a competitor for the services of the hospital whose quality are posited to be higher or lower) of Mercy and Finley could, other things being equal, benefit from the hospitals' providing services of lower quality and could, other things equal, be harmed by the hospitals providing services of higher quality, since such a competitor can take advantage of lower quality and gain more business at the expense of the hospitals, and could lose business to the hospitals if they provided higher quality.

52. Managed care plans, such as HMOs, may derive competitive advantages over other payers as a result of receiving discounts from hospitals relative to the hospitals' charges. An HMO or other managed care plan may be better off competitively if it receives a discount from hospital charges than if it receives no discount, but pays lesser reimbursement. This is because HMOs and managed care plans may receive competitive advantages from paying rates of reimbursement to hospitals which are lower than those paid by competing payers and by [80] employers.

53. Allen Memorial Hospital in Waterloo, Iowa, has approximately 194 staffed acute care beds with a 1993 average daily census of approximately 145. Allen Memorial Hospital is approximately a 41-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

54. Covenant Medical Center in Waterloo, Iowa, has approximately 322 staffed acute care beds with a 1993 average daily census of 173. Covenant Medical Center is approximately a 410-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

55. St. Luke's Methodist Hospital in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, has approximately 441 staffed acute care beds with a 1993 average daily census of 28. St. Luke's Methodist Hospital is approximately a 37-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's service area and approximately an 18-mile drive from the edge of Finley's service area.

56. Mercy Medical Center in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, has approximately 353 staffed acute care beds with a 1993 average daily census of 193. Mercy Medical Center is approximately a 37-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's service area and approximately an 18-mile drive from the edge of Finley's service area.

57. St. Mary's Hospital Medical Center in Madison, Wisconsin, [81] has approximately 345 staffed acute care beds with a 1993 average daily census of 265. St. Mary's Hospital Medical Center is approximately a 55-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's service area and approximately a 41-mile drive from the edge of Finley's service area.

58. Freeport Memorial Hospital in Freeport, Illinois, has approximately 143 staffed acute care beds with an average daily census of 70. Freeport Memorial Hospital is approximately a 28-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's service area and approximately an 18-mile drive from the edge of Finley's area.

59. University of Wisconsin Hospital and Clinics in Madison, Wisconsin, has approximately 496 staffed acute care beds with a 1993 average daily census of 386. University of Wisconsin Hospital and Clinics is approximately a 55-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's service area and approximately a 41-mile drive from the edge of Finley's service area.

60. Meriter Hospital in Madison, Wisconsin, has approximately 429 staffed acute care beds with a 1993 average daily census of 258. Meriter Hospital is approximately a 55-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's service area and approximately a 41-mile drive from the edge of Finley's [82] service area.

61. University of Iowa Hospitals and Clinics in Iowa City, Iowa, has approximately 868 staffed acute care beds with a 1993 average daily census of 677. University of Iowa Hospitals and Clinics is approximately a 63-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

62. Mercy's service area extends approximately 40 miles from Mercy.

[*994] 63. Finley's service area extends approximately 40 miles from Finley.

64. Galena-Stauss Hospital is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

65. Jackson County Public Hospital is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

66. Delaware County Memorial Hospital is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

67. Central Community Hospital is within Finley's service area.

68. Guttenberg Municipal Hospital is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

69. Lancaster Memorial Hospital is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

70. Southwest Health Center is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

71. The city of Bellevue is approximately a 23-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Bellevue is approximately a 20-mile drive from Jackson County Public Hospital.

72. The city [83] of Holy Cross is approximately a 25-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Holy Cross is approximately a 27-mile drive from Southwest Health Center.

73. The city of Hazel Green is approximately a 13-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Hazel Green is approximately a 15-mile drive from Southwest Health Center.

74. The city of Farley is approximately a 20-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Farley is approximately a 26-mile drive from Delaware County Memorial Hospital.

75. The city of Cascade is approximately a 25-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Cascade is approximately a 36-mile drive from Delaware County Hospital.

76. The city of Dickeyville is approximately an 11-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Dickeyville is approximately an 11-mile drive from Southwest Health Center.

77. The city of Monticello is approximately a 34-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Monticello is approximately a 34-mile drive to St. Luke's Methodist Hospital in Cedar [84] Rapids, Iowa.

78. The city of Dyersville is approximately a 26-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Dyersville is approximately a 19-mile drive from Delaware County Memorial Hospital.

79. The city of Cuba City is approximately a 19-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Cuba City is approximately a 10-mile drive from Southwest Health Center.

80. The city of Epworth is approximately a 16-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Epworth is approximately a 30-mile drive from Delaware County Memorial Hospital.

81. The city of Potosi is approximately a 20-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Potosi is approximately a 12-mile drive from Lancaster Memorial Hospital.

82. The city of Elizabeth is approximately a 30-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Elizabeth is approximately a 13-mile drive from Galena-Strauss Hospital.

83. The city of Zwingle is approximately a 15-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Zwingle is approximately a 16-mile drive from Jackson County [85] Public Hospital.

84. The city of Worthington is approximately a 31-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Worthington is approximately a 25-mile drive to Delaware County Memorial Hospital.

85. The city of North Buena Vista is approximately a 21-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. North Buena Vista is approximately a 13-mile drive from Guttenberg Municipal Hospital.

86. The city of LaMotte is approximately a 19-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within [*995] Mercy's and Finley's service areas. LaMotte is approximately a 20-mile drive from Jackson County Public Hospital.

87. The city of Shullsburg is approximately a 28-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Shullsburg is approximately a 19-mile drive from Galena-Stauss Hospital and a 24-mile drive from Southwest Health Center.

88. The city of Delmar is approximately a 37-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Delmar is approximately a 37-mile drive from Genesis Medical Center in Davenport, Iowa.

89. The city of Sabula is approximately a 45-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's [86] and Finley's service areas. Sabula is approximately a 51-mile drive from Genesis Medical Center in Davenport, Iowa.

90. The city of Wyoming is approximately a 42-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Wyoming is approximately a 38-mile drive from St. Luke's Methodist Hospital and Mercy Medical Center in Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

91. The city of Monmouth is approximately a 42-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Monmouth is approximately a 44-mile drive to St. Luke's Methodist Hospital in Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

92. The city of Baldwin is approximately a 41-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Baldwin is approximately a 45-mile drive from St. Luke's Methodist Hospital in Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

93. The city of Nashville is approximately a 36-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Nashville is approximately a 50-mile drive from St. Luke's Methodist Hospital and Mercy Medical Center in Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

94. The city of Charlotte is approximately a 45-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Charlotte is approximately [87] a 33-mile drive from Genesis Medical Center in Davenport, Iowa.

95. The city of Spragueville is approximately a 45-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Spragueville is approximately a 55-mile drive from Genesis Medical Center in Davenport, Iowa.

96. The city of Lost Nation is approximately a 46-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Lost Nation is approximately a 45-mile drive from Genesis Medical Center in Davenport, Iowa, and approximately a 55-mile drive from St. Luke's Methodist Hospital in Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

97. The city of Miles is approximately a 54-mile drive from Dubuque, and is within Mercy's and Finley's service areas. Miles is approximately a 60-mile drive from Genesis Medical Center in Davenport, Iowa.

98. The Statement of Department of Justice and Federal Trade Commission Enforcement Policy on Mergers Among Hospitals states that the Department of Justice and Federal Trade Commission "often have concluded that an investigated hospital merger will not result in a substantial lessening of competition in situations where market concentration might otherwise raise an inference of anticompetitive [88] effects" and that "such situations include transactions where the Agencies found that:

... The merger would allow the hospitals to realize significant cost savings that could not otherwise be realized

99. Hospital mergers have occurred in Iowa in the last 2 years in Mason City (where one independent acute care hospital remains), and in Davenport (where two independent acute care hospitals remain). Neither of these transactions was challenged by the Government.

100. At least 40 physicians with offices in Dubuque provide out-patient clinics on at least a monthly basis at distances from 15 to more than 40 miles from Dubuque. At least 9 of these physicians traveled at least 40 miles to do so. At least 17 of these physicians traveled at least 30 miles to do so.

101. Genesis Medical Center in Davenport, Iowa, has approximately 462 staffed acute care beds. Genesis Medical Center is [*996] approximately a 35-mile drive from the edge of Mercy's and Finley's service areas.

102. Managed care plan payments as a percentage of Mercy's revenues, including inpatient care revenues, are expected to continue increasing in the future.

103. Managed care plan payments as a percentage [89] of Finley's revenues, including inpatient care revenues, are expected to continue increasing in the future.

104. The percentage of patients admitted to Mercy for inpatient care who are covered by a managed care plan is expected to continue increasing in the future.

105. The percentage of patients admitted to Finley for inpatient care who are covered by a managed care plan is expected to continue increasing in the future.

106. No final decision has been made as to which, if any, clinical programs at Mercy or Finley will be consolidated after the proposed combination occurs.

107. No final decision has been made as to whether the following program at Finley or Mercy will be consolidated after the proposed combination occurs:

- a. Cardiovascular
- b. Oncology
- c. Women's & Child Health
- d. Emergency/Trauma
- e. Obstetrics
- f. Orthopedics/Neurology
- g. Surgery
- h. Anesthesiology
- i. Administration
- j. Human Resources

k. Public Relations/Marketing

l. Maintenance/Bio-Med

m. Billing

n. Magnetic Resonance Imaging Program

108. Defendants have no present plans to make DRHS into a tertiary care hospital.

109. Mercy's Board of Directors has not changed a price recommendation [90] of Mercy's finance committee in the past three years.

110. Finley has made efforts in the last three years to attract patients away from Mercy.

111. There are no present plans for the proposed combination to add additional services or upgrade any particular services.

112. No proof has been submitted to Finley's Board that community-based boards of directors control hospital costs better than other types of boards.

113. Finley does better than many hospitals in controlling its costs.

114. In 1990, Mercy, through KCA Research, conducted a community telephone survey ("the survey") to assess Mercy's role in the community to help lay the foundation for future strategic planning.

115. The largest percentage of the survey's respondents said: (i) Mercy or Finley was the first hospital that came to mind when the word "hospital" was mentioned; and (ii) overall they prefer to go to Mercy or Finley in Dubuque for their health care needs.

116. 40.7% of the survey's respondents lived in Dubuque, Iowa, zip code 52001. 59.3% of the survey's respondents lived outside of Dubuque, in 51 other zip codes from Dubuque County and Jackson County, Iowa, Grant County, Wisconsin, and Jo Davies County, [91] Illinois.

117. More than three-quarters of the survey's respondents said the hospitals' being near their home was either very important or somewhat important to them when choosing a hospital.

118. Almost 97 of the survey's respondents said a wide variety of specialists is important to them when choosing a hospital.

119. Mercy and Finley receive a bulk of their revenues from providing general acute care inpatient hospital services, i.e., services provided for the diagnosis and treatment of patients who, because of the seriousness of their specific illness or general medical condition, require at least an overnight hospital stay. In Fiscal Year 1993, Mercy had total gross patient revenue of approximately $ 100 million, of which approximately $ 60 million was derived from inpatient acute care services [*997] (which excludes revenue from emergency room care, intermediate care, newborn nursery, outpatient services, psychiatric care, rehabilitation, substance abuse, and skilled nursing care). In Fiscal Year 1993, Finley had total gross patient revenue of approximately $ 57 million of which approximately $ 32 million was derived from inpatient acute care services (which excludes revenue from [92] emergency room services, outpatient care, and skilled nursing).

120. Several of the managed care plans that contract with Mercy and Finley have non-exclusive relationships with both hospitals, i.e., they negotiate contracts with both hospitals. Two other managed care plans have exclusive contracts with Mercy.

121. Mercy and Finley cooperated in containing health care costs through the formation of United Clinical laboratories in the mid-1990s, as a joint venture for providing laboratory services for Mercy and Finley.

122. The seven small rural hospitals primarily serve patients within their immediate locales, where the phrase "immediate locales" means "closer to the rural hospital than to any other hospital."

123. Mercy and Finley are closer for those persons that both live and work within Dubuque than hospitals outside of Dubuque; however, the convenience of a particular hospital depends upon a variety of factors, including, but not limited to, the hospital's location, the location of resident's physician's practice, the accessibility of the hospital, and the location of the resident's employment.

124. Finley has advertised to attract patients away from Mercy.

125. One [93] of the reasons Mercy gives manage care plans discounts is to attract a greater volume of patients.

126. Mercy stated in its 1991-94 Strategic Plan that Mercy and Finley are in direct competition for Dubuque County inpatients. The 1991-94 Strategic Plan also states that in 1988 only 6.5% of discharges for patients residing in Dubuque County were at hospitals other than Mercy or Finley.

127. Mercy's vice-president of finance has stated that it is speculation to make hospital budget projections beyond three years.

128. Mercy's vice-president of finance has stated that it is speculation to make projections about efficiencies from the proposed consolidation beyond a three-year period.

129. Mercy's vice-president of finance has stated that managed care plans use financial incentives to pressure hospitals to be as efficient as possible.

130. Central Community Hospital in Elkader, Iowa has 29 licensed beds and is located within Finley's service area. In 1993, the hospital's average daily census was three to four acute-care and nursery patients. There are four physicians on the active medical staff, including one general surgeon. In 1993, Central Community Hospital had gross inpatient [94] revenues of approximately $ 1.3 million and recently undertook a $ 1.4 million expansion of its facilities. Central Community Hospital is at least a 60 minute drive from Dubuque but the drive time could be longer, depending on traffic, road and weather conditions. Physicians from the Dubuque area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Elkader.

131. Delaware County Memorial Hospital in Manchester, Iowa, has 58 licensed beds and is located within Mercy's and Finley's service area. The hospital has recently undergone renovations and added new birthing facilities. In 1993, the hospital's average daily census was 12 acute-care patients. There are 10 physicians on the active medical staff, including one general surgeon. In its fiscal year 1993, Delaware County Memorial Hospital had gross inpatient revenues of approximately $ 4.5 million. Delaware County Memorial Hospital is at least a 40 minute drive from Dubuque but the drive time could be longer, depending on traffic, road and weather conditions. Physicians from the Dubuque area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Manchester. Physicians from the Cedar Rapids area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Manchester. Several physicians from [95] the Dubuque area have courtesy staff privileges at the hospital, which allow them to admit up to 11 inpatients a year and to consult on an unlimited number of patients. In 1993, Delaware County Memorial Hospital [*998] treated patients discharged in 180 different DRG categories.

132. Galena-Stauss Hospital in Galena, Illinois, has 25 licensed beds and is located within Mercy's and Finley's service area. In 1993, the hospital's daily average census was three acute-care patients. There are four physicians on the active medical staff, Galena-Stauss is at least a 15 minute drive from Dubuque but the drive time could be longer, depending on traffic, road and weather conditions. At least 6 physicians from the Dubuque area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Galena. Fourteen physicians from the Dubuque area have courtesy staff privileges at the hospital, which allows them to occasionally admit inpatients and to consult on an unlimited number of patients. In 1993, Galena-Stauss Hospital treated patients discharged in 93 different DRG categories.

133. Guttenberg Municipal Hospital in Guttenberg, Iowa, has 37 licensed beds and is located within Mercy's and Finley's service area. In 1993, the [96] hospital's daily average census was seven acute-care patients. There are five physicians on the active medical staff, including one general surgeon. In its 1993 fiscal year, the hospital and net inpatient revenues of $ 1.8 million. Guttenberg Municipal Hospital is a 40 minute drive from Dubuque but the drive time could be longer, depending on traffic, road and weather conditions. At least 6 physicians from the Dubuque area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Guttenberg. The hospital has recently purchased a new surgery table and fiberoptic surgical equipment. Additionally, the hospital has budgeted for the purchase of equipment in FY 1995, including ultrasound and additional surgical equipment. Fourteen physicians from the Dubuque area have courtesy staff privileges at the hospital, which allows them to occasionally admit inpatients and to consult on an unlimited number of patients. In 1993, Guttenberg Municipal Hospital treated patients discharged in 149 different DRG categories.

134. Jackson County Public Hospital in Maquoketa, Iowa, has 99 licensed beds and is located within Mercy's and Finley's service area. It currently has the facilities to support, and is staffed, for 43 [97] beds. In 1993, the hospital's average daily census was 12.4 acute-care patients. There are 11 physicians on the active medical staff, including one general surgeon and one internist. In its 1993 fiscal year, Jackson County Hospital's net total patient revenues were $ 7.6 million which constitutes more than a fourteen (14%) percent increase over 1992. Jackson County Hospital is at least a 30 minute drive from Dubuque but the drive time could be longer, depending on traffic, road and weather conditions. At least 8 physicians from the Dubuque area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Maquoketa. Several Dubuque-based physicians have courtesy staff privileges at the hospital, which allows them to occasionally admit inpatients and consult on an unlimited number of patients. Some Davenport-based physicians have courtesy staff privileges at the hospital, which allows them to occasionally admit patients and to consult on an unlimited number. In 1993, Jackson County Hospital treated patients discharged in 188 different DRG categories.

135. Lancaster Memorial Hospital in Lancaster, Wisconsin, has 35 licensed beds and is located within Mercy's and Finley's service area. In 1993, the hospital's [98] average daily census was 20 acute-care patients. There are 9 physicians on the active medical staff. In its 1993 fiscal year, Lancaster Memorial Hospital's gross inpatient revenues were $ 3.7 million. Lancaster Memorial Hospital is at least a 30 minute drive from Dubuque but the drive time could be longer, depending on traffic, road and weather conditions. At least four physicians from the Dubuque area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Lancaster. Physicians from the Madison, Wisconsin area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Platteville. Several physicians from the Dubuque area have courtesy staff privileges at the hospital, which allows them to occasionally admit patients and to consult on an unlimited number of patients. In 1993, Lancaster Memorial Hospital treated patients discharged in 202 different DRG categories.

136. Southwest Health Center in Platteville, Wisconsin, has 35 licensed beds and is located within Mercy's and Finley's service [*999] area. In 1993, the hospital's daily average census was 11 acute-care patients. There are eight physicians on the active medical staff, including two general surgeons and one internist. In its 1993 fiscal year, Southwest's net inpatient [99] revenues were $ 3.5 million. Southwest Health Center is at least a 30 minute drive from Dubuque but the drive time could be longer, depending on traffic, road and weather conditions. At least ten physicians from the Dubuque area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Platteville. Physicians from the Madison, Wisconsin, area conduct specialty outreach clinics in Platteville. In 1993, Southwest Health Center treated patients discharged in 204 different DRG categories.

CONSENT [*2] ORDER

WHEREAS, American Booksellers Association, Inc.; Dickens Books Ltd. (d/b/a/ Harry W. Schwartz Bookshops); B&R Books, Inc. (d/b/a/ Little Professor Book Center); Olsson Enterprises, Inc., Sam Weller's Zion Book Store, Inc.; and Tattered Cover, Inc., being all of the plaintiffs in the above-captioned action (collectively and individually "Plaintiffs"), and Defendant Houghton Mifflin Company, Inc. ("Houghton Mifflin"), have jointly submitted this consent order to resolve all of the claims of Plaintiffs against Houghton Mifflin; and

WHEREAS, in this litigation, Plaintiffs have alleged that Houghton Mifflin has violated Sections 2(a), 2(d), and 2(e) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 13(a), 13(d), and 13(e), by discriminating with respect to price and the provision of promotional services, facilities, and compensation for service and facilities in the sale of books to competing booksellers, all as set forth in more detail in the Amended Complaint in this action; and

WHEREAS, without any admission of any liability whatsoever by Houghton Mifflin, the parties desire to amicably settle Plaintiffs' claims against Houghton Mifflin on the terms set forth in this Order, including [*3] all exhibits (collectively referred to as the "Consent Order"); and

WHEREAS, upon review of the proposed Consent Order, the Court finds that it is in the interests of justice and the prompt resolution of the issues in this litigation to approve this order.

It is therefore hereby ORDERED that:

1. This Court makes no finding of liability by Houghton Mifflin; this Consent Order reflects a compromise of disputed factual and legal claims.
2. Effective January 1, 1996, Houghton Mifflin shall, in the sale of a) books published by Houghton Mifflin and offered for resale, and b) books distributed by Houghton Mifflin and offered for resale on price or promotional allowance terms set by Houghton Mifflin, comply with the Rules for Application of the Robinson-Patman Act to Book Publishing (the "Rules") attached as Exhibit A and incorporated into this Consent Order by reference. These Rules reflect the parties' agreement as to the Robinson-Patman Act's application to the practices of Houghton Mifflin addressed by the Rules. Plaintiffs waive any and all claims or causes of action that each or all of them has, have, or may have arising under the Robinson-Patman Act, any other antitrust law, or [*4] any law of unfair competition with respect to any of Houghton Mifflin's pricing and promotional practices from the beginning of time until the date of this Consent Order, but reserve the right to challenge, pursuant to the terms of this Consent Order, any of Houghton Mifflin's pricing and promotional practices in effect after January 1, 1996, and that are not included in the Pricing and Promotional Allowances Plan (the "Plan") set forth in Exhibit B to this Consent Order and incorporated herein by this reference.
3. It is conclusively agreed and adjudged that the Plan set forth in Exhibit B to this Consent Order complies fully and in all respects with the Rules set forth in Exhibit A and that none of the Plaintiffs will seek to impose any liability on, or obtain any relief from, Houghton Mifflin insofar as it prices, or provides promotional allowances with respect to, books that it sells for resale in accordance with the Plan. Notwithstanding the foregoing, Plaintiffs and Houghton Mifflin disagree as to whether the Plan's non-returnable discount schedule, which requires retailers to annually elect to do business with Houghton Mifflin on a non-returnable basis in order to avail themselves [*5] of the discounts in that schedule, meets the requirements of practicable availability under the Robinson-Patman Act. If, within two years of entry of this Consent Order, Plaintiffs resolve this issue by future settlement or judgment against another present or future defendant (as defined in paragraph 8 below) in a manner that results in a specific restriction being placed on such defendant that is materially more stringent than the comparable restriction placed on Houghton Mifflin with respect to the Plan's non-returnable discount schedule and the election required with respect to it, then this Consent Order shall be construed, and amended if necessary, to comport with the more stringent restriction imposed in that settlement or judgment, taking into account the differences, if any, in the nature of the business of Houghton Mifflin and such other defendant. (By way of example only, an agreement by another defendant with respect to a category of books that constitutes a minor portion of the defendant's business would not automatically compel Houghton Mifflin to modify this Consent Order with respect to a category of books that constitutes a significant portion of Houghton Mifflin's [*6] business.) If no such settlement or judgment is reached or entered, Plaintiffs and Houghton Mifflin will attempt to negotiate a mutually satisfactory resolution of their dispute and, if they fail to do so, Plaintiffs or Houghton Mifflin may submit the issue in a post-Consent Order motion under the provisions of paragraph 6 below, provided, however, that neither Houghton Mifflin nor any of the Plaintiffs may do so earlier than three years after the entry of this Consent Order. Nothing herein shall modify the provisions of paragraph 8 or paragraph 9 hereof or compel Houghton Mifflin to continue to offer a returnable or non-returnable discount schedule.

4. Nothing in the Plan or the foregoing paragraph shall in any way preclude Houghton Mifflin from varying or altering any provision of the Plan, or from adopting and implementing any additional or other pricing or promotional practices so long as those variations, alterations, or practices are consistent with the Rules set forth in Exhibit A. Similarly, nothing shall preclude Plaintiffs from challenging, in accordance with the provisions of this Consent Order, any such variation or alteration of the Plan or additional or other pricing [*7] or promotional practice by Houghton Mifflin.

5. If an issue or question arises with respect to the permissibility of any pricing or promotional practice of Houghton Mifflin, that issue or question shall be resolved, to the fullest extent possible, by reference to the Rules set forth in Exhibit A. It is the intention of the parties that the Rules be interpreted as comprehensively addressing and resolving, if possible, all factual and legal issues and questions addressed by the terms and spirit of the Rules. If the issue or question cannot be resolved pursuant to the terms and the spirit of the Rules, then the issue or question shall be resolved in accordance with and pursuant to the then-effective provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act and the decisions and pronouncements under the Act by the courts and by the Federal Trade Commission, respectively, giving due consideration to the general purposes and spirit of the Rules.

6. Any party may move the Court to take action with respect to this Consent Order, which action may include, by way of example only: (a) holding another party in contempt for failure to comply with the Consent Order; (b) issuing an interpretation of the Consent Order [*8] where its terms are considered by the moving party to be unclear; or (c) modifying the Consent Order to reflect amendment or repeal of the Robinson-Patman Act or interpretation of the Act by federal courts or by the Federal Trade Commission [other than in In the matter of Harper & Row, et al. (F.T.C., filed 1988)] substantially modifying the legal bases or premises of the Consent Order, provided, however, that there shall be no alteration of Houghton Mifflin's payment obligation under paragraph 11. Before any party may move the Court to take any action with respect to this Consent Order it must follow the Dispute Resolution Procedures set forth in Exhibit C and incorporated into this Consent Order by reference. Any bookseller member of the American Booksellers Association that is not a named party in this action may also avail itself of the Dispute Resolution Procedures, but by so doing agrees conclusively and shall be deemed to be strictly bound by all provisions of this Consent Order for all purposes as if it were a named party in this action, including but not limited to the waiver of claims or causes or actions pursuant to Paragraph 2 of this Consent Order.

7. To the fullest [*9] extent permissible by law with respect to any claim for equitable relief, this Consent Order shall bind and inure to the benefit of all members of the American Booksellers Association on whose behalf the Association purports to bring this suit seeking injunctive relief. Nothing in this Consent Order shall be used or submitted as evidence or to establish any standard of conduct or interpretation of applicable law, or be construed to have the effect of res judicata, collateral estoppel, waiver, admission, or any other effect on Houghton Mifflin in any suit or claim filed or brought against Houghton Mifflin (a) by any person or entity not deemed to be bound by the terms of this Consent Order as provided herein or (b) by any person or entity whatsoever, whether or not otherwise bound by the terms of this Consent Order, if the suit or claim seeks damages, attorneys fees, or declaratory or injunctive relief that may be the basis for an award of damages or attorneys fees, unless the suit or claim is by a party to this action and seeks solely to enforce this Consent Order (including a request for an award of attorneys fees). Nothing in this Order, however, shall preclude Houghton Mifflin from [*10] arguing that non-named-party bookseller members of the American Booksellers Association are in fact bound by the terms of this Consent Order for all purposes. Plaintiffs agree to use their best efforts to discourage damages suits by non-named-party bookseller members of the American Booksellers Association against Houghton Mifflin for issues, occurrences, or practices addressed by this Consent Order and to encourage all members to use, pursuant to paragraph 6 of this Consent Order, the Dispute Resolution Procedures set forth in Exhibit C to resolve disputes relating to such matters.

8. If, on or after the date of this Consent Order, some or all of the Plaintiffs resolve by future settlement or judgment their claims against any other present or future defendant in a manner that: (a) results, by settlement or judgment, in any specific restriction being placed on that defendant that is materially less stringent than any comparable restriction placed on Houghton Mifflin under the terms of this Consent Order, or (b) results in a settlement that does not include any material term relating to alleged discrimination arising from a pricing or promotional practice in book publishing that is [*11] placed on Houghton Mifflin under the terms of this Consent Order, then this Consent Order shall be construed, and amended if necessary, to comport with the less stringent restriction imposed in that settlement or judgment or to delete the material term not included in that settlement. Plaintiffs shall share with Houghton Mifflin the terms of any settlement with any other present or future defendant and shall not enter into any confidentiality agreement with such defendant that precludes disclosure of those terms to Houghton Mifflin. Plaintiffs represent that, except for the prior agreement with format defendant Hugh Lauter Levin Associates, Inc., Plaintiffs have no settlement agreement with any other defendant that has not been disclosed to Houghton Mifflin. Nothing in this paragraph shall alter Houghton Mifflin's payment or fees and costs specified in this Consent Order. A "present or future defendant" is any defendant named in this action or added after the date of this Consent Order and any defendant in any other action brought by one or more of the Plaintiffs that raises issues substantially the same as the issues raised in this action.

9. If, on or after the date of this Consent [*12] Order, the pending Federal Trade Commission proceeding involving other publishers not defendants in this action, In the Matter of Harper & Row, et al. (F.T.C., filed 1988), is resolved by Commission order in a manner that results in any specific and detailed restriction as to alleged discrimination arising from a pricing or promotional practice in book publishing being placed on and made effective as to any publisher respondent in that proceeding that is materially, less stringent than any closely comparable restriction placed on Houghton Mifflin under the terms of the Rules accompanying this Consent Order, then those Rules shall be construed, and amended if necessary, to comport with the less stringent restriction imposed in that resolution of the FTC proceeding; provided, however, that this paragraph shall not relieve Houghton Mifflin from the terms of this Consent Order, nor from any of the accompanying Rules that is not directly addressed in any resolution of any FTC proceeding. If the resolution, when effective, of the FTC proceeding results in any specific and detailed restriction as to alleged discrimination arising from a pricing and promotional practice in book publishing [*13] being placed on any publisher respondent in that proceeding that is materially more stringent than any closely comparable restriction placed on Houghton Mifflin under the terms of the Rules accompanying this Consent Order, then the Rules shall be construed, and amended if necessary, to comport with the more stringent restriction imposed in that resolution of the FTC proceeding; provided, however, that the more stringent restriction is also imposed on all present and future defendants (as defined in paragraph 8) as a result of any future settlement or judgment resolving the claims of some or all of the Plaintiffs' against any other present or future defendant.

10. This Consent Order shall terminate automatically ten (10) years after the date of this Consent Order and shall have no force and effect after its termination.

11. The claims of each Plaintiff against Houghton Mifflin are DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE; provided, however, that the Court retains jurisdiction over this action and the parties to it to hear and resolve any post-Consent Order motion. Houghton Mifflin agrees to reimburse Plaintiff American Booksellers Association, Inc. the amount of $ 275,000.00 for fees and costs associated [*14] with this litigation.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

EXHIBIT A

RULES FOR THE APPLICATION OF THE ROBINSON-PATMAN ACT TO BOOK PUBLISHING

A. Price Discrimination

1. The publisher must make available the same price terms (including discounts) to all competing book retailers * for book purchases of the same size, regardless of the size or type of the book retailer that makes the purchase. The size of the book retailer shall not affect the price terms. The administrative requirements to qualify for a particular price term (including, for example, requirements for shipping and documenting returns), and the publisher's implementation and enforcement of those requirements, must be the same for all competing book retailers, large and small alike.

[*15] 2. The publisher must make available the same credit terms in the sale of books to all competing book retailers, regardless of size or type, that pose the same or substantially similar credit risks; it may make available different credit terms to different book retailers that pose substantially different credit risks only after specifically identifying and documenting the variances in risks. Those risks may be identified and documented on a category-by-category basis. The publisher must impose on all competing book retailers within a designated risk category, regardless of size or type, the same consequences for failure to make payments according to the publisher's terms (including, for example, discontinuance of new shipments, COD, mandatory use of credit cards, and requirements of security or personal guarantees).

3. To the extent that the publisher sells books on a non-returnable basis to any book retailer, it must at approximately the same time make available books on the same non-returnable basis to any other competing book retailer.

4. Any difference in book price terms to competing book retailers must be justified by, and not exceed, a difference in cost to the [*16] publisher, or be practicably available to competing book retailers, unless it falls within the meeting competition or changing conditions exceptions. Before providing any differing price terms based on cost justification, the publisher must reasonably determine and specifically document the rationale and calculations for any cost difference used to justify the difference in price terms. Documentation must be maintained for three years after it is generated. Differing price terms are practicably available to competing book retailers where competing book retailers can avail themselves of the terms with no, or only minimal, additional expense, delay, or inconvenience beyond the competing retailers' then-current common business practices.

5. If the publisher does not make available to competing book retailers the same book price terms in reliance upon the meeting competition exception, it must be able to demonstrate and document that, at the time the publisher first offered the better price term, it had a good faith belief that: (a) a competitor offered the same or more favorable terms, and (b) the publisher would lose a significant amount of business (for example, in terms of total [*17] sales, sales in a particular product or geographic market, or sales to a particular customer) if the publisher failed to meet this competition. Documentation must be maintained for three years after it is generated. The publisher must limit the size, scope, and duration of the price concession to the size, scope, and duration of the competitive offer it believes in good faith that it is meeting.

6. If the publisher does not make available to competing book retailers the same book price terms in reliance upon the changing conditions exception, it must be able to demonstrate and document that it offered the reduced price in response to changing conditions affecting the market for, or the marketability of, the books concerned. Documentation must be maintained for three years after it is generated. Changing conditions justifying a price reduction shall be limited to: (a) the obsolescence of seasonal books in imminent danger of losing substantially all of their value; (b) a distress sale under court process; or (c) a sale in good faith in discontinuance of business in either all copies of a specific book or title or in identifiable lines or types of books. Nothing here shall prevent [*18] the publisher from "remaindering in place," i.e., offering an additional discount or rebate on a specific title to all book retailers that have already purchased the title including, in the discretion of the publisher, the imposition upon all book retailers that accept the offer additional conditions or qualifications such as cancellation of return rights.

* "Book retailer" includes all businesses that purchase new, undamaged books for resale to consumers in competition with one another in contemporaneous transactions, including but not limited to independent and chain bookstores, warehouse clubs, department stores, grocery or drug stores, gift or gourmet shops, mail order houses, book clubs, catalog sales, news stands, airport shops, and television or other broadcast-, cable-, or satellite-fed sales promotions; book retailers are "in competition with one another" if they offer for sale the same or similar books to consumers in the same geographic market.

7. If the publisher provides price concessions on books to a book retailer that will resell the publisher's books with concessions in retail prices, the publisher must make available equivalent terms to all competing book retailers that will likewise resell the books with concessions in retail prices.

8. For any books that the publisher sells to a wholesaler affiliated with a book retailer, no wholesale discount may be provided under the functional discount exception if the books are shipped directly to the affiliated retailer. If a discount is justified on the basis that it reimburses the retailer-affiliated wholesaler for functions performed, the publisher shall reimburse the retailer-affiliated wholesaler only for the percentage of the wholesaler's purchases that are not resold to affiliated retailers at prices different [*19] from the prices at which the books are resold to unaffiliated retailers. The retailer-affiliated wholesaler must certify and document to the publisher the percentage of the wholesaler's purchases that are resold to other than affiliated retailers and the prices at which books are sold to affiliated and unaffiliated retailers. The publisher must maintain the documentation for three years after it is generated. These discounts shall be made available to other competing retailers to the extent that they undertake the same wholesale functions, and certify and document to the publisher the percentage of their purchases deriving from the wholesale functions. Any other discount provided to a retailer-affiliated wholesaler must be cost-justified according to Paragraph 4.

9. The availability, duration, and all other terms and conditions of book sales to book retailers, including discounts and credit terms, must be published annually in the American Booksellers Association's ABA Book Buyer's Handbook ("The Red Book"), with all changes or additions published promptly in ABA's weekly "Bookselling This Week" newsletter, in Publishers Weekly magazine, or in any other media reasonably [*20] available to all book retailers, with contemporaneous notice to ABA as to the other media.

B. Promotional Allowance Discrimination

1. In connection with the sale or books for resale, the publisher must make all promotional allowances, if any -- including any payments, support, facilities or services provided by the publisher to a book retailer in connection with the retailer's promotional or other services or facilities -- proportionally available to all competing book retailers, * regardless of the size or type of the book retailer. Nothing shall require a publisher to make available promotional allowances or prohibit the publisher from imposing limitations or conditions on the use of promotional allowances by book retailers, provided that those limitations or conditions are imposed on all competing book retailers, large and small alike, and that there is no disproportionate impact on smaller book retailers.

[*21] 2. If the publisher provides promotional allowances for one kind of promotional activity undertaken by individual larger book retailers in connection with the resale of the publisher's books, the publisher must make available proportionally equal alternatives for smaller competing book retailers that cannot practicably undertake the same kind of promotional activity. Accordingly, a smaller book retailer must be permitted to use a promotional allowance for different promotional activities (such as direct mail and point-of-sale displays) if the allowance is too small to permit it to engage in the same kind of promotional activities (such as newspaper, television, or radio advertising) for which larger book retailers use their allowances.

3. If the publisher provides promotional allowances to book retailers in connection with the resale of the publisher's books, the publisher must make available to competing book retailers that buy through wholesalers promotional allowances proportionally equal to those made available to book retailers that buy directly from the publisher.

4. If the publisher provides promotional allowances to a book retailer in connection with the resale [*22] of the publisher's books, the publisher must make available proportionally equal promotional allowances to all competing book retailers within the book retailer's geographic market. The publisher shall use its best efforts to assure that the book retailer utilizes its promotional allowances on a geographically proportional basis.

* "Book retailer" includes all businesses that purchase new, undamaged books for resale to consumers in competition with one another in contemporaneous transactions, including but not limited to independent and chain bookstores, warehouse clubs, department stores, grocery or drug stores, gift or gourmet shops, mail order houses, book clubs, catalog sales, news stands, airport shops, and television or other broadcast-, cable-, or satellite-fed sales promotions; book retailers are "in competition with one another" if they offer for sale the same or similar books to consumers in the same geographic market.

5. The administrative requirements for a book retailer to qualify for promotional allowances in connection with the resale of a publisher's books, and the publisher's implementation and enforcement of those requirements, must be the same for all competing book retailers, large and small alike.

6. A publisher may make available to book retailers in connection with the resale of its books promotional allowances that are not proportionally equal only on the basis of the meeting competition exception. This exception requires the publisher to be able to demonstrate and document that, at the time the publisher first offered the more favorable promotional allowance, it had a good faith belief that: (a) a competitor offered the same or a more favorable allowance, and (b) the publisher would lose a significant amount of business (for example, in terms of [*23] total sales, sales in a product or geographic market, or sales to a particular customer) if the publisher failed to meet this competition. Documentation must be maintained for three years after it is generated. The publisher must limit the size, scope, and duration of the competitive allowance to the size, scope, and duration of the competitive offer it believes in good faith it is meeting.

7. If the publisher provides promotional allowances to a book retailer that will resell the publisher's books with concessions in retail prices, the publisher must make available proportionally equal promotional allowances to all competing book retailers that will likewise resell the books with concessions in retail prices.

8. A publisher must make available to a book retailer not affiliated with a wholesaler promotional allowances in connection with the resale of the publisher's books that are proportionally equal to those received by competing book retailers affiliated with a wholesaler.

9. The availability, duration, and all other terms and conditions of promotional allowances to book retailers in connection with the resale of the publisher's books must be published annually in [*24] the American Booksellers Association's ABA Book Buyer's Handbook ("The Red Book"), with all changes or additions published promptly in ABA's weekly "Bookselling This Week" newsletter, in Publishers Weekly magazine, or in any other media reasonably available to all book retailers, with contemporaneous notice to ABA as to the other media.

Exhibit B

Houghton Mifflin Company Proposed New Terms and Promotional Program

I. Book Discount Schedules

* Effective date: Jan 1, 1996

* New definition of book customer types:

1. End-users: customers who purchase or obtain HM books for their own use and not for resale.
2. Retailers: business entities who resell or otherwise make HM books available to end users.
3. Libraries: institutional entities who lend or otherwise make available and do not resell HM books to end-users.
4. Wholesalers: business entities who resell at least 80% of their annual HM book purchases to libraries or unaffiliated retailers and certify annually to that effect.

(Those who do less than 80% will be required annually to calculate and document the dollar amount of their business resold to affiliated retailers. HM will rebill them [*25] for this portion at retail terms unless they certify annually that prices and terms to affiliated and unaffiliated retailers are the same.)

* All customers will be reclassified as per the above definitions by Jan 1, 1996.

* Retailers must annually elect to do business with HM on either a returnable or a non-returnable basis. Such election may only be changed annually. Should a customer decide to change its status from non-returnable to returnable, all purchases made prior to the change will remain non-returnable and coop allowances available to them as a returnable retailer (see below) will be based exclusively on their returnable purchases.

* Retail returnable customers may avail themselves of HM's retail cooperative advertising program (see below). Non-returnable retailers may not.

* Retail returnable discount schedule:

1-15 assorted copies	20%
16+ assorted copies	47%

* Non-returnable discount schedule:

1-15 asst. copies	20%
16-99	47%
100-499	50%
500+ asst. copies	53%

* Both retail returnable (RR's) and retail non-returnable customers (NRR's) may elect to open a "warehouse account" with HM and avail themselves [26] of the following preferential discounts, provided they submit all orders according to the following rules:

- a. single ship-to location which can receive shipments delivered by long distance carriers (including on pallets).
- b. carton quantities only (HM reserves the right to round up or down) (HM will attempt to standardize these quantities).
- c. no sub-shipments (requiring separate packing) within any order

* Retail returnable warehouse discount schedule (RRW):

1-15 asst. copies	20%
16+ asst. copies	49%

* Non-returnable retail warehouse discount schedule (NRRW):

1-15 asst. copies	20%
16-99	47%
100-499	52%
500+ copies	55%

* Non-returnable retail warehouse (NRRW) customers may order from a list of "commodity HM titles" and, by clearly marking such orders "special reference title orders," receive their normal discounts at the following reduced minimums:

1-15	20%
100+ asst. titles	55%

(The list of titles will be published seasonally in PW and AB. No other titles may be included in these orders.)

* Retailers may not have both returnable and non-returnable accounts.

* Both returnable [27] and non-returnable retailers may elect to have both a warehouse and a regular account and order specifically from each as per their respective restrictions.

* Effective Jan 1, 1996, HM will discontinue its Freight Pass-Through Policy, Accounts returning HM titles after that date will be credited for returned books at the discounts and invoice list prices which were awarded on the customer's last purchase of those titles from HM.

II. Promotional Program

* Available to returnable retailers only.

* An allowance for use by eligible retailers in the current calendar year will be established at the beginning of the calendar year.

This allowance will be calculated by adding the following:

a. 5% of previous calendar year's net HM book billings (exclusive of DK business) up to $ 100,000, 3% of net HM book billings (exclusive of DK business) thereafter. Retailers having more than one account may add them together (The $ 100,000 break point will activate when all accounts total $ 100,000, not each account separately.)

b. 5% of 85% (4.25%) of previous year's net book billings (only HM books, not DK) from wholesaler(s) who provide documentation acceptable to HM.

* [*28] Coop reimbursements will take the form of credits to the retailer's account(s).

* Restrictions on use:

a. Available for use in promoting only designated HM titles (to be announced seasonally in PW, AB, with no other or advance announcement to any retailer)

b. Prior approval by HM is required.

c. Documentation (that verifies that the promotional activity has been undertaken) is required (e.g. tear sheets, documentation verifying that display space was used, etc.) No coop reimbursement will be credited or permitted for any retailer until acceptable documentation is received.

d. Allowances will be approved on a first-come, first-served basis. HM reserves the right to close out particular titles which have been oversubscribed but will make available alternative titles throughout the calendar year.

* New features:

a. HM will make available on a seasonal basis the opportunity for any retailer (returnable) to avail itself of specific display allowances for placing the aforementioned HM coop titles in promotional areas of its store(s). These will offer a certain dollar amount per week per retail location for such display. As with all other qualified promotional [*29] activities, display allowance will be paid only within the overall annual allowance described above. HM will assure that each retailer (returnable) has the opportunity to utilize approximately the same percentage of its overall coop allowance in this display allowance program. All other specifics on these display allowance opportunities will be published seasonally in PW and AB.

b. In addition to the above display allowance program, HM may occasionally provide the opportunity to draw additional funds from its overall coop allowance to any retailer who resells promotionally displayed, designated HM titles at prices at or below a certain percentage of HM's suggested list price. HM will assure that each retailer (returnable) has the opportunity to utilize approximately the same percentage of its overall coop allowance in this display/discount program. These opportunities will also be announced seasonally in PW and AB.

c. For those retailers who operate in more than one media area of the country (defined by the various media vehicles in which the retailer chooses to expend its coop allowance), HM will establish a separate advertising allowance for the year for each of the media [*30] areas in which the account uses HM coop funds.

This calculation will be made by breaking down the previous year's purchases by the respective media areas into which they were shipped (either by HM directly, by the accounts distribution centers or by wholesalers who serve them).

Such accounts will be restricted to expending HM coop allowances only within the pool allowances earned for each respective media area.

EXHIBIT C

DISPUTE RESOLUTION PROCEDURES

These procedures shall apply to any motion by the American Booksellers Association or individual bookstore plaintiffs ("the Plaintiffs"), by any member of ABA, or by Houghton Mifflin Co., Inc. for any action with respect to the Consent Order ("post-Consent Order motion") as specified in paragraph 6 of the Consent Order.

1. Each year prior to January 1, ABA and Houghton Mifflin will select and engage, on a year-to-year basis, an expert neutral mediator. To the extent practicable, ABA and Houghton Mifflin will select a mediator with expertise and experience in the areas of: (1) The Robinson-Patman Act, and (2) the book publishing and book selling industry, in that order of priority. If ABA and Houghton Mifflin fail to agree [*31] upon a mediator by January 1, they will, by January 15, together move the court for an order appointing a mediator from candidates suggested separately by ABA and by Houghton Mifflin. All fees and expenses of the mediator will be divided equally between ABA and Houghton Mifflin.

a. Any planned post-Consent Order motion will be initially submitted in writing directly to ABA, if the initiating party is Houghton Mifflin, or to Houghton Mifflin if the initiating party is ABA itself or any individual bookseller. If the initial submission is by a bookseller not a named party to the action resolved by the Consent Order, that submission must expressly state that it is being made pursuant to, and in accordance with, the terms and provisions of the Consent Order and this Exhibit C and that the bookseller agrees to be bound by all provisions of the Consent Order. The party receiving the inquiry shall respond in writing within fifteen (15) business days following receipt of the initiating party's communication, unless a different time is agreed to in writing.

b. If the initiating party is Houghton Mifflin or ABA, and the initiating party is not satisfied with the response it received, or if [*32] no response is received, the initiating party may then present the post-Consent Order motion, in writing, to the mediator.

c. If the initiating party is an individual bookseller deemed a party to this Consent Order and if it is not satisfied with the response it received from Houghton Mifflin, it may submit its post-Consent Order motion, in writing, to ABA and notify Houghton Mifflin of that action. ABA will examine the inquiry and notify the initiating party, within fifteen (15) days after receipt of the submission, unless a different period is agreed to, as to whether ABA will take the matter to the mediator on behalf of the initiating party. A copy of that notice will be given to Houghton Mifflin. The decision of ABA shall be final as to the bookseller initiating party. ABA shall only bring to the mediator a post-Consent Order motion submitted by an individual bookseller if ABA believes, in good faith, that the motion has merit.

2. Prior to the submission of an unresolved post-Consent Order motion to the mediator, the parties shall confer and reach agreement regarding the exchange of: (a) documents and information in the moving party's possession or in the possession of any initiating [*33] individual book retailer relevant to the motion, (b) documents and information in the nonmoving party's possession relevant to any defense or opposition to the motion, and (c) other relevant documents and information; the parties shall also confer and attempt to reach agreement regarding the confidentiality of those documents and information. If the parties are unable to reach agreement on documents and information to be exchanged, that issue shall be presented to the mediator at the conclusion of an expedited telephonic conference before the underlying dispute is submitted to the mediator on the merits. Any decision of the mediator regarding the appropriate documents or information to be exchanged shall neither control nor affect the scope of permissible discovery before the Court should either party appeal the mediator's decision on the merits.

3. Upon submission of a matter to him, the mediator will, on the most expedited and efficient basis possible, issue a written ruling. In so doing, the mediator may conduct interviews, require the parties to appear before him, request submission of short briefs or position papers [not to exceed fifteen (15) pages, double spaced], conduct [*34] an informal hearing, and adopt other procedures appropriate for an expedited mediation program consistent with the overriding goal that the process be as quick and as inexpensive as possible. The parties will fully cooperate with one another in the mediation process, and failure to do so may be considered sufficient reason for the mediator to rule against a noncooperating party. Each party will be solely responsible for its own expenses in connection with the mediation program. The mediator is not permitted to recommend any award of damages or monetary compensation.

4. If any party believes that the mediator's ruling is erroneous, that party may, within five (5) business days after issuance of the ruling, petition the Court for de novo review, which shall be conducted on an expedited basis under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

5. If book publishers other than Houghton Mifflin enter into similar settlement agreements with Plaintiffs, Plaintiffs will use their best efforts to require that those other publishers also agree to abide by these dispute resolution procedures. If other publishers are included, the annual selection of the mediator will be by ABA, as one participant [*35] in the selection process, and by the book publishers together, as the other participant in the selection process. If the parties fail to agree upon a mediator, they will together move the Court for an order appointing a mediator from candidates suggested separately by ABA and by the book publishers. All fees and expenses of the mediator will be divided equally between ABA (and the members represented by ABA), on the one hand, and the publisher participants in the specific dispute resolution proceeding, on the other hand; i.e., one share for ABA and one share for the participating book publishers, collectively.

6. Any notice, including the submission of any post-Consent Order motion, permitted or required to be given to a party hereto shall be sufficient if delivered by certified mail upon the following:

In the Second Circuit a court may issue a preliminary injunction upon a showing of irreparable harm and either (1) a likelihood of success on the merits, or (2) sufficiently serious questions going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation with a balance of the hardships tipping decidedly toward the party requesting the injunction.

As to the likelihood of success on the merits in antitrust cases, it is up to a court to decide whether the evidence demonstrates that plaintiff's allegations are of sufficient substance to warrant an examination of the other requirements for granting an injunction. The chief danger associated with monopsony power, market power on the buying side of the market, occurs when a company has significant market power both "upstream" and "downstream," meaning that a company can control the level of demand for a product that it buys and the level of supply for a product that it sells to its own buyers. Such a market position allows a company to demand a low price from its suppliers while simultaneously raising the prices it charges its buyers.

[*1196] DECISION AND ORDER

BACKGROUND

This is an antitrust action brought by plaintiff, Kamine/Besicorp Allegany L.P. ("Kamine"), against defendant Rochester Gas & Electric Corporation ("RG&E"). Kamine, which seeks both damages and injunctive relief, asserts causes of action under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, and Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15, 26.

The facts of this case have been set out at some length in a prior decision of this court,¹ and will be repeated here only as necessary. In short, the case arises from RG&E's unwillingness to purchase power from Kamine at the price set in a Power Purchase Agreement ("PPA") that Kamine and RG&E entered into [\[*2\]](#) in 1990 with the approval of the New York State Public Service Commission ("PSC"). Kamine alleges that RG&E is trying to drive Kamine out of business so that RG&E can maintain its monopoly as a producer and seller of electricity within RG&E's service area.

The current price that RG&E must pay for power under the PPA is $.06 per kilowatt hour ("kwh"). RG&E claims that the contract price is far above RG&E's "avoided cost," which is what it would cost RG&E to buy or produce the same power at current market rates or under the current tariff (known as the "SC5") filed by RG&E and approved by the PSC. RG&E contends [\[*1197\]](#) that its avoided cost is now about $.02 per kwh. RG&E asserts that the PPA price is so much higher than its avoided cost that the contract should be rescinded or reformed. RG&E is currently prosecuting an action against Kamine in New York State Supreme Court seeking such relief.

Shortly after this case was commenced, Kamine moved for a temporary restraining [\[*3\]](#) order ("TRO") and preliminary injunction ordering RG&E to comply with the terms of the PPA. On March 20, 1995, I granted the motion for a TRO, and directed RG&E to accept electric power from Kamine under the terms of the PPA, and, in accordance with the PPA, to pay Kamine no less than six cents per kilowatt hour for that power.

As stated in the March 20 decision, the purpose of the TRO was to preserve the situation "long enough for the court to decide the motion for a preliminary injunction." Decision and Order, March 20, 1995, at 15. The parties then engaged in discovery relating to the preliminary injunction motion.

Both sides have submitted substantial additional written materials in support of their respective positions, and the court heard extensive oral argument on the injunction motion. At oral argument, counsel for both sides agreed that no factual hearing was necessary, and that the written and documentary materials that had been submitted were adequate for the court to render a decision. By stipulation of the parties, the TRO has been extended throughout this period, pending issuance of the court's decision on the preliminary injunction motion.

DISCUSSION

[4] I. Standards For Granting A Preliminary Injunction

HN1 In the Second Circuit a court may issue a preliminary injunction upon a showing of irreparable harm and either (1) a likelihood of success on the merits or (2) sufficiently serious questions going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation with a balance of the hardships tipping decidedly toward the party requesting the injunction. Acquaire v. Canada Dry Bottling Co. of New York, 24 F.3d 401, 409 (2d Cir. 1994); Consolidated Gold Fields PLC v. Minorco, S.A., 871 F.2d 252, 256 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed, 492 U.S. 939 (1989). HN2 The applicant for an injunction must show "injury for which a monetary award cannot be adequate compensation . . . [because] where money damages is adequate compensation a preliminary injunction will not issue." Jackson Dairy, Inc. v. H.P. Hood & Sons, 596 F.2d 70, 72 (2d Cir. 1979).

HN3 With respect to irreparable harm, "doubts as to whether an injunction sought is necessary to safeguard the public interest . . . should be resolved in favor of granting the injunction." Gulf & Western Indus., Inc. v. Great A.& P. Tea Co., Inc., 476 F.2d 687, 699 (1973). It is clear, however, that [\[*5\]](#) "possible irreparable injury" is a requirement of all preliminary injunctions. S.E.C. v. Unifund SAL, 910 F.2d 1028, 1039 \(2d Cir. 1990\); Gulf & Western, 476 F.2d at 692.

HN4 [↑] Whether a particular harm is irreparable turns on its imminence and the lack of an adequate remedy at law. "Irreparable harm must be shown by the moving party to be imminent, not remote or speculative, and the alleged injury must be one incapable of being fully remedied by monetary damages." Reuters Ltd. v. United Press Int'l, Inc., 903 F.2d 904, 907 \(2d Cir. 1990\) (citations omitted). HN5 [↑] "An applicant for a preliminary injunction 'must show that it is likely to suffer irreparable harm if equitable relief is denied.' Thus, a mere possibility of irreparable harm is insufficient to justify the drastic remedy of a preliminary injunction." Borey v. National Union Fire Ins. Co., 934 F.2d 30, 34 \(2d Cir. 1991\) (quoting JSG Trading Corp. v. Tray-Wrap, Inc., 917 F.2d 75, 79 \(2d Cir. 1990\)). Finally, HN6 [↑] "in making the determination of irreparable harm, both harm to the parties and to the public may be considered." Long Island R.R. Co. v. International Assoc. of Machinists, 874 F.2d 901, 910 \(2d Cir. 1989\), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1042 (1990).

HN7 [↑] As to the likelihood of success on the merits in antitrust cases, it is up to the court to decide whether the evidence demonstrates that plaintiff's allegations are of sufficient [*1198] substance to warrant an examination of the other requirements for granting an injunction. Gulf & Western, 476 F.2d at 693. The ultimate inquiry is "whether the probable future effect of the transaction will be substantially to lessen competition." Id. at 694 (citations omitted).

II. Irreparable Harm

Kamine contends that if an injunction does not issue, Kamine will be forced to default on certain financial obligations to its lender, General Electric Capital Corporation ("GECC"), and GECC may foreclose on its loans to Kamine, driving Kamine into bankruptcy. In support of this allegation, Kamine alleges that RG&E's prior refusal to purchase power at the PPA price prevented Kamine from repaying a $ 90 million construction loan on time, which in turn has made it impossible for Kamine to obtain permanent financing. As a result of these difficulties, GECC has exercised some of its rights under its contract with Kamine, including the imposition of a [*7] default interest rate on Kamine's loans. In addition, GECC has elected to exercise its right to apply RG&E's payments to Kamine's obligation to GECC. In other words, the payments from RG&E are now going directly to GECC, not to Kamine. GECC can then advance funds to Kamine upon Kamine's request, if GECC chooses to. Without an injunction, Kamine contends, that source of revenue would dry up, and GECC might foreclose on the loan.

GECC, however, has not demonstrated any particular desire to pursue its remedies under the agreement to the fullest extent. On September 13, 1994, for example, GECC sent to Kamine what GECC described as a "draft of GECC's forbearance letter for your [i.e. Kamine's] review & comments." Defendant's Exhibit Book in Opposition to Motion for Preliminary Injunction ("Def. Ex.") Ex. L. This letter stated that GECC had reviewed a default notice sent by Kamine to its planned "thermal host," the greenhouse which was supposed to buy the steam produced by Kamine's plant. Kamine had sent a default notice to the greenhouse operator because the greenhouse was not prepared to purchase the steam as planned. The problems between Kamine and the greenhouse operator were [*8] never resolved, and the deal was never consummated.

The presence of a thermal host was a precondition to Kamine's obtaining status as a qualifying facility ("QF") under the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act ("PURPA"), 16 U.S.C. §§ 796\(18\)\(B\). QF status in turn was a condition that Kamine was obligated to achieve and maintain under its agreement with GECC. That is what prompted GECC to send the forbearance letter to Kamine.

In the draft letter, GECC stated that it "agreed to forebear [sic] from exercising any remedies" available to it under its agreement with Kamine for thirty days. The letter stated that GECC reserved all of its rights to exercise such remedies at the end of that period. However, it does not appear that GECC did pursue any further remedies regarding this matter.

In another letter, dated January 31, 1995, GECC "reiterated its previously stated concern with respect to [Kamine's] ability to satisfy the conditions precedent to funding of further construction loan draws and the conditions precedent to permanent financing as set forth in the operative documents." It also noted that "RG&E has now purported to terminate [sic] the Power Purchase Agreement," which [9] "would constitute a Special Event of an Event of Default." Def. Ex. N. Although again reserving all its rights and remedies in the event of a default, however, GECC stated that it had elected to fund Kamine's requested construction loan draw. Id.

A similar letter is dated February 27, 1995. Again, GECC recited that it reserved all its rights in the event of a default, but stated that it had elected to fund the February construction loan draw. Def. Ex. O.

On April 13, 1995, GECC sent a letter to Kamine stating that Kamine was in default on its construction mortgage bond payment that had come due on March 31, 1995. GECC stated that it was "terminating its obligation (but not its right)" to make further project loans, and that it was exercising its right to have RG&E's future payments [*1199] applied directly to Kamine's obligations to GECC. Def. Ex. P.

Notably, however, GECC added that it was not at that time electing to exercise certain more drastic rights, "including the acceleration of any obligation not already due, the remedy to take possession of or title to all or any material part of the assets of [Kamine], or seek to cause repayment by [Kamine] of moneys not otherwise already [10] due (other than through capture of moneys otherwise available to [Kamine])." Id.

Although GECC has exercised some of its rights under the agreement with Kamine, then, it has also displayed a certain hesitation about pursuing its rights to the fullest at the earliest opportunity. The relatively modest steps taken by GECC do not support Kamine's previous assertions at the time of the TRO application, which depicted GECC eager waiting to lower the boom on Kamine at a moment's notice.

At the time that the TRO decision was entered, the purportedly threatened foreclosure was, according to Kamine, only about two weeks away from becoming a reality. That allegedly imminent foreclosure, and Kamine's ensuing bankruptcy, were the basis for my finding that Kamine had demonstrated a serious enough threat of imminent irreparable harm to justify granting the TRO in order to preserve the status quo long enough to decide the motion for a preliminary injunction. Now that additional facts about GECC's actions and intentions have been obtained in discovery and submitted to the court, however, it appears that the threat of foreclosure is less imminent than Kamine alleged previously.

It is understandable [11] why GECC would not want to foreclose while litigation is still pending between Kamine and RG&E, both here and in state court. According to Kamine, foreclosure would drive Kamine out of business, leaving GECC in possession of the power plant. There seems to be little incentive at this stage for GECC to want that to happen, however. For one thing, Kamine is a party to the PPA, the continued effectiveness of which represents its (and therefore GECC's) best hope of obtaining at least $.06 per ("kwh") for the energy produced by the plant.

Without Kamine, then, GECC would be left in the position of taking over the plant faced with the prospect of either running it itself, or attempting to find a new buyer for the plant. The former option would be less attractive than simply allowing Kamine to continue running the plant in the hopes that Kamine would ultimately prevail on its bid to enforce the PPA, especially since RG&E's payments are already going directly to Kamine. By foreclosing and taking over the plant, GECC might accomplish little other than disrupting the plant's operations.

Assuming control of the plant might also make things considerably worse for GECC at this point. In [12] its motion for leave to intervene in a pending FERC proceeding concerning the retroactive waiver of Kamine's QF requirement, GECC states that upon a default by Kamine, GECC has the right to step into Kamine's shoes under the PPA. See Def. Ex. BB at 12. If the reason for Kamine's default were RG&E's refusal to pay the prices set in the PPA, however, GECC might well also find itself stepping into Kamine's shoes in the current litigation with RG&E. Presumably, GECC would prefer to have the brunt (and the cost) of the legal battles with RG&E borne by Kamine. Indeed, GECC's statement in the motion to intervene that GECC had not decided what course it would take if RG&E's interpretation of the PPA prevails suggests that GECC, for the time being at least, is content to let the litigation between Kamine and RG&E play itself out completely before GECC takes any decisive steps.

