California law regarding "sham declarations" is similar to federal law: "[I]n opposing a summary judgment motion, a plaintiff may not create a disputed issue of fact by contradicting his or her deposition testimony with an affidavit or declaration." (Jogani v. Jogani (2006) 141 Cal.App.4th 158, 177, 45 Cal. Rptr. 3d 792, citing D'Amico v. Board of Medical Examiners (1974) 11 Cal.3d 1, 20-22, 112 Cal. Rptr. 786, 520 P.2d 10 (D'Amico).) This rule has been referred to as the D'Amico rule. (See Ahn v. Kumho Tire U.S.A., Inc. (2014) 223 Cal.App.4th 133, 136, 143-144, 166 Cal. Rptr. 3d 852 (Ahn).)[18]

However, like federal courts considering the sham affidavit rule, California courts have cautioned that "'an uncritical application of the D'Amico decision can lead to anomalous results, inconsistent with the general principles of summary judgment law.' . . . D'Amico should not be interpreted 'as saying that admissions should be shielded from careful examination in light of the entire record.' [Citation.] This is because the record may contain evidence that credibly contradicts or explains what might appear to be clear and unequivocal admissions, if the admissions are viewed in isolation and without reference to the other evidence." (Ahn, supra, 223 Cal.App.4th at p. 144, quoting Price v. Wells Fargo Bank (1989) 213 Cal.App.3d 465, 482, 261 Cal. Rptr. 735.) "Courts have consistently refused to apply the D'Amico rule to exclude evidence adduced in opposition to a summary judgment motion when either evidence adduced on the motion credibly explains or contradicts a party's earlier admissions." (Ahn, supra, 223 Cal.App.4th at pp. 144-145.) "A summary judgment should not be based on tacit admissions or fragmentary and equivocal concessions, which are contradicted by other credible [*80] evidence." (Price v. Wells Fargo Bank, supra, 213 Cal.App.3d at p. 482.)

Here, the court's decision to strike Estes's entire declaration was, in the words of the Ahn court, "an overly broad and erroneous application of the D'Amico rule." (Ahn, supra, 223 Cal.App.4th at p. 136.) The trial court was not presented with a clear and unequivocal admission by Estes in his deposition that was contradicted by his later declaration. In his deposition, Estes initially stated he could not recall the specific profit sharing percentages to which DTS and AutoReturn agreed under their alleged joint venture agreement. Later in the same deposition Estes testified that AutoReturn and DTS agreed to a 60/40 split of profits. In his declaration he again stated that the parties "agreed to split the $22.00 per-tow fee for City authorized tows in San Diego at 60% AutoReturn and 40% DTS." Although circumstances may render Estes's credibility on that point suspect, we cannot say that his deposition testimony and declaration averment about the agreement to share profits with a 60/40 split were so contradictory to his earlier testimony that striking his entire declaration under the D'Amico or sham affidavit rule was warranted. Estes's initial testimony was more a "fragmentary and equivocal concession[], which [was] contradicted [*81] by other credible evidence" (Price v. Wells Fargo Bank, supra, 213 Cal.App.3d at p. 482) than a clear and unequivocal admission that was clearly and unambiguously inconsistent with his later testimony and declaration.

[18] Under the D'Amico rule, ""[w]here . . . there is a clear and unequivocal admission by the plaintiff, himself, in his deposition'" and the plaintiff contradicts that admission in a subsequent [*79] declaration, "'we are forced to conclude there is no substantial evidence of the existence of a triable issue of fact.''" (Ahn, supra, 223 Cal.App.4th at p. 144, quoting D'Amico, supra, 11 Cal.3d at p. 21, first italics added by Ahn.)

Notwithstanding the court's assertion in its summary judgment ruling that its decision to strike Estes's declaration was "not a credibility determination, but rather a determination that the referenced testimony is so equivocal in context that it does not raise a triable issue of fact," we view the court's striking Estes's declaration as a credibility determination-i.e., the court determined that Estes's deposition testimony and declaration that the parties agreed to a 60/40 profit split was not credible because he initially testified in his deposition that he could not recall the profit sharing percentages. The court's credibility determination contravenes the D'Amico rule because there was no "clear and unequivocal" admission in Estes's deposition that his later declaration contradicted. The credibility determination also contravenes the well-settled rule that in ruling on a summary judgment motion, the court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the opposing party and resolve any evidentiary doubts or ambiguities [*82] in the opposing party's favor. (Aguilar, supra, 25 Cal.4th at p. 843; Saelzler, supra, 25 Cal.4th at p. 768.)

DTS additionally contends that the order striking Estes's declaration constituted an evidence sanction under Code of Civil Procedure section 2023.030, subdivision (c) for misuse of the discovery process, and that the court erred by imposing the sanction without providing the notice and opportunity for hearing required by that statute. We agree that the court's striking the declaration cannot be upheld as a sanction under Code of Civil Procedure section 2023.030 because DTS was not afforded proper notice and opportunity for hearing on the issue. "Code of Civil Procedure section 2023.030, provides for discovery sanctions only 'after notice . . . and after opportunity for hearing' and only in the manner 'authorized by the chapter governing any particular discovery method or any other provision of this title . . . .'" (People ex rel. City of Dana Point v. Holistic Health (2013) 213 Cal.App.4th 1016, 1030, 153 Cal. Rptr. 3d 810 [seeking potentially dispositive evidentiary sanctions in a summary judgment brief did not satisfy the notice and hearing requirements of Code of Civil Procedure section 2023.030].) As noted, AutoReturn and the City requested the court to strike Estes's declaration in their reply to DTS's opposition to their summary judgment motion; they did not make that request by noticed motion.

Further, in the absence of a violation of an order compelling an answer or further answer, an evidence sanction may be imposed only [*83] where the answer given by a party responding to discovery is willfully false. (Saxena v. Goffney (2008) 159 Cal.App.4th 316, 334, 71 Cal. Rptr. 3d 469.) The inconsistency between Estes's initial deposition answer that he did not recall the agreed profit sharing percentages and his later deposition testimony and declaration that AutoReturn and DTS agreed to share gross profits on a percentage basis with a "60/40" split does not establish that Estes's later deposition testimony and declaration were willfully false. We conclude the court erred in striking Estes's declaration.

DTS presented evidence that raises a triable issue of fact as to the existence of DTS's alleged joint venture agreement with AutoReturn.[19] As noted, the three basic elements of a joint venture are that the members must jointly control the venture, share the profits of the undertaking, and each have an ownership interest in the enterprise. (Unruh-Haxton v. Regents of the University of California, supra, 162 Cal.App.4th at p. 370.) "While in a technical joint venture there is usually a sharing of profits and losses in the prosecution of the common enterprise [citation], the mode of participating in the fruits of the undertaking may be left to the agreement of the parties." (Universal Sales Corp. v. California Press Mfg. Co. (1942) 20 Cal.2d 751, 764, 128 P.2d 665.)

[19] The parties' dispute regarding the alleged joint venture is focused entirely on whether there was a [*84] joint venture agreement; there is no argument that to the extent there was such an agreement, AutoReturn did not breach it.

The deposition testimony of both Estes and Garg, and Estes's declaration, provide substantial evidence that the parties discussed and orally agreed to pursue a joint venture to pursue municipal contracts and to share control and the profits of the venture. Additional evidence of a joint venture is the statement in AutoReturn's proposal that "AutoReturn is pleased to present this proposal with support from DTS as its technology partner." (Italics added.)

AutoReturn argues that there is no evidence of joint control over the alleged joint venture because AutoReturn and DTS each controlled separate aspects of the venture. However, the element of joint control may be satisfied even though the parties to a joint venture delegate control over a particular aspect of the venture to the party who is qualified to perform that aspect. (See Scottsdale Ins. Co. v. Essex Ins. Co. (2002) 98 Cal.App.4th 86, 93, 119 Cal. Rptr. 2d 62.) "Although it has been said that joint control of the undertaking and equal power to direct the enterprise is an essential element of a joint venture [citations][,] this is not to say that there cannot be a joint venture where the parties [*85] have unequal control of operations. The requirement of authority and control has been construed to mean that while in the absence of special agreement one joint venturer cannot bind the others, 'they may by agreement grant authority to one or more of their number which would not be implied from the relationship alone.'" (Stilwell v. Trutanich (1960) 178 Cal.App.2d 614, 619, 3 Cal. Rptr. 285.) DTS and AutoReturn could delegate control of different aspects of the alleged joint venture between themselves according to their respective areas of expertise.

The evidence properly considered raises a triable issue of fact as to whether DTS and AutoReturn entered into a joint venture agreement that AutoReturn breached. The trial court erred in adjudicating DTS's fifth cause of action for breach of joint venture agreement in AutoReturn's favor.

VI. Denial of Leave to Amend to Plead Causes of Action for Tortuous Interference with Contract and Breach of Fiduciary Duty

DTS contends that the court erred in denying its motion for leave to file a third amended cross-complaint on the ground that statutory CUTSA supersession barred DTS's proposed cross-claim against AutoReturn for breach of fiduciary duty and cross-claim against Orion for tortuous interference with contract. [*86] DTS's contention mischaracterizes what happened in the trial court.

DTS filed a motion for leave to file a third amended cross-complaint that would add a cause of action of for breach of fiduciary duty against AutoReturn. The motion created a procedural muddle. AutoReturn filed a "Statement of Non-Opposition" to DTS's motion, in which it stated that it did not oppose the motion but did "not concede any of the merits, allegations, or causes of action alleged in the Motion or in the proposed Third Amended Cross-Complaint." In its opening brief, DTS asserts that its motion to amend also sought to add a cause of action against Orion for tortuous interference with contract. However, DTS's operative second amended cross-complaint already contained an eighth cause of action against Orion for interference with contractual relations that had not been dismissed when the court ruled on Orion's motion for summary judgment against DTS. DTS's second amended cross-complaint also contained a 10th cause of action for interference with contractual relations against the City. AutoReturn and the City demurred to the 10th cause of action (and other causes of action) on the ground it was superseded by DTS's [*87] sixth cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets under the CUTSA, which DTS brought against AutoReturn, the City, Orion, and DeLatte. Orion did not file a demurrer to DTS's second amended cross-complaint. The court (Judge William R. Nevitt, Jr.) sustained AutoReturn and the City's demurrer to the 10th cause of action without leave to amend on the ground the CUTSA superseded that cause of action because it was "based on the same nucleus of facts as the sixth . . . cause of action [for misappropriation of trade secrets]."

In denying DTS's motion to file its proposed third amended cross-complaint, the court (Judge Taylor) noted in its minute order that Judge Nevitt had "previously sustained a demurrer, holding that DTS's claims for common law misappropriation, interference with contract and contractual relations, and undue business practices were superseded by DTS's [statutory] claim for Misappropriation Of Trade Secrets . . . , as all of these claims were premised on a common nucleus of fact relating to alleged misuse of DTS's software." Judge Taylor's minute order stated that "the proposed [third amended cross-complaint] attached to the moving papers . . . continues inexplicably [*88] to assert these previously dismissed claims."[20] The proposed third amended cross-complaint attached to DTS's motion included the eighth cause of action against Orion for interference with contractual relations, but omitted the dismissed 10th cause of action for interference with contractual relations against the City. Thus, it appears that at the time he ruled on DTS's motion for leave to amend, Judge Taylor either mistakenly believed the eighth cause of action against Orion for interference with contractual relations had been dismissed on demurrer, or impliedly found that the eighth cause of action lacked merit based on the dismissal of the 10th cause of action for interference with contractual relations against City.[21]

In any event, because the eighth cause of action against Orion for interference with contractual relations had not been dismissed when Orion moved for summary judgment on DTS's second amended cross-complaint, Orion's motion for summary judgment appropriately sought summary adjudication of that cause of action on the [*90] ground it was superseded by the CUTSA, and on the additional ground that DTS could not establish that Orion and DeLatte knew about DTS's contractual relations. DTS's opposition to Orion's motion did not address Orion's request for summary adjudication of the eighth cause of action, and the court granted the request on the ground DTS had not opposed it. The court granted summary adjudication of DTS's seventh cause of action for common law misappropriation and 12th cause of action for unfair competition on the same ground. The court stated in its order that by failing to oppose the portion of Orion's motion for summary judgment seeking adjudication of the eighth cause of action, "DTS has failed to preserve for appeal a challenge to the granting of the motion."[22]

The trial court's observation that DTS has forfeited the right to challenge the trial court's adjudication of its cause of action against Orion for interference with contractual relations is correct. (Arnall v. Superior Court (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 360, 373, 118 Cal. Rptr. 3d 379 [failure to oppose summary adjudication on a particular ground before the trial court forfeits the right to challenge adjudication on that ground on appeal]; Newton v. Clemons (2003) 110 Cal.App.4th 1, 11, 1 Cal. Rptr. 3d 90 [issues raised for the first time on appeal that could have been presented to the trial court are generally deemed waived].) Because the court granted Orion's motion for summary adjudication of the eighth cause of action for intentional interference with contractual relations and DTS has forfeited the right to challenge that ruling on appeal, we will not address DTS's argument that the court erred in denying it leave to include that cause of action in a third amended cross-complaint.

Regarding its proposed cause [*92] of action for breach of fiduciary duty against AutoReturn, DTS argues on appeal that the court erred in denying leave to amend "across the board on the basis of UTSA supersession, even though AutoReturn did not assert that issue." However, the court did not rule that DTS's proposed breach of [20] The causes of action for common law misappropriation, interference with contractual relations, and unfair competition in DTS's proposed third amended cross-complaint were against Orion and DeLatte only.

[21] Although DTS's motion for leave to file a third amended cross-complaint did not seek to add a cause of action against Orion, Orion opposed the motion by arguing that Judge Nevitt's dismissal of the contract interference cause of action against the City established that its [*89] contract interference cause of action against Orion was futile. In reply papers and at oral argument, DTS pointed out that Orion had not challenged the eighth cause of action and it had not been dismissed. DTS argued that its contract interference claim against Orion was based on different facts than the dismissed contract interference claim against the City, and was not superseded by its cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets. The court at oral argument stated, "I think Judge Nevitt did adjudicate this issue. I think he did dismiss these counts. And I think they are the same. And you are asking me to second-guess a colleague, and I'm just not going to do that. I don't have the authority to do that." DTS's counsel responded, "Okay. I will concede that today. That's fine, but we still have the issue of the breach of fiduciary duty claim [against AutoReturn]."

[22] It its reply brief, DTS takes the position that the court's incorrect view that its contract interference claim against Orion had been dismissed operated as a dismissal of that claim. DTS argues that it "could not defend against a motion seeking judgment on an interference claim that had been ruled dismissed already." We do not view the court's erroneous statement that a prior judge had dismissed DTS's eighth cause of action against [*91] Orion as constituting a dismissal of that cause of action. DTS could have opposed Orion's request for summary adjudication of the eighth cause of action on the merits and argued that the court misunderstood or misconstrued the effect of the prior dismissal of DTS's 10th cause of action on status of the eighth cause of action.

fiduciary duty cause of action was superseded by its statutory cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets. As noted, the court denied leave to amend on the ground that "DTS's claims for common law misappropriation, interference with contract and contractual relations, and undue business practices were superseded by DTS's [statutory] claim for Misappropriation of Trade Secrets." (Italics added.) After DTS's counsel failed to persuade the court at oral argument that Judge Nevitt had not dismissed those causes of action against Orion and DeLatte, counsel stated, "That's fine, but we still have the issue of the breach of fiduciary duty claim [against AutoReturn]." The court responded, "You have to bring another motion [for leave to amend] and append to it a proposed . . . cross-complaint that doesn't have included in it causes of action that my colleague has already dismissed." "If you want [*93] to try and seek leave to amend again . . . with just the fiduciary duty claim appended, just that being the new proposed third amended cross-complaint, that might be another kettle of fish."

Thus, the court did not deny DTS leave to add a cause of action against AutoReturn for breach of fiduciary duty; the court invited DTS to file another motion for leave to amend to add that cause of action with a proposed third amended cross-complaint that omitted the second amended cross-complaint's seventh, eighth, and 12th causes of action against Orion for common law misappropriation, interference with contractual relations, and unfair competition, respectively. The court deferred ruling on whether it would allow DTS to add a cause of action against AutoReturn for breach of fiduciary duty until DTS submitted a proposed third amended cross-complaint that omitted the three causes of action that the court believed had been dismissed. The court later disposed of those three causes of action by granting Orion's motion for summary adjudication of the seventh, eighth, and 12th causes of action of DTS's second amended cross-complaint.

Because the trial court declined to exercise its discretion and rule [*94] on whether to grant DTS leave to plead a cause of action for breach of fiduciary duty against AutoReturn, DTS is free on remand to file a motion for leave to amend its second amended cross-complaint to add that cause of action. If DTS files a new motion for leave to file a third amended cross-complaint, its proposed third amended cross-complaint should omit the three causes of action against Orion that court summarily adjudicated in Orion's favor.

ACT'S APPEAL

I. AutoReturn's Reliance on Declarations Filed with Its Previous Motion for Summary Judgment Against ACT

ACT's contends the court should have denied AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment on ACT'S fourth amended complaint as procedurally defective because AutoReturn did not provide its supporting evidence with the motion. AutoReturn initially filed a motion for summary judgment on ACT's fourth amended complaint in January 2012. AutoReturn later withdrew the motion and refiled a revised version of it in March 2012. Rather than refile all of the declarations it filed in support of its original motion for summary judgment against ACT, AutoReturn stated in a footnote in its memorandum of points and authorities in support of its second [*95] motion: "Each of the declarations referred to in this Memorandum of Points and Authorities was filed with this Court on January 6, 2012, when AutoReturn originally filed a motion for summary judgment against ACT." In its summary judgment order, the court rejected ACT's argument that the declarations in question were irrelevant because they were not served with the moving papers, stating: "The declarations in question were part of a similar although not identical motion filed on 1/9/12 . . . which went off calendar. However, the declarations were served on [ACT] in connection with the earlier motion, so [ACT] is aware of and has copies of same."

We agree with the trial court's implied finding that ACT was not prejudiced by the court's consideration of the declarations that the City and AutoReturn filed with their prior motion for summary judgment, and conclude that the court acted within its discretion in considering the declarations. ACT cites [Fleet v. CBS, Inc. (1996) 50 Cal.App.4th 1911, 58 Cal. Rptr. 2d 645] (Fleet) for the proposition that the evidence supporting a motion for summary judgment must be provided with the motion; it is not enough to refer to other sources where the evidence may be located. In Fleet, the defendant moving for summary [*96] judgment stated only one fact in its separate statement of undisputed facts and, in the words of the Fleet court, "expected the court to glean the background facts necessary to resolving its motion from the complaint [and other sources]." ([Id. at p. 1916, fn. 3].) The Fleet court noted that "[e]very motion for summary judgment should be accompanied by a 'separate statement setting forth plainly and concisely all material facts which the moving party contends are undisputed.' (Code Civ. Proc., § 437c, subd. (b).) Facts stated elsewhere need not be considered by the court [citation], and failure to comply with this rule constitutes ground for denial at the court's discretion [citation]." (Fleet, supra, 50 Cal.App.4th at p. 1916, fn. 3, italics added.) Because the trial court "was apparently willing [to glean the background facts from other sources] and because the crucial facts [were] to be found somewhere in the record and [were] undisputed by appellants, [the Fleet court decided it would] not disturb the trial court's ruling on this ground." (Ibid.)

In the present case, there is no issue regarding facts not stated in AutoReturn's separate statement; ACT's complaint is that AutoReturn's separate statement's cites declarations that were submitted with a prior summary judgment motion. Fleet supports [*97] the proposition that the trial court has discretion to overlook defects in the separate statement and the moving party's presentation of evidence.

ACT also cites Artiglio v. General Electric Co. (1998) 61 Cal.App.4th 830, 71 Cal. Rptr. 2d 817 (Artiglio) for the proposition that "facts[]stated elsewhere may not be considered by the court—even if submitted with a party's earlier summary judgment motion." In Artiglio the plaintiffs opposing a motion for summary judgment failed to cite specific evidence that contradicted the moving defendant's evidence. The plaintiffs' separate statement of disputed facts simply stated: "'See evidence previously produced in opposition to [defendant's] earlier motions for summary judgment.'" (Id. at p. 841.) Further, the plaintiffs' memorandum of points and authorities in opposition to the summary judgment motion did not "provide any greater clue about what evidence they believe contradicted the evidence presented by [the defendant]." (Ibid.) Based on the plaintiffs' failure to cite any evidence that contradicted the defendant's evidence, the Artiglio court concluded that "the trial court was fully warranted in concluding [the defendant's] evidence was not disputed." (Id. at p. 842.) Artiglio is inapposite because AutoReturn's separate statement in support of [*98] its motion for summary judgment cited specific evidence supporting each fact listed in its separate statement. The trial court was not required to deny AutoReturn's motion simply because certain declarations cited in AutoReturn's separate statement had been filed and served on ACT with AutoReturn's earlier withdrawn motion.

II. Summary Adjudication of ACT's Seventh Cause of Action for Unfair Business Practices

ACT contends the trial court erred in granting summary adjudication of its cause of action against AutoReturn for unfair business practices in violation of the Business and Professions Code section 17200 et seq., commonly referred to as the unfair competition law (UCL). Business and Professions Code section 17200 defines unfair competition as "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice . . . ." Because the statute "'is written in the disjunctive, it establishes three varieties of unfair competition-acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent. "In other words, a practice is prohibited as 'unfair' or 'deceptive' even if not 'unlawful' and vice versa."'" (Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co. (1999) 20 Cal.4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (Cel-Tech).)

The California Supreme Court in Cel-Tech held that in the context of a UCL action against a direct competitor of the plaintiff, in contrast to a consumer action, the word "unfair" [*99] in Business & Professions Code section 17200 "means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." (Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 187, fn. omitted.) The Cel-Tech court emphasized that "the '"antitrust laws . . . were enacted for 'the protection of competition, not competitors.'"' [Citation.] . . . Injury to a competitor is not equivalent to injury to competition; only the latter is the proper focus of antitrust laws." (Id. at p. 186.)

"The 'unlawful' practices prohibited by [Business and Professions Code] section 17200 are any practices forbidden by law, be it civil or criminal, federal, state, or municipal, statutory, regulatory, or court-made. [Citation.] It is not necessary that the predicate law provide for private civil enforcement. [Citation.] . . . [Business and Professions Code] section 17200 'borrows' violations of other laws and treats them as unlawful practices independently actionable under [Business and Professions Code] section 17200 et seq." (Saunders v. Superior Court (1994) 27 Cal.App.4th 832, 838-839, 33 Cal. Rptr. 2d 438.)

"[U]nder the fraud prong of the UCL a plaintiff need not show that he or others were actually deceived or confused by the conduct or business practice in question. . . . A violation can be shown even if no one was actually deceived, relied upon the fraudulent [*100] practice, or sustained any damage." (Schnall v. Hertz Corp. (2000) 78 Cal.App.4th 1144, 1167, 93 Cal. Rptr. 2d 439.) The plaintiff need only "show deception to some members of the public, or harm to the public interest" (Watson Laboratories, Inc. v. Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc. (C.D.Cal. 2001) 178 F.Supp.2d 1099, 1121 (Watson Laboratories), or "'that members of the public are likely to be deceived.'" (Schnall v. Hertz Corp., supra, 78 Cal.App.4th at p. 1167.)[23]

In its seventh cause of action for unfair business practices in violation of the UCL, ACT alleged that it "sustained actual harm and injury resulting from the unlawful, unfair and fraudulent competition and business practices on the part of AutoReturn . . . ." Specifically, ACT alleged that the City awarded the towing contract to AutoReturn based on "AutoReturn's [*101] wrongful inclusion of LETS and TMS software platforms in response to the 2008 RFP and in disregard of ACT's exclusive license to use . . . LETS and TMS software products in San Diego County, and in violation of the City Charter and Municipal Code."

The trial court granted summary adjudication of ACT's seventh cause of action on several grounds. First the court ruled that ACT lacked standing to bring its claim under the UCL because ACT only "leased" DTS's software. The court further ruled that even if ACT could show it had standing, it had "not shown a causal connection between the unlawful practice it alleges and the injury it claims to have suffered. It only speculates that but for AutoReturn's inclusion of LETS/TMS in its bid, [ACT] would have been awarded the contract. This conclusory, speculative statement is insufficient to raise a triable issue of material fact." The court then ruled that to the extent ACT based its UCL claim on its eighth cause of action for interference with contractual relations, "both claims fail because no contract was ever breached." The court also ruled that ACT's seventh cause of action failed under the "'unfair' prong of the UCL because ACT did not and [*102] cannot establish AutoReturn's conduct violated an antitrust law[]"—i.e., that it injured competition and not just a particular competitor. Finally, the court ruled that as a result of ACT's having brought its 18th cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets, ACT's seventh cause of action was "superseded by the CUTSA as a matter of law."[24]

We conclude the court erred in summarily adjudicating ACT's seventh cause of action in AutoReturn's favor. ACT had standing to bring its UCL claim against AutoReturn regardless of whether it had standing to bring a claim for misappropriation of trade secrets based on AutoReturn's use of LETS/TMS in its bid. Business and Professions Code section 17204 confers standing to bring a UCL action on "a person who has suffered injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition." ACT's UCL claim is based on its exclusive license to use LETS/TMS in San Diego County [*103] and not on the alleged trade secret status of LETS/TMS. ACT claims, and argued in opposition to AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment, that it would have been awarded the towing contract but for AutoReturn's unfair business practice of "bidding the LETS/TMS software products in disregard of ACT's exclusive use rights, to the loss of $1.5 million." Regardless of the merit of that claim, ACT has standing to assert it.

The trial court correctly ruled that ACT's seventh cause of action failed under the "unfair" prong of the UCL. There is no evidence that AutoReturn's alleged unfair practice threatened an incipient violation of an antitrust law, violated the policy or spirit of one of those laws, or significantly threatened or harmed competition as opposed to harming ACT as a direct competitor. (Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th at pp. 186-187.) However, we conclude there was sufficient evidence to preclude summary adjudication of ACT's seventh cause of action under the "unlawful" and "fraudulent" prongs of the UCL.

[23] In In re Tobacco II Cases (2009) 46 Cal.4th 298, 93 Cal. Rptr. 3d 559, 207 P.3d 20, the California Supreme Court held that to comply with UCL's standing requirements after 2004 amendments to the UCL by Proposition 64, a class representative in a consumer class action alleging misrepresentation under the fraudulent prong of the UCL "must demonstrate actual reliance on the allegedly deceptive or misleading statements, in accordance with well-settled principles regarding the element of reliance in ordinary fraud actions" (In re Tobacco II Cases, at p. 306.) The Supreme Court further held, however, that the "standing requirements are applicable only to the class representatives, and not all absent class members." (Ibid.)

[24] ACT voluntarily dismissed its 18th cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets without prejudice the same day it filed its opposition to AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment. Despite the dismissal, the court granted AutoReturn's motion for summary adjudication as to the 18th cause of action.

As noted, the unlawful practices prohibited under Business and Professions Code section 17200 include any practices forbidden by civil law. (Saunders v. Superior Court, supra, 27 Cal.App.4th at pp. 838-839.) "Since the addition of the word 'unlawful' to the predecessor statute in 1963, this section has been liberally construed [*104] so as not to be limited to traditional anticompetitive practices." (People v. E.W.A.P., Inc. (1980) 106 Cal.App.3d 315, 318, 165 Cal. Rptr. 73.) As we discuss infra, AutoReturn's use of LETS/TMS fell within the unlawful prong of the UCL because it subjected AutoReturn to liability for tortious interference with ACT's contractual relationship with DTS with ACT's prospective economic advantage.

Regarding the fraudulent prong of the UCL, we reiterate that the plaintiff need only "show deception to some members of the public, or harm to the public interest" (Watson Laboratories, supra, 178 F.Supp.2d at p. 1121) or "'that members of the public are likely to be deceived.'" (Schnall v. Hertz Corp., supra, 78 Cal.App.4th at p. 1167.) ACT's UCL cause of action is viable under the fraudulent prong because it is based on AutoReturn's alleged fraudulent representations to the City that it was authorized to use LETS/TMS in its prospective performance of the City's towing contract and, therefore, implicates public deception or harm to the public interest. (Watson Laboratories, supra, 178 F.Supp.2d at p. 1121; Travelers Prop. Cas. Co. of Am. v. Centex Homes (N.D.Cal. Aug. 26, 2013, No. 12-0371-SC) 2013 U.S.Dist. LEXIS 121401 [corporation may bring a UCL fraud prong claim if it shows the alleged wrongdoing has some impact on the general public].)[25] Deceptive public contract bidding is inherently harmful to the public interest and deceives the general public through [*105] public employees who issue requests for public contract bids and award public contracts on behalf of the general public. Accordingly, we conclude that a deceptive bid that harms a direct competitor as well as the public interest may serve as the basis for an action by the direct competitor under the "fraudulent" prong of Business and Professions Code section 17200. In the present case, ACT presented evidence that AutoReturn's allegedly deceptive bid harmed the public interest by resulting in a substantial delay in AutoReturn's ability to perform the towing contract while it developed software to replace LETS/TMS after ACT complained that AutoReturn's proposal infringed ACT's exclusive license to use LETS/TMS in San Diego County.

ACT contends the trial court erred in ruling there was no evidence showing a causal connection between AutoReturn's alleged unlawful business practice and the resulting injury ACT claims to have suffered. We conclude the evidence is sufficient to raise a triable issue of fact as to causation. The court made a factual finding based on declarations of three City employees, which the court referred to as "undisputed testimony," that the "City did not require any specific software platform, and that it ranked AutoReturn's proposal highest because of its superior technical score and its oral and written responses." However, ACT presented sufficient evidence to raise a triable issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn's use of the LETS/TMS software in its bid proposal was a substantial factor [25] AutoReturn contends that ACT waived the right to argue on appeal that its seventh cause of action falls under the fraudulent prong of the UCL because ACT did not make that argument in opposition to AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment We disagree. In its seventh cause of action, ACT alleged that AutoReturn engaged in fraudulent business practices, and specifically alleged that AutoReturn "falsely represented to the City that AutoReturn was authorized to utilize LETS and TMS systems in AutoReturn's [*106] prospective performance of the [towing contract] in the event said contract was awarded to AutoReturn." The seventh cause of action further alleges that AutoReturn falsely represented to the City that "ACT has no rights of exclusivity which would bar an award of the [contract] to AutoReturn." In its opposition to AutoReturn's summary judgment motion, ACT argued that the City awarded the contract to AutoReturn "based upon AutoReturn's false representation that it would use the LETS and TMS products to automate tow dispatching for the City. Having used LETS/TMS to bait the City, once AutoReturn was awarded the . . . contract, it then switched to other allegedly non-infringing computer software to avoid ACT's preliminary injunction of its infringement of ACT's exclusive license rights in LETS/TMS." In arguing that it had standing to bring a UCL claim because it lost money as a result of AutoReturn's infringement of its exclusive license, ACT contended that AutoReturn's interference with ACT's rights in LETS/TMS arose when AutoReturn "falsely represented" to the City that AutoReturn was able and intended to use LETS/TMS in the performance of the contract. This argument in ACT's opposition [*107] to AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment, along with the allegations in ACT's seventh cause of action, sufficiently preserve ACT's right to argue on appeal that its seventh cause of action is viable under the fraudulent prong of the UCL.

in the City's decision to award the towing contract to AutoReturn. AutoReturn's bid proposal was almost entirely based on its proposed use of LETS/TMS. ACT submitted [*108] evidence that AutoReturn represented to the City during the bidding process that AutoReturn's ARIES platform was then comprised of LETS and TMS, that AutoReturn would use LETS/TMS to manage tows under the contract, and that LETS/TMS was already in place and being used by the SDPD. The fact that AutoReturn's proposed use LETS/TMS software was essentially the centerpiece of its proposal raises a reasonable inference that the software was a substantial factor in the City's decision to award AutoReturn the towing contract. The fact that the City ranked ACT's proposal second to AutoReturn's supports a reasonable inference that the City likely would have awarded ACT the contract if AutoReturn had not included LETS/TMS in its proposal.

Further, a "Consensus Technical Evaluation Form-Summary" prepared by the City's Technical Evaluation Committee (the committee) noted AutoReturn's use of a "Dispatch Tow System" as a component of AIRIES and gave AutoReturn's proposal an "Exceptional" rating because "AutoReturn offers a fully comprehensive, all inclusive suite of services that will allow the City of San Diego to migrate their current system seamlessly with little or no impact to the current business [*109] operation." The committee's evaluation further stated that AutoReturn's proven experience and expertise "combined with the system capabilities provided by the DTS . . . software platform will fulfill all the requirements to provide the communication and administrative services the City of San Diego requires." The evaluation concluded with the statement that "[t]he integration of LETS/TMS, DTS and the ARIES full-feature solutions will meet and exceed the City Dispatch Towing Services RFP requirements." Another bidder whose proposal was rated acceptable but not exceptional proposed to use software other than LETS and integrate it with TMS. The committee rated this proposal as marginal, stating: "If the TMS system is not available from the other vendor it would require this vendor to develop and integrate a new system to replace its functions. This may cause of action a delay in implementation and/or unknown additional costs to the City." (Italics added.) It is reasonable to infer from this statement that the City may not have awarded the contract to AutoReturn if AutoReturn's proposal indicated it would have to develop a new software platform to replace LETS/TMS's functions in its ARIES software. [*110] The committee's evaluations raise a triable issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn's use of LETS/TMS in its proposal was a substantial factor in the City's decision to award the contract to AutoReturn.

III. Summary Adjudication of ACT's 18th Cause of Action for Misappropriation of Trade Secrets and Ruling That It Supersedes the Seventh Cause of Action

As noted, the court granted AutoReturn's motion for summary adjudication as to ACT's 18th cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets even though ACT voluntarily dismissed that cause of action without prejudice the same day it filed its opposition to AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment. In the same order, the court ruled that ACT's seventh cause of action for unfair business practices in violation of the UCL was "superseded by the CUTSA as a matter of law." On appeal, ACT challenges the court's jurisdiction to summarily adjudicate the 18th cause of action and rule that it supersedes the seventh cause of action.

We conclude that the court lacked jurisdiction to summarily adjudicate ACT's 18th cause of action after ACT voluntarily dismissed it. Code of Civil Procedure section 581, subdivision (c) provides that "[a] plaintiff may dismiss his or her complaint, or any cause of action [*111] asserted in it, in its entirety, or as to any defendant or defendants, with or without prejudice prior to the actual commencement of trial." In ruling that it could properly adjudicate ACT's 18th cause of action despite ACT's having voluntarily dismissed it, the trial court cited Cravens v. State Bd. of Equalization (1997) 52 Cal.App.4th 253, 257, 60 Cal. Rptr. 2d 436 (Cravens), in which the Court of Appeal decided the trial court had properly ruled on a motion for summary judgment where the plaintiff had not filed opposition to the motion and voluntarily dismissed the action the day before the hearing on the motion. The Cravens court stated: "[R]espondents' moving papers met their burden of negating appellant's claims, entitling them to judgment as a matter of law if no issues of disputed fact were raised. Appellant failed to file opposition within the requisite time. At that point, entry of summary judgment in favor of respondents became a formality which appellant could not avoid by the stratagem of filing a last minute request for dismissal without prejudice." (Ibid.)

Cravens is distinguishable from the present case, which is more analogous to Zapanta v. Universal Care, Inc. (2003) 107 Cal.App.4th 1167, 132 Cal. Rptr. 2d 842 (Zapanta). The plaintiffs in Zapanta filed a request to dismiss their medical malpractice lawsuit without prejudice one day before their [*112] opposition to the defendants' motion for summary judgment was due. (Id. at p. 1169.) The trial court struck the plaintiffs' request for dismissal and granted defendants' summary judgment motion on the merits. (Id. at pp. 1170-1171.) The Zapanta court reversed the judgment, concluding that the plaintiffs' request for dismissal was valid and that the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction in granting the defendant's motion for summary judgment. (Id. at pp. 1171, 1174.)

The Zapanta court distinguished Cravens, noting that the plaintiff in Cravens filed a request for dismissal one day before the summary judgment hearing and that the defendants had no notice of the dismissal and appeared at the hearing. (Zapanta, supra, 107 Cal.App.4th at p. 1172.) The Zapanta court stated: "By contrast, appellants here did not fail to file opposition to the summary judgment motion; they filed their request for dismissal prior to their deadline for filing opposition to the summary judgment motion, albeit by only one day. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that judgment on the motion was a mere formality, thus distinguishing this case from Cravens." (Id. at pp. 1172-1173, some italics added.) The Zapanta court concluded: "At the time appellants filed their request for dismissal, the opposition to the summary judgment [*113] motion was not past due, no hearing on the motion had been held and no tentative ruling or other decision tantamount to an adjudication had been made in respondents' favor. In other words, the case had not yet reached a stage where a final disposition was a mere formality." (Id. at pp. 1173-1174.)

Similar to the situation in Zapanta, when ACT filed its request to dismiss its 18th cause of action there had been no hearing on AutoReturn's motion for summary adjudication of the cause of action, there was no tentative decision in AutoReturn's favor on the motion, and it cannot be said a final disposition of the cause of action was a mere formality. Accordingly, the court lacked jurisdiction to summarily adjudicate the 18th cause of action.[26]

We conclude that ACT's voluntary dismissal of the 18th cause of action also deprived the court of jurisdiction to rule, post-dismissal, that ACT's seventh cause of action was superseded under the CUTSA by the dismissed 18th cause of action. "A plaintiff's voluntary dismissal of his action has the effect of an absolute withdrawal of his claim and leaves the defendant as though he had never been a party. . . . '[I]t is a well-settled proposition of law that where the plaintiff has filed a voluntary dismissal of an action . . . , the court is without jurisdiction to act further [citations], and any subsequent orders of the court are simply void.'" (Paniagua v. Orange County Fire Authority (2007) 149 Cal.App.4th 83, 89, 56 Cal. Rptr. 3d 746; Harris v. Billings (1993) 16 Cal.App.4th 1396, 1405, 20 Cal. Rptr. 2d 718 [after a voluntary dismissal of an action under Code of Civil Procedure section 581 the trial court lacks jurisdiction to act further in the action except to award [*115] costs and statutory attorney fees].) Accordingly, at the time it ruled on AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment, the court lacked jurisdiction to rule that the dismissed 18th cause of action superseded the seventh cause of action.

Further, we conclude that if ACT had not voluntarily dismissed its 18th cause of action, it would not supersede its seventh cause of action. "CUTSA provides the exclusive civil remedy for conduct falling within its terms, so as to supersede other [claims and] civil remedies 'based upon misappropriation of a trade secret.' (§ 3426.7, subds. (a), (b).)" (Silvaco Data Systems v. Intel Corp. (2010) 184 Cal.App.4th 210, 236, 238, 109 Cal. Rptr. 3d 27 (Silvaco).) The determination of whether a claim is based on misappropriation of a trade secret is largely factual. (Angelica Textile Services, Inc. v. Park (2013) 220 Cal.App.4th 495, 505, 163 Cal. Rptr. 3d 192.) The "UTSA by its terms does not displace a contract claim, even if it is based on the misappropriation of a trade secret. (Civ. Code, § 3426.7, subd. (b)(1).) Moreover, UTSA does not displace noncontract claims that, although related to a trade secret

[26] The court also cited Mary Morgan, Inc. v. Melzark (1996) 49 Cal.App.4th 765, 57 Cal. Rptr. 2d 4, in which the Court of Appeal decided the plaintiff could not voluntarily dismiss the action without prejudice after the court announced an adverse tentative summary judgment ruling and the summary judgment hearing had commenced and been continued to permit the plaintiff to produce additional opposition evidence (id. at pp. 768-769), and Hartbrodt v. Burke (1996) 42 Cal. App. 4th 168, 49 Cal. Rptr. 2d 562, in which the Court of Appeal held that a plaintiff could not avoid dismissal of an action as a discovery sanction by voluntarily dismissing [*114] the action without prejudice because that "tactic would simply defeat the trial court's power to enforce its discovery orders." (Id. at pp. 175-176.) These cases are distinguishable. ACT voluntarily dismissed its 18th cause of action before the trial court issued a tentative ruling on AutoReturn motion for summary judgment and the dismissal did not implicate the court's power to enforce discovery orders through a terminating sanction.

misappropriation, are independent and based on facts distinct from the facts that support the misappropriation claim." (Angelica, at p. 506, italics added.)

ACT's seventh cause of action cause of action on its face is based on facts that are distinct from the alleged facts that support ACT's 18th cause of action for [*116] misappropriation of trade secrets. The seventh cause of action was included in ACT's original complaint filed in 2009 after the City awarded AutoReturn the towing contract but before AutoReturn decided not to use LETS/TMS and develop its own software to replace it. The factual basis of the seventh cause of action is AutoReturn's alleged infringement of ACT's exclusive license to use LETS/TMS in San Diego County—i.e., the City's award of the towing contract to AutoReturn "based upon AutoReturn's wrongful inclusion of LETS and TMS software platforms in response to the 2008 RFP and in disregard of ACT's exclusive license to use . . . LETS and TMS software products in San Diego County . . . ." The seventh cause of action contains no reference to a trade secret and is in no way dependent on whether any aspect of LETS/TMS is a trade secret. Thus, it is not a claim "'based upon misappropriation of a trade secret.'" (Silvaco, supra, 184 Cal.App.4th at p. 238.)

In contrast, ACT's 18th cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets is based on allegations that ACT maintained the LETS/TMS programs "as confidential, proprietary, and exclusively licensed trade secrets . . . under passworded lock and key," and that AutoReturn acquired [*117] ACT's "confidential, proprietary and trade secret information and trade secrets through improper means[,]" and used and allowed "non-licensed third parties" to use that information to unfairly compete with ACT in violation of its exclusive license. In short, the seventh cause of action is based on alleged infringement of an exclusive license to use software; the 18th cause of action is based on alleged misappropriation of trade secrets contained within the software. Although ACT's seventh cause of action is related to the 18th cause of action, each cause of action is based on distinct facts. Thus, the 18th cause of action does not preempt or supersede the seventh cause of action. The court erred in summarily adjudicating ACT's seventh cause of action in AutoReturn's favor.

IV. Summary Adjudication of ACT's Eighth Cause of Action for Intentional Interference with Contractual Relations

ACT contends the trial court erred in summarily adjudicating ACT'S eighth cause of action of intentional interference with contractual relations. The elements of "a cause of action for intentional interference with contractual relations are (1) a valid contract between plaintiff and a third party; (2) defendant's [*118] knowledge of this contract; (3) defendant's intentional acts designed to induce a breach or disruption of the contractual relationship; (4) actual breach or disruption of the contractual relationship; and (5) resulting damage. [Citations.]' [Citation.] The plaintiff need not allege an actual breach, but only interference with or disruption of his or her contractual relations." (LiMandri v. Judkins (1997) 52 Cal.App.4th 326, 343-344, 60 Cal. Rptr. 2d 539.) "'[I]t is not necessary that the defendant's conduct be wrongful apart from the interference with the contract itself. [Citation.] [¶] . . . Intentionally inducing or causing a breach of an existing contract is . . . a wrong in and of itself. . . .'" (Korea Supply Co. v. Lockheed Martin Corp. (2003) 29 Cal.4th 1134, 1158, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 29, 63 P.3d 937 (Korea Supply).)

The contract that is the subject of this cause of action against AutoReturn is the Ball contract as amended in 2003—the agreement between DTS and ACT that gave ACT an exclusive license to use DTS's LETS/TMS software in San Diego County. In its eighth cause of action, ACT alleged that AutoReturn interfered with ACT's contractual relations with DTS by entering into negotiations and contractual relationships with DTS for the use of LETS/TMS, using confidential, proprietary and trade secret information regarding LETS/TMS in its bid for the towing contract, [*119] and falsely representing to the City that ACT's exclusive rights in LETS/TMS had expired or terminated.

In its motion for summary judgment AutoReturn did not separately address the eighth cause of action; it argued generally that it was entitled to summary adjudication of ACT's seventh through 13th, 18th, and 21st causes of action because it never used DTS's software in San Diego and ACT could not establish a causal connection between AutoReturn alleged use of DTS's software and ACT's loss of the towing contract. The trial court ruled: "AutoReturn is entitled to summary adjudication of ACT'S counts #7-14, 18, and 21 because AutoReturn did not interfere with ACT's alleged exclusive license given that AutoReturn never used LETS/TMS. Further, AutoReturn is entitled to summary judgment/adjudication of these same claims because the undisputed facts show that AutoReturn's mentioning of LETS/TMS in its proposal did not cause ACT any harm."

In considering whether AutoReturn could be held liable for inducing a breach of this contract or disrupting the contractual relationship between DTS and ACT, it is important to focus on the contract's relevant terms. The subject agreement (2003 amendment) [*120] provided that in the event ACT's contract with the City was extended past its expiration date of December 31, 2004, DTS was "strictly prohibited from entering into any communications or negotiations with the City . . . or any other person relating to operational or dispatching/communications without first obtaining prior written consent from [ACT's] president or other authorized representative." (Italics & boldface added.) The 2003 amendment provided that DTS granted ACT "and its members an irrevocable license for the exclusive use in San Diego County, California, of the TMS software, including, but not limited to, any related software and/or updates or revisions thereto." The 2003 amendment also provided that "DTS shall refrain from offering any similar or competing service to any person operating a tow company or engaged in tow and/or related services within [San Diego County], including, but not limited to . . . the City, and/or any third party tow company." (Italics added.)

The emphasized language shows that, contrary to the trial court and AutoReturn's reasoning, ACT did not have to present evidence that AutoReturn used DTS's software in San Diego County for DTS to be held liable [*121] for breaching its contract with ACT. Regardless of whether AutoReturn "used" LETS/TMS, the evidence shows that DTS committed acts in connection with AutoReturn's bid for the City towing contract that breached the terms of its contract with ACT. DTS cooperated with AutoReturn in AutoReturn's bid preparation without obtaining prior written consent from ACT as the contract required. As noted ante, AutoReturn wanted to use LETS/TMS in its bid proposal to avoid incurring additional expenses and having to retrain its employees on different software. DTS's management agreed to work with AutoReturn on its bid proposal despite knowing and communicating to AutoReturn that ACT would take issue with DTS's licensing LETS/TMS to AutoReturn for use in San Diego. DTS's CEO Estes later informed AutoReturn that ACT claimed an exclusive license to use LETS/TMS in San Diego but Estes and DTS's management assured AutoReturn that the exclusive license was invalid and unenforceable. Given that assurance, AutoReturn submitted a bid proposal to the City that was based on its proposed use of LETS/TMS. The relationship between DTS and AutoReturn soured only after AutoReturn decided not to not use LETS/TMS in [*122] performing the city contract because of ACT's exclusive license claim.

Thus, there is sufficient evidence to support a claim that AutoReturn induced DTS to breach the provision in its agreement with ACT that "strictly prohibited" it "from entering into any communications or negotiations with . . . any . . . person relating to operational or dispatching/communications without first obtaining prior written consent from [ACT's] president or other authorized representative." The evidence regarding DTS and AutoReturn's working together on AutoReturn's bid for the towing contract also violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the contract provision prohibiting DTS "from offering any similar or competing service to any person operating a tow company or engaged in tow and/or related services within [San Diego County], including, but not limited to . . . the City, and/or any third party tow company."[27]

A trier of fact could reasonably find that AutoReturn induced DTS to breach or disrupt its exclusive license agreement with ACT by cooperating and working closely with AutoReturn on AutoReturn's bid to the City, which was based on AutoReturn's proposed use of DTS's LETS/TMS. DTS's communication and cooperation with AutoReturn regarding AutoReturn's use of LETS/TMS in its bid evidences both DTS's breach of its contract with ACT and AutoReturn's inducement of the breach and disruption of DTS and ACT's contractual relationship. Regarding causation and damages, as we discussed in connection with ACT's seventh cause of action for unfair business practices, there is sufficient evidence to raise a triable issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn's use of LETS/TMS in its bid was a substantial factor in the City's decision to award AutoReturn the towing contract, and whether ACT would have won the contract if AutoReturn had not used LETS/TMS in its bid. The court erred in granting AutoReturn's motion for summary adjudication of the eighth cause of action.

[27] The only reason it may not violate the letter of that provision is that AutoReturn was not yet engaged in towing related services in San Diego County when DTS helped it with its bid. In any event, regardless of whether DTS actually breached that provision, a trier of fact could reasonably view AutoReturn's [*123] working with DTS to prepare a bid based on its proposed use LETS/TMS as a disruption of DTS's contractual relationship with ACT.

V. *Summary Adjudication [124] of ACT's Eighth Cause of Action for Intentional Interference with Prospective Economic Advantage

The elements of the tort of intentional interference with prospective economic advantage "are usually stated as follows: '"(1) an economic relationship between the plaintiff and some third party, with the probability of future economic benefit to the plaintiff; (2) the defendant's knowledge of the relationship; (3) intentional acts on the part of the defendant designed to disrupt the relationship; (4) actual disruption of the relationship; and (5) economic harm to the plaintiff proximately caused by the acts of the defendant."'" (Korea Supply, supra, 29 Cal.4th at p. 1153.) "[A] plaintiff seeking to recover for alleged interference with prospective economic relations has the burden of pleading and proving that the defendant's interference was wrongful 'by some measure beyond the fact of the interference itself.'" (Della Penna v. Toyota Motor Sales, U.S.A., Inc. (1995) 11 Cal.4th 376, 392-393, 45 Cal. Rptr. 2d 436, 902 P.2d 740.) Although intentional interference with prospective economic advantage and intentional interference with contract are distinct torts, a plaintiff may be able to state causes of action for both torts. (Korea Supply, supra, 29 Cal.4th at p. 1157.)

ACT alleged in its ninth cause of action that AutoReturn intentionally interfered with ACT's "actual and prospective [*125] economic relationships with the City" by engaging in the same conduct alleged in its eighth cause of action for intentional interference contractual relations—i.e., by entering into negotiations and contractual relationships with DTS for the use of LETS/TMS, using confidential, proprietary and trade secret information regarding LETS/TMS in its bid for the towing contract, and falsely representing to the City that ACT's exclusive rights in LETS/TMS had expired or terminated. As noted, AutoReturn sought summary adjudication of both the eighth and ninth causes of action on the grounds it never used DTS's software in San Diego and ACT could not establish a causal connection between AutoReturn alleged use of DTS's software and ACT's loss of the towing contract.

The trial court in its order granting AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment on ACT's fourth amended complaint did not separately address ACT's ninth cause of action for intentional interference with prospective economic advantage. As noted ante, the order states that "AutoReturn is entitled to summary adjudication on ACT'S counts #7-14, 18, and 21 because AutoReturn did not interfere with ACT's alleged exclusive license given that [*126] AutoReturn never used LETS/TMS. Further, AutoReturn is entitled to summary judgment/adjudication of these same claims because the undisputed facts show that AutoReturn's mentioning of LETS/TMS in its proposal did not cause ACT any harm."[28]

The evidence that AutoReturn intentionally interfered with ACT's exclusive license to use LETS/TMS in San Diego County by using LETS/TMS in its proposal for the City's towing contract and that, as a result, ACT lost the future economic benefit it would have realized by continuing its contractual relationship with the City is sufficient to defeat AutoReturn's motion for summary adjudication of ACT's ninth cause of action for intentional interference with prospective economic advantage. For purposes of summary adjudication, ACT satisfied the requirement of showing [*127] independently wrongful conduct by presenting sufficient evidence to raise a triable issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn falsely represented to the City that it had legal access to and the right to use LETS/TMS in its prospective performance of the City's towing contract, and whether AutoReturn induced DTS to breach its exclusive license contract with ACT by working with AutoReturn to include LETS/TMS in AutoReturn's bid proposal. We reiterate that the evidence raises a triable issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn's use of LETS/TMS in its bid was a substantial factor in the City's decision to award AutoReturn the towing contract, and whether ACT would have won the contract if AutoReturn had not used LETS/TMS in its bid. Accordingly, the court erred in granting AutoReturn's motion for summary adjudication of ACT's ninth cause of action.

[28] Through inadvertence or clerical error, the summary judgment order referred to ACT's 10th cause of action for "Imposition of Constructive Trust" and 11th cause of action for "Equitable Lien" as ACT's eighth and ninth causes of action, respectively, stating: "ACT's counts 8 and 9 alleging a constructive trust or equitable lien fail as a matter of law as each is a remedy and not a cause[] of action."

AUTORETURN AND THE CITY'S APPEAL

I. Trial Court's Jurisdiction to Consider AutoReturn's Request for Attorney Fees Against ACT Under Section 3426.4

AutoReturn's contention that the court erred in ruling it lacked jurisdiction to consider AutoReturn's request for attorney fees under section 3426.4 against ACT has merit.[29] The court found that "ACT's and DTS's decision to drag City [*128] and AutoReturn into the case was made without any admissible evidence (as opposed to rumor, suspicion, and speculation) of any wrongdoing by City and AutoReturn, and was thus objectively unreasonable and in bad faith." However, the court denied AutoReturn's motion for attorney fees under section 3426.4 as to ACT on the ground it lacked jurisdiction to award fees because ACT had dismissed its trade secret cause of action.

As noted, after a voluntary dismissal of an action under Code of Civil Procedure section 581 the trial court lacks jurisdiction to act further in the action except to award costs and statutory attorney fees [*129] . (Harris v. Billings, supra, 16 Cal.App.4th at p. 1405.) Section 3426.4 provides, in relevant part: "If a claim of misappropriation is made in bad faith . . . the court may award reasonable attorney's fees and costs to the prevailing party."

It is clear under case law that a defendant to a claim for misappropriation of trade secrets may be deemed a prevailing party under section 3426.4 when the plaintiff voluntarily dismisses the claim. In SASCO v. Rosendin Electric, Inc. (2012) 207 Cal.App.4th 837, 143 Cal. Rptr. 3d 828, a former employer sued form employees and a competitor for misappropriation of trade secrets and other causes of action. (Id. at pp. 840-841.) After the defendants filed a motion for summary judgment the plaintiff dismissed its action, including a cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets, without having filed opposition to the summary judgment motion. (Id. at p. 842.) Defendants then successfully moved for attorney fees and costs under section 3426.4. (Id. at pp. 842-843.) On appeal the plaintiff challenged the trial court's ruling that its trade secret claim was objectively specious, but did not challenge the court's finding that the defendants were prevailing parties under section 3426.4. (Id. at p. 845.) The Court of Appeal affirmed the award of fees and costs. (Id. at p. 849.)

In Cypress, the plaintiff voluntarily dismissed its action for misappropriation of trade secrets and the Court of Appeal upheld the trial [*130] court's finding that the defendants were prevailing parties under section 3426.4. (Cypress, supra, 236 Cal.App.4th at p. 253.) The Court of Appeal observed that "[a] statute predicating an entitlement to fees solely or predominantly on status as the prevailing party will inevitably raise the question of why a party achieving only an arguable or equivocal victory should be permitted to recoup fees from an opponent. The analogous question here is why a party who has made a trade secret claim in bad faith should be permitted to inflict the costs of defense on his or her opponent. Given the manifest legislative intention to avoid such impositions, [section 3426.4] would seem to warrant a liberal construction of 'prevailing party,' trusting in the 'bad faith' requirement to filter out doubtful cases." (Id. at p. 254.)

Thus, ACT's voluntary dismissal of its cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets did not deprive the court of jurisdiction to award AutoReturn attorney fees under section 3426.4 against ACT. We will remand the matter to the trial court to reconsider AutoReturn's motion for attorney fees and costs against ACT under section 3426.4.

II. Denial of AutoReturn's Request for an Award of Expert Witness Fees Against DTS

[29] Although AutoReturn's notice of motion for attorney fees identifies the moving parties as both AutoReturn and the City, their argument heading regarding fees under section 3426.4 states that ACT and DTS "must compensate AutoReturn for attorney fees spent in response to trade secret claims brought in bad faith under . . . [section] 3426.4." (Capitalization omitted.) AutoReturn and the City's briefs in this appeal argue only that the court erred in not awarding attorney fees under section 3426.4 to AutoReturn against ACT. We view this challenge to the court's denial of fees against ACT to be limited to the denial as to AutoReturn only, and not as to the City.

AutoReturn contends that under section 3426.4, the court erred in denying it [*131] $36,500 in costs it paid for the services of Dr. Howard Cohen, a software engineering expert that AutoReturn retained.[30] As noted, section 3426.4 provides that recoverable costs under that statute "shall include a reasonable sum to cover the services of expert witnesses, who are not regular employees of any party, actually incurred and reasonably necessary in either, or both, preparation for trial or arbitration, or during trial or arbitration, of the case by the prevailing party." AutoReturn contends that under this language, an award of the fees it paid Cohen was mandatory.

AutoReturn did not request recovery of Cohen's fees in its motion for attorney fees and costs under section 3426.4; it listed Cohen's fees as a cost under "Other" on its memorandum of costs. DTS challenged AutoReturn request for Cohen's fees in a motion to tax AutoReturn's costs. DTS argued that the $55,246.66 in total costs that AutoReturn requested in its memorandum of costs, including $36,050.00 for Cohen's services, should be reduced to $10,182.42. Regarding Cohen's fees, DTS argued: "There does not appear to be a reasonable basis for Defendants [*132] to have spent $36,000 on a computer expert in this case. However, without a breakdown of the time the expert purportedly spent on the case, it is impossible for DTS to provide further comment."

In its opposition to DTS's motion to tax costs, AutoReturn represented that Cohen "spent over 100 hours on this case reviewing pleadings and other case materials, reading hundreds of pages of documents produced by DTS, learning the ins-and-outs of both AutoReturn's and DTS's software platforms, conducting a five-day extensive review of DTS's software in August 2012, and preparing an expert report for trial." The court granted DTS's request to reduce AutoReturn's costs and awarded AutoReturn costs of $10,182.42. The court did not explain the reduction other than stating that it found DTS's "attack justified to the extent reflected [in DTS's memorandum of points and authorities in support of its motion to tax costs]."

"If the items appearing in a cost bill appear to be proper charges, the burden is on the party seeking to tax costs to show that were not reasonable or necessary. On the other hand, if the items are properly objected to, they are put in issue and the burden of proof is on the party [*133] claiming them as costs. [Citations.] Whether a cost item was reasonably necessary to the litigation presents a question of fact for the trial court and its decision is reviewed for abuse of discretion." (Ladas v. California State Auto. Assn. (1993) 19 Cal. App. 4th 761, 774, 23 Cal. Rptr. 2d 810.)

"[T]he mere filing of a motion to tax costs may be a 'proper objection' to an item, the necessity of which appears doubtful, or which does not appear to be proper on its face. [Citation.] However, '[i]f the items appear to be proper charges the verified memorandum is prima facie evidence that the costs, expenses and services therein listed were necessarily incurred by the defendant [citations], and the burden of showing that an item is not properly chargeable or is unreasonable is upon the [objecting party].'" (Nelson v. Anderson (1999) 72 Cal.App.4th 111, 131, 84 Cal. Rptr. 2d 753.)

We conclude the court did not abuse its discretion in denying AutoReturn Cohen's expert fees as costs. DTS's objection to Cohen's fees designated as "other" costs was proper because the necessity of that item was doubtful—i.e., the necessity was unclear on the face of the cost memorandum. Thus, the burden of proving the cost was proper or reasonably necessary fell on AutoReturn.

The trial court could reasonably find that AutoReturn failed to meet its burden of proving Cohen's services [*134] were reasonably necessary in the preparation for trial under section 3426.4. Cohen's declarations filed in opposition to DTS's motion to tax costs and support of AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment against DTS indicate Cohen was retained as a consultant. He was not deposed as an expert designated to testify at trial. Cohen's declaration showed he performed the vast majority of his work on the case after AutoReturn and the City filed their motion for summary judgment in June 2012 and while the hearing on that motion was pending. The court could reasonably find that it was not reasonably necessary for AutoReturn to incur substantial expert fees before any expert depositions had been set and while its summary judgment motion was pending, especially considering Orion's prior success in moving for summary adjudication of DTS's trade secret claim. DTS points out that AutoReturn cited one paragraph of Cohen's declaration in its separate statement of material facts, and the court did not rely on Cohen's declaration in granting AutoReturn and the City's motion for summary judgment. The court's conclusion that Cohen's services were not reasonably necessary for trial preparation under section 3426.4 did not exceed [*135] the bounds of reason under "'all of the circumstances before it being considered.'" (Denham v. Superior Court (1970) 2 Cal.3d 557, 566, 86 Cal. Rptr. 65, 468 P.2d 193.)

ORION'S APPEAL

I. Denial of Attorney Fees Incurred by Orion's Texas Counsel

Orion contends the court erred in denying attorney fees incurred by its Texas counsel as part of the fee award to Orion under section 3426.4. In its motion for attorney fees under section 3426.4, the total amount Orion requested ($138,631.49) included "the fees and costs charged to Orion by its longtime lawyers in Dallas ($45,536.82)." As summarized by Orion, Texas counsel's "activities included participating in strategy discussions, providing information and documents to California counsel, and reviewing pleadings and submissions to the California court that were prepared by California counsel." In its opposition to Orion's motion, DTS argued the fees sought by Orion's Texas counsel were not compensable because Texas counsel was not licensed to practice law in California and Orion "utterly failed to explain how their efforts were necessary and not duplicative of the work that was also performed by the attorneys of record in San Diego."

The trial court ruled as follows on Orion's request to recover fees paid to its Texas counsel: "The court declines to [*136] award the fees of Texas counsel, as to do so [would] send a message that it is acceptable for lawyers in other states to practice law in California without pro hac vice admission and make fee applications after having done so." The court added that Birbrower, Montalbano, Condon & Frank v. Superior Court (1998) 17 Cal.4th 119, 70 Cal. Rptr. 2d 304, 949 P.2d 1 (Birbrower) "suggests this is the safest path."

Business and Professions Code section 6125 provides: "No person shall practice law in California unless the person is an active member of the State Bar." Accordingly, the general rule is that no one may recover compensation for attorney services in California unless the person was a member of the State Bar when the services were performed. (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.4th at p. 136; Golba v. Dick's Sporting Goods, Inc. (2015) 238 Cal.App.4th 1251, 1261, 190 Cal. Rptr. 3d 337.)

In Birbrower, attorneys at a New York firm that had no California-licensed attorneys traveled to California on multiple occasions to resolve a contract dispute between their California client and a computer software company. (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.App.4th at pp. 124-125.) The New York firm filed an arbitration demand against the software company in San Francisco, but the parties settled their dispute before hearings commenced. (Id. at p. 125.) The firm's California client later sued the firm for malpractice, and the firm filed a cross-complaint to recover fees under a fee agreement. (Id. at p. 126.) The trial court dismissed the firm's claim for fees, ruling that [*137] the firm was not authorized to practice law in California. (Ibid.) The Court of Appeal agreed and denied the petition for writ of mandate and affirmed the trial court's order. (Id. at p. 127.)

The Supreme Court in Birbrower concluded that the New York attorneys had engaged in unauthorized practice of law in California and could not recover fees for legal services performed in California for the California client. (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.4th at p. 135.) However, the Birbrower concluded that New York counsel may be able to recover fees under a fee agreement with a California client for legal services it performed in New York "to the extent they did not constitute practicing law in California . . . ." (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.4th at p. 137, italics added.) The corollary to that conclusion is that out-of-state counsel may not recover fees for legal services performed for a client if those services constitute practicing law in California, regardless of where the services were performed.

The Birbrower court noted that case law defines the statutory term "practice law" as ""the doing and performing services in a court of justice in any matter depending therein throughout its various stages and in conformity with the adopted rules of procedure."" (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.4th at p. 128.) The practice of law also [*138] includes "legal advice and legal instrument and contract preparation, whether or not these subjects were rendered in the course of litigation." (Ibid.) Although Business and Professions Code section 6125 does not define what it means to practice law "in California," the Birbrower court stated that "the practice of law 'in California' entails sufficient contact with a California client to render the nature of the legal service a clear legal representation. . . . The primary inquiry is whether the unlicensed lawyer engaged in sufficient activities in the state, or created a continuing relationship with the California client that included legal duties and obligations." (Birbrower, at p. 128.)

The Birbrower court explained that its definition of the practice of law "in California" "does not necessarily depend on or require the unlicensed lawyer's physical presence in the state. Physical presence [in California] is one factor [courts] may consider in deciding whether the unlicensed lawyer has violated [Business and Professions Code] section 6125, but it is by no means exclusive. For example, one may practice law in the state in violation of [Business and Professions Code] section 6125 although not physically present here by advising a California client on California law in connection with a California legal dispute by telephone, fax, [*139] computer, or other modern technological means." (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.4th at pp. 128-129.) However, the Birbrower court rejected "the notion that a person automatically practices law 'in California' whenever that person practices California law anywhere or 'virtually' enters the state by telephone, fax, e-mail, or satellite." (Ibid.) The Supreme Court concluded that courts "must decide each case on its individual facts." (Ibid.)

We conclude that the trial court properly denied Orion recovery of the fees its Texas counsel incurred because the services that Texas counsel performed constitute the practice of law in California. The services for which Orion seeks compensation unquestionably constitute a "clear legal representation" arising from a continuing relationship that included legal duties and obligations. (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.4th at p. 128.) The question is whether with respect to this case, Orion is properly viewed as a "California client" despite the fact it is a Texas corporation. We recognize that for purposes of determining whether the provision of legal services constitutes practicing law in California, the Court of Appeal in Estate of Condon (1998) 65 Cal.App.4th 1138, 76 Cal. Rptr. 2d 922 defined "California client" as a client "that either resides in or has its principle place of business in California." [*140] (Id. at p. 1145.) We believe, however, that it may be appropriate to view an out-of-state entity involved in litigation in California arising from the entity's activities in California as a California client with respect to legal services provided to the entity in connection with the California litigation. The purpose of Business and Professions Code section 6125 is to protect California citizens from incompetent attorneys who are not trained, examined, and licensed to provide representation and legal advice in California. (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.4th at p. 132; Condon, supra, 65 Cal.App.4th at p. 1146.) We see no reason why an out-of-state person or entity with sufficient contacts with California to be sued in California is any less deserving of the protection from unauthorized practice of law in California than a California citizen.

Although Orion is a Texas corporation, for purposes of Business and Professions Code section 6125 and with respect to the instant litigation, we view Orion as a California client because it was sued in California under California law for alleged wrongdoing arising from business activities it conducted in California. Accordingly, Orion's Texas counsel's services in connection with this case constituted the practice of law in California because they entailed sufficient contact with a California client to render the nature of [*141] the legal service a clear legal representation, and Texas counsel undisputedly had a continuing relationship with Orion that included legal duties and obligations. (Birbrower, supra, 17 Cal.4th at p. 128.)

To the extent Orion's Texas counsel performed services for Orion that did not require them to be licensed in California or obtain pro hac vice status, the services are not compensable under section 3426.4. Birbrower is distinguishable from the present case because the out-of-state law firm in Birbrower sought fees under its fee agreement with the client, whereas Orion seeks fees against DTS as a sanction under a fee-shifting statute. An award of attorney fees under a fee-shifting statute like section 3426.4 authorizes compensation only for attorney services reasonably necessary to the conduct of the litigation. (Code Civ. Proc., § 1033.5, subdivision (c)(2) & (5); Robertson v. Fleetwood Travel Trailers of California, Inc. (2006) 144 Cal.App.4th 785, 817-818, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 731 [prevailing party seeking attorney fees under section 1794 of the Song-Beverly Consumer Warranty Act has the burden of showing the fees incurred were reasonably necessary to the conduct of the litigation].) Attorney services that are reasonably necessary to the prosecution or defense of a California action necessarily require California licensure. (See Cal. Rules of Court, rule 9.48(f) [permitting out-of-state attorney under certain conditions "to provide legal assistance or [*142] legal services concerning only a transaction or other nonlitigation matter"].) Accordingly, any services that Orion's Texas counsel provided in connection with the instant litigation were either not reasonably necessary to the conduct of the litigation or required pro hac vice status to be compensable. The court did not err in denying Orion recovery of attorney fees incurred by its Texas counsel.

DISPOSITION

The portion of the amended judgment entered on February 28, 2013, dismissing DTS's second amended cross-complaint with prejudice as to Orion, DeLatte, and the City and entering judgment in their favor is affirmed. The portion of the amended judgment, dismissing DTS's second amended cross-complaint with prejudice as to AutoReturn and entering judgment in AutoReturn's favor is reversed. The portion of the September 24, 2012 order granting AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment or, alternatively, summary adjudication of the fifth and six causes of action of DTS's second amended cross-complaint is vacated. The court is directed to enter a new order denying the motion for summary judgment as to AutoReturn, denying the motion for summary adjudication as to the fifth cause of action, [*143] and granting the motion for summary adjudication as to the sixth cause of action.

The portion of the amended judgment in favor of AutoReturn on ACT's fourth amended complaint based on the court's granting of AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment is reversed. The portion of the June 8, 2012 order granting AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment or, alternatively, summary adjudication of the seventh through 14th, 18th, and 21st causes of action of ACT's fourth amended complaint is vacated. The court is directed to enter a new order denying the motion for summary judgment and motion for summary adjudication as to the seventh, eighth, and ninth causes of action of action and the voluntarily dismissed 18th cause of action, and granting the motion for summary adjudication as to the 10th through 14th causes of action and 21st cause of action.

The portion of the September 24, 2012 order granting Orion's motion for attorney fees and costs against DTS under section 3426.4 is affirmed and the portion of the amended judgment awarding those fees and costs is affirmed. The portion of the December 31, 2012 order granting the City and AutoReturn's motion for attorney fees under section 3426.4 as to DTS is affirmed and the [*144] portion of the amended judgment awarding those fees is affirmed. The portion of the December 31, 2012 order denying AutoReturn's motion for attorney fees and costs under section 3426.4 as to ACT is reversed with directions to reconsider the motion as to ACT light of the views expressed in this opinion. The portion of the May 10, 2013 order granting in part DTS's motion to tax costs and reducing the City and AutoReturn's claimed costs to $10,182.41 is affirmed.

The portion of the July 6, 2012 order denying DTS's motion to file documents under seal; the portion of the September 4, 2012 order denying DTS's motions filed on June 29, 2012, to file documents under seal; the September 13, 2012 order denying DTS's ex parte application to file documents under seal; and the December 18, 2012 order denying DTS's ex parte application file to seal documents under seal are reversed. The court is directed to enter an order granting DTS's requests to file documents under seal under section 3426.5.

In all other respects the amended judgment is affirmed. The City is awarded its costs on appeal against DTS. ACT is awarded its costs on appeal against AutoReturn. The parties shall otherwise bear their own costs on appeal.

ORDER GRANTING MOTIONS TO DISMISS WITH LEAVE TO AMEND

Re: Dkt. Nos. 25 & 26

INTRODUCTION

Pending before the Court are (1) Defendant Clean Harbors Environmental Services, Inc.'s ("Clean Harbors") Motion to Dismiss and (2) Defendant PaintCare, Inc.'s ("PaintCare") Motion to Dismiss, both pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure ("Rule") 12(b)(6) and joined by Defendant [*2] Stericycle Environmental Solutions ("Stericycle"). Dkt. No. 25 (Clean Harbors Mot.); Dkt. No. 26 (PaintCare Mot.); Dkt. No. 28 (Stericycle Joinder to Mots.). Plaintiff GreenCycle Paint, Inc. ("Plaintiff") filed an Opposition (Dkt. No. 35), and Defendants filed Replies (PaintCare Reply, Dkt. No. 38; Clean Harbors Reply, Dkt. No. 36; Stericycle Joinder to Replies, Dkt. No. 39). Having considered the parties' positions, relevant legal authority, and the record in this case, the Court GRANTS Defendants' Motions WITH LEAVE TO AMEND as discussed below.

BACKGROUND

PaintCare is a non-profit created by the American Coatings Association, which is comprised of companies that manufacture and sell paint. Compl. ¶ 2, Dkt. No. 1-1. It is the only stewardship organization[1] in California approved to implement California's Architectural Paint Recovery Program, Cal. Pub. Res. Code § 48700, et seq. (the "Program"). Id. ¶¶ 7-8. California developed the Program to reduce the generation of leftover paint, promote its reuse and recycling, and properly manage unwanted leftover paint. Id. ¶ 7. PaintCare is the only stewardship organization that submitted a paint stewardship plan to CalRecycle, the state agency responsible for overseeing the Program, [*3] to implement a paint recovery program. Id. ¶ 8. PaintCare works with the other named Defendants, Clean Harbors and Stericycle, who transport post-consumer paint collected under the Program. Id. ¶ 13. The Complaint refers to Clean Harbors and Stericycle as "haulers" for the Program. Id.

Plaintiff GreenCycle was founded in 2012 and was both a processor and manufacturer of latex paint. Id. ¶ 11. It had a latex paint recycling facility that opened in September 2012, in Oakland, California. Id. ¶¶ 11, 15. Prior to its opening, Plaintiff's Chief Executive Officer, Alan Beilke, entered into discussions with PaintCare about participating in the Program as a latex paint processor. Id. ¶¶ 12-14. PaintCare introduced Plaintiff to Stericycle and Clean Harbors and advised Plaintiff to go through these haulers to facilitate receipt of paint under the Program. Id. ¶ 13. Plaintiff was ready to receive and start recycling paint in November 2012. Id. ¶ 15.

Over the next 3 years, Plaintiff tried to get approval from Clean Harbors [*4] and Stericycle to begin recycling paint. Id. ¶¶ 14-25. During that time, Mr. Beilke attempted to arrange audits, which Stericycle and Clean Harbors told Plaintiff were required before it could receive any used paint under the Program. Id. ¶ 14. Plaintiff alleges PaintCare told it that the haulers needed to provide Plaintiff with approval but meanwhile Clean Harbors told Plaintiff to get approval from PaintCare. Id. ¶¶ 13-14. Eventually, in April 2014, Stericycle approved Plaintiff as a recycler for used latex paint hauled by Stericycle, but over the following 8 months after obtaining approval, Plaintiff did not receive any used paint from Stericycle or any other hauler under the Program. Id. ¶ 19. In January 2015 and then March 2015, however, Plaintiff did receive two truckloads of paint under the Program, but was ultimately forced to shut down in April 2015 "after realizing that it was not going to receive paint[.]" Id. ¶ 25.

According to Plaintiff, "although PaintCare represented that it was not involved in determining the recyclers that received shipments of paint under the PaintCare program from the only two haulers, PaintCare was in fact conspiring with the haulers to unfairly [*5] and illegally exclude GreenCycle from the market." Id. ¶ 22. Plaintiff alleges it is not alone in being excluded from this market by the Defendants, noting that another used paint processor in Dixon, California was likewise told it would never receive paint from PaintCare. Id. ¶ 23. Thus Plaintiff alleges Defendants entered into an agreement "to prevent additional recycling facilities from entering the market[,]" and instead "shipped used latex paint to facilities they owned and/or controlled[.]" Id. ¶¶ 30, 31. Plaintiff alleges it lost profits and was forced to shut down as a result of Defendants' actions. Id. ¶ 31.

Plaintiff filed this action in the Superior Court of California, County of Alameda, on August 3, 2015, alleging claims for (1) unfair competition against Defendants;[2] (2) aiding and abetting unfair competition against Stericycle and Clean Harbors; (3) a violation of California's Cartwright Act; and (4) fraud. Compl. ¶¶ 29-48. Clean Harbors subsequently removed this action to this Court on the basis of diversity on September 4, 2015. Dkt. No. 1. All Defendants now challenge Plaintiff's Complaint, contending Plaintiff is unable to state a claim against them.

LEGAL STANDARD

Rule 8(a) requires that a complaint contain a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). A complaint must therefore provide a defendant with "fair notice" of the claims against it and the grounds for relief. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (internal quotations and citation omitted).

A court may dismiss a complaint under Rule 12(b)(6) when it does not contain enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Id. at 570. "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). "The plausibility standard is not akin to a 'probability requirement,' but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557). "While a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more [*7] than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (internal citations and parentheticals omitted).

In considering a motion to dismiss, a court must accept all of the plaintiff's allegations as true and construe them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. Id. at 550; Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93-94, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081 (2007); Vasquez v. L.A. County, 487 F.3d 1246, 1249 (9th Cir. 2007). In addition, courts may consider documents attached to the complaint. Parks Sch. of Bus., Inc. v. Symington, 51 F.3d 1480, 1484 (9th Cir. 1995) (citation omitted).

