[2] Graphic also challenges the viability of Inline's bundled discount and sham litigation theories for vagueness and lack of sufficient supporting facts. For example, Graphic highlights that the Complaint does not identify the actual products contained in the bundled discounts, the prices of those bundles, or the specific lawsuits and contents of litigation threats. The Complaint is not particularly detailed, but it does state enough facts to raise plausible claims for relief on its face. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. The Complaint goes beyond threadbare recitations of the elements of the claims asserted here—it asserts that Graphic bundled susceptor and paperboard packaging and that Graphic made sham litigation threats based on expired or inapplicable patents. Indeed, HN16[] Rule 8 "does not require 'detailed factual allegations,' but it demands more than an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me-accusation." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. At 1949 [31] (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). Inline has satisfied this pleading standard.

Inline also alleges Graphic violated antitrust law by engaging in "baiting/submarine [*1135] patent activities." Compl. ¶¶ 55-58, 106-10. Inline claims that Graphic purposefully fails to disclose its intellectual property holdings by not marking its packaging with applicable patents. Id. ¶ 106. In so doing, Inline posits that Graphic baits its competitors into investing substantial resources into production efforts on products that Graphic has protected by patent. See id. In some cases, Inline alleges, "Graphic has waited until after such packaging has become commonplace in the market to apply for such patents, and then waited months or years after being issued such patents to threaten or bring an action against its competitors, despite prior knowledge of allegedly infringing competitor products in the marketplace." Id. ¶ 55.

The Complaint specifically identifies an occasion where Graphic stopped competing in a bidding process for a large susceptor food packaging supply contract in 2014. Id. ¶ 58. Instead of participating in the bidding process, Inline alleges that Graphic threatened Inline [32] with litigation based on an undisclosed patent to foreclose Inline's ability to compete in the market. Id.

Graphic moves to dismiss this theory of antitrust liability, identifying it as "a truly novel argument" and stating that it stands in stark contrast to Inline's sham litigation theory which faults Graphic for actively informing food packaging companies of its patents. Reply Mem. Supp. Mot. Dismiss [Docket No. 32] at 7 ("While Plaintiff's 'sham litigation' theory faults Graphic for informing customers about its patents, Plaintiff's 'submarine patent' theory does the exact opposite.").

The Court agrees with Graphic that this claim is illogical. HN17[] Patent marking is not mandatory. See 35 U.S.C. § 287(a) (stating a patentee "may give notice to the public that the same is patented") (emphasis added). Under 35 U.S.C. § 287(a), a patentee cannot recover damages "except on proof that the infringer was notified of the infringement and continued to infringe thereafter." Id. When a patentee does not mark a product, § 287(a) requires actual notice "to assure that the recipient knew of the adverse patent during the period in which liability accrues, when constructive notice by marking is absent." SRI Int'l, Inc. v. Adv. Tech. Labs., Inc., 127 F.3d 1462, 1470 (Fed. Cir. 1997). Thus, marking serves as an option for patentees [33] to ensure that sufficient notice was provided which is required to recover damages for infringement. Inline cannot assert a cognizable antitrust theory based on Graphic's choice not to mark a product—a choice that is contemplated in patent law. Although, Inline argues that Graphic's decision to not mark patented products "has no pro-competitive benefits" and "no legitimate business purpose," these conclusory statements do not give rise to an antitrust claim. Given that Graphic is under no legal obligation to mark its products and Inline has provided no case law to support submarine patent theory as a viable antitrust theory, such claim is dismissed.

5. Antitrust Injury/Standing

In their last argument concerning the antitrust claims, Graphic argues that the claims fail because Inline has not adequately alleged facts to establish that it suffered an antitrust injury and, therefore, lacks standing. HN18[] To properly assert an antitrust action, a plaintiff must have suffered an antitrust injury—an "injury of the type that the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." In re Canadian Import Antitrust Litig., 470 F.3d 785, 791 (8th Cir. 2006) (quotation omitted). "[A]ntitrust injury is a threshold issue that plaintiffs [34] must establish in order to have standing to sue [*1136] under the antitrust laws." Fischer v. NWA, Inc. 883 F.2d 594, 597 n.5 (8th Cir. 1989). "[A] mere causal connection between an antitrust violation and harm to plaintiff cannot be the basis for antitrust compensation unless the injury is directly related to the harm the antitrust laws were designed to protect." McDonald v. Johnson & Johnson, 722 F.2d 1370, 1374 (8th Cir. 1983).

Here, Inline has pled sufficient facts to demonstrate that it was injured by Graphic's anticompetitive behavior. Specifically, Inline alleges that it lost profits from sales not completed due to Graphic's interference/sham litigation tactics and lost profits from sales unrealized due to Graphic's bundled discounts. See Compl. ¶¶ 28, 41-43, 82, 87, 96, 99. At the pleading stage here, this is adequate. See Fair Isaac Corp. v. Experian Info. Solutions Inc., 645 F. Supp. 2d 734, 748-49 (D. Minn. 2009) (stating that although the plaintiffs' allegations that it "has been injured in its business and property" due to the defendants' antitrust violations were sufficient to survive a motion for judgment on the pleadings for lack of standing, more was needed at the summary judgment stage).

Graphic further challenges Inline's standing for failure to plead injury to competition. See Reply Mem. Supp. Mot. Dismiss at 7 ("The fact that [Inline] may have lost sales, however, does not mean that competition [35] has been harmed."). HN19[] Indeed, the interplay between injury-to-competition and direct injury to a plaintiff when evaluating antitrust standing is not always clear. "The two concepts are closely related, however, and the Eighth Circuit and decisions from this District largely conflate the two and incorporate an injury-to-competition requirement into the analysis of antitrust standing." TheMLSonline.com. Inc. v. Regional Multiple Listing Serv. of Minn., Inc., 840 F. Supp. 2d 1174, 1180 (D. Minn. 2012). Regardless, the Complaint here contains numerous allegations of injury to competition sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss.[3] See Compl. ¶¶ 28, 34, 51, 54, 80.

C. Tortious Interference

Inline also alleges that Graphic tortiously interfered with Inline's prospective and actual contractual relationships. [36] HN20[] To establish tortious interference with an existing contract under Minnesota law, a plaintiff must show: (1) the existence of a contract, (2) the defendant's knowledge of the contract, (3) the defendant's intentional procurement of the breach of contract, (4) the defendant acted without justification, and (5) damages. Kjesbo v. Ricks, 517 N.W.2d 585, 588 (Minn. 1994). A claim for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage also has five elements: "(1) the existence of a reasonable expectation of economic advantage belonging to the plaintiff; (2) the defendant's knowledge of that expectation; (3) the defendant's wrongful interference with that expectation; (4) a reasonable probability that the plaintiff would have realized the expectation absent the defendant's conduct; and (5) damages." Daum v. Planit Sols., Inc., 619 F. Supp. 2d 652, 658 (D. Minn. 2009) (citations omitted). Liability for a tortious interference with prospective economic advantage [*1137] claim rests on whether the actor's conduct was improper. Fox Sports Net N., L.L.C. v. Minn. Twins P'ship, 319 F.3d 329, 337 (8th Cir. 2003) (citation omitted). "For purposes of this tort, improper means are those that are independently wrongful such as threats, violence, trespass, defamation, misrepresentation of fact, restraint of trade or any other wrongful act recognized by statute or common law." Harman v. Heartland Food Co., 614 N.W.2d 236, 241 (Minn. Ct. App. 2000) (quotation omitted). [37]

Graphic argues that Inline's Complaint asserts only vague and conclusory allegations that are insufficient to state a claim for tortious interference. The Court disagrees. Inline has sufficiently alleged both the existence of a contract and a reasonable expectation of business relations. Furthermore, Inline has pled that Graphic interfered with these contracts or relations.

As to interference with an existing contract, Inline claims that in 2014 it was awarded contracts to supply 1.1 billion units of susceptor packaging products to a food company buyer. Compl. ¶ 41. Inline alleges that due to Graphic's interference with that contract (i.e., Graphic's threat to the food company buyer that it would file suit against Inline), only ten percent of the product order was actually filled. Id. Graphic challenges the sufficiency of these claims, arguing that Inline did not identify the food company supplier, allege the existence of an enforceable contract, Graphic's knowledge of the contract, that the reduction of orders was indeed a breach, and that Graphic caused this breach.

Graphic's argument ignores the language of the Complaint. Inline specifically alleges the existence of a contract. The [38] Complaint states Inline was scheduled to supply 1.1 billion units of susceptor packaging and only ten percent of this amount was filled during "the pendency of the contracts." Id. The Complaint also references

[3] Graphic additionally argues that Inline lacks standing to assert antitrust claims based on threats and litigation directed at third-party manufacturers. See Disenos Artisticos E. Industriales, S.A. v. Work, 676 F. Supp. 1254, 1286 (E.D.N.Y. 1987) (stating that the defendant "has no standing to challenge allegedly coercive lawsuits brought against other parties"). The Complaint generally refers to sham litigation activities against "competitors" and "smaller rivals." Compl. ¶¶ 30, 31. The Court will resolve this ambiguity in Inline's favor and interpret such statements to be referring to Inline.

Graphic's knowledge of the contract, in that it alleges Graphic communicated with the food buyer that it "intended to sue Inline and therefore the food company buyer should not source the susceptor products from Inline." Id. Inline additionally clearly alleges Graphic's actions caused the reduction of orders. Id. ("Graphic's conduct led to Inline receiving orders for units of susceptor food packaging products far below the amounts agreed to."); Id. ¶ 129 ("Graphic intentionally caused Inline's customer to breach its agreements with Inline."). Although Inline did not identify the food company buyer by name, this is not fatal to Inline's claim. Inline's allegations are sufficiently detailed to put Graphic on adequate notice of the claim.

Finally, Graphic argues that Inline did not overtly claim that the reduction in orders constituted a breach of Inline's contract with the food company buyer. The Court finds that a breach can logically be inferred from the pleadings—Inline alleges [39] a contract for 1.1 billion units of susceptor packaging, only ten percent of which was ultimately ordered. Moreover, later in the Complaint a breach is specifically alleged. See Id. ¶ 130 ("With full knowledge of those agreements, Graphic intentionally caused Inline's customer to breach its agreements with Inline."). Although the clarity of the Complaint could be improved, the Court reads the Complaint as a whole and the allegations here, taken together, are sufficient. See Braden v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 588 F.3d 585, 594 (8th Cir. 2009) ("HN21[] [T]he complaint should be read as a whole, not parsed piece by piece.").

Additionally, Inline adequately alleges tortious interference with a prospective economic advantage. Inline references a potential business relationship with Nation Pizza Products. According to Inline, after it met with Nation [*1138] Pizza Products, Graphic communicated to Nation Pizza Products that it would sue Inline if Inline was awarded a contract. See Compl. ¶ 42. The Complaint later alleges that Inline had a reasonable expectation of economic advantage with food company buyers, Graphic was aware of this prospective economic advantage, and Graphic "intentionally, tortiously and illegally" interfered with Inline's expectations. Id. ¶¶ 122-24. Absent [40] Graphic's conduct, Inline asserts "it was reasonably probable that Inline would have realized its expected economic advantage or benefit." Id. ¶ 125. Taking these assertions together, Inline sufficiently pled a claim for tortious interference with a prospective economic advantage sufficient to survive the motion to dismiss.

Graphic cites to Select Comfort Corp. v. Sleep Better Store, LLC to support its contention that Inline has failed to allege that Graphic's actions were improper or wrongful. 838 F. Supp. 2d 889 (D. Minn. 2012). In that case, Sleep Better asserted a counterclaim for tortious interference with a contract against its competitor Select Comfort. Id. at 891. The claim centered on Select Comfort sending a cease and desist letter for trademark infringement to Overstock.com regarding the sale of Sleep Better beds, when Overstock was contracted to sell Sleep Better mattresses on its website. Id. The court dismissed the claim on a motion to dismiss. Id. at 893-96. The court focused on the justification element of tortious interference—that is, whether Select Comfort was justified in sending the cease and desist letter to Overstock.com. Id. The court concluded that "there are no factual allegations in the pleadings to support any claims [41] that Select Comfort acted with bad faith or employed improper means. Sleep Better's mere conclusory assertions that Select Comfort's conduct in sending the cease-and-desist letter was 'improper,' 'unjustified,' 'intentional,' and 'willful' do not create a plausible claim of bad faith." Id. at 895-96.

Select Comfort is distinguishable because here Inline alleges sufficient facts that Graphic engaged in improper conduct. Inline alleges Graphic's overtures to National Pizza and other food buyers were wrongful because Graphic threatened suit related to "invalid, expired, or inapplicable patents." Compl. ¶ 43. This stands in stark contrast to Select Comfort, where Sleep Better alleged no facts to support its contention that Select Comfort's cease and desist letter seeking to a protect a trademark was improper. "Ordinarily, whether interference is justified is an issue of fact, and the test is what is reasonable conduct under the circumstances." Kjesbo, 517 N.W.2d at 588. Discovery will assist in revealing if Graphic's interference was wrongful and unjustified in so far as it was based on clearly invalid or expired patents. At this stage of litigation, Inline's allegations survive. To the extent Graphic seeks to dismiss the tortious [42] interference claim, the motion is denied.

D. Misappropriation of Trade Secrets

Finally, Graphic seeks dismissal of Inline's misappropriation of trade secrets claim (Count III). HN22[] Under the Minnesota Uniform Trade Secrets Act, a trade secret is defined as information that: (1) is not generally known or readily ascertainable, (2) derives independent economic value from secrecy, and (3) is the subject of reasonable efforts to maintain its secrecy. Minn. Stat. § 325C.01, subd. 5. Misappropriation of a trade secret occurs when there is disclosure or use of a trade secret without express or implied consent by a person who, at the time of disclosure or use, knew that the utilization of the trade secret was acquired under circumstances [*1139] giving rise to a duty to maintain its secrecy or limit its use. Id., subd. 3(ii).

Inline's pleadings for this claim are facially sufficient. Inline alleges that in 2008, Heinz, as the distributor of Weight Watchers' pizza, requested that Inline redesign a susceptor sheet for Weight Watchers' Smart Ones pizza. Compl. ¶ 53. Inline claims that it created a more efficient design, and shared the design with Heinz "under the condition that it remain confidential." Id. Inline alleges that Graphic copied [43] this susceptor sheet design Inline had created for Heinz without Inline's permission. Id. Inline further claims that "Graphic knew or should have known that the design created by Inline, bearing its name, but provided by Heinz, was confidential and that Heinz owed a duty to Inline to maintain the design's secrecy and/or limit its use." Id.

Graphic contends that Inline's misappropriation of trade secrets claim is defective for multiple reasons. Graphic first argues the Complaint neglects to even allege the existence of a trade secret. Again, Graphic's argument misses the mark and attempts to rely on evidentiary failings prior to discovery. The Complaint generally alleges the design at issue comprising the trade secret—the susceptor sheet for Weight Watchers' Smart Ones pizza. See id. ¶ 53. The Complaint is vague for obvious reasons regarding the specifics of this design; a plaintiff is not required to divulge the explicit content of a trade secret in a complaint. As this Court has previously stated, HN23[] "[i]n the context of pleading a claim for the misappropriation of trade secrets, a plaintiff is understandably hesitant to reveal the exact parameters of the trade secrets it believes have been [44] misappropriated because a trade secret made public is not a secret." *TE Connectivity Networks, Inc. v. All Sys. Broadband, Inc., No. 13-1356, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 180392, 2013 WL 6827348, at 3 (D. Minn. 2013) (citations omitted).

Graphic further maintains that Inline failed to allege any reasonable efforts it took to maintain the secrecy of its pattern or design. Graphic cites to several cases wherein misappropriation of trade secrets claims were dismissed at the summary judgment stage for lack of evidence that reasonable efforts were taken to maintain the confidentiality of a trade secret. See *Coyne's & Co., Inc. v. Enesco, LLC, No. 07-4095, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83630, 2010 WL 3269977, at 16 (D. Minn. Aug. 16, 2010) ("Coyne's submits no evidence of the steps it took to maintain confidentiality."); *RING Comput. Sys., Inc. v. ParaData Comput. Networks, Inc., No. C4-90-889, 1990 Minn. App. LEXIS 922, 1990 WL 132615, at 2 (Minn. Ct. App. Sept. 18, 1990) ("[S]igning of a confidentiality agreement, without more, is not enough."). But this is not a motion for summary judgment. The Complaint specifically states that Inline shared the design with Heinz on the condition that it remain confidential, suggesting that Inline took reasonable efforts to maintain the secrecy of its Smart Ones design. The Complaint later generally alleges that the design "was the subject of efforts that were reasonable under the circumstances to maintain its secrecy." Compl. ¶ 134. Taken together, these pleadings rise above a conclusory level. The particulars [45] of Inline's reasonable steps to ensure the secrecy of its Smart Ones design is a question to be explored during discovery.

Graphic lastly argues that Inline did not adequately allege that Graphic improperly acquired the trade secret, arguing that Inline's claims are exceedingly vague and potentially could assert a misappropriation of trade secrets claim against Heinz, but not Graphic. The Court finds the Complaint clear on this point. The Complaint states that in 2013 "Graphic began copying the packaging designed by [*1140] Inline for Heinz, without Inline's permission" and "Graphic knew or should have known that the design created by Inline, bearing its name, but provided by Heinz, was confidential." Id. ¶ 53. As noted above, misappropriation of a trade secret occurs when there is a use of a trade secret without consent by a person who, at the time of the use, knew that the trade secret was acquired under circumstances giving rise to a duty to maintain its secrecy or limit its use. Minn. Stat. § 325C.01, subd. 3(ii). Here, Inline alleges that Graphic utilized a trade secret (the Smart Ones susceptor packaging design) and at the time of use, knew that the design was given with an expectation of confidentiality from Heinz. Nothing [46] more is required at this stage. Graphic's Motion to Dismiss the misappropriation of trade secrets claim is denied.[4]

IV. CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, and all the files, records and proceedings herein, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that Defendant Graphic Packaging International, Inc.'s Motion to Dismiss [Docket No. 25] is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part as follows:

A. To the extent Graphic seeks dismissal of Inline's antitrust claims in Counts IV and V that are based on its submarine patent theory, the Motion is granted; and

B. In all other respects, the Motion is denied.

[4] In a footnote to its opposition brief, Inline states that while the design for the Smart Ones pizza packaging would have become public once Heinz started utilizing it commercially, Graphic saved "valuable time" in developing a competing design by not waiting until the design became public. Additionally, the footnote states that Graphic's misappropriation caused Inline to "abandon an existing patent application for the design." Mem. Opp'n Mot. Dismiss at 9, n.4. In its reply memorandum, Graphic responds that these facts are fatal to Inline's claim because once information is disclosed in the patent application process, it becomes public and therefore can no longer be classified as a trade secret. Reply Supp. Mot. Dismiss at 9 (citing B.E. Meyers & Co., Inc. v. United States, 47 Fed. Cl. 375, 378-79 (Fed. Cl. 2000)). Although the existence of a patent application for the Smart Ones design may eventually be relevant in determining the existence of a trade secret, none of these facts are in the Complaint. On a motion to dismiss the Court is limited to the facts as asserted in the Complaint. The Court therefore will not consider these arguments at this time. [47]

Opinion

[*247] MEMORANDUM & ORDER

MARGO K. BRODIE, United States District Judge:

Plaintiffs Melvin Salveson, Edward Lawrence, Dianna Lawrence and Wendy M. Adams commenced this putative antitrust class action on December 16, 2013, in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California against Defendants, financial institutions who issue general purpose payment cards that consumers use to purchase goods and services, and the affiliates of such institutions.[1] On behalf of a putative nationwide class of consumers using payment cards issued by Defendants, Plaintiffs assert claims pursuant to Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 26, and pursuant to the Cartwright Act, California Business and Professions Code § 16750(a). Defendants moved to dismiss all of Plaintiffs' claims, and by Memorandum [3] and Order filed on November 26, 2014, the Court granted Defendants' motion (the "November 26, 2014 Decision").[2] The Clerk of Court entered judgment on December 4, 2014. (Dec. 4, 2014 J., Docket Entry No. 86.)

Plaintiffs now move to vacate the judgment and, pursuant to Local Civil Rule 6.3, for reconsideration of the dismissal of their federal claim. Defendants cross-move for reconsideration pursuant to Rule 59(e) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Local Civil Rule 6.3, seeking reconsideration of the Court's refusal to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' California state law claim. For the reasons set forth below, Plaintiffs' reconsideration motion is denied. The Court grants Defendants' reconsideration motion and, on reconsideration, dismisses [4] Plaintiffs' state law claim.

I. Background

The Court assumes familiarity with the facts and procedural background as set forth in the November 26, 2014 Decision. (Nov. 26, 2014 Memorandum and Order ("M&O"), Docket Entry No. 83.) The Court summarizes only the pertinent facts.

According to Plaintiffs, in the course of issuing payment cards to consumers, Defendants and their affiliates knowingly participated in an anticompetitive conspiracy to fix fees related to those payment cards. (Compl. ¶¶ 26-29.) These fees are known as interchange fees. (See id. ¶¶ 40, 48.) Plaintiffs contend that consumers like Plaintiffs and the putative class used the payment cards to purchase goods and services and "paid supracompetitive [i]nterchange [f]ees to Defendants and their co-conspirators." (Id. ¶¶ 19-20.)

Plaintiffs allege that each time a consumer uses a payment card, the following sequence of events occur: the merchant accepts the payment card from the cardholder and relays the transaction information to the merchant's "acquiring bank"; the acquiring bank then transmits the transaction information to the payment card's network — either Visa or MasterCard; and the network then relays the transaction information to the [5] cardholder's "issuing bank" for approval of the transaction. [*248] (Id. ¶ 49 (quoting United States v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 344 F.3d 229, 235 (2d Cir. 2003)).) If the issuing bank determines the consumer has sufficient credit and approves the transaction, it conveys its approval to the acquiring bank and the acquiring bank then relays its approval to the merchant. (See

[1] On June 4, 2014, the Clerk of Court for the Northern District of California entered a Transfer Order from the United States Judicial Panel on Multi District Litigation, transferring this case to the Eastern District of New York. (MDL Transfer Order, Docket Entry No. 61.)

[2] On December 18, 2014, the United States Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation, with the consent of the Court, ordered that the case be reassigned from Judge John Gleeson to the undersigned. (Order Reassigning Litigation, Docket Entry No. 88.)

id.) Finally, the issuing bank — in this case, one of the Defendants — pays the acquiring bank an amount representing the price of the goods or services purchased by the consumer in the underlying transaction, less an "interchange fee," the fee at issue in this case. (See id.)

Plaintiffs allege that Defendants' participation in an anticompetitive conspiracy has injured cardholders by causing them to "pa[y] supracompetitive price-fixed [i]nterchange [f]ees to Defendants" that were higher "than [the fees] they would have paid in the absence of . . . antitrust violations" by Defendants. (Id. ¶¶ 104-105.) Plaintiffs contend that a cardholder "pays the gross amount of the transaction, including fees, directly to the [issuing bank], which keeps the [i]nterchang [f]ee and passes on a separate transaction fee to the [acquiring bank] and the net amount to the merchant via the Visa or MasterCard network." (Id. ¶ 38.) According to Plaintiffs, the [6] interchange fee is paid "directly" by the cardholders. (Id. ¶ 6.) Plaintiffs specifically allege that the initial payment in the transaction is made by cardholders, that the issuing bank "keep[s]" the interchange fee from that payment, and that the payments made by cardholders are "comprise[d]" of the "balance" due to the merchant plus the interchange fee and other fees. (Id. ¶¶ 47-48, 81.)

II. Discussion

a. Standards of review

i. Reconsideration

The standard for granting a motion for reconsideration is strict, and "[r]econsideration will generally be denied unless the moving party can point to controlling decisions or data that the court overlooked — matters, in other words, that might reasonably be expected to alter the conclusion reached by the court." *Cedar Petrochemicals, Inc. v. Dongbu Hannong Chem. Co., 628 Fed. Appx. 793, 796, 2015 U.S. App. LEXIS 18008, 2015 WL 5999215, at 3 (2d Cir. 2015) (quoting Shrader v. CSX Transp., Inc., 70 F.3d 255, 257 (2d Cir. 1995)); Bank of Am. Nat'l Ass'n v. AIG Fin. Prods. Corp., 509 F. App'x 24, 27 (2d Cir. 2013) ("The standard for granting such a motion is strict . . . ." (quoting Shrader, 70 F.3d at 257)), as amended (Apr. 5, 2013); see also Local Civ. R. 6.3 (The moving party must "set[] forth concisely the matters or controlling decisions which counsel believes the Court has overlooked.").

ii. Motion to dismiss for failure to state [8] a claim

In reviewing a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, a court must "accept all factual allegations in the complaint as true and draw inferences from those allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiff." Tsirelman v. Daines, 794 F.3d 310, 313 (2d Cir. 2015) (quoting Jaghory v. N.Y. State Dep't of Educ., 131 F.3d 326, 329 (2d Cir. 1997)); see also Matson v. Bd. of Educ., 631 F.3d 57, 63 (2d Cir. 2011) (quoting Connecticut v. Am. Elec. Power Co., 582 F.3d 309, 320 (2d Cir. 2009)). A complaint must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). A claim is plausible "when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Matson, 631 F.3d at 63 (quoting Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009)); see also Pension Ben. Guar. Corp. ex rel. St. Vincent Catholic Med. Ctrs. Ret. Plan v. Morgan Stanley Inv. Mgmt. Inc., 712 F.3d 705, 717-18 (2d Cir. 2013). Although all allegations contained in the complaint are assumed true, this principle is "inapplicable to legal conclusions" or "[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678.

b. Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration of the dismissal of the federal claim

In the November 26, 2014 Decision, the Court granted Defendants' motion to dismiss the Complaint. The Court determined that Plaintiffs are indirect purchasers and therefore the dismissal of the federal claim was appropriate because the claim is barred by the rule set forth in Illinois Brick Company v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), which denies standing to indirect purchasers' under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. (M&O 6-8.)

[9] i. The November 26, 2014 Decision

The Court explained in the November 26, 2014 Decision that, pursuant to the Supreme Court decision in Illinois Brick, "indirect purchasers — individuals or entities that do not make purchases directly from the defendants alleged to have violated antitrust laws — do not have standing to sue under § 4 of the Clayton Act." (Id. at 5.) As the Court stated, "only direct purchasers have standing under § 4 of the Clayton Act to seek damages for antitrust violations." (Id. (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Delaware Valley Surgical Supply Inc. v. Johnson & Johnson, 523 F.3d 1116, 1120-21 (9th Cir. 2008)).) The Court further explained that the presumption against recovery for plaintiffs who are "not the immediate buyers from the alleged antitrust violations" includes cases "in which immediate buyers pass on 100 percent of their costs to their customers." [*250] (Id. (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Kansas v. Utilicorp United, Inc., 497 U.S. 199, 207-208, 110 S. Ct. 2807, 111 L. Ed. 2d 169 (1990)).)

The Court determined that Plaintiffs failed to allege that they are direct purchasers or that their federal claim came within an exception to the Illinois Brick doctrine. (Id. at 5-7.) The Court stated that Plaintiffs' allegations — including the allegation that the payments made by cardholders as part of each credit card transaction represented direct payments of the "supracompetitive" [10] interchange fees to Defendants — were insufficient to plead that cardholders are direct purchasers with standing. (Id. at 6.)

ii. Plaintiffs' arguments in support of their reconsideration motion

In seeking reconsideration, Plaintiffs argue, in substance, that the Court overlooked the standard applicable to a motion to dismiss by failing to accept Plaintiffs' allegations as true. (Mem. in Support of Pls. Mot. ("Pls. Mem.") 4, Docket Entry No. 91.) Plaintiffs argue that, "[t]here is no question that the cardholders repeatedly alleged that they were the direct payors or purchasers" and that the allegation that cardholders pay the interchange fee is not only plausible but also "manifest and self-evident." (Id.) Plaintiffs further argue that the Court overlooked their pleadings as to the role of cardholders in the payment transactions containing the interchange fee.[3] (Id. ("[T]his Court explained the structure of the network. . . . Although the [C]ourt included the so-called 'issuing bank,' the 'acquiring bank,' and the merchant, the cardholder consumer was omitted.").)

iii. Plaintiffs fail to satisfy the standard for reconsideration [12]

The Court neither overlooked Plaintiffs' allegations that the interchange fees are paid directly by cardholders nor ignored the obligation to credit Plaintiffs' factual allegations. Because Plaintiffs have not shown (1) that the Court overlooked critical facts or (2) that the Court overlooked any relevant controlling decisions, there is no basis for the Court to reconsider the dismissal of Plaintiffs' federal law claim for failure to state a claim. See Shrader, 70 F.3d at 257 (holding that a party seeking reconsideration must identify overlooked "controlling decisions or data"); Analytical Surveys, 684 F.3d at 52 (explaining that a motion for reconsideration is not a vehicle for relitigation of issues already addressed by the court); *Akil Bey v. City of New York, No. 13-CV-9103, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123763, 2015 WL 5473155, at 1 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 16, 2015) (construing plaintiff's motion for relief [*251] from court's order as a motion for reconsideration).

In the Complaint, Plaintiffs quote United States v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 344 F.3d 229 (2d Cir. 2003), in describing the structure of the transactions giving rise to the incursion and payment of the interchange fee. (Compl. ¶ 48.) Plaintiffs specifically quote a portion of the Second Circuit decision stating "[w]hereas in the market for general purpose cards, the issuers are the sellers, and cardholders are the buyers, in the market for general purpose card network services, the four networks [13] themselves are the sellers, and the issuers of cards and merchants are the buyers." [4] (Id. ¶ 48 (quoting Visa U.S.A., 344 F.3d at 239).) Thus, based on the allegations, Plaintiffs recognize that there is a distinction between two markets: one for payment cards (the "Payment Card Market"), in which consumers participate by purchasing cards from issuing banks, and another for network services (the "Card Network Services Market"), in which merchants purchase services to facilitate the use of those cards. Plaintiffs also allege that the interchange fee is exchanged between financial institutions in the Card Network Services Market. (Id. ¶ 48.) In rejecting their claim, the Court determined that Plaintiffs' "facile contention that cardholders pay interchange fees directly is refuted by their own allegations about how transactions over these two networks occur"

[3] In support of their argument that cardholders directly pay interchange fees, Plaintiffs file a declaration and exhibits in support of their motion. (Decl. of Joseph M. Alioto [11] , Docket Entry No. 92; see also Pls. Reply 1, Docket Entry No. 103 (arguing that the "dispositive charts" in the exhibits "showed that the cardholder paid the money, which included the interchange fee" and that the "charts also showed, in support of the plausibility of the allegations in [P]laintiffs' complaint, that the cardholder paid the issuing bank, which kept the interchange fee and passed on the remainder to the acquiring bank, which kept its fee and in turn passed on the remainder to the merchant").) The Court declines to consider these documents as they were not attached to the Complaint and were not otherwise before the Court when it decided Defendants' motion to dismiss, and, therefore, these documents are not properly before the Court on Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration. See Drapkin v. Mafco Consol. Group, Inc., 818 F. Supp. 2d 678, 695 (S.D.N.Y. 2011) (explaining that a moving party seeking reconsideration may "not advance new facts, issues or arguments not previously presented to the Court" (internal quotation marks and citation omitted)). Moreover, Local Civil Rule 6.3 specifies that on a motion for reconsideration "[n]o affidavits shall be filed by any party unless directed by the Court." Local Civil Rule 6.3.

[4] Plaintiffs selectively quote the Second Circuit's explanation in United States v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 344 F.3d 229 (2d Cir. 2003) that, "in the market for general purpose [credit cards], the issuers are the sellers, and the cardholders are the buyers" to inaccurately plead that this phrase [14] demonstrates that "the Second Circuit expressly held that Cardholders are 'direct purchasers' for antitrust purposes." (Compl. ¶ 50 (quoting Visa U.S.A., 344 F.3d at 239).) The Visa U.S.A decision contains no such holding. The standing of cardholders to bring antitrust claims, as direct or indirect purchasers, was not at issue in Visa U.S.A. In the phrase cited by Plaintiffs, the Second Circuit was explaining its determination that the district court had correctly found that the payment card networks "compete with one another in a market for 'network services.'" Visa U.S.A., 344 F.3d at 239. In doing so, the Second Circuit described that consumers are "buyers" of payment cards, not payers of interchange fees, and did so to provide an explanatory contrast. Id. (emphasis in original).

and that Plaintiffs' conclusory and contradictory pleadings did not plausibly allege that the cardholders are direct purchasers. (M&O 6-7.)

Plaintiffs argue that the Court failed to credit the allegations that cardholders are the direct payors of interchange fees and, in so doing, overlooked controlling law, namely the standard applicable to a motion to dismiss. Although the Court may not have expressly referenced the pleading standard in stating that Plaintiffs failed to allege that cardholders are direct purchasers, the Court's determination was based on its rejection of the direct purchaser allegations [15] as conclusory, contradictory and insufficient to support an inference that cardholders are the payors of interchange fees. (Id. at 6-7.) "Although factual allegations of a complaint are normally accepted as true on a motion to dismiss, . . . that principle does not apply to general allegations that are contradicted 'by more specific allegations in the Complaint.'" DPWN Holdings (USA), Inc. v. United Air Lines, Inc., 747 F.3d 145, 151-52 (2d Cir. 2014) (citations omitted); see also Sherman v. Town of Chester, 752 F.3d 554, 568 n.5 (2d Cir. 2014) (declining to credit allegation that an appeal was timely filed where the complaint also "explicitly state[d]" contradictory allegations); Hirsch v. Arthur Andersen & Co., 72 F.3d 1085, 1095 (2d Cir. 1995) ("[T]he [c]omplaint's attenuated allegations of control are contradicted both by more specific allegations in [*252] the Complaint and by facts of which we may take judicial notice . . . .").

The Court accepted Plaintiffs' factual allegations and drew "all reasonable inferences in [P]laintiffs' favor." (M&O 5 (citing Sheppard v. Beerman, 18 F.3d 147, 150 (2d Cir. 1994)). However, the Court was not obligated to credit Plaintiffs' allegation that cardholders are the direct payors of interchange fees, as this allegation is directly contradicted by the specific allegations about the Payment Card and Card Services Markets and the transactions involving the interchange fee. DPWN Holdings, 747 F.3d at 152. The Court considered the applicable standard and determined that Plaintiffs' allegations [16] did not permit a reasonable inference that cardholders are direct payors, given that such a conclusion is at odds with the allegations regarding the structure of the relevant transactions. (M&O 5); see also Matson, 631 F.3d at 63 (A claim is plausible "when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." (quoting Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678)). Plaintiffs have not identified any controlling law that the Court overlooked.

Plaintiffs also argue that the Court specifically overlooked allegations that cardholders pay interchange fees directly by initiating the chain of events that occurs as part of each transaction. The Court considered and rejected this claim. See, e.g., Boyd v. J.E. Robert Co., No. 05-CV-2455, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 140546, 2013 WL 5436969, at *2 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 27, 2013) (denying reconsideration where "[p]laintiffs' motion . . . merely attempts to relitigate and rehash arguments already considered and rejected by the court"), aff'd, 765 F.3d 123 (2d Cir. 2014); PAB Aviation, Inc. v. United States, No. 98-CV-5952, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12201, 2000 WL 1240196, at *1 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 24, 2000) ("Because PAB's motion involves only reformulations of arguments already considered and rejected, reconsideration is not warranted."), aff'd, 169 F. App'x 61 (2d Cir. 2006). Plaintiffs disagree with the Court's outcome and are attempting to "relitigat[e] old issues," which is not a basis for reconsideration. See Analytical Surveys, 684 F.3d at 52.

Plaintiffs have failed to identify controlling [17] law or allegations that the Court overlooked. The Court therefore declines to reconsider its determination that Plaintiffs are barred from asserting claims under § 4 of the Clayton Act by the Illinois Brick doctrine. Plaintiffs' reconsideration motion is denied.

c. Defendants' cross-motion for reconsideration of the state law claim

In the November 26, 2014 Decision, the Court declined to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' state law claim and dismissed the claim without prejudice. (M&O 8.) Defendants seek reconsideration of this determination, arguing that the Court overlooked the fact that it had original jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' state law claim pursuant to the Class Action Fairness Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d), ("CAFA"), and that the Court should therefore have addressed the merits of the state law claim. (Defs. Opp'n & Mem. 5, Docket Entry No. 98.) Defendants further argue that on reconsideration of the underlying motion to dismiss, the Court should dismiss the Cartwright Act claim because Plaintiffs have failed to allege a cognizable antitrust injury. (Id. at 7-8.)

i. The Court's jurisdiction pursuant to CAFA

Defendants argue that CAFA provides the Court with original jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' [18] Cartwright Act claim because the claim is asserted on behalf of a nationwide class against diverse Defendants and the damages sought are sufficient that "no permissive or mandatory [*253] exceptions apply." (Id. at 5.) Plaintiffs oppose Defendants' motion primarily by arguing against the dismissal of the state law claim on the merits. (Pls. Mem in Opp'n to Defs. Mot. ("Pls. Opp'n") 8-9, Docket Entry No. 104.) Plaintiffs do not address Defendants' argument that CAFA provides original jurisdiction over the state law claim. (Id. at 8.) Plaintiffs also fail to address the argument that because the Court overlooked this controlling law, there are grounds to reconsider Defendants' motion to dismiss. (Id.) Instead, Plaintiffs argue that "a federal court has discretion whether to entertain a supplemental state claim, after dismissing federal claims," and appear to argue that the Court should not exercise its discretion to exercise jurisdiction. (Id.)

CAFA provides federal district courts "with 'original jurisdiction' to hear a 'class action' if the class has more than 100 members, the parties are minimally diverse, and the 'matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $5,000,000.'" Std. Fire Ins. Co. v. Knowles, 562 U.S. ___, ___, 133 S. Ct. 1345, 1348, 185 L. Ed. 2d 439 (2013) (quoting 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2), (d)(5)(B)); see also Estate of Pew v. Cardarelli, 527 F.3d 25, 30 (2d Cir. 2008) ("CAFA [19] amends the diversity jurisdiction statute by adding § 1332(d), which confers original federal jurisdiction over any class action with minimal diversity (e.g., where at least one plaintiff and one defendant are citizens of different states) and an aggregate amount in controversy of at least $5 million (exclusive of interest and costs).").

CAFA provides three exceptions to original jurisdiction: "the so-called 'local controversy,' 'home state controversy,' and 'interests of justice' exceptions." Mattera v. Clear Channel Commc'ns, Inc., 239 F.R.D. 70, 77 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). The local controversy and home state exceptions to CAFA jurisdiction mandate that district courts decline jurisdiction if certain elements are present that identify a case with primarily in-state class members seeking relief principally for in-state harm by citizens of the same state.[5] Id. (citing 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(4)(A) and (d)(3)); see also Hart v. Rick's N.Y. Cabaret Int'l, Inc., 967 F. Supp. 2d 955, 962 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) ("The mandatory exceptions are designed to draw a delicate balance between making a federal forum available to genuinely national litigation and allowing the state courts to retain cases when the controversy is strongly linked to that state. . . . [T]hese exceptions are intended to keep purely local matters and issues of particular state concern in the state courts." (internal quotation marks and [20] citation omitted)). A district court may also, in the "interest of justice," decline jurisdiction after considering a set of factors "designed to address similar concerns regarding truly local controversies in cases where neither mandatory exception applies." Sorrentino v. ASN Roosevelt Ctr., LLC, 588 F. Supp. 2d 350, 355 (E.D.N.Y. 2008); see also Mattera, 239 F.R.D. at 77 (listing the statutory factors); Hart, 967 F. Supp. 2d at 962-69 (finding that neither mandatory exception applied to class claims asserted under New York state law, and declining to invoke the interest of justice exception).

Plaintiffs allege that the Court has original jurisdiction over their state law claim pursuant to section 1332(d) and that the claim is asserted on behalf of a nationwide class against diverse Defendants, seeking damages in excess of $5,000,000. (Compl. ¶ 8.) While Plaintiffs do not expressly plead that the class would number more [*254] than 100 members, the parties appear to concede that a nationwide class of Visa and Mastercard cardholders would [21] exceed 100 members. (Id. ¶¶ 1, 8.) Plaintiffs do not seek relief for primarily in-state class members to remedy in-state harm by citizens of the same state, and thus, the claim does not fall within either of the mandatory exceptions to CAFA's grant of original jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(4)(A), (d)(3). Neither party argues to the contrary. Finally, it is not in the interests of justice to consider declining jurisdiction, as it is apparent that Plaintiffs'

[5] The local controversy and home state exceptions have distinct requirements, but both are similarly tailored to address claims involving in-state harms. Plaintiffs have not argued either of these exceptions, and it is clear that this is not a state or local issue, thus the exceptions are not applicable.

allegations relate to the nationwide practices of national financial institutions affecting consumers in every state, as opposed to allegations regarding to a "truly local" controversy. Sorrentino, 588 F. Supp. 2d at 355.

In declining to exercise supplemental jurisdiction in the November 26, 2014 Decision, the Court overlooked controlling law, specifically, CAFA's provision of original jurisdiction over the state law Cartwright Act claim. The Court therefore grants reconsideration of Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' state law claim.

ii. Reconsideration of Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' state law claim Plaintiffs allege that Defendants violated California's Cartwright Act, which "enumerates a relatively broad array of anticompetitive and conspiratorial conduct" and "provides [22] a private right of action to '[a]ny person who is injured in his or her business or property by reason of anything forbidden or declared unlawful by this chapter.'" (Compl. ¶ 112-121); AT&T Mobility LLC v. AU Optronics Corp., 707 F.3d 1106, 1110 (9th Cir. 2013) (quoting Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720(a)); see also Knevelbaard Dairies v. Kraft Foods, Inc., 232 F.3d 979, 986 (9th Cir. 2000) (The Cartwright Act "prohibits, among other things, any combination '[t]o prevent competition in [the] sale or purchase of . . . any commodity' or to '[a]gree in any manner to keep the price of . . . [any] commodity . . . at a fixed or graduated figure.'" (quoting Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720(c) and (e)(2))); Clayworth v. Pfizer, Inc., 49 Cal. 4th 758, 770, 111 Cal. Rptr. 3d 666, 233 P.3d 1066 (2010) (stating that the Cartwright Act "authorizes anyone injured in his or her business or property by actions forbidden" by the statute to seek to recover treble damages (internal quotation marks and citation omitted)); Asahi Kasei Pharma Corp. v. CoTherix, Inc., 204 Cal. App. 4th 1, 138 Cal. Rptr. 3d 620, 625 (Ct. App. 2012) (explaining that the Cartwright Act "generally outlaws any combinations or agreements which restrain trade or competition or which fix or control prices" (citations omitted)). Stating a claim under the Cartwright Act requires a plaintiff to allege: "(1) the formation and operation of the conspiracy; (2) illegal acts done pursuant thereto; and (3) damage proximately caused by such acts." In re High-Tech Employee Antitrust Litig., 856 F. Supp. 2d 1103, 1126 (N.D. Cal. 2012) (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Kolling v. Dow Jones & Co., 137 Cal. App. 3d 709, 187 Cal. Rptr. 797, 803 (Ct. App. 1982); Asahi, 138 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 626-27 (same).

1. Standing to recover as direct purchasers

Defendants move to dismiss Plaintiffs' [23] Cartwright Act claim, arguing that Plaintiffs have failed to adequately plead an antitrust injury and thus lack standing to recover. (Defs. Not. of Mot. and Mem in Support of Mot. to Dismiss ("Defs. MTD") 12-18, Docket Entry No. 38.) As with the federal claim, Plaintiffs' state law claim is based on allegations that cardholders are the direct payors of interchange fees that were inflated through anti-competitive behavior. (See, e.g., Compl. ¶ 114 (alleging that Defendants with their co-conspirators [*255] have acted "to create or carry out restriction of commerce and restraints of trade by agreeing to fix high non-competitive . . . [i]nterchange [f]ees imposed on [c]ardholders in the Visa and MasterCard networks"); id. ¶ 115 (stating that Defendants "engaged in a California-based horizontal scheme to fix [i]nterchange [f]ees paid by [c]ardholders").) The Complaint alleges that the named Plaintiffs have "been injured by being forced to pay higher [i]nterchange [f]ees than they would pay in the absence of the price-fixing conspiracy alleged herein."[6] (Id. ¶ 120.)

Defendants contend that Plaintiffs lack standing to bring a Cartwright Act claim because Plaintiffs cannot satisfy the requirements for an antitrust injury as established by Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983) ("AGC "). Defendants argue that Plaintiffs lack standing to recover because, according to Plaintiffs' pleadings, the alleged fixing of interchange fees only occurs in the Card Network Services Market, in which financial institutions provide services to facilitate card transactions, while cardholders participate only in the Payment Card Market, in which consumers purchase payment cards. (MTD Mem. 8.) Defendants argue that cardholders do not purchase network services or pay interchange fees and thus "any [25] alleged downstream impact on the price of retail consumer goods is . . . derivative and too remote to confer standing under well-established antitrust standing principles." (Defs. Reply in Support of Defs. MTD ("MTD Reply") 2, Docket Entry No. 63.) Plaintiffs respond that they have pled a direct, rather than downstream, antitrust injury that confers standing and disagree that the AGC factors apply to the California claim, an argument presented for the first time in their motion for reconsideration. (Pls. MTD Opp'n 13; Pls. Cross Mot. Opp'n 3-4.)

[6] Plaintiffs also allege that the anti-competitive conspiracy causes "increased retail prices for goods and services paid by [c]ardholders." (Compl. ¶ 101(h)). However, in response to Defendants' motion to dismiss, Plaintiffs expressly [24] state that they plead an injury that is "not . . . damages from the inflated price of goods and services purchased from merchants." (Pls. Opp'n to Defs. MTD ("Pls. MTD Opp'n) 13, Docket Entry No. 52). Plaintiffs also state that construing the Complaint to allege price inflation "is a distortion of the allegations" because the Complaint "does not allege that Plaintiffs' damages are based on inflated costs to merchant which the merchants passed on the Plaintiffs by charging higher prices for goods and services." (Id. at 14.)

A. Standard applicable to determining antitrust standing for a Cartwright Act claim

The Cartwright Act grants a private right of action to "[a]ny person who is injured in his or her business or property by reason of anything forbidden or declared unlawful by this chapter." Calif. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16750(a). The Clayton Act uses similar language, entitling "[a]ny person who [is] injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws" to receive treble damages for those injuries. 15 U.S.C. § 15; see also Gatt Commc'ns, Inc. v. PMC Assocs., L.L.C., 711 F.3d 68, 75 (2d Cir. 2013). The Supreme Court has explained that the federal statutory language is limited because "Congress did not intend the antitrust laws to provide a remedy in damages [26] for all injuries that might conceivably be traced to an antitrust violation." Gatt Commc'ns, 711 F.3d at 75 (quoting AGC, 459 U.S. at 534); see also Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 987-92 ("The Supreme Court has held that Congress did not intend to afford a remedy to everyone injured by an antitrust violation simply on a showing of causation. The plaintiff must [*256] have 'antitrust standing.'" (citing AGC, 459 U.S. at 534-35)). Courts consider the following factors, identified in AGC, in order to determine whether a federal plaintiff has antitrust standing:

> [W]hether the plaintiff's alleged injury is of the type that the antitrust statute was intended to forestall; . . . the directness or indirectness of the asserted injury; . . . the extent to which the plaintiff's asserted damages are speculative; . . . the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages; . . . and the existence of more direct victims of the alleged conspiracy . . . .

Gatt Commc'ns, 711 F.3d at 76 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted) (quoting AGC, 459 U.S. at 535, 542, 545); see also Port Dock & Stone Corp. v. Oldcastle Ne., Inc., 507 F.3d 117, 121-22 (2d Cir. 2007). The Second Circuit has "distilled these factors into two imperatives": that an antitrust plaintiff allege (1) that "it suffered a special kind of 'antitrust injury,'" and (2) that "it is a suitable plaintiff to pursue the alleged antitrust violations and thus is an 'efficient enforcer' [27] of the antitrust laws." Gatt Commc'ns, 711 F.3d at 76 (citations omitted).

Consistent with standing more generally, "antitrust standing is a threshold, pleading-stage inquiry and when a complaint by its terms fails to establish this requirement," the claim must be dismissed as a matter of law. Id. at 75 (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting NicSand, Inc. v. 3M Co., 507 F.3d 442, 450 (6th Cir. 2007) (en banc)); see also Port Dock, 507 F.3d at 121, 126-27 (dismissing Clayton Act Section 4 claim for lack of antitrust standing); Paycom Billing Servs., Inc. v. MasterCard Int'l, Inc., 467 F.3d 283, 290-95 (2d Cir. 2006) (evaluating the suitability of an antitrust plaintiff by "efficient enforcer" factors, the second through fifth factors articulated in AGC). The importance assigned to these factors "will necessarily vary with the circumstances of particular cases." Daniel, 428 F.3d at 443.

Where a plaintiff asserts a state law antitrust claim, the "threshold question presented" is whether the AGC factors also apply to establish the antitrust injury. In re Flash Memory Antitrust Litig., 643 F. Supp. 2d 1133, 1151 (N.D. Cal. 2009). In the absence of a clear rule provided by state law, federal courts analyzing "unsettled areas of state law" must "carefully predict how the state's highest court would resolve the uncertainties," so as to avoid "distort[ing] established state law." Runner v. N.Y. Stock Exch., Inc., 568 F.3d 383, 386 (2d Cir. 2009) (quoting Travelers Ins. Co. v. Carpenter, 411 F.3d 323, 329 (2d Cir. 2005)); *see also Empire City Capital Corp. v. Citibank, N.A., No. 10-CV-2601, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110543, 2011 WL 4484453, at 2 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2011) (explaining that the court "construe[s] and appl[ies] state law as it believes the state's highest court would" (quoting Liddle & Robinson, LLP v. Garrett, 720 F. Supp. 2d 417, 424 (S.D.N.Y. 2010)).