Furthermore, even if Kamine fails in its attempts to enforce the PPA, Kamine would still be able to get the same price for its power that GECC would get if GECC were running the plant itself. Regardless of who runs the plant, then, the price of power is going to be the same. By foreclosing and taking possession [13] of the plant, then, GECC would gain little, and in fact might be worse off.

Trying to sell the plant would be an equally unappealing proposition. The PPA provides that "other than for collateral security [*1200] purposes, if the Plant is to be sold to any entity, this Agreement shall be assigned to and assumed by the purchaser ..." PPA at 49. As with GECC, however, a potential buyer who wanted to be assigned Kamine's rights to the PPA price for power produced by the plant would have to consider the possibility of engaging in litigation with RG&E--litigation which had contributed to driving the previous operator of the plant out of business. Naturally this would hardly enhance the market value of the plant.

Of course, if a prospective buyer were willing to sell power at RG&E's avoided cost in order to avoid the costs of litigation, that would also lessen the plant's market value compared to what it was when Kamine entered into its agreement with GECC. Instead of expecting a long-term contract with rates of at least $.06 per kWh, the buyer might have to settle for shorter-term contracts at a much lower price. Even a newly-negotiated PPA would probably have a lower contract price than Kamine's [14] PPA, since the rates that were used in negotiating the latter were later found by the PSC to have been unrealistically high, and are no longer in effect.

It should also be noted that RG&E has stated its willingness to purchase power from Kamine at RG&E's current avoided cost as set by the SC5. Kamine maintains that this would not suffice for Kamine to meet its obligations to GECC, because the financing arrangements were all based on the assumption that Kamine would receive the PPA price. In light of the facts before me, however, I am not convinced that Kamine has demonstrated that foreclosure would be likely to result, at least in the short term, if it sold power at the SC5 rate. Again, GECC itself could not hope to receive a higher price without engaging in a legal battle with RG&E, the outcome of which would be uncertain.

Furthermore, until the TRO was entered, Kamine simply refused to sell power to RG&E at anything less than the PPA price, so for some time it was not receiving any payments from RG&E at all. As noted, though, GECC showed some restraint in pursuing its remedies against Kamine. If GECC (which, as stated, is now receiving the payments directly) can get at least a [15] limited cash flow from sales at the SC5 rate, it may be even less likely to take drastic action now, while these court actions are pending. Kamine's all-or-nothing approach up until now has left this middle path untested.

Sales at the avoided-cost price, then, might well dissuade GECC from foreclosing, since some cash would be coming in. Certainly the harm would seem to be less imminent than if Kamine sold no power to RG&E at all. In addition, if GECC did not foreclose, any harm that did result to Kamine would be remediable, should Kamine prevail in its litigation with RG&E. If the PPA is found to be enforceable, the harm would simply be that Kamine had not been paid enough by RG&E. That harm could be remedied by the payment of damages by RG&E.

In my March 20, 1995 decision, citing Tucker Anthony Realty Corp. v. Schlesinger, 888 F.2d 969 (2d Cir. 1989), I noted that "the ability of a creditor to foreclose ... can suffice to establish irreparable harm." Decision and Order, Mar. 20, 1995 at 16. However, the above-recited facts, some of which have been revealed in the ensuing discovery, make it less than likely than it previously appeared that the alleged harm to Kamine will in [16] fact occur prior to resolution of the pending lawsuits.

These facts also demonstrate a significant distinction between this case and Tucker. In that case, the plaintiffs, who were limited partners in the defendant partnerships, sought to enjoin the partnerships from making payments to the defendant general partner, who the plaintiffs alleged had breached his fiduciary duties. One of the partnerships, which was "effectively insolvent," id. at 971, was indebted to a business co-owned by the general partner and another person in the amount of $ 875,000. The partnership also owed a bank over $ 2,000,000, due on demand. Based on these particular facts, the Court of Appeals rejected the defendants' argument that the danger of the plaintiffs' bankruptcy (by virtue of their liability for the partnerships' debts) was speculative. The court stated that the combination of the partnership's "precarious financial situation" and the bank's ability to demand immediate [*1201] payment of its loan gave the general partner "ample incentive" to demand immediate payment of the amount owed to him, so as to limit his own financial exposure by having his loan paid ahead of the bank's. The court concluded [17] that these facts "made the likelihood of bankruptcy more than merely speculative." Id. at 975.

As stated, the facts that have been developed in the case at bar have not shown a similar likelihood that GECC will foreclose. It has already displayed some reluctance to take any steps which might drive Kamine out of business or disrupt the operation of the plant, and indeed it seems logically to have little incentive to do so. I conclude, therefore, that the danger of foreclosure and Kamine's ensuing demise is too speculative at this point to justify the issuance of a preliminary injunction.

III. Balance of the Hardships

HN8  Besides irreparable harm, the moving party must either show that it is likely to succeed on the merits or that the balance of hardships tips decidedly in its favor. Kamine has not expressly chosen to proceed under one or the other of these routes, and so the court will address both.

For many of the same reasons that I find that Kamine has not shown a threat of imminent irreparable harm, I do not believe that it has demonstrated that the balance of hardships tips decidedly in its favor. Not only is the alleged harm to Kamine speculative, but RG&E has demonstrated [18] that it or its ratepayers will be harmed if Kamine's requested injunction is granted. RG&E has submitted evidence, particularly affidavits of Paul G. Rughanis, RG&E's Group Manager of Strategy Development Services, that if it is forced to continue purchasing power from Kamine at the PPA price, it will cost RG&E significantly more money than if RG&E were able to purchase that same power at its actual avoided cost. Rughanis opines that payment of the PPA price will result in excess costs to RG&E of about $ 57,000 per day, or $ 20,000,000 per year.²

In the FERC proceeding concerning [19] Kamine's QF waiver, the PSC has echoed those views. The PSC opposed Kamine's request for a waiver on the ground that the PPA price would force up RG&E's-- and ultimately its ratepayers'--costs by four percent. Def. Ex. G at 5. As noted, harm to the public may properly be considered in deciding a motion for a preliminary injunction. Long Island R.R. Co., 874 F.2d at 910.

In response to these contentions, Kamine has for the most part not challenged RG&E's figures as such. Instead, Kamine relies primarily on the argument that there can be no "harm" to RG&E because under the PPA, RG&E is paying its avoided cost. Kamine bases this assertion on its argument that under PURPA, avoided costs can be measured either at the time of delivery or at the time the contract was executed. In this case, Kamine states, avoided costs were measured at the time the PPA was entered into, based on the then-existing long-range avoided costs ("LRACs"), which were the PSC's predictions of future avoided costs.

Regardless of how sound a legal principle that may or may not be with respect to PURPA, however, I do not believe it is of much significance in this antitrust action for purposes of determining, [20] as a factual matter, the relative harm to the two sides that may result from the issuance or denial of an injunction, pendente lite. The unavoidable fact is that if RG&E is not forced to pay the PPA price, it can purchase the same energy at its actual avoided cost, which bears no relation to the LRACs. In fact, the 1988 LRACs upon which Kamine relies later proved to be so inflated that the PSC withdrew them in 1991 on the ground that they had been "overstated." Kamine's argument is purely semantic and ignores the common-sense meaning of avoided costs in the context of this case.

[*1202] Kamine also argues that RG&E is actually paying far more than $.06 per kwh for energy from some of its own plants, so that paying Kamine the PPA price will actually save RG&E money. RG&E disputes this assertion.

² Those figures do not appear unreasonable. Assuming a PPA rate of $.06 per kwh and an avoided-cost rate of $.02 per kwh under the SC-5 tariff, RG&E would pay an excess of $.04 per kwh. The nominal capacity of Kamine's plant is 55 megawatts, or 55,000 kw. Purchasing 55,000 kwh of power at an excess cost of $.04 per kwh would result in a total excess cost of $ 2200 per hour, which equals $ 52,800 per day, or $ 19,272,000 per year.

It appears that the cause of this dispute is a difference of opinion over whether RG&E's fixed costs (i.e. costs stemming simply from the existence of a facility, irrespective of the costs of actual energy production) should be figured into the calculation of RG&E's energy costs. Kamine contends that they should be, RG&E that they should not.

I find RG&E's arguments in this regard more [21] persuasive. HN9[↑] Fixed costs are just that--fixed. As such, they cannot be "avoided." Whether RG&E purchases power from Kamine or not, then, it will still have to bear these fixed costs. It is not logical, therefore, to say that RG&E will somehow save money by buying additional power from Kamine. The proper measure to determine the effect of buying power from Kamine under the PPA is to examine the difference between the PPA price and RG&E's cost of the same amount of power at RG&E's "variable", cost-i.e., the actual cost of the power itself, not counting unavoidable, fixed costs. Kamine has not rebutted RG&E's showing that under that calculation, purchasing power under the PPA will greatly increase RG&E's costs for that power.

Kamine also asserts that RG&E is collaterally estopped from raising the whole issue of excess costs by reason of FERC's decision in New York State Elec. and Gas Corp., 71 F.E.R.C. 61,027 \(1995\) ("NYSEG") (Kamine's App. Tab H). In NYSEG, FERC rejected an argument by a utility (an argument in which RG&E joined as an intervenor) that the utility should not have to pay the contract price for power from a QF if that price exceeded the utility's actual [22] avoided cost. FERC held that the contract price was controlling even if avoided costs had risen unexpectedly.

I am not persuaded by Kamine's argument that this ruling estops RG&E from raising issues concerning excess costs under the PPA. HN10[↑] For the doctrine of collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion, to apply, the issues involved in the current and prior litigation must be "substantially the same." ITT Corp. v. United States, 963 F.2d 561, 564 \(2d Cir. 1992\).

The utility's claim in NYSEG was based on PURPA; the utility argued in favor of a literal reading of PURPA's provision that the price paid by a utility for energy from a QF should not exceed the utility's actual avoided cost. RG&E, however, is currently litigating in state court whether, as a matter of state contract law, the PPA should be reformed or rescinded. RG&E is not arguing that the PPA price is invalid under PURPA.

Thus, the issues in NYSEG and in the state court action are not substantially the same. RG&E's present dispute with Kamine is basically about New York contract law, not PURPA. Since the legal issues therefore turn upon fundamentally different bodies of law, RG&E is not estopped from arguing [23] in this court that the excess cost imposed by the PPA may be considered in assessing the harm that would result from the issuance of an injunction. Based on the evidence presented, I find that RG&E would be harmed by an injunction, and that the balance of hardships does not tip decisively in Kamine's favor.

IV. Likelihood of Success

In the TRO I stated that "there were serious questions going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation." Decision and Order, Mar. 20, 1995 at 18. I also noted, however, that HN11[↑] the more serious and imminent the potential harm to the movant, the less need there is for the movant to show a likelihood of success on the merits. Id. at 14, 17. It is clear from the language of the TRO that the primary reason for granting the TRO was not that Kamine was likely to succeed on the merits, but that, if Kamine's allegations were true, it was "faced with imminent, irreparable injury" which suggested that "at the very least, the situation should be preserved long enough for the court to decide the motion for a preliminary injunction." Id. at 15.

I also noted in the TRO decision, however, that "many of the facts have yet to be proved ..." [24] [*1203] Id. at 18. As the preceding discussion explains, the evidence that has been produced during discovery and submitted to the court in connection with the motion for an injunction suggests that the potential harm to Kamine may not be as imminent or catastrophic as it previously alleged. That being so, whether Kamine is likely to succeed on the merits becomes of correspondingly greater concern.

I find that Kamine has not demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits in this litigation. The fundamental difficulty with Kamine's case is that whatever the merits of its contentions regarding PURPA and state contract law, this action is predicated not on PURPA or contract law, but on the antitrust laws. Kamine has simply not shown that it is likely to succeed on an antitrust theory.

The basic thrust of Kamine's antitrust allegations is that RG&E has a monopoly in its geographic area as a producer and seller of electric power, and that RG&E wants to maintain that monopoly by preventing new producers or sellers from entering the market. Having failed thus far to prevent Kamine from entering the market (insofar as Kamine is now selling power to RG&E), RG&E is allegedly trying to drive [25] Kamine out of business by its actions.

The principal means by which RG&E is doing this, Kamine alleges, is RG&E's use of its monopsony power as a buyer of wholesale electric power within RG&E's geographic area. Kamine contends that this monopsony power allows RG&E to demand a predatory price from Kamine, i.e., a price below that which Kamine needs if it is to survive.

Kamine's allegations, however, fail to indicate a truly anticompetitive effect as a result of RG&E's actions. HN12[¹] The chief danger associated with monopsony power--market power on the buying side of the market--occurs when a company has significant market power both "upstream" and "downstream," meaning that the company can control the level of demand for the product that it buys and the level of supply for the product that it sells to its own buyers. Such a market position allows the company to demand a low price from its suppliers while simultaneously raising the prices it charges its buyers.³

[26] The problem with this type of monopsony power, then, is that ultimately it can injure consumers by forcing up the price of the end product. HN13[¹] Where the risk of that happening is slight or nonexistent, however, monopsony power per se does not create an antitrust concern. IIA Areeda, supra, P 574 at 300 (citing Kartell v. Blue Shield of Massachusetts, 749 F.2d 922, 930-31 (1st Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 471 U.S. 1029, 85 L. Ed. 2d 322, 105 S. Ct. 2040, 105 S. Ct. 2049 (1985)).

There is little evidence here that RG&E's alleged use of its monopsony power poses a threat of increased consumer prices. In fact, the evidence suggests the opposite--that paying the price under the PPA, which Kamine demands, will drive up the cost to the ratepayer. Furthermore, although RG&E does possess both upstream and downstream power in the energy market, its position is not analogous to that of a manufacturer of goods that can simply reduce its output in order to increase its price. As a state-regulated utility, RG&E cannot unilaterally reduce its output of electric power to the point where consumers are willing to pay an exorbitant price. If anything, if RG&E's own cost of power drops, [27] it would have greater difficulty justifying approval of a rate increase. See IIA Areeda, supra at 300 (noting that "if selling prices are regulated, they may fall as costs fall").

A further weakness with Kamine's case is that it is based more on alleged violations of PURPA than of the antitrust laws. Although actions that violate PURPA could conceivably violate the antitrust laws as well, [*1204] they are not the same thing, and one does not necessarily flow from the other. Even if Kamine's allegations that RG&E has violated PURPA are true, that does not mean that RG&E has acted in an anticompetitive manner.

PURPA itself makes little mention of antitrust laws, other than the following statement contained in 16 U.S.C. § 2603\(1\):

³ One commentator gives the following illustration:

For example, suppose bauxite is an indispensable element for making aluminum, that bauxite has no other use and that the defendant is the sole producer of aluminum. The defendant necessarily has monopsony power in the bauxite market. If he tries to force down the bauxite price by buying less--say, from the competitive level of 1,000 units to 800 units--he cannot make as much aluminum as before, and thus its selling price must rise.

HN14[] Nothing in this Act or in any amendment made by this Act affects--

- (1) the applicability of the antitrust laws to any electric utility or gas utility ...

This statement, then, indicates that while PURPA was not intended to protect utilities from the reach of the antitrust laws, neither was it meant to create antitrust liability where none existed previously. In short, PURPA was designed to be antitrust-neutral. As it states, it does [28] not directly affect the applicability of the antitrust laws one way or the other.

This conclusion is also reinforced by the legislative history of PURPA, which reveals that Congress's motive in creating PURPA was not to foster competition in the utility industry, but to deal with a perceived energy crisis.

The Supreme Court analyzed the legislative history and objectives of PURPA at some length in FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742, 72 L. Ed. 2d 532, 102 S. Ct. 2126 (1982). The Court noted that at the time PURPA was enacted, "committees in both Houses of Congress noted the magnitude of the Nation's energy problems and the need to alleviate those problems by promoting energy conservation and more efficient use of energy resources. Congress was aware that domestic oil production had lagged behind demand and that the Nation had become increasingly dependent on foreign oil." Id. at 756 (citations omitted). The Court also noted that PURPA's provisions encouraging the development of cogeneration facilities were intended to "reduce the demand for traditional fossil fuels," Id. at 750. "Congress also determined that the development of cogeneration and small power production facilities [29] would conserve energy." Id. at 757.

Thus, it is clear that the policies underlying PURPA are quite distinct from those underlying the antitrust laws. PURPA was created as a vehicle to reduce the nation's dependency on foreign oil and to conserve energy, not to foster competition.

Arguably, of course, the encouragement of the creation and development of cogeneration facilities and other alternative-energy sources would also promote competition in the power industry, inasmuch as new energy producers would enter the market. Nonetheless, it cannot be gainsaid that, while increased competition might be a byproduct of PURPA, it is not its purpose. In enacting PURPA, Congress was not concerned with fostering competition for competition's sake, but with energy conservation. As another court put in a case also involving both PURPA and the antitrust laws:

In establishing PURPA, ... Congress did not intend to place qualifying facilities in competition with public utilities. To the contrary, Congress has sought to encourage the development of qualifying facilities by insulating them from competition. ... In general, qualifying facilities produce a component which is used by public [30] utilities and consume utility service; but, they are not competitors of public utilities.

Greensboro Lumber Co. v. Georgia Power Co., 643 F. Supp. 1345, 1373 (N.D.Ga. 1986), aff'd, 844 F.2d 1538 (11th Cir. 1988).

Although it does not appear that any reported case has yet dealt with the precise type of antitrust claim raised in this case, there are some cases that have discussed the relationship between PURPA and the antitrust laws. In Environmental Action, Inc. v. FERC, 291 U.S. App. D.C. 229, 939 F.2d 1057 (D.C.Cir. 1991), several parties petitioned the court to set aside a FERC decision that approved a merger between two power companies on the condition, inter alia, that the new firm would be required to "wheel," i.e. transmit, power for any utility that requested it, other than QFs. The court held that the exclusion of QFs from the wheeling requirement was arbitrary and capricious, and remanded to FERC for further consideration.

[*1205] One rationale advanced by FERC for excluding QFs was that affording QFs mandatory wheeling access would give them an unwarranted competitive preference over other utilities by enabling QFs to force distant utilities other than [31] their own "native" utility (such as RG&E is to Kamine) to buy their power. The court found this unpersuasive because HN15[] under PURPA, a "QF may force a sale only at the purchasing utility's avoided cost." 939 F.2d at 1061 (citing 16 U.S.C. § 824a-3(d)). Thus, the court reasoned, a QF would only have an advantage over its competitors if it produced energy at a lower cost than they did; that might harm the QF's competitors, but not competition. The court also noted that "such advantage as a QF may have stems directly from the Congress's policy choice to encourage the sale of power by QFs rather than by traditional utilities." Id. at 1062.

Several points raised by the Environmental Action court are particularly salient with respect to the instant case. The first is the court's reasoning that QFs would not have an unfair advantage over other utilities because under PURPA, QFs could charge no more than the buyer's avoided cost. That, however, is exactly the opposite of the situation in the case at bar. Here, the avoided cost is precisely what RG&E seeks to pay. It is Kamine that wants to force RG&E to pay more than its avoided cost by using the LRACs that have long [32] since been recognized as grossly inflated. It is obvious that what the court was saying in Environmental Action was that allowing QFs wheeling access would not hurt competition because they could not charge more than the buyer's actual avoided cost i.e., the price charged by the QFs' competitors. If a QF could not produce energy as efficiently as its competitors, it would actually find itself at a disadvantage.

In contrast, to allow a QF, such as Kamine, to charge more than the buyer's actual avoided cost would give it a leg up on non-QF producers. The QF could produce energy relatively less efficiently and still make the same or a greater profit than its competition because the buyer would be forced to pay an above-market price.

Of course, such protection is to some extent envisioned by PURPA. Again, however, it must be borne in mind that this case is not about PURPA directly, but about the antitrust laws, which are meant to protect competition, not individual competitors. K.M.B. Warehouse Distrib., Inc. v. Walker Mfg. Co., 61 F.3d 123, 127 (2d Cir. 1995) (citing Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977)). [33] However consonant with PURPA's aims it may be to shield a QF like Kamine from price competition, that end is not something that the antitrust laws were designed to protect.

That, in fact, is the second noteworthy point about the Environmental Action decision. The court noted that the interests served by PURPA's special protection of QFs "may or may not be wholly consistent with the antitrust laws ..." Id. (emphasis added). However, the court added, "being specifically relevant to that case it deserved at least as much consideration as the general interests embodied in the antitrust laws ..." Id. FERC, the court said, had not considered the interests served by PURPA at all. Id.

This reasoning, though compelling under the facts of Environmental Action, was expressed in the context of a situation quite distinguishable from the case at bar. Environmental Action involved a decision by FERC--an agency expressly charged in PURPA with the enforcement of that Act, see 16 U.S.C. § 824a-3--to approve a merger of utility companies. As a primary enforcer of PURPA, FERC obviously could not ignore the policies underlying that statute. The instant case, on the other [34] hand, is grounded in the antitrust laws. Conversely to Environmental Action, then, while the policies underlying PURPA may not be irrelevant to this action, it is the interests sought to be advanced by the antitrust laws that are of paramount importance here.

The district court's decision in Greensboro Lumber, 643 F. Supp. 1345, contains an extensive and penetrating analysis of the interplay between PURPA and the antitrust laws. In Greensboro Lumber, a lumber company that operated a cogeneration facility alleged [*1206] that the defendants, various electricity producers and buyers, had acted improperly both in response to its attempts to sell power to them, and in response to its requests to purchase back-up power from them. The plaintiff alleged that certain power sales contracts among the defendants precluded it from competing in the energy transmission and wholesale markets, in violation of both the antitrust laws and PURPA.

The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, laying considerable stress on the fact that the plaintiff insisted on charging prices for its excess energy which were considerably higher than the defendants' avoided costs. Noting [35] that Congress had expressly provided in PURPA that utilities should not pay QFs a price in excess of the utility's avoided cost see 16 U.S.C. § 824a-3\(b\), the court stated that this provision was enacted because PURPA was 'not intended to require the ratepayers of a utility to subsidize cogenerators or small power producers.' H.R. Rep. No. 1750, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. at 98, reprinted in 1978 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News at 7832. The congressional purpose in limiting the price to qualifying facilities was to ensure that PURPA did not become a utility-funded welfare program for qualifying facilities, since such "funding" would essentially come from the pockets of electric consumers.

Id. at 1369 n. 30.

The court also pointed out that one of the defendants, Oglethorpe, had offered to buy the plaintiff's excess energy at the same rate that Oglethorpe paid Georgia Power, its main supplier, under FERC-approved tariffs, but that the plaintiff had refused. The court said that it flies in the face of reason to think that either Oglethorpe or the EMCs [the cooperatives which together comprised Oglethorpe] would be willing to pay Greensboro more for its energy [36] and capacity than it could pay to Georgia Power for equivalent power. Nothing in the antitrust laws requires the Oglethorpe Group to pay Greensboro more for its power when the same power may be purchased from Georgia Power or others for less. ... Having been offered a price which is above the market rate as a result of FERC's regulations,⁴ Greensboro is in no position to demand a still higher price under any antitrust theory.

Id. at 1368-69.

In addition to these cases, HN16[] a number of other antitrust cases not involving utilities have held that refusing to pay an above-market price does not constitute antitrust activity. As noted earlier, HN17[] PURPA [37] does not affect the applicability of the antitrust laws. 16 U.S.C. § 2603\(1\). Thus, the principles set forth in these antitrust cases, which involve a variety of factual situations, are no less applicable here than they would be in any other antitrust case.

In First Nat'l Bank of Arizona v. Cities Serv. Co., 391 U.S. 253, 279, 20 L. Ed. 2d 569, 88 S. Ct. 1575 \(1968\), for example, a Sherman Act case, the Supreme Court, affirming summary judgment for the defendant on the plaintiff oil dealer's boycott claim based on the oil company's refusal to purchase plaintiff's oil at a specified price, stated that "obviously it would not have been evidence of conspiracy if [defendant] refused to deal with [plaintiff] because the price at which he proposed to sell oil was in excess of that which oil could be obtained from others."

Likewise, in AT&T v. Delta Comm. Corp., 408 F. Supp. 1075, 1101 \(S.D.Miss. 1976\), aff'd, 579 F.2d 972 \(5th Cir. 1978\) (per curiam), aff'd on rehearing, 590 F.2d 100 \(5th Cir. 1979\), the district court stated that HN18[] where an alleged anticompetitive conspiracy "is predicated on a failure to buy a service worth money for a moneys worth price, the plaintiff [38] has the burden of demonstrating that his product has some value above the price paid or offered." The court further refused to recognize any "inference of conspiracy or anticompetitive activity" arising out of "a refusal [^{*}1207] to buy a product or service for more than it is worth," id. at 1090 n. 29, stating that any additional payment "would have been a gift," and that the "Sherman Act does not command gratuitous compensation." Id. at 1092.

The fact that the utility industry is highly regulated by the state and federal governments is also significant. Several HN19[] courts have expressed the view that the ability of government regulation to keep monopolization power in check tends to minimize whatever dangers to the public might otherwise exist as a result of anticompetitive activity. Westchester Radiological Associates P.C. v. Empire Blue Cross and Blue Shield, 707 F. Supp. 708 (S.D.N.Y.), aff'd, 884 F.2d 707 \(2d Cir. 1989\) (per curiam), for example, was an antitrust action by hospital-based radiologists against an insurance company, whose contracts with its client hospitals provided that the radiologists could not bill patients directly for their services, but were limited to [39] the amounts paid by the insurer to the hospitals for those services. The plaintiffs alleged that this arrangement "unnaturally" limited how much they could charge for their services. The court granted summary judgment for the insurer, stating that the insurer was "simply acting as a rational buyer attempting to get the best possible terms for its subscribers." Id. at 713. Noting that the state set the reimbursement rate that the insurance company could pay to hospitals for patient care, the court said that "the state's supervision suggests that novel judicial applications of antitrust law are unlikely to be required to prevent Blue Cross from abusing its market power." Id. at 714.

The court in Kartell, 749 F.2d 922, expressed similar views in an action brought by physicians who claimed that the defendant insurance company's ban on "balance billing," i.e. billing a patient for amounts over the amount of the insurer's payment to the physician, violated the Sherman Act. Vacating the district court's injunction in favor of the plaintiffs, the court stated that HN20[¹] "where monopoly power is regulated, the regulator, not the court, bears the burden of determining whether prices [40] are reasonable." Id. at 928 (citing as examples state statutes pertaining to regulation of gas and electric rates). The court pointed out that "the price system here at issue is one supervised by state regulators," and that "while that fact does not automatically carry with it antitrust immunity, it suggests that strict antitrust scrutiny is less likely to be necessary to prevent the unwarranted exercise of monopoly power." Id. at 931 (citation omitted). The court concluded that the insurance company, as a buyer of the physicians' services on behalf of its customers, "seemed simply to be acting as every rational enterprise does, i.e., [to] get the best deal possible." Id. at 929-30 (quoting Travelers Ins. Co. v. Blue Cross of Western Pennsylvania, 481 F.2d 80, 84 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1093, 38 L. Ed. 2d 550, 94 S. Ct. 724 (1973)).

The same principles apply here. As stated, the utility industry is heavily regulated by both the state and federal governments. Historically, those governments have allowed some monopoly power to exist in the industry, and that is probably part of the reason why prices in particular are subject to government regulation [41] and approval. See, e.g., N.Y. Pub. Serv. L. § 66 (setting forth powers of PSC with respect to rates). As the courts stated in Kartell and Westchester Radiological Associates, that supervisory power suggests that an expansive application of the antitrust laws is not appropriate here.

I conclude, therefore, that Kamine has not shown a likelihood of success on the merits in this action. It simply does not appear that the effect of RG&E's refusal to pay more than its actual avoided cost would have an anticompetitive effect. HN21[¹] "The antitrust laws do not prohibit a buyer from bargaining for the best deal possible." Brillhart v. Mutual Med. Ins. Inc., 768 F.2d 196, 201 (7th Cir. 1985). That is all that RG&E is seeking to do-- get the best deal possible under market, i.e., competitive, conditions. The PPA, which Kamine is attempting to enforce, was not created as a result of market forces or a competitive process; it is a creature of a statutory scheme set up for reasons that have nothing to do with competition per se. From an economic standpoint, the PPA is little more than a "shotgun marriage" [*1208] in which the PSC was holding the trigger.

As I noted in my TRO decision, [42] the PPA does not allow RG&E simply to walk away from the contract, but requires it to seek judicial review. That, however, is what RG&E is now attempting to do in state court. At any rate, whether RG&E has breached the PPA or not, Kamine has not sufficiently demonstrated an antitrust injury to warrant issuance of the injunction it seeks. The requested injunction might protect a competitor, but it is difficult to see how it would protect competition.

The fundamental dispute between the parties, then, concerns the interpretation and enforceability of the PPA. Those are matters relating to PURPA and to common-law contract principles. The mere fact that one of the parties to this dispute is a utility with a state-sanctioned monopoly does not automatically transform this contract dispute into an antitrust matter. There has to be a showing of unlawful, anticompetitive behavior, and on the evidence presented, I do not find a likelihood that Kamine will succeed in making that showing.

V. Bond Requirement Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(c)

Additionally, I note that under Rule 65(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, HN22[¹] "no restraining order or preliminary injunction shall issue except [43] upon the giving of security by the applicant, in such sum as the court deems proper, for the payment of such costs and damages as may be incurred or suffered by any party who is found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained." Although I dispensed with the bond requirement in my TRO decision, I did so principally on the ground that the relatively short duration of the order meant that any possible overpayment by RG&E "during this purely temporary period of injunctive relief was unlikely to be so substantial that it could not be rectified at a later date." Decision and Order, Mar. 20, 1995, at 31. I also noted that

Kamine was financially not in a position to post a bond satisfactory to RG&E. Id. At oral argument on the preliminary injunction motion, Kamine reaffirmed that a bond which would protect RG&E in the event that the injunction were found to have been improvidently granted would have to be so large that "we [i.e., Kamine] can't post it."

Although it is not my primary reason for denying Kamine's motion for a preliminary injunction, I believe that Kamine's inability to post a bond adds further support to my decision. As noted, the main reason for waiving a bond [44] in the TRO was that the relief would be of short duration. As I stated at oral argument of the preliminary injunction motion, however, the matter remained "still of concern" to me, and I considered it "still a very viable issue here."

That concern is heightened by the fact that a preliminary injunction might remain in effect for a considerable period of time. Although the parties have stipulated so far to have the TRO remain in effect pending my decision on the motion for an injunction, absent such a stipulation HN23[⁵] a TRO ordinarily expires within ten days. Fed. R. Civ. P. 65\(b\). HN24[⁵] Preliminary injunctions, however, have no such time limit, and in fact are of "potentially unlimited duration." Granny Goose Foods, Inc. v. Brotherhood of Teamsters Local 70, 415 U.S. 423, 432 n. 7, 39 L. Ed. 2d 435, 94 S. Ct. 1113 \(1974\). The alleged harm here to RG&E--paying more than it should for power from Kamine--is not constant, but continues to increase with each passing day, as the total alleged overpayment mounts higher. That situation also increases the possibility that, in the event that the injunction is later found to have been improvidently granted, the amount owed to RG&E by Kamine will have [45] grown so large that it will be impossible for RG&E to be made whole. The danger of that happening, then, simply adds to the factors weighing against granting the injunction in this case.

CONCLUSION

Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction is denied in part and granted in part.

Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction is denied in all respects except to the extent that defendant, RG&E, has agreed [*1209] to purchase power from plaintiff, pendente lite, at the current tariff rate (SC5 rate).⁵

IT IS SO ORDERED.

⁵ RG&E has maintained throughout the pendency of the preliminary injunction motion that it is willing to purchase power from Kamine at its actual avoided cost as measured by the SC5 rate. See, e.g. RG&E's Sur-Reply Memorandum in Opposition to Plaintiff's Motion at 17. That willingness has also been a substantial factor in my decision to deny Kamine's motion for a preliminary injunction, particularly with respect to the issue of irreparable harm.

Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act provide for the recovery of reasonable attorney's fees to prevailing litigants. Section 4 provides that "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws shall recover the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee." 15 U.S.C.S. § 15. Section 16 provides that, "In any action under this section in which the plaintiff substantially prevails, the court shall award the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee, to such plaintiff." 15 U.S.C.A. § 26.

The "starting point" in setting an attorney's fee is to determine the "lodestar" figure--that is, the number of hours reasonably expended on the litigation multiplied by a reasonable hourly rate. The fee applicant bears the burden of "establishing entitlement and documenting the appropriate hours and hourly rates." After calculating the lodestar fee, the court should then proceed with an analysis of whether any portion of this fee should be adjusted upward or downward.

In setting an award of attorney's fees a court is guided by the twelve factors. These factors are: (1) the time and labor required; (2) the novelty and difficulty of the questions; (3) the skill required to perform the legal services properly; (4) the preclusion of other employment by the attorney due to acceptance of the case; (5) the customary fee in the community; (6) whether the fee is fixed or contingent; (7) time limitations imposed by the client or circumstances; (8) the amount involved and the results obtained; (9) the experience, reputation, and ability of the attorney; (10) the "undesirability" of the case; (11) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the clients; and (12) awards in similar cases.

Civil Procedure > ... > Costs & Attorney Fees > Attorney Fees & Expenses > Reasonable Fees

HN4 Attorney Fees & Expenses, Reasonable Fees

A reasonable hourly rate is the prevailing market rate in the relevant legal community for similar services by lawyers of reasonably comparable skills, experience, and reputation. To determine the prevailing market rate, the court will consider the following Johnson factors: customary fee; skills required to perform the legal services properly; the experience, reputation, and ability of the attorneys; time limitations; preclusion of other employment; undesirability of the case; nature and length of the professional relationship with the clients; and awards in similar cases.

[*511] ORDER

Plaintiffs, who are individual gasoline consumers, brought this class-action *2 lawsuit charging that defendants, who are retail sellers of gasoline, violated federal antitrust laws by conspiring to fix gasoline prices in Dothan, Alabama. Plaintiffs are: T. R. Coleman; Bernard J. Petit; and R. L. and Lucy Middleton. Defendants include: Rodney Parrish; Cannon Oil Company; Thomas Shirley and his company, Home Oil Company; and James Sheffield and his company, Sheffield Oil Company. Plaintiffs sought damages and injunctive relief under § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 1 \(West Supp. 1995\), and § 4 and § 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 15, 26 \(West Supp. 1995\). Plaintiffs properly invoked the court's jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1331, 1337 \(West 1993\). After a month-long trial, a jury found that defendants had engaged in illegal price fixing but awarded only nominal damages of one dollar. Also, based upon the jury's findings, the court entered an injunction against defendants.

This lawsuit is again before the court, this time on plaintiffs' motions for award of attorney's fees and expenses in the amount of $ 4,698,913.44 from defendants.¹ For the reasons [*512] given below, the court concludes that plaintiffs may recover $ 2,035,658.00 [3] in attorney's fees. The issue of plaintiffs' expenses will be addressed in a later, separate order.

I. BACKGROUND

Plaintiffs filed this lawsuit on April 19, 1990, charging several persons and their businesses with conspiring to fix the retail price of gasoline in Dothan, Alabama. The original defendants consisted of the following: Sunshine-Jr. Stores; Rodney Parrish; Vernon Cannon and his company, Cannon Oil Company; Thomas Shirley and his company, Home Oil Company; and James Sheffield and his company, Sheffield Oil Company; Southeastern Oil Company, Inc.; Davis & Harp Oil Company, Inc.; Herndon Oil Company, Inc.; Beard Oil Company; A. W. Herndon and his company; A. W. Herndon Oil Company, Inc.; McGee Oil; and Graceville Oil Company, [4] Inc. The court certified a plaintiff class for "damages" consisting of "all individuals and entities who made retail purchases of gasoline from the defendants in the Houston County, Alabama area since April 15, 1986."² The court dismissed Beard Oil Company³ and entered summary judgment in favor of Southeastern Oil Company, Davis & Harp Oil Company, Herndon Oil Company, and McGee Oil Company.⁴ The plaintiffs settled their claims against Graceville Oil Company⁵ and against A. W. Herndon and his company, A. W. Herndon Oil Company.⁶ Vernon Cannon died after this lawsuit was filed, and the executrix of his estate replaced him as a defendant.⁷ For ease of discussion, however, the court will continue to refer to Vernon Cannon as a defendant.

[5] This case went to trial as to the remaining defendants: Sunshine-Jr. Stores, Rodney Parrish, Vernon Cannon and Cannon Oil Company, Thomas Shirley and Home Oil Company, and James Sheffield and Sheffield Oil Company. A jury found that these defendants had engaged in illegal price fixing and that they should pay nominal damages of one dollar. The court set aside the jury's verdict as to Sunshine-Jr. Stores, and entered an injunction, to expire on November 19, 1996, prohibiting all remaining defendants, except Vernon Cannon, "from agreeing, directly or indirectly, to fix the retail price of gasoline in Dothan, Houston County, Alabama."⁸ The court later supplemented this injunction to require these defendants to do the following: to deliver a copy of this order to all of their current and future officers and employees engaged in the retail sale of gasoline in Dothan, Alabama; to adopt written personnel policies and procedures to help assure that each defendant and its employees engaged in the retail sale of gasoline in Dothan do not engage in price fixing in the future; and to conduct a training session to educate its officers and employees about the Sherman Act's prohibition on price [6] fixing.⁹ Plaintiffs also recovered $ 85,112.44 in court costs.¹⁰

Plaintiffs now seek $ 4,698,913.44 in attorney's fees and additional expenses from all remaining defendants except Vernon Cannon.¹¹ Because plaintiffs' submissions contain [*513] several arithmetical but, relatively speaking, minor errors, it is impossible to state how they arrived at this precise figure. It is nevertheless still possible to calculate the total fees which they should receive.

[7] II. DISCUSSION

HN1[Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act provide for the recovery of reasonable attorney's fees to prevailing litigants. Section 4 provides that "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws ... shall recover ... the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee." 15 U.S.C.A. § 15 \(West Supp. 1995\). And § 16 provides that, "In any action under this section in which the plaintiff substantially prevails, the court shall award the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee, to such plaintiff." 15 U.S.C.A. § 26 \(West Supp. 1995\).

HN2The "starting point" in setting an attorney's fee is to determine the "lodestar" figure--that is, the number of hours reasonably expended on the litigation multiplied by a reasonable hourly rate. [Hensley v. Eckerhart, 461 U.S. 424, 433, 103 S. Ct. 1933, 1939, 76 L. Ed. 2d 40 \(1983\). Accord Norman v. Housing Authority of City of Montgomery, 836 F.2d 1292, 1299 \(11th Cir. 1988\). The fee applicant bears the burden of "establishing entitlement and documenting the appropriate hours and hourly rates." Id. at 1303. After calculating the lodestar fee, the [8] court should then proceed with an analysis of whether any portion of this fee should be adjusted upward or downward.¹² Pennsylvania v. Delaware Valley Citizens' Council for Clean Air, 478 U.S. 546, 565-66, 106 S. Ct. 3088, 3098, 92 L. Ed. 2d 439 \(1986\); Hensley, 461 U.S. at 434, 103 S. Ct. at 1940.

In making the above determinations, HN3the court is guided by the twelve factors set out in [Johnson v. Georgia Highway Express, 488 F.2d 714, 717-19 \(5th Cir. 1974\). See Delaware Valley, 478 U.S. at 564, 106 S. Ct. at 3097-98; Norman, 836 F.2d at 1293.¹³ These factors are: (1) the time and labor required; (2) the novelty and difficulty of the questions; (3) the skill required to perform the legal services properly; (4) the preclusion of [9] other employment by the attorney due to acceptance of the case; (5) the customary fee in the community; (6) whether the fee is fixed or contingent; (7) time limitations imposed by the client or circumstances; (8) the amount involved and the results obtained; (9) the experience, reputation, and ability of the attorney; (10) the "undesirability" of the case; (11) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the clients; and (12) awards in similar cases.

A. Reasonable Hours

Plaintiffs' counsel have requested compensation for a total of 9,447.6 hours, as follows:

⁹ Order of November 2, 1995.

¹⁰ Orders of January 20, 1994, and December 6, 1993.

[10] [*514] Each attorney has submitted itemized documentation of the time he or she has devoted to this case. The court has considered two Johnson factors--the novelty and difficulty of the case, and the amount involved and the result obtained--in assessing the reasonableness of the hours claimed.

[11] There can be no question that this case presented extremely complex and difficult legal and factual issues. The case took a month to try and consisted of extensive expert testimony, documentary evidence, and anecdotal testimony. It posed sensitive and complex legal questions of how law and public policy are to work within the context of antitrust law. See Coleman v. Cannon Oil Co., 849 F. Supp. 1458, 1473 (M.D. Ala. 1993) (upholding jury verdict as to all defendants except Sunshine-Jr. Stores and imposing injunctive relief as to all remaining defendants except Vernon Cannon). There can also be no question that defendants mounted an aggressive and formidable defense.

Nevertheless, plaintiffs prevailed greatly. First, as this court has previously noted, "the defendants--that is, Cannon, Parrish, Shirley, and Sheffield and their employees--ceased their illegal price-fixing activity only after this lawsuit was filed. It was this litigation alone that brought an end to their illegal conduct." Coleman, 849 F. Supp. at 1471. Second, plaintiffs secured an injunction "prohibiting defendants from 'agreeing, directly or indirectly, to fix the retail price of gasoline in Dothan, Houston [12] County, Alabama' ... [and] requiring that defendants take affirmative steps to undo their price-fixing conspiracy." Id. At 1473. And the fact that plaintiffs recovered only nominal damages does not detract from the enormity and importance of their victory. "That a defendant's illegal price-fixing activity may not in the past have resulted in unreasonable prices and may not even result in the future in unreasonable prices does not mean that the public does not need protection. The injury to the public is merely in the individual acquiring 'The power to fix prices.' [United States v.] Trenton Potteries Co., 273 U.S. [392,] 397, 47 S. Ct. [377,] 379 [(1927)]. It does not matter whether that power is 'reasonably exercised or not.' Id." Coleman, 849 F. Supp. at 1472.

The court adds that none of the figures--1,669.3, 1660.3, or 1659.9--explains how plaintiffs arrived at a "corrected" total of $ 494,645.00 for the entire Hollis firm, as reflected in plaintiffs' brief filed on February 22, 1994, at 18. However, as stated earlier, despite these arithmetical mysteries, the court has still been able to arrive at a reasonable total fee.

The court has conducted a detailed and independent review of the hours claimed and is satisfied that all of the hours were necessary and directly related to the successful pursuit of plaintiffs' antitrust claim in this litigation and that none of the hours is "excessive, redundant, or otherwise unnecessary." Hensley v. Eckerhart, 461 U.S. at 434, 103 S. Ct. at 1939-40. Plaintiffs' attorneys may therefore [13] recover for all of the hours claimed.

B. Prevailing Market Rate

HN4 [↑] "A reasonable hourly rate is the prevailing market rate in the relevant legal community for similar services by lawyers of reasonably comparable skills, experience, and reputation." Norman, 836 F.2d at 1299. To determine the prevailing market rate, the court will consider the following Johnson factors: customary fee; skills required to perform the legal services properly; the experience, reputation, and ability of the attorneys; [*515] time limitations; preclusion of other employment; undesirability of the case; nature and length of the professional relationship with the clients; and awards in similar cases. Plaintiffs' attorneys seek the following hourly rates for themselves:

	RATE
Eugene A. Beatty	$ 150
Ed C. Brewer, III	170
Albert A. Chapar	115
B. Shane Clanton	115
James H. Davis	115
L. Andrew Hollis, Jr.	275
Ernest H. Hornsby	150
Kevin H. Hudson	115
Jeffrey C. Kirby	150
Sylvia K. Kochler	200
Archie C. Lamb, Jr.	115
John L. Latham	215
Kenneth L. Millwood	225
Beth M. Myler	115
Edward M. Price, Jr.	150
Rufus R. Smith, Jr.	275
Brian G. Smooke	115
Aaron Watson	115
Joel W. Weatherford	100

[14] Customary Fee: The evidence reflects that the customary fee range for attorneys in complex litigation in Alabama, depending on each attorney's experience, reputation, and ability, is approximately $ 100 to $ 400 an hour.

Skill Required to Perform the Services Properly: This litigation has from beginning to end posed a difficult and demanding task. A lawyer skilled in, or capable of quickly learning about, the complex and rapidly changing law of antitrust law was thus required. A lawyer already skilled in the area could demand a higher rate because he or she would be more knowledgeable and could work more efficiently.

Of the 19 lawyers who participated in this case on behalf of plaintiffs, only three had had prior antitrust experience and that was limited. Although this absence of broad and lengthy experience in antitrust law weighs in favor of lower fee rates for plaintiffs' attorneys, the evidence reflects that plaintiffs' attorneys were highly competent and otherwise well experienced to various degrees, and they worked very efficiently.

Experience, Reputation, and Ability of the Attorney: All of plaintiffs' attorneys are experienced and highly competent attorneys. Indeed, [*515] defendants Shirley and Home Oil Company conceded that "the reputations of plaintiffs' attorneys ... are, by all accounts, excellent." ¹⁵

Time Limitations: Where there has been "priority work that delays the lawyer's other work," this factor requires "some premium." Johnson, 488 F.2d at 718. The court is not convinced that this factor was significant in this litigation.

Preclusion of Other Employment: This factor "involves the dual consideration of otherwise available business which is foreclosed because of conflicts of interest which occur from the representation, and the fact that once the employment is undertaken the attorney is not free to use the time spent on the client's behalf for other purposes." Johnson, 488 F.2d at 718. The court is not convinced that this factor has played a significant role in this litigation.

Undesirability of the Case: It does not appear that this case was undesirable.

Nature and Length [16] of Relationship with Client: There is no evidence of a prior professional [*516] relationship between plaintiffs and their attorneys.

Awards in Similar Cases: Courts have awarded non-contingent fees in the range of $ 100 to $ 290 an hour in other complex cases. See, e.g., Lee v. Randolph County Bd. of Educ., 885 F. Supp. 1526, 1532 \(M.D. Ala. 1995\); James v. City of Montgomery, No. 94- T-264-N, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6143, 1995 WL 271138 at *4 (M.D. Ala. Apr. 19, 1995); Medders v. Autauga County Bd. of Educ., 858 F. Supp. 1118, 1129 \(M.D. Ala. 1994\); Knight v. State of Alabama, 824 F. Supp. 1022 \(N.D. Ala. 1993\); Wyatt v. King, no. 3195-N, 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21578, 1991 WL 640065 (M.D. Ala. Dec. 17, 1991), aff'd, 985 F.2d 579 (11th Cir. 1993) (table); Robinson v. Alabama State Dept. of Educ., 727 F. Supp. 1422, 1428 \(M.D. Ala. 1989\), aff'd, 918 F.2d 183 (11th Cir. 1990) (table); Hidle v. Geneva County Bd. of Educ., 681 F. Supp. 752, 756-758 \(M.D. Ala. 1988\).

The court is of the opinion, based on these criteria, that the prevailing current rates for non-contingent work performed by attorneys of similar experience in similar cases are as follows for plaintiffs' attorneys:¹⁶

Ed C. Brewer, III	160
Albert A. Chapar	115
B. Shane Clanton	115
James H. Davis	115
L. Andrew Hollis, Jr.	215
Ernest H. Hornsby	150
Kevin H. Hudson	115
Jeffrey C. Kirby	150
Sylvia K. Kochler	190
Archie C. Lamb, Jr.	115
John L. Latham	200
Kenneth L. Millwood	200
Beth M. Myler	115
Edward M. Price, Jr.	150
Rufus R. Smith, Jr.	215
Brian G. Smooke	115
Aaron Watson	115
Joel W. Weatherford	100

[17] These rates reflect the varying experience and abilities of the attorneys.

C. Lodestar Calculation

¹⁶ By establishing the appropriate market rate on the basis of current rates, the court is also compensating plaintiffs for the delay in payment. See Missouri v. Jenkins, 491 U.S. 274, 283-84, 109 S. Ct. 2463, 2469, 105 L. Ed. 2d 229 \(1989\); Norman, 836 F.2d at 1302.

The unadjusted lodestar consists, as stated, of the product of compensable hours multiplied by the prevailing market rate. The lodestar fees for those who worked on behalf of the plaintiffs are as follows:

ATTORNEYS	HOURS	RATE	AMOUNT
Eugene A. Beatty	220.8	$ 140	$ 30,912.00
Ed C. Brewer, III	1151.6	160	184,256.00
Albert A. Chapar	276.3	115	31,774.50
B. Shane Clanton	82.6	115	9,499.00
James H. Davis	61.5	115	7,072.50
L. Andrew Hollis, Jr.	1659.9	215	356,878.50
Ernest H. Hornsby	55.8	150	8,370.00
Kevin H. Hudson	511.8	115	58,857.00
Jeffrey C. Kirby	195.4	150	29,310.00
Sylvia K. Kochler	246.7	190	46,873.00
Archie C. Lamb, Jr.	17.0	115	1,955.00
John L. Latham	1985.8	200	397,160.00
Kenneth L. Millwood	639.8	200	127,960.00
Beth M. Myler	128.9	115	14,823.50
Edward M. Price, Jr.	151.5	150	22,725.00
Rufus R. Smith, Jr.	1615.7	215	347,375.50
Brian G. Smooke	188.3	115	21,654.50
Aaron Watson	251.2	115	28,888.00
Joel W. Weatherford	7.0	100	700.00
TOTAL			$ 1,727,044.00

[18] [*517] D. Paralegals

Plaintiffs also seek to recover for the work of paralegals, as follows:

	Hours	Rate	Amount
Anne G. Alford	33.90	$ 70	$ 2,373.00
Diane Bellew	16.00	50	800.00
Beth Cherry	6.30	50	315.00
Constance Cole	35.33	50	1,766.50
Arthur Davis	82.20	50	4,110.00
Laura Hull	71.00	50	3,550.00
Helen L. Sloat	1205.10	70	84,357.00
Myra Staggs	1368.05	50	68,402.50
Karen L. Taylor	2042.00	70	142,940.00
TOTAL			$ 308,614.00 ¹⁷

The court is convinced, and so finds, that their services were necessary and appropriate and that the hours and rates claimed are reasonable. Allen v. United States Steel Corp., 665 F.2d 689, 697 (5th Cir. Unit B 1982).¹⁸

[19] E. Adjustment

Plaintiffs contend that they are entitled to a 100% upward enhancement because of "The significance of the result obtained in the case and the quality of the work required to obtain that result." ¹⁹ The court believes that, in this case, plaintiffs' success is already adequately reflected in the application of the above Johnson factors. An upward adjustment is not warranted.

Defendants Shirley and Home Oil Company contend that the fee should be reduced by 50 to 75% because the results of the litigation were limited. ²⁰ As previously stated, plaintiffs prevailed greatly in this litigation. A downward adjustment is not warranted either.

[*518] F. Expenses

Plaintiffs also request an award of [20] $ 424,136.94 for certain out-of-pocket expenses: $ 12,964.00 for an investigator and $ 411,172.94 for other "uncompensated expenses." ²¹ The court reserves reaching the issue of expenses at this time. The matter will be addressed in a later, separate order.

III. CONCLUSION

Plaintiffs are entitled to recover a total sum of $ 2,035,658.00 in attorney's fees: $ 1,727,044.00 for attorney's fees and $ 308,614.00 for paralegal fees. Defendants Shirley and Home Oil Company contend that the total fee award should be apportioned among defendants. ²² The court cannot agree. Here all defendants actively and substantially participated in the antitrust violation. See Council for Periodical Distributors Ass'n v. Evans, 827 F.2d 1483, 1487 (11th Cir. 1987) ("In cases where two or more defendants actively participated in a constitutional violation, it will frequently be appropriate to hold all defendants jointly and severally liable for the attorney's fees"). ²³ [21]

For the foregoing reason, it is ORDERED that plaintiffs' petition to amend judgment to add attorney's fees and expenses, filed on May 29, 1992, their joint fee petitions, filed on June 5, 1992, and February 11, 1994, and their supplements filed on later occasions, are granted to the extent that plaintiffs shall have and recover from defendants Rodney Parrish, Cannon Oil Company, Thomas Shirley, Home Oil Company, James Sheffield, and Sheffield Oil Company the sum of $ 2,035,658.00 in attorney's fees.

It is further ORDERED that the issue of plaintiffs' expenses will be addressed in a later, separate order.

DONE, this the 3rd day of November, 1995.

Under an exclusive dealing arrangement, a buyer is required by the seller to deal only in the goods of that seller, and is prohibited from buying from the seller's competitors. Further, in order to constitute an antitrust violation, the effect of such arrangement must be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce. 15 U.S.C.S. § 14. Exclusive dealing arrangements are objectionable under the antitrust laws because they take away from the freedom of purchasers to buy in an open market.

Counsel: [*1] Robert D Gibson, Plaintiff, [PRO SE], PBSP, Pelican Bay State Prison, Crescent City, CA.

Opinion by: VAUGHN R. WALKER

Opinion

ORDER OF DISMISSAL

Plaintiff, an inmate at Pelican Bay State Prison, has filed a pro se civil complaint. Plaintiff also seeks to proceed in forma pauperis.

I

Plaintiff has filed an action alleging antitrust violation under the Sherman and Clayton Acts, Title 15 USC §§ 1, et seq. against defendants Walco Company, Walkenhorst Company and Stewart Walkenhorst. Plaintiff maintains that defendant Walkenhorst Company, a vendor of electrical appliances and other devices, has entered into an agreement with state prison officials at Pelican Bay State Prison "to alter electrical appliances to meet the special interest of prison officials in exchange for being allowed sole vending rights in Pelican Bay Prison." See Plaintiff's Amended Complaint ("Amended Complaint"), at 2. Apparently, the defendants have contracted with Pelican Bay to be the exclusive provider of certain electrical appliances to Pelican Bay inmates. This contract includes an additional $ 10.00 charge by defendants to prisoners on each item purchased for "security alterations" that are allegedly required by the prison. Plaintiff states that defendants have [*2] entered into this agreement because they carry "low quality, outdated, discontinued merchandise [that] ... can not compete in a free market." Amended Complaint, at 2. Plaintiff seeks injunctive and declaratory relief and punitive damages.

II

HN1[] Title 28 USC § 1915\(d\) authorizes federal courts to dismiss a claim filed in forma pauperis prior to service "if the allegation of poverty is untrue, or if satisfied that the action is frivolous or malicious." Under this standard, a district court may review the complaint and dismiss sua sponte those claims premised on meritless legal theories or clearly lacking any factual basis. Denton v. Hernandez, 504 U.S. 25, 32, 118 L. Ed. 2d 340, 112 S. Ct. 1728 \(1992\). Pro se pleadings must be liberally construed, however. Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 \(9th Cir. 1990\).

III

Plaintiff complains of what can be most analogously referred to as an "exclusive dealing arrangement" between Pelican Bay State Prison and the defendants which he maintains constitutes an antitrust violation under the Sherman and Clayton Acts, Title 15 USC §§ 1, et seq. HN2[] Under an exclusive dealing arrangement, a buyer is required by the seller to [*3] deal only in the goods of that seller, and is prohibited from buying from the seller's competitors. See FTC v. Brown Shoe Company, 384 U.S. 316, 317-22, 16 L. Ed. 2d 587, 86 S. Ct. 1501 \(1966\). Further, in order to constitute an antitrust violation, the effect of such arrangement must be "to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." 15 USC § 14. Exclusive dealing arrangements are objectionable under the antitrust laws because they take away from the freedom of purchasers to buy in an open market. FTC v. Brown Shoe Company, 384 U.S. at 321.

As a threshold matter, plaintiff's claim is without merit for alleged anticompetitive activities engaged in by defendant sellers are not what have led to plaintiff's alleged deprivation. Rather, for security reasons, Pelican Bay State Prison has elected to allow only one electrical supplier to provide inmates with appliances.¹ HN3[] A contract to buy exclusively from one supplier does not violate antitrust law without evidence of coercion which has resulted in exclusion of competitors from the target market. See Phillip C. Jones, Litigating Private Antitrust Actions § 5.10 (1984). The fact [*4] that a supplier may enjoy "monopoly power" within a market defined by an individual contract does not violate antitrust law unless such is the product of power within a larger market. See Triple M Roofing Corp. v. Tremco, Inc., 753 F.2d 242, 246 \(2d Cir. 1985\) (frustrations experienced by contractor upon realizing it could not secure products at price it would have liked do not implicate economic concerns of Sherman Act). Pelican Bay officials' choice to contract with only one supplier of electrical appliances in furtherance of its legitimate security concerns does not implicate the economic and judicial concerns contemplated by the Sherman and Clayton Acts. The facts alleged by plaintiff present no cognizable antitrust claim and this action is accordingly DISMISSED.²

² Further, to the extent that plaintiff may argue that Pelican Bay may not enter into such contracts limiting the access of prisoners to outside vendors, HN4[] the court will not second-guess the decisions of prison officials clearly related to security concerns. "Running a prison is an inordinately difficult undertaking that requires expertise, planning, and the commitment of resources, all of which are peculiarly within the province of the legislative and executive branches of government. In ruling on a motion to dismiss for lack of standing, the court must assume that the factual allegations in the complaint are true. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(6\). Dismissal is warranted only if it is clear that no relief could be granted under any set of facts that could be proved consistent with the allegations. The court further stresses that the threshold of sufficiency that a complaint must meet to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim is exceedingly low.

HN6 Standing, Clayton Act

Despite the broad language of § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, the courts limit a private party's right to bring an antitrust action through restrictions on standing. The United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit traditionally has employed the two-pronged target area test to determine if a plaintiff has antitrust standing. The first step is to determine whether the plaintiff has suffered antitrust injury. The United States Supreme Court has defined "antitrust injury" as an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful. The injury should reflect the anti competitive effect either of the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation. It should, in short, be the type of loss that the claimed violations would be likely to cause. While the Supreme Court's definition is somewhat obscure in application, it is clear that a plaintiff must prove more than injury causally linked to an illegal presence in the market.

[*1169] MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Before the court is defendant Monsanto Company's motion filed June 23, 1994, to dismiss the federal antitrust claims on the ground that the plaintiffs lack standing. Plaintiffs Florida Seed Co., Inc., and Frit Industries, Inc., responded in opposition on August 4, 1994. After careful consideration of the arguments of counsel, the applicable case law and the record as a whole, the court finds that the defendant's motion is due to be granted.

JURISDICTION AND VENUE

As to the federal antitrust claims, the plaintiffs predicate subject-matter jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 (federal-question jurisdiction). As to the state-law claims, the plaintiffs invoke the court's diversity-of-citizenship jurisdiction, 28 U.S.C. § 1332, and principles of supplemental jurisdiction, 28 U.S.C. § 1337. Personal jurisdiction and venue are not contested.

PARTIES

(1) Plaintiff Florida Seed Company, Inc. ("Florida Seed"), is engaged [2] in the business of wholesale distribution and marketing of lawn and garden products. Florida Seed is incorporated in Florida and also maintains its principal place of business in Florida.

(2) Plaintiff Frit Industries, Inc. ("Frit"), is the sole stockholder of Florida Seed. Frit is incorporated in Alabama with its principal place of business in Alabama. In addition to its ownership of Florida Seed, Frit also is involved in a variety of businesses, including the development and production of lawn and garden products.

(3) Defendant Monsanto Company ("Monsanto") is engaged in the manufacture and sale of a diversified line of chemicals, including lawn and garden products. Monsanto is incorporated in Delaware with its principal place of business in Missouri.

FINDINGS OF FACT

In viewing the allegations of the complaint as true, the court finds the following facts controlling for purposes of ruling on Monsanto's motion:

On May 2, 1994, the plaintiffs commenced this action in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Alabama and have asserted that certain acts of Monsanto violate the federal antitrust statutes and state laws. This controversy primarily stems from [3] Monsanto's alleged illegal acquisition of its competitor in the residential non-selective herbicide market, Ortho Consumer Products Division of Chevron Corporation ("Ortho"), and the subsequent termination of Florida Seed as an Ortho distributor.

Count I of the complaint asserts that Monsanto has attempted to create, and has in fact created, a monopoly in the residential non-selective herbicide market in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 2) and state antitrust laws. The plaintiffs assert that Count I also encompasses a monopoly leveraging claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act. Count II sets forth a cause of action under § 7 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 18) for [*1170] Monsanto's alleged unlawful acquisition of Ortho.¹

[4] Monsanto manufactures and sells an agricultural product named Roundup, a residential non-selective herbicide designed to kill all types of vegetation, such as brush, weeds and grasses. Monsanto holds a United States patent to Roundup's key ingredient called glyphosate. Although Monsanto's United States patent will not expire until the year 2000, its European patent expired in 1991. According to the plaintiffs, the expiration of Monsanto's patents and threatening competition caused Monsanto to take steps to maintain its market dominance, which included the acquisition of its competitor, Ortho. Those steps, assert the plaintiffs, are aimed at the destruction of Ortho and directed toward Florida Seed.

Until the Spring of 1993, Monsanto sold glyphosate to Ortho, which used the patented ingredient in a similar product sold under the brand name of Kleenup. According to the plaintiffs, Monsanto controls 63% of the residential non-selective herbicide market through its ownership of Roundup, and Kleenup accounts for another 22% of the market.