If a Rule 12(b)(6) motion is granted, the "court should grant leave to amend even if no request to amend the pleading was made, unless it determines that the pleading could not possibly be cured by the allegation of other facts." Lopez v. Smith, 203 F.3d 1122, 1127 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc) (internal quotations and citations omitted). However, the Court may deny leave to amend for a number of reasons, including "undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive on the part of the movant, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, undue prejudice to the opposing party by virtue of allowance of the amendment, [and] futility of amendment." Eminence Capital, LLC v. Aspeon, Inc., 316 F.3d 1048, 1052 (9th Cir. 2003) (citing Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 182, 83 S. Ct. 227, 9 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1962)).

DISCUSSION

Defendants challenge all four of Plaintiff's claims. First, PaintCare argues [*8] Plaintiff's claims are barred by the Safe Harbor Provision of Public Resources Code section 48706, which it contends protects it from Plaintiff's UCL

[2] Although the Complaint [*6] does not identify Plaintiff's unfair competition claim as one made under California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), California Business and Professions Code section 17200, the parties appear to be in agreement that the UCL is the statute that forms the basis this claim.

and Cartwright Act claims. PaintCare Mot. at 6-7. Neither Stericycle nor Clean Harbors suggest they are protected under the Safe Harbor Provision[3] but instead attack Plaintiff's claims on their merits. PaintCare likewise challenges the separate claims and the supporting allegations.

As an initial matter, no court, neither state nor federal, has previously considered this particular Safe Harbor Provision or interpreted its limitations or exceptions. The parties did not submit any legislative history or other materials to assist the Court in considering the provision's applicability in this instance. In any event, as noted below, the Court has not found that Plaintiff presently states a claim for either its Cartwright Act or UCL claims. Accordingly, the Court does not reach the issue of whether the Safe Harbor Provision applies; however, as described below, the Court has granted Plaintiff leave to amend its claims. Accordingly, should Plaintiff choose to amend, in the next round [*9] of briefing the Court expects the parties to provide more legislative history and other materials about this Safe Harbor Provision that may assist the Court in interpreting the statute.

The Court now addresses Defendants' challenges to Plaintiff's individual claims.

A. Cartwright Act Claim

Defendants seek dismissal of Plaintiff's claim under California's Cartwright Act, which makes unlawful any agreements having the effect of restraining trade. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 16720, et seq. The Cartwright Act makes unlawful a "trust," defined as a combination of capital, skill, or acts by two or more persons or businesses to restrict trade, limit production, increase or fix prices, or prevent competition. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 16702, 16720 et seq. The California Supreme Court has stated that the purpose of the Cartwright Act is to prevent any action which "has as its purpose or effect an unreasonable restraint of trade." Corwin v. L.A. Newspaper Serv. Bureau, Inc., 22 Cal. 3d 302, 314, 148 Cal. Rptr. 918, 583 P.2d 777 (1978) (emphasis in original) (citations omitted); Theme Promotions, Inc. v. News Am. Mktg. FSI, 546 F.3d 991, 1000 (9th Cir. 2008) (recognizing same).

Defendants oppose Plaintiff's Cartwright Act claim by contending, among other things, that there are alternative, innocent explanations for the actions listed in Plaintiff's Complaint and that Plaintiff has made conclusory allegations that fall short of showing an antitrust violation. See [*10] PaintCare Mot. 8-12; Clean Harbors Mot. at 6. Plaintiff, in turn, contends it "has pleaded with particularity the existence of an agreement between the defendants to exclude GreenCycle from receiving shipments of paint under the Architectural Paint Recovery Program." Opp'n at 7. According to Plaintiff, "[t]he complaint sufficiently alleges a group boycott involving GreenCycle's competitors, which is a per se violation of the Cartwright Act." Id. But additionally, Plaintiff notes the Complaint also alleges a vertical restraint of trade claim[4] under the Cartwright Act, noting "even if the court were to ignore the fact that the defendant-haulers also operate facilities that receive and process post-consumer paint under the Program, the allegations show an attempt by entities that operated at different levels of distribution to restrain trade." Id. at 9. Plaintiff asserts "defendants sought to limit competition in order to suppress the amount of paint in the marketplace, which competes with newly manufactured paint supplied by the members of the American Coatings Association, the entity behind PaintCare." Id. (citing Compl. ¶¶ 2, 40).

[3] Stericycle explicitly notes that provision does "not apply to Stericycle." Stericycle Joinder at 1-2.

[4] Antitrust law differentiates between vertical and horizontal price [*11] restraints. "Restraints imposed by agreement between competitors have traditionally been denominated as horizontal restraints, and those imposed by agreement between firms at different levels of distribution as vertical restraints." Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 730, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988) (footnote omitted). With limited exceptions, horizontal agreements are per se unlawful, whereas vertical restraints are unlawful only if an assessment of market effects, known as the "rule of reason" analysis, reveals they unreasonably restrain trade. See Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 886, 907, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007) (citations omitted); see also McGlinchy v. Shell Chem. Co., 845 F.2d 802, 811 n.3 (9th Cir. 1988) (recognizing that generally "[t]he per se analysis is applied to practices that are presumptively illegal, such as. . . group boycotts and concerted refusals to deal . . . ." (emphasis added; citations omitted)).

As the Ninth Circuit has recognized, "[t]he analysis under [the Cartwright Act] mirrors the analysis under federal law because [it] was modeled after the Sherman Act." Cty. of Tuolumne v. Sonora Cmty. Hosp., 236 F.3d 1148, 1160 (9th Cir. 2001) (citations omitted); Name.Space, Inc. v. Internet Corp. for Assigned Names & Numbers, 795 F.3d 1124, 1131 n.5 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Because analysis under the Cartwright Act is identical to that under the Sherman Act, we also affirm the district court's dismissal of the Cartwright Act claim."). Accordingly, "California courts" demand a "high degree of particularity in the pleading of Cartwright Act violations." [*12] Facebook Inc. v. Power Ventures, Inc., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103662, 2009 WL 3429568, at *2 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 22, 2009) (quotation omitted) (discussing and applying Twombly to Cartwright claims). "It is not enough merely to include conclusory allegations that certain actions were the result of a conspiracy; the plaintiff must allege facts that make the conclusion plausible." Name.Space, 795 F.3d at 1129 (citing Kendall v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 518 F.3d 1042, 1047-48 (9th Cir. 2008)). "This standard does not impose a 'probability requirement,' but 'simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556).

As such, "Cartwright Act claims are properly dismissed 'where the complaint makes conclusory allegations of a combination and does not allege with factual particularity that separate entities maintaining separate and independent interests combined for the purpose to restrain trade.'" In re Netflix Antitrust Litig., 506 F. Supp. 2d 308, 320 (N.D. Cal. 2007) (quoting Freeman v. San Diego Assn. of Realtors, 77 Cal. App. 4th 171, 189, 91 Cal. Rptr. 2d 534 (1999)). Among other things, when faced with two possible explanations for a defendant's behavior, a plaintiff cannot offer allegations that are "merely consistent with" their favored explanation but are also consistent with the defendant's alternative explanation. In re Century Aluminum Co. Sec. Litig., 729 F.3d 1104, 1108 (9th Cir. 2013) (citing Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678). "Something more is needed, such as facts tending to exclude the possibility that the alternative explanation is true, . . . in order to render plaintiffs' allegations [*13] plausible within the meaning of Iqbal and Twombly." Id. But where a plaintiff's allegations are stuck in "neutral territory," i.e., they do not tend to exclude the innocent explanation, such allegations fall short of what Iqbal and Twombly require. See id. at 1108-10 (affirming dismissal of Securities Act claim where plaintiffs' allegations were "merely consistent with both their explanation and the defendants' competing explanation"); see also Gonzalez v. Planned Parenthood of L.A., 759 F.3d 1112, 1116 (9th Cir. 2014), cert. denied sub nom. Gonzalez v. Planned Parenthood of L.A., Cal., 135 S. Ct. 2313, 191 L. Ed. 2d 1001 (2015) (affirming dismissal where plaintiff's allegation that defendant knowingly submitted false claims was only "merely possible rather than plausible," and could not overcome the plausible and obvious explanation that defendant did not knowingly submit false claims (quotation omitted; emphasis in original)); Eclectic Props. E., LLC v. Marcus & Millichap Co., 751 F.3d 990, 996 (9th Cir. 2014) (explaining that courts "must consider" "obvious alternative explanation[s]" for a defendant's behavior when analyzing plausibility); Somers v. Apple, Inc., 729 F.3d 953, 965 (9th Cir. 2013) (affirming dismissal of antitrust claim in part due to an obvious alternative explanation for music pricing).

Plaintiff assigns a nefarious motive to the fact that Defendants worked very little with Plaintiff since it was established, but this motive and any related agreement are not supported by plausible allegations [*14] at this point. First, Plaintiff has not adequately alleged a conspiracy exists. See William O. Gilley Enters., Inc. v. Atl. Richfield Co., 588 F.3d 659, 663 (9th Cir. 2009) ("Whether a plaintiff pursues a per se claim or a rule of reason claim . . . , the first requirement is to allege a 'contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy.'").[5] Identifying the existence and nature of a conspiracy requires determining whether the evidence "reasonably tends to prove that the [defendant] and others had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective." Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct.

[5] As indicated in the previous footnote, antitrust plaintiffs may prosecute claims "under one of two theories [*15] of liability." Solyndra Residual Tr., by & through Neilson v. Suntech Power Holdings Co., 62 F. Supp. 3d 1027, 1039 (N.D. Cal. 2014). "First, under the rule of reason," where "the factfinder 'weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition.'" Id. (quoting Leegin Creative Leather Prods, 551 U.S. at 885). "Second, antitrust plaintiffs can allege that a restraint is illegal per se because it is 'so plainly anticompetitive that no elaborate study of the industry is needed to establish their illegality.'" Id. (quoting National Soc. of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 692, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978)).

1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984) (internal quotation marks omitted). Parallel action is not, by itself, sufficient to prove the existence of a conspiracy; such behavior could be the result of "coincidence, independent responses to common stimuli, or mere interdependence unaided by an advance understanding among the parties." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556 n.4 (internal quotation marks omitted). On a motion to dismiss, a plaintiff's complaint must provide "plausible grounds to infer an agreement[,]" which "simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement." Id. at 556; 564.

Plaintiff has alleged that Defendants formed a conspiracy through a group boycott to exclude competitors, including Plaintiff, from the market. Opp'n at 7. But Plaintiff has not plausibility alleged that it competed with Defendants. While Plaintiff alleges the hauler Defendants and Plaintiff were competitors, the closest it comes to supporting this claim is the allegation the hauler Defendants "shipped used latex paint to facilities they owned and/or controlled[.]" Compl. ¶ 31. But Defendants undermine this motive by submitting judicially noticeable documents showing that none of the hauler Defendants processed latex paint (the only type of paint Plaintiff processed); rather, the hauler [*16] Defendants only process oil-based paints. Req. For Judicial Notice ("RJN"), Ex. C at 13, Dkt. No. 26-4; Ex. E at 19, Dkt. No. 26-6.[6] No other facts support that these hauler Defendants and Plaintiff were competitors.

And there are no allegations showing Plaintiff and PaintCare [*17] were competitors. PaintCare contends it "has no interest in any recycling facility," PaintCare Reply at 10, and the only allegation Plaintiff provides in support is the statement that "defendants sought to limit competition in order to suppress the amount of paint in the marketplace, which competes with newly manufactured paint supplied by the members of the American Coatings Association, the entity behind PaintCare." Id.; Compl. ¶¶ 2, 40. Plaintiff does not explain how this allegation fits with its other arguments, however—particularly as related to the hauler Defendants, whom Plaintiff has alleged wanted to exclude competitors so that they could keep Plaintiff's potential share of the market, which in turn would seem to maintain the amount of recycled paint in the market and likewise create a disincentive for PaintCare to direct business to those haulers—the opposite of what Plaintiff has alleged. Additionally, this allegation lacks plausibility as it appears to run counter to the whole purpose of PaintCare's mission under the Program and for which CalRecycle has selected PaintCare. Perhaps there are more facts Plaintiff can allege to support its claims but at this point Plaintiff's [*18] allegations that Defendants competed with Plaintiff and thus formed a conspiracy to exclude Plaintiff from the market lack plausibility.

Even under Plaintiff's second theory that Defendants formed a vertical restraint of trade, its allegations still do not provide enough factual matter for the Court to infer a conspiracy between Defendants. Ultimately, as the Ninth Circuit explained, courts "cannot infer a conspiracy based on speculation that [defendants] must have conspired to restrain trade simply because the system they adopted made it difficult for [the plaintiff] to carry out its business plans." Name.Space, 795 F.3d at 1131 (footnote omitted). This is particularly true when there have been ongoing relationships with coworkers and where the plaintiff business is comparatively untested. See id. ("We cannot infer an illegal agreement with outside interests simply because ICANN's rational business decisions favor the status quo rather than name.space's untested alternative business model.").

Second, and along the same lines, there are potentially innocent explanations for Defendants' conduct. As PaintCare points out, "plaintiff does not allege any facts that would exclude the possibility that the defendants made [*19] this decision [not to work with Plaintiff] based upon (1) GreenCycle's lack of any prior experience in [6] Pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 201(b)(2), PaintCare requests the Court take judicial notice of various documents, including Exhibits C and E, which are PaintCare's Annual Reports from 2013 and 2014 respectively. Dkt. No. 26-1. Plaintiff did not object to PaintCare's request for judicial notice and even relied on these two Annual Reports in its Opposition. See Opp'n at 3. The Court has reviewed Exhibits C and E and agrees with PaintCare that it may properly take judicial notice of them as information available in the public record and obtained from government websites. See MGIC Indem. Corp. v. Weisman, 803 F.2d 500, 504 (9th Cir. 1986) ("On a motion to dismiss, we may take judicial notice of matters of public record outside the pleadings." (citation omitted)); see also *Preciado v. Wells Fargo Home Mortg., 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65835, 2013 WL 1899929, at 3 (N.D. Cal. May 7, 2013) (taking judicial notice of information available on official government websites). The Court does not rely on the other exhibits for which PaintCare requested judicial notice and as such will not take judicial notice of them at this time.

recycling latex paint, see Compl. ¶ 15, and (2) defendants' existing track record of success with the other paint recyclers." PaintCare Mot. at 9-10. Although Plaintiff argues Name.Space and related cases requiring consideration of alternative, innocent explanations are inapposite because Plaintiff's Complaint explicitly alleges the existence of a conspiracy, see Opp'n at 10, this argument misses the point. Simply providing a conclusory allegation that a conspiracy exists is not enough—there must be plausible factual allegations on which to substantiate such a conspiracy. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (holding that a threadbare assertion of an unlawful agreement is a "legal conclusion" not entitled to an assumption of truth); William O. Gilley Enters., 588 F.3d at 659 ("claimants must plead not just ultimate facts (such as a conspiracy), but evidentiary facts" in support of the elements of their claims). Plaintiff's current allegations do not tend to exclude the innocent, competing explanations, rendering its Cartwright Act claim unsustainable.

Finally, Plaintiff's theory of antitrust injury is unclear. "[T]he Cartwright Act, like all antitrust laws, is about [*20] the protection of competition, not competitors." Asahi Kasei Pharma Corp. v. CoTherix, Inc., 204 Cal. App. 4th 1, 20, 138 Cal. Rptr. 3d 620 (2012) (internal quotations and citations omitted; emphasis in original). While Plaintiff alleges facts supporting that it suffered injuries personally, it is unclear how Plaintiff alleges Defendants' conduct injured competition. See Brantley v. NBC Universal, Inc., 675 F.3d 1192, 1198 (9th Cir. 2012) ("[P]laintiffs must plead an injury to competition beyond the impact on the plaintiffs themselves." (citing McGlinchy, 845 F.2d at 811)). Plaintiff suggests that because it alleges a group boycott claim, it "does not need to allege market-wide injury to competition." Opp'n at 7. This is not the case. Even if Plaintiff were able to make out a group boycott claim, i.e., a per se antitrust violation, "the antitrust injury requirement applies to cases alleging conduct that is per se unlawful as well as to cases governed by the rule of reason." Flagship Theatres of Palm Desert, LLC v. Century Theatres, Inc., 198 Cal. App. 4th 1366, 1378, 131 Cal. Rptr. 3d 519 (2011), as modified on denial of reh'g (Sept. 29, 2011); see also Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 341, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990)) (rejecting "suggestion that no antitrust injury need be shown where a per se violation is involved").

The question then is whether Plaintiff has otherwise articulated a theory of antitrust injury in its Complaint. "Antitrust injury is made up of four elements: '(1) unlawful conduct, (2) causing an injury to the plaintiff, (3) that flows from that which [*21] makes the conduct unlawful, and (4) that is of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent.'" Glen Holly Entm't, Inc. v. Tektronix, Inc., 352 F.3d 367, 372 (9th Cir. 2003) (quotation omitted). The Ninth Circuit has also added a fifth requirement, that the injured party be "a participant in the same market as the alleged malefactors . . . In other words, the party alleging the injury must be either a consumer of the alleged violator's goods or services or a competitor of the alleged violator in the restrained market." Id. (quotations omitted). "The antitrust injury requirement ensures that a plaintiff can recover only if the loss stems from a competition-reducing aspect or effect of the defendant's behavior." Flagship Theatres, 198 Cal. App. 4th at 1379 (emphasis in original) (quoting Atl. Richfield Co., 495 U.S. at 344). For instance, "[v]ertical agreements that foreclose competitors from entering or competing in a market can injure competition by reducing the competitive threat those competitors would pose." Id. Additionally, "[s]ome types of vertical agreements can also injure competition by facilitating horizontal collusion." Id.

As noted above, Plaintiff has not alleged plausible allegations that Defendants formed a conspiracy to foreclose Plaintiff from entering the market, and there are no allegations plausibly supporting that Defendants [*22] and Plaintiff were competitors, which would give them a motive to restrict Plaintiff's access to the market. Again, the closest Plaintiff comes to alleging facts in support of such an argument is that "defendants sought to limit competition in order to suppress the amount of paint in the marketplace, which competes with newly manufactured paint supplied by the members of the American Coatings Association, the entity behind PaintCare." Opp'n at 9; see Compl. ¶¶ 2, 40. But Plaintiff's Complaint lacks adequate factual background to be able to understand how Defendants might have suppressed the amount of paint in the marketplace, or how this theory correlates with Plaintiff's other theory that the hauler Defendants wanted more recycling/processing business for themselves. The Court will not speculate in the face of presently unclear allegations about if and how both of these theories may co-exist. Moreover, there are no facts showing how Plaintiff's presence in the market might have otherwise increased the amount of paint available to consumers. Finally, Plaintiff asserts "defendants increased the cost to consumers through increased transportation costs for recycling and processing paint," [*23] Opp'n at 11, but Plaintiff has not explained how consumers interact with Defendants or how Defendants might pass along the costs to consumers.

Even assuming Plaintiff can ultimately allege facts supporting an antitrust violation, Plaintiff must clearly articulate how the violation harms competition and how the system at issue works; it has not done so at this point.

Given the foregoing, the Court cannot find Plaintiff has stated a claim against Defendants for a Cartwright Act claim at this time and dismisses this claim. However, the Court will grant Plaintiff leave to amend so that it may more clearly articulate its antitrust theory and what plausible facts support the elements of its claim. In doing so, Plaintiff should be particularly mindful that "[w]hen considering plausibility, courts must also consider an 'obvious alternative explanation' for defendant's behavior." Eclectic Props., 751 F.3d at 996 (quotation omitted). Plaintiff may also add its claims for all available relief under the Cartwright Act. See Opp'n at 11 (requesting leave to amend to include prayer for treble damages and attorneys' fees).

B. Fraud

Defendants next challenge Plaintiff's fraud claim, contending (1) Plaintiff's claim is not pled with the requisite [*24] particularity under Rule 9(b); and (2) Plaintiff has not plausibly alleged Defendants misrepresented a fact or that Plaintiff justifiably relied on any of their purported misrepresentations. PaintCare Mot. at 12-15; Clean Harbors Mot. at 3-5. PaintCare points out that Plaintiff alleges PaintCare told it in April 2012 that there would be enough latex paint such that Plaintiff would have no problem receiving paint under the program. PaintCare Mot. at 13 (citing Compl. ¶ 2). But PaintCare also points out that it made this statement before Plaintiff even built its recycling facility, and furthermore, "[a]s alleged in the Complaint, in every subsequent communication with the plaintiff, PaintCare stated that GreenCycle would not receive shipments of paint unless its recycling facility was approved by the haulers." Id. (citing Compl. ¶¶ 13-14, 17-18, 21, 24). PaintCare emphasizes Plaintiff's allegations that PaintCare expressed "a pessimistic view of GreenCycle's chances of obtaining approval from Stericycle." Id. at 14 (quoting Compl. ¶ 17). It notes that while Plaintiff may not have believed PaintCare's statements at the time, Plaintiff's "refusal to accept PaintCare's warnings certainly cannot sustain the diametrically [*25] opposite argument that PaintCare made promises upon which GreenCycle could justifiably rely." Id. Meanwhile, Clean Harbors contends Plaintiff's fraud claim is broadly alleged against all Defendants with little specificity about what representations Clean Harbors made that could constitute fraudulent behavior. Clean Harbors Mot. at 3.

According to Plaintiff, it has alleged multiple specific statements made by Defendants to Plaintiff that "were intended to induce GreenCycle to enter the market for recycling of post-consumer paint." Opp'n at 12 (citing Comp. ¶¶ 12, 14, 18, 21). Plaintiff asserts that at no time did Defendants ever state that they were not going to provide GreenCycle with post-consumer paint, and when Plaintiff inquired about the delays, the haulers pointed to PaintCare and PaintCare pointed to the haulers. Id. at 13. As in its antitrust claim, Plaintiff alleges Defendants had agreed to not allow any other recycling facilities to enter the market for post-consumer paint, but that they never informed Plaintiff of this agreement. Id.

The elements of fraud in California are: "(1) a misrepresentation (false representation, concealment, or nondisclosure); (2) knowledge of falsity (or [*26] scienter); (3) intent to defraud, i.e., to induce reliance; (4) justifiable reliance; and (5) resulting damage." Robinson Helicopter Co. v. Dana Corp., 34 Cal. 4th 979, 990, 22 Cal. Rptr. 3d 352, 102 P.3d 268 (2004). "The intent to defraud may be inferred from a defendant's statements and conduct." Eclectic Props., 751 F.3d at 997 (citing United States v. Peters, 962 F.2d 1410, 1414 (9th Cir. 1992)). "In the absence of direct evidence of intent, the party asserting fraud must first prove 'the existence of a scheme which was reasonably calculated to deceive persons of ordinary prudence and comprehension,' and then, 'by examining the scheme itself' the court may infer a defendant's specific intent to defraud." Id. (quoting United States v. Green, 745 F.2d 1205, 1207 (9th Cir. 1984)).

Given these elements, the Court agrees with Defendants that there are a variety of deficiencies in Plaintiff's fraud claim as currently pled. The problems are interrelated in that Plaintiff's allegations do not demonstrate justifiable reliance on its part or that Defendants intended to defraud Plaintiff or knew that they were making false statements to Plaintiff when they indicated it could become a processor for recycling latex paint. As pled, the allegations indicate that Plaintiff was aware that there was no promise it would become a processor; rather, the allegations show Plaintiff understood that there was enough business for it to become a processor, [*27] but it would have to be approved and audited prior to beginning such operations. But as noted by PaintCare, Plaintiff had not even built its facility—a prerequisite to conducting an audit—when it first began communicating with Defendants. See Compl. ¶ 14 (indicating that at the meeting in September 2012 with PaintCare, Clean Harbors, and Stericycle, a Stericycle official told Plaintiff an audit was necessary before Plaintiff could be approved to process paint, which was not possible until its recycling facility was set up). And while Plaintiff finished building the facility in September 2012, according to its own allegations, it was only ready to receive and process paint in November 2012. Id. ¶ 15. Defendants' representations about Plaintiff's ability to process paint through the Program were thus contingent on audits of this facility. See Cansino v. Bank of Am., 224 Cal. App. 4th 1462, 1469-71, 169 Cal. Rptr. 3d 619 (2014) (explaining that predictions as to future events may not be actionable in fraud, particularly where "the future state" of a something is unknown, and "[a]ny future [] forecast must be regarded not as fact but as prediction or speculation").

After opening its facility, Plaintiff vaguely alleges it made "repeated efforts" to obtain paint shipments from [*28] Clean Harbors, but it does not allege any specific communications they shared between September 2012, when the facility opened, and August 2014, when Clean Harbors contacted Plaintiff about evaluating its facility. Compl. ¶ 21. There are no allegations that Clean Harbors made any representations to Plaintiff during this period that Plaintiff relied on, and in the August 2014 discussions, Plaintiff merely alleges Clean Harbors told Plaintiff it would send an audit package, but Plaintiff did not receive such a package. Id. Plaintiff does not explain how it relied on these representations and was then damaged by them, or that Clean Harbors intended to induce Plaintiff's reliance.

Likewise, while there are more allegations about PaintCare's and Stericycle's communications with Plaintiff, it is still unclear when several of the communications took place, for instance, when PaintCare allegedly expressed a "pessimistic view" to Plaintiff that it would be approved as a processor. Id. ¶ 17. Furthermore, Plaintiff asserts Defendants "misrepresented" that it "would receive used latex paint if it met certain requirements[,]" id. ¶ 36, but Plaintiff has not alleged facts showing how these statements [*29] constitute misrepresentations or that Defendants intended to defraud Plaintiff by making them, particularly when they actually began shipping paint to Plaintiff in early 2015. Finally, it is not clear what motivation Defendants would have had to induce Plaintiff to go through the approval process if they had no intention of working with Plaintiff. Something more is needed to make Plaintiff's allegations plausible and adequate under Rule 9(b). See Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) (requiring "a party . . . state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud . . . .").

That said, Plaintiff may be able to allege plausible and particular facts to demonstrate Defendants defrauded Plaintiff; accordingly, while the Court dismisses Plaintiff's fraud claim, it does so with leave to amend.

C. Unfair Competition Claims

Defendants also challenge Plaintiff's unfair competition claims on the grounds that Plaintiff has not shown that (1) any of Defendants' conduct was "unlawful" or "fraud" under another statute or law, or (2) that Defendant's conduct was unfair. PaintCare Mot. at 15; Clean Harbors Mot. at 7. Additionally, Clean Harbors asserts that Plaintiff does not have standing to bring a UCL claim against Clean Harbors as it has [*30] not shown how it lost money or property as a "direct result" of Clean Harbor's "specific conduct[.]" Clean Harbors Mot. at 6-7.

California's UCL proscribes three types of unfair competition: "practices which are unlawful, unfair or fraudulent." In re Tobacco II Cases, 46 Cal. 4th 298, 311, 93 Cal. Rptr. 3d 559, 207 P.3d 20 (2009) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted); see also Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 (defining unfair competition to include "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice"). "Each prong of the UCL is a separate and distinct theory of liability," and "an independent basis for relief." Lozano v. AT&T Wireless Servs., Inc., 504 F.3d 718, 731 (9th Cir. 2007) (citation omitted).

1. Unlawful Prong

With respect to the UCL's unlawful prong, the California Supreme Court has held: "By proscribing 'any unlawful' business practice, § 17200 borrows violations of other laws and treats them as unlawful practices that the unfair competition law makes independently actionable." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999) (quotations omitted). In other words, claims raised under the UCL's unlawful prong rise or fall with the Court's determination of liability with respect to the underlying violation. See Krantz v. BT Visual Images, 89 Cal. App. 4th 164, 178, 107 Cal. Rptr. 2d 209 (2001). Here, as noted above, the Court has not found that Plaintiff has alleged plausible facts supporting a violation of another law; as such, Plaintiff's UCL claims premised on the "unlawful" [*31] prong must be dismissed, but with leave to amend in the event Plaintiff can allege plausible facts to support its antitrust or fraud claim.

2. Unfair Prong

"[W]ith respect to business-competitor cases, to state a claim under the UCL's 'unfair' prong the alleged unfairness must 'be tethered to some legislatively declared policy or proof of some actual or threatened impact on competition.'" Levitt v. Yelp! Inc., 765 F.3d 1123, 1136 (9th Cir. 2014) (quoting Cel-Tech Commc'ns, 20 Cal. 4th at 186-87 (an act or practice is "unfair" under the UCL only if the conduct "threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.")). Additionally, "where the same conduct alleged to be unfair under the UCL is also alleged to be a violation of another law, the UCL claim rises or falls with the other claims." *Hicks v. PGA Tour, Inc., ___ F. Supp. 3d ___, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31597, 2016 WL 928728, at 7 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 9, 2016) (citation omitted). Indeed, California Courts of Appeal have recognized that "[t]o permit a separate inquiry into essentially the same question under the unfair competition law would only invite conflict and uncertainty[.]" Chavez v. Whirlpool Corp., 93 Cal. App. 4th 363, 375, 113 Cal. Rptr. 2d 175 (2001); Belton v. Comcast Cable Holdings, LLC, 151 Cal. App. 4th 1224, 1240, 60 Cal. Rptr. 3d 631 (2007) (recognizing same).

Plaintiff appears to contend that Defendants' acts of telling "GreenCycle [*32] it would receive post-consumer paint" and leading "it through a lengthy and detailed 'audit process'" while never "intend[ing] to approve GreenCycle" violated the policy or spirit of a law as these acts "violated the stated goals of the Program, increase costs to consumers, increase emissions from additional transportation, result in more paint being dumped in landfills and create an unfair playing field in the post-consumer paint market." Opp'n at 15-16. Additionally, Plaintiff asserts that Defendants' actions "violate the spirit of free competition in the marketplace[,]" noting that "Defendants control the market for post-consumer paint and are not only excluding local recycling options, but are creating a lengthy and unnecessary burden on new business." Id. at 16. Plaintiff explains that "PaintCare is the only stewardship organization authorized to administer the used-paint recycling program in California and the other defendants are the only transport companies with which PaintCare contracts." Id. at 15. It asserts that PaintCare and the other Defendants' positions of control in the marketplace require specific consideration by the Court under Cel-Tech. Id. (citing Cel-Tech Commc'ns, 20 Cal. 4th at 190) ("Given L.A. Cellular's government-protected [*33] position . . . , the fairness of its below-cost sales of cellular equipment requires careful scrutiny.").

Having carefully reviewed Plaintiff's Complaint, the Court finds Plaintiff's allegations do not provide enough plausible facts to support Plaintiff's UCL claims at this time. First, to the extent Plaintiff's UCL claims overlap with its antitrust and fraud allegations, which the Court has found presently fail to state a claim, the Court agrees with Defendants that under Chavez v. Whirlpool Corporation, Plaintiff's UCL claims premised on the "unfair prong" also fail as a matter of law. *See Hicks, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31597, 2016 WL 928728, at 7 ("Because the conduct the caddies assert is unfair under the UCL overlaps completely with the allegations the Court has held fails to state a claim for breach of contract, misappropriation of likeness, and antitrust violations, the caddies' UCL claim fails as a matter of law too." (citation omitted)).

Second, the only allegations Plaintiff presents that do not overlap with its antitrust claims are related to allegations that the Program was developed in part to "provide a uniform competitive business environment to all architectural paint manufacturers[,]" Compl. ¶¶ 10, 30 (citing Cal. Code Regs. tit. 14, § 18950), and that Defendants [*34] "failed to [] meet the statutory and regulatory requirements to promote the reuse of used paint and manage the end-of-life of unused paint in an environmentally sound fashion" by "increase[ing] truck travel and transportation of used latex paint" resulting in "increased emissions, adverse environmental impacts, increased costs for consumers, additional spillage and waste" and "land-based disposal of paint that is otherwise prohibited in California." Id. ¶ 31. The problem with these allegations, however, is that they are conclusory and do not clarify which Defendant did what. While Plaintiff has alleged facts showing that it had a difficult time procuring business under the Program, it has not alleged how Defendants' conduct failed to provide a uniform competitive business environment or how specifically they failed to meet the statutory and regulatory requirements. See Scripps Clinic v. Superior Ct., 108 Cal. App. 4th 917, 940, 134 Cal. Rptr. 2d 101 (2003) (UCL unfair prong claim "must be 'tethered' to specific constitutional, statutory or regulatory provisions." (citations omitted)). Finally, in its Opposition, Plaintiff asserts Defendants "are creating a lengthy and unnecessary burden on new business," Opp'n at 16, but it has alleged no facts demonstrating this to be the case. The [*35] only allegation supporting this contention is that Plaintiff dealt with a lengthy process navigating how to obtain business through the program. It appears, however, from judicially noticeable documents, that the Program added new paint recyclers between 2013 and 2014. RJN Exs. C & E. The fact that Plaintiff was not one of them is not enough to plausibly establish Defendants violated the policy or spirit of a law or otherwise harmed competition.

3. Fraudulent Prong

"To establish an unfair competition claim under the fraudulent prong, plaintiffs must show that [the defendant's] representations were false or were likely to have misled 'reasonable consumers.'" Belton, 151 Cal. App. 4th at 1241 (quotation omitted)). "The standard for finding a likelihood of deception is that of a reasonable consumer who is neither the most vigilant and suspicious of advertising claims nor the most unwary and unsophisticated, but instead is 'the ordinary consumer within the target population.'" Ehret v. Uber Techs., Inc., 68 F. Supp. 3d 1121, 1137 (N.D. Cal. 2014) (quotations omitted). As PaintCare points out in its Reply, Plaintiff's fraud claims are primarily premised on alleged misrepresentations Defendants made specifically to Plaintiff—not to consumers. Those claims are not presently viable as addressed [*36] above. But Plaintiff also indicates Defendants' actions "misled the general public with regard to the costs and benefits of the Architectural Paint Recovery Program[.]" Compl. ¶ 32. Plaintiff is not clear about which Defendants made what misrepresentations to the public or how specifically they misled consumers regarding the costs of the Program or its benefits. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) ("a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud . . . ."). Without more, it cannot maintain its UCL claims under the fraud prong.

4. Standing

Finally, as to standing, since the passage of Proposition 64 in 2004, a private individual has standing to bring a UCL action only if he or she "has suffered injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204. "The phrase 'as a result of' in its plain and ordinary sense means 'caused by' and requires a showing of a causal connection or reliance . . . ." Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 326, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877, 887 (2011) (citation omitted). Clean Harbors has questioned Plaintiff's standing to bring a UCL claim if Plaintiff cannot show it lost money or property as a result of the Defendants' acts. Clean Harbors Mot. at 6-7. As the nature of Defendants' acts is currently unclear, it is [*37] premature to find that Plaintiff cannot allege facts to show how Defendants' conduct caused it to lose money or property. Nonetheless, in granting leave to amend on Plaintiff's UCL claim, the Court urges Plaintiff to plead factual content that allows it to draw the reasonable inference Plaintiff lost money or property as a result of Defendants' acts. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678; Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 ("Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.").

CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing analysis, the Court GRANTS Defendants' Motions to Dismiss but WITH LEAVE TO AMEND on all claims. Plaintiff shall file an amended complaint by May 6, 2016 or the Clerk of Court will close this case.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

ORDER [*2]

I. INTRODUCTION

This matter comes before the Court on Defendant A.Hak Industrial Services US, LLC's ("Defendant") Motion for Leave to File Amended Answer and Counterclaim. Dkt. # 112. Plaintiff Quest Integrity USA, LLC ("Plaintiff") opposes the Motion and requests oral argument. See Dkt. # 120. The Court deems oral argument unnecessary for resolution of the Motion. For the reasons set forth below, the Court GRANTS Defendant's Motion.

II. BACKGROUND

The Court has detailed the background of the allegations in this case in other Orders. See Dkt. # 81; Dkt. # 123. In short, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant has infringed United States Patent 7,542,874 (the "'874 Patent"), which is entitled "2D and 3D Display System and Method for Furnace Tube Inspection." Compl. ¶ 6. The '874 Patent permits refinery stakeholders to quickly identify problems in furnace tubing without necessarily needing to turn to a trained engineer to interpret "inspection pig" spreadsheets. See id. ¶¶ 17, 19-20. Essentially, the '874 Patent permits refinery stakeholders to make actionable decisions on the spot, which was not necessarily possible before. See id. ¶ 20.

III. LEGAL STANDARD

Amendment to pleadings is governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a). Rule 15(a) "provides that a party's right to amend as a matter of course [*3] terminates 21 days after service of a responsive pleading or 21 days after service of a motion under Rule 12(b), (e), or (f), whichever is earlier." Montz v. Pilgrim Films & Television, Inc., 606 F.3d 1153, 1159 n.1 (9th Cir. 2010); Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(1)(B). "In all other cases, a party may amend its pleading only with the opposing party's written consent or the court's leave. The court should freely give leave when justice so requires." Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2). "In exercising this discretion, a court must be guided by the underlying purpose of Rule 15 to facilitate a decision on the merits, rather than on the pleadings or technicalities." Roth v. Garcia Marquez, 942 F.2d 617, 628 (9th Cir. 1991); United States v. Webb, 655 F.2d 977, 979 (9th Cir. 1981). Further, the policy of favoring amendments to pleadings should be applied with "extreme liberality." DCD Programs, Ltd. v. Leighton, 833 F.2d 183, 186 (9th Cir. 1987).

Against this extremely liberal standard, the Court may deny leave to amend after considering "the presence of any of four factors: bad faith, undue delay, prejudice to the opposing party, and/or futility." Owens v. Kaiser Foundation Health Plan, Inc., 244 F.3d 708, 712 (9th Cir. 2001). But "[n]ot all of the factors merit equal weight ... it is the consideration of prejudice to the opposing party that carries the greatest weight." Eminence Capital, LLC v. Aspeon, Inc., 316 F.3d 1048, 1052 (9th Cir. 2003). "Absent prejudice, or a strong showing of any of the remaining [] factors, there exists a presumption under Rule 15(a) in favor of granting leave to amend." Id. The party opposing amendment bears the heavy burden of overcoming this presumption. DCD Programs, Ltd. v. Leighton, 833 F.2d at 187.

IV. ANALYSIS [*4]

Defendant seeks leave to amend its Answer to include three counterclaims: (1) a claim for inequitable conduct, (2) a Walker Process claim for monopolization under the Sherman Act, and (3) a Walker Process claim for attempted monopolization under the Sherman Act. See Dkt. # 112 at 2. Plaintiff does not argue that Defendant is seeking to amend in bad faith, has delayed in seeking amendment (though Plaintiff alludes to that possibility), or that amendment would result in prejudice. Instead, Plaintiff argues that Defendant's proposed counterclaims do not satisfy the pleading requirements for those claims — i.e., that they are futile. See Dkt. # 120 at 3.

In determining whether leave to amend should be given, a proposed amendment is futile only if the complaint cannot be saved by further amendment. See United States v. Corinthian Colleges, 655 F.3d 984, 995 (9th Cir. 2011) (quoting Krainski v. Nev. ex rel. Bd. of Regents of Nev. System of Higher Educ., 616 F.3d 963, 972 (9th Cir. 2010)). Accordingly, "[l]eave to amend is warranted if the deficiencies can be cured with additional allegations that are 'consistent with the challenged pleading' and that do not contradict the allegations in the original complaint." Id. (quoting Reddy v. Litton Indus., 912 F.2d 291, 296-97 (9th Cir. 1990)). "A party should be afforded an opportunity to test his claim on the merits rather than on a motion to amend unless it appears beyond doubt that the [*5] proposed amended pleading would be subject to dismissal." Wizards of the Coast LLC v. Cryptozoic Entm't LLC, 309 F.R.D. 645, 654 (W.D. Wash. 2015) (quoting *Mahone v. Pierce Cty., No. C10-5847 RBL KLS, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 56115, 2011 WL 2009740, at 2 (W.D. Wash. May 23, 2011)).

a. Defendant's Proposed Inequitable Conduct Counterclaim

Defendant seeks to amend its Answer to include a counterclaim for inequitable conduct pertaining to the prosecution of the '874 Patent. See Dkt. # 112-1 Ex. A ("Prop. Countercl.") ¶¶ 13-49. The proposed counterclaim alleges that individuals before the United States Patent and Trademark Office ("USPTO") violated their duty of candor during the prosecution by failing to disclose certain information.

"Inequitable conduct is an equitable defense to patent infringement that, if proved, bars enforcement of a patent." Therasense, Inc. v. Becton, Dickinson & Co., 649 F.3d 1276, 1285 (Fed. Cir. 2011). "The substantive elements of inequitable conduct are: (1) an individual associated with the filing and prosecution of a patent application made an affirmative misrepresentation of a material fact, failed to disclose material information, or submitted false material information; and (2) the individual did so with a specific intent to deceive the PTO." Exergen Corp. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 575 F.3d 1312, 1327 n.3 (Fed. Cir. 2009) (citing Star Scientific, Inc. v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 537 F.3d 1357, 1365 (Fed. Cir. 2008); Molins PLC v. Textron, Inc., 48 F.3d 1172, 1178, 1181 (Fed. Cir. 1995); 37 C.F.R. § 1.56 (2008)). Inequitable conduct must be pled with particularity under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b). Id. at 1326 (quoting Ferguson Beauregard/Logic Controls, Div. of Dover Res., Inc. v. Mega Sys., LLC, 350 F.3d 1327, 1344 (Fed. Cir. 2003)).

Plaintiff argues that Defendant [*6] has not pleaded these elements with particularity. See Dkt. # 120 at 5. The Court disagrees.

Defendant's proposed counterclaim identifies four specific acts of fraud that could constitute the "but-for materiality" required to show inequitable conduct. See Therasense, 649 F.3d at 1291. Specifically, Defendant alleges that Plaintiff failed to disclose a pre-critical date sale[1] (see Prop. Countercl. ¶¶ 19-27), misrepresented certain figures in the '874 Patent specification (see id. ¶¶ 28-33), failed to disclose a brochure containing prior art for furnace tube inspection systems ("FTIS") (see id. ¶¶ 34-42), and misrepresented the commercial success of the claimed invention (see id. ¶¶ 43-49). Defendant further alleges how each of these misrepresentations or omissions could have led the USPTO to disallow the claim. That is enough at this juncture, though Defendant likely will be required to show by clear and convincing evidence that the USPTO would have disallowed "the claim if it had been aware of the undisclosed reference" at some later point.[2] Therasense, 649 F.3d at 1290-92.

Plaintiff further argues that Defendant has insufficiently pleaded the scienter requirement of inequitable conduct. See Dkt. # 120 at 5. In order to prevail on the specific intent prong, "the accused infringer must prove by clear and convincing evidence that the applicant knew of the reference, knew that it was material, and made a deliberate decision to withhold it." Therasense, 649 F.3d at 1290. However, "[b]ecause direct evidence of deceptive intent is rare, a district court may infer intent from indirect and circumstantial evidence." Id. (citing Larson Mfg. Co. of S.D., Inc. v. Aluminart Prods, Ltd., 559 F.3d 1317, 1340 (Fed. Cir. 2009)).

[1] The "critical date" refers to 35 U.S.C. § 102's on-sale bar. See Hamilton Beach Brands, Inc. v. Sunbeam Prods., Inc., 726 F.3d 1370, 1374-75 (Fed. Cir. 2013).

[2] In fact, the allegations explain the "the who, what, when, where, and how" of the inequitable conduct. See Exergen, 575 F.3d at 1329-30; see also Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1106 (9th Cir. 2003) (quoting Cooper v. Pickett, 137 F.3d 616, 627 (9th Cir. 1997)). Defendant [*7] names the specific actors involved in the alleged inequitable conduct (see Prop. Countercl. ¶ 17), identifies which claims the withheld references are relevant to (see Prop. Countercl. ¶¶ 22-24, 28-29, 36, 40-42) and where the references to material information can be found (see Prop. Countercl. ¶¶ 19-21, 26, 32, 35). Moreover, the allegations "identify the particular claim limitations, or combination of claim limitations, that are supposedly absent from the information of record." See Exergen, 575 F.3d at 1329.

The Court finds that Defendant has sufficiently pleaded scienter. Taken as true, the allegations plausibly suggest that the inventors and others involved in prosecuting the '874 Patent specifically intended [*8] to defraud the USPTO by withholding material information regarding prior art and commercial sales. The allegations show how the inventors of the '874 Patent would be aware of the later misrepresentations — at least one of them prepared the Norco Report.[3] Prop. Countercl. ¶ 21. This allegation supports a reasonable inference that they knew of the material omission at the time of the patent application.

Accordingly, the Court finds that the proposed counterclaim for inequitable conduct is sufficiently pleaded.

b. Defendant's Proposed Walker Process Antitrust Claims

Defendant also seeks to amend its Answer to include counterclaims for Walker Process antitrust claims. Prop. Countercl. ¶¶ 50-66.

"Walker Process claims reside at the junction of patent and antitrust law, allowing plaintiffs to 'strip [a patent-holder] of [his] exemption from the antitrust laws' if his patent has been procured by fraud." Ritz Camera & Image, LLC v. SanDisk Corp., 772 F. Supp. 2d 1100, 1103 (N.D. Cal. 2011) (quoting Walker Process Equip., Inc. v. Food Machinery & Chem. Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 177, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1965)).

To succeed on a claim for Walker Process fraud, the antitrust claimant must show:

(1) [*9] that the asserted patent was obtained by knowingly and willfully misrepresenting the facts to the PTO;
(2) that the party enforcing the patent was aware of the fraud when bringing suit;
(3) independent and clear evidence of deceptive intent;

(4) a clear showing of reliance, i.e., that the patent would not have issued but for the misrepresentation or omission; and
(5) the necessary additional elements of an underlying violation of the antitrust laws.

In re Netflix Antitrust Litig., 506 F. Supp. 2d 308, 314 (N.D. Cal. 2007) (citing Nobelpharma AB v. Implant Innovations, Inc., 141 F.3d 1059, 1068-71 (Fed. Cir. 1998)).

"There are three essential elements to a successful claim of Section 2 monopolization: (a) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; (b) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power; and (c) causal antitrust injury." Name.Space, Inc. v. Internet Corp. for Assigned Names & Numbers, 795 F.3d 1124, 1131 (9th Cir. 2015) (quoting Allied Orthopedic Appliances Inc. v. Tyco Health Care Grp. LP, 592 F.3d 991, 998 (9th Cir. 2010)). "[T]o state a claim for attempted monopolization, the plaintiff must allege facts that, if true, will prove: '(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.'" Coalition for ICANN Transparency, Inc. v. VeriSign, Inc., 611 F.3d 495, 506 (9th Cir. 2009) (quoting Cascade Health Solutions v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 893 (9th Cir. 2008)).

Plaintiff raises several issues with Defendant's Sherman Act allegations.[4] Plaintiff argues that Defendant has not provided sufficient factual support for its assertion that Plaintiff has monopoly power [*10] and maintains a monopoly for furnace inspection services. See Dkt. # 120 at 7. Plaintiff further argues that Defendant has not provided sufficient factual support for allegations that Plaintiff willfully acquired or maintained the market power in a fraudulent manner. See id.

[3] The "Norco Report" is a more elegant name for a report describing FTIS tool and software used on March 3-7, 2003 to prepare a report on an examination of a refinery in Norco, Louisiana. See Prop. Countercl. ¶ 20.

[4] It is not entirely clear whether Plaintiff contests Defendant's definition of the relevant market. See Dkt. # 120 at 9. Although "the validity of the 'relevant market' is typically a factual element rather than a legal element," a complaint may still be dismissed for alleging a facially unsustainable definition for the relevant market. Newcal Indus., 513 F.3d at 1045. As Plaintiff rightly notes, Defendant makes little effort to define the relevant market in its allegations. See Dkt. # 120 at 9; Prop. Countercl. ¶¶ 52, 60. But Plaintiff also does not present any reason the Court should find this market facially unsustainable. At this juncture, although the relevant market could be better defined (and may yet raise further issues), it is not so insufficient as to deny leave to amend.

The Court disagrees with Plaintiff's apparent application of the heightened pleading standard under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b) to the non-fraud based Walker Process claim elements. Other courts [*11] assessing such claims simply apply ordinary pleading standards. See Ritz Camera, 772 F. Supp. 2d at 1106-1110; *see also Nalco Co. v. Turner Designs, Inc., No. 13-CV-02727 NC, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21362, 2014 WL 645365, at 8-9 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 19, 2014). This makes sense as "[t]here is no requirement that these elements of the antitrust claim be pled with specificity." Newcal Indus., Inc. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1045 (9th Cir. 2008) (citing Cost Mgmt. Servs., Inc. v. Wash. Nat. Gas Co., 99 F.3d 937, 950 (9th Cir. 1996)).

Still, Defendant's allegations scarcely go beyond the elements for Sherman Act monopolization. And accordingly, the Court agrees that Defendant's allegations are somewhat insufficient. For example, Defendant summarily alleges that "[Plaintiff] has monopoly power and maintains a monopoly in the market for furnace tube inspection services in the United States." Prop. Countercl. ¶ 54. Similarly, for its attempted Walker Process claim, Defendant simply alleges that "[Plaintiff] possesses substantial market power in the market for furnace tube inspection services in the United States, and there is a high likelihood and a dangerous probability that [Plaintiff] will be successful in achieving and maintaining monopoly power in that market." Id. ¶ 62. Neither allegation provides the Court with any real basis — such as market share — for finding monopoly power or a dangerous probability that Plaintiff will obtain monopoly power. See Rebel Oil Co. v. Atl. Richfield Co., 51 F.3d 1421, 1438 (9th Cir. 1995) (expressing reluctance to apply bright line rule regarding market [*12] share, but finding 44 percent share sufficient to support market power in attempted monopolization case); Hunt-Wesson Foods, Inc. v. Ragu Foods, Inc., 627 F.2d 919, 924-25 (9th Cir. 1980) (suggesting that market share above 65 percent could support a finding of market power and survive motion to dismiss).

With respect to Defendant's allegations of exclusionary conduct, the Court simply notes that "[t]o demonstrate Walker Process fraud, a claimant must make higher threshold showings of both materiality and intent than are required to show inequitable conduct." Dippin' Dots, Inc. v. Mosey, 476 F.3d 1337, 1346-47 (Fed. Cir. 2007) (citing Nobelpharma, 141 F.3d at 1070-71; C.R. Bard, Inc. v. M3 Sys., Inc., 157 F.3d 1340, 1364 (Fed. Cir. 1988)). Defendant rests upon the same factual allegations supporting its claim for inequitable conduct for its Walker Process claims. That may be problematic beyond the pleading stage, but it suffices to sustain their Walker Process claims at this juncture. Furthermore, Defendant's allegations regarding the only other form of exclusionary conduct — using "influence" to revise an industry standard — lack any real specificity. See Prop. Countercl. ¶¶ 55, 63. Nevertheless any deficiencies in these allegations could be cured by further amendment.

Finally, it appears that Plaintiff takes issue with Defendant's allegations of antitrust injury. See Dkt. # 120 at 9. The Court agrees that as written, [*13] Defendant's antitrust injury is vague at best. See Prop. Countercl. ¶¶ 57, 66. In any event, however, the Federal Circuit has recently suggested that attorneys' fees may form the basis for antitrust injury and injury-in-fact on a Walker Process claim. See TransWeb, LLC v. 3M Innovative Props. Co., 812 F.3d 1295, 1310 (Fed. Cir. 2016). That may be enough to sustain Defendant's claim.

The Court therefore finds that although the proposed Walker Process counterclaims are not particularly well pleaded, they are not futile because they could potentially be saved by further amendment.

V. CONCLUSION

The Court finds that Defendant's proposed amendments are not futile, it will permit Defendant leave to amend its Answer to add these new allegations. However, the Court notes that Defendant's proposed Walker Process counterclaims face some hurdles and require additional factual support.

Accordingly, the Court GRANTS Defendant's Motion for Leave to Amend (Dkt. # 112) and will permit Defendant to file an amended Answer containing the newly proposed counterclaims within fourteen (14) days of this Order.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

This matter comes before the Court on Defendants' Joint Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on the Attorney General's Foreign Commerce Claims and on the State of Illinois' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on Antitrust Law's Domestic-Injury Exception. The Court has reviewed the foregoing motions and the parties' respective memoranda in support thereof ("Df. MSJ" and "Pl. MSJ"), as well as Defendants' Reply in Support of their Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on the Attorney General's Foreign Commerce Claims and Opposition to the Attorney General's Cross Motion ("Df. Reply"), the State of Illinois' Reply for Partial Summary Judgment on Antitrust Law's Domestic-Injury Exception ("Pl. Reply"), and all accompanying exhibits to the preceding briefs. The Court has also considered the oral arguments of counsels and relevant legal authorities.

Background

The facts of the instant suit recounted here are drawn from prior written opinions of this Court,[1] and from the parties' briefs on the instant motions where specifically cited. In late 2006, the public learned of a price-fixing investigation being conducted by the United States [*2] Department of Justice. The investigation centered on allegations that manufacturers of thin-film transistor liquid crystal display ("LCD") panels had held unlawful meetings for the purpose of fixing the prices and output of LCD panels throughout the United States, including in Illinois. The price fixing allegedly occurred between November 30, 1998, and December 11, 2006, during which time the State of Illinois and Illinois consumers purportedly paid artificially inflated prices for LCD panels.

After the investigation became public, a torrent of litigation ensued, with hundreds of civil actions filed in United States district courts throughout the country. To promote the efficient adjudication of those cases, the federal matters were consolidated in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California under the caption In re: TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litigation, Case No. 3:07-MD-1827 SI, MDL No. 1827 (N.D. Gal.) (the "multidistrict litigation"). The Honorable Judge Susan Illston has presided over the multidistrict litigation since 2006, and ultimately certified two class actions therein. The first class consisted of entities that were direct purchasers of [*3] LCD panels (e.g., entities that utilize LCD panels as components of other products). The second class consisted of indirect purchasers of LCD panels, specifically individuals and entities that purchased consumer products containing LCD panels (e.g., cellular phones. computer monitors, televisions, and numerous other items). Additionally, various plaintiffs opted out of the two classes and brought cases of their own.

Though many states elected to participate in the multidistrict litigation, the State of Illinois opted to pursue its own action. On August 10, 2010, the Illinois Attorney General (the "Attorney General" or "the State") filed the instant case on behalf of Illinois indirect purchasers of products containing LCD panels.[2] Defendants in the instant suit currently include the AU Optronics Defendants,[3] the Samsung Defendants,[4] and the Toshiba Defendants[5] (collectively, the "Defendants").[6] The Complaint alleges that Defendants violated section 3(1) of the Illinois Antitrust Act (the "IAA") by conspiring to fix prices on LCD panels. The Complaint asserts claims for monetary relief (including treble damages) for injuries allegedly suffered by the State of Illinois, its state agencies, [*4] and, in the State's parens patriae capacity, Illinois residents (both individuals and businesses) who purchased products containing LCD panels during the period in question. Additionally, the Complaint seeks injunctive relief to undo the effects of Defendants' alleged unlawful conduct.

The Defendants and other alleged co-conspirators who have already settled with the State are variously headquartered in Japan, Korea, or Taiwan. Pl. MSJ at 2. The price-fixing allegations describe a variety of conduct, including price negotiations, price monitoring, and meetings at which prices were coordinated amongst Defendants. Pl. MSJ at 3-8. Some of the conduct is alleged to have taken place in different locations across the United States, and some overseas. Pl. MSJ at 3-8. During the time frame of the alleged conspiracy, approximately 80% of LCDs in the global market were produced by Defendants, according to estimates of experts for both the State and Defendants. Pl. MSJ at 2. The LCDs in question were incorporated into consumer products such as televisions, laptops, monitors, and cellular phones. Pl. MSJ at 2. The United States is one of the largest [*5] markets for products containing LCDs, a fact well-known to Defendants, whose sales volume for LCDs to the United States exceeded $44 billion between 1998 and 2006. Pl. MSJ at 9-10.

The portion of the cost of a consumer product containing an LCD for which the LCD component accounts varies based on the product type (i.e. laptop or cellphone, etc.). Pl. MSJ at 10. For example, while an LCD accounts for approximately 56% of the cost of a monitor, it accounts for only 9% of the cost of a cellular phone. Pl. MSJ at 10. The State has used pricing and sales figures generated by their experts and Defendants' experts to estimate that the effect of the alleged LCD price-fixing in the United States was about $179 million in overcharges to business and consumers. Pl. MSJ at 10. The State seeks recovery for the portion of such overcharges incurred by it and by residents of the State of Illinois. PL MSJ at 11.

The question presented to the Court in the instant motions for summary judgment is whether the State's claim for such damages can be brought pursuant to section 5(14) of the IAA, which provides as follows:

> No provisions of this Act shall be construed to make illegal:
> * * * *
> (14) Conduct involving trade or commerce (other [*6] than import trade or import commerce) with foreign nations unless:
> (a) such conduct has a direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect:
> (i) on trade or commerce which is not trade or commerce with foreign nations, or on import trade or import commerce with foreign nations; or
> (ii) on export trade or export commerce with foreign nations of a person engaged in such trade or commerce in the United States: and
> (b) such effect gives rise to a claim under the provisions of this Act, other than this subsection (14).
> (c) If this Act applies to conduct referred to in this subsection (14) only because of the provisions of paragraph (a)(ii), then this Act shall apply to such conduct only for injury to export business in the United States which affects this State[.]

740 ILCS 10/5. The language of the IAA at section 5(14) mirrors the language of section 6a of the United States Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act of 1982 ("FTAIA"). 15 U.S.C. § 6a.[7] As the United States Supreme Court explained in a case called F. Hoffmann-La Roche Ltd. V. Empagran S.A., this provision "excludes from the Sherman Act's reach much anticompetitive conduct that causes only foreign injury . . . by setting forth a general rule [that the Act] 'shall not apply to conduct involving trade or commerce . . . with [*7] foreign nations,'" and then creating an exception, "applicable where (roughly speaking) that conduct significantly harms imports, domestic commerce, or American exporters." 542 U.S. 155, 158 (2004).

Defendants argue that because the "vast majority" of the State's claims relate to LCDs Defendants sold to foreign purchasers, rather than customers in the United States, those claims "do not arise from restraints on import commerce . . . nor do they arise from a 'direct' effect on [United States] commerce." Df. MSJ at 1-2. Therefore, Defendants say, section 5(14) of the IAA does not reach the allegations in the instant suit. On this basis Defendants request the Court to grant summary judgment in their favor on all claims which do not involve direct sales of LCDs by Defendants to customers in the United States.

The State argues that section 5(14) of the IAA is identical to FTAIA, and that FTAIA has been interpreted to "reach foreign conduct that has a 'direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect' on [United States] commerce if that effect gives rise to the plaintiff's claim." Pl. MSJ at 1. The State's claims are based on inflated prices in the United States, which were allegedly caused by Defendants' price-fixing conspiracy, and paid by the State [*8] and its residents who purchased products containing LCDs. Pl. MSJ at 1. Therefore, the State says, their claims meet the elements required by section 5(14) of the IAA. On this basis the State requests the Court to find, as a matter of law, that section 5(14) of the IAA is applicable to the allegations against Defendants, and to strike defenses asserted by Defendants based on the same provision.[8]

For reasons fully explained infra, the Court finds in favor of the State, and against the Defendants, that section 5(14) of the IAA is applicable to the claims put forth by the State on behalf of itself and its residents. In so finding, the Court makes no determination as to whether the State has ultimately met its burden of proof as to the ultimate merits of the case. The Court instead reaches only the issue raised in the instant cross motions for partial summary judgment: whether the State has successfully plead facts that, if proven, meet the elements required for relief pursuant to section 5(14) of the IAA. In other words, the Court finds that the State has plead facts that, as a matter of law, constitute allegations of an injury to the State and its residents arising out of a direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable effect of Defendants' conduct on domestic commerce [*9] in the United States, and that the State has also alleged such conduct is in violation of section 3(1) of the IAA.

Defendants have also argued in then briefs that the State's claims are barred by the Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution, but this argument has already been addressed in this Court's Memorandum Opinion and Order of January 20, 2016, which granted the State's Motion for Partial Summary Judgment Against the Defendants' Foreign-Conduct Defenses.[9] That argument is therefore moot and will not be further addressed in the instant opinion.

Discussion

Summary judgment is appropriate "if the pleadings, depositions, and admissions on file, together with affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." 735 ILCS 5/2-1005(c). For the purposes of summary judgment, the court should construe the facts strictly against the movant and liberally in favor of the opponent. Adams v. N. Ill. Gas Co., 211 Ill.2d 32, 43 (2004). A summary judgment proceeding is not used to try an issue of fact, but to determine whether any genuine issue of material fact exists. Happel v. Wal-Mart Stores, 199 Ill.2d 179, 186 (2002). Summary judgment should not be granted unless the right of the moving party is clear and free from doubt. Horwitz v. Holabird & Root, 212 Ill.2d 1, 8 (2004). Partial summary judgment may also be appropriate on discrete [*10] issues where "a party moves for a summary determination of one or more, but less than all, of the major issues in the case, and the court finds that there is no genuine issue of material fact as to that issue or those issues," in which case "the court shall thereupon draw an order specifying the major issue or issues that appear without substantial controversy, and directing such further proceedings upon the remaining undetermined issues as are just." 735 ILCS 5/2-1005(d).

The instant cross motions call upon this Court to interpret the meaning of section 5(14) of the IAA. "The cardinal rule of statutory interpretation is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the legislature." Wolf v. Toolie, 2014 IL App (1st) 132243, ¶ 21 (quoting Krautsack v. Anderson, 223 Ill. 2d 541, 552 (2006)). The language of the statute is the best indication of the legislature's intent and therefore must be given its plain and ordinary meaning. Wolf, 2014 IL App (1st) 132243, ¶ 21 (internal citation omitted). A court should not consider words and phrases in isolation, but instead should interpret each word and phrase in light of the statute as a whole. Id. "Each word, clause and sentence of a statute must be given reasonable meaning, if possible, and should not be rendered superfluous." Id. (quoting Standard Mutual Insurance Co. v. Lay, 2013 IL 114617, ¶ 26). Statutes should be interpreted as a whole,

[8] Defendants seem to argue in their Reply brief against granting summary judgment in favor of the State on the entire case. Df. Reply at 20-21. The cross-motion by the State presently before the Court requests only partial summary judgment on the issue of whether section 5(14) of the IAA is applicable to the claims alleged if proven; it does not ask for summary judgment that they in fact have been proven, and the Court makes no finding at this time on the latter question.

[9] The Defendants' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment that is currently before the Court was filed prior to the Court's ruling on whether the Commerce Clause barred any of the State's claims against Defendants.

"meaning different sections [*11] of the same statute should be considered in reference to one another so that they are given harmonious effect." Wolf, 2014 IL App (1st) 132243, ¶ 21 (quoting Jayko v. Fraczek, 2012 IL App (1st) 103665, ¶ 14).

Interpretation of section 5(14) of the IAA is a matter of first impression in Illinois. However, ample guidance exists for this Court in the form of federal case law, to which this Court has been instructed by the Illinois General Assembly to look in its interpretation and application of the IAA when a provision of the IAA follows the language of its federal antitrust law counterpart. See 740 ILCS 10/11 (expressly directing Illinois courts to look to federal law for guidance where the wording of the IAA is "identical or similar to that of a federal antitrust law"). As explained supra, section 5(14) of the IAA is nearly identical to section 6a of the FTAIA. 15 U.S.C. § 6a. Therefore this Court looks to federal case law applying that statute to guide its interpretation of section 5(14) of the IAA.

Defendants argue in their brief that FTAIA represents a policy judgment on the part of Congress that United States antitrust law should not be applied to "foreign commerce" absent specific effects on United States import or domestic commerce. Df. MSJ at 10. Import commerce, Defendants argue, is limited to transactions between foreign sellers and domestic buyers, and thus does not encompass [*12] the State's allegations of claims arising from the effect of the Defendants' alleged conduct on the domestic commerce of the United States. Df. MSJ at 11. The State has not alleged that Defendants fixed the prices of consumer products sold in the United States, such as laptops; instead, the State has alleged that Defendants fixed the prices of LCDs that were almost all sold to foreign purchasers, who then integrated those LCDs into consumer products, many of which were eventually purchased in the United States. Df. MSJ at 12.

Such transactions do not constitute import commerce, say Defendants, and neither did the States' purported injury arise out of a "direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect" of Defendants' alleged conduct on domestic commerce. Df. MSJ at 12. Rather, the LCD panels sold by Defendants to foreign purchasers had a downstream effect on consumers in Illinois that was indirect. Df. MSJ at 14. The LCDs in question were "transformed" into components of other products after Defendants sold them to foreign purchasers, and after they passed through multiple intermediaries in the manufacturing and distribution chain, before finally reaching consumers in Illinois. [*13] Df. MSJ at 15-18. Defendants insist this is not the type of "direct effect" required by the FTAIA in order for federal antitrust law to reach conduct involving foreign commerce; therefore the requirements of section 5(14) of the IAA are also not met by the State's allegations in the instant suit. Df. MSJ at 19-21.

The State argues that their claims meet all the necessary requirements to pass muster under FTAIA's — and thus the IAA's — standards for conduct involving foreign commerce. Pl. MSJ at 12. They argue that "the undisputed facts show that the Defendants' price-fixing proximately caused higher prices for LCD products in the United States." Pl. MSJ at 13. The fact that there were intermediary purchasers and sellers between Defendants and Illinois consumers, says the State, does not render the effect of the Defendants' alleged conduct on domestic commerce "indirect" Pl. MSJ at 18. The State points to two federal courts that have already determined that the exact same conduct by some of the same entities who are Defendants in the instant suit had a direct effect on consumer prices in the United States. In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., 822 F. Supp. 2d 953, 966 (N.D. Cal. 2011); United States v. Hsiung, 778 F.3d 738 (9th Cir. 2015); Pl. MSJ at 18-19. The State argues these cases bar Defendants from re-litigating the issue in the [*14] instant suit. Pl. MSJ at 22-24.

In addition to being direct, the State argues that the effect of the Defendants' alleged conduct on domestic commerce was substantial where damages to consumers in the United States exceeded $179 million, and that the effect was reasonably foreseeable where Defendants targeted the United States' market. Pl. MSJ at 25-26. Finally, the State argues that the effect out of which its claims arise is the effect on the United States" market for consumer products containing LCDs — not the foreign market for the LCD components — and that therefore the alleged injury arises out of an effect that was direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable, on domestic commerce, and not, as Defendants argue, out of a separate effect on foreign commerce. Pl. MSJ at 27-29.

I. Federal Case Law

In order to best comprehend the current interpretation of FTAIA by federal courts, a discussion of the most relevant case law cited by both parties is provided here in chronological order, beginning with a Seventh Circuit case called Loeb Industries v. Sumitomo Corporation, 306 F.3d 469 (7th Cir. 2002). Loeb did not deal specifically with FTAIA, but addressed questions of "directness" in the context of an alleged conspiracy to fix prices of copper futures [*15] on international exchange markets. Id. at 474. Plaintiffs in that case were buyers of actual physical copper, in various forms, who brought claims under federal and state antitrust laws. Id. at 475. They alleged that defendants conduct — a series of transactions designed to artificially inflate the prices of copper as a commodity in the futures market — had caused comparable inflation of the price of physical copper; plaintiffs sought damages for the difference in the inflated price of actual copper they had purchased. Id. at 477-78.

The claims were dismissed by a federal district court pursuant to the rule from Illinois Brick, which states that only direct purchasers from an alleged antitrust violator have a cause of action, and that "those further removed" are not the proper plaintiffs to bring suit. Id. at 481 (citing Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 729 (1977)). The Seventh Circuit reversed, explaining that "different injuries in distinct markets may be inflicted by a single antitrust conspiracy," and thus more than one set of "differently situated" plaintiffs might be able to raise claims. Id. (citing Blue Shield of Va. V. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 477 (1982)). The court explained that plaintiffs were not "indirect purchasers along a supply chain," as in Illinois Brick, but instead were operators in a "separate but related" [*16] market that was directly impacted by defendants' conduct in the futures market. Id. at 482. The harms incurred in the physical copper market by plaintiffs therefore formed "a separate and compensable injury." Id. at 483 (citing Sanner v. Board of Trade, 62 F.3d 918, 929 (7th Cir. 1995)). As a result of Loeb, it became clear that Illinois Brick is not a total bar to all federal antitrust claims by plaintiffs who did not make a purchase directly from a defendant in an antitrust suit.

In 2004 the United States Supreme Court directly addressed the application of FTAIA for the first time in F. Hoffmann-La Roche Ltd. V. Empagran S.A. 542 U.S. 155, 158 (2004). Plaintiff class members in Empagran brought suit against foreign and domestic manufacturers and distributors of vitamins under federal antitrust law, alleging that they had been damaged by a price-fixing conspiracy conducted by defendants. Id. at 159-60. Defendants moved for dismissal of claims by foreign purchasers for transactions that occurred entirely outside of the United States; a federal district court granted dismissal and the D.C. Circuit then reversed. Id. at 160. The Supreme Court addressed two questions: (1) whether "anticompetitive price-fixing activity that is in significant part foreign, that causes some domestic antitrust injury, and independently causes separate foreign injury," constitutes [*17] conduct involving trade or commerce with foreign nations, and thus falls within the FTAIA's general exclusion; and (2) "whether the conduct nonetheless falls within a domestic-injury exception" making the Sherman Act applicable "where the conduct has a 'direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect' on domestic commerce' [and] 'such effect gives rise to a Sherman Act claim.'" Id. at 159.

The Court answered the first question in the affirmative, finding that "the FTAIA's general rule applies where the anticompetitive conduct at issue is foreign." Id. at 163. This general rule, the Court explained, places "all (nonimport) activity involving foreign commerce outside the Sherman Act's reach." Id. at 162 (emphasis in original). The Court then answered the second question in the negative, finding that the FTAIA exception, designed to bring certain conduct "back within the Sherman Act's reach provided that the conduct both . . . sufficiently affects American commerce . . . and . . . has an effect of a kind that antitrust taw considers harmful," did not apply. Id. at 162, 164 (emphasis in original).

The Court reached this conclusion based on the fact that, although the alleged conduct "significantly and adversely affect[ed] both customers outside the United States and customers [*18] within the United States . . . the adverse foreign effect [was] independent of any adverse domestic effect." Id. at 164. In other words, the specific antitrust injury at issue in the motion to dismiss arose only out of the adverse foreign effect of defendants' alleged conduct. Id. at 165-66. The Court specifically acknowledged that "application of our antitrust laws to foreign anticompetitive conduct is . . . reasonable, and . . . consistent with principles of prescriptive comity, insofar as [the antitrust laws] reflect a legislative effort to redress domestic antitrust injury that foreign anticompetitive conduct has caused." Id. at 165 (emphasis in original). Empagran thus clarified that the key question with respect to the territorial reach of FTAIA is not where the alleged anti-competitive conduct of defendants occurred, but whether plaintiff's injury arose from a domestic effect specifically, as opposed to any separate foreign effects.

Application of FTAIA in the specific context of electronic components was addressed in a 2010 multidistrict class action against some of the same defendants to the instant suit regarding different products and separate alleged price-fixing activities. In re Status Random Access Memory (SRAM) Antitrust Litigation, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141968 (N.D. Cal.) ("SRAM"). In SRAM, classes [*19] of direct and indirect purchasers of certain types of electronic data memory chips, and of electronic devices in which such memory was a component, brought suit against a group of manufacturers pursuant to federal antitrust law. Id. at *29. Defendants brought a, motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, arguing that FTAIA is a jurisdiction-stripping statute and plaintiffs' claims did not fall within the exception. Id. at *29, 33. The federal district court was faced with the question of whether the Supreme Court's ruling in Empagran had any effect on the Ninth Circuit's previous treatment of FTAIA as a jurisdictional requirement. Id. at *34. The Honorable Judge Claudia Wilken decided it did not, and treated FTAIA as jurisdictional.[10] Id. at *36.

Judge Wilken found that direct purchaser claims within the class definition met the first prong of FTAIA because "evidence that the SRAM purchases were billed to the United States, and Defendants' targeting of the United States market for SRAM, taken together, establish[ed] a direct, substantial and foreseeable effect on domestic commerce." Id. at *43. The second prong was satisfied where overcharges to those direct purchasers [*20] "as a result of the alleged conspiracy" specifically gave rise to the antitrust claim. Id. at *45. With respect to indirect purchaser claims, the court was not convinced the FTAIA requirements were met, but nevertheless allowed the claims to proceed. Id. at *47-48.

The indirect purchaser claims arose out of SRAM, or consumer products containing SRAM, originally sold by defendants to customers in a foreign country and then incorporated into products that were imported into the United States by third parties who subsequently sold such products to indirect purchaser plaintiffs. Id. at *46. Plaintiffs argued that their indirect purchases also arose out of a direct domestic effect because defendants had targeted the United States. Id. The court stated that their indirect claims would be analyzed under the targeting theory as follows:

> Mere argument that Defendants must have harbored an inchoate hope or intention that their SRAM would reach the United States is insufficient. However, [indirect purchaser plaintiffs] have proffered some evidence from which it could be inferred that Defendants produced certain types of SRAM products specifically designed to be sold to a particular manufacturer, [*21] to be incorporated into a product in turn specifically designed for the United States market, and actually sold in the United States. Supra-competitive pricing of that SRAM could have had a domestic effect in the United States which could have given rise to antitrust injury.

Id. at *47. Although neither party had produced sufficient evidence at that point for the court to determine whether the SRAM sold abroad and then imported met the above test, Judge Waken decided to allow the parties to present their evidence during trial. Id. at *48. The court stated that if the indirect purchaser plaintiffs were unable to present sufficient evidence, and were unable to segregate domestic transactions — which the court had already determined met the FTAIA requirements — from foreign transactions that might not meet those requirements, "all of their damage claims would fail." Id.

Less than a year later, the Honorable Judge Susan Illston entered an opinion in the multidistrict litigation with which the instant case is connected that addressed the very same issues. In re TFT-LCD Antitrust Litigation. 822 F. Supp. 2d 953 (N.D. Cal. 2011). Defendants in the multidistrict litigation brought a dispositive motion on claims by indirect purchasers, who purchased products containing [*22] the same LCDs at issue in the instant case in the United States after third-parties had purchased the LCDs from defendants overseas and incorporated them into products destined for the United States and other countries. Id. at 955. Defendants argued, just as defendants in SRAM had argued, that "to the extent they did not sell their LCD panels directly to United States consumers or companies, they may not be held liable under either federal or state law." Id. at 955-56. Judge Illston did not analyze FTAIA as a jurisdictional requirement; instead, she adopted an approach taken by the Third Circuit, which determined that FTAIA "delineates the elements of a successful antitrust claim." Id. at 958 (quoting Animal Science Products, Inc. v. China Minmetals Corp., 654 F.3d 462 (3d Cir. 2011) (emphasis added)).

[10] The distinction, for the federal courts, "affects how disputed facts are handled, and it determines when a party may raise the point," since "subject-matter jurisdiction must be secured at all times, regardless of whether the parties raise the issue, and no matter how much has been invested in a case." Minn-Chem, Inc. v. Agrium Inc., 683 F.3d 845, 852-53 (7th Cir. 2012) (internal quotations omitted).

Because the dispositive motion in the multidistrict litigation involved only indirect purchaser claims, unlike the motion to dismiss in SRAM involving both direct and indirect purchaser claims, the sole question before the court was "the degree to which defendants' foreign price-fixing activities fall within [the] 'domestic injury' exception" of FTAIA. Id. at 959. The challenge specifically focused on the "directness" element and "whether the effect of price fixing of LCD panels that are manufactured and sold [*23] abroad before they enter the United States can be considered a direct effect on United States commerce." Id. at note 2. Defendants argued, just as they do in the instant case, that "the only 'direct' effects of the conspiracy occurred overseas, and that the effects on the U.S. economy are at most 'ripple effects' radiating outward from the initial overcharge," and thus not actionable by indirect purchasers under FTAIA. Id. at 962. The indirect purchaser plaintiffs argued, similarly to the State in the instant case, that the United States is the largest market for products containing LCDs and that defendants' conduct had a direct effect on the United States "because the conspiracy was deliberately targeted at the United States." Id. at 963. Furthermore, plaintiffs argued that the inflated prices of the LCDs were "passed through" to them, creating the "direct effect" required under FTAIA. Id.