In [28] predicting how a state's highest court would resolve the issue, courts must "give the fullest weight to pronouncements of the state's highest court . . . while giving proper regard to relevant rulings of the state's lower courts." Runner, 568 F.3d at 386 (quoting Carpenter, 411 F.3d at 329); see also Reddington v. Indus., Inc., 460 F.3d 201, 210 (2d Cir. 2006) ("[T]he judgment of an intermediate appellate state court 'is a datum for ascertaining state law which is not to be disregarded by a federal court unless it is convinced by other persuasive data that the highest court of the state would decide otherwise.'" (quoting Comm'r v. Estate of Bosch, 387 U.S. 456, 465, 87 S. Ct. 1776, 18 L. Ed. 2d 886 (1967))); Ryman v. Sears, Roebuck and Co., 505 F.3d 993, 994 (9th Cir. 2007) (If "there is relevant precedent from the state's intermediate appellate court, the federal court must follow the state intermediate appellate court decision unless the federal court finds convincing evidence that the state's supreme court likely would not follow it."). While decisions of federal courts construing state law may also be considered, "no deference" is owed to a "district court's interpretation" of state law. Reddington, 511 F.3d at 133.

California's highest court [29] has not directly addressed whether the AGC factors should be applied to determine whether a plaintiff has alleged antitrust injury under California law. In re Flash Memory, 643 F. Supp. 2d at 1151-52. The California Supreme Court has recently stated that "'[i]nterpretations of federal antitrust law are at most instructive, not conclusive, when construing the Cartwright Act, given that the Cartwright Act was modeled not on federal antitrust statutes but instead on statutes enacted by California's sister states around the turn of the 20th century.'"[7] Aryeh v. Canon Bus. Solutions, Inc., 55 Cal. 4th 1185, 1195, 151 Cal. Rptr. 3d 827, 292 P.3d 871 (2013); see also In re Cipro Cases I & II, 61 Cal. 4th 116, 142, 187 Cal. Rptr. 3d 632, 348 P.3d 845 (2015).

At least one California intermediate appellate court has applied the AGC factors to a state antitrust claim. Vinci v. Waste Mgmt., Inc., 36 Cal. App. 4th 1811, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 337, 338-39 (Ct. App. 1995). This decision is due particular weight. See Schoenefeld v. New York, 748 F.3d 464, 469 (2d Cir.) (explaining that "the absence of authority from New York's highest court does not provide us license to disregard lower court rulings nor to analyze the question as though we were presented with a blank [31] slate"), certified question accepted, 23 N.Y.3d 941, 987 N.Y.S.2d 593, 10 N.E.3d 1148 (2014) and certified question answered, 25 N.Y.3d 22, 6 N.Y.S.3d 221, 29 N.E.3d 230 (2015); *Statharos v. (internal quotation marks and citation omitted)). In Vinci, a California intermediate appellate court observed that "the Cartwright Act has objectives identical to the federal antitrust acts," and noted that, in the past, California courts construing the [7] Plaintiffs argue, for the first time in seeking reconsideration, that the application of the AGC factors to claims under the Cartwright Act is precluded by the California Supreme Court's decision in Clayworth. (Pl. Opp'n to Defs. Cross Mot. for Reconsideration ("Pls. Cross Mot. Opp'n"), 3-4, Docket Entry No. 104.) Plaintiffs argue that in Clayworth, the California Supreme Court "departed" from AGC's "principles in interpreting the Cartwright Act." (Id. at 3.) Because Plaintiffs did not rely on this authority in their initial motion, they cannot do so on reconsideration. Lichtenberg, 28 F. App'x at 75 (explaining that a Court on reconsideration considers only overlooked decisions "that were put before the Court on the underlying [30] motion"). In any event, the issue addressed by the California Supreme Court in Clayworth is not before this Court. The issue in Clayworth involved the assertion of the so-called "pass-through defense" by alleged antitrust conspirators, who asserted that claims brought by manufacturers were barred because the manufacturers conceded that they had passed the cost of the direct antitrust injury on to their customers. Clayworth, 49 Cal. 4th at 774. In deciding the case, the California Supreme Court did not address antitrust standing or the sufficiency of an antitrust injury under the Cartwright Act. Id. (noting that AGC and Vinci, as cases that dealt with antitrust causation, have "nothing to say on the general topic that concerns us: when (as here) causation has been properly alleged, how are antitrust damages to be measured?" (first citing AGC, 459 U.S. at 535; and then citing Vinci, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 338)).

Cartwright Act have looked to cases construing federal antitrust laws for guidance. Vinci, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 338 n.1.

It is also instructive that the Ninth Circuit, although without explanation, has applied the AGC factors to an antitrust claim brought under the Cartwright Act. Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 987 (holding, after applying the AGC factors, that "all elements of antitrust standing are satisfied on the face of the present complaint"). However, despite applying the AGC factors, the Ninth Circuit has noted that, "California law grants antitrust standing more liberally than does federal law." Theme Promotions, Inc. v. News Am. FSI, 35 F. App'x 463, 466-67 (9th Cir. 2002) (citing Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 987) (reversing the dismissal of federal antitrust claims for failure to allege injury to competition and thus "also [32] revers[ing] the dismissal of the broader, more liberal state antitrust claims"); see also In re ATM Fee Antitrust Litig., 686 F.3d 741 (9th Cir. 2012). In Knevelbaard, the Ninth Circuit applied the "directness of the injury" AGC factor and explained that the "extent to which antitrust injury is recognized under the Cartwright Act is enlarged, by statute, in comparison to federal law." Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 991 (As a result of the Illinois Brock repealer statute, "the more restrictive definition of 'antitrust injury' under federal law does not apply" to the Cartwright Act. (quoting Cellular Plus, Inc. v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 4th 1224, 18 Cal. Rptr. 2d 308 (Cal. Ct. App. 1993))).

District courts presented with the issue of whether to apply the AGC factors in a Cartwright Act case have reached differing conclusions. See In re Dairy Farmers of Am., Inc. Cheese Antitrust Litig., No. 9-CV-3690, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84152, 2015 WL 3988488, at *8 (N.D. Ill. June 29, 2015) (applying the AGC factors to antitrust claims brought under the Cartwright Act); In re Flash Memory, 643 F. Supp. 2d at 1151-52 (finding the AGC factors to be applicable to an analysis of antitrust standing for a Cartwright Act claim); In re TFT—LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., 586 F. Supp. 2d 1109, 1120-24 (N.D. Cal. 2008) (stating that a clear directive from state legislature or high court was necessary to apply the AGC factors, but nevertheless finding that plaintiffs had standing by considering factors); In re Graphics Processing Units Antitrust Litig., 540 F. Supp. 2d 1085, 1097 (N.D. Cal. 2007) (declining to apply AGC because, while "some [state] appellate courts have used the AGC test," that [33] "is not the same as showing that AGC has been adopted").

Giving the "fullest weight to pronouncements of the state's highest court," Runner, 568 F.3d at 386, and mindful that the California Supreme Court has not addressed whether the AGC factors may be applied to a Cartwright Act claim and has recently reiterated that federal law provides only guidance for state antitrust law, Aryeh, 55 Cal. 4th at 1195, and because there is no California law contrary to the state appellate court's application of the AGC factors in Vinci, the Court applies the AGC factors to Plaintiffs' claim. The decision of both an intermediary court and the Ninth Circuit remain the best predictor of the state's highest court's action on the issue, and the Court is not "convinced" to "disregard" this data by any other indication that "the highest court of the state would decide otherwise." Nat'l Serv. Indus., Inc., 460 F.3d at 210; see also In re Dairy Farmers, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84152, 2015 WL 3988488, at *8 (applying [*259] AGC factors "mindful that . . . California's antitrust-standing provision is broader in some respects than federal antitrust-standing law because of California's repealer statute"); but see Los Gatos Mercantile, Inc. v. E.I. Dupont De Nemours & Co., No. 13-CV-01180, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106292, 2015 WL 4755335, at *19 n.11 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 11, 2015) (concluding that the California Supreme Court "would not find rationale set forth in Vinci persuasive and would not apply AGC" given "repeated instruction that federal [34] antitrust law does not control interpretation of the Cartwright Act"); In re Capacitors Antitrust Litig., 106 F. Supp. 3d 1051, 2015 WL 3398199, at *13 (N.D. Cal. 2015) ("The application of AGC to California state antitrust claims has recently become murky, and that murkiness persuades the Court AGC should not be applied.").

The Court finds that it is appropriate to apply the AGC factors in order to determine whether Plaintiffs have antitrust standing to assert their Cartwright Act claim and that the factors are "instructive, not conclusive." See Aryeh, 55 Cal. 4th at 1195. Consistent with the Ninth Circuit's approach in Knevelbaard, this Court will apply the AGC factors "liberally," and in concert with the broader antitrust standing requirements under California law, particularly with respect to the application of AGC's second factor, the directness of the injury. See Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 985, 989 ("[F]ederal antitrust precedents are properly included in a Cartwright Act analysis, but their role is limited: they are 'often helpful' but not necessarily decisive." (quoting State of Cal. ex rel. Van de Kamp v. Texaco, Inc., 46 Cal. 3d 1147, 252 Cal. Rptr. 221, 762 P.2d 385, 395 (1988))).

B. Plaintiffs lack antitrust standing under the Cartwright Act as direct purchasers

The Court now applies the AGC factors to determine whether Plaintiffs have antitrust standing to assert a claim pursuant to the Cartwright Act. The factors for determining "whether a plaintiff [35] who has borne an injury has antitrust standing" are: "(1) the nature of the plaintiff's alleged injury, (2) the directness of the injury, (3) the speculative nature of the harm, (4) the risk of duplicative recovery and (5) the complexity in apportioning damages." *Abbouds' McDonald's LLC v. McDonald's Corp., No. 05-CV-36032, 2006 U.S. App. LEXIS 17187, 2006 WL 1877247, at 1 (9th Cir. July 7, 2006) (citing AGC, 459 U.S. at 535-37); see also Vinci, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 339 ("The factors identified by the court which favor a finding that the plaintiff is a proper party include the following: (1) the existence of an antitrust violation with resulting harm to the plaintiff; (2) an injury of a type which the antitrust laws were designed to redress; (3) a direct causal connection between the asserted injury and the alleged restraint of trade; (4) the absence of more direct victims so that the denial of standing would leave a significant antitrust violation unremedied; and (5) the lack of a potential for double recovery.").

(1) The nature of Plaintiffs' injury

The first AGC factor considers whether the nature of the injury asserted by a plaintiff is "the type the antitrust laws were intended to forestall." Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 987 (quoting Am. Ad Mgmt., Inc. v. Gen. Tel. Co., 190 F.3d 1051, 1055 (9th Cir. 1999)). The Ninth Circuit has "identif[ied] four requirements that must be met in order to conclude that there is antitrust injury: (1) unlawful conduct, (2) causing an injury to the [36] plaintiff, (3) that flows from that which makes the conduct unlawful, and (4) that is of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent." Id. (quoting Am. Ad Mgmt., 190 F.3d at 1055). "The requirement that the alleged injury be related to anti-competitive behavior requires, as a corollary, that the [*260] injured party be a participant in the same market as the alleged malefactors." In re Flash Memory, 643 F. Supp. 2d at 1153 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted) (quoting Bhan v. NME Hospitals, Inc., 772 F.2d 1467, 1470 (9th Cir. 1985)); see also AGC, 459 U.S. at 539 (dismissing claim asserted where plaintiff "was neither a consumer nor a competitor in the market in which trade was restrained"); Vinci, 36 Cal. App. 4th at 1816 (dismissing for lack of antitrust standing because "plaintiff was neither a consumer nor a competitor in the market in which trade was restrained"); Tanaka v. Univ. of Southern Cal., 252 F.3d 1059, 1063 (9th Cir. 2001) (explaining that the anticompetitive effects must be felt in the "relevant market"); In re Dynamic Random Access Memory (Dram) Antitrust Litig., 516 F. Supp. 2d 1072, 1090 (N.D. Cal. 2007) (dismissing antitrust claims asserted by plaintiffs who were "participants in separate, albeit related, markets").

Here, Plaintiffs allege that cardholders were injured by the "payment of inflated [i]nterchange [f]ees by payment cardholders to their [i]ssuer banks" and that cardholders pay interchange fees directly in the Payment Card Market "because the cardholder is the first and only person who pays anything." (Pls. MTD Opp'n 5.) [37] Plaintiffs assert that "by extracting the price-fixed 'interchange fee' directly from the cardholder's account . . . and keeping it, the [i]ssuer bank inflicts injury and damage on the cardholder . . . within the [i]ssuer-cardholder market." (Pls. MTD Opp'n 7 (citing Compl. ¶¶ 49, 81).)

Defendants' central argument is that Plaintiffs "are not consumers, competitors, or participants in the allegedly restrained market," and that any unlawful conduct by Defendants was not directed at Plaintiffs. (Defs. MTD 7 (citing Eagle v. Star-Kist Foods, Inc., 812 F.2d 538, 539-43 (9th Cir. 1987) (affirming a district court determination that plaintiffs failed to satisfy the first AGC factor because they were "neither consumers nor competitors in the relevant market" and "because the alleged anticompetitive conduct was directed" at a party other than the plaintiffs)).) In Eagle, fishing boat employees and their union sued their employer for its allegedly anticompetitive behavior in the market to buy and sell fish, arguing that the employer's conspiracy to set artificially low prices for tuna reduced their wages and, ultimately, the dues paid to their union. Eagle, 812 F.2d at 539. The Ninth Circuit held that the crewmembers lacked standing because, as non-parties to their employer's agreements to sell [38] the fish, they were not participants in the relevant market as either consumers or competitors and the employer's conduct was "directed at the vessel owners, not the crewmembers or the union." Id. at 541.

According to Defendants, Plaintiffs "blur the definition of the relevant market" to obscure the distinction between the Payment Card Market, in which cardholders participate, and the Card Network Services Market, in which the interchange fee is paid between financial institutions. (Id. at 8 (citing Compl. ¶ 94 (alleging that "Visa and MasterCard general purpose Credit cards and Debit cards and Visa and MasterCard credit card network services and Debit card network services are the relevant markets")).) Defendants argue that Plaintiffs fail to allege any participation by cardholders in the Card Network Services Market or any anticompetitive conduct in the Payment Card Market and thus, like the fishing boat employees in Eagle, there was no anticompetitive conduct directed at Plaintiffs. (Id.)

In attempting to characterize the allegedly anticompetitive conduct of the issuing banks as being directed at cardholders, [*261] Plaintiffs emphasize that cardholders are in privity with issuing banks in the Payment Card [39] Market. For example, Plaintiffs argue that Defendants' reliance on Eagle is misplaced and the facts are distinguishable because, "unlike cardholders" who do have a contractual relationship with the issuing banks, the fishing boat employees were "not parties to their employer's . . . agreement" to sell fish. (Pls. MTD Opp'n 8 (citing Eagle, 812 F.2d at 539).) In Eagle, the fishing boat employees had a contractual relationship with their employer in a separate and distinct market for the fishing services provided by the fishing boat employees, but were nevertheless not parties to the agreement relevant to the anticompetitive behavior. Eagle, 812 F.2d at 539. The same is true here. Plaintiffs allege in the Complaint that cardholders "participate in the . . . card market in that they are issued payment cards" rather than in the Card Network Services Market, which facilitates the purchases of goods and services when cardholders use their payment cards to obtain goods and services from merchants. (Compl. ¶ 81.) Although cardholders and issuing banks transact in the Payment Card Market, that is insufficient to overcome the fact that the allegedly anticompetitive interchange fee is set and paid between financial institutions in the [40] Card Network Services Market, not between issuing banks and cardholders in the Payment Card Market.

Plaintiffs also argue that the Ninth Circuit's decision in Knevelbaard, where the court found sufficient antitrust injuries despite conduct by the defendants across multiple relevant markets, supports a finding of sufficient injuries here. (Pls. MTD Opp'n 9 (citing Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 987).) Plaintiffs' reliance on Knevelbaard is misplaced. In Knevelbaard, the milk-seller plaintiffs asserted a claim against milk-buyer defendants, who the plaintiffs alleged had rigged the price of bulk cheese with the direct effect of creating "artificially depressed milk prices." Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 987-88. The Ninth Circuit concluded that the defendants' actions in the market for bulk cheese caused economic loss to the plaintiffs in the related market for milk, in which the defendants both participated and sought to fix prices. Id. at 989 ("[T]he complaint's allegations unmistakably place all parties in the milk market — the defendants as buyers and the plaintiffs as sellers — and even have them transacting business with each other."). Unlike the milk seller plaintiffs in Knevelbaard, Plaintiffs have not alleged that issuing banks directed anticompetitive fees at [41] cardholders in the Payment Card Market or that cardholders suffered any resulting economic harm when issuing banks "kept" the interchange fee charged within the Card Network Services Market. Although conduct across multiple markets may result in an antitrust injury, Plaintiffs have not alleged such injury.

Plaintiffs further argue that cardholders suffer an injury analogous to those experienced by purchasers at the low end of a distribution chain. (Pls. MTD Opp'n 9-10.) Plaintiffs argue that the Payment Card Market and the Card Network Services Market are "inextricably linked" because "without the card with its card number, the network is inoperable." (Id. at 8.) Plaintiffs contend that, because no transaction could take place without cardholders and their accounts, the interchange fees are sufficiently "traceable" to cardholders to provide antitrust standing, similar to damages that are passed along a distribution chain. (Id. at 8-9.) Plaintiffs argue repeatedly that the similarity between their injury and that of secondary purchasers renders the damages to cardholders traceable. (Id. at 9 (first citing In re Cathode Ray Tube (CRT) Antitrust Litig., 738 F. Supp. 2d 1011, 1024 (N.D. Cal. 2010) (finding an alleged overcharge for cathode ray tubes significantly intertwined and traceable [*262] through market [42] for televisions and computer monitors that contain cathode ray tubes); then citing In re Flash Memory, 643 F. Supp. 2d at 1150-56 (finding antitrust injury across markets for NAND flash memory and finished products containing NAND flash memory); then citing In re TFT-LCD, 586 F. Supp. 2d at 1123-24 (identifying traceable antitrust injury across market for TFT-LCD panels and market for finished products containing TFT-LCD panels); and then citing In re Graphics Processing Units, 540 F. Supp. 2d at 1098-99 (finding an antitrust injury traceable from a market for GPUs through a market for computers that contain GPUs)).) Defendants contend that the "inextricably linked" exception to participating in the relevant market is a narrow one, and requires a plaintiff to suffer a direct injury. (Defs. MTD Reply 3.) Defendants argue that Plaintiffs have not alleged any injury, including one traceable to a secondary market. (Id.)

Plaintiffs have expressly alleged in the Complaint that cardholders are directly injured when interchange fees are assessed from the funds extracted from cardholders' accounts, and have disclaimed the allegation that the cost of supracompetitive interchange fees are passed onto cardholders through merchants. (Compl. ¶¶ 49, 81; see also Pls. MTD Opp'n 13-14; MTD Reply 5 (arguing that "plaintiffs expressly disavow reliance [43] on an overcharge pass-through theory, or a claim that the prices they paid for goods and services were inflated at all").) As such, the cases Plaintiffs rely on to argue that their harm is traceable or similar to damages passed through a distribution change are inapposite.

With respect to demonstrating the presence of "unlawful conduct causing an injury to the plaintiff," Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 987, because Plaintiffs are "neither consumer[s] nor competitor[s] in the market in which trade was restrained," anticompetitive behavior by issuing banks within the Card Network Services Market was not directed at Plaintiffs, AGC, 459 U.S. at 539. Rather, cardholders are "consumer[s] of goods sold by merchants who happen to be part of the affected market." Nass-Romero v. Visa U.S.A. Inc., 2012- NMCA 058, 279 P.3d 772, 778 (N.M. Ct. App. 2012) (affirming dismissal of federal antitrust claims asserted by cardholders against Visa entities for lack of standing, including because cardholders are not in the restrained market)). Plaintiffs have failed to plead that anticompetitive behavior by Defendants, the issuing banks, was directed at cardholders or caused an economic injury to cardholders, and thus, have failed to allege an antitrust injury that satisfies the first AGC factor. The failure to satisfy this factor is grounds to dismiss Plaintiffs' claim. See, e.g., [44] *Crouch v. Crompton Corp., No. 02-CV-4375, 2004 NCBC LEXIS 6, 2004 WL 2414027, at 26 (N.C. Super. Ct. Oct. 26, 2004) ("This factor alone would strongly support a finding of no standing . . . ."). The Court nevertheless addresses the additional factors.

(2) The directness of Plaintiffs' injury

To assess the directness of a plaintiff's injury, pursuant to the second AGC factor, the court "look[s] to the chain of causation between [plaintiff's] injury and the alleged restraint in the market." Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 989 (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Am. Ad Mgmt., 190 F.3d at 1058). In AGC, the Supreme Court identified "two separate considerations" within the directness inquiry: "(1) the chain of causation alleged by the plaintiffs; and (2) the existence of an identifiable class of persons whose self-interest would normally motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement." *In re Dairy Farmers of Am., Inc. Cheese Antitrust Litig., No. 09-CR-3690, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119962, 2013 WL 4506000, at 12 [*263] (N.D. Ill. Aug. 23, 2013) (citing AGC, 459 U.S. at 540-42); see also *In re Refrigerant Compressors Antitrust Litig., 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50737, 2013 WL 1431756, at 14-15 (E.D. Mich. Apr. 9, 2013) (explaining that the "causal nexus between the alleged conspiracy" and the alleged injury cannot be "too remote and attenuated" for it to provide antitrust standing"). However, as explained above, "[t]he extent to which antitrust injury is recognized under the Cartwright Act is enlarged, by statute, in comparison to federal law" because an action "may be brought by any person who is injured in his or her business or property by reason of anything [45] forbidden or declared unlawful by this chapter, regardless of whether such injured person dealt directly or indirectly with the defendant." Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 991 (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Calif. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16750(a)).

The parties' arguments with respect to the directness of the injury to Plaintiffs are the same as their arguments about the nature of the injury to Plaintiffs. Defendants contend that "any impact on Plaintiffs" through final consumer prices "would be at most derivative" of the effect on the Card Network Services Market. (Defs. MTD 9.) Plaintiffs assert that Defendants have misconstrued their allegations, and that the payment of the interchange fee from funds withdrawn from cardholders' accounts renders a direct injury to Plaintiffs. (Pls. MTD Opp'n 11.) Plaintiffs argue that the injury is directly incurred from issuing bank to cardholder, rather than passed along through the merchant and the cost of the good or service purchased by the cardholder. (Id.) Plaintiffs also reiterate their argument that their injuries are traceable and, thus, "adequate to show that there is a chain of causation between . . . allegedly anticompetitive conduct" and the injury to cardholders. (Id. (quoting In re Flash Memory, 643 F. Supp. 2d at 1155).)

When considering [46] the application of the directness factor to a Cartwright Act claim, the Court is aware that California law allows recovery for antitrust injuries that result from a more attenuated and indirect causal chain than is permitted under federal law. See Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 989 (explaining the development of the Cartwright Act in response to Illinois Brick); In re Dairy Farmers, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84152, 2015 WL 3988488, at *8 (explaining that "California's antitrust-standing provision is broader in some respects than federal antitrust-standing law because of California's repealer statute"). Plaintiffs' allegations are deficient, not because they fail to assert a direct injury, but because they fail to plead that the cardholders suffered any plausible economic injury. Although Plaintiffs argue that the interchange fee is paid from "the cardholder's account first before paying the balance to the acquirer bank and the merchant," their allegations also acknowledge that the amount withdrawn from a cardholder's account is due, in its entirety, to a merchant for goods or services, and thus there is no increased cost to cardholders from the interchange fee. (Pls. MTD Sur-Reply 2.) Plaintiffs concede that the amount withdrawn from the cardholder's account is the price to purchase the goods, [47] rather than the price of the goods combined with a surcharge for any interchange fee. (Pls. MTD Opp'n 11.) The Court finds that Plaintiffs cannot satisfy the second AGC factor because, as explained above, the allegedly anticompetitive conduct of the issuing banks was not directed at cardholders and has not resulted in an injury for the Court to assess for its directness.

(3) Speculative nature of the harm, the risk of duplicative recovery, and the complexity in apportioning damages

The Court considers the final three AGC factors together, as they reflect overlapping concerns. Under the third factor, [*264] courts consider whether a plaintiff's damages are only speculative, in that "(1) the alleged injury was indirect; and (2) 'the alleged effects . . . may have been produced by independent factors.'" Am. Ad Mgmt., 190 F.3d at 1059 (quoting AGC, 459 U.S. at 542); see also Knevelbaard, 232 F.3d at 991 (Where "the alleged effects on the [plaintiff] may have been produced by independent factors, the [plaintiff's] damages claim" may also be "highly speculative."); Eagle, 812 F.2d at 542 (citing these considerations). As to the fourth factor, "[t]he risk to be avoided . . . is that potential plaintiffs may be in a 'position to assert conflicting claims to a common fund . . . thereby creating the danger [48] of multiple liability.'" Am. Ad Mgmt., 190 F.3d at 1059 (quoting AGC, 459 U.S. at 544); see also Eagle, 812 F.2d at 542. Finally, the court considers whether, "if the plaintiff is allowed standing, any attempt to ascertain damages would lead to 'long and complicated proceedings involving massive evidence and complicated theories.'" Eagle, 812 F.2d at 543 (quoting AGC, 459 U.S. at 544).

Plaintiffs argue that merchants asserting claims arising from the same allegedly anticompetitive interchange fees "are not better positioned to assert injury to card holders as they are not direct payers" of the interchange fee, and thus the recovery to Plaintiffs is neither speculative nor complex to apportion. (Pls. MTD Opp'n 12.) Plaintiffs also argue that the injury is concrete and simple, and rely on their assertion that cardholders' injury need not be traced through inflated costs passed on by merchants. (Id. at 12-13.) Similarly, Plaintiffs state that because damages are "traceable by cardholder account number, there is no risk of duplicative recovery." (Id. at 13.) Defendants counter that other parties "are better positioned to bring these claims" and have an adequate economic motivation to do so, including both merchants and the acquiring banks who pay the interchange fees in the Card Network Services Market. (Defs. MTD 10.) [49]

Assuming that there is harm to Plaintiffs caused by the interchange fees and also that it would be feasible to determine the amount of such harm, there remains a large and predictable risk of duplicative recovery against the issuing banks as well as the need for "long and complicated proceedings" to determine the damages due to cardholders and merchants. Eagle, 812 F.2d at 543. Plaintiffs do not address the certified class of merchants before the Court who have asserted essentially identical claims to Plaintiffs, and the fact that duplicative recovery — and thus the need to apportion damages — is not merely hypothetical. Thus, assuming an injury to cardholders, Plaintiffs have not shown that their claims can be litigated without expensive and duplicative efforts.

The Court finds that Plaintiffs have failed to assert a direct antitrust injury that confers standing to bring a claim under the Cartwright Act because Plaintiffs are not in the relevant market of the alleged antitrust conduct and because allowing such a claim would inevitably result in duplicative and expensive litigation.

2. Standing to recover as indirect purchasers

On reconsideration, Plaintiffs for the first time argue that the Court may decline [50] to dismiss their state law claim on an alternative ground that cardholders are indirect purchasers. (Pls. Cross Mot. Opp'n 1-2.) In response, Defendants argue that "it is neither in dispute nor relevant" that California has "no per se bar against actions by indirect purchasers" because Plaintiffs have "never alleged that they were indirect purchasers" but rather have only alleged that cardholders are the direct payors of interchange fees. (Defs. [*265] Cross Mot. for Reconsideration Reply 2, Docket Entry No. 106.) Defendants also argue that Plaintiffs are not permitted to "amend [the] complaint through statements made in moving papers." (Id. at 3 (quoting *Hernandez v. City of New York, No. 11-CV-3521, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31793, 2013 WL 593450, at 4 n.5 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 13, 2013)).)

Arguments "raised for the first time in [a] motion for reconsideration" are "not properly presented to the district court" and, absent a reason to excuse the untimeliness, are waived by the party. Phillips v. City of New York, 775 F.3d 538, 544 (2d Cir.), cert. denied sub nom., Phillips v. City of New York, N.Y., 136 S. Ct. 104, 193 L. Ed. 2d 37 (2015) (finding that a party had waived arguments based on documents obtained in discovery and asserted for the first time in a motion for reconsideration); see also Harris v. Millington, 613 F. App'x 56, 57 (2d Cir. 2015) ("We do not generally consider claims that were raised for the first time in a motion for reconsideration."); Sompo Japan Ins. Co. of Am. v. Norfolk S. Ry. Co., 762 F.3d 165, 188 (2d Cir. 2014) (declining to consider arguments raised without excuse [51] for the first time on a motion to reconsider); Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors of Color Tile, Inc. v. Coopers & Lybrand, LLP, 322 F.3d 147, 159 (2d Cir. 2003) (explaining that the appeals court retains discretion to consider "issues not timely raised below," including those raised for the first time on reconsideration, particularly in instances where "(1) consideration of the issue is necessary to avoid manifest injustice or (2) the issue is purely legal and there is no need for additional factfinding"); Goldberg v. UBS AG, 690 F. Supp. 2d 92, 98 (E.D.N.Y. 2010) ("[B]y failing to timely raise such an argument during the briefing of its motion to dismiss, defendant waived its right to seek reconsideration of this point.").

In opposing Defendants' original motion to dismiss, Plaintiffs argued that cardholders satisfy the requirements for standing as direct purchasers. Plaintiffs stated that they "sue herein for direct payment by them to their issuer banks" of the allegedly supra-competitive price-fixed interchange fees. (Pls. MTD Opp'n 14.) Plaintiffs' only mention of indirect purchasers prior to their motion for reconsideration was in a passing reference to the fact that the Cartwright Act "contains an Illinois Brick repealer for indirect purchasers," not in connection with an argument by Plaintiffs that cardholders sought to recover as indirect purchases. [52] (Id. at 5.) Plaintiffs now direct the Court's attention to cases concluding that the Cartwright Act is a so-called "Repealer Act," which, unlike federal antitrust statutes, provides standing to indirect purchasers to assert claims for antitrust injury. (Pls. June 22, 2015 Ltr 1, Docket Entry No. 109 (citing *In re Capacitors, 106 F. Supp. 3d 1051, 2015 WL 3398199, at 13)).) These arguments are untimely and "not properly presented" to the Court, as they were not made prior to the motion for reconsideration. Phillips, 775 F.3d at 544. Plaintiffs have not presented any compelling excuse for the untimeliness of this argument, and the Court therefore declines to consider whether cardholders could have standing to assert antitrust claims as indirect purchasers.

III. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the Court denies Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration. The Court grants Defendants' cross-motion for reconsideration, and, on reconsideration, dismisses Plaintiffs' claim under the Cartwright Act.

The Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.S. § 187, extends a private right of action to those injured in business or property by reason of certain unlawful union practices proscribed by the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA). As explained in ASE I, § 8(b)(4)(ii) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C.S. § 158(b)(4)(ii)(A) and (B), makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to threaten, coerce, or restrain an employer with an object of forcing the employer to enter into an agreement prohibited by § 8(e) of the NLRA, or to cease doing business with another party. An illegal § 8(e) agreement is, in turn, defined in part as an agreement by an employer to cease doing business with any other person. 29 U.S.C.S. § 158(e). In other words, a union may incur liability under (B) of § 8(b)(4)(ii) if it coerces an employer to cease doing business with another party or under (A) of § 8(b)(4)(ii) if it coerces an employer to enter into an agreement to cease doing business with another party. Such an agreement can be express or implied and it need not be of a generalized exclusionary nature to fall afoul of § 8(e); rather, the use of coercive measures by a union to pressure a single neutral employer into a single agreement to cease doing business with a single non-union employer, or the application of such measures on a project-by-project basis" is sufficient to find liability.

A neutral employer's mere decision to acquiesce to a union's unlawful coercion and cut ties with the nonunion party is not, standing alone, sufficient to imply the existence of a § 8(e), 29 U.S.C.S. § 158(e), agreement and incur liability under subparagraph A. Such an interpretation would allow subparagraph B to swallow subparagraph A whole.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN8[] Sherman Act, Scope

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., protects against unlawful impairments to competition, not to individual competitors. If a party drives down the cost of its products in the hopes of pummeling a less-efficient competitor into submission, a court does not permit the competitor to reach for relief through an antitrust claim. Doing so would thwart the very purposes of the antitrust laws: encouraging efficiency, lowering costs, and increasing output. As such, claims under the Sherman Act require care because overly interventionist enforcement could backfire and dampen the competitive spirit that the laws were intended to foster and protect.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Monopolization Offenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN9[] Scope, Monopolization Offenses

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, prohibits unreasonable restraints of trade or commerce through contracts, combinations, or conspiracies; it thus applies only to concerted action that unreasonably restrains trade. 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 forbids monopolization, attempted monopolization, and conspiracies to monopolize any part of trade or commerce. The latter covers both concerted and independent action which monopolizes or threatens actual monopolization, a category that is narrower than restraint of trade. In evaluating such claims under the Sherman Act, one of the first considerations a court faces is determining the appropriate framework for its review: per se, quick look, or rule of reason. Admittedly, this decision requires putting the cart before the horse to some extent, since the court must engage with the functional and factual contents of the claim in order to decide how it will proceed to evaluate that claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Sherman Act

HN10[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

Under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, certain kinds of agreements will so often prove so harmful to competition and so rarely prove justified that the antitrust laws do not require proof that an agreement of that kind is, in fact, anticompetitive in the particular circumstances. An agreement of such a kind is unlawful per se. When faced with an agreement of that rare species, such as a horizontal price-fixing or a market-division agreement, the plaintiffs can demonstrate § 1 liability without need for proof of power, intent or impact. Only those restraints that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output, or those with manifestly anticompetitive effects and that lack any redeeming virtue, may be deemed per se illegal.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Sherman Act

HN11[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

If the agreement in question does not quite fit the bill of per se liability, but nonetheless would seem to have an anticompetitive effect on customers and markets to an observer with even a mere rudimentary understanding of economics, the district court might opt to take a quick look at preliminary evidence. Under that purgatorial standard, the agreement is not subject to immediate per se condemnation and may yet ascend to a full rule-of-reason review. Quick-look analysis in effect shifts to a defendant the burden to show empirical evidence of procompetitive effects. Such a preliminary evaluation may be appropriate where the agreement seems anticompetitive at first glance, but the competitive justification offered by the defendant appears plausible or the agreement arises in a unique or unfamiliar context.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > Sherman Act

HN12[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

The vast majority of agreements, however, need only be found to constitute a reasonable restraint of trade after a rule of reason analysis to avoid Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, liability. As the United States Supreme Court has made clear, the Sherman Act's prohibition of every agreement in restraint of trade, prohibits only agreements that unreasonably restrain trade. Because all agreements restrain trade in some respect, § 1 only prohibits those classes of contracts or acts which the common law had deemed to be undue restraints of trade and those which new times and economic conditions would make unreasonable.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Sherman Act

HN13[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

The rule of reason analysis typically requires a plaintiff to show that the defendants' actions enhanced market power, for example, the power to raise prices or exclude competition, which in turn requires some economic analysis of the relevant market. That demanding calculus compels an antitrust plaintiff to show, inter alia, that the alleged agreement involved the exercise of power in a relevant economic market, and that the exercise had anti-competitive consequences. For exclusive dealing arrangements, foreclosure levels are unlikely to be of concern where they are less than 30 or 40 percent low numbers make dismissal easy.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Violations

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN14[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Per Se Violations

In order to evaluate whether an agreement truly deserves the fatal per se label, or instead merits a more nuanced quick-look or rule-of-reason review, courts are obliged to seek the central substance of the situation. That usually involves careful delineation of the parties' horizontal and vertical relationships. Under a group boycott theory, a violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, may well occur when a group of independent competing firms engage in a concerted refusal to deal with a particular supplier, customer, or competitor. A group boycott arrangement sometimes is called a per se violation. The rhetoric of older group boycott cases cannot be taken at face value, and that any per se group boycott label is minimally useful. That is because precedent limits the per se rule in the boycott context to cases involving horizontal agreements among direct competitors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > Sherman Act

HN15[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

Horizontal restraints are agreements between competitors at the same level of market structure, whereas vertical restraints are combinations of persons at different levels of market structure such as manufacturers and distributors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Exemptions

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Monopolization Offenses

HN16[] Scope, Exemptions

As the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit has noted in ASE I, there is an inherent tension between national antitrust policy, which seeks to maximize competition, and national labor policy, which encourages cooperation among workers to improve the conditions of employment. Whereas antitrust laws protect the consumer at the expense of individual market participants with a singular focus on price and output, labor laws protect the livelihood of the employee on the other end of the long chain of production and consumption. The courts have sought to reconcile those competing directives via two labor exemptions from the antitrust laws, one statutory and one nonstatutory.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Exemptions

Labor & Employment Law > ... > Unfair Labor Practices > Union Violations > Secondary Activities

HN17[] Scope, Exemptions

The statutory exemption stems from the United States Supreme Court's attempt to harmonize the goals of the Sherman, Clayton, and Norris-LaGuardia Acts. Reading the three statutes together, the United States Supreme Court held that union activity is exempt from antitrust liability so long as the union acts in its self-interest and does not combine with non-labor groups. Yet, this exemption, while helpful in protecting the organization of union activity itself, did not adequately encompass the need to protect legitimate collective bargaining activity from antitrust liability. This is because such activity necessarily constitutes a combination between labor unions and non-labor employers.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Exemptions

Labor & Employment Law > Collective Bargaining & Labor Relations > Interpretation of Agreements

HN18[] Scope, Exemptions

The United States Supreme Court has recognized that a proper accommodation between the congressional policy favoring collective bargaining under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.S. § 187, and the congressional policy favoring free competition in business markets requires that some union-employer agreements be accorded a limited nonstatutory exemption from antitrust sanctions. That nonstatutory exemption shields some restraints on competition imposed through the bargaining process, where the alleged anticompetitive conduct is anchored in the collective-bargaining process, concerns only the parties to the collective bargaining relationship, and relates to wages, hours, conditions of employment, or other mandatory subjects of collective bargaining.

HN20[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

While it remains true that one group of employers may not conspire to eliminate competitors from the industry and the union is liable with the employers if it becomes a party to the conspiracy, sufficient proof of concerted anti-competitive action among independent business entities remains necessary to state a successful the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > Boycotts

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Horizontal Refusals to Deal > Sherman Act

HN23[] Scope, Monopolization Offenses

The freedom to switch suppliers lies close to the heart of the competitive process and that applying per se liability to a buyer's decision to switch suppliers, even though not made for competitive reasons, would transform cases involving business behavior that is improper for various reasons into treble-damages antitrust cases.

A rule of reason analysis requires a burdensome multi-part showing: that the alleged agreement involved the exercise of power in a relevant economic market, that that exercise had anti-competitive consequences, and that those detriments outweighed efficiencies or other economic benefits.

Generally speaking, to make out a claim of exclusive dealing under the rule of reason, the plaintiffs would need to show that they were foreclosed from competing in a substantial portion of the relevant market. For exclusive dealing, foreclosure levels are unlikely to be of concern where they are less than 30 or 40 percent.

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, does not reach independent decisions, even if they lead to the same anticompetitive result as an actual agreement among market actors. To survive a motion for summary judgment, the plaintiffs needed to demonstrate a genuine dispute as to whether the defendant's actions caused an injury to competition, as distinguished from impact on themselves.

Opinion

[*48] HOWARD, Chief Judge. On December 2, 2004, five structural steel contractors filed a complaint against a local union alleging antitrust law violations under the Sherman Act, labor law [*49] violations under the Labor Management Relations Act ("LMRA"), and other violations under state law. Over the intervening decade, the case has evolved in complex ways. Although we reviewed this matter once before, Am. Steel Erectors, Inc. v. Local Union No. 7, Int'l Ass'n of Bridge, Structural, Ornamental & Reinforcing Iron Workers ("ASE I"), 536 F.3d 68 (1st Cir.

2008), [2] we found elements pertaining to the federal claims undeveloped and remanded for further proceedings. The case now reaches us again following trial, with both parties appealing and cross-appealing aspects of the final judgment. After considerable reflection, and for the reasons set forth below, we affirm.

I. Background

A. Factual History

As we explained in ASE I, the structural steel industry is comprised of steel fabricators, who manufacture steel products to meet design specifications, and steel erectors, who assemble the fabricated steel. When a developer or owner taps a general contractor to lead the construction of a building, that general contractor typically solicits bids for a combined "fab and erect" package, which is submitted by the fabricator and includes the combined price for both the fabrication and erection of the structural steel. As such, the steel fabricators must themselves solicit bids for the erection work from the steel erectors in order to finalize their combined bid price. And, in turn, the erection companies must incorporate the significant costs associated with paying their laborers into their own steel erection price.

In New England, at the time of the complaint, [3] there were relatively few fabricators (around twenty) and many erectors (over 200). The plaintiffs in this case are five nonunionized steel erector companies,[1] and the defendant is Labor Union No. 7 of the International Association of Bridge, Structural, Ornamental & Reinforcing Iron Workers ("Local 7"), a teamsters local union for member iron workers (including steel erector laborers) in eastern Massachusetts. Local 7 has a collective bargaining agreement ("CBA") with the Building Trades Employers' Association of Boston and Eastern Massachusetts ("BTEA"), which is an entity that represents hundreds of construction companies. Among the "union signatory" firms that have agreed to the CBA are numerous erector companies with whom the plaintiffs compete.

Under the CBA, the signatory erectors must pay Local 7 workers a union scale wage. Nonunion erectors, on the other hand, are not [4] bound to the CBA and can negotiate their own labor costs with their employees. Because labor expenditures account for approximately half of the total steel erection costs, nonunion erectors are often able to submit lower bids for erection contracts to fabricators looking to formulate a combined "fab and erect" bid. Over time, not unexpectedly, that can lead to nonunion erectors and laborers gaining market share from union erectors and laborers.

In order to prevent such erosion in its labor market share, Local 7 incorporated a "Market Recovery Program" ("MRP") into its 2000-2006 CBA. Under the MRP, signatory erectors withheld a fraction of each union laborer's paycheck, which was then paid into a target fund (the "Fund") operated by Local 7. Local 7 could then identify [*50] construction projects likely to draw competition from nonunion erectors and, on a case-by-case basis, send "blast faxes" or "project alerts" to its signatory union erectors with an offer to subsidize their bids and make them more competitive with nonunion bids. In the event that a union signatory won the subcontract, Local 7 (sometimes in conjunction with other regional unions) would enter into a job targeting fund agreement [5] with that erector company governing the terms of the MRP subsidy for that specific project ("JTF agreement").

B. Procedural History

In 2004, the plaintiffs filed a complaint in federal district court in Massachusetts alleging, in addition to state law claims, that actions of Local 7 violated both (1) the LMRA, which provides civil liability for damages resulting from

[1] The plaintiffs are Arial Services, Inc., D.F.M. Industries, Inc., American Steel Erectors, Inc., Bedford Ironworks, Inc., and Ajax Construction, Inc. As plaintiffs D.F.M. Industries and Ajax Construction are most heavily involved in the foundational facts, we refer to them throughout as "DFM" and "Ajax" for ease.

unfair labor practices, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158, 187; and (2) Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, which forbid practices that unlawfully impair competition, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2. In general, the complaint alleged that Local 7 employed coercion and unlawful economic pressure to ensure that contracts were awarded to signatory erectors, rather than plaintiffs, and to foreclose nonunion erectors from a large portion of the structural steel erection market in the greater Boston area.

After the district court granted Local 7's request for summary judgment on all claims, we reversed in part. See ASE I, 536 F.3d at 76-85. We agreed that the plaintiffs' state claims were preempted, but remanded the surviving federal labor and antitrust claims for further proceedings. The district court set the plaintiffs' LMRA claims for trial and reserved the antitrust claims to be addressed after several of the factual disputes [6] underlying both claims had been resolved by the jury.

At trial on the LMRA claims, the court limited the plaintiffs to presenting evidence about union conduct relating to four particular construction projects: two, referred to as Cardi's Furniture and Archstone Apartments, involved plaintiff Ajax; the other two projects, Fox 25 and Brickworks, involved plaintiff DFM. The jury found for the plaintiffs on each of the four projects, awarding Ajax $211,956.00 in damages and awarding DFM $78,757.60. The district court denied Local 7's motion for judgment as a matter of law or a new trial, see Fed. R. Civ. P. 50(b), 59, which challenged the sufficiency of the evidence supporting liability and the damages calculations.

Following the jury verdict, the district court relied on the evidence presented at trial in its subsequent consideration of the antitrust issues, as the plaintiffs had represented earlier in the litigation that identical evidence undergirded both the LMRA claims and the antitrust claims. Ultimately, the court entered judgment on the Sherman Act claims in favor of Local 7, concluding that the plaintiffs' evidence failed to give rise to antitrust liability as a matter of law. [7] See Am. Steel Erectors, Inc. v. Local Union No. 7, Int'l Ass'n of Bridge, Structural, Ornamental & Reinforcing Iron Workers ("ASE II"), 932 F. Supp. 2d 240, 252 (D. Mass. 2013).

II. Analysis

The plaintiffs appeal from the summary judgment decision on their antitrust claims. Local 7 cross-appeals the court's decision to keep in place the jury's verdict on the LMRA claims. We address the appeals in reverse order, HN1[] review the merits de novo, and consider all trial evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs. See Long v. Fairbank Reconstruction Corp., 701 F.3d 1, 3 (1st Cir. 2012).

[*51] A. Labor Law Claims

1. Liability

The LMRA HN2[] extends a private right of action to those injured in business or property by reason of certain unlawful union practices proscribed by the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"). See 29 U.S.C. § 187. As we explained in ASE I, § 8(b)(4)(ii) of the NLRA makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to threaten, coerce, or restrain an employer with an object of forcing the employer (A) to enter into an agreement prohibited by § 8(e) of the NLRA, or (B) to cease doing business with another party. See 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(ii)(A) & (B); Intercity Maint. Co. v. Local 254, Serv. Employees Int'l Union, 241 F.3d 82, 87 (1st Cir. 2001). An illegal § 8(e) agreement is, in turn, defined in relevant part as an agreement by an employer to cease doing business with any other person. See 29 U.S.C. § 158(e). In other words, a union may incur liability under subparagraph B of § 8(b)(4)(ii) if it coerces an employer to cease doing [8] business with another party or under subparagraph A of § 8(b)(4)(ii) if it coerces an employer to enter into an agreement to cease doing business with another party.

Such an agreement can be express or implied, ASE I, 536 F.3d at 83, and it need not be of a "generalized exclusionary nature to fall afoul of § 8(e); rather, the use of coercive measures by a union to pressure a single neutral employer into a single agreement to cease doing business with a single non-union employer, or the application of such measures on a project-by-project basis" is sufficient to find liability. Id. (citing N.L.R.B. v. Bangor Bldg. Trades Council, 278 F.2d 287, 289-90 (1st Cir. 1960)).

Of course, Local 7 rightfully points out that HN3[] a neutral employer's mere decision to acquiesce to a union's unlawful coercion and cut ties with the nonunion party is not, standing alone, sufficient to imply the existence of a § 8(e) agreement and incur liability under subparagraph A. Such an interpretation would allow subparagraph B to swallow subparagraph A whole. Local 7 points to the decision of the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB") in Local Freight Drivers Local 208, 224 N.L.R.B. 1116 (1976), for support.

In Local Freight Drivers, the NLRB held that the union had violated subparagraph B by making the termination of its unlawful picketing contingent upon the neutral party's [9] decision to sever its relationship with a nonunion employer. See 224 N.L.R.B. at 1121. The NLRB stopped short, however, of finding a subparagraph A violation, noting that the union had "specifically made removal of the [nonunion] . . . the quid pro quo for cessation of the picketing," and that "[n]o other requirement was attributed to [the union] as a condition for cessation of the picketing." Id. at 1123. Because the union did not go one step further and require that the nonunion employer be replaced with a union employer, the NLRB found that the factual elements required for subparagraph A liability were absent from the record. See id. at 1121-23.

In ASE I, we deemed any subparagraph B claims waived due to the plaintiffs' failure to "sort out their allegations and develop their arguments sufficiently." 536 F.3d at 83. On remand, we offered the plaintiffs an opportunity to flesh out "the nature and extent of Local 7's allegedly coercive tactics" and show that "Local 7 through use of those tactics pressured neutral employers into agreements to refrain from using non-union contractors in violation of § 8(e)." Id. at 84 (emphasis added).

[*52] The permissible grounds for liability were narrowed even further at trial by jury instructions that required the plaintiffs to [10] show that Local 7 "threatened, coerced, or restrained one or more of the steel fabricators" with an object of "obtaining . . . an agreement, explicit or implicit, from the steel fabricators to cease doing business with the plaintiffs." (emphasis added). Although subparagraph A liability might well have been premised on coercion directed at other neutral employers, such as site owners or general contractors, the plaintiffs failed to object to the jury instructions below. With this somewhat whittled basis for liability in mind, we examine the record to ensure that a sufficient evidentiary foundation exists to prove the allegations.