From the mid-1980s to 1992, Florida Seed had a nonexclusive distributorship agreement with Monsanto to distribute Roundup and other Monsanto products [5] to retail stores chain accounts, such as Wal-Mart and The Home Depot. Under the agreement, which was renewed annually through course of dealing, Florida Seed's marketing and sales territory included Alabama, Florida and Georgia.

Florida Seed simultaneously held a nonexclusive distributorship agreement with Ortho to market and sale its products at wholesale (including Kleenup) in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana and Mississippi. This agreement also was renewed annually through course of dealing. According to the plaintiffs, Florida Seed was one of Ortho's leading and most effective distributors in the nation.² During the period when Florida Seed acted as a distributor of Monsanto and Ortho products, both companies restricted Florida Seed from manufacturing competing lawn and garden products.

[6] By letter dated July 1, 1992, Monsanto notified Florida Seed that it would not renew Florida Seed's distributorship agreement, which was scheduled to expire on September 30 of the same year. The letter stated that Monsanto had made a "strategic decision" to "work with fewer authorized Monsanto distributors." Pls' Compl. at P 24. Following the termination of its distributorship agreement with Monsanto, Florida Seed continued to market and sell Kleenup for Ortho.

By letter dated May 20, 1993, Monsanto notified Florida Seed that Monsanto had acquired Ortho and that it would honor all current distribution agreements. Subsequently, in a letter dated July 23, 1993, Monsanto again wrote Florida Seed and stated that when Florida Seed's current agreement to distribute Kleenup and other former Ortho products expired on September 30, 1993, Monsanto would not renew the distributorship agreement. The stated reason for non-renewal was again a purported business decision by Monsanto to use fewer distributors.

¹The plaintiffs also seek redress under state laws for breach of contract (Count III), misrepresentation (Count IV), and unfair competition wrongful termination in violation of Florida statutes "or other applicable state law" (Count V). The validity of the state law claims is not before the court.

Later, Monsanto sent Frit, Florida Seed's parent corporation, a "Guaranty" demanding that Frit pay Ortho all indebtedness owed by Florida Seed and return any products not yet sold. [\[7\]](#) Monsanto further stated that the "Guaranty" had been assigned to it in its acquisition of Ortho.

Monsanto's proposed acquisition of Ortho independently caused the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") to file an administrative complaint against Monsanto. According to the plaintiffs, the FTC asserted, among other things, that the acquisition of Kleenup would [\[*1171\]](#) grant Monsanto a monopoly in the residential non-selective herbicide market, would reduce competition in the United States for the production and sale of this type of herbicide and would create barriers to market entry.

Subsequently, on September 1, 1993, Monsanto entered into a consent decree with the FTC to resolve allegations that the acquisition violated federal antitrust laws. The consent decree allowed Monsanto to acquire Ortho but placed certain divestiture restrictions on the purchase of Kleenup. In part, Monsanto agreed to sell the chemical formulation and the trademark for Kleenup by September 1994 and to maintain the marketability of the Kleenup assets until the divestiture was complete.³ The consent decree further required that for a period of ten years, Monsanto would not acquire any interest in the residential non-selective [\[8\]](#) herbicide market.

The plaintiffs further allege that following Monsanto's termination of Florida Seed's distributorship agreement with Ortho, Florida Seed was forced to withdraw from National Prime Source. As stated by the plaintiffs, National Prime Source is a joint venture among fifteen wholesale distributors of lawn and garden products that Florida Seed helped organize in 1992. According to the plaintiffs, National Prime Source "enabled its members to compete for multi-regional and national mass merchandising accounts which generally preferred to do business with distributors offering centralized bidding and administrative functions." [\[9\]](#) Id. at P 22. The plaintiffs also aver that Florida Seed has sustained substantial damages from its inability to sell to retail chain store accounts.

The plaintiffs seek treble damages under the federal antitrust laws, compensatory damages and attorneys fees. The plaintiffs also request a declaratory judgment that any amount due and payable from Florida Seed to Monsanto under the "Guaranty" are offset by the damages owed to Florida Seed by Monsanto and that Frit is not liable under the "Guaranty" for any debts of Florida Seed to Monsanto.

dismiss for failure to state a claim is exceedingly low." Quality Foods v. Latin Am. Agribusiness Dev., 711 F.2d 989, 995 (11th Cir. 1983).

B. The Antitrust Laws and General Principles of Antitrust Standing

Monsanto does not challenge the merits of the federal antitrust claims but asserts that the plaintiffs lack standing under § 2 of the Sherman Act and § 7 of the Clayton Act. The plaintiffs have raised several theories that allegedly confer standing, each of which the court will address after setting forth the applicable antitrust statutes and the general principles of antitrust law.

HN3 Section Two of the Sherman Act provides sanctions for "every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or [*1172] persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce. . ." 15 U.S.C. § 2. HN4 Section 7 of the [11] Clayton Act provides, in part, as follows:

No person engaged in commerce or in any activity affecting commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no person subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another person engaged also in commerce or in any activity affecting commerce, where in any line of commerce or in any activity affecting commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or tend to create a monopoly.

HN5 Section 4 of the Clayton Act, in turn, provides a damages remedy for violations of all federal antitrust laws, including § 2 of the Sherman Act and § 7 of the Clayton Act. Namely, when a private party claims monetary relief under the antitrust laws, as here, § 4 of the Clayton Act permits recovery by any person "injured in his [or her] business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws." 15 U.S.C. § 15 (brackets supplied).

HN6 Despite the broad language of § 4, the courts have limited a private party's right to bring [12] an antitrust action through restrictions on standing. See Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., 405 U.S. 251, 263 n.14, 31 L. Ed. 2d 184, 92 S. Ct. 885 (1972) (stating that "Congress did not intend the antitrust laws to provide a remedy in damages for all injuries that might conceivably be traced to an antitrust violation"). The Eleventh Circuit traditionally has employed the two-pronged target area test to determine if a plaintiff has antitrust standing.⁴ Municipal Utils. Bd. of Albertville, 934 F.2d at 1499. The first step is to determine whether the plaintiff has suffered antitrust injury. Id. The Supreme Court has defined "antitrust injury" as an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful. The injury should reflect the anti competitive effect either of the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation. It should, in short, be "the type of loss that the claimed violations . . . would be likely to cause."

Subsequently, in Amey, Inc. v. Gulf Abstract & Title, Inc., 758 F.2d 1486, 1496 (11th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1107, 89 L. Ed. 2d 912, 106 S. Ct. 1513 (1986), the Eleventh Circuit held that the target area test "does not produce results materially different from the results obtained in" Associated Gen. Contractors. Id. at 1520; See also Mr. Furniture v. Barclays Am./Commercial, Inc., 919 F.2d 1517, 1520 n.1 (11th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 815, 116 L. Ed. 2d 43, 112 S. Ct. 68 (1991). Accordingly, the court will proceed under the target area test and also will bear in mind the factors set out by the Supreme Court.

Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977) (citations omitted). While the Supreme Court's definition is somewhat obscure [13] in application, it is clear that a plaintiff "must prove more than injury causally linked to an illegal presence in the market." Id.

[14] HN7 [↑]

The second prong of the Eleventh Circuit's standing test is to determine whether the plaintiff is an efficient enforcer of the antitrust laws. Municipal Utils. Rd. of Albertville, 934 F.2d at 1499. In other words, a plaintiff must "prove that he [or she] is within that sector of the economy which is endangered by a breakdown of competitive conditions in a particular industry" and "be the target against which anticompetitive activity is directed." National Ind. Theatre Exhibitors, Inc. v. Buena Vista Distribution Co., 748 F.2d 602, 608 (11th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1013, 88 L. Ed. 2d 473, 106 S. Ct. 544 (1985) (brackets supplied).

[*1173] In sum, the primary purpose of the standing requirements is to assure that the injuries alleged are not "merely indirect, secondary, or remote." Construction Aggregate Transport, Inc. v. Florida Rock Indus., Inc., 710 F.2d 752, 764 (11th Cir. 1983) (Citation omitted). That is, standing "safely limit(s) the class of potential plaintiffs to those persons who will most adequately vindicate the purposes of the antitrust laws." Id. at 762-63 (citation omitted); see also Greater Rockford Energy & Technology Corp. v. Shell Oil [15] Co., 998 F.2d 391, 394 (11th Cir. 1993) ("Given the potential scope of antitrust violations and the availability of treble damages, an overbroad reading of § 4 could result in 'overdeterrence,' imposing ruinous costs on antitrust defendants, severely burdening the judicial system, and possibly chilling economically efficient behavior."), cert. denied, ___ U.S. ___, 127 L. Ed. 2d 375, 114 S. Ct. 1054 (1994).

3. Analysis

To paraphrase, Count I asserts that Monsanto's acquisition of Ortho and subsequent termination of Florida Seed's distributorship agreement was part of a scheme to "preserve or expand" Monsanto's monopoly in the residential non-selective herbicide market by destroying the marketability of its competitor product, Kleenup, all in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. Pl.s' Compl. at P 34. According to the plaintiffs, Monsanto illegally took advantage of its short-term control of both Roundup and Kleenup and commenced anticompetitive actions to impair Kleenup's marketability by stifling the distribution channels for that product. The termination of Florida Seed's distributorship agreement was a monopolistic act aimed directly at Florida Seed because, [16] according to the plaintiffs, the best way to squelch the distribution channels of Kleenup was to terminate effective distributors, such as Florida Seed.

The plaintiffs also allege that under § 2 of the Sherman Act, Monsanto's conduct constitutes monopoly leveraging, which involves "using a monopoly in one market to gain a competitive advantage in a second, where the purpose is not to monopolize or attempt to monopolize the second market." Multistate Legal Studies v. Harcourt Brace Publ., 63 F.3d 1540, 1551 n.8 (11th Cir. 1995).⁵ The allegations contained in Count II are as follows:

Monsanto's acquisition of Ortho has had and will have the effect of substantially lessening competition or tending to create a monopoly in the relevant market in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act. . . . But for the illegal acquisition, Florida Seed would not have been terminated as a distributor of Ortho products including Kleenup, and Florida Seed would have retained its ability to sell lawn and garden products to large retail chain accounts and to continue to participate in [National] Prime Source.

Id. at P 36 (brackets supplied).

[17] In determining whether the plaintiffs have antitrust standing, the court must assume that Monsanto has violated § 2 of the Sherman Act and § 7 of the Clayton Act. See Mr. Furniture, 919 F.2d at 1520 n.2. The primary argument raised by Monsanto is that Florida Seed does not have standing to challenge an alleged illegal acquisition at the manufacturing level because Florida Seed is neither a competitor or consumer in the relevant market, which according to Monsanto is limited to the manufacture of residential non-selective herbicides. HN8 [↑] Generally, but not always, a plaintiff must be either a consumer or competitor in the relevant market, or the injury likely will be too remote from the alleged violation. see Associated Gen. Contractors, 459 U.S. at 539.

Monsanto correctly points out by way of numerous case citations that HN9 [↑] distributors terminated after illegal mergers of manufacturers usually lack standing to sue under the antitrust laws. For example, Monsanto relies [*1174] on John Lenore & Co. v. Olympia Brewing Co., 550 F.2d 495 (9th Cir. 1977). There, the defendant, Olympia, acquired Hamm's brewing and terminated Hamm's distributors, including the plaintiff, Lenore. Lenore sued [18] Olympia, alleging that the acquisition violated § 7 of Clayton Act because it substantially lessened competition. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of Olympia, and the Ninth Circuit affirmed. The Ninth Circuit looked to Brunswick, supra, and held that Lenore did not have standing to sue because it had not suffered antitrust injury:

Even though Lenore's injury may have ". . . occurred 'by reason of' the unlawful acquisitions, it did not occur 'by reason of' that which made the acquisition unlawful." The terminations were an incidental matter which the merger may have made possible, but certainly did not cause." All Lenore really alleges is that because Olympia purchased the Hamm's brand, Lenore was replaced in favor of other distributors. This is insufficient to make out a case under § 7 which is concerned with competition, not competitors.

550 F.2d at 500 (internal citations omitted). In sum, the court determined that the acquisition of Hamm violated the antitrust laws, if at all, because competition was reduced in the manufacture of beer, a market in which Lenore was neither a competitor or consumer.

In a similar case relied upon by Monsanto, [*19] G.K.A. Beverage Corp. v. Honickman, 55 F.3d 762 (2nd Cir. 1995), cert. denied, 133 L. Ed. 2d 304, 116 S. Ct. 381, 1995 WL 555505 (Oct. 30, 1995), the Second Circuit analyzed terminated distributors' ability to obtain standing under § 2 of the Sherman Act. The plaintiffs were a group of former soft drink distributors for Seven-Up Brooklyn. They brought antitrust claims against several defendants, including Honickman, the latter of whom sought to acquire Seven-Up Brooklyn. Honickman and Seven-Up Brooklyn were two of the three soft drink bottling companies in New York City. Without including the Seven-Up brands, Honickman controlled more than one-half of the soft drink sales to retailers in New York City.

Honickman provided financing to its various affiliates for the purchase of Seven-Up Brooklyn, a transaction that gave rise to an FTC investigation. When the FTC disallowed the acquisition asserting antitrust violations, the plaintiffs claimed that Honickman and the other defendants conspired to cause Seven-Up Brooklyn to file for bankruptcy. If Seven-up Brooklyn filed for bankruptcy, then according to the plaintiffs, Honickman could reacquire it under the failing company [*20] defense and avoid repercussions under the federal antitrust laws. This is in fact what happened.

The Second Circuit held that the plaintiffs' injuries were derivative only and failed to rise to a level of antitrust injury sufficient to confer standing:

If Seven-Up Brooklyn, before its bankruptcy, had canceled its distribution agreements and hired delivery drivers as employees, the distributors would not have been able to assert an antitrust violation. Lacking such a claim against Seven-Up Brooklyn, the distributors also lack a claim against Honickman [and the other defendants] who, having taken over Seven-Up Brooklyn's business, have not hired the plaintiffs as distributors.

Although the distributors undoubtedly suffered injury as a result of the alleged antitrust violation, the injury suffered by the distributors is derivative of the injury suffered by Seven-Up Brooklyn. Thus, accepting the antitrust allegations as true, it was not the distributors that suffered direct antitrust injury, but Seven-Up Brooklyn. Therefore, the proper party to bring the antitrust action on these facts was Seven-Up Brooklyn, or, after its bankruptcy, the estate's trustee.

Id. at 767; [21] see also Universal Brands, Inc. v. Philip Morris, Inc., 546 F.2d 30 (5th Cir. 1977) (denying sub-distributor standing to enjoin a merger when its exclusive distributor was replaced after a merger).

The court finds that the same result is required in this case. While Florida Seed's injuries undoubtedly resulted from the termination of its distributorship agreement for Kleenup, the court finds that the injury sustained is too remote. If Ortho, [*1175] prior to Monsanto's acquisition, had terminated Florida Seed, Florida Seed could not have attacked as illegal Ortho's decision. The same would be true if after divesture of the Kleenup assets, the purchasing company had not retained Florida Seed as a distributor.

In making its finding, the court further assumes that Monsanto's goal was to gain control of the non-selective herbicide market and that Florida Seed was an effective distributor. However, even assuming such, the court finds that the damages claimed by the plaintiffs (loss of competition at the distributor level) are not the type of anticompetitive injury that the antitrust laws were intended to remedy. The court finds that if the merger is illegal, the illegality stems from decreased [22] competition in the manufacture of residential non-selective herbicides.

The court, after carefully examining the law, cannot find any cases, nor have the plaintiffs cited any, that would warrant a contrary finding. In fact, the cases relied on by the plaintiffs are inapposite. For example, the plaintiffs rely on Delong v. Washington Mills Electro Min., 990 F.2d 1186 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, U.S. __, 126 L. Ed. 2d 569, 114 S. Ct. 604 (1993), for the proposition that a manufacturer's short-term control over intrabrand competition gives a terminated dealer standing. The Delong court, however, held that a distributor had standing where the manufacturer terminated the distributorship because the distributor objected to a price-fixing conspiracy directed towards the consumer. Quite a different fact scenario is present here.

The difficulties that a terminated distributor may face in obtaining standing to contest an illegal merger are explained in P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law § 381 (rev. ed. 1995) (internal footnotes omitted) (brackets supplied):

Many mergers have been challenged by suppliers (including dealers, franchisees, and employees providing the merging [23] firms with distribution and other services) displaced as a result of the merger. Injury-in-fact may be doubtful when equivalent opportunities are available elsewhere. If other opportunities do not exist [as alleged by Florida Seed], displaced suppliers made redundant by a merger suffer actual losses but not antitrust injury, for the rationale for condemning a merger lies in its potential for supracompetitive pricing, not in its potential for cost savings and other efficiencies. A merger that actually brings about supracompetitive prices and diminished output reduces the need for inputs and can therefore injure suppliers. Although such an injury connects more closely with the rationale for finding a violation, it is still not antitrust injury because it is neither the means by which output is restricted nor the direct concern of antitrust rules protecting product market competition.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue that as a wholesale distributor to retail consumers, Florida Seed competes with manufacturers, such as Monsanto, which also engage in direct sales to retail consumers. Hence, according to the plaintiffs, the relevant market encompasses the marketing and selling [24] of residential non-selective herbicides, in addition to manufacturing. The court agrees with the plaintiffs that at this stage of the litigation, the factual allegations with respect to the relevant markets must be accepted as true. See Adams v. Bain, 697 F.2d 1213, 1216 (4th Cir. 1982); see also Construction Aggregate Transport, Inc., 710 F.2d at 764 (recognizing that more than one "sector of the market may be the target for a particular anticompetitive act"). Nonetheless, the court is not persuaded by the plaintiffs' argument. In Honickman, the Second Circuit rejected this "distribution monopoly" argument:

The distributors attempt to recharacterize their antitrust claims by arguing that they suffered antitrust injury in the elimination of competition in retail distribution between themselves and Honickman. However, the so-called "distribution monopoly" is derived entirely from Honickman's share of the bottling market. Honickman's "distribution monopoly" thus involves only his product. Moreover, a vertically structured monopoly can take only one monopoly profit. See Lamotte Valley R.R. v. ICE, 229 U.S. App. D.C. 17, 711 F.2d 295, 318 (D.C. Cir. 1983); see also [*1176] Robert H. Bark, [25] The Antitrust Paradox 229 (2d ed. 1993); 3 Philip Areeda & Donald F. Turner, Antitrust Law 21 725b (1978).

55 F.3d at 767.

In the alternative, Florida Seed argues that, at the very least, it is a potential competitor in the manufacturing arena. The court is not persuaded by this argument either. The court recognizes that HN10 a plaintiff who was never in a market, here the manufacturing market, sometimes can succeed on a claim that he or she would have entered if had the defendant's antitrust violation not kept him or her out. To state such a claim, the plaintiff must show a financial ability to enter the market, the appropriate background and experience that makes success possible and steps evidencing an intent to enter the market. See In re Dual Deck Video Cassette Antitrust Litigation, 11 F.3d 1460, 1465 \(9th Cir. 1993\); Great Western Directories, Inc. v. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co., 63 F.3d 1378, 1389 \(5th Cir. 1995\).

Admittedly, Florida Seed's inability to manufacture residential non-selective herbicides is directly attributable to the prohibitive contractual clauses contained in its distributorship agreements with Monsanto and Ortho. Florida Seed, however, has 26 not pointed to any authority indicating that such a restriction is illegal in an antitrust sense or that the factors recited in Dual Deck Video Cassette need not be proven when such a clause has prohibited market entry. In fact, it appears that Florida Seed would not have complained of its inability to enter the market if its distributorship agreements had not been terminated.

Florida Seed continues by arguing that its assertion that it is a potential competitor, in and of itself, is sufficient to confer standing because at this stage all factual assertions must be taken as true. The court, however, need not and should not adopt in totum conclusory allegations. In other words, HN11 a motion to dismiss cannot be defeated with "conclusory allegations . . . if not supported by facts constituting a legitimate claim for relief. . . ." Municipal Utilities Bd. of Albertville, 934 F.2d at 1495; see also Lombard's, Inc. v. Prince Mfg., Inc., 753 F.2d 974, 975 \(11th Cir. 1985\). Here, the plaintiffs have not alleged the existence of any of the Dual Deck Video Cassette factors, which the court must examine to assess a company's preparedness to enter a market. The complaint is devoid 27 of any facts that Florida Seed had a genuine intent to enter the market and a preparedness to do so. In other words, the court finds that there is no set of facts by which Florida Seed can show that it is a potential competitor.

Even if the court were to find that Florida Seed suffered antitrust injury, this finding alone cannot confer standing, because "HN12 only those parties who can most efficiently vindicate the purposes of the antitrust laws have antitrust standing to maintain a private action under § 4." In re Industrial Gas Antitrust Litigation, 681 F.2d 514, 516 \(7th Cir. 1982\), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1016, 75 L. Ed. 2d 487, 103 S. Ct. 1261 (1983). The court finds that other more direct victims exist. If Monsanto is in fact squelching the marketability of its competitor products, the company who acquired the Kleenup assets or another manufacturing company in the same market would be a more appropriate plaintiff. Likewise, consumers of residential non-selective herbicides could maintain an action if Monsanto's action stifled competition allowing Monsanto to engage in monopoly pricing in retail stores. See generally SAS of Puerto Rico, Inc. v. Puerto Rico Tel. Co., 48 F.3d 39 \(1st Cir. 1995\). In other 28 words, a finding that Florida Seed has standing to bring an antitrust lawsuit could potentially open the litigation floodgates to all distributors terminated as a result of the alleged illegal merger. The focus of the litigation would then be on the individual injuries and not the damages suffered by the public as a whole.

The discussion, thus far, has focused on whether Florida Seed has standing to assert antitrust claims. Frit likewise cannot bring this action, because HN13 stockholders do not have standing to bring an action on behalf of their subsidiary. Midwestern Waffles, Inc. v. Waffle House, Inc., 734 F.2d 705, 710 \(11th Cir. 1984\); Harris v. Shell Oil Co., 371 F. Supp. 376, 377 \(M.D.Ala. 1974\) ("The fact [*1177] that the sole stockholder may not recover damages under the antitrust laws for losses of his [or her] corporation had long ago been decided in this jurisdiction. . . .") In Harris, the court explained the reasoning for denying standing to stockholders and related entities:

The theory is that, if each creditor, shareholder or other person with some damage derived or reflecting from the damage to the corporation initially injured by the antitrust violations, 29 had standing to assert treble-damages claims for such injuries, the court would be flooded with a multiplicity of suits, and the defendant would be subject to multiple liability for the same alleged wrongs.

Id. at 379.

The plaintiffs, however, argue that Frit does not seek a double recovery or independent standing in its capacity as a shareholder but rather joins with Florida Seed in vindicating the alleged violations of the antitrust laws. The plaintiffs have not cited any authority for allowing Frit to unite with Florida Seed, nor has the court found any. Under the antitrust laws, Florida Seed is capable, in and of itself, of bringing an antitrust action, assuming of course that the standing requirements are satisfied. To the extent Frit seeks to join forces with Florida Seed, the court finds that the addition of Frit is merely duplicative. Therefore, Frit is not a proper party to the federal antitrust claims. Accordingly, Monsanto's motion to dismiss for lack of standing as to the plaintiffs' claims under § 2 of the Sherman Act and § 7 of the Clayton Act is due to be granted.

II. State Law Claims

In granting Monsanto's motion to dismiss, the only claims now [\[*30\]](#) remaining are those brought pursuant to state law. Because diversity-of-citizenship jurisdiction is present in this case, the court will retain jurisdiction over the remaining causes of action.

ORDER

For the reasons stated herein, it is CONSIDERED and ORDERED that defendant Monsanto Company's motion to dismiss the federal antitrust claims under § 2 of the Sherman Act (Count I) and § 7 of the Clayton Act (Count II) be and the same is hereby GRANTED. The action will continue as to the state-law claims asserted in Counts III, IV, and V of the complaint.

To establish an antitrust violation, a plaintiff must show a contract, combination or conspiracy that affects interstate commerce and unreasonably restrains trade. To show an unreasonable restraint of trade, a plaintiff must show that the conspiracy has the potential to produce adverse anti-competitive effects within relevant product and geographic markets. This may be shown through proof of a per se antitrust violation, where proof of certain actions by defendants is sufficient to establish a violation, or through a rule of reason analysis, where, in addition to proving actions by defendants, plaintiff must offer sufficient evidence for a trier of fact to be able to conclude that the actions had an unreasonably anti-competitive effect.

HN3 [down] Cartels & Horizontal Restraints, Price Fixing

Horizontal price-fixing is a per se antitrust violation. A plaintiff must prove more than parallel business behavior to defeat a motion for summary judgment. Plaintiff must come forward with significant probative evidence supporting its theory that the defendants engaged in (1) conscious parallel action, (2) which is contrary to their economic self-interest so as not to amount to a good faith business judgment.

Judges: BEFORE: KENNEDY and MOORE, Circuit Judges; and POTTER, * Senior District Judge.

Opinion

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff Sportswear Design, Inc. ("Sportswear") appeals the order of the District Court granting summary judgment in favor of defendants Canstar Sports USA, Inc. ("Canstar"), Bob Reid ("Reid") and Cooper of Canada, Ltd. ("Cooper") on antitrust claims and certain contract claims. Defendant Canstar appeals the dismissal without prejudice of Sportswear's defamation claim and breach of warranty claim and appeals the District Court's denial of summary judgment on its account stated counterclaim. [*2] For the following reasons, we AFFIRM in part, REVERSE in part, and REMAND to the District Court.¹

I.

Defendant Canstar is a distributor for Canstar Sports, Inc., a Canadian public company that manufactures and distributes major brands of hockey equipment. In 1981, Canstar hired Defendant Reid as a sales representative of several product lines for Michigan and Ohio.

Plaintiff Sportswear began as a retailer of hockey equipment in the early 1980's. In 1985, Canstar approved a $4,000 credit line for Canstar's Micron skates to Sportswear. Within three months, Sportswear was delinquent on its debt. Problems continued through the year and Sportswear's line of credit was reduced. By March 10, 1987, Sportswear [*3] was delinquent in the amount of $ 4,778.

In early March of 1987, Canstar and Sportswear tried to negotiate a payment plan but Canstar would not accept Sportswear's condition that Canstar open an account for Sportswear to carry Canstar's Bauer line of skates. On March 17, 1987, Sportswear asserted for the first time that Canstar breached a contract by refusing to honor warranties on Micron skates for which payment had come due in January. Canstar made several unsuccessful attempts to negotiate a settlement of the dispute, but ultimately suspended further dealing with Sportswear. In 1990, when Canstar purchased the assets of Cooper and discovered that Sportswear was a Cooper customer, Canstar chose not to sell Sportswear any Cooper products.

In November of 1990, Sportswear filed a nine-count complaint alleging antitrust, contract, and business tort claims against Canstar, Cooper, and sales representative Bob Reid. The District Court granted summary judgment to the defendants on the antitrust claims and on all but one of the breach of contract claims, which, together with a defamation claim, the District Court dismissed without prejudice.

II.

We affirm the District Court's [*4] grant of summary judgment in favor of the defendants on the antitrust claims under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq., the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13 et seq., and under Michigan antitrust law, M.C.L.A. § 445.771 et seq..² HN1 A motion for summary judgment must be rendered where there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, F.R.C.P. 56\(c\), with all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 106 S. Ct. 2505 \(1986\).

* Honorable John W. Potter, Senior United States District Judge for the Northern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

² All three claims collapse into one for the purposes of summary judgment in this case. Under the facts presented, there can be no liability under the Clayton Act if the Sherman Act has not been violated, and Michigan law explicitly tracks federal antitrust law. M.C.L.A. § 445.784\(2\).

HN2[

To establish an antitrust violation, a plaintiff must show a contract, combination or conspiracy that affects interstate commerce and unreasonably restrains [*5] trade. Lie v. St. Joseph Hosp. of Mount Clemens, Mich., 964 F.2d 567, 568 \(6th Cir. 1992\). To show an unreasonable restraint of trade, a plaintiff must show that the conspiracy has the potential to produce adverse anti-competitive effects within relevant product and geographic markets. This may be shown through proof of a per se antitrust violation, where proof of certain actions by defendants is sufficient to establish a violation, or through a rule of reason analysis, where, in addition to proving actions by defendants, plaintiff must offer sufficient evidence for a trier of fact to be able to conclude that the actions had an unreasonably anti-competitive effect. See e.g., Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery & Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 296-97, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202, 105 S. Ct. 2613 \(1985\).

Sportswear claims that Canstar's refusal to do business with it was not, as Canstar alleges, on account of Sportswear's poor credit history but because Sportswear was a discounter. Even if this were so, and the record does not support such a theory, the actions allegedly taken by Canstar would not constitute a per se antitrust violation. [Business Elec. \[*6\] Corp. v. Sharp Elec. Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 726-27, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808, 108 S. Ct. 1515 \(1987\)](#). Therefore the rule of reason standard applies. Plaintiff failed to allege facts sufficient for a trier of fact to conclude that the actions had any anti-competitive effect. In fact, plaintiff's own officer conceded that the market was "very competitive."

Sportswear further claims that defendants conspired with several Detroit area retailers in a horizontal price-fixing scheme to keep prices above a minimum level. HN3[] Horizontal price-fixing is a per se antitrust violation. At most in this case, however, Sportswear has shown merely that several businesses would not deal with it. Plaintiff must prove more than parallel business behavior to defeat a motion for summary judgment. Plaintiff "must come forward with significant probative evidence supporting its theory that the defendants engaged in (1) conscious parallel action, (2) which is contrary to their economic self-interest so as not to amount to a good faith business judgment." Amey, Inc. v. Gulf Abstract & Title Inc., 758 F.2d 1486 \(5th Cir. 1985\), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1107, 89 L. Ed. 2d 912, 106 S. Ct. 1513 (1986). Although [*7] Sportswear has made general allegations of horizontal price-fixing, it has failed to offer significant probative evidence to suggest that decisions made by defendants were not the result of good faith business judgments. Summary judgment on this issue was thus appropriate.

Finally, Sportswear argues that defendant engaged in vertical non-price restraint by trying to control and enforce the final destination of its products. Such actions are not per se antitrust violations; the rule of reason standard is applied. Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 58-59, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 \(1977\). As stated above, plaintiff has failed to establish facts from which a trier of fact could conclude that Canstar's actions were unreasonably restrictive of competitive conditions. Therefore, as a matter of law, defendants' actions with regard to this accusation do not constitute antitrust violations. The District Court properly dismissed the antitrust claims.

III.

The District Court denied summary judgment for Canstar with regard to the Sportswear's breach of contract and defamation claims as well as Canstar's state law counterclaim for account stated. HN4[] [*8] While we review a grant of summary judgment under a de novo standard, appellate review of a denial of summary judgment is governed by an abuse of discretion standard. Pinney Dock & Transp. v. Penn Cent. Corp., 838 F.2d 1445, 1472 \(6th Cir.\), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 880, 102 L. Ed. 2d 166, 109 S. Ct. 196 \(1988\); Southward v. South Cent. Ready Mix Supply Corp., 7 F.3d 487, 492 \(6th Cir. 1993\).

A. The Defamation Claim

The District Court dismissed Sportswear's defamation claim in order to allow plaintiff additional time to amend its complaint with respect to that claim. Plaintiff, however, had already been granted leave to amend but failed to do so satisfactorily. Nor has it indicated what amendment would be forthcoming. In its reply brief, plaintiff points to four affidavits in support of its defamation claim. Appellant's Reply Brief at 48. Taken as true, nothing in the affidavits constitutes competent evidence of defamation.³ Thus, given ample opportunity of lengthy discovery, plaintiff failed to point to a genuine issue of material fact and defendants are entitled to judgment as a matter of law. We therefore find the District Court to have abused its discretion by denying summary judgment to the [*9] defendants and remand for summary judgment for the defendant on the defamation claim. See Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 182, 9 L. Ed. 2d 222, 83 S. Ct. 227 (1962) (discussing when a grant of leave to amend is inappropriate).

B. The Warranty Claim

Undisputed facts establish that in August of 1986 Sportswear submitted purchase orders to Canstar for Micron product which Canstar then delivered. According to Sportswear officer Bekkala's own deposition testimony, the product was sold "as is." Because the defendant offered evidence of the plaintiff conceding that the purchase [*10] of fitting stock was "as is," and plaintiff pointed to nothing specific to show otherwise, the District Court erred in not granting summary judgment to the defendant on the breach of warranty claim.

The District Court appears to have concluded erroneously that notes allegedly taken by a Sportswear officer created a genuine issue of material fact on the warranty claim. The note simply said, "Understanding of no return at any point unless warranty is involved." This is not proof of the existence of a warranty. Furthermore, our own independent review of the record uncovered no competent evidence of warranty. Therefore, we find that the District Court abused its discretion with regard to plaintiff's warranty claim and defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

C. The Account Stated Counterclaim

Canstar filed a counterclaim for an action for account stated under Michigan law, MCL 600.2145, MSA 27A.2145, because of Sportswear's account delinquency. Undisputed facts establish that Canstar delivered product to Sportswear pursuant to a Sportswear purchase order and that Sportswear never paid for the product. In fact, Sportswear had agreed to a payment plan to extinguish the [*11] debt and had gone so far as to prepare a check for the first installment but never sent it on advice of counsel.

The District Court found a genuine issue with regard to the warranty claim and thus never reached Canstar's counterclaim. But, as discussed above, Sportswear has failed to show a genuine issue of material fact on the warranty issue -- the product was sold "as is" -- therefore, Sportswear cannot argue that a breach of warranty excused its failure to settle its account. Thus, defendant has provided unrefuted evidence of an account stated and is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. See Roberts Consol. Indus., Inc. v. Superior Carpet Supply, Inc., No. 91-CV-73128-DT, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21518, 1992 WL 350617 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 28, 1992).

IV.

For the reasons stated, we AFFIRM in part, REVERSE in part, and REMAND to the District Court for dismissal of the warranty and defamation claims with prejudice, for entry of judgment on the counterclaim, and for vacation of the judgment of dismissal on the complaint as to Cooper of Canada, Ltd. as to which a default judgment has already been entered.

End of Document

³ Two of the affidavits consist of sworn statements of Sportswear officers, Gale and Bekkala, who attest to having been told by fellow retailers that they could not sell any Canstar products to Sportswear and two affidavits of Joseph Domenick, an employee at another sporting goods store, are to the same effect. HN1 [down arrow] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Appropriateness

Summary judgment shall be rendered if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56\(c\). The court evaluates all evidence in the light most favorable to the non-movants. To withstand summary judgment, disputed facts in a case must be those that might affect the outcome of the suit. Summary judgment is not a discretionary remedy and must be granted when the movant is entitled to it as a matter of law.

The Petroleum Marketing Practices Act (PMPA), 15 U.S.C.S. § 2805, provides franchisees the right to pursue equitable and legal actions against franchisers who fail to comply with the PMPA's notice provisions in terminating franchisees. The preliminary issue in a PMPA wrongful termination action is whether there was a termination. This issue arises from the requirement that a court's jurisdiction be secured by a justiciable case or controversy. The PMPA vests jurisdiction in federal district courts over matters involving the violation of 15 U.S.C.S. § 2802\(a\), which states that no franchisor engaged in the sale or distribution of motor fuel in commerce may: (1) terminate any franchise prior to the conclusion of the term, or the expiration date, stated in the franchise; or (2) fail to renew any franchise relationship. 15 U.S.C.S. § 2802\(a\).

To have standing in federal court pursuant to U.S. Const. art. III, plaintiffs must demonstrate the existence of a case or controversy. In the antitrust context, a core component of the case or controversy demonstration is the requirement of an antitrust injury. An antitrust injury is an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and an injury flowing from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful. The alleged injury must be palpable and distinct, rather than abstract, conjectural, or hypothetical. In considering the injury requirements of antitrust cases, although the court must draw all inferences from the underlying facts in the light most favorable to the non-movants, antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence.

HN8 Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In order to prove an agreement in restraint of trade, a plaintiff must show that the defendant's conduct actually had an adverse effect on all of competition in a relevant market. Proof of harm to single competitor is insufficient. The plaintiff has the burden of demonstrating the relevant geographic market. That market is the geographic area in which a buyer may practically proceed to other sellers for goods or services, should the defendant seller seek to raise its prices. Furthermore, rule of reason analysis includes the general requirement that antitrust plaintiffs establish that the defendants had market power. That is, there must be a showing that defendants possessed the power to raise prices significantly above the competitive level without losing all of one's business. Plaintiffs cannot meet their burden of showing an antitrust injury simply by alleging that they could have made more money by pricing products differently than they chose to. Instead, they must make some showing that the pricing provision caused them to lose money by forcing them to set prices which were artificial.

[*1205] OPINION AND ORDER

CHARLES R. NORGL, SR., District Judge:

Before the court are the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment on Count II, and Defendant State Oil Company's ("State Oil") motion for summary judgment on Counts I and IV. Also before the court are State Oil's motion to strike Plaintiff's expert report, its motion to bar that expert's testimony, and its motion in limine regarding that expert's testimony. Plaintiff has indicated that he will voluntarily dismiss Count III.

I. BACKGROUND

Plaintiffs Barkat U. Kahn ("Kahn") and Kahn & Associates, Inc. ("K&A") (collectively "Plaintiffs") bring this action [2] against State Oil claiming damages for violations of the Petroleum Marketing Practices Act ("PMPA"), 15 U.S.C. §§ 2801-41 (Count I), the Sherman Antitrust Act ("Sherman Act"), 15 U.S.C. § 1 (Count II), and for breach of contract (Count IV). The court exercises jurisdiction over the PMPA and Sherman Act claims pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1331, and over the contract claim under its supplemental jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1337.

On January 20, 1992, Khan and State Oil entered a written lease and supply agreement ("Agreement") regarding a gasoline service station (the "Station"). In relevant part, paragraph 31 of the Agreement provides:

In order to assist in maintaining the competitive position of both Landlord and Tenant, The [sic] Landlord will from time to time establish a recommended retail pump price for each type of gasoline sold at the location. The Landlord shall charge the Tenant for each transport of gasoline at the recommended retail pump price less margin and sales tax. The Tenant's margin will be $ 0.0325 (three and 1/4 cents) per gallon. In the event the Tenant elects to sell at retail at a price in excess of the recommended retail pump price established [3] by the Landlord, the Tenant shall pay the Landlord a sum equal to the difference between the retail pump price at which the gasoline in question has been sold, and the recommended retail pump price established by the Landlord multiplied by the number of gallons sold. In the event the Tenant elects to sell at a retail pump price below the recommended retail pump price established by the Landlord, the Tenant shall not be entitled to a reduction in price to cover the difference.

The Agreement also provides for rent in the amount of $ 7,500 per month in 1992, $ 8,000 per month in 1993, and $ 8,500 per month in 1994.

After execution of the agreement, Khan took possession of the Station and remained in possession from January 1992 to February 1993. During that time, pursuant to the Agreement, Plaintiffs purchased from State Oil and resold various grades of gasoline. Both parties agree that Khan was a franchisee and State Oil was a franchisor under the definitional provisions of the PMPA.

On January 27, 1993, State Oil issued a Notice of Termination, giving Plaintiffs five-days notice of State Oil's intent to terminate the Agreement as of February 2, 1993. [*1206] State Oil explains that [4] this notice was issued for non-payment of amounts owed. On February 8, 1993, State Oil brought a forcible entry and detainer action in DuPage County and a separate action to collect on the debt. The Circuit Court of the Eighteenth Judicial Circuit of Illinois appointed a receiver to operate the Station.

Khan removed State Oil's action to federal court, arguing that the PMPA applied. On May 12, 1993, the court denied State Oil's motion for summary judgment, because the court had not determined that, as a matter of law, State Oil's January 27, 1993 notice was reasonable. The court found that it did not have jurisdiction over State Oil as a plaintiff franchisor under the PMPA because the PMPA grants jurisdiction only over franchisee actions. State Oil Co. v. Khan, 839 F. Supp. 543 \(N.D. Ill. 1993\). By order of December 3, 1993, this court remanded the action back to DuPage County. In addition to the instant case in federal court, Khan filed state counterclaims and a third-party complaint in the remanded state collection action.

After the state court appointment of the receiver, State Oil issued a second notice of termination on May 29, 1993, providing for termination effective September [5] 3, 1993. The receiver ran the Station from February until November 1993.

II. DISCUSSION

HN1  Summary judgment "shall be rendered forthwith if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Communications Int'l Union v. CSX Transp., Inc., 30 F.3d 903, 904 (7th Cir. 1994). The court evaluates all evidence in the light most favorable to the non-movants. Serfecz v. Jewel Food Stores, 67 F.3d 591, 1995 WL 567135, at * 3 (1995). To withstand summary judgment, disputed facts in a case must be those that might affect the outcome of the suit. Tolle v. Carroll Touch, Inc., 23 F.3d 174, 178 (7th Cir. 1994). Summary judgment is not a discretionary remedy and must be granted when the movant is entitled to it as a matter of law. Anderson v. P. A. Radocy & Sons, Inc., 67 F.3d 619, 1995 WL 572914, at *2 (7th Cir. 1995). In the instant case, considering all facts in the light most favorable to the non-movants, there are no [6] genuine issues of material fact which would allow this case to withstand summary judgment.

A. K&A as a Party

As a preliminary matter, State Oil contends that K&A is not a proper plaintiff in this action because the Complaint alleges a contractual relationship only between Khan and State Oil. HN2[] The PMPA offers protections only to a "franchisee," which is defined as "a retailer or a distributor . . . who is authorized . . . under a franchise . . . to use a trademark in connection with the sale . . . or distribution of motor fuel." 15 U.S.C. § 2801\(4\). The PMPA defines a "franchise" only in terms of a contractual relationship. 15 U.S.C. § 2801\(1\)\(B\). Khan was the only "retailer or distributor" in a contractual relationship with State Oil. Because K&A was not engaged in a contractual relationship with State Oil, it is not a protected "franchisee" under the PMPA. Thus, it is not a proper plaintiff under Count I of the Complaint.

Count II of the Complaint alleges a violation of antitrust law. State Oil contends that K&A does not have standing to bring this count because there was no contractual relationship between State Oil and K&A. HN3[] Because antitrust law is designed to prevent many [7] types of injuries, rather than simply contractual injury, courts should generally focus on antitrust injury requirements, rather than traditional contractual standing requirements, when deciding antitrust cases. See Southwest Suburban Bd. of Realtors v. Beverly Area Planning Assoc., 830 F.2d 1374, 1377 n.1 (7th Cir. 1987). Because K&A may have been in a position to suffer potential antitrust injury, the court will not dismiss K&A's Count II, and will consider that count as it applies to both Khan and K&A.

[*1207] Count IV alleges a state law contract claim. Again, because State Oil incurred no contractual duties to K&A under the facts presented, K&A does not have standing to bring this contractual claim against State Oil. See White Hen Pantry, Inc. v. Cha, 214 Ill. App. 3d 627, 158 Ill. Dec. 310, 574 N.E.2d 104 (1991).

In sum, K&A does not have standing to bring Counts I and IV. As such, the court considers Counts I and IV as if they were brought by Khan individually.

B. Petroleum Marketing Practices Act

Khan alleges that State Oil violated the PMPA by its defective January 27, 1993, notice of intent to terminate the Agreement and by its action to appoint the receiver.¹ The [8] court need not decide whether the January 27 notice was faulty for purposes of this order.²

¹ Citing Winks v. Feeney Oil Co., 731 F. Supp. 322, 327 (C.D. Ill. 1990), Khan asserts that State Oil has already conceded that its first notice was defective by issuing the second notice. The court respectfully disagrees with the Winks court. The court will not imply that a franchisor concedes a defective first notice when it issues a complying second notice. By punishing the issuance of a correct notice, the incentive for franchisors' to correct possibly defective notices would be removed.

² Khan's response to State Oil's motion states:

In the action before Judge Norgle prior to its remand, State Oil moved for summary judgment, which was denied by Order dated May 12, 1993. Judge Norgle found that the January 27, 1993 Notice of Termination . . . was not reasonable nor justified under the circumstances.

(Pls.' Mem. In Opp'n to Summ. J. at 4.) Khan seems to ignore the court's later opinion and order remanding the case to the Circuit Court of DuPage County, which explains:

[9] HN4

The PMPA provides franchisees the right to pursue equitable and legal actions against franchisors who fail to comply with the PMPA's notice provisions in terminating franchisees. 15 U.S.C. § 2805. The preliminary issue in a PMPA wrongful termination action is whether there was a termination. This issue arises from the requirement that a court's jurisdiction be secured by a justiciable case or controversy. Naso v. Sun Ref. & Mktg. Co., 582 F. Supp. 1566 \(N.D. Ohio 1983\) (citing Alabama State Federation of Labor v. McAdory, 325 U.S. 450, 89 L. Ed. 1725, 65 S. Ct. 1384 \(1945\)). The PMPA vests jurisdiction in federal district courts over matters involving the violation of 15 U.S.C. § 2802\(a\), which states:

No franchisor engaged in the sale . . . or distribution of motor fuel in commerce may - (1) terminate any franchise . . . prior to the conclusion of the term, or the expiration date, stated in the franchise; or . . . (2) fail to renew any franchise relationship.

Khan alleges that the appointment of the receiver was a termination by State Oil pursuant to the January 27 notice. This court has already determined, in its minute order of [\[*10\]](#) September 11, 1995, that it will not construe the appointment of a receiver by the state court as a termination by State Oil under the PMPA.³ The appointment was an [\[*1208\]](#) action of the state court, rather than an action of State Oil. As such, that appointment cannot be viewed as a termination by State Oil flowing from its arguably-defective January 27 notice. Khan has not alleged any other act which could constitute a termination by State Oil in violation of the PMPA. Khan's failure to meet this jurisdictional requirement raises a serious doubt about the existence of a justiciable case or controversy. See Halder v. Standard Oil Co., 642 F.2d 107 \(5th Cir. 1981\) (franchisee's fear of termination did not confer jurisdiction on the district court).

[\[*11\]](#) Alternatively, Khan argues that he did not need to wait for State Oil to actually terminate his franchise before bringing a PMPA action against State Oil. Khan cites several cases where franchisees brought actions based on defective notices prior to actual termination. See, e.g., Winks v. Feeney Oil Co., Inc., 731 F. Supp. 322 \(C.D. Ill.

The court has not already made a finding that State Oil's original notice of termination was defective or unreasonable. The court in its May 12, 1993 minute order on State Oil's motion for summary judgment found only that State Oil failed to convince the court that providing ninety-days notice would not have been reasonable as a matter of law. The court did not conclude the opposite: that ninety-days notice would not have been unreasonable, or that the five-day notice was itself unreasonable. That issue may thus be revisited.

State Oil v. Khan, 839 F. Supp. 543, 544 n.1 \(N.D. Ill. 1993\) (Norgle, J.) (emphasis added).

As a matter of law, the mere appointment of a receiver by the Circuit Court for the 18th Judicial Circuit did not constitute a termination of the contract between the parties. Generally, appointment of a receiver does not determine the rights of the parties. Rather, a receiver acts as an officer of the court, managing the property for the benefit of both parties. First Nat'l Bank of Vandalia v. Trail Ridge Farm, 143 Ill. App. 3d 244, 251, 97 Ill. Dec. 371, 492 N.E.2d 1030 \(5th Dist. 1986\); see also People ex rel. Scott v. Pintozzi, 50 Ill. 2d 115, 277 N.E.2d 844 \(1971\); In re marriage of Pick, 167 Ill. App. 3d 294, 299, 118 Ill. Dec. 53, 521 N.E.2d 121 \(2d Dist. 1988\) (purpose of receivership is to prevent injury and avoid injustice).

The decision to appoint a receiver lies within the discretion of the court. Asset Guar. Reinsurance Co. v. American Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Chicago, 254 Ill. App. 3d 713, 627 N.E.2d 179, 194 Ill. Dec. 63 \(Ill. App. 1st Dist. 1993\). State Oil's mere petition for a receiver could not have served as a termination of the agreement. Rather, it was the court's discretionary decision that placed Plaintiff's property in receivership. The court's appointment of a receiver was not a termination of the franchise agreement by State Oil.

1990); Thompson v. Kerr-McGee Refining Corp., 660 F.2d 1380 (10th Cir. 1981). However, these cases involve franchisees who were, unlike Khan, seeking injunctions against termination.

Nevertheless, Khan's argument is that the January 27 notice alone is enough to entitle him to damages. He contends that courts must not allow franchisors, like State Oil, to escape liability for harm caused by defective notices by later withdrawing those notices. Khan cites no authority for this proposition.

Furthermore, Khan does not allege that he was harmed by the January 27 notice. He alleges none of the injuries which PMPA plaintiffs in other cases have alleged. For example, as discussed above, he can not claim that an actual termination resulted from that notice. Also, because he did not bring a claim for injunctive relief, he cannot claim attorneys fees [\[12\]](#) for seeking an injunction like the plaintiffs in Winks and Lyons v. Mobil Oil Corp., 554 F. Supp. 199 (D. Conn. 1982). He does not claim resulting lost profits like the plaintiff in Lippo v. Mobil Oil Corp., 776 F.2d 706 (7th Cir. 1985). Indeed, Khan claims in Count II that the receiver increased revenue and profits while operating Khan's franchise after the time of the defective notice.

In essence, Khan's argument amounts to an assertion that the issuance of any defective notice is a per se violation of the PMPA entitling a franchisee to trial and damages. Neither case law nor the PMPA recognize a per se violation of the PMPA by franchisors entitling franchisees to recovery. This court is unwilling to create such a violation of the PMPA based on allegations of a defective notice. HN5 A mere defective notice, without more, does not form a sufficient basis for an action under the PMPA.⁴ Even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Khan, there is no genuine issue of material fact which would allow Count I (PMPA) to survive summary judgment.

[\[13\]](#) C. Antitrust

Both sides have moved for summary judgment on Count II.⁵ [\[14\]](#) Plaintiffs state that the pricing provisions in the Agreement (set-forth above) constituted vertical price-fixing, in that the Agreement prohibited [\[*1209\]](#) Plaintiffs from increasing income by raising or lowering State Oil's recommended retail price.⁶ Plaintiffs claim that, absent the Agreement's price constraints, Plaintiffs could have increased income by raising the price of premium grade gasoline and lowering the price of regular grades.

As proof of these assertions, Plaintiffs offer the report of Gustavo E. Bamberger ("Bamberger"). Plaintiffs aver that the receiver did not follow State Oil's recommended retail price and, therefore, that the receiver increased sales of gasoline. Plaintiffs also state that increased sales of gasoline would have resulted in a similar increase in ancillary sales.

⁴ The PMPA specifically provides that the court, rather than a jury, shall determine whether exemplary damages or attorney fees should be awarded. 15 U.S.C. § 2805(d)(2)-(3). No case or statute recognizes a mere defective notice, without alleged injury, as a violation entitling a plaintiff to fees or exemplary damages. Accordingly, Khan has set forth no facts which could give rise to such an award.

The courts . . . [have] . . . spawned an enormous body of interpretations and judgements without great uniformity or consistency. Almost any term in a contract that was alleged in one decisions to be . . . "anticompetitive," and thus illegal, has been found in another decision to be legal.

Armen A. Alchian & William R. Allen, Exchange and Production: Competition, Coordination & Control 272 (3d ed. 1983). The standards of summary judgment loom heavily in the face of this ambiguity. The court acknowledges the challenge of demonstrating a genuine issue of material fact under such circumstances.

In response, State Oil states that competition, rather than State Oil, prevented Plaintiffs from raising prices. State Oil notes that Plaintiffs were free to set any price they wished for the gasoline, although profits would be effected by setting a price different from the recommended price. State Oil also argues that Plaintiffs and their expert are merely speculating about the receiver's pricing method and success, and that any success that the receiver may have had is not an indicator [15] that Plaintiffs could have performed similarly. In addition, State Oil asserts that Plaintiffs' reasoning regarding the relationship between ancillary sales and gasoline sales is faulty.

Plaintiffs respond that State Oil's recommended prices were not competitive. Plaintiffs draw this conclusion from a series of documented phone calls, in which Khan called-in the pump prices of his competitors. For each of these phone calls, Khan's recommended prices were higher than his competition's. In response, State Oil claims that Khan only called-in prices when he wished to request a wholesale price-reduction, and that Khan's documented prices are not generally representative of the relationship between Khan's prices and those of his competition.

HN6[] Section One of the Sherman Act bans "every contract . . . in restraint of trade or commerce." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Section One determinations proceed under one of two methods: "per se" or "rule of reason" analysis. The court already ruled, on September 12, 1995 (Doc. # 73), that the alleged violation must be considered under "rule of reason," and not "per se," analysis. That is, the court will weigh all circumstances of the case when determining whether [16] the pricing provision is illegal for imposing an unreasonable restraint on trade. See Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 \(1977\).⁷

It is well-established that, HN8[] in order to prove an agreement in restraint of trade, a plaintiff must show that the defendant's conduct actually had an adverse effect on all of competition in a relevant market. The plaintiff has the burden of demonstrating the relevant geographic market. Nichols Motorcycle Supply Inc. v. Dunlop Tire Corp., 1995 U.S. Dist. Furthermore, Rule of Reason analysis includes the general requirement that antitrust plaintiffs establish that the defendants had market power. [Valley Liquor, 822 F.2d at 665 \(7th Cir. 1987\). That is, there must be a showing that defendants possessed the "power to raise prices significantly above the competitive level without losing all of one's business." Id.

Plaintiffs cannot meet their burden of showing an antitrust injury simply by alleging that they could have made more money by pricing products differently than they chose to. See Slowiak, 987 F.2d 1293 at 1297 at 1297-98. Instead, they must make some showing that the pricing [19] provision caused them to lose money by forcing them to set prices which were artificial. Slowiak 987 F.2d 1293 at 1297.

Courts must not trivialize the power of the Sherman Act by bestowing an aura of federal antitrust significance upon minor business disputes. HN9 Before receiving antitrust relief, plaintiffs must meet their burden of demonstrating the applicability of antitrust law to their dispute. Plaintiffs here have failed to demonstrate antitrust injury, harm to competition, a relevant market for analysis and market power. Accordingly, as a matter of law, Plaintiffs' allegations do not command the forces of the Sherman Act.

Plaintiffs have not even shown that they could prove that a difference in pricing would have increased their sales. Plaintiffs present the court with Bamberger's report as support for their allegations that the pricing provisions of the Agreement caused the loss of the Station. Bamberger concludes that Plaintiffs would have increased their gross dollar margin if they had not followed State Oil's recommended retail price. He bases this conclusion on the undocumented assumption that the receiver did not follow the pricing provisions of the Agreement. State [20] Oil denies that assumption. Bamberger states that the receiver showed an increase in profits and sales, which State Oil also denies. Bamberger's report also relies on a series of mathematical equations which rest on undocumented factual assumptions.

In addition, in drawing his conclusions, Bamberger notes, "The difference in . . . sales also may reflect, in part, changes in general economic conditions," although Bamberger states that he was able to isolate the effects of such changes from his calculations. (Rept. of Gustavo E. Bamberger at 3.) He states that he isolated these effects by "assuming that absent the change in pricing policy, gallon sales at Plaintiffs' former location would have changed by the same percentage amount as total gasoline sales" in all of DuPage County. [Rept. of Gustavo E. Bamberger at 4.] Bamberger's report makes no mention of why DuPage County is a relevant market for the analysis of Plaintiff's potential sales.

Moreover, Bamberger's report works on the unstated and unexplained assumption that five-months of the receiver's experience at a single station is a legitimate basis for analyzing Plaintiffs' experience at the same station prior to the receiver's [21] appointment. He assumes that the receiver operated the Station in the same manner and competitive conditions as Plaintiffs. As an example of how the receiver operated the Station in the same manner as Plaintiffs, Bamberger mentions only that the receiver and Plaintiffs followed the same hours of operation.

[*1211] In an antitrust trial, the court would not admit Bamberger's report as evidence of antitrust injury. The report turns entirely on the experience of one receiver who operated one gas station over a five-month period which occurred after the alleged antitrust violation. The court would expect an expert to also consider trustworthy data reflecting the experience of other, similarly situated stations in a demonstrably relevant market. Bamberger has not done so.

From the assumption that the receiver made money while not following the pricing provisions, Bamberger draws the conclusion that Plaintiffs lost money while following the pricing provisions because of those provisions. The receiver's experience is not a sufficient basis for proving antitrust damages simply because the receiver's experience followed Plaintiffs'. See Isaksen v. Vermont Castings, Inc., 825 F.2d 1158, 1165 \(7th Cir. 1987\) (when antitrust plaintiff attempted to prove lost profits by comparing profits for years before and after alleged unlawful activity, the court explained that post hoc ergo propter hoc is an invalid methodology for calculating damages, especially where other causal factors may have been at work); See also Schiller & Schmidt, Inc. v. Nordisco Corp., 969 F.2d 410, 415 \(7th Cir. 1992\).

Furthermore, HN10 antitrust plaintiffs have the burden of showing a violation by a party with market power, Valley Liquor, 822 F.2d at 665, and that the violation had a negative effect on competition in the entire relevant market, not just to an individual competitor. Tunis Bros. Co. Inc. v. Ford Motor Corp., 952 F.2d 715 (3d Cir. 1991); see also GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S. at 52. To hold otherwise would transform ordinary business disputes into antitrust claims. See Ball Memorial Hosp., Inc. v. Mutual Hosp. Ins., Inc., 784 F.2d 1325, 1338 (7th Cir. 1986). In the instant case, Plaintiffs have not even attempted to demonstrate that State Oil had market power, or to demonstrate the effect of the pricing provisions on competition in a relevant market. Plaintiffs have, at most, shown [23] a contractual injury to single competitor in an undefined market.

Bamberger's report does not even demonstrate that Plaintiffs would not have suffered but for the alleged antitrust violation, much less that the injury was of the sort of harm that antitrust laws were intended to prohibit. See Jack Walters & Sons Corp. v. Morton Bldg., Inc., 737 F.2d 698, 707 (7th Cir. 1984) (holding that, even if a manufacturer engaged in price-fixing, its dealer, alleging only its own lost sales, could not bring an action for antitrust damages because antitrust laws were intended to prohibit damage to market competition rather than in individual business relationships). Thus, Plaintiffs have not submitted evidence of an antitrust injury.

Accordingly, Plaintiffs fail to meet the standing requirements of Sherman Act and lack antitrust standing. As a matter of law, considering all facts in favor of Plaintiffs, there is no genuine issue of material fact for trial.

D. State Law Contract

Finally, Khan argues that State Oil breached a covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which arose from the Agreement, because Khan was unable to change gasoline prices at will while State Oil did not set its [24] prices fairly to allow Khan to make a profit. Khan states that State Oil's wholesale gasoline prices were not competitive, in violation of the covenant of good faith.

For purposes of this motion, State Oil concedes that it did have an obligation under the Agreement to set a competitive recommended pump price. Therefore, State Oil agrees with Khan that State Oil would be in violation of that obligation if it set a recommended pump price (which was linked to the wholesale price) which was too high to be competitive. However, State Oil notes that, a low, and thus competitive, recommended pump price (linked to a low wholesale price) would not be in violation of its obligation. The court agrees. See Atlantic Richfield, 495 U.S. 328, 339, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (low, non-predatory, prices are not anti-competitive). Khan can therefore only recover for breach of the covenant if he can present facts indicating that State's prices were too high to be competitive.

State Oil argues that Khan has presented no such facts. State Oil asserts that Bamberger's [*1212] report consists of mere speculation, without supporting economic analysis.

Khan asserts that he need not establish that State Oil's prices were too high. Rather, [25] he believes that he need only prove that State Oil breached its covenant of good faith. According to Khan,

[The breach] . . . is amply shown by the fact that the Agreement itself is per se illegal under . . . the Sherman Act. The Agreement was thus void ab initio, and it necessarily follows that State Oil, by drafting, entering into, and enforcing the illegal pricing provisions, breached its covenant of good faith to Khan.

(Pls.' Mem.' in Opp. to Summ. J. at 20.) In sum, Khan argues that State Oil is liable for a breach of a void, unenforceable covenant.

In addition to this circular argument, Khan proceeds to defend Bamberger's report, arguing that it does demonstrate the anti-competitive nature of State's Oil's pricing scheme. As discussed above, the court finds that the report rests on undocumented and unexplained assumptions which fail to demonstrate any anti-competitive injury. Consequently, Khan has offered no facts to support his legal conclusion that State Oil set its prices at anti-competitive levels. Khan has raised no genuine issue of material fact as to a breach of a covenant of good faith and fair dealing.

III. CONCLUSION

Accordingly, Defendant's [26] motion for summary judgment is granted as to Counts I, II, and IV and Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment as to Count II is denied. Defendant's motion to strike the expert report, its motion to bar, and its motion in limine are denied as moot.

The appellate court reviews a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(6\) dismissal de novo. All allegations of material fact are taken as true and construed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. A complaint should not be dismissed unless it appears beyond doubt that plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.