The court in the multidistrict litigation agreed with the indirect purchaser plaintiffs, and rejected defendants' argument that the "direct effect" of FTAIA was limited to the first sale of a price-fixed product. Id. Reading FTAIA so narrowly, the court explained, "would all but eviscerate the distinction between the 'domestic injury' [*24] exception and 'import commerce,' which is not subject to the FTAIA." Id. (internal citation omitted). The court considered language from the Ninth Circuit that "anticompetitive conduct has a 'direct effect' on U.S. commerce only when the effect of the conduct 'proceeds from one point to another in time or space without deviation or interruption'" and that such effect "must 'follow as an immediate consequence of the defendant's activity.'" Id. (quoting United States v. LSL Biotechnologies, 379 F.3d 672, 680 (9th Cir. 2004); Republic of Argentina v. Weltover, Inc., 504 U.S. 607, 618 (1992)). Judge Illston then explained:

> Where, as here, the nature of the effect does not change in any substantial way before it reaches the United States consumer, the effect is an 'immediate consequence' of the defendant's anticompetitive behavior. In other words, because the effect of defendants' anticompetitive conduct did not change significantly between the beginning of the process (overcharges for LCD panels) and the end (overcharges for televisions, monitors, and notebook computers), the effect 'proceeded without deviation or interruption' from the LCD manufacturer to the American retail store. No intervening events interrupted its journey.

Id. at 964. Judge Illston distinguished cases relied upon by defendants where plaintiffs' injuries had [*25] occurred overseas and courts had "rightfully rejected those plaintiffs' convoluted attempts to convert their foreign injuries into some nebulous effect on American commerce," Id. In the multidistrict litigation, indirect purchaser plaintiffs, who were presenting substantially the same facts as the instant suit, were found to have "identified domestic injury that is concrete and quantifiable," and "[m]ore importantly . . . directly traceable back to the defendants' anticompetitive conduct." Id. at 967. Like Judge Wilkin in the SRAM case, Judge Illston concluded that a material question of fact existed in the multidistrict litigation as to whether defendants' alleged conduct had a direct effect on United States commerce. Id. This was "sufficient to invoke the domestic effect exception to the FTAIA." Id.

At the time Judge Illston authored her opinion in the multidistrict litigation, one case potentially presenting an obstacle to the indirect purchaser claims that the court distinguished was Minn-Chem, Inc. v. Agrium Inc., a Seventh Circuit multidistrict antitrust decision reversing a federal district court's denial of a motion to dismiss based upon FTAIA. Id. at 965 (citing Minn-Chem, Inc. v. Agrium Inc., 657 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 2011) (reversed on rehearing by Minn-Chem, Inc. v. Agrium Inc., 683 F.3d 845 (2012)). [*26] Minn-Chem involved alleged price-fixing of potash, a mineral used in fertilizer. Minn-Chem, Inc., 683 F.3d at 848. Plaintiffs were companies based in the United States who were both direct and indirect purchasers of potash from defendants, who produced approximately 71% of the world's potash, of which the United States was the world's second largest consumer. Id. at 849. Defendants allegedly directed their price-fixing conduct at other countries, including Brazil, India, and China, but with the ultimate aim of driving up prices worldwide, including in the United States. Id. The initial decision by the Seventh Circuit found that "generalized allegations" of price fixing in other countries causing similar price inflation in the United States were insufficient to support a claim that defendants foreign conduct had a "direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable effect" on domestic or import commerce in the United States. Minn-Chem, Inc., 657 F.3d at 662.

However, after a rehearing en banc, the Seventh Circuit changed course and affirmed the district court's finding that plaintiffs had stated a claim under FTAIA. Minn-Chem, Inc., 683 F.3d at 848. Like Judge Illston in the multidistrict litigation, the Seventh Circuit found that FTAIA "spells out an element" of a claim under federal antitrust [*27] law, not a "jurisdictional limit." Id. at 852. Before addressing the merits of the complaint, the court addressed "two distinct questions of statutory interpretation" regarding FTAIA: (1) what is the definition of "import commerce" contemplated by FTAIA, and (2) what is required "to show that foreign conduct has a direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect on U.S. domestic or import commerce." Id. at 855.

The court answered the first question thusly:

> [T]ransactions that are directly between the plaintiff purchasers and the defendant [potash producers] are the import commerce of the United States in this sector. The FTAIA does not require any special showing in order to bring these transactions back into the Sherman Act . . . because they were never removed from the statute.

Id. at 855. The only applicable rules to such transactions are the rules governing import commerce, which is covered by the Sherman Act whenever "foreign conduct produc[es] a substantial intended effect in the United States." Id. (citing Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Cal., 509 U.S. 764, 797 (1993)). Some of the alleged conduct of defendants in Minn-Chem satisfied the standard for "import commerce," but other defendants were not alleged to have made any sales directly to customers in the United States. Id. Plaintiffs [*28] had nevertheless argued that those defendants' sales to other countries were an important part of the overall conspiracy. Id. Those claims, the court explained, must meet the FTAIA elements to be actionable. Id. at 856.

The court first asked whether defendants alleged conduct "involves foreign commerce," and found that it plainly did, and was therefore excluded under the general rule. Id. The court next applied the elements of the FTAIA exception seriatim, asking whether plaintiffs had alleged a substantial effect on domestic commerce, and finding they had where the complaint alleged that 5.3 million tons of potash had been imported into the United States in 2008, the "vast majority" of which was from defendants, and that the price of potash had increased 600% between 2003 and 2008. Id. The court next asked whether plaintiffs had alleged a reasonably foreseeable effect on domestic commerce, and found that it was "objectively foreseeable that an international cartel with a grip on 71% of the world's supply of a homogeneous commodity will charge supracompetitive prices," and that after accounting for shipping costs, such prices "will be uniform throughout the world" so long as arbitrage was possible. [*29] Id.

Finally, the Minn-Chem court turned to the question of "what it takes to show 'direct' effects" under FTAIA. Id. The court considered one definition applied to the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act: "that an effect is 'direct' if it 'follows as an immediate consequence of the defendant's . . . activity.'" Id. (quoting Republic of Argentina v. Weltover, Inc., 504 U.S. 607 (1992)). This had been the definition used by Judge Illston in the multidistrict litigation a well. In re TFT-LCD Antitrust Litigation, 822 F. Supp. 2d 953, 963 (N.D. Cal. 2011). An amicus brief filed by the U.S. Department of Justice encouraged the Seventh Circuit to adopt a less stringent definition, finding that "for FTAIA purposes, the term 'direct' means only 'a reasonably proximate causal nexus.'" Minn-Chem, Inc., 683 F.3d at 857 (internal citations omitted).

The Seventh Circuit adopted the less stringent definition advocated by the U.S. Department of Justice, finding their approach was "more consistent with the language" of FTAIA. Id. Having decided on the interpretation, the court applied this test to the allegations of the complaint, and found that direct effects were alleged where plaintiffs asserted that defendants had fixed prices in other countries that "showed up almost immediately in the prices of U.S. imports," and that the potash production cartel "established benchmark [*30] prices in markets where it was relatively free to operate, and then applied those prices to its U.S. sales." Id. at 859. "It is no stretch," the court held, "to say that the foreign supply restrictions, and the concomitant price increases forced upon the Chinese purchasers, were a direct — that is, proximate — cause of the subsequent price increases in the United States." Id.

The court contrasted these facts with the facts of Empagran, where plaintiffs were foreign consumers injured by effects on a foreign market. Id. at 860. "It is the U.S. authorities or private plaintiffs who have the incentive — and the right — to complain about overcharges paid as a result of the potash cartel." Id. It was not, the court opined, a "situation in which action in a foreign country filters through many layers and finally causes a few ripples in the United States." Id. The Minn Chem court, like the federal district courts in SRAM and the multidistrict litigation, found FTAIA applicable to the allegations, giving plaintiffs an opportunity to meet their burden of proof at a later date. More importantly, it provided clarity on what constitutes a "direct effect," adopting an even lower threshold than that applied by Judge [*31] Illston in the multidistrict litigation in one of the most thorough analyses of FTAIA post-Empagran.

In 2014 the Second Circuit also addressed the question of what constitutes a "direct" effect in another case involving components of consumer electronics called Lotes Company, Ltd. v. Hon Hai Precision Industry Company, Ltd. 753 F.3d 395 (2d Cir. 2014). The Lotes plaintiff was a Taiwanese manufacturer of USB connectors who alleged that other dominant manufacturers in the USB market were involved in an anticompetitive monopolization scheme to exclude it from the market for products, such as laptops, in which its USB connectors were typically incorporated. Id. at 399. Although the transactions between plaintiff and defendants occurred in China, plaintiff alleged that the monopolization of the USB market by its competitors would cause a rise in prices that would be passed through directly to consumers, including consumers in the United States. Id. at 402.

Defendants in Lotes filed a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction (believing FTAIA to be a jurisdictional bar) and also for failure to plausibly allege a direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable effect on any market in the United States. Id. at 403. The federal district court, applying the same standard of directness embraced by [*32] Judge Illston in the multidistict litigation, granted the motion to dismiss and plaintiff appealed. Id. On appeal, the Second Circuit held, just as the Minn-Chem court had, that FTAIA is not a jurisdictional bar and instead sets forth the elements of an antitrust claim. Id. at 405. However, the appellate court rejected the district court's application of the directness standard - requiring the effect to be "immediate" - and opted instead for the standard applied by the Seventh Circuit in Minn-Chem, which required only "proximate causation." Id. at 411-12.

The Lotes court opined at length that the fact that the USB connectors were sold abroad and then integrated into consumer products that later were imported and sold in the United States did not necessarily render the effect of defendants' conduct "indirect." Id. at 412-13. The court explained:

> There is nothing inherent in the nature of outsourcing or international supply chains that necessarily prevents the transmission of anticompetitive harms or renders any and all domestic effects impermissibly remote and indirect. Indeed, given the important role that American firms and consumers play in the global economy, we expect that some perpetrators will design foreign anticompetitive [*33] schemes for the very purpose of causing harmful downstream effects in the United States. Whether the causal nexus between foreign conduct and a domestic effect is sufficiently "direct" under the FTAIA in a particular case will depend on many factors, including the structure of the market and the nature of the commercial relationships at each link in the causal chain. Courts confronting claims under the FTAIA will have to consider all of the relevant facts, using all of the traditional tools courts have used to analyze questions of proximate causation.

Id. at 413. Nevertheless, the court failed to actually reach the question of whether defendants' conduct was in fact direct, because it found that, even if the effect on the United States had been direct, the injury to plaintiff did not arise from that effect where plaintiff was a foreign entity transacting with defendants overseas, just like the plaintiffs in Empagran. Id. at 414-15 (citing F. Hoffmann-La Roche Ltd. V. Empagran S.A. 542 U.S. 155, 173 (2004)). Lotes therefore adds weight to the standard of directness adopted by the Seventh Circuit Minn-Chem, and supports the proposition that a component sold overseas might have a direct effect on the domestic market for a consumer product in the United States. Lotes also offers [*34] a consistent application of the Supreme Court's rule from Empagran that any claim of damages resulting from a price increase must arise specifically from such domestic effect.

The Seventh Circuit addressed the requirements of FTAIA in another 2014 case called Motorola Mobility LLC v. AU Optronics Corporation. 775 F.3d 816 (7th Cir. 2014). Motorola also arose out of the same alleged LCD price-fixing conspiracy at issue in the instant suit, but the claim was brought by Motorola and its ten foreign subsidiaries rather than an indirect purchaser class, as in the multidistrict litigation, or a government entity, as here. Id. at 817. The federal district court granted summary judgment in favor of defendants on the question of whether LCDs bought by foreign subsidiaries of Motorola and then shipped to Motorola for sale in the United States could give rise to a claim of damages to Motorola under the Sherman Act. Id. The court affirmed the judgment in favor of defendants because "the victims of the price fixing of LCD panels were Motorola's foreign subsidiaries," while "Motorola itself, along with U.S. purchasers of cellphones incorporating those panels, were at most derivative victims." Id. 818.

The court acknowledged that Motorola had a claim for the small percentage of sales made by defendants directly [*35] to Motorola or its subsidiaries in the United States, since those direct sales constituted import commerce not excluded from federal antitrust law by FTAIA. Id. at 817. However, sales to Motorola's foreign subsidiaries occurred prior to importation, therefore the court examined claims based on those sales to determine whether any overcharge arose from a "direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable" effect on domestic commerce in the United States. Id. at 819. The court had no trouble perceiving that there was an effect on domestic commerce, or with finding that the effect would be reasonably foreseeable where defendants knew some of the LCDs would be incorporated into products bound for the United States. Id.

With respect to directness, the court concluded that the effect was "less direct than the conduct in Minn-Chem," where all defendants had allegedly conspired to drive up global prices and most defendants had sold directly to customers in the United States, but did not rule out the possibility that the effect in the case before it might still be "direct rather than 'remote.'" Id. The court speculated that sale of LCDs by defendants to foreign subsidiaries who "incorporated them into the finished [*36] product and sold the finished product to Motorola for resale in the United States . . . doesn't seem like 'many layers,' resulting in just 'a few ripples' in the United States cellphone market." Id. at 819. The court therefore assumed that the effect could have been both direct and substantial as well. Id.

The problem for the Motorola court was that "the immediate victims of the price fixing were [Motorola's] foreign subsidiaries," not Motorola itself. Id. at 820. Those subsidiaries were governed by and had to seek relief under the law of the countries in which either they or the defendants were incorporated and conducted their transactions; Motorola, as a parent company, had no right to seek relief on their behalf. Id. Motorola argued that it was the target of the alleged price-fixing, and was the "real buyer" of the LCD panels through its subsidiaries, but the court pointed out that Motorola's expert had only provided overcharge estimates for foreign subsidiaries, not Motorola. Id. at 821-22. The court explained that "having chosen to conduct its LCD purchases through legally distinct entities organized under foreign law, [Motorola] cannot now impute to itself the harm suffered by them." Id. at 822.

The court further found that Motorola [*37] ran up against the indirect purchaser or "first sale" doctrine of Illinois Brick. Id. at 821 (citing Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720 (1977)). This was the case distinguished by the Loeb court as only barring "derivative" injuries — that is, injuries incurred by subsequent purchasers of the same product — but not "separate and compensable injuries" resulting from anti-competitive conduct in a different market. Loeb Indus. v. Sumitomo Corp., 306 F.3d 469, 483 (7th Cir. 2002). Motorola, however, had based all its damages on the allegedly inflated prices of LCDs sold to foreign subsidiaries; it waived arguments that it was damaged by "the cost to Motorola of cellphones incorporating those [LCDs as components]," specifically admitting that "Motorola is not basing its claims on the purchase of finished LCD Products." Motorola Mobility LLC, 775 F.3d at 823-24.

Although the court rejected Motorola's claims against defendants based on sales to its foreign subsidiaries, the Seventh Circuit also addressed concerns, raised by the U.S. Justice Department in an amicus brief, that the court's ruling against Motorola would interfere with prosecution by government entities of antitrust violations by foreign companies. Id. at 825. The court distinguished actions by the government from actions by private entities, which raise concerns over comity and interference [*38] with foreign nation's enforcement of their own antitrust laws. Id. at 824-25. "Motorola's inability to mount the kind of private antitrust suit that it is attempting in this case does not foredoom the use of antitrust law to prevent and punish the kind of foreign cartelization harmful to Motorola's subsidiaries." Id. at 826. Motorola thus again confirmed that it is not enough under FTAIA that plaintiff has been damaged somewhere down the line as a result of defendant's anticompetitive conduct. The conduct must have a direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect on domestic commerce and plaintiff's injury must arise out of that effect, not out of some independent effect on foreign commerce. Motorola also suggests that concerns about application of antitrust laws to foreign conduct are greater when a private plaintiff is bringing the suit than when a government entity brings suit.

Finally, the Ninth Circuit addressed the directness element of an FTAIA analysis in a criminal antitrust case against the AU Optronics Defendants and two of the company's officers based upon the same alleged price-fixing conduct at issue in the instant civil suit. United States v. Hui Hsiung, 778 F.3d 738 (9th Cir. 2015). The criminal defendants, after conviction and sentencing, raised a number [*39] of issues on appeal, including whether the indictment and evidence at trial satisfied the requirements of FTAIA with respect to the effects of their activity on the domestic market being "direct." Id. at 750. The Ninth Circuit agreed with Minn-Chem and other prior case law that the FTAIA elements are not a jurisdictional bar, but rather "a component of the merits of a Sherman Act claim involving nonimport trade or commerce with foreign nations." Id. at 751 (internal citations omitted). Defendants in Hsiung acknowledged that the domestic effects of their conduct were substantial and reasonably foreseeable, but argued that their conduct had no direct effect on domestic commerce because much of the conduct occurred overseas and was thus "too attenuated from the United States," and that "the intervening development, manufacture, and sale of the [finished products containing defendants' LCDs] worldwide" resulted in only a "diffuse effect." Id. at 758.

The Ninth Circuit utilized the same language to analyze "directness" that had been applied by Judge Illston in the multidistrict litigation, but which had been expanded in favor of broader language by the Minn-Chem and Lotes courts, holding that "conduct has a 'direct' effect for [*40] purposes of the domestic effects exception to the FTAIA if it follows as an immediate consequence of the defendants' activity." Id. at 758 (quoting United States v. LSL Biotechnologies, 379 F.3d 672, 680-81 (9th Cir. 2004)); In re TFT-LCD Antitrust Litigation, 822 F. Supp. 2d 953, 963 (N.D. Cal. 2011); Minn-Chem, Inc. v. Agrium Inc., 683 F.3d 845, 857 (2012) (internal citations omitted); Lotes Co., Ltd. v. Hon Hai Precision Indus. Co., Ltd. 753 F.3d 395, 411-12 (2d Cir. 2014). The Hsiung court found that the indictment sufficiently alleged directness, and that there was sufficient evidence at trial to support such finding in a criminal law context as well. Hui Hsiung, 778 F.3d at 756.

This direct connection was "neither speculative nor insulated by multiple disconnected layers of transactions" where the impact on the United States market "was direct and followed 'as an immediate consequence' of the price fixing." Id. at 759. Facts on which the court based its finding included that the LCDs were a "substantial cost component of the finished products," that certain meetings at which the price fixing initially occurred "led to direct negotiations with United States companies, both domestically and overseas, on pricing decisions," and that "it was well understood that substantial numbers of finished products were destined for the United States and that the practical upshot of the conspiracy would be and was increased prices to customers in the United States." Id.

The court specifically distinguished Motorola, which involved the same [*41] underlying conduct, because the Seventh Circuit in that case — while not making an express finding on directness — had explained that its interpretation of the FTAIA would not block the government from bringing criminal or civil actions, as was the case in Hsiung. Id. at 760 (citing Motorola Mobility LLC, 775 F.3d at 816). Hsiung involved a post-conviction appeal in a criminal matter, and therefore had the benefit of reviewing evidence already presented as opposed to deciding whether a claim had been sufficiently stated. Nevertheless, Hsiung provides examples of the types of facts that are relevant to questions of directness and provides further support for the Motorola court's suggestion that Illinois Brick is not meant to serve as a bar to government enforcement of antitrust laws.

II. Interpretation and Application of the Illinois Antitrust Act

Applying this body of case law to the allegations of the instant suit, there is no question that the LCD panels delivered and billed by Defendants to buyers overseas (approximately 97% of the alleged transactions) are not "import commerce" because those were not transactions "directly between the plaintiff purchasers and the defendant[s]." Minn-Chem, Inc., 683 F.3d at 855; Hui Hsiung, 778 F.3d at 755. It is equally clear that most of the alleged price-fixing [*42] activity by Defendants was conducted abroad, and is thus removed from the IAA's reach by section 5(14)'s general rule placing non-import foreign commerce outside the scope of the statute. F. Hoffmann-La Roche Ltd. V. Empagran S.A. 542 U.S. 155, 161 (2004).

The Court therefore turns to the elements of the domestic effects exception to see whether I Defendants' alleged overseas conduct is nevertheless brought back within the scope of the IAA through a direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect on domestic commerce that gives rise to the State's claims. Id. at 162, 164. This Court finds that the eel et on domestic commerce in the instant case was substantial where the State has alleged it resulted in $179 million in overcharges to businesses and consumers. P1. MSJ at 10. Furthermore. thi, effect was reasonably foreseeable where the I CD:, in question accounted for anywhere from a tenth to over half the cost of the consumer products in which they were installed, and where Defendants produced approximately 80% of the world's LCDs during the time period in question, many of which were certain to end up in the United States, the second biggest importer of LCD products. Pl. MSJ at 2, 9-10.

With respect to whether the effect was direct, the State argues that Defendants are [*43] precluded from re-litigating this issue because it was already decided by Judge Illston in the multidistrict case. TFT-LCD, 822 F. Supp. 2d at 962; Pl. MSJ at 22. Issue preclusion, also referred to as collateral estoppel, may be applied "when the issue decided in the prior adjudication is identical with the one presented in the current action, there was a final judgment on the merits in the prior adjudication, and the party against whom estoppel is asserted was a party to, or in privity with a party to, the prior adjudication." DuPage Forklift Serv., Inc. v. Material Handling Servs., Inc., 195 Ill.2d 71, 80 2001. This doctrine is not limited to fact determinations; it reaches issues of law as well, including where one action was in federal court and another in state court. Id. However, the DuPage case only concerned issues 01 state law decided in different courts. Id. In the instant case, the State argues that a decision by a federal court as to whether Defendants' conduct had a "direct effect" under FTAIA should preclude Defendants from litigating whether their conduct had a "direct effect" under section 5(14) of the IAA.

The Court is convinced by federal case law interpreting FTAIA, including the multidistrict litigation involving the same facts at issue here, that the "direct effect" element of the IAA is also met by the State's [*44] allegations in the instant suit. The precedential nature of those cases, to which the General Assembly has instructed this Court to look for guidance, is nevertheless only persuasive. It remains possible for Illinois courts to interpret the IAA differently than federal courts have interpreted FTAIA, particularly where there is not a completely unified federal approach, as indicated with the varying language applied by different circuits to define directness. This Court therefore looks to such federal cases as the basis for its reasoning, but does not consider the question before it precluded by any of them.

Turning to the substance of those federal cases, the Court finds particularly persuasive guidance from the SRAM and TFT-LCD decisions on this same issue, relating to the exact same or very similar facts, and at the same procedural posture as the instant suit. In the SRAM case the allegedly price-fixed memory was a component sold by defendants overseas and then integrated into consumer products that were later sold in the United States at inflated pi lees. In re Status Random Access Memory (SRAM) Antitrust Litigation, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141968 (N.D. Cal.), *46. Judge Wilken found that defendants' targeting of the United States by producing certain price-fixed memory specifically designed [*45] to be sold to particular manufacturers and incorporated into products designed for the United States market was sufficient to allow indirect purchaser claims to continue to trial. Id. at *47. In the instant suit, the State alleges that Defendants visited customers in the United States and -sent engineers to those customers because their LCDs' specifications had to meet U.S. customers' needs." Pl. MSJ at 3. The State provides examples of four specific products, sold by companies based in the United States (Hewlett Packard, Motorola, Dell, and Apple) to domestic consumers, which were the subject of meetings or communications between Defendants and those companies to determine prices of LCDs specifically for those products. Pl. MSJ at 6-7. Just as in the SRAM case, these are examples of specific targeting of the market for consumer products containing Defendants' component LCDs in the United States.

In the multidistrict litigation, defendants summarized the process by which their LCD panels eventually made their way into the hands of indirect purchaser plaintiffs as follows:

> 1. Foreign LCD manufacturers — primarily Korean, Taiwanese or Japanese companies such as Defendants — manufactured [*46] LCD panels in their overseas facilities;
> 2. The foreign LCD manufacturers sold LCD panels to foreign [original design manufacturers or "ODMs"] or [foreign system integrators or "SIs"] (such as TPV, Compal or Wistron), either directly or via an intermediate sale, e.g. to a foreign [foreign original equipment manufacturers or "OEMs"] (such as a Dell or HP foreign affiliate);
> 3. The foreign ODMs or SIs assembled finished products (such as televisions, monitors or notebook computers) in overseas facilities using the LCD panels they purchased from the foreign LCD panel manufacturers;
> 4. The foreign ODMs or SIs sold the finished products to brand-name electronics companies, including foreign OEMs such as Acer, Asus and Proview and historically U.S.-based OEMs, such as Dell or HP, or their foreign affiliates;
> 5. These domestic or foreign OEMs imported the finished products into various countries around the world, including the United States;
> 6. The OEMs sold the LCD televisions, computer monitors, and notebook computers to distributors, to retailers such as Best Buy or Walmart, or directly to end consumers, e.g., via the Internet;
> 7. The retailers sold the finished LCD products to end consumers [*47] in the individual states, including presumably the [indirect purchaser plaintiffs] (or the distributors [962] sold to retailers, that in turn sold to the end consumers).

TFT-LCD, 822 F. Supp. 2d at 961-62. This description is nearly word-for-word the same as Defendants' description of the process by which LCDs made their way to consumers in the instant suit, which of course makes sense given that the multidistrict litigation arises from the same set of facts. Df. MSJ at 7-8.

Indirect purchaser plaintiffs in the multidistrict litigation did not dispute defendants' account of the LCDs' journey, but argued that the effect of defendants' conspiracy was "passed through" directly to consumers in the United States. TFT-LCD, 822 F. Supp. 2d at 962. Plaintiffs argued the facts were sufficient to support a claim of a direct effect because defendants' alleged conspiracy was deliberately targeted at the United States, which was one of the largest markets for products containing LCDs. Id. Defendants specifically utilized their subsidiaries and employees in the United States to market directly to American companies. Id. Furthermore, defendants' pricing strategies were "informed" by monitoring of "street prices" in the United States. Id.

A number of depositions and [*48] declarations cited by the multidistric court as supporting the indirect purchaser plaintiffs' theory are also offered by the State in support of their motion in the instant suit, including documents "illustrat[ing] the degree to which the conspiracy was focused on American OEMs." Id.; Pl. MSJ Ex. 31; see also Pl. MSJ Ex. 9 (deposition of Po-Chang "Edward" Hung); Pl. MSJ Ex. 40 (deposition of Heon Seong Kim). The Court need not even analogize to the multidistrict litigation because the facts which are before this Court now were exactly the same as those which informed Judge Illston's determination that a direct effect had been articulated by the indirect purchaser plaintiffs. TFT-LCD, 822 F. Supp. 2d at 964.

One aspect of Judge Illston's reasoning which this Court finds particularly persuasive is her observation that limiting the interpretation of "direct effects" to only the harm caused by the first sale of a price-fixed product would "all but eviscerate the distinction between the 'domestic injury' exception and 'import commerce,' which is not subject to the FTAIA." Id. at 963. This same reasoning was also noted by the Second Circuit in Lotes. Lotes Co., Ltd, 753 F.3d at 411 ("to demand that any domestic effect must follow as an immediate consequence of a defendant's [*49] foreign anticompetitive conduct would all but collapse the FTAIA's domestic effects exception into its separate import exclusion"). Judge Illston and the Second Circuit recognized that foreign conduct can have a direct effect on more than just the first sale of a price-fixed item to the United States. This is because the term "import commerce" in the first sentence of FTAIA already contemplates directness; therefore the directness element in subpart (1) of that statute would be rendered superfluous if it did not address a different set of circumstances from "import commerce." See Minn-Chem, Inc., 683 F.3d at 855 (clarifying when import commerce is covered by the Sherman Act).

Put another way, the first sale to a domestic purchaser of an item price-fixed overseas is "import commerce," See id.; see also Hui Hsiung, 778 F.3d at 755. The first sentence of FTAIA makes clear that the elements of subpart (1) ("direct, substantial, reasonably foreseeable") only apply to conduct involving foreign commerce other than import commerce. Therefore, in order for this Court's interpretation of FTAIA and Section 5(14) of the IAA to have a harmonious result, the Court is obligated to read subpart (1) of FTAIA and Section 5(14)(a)(i) of the IAA as contemplating something other than "import commerce." See Wolf v. Toolie, 2014 IL App (1st) 132243, ¶ 21 ("different sections [*50] of the same statute should be considered in reference to one another so that they are given harmonious effect." (internal citation omitted)). Such analysis leads to the ineluctable result that "direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable" encompasses one or more transactions aside from the first sale by an overseas entity to a buyer in the United States.

Defendants themselves acknowledge the logic in this where they state in their brief that "if the import commerce exclusion applied to foreign restraints that merely had effects on import commerce, then there would be no work left to be done by the domestic effects exception[.]" Df. MSJ at 12 (emphasis in original). Defendants should thus have no trouble seeing that the direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect with which the legislators who crafted FTAIA and the IAA were concerned was distinct from any effect on the overseas market, or even on the first sale to a customer based in the United States.[11]

Having rejected Defendants' argument that only the first sale of a price-fixed product can have the requisite direct effect, the Court examines the varying standards of directness applied by the [*51] courts in the multidistrict litigation and in Minn-Chem. TFT-LCD, 822 F. Supp. 2d at 963 (a direct effect "proceeds from one point to another . . . without deviation or interruption [and] must follow as an immediate consequence of the defendant's activity"); Minn-Chem, Inc., 683 F.3d at 857 (a direct effect requires "only a reasonable proximate causal nexus"). The standard described by the Seventh Circuit in Minn-Chem is without question easier to meet than the standard described by Judge Illston in the multidistrict litigation. This Court need not choose between them, however, since the allegations in the instant case meet either standard.

If directness is, as the Seventh Circuit held, merely a "reasonably proximate causal nexus," then such nexus is certainly found if the State's allegations are proven that Defendants conspired to fix prices of LCDs, for which they produced approximately 80% of the world's supply, and for which the United States was one of the largest markets, which Defendants specifically targeted through customized designs and marketing. Pl. MSJ at 2-3, 6-7, 9-10.

If, alternatively, directness is an effect proceeding from one point to the next "without deviation or interruption," which "must follow as an immediate consequence" of Defendant's [*52] alleged price-fixing abroad, the State has argued that the inflated prices were not absorbed by intermediaries who assembled or distributed consumer products containing the LCDs, but were instead passed on directly to businesses and consumers in the United States, including in Illinois. Pl. MSJ at 10. The "nature of the effect," in such circumstances, did not 'change in any substantial way before [reaching] the United States consumer," and can thus be considered an "'immediate consequence' of the defendant's anticompetitive behavior." TFT-LCD, 822 F.Supp. 2d at 964. This was the [11] Defendants argue that Judge Illston's reasoning was incorrect, and that the domestic effects exception would not be rendered inoperative next to the exclusion of import commerce from FTAIA, even if it were held not to cover more than the first sale of a price-inflated product. Df. Reply at 29-30. Defendants argue it would still reach harm to exports, price-tying between foreign and domestic products, and monopolization harming domestic commerce. Df. Reply at 30. However, Defendants' reference to other types of conduct potentially addressed by FTAIA is a red herring. FTAIA does not address any specific underlying antitrust conduct that is embedded in other substantive antitrust statutes. FTAIA speaks to the nature of the effect (i.e., "direct, substantial, reasonably foreseeable") of the alleged conduct. TFT-LCD, 822 F. Supp. 2d at 963; Lotes Co., Ltd., 753 F.3d at 411. Defendants' attempt to address FTAIA with particular types of antitrust conduct thus fails where only the effects of that conduct are at issue.

standard which Judge Elston found these same facts had satisfied in the multidistrict litigation, and this Court agrees with her sagacious determination.

Having found that the effect at issue here was substantial, reasonably foreseeable, and direct, the Court turns to the final prong of analysis: whether that effect gives rise to the State's claims of injury. Defendants argue that it did not, and that the instant suit is like Motorola, where the only damages alleged were incurred by foreign entities, and thus arose from a separate effect on a foreign market. Df. MSJ at 20. Motorola is clearly distinguishable since the State of Illinois is not asserting [*53] a claim for damages incurred by any person or entity that made purchases overseas the way Motorola attempted to make a claim based on damages incurred by its foreign subsidiaries. Here the State is asserting claims for itself and residents of Illinois, all of whose purchases occurred in the United States and could thus only have arisen out of an effect on the domestic market.[12]

As the United States Supreme Court noted in Empagran, "the application of our antitrust laws to foreign anticompetitive conduct is . . . reasonable . . . insofar as [the antitrust laws] reflect a legislative effort to redress domestic antitrust injury that foreign anticompetitive conduct has caused." F. Hoffmann-La Roche Ltd. V. Empagran S.A. 542 U.S. 155, 165 (2004) (emphasis in original). That is precisely the circumstance here, where the General Assembly has made clear that "no action under [the IAA] shall be barred on the grounds that the activities or conduct complained of in any way affects or involves . . . foreign commerce," and adopted FTAIA's specifications as to how causation of harm by foreign anticompetitive conduct could be demonstrated. 740 ILCS 10/7.9; 740 ILCS 10/5.

Defendants argue that the effect on the domestic market for consumer products containing LCDs in the [*54] United States is "separated by a long and winding distribution chain" from the overseas market into which they sold their LCD panels. Df. MSJ at 15. In particular, they argue that the LCDs were transformed into "complex products containing many other components," and that "an injury in a different market from the market in which the [anticompetitive conduct] occurs is an indirect effect, not a direct one." Df. MSJ at 15; Df. Reply at 9-10. Defendants cite a number of cases in support of this position, none of which deal specifically with FTAIA or foreign transactions. See Am. Ad Mgmt. v. Gen. Tel. Co., 190 F.3d 1051, 1057 (9th Cir. 1999); Bhan v. NME Hosps., Inc., 772 F.2d 1467, 1470 (9th Cir. 1985); Assoc. Gen Contractors v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 538 (1983); Philip Morris, 353 Ill. App. 3d 55, 62 (1st Dist. 2004). The one case cited by Defendants which does deal with foreign conduct (though not FTAIA) does not support their position: the Loeb court, in the first antitrust decision discussed supra, held that where an antitrust conspiracy gives rise to "different injuries in distinct markets," those injuries may nonetheless be actionable under federal antitrust law. Loeb Indus. v. Sumitomo Corp., 306 F.3d 469, 482-83 (7th Cir. 2002).

Defendants also argue that there are too many intermediaries separating them from consumers in Illinois for those consumers' injury to arise out of any effect caused by Defendants, particularly where some of the overcharges were "dissipated" along the way [*55] rather than passed directly through to consumers. Df. MSJ at 15, 18; Df. Reply at 11. Defendants cite the Minn-Chem, Loeb, and Motorola cases in support, but again cherry-pick language while ignoring the actual holdings of those cases. Df. MSJ at 18. As discussed supra, the Minn-Chem court adopted an even lower standard of "directness" than previous courts had applied, finding sufficient proximate causation where price-fixing overseas had affected prices in the United States. Minn-Chem, Inc., 683 F.3d at 859. The Loeb court found injury in an entirely separate market actionable, and the court in Motorola commented that the effect did not seem indirect, but that the only overcharges alleged were incurred by foreign subsidiaries, not Motorola itself, distinguishing Motorola from cases where overcharges are passed through to consumers. Loeb Indus., 306 F.3d at 482-83; Motorola Mobility LLC, 775 F.3d at 819, 823.

[12] Defendants also insist that the State must segregate claims based on the FIAIA exception from claims based on import commerce in accordance with the SRAM case, else "all of their damage claims fail." Df. Reply at 4; *SRAM, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141968, 48. Even assuming arguendo that SRAM would command such result, the court in SRAM allowed all of the claims in that case to proceed to trial, where sufficient evidence supporting each type of claim would be presented. *SRAM, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 141968, 48. The SRAM determination thus does not support dismissal of such claims as a matter of law at this procedural juncture.

Defendants point to one estimate that approximately 60% of the overcharge stemming from LCD panels incorporated into cellular phones was dissipated by intermediaries. Df. MSJ at 18. The Court notes that, of the many consumer products involved in the instant suit, the LCD component in cellular phones represented the lowest cost-percentage in the overall price when compared with LCD components in any other [*56] type of product. See Pl. MSJ at 2, 9-10. It is therefore reasonable to infer, at this stage of the proceeding, that dissipation of overcharges would also be greatest in cellular phones, and less in other types of products. In fact Defendants' own expert has concluded that, depending on the product type, between 50-100% of overcharges for the LCD panels were passed through to the sale price for the final consumer product. Pl. MSJ at 28. The Court declines to designate a bright-line percentage of cost at which an effect can no longer be considered "direct" under any circumstances. The Court finds the allegation that around half the overcharge, at a minimum, was passed on to consumers, and as much as 100% in some instances, could be sufficient, when viewed in conjunction with all of the relevant factors, to support a finding of a direct effect.[13]

Finally, Defendants have raised the rather alarmist argument that if this Court holds that section 5(14) of the IAA applies to the State's claims in the instant case nothing will prevent future plaintiffs from applying Illinois law to foreign transactions far removed from Illinois consumers. Df. MSJ at 22. They hypothesize that "an Egyptian cotton farmer's sales to [*57] an Egyptian cotton merchant" will be actionable under the IAA "if the merchant paid an anticompetitive price that eventually filtered into the price of clothing sold at a Chicago retail outlet." Df. MSJ at 22. While this may be a hypothetical possibility in a technical sense, it is highly unlikely to ever be a reality given that, in order to be actionable under the IAA, an effect on the domestic market needs to be direct and substantial and reasonably foreseeable. 780 ILCS 10/5. Likewise, Defendants proposition that the Attorney General could use the IAA to halt a merger of "foreign companies that produce a two percent component of a product that passes through a ten-step foreign manufacturing and distribution chain before it reaches the United States," is highly distinguishable from the facts of the instant case, where the components at issue represented at minimum four to five times that percentage of the ultimate consumer product price. Df. MSJ at 22; Df. Reply at 3, 14; Pl. MSJ at 2, 9-10. The Court is thus not dissuaded by these highly unlikely speculations as to the purportedly far-reaching implications of its ruling.

In the course of oral argument, the State clarified its Motion for Partial [*58] Summary Judgment. The State explained that since experts for both the State and Defendants concluded that 50% to 100% of the original LCD price overcharge was passed through to the ultimate purchasers, the State had shown that Defendants conduct was "direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable" as a matter of law and was entitled to such a finding from this Court. As the Court has already explained, the underlying dispute between the parties involves multiple types of products which contained the LCD panels, such as cell phones, computers, notebooks, and tablets, as well as other electronic products. Pl. MSJ at 10. The LCD components within these products manifested varying percentages of the overall price of the final product. Thus the LCD component in a cell phone constituted approximately 9% of the total price while the LCD component in a monitor was approximately 56% of the total price. Pl. MSJ at 10. The Defendants have argued that some of the overcharges were dissipated in the transactions between companies in the distribution chain. Df. MSJ at 18.

In the event that this Court accedes to the State's request, it would make a blanket finding as to all products, notwithstanding [*59] the fact that substantial differences may have existed between products devolving on the issue of the "directness" of the Defendants" conduct. Furthermore, a finding in favor of the State on the issue of "directness" at the Summary Judgment stage would prejudice Defendants and deprive them from the opportunity of positing a defense based on the structure of the market and the nature of the commercial relationships at each link of the causal chain. The Court therefore declines the State's request to find that it has established "directness" as a matter of law based solely on the experts' price pass through conclusions. Still, the Court's conclusion should not be construed as a specific finding regarding to the nature of the State's evidentiary burden at trial, or what quantum of proof is necessary to establish a prima ficie showing of "directness." That determination must await the trial.

[13] As the Second Circuit explained in Lotes, directness depends on "many factors, including the structure of the market and the nature of the commercial relationships at each link in the causal chain." Lotes Company, Ltd. v. Hon Hai Precision Industry Company, Ltd. 753 F.3d 395, 413 (2d Cir. 2014).

For all the foregoing reasons, the Court finds that section 5(14) of the IAA is applicable to the Complaint by the State on behalf of itself and its residents, which alleges an injury arising out of a direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable effect of Defendants' conduct on domestic commerce in the United States, which [*60] conduct is also alleged to be in violation of section 3(1) of the IAA.

IT IS, THEREFORE, HEREBY ORDERED that:

1. Defendants' Joint Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on the Attorney General's Foreign Commerce Claims is DENIED;

2. The State of Illinois' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on Antitrust Law's Domestic-Injury Exception is GRANTED to the extent that the State is permitted to propound proof of the domestic injury exception, however the Court reserves the question of whether the State has met its burden on this issue pending trial;
3. This matter is continued for status on June 14 at 10:30 am without further notice.

ORDER ON DEFENDANTS' MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGEMENT RELATING TO STATE LAW CLAIMS

I. INTRODUCTION

Now before the Court are two motions for summary judgment asking the Court to dismiss Direct Action Purchaser ("DAP") Costco's state law claims on due process, ECF Nos. 3029 ("DP Mot."), and choice-of-law grounds, ECF No. 2997 ("COL Mot."). The parties submitted a consolidated Opposition, ECF No. 3264 ("Opp'n"), and consolidated Reply, 3469 ("Reply"), to both motions. Due to various settlements and dismissals after the filing of these motions, Costco's California claims are the only remaining claims at issue. Oral argument was held on March 28, 2016. Defendants' choice-of-law motion is GRANTED, and their due process motion is DENIED as MOOT.[1]

II. FACTS

The history of this case is well known to parties. By way of summation, this case is predicated upon an alleged conspiracy to price-fix cathode ray tubes ("CRTs"), [*168] a core component of tube-style screens for common devices including televisions and computer monitors. This conspiracy ran from March 1, 1995 to November 25, 2007 (the "Conspiracy Period"), involved many of the major companies that produced CRTs, and allegedly resulted in overcharges of billions of U.S. dollars to domestic companies that purchased and sold CRTs or products containing CRTs ("CRT Finished Products") for purposes such as personal use. A civil suit was originally filed in 2007, ECF No. 1, consolidated by the Joint Panel on Multidistrict Litigation shortly thereafter, see ECF No. 122, assigned as a Multidistrict Litigation case ("MDL") to Judge Samuel Conti, see id., and ultimately transferred to the undersigned, see ECF No. 4162.

[1] The Court previously filed this order provisionally under seal on April 19, 2016. ECF No. 4582. No party has filed a motion to seal any part of that order. Accordingly, pursuant to ECF No. 4477 ¶ 5, the Court now files the motion on the public docket.

In addition to two class actions, this MDL involves various direct actions from individual plaintiffs who have opted out of the class actions. Each DAP alleges that it bought at least one CRT Finished Product from a Defendant or an entity owned or controlled by a Defendant. The DAPs, despite their moniker, are classified as indirect purchasers under antitrust law -- not direct purchasers. Defendants bring the instant motions against DAP Costco. [*169]

Costco filed indirect purchaser claims under California law for CRT Finished Product purchases it made during the Conspiracy Period for its stores throughout the United States. Because Costco filed its lawsuit in Washington before the case was transferred to this Court, Washington's choice-of-law rules apply. In re Nucorp Energy Sec. Litig., 772 F.2d 1486, 1492 (9th Cir. 1985) (holding that courts apply the choice-of-law rules of each state where the individual actions of an MDL were originally filed). Defendants argue in their choice-of-law motion that Washington's choice-of-law rules dictate that Washington law should apply. Accordingly, they ask the Court to dismiss Costco's California claims. In their due process motion, Defendants argue that Costco's California claims should be dismissed for the independent reason that they violate due process. Insofar as Washington law applies, however, Defendants' due process motion is moot.

The instant motions turn on California's and Washington's respective contacts with the parties and the underlying transactions. In 1993, Costco merged with Price Club, a California company, and incorporated in Delaware. In 1999, however, Costco reincorporated in Washington. Costco's headquarters were located in Washington [*170] throughout the Conspiracy Period, though Costco states that some executive offices were also located in California for an unspecified amount of time after the merger with Price Club.

Costco's purchases of CRT Finished Products started with a buyer located in its Washington headquarters who chose vendors and negotiated price, quantity, and time of delivery. Purchase orders were then created in and issued directly to the vendor from either Costco's headquarters in Washington or Costco's regional offices throughout the country. Once a purchase order was issued, the product was delivered directly to Costco's depots or stores. Personnel at those locations signed the bill of lading or other shipping document and accepted delivery, at which point Costco's payment obligation arose and title transferred. Payment was then remitted from Costco's Washington headquarters.[2] Costco purchased and received more than four million CRT Finished Products for its California locations using this process, more than its stores in any other state.

Although Defendants allegedly engaged in conspiratorial [*171] conduct throughout the world, Costco presents evidence that some of this activity occurred in California. For example, on June 20, 2000, San Diego-based HED(US) employee Yuri Mitsumoto circulated an email containing future production capacity plans of competitor American Matsushita Electronics Company. See ECF No. 3265-8, Ex. 29. In addition, on July 24, 2001, Mitsumoto sent HED(US) employee Tom Heiser an email confirming that he "talked with Samsung Chunghwa sales manager on the phone" and reported to Heiser the CRT pricing plans he had obtained. See ECF No. 3265-8, Ex. 28. Finally, Hirokazu Nishimaya from Panasonic testified that he exchanged "production information and capacity" with Hitachi employees at a trade-association meeting in La Quinta, California. ECF No. 3265-8, Ex. 32 at 508:20-514:13.

III. LEGAL STANDARD

A. Summary Judgment

Summary judgment is proper when a "movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a); accord Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323-24, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). "A party asserting that a fact cannot be or is genuinely disputed must support the assertion by" citing to depositions, documents, affidavits, or other materials. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(1)(A). A party also [*172] may show that such materials "do not establish the absence or presence of a genuine dispute, or that an adverse party cannot produce admissible evidence to support the fact." Fed. R. Civ. P.

[2] For a more detailed description of Costco's purchasing processes, see generally, ECF No. 3264-1 (Shavey Decl.).

56(c)(1)(B). An issue is "genuine" only if there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable fact-finder to find for the non-moving party. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248-49, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). A fact is "material" if the fact may affect the outcome of the case. Id. at 248. "In considering a motion for summary judgment, the court may not weigh the evidence or make credibility determinations, and is required to draw all inferences in a light most favorable to the non-moving party." Freeman v. Arpaio, 125 F.3d 732, 735 (9th Cir. 1997). However, unsupported conjecture or conclusory statements do not create a genuine dispute as to material fact and will not defeat summary judgment. Surrell v. Cal. Water Serv. Co., 518 F.3d 1097, 1103 (9th Cir. 2008).

For claims on which the defendant does not carry the ultimate burden of persuasion, defendant as the moving party has the burden of producing evidence that negates an essential element of each claim on which it seeks judgment or showing that the plaintiff cannot produce evidence sufficient to satisfy the burden of proof at trial. See Nissan Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Fritz Cos., 210 F.3d 1099, 1102 (9th Cir. 2000). If the moving party satisfies its initial burden of production, then the nonmoving party must produce admissible evidence to show [*173] that a genuine issue of material fact exists. Id. at 1102-1103. The non-moving party must "identify with reasonable particularity the evidence that precludes summary judgment." Keenan v. Allan, 91 F.3d 1275, 1279 (9th Cir. 1996). "Specific citations, not bulk references, are essential to pinpoint key facts and factual disputes. [A] district court [i]s not required to put the puzzle together from a boxful of facts, and . . . may permissibly decide the motion without mining [an] entire document for more substantiation" when a citation offers only a "breezy reference" to a part of an "82-page report" not otherwise cited or explained in briefing. Stanislaus Food Products Co. v. USS-POSCO Indus., 803 F.3d 1084, 1094-95 (9th Cir. Oct. 13, 2015). "A mere scintilla of evidence will not be sufficient to defeat a properly supported motion for summary judgment; rather, the nonmoving party must introduce some significant probative evidence tending to support the complaint." Summers v. Teichert & Son, Inc., 127 F.3d 1150, 1152 (9th Cir. 1997) (citation omitted). If the non-moving party fails to make this showing, the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986).

IV. DISCUSSION

For the reasons provided below, the Court will grant Defendants' choice-of-law motion. This ruling moots the due process motion, so the Court declines to address the merits thereof.

Where there is an actual conflict between the laws or interests [*174] of Washington and that of another state, Washington follows the "most significant relationship test" from the Restatement (Second) on Conflict of Laws. Johnson v. Spider Staging Corp., 87 Wash. 2d 577, 580, 555 P.2d 997 (1976) (citing Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 145 (1971)). Here, an actual conflict exists because California allows indirect purchaser suits, whereas Washington does not. Accordingly, the Court must determine which state -- California or Washington -- has the most significant relationship by comparing those states' contacts with the occurrence and the parties. Id. In performing that analysis, the goal "is not merely to count contacts, but rather to consider which contacts are most significant and to determine where these contacts are found." Id. at 581.

The "most relevant relationship test" requires a comparison of each state's contacts with (a) the place where the injury occurred; (b) the place where the conduct causing the injury occurred; (c) the domicile, residence, nationality, place of incorporation and place of business of the parties; and (d) the place where the relationship, if any, between the parties is centered. Id. at 580-81.

As a preliminary matter, Costco argues Defendants' California-based conspiratorial conduct is the most important contact to consider in the choice-of-law analysis. [*175] There is some support for its position. See id. § 145, cmt. c ("If the primary purpose of the tort rule involved is to deter or punish misconduct . . . the state where the conduct took place may be the state of dominant interest and thus that of most significant relationship"); id., cmt. e (stating that "the place where the conduct occurred is given particular weight" where there is "no one clearly demonstrable place of injury"). Here, however, Defendants did not focus their collusive activity in any particular state; rather, their conspiratorial conduct allegedly spanned the globe. Further, > where the acts of the defendants take place in a different state than that where the plaintiff suffered injury, the local law of the state of injury will be applied unless some other state, which would usually be the state where the defendants acted, has a more significant relationship to the occurrence and the parties with respect to the particular issue.

Id., § 172, cmt. b (emphasis added). The place of injury is particularly important, moreover, because where, as here, "two or more persons are liable to a third person for the acts of each other . . . [t]he applicable law will usually be the local law of the state where [*176] the injury occurred." Id., § 172(2). The place of Costco's injury is therefore the most important contact in the choice-of-law analysis.

Plaintiffs bringing antitrust claims "are deemed to be injured in the states where they agreed to pay inflated prices for products." *In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., MDL No. 1827, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121757, 2012 WL 3727221, at 3 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 27, 2012). It is undisputed that Costco agreed to pay and paid inflated prices from its Washington headquarters. See COL Opp'n at 3; see also ECF No. 3264-1 ("Shavey Decl.") ¶ 12. Costco was therefore injured in Washington.

Costco argues that its place of injury was California because it bought and sold more CRT Finished Products in California than in any other state; because it issued purchase orders for these products, in part, from its California offices; because Costco purchased a significant amount of CRT Finished Products from California-based vendors, and because title transferred to Costco when the CRT Finished Products were delivered, many of which were delivered to California locations. These considerations, however, bear no legal weight. See also *In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., No. C 11-0058 SI, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96741, 2011 WL 3809767, at 3 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 29, 2011) (citing Pecover v. Electronics Arts Inc., 633 F. Supp. 2d 976, 984 (N.D.Cal.2009); In re Graphics Processing Units Antitrust Litig. ("GPU"), 527 F. Supp. 2d 1011, 1027-29 (N.D. Cal.2007)) [*177] ("Thus, the ultimate destination of the panels does not have any part in Costco's antitrust injury or in its state-law claims."). Rather, as Judge Illston found in LCD, Washington is the place of injury because > [a]lthough sales of . . . products in California may constitute a significant portion of Costco's business, those products were selected in Washington, the negotiation over the terms of purchase took place in Washington, the invoices were sent to Washington, and payment issued from Costco's Washington headquarters. . . . [T]hese events are all more significant to Costco's claims than the issuance of a purchase order.

In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., No. C 11-0058 SI, 2011 WL 5922966, at *2 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 28, 2011). Accordingly, the "place of injury" factor weighs heavily in favor of granting Defendants' motion.

Next, the Court examines the place of Defendants' conduct. Costco claims that the conspiratorial conduct "was focused in California." Costco Opp'n at 19. Although there is evidence that some conspiratorial activity occurred in California, the vast majority of the conduct causing Costco's injury took place outside of California. This factor therefore does not weigh in favor of either side.

The Court next looks at the domicile, [*178] residence, nationality, place of incorporation, and place of business of the parties. Although Costco was incorporated in Delaware early on in the conspiracy, it was headquartered and incorporated in Washington for the vast majority of the Conspiracy Period. None of the Defendants were headquartered or incorporated in California or Washington.

Costco notes that where the interest affected "is a business or financial one, such as in the case of unfair competition, . . . the place of business is the more important contact." Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 145, cmt. e (1971). Costco, however, did business across the country. Moreover, even if "during the early years of the [Conspiracy] Period, Costco maintained executive functions in both California and Washington," Costco COL Opp'n at 20, Costco's Washington operation was much more substantial and continued throughout the Conspiracy Period. In addition, whereas Costco's contacts with California were limited only to those CRT product purchases destined for California stores, Washington directed the purchase of every CRT product that Costco made for its stores across the country. This factor therefore weighs in favor of granting Defendants' motion.

Finally, the Court looks to the [*179] place where the relationship between the parties was centered. The purchase of CRT Finished Products was controlled by Costco's headquarters in Washington, and payment was remitted from Washington. Thus, even though California offices were involved in the purchasing process for CRT Finished Products destined for California stores, Costco's relationship with Defendants was centered in Washington. See also *LCD, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96741, 2011 WL 3809767, at 4 ("[T]he relationship between [Costco and the LCD defendants] was centered in Washington.").

While the parties' contacts with California were not insubstantial, "the facts that Costco is located in Washington, that Costco was injured in Washington, and that the relationship between the parties was centered in Washington lead the Court to conclude that Washington law governs Costco's claims." *2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96741, [WL] at 4-5.

V. CONCLUSION

Defendants' choice-of-law motion is GRANTED, and Costco's California claims are dismissed. Defendants' due process motion on Costco's California claims is DENIED as MOOT.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[*283] Stengel, [2] J.

This case is part of a Multidistrict Litigation (MDL) involving claims of liver damage from the use of Tylenol at or just above the recommended dosage.[1] This is the first "bellwether" scheduled for trial.[2] [*284] The defendants have filed eighteen motions in limine. My rulings on each motion are explained below.

I. Evidentiary Standards

Several of the defendants' motions in limine involve arguments about the relevancy or prejudicial effect of certain evidence under Federal Rules of Evidence 401 and 403. "A district court is accorded a wide discretion in determining the admissibility of evidence under the Federal Rules." Sprint v. Mendelsohn, 552 U.S. 379, 384, 128 S. Ct. 1140, 170 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2008)(quoting [3] U.S. v. Abel, 469 U.S. 45, 54, 105 S. Ct. 465, 83 L. Ed. 2d 450 (1984)). See also Moyer v. United Dominion Indus., 473 F.3d 532, 542 (3d Cir. 2007)(citation omitted). "Assessing the probative value of [the proffered evidence], and weighing any factors counseling against admissibility is a matter first for the district court's sound judgment under Rules 401 and 403...." Id.

Context is important to questions involving Rules 401 and 403. Luce v. U.S., 469 U.S. 38, 41, 105 S. Ct. 460, 83 L. Ed. 2d 443 (1984)("A reviewing court is handicapped in any effort to rule on subtle evidentiary questions outside a factual context."). To be admissible, evidence must be relevant. Fed. R. Evid. 402. Relevant evidence is evidence having any tendency to make a fact of consequence in determining the action more or less probable than it would be without the evidence. Fed. R. Evid. 401.

Under Rule 403, relevant evidence may be excluded "if its probative value is substantially outweighed by a danger of one or more of the following: unfair prejudice, confusing the issues, misleading the jury, undue delay, wasting time, or needlessly presenting cumulative evidence." Fed. R. Evid. 403.

1. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence of, or Reference to, Adverse Event Reports (MIL 1)

The defendants move to exclude evidence of, or reference to, adverse event reports (AERs). The defendants claim they are "irrelevant, unreliable, and unsubstantiated anecdotes."

Under FDA regulations, manufacturers [4] are required to create an AER in their safety surveillance database whenever they receive information that a person taking their drug has experienced an adverse event. 21 C.F.R. § 314.80. AERs are created on a standard form and may be submitted alone or accompanied by few or dozens of pages of supporting medical records. See Office of Epidemiology and Biostatistics, Food and Drug Administration, Annual Adverse Drug Experience Report: 1996 (Oct. 30, 1997), at 2 (Doc. No. 61, Ex. A). AERs are prepared by an employee of a pharmaceutical manufacturer based either on telephone conversations with a third party or other correspondence received by the manufacturer. AERs are drawn from a variety of sources: patients, their family members, physicians, or even civil complaints. See, e.g., In re Carter-Wallace, Inc. Sec. Litig., 220 F.3d 36, 40 (2d Cir. 2000)("Drug manufacturers receive these reports from several sources, including treating physicians.").

[1] See Master Compl., 13-md-2436, Doc. No. 32. There are close to two hundred other cases included in this MDL, along with several similar cases in New Jersey state court.

[2] A "bellwether" case is a test case. "Bellwether" trials should produce representative verdicts and settlements. The parties can use these verdicts and settlements to gauge the strength of the common MDL claims to determine if a global resolution of the MDL is possible. See FEDERAL JUDICIAL CENTER, MANUAL FOR COMPLEX LITIGATION, FOURTH EDITION 360 (2004); DUKE LAW CENTER FOR JUDICIAL STUDIES, MDL STANDARDS AND BEST PRACTICES 16-21 (2014).

Both parties recognize that AERs have limitations in terms of their reliability. Because AERs are based on self-reported complaints of adverse events, they may not contain information which can make them a reliable source.[3] AERs are not considered [*285] to "necessarily reflect a conclusion by the applicant or FDA that the report or information [5] constitutes an admission that the drug caused or contributed to an adverse effect." 21 C.F.R. § 314.80(l).

a. Hearsay

First, the defendants argue that AERs would be inadmissible as hearsay: out-of-court statements offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. See Fed. R. Evid. 801. The defendants claim that they are not admissible under any of the hearsay exceptions or exemptions. The plaintiff counters that [6] they would fall within the public records exception or the business records exception to hearsay. See Fed. R. Evid. 803(8)(A); Fed. R. Evid. 803(6). Whether an AER falls within an exception to the hearsay rule will require a more specific inquiry as to each document. It's entirely likely that an AER could be offered for a non-hearsay purpose. If offered for knowledge, or state of mind, and not for its inherent truth, the AER would not be hearsay as to each document. For this reason, I will defer any ruling on the hearsay objection to the AERs.[4]

b. Notice

Even if the AERs are hearsay, the plaintiff argues they are relevant to showing notice. The defendants argue that these AERs are not admissible to show "notice" because they are unreliable. This argument misses the point. An AER is notice of some event or problem. The "reliability" issue is more one of weight than of relevance. Reliable or not, they are notice of some event of significance to this case and that likely takes them out of the hearsay rule.

The purpose of recording AERs is to serve as a warning [7] system or signaling system for drug manufacturers. See Soldo v. Sandoz Pharms. Corp., 244 F. Supp. 2d 434, 463-64 (W.D. Pa. 2003)(quoting Brief Description with Caveats of System, Surveillance and Data Processing Branch of the Division of Epidemiology and Surveillance, Division of Epidemiology & Surveillance, Dec. 1988, at p. 1). Drug manufacturers are expected to report AERs to the FDA, which compiles them into a database. See http://www.fda.gov/Drugs/GuidanceComplianceRegulatoryInformation/Surveillance/AdverseDrugEffects/ucm082193.htm . AERs are often reviewed by the FDA and its subcommittees to determine if changes to a drug composition or its label need to be made.[5] [3] See 71 Fed. Reg. 77314, 77321 (Dec. 26, 2006)("FDA noted that there are limitations to interpreting the AERS data. Dosing information may be unreliable. Acetaminophen products are generally taken on an as-needed basis, so the actual dose ingested can be difficult to ascertain. There is no certainty that all of the adult cases included in this analysis were unintentional. Stigma may be associated with reporting suicide, so cases may be reported as unintentional when they were intentional overdoses. In addition, spontaneous reporting systems cannot provide certainty that acetaminophen was the cause of any of the reported adverse event. Furthermore, incidence rates cannot be determined, because the numerator or denominator descriptors for the entire population are not available. Overall, spontaneous reports may be subject to significant underreporting.").

[4] The plaintiff also argues that the AERs could be considered party admissions. I will need to see the context and content of the AERs in order to make a ruling on this point.

[5] The 2002 Advisory Committee reviewed AERs to determine what risk of injury recommended dosing posed. See FDA Safety Analysis Power Point, Sept. 19, 2002 (Doc. No. 96, Ex. 7); FDA Memorandum Aug. 15, 2002 (Doc. No. 95, Ex. 17). The Acetaminophen Working Group of the FDA relied on AERs in making its recommendation to reduce the single caplet strength from 500 mg to 325 mg. See CDER Working Group Executive Summary and Recommendations, Feb. 26, 2008 (Doc. No. 96, Ex. 1). Other Committees Groups of the FDA use AERs as data for understanding further regulatory needs. See Characterization of Acetaminophen Overdose and Related Hepatotoxic Events, Joint Meeting of the Drug Safety and Risk Management, Nonprescription [8] and Anesthetic and Life Support Drugs Advisory Committees of the FDA, Powerpoint, Jun. 29, 2009 (Doc. No. 95, Ex. 21).

[*286] Drug manufacturers are expected to take certain steps to ensure their products are safe for consumers. These steps are known as "pharmacovigilance." See Guidance for Industry: Good Pharmacovigilance Practices and Pharmacoepidemioliogic Assessment (2005)(Doc. No. 96, Ex. 3). Reporting AERs to regulatory authorities is at the heart of pharmacovigilance. See E. Kuffner Dep., Mar. 5, 2014 at 8 (Doc. No. 90, Ex. 3)("Reporting — reporting adverse event reports to the regulatory authorities would be my description of pharmacovigilance. I believe that's accurate."); E. Nelson Dep., Nov. 21, 2013 at 62-65, 98-101 (Doc. No. 96, Ex. 4)(confirming how AERs are used in the context of pharmacovigilance). Whether the defendants undertook the appropriate steps to carry out their duty of pharmacovigilance is important to the plaintiff's failure-to-warn and design defect claims.

With all this in mind, AERs would be admissible to show notice. See, e.g., Benedi v. McNeil-P.P.C., Inc., 66 F.3d 1378, 1385-86 (4th Cir. 1995)("[T]he district court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the DERs and case summaries, because the plaintiff offered the evidence solely [9] to prove notice."); In re Gadolinium-Based Contrast Agents Products Liability, 956 F. Supp. 2d 809, 815 (N.D. Ohio Jul. 25, 2013), affirmed by Decker v. GE Healthcare Inc., 770 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 2014)(citations omitted); *In re Fosamax Prods. Liab. Litig., No. 06 MD 1789(JFK), 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6631, 2013 WL 174416, at 4 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 15, 2013)("Adverse event reports received by Merck until the time of Plaintiff's injury are admissible if used as evidence that Merck was on notice of potentially serious jaw injuries."); *Wolfe v. McNeil—PPC, Inc., No. 07-348, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2160, 2012 WL 38694, at 2 (E.D.Pa. Jan. 9, 2012)("However, reports submitted to the FDA before plaintiff's alleged injury occurred would not be hearsay if offered on the issue of defendants' notice of potential safety risks from the use of Children's Motrin."); Schedin v. Ortho—McNeil—Janssen Pharms., Inc., 808 F. Supp. 2d 1125, 1139 (D. Minn. 2011)("The Court had denied its previously filed motion in limine regarding AERs, finding that the evidence was admissible to show notice and could also support a finding of causation."), reversed in part on other grounds, In re Levaquin Products Liability Litigation, 700 F.3d 1161 (8th Cir. 2012); *Hogan v. Novartis Pharms. Corp., No. 06-civ-0260, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43800, 2011 WL 1533467, at 13 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 24, 2011)("The motion to preclude admission of adverse drug experience reports is denied. Individual reports and the total number of ONJ reports before June, 2005 can establish notice regardless of whether Hogan's jaw condition was not similar to any of the patients described in the reports."); *In re Fosamax Prods. Liab. Litig., No. 1:06-MD-1789-JFK, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114262, 2010 WL 4242708, at 3 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 27, 2010)("[A]dverse event reports are admissible [10] only to prove when Merck had notice of the adverse events alleged therein."); *Bartlett v. Mutual Pharmaceutical Co., Inc., No. 08-cv-358-JL, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111259, 2010 WL 3092649, at 1 (D. N.H. Aug. 2, 2010)("The [adverse event] reports are not hearsay, though, if offered to prove that the FDA was on notice of Sulindac's safety risks, or that Mutual should have been on notice of such risks.").

If they are admitted for the purposes of "notice," the defendants ask that the AERs admitted be limited only to those involving similar circumstances to those surrounding the decedent's death. I agree that the AERs presented for the purpose [*287] of notice should be ones that would be similar to the circumstances of this case (i.e., persons who developed acute liver failure/damage at or just above 4 g, persons who were fasting/malnourished). Other AERs would likely be irrelevant to the case.

The defendants claim that the admission of only one AER which is substantially similar is necessary; admission of other AERs would be redundant. I disagree. The extent to which the defendants were on notice of the potentially adverse effects of Tylenol would be relevant to showing how intentional their behavior was in not addressing a potential problem or safety signal. The number [11] of AERs will not necessarily be limited. However, the defendants can raise objections to relevance and prejudicial effect at the time of trial for specific AERs.

c. Design Defect

The defendants claim the AERs cannot serve as substantially similar prior incidents to show a design defect. "In the appropriate circumstances, evidence of prior occurrences and accidents involving a product which is identical or substantially similar to the product which has allegedly caused an injury has generally been held to be admissible at trial." Barker v. Deere & Co., 60 F.3d 158, 162 (3d Cir. 1995)(quoting 2A Louis Frumer & Melvin Friedman, Products Liability § 18.02[1], at 18-14 to 18-17 (1995)). In order to be considered "substantially similar," a district court "must be apprised of the specific facts of previous accidents." Barker, 60 F.3d at 163. "Absent such a foundation, it is impossible for the district court in the first instance, and for this court on appeal, to review the facts in order to make a determination as to similarity." Id. In order to determine whether AERs are substantially similar enough to serve as evidence of a design defect, I will need factual context. I decline to make a ruling on this point until trial. The parties can raise their arguments at that time.

d. Reliance by Experts

The defendants claim that because [12] AERs are unreliable sources of data, experts cannot use them in forming their opinions. The plaintiff recognizes that AERs may have limitations but argues that they may be used by experts to corroborate other information or research.

"If experts in the particular field would reasonably rely on those kinds of facts or data in forming an opinion on the subject, they need not be admissible for the opinion to be admitted." Fed. R. Evid. 703. Though AERs do not have the same controls as other sources of data, courts have found that they can be relied upon by experts, along with other data or research, in forming opinions about causation.[6] See *Wolfe v. McNeil-PPC, Inc., No. 07-348, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47710, 2011 WL 1673805, at 5 (E.D. Pa. May 4, 2011)("In this case, the three doctors did not solely rely on case reports in forming their opinions on causation but used them to supplement their extensive review of plaintiff's medical records and deposition testimony of plaintiff's treating physicians. As with defendants' other objections, the three doctors' use of case studies in reaching their conclusion affects only the weight to be given their testimony, not its admissibility. Thus, the proposed testimony of the three doctors is based on sufficiently reliable methods."); Deutsch v. Novartis Pharmaceuticals Corp., 768 F.Supp.2d 420, 431 (E.D.N.Y. 2011)("Accordingly, the fact that [*288] a particular opinion [13] is not based on a randomized controlled clinical trial, while certainly an area for cross-examination, will not affect its admissibility.").[7] In addition, an expert opining about a drug companies' pharmacovigilance duties may need to rely on AERs to explain what tasks drug companies may need to take to monitor the safety of their products. See Decker v. GE Healthcare Inc., 770 F.3d 378, 394 (6th Cir. 2014)("[Plaintiff's expert] was qualified to reliably testify as to the significance of the AERs.").

Okla. 2002)*(holding that expert opinion testimony based in part on AERs and case reports were admissible under Daubert).

But see Soldo v. Sandoz Pharms. Corp., 244 F. Supp. 2d 434, 537-44 (W.D. Pa. 2003)(finding case reports to be unreliable and "unscientific" sources that plaintiff's experts could not rely on for causation); McClain v. Mar. 26, 2013)("Dr. Hamilton's reliance on adverse event reports is also unimpressive, as such reports do not demonstrate the requisite degree of reliability demanded by Daubert.").

For these reasons, an expert's reliance on AERs may, in and of itself, be appropriate. Whether the expert used those AERs in a reliable manner is a different question, best addressed by a Daubert motion.[8]

e. Rule 401 and Rule 403 Arguments

Lastly, the defendants argue that AERs are not relevant under Rule 401 and/or any probative value [15] they may have would be substantially outweighed by the risk of prejudice under Rule 403. AERs may be relevant to this case. Whether Rule 403 would bar their admission is better determined at trial.

For these reasons, I will DENY this motion without prejudice. The plaintiff may offer AERs to show notice. The question of whether an expert opinion appropriately relies on AERs will be discussed in rulings on the parties' Daubert motions. If the plaintiff plans to introduce specific AERs for any reason other than notice (i.e., causation or to show design defect), the defendants may object as appropriate at trial.

2. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence or Argument Relating to Fraud on the FDA (MIL 2)

The defendants move to exclude all evidence meant to show that the defendants [*289] committed a "fraud on the FDA." Specifically, they claim the following evidence is inadmissible: evidence showing that the defendants misled the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), withheld information from the FDA, violated FDA disclosure requirements, otherwise violated the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (FDCA), or did not cooperate with the FDA regarding Extra Strength Tylenol. They argue this evidence is preempted by the [16] United States Supreme Court's decision in Buckman Co. v. Plaintiffs' Legal Committee, which held that "state-law fraud-on-the-FDA claims conflict with, and are therefore impliedly pre-empted by federal law." 531 U.S. 341, 348, 121 S. Ct. 1012, 148 L. Ed. 2d 854 (2001).

In Buckman, the liability for fraud was based solely on alleged non-disclosure of information to the FDA. Id. at 353. The Court held that fraud-on-the-FDA claims were impliedly preempted because these types of state law tort claims conflicted with the FDCA. Id. at 348. "The conflict stems from the fact that the federal statutory scheme amply empowers the FDA to punish and deter fraud against the [FDA], and that this authority is used by the Administration to achieve a somewhat delicate balance of statutory objectives." Id. Allowing fraud-on-the-FDA claims, the Court reasoned, could skew that balance. Id. See also Farina v. Nokia Inc., 625 F.3d 97, 123 (3d Cir. 2010).

I previously found that the plaintiff's fraud and fraudulent concealment claims were not impliedly preempted by Buckman. See Memorandum Denying Motion for Summary Judgment on Plaintiff's Short Form Complaint Claims, Nov. 13, 2015 at 14-17 (Doc. No. 177). I did not view them as fraud-on-the-FDA claims, which are preempted under Buckman. Id. at 15. If the evidence in question were being used to establish the [17] defendants' liability solely based on concealment of information to the FDA or violations of FDA regulations, that evidence would not be permitted under Buckman.[9] See Buckman, 531 U.S. at 352-53 ("[T]he Medtronic claims arose from the manufacturer's alleged failure to use reasonable care in the production of the product, not solely from the violation of FDCA requirements. In the present case, however, the fraud claims exist solely by virtue of the FDCA disclosure requirements."). The defendants' breach of duty cannot be premised solely on their interactions with the FDA.

[8] Daubert motions filed by the parties on this issue are still pending.

[9] To support their motion, the defendants cite cases where courts found that claims were impliedly preempted under Buckman. See, e.g., Farina v. Nokia Inc., 625 F.3d 97, 123 (3d Cir. 2010); In re Fosamax (Alendronate Sodium) Prods. Liab. Litig. (No. II), 751 F.3d 150, 164 (3d Cir. 2014); *Henderson v. Merck & Co., No. 04-CV-05987-LDD, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45106, 2005 WL 2600220, at 11 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 11, 2005). These cases are not helpful. Whether the plaintiff's claims were preempted was an issue discussed in the defendants' motion for summary judgment. At issue here is whether the evidence related to the defendants' interactions with the FDA is admissible for purposes other than establishing liability or breach of duty. That is a different inquiry than whether the plaintiff's claims are preempted.

However, evidence that the defendants attempted to manipulate the regulatory process, [18] failed to comply with regulatory duties, or adhere to guidance provided by the FDA can be used to show other elements of the plaintiff's claims. See *Eve v. Sandoz Pharmaceutical Corp., No. IP 98-1429-C-Y/S, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23965, 2002 WL 181972, at 3 (S.D. Ind. Jan. 28, 2002)("Thus, evidence of NPC/SPC's interaction with the FDA may be pertinent to proving the Eves' claim, but it is not the basis for the claim itself.").[10] For example, how the defendants [*290] responded to FDA requests for information, what they did to comply with FDA regulations, and what information they presented to the FDA is all relevant to plaintiff's failure-to-warn and design defect claims.[11] See *In re Yasmin & YAZ (Drospirenone) Mktg., Sales Practices & Products Liab. Litig., 3:09-MD-02100-DRH, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145593, 2011 WL 6302287, at 11 (S.D. Ill. Dec. 16, 2011)("Buckman does not pre-empt evidence of when Bayer informed the FDA of information relating to Yasmin and YAZ. Buckman is a claim preemption case focusing on fraud-on-the-FDA claims, not an evidence preemption case....The Supreme Court made clear in Wyeth that federal law does not prevent judges and juries in failure to warn cases from considering a drug companies compliance with FDA regulations. Wyeth, 555 U.S. at 568-73."). This evidence would be highly probative of the defendants' state of mind, motive, or knowledge of a defect. [19] [12]

It also would be relevant to the plaintiff's fraud claims if the information the defendants sent to or received from the FDA was different from what the defendants were communicating to consumers, such as the decedent. See *Globetti v. Sandoz Pharm. Corp., No. CV98-TMP-2649-S, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2391, 2001 WL 419160, at 2 (N.D. Ala. Mar. 5, 2001)("Notwithstanding that information may have been misrepresented to or concealed from the FDA, once defendant undertook [*291] to misrepresent those facts to plaintiff, or to conceal from plaintiff facts it was bound to disclose, the plaintiff's claim no longer rests simply on the assertion that the agency was defrauded but on the additional fact that she was defrauded.")(emphasis in original).

For these reasons, I will DENY the defendants' motion.[13]

[10] See also *In re Vioxx Products Liab. Litig., MDL No. 1657, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47827, 132005 WL 3164254, at 1 (E.D. La. Minn. 2006)("Thus, plaintiffs may use evidence—if they are able to produce it—of Medtronic's efforts to manipulate the regulatory process in order to prove their negligence and strict liability claims, but they may not bring an independent claim for relief based on fraud-on-the-FDA.").

[11] The plaintiff argues that this evidence also may be relevant if the defendants "open the door" and claim they are absolved from liability by complying with FDA regulations. These sorts of arguments will likely be precluded under Wyeth v. Levine, 555 U.S. 555, 129 S. Ct. 1187, 173 L. Ed. 2d 51 (2008). The defendants also cannot argue that the use of Extra Strength Tylenol in all circumstances was fully "approved" by the FDA because no Final Monograph has ever been issued. However, if the defendants offer such an affirmative defense, and I find it is permissible, evidence of their non-compliance with FDA regulations will be relevant to rebutting their defense.

[12] See *In re Yasmin & Yaz (Drospirenone) Mktg., Sales Practices & PMF Products Liab. Litig., 3:09-CV-10012-DRH, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147935, 2011 WL 6740391, at 2 (S.D. Ill. Dec. 22, 2011)("The Court finds, as it has in the past, that Buckman is [20] inapposite and Bayer's reliance thereon is misplaced (as it has been throughout this litigation). Wyeth v. Levine, 555 U.S. 555 129 S.Ct. 1187, 173 L. Ed. 2d 51 (2009) is a far better guidepost for this Court and for this litigation. Bayer's knowledge and notice of the adverse effects of the subject drugs are of paramount relevance in this litigation. It will ultimately be an intertwined decision of the jury on the issue of proper warning whether Bayer complied with the FDAs [sic] policies. But, it is clear that the FDA is, for all practical purposes, wholly dependent upon the honesty of the pharmaceutical proponent of a drug when engaged in the approval process. In a case such as this, the jury must be fully informed of any information withheld from the FDA that could have effected decisions regarding the label."); *Globetti v. Sandoz Pharm. Corp., No. CV98-TMP-2649-S, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2391, 2001 WL 419160, at 3 (N.D. Ala. Mar. 5, 2001)("The defendant's motion in limine based on Buckman is due to be and hereby DENIED. While plaintiff may not offer evidence simply to show misrepresentations to or concealment from the FDA, such evidence may be relevant to showing the defendant's knowledge relating to the adequacy of the warning or the truth of information represented to or concealed from plaintiff or her physician. FRE 403 may [21] dictate that some such evidence be excluded to avoid confusing the jury about the exact nature of plaintiff's claims. Defendant remains free to raise appropriate objections during the course of trial.").

3. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence and Argument Relating to the September 2002 and June 2009 Advisory Committee Meeting (MIL 3)

The defendants move to exclude certain evidence and argument concerning the September 2002 and the June 2009 Advisory Committee Meetings of the FDA discussing acetaminophen-related liver issues. In September 2002, an Advisory Committee of the FDA met to discuss ways to prevent liver injury caused by unintentional acetaminophen overdose.[14] During the Committee Meeting, the FDA presented findings from medical literature: 1) that hepatotoxicity may occur "at recommended doses of APAP [or acetaminophen]," 2) that such cases were linked to risk factors such as alcohol use and/or fasting, and 3) that some cases of unintentional overdose led to death.[15] The Committee noted findings of hepatotoxicity (i.e., liver damage) in persons who have ingested less than 4 grams/day of acetaminophen and/or had risk factors like "poor nutritional status."[16]

In June 2009, several advisory committees within the FDA held a joint meeting to discuss the issue of liver injury related to acetaminophen use.[17] McNeil representatives were present at the meeting and offered presentations to the committee members.[18] At that meeting, the committee members voted to recommend that the current maximum single dose of OTC acetaminophen (i.e., 2 x 500 mg) be made available only by prescription.[19] If that recommendation were put into effect, Extra Strength Tylenol could only be sold by prescription according to its current dosing. The majority of committee members recommended that the maximum single dose of acetaminophen be lowered to 650 [*292] mg (i.e., two tablets of Regular Strength Tylenol).[20]

The FDA has over thirty advisory committees which focus on different aspects of its mission. See FDA website, About Advisory Committees, http://www.fda.gov/AdvisoryCommittees/CommitteesMeetingMaterials/default.htm . As one might deduce from their title, these committees are meant to be advisory in nature. Their decisions or discussions are not considered binding actions by the FDA. The materials prepared by committees are meant to be recommendations which the FDA can adopt or reject.[21]

[13] The defendants only argued that this evidence should be precluded under Buckman. They did not argue that that it should be precluded under other Federal Rules of the Evidence (i.e., Rule 403, etc.). Any objections or arguments regarding admissibility for other reasons may still be raised [22] at trial.

[14] See FDA Safety Analysis Power Point, Sept. 19, 2002 (Doc. No. 95, Ex. 11); FDA Memorandum, Aug. 15, 2002 (Doc. No. 95, Ex. 17).

[21] As I've explained in earlier decisions, the fact that the FDA does not adopt a recommendation by the advisory committee [25] does not necessarily absolve the defendants of their duty to warn or design a safe product. FDA regulations

a. Hearsay

The defendants argue that materials from these two meetings would be inadmissible hearsay. The plaintiff argues that the documents would be considered a "public record" which would not be hearsay. "A record or statement of a public office" is not excluded as hearsay "if...it sets out...the office's activities [or] a matter observed while under a legal duty to report...or...in a civil case...factual findings from a legally authorized investigation" and "the opponent does not show that the source of information or other circumstances indicate a lack of trustworthiness." Fed. R. Evid. 803(8)(2014). "Public records have justifiably carried a presumption of reliability..." Fed. R. Evid. 803(8), 2014 Amendment Advisory Committee Notes. The party wishing to admit evidence under this exception simply needs to meet the definition [26] of a "public record" under the Rule. Id. The burden then shifts to the opposing party to show that "the source of information or other circumstances indicate a lack of trustworthiness." Id.; Fed. R. Evid. 803(8). Both facts and opinions contained in documents meeting the requirements of the public records exception are considered to be admissible.[22]

The plaintiff also argues that documents related to these meetings are "business records," which are not precluded as hearsay. A record of an act, event, condition, opinion, or diagnosis if:

> (A) the record was made at or near the time by--or from information transmitted by--someone with knowledge;
> (B) the record was kept in the course of a regularly conducted activity of a business, organization, occupation, or calling, whether or not for profit;
> (C) making the record was a regular practice of that activity;
> (D) all these conditions [27] are shown by the testimony of the custodian or another qualified witness, or by a certification that complies with Rule 902(11) or (12) [*293] or with a statute permitting certification; and
> (E) the opponent does not show that the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate a lack of trustworthiness.

Fed. R. Evid. 803(6)(2015).

To determine whether specific advisory committee documents related to these meetings are "public records" or "business records," I will need to see the context and content of each document. I will defer ruling on whether specific documents are admissible until trial. At that time, the parties may raise their hearsay arguments with a focus on specific documents.

b. Notice or Knowledge

If offered to prove notice to the defendants of certain risks or to prove the state of mind of the defendants, these documents would not be hearsay. It may not be necessary to determine if these documents are public records or business records. The defendants were involved in these meetings and were well-aware of the information shared at these meetings. This information would be important to showing whether they had notice or knowledge of the potential link between Extra Strength Tylenol and [28] acute liver failure at or just above recommended doses.[23] What was discussed at these meetings may show defendants' state of mind. There is evidence that the defendants are a floor and not a ceiling. For a further explanation, see Memorandum Denying Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment on Failure-to-Warn Claim, Nov. 13, 2015 (Doc. No. 182); Memorandum Denying Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment on Design Defect Claim, Nov. 13, 2015 (Doc. No. 184). See also Wyeth v. Levine*, 555 U.S. 806, 129 S. Ct. 337, 172 L. Ed. 2d 14 (2008).

[22] Beech Aircraft Corp. v. Rainey, 488 U.S. 153, 170, 109 S. Ct. 439, 102 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1988)("We hold, therefore, that portions of investigatory reports otherwise admissible under Rule 803(8)(C) are not inadmissible merely because they state a conclusion or opinion. As long as the conclusion is based on a factual investigation and satisfies the Rule's trustworthiness requirement, it should be admissible along with other portions of the report.").

[23] The documents at issue were ones produced by the defendants, indicating they were in their possession.

took specific actions in preparation for the meetings and as a result of what happened at them.[24] The jury is entitled to hear this evidence and draw appropriate inferences about why the defendants acted as they did before and after these meetings.[25]

c. Rule 403

The defendants also argue that this evidence should be excluded under Federal Rule of Evidence 403 as confusing to the jury, unfairly prejudicial to the defendants, and/or a waste of time. The fact that the Advisory Committee was not a final rulemaking body of the FDA, the defendants claim, could make the materials confusing to a jury. There is nothing inherently confusing about the Advisory Committee process. With an adequate foundation, there should be minimal risk of jury confusion.

For these reasons, I will DENY MIL 3 without prejudice. The plaintiff will, in the least, be permitted to offer information about the 2002 and 2009 meetings as evidence of notice, knowledge, and/or motive of the defendants.

[*294] 4. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence or Argument Relating to Employee Compensation (MIL 4)

The defendants move to exclude [30] any evidence or argument relating to employee compensation under Rule 401 or 403. The plaintiff argues that this information is relevant to show bias or conflict of interest. I agree.[26]

If employee compensation evidence is admitted to show bias, the defendants argue that proof of employment alone is enough to show bias. I disagree. For example, an employee's bonus structure may further implicate a particular bias towards a profit motive. The various ways in which an employee was compensated may be relevant.

The defendants contend that evidence [31] of compensation should only apply to current employees of the defendants. There is no good reason to narrow the focus of this evidence. A witness's possible bias created by certain compensation structures would relate to actions taken while the witness was employed with the defendants. While his or her current compensation at a different job may not be relevant, previous compensation while working for the defendants may be relevant to their motivation for making certain decisions on behalf of the defendant corporations. This information appears relevant.

At this time, I see no reason why all employee compensation evidence should be precluded based on "unfair prejudice" under Rule 403.

[24] See, e.g., E. Kuffner Dep., Mar. 31, 2011at 92 (Pl. Ex. 17 to Response for MIL 3, filed under seal); E. Kuffner Dep., Apr. 30, 2014 at 32, 201 (Pl. Ex. 13 to Response for MIL 3, filed under seal); L. Pawelski Dep., Feb. 28, 2014 at 85-86 (Pl. Ex. 14 to Response for MIL 3, filed under seal); A. Temple Dep., Mar. 20, 2014 at 158 (Pl. Ex. 15 to Response for MIL 3, filed under seal); Email to C. Goggins re: meeting recommendations, May 27, 2009 (Pl. Ex. 7 to Response for MIL 3, filed under seal); Letter to the FDA about "Risk Mitigation Plan," Jul. 29, 2009 (Pl. Ex. 11 to Response for MIL 3, filed under seal).

[25] The defendants argue that the information presented at these meetings still [29] has to be "substantially similar" to the injuries presented in this case. It is clear that the purpose of these meetings was to address the very concern at issue in this case—what risk was there to consumers of liver injury from taking Extra Strength Tylenol for therapeutic reasons. These meetings were on point with the issues presented in this case. This argument is not helpful.

[26] I made a previous ruling in this regard during the deposition of Ashley McEvoy. The parties could not agree about whether the evidence of employee compensation was relevant. They contacted me during the deposition to decide the issue. I ruled that the financial stake or interest in the corporation was relevant to bias. I confirmed this ruling in an Order dated February 26, 2014. See 13-md-2436, Doc. No. 123. While this Order pertained to the ability of the MDL plaintiffs to discover evidence related to employee compensation, the parameters set out in that Order offer good guidance on what types of employee compensation evidence would be relevant to show bias.

For these reasons, I will DENY the defendants' motion.

5. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Expert Testimony Regarding Corporate State of Mind (MIL 5)

The defendants move to exclude expert testimony about the defendants' "corporate state of mind." They argue that this sort of testimony invades the province of the jury and/or offers inappropriate legal conclusions. Juries can draw inferences from the evidence without the benefit of expert testimony. See In re Viagra Prods. Liab. Litig., 658 F. Supp. 2d 950, 964-965 (D. Minn. 2009)("There is no indication in the record that the jury here [32] would require special assistance to interpret the documents on which [the expert] bases her opinion that Pfizer was more worried about bad publicity than safety. Because the jury is equally capable of evaluating this particular evidence, Dr. Blume's opinion on this matter must be excluded.").

Expert testimony, which draws a legal conclusion about corporate state of mind, is not admissible. See, e.g., Berckeley Inv. Grp., Ltd.v. Colkitt, 455 F.3d 195, 217 (3d Cir. 2006)("[T]he District Court must ensure that an expert does not testify as to the governing law of the case. Although Federal Rule of Evidence 704 permits an expert witness to give expert testimony that 'embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact,' an expert witness is prohibited from rendering a legal opinion. United States v. Leo, 941 F.2d 181, 195-96 (3d Cir.1991). Such testimony is prohibited because it would usurp the District Court's pivotal role in explaining the law to the jury. *First National State [295] Bank v. Reliance Elec. Co., 668 F.2d 725, 731 (3d Cir.1981)(per curiam).").[27]

The plaintiff argues that this motion is overly broad.[28] While I agree that every context in which an expert might discuss information about corporate state of mind may not overstep boundaries into the jury's role, it is clear that experts cannot render opinions on the defendants' corporate state of mind. See Berckeley Inv. Grp., Ltd. v. Colkitt, 455 F.3d 195, 217-18 (3d Cir. 2006)(explaining how expert testimony [*296] on industry standards and customs is appropriate but expert conclusions about whether a defendant fell below those standards or complied with federal regulations was inadmissible). That is for the jury.

For these reasons, I will GRANT the defendants' motion without prejudice. Experts cannot opine about [36] the defendants' corporate state of mind.[29]

6. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence and Argument Regarding Defendants' Draft Company Documents and Internal Reports that were not Disseminated (MIL 6)

The defendants move to exclude draft company documents and internal reports because the plaintiff cannot show that decedent, plaintiff, decedent's physicians, or any other "relevant" person ever saw and relied on the internal drafts and non-disseminated materials. For this reason, the defendants argue that these documents are irrelevant as they have no probative value. The plaintiff counters that these documents are relevant to what the defendants knew or should have known about risks of liver damage caused by acetaminophen and to the defendants' [37] state of mind, motive, and intent.[30]

Even if the plaintiff, decedent, or decedent's physician did not see the defendants' draft or internal documents at issue, these documents may still be relevant to show the defendants' knowledge, state of mind, motive, and/or intent.

The defendants make an argument based on Rule 403 that any probative value would be substantially outweighed by prejudice to them. I cannot make a determination under Rule 403 without context.

For these reasons, I will DENY the defendants' motion without prejudice.

7. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence of Manufacturing, Quality Control, and Production Matters Involving McNeil's Facilities; Related Government Investigations; Regulatory Matters, Including FDA Form 483s and CAPAs; Recalls; Testimony Before Congress; the 2011 Consent Decree; and the 2015 Plea Agreement (MIL 7)

The defendants move to exclude evidence of or references to the [38] following, as irrelevant, impermissible character evidence, and/or unduly prejudicial under Rule 403: manufacturing, quality control, or production issues at McNeil's facilities, along with all related government investigations, regulatory matters (including Form 483s and corrective actions plans or CAPAs), product recalls, testimony before Congress by William Weldon and Colleen Goggins, the 2011 Consent Decree, and any evidence regarding the 2015 Plea Agreement. The plaintiff counters

[28] Much of the plaintiff's response revolves around their expert testimony for Dr. Marvin Goldberg. Whether his testimony is appropriate has been addressed in my ruling on the Daubert motion challenging his expert testimony. See Doc. No. 315 (Mar. 2, 2016).

[29] This does not mean, however, that the plaintiff's experts cannot offer evidence that could allow a jury to infer what the defendants' corporate state of mind would be. That is entirely appropriate. The specifics of what evidence experts can discuss (as opposed to opinions they may render) is better addressed in the context of Daubert motions, deposition designations, and/or at trial. My ruling on Motion in Limine #5 is meant to be narrow.

[30] The plaintiff's response centers on the expert report of Dr. Marvin Goldberg, the plaintiff's marketing expert. Whether these documents can be used by Dr. Goldberg is a different question. I addressed what testimony Dr. Goldberg could offer in my Daubert ruling. See Doc. No. 315 (Mar. 2, 2016).

that the evidence is relevant to the defendants' motive, state of mind, and/or knowledge, to show the defendants' character for untruthfulness, or for impeachment purposes. [*297] The plaintiff argues that evidence showing the defendants acted contrary to their marketing message of "trust" and "safety" would be probative of the reasonableness of their conduct. They claim the evidence at issue is illustrative of the defendants' motive to maximize profits at the expense of consumer safety.

i. The 483 Forms

The FDA regularly conducts on-site inspections of the facilities of manufacturers of products subject to FDA regulation.[31] At the end of the inspection, the FDA issues a Form 483, outlining observations of any conditions [39] the FDA investigator believes constitute violations of relevant laws and regulations.[32] "Companies are encouraged to respond to the FDA Form 483 in writing with their corrective action plan and then implement that corrective action plan expeditiously."[33] The Form 483 is not considered a final corrective action by the agency but instead is meant to alert the company to harmful conditions.[34]

One area that FDA investigates when it makes its site visits is whether the company had in place appropriate reporting systems of adverse events. On October 19, 1999, the FDA issued a 483 Form for a period of inspection for October 5, 6, 13, and 19, 1999 for a McNeil facility.[35] One noted violation was a failure to establish an audit trail to track changes or deletions made to the Consumer Response System (CRS) containing 15 day and periodic adverse events reports.[36] The Form 483 noted that the Medical Affairs department personnel were allowed to make changes to information entered on MedWatch Forms. [40] [37] The second violation reported a failure of McNeil/J&J's legal department to report two recent adverse drug events they received through litigation.[38]

On December 9, 2010, the FDA issued a second 483 Form for a period of inspection from October 27, 2010 through December 9, 2010.[39] Again, the defendants were cited for having inadequate procedures in handling written and oral complaints.[40]

On April 14, 2011, a third 483 Form was issued for an inspection period of March 21, 2011 to April 14, 2011.[41] The form noted two violations: 1) that procedures for handling written and oral complaints related to drug products were [38] FDA Form 483, Oct. 19, 1999 (Pl. Ex. 12). During the same timeframe, the defendants also conducted internal audits showing similar deficiencies about adverse event reporting. See Quintiles Memorandum, May 2, 2003 (Pl. Ex. 13). I do not consider those internal audits to be at issue in this motion.

[39] FDA Form 483, Dec. 9, 2010 (Pl. Ex. 14).

[40] FDA Form 483, Dec. 9, 2010 (Pl. Ex. 14). The Form specifically noted deficiencies in how the defendants' pharmacovigilance department inappropriately handled complaints of stomach pain, diarrhea, and vomiting. This information may be relevant to notice, given that the reported conditions not appropriately handled were [41] those experienced by the decedent.

again deficiently written/followed and were not appropriately followed up on; and 2) a failure to report [*298] adverse drug experience information to the FDA.[42]

While information in the 483 forms about the actual quality control of the defendants' products would not be relevant to the plaintiff's claims, the reports of pharmacovigilance deficiencies would definitely be relevant to show defendants' breach of duty.[43] From this evidence, a jury may infer that the defendants were careless about and/or willfully blind to potential risks of consumer safety.

Additionally, this information may be relevant to rebut any argument by the defendants that they have been in compliance with FDA regulations. In the [42] same way, it would be appropriate for impeachment purposes.

ii. Recall Evidence

In 2007, the defendants voluntarily withdrew liquid Infant Tylenol products from the market. The recall was presented in internal memos as a way to remove the risk of overdose from foreseeable misuse.[44] The plaintiff claims that Infant Tylenol, compared to Extra Strength Tylenol, was a small share of profits. This evidence would most certainly be relevant to the defendants' state of mind and/or knowledge of a design defect in this case.

In 2008, the defendants discovered that certain lots of Motrin were not in compliance with FDA regulations. Instead of issuing a formal recall of the product, the defendants allegedly retained a contractor to go to all retail stores where Motrin was sold nationwide, act as regular customers, and buy all of the product on the shelves. The defendants then indicated to the FDA that a formal recall was not necessary because the product was no longer available on the shelves.

The plaintiff argues that this evidence points to the defendants' [43] character for untruthfulness because the corporate character is imputed to the defendants' witnesses, acting on behalf of the company. Testimony given at a formal hearing of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform raised questions about how forthright the defendants were during the above "recall." See Transcript of Hearing of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, 09/30/10, at 33-34, 37, 39, 43 (Pl. Ex. 7).

The plaintiff claims that this motion may encompass evidence showing that the defendants' were not cooperative with the FDA during the investigations into their manufacturing concerns and were, at times, trying to "influence" the FDA.[45] They claim this evidence can be used as impeachment material, to attack the defendants' reputation for truthfulness. See Fed. R. Evid. 608(a). I agree that this information may be used for impeachment purposes. However, the information would not necessarily be used as character evidence if the defendants don't open the door to it.

iii. The 2011 Consent Decree, 2015 Plea Agreement, and Related Congressional testimony

From 2008 through [44] 2015, McNeil was involved in several matters related to the contamination of some of its over-the-counter drug products. Some of these issues regarding production were noted in [*299] the above-mentioned 483 Forms and "phantom recalls." In 2010, Johnson & Johnson executives Colleen Goggins and William [43] Even if the information about deficiencies in manufacturing were relevant, its probative value would be substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice. See Fed. R. Evid. 403. That evidence will be excluded.

[44] See C. Goggins Email with Internal Memo, Oct. 10, 2007 (Pl. Ex. 5). See also 2003 Consumer OTC Medication Use Survey, Executive Summary (Pl. Ex. 6).

Weldon appeared before Congress to discuss ongoing manufacturing, quality control, and production issues at McNeil facilities. In 2011, McNeil entered a Consent Decree of Permanent Injunction with the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ), without admission of fault, in relation to those manufacturing, quality control, and production issues.[46] In 2015, McNeil entered into a Plea Agreement on the same issues with the DOJ because they were not rectified.[47]

The plaintiff asserts a design defect claim, not a manufacturing defect claim. Her claims do not involve injury from a contaminated Tylenol product. For this reason, I see little to no relevance in admitting evidence regarding manufacturing defects. Any probative value this evidence might have would be substantially outweighed by the risk of unfair prejudice or confusion [45] by the jury.[48] See Fed. R. Evid. 403. However, if the defendants "open the door" to such evidence (i.e., offering compliance with FDA regulations, etc.), I may reconsider this ruling. Congressional testimony, of course, will be available for impeachment purposes if the defendants' witnesses provide inconsistent testimony at trial. This testimony also may include discussions of the defendants' treatment of AERs and other pharmacovigilance actions, which I've noted would be relevant to the plaintiff's claims.

iv. Character Evidence

The defendants [46] also argue that this evidence should be excluded under Rule 404, as impermissible character evidence. Rule 404(a)(1) provides that, "Evidence of a person's character or character trait is not admissible to prove that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character or trait." Rule 404(a)(2) provides exceptions to this rule but only in criminal proceedings. Under Rule 404(a), evidence showing the defendants' character for "untruthfulness" would be excluded to prove the plaintiff's claims.

Rule 404(b)(1) states that: "Evidence of a crime, wrong, or other act is not admissible to prove a person's character in order to show that on a particular occasion the person acted in accordance with the character." However, Rule 404(b)(2) provides that evidence of crimes or "prior bad acts" "may be admissible for another purpose, such as proving motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, absence of mistake, or lack of accident." Given that the plaintiff may be offering this evidence to show motive/state of mind or knowledge, I cannot exclude this evidence outright. This evidence has the potential to be very prejudicial. A specific offer of proof is necessary for each item of possible 404(b) evidence.

The plaintiff also argues [47] that the evidence of the Congressional testimony, Plea Agreement, and Consent Decree also show [*300] the defendants' character for being untruthful. This likely will not come in during the plaintiff's case-in-chief. However, if the defendants claim they have been forthright with the FDA and the Government, this information may be allowed for impeachment.

v. Hearsay Argument

Lastly, the defendants argue that regulatory documents and communications, including recall announcements, Forms 483s, are inadmissible hearsay under Rule 801 because they are out-of-court statements offered for the

[47] See 2015 Plea Agreement (Doc. No. 69, Ex. A).

[48] The plaintiff argues that these are "prior bad acts" which can show "proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake." See Fed. R. Evid. 404(b). If the plaintiff had a manufacturing defect claim, this argument would have merit. However, I do not see this act as being similar enough to count as "prior bad acts" under Rule 404.

The plaintiff also claims this evidence is relevant to the punitive damages claim, because it reflects "a pattern and practice of evading federal marketing regulations and federal obligations." I disagree. Again, the Consent Decree and Plea Agreement involved manufacturing defect issues. This is not a manufacturing defect case.

truth of the matter. The defendants do not address whether any of these documents are exempted or excepted under hearsay rules. If these documents are being used to show motive, state of mind, or knowledge, they would not be hearsay. If they are being used for the truth of the matter, I will determine at trial whether they are hearsay or whether they fall within an exception or exemption.[49]

For these reasons, I will GRANT MIL 7 in part and DENY it in part without prejudice. The 2011 Consent Decree and 2015 Plea Agreement shall be excluded. 483 Form evidence will be limited to deficiencies regarding pharmacovigilance (i.e., AERs, complaint reporting, etc.). The admissibility of all other evidence will be considered at trial, in context.

8. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence of Other Lawsuits, Settlements, Government Investigations, and Unrelated Actions (MIL 8)

The defendants move to exclude evidence of or references to any other pending or former lawsuits, claims, or settlements of non-parties who allegedly experienced adverse reactions from ingesting any Tylenol product.[50] They argue such evidence is inadmissible as irrelevant under Rules 401 and 402 and/or unduly prejudicial under Rule 403. The defendants also argue this information would be inadmissible hearsay and/or character evidence.

It is unclear what evidence to this [49] effect might be presented or how it might be used. Evidence of past settlements is highly disfavored under Rule 408. However, evidence of past lawsuits may be probative of notice/knowledge of a possible defect and/or of the motive of the defendants. Information related to past lawsuits also may be relevant for impeachment purposes. Without more information about the content and context of the evidence at issue, I cannot make a blanket ruling on its exclusion. See Luce v. U.S., 469 U.S. 38, 41, 105 S. Ct. 460, 83 L. Ed. 2d 443 (1984)("A reviewing court is handicapped in any effort to rule on subtle evidentiary questions outside a factual context.").

For this reason, I will DENY MIL 8 without prejudice.

9. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence or Argument Regarding Any Documents, Events, or Labeling that Post-Date Decedent's August 2010 Acute Liver Failure (MIL 9)

The defendants move to exclude evidence or argument regarding documents, [*301] events, and/or labeling changes that post-date Ms. Hayes's August 2010 acute liver failure.[51] The defendants argue, generally, that this

[49] The plaintiff also argues that this evidence may be considered party admissions, which would not be hearsay. See Fed. R. Evid. 801(d). This also may be a reason the evidence would not be considered hearsay. Context, again, is important to determine this. [48]

[50] I do not consider a 2011 Consent Decree (i.e., settlement) or 2015 Plea Agreement with the federal government to be included in this evidence. Arguments about the admissibility of that evidence were raised in MIL 7 and are addressed in my ruling on that motion.

[51] Specifically, the defendants would like to exclude:

- Post-injury changes to the labeling for over-the-counter Extra Strength Tylenol® labeling (e.g., McNeil's voluntary reduction of the listed maximum daily dose on its OTC acetaminophen products that was made in conjunction with FDA input-namely a reduction from 4,000 mg to 3,000 mg in a 24 hour period);

- Post-injury changes to prescription acetaminophen labeling (see, 76 Fed. Reg. 2691 (Jan. 14, 2011));

- Post-injury FDA statements/pronouncements or regulations concerning prescription acetaminophen (see, e.g., FDA safety communications regarding limiting prescription acetaminophen products to 325 mg per dosage, and recommendations to health care professionals to stop dispensing prescription combination drug products with more than 325 mg of evidence is inadmissible under Rule 401 or Rule 403. Without the context of this evidence, I cannot make such a ruling. For example, communications by the defendants' employees may have occurred after the [50] decedent's death but may discuss what the defendants' knew about the risk of acute liver failure at the recommended dose before she died. That evidence would be highly relevant to this case.[52]

The defendants argue that changes to prescription acetaminophen labels are irrelevant. Unlike other OTC drugs, acetaminophen's maximum total daily limit is the same for both OTC and prescription products. Because one of the key issues in this case is whether the defendants should have recommended different dosing or warnings for Extra Strength Tylenol, there may be instances when changes to a prescription acetaminophen label may be relevant. Without more of a context, I cannot say for certain that this evidence would not have probative value.

They also argue the change of the dosing on Extra Strength Tylenol's label, after the decedent's [52] death, would be inadmissible as a subsequent remedial measure under Rule 407. Rule 407 prohibits the introduction of evidence of post-injury measures which "would have made an earlier injury or harm less likely to occur" (i.e., "subsequent remedial measures") to show negligence, a defendants' culpable conduct, a defect in a product or its design, or a need for a warning or instruction. However, "the court may admit this evidence for another purpose, such as impeachment or—if disputed—proving ownership, control, or the feasibility of precautionary measures." The defendants have already claimed that their making a label change prior to the decedent's death was not possible. Under Rule 407, the plaintiff would be allowed to rebut this argument offering the post-death label changes.[53] [*302] The post-injury label changes are also available for impeachment purposes. I see no reason, at this time, to exclude this evidence pre-trial.[54] More context will be [*303] needed to determine if this evidence is admissible.[55] acetaminophen, http://www.fda.gov/drugs/drugsafety/informationbydrugclass/ucm165107.htm ; and notice of public hearing on Over-The-Counter Drug Monograph System -Past Present, and Future, 79 Fed. Reg. 10168 (Feb. 24, 2014));

• Post-injury MedWatch 3 500 forms, including that of Ms. Hayes, or other adverse event reports; and

• The notice of proposed rulemaking for acetaminophen [51] currently on the unified agenda with a projected completion date of December 2015 (79 Fed. Reg. 76718-01 (Dec. 22, 2014)).

This is not an exhaustive list, however, of the types of evidence that might be covered by this motion.

[52] The plaintiff offers another example: evidence that the defendants neglected to follow up on adverse events after the decedent's death. This information will likely not be relevant. Punitive damages cannot be imposed on the defendants for conduct that occurred after the injury asserted. I note this example but decline to rule definitely on it until trial.

[53] See, e.g., Kenny v. Southeastern Pennsylvania Transp., 581 F.2d 351, 356 (3d Cir.1978)("As a general rule, evidence of remedial measures taken after the event is not admissible to prove culpable conduct. Fed.R.Evid. 407. The reason for the exclusion is to encourage post-accident repairs or safety precautions [53] in the interest of public safety. See Saltzburg & Redden, Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 162 (2d ed. 1977). But when the defendant opens up the issue by claiming that all reasonable care was being exercised at the time, then the plaintiff may attack that contention by showing later repairs which are inconsistent with it. See 2 J. Weinstein & N. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence PP 407(03), (04) (1977).").

[54] The plaintiff also argues that the subsequent remedial measures were not voluntary and are, therefore, not covered by Rule 407. In January 2011, the FDA asked manufacturers of combination drugs containing acetaminophen, sold globally under trade names such as Tylenol and Panadol, to limit acetaminophen doses to no more than 325 mg in each tablet or capsule by January 14, 2014. For this reason, the plaintiff argues, the changes were not voluntary. The majority of Circuits agree that a subsequent remedial measure is not "voluntary" if it is not done by the defendants. See Steele, Texas Emp. Ins. Ass'n, Intervenor v. Wiedemann Mach. Co., 280 F.2d 380, 382 (3d Cir. 1960)(holding the rule excluding evidence of repairs made after an accident is not applicable where the person who made the repairs is not a party to the suit); TLT—Babcock, Inc. v. Emerson Elec. Co., 33 F.3d 397, 400 (4th Cir.1994)("In the case at bar, the remedial measures were not taken by defendant [54] Emerson but rather were initiated by a third party, the Maryland Transit Authority. Ohio Brass Co., 502 F.2d 741, 744 (7th Cir. 1974)*(Rule 407 has no applicability "when the evidence is offered against a party...which did not make the changes."); O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., 904 F.2d 1194, 1204 (8th Cir. 1990)("An exception to Rule 407 is recognized for evidence of remedial action mandated by superior governmental authority or undertaken by a third party because the policy goal of encouraging remediation would not necessarily be furthered by exclusion of such evidence."); In re Aircrash in Bali, Indonesia, 871 F.2d 812, 817 (9th Cir. 1989)(per curiam)("The purpose of Rule 407 is not implicated in cases involving subsequent measures in which the defendant did not voluntarily participate."); Mehojah v. Drummond, 56 F.3d 1213, 1215 (10th Cir.1995)("'[R]ule 407 only applies to a defendant's voluntary actions;' it does not apply to subsequent remedial measures by non-defendants." Colmar Storage, LLC, 494 F.3d 1293, 1302 (11th Cir. 2007)*("Rule 407 does not apply to a remedial measure that was taken without the voluntary participation of the defendant.").

The more specific question presented here is whether a subsequent remedial measure is "voluntary" if it was undertaken at the request or authority of a regulatory agency, like the FDA. Several Circuits have held that a [55] subsequent remedial change made at the bequest on a "superior authority" is not "voluntary" and, therefore, is not to be covered by Rule 407. See O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., 904 F.2d 1194, 1204 (8th Cir. 1990)("An exception to Rule 407 is recognized for evidence of remedial action mandated by superior governmental authority or undertaken by a third party because the policy goal of encouraging remediation would not necessarily be furthered by exclusion of such evidence."); Herndon v. Ford Motor Co., 573 F.2d 1332, 1343 (5th Cir. 1978)("Invoking this policy [of Rule 407] to justify exclusion here is particularly inappropriate since the estimate was prepared not out of a sense of social responsibility but because the remedial measure was to be required in any event by a superior authority, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration."); In re Aircrash in Bali, Indonesia, 871 F.2d 812, 817 (9th Cir. 1989)(per curiam)("Where the defendant has not voluntarily participated in the subsequent measure at issue, the admission of that measure into evidence does not 'punish' the defendant for his efforts to remedy his [56] safety problems. In this case, Pan Am's management, although to be commended for its cooperation, nonetheless was legally obligated to cooperate with the FAA's investigation. See 14 C.F.R. § 13.3. Thus, the admission of the Hudson report did not penalize Pan Am for its voluntary participation in safety measures."). See generally Annot., Subsequent Remedial Measures, 158 A.L.R. Fed. 609 at § 5[a] (1999).

The Third Circuit has not ruled on this issue. See *Stecyk v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., No. CIV. A. 94-CV-1818, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16772, 1998 WL 744087, at *12 (E.D. Pa. There is not enough evidence before [57] the court to determine even if the possibly admissible subsequent remedial measure was "voluntary" or whether it was done at the behest of the FDA. For this reason, I will decline to make a ruling based on this "theory" of admissibility. When the plaintiff seeks to admit evidence of a post-death label change, the parties can then address the issue of whether Rule 407 applies based on the "voluntariness" of the subsequent change.

10. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence or Argument Regarding What the FDA May Do in the Future (MIL 10)

The defendants have indicated they are withdrawing this motion and that any rulings on this point can be made at trial. For [*304] this reason, I will DENY this motion without prejudice.

11. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence or Argument Relating to the Alleged Inadequacy of the FDA's [59] Regulatory Process (MIL 11)

The defendants move to exclude evidence and arguments related to the alleged inadequacy of the FDA's regulatory process. They claim this evidence and argument is preempted by Buckman Co. v. Plaintiffs' Legal Committee, 531 U.S. 341, 121 S. Ct. 1012, 148 L. Ed. 2d 854 (2001). I previously found that Buckman did not preempt the plaintiff's claims. I see no reason why Buckman would preempt the admission of evidence about alleged flaws in the FDA's regulatory process.[56]

The defendants also argue that this evidence would be prejudicial, confusing, or a waste of time and should be excluded under Rule 403. Without more information, I cannot determine whether this will be the case. This information may be irrelevant or confusing to a jury if the plaintiff raises criticism of the FDA process in her case-in-chief. However, if the defendants claim they were compliant with their duties under FDA regulations and were not required to do more, the plaintiff could potentially offer evidence of the criticism of the FDA regulatory process to rebut these assertions.

For these reasons, I will DENY the defendants' motion without prejudice.

12. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence and Argument Based on Defendants' Exercise of their Constitutionally Protected Right to Petition the Government (MIL 12)

The defendants move to exclude any evidence or argument regarding their lobbying efforts towards Congress or the FDA. They argue that this evidence is barred by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine and is violative of their First Amendment rights to petition the government.

The First Amendment provides the right to petition the government without fear of retribution or penalty. See U.S. Const. amend. I ("Congress shall make [61] no law . . . abridging . . . the right of the people to petition the government for a redress of grievances."); see also U.S. Const. amend. XIV. "Under the Noerr—Pennington doctrine—established by Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81

Cir. 1980); to impeach a witness, Norwood Clinic, Inc. v. Spann, 240 Ala. 427, 199 So. 840 (1941); or to give testimony which is part of the res gestae.") and id. at 88 (acknowledging that proof of ownership is an additional exception to the rule).

[56] The defendants support this argument with Horn v. Thoratec Corp., 376 F.3d 163, 178 (3d Cir. 2004). Horn did quote part of the FDA's amicus brief stating: "[I]t is inappropriate for a jury to second-guess FDA's scientific judgment on such a matter that is within FDA's particular expertise." The FDA has not offered any opinion on the outcome of this motion or case. That case also involved a medical device and different regulations than this one. Horn discussed whether preemption was appropriate, not whether evidence was admissible. I have already ruled that the plaintiff's claims are not preempted by Buckman. For these reasons, Horn is not helpful.

I also note that the FDA itself has questioned the efficacy of the monograph process. See FDA Is Seeking Ideas for a "New and Improved" Process for Regulating OTC Drugs under the OTC Drug Review, available at [60] http://blogs.fda.gov/fdavoice/index.php/2014/04/fda-is-seeking-ideas-for-a-new-and-improved-processfor-regulating-otc-drugs-under-the-otc-drug-review/ .

S.Ct. 523, 5 L.Ed.2d 464 (1961), and United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L.Ed.2d 626 (1965)—defendants are immune from antitrust liability for engaging in conduct (including litigation) aimed at influencing decisionmaking by the government." Octane Fitness, LLC v. ICON Health & Fitness, Inc., 134 S.Ct. 1749, 1757, [*305] 188 L. Ed. 2d 816 (2014)(citation omitted).[57] Essentially, businesses can't be held liable for antitrust violations for petitioning the government because their First Amendment rights supersede antitrust laws.

The defendants argue that Noerr-Pennington is applicable beyond just the antitrust context. While that is true, the Noerr-Pennington doctrine has no place here.[58] The plaintiff is not trying to restrain the defendants' speech or enjoin the [62] defendants' conduct towards the government. See NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 913-15, 102 S. Ct. 3409, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1215 (1982)(recognizing Noerr-Pennington protects right to boycott businesses for civil rights violations; reversing state court's issuance of an injunction and damages for lost profits). The plaintiff is not seeking civil liability for the defendants' petitioning efforts, based on a theory of conspiracy. See In re Asbestos School Litigation, 46 F.3d 1284, 1286, 1294 (3d Cir. 1994)(finding that a civil conspiracy claim could not withstand summary judgment when it was based primarily on evidence that the defendant company joined a lobbying organization that may have offered misleading information to governmental officials); Int'l Bhd of Teamsters, Local 734 Health & Welfare Trust Fund v. Philip Morris Inc., 196 F.3d 818, 826 (7th Cir. 1999)("To the extent the manufacturers' statements were designed to influence Congress—to get favorable laws and ward off unfavorable ones—they cannot be a source of liability directly under the Noerr—Pennington doctrine."); Evers v. County of Custer, 745 F.2d 1196, 1204 (9th Cir. 1984)(finding conspiracy claim unfounded based on petitioning activities).[59] Nor is the plaintiff trying to base her [*306] cause of action on the defendants' petitioning activities.

[57] The doctrine also includes a "sham exception" which provides that "activity 'ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action' does not qualify for Noerr immunity if it 'is a mere sham to cover...an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor.'" Octane Fitness, LLC v. ICON Health & Fitness, Inc., 134 S.Ct. 1749, 1757, 188 L. Ed. 2d 816 (2014)(citation omitted). Since the Noerr-Pennington doctrine does not apply here, I see no reason to consider argument about whether the sham exception applies to prevent immunity.

[58] See, e.g., We, Inc. v. City of Philadelphia, 174 F.3d 322, 327 (3d Cir. 1999)("Thus, the purpose of Noerr—Pennington as applied in areas outside the antitrust field is the protection of the right to petition. Immunity from liability is necessary so as not to chill the exercise of that right."); Congregation Anshei Roosevelt v. Planning and Zoning Bd. of the Borough of Roosevelt, No. 07-4109(GEB), 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63994, 2008 WL 4003483, at *6-9 (D. N.J. Aug. 21, 2008)("The Supreme Court as well as the Third Circuit Court of Appeals have since extended the Noerr—Pennington doctrine beyond the scope of antitrust to areas such as civil conspiracy and cases arising under § 1983 as well as other civil rights statutes.")(citations omitted); Falise v. Am. Tobacco Co., 94 F. Supp. 2d 316, 350-53 (E.D. N.Y. 2000); Video Intern. Production v. Warner-Amex Cable Com., 858 F.2d 1075, 1084 (5th Cir. 1998)("Although the Noerr—Pennington doctrine initially arose in the antitrust field, other circuits have expanded it to protect first amendment petitioning of the government from claims brought under federal and state laws, including section 1983 and common-law tortious interference with contractual relations. [64] See, e.g., Evers v. County of Custer, 745 F.2d 1196, 1204 (9th Cir. 1984); Gorman Towers, Inc. v. Bogoslavsky, 626 F.2d 607, 614 (8th Cir.1980), and cases cited therein. We find it easy to agree that the same rationale under antitrust law that supports WAX's petitions to the City also serves to protect WAX from the tort claim. There is simply no reason that a common-law tort doctrine can any more permissibly abridge or chill the constitutional right of petition than can a statutory claim such as antitrust.").

[59] The Third Circuit in In re Asbestos School Litigation, 46 F.3d 1284 (3d Cir. 1994), relied on NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 913-15, 102 S. Ct. 3409, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1215 (1982), in making its decision. However, the court's focus was more on a violation of Pfizer's First Amendment right to associate with a lobbying organization than it was Pfizer's right to petition the government. Id. at 1289-94. See also id. at 1294 ("In sum, then, the district court's decision was clearly wrong. Worse, it has implications that broadly threaten First Amendment rights. The district court's holding suggests that Pfizer-based solely on its limited and (as far as the record reflects) innocent association with the SBA-could be held liable, as the plaintiffs have urged, for all of the allegedly tortious acts committed by all of the defendants, whether before or after the SBA was formed. The implications of such a holding are far-reaching. Joining organizations that participate in public debate, making contributions to them, [65] and attending their meetings are activities that enjoy substantial First Amendment protection....But the district court's holding, if generally accepted, would make these activities unjustifiably risky and would undoubtedly have an unwarranted inhibiting effect upon them." (citations omitted)). While the lobbying organization's communications with Congress would be protected, the Court noted that misleading communications by the lobbying organization to plaintiffs and potential members of the class may not be protected and could be evidence of fraudulent concealment. See id. at 1290 and 1290, n. 4.

See Brownsville Golden Age Nursing Home, Inc. v. Wells, 839 F.2d 155, 160 (3d Cir. 1988)("In numerous cases, the courts have rejected claims seeking damages for injuries allegedly caused by the defendants' actions directed to influencing government action."); Structure Building Corp. v. June 30, 2005)(Noerr-Pennington doctrine barred defamation and injurious falsehood claims against defendants who had sent letters to federal regulators).

Instead, the plaintiff seeks to offer evidence about how the defendants attempted to influence, petition, or communicate with Congress and/or the FDA to show their knowledge, state of mind, or intent. It would be a stretch to say that Noerr-Pennington bars any use of any evidence of the defendants' petitioning of the government, and its agencies, or evidence of any communications with the FDA. See *Wolfe v. McNeil-PPC, Inc., No. 07-348, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2160, 2012 WL 38694, at * 6 (E.D. Pa. They also argue this evidence should be precluded under Rule 401 and 403. The context of this evidence is important to understanding its relevance and/or risk of undue prejudice. I will decline to rule based on Rule 401 or 403 at this time.

For these reasons, I will DENY the defendants' motion without prejudice.

13. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence and Argument Related to Foreign Labeling and Foreign Regulatory Actions (MIL 13)

The defendants argue that evidence related to labeling or regulatory actions [*307] taken in countries outside the U.S. should be excluded under Rules 401, 402, or 403. The defendants argue that foreign regulatory processes regarding labeling of OTC products are so different from the FDA's processes that information about foreign regulatory actions would be irrelevant. [61] The plaintiff counters that foreign labels on the defendants' products, Mich. 2000)*(finding [66] that district judge "erred in treating the [Noerr—Pennington] doctrine as a rule of evidence")(citing In re Brand Name Prescription Drugs); Mason v. Texaco, Inc., 741 F.Supp. 1472, 1500-01 (D. Kan. 1990)(explaining how Noerr-Pennington only bars cause of action based on solely on petitioning activities, not evidence of petitioning activities for other claims).

[61] The defendants cite In re Vioxx Litig., 2006 WL 2950622, at *5 (N.J. Super., Law Div. Oct. 2, 2006), and 395 N.J. Super. 358, 377, 928 A.2d 935 (App. Div. 2007), cert. denied, 193 N.J. 221, 936 A.2d 968 (2007), as support for this argument. These decisions focused on whether New Jersey was an appropriate forum, not whether foreign labels would be admissible evidence. I do not find these cases to be helpful.

They also cite to Meridia Prods. Liab. Litig. v. Abbott Labs., 447 F.3d 861 (6th Cir. 2006). In Meridia, the Sixth Circuit reviewed whether the district court's grant of summary judgment was appropriate. Id. at 863. The court considered whether a foreign label with different instructions created a "triable issue of fact," not whether admission [68] of a foreign label was permissible. See id. at 867. This case is not helpful.

The other cases offered by the defendants to support their relevance argument are also not on point or are not persuasive. See Hurt v. Coyne Cylinder Co., 956 F.2d 1319, 1327 (6th Cir. 1991)(discussing the use of foreign labels in the context of whether a jury instruction about alternative designs was appropriate); Deviner v. Electrolux Motor, AB, 844 F.2d 769, 771 n.2 (11th Cir. 1988)(noting simply that the district court excluded foreign instructions on a saw based on relevance, without offering much explanation of the rationale of that decision); In re Trasylol Prods. Liab. Litig., 709 F. Supp. 2d 1323, 1336 (S.D. Fla.

warning of the risk of "severe or possibly fatal liver [67] damage" before the decedent's death are evidence of the defendants' knowledge of potential risks related to their products. See Pl. Ex. 1, Canadian Label (filed under seal). I agree. I recognize that the admission of foreign labels may require context of a foreign country's regulatory system in order to present them accurately, leading to a trial within a trial and undue delay. However, I believe it's possible for the plaintiff to offer evidence that foreign regulatory agencies raised concerns about acetaminophen dosing years before the decedent's death, to show notice and/or knowledge. A jury instruction can be given to ensure that jurors understand the limited nature of this evidence.

The plaintiff also argues that defendants' foreign labeling can be offered to show how the defendants fell below their standard of care. Here, I agree with the defendants. It would be unfair to allow evidence of foreign labeling in countries requiring different regulatory and/or statutory duties to [69] show that the defendants breached their duties under United States laws. Use of foreign regulatory activities in this way would be inappropriate.

The plaintiff claims this evidence could also be used to show causation. It is unclear to me how this evidence would be probative of causation. I would need to see how it was used in context to determine whether its admission for this purpose would be appropriate.

In addition, I will decline to make rulings as to the admissibility of this evidence based on Rule 403. The context and content of the evidence regarding foreign labels and foreign regulatory actions will be important to my determining its probative value and any risk of prejudice, undue delay, or confusion to the jury.

[*308] The defendants also argue that foreign labels are inadmissible hearsay that do not fall within an exception.[62] The plaintiff counters that they are not hearsay because they are not being offered for the truth.[63] In order to address this argument, I would need more information about the labels and how the plaintiff plans to use them in order to rule on this point.

Lastly, the defendants claim that the plaintiff cannot authenticate foreign labeling evidence. The plaintiff argues that the evidence is self-authenticating under Rule 902(3). Argument on this point is better addressed at trial.

For the foregoing reasons, I will DENY the defendants' MIL 13 without prejudice.[64]

14. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Marketing and Promotional Materials (MIL 14)

2010)(excluding expert testimony on foreign regulatory matters in a Daubert motion because expert was not qualified in this area of expertise, testimony included improper opinions, and/or information about foreign regulations should be excluded under Rule 403); In re Seroquel Prods. Supp. 2d 1029, 1054 (D. Minn. 2007)(excluding evidence about foreign label based on Rule 403 and the risk of confusion to the jury).

[62] The plaintiff counters that these labels are adoptive admissions under Rule 801(d)(2)(A), (B). I would need to see more information about [70] the content and context of the labels in order to rule appropriately on this point.

[63] The plaintiff also argues that her experts may rely on the foreign labels and regulatory actions in rendering an opinion. This may be true. See Fed. R. Evid. 703. However, this argument is better addressed in the context of pending Daubert motions.

[64] See, e.g., *Tobin v. SmithKline Beecham Pharms., No. 00-CV-0025, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26401, 2001 WL 36102165, at *1 (D. Wyo. The defendants [71] move for the exclusion of any evidence related to marketing, public relations, and/or promotional materials for Tylenol products. They argue the information is irrelevant, would confuse the jury, or cause undue delay in the trial. The plaintiff argues that evidence regarding marketing and advertising decisions made by the defendants should be allowed to show knowledge, state of mind, and/or conscious disregard and is relevant to the plaintiff's failure-to-warn, design defect, and wrongful death claims.[65]

First, the defendants argue that the information is irrelevant because the plaintiff cannot assert a deceptive marketing claim under Alabama law.[66] The plaintiff concedes this point.[67] This argument is moot.

Next, the defendants claim that advertising is irrelevant because the plaintiff admits that the decedent read the label. The plaintiff notes that advertising, marketing, and public relations are other ways the defendants use to communicate with the public and physicians about Tylenol [*309] products and their risks; all of the varied ways the defendants communicated with consumers should be considered because Tylenol is an over-the-counter product.[68]

There is a question—to be answered by the jury—about whether the decedent took the recommended dose or accidentally took an overdose. The plaintiff argues that marketing and advertising affected consumers' perceptions of how strictly to adhere to the warnings, giving consumers the impression that Tylenol was "safe." Given that the jury will have to decide whether the decedent overdosed or misused the product and whether this misuse was foreseeable, marketing and advertising may be relevant to the plaintiff's theory that the defendants' branding of Extra Strength Tylenol "blunted" the warnings provided.

Third, the defendants [73] argue that any advertising not actually seen or relied upon by the decedent should be excluded as irrelevant.[69] For example, the defendants argue that certain promotional materials involving Tylenol

[66] The parties also discuss the relevant regulatory standards for over-the-counter drug marketing, as enforced by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). Because there is no deceptive marketing claim, I do not [72] see this information as relevant or helpful to the motion at hand.

[69] To support this point, the defendants point to other cases which have excluded marketing evidence: Zundel v. Johnson & Johnson, No. MID-L-6854-05, Hrg. Tr., at 60-62 (N.J. Super. Ct., Middlesex Cty. Jan. 13, 2009)(Doc. No. 76, Ex. E); In re Norplant Contraceptive Prods. Liab. Litig., 165 F.3d 374, 379 (5th Cir. 1999); and *Appleby v. Glaxo Wellcome, Inc., 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32875, 2005 WL 3440440, at 4 n. 5 (D. N.J. Dec. 13, 2005). These cases are not helpful.

In Zundel, the judge excluded marketing evidence because it was not relevant to the plaintiff's failure-to-warn claim. See No. MID-L-6854-05, Hrg. Tr., at 60-62 (N.J. Super. Ct., Middlesex Cty. Jan. 13, 2009)(Doc. No. 76, Ex. E). However, it is not clear from that decision whether the plaintiff also had asserted a punitive damages claim. In this case, the marketing evidence may be relevant to state [74] of mind, which is especially important to the plaintiff's punitive damages claim. For this reason, I cannot say that Zundel is helpful.

In re Norplant Contraceptive Prods. Liab. Litig., 165 F.3d 374, 379 (5th Cir. 1999), was an appeal of a summary judgment decision. The Fifth Circuit briefly discussed the appellant's argument that evidence of "aggressive" marketing should negate adequate warnings. The court found that this argument was "critically weakened by the absence of any evidence on the record that any of the five plaintiffs actually saw, let alone relied, on any marketing materials issued to them by [the defendant]." Id. The court went on to explain that even if there was evidence of the plaintiff relying on marketing, the learned-intermediary doctrine would make summary judgment appropriate. Id. Norplant, unlike this case, involved a prescription drug. Given Norplant's procedural and factual differences, it is distinguishable and not persuasive.

Cool Burst Caplets has no bearing on Ms. Hayes' case. They claim that the only evidence the plaintiff can offer on this topic comes from "vague and conclusory testimony" by Rebecca Hayes, the decedent's sister. This, the defendants argue, should not be enough to permit any and all advertising of about Tylenol into evidence at trial.[70]

[*310] It may very well be true that Ms. Hayes did not see all the advertising the plaintiff purports to put forth. It may also be true that information regarding these promotional materials could be relevant to show the defendants' state of mind. Decisions on whether specific pieces of evidence are relevant or irrelevant are best made in context, at trial, when the use of such materials is clearer.

Lastly, the defendants argue that financial information related to marketing should be excluded under Rule 403 because it would be unfairly prejudicial or [76] would cause undue delay in the trial. The defendants have filed a separate motion (MIL 17) seeking to exclude all financial information. I will address the admissibility of financial information in discussing that motion.

The plaintiff counters that sales of Tylenol were influenced by the defendants' branding of Tylenol products as safe and recommended most by doctors and hospitals. She also claims marketing evidence may show the defendants' breach of their pharmacovigilance duties. One of the plaintiff's main theories of the case is that the defendants put profits over safety. The plaintiff has offered evidence about how expenditures on marketing far exceeded those budgeted for research and development. This information would, in the least, be relevant to the plaintiff's theory about the defendants' state of mind and/or motive.[71]

The plaintiff argues that evidence related to marketing and advertising would be relevant to the plaintiff's failure-to-warn claim—to show that the danger of liver [77] failure was not known and obvious under the circumstances, thereby imposing a duty to warn of such risks on the defendants. The marketing and promotional materials could establish the context in which the decedent perceived the risks associated with Extra Strength Tylenol.[72] Evidence explaining the backdrop of the product's marketing may be helpful in providing the details the jury would need to

Appleby v. Glaxo Wellcome, Inc., 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32875, 2005 WL 3440440 (D. N.J. Dec. 13, 2005), also involved a prescription drug. In discussing whether a direct marketing exception of the learned intermediary doctrine existed, the court found that liability premised on this theory could not stand because the plaintiff had not presented evidence she was affected by marketing. *2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32875, [WL] at 4-5. This case is distinguishable. [75]

[70] To support this theory, the defendants cite decisions in *Wolfe v. McNeil-PPC, Inc., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47710, 2011 WL 1673805, at 8-9 (E.D. Pa. May 4, 2011), and Lyles v. McNeil-PPC, Inc., No. ATL-L-8655-11 (N.J. Super. Ct.). These decisions are not helpful. Both of those decisions discussed whether the expert testimony of Dr. Marvin Goldberg, the plaintiff's marketing expert, should be excluded under Daubert. The defendants filed a separate Daubert motion to exclude Dr. Goldberg's testimony. The plaintiff also makes arguments in this motion in limine about the admissibility of Dr. Goldberg's testimony. The extent to which Dr. Goldberg's testimony is admissible has been addressed in my decision on his Daubert motion. See Doc. No. 315 (Mar. 2, 2016).

determine whether the risk of acute liver failure was really one that was known and obvious to consumers of Extra Strength Tylenol.[73]

[*311] The plaintiff claims marketing evidence may also be relevant to the plaintiff's design defect claim by showing Extra Strength Tylenol was an "unreasonably dangerous product." Under Alabama law, "a defective product is one that is unreasonably dangerous, i.e., one that is not fit for its intended purpose or that does not meet the reasonable expectations of the ordinary consumer." Beam v. Tramco, Inc., 655 So.2d 979, 981 (Ala.1995)(citing Casrell v. Altec Industries, Inc., 335 So.2d 128, 133 (Ala.1976); Entrekin v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 519 So.2d 447 (Ala.1987)). The plaintiff argues that marketing evidence would be relevant to showing "the reasonable expectations of the ordinary consumer."[74] I agree that marketing evidence may be relevant evidence in this respect.

Furthermore, the Tylenol label itself included the defendants' marketing message of "How Tylenol® Products are Different." This message, on the box of Tylenol products, stated how Tylenol is "[r]ecommended the most by doctors and used the most by hospitals" and is "[u]nlikely to cause the gastric irritation often associated with aspirin, naproxen sodium or even ibuprofen." This information most certainly would be relevant, given Rebecca Hayes' testimony that her sister took Extra Strength Tylenol—as opposed to another pain reliever—because she thought it was gentler on her stomach and was a safer [*312] product. A jury could conclude from this information that the decedent expected it to be a safe product—not one which might cause her irreparable harm and death.

The evidence may also help the plaintiff make out her fraud claims, by showing that the information communicated to the public through marketing, advertising, public relations, and the products' label did not fully inform the decedent of Extra Strength Tylenol's risks. The drug product in this case is sold over-the-counter (OTC). A consumer does not need [82] the advice of a doctor to take it. From that vantage point, the label and any other information, i.e., marketing, advertising, and public relations, would be the primary means by which consumers learn about the product.[75] In this context especially, marketing and advertising may be more relevant because there is no "learned intermediary" who can educate consumers about an OTC product.[76] The plaintiff has offered evidence that Rebecca Hayes and the decedent relied upon the defendants' marketing and advertising messages for Tylenol in making their decisions to purchase/consume Extra Strength Tylenol. Marketing evidence would, therefore, be relevant to the plaintiff's fraud claims.

In the least, the plaintiff argues that marketing and sales documents should be admissible for impeachment purposes. I agree.

For these reasons, I will DENY the defendants' MIL 14 without prejudice. The parties may raise arguments regarding relevance and unfair prejudice at trial.

15. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Media Reports Relating to Tylenol (MIL 15)

The defendants move to preclude the plaintiff from introducing into evidence media reports concerning Tylenol "that are unrelated to Plaintiff's claims in this case." Specifically, the defendants take issue with admission of an April 1995 television program [*313] "Prime Time Live," a series of print and audio reports by ProPublica including a September 2013 program on the National Public Radio (NPR) podcast "This American Life," and a 2015 article published online at thebmj.com on the efficacy of acetaminophen for the [85] treatment of spinal pain and related media coverage of that article. They argue this evidence is hearsay, is irrelevant, and is highly prejudicial under Rule 403.

The plaintiff counters that the defendants' motion is vague and overly broad. Further, she argues that media reports may be relevant because the defendants used aggressive public relations tactics as part of their marketing of Tylenol as safe. The plaintiff "acknowledges that, in general, media video and/or publications may fall under the hearsay rule." However, the plaintiff claims media reports may fall into hearsay exceptions or may be appropriate impeachment material. Media reports, the plaintiff claims, also may be offered for a purpose other than the truth of their content (i.e., notice, breach of duty, knowledge, state of mind, etc.).

[75] See Torsiello v. Whitehall Labs., Div. of Home Prods. Corp., 165 N.J. Super. 311, 326, 398 A.2d 132 (App. Div. 1979)("A consumer of over-the-counter drugs is, as it were, self-prescribing and is intended, expected, and indeed encouraged by the drug industry to do so. He must, therefore, also be given such information by the manufacturer as will permit him to self-prescribe with a minimum of risk.").

[76] See id. at 322-23 ("It was clearly for the jury to determine whether in fact that danger is, in Restatement verbiage, as 'generally known and understood' among lay consumers as it apparently is in medical and pharmaceutical circles. In our [83] view, the duty of the manufacturer explicitly to warn consumers of the specific risks of over-the-counter drug use derives from the basic marketing predicate of the over-the-counter drug industry, namely, that nonprescription drugs are purchased by consumers for the purpose of self-medication typically without any intended or actual intervention by a physician. The consuming public may well appreciate that an inherent risk of self-medication is delay or failure in obtaining professional attention for an ailment requiring more than simple symptomatic relief. But it has also been led to believe that while the over-the-counter product may not prove ultimately helpful, neither will it harm if taken as directed. Indeed, a jury would be justified in concluding that the advertising and mass marketing techniques involved in selling aspirin to the consumer are calculated to assure the public of its essential innocuousness and inherent safety. It is indeed this actual and intended direct relationship between the manufacturer and the consumer of over-the-counter drugs, in contradistinction to the interposition between them of the physician where prescription drugs are involved, which accounts [84] for what has become a well-recognized dichotomy in respect of the required recipient of the manufacturer's warning, namely, that while it is the consumer who is entitled to the warning in respect of nonprescription drugs, only the prescribing physician need be warned as to the risks involved in a prescription drug.").

The defendants have not provided these specific pieces of evidence. It is not entirely clear what they discuss or include. The lack of information about this evidence makes it difficult for me to assess their admissibility. See Luce v. U.S., 469 U.S. 38, 41, 105 S. Ct. 460, 83 L. Ed. 2d 443 (1984)("A reviewing court is handicapped in any effort to rule on subtle evidentiary questions outside a factual context."). Without the context of this evidence or any other [86] media reports the plaintiff might introduce, I cannot rule on this motion based on the defendants' Rule 401, 402, and 403 arguments. In addition, the purpose for which these materials may be offered will help determine whether they are hearsay.

For these reasons, I will DENY the defendants' MIL 15 without prejudice.

16. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence or Argument Related to Statements Submitted to the American Association for the Study of Liver Diseases to the FDA and the 2006 Press Release Issued by the American Liver Foundation (MIL 16)

The defendants move to exclude evidence and argument concerning two related pieces of evidence created by third-parties: 1) the July 2006 press release issued by the American Liver Foundation (ALF) regarding the dangers of "excess acetaminophen," and 2) the April 27, 2007 memorandum prepared by the American Association for the Study of Liver Diseases (AASLD) that was submitted to the FDA. See Doc. No. 79, Ex. C and D. They argue that this evidence is inadmissible hearsay or is barred by Rule 403.

a. AASLD and ALF

The AASLD "was founded in 1950 by a small group of leading liver specialists... to bring together those who had contributed to the field of hepatology." [87] See http://www.aasld.org/aboutus/Pages/default.aspx ; see also Doc. No. 79, Ex. A: "About Us," from http://www.aasld.org/aboutus/Pages/default.aspx . The AASLD's stated mission is "[t]o advance and disseminate the science and practice of hepatology, and to promote liver health and quality patient care." Id. The American Liver Foundation is a non-profit organization created by the AASLD in 1976 with a mission of "facilitat[ing], advocat[ing], and promot[ing] education, support and research for the prevention, treatment and cure of liver disease." See http://www.liverfoundation.org/about/ ; see also Doc. No. 79, Ex. B: "About Us," from http://www.liverfoundation.org/about/ .

[*314] b. July 2006 ALF Press Release

In July 2006, the American Liver Foundation (ALF) issued a press release to warn of the "dangers of excess acetaminophen." See ALF press release, Jul. 18, 2006 (Doc. No. 79, Ex. C). The press release discussed a recently published study in the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) that "showed that healthy adults who took the maximum recommended dose of acetaminophen for two weeks had drastically increased liver enzyme levels which could lead to liver damage." Id.[77]

In response to the article, the ALF recommended "that people not exceed three grams of acetaminophen a day for any prolonged period of time." Id. The press release explained that the recommendation concerned persons taking "the equivalent of six 'extra-strength' tablets a day for several weeks" not those taking acetaminophen for "[r]egular, short-term use." Id.

c. The AASLD's Public Comment on FDA's December 2006 Rulemaking

[77] The article in question was Paul B. Watkins, Aminotransferase Elevations in Healthy Adults Receiving 4 Grams of Acetaminophen Daily, 296 JAMA 87, 91 (Jul. 5, 2006)("An association between therapeutic dosing of acetaminophen and elevations [88] in ALT has not been previously reported.").

In December 2006, the FDA proposed certain amendments to its OTC labeling regulations and the tentative final monograph for OTC internal analgesic, antipyretic, and antirheumatic (IAAA) drug products to include new warnings and other labeling requirements. See 71 Fed. Reg. 77314-01 (Dec. 26, 2006). Proposed changes included removing the prior-enacted alcohol warning and adding a new liver warning that also included an alcohol warning. See id. at 77333. The FDA requested comments and data from interested persons. See id. at 77346.

The AASLD submitted a public comment in April 2007, which recommended, inter alia, that the FDA add: 1) a warning that using acetaminophen at the maximum recommended dose (4 grams/day) for 5 or more consecutive days increases the chance for severe [89] or fatal injury; and 2) a warning that using acetaminophen at the maximum recommended dose (4 grams/day) when food intake is restricted or prohibited increases the chance for severe or fatal injury. See Doc. No. 79, Ex. D. The FDA did not adopt these recommendations because the FDA did not have sufficient data to support the warnings. See 74 Fed. Reg. 19385-01, 19391, 19397 (Apr. 29, 2009).[78]

d. Hearsay

The defendants argue that the press release and public comment are inadmissible hearsay. The plaintiff counters that she plans to use the evidence not for its truth, but instead to show notice, knowledge, standard of care, or state of mind.[79] This would not be for a hearsay purpose.

[*315] e. Notice, Knowledge, State of Mind

The defendants argue that these documents cannot be admitted to show "notice" because the risks they discuss are not substantially similar to those experienced by the decedent.

"In products liability cases evidence of prior accidents involving the same product under similar circumstances is admissible to show notice to the defendant of the danger, to show existence of the danger, and to show the cause of the accident." Gumbs v. International Harvester, Inc., 718 F.2d 88, 97, 19 V.I. 642 (3d Cir. 1983). The idea that prior incidents be "substantially similar" is especially important in cases "where the evidence is proffered to show the existence of a design defect." Barker v. Deere and Co., 60 F.3d 158, 162-63 (3d Cir. 1995). In determining whether the prior incidents are "substantially similar," a court must look to the facts and circumstances of the prior incidents in weighing their potential relevance and potential prejudice. See Tait v. Armor Elevator Co., 958 F.2d 563, 568-69 (3d Cir. 1992)(explaining how district courts should use Rules 402 and 403 to determine similarity of prior accidents); *Stecyk v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., No. CIV. A. 94-CV-1818, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16772, 1998 WL 744087, at 4 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 23, 1998) [91] (same).

From the information provided, the ALF press release and the AASLD public comment offer information that is highly probative of the risks later experienced by the decedent (i.e., plaintiff was fasting and/or taking recommended daily dose of Extra Strength Tylenol for more than five days). The evidence in question involves risks related to taking acetaminophen for long periods and/or while fasting. The information is similar enough that I do not see a substantial risk of undue prejudice in admitting it for the purpose of notice.[80] The defendants may explore any [78] I explained in a previous decision that the FDA's decision to not adopt these recommendations based on insufficient data did not preempt the plaintiff's claims under Wyeth v. Levine. See Memorandum Denying Motion for Summary Judgment regarding Failure-to-Warn Claim, Doc. No. 181 at 41-44.

[79] The plaintiff also plans to have their experts use these documents in forming opinions about post-marketing reporting and labeling. Evidence relied upon by experts need not be admissible so long "experts in the particular field would reasonably [90] rely on those kinds of facts or data in forming an opinion on the subject." Fed. R. Evid. 703. Whether the press release or public comment can be relied upon by experts in rendering an opinion is a question more appropriately answered in Daubert motions pending before the court.

dissimilarity between this evidence and the circumstances of the decedent's death at trial; the jury can then determine how much weight to give them. See, e.g., Benedi v. McNeil-P.P.C., Inc., 66 F.3d 1378, 1386 (4th Cir. 1995)("McNeil explored these dissimilarities at length. Whether the dissimilarities were significant was for the jury to determine."); Kehm v. Procter & Gamble Mfg. Co., 724 F.2d 613, 626 (8th Cir. 1983)("It was up to the jury to decide what weight to give the complaints from other consumers.").

As the plaintiff argues, the press release, together with other evidence showing the defendants' reaction to this press release, can also be offered to show the defendants' knowledge of potential risks and state of mind. Additionally, the documents could be relevant to show how reasonable the defendants' conduct was or was not by comparing it to the actions other members of the scientific community took regarding information about potential risks.

f. Rule 403 Generally

The defendants argue the evidence would be unduly prejudicial, confusing, or misleading as compared to their probative value. From what has been provided, I cannot say for certain. Context is key to rulings regarding Rule 403.

For these reasons, I will DENY the defendants' motion without prejudice.

[*316] 17. Defendants' Motion In Limine To Exclude Evidence Or Argument Relating To Defendants' Profit Margins, Wealth, And Other Financial Information (MIL 17)

The defendants move to exclude any evidence or argument relating to the defendants' profit margins, wealth, or other financial information. They argue this information is irrelevant or considered [93] "highly prejudicial" under Alabama law. The plaintiff counters that this motion is overly broad and vague.

Both sides agree that the defendants' net worth is not admissible under Alabama law because it would be highly prejudicial. See Southern Life Health Ins. Co. v. Whitman, 358 So.2d 1025, 1026-1027 (Ala. 1978)("Our cases have long held that evidence of the defendant's wealth is highly prejudicial and, therefore, inadmissible."); Industrial Chemical & Fiberglass Corp. v. Chandler, 547 So. 2d 812, 835-836 (Ala. 1989)("Our cases have long held that evidence of the defendant's wealth, or lack of wealth, is highly prejudicial and, therefore, inadmissible (and our cases recognize no distinction between situations involving compensatory damages and those involving punitive damages)..."); *Pacific Mut. This rule of exclusion has been considered substantive and not procedural by other federal courts. See Wilson v. Gillis Adver. Co., 145 F.R.D. 578, 580 (N.D. Ala. 1993)("Although an argument can be made that this is simply an Alabama rule of evidence, plaintiff argues that certain financial evidence, such as the defendants' substantially higher spending on marketing as compared to spending on research and development, is relevant to [*317] show motive.[82] I agree that this information would be relevant to the defendants' state of mind.

The plaintiff further argues that other monetary numbers, beyond the defendants' net worth, may be admissible to show the defendants' level of culpability: the amount of money spent on marketing and advertising to influence consumers to purchase Tylenol; the amount the defendants earned "as a result of that misleading marketing and advertising;" the amount the defendants saved because they did not conduct clinical trials and testing; the amount of revenue preserved because a warning was not added; and the amount donated to "influence" [97] the American Liver Foundation to change its position on acute liver failure. Admission of these numbers might implicitly allow the jury to draw conclusions about the defendants' wealth. Implicit references to the defendants' net worth may also not be appropriate under Alabama law.[83] See, e.g., Otis Elevator Co. v. Stallworth, 474 So. 2d 82, 84 (Ala. 1985)("The language used by plaintiff's attorney implies that if Otis Elevator Company could afford to hire an expensive expert from New York to testify in over one hundred cases, then that same company could afford to pay a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. and is thus procedural rather than substantive, it is so fundamental to the resolution of the issue of punitive damages under the Alabama law theories as to be effectively substantive and as a practical matter binding on a federal trial court when it tries an Alabama tort claim seeking punitive damages."); Carr v. City of Florence, 729 F. Supp. 783, 786 (N.D. Ala. 1990)(applying wealth exclusionary rule), aff'd, 934 F.2d 1264 (11th Cir. 1991).

The Alabama Supreme Court has indicated that arguments about what awards may be sufficient to punish the defendants are not proper, but such improper comments may not cause reversible errors if a curative instruction is offered. See Daniel Construction Co. V. Pierce, 270 Ala. 522, 120 So.2d 381, 386-387 (Ala. 1960)(discussing whether attorney arguing "if the jury brings out a verdict less than $50,000 it wouldn't [95] be any more than a mosquito bite to this defendant" was reversible error; finding it was improper but cured by jury instruction); Blount Bros. Construction Co. v. Rose, 274 Ala. 429, 149 So.2d 821, 831-833 (1963)(explaining that argument "Why, a $25,000 verdict against Blount Brothers would not be a slap on the leg to them" was cured by jury instruction, citing Daniel Construction). But see Young v. Bryan, 445 So.2d 234, 237-239 (Ala. 1984)(plaintiff's counsel's argument in closing statement regarding size and contents of defendant deceased's estate held to be improper/highly prejudicial and warranted remand for new trial and reversal).

[82] The plaintiff also argues that financial wealth information may be admissible if the defendants "open the door" to such evidence. There is caselaw in Alabama supporting this point. See Mutual Sav. Life Ins. Co. v. Smith, 765 So. 2d 652, 655-56 (Ala. Civ. App. 1998)("The rule under discussion does not operate to exclude evidence of wealth or poverty if such is relevant to some issue, other than damages, properly in the case. One way for such an issue to be properly in a case is for one's opponent to have opened the door by commenting upon or asking questions concerning a party's financial standing. Whenever one addresses a particular subject, even if impermissibly so, this then permits the opponent to rebut such evidence under the doctrine of 'curative admissibility.' [96] Some writers and courts have referred to this as 'retaliatory admissibility.'")(quoting 1 Charles W. Gamble, McElroy's Alabama Evidence, § 189.05(1)(5th ed. 1996)); City of Gulf Shores v. Harbert Int'l, 608 So. 2d 348, 353 (Ala. 1992)("We acknowledge this Court's long-standing rule that evidence of a party's wealth, be it plaintiff's or defendant's, is inadmissible generally....However, we also recognize that an opposing party may inquire into the other party's wealth on cross-examination or in rebuttal if the other party 'opens the door.'")(citations omitted). However, the parties are expected to abide by Alabama's rule of precluding evidence of a party's wealth because unintentional admission of such evidence could result in a mistrial.

[83] The defendants are also precluded from implying that their net worth is the reason the plaintiff has brought suit against them. See Baptist Med. Ctr. Montclair v. Whitfield, 950 So. 2d 1121, 1128 (Ala. 2006)(finding arguments by defense counsel that plaintiff dismissed individual doctor so that she could "focus on recovering from BMC, a corporation, which had more money than Dr. Pennington's practice group" was improper argument; grant of a new trial was warranted); Allison v. Acton-Etheridge Coal Co., Inc., 289 Ala. 443, 446-49, 268 So. 2d 725 (1972)(finding that defense counsel's argument "It's a great thing, folks, to be a very wealthy man and to be able to go out here and hire two law firms with four lawyers" was improper and warranted a reversal).

defendant's wealth warranting a new trial); *Estis Trucking Co. v. Hammond, 387 So. 2d 768 [318] (Ala. 1980)(comments made by plaintiffs' attorney that defendant "could have afforded" and that defense counsel was not surprised by [98] the amount of damages requested because "[h]e deals in these figures everyday. He tries lawsuits all over the State of Alabama" were improper). Argument or references to wealth which imply that the jury award damages simply because the defendant has the means to pay damages are not appropriate.[84] Whether the use of a financial number is prejudicial depends upon the context in which it is used. In order to determine whether other financial numbers are highly prejudicial, in line with Alabama's "exclusion of wealth rule," I will need to see them used in context.

The defendants also argue, with little explanation, that Johnson & Johnson cannot be liable because it is a holding company of McNeil and does not design, manufacture, market, or sell Extra Strength Tylenol. For this reason, they claim, no liability can attach to Johnson & Johnson. The plaintiff has offered evidence that Johnson & Johnson executives were involved in decision making about the [100] day-to-day operations regarding Tylenol.[85] From what the defendants have provided, I do not find this argument to be persuasive.[86]

Lastly, the defendants argue that all financial information is unfairly prejudicial, can cause juror confusion, or cause undue delay. Under Alabama law, I agree that there is a risk of unfair prejudice in presenting financial information to the jury that could implicate defendants' net worth. However, I am not convinced that all financially-related evidence should be excluded. As the plaintiff argues, some of this information would be relevant to the plaintiff's theory that the defendants' decisions regarding Extra Strength Tylenol were driven by profits and not consumer [101] safety. There are ways that this sort of information can be presented to the jury (i.e., graphs without numbers, use of percentages, jury instructions on appropriate use of information, etc.), which can reduce the risk of unfair prejudice.

For these reasons, I will GRANT the defendants' motion in part and DENY it in part without prejudice. Evidence of the defendants' net worth will be excluded. Argument about the admissibility of all other financial information will be reserved for trial.

[*319] 18. Defendants' Motion In Limine to Exclude Testimony Regarding Inapplicable "Risk Factors" (MIL 18)

The parties have agreed that any rulings on this motion should be deferred until trial. For this reason, I will DENY MIL 18 without prejudice.

II. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, I make the following rulings:

[84] See Southern Life and Health Ins. Co. v. Smith, 518 So.2d 77, 80-82 (Ala. 1987)(finding that argument "'A corporation, [99] like I said, is a legal entity..., but it's not a human being. It has no conscience. 'The only way you can punish a corporation is through monetary damages'" was improper); Taylor v. Brownell—O'Hear Pontiac Co., 265 Ala. 468, 91 So. 2d 828, 828-29 (Ala. 1957)(finding plaintiff's counsel's comment "We have also dismissed as to Mr. Ritchie. We don't want to penalize Mr. Ritchie. We are after somebody that can pay" was highly prejudicial); American R. E. Co. v. Reid, 216 Ala. 479, 113 So. 507, 510 (Ala. 1927)(plaintiff's argument "We are asking simply for justice which this boy is entitled to. And we are going to insist that he is entitled to some good round sum. It doesn't make any difference to the American Express Company, this defendant. What difference does it make to them what your verdict in this case is?" was improper because they "were an appeal for a large verdict upon the assumed ability of the corporate defendant to pay").

[85] See Pl. Brief Opposing MIL 17 at 4-13 (outlining evidence that high-level J & J executives were involved in decisions regarding the marketing and sales of Tylenol products)(filed under seal) and attached exhibits.