HN4[] Although we must ensure that the judgment rests upon more than conjecture and speculation or a mere scintilla of evidence, see Trigano v. Bain & Co., Inc., 380 F.3d 22, 28-29 (1st Cir. 2004), we are mindful that it is not our role to assess witness credibility, resolve evidentiary conflicts, or weigh the evidence, see Gibson v. City of Cranston, 37 F.3d 731, 735 (1st Cir. 1994). In the end, we are compelled to honor the jury's verdict unless the facts and inferences point so strongly and overwhelmingly in favor of Local 7 that a reasonable jury could not have returned the verdict for plaintiffs DFM and Ajax. See Long, 701 F.3d at 3.

At trial, DFM president Glen Pisani described how union members regularly [11] filmed job sites where his company's laborers were working and formed picket lines ostensibly protesting DFM's pay scale as being out of step with prevailing wage standards. Pisani testified that he understood that unions might engage in this conduct lawfully in order to place pressure on erectors to sign a CBA. At one point, Pisani made efforts to determine whether his workforce wanted to unionize, and they did not. Even after this, however, members of Local 7 would show up at work sites and, in his words, "harass" his crew. He found it "kind of ironic" that the union picketed publicly funded job sites that were governed by state-regulated pay scales.

Pisani further described that occasionally he hired a union crane laborer to work at a particular job alongside his nonunionized workforce, but the pressure of union picketers would provoke the crane operator to leave the site in order to avoid being "blackballed" by the union. Union picketing intensified when Pisani's company secured erector jobs closer to Boston: "I want to work in the city. Every time I get close, I get picketed and they make problems for me."

The president of Ajax, Donald Morel, also described union picketing at his [12] company's job sites. He further testified about an incident in July 2003 in which about "fifty union iron workers stormed" one of his job sites in downtown Boston at 85 New Market Street, threatening Ajax laborers as not "belong[ing] in downtown." Fights broke out and property was damaged, but no one was ever held responsible for the incident. As of the time of trial, Ajax had not worked in downtown Boston since that incident.

At times, the developing hostilities in the erector labor market ensnared neutral steel fabricators. John Paulding of Cape & Island Steel, a fabricator company, testified that Local 7 had pressured him on several occasions to award bids to union signatories, rather than to nonunion erector companies. He described his first meeting with Eddie Wright, a former president of Local 7, in the early 1990s after Paulding had awarded a job to a nonunion company. Wright "let [him] know [that] the project needed to go union," and [*53] Paulding responded that he "couldn't afford" to carry the "additional costs." After pressure from Wright and the general contractor, Paulding retained a union signatory for the job. Still, Paulding continued to use nonunionized laborers at future job sites while also [13] continuing to feel the heat from Local 7 representatives who at times threatened to picket in order to "stop the job."

In 2003, Paulding again was approached by Local 7 representatives, who told him that they "wanted a lot of work for their people" and that "there [were] opportunities out there with target money." They explained that target money would be provided to the union "installers . . . to give them a leg up on the job" and that "it would ultimately . . . help [Paulding's company] win work." "[I]t actually never quite worked like that," Paulding explained, "it was sort of a mystery to me, the target fund money, because it was always promised how much it could do for me, but it never really did a thing for me." Paulding continued to resist the union's pressure but acknowledged that there came a time when his company only hired union signatories for all erector work in Boston except for smaller jobs lasting only one or two days.

Another steel fabricator, Ann Gavin of FAMM Steel, also testified about pressure to subcontract with union signatories that her company experienced, more directly from owners and general contractors. Gavin testified that there were several instances in which [14] the general contractor or owner would require her to replace the nonunion erector at the site with a union signatory. She testified, "[M]ost of them were Stop & Sho[p] [supermarkets], . . . depending upon what happened with the union, they would change their mind." "We would put the nonunion erector on notice, because in some cases they had mobilized cranes and . . . were at the site and had done the initial work in the field before the union erector came on board. So we had to get costs for them. We couldn't just cancel them and walk away." Gavin estimated that the same pattern occurred "[p]robably half a dozen [times] . . . if we're talking just about Stop & Shops." She acknowledged her company's participation in deciding "to make a change" and cancel a subcontract commitment due to "pressure or . . . an incentive being offered"; "[i]t was an abuse. It was unethical what we did."

This general gloss informed more particular evidence and testimony that was submitted with respect to four job sites where fabricators cancelled subcontracts with DFM and Ajax during project kickoff and replaced them with union signatories despite a higher subcontract cost. We review events surrounding these projects in chronological [15] order.

Cardi's Furniture

In the spring of 2002, plaintiff Ajax pursued erector work on a project in Attleboro, Massachusetts for a commercial building, Cardi's Furniture, and was awarded the job by fabricator FAMM Steel. Having in hand a $370,000 purchase order for twelve weeks of erector work, Ajax began the normal kickoff preparations. Ultimately, however it was prevented from ever being able to start the work.

During kickoff, Gavin of FAMM Steel received some "initial calls," advising her that "there were issues occurring at the site"--"something was up with the union." The general contractor relayed to her that he and the owner now were "considering going from open shop to union." When Ajax learned of the trouble, Morel contacted Gavin "pretty much pleading with them not to remove us." Gavin told him that "it was beyond her control" and that he [*54] "could call

Mr. Cardi himself." Morel also spoke with the owner on two occasions, to no avail: in the midst of project kickoff, Gavin chose to cancel FAMM Steel's subcontract with Ajax "to put a union erector on" the site. FAMM Steel replaced Ajax with Griffin Ironworks, a union signatory erector, at a higher subcontract price. Gavin acknowledged [16] that "[i]t wasn't the first time" that this occurred with Morel's company and she had been "forced to change erectors."

Several entities, including three local union chapters and Local 7, paid Griffin Ironworks $120,000 in "target money" for the Cardi's Furniture job in order to reduce the $570,000 replacement bid to $450,000--still a significantly higher cost than the Ajax subcontract. Griffin Ironworks began work in the fall of 2002 and, after fifty percent completion, sent a letter to Local 7 to request an installment of the promised payment. The December 2002 letter opens with the following, "Through a concerted effort with the New England District Council and Griffin Ironworks, Cardi's new furniture store was turned around from a nonunion project to a union project."

Fox 25

The following year, in 2003, plaintiff DFM sought work at a job site in Dedham, Massachusetts. It submitted a quote to fabricator Cape & Island Steel for the second construction phase at a Fox 25 television facility, because the erector company that "had done the job wasn't going to be there to finish it." DFM and Cape & Island Steel agreed to a purchase order of $18,000 for the erector work for a new side entrance [17] of the building. Trouble with Local 7 soon began.

Within days of DFM laborers arriving on site, a Local 7 business representative, Wright, "had words" with DFM laborers, "questioning [them] being on the site" and upset that the fabricator had brought DFM onto the job. Wright also spoke with Paulding of Cape & Island Steel "about getting [DFM] off the site" and "had conversations" with the general contractor. At some point Wright called Paulding, "extremely upset that the project was subcontracted by C&I Steel, Inc. to DFM," telling Paulding that the job "was going union." Paulding responded that his company had solicited separate bids from both union and nonunion firms, that Wright was unreasonable to expect continued negotiations with unionized erectors, and that DFM had "a reasonable price and a schedule that would work." For the fabricator, "the schedule was tight . . . we needed to get things rolling." Wright's ire escalated. He told Paulding that DFM was "one of the companies targeted by the Local 7 union," that "DFM should not be on this project," and that "there will be a strike at Fox 25." He also warned Paulding that the union had put other companies out of business before [18] and that he planned to follow suit by "letting the gorilla out of the cage" on both Cape & Island Steel and DFM.

The conversation continued. Paulding reminded Wright that his fabricator company had provided "millions of dollars in revenue for union forces through the calendar year of 2002" and "hoped [for] some consideration for this effort." Wright, nonetheless, strenuously insisted that "the union erectors had been hurt as a result of [Cape & Island Steel's] subcontracting to DFM" which was "a big mistake." The discussion ended with Wright telling Paulding that "DFM [had] been targeted by the union," that the Fox 25 job "is a high-profile project," and that DFM's "non-union forces should not be there"--he assured Paulding that "Local 7 would be striking this site continuously."

[*55] When Cape & Island Steel nevertheless "went forward with DFM," union picketers arrived, causing the general contractor to contact the fabricator about the union difficulties at the job site. DFM was asked to leave "until things got straightened out." The nonunion laborers did so but later returned to work and found that DFM's equipment and material had been damaged. Pisani wrote a letter to the fabricator, stating [19] that DFM had been targeted even though his employees were not interested in joining the union, vandalism had occurred at the site, and his crew's safety needed to be protected. Receiving assurances, DFM laborers returned to work.

Later, however, the fabricator sent Pisani a fax with the following cover: "Union BS from 'Edwin Wright' that I guess we must live with." The attached document summarized the phone call exchange between Paulding and Wright. The fabricator dismissed DFM from the job and retained an erector company that was considered friendly with the union. The replacement erector, however, worked at the site for only one week before Paulding "called DFM back, hat in hand," because the new erector could not meet the site needs. DFM returned and finished the job.

Archstone Apartments

That summer, plaintiff Ajax pursued erector work on the Archstone Apartments project in Watertown, Massachusetts. It was a "medium-sized," multi-phase project, expected to generate about eight weeks of erector work. Following the bidding process, Ajax was awarded a $160,000 erector subcontract in June by fabricator Mandate Erectors & Steel. Ajax's project manager attended the usual kickoff meetings, [20] sequencing the job site but, again, Ajax was never able to begin the erector work.

In early September, Local 7 sent out a "project alert" on the Archstone Apartments project, and Morel of Ajax soon learned from Ajax personnel of "a problem" with the union and that his company was "going to lose the job." After Morel had already "earmarked the crane for the job and the people," he urged the fabricator "to try and get the owner to stay with our contract." His effort failed; the fabricator broke the subcontract and hired a union signatory erector as a replacement.

Brickworks

The following year, in the winter of 2004, plaintiff DFM pursued erector work at a condominium construction project called Brickworks in Cambridge, Massachusetts, at the site of an old brick factory. DFM was awarded the job by fabricator Capone Iron, an $80,050 subcontract for five to six weeks of labor to begin in November 2004. During kickoff, DFM personnel met with the general contractor to ensure that safety expectations, among other things, were satisfied. With the anticipation of union picketing, a "two-gate system" was planned so that DFM laborers would enter the site by a designated gate where the union could [21] lawfully picket, and other trade laborers would use a separate access gate.

In mid-November, however, DFM received from the fabricator a packet of correspondence involving union efforts to obtain the erector work at Brickworks. One document was a handwritten proposal from Bel-Lin Corporation, a union signatory, showing a total bid of $115,200 for the Brickworks erector work. The note reflected an original pricing of $136,000, reduced by some $21,000--cast as a "good guy discount." A second document was a letter from Wright of Local 7 addressed to fabricator Capone Iron, indicating that "Walter Belmonte [of union signatory Bel-Lin Corporation] will cut $9,000" and Local 7 will use $12,000 in target money for a total of $21,000 as "concession and market [*56] recovery." The union letter requested that the fabricator send the offer to the general contractor. The last item in the packet that the fabricator provided to DFM was a note from the project manager of Capone Iron addressed to the general contractor, stating: "Please see the attached documents from Local 7 Agent Edwin Wright, run this up the flag pole and see who salutes it."

Ultimately, DFM did not begin the erector work because the fabricator [22] dismissed DFM from the job to give the erector work to the selected union signatory. The December 3 dismissal letter stated in part, "[A]s advised during our recent telephone conversations and due to last-minute lobbying efforts by [Local 7,] Columbia Construction Company, the General Contractor, has demanded that Union forces install the steel for the Brickworks project." Citing the "for convenience" provision in the contract, the fabricator's letter cancelled DFM's installation order, stating: "We regret taking this action considering our long-term relationship. Unfortunately, we have no other choice but to proceed with this project utilizing a union subcontractor."

The fabricator acknowledged that DFM "did [not] do anything at all" to cause Capone to cancel the contract. Less than a week later, Capone Iron entered into a subcontract for $109,200 with Bel-Lin Corporation to perform the erector work for the project. Capone testified that it did not "make commercial sense" to take a higher bid, but that the increased cost was paid by the general contractor.

Despite the narrow prism of liability available to the plaintiffs as a result of our holding in ASE I and the district court's jury [23] instructions, we have viewed the record as a whole and hold that there was sufficient evidence to justify the jury's findings. After the plaintiffs entered into a subcontract with each fabricator at each site, Local 7 targeted the mid-size to larger project in order to seize the work from the prominent nonunion erectors. While Local 7 had pressured fabricators before, on these four occasions the fabricators responded (albeit reluctantly) to the site troubles by agreeing to cancel Ajax's and DFM's subcontracts and to hire replacement union signatories. None of the fabricators took this action for otherwise legitimate business reasons, such as saving money or saving the job site from deficient or untimely performance by Ajax or DFM. In fact, the replacement subcontracts cost more than the cancelled ones, sometimes significantly so. And, on each occasion, the fabricator took the counterintuitive action almost immediately after the union had stirred up trouble on the site, and in the midst of kickoff, when any potential work delays threaten to be a particularly expensive proposition. The jury rationally could have seen these circumstances as signifying a tacit agreement, attributable to [24] the coercion itself, between each fabricator and Local 7 for a specific course of action: oust the targeted nonunion erector and hire a union signatory replacement for the benefit of Local 7 in order to vitiate union obstacles that had been causing project interference. See N.L.R.B. v. Int'l Broth. of Teamsters, Local 251, 691 F.3d 49, 57 (1st Cir. 2012) (determining whether an arrangement comprises an illegal § 8(e) agreement through a "holistic" inquiry into all surrounding circumstances).

Local 7 protests this reading of the record and contends that it was the general contractors or owners, rather than Local 7, who sought and secured agreements with each fabricator to cease doing business with either Ajax or DFM at the four construction projects. No doubt there is evidence in the record that would also support a jury finding that the fabricators [*57] principally acted at the behest of the site owners and general contractors. And perhaps we, sitting as a factfinder in the first instance, might have come to the same conclusion that Local 7 implores us to arrive at on appeal. But that is not our job.

Here, the evidence is quite sufficient to infer that Local 7 took a multi-pronged approach and applied pressure at multiple points to achieve the maximum intended effect. The fact [25] that direct evidence may show that pressure was applied to one party does not somehow negate circumstantial evidence that shows that pressure was applied to another party. The task of weighing these pressures and considering whether these facts, in the aggregate, satisfied the jury instructions provided by the court falls within the province of the jury, and we will only upset that determination if no reasonable jury could have arrived at the same conclusion.

Moreover, HN5[🡅] this Court's repeated and unwavering pronouncements of respect for a jury's credibility findings and rational inferences are not merely appellate flourishes or rote recitation. The jury was entitled to rely upon industry context, witness credibility, and other subtle cues in order to feel out the true pulse of the case; a pulse that is oftentimes difficult for this Court to detect through a cold stack of transcripts. Testimonial references to "troubles," "issues," or "problems" do not arise in a vacuum and may be considered within the broader record, which is sufficient to show Local 7's exploitation of the "time-is-money" pressures present during kickoff and the interruption (or threatened interruption) of worksite activity. [26]

Finally, we think the evidence is more than clear that the pressure applied, and the agreements obtained, went well beyond merely unseating the nonunion fabricator. The jury was well within reason, based on the record, to find that the replacement erector's union affiliation was not just a happy coincidence but rather a necessary condition to mollify Local 7's demands.

Evidence about the lawfulness of union conduct, especially at a common situs for primary and secondary employers, often "will be conflicting and confused, and the inferences to be drawn susceptible of more than one interpretation," the selection of which is left to the factfinder. Abreen Corp. v. Laborers' Int'l Union, 709 F.2d 748, 755 (1st Cir. 1983). It is the jury's role to decide among competing, reasonable interpretations of the evidence, and the record here allowed the path it took by a preponderance of the evidence.

With Local 7's LMRA liability left in place,[2] we turn to the damages award.

[2] We reject a number of both parties' subsidiary challenges. First, we reject Local 7's evidentiary challenges to the record. Local 7 first takes issue with Morel's brief testimony about union workers storming the construction site at 85 New Market Street in July 2003, as irrelevant and highly prejudicial. [27] See Fed. R. Evid. 404(b). We see no abuse of discretion where the July 2003 event was close in time to the Archstone Apartments project and provided context for the hostilities between the union and Ajax during the relevant time period. Moreover, the event was explored briefly on redirect, perhaps in response to a possible

[*58] 2. Damages

The jury awarded Ajax $211,956.00 and DFM $78,757.60, the precise amounts requested by plaintiffs' counsel. Local 7 contends [29] that the damages award is excessive and unwarranted by the evidence for two reasons. First, it argues that two-thirds of the award is based on what it calls a "lost man hours" theory, which amounts to a factual fiction in this case. Second, Local 7 argues that the damages award amounts to a double recovery because the plaintiffs were awarded their ordinary lost profits for the job sites, as well as "lost man hours" costs which also included a profit margin in the hourly wages calculus. Rather than a new trial on damages as urged below, Local 7 seeks remittitur here. Assuming that remittitur is available in the context of this appeal, we conclude that Local 7 fails to show sufficient cause for disturbing the jury's damages award.

HN7[] Great deference is accorded a jury's award of damages, and the district court's decision to abide by the award is reviewed for abuse of discretion. See Loan Modification Group, Inc. v. Reed, 694 F.3d 145, 154 (1st Cir. 2012); Rodriguez-Garcia v. Miranda-Marin, 610 F.3d 756, 765 (1st Cir. 2010). "[T]he jury is free to select the highest figures for which there is adequate evidentiary support," Reed, 694 F.3d at 154 (internal quotation marks omitted), as long as the figure remains in the "universe of acceptable awards," Blinzler v. Marriott Int'l, Inc., 81 F.3d 1148, 1162 (1st Cir. 1996). In the end, we will not disturb a jury's damages award unless it is "grossly excessive, inordinate, shocking [30] to the conscience of the court, or so high that it would be a denial of justice to permit it to stand." Reed, 694 F.3d at 154 (internal quotation marks omitted).

The district court instructed the jury that it may award compensatory damages, meaning "lost profits, both actual and reasonably anticipated but for the effect of the boycott, and any uncompensated out-of-pocket expenses a plaintiff incurred because of the defendant's wrongful contact." It admonished the jury not to speculate or otherwise guess when deciding damages but to use common sense and deduce from the evidence an award that "fairly and reasonably compensate[s] a plaintiff for the full extent of its losses," without "understat[ing] [or] exceed[ing] compensation for the entire injury." The court further explained that "a plaintiff has a continuing duty to mitigate his damages by seeking out suitable substitute replacement work where there is the opportunity [*59] to do so." Ultimately, the jury awarded the plaintiffs both ordinary lost profits and damages associated with "additional manpower costs" for keeping the displaced workforce employed.

The portion of the awards first deemed excessive by Local 7 amounts to $89,600 for Ajax and $45,760 for DFM. According to Local 7, because the [31] plaintiffs elected to put their displaced laborers to work at alternative job sites, they continued to receive an economic benefit from their labor force, leaving their costs theory misimpression left by defense counsel's cross-examination of Morel regarding an unsuccessful NLRB charge against the union. The issue of unfair prejudice is largely left to the district court, and we see no abuse of discretion given that union intent was a highly contested issue at trial.

Local 7's generic challenges to evidence of labor disputes, including primary lawful picketing and secondary labor activity, likewise fail. Despite the court's pretrial ruling allowing some measure of "background" evidence, Local 7 points to no trial objection in which it challenged testimony as out of bounds. Additionally, the jury received instructions on the difference between legal primary and illegal secondary union conduct, and Local 7 gives us no reason to conclude that the jury was inattentive to the careful line drawing it was called upon to do. See Connolly v. Roden, 752 F.3d 505, 515 n.14 (1st Cir. 2014).

Next, we reject the plaintiffs' allegations [28] that the district court improperly foreclosed evidence at the LMRA trial of eleven other construction sites and that the district court abused its discretion in excluding four witnesses. The district court properly excluded information regarding the additional eleven job sites based on insufficient evidence that Local 7 engaged in threats, restraints, or coercion on any of these sites. The district court also properly exercised its discretion to exclude four witnesses that it deemed to be inadequately disclosed by the plaintiffs. The witnesses were not included in the plaintiffs' Rule 26 statement and were only referred to on a handful of occasions within a voluminous record. Although the plaintiffs contend that an amended Rule 26 statement is not necessary when additional information has "otherwise been made known to the other parties during the discovery process," Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(e)(1)(A), HN6[] the "mere mention of a name in a deposition or interrogatory is insufficient to satisfy Rule 26(a)(1)(A)(i)," especially where, as here, the case involves an expansive record and a multitude of individuals, see, e.g., Lujan v. Cabana Mgmt., Inc., 284 F.R.D. 50, 72 (E.D.N.Y. 2012).

unsubstantiated on the record. This argument assumes that the displaced laborers must have been actually idle in order for each company to have experienced tangible financial losses aside from lost profits. It also assumes that the evidence compelled a finding that the plaintiffs' ousted workforce generated profits at the alternative site where they were reassigned. Local 7, however, both misunderstands the nature of the "additional manpower costs" requested and unduly restricts the impact of the evidence presented.

Steel erector companies often schedule several jobs simultaneously and in immediate succession in order to prevent their labor force from becoming idle. The evidence allowed a reasonable inference that any alternative work sites where the plaintiffs' displaced crews were reassigned already had fixed profit returns under a fixed subcontract. The jury could have concluded rationally that readily securing true replacement erector work in the steel market for the plaintiffs' displaced erector workforce [32] was nearly impossible on short notice, and that keeping the individuals employed meant carrying the costs of their wages, as well as taking on costs of other business inefficiencies in a time-is-money industry, without the benefit of any additional income. See Kerry Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 637 F.2d 957, 966 (3d Cir. 1981) (evidence showing "a reasonable basis" for a causal relationship between damages requested and the union's unlawful conduct is all that is required to sustain the damages award). Accordingly, we cannot say on this record that the plaintiffs' estimation of "additional manpower costs" during the time related to the cancelled subcontracts generated grossly excessive damages.

In making their double recovery argument, Local 7 points to the profit margin built into the hourly wage calculus used for the costs theory. Assuming, without deciding, that this issue is preserved for appellate review, Local 7's brief argument again fails.

While the record shows the possibility of some overlap, it does not necessarily demonstrate that a double recovery was incorporated in the hourly wage calculus beyond actual wages paid. Not only did the plaintiffs pay the base wages for the displaced laborers, but Pisani testified about the "scrambling" that [33] was required after the sudden loss of a significant erector subcontract. The jury reasonably could have inferred that both companies faced similar circumstances common to the industry and that the costs attributable to these business inefficiencies were absorbed by both plaintiffs here and were thus recoverable as costs beyond actual wages paid to the reassigned workers. Cf. Landstrom v. Chauffeurs, Teamsters, etc., 476 F.2d 1189, 1195 (2d Cir. 1973) (remanding for new trial on damages where "[t]he most that was shown is a lost gross profit, but not a loss of net income"). Also, Local 7 makes no effort to reckon with the evidence, from which plaintiffs' counsel argued to the jury, that the financial hit taken by DFM and Ajax reduced in some measure reasonably expected future profits [*60] by diminishing their ability to reinvest in their companies for competitive growth.

After reviewing the record, we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in upholding the LMRA damages award as a fair estimate of compensable harm. Thus, in addition to the LMRA liability verdict, the damages awards withstand Local 7's appellate challenges.

B. Antitrust Law Claims

The district court entered summary judgment for Local 7 on the plaintiffs' antitrust claims, concluding [34] that the plaintiffs' evidence failed to give rise to antitrust liability as a matter of law. The plaintiffs now appeal this determination. Because the plaintiffs' claim bobs at the crosscurrents of antitrust liability and labor rights, we must carefully navigate conflicting statutory directives and cut a course as close to congressional intent as we can.

The Sherman Act HN8[] protects against unlawful impairments to competition, not to individual competitors. See Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 344, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990); Sterling Merch., Inc. v. Nestlé, S.A., 656 F.3d 112, 121 (1st Cir. 2011). If a party drives down the cost of its products in the hopes of pummeling a less-efficient competitor into submission, we do not permit the competitor to reach for relief through an antitrust claim. Doing so would thwart the very purposes of the antitrust laws: encouraging efficiency, lowering costs, and increasing output. As such, claims under the Sherman Act require care because overly interventionist enforcement could backfire and dampen the competitive spirit that the laws were intended to foster and protect.

Here, the plaintiffs allege violations of Section 1 and Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Section 1 of the Act HN9[] prohibits unreasonable restraints of trade or commerce through contracts, combinations, or conspiracies; it thus applies only to concerted [35] action that unreasonably restrains trade. 15 U.S.C. § 1; see Am. Needle, Inc. v. Nat'l Football League, 560 U.S. 183, 189-90, 130 S. Ct. 2201, 176 L. Ed. 2d 947 (2010). Section 2 forbids monopolization, attempted monopolization, and conspiracies to monopolize any part of trade or commerce. 15 U.S.C. § 2. The latter "covers both concerted and independent action" which "monopolizes" or "threatens actual monopolization"--"a category that is narrower than restraint of trade." Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 190 (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted).

In evaluating such claims under the Sherman Act, one of the first considerations a court faces is determining the appropriate framework for its review: per se, "quick look," or rule of reason. Admittedly, this decision requires putting the cart before the horse to some extent, since the court must engage with the functional and factual contents of the claim in order to decide how it will proceed to evaluate that claim.

HN10[] Under Section 1, for example, "certain kinds of agreements will so often prove so harmful to competition and so rarely prove justified that the antitrust laws do not require proof that an agreement of that kind is, in fact, anticompetitive in the particular circumstances. An agreement of such a kind is unlawful per se." NYNEX Corp. v. Discon, Inc., 525 U.S. 128, 133, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1998) (internal citations omitted). When faced with an agreement of this rare species [36] such as a horizontal price-fixing or a market-division agreement, see id., plaintiffs can demonstrate Section 1 liability "without need for proof of power, intent or [*61] impact," Stop & Shop Supermarket Co. v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of R.I., 373 F.3d 57, 61 (1st Cir. 2004). See Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 886, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007) (noting that only those restraints "that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output," or those with "manifestly anticompetitive effects and [that] lack any redeeming virtue," may be deemed per se illegal (internal quotation marks and ellipses omitted)).

HN11[] If the agreement in question does not quite fit the bill of per se liability, but nonetheless would seem to have an anticompetitive effect on customers and markets to "an observer with even a mere rudimentary understanding of economics," F.T.C. v. Actavis, Inc., 133 S. Ct. 2223, 2237, 186 L. Ed. 2d 343 (2013) (internal quotation marks omitted), the district court might opt to take a "quick look" at preliminary evidence. Under this purgatorial standard, the agreement is not subject to immediate per se condemnation and may yet ascend to a full rule-of-reason review. "[Q]uick-look analysis in effect" shifts to "a defendant the burden to show empirical evidence of procompetitive effects." Cal. Dental Ass'n v. F.T.C., 526 U.S. 756, 775 n.12, 119 S. Ct. 1604, 143 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1999). Such a preliminary evaluation may be appropriate where the agreement seems anticompetitive at first glance, but the competitive [37] justification offered by the defendant appears plausible or the agreement arises in a unique or unfamiliar context. See id. at 770.

HN12[] The vast majority of agreements, however, need only be found to constitute a "reasonable" restraint of trade after a rule of reason analysis to avoid Section 1 liability. As the Supreme Court has made clear, "the Sherman Act's prohibition of '[e]very' agreement in 'restraint of trade,' 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1, prohibits only agreements that unreasonably restrain trade." NYNEX, 525 U.S. at 133. Because all agreements "restrain trade" in some respect, Section 1 only prohibits "those classes of contracts or acts which the common law had deemed to be undue restraints of trade and those which new times and economic conditions would make unreasonable." Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 211, 79 S. Ct. 705, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741 (1959) (citing Standard Oil Co. of N.J. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 59-60, 31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619 (1911)).

HN13[] The "[r]ule of reason analysis typically requires a plaintiff to show that the defendants' actions enhanced market power--i.e., the power to raise prices or exclude competition--which in turn requires some economic analysis of the relevant market." Díaz Aviation Corp. v. Airport Aviation Servs., 716 F.3d 256, 265 (1st Cir. 2013). This demanding calculus compels an antitrust plaintiff to show, inter alia, "that the alleged agreement involved the exercise of power in a relevant economic market," and "that this exercise had anti-competitive consequences." [38] Stop & Shop, 373 F.3d at 61. For exclusive dealing arrangements, "foreclosure levels are unlikely to be of concern where they are less than 30 or 40 percent . . . low numbers make dismissal easy." Sterling Merch., 656 F.3d at 123-24 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Of course, HN14[] in order to evaluate whether an agreement truly deserves the fatal per se label, or instead merits a more nuanced quick-look or rule-of-reason review, courts are obliged to "seek the central substance of the situation." Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 191. This usually involves careful delineation of the [*62] parties' horizontal and vertical relationships. For example, the plaintiffs here advance a "group boycott" theory of liability. Under a group boycott theory, "[a] violation of section 1 may well occur when a group of independent competing firms engage in a concerted refusal to deal with a particular supplier, customer, or competitor." González-Maldonado v. MMM Healthcare, Inc., 693 F.3d 244, 249 (1st Cir. 2012) (citing Klor's, 359 U.S. at 212). A group boycott arrangement "sometimes [is] called [a] per se violation[]." Stop & Shop, 373 F.3d at 61. We have cautioned, however, that the "rhetoric of older group boycott cases" cannot be "taken at face value," and that any per se group boycott "label" is "minimally useful." Id. at 61, 63-64. This is because "precedent limits the per se rule in the boycott context to cases involving horizontal agreements among [39] direct competitors." NYNEX, 525 U.S. at 135.

HN15[] Horizontal restraints are "agreements between competitors at the same level of market structure," whereas vertical restraints are "combinations of persons at different levels of market structure such as manufacturers and distributors." M & H Tire Co., Inc. v. Hoosier Racing Tire Corp., 733 F.2d 973, 978 (1st Cir. 1984) (internal quotation marks omitted). For example, the vertical chain in this case runs from the laborers to the erectors, from the erectors to the fabricators, and from the fabricators to the general contractors. Meanwhile, the nonunion erector companies compete on the same horizontal plane as the union-signatory erector companies, with each erector company (whether union or nonunion) competing for bids against every other erector company (whether union or nonunion).

As if our framework for analysis were not convoluted enough, we are faced here with an antitrust claim lodged against a labor organization. Because the labor laws accord specific protections and rights to unions, there are qualifications and carve-outs that must be considered before we proceed.

HN16[] As we noted in ASE I, "there is an inherent tension between national antitrust policy, which seeks to maximize competition, and national labor policy, which encourages cooperation [40] among workers to improve the conditions of employment." 536 F.3d at 76 (quoting H.A. Artists & Assocs., Inc. v. Actors' Equity Ass'n, 451 U.S. 704, 713, 101 S. Ct. 2102, 68 L. Ed. 2d 558 (1981)). Whereas antitrust laws protect the consumer at the expense of individual market participants with a singular focus on price and output, labor laws protect the livelihood of the employee on the other end of the long chain of production and consumption. The courts have sought to reconcile these competing directives via two labor exemptions from the antitrust laws, one statutory and one nonstatutory.

HN17[] The statutory exemption stems from the Supreme Court's attempt to harmonize the goals of the Sherman, Clayton, and Norris-LaGuardia Acts. Id. "Reading the three statutes together, the Supreme Court held that union activity is exempt from antitrust liability 'so long as [the] union acts in its self-interest and does not combine with non-labor groups.'" Id. (quoting United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U.S. 219, 232, 61 S. Ct. 463, 85 L. Ed. 788 (1941)).

Yet, this exemption, while helpful in protecting the organization of union activity itself, did not adequately encompass the need to protect legitimate collective bargaining activity from antitrust liability. This is because such activity necessarily "constitute[s] a combination between labor unions and non-labor employers." Id. at 77. In ASE I, for example, we pointed out that the CBA [41] (and the MRP) clearly could [*63] not qualify for the statutory exemption because it represented a combination between Local 7 (labor) and the signatory contractors (non-labor). Id.

Thus, HN18[] the Supreme Court has recognized "that a proper accommodation between the congressional policy favoring collective bargaining under the NLRA and the congressional policy favoring free competition in business markets requires that some union-employer agreements be accorded a limited nonstatutory exemption from antitrust sanctions." Connell Constr. Co. v. Plumbers & Steamfitters Local Union No. 100, 421 U.S. 616, 622, 95 S. Ct. 1830, 44 L. Ed. 2d 418 (1975). This nonstatutory exemption "shields some restraints on competition imposed through the bargaining process, where the alleged anticompetitive conduct is anchored in the collective-bargaining process, concerns only the parties to the collective bargaining relationship, and relates to wages, hours, conditions of employment, or other mandatory subjects of collective bargaining." ASE I, 536 F.3d at 77 (citing Brown v. Pro Football, Inc., 518 U.S. 231, 250, 116 S. Ct. 2116, 135 L. Ed. 2d 521 (1996)).

It is within this detailed framework that our evaluation of the plaintiffs' antitrust claims begins. We described the plaintiffs' antitrust claims in ASE I as asserting a "conspiracy between Local 7 and its signatory contractors to pressure fabricators to hire only union employers, through a combination [42] of threats, disruptive behavior, and MRP subsidies." Id. at 74. The plaintiffs had "paint[ed] the MRP as only one part--if the central part--of a wider conspiracy between Local 7, its signatory contractors, and the general contractors and steel fabricators from which they solicit steel erection work, to shut open-shop outfits such as Plaintiffs out of the steel erection market in the greater Boston area." Id. at 80. Although we ultimately held that Local 7's alleged conduct in combination with the signatory erectors was not protected by the statutory labor exemption, we remanded for further fact-finding to determine whether the nonstatutory exemption applied. Id. at 78-81. We reserved any opinion on the merits of the plaintiffs' antitrust claims. See id. at 76 n.6.

On remand, the district court resolved the antitrust issues after the jury's verdict on the LMRA claims. While ruling that the illegal § 8(e) agreements could not enjoy the protections of the nonstatutory exemption, the court concluded that summary judgment for Local 7 was still warranted. ASE II, 932 F. Supp. 2d at 247, 252. Its reasoning: the plaintiffs had "failed to demonstrate an unlawful anticompetitive effect of any aspect of Local 7's accused conduct." Id. at 252. We review this judgment de novo and may affirm on any [43] ground made manifest in the record, untethered to the district court's rationale. See Euromodas, Inc. v. Zanella, Ltd., 368 F.3d 11, 16 (1st Cir. 2004).

Before us now, the plaintiffs argue that the court erroneously focused only on the four § 8(e) agreements, and thus failed to abide by our directive in ASE I to consider the "entirety of the alleged activity" in the industry as a whole. 536 F.3d at 80. Given a wider field of vision, they argue, the record shows that the defendant is guilty of "conspiracies to monopolize, group boycott, and horizontal monopoly." We have attempted to piece together these claims to the best of our ability given the rather murky briefing, but we cannot find that antitrust liability exists on the facts and theories presented.[3]

[*64] 1. Section 1 Group Boycott

The plaintiffs initially attempt to circumvent a typical rule of reason analysis by incanting the magic, per se words of "group boycott." But, the plaintiffs' attempt to twist the record into reflecting a per se violation is unavailing. As discussed above, HN19[] "precedent limits the [44] per se rule in the boycott context to cases involving horizontal agreements among direct competitors." NYNEX, 525 U.S. at 135. As such, plaintiffs' allegations of questionable vertical arrangements, whether between Local 7 and fabricators or Local 7 and general contractors, do little to advance their claim to per se treatment. In order to potentially generate per se antitrust liability, Local 7's vertical relationships would at least need to intersect with or give rise to an unlawful horizontal relationship. Cf. MM Steel, L.P. v. JSW Steel 7 (USA) Inc., 806 F.3d 835 (5th Cir. 2015); United States v. Apple, Inc., 791 F.3d 290 (2d Cir. 2015). Here, there is no such horizontal arrangement to speak of.

To the extent the plaintiffs claim that there is any horizontal conspiracy among the fabricators as a class or the general contractors as a class to shut nonunion erectors out of bidding opportunities, there is no such evidence in the record. Despite isolated instances of nonunion erectors being removed from jobs, there was no evidence of any horizontal agreement among general contractors or among fabricators to foreclose the plaintiffs from the structural steel erection market at Local 7's request. Compare Klor's, 359 U.S. at 208-09 (holding boycott unlawful when appliance manufacturers and distributors agreed that distributors [45] would not sell to one retailer at another retailer's request) with NYNEX, 525 U.S. at 133, 136-37 (antitrust rule that group boycotts are illegal per se did not apply to a single buyer's decision to favor "one seller over another, albeit for an improper reason" because the combination involved only a vertical agreement and a vertical restraint depriving a supplier of a potential customer).

To the contrary, the fabricators' testimony evinced a willingness and desire to work with the nonunion erectors, and there appeared to be no general, horizontally consistent scheme of market foreclosure. One witness described DFM and Ajax as "extremely large" and "prominent" in the steel erection industry during the pertinent time frame. Pisani started DFM in the early 1990s, and the company gained stability with about twenty-five employees, primarily working in Rhode Island and Massachusetts. By the middle of the next decade, DFM had grown to about 110-120 employees and $13 million in sales. First entering the industry in the 1970s, Ajax had varying employee numbers over time, ranging from thirty to 120. Its business territory covered much of New England, including Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. [46] Ajax and DFM, as well as other named plaintiffs, regularly entered into subcontracts with various fabricators.

Nor does one find any meaningful evidence of unlawful horizontal conspiracy among the signatory erector firms. To the extent the plaintiffs bemoan the operation of the MRP in conjunction with signatory erector firms, there can be little doubt that this program was part and parcel of the CBA protected from antitrust scrutiny by the nonstatutory exemption. The MRP was clearly "anchored in the collective-bargaining process, concer[ned] only the parties to the collective bargaining relationship, and relat[ed] to wages, hours, [*65] conditions of employment, or other mandatory subjects of collective bargaining." ASE I, 536 F.3d at 77 (citing Brown, 518 U.S. at 250). As we mentioned in ASE I, such agreements, as a general matter, have been widely upheld. Id. at 79-80.

Beyond this point of wage agreement, however, the plaintiffs' accusations of horizontal conspiracy among the signatory erectors ring hollow on this record, especially in light of the rigorously enforced Section 1 demands for sufficient proof of concerted conduct. See Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 190 n.2; Fisher v. City of Berkeley, 475 U.S. 260, 266, 106 S. Ct. 1045, 89 L. Ed. 2d 206 (1986); White v. R.M. Packer Co., 635 F.3d 571, 576 (1st Cir. 2011). HN20[] While it remains true that "[o]ne group of employers may not conspire to eliminate competitors from the industry and the union is liable with [47] the employers if it becomes a party to the conspiracy," United Mine Workers of Am. v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 665-66, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965); see also Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3, Int'l Bhd. of Elec. Workers, 325 U.S. 797, 800, 65 S. Ct. 1533, 89 L. Ed. 1939 (1945), sufficient proof of concerted anti-competitive action among independent business entities remains necessary to state a successful Section 1 claim.

In the end, evidence of conduct by the union erector signatories as market participants that remains ambiguous as to whether the actors have engaged in an illegal antitrust conspiracy, as opposed to independent action or conscious parallelism, is insufficient to survive summary judgment. See White, 635 F.3d at 577 & n.5; Euromodas, 368 F.3d at 19. After careful review of the record, we conclude that the plaintiffs' evidence fails to clear this hurdle and that any purported tacit horizontal agreement among union signatory erectors remains illusory. See Euromodas, 368 F.3d at 18 (noting that antitrust plaintiffs bear the burden "to make at least a prima facie showing of concerted action" with "an illicit objective").

Beyond the bare wage agreement and operation of the MRP, which are protected from antitrust scrutiny under the nonstatutory exemption, each company acted as its own profit-maximizing entity pursuant to its own economic interest when seeking to win a fabricator's favor with the lowest erector bid, whether competing against a nonunion firm or [48] another union signatory. Each union signatory erector formulated its own bid either with assurances of an MRP subsidy or by taking a corresponding cut in profits to account for nonunion bidders who were not bound to CBA wages. There is no evidence that the union signatories relinquished independent, competitive decision-making when receiving blast faxes and opting to submit a bid on the projects targeted by Local 7 or when later entering into a JTF agreement with the union for a winning bid. Rather, the evidence tends to show that the hundred-plus signatory erectors remained independently profit-driven in their respective bidding decisions--with or without the promised subsidy.

This precludes us from holding that the instant case falls within a category of "what may be called HN21[] a group boycott in the strongest sense: A group of competitors[, i.e., signatory erectors,] threaten[ing] to withhold business from third parties[, i.e., fabricators or general contractors,] unless those third parties would help them injure their directly competing rivals[, i.e., nonunion erectors]." NYNEX, 525 U.S. at 135; see also Fashion Originators' Guild of Am., Inc. v. F.T.C., 312 U.S. 457, 61 S. Ct. 703, 85 L. Ed. 949, 32 F.T.C. 1856 (1941) (applying per se liability to an agreement among clothing designers, manufacturers, [*66] and suppliers to withhold selling [49] clothes to retailers who bought clothes from competing manufacturers and suppliers).

HN22[] Without unlawful agreement among participants at any given horizontal plane, a Section 1 claim cannot fall within the narrow category of per se unlawful group boycott agreements. Because the plaintiffs failed to demonstrate any agreement among general contractors, any agreement among fabricators, or any non-wage-based agreement among signatory erectors,[4] the plaintiffs' group boycott theory of antitrust liability fails.

2. Section 1 Vertical Restraints

This leaves us with the plaintiffs' attack on Local 7's alleged vertical arrangements with individual signatory erectors, fabricators, and general contractors. [*67] Assuming that, from our labor analysis above, at least four vertical

[4] The plaintiffs continue to allege that the wage-based agreement among and between the signatory erectors and Local 7 cannot be sheltered from antitrust scrutiny because it involved taking deductions from laborer wages and providing contractor subsidies on public projects in violation of the Davis-Bacon Act, 40 U.S.C. §§ 3141-3148. See ASE I, 536 F.3d at 74; see id. n.5 (providing contours of Davis-Bacon Act). In ASE I, we recognized that "the MRP may very well violate the Davis-Bacon Act" to the extent it draws deductions from public projects or offers subsidies to contractors to win public projects. Id. at 81. We also recognized, however, that the plaintiffs themselves had not pursued, and likely could not pursue, a cause of action under the Davis-Bacon [50] Act. Id. We left it to the plaintiffs on remand to flesh out their theory. In the final analysis, we do not believe that the plaintiffs have successfully landed their "acrobatic attempt to shoehorn a possible Davis-Bacon violation into their antitrust claims." Id.

"The Davis—Bacon Act was originally enacted in 1931 as a 'minimum wage law designed for the benefit of construction workers' which 'protects . . . employees from substandard earnings by fixing a floor under wages on Government projects.'" Int'l Bhd. of Elec. Workers, Local 357, AFL-CIO v. Brock, 68 F.3d 1194, 1199 (9th Cir. 1995) (quoting United States v. Binghamton Constr. Co., 347 U.S. 171, 177-178, 74 S. Ct. 438, 98 L. Ed. 594 (1954)). "When Congress enacted the Davis-Bacon Act, it intended to remove labor as [a] competitive element." *In the Matter of: Bldg. & Constr. Trades Unions Job Targeting Programs, WAB Case No. 90-02, 1991 DOL Wage App. Bd. LEXIS 34, 1991 WL 494718, at 1 (June 13, 1991).

When an otherwise-lawful MRP is utilized on such public projects, however, the funds deducted from the Davis-Bacon projects are used "as subsidies on private sector projects," and the prevailing wage surveys might thereby become "distorted to the extent the subsidy was distributed to [a] contractor on a private sector project." *1991 DOL Wage App. Bd. LEXIS 34, [WL] at 6. "Over time, the government would pay more on Davis-Bacon . . . projects than the actual area wage rate, a result clearly outside the public interest and definitely not contemplated by the Congress which enacted Davis-Bacon." Id.

Although the recycling [51] of wages through fixed-wage public projects and competitive private projects via the MRP may ultimately have an anticompetitive effect, this outcome is partially a result of the Davis-Bacon Act's anticompetitive prevailing wage mechanism. In other words, the plaintiffs' frontal assault on the MRP seems to necessarily entail a collateral, predicate attack on the Davis-Bacon Act itself.

Thus, while we agree that Congress presumably did not intend to permit such deductions under the Davis-Bacon Act, we find it equally unlikely that Congress intended the Sherman Act to provide the remedy that the plaintiffs request. See ASE I, 536 F.3d at 81 (noting that "Reich and its progeny do not appear to stand for the proposition that a Davis-Bacon violation exposes an otherwise exempt job targeting program to antitrust liability"). Allowing particular deductions or subsidies that violate Davis-Bacon to eviscerate the categorical protections provided against Sherman Act liability would radically alter the careful balance struck between labor rights and antitrust liability.

That is not to say that a theory of liability more tailored to the specific offending characteristics or applications of the MRP might not allow for [52] antitrust scrutiny. Rather, it is simply to say that the plaintiffs' broadside attack on the nonstatutory exemption fails. The plaintiffs have attempted to pin antitrust liability on the MRP as a whole, but we think the tail fails to find the donkey.

agreements exist, the plaintiffs allege a wider pattern of exclusive dealing between Local 7 and fabricators or Local 7 and general contractors.

Yet, this basis for antitrust liability also fails. First, to the extent any given fabricator or contractor replaced a nonunion erector with a union erector for improper reasons and in the face of higher costs, this alone is insufficient to prevail on an antitrust claim. See NYNEX, 525 U.S. at 136-37 (noting that HN23[] "[t]he freedom to switch suppliers lies close to the heart of the competitive process" and that applying per se liability to a buyer's decision to switch suppliers, even "though not made for competitive reasons, . . . would transform cases involving business behavior that [53] is improper for various reasons . . . into treble-damages antitrust cases").

Second, any vertical agreements struck by the union are, on this record, insufficient to survive the district court's summary judgment. That is not to say that vertical agreements with exclusionary components can always escape antitrust liability. In Connell Construction, for example, a local union entered two sets of agreements: (1) a multiemployer bargaining agreement with a "most favored nation" clause that promised in essence to eliminate competition between all signatory mechanical trade subcontractors and any other subcontractors that the union might organize, and (2) a series of parallel, vertical agreements with general contractors that prohibited the general contractor from using any subcontractor that did not have an agreement with the union. 421 U.S. at 619, 623-25. Thus, the union's agreements with general contractors not only reached beyond the laborers' primary employers, but also made nonunion subcontractors completely ineligible to compete for a substantial portion of all available work and imposed an anticompetitive restraint on the business market that was not limited to the elimination of competition over wages [54] and working conditions. Id. at 625. Without deciding whether the union's vertical agreement with the general contractor actually violated the Sherman Act, the Supreme Court held that the agreement could provide the basis for a federal antitrust suit and remanded the case. Id. at 637.

Simply put, however, this case is no Connell. In the absence of evidence that Local 7 entered into a systemic or interlocking set of vertical exclusive dealing agreements with third-party neutrals so as to effectively foreclose the plaintiffs' access to a significant portion of competitive opportunities in the market for structural steel erection, we cannot disagree with the district court's decision to dispose of the antitrust claims on summary judgment.

To the extent Local 7 can be said to have entered into a handful of project-by-project vertical "exclusionary" agreements, the district court properly noted that such agreements are usually adjudged under the rule of reason. See Leegin, 551 U.S. at 907; Continental T. V. v. GTE Sylvania, 433 U.S. 36, 59, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977). HN24[] A rule of reason analysis "requires a burdensome multi-part showing: that the alleged agreement involved the exercise of power in a relevant economic market, that this exercise had anti-competitive consequences, and that those detriments outweighed [55] efficiencies or other economic benefits." Stop & Shop, 373 F.3d at 61.

But, HN25[] generally speaking, to make out a claim of exclusive dealing under the rule of reason, the plaintiffs would need to show that they were foreclosed from competing [*68] in a substantial portion of the relevant market. See id. at 68 ("For exclusive dealing, foreclosure levels are unlikely to be of concern where they are less than 30 or 40 percent."); ZF Meritor, LLC v. Eaton Corp., 696 F.3d 254, 303 (3d Cir. 2012) (holding that parallel long-term agreements between a single, upstream supplier and all downstream purchasers that contained exceedingly high market-penetration-target rebates constituted de facto exclusive dealing agreements and were, in the aggregate, anticompetitive under the rule of reason). Based on the trial record, the district court found that spending in the relevant market "has exceeded $200,000,000 each year since 1999" and that the four opportunities foreclosed "constitute only a fraction of a percent of the defined market, nowhere near the percentage impact necessary to make out an exclusionary claim under the rule of reason."[5] ASE II, 932 F. Supp. 2d at 248. Rather, the district court found that the plaintiffs were not "shorn of the ability to remain as competitors in the market" and that there was "no evidence that they [56] were excluded from bidding on other jobs." Id. at 249.

[5] The court assumed for purposes of summary judgment that spending for steel erection in the agreed-upon market exceeded $200 million each year since 1999, and the plaintiffs agree with this calculation.

To overcome this factual inconvenience, plaintiffs argue that the four deprivations presented at trial are illustrative of a broader pattern of exclusion from the Boston-area steel erection market, as evidenced by (1) the undisputed fact that seventy percent of the steel erection work within the geographical bounds of the agreed-upon market was performed by union signatory erectors, and (2) the trial testimony indicating that at some point nearly all significant erector work in Boston itself was performed by union signatory companies.