The fact that an antitrust counterclaim for damages might have been asserted in the prior suit does not mean that the failure to do so renders the prior judgment res judicata as respects it. A claim that patent infringement litigation violated an antitrust statute is a permissive, not a mandatory, counterclaim in a patent infringement case, and is not barred in a subsequent suit by failure to raise it in the infringement suit.

Appeals from patent infringement decisions now go to the Federal Circuit, but appeals from antitrust decisions go to the regional circuit in which the district court sits. If the antitrust counterclaim were treated as compulsory, then any appeal of the antitrust decision would go to the Federal Circuit, not the regional circuit. This may generate a difference between the antitrust law generally applicable within each regional circuit, and antitrust law in predatory patent infringement cases. That Congress has provided for regional courts of appeals to decide antitrust appeals, and for the federal circuit to decide patent appeals, suggests that Congress perceived a distinction between the kinds of facts giving rise to one or the other.

If an appellate court reverses and vacates a judgment, the party which prevails on appeal is generally not bound by adverse trial court rulings on other issues. Unless a lawsuit is objectively baseless, whether an antitrust defendant was indifferent to the outcome on the merits of the suit, or had decided to sue primarily for the benefit of collateral injuries inflicted through the use of legal process is immaterial.

"Probable cause" to institute legal proceedings, in the sense in which the phrase is used in tort suits for malicious prosecution of civil claims, establishes that the litigation is not "objectively baseless." At common law, a reversed judgment for the plaintiff in the first action usually is not conclusive as to probable cause in the malicious prosecution action, where the judgment was obtained by fraud.

If a patent was obtained by intentional fraud, and not merely "technical fraud," then a reversed judgment based upon that fraud, where the plaintiff obtained the patent by intentional fraud or was an assignee who knew of the patent's infirmity, would not demonstrate probable cause for a patent infringement suit.

KLEINFELD, Circuit Judge:

We must decide whether an antitrust claim is a compulsory counterclaim in a prior patent infringement suit. We conclude that it is not, and reverse the district court's dismissal of the complaint.

I. Facts.

Under the Saline Water Conversion Act of 1971, the government was to contract for water desalination research. Title to any inventions resulting from the research was to vest in the United States, and any patents were to be issued to the United States, in order to make discoveries available to the general [2] public. FilmTec v. Hydranautics, 982 F.2d 1546, 1547-48 (Fed. Cir. 1992). The government would pay scientists to do research, and the benefits were to go to the general public, not just to the researchers.

A scientist named John Cadotte was employed by a nonprofit institution to perform desalination research under a research contract with the government made pursuant to the Saline Water Conversion Act. Id. at 1548. While so employed, he conceived of three new types of membranes for reverse osmosis desalination. Id. at 1548-49. The nonprofit research institution did not report Mr. Cadotte's findings to the government. Id. Mr. Cadotte and others at the nonprofit formed a for-profit corporation, FilmTec, and left the nonprofit. Id. Mr. Cadotte then essentially duplicated at his new for-profit corporation the experiments he had carried out at the nonprofit, with a slight refinement. He obtained a patent, assigned to FilmTec, on the reverse osmosis membranes so developed. Id.

Hydranautics subsequently began manufacturing similar membranes. FilmTec sued [*535] Hydranautics for patent infringement, and won in district court. Id. The district court held that FilmTec's [3] patent was valid, and [1775] that Hydranautics had willfully infringed it. Id. The district court issued a permanent injunction for the statutory term of FilmTec's patent prohibiting Hydranautics from making or selling the patented films.

* The Honorable Samuel P. King, Senior United States District Judge, for the District of Hawaii, sitting by designation.

The Federal Circuit reversed. Id. at 1550-54. The basis for the reversal was that the 1971 Saline Water Conversion Act required that any "patents . . . resulting from such research developed by Government expenditure will . . . be available to the general public." Id. at 1550 (alteration in original)(quoting Saline Water Conversion Act of 1971, Pub.L. No. 92-60, 85 Stat. 159 (1971)). The Federal Circuit held that "Congress intended that inventions made under the Contract be available to the 'general public,' of which Hydranautics is a member." Id. at 1551. The Federal Circuit concluded as a matter of law that the patented invention was conceived while Mr. Cadotte was employed on the government research contract at the nonprofit research institution. Id. at 1551-54.

Mr. Cadotte had testified that he was not particularly encouraged by his November experiments, while he was at the nonprofit, and did not even remember them when he reacted [4] the same substances in the same manner, in the same proportions, for the same amount of time, but with a reduced drying temperature, three months later, in February. Id. at 1553. The Federal Circuit did not reach the question of fact regarding intentional fraud, "difficult as it is for us to understand how February experiments on the same compositions were not a direct sequel to the experiments three months earlier." Id. Review of this factual determination was not necessary to the holding, because "when the invention was conceived by Mr. Cadotte, title to that invention immediately vested in the United States by operation of law." Id. at 1553.

After winning a reversal of the patent infringement judgment, Hydranautics sued FilmTec in a separate lawsuit in district court, for antitrust violations. The complaint in this second lawsuit is the one before us. It was filed under the Clayton and Sherman Acts, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15, 26 and 15 U.S.C. § 2, alleging that FilmTec had engaged in "predatory" patent litigation. The district court dismissed it as failing to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12\(b\)\(6\).

The complaint, filed [5] in March of 1993, alleges that until September 1991, Hydranautics made reverse osmosis membranes of the patented type, but from the time the permanent injunction in the infringement suit issued, in September 1991, until the mandate was spread from the Federal Circuit decision in April 1993, it had been prevented from doing so. Another company, Allied-Signal, had also made such membranes, and had been enjoined from continuing to do so in 1990. FilmTec had sued Allied-Signal as well as Hydranautics for infringement. FilmTec, 982 F.2d at 1549 & n.2.

Hydranautics' complaint alleges that FilmTec engaged in predatory acts. The alleged predatory acts were that: (1) FilmTec had applied for a patent on the reverse osmosis membrane when it knew that the United States owned the patent; (2) FilmTec falsely told the government that the invention had first been conceived after Mr. Cadotte left the non-profit and joined FilmTec; (3) FilmTec sued Hydranautics for patent infringement, and obtained injunctions to drive it out of the reverse osmosis membrane market, in bad faith, without any reasonable belief that it owned the patent.

The district court dismissed Hydranautics' complaint, holding [6] that it was barred because it should have been raised as a compulsory counterclaim in the patent infringement action.

II. Analysis.

HN1 [↑] We review a 12(b)(6) dismissal de novo. Everest and Jennings v. American Motorists Ins. Co., 23 F.3d 226, 228 \(9th Cir. 1994\). All allegations of material fact are taken as true and construed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Id. at 229. A complaint should not be dismissed unless it appears beyond doubt that plaintiff [536] can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief. Id.

A. Compulsory Counterclaim

It was permissible for Hydranautics to delay suing FilmTec for predatory patent litigation until it had succeeded in defeating the infringement case. The Supreme Court in Mercoid Corp. v. Mid-Continent Investment Co., 320 U.S. 661, 88 L. Ed. 376, 64 S. Ct. 268 \(1944\), said that "the HN2 [↑] fact that [an antitrust counterclaim for damages] might have been asserted . . . in the prior suit . . . does not mean that the failure to do so renders the prior judgment

70 F.3d 533, *536 1995 U.S. App. LEXIS 31981, 6 36 U.S.P.Q.2D (BNA) 1773, 1775

res judicata as respects it." Mercoid, 320 U.S. at 671. A claim that patent infringement litigation violated an antitrust statute is a permissive, [\[7\]](#) not a mandatory, counterclaim in a patent infringement case, and is not barred in a subsequent suit by failure to raise it in the infringement suit. See Id. at 669-71. [\[1776\]](#)

HN3 An answer must state as a counterclaim a claim which "arises out of the same transaction or occurrence" as the plaintiff's claim:

(a) Compulsory counterclaims. A pleading shall state as a counterclaim any claim which at the time of serving the pleading the pleader has against any opposing party, if it arises out of the same transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party's claim

(b) Permissive counterclaims. A pleading may state as a counterclaim any claim against an opposing party not arising out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party's claim.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 13. HN4 If a party has a counterclaim which is compulsory and fails to plead it, it is lost, and cannot be asserted in a second, separate action after conclusion of the first. Seattle Totems Hockey Club, Inc. v. National Hockey League, 652 F.2d 852, 854 \(9th Cir. 1981\).

HN5 We determine whether a claim arises out of the same transaction or occurrence by analyzing [\[8\]](#) "whether the essential facts of the various claims are so logically connected that considerations of judicial economy and fairness dictate that all the issues be resolved in one lawsuit." Pochiro v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America, 827 F.2d 1246, 1249 \(9th Cir. 1987\)(quoting Harris v. Steinem, 571 F.2d 119, 123 \(2d Cir. 1978\)).

While there may be cases where resolving both issues at once is preferable, Mercoid leaves open the possibility of raising antitrust claims as permissive counterclaims in an infringement action, or in a separate and subsequent action.

In many cases even if the antitrust counterclaim were asserted by counterclaim, the court would sever the issues and resolve the infringement case first. The evidence for patent infringement and antitrust damages may differ considerably, depending on the particulars of the case. If the plaintiff wins the patent infringement suit, then the antitrust counterclaim may ordinarily be disposed of expeditiously on motion, instead of by a time consuming and expensive trial.

The distinctiveness between the facts giving rise to the patent and those giving rise to the antitrust claims is suggested by the different appellate [\[9\]](#) paths Congress has provided for those two kinds of claims. HN6 Appeals from patent infringement decisions now go to the Federal Circuit, but appeals from antitrust decisions go to the regional circuit in which the district court sits. See 28 U.S.C.S. §§ 1291-1295; 15 U.S.C.S. § 15\(a\). If the antitrust counterclaim were treated as compulsory, then any appeal of the antitrust decision would go to the Federal Circuit, not the regional circuit. This may generate a difference between the antitrust law generally applicable within each regional circuit, and antitrust law in predatory patent infringement cases. That Congress has provided for regional courts of appeals to decide antitrust appeals, and for the federal circuit to decide patent appeals, suggests that Congress perceived a distinction between the kinds of facts giving rise to one or the other.

The antitrust claim attacks the patent infringement lawsuit itself as the wrong which furnishes the basis for antitrust damages. This is somewhat analogous to a civil claim for malicious prosecution. It is usually held [\[*537\]](#) that HN7 a malicious prosecution claim cannot be asserted as a counterclaim to the original suit which furnishes its predicate. [\[10\]](#) 1 Harper, James & Gray, The Law of Torts § 4.8 (2d ed. 1986). Mercoid is consistent with this approach, and we see no reason to distinguish Mercoid from the case at bar.

In this case, Hydranautics claims that FilmTec was not entitled to a patent, fraudulently obtained one, and used it to run competition out of the market. The issue of whether FilmTec owned the patent was resolved in the infringement case, and is logically a part of both cases. That identity of issues, by itself, suggests compulsory counterclaim classification.

But there was not much point in litigating Hydranautics' antitrust claims until FilmTec's infringement case was resolved. The Federal Circuit held that the government owned the patent on the reverse osmosis membrane, not FilmTec, because Mr. Cadotte had conceived the invention while working for the non-profit on the government contract. Thus the patent infringement judgment was vacated on the ground that FilmTec did not own the patent, without a determination whether FilmTec had fraudulently obtained the patent. Because the Federal Circuit did not decide whether FilmTec obtained its patent fraudulently, the district court will now begin the antitrust [11] case with a blank slate on the fraud issue. HN8[] If an appellate court reverses and vacates a judgment, the party which prevails on appeal is generally not bound by adverse trial court rulings on other issues. United States v. Cheung Kin Ping, 555 F.2d 1069, 1077 \(2d Cir. 1977\). This difference in which facts control shows why there may be a significant difference, and there is a significant difference in this case, between the facts which control the patent infringement claim and the facts which control the antitrust claim.

B. Noerr-Pennington Immunity [1777]

Both parties agree that we may also affirm the dismissal of Hydranautics' complaint if we conclude that FilmTec is immune from this antitrust action under the rationale of Eastern R.R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 \(1961\). Accord United Mine Workers of America v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 \(1965\). In Noerr, the Supreme Court held that HN9[] no violation of the Sherman Act may be predicated upon the defendant's attempts to influence the passage or enforcement of laws. Noerr, 365 U.S. at 135. That principle was expanded to include access to courts and administrative agencies in California [12] Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 510-11, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609 \(1972\).

FilmTec claims that it is immunized from an antitrust lawsuit by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. Hydranautics disagrees. The district court did not reach this issue, but FilmTec urges us to affirm the district court dismissal on this ground, on the theory that if the issue of Noerr-Pennington immunity had been reached, it would have to have been decided on the pleadings in favor of FilmTec. We conclude that this disagreement could not properly be resolved against Hydranautics on the basis of the pleadings. The outcome will depend on evidence. We therefore cannot affirm on this ground.

Application of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine to antitrust claims has recently been clarified by Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., 123 L. Ed. 2d 611, 113 S. Ct. 1920 \(1993\) and our application of that decision in Liberty Lake Investments, Inc. v. Magnuson, 12 F.3d 155 \(9th Cir. 1993\). Columbia Pictures holds that HN10[] litigation cannot be deprived of its antitrust immunity as a sham unless it is objectively baseless, regardless of whether the subjective intent of the litigation is to interfere [13] with competition. "Unless a lawsuit is objectively baseless, whether an antitrust defendant 'was indifferent to the outcome on the merits' of the suit, or 'had decided to sue primarily for the benefit of collateral injuries inflicted through the use of legal process' is immaterial." Liberty Lake, 12 F.3d at 159.

FilmTec's theory is that its patent infringement lawsuit could not have been "objectively baseless," because FilmTec won in district court. FilmTec argues that its initial victory requires dismissal of antitrust claims [*538] based upon FilmTec's ultimately unsuccessful patent infringement lawsuits, regardless of whether it obtained the patents fraudulently. The holdings in Columbia Pictures and Liberty Lake leave open the question of whether an infringement action based on a fraudulently obtained patent is "objectively baseless." Footnote six in Columbia Pictures says the court does "not decide here whether, and, if so, to what extent Noerr permits the imposition of antitrust liability for a litigant's fraud or other misrepresentations." 113 S. Ct. at 1929, n.6.

Columbia Pictures cites [Walker Process Equip., Inc. v. Food Machinery and Chem. Corp., 382 U.S. \[14\] 172, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247, 86 S. Ct. 347 \(1965\)](#) in footnote 6. In Walker Process, the Court held that proof of the claim that the patent holder obtained its patent by knowingly and willfully misrepresenting facts to the Patent Office "would be sufficient to strip [the patent holder] of its exemption from the antitrust laws." Walker Process, 382 U.S. at 177. It further held that "enforcement of a patent procured by fraud on the Patent Office may be violative" of the Sherman Act and subject the defendant to treble damages under the Clayton Act. Id. at 174. See also California Motor Transport, 404 U.S. at 513-14 ("Use of a patent obtained by fraud to exclude a competitor from the market may involve a violation of the antitrust laws . . .").

We said in dictum in Liberty Lake that "in HN11[] a case involving a fraudulently obtained patent, that which immunized the predatory behavior from antitrust liability (the patent) is, in effect, a nullity because of the underlying fraud." Liberty Lake, 12 F.3d at 159. We now are faced with deciding whether the dictum in Liberty Lake is good law, and we conclude that it is, at least where the fraud is intentional, not "technical fraud." See Justice Harlan's [15] concurrence in Walker Process, 382 U.S. at 179, cited in footnote 6 of Columbia Pictures.

Columbia Pictures explains that HN12[] "probable cause" to institute legal proceedings, in the sense in which the phrase is used in tort suits for malicious prosecution of civil claims, establishes that the litigation is not "objectively baseless." At common law, a reversed judgment for the plaintiff in the first action usually is not conclusive as to probable cause in the malicious prosecution action, where the judgment was obtained by fraud. See 1 Harper, James & Gray, The Law of Torts § 4.8 (2d ed. 1986); W. Page Keeton et al., Prosser & Keeton on Torts 894 (5th ed. 1984). HN13[] If the patent was obtained by "intentional fraud," and not merely "technical fraud," see Walker Process, 382 U.S. at 176, 179, then a reversed judgment based upon that fraud, where the plaintiff obtained the patent by intentional fraud or was an assignee who knew of the patent's infirmity, [1778] would not demonstrate probable cause for a patent infringement suit. See Walker Process, 382 U.S. at 177.¹

[16] Hydranautics asserts facts in its complaint that, if true, would prove that FilmTec obtained its patent by fraud. Its complaint [*539] therefore cannot be dismissed short of summary judgment or trial.

REVERSED and REMANDED.

End of Document

¹ While we were considering this opinion, we learned that the Federal Circuit decided a parallel case, FilmTec Corp. v. Hydranautics, 67 F.3d 931, 1995 U.S. App. LEXIS 28215, 1995 WL 599982, (Fed. Cir. 1995) (petition for rehearing pending). In that case, the district court had denied Hydranautics' motion for leave to amend its answer to the patent infringement case to assert an antitrust counterclaim, because the motion came too late. The case had gone through judgment, appeal, and spreading of the appellate mandate, before the motion to amend was filed. The Federal Circuit held that the delay was excusable, because until Hydranautics defeated the patent claim, it had good reason not to file the antitrust claim. The Federal Circuit nevertheless affirmed the denial of leave to amend, because the antitrust claim would have been futile under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine.

We do not decide whether the case at bar is distinguishable, on the ground that FilmTec's alleged fraud would render FilmTec's patent infringement claim objectively baseless. The Federal Circuit held that as a matter of law, FilmTec's case was not objectively baseless, but said "there is no dispute over the facts." In the procedural posture of the case before us, it would not be correct to say that there is no dispute as to the facts. Hydranautics alleges fraud, and FilmTec denies it. We must assume for the purposes of Rule 12\(b\)\(6\) that Hydranautics could prove that FilmTec obtained the patent fraudulently. Nor do we decide whether the issue of objective baselessness is res judicata, on account of the Federal Circuit case. These questions should, if raised on remand, be decided in the first instance by the district court.

In determining whether to grant a preliminary injunction, the court must consider: (1) whether, absent the injunction, the moving party would suffer irreparable injury; (2) whether the moving party has demonstrated a substantial likelihood of success on the merits; (3) whether the injunction would have a harmful effect on third parties; and (4) whether the public interest would be served by the injunction.

In order to obtain a preliminary injunction, the harm that would result in the absence of the injunction must be irreparable, not merely substantial. Irreparable injury must include more than a determinable monetary loss. The possibility that adequate relief will be available at a later point in the litigation weighs heavily against a claim of irreparable harm.

HN4 [down arrow] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

The court's function for purposes of summary judgment is not to weigh evidence and determine truth of the matter, but to determine whether there is a genuine issue as to any material fact and whether moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. The moving party has initial burden of showing absence of genuine issue of material fact as to an essential element of non-movant's case. If moving party meets this burden, then non-moving party must set forth specific facts showing there is a genuine issue for trial. The evidence of nonmovant is to be believed and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor. There is no genuine issue for trial unless there is sufficient evidence favoring the nonmoving party for a jury to return a verdict for that party. Conclusory allegations, however, are not sufficient to defeat a motion for summary judgment.

HN5 [down arrow] Noerr-Pennington Doctrine, Right to Petition Immunity

The Noerr-Pennington doctrine holds that business interests may combine and lobby to influence the various branches of the government or administrative agencies without violating the antitrust laws since such activities are protected by U.S. Const. amend. I right to petition the government for redress of grievances. Thus, a cause of action under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 and § 2, cannot arise from conduct by a competitor to lawfully influence government decision-making.

Constitutional Law > Bill of Rights > Fundamental Freedoms > General Overview

HN6 [down] Bill of Rights, Fundamental Freedoms

The right to petition authorities to take official action is generally protected regardless of the motives of the petitioners. This is true even where the petitioning activity has the intent or effect of depriving another of property interests. The right to petition the government for redress of grievances includes the right to seek relief from the courts.

HN7 [down] Noerr-Pennington Doctrine, Sham Exception

There is no right under U.S. Const. amend. I to pursue baseless litigation. A pattern of baseless, repetitive claims may establish the sham nature of the petitioning activity and result in the loss of any privilege under U.S. Const. amend. I.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Civil Procedure > Sanctions > Baseless Filings > General Overview

HN8 [down] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Litigation is "sham" if it satisfies a two-part test. First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. If an objective litigant could conclude that the suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, an antitrust claim premised on the sham exception must fail. The existence of probable cause to institute legal proceedings precludes a finding that the litigation was sham. Only if the challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation. Evidence of anticompetitive intent or purpose alone cannot transform otherwise legitimate petitioning activity into a sham.

HN10 [L] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The Noerr-Pennington doctrine is not limited in application to antitrust claims. The doctrine is grounded on the First Amendment principle that an individual or entity has the right to pursue legitimate efforts to influence government decision-making and to approach the courts in order to obtain redress of grievances. This principle applies whether those efforts are challenged under federal antitrust law or under state law.

This matter is before the Court upon the following motions: (1) Defendant and Counterclaimant Scioto Water, Inc.'s [2] (SWI) Application for Preliminary Injunction, Permanent Injunction, and Declaratory Judgment (Doc. no. 36), Plaintiff Scioto County Regional Water District No. 1, Authority's (Water 1) opposing memorandum and motion for summary judgment (Doc. no. 49), SWI's reply memorandum and memorandum in opposition to Water 1's motion for summary judgment (Doc. no. 54)¹, and Water 1's reply in support of its motion for summary judgment (Doc. no. 73); (2) Rural Economic and Community Development Service's (RECDS) Motion for a More Definite Statement and Counterclaim² (Doc. no. 42); (3) Water 1's Motion for a More Definite Statement pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(e), Alternatively, Motion to Strike Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f) (Doc. no. 46); and (4) SWI's Motion to Strike and Motion for Leave to Supplement Memoranda in Response to Water 1's Reply (Doc. no. 74).

[3] I. RECDS's Motion for a More Definite Statement

RECDS moves the Court to strike SWI's cross-claim for indemnification. Because the Court has dismissed all of Water 1's claims against SWI, RECDS's motion is DENIED as moot.

II. SWI's Motion to Strike

SWI moves the Court to strike Water 1's reply memorandum in support of its motion for summary judgment. SWI contends that the reply violates the federal rules because it raises new issues, cites additional case law, and exceeds the scope of a proper reply. In the event the Court declines to strike the reply, SWI requests leave to respond to the new issues raised in the reply.

The reply brief submitted by Water 1 addresses many of the same issues raised in its motion for summary judgment. Although Water 1 has raised a new issue in its reply regarding the applicability of the Parker Governmental Immunity Doctrine, the Court deems it unnecessary to address that issue in order to rule on the summary judgment motion. Because the reply brief does not otherwise exceed the scope of the issues raised in Water 1's motion for summary judgment, the motion to strike is hereby DENIED. Further, because the Court will consider only those issues [4] which the parties have had an opportunity to address, SWI's request for leave to respond to new issues raised in the reply is DENIED.

III. Water 1's Motion to Strike SWI's Response

Water 1 moves the Court to strike SWI's response to its motion for summary [*697] judgment as untimely. Water 1 filed its response to SWI's application for injunctive and declaratory relief and its motion for summary judgment on July 10, 1995. On July 18, 1995, SWI filed a reply memorandum in support of its application for injunctive and declaratory relief. On August 23, 1995, SWI moved the Court to treat the reply memorandum as its response to Water 1's motion for summary judgment. The Court granted SWI's request on September 7, 1995. Nonetheless, Water 1 claims that the Court should not consider the response because it is untimely and SWI has not demonstrated excusable neglect for the delay. Water 1 claims that the Court should consider its claims to be undisputed in light of SWI's failure to file a timely response and should grant summary judgment in Water 1's favor.

The Court declines to strike SWI'S response. SWI responded to Water 1's opposing memorandum in a timely manner, but captioned it only as [5] a reply memorandum in support of its application for injunctive and declaratory relief rather than as both a reply memorandum and a memorandum in opposition to Water 1's motion for summary judgment. SWI's omission does not warrant treating Water 1's claims as undisputed and granting summary judgment in Water 1's favor. Accordingly, Water 1's request to strike SWI's response to its motion for summary judgment is DENIED.

IV. Motion for a More Definite Statement

¹The Court granted SWI's request that its reply memorandum be treated as its response to Water 1's motion for summary judgment by Order dated September 7, 1995 (Doc. no. 70).

²The "counterclaim" is actually a cross-claim against Defendant SWI.

Water 1 moves the Court to require SWI to provide a more definite statement of its counterclaims. In support of its motion, Water 1 alleges that the actions which SWI challenges as violative of 7 U.S.C. § 1926(b) are privileged and protected methods of seeking redress.³ Water 1 further contends that SWI has not alleged any facts which give Water 1 adequate notice as to the basis of its alleged liability for the Sherman Act violations asserted in Count II.

[6] Count I provides adequate notice of SWI's claims under § 1926(b) and the basis for them. Water 1's contention that its actions are privileged and cannot give rise to a claim under § 1926(b) goes to the merits of SWI's claims and is not an appropriate basis for striking same.

As to Count II, the Court agrees that SWI has failed to give Water 1 adequate notice of the basis for its claims under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 and § 2. Count II simply incorporates the allegations of the complaint and states that Water 1 "has engaged in anti-competitive and monopolistic conduct in direct violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1 and § 2." However, because the Court finds as a matter of law that SWI cannot establish a Sherman Act violation, to require SWI to provide a more definite statement of its claims would be futile.⁴ Accordingly, Water 1's motion for a more definite statement is DENIED. The Court will dispose of the claims on their merits.

V. SWI's Application for Injunctive and [7] Declaratory Relief

Defendant/Counterclaimant SWI moves for injunctive and declaratory relief on two grounds. First, SWI claims that Water 1 has violated 7 U.S.C. § 1926(b) by filing the complaint and the applications for a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction. Second, SWI contends that Water 1 has violated § 1926(b) by extending its transmission lines and expanding its service into SWI's service area. SWI asserts that Water 1 has consequently impaired its ability to repay its existing FmHA indebtedness. SWI further alleges that Water 1 has acted to interfere with SWI's construction of its own wellfield and water treatment plant by corresponding with FmHA officials, state clearing house officials, township trustees, other governmental agencies, state and federal legislators, and the EPA, and by filing appeals to the EPA, Ohio Valley Regional Development Commission, Environmental Board of Review, and the Franklin County, Ohio, Court of Appeals. SWI claims that [*698] Water 1 has acted with the intent to impair SWI's ability to serve its customers and to reduce its water rates for current customers and projected future customers.

SWI further asserts that Water 1 has [8] engaged in anti-competitive and monopolistic conduct in direct violation of 15 U.S.C. § 1 and § 2. SWI also claims that Water 1 has maliciously and tortiously interfered with the contractual relationship between SWI and the FmHA. In support of the latter claim, SWI contends that Water 1 has directed correspondence to various agencies, including the United States Department of Agriculture, seeking the withholding of committed funds for SWI's construction project.

SWI seeks a declaration that it is indebted to the FmHA; that it is entitled to the protections afforded under § 1926(b); and that it has the right to provide water service to new customers which are not currently served by any other water entity and which are included within the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) and Ohio Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) plans for Phase I and Phase II of SWI's water distribution project. SWI also requests an injunction enjoining Water 1 from interfering with the operation of the wellfield and treatment plant constructed by SWI, from interfering with any contract between SWI and FmHA, and from providing water outside of Water 1's court-created water district.⁵ Finally, SWI seeks [9] an order requiring Water 1 to transfer its transmission lines and properties located within the Townships of Porter, Vernon and Blume in Scioto County, Ohio, to SWI since such lines lie outside of Water 1's court-created water district.

³ HN1 [↑] Section 1926(b) states, in pertinent part, that the service provided by a water facility "shall not be curtailed or limited by inclusion of the area served by such association within the boundaries of any municipal corporation or other public body, or by the granting of any private franchise for similar service within such area during the term of such loan . . .

A. Preliminary Injunction

SWI claims that the requirements for a preliminary injunction are satisfied in that Water has clearly violated § 1926\(b\), SWI has demonstrated its likelihood of success on the merits, SWI will suffer irreparable harm if an injunction is not granted, other remedies are inadequate, and no harm will result to third parties if a preliminary injunction is issued since SWI does not serve, and does not intend to serve, current customers of Water 1.

HN2 [↑] In determining whether to grant a [10] preliminary injunction, the court must consider: (1) whether, absent the injunction, the moving party would suffer irreparable injury; (2) whether the moving party has demonstrated a substantial likelihood of success on the merits; (3) whether the injunction would have a harmful effect on third parties; and (4) whether the public interest would be served by the injunction. USACO Coal Company v. Carboomin Energy, Inc., 689 F.2d 94, 98 \(6th Cir. 1982\); Friendship Materials, Inc. v. Michigan Brick, Inc., 679 F.2d 100, 102 \(6th Cir. 1982\).

HN3 [↑] In order to obtain a preliminary injunction, the harm that would result in the absence of the injunction must be irreparable, not merely substantial. Sampson v. Murray, 415 U.S. 61, 39 L. Ed. 2d 166, 94 S. Ct. 937 \(1974\). Irreparable injury must include more than a determinable monetary loss. Id. The possibility that adequate relief will be available at a later point in the litigation weighs heavily against a claim of irreparable harm. Id. at 90 (citation omitted).

SWI has failed to demonstrate that it will suffer irreparable harm if a preliminary injunction is not granted. SWI alleges only that it will be irreparably harmed if it [11] is enjoined from completing Phase II of its project, in which event it will be unable to pay its indebtedness to the FmHA on the completed Phase I of the project, i.e., construction of the wellfield and water treatment plant, which will in turn lead to SWI's financial ruin. However, the Court has denied Water 1's request for injunctive relief and has dismissed all of Water 1's claims against SWI. Accordingly, SWI is in no danger of having this Court issue an injunction against it.

Furthermore, SWI has not demonstrated a substantial likelihood of success on the merits of the sole claim on which the Court finds that it is entitled to proceed, i.e., that Water [*699] 1 has violated § 1926\(b\) by extending its lines into, and serving customers within, SWI's service area. Although SWI is clearly an indebted association under § 1926\(b\) and is entitled to the protections afforded by the statute, the Court is unable to conclude at this point that there is a substantial likelihood that SWI will ultimately prevail on its claim that Water 1 has infringed its rights under the statute.⁶

[12] Finally, it appears that water customers in the disputed areas will be served by one of the parties whether or not an injunction is issued. Therefore, although third parties would not be harmed by issuance of an injunction, neither would the public interest be served thereby. For these reasons, SWI's request for a preliminary injunction is hereby DENIED.

B. Water 1's Motion for Summary Judgment

1 . Standard of Review

HN4 [↑] The summary judgment procedure under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 is designed to secure a just, speedy and inexpensive determination of any action. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 327, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265, 106 S. Ct. 2548 \(1986\). The court's function is not to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter, but to determine whether there is a "genuine issue as to any material fact and [whether] the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56\(c\). The moving party has the initial burden of showing the absence of a genuine issue of material fact as to an essential element of the non-movant's case. Celotex, 477 U.S. at 321; Guarino v. Brookfield Township Trustees, 980 F.2d 399, 405 (6th Cir. 1992); Street v. I131 J.C. Bradford & Co., 886 F.2d 1472, 1479 (6th Cir. 1989). If the moving party meets this burden, then the non-moving party "must set forth specific facts showing there is a genuine issue for trial." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e); Guarino, 980 F.2d at 405. The evidence of the nonmovant is to be believed and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. 242, 255, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 106 S. Ct. 2505 (1986) (citing Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 158, 26 L. Ed. 2d 142, 90 S. Ct. 1598 (1970)). There is no genuine issue for trial unless there is sufficient evidence favoring the nonmoving party for a jury to return a verdict for that party. Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248. Conclusory allegations, however, are not sufficient to defeat a motion for summary judgment. McDonald v. Union Camp. Corp., 898 F.2d 1155, 1162 (6th Cir. 1990).

SWI claims that Water 1 has instituted legal and other proceedings in violation of § 1926(b) in order to halt completion of SWI's water project. Water 1 does not dispute the fact that it has sought administrative, legislative and judicial remedies for the purpose of halting SWI's [14] project. However, Water 1 claims that its actions are lawful and are constitutionally protected under the First Amendment to the United States Constitution, which guarantees the right to petition the government for a redress of grievances. Water 1 contends that because its actions are protected under the First Amendment, it is entitled to summary judgment on SWI's claim that it has violated § 1926(b) by seeking redress from courts and governmental agencies.

Water 1 is entitled to summary judgment on SWI's claim that it has violated § 1926(b) by petitioning administrative and judicial bodies for legal redress. Although the cases cited by SWI in support of its claim set forth the principle that § 1926(b) prohibits the curtailment of water services provided by an association indebted to the FmHA during the term of such indebtedness, none of these cases support the proposition that the institution of administrative or legal proceedings by a competing water association can constitute curtailment of water services in violation of § 1926(b). See *City of Madison v. Bear Creek Water Ass'n., 816 F.2d 1057 (5th Cir. I*700 1987); Jennings Water, Inc. v. City of North Vernon, 895 F.2d 311 I151 (7th Cir. 1989); CSL Utilities v. Jennings Water, Inc., 807 F. Supp. 490 (S.D. Ind. 1992); Glenpool Utility Services v. Water Dist. No. 2, 861 F.2d 1211 (10th Cir. 1988)*. The Court is unaware of any authorities which suggest that one's First Amendment right to petition the courts for redress of grievances is circumscribed to any extent by § 1926(b). In the absence of any such legal authorities, and based on the undisputed facts before the Court, Water 1 is entitled to summary judgment on SWI's claim that it has violated § 1926(b) by petitioning administrative agencies and the courts for relief.

As to SWI's claim that Water 1 has violated § 1926(b) by extending its water lines and expanding its service into SWI's service area, the facts and evidence before the Court are insufficient to enable the Court to determine whether Water 1 has curtailed SWI's provision of services in violation of § 1926(b) by undertaking such alleged actions. Therefore, this claim will be preserved for trial.

3. Sherman Act

Water 1 also claims that it is entitled to summary judgment on SWI's claims under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 and § 2. Water 1 contends that its lawful petitioning [16] for relief is protected activity under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. SWI concedes that while legitimate advocacy to the government may be protected under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, frivolous or sham attempts to interfere directly with the business of a competitor are illegal under the antitrust laws. SWI submits that discovery will reveal direct interference with the business of SWI by Water 1 and a pattern of baseless and repetitive proceedings brought for the sole purpose of injuring SWI's business.

HN5 The Noerr-Pennington doctrine holds that business interests may combine and lobby to influence the various branches of the government or administrative agencies without violating the antitrust laws since such activities are protected by the First Amendment right to petition the government for redress of grievances. Eaton v. Newport Bd. of Educ., 975 F.2d 292, 297-299 (6th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 508 U.S. 957, 113 S. Ct. 2459, 124 L. Ed. 2d 674 (1993). Thus, a cause of action under the Sherman Act cannot arise from conduct by a competitor to lawfully influence government decision-making. Barton's Disposal Service, Inc. v. Tiger Corp., 886 F.2d 1430 (5th Cir. 1989). [17]

HN6 [↑] The right to petition authorities to take official action is generally protected regardless of the motives of the petitioners. Eaton, 975 F.2d at 298 (citing Video Int'l. Prod., Inc. v. Warner-Amex Cable Communications, Inc., 858 F.2d 1075, 1084 (5th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 491 U.S. 906, 105 L. Ed. 2d 697, 109 S. Ct. 3189 (1989)). This is true even where the petitioning activity has the intent or effect of depriving another of property interests. Id. The right to petition the government for redress of grievances includes the right to seek relief from the courts. Nestle Ice Cream Go. v. N.L.R.B., 46 F.3d 578, 585 (6th Cir. 1995) (citing California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking, Untd., 404 U.S. 508, 510, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609 (1972)).

The United States Supreme Court has carved out a narrow "sham" exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. The exception covers cases where the defendant intended to use the petitioning process merely to harass the plaintiff. Eaton, 975 F.2d at 298. HN7 [↑] There is no First Amendment right to pursue baseless litigation. Nestle Ice Cream, 46 F.3d at 585. A pattern of baseless, repetitive claims may establish the [18] sham nature of the petitioning activity and result in the loss of any privilege under the First Amendment. California Motor, 404 U.S. 508, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609.

HN8 [↑] Litigation is "sham" if it satisfies a two-part test. Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., 508 U.S. 49, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 1928, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1993). First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. Id. If an objective litigant could conclude that the suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, an antitrust claim premised on the [*701] sham exception must fail. Id. The existence of probable cause to institute legal proceedings precludes a finding that the litigation was sham. Id.

Only if the challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation. Id. Evidence of anticompetitive intent or purpose alone cannot transform otherwise legitimate petitioning activity into a sham. Id.

The Court may determine whether there was probable cause for Water 1 to bring its claims as a matter of law. See Columbia Pictures, 113 S. Ct. at 1930. The [19] Court finds that there was probable cause for Water 1 to pursue its claims. Water 1's claims, which have been dismissed by the Court, were not objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could have realistically expected success on the merits of such claims. Water 1 brought claims under § 1926(b) on the theory that it was a protected association under the terms of the statute. In its opinion dismissing Water 1's claims, the Court noted that the question of whether an entity in Water 1's position qualifies as an indebted association entitled to the protections of § 1926(b) is unsettled. (Doc. no. 59) The Court found that § 1926(b) did not define pertinent terms and that it was necessary to look beyond the statutory language in order to construe the meaning thereof. Although the Court acknowledged that one state court had construed the pertinent statutory provisions in the manner advocated by Water 1, the Court rejected that interpretation. However, the fact that the Court rejected Water 1's position does not mean that its position was frivolous or unreasonable. Rather, in light of the unsettled nature of the law, its action was arguably warranted by existing law [20] or by a reasonable argument for the extension of existing law. Thus, the objective prong of the test for determining whether litigation is sham is not satisfied with regard to this lawsuit.

The same is true of those activities which Water 1 directed toward other governmental bodies and administrative agencies. As an arguably covered association under § 1926(b), Water 1 had an objectively reasonable basis for attempting to halt SWI's project by pursuing relief through administrative and legislative channels.

The Court need not consider SWI's contention that discovery will disclose the existence of sham activities by Water 1. Since the Court has found that Water 1 had probable cause to bring its claims, Water 1's intent in pursuing such claims is immaterial.⁷ [21] As a matter of law, the sham exception does not apply, and Water 1 is entitled to immunity from antitrust liability for SWI's claims under the Sherman Act.⁸

4. Tortious Interference

Although Ohio recognizes a cause of action for tortious interference, (See Juhasz v. Quik Shops, Inc., 55 Ohio App. 2d 51, 379 N.E.2d 235 (1977)), Water 1 contends that is immune from liability under the applicable law. It has been held that HN9[↑] the Noerr-Pennington doctrine immunizes certain actions to influence the government from liability under state law for tortious interference with business, subject to the sham exception set forth above. See, e.g., In re IBP Confidential Business Documents Litigation, 755 F.2d 1300, 1309 (8th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1088, 94 L. Ed. 2d 150, 107 S. Ct. 1293 (1987) (citing NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 915, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1215, 102 S. Ct. 3409 (1982)); Suburban Restoration Co., Inc. v. Acmat Corp., 700 F.2d 98 (2nd Cir. 1983)). The Court in Suburban Restoration reasoned that the federal courts have strongly suggested that imposing liability for filing a "non-sham lawsuit" under [*702] state law would pose serious constitutional questions. Id. at 102.

This Court agrees that HN10[↑] the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is not limited in application to antitrust claims. The doctrine is grounded on the First Amendment principle that an individual or entity has the right to pursue legitimate efforts to influence government decision-making and to approach the courts in order to obtain redress of grievances. This principle applies whether those efforts are challenged under federal antitrust law or under state law.

Furthermore, the United States Supreme Court in Columbia Pictures suggested that the Noerr-Pennington doctrine applies to claims other than those brought under the antitrust laws. The Court stated as follows:

HN11[↑] Whether applying Noerr as an antitrust doctrine or invoking it in other contexts, we have repeatedly reaffirmed that evidence of anticompetitive intent or purpose alone cannot transform otherwise legitimate activity into a sham. . . .

Because Water 1 had an objectively [23] reasonable basis for attempting to stop SWI's projects, the Noerr-Pennington doctrine immunizes Water 1 from liability for its petitioning activities. Water 1 is therefore entitled to summary judgment on SWI's tortious interference claim.

VI. Conclusion

The Court hereby DENIES Defendant RECD's Motion for a More Definite Statement (Doc. no. 42), Plaintiff Water 1's Motion for a More Definite Statement or, Alternatively, Motion to Strike (Doc. no. 46), Defendant SWI's Motion to Strike and Motion for Leave to Supplement Memoranda (Doc. no. 74), and Defendant SWI's Application for preliminary Injunction, Permanent Injunction, and Declaratory Judgment (Doc. no. 36).

The Court hereby GRANTS Water 1's Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. no. 49) with respect to SWI's claims that (1) Water 1 has violated § 1926(b) by petitioning government agencies and courts for legal redress for alleged wrongs by SWI, (2) Water 1 has violated the Sherman Act, and (3) Water 1 is liable for tortious interference with SWI's business.

Water 1's motion for summary judgment (Doc. no. 49) is DENIED with respect to SWI's claim that Water 1 has violated § 1926(b) by extending its lines and expanding its service [24] into SWI's service area.

⁸ In addition, to the extent SWI wishes to pursue a claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, Water 1 is entitled to summary judgment on the ground that there can be no conspiracy by a single entity acting on its own behalf. Greenwood Utilities Comm'n. v. Mississippi Power Co., 751 F.2d 1484, 1497 (5th Cir. 1985).

[2] [*521] The trial court in this antitrust and unfair trade practices suit issued an order directing that the Louisiana Code of Civil Procedure govern discovery in the case rather than La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq., on grounds that the more recent discovery articles of the Code better serve judicial economy and expeditious handling of the case as opposed to the older, more burdensome statutory discovery provisions. The State of Louisiana, through the Attorney General, filed this expedited pretrial appeal of the order, as authorized by La. R.S. 51:135. Because we find that the provisions of La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq., remain in effect and are available to the Attorney General for discovery in this case, we vacate the order of the trial court and remand for further proceedings.

This action was commenced by the State of Louisiana, through the Attorney General by petition alleging that the named defendants [Pg 2] have violated and continue to violate Louisiana's monopoly laws, La. R.S. 51:121, et seq., and its unfair trade practices laws, La. R.S. 51:1401, et seq.. Following commencement of the action, the Attorney General moved to take testimony from the defendants under La. R.S. 13:5081, which provides:

HN1 [↑] The Attorney General, or any district attorney, acting under the direction of the former, or of the governor, shall begin any action to enforce the laws respecting monopolies, combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, commerce or business. The prosecuting officer either in preparation for or upon the trial of the case may take testimony of an officer, director, agent or employee of any foreign or domestic corporation, joint stock association, or of any member of any copartnership, or of any individual or individuals against whom proceedings are brought. If the person or persons whose testimony is desired, resides within or outside the state, the prosecuting officer shall file in court where the action is brought, at any time, or with any special commissioner appointed in accordance with R.S. 13:5085 by the court to take testimony, a written statement setting for the following:

- (1) What the state expects to prove;
- (2) The name or names and residences of the persons whose testimony he desires to take;
- (3) All books, papers or documents specifically designated he desires produced;

- (4) The time and place, either within [*4] or outside the state he desires the person to [*522] appear and testify, or to produce the books, papers and documents.

Thereupon the judge, or the commissioner, as the case may be, before whom the testimony is being or shall be taken, shall issue immediately a notice in writing, directed to the attorney of record or to the defendant or defendants themselves in the cause, notifying said person that the testimony of the person or persons, named in the notice is desired, and requiring him to whom the notice is delivered, or served, to notify and have the witness or witnesses whose testimony or evidence it is desired to take to comply with the requirements set forth in the written statement.

[Pg 3] If the taking of such evidence is not concluded on the day and date specified in the notice, the court or the commissioner, as the case may be, may continue the taking of such evidence from day to day, or adjourn from day to day, at the same place, until the taking of such evidence has been concluded.

Acting on authority of La. R.S. 13:5085,¹ the trial court fixed a rule to show cause why a special commissioner should not be appointed to take the testimony requested in the [*5] Attorney General's motion. The parties appeared for argument on the rule, and the trial court took the matter under advisement. On September 11, 1995, the trial court issued an order that Articles 1420 through 1474 of the Louisiana Code of Civil Procedure would govern discovery in the case rather than La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq.. In written reasons for the order, the court stated

HN2 [↑] Any court, or presiding judge thereof, in which any proceeding as provided in R.S. 13:5081 through 13:5090 is pending at any time, upon application therefor, made by the Attorney General, or district attorney, shall appoint some well qualified disinterested person as special commissioner, to take testimony, or in any such case, at any point either within or outside the state, as designated in such application, or where requested by either party to the cause of action, upon the issues joined in the cause.

its finding that discovery under the codal articles rather than under the "burdensome and archaic" provisions of La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq. would better serve the interest of judicial economy and promote expeditious movement of the case. The Attorney General then took the present appeal.

[6] The trial court's reasoning, while certainly supported by policy considerations favoring judicial economy and efficient case [Pg 4] management, nonetheless contains legal error. The provisions for taking testimony under La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq., although seldom used since their enactment in 1914, remain in effect and provide the Attorney General with discovery methods as an alternative to those established by the Louisiana Code of Civil Procedure. However, those alternative discovery methods are only available in an action instituted by the Attorney General "to enforce the laws respecting monopolies, combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, commerce or business." La. R.S. 13:5081.

The Attorney General has procedural capacity to bring suit alleging violation of the state's antitrust and unfair trade practices laws. La. R.S. 51:128, 138, 1407, 1408. HN3¹ Louisiana's antitrust and unfair trade practices laws are sui generis statutes regulating monopolies and restraints of trade or commerce in this state. State ex rel. Guste v. Pickering, 365 So. 2d 943, 945 (La.App. 4 Cir. 1978), writ denied, 366 So. 2d 556 (La. 1978). Certain specialized procedures are embodied [7] in these sui generis statutes. The present pretrial appeal of this interlocutory judgment, as authorized by La. R.S. 51:135, is one such specialized procedure. See also Daily Advertiser v. Trans-La, 612 So. 2d 7, 14-15 (La. 1993).

In 1914, the Louisiana Legislature enacted La. R.S. 13:5081-5090 to provide the Attorney General with specialized procedures for obtaining pretrial testimony and production of documents in antitrust and unfair trade practices litigation. La. Acts 1914, No. 288. The application of these specialized pretrial discovery procedures is [Pg 5] expressly limited to antitrust and unfair trade practices suits instituted by the Attorney General or a district attorney acting on the direction of the Attorney General or the Governor. La. R.S. [*523] 51:5081. As noted by the trial court in this case, the discovery procedures authorized by La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq., are burdensome to implement. More important to this analysis, however, is the fact that the Louisiana Legislature, despite enacting numerous other provisions governing discovery in judicial proceedings, has not seen fit to repeal or amend La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq., since the 1914 enactment of those [8] statutes.

In their brief to this court, defendants review the legislative development of discovery procedures in Louisiana and argue that the Louisiana Code of Civil Procedure, in particular Article 1426², grants authority for the discovery order issued by the trial court in this case. Alternatively, defendants contend that the order was properly issued because the provisions of La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq., were repealed by the subsequent enactment of the Code of Civil Procedure. Defendants urge that the special discovery procedures for antitrust cases in La. R.S. Title 13 are not identified as discovery methods available under La.C.C.P. art. 1421 and have therefore been repealed as being in conflict or inconsistent with the Code of Civil Procedure. See La. Acts 1976, No. 574, Sec. 3.

[9] [Pg 6] We find neither of defendants' arguments persuasive. HN4¹ The trial court's authority to issue a protective order under Article 1426 of the Code of Civil Procedure cannot be used to circumvent discovery procedures the Louisiana Legislature specifically granted to the Attorney General, regardless of how burdensome the trial court may find those discovery procedures. Moreover, our comparison of the specialized discovery procedures established by La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq., with the discovery procedures contained in the Code of Civil Procedure reveals no conflicts or inconsistencies of a magnitude sufficient to result in repeal of the special antitrust discovery procedures. Rather, the specialized discovery procedures for antitrust cases exist as an alternative or supplement to the discovery procedures found in the Code of Civil Procedure. We find that La. R.S. 13:5081-5090 HN5¹ remain effective as statutes and provide the Attorney General with specialized discovery procedures for use in this antitrust and unfair trade practices suit. The trial court therefore committed error by issuing an order which denied the Attorney General's request for discovery in this case under [La. R.S. I10\] 13:5081, et seq.](#)

² La. C.C.P. art. 1426 authorizes the trial court to issue protective orders in discovery matters. As quoted by defendants in brief to this court, Article 1426(3) grants the trial court authority to "... make any order which justice requires to protect a party from annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense, including ...that the discovery may be had only by a method of discovery other than that selected by the party seeking discovery."

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the district court that discovery in this case shall be governed by Louisiana Code of Civil Procedure Articles 1420 through 1474 rather than the provisions of La. R.S. 13:5081, et seq., is hereby vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

HN1[] Standards of Review, Arbitrary & Capricious Standard of Review

A court reviewing the action of an administrative agency may revise or modify the agency's decision only if the substantial rights of the appellant have been prejudiced because the administrative findings, inferences, conclusions, or decisions are: 1) In violation of constitutional or statutory provisions; 2) in excess of the statutory authority of the agency; 3) made upon unlawful procedure; 4) affected by other error of law; 5) clearly erroneous in view of the reliable, probative, and substantial evidence on the whole record; or 6) arbitrary or capricious or characterized by abuse of discretion or clearly unwarranted exercise of discretion, Conn. Gen. Stat. § 4-183(i). A court reviewing the factual and discretionary determinations of an administrative agency must accord such findings considerable weight. On the other hand, it is the function of courts to expound and apply governing principles of law.

MEMORANDUM OF DECISION

The plaintiffs in this administrative appeal challenge the constitutionality and validity under the Sherman Act of certain state regulations concerning the wholesale pricing of alcoholic beverages. The plaintiffs, John R. Slimp, permittee, and Gambrinos Importing Co., Inc., a Texas-based seller of beer to Connecticut liquor distributors, also challenge both the finding that they violated Connecticut's Liquor Control Act and the severity of the penalty imposed. The defendants are the State Department of Liquor Control, its chairman, William W. Sullivan, and Commissioner William Devine (collectively, "agency").

History of the Proceedings

By a citation dated June 16, 1994, the permittee was required to appear before the agency on charges that he had paid cash returns, rebates, quantity prices or discounts to wholesalers for the sale of malt beverage [*2] products, specifically, Corona beer. The agency claimed that such payments, which it alleged had been made on twenty-four occasions to various distributors in 1992, violated General Statutes §§ 30-94 and -63(b) and Regulation 30-6-A29(a). After a hearing the agency issued a memorandum of decision dated March 14, 1995 in which it found that the alleged violations had been proven. It imposed a suspension of the permittee's out-of-state shipper's permit for four hundred days or, in lieu of suspension, a fine in the amount of $ 30,000.00.

The plaintiffs filed a timely appeal from the agency's ruling and have obtained a stay of its execution pending the resolution of this appeal.

Aggrievement

The court finds that the plaintiffs are aggrieved by the ruling of the agency, having been subject to loss of their authorization to do business in Connecticut or a fine. The plaintiffs have demonstrated a specific personal and legal interest in the subject matter of the decision and an adverse effect on that interest. State Medical Society v. Board of Examiners in Podiatry, 203 Conn. 295, 299-300, 524 A.2d 636 \(1987\).

Facts

While the parties assume differing positions with [*3] regard to the legal interpretation of the facts and the legality of the agency's enforcement action, they do not dispute the underlying facts found by the agency, and, in fact, they stipulated to most of them at the administrative hearing. (Tr. 8-10.) The relevant facts are as follows. The plaintiffs, who are out-of-state shippers, were engaged in 1992 in selling Corona beer to various liquor wholesalers in Connecticut. During 1992, the plaintiffs paid some wholesalers various sums of money calculated on the basis of the amount of monthly sales by each distributor of beer bought from the plaintiffs. In the forms they sent to the wholesalers, the plaintiffs characterized these payments as a "price promotion" program. The wholesalers were required to return to the plaintiffs a promotional tracking form and depletion report disclosing beginning inventory, receipts, ending inventory and retail sales for each month in which the distributor sought such payment. Payments were made by the plaintiffs based on the retail sales reported for the month. The payments were unrestricted as to use, that is, wholesalers were not required to use the money for any particular purpose, such as advertising [*4] or displays.

At the administrative hearing, the plaintiffs characterized their program as the furnishing of "promotion allowances" or "depletion allowances" and asserted, as they do on appeal, that such payments are authorized by 12 CFR 10.13 and by existing policy of the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. The state agency found the program to constitute a program of "cash returns", "rebates" and "discounts" in violation of General Statutes §§ 30-94, -63(b) and Regulation 30-6-A29(a), because the payments were made on the basis of the quantity of the plaintiffs' product sold, to induce more purchases of beer by wholesalers from the plaintiffs at prices effectively reduced below the price posted with the agency because of the post-sale payments.

Pursuant to statute, each out-of-state shipper of beer is required annually to file or "post" its prices for the products it ships to Connecticut wholesalers. A posted price can be changed by filing by the sixth of the month an amended posting to be in effect for the following month. General Statutes § 30-63\(c\) requires the posted price to be the "controlling price" charged by the shipper for the month of its posting.

Such [*5] postings and supplemental postings are filed by the agency and open to inspection by other out-of-state shippers or by wholesalers. The agency takes no part in determining the prices posted. (Tr. 104-5.)

Issues

The plaintiffs make the following claims:

1. The agency erred in finding that their depletion allowances violated Regulation 30-6-A29(f) and General Statutes §§ 30-63\(b\) and -94.
2. That the agency erred in interpreting the cited state statutes in a way that violates the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 et. seq.
3. That the agency's ruling violates the Commerce Clause of the Constitution of the United States.
4. That the penalty imposed is excessive.

The parties agree that all of these grounds concern the construction, interpretation, and validity of statutes rather than the factual determinations of the agency.

Standard of Review

HN1 [↑] A court reviewing the action of an administrative agency may revise or modify the agency's decision only if the "substantial rights of the...[appellant] have been prejudiced because the administrative findings, inferences, conclusions, or decisions are: 1) In violation of constitutional or statutory [*6] provisions; 2) in excess of the statutory authority of the agency; 3) made upon unlawful procedure; 4) affected by other error of law; 5) clearly erroneous in view of the reliable, probative, and substantial evidence on the whole record; or 6) arbitrary or capricious or characterized by abuse of discretion or clearly unwarranted exercise of discretion." General Statutes § 4-183\(j\).

A court reviewing the factual and discretionary determinations of an administrative agency must accord such findings considerable weight. Connecticut Hospital Ass'n., Inc. v. Commission on Hospitals & Health Care, 200 Conn. 133, 140, 509 A.2d 1050 (1986). "On the other hand, it is the function of courts to expound and apply governing principles of law." [Lieberman v. In Perkins v. Freedom of Information Commission, 228 Conn. 158, 165, 635 A.2d 783 (1994), the Supreme Court affirmed "the well-established practice of this court to accord great deference to the construction given a statute by the agency charged with its enforcement" except where the statute "has not previously been subjected to judicial scrutiny or time-tested agency interpretation." West Hartford Interfaith Coalition, Inc. v. Town Council, 228 Conn. 498, 507, 636 A.2d 1342 (1994).

The Supreme Court has recently noted that HN2[ while deference is appropriately given to an administrative agency's interpretation of a law that is charged with enforcing, "it is for the court, and not for administrative agencies to expound and apply governing principles of law" when there are two equally plausible interpretations of the statutory language. Bridgeport [*8] Hospital v. Commission on Human Rights and Opportunities, 232 Conn. 91, 109, 653 A.2d 782 (1995).

In the specific context of regulation of the sale and distribution of alcoholic beverages, the Supreme Court has likewise ruled that HN3[ in reviewing the determinations of the Liquor Control Commission, "the court can do no more than decide whether upon the facts before it the commission has mistaken the law, or whether it has reached a conclusion untenable in the light of logic and reason. Greenwich v. Liquor Control Commission, 191 Conn. 528, 534, 469 A.2d 382 (1983); Aminti v. Liquor Control Commission, 144 Conn. 550, 553, 135 A.2d 595 (1957).

I. Violations of Liquor Control Act

The plaintiffs' first ground for appeal is that the agency erroneously interpreted the Liquor Control Act when it decided that their payments to wholesalers violated General Statutes §§ 30-94 and -63(b).

General Statutes § 30-94 provides in relevant part that "No permittee...licensed under the provisions of this chapter in transaction with another permittee...shall directly or indirectly offer, furnish or receive any...cash returns,...discounts...with the sale of alcoholic beverages [*9] or liquors."

General Statutes § 30-63(b) HN4[ provides that:

No manufacturer, wholesaler or out-of-state shipper permittee shall discriminate in any manner in price discounts between one permittee and another on sales or purchases of alcoholic liquors bearing the same brand or trade name and of like age, size and quality, nor shall he allow in any form any discount, rebate, free goods, allowance or other inducement for the purpose of making sales or purchases.

The regulations enacted by the agency deal more explicitly with the issue of payments by shippers to Connecticut wholesalers.

Regulation § 30-6-A29(a) HN5[ provides that:

(a) No permittee in transactions with another permittee shall directly or indirectly offer, furnish...any discounts...cash return...or special prices...with the sale of alcoholic liquors.

Regulation § 30-6-A29(f) HN6[ provides that:

(f) Notwithstanding any provisions of this section to the contrary, an out-of-state shipper or manufacturer licensee may offer to wholesale licensees funds to be used for product promotion as permitted by federal law and in accordance with the following:

(1) There shall be no restrictions or obligations [*10] on the use of such funds, except that such funds shall be used for promotion of the product(s) identified.

(2) Funds shall be offered without discrimination in any manner among wholesalers authorized to distribute the products to be promoted, except that funds may be pro-rated among such wholesalers based upon population of their authorized geographic territory for the product(s) involved; as determined by the most recently completed decennial census; or based upon any other formula not prohibited by sections 30-63 or 30-94 of the general statutes; HN7 [↑] (3) Out of state shippers and manufacturers shall file with the Department at least thirty days before the distribution of funds, written notice listing the following:

- (A) The total amount of funds to be distributed and the proposed date of distribution;
 - (B) The product(s) to be promoted and the wholesalers authorized to distribute such products;
 - (C) If funds are distributed based on population served, the population is the geographic territories of each wholesaler, and the eligible share of funds expressed as a percentage;
 - (D) If any other formula is used, a detailed exposition of such formula used; and
 - (E) [*11] The amount of promotional funds each is to receive.
- (4) No promotional funds shall be distributed to any wholesaler without approval of the Department.

It is undisputed that the wholesalers to whom the plaintiffs made the payments in dispute are "permittees" within the meaning of the statutes and regulations cited above.

The plaintiffs assert that Regulation § 30-6-A29(f) allows promotional allowances "as permitted by federal law" and they note that they presented at the hearing a letter from the Chief of the Market Compliance Branch of the Alcohol and Tobacco Division of the Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms in which that official responded to their inquiry as to the legality under federal regulations of payment of "depletion allowances" to a customer based on its case sales for a specified period. Though the plaintiffs assert that the opinion provided was that such payments comport with federal regulations, in fact, the only conclusion stated was as follows:

Assuming such payments are in compliance with State law, adherence to 27 CFR 10.23 will enable your client to safely act within the purview of the Federal Alcohol Administration Act."

The cited regulation is included in regulations which provide, at 27 CFR § 10.1, the preface to the cited section, that "Nothing in this part shall exempt any person from the requirement of any State law or regulation."

The plaintiffs argue, in effect, that regulation § 30-6-A29(f) exempts from the operation of § 30-6-A29(a) any product promotion payments permitted by federal law, and that an absence of federal prohibition against rebates makes such rebates permissible. Were this court to adopt such a reading of regulation § 30-6-A29(f), that regulation would negate General Statutes § 30-63\(b\), which expressly prohibits the payment of rebates. HN8 [↑] An administrative regulation is not valid if it is inconsistent with or beyond the authorizing statute. Mass v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 222 Conn. 631, 649, 610 A.2d 1185 \(1992\); Travelers Insurance Co. v. Kulla, 216 Conn. 390, 399, 579 A.2d 525 \(1990\). The agency was not free to abolish the prohibitions of General Statutes § 30-63\(b\) by enacting a contrary regulation. Accordingly, regulation § 30-6-A29(f) cannot be interpreted in a manner inconsistent with the substantive provisions [*13] of Title 30. A non-conflicting interpretation is certainly available; Regulation § 30-6-A29(f) authorizes only those promotional payments that are expressly authorized by federal law. The cited federal regulation refers back to state regulations, and therefore the prohibitions of § 30-6-A29(a) are unaffected by any federal provision and are applicable.