[86] I note, as the plaintiff has, that Johnson & Johnson remains a named defendant in this case. No summary judgment motion or other motion has been filed asserting the theory stated above. If the defendants disagree with my ruling on this point, they may file a motion for reconsideration.

ORDER GRANTING DEFENDANTS' MOTIONS TO DISMISS PLAINTIFF'S THIRD AMENDED COMPLAINT [50, 52]

I. INTRODUCTION

Pending before the Court are two Motions to Dismiss filed by Defendants International Creative Management Partners, LLC ("ICM"), (Dkt. No. 50), and United Talent Agency, Inc. ("UTA"), (Dkt. No. 52), (collectively, "Defendants"). Defendants seek to dismiss all of the claims in Plaintiff Lenhoff Enterprises, Inc.'s ("Plaintiff") Third Amended Complaint ("TAC") pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). (Dkt. Nos. 50, 52.) Plaintiff alleges four causes of action in its TAC: (1) conspiracy to unreasonably restrain trade in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1; (2) unfair competition and unlawful and unfair business practices in violation of California Business and Professions Code sections 16720 et seq. (Cartwright Act) and 17200 et seq. (Unfair Competition Law or "UCL"); (3) intentional interference with contract; and, (4) intentional interference with prospective economic advantage. (Dkt. No. 49.) After considering the papers filed in support of and in opposition to [*2] the instant Motions, the Court deems these matters appropriate for resolution without oral argument of counsel. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 78; C.D. Cal. L.R. 7-15. For the following reasons, the Court GRANTS Defendants' Motions.

II. LENT AGENCY, INC. ET AL. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

A. The Parties

Plaintiff and Defendants are talent agencies doing business in California, providing their agency services to individuals in the entertainment industry. (Pl.'s Third Am. Compl. ("TAC") ¶¶ 1-3, 7-9.) Plaintiff is a small boutique agency with two agents, (TAC ¶ 9), while Defendants are large agencies with significantly more agents and a larger clientele than Plaintiff, (TAC ¶¶ 11-12).

B. Sherman Act § 1 Claim

Plaintiff claims that beginning in the late 1990s and continuing to 2002, Defendants and other large talent agencies "conspired and agreed . . . that it was in their best interests to proceed without Rule 16(g)" of the franchise agreement between the Association of Talent Agents ("ATA")[1] and the Screen Actors' Guild ("SAG"). (TAC ¶ 25.) Rule 16(g) had two pertinent effects: (1) it precluded agencies from accepting investments from "outside/offshore investors, private equity hedge funds, ad agencies, advertisers[,] and independent producers," [*3] (TAC ¶ 28); and, (2) it prevented an agency from possessing "any financial interest in a production or distribution company," (TAC ¶ 24). With the expiration of Rule 16(g) imminent, in February 2002, ATA and SAG agreed to amend the rule's restrictions. (TAC ¶ 32.) The deal allegedly provided that agents would be allowed "to take up to a 20% stake in production and distribution companies," and that advertising firms and independent (non-studio) producers would be permitted to take up to 20% stakes in talent agencies. (Id.) However, upon submission to SAG members for approval, the Rule 16(g) agreement was rejected. (TAC ¶ 33.)

Plaintiff claims that the ATA—specifically, the ATA's Strategic Planning Committee, comprised of UTA's Jim Berkus, ICM's Jeff Berg, and representatives from the other large agencies—did not renegotiate the deal and instead awaited Rule 16(g)'s expiration. (TAC ¶¶ 22, 37.) Plaintiff alleges that Defendants' intent "in bringing about the demise of Rule 16(g) . . . was to destroy competition and to build a cartel of Uber Agencies." (TAC ¶ 27.) Without Rule 16(g)'s restrictions, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants and the two other large agencies, [*4] William Morris Endeavor Entertainment ("WME") and Creative Artists Agency ("CAA"), received significant increases in investments and business. (TAC ¶¶ 3, 38.) As a result, Plaintiff avers that the four "Uber Agencies"—comprised of ICM, UTA, WMA, and CAA (collectively, the "Big 4 Agencies")—now control 94% of the scripted series packaging market. (TAC ¶¶ 3, 45.)

[1] All of the named parties in this action are members of the ATA. (TAC ¶¶ 8, 21.)

Plaintiff goes on to allege that the increase in the Big 4 Agencies' business is caused by their ability to provide exclusive "packaging" arrangements to clients, which allow larger agencies, like Defendants, not to charge the standard 10% commission typically charged by smaller agencies, such as Plaintiff. (TAC ¶ 54.) In lieu of the 10% fee, Plaintiff alleges that the Big 4 Agencies earn "packaging fee[s]" from studios or production companies, which compensate the Big 4 Agencies based on the underlying work's success. (TAC ¶ 53.) The rights are allegedly in perpetuity, and the total payments to the packaging agencies can, in some circumstances, exceed the total payments to the client. (TAC ¶¶ 53, 56.) Plaintiff contends that Defendants lure talent away from smaller firms, like Plaintiff, by eliminating the standard 10% commission [*5] and offering to package the individual in future deals with studios, networks, and producers. (TAC ¶¶ 52, 54.)

Plaintiff further avers that the Big 4 Agencies split packaging fees with each other, but they do not split with any other firms, thereby forming a "cartel" which controls the relevant market. (TAC ¶ 46.) Although Plaintiff claims that the Big 4 Agencies exclude all other talent agencies from participating in co-packaging agreements, (TAC ¶ 67), it states that in 2014/2015, two non-Big 4 Agencies co-packaged with Big 4 Agencies and that only 85 of 353 packaged scripted series were co-packaged together by and among Big 4 Agencies, (TAC ¶ 45, Exs. A, B). Plaintiff also contends that Defendants, along with the other Big 4 Agencies, conspired to coerce purchasers of talent services—studios, networks, and producers—to refuse deals with non-Big 4 Agencies and the individuals they represent. (TAC ¶ 68.) According to Plaintiff, the threatened consequence of dealing with non-Big 4 Agencies was loss of future packaging of the Big 4 Agencies' talent. (TAC ¶ 75.)

C. Client-Poaching Allegation

Plaintiff also alleges that around September or October 2014, one of Plaintiff's clients, Client [*6] #1, attended Defendant UTA's VIP screening of Client #1's show, during which Defendant "UTA began the process of encouraging and inducing Client #1 to break her contract with Plaintiff." (TAC ¶ 94.) On November 4, 2014, Client #1 allegedly informed Plaintiff that she was terminating Plaintiff's representation. (TAC ¶ 93.) Plaintiff similarly alleges that Defendant ICM invited another of Plaintiff's clients, Client #2, to a meeting to discuss representation/packaging, which Plaintiff alleges induced Client #2 to breach his contract with Plaintiff. (TAC ¶ 97.)

Plaintiff further contends that the agreements with Clients #1 and #2 were verbal contracts subject to "Rider D" of the agreement between the ATA and the Directors Guild of America ("DGA"). (TAC ¶¶ 91-92, 95.) Rider D provides as follows:

> If during any period of ninety (90) consecutive days immediately preceding the giving of notice of termination herein described, the Director (1) fails to be employed or (2) fails to receive a bona fide offer then either Director or Agent may terminate the employment of Agent hereunder by giving written notice of termination to the other party, subject to the following terms and provisions:
> C. Actual [*7] employment of or contracts or bona fide offers for the employment of the Director in any field whatever in which the Director is represented by the Agent shall be deemed to be employment. If the Director has been employed or has had contracts or bona fide offers for employment in any field in which Director is represented by Agent the Director may not terminate so long as Director is entitled to an amount equal to his last compensation at a pro rata equivalent to 3 weeks of services.

(TAC, Ex. C.)

D. Procedural Background

On February 13, 2015, Plaintiff filed its Original Complaint, (Dkt. No. 3), but never served it on Defendants. Instead, Plaintiff filed its First Amended Complaint ("FAC") on June 15, 2015, (Dkt. No. 8), and served it on UTA and ICM on June 16 and June 17, respectively, (Dkt. Nos. 12, 13). Defendants subsequently filed Motions to Dismiss on August 10, 2015, seeking to dismiss all claims in Plaintiff's FAC pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). (Dkt. Nos. 16, 18, 21.) On September 18, 2015, the Court granted, in part, and denied, in part, Defendants' Motions. (Dkt. No. 28.) Namely, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act without prejudice. (Id. at 7.) The Court did not address [*8] the merits of the Sherman Act claim, instead concluding that Plaintiff failed to allege any facts indicating that a conspiracy existed to create a monopoly in a single entity, as required under § 2. (Id. at 6-7.) The Court also dismissed Plaintiff's intentional interference with contract and intentional interference with prospective economic damage claims without prejudice. (Id. at 9-10.) Finally, the Court dismissed Plaintiff's claims for declaratory relief and injunctive relief with prejudice, (id. at 11-12), but denied Defendants' Motions as to Plaintiff's UCL claim, (id. at 8).

On October 12, 2015, Plaintiff filed its Second Amended Complaint ("SAC"), alleging: (1) a § 1 Sherman Act claim; (2) an unfair competition and unlawful and unfair business practices claim; (3) an intentional interference with contract claim; and, (4) an intentional interference with prospective economic advantage claim. (Dkt. No. 31.) Defendants subsequently filed their Motions to Dismiss on November 9, 2015. (Dkt. Nos. 34, 36.) The Court granted both Motions in their entirety without prejudice. (Dkt. No. 43.)

Plaintiff filed its TAC on January 22, 2016, alleging the same causes of action as its SAC. (Dkt. No. 49.) On February 12, 2016, Defendants moved [*9] to dismiss the TAC. (Dkt. Nos. 50 (hereinafter, "ICM Mot."), 52 (hereinafter "UTA Mot.").) Plaintiff timely filed its Oppositions, (Dkt. Nos. 56 (hereinafter, "Pl.'s ICM Opp'n"), 57 (hereinafter, "Pl.'s UTA Opp'n")), and Defendants timely replied, (Dkt. Nos. 61, 62).

III. REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL NOTICE

In support of its Motion, Defendant ICM filed a Request for Judicial Notice. (See Dkt. No. 51 (hereinafter, "RJN").) A court may properly take judicial notice of (1) material which is included as part of the complaint or relied upon by the complaint, and (2) matters in the public record. See Marder v. Lopez, 450 F.3d 445, 448 (9th Cir. 2006); Lee v. City of Los Angeles, 250 F.3d 668, 688-89 (9th Cir. 2001). A court may also take judicial notice pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 201(b). Under the rule, a judicially noticed fact must be one that is "not subject to reasonable dispute because it: (1) is generally known within the trial court's territorial jurisdiction; or (2) can be accurately and readily determined from sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned." Fed. R. Evid. 201(b). A court "must take judicial notice if a party requests it and the court is supplied with the necessary information." See Fed. R. Evid. 201(c)(2); In re Icenhower, 755 F.3d 1130, 1142 (9th Cir. 2014).

Defendant ICM requests that the Court take judicial notice of the following: (1) the ATA/DGA Agreement incorporating Rider D, which is [*10] attached to Plaintiff's TAC, (see TAC, Ex. C); (2) a March 2014 email between Sony executives that Plaintiff refers to in its TAC, (see TAC ¶ 18); and, (3) a Deadline article referenced in the Sony email. (See RJN, Exs. A—C.) Here, Plaintiff relied upon the ATA/DGA Agreement and the Sony email in its TAC, and neither party has objected to their authenticity. (See TAC ¶ 18, Ex. C); Marder, 450 F.3d at 448. Additionally, the Deadline article "was in the public realm at the time" the Sony executive email allegedly sent the email. Von Saher v. Norton Simon Museum of Art at Pasadena, 592 F.3d 954, 960 (9th Cir. 2009) ("Courts may take judicial notice of publications introduced to 'indicate what was in the public realm at the time . . . .'" (quoting Premier Growth Fund v. Alliance Capital Mgmt., 435 F.3d 396, 401 n.15 (3d Cir. 2006))). The Court accordingly GRANTS Defendant ICM's request for judicial notice.[2] However, as to the Deadline article, the Court only takes judicial notice "to 'indicate what was in the public realm at the time, not whether the contents of those articles were in fact true.'" Id. (quoting Premier Growth Fund, 435 F.3d at 401 n.15).

[2] Defendant ICM objects to the declarations of Ted P. Tatos and Charles Lenhoff in support of Plaintiff's Opposition. (See Dkt. No. 63.) The declarations purportedly establish "that the percentage of co-packaged shows between Uber Agencies is enormously out of proportion [*11] with the statistical likelihood of such co-packaging based on the number of agencies in the market." (Pl.'s ICM Opp'n at 24; Pl.'s UTA Opp'n at 23-24.) In ruling on a motion to dismiss, a court may not look beyond the pleadings except in limited circumstances, none of which apply here. See United States v. Corinthian Colls., 655 F.3d 984, 998-99 (9th Cir. 2011) (citations omitted). Accordingly, the Court considers these declarations in determining only whether to grant leave to amend. See *Acinelli v. Torres, No. ED CV 13-1371-AB (PLA), 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92759, 2015 WL 4380772, at 2 n.3 (C.D. Cal. July 16, 2015) (citing Orion Tire Corp. v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 268 F.3d 1133, 1137-38 (9th Cir. 2001)).

IV. LEGAL STANDARD

Under Rule 8(a), a complaint must contain a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the [plaintiff] is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a). If a complaint fails to do this, the defendant may move to dismiss it under Rule 12(b)(6). Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). "To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)). A claim is plausible on its face "when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. "Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Thus, there must be "more than a sheer [*12] possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. "Where a complaint pleads facts that are 'merely consistent with' a defendant's liability, it 'stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility'" that the plaintiff is entitled to relief. Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557).

Where a district court grants a motion to dismiss, it should provide leave to amend unless it is clear that the complaint could not be saved by any amendment. Manzarek v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 519 F.3d 1025, 1031 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Dismissal without leave to amend is improper unless it is clear, upon de novo review, that the complaint could not be saved by any amendment."). Leave to amend, however, "is properly denied . . . if amendment would be futile." Carrico v. City & County of San Francisco, 656 F.3d 1002, 1008 (9th Cir. 2011).

V. DISCUSSION

A. Sherman Act Claim

Plaintiff argues that it sufficiently pleads the existence of a Sherman Act § 1 violation. (See Pl.'s ICM Opp'n at 8-19; Pl.'s UTA Opp'n at 8-19.) Plaintiff's Sherman Act allegations can best be summarized as follows: First, Defendants agreed amongst themselves that it was in their best interest to allow Rule 16(g) to expire, and to that end, conspired to cause that result by refusing to renegotiate with SAG regarding the Rule 16(g) amendments. (TAC ¶¶ 25, 36-37.) Next, given the lack of financial restrictions resulting from [*13] Rule 16(g)'s expiration, Defendants and the other Big 4 Agencies obtained significant capital investments from outside sources. (TAC ¶ 38.) The Big 4 Agencies then lured talent away from other agencies by eliminating the 10% commission in lieu of a packaging fee. (TAC ¶¶ 52-54, 56.) Given the influx of talent, the Big 4 Agencies were able to control the relevant market by conspiring to exclusively co-package with each other, thereby harming competition. (TAC ¶¶ 43, 75-76, 78.) Plaintiff also alleges that Defendants agreed to coerce studios, networks, and producers to refuse deals with non-Big 4 Agencies, threatening to withhold talent as a consequence of noncompliance. (TAC ¶ 63.) The resulting harm to competition, according to Plaintiff, is a lack of diversity among talent and a reduction of agencies in the scripted series market, thereby allowing the Big 4 Agencies to set the prices for talent. (TAC ¶¶ 17, 49, 78-79.) Moreover, Plaintiff alleges that it was harmed by the anti-competitive aspect of Defendants' practices—namely, the package-fee incentive—when Defendants "poached" two of Plaintiff's clients. (TAC ¶ 81.)

1. Per Se Analysis—Price-Fixing Allegation

As discussed in the Court's prior [*14] Order, claims under § 1 of the Sherman Act are evaluated under either a per se analysis or the rule of reason. In re WellPoint, Inc. Out-of-Network UCR Rates Litig., 865 F. Supp. 2d 1002, 1024-25 (C.D. Cal. 2011) (citing Thurman Indus., Inc. v. Pay 'N Pak Stores, Inc., 875 F.2d 1369, 1373 (9th Cir. 1989)). To state a claim for a per se violation of the Sherman Act, Plaintiff must sufficiently plead that Defendants (1) entered into an agreement (2) to fix prices or divide the market. Id. Here, as in its SAC, Plaintiff alleges that the Big 4 Agencies are engaged in horizontal price-fixing. (Compare TAC ¶¶ 43, 78, with SAC ¶¶ 73, 84, 116.)

However, Plaintiff adds no factual details to support this conclusion. Accordingly, the Court finds that Plaintiff again fails to sufficiently plead a per se Sherman Act violation.

2. Rule of Reason Analysis—Unreasonable Restraint of Trade Allegations

To sufficiently state a § 1 claim under the rule of reason, Plaintiff must sufficiently plead each of the following elements: "(1) a contract, combination or conspiracy among two or more persons or distinct business entities; (2) by which the persons or entities intended to harm or restrain trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations; (3) which actually injures competition." Brantley v. NBC Universal, Inc., 675 F.3d 1192, 1197 (9th Cir. 2012) (internal quotation marks omitted). In addition to these elements, Plaintiff must also plead "(4) [*15] that [it was] harmed by [Defendants'] anti-competitive contract, combination, or conspiracy, and that this harm flowed from an anti-competitive aspect of the practice under scrutiny." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted). "In its design and function the rule [of reason] distinguishes between restraints with anticompetitive effect that are harmful to the consumer and restraints stimulating competition that are in the consumer's best interest." Id. (quoting Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 886, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007)).

a. Conspiracy

As discussed above, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants engaged in a conspiracy to (1) bring about the expiration of Rule 16(g), (2) exclude non-Big 4 Agencies from co-packaging contracts and not split packaging fees with anyone other than the Big 4 Agencies, and (3) coerce studios, networks, and producers to boycott non-Big 4 Agencies through threats of withholding the Big 4's talent from those who do not comply. Defendants compare Plaintiff's TAC to its SAC and argue that Plaintiff has again failed to plead these facts with the requisite specificity. (ICM Mot. at 6-16; UTA Mot. at 5-12.) Once again, the Court agrees with Defendants. (See Dkt. No. 43 at 8-11.)

To sufficiently "allege an agreement or conspiracy between antitrust co-conspirators, [*16] the complaint must allege facts such as a 'specific time, place, or person involved in the conspiracies' to give a defendant seeking to respond to allegations of a conspiracy an idea of where to begin." Kendall v. Visa USA, Inc., 518 F.3d 1042, 1047 (9th Cir. 2008) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 565 n.10). "[T]erms like 'conspiracy,' or even 'agreement,' are border-line: they might well be sufficient in conjunction with a more specific allegation—for example, identifying a written agreement or even a basis for inferring a tacit agreement," but such terms, alone, are insufficient to state claim of conspiracy. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557 (quoting DM Research, Inc. v. Coll. of Am. Pathologists, 170 F.3d 53, 56 (1st Cir. 1999)).

Like its SAC, Plaintiff's TAC relies upon circumstantial evidence, not direct evidence, to plead the existence of a conspiracy. (TAC ¶ 47; see also Dkt. No. 43 at 9 n.3.) When relying on circumstantial evidence to allege a conspiracy, the plaintiff may point to the defendants' parallel conduct to create the inference that the parties have entered into an agreement. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 553 ("[A] showing of parallel business behavior is admissible circumstantial evidence from which the fact finder may infer agreement . . . ."). However, parallel conduct alone does not constitute a Sherman Act violation. Id. "'[T]he crucial question' is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct 'stem[s] from independent [*17] decision or from an agreement, tacit or express.'" Id. (quoting Theatre Enters., Inc. v. Paramount Film Distrib. Corp., 346 U.S. 537, 540, 74 S. Ct. 257, 98 L. Ed. 273 (1954)).

In the Ninth Circuit, courts distinguish "permissible parallel conduct from impermissible conspiracy by identifying certain 'plus factors,'" which are "economic actions and outcomes that are largely inconsistent with unilateral conduct but largely consistent with explicitly coordinated action." In re Musical Instruments, 798 F.3d 1186, 1194 (9th Cir. 2015) (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557 n.4). "If pleaded, they can place parallel conduct in a context that raises a suggestion of preceding agreement," thereby distinguishing it from lawful independent action. Id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

As in the previous Order, the Court concludes that Plaintiff fails to allege sufficient facts regarding the purported conspiracies between Defendants and the other Big 4 Agencies. (See Dkt. No. 43 at 10.) Like the SAC, the only alleged conspiracy of which Plaintiff provides names of participating individuals is the alleged agreement "to eliminate Rule 16(g)." (TAC ¶¶ 22-23.) Plaintiff alleges that "the ATA's Strategic Planning Committee consisting of UTA's Jim Berkus, ICM's Jeff Berg, CAA's Bryan Lourd, William Morris' Walt Zifkin, Endeavor's Rick Rosen, and Broder/Kurland/Webb/ Uffner's Bob Broder" was created "with the specific [*18] goal and intent of eliminating the [Rule 16(g)] prohibitions on outside investments and funding." (TAC ¶ 75.) In sum, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants' agents on the ATA's Strategic Planning Committee "agreed amongst themselves that it was in their best interests to proceed without Rule 16(g)." (TAC ¶ 25.)

Defendants argue that their participation in the ATA meetings cannot be construed as an illegal conspiracy. (UTA Mot. at 8.) Further, Defendants contend that even assuming the ATA members thought it in their best interest to allow Rule 16(g) to expire, that is not "'inconsistent with unilateral conduct' or 'largely consistent with explicitly coordinated action.'" (ICM Mot. at 12 (quoting In re Musical Instruments, 798 F.3d at 1194).) Rather, according to Defendants, this allegation "suggest[s] rational, legal business behavior." (Id. (quoting Kendall, 518 F.3d at 1049).) Defendants also point to the Court's prior Order, in which the Court noted that it was SAG, not the ATA, which decided to reject the new Rule 16(g) terms, thereby allowing Rule 16(g) to expire. (UTA Mot. at 7 (citing Dkt. No. 43 at 11); ICM Mot. at 9 (citing Dkt. No. 43 at 11); see also TAC ¶¶ 32-34.)

First, "mere participation in trade-organization meetings where information is exchanged and strategies are advocated does not suggest an illegal [*19] agreement." In re Musical Instruments, 798 F.3d at 1196. Thus, merely stating—as the SAC did, (SAC ¶ 49)—that Defendants' agents served on the Strategic Planning Committee and "had ample opportunity" to plan to eliminate Rule 16(g) fails to sufficiently plead a conspiracy claim. (TAC ¶ 23; see Dkt. No. 43 at 11.) Adding dates of committee meetings and communications likewise does not cure this defect. (See TAC ¶ 23.) Further, as the Court concluded in its previous Order, the decision to permit Rule 16(g) to expire is as much evidence of a conspiracy as it is evidence that each individual agency acted for its own independent benefit. (Dkt. No. 43 at 11.) In sum, that the expiration of Rule 16(g) would ultimately benefit Big 4 Agencies does not demonstrate that Defendants conspired to bring about its demise, especially in light of the fact that SAG, not the ATA, rejected a new version of Rule 16(g).

As for the alleged conspiracy to exclusively co-package with Big 4 Agencies, Plaintiff's TAC relies on two sets of data[3] which purportedly show that "only 2 of 53 agencies" were able to co-package with Big 4 Agencies and that 85 of 353 packaged series were co-packaged amongst Big 4 Agencies. (TAC ¶ 45, Exs. A, B (emphasis omitted).) An "amended complaint may only allege 'other [*20] facts consistent with the challenged pleading.'" Reddy v. Litton Indus., Inc., 912 F.2d 291, 297 (9th Cir. 1990) (quoting Schreiber Distrib. Co. v. Serv-Well Furniture Co., Inc., 806 F.2d 1393, 1401 (9th Cir. 1986)). Here, in its SAC, Plaintiff alleged that in 2014/2015, sixteen co-packages included non-Big 4 Agencies, while Big 4 Agencies co-packaged exclusively with one another on eighty-nine occasions. (SAC ¶ 73.) However, Plaintiff's TAC includes a chart representing that Big 4 Agencies co-packaged exclusively amongst themselves eighty-five times and with smaller agencies only twelve times in 2014/2015. (TAC ¶ 45, Exs. A, B.)

Plaintiff attempts to account for these discrepancies by pointing to "[r]ecent information published by the FX Network and other sources." (TAC ¶ 45 n.2.) However, the Court need not accept the newly alleged, contradictory data as true. *Azadpour v. Sun Microsystems, Inc., No.C06-03272 MJJ, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 55502, 2007 WL 2141079, at 2 n.2 (N.D. Cal. July 23, 2007) ("Where allegations in an amended complaint [*21] contradict those in a prior complaint, a district court need not accept the new alleged facts as true, and may, in fact, strike the challenged allegations as 'false and sham.'"). Even assuming the Court considered the data, it fails to establish that Defendants conspired to exclude non-Big 4 Agencies from co-packaging. Indeed, the data demonstrates that Big 4 Agencies co-packaged with smaller agencies on at least twelve occasions. (See TAC, Ex. A.) Accordingly, Plaintiff's own allegations contradict its claim that Defendants' co-packaging agreements are exclusive to the Big 4 Agencies.

[3] Defendant UTA claims to have contacted Plaintiff regarding the "facial inaccuracies" of this data, (UTA Mot. at 3 n.1), and Plaintiff concedes the existence of "two minor errors," (Pl.'s UTA Opp'n at 13 n.5). Even assuming the exhibits were entirely accurate, the data still conflicts with Plaintiff's allegation that Defendants conspired to entirely exclude non-Big 4 Agencies from co-packaging with them.

Further, like its SAC, Plaintiff's TAC fails to provide the names of any individuals who allegedly conspired to coerce studios, networks, and producers to boycott smaller agencies. (See Dkt. No. 43 at 11.) Nor does the TAC include a reference to a specific time or place such agreements took place. Plaintiff also fails to plead a specific instance of a threat against a studio, network, or producer. Thus, Plaintiff fails to sufficiently plead a conspiracy based on the alleged coercion.

For the foregoing reasons, the Court concludes that Plaintiff has again failed to sufficiently plead a conspiracy. For this [*22] reason alone, the Court could grant Defendants' Motions as to Plaintiff's § 1 Sherman Act claim. However, as discussed below, Plaintiff also fails to satisfy the injury to competition element.

b. Restraint of Trade—Injury to Competition

"In order to plead injury to competition, the third element of a Section 1 claim, sufficiently to withstand a motion to dismiss, 'a section one claimant may not merely recite the bare legal conclusion that competition has been restrained unreasonably.'" Brantley, 675 F.3d at 1198 (quoting Les Shockley Racing, Inc. v. Nat'l Hot Rod Ass'n, 884 F.2d 504, 507-08 (9th Cir. 1989)). "Rather, a claimant must, at a minimum, sketch the outline of [the injury to competition] with allegations of supporting factual detail . . . [that] raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of an injury to competition." Id. (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). The first element of a § 1 Sherman Act claim is linked with the third element, in that to establish an injury to competition, "the claimant must identify a contract, combination or conspiracy that has an anticompetitive effect." Id. For example, a "horizontal agreement"—an agreement between competitors in the same market—"to set prices may injure competition because the result of such an agreement, if effective, [*23] is the elimination of one form of competition, namely price." Id. (internal quotation marks omitted). "Or a group of competitors may act in concert to harm another competitor or exclude that competitor from the market and thus 'protect . . . dealers from real or apparent price competition' from the targeted competitor." Id. (quoting United States v. Gen. Motors Corp., 384 U.S. 127, 146-47, 86 S. Ct. 1321, 16 L. Ed. 2d 415 (1966)).

Here, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants have entered into horizontal agreements that have effectively eliminated other agencies from the market, thereby facilitating horizontal price-fixing and restraining trade. (TAC ¶¶ 43, 78.) However, as was the case in Plaintiff's SAC, Plaintiff fails to sufficiently plead the predicate fact—an agreement or conspiracy. See discussion supra Section V.A.2.a. Thus, Plaintiff again fails to state a claim of injury to competition based on the alleged horizontal agreements.

Plaintiff also claims the existence of vertical agreements between Defendants and the studios, networks, and producers. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants coerced the studios, networks, and producers to institute a boycott of non-Big 4 Agencies through threats of withholding the Big 4 Agencies' coveted talent from future package deals from [*24] noncompliant studios, networks, and producers. (TAC ¶¶ 63-64.) However, this allegation fails because Plaintiff fails to plead enough facts to "raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal" the existence of such agreements. Brantley, 675 F. 3d at 1198. For example, Plaintiff provides no names, dates, or other facts to support this allegation.[4] Rather, it relies on a conclusory allegation that Defendants "coerce[d]" the studios, networks, and producers to boycott non-Big 4 Agencies. (TAC ¶ 62.) Such an allegation lacks the requisite specificity to state a claim for an agreement under Twombly and Iqbal.

Further, it is unclear based on the alleged facts [*25] whether Defendant unlawfully coerced or lawfully pressured the studios, networks, and producers to refrain from dealing with non-Big 4 Agencies. See Filco v. Amana Refrigeration, Inc., 709 F.2d 1257, 1263 (9th Cir. 1983) (stating that "[d]emands or threats, however, must be distinguished from mere exposition, persuasion, argument, or pressure," and that the issue in that case was whether the statements at issue were "enough to raise an inference of coercion and thus create an inference of" illegality) (internal quotation marks omitted). Indeed, Plaintiff concedes that the Big 4 Agencies represent "top acting, writing, producing[,] and directing talent," and therefore are better suited to develop new series than smaller agencies. (TAC ¶ 14.) Accepting this as true, it is reasonable to infer that studios, networks, and producers would be drawn to work with Big 4 Agencies; no threats would be necessary.

[4] In its TAC, Plaintiff adds a quote from an alleged 2014 email sent by the chairman of Sony Pictures. (See TAC ¶ 18 ("They [Uber Agencies] are demanding and getting fees now on these from the financiers (they call it a 'packaging fee') and are keeping as many emerging high[-]end filmmaker projects off the market until they have full control.") (emphasis omitted); RJN, Ex. B.) The email, however, is irrelevant to this matter, as it concerns a motion picture investment rather than a scripted television series package. (See ICM Mot. at 15, 15 n.6; RJN, Exs. B, C.)

Finally, Plaintiff references Defendants' alleged "tying agreements" in an effort to plead an injury to competition. (See TAC ¶¶ 42, 78.) "Tying is defined as an arrangement where a supplier agrees to sell a buyer a product (the tying product), but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product." Brantley, 675 F.3d at 1199 (internal quotation marks and citation [*26] omitted). "The potential injury to competition threatened by this practice is that the tying arrangement will either harm existing competitors or create barriers to entry of new competitors in the market for the tied product . . . or will force buyers into giving up the purchase of substitutes for the tied product." Id. (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

In its TAC, Plaintiff alleges three tying agreements whereby Defendants allegedly "coerc[ed]" or "cajol[ed]" a studio, network, or producer to accept tied talent along with the coveted talent. (See TAC ¶ 42 (discussing "UTA coercing AMC Network to renew their extremely low rated series 'Halt And Catch Fire' . . . in order to get a different and higher rated series, 'Better Call Saul,' or ICM cajoling ABC to renew the ratings[-]challenged 'Private Practice' series in order to keep their package of 'Grey's Anatomy' going").) Even assuming Defendants utilized tying agreements, Plaintiff fails to adequately allege how these assumed agreements "harm existing competitors or create barriers to entry of new competitors in the market for the tied product." Brantley, 675 F.3d at 1199. Plaintiff also fails to allege that the buyers were forced "into giving up the purchase [*27] of substitutes for the tied product." Id. As such, Plaintiff fails to establish restraint of trade through Defendants' alleged tying agreements.

For the foregoing reasons, Plaintiff again fails to sufficiently plead the conspiracy and harm-to-competition elements of its § 1 Sherman Act claim.[5] Accordingly, Defendants' Motions are GRANTED as to that cause of action. Given that this is Plaintiff Third Amended Complaint, and because Plaintiff has failed to cure deficiencies as to its Sherman Act § 1 claim in each of its previous pleadings, Plaintiff's Sherman Act claim is DISMISSED with prejudice. See Zucco Partners, LLC v. Digimarc Corp., 552 F.3d 981, 1007 (9th Cir. 2009) ("As here, where the plaintiff has previously been granted leave to amend and has subsequently failed to add the requisite particularity to its claims, the district court's discretion to deny leave to amend is particularly broad.") (internal quotation marks omitted).

B. Unfair Business Practices Claim

The UCL defines "unfair competition" as "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Plaintiff may therefore base its claim upon [*28] "acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent." Podolsky v. First Healthcare Corp., 50 Cal. App. 4th 632, 647, 58 Cal. Rptr. 2d 89 (Cal. Ct. App. 1996). Here, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants violated the "unlawful" and "unfair" prongs of the UCL. (See Pl.'s ICM Opp'n at 20; Pl.'s UTA Opp'n at 20.)

In Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (Cal. 1999), the California Supreme Court defined the meaning of an "unfair" act under the UCL as it applies in the antitrust context:

> When a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's "unfair" act or practice invokes section 17200, the word "unfair" in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an > antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.

[5] Given that Plaintiff again fails to satisfy these two elements, the Court need not discuss the remaining two elements of Plaintiff's § 1 Sherman Act claim.

Id. at 187. However, where, as here, (see TAC ¶¶ 83, 85, 87-88), "the same conduct is alleged to be both an antitrust violation and an 'unfair' business act or practice for the same reason—because it unreasonably restrains competition and harms consumers—the determination that the conduct is not an unreasonable restraint of trade necessarily implies that the conduct is not 'unfair.'"[6] City of San Jose v. Office of the Comm'r of Baseball, 776 F.3d 686, 691-92 (9th Cir. 2015) (citing Chavez v. Whirlpool Corp., 93 Cal. App. 4th 363, 375, 113 Cal. Rptr. 2d 175 (Cal. Ct. App. 2001)).

Like in its previous Order, (see Dkt. No. 43 at 15-16), the Court finds that because Plaintiff has not sufficiently pleaded an unreasonable restraint of trade under § 1 of the Sherman Act, Plaintiff also necessarily fails to plead unfair or unlawful conduct under the UCL, see Office of the Comm'r of Baseball, 776 F.3d at 691-92; Chavez, 93 Cal. App. 4th at 375. Defendants' Motions are therefore GRANTED as to Plaintiff's UCL claim, and that claim is DISMISSED with prejudice for the same reasons as Plaintiff's § 1 Sherman Act claim. See Zucco, 552 F.3d at 1007.

C. Intentional Interference with Contract

Plaintiff alleges that Defendants interfered with its contractual relationships with Clients #1 and #2[7] by inviting the clients to a private VIP screening or meeting, during which Defendants began persuading the clients to breach their contracts with Plaintiff. (TAC ¶¶ 94, 97.) Defendants argue that Plaintiff fails to plead intentional interference with contract given its failure to allege that the contracts were not terminable at will. (ICM Mot. at 22-25; UTA Mot. at 18-24.) Thus, according to Defendants, the competitor's privilege applies, [*30] and Plaintiff fails to aver an independently wrongful act to defeat the privilege.[8] (Id.)

To state a claim for intentional interference with contract, Plaintiff must sufficiently plead the following: "(1) a valid contract between plaintiff and a third party; (2) defendant's knowledge of this contract; (3) defendant's intentional acts designed to induce a breach or disruption of the contractual relationship; (4) actual breach or disruption of the contractual relationship; and (5) resulting damage." Pac. Gas & Elec. Co. v. Bear Stearns & Co., 50 Cal. 3d 1118, 1126, 270 Cal. Rptr. 1, 791 P.2d 587 (Cal. 1990). "'A plaintiff need not allege an actual or inevitable breach of contract in order to state a claim for disruption of contractual relations'; rather, unlike the tort of inducing breach of contract, intentional interference with contractual [*31] relations requires only proof of interference." RealPage, Inc. v. Yardi Sys., Inc., 852 F. Supp. 2d 1215, 1230 (C.D. Cal. 2012) (quoting Pac. Gas & Electric Co., 50 Cal. 3d at 1129) (emphasis in original). However, where contracts are terminable at will, the competitor's privilege applies. See, e.g., Pac. Exp., Inc. v. United Airlines, Inc., 959 F.2d 814, 819 (9th Cir. 1992). If the privilege applies, "a plaintiff must also plead and prove that the defendant engaged in an independently wrongful act," which induced the party to leave the plaintiff. Reeves v. Hanlon, 33 Cal. 4th 1140, 1152, 17 Cal. Rptr. 3d 289, 95 P.3d 513 (Cal. 2004). "[A]n act is independently wrongful if it is unlawful, that is, if it is proscribed by some constitutional, statutory, regulatory, common law, or other determinable legal standard." Id.

Here, as in the SAC, Plaintiff alleges that it had "valid and exclusive contracts" with Clients #1 and #2. (TAC ¶ 90.) However, Plaintiff alleges that its agreements with Clients #1 and #2 were "verbal contracts," (TAC ¶¶ 91, 95), and

[6] Because "[t]he analysis under California's antitrust law mirror the [*29] analysis under federal law," County of Tuolumne v. Sonora Cmty. Hosp., 236 F.3d 1148, 1160 (9th Cir. 2001) (citing Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16700 et seq.), Plaintiff's new allegation that Defendants violated the Cartwright Act does not alter the Court's conclusion, (see TAC ¶ 83).

[7] Plaintiff explains that Clients #1 and #2 are directors and members of the DGA. (TAC ¶¶ 91, 96.)

[8] As discussed below, the Court finds that Plaintiff fails to (1) sufficiently allege that Client #1's contract was not at will and (2) defeat the competitor's privilege. Thus, the Court need not address Defendant UTA's additional argument that Plaintiff fails to adequately allege knowledge or causation with respect to the Client #1 agreement. (See UTA Mot. at 24-25.)

Plaintiff fails to allege whether those contracts were for a specified term or terminable at will.[9] Thus, the competitor's privilege applies, which Plaintiff again cannot overcome because it fails to sufficiently allege a Sherman Act violation.

Plaintiff's principal argument is that Rider D in the ATA/DGA Agreement establishes that the contract was not terminable at will, and thus that the competitor's privilege does not apply. However, the Court need not determine whether this is true, as Plaintiff fails to demonstrate that the Rider D Agreement's termination restriction was triggered to preclude Clients #1 and #2 from terminating their agreements with Plaintiff.

The crux of the Rider D Agreement is that a director or agent may not terminate an agreement so long as (1) the director has been employed or received a bona fide offer of employment in a field in which the [*33] director is represented by the agent within ninety (90) days preceding the director's notice of termination, and (2) the director is entitled to an amount equal to his last compensation at a pro rata equivalent to three weeks of services. (See TAC ¶ 92, Ex. C at 2.) According to Plaintiff, Rider D applied to its relationships with Clients #1 and #2, thereby precluding them from leaving Plaintiff for another agency. (TAC ¶ 92.) However, as discussed in the Court's prior Order, it is clear based upon the agreement's language that there are two conditions that must be met before a director is restricted from terminating the relationship with his or her agent. The first is that within ninety (90) days preceding the notice of termination, the director must have obtained employment in his field, or at least received a bona fide offer of employment. (TAC ¶ 92.) The second is that the director must be "entitled to an amount equal to his last compensation at a pro rata equivalent of 3 weeks of services." (Id.)

Here, as in the SAC, Plaintiff alleges facts that, taken as true, establish the first condition—that Clients #1 and #2 obtained employment within the ninety days preceding their notices [*34] of termination. (See TAC ¶¶ 93, 95.) However, Plaintiff fails to allege the second condition, as it states no facts alleging whether the payment for Client #1's and Client #2's employment met Rider D's terms. Instead, Plaintiff states, in a conclusory fashion, that Clients #1 and #2 "received an amount equal to [their] last compensation at a pro rata rate equivalent to three (3) weeks of services." (TAC ¶¶ 93, 95.) Plaintiff does not allege the amount each client was compensated for their prior work, nor does it allege the amount each client received for their subsequent work. Merely reciting Rider D's terms is insufficient to state a claim under Twombly. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 ("[A] plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.") (quoting Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 286, 106 S. Ct. 2932, 92 L. Ed. 2d 209 (1986)). Thus, even assuming that the ATA/DGA Agreement could elevate the contracts to term agreements, Plaintiff fails to sufficiently plead that Rider D's termination restriction would apply to Client #1's and Client #2's notices of termination.

Because Plaintiff again fails to plead that the agreements with Clients #1 and #2 were not at will, [*35] the competitor's privilege applies. As discussed above, Plaintiff again fails to sufficiently plead a Sherman Act violation, thus there is no "independently wrongful act" to defeat the competitor's privilege. Reeves, 33 Cal. 4th at 1152. Accordingly, Defendants' Motions are GRANTED. As to Plaintiff's claim against Defendant UTA for interference with Plaintiff's relationship with Client #1, that claim is DISMISSED with prejudice, as Plaintiff has failed multiple times to allege that agreement was not at-will, see Zucco, 552 F.3d at 1007, and amendment of that claim would be futile, Carrico, 656 F.3d at 1008. However, Plaintiff's intentional interference with contract claim against Defendant ICM relating to Client #2 is DISMISSED with leave to amend, as Plaintiff may avoid the competitor's privilege if it sufficiently pleads, in good faith, that at the time the alleged interference took place, Client #2 was under an agreement for a specified term.

[9] Although Plaintiff alleges that its agreement with Client #2 "commenced on . . . February 10, 2009" and had an "initial term of years, with a 2-year renewal term, followed by 1-year [*32] terms," (see TAC ¶ 95), Plaintiff fails to allege whether the initial two-year agreement was ever renewed, thereby continuing the term contract. Further, the alleged acts of interference appear to have occurred shortly before Client #2 gave notice of termination of June 26, 2014, (see TAC ¶ 97), after the initial two-year term had expired. Thus, without any allegation as to whether the initial two-year agreement was renewed, Plaintiff fails to sufficiently plead that, at the time of the alleged interference, the agreement with Client #2 was for a specified term.

D. Intentional Interference with Prospective Economic Advantage

To plead a claim for intentional interference with prospective business advantage, Plaintiff must sufficiently allege the following:

> (1) [A]n economic relationship between the plaintiff and some third party, with the probability of future economic benefit to [*36] the plaintiff; (2) the defendant's knowledge of the relationship; (3) intentional acts on the part of the defendant designed to disrupt the relationship; (4) actual disruption of the relationship; and (5) economic harm to the plaintiff proximately caused by the acts of the defendant.

Korea Supply Co. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 29 Cal. 4th 1134, 1153, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 29, 63 P.3d 937 (Cal. 2003). Further, a plaintiff must plead and prove "that the defendant's interference was wrongful by some measure beyond the fact of the interference itself." Della Penna v. Toyota Motor Sales, USA, Inc., 11 Cal. 4th 376, 392-93, 45 Cal. Rptr. 2d 436, 902 P.2d 740 (Cal. 1995) (internal quotation marks omitted).

As in its SAC, Plaintiff relies on Defendants' acts allegedly violating the Sherman Act as the independent and wrongful acts to support this claim. (Compare TAC ¶ 104, with SAC ¶ 138.) However, as discussed above, Plaintiff fails to sufficiently plead a violation of the Sherman Act. See supra Section V.A. Thus, Plaintiff again fails to sufficiently allege that Defendants' conduct was "wrongful by some measure beyond the fact of the interference itself," as required under Della Penna. See Della Penna, 11 Cal. 4th at 393. Defendants' Motions are therefore GRANTED as to Plaintiff's intentional interference with prospective economic advantage claim, and that claim is DISMISSED with prejudice, as Plaintiff has again unsuccessfully amended this claim despite [*37] having filed three amended complaints. See Zucco, 552 F.3d at 1007.

E. The Court Declines to Exercise Supplemental Jurisdiction over the Remaining State Law Claim

"The decision whether to continue to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over state law claims after all federal claims have been dismissed lies within the district court's discretion." Foster v. Wilson, 504 F.3d 1046, 1051 (9th Cir. 2007). "In Gibbs, the [United States Supreme] Court stated that 'if the federal claims are dismissed before trial . . . the state claims should be dismissed as well.'" Carnegie-Mellon Univ. v. Cohill, 484 U.S. 343, 350 n.7, 108 S. Ct. 614, 98 L. Ed. 2d 720 (1988) (quoting United Mine Workers of Am. v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 726, 86 S. Ct. 1130, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218 (1966)). Although this is not a per se rule, "in the usual case in which all federal-law claims are eliminated before trial, the balance of factors to be considered under the pendent jurisdiction doctrine—judicial economy, convenience, fairness, and comity—will point toward declining to exercise jurisdiction over the remaining state-law claims." Id. "When the balance of these factors indicates that a case properly belongs in state court, as when the federal-law claims have dropped out of the lawsuit in its early stages and only state-law claims remain, the federal court should decline the exercise of jurisdiction by dismissing the case without prejudice." Id. at 350.

Here, only Plaintiff's intentional interference [*38] with contract claim as to Client #2 remains—a state-law cause of action. See discussion supra Section V.C. Further, the Court has dismissed Plaintiff's sole federal-law claim with prejudice. See discussion supra Section V.A. Accordingly, there is no federal-law claim remaining. Given that this action is in its early stages, and because the federal-law claim has "dropped out of the lawsuit . . . and only [a] state-law claim[] remain[s]," the Court declines to exercise jurisdiction over the remaining state-law claim and DISMISSES the case without prejudice. See Carnegie-Mellon, 484 U.S. at 350.

VI. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Defendants' Motions are GRANTED with prejudice as to Plaintiff's Sherman Act § 1 claim, UCL claim, intentional inference with prospective economic advantage claim, and intentional interference with contract claim as to Client #1. Although, Defendants' Motions are GRANTED without prejudice as to Plaintiff's intentional interference with contractual relations claim with regard to Client #2, the Court declines to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over that claim given that the sole federal claim has "dropped out of the lawsuit . . . and only [a] state-law claim[] remain[s]." Carnegie-Mellon, 484 U.S. at 350. Accordingly, the case is DISMISSED [*39] without prejudice to the extent Plaintiff's intentional interference with contractual relations claim remains as to Client #2.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A complaint may be dismissed for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). The purpose of a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) is to test the legal sufficiency of the complaint. Generally, a plaintiff's burden at the pleading stage is relatively light. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) states that a pleading which sets forth a claim for relief shall contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a).

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In ruling on a motion to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), the court analyzes the complaint and takes all allegations of material fact as true and construes them in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. Dismissal may be based on a lack of a cognizable legal theory or on the absence of facts that would support a valid theory. A complaint must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory. A pleading that offers "labels and conclusions" or "a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Nor does a complaint suffice if it tenders "naked assertions" devoid of further factual enhancement. Rather, the claim must be "plausible on its face," meaning that the plaintiff must plead sufficient factual allegations to allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.

HN4[] Defenses, Inequitable Conduct

Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) sets a heightened pleading standard for claims based on fraud. In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). The Ninth Circuit has held that in order to meet this standard, a complaint must specify such facts as the times, dates, places, benefits received, and other details of the alleged fraudulent activity. The Federal Circuit has similarly held that in pleading inequitable conduct in patent cases, Rule 9(b) requires identification of the specific who, what, when, where, and how of the material misrepresentation or omission committed before the Patent and Trademark Office. The heightened standard does not apply to "malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b).

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Preclusion of Judgments > Res Judicata

HN5[] Preclusion of Judgments, Res Judicata

The general concept of claim preclusion also known as res judicata is that when a final judgment is rendered on the merits, another action may not be maintained between the parties on the same "claim," and defenses that were raised or could have been raised in that action are extinguished. Claim preclusion requires (1) an identity of parties or their privies, (2) a final judgment on the merits of the first suit, and (3) the later claim to be based on the same set of transactional facts as the first claim such that the later claim should have been litigated in the prior case.

Patent Law > Preclusion > Res Judicata

HN6[] Preclusion, Res Judicata

Where a claim preclusion issue is particular to patent law, courts analyze it under applicable Federal Circuit law.

Patent Law > Preclusion > Collateral Estoppel

Patent Law > Preclusion > Res Judicata

HN7[] Preclusion, Collateral Estoppel

As to both claim preclusion and issue preclusion, the law is well settled that the pendency of an appeal has no affect on the finality or binding effect of a trial court's holding.

Patent Law > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Patent Invalidity

Patent Law > Preclusion > Res Judicata

HN8[] Defenses, Patent Invalidity

This doctrine (claim preclusion) requires a close identity of claims. The Federal Circuit has held, for example, that where a prior judgment established "both that a patent was valid and that a party infringed," claim preclusion does not bar an invalidity defense when the same party is later sued for infringing the same patent with a different device unless the second allegedly infringing device is "essentially the same" as the earlier device found to infringe. Even if the invalidity defense would rest on the same basic facts in the second case as in the first, the defense is not precluded under this doctrine if the claims are not substantially the same. While defenses to a "claim" are extinguished by application of the doctrine of claim preclusion, the facts related to the defense do not in themselves constitute the transaction or "claim."

Antitrust & Trade Law > Procedural Matters

HN9[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Procedural Matters

Generally speaking, a counterclaim is compulsory if it (A) arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party's claim; and (B) does not require adding another party over whom the court cannot acquire jurisdiction, subject to certain exceptions. Fed. R. Civ. P. 13(a). A counterclaim which is compulsory but is not brought is thereafter barred. The issue is complicated by the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Mercoid, which some courts (including the Ninth Circuit) have construed as holding that antitrust claims are not compulsory counterclaims in patent cases, while other courts have disagreed.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Patent Law > Infringement Actions

HN10[] Patent, Infringement Actions

The Federal Circuit has in fact suggested that whether a claim was a compulsory counterclaim in a previous action is an issue of regional circuit law. The Ninth Circuit has held that a claim that patent infringement litigation violated an antitrust statute is a permissive, not a mandatory, counterclaim in a patent infringement case, and is not barred in a subsequent suit by failure to raise it in the infringement suit.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Patent Law > Infringement Actions

HN11[] Patent, Infringement Actions

The Fifth and Ninth Circuits have strictly followed Mercoid in refusing to hold any antitrust claim compulsory in the underlying patent infringement lawsuit.

Civil Procedure > ... > Preclusion of Judgments > Estoppel > Collateral Estoppel

HN12[] Estoppel, Collateral Estoppel

The doctrine of issue preclusion prevents relitigation of all "issues of fact or law that were actually litigated and necessarily decided" in a prior proceeding. Or, as phrased in the Restatement of Judgment, the doctrine applies when an issue of fact or law is actually litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment, and the determination is essential to the judgment.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Trademark Law > Causes of Action Involving Trademarks > Infringement Actions

HN13[] Causes of Action Involving Trademarks, Infringement Actions

A, as owner of a trademark, brings an action against B for infringement. B denies the validity of the trademark and denies infringement. The court finds that the trademark is valid, but that B had not infringed it, and gives judgment for B. Thereafter A brings an action against B alleging that since the rendition of the judgment B infringed the trademark. B is not precluded from defending this action on the ground that the trademark is invalid. Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27, comment h, illustration 14.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN14[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of those facts is improbable, and that a recovery is very remote and unlikely.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Monopolization Offenses

HN15[] Scope, Monopolization Offenses

In 1965, the U.S. Supreme Court held in Walker Process that a patent obtained through fraud on the Patent Office can provide a basis for claims under the Sherman Act. The Federal Circuit more recently and succinctly summarized the standard for such a claim: Walker Process set forth two conditions for antitrust liability based on the fraudulent procurement of a patent. First, the plaintiff must show that the defendant procured the relevant patent by knowing and willful fraud on the Patent and Trademark Office or (in the case of an assignee) that the defendant maintained and enforced the patent with knowledge of the fraudulent manner in which it was obtained. Second, the plaintiff must prove all the elements otherwise necessary to establish a Sherman Act monopolization charge. With the first condition, the court made clear that the invalidity of the patent was not sufficient; a showing of intentional fraud in its procurement was required. With the second condition, the Court incorporated the rules of antitrust law generally. As Justice Harlan stated in his concurring opinion, as to this class of improper patent monopolies, antitrust remedies should be allowed room for full play. The Ninth Circuit recognized a related basis for liability in Handgards.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Monopolization Offenses

HN16[] Scope, Monopolization Offenses

Inspired by Walker Process, the Ninth Circuit held in Handgards that a plaintiff could pursue antitrust remedies for bad faith infringement actions--even if not based on fraud on the patent office--so long as the jury is "instructed that a patentee's infringement suit is presumptively in good faith and that this presumption can be rebutted only by clear and convincing evidence." As illustrated in Handgards itself, not all Handgards claims are also Walker Process claims: a Handgards claim can be based on bad faith litigation to enforce a patent known to be invalid for reasons other than fraud on the Patent and Trademark Office. Conversely, not all Walker Process claims arise from bad faith litigation: enforcement actions are not a sine qua non of monopolizing by patent fraud.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct

HN17[] Defenses, Inequitable Conduct

The heightened pleading standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) applies to allegations of inequitable conduct, and Federal Circuit law governs the question of whether inequitable conduct has been pleaded with particularity under Rule 9(b). In pleading inequitable conduct in patent cases, Rule 9(b) requires identification of the specific who, what, when, where, and how of the material misrepresentation or omission committed before the Patent and Trademark Office (PTO), rather than simply aver the substantive elements of inequitable conduct. Those elements are that an individual associated with prosecuting a patent application (1) made an affirmative misrepresentation of a material fact, failed to disclose material information, or submitted false material information; and (2) did so with a specific intent to deceive the PTO.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct

HN18[] Defenses, Inequitable Conduct

Although "knowledge" and "intent" may be averred generally, a pleading of inequitable conduct under Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) must include sufficient allegations of underlying facts from which a court may reasonably infer that a specific individual (1) knew of the withheld material information or of the falsity of the material misrepresentation, and (2) withheld or misrepresented this information with a specific intent to deceive the Patent and Trademark Office. A reasonable inference is one that is plausible and that flows logically from the facts alleged, including any objective indications of candor and good faith. At the pleading stage, it need not be "the single most reasonable inference able to be drawn"--unlike on the merits, where a "clear and convincing evidence" standard applies to inequitable conduct claims.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Infringement Actions > Defenses > Inequitable Conduct

Evidence > Burdens of Proof

HN19[] Defenses, Inequitable Conduct

In context, that standard (most reasonable inference) applies to evaluating "indirect and circumstantial evidence" of deception--i.e., a judgment on the merits. Although Therasense raised the bar for proving inequitable conduct on the merits, it did not change the Exergen standard for pleading inequitable conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > Sham Exception

HN20[] Noerr-Pennington Doctrine, Sham Exception

In PRE, the U.S. Supreme Court set forth the standard required for a plaintiff to establish sham litigation (stated here in part): The Court now outlines a two-part definition of "sham" litigation. First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. If an objective litigant could conclude that the suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, the suit is immunized under Noerr, and an antitrust claim premised on the sham exception must fail. Only if challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation. Under this second part of the Court's definition of sham, the court should focus on whether the baseless lawsuit conceals an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor, through the use of the governmental process--as opposed to the outcome of that process--as an anticompetitive weapon.

HN21[] Noerr-Pennington Doctrine, Sham Exception

In PRE, the U.S. Supreme Court set forth the standard required for a plaintiff to establish sham litigation (stated here in part): This two-tiered process requires the plaintiff to disprove the challenged lawsuit's legal viability before the court will entertain evidence of the suit's economic viability. Of course, even a plaintiff who defeats the defendant' s claim to Noerr immunity by demonstrating both the objective and the subjective components of a sham must still prove a substantive antitrust violation. Proof of a sham merely deprives the defendant of immunity; it does not relieve the plaintiff of the obligation to establish all other elements of his claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities

HN22[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Exemptions & Immunities

According to the Federal Circuit: PRE and Walker Process provide alternative legal grounds on which a patentee may be stripped of its immunity from the antitrust laws; both legal theories may be applied to the same conduct. Moreover, the court need not find a way to merge these decisions. Each provides its own basis for depriving a patent owner of immunity from the antitrust laws; either or both may be applicable to a particular party's conduct in obtaining and enforcing a patent.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Monopolization Offenses

HN23[] Scope, Monopolization Offenses

A Walker Process plaintiff must (also) establish all the elements otherwise necessary to establish a Sherman Act monopolization charge, based on the rules of antitrust law generally.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > Lanham Act

HN24[] False Advertising, Lanham Act

Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act prohibits any false or misleading description or representation of fact, which in commercial advertising or promotion, misrepresents the nature, characteristics, qualities, or geographic origin of goods services, or commercial activities. 15 U.S.C.S. § 1125(a). Before a patentee may be held liable under § 43(a) of the Lanham Act for marketplace activity in support of its patent, and thus be deprived of the right to make statements about potential infringement of its patent, the marketplace activity must have been undertaken in bad faith. Obviously, if the patentee knows that the patent is invalid, unenforceable, or not infringed, yet represents to the marketplace that a competitor is infringing the patent, a clear case of bad faith representations is made out.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising

HN25[] Consumer Protection, False Advertising

A mere claim that a product is "patented" is not false or misleading unless no patent covers the product.

Torts > Intentional Torts > Malicious Prosecution

HN26[] Intentional Torts, Malicious Prosecution

At least one California appellate court has held that a civil action for malicious prosecution will not lie while an appeal in the underlying action is pending.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Remedies

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Costs & Attorney Fees > Attorney Fees & Expenses

Civil Procedure > Pleading & Practice > Motion Practice

HN27[] Private Actions, Remedies

It is well established that antitrust plaintiffs bringing claims that previous litigation constituted unlawful anticompetitive conduct can recover the cost of their defense in that litigation as damages. Under such circumstances, attorneys' fees fall within the "substantive law exception" to Fed. R. Civ. P. 54 because the prior litigation itself constituted prohibited conduct, and fees thus may be recovered as damages in a subsequent action.

ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO DISMISS WITH LEAVE TO AMEND

I. INTRODUCTION

Plaintiff Cave Consulting Group, Inc. ("CCGroup") alleges that Defendant OptumInsight, Inc. wrongfully and in bad faith sought to enforce patents that it obtained through fraud on the United States Patent and Trademark Office ("USPTO"). CCGroup's First Amended Complaint asserts antitrust claims under the Walker Process and Handgards doctrines, a Lanham Act claim for false or misleading representations of patent status, and a malicious [*2] prosecution claim under California common law. OptumInsight moves to dismiss. The Court held a hearing on January 8, 2016, and thereafter took supplemental briefing on preclusion issues. The Court agrees with OptumInsight that CCGroup's allegations do not satisfy the pleading standard for inequitable conduct claims set forth in Exergen Corp. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 575 F.3d 1312, 1326 (Fed. Cir. 2009), among other deficiencies discussed below. OptumInsight's Motion is therefore GRANTED, and the First Amended Complaint is DISMISSED with leave to amend. CCGroup may file a Second Amended Complaint no later than May 13, 2016.[1]

II. ALLEGATIONS OF THE FIRST AMENDED COMPLAINT

CCGroup's HN1[] allegations are generally taken as true at the pleading stage. Parks Sch. of Bus. v. Symington, 51 F.3d 1480, 1484 (9th Cir. 1995). This section summarizes the allegations but should not be construed as resolving any factual issues that might be disputed.

Both parties in this case are in the business of providing software, known as "episode of care groupers" or simply "groupers," used to group medical claims data based on discrete periods of treatment in order to better evaluate the quality and efficiency of medical care. 1st Am. Compl. ("FAC," [*3] dkt. 39) ¶¶ 21-28. From 2005 through 2014, only three groupers existed in the national market, including OptumInsight's "ETG" product, CCGroup's "Cave Grouper," and a product sold by non-party Truven Health Analytics, Inc., formerly known as MedStat Group, Inc. ("MedStat"). Id. ¶ 28. OptumInsight controlled eighty-five to ninety percent of the market during that period. Id. ¶ 30. OptumInsight (including its predecessors Ingenix, Inc. and Symmetry Health Data Systems Inc.) obtained its dominant market share through actual and threatened enforcement of a portfolio of patents, including two families: the "Dang Patents" and the "Seare Patents." Id. ¶¶ 31-33.[2]

A. Symmetry and the '897 Patent

Dennis Dang, among others, formed Symmetry Health Data Systems Inc. ("Symmetry") in 1993, and "[b]y early 1994 . . . had developed a software grouping methodology, which Symmetry began advertising for sale under the trade name 'Episode Treatment Groups' or 'ETGs.'" Id. ¶¶ 43-44. On June 12, 1994, Symmetry responded to a request for proposal from Aetna, [*4] a large insurance company, by offering to license the ETG software to Aetna and providing a description of the software, sample reports generated by the software, and pricing information. Id. ¶¶ 45-46. Symmetry's response constituted an offer of sale describing the invention, and therefore triggered a one-year period to file a patent application under the then-existing version of 35 U.S.C. § 102(b). Id. ¶ 47.[3]

More than one year after responding to Aetna's RFP, Symmetry filed a patent application for its grouping methodology. Id. ¶ 48. "When [Symmetry's patent counsel David Rosenbaum] and Dang filed the patent application, they deliberately withheld from the USPTO all of the information in their possession regarding Symmetry's early efforts to commercialize Dang's invention, including Dang's offer to sell his inventive methodology to Aetna." [*5] Id. ¶ 49. In response to that application, the USPTO issued the '897 patent in 1998. Id. ¶ 51. CCGroup asserts that disclosure of the offer to Aetna "would have rendered the claims of the '897 patent unpatentable," because those claims "read on Dang's grouping methodology and, by extension, the ETG grouping software Symmetry offered for sale to Aetna." Id. ¶¶ 50-51.

B. Symmetry-MedStat Litigation

[1] The parties have consented to the jurisdiction of the undersigned magistrate judge for all purposes pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(c).

[2] The Dang Patents include U.S. Patent Nos. 5,835,897; 6,370,511; 7,620,560; 7,725,333; 7,774,216; 7,979,290; 8,121,869; 8,296,165; and 8,700,433. The Seare Patents include U.S. Patent Nos. 7,222,079 and 7,774,252. This Order refers to these patents using the last three digits of each number (e.g., the '897 patent).

[3] At the time, that statute read as follows: "A person shall be entitled to a patent unless-- . . . (b) the invention was patented or described in a printed publication in this or a foreign country or in public use or on sale in this country, more than one year prior to the date of the application for patent in the United States . . . ." 35 U.S.C. § 102 (prior to amendment in 2015).

Immediately after the '897 patent was issued, Symmetry sued MedStat for infringing that patent. Id. ¶ 47(2)[4] (citing Symmetry Health Data Sys., Inc. v. The MedStat Grp. Inc., No. 2:98-CV-02032-EHC (D. Ariz.)). "Rosenbaum, Symmetry's patent prosecution counsel, served as litigation counsel in the MedStat litigation." Id. Symmetry stated in sworn interrogatory responses that Dang conceived of the invention "at least as early September 1993" and that, at that time, it was "sufficiently complete to enable one of ordinary skill in the art to reduce the claimed invention to practice." Id. ¶¶ 48(2)-49(2). Dang confirmed that position in sworn testimony in both the MedStat litigation and later litigation against Cave Group. Id. ¶ 51(2). According to Cave Group, Symmetry took the position that the invention occurred in 1993 "in order [*6] to predate prior art cited by MedStat," specifically a patent issued from a 1994 application by Jerry Seale. Id. ¶ 52(2). The MedStat litigation ultimately settled in 2000. See id. ¶ 56.

C. Reexamination of the '897 Patent

Earlier in 2000, before the MedStat case settled, Symmetry initiated a non-adversarial USPTO reexamination of the '897 patent and disclosed the sales offer to Aetna, in an attempt to cure the previous non-disclosure in its initial application. Id. ¶¶ 56-58. To avoid invalidating the patent under § 102(b), Dang, Rosenbaum, and others "worked together to contrive a story that would deceive the USPTO regarding the importance of the Aetna offer and the conception date for Dang's invention," with that plot being reflected in their contemporary communications. Id. ¶ 68. They "manufactured a later conception date of August 1994"—shortly after the June 1994 RFP response—"for purposes of their proceedings before the USPTO." Id. ¶ 61. Rosenbaum, Dang, and another Symmetry [*7] employee "executed sworn declarations stating that Dang's invention was not fully conceived and ready for patenting until August 1994," which CCGroup alleges is "false," and Rosenbaum submitted the declarations to the USPTO. Id. ¶¶ 62-64. Symmetry withheld from the USPTO the litigation materials in which Symmetry had asserted a 1993 conception date, which CCGroup alleges "were material to the patentability of the '897 patent and all of the other patents that ultimately issued from the original application for the '897 patent." Id. ¶ 67. By representing that the invention was conceived in 1994, the declarants "intentionally deceived the USPTO," and Symmetry was aware of their "false claims" and "deliberate non-disclosure." Id. ¶ 69, 72.

D. Ingenix-Symmetry Litigation

"In April of 2001, while the reexamination of the '897 patent was pending, OptumInsight (then known as Ingenix) sued Symmetry for infringement of Seare's U.S. Patent No. 6,223,164." Id. ¶ 73 (citing Ingenix, Inc. v. Symmetry Health Data Systems, Inc., No. 0:01-cv-00704 (D. Minn.)). Rosenbaum again assisted as Symmetry's litigation counsel. Id. ¶ 74. OptumInsight's counsel included Peter Lancaster[5] of the Dorsey & Whitney firm, and Kevin McMahon and Steven Glazer of the Weil Gotshal [*8] firm. Id. ¶¶ 75-76.

Symmetry counterclaimed that Seare derived his invention from Dang's work. Id. ¶ 77. The Seare '164 patent's filing date was June 23, 1994, and Symmetry argued that Dang conceived the '897 patent in September of 1993—contradicting the position Symmetry took in the reexamination and reverting to the date it asserted in its litigation against MedStat. Id. ¶¶ 79-80. Symmetry disclosed dated source code to support the 1993 date, and asserted in a brief opposing summary judgment that "Mr. Dang's undisputed testimony is that he first conceived of the invention, which is now known as ETGs, in the summer of 1993." Id. ¶ 82 (quoting the brief) (emphasis omitted). Lancaster, McMahon, and Glazer received or knew of the source code and the brief, id. ¶ 83, and "were also provided with the interrogatory responses and other materials from the earlier MedStat litigation that identified September 1993 as the actual conception date for Dang's invention." Id. ¶ 90.

[4] The First Amended Complaint includes two sets of paragraphs numbered 47 through 53. See FAC at 10-12. This Order, like OptumInsight's Motion, indicates citations to the second set of paragraphs with "(2)" after the paragraph number. See Mot. at 5 n.2.

[5] Lancaster also represents OptumInsight in the present action, in which he is OptumInsight's lead counsel. See Reply (dkt. 65) at 10.

Separate litigation between OptumInsight and Symmetry also occurred in the District of Arizona. See id. ¶ 93 (citing [*9] Symmetry Health Data Systems, Inc. v. Ingenix, Inc., No. CIV 00-1411 (D. Ariz.)). Symmetry sued OptumInsight for infringing the '897 patent, and OptumInsight counterclaimed that the '897 patent was unenforceable on account of inequitable conduct. Id.

E. Interference Proceeding, Acquisition of Symmetry, and Subsequent Representations Regarding the Patents

In addition to its infringement lawsuit, OptumInsight also provoked a USPTO interference proceeding between the '897 Dang patent and the then-pending application for what became the '079 Seare patent, with OptumInsight asserting that Seare "first invented the episode grouping methodology claimed in those applications." See id. ¶ 92. OptumInsight's application for the '079 patent included, verbatim, the first claim of the '897 patent. Id. ¶ 94. "Through its attorneys McMahon and Glazer, OptumInsight represented to the USPTO that the ['897] Dang patent and the Seare application [resulting in the '079 patent] are directed to the same invention." Id.

In May of 2003, OptumInsight purchased all the outstanding stock of Symmetry, and thus acquired Symmetry's intellectual property. Id. ¶ 95. To resolve the interference, OptumInsight decided unilaterally that the Seare application for the '079 patent had priority [*10] over the '897 patent—now also owned by OptumInsight—without the issue being decided by a finder of fact. Id. ¶¶ 96-97. Later, in 2007, Symmetry merged into OptumInsight. Id. ¶ 100.

According to CCGroup, "Symmetry's corporate knowledge, including that of its agents Rosenbaum, Dang, and [co-founder Mitchell] Portnoy, was imputed to OptumInsight as the purchaser of all of Symmetry's outstanding stock." Id. Based on that knowledge, and OptumInsight's own knowledge obtained during litigation, CCGroup alleges that OptumInsight's and its agents' representations to the USPTO during the interference were knowingly false. Id. ¶¶ 99-105.

OptumInsight on multiple later occasions acknowledged to the public and a potential client "that Dang's ETG software was introduced to the market" and/or conceived in 1993, which, CCGroup alleges, contradicts the position OptumInsight took in the interference. Id. ¶ 98. Neither OptumInsight nor Symmetry has ever disclosed the 1993 conception date to the USPTO, including during prosecution of at least eight additional patents based on Dang's original application. Id. ¶¶ 107-11. CCGroup alleges that "[b]ecause all of the Dang patents rely on Dang's original application, and because [*11] the claims are all related, each of them is invalid and unenforceable in light of the material misrepresentations and omissions before the USPTO regarding Dang's conception date and related June 12, 1994 offer to sell the ETG software to Aetna." Id. ¶ 113. CCGroup also alleges that OptumInsight and its attorneys committed fraud on the USPTO by prosecuting the Seare patents, because they knew that Dang invented his methodology and software earlier, and that the USPTO would not have issued the Seare patents if OptumInsight had disclosed that prior art. See id. ¶¶ 114-22.

F. Minnesota OptumInsight-CCGroup Litigation

On January 11, 2011, OptumInsight filed a complaint against CCGroup in the District of Minnesota for infringement of two Seare patents and five Dang patents. Id. ¶ 123 (citing Ingenix, Inc. v. Cave Consulting Grp., LLC, No. 11-cv-00077-DWF-FLN (D. Minn.)). CCGroup alleges that OptumInsight and its attorneys, including Lancaster and Devan Padmanabhan of Dorsey & Whitney, knew that both patent families were invalid and unenforceable due to inequitable conduct. Id. ¶¶ 125-30.

OptumInsight did not serve the complaint on CCGroup, and ultimately dismissed the Minnesota lawsuit without [*12] prejudice on June 20, 2011. Id. ¶ 131. CCGroup nevertheless "received numerous inquiries from customers and potential customers regarding OptumInsight's allegations of infringement." Id. ¶ 134. CCGroup asked OptumInsight to dismiss its claims with prejudice "to ensure that OptumInsight's public allegations . . . would not tarnish CCGroup's reputation and ability to compete in the marketplace, but OptumInsight refused. Id. ¶¶ 132-33.

G. Declaratory Judgment Action

"To clear the pall that OptumInsight's allegations had cast over CCGroup's business, on July 11, 2011, CCGroup filed a declaratory judgment action in the Northern District of California to resolve OptumInsight's infringement claims." Id. ¶ 135 (citing Cave Consulting Grp., Inc. v. OptumInsight, Inc., No. 5:11-cv-00469-EJD (N.D. Cal.) (hereinafter, "Cave I")).[6] OptumInsight, again represented by Dorsey & Whitney attorneys including Lancaster and Padmanabhan, filed counterclaims asserting that CCGroup infringed the patents at issue in the Minnesota complaint, as well as an additional Dang patent issued in the intervening period. Id. ¶¶ 136-37. Based on information obtained from earlier litigation, "Padmanabhan, Lancaster, OptumInsight, [*13] and Dorsey & Whitney knew before those counterclaims were filed that the Dang and Seare patents are invalid and unenforceable." Id. ¶ 138.

The Cave I litigation continued for three years, and required CCGroup "to undertake a costly claim construction, extensive fact discovery, and an in-depth review of the asserted patents and prior art." Id. ¶ 140. "Two years into the litigation . . . OptumInsight . . . produc[ed] over 25,000 pages of confidential documents from its prior litigations involving the Dang and Seare patent portfolios." Id. ¶ 146. Those documents form the basis for CCGroup's allegations summarized above regarding OptumInsight's alleged inequitable conduct, and CCGroup filed a second amended complaint in Cave I asserting that the Dang patents were invalid and unenforceable due to that conduct. See id. ¶¶ 147-50. Nearly one [*14] year later, OptumInsight dismissed its counterclaims based on the Dang patent family, although it continued to assert infringement of the Seare patents. Id. ¶¶ 152-53.

Judge Davila granted partial summary judgment for OptumInsight, holding that Symmetry's response to Aetna's RFP in 1994 was not prior invalidating art as to the Seare patents because it was not made public. *Cave I, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21514, 2015 WL 740379, at 13 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 20, 2015). He declined to grant summary judgment for either party on other issues relating to the validity of the Seare patents because material facts remained disputed. *2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21514, [WL] at 12-14. There is no indication that CCGroup made any argument in Cave I regarding inequitable conduct related to the Seare patents.

OptumInsight withdrew the '252 Seare patent "[o]n the eve of trial." FAC ¶ 154. At trial, a jury determined that CCGroup did not infringe the remaining '079 Seare patent. Id. ¶ 157. Post-trial motions remain pending as of the date of this Order. See Cave I dkts. 379, 383.

H. Alleged Damages and Claims

CCGroup alleges that "OptumInsight's fraud on the USPTO, and its resulting possession and baseless assertion of the Dang and Seare patent families, has enabled OptumInsight to acquire and maintain monopoly power or, in the alternative, created [*15] a dangerous probability of OptumInsight obtaining monopoly power, in the Grouper Software Market." FAC ¶ 160. Since CCGroup introduced its competing software in 2005, it has lost customers due to the perceived strength of OptumInsight's patents, and has incurred litigation expenses as a result of OptumInsight's efforts to enforce the patents through alleged sham litigation. See id. ¶¶ 163, 165, 167.

The First Amended Complaint includes four claims. First, under the doctrine of Walker Process Equipment Inc. v. Food Machinery and Chemical Corporation, 382 U.S. 172, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1965), CCGroup alleges that OptumInsight violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act by monopolizing or attempting to monopolize the market for grouper software through fraud on the USPTO in connection with prosecution of the Dang and Seare patents. FAC ¶¶ 179-85. Second, under the doctrine of Handgards v. Ethicon, 601 F.2d 986 (9th Cir. 1979), CCGroup alleges that OptumInsight monopolized or attempted to monopolize the market through bad faith use of sham litigation to enforce Dang and Seare patents that OptumInsight knew were invalid or unenforceable. FAC ¶¶ 186-92. Third, CCGroup asserts that OptumInsight violated the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a)(1)(B), through false or misleading statements that its ETG software was "patented" or covered by specific Dang patents, despite OptumInsight's alleged knowledge [*16] that the patents were not enforceable. FAC ¶¶ 193-200. Finally, CCGroup brings a malicious prosecution claim under California law, asserting that OptumInsight acted without probable cause in bringing infringement counterclaims in the Cave I action when it allegedly knew that the patents at issue were invalid and unenforceable. Id. ¶¶ 201-09.

[6] The Court takes judicial notice that Cave Consulting initially filed a claim in January of 2011 alleging that OptumInsight infringed a patent owned Cave Consulting, and filed an amended complaint in July adding claims for declaratory judgment of non-infringement and invalidity of OptumInsight's patents. See Cave I dkts. 1 (Complaint), 23 (First Amended Complaint).

III. ANALYSIS

A. Legal Standard

HN2[] A complaint may be dismissed for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. "The purpose of a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) is to test the legal sufficiency of the complaint." N. Star Int'l v. Ariz. Corp. Comm'n, 720 F.2d 578, 581 (9th Cir. 1983). Generally, a plaintiff's burden at the pleading stage is relatively light. Rule 8(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure states that "[a] pleading which sets forth a claim for relief . . . shall contain . . . a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a).

HN3[] In ruling on a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), the court analyzes the complaint and takes "all allegations of material fact as true and construe[s] them in the light most favorable to the non-moving party." Parks Sch. of Bus. v. Symington, 51 F.3d 1480, 1484 (9th Cir. 1995). Dismissal may be based on a lack of a cognizable legal theory or on the absence of facts that would support a valid theory. Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). A complaint must "contain either direct or inferential allegations [*17] respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 562, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (citing Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1106 (7th Cir. 1984)). "A pleading that offers 'labels and conclusions' or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). "Nor does a complaint suffice if it tenders 'naked assertion[s]' devoid of 'further factual enhancement.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557). Rather, the claim must be "'plausible on its face,'" meaning that the plaintiff must plead sufficient factual allegations to "allow[] the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570).