Although these numbers might paint a more compelling picture if the plaintiffs could show that they were the result of widespread or systemic anticompetitive agreements or conduct, we side with the district court in finding the record lacking in this regard. Section 1 HN26[] "does not reach independent decisions, even if they lead to the same anticompetitive result as an actual agreement among market actors." White, 635 F.3d at 575. "To survive [a] [57] motion for summary judgment, [the] plaintiffs needed to demonstrate a genuine dispute as to whether defendant['s] actions caused an injury to competition, as distinguished from impact on themselves." R.W. Int'l Corp. v. Welch Food, Inc., 13 F.3d 478, 487 (1st Cir. 1994) (emphasis in original).

None of the discrete agreements involved a refusal to deal on an on-going basis, a fact that the plaintiffs acknowledged before the district court. Cf. Sterling Merch., 656 F.3d at 124 ("'Short contract terms and low switching costs generally allay most fears of injury to competition,'" as do vertical agreements that are "not entirely exclusive." (quoting 11 Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law, ¶ 1802, at 94)). Moreover, there is insufficient evidence to establish widespread collusive agreements between Local 7 and steel fabricators or general contractors to foreclose open-shop erector companies as a general matter. We briefly revisit the record on the latter point.

Of the twenty steel fabricators referenced at trial, only four agreed to break subcontracts with DFM and Ajax and retain a union signatory replacement at a higher cost due to the pressure imposed by Local 7. Indeed, Paulding of fabricator [*69] Cape & Island Steel testified to his resistance against union pressure, and the evidence relating [58] to the Brickworks project also evinces fabricator opposition toward Local 7's interference. Furthermore, DFM and Ajax were not excluded from bidding on other jobs or on future jobs with the same fabricators. It is telling that fabricator Cape & Island recalled DFM to finish the erector work at the Fox 25 site, and afterward the two entities continued their business relationship. Similarly, fabricator Capone Iron continued hiring DFM after dismissing that nonunion company from the Brickworks site.

Additionally, both DFM and Ajax flourished financially during the relevant time frame, two other plaintiffs also experienced economic growth, and three of the five plaintiffs entered the steel erector market since the inception of the MRP. Pisani himself testified that in the "past couple of years [DFM had] been doing a lot of pharmaceutical companies" and was "very competitive" on "very large jobs . . . a testament to what [his company] has done," and he agreed that as of 2006 his company "[had] been working pretty steady with about 20 fabricators."

While Local 7 certainly put direct pressure on some third-party neutrals to award work to union signatory companies, in the end (and after years [59] of litigation and protracted discovery), the plaintiffs proved only four occasions in which individual fabricators agreed to replace a nonunion company with a union signatory erector company.

Nor is it sufficient to point to the MRP alone as evidence of an unlawful vertical agreement. Fabricators are entitled to respond to lower prices from erectors, and signatory erectors are entitled to float lower bids in an attempt to win erection work. A job lost to price competition is not one the antitrust laws were intended to restore or vindicate.[6] [6] As we discuss above, there may perhaps be reason to believe that a more narrowly tailored challenge to applications of the MRP could survive summary judgment, but the plaintiffs cannot render all contracts stemming from the MRP wholly unlawful under antitrust law merely by showing that the MRP sometimes functioned unlawfully under unrelated laws. As such, the plaintiffs cannot transform a vertical agreement entered into between a union signatory and a fabricator on the basis of price into an unlawful "exclusionary" agreement simply by pointing to a secondary JTF agreement between Local 7 and that union signatory.

Moreover, the record gives other reasons [60] for the concentration of union labor in Boston. For instance, early on in the litigation, the district court noted that "[t]he largest Boston area construction projects employing structural steel workers are government-financed public works projects, including the 'Big Dig,' the Boston Harbor clean up, and the renovation of the terminals and parking facilities at Logan Airport." At trial, both Pisani and Morel testified that they generally opted not to submit bids for publicly funded projects because they did not want to sign the required project labor agreement. In short, the record evidence does not point inevitably toward a conclusion that union labor dominance for erector work in Boston stemmed from any set of unlawfully restrictive agreements, rather than some other cause not regulated under the Sherman Act. See NYNEX, 525 U.S. at 136-37; Brooke Grp. Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 224-25, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993); Atl. Richfield, 495 U.S. at 344; Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 503, 60 S. Ct. 982, 84 L. Ed. 1311 (1940).[7]

[*70] HN27[] "[S]ome antitrust cases are intrinsically hopeless" because "they merely dress up in antitrust garb what is, at best, a business tort or contract violation." Stop & Shop, 373 F.3d at 69; see also E. Food Servs., Inc. v. Pontifical Catholic Univ. Servs. Ass'n, Inc., 357 F.3d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 2004). Ultimately, the plaintiffs' antitrust claims here are dressed in the same vestment. And so, given the record before us, we agree with the [62] district court's bottom line that the evidence was only sufficient to demonstrate the existence of a handful of sporadic vertical restraints resulting in harm to the plaintiffs, and not the existence of a systemic set of exclusionary restraints resulting in harm to competition in the marketplace for structural steel erection services itself. See Stop & Shop, 373 F.3d at 66; Euromodas, 368 F.3d at 21; R.W. Int'l, 13 F.3d at 487.

Lastly, we note that the plaintiffs have invoked Section 2 of the Sherman Act as well, although their allegations pertaining to "conspiracy to monopolize" and "horizontal monopolization" are dubious and difficult to divine. Their brief mingles Section 1 and Section 2 advocacy, with little attention to the latter.

There is, perhaps, an argument to be made that the bids of signatory erectors on particular private projects could have been below-cost, predatory bids offset by supracompetitive prices enabled by the Davis-Bacon Act's prevailing wage mechanism and the artificial inflation of the local prevailing wage rate. Hints of a novel theory of this nature seem to be scattered throughout the plaintiffs' papers. Yet, once again, we are faced with a situation where the plaintiffs have provided such skimpy evidence and entangled briefing that this theory of liability [63] must be considered waived. See ASE I, 536 F.3d at 83 ("[I]f [p]laintiffs cannot sort out their allegations and develop their arguments sufficiently, it is not for us to do so for them.").

The plaintiffs' buckshot Davis-Bacon accusations have always seemed to suggest that the alleged violations of that statute should unwind the nonstatutory exemption as a whole, thereby causing otherwise-lawful and non-conspiratorial activity to incur antitrust liability. On remand, the district court addressed the MRP in the context of the plaintiffs' larger conspiracy theory, and we agree that the plaintiffs' alleged Davis-Bacon violations do not impact the MRP's broader eligibility for the nonstatutory exemption.

[7] It is true that Gavin of fabricator FAMM Steel testified that her company had agreed on numerous occasions to replace a nonunion erector with a union signatory at the behest of the general contractor or owner (and through union pressure), including about "half a dozen Stop & Shops." However, she is the only fabricator witness who testified to an apparent company pattern [61] of subcontract breaches targeting nonunion erectors. Also, the plaintiffs offered no evidence that Gavin's company accepted higher priced contracts with union signatories beyond the Cardi's Furniture project. On this record, we should not leap to a conclusion that one fabricator's potential business torts or contract breaches are indicative of antitrust liability. See Stop & Shop, 373 F.3d at 69. This is particularly true in view of the fact that DFM, Ajax, and other willing open-shop erectors continued to participate in the fiercely competitive structural steel erection market. Cf. Sterling Merch., 656 F.3d at 124 (holding that exclusive agreements were not proven to have impaired competition where, inter alia, distributors historically competed for the agreements with retailers, plaintiff succeeded in winning over one of defendant's largest customers, other avenues of distribution remained available, and new competitors entered the market).

Beyond this, however, the plaintiffs have sporadically implied that the deductions and subsidies themselves were part of an unlawful predatory pricing scheme. While we do not foreclose the viability of the suggested theory as a matter of law in [*71] future cases, any leeway that we may grant to parties who present evolving legal theories on appeal has limits. See generally Genereux v. Raytheon Co., 754 F.3d 51, 59 (1st Cir. 2014); MaCaulay v. Anas, 321 F.3d 45, 52 (1st Cir. 2003).

The plaintiffs have exceeded those limits. HN28[] A predatory pricing claim under Section 2 requires plaintiffs to prove that the prices complained of were below an appropriate [64] measure of costs and that there was a dangerous probability that the difference between these values could be recouped. Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 222, 224.

Here, the plaintiffs haphazardly invoke variant strands of antitrust case law and have failed to make any coherent argument to support their predatory pricing claim. Stop & Shop, 373 F.3d at 65 ("[S]ubstitut[ing] innuendo for analysis [is] fatal" to antitrust claims since antitrust plaintiffs must "explain in detail . . . just what the arrangements were and why they plausibly constituted antitrust violations."). The plaintiffs fail to explain at all, for example, how recoupment via the unlawful exploitation of a statutory mechanism rather than recoupment via monopolistic power would affect a predatory pricing analysis. If this unconventional approach is economically unsound, then there is a good chance that the "unsuccessful predation [would be] . . . a boon to consumers," Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 224, and we would be wise to stay our hand, at least as far as antitrust liability is concerned. If the plaintiffs wish to cut a bold new path through antitrust law with a seemingly unique claim, they must show us the way.

Equally fatal, the plaintiffs' brief feints in this direction inexplicably fault Local 7 for failing to provide evidence [65] of above-cost pricing. But as the district court recognized, "[t]his contention . . . stands the burden of proof on its head. Plaintiffs bear the ultimate burden of proving their claims, and on summary judgment must identify some evidence on which a jury could reasonably find in their favor . . . . That they have not done." ASE II, 932 F. Supp. 2d at 251 n.13.[8] We can hardly disagree. See Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 222 ("[A] plaintiff seeking to establish competitive injury from a rival's low prices must prove that the prices complained of are below an appropriate measure of its rival's costs.").

Because the plaintiffs have failed to offer sufficient evidence or argument to support a predatory pricing or "monopolization" claim, we find that their Section 2 claim, like their [66] Section 1 claims, fails. Accordingly, the plaintiffs are left without antitrust recourse.[9]

[*72] III. Conclusion

We AFFIRM the district court's decisions upholding the LMRA jury verdict and award of damages for plaintiffs DFM and Ajax, and granting summary judgment for defendant Local 7 on the antitrust claims. Parties to bear their own costs.

End of Document

[8] Insofar as the plaintiffs point to Dr. Kenneth Clarkson's expert report and argue that the MRP resulted in millions of dollars in harm due to "gross lost profits" by the plaintiffs, this continues to both presume the MRP is wholly unlawful and confuse harm to competition with harm to competitors. More importantly, Local 7 successfully moved to preclude him from testifying at the LMRA trial, and the plaintiffs failed to reanimate and adequately support these arguments in their post-trial briefing.

[9] As with the LMRA claims, the plaintiffs gain no traction by faulting the district court for excluding evidence on the eleven other construction projects. The court rendered these rulings in relation to the LMRA trial, and the jury's verdict has withstood Local 7's appellate attack. The plaintiffs do not adequately tie their evidentiary challenges to their antitrust appeal, and we will not craft a connection for them. Moreover, while they had the opportunity post-trial to readdress evidentiary boundaries for the antitrust litigation, the plaintiffs' 2011 summary judgment pleadings nearly exclusively relied on the trial evidence. Accordingly, we have no need to address the merits of their arguments.

Opinion

CHESLER, District Judge

This matter comes before the Court upon three motions: (1) Defendants Merck & Co., Inc. and Upsher-Smith Laboratories' ("Defendants") motion for summary judgment as to all claims brought by Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs ("Plaintiffs") related to the Upsher-Smith settlement [Docket Entry 839]; (2) Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to all claims brought by Plaintiffs related to the ESI settlement [Docket Entry 840]; and (3) Plaintiffs' motion to strike Sections I and II of the reply memorandum submitted by Defendant Merck & Co., Inc., in support of its motion for summary judgment on all claims related to the ESI settlement [Docket Entry 848]. The Court has considered the papers filed by the parties, and heard oral argument on these motions on July 22, 2015 [Docket Entry 859]. For the reasons discussed below, the Court will deny Plaintiffs' motion to strike Sections I and II of Defendants' reply memorandum related to the ESI settlement. The Court will also deny Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to all claims brought by Plaintiffs [*9] related to the Upsher-Smith settlement. The Court will grant Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to all claims brought by Plaintiffs related to the ESI settlement.

I. INTRODUCTION

Plaintiffs in this action challenge the lawfulness of two patent litigation settlements between a brand-name pharmaceutical company and generic pharmaceutical companies who sought to enter the market with generic drugs, prior to expiration of the brand-name manufacturer's relevant patent for the drug. In the events leading to this case, brand-name pharmaceutical manufacturer Schering-Plough Corporation ("Schering") settled two separate patent infringement litigation cases with generic manufacturers Upsher-Smith Laboratories ("Upsher") and ESI-Lederle ("ESI"), related to Schering's sustained-release potassium supplement K-Dur. These settlements provided for cash payments from Schering to each generic company, in exchange for the generic company's promise to not enter the market with a generic version of K-Dur for a period of time.

The type of settlement described above is commonly known as a reverse payment settlement, or a "pay-for-delay" settlement. Reverse payment settlements typically occur between [*10] brand-name pharmaceutical companies, who ordinarily hold the patents at issue in patent infringement litigation, and generic pharmaceutical companies, who seek to compete in the same drug market as the brand-name company and thus run the risk of infringing the brand-name company's patents. In a reverse payment settlement, the patent holder pays the generic company (also usually an alleged patent infringer) substantial consideration, in exchange for the generic company's agreement to settle the patent litigation and delay entry into the market for a set period of time. Reverse payment settlements occur almost exclusively in pharmaceutical drug litigation, usually under the auspices of the Hatch-Waxman Act's provisions allowing generic manufacturers to challenge the validity of a patent owned by a brand-name manufacturer. FTC v. Actavis, Inc., 133 S. Ct. 2223, 2227-28, 186 L. Ed. 2d 343 (2013).

Plaintiffs allege that the settlements between Schering and Upsher ("the Schering-Upsher settlement") and Schering and ESI ("the Schering-ESI settlement") were anticompetitive agreements that prevented and delayed the market entry of generic substitutes for K-Dur, and that Schering, Upsher, and ESI engaged in a conspiracy to restrain trade of K-Dur and to fix the price [*11] of K-Dur, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1. (First Am. Class Action Compl. ¶¶ 119-22, Docket Entry 839-4).

This case has had a long factual and procedural history, which has been recounted in numerous previous opinions. The relevant regulatory and procedural background, as well as the facts germane to the motions addressed in this Opinion, are reviewed below.

a. REGULATORY BACKGROUND

A brand-name drug manufacturer seeking to market a "pioneer" new prescription drug in the United States first must file a New Drug Application ("NDA") with the federal Food and Drug Administration ("FDA"). 21 U.S.C. § 355(b)(1) (2012); Actavis, 133 S. Ct. at 2228. The brand-name manufacturer must then provide data to the FDA to verify the safety and efficacy of the new drug, and must also provide the FDA with information on how the drug is manufactured, processed, and packed. Id. This information is printed in the publication Approved Drug Products with Therapeutic Equivalence Evaluations, otherwise known as the "Orange Book." FDA Electronic Orange Book, http://www.fda.gov/cder/ob/ . The FDA may grant a brand-name manufacturer permission to market the pioneer drug in the United States, after a review process. 21 U.S.C. § 355(b)(1); Actavis, 133 S. Ct. at 2228.

Regulation of the approval of generic drugs in the United States [*12] is governed by the provisions of the Drug Price Competition and Patent Term Restoration Act of 1984, commonly known as the Hatch-Waxman Act. Pub. L. 98-419, 98 Stat. 1585 (1984) (codified at 21 U.S.C. §§ 355, 360cc, 35 U.S.C. §§ 156, 271), amended by the Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement, and Modernization Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-173, 117 Stat. 2066 (2003). The Hatch-Waxman Act permits generic manufacturers to avoid the long and expensive process of obtaining FDA approval for a pioneer brand-name drug. After the FDA has approved a pioneer brand-name drug for marketing, a generic drug manufacturer can file an Abbreviated New Drug Application ("ANDA") with the FDA to seek marketing approval. The ANDA applicant must declare that the generic drug has the "same active ingredients" as and is biologically equivalent to the brand-name drug. Caraco Pharm. Labs., Ltd. v. Novo Nordisk A/S, 132 S. Ct. 1670, 1676, 182 L. Ed. 2d 678 (2012) (citing 21 U.S.C. §§ 355(j)(2)(A)(ii), (iv)); see also Actavis, 133 S. Ct. at 2228.

The Hatch-Waxman Act also provides special procedures for patent disputes arising between brand-name manufacturers and generic manufacturers. For example, brand-name manufacturers are required to list the patent number and expiration date for any relevant patents for the drug in the NDA. 21 U.S.C. § 355(b)(1); Actavis, 133 S. Ct. at 2228. In addition, generic manufacturers must provide written notice to each patent owner listed in the Orange Book who may be impacted by an ANDA. 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(B)(iii)(I). Generic [*13] manufacturers also must assert in the ANDA that the generic drug does not infringe the brand-name drug's patents, and may do so in a variety of ways. Actavis, 133 S. Ct. at 2228 (citing Caraco, 132 S. Ct. at 1672). A generic manufacturer may assert that the brand-name manufacturer has not listed any relevant patents in its NDA, or that any relevant patents listed in the NDA have expired. 21 U.S.C. §§ 355(j)(2)(A)(vii)(I)-(II). It may request approval to market its generic drug once the brand-name drug's patents expire. 21 U.S.C. §§ 355(j)(2)(A)(vii)(III). Finally, under a certification commonly known as the "Paragraph IV route," it may certify that any relevant patent listed in the NDA "is invalid or will not be infringed by the manufacture, use, or sale" of the generic drug listed in the ANDA. 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(A)(vii)(IV). Using the Paragraph IV route in an ANDA application is an automatic act of patent infringement (per 35 U.S.C. § 271(e)(2)(A)), and oftentimes spurs the brand-name patent holder to start litigation proceedings against the generic ANDA filer. Actavis, 133 S. Ct. at 2228 (citing Caraco, 132 S. Ct. at 1677). When the brand-name manufacturer brings an infringement suit against the ANDA applicant within 45 days of a Paragraph IV filing, the FDA may not grant final approval of the generic drug until either (1) 30 months has passed, or (2) the court hearing the patent infringement or validity suit [*14] has found that the patent is either invalid or not infringed, whichever is earlier. 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iii)(I).

Under the current Hatch-Waxman Act provisions, the first generic manufacturer to file an ANDA application is entitled to 180 days of marketing exclusivity over other generic companies, starting on (1) the first day it commercially markets its generic drug, or (2) from the date of a court decision[1] of patent invalidity or non-infringement. 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iv). If a first-to-file generic company forfeits the exclusivity right for a particular drug, no other generic company can receive it. 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(D). Generic companies value this exclusivity right highly; oftentimes most of the profits a generic company makes on a particular generic drug are earned during the exclusivity period. See, e.g., C. Scott Hemphill, Paying for Delay: Pharmaceutical Patent Settlement as a Regulatory Design Problem, 81 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1553, 1588-94 (2006).

[1] The meaning of "court decision" has been refined by the courts over time. At the time of the Schering-Upsher and Schering-ESI settlements, the FDA applied the interpretation that a court decision on validity or non-infringement had been rendered either when the Federal Circuit affirmed a district court decision, or when the time for filing an appeal [*15] had lapsed. In Mylan Pharmaceuticals, Inc. v. Shalala, 81 F. Supp. 2d 30, 41-42 (D.D.C. 2000), the court held that "decision of a court" meant "all court decisions, whether subsequently vacated, settled, appealed or otherwise mooted," and that the 180-day exclusivity period began on the date a district court rendered a decision of patent invalidity, non-infringement, or unenforceability. The FDA acknowledged that it would follow this approach prospectively in its March 2000 Guidance to Industry on this topic.

Starting in the late 1990s, some parties to patent infringement suits under the Hatch-Waxman regime began to settle their disputes using reverse payment settlements, where the brand-name patent holder gave valuable consideration to the generic manufacturer, primarily in exchange for the generic manufacturer's agreement to refrain from entering the market with a generic drug for a set period of time. Congress observed that many of these agreements may have potentially anticompetitive elements, and thus amended the Hatch-Waxman Act as part of the Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement, and Modernization Act of 2003 to require parties who settle patent litigation under the Hatch-Waxman Act to submit their settlement agreements to the Federal Trade Commission [*16] and the Department of Justice for antitrust review. Pub. L. No. 108-173, §§ 1111-1118, 117 Stat. 2066, 2461-64 (codified as amended at 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)).

b. Factual And Procedural Background of Schering's Settlements with Upsher and ESI[2]

i. Parties

Lead Plaintiff Louisiana Wholesale Drug represents the Direct Purchaser Plaintiff class in this action, comprised of all persons or entities who purchased K-Dur directly from Schering from November 20, 1998 through September 1, 2001. (First Am. Class Action Compl. ¶ 2, Docket Entry No. 839-4.) Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs include direct purchasers of K-Dur, as well as health maintenance organizations, hospitals, retail drug store chains, and wholesalers. (Id.)

Former Defendant Schering was a New Jersey corporation involved in drug discovery, development, and marketing of brand-name and generic drugs. (Id. ¶ 3.) Schering merged with Defendant Merck in 2009. Defendant Upsher is a Minnesota corporation involved in drug discovery, development, and marketing of brand-name and generic drugs. (Id. ¶ 4.) Former Defendant Wyeth Laboratories ("Wyeth"), previously known as American Home Products, [*17] Inc. ("AHP"), was a Delaware corporation involved in drug discovery, development, and marketing of brand-name and generic drugs. (Id. ¶ 5.) Former Defendant ESI was a business unit of Wyeth, engaged in the research, manufacture, and sale of generic drugs. (Id.)

ii. K-Dur and Schering's '743 Formulation Patent[3]

In the time period before the events leading to this litigation, Schering marketed a brand-name sustained-release potassium chloride supplement known as K-Dur. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 1; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 1.) The compound potassium chloride itself could not be patented due to prior art in the field. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 2; Defs.' SDF Reply Upsher ¶ 2.) Schering's subsidiary Key Pharmaceuticals ("Key") held a formulation patent (U.S. Patent No. 4,863,743 ("the '743 patent")) on the controlled-release coating used to package the potassium chloride crystals. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 2; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 2, 55; Defs.' SDF Reply Upsher ¶ 55.) Schering listed the '743 patent in the Orange Book, as a patent that would be infringed by a generic version of K-Dur. (Pls.' SDF Upsher [*18] ¶ 56; Defs.' SDF Reply Upsher ¶ 56.) The '743 patent expired on September 5, 2006. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 2; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 2.)

iii. Schering's Patent Litigation and Settlement with Upsher

[2] The facts pertinent to the current motions are drawn primarily from the parties' pleadings and respective statements filed pursuant to Local Rule 56.1.

[3] The details of this patent and its prosecution are described in the Special Master's 2009 Report and Recommendation in this case. *In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., No. 1-1652, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126249, 2009 WL 508869, at 4-5 (D.N.J. Feb. 6, 2009).

Upsher filed the first ANDA related to K-Dur in August 1995, seeking approval for its generic version of K-Dur: a microencapsulated, controlled-release potassium chloride tablet. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 3; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 3.) In its Paragraph IV certification, Upsher claimed that its generic drug was bioequivalent to K-Dur, but did not infringe the '743 patent. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 4-6, Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 4-6, 57; Defs.' SDF Reply Upsher ¶ 57.)

Schering (through Key) then filed a patent infringement suit against Upsher in the District of New Jersey on December 15, 1995, seeking to enjoin Upsher from marketing its generic version of K-Dur until the '743 patent expired in September 2006. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 7; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 7, 58; Defs.' SDF Reply Upsher ¶ 58.) Upsher denied the infringement claims, and brought declaratory judgment counterclaims for invalidity, non-infringement, and unenforceability of the '743 patent. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 8; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 8.)

The parties reached a settlement on the morning of June 18, 1997 ("the [*19] Schering-Upsher settlement," dated June 17, 1997), on the eve of trial in the patent litigation action. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 14-20, 27, 43-44; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 14-20, 27, 43-44, 64-74, 76; Defs.' SDF Reply Upsher ¶¶ 64-74, 76.) The settlement included the following main terms: (1) Upsher would not market its generic potassium chloride drug or any other sustained-release microencapsulated potassium chloride tablet before September 1, 2001; (2) effective September 1, 2001, Schering would grant Upsher a non-exclusive, non-royalty bearing license to market its generic potassium chloride products in the United States; (3) Upsher granted Schering an overseas license to Niacor-SR© ("Niacor"), a sustained-release niacin drug, as well as five other products[4]; and (4) Schering agreed to pay Upsher $60 million in three installments over two years, up to a further $10 million in milestone payments upon marketing of Niacor in certain countries, and 10 to 15 percent royalties on net Niacor sales.[5] (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 43; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 43; Docket Entry 843, Ex. 1.)

iv. SCHERING'S LITIGATION, MEDIATION, AND SETTLEMENT WITH ESI

On December 29, 1995, ESI filed an ANDA application on a sustained-release potassium chloride version of K-Dur, including a Paragraph IV certification. (Defs.' SUF ESI ¶ 1; Pls.' SDF ESI ¶ 1.) Schering (through Key) subsequently sued ESI in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania on February 16, 1996, alleging infringement of the '743 patent. (Defs.' SUF ESI ¶ 2; Pls.' SDF ESI ¶ 2.) Schering and ESI proceeded to court-supervised mediation in the fall of 1996, on the suggestion of presiding District Judge Jan DuBois. (Id.) United States Magistrate Judge Thomas Rueter [*21] served as mediator in this case, and met with the parties separately and jointly to encourage settlement. (Id.)

Judge DuBois held a Markman hearing on January 21 and 22, 1998, after which he directed the parties to Magistrate Judge Rueter to attempt to settle the case.[6] (Defs.' SUF ESI ¶¶ 11-13; Pls.' SDF ESI ¶¶ 11-13.) The parties eventually settled on the following terms on January 23, 1998 ("the Schering-ESI settlement"): (1) ESI agreed that it would not enter the K-Dur market with a generic product until January 1, 2004; (2) Schering would grant ESI a royalty-free, non-exclusive license of the '743 patent starting on January 1, 2004; (3) Schering would pay ESI $5 million upfront; and (4) Schering would pay ESI additional cash, the amount depending on when the FDA approved ESI's ANDA application for generic K-Dur. (Defs.' SUF ESI ¶¶ 15-18; Pls.' SDF ESI ¶¶ 15-18, 22; Defs.' SDF Reply ESI ¶ 22; Docket Entry 843-52.) Schering agreed to pay ESI a maximum of $10 million if the FDA

[4] As a part of the Schering-Upsher settlement, in addition to the Niacor license Upsher granted Schering licenses to its products [*20] KLOR CON© 8, KLOR CON© 10, KLOR CON© M20, PREVALITE©, and pentoxifylline. (Docket Entry 843, Ex. 1.)

[5] Schering paid Upsher $28 million upon approval of the settlement by Schering's Board of Directors, $20 million on the first anniversary of the approval of the settlement, and $12 million on the second anniversary of the approval of the settlement. The settlement included payment schedules for milestones and royalties related to Schering's sales of Niacor, but Schering did not pursue the production and marketing of Niacor so these payments were never made. (Docket Entry 843, Ex. 1.)

[6] The parties dispute the admissibility and relevance of comments made by Judge Rueter and Judge DuBois during the mediation process. (Defs.' SUF ESI ¶¶ 5, 11-19; Pls.' SDF ESI ¶¶ 5, 11-19.)

approved ESI's ANDA before July 1999. (Defs.' SUF ESI ¶¶ 16-18; Pls.' SDF ESI ¶¶ 16-18, 22; Defs.' SDF Reply ESI ¶ 22; Docket Entry 843-52.) If the FDA did not approve ESI's ANDA until 2002, Schering agreed to pay ESI [*22] only $625,000. (Id.)

The FDA approved ESI's generic K-Dur product in May 1999, and Schering paid ESI the $10 million specified by the Schering-ESI settlement. (Defs.' SUF ESI ¶ 20; Pls.' SDF ESI ¶ 20.) In July 2001, ESI announced that it was exiting the oral generics business, and ESI left the oral generics market in 2002 without ever marketing a generic K-Dur product. (Defs.' SUF ESI ¶ 21; Pls.' SDF ESI ¶ 21.)

c. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

i. FTC ACTION AND APPEAL TO THE ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

On March 30, 2001, the FTC's Complaint Counsel filed a Complaint against Schering, Upsher, and AHP.[7] In the Matter of Schering-Plough Corp., No. 9297, Initial Decision, 136 F.T.C. 956, 1092 (2002). The Complaint alleged that Schering's settlements with Upsher and ESI violated Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, because Schering, Upsher, and ESI entered into unlawful agreements to delay the entry of generic K-Dur onto the market. Id.

The FTC held a nine week trial in this action in early 2002, and at its conclusion the Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") presiding over the case dismissed the Complaint, because he found no evidence to support the FTC's challenge on either settlement. Id. at 1092, 1263. The ALJ determined that the Schering-Upsher settlement did not include a reverse payment, because the parties separately valued the Niacor license deal included in the settlement. Id. at 1168-80. Thus, the ALJ concluded that Schering did not pay Upsher impermissibly for delaying its entry onto the market. Id. at 1243. The ALJ also found that the Schering-ESI settlement did not maintain Schering's monopoly unlawfully in the potassium chloride market. Id. at 1236, 1262-63.

The ALJ adopted the antitrust rule-of-reason approach to analyze the legality of both settlements.[8] In doing so, the ALJ rejected the FTC's preferred per se approach, which presumes that such settlements are illegal due to the need to consider the exclusionary power of the patent in the analysis of the legality of the settlements. Id. at 1225-35. The ALJ found "no basis in law or fact" to make the presumption that the '743 patent was invalid, or that Upsher and ESI's products did not infringe the patent. Id. at 1097. Overall, [*24] the ALJ rejected the FTC's argument that without Schering's payments to Upsher and ESI, the generic companies could have entered the market earlier, given the exclusionary power of Schering's '743 patent and the court's inability to predict the outcome of the patent litigations at issue. Id. at 1193-94.

The full Federal Trade Commission ("the Commission") unanimously reversed the ALJ's decision in December 2003. In the Matter of Schering-Plough Corp., Final Order, 136 F.T.C. 956, 1003-04 (2003). On its own fact findings, the Commission determined that Schering's $60 million payment compensated Upsher not only for the Niacor license but also for its delayed entry onto the K-Dur market. Id. at 1061. The Commission also determined that the Schering-ESI agreement violated the antitrust laws, given that Schering did not effectively rebut the presumption that the purpose of its payment to ESI was to guarantee ESI's delayed entry into the market. Id. at 1056-57. Although the Commission did not hold that Schering's payments to Upsher and ESI were per se illegal, it also did not adopt the rule-of-reason analysis used by the ALJ. Id. at 965. Instead, the Commission required the FTC's Complaint Counsel to first demonstrate that the agreements had anticompetitive effects, [*25] after which the "[r]espondents must demonstrate that the challenged provisions are justified by procompetitive benefits that are both cognizable and plausible." Id. The Commission found that the FTC's Complaint Counsel had demonstrated the

[7] As noted above, ESI was a division of AHP, engaged in the manufacture, research, and sale of generic drugs. AHP became Wyeth in 2002. (First [*23] Am. Class Action Compl. ¶ 5.)

[8] The details of the rule-of-reason approach are reviewed in Section III.

Schering-Upsher and Schering-ESI settlements had anticompetitive effects, and found that with inadequate procompetitive justifications on the record, "it is logical to conclude that the quid pro quo for the payment was an agreement by the generic to defer entry beyond the date that represents an otherwise reasonable litigation compromise." Id. at 988. The Commission essentially concluded that settlements with reverse payments in excess of $2 million (to cover estimated legal fees) paid for market delay, and were thus illegal. Id. at 968.

On appellate review, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit reversed the Commission's Final Order and dismissed the Complaint. Schering-Plough Corp. v. FTC, 402 F.3d 1056 (11th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 548 U.S. 919, 126 S. Ct. 2929, 165 L. Ed. 2d 977 (2006). Rather than using a per se or a rule-of-reason approach, the Eleventh Circuit found that courts must determine "the extent to which the exclusionary effects of the agreement fall within the scope of the patent's protection." Id. at 1065, 1076. Under this rule, the settlements at issue fell within the [*26] protections of the '743 patent, and thus were not illegal. Id. at 1076. The Eleventh Circuit determined specifically that the $60 million payment in the Schering-Upsher settlement did not constitute an illegal reverse payment. In fact, the court found by "overwhelming evidence" that Schering's payment was for the license. Id. at 1069-71. Furthermore, although the court found that the Schering-ESI settlement included a reverse payment, given policy rationales favoring the settlement of litigation, the court found that this payment "'reflect[ed] a reasonable implementation' of the protections afforded by patent law." Id. at 1072 (quoting Valley Drug Co. v. Geneva Pharms., Inc., 344 F.3d 1294, 1312 (11th Cir. 2003)). These settlements allowed Upsher to enter the market more than five years before the '743 patent expired, and allowed ESI to enter the market more than two years before the '743 patent expired. Id. at 1067-68. At the time, no allegations had been raised that the '743 patent was invalid, or that Schering's infringement suits against the generic companies were shams. Id. at 1068. In addition, the court found no evidence on the record to support the Commission's conclusion that the parties would have compromised on earlier entry dates without Schering's payments. Id. at 1074. The court further noted that the Hatch-Waxman Act changes the risk assessment for brand-name and generic [*27] manufacturers:

> [T]he Hatch-Waxman Amendments grant generic manufacturers standing to mount a challenge without incurring the cost of entry or risking enormous damages flowing from any possible infringement. Hatch-Waxman essentially redistributes the relative risk assessments and explains the flow of settlement funds and their magnitude. Because of the Hatch-Waxman scheme, ESI and Upsher gained considerable leverage in patent litigation: the exposure to liability amounted to litigation costs, but paled in comparison to the immense volume of generic sales and profits. This statutory scheme could then cost Schering its patent.
> By entering into the settlement agreements, Schering realized the full potential of its infringement suit—a determination that the '743 patent was valid and that ESI and Upsher would not infringe in the future. Furthermore, although ESI and Upsher obtained less than they what they would have received from successfully defending the lawsuits (the ability to immediately market their generics), they gained more than if they had lost. A conceivable compromise, then, directs the consideration from the patent owner to the challengers.

Id. (internal citations omitted). Under this logic, the Eleventh Circuit explicitly [*28] stated that settlements should be available as a remedy for brand-name and generic companies involved in Hatch-Waxman litigation, and should not be prevented due to the presence of a reverse payment—even when the payment is large. Id. at 1075.

ii. PRIVATE DAMAGES CASES

The action currently before this Court stems from private damage cases filed in 2001, after the FTC filed its Complaint against Schering, Upsher, and AHP (of which ESI was a subsidiary). Plaintiffs originally filed these cases in several districts, but the Judicial Panel on Multi-District Litigation consolidated the pending action in the District of New Jersey. In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 176 F. Supp. 2d 1377 (J.P.M.L. 2001). By consent in 2006, the district court appointed Stephen Orlofsky as Special Master, with the responsibility of handling all motions in this case [Docket Entry 316]. On April 14, 2008, the Special Master certified a class of plaintiffs of wholesalers and retailers who purchased K-Dur directly from Schering. *In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., No. 1-1652, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 118396, 2008 WL 2699390, at 1 (D.N.J. April 14, 2008).

Defendants Schering and Upsher filed summary judgment motions in 2008, asserting that to raise concerns about antitrust liability, Plaintiffs had to demonstrate either that Schering's underlying patent litigation was baseless, [*29] that the '743 patent was obtained by fraud, or that the settlement terms extended beyond the "scope of the patent." *In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., No. 01-1652 (JAG), 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126249, 2009 WL 508869, at 12 (D.N.J. Feb. 6, 2009). Specifically on the Schering-Upsher settlement, Defendants also asserted that the evidence on the record was legally insufficient to prove that Schering's $60 million payment was anything other than a bona fide licensing payment for Niacor. Id. The Special Master recommended that summary judgment be granted for Defendants on these motions, because the settlements at issue were lawful under the "scope of the patent" test. *2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126249, [WL] at 27-30. The opinion applied the presumption that the '743 patent was valid, and that Schering had, by right, the ability to exclude others from making infringing products until patent expiration, even through the use of reverse payments. Id. Under this framework, these settlements would be subject to antitrust scrutiny only if they exceeded the scope of the '743 patent, or if the underlying patent infringement suits were baseless. In this case, the Special Master found that neither of these exceptions applied. Id. On March 24, 2010, after de novo review, the Court adopted the Special Master's report and recommendation. In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., No. 01-1652, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28918, 2010 WL 1172995 (D.N.J. Mar. 24, 2010).

In 2012, the Third Circuit reversed the district court's decision on [*30] the issue of the proper test to use to determine antitrust liability.[9] In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 686 F.3d 197, 218 (3d Cir. 2012). In doing so, the court adopted the "quick look" test for the analysis of the potential antitrust liability of reverse payment settlements, which requires that the plaintiff initially present proof of a payment from a patent holder to a would-be generic entrant onto the market, after which the overall burden of proof shifts to the defendant to demonstrate that the payment was justified. Id. The Third Circuit explicitly rejected the "scope of the patent" test, stating that "litigated patent challenges are necessary to protect consumers from unjustified monopolies by name brand drug manufacturers," and that although the "scope of the patent" test encourages settlements, courts must consider other factors when determining the legality of a settlement. Id. The Third Circuit noted that "the only settlements subject to antitrust scrutiny [under the 'quick look' test] are those involving a reverse payment from the brand-name manufacturer to the generic challenger," and that the vast majority of pharmaceutical settlements would be unaffected by this rule. Id.

Following the Third Circuit's 2012 decision, Defendants Merck and Upsher filed petitions for certiorari, based on a circuit split as to the applicable standard under which reverse payment settlements should be analyzed. Brief of Petitioner for Certiorari, Merck & Co. v. La. Wholesale Drug Co., No. 12-245, 133 S. Ct. 2849, 186 L. Ed. 2d 904 (Aug. 24, 2012); Brief of Petitioner for Certiorari, Upsher-Smith Labs., Inc. v. La. Wholesale Drug Co., No. 12-265, 133 S. Ct. 2849, 186 L. Ed. 2d 904 (Aug. 29, 2012). To settle the circuit split, the Supreme Court granted certiorari on a reverse payment settlement case from the Eleventh Circuit. FTC v. Watson Pharms., 133 S. Ct. 787, 184 L. Ed. 2d 527 (2012), sub nom. FTC v. Actavis, Inc., 133 S. Ct. 2223, 186 L. Ed. 2d 343 (2013). In FTC v. Actavis, Inc., the Supreme Court directed lower courts to analyze reverse payments settlements using the rule-of-reason standard, and rejected both the "scope of the patent" and "quick look" tests. Id. at 2237. The Court held that "a reverse payment, where large and unjustified, can bring with it a risk of significant anticompetitive effects." Id. at 2237. Section III details the Actavis decision and its application to the analysis of reverse payment settlements.

Following the decision in Actavis, the Supreme Court granted Defendants' petitions for certiorari, vacated the Third Circuit's 2012 decision, and remanded the case to the Third Circuit. Merck & Co. v. La. Wholesale Drug Co., 133 S. Ct. 2849, 186 L. Ed. 2d 904 (2013); Upsher-Smith Labs., Inc. v. La. Wholesale Drug Co., 133 S. Ct. 2849, 186 L. Ed. 2d 904 (2013). At the request of all parties, the Third Circuit remanded the case to this [*32] Court for further proceedings. In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., Nos. 10-2077, 10-2078, 10-4571, 2013 U.S. App. LEXIS 18859, 2013 WL 5180857 (3d Cir. Sept. 9, 2013).

[9] The Third Circuit also affirmed the district court's certification [*31] of the Direct Purchaser Plaintiff class. In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., 686 F.3d at 224.

Currently before this Court are three motions: (1) Defendants' motion for summary judgment on all claims related to the Schering-Upsher settlement; (2) Defendants' motion for summary judgment on all claims related to the Schering-ESI settlement; and (3) Plaintiffs' motion to strike sections I and II of the reply memorandum submitted by Defendant Merck & Co., Inc. in support of its motion for summary judgment on all claims related to the ESI settlement. The Court heard oral argument on all motions on July 22, 2015 [Docket Entry 859].

II. LEGAL STANDARD FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Summary judgment is appropriate under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c) when the moving party demonstrates that there is no genuine issue of material fact and the evidence establishes the moving party's entitlement to judgment as a matter of law. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322-23, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). A factual dispute is genuine if a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the non-movant, and it is material if, under the substantive law, it would affect the outcome of the suit. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). "In considering a motion for summary judgment, a district court may not make credibility determinations or engage in any weighing [*33] of the evidence; instead, the non-moving party's evidence 'is to be believed and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor.'" Marino v. Indus. Crating Co., 358 F.3d 241, 247 (3d Cir. 2004) (quoting Anderson, 477 U.S. at 255).

"When the moving party has the burden of proof at trial, that party must show affirmatively the absence of a genuine issue of material fact: it must show that, on all the essential elements of its case on which it bears the burden of proof at trial, no reasonable jury could find for the non-moving party." In re Bressman, 327 F.3d 229, 238 (3d Cir. 2003) (quoting United States v. Four Parcels of Real Prop., 941 F.2d 1428, 1438 (11th Cir. 1991)). "[W]ith respect to an issue on which the nonmoving party bears the burden of proof . . . the burden on the moving party may be discharged by 'showing'—that is, pointing out to the district court—that there is an absence of evidence to support the nonmoving party's case." Celotex, 477 U.S. at 325.

Once the moving party has satisfied its initial burden, the party opposing the motion must establish that a genuine issue as to a material fact exists. Jersey Cent. Power & Light Co. v. Lacey Twp., 772 F.2d 1103, 1109 (3d Cir. 1985). The party opposing the motion for summary judgment cannot rest on mere allegations and instead must present actual evidence that creates a genuine issue as to a material fact for trial. Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248; Siegel Transfer, Inc. v. Carrier Express, Inc., 54 F.3d 1125, 1130-31 (3d Cir. 1995). "[U]nsupported allegations . . . and pleadings are insufficient to repel summary judgment." Schoch v. First Fid. Bancorporation, 912 F.2d 654, 657 (3d Cir. 1990); see also Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e) (requiring the nonmoving party [*34] to "set out specific facts showing a genuine issue for trial"). "A nonmoving party has created a genuine issue of material fact if it has provided sufficient evidence to allow a jury to find in its favor at trial." Gleason v. Norwest Mortg., Inc., 243 F.3d 130, 138 (3d Cir. 2001).

If the nonmoving party has failed "to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of an element essential to that party's case, and on which that party will bear the burden of proof at trial, . . . there can be 'no genuine issue of material fact,' since a complete failure of proof concerning an essential element of the nonmoving party's case necessarily renders all other facts immaterial." Katz v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co., 972 F.2d 53, 55 (3d Cir. 1992) (quoting Celotex, 477 U.S. at 322-23).

III. Standard for Establishing Antitrust Liability under Actavis

The parties spend significant effort in their briefing on these motions debating how Actavis and the rule of reason should be applied in reverse payment settlement cases. This Section outlines the Court's views on these topics.

a. Reverse Payment Settlements: The Actavis Decision

In Actavis, the Supreme Court directed lower courts to use the antitrust rule of reason to examine the legality of reverse payment settlements on a case-by-case basis. Id. at 2236-37. In doing so, it explicitly rejected both the "scope of the [*35] patent" and the "quick look" tests for determining antitrust liability of reverse payment settlements. Id. at 2225, 2236-37. The Court identified five main considerations in its decision: (1) reverse payment settlements have the "potential for genuine adverse effects on competition"; (2) the anticompetitive results of these settlements may sometimes be unjustified, for example where payments are not intended only to offset litigation costs; (3) patent holders often possess the market power necessary to cause anticompetitive harm; (4) litigating patent validity may not be necessary to determine whether a settlement is legal under antitrust laws, as "large and unexplained" reverse payment settlements indicate that the patent holder has doubts about the patent's ability to withstand scrutiny; and (5) parties can still settle patent litigation, despite the risk of antitrust scrutiny, by avoiding reverse payment settlements. Id. at 2234-37.

The FTC encouraged the Supreme Court to adopt the "quick look" test for the analysis of potential antitrust liability for reverse payment settlements. This test shifts the burden of proof to the defendant to show procompetitive effects of the reverse payment settlement in question. Id. at 2237. [*36] The Supreme Court declined to do so, and cited California Dental Association v. FTC for the proposition that the rule of reason should be abandoned for the "quick look" test "only where 'an observer with even a rudimentary understanding of economics could conclude that the arrangements in question would have an anticompetitive effect on customers and markets.'" Id. (quoting Cal. Dental Ass'n v. FTC, 526 U.S. 756, 770, 119 S. Ct. 1604, 143 L. Ed. 2d 935 (1999)). The Supreme Court stated that reverse payment settlements do not meet this criterion, given that:

> [T]he likelihood of a reverse payment bringing about anticompetitive effects depends upon its size, its scale in relation to the payor's anticipated future litigation costs, its independence from other services for which it might represent payment, and the lack of any other convincing justification. The existence and degree of any anticompetitive consequence may also vary as among industries. These complexities lead us to conclude that the FTC must prove its case as in other rule-of-reason cases.

Id. The Supreme Court did explain, however, that the FTC need not "litigate the patent's validity, empirically demonstrate the virtues or vices of the patent system, present every possible supporting fact or refute every possible [*37] pro-defense theory" under the rule-of-reason approach. Id.

b. Application of Actavis to Rule of Reason Analysis

As noted above, in Actavis, the Supreme Court directed lower courts to analyze reverse payment settlements using the antitrust rule-of-reason test. Id. at 2237-38. "The true test of legality [under the rule-of-reason test] is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition." Race Tires Am., Inc. v. Hoosier Racing Tire Corp., 614 F.3d 57, 75 (3d Cir. 2010) (quoting Orson, Inc. v. Miramax Film Corp., 79 F.3d 1358, 1368 (3d Cir. 1996)). The traditional rule-of-reason analysis directs the finder of fact to:

> [W]eigh all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition. The plaintiff bears an initial burden under the rule of reason of showing that the alleged combination or agreement produced adverse, anti-competitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets. The plaintiff may satisfy this burden by proving the existence of actual anticompetitive effects, such as reduction of output, increase in price, or deterioration in quality of goods or services. Such proof is often impossible to make, however, due to the difficulty [*38] of isolating the market effects of challenged conduct. Accordingly, courts typically allow proof of the defendant's market power instead. Market power, the ability to raise prices above those that would prevail in a competitive market, is essentially a surrogate for detrimental effects.
> If a plaintiff meets his initial burden of adducing adequate evidence of market power or actual anti-competitive effects, the burden shifts to the defendant to show that the challenged conduct promotes a sufficiently pro-> competitive objective. . . . To rebut, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the restraint is not reasonably necessary to achieve the stated objective.

United States v. Brown Univ., 5 F.3d 658, 668-69 (3d Cir. 1993) (alterations, citations, footnotes, and internal quotations omitted).

The Supreme Court left development of the application of the rule-of-reason test in reverse payment settlement cases primarily to the lower courts, indicating that lower courts should focus on the "basic question" of whether a settlement has "significant unjustified anticompetitive consequences." Actavis, 133 S. Ct at 2237. Recently, the Third Circuit directed a district court to apply the rule of reason as described in Actavis:

> First, to prove anticompetitive effects, the plaintiff must prove payment [*39] for delay, or, in other words, payment to prevent the risk of competition. [T]he likelihood of a reverse payment bringing about anticompetitive effects depends upon its size, its scale in relation to the payor's anticipated future litigation costs, its independence from other services for which it might represent payment, and the lack of any other convincing justification.
> Second, the burden then shifts to the defendant to show that legitimate justifications are present, thereby explaining the presence of the challenged term and showing the lawfulness of that term under the rule of reason.
>> The reverse payment, for example, may amount to no more than a rough approximation of the litigation expenses saved through the settlement. That payment may reflect compensation for other services that the generic has promised to perform—such as distributing the patented item or helping to develop a market for that item. There may be other justifications.
> The Court does not foreclose other justifications, and we need not decide today what those other justifications might be.
> Finally, the plaintiff will have the opportunity to rebut the defendant's explanation.

King Drug Co. of Florence, Inc. v. Smithkline Beecham Corp., 791 F.3d 388, 412 (3d Cir. 2015) (internal citations, quotations, and footnotes [*40] omitted). The Supreme Court gave lower courts further guidance on the application of the rule of reason to reverse payment settlement cases, noting that antitrust considerations only arise if a "reverse payment" has occurred, and that the reverse payment in question must be "large and unexplained." Actavis, 133 S. Ct. at 2236-37. "Large" payment sums should be scrutinized more carefully, as a large payment may "provide a workable surrogate for a patent's weakness." Id. Reverse payment settlements also may be anticompetitive when the size of the settlement is too large when compared to the potential cost of future litigation, or where other reasonable justification for the settlement cannot be shown. Id. at 2237-38. Finally, the Supreme Court directed lower courts to consider "traditional antitrust factors such as likely anticompetitive effects, redeeming virtues, market power, and potentially offsetting legal considerations present in the circumstances, such as here those related to patents." King Drug, 791 F.3d at 412 (quoting Actavis, 133 S. Ct. at 2231).