The agency did not act arbitrarily or capriciously in interpreting the payments at issue as rebates and in determining that the payment of such rebates is prohibited by General Statutes § 30-63\(b\), § 30-94 and Regulation § 30-6-A29(a). The agency was further warranted in finding a violation of Regulation § 30-6-A29(f) in that the rebates were not paid for promotional purposes "without discrimination in any manner among wholesalers authorized to distribute the products to be promoted" but were paid according to discriminations made on the basis of amount of product sold. While Regulation § 30-6-A29(f)(2) authorized differences in payments based on geographical distributions of population, it expressly prohibits discrimination based on a formula prohibited by General Statutes §§ 30-63 or 30-94, that is, volume rebates or discounts.

[*14] II. Unenforceability under the Sherman Act

The plaintiffs claim that if the agency may enforce penalties for rebates that reduce a shipper's posted price of beer to the plaintiffs' customers, it is enforcing a pricing scheme, provided for in § 30-63\(c\), that is invalid because it violates the Sherman Act, § 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq.

At oral argument, the agency objected that since it had not specifically invoked § 30-63\(c\) when it sanctioned the plaintiffs, the applicability of the Sherman Act to the state's liquor price posting statute is not an issue that can be raised in this appeal. General Statutes § 30-63\(c\) HN9[¹⁵] provides for posting by each manufacturer, wholesaler or out-of-state shipper permittee of its prices for each month and provides that the posted price "when so posted shall be the controlling price for such manufacturer, wholesaler or out-of-state permittee for the month following such posting." In finding that the plaintiff gave rebates or discounts to its customers, the agency found that the consequence was that "funds were distributed based on what and how much was sold and thereby illegally inducing more sales and purchases of Gambrinos products at [*15] effectively reduced prices of goods." (Memorandum of Decision 3/14/95, page 3, emphasis supplied.) The plaintiffs urge that because enforcement of the prohibition on discounts and rebates set forth in § 30-63\(b\) is clearly linked to the prohibition against selling at less than the posted prices, this court should review the validity of that prohibition under the federal anti-trust statute, as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court in California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n. v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233, 100 S. Ct. 937 \(1980\) and by other courts subsequently. The plaintiffs further note that since the agency found that the rebates effectively reduced the prices charged, violation of § 30-63\(c\) was therefore an explicit part of the violation claimed.

It is necessary to decide whether administrative enforcement of § 30-63\(b\) is necessarily an enforcement of § 30-63\(c\). This court finds that it is not. General Statutes § 30-63\(b\) HN10[¹⁵] provides that "price discounts" may be given to a wholesaler or shipper's customers so long as the seller does not "discriminate" between customers in the discounts and provided that the wholesaler or shipper [*16] shall not "offer in any form any discount, rebate, free goods, allowance or other inducement for the purpose of making sales or purchases." Some discounts from the posted prices are therefore permitted, and regulation § 30-6-A29(b) defines permissible methods of providing non-discriminatory discounts in the form of promotional funds.

The enforcement action at issue in this appeal with regard to General Statutes § 30-63\(b\) is enforcement of the prohibition against discrimination in providing promotional discounts. The agency found that the amount of the discount claimed to be for promotion was not uniform among customers but varied, that is "discriminated", according to the amount of product sold.

The enforcement of General Statutes § 30-94, which the agency found the plaintiffs had also violated, presents a different situation. That statute on its face prohibits the furnishing of "cash returns" or "discounts" by a permittee to another to induce purchases. The agency expressly found that the effect of providing rebates was to induce purchases at effectively "reduced prices." While the agency invoked § 30-94, its rationale for enforcement and its express finding was the consequential [*17] charging of less than the posted price through the operation of the volume rebate, a violation of § 30-63\(c\). The agency's formulation of the charges without reference to the provisions of § 30-63\(c\) does not change the substance of its enforcement effort, which was to sanction rebates that effectively reduced the sale price below the posted price. While the agency might be in the position of enforcing only § 30-94 if a shipper offered a gift or a prize to a customer, where the charge is the giving of a discount or rebate, and where, as here, the agency finds that the substance of the offense involved charging "reduced prices," then the issue of the price posting scheme is part of the enforcement proceeding and is fairly raised as an issue in the appeal.

This court does not agree with the agency that the validity of Connecticut's price-posting scheme can be raised only if the agency cites § 30-63\(c\) in its enforcement action. The agency itself relied on the finding that the rebates "effectively reduced prices of goods." The plaintiffs gave the agency clear notice of their position that the instant enforcement action was an enforcement of the duty to adhere to posted prices and [*18] was unenforceable under federal law. (Record, Letter of Atty. Siegel dated November 30, 1994.) The Connecticut Supreme Court has stated that HN11[¹⁵] a person who is aggrieved by the decision of an administrative agency may, on appeal, raise any issue relevant to the question whether the agency has acted illegally. Connecticut Fund for the Environment Inc. v. Stamford, 192 Conn. 247, 251 n.3, 470 A.2d 1214 \(1984\).

The agency has taken the position that so long as it challenges price discounting by invoking only § 30-94 and not § 30-63\(c\), a respondent in an enforcement action may not challenge the requirement not to sell below the price it has posted. In its brief, indicating that the paying of rebates violated §§ 30-63\(b\) and -94, the agency conceded that "the other prohibitions stated in the statutes could also apply," that is, the same conduct violates the prohibition against charging a price lower than the posted price, pursuant to § 30-63\(c\). The Connecticut Supreme Court has recognized, in Beckanstin v. Liquor Control Commission, 140 Conn. 185, 192, 99 A.2d 119 \(1953\), that the prohibition against discounts is part of "the prohibition of the granting to any retailer by a [*19] wholesaler of any reduction of the established price of a given brand of liquor."

The agency's position cannot be accepted because to do so would be to hold that the agency can prevent court review of the price posting scheme and deprive respondents of grounds for appeal merely by characterizing a reduction of the posted price as a "discount" or "rebate", and never specifying § 30-63\(c\) as the statute violated even where, as here, the agency's complaint is that the rebate resulted in "effectively reduced prices of goods."

Having been subjected to penalties for paying discounts that effectively reduced its announced prices, the plaintiffs are entitled to challenge the validity of the substance of the enforcement action, that is, the prohibition of offering such reduced prices through rebates or discounts.

Though this court finds that the issue of the validity of the enforcement of a system of posted prices is an issue to be decided, the court finds for the agency on the merits of that issue.

In California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n. v. Midcal Aluminum, 445 U.S. 97, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233, 100 S. Ct. 937, the United States Supreme Court found that the California price-posting [*20] system violated the Sherman Act. The California statute at issue provided that the wine producer set the price for its brand of wine and that all persons at various levels in the chain of distribution were forced to establish identical prices so fixed by the brand owner. The Court found that this statutory scheme operated in a way that authorized the wine producer to prevent price competition by dictating the prices charged by wholesalers, through a resale price maintenance scheme.

The Connecticut price-posting scheme gives no such control to the producer and does not control the price at which retail sellers may sell the product they buy from shippers.

Reviewing the Connecticut price posting scheme as to both wholesale and retail prices in Serlin Wine & Spirit Merchants, Inc. v. Healy, 512 F. Supp. 936, 938 \(D.Conn. 1981\), aff'd sub nom Morgan v. Division of Liquor Control, 664 F.2d 353, 355 \(2d Cir. 1981\), the federal courts found that Midcal was inapplicable because the Connecticut system required only individual actions by sellers, not concerted action.

The United States Supreme Court revisited the California liquor distribution system, but not the pricing features [*21] of that system, in Rice v. Norman Williams Co., 458 U.S. 654, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1042, 102 S. Ct. 3294 \(1982\). The Court upheld a state statute that allowed only importers designated by the brand owner to accept delivery of a brand of distilled spirits in California. The Court reversed the state Appellate Court's finding of an anti-trust violation, stating that "[a] state statute is not pre-empted by the federal antitrust laws simply because the state scheme might have an anticompetitive effect." Ct. 403 \(1978\)](#), and that a state statute could be rendered unenforceable "only if the statute on its face irreconcilably conflicts with federal antitrust policy." id. The Court characterized its holding in Midcal as identifying a facial conflict with the Sherman Act because the state statute required concerted action by wholesalers. The Court contrasted the finding of facial conflict in the California law with its finding in Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc. v. Hostetter, 384 U.S. 35, 1*221 39-40, 16 L. Ed. 2d 336, 86 S. Ct. 1254 \(1966\), that a posting requirement did not impose "irresistible pressure" to violate the Sherman Act.

Reviewing the New York posting statute in Battipaglia v. N. Y. State Liquor Authority, 745 F.2d 166 \(2nd Cir. 1984\), the Second Circuit upheld the state law upon a finding that the requirement to post a monthly wholesale price did not require concerted action by shippers and did not constitute a facial violation of the Sherman Act.

The plaintiffs point out that the Ninth Circuit has invalidated the Oregon price posting regulation in Miller v. Hedlund, 813 F.2d 1344 \(9th Cir. 1987\), and that the appellate courts of Nebraska and California have invalidated their own state laws in Louis Finocchiaro, Inc. v. Nebraska Liquor Control Commission, 217 Neb. 487, 351 N.W.2d 701 \(Neb. 1984\); and Lewis-Westco and Co. v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board, 136 Cal. App. 3d 829, 186 Cal. Rptr. 552 \(Cal. App. 1982\), respectively.

The Ninth Circuit's conclusion in Miller v. Hedlund, 813 F.2d 1344, rests on its determination that Oregon's wholesale price posting on its face irreconcilably conflicts with federal antitrust [*23] policy. The Ninth Circuit reasoned that the state's requirements that each shipper post its price "facilitates the exchange of price information and require adherence to the publicly posted prices." Miller v. Hedlund, 813 F.2d 1344 at 1349. That court then made the leap of logic that a statute that "facilitates" exchange of price information "compels activity that would otherwise be a per se violation of the Sherman Act." id. Because Connecticut's price posting system allows sellers to revise their prices downward for subsequent months, this court cannot so confidently conclude that that which facilitates also, on its face, compels concerted agreements to fix prices. In Rice v. Norman Williams Co., 458 U.S. 654, 660-61, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1042, 102 S. Ct. 3294, the Supreme Court referred to the price posting statute at issue in Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, Inc. v. Hostetter, 384 U.S. 35, 16 L. Ed. 2d 336, 86 S. Ct. 1254, as not having presented a statute that on its face violates the Sherman Act by imposing "irresistible economic pressure" to violate the Sherman Act on those who sought to comply with the state law. This analysis by the United States Supreme Court does not [*24] appear to support the Ninth Circuit's reasoning that facilitation of concerted action is the same thing as compulsion of it.

The plaintiffs urge that Connecticut courts should follow the Supreme Court of Nebraska, which found in Louis Finocchiaro, Inc. v. Nebraska Liquor Control Commission, 217 Neb. 487, 351 N.W.2d 701 \(Neb. 1984\), that a wholesale price posting law and prohibition of volume discounts served no rational relation to any state purpose. They also urge this court to follow the California Court of Appeals, which appears determined to invalidate its state's liquor laws on federal grounds not supported by the federal courts. See Rice v. Norman Williams Co., supra.

Though the Connecticut Supreme Court has not had occasion recently to rule on the statutes prohibiting discounts or rebates from posted prices when it did so in Beckanstin v. Liquor Control Commission, 140 Conn. 185, 192, 99 A.2d 119 \(1953\), it upheld the constitutionality of such provisions based on preventing "the evil of the tied house which was rampant in preprohibition days."

This court finds that the plaintiffs have not established that the prohibition on giving discounts or rebates based [*25] on volume is on its face a violation of the Sherman Act even though it may, in combination with the posting requirements, have an anticompetitive effect. Accordingly, the plaintiffs have failed to make the showing required by Rice v. Norman Williams Co. as to a claim of facial validity. Having undertaken no proof that would allow the court to analyze the operation of the challenged statutes under the "rule of reason" approach, see Rice v. Norman Williams, 458 U.S. 654, 658-59, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1042, 102 S. Ct. 3294, the plaintiffs cannot prevail on this claim.

III. Constitutionality of Anti-Rebate Provisions

The plaintiffs assert that Connecticut's statutes prohibiting rebates or discounts that effectively reduce the price charged below the posted price violate the Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution and are therefore invalid. The United States Supreme Court has ruled that HN12 the Twenty-First Amendment did not entirely remove state regulation of alcoholic beverages from the ambit of the Commerce Clause, but that a pragmatic effort must be made to harmonize state and federal powers. Midcal, 445 U.S. 97, 109, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233, 100 S. Ct. 937; [*26] Bacchus Imports, Ltd. v. Dias, 468 U.S. 263, 275, 82 L. Ed. 2d 200, 104 S. Ct. 3049. The test is "whether the interests implicated by a state regulation are so closely related to the powers reserved by the Twenty-First Amendment that the regulation may prevail, notwithstanding that its requirements directly conflict with express federal policies." Bacchus, 468 U.S. 263, 275-76, 82 L. Ed. 2d 200, 104 S. Ct. 3049; Capital Cities Cable, Inc. v. Crisp, 467 U.S. 691, 714, 104 S. Ct. 2694, 2708, 81 L. Ed. 2d 580 \(1984\).

The plaintiffs' constitutional attack on the state statutes at issue appears to be based almost entirely on its view that the statutes are on their face violative of the Sherman Act, and therefore burden commerce. There is, however, some suggestion in their brief that the statutes are unconstitutional because they bear no rational relation to the achievement of any state regulatory goal. The plaintiffs point out that in 1982 Connecticut repealed its minimum retail price statutes as to alcoholic beverages, and that the state therefore has no remaining interest in regulating wholesale prices through posting requirements. The agency asserts that the provisions [*27] of the Liquor Control Act serve to prevent wholesalers from favoring certain retailers over others (Brief, page 9), apparently based on the belief that small retailers will be forced out of business by larger retailers able to charge lower prices because they can get rebates based on volume of sales. This court is unable to characterize such a goal as not bearing a rational relationship to a valid state regulatory goal. Though the agency has not explicitly invoked the regulatory interests found by the Connecticut Supreme Court in Beckanstin, such goals may also be served. It is notable that at the time it abolished retail pricing controls, the General Assembly chose not to alter provisions concerning wholesale price posting. The preservation of these features of the law supports the agency's position that the legislature perceived a reason to retain this system of regulation at the wholesale level.

IV. Severity of the Penalty

The plaintiffs' final point is that the penalty imposed by the agency is so excessive that it should be considered to be arbitrary and capricious. HN13[] It is well settled that a reviewing court should not substitute its own judgment for that of [*28] a regulatory agency as to the proper penalty for violation of a regulation absent a showing of abuse of discretion. Sumara v. Liquor Control Commission, 165 Conn. 26, 32, 327 A.2d 549 \(1973\); Spadaro v. Liquor Control Commission, 150 Conn. 68, 186 A.2d 76 \(1962\); DeMeo v. Zoning Commission, 148 Conn. 68, 167 A.2d 454 \(1961\). The plaintiffs argue that the penalty imposed "effectively puts the plaintiff out of business in Connecticut" (Brief, page 32). The court has no factual record sufficient to support such a conclusion. The Connecticut Supreme Court specifically found in Spadaro v. Liquor Control Commission, 150 Conn. 68, 73, 186 A.2d 76, that a court may not judicially notice such a result nor find such an effect without a sufficient evidentiary record. Absent such a factual showing, this court cannot find that the penalty imposed exceeds what is necessary to secure compliance with the Liquor Control Act. It would appear that the agency must arrive at penalties severe enough to deter violations and that it must use its expertise to avoid creating a situation in which violations are engaged in because the penalties imposed are a nontroublesome cost of doing business.

[*29] The plaintiffs have failed to establish that the sanctions imposed are arbitrary or capricious or constitute an abuse of discretion.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the appeal is dismissed.

HN12 [💡] Fiduciary Duties, Business Judgment Rule

When a board is confronted with a hostile tender offer, it has the obligation to determine whether the offer is in the best interests of the corporation and its shareholders. The board's duty to the shareholders in this context is no different from its duty in any other situation, and its decision should be entitled to the same deference it would receive in other matters. However, because directors might have some entrenchment motive, rather than those of the corporation and its shareholders, an "enhanced judicial scrutiny" is applicable to board decisions in the tender offer context. That standard must be satisfied before the board's actions are reviewed under the traditional business judgment rule. This enhanced test places the initial burden upon the board to demonstrate compliance therewith before the presumption of the business judgment rule may be invoked.

HN13 [💡] Fiduciary Duties, Business Judgment Rule

Under the enhanced judicial scrutiny test set forth in Unocal, the directors must show they had reasonable grounds for believing that a danger to corporate policy and effectiveness existed, a burden which is satisfied by showing good faith and reasonable investigation. This proof is materially enhanced where the board is comprised of a majority of outside independent directors who have complied with their duties of good faith and reasonable investigation. However, the board is not empowered with unbridled discretion to defeat any perceived threat by whatever draconian means available. A defensive measure may only survive enhanced judicial scrutiny and fall within the purview of the business judgment rule if it is reasonable in relation to the threat posed.

In effect, the board must defeat the plaintiff's ability to discharge this burden by demonstrating that even under Unocal's enhanced scrutiny, the board's actions merited the protection of the business judgment rule. Plaintiff's likelihood of success on the merits, therefore, is a function of the board's inability to discharge its Unocal burden.

A defensive measure taken by the board in response to some perceived threat to the corporation is the sine qua non triggering Unocal's enhanced judicial scrutiny. Whether board action is "defensive" can be determined from a variety of factual circumstances, such as the timing of consideration and implementation of the measure in relation to the initial appearance of the corporate threat. Proper determination of the defensive nature of the board's challenged actions is critical. If a particular measure taken by the board is not found to be defensive, the reviewing court must review the board's action under the business judgment rule.

Unocal's first inquiry focuses upon the existence and nature of the threat to the target company. Under this inquiry, the target board must demonstrate that after reasonable investigation, the board determined, in good faith, that the tender offer posed a threat to the corporation or its shareholders which warranted the adoption of a defensive measure.

An affirmative and precise determination of a threat must be demonstrated before moving to the second inquiry under Unocal, as this first inquiry informs the second. The obvious requisite to determining the reasonableness of a defensive action is a clear identification of the nature of the threat.

A "coercive" offer is a term of art used to describe an offer which has the effect of compelling shareholders to tender their shares out fear of being treated less favorably in the second stage. A "noncoercive" offer, on the other hand, is one, which does not create that compulsion.

An inadequate, non-coercive tender offer may also pose a legally cognizable threat in two ways. First, the target corporation may be inclined to provide the shareholders with a more attractive alternative, but may need some additional time to formulate and present that option. During the interim, the threat is that shareholders might choose the inadequate tender offer only because the superior option has not yet been presented.

Poison pills serve legitimate functions, which create no fiduciary duty issue. If a hostile tender offer is commenced at a share value which the board, in good faith and after reasonable investigation, determines to be "inadequate," the board may justifiably leave the pill in place for a period of time so as to enable it to take steps necessary to protect and advance shareholder interests. After the period in which such alternatives may be considered has ended, and the board has determined that such alternatives are not feasible or, at any rate, not better for the shareholders, the legitimate role of the poison pill has expired. At that point, the only function the pill serves is to prevent the shareholders from exercising their right to tender, as the poison pill, once activated, effectively forecloses the consummation of the tender offer.

Under the business judgment rule the burden shifts back to the plaintiffs who have the ultimate burden of persuasion in a preliminary injunction proceeding to show a breach of the directors' fiduciary duties. In order to rebut the protection of the business judgment rule, the burden on the plaintiffs is to demonstrate, by a preponderance of the evidence that the directors decisions were primarily based on (1) perpetuating themselves in office or, (2) some other breach of fiduciary duty such as fraud, overreaching, lack of good faith, or (3) being uninformed.

To demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits for injunctive relief, a defendant must fulfill two criteria: first, they must show that it is more probable than not that acquisition by plaintiffs will affect a "line of commerce" in "any section of the country." These respective determinations are informed by the elucidation of a relevant product market and a relevant geographic market. Second, defendants must show that it is more probable than not that plaintiffs' takeover may substantially lessen competition in the relevant product and geographic markets; the mere possibility of substantial impairment to competition will not suffice.

The outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use by consumers or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it. Interchangeability of use implies that one product or service is approximately equivalent to another; discounting any degree of preference for the one over the other, either product would work just as well. Cross-elasticity of demand refers to whether the demand for the second good or service would respond to change in the price of the first. In short, defining a relevant product market is a process of describing those groups of producers which, because of the similarity of their products or services, have the ability, actual or potential, to take significant amounts of business away from each other.

Under appropriate circumstances, a broad product market may be parsed into well-defined submarkets, each comprising a discrete line of commerce unto itself for the Clayton Act § 7, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18 purposes. If such a submarket(s) does exist, the court must scrutinize not only the broad, overall market, but must also examine the effects of a merger in each such economically significant submarket to determine if there is a reasonable probability that the merger will substantially lessen competition.

HN60 [blue icon] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

It is also important to examine the barriers to entry into the market, because without barriers to entry it would presumably be impossible to maintain supracompetitive prices for an extended time. Low barriers to entry into the market invite entry by new competitors and also expose firms well established in the market to the threat of potential entry. This in turn can induce those firms to hold prices, services, quality, and developments at competitive levels. The converse is also true: high entry barriers reduce the potential for increased competition by dissuading smaller firms from aggressively competing.

I. INTRODUCTION

Before the Court in this securities and antitrust matter are the parties' cross motions for preliminary injunctive relief and plaintiffs' motion to dismiss defendant's counterclaim. In their motion for a preliminary injunction, plaintiffs Moore Corporation Limited and its wholly-owned subsidiary FRDK, Inc. (collectively, "Moore") [2] seek to enjoin defendants Wallace Computer Services, Inc. and its Board of Directors (collectively, "Wallace," "Board," or "Wallace Board") from implementing Wallace's antitakeover devices or taking any other actions to impede Moore's tender offer. Moore contends that such antitakeover maneuvers constitute a breach of fiduciary duty to the Wallace shareholders. As principal relief, Moore seeks to compel Wallace to redeem its "poison pill," which according to Moore presents the most serious obstacle to the consummation of the tender offer.

Wallace has counterclaimed that Moore's tender offer, if consummated, would violate Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. In response, Moore has moved for dismissal of the counterclaim pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), arguing that Wallace has not alleged sufficient antitrust injury and therefore lacks standing to bring this claim. Wallace has also moved for a preliminary injunction as to this antitrust counterclaim.¹

[3] Consonant with the high stakes in this case, the parties have erected a voluminous record for the Court's consideration. Prior to, contemporaneous with, and following a preliminary injunction hearing, the Court has been "carpet bombed" ² with a rash of legal memoranda, over two hundred exhibits, myriad depositions, with separately filed excerpts and highlights from those same depositions, and a salmagundi of other documents. In addition to considering all of the above, the Court also will refer to testimony elicited at a three day preliminary injunction hearing held November 7-9, 1995.

HN1 [↑] Jurisdiction is based on diversity of citizenship, 28 U.S.C. § 1332, and federal question jurisdiction, 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 1337\(a\), 15 U.S.C. § 1541 26. HN2 [↑] Venue is proper under 28 U.S.C. § 1391\(c\) and 15 U.S.C. § 22. This opinion contains this Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 52\(a\); to the extent that findings of fact are placed among conclusions of law, they should be deemed findings of fact.

For the reasons set forth below, the Court will deny Moore's motion for preliminary injunction with respect to the breach of fiduciary duty claim and grant Moore's motion to dismiss Wallace's Clayton Act counterclaim. Wallace's motion for preliminary injunction with respect to the antitrust claims will therefore become moot.

II. THE PARTIES

Plaintiff Moore Corporation Limited is an Ontario, Canada corporation engaged in the business of delivering information handling products ("business forms" or "forms") and services, with its principal place of business in Toronto, Ontario. Docket Item ("D.I.") 1, P 7. Plaintiff FRDK, Inc. is a New York corporation with its principal place of business in Toronto, Ontario. Id. P 8. As a wholly-owned subsidiary of Moore Corporation Limited, FRDK, Inc. was incorporated for the purpose of making a tender offer for all outstanding Wallace stock in connection [5] with a proxy solicitation and merger. Id. P 8. Counterclaim defendant Braun is the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of Moore Corporation, Limited.

Defendant Wallace is a Delaware corporation engaged predominantly in the computer services and supply industry, with its principal place of business in Hillside, Illinois. Id. P 9. Defendants Robert J. Cronin ("Cronin"), Theodore Dimitriou ("Dimitriou"), Fred F. Canning ("Canning"), William N. Lane, III ("Lane"), Neele E. Stearns, Jr. ("Stearns"), R. Darrell Ewers ("Ewers"), Richard F. Doyle ("Doyle"), and William E. Olsen ("Olsen") are members of the eight-member Wallace Board of Directors. Of these eight directors, all but Cronin and Dimitriou are independent directors. Cronin presently serves as President and Chief Executive Officer of Wallace. Dimitriou formerly served as Chief Executive Officer, and now serves as Chairman of the Wallace Board.

III. MOORE'S FIDUCIARY DUTY CLAIM

A. Facts

As with all actions alleging breach of fiduciary duty by a target corporation's Board of Directors, a detailed examination of the actions of the Wallace Board is required to provide context to the claim. In February, 1995, [6] Moore's Chief Executive Officer Braun approached Wallace management proposing a possible business combination between Moore and Wallace. D.I. 176 at 2-3. On March 8, 1995, the Wallace Board instructed its Chief Executive Officer Cronin to advise Braun that Wallace had no interest in a business combination with Moore. Between February and June, 1995, attempts were made by Braun to meet with Cronin over lunch to discuss the matter, but the lunch meeting never occurred. On June 14, 1995, the Wallace Board approved an employment agreement for Cronin that provided Cronin, among other items, a severance package in the amount of $ 8 million in the event of a change in his job duties. D.I. 107, Deposition of Doyle ("Doyle Depo."), at 52. The substance of this agreement, in all pertinent respects, was identical to a prior agreement between Wallace and Dimitriou, Cronin's predecessor as Chief Executive Officer. Additionally, the Wallace Board adopted a bylaw amendment creating a 60-day notice requirement applicable to shareholders desiring to bring business for consideration at Wallace's annual meeting. Id. at 56.

On July 30, 1995, a Sunday, Moore announced its intention to commence a tender [7] offer for all outstanding shares of Wallace common stock (together with the associated preferred stock purchase rights that were issued in connection with Wallace's poison pill) at a price of $ 56 per share, a number which was determined with the advice of Moore's financial consultant Lazard Freres. The value of the proposed transaction was approximately $ 1.3 billion. D.I. 1, P 20. Moore intends, as soon as practicable after the consummation of the tender offer, to cause Wallace to merge with FRDK, and [*1551] purchase all shares not tendered. Concurrently with the tender offer, Moore has delivered proxy solicitation materials to the Wallace shareholders in order to nominate three individuals to serve as and replace the entire membership of the Wallace Board. Id. PP 21, 22. ³

The $ 56 tender offer was an all-cash offer for all shares that would [8] provide Wallace shareholders a premium of 27% over the market price of Wallace stock value as of the date of the announcement of the offer. Id. PP 24, 25. The offer was conditioned upon, inter alia, (a) the valid tender of a majority of all outstanding shares of Wallace's common stock on a fully-diluted basis on the date of purchase; (b) the redemption, invalidation or inapplicability of the rights allowed under the Preferred Stockholder Rights Plan (the poison pill); ⁴ [9] (c) Wallace Board approval of the acquisition of shares pursuant to the offer and proposed merger under Section 203 of the Delaware Business Combination Statute ("Section 203"); ⁵ (d) the proposed merger having been approved pursuant to Article Ninth of Wallace's Restated Certificate of Incorporation ("Article Ninth"), or the inapplicability of such article to the offer and proposed merger; ⁶ and (e) the availability of sufficient financing to consummate the offer and proposed merger. ⁷ Id. P 20.

[10] Moore communicated its intent to launch the tender offer to Wallace by leaving a telephone message that Sunday evening at Cronin's home. Upon receiving the information, Cronin contacted the Wallace Board and officers, and a group of advisors met them at their corporate headquarters. On Monday, July 31, Wallace, based on the recommendation of Dimitriou, retained Goldman Sachs ("Goldman") as its financial advisor to review the

⁵ Section 203 applies to any Delaware corporation that has not opted out of the statute's coverage. It provides that any person acquiring 15% or more of a company's voting stock (thereby becoming an "interested shareholder") may not engage in any business combination, including a merger, for three years after becoming such, unless that person obtains or has obtained certain approvals by the Board of Directors, or the affirmative vote of at least two-thirds of the outstanding voting stock not owned by the interested HN3 shareholder. See 8 Del. C. § 203.

⁶ Article Ninth, entitled "Certain Business Combinations," is designed to impede coercive and inadequate tender offers. It prohibits certain business combinations by any "interested shareholder" (defined to include any person who directly or indirectly owns 20% or more of the outstanding voting power of Wallace, or an affiliate or assignee thereof), unless the affirmative vote of at least 80% of the combined voting power of the then outstanding shares of Wallace stock is obtained. D.I. 1, PP 34, 35. Like the poison pill, Article Ninth was in place years before the initiation of the Moore tender offer.

adequacy of the Moore tender offer. Dimitriou recommended Goldman based on the fact that Goldman had previously done work for Wallace, and that Goldman enjoyed the reputation as being a leading investment firm.

That same day, at 8:30 a.m., Moore filed the complaint in this action seeking the Court to compel the removal of the antitakeover devices and to declare that the proposed merger complied with all applicable laws. See Moore Corp. v. Wallace Computer Servs., 898 F. Supp. 1089, 1995 WL 590561 (D.Del. 1995). Wallace moved to dismiss the complaint on the dual grounds that the action was not yet ripe, and that plaintiffs engaged in impermissible forum shopping. The motion was denied. See id. On August 1, 1995, the Wallace Board met for the first time to consider [11] the offer and to ratify the retention of Goldman as the company's financial advisor. [*1552] Doyle Depo. at 107.⁸

Cody Smith ("Smith"), a Goldman partner, headed his firm's evaluation of the proposed tender offer. In accordance with requests from Goldman, Wallace management provided a series of documents reflecting [12] historic information and future projections to Goldman on Monday, July 31, 1995. D.I. 107, Deposition of Michael J. Halloran ("Halloran Depo."), at 72-73. These documents, assembled and presented by Michael J. Halloran ("Halloran"), a Wallace vice president and its Chief Financial Officer, included the following: annual reports for preceding years, Securities and Exchange Commission Form 10K reports, proxy reports, quarterly statements for the first three fiscal quarters of 1995, and any current analysts reports Wallace had on file. Id. Additionally, Halloran provided Goldman with its June, 1995 Strategic Plan (the "Strategic Plan"). Id. at 73-74. All of the figures and data provided to Goldman were prepared exclusively by Wallace.

The Strategic Plan contained projections which were, in large part, dependent upon future acquisitions. However, Smith testified that but for one acquisition, the Strategic Plan acquisition-related projections were not used by Goldman in preparing its report. Transcript of Hearing ("Tr.") 440, 444-45. Goldman made no independent investigation of the figures supplied by Wallace, nor did it make any changes thereto, but did speak with department heads [13] at Wallace to review their component businesses, the basis of their forecasts, and the evidence supporting their forecasts. Id. at 423.

On August 4th, 1995, Goldman visited the Wallace headquarters in Hillside, Illinois. Wallace provided Goldman with its 1996 budget and additional supporting papers thereto. Wallace also gave Goldman its projections for fiscal year 1996 by quarter, as well as a projection through fiscal year 2000. The numbers set forth in the projections contained adjustments to reflect additional financial information which Wallace had gained in the two month interim since the Strategic Plan was created. Wallace then was asked to provide additional figures to include projections through the year 2002, which Wallace gave Goldman on August 9th. These projections contained more generous assumptions than previously supplied. Wallace explained that these more optimistic figures were given to Goldman because "we realized that we really had not given ourselves credit for some major initiatives we were taking to redo our manufacturing system," which was expected to be completed by the end of the calendar year 1996. Halloran Depo. at 118-119. Both subsequent sets of figures [14] contained higher projected earnings than the first set.

On August 11, 1995, the Wallace Board met for the purpose of reviewing the adequacy of the Moore offer. Goldman presented its preliminary opinion that $ 56 was inadequate. The Wallace Board took no action at that time. On August 14, 1995, the Board met again, when Goldman issued its final opinion as to the inadequacy of the Moore offer.⁹ The Board unanimously concluded that the offer was inadequate. Their decision was based on the presentation of Goldman and the results from the fourth quarter of fiscal 1995 (May, June and July). Wallace sales had increased 32% to 33% over the prior year and profits had increased 32%. Both the actual figures from the fourth quarter of fiscal 1995 and all of fiscal 1995 were record results and were above those projected by financial analysts. Additionally, the Wallace Board believed that the proposed union between the companies would present [*1553] antitrust concerns. On August 15, 1995, Wallace formally rejected Moore's offer. D.I. 28 at 2.

[15] On October 12, 1995, Moore raised its offer price to $ 60 per share. Again, the Wallace Board met to consider the offer. Additional material was given to Goldman to provide an updated set of data regarding their financial status. On October 17, 1995, Goldman presented its opinion that the $ 60 offer was inadequate. Goldman based its opinion in part on the fact that Wallace is presently generating and receiving the benefits of its capital expenditure plan for infrastructure such as the Wallace Information Network ("WIN") system, which has become successful only within the past two years.¹⁰ Tr. 429-30. Further, Wallace's recent alliance with United Stationers, an office products company, had begun to produce favorable returns. Id. at 430. Goldman also believed that a reorganization or recapitalization plan, which Wallace could adopt, would produce current value which could exceed $ 60 per share, yet still allow its shareholders to retain their ownership interest in the company, a result the Moore cash-out offer could not achieve. Id. at 431.

[16] The Board concurred in the Goldman conclusion that the price was inadequate, because recent financial results demonstrated continued improvement and momentum in the marketplace. At neither the August 14th nor the October 17th meeting did Goldman provide Wallace with a range of values that would be adequate or fair. Similarly, Goldman did not inform the Board the margin by which the Moore offers fell short of adequacy, nor did the Board ask. At both meetings, however, Goldman went through its materials with the Wallace Board and answered questions posed by the Board regarding the Goldman analysis. Tr. 421.

A hearing on Moore's motion for a preliminary injunction was held on November 7-9th, 1995. At that time, 73.4% of Wallace shareholders had tendered their shares. Moore alleges that the all cash tender offer, proposed merger, and proxy solicitation cannot be completed unless Wallace agrees to remove or make inapplicable its anti-takeover devices, including its poison pill, Article Ninth, and the protection of Section 203. D.I. 1, P 27. The Board's failure to redeem the poison pill, however, is the gravamen of Moore's prayer for injunctive relief.¹¹

[17] B. Analysis

1. Standard of Review

Before reaching the substantive issues in this case, the Court must determine the standard of review applicable to the Wallace Board's challenged actions. HN4 [↑] A shareholder challenge to board actions usually entails one of ¹⁰ A major asset of Wallace is its recently-developed computer system known as the "Wallace Information Network" ("WIN"). The WIN system is a set of computer programs that links together several other Wallace systems, such as its order entry, order management, manufacturing, inventory management, distribution and billing systems, for the purpose of delivering services and assisting the customer, as well as reducing costs. Tr. 220. The benefits WIN provides largely accrue to large, out-source customers because it enables them to control inventories, manage accounts and identify items for consolidation. Moore's internal documents reveal that (1) the WIN system is a superior system; (2) Moore entered into an agreement with Electronic Data Systems in a bid to engage in a technological catch-up which has not been successful, Tr. 60; and (3) Wallace has been beating Moore in head-to-head competition for large, forms-intensive customers with multiple locations.

¹¹ The Wallace Board is entitled under its poison pill to redeem the rights or make the poison pill inapplicable to the offer and proposed merger by an amendment to the rights agreement. D.I. 1, P 30. The Board is also empowered under Article Ninth to avoid the shareholder vote requirement by approving the transaction by a majority vote of the Board. Id. P 36. Finally, the Board has the right to opt out of Section 203's protection under Delaware law. Id. P 31. While the court notes that Moore also seeks to compel Wallace to make inapplicable Article Ninth of its Restated Certificate of Incorporation, and opt out of the protection of 8 Del. C. § 203, Moore's briefs submitted before and after oral argument confine its discussion to the poison pill. Additionally, no portion of oral argument was devoted to these defenses. Accordingly, the Court will so limit its discussion.

the following standards of judicial review: the traditional business judgment rule, the Unocal standard of enhanced judicial scrutiny, see Unocal Corp. v. Mesa Petroleum Co., 493 A.2d 946 (Del. 1985), or the [*1554] entire fairness standard, see, e.g., AC Acquisitions Corp. v. Anderson, Clayton & Co., 519 A.2d 103, 111 (Del. 1986). Unitrin, Inc. v. American Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1371 (Del. 1995). Determining the appropriate standard of review is not a task this Court takes lightly. "Because HN5[¹] the effect of the proper invocation of the business judgment rule is so powerful . . . , the determination of the appropriate standard of judicial review frequently is determinative of the outcome of [the] litigation." Id. (quoting Mills Acquisition Co. v. Macmillan, Inc., 559 A.2d 1261, 1279 (Del. 1988)). While the entire fairness standard has no application to the case presently before the Court,¹² HN6[¹] the [18] business judgment rule and Unocal enhanced scrutiny will apply. Accordingly, the Court will first address the interplay between the two standards of review.

[19] HN7[¹] The business judgment rule is a judicially-created doctrine which gives recognition to the fundamental tenet of Delaware General Corporation Law that directors are charged with managing the business and affairs of the corporation. See 8 Del. C. § 141. HN8[¹] It is a presumption that in making a business decision, the directors of a corporation act on an informed basis, in good faith and honest belief that the action taken was in the best interests of the corporation. Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812 (Del. 1984). HN9[¹] The bedrock principle embodied in HN10[¹] the business judgment rule is the court's reluctance to substitute its judgment for that of a board if the board's decision can be attributed to any rational business purpose. Sinclair Oil Corp. v. Levien, 280 A.2d 717, 720 (Del. 1971). HN11[¹] The plaintiff bears the initial burden and must establish facts sufficient to persuade the Court that the presumption of the business judgment rule has been rebutted and therefore the Court should substitute its own judgment for that of the Board. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1374.

HN12[¹] When a board is confronted with a hostile tender offer, it has the obligation to determine whether the offer is [20] in the best interests of the corporation and its shareholders. The board's duty to the shareholders in this context is no different from its duty in any other situation, and its decision should be entitled to the same deference it would receive in other matters. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 954. However, because directors might have some entrenchment motive, described by the Supreme Court of Delaware as the "omnipresent specter that a board may be acting primarily in its own interests, rather than those of the corporation and its shareholders," an "enhanced judicial scrutiny" is applicable to board decisions in the tender offer context. That standard must be satisfied before the board's actions are reviewed under the traditional business judgment rule. Id. This enhanced test places the initial burden upon the board to demonstrate compliance therewith before the presumption of the business judgment rule may be invoked. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1374.

HN13[¹] Under the enhanced judicial scrutiny test set forth in Unocal, the directors must show they had reasonable grounds for believing that a danger to corporate policy and effectiveness existed, a burden which is satisfied by showing [21] good faith and reasonable investigation. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955 (quoting Cheff v. Mathes, 41 Del. Ch. 494, 199 A.2d 548, 554-55 (Del. 1964)). This proof is materially enhanced where the board is comprised of a majority of outside independent directors who have complied with their duties of good [*1555] faith and reasonable investigation. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955; see also Aronson, 473 A.2d at 812. However, the board is not empowered with unbridled discretion to defeat any perceived threat by whatever draconian means available. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955. A defensive measure may only survive enhanced judicial scrutiny and fall within the purview of the business judgment rule if it is reasonable in relation to the threat posed. Id.

¹² The "entire fairness" standard of review applies "where a self-interested corporate fiduciary has set the terms of a transaction and caused its effectuation." AC Acquisitions Corp. v. Anderson, Clayton & Co., 519 A.2d 103, 111 (Del. 1986). A reviewing court must review the transaction and determine that the merits satisfy the court of its entire fairness, id., including scrutiny of both "fair dealing" and "fair price." Mills Acquisition Co. v. Macmillan, Inc., 559 A.2d 1261, 1280 (Del. 1988). The "entire fairness" standard applies "only if the presumption of the business judgment rule is defeated," Grobow v. Perot, 539 A.2d 180, 187 (Del. 1988) (citing Aronson v. Lewis, 473 A.2d 805, 812-17 (Del. 1984)), due to allegations of board self-dealing. See, e.g., Unitrin Inc. v. American Gen. Corp., 651 A.2d 1361, 1372 (Del. 1995) ("The Court of Chancery concluded that the Board's implementation of the poison pill and the Repurchase Program, in response to American General's Offer, did not constitute self-dealing that would require the Unitrin Board to demonstrate entire fairness."). Since there are no allegations in the present case of an interested transaction, this standard is inapplicable and will not be discussed.

HN14 [↑] Once the directors meet their burden under Unocal of showing a threat and response proportional to that threat, their actions will be subjected to review under the traditional business judgment rule. See Macmillan, 559 A.2d at 1288; see also In re Sea-Land Corp. Shareholders Litigation, 642 A.2d 792, 804 (Del. Ch. 1993) ("Before a board may receive the normal protection of the business judgment rule, it must demonstrate that its actions [22] were reasonable in relation to the advantage sought to be achieved or to the threat allegedly posed."). The Supreme Court of Delaware and Chancery Court have repeatedly held that HN15 [↑] the refusal to entertain an offer may comport with a valid exercise of the board's business judgment. Paramount Communications, Inc. v. Time, Inc., 571 A.2d 1140, 1152 (Del. 1989) ("Time"); Macmillan, 559 A.2d at 1285 n.35; Smith v. Van Gorkom, 488 A.2d 858, 881 (Del. 1985).

2. Preliminary Injunction Standard

In addition to bringing its legal position within the strictures of substantive Delaware corporate law, Moore must satisfy the procedural criteria for granting a preliminary injunction. Not surprisingly, at some point, the two burdens become intertwined. HN16 [↑] In a preliminary injunction proceeding, plaintiff bears the burden of establishing (1) the likelihood of success on the merits; (2) the extent of irreparable injury from the conduct complained of; (3) the extent of irreparable harm to the defendants if the preliminary injunction issues; and (4) effect on the public interest if relief were granted. Clean Ocean Action v. York, 57 F.3d 328, 331 (3d Cir. 1995); Opticians Ass'n of [23] Am. v. Independent Opticians of Am., 920 F.2d 187, 191-92 (3d Cir. 1990). In effect, the board must defeat the plaintiff's ability to discharge this burden by demonstrating that even under Unocal's enhanced scrutiny, the board's actions merited the protection of the business judgment rule. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1375. Plaintiff's likelihood of success on the merits, therefore, is a function of the board's inability to discharge its Unocal burden. See id.

In accordance with the Unocal analysis utilized by the Supreme Court of Delaware and the standard for a preliminary injunction recognized by the Third Circuit Court of Appeals, the Court will review the facts of the case sub judice under the following analytical framework. As to the likelihood of success on the merits: (1) Were the actions of the Wallace Board defensive? (2) If so, did the Wallace Board satisfy its burden under Unocal? (a) What was the nature of the threat perceived by the Wallace Board by the Moore tender offer? (b) Were the Wallace Board's actions reasonably proportionate to the perceived threat of the Moore tender offer? As to the balance of the equities and the public interest: [24] (1) Has Moore demonstrated irreparable injury if the relief sought is not granted? (2) Is the extent of Moore's injury if the injunction does not issue greater than the injury to Wallace if the injunction issues? (3) Has Moore shown that the relief sought is not adverse to the public interest?

a) Likelihood of Success on the Merits

i) Were the Actions Taken by the Wallace Board "Defensive"?

HN17 [↑] A defensive measure taken by the board in response to some perceived threat to the corporation is the sine qua non triggering Unocal's enhanced judicial scrutiny. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1372. Whether board action is "defensive" can be determined from a variety of factual circumstances, such as the timing of consideration and implementation of the measure in relation to the initial appearance of the corporate threat. See id. (poison pill, advance notice bylaw provision for shareholder proposals, and stock repurchase program, adopted by board after commencement of tender offer, deemed defensive measures); Gilbert v. El Paso Co., 575 A.2d 1131, 1136 (Del. 1990) (golden parachute [1556] agreements, Employee Savings and Stock Ownership Plans and shareholder supermajority [25] voting provisions adopted after initiation of tender offer deemed defensive measures). Proper determination of the defensive nature of the board's challenged actions is critical. If a particular measure taken by the board is not found to be defensive, the reviewing court must review the board's action under the business judgment rule. Id. at 1143-44 (a business combination plan which predates the outside bid is not a defensive measure and therefore not subject to Unocal's enhanced judicial scrutiny).

In the case sub judice, the allegedly defensive measures taken by the Wallace Board include the following: (1) the failure to redeem the poison pill; (2) the adoption of a "golden parachute" employment contract with Cronin; and (3) the amendment to the Wallace bylaws to require a 60-day advance notice period for shareholder proposals for the Wallace annual meeting. With respect to the failure to redeem the poison pill, the Court finds this to be a defensive measure. HN18¹⁵ Poison pills are, by definition, defensive. Even when they are adopted prior to a takeover bid as a preventative measure, they become defensive when the board fails to redeem them after a hostile tender offer is 26 commenced. See Moran v. Household Int'l, Inc., 500 A.2d 1346, 1350 \(Del. 1985\).

Evidence adduced at the evidentiary hearing persuaded the Court that the golden parachute component of Cronin's employment agreement was not adopted as a defensive measure. Doyle testified that the Wallace Board fully intended to adopt an employment agreement for Cronin, identical in all pertinent respects to that of Dimitriou, Cronin's predecessor, but for some reason failed to get around to it in a timely fashion. During this period of laxity, Moore had been attempting to lure Wallace management over to its company. Tr. 292. In addition to finding Doyle's testimony to be credible, the facts that such agreements are commonplace among chief executives of major companies and that Cronin's severance package was identical to that of his predecessor, persuade this Court that the adoption of the golden parachute agreement was not a defensive measure. The advance notice amendment to the Wallace bylaws is a mild defensive measure, see Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1369. However, it has played no role in either the tender offer or the proxy contest, which explains why it was not briefed or argued by either party. 27 Accordingly, enhanced judicial scrutiny will be limited to the Wallace Board's failure to redeem the poison pill.

ii) Unocal's Enhanced Judicial Scrutiny

(A) Did the Moore Offer Pose a Threat to Wallace?

HN19¹⁶ Unocal's first inquiry focuses upon the existence and nature of the threat to the target company. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955. Under this inquiry, the target board must demonstrate that after reasonable investigation, the board determined, in good faith, that the tender offer posed a threat to the corporation or its shareholders which warranted the adoption of a defensive measure. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1375. HN20¹⁷ An affirmative and precise determination of a threat must be demonstrated before moving to the second inquiry under Unocal, as this first inquiry informs the second. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1384 ("the nature of the threat associated with a particular hostile offer sets the parameters for the range of permissible defensive tactics."); see also Time, 571 A.2d at 1154 ("The obvious requisite to determining the reasonableness of a defensive action is a clear identification of the nature of the threat."). The Unocal Court also held that 28 the presence of a majority of outside directors will materially enhance the board's proof on this issue. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955.

Wallace argues that the Moore tender offer posed a serious threat to Wallace in that (1) the $ 56 and $ 60 offers are inadequate, (2) the offer is squarely contrary to Wallace's successful business strategy, and (3) the tender offer is illegal under the antitrust laws. Moore argues that the tender offer poses no threat to Wallace because, at least as to inadequacy, the Wallace Board never undertook to discover what an adequate or "fair" price for Wallace stock would be. Thus, Moore argues, Wallace has no basis upon which to determine that the allegedly inadequate [\[*1557\]](#) price constitutes a threat. Second, Moore argues that the alleged threat to Wallace's business plan is not legally cognizable, and dismisses as unwarranted Wallace's analogy to Time, 571 A.2d 1140. Third, Moore argues that the alleged antitrust concerns do not constitute a threat to Wallace, because, as Wallace itself admits, the antitrust litigation was commenced solely for the purposes of deterring the consummation of Moore's offer.

Since Unocal, Delaware courts have struggled to 29 determine what threats cited by target management as justification for defensive measures are legally cognizable. Early decisions presented easy cases for an affirmative determination of a threat. For example, in Unocal itself, the threat posed by the offer was due to the coercive nature of the offer.¹⁸ See Unocal, 493 A.2d at 956 (two-tier, "front-loaded" cash tender offer for approximately 37% of company's outstanding stock is inadequate and coercive, and posed a threat to shareholders); see also El Paso, 575 A.2d at 1145 (coercive, two-tier, partial tender offer is "serious" threat to shareholders). In those cases, the threat is obvious: shareholders will feel compelled to tender their shares to avoid being treated less favorably in the second stage of the transaction. See Time, 571 A.2d at 1152.

[30] HN22¹⁴ An inadequate, non-coercive tender offer may also pose a legally cognizable threat in two ways. First, the target corporation may be inclined to provide the shareholders with a more attractive alternative, but may need some additional time to formulate and present that option. During the interim, the threat is that shareholders might choose the inadequate tender offer only because the superior option has not yet been presented. See, e.g., City Capital Assoc. v. Interco Inc., 551 A.2d 787, 798 \(Del. Ch. 1988\) (retention of poison pill is appropriate response to give target time to develop an alternative plan to maximize shareholder value). Second, in addition to the threat of inadequacy, the board might also find that the danger that shareholders, tempted by the suitor's premium, might tender their shares in ignorance or mistaken belief as to management's representations of intrinsic value and future expectations. See, e.g., Time, 571 A.2d at 1153 (threat posed by the fact that "shareholders might elect to tender into Paramount's cash offer in ignorance or in a mistaken belief of the strategic benefit which a business combination with Warner might produce."); see also [31] Unitrin, 1994 Del. Ch. LEXIS 187, 1994 WL 698483 at *6 (Del. Ch. Oct. 13, 1994) ("Board HN23¹⁴ action may be necessary to protect stockholders from a 'low ball' negotiating strategy, or to allow the board to make an important decision over the management of the corporation. There are no limited categories of threats posed by an unsolicited offer, but the board's perception of a threat must be reasonable.") (citations omitted), *rev'd on other grounds, 651 A.2d 1361.*¹⁴

[32] [*1558] In determining whether the Wallace Board made a good faith determination after reasonable investigation that the Moore offer posed a threat, the Court is guided by a recent and closely analogous decision of the Supreme Court of Delaware in Unitrin, 651 A.2d 1361. There, the court determined that the Unitrin board reasonably perceived a threat to the corporation from the suitor's offer in that shareholders might mistakenly tender without knowledge as to the projected future value of the shares. The board cited several reasons for its determination of a threat: the board's belief that (1) Unitrin stock was worth more than the 50-3/8 offer price; (2) the tender offer price did not reflect Unitrin's long term business prospects as an independent company; (3) the "true value" of Unitrin was not reflected in the current market price of its common stock; (4) because of its strong financial position, Unitrin was well positioned to "pursue strategic and financial opportunities;" and (5) the merger with American General would have anticompetitive effects and thus raise antitrust concerns. Id. at 1370. The court deferred to the board's reasonable perception of the threat. Id.; cf. [33] Shamrock Holdings, Inc. v. Polaroid Corp., 559 A.2d 278, 289-90 \(Del. Ch. 1989\) (noncoercive, all cash, all shares, inadequate tender offer constitutes when they tender. For a detailed explanation of these terms, see City Capital Assoc. v. Interco Inc., 551 A.2d 787, 797 \(Del. Ch. 1988\).

- HN24¹⁵ (i) opportunity loss . . . [where] a hostile offer might deprive target shareholders of the opportunity to select a superior alternative offered by target management [or, we would add, offered by another bidder];
- (ii) structural coercion, . . . the risk that disparate treatment of non-tendering shareholders might distort shareholders' tender decisions; and a cognizable threat since target was on verge of winning a judgment in excess of $ 5 billion, an asset with a present value shareholders would be unable to value).
- (iii) substantive coercion, . . . the risk that shareholders will mistakenly accept an underpriced offer because they disbelieve management's representations of intrinsic value.

With these principles in mind, the Court turns to the evidence proffered by Wallace to determine whether it demonstrates the Board's good faith belief, made after reasonable investigation, that the Moore offer posed a legally cognizable threat. First, the procedure followed by the Wallace Board in assessing each offer by Moore demonstrates reasonable investigation for purposes of Unocal. When Moore's first offer of $ 56 was made, the Wallace Board met three times within two weeks to review the terms of the offer and assess its merits. Wallace retained Goldman as its investment banker to review the financial aspects of the proposed transaction. Goldman prepared its analysis by using projections which were reasonably related to past growth and historical data which was provided by Wallace management. Collectively, the Board considered Wallace's current business plans [34] and strategies, its financial projections, its current financial results and future projections, and the opinion of Goldman in arriving at its decision that the $ 56 offer was inadequate. Further, several individual members of the Board took the position that, based on their knowledge and experience, the offer seemed to be a "low ball" offer.¹⁵ The same investigative procedure was followed when Moore raised its offer price to $ 60. Updated financial information was given to Goldman which represented the actual, rather than projected, 1995 figures. After Goldman analyzed the information, Goldman again arrived at the conclusion that the $ 60 offer was also inadequate. The Board considered the presentation of Goldman and arrived at its conclusion that the second offer was also inadequate.

[35] The Wallace Board's decision reflected consideration of a variety of factors which were also reflected in the Goldman report, including the belief that the fourth quarter of fiscal 1995 (May, June and July, 1995), promised to be a good one. That belief became a reality: sales had increased 32% to 33% over the prior year, and profits had increased 32%. The fact that Wallace is generating [*1559] and receiving the benefits of its capital expenditure plan, specifically the WIN system, as well as Wallace's recent alliance with United Stationers which had begun to produce favorable returns, were also considered. These data suggested to the Board that Wallace could achieve returns greater than Moore's offer, while allowing the shareholders to retain their ownership interest. Accordingly, the Court cannot conclude that the Wallace Board lacked good faith or acted unreasonably in its investigation of the Moore offer.

Moore argues that the Wallace Board has not demonstrated good faith and reasonable investigation, on the ground that the preparation performed by Goldman was unreliable because of the optimistic figures provided by Wallace management. Specifically, Moore argues that Goldman based its [36] future earnings projections on management's assumption that 30% of future profits and 38% of future sales were expected to be derived from acquisitions. However, the associated costs, share dilution, and amortization of goodwill in connection therewith were not similarly figured into its projections, and thus the results, reflecting the benefits but not the costs, were "useless." Smith, however, specifically denied using the acquisition-related figures, with the exception of one projected acquisition, testimony which was unrebutted by Moore. The testimony of Halloran corroborated Smith's statement. Tr. 375, Defense Exhibit ("DX") 33B.

Additionally, the Court finds that the financial projections assumed by Wallace were not unrealistic. In its Strategic Plan, which was provided to Goldman, Wallace had assumed certain growth percentages which proved to be

I think that Wallace, personally, is the epitome of what a successful American company ought to be. If we go back to the middle sixties, Wallace decided that it would change basically -- would start to change from being basically a manufacturing and production company to a sales/marketing-oriented company that was very customer-oriented. It has -- today, it is, in my judgment, the best company in its field with respect to technology. It has an exceptionally dedicated and high-morale work force. It has a good experienced management. It has an excellent balance sheet with very little debt and a large cash position. It's in a -- in a market where many of its competitors are in trouble and, therefore, Wallace has great opportunity for success over the next five, ten years.

conservative with respect to actual numbers. Halloran Depo. at 172-73. When Wallace was asked to provide updated figures to Goldman, Halloran determined the percentage of actual growth of the company by using actual numbers representing the growth for fiscal 1994 and fiscal 1995. That percentage was then used to project future growth [37] through the year 2002. To the extent that any prediction of future values has any indicia of trustworthiness, this was a reasonable means to project future values. This finding is bolstered by the fact that its previous projections, based on projected growth in the 1995 strategic plan, had been lower than actual results. Furthermore, Wallace's projections for growth into fiscal years 1996 and 1997 were lower in most instances than the actual growth Wallace experienced in fiscal 1995.¹⁶ [38] While these statistics might be misleading since the Court cannot ascertain the viability of future markets in those areas, at the very least, they indicate a principled assessment of future growth, which hardly rises to the level of bad faith.¹⁷

Furthermore, the Wallace Board could reasonably conclude, based on the upward trend in earnings per share, that the company was well-positioned to reap economic benefits in the future, which would support their initial reaction that the Moore offer seemed "low ball." A review of the earnings per share growth data from recent quarters demonstrates this trend.¹⁸ For the first quarter of fiscal 1995, Wallace reported $ 0.52 earnings per share growth. This number increased to $ 0.60 for the second quarter of fiscal 1995, to $ 0.64 for the third quarter, and finally reached $ 0.70 for the fourth quarter. Figures for the first quarter of fiscal 1996, recently released, confirmed this upward trend: earnings per share growth reached [*1560] $ 0.85.¹⁹ [40] Additionally, [39] the results from the first quarter of fiscal 1996, as compared to the same quarter of fiscal 1995, surpassed management's projections. Management projected a 34% increase in sales and a 50% increase in earnings for the first quarter of fiscal 1996 over the same quarter for 1995. Tr. 409-10. The actual figures for the first quarter of fiscal 1996 were 35.4% and 63.5%, respectively.²⁰ See D.I. 181 at Exh. A.²¹

Finally, as the Unocal court noted, HN25[↑] the target board's proof under Unocal is materially enhanced where board's approval [41] was comprised of a majority of outside independent directors who exercised good faith and

¹⁷ For example, Mr. Cronin testified that some of the markets in which Wallace is engaged are declining. The business forms industry is predicted to decline between 3% and 5% per year, according to industry analysts. Tr. 317. Thus, a declining market would probably require Wallace to predict declining sales and profits growth in that area.

¹⁸ The following series of numbers excludes takeover-related costs.

²⁰ On November 20, 1995, Wallace reported results from the first quarter of fiscal 1996 as follows:

Wallace Computer Services, Inc. . . . reported that sales for its first quarter ended October 31, 1995 increased 35.4 percent to $ 214.4 million compared to $ 158.4 million for the first quarter last year. Before takeover expenses, net income rose 65.6 percent to $ 19.3 million compared to $ 11.6 million last year, and earnings per share rose 63.5 percent to 85 cents compared to 52 cents per share achieved in fiscal 1995. These results exceeded the company's most recent forecast and all analyst projections.

D.I. 181, at Exh. A.

²¹ The Court also recognizes that these increases in growth have been somewhat retarded by the pendency of the Moore bid. As Wallace's November 20, 1995 press releases states, "the hostile takeover bid was delaying the signing of some new contracts, and in its absence, results could be even higher." D.I. 181 at Exh. A.

reasonable investigation.²² Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955. Their "independent" status, coupled with the substance of and procedures utilized in their review of the Moore offers, satisfies this Court that Wallace has met its initial burden under Unocal to demonstrate, by proof of good faith and reasonable investigation, that the Moore offer posed a threat to Wallace and its shareholders.

[42] This case presents a factual scenario different from that which normally occurs. In most cases, the target seeks to persuade the Court that the hostile tender offer posed a threat to the company's future plans and the company's shareholders which justified the defensive measures until the expected benefits of the plan come into fruition. Here, however, the directors seek to prove that the hostile tender offer poses a threat of a different nature. The favorable results from the board's past actions are now beginning to be translated into financial results which even surpass management and financial analyst projections, and the financial data which manifests these results are facts only known to them. Therefore, Moore's tender offer poses a threat that shareholders might tender their shares without appreciating the fact that after substantial capital investment, Wallace is actually witnessing the beginning of the pay-off of its business strategy. The Court therefore finds that Moore's tender offer poses a threat to Wallace that shareholders, because they are uninformed, will cash out before realizing the fruits of the substantial technological innovations [*1561] achieved by Wallace. Accordingly, [43] the Court turns its attention to the second Unocal inquiry, which evaluates the proportionality of the target board's response.

(B) Did the Actions of the Wallace Board Constitute a Reasonable Response?

The second prong of the Unocal enhanced scrutiny requires that once the threat has been identified, the board must prove that its defensive measure[s] constituted a response which was reasonably proportionate to the magnitude of the threat. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955. HN26 A claim for breach of fiduciary duty arising out of a board's failure to redeem a poison pill are reviewed under the enhanced scrutiny provided by Unocal. Moran, 500 A.2d at 1356; Stahl v. Apple Bancorp, Inc., 1990 Del. Ch. LEXIS 121, 1990 WL 114222 at *6 (Del. Ch. Aug. 9, 1990). HN27 Reasonableness turns on an assessment by the directors of the nature of the tender offer and the effect such offer would have on the corporate enterprise. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955. Factors relevant to this assessment include (1) inadequacy of the price offered; (2) nature and timing of the offer; (3) questions of illegality; (4) the impact on "constituencies" other than the shareholders (i.e., creditors, customers, employees, and perhaps [44] even the community generally); (5) the risk of nonconsummation; and (6) the qualities of the securities being offered in the exchange. Id.