HN4[] Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure sets a heightened pleading standard for claims based on fraud. "In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). The Ninth Circuit has held that in order to meet this standard, a "complaint must specify such facts as the times, dates, places, benefits received, and other details of the alleged fraudulent activity." Neubronner v. Milken, 6 F.3d 666, 672 (9th Cir. 1993); see also McMaster v. United States, 731 F.3d 881, 897 (9th Cir. 2013). The Federal Circuit has similarly held that "in pleading inequitable conduct in patent cases, Rule 9(b) requires identification of the specific who, what, when, where, and how of the material misrepresentation [*18] or omission committed before the PTO." Exergen Corp. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 575 F.3d 1312, 1326 (Fed. Cir. 2009). The heightened standard does not apply to "[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind." Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b).

B. Effect of Non-Invalidity Determination in Cave I

One preliminary issue is whether CCGroup is precluded from asserting invalidity of the Seare patents based on its failure to successfully do so in the Cave I litigation. OptumInsight asserts that, in that litigation, "OptumInsight won the validity issue; Cave lost." Mot. at 27. CCGroup responds that inequitable conduct as to the Seare patents "has never been litigated by the parties." Opp'n at 29.

In its Motion and Reply, OptumInsight appears to make three distinct arguments: (1) that the doctrine of claim preclusion applies to defenses that CCGroup raised or could have raised in Cave I; (2) that the doctrine of issue preclusion applies to Judge Davila's determination that the Aetna RFP response does not constitute invalidating prior art; and (3) that regardless of formal preclusion doctrines, "[c]laims and issue on which OptumInsight actually achieved success cannot possibly be claims as to which no 'reasonable litigant could realistically expect success.'" See Reply at 14-17 (citation omitted); [*19] see also Mot. at 25-27.

Because OptumInsight's clearest articulation of its arguments was in its Reply, and the parties' briefing of these issues was therefore not as thorough as it might have been, the Court ordered the parties to file simultaneous supplemental briefs after the hearing to address questions of preclusion in more detail. OptumInsight's supplemental brief argues that: (1) "merger and claim-splitting" doctrines, also known as claim preclusion, bar CCGroup's antitrust claims, Def.'s Supp'l Br. (dkt. 73) at 4-9; (2) the doctrine of compulsory counterclaims bars the claims, id. At 9-15; (3) issue preclusion applies, id. at 15-16; and (4) OptumInsight "need not prove claim or issue preclusion to establish that [CCGroup's] antitrust claims lack merit, because [CCGroup's] burden in this antitrust case is far heavier than the burden of showing that it was entitled to win in Cave I," id. at 16. CCGroup contends that issue preclusion does not apply because: (1) Judge Davila's non-invalidity ruling was not necessary to the ultimate judgment of non-infringement, Pl.'s Supp'l Br. (dkt. 74) at 5-7; (2) the inquiry in Cave I concerned a different issue with a higher burden of proof, id. at 7-11; (3) CCGroup neither had [*20] nor will have any practical opportunity for appellate review of Judge Davila's non-invalidity decision, id. at 11-12; and (4) giving preclusive effect to that decision would be inequitable because Judge Davila applied an incorrect legal standard, id. at 12-14. CCGroup also argues that claim preclusion does not apply because the Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit have held that antitrust claims are not compulsory counterclaims in infringement cases. Id. at 14-15 (citing Mercoid v. Mid-Continent Inv. Co., 320 U.S. 661, 671, 64 S. Ct. 268, 88 L. Ed. 376, 1944 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 641 (1944); Hydranautics v. FilmTec Corp., 70 F.3d 533, 536 (9th Cir. 1995)).

1. Claim Preclusion

HN5[] "The general concept of claim preclusion [also known as res judicata] is that when a final judgment is rendered on the merits, another action may not be maintained between the parties on the same 'claim,' and defenses that were raised or could have been raised in that action are extinguished." Hallco Mfg. Co. v. Foster, 256 F.3d 1290, 1295 (Fed. Cir. 2001) (citing Restatement (Second) of Judgments §§ 18-19).[7] "Claim preclusion requires (1) an identity of parties or their privies, (2) a final[8] judgment on the merits of the first suit, and (3) the later claim to be based on the same set of transactional facts as the first claim such that the later claim should have been litigated in the prior case." Bowers Inv. Co., LLC v. United States, 695 F.3d 1380, 1384 (Fed. Cir. 2012).

[7] HN6[] Where a "claim preclusion issue is particular to patent law, [courts] analyze it under applicable Federal Circuit law." Hallco, 256 F.3d at 1294.

[8] HN7[] As to both claim preclusion [*21] and issue preclusion, "the law is well settled that the pendency of an appeal has no affect [sic] on the finality or binding effect of a trial court's holding." SSIH Equip. S.A. v. U.S. Int'l Trade Comm'n, 718 F.2d 365, 370 (Fed. Cir. 1983) (citing Deposit Bank v. Frankfort, 191 U.S. 499, 24 S. Ct. 154, 48 L. Ed. 276 (1903); 18 C. Wright, A. Miller & E. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4433 (1981)); see also, e.g., Pharmacia & Upjohn Co. v. Mylan Pharms., Inc., 170 F.3d 1373, 1381 (Fed. Cir. 1999); Cygnus Telecoms. Tech., LLC v. Am. Int'l Telephonics, LLC, 569 F. Supp. 2d 1035, 1038 (N.D. Cal. 2008). The Court applies the same rule to the pending post-trial motions in Cave I and holds that the judgment in that case is sufficiently final for the purposes of either preclusion doctrine.

HN8[] This doctrine requires a close identity of claims. The Federal Circuit has held, for example, that where a prior judgment established "both that [a] patent was valid and that [a party] infringed," claim preclusion does not bar an invalidity defense when the same party is later sued for infringing the same patent with a different device unless the second allegedly infringing device is "essentially the same" as the earlier device found to infringe. See Hallco, 256 F.3d at 1295-96 (summarizing Foster v. Hallco Mfg. Co., 947 F.2d 469 (Fed. Cir. 1991)). Even if the invalidity defense would rest on the same basic facts in the second case as in the first, the defense is not precluded under this doctrine if the claims are not substantially the same. "While defenses to a 'claim' are extinguished by application of the doctrine [*22] of claim preclusion, the facts related to the defense do not in themselves constitute the transaction or 'claim.'" Foster, 947 F.2d at 479.

While there is overlap on some issues, all of CCGroup's claims in this case—two antitrust claims, a false advertising claim, and a malicious prosecution claim—rely on key alleged facts that fall outside the scope of the claims in Cave I, such as OptumInsight's market dominance and its alleged efforts to enforce and advertise its patents. The cases cited in OptumInsight's Reply and supplemental brief do not fit the facts of this case. See, e.g., Cummins, Inc. v. TAS Distrib. Co., Inc., 700 F.3d 1329, 1336 (Fed. Cir. 2012) (applying principles of Illinois res judicata law not applicable to the present case, which has no connection to Illinois); Roche Palo Alto LLC v. Apotex, Inc., 531 F.3d 1372, 1380 (Fed. Cir. 2008) (applying claim preclusion in a second suit asserting infringement of the same patent by "essentially the same" product as in a previous infringement suit); Crystal Imp. Corp. v. AVID Identification Sys., Inc., 582 F. Supp. 2d 1166 (D. Minn. 2008) (holding that claim preclusion barred the second of two antitrust actions, with no suggestion that an earlier infringement action barred either of the antitrust actions). The Court concludes that claim preclusion does not apply here.

2. Compulsory Counterclaims

Although related to the doctrine of claim preclusion, OptumInsight distinctly raises for the [*23] first time in its supplemental brief the argument that CCGroup's present claims were compulsory counterclaims in Cave I. Def.'s Supp'l Br. at 9-15. HN9[] Generally speaking, a counterclaim is compulsory if it "(A) arises out of the transaction or occurrence that is the subject matter of the opposing party's claim; and (B) does not require adding another party over whom the court cannot acquire jurisdiction," subject to certain exceptions. Fed. R. Civ. P. 13(a). "A counterclaim which is compulsory but is not brought is thereafter barred." Baker v. Gold Seal Liquors, Inc., 417 U.S. 467, 469 n.1, 94 S. Ct. 2504, 41 L. Ed. 2d 243 (1974). The issue is complicated by the Supreme Court's decision in Mercoid v. Mid-Continent Investment Company, 320 U.S. 661, 64 S. Ct. 268, 88 L. Ed. 376, 1944 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 641 (1944), which some courts (including the Ninth Circuit) have construed as holding that antitrust claims are not compulsory counterclaims in patent cases, while other courts have disagreed.

OptumInsight incorrectly asserts that "the Federal Circuit has noted, 'the majority of courts . . . have held that antitrust claims are compulsory counterclaims.'" Id. at 9 (quoting Nobelpharma AB v. Implant Innovations, Inc., 141 F.3d 1059, 1067 n.4 (Fed. Cir. 1998) (en banc)) (ellipsis in original). OptumInsight is correct that the quoted language appears in the Federal Circuit's opinion, and OptumInsight accurately notes that that the Circuit quotes a district court decision for that language. See id. What OptumInsight omits, [*24] however, is that the language at issue appears in a parenthetical phrase in a "compare . . . with" citation string intended to illustrate a split of authority. See Nobelpharma, 141 F.3d at 1067 n.4. The Federal Circuit itself noted only that antitrust claims based on patent prosecution are "typically raised as a counterclaim," id. at 1067 (emphasis added)—but whether such counterclaims are compulsory was not before the court, and the footnote now quoted by OptumInsight references not only the Northern District of Illinois decision[9] that found treating antitrust counterclaims as compulsory to be the majority position, but also decisions of the Fifth and Ninth Circuits that reached the opposite result. The Federal Circuit's footnote reads, in full, as follows:

The Seventh Circuit has expressly refused to decide the issue." (citations omitted)).

Nobelpharma, 141 F.3d at 1067 n.4 (bold emphasis added to designate the portion quoted in OptumInsight's brief). It is not accurate to suggest that the Federal Circuit took a position one way or the other on whether OptumInsight's preferred treatment of these claims is the majority view.

HN10[] The Federal Circuit has in fact suggested that whether a claim was a compulsory counterclaim in a previous action is an issue of regional circuit law. Genentech, Inc. v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 143 F.3d 1446, 1456 (Fed. Cir. 1998) (applying Seventh Circuit law), vacated on other grounds, 527 U.S. 1031, 119 S. Ct. 2388, 144 L. Ed. 2d 789 (1991); see also Def.'s Supp'l Br. at 13 (discussing Genentech). Accordingly, Ninth Circuit precedent applies to the case at hand. The Ninth Circuit—as noted in the Nobelpharma footnote set forth above—has held that a "claim that patent infringement litigation violated an antitrust statute is a permissive, not a mandatory, counterclaim in a patent infringement case, and is not barred in a subsequent suit by failure to raise it [*26] in the infringement suit." Hydranautics, 70 F.3d at 536-37 (citing Mercoid, 320 U.S. at 671).

Although OptumInsight attempts to distinguish Hydranautics on its facts, Def.'s Supp'l Br. at 11, the rule in that case could not have been stated more clearly. See also Destiny Tool v. SGS Tools Co., 344 F. App'x 320, 323 (9th Cir. 2009) (HN11[] "The Fifth and Ninth Circuits have strictly followed Mercoid in refusing to hold any antitrust claim compulsory in the underlying patent infringement lawsuit." (emphasis added)). The only case that OptumInsight cites that was decided after Hydranautics within the Ninth Circuit was not a patent case, and held only that Hydranautics should not be extended outside the realm of patent law. *MGA Entm't, Inc. v. Mattel, Inc., No. SACV 11-01063 DOC (RNBx), 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22055, 2012 WL 569389, at 17-18 (C D. Cal. Feb. 21, 2012). As this Court is bound by Ninth Circuit precedent on the issue,[10] the Court holds that CCGroup's antitrust claims were not compulsory counterclaims to OptumInsight's infringement claims in Cave I.

3. Issue Preclusion

HN12[] "The doctrine of issue preclusion prevents relitigation of all 'issues of fact or law that were actually litigated and necessarily decided' in a prior proceeding.'" Robi v. Five Platters, Inc., 838 F.2d 318, 322 (9th Cir.

[10] OptumInsight has cited no authority for the proposition that the determination of compulsory counterclaims is a matter of uniform Federal Circuit law, nor any decision in which the Federal Circuit actually decided the significance of the Supreme Court's Mercoid decision. OptumInsight suggests that the Ninth Circuit's approach in Hydranautics creates a special [*27] rule for patent cases, which would then bring the issue within the Federal Circuit's realm of authority. That approach would not change the outcome. If the question is one of Federal Circuit law, the Federal Circuit has not set forth a clear rule, and the Court finds the Ninth Circuit's interpretation of Mercoid persuasive absent more recent Supreme Court precedent altering the rule set forth in that case. The Court acknowledges, however, that there is a split of authority on the issue. See Def.'s Supp'l Br. at 13-14 (collecting cases from outside the Ninth Circuit holding that antitrust claims are or can be compulsory counterclaims in infringement actions).

1988) (emphasis added; citation omitted); see also Reply at 16 (quoting Robi). Or, as phrased in the Restatement of Judgment, the doctrine applies "[w]hen an issue of fact or law is actually litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment, and the determination is essential to the judgment." Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27 (emphasis added).

The judgment in Cave I reads as follows:

> The [*28] issues in this action having been tried and the jury having rendered a verdict in favor of Plaintiff and against Defendant (Docket Item No. 366);
> IT IS HEREBY ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED that judgment is entered in favor of Plaintiff. The Clerk shall close this file.

Cave I dkt. 370 (April 6, 2015). The jury's verdict form indicates that judgment was entered on the basis that OptumInsight infringed CCGroup's patent and CCGroup did not infringe OptumInsight's '079 patent. Cave I dkt. 366 (April 3, 2015).

There is no question that at least one question of the Seare patents' validity—whether the Aetna RFP response constituted invalidating prior art—was "actually litigated and determined" in Cave I by OptumInsight's motion for summary judgment and Judge Davila's order granting that motion. See *Cave I, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21514, 2015 WL 740379, at 12-13. That determination was not, however, necessary to the judgment, which was in CCGroup's favor because the jury determined that CCGroup did not infringe the only remaining Seare patent. A hypothetical illustration in an official comment to the Restatement is directly on point:

> HN13[] A, as owner of a trademark, brings an action against B for infringement. B denies the validity of the trademark and denies infringement. [*29] The court finds that the trademark is valid, but that B had not infringed it, and gives judgment for B. Thereafter A brings an action against B alleging that since the rendition of the judgment B infringed the trademark. B is not precluded from defending this action on the ground that the trademark is invalid.

Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27, comment h, illustration 14. One court has cited this example approvingly in the context of both trademark and patent infringement cases, although it reached the opposite result because, unlike in this case and the Restatement example, the same party had prevailed on both issues. See Zip Dee, Inc. v. Dometic Corp., 905 F. Supp. 535, 538 (N.D. Ill. 1995). The Federal Circuit has similarly held in a case where it upheld a non-infringement verdict that "the district court's resolution of the issue of invalidity was not necessary to the judgment," and "[fjor that reason, the court's invalidity ruling will have no collateral estoppel effect in any possible future dispute between the parties." Hill-Rom Co. v. Kinetic Concepts, Inc., 209 F.3d 1337, 1344 (Fed. Cir. 2000).[11]

Because the jury found no infringement, CCGroup—like "B" in the comment illustration—is not barred from litigating the issue of the Seare patents' invalidity. The Court need not determine the extent to which CCGroup's present assertion that the Seare patents were obtained through inequitable conduct overlaps with Judge Davila's decision regarding the Aetna RFP response, because that decision was ultimately not necessary to the judgment and thus lacks preclusive effect.[12]

[11] OptumInsight attempts to distinguish the trademark law at issue in the Restatement example from the patent law at issue here, but does not address Zip Dee or Hill-Rom, both of which involved patent claims. See Def.'s Supp'l Br. at 15. Moreover, the distinctions OptumInsight identifies between [*30] the two areas of law have no bearing on whether the non-invalidity of a patent is essential to a judgment of non-infringement.

[12] OptumInsight seeks to reserve its right to raise an issue preclusion defense if the non-infringement verdict in Cave I is altered as a result of post-judgment motions or an appeal. Def.'s Supp'l Br. at 16. The Court expresses no opinion on the potential effect of such a contingency at this time.

OptumInsight suggests for the first time in its supplemental brief that the determination was in fact relevant to the judgment, because CCGroup's prayer for relief in Cave I sought declarations of invalidity, and CCGroup received no such declaration in the judgment. Def.'s Supp'l Br. at 15-16. The judgment [*31] actually entered, however, is simply "in favor of Plaintiff'—CCGroup—with no reference to CCGroup's failure to prevail on its invalidity argument. See Cave I dkt. 370. OptumInsight cites no authority for the proposition that Hill-Rom and the Restatement example above do not apply if the non-infringing party's prayer for relief sought a declaration of invalidity. Because the judgment in Cave I includes no reference to the request for declaratory relief, the Court is not persuaded that the inclusion of that request in CCGroup's Cave I complaint alters the analysis above.

4. Reasonable Litigant Standard

As discussed in more detail below, certain claims in this case may require CCGroup to prove that "no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits." See Prof'l Real Estate Inv'rs, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Indus., Inc., 508 U.S. 49, 60, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1993) (hereinafter, "PRE"). OptumInsight asserts that it need not establish any formal preclusion doctrine as to those claims, because the very fact that it litigated the '079 patent to trial without that patent being found invalid demonstrates the reasonableness of the claim.[13] This argument has appeal—if, as CCGroup now alleges, the inequitable conduct underlying the Seare patents was so clear that OptumInsight's attorneys must have [*32] known they could not succeed, it is odd that CCGroup would have declined to vigorously raise that argument in Cave I. Absent any formal preclusion doctrine, however, CCGroup was not required to do so. The Court cannot assume that the judge and jury in Cave I were made aware of all the facts OptumInsight's lawyers allegedly knew when they filed their infringement claims, and thus cannot now conclude at the pleading stage that OptumInsight's decision to bring those claims was reasonable as a matter of law. The Court declines to speculate as to CCGroup's litigation tactics in the previous case. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556 HN14[] ("[A] well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of those facts is improbable, and that a recovery is very remote and unlikely." (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)).

Because the Court does not find that CCGroup's failure to demonstrate invalidity of the Seare patents in Cave I [*33] has any preclusive effect—whether through claim preclusion, through the compulsory counterclaim doctrine, through issue preclusion, or as an inherent bar to meeting PRE's "no reasonable litigant" standard—the Court does not reach the parties' arguments as to whether one or two definitively non-frivolous counterclaims in Cave I (according to OptumInsight, counterclaims based on the Seare patents) would bar CCGroup from recovery based on other allegedly unreasonable counterclaims (i.e., those based on the Dang patents). See Mot. at 25-27.

C. Walker Process and Handgards Claims

HN15[] In 1965, the Supreme Court held in Walker Process that a patent obtained through fraud on the Patent Office can provide a basis for claims under the Sherman Act. See generally Walker Process, 382 U.S. 172, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247. The Federal Circuit more recently and succinctly summarized the standard for such a claim:

> Walker Process set forth two conditions for antitrust liability based on the fraudulent procurement of a patent. First, the plaintiff must show that the defendant procured the relevant patent by knowing and willful fraud on the PTO or (in the case of an assignee) that the defendant maintained and enforced the patent with knowledge of the fraudulent [*34] manner in which it was obtained. Second, the plaintiff must prove all the elements

[13] CCGroup's sham litigation argument is based solely on the validity and enforceability of OptumInsight's patents. CCGroup does not argue that, if the patents are valid and enforceable, OptumInsight could not make a good faith argument that CCGroup infringed the '079 patent.

> otherwise necessary to establish a Sherman Act monopolization charge. Walker Process, 382 U.S. at 174, 176-77, 86 S. Ct. 347; see also id. at 179, 86 S. Ct. 347 (Harlan, J., concurring). With the first condition, the Court made clear that the invalidity of the patent was not sufficient; a showing of intentional fraud in its procurement was required. Id. at 176-77, 86 S. Ct. 347; id. at 179, 86 S. Ct. 347 (Harlan, J., concurring). With the second condition, the Court incorporated the rules of antitrust law generally. As Justice Harlan stated in his concurring opinion, "as to this class of improper patent monopolies, antitrust remedies should be allowed room for full play." Id. at 180, 86 S. Ct. 347 (Harlan, J., concurring).

The Ninth Circuit recognized a related basis for liability in Handgards, 601 F.2d 986. Handgards itself was "not a Walker Process case" because the plaintiff did "not contend that [the defendant] sought to enforce a fraudulently-procured patent," and instead argued that the defendant "prosecuted infringement actions in bad faith, that is, with knowledge that the patents, though lawfully-obtained, were invalid." Id. at 994. HN16[] Inspired by Walker Process, the Ninth Circuit held that a plaintiff could pursue antitrust remedies for bad faith infringement actions—even if not [*35] based on fraud on the patent office—so long as the jury is "instructed that a patentee's infringement suit is presumptively in good faith and that this presumption can be rebutted only by clear and convincing evidence." Id. at 996.

As illustrated in Handgards itself, not all Handgards claims are also Walker Process claims: a Handgards claim can be based on bad faith litigation to enforce a patent known to be invalid for reasons other than fraud on the USPTO. Conversely, not all Walker Process claims arise from bad faith litigation: "enforcement actions are not a sine qua non of monopolizing by patent fraud." Brunswick Corp. v. Riegel Textile Corp., 752 F.2d 261, 265 (7th Cir. 1984). Here, however, both parties' arguments address only a theory of monopolization through infringement actions brought in bad faith because OptumInsight allegedly knew that its patents were fraudulently obtained—thus basing both claims on the same operative facts. See generally Mot.; Opp'n; Reply. The Court follows the parties' lead and consolidates the two tests for the purpose of the present motion.

As discussed below, the Court holds that CCGroup's First Amended Complaint fails to adequately plead the specific claims of the patents at issue that are implicated by the alleged misconduct. [*36] Because it is possible for that defect to be cured by amendment, the Court DISMISSES both of CCGroup's antitrust claims with leave to amend.

1. Inequitable Conduct

HN17[] The heightened pleading standard of Rule 9(b) applies to allegations of inequitable conduct, and Federal Circuit law governs "the question of whether inequitable conduct has been pleaded with particularity under Rule 9(b)." Exergen, 575 F.3d at 1326. "[I]n pleading inequitable conduct in patent cases, Rule 9(b) requires identification of the specific who, what, when, where, and how of the material misrepresentation or omission committed before the PTO," rather than "simply aver[] the substantive elements of inequitable conduct." Id. at 1326-27. Those elements are that an individual associated with prosecuting a patent application (1) "made an affirmative misrepresentation of a material fact, failed to disclose material information, or submitted false material information; and (2) . . . did so with a specific intent to deceive the PTO." Id. at 1327 n.3.[14]

[14] The Federal Circuit previously held that "inequitable conduct is a broader, more inclusive concept than the common law fraud needed to support a Walker Process counterclaim." Nobelpharma AB v. Implant Innovations, Inc., 141 F.3d 1059, 1069 (Fed. Cir. 1998). Since then, the Federal Circuit has narrowed if not closed the gap between basic inequitable [*37] conduct and Walker Process fraud, by setting forth a stringent pleading standard for inequitable conduct in Exergen and a stringent standard for success on the merits in Therasense, Inc. v. Becton, Dickinson & Co., 649 F.3d 1276 (Fed. Cir. 2011) (en banc). Both parties appear to agree that Exergen and Therasense govern CCGroup's Walker Process claim. See Mot. at 16-17; Opp'n at 9-11. For the purpose of this Order, the Court assumes without deciding that Exergen and Therasense have effectively harmonized the standards for Walker Process fraud and other assertions of inequitable conduct. See Cornucopia Prods., LLC v. Dyson, Inc., 881 F. Supp. 2d 1086, 1099 n.4 (D. Ariz. 2012) ("Therasense, however, raised inequitable conduct to match the standard for Walker

"Moreover, HN18[] although 'knowledge' and 'intent' may be averred generally, a pleading of inequitable conduct under Rule 9(b) must include sufficient allegations of underlying facts from which a court may reasonably infer that a specific individual (1) knew of the withheld material information or of the falsity of the material misrepresentation, and (2) withheld or misrepresented [*38] this information with a specific intent to deceive the PTO." Id. at 1328-29. "A reasonable inference is one that is plausible and that flows logically from the facts alleged, including any objective indications of candor and good faith." Id. at 1329 n.5. At the pleading stage, it need not be "the single most reasonable inference able to be drawn"—unlike on the merits, where a "clear and convincing evidence" standard applies to inequitable conduct claims. Id. (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

OptumInsight's Motion erroneously relies a "most reasonable inference" standard for intent to deceive the USPTO, based on the Federal Circuit's decision in Therasense. Mot. at 16. HN19[] In context, however, that standard applies to evaluating "indirect and circumstantial evidence' of deception—i.e., a judgment on the merits. Therasense, Inc. v. Becton, Dickinson & Co., 649 F.3d 1276, 1290 (Fed. Cir. 2011) (en banc) (emphasis added) (considering an appeal from a bench trial). "Although Therasense raised the bar for proving inequitable conduct on the merits, it did not change the [Exergen] standard for pleading inequitable conduct." *Nalco Co. v. Turner Designs, Inc., No. 13-CV-02727 NC, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21362, 2014 WL 645365, at 3 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 19, 2014) (citing, e.g., Delano Farms Co. v. Cal. Table Grape Comm 'n, 655 F.3d 1337, 1350 (Fed. Cir. 2011)).

The only challenge that OptumInsight brings regarding CCGroup's Rule 9(b) "who, what, when, where, and how" pleading is that CCGroup has failed to allege which [*39] specific claims and limitations of the '897 patent were unpatentable due to having allegedly been conceived before the offer to sell to Aetna. See Mot. at 23. In Exergen, the Federal Circuit held insufficient a pleading which "fails to identify which claims, and which limitations in those claims, the withheld references are relevant to, and where in those references the material information is found—i.e., the "what" and "where" of the material omissions." Exergen, 575 F.3d at 1329. CCGroup's First Amended Complaint includes broad allegations that disclosing the RFP response during the initial application "would have rendered the claims of the '897 patent unpatentable," and that materials withheld during the reexamination "were material to the patentability of the '897 patent and all of the other patents that ultimately issued from the original application for the '897 patent." FAC ¶¶ 50-51, 67. Other than the conclusory assertion that "the claims are all related" and therefore all unenforceable, see id. ¶ 113, the First Amended Complaint does not specify which claims were implicated by the various materials withheld from the USPTO during the application, reexamination, and/or interference proceedings. CCGroup's Opposition lists a number of specific [*40] claims for several of the documents at issue, Opp'n at 12, but assertions in a brief cannot replace necessary allegations absent from pleading.[15] The Court therefore DISMISSES CCGroup's Walker Process and Handgards claims with leave to amend.

OptumInsight also argues that CCGroup has not adequately alleged intent to deceive the USPTO regarding the '897 patent because such intent is not the "single most reasonable inference" arising from the allegations. [*41] Mot. at 24. As previously discussed, that is not the correct standard at the pleading stage. CCGroup alleges that Dang and Rosenbaum failed to disclose to the USPTO an offer to sell the same invention that they sought to patent, which would have rendered their claims unpatentable. FAC ¶¶ 49-51. During the reexamination, they and others submitted false declarations asserting a later conception date, despite Dang's sworn litigation testimony that he conceived the invention in 1993. Id. ¶¶ 48(2)-51(2), 62-64. Their contemporary communications revealed that Process claims based on omission."); but see *Nalco Co. v. Turner Designs, Inc., No. 13-CV-02727 NC, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21362, 2014 WL 645365, at 6 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 19, 2014) (acknowledging that the Therasense inequitable conduct standard is "arguably" identical to Walker Process fraud, but nevertheless maintaining a formal distinction between the two).

[15] CCGroup suggests that it is excused from the requirement to plead specific patent claims and limitations because the false affidavits were allegedly per se material to the uSPTO's decision. Opp'n at 12-13. The case it cites for that proposition does not state such a rule, and in fact discusses the individual patent claim specifically cited in the pleading at issue. See *Spectrum Pharms., Inc., v. Sandoz Inc., No. 2:12-CV-00111-GMN, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140783, 2013 WL 5492667, at 3 (D. Nev. Sept. 30, 2013) ("Specifically, Defendant alleges that the prosecuting attorney routinely certified to the USPTO that the claim that ultimately issued as claim 13 was a dependent claim . . . ."). Absent authority to the contrary, the Court follows the requirements set by the Federal Circuit in Exergen, even where CCGroup asserts per se materiality.

they intended to deceive the USPTO regarding the conception date. Id. ¶ 68. Taking those and other factual allegations as true and drawing reasonable inferences in CCGroup's favor for the limited purpose of resolving a challenge to the pleadings, the Court finds that Dang's and Rosenbaum's specific intent to defraud the USPTO "is plausible and . . . flows logically from the facts alleged." See [Exergen, 575 F.3d at 1329 n.5].

2. Knowledge of Fraud During Enforcement of Patent

The parties dispute whether OptumInsight should be treated as an assignee, and thus whether CCGroup must plausibly allege that OptumInsight "maintained and enforced the patent with knowledge of [*42] the fraudulent manner in which it was [allegedly] obtained." See [Ritz Camera, 700 F.3d at 506]. CCGroup argues that because OptumInsight acquired Symmetry, OptumInsight should be treated as the original patent holder and not subject to that requirement. Opp'n at 14-18. Because CCGroup has not adequately alleged inequitable conduct, the present Order does not reach this issue.

3. Noerr-Pennington

To base liability on OptumInsight's infringement claims, CCGroup must establish that OptumInsight's claims fall outside the scope the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, which otherwise immunizes efforts to petition government—including the courts—based on the [First Amendment]. Walker Process is itself an exception to Noerr. [Nobelpharma, 141 F.3d at 1071].

A separate exception is the "sham litigation" rule. HN20[] In PRE, the Supreme Court set forth the standard required for a plaintiff to establish sham litigation:

> We now outline a two-part definition of "sham" litigation. First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. If an objective litigant could conclude that the suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, the suit is immunized under Noerr, and an antitrust claim premised on the [*43] sham exception must fail.
> Only if challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation. Under this second part of our definition of sham, the court should focus on whether the baseless lawsuit conceals "an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor," [[E. R.R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 144, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961)]] (emphasis added), through the "use [of] the governmental process—as opposed to the outcome of that process—as an anticompetitive weapon," [[City of Columbia v. Omni Outdoor Advertising, Inc., 499 U.S. 365, 380, 111 S. Ct. 1344, 113 L. Ed. 2d 382 (1991)]] (emphasis in original).
> HN21[] This two-tiered process requires the plaintiff to disprove the challenged lawsuit's legal viability before the court will entertain evidence of the suit's economic viability. Of course, even a plaintiff who defeats the defendant' s claim to Noerr immunity by demonstrating both the objective and the subjective components of a sham must still prove a substantive antitrust violation. Proof of a sham merely deprives the defendant of immunity; it does not relieve the plaintiff of the obligation to establish all other elements of his claim.

HN22[] According to the Federal Circuit:

> PRE and Walker Process provide alternative legal grounds on which a patentee may be stripped of its [*44] immunity from the antitrust laws; both legal theories may be applied to the same conduct. Moreover, we need not find a way to merge these decisions. Each provides its own basis for depriving a patent owner of immunity from the antitrust laws; either or both may be applicable to a particular party's conduct in obtaining and enforcing a patent.

Nobelpharma, 141 F.3d at 1071.

CCGroup alleges that attorneys representing OptumInsight in litigation and USPTO proceedings received or knew of "source code, briefing, sworn testimony, and interrogatory responses proving that Dang conceived of his ['897 patent] invention in September of 1993." E.g., FAC ¶ 110. Without the missing allegations discussed above regarding which specific claims and limitations the allegedly incriminating documents pertained to, the Court cannot determine whether it is plausible that the patents were obtained through fraud, much less whether it is plausible that the attorneys knew of the fraud or knew that no reasonable litigant could expect success on their infringement claims. Pending amendment, the Court declines to further address whether CCGroup's knowledge allegations are sufficient to meet the Walker Process and/or PRE exceptions to Noerr.

4. Antitrust [*45] Elements

HN23[] A Walker Process plaintiff must also establish "all the elements otherwise necessary to establish a Sherman Act monopolization charge," based on "the rules of antitrust law generally." Ritz Camera, 700 F.3d at 506.

OptumInsight's only argument pertaining to antitrust law and not specific to patent doctrines or knowledge of sham litigation is that "[a]ntitrust liability is ordinarily based on the filing of an abusive lawsuit as a whole, not merely individual claims, much less claims asserted as counterclaims," and that CCGroup "must establish harm beyond that caused by assertion of the Seare patent already ruled to be valid." Mot. at 25 (capitalization altered; quoting in part from a heading). As discussed above, the Court holds that Cave I lacks preclusive effect as to the validity of either Seare patent. However, as also discussed above, the Court cannot determine which if any of OptumInsight's infringement claims were plausibly baseless unless and until CCGroup provides more specific allegations regarding the claims implicated by the allegedly incriminating materials withheld from the USPTO. The Court declines at this time to decide what effect one or more non-frivolous infringement counterclaims would have on [*46] CCGroup's ability to recover here.

OptumInsight suggests in a footnote that counterclaims, even those allegedly brought in bad faith, can never form a basis for antitrust liability. Mot. at 31 n.7. The case that it cites does not stand for that proposition. Instead, the Seventh Circuit held that "simply defending oneself in a proceeding brought by another"—in that case, a patent interference proceeding provoked by the antitrust plaintiff—is not actionable. Brunswick Corp. v. Riegel Textile Corp., 752 F.2d 261, 271-72 (7th Cir. 1984). Here, OptumInsight did not "simply defend [it]self," but instead affirmatively asserted counterclaims for infringement. The Court declines to hold that, assuming all other Walker Process and Handgards elements are satisfied, a dominant market participant (OptumInsight) can assert allegedly frivolous counterclaims with impunity merely because a competitor (CCGroup) chose to file a non-frivolous lawsuit against it—particularly where, as here, the competitor's lawsuit has proven meritorious. Moreover, CCGroup plausibly alleges that OptumInsight's earlier filed-but-not-served Minnesota lawsuit caused CCGroup competitive harm by sowing doubt among its customers as to whether its products infringed OptumInsight's patents. See FAC ¶¶ 132-34.

D. [*47] Lanham Act Claim

HN24[] Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act prohibits any "false or misleading description [or] representation of fact, which . . . in commercial advertising or promotion, misrepresents the nature, characteristics, qualities, or geographic origin of . . . goods services, or commercial activities." 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a). "[B]efore a patentee may be held liable under § 43(a) for marketplace activity in support of its patent, and thus be deprived of the right to make statements about potential infringement of its patent, the marketplace activity must have been undertaken in bad faith." Zenith Electronics Corp. v. Exzec, Inc., 182 F.3d 1340, 1353 (Fed. Cir. 1999). "Obviously, if the patentee knows that the patent is invalid, unenforceable, or not infringed, yet represents to the marketplace that a competitor is infringing the patent, a clear case of bad faith representations is made out." Id. CCGroup asserts that OptumInsight engaged in such conduct by representing that its products were "patented," or in one instance by representing that they were covered by the '897 and '511 patents, when in fact OptumInsight allegedly knew "that the Dang and Seare patents are invalid and unenforceable." FAC ¶¶ 195-96.

OptumInsight correctly observes that HN25[] a mere claim that a product is "patented" is not false or misleading unless no patent [*48] covers the product, which CCGroup has not explicitly alleged. Mot. at 28. Further, and also encompassing OptumInsight's more specific representation regarding the '897 and '511 patents, CCGroup must allege the claims and limitations rendered invalid or unenforceable to satisfy the Exergen pleading standard discussed above. Both of these deficiencies could be cured by amendment. The Lanham Act claim is therefore DISMISSED with leave to amend.[16]

E. Malicious Prosecution Claim

CCGroup's final claim asserts malicious [*49] prosecution under California common law, alleging that "OptumInsight knew or had reason to know that the patents at issue in the patent infringement litigation were invalid and unenforceable," and that OptumInsight therefore "acted without probable cause in initiating and/or continuing its claims for patent infringement against CCGroup." FAC ¶¶ 206-07. For the reasons discussed above, CCGroup has not adequately alleged which claims and limitations of the patents at issue were invalid and/or unenforceable under the Exergen standard. Further, HN26[] at least one California appellate court has held "that a civil action for malicious prosecution will not lie while an appeal in the underlying action is pending." Friedman v. Stadum, 171 Cal. App. 3d 775, 778-79, 217 Cal. Rptr. 585 (1985). The same reasoning applies to the post-judgment motions pending in Cave I. CCGroup is correct, however, that all of OptumInsight's infringement claims in that case were dismissed with prejudice except for the '079 patent.

The malicious prosecution claim is therefore DISMISSED for failure to plausibly allege bad faith based on patent invalidity and unenforceability. CCGroup may amend this claim if it can meet the pleading standard set forth in Exergen with respect to its underlying allegations of [*50] invalidity or unenforceability, except that CCGroup may not claim malicious prosecution of the '079 patent while post-judgment motions or any subsequent appeal remain pending in Cave I.

F. Attorneys' Fees as Damages

OptumInsight argues that CCGroup cannot seek attorneys' fees from Cave I as damages because it withdrew a motion for attorneys' fees in that case. Mot. at 29-30. OptumInsight cites the Ninth Circuit's decision in Port of Stockton v. Western Bulk Carrier KS, 371 F.3d 1119, 1120 (9th Cir. 2004) for the proposition that a party who fails to bring a timely motion for attorneys' fees in one case cannot bring a second case to recover fees from the first case. See id.

The Port of Stockton decision rests on Rule 54 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides that "'[c]laims for attorneys' fees and related nontaxable expenses shall be made by motion unless the substantive law governing the action provides for the recovery of such fees as an element of damages to be proved at trial.'" Port of Stockton, 371 F.3d at 1120-21 (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d)(2)(A)) (emphasis added; emphasis in original omitted). The Ninth Circuit specifically considered whether "Rule 54's 'substantive law' exception" applied to the contract claims at issue, and held that it did not. Id. at 1121.

[16] OptumInsight also argues for the first time in its Reply that Zenith only recognized Lanham Act liability for two categories of misrepresentations related to patents: "(1) that a specific party infringes specific patents, and (2) that a specific party cannot manufacture a noninfringing product." Reply at 18. Although those were the two types of statements specifically considered in Zenith, there is no indication that the holding was limited to only those categories, and OptumInsight does not identify any authority endorsing that narrow reading of the case. The Court concludes that Zenith does not restrict Lanham Act claims based on misrepresentation of patents except to require a showing of bad faith.

In contrast, HN27[] it is well established that antitrust plaintiffs bringing claims that previous litigation constituted unlawful [*51] anticompetitive conduct can recover the cost of their defense in that litigation as damages. See, e.g., Handgards, 601 F.2d at 997 ("In a suit alleging antitrust injury based upon a bad faith prosecution theory it is obvious that the costs incurred in defense of the prior patent infringement suit are an injury which 'flows' from the antitrust wrong."); Hynix Semiconductor Inc. v. Rambus, Inc., 527 F. Supp. 2d 1084, 1088 ("The Manufacturers are entitled to a jury on their antitrust claim because their patent litigation attorneys' fees are cognizable damages where the patent litigation itself was part of an unlawful scheme."). Under such circumstances, attorneys' fees fall within the "substantive law exception" to Rule 54 because the prior litigation itself constituted prohibited conduct, and fees thus may be recovered as damages in a subsequent action.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, each claim of the First Amended Complaint is DISMISSED with leave to amend. CCGroup may file a Second Amended Complaint no later than May 13, 2016.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

ORDER DENYING MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION

Zaremba Family Farms, Zaremba [*2] Group, and Walter Zaremba (collectively Zarembas) filed this motion for reconsideration of the order denying their prior motion for reconsideration. (ECF No. 506.)

In their counterclaims, the Zarembas allege Encana and Chesapeake colluded with each other in violation of the Sherman Act. The Zarembas and Encana filed cross-motions for summary judgment on the antitrust counterclaim. On October 16, 2015, this Court granted Encana's motion and denied the Zarembas' motion, concluding that the evidence in the record established that the two companies were negotiating an agreement, that the two companies tried to reach an agreement, but ultimately did not reach any agreement, at least through mid-July 2010. (ECF No. 462.) Convinced that the Court did not properly interpret the evidence, and convinced that the Court erred in its application of antitrust law, the Zarembas filed a motion for reconsideration of the denial of its motion for summary judgment. (ECF No. 486.) The Zarembas identified specific legal and factual conclusions in the opinion resolving the motions for summary judgment, and explained why they felt the Court erred. The Court carefully considered their arguments, but ultimately [*3] denied the motion for reconsideration. (ECF No. 503.)

In this new motion for reconsideration, the Zarembas are simply reasserting the same arguments and relying on the same evidence that the Court previously considered in the cross motions for summary judgment and in the prior motion for reconsideration. A motion for reconsideration will be denied where the issues raised by the moving party have already been raised and ruled upon by the court, either expressly or by reasonable implication. Estate of Graham v. County of Washtenaw, 358 F.3d 377, 385 (6th Cir. 2004). To the extent this new motion for reconsideration identifies new alleged errors in the summary judgment opinion, the arguments are improper because they should have been raised in the prior motion for reconsideration. A motion for reconsideration is not an opportunity to present new arguments that could have been presented before the court issued its ruling, but an opportunity for the court to reconsider those arguments already presented. Sault Ste. Marie Tribe of Chippewa Indians v. Engler, 146 F.3d 367, 374 (6th Cir. 1998).

For these reasons, the motion for reconsideration (ECF No. 506) is DENIED. IT IS SO ORDERED.

ORDER

This cause comes before the Court on Defendant Ford Motor Company's ("Ford") Motion to Dismiss (Doc. No. 9), to which Plaintiff SilverHorse Racing, LLC ("SHR") responded in opposition, (Doc. No. 12). For the reasons [*2] that follow, the Court will deny Ford's motion to dismiss.

I. BACKGROUND

SHR brings this single-count action against Ford for tortious interference with business relationships. (Doc. No. 2 at p. 7). In 2004, motivated by his passion for Ford Mustangs, Joseph Marcello Canitano ("Canitano") established SHR as a business that specializes in customizing and manufacturing Ford Mustang aftermarket parts. (Id. ¶¶ 13-14). Canitano is the sole owner of SHR. (Id. ¶ 5). In 2008, Canitano moved his expanding business to a new facility and began developing relationships with nationwide dealers in Ford Mustang aftermarket parts. (Id. ¶ 15). From 2007-2008, SHR alleges that Ford Racing began to use some of SHR's parts on Ford Racing vehicles.[1] (Id. ¶ 17-18). In February 2010, SHR and Ford had a close relationship and began negotiations for SHR to directly produce its parts as a factory-installed option for Ford Mustangs. (Id. ¶ 19). Unfortunately, SHR could not pursue the opportunity due to a lack of financial resources. (Id.) However, SHR continued to manufacture its aftermarket parts for Ford vehicles. (Id.)

SHR's ongoing relationship with Ford ended abruptly on April 3, 2013, when SHR received a cease-and-desist [*3] letter from Ford. (Id. ¶ 24). The cease-and-desist letter warned SHR that it was using Ford's trademarks on SHR's products and in SHR's advertisements without Ford's authorization. (Id. ¶ 25). Additionally, Ford demanded a royalty for all of SHR's products embellished with one of Ford's trademarks—a unique design utilizing the letters "GT," where the top of the G connects with the top of the T. (Id. ¶ 29, see Ex. B). SHR alleges that throughout 2014, Ford "embarked on a campaign to contact all retailers and distributors of SHR products and advise them that SHR products engraved with the initials GT were 'counterfeit goods' and subject to criminal forfeiture and/or criminal prosecution." (Id. ¶ 31). Many of SHR's dealers and distributors refused to accept additional products from SHR. (Id. ¶ 32). Thereafter, SHR brought this lawsuit alleging that Ford intentionally interfered with SHR's relationships with its retailers and distributors. (Id. ¶ 42). On January 25, 2016, Ford filed a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss SHR's Complaint arguing that Ford is immune from liability under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. (Doc. No. 9).

II. LEGAL STANDARD

For purposes of deciding a motion to dismiss for failure to [*4] state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6), the Court accepts as true the factual allegations in the complaint and draws all reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 705 (11th Cir. 2010). "Generally, under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a complaint need only contain 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'" Id. (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2)). However, the plaintiff's complaint must provide "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). Thus, the Court is not required to accept as true a legal conclusion merely because it is labeled a "factual allegation" in the complaint; it must also meet the threshold inquiry of facial plausibility. Id.

III. ANALYSIS

Ford moves to dismiss SHR's Complaint on the grounds that Ford is entitled to immunity from suit under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, which is in part derived from the First Amendment right to petition. (Doc. No. 9 at p. 2). SHR disputes the applicability of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine outside of the antitrust [*5] context where it was first developed. (Doc. No. 12 at p. 5). Even if the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is applicable, SHR argues that the "sham exception" applies and abrogates Ford's immunity. (Id. at p. 15).

[1] The identity of Ford Racing and its relationship to Ford is unclear from the Complaint. Plaintiff begins mentioning Ford Racing without an introduction in Paragraph 17 of the Complaint and mentions it throughout.

The Noerr-Pennington doctrine was first recognized in the "context of concerted petitions for anti-competitive legislation." Primetime 24 Joint Venture v. Nat'l Broad., Co., 219 F.3d 92, 99-100 (2d Cir. 2000). The landmark cases, Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr-Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961) and United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965), establish that "[j]oint efforts to influence public officials do not violate the antitrust laws even though intended to eliminate competition." McGuire Oil Co. v. Mapco, Inc., 958 F.2d 1552, 1558 (11th Cir. 1992). The Noerr-Pennington doctrine was later "extended to immunize from antitrust liability attempts to influence adjudicative bodies." Id. (citing Cal. Motor Transp. Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 92 S. Ct. 609, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642 (1980)). The Supreme Court has emphasized the First Amendment interests inherent in the doctrine, stating that "it would be destructive of rights of association and petition to hold that groups with common interests may not, without violating antitrust laws, use the channels and procedures of state and federal agencies and courts to advocate their causes . . . ." Cal. Motor Transp. Co., 404 U.S. at 510-511.

A number of court decisions expand the scope of Noerr-Pennington immunity by applying it in areas outside of antitrust law. While the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals has not addressed the applicability of Noerr-Pennington in [*6] other contexts, the Supreme Court has applied the doctrine outside of the antitrust context in a few instances. See N.A.A.C.P. v. Claiborne Hardware, 458 U.S. 886, 102 S. Ct. 3409, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1215 (1982) (granting first amendment immunity to a nonviolent business boycott seeking to vindicate economic equal rights); see also, Bill Johnson's Restaurants Inc v. N.L.R.B., 461 U.S. 731, 742-43, 103 S. Ct. 2161, 76 L. Ed. 2d 277 (1983) (immunizing employer's lawsuit from NLRB injunction under the right to petition). In BE & K Constr. Co. v. N.L.R.B., the Supreme Court reasoned that the principles of statutory construction embodied in the Noerr-Pennington doctrine apply in other statutory contexts, and the Court concluded that the National Labor Relations Act does not impose liability on an employer for unsuccessful prosecution of lawsuits that were brought for the purpose of retaliating against workers, but were not objectively baseless. 536 U.S. 516, 527, 122 S. Ct. 2390, 2397, 153 L. Ed. 2d 499 (2002).

There is a clear trend among the circuit courts to extend Noerr-Pennington immunity to other areas of law where the purposes of the First Amendment right to petition are implicated. See Venetian Casino Resort, L.L.C. v. N.L.R.B., 793 F.3d 85, 87, 417 U.S. App. D.C. 85 (D.C. Cir. 2015) (applying Noerr-Pennington to NLRA claim, stating "employer conduct that would otherwise be illegal may be 'protected by the First Amendment when it is part of a direct petition to government."); see also, Content Extraction and Transmission LLC v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 776 F.3d 1343 (Fed. Cir. 2014) (applying Noerr-Pennington to claims for tortious interference and RICO violations); Sosa v. DIRECTV, Inc., 437 F.3d 923 (9th Cir. 2006) ("In light [*7] of BE & K's application of Noerr-Pennington to the NLRA, we conclude that the Noerr-Pennington doctrine stands for a generic rule of statutory construction, applicable to any statutory interpretation that could implicate the rights protected by the Petition Clause."); IGEN Intern., Inc. v. Roche Diagnostics, GmbH, 335 F.3d 303 (4th Cir. 2003) (applying Noerr-Pennington doctrine to claims for tortious unfair competition and breach of contract); Cheminor Drugs, Ltd. v. Ethyl Corp., 168 F.3d 119, 128 (3d Cir. 1999) (extending Noerr-Pennington immunity to state tort claims based on the same petitioning activity as federal antitrust claims); Hufsmith v. Weaver, 817 F.2d 455 (8th Cir. 1987) (applying Noerr-Pennington to a claim for tortious interference with contract); Havoco of Am., Ltd. v. Hollobow, 702 F.2d 643, 649-650 (7th Cir. 1983) (Noerr-Pennington "has been applied to protect the First Amendment right to petition against claims of tortious interference with business relationships.").

District courts in the Eleventh Circuit have rarely addressed Noerr-Pennington outside of the antitrust context. However, the majority of the district courts that have addressed the issue have applied Noerr-Pennington in non-antitrust cases. *See Rolex Watch U.S.A, Inc. v. Rainbow Jewelry, Inc., No. 12-21437-CIV, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 133791, 2012 WL 4138028, at 3 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 19, 2012) (applying Noerr-Pennington to unfair trade practices claim); *Atico Int'l USA, Inc. v. Luv N' Care, Ltd., No. 09-60397-CIV, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73540, 2009 WL 2589148, at 2 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 19, 2009) (applying Noerr-Pennington to tortious interference claim); Lynn v. Amoco

Oil Co., 459 F. Supp. 2d 1175, 1189-90 (M.D. Ala. 2006) [*8] ("Although the Noerr-Pennington doctrine applies to antitrust conspiracies, the principles of law on which it is based are not restricted to the field of antitrust.").[2]

Not surprisingly, SHR relies on the lone circuit court decision not extending Noerr-Pennington immunity to matters outside of the antitrust context. In Cardtoons, L.C. v. Major League Baseball Players Ass'n, the Tenth Circuit held that it was not appropriate to apply Noerr-Pennington to a tortious interference claim because the doctrine was limited to the antitrust area. 208 F.3d 885, 892 (10th Cir. 2000). However, in a decision eight years later, the Tenth Circuit has been favorable to applying Noerr-Pennington immunity outside the realm of antitrust because of the doctrine's roots in the right to petition:

> Rather, in non-antitrust cases, immunity derives solely from the First Amendment right to petition. Id. Thus, as we determined in Scott, we apply Noerr-Pennington immunity to cases outside the antitrust context with caution. Scott, 216 F.3d at 914.Yet, as we acknowledged in Cardtoons, L.C., 208 F.3d at 889, and Scott, 216 F.3d at 914, numerous federal and state courts have applied Noerr-Pennington-like immunity to state tort claims. Imposing tortious interference liability pursuant to state law could very well impinge a defendant's First Amendment rights to petition the government for redress. See Scott, 216 F.3d at 914 ("'[I]t is hard to see any reason [*9] why, as an abstract matter, . . . common law torts . . . might not in some of their applications be found to violate the First Amendment.'" (quoting Whelan v. Abell, 48 F.3d 1247, 1254, 310 U.S. App. D.C. 396 (D.C. Cir. 1995))). Accordingly, ProLease was entitled to plead and prove that it was immune from liability under the First Amendment for its tortious interference.

Pers. Dep't, Inc. v. Prof'l Staff Leasing Corp., 297 Fed. Appx. 773, 778-79 (10th Cir. 2008).

This Court finds persuasive the decisions of the abovementioned majority of circuit courts extending Noerr-Pennington immunity outside of the antitrust context when the First Amendment right to petition is implicated. "[T]he distinction between antitrust and non-antitrust cases is not relevant to the Noerr-Pennington analysis, given the Supreme Court's focus on the First Amendment right to petition, rather than a statutory construction of the Sherman Act." Select Comfort Corp. v. Sleep Better Store, LLC, 838 F. Supp. 2d 889, 898 (D. Minn. 2012) (citing Cal. Motor Transp. Co., 404 U.S. 508, 92 S. Ct. 609, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642)). Therefore, upon a proper showing, Ford may be entitled to such immunity.

Now that the Court has determined that an analogous Noerr-Pennington immunity applies outside of the antitrust context, the Court must determine whether Ford's conduct, as alleged by SHR, is protected under it at the motion to dismiss stage. SHR's tortious interference claim is based on Ford's actions of sending a cease-and-desist letter to SHR due to SHR's use of Ford's registered trademarks, and Ford's advising and threatening [*10] SHR's retailers and distributors. (See Doc. No. 2). A number of circuit courts, including the Eleventh Circuit, have expressly extended Noerr-Pennington immunity to threats of litigation and pre-litigative activity, including sending cease-and-desist letters and publicity campaigns aimed at protecting intellectual property rights. See McGuire Oil Co., 958 F.2d at 1560; see also, Coastal States Mktg., 694 F.2d at 1367 ("[I]t would be absurd to hold that it does not protect those acts reasonably and normally attendant upon effective litigation. The litigator should not be protected only when he strikes without warning."); In re IBP Confidential Bus. Documents Litig., 755 F.2d 1300, 1310 (8th Cir.1985) ("The right to petition means more than simply the right to communicate directly with the government, [therefore] protection under the doctrine necessarily includes those activities reasonably and normally attendant to effective petitioning.") (internal quotation marks omitted)); *PODS Enters. v. ABF Freight Sys., No. 8:11-cv-84-T-33MAP, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119657, 2011 WL 4948397, at 5 (M.D. Fla. Oct. 17, 2011) ("[P]re-litigative activity such as sending cease-and-desist letters is also immunized.").

[2] SHR cites to one Southern District of Florida case holding that Noerr-Pennington does not apply outside of antitrust law. *Slip-N-Slide Records, Inc. v. TVT Records, LLC, No. 05-21113-Civ-TORRES, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9014, 2007 WL 473273, at 6 (S.D. Fla. Feb. 8, 2007). However, that decision does not discuss the circuit court decisions in the area. The Court finds the above-cited circuit court decisions to be more persuasive.

At this stage in the litigation, the Court does not have enough information to hold as a matter of law that Ford's conduct is immunized. Certainly, a registered trademark owner enjoys immunity for sending a cease-and-desist [*11] letter before commencing litigation to enforce its valid trademark rights. See *PODS Enters., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119657, 2011 WL 4948397, at 5. However, SHR alleges that Ford engaged in more than merely sending a cease-and-desist letter. SHR alleges that Ford contacted SHR's dealers and distributors and advised them that all SHR products engraved with Ford's "GT" trademark were counterfeit goods subject to criminal forfeiture and criminal prosecution. (Doc. No. 2 ¶ 31). It remains to be determined whether Ford's contact with SHR's dealers and distributors and perceived threats of criminal prosecution is conduct "reasonably and normally attendant" to effective petitioning. See, Coastal States Mktg., 694 F.2d at 1367. It is plausible that Ford's conduct falls outside the realm of activities reasonably taken in anticipation of litigation. If so, the right to petition would not be implicated by Ford's actions. This determination is better suited for summary judgment with a more fully-developed record.

Additionally, SHR argues that the sham exception applies because Ford is engaging in "sham litigation." (Doc. No. 12 at p. 15). To abrogate Noerr-Pennington immunity as conduct attendant to a sham litigation, a litigant must establish "(1) the lawsuit [is] objectively baseless in the sense [*12] that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits; and (2) the party bringing the allegedly baseless suit did so with a subjective motivation . . . to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor." Andrx Pharms., Inc. v. Elan Corp., PLC, 421 F.3d 1227, 1234 (11th Cir. 2005). Litigation is not "objectively baseless" if there was probable cause to bring a lawsuit. Id. Thus, the plaintiff must "prove that the defendant lacked probable cause to institute an unsuccessful civil lawsuit and that the defendant pressed the action for an improper, malicious purpose." Prof'l Real Estate Inv'rs, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Indus., Inc., 508 U.S. 49, 62, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 1929, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1993). However, whether or not a lawsuit is a "sham" does not depend on a plaintiff's success on the merits of its trademark infringement claims. Select Comfort Corp. v. Sleep Better Store, LLC, 838 F. Supp. 2d 889, 894 (D. Minn. 2012) (citing BE & K Const. Co., 536 U.S. at 531-32 (stating that the doctrine "protect[s] petitioning whenever it is genuine, not simply when it triumphs.")).

As an initial matter, the Court need not determine whether the sham exception applies because it is unclear at this stage whether Ford's conduct constitutes pre-litigative activity necessary to invoke Noerr-Pennington immunity. Nonetheless, SHR alleges that Ford contacted and threatened SHR's retailers and distributors by misrepresenting to them that all of SHR's products bearing the letters "GT" are counterfeit, [*13] and Ford threatened them with criminal forfeiture and criminal prosecution. (Doc. No. 2 ¶¶ 31, 32, 42). However, Ford continued to purchase SHR's aftermarket parts even after issuing these warnings. (Id. ¶ 33). Additionally, SHR alleges that Ford's claims to the "GT" initials are "disingenuous and species" because Ford expressly disclaimed rights in the letters "GT" apart from Ford's unique design (how the mark is shown in the trademark application). (Id. ¶ 35, Ex. B). At this stage of the litigation, taking these allegations as true, the Court finds SHR's allegations sufficient under a notice pleading standard. Therefore, the Court concludes that, as alleged, Ford lacked an objective basis to threaten SHR's retailers and distributors with trading in counterfeit goods and criminal prosecution. This conduct could plausibly constitute "objectively baseless" threats sufficient for a tortious interference claim against Ford. Whether SHR can ultimately establish the application of the "sham litigation" exception to strip Ford of potential Noerr-Pennington immunity may be raised again at summary judgment or trial.

IV. CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, it is ordered as follows:

1. Defendant [*14] Ford Motor Company's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. No. 9), filed on January 25, 2016, is DENIED.

2. Defendant Ford Motor Company SHALL FILE an answer to Plaintiff's Complaint within fourteen days.

DONE and ORDERED in Chambers, in Orlando, Florida on April 27, 2016.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A motion to dismiss pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) operates to test the sufficiency of the complaint and permits dismissal of a complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. To show grounds for relief, Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) requires that the complaint contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

While Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 does not require detailed factual allegations, it demands more than an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation. Pleadings offering mere labels and conclusions or a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. In fact, in determining a motion to dismiss, courts are not bound to accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation. Further, factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN4[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. A claim is plausible where the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. Plausibility is not akin to a probability requirement, but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. Where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged—but it has not "shown"—that the pleader is entitled to relief, and the case shall be dismissed.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN5[] Standing, Requirements

Antitrust standing is a threshold, pleading-stage inquiry and when a complaint by its terms fails to establish this requirement it must be dismissed. as a matter of law—lest the antitrust laws become a treble-damages sword rather than the shield against competition-destroying conduct that Congress meant them to be. A district court decides whether a plaintiff has adequately pleaded antitrust standing by balancing five factors: (1) the causal connection between the antitrust violation and harm to the plaintiff and whether that harm was intended to be caused; (2) the nature of the plaintiff's alleged injury including the status of the plaintiff as consumer or competitor in the relevant market; (3) the directness or indirectness of the injury, and the related inquiry of whether the damages are speculative; (4) the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages; and (5) the existence of more direct victims of the alleged antitrust violation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN6[] Standing, Requirements

Standing in an antitrust case is more onerous than the conventional U.S. Const. art. III inquiry.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN7[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

An antitrust injury is an: (1) injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and (2) injury that the flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful. Because the purpose of the antitrust laws is to protect competition rather than competitors, a plaintiff must allege injury, not only to himself, but to a relevant market. Thus, failure to allege an anti-competitive impact on a relevant market amounts to a failure to allege an antitrust injury. This requirement means that one competitor may not use the antitrust laws to sue a rival merely for vigorous or intensified competition. Specifically, a plaintiff must put forth factual allegations plausibly suggesting that there has been an adverse effect on prices, output, or quality of good in the relevant market as a result of the challenged actions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN8[] Standing, Requirements

An antitrust plaintiff must show that (1) the alleged violation tended to reduce competition overall and (2) the plaintiff's injury was a consequence of the resulting diminished competition. This requires a demonstration, as a threshold matter, that the challenged action has had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Clayton Act

HN9[] Standing, Clayton Act

Predatory pricing harms both competitors and competition, and is capable of inflicting antitrust injury. The U.S. Supreme Court has noted that a predatory pricing scheme creates antitrust injury: This does not necessarily mean that § 4 of the Clayton Act plaintiffs must prove an actual lessening of competition in order to recover. The short-term effect of certain anticompetitive behavior—predatory below-cost pricing, for example—may be to stimulate price competition. But competitors may be able to prove antitrust injury before they actually are driven from the market and competition is thereby lessened. When the defendant effectively sells below its own costs, it puts pressure on its competitors to lower prices without actually lowering its own costs or otherwise creating a market efficiency. This is sufficient for competitors to have antitrust standing.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Clayton Act

HN10[] Standing, Clayton Act

Antitrust injury does not arise for purposes of § 4 of the Clayton Act until a private party is adversely affected by an anticompetitive aspect of the defendant's conduct; in the context of pricing practices, only predatory pricing has the requisite anticompetitive effect.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > Predatory Pricing

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN11[] Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices, Predatory Pricing

Losses a competitor suffers as a result of predatory pricing is a form of antitrust injury because predatory pricing has the requisite anticompetitive effect against competitors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN12[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

A claim for attempted monopolization in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, requires: (1) a specific intent to monopolize; (2) anti-competitive conduct; and (3) a dangerous probability of success. Market strength that approaches monopoly power, meaning the ability to control prices and exclude competition, is a necessary element for showing a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power. However, courts have not adopted a uniform standard regarding the threshold of what it takes to establish a monopoly power. Market share alone, however, is not enough to determine a firm's capacity to achieve monopoly; the real test is whether the defendants possessed sufficient market power to achieve its aims.

HN13[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

For the purposes of an attempted monopolization claim, specific intent to monopolize may be inferred from evidence of anticompetitive conduct, but not from legitimate business practices aimed only at succeeding in competition.

HN14[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

The relationship between act and intent in attempted monopolization claims is a close one, and evidence of anticompetitive conduct may be used to support a finding of intent where direct evidence of intent is unavailable. Conduct showing a desire to crush competitors shows a specific intent to monopolize.

HN15[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

For purposes of an attempted monopolization claim, anticompetitive conduct is any conduct that attempts to exclude rivals on some basis other than efficiency. Anticompetitive conduct can come in too many different forms, and is too dependent upon context, for any court or commentator ever to have enumerated all the varieties.

HN16[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

In determining whether an attempted monopolization plaintiff has alleged anticompetitive conduct, the fact finder should be permitted to consider the entire sum of unlawful exclusionary practices and their impact.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > Predatory Pricing

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Burden Shifting

HN17[] Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices, Predatory Pricing

A plaintiff seeking to plead predatory pricing must plead that the prices complained of are below an appropriate measure of its rival's costs and that the defendant had a dangerous probability of recouping its investment in below-cost prices. To establish predatory pricing a plaintiff must prove that the anticipated benefits of the defendant's price depended on its tendency to discipline or eliminate competition and thereby enhance the firm's long-term ability to reap the benefits of monopoly power. If the defendant's prices were below average total cost but above average variable cost, the plaintiff bears the burden of showing defendant's pricing was predatory. If, however, the plaintiff proves that the defendant's prices were below average variable cost, the plaintiff has established a prima facie case of predatory pricing and the burden shifts to the defendant to prove that the prices were justified without regard to any anticipated destructive effect they might have on competitors.

HN18[] Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices, Predatory Pricing

Competitors are the best of predatory pricing plaintiffs because, although they do not have direct information about the defendant's costs, they usually know these costs better than anyone else. If a plaintiff were required to actually know a defendant's costs to even plead a predatory pricing claim, no predatory pricing case would progress beyond a motion to dismiss.

HN19[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

For purposes of an attempted monopolization claim, there is no requirement that the underlying anticompetitive acts give rise to an independent tort action. It is well settled that acts which are in themselves legal lose that character when they become part of an unlawful scheme.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

HN20[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

For purposes of an attempted monopolization claim, anticompetitive conduct only requires that the conduct be designed to have an anticompetitive effect on the relevant market.

HN21[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

Specific intent for an attempted monopolization claim may be inferred from the existence of anticompetitive acts.

HN22[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

For purposes of an attempted monopolization claim, a dangerous probability of success requires market strength that approaches monopoly power and an examination of barriers to entry.

HN23[] Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices, Predatory Pricing

The final element of the predatory pricing analysis is whether there is a dangerous probability of recoupment, or whether the defendants could obtain enough market power to set higher than competitive prices, and then could sustain those prices long enough to earn in excess profits what they earlier gave up in below-cost prices. In conducting this analysis, a court should analyze the predatory pricing scheme to determine whether the scheme alleged could plausibly produce the intended effects on the firm's rivals by driving them from the market, and then analyze the structure and conditions of the relevant market in order to determine whether defendants could plausibly maintain supra-competitive prices after it has eliminated its rival from the market. Since this analysis is a particularly fact-intensive inquiry, courts typically should not resolve it at the pleading stage.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Monopoly Power

HN24[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

A lesser degree of market power may be sufficient to establish an attempted monopolization claim than that needed to establish a completed monopolization claim. Under this lesser standard, courts will generally find a dangerous probability for success where the defendant has a market share of fifty percent or more. On the other end of the spectrum, a market share of thirty percent is presumptively insufficient to establish a dangerous probability of success. Those with market shares between thirty and fifty percent may be found to have a dangerous probability of success if other factors are present.

There are dozens of cases stating that market shares of 50% are generally sufficient to support an attempted monopolization claim, and much lower market shares may support such a claim when there are strong barriers to entry.

HN26[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

For purposes of an attempted monopolization claim, a dangerous probability of achieving market power is more likely in a two-competitor market where each market participant has approximately an equal share, than in a market with numerous other players. In a two-player, 50%-50% market, the elimination of the plaintiff would leave the defendant with 100% of the market.

HN27[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

For purposes of an attempted monopolization claim, in determining whether there are barriers to entry in the market, the fact that it is difficult for a new firm to enter the industry, or that no new competitors have entered the market for a number of years, may be very important factors.

HN28[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

For purposes of an attempted monopolization claim, there is no requirement that substantial barriers to entry consist of more than high fixed costs. The ultimate question is whether new entry is easy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

HN29[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

To survive a motion to dismiss, an antitrust conspiracy plaintiff must allege that: (1) two or more entities engaged in a conspiracy, combination, or contract, (2) to effect a restraint or combination prohibited per se (wherein the anticompetitive effects within a relevant geographic and product market are implied), (3) that was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's antitrust injury.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Mergers & Acquisitions Law > Antitrust > Antitrust Statutes

HN30[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

For purposes of an antitrust conspiracy claim, where the original purpose of a merger was to restrain trade or monopolize a market, the prohibition against intra-company conspiracies no longer applies. It has long been clear that a pattern of acquisitions may itself create a combination illegal under § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, especially when an original anticompetitive purpose is evident from the affiliated corporations' subsequent conduct. The affiliation of the defendants is irrelevant if the original acquisitions were themselves illegal. An affiliation flowing from an illegal conspiracy will not avert sanctions. Common ownership and control are irrelevant if restraint of trade was the primary object of the combination. Even if the original purpose of the merger were not to unreasonably restrain trade or to monopolize a market, a merger does not insulate parties from joint actions taken before the merger.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Causes of Action Involving Trademarks > Infringement Actions > Determinations

Trademark Law > Likelihood of Confusion > Consumer Confusion

HN31[] Infringement Actions, Determinations

To state a claim of trademark infringement, a plaintiff must allege facts establishing that: (1) the plaintiff owns the registered trademark; (2) the defendant used the mark in commerce; and (3) the use was likely to cause confusion. The touchstone of liability for trademark infringement is whether the defendant's use of the disputed mark is likely to cause confusion among consumers regarding the origin of the goods offered by the parties. Generally, dismissal for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted is appropriate in only the most extreme trademark infringement cases, such as where goods are unrelated as a matter of law, since the likelihood of confusion is generally a question of fact.

Trademark Law > Subject Matter of Trademarks > Particular Subject Matter

HN32[] Subject Matter of Trademarks, Particular Subject Matter

A standard character trademark is not limited to a particular font, style, size, or color. Standard character marks are not limited to any particular presentation.

Trademark Law > Likelihood of Confusion > Factors for Determining Confusion

Trademark Law > Likelihood of Confusion > Factors for Determining Confusion > Similarity of Marks

HN33[] Likelihood of Confusion, Factors for Determining Confusion

An allegedly infringing trademark need not be identical; it need only cause a likelihood of confusion. While the lack of actual confusion is rarely significant, the existence of actual confusion is the best evidence of likelihood of confusion.

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Federal & State Interrelationships > Choice of Law

HN34[] Federal & State Interrelationships, Choice of Law

When considering state-law claims, a federal court must first determine which state's law applies. A federal district court sitting in Ohio applies Ohio's choice-of-law rules.

Torts > Procedural Matters > Conflict of Law > Place of Injury

Torts > Procedural Matters > Conflict of Law > Significant Relationships

HN35[] Conflict of Law, Place of Injury

Under Ohio law, in making choice-of-law determinations in tort actions, a presumption is created that the law of the place of the injury controls unless another jurisdiction has a more significant relationship to the lawsuit. The burden of proving this conflict rests with the party disputing the application of local law. If, after applying the relevant factors, either state would be appropriate, the court should apply the law of the forum state.

Torts > Procedural Matters > Conflict of Law > Place of Injury

Torts > Procedural Matters > Conflict of Law > Significant Relationships

HN36[] Conflict of Law, Place of Injury

Within the context of tort actions, to determine the state with the most significant relationship to the cause of action, Ohio courts consider (1) the place of the injury; (2) the place where the conduct causing the injury occurred; (3) the domicile, residence, nationality, place of incorporation, and place of business of the parties; and (4) the place where the relationship between the parties, if any, is located. The place where the tortious conduct occurred is the place where the relationship, if any, between the parties centered.

Torts > ... > Business Relationships > Intentional Interference > Elements

HN37[] Intentional Interference, Elements

Under Ohio law, the tort of interference with a business relationship occurs when a person, without a privilege to do so, induces or otherwise purposely causes a third person not to enter into or continue a business relationship with another. To state a claim for tortious interference with business relations, a plaintiff must allege: (1) a business relationship; (2) the tortfeasor's knowledge of the relationship; (3) an intentional interference causing a breach or termination of the relationship; and (4) damages.

Torts > ... > Business Relationships > Intentional Interference > Elements

HN38[] Intentional Interference, Elements

Conduct that is in violation of antitrust provisions may be improper conduct sufficient to support tortious interference with business relationships.

Torts > Intentional Torts > Conversion

Torts > Intentional Torts

HN39[] Intentional Torts, Conversion

A trespass to chattel occurs when one intentionally disposes another of their personal property. One who commits a trespass to a chattel is subject to liability to the possessor of the chattel if, but only if, (a) he dispossesses the other of the chattel, or (b) the chattel is impaired as to its condition, quality, or value, or (c) the possessor is deprived of the use of the chattel for a substantial time, or (d) bodily harm is caused to the possessor, or harm is caused to some person or thing in which the possessor has a legally protected interest. While authority under Ohio law respecting an action for trespass to chattels is extremely meager, it appears to be an actionable tort. An unprivileged use or other intermeddling with a chattel which results in actual impairment of its physical condition, quality or value to the possessor makes the actor liable for the loss thus caused. The word "chattels" is ordinarily limited to visible, tangible, movable personable property, although it may be used in the broader sense. Trespass to chattels has been described as the little brother to conversion.

Torts > Intentional Torts

HN40[] Torts, Intentional Torts

For purposes of a trespass to chattel claim, physical damage is not required if the value of the chattel diminished.

Torts > Intentional Torts

HN41[] Torts, Intentional Torts

The interest of a possessor of a chattel in its inviolability, unlike the similar interest of a possessor of land, is not given legal protection by an action for nominal damages for harmless intermeddlings with the chattel. In order that an actor who interferes with another's chattel may be liable, his conduct must affect some other and more important interest of the possessor. Therefore, one who intentionally intermeddles with another's chattel is subject to liability only if his intermeddling is harmful or if the possessor is deprived of the use of the chattel for a substantial time, or some other legally protected interest of the possessor is affected Sufficient legal protection of the possessor's interest in the mere inviolability of his chattel is afforded by his privilege to use reasonable force to protect his possession against even harmless interference.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Labor & Employment Law > ... > Conditions & Terms > Trade Secrets & Unfair Competition > Noncompetition & Nondisclosure Agreements

HN42[] Types of Contracts, Covenants

Ohio, Florida, Georgia, and Illinois do not have a rule that restrictive covenants are always valid, instead each holds that only restrictions that are reasonable in scope are valid and enforceable. Under Ohio law, noncompetition and nonsolicitation agreements that are reasonable are enforced. A Florida statute permits the enforcement of contracts restricting or prohibiting competition during or after the term of the restrictive covenant so long as such contacts are reasonable in time, area, and line of business. O.C.G.A. § 13-8-53 (2012) permits restrictive covenants only when they meet certain conditions. For a restrictive covenant to be valid and enforceable in Illinois, the terms must be reasonable and necessary to protect a legitimate business interest of the employer. In determining whether restrictive covenants should be enforced, the facts of each case are paramount, and therefore it is inappropriate to decide these issues on a motion to dismiss.

(Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 45-46).

[2] Also pending before the Court is a motion to dismiss (Doc. 26) that was filed before Plaintiff Dodge Data amended its complaint. (Doc. 28). The amended complaint rendered the motion to dismiss (Doc. 26) moot. *Computerease Software, Inc. v. Hemisphere Corp., No. 06cv247, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64753, at 1 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 19, 2007) ("Since the amended complaint replaces the original complaint, the motion to dismiss the original complaint is moot."). Accordingly, the first motion to dismiss (Doc. 26) is DENIED as MOOT.

[*862] I. FACTS AS ALLEGED BY THE PLAINTIFF

For purposes of this motion to dismiss, the Court must: (1) view the complaint in the light most favorable to Plaintiff Dodge Data; and (2) take all well-pleaded factual allegations as true. Tackett v. M&G Polymers, 561 F.3d 478, 488 (6th Cir. 2009).

Dodge Data provides Construction Project Information ("CPI"). (Doc. 28 at ¶ 20). CPI consists of "construction project information, building product information, construction plans and specifications, industry news, market research, and industry trends and forecasts." (Id.) Dodge Data sells its nationwide CPI product to customers "through web-based programs accessed by those customers who pay a subscription fee to Dodge." (Id. at ¶ 24). The subscription "depend[s] upon the level of detail and geographical area in which the contractor [i]s interested, as well as the number of licenses purchased by the contractor." (Id. at ¶ 26).

Dodge Data claims that Defendants are attempting to monopolize the market for nationwide CPI in the United States and Canada (the relevant market), in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Dodge Data alleges that [4] Defendants' goal is to consolidate into one entity with market power, drive Dodge Data from the market, and acquire a 100% market share so that they can charge monopoly prices, reduce output, and stifle innovation to the detriment of consumers.

Dodge Data alleges that Defendants are attempting to achieve their goal through anticompetitive conduct, including a predatory pricing scheme in which they have offered prices to Dodge Data's customers (but not to their own customers), that are more than 85% below Dodge Data's prices and below any appropriate measure of Defendants' costs. Defendants have also allegedly stolen and used Dodge Data's confidential customer information, infringed Dodge Data's trademarks, abused restrictive covenants, and tortiously interfered with Dodge Data's business relationships.