This Court notes that the rule-of-reason test puts the ultimate burden of proof to show anticompetitive conduct onto the plaintiff. Once the plaintiff establishes a prima facie case for antitrust liability, as described above, [*41] the defendant may rebut by showing why the conduct in question was procompetitive in nature. The "quick look" test, by contrast, creates the presumption that the conduct in question is in fact anticompetitive, thereby shifting the ultimate burden of proof to the defendant to show that the conduct in question is procompetitive.

Since the Actavis decision, several courts[10] have examined the application of the rule of reason to the context of reverse payment settlements. In particular, district courts in the District of Massachusetts and the Eastern District of Pennsylvania have examined the burdens held by each party at each stage of analysis.

[10] The questions of burdens and elements in a rule-of-reason analysis of reverse payment settlements have been addressed by two district courts prior to this Opinion: the Eastern District of Pennsylvania in King Drug Co. of Florence, Inc. v. Cephalon, Inc., 88 F. Supp. 3d 402 (E.D. Pa. 2015); and the District of Massachusetts in In re Nexium (Esomeprazole) Antitrust Litigation, 42 F.

First, the District of Massachusetts interpreted Actavis to apply to the examination of "large and unjustified" reverse payments. In re Nexium (Esomeprazole) Antitrust Litig., 42 F. Supp. 3d 231, 262 (D. Mass. 2014). This court's theory of burden shifting [*42] under the rule of reason is as follows. The plaintiff must first demonstrate that the settlement in question included a payment from the brand-name to the generic company, and notes that "[t]he size and scale of such a payment . . . can be an indicator of anticompetitive intent, because '[a] large payment would be an irrational act unless the patentee believed that generic production would cut into its profits.'" Id. (quoting Herbert Hovenkamp, Anticompetitive Patent Settlements and the Supreme Court's Actavis Decision, 15 Minn. J.L. Sci. & Tech. 3, 25 (2013)). If the plaintiff can make this showing, the burden shifts to the defendant to show that the payment may be justified by a procompetitive goal, such as avoided litigation costs or payment of fair value for services or goods rendered. Id. If the defendant shows a procompetitive justification for the payment, the burden shifts back to the plaintiff to show that, on balance, the settlement is anticompetitive. Id. at 262-63.

In King Drug Co. of Florence, Inc. v. Cephalon, Inc., the Eastern District of Pennsylvania laid out a slightly different interpretation of Actavis, where the plaintiff must establish in the first step of the rule-of-reason analysis that the payment in question was "large." 88 F. Supp. 3d 402, 414 (E.D. Pa. 2015). Although the court did not impose a "threshold burden" on the plaintiff [*43] to show that the reverse payment is large and unjustified, it noted that "evidence of a large payment is required for a plaintiff to satisfy its initial burden of demonstrating anticompetitive effects under the Actavis rule of reason analysis." Id. at 415. If the plaintiff can satisfy this burden, "the burden shifts to the defendant to show that the challenged conduct promotes a sufficiently procompetitive objective . . . with the defendant bearing the burden of providing evidence that the reverse payment is justified by procompetitive considerations." Id. Should the defendant satisfy this burden, the plaintiff must rebut the defendant's justifications and "raise a genuine dispute of material fact as to the defendant's justifications," after which a finder of fact will weigh the anticompetitive and procompetitive effects of the agreement. Id.

If this Court adopted the approach espoused in these opinions, to satisfy their initial burden Plaintiffs would be required to produce evidence that a large amount of consideration (monetary or otherwise) had been transferred from the brand-name company (Schering) to a generic company, and that at least a component of the settlement compensated the generic [*44] company for delaying entry onto the market. Defendants would then bear the burden to show that the payment compensated the generic company for reasonable litigation costs and other products and services, given that "[f]ailure to provide a legitimate justification results in antitrust liability." Id. at 416. This Court is concerned that any sort of requirement for Plaintiffs to establish at the outset that a settlement payment in question was "large" creates a threshold burden not delineated under the rule of reason. Furthermore, this Court notes that the Supreme Court explicitly rejected the "quick look" test, so any analysis of the legality of a reverse payment settlement must place the overall burden to prove the settlement was anticompetitive onto Plaintiffs, and furthermore must put the initial burden of proof to establish a prima facie case in the first step of the rule-of-reason analysis onto Plaintiffs as well. Thus, the burden must be on Plaintiffs to show that the settlement delayed the generic company's entry onto the market, that the brand-name company paid the generic company consideration of some kind, and that the consideration exchanged in the settlement exceeded the estimated cost of [*45] litigation and the costs of other services and products, in order to establish a prima facie case. Antitrust implications for a reverse payment only arise if the payment is separate from compensation for the fair market value of other products and services bargained for in the settlement, as well as the potential litigation costs that the settlement effectively saves.

This Court also believes that in most cases it is likely that the defendants will have better access to information about the value of the payments in question, including the value of products, services, and estimated litigation costs saved by the settlement. Although the plaintiff must bear the initial burden of proof to establish a prima facie case, it is logical that the defendant should bear the burden of production to present this evidence. If the defendant can show evidence on this issue, the plaintiff would then need to show that that the payment exceeded the value of litigation costs or other products or services to satisfy its overall burden in this step of the rule-of-reason analysis.

Supp. 3d 231 (D. Mass. 2014). The California Supreme Court has also addressed the burdens required in examining a reverse payment settlement case under the rule of reason in In re Cipro Cases I & II, 61 Cal. 4th 116, 187 Cal. Rptr. 3d 632, 348 P.3d 845 (Cal. 2015).

Given the above discussion, the Court finds the logic behind the burden shifting in the recent California Supreme Court decision [*46] In re Cipro Cases I & II, 61 Cal. 4th 116, 187 Cal. Rptr. 3d 632, 348 P.3d 845 (Cal. 2015)[11] compelling. The California Supreme Court summarizes their application of the rule of reason to reverse payment settlement cases as follows:

> To make out a prima facie case that a challenged agreement is an unlawful restraint of trade, a plaintiff must show the agreement contains both a limit on the generic challenger's entry into the market and compensation from the patentee to the challenger. The defendants bear the burden [of production] of coming forward with evidence of litigation costs or valuable collateral products or services that might explain the compensation; if the defendants do so, the plaintiff has the burden of demonstrating the compensation exceeds the reasonable value of these. If a prima facie case has been made out, the defendants may come forward with additional justifications to demonstrate the settlement agreement nevertheless is procompetitive. A plaintiff who can dispel these justifications has carried the burden of demonstrating the settlement agreement is an unreasonable restraint of trade . . .

Id. at 871. This Court will adopt the framework outlined above in its analysis of these motions for summary judgment.

IV. Discussion[12]

a. Motion for Summary Judgment on All Claims Related to the Schering-Upsher Settlement

Defendants have moved for summary judgment on all claims related to the Schering-Upsher settlement. The parties dispute two main points in their briefing: how burdens of proof operate under the rule of reason for each party post-Actavis, and whether Schering's payment for the Niacor license was indeed fair market value. The Court has addressed how it will apply the rule of reason in the previous Section, and will now examine whether Plaintiffs have satisfied their burden under the rule of reason sufficiently to survive summary judgment, with special focus on the factual issue of the fair market value of the Niacor license.

Plaintiffs have offered sufficient evidence such that a reasonable finder of fact could find that Plaintiffs have established a prima facie case for antitrust liability. Although Defendants have offered procompetitive justifications for the reverse payment settlement, particularly [*49] evidence that may indicate that Schering paid fair market value for the Niacor license, Plaintiffs have offered sufficient evidence such that a reasonable jury could conclude that Schering's payment to Upsher did not merely compensate Upsher for the fair market value of the Niacor license.

[11] In re Cipro Cases I & II focuses on the application of Actavis [*47] to the Cartwright Act, California's state antitrust law. The Cartwright Act and the Sherman Act are not perfectly analogous, but both statutes have implied exceptions that "validate reasonable restraints of trade" under the rule of reason. In re Cipro Cases I & II, 348 P.3d at 855 (citing Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619 (1911); People v. Bldg. Maint. Contractors' Ass'n, Inc., 41 Cal. 2d 719, 264 P.2d 31 (Cal. 1953)).

[12] Plaintiffs filed a motion to strike Sections I and II of Defendants' reply memorandum in support of the motion for summary judgment on all claims related to the Schering-ESI settlement, asserting that Defendants raised subjects in their reply brief that had not been raised in the moving papers for the motion for summary judgment [Docket Entry 848]. In particular, Plaintiffs objected to arguments related to the existence of a single conspiracy, and whether Plaintiffs could prove that Upsher's entry onto the market was delayed. Following oral argument on this motion on July 22, 2015 [Docket Entry 859], the Court permitted Plaintiffs and Defendants to submit sur-replies on the issues of whether Plaintiffs could prove a three-way conspiracy between Schering, Upsher, and ESI, and whether Plaintiffs could prove that entry of Upsher's generic K-Dur product was delayed by the alleged single conspiracy [Docket Entries 856, 858]. [*48] Considering that both parties have had the opportunity to address these arguments, the Court will deny Plaintiffs' motion to strike as moot, and will consider all briefing to decide these summary judgment motions.

1. Plaintiffs' Prima Facie Case Under Actavis

To establish a prima facie case that the Schering-Upsher settlement was an unlawful restraint of trade, Plaintiffs must first show that the agreement limited Upsher's entry into the market for generic K-Dur, and that Schering paid Upsher as a part of the settlement. Once this is done, Defendants then have the burden of production (but not the ultimate burden of proof) to show the value of litigation costs, products, or services the settlement covered. If this is done, Plaintiffs then have the burden of proof to demonstrate that the compensation exceeded the reasonable value of litigation costs, products, and/or services. As noted earlier, if a finder of fact concludes that such a prima facie case has been made out, Defendants then can show evidence to demonstrate why the agreement is nevertheless procompetitive.

The parties do not dispute that the Schering-Upsher [*50] settlement did in fact limit Upsher's entry into the K-Dur market, as Upsher agreed to an entry date of September 1, 2001. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 19; Pls. SDF Upsher ¶ 19, Docket Entry 843, Ex. 1.) Furthermore, it is undisputed that Schering paid Upsher $60 million as a term of the settlement. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 43; Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 43.) Defendants have put forth evidence that Schering's payment to Upsher paid for the license to Niacor, as well as other licenses, satisfying their burden of production on this issue. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 18, 21-51.) Plaintiffs have offered expert testimony showing that Schering's payment to Upsher exceeded the value of the Niacor license, in an attempt to discredit Defendants' evidence. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 72-149.) As outlined in more detail below, Plaintiffs' evidence on this point raises significant questions as to Defendants' justification for the value of the Schering-Upsher settlement payment. The Court concludes that there is indeed a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Schering's payment exceeded the fair value of the licenses coupled with litigation costs. Accordingly, there is sufficient evidence on this record such that a reasonable [*51] finder of fact could find that Plaintiffs have established a prima facie case for antitrust liability as to the Schering-Upsher settlement.

2. Fair Market Value of the Niacor Licensing Transaction: Justifications and Rebuttal

a. Defendants' Procompetitive Justifications for the Payment

Defendants assert that the Niacor license stands on its own merit, and that the $60 million Schering paid for Niacor was a good faith, fair market value purchase of the Niacor license. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 18, 21-51.) Defendants first offer evidence that Schering informed Upsher several times during settlement negotiations that it would not pay money to delay Upsher's entry onto the market. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 15-18.) Schering's in-house counsel stated during negotiations that it would pay Upsher in a settlement only for "business deals that stand on their own two feet." (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 20.) Schering also told Upsher that any licensing deal must be valued such that Schering would have entered into it with or without the contemporaneous settlement of litigation. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 21.)

Furthermore, Defendants offer evidence to show that Schering had a genuine interest in Niacor at the time of the [*52] Schering-Upsher settlement. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 22-25.) Schering had previously pursued an opportunity with Kos Pharmaceuticals to co-promote Niaspan, a sustained-release niacin product, in the months before the Upsher settlement. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 24-25.) The talks between Schering and Kos fell through. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 25, 40.) At the time of the Schering-Upsher settlement, Niacor was in the late stages of development and Upsher had minimized previous issues with side effects of the drug, leading to Schering's interest in the product. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 26-27.)

According to Defendants, Schering also conducted an internal review of Niacor before signing the Schering-Upsher settlement, including a commercial assessment and a review of clinical trial results. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 29-31, 34, 35, 36-38.) Schering also created a sales forecast for Niacor outside of the United States, Canada, and Mexico. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 36.) Defendants have also produced sales projections for Niaspan which they claim support Schering's sales projections for Niacor. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 37-40.) Based on the sales projections, Schering head of Global Marketing Thomas Lauda testified that [*53] he believed that overseas rights to Niacor were "well worth" $60-70 million. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 42.)

Finally, Defendants offer evidence that Schering's Board of Directors reviewed the proposed Niacor deal prior to signing the Schering-Upsher agreement, using the same standard corporate finance model used for all license deals it reviewed. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 44.) This model gave the present economic value[13] of the Niacor license at $225-265 million. (Id.) Furthermore, the Board of Directors were instructed to approve the Niacor license only if the deal could stand on its own merits, independent of the settlement of the K-Dur litigation. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶¶ 45-46.) The Board of Directors reviewed the sales projections and commercial assessment conducted by Schering employees on Niacor, prior to approving the Schering-Upsher settlement. (Defs.' SUF Upsher ¶ 45.)

Defendants have offered evidence that could persuade a reasonable jury that Schering paid fair market value for Niacor, [*54] and that the payment at issue in the Schering-Upsher settlement did not compensate Upsher for delaying its market entry.

b. Plaintiffs' Rebuttal of Defendants' Procompetitive Justifications for the Payment

Plaintiffs, however, have offered evidence that counters Defendants' claims and that raises a genuine dispute of material fact that the reverse payment in the Schering-Upsher settlement was not merely compensation for the Niacor license.

First, Plaintiffs offer evidence that the Schering-Upsher agreement lacked terms that would typically be present in a pharmaceutical licensing agreement, including terms the in-house Schering lawyer who drafted the Schering-Upsher agreement recommends that pharmaceutical license agreements include. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 84.) These terms include: the communication infrastructure for drug development; parties responsible for additional development work; parties responsible for regulatory filings; whether the licensee will gain access to the licensor's "know-how" as part of the license agreement; parties responsible for reporting adverse events and pharmacovigilance; whether audit rights for royalties are part of the bargain; duration of rights and obligations; [*55] publicity and publication for the licensed drug; regulatory issues in foreign countries, if related to the license; and any needed representations and warranties. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 84, 87.) Plaintiffs also cite the testimony of Schering head of Global Marketing Thomas Lauda on this point, who stated that, when reviewing a licensing agreement, he looks for the term (or duration) of the agreement, Schering's rights and obligations under the agreement, dispute resolution terms, termination provisions, the respective obligations of the licensing partners, identification of the party responsible for regulatory approvals, and a provision requiring the other party to exercise reasonable diligence in filing an NDA if the licensor is to provide regulatory data. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 85.) The record contains several samples of other licensing agreements to which Schering was a party. These agreements include provisions on the license's term, the obligations of the parties to commercialize the drug, respective responsibilities for research and development, and how adverse events should be reported. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 86.) Plaintiffs note that none of the provisions listed above appear in the [*56] Schering-Upsher agreement. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 87.) Plaintiffs support this observation with expert testimony stating that the Schering-Upsher agreement was missing "critical" terms, including the term of the agreement, the diligence obligations of the parties, and indemnification provisions. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 89.) The expert noted that, under this agreement, Schering was obligated to pay a large part of the bargained-for consideration upfront, whether or not the parties executed a subsequent agreement or Schering developed the Niacor product. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 88.)

Second, Plaintiffs provide evidence to show the types of due diligence a company interested in purchasing a drug license will typically conduct before the license agreement is executed. Plaintiffs also offer evidence that may indicate Schering did not conduct its typical diligence on the Niacor license. According to Schering's employees, at the time of the Schering-Upsher settlement, typically Schering reviewed the following aspects of a potential product before signing a licensing agreement: (1) the science behind the product, including necessary additional research and development; (2) the regulatory status of the [*57] product; (3) the manufacturing and supply issues; (4) the intellectual property rights and potential infringement risks; and (5) the commercial potential of the product. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 92-94.) Typically a large number of employees worked on these reviews. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 94-95.) On some drugs, Schering took over a year to conduct due diligence. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 96.) But only a single employee of Schering conducted due diligence on Niacor, over the time period of two days. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 97.) This review only examined the commercial prospects of Niacor, and did not examine potential regulatory, intellectual property, or manufacturing issues. (Id.) Furthermore, Schering's reviewing employee did not independently verify any of the information in the package he received on Niacor, unlike when he attempted to verify facts during his due diligence examination of Niaspan. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 99-100.) Plaintiffs contend that Defendants' expert, who finalized licenses for twenty products while working at Bristol Myers Squibb, never conducted such an abbreviated due diligence process as the process Schering conducted for Niacor. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 102-03.)

[13] This figure represented the net present value of the expected revenue stream for Niacor over the product's expected lifetime, after subtracting the royalties Schering would pay to Upsher. (Defs' SUF Upsher ¶ 44.)

Plaintiffs offer [*58] expert testimony that, typically, parties begin to commercialize a licensed drug soon after signing a licensing agreement, but that Schering did not move to commercialize Niacor with immediacy. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 104-07.) Plaintiff's expert stated that, following execution of a licensing agreement, typically a licensee will appoint responsible personnel, form joint committees to oversee product development, exchange relevant legal, scientific, development, and regulatory materials, and start communicating frequently in an effort to develop and market the product. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 104.) In contrast, in the days following the signing of the Schering-Upsher agreement, Schering's Global Marketing group was assigned to be responsible for international registration and marketing of Niacor, and the employee who conducted due diligence on Niacor was appointed to manage these efforts. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 105.) Schering made a few requests for information from Upsher, but Plaintiffs assert that no substantive information was exchanged. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 107.)

Plaintiffs also declare that multiple contemporary valuations of Niacor indicate that Schering overpaid for the Niacor license in [*59] its agreement with Upsher. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 109-14.) Plaintiffs offer comparative evidence of several licensing deals for sustained-release niacin products, none of which approach $60 million in value. (Id.)

Additionally, Plaintiffs assert that Schering failed to acknowledge substantial risks with the Niacor licensing deal in its evaluation process. First, the $60 million payment Schering made to Upsher was, at the time, Schering's largest upfront non-contingent payment ever for a license, despite the fact that the FDA had not granted Niacor marketing approval at the time of the payment. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 115-16.) Furthermore, Niacor was not expected to be a blockbuster drug with huge sales. (Id.) The Board of Directors did not discuss these issues or other potential risks for licensing Niacor in their evaluation of the settlement, despite the fact that a Schering subsidiary employee had identified significant downsides to licensing Niaspan.[14] (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 117-22.)

Plaintiffs also challenge Defendants' evidence on the economic value of the Niacor deal, asserting that the value of the license was significantly lower than the $60 million Schering paid Upsher. Plaintiffs offer expert quantitative analysis on this issue using three valuation methods. First, using the 25 percent rule, under which in general a licensor would expect to receive about 25 percent of the pretax profits from a licensed product, Plaintiffs' expert asserted that the $60 million payment far exceeded 25 percent of the pretax profits from expected Niacor sales. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 138.) The expert noted that the other payments outlined in the Schering-Upsher agreement for Niacor approximated 25 percent of pretax profits expected for Niacor. (Id.) Second, in a comparable transactions analysis, Plaintiffs' expert compared the licensing agreement [*61] for Niacor to other Schering license agreements and other sustained-release niacin licensing agreements, and found that the value of Niacor approximated the $10 million in milestones and the 10 to 15 percent royalties outlined in the Schering-Upsher agreement. (Pls.' SDF

[14] Furthermore, the sales forecast for Niaspan in the United States may not have been analogous to the sales forecast for Niacor in Europe, given Niaspan's likely position as first mover on the market. (Pls.' SDF [*60] Upsher ¶ 123.) Europe also may not have been as receptive to niacin products as the United States was at the time, given that European doctors had access to fibrate products with the same characteristics as niacin, while American doctors did not since these drugs had not been approved for marketing in the United States. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 124.)

Upsher ¶ 139.) Plaintiffs' expert found that these comparable agreements could not explain the $60 million upfront payment. (Id.) Third, Plaintiffs' expert conducted a net present value analysis, which indicated that Niacor was not worth the $60 million Schering paid Upsher. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶¶ 142-43.) The expert also testified that the Schering sales forecast was predicated on faulty assumptions, including the unlikely prospect that Niacor could be approved for sale in Europe in only one year, and that Niacor would be the only sustained-release niacin product on the market. (Pls.' SDF Upsher ¶ 140.) Plaintiffs' expert also noted that Niaspan was likely a superior product to Niacor in terms of safety, efficacy, and dosing issues, and that Niaspan could be used in conjunction with statin drugs while Niacor could not. (Id.)

The parties devote much of their efforts to discussing the implications of prior proceedings [*62] against Schering and Upsher before the FTC and the Eleventh Circuit. In the Matter of Schering-Plough Corp., No. 9297, Initial Decision, 136 F.T.C. 956, 1092 (2002); In the Matter of Schering-Plough Corp., Final Order, 136 F.T.C. 956, 1003-04 (2003); Schering-Plough Corp. v. FTC, 402 F.3d 1056 (11th Cir. 2005). Those proceedings were before another adjudicative body with different parties and a different factual record. These prior proceedings will not be considered by this Court, since it necessarily can only consider the factual record before it.

While Defendants challenge the reliability and method of Plaintiffs' experts, nevertheless Plaintiffs have put this material on the record. Although Defendants may be able to successfully impeach the expert opinions and evidence Plaintiffs have presented, Plaintiffs' evidence is sufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact on the question of the fair market value of the Niacor license. A reasonable jury could conclude that the payment in the Schering-Upsher settlement was aimed, at least in part, to delay entry of Upsher's generic K-Dur product, not to compensate Upsher for the Niacor license. "In the event a genuinely disputed issue of fact exists regarding the reasonableness of the restraint, the determination is for the jury," given that the jury is ultimately responsible for balancing the procompetitive justifications [*63] and anticompetitive rebuttals presented by the parties under the rule of reason. In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d 300, 316 n.12 (3d Cir. 2010). For these reasons, Defendants' motion for summary judgment on all claims related to the Schering-Upsher settlement is denied.

b. Motion for Summary Judgment on All Claims Related to The Schering-ESI Settlement

Defendants have also moved for summary judgment on all claims related to the Schering-ESI settlement. On this motion, the parties primarily dispute whether Schering, Upsher, and ESI formed a single conspiracy covering all actions related to K-Dur. Plaintiffs have conceded that the Schering-ESI settlement did not cause direct competitive market harm, given that "[Plaintiffs] do not intend to prove at trial that ESI was actually delayed." (7/22/15 Hrg. Tr. at 57) [Docket Entry 859]. Rather, "[Plaintiffs] intend to prove at trial that there was a violation [of antitrust law] by means of the ESI settlement which was part of the overall conspiracy that [Plaintiffs] allege." (Id.) This scenario, according to Plaintiffs, would impute civil liability onto ESI for the actions of all parties to the alleged single conspiracy (Schering, Upsher, and ESI). Defendants assert that, on this record, there is no evidence [*64] of a three-party conspiracy, given that Upsher and ESI settled separately with Schering on very different terms.

i. Legal Standard

1. Antitrust Conspiracy under The Sherman Act

To prevail on a Section 1 conspiracy claim under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, the plaintiff must prove the existence of a single agreement that unreasonably restrains trade, whether tacit or express. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 553, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "The existence of an agreement is the hallmark of a Section 1 claim. Liability is necessarily based on some form of concerted action."[15] In re Baby Food Antitrust Litig., 166 F.3d 112, 117 (3d Cir. 1999) (citation omitted); see also Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d at 315.

The plaintiff may prove the existence of a single agreement by either direct or circumstantial evidence. Direct evidence "is explicit and requires no inferences to establish the proposition or conclusion being asserted." InterVest, Inc. v. Bloomberg, L.P., 340 F.3d 144, 159 (3d Cir. 2003) (quoting In re Baby Food Antitrust Litig., 166 F.3d at 118). In the absence of direct evidence of an actual agreement or conspiracy to restrain trade, finders of fact typically use proof by inferences, drawn from circumstantial evidence, to establish a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Id. The use of circumstantial evidence [*65] can be problematic, as finders of fact may draw incorrect inferences based on the evidence before them, and thus mistake legitimate competition for unlawful cooperation. "[M]istaken inferences in [antitrust] cases . . . are especially costly, because they chill the very conduct the antitrust laws were designed to protect"—procompetitive conduct. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 594, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). Given this legitimate concern, the Supreme Court has found that "antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences [that may be drawn] from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case." Id. at 588. To survive summary judgment, "[t]here must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the [alleged conspirators] were acting independently." Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984). Put another way, if conduct can be explained in an equally plausible manner by an illegal conspiracy or by permissible competition, the finder of fact is not permitted to draw an inference of conspiracy. Id.

2. Numbers and Types of Conspiracies

In United States v. Kelly, the Third Circuit adopted a three-step test to determine whether a set of events comprises a single conspiracy or separate, unrelated conspiracies. 892 F.2d 255, 259 (3d Cir. 1989) (citing United States v. DeVarona, 872 F.2d 114 (5th Cir. 1989)). The court first determines whether there was a common goal among the conspirators. Id. Second, the court [*66] examines the nature of the scheme to find whether the agreement sought to create a result that would require the "continuous cooperation of the conspirators." Id. (quoting DeVarona, 872 F.2d at 119). Finally, the court examines the level to which participants overlap in the various dealings. Id. "[T]he government need not prove that each defendant knew all the details, goals, or other participants in order to find a single conspiracy." Id. at 260 (quotation omitted). "The absence of one [Kelly] factor does not necessarily defeat an inference of the existence of a single conspiracy." United States v. Padilla, 982 F.2d 110, 115 (3d Cir. 1992). Furthermore, "courts treat civil and criminal conspiracy alike—apart of course from standard of proof and other respects in which civil and criminal procedure differ—so that the abundant precedents on the meaning of criminal conspiracy are available for use in the civil context." Hartford Accident & Indem. Co. v. Sullivan, 846 F.2d 377, 383 (7th Cir. 1988); see also Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 227, 59 S. Ct. 467, 83 L. Ed. 610 (1939) (citing United States v. Schenck, 253 F. 212, 213 (E.D. Pa. 1918), aff'd, 249 U.S. 47, 39 S. Ct. 247, 63 L. Ed. 470, 17 Ohio L. Rep. 26, 17 Ohio L. Rep. 149 (1919) (Espionage Act) and Levey v. United States, 92 F.2d 688, 691 (9th Cir. 1937), cert. denied, 303 U.S. 639, 58 S. Ct. 609, 82 L. Ed. 1099 (1938) (mail fraud) as examples of situation where a conspiracy may be formed in a civil context).

Conspiracies are often described as taking one of two forms: a "chain" conspiracy, where conspirators act separately and successively; or a "wheel" or "hub-and-spoke" conspiracy, where a central figure (the "hub") [*67] interacts separately with peripheral parties (the "spokes") in furtherance of a single, illegal enterprise. In a hub-and-spoke conspiracy, each peripheral party "spoke" is a member of the conspiracy, even though these parties may not directly interact with each other. For a single conspiracy to exist, the parties serving as spokes must have been aware of the existence of other spokes, and each spoke must have done something in furtherance of a single, illegal endeavor. Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 755, 66 S. Ct. 1239, 90 L. Ed. 1557 (1946); see also

[15] The Third Circuit has noted that the term "concerted action" is generally used as shorthand to refer to any activity meeting the "contract, combination or conspiracy" element for Section 1 liability. In re Baby Food Antitrust Litig., 166 F.3d at 117 n.3.

Blumenthal v. United States, 332 U.S. 539, 556-57, 68 S. Ct. 248, 92 L. Ed. 154 (1947); United States v. Castro, 776 F.2d 1118, 1124 n.4 (3d Cir. 1985). The Supreme Court explained in Kotteakos that the existence of a single party common to several conspiracies does not necessarily establish that a single conspiracy existed between all parties in the criminal context. 328 U.S. at 755. For a single conspiracy to exist, a "rim" must connect the spokes, and typically a rim takes the form of connecting agreements between the spokes. Total Benefits Planning Agency, Inc. v. Anthem Blue Cross & Blue Shield, 552 F.3d 430, 435 n.3 (6th Cir. 2008); see also Dickson v. Microsoft Corp., 309 F.3d 193, 203 (4th Cir. 2002) ("A rimless wheel conspiracy is one in which various defendants enter into separate agreements with a common defendant, but where the defendants have no connection with one another, other than the common defendant's involvement in each transaction.") (citing Kotteakos, 328 U.S. at 755). But "[i]t is elementary that an unlawful conspiracy may be and often is formed [*68] without simultaneous action or agreement on the part of the conspirators." Interstate Circuit, 306 U.S. at 227. Moreover, a party seeking to prove a conspiracy "need not prove that each defendant knew all of the conspiracy's details, goals, or other participants." United States v. Gibbs, 190 F.3d 188, 197 (3d Cir. 1999).

The Third Circuit opinion in United States v. Kemp emphasized that "there must be overlap among the spokes, not just between the hub and the various spokes," to find a single hub-and-spoke conspiracy on a given set of facts. 500 F.3d 257, 291 (3d Cir. 2007). In determining whether the facts support a single or multiple conspiracies, "the inquiry must focus . . . on the character of the agreement between the spokes." Id. Likewise, "[i]n all hub-and-spoke conspiracies, the horizontal agreement among the spokes supports the [vertical] agreements between the hub and each spoke, and vice versa." In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d at 347.

ii. Analysis

At the summary judgment stage, the movant is the party without the burden of proof at trial. Therefore, the Court must determine whether there is sufficient evidence on the question of whether Schering, Upsher, and ESI formed a single conspiracy such that the question should go to the jury.

Plaintiffs envision a single hub-and-spoke conspiracy, with Schering as the hub and with Upsher and ESI [*69] as spokes due to their respective settlements with Schering, working together to eliminate generic competition for K-Dur. In Plaintiffs' scenario, ESI would be civilly liable for all of the conspiracy's actions, including any competitive harm caused by the conspiracy's actions to delay Upsher's entry onto the market. Plaintiffs characterize Schering's payment to ESI as inducement to convince ESI to join the conspiracy with Schering and Upsher.

Conversely, Defendants assert that there is no evidence of a single three-party conspiracy on this record, given that Schering and Upsher settled their patent litigation without the involvement of ESI, and that Schering and ESI settled their patent litigation without the involvement of Upsher. According to Defendants, ESI should not be civilly liable for the Schering-Upsher settlement, because ESI knew nothing about the legality of the Schering-Upsher agreement—which hinges on whether Schering paid fair market value for the Niacor license. Under Kotteakos and Kemp, Defendants argue that because alleged spokes Upsher and ESI were not part of each other's settlement agreements, the evidence before this Court does not indicate any agreement between [*70] the spokes. Given the lack of evidence on the record that ESI would have actually won the litigation, Defendants also dispute that ESI could have entered the market with a generic version of K-Dur after winning a ruling of non-infringement in the ongoing patent case.

i. Direct Evidence of a Single Conspiracy

For this Court to treat the evidence Plaintiffs have offered as direct evidence of a single conspiracy between Schering, Upsher, and ESI, a reasonable finder of fact must be able to use the evidence to find a conspiracy with no further extrapolation. In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d at 324 n.23. If, based on the evidence presented, a finder of fact must make an additional logical step to conclude that a conspiracy occurred, the evidence is circumstantial, not direct. Id. Courts have found evidence such as a "document or conversation explicitly manifesting the existence of the agreement in question" to be direct evidence. Id.; see also Monsanto, 465

U.S. at 765 (finding that supplier's advice to distributors that they would be terminated if suggested price levels were not maintained was direct evidence); InterVest, 340 F.3d at 162-63 (listing examples of direct evidence, including "a direct threat to the plaintiff from a competitor that if he went into business his competitors [*71] would do anything they could to stop him[;]. . . a memorandum . . . detailing the discussions from a meeting of a group of alleged conspirators," and "a public resolution by a professional association recommending that its members withdraw their affiliation with an insurer" (internal quotations omitted)).

Plaintiffs have offered several types of evidence intended to directly demonstrate a conspiracy between Schering, Upsher, and ESI. Plaintiffs first offer evidence intended to show that ESI knew that Schering and Upsher had entered into an unlawful settlement. During the Schering-ESI patent litigation, ESI filed a motion to compel the production of a copy of the Schering-Upsher agreement, and in that motion stated that the Schering-Upsher agreement "may have been crafted collusively with anticompetitive purpose, and [the agreement was] therefore reasonably calculated to be admissible evidence of patent misuse or an antitrust violation." (Pls.' SDF ESI ¶ 28.) Plaintiffs also assert that Schering and ESI exchanged market forecasts predicting the potential impact of multiple versions of K-Dur on Schering, Upsher, and ESI. (Pls.' SDF ESI ¶ 24.) Finally, Plaintiffs argue that the Defendants [*72] all had similar motives to cooperate—allegedly, all parties sought to share Schering's monopoly profits through blocking the entry of generic competitors onto the K-Dur market. (Pls.' Sur-Reply Br. at 3, 9-10.)

The Court finds that none of the evidence offered by Plaintiffs is direct evidence of a single conspiracy, because it does not establish on its own any concerted action between Schering, Upsher, and ESI. Proving a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act requires that the parties have unlawfully agreed, not simply that the parties had the opportunity to conspire or that competitors may be aware of similar conduct by other parties. In re Insurance Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d at 349-50. Plaintiffs do not offer a "smoking gun" to show that Defendants directly colluded, and the evidence Plaintiffs have offered is not similar to the examples of direct evidence listed above. Plaintiffs have offered no direct evidence, such as a conversation or document, that ESI and Upsher agreed amongst themselves to collude in this market, much less that all parties agreed to collude in the K-Dur market. Instead, Plaintiffs have provided evidence of agreements between Schering and Upsher (Docket Entry 843-1), and between Schering and ESI (Docket Entry 843-52). [*73] These agreements do not have similar structures or terms, as the parties agreed on different market entry dates, for different types of consideration. (Id.) A reasonable finder of fact would need to make inferences to conclude that these agreements indicated a single conspiracy between the parties. Thus, Plaintiffs have not provided direct evidence sufficient for a reasonable finder of fact to find a single conspiracy.

ii. Circumstantial Evidence of a Single Conspiracy

Plaintiffs urge the Court to find that the record has sufficient circumstantial evidence such that a reasonable jury could find, under the three-part test outlined in Kelly, that Schering, Upsher, and ESI entered into a single conspiracy to delay the entry of generic K-Dur.[16] Under Plaintiffs' theory, the conspirators shared the common goals of delaying generic competition for K-Dur, and sharing the financial benefits of such delay. Allegedly, the Schering-ESI settlement was one part of a larger scheme to prevent generic K-Dur from entering the market, which required Schering to eliminate all other threats to its monopoly by cooperating with all potential generic challengers. Plaintiffs base their assertions on an intricate [*74] analysis of the FDA's enforcement of the Hatch-Waxman Act's exclusivity provisions at the time of the Schering-ESI settlement, which is examined in detail below. Finally, [16] Plaintiffs offer two theories as to how ESI participated in the overall conspiracy: either ESI formed a conspiracy with Schering and Upsher, presumably at the time of the Schering-ESI agreement; or ESI joined the Schering-Upsher conspiracy already in existence at the time of the Schering-ESI agreement. It is established Third Circuit law that a party who did not participate in the formation of a conspiracy "may nevertheless join belatedly and become responsible for the actions that antedated his arrival should he knowingly 'co-operate in the common effort to obtain the unlawful results.'" United States v. Vasquez-Uribe, 426 F. App'x 131, 135 (3d Cir. 2011) (quoting United States v. Lester, 282 F.2d 750, 753 (3d Cir. 1960)). How ESI allegedly entered the single conspiracy is not outcome determinative on these facts. The Court finds that the issues of interdependence and overlap are the key issues in this analysis, and the analysis provided herein would apply in either scenario.

---

Plaintiffs assert that there is overlap as to the parties involved in the alleged sub-conspiracies since Schering is a party to both conspiracies.

The Court finds that [*75] there is not sufficient circumstantial evidence presented here to persuade a reasonable jury that Schering, Upsher, and ESI had a common goal, sought to maintain the continuous operation of the single conspiracy, or that the parties overlap sufficiently to support an inference of a single conspiracy. In particular, Plaintiffs have failed to offer sufficient evidence of the interdependence of the Schering-Upsher and Schering-ESI settlements to support the finding of an inference of conspiracy by a reasonable finder of fact.

a. Interdependence of Alleged Conspiracies

As noted above, Plaintiffs allege that Schering, Upsher, and ESI shared the same goals: (1) delaying generic competition; and (2) sharing the financial benefits of delay, presumably through Schering's distribution of monopoly profits in settlement payments to generic companies. It is not sufficient that Plaintiffs demonstrate that Schering, Upsher, and ESI had the same goal, however. To demonstrate a single conspiracy under Kelly, Plaintiffs must demonstrate that the parties had a common goal. 892 F.2d at 259. Furthermore, Plaintiffs allege that, in order to prevent generic competition for K-Dur, Schering, Upsher, and ESI had to work together [*76] and continuously. To demonstrate both of these elements, Plaintiffs must provide evidence tending to show that the settlements were interdependent in nature. To evaluate interdependence, the court engages in an inquiry focused on "the extent to which the success or failure of one conspiracy is independent of a corresponding success or failure by the other." United States v. Macchia, 35 F.3d 662, 671 (2d Cir. 1994); see also Kemp, 500 F.3d at 289 ("In evaluating interdependence, we consider how helpful one individual's contribution is to another's goals.").

Plaintiffs propose the following theory of motivation for Schering, Upsher, and ESI to conspire in an interdependent fashion. Plaintiffs contend that, at the time of the Schering-ESI settlement, ESI posed a competitive threat to Schering's monopoly on the K-Dur market given that under the FDA's successful defense requirement,[17] ANDA first-filer Upsher was not entitled to 180 days of marketing exclusivity. Upsher thus could not use its exclusivity period to block ESI's entry onto the market, and had it won its patent litigation with Schering, ESI could have entered the market immediately. After the FDA stopped enforcing the successful defense requirement in June 1998, Plaintiffs assert that ESI could have triggered [*77] [18] Upsher's newly-instated exclusivity period by winning its [17] When Schering and ESI entered into their settlement on January 23, 1998, the FDA actively enforced a Final Rule implementing patent and marketing exclusivity provisions of the Hatch-Waxman Act known as the "successful defense requirement." 21 C.F.R. § 314.107(c)(1); Abbreviated New Drug Applications, 59 Fed. Reg. 50338, 50367 (Oct. 3, 1994). Under this requirement, a first-filer ANDA applicant using a Paragraph IV certification was not entitled to receive the statutory 180-day [*78] exclusivity period unless it had successfully defended a patent infringement suit. Id. Litigants challenged these requirements, and the District of the District of Columbia ruled in Inwood Laboratories, Inc. v. Young, 723 F. Supp. 1523 (D.D.C. 1989), vacated as moot, 43 F.3d 712, 310 U.S. App. D.C. 61 (D.C. Cir. 1989), and Mova Pharmaceutical Corp. v. Shalala, 955 F. Supp. 128 (D.D.C. 1997), that the 180-day marketing exclusivity period should be granted to the first ANDA applicant who files a Paragraph IV certification for a specific generic drug, whether or not the applicant is sued subsequently for patent infringement. Conversely, the Eastern District of North Carolina ordered the FDA to enforce the successful defense requirement in its decision in Granutec, Inc. v. Shalala, No. 5:97-cv-485, 1997 WL 1403894 (E.D.N.C. July 3, 1997). In response to these decisions, the FDA published a policy clarification on November 28, 1997 that reiterated its intent to continue its enforcement of the successful defense requirement, at least until appeals in the 1997 cases had been completed. FDA, Policy on 180-Day Marketing Exclusivity for Drugs Marketed Under Abbreviated New Drug Applications; Clarification (Nov. 28, 1997). Following the decisions from Courts of Appeal in Mova Pharmaceutical Corp. v. Shalala, 140 F.3d 1060, 329 U.S. App. D.C. 341 (D.C. Cir. 1998) and Granutec, Inc. v. Shalala, 139 F.3d 889 (4th Cir. 1998) (unpublished opinion) that both overturned the successful defense requirement, the FDA expressed its intent to no longer enforce the requirement [*79] as of June 1998. HHS Center for Drug Evaluation and Research (CDER), Guidance for Industry: 180-Day Generic Drug Exclusivity under the Hatch-Waxman Amendments to the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (June 1998).

[18] As noted above, a first-filer ANDA applicant may receive 180 days of exclusivity upon the earlier of the first commercial marketing of the first-filer's generic drug under its ANDA, or a court decision of patent invalidity or non-infringement, which patent litigation against Schering, even before Upsher had the right to enter the market per its agreement with Schering. Under this scenario, ESI could have entered the market as a competitor to Schering after Upsher's exclusivity expired. According to Plaintiffs, Schering's payment to ESI eliminated the threat that ESI would enter the market before January 2004, which benefitted both Schering and Upsher. Schering's payment also prevented ESI from triggering Upsher's exclusivity period before Upsher could enter the market in September 2001, and so gave Upsher a reason to collude with ESI. Plaintiffs further assert that Schering provided ESI incentive to collude with the overall conspiracy through the cash payment included in the Schering-ESI settlement.

To find a single conspiracy, a rim must have connected the spokes Upsher and ESI, as a single conspiracy can only be found where "the evidence clearly indicated that the defendants would not have undertaken their common action without reasonable assurances that all would act in concert." In re Insurance Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d at 332. In essence, the transactions must have been contingent on each other to establish interdependence. Kemp, 500 F.3d at 291. Plaintiffs bear the burden to offer evidence tending [*80] to indicate that the spokes of the alleged single conspiracy made some kind of agreement, whether explicit or tacit.

The Court finds that Plaintiffs have not put sufficient evidence onto the record to support their theory, such that a reasonable finder of fact could conclude that the Schering-Upsher and Schering-ESI deals were interdependent. Plaintiffs assert that the settlements were interdependent because Schering had to settle with both Upsher and ESI to guarantee that it would be free of generic competition until Upsher entered the market in September 2001. This theory indicates a possible motivation for Schering to collude with Upsher and with ESI, as Schering's success in the K-Dur market may have depended on the agreements it made with Upsher and ESI. Theories about one party's motivations in entering into a settlement are not evidence of a conspiracy, however, particularly on these facts where the Court's inquiry must necessarily focus on the evidence related to the interdependence or horizontal agreement between alleged spokes Upsher and ESI. Likewise, awareness of a competitor's actions is not enough to create an inference of a conspiracy. See In re Insurance Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d at 349-50. For ESI in particular, its [*81] awareness that Schering and Upsher had settled their patent litigation, even on potentially anticompetitive terms, does not establish a single conspiracy. Plaintiffs point to no other evidence that would indicate ESI's motive in settling with Schering somehow involved an interest in entering into a single, overall conspiracy.

Moreover, the evidence before this Court does not suggest that Upsher and ESI in any way interfered with the other party's settlement with Schering. Upsher and ESI structured different deals with Schering, supporting an inference that their goals in settling their respective patent litigations were not interdependent.[19] The plain language of the "triggers" the start of the exclusivity period. A court decision triggering the exclusivity period need not involve the first-filing ANDA applicant, however. A subsequent ANDA filer may obtain a ruling of invalidity or non-infringement, and that ruling triggers the first-filer ANDA applicant's exclusivity period. Minn. Mining & Mfg. Co. (3M) v. Barr Labs., Inc., 139 F. Supp. 2d 1109 (D. Minn. 2001), aff'd, 289 F.3d 775 (Fed. Cir. 2002).

[19] The Court notes that two recent district court decisions have examined whether a single conspiracy existed with a brand-name pharmaceutical company who entered into basically the same settlement agreement, including a reverse payment, with several generic companies. King Drug Co. of Florence v. Cephalon, Inc., No. 06-1797, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84818, 2014 WL 2813312 (E.D. Pa. June 23, 2014); In re Nexium (Esomeprazole) Antitrust Litig., 42 F. Supp. 3d 231 (D. Mass. 2014). In the settlement agreements, each generic company agreed to enter the market on the same date, with a contingent launch provision. The court in King Drug Co. granted summary judgment on the issue of a single conspiracy between the brand-name and generic manufacturers. *No. 06-1797, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84818, 2014 WL 2813312, at 14 (E.D. Pa. June 23, 2014). Conversely, the court in In re Nexium denied summary judgment on the issue of a single conspiracy. 42 F. Supp. 3d at 258. Both courts compared their fact pattern to two hub-and-spoke conspiracy cases in which the hub made the same agreement with a series of spokes: Interstate Circuit, 306 U.S. at 215-16, and Toys "R" Us, Inc. v. FTC, 221 F.3d 928, 930, 935-36 (7th Cir. 2000). These cases relied on findings of interdependence and the presence [*83] of "plus factors," predominantly an assessment of each spoke's economic interest, to establish that the parties tacitly cooperated. See Interstate Circuit, 306 U.S. at 222; Toys "R" Us, 221 F.3d at 936. In re Nexium, King Drug Co., Interstate Circuit, and Toys "R" Us are all distinguishable from the instant case, because all of the alleged spokes in those cases made the same vertical agreement with their respective hub, at or around the same time. But the Schering-Upsher and Schering-ESI settlements differ in their material terms. Schering's settlement with Upsher set a different generic entry date from the Schering-ESI settlement, and the generic companies did not receive the same settlements at issue in this case does indicate that both Upsher and ESI sought market entry prior to patent expiration, and that a term of ending patent litigation against Schering was a cash payment. But Upsher and ESI negotiated with Schering for different settlement dates, and arranged different payment amounts and schedules. Furthermore, Plaintiffs have offered no evidence that Upsher acted with the involvement of ESI in settling with Schering. Upsher also had no knowledge at the time of the Upsher-Schering settlement [*82] that ESI eventually would settle with Schering. Upsher knew ESI and Schering were engaged in patent litigation at the time of its settlement with Schering, and that, if ESI won that litigation before Upsher's settlement entry date of September 1, 2001, that ESI would be able to enter the market before Upsher. (Docket Entry 843-1.)

Plaintiffs likewise have not offered sufficient evidence to show that ESI's settlement with Schering was dependent on Upsher or the Schering-Upsher settlement. In fact, Upsher's settlement likely did not affect ESI's ability to enter the market in January 1998. At the [*84] time of the Schering-ESI settlement, Upsher had not satisfied the successful defense requirement, because it settled with Schering in June 1997 rather than successfully defending Schering's patent suit.[20] Under the successful defense requirement, the first generic to file an ANDA with a Paragraph IV certification could not receive the 180-day exclusivity period unless it successfully defended a patent infringement suit. 21 C.F.R. § 314.107(c)(1); Abbreviated New Drug Applications, 59 Fed. Reg. 50338, 50367 (Oct. 3, 1994). Accordingly, Upsher arguably could not have used its exclusivity right to block ESI's entry into the market in January 1998, and therefore ESI could not have triggered Upsher's 180 days of exclusivity by winning its patent litigation at this time. ESI could have reached the market earlier if it had won its patent litigation with Schering, given these facts. But none of this evidence suggests that Upsher and ESI had motives to collude with each other. In fact, if ESI had been able to trigger Upsher's exclusivity period, Upsher may have had an incentive to collude with ESI to protect its exclusivity right. But Upsher faced no such threat from ESI. Plaintiffs' arguments about ESI's potential behavior if it had chosen to continue litigation against Schering after the [*85] demise of the successful defense requirement in June 1998 are pure speculation, not supported by the evidence before this Court, and will not be entertained.

In light of the reasoning above, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have not established that a rim existed between spokes Upsher and ESI. There is a dearth of evidence on which a reasonable jury could conclude that the Schering-Upsher and Schering-ESI agreements were interdependent, as would be required to support an inference of a single conspiracy between Schering, Upsher, and ESI. Given that Plaintiffs must show that it is more likely than not that a single conspiracy was formed, Plaintiffs have not made the requisite evidentiary showing on the issue of interdependence to support such a claim.

b. Overlap of Alleged Conspirators consideration for their agreements. (Docket Entry 843, Ex. 1; Docket Entry 843-52.) Unlike in the cases referenced above, the parties in this case did not settle in a near-contemporaneous fashion: Schering settled with Upsher in June 1997, while Schering settled with ESI in January 1998. (Id.)

[20] *See, e.g., In re K-Dur Antitrust Litig., No. 1-1652, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 126249, 2009 WL 508869, at 24 (D.N.J. Feb. 6, 2009) (noting that the agreements in this case did not manipulate the 180-day exclusivity period to create a "bottleneck" blocking the entry of other generic companies onto the market, as Upsher could have transferred or relinquished its exclusivity right, and furthermore that because the successful defense requirement existed when Schering and Upsher settled, "Upsher arguably was not entitled to the exclusivity period."); see also In re Tamoxifen Citrate Antitrust Litig., 277 F. Supp. 2d 121 (E.D.N.Y. 2003), aff'd, 466 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 2006) (as amended), abrogated by FTC v. Actavis, Inc., 133 S. Ct. 2223, 186 L. Ed. 2d 343 (2013). In 1985, generic manufacturer Barr filed the first ANDA with a Paragraph IV notice for tamoxifen, a treatment for breast cancer. 277 F. Supp. 2d at 124-25. Brand-name manufacturer Zeneca and Barr settled the ensuing patent litigation in 1993. Id. Subsequently, several other generic manufacturers filed ANDAs for tamoxifen in 1994 and 1996. Id. at 126-27. While the suits related to these subsequent ANDAs were pending in district court, the FDA stopped enforcing the successful defense requirement. 466 F.3d at 195. The Second Circuit noted that the successful defense requirement [*86] "would have excluded Barr from benefitting from the exclusivity period," given that it settled with Zeneca. Id. In June 1998, after the FDA removed the successful defense requirement, Barr attempted to block final FDA approval of other generic versions of tamoxifen by asserting its rights to the 180-day exclusivity period. Id.