Wallace argues that since the Moore tender offer has commenced, it has only taken three actions: (1) rejected the Moore offers for $ 56 and $ 60 per share, (2) authorized the commencement of antitrust litigation, and (3) declined to redeem the poison pill. Wallace argues that these actions are clearly reasonable and proper, given the gravity of the threat posed by Moore's offer. Wallace asserts that the decision not to redeem the poison pill is not draconian, because it in no way presents any obstacle to Moore's proxy contest. Moore argues that a fortiori, no threat exists, but that in any event, Wallace's actions were not reasonably proportionate. Since the Wallace Board never informed itself as to what a "fair" or "adequate" price would be, Moore reasons, it was poorly positioned to determine whether a threat due to inadequacy exists as an initial matter, thus obfuscating any meaningful determination of proportionate response, and concomitantly negating any justification for keeping the poison pill in place.

As an initial matter, the [45] Court notes that HN28 poison pills serve legitimate functions which create no fiduciary duty issue. For example, if a hostile tender offer is commenced at a share value which the board, in good faith and after reasonable investigation, determines to be "inadequate," the board may justifiably leave the pill in place for a period of time so as to enable it to take steps necessary to protect and advance shareholder interests. See, e.g., City Capital, 551 A.2d at 798. Such permissible actions include negotiation on behalf of the shareholders with the offeror, recapitalization or restructuring as an alternative to the offer, Revlon-style auctioning, should Revlon duties be triggered, or the arrangement for an otherwise better and value-maximizing alternative than that posed by the tender offer. Id.; see also Stahl, 1990 Del. Ch. LEXIS 121, 1990 WL 114222 at *8 (failure to redeem pill was reasonable in relation to threat since it preserved the board's ability to explore alternatives to enhance shareholder value). After the period in which such alternatives may be considered has ended, and the board has determined that such alternatives are not feasible or, at any rate, not better for the shareholders, [46] the legitimate role of the poison pill has expired. City Capital, 551 A.2d at 798. At that point, the only function the pill serves is to prevent the shareholders from exercising their right to tender, as the poison pill, once activated, effectively forecloses the consummation of the tender offer.

However, HN29[[↑]] failing to redeem a poison pill can be justified by considerations other than maximizing current share value. In Time, the Supreme Court of Delaware noted, "Absent a limited set of circumstances as defined under Revlon, a board of directors, while always required to act in an informed manner, is not under any per se duty to maximize shareholder value in the short term, even in the context of a takeover." Time, 571 A.2d at 1150. The Time court further observed that "directors HN30[[↑]] are not [*1562] obliged to abandon a deliberately conceived corporate plan for a short-term shareholder profit unless there is clearly no basis to sustain the corporate strategy." Id. at 1154; see also Mai Basic Four, Inc. v. Prime Computer, 1988 Del. Ch. LEXIS 161, 1988 WL 140221 at *4 (Del. Ch. Dec. 20, 1988) ("Prime has recently obtained new management and is only now on the verge of reaping the economic benefits [47] of its recent acquisition of Computervision. As a result, the projections by Prime's management for the future are optimistic."); compare, Sutton Holding Corp. v. DeSoto, Inc., 1990 Del. Ch. LEXIS 15, *23, 1990 WL 13476 at *8 (Del. Ch. Feb. 5, 1990) (management's failure to attempt to maximize shareholder value, and reliance on a modest restructuring plan which had been prepared in the ordinary course of business, falls short of the business plan of Time, and thus ordering of the immediate redemption of the poison pill would ordinarily be required).

Delaware courts have recognized that at some point, HN31[[↑]] the failure to redeem a poison pill can constitute a fiduciary breach. "Our cases, however, also indicate that in the setting of a noncoercive offer, absent unusual facts, there may come a time when a board's fiduciary duty will require it to redeem the rights and to permit the shareholders to choose." City Capital, 551 A.2d at 798-99 (failure to redeem the poison pill, to enable board to implement restructuring plan projected to produce modest increase in share value, constituted an unreasonable response to the threat posed by noncoercive tender offeror); see also Grand Metro. Public Ltd. v. Pillsbury [48] Co., 558 A.2d 1049, 1057-58 \(Del. Ch. 1988\) (failure to redeem poison pill in order to implement board's restructuring plan projected to offer greater share value was unreasonable in relation to threat posed by noncoercive tender offer, since projected benefits of plan may never come into fruition).

HN32[[↑]] While Unocal gave no direct guidance to courts applying the proportionality test, the Court did expressly define the outer parameter of board action by condemning any action which is "draconian" as not reasonably proportionate to the perceived threat. Unocal, 493 A.2d at 955. Draconian measures have been described as measures which are coercive or preclusive with respect to the outside bid. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1387-88. HN33[[↑]] Board actions that are coercive in nature or force upon shareholders a management-sponsored alternative to a hostile offer, even if the threat is valid, may be struck down as unreasonable and nonproportionate responses. See Time, 571 A.2d at 1154-55 ("Time's responsive action to Paramount's tender offer was not aimed at 'cramming down' on its shareholders a management-sponsored alternative, but rather had as its goal the carrying forward of a preexisting [49] transaction in an altered form. Thus, the response was reasonably related to the threat."). HN34[[↑]] If a defensive measure is not preclusive or coercive, Unocal requires the action to fall within a "range of reasonableness." Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1387-88; Paramount Communications Inc. v. QVC Network Inc., 637 A.2d 34, 45 \(Del. 1993\) ("QVC"). As the Unitrin court noted, "proper and proportionate defensive responses are intended and permitted to thwart perceived threats," and the board need not wait for the actual takeover to be commenced, when it reasonably perceives the takeover threat to be imminent:

HN35 When a corporation is not for sale, the board of directors is the defender of the metaphorical medieval corporate bastion and the protector of the corporation's shareholders. The fact that a defensive action must not be coercive or preclusive does not prevent a board from responding defensively before a bidder is at the corporate bastion's gate.

Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1388. The rationale for this "range of reasonableness" standard, as explained by the Unitrin court, is that directors need a degree of latitude in discharging their fiduciary duties when defending [50] against threats to the company. That latitude, combined with an appropriate amount of judicial restraint, results in a reviewing court's upholding the board's defensive actions, provided the actions are not coercive or preclusive. See id. at 1388.

In Unitrin, the board's response to the hostile tender offer was found not to be preclusive or coercive. The challenged actions taken were the adoption of poison pill, advance notice provision in bylaws for shareholder [*1563] proposals, and a repurchase program. The Unitrin board determined that the inadequate price of the offer and potential antitrust complications caused the American General offer to be a threat. Discarding the antitrust concerns as frivolous, see Unitrin, 1994 Del. Ch. LEXIS 187, 1994 WL 698483, at *8, the Chancery Court determined that the inadequate price threat was "mild" because the offer was negotiable both in price and structure. Id. at *7. However, even in the face of a mild threat, the Chancery Court upheld the board's adoption of the poison pill because the board reasonably believed the price was inadequate and feared that the shareholders would not realize that the long term value of Unitrin was not reflected in the market [51] price of the stock. Id. at *8. This finding was not contested on appeal to the Supreme Court of Delaware. Compare, QVC, 637 A.2d at 49-50 (defensive measures designed to protect desired merger with Viacom deemed draconian in light of "threat" posed by QVC all cash tender offer for majority of Paramount shares, offering aggregate premium of over $ 1 billion).

In the present case, retention of the poison pill is not draconian. HN36 The Board's decision not to redeem the pill is not coercive or preclusive. First, retention of the pill will have no discriminatory effect on shareholders, as is generally the result in any situation involving a coercive offer. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1388 ("A selective repurchase of shares in a public corporation on the market, such as Unitrin's Repurchase Program, generally does not discriminate because all shareholders can voluntarily realize the same benefit by selling."); Second, and more important, retention of the pill will have no effect on the success of the proxy contest. See Moran, 500 A.2d at 1357 ("We reject appellants' contentions . . . that the Rights Plan fundamentally restricts proxy contests."); see also Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1383 [52] (concluding that a proxy contest is not precluded by the existence of a poison pill, supermajority voting requirement and fully implemented stock repurchase plan); Time, 571 A.2d at 1155 (Time board's response to the Paramount bid not preclusive because Paramount was still able to make an offer for the combined Time-Warner entity or amend the conditions of its offer to eliminate the requirement that the Time-Warner agreement be nullified). Here, the poison pill is only triggered upon the acquisition of 20% of the shares of Wallace stock. Therefore, so long as Moore maintains a stock ownership percentage below that amount, it may safely wage its proxy contest free from the dramatic effect of the poison pill.

Since the Court finds that the retention of the poison pill was not a coercive or preclusive response, it must merely be satisfied that it fell within a "range of reasonableness" to survive Unocal scrutiny. QVC, 637 A.2d at 45-46. The evidence demonstrates that the Wallace Board reasonably believed that the shareholders were entitled to protection from what they considered to be a "low ball" offer. See, e.g., Unitrin, 1994 Del. Ch. LEXIS 187, 1994 WL 698483 at *8 ("It HN37 is the prerogative [53] of the directors of a Delaware corporation to determine that the market undervalues the price of its stock and to protect its stockholders from offers that do not reflect the long term value of the corporation under its present management plan."). After substantial capital investment spanning several years, Wallace had finally begun to reap the financial benefits from its WIN system. Cf. Mai Basic Four, 1988 Del. Ch. LEXIS 161, 1988 WL 140221 at *4 ("Prime has recently obtained new management and is only now on the verge of reaping the economic benefits of its recent acquisition"). These benefits, however, were reflected in data which remained peculiarly within the province of the Wallace Board. Shareholders, at the time of the Moore offer, were unable to appreciate the upward trend in Wallace's earnings which have been set forth in detail above. Given this situation, the Wallace Board's response can hardly be deemed unreasonable. In light of the foregoing, the Court concludes the Wallace Board has demonstrated that its retention of the poison pill falls within the range of reasonableness required under Unocal. See Unitrin, 651 A.2d at 1388.²³

[54] [*1564] Having concluded that retention of the poison pill was proportionate to the threat the Wallace Board believes Moore's tender offer poses, the poison pill is entitled to review HN38 under the business judgment rule. The burden now shifts "back to the plaintiffs who have the ultimate burden of persuasion [in a preliminary injunction proceeding] to show a breach of the directors' fiduciary duties." In order to rebut the protection of the business judgment rule, the burden on the plaintiffs will be to demonstrate, 'by a preponderance of the evidence that the directors' decision were primarily based on [(1)] perpetuating themselves in office or [(2)] some other breach of fiduciary duty such as fraud, overreaching, lack of good faith, or [(3)] being uninformed.' Unocal, 493 A.2d at 958 (emphasis added)."Unitrin, Inc., 651 A.2d at 1390 (internal citation omitted).

Moore has not carried its burden. It is held the decision of the Wallace Board not to redeem the poison pill was a valid exercise of its business judgment.

b) Hardship to Moore, Wallace, and the Public Interest

While Moore has not succeeded in showing a likelihood of success on the merits, the Court will briefly [55] discuss the other requirements for a preliminary injunction. HN39 In ruling on a preliminary injunction, the Court must weigh the extent of hardship to the plaintiff if the requested relief is not granted against the hardship to the defendant if the relief is granted. See Clean Ocean Action, 57 F.3d at 331. Moore argues that if the Court does not issue a preliminary injunction, Moore will continue to suffer the consequences of the Wallace Board's breach of fiduciary duty by not having its tender offer put to the shareholders. Furthermore, Moore argues, the availability of the proxy contest does not negate Moore's right to an equitable remedy, especially since Wallace plans to rely on its defensive supermajority voting requirements to block the offer and thwart the overwhelming desires of the shareholders. Wallace argues that Moore has failed to put forward any evidence of injury since the option of a proxy contest is still available to Moore. Furthermore, Wallace argues it will suffer irreparable injury in that the company will cease to exist if the tender offer were to succeed, and there could therefore never be a trial on the merits. Finally, since this would be a cash-out merger, [56] the Wallace shareholders will be deprived of their right to participate in the emerging glowing financial results of Wallace. A preliminary injunction would also grant Moore access to Wallace's WIN system, a move which could not later be 'unscrambled.' It is Wallace's technology which is enabling it to beat Moore in head-to-head competition. If a preliminary injunction were granted, there is a real possibility that Moore would gain access to that technology prior to trial. If that were to happen, Wallace will have lost its technological advantage and with it, its competitive edge.

The Court finds Wallace's arguments persuasive. First, Moore has not demonstrated irreparable injury if the preliminary injunction does not issue. Moore may still wage its proxy contest. Second, and perhaps most importantly, to the extent that Moore would suffer injury if relief were denied, Wallace's injury if the injunctive relief is granted would be far greater. HN40 At the preliminary injunction stage of a hostile tender offer case, the Court must be extremely cautious when determining whether to grant the relief, given the dramatic consequences of the action. Cf. United States v. Spectro Foods Corp., 571 544 F.2d 1175, 1181 \(3d Cir. 1976\) ("The power to issue a preliminary injunction, especially a mandatory one, should be sparingly exercised."). Finally, the public interest favors neither side.

IV. WALLACE'S ANTITRUST COUNTERCLAIM

²³ The Wallace Board also had concerns as to whether the acquisition of Wallace by Moore would violate federal antitrust law. Although this Court has, for preliminary injunction purposes, concluded that it would not, as appears infra, one cannot say there was not legitimate substance to this concern. If there were antitrust standing, it is unknown what result would obtain after a full-blown trial.

A. Antitrust Standing

1. Background

Moore concedes that "on HN41[] a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, all allegations [1565] in the pleadings must be accepted as true." Schrob v. Catterson, 948 F.2d 1402, 1405 (3d Cir. 1991); see also In re Solar Mfg. Corp., 200 F.2d 327, 333 (3d Cir. 1952) (applying same standard to counterclaims), cert. denied, 345 U.S. 940 (1953). The Court will assume the veracity of the facts as averred by Wallace in the context of Moore's motion to dismiss.

According to Wallace's allegations, Moore and Wallace compete in the manufacture and sale of business forms. Wallace Counterclaim, Count One, P 13, D.I. 40. Wallace asserts in its antitrust counterclaim that "if Moore were to acquire Wallace, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition in the relevant product and geographic market, thus violating Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18." D.I. 40, Counterclaim [*58] at P19. Wallace also avers that unless the Court enjoins Moore's takeover attempt, Wallace will suffer irreparable harm flowing from the antitrust infirmity, including but not limited to, "loss of independent decision making authority, loss of trade secrets, loss of employees, and loss of customers." Id. at P 20.

2. Analysis

HN42[] Under Section 16 of the Clayton Act, "any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief . . . against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 26. As HN43[] an antitrust plaintiff, Wallace must, however, allege and ultimately prove that it would suffer threatened loss or damage constituting an "antitrust injury." Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 113, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427, 107 S. Ct. 484 (1986); The Treasurer, Inc. v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 682 F. Supp. 269, 273 (D.N.J.), aff'd mem. op., HN44[] 853 F.2d 921 (3d Cir. 1988). Antitrust injury involves injury "of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Cargill, 479 U.S. at 109 (citing Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo [*59] Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977)).

Prior to the Cargill decision, Supreme Court precedent under the Clayton Act required a Clayton Act plaintiff to demonstrate the threat of "antitrust injury" when suing for damages. Brunswick Corp., 429 U.S. at 489. However, there raged a debate in the lower courts as to whether a Clayton Act injunctive plaintiff needed to establish antitrust injury when seeking injunctive relief. See, e.g., CIA Petrolera Caribe, Inc. v. ARCO Caribbean, Inc., 754 F.2d 404, 407-08 (1st Cir. 1985) (plaintiff need only show threat of injury emanating from the antitrust violation); Board of Regents v. National Collegiate Athletic Assoc., 707 F.2d 1147, 1151 (10th Cir.), aff'd, 468 U.S. 85, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70, 104 S. Ct. 2948 (1983) (Brunswick standing limitation not fully applicable to suit for injunctive relief); but see, e.g., Local Beauty Supply, Inc. v. Lamac Inc., 787 F.2d 1197 (7th Cir. 1986) (plaintiff need show "antitrust injury" to fulfill standing requirement); Schoenkopf v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 637 F.2d 205 (3d Cir. 1980) (same). This debate extended to merger cases involving [*60] standing of target companies to assert Clayton Act violations as well. See, e.g., Laidlaw Acquisition Corp. v. Mayflower Group, Inc., 636 F. Supp. 1513, 1516-17 (S.D. Ind. 1986) (target plaintiff has standing to sue in antitrust case); Gearhart Indus., Inc. v. Smith Int'l, Inc., 592 F. Supp. 203, 211 n.1 (N.D. Tex.) (same), aff'd in part, modified and vacated in part, 741 F.2d 707 (5th Cir. 1984); but see, e.g., Central Nat'l Bank v. Rainbolt, 720 F.2d 1183, 1186-87 (10th Cir. 1983) (target corporation lacked standing in antitrust case to sue for injunctive relief); A.D.M. Corp. v. SIGMA Instruments, Inc., 628 F.2d 753 (1st Cir. 1980) (same); Carter Hawley Hale Stores, Inc. v. Limited, Inc., 587 F. Supp. 246, 250 (C.D. Cal. 1984).

In Cargill, the Supreme Court finally repaired the rent in the Circuits over this issue. The Court held that HN45[] a plaintiff seeking an injunction under Section 16 of the Clayton Act must show a threat of "antitrust injury" in order to fulfill the standing requirement. In that case, the nation's fifth-largest beef packer, Monfort of Colorado ("Monfort"), sought an injunction in a challenge to a merger between the nation's second and [61] [*1566] third-largest beef packers. Cargill, 479 U.S. at 106. The Court first acknowledged that HN46[¹] under the Clayton Act's statutory scheme, its standing analysis for injunctive relief would "not always be identical" to standing analysis for damages. Id. at 111 n.6. Notwithstanding this caveat, the Court went on to declare HN47[¹] it to be "anomalous . . . to read the Clayton Act to authorize a private plaintiff to secure an injunction against a threatened injury for which he would not be entitled to compensation if the injury actually occurred." Id. at 112. Following this reasoning, the Court held that a plaintiff seeking injunctive relief under Section 16 of the Clayton Act must allege antitrust injury. Id. at 113.

A survey of both case law and scholarly commentary subsequent to the Cargill decision spurs this Court to conclude that HN48[¹] the target of a hostile takeover has no standing to bring a Section 7 Clayton Act claim. See e.g., Anago, Inc. v. Tecnol Medical Prod., Inc., 976 F.2d 248 (5th Cir. 1992) (target has no standing to bring Clayton antitrust claim), cert. dismissed, 114 S. Ct. 491 (1993); Burnup & Sims, Inc. v. Posner, 688 F. Supp. 1532 (S.D. Fla. 1988) (same); [62] Burlington Indus., Inc. v. Edelman, 666 F. Supp. 799 (M.D.N.C. 1987) (same), aff'd, 1987 WL 91498 (4th Cir. June 22, 1987); II Phillip Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law, P 381b, at 332 (Rev. Ed. 1995) (same); Andrew Zuckerman, Standing of Targets of Hostile Takeovers to Enjoin Their Acquisition on Antitrust Grounds, 1992/1993 Ann. Sur. Am. Law 447 (same); but see contra Joseph F. Brodley, Antitrust Standing in Private Merger Cases: Reconciling Private Incentives and Public Enforcement Goals, 94 Mich. L. Rev. 1 \(1995\). This line of cases and commentary has cited various grounds pursuant to Cargill to justify a lack of target standing in Clayton Act cases.

For example, courts have regarded HN49[¹] any alleged injury suffered by a target in a merger as being inherent to the merger process rather than flowing from any anticompetitive effect of the merger. See Burnup, 688 F. Supp. at 1534; Burlington, 666 F. Supp. at 805. Another rationale for finding a lack of target standing is the view that rather than suffering injury, the target and its shareholders ultimately benefit from any increased prices or decreased competition stemming from the merger. Anago, I^{63} 976 F.2d at 251; Burlington, 666 F. Supp. at 805. Finally, courts have even found that disingenuous antitrust suits may be brought by targets to thwart the loss of control to be suffered by management, as opposed to any motives relating to antitrust. In that vein, courts have not shied from the type of cynicism first articulated by Judge Friendly:

Drawing Excalibur from a scabbard where it would doubtless remain sheathed in the face of a friendly offer, the target company typically hopes to obtain a temporary injunction which may frustrate the acquisition since the offering company may well decline the expensive gambit of a trial

Missouri Portland Cement Co. v. Cargill, Inc., 498 F.2d 851, 854 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 883, 42 L. Ed. 2d 123, 95 S. Ct. 150 (1974). See also Burnup, 688 F. Supp. at 1534 ("The suit must be understood in its true sense, an attempt by the incumbent management to defend their own positions, not as an attempt to vindicate any public interest.").

Demonstrating a resistance to change even in light of Cargill, precedent from the Second Circuit Court of Appeals takes the opposite view. See Consolidated Gold [64] Fields PLC v. Minorco, S.A., 871 F.2d 252 (2d Cir. 1989) (target corporation found to have standing to sue for Clayton Act violation), cert. dismissed, 492 U.S. 939, 110 S. Ct. 29, 106 L. Ed. 2d 639 (1989). In Consolidated Gold Fields, the court held that the plaintiff target would suffer antitrust injury because its "loss of independence [was] causally linked to the injury occurring in the marketplace." Consolidated Gold Fields, 871 F.2d at 258. However, the loss of independent decision making, intrinsic to any takeover case, runs counter to Cargill's mandate that "plaintiffs must show more than simply an 'injury causally linked' to a particular merger." Cargill, 479 U.S. at 109 (citing Brunswick, 429 U.S. at 489).

[*1567] This principle is further illuminated in the Consolidated Gold Fields dissenting opinion, where Judge Altimari posed the following hypothetical:

Each of the injuries [such as loss of decision making power] alleged by Gold Fields would occur if the combining corporations controlled a total market share of only 2% [implying no anticompetitive result], or if the entity attempting the takeover was not a competitor of the target.

Consolidated Gold Fields, Inc., [\[*65\]](#) 871 F.2d at 264 (Altimari, J., dissenting). The dissent also pointed to a further flaw in the Consolidated Gold Fields reasoning, where the majority expressly relied on a decision which did not have the benefit of the Supreme Court's reasoning in Cargill and whose continued vitality was therefore limited. Id. (citing Grumman Corp. v. LTV Corp., 665 F.2d 10 (2d Cir. 1981)).

The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has recognized that articulation of a precise formulation for antitrust standing is a continuing struggle, as standing is a somewhat "malleable concept." Alberta Gas Chemicals, Ltd. v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours and Co., 826 F.2d 1235, 1239 (3d Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 486 U.S. 1059, 100 L. Ed. 2d 930, 108 S. Ct. 2830 (1988). In Alberta Gas, the Third Circuit analyzed antitrust standing under Section 7 of the Clayton Act. Plaintiff Alberta Gas was a methanol producer who challenged the merger of a competitor, DuPont, with another company that produced methanol, Conoco. Id. at 1236-37. Alberta Gas claimed injury resulting in that it allegedly lost sales when the merger induced Conoco to no longer participate in the push to stimulate market demand for [\[66\]](#) methanol. Id. at 1237. Applying Cargill, the court declined to find this type of loss as connected with or resulting from DuPont's market power in the methanol-producing industry. 826 F.2d at 1241. Refusing to take a lenient stance on what constitutes antitrust injury, and instructive to the case sub judice, the court also noted that the same type of harm, i.e., non-antitrust harm, would have occurred if any acquiror decided to curtail the target's production and marketing plans. Id.

The Third Circuit appellate court has not faced squarely the issue of target antitrust standing. However, with the above weaknesses in the Consolidated Gold Fields majority's reasoning, as well as the strict approach countenanced by the Alberta Gas court, I conclude that HN50[[↑]] the Third Circuit Court of Appeals would join the Anago line of cases rather follow Consolidated Gold Fields. HN51[[↑]] The purpose of the requirement of antitrust injury is to ensure that the harm alleged by a plaintiff corresponds to the rationale for finding a violation of the antitrust laws in the first place. Ansell, Inc. v. Schmid Laboratories, Inc., 757 F. Supp. 467, 484 (D.N.J.), aff'd, 941 F.2d 1200 [\[67\]](#) (3d Cir. 1991). In the event of a Moore takeover, Wallace alleges it will be harmed by a loss in independent decision making authority, loss of customers, loss of employees, and loss of trade secrets. These alleged injuries do not occur because of the potential lessening of competition; rather, they occur due to a change in corporate control. See Burlington Indus., 666 F. Supp. at 805. In other words, these sequelae can occur with the consummation of any merger, even those that are not violative of the Clayton Act, and are divorced from any considerations that less competition may exist in the open market. Id.

In sum, because Wallace has not alleged injury "of the type the antitrust law were intended to prevent," the Court will grant Moore's motion to dismiss Count I of Wallace's counterclaim.

Ordinarily, this opinion would stop here and the Wallace motion to preliminarily enjoin the merger on antitrust grounds would not be treated. However, the plain fact is the circuits have divided on the issue of antitrust standing. The Fifth Circuit, Anago, and the Fourth Circuit, Burlington Indus. (summary affirmance), have concluded a takeover target does not have antitrust [\[68\]](#) standing while the Second Circuit in Consolidated Gold Fields has concluded the opposite. HN52[[↑]] Antitrust standing is a prudential, not constitutional limitation on federal court jurisdiction. As such, it is not surprising that the Circuits have reached opposite conclusions. Similarly, while I believe there should be this prudential limitation on antitrust jurisdiction, [\[*1568\]](#) those possessed of a higher commission might feel otherwise. In an abundance of caution, in order to facilitate appellate review should that contingency occur, the merits of the Wallace motion for preliminary injunction based on an alleged antitrust violation will be addressed.

B. Preliminary Injunction - Wallace's Antitrust Counterclaim

Wallace has moved to preliminarily enjoin a proposed merger with Moore. As stated above, Wallace asserts in its Section 7 counterclaim that "if Moore were to acquire Wallace, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition in the relevant product and geographic market. . . ." D.I. 40, Counterclaim at P 19. Wallace alleges that for most customers in the relevant product and geographic markets, the only acceptable vendors are Wallace, Moore and the [\[69\]](#) Standard Register Company; thus, the acquisition of Wallace by Moore would transform a three-firm market into a two-firm market. Id. at PP 16-17. Wallace identifies the relevant product market to be the sale of forms and forms services to large, forms-intensive multi-location customers. Tr. 564.

I. Facts

a) Wallace's Evidence

As an obligatory preamble for setting the stage for its definition of the relevant product market as the forms and form services market encompassing large, forms-intensive customers with multiple locations, Wallace offered a historical backdrop to contextualize the current market conditions. Over the past two decades, the business forms market has been pressured to redefine itself in response to evolving customer needs, technology, and availability of raw resources. According to Douglas Fitzgerald, Wallace's Vice President of Marketing, a business customer in the mid-1970s would typically manage most or all of its forms needs in-house. Tr. 98-100. The customer would invariably initiate a given form's inception, design, and utilization; ultimately the customer would print the form on-site or solicit bids to have a vendor (such as Wallace) print [70] a supply of forms. Once the forms were mass produced and/or shipped to the customer, the customer would warehouse the forms and monitor the form's inventory level and restock at the appropriate time.

In this so-called traditional method of forms management, vendors competed on the basis of price and quality, as well as service, which was evaluated primarily by the turn-around time measured between time of placement of order and delivery. Tr. 100. Over time, the business forms market has mushroomed beyond the mere printing and delivery of forms. Fitzgerald described two trends at the heart of this market transition: first, the proliferation of computers has created a corresponding need for forms and other related supplies. Second, a trend towards "out-sourcing" has evolved: having the vendor assume the forms-management responsibilities formerly achieved internally. For some customers, out-sourcing their forms management functions is efficient and results in significant cost savings. For example, a Wallace customer, Pacific Bell, credits an annual savings of $ 2 million to its out-sourcing of forms management services. Tr. 105.

Currently, the trend towards customer out-sourcing is [71] a force to be reckoned with, and business forms vendors fiercely compete by offering an ever-expanding breadth of services. To do so effectively, forms providers such as Wallace offer a smorgasbord of options tailored specifically to the customer's particular needs. For example, in response to the changing demands of the forms marketplace, Wallace provides on-site forms management, i.e., a Wallace employee(s) is stationed at the customer's workplace to perform such diverse tasks as forms design, forms utilization review (e.g., elimination of duplicative forms), forms inventory management, distribution, and purchasing.

Fitzgerald identified a subset of customers who demand out-sourcing services as "large, forms-intensive" ²⁴ customers with multiple locations" ("[*1569] LFICwMLs"). Tr. 106. According to Fitzgerald, these customers typically solicit contract bids for forms and forms-related services from various competing vendors. The LFICwML will submit to each vendor-candidate a request for information or a proposal outlining the required forms and accompanying services it seeks. Many of the needs presented by the customer require the vendor to showcase its best attributes, i.e., [72] provide concrete reasons why one vendor should be considered superior over another. In Wallace's experience, a LFICwML may solicit requests for proposals or bids from as little as two to as many as "multiple dozens" of vendors. Tr. 261. Sometimes, if Wallace is a finalist in the bidding contest, it may lower its proposed price in order to be more competitive, especially if the other finalists are Moore or Standard Register. Tr. 262. However, Wallace does not generally lower its bid price if it is a finalist against vendors other than these; Wallace perceives Moore and Standard Register to be its main competitors, while it views the others as lacking the breadth of service and sophisticated out-sourcing capabilities to be considered competitive when courting LFICwMLs. Wallace did acknowledge, at least in one instance, however, the existence of a LFICwML, Kaiser

Permanente, that elected to solicit bids for its forms and forms management functions from regional vendors and not Moore, Wallace, or Standard Register. Tr. 209.

[73] Notwithstanding its view as to its major competitors, Wallace admitted that there are other suppliers who serve LFICwMLs, such as Duplex, Ennis, Reynolds & Reynolds, Vanier, GIS, Better Business Forms, Bowater, Williamette, Jerome Business, Rittenhouse, Avery Dennison, and Ross Martin. Tr. 135-45, 155, 159, 161-62, 165-68. These suppliers may merely provide forms without forms management services, or forms management services without forms, or a mixture of forms and forms management services. Further, when Wallace wins a contract bid, the bid may be "split" or shared with one or more of these or other competitors. Tr. 129-30. For example, Wallace prints Domestic Air Bill forms for the Federal Express corporation, where Standard Register prints its International Air Bills. Tr. 155.

To compete effectively for customers, Wallace has developed state-of-the-art computer technology allowing customer orders to be automatically routed to the optimum warehouse location, where storage and shipping are bar-code driven. Tr. 117. Inventory and quality control programs track and assure accuracy of order filling; customers are provided with summary invoicing that organizes order data in a concise [74] format.

Additionally, Wallace has developed the WIN computer system. Fitzgerald described this program as allowing "customers access to a variety of sophisticated forms management services." Tr. 171. Generally, a customized WIN program is offered to Wallace customers who purchase a combination of products that exceeds $ 1 million. A similar program with lesser customization called Select Services, is offered to Wallace customers with accounts of over $ 400,000 but less than $ 1 million. Tr. 213. Customers who utilize either of these programs are charged via pricing methodology that accounts for both product and service. Charges for the services provided are not broken down separately, rather, they are incorporated into a single price incurred for both product and correlative service. Tr. 174.

The WIN program is Wallace's flagship computer program. As described above, it links together order entry, order management, manufacturing, inventory, distribution, and billing systems. Tr. 220. With all of these functions coordinated and available in a single software format, WIN allows Wallace to provide LFICwMLs, many of whom are out-source customers, with tools to streamline their forms [75] management. If a Wallace customer qualifies for the WIN program, that customer can promptly access the gamut of WIN services on the customer's own personal computer. Tr. 251. Michael Leatherman, a Wallace Senior Vice President and its Chief Information Officer, testified that Wallace invested $ 34 million over a nine-year period to cultivate the WIN software, basically [*1570] from scratch, as its software needs were sui generis. Tr. 240. Leatherman was unaware of any commercially available software that could readily supplant the WIN software.

Wallace counts its WIN system as a trump card in the competition against its competitors. Since the WIN system has become available, Wallace has won LFICwML accounts from other vendors, including Moore. Tr. 268-70. One of Moore's consultants has admitted that the WIN system "could put Wallace four years ahead of [Moore] in terms of order management." DX 60 at 834454. Moore has been struggling intensively to improve its own computer system, retaining Electronic Data Systems as an adscititious partner in systems development. Tr. 60. Moore's costs in its quest for computer system enhancement have been staggering: in 1995, Moore budgeted $ 44 million, [76] and for 1996, it has budgeted $ 35 million. McKay Depo. at 111, D.I. 149. Despite these efforts, Moore has suffered delays in implementing enhanced computer systems, with consequential disappointing earnings figures in its U.S. Forms Division. Tr. 60.

i) Wallace's Customers

As anecdotal testimonial support, Wallace also offered evidence from two of its satisfied customers. John W. Rountree, an administrator at Public Service Electric and Gas Company of New Jersey ("PSE&G"), testified that his company uses about 1200 forms in its day-to-day operations. Rountree stated that PSE&G is a satisfied WIN system user, and that it has out-sourced both the printing and managing of its forms. When asked hypothetically if Moore acquired Wallace, and Moore raised prices by five percent for the same services PSE&G currently received, Rountree answered that if no other vendor could provide those services, PSE&G would pay the increased price. Tr. 338.

Similarly, Frank Cuomo, Purchasing Manager with the Pershing Division of Donaldson, Lufkin and Jenrette Securities Corporation, testified that his company uses several hundred forms. Like his PSE&G counterpart, Cuomo is a satisfied WIN customer, [77] and takes advantage of Wallace's forms management services for its national needs. Unlike his PSE&G counterpart, however, Cuomo also uses local vendors for forms purchases where no forms management is needed, so as to not be totally dependent on a single supplier. Tr. 356. In the hypothetical event of a Moore takeover and price hike, Cuomo would likewise absorb a price increase of five percent for the same services he currently receives from Wallace. Tr. 353.

ii) Wallace's Antitrust Expert

Dr. Jerry Hausman, a Professor of Economics at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, testified as Wallace's expert on the antitrust claim. Hausman's expert opinion was based on econometric analyses²⁵ he performed on raw data provided to him by Wallace. Hausman had Wallace collect all of their bidding data for their LFICwMLs, specifically those with annual contracts worth $ 500,000 or more. These data were culled for the time period commencing January 1, 1994 up through the present.

[78] Initially, Hausman explained that for the statistical population of large (greater than $ 500,000) contracts on which Wallace chose to bid during the above time period, the four largest incumbent contract holders were Moore at 44%, Wallace at 18%, Standard Register at 15%, and Uarco at 12%. Tr. 547, DX 56. After the bidding process closed, these incumbent contracts were awarded anew, with a resultant reshuffling into new proportions: Wallace subsequently won over 50% of the contracts, Moore won about 15%, Standard Register won 12%. Uarco was not able to hold onto any contracts at all. Tr. 547-48, DX 57.

From these data, Hausman concluded that the three companies, Moore, Standard Register, and Wallace, are "very important competitive companies," Tr. 548, and are 'primarily responsible for servicing large, multi-location customers that wish to out-source the forms function,' Tr. 545. He added that the increase in contract wins for Wallace in [*1571] light of the concurrent decrease for Moore shows that these two entities significantly compete head-to-head. He pointed out that the statistics also showed that Wallace competed against Moore about 75% of the time. Tr. 552.

Hausman additionally [79] looked to information generated by Moore itself. On a document entitled "Target Competitor Forms Management Accounts," Moore compiled a list of target customers in the eastern United States whose forms management programs were not administered by Moore as of late summer 1995. DX 51, Deposition of Kathleen W. Sakal at 65. Of these target accounts coveted by Moore, 34 accounts were deemed as having a potential value of $ 1 million or more. Hausman looked at these accounts and concluded that Wallace and Standard Register each held 38% of those million dollar contracts; together they constituted the majority of Moore competitors.

Hausman conceded, however, that there are other LFICwMLs that are serviced primarily by vendors other than Moore, Wallace, and Standard Register. His review of DX 7 demonstrated that many LFICwMLs had contract with other vendors: (company -- vendor) Woodward & Lothrop - Duplex; Alex & Alex - Duplex; Alex Brown & Co. - Duplex; Beneficial Management - shared between Wallace and Federal; Schering-Plough - NCR; Wyeth Labs - Federal; Certainteed - shared between Amherst local jobber²⁶ and Moore; Smith Kline - Duplex; Show Boat - Janice Group; Sun. Co - Ross Martin; [80] Caesars - Ross Martin; Fleet Bank/Shawmut - Duplex; Bankers' Trust - Howard Press; Canada Life - Reynolds & Reynolds; Cole Haan Shoes - Creative Business Forms; Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Maine - uses its own in house program; Bloomingdale's - Uarco; United Technologies - Uarco; NEC - Uarco; Northeast Utilities - Duplex; United Utilities - Duplex; CenterBank - Duplex; United Illuminating -

Duplex; Service America - Uarco; Fag Bearings - Uarco; Mercedes Benz Credit - Jobber; Perrier Group of America - Duplex; Cincinnati Bell Info. Systems - Better Business Forms; Tech Data - Reynolds & Reynolds; People Gas - Better Business Forms; Tampa Electric Co. - Better Business Forms; Glaxo/Burroughs - Wellcome - shared between Uarco and Standard Register; Guilford Mills - Jordan Graphics; Overnite Transportation - NCR; Philip Morris USA - Reynolds & Reynolds; Owens & Manor - Reynolds & Reynolds; Crawford Co. - Duplex; Turner Broadcasting - Reynolds & Reynolds. DX 7; Tr. 588-91.

[81] Finally, Hausman deduced further conclusions from the data supplied him by Wallace. His econometric analysis showed that Wallace's gross margin (defined as price minus cost) was lower when Moore was bidding than when Moore was not bidding. DX 12 at P 11; Tr. 566. When Wallace went head-to-head against Moore in the bidding process, Hausman found the Wallace gross margin was lower by about seven to eight percent. Tr. 566. From this, Hausman concluded that "if Moore were not going out head-to-head against Wallace, . . . on average, prices to customer will go up by between seven and eight percent." Tr. 567. Hausman based his conclusion on the premise that if Moore takes over Wallace, Wallace and Moore will be bidding together rather than as competitors; competition between these two companies will therefore be eliminated. Further, he opined that this elimination of competition will not just affect pricing; the technological rivalry between these two competitors will also be abolished, with a resultant inertia in the improvement of overall services.

Despite his econometric prowess, Hausman could not offer a definition of Wallace's market share as to LFICwMLs. Neither could he "sort out" [82] what percentage of the total forms sales market is represented by LFICwMLs. Tr. 573. He could not testify as to how many LFICwMLs there are in the U.S. market; other Wallace testimony elucidated that there are approximately 170 Wallace WIN and Select Service customers who fall into this alleged submarket. Tr. 252-254.

[*1572] b) Moore's Evidence

i) Expert Testimony

Not surprisingly, Moore presented economist Dr. Sumanth Addanki from the National Economic Research Associates whose testimony was at stark variance with that of Dr. Hausman. Addanki concluded that the relevant market within which to analyze Moore's acquisition of Wallace is no smaller than the U.S. market for the sale of business forms and related services. Tr. 641. He characterized this market as "unconcentrated, vigorously competitive," with customers having a variety of alternative ways to meet their business forms and services needs. Tr. 641. He found that some of these alternatives include local suppliers, regional suppliers, and national suppliers.

Addanki also reasoned that there is no logical basis for discerning a discrete product submarket of LFICwMLs, and that no one in the industry tracks market share [83] in such a theoretical arena. Tr. 653. Rather than the size of the customer, number of customer locations, or dollar amount spent on forms and forms management services, he concluded that the primary distinguishing factor is the type of industry within which the customer works and how the customer organizes its forms procurement processes. He found large customers and small customers expressing similar demands regardless of their size, albeit with idiosyncrasies varying from customer to customer.

Addanki's review of bidding data for both Moore and Wallace revealed that vendors are often called upon by large customers to bid on supply requirements without any forms-related management services. American Express, Frank Parsons Paper, and Melville Corp. requested quotes from Moore excluding forms management services. See Sakal Depo. at 41, 47, 53. Further, many large customers are supplied on a "noncontract" or ad hoc basis, as in Wallace's relationship with United Parcel Service, DiscoverCard Services, and State Farm Insurance. See PX 229. Other customers request contracts ranging in duration from one to five years, with the capability of being terminated upon notice by either [84] party. Some customers rely on multiple suppliers for their forms need, such Avis, Homedco, Federal Express, Bank One, Nationwide Insurance and Boeing. See Fitzgerald Depo. at 200, 204, 214-15, 269-71, 315-17, 325. From this, Addanki concluded the following:

There is no single set of requirements that distinguishes 'large forms-intensive customers with multiple locations.' Rather, these customers can, and do, satisfy their forms need in a variety of alternative ways, outsourcing as little or as much of the management and distribution functions as they choose, arranging their forms procurement process accordingly, buying forms locally, regionally or centrally as needed.

Addanki Expert Report, PX 119 at 7-8.

Like Wallace's Vice President Fitzgerald, Addanki also described the forms industry as one in transition. Demand for traditional core products in the forms industry, such as single and multi-ply forms, and continuous feed forms, is declining because of technological progress and its impact on customer demands. Shipments of these core products declined by five percent in 1992 and by approximately 4 percent in 1993. PX 119 at 9. As one alternative to paper forms, [85] customers have the option to perform many of their business functions via electronic mail (e-mail) and transmission over local and wide area computer networks. PX 119 at 5.

Additionally, LFICwMLs have increasingly restructured and consolidated their forms use and forms suppliers, thus intensifying the competitive pressures between vendors in the forms industry. Corporations such as Andersen Consulting, CSC Index, and Price Waterhouse offer management consulting to re-engineer a given business entity, including the revamping of information systems and the forms generated by those systems. Id. at 12. In sum, Addanki opined that the market for business forms today is vigorously competitive because vendors must continue to grow their sales despite the declining demand for core products. Id.

Finally, as a corollary to forms customers consolidation of their purchases, Addanki identified a growing trend in which many informed and sophisticated forms customers [*1573] assert their bargaining power by demanding and obtaining favorable pricing by playing one vendor against its competitors. Tr. 683. These factors also exert pressure on the forms vendors to create new methods of servicing customers' [86] forms needs more completely.

Along with his qualitative evaluation of competition in the business forms industry, Addanki quantified his economic data. Following U.S. Department of Justice Merger Guidelines, Addanki used the Herfindahl-Hirschman Index ("HHI") to measure concentration in the relevant product market he identified as the business forms industry in the United States. He postulated that there are over 600 vendor participants in this market, with the top 20 vendors accounting for 67% of total sales. PX 119 at 16. As HHI calculations require, each vendor's market share was mathematically squared and then all the squared shares were added. Addanki calculated the HHI of the current market as 432.5. If Moore acquires Wallace, the HHI would increase to 527, an increase of 95 points. Tr. 651. According to Addanki, this figure, well below the Merger Guideline's safe harbor level of 1000, represents an unconcentrated market where a competitively healthy amount of alternative suppliers are available to customers. In terms of real dollars and cents, the entire business forms market in the United States is approximately $ 7.5 billion dollars; Moore's and Wallace's combined sales total [87] approximate $ 1.3 billion or less than 18% of the total business forms market.

Based on his evaluation of data supplied by Moore, Addanki concluded that the acquisition of Wallace by Moore would not cause competitive harm in the forms industry in the United States.

ii) Other Moore Evidence

Gregory Lynch, Vice President of Moore's Financial Services Group, testified that in the course of its marketing and sales development plans, Moore identified a list of what could be considered LFICwMLs (as defined by Wallace) as potential clients. Out of a possible 2000 LFIC-wMLs, Moore targeted a limited number (125) of 'rational accounts,' which were defined in Moore's National Account Pocket Dossier as accounts valued at a potential for $ 1 million or more. DX 3 at C6130516. In this National Account Pocket Dossier, Moore estimated its market share for these types of accounts as 25%; the remaining 75% were served by other suppliers. Id. at C6130555. Recently, Moore has shifted its focus to customers who potentially spend over $ 250,000 in forms and forms-related services. Tr. 626. Moore also classifies its customers into three "vertical segments" by industry type rather than merely [88] by account value: Financial Services, Health Services, and Government Services.

Lynch testified as to the competitive nature of the forms and forms services marketplace. In his experience, each individual customer is different and pursues a strategy related to its own needs and goals. Tr. 618. He agreed that there are many alternatives to supplying customers' needs available to Moore's customers, and the range of alternatives itself is ever increasing. He also agreed that the industry has witnessed a trend where customers out-source functions not related to their core business. Although there are businesses that still produce and manage forms internally, using in-house print shops and in-house employees, other businesses may decide to out-source the production of forms, but retain forms management in-house. Other customers out-source both forms management and production.

Lynch also testified that, in his experience, his customers are very well informed. Customers insist on "30 day out clauses" which allow them to change suppliers after 30 days. Tr. 624. Competitive conditions in the industry itself are responding to the multiplicity of customer demands. Of increasing importance is [89] the emergence of forms jobbers and distributors, middleman organizations which sell but do not manufacture forms. The industry has witnessed these vendors teaming up with warehousing and distribution firms that provide inventory, distribution, and billing systems. Tr. 178-79; 621-22. Paper mills themselves have also recently entered the competitive fray with various offerings.

Effects of the potpourri of alternatives available to Moore customers has not escaped [*1574] Moore's notice. When Moore informs a customer of a price hike, Moore increasingly runs the risk that the customer will defect to another vendor or vendors. Lynch cited several instances where Moore lost large accounts to smaller vendors when Moore attempted to raise prices: a large contract with a uniform company in Cincinnati was lost to Miami Business Forms; a $ 4 million American Express contract was lost to a five person organization called General Credit; contracts with CIGNA and Bank of New York were lost to Williamette. Tr. 623.

2. Likelihood of Success on the Merits

Before this Court can preliminarily enjoin Moore's proposed merger based on this issue, Wallace, as movant and counterclaimant, must first establish [90] that it has demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits of its Section 7 claim. See Clean Ocean Action v. York, supra, 57 F.3d 328, 331 \(3d Cir. 1995\); Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co. v. White Consol. Indus., Inc., 414 F.2d 506, 510 \(3d Cir. 1969\), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1009, 24 L. Ed. 2d 501, 90 S. Ct. 567 (1970). Section 7 of the Clayton Act HN53[¹] proscribes mergers or acquisitions "where in any line of commerce or in any activity affecting commerce in any Section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or tend to create a monopoly." 15 U.S.C. § 18. Accordingly, HN54[¹] to demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits, Wallace must fulfill two criteria: first, it must show that it is more probable than not that acquisition of Wallace by Moore will affect a "line of commerce" in "any Section of the country." These respective determinations are informed by the elucidation of a relevant product market and a relevant geographic market. Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 324, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 \(1962\). Wallace argues that the relevant product market is the forms and forms services market encompassing large, [91] forms-intensive customers with multiple locations; it posits the geographic market as the entire United States.

Second, Wallace must show that it is more probable than not that the Moore takeover may substantially lessen competition in the relevant product and geographic markets; the mere possibility of substantial impairment to competition will not suffice. Fruehauf Corp. v. FTC, 603 F.2d 345, 351 \(2d Cir. 1979\); see also United States v. Marine Bancorporation, Inc., 418 U.S. 602, 622-23, 41 L. Ed. 2d 978, 94 S. Ct. 2856 \(1974\) (Clayton Act Section 7 "deals in probabilities" rather than "ephemeral possibilities"). Of equal note, however, is that HN55[¹] Wallace need not prove the fruition of actual anticompetitive effects of the acquisition, FTC v. Procter & Gamble Co., 386 U.S. 568, 577, 18 L. Ed. 2d 303, 87 S. Ct. 1224 \(1967\), as Section 7's underlying purpose is to "arrest apprehended consequences of intercorporate relationships before those relationships could work their evil," Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, 429 U.S. 477, 485, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 \(1977\).

a) The Relevant Product and Geographic Markets

HN56[¹] A necessary predicate to a finding of a violation [92] of Section 7 of the Clayton Act is the definition of the relevant product market and relevant geographical market. United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 353

U.S. 586, 593, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1057, 77 S. Ct. 872 (1957). These market determinations confer the requisite context within which the Court can analyze whether there has been a substantial lessening of competition. Id.

i) Relevant Geographic Market

The United States Supreme Court has defined HN57 relevant geographic market as the region "where, within the area of competitive overlap, the effect of the merger on competition will be direct and immediate." United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 357, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963). Both parties agree that the relevant geographic market in this case encompasses the entire United States, Tr. 564, 641, and the Court so finds.

ii) Relevant Product Market

Determination of the relevant product market quite often is the major battleground in Section 7 litigation, and this case is no exception. See 3 Julian O. von Kalinowski, [*1575] Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation, § 18.01[2] (1995). Another commentator concurs:

However [93] wide or narrow the range of inquiry for appraising a merger, market definition is frequently critical. For example, viewed in a wider product. . . market than the minimum necessary to include the merging firms, a merger will appear to have a less significant effect. In contrast, when the products . . . of the merging firms differ, a definition wide enough to bring the merging firms into the same market makes the merger. . . more likely to be seen as troublesome.

Phillip Areeda & Louis Kaplow, Antitrust Analysis, P 506, at 814-15 (4th ed. 1988).

The criteria relating to product market definition have been set forth by the Supreme Court in the seminal decision Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 (1962). The Court held that "the HN58 outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use [by consumers] or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it." Id. at 325. Interchangeability of use implies that one product or service is approximately equivalent to another; discounting any degree of preference for the one over the other, either product would work [94] just as well. Allen-Myland, Inc. v. International Business Machines Corp., 33 F.3d 194, 206 (3d Cir. 1994), cert. denied, 130 L. Ed. 2d 615, 115 S. Ct. 684 (1994). Cross-elasticity of demand refers to whether the demand for the second good or service would respond to change in the price of the first. Id. In short, "defining a relevant product market is a process of describing those groups of producers which, because of the similarity of their products [or services], have the ability--actual or potential--to take significant amounts of business away from each other." SmithKline Corp. v. Eli Lilly & Co., 575 F.2d 1056, 1063 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 838, 58 L. Ed. 2d 134, 99 S. Ct. 123 (1978).

The Supreme Court has also recognized that HN59 under appropriate circumstances, a broad product market may be parsed into well-defined submarkets, each comprising a discrete line of commerce unto itself for Section 7 purposes. Brown Shoe, 370 U.S. at 325. If such a submarket(s) does exist, the Court must scrutinize not only the broad, overall market, but must also "examine the effects of a merger in each such economically significant submarket to determine if there is a reasonable probability [95] that the merger will substantially lessen competition." Id. HN60 The Brown Shoe Court set forth seven "practical indicia" for lower courts to consider when determining whether a submarket exists: "industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors." Id. All of these indicia need not be present for a well-defined submarket to exist. General Foods Corp. v. FTC, 386 F.2d 936, 941 (3d Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 391 U.S. 919, 20 L. Ed. 2d 657, 88 S. Ct. 1805 (1968).

iii) Application of the Brown Shoe Criteria: Wallace's Proposed Submarket

The record evidence shows that the parties are sharply divided on their characterizations of the relevant product market. Moore, the aggressor corporation and antitrust defendant, argues for an expansive definition of the relevant product market, as being "comprised of the sales of all business forms and forms management services." Expert Report of Sumanth Addanki, PX119 at 8. In its Securities and Exchange Commission filing Form 10-K [96] for 1994, Moore views itself as serving the "information needs of businesses, government and other enterprises." PX 122 at 5. Similarly, in its Form 10-K, Wallace describes itself as a corporation engaged "predominantly in the computer services and supply industry." PX 26 at 3. Both companies overlap in the supply of products and services, such as business forms, labels, commercial printing, direct mail, and office supplies.

Even if Moore's broad characterization of the relevant product market were accurate, definition of a relevant product submarket [*1576] would not be foreclosed under Brown Shoe. Wallace contends that there exists a well-defined submarket in this case: "the sale of forms and forms services" to "large, multi-location customers.", Tr. 564. Wallace argues that application of the Brown Shoe factors conclusively demonstrate that the relevant product market is a submarket within the broad market definition proposed by Moore, and that this submarket is a "line of commerce" unto itself for purposes of the Clayton Act. Ansell Inc. v. Schmid Laboratories, Inc., 757 F. Supp. 467, 471-74 (D.N.J.) (applying the Brown Shoe criteria to determine relevant product market), [97] aff'd mem. op., 941 F.2d 1200 (3d Cir. 1991).

(A) Industry or Public Recognition of the Submarket as a Separate Economic Entity

HN61[] Recognized sources of evidence of industry or public recognition include (1) statements of the merging parties and their own market surveys, annual reports, marketing materials, and preacquisition reports; (2) Industry or trade association publications; (3) the existence of a discrete trade association for the product or services involved; (4) perceptions and statements of major customers; and (5) Industry classification codes of the United States Census Bureau. Von Kalinowski, 3 Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation § 18.02[2] (1995)(collecting cases).

In support of its proposed submarket definition of LFICwMLs, Wallace relies heavily on the first type of evidence: statements and marketing materials of the parties in this case. The record, however, shows that neither company has historically considered LFICwML as a category unto itself. The best evidence Wallace offers is differential treatment of customers according to account size based on dollar value; even then, there seem to be no well defined or accepted parameters. Wallace demonstrated [98] that only accounts valued at $ 1 million or above qualify for participation on the WIN system; another Wallace customer category includes those accounts valued at over $ 400,000. For reasons known only to Wallace, its economics expert used yet another dollar value for his analyses, i.e., $ 500,000.

Moore documentation was equally all over the scale. In one document, the National Accounts Pocket Dossier, Moore targeted accounts worth $ 1 million or more for intensive sales promotion and marketing, DX 3 at C6130564, although these efforts have been apparently redefined to include accounts with a floor value of $ 250,000. In another document compiled for similar purposes, Moore lumped together accounts both small and large, valued from thousands of dollars up through millions of dollars. DX 7. Significantly, in only one instance did either company define a market share for a sub-category of the entire forms industry; Moore chose a cutoff figure of $ 250,000. DX 61.

The evidence also showed in specialized circumstances, that rather than segregating LFICwMLs as a submarket, Moore analyzes its customer base in terms of vertical segments by industry type, such as Financial Services, Health [99] Care, and Governmental. Common sense dictates there will be similarity in forms needs within a given industry sector, such as the banking industry, as contrasted to other, diverse types of businesses, such as hospitals. Finally, and perhaps most significantly, both parties agreed that it is not unusual for a customer to split its forms and forms servicing loyalties among different vendors. As a result, a "large" customer in terms of corporate demographics does not necessarily translate into large business forms customer whose account dollar value corresponds to the breadth of its business form needs. In other words, even assuming there exists a subset of customers defined as LFICwMLs, a given LFICwML may not surrender all of its business form and form service requirements to a single or even primary vendor. Instead of falling into well-defined submarkets based on corporate size, locations, or dollar value of account, business forms and form service customers are aligned along a continuum of diverse needs. Accordingly, the Court finds that there is no industry or public recognition of submarket composed of LFICwMLs.

(B) The Product's Peculiar Characteristics and Uses

Both parties [100] presented convincing evidence of the overwhelming importance of [*1577] serving a forms and forms service customer's distinct needs. Because customers needs are as diverse as the customers themselves, there is no one forms product or forms service (or set of products and/or services) that can be readily distinguished as its own category. Even if the Court were to accept the premise that LFICwMLs compose a circumscribed subset of forms and forms service customer, the record shows that there is no single product and/or service that is marketed to these target customers alone. A relatively small business forms customer with only one location may desire the same forms and forms management services as a LFICwML, albeit on a different scale. Although out-sourcing may be considered a particular type of service frequently utilized by LFICwMLs, the gamut of out-sourcing options available apply to customers large and small alike.

Typically, under this Brown Shoe factor, courts have distinguished products with specialized end uses or characteristics from similar products. See, e.g., Ansell, Inc. v. Schmid, 757 F. Supp. at 473 (different packaging and distribution of latex condoms enough to distinguish [101] between product lines); United States v. American Tech. Indus. Inc., 1974 Trade Cas. P74,873 (M.D. Pa. 1974) (artificial Christmas trees considered a separate market from natural Christmas trees). In the case sub judice, there is no basis in the record for discerning any distinct products or services sold to LFICwMLs as compared with those sold to other types of business forms and forms management customers.

(C) Unique Production Facilities.

This Brown Shoe factor requires the Court to evaluate whether business forms and forms management services for LFICwMLs require unique facilities or technology different than that which underlies forms and forms-related services demanded by non-LFICwMLs. See General Foods Corp. v. FTC, 386 F.2d 936, 943 (3d Cir. 1967) (production facility for steel wool markedly different from facilities for other cleaning devices), cert. denied, 391 U.S. 919, 20 L. Ed. 2d 657, 88 S. Ct. 1805 (1968). Wallace argues that the services demanded by LFICwMLs are "mainly produced by using integrated and sophisticated computer systems" such as WIN. Tr. 543. The record demonstrates that many LFICwMLs, especially those that out-source their [102] forms management functions, derive great benefit from a vendor's sophisticated computer technology.

However, the record also shows many LFICwMLs as contracting with companies other than Moore, Wallace, or Standard Register. DX 7. Although Wallace characterizes these other forms vendors as "second-tier" because of a perceived lack of technological out-sourcing capability, the objective evidence demonstrates that even with "inferior" technology (as compared to WIN), these vendors still compete effectively for LFICwML contracts. The Court finds that the evidence does not support a finding that these types of customers are served by unique production facilities as typified by the Wallace facility.

(D) Distinct Customers

An oft-cited case, Reynolds Metals Co. v. FTC, 114 U.S. App. D.C. 2, 309 F.2d 223 (D.C. Cir. 1962), sets forth a clear paradigm of a distinct customer class. In that case, the parties disputed whether a class of customers who purchased decorative aluminum foil used in the floral industry could be considered unique. The court found that:

the sole purchasers of florist foil are the nation's 700 wholesale florist outlets and, through these, the 25,000 [103] retail florists throughout the country. Despite a clearly lower price for florist foil, . . . other end users of decorative foil have not joined the identifiable mass of florist foil purchasers in noticeable numbers.

309 F.2d at 228.

Like the aluminum foil manufacturer in Reynolds, Wallace also attempted to portray LFICwMLs as somehow coalescing into a distinct class of customers. The record evidence, however, shows the opposite to be true: the needs of the customers differ greatly by industry type and idiosyncratic customer preference. For customers that could be described as LFICwML, Moore adduced evidence showing that its forms and forms service demands defy simple classification. For example, American Express requested a bid from Moore for forms and no [*1578] forms services. Avis, Homedco, and Federal Express were cited as companies that prefer to rely on multiple forms and forms service suppliers. Furthermore, Wallace's Chief of Information Systems testified that a particular LFICwML's needs can vary greatly depending on the customer, one may handle its own forms management in-house, and another may out-source those same functions. Tr. 254-56.

Diversity of forms, forms service [104] needs, and out-sourcing are not limited to the LFICwML type of customer. In a document generated by Moore well before the initiation of litigation, Moore identified forms and forms management needs for its smaller customers ranging by account size of $ 5,000 to $ 250,000. PX 131 at M4631332. The catalog of products and services primarily used and available to these smaller customers paralleled those described by Wallace as peculiar attributes of LFICwMLs: e.g., custom and stock forms, mailing systems, forms handling equipment, forms management services, warehousing and distribution, and electronic data interchange. Because there appears to be no easy demarcation of forms and forms management attributes as between LFICwML and other smaller customers, as well as within the population of LFICwMLs itself, the Court finds that there is no distinct class of LFICwML customers under Brown Shoe.

(E) Distinct Prices

During the hearing, and in its briefs, Wallace emphasized its pricing strategy for LFICwMLs who purchase a bundle of forms management services as an accompaniment to its forms purchases. Such LFICwMLs incur a unified charge that incorporates both product and service; [105] a separate breakdown of price per form and price per service is not available. However, Wallace also presented evidence that other LFICwMLs choose to manage their own forms; it follows that these LFICwMLs are charged no differently for their forms purchases than any other customer who purchases only forms. While a subgroup of LHCwMLs may encounter a distinct pricing scheme, the Court finds that the industry does not price its forms and forms management services based merely on a customer's being pigeonholed as a LFICwML.

(F) Sensitivity to Price Changes

Wallace offered testimony of two selected WIN customers who expressed a loyal degree of satisfaction in their corporate relationship with Wallace. Both PSE&G and Pershing witnesses admitted without hesitation that if Wallace raised its prices by five percent, they would incur the additional cost and remain Wallace customers.

On the other hand, in equally anecdotal fashion, Moore offered concrete evidence where it had informed some of its LFICwMLs of a price increase, the customers fled to another vendor. In light of these competing offerings, the Court cannot conclusively find that LFICwMLs react uniformly with respect to price [106] changes in the forms and forms services industry.