Dodge Data alleges claims for: (1) attempt to monopolize in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act; (2) conspiracy to monopolize in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act; (3) conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act; (4) trademark infringement of the "S" (Sweets) mark; (5) unfair competition concerning the "S" (Sweets) mark; (6) dilution of the Sweets mark under Ohio law; [5] (7) violation of the Ohio Deceptive Trade Practices Act relating to the "S" (Sweets) mark; (8) trademark infringement of the BidPro mark; (9) federal unfair competition concerning the BidPro mark; (10) violation of the Deceptive Trade Practices Act relating to the BidPro mark; (11) tortious interference with prospective business relationships; (12) trespass to chattels; and (13) declaratory judgment.

Defendants maintain that they have lawfully challenged Dodge Data's dominant market position, and so Dodge Data now seeks to undermine their competition.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

HN2[] A motion to dismiss pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) operates to test the sufficiency of the complaint and permits dismissal of a complaint for "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." To show grounds for relief, Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) requires that the complaint contain a "short and plain statement of the claim [*863] showing that the pleader is entitled to relief."

[3] The parties request oral argument. (Doc. 29 at 1 and Doc. 32 at 1). The Court finds that the pleadings are clear on their face, and that oral argument and/or an evidentiary hearing is not necessary. *See Whitescarver v. Sabin Robbins Paper Co., Case No. C-1-03-911, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51524, at 7 (S.D. Ohio July 27, 2006) [3] (J. Dlott) (HN1[] "Local Rule 7.1(b)(2) leaves the court with discretion to grant a request for oral argument.").

HN3[] While Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 "does not require 'detailed factual allegations,' . . . it demands more than an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (citing Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)). Pleadings offering mere "'labels and conclusions' or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'" [6] Id. (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). In fact, in determining a motion to dismiss, "courts 'are not bound to accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation[.]'" Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (citing Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 106 S. Ct. 2932, 92 L. Ed. 2d 209 (1986)). Further, "[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level[.]" Id.

Accordingly, HN4[] "[t]o survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. A claim is plausible where "plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. Plausibility "is not akin to a 'probability requirement,' but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. "[W]here the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged—but it has not 'show[n]'—'that the pleader is entitled to relief,'" and the case shall be dismissed. Id. (citing Fed. Rule Civ. P. 8(a)(2)).

III. ANALYSIS

A. Antitrust Standing

HN5[] "[A]ntitrust standing is a threshold, pleading-stage inquiry and when a complaint by its terms fails to establish this requirement [it] must [be] dismiss[ed]... as a matter of law—lest [7] the antitrust laws become a treble-damages sword rather than the shield against competition-destroying conduct that Congress meant them to be." NicSand, Inc. v. 3M Co., 507 F.3d 442, 450 (6th Cir. 2007) (en banc).[4] A district court decides whether a plaintiff has adequately pleaded antitrust standing by balancing five factors: "(1) the causal connection between the antitrust violation and harm to the plaintiff and whether that harm was intended to be caused; (2) the nature of the plaintiff's alleged injury including the status of the plaintiff as consumer or competitor in the relevant market; (3) the directness or indirectness of the injury, and the related inquiry of whether the damages are speculative; (4) the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages; and (5) the existence of more direct victims of the alleged antitrust violation." Southaven Land Co. v. Malone & Hyde, Inc., 715 F.2d 1079, 1085 (6th Cir. 1983).

Here, Defendants argue that Dodge Data does not have antitrust standing because it has not properly plead an antitrust injury. HN7[] An antitrust injury is an: (1) "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent" and (2) injury that "the flows from that which makes defendants' [8] acts unlawful." In re Cardizem CD Antitrust Litig., 332 F.3d 896, 909 (6th Cir. 2003). "[B]ecause the purpose of the antitrust laws is to protect competition [*864] rather than competitors, a plaintiff must allege injury, not only to himself, but to a relevant market. Thus, failure to allege an anti-competitive impact on a relevant market amounts to a failure to allege an antitrust injury." Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962). This requirement means that "one competitor may not use the antitrust laws to sue a rival merely for vigorous or intensified competition." NicSand, Inc., 507 F.3d at 450. Specifically, "a plaintiff must put forth factual allegations plausibly suggesting that there has been an adverse effect on prices, output, or quality of good in the relevant market as a result of the challenged actions." *Guinn v. Mount Carmel Health, No. 2:09cv226, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24353, at 14 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 27, 2012).[5]

Here, Dodge Data not only alleges competition, it alleges that Defendants have engaged in illegal predatory pricing.HN9[] Predatory [9] pricing "harms both competitors and competition," and is "capable of inflicting antitrust injury." Cargill Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 117-118, 107 S. Ct. 484, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1986). The Supreme Court has noted that a predatory pricing scheme creates antitrust injury:

> This does not necessarily mean, as the Court of Appeals feared, that § 4 plaintiffs must prove an actual lessening of competition in order to recover. The short-term effect of certain anticompetitive behavior—predatory below-cost pricing, for example—may be to stimulate price competition. But competitors may be able to prove antitrust injury before they actually are driven from the market and competition is thereby lessened.

Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489 n. 14, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977).[6] "When the defendant effectively sells below its own costs, it puts pressure on its competitors to lower prices without actually lowering its own costs or otherwise creating a market efficiency. This is sufficient for competitors to have antitrust standing." Collins Inkjet Corp. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 781 F.3d 264, 275 (6th Cir. 2015).[7]

Competition between Dodge Data and CMD (and later iSqFt/CMD) over the years has necessitated that each company improve its product quality and increase innovation in order to keep up with its rival. Dodge Data argues that if it is forced from the market, Defendants would raise prices to supra-competitive levels and innovation and product quality would suffer. (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 65-66).

Accordingly, Dodge Data has alleged antitrust injury sufficient to establish standing.

[*865] B. Attempted Monopolization

Dodge Data alleges HN12[] a claim for attempted monopolization in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. 15 U.S.C. § 2. A claim for attempted monopolization requires: "(1) a specific intent to monopolize; (2) anti-competitive conduct; and (3) a dangerous probability of success." Tarrant Serv. Agency, Inc. v. Am. Standard, Inc., 12 F.3d 609, 615 (6th Cir. 1993). Market strength that approaches monopoly power, meaning the ability to control prices and exclude competition, is a necessary element for showing a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power. Id. However, courts have not adopted a uniform standard regarding the threshold of what it takes to establish a monopoly [11] power. "[M]arket share alone, however, is not enough to determine a firm's capacity to achieve monopoly . . . [t]he real test is whether [the defendants] possessed sufficient market power to achieve its aims." Richter Concrete Corp. v. Hilltop Concrete Corp., 691 F.2d 818, 826 (6th Cir. 1982).

[5] HN8[] "[A]n antitrust plaintiff must show that (1) the alleged violation tended to reduce competition overall and (2) the plaintiff's injury was a consequence of the resulting diminished competition." J.B.D.L. Corp. v. Wyeth-Ayerst Labs. Inc., 485 F.3d 880, 887 (6th Cir. 2007). This requires a demonstration, "as a threshold matter, 'that the challenged action has had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market." George Haug Co. v. Rolls Royce Motor Cars, Inc., 148 F.3d 136, 139 (2nd Cir. 1998).

[6] See also Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 339-40, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990) (HN10[] "[a]ntitrust injury does not arise for purposes of § 4 of the Clayton Act until a private party is adversely affected by an anticompetitive aspect of the defendant's conduct, in the context of pricing practices, only predatory pricing has the requisite anticompetitive effect").

[7] See also Amarel v. Connell, 102 F.3d 1494, 1508 (9th Cir. 1996) (HN11[] "[l]osses a competitor suffers as a result of predatory [10] pricing is a form of antitrust injury because 'predatory pricing has the requisite anticompetitive effect' against competitors").

1. Specific intent to monopolize

HN13[] "Specific intent to monopolize may be inferred from evidence of anticompetitive conduct, but not from legitimate business practices aimed only at succeeding in competition." Arthur S. Langenderfer, Inc. v. S.E. Johnson Co., 917 F.2d 1413, 1432 (6th Cir. 1990). Defendants argue that Dodge Data has pled nothing more than "heated competition."

Dodge Data alleges that Defendants: (i) began predatory pricing shortly after CMD's president instructed his sales staff to do "whatever it takes to disrupt Dodge Data's business"; (ii) provided its two leading sales people with a list of 50-70 Dodge Data customers and instructed those sales people to concentrate full-time on converting those customers to CMD; (iii) provided those employees with special bonuses that could equal $100,000 a year depending on their success in converting Dodge Data's customers; (iv) directed its inside sales force to specifically target Dodge Data customers and told those salespeople to convert those customers no matter what the price; (v) had prices approved by the top management [12] of iSqFt/CMD that were well below iSDqFt/CMD's average total cost and average variable cost; and (vi) sold to Dodge Data's customers at a price which was well below (at times hundreds of thousands of dollars below) the price necessary to actually win the account (and below prices offered to iSqFt/CMD's own customers). (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 58-61).

Accordingly, and as discussed in more detail infra at Section III.B.2, Dodge Data has pleaded specific intent to monopolize. See, e.g., Tops Mkts., Inc. v. Quality Mkts., Inc., 142 F.3d 90, 101 (2d Cir. 1998) ("defendants' intent can be derived from their words" and "their stated goal of preventing [the plaintiff] from entering the [] market").[8]

2. Anticompetitive conduct

HN15[] Anticompetitive conduct is any conduct that "attempt[s] to exclude rivals on some basis other than efficiency." Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 605, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985). "Anticompetitive conduct can come in too many different forms, and is too dependent upon context, for any court or commentator ever [13] to have enumerated all the varieties." *Spirit Airlines, [866] Inc. v. Nw. Airlines, Inc., 431 F.3d 917, 951 (6th Cir. 2005).

Dodge Data has alleged anticompetitive conduct consisting of: (i) predatory pricing; (ii) the use of the stolen customer information to compete; (iii) the intentional infringement of trademarks; (iv) the attempt to acquire market power through merger; and (v) restricting the availability of qualified employees by requiring them to sign invalid non-compete agreements. (Doc. 28 at ¶ 99). HN16[] In determining whether Dodge Data has alleged anticompetitive conduct, "[t]he fact finder should be permitted to consider the entire sum of unlawful exclusionary practices and their impact." 2 Philip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law*: An Analysis of Antitrust Principles and Their Application* at ¶ 310c7 (Aspen Publishers 3d ed. (2008)).[9] The Court will consider each of these alleged acts of anticompetitive conduct in turn.

[8] See also D.E. Rogers Assocs., Inc. v. Gardner-Denver Co., 718 F.2d 1431, 1435 (6th Cir. 1983) (HN14[] "the relationship between act and intent in attempted monopolization claims is a close one" and "evidence of anticompetitive conduct may be used to support a finding of intent where direct evidence of intent is unavailable"); Scooter Store, Inc. v. Spinlife.com, 777 F. Supp.2d 1102, 1116 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 28, 2011) (conduct showing a "desire to crush competitors" shows a specific intent to monopolize).

[9] "The evidence supported [plaintiff's] theory that [defendant's] interrelated practices successfully limited competition. [Defendant] once again attempts to divide the practices into discrete, distinct activities, each of which prior courts may have found to be lawful . . . Defendant argues that no one instance of improper conduct standing [14] alone would lead to § 2 liability. However, taken together, they show a pattern of exclusionary behavior sufficient to support the jury verdict." *Conwood Co. v. U.S. Tobacco Co., No. 5:98-cv-108-R, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12761, at 11 (W.D. Ky. Aug. 10, 2000).

a. Predatory pricing

HN17[] A plaintiff seeking to plead predatory pricing must plead that "the prices complained of are below an appropriate measure of its rival's costs" and that the defendant had a "dangerous probability...of recouping its investment in below-cost prices." Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 222, 224, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993).

> [W]e hold that to establish predatory pricing a plaintiff must prove that the anticipated benefits of defendant's price depended on its tendency to discipline or eliminate competition and thereby enhance the firm's long-term ability to reap the benefits of monopoly power. If the defendant's prices were below average total cost but above average variable cost, the plaintiff bears the burden of showing defendant's pricing was predatory. If, however, the plaintiff proves that the defendant's prices were below average variable cost, the plaintiff has established a prima facie case of predatory pricing and the burden shifts to the defendant to prove that the prices were justified without regard to any anticipated destructive effect they [15] might have on competitors.

Spirit Airlines, Inc., 431 F.3d at 938.[10]

Since Dodge Data does not yet have access to Defendants' costs, Dodge Data uses its knowledge of its own cost structure, its knowledge of the industry, and its knowledge of iSqFt/CMD's business, to plead, upon information and belief, that Defendants' costs are below their average variable and average total cost. Dodge Data's allegations are an extrapolation of iSqFt/CMD's cost structure based upon the information that Dodge Data has: Dodge Data, as iSqFt/CMD's only competitor in the relevant market, knows about the industry; the products iSqFt/CMD offers; the basic level of costs associated with gathering, organizing, and delivering the data to customers; the costs associated [*867] with hiring, training, and compensating sales people; and the hundreds of other costs and company seeking to offer a product that is competitive with Dodge Data's products must incur. HN18[] "[C]ompetitors are the best of predatory pricing plaintiffs [because], although they do not have direct information about the defendant's costs, . . . they usually know these costs better than anyone else." [16] 3A Areeda & Hovenkamp at ¶ 723e. If a plaintiff were required to actually know a defendant's costs to even plead a predatory pricing claim, no predatory pricing case would progress beyond a motion to dismiss.

Dodge Data argues that Defendants' predatory pricing campaign began shortly after CMD's president instructed his sales staff to do "whatever it takes to disrupt Dodge's business." (Doc. 28 at ¶ 58). In support of this campaign, CMD provided its two leading sales people with a list of 50 to 70 of Dodge Data's customers (believed to have been obtained from the stolen customer information), and instructed those sales people to devote their full time to converting those customers to CMD. (Id. at ¶¶ 58-59). Dodge Data argues that top management at iSqFt/CMD specifically approved sales that were well below average total cost and average variable cost. (Id. at ¶ 60). Specifically, iSqFt/CMD offered prices that were, in some cases, more than 85% lower than the price offered by Dodge Data. (Id. at ¶¶ 61-62).[11]

These facts support Dodge Data's allegations that iSqFt/CMD's pricing structure was designed more to "discipline or eliminate competition" than to secure profits for iSqFt/CMD. Spirit Airlines, 431 F.3d at 958. Moreover, the price

[10] See also Superior Prod. P'ship v. Gordon Auto Body Parts Co., 784 F.3d 311, 326 (6th Cir. 2015) (plaintiffs were allowed "the flexibility to apply a cost-based test other than average variable cost").

[11] iSqFt/CMD complains that Dodge Data has only set forth one example of a post-merger predatory price charged by iSqFt/CMM. Defendants, however, do not explain what the significance of [17] the merger date is (or if it has in fact occurred). Even if the predatory pricing ceased entirely after the complaint was filed, that would not change Defendants' liability for any acts that they have allegedly already committed.

at which iSqFt/CMD ultimately secured the business of Dodge Data's customers was well below the price necessary to actually win the account.[12]

b. Use of stolen customer information

Next, Dodge Data alleges that iSqFt/CMD is currently using stolen customer information to compete against Dodge Data. (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 39, 58, 174). Defendants contend that its receipt of the alleged stolen [18] customer information was already litigated and is therefore barred by res judicata. However, claims based upon Defendants' use of the information in 2014 through the present were not litigated in the 2009 litigation and therefore are not barred by res judicata. Defendants' continued use of the customer information constitutes an anticompetitive act, because this usage is allegedly part of a scheme to exclude rivals on some basis other than efficiency. Moreover,HN19[] there is no requirement that the underlying "anticompetitive acts" give rise to an independent tort action. Cont'l Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 707, 82 S. Ct. 1404, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777 (1962) (it is "well settled that acts which are in themselves legal lose that character when they become [part] of an unlawful scheme").

c. Infringement of trademarks and use of improper restrictive covenants

Dodge Data alleges that Defendants' conduct was designed to adversely [*868] affect competition in the relevant market. Defendants maintain that the alleged trademark infringement cannot be anticompetitive conduct, because the products associated with the infringed trademarks are in a different product market. However, HN20[] anticompetitive conduct only requires that the conduct be designed to have an anticompetitive effect on the relevant [19] market. Tops Mkts, Inc., 142 F.3d at 100 (tortiously interfering with a contract to purchase land (real estate market), to stop plaintiff from finding a location to open a grocery store, was anticompetitive conduct affecting the grocery store market).

d. Mergers and attempted mergers

Finally, Dodge Data argues that iSqFt attempted to acquire every player in the relevant market, including Dodge Data. Defendants maintain, however, that Dodge Data does not and cannot allege that iSqFt planned to acquire both Dodge Data and CMD, as opposed to just one of them.

Ultimately, considering "the entire sum of [alleged] unlawful exclusionary practices and their impact" and construing the facts in the light most favorable to Dodge Data, it has pleaded numerous instances of anticompetitive conduct and specific intent to monopolize.[13] See Areeda & Hovenkamp at ¶ 310c7.

[12] If iSqFt/CMD were interested in maximizing profits, there was no reason to resort to prices that were so drastically below that which Dodge Data was offering. Therefore, Dodge Data offers sufficient facts to allege that iSqFt/CMD's pricing strategy was more concerned with eliminating Dodge Data's revenue and driving it from the relevant market than it was with its own short-term profitability.

[14] HN22[] A "dangerous probability of success" requires "market strength that approaches monopoly power" and an examination of "barriers to entry." White & White, Inc. v. Am. Hosp. Supply Corp., 723 F.2d 495, 507 (6th Cir. 1983).

HN23[] The final element of the predatory pricing analysis is whether there [20] is a dangerous probability of recoupment, or whether Defendants could "obtain enough market power to set higher than competitive prices, and then [could] sustain those prices long enough to earn in excess profits what they earlier gave up in below-cost prices." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 590-91, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). In conducting this analysis, a court should analyze the predatory pricing scheme to determine whether the scheme alleged could plausibly "produc[e] the intended effects on the firm's rivals . . . [by] driving them from the market," and then analyze "the structure and conditions of the relevant market" in order to determine whether defendants could plausibly maintain supra-competitive prices after it has eliminated its rival from the market. Brooke Group Ltd., 509 U.S. at 225-27. Since this analysis is a "particularly fact-intensive inquiry," "[c]ourts typically should not resolve [it] at the pleading stage." Broadcom Corp. v. Qualcomm Inc., 501 F.3d 297, 318 (3d Cir. 2007).

The predatory pricing scheme that Dodge Data alleges could plausibly result in a market where there is a "dangerous probability" that iSqFt/CMD would have monopoly power, including the power to charge supra-competitive prices, reduce output, decrease innovation, and otherwise damage competition. For example, the alleged predatory pricing scheme caused Dodge Data to lose [21] customers with millions of dollars in annual sales volume. (Doc. 28 at ¶ 63). Further, Dodge Data has allegedly lost millions in "price erosion," where it has been forced to discount to unsustainable and unprofitable levels. (Id.)[15]

> HN24[] A lesser degree of market power may be sufficient to establish an attempted monopolization claim than that needed to establish a completed monopolization claim. Under this lesser standard, courts will generally find a dangerous probability for success where the defendant has a market share of fifty percent or more. On the other end of the spectrum, a market share of thirty percent is presumptively insufficient to establish a dangerous probability of success. Those with market shares between thirty and fifty percent may be found to have a dangerous probability [22] of success if other factors are present.

Defiance Hosp., Inc. v. Fauster-Cameron, Inc., 344 F.Supp.2d 1097, 1116-117 (N.D. Ohio 2004).[16]

Furthermore, Dodge Data maintains that this is a highly concentrated two-competitor market. HN26[] A "dangerous probability" of achieving market power is more likely in a two-competitor market where each market participant has approximately an equal share, than in a market with numerous other players. In a two-player, "50%-50% market," the elimination of the plaintiff would leave the defendant with 100% of the market. Domed Stadium Hotel, Inc. v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 732 F.2d 480, 490 (5th Cir. 1984).

Additionally, Dodge Data argues that having achieved monopoly power and the ability to charge supra-competitive prices, iSqFt/CMD would be able to maintain those prices because there are significant barriers to entry in this market. [23] Dodge Data maintains that "[i]n the past 100 years, no company other than Dodge or CMD has occupied this market, other than in a de minimis way." (Doc. 28 at ¶ 55). See, e.g., White & White, Inc. v. Am. Hosp. Supply Corp., 723 F.2d 495, 507 (6th Cir. 1983) (HN27[] "[t]he fact that it is difficult for a new firm to enter the industry, or that no new competitors have entered the market for a number of years, may be very important factors"). Thus, Dodge Data has pleaded sufficient facts to show that Defendants could "obtain enough market

[15] Defendants argue that there is some possibility that if their predatory pricing scheme continues that they, instead of Dodge Data, will exit the market. However, Defendants fail to cite any case law where a court dismissed an attempt to monopolize claim because the plaintiff attempted to survive that scheme.

[16] Defendants argue that a 50% market share is insufficient to support an attempted monopoly claim. However, HN25[] there are dozens of cases stating that market shares of 50% are "generally" sufficient to support such a claim, and much lower market shares may support such a claim when there are strong barriers to entry. See, e.g., Smith Wholesale Co. v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., No. 2:03cv221, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18078 (E.D. Tenn. Aug. 16, 2005), aff'd, 219 F. App'x 398 (6th Cir. 2007) (Philip Morris' market share of 49-56% was sufficient to establish market power for an attempted monopolization claim).

power to set higher than competitive prices, and then [could] sustain those prices long enough to earn in excess profits what they earlier gave up in below-cost prices." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 475 U.S. at 590-91.[17]

Finally, Defendants argue that Dodge Data's sole basis for pleading barriers to entry is its claim that there are high fixed costs, and that for there to be "substantial" barriers to entry, there must be some structural aspect unique to the market aside from cost alone. However, HN28[] there is no requirement that substantial barriers to entry consist [24] of more than high fixed costs. Furthermore, Dodge Data pleaded that a firm seeking to enter the relevant market would need: (i) a network of individuals to secure the necessary plans and specifications; (ii) a salesforce with ties throughout [*870] the United States and Canada to BPMs; and (iii) a software solution. (Doc. 28 at ¶ 54). Dodge Data argues that these items take years to develop, and there are a limited number of people with sufficient experience, contacts, and knowledge to effectively sell Nationwide CPI to BPMs. The ultimate question is whether "new entry is easy." Brooke Group, Ltd., 509 U.S. at 226.

Accordingly, Dodge Data has alleged a dangerous probability of success sufficient to maintain a claim for attempted monopolization in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act.

C. Conspiracy

Dodge Data alleges two antitrust conspiracy claims: (1) Defendants violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act by conspiring to monopolize the relevant market (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 105-11); and (2) Defendants conspired to unreasonably restrain trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act (Id. at ¶¶ 112-17). HN29[] To survive the motion to dismiss, Dodge Data must allege that: "(1) two or more entities engaged in a conspiracy, combination, or contract, (2) to effect a [25] restraint or combination prohibited per se (wherein the anticompetitive effects within a relevant geographic and product market are implied), (3) that was the proximate cause of [Dodge Data's] antitrust injury." Expert Masonry, Inc. v. Boone Cnty., 440 F.3d 336, 342-43 (6th Cir. 2006).

First, Defendants argue that the conspiracy claims fail because Dodge Data only alleges unilateral conduct. However, Dodge Data alleges a multilateral conspiracy between four entities — iSqFt, CMD, BidClerk, and CDC. (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 45-48). Specifically, Dodge Data alleges that these entities are attempting to jointly drive Dodge Data from the market and otherwise restrain trade, by offering customers predatory pricing, trademark infringement, and by using of Dodge Data's stolen customer information to tortiously interfere with its customers. (Id. at ¶¶ 58-64, 67-94)

Next, Defendants argue that commonly held entities cannot conspire among themselves. However, HN30[] where the original purpose of a merger was to restrain trade or monopolize a market (as is alleged here), the prohibition against intra-company conspiracies no longer applies.

> It has long been clear that a pattern of acquisitions may itself create a combination illegal under § 1, especially when an original anticompetitive [26] purpose is evident from the affiliated corporations' subsequent conduct. The Yellow Cab passage is most fairly read in light of this settled rule. In Yellow Cab, the affiliation of defendants was irrelevant because the original acquisitions were themselves illegal. An affiliation "flowing from an illegal conspiracy" would not avert sanctions. Common ownership and control were irrelevant because restraint of trade was "the primary object of the combination."

Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 761, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984). Even if the original purpose of the merger were not to unreasonably restrain trade or to monopolize a market, a merger does not insulate parties from joint actions taken before the merger. Omnicare, Inc. v. UnitedHealth Group, Inc., 629 F.3d 697 (7th Cir. 2011) (examining pre-merger conduct to determine if there was a combination or conspiracy). Moreover, whether the defendant entities have actually merged, when that merger took place (if at all), and the form of that merger (if it happened) are unclear. As of the date of the Amended Complaint, each defendant existed as a separate legal entity, maintained separate and distinct websites, and continued to appear as separate, [*871] competitive entities in the marketplace. (Doc. 32 at 37). Whether and to what extent Defendants have integrated is a fact-specific [27] inquiry inappropriate for determination on the pleadings. *See, e.g., Med. Ctr. at Elizabeth Place v. Atrium Health Sys., No. 3:12-cv-26, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123408 at 22 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 30, 2012) (denying motion to dismiss and noting that "[d]efendants fail to point to any case whether a court has decided this factually-driven issue [of a single entity status] on a motion to dismiss").

[17] Defendants argue that a few years ago several smaller competitors began to emerge. "None of these competitors, however, was successful in obtaining more than a de minimis share of the relevant market for Nationwide CPI." (Doc. 28 at ¶ 41).

Accordingly, Dodge Data has alleged sufficient facts (see supra Sections III.A&B) to maintain claims for antitrust conspiracy.

D. Trademark Claims

HN31[] To state a claim of trademark infringement, "a plaintiff must allege facts establishing that: (1) [the plaintiff] owns the registered trademark; (2) the defendant used the mark in commerce; and (3) the use was likely to cause confusion." Hensley Mfg. v. ProPride, Inc., 579 F.3d 603, 609 (6th Cir. 2009) (citing 15 U.S.C. § 1114(1)). "The touchstone of liability [for trademark infringement] is whether the defendant's use of the disputed mark is likely to cause confusion among consumers regarding the origin of the goods offered by the parties." Id. at 610. "Generally, dismissal for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted is appropriate in only the most extreme trademark infringement cases, such as where goods are unrelated as a matter of law, since the likelihood of confusion is generally a question of fact." [28] Id. at 613.[18]

The Sweets Mark: With respect to Sweets, Dodge Data asserts two types of trademarks. First, it asserts the Sweets registered marks, which consist of a stylized, block-letter "S" inside a solid circle. (Doc. 28, Ex. A). Since these marks are depicted in black and white (and do not contain any markings indicating color), they are not limited to any specific color. See 37 C.F.R. § 2.52 (2016); 3 McCarthy on Trademarks and Unfair Competition § 19:58 (4th ed. 2016). Second, Dodge Data asserts common law rights in the same block-letter "S" symbol where the "S" symbol is depicted in white and set inside a solid distinctive green circle. (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 73-75, 126-32). The offending Sweets mark consists of the same "S" element—a block-letter, stylized "S"—and adds small tabs to the top and bottom of the "S" in order to turn the "S" into a dollar sign.[19] This symbol is then set upon a solid green circle that is allegedly the same shade of green used by Dodge Data for decades. (Id.)

Here, Dodge Data has sufficiently alleged that the marks in question are similar, that the goods are sold in the same market, and that a purchaser could mistake the marks for the wrong product. These allegations meet the low standard in Hensley and are enough to survive a motion to dismiss. *See, e.g., Tovey v. Nike, Inc., No. 1:12cv448, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16084, at 15 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 6, 2013).

The "Dodge BidPro" Mark: With respect to the BidPro mark, Dodge Data asserts two types of trademark rights: those arising out of its registered "Dodge BidPro" [*872] mark and those arising out of the common law. (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 139-154).

The BidPro registered mark isHN32[] a standard character mark, which means it is not limited "to a particular font, style, size, or color." (Doc. 28., Ex. B). Citigroup Inc. v. Capital City Bank Group, Inc., 637 F.3d 1344, 1349 (Fed. Cir. 2011) (standard character marks "are not limited to any particular presentation"). The offending Bid Pro

[18] *See also Just Enters., Inc. v. Nurenberg Paris Heller & McCarthy Co., No. 1:07cv1544, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39281, at 4 (N.D. Ohio May 12, 2008) (holding that "the question of likelihood of confusion is best resolved after discovery on summary judgment").

[19] Defendants argue that the dollar sign [29] used on CDC's website cannot be confused with Dodge Data's "S" or the advertisement that it is inviting customers to "Advertise with Construction Data" Corporation (CDC), not in the Sweets catalog. (Doc. 28 at ¶ 77).

mark is "Invitation to Bid Pro" and is used by CDC to mark a product that "directly competes" with "Dodge's BidPro." (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 85-87). Dodge Data argues that [30] the construction of the offending Bid Pro mark is such that it actually appears to be inviting the reader to use Dodge Data's service and has caused at least one instance of actual confusion. (Id. at ¶ 88).

Defendants argue that Dodge Data's misleading use of "BidPro" to describe its mark is improper because the registered mark is "Dodge BidPro," not merely "BidPro." CDC's product is called "Invitation to Bid Pro." Furthermore, Defendants argue that Dodge Data's customers are different than CDC's customers. Specifically, the purchasers of Dodge Data's product are "subcontractors," while CDC's customer base constitutes individuals who want access to subcontractors and suppliers. (Doc. 28 at ¶ 80). Therefore, Defendants argue that there is no likelihood of confusion by Dodge Data's subcontractor customers.

First, the fact that Dodge Data's mark includes the word "Dodge" -- but the offending Bid Pro mark does not -- is irrelevant because HN33[] the mark need not be identical; it need only cause a likelihood of confusion. Second, Dodge Data alleges that CDC uses BidPro "to promote a product that directly competes with [Dodge] BidPro" (Doc. 28 at ¶ 87), so Defendants' allegation that the products [31] do not actually compete is a factual issue, and, therefore, improper for resolution on a motion to dismiss. Moreover, the offending Bid Pro mark has already caused at least one instance of actual confusion. (Doc. 28 at ¶ 88). See Daddy's Junky Music Stores, Inc. v. Big Daddy's Family Music Ctr., 109 F.3d 275, 284 (6th Cir. 1997) (while the lack of actual confusion "is rarely significant," the existence of actual confusion is the "best evidence of likelihood of confusion").

Accordingly, Dodge Data has alleged claims for trademark infringement.

E. State Law Claims

1. Choice of law analysis

HN34[] When considering the state-law claims, a court must first determine which state's law applies. This Court, as a federal district court sitting in Ohio, applies Ohio's choice-of-law rules. Glennon v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 83 F.3d 132, 136 (6th Cir. 1996). Ohio "follows the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws in making choice-of-law determinations in tort actions." *MV Circuit Design, Inc. v. Omnicell, Inc., No. 1:14cv2028, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37688, at 37 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 24, 2015). Accordingly, HN35[] "a presumption is created that the law of the place of the injury controls unless another jurisdiction has a more significant relationship to the lawsuit." The burden of proving this conflict rests with the party disputing the application of local law. Akro-Plastics v. Drake Indus., 115 Ohio App. 3d 221, 685 N.E.2d 246, 248 (Ohio 1996). If, after applying the relevant factors, either state would be appropriate, [32] the court should apply the law of the forum state. Carder Buick-Olds Co., Inc. v. Reynolds & Reynolds, Inc., 148 Ohio App. 3d 635, 2002 Ohio 2912, 775 N.E.2d 531, 544 (Ohio App. 2002).

HN36[] Within the context of tort actions, to determine the state with the most significant relationship to the cause [*873] of action, Ohio courts consider "(1) the place of the injury; (2) the place where the conduct causing the injury occurred; (3) the domicile, residence, nationality, place of incorporation, and place of business of the parties; [and] (4) the place where the relationship between the parties, if any, is located." *Nicula v. Nicula, No. 84049, 2009 Ohio 2114, 2009 Ohio App. LEXIS 1773, at 16 (Ohio App. May 7, 2009).[20]

Dodge Data claims that New York law applies because the place of injury is New York, where Dodge Data is based and where its customer database is maintained. Defendants maintain that Ohio law applies, because Ohio has a more significant relationship to the lawsuit since: (1) the pricing decisions and use of confidential customer information occurred in Ohio (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 58-64); and (2) four of the five parties have their principal place of business in Ohio (Id. at ¶¶ 8-11). Considering these facts, Dodge Data's express statements that Defendants' tortious acts "arise, and have caused injury, in [33] Ohio,"[21] and that the forum state is favored where either state's law would be appropriate, the Court finds that Dodge Data has not met its burden of establishing that New York law applies.

[20] The place where the tortious conduct occurred is the place where the relationship, if any, between the parties centered. Amon v. Grange Mut. Cas. Co., 112 Ohio App. 3d 407, 678 N.E.2d 1002, 1005 (Ohio 1996).

2. Tortious interference

HN37[] Under Ohio law, "[t]he tort of interference with a business relationship occurs when a person, without a privilege to do so, induces or otherwise purposely causes a third person not to enter into or continue a business relationship with another." Harris v. Bornhorst, 513 F.3d 503, 523 (6th Cir. 2008). To state a claim for tortious interference with business relations, a plaintiff must allege: (1) a business relationship; (2) the tortfeasor's knowledge of the relationship; (3) an intentional interference causing a breach or termination of the relationship; and (4) damages. Dolan v. Glouster, 173 Ohio App. 3d 617, 2007 Ohio 6275, 879 N.E.2d 838, 847 (Ohio App. 2007).

Here, Dodge Data alleges that Defendants intentionally interfered with its prospective business relations with numerous customers by using "dishonest, unfair, and improper means." (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 171-76). Specifically, Dodge Data alleges that both Defendants' use of the stolen customer information to identify and solicit customers, and Defendants' predatory pricing, tortuously interfered with Dodge Data's prospective business relations. (Doc. [34] 28 at ¶¶ 171-176). See, e.g., Guinn, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24353 at 35-37.

In response, Defendants first maintain that this claim should be dismissed because Dodge Data has failed to identify a single customer that it has lost which is an essential element to its interference claim. However, Dodge Data identifies nine customers that it Alleges it lost as a result of Defendants' below-cost sales. (Doc. 28 at ¶ 61).[22]

Next, Defendants argue that "below cost pricing" cannot provide the necessary wrongful conduct to support a claim for tortious interference. However, HN38[] conduct that is in violation of antitrust provisions may be improper conduct sufficient to support tortious interference. Restatement (Second) of Torts § 767 cmt. a (2015).

Accepting Dodge Data's allegations as true, and drawing all justifiable inferences [*874] in its favor, the Court concludes that Dodge Data has sufficiently pleaded a claim for tortious interference with business relationships.

3. Trespass to Chattels

Dodge Data claims that Defendants physically interfered with the use of Dodge Data's customer information by stealing it and using it to target Dodge Data's customers. (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 178-179). [35] Dodge Data maintains that Defendants use of the stolen information constitutes a trespass and interference with Dodge Data's rights. (Id. at ¶ 181).

HN39[] "A trespass to chattel occurs when one intentionally disposes another of their personal property." Mercer v. Halmbacher, 2015- Ohio 4167, 44 N.E.3d 1011, 1017 (Ohio App. 2015).

> One who commits a trespass to a chattel is subject to liability to the possessor of the chattel if, but only if, (a) he dispossesses the other of the chattel, or (b) the chattel is impaired as to its condition, quality, or value, or (c) the possessor is deprived of the use of the chattel for a substantial time, or (d) bodily harm is caused to the possessor, or harm is caused to some person or thing in which the possessor has a legally protected interest.

CompuServe Inc. v. Cyber Promotions, Inc., 962 F. Supp. 1015, 1021-22 (S.D. Ohio 1997) (citing Restatement (Second) of Torts § 218 (1965)).[23] "An unprivileged use or other intermeddling with a chattel which results in actual impairment of its physical condition, quality or value to the possessor makes the actor liable for the loss thus caused." Id. at 1022. "[T]he word 'chattels' is ordinarily limited to visible, tangible, movable personable property, although it 'may be used in the broader sense." Universal Tube & Rollform Equip. Corp. v. YouTube, Inc., 504 F. Supp.2d 260 (N.D. Ohio 2007).[24]

Defendants maintain that Dodge Data's trespass to chattels claim fails because trespass to chattels relating to improper access of a computer database requires that there be some "physical damage" to the database.[25] However, in CompuServe, the court found that HN40[] physical damage was not required where the value of the chattel diminished. 962 F. Supp. at 1022. Here, Dodge Data has alleged that it was injured as a result of Defendants' conduct. The Court's discussion of that conduct and subsequent injury (see supra at Section III, A-C) supports a finding that the alleged damage sustained by Dodge Data is sufficient to maintain an action for trespass to chattels. See CompuServe, 962 F. Supp. at 1023.

[*875] F. Declaratory Relief

Dodge Data seeks declaratory judgment finding that the restrictive covenants that Defendants require their employees to sign are overly broad, unreasonable, and invalid. (Doc. 28 at ¶¶ 184-89).

First, Defendants argues that their restrictive covenants are legal and enforceable in each state in which they are consummated: Ohio, Florida, Georgia, and Illinois. However,HN42[] none of these states has a rule that restrictive covenants are always valid, instead each holds that only restrictions that are "reasonable" in scope are valid and enforceable. See, e.g., Rotex Global, LLC v. CPO Wirecloth & Screens, Inc., No. 1:16cv244, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24540, at *5 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 29, 2016) ("[n]oncompetition and nonsolicitation agreements that are reasonable are enforced"); GPS Indus., LLC v. Lewis, 691 F. Supp. 2d 1327, 1333 (M.D. Fla. 2010) (Florida statute "permits the enforcement of contracts restricting [38] or prohibiting competition during or after the term of the restrictive covenant so long as such contacts are reasonable in time, area, and line of business"); Ga. Code Ann. § 13-8-53 (2012) (permitting restrictive covenants only when they meet certain conditions); Cambridge Eng'g, Inc. v. Mercury Partners 90 BI, Inc., 378 Ill. App. 3d 437, 879 N.E.2d 512, 522, 316 Ill. Dec. 445 (Ill App. 2007) (noting that "[f]or a restrictive covenant to be valid and enforceable in Illinois, the terms must be 'reasonable and necessary to protect a legitimate business interest of the employer.'"). "In determining whether restrictive covenants should be enforced, the facts of each case are paramount," and therefore it is inappropriate to decide these issues on a motion to dismiss. Rotex Global, LLC, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24540 at 12 (denying motion to dismiss relating to restrictive covenants).

[24] Trespass to chattels has been described as the "little brother to conversion." State v. Herbert, 49 Ohio St. 2d 88, 358 N.E.2d 1090, 1106 (Ohio 1976).

[25] HN41[] "The interest of a possessor of a chattel in its inviolability, unlike the similar interest of a possessor of land, is not given legal protection by an action for nominal damages for harmless intermeddlings with the chattel. In order that an actor who interferes with another's chattel may be liable, his conduct must affect some other and more important interest of the possessor. Therefore, one who intentionally intermeddles with another's chattel is subject to [37] liability only if his intermeddling is harmful or if the possessor is deprived of the use of the chattel for a substantial time, or some other legally protected interest of the possessor is affected . . . Sufficient legal protection of the possessor's interest in the mere inviolability of his chattel is afforded by his privilege to use reasonable force to protect his possession against even harmless interference." Restatement (Second) of Torts § 218, Comment e (2015).

Second, Defendants maintain that Dodge Data's declaratory judgment claim is too hypothetical, because iSqFt/CMD did not threaten litigation, but only advised Dodge Data that iSqFt's former employees may not solicit iSqFt's customers and employees. HN43[] The standard is whether the "facts alleged, under all the circumstances, show that there is a substantial controversy, between parties having adverse legal interests, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment." MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 549 U.S. 118, 127, 127 S. Ct. 764, 166 L. Ed. 2d 604 (2007). Considering all of [39] the circumstances in the light most favorable to Dodge Data, the Court finds that Dodge Data has alleged sufficient facts to meet this standard.

Finally, Defendants argue that Dodge Data failed to plead any specific facts about any specific covenant, which highlights the absence of an actual controversy as required by the Declaratory Judgment Act. 28 U.S.C. § 2201. However, Dodge Data alleged that it did not hire any of Defendants' former employees who were subject to restrictive covenants "due to the uncertainty" created by the restrictive covenants. (Doc. 28 at ¶ 186). Defendants have clearly taken a contrary position. (Id., Ex. C). Dodge Data is in the position of pursuing "arguably illegal behavior" or "abandoning its right to do [so]." MedImmune, Inc., 549 U.S. at 129. HN44[] The "dilemma" created by "putting the challenger to the choice between abandoning his rights or risking prosecution" is "'a dilemma that it was the very purpose of the Declaratory Judgment Act to ameliorate.'" Id.

Accordingly, Dodge Data has stated a claim for declaratory judgment.

[*876] IV. CONCLUSION

For these reasons, Defendants' motion to dismiss (Doc. 29) is DENIED.

Opinion

THIS DOCUMENT RELATES TO ALL DIRECT-PURCHASER PLAINTIFF CASES

ORDER AND REASONS

Defendants Pool Corporation, SCP Distributors LLC, and Superior Pool Products (collectively, "Pool"), move for summary judgment on Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' (DPPs') vertical conspiracy claims, as well as Indirect Purchaser Plaintiffs' (IPPs') analogous state-law claims.[1] DPPs have alleged that Pool maintained an unlawful vertical agreement with each Manufacturer Defendant—Hayward Industries, Inc., Pentair Water Pool and Spa, Inc., and Zodiac Pool Systems, Inc. For the following reasons, the Court grants the motion.

I. BACKGROUND

This is an antitrust case that direct-purchaser plaintiffs (DPPs) and indirect-purchaser plaintiffs (IPPs) filed against Pool and the Manufacturer Defendants. Pool is the country's largest [*4] distributor of products used for the construction and maintenance of swimming pools (Pool Products).[2] The Manufacturer Defendants are the three largest manufacturers of Pool Products in the United States: Hayward, Zodiac, and Pentair.[3] As defined in DPPs' Second Consolidated Amended Class Action Complaint and IPPs' Third Amended Class Action Complaint, Pool Products are the equipment, products, parts, and materials used for the construction, renovation, maintenance, repair, and service of residential and commercial swimming pools. Pool Products include pumps, filters, covers, drains, fittings, rails, diving boards, and chemicals, among other goods. Pool buys Pool Products from manufacturers, including the three the Manufacturer Defendants, and in turn sells them to DPPs, which include pool builders, pool retail stores, and pool service and repair companies (collectively referred to as "Dealers").[4] IPPs are pool owners who indirectly purchased Pool Products manufactured by the Manufacturer Defendants and distributed by Pool.[5]

DPPs filed two consolidated amended complaints—the first on June 29, 2012[6] and the second on June 21, 2013[7]—each of [*5] which defendants moved to dismiss. Following the Court's orders on those motions, DPPs were left with the following five claims: (1) a Section 1 claim under the per se rule involving a horizontal agreement between the Manufacturer Defendants and Pool to fix free freight minimums; (2) three Section 1 claims under the rule of reason involving three separate vertical conspiracies (one between Pool and each Manufacturer Defendant) to exclude Pool's competitors; and (3) a Section 2 attempted monopolization claim against Pool.[8] Pool has moved for summary judgment on these five claims. In addition, DPPs have moved for class certification. Both Pool and DPPs have also moved in limine to exclude the opposing party's experts.

The Court dismissed DPPs' Section 1 horizontal conspiracy claim on summary judgment.[9] The Court also excluded in part the testimony of DPPs' expert, Dr. Gordon Rausser.[10] Specifically, the Court excluded Dr. Rausser's aggregated causation analysis to demonstrate the supposed anticompetitive effects of Pool's alleged vertical conspiracies with each Manufacturer Defendant.[11]

IPPs initially alleged that the conduct of Pool and the Manufacturer [*6] Defendants violated various antitrust and deceptive trade practices laws of California, Arizona, Florida, and Missouri. Specifically, IPPs alleged violations of California's antitrust law, the Cartwright Act, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720, et seq.; the Unfair Competition Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200, et seq.; the state antitrust provisions of Ariz. Rev. Stat. §§ 44-1401, et seq.; the consumer protection provisions of the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act, Fl. Stat. §§ 501.201, et seq., including § 501.204; and the consumer protection provisions of the Missouri Merchandising Practices Act, Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 407.010, et seq.[12] IPPs based their claims on allegations of the same underlying conduct that DPPs alleged in their Sherman Act claims.

On May 24, 2013, the Court dismissed IPPs' claims under the California Unfair Competition Law, Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act, and Missouri Merchandising Practice Act that were based on the theory that defendants engaged in fraud or misrepresentation. The Court also dismissed IPPs' illegal group boycott claim under the Cartwright Act because IPPs failed to allege a horizontal agreement.[13] IPPs were left with the following claims: California Unfair Competition Law and rule of reason Cartwright Act claims involving three vertical conspiracies (one between Pool and each Manufacturer Defendant); [*7] Arizona Antitrust Act claims involving three vertical conspiracies and a claim of attempted monopolization against Pool; Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act claims involving three vertical conspiracies and a claim of attempted monopolization against Pool; and Missouri Merchandising Practice Acts claims based on defendants' alleged anticompetitive agreements to exclude Pool's rivals and Pool's attempted monopolization.[14]

The Court now analyzes whether plaintiffs have sufficient evidence to proceed on their vertical conspiracy claims.

III. DISCUSSION

A. DPPs' Sherman Act Claims

Liability in a private antitrust action requires the plaintiff to prove that the defendants violated the antitrust laws, that the violation injured the plaintiff's business or property, and that the plaintiff has some indication of the amount of damage done. See El Aguila Food Prods., Inc. v. Gruma Corp., 131 F. App'x 450, 452 (5th Cir. 2005); Kestenbaum v. Falstaff Brewing Corp., 514 F.2d 690, 694 (5th Cir. 1975).

Here, DPPs allege that Pool has violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act through three vertical agreements (one with each Manufacturer Defendant) "to restrict rivals' access to supply from the Manufacturer Defendants and to foreclose rivals from selling to PoolCorp's customers."[15]

Section 1 of the Sherman Act forbids every contract, combination, or conspiracy that unreasonably restrains trade. See 15 U.S.C. §1; NYNEX Corp. v. Discon, Inc., 525 U.S. 128, 133, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1998). Courts test the unreasonableness, and thus the illegality, of a vertical restraint by the rule of reason. Leegin Creative Leather Prods, Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007). Under the rule of reason, whether a challenged restraint "unreasonably restrains trade" refers to whether it caused an "injury to competition." PSKS, Inc. v. Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc., 615 F.3d 412, 417 (5th Cir. 2010) (quoting Doctor's Hosp., Inc. v. Se. Med. Alliance, Inc., 123 F.3d 301, 307 (5th Cir. 1997)). Courts must balance > the anticompetitive evils of a restrictive [*9] practice . . . against any procompetitive benefits or justifications within the confines of the relevant market. Proof that the defendant's activities, on balance, adversely affected competition in the appropriate product and geographic markets is essential to recovery under the rule of reason.

Doctor's Hosp., 123 F.3d at 307 (citing Hornsby Oil Co. v. Champion Spark Plug Co., 714 F.2d 1384, 1392 (5th Cir. 1983)). When assessing the effect on competition of a vertical conspiracy in a case that includes multiple "discrete conspiracies," a court must evaluate each alleged agreement individually:

> [E]ach . . . agreement must be treated as a separate conspiracy, and only acts taken in furtherance of that alleged conspiracy are appropriately considered in determining the adverse effects of the claimed restraints on trade, not acts of one conspirator taken in furtherance of other possible, distinct conspiracies. . . . Indeed, to hold otherwise would be to suggest that the distinction between a single conspiracy and multiple conspiracies involving a common defendant is one without a difference.

[15] R. Doc. 584 at 1.

Dickson v. Microsoft Corp., 309 F.3d 193, 210-11 (4th Cir. 2002) (citations omitted). If, on balance, the challenged conduct in furtherance of a particular agreement injures competition, then that agreement violates Section 1; if not, then not.

In support of summary judgment on each of DPPs' [*10] vertical conspiracy claims, Pool argues that DPPs cannot show that any of Pool's alleged agreements with Hayward, Zodiac, or Pentair injured competition and therefore cannot show that an antitrust violation occurred.

DPPs depend on Dr. Rausser's aggregated causation analysis to prove that the three alleged vertical conspiracies had an anticompetitive effect on the relevant market. DPPs ask the Court to consider Pool's separate vertical agreements with each Manufacturer Defendant collectively in analyzing the competitive effects. DPPs also ask the Court to consider Pool and the Manufacturer Defendants' alleged horizontal agreement, a claim the Court has since dismissed on summary judgment for lack of evidence of horizontal collusion.

According to DPPs, "[t]he[] restraints operated collectively and . . . collectively gave rise to the reduction in competition and the artificial elevation in prices . . . ."[16] But the Court has excluded Dr. Rausser's aggregate causation analysis in aid of DPPs' vertical conspiracy claims, finding that it did not fit the legal standard applicable to a vertical conspiracy claim. This standard tasks the Court with separately considering the competitive effect of each [*11] alleged conspiracy, rather than the aggregate effect of all allegedly unlawful conduct, as Dr. Rausser has done.

The cases on which DPPs rely in urging the Court to consider the aggregate effect of all alleged conspiracies are distinguishable. In those cases, the courts considered the effect of various conduct taken in furtherance of a single conspiracy, not the combined competitive effect of multiple alleged conspiracies to prove that any one conspiracy, on its own, was anticompetitive. See, e.g., Cont'l Ore v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 82 S. Ct. 1404, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777 (1962) (single conspiracy to monopolize claim); LePage's Inc. v. 3M, 324 F.3d 141 (3d Cir. 2003); In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651 (7th Cir. 2002) (single horizontal conspiracy claim); Taylor Publishing Co. v. Jostens, Inc., 216 F.3d 465 (5th Cir. 2000) (single attempted monopolization claim); Southway Theatres, Inc. v. Georgia Theatre Co., 672 F.2d 485 (5th Cir. 1982) (single horizontal conspiracy claim); Associated Radio Serv. Co. v. Page Airways, Inc., 624 F.2d 1342 (5th Cir. 1980) (single attempted monopolization claim).

DPPs' reliance on exclusive dealing cases, like Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co., 258 U.S. 346, 42 S. Ct. 360, 66 L. Ed. 653 (1922) and Standard Oil Co. v. United States (Standard Stations), 337 U.S. 293, 69 S. Ct. 1051, 93 L. Ed. 1371 (1949), and horizontal boycott cases, like Toys "R" Us, Inc. v. FTC, 221 F.3d 928 (7th Cir. 2000), is also misplaced. First, as the Court explained in its order partially excluding the opinion of Dr. Rausser, the Court dismissed DPPs' boycott claim on the pleadings and granted summary judgment on DPPs' horizontal price-fixing claim for lack of evidence of horizontal collusion. DPPs' continued arguments on the issue do not preclude summary judgment. Moreover, because [*12] this case does not involve exclusive dealing agreements, cases detailing how these agreements may be anticompetitive are unhelpful. It is undisputed that Pool did not maintain an exclusive distributorship with any Manufacturer Defendant. Pool's preferred vendor program required that vendors conduct $2 million worth of business with Pool, while manufacturers could and did do business with other distributors. DPPs' own expert Dr. Rausser confirms that the three Manufacturer Defendants conducted the majority of their business with entities other than Pool.[17]

Without evidence that any of the alleged vertical conspiracies injured competition, DPPs cannot prove the antitrust violation necessary to sustain their vertical conspiracy claims.

B. IPPs' State-Law Claims

[16] Id. at 56.

[17] Rausser Initial Report, April 10, 2014, at 40-42.

Pool argues that IPPs state-law vertical conspiracy claims "suffer from the same deficiencies [and] legal insufficienc[ies]" as DPPs' Sherman Act claims.[18] It is undisputed that IPPs rely on the aggregated effects of Pool's conduct with all three Manufacturer Defendants to establish injury to competition, which allegedly resulted in supra-competitive prices for Pool Products. Thus, IPPs' vertical conspiracy [*13] claims are likewise subject to summary judgment.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court GRANTS Pool's motions for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claims of vertical conspiracies between Pool and Hayward, Pool and Zodiac, and Pool and Pentair.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

HN4[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

To establish an actionable antitrust violation, a plaintiff must show both that the defendant engaged in anticompetitive conduct and that the plaintiff suffered antitrust injury as a result. Courts employ either a per se or a rule of reason analysis to determine whether conduct is anticompetitive. The per se illegality rule applies when a business practice on its face, has no purpose except stifling competition. When conduct does not trigger a per se analysis, the court applies a rule of reason test, which focuses on the particular facts disclosed by the record.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > State Regulation

HN5[] Trade Practices & Unfair Competition, State Regulation

The New Jersey Antitrust Act shall be construed in harmony with ruling judicial interpretations of comparable federal antitrust statutes.

HN6[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

One form of potentially anticompetitive conduct is an exclusive dealing arrangement, which is an express or de facto agreement in which a buyer agrees to purchase certain goods or services only from a particular seller for a certain period of time. While exclusive dealing arrangements may deprive competitors of a market for their goods, they can also offer consumers various economic benefits, such as assuring them the availability of supply and price stability. As such, an exclusive dealing arrangement does not constitute a per se violation of the antitrust laws and is instead judged under the rule of reason.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > Exclusive Dealing

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

HN7[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

An exclusive dealing agreement is illegal under the rule of reason only if the probable effect of the arrangement is to substantially lessen competition, rather than merely disadvantage rivals. While there is no set formula for making this determination, the court must consider whether a plaintiff has shown substantial foreclosure of the market for the relevant product. The court also analyzes the likely or actual anticompetitive effects of the exclusive dealing arrangement, including whether there was reduced output, increased price, or reduced quality in goods or services.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > Exclusive Dealing

HN8[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

To demonstrate substantial foreclosure, a plaintiff must both define the relevant market and prove the degree of foreclosure. Although the test is not total foreclosure, the challenged practices must bar a substantial number of rivals or severely restrict the market's ambit. There is no fixed percentage at which foreclosure becomes substantial and courts have varied widely in the degree of foreclosure they consider unlawful. In analyzing the amount of foreclosure, the court's concern is not about which products a consumer chooses to purchase, but about which products are reasonably available to that consumer. For example, if customers are free to switch to a different product in the marketplace but choose not to do so, competition has not been thwarted, even if a competitor remains unable to increase its market share. One competitor's inability to compete does not automatically mean competition has been foreclosed.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization

HN9[] Regulated Practices, Monopolies & Monopolization

In certain circumstances, courts have recognized that a monopolist may use its power to break the competitive mechanism and deprive customers of the ability to make a meaningful choice.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

HN10[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

A bundling arrangement generally involves discounted rebates or prices for the purchase of multiple products.

HN11[] Actual Monopolization, Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices

Bundling is anticompetitive when it could foreclose portions of the market to a potential competitor who does not manufacture an equally diverse group of products and who therefore cannot make a comparable offer.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements

HN12[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Tying is an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition

HN13[] Regulated Practices, Trade Practices & Unfair Competition

While false or deceptive statements may violate the antitrust laws in rare circumstances, at minimum, a plaintiff must show that such statements induced or were likely to induce reasonable reliance by consumers.

HN14[] Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices, Predatory Pricing

Unlawful predatory pricing occurs when a firm reduces its prices to below-cost levels to drive competitors out of the market and, once competition is eliminated, reduces output and raises its prices to supracompetitive levels. Reducing prices to only above-cost levels, however, generally does not have an anticompetitive effect because the exclusionary effect of prices above a relevant measure of cost reflects the lower cost structure of the alleged predator, and so represents competition on the merits. While there may be situations where above-cost prices are anticompetitive, it is beyond the practical ability of a judicial tribunal to ascertain this without courting intolerable risks of chilling legitimate price-cutting. In light of this economic reality, a plaintiff can succeed on a predatory pricing claim only if it can show that (1) the rival's low prices are below an appropriate measure of its costs and (2) the rival had a dangerous probability of recouping its investment in below-cost prices. This is known as the price-cost test.

When a competitor complains that a rival's sales program violates the antitrust laws, the court must consider whether the conduct constitutes an exclusive dealing arrangement or simply a pricing practice. Defendants may argue that the challenged conduct is fundamentally an above-cost pricing scheme and therefore the price-cost test applies, ultimately dooming a plaintiff's claims, but not all contractual practices involving above-cost prices are per se legal under the antitrust laws. The price-cost test may be utilized as a specific application of the rule of reason only when price is the clearly predominant mechanism of exclusion. Where a dominant supplier enters into de facto exclusive dealing arrangements with every customer in the market, other firms may be driven out not because they cannot compete on a price basis, but because they are never given an opportunity to compete, despite their ability to offer products with significant customer demand.

When pricing predominates over other means of exclusivity, the price-cost test applies. This is usually the case when a firm uses a single-product loyalty discount or rebate to compete with similar products. In that situation, an equally efficient competitor can match the loyalty price and the firms can compete on the merits. More in-depth factual analysis is unnecessary because the balance always tips in favor of allowing above-cost pricing practices to stand.

[*398] ROTH, Circuit Judge:

The antitrust laws are concerned with "the protection of competition, not [*399] competitors."[1] Eisai complains that the conduct of Sanofi Aventis U.S., LLC, and Sanofi U.S. Services, Inc., (Sanofi) jointly and severally harmed competition in the market for anticoagulant [2] drugs by preventing hospitals from replacing Lovenox, one of Sanofi's drugs, with competing drugs. The facts, however, do not bear out Eisai's characterization of market events. For the reasons stated below, we conclude that what Eisai calls "payoffs" were, in reality, discounts offered by Sanofi to its customers; what Eisai calls "agreements with hospitals to block access" were, in reality, provisions proscribing customers from favoring competing drugs over Lovenox; what Eisai calls "a campaign of 'fear, uncertainty, and doubt'" was, in reality, Sanofi's marketing of Lovenox. Analyzing Eisai's claims under the rule of reason, we find no evidence that Sanofi's actions caused broad harm to the competitive nature of the anticoagulant market. To the extent that Sanofi's conduct caused damage to its competitors, that is not a harm for which Congress has prescribed a remedy. We will therefore affirm the order of the District Court, granting summary judgment in favor of Sanofi.

Lovenox is an anticoagulant drug used in the treatment and prevention of deep vein thrombosis (DVT), a condition in which blood clots develop in a person's veins. Lovenox belongs to a category of injectable, anticoagulant [3] drugs known as low molecular weight heparin (LMWH). Lovenox was the first LMWH approved by the Food and Drug Administration and has been sold by Sanofi in the United States since 1993. Lovenox has at least seven FDA-approved uses (known as indications), including the treatment of certain severe forms of heart attack.

Fragmin is a competing injectable LMWH, which Pfizer, Inc., initially sold only abroad. In September 2005, Pfizer sold Eisai an exclusive license to market, sell, and distribute Fragmin in the United States. Fragmin has five FDA-approved indications, some of which overlap Lovenox's indications. Fragmin is also indicated to reduce the reoccurrence of symptomatic venous thromboembolism in cancer patients, while Lovenox is not. Lovenox, however, is indicated for treating certain more severe forms of heart attack, an indication that Fragmin does not have.

[1] Brown Shoe Co v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962).

The relevant product market also consists of two other injectable anticoagulant drugs, Innohep and Arixtra. Innohep, a LMWH, was manufactured and sold by LEO Pharma Inc. in the United States from 2000 to 2011. Arixtra is an injectable anticoagulant approved by the FDA in 2001 and sold in the United States by GlaxoSmithKline [4] from 2005 to 2010. While not a LMWH, Arixtra is clinically comparable to LMWHs in its treatment of DVT.

Relevant to Eisai's claims is the market for Lovenox, Fragmin, Innohep, and Arixtra in the United States from September 27, 2005 (when Eisai was able to begin selling Fragmin) until July 25, 2010 (when Sanofi ended certain marketing practices after a generic entered the market). During that time, Lovenox had the most indications of the four drugs, the largest sales force, and maintained a market share of 81.5% to 92.3%. Fragmin had the second largest market share at 4.3% to 8.2%.

Eisai's antitrust claims relate to Sanofi's marketing of Lovenox to U.S. hospitals. Most hospitals are members of group purchasing organizations (GPOs), which negotiate drug contracts and discounts from pharmaceutical companies on behalf of their members. From September 2005 until July 2010, Sanofi offered GPOs the "Lovenox Acute Contract Value Program" (Program), featuring a contractual offer to sell Lovenox on certain terms and conditions. Eisai's allegations of anticompetitive conduct relate to three elements of this program: (1) market-share and volume discounts, (2) a restrictive formulary access clause, [5] and (3) aggressive sales tactics used to market the program.

(1) Under the terms of the Program, hospitals received price discounts based on the volume of Lovenox they purchased and their market-share calculation tied to their purchases of the four anticoagulant drugs.[2] The Program generally treated a GPO's members as individual customers when determining the volume and market share. When a hospital's purchases of Lovenox were below 75% of its total purchases of LMWHs, it received a flat 1% discount regardless of the volume of Lovenox purchased. But when a hospital increased its market share above that threshold, it would receive an increasingly higher discount based on a combination of the volume purchased and the market share. For example, in 2008, the discount ranged from 9% to 30% of the wholesale price. Additionally, if certain criteria were met, a multi-hospital system could have the hospitals' volumes and market shares calculated as one entity. For a multi-hospital system, the discount started at 15% for a market share meeting the threshold, and increased to 30%.

Although this discount structure motivated GPOs to purchase more Lovenox, they were not contractually obligated to do so. The consequence of not obtaining 75% market share was that a customer would receive only the 1% discount. If a customer chose to terminate the contract, it was required to give thirty days' notice and could still purchase Lovenox "off contract" at the wholesale price.

(2) The Program also included a formulary access clause that limited a hospital's ability to give certain drugs priority status on its formulary. Generally, a hospital maintains a formulary, a list of medications approved for use in the hospital based on factors such as a drug's cost, safety, and efficacy. The formulary access clause in the Lovenox contract required customers to provide Lovenox with unrestricted formulary access for all FDA-approved Lovenox indications so that the availability of Lovenox was not more restricted or limited than the availability of Fragmin, Innohep, or Arixtra. Hospitals were also forbidden by the contract to adopt any restrictions or limitations on marketing [7] or promotional programs for Lovenox. In essence, the contract did not prohibit members from putting other anticoagulant drugs on their formularies, but did prohibit them from favoring those drugs over Lovenox. Noncompliance with the contract did not limit a customer's access to Lovenox; it merely caused a customer's discount to drop to the 1% base level.

[2] Specifically, the market share was defined as the rolling four months of Lovenox units purchased by the hospital divided [6] by the rolling four months of all units purchased within the market for Lovenox, Fragmin, Arixtra, and Innohep.

(3) According to Eisai, Sanofi further engaged in a long-term campaign to discredit Fragmin by spreading "fear, uncertainty and doubt" about its safety and [*401] efficacy. Eisai asserts that the so-called "FUD" campaign consisted of the following conduct: Sanofi paid doctors to publish articles attacking Fragmin on false grounds, without properly disclosing such payments, and distributed those articles broadly; Sanofi paid doctors to present educational programs regarding the medical and legal risks of switching from Lovenox, casting doubt on Fragmin's effectiveness and promoting a belief that Fragmin use would expose hospitals to malpractice liability; Sanofi's representatives claimed that Lovenox was superior to other drugs, in violation of FDA regulations; and Sanofi promoted Lovenox for non-indicated cancer-related uses, also in violation [8] of FDA regulations.

C.

Eisai commenced this action on August 18, 2008, in the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey, asserting (1) willful and unlawful monopolization and attempted monopolization in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act;[3] (2) de facto exclusive dealing in violation of Section 3 of the Clayton Act;[4] (3) an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act;[5] and (4) violations of the New Jersey Antitrust Act.[6] Sanofi moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim and for being untimely under the applicable statute of limitations. After a hearing, the District Court denied the motion and referred the case to a magistrate judge for further proceedings.

The parties then engaged in extensive discovery. On one particularly contentious discovery issue, Eisai moved to compel discovery of deposition transcripts from a 2003 antitrust lawsuit brought by Organon Sanofi-Synthelabo (OSS) against Aventis Pharmaceuticals (Sanofi's predecessor) relating to a contractual offer similar to the terms of the Lovenox Program. On February 27, 2012, the Magistrate Judge denied Eisai's motion on the basis that the 2003 transcripts were irrelevant to the current [9] action and unlikely to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence, and because the burden or expense of the discovery outweighed its likely benefit. The District Court affirmed the order.

Both parties subsequently moved for summary judgment. Eisai relied largely on an expert report by Professor Einer Elhauge, who determined that customers occupying a certain spectrum of market share would not save money by partially switching to a rival drug, even if the rival drug was cheaper than Lovenox. According to Professor Elhauge, the Lovenox Program restricted rival sales by bundling each customer's contestable demand for Lovenox (the units that the customer is willing to switch to rival products) with the customer's incontestable demand for Lovenox (the units that the customer is less willing to switch to rival products). The incontestable demand for Lovenox was based, at least partially, on its unique cardiology indication, which no other anticoagulant in the market possessed and which hospitals needed to treat certain of their patients. Based on Lovenox's and Fragmin's April 2007 prices, Professor Elhauge determined that bundling resulted in an enormous "dead zone" spanning Fragmin's market [10] share: For any system choosing to increase its Fragmin market share from 10% to any amount less than 62%, it would actually cost hospitals more to switch from Lovenox to Fragmin despite [*402] Fragmin's lower price. Professor Elhauge also determined that the Program foreclosed between 68% and 84% of the relevant market.

On March 28, 2014, the District Court granted Sanofi's motion for summary judgment. The District Court held first that price was the predominant mechanism of exclusion under Sanofi's practices, and therefore Eisai's antitrust claims could not succeed because Sanofi's prices were above cost. Next, the court held that, even when analyzed under an exclusive dealing framework, Eisai's claims still failed because the evidence could not support Eisai's contention that Sanofi engaged in unlawful exclusive dealing. Eisai also could not satisfy the antitrust-injury requirement because it could not establish that its lower market share was attributable to anticompetitive conduct by Sanofi as opposed to other factors.

The applicable law is the same for each of Eisai's four claims.[11] HN4[] To establish an actionable antitrust violation, Eisai must show both that Sanofi engaged in anticompetitive conduct and that Eisai suffered antitrust injury as a result.[12] Courts employ either a per se or a rule of reason analysis to determine whether conduct is anticompetitive.[13] The "per se illegality rule applies when a business practice 'on its face, has no purpose except stifling competition.'"[14] When conduct does not [*403] trigger a per se analysis, we apply a rule of reason test, which focuses on the "particular facts disclosed by the record."[15]

HN6[] One form of potentially anticompetitive conduct is an exclusive dealing arrangement, which is an express or de facto "agreement in which a buyer agrees to purchase certain goods or services only from a particular seller for a certain period of time."[16] While exclusive dealing arrangements may deprive competitors of a market for their goods, they can also offer consumers various economic benefits, such as assuring them the availability of supply and price stability.[17] As such, an exclusive dealing arrangement does not constitute a per se violation of the antitrust laws and is instead judged under the rule of reason.[18]

Eisai argues that Sanofi's conduct, as a whole, operated as a de facto exclusive dealing arrangement that unlawfully hindered competition. HN7[] An exclusive dealing agreement is illegal under [13] the rule of reason "only if the 'probable effect' of the arrangement is to substantially lessen competition, rather than merely disadvantage rivals."[19] While there is no set formula for making this determination, we must consider whether a plaintiff has shown substantial foreclosure of the market for the relevant product.[20] We also analyze the likely or actual anticompetitive effects of the exclusive dealing arrangement, including whether there was reduced output, increased price, or reduced quality in goods or services.[21]

HN8[] To demonstrate substantial foreclosure, a plaintiff "must both define the relevant market and prove the degree of foreclosure."[22] Although "[t]he test is not total foreclosure," the challenged practices must "bar a substantial number of rivals or severely restrict the market's ambit."[23] "There is no fixed percentage at which foreclosure becomes 'substantial' and courts have varied widely in the degree of foreclosure they consider unlawful."[24] In analyzing the amount of foreclosure, our concern is not about which products a consumer chooses to purchase, but about which products are reasonably available to that consumer.[25] For example, if [14] customers are free to switch to a different product in the marketplace but choose not to do so, competition has not been thwarted—even if a competitor remains unable to increase its market share.[26] One competitor's inability to [*404] compete does not automatically mean competition has been foreclosed.

HN9[] In certain circumstances, however, we have recognized that a monopolist "may use its power to break the competitive mechanism and deprive customers of the ability to make a meaningful choice."[27] That was the case in LePage's Inc. v. 3M, where we held that the use of bundled rebates, when offered by a monopolist, foreclosed portions of the market to competitors that did not offer an equally diverse line of products.[28] Similarly, in United States v. Dentsply International, Inc., we held that a dominant manufacturer of prefabricated teeth hindered competition when it prohibited dealers from adding competing tooth lines to their product offerings and retained the ability to terminate the dealer relationships at will.[29] Finally, in ZF Meritor, we found the defendant's conduct to be anticompetitive when the defendant leveraged [15] its position as a dominant supplier of necessary products to force manufacturers into long term agreements and there was proof that the manufacturers were concerned that they would be unable to meet consumer demand without doing so.[30] Although consumers had a choice between products in LePage's, Dentsply, and ZF Meritor, in each case the defendant's anticompetitive conduct rendered that choice meaningless.

Eisai argues that Sanofi's practices substantially foreclosed the market for anticoagulant drugs because hospitals had no choice but to purchase Lovenox despite its increasing price. In support, Eisai points to what it characterizes as "extensive evidence" of hospitals that wanted to purchase Fragmin but allegedly were prevented from doing so due to Sanofi's conduct. But identification of a few dozen hospitals out of almost 6,000 in the United States is not enough to demonstrate "substantial foreclosure"[31] — particularly, if the reason a hospital did not change to Fragmin was due to price, i.e., the loss of the discounts offered by the Program.

Eisai also relies on the findings of Professor Elhauge, who described two purported examples of "foreclosure." First, Professor Elhauge claims that the discount offered by Sanofi foreclosed rivals from 68% to 84% of the LMWH market. Professor Elhauge calculated this percentage by "treat[ing] as restricted any customer that was receiving loyal Lovenox prices and thus would have been penalized with higher Lovenox prices if they purchased a higher percentage of their LTC drugs from rivals." In other words, Professor Elhauge assumed that all Lovenox customers utilizing the discount program were foreclosed from switching to another LMWH drug. Second, Professor Elhauge asserts that the Lovenox discount created a "dead zone" that prevented customers from increasing their Fragmin purchases to anywhere between 10% and 62% of their LMWH needs. Again, Professor Elhauge focuses on consumer preference as the basis [*405] for foreclosure. Specifically, he calculates this "dead zone" based [17] on the fact that "many customers are willing to switch only a portion of their Lovenox purchases to rival LTC drugs."

Professor Elhauge's examples of foreclosure ultimately derive from a theory of bundling of Lovenox demand. But HN10[] a bundling arrangement generally involves discounted rebates or prices for the purchase of multiple products.[32] For example, in LePage's, the plaintiffs alleged that 3M, a dominant seller of transparent tape in the United States, used its monopoly to gain a competitive advantage in the private label tape portion of the transparent market by offering a "multi-tiered 'bundled rebate' structure, which offered higher rebates when customers purchased products in a number of 3M's different product lines."[33] Analogizing this practice to tying, which is per se illegal, we found such HN11[] bundling anticompetitive because it could "foreclose portions of the market to a potential competitor who does not manufacture an equally diverse group of products and who therefore cannot make a comparable offer."[34] In ZF Meritor, we limited the reasoning in LePage's "to cases in which a single-product producer is excluded through a bundled rebate program offered by a producer of multiple products, [18] which conditions the rebates on purchases across multiple different product lines."[35] Significantly, Eisai does not claim that Sanofi conditioned discounts on purchases across various product lines, but on different types of demand for the same product. [*406] Such conduct does not present the same antitrust concerns as in LePage's, and we are aware of no court that has credited this novel theory.

We are not inclined to extend the rationale of LePage's based on the facts presented here. Even if bundling of different types of demand for the same product could, in the abstract, foreclose competition, nothing in the record indicates that an equally efficient competitor was unable to compete with Sanofi. Professor Elhauge defines incontestable demand as the "units that the customer is less willing to switch to rival products" because of "unique indications, departmental preferences, and doctor habit." Of course, obtaining an FDA indication requires investing a significant amount of time and resources in clinical trials. But Eisai does not offer evidence demonstrating that fixed costs were so high that competitors entering the market were unable to obtain a cardiology indication. In fact, Eisai has its own unique cancer indication, which it presumably obtained because of its calculated decision to focus on that area, above others. Nor does Eisai explain what percentage of incontestable demand for Lovenox was based on its unique cardiology indication as opposed to the other factors. While Professor Elhauge certainly explains why, in theory, a customer might hesitate to [21] switch from Lovenox to one of its lower priced competitors, Eisai fails to tie Professor Elhauge's model to concrete examples of anticompetitive consequences in the record. Accordingly, we cannot credit Eisai's bundling claims, at least on the facts before us.[36]

Eisai's reliance on our holdings in ZF Meritor and Dentsply is also misplaced. As a preliminary matter, although Eisai cites extensively to these cases for the proposition that Lovenox customers lacked any meaningful ability to switch products, its supposed evidence of foreclosure is grounded in Professor Elhauge's unsupported bundling theory. Moreover, Sanofi's conduct is distinguishable from the anticompetitive practices at issue in ZF Meritor and Dentsply. In ZF Meritor, the plaintiff "introduced evidence that compliance with the market penetration targets was mandatory because failing to meet such targets would jeopardize the [customers'] relationships with the dominant manufacturer of transmissions in the market." [22] [37] If customers did not comply with the targets for one year, they had to repay all contractual savings.[38] We observed that the situation was similar to Dentsply, where we applied an exclusive dealing analysis because "the defendant threatened to refuse to continue dealing with customers if customers purchased rival's products."[39] The threat to cut off supply ultimately provided customers with no choice but to continue purchasing from the defendants.

Here, Lovenox customers did not risk penalties or supply shortages for terminating the Lovenox Program or violating its terms. The consequence of not obtaining the 75% market share threshold or meeting the formulary requirements was not contract termination; rather, it was receiving the base 1% discount. If a customer [*407] chose to terminate the contract entirely, it could still obtain Lovenox at the wholesale price. In fact, nothing in the record demonstrates that a hospital's supply of Lovenox would be jeopardized in any way or that discounts already paid would have to be refunded. Attempting to draw a comparison with ZF Meritor, Eisai argues that the threat of not obtaining a higher discount (ranging up to 30% off) "handcuffed" hospitals [23] to the Lovenox Program. Yet, Eisai points to no evidence of this. Moreover, the threat of a lost discount is a far cry from the anticompetitive conduct at issue in ZF Meritor or Dentsply. On the record before us, Eisai has failed to point to evidence suggesting the kind of clear-cut harm to competition that was present in these earlier cases. Accordingly, Eisai fails to demonstrate that hospitals were foreclosed from purchasing competing drugs as a result of Sanofi's conduct.

Eisai also cannot demonstrate that Sanofi's conduct, as a whole, caused or was likely to cause anticompetitive effects in the relevant market. Eisai claims that the District Court ignored "proof" of reduction of output, denial of consumer choice, and increasing price. As to output, Eisai relies on two pages of Professor Elhauge's description of the annual growth rate in the anticoagulant market as more than doubling after generic entry. Because there was a large reduction in promotional spending that year, Professor Elhauge concluded that Sanofi must have previously been reducing output. Such an assumption cannot serve as a substitute for actual evidence at the summary judgment stage. Moreover, Eisai fails to [24] identify any record evidence in support of its argument that Sanofi's conduct restricted consumer choice, instead presumably relying on its theory of foreclosure.

Eisai's sole example of actual or likely anticompetitive effect is that Lovenox's price increased from 2005 until a generic entered the market in 2010. According to Eisai, the rising price is particularly significant considering Sanofi's long-term monopoly in the market and therefore provides ample basis for us to find a likelihood of anticompetitive effect. Specifically, Sanofi had as high as a 92% share of the market and Lovenox's price was the highest in the market. For example, in 2009, the average price per converted unit of Lovenox was $162.72 compared to $140.28 for Fragmin. While these figures certainly suggest that Lovenox's prices were high, we have no reason to believe that Sanofi's allegedly anticompetitive conduct was the cause. In fact, Sanofi's list prices increased at a rate similar to Eisai's prices and the Pharmaceutical Producer Price Index. As a result, we find little evidence to suggest that Sanofi's practices caused or were likely to cause anticompetitive effects.