Furthermore, Plaintiffs' view of what constitutes sufficient overlap between the parties under Kelly does not comport with established Third Circuit case law regarding hub-and-spoke conspiracies. Plaintiffs assert that they have satisfied [*87] the third element of the Kelly test by noting that Schering, the alleged hub in the overall hub-and-spoke conspiracy, is a member of both alleged sub-conspiracies. But the Supreme Court has ruled that the presence of a single party common to several illegal agreements with other parties does not necessarily establish a single conspiracy. Kotteakos, 328 U.S. at 755. Plaintiffs also ignore the Third Circuit opinions that require the showing of at least a reasonable inference of a horizontal agreement between the spokes of a hub-and-spoke conspiracy to find a single conspiracy, not just vertical agreement between the hub and each individual spoke. See, e.g., Kemp, 500 F.3d at 291 (finding that when determining whether the facts support a single or multiple conspiracies, "the inquiry must focus . . . on the character of the agreement between the spokes"); In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d at 347 ("In all hub-and-spoke conspiracies, the horizontal agreement among the spokes supports the agreements between the hub and each spoke, and vice versa").

Under Kotteakos, Plaintiffs have not offered evidence such that a finder of fact could reasonably determine that the spokes of the alleged hub-and-spoke conspiracy—Upsher and ESI—made any type of horizontal agreement or overlapped [*88] in any other way. On this point, Plaintiffs discuss the motives of Schering in wishing to end the threat of generic competition for K-Dur, and assert that Upsher and ESI were incentivized to enter into the conspiracy through Schering's payments. But Plaintiffs do not offer facts that this Court can construe as showing any type of agreement between Upsher and ESI. In fact, as part of the settlement with Schering, Upsher agreed to not assist ESI with its ongoing patent litigation against Schering, and to not assist any other party challenging the '743 patent. (Docket Entry 843, Ex. 1 ¶ 6.) And there is no evidence on this record that ESI even knew about the Schering-Upsher settlement until after it occurred.

Plaintiffs cannot succeed on the third Kelly factor simply by showing that both Upsher and ESI settled with Schering, and then asking the Court to infer that the parties had illegal motives for settling. As discussed above, Plaintiffs' evidence does not establish that ESI had a motive to enter into a single conspiracy, that Upsher and ESI acted in a collusive manner by interacting or agreeing in any sort of horizontal manner, or that ESI would have benefitted from some sort of tacit agreement [*89] to collude with Schering and Upsher.

Plaintiffs have not satisfied their burden on the issue of overlap by stating that ESI knew about the alleged conspiracy between Schering and Upsher, or even by stating that in court documents, ESI acknowledged that the Schering-Upsher settlement may have been anticompetitive. (Pls.' SDF ESI ¶ 28; Defs.' SDF Reply ESI ¶ 28.) Plaintiffs must present evidence tending to show either that ESI agreed to join the Schering-Upsher conspiracy, or that it formed a conspiracy with Schering and Upsher at the time it signed a settlement agreement with Schering, and furthermore that ESI knowingly cooperated in the common effort to obtain unlawful results. On this evidence, no reasonable jury could conclude that it is more likely that ESI joined a single conspiracy with Schering and Upsher rather than that ESI bargained with Schering for its own benefit.

Plaintiffs have not provided sufficient direct or circumstantial evidence such that a reasonable finder of fact could find in favor of Plaintiffs on the issue of a single conspiracy between Schering, Upsher, and ESI. Plaintiffs have thus failed to cite evidence sufficient to defeat Defendants' summary judgment motion, [*90] and accordingly the Court will grant Defendants' motion for summary judgment on all claims related to the Schering-ESI settlement.

V. Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, the Court will deny as moot Plaintiffs' motion to strike Sections I and II of Defendants' reply memorandum related to the ESI settlement. The Court will also deny Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to all claims brought by Plaintiffs related to the Schering-Upsher settlement. The Court will grant Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to all claims brought by Plaintiffs related to the Schering-ESI settlement. An appropriate Order will be filed herewith.

Opinion

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

In addition to the claims brought by Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs (the "DPPs") and End-Payor Purchaser Plaintiffs (the "EPPs"), two groups of retailers, Walgreen Co., et al., and Rite Aid Corporation, et al. (collectively, the "Opt-Out Plaintiffs"), have brought claims in this multi-district litigation against Endo Health Solutions Inc., Endo Pharmaceuticals Inc., Penwest Pharmaceuticals Co. (collectively, "Endo"), and Impax Laboratories, Inc. ("Impax") (collectively, the "Defendants"), pursuant to the Supreme Court's decision in FTC v. Actavis, Inc., 133 S.Ct. 2223, 186 L. Ed. 2d 343 (2013). Opt-Out Plaintiffs, like DPPs and EPPs, allege that Defendants violated the Sherman Act when they entered into an illegal reverse payment agreement to settle ongoing patent infringement litigation thereby delaying the entry of generic versions of Opana ER to the Oxymorphone ER Market.

Currently before the Court is Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Opt-Out Plaintiffs' Complaints pursuant to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6) [ECF No. 119]. For the reasons stated herein, the [*6] Motion to Dismiss is granted.

I. BACKGROUND

Except where noted, the following facts are contained in both of Opt-Out Plaintiffs' Complaints, as well as documents attached to, referenced in, and critical to, the Complaints. Geinosky v. City of Chicago, 675 F.3d 743, 745 n.1 (7th Cir. 2012).

A. Hatch-Waxman Regulatory Framework

For a complete discussion of the Hatch-Waxman regulatory framework underpinning this case, the Court incorporates by reference the discussion on pages 2-6 of its February 10, 2016 Memorandum Opinion and Order [ECF No. 151].

B. Endo-Impax Patent Litigation

Up until early spring of 2012, Defendant Endo manufactured Opana ER, an extended release form of oxymorphone hydrochloride marketed for the relief of moderate to severe pain. Rite Aid Complaint ("RAC") ¶ 53; Walgreen Complaint ("WC") ¶ 57. Endo began selling Opana ER on or about June 21, 2006. RAC ¶ 55; WC ¶ 59. At the time, Endo had three years of regulatory protection from generic competition, which prevented the Food and Drug Administration ("FDA") from approving an Abbreviated New Drug Application ("ANDA") for Opana ER through June 22, 2009, after which point Endo's Opana ER monopoly would be subject to generic competition. RAC ¶ 57; WC ¶ 61. Knowing this, Endo purchased the [*7] rights to four patents — U.S. Patent No. 5,128,143 (the "'143 patent"), No. 5,958,456 (the "'456 patent"), No. 5,662,933 (the "'933 patent"), and No. 7,276,250 (the "'250 patent") (collectively, the "Penwest Patents") — that could be used to block generic entry beyond those three years. RAC ¶¶ 51-52, 68; WC ¶¶ 55-56, 72. Endo then listed the '143 patent in the "Approved Drug Products with Therapeutic Equivalence Evaluations" (commonly known as the "Orange Book") as covering Opana ER, and later added the '250, '456 and '933 patents. RAC ¶¶ 65, 68; WC ¶¶ 69, 72.

In November of 2007, Impax filed an ANDA seeking to market a generic version of Opana ER, and submitted a Paragraph IV certification stating that the Penwest Patents would not be infringed by Impax's generic. See, 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(A) (vii); RAC ¶ 70; WC ¶ 74. On December 13, 2007, Impax sent Endo notice of its Paragraph IV filing. RAC ¶ 72; WC ¶ 76. On January 25, 2008, Endo sued Impax for patent infringement — triggering the 30-month Hatch-Waxman stay. RAC ¶ 73; WC ¶ 76. Other generic companies later filed ANDAs seeking to market generic versions of Opana ER before the expiration of the Penwest Patents, and Endo sued each for patent infringement. RAC ¶¶ 84-109; WC ¶¶ 80-105. Because Impax was the first company to file a Paragraph IV ANDA (commonly [*8] known as the "first-filer") for the 5, 10, 20, 30, and 40 mg strengths of Opana ER, upon obtaining FDA approval it was entitled to 180 days of exclusivity for those strengths as against the other ANDA filers. RAC ¶¶ 74, 77; WC ¶¶ 78, 81. Thus, by filing suit and delaying Impax's entry for 30 months, Endo delayed all generics from launching 5, 10, 20, 30 and 40 mg strengths of generic Opana ER.

On May 13, 2010, a month before the 30-month stay was set to expire, the FDA tentatively approved Impax's ANDA for all strengths of Opana ER. RAC ¶ 111; WC ¶ 115. This meant that, upon the expiration of the 30-month stay on June 14, 2010, Impax was free to make an "at-risk" launch of its generic without waiting for the trial court's final ruling in the Impax patent litigation. RAC ¶ 112; WC ¶ 116. But, for whatever reason, Impax agreed not to launch its generic through the last day of trial. RAC ¶ 113; WC ¶ 117. The bench trial commenced on June 3, 2010, and proceeded for two days. RAC ¶ 114; WC ¶ 118. On June 8, 2010, Endo and Impax settled. RAC ¶ 116; WC ¶ 120.

C. Endo-Impax Settlement

The Endo-Impax Settlement consisted of two agreements entered into simultaneously: (1) the Settlement and License [*9] Agreement ("SLA"), and (2) the Development and Co-Promotion Agreement ("DCA"). Under the SLA, Impax agreed to delay its launch of generic Opana ER until the earlier of: (i) January 1, 2013, (ii) thirty days after a non-appealable federal court decision finding that Endo's patents were invalid or not infringed, or (iii) Endo's withdrawal of its patents from the Orange Book. SLA § 3.2. Impax further agreed to refrain from challenging the validity or enforceability of the '933 and '456 patents, as well as the '250 patent, which Endo had not even accused Impax of infringing. SLA § 3.3. In return, Endo covenanted not to sue Impax on, and granted Impax a license as to, any then-existing or subsequently obtained patents relating to Opana ER. Id. at § 4.1(a), (b). Additionally, Endo agreed to refrain from launching an Authorized Generic ("AG") version of Opana ER marketed under Endo's NDA during Impax's 180-day exclusivity period ("No-AG Agreement"). Id. at § 4.1(c).

The SLA was also structured so that, depending on the volume of Opana ER sales at the time Impax's generic entered the market, one of three things would occur. First, if at the time Impax entered the market sales of Opana ER had declined below a certain threshold defined in the SLA, then Endo was required [*10] to pay Impax under the "Endo Credit" provision. Id. at § 4.4. The amount of the Endo Credit payment depended on the amount of decline in Opana ER sales — the greater the decline in sales, the larger the payment required under the Endo Credit provision. Id. Second, if Opana ER sales exceeded a certain threshold defined in the SLA by the time Impax entered the market, then Impax was required to pay Endo a 28.5% royalty on net sales of Impax's generic under the "Royalties" provision. Id. at § 4.3. Finally, if sales of Opana ER remained somewhere between the Endo Credit and the Royalties threshold amounts, neither party was required to pay anything.

The other aspect of the Endo-Impax Settlement was the DCA, which resulted in a $10 million cash payment from Endo to Impax. DCA § 3.1. Under the DCA, Endo and Impax agreed to work together on the development and promotion of a drug for the treatment of Parkinson's disease. Id. at § 2.1. Among other things, Endo agreed to support the product's development through a $10 million up-front payment, and to make additional future payments to Impax if Impax successfully completed various clinical and commercial milestones. Id. at §§ 3.1, 3.2, 3.3. In return, Endo received an exclusive license to promote [*11] the product to non-neurologists in the United States. Id. at §§ 2.1, 2.2. Endo also received the right to keep between 75% and 100% of the profits from the sale of the drug to non-neurologists in the United States. Id. at § 3.4.

D. Aftermath

Endo knew that when generics for Opana ER entered the market in 2013 there would be "substantial share erosion" for brand Opana ER, so it immediately set about "working at multiple levels to combat that." RAC ¶ 148; WC ¶ 152. Accordingly, shortly after entering into the Endo-Impax Settlement, Endo set about switching the market from Opana ER to a crush resistant formula of Opana ER ("Opana ER CRF"). RAC ¶ 149; WC ¶ 153. The FDA approved Endo's supplemental new drug application ("sNDA") for Opana ER CRF on December 9, 2011. RAC ¶ 150; WC ¶ 154. To accomplish the switch between Opana ER and Opana ER CRF, Endo discontinued the sale of Opana ER, thus forcing physicians desiring to prescribe extended release oxymorphone hydrochloride to prescribe Opana ER CRF instead. RAC ¶ 150; WC ¶ 154.

Generic drugs that are "therapeutically equivalent" to their brand counterpart receive an "AB" rating from the FDA. An AB-rated generic may be automatically substituted at the pharmacy [*12] counter for the brand drug. Because generic versions of Opana ER are not AB-rated equivalents of Opana ER CRF and therefore are not automatically substitutable, they were unable to capture the sales of Opana ER CRF when they eventually entered the market in 2013. RAC ¶ 151; WC ¶ 155. Without generic competition, Endo continues to sell Opana ER CRF at supracompetive prices. RAC ¶ 152; WC ¶ 156.

As a result of Endo's market shift from Opana ER to Opana ER CRF, by the time Impax's generic entered the market in line with the terms of the Endo-Impax Settlement Agreement, in January 2013, sales of Opana ER had declined below the threshold defined in the SLA, triggering the Endo Credit provision. SLA § 1.1. The amount Endo was required to pay Impax under the Endo Credit was determined based on the sales of Opana ER in the quarter immediately prior to the launch of Impax's generic. SLA § 1.1; RAC ¶ 5; WC ¶ 123. Ultimately, in April 2013, Endo paid Impax $102,049,000 pursuant to the Endo Credit provision. RAC ¶ 5; WC ¶ 123.

E. Assignment of Claims to Opt-Out Plaintiffs

Opt-Out Plaintiffs bring suit as assignees of pharmaceutical wholesalers Cardinal Health, Inc. ("Cardinal"), McKesson Corporation ("McKesson"), [*13] and AmeriSource Bergen Drug Corporation ("ABDC") (collectively, "the Wholesalers"). Each of the Wholesalers, in turn, purchased Opana ER directly from Endo pursuant to Distribution Service Agreements ("DSAs"). The DSAs govern Endo's sale of Opana ER to the Wholesalers, and include general provisions for product distribution, inventory management services, and distribution channel information, among other services.

Each DSA includes a provision that prohibits the Wholesalers from assigning the agreement without Endo's consent. Specifically, the Cardinal DSA states, "[n]either party may assign this Agreement without the prior written consent of the other party. . . ." Cardinal DSA § 4.3. The McKesson DSA states, "[n]either party may assign this Agreement or delegate any of its respective duties or responsibilities under this Agreement without the prior written consent of the other party which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld." McKesson DSA § 5.3. Similarly, the ABDC DSA states, "[n]either Party may assign this Agreement or delegate any of its respective duties or responsibilities [sic] this Agreement without prior written consent of the other Party which shall not be unreasonably withheld. . . ." ABDC DSA § 13.2. Endo did not consent to the assignment [*14] of claims by the Wholesalers to any of the Opt-Out Plaintiffs.

II. ANALYSIS

Opt-Out Plaintiffs, like DPPs and EPPs, make claims against Defendants based on the Supreme Court's opinion in FTC v. Actavis, which decided whether it is illegal for a brand-name company to provide a payoff to a potential generic competitor, to keep it from entering the market earlier than it otherwise might have. Actavis, 133 S.Ct. at 2223. The Supreme Court held that a reverse settlement payment, that is, a payment by a patentee to a claimed infringer, may be a restraint of trade under a "rule of reason" analysis when the payment is large and unjustified. Id. at 2230, 2237-38. The Court explained, the "likelihood of a reverse payment bringing about anticompetitive effects depends upon its size, its scale in relation to the payor's anticipated future litigation costs, its independence from other services for which it might represent payment and the lack of any other convincing justification." Id. at 2237. For a complete discussion of the Actavis decision, the Court incorporates by reference the discussion on pages 12-15 of its February 10, 2016 Memorandum Opinion and Order [ECF No. 151].

Following the Court's lead in Actavis, Opt-Out Plaintiffs allege that the Endo-Impax [*15] Settlement contained a large and unjustified reverse settlement payment that satisfies a "rule of reason" analysis. Defendants, in their Motions to Dismiss Opt-Out Plaintiffs' Complaints, make five arguments: (1) the Endo-Impax Settlement Agreement did not involve a reverse payment at the time the settlement was entered; (2) the alleged reverse payment was not large and unjustified; (3) Opt-Out Plaintiffs have failed to allege antitrust injury; (4) Opt-Out Plaintiffs lack standing to bring these claims; and (5) Opt-Out Plaintiffs claims may only be pursued as part of DPP class, and therefore must be dismissed or at least stayed until DPPs achieve class certification. The Court will address the last two arguments first, as they go to the Court's power to consider Opt-Out Plaintiffs' claims. Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 498, 95 S. Ct. 2197, 45 L. Ed. 2d 343 (1975) (stating that whether a plaintiff has standing is "the threshold question in every federal case, determining the power of the court to entertain the suit.").

A. Standing

The doctrine of standing acts as a limitation on the power of the federal courts. It "requires federal courts to satisfy themselves that 'the plaintiff has alleged such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to warrant [*16] his invocation of federal-court jurisdiction.'" Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 493, 129 S. Ct. 1142, 173 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2009) (quoting Warth, 422 U.S. at 498-499 (internal quotation marks omitted)).

Private suits to enforce the Sherman Act are authorized by Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15(a), which provides that "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue therefor. . . ." Despite the apparent breadth of the phrase "any person," numerous doctrines have arisen to clarify the circumstances under which a particular person may recover from an antitrust violator. At times these doctrines are referred to as "antitrust standing." The Supreme Court, however, has made clear that these doctrines are separate and distinct from Article III standing, which tests "whether a plaintiff has suffered a redressable injury in fact, entitling the federal courts to hear such a 'case or controversy'. . . ." Loeb Indus., Inc. v. Sumitomo Corp., 306 F.3d 469, 480 (7th Cir. 2002) (citing Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560, 112 S. Ct. 2130, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351 (1992)). There is no dispute that Opt-Out Plaintiffs allege that they have been injured by paying supracompetive prices for Opana ER and Opana ER CRF as a result of the illegal agreement between Endo and Impax, and therefore they have Article III standing. The more difficult question is whether, under the Sherman Act, Opt-Out Plaintiffs [*17] have antitrust standing to bring this suit for antitrust damages.

To establish antitrust standing a plaintiff must prove that he or she has been (1) "injured in his business or property"; (2) "by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws. . . ." See, 15 U.S.C. § 15(a). Under the first element, a plaintiff must demonstrate injury to his or her business or property interests, which injury is causally linked to an antitrust violation. Generally speaking, an allegation that plaintiff consumers paid higher prices for goods purchased due to defendants' conduct satisfies this element. See, e.g., Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 342, 99 S. Ct. 2326, 60 L. Ed. 2d 931 (1979) ("[W]here petitioner alleges a wrongful deprivation of her money because the price of the [good] she bought was artificially inflated by reason of respondents' anticompetitive conduct, she has alleged an injury in her 'property' under § 4."). Under the more critical second element, a plaintiff must also demonstrate "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent" (commonly referred to as "antitrust injury"). See, Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum, 495 U.S. 328, 334, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990).

Even assuming, however, that a plaintiff is able to show antitrust injury, it is "not always sufficient to establish standing under section 4 because a party may have suffered antitrust injury but [*18] may not be the proper plaintiff under section 4 for other reasons." Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 110 n.5, 107 S. Ct. 484, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1986). For example, where a plaintiff's injury is derivative of a more direct injury to some other person, and that person would have a strong motivation to pursue its own antitrust claim against the defendant, standing is likely to be denied. This is the rationale underlying Illinois Brick, in which the Supreme Court held that indirect purchasers are too remote to suffer true antitrust injury, and therefore do not have standing under federal antitrust law to pursue antitrust claims. Illinois Brick v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 728 n.7, 745-46, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977).

Defendants argue that Opt-Out Plaintiffs lack antitrust standing pursuant to Illinois Brick because their injury is derivative of the Wholesalers' direct injury. Opt-Out Plaintiffs respond that their injury is not derivative because they are standing in the shoes of the Wholesalers by virtue of the assignments. Defendants, in turn, contend that the assignments under which Opt-Out Plaintiffs purportedly bring their claims are invalid. Ultimately, whether Opt-Out Plaintiffs have antitrust standing to recover against Defendants turns on whether the assignments are valid.

The validity of assignments under the Sherman and Clayton Acts is a matter of federal [*19] common law. Gulfstream III Associates, Inc. v. Gulfstream Aerospace Corp., 995 F.2d 425, 437 (3d Cir. 1993). There is no serious doubt that an antitrust claim can be expressly assigned. In many cases, such assignments are accepted sub silentio. See, e.g., Jefferson Cnty. Pharm. Ass'n, Inc. v. Abbott Lab., 460 U.S. 150, 103 S. Ct. 1011, 74 L. Ed.

2d 882 (1983); Chiropractic Coop. Ass'n of Michigan v. Am. Med. Ass'n, 867 F.2d 270 (6th Cir. 1989); Hahn v. Oregon Physicians' Service, 786 F.2d 1353 (9th Cir. 1985); see also, In re Fine Paper Litig., 632 F.2d 1081, 1090 (3d Cir. 1980) (recognizing validity of assignment after discussion); D'Ippolito v. Cities Service Co., 374 F.2d 643, 647 (2d Cir. 1967) (same); Hicks v. Bekins Moving & Storage Co., 87 F.2d 583, 585 (9th Cir. 1937) (same); Mercu-Ray Industries, Inc. v. Bristol-Myers Co., 392 F. Supp. 16, 18 (S.D.N.Y.), aff'd mem., 508 F.2d 837 (2d Cir. 1974) (same).

However, this does not answer fully the question raised by Defendants: whether the particular assignments upon which Opt-Out Plaintiffs base their claims are valid. Defendants argue they are not because a provision in each DSA prohibited the Wholesalers from assigning "this Agreement" and/or from "delegate[ing]" any "duties or responsibilities" under the agreement without Endo's consent. Opt-Out Plaintiffs argue that this language does not affect the validity of their assignments because the Wholesalers did not assign the DSAs to Opt-Out Plaintiffs, nor did they assign or delegate any of their duties or obligations under the DSAs. Instead, Opt-Out Plaintiffs argue that the Wholesalers have simply assigned their antitrust overcharge claims against Endo and its co-conspirators.

The Court agrees with Opt-Out Plaintiffs. Unless intent to the contrary is shown, a contractual prohibition against "assignment of the contract" is presumed [*20] as a matter of law to refer only to delegation of contractual duties, not assignment of rights. See, Cedar Point Apartments, Ltd. v. Cedar Point Inv. Corp., 693 F.2d 748, 753 (8th Cir. 1982); Charles L. Bowman & Co. v. Erwin, 468 F.2d 1293, 1297-98 (5th Cir. 1972); Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 322(1) (1981); 3 S. Williston, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 422, at 138-39 (3d ed. 1961); 4 A. Corbin, Corbin on Contracts § 872, at 484 (1951). The non-assignment provision in each DSA may be read to prohibit the assignment of the parties' contractual duties and obligations under the DSA, but it cannot be read to prohibit the assignment of the parties' rights.

Even under a broad reading of the non-assignment provisions, the prohibition on assigning "this Agreement" or "delegat[ing]" any "duties or responsibilities" would only serve to limit the parties' ability to assign their rights and obligations under the DSA. The Court does not read this language to include statutorily-based antitrust claims, because such claims are not based on any substantive right or duty found in the DSAs themselves. See, e.g., United Food & Comm. Workers Local 1776 & Participating Emp'rs Health & Welfare Fund v. Teikoku Pharma USA, Inc., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 94220, 2015 WL 4397396, at *4 (N.D. Cal. July 17, 2015); In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88723, 2011 WL 3475408, at *4 (N.D. Cal. 2011); Meijer, Inc. v. Barr Pharms. Inc., 572 F. Supp. 2d 38, 64 (D.D.C. 2008); Cedar Point Apartments v. Cedar Point Inv. Corp., 693 F.2d 748, 753 (8th Cir. 1982). The existence of a boilerplate duty to abide by applicable law does not manifest the requisite intent to expand the scope of the non-assignment provisions beyond their plain language. The DSAs do not specifically mention antitrust law or the assignment [*21] of legal claims.

It is undisputed that the wholesalers did not delegate their duties or obligations under "th[e] Agreement" — the DSA — nor was the DSA as a whole assigned to Opt-Out Plaintiffs. What was assigned is a cause of action that arose from the DSA. Such an assignment is not prohibited by the language of the non-assignment provisions. Accordingly, the Court finds that Defendant's standing argument lacks merit.

B. Dismiss or Stay Pending DPP Class Certification

Defendants next argue that even if the assignments are valid, they are only partial assignments, and therefore Opt-Out Plaintiffs should be required to pursue their claims as part of the direct purchaser class under Fed. R. Civ. P. 19. Defendants contend that a partial assignment multiplies the number of lawsuits brought against Defendants on the basis of the Wholesalers' purchases and impermissibly forces Defendants to face a multiplicity of suits. While normally a class member with an individual claim may opt out of the class to pursue his or her claim separately, Defendants propose that a different rule applies when a class member partially assigns his or her claim to a third party. Under such circumstances, Defendants assert that the holder [*22] of the partially-assigned claims loses the right to opt out and must litigate its claims as part of the relevant class. Opt-Out Plaintiffs contend that Defendants' proposed rule has been repeatedly rejected by the federal courts and that this multidistrict litigation sufficiently consolidates the cases to alleviate any of the concerns raised by Defendants.

Class members with individual claims for actual damages may always opt out of the class to pursue their claims separately. Murray v. GMAC Mortg. Corp., 434 F.3d 948, 953 (7th Cir. 2006). A different rule applies, however, when a class member partially assigns its claim to a third party:

> An assignment of a fractional part of a single and entire right against an obligor is operative as if the part had been a separate right. But unless the obligor has consented, the partial assignee may not maintain the original suit against the obligor unless all parties having the collective right to the entire claim are joined in the proceeding.

Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 326 (1981).

The Third Circuit extensively examined this principle in Fine Paper when it addressed whether the holder of partially-assigned claims may opt out of a certified class action. Fine Paper, 632 F.2d at 1089. The court first concluded that partial assignments "pose no threat to the rule of law [*23] enunciated in [Illinois Brick]." Id. at 1090. In fact, the court found that both of the policies behind Illinois Brick — the risk of multiple liability and complex problems of proof and apportionment — weigh in favor of recognizing partially-assigned claims in class actions. Id. Specifically, the Court stated:

> Adjudicating the partial assignments at this stage will provide defendants with assurance against multiple liability. With all the claims in one proceeding, . . . the parties and the court can monitor each claim against the defendants. Moreover, the presence of the partial assignments will not add to the complexity of the lawsuit. Proof of the assignment bears no resemblance to attempts to ascertain the numbers of indirect purchases or overcharges in the Illinois Brick setting.

Id. Therefore the court held that the partially-assigned claims should be included in the class action, as this would provide the defendants with assurance against multiple liabilities. Id.

But the court went on to conclude that the holder of the partially-assigned claims, "unlike other class members, [did] not have the right to opt out" of the class action. Id. at 1090-91. The court explained that although partial assignments are [*24] recognized, "the rights of the obligor to be free of successive and repeated suits growing out of the same basic facts" must also be protected. Id. at 1091. Thus, the court held that "[t]he compulsory joinder provisions of Rule 19" required the holder of the partially-assigned claims to pursue those claims as a member of the relevant class. Id.

The Court agrees with the reasoning and the rule announced by the Third Circuit in Fine Paper, and believes that its application to this case would compel a certain result but for a key factual distinction that renders the issue premature. Specifically, in Fine Paper, the partially-assigned claims were assigned by members of the certified direct purchaser class. Id. at 1089. In the instant case, the direct purchaser class has not been certified, and therefore its membership is indeterminate. Although the Wholesalers — Cardinal, McKesson, and ABDC — fit the description of membership for the direct purchaser class, it is uncertain whether the class will ultimately obtain certification. Moreover, even if the class is certified, there remains a chance that the Wholesalers will exercise their right to opt out. Under such circumstances, the Fine Paper rule would require Opt-Out Plaintiffs [*25] to be joined in the Wholesalers' opt-out suit (should they choose to pursue one) — not in the direct purchaser class suit. See, Fine Paper, 632 F.2d at 1091 ("[U]nless the obligor has consented, the partial assignee may not maintain the original suit against the obligor unless all parties having the collective right to the entire claim are joined in the proceeding.").

Thus, the current status of this litigation makes a decision to dismiss or stay Opt-Out Plaintiffs' partially-assigned claims premature. Although DPPs have filed a class action complaint, none of the Wholesalers appear as named plaintiffs, and DPPs have not yet moved for class certification. At this stage, it remains unclear whether the Wholesalers have reserved for themselves any portion of their right to sue Defendants, and if so, how they will choose to pursue that right. Therefore, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss or Stay Opt-Out Plaintiffs' claims is denied.

C. Sherman Act Arguments

Turning to Defendants' remaining arguments, the Court finds Opt-Out Plaintiffs' pleadings substantially similar in many relevant respects to DPPs' and EPPs' pleadings; thus, in the interests of judicial economy, the Court will restate briefly its findings as Defendants' Sherman [*26] Act arguments, and discuss any meaningful distinctions in Opt-Out Plaintiffs' pleadings. The Court incorporates by reference its more thorough analysis of Defendants' Sherman Act arguments on pages 16-27 of its February 10, 2015 Memorandum Opinion and Order [ECF No. 151].

Defendants first argue that the Endo Credit was not a reverse payment. The Court disagrees. When the Court views the components of the Endo-Impax Settlement as a whole, it finds plausible and persuasive Opt-Out Plaintiffs' allegation that the Endo Credit and No-AG Agreement worked in conjunction with one another to ensure payment to Impax. Specifically, Plaintiffs allege that the settlement guaranteed Impax would receive a large reverse payment either through the Endo Credit if sales of Opana ER dropped, or through the No-AG Agreement if sales of Opana ER remained steady or rose after two-and-one-half years. Moreover, even if Impax had been required to pay Endo under the Royalties provision, Impax would still have received significant value through the Settlement in the form of the No-AG Agreement. This is because the Royalties provision was only triggered if sales of Opana ER rose by a predefined amount. If this rise [*27] in sales occurred, by the time Impax entered the market with its generic there would be more Opana ER sales for it to capture, and Endo's promise not to compete through an AG during Impax's 180-day exclusivity period would become even more valuable.

In Actavis, the Supreme Court recognized generally that the 180—day exclusivity period is "possibly 'worth several hundred million dollars,'" and may be where the bulk of the first-filer's profits lie. Actavis, 133 S.Ct. at 2229 (quoting C. Scott Hemphill, Paying for Delay: Pharmaceutical Patent Settlement as a Regulatory Design Problem, 81 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1553, 1579 (2006)). At the same time, Endo's commitment not to produce an AG means that it gave up the valuable right to capture profits in the new two-tiered market. As such, the No-AG Agreement transferred the profits Endo would have made from its AG to Impax — plus potentially more, in the form of higher prices, because it enabled Impax to have a generic monopoly instead of a generic duopoly. See, King Drug Co. of Florence v. Smithkline Beecham Corp., 791 F.3d 388, 405 (3d Cir. 2015). Thus, even though Endo was free to compete with Impax in other areas of the market, by agreeing not to launch an AG during Impax's 180-day exclusivity period, Endo conveyed significant value to Impax.

Despite the form and amount of the reverse payment [*28] under the settlement being contingent on future occurrences, taking the Plaintiffs' allegations as true, it was certain at the time of the Endo-Impax Settlement that Impax would at least receive a reverse payment of significant value in the form of the No AG-Agreement, and an additional $10 million under the DCA. Therefore, Opt-Out Plaintiffs have alleged sufficiently that the Endo-Impax Settlement contained a reverse payment.

Next, Defendants contend that Opt-Out Plaintiffs have failed to establish sufficiently that the alleged reverse payment was large or unjustified. Defendants argue that Opt-Out Plaintiffs do not even attempt to value the reverse payment, and only allege summarily that the No-AG Agreement was worth "many millions of dollars" to Impax. RAC ¶¶ 120, 122; WC ¶¶ 124, 126. In this respect, Opt-Out Plaintiffs' Complaints differ significantly from the complaints of DPPs and EPPs. This variance in the pleadings leads the Court to reach a different outcome than in the Motion to Dismiss DPPs' and EPPs' Complaints.

When, as here, "an alleged reverse payment involves a non-monetary payment of any kind, it must be valued in terms of a monetary amount in order to determine if it [*29] is 'large' within the meaning of Actavis." *In re Effexor XR Antitrust Litig., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142206, 2014 WL 4988410, at 21 (D.N.J. Oct. 6, 2014). Simply alleging that the No-AG Agreement was worth "many millions of dollars," absent a reliable foundation supporting that value, does not establish the plausibility required by Rule 12(b)(6). The Court is aware that a precise valuation may require discovery, as it will likely depend on evidence in Defendants' exclusive possession and on expert analysis. In re Aggrenox Antitrust Litig., 94 F.Supp.3d 224, 244 (D. Conn. 2015). But in order to raise a right to relief above the speculative level, Opt-Out Plaintiffs must provide some reliable foundation to show an estimated value of the reverse payment and how that estimate was calculated. Further, Opt-Out Plaintiffs' allegation that the reverse payment was "an amount far above any litigation costs saved by Endo (or Impax) by settling," RAC ¶ 119; WC ¶ 123, fails to calculate what those saved costs actually were. Without this information, it is impossible to determine whether the payment was "large" or "unjustified" in comparison to the avoided litigation costs and any other services provided from Impax to Endo. See, Actavis, 133 S.Ct. at 2236; see also, In re Lipitor Antitrust Litig., 46 F.Supp.3d 523, 547 (D.N.J. 2014) ("Plaintiffs failed to plausibly allege an estimate of the monetary value of the non-monetary payment. . . .").

Therefore, the Court grants Defendants' [*30] Motion to Dismiss Opt-Out Plaintiffs' Complaints for failure to state a Sherman Act claim under Actavis. Opt-Out Plaintiffs are granted leave to file an amended complaint within 21 days of the date of this memorandum opinion and order.

In light of this conclusion, the Court will not delve into an in-depth analysis of Defendants' argument that Out-Out Plaintiffs have failed to allege antitrust injury. But to save time and energy on future briefing, the Court notes that this argument, which is identical to that made in the Motion to Dismiss DPPs' and EPPs' Complaints, is unavailing. See, February 10, 2016 Memorandum Opinion and Order, p. 24-27. [ECF No. 151].

The anticompetitive harm, under Actavis, is that the reverse-payment settlement seeks to prevent the risk of competition. Actavis, 133 S.Ct. at 2236. Opt-Out Plaintiffs contend that: (1) Endo used a large reverse payment to buy itself freedom from generic competition; (2) but for Endo's unlawful and large reverse payment, Impax would have launched its generic earlier than it finally did; (3) Endo and Impax conspired to allocate the Oxymorphone ER Market in a manner that gave each company more exclusivity than it was lawfully entitled to in order to maximize [*31] profits; (4) Endo used that market exclusivity to further stifle generic competition by switching the market to its new formulation, Opana ER CRF; and (5) Impax ensured it received full compensation either through the valuable No-AG Agreement if Endo did not switch the market or through the Endo Credit and less valuable No-AG Agreement if Endo did switch the market. These allegations, if true, raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence sufficient to prove that the reverse payment was made to prevent competition on various fronts. Aggrenox Antitrust Litig., 94 F.Supp.3d. at 245-46.

III. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated herein, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Opt-Out Plaintiffs' Complaints [ECF No. 119] is granted. Opt-Out Plaintiffs are granted leave to replead within twenty-one (21) days of the date of this Memorandum Opinion and Order.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[*943] ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART PLAINTIFF AND COUNTERDEFENDANT [2] OBESITY RESEARCH INSTITUTE'S MOTION TO DISMISS DEFENDANT'S FIRST AMENDED COUNTERCLAIMS

(ECF No. 43)

On March 16, 2015, Obesity Research Institute, LLC ("Obesity Research") filed a Complaint for Declaratory Judgment against Fiber Research International, LLC ("Fiber Research") asking the Court to declare that it has no liability under either the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1125 et seq., or the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act ("FFDCA"), 21 U.S.C. §§ 301 et seq. (ECF No. 1.) On May 28, 2015, Fiber Research filed an Answer, in which it asserts the affirmative defense of unclean hands, and a First Amended Counterclaims. (ECF No. 41 ("FACC").) The FACC alleges a violation of the Lanham Act (false advertising, unfair competition and false designation in violation of section 1125(a)(1)), a violation of California's unfair competition law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§17200 et seq., and a violation of California's false advertising law ("FAL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500 et seq. (Id.)

Presently before this Court is a Motion to Dismiss the FACC filed by Obesity Research pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). (ECF No. 43.) Obesity Research argues the FACC should be dismissed because: (1) Fiber Research lacks statutory standing to bring the claims; (2) the FACC fails to state a claim for a violation of the Lanham Act and for a violation of the UCL; (3) [3] the FACC fails to allege sufficient particularity under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b); and (4) the allegations in the FACC are barred by laches. Fiber Research opposes. (ECF No. 48.)

The Court finds this motion suitable for determination on the papers submitted and without oral argument. See Civ. L.R. 7.1(d)(1). For the reasons set forth below, Court GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART Obesity Research's Motion to Dismiss (ECF No. 43).

I. BACKGROUND

As alleged in Fiber Research's FACC, "Glucomannan is a dietary fiber derived from Konjac, a root vegetable." (FACC at ¶ 24.) Shimizu Chemical Corporation ("Shimizu") "has developed a proprietary, patented process for extracting and refining Konjac root to produce the highest-quality glucomannan available in the world, called 'Propol.'" (Id.) "Numerous clinical studies support the efficacy of Propol glucomannan in assisting weight loss." (Id.)

[*944] "In 2006, Obesity Research introduced a weight loss product called Lipozene." (Id. at ¶ 25.) Although Obesity Research's marketing campaign highlights Propol's strong clinical testing results, "Lipozene contains neither Propol glucomannan, nor any substantially equivalent glucomannan that would justify Obesity Research relying on Propol clinical [4] studies to support its Lipozene weight loss claims." (Id. at ¶¶ 25, 26.)

Specifically, Fiber Research alleges that Obesity Research repeatedly says Lipozene is "clinically proven," when, in fact, the clinical studies it relies on are those using Shimizu's Propol. (Id. at ¶¶ 50, 55, 57, 58-61.) Lipozene, to the contrary, "contains poor-quality, cheap ingredients and adulterants that do not have the same functional chemical profile as Propol. Hence, Lipozene does not have the weight loss benefits of Propol as demonstrated by Propol's clinical testing." (Id. at ¶ 65.) "Instead, there is no reliable clinical data supporting Lipozene's efficacy in . . . promoting weigh loss." (Id. at ¶ 66.) Additionally, Fiber Research alleges that Obesity Research falsely represents that at least one of the clinical studies is "sponsored by [Obesity Research]" and that Obesity Research falsely refers to one of the clinical studies of Propol as a "Lipozene Clinical Study," when in fact Lipozene was not involved in the study at all. (Id. at ¶¶ 70-71.) Finally, Fiber Research claims that Obesity Research falsely represents on its label that there are "[n]o known allergens in this product" when, in fact, there [5] are quantities of sulfites in Lipozene such that an allergen warning is warranted. (Id. at ¶ 67.)

"Pursuant to an exclusive sales contract with Shimizu, Fiber Research markets Propol in the United States." (Id. at ¶ 28.) Fiber Research is also "the assignee of Shimizu's legal rights of action in the United States for any damages incurred by Shimizu by virtue of any unlawful selling or marketing of products in unfair or unlawful competition with Propol." (Id. at ¶ 29.) Fiber Research brings this action for injuries both "sustained directly, and as the legal assignee for injuries sustained by Shimizu." (Id. at ¶ 30.) "Fiber Research has been injured in its efforts to sell Propol as a result of Obesity Research's unfairly passing off its sub-standard, adulterated, unrefined Konjac root product as the same or substantially the same as that studied in clinical trials of Shimizu's Propol glucomannan (even going so far as to call these the 'Lipozene Clinical Studies.') Fiber Research is also injured by the loss of good will to Propol caused by Obesity Research's passing off an inferior product as Propol." (Id. at ¶ 28.)

Fiber Research seeks: (1) a permanent injunction against Obesity Research [6] from falsely advertising, marketing, packaging, labeling, and/or selling Lipozene using any false representations; (2) damages suffered by Fiber Research (directly and as Shimizu's assignee) "as measured by Shimizu's lost sales to Obesity Research and by Obestity [sic] Research's Lipozene profits"; (3) Obesity Research's profits "attributable to its willful false advertising, unfair competition, and deceptive acts or practices"; (4) treble damages under 15 U.S.C. §1117; and (5) attorney's fees and costs. (Id. at ¶ 106.)

II. LEGAL STANDARD

A motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure tests the legal sufficiency of the claims asserted in the complaint. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6); Navarro v. Block, 250 F.3d 729, 732 (9th Cir. 2001). The court must accept all factual allegations pleaded in the complaint as true and must construe them and draw all reasonable inferences from them in favor of the nonmoving party. *Cahill v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 80 F.3d 336, 337-38 [945] (9th Cir. 1996). To avoid a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal, a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations, rather, it must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). "Where [7] a complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557) (internal quotations omitted).

"[A] plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (quoting Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 286, 106 S. Ct. 2932, 92 L. Ed. 2d 209 (1986) (alteration in original)). A court need not accept "legal conclusions" as true. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. Despite the deference the court must pay to the plaintiff's allegations, it is not proper for the court to assume that "the [plaintiff] can prove facts that it has not alleged or that the defendants have violated the . . . law[] in ways that have not been alleged." Associated Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 526, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983).

When a claim is based on fraud or mistake, the circumstances surrounding the fraud or mistake must be alleged with particularity. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). If the allegations fail to satisfy the heightened pleading requirements of Rule 9(b), a district court may dismiss the claim. Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1107 (9th Cir. 2003). To satisfy the particularity requirement of Rule 9(b), "[a]verments of fraud must be accompanied by 'the who, what, when, where, and how' of the misconduct charged." Vess, 317 F.3d at 1106 (quoting Cooper v. Pickett, 137 F.3d 616, 627 (9th Cir. 1997)). Plaintiffs must plead [8] enough facts to give defendants notice of the time, place, and nature of the alleged fraud, together with the content of any alleged misrepresentation and explain why it is false or misleading. See id. at 1107. The circumstances constituting the alleged fraud must "be specific enough to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct . . . so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny that they have done anything wrong." Vess, 317 F.3d at 1106 (quoting Bly-Magee v. California, 236 F.3d 1014, 1019 (9th Cir. 2001) (internal quotation marks omitted)); see also In re GlenFed, Inc. Sec. Litig., 42 F.3d 1541, 1547 (9th Cir. 1994), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in Ronconi v. Larkin, 253 F.3d 423, 429 n. 6 (9th Cir. 2001). "Malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind may be alleged generally." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b).

III. DISCUSSION

A. Standing

1. Lanham Act

Failure to allege sufficient statutory standing requires dismissal under Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim. Maya v. Centex Corp., 658 F.3d 1060, 1067 (9th Cir. 2011). "'For purposes of ruling on a motion to dismiss for want of standing, [the court] must accept as true all material allegations of the complaint and must construe the complaint in favor of the complaining party.'" Id. at 1068 (quoting Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 501, [*946] 95 S. Ct. 2197, 45 L. Ed. 2d 343 (1975)); see also Vaughn v. Bay Envtl. Mgmt., 567 F.3d 1021, 1024 (9th Cir. 2009).

The Lanham Act "authorizes suit by 'any person who believes that he or she is likely to be damaged' by a defendant's false advertising." Lexmark Int'l, Inc. v. Static Control Components, Inc., 134 S. Ct. 1377, 1388, 188 L. Ed. 2d 392 (2014) (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a)(1)). The Supreme Court has determined [9] that a statutory cause of action under the Act extends only to plaintiffs "whose interests 'fall within the zone of interests protected by the law invoked,'" id. (quoting Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751, 104 S. Ct. 3315, 82 L. Ed. 2d 556 (1984)), and "whose injuries are proximately caused by violations of the statute, id. at 1390. Therefore, to allege statutory standing under the Lanham Act, Fiber Research's Counterclaims must first meet the "zone of interest" test. Id. Second, Fiber Research must sufficiently allege that the injuries were proximately caused by a violation of the statute. Id.

The "zone of interest" test is not a particularly demanding one, and the benefit of the doubt goes to the one alleging the cause of action. Id. at 1389. "[T]he test forecloses suit only when a plaintiff's interests are so marginally related to or inconsistent with the purposes implicit in the statute that it cannot reasonably be assumed that Congress authorized the plaintiff to sue." Id. (citation and quotations omitted). In the false advertising context, Congress' goal was to protect persons engaged in commerce against unfair competition. Id. Thus, "to come within the zone of interests in a suit for false advertising under §1125(a), a plaintiff must allege an injury to a commercial interest in reputation [10] or sales" as opposed to an allegation a consumer or business was misled into purchasing disappointing or inferior products. Id. at 1390.

To establish proximate cause under section 1125(a), a plaintiff "ordinarily must show economic or reputational injury flowing directly from the deception wrought by the defendant's advertising; and that that occurs when deception of consumers causes them to withhold trade from the plaintiff." Id. at 1391. "That showing is generally not made when the deception produces injuries to a fellow commercial actor that in turn affect the plaintiff." Id. Although it may be more difficult to establish proximate causation when the parties do not directly compete, there need not be an allegation that the parties are in direct competition with each other. Id. at 1392; see also Merck Eprova AG v. BrookStone Pharms., LLC, 920 F. Supp. 2d 404, 416 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) (finding that Merck had standing to bring a Lanham Act claim "[a]lthough Merck and Acella are not direct competitors, insofar as Merck does not produce finished consumer products, [where] Merck and Acella both produce competing sources of folate for use in dietary supplements"); Luxul Tech. Inc. v. Nectarlux, LLC, 78 F. Supp. 3d 1156, 1170 (N.D. Cal. 2015).

"At the pleading stage, general factual allegations of injury resulting from the defendant's conduct may suffice, for on a motion to dismiss we presume that general allegations [11] embrace those specific facts that are necessary to support the claim." Maya, 658 F.3d at 1068 (citation and quotations omitted); see also Luxul Tech. Inc., 78 F. Supp. 3d at 1170 ("At the pleading stage, plaintiff must allege an injury to a commercial interest in sales or business reputation proximately caused by the defendant's misrepresentations." (citation omitted)).

[*947] In its FACC, Fiber Research alleges that it has an exclusive sales contract to sell Propol in the United States. (FACC at ¶ 28.) It alleges it has been injured in its efforts to sell Propol because Obesity Research is "unfairly passing off its sub-standard, adulterated, unrefined Konjac root product as the same or substantially the same as that studied in clinical trials of . . . Propol." (Id. at ¶ 28.) Thus, Fiber Research has sufficiently alleged that its commercial interests in reputation or sales have been damaged by Obesity Research's conduct, and its injuries fall with the zone of interest protected by the Lanham Act. Additionally, Fiber Research claims that it has "been injured by the loss of good will to Propol caused by Obesity Research's passing off an inferior product as Propol."

(Id.) Thus, it has sufficiently alleged economic or reputation injury proximately caused [12] by Obesity Research's deception.

Obesity Research argues that it is not in direct competition with Fiber Research because Propol is sold to manufacturers only as an ingredient, whereas Obesity Research sells directly to consumers. However, as discussed above, there is no requirement that the parties be in direct competition with one another. Fiber Research alleges its ability to sell Propol has been injured because of Obesity Research's allegedly false representations. Therefore, the Court finds Fiber Research has alleged sufficient facts to establish standing under the Lanham Act.

2. UCL and FAL

Proposition 64, passed in November 2004, narrowed the standing in California for either an unfair competition or a false advertising cause of action to those actually injured by a defendant's unlawful business practice. See Clayworth v. Pfizer, Inc., 49 Cal. 4th 758, 788, 111 Cal. Rptr. 3d 666, 233 P.3d 1066 (2010). Pursuant to section 17204 of the California Business and Professions Code, only a "person who has suffered injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition" may seek relief under the UCL." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204. Similarly, pursuant to section 17535 of the California Business and Professions Code, only a person "who has suffered injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of a violation of" the FAL. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17535. Therefore, in order to bring a claim under the UCL or FAL, a plaintiff [13] must "(1) establish a loss or deprivation of money or property sufficient to qualify as injury in fact, i.e., economic injury, and (2) show that the economic injury was the result of, i.e., caused by, the unfair business practice or false advertising that is the gravamen of the claim." Kwikset Corp. v. Super. Ct., 51 Cal. 4th 310, 322, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (2011). A plaintiff must also establish that it has "personally suffered such harm." Id. at 323.

The economic injury must be an invasion of a legally protected interest which is "concrete and particularized" and "actual or imminent," not "conjectural or hypothetical." Id. at 322. The causation requirement does not require a plaintiff "to allege that the challenged misrepresentations were the sole or even the decisive cause of the injury-producing conduct." Id. at 327. (citation and quotations omitted). "At the pleading stage, general factual allegations of injury resulting from the defendant's conduct may suffice." Id. (citation omitted).