(G) Specialized Vendors

This final Brown Shoe criterion looks to whether a product or service is sold or marketed by a unique class of vendor. For example, in United States v. Healthco, Inc., 387 F. Supp. 258 (S.D.N.Y.), aff'd mem. op., 535 F.2d 1243 (2d Cir. 1975), the court distinguished between submarkets for dental equipment and dental sundries. This distinction was based in part on the two industries' different methods for distributing and marketing those products. Dental equipment was marketed via specialized dental dealers and salespeople and was personally detailed to dental customers; dental sundries were frequently marketed and sold via mail-order. Id. at 261, 265. Thus, the court justified the different submarkets in part on the existence of the two different types of vendors.

Wallace has similarly argued that only three specialized vendors, Moore, Wallace, and Standard Register, offer a complete menu of options capable of serving the forms and forms management needs of LFICwMLs. Pointing to the worst case scenario of a LFICwML that completely out-sources its forms and forms management services, Wallace [107] convincingly showed that extremely sophisticated vendor technology is required to be competitive, and that Moore, Wallace, and Standard Register offer the [*1579] most competitive, state. of the art technology available. The PSE&G customer's testimony highlighted this assertion: as a completely out-sourced customer, dependent on a single vendor, the witness regarded only the larger forms companies Moore, Standard Register, Wallace, and Uarco as viable vendors for PSE&G's out-sourcing needs. Tr. 333.

If the evidence showed all LFICwMLs as desiring to out-source the majority of their forms and concomitant services, the Court would agree that only a limited number of "specialized" vendors exist to serve those customers. However, as discussed supra, the evidence showed that LFICwMLs operate along a continuum of out-sourcing needs. Some require little or no out-sourcing; others prefer to liberally out-source. The evidence also showed that a significant number of LHCwMLs contract with vendors not designated by Wallace as specialized, such as Duplex, Vanier, Willamette, Federal, Reynolds & Reynolds, Ross Martin, and Better Business Forms. See, e.g., DX 7. Consequently, the Court cannot agree [*108] that only specialized vendors support the forms and forms management needs of LFICwML.

(H) Barriers to Entry

In Ansell, Inc. v. Schmid Laboratories, Inc., 757 F. Supp. 467, 474-75, (D.N.J.), aff'd mem. op. 941 F.2d 1200 (3d Cir. 1991), the Third Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's augmentation of the Brown Shoe criteria with consideration of another factor, barriers to entry. See also Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 120 n.15, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427, 107 S. Ct. 484 (1986) ("It HN62[] is also important to examine the barriers to entry into the market, because 'without barriers to entry it would presumably be impossible to maintain supracompetitive prices for an extended time.'") (citation omitted). Low barriers to entry into the market invite entry by new competitors and also expose firms well established in the market to the threat of potential entry. This in turn can induce those firms to hold prices, services, quality, and developments at competitive levels. See 3 Von Kalinowski, supra, at § 26.02[4]. The converse is also true: high entry barriers reduce the potential for increased competition by dissuading smaller [*109] firms from aggressively competing. FTC v. Proctor & Gamble, 386 U.S. at 578.

Wallace presented extensive videotape, testimonial, and documentary evidence featuring the superiority of its WIN computer system. Focusing on Moore's struggle to create comparatively competitive technology, Wallace argues that a new entrant into the purported LFICwML submarket would face several years of computer research and development to become competitive. Once again, however, Wallace overlooks the heterogeneity of forms and forms-management needs among the LFICwML user population. For customers like PSE&G who totally out-source forms management, the WIN system is unparalleled. The costs of building a comparable information system would be monumental and no doubt form a high barrier to entry for those customers.

However, further down the consumer spectrum is Pershing, who uses both WIN and local/regional forms vendors; these smaller vendors compete effectively without WIN-type technology for a subset of Pershing's forms business. Depending on how much or little forms services a LFICwML decides to out-source, the evidence shows vendors with lesser technological capabilities successfully vying for [*110] those customers. See e.g., DX 7. Wallace has demonstrated that its WIN and Select Service LFICwMLs number around 170. Moore has placed the total number of LFICwMLs at 2000; Wallace's share of these customers is less than ten percent. Even if one assumes that Moore and Standard Register each serve twice as many LFICwML customers as Wallace (a generous assumption), 50% of the LFICwML market remains served by vendors beside Moore, Wallace, and Standard Register. Therefore, even without computer technology approaching that of the WIN system, other vendors compete effectively for a large share of LFICwMLs. A vendor need not surmount as ambitious a hurdle as Wallace erects to enter the forms and forms services market for LFICwMLs.

In sum, the evidence has failed to support Wallace's contention that the relevant product [1580] market in this case constitutes the sale of business forms and forms-related services to large, multi-location customers. Mindful that the Brown Shoe factors are "practical indicia," and not intended to be mechanically applied, the Court has considered the factors and finds that they fall short of identifying LFICwMLs as a discrete segment of the forms and forms-related [*111] services market that can fairly be considered a well-defined submarket. See Bon-Ton Stores, Inc. v. May Dep't Stores Co., 881 F. Supp. at 875. At best, Wallace, leading the pack in technological innovation responsive to the needs of large, form-intensive customers with multiple locations, is beginning to successfully carve out a niche in an industry in transition. That transition has not yet matured to the point where there is an identifiable submarket. Instead, at this time, because customer needs for forms and forms-related services fall along a continuum without regard to corporate size or location, the realities of the forms and forms-related services industry, Wallace has not established that there is a submarket beyond the broader relevant product market in this case, i.e., the entire U.S. market for business forms.²⁷

[112] b) Substantial Lessening of Competition

HN63 Once the relevant product and geographic markets circumscribing the area of effective competition have been defined, the Court must analyze whether the effect of the merger "may be substantially to lessen competition."

Brown Shoe, 370 U.S. at 328 (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 18). Inquiry into the likely effect of a Moore-Wallace merger on competition starts with an evaluation of the level of economic concentration in the U.S. market for business forms.

HN64 While statistics reflecting market share controlled by industry leaders are the focal point of the Court's analysis, the Court is also mindful that statistics must be viewed in light of the particular market's structure, history, and probable future. Brown Shoe, 370 U.S. at 322 n.38.

The Department of Justice Merger Guidelines reference the Herfindahl-Hirschman Index ("HHI"), a statistical formula used to calculate and compare market concentration pre- and post-merger. As indicated by Moore's expert Addanki, a market's HHI is calculated by adding the squares of the market shares of those vendors participating in the market. See Merger Guidelines § 1.5. The Merger Guidelines contemplate [113] a product market to fall into one of three categories: unconcentrated (HHI below 1000), moderately concentrated (Hill between 1000 and 1800), and highly concentrated (HHI above 1800). Id. at § 1.51.

Finding the relevant product and geographic market to be the forms industry in the entire U.S., Addanki looked at market shares of the top 20 forms vendors (who account for approximately 67 % of the forms market dollars). He found the pre-merger HHI value at 432, indicating an unconcentrated market. Following an acquisition of Wallace by Moore, the post-merger HHI value would be 527, indicating that the forms industry market would remain unconcentrated. According to the Merger Guidelines, an unconcentrated product or service market post-merger is indicative of a market "unlikely to have adverse competitive effects." Merger Guidelines § 1.51. Based on his statistical analysis and qualitative market considerations discussed above, Addanki concluded that a Wallace-Moore merger is unlikely to cause competitive harm. He reported that post-acquisition, forms and forms-related service customers will still enjoy realistic alternatives to which they can readily turn for their needs. DX 119 [114] at 17. Addanki [*1581] further opined that in such a competitive environment, a Wallace-Moore combination could neither successfully exercise unilateral market power, nor facilitate coordination and collusion among remaining vendors. See Merger Guidelines § 2.2 (cautioning against the danger that, post-acquisition, a merged firm may be able to unilaterally elevate the price and suppress the output of a product and still capture any sales lost due to that price rise, if buyers will substitute another product that is now sold by the merged firm); Hospital Corp. of Am. v. FTC, 807 F.2d 1381, 1386 (7th Cir. 1986) (courts HN65 must consider whether acquisition will make it "easier for the firms in the market to collude, expressly or tacitly, and thereby force price above or farther above the competitive level"), cert. denied, 481 U.S. 1038, 95 L. Ed. 2d 815, 107 S. Ct. 1975 (1987).

In direct contrast, Wallace's expert, Hausman, offered no such market share or market concentration statistics in his data, all of which incorrectly assumed a relevant product submarket of sales of large, forms-intensive customers with multiple locations. In fact, Hausman explicitly disclaimed any knowledge [115] of Wallace's market share of LFICwMLs and what percentage of the total forms sales market is represented by LFICwMLs. Notwithstanding his incomplete information base, Hausman concluded that were Moore to acquire Wallace, Moore would be able to raise prices of forms and forms-related services to LFICwML by seven or eight percent, a figure Hausman termed as statistically significant.

First, Hausman drew his conclusion based on 51 bidding situations in 1994 and 1995 where Wallace bid on LFICwML contracts valued at $ 500,000 or greater. Tr. 584. Where Wallace successfully competed directly against Moore for such contract bids, the data showed that Wallace had enjoyed a lesser gross profit margin by seven or eight percent. These figures are corroborated by the testimony of Wallace's Chief Executive Officer Cronin. Cronin confirmed that when competing directly against Moore as finalists for a customer contract, Wallace's corporate strategy involved lowering its bid price to be more competitive. With respect to other competitors, however, Wallace did not lower its prices as much or even at all. Hausman's data also showed that for this same time period, Wallace was able to win over 46% of [116] Moore's LFICwLMs with its bidding tactics.

From the data, Hausman then assumed the converse to be true: post-acquisition, with Wallace eliminated from the marketplace, Moore would be able to raise its contract prices by this same seven or eight percent. Hausman postulated this effect to be the sine qua non of substantially lessened competition. The Court will assume Wallace has preliminarily established that when Moore competes against Wallace for LFICwMLs, those customers will receive a lower price than if the two entities did not compete. However, the Court cannot credit Hausman's other empirical assertions, unsupported by market share data, that no matter how broadly or narrowly one defines the market, there would be a substantial lessening of competition post-acquisition. Hausman cannot draw his conclusion in a vacuum; HN66[¹] market definition provides the necessary context within which the lessening vel non of competition must be evaluated. United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 593, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1057, 77 S. Ct. 872 \(1957\).

The Court is unaware of any precedent where a substantial lessening of competition was found without regard to definition of a relevant [117] product market, submarket, market share, or market concentration. To the contrary, HN67[¹] an antitrust plaintiff cannot prevail by simply alleging a lessening of competition within a limited subset of customers; plaintiff must also evaluate the significance of this impact in the "universe" of the relevant product market. United States v. Gillette Co., 828 F. Supp. 78, 83 \(D.D.C. 1993\). Here, as stated above, Wallace has not shown any probability of establishing its proposed submarket of LFICwML within the entire U.S. business forms industry; the only realistic market definition supported by the evidence, at least at this stage of the litigation, is the broad U.S. forms industry. The Court is willing to assume arguendo that there is a subset of LFICwMLs that would only look to Moore, Standard Register, or Wallace for [*1582] their forms and forms-management services, and that these will pay higher prices if there is a Moore takeover of Wallace. Even so, Wallace's failure to show that the lessening of competition for these customers would have the effect of substantially lessening competition in the overall relevant product market is fatal.

Similarly, the Court is willing to assume as true [118] that if Moore were to merge with Wallace, Moore's arch-rival in the technology and service arena would be removed from the competitive mix. However, the evidence showed that other competitors are "attempting to create similar services" to the WIN system, Tr. 256-57, some of which "compete[] favorably with WIN," PX 128 at 2. Moore has demonstrated that it views competitors other than Wallace as posing real and significant competitive threat; it therefore unlikely that Moore will be content with the status quo in terms of staying competitive on the technological and service fronts.

In short, the uncontested evidence shows that the relevant product market in this case is currently unconcentrated and will remain so even if Moore acquires Wallace. HHI calculations confirm that the merger falls within the safe harbor as defined by the Department of Justice Merger Guidelines. In addition, most likely stymied by both lack of time and the transitional nature and state of flux of the forms industry, Wallace did not present a requisite showing under decisional law that competition in the relevant product market will be substantially lessened in the event of a Moore takeover. Accordingly, [119] the Court finds that Wallace has failed to show a likelihood of success on the merits of its Section 7 Clayton Act counterclaim.

3. Irreparable Injury and Harm to Public Interest

Wallace has presented uncontested testimony that customers have deferred their award of contracts to Wallace because of the uncertainty of the pending takeover offer. If these customers eventually choose other vendors, Wallace will certainly suffer the damage in the form of lost profits. Moreover, Wallace correctly asserts if Wallace is merged into Moore, Moore will gain access to its proprietary computer technology, thereby negating its technological advantage and consequent competitive superiority. The Wallace technological and correlative competitive superiority could never be reclaimed if an eventual trial should result in a finding that Moore violated Section 7 of the Clayton Act. In contrast, the injury Moore would suffer if the merger were preliminarily enjoined on antitrust grounds is loss of incremental profit anticipated by reason of the merger. The Court concludes that if the merger goes through and there is no injunction, Wallace will suffer far more irreparable injury than Moore.

Those [120] form intensive customers with multiple locations who require the full panoply of forms and form services, which can only be met by Moore, Wallace and Standard Register, will incur higher costs if in fact there is a merger of Moore and Wallace. In that sense, since those customers are part of the public, the public interest would be served by grant of an injunction.

4. Balancing of All Four Preliminary Injunction Factors

The Court has found Wallace has failed to satisfy the first criteria for grant of injunctive relief in that it has not demonstrated a likelihood it will prevail on the merits at a final hearing. However, the Court has found Wallace did carry its burden in demonstrating that the irreparable harm it will suffer far exceeds the irreparable injury to Moore if the injunction does not issue. Similarly, the fact that there will be a decrease in competition for even a limited subset of business forms customers weighs in favor of finding that Wallace has carried its burden in demonstrating the public interest will be served if an injunction were granted on antitrust grounds.

AT&T Co. v. Winback and Conserve Program Inc., 42 F.3d 1421, 1429 \(3d Cir. 1974\), instructs [121] that "the HN68[] injunction should issue only if the plaintiff (movant for the injunction) produces evidence sufficient to [*1583] convince the district court that all four ²⁸ factors favor preliminary relief." In a footnote in the same opinion, the above-quoted language was blunted with the instruction that the "district court should award preliminary injunctive relief only upon weighing all four factors." Id. at 1427, n.8. Weighing all four factors and recognizing that three of the criteria counsel for issuance of the injunction, the fact remains that without both a probability of success on the merits and irreparable injury to the movant, a preliminary injunction should not issue. Accordingly, if the entire section IV(B) were not dicta, an order would be entered denying the Wallace motion for preliminary injunction.

V. CONCLUSION

The Court has found Wallace carried its burden under the Unocal/enhanced [122] judicial scrutiny test and Moore has not rebutted the presumption that the Wallace Board acted properly under the Business Judgment Rule in refusing to redeem its poison pill. As a consequence, an order will be entered denying Moore's motion for preliminary injunction.

The Court has also held a target in a hostile tender offer cannot challenge a proposed merger with the acquirer on the ground the merger would violate federal antitrust laws because it lacks antitrust standing. In order to facilitate appellate review in the event the Third Circuit Court of Appeals were to hold a target does have antitrust standing, this Court concluded that the requested Wallace injunction should not issue.

An order will be entered denying Moore's motion for preliminary injunction and granting Moore's motion to dismiss the Wallace antitrust counterclaim.

ORDER

At Wilmington this 4th day of December, 1995, for the reasons set forth in the accompanying Opinion issued this date,

IT IS ORDERED:

1. Plaintiff's motion for preliminary injunction is denied.
2. Plaintiff's motion to dismiss the defendant Wallace's antitrust counterclaim is granted.
3. Defendants' motion for preliminary injunction [123] is denied as moot.

Section 1144 of the Employment Retirement Income Security Act, 29 U.S.C.S. § 1001 et seq., in part states that ERISA shall supersede any and all state laws insofar as they may now or hereafter relate to any employee benefit plan. Section 1144(c) provides and the Supremacy Clause of the federal constitution requires that the term "state laws" includes any state statute, regulation, common law ruling or other state action.

HN3 [down arrow] Federal Preemption, State Laws

The reach of federal preemption under 29 U.S.C.S. § 1144(a) is described in broad language. A state law "relates to" an employee benefit plan, in the normal sense of the phrase, if it has a connection or reference to such a plan. A court's analysis of this problem must be guided by a respect for the separate spheres of governmental authority preserved in our federalist system.

HN4 [down arrow] Preemption Clause, Bad Faith & Misrepresentation

There are a variety of factors when determining whether a state statute of general application "relates to" Employment Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) plans. These factors include whether the state law negates an ERISA plan provision, whether the state law affects relations between primary ERISA entities, whether the state law impacts the structure of ERISA plans, whether the state law impacts the administration of ERISA plans, whether the state law has an economic impact on ERISA plans, whether preemption of the state law is consistent with other ERISA provisions, and whether the state law is an exercise of traditional state power. The court must still look to the totality of the state statute's impact on the plan - both how many of the factors favor preemption and how heavily each individual factor favors preemption are relevant. No one factor is controlling. Merely because a state law or cause of action represents a traditional exercise of state power will not dictate a finding that there is no ERISA preemption. Likewise just because a particular law does not affect relations between primary ERISA plan entities should not be controlling. A primary concern must be whether the state law or state common law or statutory action affects the structure, the administration or the type of benefits provided by an ERISA plan.

A state rule of law may be preempted even though it has no such direct nexus with or is not purposely aimed at Employment Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) plans if its effect is to dictate or restrict the choices of ERISA plans with regard to their benefits, structure, reporting and administration or if allowing states to have such rules would impair the ability of a plan to function simultaneously in a number of states.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN9 Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In determining whether a challenged activity constitutes an unreasonable restraint on trade the courts use a per se analysis or a rule of reason analysis. A per se analysis is used only in a limited class of cases - a court must conclude that a defendant's actions are so plainly harmful to competition and so obviously lacking in any redeeming pro-competitive values that they are conclusively presumed illegal without the need for further examination. Most cases fall outside these narrow categories held to be illegal per se. In the general run of cases a plaintiff must prove an antitrust injury under the rule of reason. Under this test the plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that the challenged action has had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market; to prove it has been harmed as an individual competitor will not suffice.

HN10 [blue icon] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Rule of reason analysis requires the antitrust plaintiff to bear the initial burden of demonstrating that the defendant's conduct or policy has had a substantially harmful effect on competition. The plaintiff may satisfy this burden without detailed market analysis by offering proof of actual detrimental effects, such as a reduction of output. It is only after that initial burden is met that the antitrust defendant must offer evidence to exonerate its conduct such as pro competitive justifications for its conduct.

MEMORANDUM OF DECISION ON DEFENDANT'S MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

The defendant Connecticcare has moved for summary judgment on three of the counts of the plaintiff's complaint, second count (state antitrust law), third count (breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing), Fourth count (CUTPA violation).

Connecticcare is engaged in providing health care coverage to groups of employees through benefit plans sponsored by employees. It contracts with employers to provide health care. The plaintiffs formerly were providers of chiropractic services in the defendant's health provider network. In 1990 the defendant began to consider the formation of an independent practice association (IPA) as an alternative to the existing individual contractual relationships with chiropractors - chiropractic treatment of subscribers would be limited to a single chiropractic group. One of the plaintiffs, Dr. Curry, was elected vice chairman and [*2] the committee was organized to determine standards of membership in the prospective chiropractic group.

The defendant corresponded with providers who at the time where chiropractic providers; information was requested from these individuals.

The committee decided to set up an IPA and to that end organized and incorporated Connecticut Chiropractic care, P.C. (C.C.C.). Credentials and standards were adopted by CCC. Certain chiropractors were chosen initially and future membership determinations were to be based on agreed upon credential standards. The plaintiffs were not selected by CCC for membership and this can longer participate in the defendant's restructured provider network.

The plaintiffs maintain, and support their position by affidavit, that the defendant Connecticcare did play a role in the decision as to who would participate in the determination as to who would participate in the IPA. The plaintiffs assert by way of affidavit that a document generated by the defendant showed "high utilizers" - utilization refers to the cost per patient per visit and the number of visits per year. Dr. Curry was informed that high utilizers wouldn't be accepted in the I.P.A. Some of those [*3] accepted had higher utilization rates than those of the plaintiffs. At a meeting of prospective IPA member chiropractors a map of the state was displayed showing pins placed on certain cities. Later the defendant and CCC informed the plaintiff Santiago she would not be offered an IPA contract based on a review of geographical need and participation criteria. Dr. Santiago's practice is located in the same town as Dr. Owens who was a member of the CCC board of directors and who was thus in the IPA. As noted the plaintiffs assert the defendant did participate in determining who would be allowed in the IPA.

The defendant by affidavit asserts it only provided logistical and administrative support to CCC pursuant to a contract but denies participating in selecting the chiropractors who would be let into the IPA and did not require CCC that include or exclude certain individuals from membership.

The rules to be applied in summary judgment matters are wellknown. Such HN1 a motion must not be granted if there is a genuine issue of material fact.

The motion for summary judgment claims that the second, third and fourth counts brought against Connecticare are barred by the federal act known as ERISA [*4] and also that as a matter of state law the causes of action in the three counts cannot be maintained and no genuine issue of material fact bars the granting of summary judgment on these counts.

The ERISA preemption claim appears to be based on an analysis the allegations of the complaint and the relief sought. This issue appears to be resolvable as an issue of law and, at least to the court, it does not appear that the plaintiffs claim an issue of material fact prevents the granting of the motion - they argue, as a matter of law there is no ERISA preemption. The plaintiffs do maintain the three counts should not be dismissed on state law grounds because there exist genuine issues of material fact.

ERISA PREEMPTION

The first issue that must be discussed by the court is whether the Employment Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA), 29 USC § 1001 et seq., and specifically § 1144 \(a\) of that act preempts the state law claims made by the plaintiffs in this case. HN2 Section 1144 in relevant part states that ERISA "shall supersede any and all State laws insofar as they may now or hereafter relate to any employee benefit plan." Section 1144\(c\) provides and the Supremacy Clause [*5] of the federal constitution requires that the term "state laws" includes any state statute, regulation, common law ruling or other state action.

HN3 The reach of federal preemption under § 1144 \(a\) has been described in broad language. In Shaw v. Delta Airlines Inc. 463 U.S. 85, 96-97, 77 L. Ed. 2d 490, 103 S. Ct. 2890 \(1982\), the court said: "A (state) law 'relates to' an employee benefit plan, in the normal sense of the phrase, if it has a connection or reference to such a plan." This broad language must be tempered for as the court said in Alessi v. Raybestos-Manhattan, Inc., 451 U.S. 504, 522, 101 S. Ct. 1895, 68 L. Ed. 2d 402 \(1980\): "Our analysis of this problem must be guided by a respect for the separate spheres of governmental authority preserved in our federalist system." In a recent case Justice Souter in referring to § 1144 \(a\) added an even more dramatic flourish by saying "we . . . have addressed claims of preemption with the starting presumption that Congress does not intend to supplant state law." New York Blue Cross v. Travelers Insurance, 514 U.S. , 115 S. Ct. 1671, 131 L.Ed 2d 695, 704 \(1995\) However, it is difficult to see how Congress could [*6] have used clearer language than that set forth in § 1144 \(a\). Also even in these days when the philosophy of Federal retrenchment seems so far advanced Justice Souter in the end quoted with approval language in an earlier case, Ingersoll-Rand v. McClendon, 498 U.S. 133, 142, 112 L. Ed. 2d 474, 111 S. Ct. 478 \(1992\). There the court said that in enacting the statute Congress intended:

"to ensure that plans and plan sponsors would be subject to a uniform body of benefits law; the goal was to minimize the administrative and financial burden of complying with conflicting directives among States or between States and the Federal Government . . . , [and to prevent] the potential for conflict in substantive law . . . requiring the tailoring of plans and employer conduct to the peculiarities of the law of each jurisdiction." Ingersoll-Rand, 498 U.S. at 142, 112 L. Ed. 2d 474, 111 S. Ct. 478.

This echoes the statement of a Senator quoted in Pilot Life Ins. Co. v. Dedeaux, 481 U.S. 41, 56, 95 L. Ed. 2d 39, 107 S. Ct. 1549 \(1987\) who said: "The uniformity of decision which the act is designed to foster will help administrators, fiduciaries and participants to predict [*7] the legality of proposed actions without the necessity of reference to varying state laws."

In deed as Justice Souter notes at page 706 of New York Blue Cross v. Travelers Ins.: "The basic thrust of the preemption clause, then, was to avoid a multiplicity of regulation in order to permit the nationally uniform administration of employee benefit plans."

The question really becomes what type of litigation based on state statute or common law should be held to interfere with the administration of an employee benefit plan? For preemption to be found then two issues must be addressed: (1) what does the "administration" of such a plan mean and (2) assuming we establish a definition for that term what type and/or degree of state interference is permissible without a finding of preemption.

There are scores of Federal cases that struggle with the issue of preemption and the analysis is confused because of the broad range of employee benefit plans covered by ERISA. They range from pension to health plans. Often then it is not helpful to cull out language in one case or another that might be said to define what the administration of a plan means in one context and apply it to a different [*8] factual setting.

In a triumph of understatement the court in Arkansas Blue Cross & Blue Shield v. St. Mary's Hospital, 947 F.2d 1341, 1344 (CA 8, 1991) said that Shaw v. Delta Airlines Inc., supra doesn't "provide courts with a fool-proof method for determining on which side of the preemption line a specific state statute falls." But the court then goes on to provide a helpful review of the cases and some general principles that should be considered in deciding the issue of Federal preemption under ERISA. The court notes that Federal cases:

"have relied on HN4[↑] a variety of factors when determining whether a state statute of general application 'relates to' ERISA plans. These factors include whether the state law negates an ERISA plan provision, Baxter v. Lynn, 886 F.2d 182, 185 \(8th Cir. 1989\), whether the state law affects relations between primary ERISA entities, Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Neusser, 810 F.2d 550, 556 \(6th Cir. 1987\); Sommers Drug Stores v. Corrigan Enters, 793 F.2d 1456, 1467 \(5th Cir. 1986\), whether the state law impacts the structure of ERISA plans, United Food & Commercial Workers v. Pacyga, 801 F.2d 1157, 1160 \(9th Cir. 1986\), whether [*9] the state law impacts the administration of ERISA plans, Fort Halifax Packing Co. v. Coyne, 482 U.S. 1, 9-10, 107 S. Ct. 2211, 2216-17, 96 L. Ed. 2d 1 \(1987\), whether the state law has an economic impact on ERISA plans, Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Borges, 869 F.2d 142, 147-48 \(2d Cir. 1989\), whether preemption of the state law is consistent with other ERISA provisions, Mackey v. Lanier Collection Agency & Serv., 486 U.S. 825, 832-40, 108 S. Ct. 2182, 2186-90, 100 L. Ed. 2d 836 \(1988\), and whether the state law is an exercise of traditional state power, Aetna Life Ins. Co., 869, F.2d at 148; Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 810 F.2d at 555.

This court agrees that all these factors can be relevant to an ERISA preemption analysis. Like any list of factors, however, they only serve to focus and clarify the court's analysis. The court must still look to the totality of the state statute's impact on the plan - both how many of the factors favor preemption and how heavily each individual factor favors preemption are relevant.

We do not believe that any one factor, by itself, is determinative of the ERISA preemption issue before the court today."

[*10] No one factor is controlling. Merely because a state law or cause of action represents a traditional exercise of state power won't dictate a finding that there is no ERISA preemption. Likewise just because a particular law does not affect relations between primary ERISA plan entities should not be controlling.

But as a 10th Circuit case has put it a primary concern must be whether the state law or state common law or statutory action affects the "structure, the administration or the type of benefits provided by an ERISA plan", Airparts Co. v. Custom Benefit Services of Austin Inc., 28 F.3d 1062, 1065 (CA 10, 1994), see also Hospice of Metro Denver Inc. v. Group Health Ins. of Okla, Inc., 944 F.2d 752, 753 (CA 10, 1991), Rebaldo v. Cuomo, 749 F.2d 133, 139 (CA 2, 1984). In Airparts Co. the employers and trustees of a pension plan brought state law claims for negligence indemnity and common law fraud against a consultant to the plan administrators. The court noted the state law claims wouldn't have any effect on the plan entities who were united in seeking redress against the defendant. But the court went on to say: "Additionally, these claims will not affect, the [*11] structure and administration of the plan or type of benefits provided by the plan;" there was no effort to "modify the terms of the plan," 23 F.3d at 1066. The court went on to quote from Joos v. Intermountain Health Corp., Inc., 25 F.3d 915, 917 (CA 10, 1994) which said: "If the elements of the ERISA plan are inherently part of the factual basis of the . . . lawsuit, the lawsuit is preempted in part because of the possibility of inconsistent or contradicting interpretations."

To ascertain whether a particular state law or suit would affect the structure, administration or the type of benefits of an ERISA plan one must not merely look at which entity - here Connectic平 - the litigation is aimed at but at the relief being sought. Here the plaintiffs seek inclusion in the provider network that certain of their patients' employee benefit plans utilize. As the defendant notes the provider network "is an integral part of, and established pursuant to the employee benefits plans of the plaintiffs' patients."

The recent case of Hollis et al v. Agna, 13 Conn. L. Rptr. 396 (1995) has a bearing on the issue now before this court. The factual setting and the issues presented are similar.

[*12] In that case a group of participants in a CIGNA health plan sued the defendant on a variety of state statutory claims. The basis of the claims was that the defendant had wrongfully excluded a physician from its list of participating physicians whose fees would be reimbursed under a private medical plan. The court at page 400 said: "This is in essence a complaint about plan administration. This is a core ERISA concern.

A moment's reflection will confirm why this is so. The preemption clause "was intended to ensure that plans and plan sponsors would be subject to a uniform body of benefits law; the goal was to minimize the administrative and financial burden of complying with conflicting directives among States or between States and the Federal Government." Ingersoll-Rand Co. v. McClendon, supra, 498 U.S. at 142. Allowing state law actions like the one here would subject plans and plan sponsors to burdens not unlike those that the preemption clause seeks to foreclose. It is entirely foreseeable that different state courts, construing a wide array of state statutory provisions and common-law principles, might develop different substantive standards governing the circumstances [*13] under which health plans could remove physicians from their lists. This would, in the language of Ingersoll-Rand, require "the tailoring of plans . . . to the peculiarities of the law of each jurisdiction. Such an outcome is fundamentally at odds with the goal of uniformity that Congress sought to implement." Id.

As in Hollis the relief sought here would permit an intervention into the very provider network the defendant administers.

From that perspective cases like Aetna Life Insurance v. Borges, 869 F.2d 142 (CA 2, 1989) really are not on point or helpful to the resolution of the issue now before the court. There the plaintiff insurance company brought an action for declaratory and injunctive relief contending that the state improperly demanded the surrender under state escheat laws of $ 2.5 million in uncashed checks and drafts under ERISA plans. The discussion of the court at 869 F.2d pages 145-147 is replete with comments that no preemption should be found where there is only a "peripheral" effect on a plan or there is some "minimal indirect impact on administration". In other words the court in Borges assumed as a starting point that the state action did "not [*14] affect the structure, the administration or the type of benefits provided by an ERISA plan."

In other words the cases seem to say HN5 if a state law or cause of action does not affect the structure of an ERISA plan or administration or type of benefits mere economic impact does not require a finding of preemption; thus see Aetna Life Insurance Co. v. Borges, supra, Mackey v. Lanier Collection Agency & Service Inc., 486 U.S. 825, 100 L. Ed. 2d 836, 108 S. Ct. 2182 \(1988\) (generally applicable garnishment law), Fort Halifax Packing Co. v. Coyne, 482 U.S. 1, 96 L. Ed. 2d 1, 107 S. Ct. 2211 \(1987\) (law lump sum severance payments when closing a plant), Rebaldo v. Cuomo, 749 F.2d 133 (CA 2, 1984) (a law prescribing what hospitals can charge for in-patient care, thereby preventing plans from negotiating their own discount rates with hospitals), Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Neusser, 810 F.2d 550 (CA 6, 1987) (city tax of general application that effects employee contributions to benefit plans) But again that is not what is involved here - here the plaintiffs seek to be included in the provider network, directly affecting the administration of the plan and its benefits. [*15]

Similarly as noted in the Arkansas Blue Cross, Blue Shield case some courts have found that preemption is dictated when a state law affects relations between primary ERISA entities, Sommers Drug Stores v. Corrigan Enterprises, Inc., 793 F.2d 1456, 1468 (CA 5, 1986). Such laws would obviously affect the administration of the ERISA plan or its benefits. But so too would a state law or suit which, as here, would affect the delivery of plan benefits by the plan to beneficiaries even if the way that result is effected is through the relief sought in a suit brought by an "outside" entity against the plan, cf Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 471 U.S. 724, 85 L. Ed. 2d 728, 105 S. Ct. 2380 \(1985\).¹

[*16] Also while it is true that an important consideration must be whether the state law giving rise to the cause of action focuses specifically on ERISA benefit plans. cf Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Borges, 869 F.2d 142, 147 (CA 2, 1989) (escheat law sought to be enforced applied to lost or abandoned property generally), "this does not end (the) inquiry, however. HN6 A state rule of law may be preempted even though it has no such direct nexus with or is not purposely aimed at ERISA plans if its effect is to dictate or restrict the choices of ERISA plans with regard to their benefits, structure, reporting and administration or if allowing states to have such rules would impair the ability of a plan to function simultaneously in a number of states," United Wire, Metal & Machine Health and Welfare Fund v. Morristown Memorial Hospital, 995 F.2d 1179, 1193 (CA 3, 1993), see also Erisa Preemption - State Law, 121 L.ed 2d 783, 797-798 (1995) which cites Ingersoll-Rand Co. v. McClendon, 498 U.S. 133, 141, 112 L. Ed. 2d 474, 111 S. Ct. 478 \(1990\). That is exactly the situation here.

The plaintiffs also argue that a finding of preemption here would create an insulated legal world in [*17] which Connecticut's laws of general applicability wouldn't apply to the defendant. They cite DiPietro-Kay v. Interactive Benefits Corp., supra which quoted Rebaldo v. Cuomo, supra to the effect that ERISA can't be held to invalidate every state action that may increase the costs of operating these plans because otherwise the plans would be permitted to lead a "charmed existence that was never contemplated by Congress." 825 F. Supp. at p. 462. But DiPietro-Kay in rejecting the claim of preemption was dealing with an allegation that the defendant misrepresented and concealed the renewal protection rider on the plan from the employer who brought suit. Before making the above noted comment the court explicitly found that the plaintiff "does not challenge any action taken by (the defendant) in administering the plan, e.g. processing a claim or disbursing a benefit, nor do (the plaintiffs) claim any right under the plan, dispute its terms or attempt to modify it." The court went on to hold that the one time recovery sought by the plaintiff based on benefits it would've been provided with if it'd been allowed to take advantage of the renewal protection rider would not "implicate [*18] the administration of the plan", 825 F. Supp. at p. 462. Having made these observations the court went on to conclude although there might be some economic impact on benefit plans by allowing such claims, that would not demand preemption. It was in this context that the court made the above referenced remarks now relied upon by the plaintiff. If the administration of the plan isn't affected, a de minimis increase in operating costs certainly don't dictate preemption. Here the plan is directly affected.

Also the fact that the plaintiffs are forestalled in asserting general remedies provided by state law won't defeat a finding of preemption when even a law of general application must be preempted because of its impact on an ERISA plan.

The point is that if preemption is found then the only remedy provided is a federal one and the point of the federal remedy is that it is provided to plan participants and beneficiaries, 29 USC § 1132. Given the broad fiduciary duties placed on plan administrators under the act and the power of the Secretary of HEW under § 1109 of the federal act to enforce those duties, I certainly can't say federal law doesn't provide adequate protection to plan [*19] participants for ensuring the adoption and implementation of an appropriate employee benefit plan. Third party providers and their interest in participation in a plan were not a concern the federal act meant to directly address.

Their exclusion would only become a concern of the Federal act if it could be shown that their exclusion somehow violated the fiduciary obligations of the plan administrators to the plain beneficiaries. If apart from that such exclusion is claimed to have been improper or illegal and no state or federal remedy is available due to preemption, perhaps a due process claim would be presented. But that is not before me.

In any event I find that the action brought in this case is preempted by ERISA. No genuine issue of material fact is presented since the allegations of the complaint and the relief sought properly raise the issue of preemption

In the third count the plaintiffs allege the defendant violated an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing owed to plan beneficiaries by failing to inform beneficiaries that it entered into a contract with a group of chiropractic physicians which they must use but [*20] with whom the defendant agreed to pay a lump sum each month for chiropractic services. HN7 Every contract carries an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing but it is difficult to understand how this theory can be relied upon here since there does not appear to be an underlying between the plaintiffs and Connecticare. Apart therefore from the court's ruling on ERISA preemption there is an independent ground to grant the defendant's motion for summary judgment on the third count. It should be noted, however, that the very allegations set forth in this count and in the second count, asserting CUTPA violations, underline the reasons why ERISA preemption must be found. Both counts base much of their factual allegations giving rise to their respective legal claims on the perceived effect that the actions of the defendant and a certain group of chiropractic physicians will have on plan beneficiaries. The plan administrators and the beneficiaries are certainly primary entities of the ERISA plan.

The defendant also raises a non-ERISA standing objection to the plaintiff's CUTPA claim in the second count. The plaintiffs do point out that the CUTPA claim does allege Connecticare breached [*21] obligations owed to prospective I.P.A. members - the plaintiffs themselves. On the state of the record before me I'm not prepared to say that summary judgment should be granted on the non-ERISA preemption claim of lack of standing as to the CUTPA count.

The fourth count of the complaint alleges that the defendant violated the state anti-trust act. The court has ruled that the claim is precluded by ERISA and will discuss whether apart from the ERISA grounds the defendant should prevail on its motion for summary judgment as to this count.

The plaintiffs allege the defendant conspired with chiropractic physician competitors of the plaintiffs to persuade or induce third parties - plan beneficiaries to utilize the services of other doctors than the plaintiffs. Their exclusion from membership in CCC would according to the plaintiff's allegations be a secondary boycott.

HN8 Our anti-trust statute is set forth in § 35-28 of the general statutes and regarding the interpretation of this statute our court has said: "the judicial interpretation of the federal act is particularly pertinent in our construction of the state statute," [*Elida v. Harinor Realty Corp., 177 Conn. 218, 226, 413 \[22\] A.2d 1226 \(1979\)](#).

A major contention of the defendant is that an essential element of an antitrust violation is the allegation that the concerted action imposes an unreasonable restrain on trade, see subsection (a) of the statute, State v. Hossan-Maxwell, Inc. 181 Conn. 655, 666, 436 A.2d 284 \(1980\).

HN9 In determining whether a challenged activity constitutes an unreasonable restraint on trade the courts use a per se analysis or a rule of reason analysis.

A per se analysis is used only in a limited class of cases - a court must conclude that a defendant's actions are so plainly harmful to competition and so obviously lacking in any redeeming pro-competitive values that they're conclusively presumed illegal without the need for further examination, Broadcast Music Inc. v. CBS, 441 U.S. 1, 8, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1, 99 S. Ct. 1551 \(1979\). As said in Capital Imaging v. Mohawk Valley Medical Assoc., 996 F.2d 537, 543 \(CA 2, 1993\).

"Most cases fall outside these narrow categories held to be illegal per se. In the general run of cases a plaintiff must prove an antitrust injury under the rule of reason. Under this test the plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that [*23] the challenged action has had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market; to prove it has been harmed as an individual competitor will not suffice."

As the court noted the Supreme Court has cautioned against applying the per se rule to professional associations "because the economic impact of professional activities is difficult to track", id at page 543.

Cases cited by the plaintiffs on other points raised in their brief support the application of a rule of reason test here, cf Kreuzer v. American Academy of Periodontology, 237 U.S. App. D.C. 43, 735 F.2d 1479, 1491 \(CADC, 1984\), Wilk v. AMA, 895 F.2d 352, 359 \(CA 7, 1990\) but see Weiss v. York Hospital, 745 F.2d 786, 817 \(CA 3, 1984\). The underlying purposes sought to be effectuated by setting up the IPA and forming the CCC are not illegal, in fact they merely seek to control costs. Given that courts should be wary about creating per se rules in this area. Since I believe it is appropriate to use the rule of reason test to determine if there has been a sufficient showing of restraint of trade, it is helpful to examine the Capital Imaging case. That case involved a situation [*24] where the court of Appeals upheld the trial court's granting of the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Later on in the opinion at 996 F.2d page 546 the court said that in the summary judgment context the: HN10 "Rule of reason analysis requires the antitrust plaintiff to bear the initial burden of demonstrating that the defendant's conduct or policy has had a substantially harmful effect on competition. The plaintiff may satisfy this burden without 'detailed market analysis' by 'offering proof of actual detrimental effects, such as a reduction of output.' The plaintiff in Capital Imaging had failed to meet its initial burden of showing that the defendant's activities have had an adverse impact on price, quality, or output of medical services offered to consumers in the relevant market. It is only after that initial burden is met that the antitrust defendant must offer evidence to exonerate its conduct such as pro competitive justifications for its conduct., 996 F.2d at 547.

My problem here is that the plaintiffs have not offered any evidence to meet their initial burden of showing an adverse impact on price, quality, or output of chiropractic services offered to consumers in [*25] the relevant market - i.e. the plan beneficiaries.² On this basis alone I conclude there is a non-ERISA basis for granting the defendant's summary judgment motion as to the fourth count.

²I will not discuss the other reasons advanced by the defendant as a non-ERISA basis for granting its motion as to the fourth count. Failure to establish this preliminary element warrants the granting of the motion.

In any event based on the ERISA analysis the court grants the defendant's motion for summary judgment as to all counts and also grants the motion as to the third and fourth counts on non-ERISA grounds.

In reviewing no evidence points, the appellate court considers only the evidence and reasonable inferences drawn therefrom which support the jury's findings. The appellate court disregards all evidence and inferences contrary to the fact finding. If there is more than a scintilla of evidence to support the finding, the no evidence challenge fails.

HN2 Standards of Review, Substantial Evidence

In reviewing factual insufficiency points, the appellate court reviews all of the evidence in the record, including any evidence contrary to the verdict. It will set aside a jury's finding on the basis of a factual insufficiency or great weight and preponderance point only if it determines that the evidence is factually insufficient or so against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence as to be manifestly unjust, shocking to the conscience, or clearly demonstrating bias. If it is inclined to reverse on the basis of factual insufficiency or great weight and preponderance point, the appellate court must detail the evidence relevant to the issue in consideration and clearly state why the jury's finding is factually insufficient or is so against the great weight and preponderance as to be manifestly unjust; why it shocks the conscience; or clearly demonstrates bias.

HN3 Standards of Review, Substantial Evidence

The appellate court must set forth in what regard the contrary evidence greatly outweighs the evidence in support of the verdict. If it sustains a factual insufficiency or great weight and preponderance point, it can only remand the case. The Constitution empowers the courts of appeals to "unfind" facts, even if they cannot "find" them. The appellate court cannot substitute its interpretation of the evidence for that of the jury even if a different answer can be reached on the evidence.

HN9 Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The legality of an agreement or regulation cannot be determined by so simple a test, as whether it restrains competition. Every agreement concerning trade, every regulation of trade, restrains. To bind, to restrain, is of their very essence. The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts.

HN10 Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

While many factors may be considered, the rule of reason focuses directly on the challenged restraint's impact on competitive conditions. The purpose of the analysis is to form a judgment about the competitive significance of the restraint; it is not to decide whether a policy favoring competition is in the public interest, or in the interest of the members of an industry.

To establish an antitrust violation, the complaining party must prove that the agreement has a substantial adverse effect on competition in the relevant market. Ordinarily, a plaintiff must delineate the relevant market and show that the defendant has enough market power to significantly impair competition. However, such a showing is not required if an actual, substantial, adverse effect on competition is proven.

HN12 [blue icon] Regulated Industries, Higher Education & Professional Associations

A showing of adverse impact on a competitor will not support recovery for violation of the antitrust laws. To show a violation of the rule of reason, actual adverse impact on the relevant market must be shown. Further, the adverse impact must be considered in light of procompetitive or other redeeming effects the practice may have on the market. Not all arrangements among actual or potential competitors that have an impact on price are per se violations of the Sherman Act or even unreasonable restraints. Intent to defraud is generally not susceptible to direct proof. It almost invariably must be proven by circumstantial evidence. Standing alone, failure to perform is no evidence of the promisor's intent not to perform when the promise is made. However, failure to perform is a fact that a jury may consider in determining intent. A promisor's denial that he ever makes a promise is a fact showing no intent to perform when the promise is made; however, standing alone it is insufficient evidence to support a finding of lack of intent to perform. "Slight circumstantial evidence" of fraud, when considered with the breach of promise to perform, is sufficient to support a finding of fraudulent intent.

OPINION ON MOTION FOR REHEARING

Opinion By Justice Barber

We deny the parties' motions for rehearing. We vacate our opinion and judgment of August 24, 1995. This is now the opinion of the Court.

American Chiropractic Clinics, P.C. and Paul Liechty (collectively ACC) appeal the judgment rendered against them for violation of Texas antitrust laws, fraud, and breach of contract. In seven points of error, ACC asserts the trial court erred in awarding Spence: (1) damages for violation of Texas antitrust law because there was no evidence that the noncompetition agreement(s) adversely affected competition; (2) damages under Texas antitrust law because there was no evidence or insufficient evidence that the noncompetition agreement(s) damaged Spence; (3) damages for fraud because there was no evidence [*2] or insufficient evidence showing Spence was defrauded; (4) damages for fraud because there was no evidence of damages; (5) damages for breach of contract because there was no evidence of damages; (6) attorney's fees because there was no evidence or insufficient evidence of segregation of fees between prosecution and defense of claims and causes of action; and (7) punitive damages because the fraud claim must be set aside.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Dr. Paul Liechty is a chiropractor. In 1982, he formed American Chiropractic Clinics, P.C. (American Chiropractic). American Chiropractic is a professional corporation that owns and operates a clinic in Mesquite, Texas. Liechty also had ownership interests in clinics in Rockwall, downtown Dallas, north Dallas, and Duncanville.² Liechty is president of [*3] and a shareholder in American Chiropractic. The jury was instructed, without objection, that Liechty's wife, Sharon, was an officer of and shareholder in American Chiropractic.³

In February of 1989, Liechty contacted Spence about working for American Chiropractic. Spence made it clear that he was not looking for an associateship. Although the evidence conflicts as to when the agreement was reached and what its terms were, Liechty agreed to sell Spence a fifty-percent interest in American Chiropractic for between $ 800,000 and $ 1,000,000. Liechty and Spence agreed to a six-month "trial period" before proceeding with the purchase. Spence thought he would be made a "partner" in six [*4] months, or shortly thereafter.⁴ Liechty agreed to help Spence obtain financing for the purchase. At trial, the parties disagreed as to the type of financing Liechty agreed to arrange or provide. Spence and Liechty never executed any written documents regarding Spence's being made a partner.

Spence agreed to work for American Chiropractic, and signed a six-month employment contract. The term of this contract was March 1, 1989 though September 1, 1989. The contract contained a noncompetition agreement. Spence thought he would be made a partner at the end of the six-month period, or shortly thereafter. After the first contract expired, Spence continued to work for American Chiropractic for about six months. He then signed another six-month contract [*5] containing a noncompetition agreement. The second employment contract ran from March 1, 1990 through September 1, 1990.

Sometime between December of 1990 and March of 1991, Spence and Liechty met with Harlan Bilton of Swiss Avenue Bank to discuss financing Spence's purchase of a fifty-percent interest in American Chiropractic. The bank agreed to loan Spence the money for the purchase if the loan was secured by a certificate of deposit. Additionally, the bank proposed a series of loans, as opposed to a single loan, to finance the purchase. Liechty agreed to provide security for the loan. Spence rejected the loan package because he felt the proposed loan terms were not consistent with his and Liechty's agreement.⁵ Spence began planning to leave American Chiropractic and to open his own clinic.

[*6] Spence executed a third employment contract which ran from December 11, 1990 through April 1, 1991. The third employment contract contained a noncompetition agreement. The noncompetition clause encompassed the area within a ten-mile radius of the Mesquite clinic. The third employment contract also contained a nonsolicitation clause, as did the earlier employment contracts.

Numerous disputes arose between Liechty and Spence regarding compensation, partnership, health insurance, patient switching, and office administration. Liechty testified that after the third employment contract expired, he told Spence he did not want him working for American Chiropractic anymore. Liechty characterized the situation as not

² Each of these clinics is a separate corporation. The record is unclear regarding the relationship between American Chiropractic and these other clinics. There is evidence showing that they shared a common payroll account and had joint staff meetings.

³ In his brief, Liechty states that he was the sole shareholder of ACC.

⁴ Throughout the trial, the parties referred to Spence being made a "partner." However, it is clear that the parties were contemplating a sale of 50% of the stock of American Chiropractic to Spence. We will follow the parties convention and speak in terms of partnership.

⁵ Spence also testified that at the time of the meeting with the bank, he had already decided that he was not going to become a partner with Liechty due to "other factors." He later recanted this and testified that he would have become a partner had acceptable financing been available.

renewing Spence's contract and not allowing him to work for American Chiropractic without one. Spence testified that he was fired.

After leaving American Chiropractic, Spence first worked for another chiropractor within the ten-mile noncompetition area. He also treated patients, some of whom were former ACC patients of his, in his home. Later, he opened his own office in Rockwall. Spence treated a number of patients in his Rockwall Clinic whom he had previously treated at American [*7] Chiropractic.

American Chiropractic sued Spence, seeking enforcement of the noncompetition and nonsolicitation provisions of the employment agreement and for breach of contract. American Chiropractic also sought injunctive relief. Spence counter-claimed, and sued Paul and Sharon Liechty as third-party defendants. In his petition, Spence sought recovery for breach of contract, breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, and antitrust violations.

The trial court found that the ten-mile geographical radius of the noncompetition clause was unreasonable and reduced it to a five-mile radius from the Mesquite clinic.⁶ The case was tried to a jury. Pursuant to the jury's verdict, the trial court signed a judgment against Liechty for antitrust violations, fraud, and punitive damages. The trial court entered judgment against American Chiropractic for breach of contract, antitrust violations, attorney's fees, and punitive damages. The trial court signed a judgment against Liechty and ACC jointly and severally for fraud. The judgment also awarded Spence punitive damages of $ 10,000 against American Chiropractic and Liechty severally. American Chiropractic took nothing on its claims against Spence. Pursuant [*8] to the trial court's judgment non obstante veredicto, Spence took nothing on his claims against Sharon Liechty.

STANDARD OF REVIEW: SUFFICIENCY OF THE EVIDENCE

A. No Evidence

HN1[] In reviewing no evidence points, we consider only the evidence and reasonable inferences drawn therefrom which support the jury's findings. See Phillips v. ACS Mun. Brokers, Inc., 888 S.W.2d 872, 874 \(Tex. App.--Dallas 1994, no writ\). We disregard all evidence and inferences contrary to the fact finding. Stafford v. Stafford, 726 S.W.2d 14, 16 \(Tex. 1987\); Phillips, 888 S.W.2d at 874. If there is more than a scintilla of evidence to support the finding, the no evidence challenge fails. Stedman v. Georgetown Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 595 S.W.2d \[*91 486, 488 \(Tex. 1979\).

B. Insufficient Evidence

HN2[] In reviewing factual insufficiency points, we review all of the evidence in the record, including any evidence contrary to the verdict. Plas-Tex., Inc. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 772 S.W.2d 442, 445 \(Tex. 1989\); R____ S____ v. J____ B____ B____, 883 S.W.2d 711, 715 \(Tex. App.--Dallas 1994, no writ\). We will set aside a jury's finding on the basis of a factual insufficiency or great weight and preponderance point only if we determine that the evidence is factually insufficient or so against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence as to be manifestly unjust, shocking to the conscience, or clearly demonstrating bias. Ames v. Ames, 776 S.W.2d 154, 159 \(Tex. 1989\)(quoting Pool v. Ford Motor Co., 715 S.W.2d 629, 635 \(Tex. 1986\)), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1080, 108 L. Ed. 2d 939, 110 S. Ct. 1809 (1990); see also Pilkington v. Kornell, 822 S.W.2d 223, 230-31 \(Tex. App.--Dallas 1991, writ denied\). If we are inclined to reverse on the basis of factual insufficiency or great weight and preponderance point, we must "detail the evidence relevant to the issue in consideration and clearly state why the jury's finding is factually insufficient or is [*10] so against the great weight and preponderance as to be manifestly unjust; why it shocks the conscience; or clearly demonstrates bias." Pool, 715 S.W.2d at 635. Additionally, HN3⁷ we must set forth in what regard the contrary evidence greatly outweighs the evidence in support of the verdict. Id. If we sustain a factual insufficiency or great weight and preponderance point, we can only remand the case. "Our present Constitution empowers the courts of appeals to 'unfind' facts, even if they cannot 'find' them." Id. at 634. We cannot substitute our interpretation of the evidence for that of the jury even if a different answer could be reached on the evidence. *R*___ *S*___, 883 S.W.2d at 715; see Herbert v. Herbert, 754 S.W.2d 141, 144 (Tex. 1988).

ANTITRUST

In its first point of error, ACC asserts the trial court erred in entering judgment against American Chiropractic for antitrust violations. ACC argues there was no evidence that the noncompetition provisions of Spence's employment contracts or the other associate doctors' contracts adversely affected competition.

HN9[] The legality of an agreement or regulation cannot be determined by so simple a test, as whether it restrains competition. Every agreement concerning trade, every regulation of trade, restrains. To bind, to restrain, is of their very essence. The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

Board of Trade of Chicago, 246 U.S. at 238. HN10[] While many [*14] factors may be considered, the rule of reason focuses directly on the challenged restraint's impact on competitive conditions. National Soc'y of Professional Eng'r's v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 688, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637, 98 S. Ct. 1355 (1978). "The purpose of the analysis is to form a judgment about the competitive significance of the restraint; it is not to decide whether a policy favoring competition is in the public interest, or in the interest of the members of an industry." Id. at 692.

HN11[] To establish an antitrust violation, the complaining party must prove that the agreement has a substantial adverse effect on competition in the relevant market. MJR Corp. v. B & B Vending Co., 760 S.W.2d 4, 22-23 (Tex. App.--Dallas 1988, writ denied); see Plueckhahn v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 749 F.2d 241, 246 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 473 U.S. 905, 87 L. Ed. 2d 652, 105 S. Ordinarily, a plaintiff must delineate the relevant market and show that the defendant has enough market power to significantly impair competition. Bhan, 929 F.2d at 1413; see Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 17-18, 31-32, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1984). However, [*15] such a showing is not required if an actual, substantial, adverse effect on competition is proven. Federal Trade Comm'n v. Indiana Fed. of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 460-61, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445, 106 S. Ct. 2009 (1986); Bhan, 929 F.2d at 1413.

HN12[] A showing of adverse impact on a competitor will not support recovery for violation of the antitrust laws. See Consolidated Metal Prods. v. American Petroleum Inst., 846 F.2d 284, 293 (5th Cir. 1988); see DeSantis, 793 S.W.2d at 688. To show a violation of the rule of reason, actual adverse impact on the relevant market must be shown. DeSantis, 793 S.W.2d at 688. Further, the adverse impact must be considered in light of procompetitive or other redeeming effects the practice may have on the market. See National Collegiate Athletic Ass'n, 468 U.S. at 103; Plueckhahn, 749 F.2d at 246; Henderson Broadcasting Corp. v. Houston Sports Ass'n, Inc., 647 F. Supp. 292, 296 (S.D. Tex. 1986). GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 51-57, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977).

HN13[] A "relevant market" has both geographic and product dimensions. See Bhan, 929 F.2d at 1413. The geographic component is dependant upon the nature and extent of the alleged restraint and the product or products in issue. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 7-8. The geographic limits of a relevant market may exceed the geographic limit of a particular agreement. See Bhan, 929 F.2d at 1413.

In determining whether the subject noncompetition agreements give rise to an antitrust violation, we must be mindful of the position that the Texas Legislature has taken with respect to noncompetition agreements and antitrust. At least HN14[] to a limited extent, the legislature has exempted noncompetition agreements from antitrust laws. See TEX. BUS. & COM. CODE ANN. § 15.50 (Vernon Supp. 1995).¹⁰ From this we may infer that the legislature has determined that the anticompetitive consequences of reasonable noncompetition agreements are outweighed by their overall desirability.

[*17] B. Application of Law to Facts

With respect to the alleged antitrust violation, the jury was instructed that it "must consider all the evidence in the case and the economic effects upon competition of ACC's and the Liechty's practice of placing the covenants-not-to-compete in their associate doctor's [sic] contracts." Evidence presented at trial showed that when considered together, the noncompetition agreements of the associate doctors could cover Dallas. For purposes of evaluating the sufficiency of the evidence, the geographic scope of the relevant market is Dallas. Spence's position is that the product in issue is chiropractic care.¹¹ Spence argues the noncompetition agreements wrongfully exclude chiropractic physicians from the relevant market.

[*18] The record before us contains no evidence regarding the availability of chiropractors or chiropractic care in the relevant market. Spence introduced evidence showing that in the ten years prior to the trial, Liechty had approximately thirty associate doctors sign covenants not to compete. However, Spence presented no evidence showing how many of those covenants were in effect at any given time. There is no evidence establishing how many chiropractic physicians practice in Dallas or within a five or ten mile radius of the Mesquite clinic. There is no evidence showing what percentage of the chiropractic care market was controlled by ACC in Dallas or anywhere else. Thus, there was no evidence showing that ACC had market power to significantly impair competition in Dallas or within a five or ten mile radius of the Mesquite clinic.

Spence presented evidence showing that his rates were lower than those charged by ACC; however, Spence did not establish what the prevailing rates were generally in Dallas. The record contains no evidence linking the noncompetition agreements to the price or availability¹² [*20] of chiropractic services and physicians in Dallas.¹³ Spence did present evidence [*19] indicating that a chiropractic physician who was required to move outside a ten-mile radius of a clinic might never return to practice within that area. This evidence may show the effect the noncompetition agreements had on certain potential competitors. However, to be violative of the antitrust laws

Notwithstanding Section 15.05 of this code, a covenant not to compete is enforceable if it is ancillary to or part of an otherwise enforceable agreement at the time the agreement is made to the extent that it contains limitations as to time, geographical area, and scope of activity to be restrained that are reasonable and do not impose a greater restraint than is necessary to protect the goodwill or other business interest of the promisee.

Because the trial court reformed the geographical scope of the subject non-competition agreement and because ACC makes no argument on appeal on the basis of section 15.50, we express no opinion as whether section 15.50 affects this case beyond being an indicia of legislative intent and public policy. See De Santis, 739 S.W.2d at 688 n.9.

¹³ In his appellate brief, Spence discusses certain billing practices and treatment plans ACC used with various insurance companies and patients. Spence's position is that these billing practices and treatment plans were improper in that they resulted in excessive charges and unnecessary treatment. Spence asserts, "the jury could have concluded that ACC was better able to pull off such a scheme if it avoided competition from the departing doctors who were aware of it." There is no evidence linking the subject practices to ACC's market power, the noncompetition agreements, or the cost or availability of chiropractic care in the relevant market; therefore, the practices were not evidence of anticompetitive affect on the relevant market.

effect on competition in the relevant market must be shown. See DeSantis, 793 S.W.2d at 688. Spence presented no evidence establishing what actual effect the noncompetition agreements had on the price or availability of chiropractic care in the relevant market. Spence failed to produce legally sufficient evidence showing that ACC had market power or that the noncompetition agreements had a substantial enough impact on the relevant market to constitute a violation of the section 15.05\(a\). We sustain ACC's first point of error. Because of our disposition of ACC's first point of error, we do not reach its second point of error which also challenged the antitrust award. See TEX. R. APP. P. 90(a).

FRAUD

In its third point of error, ACC asserts there was no evidence or insufficient evidence to support the jury's finding that it defrauded Spence. Specifically, ACC asserts there was: (1) no evidence or insufficient evidence showing that ACC made false representations; (2) no evidence of justifiable reliance; (3) no evidence or insufficient evidence [*21] of fraudulent intent; and (4) factually insufficient evidence that ACC's representations caused Spence damage.

Generally, HN15 in order to prevail on a fraud cause of action, the complaining party must prove that: (1) a material representation was made; (2) the representation was false; (3) when the speaker made the representation, he knew it was false or made it recklessly without any knowledge of its truth and as a positive assertion; (4) the representation was made with the intention that it should be acted upon by the complaining party; (5) the complaining party acted in reliance on the representation; and (6) the complaining party suffered injury as a result. Trenholm v. Ratcliff, 646 S.W.2d 927, 930 \(Tex. 1983\); see DeSantis, 793 S.W.2d at 688. A promise to do something in the future can be an actionable misrepresentation when it is made with no intention of performing the act. T.O. Stanley Boot Co. v. Bank of El Paso, 847 S.W.2d 218, 222 \(Tex. 1992\); Spoljaric v. Percival Tours, Inc., 708 S.W.2d 432, 434 \(Tex. 1986\).