Without evidence of substantial foreclosure [25] or anticompetitive effects, Eisai has failed to demonstrate that the probable effect of Sanofi's conduct was to substantially lessen competition in the relevant market, rather than to merely disadvantage rivals.[40] Unlike in LePage's, [*408] Dentsply, and ZF Meritor, Lovenox customers had the ability to switch to competing products. They simply chose not to do so. We will therefore affirm the District Court's grant of summary judgment in favor of Sanofi under a rule of reason analysis.

Turning to Safofi's argument that its discounts amounted to no more than price-based competition and Eisai's suit must be dismissed under the so-called price-cost test, we disagree. We are not persuaded that Eisai's claims fundamentally relate to pricing practices.

HN14[] Unlawful predatory pricing occurs when a firm reduces its prices to below-cost levels to drive competitors out of the market and, once competition is eliminated, reduces output and raises its prices to supracompetitive levels.[41] Reducing prices to only above-cost levels, however, generally does not have an anticompetitive effect because "the exclusionary [27] effect of prices above a relevant measure of cost . . . reflects the lower cost structure of the alleged predator, and so represents competition on the merits."[42] While there may be situations where above-cost prices are anticompetitive, it "is beyond the practical ability of a judicial tribunal" to ascertain this "without courting intolerable risks of chilling legitimate price-cutting."[43] In light of this "economic reality," a plaintiff can succeed on a predatory pricing claim only if it can show that (1) the rival's low prices are below an appropriate measure of its costs and (2) the rival had a dangerous probability of recouping its investment in below-cost prices.[44] This is known as the price-cost test.

Eisai's brief, in passing, provides only a handful of examples of hospitals that decided not to switch to Fragmin after their representatives attended meetings presented by Sanofi or its consultants. [26] But, even if these examples were enough to demonstrate reliance, Eisai has given us no reason to believe that it could not have corrected Sanofi's misstatements by supplying the hospitals with accurate information. See Santana Prods., Inv., 401 F.3d at 133 (holding that a defendant did not violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act by criticizing a competitor's partitions, in part, when the plaintiff "remain[ed] free to tout its products to the [customers] and remain[ed] equally free to reassure them that its partitions are superior to [defendant's] partitions and to prove [defendant] wrong with respect to the flammability of [its] partitions").

HN15[] When a competitor complains that a rival's sales program violates the antitrust laws, we must consider whether the conduct constitutes an exclusive dealing arrangement or simply a pricing practice. Defendants may argue that the challenged conduct is fundamentally an above-cost pricing scheme and therefore the price-cost test applies, ultimately dooming a plaintiff's claims. But not all contractual [*409] practices involving above-cost prices are per se legal [28] under the antitrust laws.[45] We previously explained in ZF Meritor that the price-cost test may be utilized as a "specific application of the 'rule of reason'" only when "price is the clearly predominant mechanism of exclusion."[46] There, the defendant urged us to apply the price-cost test because the plaintiff's claims were, "at their core, no more than objections to . . . offering prices . . . through its rebate program."[47] We declined to adopt this "unduly narrow characterization of the case as a 'pricing practices' case."[48] We explained that price itself did not function as the exclusionary tool: "Where, as here, a dominant supplier enters into de facto exclusive dealing arrangements with every customer in the market, other firms may be driven out not because they cannot compete on a price basis, but because they are never given an opportunity to compete, despite their ability to offer products with significant customer demand."[49]

Under ZF Meritor, HN16[] when pricing predominates over other means of exclusivity, the price-cost test applies. This is usually the case when a firm uses a single-product loyalty discount or rebate to compete with similar products.[50] In that situation, an equally efficient [29] competitor can match the loyalty price and the firms can compete on the merits. More in-depth factual analysis is unnecessary because we know that "the balance always tips in favor of allowing above-cost pricing practices to stand."[51] As a result, we apply the price-cost test as an application of the rule of reason in those circumstances and conclude that the above-cost pricing at issue is per se legal. But our conclusion may be different under different factual circumstances. Here, for example, Eisai alleges that its rival, having obtained a unique FDA indication, offered a discount that bundled incontestable and contestable demand. On Eisai's telling, the bundling — not the price — served as the primary exclusionary tool. Because we have concluded that Eisai's claims are not substantiated and that they fail a rule of reason analysis, we will not opine on when, if ever, the price-cost test applies to this type of claim.

IV.

Eisai also argues that the District Court abused its discretion in holding that discovery of deposition transcripts from the OSS litigation was irrelevant and unduly burdensome. Assuming the transcripts were relevant, Eisai must still show that the order resulted in "actual and substantial prejudice."[52] Eisai cannot show prejudice when it appears to have engaged in ample discovery in this case: Sanofi claims that Eisai took over thirty depositions, [*410] received millions of pages of documents, and subpoenaed approximately 350 third parties. Eisai was free to elicit information regarding the OSS litigation during this extensive discovery process and—in fact—did so by deposing at least one witness from that litigation. We therefore conclude that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying Eisai's request for production of the 2003 OSS deposition transcripts.

For the foregoing reasons, we will affirm the District Court's order, granting summary judgment in favor of Sanofi, and its order denying Eisai's motion to compel discovery of transcripts from a prior litigation.

RULING ON DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS

Toor, J.

In this class action, plaintiffs allege price-fixing by defendants, who are wholesale and retail sellers of unleaded gasoline in Chittenden, Franklin, and Grand Isle counties. Specifically, plaintiffs claim violations of the Vermont Consumer Protection Act (VCPA) (9 V.S.A. § 2453) as to wholesale gasoline (Count I) and retail gasoline (Count II), as well as unjust enrichment (Count III). Defendants have moved to dismiss pursuant to V.R.C.P. 12(b)(6), and also on statute of limitations grounds. Each defendant has filed a separate motion to dismiss, with generally overlapping arguments.

PLAINTIFFS' ALLEGATIONS

The following facts are alleged by plaintiffs in their complaint.[1] The court makes no findings as to their accuracy.

[1] Throughout this decision, "complaint" or "compl." refers to plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint, filed on July 30, 2015, unless otherwise indicated.

Plaintiffs bring this action individually and on behalf of the class, which consists of Vermont citizens and businesses who purchased unleaded gasoline at retail gasoline stations in Chittenden, Franklin, and Grand Isle counties (the "class area") during the class [*2] period (January 1, 2005 through the present). Compl. ¶ 2. The defendants are four Vermont corporations: R.L. Vallee, Inc., S.B. Collins, Inc., Champlain Farms/Wesco, Inc., and Champlain Oil Company, Inc. Id. ¶ 1.

Average retail gasoline prices in the class area have been inexplicably and persistently higher than elsewhere in the state—such as Middlebury and Rutland—and other areas of the Northeast and the United States. Id. ¶ 5. Defendants' gross wholesale and retail profits have periodically been: (1) twice the national average; (2) second highest out of 450 gasoline markets measured in the country; and (3) highest within New England. Id. Plaintiffs claim the high prices and profits are the result of a price-fixing agreement among defendants. See id. ¶ 34.

The class area contains a highly concentrated wholesale and retail gasoline market. Defendants collectively own or control at least four of the six meaningful gas suppliers, a 67% market share, and at least 64% of all class area gas stations. Additionally, defendants own and lease back gas pumps at several independently owned stations. Thus, defendants control wholesale pricing and as a result retail pricing at their stations and [*3] at several independent stations, with those stations passing on defendants' wholesale prices to consumers. Id. ¶ 6.

Several phenomena persist in the class area and during the class period that generally do not exist in competitive, non-collusive markets. One example alleged by plaintiffs is that defendants' wholesale and retail prices have been nearly identical, and the stations supplied by defendants have adjusted retail prices in direct relation to defendants' wholesale prices. Id. ¶¶ 7, 60-62. More specifically, defendants' wholesale prices have increased and decreased by the same or similar amounts on the same days. Id. ¶ 61. Likewise, retail prices at defendants' stations and stations they supply in the class area (over 100 stations) moved virtually in lockstep. Id. ¶ 62. During the class period, S.B. Collins typically sold gas at its Chittenden County station two cents above prices at Champlain Oil and Wesco stations, and three cents above stations owned by R.L. Vallee. Id. ¶ 71. This suggests, plaintiffs allege, that retail prices at Chittenden County stations were simply following collectively fixed wholesale prices. Id. Defendants directly charged a higher price to the independently [*4] owned gas stations they supplied, forcing them to charge higher prices to the class. Id. ¶¶ 72-73. If a co-conspirator had an incentive to take market share and profits by lowering its price, the other defendants could simply threaten to lower wholesale prices, thus reducing retail prices and "enforc[ing] the terms of the cartel." Id. ¶ 73.

Market prices often have not been logically related to terminal rack costs.[2] Market prices have: (1) increased or remained unchanged in times of declining cost, (2) increased when costs have not changed, and (3) decreased at a disproportionately smaller amount and pace than the decline in costs. Id. ¶ 7. Specifically, plaintiffs allege that from 2010 to 2015, there were six distinct periods of declining terminal rack prices, where defendants increased the price spread between Chittenden County and Rutland. Id. ¶ 69. The average time span of the six distinct periods was 94 days, including one 210-day span where the price spread quadrupled. Id.

Defendants have earned outsized gross profits, often in the top 10 of 450 gasoline markets measured in the United States. Id. ¶ 7. [*5] Defendants were able to achieve "abnormal and exorbitant" profits on the sale of gasoline within the class area. Id. ¶ 63. Their profit margins exceeded the margins realized by comparable gas stations outside of the class area within comparative markets in Vermont and throughout the United States. Id. ¶ 64. The Oil Price Information Service, a company that tracks the terminal and retail prices of gasoline throughout the country, found that the Burlington area was the most profitable gasoline market for retailers in the northeast United States and often in the top ten nationwide. Id. ¶ 8.

Defendants have maintained their wholesale and retail market shares despite numerous opportunities to compete on price to acquire market share. Id. ¶ 7. In competitive markets and during periods of declining costs, profit-motivated competitors would typically decrease prices to take more market share. Id. ¶ 67. However, that did not happen among defendants during the class period and within the class area. Id.

Defendants have frequently acquired real property on which they have imposed deed restrictions barring future use as gas stations to further limit competition or dilution of market share. Id. ¶ [*6] 7. Additionally, defendants have used Vermont environmental laws to obstruct the entry of low-cost gasoline providers and to extract unreasonable covenants that prevent or limit competition. Id.

With regard to those barriers to entry, plaintiffs allege two examples within the class area. First, in 2010 R.L. Vallee opposed Walmart's bid to build a discount store in Franklin County until it was written into the permit that "there shall be no sale of gasoline for automobiles." Id. ¶ 50. Second, R.L. Vallee has partnered with Wesco since 2007 to oppose Costco's plans to build a filling station in Colchester, Vermont. Id. ¶ 51. The entry of Costco into the market "would have meant the addition of a major low cost player acting outside of the cartel." Id. Plaintiffs allege three additional examples, all of them outside of the class area. Two involved deed and permitting restrictions at gas stations in Plainfield in 2012 and 2013-2014, while the other involved the closing of a gas station in St. Johnsbury in 2014. See id. ¶¶ 52-54.

When confronted by federal and state elected officials, Defendants have given pretextual or plainly false explanations for their pricing behavior, such as claiming [*7] they did not make a profit, or that they lost money on gasoline for substantial periods within the class period. Id. ¶¶ 7, 75, 80-81. While the issue at the legislative hearings was why a certain area of Vermont had higher prices than elsewhere in the state, defendants tried to confuse the issue by interjecting: (1) factors that apply throughout Vermont; (2) irrelevant comparisons between Vermont and other states; and (3) other "nonsensical red-herrings" that could not have explained the high price of gasoline within the class area. Id. ¶ 82. This was a "blatant attempt at misdirection" to conceal ongoing price coordination. Id. ¶ 83.

The proffered justifications for high gas prices provided by defendants at the hearings included freight differences, the high cost of living in Vermont, high terminal costs, fluctuation in wholesale price with limited turnover, overhead which can vary from location to location, labor costs, environmental compliance, repair costs, health insurance, utility costs, credit card fees, cost of crude available in Vermont, law enforcement authority reluctance to pursue people stealing gas, property taxes, costs to build gas stations and replace underground storage [*8] tanks, variable sales volumes, amenities such as hot coffee and made-to-order food, and clean bathrooms with fresh flowers. Id. ¶¶ 84-85. Additionally, the R.L. Vallee CEO gave an "irrelevant speech" about alleged environmental violations of a possible competitor, and how much his company is appreciated in the community. Id. ¶ 86. The hearing testimony summarized above, plaintiffs allege, does not explain the high price of unleaded gasoline in the class area, and only further demonstrates that defendants engaged in a price-fixing conspiracy. Id. ¶¶ 75, 80-87.

Additionally, the Federal Trade Commission concluded that gas prices in the greater Burlington area in late June 2012 were 10 to 43 cents a gallon higher than the FTC's computer model predicted they should be. Id. ¶ 9. Plaintiffs allege further evidence of collusive behavior in that defendants temporarily reduced their prices and profit margins before August 2012 and January 2013 legislative hearings investigating high gas prices in northwestern Vermont. Id. ¶ 74. These price reductions were executed despite rising costs for the purpose of masking illegally high prices charged at all other times, and demonstrates that defendants [*9] had control of the market. Id.

Plaintiffs allege that this evidence "does not support the possibility of innocent, independent pricing decisions" and "instead points directly to an extensive price-fixing scheme of long duration" perpetrated by defendants. Id. ¶ 15. More specifically, plaintiffs allege, the facts and data show that: (1) defendants agreed to set their wholesale prices at nearly identical levels to maintain retail prices at virtually all stations in the class area at illegally high levels; (2) defendants agreed to increase, decrease, and maintain their prices at or near the same time and by the same amount; (3) defendants' wholesale price-fixing directly inflated prices both at their stations and at the independent stations they supply; and (4) the class paid illegally inflated prices at defendants' stations and at the stations they supply. Id. Plaintiffs allege defendants might have pilfered over $100 million from the class during the class period. Id. ¶ 16.

In sum, "[p]laintiffs allege that during the Class Period, Defendants conspired to fix, raise, maintain, and/or stabilize unleaded gasoline prices being charged at wholesale and to all Vermont citizens who purchased gasoline in [*10] the Class Area. Because of Defendants' unlawful conduct, Plaintiffs paid artificially-inflated prices for unleaded gasoline, and, as a result, suffered monetary damages." Id. ¶ 34.

In the complaint, plaintiffs allege that defendants discussed and formed their anticompetitive agreements during "secret meetings and conversations, often conducted at undisclosed, out-of-the-way locations." Id. ¶ 79. However, during oral argument, plaintiffs retreated from their "secret meeting" allegation, instead relying on their assertion that defendants had the opportunity to meet. See Tr. of Hr'g on Mots. to Dismiss at 43-44; Compl. ¶ 59.[3] Specifically, the complaint alleges such opportunities through membership in the Vermont Petroleum Association by all defendants, which convened regular trade association meetings and more informal events like an annual golf tournament which "some or all of the [d]efendants" might have attended. Id. Plaintiffs also allege that the fact that defendants collectively agreed to one agent for representation at legislative hearings in 2012, 2013, and 2015, further demonstrates such opportunity to meet. See id.

Plaintiffs allege that they did not discover their cause of action earlier than immediately before the filing of this lawsuit because of defendants' fraudulent concealment of their conspiracy. Id. ¶ 89. Thus, plaintiffs assert the tolling of the statute of limitations. Id. ¶ 91.

DISCUSSION

I. Statute of Limitations

First, the court addresses the statute of limitations issue raised by Champlain Oil and Wesco. Those defendants contend the six-year statute of limitations has run because the class period started in 2005, and plaintiffs were in possession of enough facts to pursue and investigate their claim at that point. Plaintiffs' complaint alleges that despite due diligence during the class period, plaintiffs did not and could not discover their cause of action until immediately before the filing of this lawsuit in 2015 due to defendants' fraudulent concealment. Compl. ¶¶ 76-91.

In their opposition memo, Plaintiffs argue that the conspiracy was discovered in 2012. See Pl.'s Opp'n to Defs.' Mots. to Dismiss at 16 n.8 (filed Nov. 2, 2015). They also argue that the statute [*12] of limitations issue cannot be resolved on a motion to dismiss, arguing that this is a fact-intensive question that must be resolved by a jury. Id. While it is true that disputed facts regarding the time of discovery must go to a jury, plaintiffs are still required to plead facts that, if proved, would establish their tolling claim.

Defendants contend that discovery of the alleged conspiracy occurred simply by reviewing publicly available pricing data from 2005 and concluding that it amounted to a conspiracy. Thus, defendants argue, plaintiffs were on inquiry notice because the pricing data existed for years before the statute of limitations ran, and they point to no fact discovered in 2012 that could not have been discovered earlier. Retail gas prices are publicly posted on large signs, and public hearings were held regarding gas prices. Defendants further argue that by alleging no facts that would support a claim or inference of fraudulent concealment, plaintiffs fail to satisfy the heightened pleading standard for fraud contained in Rule 9(b) ("In all averments of fraud or mistake, the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake shall be stated with particularity.").

"If properly pleaded, [*13] fraudulent concealment can vitiate the statutory bar of the limitations defense." Fercenia v. Guiduli, 2003 VT 50, ¶ 14, 175 Vt. 541, 830 A.2d 55 (citing S. Burlington Sch. Dist. v. Goodrich, 135 Vt. 601, 606, 382 A.2d 220 (1977)). The Vermont Supreme Court has applied the same pleading rule in cases where the fraud is pled to avoid the statute of limitations rather than as a separate, affirmative claim. Id. ("Allegations of fraud . . . must be pled with particularity."); Standard Packaging Corp. v. Julian Goodrich Architects, Inc., 136 Vt. 376, 380-81, 392 A.2d 402 (1978); see also In re Elec. Carbon Products Antitrust Litig., 333 F. Supp. 2d 303, 315 (D.N.J. 2004) (plaintiffs seeking to toll statute of limitations based on defendant's fraudulent concealment must allege underlying acts of fraudulent concealment with particularity as required by heightened pleading standard for fraud claims); Boland v. Consol. Multiple Listing Serv., Inc., 868 F. Supp. 2d 506, 518 (D.S.C. 2011); Doe v. Order of St. Benedict, 836 F. Supp. 2d 872, 877 (D. Minn. 2011).

In the antitrust context, courts have generally held that a plaintiff must allege three elements of fraudulent concealment to avoid the statute of limitations: (1) affirmative acts by defendant to fraudulently conceal its conduct, (2) failure of plaintiff to discover the facts forming the basis of its claim within the limitations period, and (3) plaintiff's exercise of due diligence in attempting to discover those facts. State of N.Y. v. Hendrickson Bros., 840 F.2d 1065, 1083 (2d Cir. 1988); In re Ciprofloxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litigation, 261 F. Supp. 2d 188, 222 (E.D. N.Y. 2003); In re Nine West Shoes Antitrust Litigation, 80 F. Supp. 2d 181, 192 (S.D. N.Y. 2000); J. Miles, 1 Health Care and Antitrust L. § 9:10 n.32 (2016) (listing cases).

With respect to the first element, price-fixing and bid-rigging are considered "self-concealing" conspiracies, whose [*14] natures are "inherently secret." Miles, 1 Health Care and Antitrust L. § 9:10 and n.35 (listing cases). Thus, merely alleging a price fixing conspiracy is sufficient as to that element, and plaintiffs need not plead that defendants took independent, affirmative steps of concealment. See Hendrickson Bros., 840 F.2d at 1083-84; Hinds Cty., Miss. v. Wachovia Bank N.A., 620 F. Supp. 2d 499, 520 (S.D.N.Y. 2009); Nine West Shoes, 80 F. Supp. 2d at 193.

As to the second element, plaintiffs have pled that they "did not discover their cause of action until immediately before the filing of this lawsuit because [d]efendants' fraudulent concealment of their conspiracy was effective." Compl. ¶ 89. Some federal cases have found such allegations insufficiently particular under Rule 9(b). In Hinds, the plaintiffs failed to plead the second prong of fraudulent concealment where they alleged that "Plaintiffs and the Class members did not discover . . . that Defendants and their coconspirators were violating the antitrust laws until shortly before this litigation was commenced." 620 F. Supp. 2d at 520. The complaint in Hinds did "not specify when any Named Plaintiffs or Class members became aware of the antitrust violations, and therefore [did] not state 'with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake.'" Id. (citing F.R.C.P. 9(b)); see also In re Magnetic Audiotape Antitrust Litig., No. 99 Civ. 1580, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8366, 2002 WL 975678, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. May 9, 2002) (allegation that knowledge about the alleged antitrust [*15] violation "was obtained 'shortly before April 1999' is very vague. Such a general allegation, without more, fails to satisfy the second prong of the fraudulent concealment test.").

Plaintiffs' allegations of the second element of fraudulent concealment is similar to the Hinds allegation, which that court found insufficient. Vermont case law suggests the same conclusion. In a case involving an action for damages resulting from the collapse of portions of a building, the plaintiffs[4] alleged negligent installation of steel structural supports for the building's roof and sprinkler system. See Standard Packaging Corp. v. Julian Goodrich Architects, Inc., 136 Vt. 376, 377-78, 392 A.2d 402 (1978). The complaints charged that the defendants "'actively concealed' the defective work, which 'was not apparent to [plaintiff] in the exercise of reasonable diligence and was a latent rather than a patent defect.'" Id. at 378. The complaints also stated that the defective construction was discovered only when the building's roof collapsed. Id. The Supreme Court held that these allegations were sufficient to raise the issue of fraudulent concealment and bring the complaint within the applicable six year limitations period. Id. at 381.

In Standard Packaging, the complaint pled when and how plaintiff discovered the cause of action. In contrast, plaintiffs here have alleged merely that they "did not discover their cause of action earlier than immediately before the filing of this lawsuit." Compl. ¶ 89. This does not rise to the level of pleading with particularity under Rule 9(b). Plaintiffs do not state exactly when they discovered the cause of action, even though such information is presumably based on their actual knowledge and readily available.

[4] The plaintiffs in Standard were actually third-party plaintiffs, the complaints third-party [*16] complaints, and defendants third-party defendants. However, this court refers to them as plaintiffs, complaints, and defendants for ease of discussion.

As to the third element, plaintiffs pled that although they "exercised due diligence" during the class period, they "could not have discovered the self-concealing . . . conspiracy at an earlier date" because of defendants' fraudulent concealment. Compl. ¶ 90. In Hinds, the court found the allegations as to the third element insufficient to satisfy Rule 9(b). There, the plaintiffs did not allege that they performed any kind of due diligence, only that "Plaintiffs and Class members did not discover, nor could have discovered through reasonable [*17] diligence, that Defendants and their co-conspirators were violating the antitrust laws until shortly before this litigation was commenced, because Defendants and their co-conspirators used deceptive and secret methods to avoid detection and affirmatively conceal their violations." 620 F. Supp. 2d at 521-22. The court concluded that a "brief reference to 'reasonable diligence,' coupled with general allegations of secrecy and deception directed towards the first prong of fraudulent concealment," was not enough.[5] Id. at 522; see also Nine West Shoes, 80 F. Supp. 2d at 193 ("Plaintiffs must plead due diligence with specificity.").

This court finds the Hinds analysis persuasive under the heightened pleading standard for fraud. Here, plaintiffs do not provide any detail as to how they exercised due diligence. They do not state whether they discovered their cause of action from retail prices alone, or examination of retail prices together with wholesale prices and profits after a particular investigation, or through some other means. Without any particularity, plaintiffs cannot rely on the fraudulent concealment exception to avoid the statute of limitations.[6]

However, plaintiffs' failure to plead fraudulent concealment with particularity does not doom their entire action. The statute of limitations excludes only that portion of the class period before the six-year period immediately prior to the filing of the lawsuit. Plaintiffs do not allege merely a single agreement that took place in 2005 or a conspiracy that ended more than six years before the suit was filed. Rather, they allege an on-going price-fixing conspiracy between 2005 and 2015. The allegations as a whole, if sufficient to suggest a price fixing conspiracy, would place that conspiracy—at least in part—during the limitations period.

The original complaint in this suit was filed on June 22, 2015. Therefore, any alleged conspiratorial acts or injuries which occurred prior to June 22, 2009 are time-barred.[7]

[5] The Hinds court observed that the case law regarding the third prong is "not entirely consistent":

> The third prong has been characterized as requiring a showing that the plaintiff's ignorance of the claim "was not the result of lack of diligence," Hendrickson Bros., 840 F.2d at 1083. It has also been characterized as a requirement that a plaintiff show "due diligence in pursuing discovery of the claim," National Group, 420 F.Supp.2d at 265; see also Merrill Lynch, 154 F.3d at 60.

620 F. Supp. 2d at 522. Finding the first formulation "problematic" because it "allows the allegations required to satisfy the first prong of fraudulent concealment to also satisfy the third prong" and "is difficult to characterize . . . as pleading with particularity," the Hinds [*18] court noted that it agreed with other courts that in this context, "[g]eneral assertions of ignorance and due diligence without more specific explanation . . . will not satisfy the[ ] pleading requirements." Id. (alterations in original). Thus, "[d]ue diligence is not adequately pled if plaintiffs 'did not allege in the [complaint] that they exercised due diligence' or if they 'make no allegation of any specific inquiries of [defendants], [or] detail when such inquiries were made, to whom, regarding what, and with what response.'" Id. (quoting Merrill Lynch, 154 F.3d at 60) (alterations in original).

[7] At oral argument, plaintiffs also claimed that the alleged price-fixing constitutes a "continuing violation," and that that saves the entire class period from the statute of limitations. Tr. at 51. It is far from clear that the "continuing violation" theory would save the entire class period. See Klehr v. A.O. Smith Corp., 521 U.S. 179, 189-90, 117 S. Ct. 1984, 138 L. Ed. 2d 373 (1997) ("Antitrust law provides [*20] that, in the case of a 'continuing violation,' say, a price—fixing conspiracy that brings about a series of unlawfully high priced sales over a period of years, 'each overt act that is part of the violation and that injures the plaintiff,' e.g., each sale to the plaintiff, 'starts the statutory period running again, regardless of the plaintiff's knowledge of the alleged illegality at much earlier times.' But the commission of a separate new overt act generally does not permit the plaintiff to recover for the injury caused by old overt acts outside the limitations period.") (quoting 2 P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 338b, p. 145 (rev. ed.1995)) (citations omitted); Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 502 n. 15, 88 S. Ct.

II. First Amendment Protected Activity

Some of the conduct alleged by plaintiffs includes lobbying, permitting activity, and testimony before public hearings. The parties agree that this activity cannot form the basis of an antitrust violation under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. See Prof'l Real Estate Inv'rs, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Indus., Inc., 508 U.S. 49, 56, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1993) ("Those who petition government for redress are generally immune from antitrust liability.") (citing Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961)); Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 669, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965)). However, [*21] as plaintiffs correctly observe, evidence of such activity might be admissible to demonstrate the purpose and character of the alleged conspiracy. Pennington, 381 U.S. at 670 n.3; see also, e.g., Steward Health Care Sys., LLC v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Rhode Island, 997 F. Supp. 2d 142, 163 (D.R.I. 2014) ("a plaintiff may properly include evidence of immune lobbying activity in its antitrust allegations insofar as that evidence serves to illustrate the context and motive underlying the alleged anticompetitive conduct"); Evans v. Lorillard Tobacco Co., 465 Mass. 411, 457, 990 N.E.2d 997 (2013) ("Here, the plaintiff did not allege at trial that Tisch's testimony before the congressional subcommittee was the basis of any of the plaintiff's claims. Rather, portions of Tisch's testimony were offered as evidence in support of these claims.").

Thus, the court will consider below plaintiffs' allegations of defendants' lobbying, permitting activity, and testimony not as a basis for the claimed violation, but to the extent that those activities provide factual support for the price-fixing claim.

III. The Pleading Standard

The crux of the motions to dismiss is whether plaintiffs have adequately pled a price-fixing conspiracy by defendants so as to avoid dismissal for failure to state a claim. However, a preliminary inquiry deals with the pleading standard itself.

The burden on plaintiffs under Vermont law [*22] is "exceedingly low" at the pleading stage. Prive v. Vermont Asbestos Group, 2010 VT 2, ¶ 14, 187 Vt. 280, 992 A.2d 1035. Motions to dismiss for failure to state a claim are "disfavored and should be rarely granted." Bock v. Gold, 2008 VT 81, ¶ 4, 184 Vt. 575, 959 A.2d 990. Complaints are intended to give enough notice to the defendant to allow a response, but need not lay out every detail of the facts supporting the claim. See Colby v. Umbrella, Inc., 2008 VT 20, ¶ 13, 184 Vt. 1, 955 A.2d 1082 ("The complaint is a bare bones statement that merely provides the defendant with notice of the claims against it."). As our Supreme Court has noted, the goal is to "strike a fair balance, at the early stages of litigation, between encouraging valid, but as yet underdeveloped causes of action and discouraging baseless or legally insufficient ones." Id.

The U.S. Supreme Court has rejected the federal standard on which Colby was based, finding that the "no set of facts" language had "puzzl[ed] the profession for 50 years" and had "earned its retirement." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 562-63, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). Instead, Twombly speaks of pleading sufficient facts to make the plaintiff's claims not just possible, but "plausible." Id. at 556, 570. The decision is confusing, as it seems at times to be creating a "more likely than not" standard, yet denies it is doing so. Id. at 556-57; see also In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., 630 F.3d 622, 629 (7th Cir. 2010) (observing that Court's explanation of plausibility standard is "a little unclear," but perhaps [*23] is best described as "a nonnegligible probability that the claim is valid[.]"). The Twombly standard, the Court later explained, is "not akin to a 'probability requirement.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009).

One defendant (S.B. Collins) argues in its briefings that the court should adopt Twombly's "plausibility" pleading standard for antitrust cases in Vermont.[8] Twombly held that stating an antitrust claim "requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made." 550 U.S. at 556. Therefore, "an allegation of parallel conduct and a bare assertion of conspiracy will not suffice. Without more, parallel conduct does not suggest conspiracy, and a conclusory allegation of agreement at some unidentified point does not supply facts adequate to show illegality." Id. at 556-57.[9] Adopting the Twombly standard, defendant argues, would alleviate concerns about expensive and expansive discovery that is unique to antitrust cases. See id. at 558-89.

[8] This argument was not raised at oral argument, so it appears S.B. Collins has backed away from it. To the extent S.B. Collins still relies on that argument, the court addresses it here for clarification.

The Vermont Supreme Court has twice declined to adopt Twombly's pleading standard. See Colby v. Umbrella, Inc., 2008 VT 20, ¶ 5 n.1, 184 Vt. 1, 955 A.2d 1082 ("[W]e . . . are in no way bound by federal jurisprudence in interpreting our state pleading rules. We recently reaffirmed our minimal notice pleading standard . . . and are unpersuaded by the dissent's argument that we should now abandon it for a heightened standard.") (citations omitted); Bock v. Gold, 184 Vt. 575, 2008 VT 81, ¶5, 959 A.2d 990 n.*, 184 Vt. 575, 959 A.2d 990 ("As we noted recently, our dissenting colleagues' reliance on [Twombly] is misplaced.").[10] S.B. Collins tries to distinguish those cases, noting that Colby involved a section 1983 discrimination claim by a disabled state employee, while Bock involved a civil rights suit against DOC by a prisoner. In those cases, defendant argues, there was a much greater disparity of resources between the plaintiffs and the state, plaintiffs there had difficulty articulating their claims, and discovery was not overly burdensome. Thus, S.B. Collins argues that the Court's rationale is inapplicable here.

It is true that the Court has not addressed the question of whether there should be a higher pleading standard for antitrust cases. However, the Court has not rested its decisions on the type of cases it was considering. The Court has repeatedly rejected adoption of the heightened Twombly pleading standard, and has not indicated it would be appropriate in any different context. Moreover, even in federal court the Twombly standard is not a special standard for antitrust cases, but applies to all types of cases. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 684, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). This court therefore has no basis for creating a special standard based upon the nature of this case. Whatever Twombly actually says about pleading, it is not the law in Vermont, and this court will not import its standards without explicit direction from our Supreme Court.

The court will address defendants' motions under [*26] the traditional Vermont pleading standard: whether "it appears beyond doubt that there exist no facts or circumstances that would entitle the plaintiff to relief." Davis v. American Legion, Dept. of Vermont, 198 Vt. 204, 2014 VT 134, ¶ 12, 114 A.3d 99 (quoting Alger v. Dep't of Labor & Indus., 2006 VT 115, ¶ 12, 181 Vt. 309, 917 A.2d 508); see also Prive v. Vermont Asbestos Grp., 2010 VT 2, ¶ 15, 187 Vt. 280, 992 A.2d 1035 (the rule in this state is that when plaintiffs have not yet had an "opportunity to develop the case" through discovery, all that is required is a short and plain statement of the claim.) (internal quotation omitted). The court must take factual allegations in the complaint—though not legal conclusions—as true, and determine whether such facts could prove plaintiffs' case. Dernier v. Mortgage Network, Inc., 2013 VT 96, ¶ 23, 195 Vt. 113, 87 A.3d 465 ("We assume that all factual allegations pleaded in the complaint are true, accept as true all reasonable inferences that may be derived from plaintiffs pleadings, and assume that all contravening assertions in defendant's pleadings are false.").

IV. Price-Fixing Claims

Plaintiffs allege that defendants engaged in price-fixing in violation of the VCPA, which prohibits "[u]nfair methods of competition . . . and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce . . . ." 9 V.S.A. § 2453(a). Only one significant Vermont antitrust decision is on point, in which the Supreme Court described price-fixing as follows:

[9] "Hence, when allegations of parallel conduct are set out in order to make a[n [*24] antitrust] claim, they must be placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557.

[10] There is also considerable disagreement as to whether Twombly [*25] actually imposed a heightened pleading standard, or merely clarified the already existing standard under Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957). See Colby, 184 Vt. 1, 2008 VT 20, ¶ 5 n.1, 955 A.2d 1082; id. ¶ 19 n.3 (Burgess, J., dissenting); Wright & Miller, 5 Fed. Prac. & Proc. Civ. §§ 1202, 1216 (3d ed.). It is not clear that the decision in Twombly would actually change the result in any pre-Twombly antitrust decisions involving motions to dismiss.

> Proof of a price-fixing conspiracy need not be direct. [*27] While particularly true of price-fixing conspiracies, it is well recognized law that any conspiracy can ordinarily only be proved by inferences drawn from relevant and competent circumstantial evidence , including the conduct of the defendants charged. Parallel business behavior, although not itself illegal, is admissible circumstantial evidence from which the fact finder may infer agreement.
> [U]niformity of price may be and has been considered some evidence tending to establish an illegal agreement. Price uniformity among competitors does not, of itself, violate the antitrust laws, however. If it is the result of independently reached pricing decisions, the element of "agreement" necessary to establish an illegal price-fixing combination or conspiracy is absent. But it does permit an inference that the defendant's conduct stemmed from an agreement, tacit or express, rather than from independent business decisions.

State v. Heritage Realty of Vermont, 137 Vt. 425, 429-30, 407 A.2d 509 (1979) (quotations and citations omitted) (alteration in original).

Heritage involved a price-fixing claim against real estate brokers in violation of the consumer fraud act. In that case, the State's complaint alleged that during February 1977, most members of a county board of realtors attended [*28] a meeting where they voted to set the commission for residential real estate sales at seven percent, a change from the previous six percent. 137 Vt. at 427-28. The trial court granted summary judgment for defendants based on both parties' affidavits, but the Supreme Court reversed, holding that plaintiff should have been allowed to further develop its case because its affidavits indicated that discovery might produce a genuine issue of materia l fact. Id. at 430.

By itself, Heritage does not resolve the exact issue here. It involved a summary judgment motion rather than a motion to dismiss. Further, the allegations of a meeting in the complaint were more specific than in this case. However, Heritage does provide guidance as to the type of evidence from which a price fixing conspiracy may be inferred. See id. at 429-30.

Plaintiffs urge the court to decide this motion solely based on Vermont law. However, there is insufficient guidance in Vermont law to determine the antitrust issues raised in this case.[11] The court must look to federal substantive antitrust law for guidance in construing the VCPA. See id. § 2453(b) ("It is the intent of the Legislature that in construing subsection (a) of this section, the courts of this State will be guided by the [*29] construction of similar terms contained in Section 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act as from time to time amended by the Federal Trade Commission and the courts of the United States.");[12] Heritage, 137 Vt. at 429-30 (relying on federal antitrust decisions). Therefore, the court will be guided by substantive federal antitrust law in determining what inferences may be drawn from what facts. Given the low pleading standard, however, if this case presents a close [11] As argued by plaintiffs, a literal reading of Heritage might suggest that an allegation of parallel pricing alone could be enough to survive a motion to dismiss. See Pls.' Opp'n at 2, 13-15; Heritage, 137 Vt. at 427-28 ("Parallel business behavior, although not itself illegal, is admissible circumstantial evidence from which the fact finder may infer agreement. . . . [U]niformity of price may be and has been considered some evidence tending to establish an illegal agreement."). However, given the citation in Heritage of federal law to the contrary, as well as the practical result of allowing any complaint alleging mere parallel business pricing to proceed to discovery, such a literal interpretation cannot possibly be what the Supreme [*30] Court intended.

[12] The statute refers to the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 45, which prohibits "[u]nfair methods of competition . . . and unfair or deceptive acts or practices," and not the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 1, which prohibits "[e]very contract, combination . . . , or conspiracy, in restraint of trade." See Elkins v. Microsoft Corp., 174 Vt. 328, 335-37, 817 A.2d 9 (2002). However, the U.S. Supreme Court has held that any violation of the Sherman Act also violates the FTC Act. California Dental Ass'n v. Fed. Trade Comm'n, 526 U.S. 756, 762, 119 S. Ct. 1604, 143 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1999) ("The FTC Act's prohibition of unfair competition and deceptive acts or practices, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(1), overlaps the scope of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, aimed at prohibiting restraint of trade . . . ."); Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 454, 106 S. Ct. 2009, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1986) ("standard of 'unfairness' under the FTC Act . . . encompass[es] . . . practices that violate the Sherman Act and the other antitrust laws"); Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Cement Inst., 333 U.S. 683, 689-95, 68 S. Ct. 793, 92 L. Ed. 1010, 44 F.T.C. 1460 (1948).

call, the court will err on the side of denying the motion to dismiss. Bock, 184 Vt. 575, 2008 VT 81, ¶ 4, 959 A.2d 990.

(1) Concious Parallelism and Plus Factors

It is well settled that conscious parallelism is not in itself unlawful. Heritage, 137 Vt. at 429-30; Brooke Grp. Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 227, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993); Theatre Enterprises, Inc. v. Paramount Film Distrib. Corp., 346 U.S. 537, 540-41, 74 S. Ct. 257, 98 L. Ed. 273 (1954). Conscious parallelism has been described as a "phenomenon of oligopolistic markets in which firms 'might in effect share monopoly power, setting their prices at a profit-maximizing, supracompetitive level by recognizing their shared economic interests and their interdependence with respect to price and output decisions.'" White v. R.M. Packer Co., 635 F.3d 571, 575 (1st Cir. 2011) (quoting Brooke Grp., 509 U.S. at 227).[13] "Each producer may independently decide [*31] that it can maximize its profits by matching one or more other producers' price, on the hope that the market will be able to maintain high prices if the producers do not undercut one another." Id. Plaintiffs here do not argue that mere parallel behavior forms the basis for their claims, however. Instead, they claim that the parallel behavior is one of several facts that together provide circumstantial evidence of an agreement among defendants to fix prices.

Because parallel pricing behavior may well be the result of independent, rational, and perfectly legal business conduct, plaintiffs must allege additional "plus factors" which suggest that the parallel pricing results from a price fixing agreement. See Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 822 F.2d 246, 253-54 (2d Cir. 1987) (to infer a conspiracy from parallel pricing, "a plaintiff must show the existence of additional circumstances, often referred to as 'plus' factors, which, when viewed in conjunction[ ] with the parallel acts, can serve to allow a fact-finder to infer a conspiracy"); In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d 300, 323 (3d Cir. 2010) ("plaintiffs relying on parallel conduct must allege facts that, if true, would establish at least one 'plus factor,' since plus factors are, by definition, facts that 'tend[ ] to ensure that courts punish concerted action—an actual agreement—instead of the unilateral, independent conduct of competitors.'") (quoting In re Flat Glass Antitrust Litig., 385 F.3d 350, 360 (3d Cir. 2004)) (alteration in original). The [*33] plus factors serve to distinguish between behavior that results from an agreement and behavior that results from independent business conduct. Flat Glass, 385 F.3d at 360 ("plus factors" are "proxies for direct evidence of an agreement").[14]

> "An oligopoly market is one in which a few relatively large sellers account for the bulk of the output." 2B Areeda, Hovenkamp, & Solow, Antitrust Law ¶ 404a, at 9 (3d ed. 2007). By contrast to a competitive market, in which no single producer has the power to affect the market price, in an oligopolistic market each of the major sellers can affect the market price by changing its output. By contrast to a monopolized market, "no one firm can unilaterally determine market price by varying its output" because rivals are large enough to affect the market price by doing the same. Id. at 10. As a result, "the distinctive characteristic of oligopoly is recognized interdependence among [*32] the leading firms: the profit-maximizing choice of price and output for one depends on the choices made by others." Id.

White v. R.M. Packer Co., 635 F.3d 571, 576 n.4 (1st Cir. 2011); see also E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. v. F.T.C., 729 F.2d 128, 139 (2d Cir. 1984) ("The mere existence of an oligopolistic market structure in which a small group of manufacturers engage in consciously parallel pricing of an identical product does not violate the antitrust laws.").

[14] Even under pre-Twombly antitrust law, an allegation of parallel conduct alone has never been enough to defeat a motion to dismiss. The Twombly dissent acknowledges this. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 580 n.6 (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("For example, had the amended complaint in this case alleged only parallel conduct, it would not have made the required 'showing.' Similarly, had the pleadings contained only an allegation of agreement, without specifying the nature or object of that agreement, they would have been susceptible to the charge that they did not provide sufficient notice that the defendants may answer intelligently. Omissions of that sort instance the type of 'bareness' with which the Federal Rules are concerned.") (citation omitted) (emphasis in original). There is no reason to suppose the Vermont Supreme Court would find a mere allegation of parallel conduct sufficient.

Courts have disagreed over what constitutes a "plus factor" and how much weight particular plus factors should be given. The Third [*34] Circuit has observed that "[t]here is no finite set of such criteria; no exhaustive list exists." Id. However, that same court has broadly categorized plus factors into three distinct groups: "(1) evidence that the defendant had a motive to enter into a price fixing conspiracy; (2) evidence that the defendant acted contrary to its interests; and (3) "evidence implying a traditional conspiracy." Id.

The first two factors can be problematic, the Third Circuit explained, because they "largely restate the phenomenon of interdependence." Id. But they are still "important to a court's analysis, because their existence tends to eliminate the possibility of mistaking the workings of a competitive market . . . with interdependent, supracompetitive pricing." Id. at 361; see also id. at 361 n.12 ("Neither factor is strictly necessary . . . nor sufficient to conclude that sufficient proof of an agreement exists to preclude summary judgment, but it is relevant and courts should as a general matter consider it.") (internal quotations omitted). With respect to the first factor, evidence that the defendant "had a motive to enter into a price fixing conspiracy" means "evidence that the industry is conducive to oligopolistic price [*35] fixing, either interdependently or through a more express form of collusion. In other words, it is 'evidence that the structure of the market was such as to make secret price fixing feasible.'" Id. at 360 (quoting In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litigation, 295 F.3d 651, 655 (7th Cir.2002)). As to the second factor, evidence that the defendant "acted contrary to its interests" means "evidence of conduct that would be irrational assuming that the defendant operated in a competitive market." Id. at 360-61.[15]

The Third Circuit considered the third factor most important, and stated that it would "generally be non-economic evidence 'that there was an actual, manifest agreement not to compete." Id. at 361 (quoting High Fructose Corn Syrup, 295 F.3d at 661). "That evidence may involve 'customary indications of traditional conspiracy,' or 'proof that the defendants got together and exchanged assurances of common action or otherwise adopted a common plan even though no meetings, conversations, or exchanged documents are shown.'" Id. (quoting [*36] Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 1434b, at 243 (2nd ed.2000)); see also In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d 300, 321-22 (3d Cir. 2010).[16]

[15] "In a competitive industry, for example, a firm would cut its price with the hope of increasing its market share if its competitors were setting prices above marginal costs. Put differently, in analyzing this factor a court looks to 'evidence that the market behaved in a noncompetitive manner.'" Flat Glass, 385 F.3d at 361 (quoting High Fructose Corn Syrup, 295 F.3d at 655).

[16] Courts and commentators have organized and described "plus factors" in numerous ways. For example, one commentator has outlined the "chief" plus factors as follows:

- Actions contrary to each defendant's self-interest unless pursued as part of a collective plan.
- Phenomena that can be explained rationally only as the result of concerted action.
- Evidence that the defendants created the opportunity for regular communication.
- Industry performance data, such as extraordinary profits, that suggest successful coordination.
- The absence of a plausible, legitimate business rationale for suspicious conduct (such as certain communications with rivals) or the presentation of contrived rationales for certain conduct.

W. Kovacic, et. al., Plus Factors and Agreement in Antitrust Law, 110 Mich. L. Rev. 393, 405-06 (2011). Another commentator has written that the plus factor "most often considered" by courts in determining whether parallel behavior is the result of an agreement is the "business-justifications test." M. Vaska, Conscious Parallelism and Price Fixing: Defining the Boundary, 52 U. Chi. L. Rev. 508, 509 (1985). Under that test, "a price-fixing agreement may be [*37] inferred from parallel conduct if firms cannot show legitimate independent business reasons for engaging in such practices." Id. See also In re Travel Agent Comm'n Antitrust Litig., 583 F.3d 896, 907 (6th Cir. 2009) ("We concluded the following 'plus factors' were important when evaluating circumstantial evidence of concerted action: '(1) whether the defendants' actions, if taken independently, would be contrary to their economic self-interest; (2) whether defendants have been uniform in their actions; (3) whether defendants have exchanged or have had the opportunity to exchange information relative to the alleged conspiracy; and (4) whether defendants have a common motive to conspire. Ordinarily, an affirmative answer to the first of these factors will consistently tend to exclude the likelihood of independent conduct.'") (quoting Re/Max Int'l, Inc. v. Realty One, Inc., 173 F.3d 995, 1009 (6th Cir. 1999)); E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. v. F.T.C., 729 F.2d 128, 140 n.10 (2d Cir. 1984) ("The 'plus factor' may be conduct that is contrary to the

(2) Plus Factors Alleged by Plaintiffs

Plaintiffs have alleged parallel pricing and a number of "plus factors" from which, they argue, one can infer [*38] a conspiracy among defendants to fix retail and wholesale gasoline prices in the class area. For purposes of organization, the court has categorized the allegations into three broad groups based on how they are presented in the complaint: (1) product/market structure, (2) parallel pricing and behavior, and (3) barriers to entry.

i. Allegations Concerning Product/Market Structure

As to the product, plaintiffs allege that unleaded gasoline is a necessary commodity, and no other fuel type is a substitute for such gasoline used in automobiles. See In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651, 657 (7th Cir. 2002) (Posner, J.) ("no close substitutes" for high fructose corn syrup). The demand for gasoline is highly inelastic and thus changes little in response to price changes. See White v. R.M. Packer Co., 635 F.3d 571, 582 (1st Cir. 2011) ("High barriers to entry and inelastic demand are two hallmarks of oligopolistic markets susceptible to successful parallel pricing practices, but neither helps to distinguish between agreement and mere conscious parallelism as the root cause of those practices.").

Regarding the geographic market, plaintiffs allege that gas stations and drivers that purchase gas (either through wholesale or retail) from defendants in the class area cannot reasonably and cost-effectively turn to [*39] areas of supply outside the class area. The cost and time of seeking gas from outside the class area outweighs any benefit from lower prices.

Plaintiffs also allege a highly concentrated market, where defendants have a 67 percent market share of the wholesale market, and own or control at least 64 percent of all class area gas stations. Compl. ¶ 6. Because of their control of the wholesale market, plaintiffs allege defendants also control retail pricing at independent stations. Id. Other courts have found that a highly concentrated market makes price fixing more feasible. See In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., 630 F.3d 622, 628 (7th Cir. 2010) (four defendants controlled 90 percent of text messaging market); Starr v. Sony BMG Music Entm't, 592 F.3d 314, 323-24 (2d Cir. 2010) (defendants controlled over 80% of digital music sold to end purchasers in U.S.); see also id. (citing 7 Phillip R. Areeda and Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law § 1431a (2d ed. 2003) ("[E]mpirical studies considering many industries have suggested that noncompetitive pricing [that may be the result of price coordination] is likely to appear when the four leading firms account for some 50 to 80 percent of the market.") (alterations in original); High Fructose Corn Syrup, 295 F.3d at 656 (five defendants accounted for 90 percent of product sales).

However, a concentrated market, by itself, could also [*40] demonstrate mere parallel conduct in an oligopolistic market. As one court has observed:

> A firm in a concentrated industry typically has reason to decide (individually) to copy an industry leader. After all, a higher-than-leader's price might lead a customer to buy elsewhere, while a lower-than-leader's price might simply lead competitors to match the lower price, reducing profits for all. One does not need an agreement to bring about this kind of follow-the-leader effect in a concentrated industry.

Owens—Corning Fiberglas Corp., 971 F.2d 37, 53 (7th Cir.1992); see also In re Travel Agent Comm'n Antitrust Litig., 583 F.3d 896, 910 (6th Cir. 2009) (holding that each defendant's decision to match a new commission cut was arguably a "reasoned, prudent business decision"). Plaintiffs' allegations here about the product and the market structure make price-fixing feasible in the class market, but by themselves are not enough to defeat the motion to dismiss.[17] defendants' independent self-interest, the presence or absence of a strong motive on a defendants' part to enter an alleged conspiracy, or the artificial standardization of products . . . .") (internal citations omitted).

[17] Champlain Oil also points out that defendants are only four of the six major gas wholesalers in the class area. The complaint does not explain why the other two wholesalers did not take market share by pricing at allegedly competitive levels. This, Champlain Oil contends, demonstrates that higher prices are more likely explained by conscious parallelism [*41] rather than a conspiracy to fix prices. However, this fact does not necessarily negate an inference of a price-fixing agreement. It is entirely

ii. Allegations Concerning Parallel Pricing and Behavior

Plaintiffs allege that retail prices in the class area are inexplicably and persistently higher than elsewhere in the State, such as Middlebury and Rutland, and other areas of the northeast and the United States.[18] These prices have allegedly been nearly identical and moved in lockstep fashion among defendants. Further, they allege that defendants have earned "abnormal and exorbitant" gross wholesale and retail profits, often in the top 10 of 450 gasoline markets measured in the United States. Plaintiffs allege that no rational explanation has been offered for such high prices and profits.[19]

Of course, parallel pricing alone is insufficient to infer a price fixing conspiracy. Plaintiffs allege additional facts, some of which move them closer to a context that suggests a conspiracy. First, they allege that retail prices have not been logically related to terminal rack costs. According to plaintiffs, prices have repeatedly increased or remained unchanged in times of declining cost, increased when costs have not changed, and decreased at a disproportionately smaller amount and pace than the decline in costs. See Starr v. Sony BMG Music Entm't, 592 F.3d 314, 323-24 (2d Cir. 2010) (allegation that none of defendants reduced prices for Internet music despite dramatic cost reductions, taken together with other allegations, placed parallel conduct in context that suggested price-fixing agreement); In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., 630 F.3d 622, 628 (7th Cir. 2010) (Posner, J.) (complaint alleged that "in the face of steeply falling costs, the defendants increased their prices").[20]

Second, defendants have allegedly maintained their wholesale and retail market shares despite numerous opportunities to compete on price to acquire market share. Evidence of stable market shares suggests anticompetitive conduct, because such stability "is just what one would expect of a group of sellers who are all charging the same prices for a uniform product and trying to keep everyone happy by maintaining the relative sales positions of the group's members." High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d at 659 (7th Cir. 2002); see possible that the two non-party wholesalers and/or those stations they supply independently imitated defendants' allegedly fixed prices. In any event, as the court has already stated, the fact of a concentrated market does not by itself suggest a price-fixing conspiracy.

[18] Defendants argue that plaintiffs have not alleged that Rutland is an appropriate comparable market. Though plaintiffs' attorney stated [*42] at oral argument that both the class area and Rutland County are oligopolistic markets and insisted that plaintiffs had made that specific allegation in their complaint, see Transcript at 38:4-19, the complaint does not contain such a specific allegation. The closest the complaint comes to alleging that Rutland is a comparable market is in Paragraph 64 ("Profit margins realized by Defendants in the Class Area exceeded the margins realized by comparable gas stations outside of the Class Area within comparative markets in the State of Vermont and throughout the United States."), Paragraph 68 ("There is little justification for the price differential for gasoline between the Class Area and the City of Rutland. Major costs . . . vary little or not at all. To the extent some costs in Rutland are lower . . ., those difference cannot explain the price differential.) and in Paragraph 70 ("There is no competitive market explanation for the magnitude and substantial duration of the retail price differentials between Chittenden and Rutland during periods of declining costs."). However, this does not doom plaintiffs' complaint. There is a clear implication in the complaint of an apples-to-apples [*43] comparison. Moreover, the complaint alleges that the class area has higher prices than not only Rutland, but other areas of Vermont, the Northeast, and the country.

[19] With regard to parallel pricing behavior, defendants argue that the FTC document relied upon by plaintiffs in their complaint undercuts their allegations. Specifically, R.L. Vallee argues that the FTC data does not show excessive pricing or profit-taking, but instead shows that prices were within the predicted range for all but a few weeks. See Ex. A to R.L.'s Vallee's Reply. Indeed, the FTC data purportedly shows that from the period between January 2010 and June 2012, gas prices in Burlington, Vermont were within the "expected range" except for the last four weeks. See id. However, this is not the only allegation of parallel pricing behavior offered by plaintiffs. They allege unreasonably high retail prices, wholesale prices, and profits throughout the class period. Presumably, they will offer evidence supporting those allegations during discovery. The FTC chart covers only part of the class period. Furthermore, it is unclear from the chart exactly how the FTC determined the "expected range." The FTC chart does not meaningfully [*44] undermine plaintiffs' allegations.

[20] As Judge Posner further explained, "[t]his is anomalous behavior because falling costs increase a seller's profit margin at the existing price, motivating him, in the absence of agreement, to reduce his price slightly in order to take business from his competitors, and certainly not to increase his price." [*45] Text Messaging, 630 F.3d at 628.

also White v. R.M. Packer Co., 635 F.3d 571, 582 ("stable market shares over time may suggest in some factual contexts that the firms 'eliminated competition[] among themselves") (quoting R. Posner, Antitrust Law 79 (2d ed. 2001)).

Third, and perhaps most damning to defendants, is the allegation that they temporarily reduced their prices and profit margins before August 2012 and January 2013 legislative hearings investigating high gas prices in northwestern Vermont, despite rising costs at the time. If true, as the court must assume for purposes of this motion, the timing is highly suspicious and suggests an agreement to temporarily reduce prices in order to mask high prices charged at other times. The fact that defendants did so despite rising costs—again, as [*46] the court must assume to be true—further suggests a conspiracy. See Starr, 592 F.3d at 323-24; Text Messaging, 630 F.3d at 628.

Plaintiffs also allege that defendants had the opportunity to meet and conspire through membership in the Vermont Petroleum Association, which held regular trade association meetings and an annual golf tournament. The court deems this to be of limited persuasive value in determining whether a conspiracy can be inferred from the allegations. Virtually any profession like that of defendants has a trade association which holds meetings and other events. Mere membership in the Vermont Petroleum Association demonstrates nothing. As other cases have demonstrated, something more—like specific dates and topics covered at meetings—is generally necessary for trade association membership or communications among defendants to be a plus factor. Compare Text Messaging, 630 F.3d at 628 (complaint sufficiently pled price-fixing where it alleged that, among other allegations, "defendants belonged to a trade association and exchanged price information directly at association meetings" and "met with each other in an elite 'leadership council' within the association . . . [whose] stated mission was to urge its members to substitute 'co-opetition' for competition"), [*47] Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 822 F.2d 246, 255-58 (2d Cir. 1987) (reasonable inference could be drawn that notebook entries memorializing telephone conversations between defendants evidenced an agreement), and In re Static Random Access Memory (SRAM) Antitrust Litig., 580 F. Supp. 2d 896, 903 (N.D. Cal. 2008) (where complaint cited specific email communications between defendants that suggested conspiracy, court noted that "allegations regarding [d]efendants' participation in various trade organizations . . . cannot alone support Plaintiffs' claims, but such participation demonstrates how and when [d]efendants had opportunities to exchange information or make agreements"), with Mayor and City Council of Baltimore v. Citigroup, Inc., 709 F.3d 129, 139-40 (2d Cir. 2013) (rejecting plaintiffs' allegation of "specific communications" between defendants where most communications alleged were internal to individual defendants, and the only two actual communications between competitors were "vague references to isolated discussions among only three defendants"), and In re Graphics Processing Units Antitrust Litig., 527 F. Supp. 2d 1011, 1023 (N.D. Cal. 2007) ("Attendance at industry trade shows and events is presumed legitimate and is not a basis from which to infer a conspiracy, without more.") (citing In re Citric Acid Litig., 191 F.3d 1090, 1098 (9th Cir.1999)).

That defendants collectively had one agent who represented them at legislative hearings is similarly unavailing. That a group of businesses would have common legislative interests does not support any untoward conspiracy.

One additional allegation offers [*48] further support for the inference of a conspiracy: that of defendants' "pretextual" or "plainly false" explanations for pricing behavior, consisting generally of testimony presented at legislative hearings conducted to investigate high gas prices in northwestern Vermont.[21] According to the complaint, defendants claimed they did not make a profit, or that they lost money on gasoline for substantial periods within the class period. Compl. ¶¶ 7, 75, 80-81. Defendants allegedly tried to confuse the issue at the legislative hearings by interjecting: (1) factors that apply throughout Vermont; (2) irrelevant comparisons between Vermont and other states; and (3) other "nonsensical red-herrings" that could not have explained the high price of gasoline within the class area. Id. ¶ 82. Plaintiffs allege this was a "blatant attempt at misdirection" to conceal ongoing price coordination. Id. ¶ 83.

Defendants proffered several justifications for high gas prices at the hearings, but plaintiffs allege none of them explain the high price of unleaded gasoline in the class area, and only further demonstrate that defendants engaged in a price-fixing conspiracy. Id. ¶¶ 75, 80-87. The lack of an explanation for high gas prices is itself significant, and the lack of a rational explanation given the opportunity to present one even more so. In one federal case, the Second Circuit held that plaintiffs failed to plead additional facts beyond mere parallel conduct to plausibly suggest an agreement where defendants"'en masse flight from a collapsing market in which they had significant downside exposure[ ]made perfect business sense. . . . [A]bandoning bad investments was not just a rational business decision, but the only rational business decision." Mayor of Baltimore, 709 F.3d at 138 (italics and emphasis in original). [*50] Here, in contrast, there is no clear rational explanation for the high gas prices that would counter the inference of a price-fixing agreement as opposed to rational, legitimate, and independent parallel conduct.[22]

iii. Allegations Concerning Barriers to Entry

Plaintiffs allege several so-called "barriers to entry" which, they claim, also suggest a price-fixing conspiracy. Most of these allegations, however, add nothing to their argument. They make vague reference to a need to obtain environmental permits, legal limitations on the number of gas stations in the class area, the cost and complexity of gasoline storage and operation of stations, and defendants' "threats" against anyone who attempts to open a competing gas station. However, they include no additional detail or facts explaining the nature of these allegations or how these operate to prevent entry into the market. Without more context, those allegations are simply insufficient.

Other alleged barriers to entry are more fact-specific, but do not suggest a price-fixing conspiracy in [*52] the class area. For example, plaintiffs allege that defendants have "frequently" acquired real property on which they imposed deed restrictions barring future use as gas stations to further limit competition or dilution of the market share. Id. ¶ 7. However, the only examples are actions solely by R.L. Vallee in Plainfield and St. Johnsbury, outside of the class area. Id. ¶¶ 52, 54. It is difficult to see how those particular activities, if true, support an inference of a conspiracy to fix prices between the four defendants in the class area.

Another allegation is that defendants misused Vermont environmental laws to obstruct the entry of low-cost gasoline providers and to extract unreasonable covenants that prevent or limit competition. Id. ¶ 7. Only two examples are provided. First, in 2010 R.L. Vallee opposed Walmart's bid to build a discount store in Franklin County until it was written into the permit that "there shall be no sale of gasoline for automobiles." Id. ¶ 50. Second, R.L. Vallee has partnered with Wesco since 2007 to oppose Costco's plans to build a filling station in Colchester, Vermont. Id. ¶ 51. However, it is perfectly reasonable for a business to try independently [*53] to discourage competitors; such conduct does not necessarily show a conspiracy. Furthermore, the Walmart opposition was [22] The court emphasizes that it is not placing a burden on defendants to produce an explanation for parallel pricing at the pleading stage. Rather, the court merely recognizes, as other courts have, that the existence or absence of an obvious alternative explanation for the parallelism that suggests independent conduct rather than an illegal agreement is an important factor. See In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d 300, 322-23 (3d Cir. 2010) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 567) ("allegations of conspiracy are deficient if there are 'obvious alternative explanation[s]' for the facts alleged"); In re Travel Agent Comm'n Antitrust Litig. ("Tam Travel"), 583 F.3d 896, 908-09 (6th Cir. 2009) (airlines' historical failures at independently cutting commission rates without prior agreements with other airlines did not suggest collusion, because defendants offered a "reasonable, alternative explanation": each airline could have reasonably calculated that a successful commission cut would yield greater net revenue); LaFlamme v. Societe Air France, 702 F. Supp. 2d 136, 151-52 (E.D.N.Y. 2010) ("rapidly rising jet fuel prices" provided an obvious independent explanation for the alleged parallel [*51] behavior); In re Graphics Processing Units Antitrust Litigation, 527 F.Supp.2d 1011, 1022 (N.D. Cal. 2007) (allegations of parallel conduct were equally consistent with conspiracy and lawful conduct where certain characteristic of chip industry provided "independent innocent explanation" for conduct); Cf. Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 224, 59 S. Ct. 467, 83 L. Ed. 610 (1939) (defendant's letter provided evidence of conspiracy, particularly because defendants could offer no alternative reason for parallel pricing demands).

action taken solely by R.L. Vallee, while the Costco opposition involved only two of the four defendants. The court deems these allegations to be of very limited persuasive value.[23]

(3) Analysis

In determining whether plaintiffs have adequately pled facts from which a price-fixing conspiracy could be inferred, the court must examine the allegations in the complaint as a whole. Plaintiffs have alleged parallel pricing, as well as product and market structure factors demonstrating that the class area was conducive to a price-fixing conspiracy. Those allegations alone are insufficient because they merely demonstrate an oligopolistic market. However, plaintiffs also allege certain plus factors which suggest that the parallel conduct might have resulted from an agreement and is not merely consistent with independent action. The discrepancy [*54] between retail prices and terminal rack costs, the temporary price reductions before the legislative hearings at a time of rising costs, and the lack of a rational explanation for the pricing behavior at the legislative hearings, when considered together with the parallel pricing and market structure, suggest a price-fixing agreement.

Defendants claim that plaintiffs must identify the specific time, place, or person related to the conspiracy allegation. This is incorrect, even under the post-Twombly federal pleading standard. The Second Circuit has interpreted Twombly as not requiring such specificity where the claim of agreement rests on parallel conduct. See Starr, 592 F.3d at 325 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 565 n.10); see also Allen v. Dairy Farmers of Am., Inc., 748 F. Supp. 2d 323, 333 n.2 (D. Vt. 2010). Instead, allegations of parallel conduct "must be placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action." Starr, 592 F.3d at 322 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557). Examples of a parallel conduct allegation that would suffice under this standard include "parallel behavior that would probably not result from chance, coincidence, independent responses to common stimuli, or mere interdependence unaided by an advance understanding among the parties." Id. (citing Twombly at 556 n.4). [*55]

Defendants, and particularly R.L. Vallee, also repeatedly point to footnote six in Vallee's December 11th reply memorandum, where Vallee cites nine federal antitrust cases that were, according to Vallee, "dismissed at the pleading stage because they suffered from the same deficiency as Plaintiffs' Complaint: they failed to allege facts supporting the inference that an unlawful agreement among competitors to fix prices, rather than legitimate business behavior, was responsible for parallel market activity." R.L. Vallee's Reply at 9 n.6 (citing SD3, LLC v. Black & Decker (U.S.) Inc., 801 F.3d 412 (4th Cir. 2015); Mayor of Baltimore, 709 F.3d 129; Insurance Brokerage, 618 F.3d 300; In re Travel Agent Comm'n Antitrust Litig. ("Tam Travel"), 583 F.3d 896 (6th Cir. 2009); Hu v. Huey, 325 Fed. Appx. 436 (7th Cir. 2009); Allen v. Dairy Farmers of America, Inc., 748 F. Supp. 2d 323 (D. Vt. 2010); LaFlamme v. Societe Air France, 702 F. Supp. 2d 136 (E.D.N.Y. 2010); In re Static Random Access Memory Antitrust Litigation, 580 F.Supp.2d 896 (N.D. Cal. 2008); In re Graphics Processing Units Antitrust Litigation, 527 F.Supp.2d 1011 (N.D. Cal. 2007)).

While those cases provide guidance as to what allegations can be used as "plus factors" from which an inference of a conspiracy can be drawn, they were all decided under the federal, post-Twombly pleading standard. Moreover, the cases are inconsistent and impossible to harmonize. In any case, each is fact-specific and provides no broad guidance here. For instance, while some of the cited cases observe that meetings between defendants must be alleged with some level of specificity in order to suggest a conspiracy, see SD3, 801 F.3d at 429-30; Mayor of Baltimore, 709 F.3d at 139-40; Tam Travel, 583 F.3d at 910-11; LaFlamme, 702 F. Supp. 2d at 147-48, an allegation of meetings is not strictly [*56] necessary to survive a 12(b)(6) motion, nor is it even necessary to allege a specific time or place of the conspiracy. See Starr, 592 F.3d at 325.

Defendants also point to pre-Twombly federal cases in an attempt to show that even under our lower pleading standard, plaintiffs have failed to adequately allege a conspiracy to fix prices. In Estate Construction. Co. v. Miller & Smith Holding Co., the Fourth Circuit held that dismissal of an antritrust conspiracy complaint was appropriate where the plaintiffs failed to provide "any factual support" for their allegations of a conspiracy. 14 F.3d 213, 221 (4th Cir. 1994). The complaint there, however, was entirely conclusory, stating no facts and only legal conclusions. Id.[24]

Lombard's, Inc. v. Prince Mfg., Inc., 753 F.2d 974, 975 (11th Cir. 1985) also involved an entirely conclusory complaint. Though notice pleading was all that was required for a valid antitrust complaint in that case, "[n]evertheless, enough data must be pleaded so that each element of the alleged antitrust violation can be properly identified." Id. (quotations omitted). The complaint in Lombard's stated only a conclusory allegation that there was a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act, and Prince was the only defendant named. Id. "Thus not only are no facts alleged to demonstrate the conspiracy but the specific participants of the conspiracy are not even identified. Such pleading is inadequate to give the defendant fair notice of Lombard's claim." Id.[25]

Defendants also point to In re Currency Conversion Fee Antitrust Litigation as an example of a sufficiently pled antitrust complaint under the pre-Twombly federal pleading standard. In that case, though the parallel conduct by MasterCard and VISA in establishing currency conversion fees was not enough by itself [*59] to infer an antitrust conspiracy, plaintiffs also alleged plus factors which prevented dismissal. 265 F. Supp. 2d 385, 418-19 (S.D.N.Y. 2003). Those plus factors included allegations that certain fees were against the defendants' economic self-interest absent collusion, a dual governance structure facilitated the conspiracy, and the actions of one organization's board were disseminated to members of both organizations. Id. (Thus, "each of the associations is a fishbowl and officers and board members are aware of what the other is doing, much more so than in the normal corporate environment.") Id. Another example of a sufficiently pled antitrust complaint is In re Mid-Atlantic Toyota Antitrust Litigation, 525 F.Supp. 1265, 1280-81 (D. Md. 1981), where the plaintiff "carefully documented a series of meetings . . . includ[ing] the persons in attendance . . ., the topics discussed, and the impact these meetings had on the alleged conspiracy . . . ."

Defendants are correct that plaintiffs' "plus factor" allegations in this case are not as strong as those in Currency Conversion or Mid-Atlantic. On the other hand, plaintiffs' allegations are not as "bare bones" as those offered in Estate Construction and Lombard's. Unlike Lombard's, which failed to specify the participants in the conspiracy, > Providence combined and/or conspired with the Miller & Smith defendants, Gordon V. Smith, Calloway, Conner, Jack B. Conner Associates, Inc. and others to restrain trade unreasonably in the real estate development business in the Washington, D.C. metropolitan area by combining and/or conspiring to deprive the Pattersons of The Property, cause The Property to be sold in foreclosure at a price that would leave the Pattersons with no assets, and otherwise to drive them and Estate Construction out of the real [*57] estate development business in the Washington, D.C. metropolitan area. The combination and/or conspiracy produced adverse, anticompetitive effects within the relevant product and geographic market. The objects and conduct of the combination and/or conspiracy were illegal.

In furtherance of that conspiracy, and in response to dealer complaints, PRINCE has prevented LOMBARD'S from making wholesale and mail order sales of the three (3) new tennis racquets by refusing to fill LOMBARD'S purchase orders for these new tennis racquets.
> 11. Upon information and belief, PRINCE, together and with PRINCE dealers and others at this time unknown to LOMBARD'S, have attempted, and are now attempting, to prevent LOMBARD'S from making wholesale and mail order sales of the "Prince Precision Graphite," the "Prince J/R Pro" and the "Prince Magnesium Pro" tennis racquets not to achieve any legitimate business objectives, but for the sole purpose of unlawfully preventing LOMBARD'S from engaging in intrabrand price competition with other dealers in those same tennis racquets.

Lombard's, 753 F.2d at 975.

plaintiffs here [*60] specify the four named defendants as the participants. Furthermore, unlike the Estate Construction complaint which "lack[ed] completely any allegations of communications, meetings, or other means through which one might infer the existence of a conspiracy," plaintiffs here allege price increases at a time of declining costs, price changes immediately before legislative hearings to investigate high gas prices, and the lack of a rational explanation for the high gas prices. Considering those factors along with the allegations of parallel pricing behavior and a market structure and product that make price-fixing feasible, plaintiffs' complaint offers something more than a mere conclusory allegation of a price-fixing conspiracy.

In essence, defendants argue that because there may well be a perfectly legitimate explanation for all of the facts alleged by plaintiffs, the complaint is insufficient. The court concludes that this is not the law at the pleading stage. Instead, if the allegations could also be explained by a tacit agreement to fix prices, the complaint is sufficient. See, e.g., Heritage, 137 Vt. at 430 (evidence compels neither inference of price-fixing nor "an inference of no agreement"); SD3, 801 F.3d at 425 ("[I]t is not our [*61] task at the motion-to-dismiss stage to determine whether a lawful alternative explanation appear[s] more likely from the facts of the complaint. Post-Twombly appellate courts have often been called upon to correct district courts that mistakenly engaged in this sort of premature weighing exercise in antitrust cases.") (internal citation omitted); Starr, 592 F.3d at 325 (allegations adequate at pleading stage if they "suggest" that an agreement was made).[26]

This is a motion to dismiss, based solely upon allegations. It could be that no evidence exists that reasonably supports the allegations. It is possible that discovery will turn up insufficient evidence to support plaintiffs' claims, and the case will not survive summary judgment. However, that is not the question to be resolved here. Starr, 592 F.3d at 329 (Newman, J., concurring) ("Even in those contexts in which an allegation of parallel conduct will not suffice to take an antitrust plaintiff's case to the jury, it will sometimes [*62] suffice to overcome a motion to dismiss and permit some discovery . . . ."). Plaintiffs' allegations of parallel conduct and plus factors are enough to survive a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss under Vermont's "exceedingly low" pleading standard.

V. Unjust Enrichment

Unjust enrichment rests on the principle that one should "not be allowed to enrich himself unjustly at the expense of another." Shattuck v. Peck, 2013 VT 1, ¶ 11, 193 Vt. 123, 70 A.3d 922. "[T]he inquiry is whether, in light of the totality of circumstances, it is against equity and good conscience to allow [a party] to retain what is sought to be recovered. . . . It must be a realistic determination based on a broad view of the human setting involved." Id. (quoting Weed v. Weed, 2008 VT 121, ¶ 17, 185 Vt. 83, 968 A.2d 310). Thus, unjust enrichment is present only if: "(1) a benefit was conferred on defendant; (2) defendant accepted the benefit; and (3) defendant retained the benefit under such circumstances that it would be inequitable for defendant not to compensate plaintiff for its value." Kellogg v. Shushereba, 2013 VT 76, ¶ 31, 194 Vt. 446, 463, 82 A.3d 1121 (quoting Center v. Mad River Corp., 151 Vt. 408, 412, 561 A.2d 90 (1989)) (alterations in original).

Plaintiffs allege that during the class period, defendants' price-fixing conspiracy resulted in plaintiffs paying artificially inflated prices for unleaded gasoline, and that defendants have retained the benefit of those [*63] excess profits. See Compl. ¶¶ 4, 7, 10, 16, 34, 56-75, 106-108. Defendants contend that plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim fails because there is no allegation that defendants did not "compensate" or "pay" plaintiffs for the benefit they received, "i.e., that [d]efendants did not give [p]laintiffs gasoline in exchange for money." R.L. Vallee's Mot. to Dismiss at 31. To support this argument, defendants quote Ray Reilly's Tire Mart, Inc. v. F.P. Elnicki, Inc., 149 Vt. 37, 39, 537 A.2d 994 (1987), which states that "[t]he retention of a benefit is not unjust where defendants have paid for it."

The issue here, however, is whether the amount plaintiffs paid for the product was unreasonably high and thus whether defendants obtained a greater benefit than the value of the product. See, e.g., In re Processed Egg

[26] As one treatise notes, Twombly cannot mean "that the plaintiff must disprove all nonconspiratorial explanations for the defendants' conduct," even at the summary judgment stage. P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Fundamentals of Antitrust Law § 14.03[B] at 14-25 (4th ed. 2015 supp.).

Products Antitrust Litig., 851 F. Supp. 2d 867, 927 (E.D. Pa. 2012) (plaintiffs sufficiently alleged that purchasers had conferred benefit on defendants since any purchase of eggs at artificially inflated prices stemming from price-fixing conspiracy "allowed [d]efendants to obtain the benefit of 'increased revenues and profits from their sales of eggs'"); In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., 599 F. Supp. 2d 1179, 1190 (N.D. Cal. 2009) (plaintiffs alleged that they conferred benefit on defendants by paying higher prices for LCD products than they would have in absence of alleged price-fixing conspiracy).

Defendants also claim that the unjust enrichment claim fails because [*64] plaintiffs have failed to adequately allege a price-fixing conspiracy. In light of the court's resolution of the price-fixing claims above, the court rejects defendants' argument. See generally D. Karon, Undoing the Otherwise Perfect Crime - Applying Unjust Enrichment to Consumer Price-Fixing Claims, 108 W. Va. L. Rev. 395, 431 (2005) (arguing that unjust enrichment always has applied to situations like consumer price-fixing claims).

However, the statute of limitations issue addressed above applies equally to the unjust enrichment claim. See Stankiewicz v. Estate of LaRose, 151 Vt. 453, 456, 561 A.2d 400 (1989) (six-year statute of limitations under 12 V.S.A. § 511 applies to unjust enrichment claim). Plaintiffs may not proceed on any unjust enrichment which may have occurred before June 22, 2009.

Order

Defendants' motions to dismiss are granted in part and denied in part. The motions are granted on statute of limitations grounds with respect to the period before June 22, 2009. They are denied in all other respects. The parties are directed to submit a proposed discovery schedule by May 24.

Dated at Burlington this 7th day of May, 2016.