There are innumerable ways a plaintiff may demonstrate economic injury, including the following: "[a] plaintiff may (1) surrender in a transaction more, or acquire in a transaction less, than he or she otherwise would have; (2) have a present or future property interest diminished; (3) be deprived of money [14] or property to [*948] which he or she has a cognizable claim; or (4) be required to enter into a transaction, costing money or property, that would otherwise have been unnecessary." Id. at 323. Courts have also found "lost sales, revenue, market share, and asset value" sufficient to allege an economic injury. Allergan, Inc., v. Athena Cosmetics, 640 F.3d 1377, 1381, 1382 (Fed. Cir. 2011); see also AngioScore, Inc. v. TriReme Medical, LLC, 70 F. Supp. 3d 951, 962 (N.D. Cal. 2014) (finding an alleged "injury to market share suffered as a result of a competitor's unfair business practice" to be a cognizable injury under the UCL); Overstock.com v. Gradient Analytics, Inc., 151 Cal. App. 4th 688, 716, 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 29 (2007) (finding allegations of "diminution of value of . . . assets and decline in market capitalization and other vested interests" to satisfy the UCL injury in fact requirement). There is no requirement that there be allegations of business dealings between the parties. See Allergan, Inc., 640 F.3d at 1383.

Obesity Research first argues that Fiber Research lacks standing to assert either a UCL or FAL claim because it seeks, in part, a non-restitutionary remedy. Citing Buckland v. Threshold Enters., 155 Cal. App. 4th 798, 66 Cal. Rptr. 3d 543 (2007) and Citizens of Humanity, LLC v. Costco Wholesale Corp., 171 Cal. App. 4th 1, 89 Cal. Rptr. 3d 455 (2009), Obesity Research argues standing for UCL or FAL claims is limited to those who suffer losses of money or property entitling them to restitution. However, ineligibility for restitution is not a basis for denying standing under either the UCL or FAL. See Kwikset Corp., 51 Cal. 4th at 335-36; Clayworth, 49 Cal. 4th at 789; see also Allergan, Inc., 640 F.3d at 1381-82 (stating that Kwikset and Clayworth [15] found that ineligibility for restitution is not a basis for denying standing and to the extent Citizens and Buckland concluded otherwise, they have been disapproved by the California Supreme Court). Obesity Research's "argument conflates the issue of standing with the issue of the remedies to which a party may be entitled. That a party may ultimately be unable to prove a right to . . . restitution . . . does not demonstrate that it lacks standing to argue for its entitlement to them." Clayworth, 49 Cal. 4th at 789.

Therefore, to the extent Fiber Research alleges it has been directly injured in its efforts to sell Propol, in that it lost sales, market share, and goodwill,[1] because of Obesity Research's "unfairly passing off its sub-standard, adulterated, unrefined Konjac root product as the same or substantially the same as that studied in clinical trials of . . . Propol," the Court finds it has sufficiently alleged standing.

Obesity Research next argues that Fiber Research lacks standing to prosecute the UCL and FAL claims on behalf of Shimizu, who is not a party to this action. The Court agrees. An uninjured assignee does [16] not have standing to sue in a representative capacity. Amalgamated Transit Union, Local 1756, AFL-CIO v. Super. Ct., 46 Cal. 4th 993, 1002, 95 Cal. Rptr. 3d 605, 209 P.3d 937 (2009) ("To allow a noninjured assignee of an unfair competition claim to stand in the shoes of the original, injured claimant would confer standing on the assignee in direct violation of the express statutory requirement in the unfair competition law." (emphasis in original)); see also In re WellPoint, Inc. Out-of-Network UCR Rates Litig., 903 F. Supp. 2d 880, 898-99 (C.D. Cal. 2012) (to the extent assignees suffered [*949] their own independent and direct injuries as a result of the unfair competition or false advertising, they may pursue their own UCL/FAL claims). Therefore, to the extent that Fiber Research alleges it was injured indirectly as an assignee of Shimizu, the Court finds it lacks standing. Fiber Research may only pursue claims under the UCL and FAL with respect to injuries it has suffered directly as the exclusive seller of Propol in the United States.

B. Failure to State a Claim

1. Lanham Act

Fiber Research's first cause of action alleges a violation of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. §1125(a)(1), including false advertising, unfair competition, and false designation. (FACC at ¶¶ 79-86.) Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a), prohibits the use of false designations of origin, false descriptions, and false representations in the advertising and sale of goods and services. [17] See Cleary v. News Corp., 30 F.3d 1255, 1259 (9th Cir. 1994); 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a). To establish a false advertising claim under the Lanham Act, a plaintiff must allege: "(1) a false statement of fact by the defendant in a commercial advertisement about its own or another's product; (2) the statement actually deceived or has the tendency to deceive a substantial segment of its audience; (3) the deception is material, in that it is likely to influence the purchasing decision; (4) the defendant caused its false statement to enter interstate commerce; and (5) the plaintiff has been or is likely to be injured as a result of the false statement, either by direct diversion of sales from itself to defendant or by a lessening of the goodwill associated with its products." Southland Sod Farms v. Stover Seed Co., 108 F.3d 1134, 1139 (9th Cir. 1997); see also Newcal Indus., Inc. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1052 (9th Cir. 2008). "To demonstrate falsity within the meaning of the Lanham Act, a plaintiff may show that the statement was literally false, either on its face or by necessary implication, or that the statement was literally true but likely to mislead or confuse consumers." Id.

In order to succeed on a false designation of origin claim under the Lanham Act, a plaintiff must show: "(1) defendant uses a designation (any word, term, name, device, or any combination thereof) or false designation of origin; [18] (2) the use was in interstate commerce; (3) the use was in connection with goods or services; (4) the designation or false designation is likely to cause confusion, mistake, or deception as to (a) the affiliation, connection, or association of defendant with another person, or (b) as to the origin, sponsorship, or approval of defendant's goods, services, or commercial activities by another person; and (5) plaintiff has been or is likely to be damaged by these acts." Summit Tech., Inc. v. High-Line Med. Instruments, Co., 933 F. Supp. 918, 928 (C.D. Cal. 1996); see also Freecycle Network, Inc. v. Oey, 505 F.3d 898, 902 (9th Cir. 2007); Luxul Tech. Inc., 78 F. Supp. 3d at 1170. "The test for likelihood of confusion is whether a 'reasonably prudent consumer' in the marketplace is likely to be confused as to the origin of the good or service." Dreamwerks Prod. Grp., Inc. v. SKG Studio, 142 F.3d 1127, 1129 (9th Cir. 1998). The likelihood of confusion must be probable, not just possible. Murray v. Cable Nat. Broad. Co., 86 F.3d 858, 861 (9th Cir. 1996).

Even though the allegations in this case do not involve trademark infringement, in order to determine the likelihood of confusion, courts use the trademark infringement analysis. See Two Pesos, Inc. v. Taco Cabana, Inc., 505 U.S. 763, 781, 112 S. Ct. 2753, 120 L. Ed. 2d 615 (1992) (Stevens, J., concurring) ("Whether we call the violation infringement, unfair competition or false [*950] designation of origin, the test is identical—is there a likelihood of confusion?"); *Spearmint Rhino Cos. Worldwide, Inc. v. Chiappa Firearms, Ltd., No. CV 11-05682-R-MAN, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 189112, 2012 WL 8962882, at 2 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 20, 2012) (citing Walter v. Mattel, 210 F.3d 1108 (9th Cir. 2000)); Celebrity Chefs Tour, LLC v. Macy's Inc., 16 F. Supp. 3d 1141, 1153 (S.D. Cal. 2014) (citing Brookfield Commc'ns, Inc. v. W. Coast Ent. Corp., 174 F.3d 1036, 1046 n. 6 (9th Cir. 1999)) (a claim for [19] false designation of origin is subject to the same standard as trademark infringement but does not require the mark to be registered).

Thus, the Court may look to the Sleekcraft factors in its analysis: (1) strength of the mark, (2) relatedness of the goods, (3) similarity of sight, sound and meaning, (4) evidence of actual confusion, (5) marketing channels, (6) type of goods and purchaser care, (7) intent and (8) likelihood of expansion. AMF, Inc. v. Sleekcraft Boats, 599 F.2d 341, 348-49 (9th Cir. 1979), abrogated on other grounds by Mattel, Inc. v. Walking Mountain Prods., 353 F.3d 792, 810, n. 19 (9th Cir. 2003). As Fiber Research points out, several of these factors are uniquely applicable to trademark infringement and, thus, are not helpful here, but the overall framework is helpful to the analysis. See E & J Gallo Winery v. Gallo Cattle Co., 967 F.2d 1280, 1290 (9th Cir. 1992) ("This list of factors . . . is neither exhaustive nor exclusive. Rather, the factors are intended to guide the court in assessing the basic question of likelihood of confusion."); Entrepreneur Media, Inc., v. Smith, 279 F.3d 1135, 1140 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Although the Sleekcraft test plays an important role in the analysis of whether a likelihood of confusion exists, it is the totality of facts in a given case that is dispositive." (citation and internal quotations omitted)).

Obesity Research argues the Lanham Act cause of action should be dismissed for failure to state a claim because: (1) the [20] allegations regarding likelihood of confusion are conclusory; (2) the cause of action fails to allege Propol is used in U.S. commerce; (3) the FACC fails to allege the notice required for treble damages under 15 U.S.C. §1111; (4) the alleged false statements are not false or misleading; and (5) the FACC fails to allege plausible facts showing Fiber Research suffered economic injury.

With respect to likelihood of confusion, the Court finds Fiber Research alleges sufficient relation and similarity between Propol and Lipozene to justify the conclusion that confusion is likely. Fiber Research alleges that Lipozene specifically uses the Propol research studies to bolster its claims, without justification. Furthermore, the type of purchaser, those buying weight loss supplements, is not likely to have the resources to analyze whether the content of the supplements are as represented or not. Fiber Research alleges that Obesity Research makes these misleading statements intentionally to encourage customer confusion. Therefore, the allegations of "likelihood of confusion" are sufficient to support Fiber Research's Lanham Act claims at this stage.

Furthermore, the Court finds Fiber Research sufficiently alleges [21] both Lipozene and Propol are used in commerce in the United States. (See FACC at ¶ 25 ("Lipozene has become the United States' best-selling weight loss product."); and ¶ 28 ("Fiber Research markets Propol in the United States.").) This is sufficient to meet the requirement under 15 U.S.C. §1125(a)(1) that the goods or services at issue be used "in commerce." Fiber Research need not allege that Obesity Research uses the Propol trademark in commerce in a false designation of origin claim. See Summit Tech., Inc., 933 F. Supp. [*951] at 928; Luxul Tech. Inc., 78 F. Supp. 3d at 1170.

Obesity Research's argument that Fiber Research failed to allege notice under 15 U.S.C. §1111[2] is not well-founded. First, this section, by its terms, applies to an action for trademark infringement, which is not the case here. Second, Obesity Research, in its Complaint, alleges Propol was listed, with the letter R enclosed within a circle, in the letter sent to Obesity Research on March 10, 2015 prior to this suit being initiated. (Compl. at ¶¶ 4, 10.) Therefore, Obesity Research's argument on this ground must fail.

The Court further finds that Fiber Research has sufficiently alleged that the purported false statements are false or misleading under its false advertising claim. The FACC alleges that since late 2006, Obesity Research has been marketing and advertising Lipozene as being "clinically proven" to help reduce body fat and weight, in reliance on studies that tested Propol, and not Lipozene, which does not have "the same functional chemical profile as Propol." (See FACC at ¶¶ 44-73.) One of the studies the FACC alleges Lipozene relies on is a 2004 study entitled "A Randomized Double-Blinded Placebo-Controlled Study of Overweight Adults Comparing the Safety and Efficacy of a Highly Viscous Glucomannan Dietary Supplement (Propol ™)" ("Kaats Study"). (See FACC at ¶ 46, Exh. 2.) The other is a 1984 study entitled "Effect of Glucomannan on Obese Patients: A Clinical Study," which tested "Glucomannan fiber (from konjac root)" ("Walsh Study"). (See FACC at ¶ 45, Exh. 1.) Among the allegations in the FACC is that Obesity Research's Lipozene website has been falsely characterizing [23] the Walsh Study as a "Lipozene Clinical Study." (Id. at ¶ 71.)

Obesity Research argues that the alleged false statements are not false and misleading because the Walsh Study does not explicitly say it used Propol in its testing, and the FACC insufficiently alleges it advertised using the Kaats Study. However, the FACC alleges that the Walsh Study tested Propol, which Fiber Research defines as glucomannan extracted from Konjac, a root vegetable, by means of a propriety, patented process. (FACC at ¶¶ 24, 45, 60-61.) At this stage, the Court finds these allegations sufficient. Furthermore, with respect to the Kaats Study, the FACC alleges that many Lipozene commercials "contain textual, small-print sentences stating that participants in the clinical study to which the commercials refer lost 4.93 pounds, of which 3.86 was body fat (thus forming Obesity Research's '78% was body fat' figure: 3.86 / 4.93 = 0.78296)" and this was the exact finding in the Kaats Study. (FACC at ¶ 54; see also FACC at ¶ 55 ("Obesity Research highlighted the fact that the study on which it relies was conducted during the holiday season, as was the Kaats [S]tudy"); ¶ 56 (Obesity Research commercials state "[c]linical data shows [24] that the amount of weight loss experienced between the active and placebo group was 4.93 lbs. and of the 4.93 lbs of weight loss experienced by the active group 3.86 lbs was body fat.") The Court also finds these allegations sufficient at this stage.

Obesity Research further argues that there is nothing false or misleading about its statement on its website that "[n]umerous [*952] clinical studies confirm Lipozene's active ingredient, Glucomannan, is safe and effective for weight loss and body fat loss." In other words, Obesity Research is claiming that the Glucomannan used in its product is safe and effective for weight loss and body fat loss. Fiber Research alleges that a chemical analysis of Lipozene by Japan Food Research Laboratories, which it attaches to its FACC, "demonstrates that Lipozene, unlike Propol glucomannan or a substantial equivalent, contains poor-quality, cheap ingredients and adulterants that do not have the same functional chemical profile as Propol. Hence, Lipozene does not have the weight loss benefits of Propol as demonstrated by Propol's clinical testing," which Fiber Research is relying on in making its statement. (See FACC at ¶¶ 64-66.) Accordingly, the Court finds these [25] allegations sufficient to plausibly allege this statement is false or misleading.

Lastly, as discussed above under the Court's standing discussion, the Court finds the FACC alleges plausible facts showing Fiber Research has been or is likely to suffer economic injury.

2. UCL

[2] Section 1111 requires that "a registrant of a mark registered in the Patent and Trademark Office . . . give notice that his mark is registered by ... the letter R enclosed within a circle" prior to bringing any "suit for infringement." [22] 15 U.S.C. § 1111. However, "section 1111 is not a defense to infringement, but a limitation on remedies." *mophie, Inc. v. Shah, No. SA CV 13-01321-DMG(JEMx), 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 185196, 2014 WL 10988347, at 22 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 12, 2014) (citing United States v. Sung, 51 F.3d 92, 94 (7th Cir. 1995)).

The UCL prohibits, and provides civil remedies for, unfair competition, which it defines as "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising." Kwikset Corp., 51 Cal. 4th at 322 (quoting Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200). "Because the statute is written in the disjunctive, it is violated where a defendant's act or practice is (1) unlawful, (2) unfair, (3) fraudulent, or (4) in violation of section 17500," i.e., the FAL. Lozano v. AT&T Wireless Servs., Inc., 504 F.3d 718, 731 (9th Cir. 2007). Obesity Research moves to dismiss Fiber Research's UCL claim to the extent Fiber Research alleges a violation of the "unfair" prong, arguing that it relies on an outdated definition of "unfair," and the "unlawful" and "fraudulent" prongs, arguing that the FACC's allegations are insufficiently specific to pass muster under Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

a. Fraudulent prong

To state a claim under the UCL's "fraudulent" prong, Fiber Research must plead that Obesity Research's allegedly fraudulent business practice is one in which "members of [26] the public are likely to be deceived." Schnall v. Hertz Corp., 78 Cal. App. 4th 1144, 1167, 93 Cal. Rptr. 2d 439 (2000). "Unless the challenged conduct targets a particular disadvantaged or vulnerable group, it is judged by the effect it would have on a reasonable consumer." Puentes v. Wells Fargo Home Mortg., Inc., 160 Cal. App. 4th 638, 645, 72 Cal. Rptr. 3d 903 (2008) (quotations and citation omitted).

Obesity Research argues the Counterclaims are pled with insufficient specificity under Rule 9(b). Because this claim is based on fraud, the circumstances surrounding the fraud must be alleged with particularity. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b); see also Kearns v. Ford Motor Co., 567 F.3d 1120, 1125 (9th Cir. 2009) (Rule 9(b) applies to UCL claims based on fraud). The FACC goes into great detail as to who, what, and when the fraudulent conduct was allegedly committed, even attaching copies of the allegedly fraudulent marketing materials. Obesity Research's argument on this ground must fail.

b. Unlawful prong

The UCL's "unlawful" prong is essentially an incorporation-by-reference provision. See Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 180 ("By proscribing any unlawful business practice, section 17200 borrows [*953] violations of other laws and treats them as unlawful practices that the [UCL] makes independently actionable." (citations and internal quotation marks omitted)). "Violation of almost any federal, state, or local law may serve as the basis for a UCL claim." Plascencia v. Lending 1st Mortg., 583 F. Supp. 2d 1090, 1098 (N.D. Cal. 2008) (citing Saunders v. Super. Ct., 27 Cal. App. 4th 832, 838-39, 33 Cal. Rptr. 2d 438 (1994)). "When a statutory claim fails, a derivative UCL claim [27] also fails." Aleksick v. 7-Eleven, Inc., 205 Cal. App. 4th 1176, 1185, 140 Cal. Rptr. 3d 796 (2012).

Fiber Research alleges Obesity Research's conduct was "unlawful" because it violates the Lanham Act, the FFDCA Act, the FAL, and the Sherman Act. (FFAC at ¶ 90.) Again, Obesity Research argues this is insufficient particularity under Rule 9(b). The Court disagrees. As discussed above, the FACC lays out in great detail how each of these Acts were allegedly violated. Furthermore, this Court has already found the allegations are sufficient to constitute a violation of the Lanham Act. Hence Obesity Research's motion on this ground must also fail.

c. Unfair prong

Under the UCL, "[w]hen a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's 'unfair' act or practice invokes section 17200, the word 'unfair' in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 187.[3] Thus, Fiber Research must allege that Obesity Research's conduct "(1) violates the policy or spirit of the [3] Fiber Research argues this test does not apply, relying on a footnote in Cel-Tech, which states this test does not apply to "actions by consumers or by competitors alleging other kinds of violations of the unfair competition law such as "fraudulent" or "unlawful" business practices or "unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising." Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 187, n. 12. The Court disagrees. This is not an action by a consumer and the Court is not applying this test to the other prongs of the UCL.

antitrust laws because the effect of the conduct is comparable to or the same as a violation [28] of the antitrust laws, or (2) it otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." People's Choice Wireless, Inc. v. Verizon Wireless, 131 Cal. App. 4th 656, 662, 31 Cal. Rptr. 3d 819 (2005) (citing Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 187). Notably, "[i]njury to a competitor is not equivalent to injury to competition; only the latter is the proper focus of antitrust laws." Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 186. Acts that violate the spirit of the antitrust laws include "horizontal price fixing, exclusive dealing, or monopolization." See Celebrity Chefs Tour, LLC v. Macy's Inc., 16 F. Supp. 3d 1141, 1156 (S.D. Cal. 2014).

In its opposition to the motion, Fiber Research states that the FACC "does not allege 'anticompetitive practices.'" (Opp. at p. 18.) The Court agrees. Although the purpose of the Lanham Act is to protect persons engaged in commerce against unfair competition, POM Wonderful LLC v. Coca-Cola Co., 134 S. Ct. 2228, 2234, 189 L. Ed. 2d 141 (2014), Plaintiff only alleges harm to its own commercial interests, rather than harm to competition. See Watson Labs., Inc. v. Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 178 F. Supp. 2d 1099, 1117 (C.D. Cal. 2001) (finding the plaintiff [29] could not prevail where the evidence merely indicated harm to its commercial interests rather than harm to [*954] competition). Accordingly, the Court grants Obesity Research's motion to dismiss Fiber Research's claim under the "unfair" prong of the UCL.

C. Laches

Obesity Research argues that all of Fiber Research's Counterclaims are barred by laches because they allege Obesity Research began marketing Lipozene in 2006, and many of the advertisements complained of aired in 2006 and 2007, and this suit was not filed until 2015. "Laches is an equitable defense that prevents a plaintiff, who with full knowledge of the facts, acquiesces in a transaction and sleeps upon his rights." Danjaq, LLC v. Sony Corp., 263 F.3d 942, 950-51 (9th Cir. 2001) (internal quotations and citation omitted). Laches is a valid defense to Lanham Act claims, including those for false advertising. Jarrow Formulas, Inc., v Nutrition Now, Inc., 304 F.3d 829, 835 (9th Cir. 2002).

"To demonstrate laches, the defendant must prove both an unreasonable delay by the plaintiff and prejudice to itself." Danjaq, 263 F. 3d at 951 (quotations omitted). The delay is measured from the time a plaintiff knew, or should have known, about a cause of action. Jarrow, 304 F.3d at 838; see also Danjaq, 263 F. 3d at 952. "[I]f the plaintiff legitimately was unaware of the defendant's conduct, laches is no bar to suit." Id. When determining reasonableness, [30] courts look at the cause of delay. Danjaq, 263 F. 3d at 954. A defendant can demonstrate prejudice in two ways: either evidentiary, showing that evidence has been lost or memories have faded, or expectations-based, showing that the defendant has taken actions or suffered consequences it would not have had plaintiff brought timely suit. Id. at 955.

"Because laches is an equitable remedy, laches will not apply if the public has a strong interest in having the suit proceed." Jarrow, 304 F.3d at 840. However, "[t]he public's interest will trump laches only when the suit concerns allegations that the product is harmful or otherwise a threat to public safety and well being." Id. at 841. Furthermore, a party with unclean hands may not assert laches. Id. This bar to laches for unclean hands applies "only if the court is left with a firm conviction that the defendant acted with a fraudulent intent in making the challenged claims." Id. at 842.

A quick review of this law makes it obvious how inappropriate the motion is at this stage of the proceedings. The issue is primarily a fact-based issue. See Dirk Ter Haar v. Seaboard Oil Co. of Del., 1 F.R.D. 598, 598 (S.D. Cal. 1940) ("The defense of laches . . . may not be asserted by motion to dismiss, but should be set forth affirmatively in defendant's answer"); *24/7 Customer, Inc. v. 24-7 Intouch, No. 5:14-cv-02561-EJD, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43935, 2015 WL 1522236, at 4 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 31, 2015) [31] ("laches and statute of limitations defenses often require a fact-intensive investigation that is inappropriate on a motion to dismiss.") Looking at the FACC and assuming everything in it is true, there are no allegations that support Obesity Research's claim of laches. There is no allegation as to when Fiber Research knew or should have known of the cause of action. If there was a delay, there is no information as to the cause of delay. There is no evidence or allegation that Obesity Research has been in any way prejudiced by any delay. Finally, Fiber Research has alleged an affirmative defense of unclean hands. It will require fact-based discovery to determine whether evidence supports either a public interest that trumps the defense of laches or fraudulent intent on the part of Obesity Research. The Court agrees with Fiber Research. The motion to dismiss based on laches is premature.

[*955] IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court GRANTS IN PART and DENIES IN PART Obesity Research's Motion to Dismiss the First Amended Counterclaims (ECF No. 43). The Court GRANTS Obesity Research's motion to the extent it moves to limit Fiber Research's claims under the UCL and FAL to damages it [32] suffered directly, as opposed to indirectly as an assignee of Shimizu, and to the extent it moves to dismiss Fiber Research's claim under the "unfair" prong of the UCL. However, in all other respects, Obesity Research's motion is DENIED.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

ORDER GRANTING DEFENDANT'S MOTION TO DISMISS [9]

I. INTRODUCTION

After falling behind on her mortgage payments, Plaintiff Cynthia Castaneda attempted to modify her loan with Defendant Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. ("Wells Fargo")—the ultimate successor of World Savings Bank, FSB ("World Savings Bank").[1] Castaneda alleges that Wells Fargo recorded a Notice of Trustee's Sale prematurely; that it failed to provide her with a written denial of her third loan modification application; that it added unfair and duplicative fees for default-related services; [*2] and that it was negligent. Castaneda also makes a claim for accounting. Wells Fargo removed the case and now moves to dismiss. For the reasons stated below, the Court GRANTS Wells Fargo's Motion to Dismiss.

II. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

In September 2004, Castaneda obtained a $223,300.00 loan from World Savings Bank which was secured with a Deed of Trust against the real property at 8231 Quoit Street, Downey, California. (ECF No 10-1, Ex. A.)[2] World Savings Bank was a federal savings bank, regulated at the time by the Office of Thrift Supervision. (Id., Ex. G.) After several mergers, Wells Fargo became the legal successor to World Savings Bank. (ECF No. 9.)

Castaneda defaulted on her loan and on August 3, 2012, Wells Fargo recorded [*3] a Notice of Default and Election to Sell Under Deed of Trust. (ECF No. 1-1, Ex. A (Compl.) ¶¶ 37-38.) On or around September 19, 2013, Castaneda submitted a complete application for a loan modification, and in December 2013 she received two letters from Wells Fargo indicating that she did not qualify. (Id. ¶¶ 39-41.) Around July 2014, she submitted a second complete application for a loan modification, naming her husband as a contributor. (Id. ¶ 42.) On August 13, 2014, while Castaneda's second complete loan application was under review, Wells Fargo recorded a Notice of Trustee's Sale. (Id. ¶ 43.) In October 2014, Wells Fargo sent Castaneda a written denial of her second loan modification application and indicated that she did not qualify for any modification program with $4,100 of monthly income. (Id. ¶ 44.) Castaneda filed a timely appeal, which was denied. (Id.)

Castaneda soon retained counsel to assist her with the loan modification process. Her counsel requested information from Wells Fargo relating to Castaneda's loss mitigation options and transaction history. (Id. ¶ 46.) Wells Fargo responded with a loan history statement, which included various charges such as, "Misc. Application [*4] Pay," "After NOD Exp," "Late Charge Adjust," and others. (Id. ¶ 47.)

Around April 13, 2015, Castaneda submitted a third loan modification application, stating a material change in circumstances. (Id. ¶ 65.) Specifically, she mentioned that her husband began working more overtime. (Id.) His monthly income was now $5,200, a $1,100 difference from the monthly income contained in the October 2014 denial letter. (Id.) Castaneda, through her counsel, contacted Wells Fargo on April 17, 2015 to inquire about her pending application. (Id. ¶ 66.) A Wells Fargo representative confirmed that a complete application was received, but it noted that it would not be opening a modification review. (Id.) To date, Wells Fargo has not provided Castaneda a written denial of the third complete loan modification application. (Id.)

On October 18, 2015, Castaneda filed suit against Wells Fargo in Los Angeles County Superior Court alleging several violations of California's Homeowner Bill of Rights ("HOBR") and California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), negligence, and a breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. (Id.) Castaneda also makes a demand for accounting. (Id.) On November 13, 2015, Wells Fargo removed [*5] the action invoking diversity jurisdiction. (ECF No. 1.)

On November 20, 2015, Wells Fargo moved to dismiss Castaneda's Complaint for failure to state a claim. (ECF No. 9.) The parties filed a timely opposition and reply. (ECF Nos. 11, 14.) Wells Fargo's Motion is now before the Court for decision.

[1] National Bankruptcy Services, LLC, ("NBS") was named as a defendant but is a nominal party to this lawsuit. NBS replaced Cal-Western Reconveyance Corporation as the trustee in the deed of trust encumbering the party at issue. Plaintiff fails to state any facts that materially tie NBS to any alleged wrongdoing. (ECF No. 1, p. 6.)

[2] The Court GRANTS Defendant's Request for Judicial Notice to the extent that the Court uses the documents adduced in this Order. (ECF No. 10.)

III. LEGAL STANDARD

A court may dismiss a complaint under Rule 12(b)(6) for lack of a cognizable legal theory or insufficient facts pleaded to support an otherwise cognizable legal theory. Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). To survive a dismissal motion, a complaint need only satisfy the minimal notice pleading requirements of Rule 8(a)(2)—a short and plain statement of the claim. Porter v. Jones, 319 F.3d 483, 494 (9th Cir. 2003). The factual "allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). That is, the complaint must "contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009).

The determination whether a complaint satisfies the plausibility standard is a "context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense." Id. at 679. A court is generally limited to the pleadings and must construe all "factual allegations set forth in the complaint . . . as true and . . . in [*6] the light most favorable" to the plaintiff. Lee v. City of L.A., 250 F.3d 668, 688 (9th Cir. 2001). But a court need not blindly accept conclusory allegations, unwarranted deductions of fact, and unreasonable inferences. Sprewell v. Golden State Warriors, 266 F.3d 979, 988 (9th Cir. 2001).

As a general rule, a court should freely give leave to amend a complaint that has been dismissed. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a). But a court may deny leave to amend when "the court determines that the allegation of other facts consistent with the challenged pleading could not possibly cure the deficiency." *Schreiber Distrib. IV. DISCUSSION

Wells Fargo contends that Castaneda's causes of action fail to state a claim on their allegations. The Court will address each issue in turn.

A. HBOR Claims

Castaneda's first cause of action asserts claims under the California Homeowner Bill of Rights ("HBOR"). Specifically, she alleges that Wells Fargo violated California Civil Code section 2923.6(c) while handling her second loan modification application, section 2923.6(g) while handling her third loan modification application, and, as a consequence, also violated sections 2923.6(d) and 2923.6(f).

a. Cal. Civ. Code § 2923.6(c)

Castaneda alleges that Wells Fargo violated California's law against dual tracking. The HBOR forbids a mortgage servicer from "dual tracking," or "record[ing] a notice of default or notice of sale . . . while the [borrower's] complete first lien loan modification is pending." Cal. Civ. Code § 2923.6(c).

Her allegation [*7] of dual tracking under section 2923.6(c) occurred when: (1) Castaneda submitted her second loan modification application to Wells Fargo in July 2014, and (2) Wells Fargo recorded a Notice of Trustee's Sale on August 13, 2014 without providing Castaneda with a determination on her pending application.

Wells Fargo claims that Castaneda's allegation of dual tracking is moot because it subsequently provided her with written notice denying both her application and appeal in October and November 2014, respectively, thus remedying the violations. The Court agrees. If a mortgage servicer corrects and remedies a violation prior to the recordation of a trustee's deed upon sale, it is not liable for violating section 2923.6(c). Cal. Civ. Code § 2924.12(c). See Jerviss v. Select Portfolio Servicing, Inc., No. 2:15-cv-01904-MCE-KJN, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 159630, 2015

*WL 7572130, at 5 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 25, 2015) (holding a dual tracking claim was moot after defendant sent written denial of plaintiff's application before a sale was recorded); *Diamos v. Specialized Loan Servicing LLC, No. 13-CV-04997 NC, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158092, 2014 WL 3362259, at 5 (N.D. Cal. July 7, 2014) (holding that a cause of action for dual tracking is moot when defendant rescinded notice of default); *Jent v. N. Trust Corp., No. 13-cv-01684 WBS, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5478, 2014 WL 172542, at 5 (E.D. Cal. Jan. 15, 2014) (holding that liability was precluded when defendants had rescinded the notice of default and no trustee's deed upon sale had been recorded); see also *Pearson v. Green [*8] Tree Servicing, LLC, No. 14-CV-04524-JSC, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18297, 2015 WL 632457, at 2 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 13, 2015) (explaining that if the servicer takes action to correct the HBOR violation before proceeding to foreclosure, no liability results) (emphasis added).

Here, Castaneda does not allege that a trustee's deed upon sale has been recorded. Furthermore, the Complaint shows that Wells Fargo cured the alleged violation of section 2923.6(c) by delivering a written denial to Castaneda's second loan application in October 2014. (Compl. ¶ 44.) Accepting Castaneda's allegations as true, Wells Fargo cured any purported violation of section 2923.6(c) by complying with 2924.12(c). As such, the Court GRANTS Defendant's Motion as to section 2923.6(c).

b. Cal. Civ. Code § 2923.6(g)

Castaneda next alleges that Wells Fargo violated section 2923.6(g), which requires a mortgage servicer to evaluate applications from borrowers who have already been evaluated for a first lien loan modification if "there has been a material change in the circumstances since the date of the borrower's previous application . . . ." Cal. Civ. Code § 2923.6(g). Castaneda claims that her husband's monthly income at the time of her third loan modification application in April 2015 was $5,200—a $1,100 increase from her second application in July 2014—and that Wells Fargo failed to evaluate her application despite this [*9] material change. (Compl. ¶¶ 65, 66.)

Wells Fargo argues that Plaintiff's second application included her husband's income; therefore it had already considered the change in circumstance Castaneda argues is relevant here. (ECF No. 9, p. 5.) Additionally, Wells Fargo argues that Castaneda has not provided the requisite documentation for her third application showing a material change in circumstance.[3] (Id. at p. 14.)

Indeed, Castaneda must do more than plausibly plead a material change in circumstance to state a claim under section 2923.6(g). Castaneda must allege that she provided documentation of her updated circumstances to Wells Fargo. *Salazar v. U.S. Bank Nat. Ass'n, No. ED CV 14-514-GHK (DTBx), 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49172, 2015 WL 1542908, at 4 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 6, 2015). Construing the facts in Plaintiff's favor as is required at this stage, the Court finds that Castaneda has not met her burden. In her Complaint, Castaneda alleges that she faxed a loan modification application noting that her husband was working more overtime, resulting in the $1,100 increase in income from the second loan [*10] modification application. (Compl. ¶ 65.) "[A]lthough the precise nature of the documentation required under this code is not clear, the plaintiff must do more than submit a new loan modification with different financial information." *Saber v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8718, 2014 WL 255700, at 2 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 23, 2014); see also *Salazar, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49172, 2015 WL 1542908, at 4. To find otherwise would be to defeat the intent of subsection (g), which is to "relieve mortgage servicers from evaluating multiple loan applications submitted for the purpose of delay." *Winterbower v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44087, 2013 WL 1232997, at 3 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 27, 2013).

As such, Castaneda must allege what, if any, proper documentation she submitted to Wells Fargo to support her material change in circumstance for the third loan modification application. See *Winterbower, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44087, 2013 WL 1232997 at 3 (documenting and submitting a material change in circumstance "means more than simply stating one's [income] has increased and then providing two numbers"). The Court GRANTS Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's 2923.6(g) claim with leave to amend.

[3] Plaintiff provides documentation for a fourth loan modification application filed in October 2015, but did not provide documentation for her third loan modification application. (ECF No. 11, Ex. A, pp. 14-64.)

c. Cal. Civ. Code §§ 2923.6(d), 2923.6(f)

Castaneda alleges other HBOR violations stemming from Wells Fargo's decision not to review her third loan modification application. She alleges a violation of section 2923.6(f), which requires a servicer to provide written notice to the borrower that includes the reason for denial, and a violation of 2923.6(d), which grants the borrower thirty days after [*11] the written denial to file an appeal. Cal. Civ. Code §§ 2923.6(d), 2923.6(f).

These claims are premised on the assumption that Wells Fargo had any obligation to review Castaneda's third application under section 2923.6(g). Because Castaneda has not adequately stated a claim for relief under 2923.6(g), the Court GRANTS Defendant's Motion to Dismiss these derivative claims with leave to amend.

B. Negligence

Castaneda's next cause of action is for negligence. Wells Fargo contends that Castaneda failed to state a claim for negligence because lenders do not generally owe their borrowers a duty of care.

Under California law, the "existence of a duty of care owed by a defendant to a plaintiff is a prerequisite to establishing a claim for negligence." Nymark v. Heart Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 231 Cal. App. 3d 1089, 1095, 283 Cal. Rptr. 53 (1991). Generally, a financial institution does not owe its borrower a duty of care "when the institution's involvement in the loan transaction does not exceed the scope of its conventional role as a mere lender of money." Id. at 1096. A lender exceeds its "conventional role" as a money lender when it "actively participates" in the financed enterprise "beyond the domain of the usual money lender." Wagner v. Benson, 101 Cal. App. 3d 27, 35, 161 Cal. Rptr. 516 (1980) (quoting Connor v. Great W. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 69 Cal. 2d 850, 864, 73 Cal. Rptr. 369, 447 P.2d 609 (1968)).

Castaneda does not allege in her Complaint any facts suggesting that Wells Fargo exceeded the normal role of [*12] a lender during the default/foreclosure process; she simply reiterates that it failed to comply with the procedures set forth in section 2923.6, as stated above. (Compl. ¶¶ 75-77.)

While Castaneda's allegations under section 2923.6 may make out statutory violations if sufficiently pled, they still do not establish that Wells Fargo "actively participate[d]" in Castaneda's loan "beyond the domain of the usual money lender." See Wagner, 101 Cal. App. 3d at 35. Rather, these actions—or inactions such as they are—fall squarely within the class of conduct a lender might take during the default process. The Court thus GRANTS Defendant's Motion on this claim.

C. Unfair Competition Law

Castaneda next brings a claim against Wells Fargo for violating the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"). The UCL prohibits "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Wells Fargo contends that Castaneda both lacks standing to bring a UCL claim and fails to adequately plead allegations of unlawful, fraudulent, or unfair conduct. (ECF No. 9, pp. 19-20.)

1. UCL standing

To have standing to sue under the UCL, a plaintiff must have "suffered injury in fact and [have] lost money or property as a result of the [*13] unfair competition." Id. § 17204. The California Supreme Court held that to satisfy this requirement, the plaintiff must "(1) establish a loss or deprivation of money or property sufficient to qualify as injury in fact, i.e., economic injury, and (2) show that the economic injury was the result of, i.e., caused by, the unfair business practice or false advertising that is the gravamen of the claim." Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 322, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (2011).

Wells Fargo argues that Castaneda has not alleged any injury or a loss of money or property that was caused by its conduct because the foreclosure sale has not occurred yet. (ECF No. 9, p. 19.) Instead, it contends that any of Castaneda's injuries would be due to her own failure to pay her mortgage as she promised. Id.

But Castaneda does allege that she suffered economic injury as a result of Wells Fargo's conduct, namely the loss of home equity. (Compl. ¶ 102.) Castaneda asserts that Wells Fargo's decision to charge marked up and excess fees caused her to lose title to, and interest in, her home. (Id. ¶ 103.) These economic detriments easily satisfy the California Supreme Court's interpretation of section 17204. See Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th at 323 (interpreting the phrase "lost money or property").

The Court therefore finds that the Castaneda [*14] has standing to sue under the UCL.

2. "Unlawful" conduct

UCL's "unlawful" prong "borrows" violations of other laws such that a "defendant cannot be liable under § 17200 for committing unlawful business practices without having violated another law." Ingels v. Westwood One Broad. Servs., Inc., 129 Cal. App. 4th 1050, 1060, 28 Cal. Rptr. 3d 933 (2005) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Farmers Ins. Exch. v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. 4th 377, 383, 6 Cal. Rptr. 2d 487, 826 P.2d 730 (1992).

Wells Fargo attacks Castaneda's allegations that it violated various provisions of section 2923.6 or was otherwise unlawful in its dealings with Plaintiff.

a. 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341, 1343, 1962

Castaneda alleges, rather vaguely, that Wells Fargo's decision to omit material facts with respect to her third loan modification application constitutes "unlawful" conduct because it violates 18 U.S.C. section 1341 (mail fraud), section 1343 (wire fraud), and section 1962 (criminal racketeering). Even after sifting through the Complaint with a fine-toothed comb, the Court cannot find enough facts to support any cognizable violation under the aforementioned sections of Title 18.

b. Cal. Civ. Code § 2923.6

Further, because the Court has already found that Castaneda did not adequately plead a violation of the HBOR, any alleged violations under section 2923.6 cannot serve as a predicate for a UCL claim. See Martinez v. Wells Fargo Home Mortg., Inc., 598 F.3d 549, 558 (9th Cir. 2010).

3. "Fraudulent" conduct

A "fraudulent" business act or practice is one which is likely to deceive members of the public. Weinstat v. Dentsply Intern., Inc., 180 Cal. App. 4th 1213, 1223, 103 Cal. Rptr. 3d 614 (2010). UCL claims premised [*15] on fraudulent conduct trigger the heightened pleading standard under Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Kearns v. Ford Motor Co., 567 F.3d 1120, 1125 (9th Cir. 2009).

Here, the Complaint fails to meet the heightened pleading standard required for fraud claims because Castaneda only vaguely alleges how members of the public are likely to be deceived by Wells Fargo's actions. She alleges that Wells Fargo instituted improper or premature foreclosure proceedings to generate fees for default-related services, all while concealing the true character, quality and nature of the fees—or simply put, the fees themselves were marked-up and unwarranted. (E.g., Compl. ¶¶ 94, 99.) She jumps to the conclusion that these practices are likely to deceive the public. However, these allegations are insufficient to meet the heightened pleading standard required to plead a fraudulent business act.

4. "Unfair" conduct

In interpreting the UCL's "unfair" term, the California Supreme Court held that "the word 'unfair' in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 187, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999).

Castaneda [*16] has not alleged how Defendant's actions rose anywhere near the mandatory level of anticompetitive activity.

Accordingly, the Court GRANTS Defendant's Motion as to the UCL claim with leave to amend the unlawful prong only.

D. Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

Castaneda alleges that Wells Fargo breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing by denying her request for a loan modification and by imposing unnecessary and marked up fees in conjunction with its default-related services. This allegation suggests that Castaneda's loan agreement contained an implicit promise that Wells Fargo would assist her as she attempts to obtain a loan modification or pursue other loss mitigation alternatives. Castaneda tried with the section 2923.6 claim to persuade the Court that Wells Fargo is legally obligated to accept her request for a loan modification, and with the UCL claim to argue certain fees were imposed incorrectly and inconsistently onto her. The implied covenant approach is different in form, but not in substance.

The covenant of good faith and fair dealing is implied to protect the express covenants of a contract, not a general public policy interest indirectly tied to the contract's [*17] purpose. Racine & Laramie, Ltd. v. Cal. Dep't of Parks and Recreation, 11 Cal. App. 4th 1026, 1031, 14 Cal. Rptr. 2d 335 (1992). The covenant is implied as a supplement to the express contractual covenants "to prevent a contracting party from engaging in conduct" that does not technically breach the express covenants, but otherwise "frustrates the other party's rights to the benefits of the contract." Id. at 1028.

The obvious purpose of the mortgage loan is to memorialize the terms on which Castaneda will pay back the money borrowed. There is no reason to believe that somewhere in the agreement is an implicit promise to permit Plaintiff to change the terms of repayment due to her default. Such an implied promise would directly undermine, not protect, the contract's express terms. Regarding the fees for Well Fargo's default-related services, Castaneda has failed to identify how they were improperly assessed, or how the charges themselves undermine, rather than protect, the terms of the loan agreement. Therefore, the Court GRANTS Wells Fargo's Motion as to this cause of action.

E. Accounting

Lastly, Castaneda makes a demand for accounting based on the fees alleged to be improper and unnecessary. For her to be entitled to accounting, Castaneda must demonstrate a relationship between the plaintiff and defendant exists [*18] that requires an accounting, and that some balance is due to the plaintiff that can only be ascertained by an accounting. See Teselle v. McLoughlin, 173 Cal. App. 4th 156, 179, 92 Cal. Rptr. 3d 696 (2009).

Other than merely concluding that Wells Fargo owes her a duty, Castaneda has not demonstrated why that is the case. As stated once before, a mortgage lender or trustee under a deed of trust generally does not owe a fiduciary duty to the borrower. See Nymark, 231 Cal. App. 3d 1089, 1093 n. 1, 283 Cal. Rptr. 53 (1991). Castaneda claims, however, that a relationship for accounting exists because Wells Fargo collected money that it actually did not have forthcoming. This notwithstanding, Castaneda has failed to plead sufficient facts regarding these fees to survive a motion to dismiss. See *Williams v. Wells Fargo Bank, NA, No. EDCV 13-02075 JVS (DTBx), 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17215, 2014 WL 1568857, 9 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 27, 2014) ("The [c]omplaint is devoid of any factual details regarding when these charges were assessed, the venders involved, or why [Plaintiff] . . . concluded that these charges were excessive."). Thus, the Court GRANTS Wells Fargo's Motion on the demand for accounting.

V. CONCLUSION

For the reasons discussed above, the Court GRANTS Defendant's Motion to Dismiss. (ECF No. 9.) Castaneda may amend her Complaint within 14 days with respect to the HBOR claims and the UCL's unlawful prong only.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Opinion

INTRODUCTION

Appellant Leonard Isenberg, a teacher and former member of the United Teachers Los Angeles labor union (UTLA or the union), sued the union and a law firm, Trygstad, Schwab & Trygstad (Trygstad), alleging that they violated the Cartwright Act (Bus. & Prof. Code, §16720, et seq.) and the Unfair Competition Law (id., § 17200, et seq.) (UCL). Isenberg alleged that an exclusive representation agreement between UTLA and Trygstad limited the legal representation available to union members because UTLA would pay Trygstad, but no other attorneys or firms, to represent UTLA members in teacher disciplinary and dismissal proceedings. Isenberg alleged that this agreement unlawfully restrained trade in the relevant legal market. On the day set for trial, Trygstad moved to dismiss the case, arguing that [*2] that the Public Employee Relations Board (PERB) had exclusive jurisdiction over Isenberg's claims. The trial court granted the motion, and Isenberg appealed.

We hold that the trial court erred in finding that PERB had exclusive jurisdiction over Isenberg's claims. PERB's jurisdiction extends only to issues that have a substantial impact on the relationship between union members and their employers; PERB does not exercise jurisdiction over matters involving the internal activities of a union. PERB has ruled that disagreements between a union and its members relating to outside legal representation are solely internal matters beyond the scope of PERB's jurisdiction. Moreover, PERB does not exercise discretion over issues governed by the Education Code rather than by the Educational Employment Relations Act (EERA). Dismissal proceedings involving certificated teachers—the proceedings at issue in Isenberg's allegations—are governed by the Education Code, not the EERA, and therefore are not within PERB jurisdiction.

Defendants request that we affirm the trial court's dismissal on the alternative basis that the Cartwright Act exempts labor unions from liability. In fact, the Cartwright Act [*3] exempts a labor union from liability only when the union does not act with the purpose of restraining trade. There is insufficient evidence in the record to determine UTLA's purpose in employing only a single law firm. On this record, the labor exemption of the Cartwright Act therefore does not provide an alternative basis to affirm the dismissal.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

A. Isenberg's allegations

Isenberg was a teacher in the Los Angeles Unified School District (LAUSD) and is a former member of UTLA. The parties agree that UTLA is the exclusive bargaining agent for certificated LAUSD teachers. UTLA works with defendant Trygstad, which UTLA says "has a long-standing familiarity with the union and representation of teachers with respect to employment decisions." UTLA provides union members with legal representation by Trygstad as follows: "As a benefit of union membership, and at its discretion, UTLA affords its members reimbursement of $1,000 to $1,500 for legal fees for the services provided by Trygstad to the member. If, however, a union member wishes to retain legal counsel of his or her own choosing, the union member is free to do so."

Isenberg sued UTLA and Trygstad[1] in June [*4] 2012, alleging that together they conspired to monopolize the market for all UTLA members needing legal services. Isenberg alleged that UTLA and Trygstad entered into agreements "for the purpose of limiting access to legal services provided by any attorney except those employed by [Trygstad]. [¶] The purpose and goal of the conspiracy were [sic] to restrain and restrict the availability of legal services to UTLA members so that [Trygstad] could maintain a monopoly over such services in the relevant market."[2] The relevant market consisted of "more than 35,000 UTLA members." Isenberg alleged that union members who do not want to use Trygstad as their law firm must pay for their own legal representation. According to the complaint, UTLA purported to keep a list of law firms "approved" by UTLA, but in fact there was no process by which any other law firm or attorney could gain UTLA approval. Isenberg alleged that Trygstad had held this monopoly for more than 30 years.

[1] Isenberg added the "Educators Liability Insurance Fund" as a Doe defendant, but the record gives no indication that this entity ever answered or participated in proceedings below. UTLA's trial brief suggested that there is [*5] no such entity.

[2] The allegations vary somewhat in the different versions of the complaint filed. We focus on only the third amended complaint, which was operative at the time of the dismissal.

Isenberg alleged that he and other UTLA members were harmed by the exclusive relationship between UTLA and Trygstad. Isenberg alleged that when LAUSD initiated dismissal proceedings against him, he initially worked with Trygstad attorney Richard Schwab but later wanted different counsel. UTLA refused to pay any amount for a non-Trygstad attorney or law firm, even though UTLA had authorized a $15,000 fee for Trygstad to represent him. As a result, Isenberg alleged, he incurred fees and litigation expenses because he had to pay for his own attorney. In addition, Isenberg alleged that other UTLA members were damaged by the relationship between UTLA and Trygstad because Trygstad has "persuaded almost all of the teachers it has represented to accept a settlement agreement from LAUSD, including those who were factually and legally innocent of the charges." Isenberg also alleged that Trygstad routinely failed to assert critical affirmative defenses on behalf of teachers.