A. Misrepresentations

In its appellate brief, ACC's argument centers on the representation regarding financing the loan and the [*22] loan Swiss Avenue Bank offered. ACC does not address the other representations which Spence asserted were false. The jury charge did not specify the representations which might have been false.¹⁴

¹⁴ With respect to fraud, the jury was charged as follows:

Do you find that Paul Liechty or ACC fraudulently induced Spence into going to work or continuing to work for ACC under the Employment Agreements?

You are instructed that a "fraudulent inducement" has occurred in this case if you find each of the following elements:

(1)

One or more promise was made;

(2)

The promise(s) was false;

(3)

The false promise(s) was made with no intention to perform at the time it was made;

(4)

The promise(s) was made with the intention that Spence act on it; and

(5)

Spence justifiably acted in reliance on the promise(s), to his detriment.

[*23] Spence testified that in February of 1989, Liechty promised to make Spence a partner after six months if all things went well between them. Both Spence and Liechty testified that things were going well after six months. Spence was not made a partner after six months, although the parties continued to discuss a partnership. The meeting with Swiss Avenue Bank regarding financing of the purchase did not take place until sometime between December 1990 and March 1991. Finally, there was evidence that Liechty had no intent to make Spence a partner.

There was legally and factually sufficient evidence from which the jury could have concluded that Liechty represented that Spence would be made a partner in the Mesquite clinic at the end of the initial six-month period if things went well between the parties, and that the representation was false. There was sufficient evidence from which the jury could have found that Spence was fraudulently induced into staying with ACC after the initial six-month period. We overrule ACC's third point of error to the extent it asserts there was insufficient evidence of misrepresentation.

B. Reliance

ACC argues that there was no evidence of [*24] justifiable reliance because the promise to make Spence a partner was conditioned on the parties being satisfied with each other at the end of the six-month period. ACC relies on Barrier v. Brinkmann, 130 Tex. 350, 109 S.W.2d 462 (Tex. 1937) to support its position. We conclude Barrier is distinguishable from the case before us.

In Barrier, a real estate dealer proposed a contract with property owners that would give the dealer plenary power over the real estate for the purpose of preventing foreclosure. The owners refused to sign the contract. Id. at 465. The court held that under these circumstances, the dealer was not liable in contract or fraud even though the dealer had promised to effect an arrangement that would avoid foreclosure. Id. at 466-67. Contract liability was not available because the oral promise contemplated execution of the contract giving the dealer powers to deal with the foreclosure. Id. at 466. Fraud liability was not available because performance of the promise was dependent upon the making of the proposed contract and investing in the dealer certain power, to be defined therein, with respect to the property. Id. at 466-67. The Barrier court [*25] did not address the question of whether Barrier ever intended to take steps to prevent foreclosure.

In the instant case, ACC promised to make Spence a partner six months after Spence started working for it or shortly thereafter, if the parties were happy with each other. The jury may have found that ACC never intended to make Spence a partner regardless of whether the parties were happy with each other after the initial six months. Alternatively, the jury may have found that ACC defrauded Spence into continuing employment with ACC based on false representations regarding partnership.¹⁵ Further, there is evidence in the record that ACC and Spence were happy with each other after the initial six-month period. Thus, even if the representation was not sufficient to constitute the basis of actionable fraud when it was made, it became actionable when the condition was satisfied. Based on the foregoing, we conclude that this case is factually distinguishable from Barrier, and that Barrier is not controlling.

[*26] There was sufficient evidence showing that Spence justifiably relied on ACC's false representations. We overrule ACC's third point of error to the extent it asserts there was insufficient evidence of justified reliance.

C. Fraudulent Intent

ACC asserts there was legally and factually insufficient evidence of fraudulent intent. Specifically, ACC argues there was insufficient evidence to show it never intended to make Spence a partner.

The jury answered the question affirmatively as to Liechty and American Chiropractic. The above question encompassed misrepresentations which might have been made before Spence began working for ACC and representations made after he began work there which induced him to remain.

[HN16] Intent is a fact question uniquely within the realm of the trier of fact because it so depends upon the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony." Spoljaric, 708 S.W.2d at 434. A party's intent is determined at the time the representation is made; however, it may be inferred from the party's subsequent acts after the representation is made. Id. at 434.

[HN17] Intent to defraud is generally not susceptible to direct proof. It almost invariably must be proven by circumstantial evidence. See id. at 435. Standing alone, failure to perform is no evidence of the promisor's intent not to perform when the promise was made. However, failure to perform is a fact that a jury may consider in determining [*27] intent. Id. A promisor's denial that he ever made a promise is a fact showing no intent to perform when the promise was made; however, standing alone it is insufficient evidence to support a finding of lack of intent to perform. T.O. Stanley Boot Co., 847 S.W.2d at 222; see Spoljaric, 708 S.W.2d at 435. "Slight circumstantial evidence' of fraud, when considered with the breach of promise to perform, is sufficient to support a finding of fraudulent intent." Spoljaric, 708 S.W.2d at 435 (citing Maulding v. Niemeyer, 241 S.W.2d 733, 738 (Tex. Civ. App.--El Paso 1951 orig. proceeding)).

Spence presented evidence from which the jury could have concluded that ACC made no effort to make him a partner after the initial six-month period even though ACC and Spence were satisfied with each other. ACC and Spence did not meet with Swiss Avenue Bank until approximately twelve months after the end of the initial six-month period. Spence also testified that the financing scheme offered by Swiss Avenue Bank was not the arrangement ACC represented would be available. Terry Lynn Upton, a former ACC employee, testified that Sharon Liechty said on numerous occasions that Spence would [*28] not be made a partner. Upton testified that Sharon Liechty started saying this in early 1990.

The foregoing is legally and factually sufficient evidence from which the jury could have found that ACC never intended to make Spence a partner, and that it intentionally induced him into remaining with American Chiropractic through other false representations. We overrule ACC's third point of error to the extent it asserts there was legally and factually insufficient evidence to show fraudulent intent.

D. Causation

ACC argues there was factually insufficient evidence to show Spence was damaged by the allegedly false representations.¹⁶ ACC bases its argument on Spence's testimony that at the time of the meeting with Swiss Avenue Bank, he had decided he did not want to become a partner.

Spence testified that at the time of the meeting with Swiss Avenue Bank, he had decided he did not want to become a partner. [*29] However, he later recanted that testimony.

[ACC'S COUNSEL]: Okay. Last Wednesday you told me you were ready to become a partner.

[SPENCE]: That's correct.

[ACC'S COUNSEL]: Half an hour ago you told me that by September of '90, even if Dr. Liechty had come up with the financing, you weren't going to become a partner. You just told me that under oath half an hour ago.

[SPENCE]: Yes, I did.

[ACC'S COUNSEL]: Now, do you want to change that story again?

[SPENCE]: Yes, I do.

[ACC'S COUNSEL]: What is it, Dr. Spence? You're sitting here under oath. Were you going to become a partner, or weren't you?

¹⁶ ACC challenges the amount of damages the jury awarded for fraud in its fourth point of error.

[SPENCE]: That meeting happened, what, two years ago? I'm trying to recall exactly what happened. And the fact is, a lot of information I have received after I left ACC after the meeting, which was not exactly the way it was when I went to the meeting. When I went to the meeting -- I'm talking about before the meeting, before we actually saw Harlan Bilton, I had full intentions of becoming a partner. Immediately when I was presented his package I was definitely not going to become a partner. So if we can split those two things then--now [*30] my story is correct.

Spence's testimony as to whether he would have become a partner at the time of the meeting with Swiss Avenue Bank was undoubtedly contradictory. However, the conflict was one for the jury to resolve. See R____ S____, 883 S.W.2d at 715; Greater Houston Transp. Co. v. Zrubeck, 850 S.W.2d 579, 590 (Tex. App.--Corpus Christi 1993, writ denied). We cannot say the jury's evaluation of the evidence was so against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence as to be manifestly unjust, shocking to the conscience, or clearly demonstrating bias. Further, the fraud question submitted to the jury asked whether ACC fraudulently induced Spence into going to work for it as well as whether it fraudulently induced him into staying with ACC. ACC did not challenge the jury's response to the question as it related to whether ACC fraudulently induced Spence into going to work for ACC.

The evidence was factually sufficient to support the jury's finding that Spence was damaged by ACC's false representation(s). We overrule ACC's third point of error to the extent that it asserts there was factually insufficient evidence of causation.

We overrule ACC's third point [*31] of error.

DAMAGES FOR FRAUD

Based upon the jury's answer to question number nine, the trial court entered judgment awarding Spence $ 221,928 in damages on his fraud claim. In its fourth point of error, ACC contends there was no evidence to support the damages award. ACC argues that the record contains no evidence of either out-of-pocket or benefit-of-the-bargain damages suffered by Spence. Rather, ACC asserts, Spence only presented evidence of lost profits, which are not recoverable for fraud.

A. Applicable Law

HN18 [+] The correct measure of damages for fraud is the actual amount of the complaining party's loss resulting directly and proximately from the fraud practiced upon him. C & C Partners v. Sun Exploration & Prod. Co., 783 S.W.2d 707, 719 (Tex. App.--Dallas 1989, writ denied). A party may recover either out-of-pocket damages or benefit-of-the-bargain damages. Leyendecker & Assocs., Inc. v. Wechter, 683 S.W.2d 369, 373 (Tex. 1984). Out-of-pocket damages are calculated as the difference between the value of that with which the complaining party parted and the value of the thing received. Id. Benefit-of-the-bargain damages are calculated as the difference [*32] between the value as represented and the value actually received. Id. Speculative losses and lost profits are not recoverable in a fraud action. C & C Partners, 783 S.W.2d at 719.

B. Application of Law to Facts

Although the parties loosely characterize the damages as lost profits, the record reflects that the profits belonged to American Chiropractic. There was evidence that ACC represented to Spence that he would receive a fifty-percent partnership interest in American Chiropractic, which would entitle him to fifty percent of American Chiropractic's profits. Thus the damages were not Spence's lost profits. Rather, the damages claimed were the difference between the fifty-percent interest in the profits that ACC represented Spence would receive and what Spence actually received when he was not made a partner. This is benefit-of-the-bargain damages. See Khalaf v. Williams, 814 S.W.2d 854, 857 (Tex. App.--Houston [1st Dist.] 1991, no writ).

There was evidence that American Chiropractic was worth approximately 1.6 million dollars and that it was represented to Spence he could buy into one-half of American Chiropractic for $ 800,000. Spence testified that his [*33] partnership interest would entitle him to one-half of American Chiropractic's profits. There was evidence that American Chiropractic's profits equalled one-half of its collections. Spence presented testimony and financial statements showing what American Chiropractic's profits were for the fifteen month period in which he would have been a partner, and what the value of his share of the profits would have been. He also presented evidence of what he actually received.

We conclude the evidence was not too speculative. The jury could have used it in calculating the difference between what ACC represented to Spence he would receive and what Spence actually received. Viewing only the evidence and reasonable inferences supporting the jury's finding, we conclude there is more than a scintilla of evidence to support the damages award. See id. We overrule ACC's fourth point of error.

DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT

In its fifth point of error, ACC asserts there was no evidence to support the amount of damages the jury awarded Spence for breach of contract. The substance of ACC's complaint is that one of the premises underlying Spence's breach of contract damage calculation was [*34] flawed.

Spence sought damages for breach of contract asserting that ACC wrongfully failed to pay him commissions after he left ACC. ACC summarizes Spence's damages evidence as follows:

According to Spence, this stat sheet showed that, after he had worked at ACC for about a year, his collections in a given month would roughly equal 70% of his production in that month. He called this his 'collection rate.'

Spence took the total production during his 25 months at ACC ($ 1,723,330), and then subtracted the total collections that were received for his work during these same 25 months (1,5065,136) to obtain the difference $ 685,194. He then multiplied that figure time his 70% 'collection rate' to obtain $ 460,736. He contended that this was the amount of money that ACC would have received for his work after April 1, 1991. He then claimed 20% of that under his employment contract.

ACC asserts the damage calculation was flawed because the collection rate may not have been correct because "the fact that he collected 70% of his current billing does not mean that he would also collect 70% of his past due bills. . . . the logical inference would be that ACC would collect much less than [*35] 70% of those [past due] accounts."

In considering this no evidence point, we must disregard all evidence and inferences contrary to the fact finding. Stafford, 726 S.W.2d at 16. If there is more than a scintilla of evidence to support the finding, the no evidence challenge fails. Stedman, 595 S.W.2d at 488.

On appeal, ACC does not dispute that Spence was entitled to commissions for the work he did while employed by American Chiropractic and for which the fees were collected after he left.¹⁷ By detailing and relying on the evidence Spence used to show what he was due, ACC implicitly concedes there was more than a scintilla of evidence showing Spence's contract damages. The evidence Spence used in his calculation was evidence of his contract damages. ACC does not contest Spence's evidence regarding his total production and the portion of that production for which Spence was not paid. Instead, ACC asks us to set the jury's finding aside on the basis of its inference regarding Spence's collection rate which is contrary to the evidence and the jury's finding. We cannot do this. Stafford, 726 S.W.2d at 16. There was more than a scintilla of evidence regarding Spence's contract [*36] damages.

¹⁷ Spence's employment contract provided for either a fixed rate of compensation or a percentage of his billings once they were collected, whichever was greater. At trial, ACC took the position that it was not obligated to pay Spence for billings attributable to him that were collected after he stopped working for ACC. Spence took the contrary position and prevailed.

We overrule ACC's fifth point of error.

ATTORNEYS' FEES

In its sixth point of error, ACC asserts the trial court erred in awarding Spence attorneys' fees because there was no evidence or insufficient evidence of segregation of recoverable fees. ACC also asserts that if we reverse on the breach of contract or antitrust claims, we must remand for redetermination of attorneys' fees in view of the changed result.

HN19 [Footnote] A party may not complain about an attorneys' fee award not being segregated when a broad form attorneys' fee question is submitted to the jury without objection. *Aero Energy, Inc. v. Circle C Drilling Co., 699 S.W.2d [371] 821, 823 (Tex. 1985); Matthews v. Candlewood Builders, Inc., 685 S.W.2d 649, 650 (Tex. 1985) (per curiam). In this case, a broad form question was submitted to the jury on attorneys' fees: "Find the reasonable and necessary attorneys' fees for the legal services provided and to be provided to Spence in connection with this lawsuit." ACC did not object to this jury question.¹⁸ Therefore, ACC has waived any complaint it may have had regarding Spence's failure, if any, to segregate his attorneys' fees between defense of ACC's claims and prosecution of his own. Likewise, ACC cannot complain of Spence's failure, if any, to segregate his attorneys' fees between his fraud claim and his antitrust and contract claims.

[*38] ACC also asserts that we must remand this case for redetermination of attorneys' fees if we reverse the antitrust award. ACC relies on two opinions of the Fort Worth court of appeals. See Collins v. Beste, 840 S.W.2d 788 (Tex. App.--Fort Worth 1992, writ denied); French v. Diamond Hill-Jarvis Civic League, 724 S.W.2d 921 (Tex. App.--Fort Worth 1987, writ ref'd n.r.e.). Neither case mandates the result ACC wants.

In Collins, the court reversed and remanded the question of breach of contract, finding that the trial court erred in refusing to submit an issue on it. Collins, 724 S.W.2d at 789. Because of the reversal and remand of the breach of contract question, the court did not reach the merits of Collins' point of error on attorneys' fees but summarily reversed and remanded the issue of attorneys' fees. Id. at 792. The opinion does not reflect the nature of Collins' point of error on attorneys' fees. It is clear that Collins was entitled to seek attorneys' fees on remand of his breach of contract claim.

In French, the court reversed a portion of the trial court's declaratory judgment and rendered a declaratory judgment that was favorable to French. *French [391] 724 S.W.2d at 924. After noting that a trial court has broad discretion in awarding attorneys' fees in declaratory judgment actions, the court remanded the issue of attorneys' fees to "give the trial court the opportunity to exercise its discretion in view of the changed result . . ." Id.

Neither Collins nor French held that remand was required under their particular facts. Further, they are distinguishable from the case before us. We are not remanding a cause of action for which attorneys' fees are recoverable nor are we faced with a declaratory judgment action. Collins and French do not compel us to remand the issue of attorneys' fees because of our reversing and rendering Spence's antitrust recovery.

Plaintiff objects to Question No. 12 because attorneys' fees have not been properly pleaded for this claim. Defendant pled general attorneys' fees without making reference to any statute whatsoever, certainly not to this statute, and this issue should not be submitted as a result of the insufficient pleading.

In the final charge, question number twelve addressed whether ACC knew the noncompetition clause was unreasonable. ACC's objection seems to have been with respect to an issue on fraud in a stock transaction. See TEX. BUS. & COM. CODE ANN. § 27.01(e) (Vernon 1987). In his cross-point of error, Spence complains of the trial court's refusal to submit an attorneys' fees question pursuant to section 27.01(e).

HN20 [+] We have the discretion, when we reverse and render judgment in part, to remand the issue of attorneys' fee under the rules of appellate procedure. See TEX. R. APP. P. 80\(c\); TEX. R. APP. P. 81(c). We also have discretion to do so in the interest of justice. See Gill Savs. Ass'n v. International Supply Co., Inc., 759 S.W.2d 697, 706-07 \(Tex. App.--Dallas 1988, writ denied\).

Neither of Spence's experts on attorneys' fees testified as to whether the fees [*40] incurred in prosecuting the antitrust claim were segregable from the remainder of Spence's attorneys' fees. Spence's antitrust claim involved proof of facts such as market conditions, anticompetitive effect, and market power. Such essential facts did not overlap essential facts of any of Spence's other claims of defense of ACC's claims. Thus, segregation could be an issue. See id. at 705-06 (noting that segregation of fees not required where the claims and defenses arise out of the same transaction and are so interrelated that their prosecution or defense entails proof or denial of essentially the same facts).¹⁹

We have reviewed Spence's attorneys' invoices which itemize the work done on the case. We note that a number of entries reflect [*41] work specifically attributable to the antitrust claim. However, our review of the billing records does not persuade us that it would be in the best interests of the parties or justice to reopen the issue of attorneys' fees, even assuming it were legally appropriate to do so. We deny ACC's request to remand the issue of attorneys' fees. We overrule ACC's sixth point of error.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES

In its seventh point of error, ACC asserts we must set aside the punitive damages award because the judgment based on fraud must be set aside. We have affirmed the fraud findings and award. Therefore, we overrule ACC's seventh point of error.

SPENCE'S CROSS-POINT OF ERROR

In his cross-point of error, Spence asserts the trial court erred in denying his requested trial amendment and not awarding him attorneys' fees under section 27.01\(e\) of the business and commerce code. Through a trial amendment, Spence sought to add a claim under section 27.01. Spence requested the trial amendment after the close of evidence and before the charge was submitted to the jury.

After reviewing the evidence presented at trial, we conclude that Spence was not harmed by the trial court's ruling on the trial [*42] amendment, even assuming it erred in its denial of the request. In his brief, Spence does not discuss how the judgment would have been different had the trial court allowed the trial amendment and submitted the requested question on attorneys' fees to the jury. Spence recovered attorneys' fees in the exact amount he requested and on which he presented evidence to the jury. His evidence on attorneys' fees did not delineate any particular fees attributable to his section 27.01 claim. Spence has failed to show how, or if, he was harmed by the trial court's rulings. Thus, even assuming error, it is not reversible error. See TEX. R. APP. P. 81(b)(1).

We overrule Spence's cross-point of error.

DISPOSITION

We reverse the trial court's judgment for antitrust damages and render judgment that Spence take nothing on his antitrust claim. We affirm the trial court's judgment in all other respects.

WILL BARBER

¹⁹ We also note that Spence obtained judicial modification of the noncompetition agreement. Attorneys' fees are recoverable for a promisor who prevails in obtaining modification of a noncompetition agreement. TEX. BUS. & COM. CODE ANN. § 15.51\(c\) (Vernon Supp. 1995).

HN3 [down] Injunctions, Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

To obtain preliminary injunctive relief, a plaintiff must establish each of the following factors: (1) a substantial likelihood that plaintiff will eventually prevail on the merits; (2) plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury unless injunctive relief is granted; (3) the threatened injury to plaintiff outweighs whatever damage the proposed injunction may cause defendant; and (4) the injunction, if granted, will not be adverse to the public interest.

HN4 [down] Grounds for Injunctions, Likelihood of Success

To demonstrate a substantial likelihood of success on the merits, a plaintiff is required to present a prima facie case showing a reasonable probability that it will ultimately be entitled to the relief sought. A plaintiff is not required to show to an absolute certainty that it will prevail. Rather, if the other three requirements for a preliminary injunction are satisfied, it is enough if the plaintiff raises questions going to the merits so serious, substantial, difficult and doubtful, as to make them a fair ground for litigation and thus for more deliberate investigation.

HN7 Ownership & Transfer of Rights, Assignments

Generally, the exercise of one's rights under the Patent and Copyright Acts, even by refusing to license or sell one's protected work to a competitor, does not automatically equate with an antitrust violation. A copyright owner possesses the exclusive right to sell, license, or otherwise distribute copies of a copyrighted work under 17 U.S.C.S. § 106\(3\). In essence, a copyright provides the copyright holder with a legal monopoly. A good faith effort to enforce one's copyright is not the type of exclusionary conduct condemned by § 2 of the Sherman Act.

Anti-trust laws are designed to protect competition, not competitors. Moreover, a competitor is not entitled to maintain its competitive edge by infringing others' copyrights.

HN9 Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing

An exercise of rights under a copyright can lead to antitrust liability. Power gained through some natural or legal advantage such as a patent, copyright, or business acumen can give rise to liability if a seller exploits his dominant position in one market to expand his empire into the next.

HN10 Misuse of Rights, Copyright & Trademark Misuse Defenses

Ownership of intellectual property entitles the owner to exact royalties as high as he can negotiate with the leverage of that monopoly. Setting a high price may be a use of monopoly power, but it is not in itself anticompetitive. Under this rationale, exorbitant pricing alone is not copyright misuse.

HN11[Copyright Protection, Conveyances

The Copyright Act mandates that an infringer pay the fees charged by a copyright holder for the use of its copyrighted materials. Without a license, the infringer's use of the diagnostic software to service the copyright holder's product constitutes infringement. Similarly, the infringer's copying of copyrighted manuals constitutes infringement. If a copyright holder's manual prices or licensing fees are exorbitant and, if when combined with other monopolistic activity, they give rise to antitrust violations, the infringer's remedy lies in damages on its antitrust claims, not blatant copyright infringement during the pendency of the resolution of the antitrust claims.

[*1275] [6] [*1539] MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

This matter came before the court for hearing October 12, 1995, on Xerox's motion for a preliminary injunction against counterclaim defendant CSU Holdings, Inc. (Doc. #109). Pursuant to the court's request at the hearing, Xerox submitted a modified proposed order clarifying and narrowing the relief requested (Doc. #158). For the reasons set forth below, Xerox's motion for a preliminary injunction will be granted as modified. After carefully considering the parties' briefs, oral arguments, testimony at the hearing, and exhibits, the court makes the following findings of fact and conclusions of law as required by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52\(a\).

[*1540] Findings of Fact

1. Counter claimant Xerox Corporation ("Xerox") is a New York corporation with its principal offices in Stamford, Connecticut. Counterclaim defendants Copier Services Unlimited ("CSU") Holdings, Inc., is a Kansas corporation located in Kansas City, Kansas. CSU Kansas City is a Kansas corporation with its principal place of business at 9261 Cody, Overland Park, Kansas. CSU St. Louis is a Missouri corporation with its principal place of business at 2275 Cassens Drive in Fenton, Missouri. Counterclaim [7] defendants will be referred to collectively as "CSU."

2. CSU filed suit against Xerox in this court seeking injunctive relief and damages for antitrust violations pertaining to Xerox's allegedly restrictive parts policy. Xerox filed second amended counterclaims alleging, inter alia, copyright infringement by CSU. Only the copyright infringement counterclaims are implicated by the instant motion for preliminary injunction.

3. Xerox is in the business of inventing, manufacturing, selling, and servicing copiers and printers. Xerox also manufactures and sells parts for Xerox copiers and printers.

4. CSU is a competitor of Xerox in the sale and servicing of copiers and printers.

5. Xerox's 5090 copier, among other Xerox copier machines, utilizes Xerox-developed operating system and diagnostic software, which are contained on floppy disks. Operating system software directs the operation of the machine, while diagnostic software assists in diagnosing machine failures. There are two types of diagnostic software used on a Xerox 5090 copier -- that which is resident and, therefore, permanent on the hard drive of the machine ("resident diagnostic software") and that which is installed [8] temporarily from portable floppy disks ("diagnostic disk software" and "diagnostic utility disks").

Although Xerox has brought claims alleging that CSU's use of all types of copyrighted software infringes Xerox's copyrights, Xerox is not presently seeking to enjoin CSU's use of any resident software. Xerox is only seeking to enjoin CSU from copyright infringement with respect to: (1) Xerox diagnostic software on floppy disks; and (2) unauthorized copies of Xerox manuals.

6. Xerox is the sole owner and/or assignee of all right, title, and interest in and to the copyrights on all versions of diagnostic software for the Xerox 5090 copier. Xerox's copyrights are duly registered, pursuant to the Copyright Act, 17 U.S.C. § 410.

7. CSU utilizes Xerox diagnostic software in providing maintenance service for Xerox 5090 copiers and 4050, 4090, and 4650 laser printers. Neither CSU nor its customers have purchased a license to use Xerox's copyrighted software. Xerox will sell CSU or its customer a license to use Xerox's copyrighted diagnostic software for $ 4,080 per copier.

8. CSU officials have admitted copying Xerox copyrighted manuals and software and that they knew that the materials [9] were [1276] copyrighted. They assert that at the time the materials were copied, copying was one of the only means by which they could acquire the materials.

9. Xerox did not have concrete evidence, until recent discovery in the instant case, that CSU was infringing its copyrights in the particular manner Xerox now seeks to enjoin. There is strong evidence that Xerox may have suspected infringement by CSU for quite some time, and at least as early as November 30, 1994, when it sought leave to bring its copyright infringement counterclaims, Xerox knew of CSU's allegedly infringing conduct. Nevertheless, the court finds that actual evidence to warrant the bringing of the instant motion for preliminary relief, i.e., admissions by CSU officials of ongoing unauthorized copying of Xerox manuals and diagnostic software disks, was not known by Xerox until recent depositions in this case.

Conclusions of Law

HN1 This court has jurisdiction over the copyright infringement counterclaims pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331 and 1338\(a\). Venue lies pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1400\(a\).

HN2[] We are authorized by the Copyright Act to "grant temporary and final injunctions on such terms" as we deem "reasonable to prevent [10] or restrain infringement of a copyright." [1541] 17 U.S.C. § 502\(a\). See Autoskill Inc. v. National Educ. Support Sys., Inc., 994 F.2d 1476, 1487 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 126 L. Ed. 2d 254, 114 S. Ct. 307 (1993).

In addition, HN3[] to obtain preliminary injunctive relief, Xerox must establish each of the following factors: (1) a substantial likelihood that Xerox will eventually prevail on the merits; (2) Xerox will suffer irreparable injury unless injunctive relief is granted; (3) the threatened injury to Xerox outweighs whatever damage the proposed injunction may cause CSU; and (4) the injunction, if granted, will not be adverse to the public interest. See id. (citations omitted).

Likelihood of success on the merits

HN4[] To demonstrate a substantial likelihood of success on the merits, Xerox is required to present "a prima facie case showing a reasonable probability that [it] will ultimately be entitled to the relief sought." Id. Xerox is not required to show to an absolute certainty that it will prevail. See id. Rather, if the other three requirements for a preliminary injunction are satisfied, it is enough if Xerox raises "questions going to the merits so serious, [11] substantial, difficult and doubtful, as to make them a fair ground for litigation and thus for more deliberate investigation." Id.

HN5[] To establish a likelihood of success, Xerox must present a prima facie case of copyright infringement. This requires Xerox to show: (1) ownership of a valid copyright, and (2) copying. See id. Both prongs of Xerox's prima facie case are easily met in this case.

The Copyright Act HN6[] provides that a certificate of registration of a copyright "shall constitute prima facie evidence of the validity of the copyright and of the facts stated in the certificate." 17 U.S.C. § 410\(c\). By presenting the registration certificates for the copyrights in question, Xerox shifts the burden to CSU to dispute the validity of the copyrights. See Autoskill, 994 F.2d at 1487.

Xerox has also established copying by CSU. We agree with the court in MAI Sys. Corp. v. Peak Computer, Inc., 991 F.2d 511, 519 (9th Cir. 1993), cert. dismissed, 114 S. Ct. 671, 126 L. Ed. 2d 640 (1994), that transferring a computer program from a storage device to a computer's RAM constitutes a copy for purposes of copyright law. See also NLFC, Inc. v. Devcom Mid-America, Inc., 45 F.3d 231, 235 (7th [12] Cir.), cert. denied, 132 L. Ed. 2d 257, 115 S. Ct. 2249 (1995) ("loading software into a computer constitutes the creation of a copy under the Copyright Act"); Vault Corp. v. Quaid Software Ltd., 847 F.2d 255, 260 (5th Cir. 1988) ("the act of loading a program from a medium of storage into a computer's memory creates a copy of the program"); Advanced Computer Servs. v. MAI Sys. Corp., 845 F. Supp. 356, 363 (E.D. Va. 1994) (where "a copyrighted program is loaded into RAM and maintained there for minutes or longer, the RAM representation of the program is sufficiently 'fixed' to constitute a 'copy' under the Act"); Triad Sys. Corp. v. Southeastern Express Co., 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5390, No. C 92 1539-FMS, 1994 WL 446049 at *2 (N.D. Cal. March 18, 1994), aff'd in pertinent part, 64 F.3d 1330 (9th Cir. 1995), petition for cert. filed, (U.S. November 24, 1995) (No. 95-808) (loading the operating system software into a computer's RAM "necessarily creates a 'copy' in the computer's internal memory").

CSU does not seriously challenge that Xerox holds valid copyrights or that CSU's use of the diagnostic software constitutes copying. Rather, CSU alleges that Xerox cannot enforce its copyrights [13] because it is misusing the copyrights to perpetrate antitrust violations. The misuse defense, first recognized in the patent context in Morton Salt Co. v. G.S. Suppiger Co., 314 U.S. 488, 86 L. Ed. 363, 62 S. Ct. 402 (1942), has been discussed by several courts in the copyright context as well. See Atari Games Corp. v. Nintendo of America, Inc., 975 F.2d 832, 846 (Fed. Cir. 1992) (listing numerous circuit court cases on the misuse defense); Service & Training, Inc. v. Data Gen., Inc., 963 F.2d 680, 690 (4th Cir. 1992) (finding no misuse); Lasercomb America, Inc. v. Reynolds, 911 F.2d 970, 976-80 (4th Cir. 1990) (finding misuse); Edward v. Marks Music Corp. v. Colorado Magnetics, Inc., 497 F.2d 285, 290-91 (10th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1120, 42 L. Ed. 2d 819, 95 S. Ct. 801 (1975) (discussing the conflict of policies between "preventing piracy of copyrighted matter" and "enforcing the antitrust laws" and finding no misuse).

[*1542] HN7 Generally, the exercise of one's rights under the Patent and Copyright Acts, even by refusing to license or sell one's protected work to a competitor, does not automatically equate with an antitrust violation. See, e.g., Fox Film [14] Corp. v. Doyal, 286 U.S. 123, 127, 76 L. Ed. 1010, 52 S. Ct. 546 \(1932\) (A copyright owner may refrain from "vending or licensing and content himself with simply exercising the right to exclude others from using his property."); SCM Corp. v. Xerox Corp., 645 F.2d 1195, 1204 \(2d Cir. 1981\), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 1016, 72 L. Ed. 2d 132, 102 S. Ct. 1708 (1982) (similar holding in patent arena); Service & Training, 963 F.2d at 686-88, 690 (copyright case) (selective licensing is not evidence of an illegal tying arrangement).

Indeed, a copyright owner possesses the exclusive right to sell, license, or otherwise distribute copies of a copyrighted work. See 17 U.S.C. § 106\(3\). In essence, a copyright provides the copyright holder with a legal monopoly. "[A] good faith effort to enforce one's copyright is not the type of exclusionary conduct condemned by [§] 2 of the Sherman Act." Marks Music, 497 F.2d 285, 291.

CSU asserts that Xerox ought not be permitted to enforce its exclusive rights under the Copyright Act because Xerox is misusing the copyrights to further its antitrust scheme. CSU relies heavily on the Fourth Circuit's opinion in Lasercomb, 911 F.2d at 970, one of the few courts to have found the misuse defense applicable. However, Lasercomb is readily distinguishable from the instant case and certainly does not convince the court that CSU can avoid a preliminary injunction against further infringement by invoking the misuse defense in the instant case.

Lasercomb, 911 F.2d at 978, involved a licensing agreement which restricted the licensee from independently creating a program using the idea embodied in the copyrighted software program. The court found that Lasercomb (the licensor) had misused its copyright by using the license to attempt to restrict independent creative expression: "Lasercomb is attempting to use its copyright in a manner adverse to the public policy embodied in copyright law" (i.e., to promote independent creative expression of an idea). Id. "Misuse arises from Lasercomb's attempt to use its copyright in a particular expression, . . . to control competition in an area outside the copyright." Id. at 979. See also, Triad Sys. Corp. v. Southeastern Express Co., 64 F.3d 1330, 1337 \(9th Cir. 1995\) (distinguishing Lasercomb on similar grounds).

Similar circumstances do not exist in [16] the instant case. At least since June 1994, Xerox has offered to sell licenses for its diagnostic software. There is no evidence that Xerox's licensing agreement prohibits CSU from developing its own diagnostic software for Xerox copiers. Indeed, there is no evidence that CSU has ever attempted to develop its own software program, choosing instead to simply pirate Xerox's copyrighted work.

CSU urges that Xerox is including "intellectual property litigation in its arsenal of weapons, along with its restrictive Parts Policy, to defeat competition by independent service organizations ("ISOs") in order to maintain its monopoly in servicing high volume copiers and printers." CSU maintains that the license fee charged by Xerox is exorbitant and that paying it will put CSU out of business. However, CSU's profit analysis is based on a scenario in which CSU does not pass any portion of the licensing fee on to its customers. CSU presently offers service at 20-25% below Xerox service prices. On the present record, it appears that even if CSU passes on all of the licensing fee to its customers, it will still be able to price its service at or below prices charged by Xerox.

HN8 "Anti-trust laws [17] are designed to protect competition, not competitors." Service & Training, Inc. v. Data Gen. Corp., 737 F. Supp. 334, 344 \(D. Md. 1990\), aff'd, 963 F.2d 680 \(4th Cir. 1992\). Moreover, CSU is not entitled to maintain its competitive edge by infringing Xerox's copyrights. Autoskill, 994 F.2d 1476, 1498. We believe that Xerox is entitled to recoup the development costs of copyrighted material by charging a reasonable licensing fee to those who use the copyrighted work, without running afoul of the antitrust laws. [1278]

Exactly where the line of reasonableness is to be drawn with respect to a license fee for Xerox's copyrighted software and manuals, [*1543] need not be determined at this stage of the litigation. Xerox has presented evidence that significant resources went into developing the copyrighted software and manuals. From the testimony at the hearing, it is evident that Xerox's diagnostic software involves a very sophisticated computer program which creates significant savings in terms of repair and maintenance time and expense. The Xerox diagnostic software is obviously a very valuable resource to those involved in servicing Xerox equipment.

Xerox charges $ 4,080 per machine for [18] a license to use the 5090 diagnostic software. Xerox sells manuals for approximately $ 400. Although CSU vehemently disputes the reasonableness of these fees, CSU has submitted no evidence that they are excessive. Moreover, even if we were to assume that Xerox's prices are excessive, we question whether excessive pricing alone constitutes copyright misuse, which triggers antitrust liability.

HN9 [↑] An exercise of rights under a copyright can lead to antitrust liability. In Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 479 n.29, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265, 112 S. Ct. 2072 (1992), the Supreme Court stated, "the Court has held many times that power gained through some natural or legal advantage such as a patent, copyright, or business acumen can give rise to liability if a 'seller exploits his dominant position in one market to expand his empire into the next.'" In Marks Music, 497 F.2d at 290, the Tenth Circuit assumed arguendo that an antitrust violation is a defense in a copyright infringement action. The court also stated, "utilization of the courts in a manner which is in accordance with the spirit of the law continues to be exempt from the antitrust laws." Id. [19] at 290-91. By negative implication, Marks Music suggests that a bad faith effort, contrary to the spirit of copyright and antitrust law, to enforce one's copyright is condemned by the Sherman Act. The Lasercomb court also said, "the attempted use of a copyright to violate antitrust law probably would give rise to a misuse of copyright defense." 911 F.2d at 978.

However, we are not aware of any court that has held that price alone is a basis for antitrust liability. Indeed, courts have held that HN10 [↑] ownership of intellectual property "entitles the owner to exact royalties as high as he can negotiate with the leverage of that monopoly." Brulotte v. Thys Co., 379 U.S. 29, 33, 13 L. Ed. 2d 99, 85 S. Ct. 176 (1964); Continental Cablevision v. American Elec. Power Co., 715 F.2d 1115, 1121 (6th Cir. 1983) ("Setting a high price may be a use of monopoly power, but it is not in itself anticompetitive."); LaSalle St. Press, Inc. v. McCormick & Henderson, Inc., 445 F.2d 84, 95 (7th Cir. 1971) (patent case). Under this rationale, exorbitant pricing alone is not copyright misuse.

Perhaps exorbitant pricing, combined with other monopolistic conduct, may trigger antitrust liability. [20] In W. L. Gore & Assoc., Inc. v. Carlisle Corp., 529 F.2d 614, 623 (3d Cir. 1976) (quoting Brulotte, 379 U.S. at 33), the court stated, "absent any overriding unlawful conduct, a patent empowers the owner to exact royalties as high as he can negotiate with the leverage of that monopoly." In Marks Music, 497 F.2d at 291, the court spoke of balancing the conflicting policies implicated by the copyright and antitrust laws by "taking into account the comparative innocence or guilt of the parties, the moral character of their respective acts, the extent of harm to the public interest, [and] the penalty inflicted" if relief is denied.

Even if Xerox may ultimately be found to have used the copyrights as part of an overall restrictive parts policy aimed at snuffing out ISO competition, we do not believe this forecloses Xerox's entitlement to an injunction against CSU's continued copyright infringement in the interim. The present situation is that Xerox is offering its copyrighted manuals and licenses for its copyrighted diagnostic software for sale to CSU and other ISOs.

HN11 [↑] The Copyright Act mandates that CSU pay the fees charged by Xerox for the use of its copyrighted materials. [21] Without a license, CSU's use of the diagnostic software to service Xerox copiers constitutes infringement. Similarly, CSU's copying of Xerox's copyrighted manuals constitutes infringement. If Xerox's manual prices or licensing fees are exorbitant and, if when combined with other monopolistic activity, they give rise to antitrust violations, CSU's remedy lies in damages on its antitrust claims, not blatant copyright [*1544] infringement during the pendency of the resolution of the antitrust claims. See, e.g., Service & Training, 737 F. Supp. at 342 (citations omitted) ("Numerous courts have held that an alleged violation of the anti-trust laws, while perhaps affording a ground for affirmative relief, generally does not provide a defense to copyright infringement.").

We conclude that CSU's antitrust allegations against Xerox do not warrant denial of preliminary injunctive relief in this case. Xerox has established a reasonable likelihood of success on the merits of its copyright infringement claims.

[*1279] Irreparable Harm

Although the Tenth Circuit has not ruled on the issue, the majority of circuits have held that HN12 irreparable harm may be presumed upon a prima facie showing of copyright [\[22\]](#) infringement. See Service & Training, 963 F.2d at 690; Johnson Controls, Inc. v. Phoenix Control Sys., Inc., 886 F.2d 1173, 1174 \(9th Cir. 1989\); Concrete Machinery Co. v. Classic Lawn Ornaments, Inc., 843 F.2d 600, 611 \(1st Cir. 1988\); West Pub. Co. v. Mead Data Central, Inc., 799 F.2d 1219, 1229 \(8th Cir. 1986\), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1070, 93 L. Ed. 2d 1010, 107 S. Ct. 962 \(1987\); Hasbro Bradley, Inc. v. Sparkle Toys, Inc., 780 F.2d 189, 192 \(2d Cir. 1985\); Apple Computer, Inc. v. Franklin Computer Corp., 714 F.2d 1240, 1254 \(3d Cir. 1983\), cert. dismissed, 464 U.S. 1033, 104 S. Ct. 690, 79 L. Ed. 2d 158 \(1984\); Atari, Inc. v. North Am. Philips Consumer Electronics Corp., 672 F.2d 607, 620 \(7th Cir.\), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 880, 74 L. Ed. 2d 145, 103 S. Ct. 176 \(1982\).

In Autoskill, 994 F.2d at 1498, the Tenth Circuit expressly declined to decide whether to adopt the irreparable harm presumption because evidence of a loss of uniqueness in the marketplace provided an independent ground for finding irreparable harm. CSU suggests that the Autoskill court expressly rejected the irreparable harm presumption and that irreparable harm must be shown by evidence of a loss [\[23\]](#) of uniqueness in the marketplace or an inability to calculate damages. Citing Autoskill, 994 F.2d at 1498, CSU contends that injunctive relief should only be granted where a damage remedy is inadequate because damages cannot be calculated. CSU submits that because CSU has given Xerox a list of CSU's model 5090 copier customers, any license fees due can be easily calculated. CSU argues that Xerox is already relying on its damages remedy with respect to a portion of its copyright infringement claims.

We acknowledge that although Xerox continues to allege that CSU's unlicensed use of resident operating and diagnostic software violates Xerox's copyrights, it does not seek to enjoin CSU's use of that software. Xerox has chosen instead to rely on its damage remedy and seek a permanent injunction relative to that copyrighted software at trial. However, Xerox's decision to rely on its damages remedy and only seek to enjoin a portion of CSU's conduct does not preclude a finding of irreparable harm. Even though the license fees for the copiers presently serviced by CSU are rather easily calculated, that damages remedy alone does not fully realize the value of Xerox's rights in its copyrighted [\[24\]](#) materials.

In addition to the license fee, Xerox's copyright gives it a competitive advantage over competitors who do not have the copyrighted materials. It may very well be that when CSU is forced to compete with Xerox at more similar pricing, Xerox will pick up additional service accounts which will generate additional revenue. We have no way of calculating the value to Xerox of its enhanced ability to compete with CSU in the service market, and simply cannot determine the full damages stemming from CSU's alleged copyright infringement at this juncture. See Encyclopaedia Britannica Educ. Corp. v. C.N. Crooks, 447 F. Supp. 243, 247-48 \(W.D. N.Y. 1978\) (irreparable harm found where licensing agreements did not provide a clear measure of damages).

We believe that the presumption of irreparable harm is precisely directed at such a situation. As we have already discussed, Xerox is not legally required to license its copyrighted work. While refusal to license may implicate the antitrust laws if it is found to be anticompetitive conduct, the fact that licenses are presently offered (at what appears to be reasonable prices) weakens CSU's antitrust claim. Moreover, irreparable harm [\[25\]](#) can be presumed, notwithstanding [\[*1545\]](#) that a portion of Xerox's damages can be easily calculated based on the license fee.

CSU also attempts to rebut the presumption of irreparable harm by arguing that Xerox unreasonably delayed bringing its motion for a preliminary injunction in that it knew about CSU's alleged copyright violations for years before seeking to enjoin CSU. CSU asserts that Xerox had such knowledge because CSU is one of Xerox's main competitors in the service market. CSU argues that because the software is required to service the equipment, Xerox knew for some time that CSU was servicing Xerox machines using the copyrighted software without a license.

Xerox counters that it did not have a good faith basis for seeking preliminary injunctive relief until recent depositions in this case when CSU officials admitted copying manuals and unlawfully obtaining and reproducing floppy disks containing copyrighted software. Xerox also points out that CSU had previously denied using copyrighted diagnostic software in performing service to customers.

Admittedly, HN13[↑] delay may rebut the presumption of irreparable harm. See, e.g., Tom Doherty Assoc., Inc. v. Saban Entertainment, Inc., [261 60 F.3d 27, 39 \[1280\] \(2d Cir. 1995\)](#). However, delay caused by a copyright owner's good faith efforts to investigate the suspected infringement should not rebut the presumption. Fisher-Price, Inc. v. Well-Made Toy Mfg. Corp., 25 F.3d 119, 124-25 \(2d Cir. 1994\). Under all the circumstances, we do not believe that CSU has sufficiently rebutted the presumption of irreparable harm with its allegations that Xerox unreasonably delayed in seeking injunctive relief.

Balance of Hardships

Xerox is required to demonstrate that the injury it will sustain if the injunction does not issue outweighs the potential harm the injunction will cause to CSU. Autoskill, 994 F.2d 1476, 1498. CSU contends that enjoining it from continued infringement of Xerox's copyright will have a devastating impact on its business. We seriously question this assertion because all of the evidence presented has been that this is true only if CSU does not pass on any of the license fees to its customers.

In any event, as the court in Autoskill stated, HN14[↑] "even assuming the injunction would have such a devastating effect . . . a knowing infringer cannot be 'permitted to construct its business around its infringement.'" [\[27\]](#) Id. (quoting Apple Computer, Inc. v. Franklin Computer Corp., 714 F.2d 1240, 1255 \(3d Cir. 1983\)). The court's reasoning that "placing too much weight on this factor would reward infringers" is also particularly appropos in the instant case. In sum, the balance of hardships weighs in favor of Xerox's right to enforce its copyrights.

Public Interest

Xerox is required to demonstrate that the issuance of the injunction is not adverse to the public interest. Autoskill, 994 F.2d at 1499. CSU seems to argue that issuance of a preliminary injunction is not in the public's best interest because Xerox is trying to use the copyright to put the ISOs out of business, and that once that is accomplished, Xerox will usurp monopolistic prices from the public. CSU also suggests that passing on the licensing fee to its customers is contrary to the public interest because it furthers Xerox's monopolistic activity by forcing the public to pay higher prices.

CSU has not presented any concrete evidence to support its claims.¹ On the present record, it is not apparent that the payment of the $ 4,080 license fee will, necessarily, put CSU out of business. It is also not evident that if [\[28\]](#) CSU passes on some or all of the licensing fee to its customers, the higher prices paid by the public will exceed the true value of the service provided.

Moreover, HN15[↑] upholding the rights of a copyright holder is generally regarded as being in the public interest. Id. We note that the injunction is narrowly tailored so as not to reach only the most blatant of CSU's alleged copyright infringement. Overall, the public interest is best served by the issuance of the [\[*1546\]](#) injunction to prohibit CSU from continuing to thumb its nose at the requirements of the Copyright Act.

Conclusion

910 F. Supp. 1537, *1546 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19558, 28 38 U.S.P.Q.2D (BNA) 1273, 1280

We conclude that Xerox has met the requirements for the issuance of a preliminary injunction. An injunction is consistent with our authority [29] under 17 U.S.C. § 502 in that it is necessary to prevent and restrain further infringement of Xerox's copyrights by CSU.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that Xerox's motion for preliminary injunction (Doc. #109) is granted, on the condition that, pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 65(c), Xerox post security, within fourteen (14) days, in the amount of $ 375,000 to assure payment to CSU of any damages incurred in the event Xerox does not ultimately prevail on its copyright infringement claims at trial.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that CSU shall, within ten (10) days of the posting of security in this matter, deliver to Xerox all unauthorized copies (whether made by CSU or acquired from unlicensed sources) of Xerox manuals and floppy disks containing diagnostic software for the 5090 copier which are in CSU's possession, custody, or control.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that CSU and its officers, agents, servants, employees, and any other persons in active concert or participation with them, who receive actual notice of this order by personal service or otherwise, are hereby immediately restrained and enjoined, pending trial, from: (1) reproducing Xerox manuals and/or distributing unauthorized [30] copies of Xerox manuals or substantial portions thereof; and (2) acquiring, using, or distributing, in the absence of a license from Xerox, any floppy [1281] disks or upgrade disks containing diagnostic software or diagnostic utility disks for the Xerox 5090 copier.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

I. Introduction

Plaintiffs Caribbean Broadcasting System, Ltd. ("CBS") and Alvin Korngold¹ filed suit against Defendants Cable and Wireless PLC ("C&W")² [*2], Cable and Wireless West Indies ("WI")³, and Caribbean Communications Co., LTD ("CCC")⁴ alleging that all Defendants violated sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act⁵ [*3], 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2 \(1982\), and that Defendant CCC violated section 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1124\(a\).⁶

¹ Plaintiff CBS is a limited liability company organized under the laws of the British Virgin Islands. CBS owns three FM radio stations in the Eastern Caribbean on the island of Tortola. Plaintiff Korngold is a U.S. citizen and resident, and is president and sole shareholder of CBS.

² Defendant C&W is a limited liability company organized and existing pursuant to the laws of the United Kingdom with its principal place of business located in London. It provides telecommunications services in and across countries throughout the world. In the British Virgin Islands, C&W operates through Defendant Cable and Wireless West Indies. C&W is also subject to the laws of the United States and the regulation and licensing of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

⁴ Defendant CCC is a limited liability company organized pursuant to the laws of Montserrat, West Indies. CCC owns and operates an FM radio station on the island of Montserrat. CCC's corporate headquarters is located in Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

⁶ Count 1 alleges that CCC disseminated false and misleading information about its radio network, in violation of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Trademark Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1124\(a\).

This matter comes before the Court on Defendants' Motions to Dismiss⁷ for lack of subject matter jurisdiction and for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, filed pursuant to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure ("Fed. R. Civ. P.") 12(b)(1), (3), & (6).

[*4] II. Factual Background

Plaintiff CBS and the Defendants are telecommunications companies organized under the laws of the United Kingdom and operating in the Eastern Caribbean, outside the territorial limits of the United States. This lawsuit stems from Plaintiffs' attempt, back in 1984, to establish and develop television and radio broadcast stations in the British Virgin Islands. In an effort to raise revenues for that project, Plaintiffs attempted to sell advertising time to tobacco and liquor advertising markets covering the U.S. and British Virgin Islands and part of Puerto Rico. According to Plaintiffs, their efforts were thwarted by CCC's "(deceptive practices which created a substantial barrier to their entry into this market." Complaint at P 25. Specifically, Plaintiffs contend that CCC misrepresented the coverage and strength of radio GEM, a CCC-owned radio station. By so doing, Plaintiffs assert, Defendants established radio GEM as "the foremost vehicle by which U.S. companies advertise their goods in the Eastern Caribbean," thereby effectively eliminating the threat of competition from companies competing for the same advertising revenues. Complaint at P 30.

[*5] Plaintiffs further assert that when Defendant C&W purchased 27% of CCC in late 1986 or early 1987, C&W developed a direct interest in preserving CCC's monopoly power and excluding Plaintiffs from the relevant markets. To this end, Plaintiffs allege, Defendants "acted on a coordinated basis and engaged in a pattern of concerted action to protect Cable and Wireless' financial stake in CCC and maintain CCC's monopoly power." Complaint P 45. As a result of this pattern of concerted action, Plaintiffs contend that the commencement of their operations was delayed for three years.

Plaintiffs seek in this lawsuit to enjoin Defendants from continuing these practices and request treble damages for injuries suffered from Defendants' Sherman Act violations. Defendants argue, in their pending motions, that this Court is without subject matter jurisdiction and that dismissal is therefore required pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(1\).

III. Subject Matter Jurisdiction

HN1 [↑] In deciding a motion to dismiss for want of subject matter jurisdiction, "the allegations of the complaint should be construed favorably to the pleader." Hohri v. U.S., 251 U.S. App. D.C. 145, 782 F.2d 227, 241 \(D.C. Cir. 1986\). See also Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 236, 94 S. Ct. 1683, 1686, 40 L. Ed. 2d 90 \(1974\); Walker v. Jones, 236 U.S. App. D.C. 92, 733 F.2d 923, 925-26 \(D.C. Cir. 1984\).

HN2 [↑] In order to invoke the jurisdiction of this Court under the Sherman Antitrust Act, Plaintiffs must allege conduct ""involving trade or commerce" that has a "direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable adverse effect [on U.S. trade and commerce]." ⁸ 15 U.S.C. § 6a\(1\)\(A\). "An anti-competitive effect on United States commerce is required for jurisdictional nexus, regardless [of] whether there was anti-competitive conduct in the United States." McElberry v. Cathay Pacific Airways, Ltd., 678 F. Supp. 1071, 1077 (S.D.N.Y. 1988).

⁷ Although there are three Motions to Dismiss filed by three separate Defendants, this Court will only address the Motions to Dismiss filed by C&W and WI. These two motions are identical and have been consolidated for the purpose of opposition and reply. When referring to both Defendants, the Court will refer to them as "C&W." Judge Harold Greene's Order of December 22, 1993 mandated that "no opposition or reply directed to the pending motion to dismiss filed by CCC need be filed unless and until the Court, by further order entered after the Court's ruling on the motions of C&W and WI to dismiss the complaint, sets dates for such opposition and reply." (Order at 2). Therefore, Defendant CCC's alleged violation of the Lanham Act will not be considered herein.

[*7] Plaintiffs have not alleged necessary facts to substantiate a claim of adverse effect on U.S. commerce arising out of Defendants' alleged misconduct. The antitrust laws "were enacted for the protection of competition not competitors." Association of Retail Travel Agents, Ltd. v. Air Transport Association of America, 635 F. Supp. 534, 537 (D.D.C. 1986) (citations omitted). Plaintiffs' claims, however, relate to Defendants' alleged efforts to delay and disrupt the efforts of Plaintiff CBS to establish a radio station on Tortola Insofar as these acts harm Plaintiffs, they harm them in their status as potential participants, rather than current competitors, in the commercial broadcasting business. Plaintiffs have failed to present evidence demonstrating any detrimental effect upon competition among advertising media in the Eastern Caribbean. For example, the complaint is silent on the effect of the alleged conduct on pricing in the relevant markets. Moreover, the complaint does not suggest that prices or supply reached noncompetitive levels as a result of the alleged misconduct. The only harm Plaintiffs have alleged is harm to CBS itself. At most, this harm constitutes a basis for [*8] a commercial tort action.⁹

Further, HN3[↑] the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act of 1982, 15 U.S.C. § 6a "makes clear that the concern of the antitrust laws is protection of American consumers and American exporters, not foreign consumers or producers." Areeda and Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law 305 (1993 Supp.). See also United States v. Western Electric Co., 604 F. Supp. 256, 261 n.3 (D.D.C. 1984), cert. denied, 480 U.S. 922 (1987) ("The antitrust laws do [*9] not apply to conduct involving trade or commerce with foreign nations unless such conduct has a direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect on commerce in the United States or on the export commerce of United States exporters.") (citations omitted); Matsushita Elec. Ind. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 582, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 ("... American antitrust laws do not regulate the competitive conditions of other nations' economies").

Plaintiffs here are neither importers nor exporters of U.S. goods and services but are, rather, foreign sellers of a foreign product (namely, broadcast airtime on stations in Tortola). Further, Plaintiff CBS is a seller of media advertising (to tobacco and liquor advertisers), not a purchaser. Therefore it does not fall within the class of consumers that have allegedly been affected by anticompetitive conduct.¹⁰

[*10] Because there are no allegations that Defendants' alleged misconduct has had any kind of anticompetitive effect on U.S. advertisers or consumers, and there are no facts showing how U.S. commerce has been adversely affected, the antitrust claims must be dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1).

IV. Failure To State A Claim For Which Relief May Be Granted Under Count XI Of The Complaint

HN4[↑] When considering a motion to dismiss, all factual allegations in the complaint must be presumed true and liberally construed in favor of the plaintiff. Ramirez de Arellano v. Weinberger, 240 U.S. App. D.C. 363, 745 F.2d 1500, 1506 (D.C. Cir. 1984). "[A] complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80, 78 S. Ct. 99 (1957).

Ind. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986); United States v. Western Electric Co., 604 F. Supp. 256, 261 n.23 (D.D.C. 1984).

Under Count XI of Plaintiff's Complaint, Plaintiffs allege that they were denied access to "essential facilities," which help communications entities enter relevant markets. The facilities in question here are (1) the local [*11] and long distance telephone system in the British Virgin Islands, and (2) the microwave relay system operating throughout the Eastern Caribbean. Plaintiffs claim that, as a result of the actions of the Defendants, CBS was excluded from the relevant markets and that, therefore, Defendants violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2.

HN5[[↑]] In order to state a Sherman Act Section 2 violation for denial of use of essential facilities, a plaintiff must plead and prove four elements: (1) control of the essential facility by a monopolist; (2) a competitor's inability practically or reasonably to duplicate the essential facility; (3) the denial of the use of the facility to a competitor; and (4) the feasibility of providing the facility. MCI Communications Corp. v. AT&T, 708 F.2d 1081, 1132-33 (7th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 891, 78 L. Ed. 2d 226, 104 S. Ct. 234 (1983). Plaintiffs fail to plead a number of these elements.

First, Plaintiffs fail to allege sufficient facts to establish that Defendants denied them use of an essential facility. Plaintiffs claim that C&W and WI unreasonably denied CBS access to these facilities by submitting sham objections to the applications [*12] filed by CBS with the government of the British Virgin Islands and by publishing an erroneous telephone listing for CBS in the Tortola directory. Plaintiffs' complaint, however, never identifies any facility to which CBS was denied access nor a single instance in which access to a facility was actually requested or denied. Hence, Plaintiffs fail the third prong of the essential facilities test.

Second, HN6[[↑]] the holder of the essential facility must be in competition with the deprived party for the essential facilities doctrine to apply. Ferguson v. Greater Pocatello Chamber of Commerce, 848 F.2d 976, 983 (9th Cir. 1988). Neither C&W nor WI was ever a competitor of Plaintiffs. Thus, Plaintiffs cannot substantiate an essential facilities claim.

Finally, Plaintiffs contend that, given CBS's attempt to compete with CCC, C&W's one-time purchase of a 27 percent minority interest in CCC is sufficient to substantiate an essential facilities claim. HN7[[↑]] A subsidiary's competition with a third person, however, does not confer a "competitor" status on the corporate parent unless the parent impermissibly controls the day-to-day affairs of the subsidiary. See United States v. Crocker Nat'l Corp., *13 656 F.2d 428, 450 (9th Cir. 1981), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Bankamerica Corp. v. United States, 462 U.S. 122, 76 L. Ed. 2d 456, 103 S. Ct. 2266 (1983). C&W's minority ownership of stock alone is, therefore, insufficient to establish the requisite competition between Plaintiffs and Defendants C&W and WI to establish a Section 2 violation.

For the foregoing reasons, this Court finds that Count XI of the complaint must be dismissed under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12 (b)(6).

V. Standing As To Plaintiff Korngold

Plaintiff Korngold, the president and sole shareholder of Plaintiff CBS, seeks relief on behalf of CBS for the injuries allegedly sustained by CBS as a result of defendants' actions. Defendants contend that Korngold does not have standing as an individual to assert this cause of action on behalf of CBS. Rather, they assert, any claim arising out of injury to a corporation committed by a third party must be brought by the corporation itself. See American Airways Charters, Inc. v. Regan, 241 U.S. App. D.C. 132, 746 F.2d 865, 873 n.14 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

Korngold responds that, because he operated CBS as a sole proprietorship prior to March 1989, and because much of [*14] the alleged conduct occurred prior to that date, he not only may, but must, assert these claims individually. The Court finds to the contrary.

While it is true that HN8[[↑]] a sole proprietor may bring suit based upon alleged violations of the antitrust laws, see, e.g., Eiberger v. Sony Corp. of America, 622 F.2d 1068, 1070 (2d Cir. 1980); Hays v. United Fireworks Mfg. Co., 420 F.2d 836, 837 (9th Cir. 1969), the complaint in this case contains no allegations that CBS was once a sole proprietorship, or that Korngold was the sole proprietor, or even that CBS was later incorporated.¹¹ Plaintiffs cannot cure the deficiencies of the complaint as to Korngold's lack of standing by raising new and creative arguments in their Opposition to a Motion to Dismiss. This is especially true when the claims made in the Opposition are inconsistent with the allegations contained in the Complaint.¹²

[*15] Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the Court finds that Plaintiffs' entire complaint must be dismissed pursuant to Fed R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(1\) for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Further, the Court finds that Count XI must be dismissed pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(6\). Finally, the Court finds that Plaintiff Korngold's claims must be dismissed for lack of standing pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12\(b\)\(1\). Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Counts 2 through 10 must therefore be granted.

Count 1 against CCC remains pursuant to Judge Greene's Order. Any appropriate dispositive motions relating to this Count must be filed by CCC within thirty days from the date of this Order.