Isenberg asserted causes of action [*6] against UTLA and Trygstad for violations of the Cartwright Act (Bus. & Prof. Code, §16720, et seq.) and UCL (id., § 17200, et seq.). He alleged that the agreement between UTLA and Trygstad "restrains competition by refusing to authorize payment of legal fees and expenses [from UTLA] to any law firm except [Trygstad]." He also alleged that this conspiracy "interferes with the client's right to choose his or her own attorney." Affected parties were damaged because they had to pay attorney fees for other attorneys or accept substandard representation by Trygstad.

Isenberg asserted an additional cause of action against UTLA for fraudulent business practices, alleging that UTLA fraudulently represented to Isenberg and other members that it had a properly funded legal defense program in place. He alleged that UTLA concealed information from union members, including "the procedures to be followed to submit a claim, the standards for determining whether a claim will be paid, the name of the insurance company(ies) providing benefits, and procedures for appealing UTLA's decision not to provide payment for attorney's fees." Isenberg also alleged that "UTLA, acting as a quasi-fiduciary, may not act arbitrarily or discriminate between or among [*7] claimants."[3]

In response to Isenberg's first and second amended complaints, UTLA and Trygstad demurred and moved for judgment on the pleadings on the basis that as a labor union, UTLA was exempt from the Cartwright Act. They cited Business and Professions Code section 16703 (section 16703), which states, "Within the meaning of this chapter, labor, whether skilled or unskilled, is not a commodity." The trial court rejected the defendants' arguments, holding that the face of the complaint did not indicate that UTLA was exempt from the Cartwright Act, and therefore Isenberg's complaint stated a valid cause of action.

B. Trygstad's motion to dismiss

The day trial was set to begin, Trygstad filed a document titled, "Motion to Dismiss [*8] for Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction." In it, Trygstad asserted for the first time that "the Public Employment Relations Board ('PERB') has exclusive and initial jurisdiction over matters involving the unfair practices claims relating to unions." Trygstad cited part of the EERA, Government Code section 3541.5, which states, "The initial determination as to whether the charges of unfair practices are justified, and, if so, what remedy is necessary to effectuate the purposes of this chapter, shall be a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of the board."

[3] Isenberg also asserted a cause of action for professional negligence against Trygstad and partner Richard Schwab. Isenberg alleged that when he was involved in the disciplinary process with LAUSD, UTLA referred him to Trygstad, which did not adequately represent him. According to the complaint, Trygstad and Schwab did not disclose relevant conflicts of interest and failed to assert certain affirmative defenses. Isenberg dismissed this cause of action about three months before the parties were scheduled to go to trial.

In support of its argument, Trygstad said, "It cannot be disputed that Plaintiff's operative claims are for 'unfair practices' as contemplated under Section 3541.5." Trygstad pointed to a paragraph in Isenberg's complaint that quoted the language of the UCL, alleging that the defendants' actions constituted an "unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice." (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200.) Trygstad also argued that because Isenberg alleged a conspiracy between the union and Trygstad, the cause of action should be interpreted as alleging an "attempt by a union to restrain members' rights as contemplated by Government Code section 3543 and 3543.6(b) — claims properly subject to PERB."[4]

Trygstad conceded that PERB does not exercise jurisdiction over exclusively internal union matters, but argued that PERB jurisdiction applies because this case involves issues between union members and employers: "Plaintiff's claims in this Action involve a union member's ability to obtain legal representation at dismissal proceedings which ultimately determine whether this employer-employee relationship will continue or terminate. It cannot be reasonably argued that this issue and alleged restraint on representation does [sic] not have a substantial impact on this relationship." Trygstad also repeated its earlier argument that labor union activity is exempt from the Cartwright Act. UTLA joined the motion.

The trial court allowed Isenberg to file an opposition [*10] the same day. Isenberg argued that the case was not within PERB's jurisdiction because his allegations did not involve any issue arising under a collective bargaining agreement or within the employer-employee relationship. Isenberg pointed out, "There are no facts nor is there an allegation that any act or omission involved plaintiff and his employer, LAUSD." Therefore, Isenberg argued, the issue is not unfair labor practices under the EERA, but rather unfair business practices under the UCL and antitrust under the Cartwright Act. Isenberg also opposed the renewed argument that the actions in this case fall under the labor exemption to the Cartwright Act.

The following day, the court granted Trygstad's motion. The court held, "The Public Employment Relations Board ('PERB'), has exclusive and initial jurisdiction over matters involving unfair practice claims relating to unions. [¶] Mr. Isenberg's Third Amended Complaint alleges causes of action for unfair practices by the United Teachers Los Angeles ('UTLA') and Trygstad, Schwab, & Trygstd [sic] ('TST') specifically that these organizations conspired to monopolize the market for legal services and restricting the availability of these [*11] services. The Educational Employment Relations Act ('EERA'), makes clear that the initial determination as to whether an unfair practice charge is justified SHALL not MAY be [sic] within the exclusive jurisdiction of the PERB. California Government Code Section 3541.5." The minute order further stated, "It is undisputed that the benefits at issue here, i.e., the provision by the UTLA of attorney benefits . . . directly impacts the ability of a union member such as Mr. Isenberg to defend himself in dismissal proceedings brought by his employer. This very clearly substantially affects the relationship between employer and employee. [¶] For these reasons I must dismiss this matter as being outside of this Court's jurisdiction." (Ellipsis in original.) The court stated that it was not deciding whether UTLA was immune from Cartwright Act liability under the labor exception in that statute. The court dismissed the case with prejudice.

The court entered a judgment and awarded costs to defendants. Isenberg timely appealed.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

"Subject matter jurisdiction . . . is the power of the court over a cause of action or to act in a particular way." (Greener v. Workers' Comp. Appeals Bd. (1993) 6 Cal.4th 1028, 1035, 25 Cal. Rptr. 2d 539, 863 P.2d 784.) Here, the court found that it did not have subject matter jurisdiction over [*12] this case. An appeal from a dismissal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction presents a question of law that this court reviews de novo. (Robbins v. Foothill

[4] Government Code section 3543, subdivision (a) provides that public school employees may form [*9] and join unions, and that those unions may be exclusive representatives of the employees in employment relations with the employer. Subdivision (b) of section 3543 discusses grievance procedures. Government Code section 3543.6, subdivision (b) says it is unlawful for a union to "[i]mpose or threaten to impose reprisals on employees, to discriminate or threaten to discriminate against employees, or otherwise to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees because of their exercise of rights guaranteed by this chapter."

DISCUSSION

A. PERB did not have initial exclusive jurisdiction over Isenberg's allegations.

1. PERB jurisdiction extends to alleged violations of the EERA.

"The Legislature created the Educational Employment Relations Board (EERB) in 1975 to administer the Educational Employment Relations Act (EERA). ([Coachella Valley Mosquito and Vector Control Dist. v. California Public Employment Relations Bd. (2005) 35 Cal.4th 1072], 1084-1085, 29 Cal. Rptr. 3d 234, 112 P.3d 623.) In 1977 the Legislature expanded the EERB's jurisdiction to encompass unfair practice charges under the former State Employer-Employee Relations Act (§ 3512 et seq. [now the Ralph C. Dills Act]) and renamed the entity 'Public Employment Relations Board.' (Coachella Valley, at p. 1085.)" (County of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles County Employee Relations Com. (2013) 56 Cal.4th 905, 916, fn.10, 157 Cal. Rptr. 3d 481, 301 P.3d 1102.)

"The EERA governs employer-employee relations within public school systems. Government Code sections 3543.5 and 3543.6 set forth conduct deemed to constitute unfair employment practices by employers or employee organizations. Government Code section 3541.5 provides, '[t]he initial determination as to whether the charges of unfair practices are justified, and, if so, what remedy is necessary to effectuate the purposes of [*13] this chapter, shall be a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of [PERB].' PERB's exclusive jurisdiction extends to all alleged violations of the EERA, not just those which constitute unfair practices. [Citation.]" (Personnel Com. v. Barstow Unified School Dist. (1996) 43 Cal.App.4th 871, 885, 50 Cal. Rptr. 2d 797 (Barstow Unified).)

Barstow Unified characterized PERB's jurisdiction as "preempting" superior court jurisdiction. It noted, "The decisions considering PERB preemption of superior court jurisdiction can be divided into three categories. In the first category are cases in which the plaintiff alleges only a violation of the Education Code, and no arguable EERA violation is evident. In these cases, the courts find no preemption. [Citations.] [¶] In the second category are cases in which the plaintiff alleges only conduct constituting an unfair practice or other violation of the EERA. In these cases, the courts find preemption. [Citations.] [¶] In the third category are cases in which the plaintiff alleges both a violation of the Education Code and an unfair practice or other violation of the EERA. In these cases, the courts again find preemption. [Citations.]" (Barstow Unified, supra, 43 Cal.App.4th at pp. 886-887.)

This case does not fit into any of the three categories because Isenberg has not alleged that UTLA violated [*14] either the EERA or the Education Code.[5] Rather, Isenberg has alleged that defendants violated the Cartwright Act and the UCL. The Cartwright Act is California's principal antitrust law, intended to "rein in the burgeoning power of monopolies and cartels" by preserving consumer welfare. (In re Cipro Cases I & II (2015) 61 Cal.4th 116, 136, 187 Cal. Rptr. 3d 632, 348 P.3d 845.) "The act 'generally outlaws any combinations or agreements which restrain trade or competition or which fix or control prices' (Antitrust and Trade Reg. Law Section of the State Bar of Cal., Cal. Antitrust Law (1991) p. 4), and declares that, with certain exceptions, 'every trust is unlawful, against public policy and void' ([Bus. & Prof. Code,] § 16726)." (Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. County of Stanislaus (1997) 16 Cal.4th 1143, 1147, 69 Cal. Rptr. 2d 329, 947 P.2d 291.) Isenberg has alleged that the same actions constitute a violation of the UCL, which prohibits "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice." (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200.) "The UCL's purpose is to protect both consumers and competitors by promoting fair competition in commercial markets for goods and services." (Kasky v. Nike, Inc. (2002) 27 Cal.4th 939, 949, 119 Cal. Rptr. 2d 296, 45 P.3d 243.) "By defining unfair competition to include any 'unlawful . . . business act or practice' (§ 17200, italics added), the UCL permits violations of other laws to be treated as unfair competition that is independently actionable." (Ibid.)

[5] Respondents make a passing argument that [*15] this case also involves the Meyers-Milias-Brown Act (Gov. Code, § 3500 et seq.; the MMBA), specifically Government Code section 3502, which states that employees "shall have the right to represent themselves individually in their employment relations with the public agency." Isenberg's allegations do not touch on whether UTLA members have a right to represent themselves in employment relations, and therefore this statute is not relevant.

Trygstad and UTLA argue that despite Isenberg's characterization of his causes of action in the complaint, his claims nonetheless fall under the EERA. They argue that the actions underlying Isenberg's allegations are properly interpreted as implicating the "unfair labor practices" prohibited by the EERA, including a subset of unfair practices generally characterized as a "duty of fair representation." (See Gov. Code §§ 3544.9 [a union "shall fairly represent each and every employee in the appropriate unit"], 3543.6 [it is unlawful for a union to discriminate against employees "because of their exercise of rights guaranteed by this chapter"]; Los Angeles Council of School Nurses v. Los Angeles Unified School Dist. (1980) 113 Cal.App.3d 666, 672, 169 Cal. Rptr. 893 [violation of the duty of fair representation constitutes an unfair practices claim].) Trygstad admits that "there is no definition of 'unfair practices' provided" in the relevant [*16] statutes, but Trygstad quotes a PERB decision for the proposition that "[i]t is possible that the range of actions which may be deemed as unfair practices may have been left to PERB's own determination." (Quoting Mt. Diablo Unified School District (Quarrick) (1978) PERB Dec. 68E at p. 12 [2 PERC ¶ 2174].)

Trygstad is correct that courts generally defer to PERB's interpretation of the EERA's scope. PERB has the power and duty "[t]o determine in disputed cases whether a particular item is within or without the scope of representation" under the EERA. (Gov. Code, § 3541.3, subd. (b).) "Under established principles PERB's construction is to be regarded with deference by a court performing the judicial function of statutory construction, and will generally be followed unless it is clearly erroneous." (San Mateo City School Dist. v. Public Employment Relations Bd. (1983) 33 Cal.3d 850, 856, 191 Cal. Rptr. 800, 663 P.2d 523.)

2. PERB does not exercise jurisdiction over purely internal union matters, including choice of counsel for union members.

PERB has held that it "will not intervene in matters involving the solely internal activities or relationships of an employee organization which do not impact employer-employee relations." (California State Employees Association (Hutchinson) (1998) PERB Dec. No. 1304-S [1998 Cal. PERB Lexis 61 at p. *5].) In other words, [*17] "only those activities that have a substantial impact on the relationship of unit members to their employer are subject to the duty of fair representation." (El Centro Elementary Teachers Assoc. (Willis) (1982) PERB Dec. No. 232 at p. 14 [6 PERC ¶ 13186].) The question, therefore, is whether a union's provision of legal representation for union members is a matter that impacts only the relationship between the employee and the union, or one that impacts the employer-employee relationship.

PERB's past decisions establish that a union's decision as to which attorney will represent a member, or whether a union will pay for an attorney to represent a member, is an internal issue that is beyond the scope of PERB's jurisdiction. In a similar case, United Teachers Los Angeles (Bracey) (1987) PERB Dec. No. 616 [1987 Cal. PERB LEXIS 28], LAUSD placed a teacher and UTLA member on medical leave and began dismissal proceedings. UTLA put the teacher in contact with an attorney at Trygstad, Mr. Schwab (who also represented Isenberg in some of his proceedings involving LAUSD, but the teacher failed to return his calls and letters. The teacher later argued that she did not contact Mr. Schwab because she wanted to work directly with Mr. Trygstad instead, and [*18] she filed a complaint with PERB alleging that UTLA breached its duty of fair representation. PERB rejected the teacher's argument. After noting that PERB would not address "matters which do not involve the employer or which are strictly internal union matters" (*id. at, p. 17), PERB stated, "Charging party [the teacher] is thus essentially alleging that UTLA violated its duty of fair representation toward her by failing to provide her with the attorney of her choice. However, this is an internal union matter." (*Id. at p. 19.) The decision went on to say that "an employee organization's denial of a member's request for a particular attorney, without more, does not establish arbitrary, discriminatory, or bad faith conduct on the part of the employee organization." (Ibid.)

All parties cite National Education Assoc.-Jurupa (Norman) (2014) PERB Dec. No. 2371 [2014 Cal. PERB LEXIS 11] in support of their respective positions. In Norman, a teacher who had been placed on leave and was facing dismissal proceedings alleged that his union (NEA-J) and the California Teachers Association (CTA) promised he would be provided an attorney throughout the leave and dismissal hearing process. (*Id. at p. 2.) He alleged that although the union provided an attorney for a portion of the [*19] proceedings, it did not appoint an attorney or pay for a private attorney for the remainder, including his dismissal proceeding. (*Id. at p.5.)

PERB rejected the teacher's claim. It noted, "PERB has long held that the duty of fair representation extends only to contractually [ ] based remedies under the exclusive control of the exclusive representative." (*Norman, supra, at pp. 15-16.) Therefore, "[a]n exclusive representative owes no duty of fair representation to a unit member unless the exclusive representative possesses the exclusive means by which such member can vindicate an individual right, and the right in question derives from a collective bargaining agreement." (*Id. at p. 16.) PERB went on to add, "Permanent teacher dismissal proceedings are governed exclusively by the Education Code, and are beyond the scope of negotiations under EERA. [Citations.] Therefore, it was legally impossible for permanent teacher dismissal proceedings to be a term and condition contained in a [collective bargaining agreement] between the District and NEA-J. NEA-J, the exclusive bargaining representative, owed no duty of fair representation for the statutory teacher dismissal procedure." (*Id. at pp. 17-18.)

PERB also held that it had no jurisdiction over Norman's contract-based [*20] claim that CTA owed him representation. "Any alleged contract to provide legal services to members is not a part of a collective bargaining agreement negotiated between the [school district employer] and NEA-J, but instead an alleged promise made only to CTA members. PERB does not have jurisdiction to enforce such contracts. PERB's jurisdiction over employee organizations is confined to remedying alleged violations of EERA, including EERA sections 3543.6 and 3544.9. Nothing in EERA requires employee organizations to offer members economic benefits such as legal services, and nothing in EERA envisions PERB enforcing such alleged individual contracts between an employee organization and its members, especially where the employee organization is not the exclusive representative." (*Norman, supra, at pp. 19-20.) Here, UTLA admits that its provision of legal representation to its members is "a benefit of union membership" that UTLA provides "at its discretion." UTLA's provision of legal representation is therefore not a result of any collective bargaining agreement involving employer LAUSD.

UTLA argues, "The fact that the PERB reached the merits of the union members' arguments in Norman and Bracey confirms that the PERB exercised its [*21] jurisdiction over the claims and thus believed those disputes within the purview of the PERB." This argument is not persuasive. Norman cannot reasonably be read to mean that PERB had jurisdiction over Norman's claims to the extent they were outside of any collective bargaining agreement. After finding that Norman's claims did not fall within PERB's jurisdiction, PERB commented that Norman also failed to adequately allege facts that would constitute a prima facie case because he did not allege that his union—as opposed to other entities referenced in Norman's complaint—denied him fair representation. For example, PERB noted, "Norman alleges no facts that NEA-J, the only named respondent, denied representation to Norman at any stage of his dismissal-related procedure," and "Norman has not alleged that any of the above-referenced entities were alter egos or agents of each other." (*Norman, supra, p. 21-22.) PERB's observation that Norman failed to allege facts sufficient to show that his exclusive representative breached the duty of fair representation is not a holding on the merits of Norman's non-EERA claims.

PERB looked more closely at the facts in Bracey because the teacher there alleged that UTLA violated [*22] the duty of fair representation under the EERA. (*Bracey, supra, at p. 1.) This does not merit a conclusion that Isenberg's claims are within PERB's jurisdiction. To reach such a conclusion would require us to ignore Bracey's holding that failing to provide a union member her attorney of choice is an internal union matter. Indeed, Bracey highlights that a union's choice to use a particular attorney—the issue alleged here—is distinct from whether the union breached the duty of fair representation in proceedings involving the employer. Bracey states that choice of a particular attorney is not within PERB's jurisdiction, but the duty of fair representation is. Here, Isenberg's allegations focus on the former, and PERB's examination of the latter in Bracey does not compel us to reach a different result.

Other PERB decisions reach similar conclusions. In California State Employees Association (Fox) (1995) PERB Dec. No. 1099-S [1995 Cal. PERB LEXIS 24], for example, PERB denied a teacher's allegation that her union breached the duty of fair representation, stating, "Because CSEA is under no obligation to represent you before the State Personnel Board, a denial of financial assistance to hire private counsel would [*23] also be outside the duty of fair representation." (*Fox, supra, at p. 10.) In Valley of the Moon Teachers Association (McClure) (1996) PERB Dec. No. 1165 [1996 Cal. PERB LEXIS 40], a teacher alleged that the California Teacher's Association violated the duty of fair representation by requiring a union member to either choose an attorney "affiliated" with the teacher's association or waive the right to a union-provided attorney. PERB rejected the allegation, stating, "[A]n employee organization's denial of a member's request for a particular representative, without more, does not establish arbitrary, discriminatory or bad faith conduct on the organization's part. [Citation.] Similarly, where an employee chooses self representation or representation by an outside agent, the Association has no obligation to provide representation or assistance." (*Id. at p. 20.) Another PERB decision, Service Employees Int'l Union (Banks) (2004) PERB Dec. No. 1636M [2004 Cal. PERB LEXIS 257], noted that "a union is not obligated to assist an employee with . . . proceedings before a Commission on Professional Competence." (Id. at p. *5.) Here, Isenberg alleges that his damages arose because he needed to hire an attorney to represent him in a dismissal proceeding before the Commission on Professional [*24] Competence. Moreover, as noted in Norman, the dismissal procedure for permanent teachers such as Isenberg falls under the Education Code, not the EERA, and therefore is not within PERB's jurisdiction. (Barstow Unified, supra, 43 Cal.App.4th at pp. 886-887 [claims falling under the Education Code are not within PERB's jurisdiction].) Under the reasoning of these PERB decisions, UTLA did not have a duty to provide representation under the EERA under the circumstances alleged in Isenberg's complaint, and therefore PERB's jurisdiction does not extend to Isenberg's claims.

In its order granting Trygstad's motion to dismiss, the trial court held that UTLA's manner of providing attorneys to its members "very clearly substantially affects the relationship between employer and employee." This conclusion contradicts PERB's rulings that a union's provision of legal services outside the parameters of a collective bargaining agreement is an internal union matter that does not affect the employer-employee relationship. "PERB decisions are entitled to deference and its interpretation of pertinent statutes will be followed unless clearly erroneous." (Williams v. Public Employment Relations Bd. (2012) 204 Cal.App.4th 1119, 1127, 139 Cal. Rptr. 3d 618.) We see no basis for finding Bracey, Norman, Fox, McClure, or Banks clearly erroneous.

3. UTLA's voluntary [*25] provision of legal representation to members does not place this issue within PERB's jurisdiction.

Trygstad argues that even if UTLA did not initially have a duty to represent Isenberg and therefore may not have been subject to the duty of fair representation, "the analysis rightfully changes, when, as here, the exclusive representative voluntarily assumes a duty to an individual member collateral to the collective bargaining agreement." Trygstad cites Lane v. I.U.O.E. Stationary Engineers (1989) 212 Cal.App.3d 164, 260 Cal. Rptr. 634 (Lane) for the proposition that "if the union had no formal obligation to represent plaintiff but voluntarily undertook to do so it owed him the duty to act with the requisite degree of care." (212 Cal.App.3d at p. 171.) Trygstad argues that because "PERB has never definitively stated whether or not Lane creates an unfair practice right of action for voluntarily assumed obligations," it is fair to assume that PERB would accept a Lane-based theory of duty and breach.

Contrary to Trygstad's argument, however, PERB has rejected Lane's reasoning as a basis for a claim under PERB jurisdiction. "PERB has never adopted the Lane theory as a basis for an unfair practice charge. PERB has viewed such a theory as implicating a cause of action in state court rather than [*26] a matter within its jurisdiction." (*Oakland Education Association (McKeel) (2000) PERB Dec. No. 1383 [2000 Cal. PERB LEXIS 17 at pp. 12-13]; see also California State Employees Assoc. (Cohen) (1993) PERB Dec. No. 980-S [1993 Cal. PERB LEXIS 19]["Even assuming facts were alleged to demonstrate that the Association promised to undertake representation in these arenas, and then negligently forfeited Cohen's rights, such conduct would not be within PERB's jurisdiction, but her recourse, if any, would be in the State courts."] (*Id at pp. *19-20.))

PERB's decisions therefore demonstrate that the manner by which a union chooses legal representatives for its members is not within the scope of PERB's jurisdiction under the EERA. Because UTLA was not obligated to provide Isenberg (or other UTLA members) legal representation under the EERA or any collective bargaining agreement, and PERB has rejected Lane's theory of an assumed duty of representation as a basis for relief under PERB's jurisdiction, UTLA and Trygstad have failed to show that Isenberg was required to address his allegations with PERB before filing suit in superior court.

The trial court erred by finding that Isenberg's claims were subject to PERB's exclusive jurisdiction, and it erred by dismissing the [*27] case on that basis.

B. On this record, the labor exemption to the Cartwright Act does not apply.

Defendants ask that if we find that the trial court erred by dismissing the case on jurisdictional grounds, we should nonetheless affirm the judgment on the alternative basis that UTLA, as a labor union, is exempt from liability under the Cartwright Act. Although Trygstad asserted this argument in the motion to dismiss below, the trial court explicitly declined to decide the issue in ruling on the final motion to dismiss. Based on the record before us, this defense does not provide a basis to affirm the judgment.

UTLA articulates the argument as follows: "Trygstad [is] serving the union's interests in a matter relating to the members' interests in their continued employment and the continuation of their compensation. Therefore, the relationship between the UTLA and Trygstad is immunized under Business and Professions Code 16703 and a cause of action for violation of the Cartwright Act will not lie against UTLA or Trygstad." Trygstad argues that "the fact that UTLA is a labor union mandates a finding that UTLA is exempt from the Cartwright Act and therefore, it is legally impossible for [Trygstad] to 'conspire' with UTLA to [*28] violate the Act and the UCL."

Defendants base their argument on section 16703, which states, "Within the meaning of this chapter, labor, whether skilled or unskilled, is not a commodity." In some cases, a question of statutory immunity can be a pure question of law that may be addressed for the first time on appeal. (See, e.g., Inland Empire Health Plan v. Superior Court (2003) 108 Cal.App.4th 588, 592, 133 Cal. Rptr. 2d 735 ["governmental immunity from liability is a jurisdictional matter that can be raised for the first time on appellate review."].) But defendants cite no authority, and we have found none, indicating that section 16703 provides immunity to a labor union for alleged Cartwright Act violations as a matter of law.

The application of the labor exemption in section 16703 relies on findings of fact relating to the union's primary purpose in taking the allegedly improper actions: "[A] labor union, acting alone, violates the Cartwright Act . . . when its primary purpose is to accomplish a restraint of trade [citations], not when its purpose is to obtain a valid labor objective [citations]." (Messner v. Journeymen Barbers, Hairdressers and Cosmetologists, Intern. Union of America, Local 256 (1960) 53 Cal.2d 873, 886, 4 Cal. Rptr. 179, 351 P.2d 347.) This is because "section 16703 was intended to insulate from antitrust liability concerted activities by workers seeking to improve their working terms and conditions. . . . [T]he exemption broadly covers combinations, agreements, and [*29] concerted activities for the purpose of negotiating or otherwise fixing workers' rates of wages or compensation." (California Dental Assn. v. California Dental Hygienists' Assn. (1990) 222 Cal.App.3d 49, 63, 271 Cal. Rptr. 410 (emphasis added).) Therefore, the purposes and effects of the allegedly improper actions must be considered: "The relevant question, in every case, is whether the practice in question is meant to further the interest of tradesmen as employees in a collective bargaining context, or whether it is designed to advance their interests as entrepreneurs." (Marin County Bd. of Realtors, Inc. v. Palsson (1976) 16 Cal.3d 920, 927-928, 130 Cal. Rptr. 1, 549 P.2d 833.)

UTLA argues that its "primary objective is a legitimate and valid labor objective; namely, securing affordable and experienced employment attorneys to represent its members' interests . . . not to restrain trade in the legal profession." Isenberg, however, has alleged that defendants' objectives were to "restrain and restrict the availability of legal services to UTLA members so that [Trygstad] could maintain a monopoly over such services in the relevant market," and that this was "an unlawful conspiracy in restraint of trade."

Determining the purposes and effects of an exclusive dealing arrangement such as the one Isenberg has alleged is a fact-intensive endeavor. (See, e.g., Fisherman's Wharf Bay Cruise Corp. v. Superior Court (2003) 114 Cal.App.4th 309, 335, 7 Cal. Rptr. 3d 628 ["[A] determination of illegality is tested [*30] under a rule of reason and 'requires knowledge and analysis of the line of commerce, the market area, and the affected share of the relevant market. . . . The resulting factual inquiry often makes summary judgment inappropriate."].) Here, the motion to dismiss was granted on jurisdictional grounds; the court did not admit or consider any evidence relating to the merits of Isenberg's Cartwright Act allegations. We will not address these disputed issues of fact for the first time on appeal.

In short, a labor union does not have statutory immunity from Cartwright Act violations as a matter of law, as Trygstad and UTLA argue. We therefore reject defendants' argument that section 16703 provides an alternative basis for affirming the judgment below.

DISPOSITION

The trial court erred by dismissing the case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The court's dismissal also cannot be affirmed on the alternative basis of the Cartwright Act labor exemption in section 16703. We therefore reverse and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. Isenberg shall recover his costs on appeal.

Opinion

ORDER:

(1) GRANTING DIRECTV'S MOTION TO DISMISS (ECF NO. 64);

(2) GRANTING DIRECTV'S MOTIONFOR LEAVE TO FILE FIRST AMENDED COUNTERCLAIM [*2] (ECF NO. 84);

(3) DENYING AS MOOT COUNTERDEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS COUNTERCLAIMS (ECF NO. 68); AND

(4) DENYING COUNTERDEFENDANTS' MOTION TO FILE A SUPPLEMENTAL EXHIBIT (ECF NO. 95)

Joe Hand Promotions, Inc. ("Joe Hand"), a commercial distributor and licensor of sporting events, commenced this action against Marc S. Bragg and Cynthia Motsch, both individually and doing business as Sally and Henry's Doghouse Bar and Grill (collectively "Doghouse") alleging Doghouse improperly broadcast the "Ultimate Fighting Championship Program" ("the Program") at the Bar and Grill on November 17, 2012, without obtaining the proper licensing to do so from Joe Hand. (ECF No. 1.) Doghouse filed counterclaims against Joe Hand. (ECF Nos. 25, 36.)

On June 25, 2014, Doghouse filed a Third Party Complaint against DirecTV, LLC ("DirecTV") alleging DirecTV's misrepresentations caused it to broadcast the Program without proper licensing. (ECF No. 26.) On July 28, 2014, Doghouse filed an Amended Third Party Complaint against DirecTV. (ECF No. 37 ("ATPC").)

Joe Hand and the Doghouse jointly dismissed the original complaint and counterclaims, so that the only remaining complaint was the ATPC. (ECF Nos. 57, 58.) DirecTV [*3] thereafter filed counterclaims against Doghouse. (ECF No. 63.)

Presently before this Court are (1) DirecTV's Motion to Dismiss the ATPC (ECF No. 64); (2) Doghouse's Motion to Dismiss DirecTV's counterclaims (ECF No. 68) to which no opposition has been filed; (3) DirecTV's Motion for Leave to File First Amended Counterclaims (ECF No. 84); and (4) Doghouse's Motion to File a Supplemental Exhibit (ECF No. 95).

For the following reasons, this Court GRANTS DirecTV's Motion to Dismiss (ECF No. 64); GRANTS DirecTV's Motion to File First Amended Counterclaims (ECF No. 84); DENIES AS MOOT Doghouse's Motion to Dismiss the Counterclaims (ECF No. 68); and DENIES Doghouse's Motion to File a Supplemental Exhibit (ECF No. 95).

I. DIRECTV'S MOTION TO DISMISS THE ATPC

DirecTV moves to dismiss the ATPC pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) arguing: (1) the allegations of fraud and deceit lack sufficient particularity; (2) Doghouse fails to allege any term of the contract that was breached; (3) since there was no breach of contract, and no allegation of a special fiduciary relationship, there can be no breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing; (4) the UCC does not apply to contracts for goods as opposed to services; [*4] (5) Doghouse fails to identify any false advertisements with particularity; and (6) Doghouse fails to allege sufficient facts to support an unfair competition claim.

A motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure tests the legal sufficiency of the claims asserted in the complaint. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6); Navarro v. Block, 250 F.3d 729, 731 (9th Cir. 2001). The court must accept all factual allegations pleaded in the complaint as true and must construe them and draw all reasonable inferences from them in favor of the nonmoving party. Cahill v. Liberty Mutual Ins. Co., 80 F.3d 336, 337-38 (9th Cir. 1996). To avoid a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal, a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations, rather, it must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). A claim has "facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). "Where a complaint pleads facts that are 'merely consistent with' a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of 'entitlement to relief.'" Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557).

"[A] plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of [*5] action will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (quoting Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 286, 106 S. Ct. 2932, 92 L. Ed. 2d 209 (1986). A court need not accept "legal conclusions" as true. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. Despite the deference the court must pay to the plaintiff's allegations, it is not proper for the court to assume that "the [plaintiff] can prove facts that [he or she] has not alleged or that defendants have violated the...laws in ways that have not been alleged." Associated Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 526, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983).

Generally, courts may not consider material outside the complaint when ruling on a motion to dismiss. Hal Roach Studios, Inc. v. Richard Feiner & Co., 896 F.2d 1542, 1555 n.19 (9th Cir. 1990). However, documents specifically identified in the complaint whose authenticity is not questioned by parties may also be considered. Fecht v. Price Co., 70 F.3d 1078, 1080 n.1 (9th Cir. 1995) (superseded by statute on other grounds). Moreover, the court may consider the full text of those documents even when the complaint quotes only selected portions. Id. It may also consider material properly subject to judicial notice without converting the motion into one for summary judgment. Barron v. Reich, 13 F.3d 1370, 1377 (9th Cir. 1994).

As a general rule, a court freely grants leave to amend a complaint which has been dismissed. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a). However, leave to amend may be denied when "the court determines that the allegation of other facts consistent with the challenged pleading could not possibly cure the deficiency." Schreiber Distrib. Co. v. Serv-Well Furniture Co., 806 F.2d 1393, 1401 (9th Cir. 1986).

A. Preliminary Considerations

In its [*6] Opposition, Doghouse requests that the Court incorporate by reference an Opposition filed in another case, involving different parties, before a different Judge. (ECF No. 79 at p. 3.) Although this Court understands that there is a pending Motion to Consolidate in that other case, requesting that the case be consolidated with this one, that Motion has not been granted, the cases are not consolidated, and this Court declines to allow Doghouse to incorporate by reference a pleading filed in a different, as of yet, unrelated, case.

In addition, Doghouse filed a Motion to File a Supplemental Exhibit to its Opposition. (ECF No. 95.) Doghouse requests that this Court take judicial notice of a Final Judgment and Permanent Injunction issued by the San Diego Superior Court against DirecTV on December 10, 2010. Since this Final Judgment is ultimately not relevant to the decisions reached by the Court in this Order, the Motion to File a Supplemental Exhibit is DENIED.

B. Count One: Fraud and Deceit

DirecTV moves to dismiss Count One of the ATPC alleging Doghouse fails to allege sufficient particularly to withstand a challenge under Rule 12(b)(6). In order to establish a cause of action for fraud, Doghouse must [*7] allege: (1) a misrepresentation (false representation, concealment, or nondisclosure); (2) DirecTV's knowledge of this falsity; (3) DirecTV's intent to defraud; (4) Doghouse's justifiable reliance; and (5) resulting damage. Engalla v. Permanente Med. Grp., Inc., 15 Cal. 4th 951, 974, 64 Cal. Rptr. 2d 843, 938 P.2d 903 (1997).

Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure holds fraud claims to a heightened pleading standard and claimants must plead fraud with particularity. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). A plaintiff must state the "time, place and specific content of the false representations as well as the identities of the parties to the misrepresentations" with particularity. Sanford v. MemberWorks, Inc., 625 F.3d 550, 558 (9th Cir. 2010) (citation omitted). A plaintiff must also "set forth what is false or misleading about a statement, and why it is false." Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1106 (9th Cir. 2003) (citation omitted). In other words, the pleading must be "specific enough to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct . . . so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny they have done anything wrong." Sanford, 625 F.3d at 558 (citation omitted).

In the ATPC, Doghouse alleges that at the time DirecTV solicited Doghouse to buy its service in 2012, it "represented that it was providing . . . Doghouse a commercial license and that all the content it distributed to the DirecTV equipment it installed . . . was properly licensed by DirecTV with the full knowledge and [*8] consent of any content provider." (ATPC at ¶¶ 7, 15.) Doghouse further alleges "DirecTV's representations made by it at the time it induced . . . Doghouse to subscribe to its services," included the representation "that all programs were properly licensed," and this "was knowingly and intentionally false." (Id. at ¶ 34.) According to the ATPC, "DirecTV's representations . . . made by DirecTV during the continuation of the subscription during verbal conversations with its telephonic sales agents and on its website promoting various programs, . . . along with its purchase and license, were intended to and did in fact lead . . . Doghouse to justifiably believe that the . . . [Program] . . . [was] . . . lawfully licensed and authorized." (Id. at ¶ 36.)

In its Opposition, Doghouse appears to concede that the representations in the ATPC are insufficient. Doghouse provides insufficient specifics as to what misrepresentations were made and by whom. Instead, Doghouse offers a Second Amended Third Party Complaint and requests the Court allow it to amend its allegations. Hence this Court GRANTS the Motion to Dismiss Count One. Since the Court finds it possible Doghouse may be able to amend to [*9] allege sufficient allegations of fraud, the Doghouse is given leave to amend. However, Doghouse is cautioned that any allegation of fraud and deceit must include the specific content of the allegedly false representations as well as the individual who made them.

C. Count Six: Breach of Contract

To state a breach of contract claim under California law, a plaintiff must allege: (1) the existence of a contract; (2) the plaintiff's performance or excuse for nonperformance: (3) the defendant's breach; and (4) the resulting damage to the plaintiff. CDF Firefighters v. Maldonado, 158 Cal. App. 4th 1226, 1239, 70 Cal. Rptr. 3d 667 (2008). A plaintiff must allege the substance of the relevant terms of the contract, set them out verbatim in the complaint, or attach a copy of the contract to the complaint and incorporated by reference. N. Cnty. Commc'ns Corp. v. Verizon Global Networks, Inc., 685 F. Supp. 2d 1112, 1122 (S.D. Cal. 2010) (citing McKell v. Wash. Mut., Inc., 142 Cal. App. 4th 1457, 1489, 49 Cal. Rptr. 3d 227 (2006)). In addition, the complaint must "identify the specific provision of the contract allegedly breached by the defendant." Donohue v. Apple, Inc., 871 F. Supp. 2d 913, 930 (N.D. Cal. 2012) (citing Progressive West Ins. Co. v. Yolo Cnty. Super. Ct., 135 Cal. App. 4th 263, 281, 37 Cal. Rptr. 3d 434 (2005)). Moreover, a plaintiff must allege how the defendant breached the relevant term(s) of the alleged contract. See Parrish v. Nat'l Football League Players Ass'n, 534 F. Supp. 2d 1081, 1096 (N.D. Cal. 2007).

In the ATPC, Doghouse alleges DirecTV had a contract with Doghouse for the provision of satellite television service and for the purchase of the Program. (ATPC at ¶ 110.) Doghouse claims the contract [*10] required DirecTV to provide programming paid for by Doghouse. (Id. at ¶ 111.) Without further specificity, Doghouse claims DirecTV breached this contract.

In its Opposition to DirecTV's Motion to Dismiss, Doghouse appears again to admit that the allegations in the ATPC are insufficient to state a breach of contract claim. It is unclear what provision of the contract DirecTV is alleged to have violated. In fact, assuming everything in the ATPC is true, it appears DirecTV did provide satellite television service and the programming paid for by Doghouse, including the Program. Therefore, the Court GRANTS DirecTV's Motion to Dismiss Count Six with leave to amend. However, Doghouse is cautioned that any amended Complaint must include the details as to what provision was allegedly violated and how.

D. Count Two: Breach of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

In California, "[e]very contract imposes upon each party a duty of good faith and fair dealing in its performance and its enforcement." Foley v. Interactive Data Corp., 47 Cal. 3d 654, 684, 254 Cal. Rptr. 211, 765 P.2d 373 (1988) (citing Rest. 2d Contracts §205). Thus, in order to bring an action for breach of the implied covenant of good faith and faith dealing, the complainant must first allege the existence of a contract. Spencer v. DHI Mortgage Co., Ltd., 642 F. Supp. 2d 1153, 1165 (E.D. Cal. 2009) (citing Smith v. City and Cnty. Of S.F., 225 Cal. App. 3d 38, 49, 275 Cal. Rptr. 17 (1990)). Since this [*11] Court has determined Doghouse has not sufficiently alleged the existence of a contract or that Doghouse failed to receive the benefits of any contract, this cause of action must also be dismissed. Hence, the Motion to Dismiss Count Two is GRANTED with leave to amend.

E. Count Three: Breach of Warranty of Fitness for Particular Purpose

In Count Three, Doghouse alleges a breach of warranty under Article II of the California Uniform Commercial Code ("UCC"). Doghouse alleges DirecTV breached this warranty "by deceiving and inducing . . . Doghouse into believing the Program that was purchased and paid for was had [sic] clear title and was transmitted without infringing on the rights of any third parties." (ATPC at ¶ 32.) Thus, DirecTV breached the warranty of fitness for a particular purpose "when it sold, licensed, and transmitted the Program to . . . Doghouse" (Id. at ¶ 80.)

The UCC only applies to contracts for sale of goods and not to contracts for the sale of services. Cal. Com. Code § 2102. The UCC defines "goods" as "all things (including specially manufactured goods) which are movable at the time of identification to the contract for sale." Cal. Com. Code § 2105; see also Simulados Software, Ltd. v. Photon Infotech Private, Ltd., 40 F. Supp. 3d 1191, 1199 (N.D. Cal. 2014). When something is a combination of goods and services, [*12] courts look to "whether the thrust is the rendition of service with goods incidentally involved or whether the transaction is a sale of goods with labor incidentally involved." TK Power, Inc. v. Textron, Inc., 433 F. Supp. 2d 1058, 1061 (N.D. Cal. 2006).

This Court agrees with DirecTV (and Doghouse appears to concede) that the transmission of cable television programming is a service rather than a good. The leased equipment is only incidentally involved and merely makes it possible for DirecTV to provide clients its television services. Hence, DirecTV's Motion to Dismiss Count Three is GRANTED without leave to amend.

F. Count Four: Unfair Practices/Fraud in Advertising

In Count Four, Doghouse alleges DirecTV violated California's False Advertising Law found in the California Business and Professions Code §§ 17500-17509. This law prohibits the dissemination of statements that are "untrue or misleading, and which [are] known, or which by the exercise of reasonable care should be known, to be untrue or misleading." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §17500. Courts have interpreted this provision broadly to "embrace not only advertising which is false, but also advertising which although true, is either actually misleading or which has a capacity, likelihood or tendency to deceive or confuse the public." [*13] *Inter-Mark USA, Inc. v. Intuit, Inc., No. C-07-04178 JCS, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18834, 2008 WL 552482, at 9 (N.D. Cal. 2008) (quoting Leoni v. State Bar, 39 Cal. 3d 609, 626, 217 Cal. Rptr. 423, 704 P.2d 183 (1985)).

Where a plaintiff alleges fraud as a basis for a violation of his false advertising claim, he will be subject to the higher "particularity" pleading standard required under Rule 9(b). In re Sony Grand Wega KDF-E A10/A20 Series Rear Projection HDTV Television Litig., 758 F. Supp. 2d 1077, 1093 (S.D. Cal. 2010). Since Doghouse alleges fraud as the basis for its false advertising claim, it is subject to this higher pleading standard.

Accordingly, to properly plead its false advertising claim, Doghouse must identify specific advertisements, when and where they were shown, and why they were untrue or misleading. Id.; see also Williams v. Gerber Prods. Co., 552 F.3d 934, 938 (9th Cir. 2008) ("[T]he primary evidence in a false advertising case is the advertising itself.") (quotation omitted); VP Racing Fuels, Inc. v. Gen. Petroleum Corp., 673 F. Supp. 2d 1073, 1088 (E.D. Cal. 2009) ("The underlying element of a false advertising claim is some type of advertising statement.") In In re Sony Grand Wega, for example, the Court granted defendant's motion to dismiss the false advertising claim because plaintiffs failed to identify specific advertisements, when and where they were shown, or why they were untrue or misleading. In re Sony Grand Wega, 758 F. Supp. 2d at 1093-94.

In this case, Doghouse alleges DirecTV sent Doghouse "advertisements that [DirecTV] was the authorized distributor and source for the Program" and "paper advertisements and advertisements over the Internet that solicited [*14] the sale of the Program but did not disclose that DirecTV's sale of the Program required as a condition of the sale, a separate price or fee to be paid over to [Joe Hand]." (ATPC at ¶¶ 87, 88.) Doghouse fails to identify any specific advertisement, let alone when and where it was shown. Doghouse's allegations of false advertising are insufficient even under the notice pleading standard of Rule 8(a) and certainly lack the particularity required under Rule 9(b).

Therefore, DirecTV's Motion to Dismiss Count Four is GRANTED. Again, since Doghouse may be able to cure this deficiency, this Court gives Doghouse leave to amend. Any amended cause of action must include specifics as to what advertisement was received, when and where, and specifically what in the advertisements is alleged to be misleading or false.

G. Count Five: Unfair Competition

In Count Five, Doghouse alleges unfair competition in violation of California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200 et seq. This law prohibits business acts or practices that are "unlawful," "unfair," or "fraudulent." Id. §17200. Each of these three prongs constitutes a separate and independent cause of action. See Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999).

Doghouse alleges DirecTV deceived the public by "knowingly licens[ing] and sell[ing] the Program [*15] to commercial customers improperly . . . designated as 'residential.'" (ATPC at ¶ 98.) Doghouse claims that by misrepresenting the owner and licensor of the Program, DirecTV was able to sell the Program at significantly reduced rates to small business owners and other members of the public, who were then deceived into purchasing DirecTV. (Id. at ¶¶ 100-102.) Finally, Doghouse alleges DirecTV "created a strict pricing model for the licensing of the Program which not only confuses the general public as a result of the concealed terms and license rights, but also inhibits competition in the marketplace as the Program is unique and not otherwise available to the general public." (Id. at ¶ 103.) Doghouse claims this constitutes unfair competition because the purpose of the "dividing of the license fees into two discrete categories of 'residential' and 'commercial' is to restrain competition." (Id. at ¶ 104.)

This Court will analyze these allegations under each of the three prongs of the unfair competition law.

1. Unlawful prong

The UCL's "unlawful" prong is essentially an incorporation-by-reference provision. See Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 180 ("By proscribing 'any unlawful' business practice, section 17200 borrows violations of other [*16] laws and treats them as unlawful practices that the [UCL] makes independently actionable." (citations and some internal quotation marks omitted)). "Violation of almost any federal, state, or local law may serve as the basis for a UCL claim." Plascencia v. Lending 1st Mortg., 583 F. Supp. 2d 1090, 1098 (N.D. Cal. 2008) (citing Saunders v. Super. Ct., 27 Cal. App. 4th 832, 838-39, 33 Cal. Rptr. 2d 438 (1994)). "When a statutory claim fails, a derivative UCL claim also fails." Aleksick v. 7-Eleven, Inc., 205 Cal. App. 4th 1176, 1185, 140 Cal. Rptr. 3d 796 (2012).

In the ATPC, Doghouse fails to allege that DirecTV violated any law. Therefore, the claim under the unlawful prong must fail.

2. Unfair prong

Under the UCL, for suits brought by consumers, courts have applied either the balancing test set forth in S. Bay Chevrolet v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp., 72 Cal. App. 4th 861, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 (1999), the test set forth in Cel-Tech, or the three-pronged test set forth in the FTC Act. Davis v. HSBC Bank Nev., N.A., 691 F.3d 1152, 1169-70 (9th Cir. 2012). However, the Ninth Circuit has declined to apply the FTC standard to consumer actions "in the absence of a clear holding from the California Supreme Court" that it should be applied. Lozano v. AT&T Wireless Servs., Inc., 504 F.3d 718, 736 (9th Cir. 2007).

Under the balancing test, "unfair" conduct occurs when that practice "offends an established public policy or when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers." Davis, 691 F.3d at 1169 (citing S. Bay Chevrolet, 72 Cal. App. 4th at 886-87). "Under this approach, courts must examine the practice's impact on its alleged victim, balanced against the reasons, [*17] justifications and motives of the alleged wrongdoer. In short, this balancing test must weigh the utility of the defendant's conduct against the gravity of the harm to the alleged victim." Id. (internal citations and quotations omitted). Under the Cel-Tech test, which was expressly limited in Cel-Tech to actions by competitors, but has been applied by courts to consumer actions, an "unfair" practice means "conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Id. at 1169-70 (citing Cel-Tech., 20 Cal. 4th at 187 & n. 12).

Although Doghouse alleges DirecTV's conduct "inhibit[ed] competition," it does not identify the established public policy being offended, or make clear how DirecTV's conduct is immoral, unethical, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers. Doghouse also fails to allege any acts that threaten an incipient violation of an antitrust law or violate the spirit of the antitrust laws. Therefore, any claim under this prong must also fail.

3. Fraudulent prong

To state a claim under the UCL's "fraudulent" prong, Doghouse [*18] must plead that DirecTV's allegedly fraudulent business practice is one in which "members of the public are likely to be deceived." Schnall v. Hertz Corp., 78 Cal. App. 4th 1144, 1167, 93 Cal. Rptr. 2d 439 (2000). "Unless the challenged conduct targets a particular disadvantaged or vulnerable group, it is judged by the effect it would have on a reasonable consumer." Puentes v. Wells Fargo Home Mortg., Inc., 160 Cal. App. 4th 638, 645, 72 Cal. Rptr. 3d 903 (2008) (internal quotations and citation omitted). Reduced to the elements, a plaintiff must allege with specificity that a defendant's alleged misrepresentations: "(1) were relied upon by the named plaintiffs; (2) were material; (3) influenced the named plaintiffs' decision to purchase the product [or enter into an agreement]; and (4) were likely to deceive members of the public." *Yastrab v. Apple, Inc., No. 5:14-cv-01974-EJD, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 37119, 2015 WL 1307163, at 19 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 23, 2015) (quotations omitted).

As discussed above, Doghouse fails to allege with sufficient particularity what alleged misrepresentations were made and by whom they were made. However, it appears Doghouse may be able to allege more specific misrepresentations, therefore, Doghouse is given leave to amend.

III. DIRECTV'S MOTION TO AMEND COUNTERCLAIMS

DirecTV moves to amend its counterclaims. (ECF No. 84.) As it points out, this case is procedurally in its infancy. No answer has been filed. No scheduling [*19] order has been issued. No discovery has been conducted. Rule 15(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure directs that "a party may amend its pleading only with the opposing party's written consent or the court's leave. The court should freely give leave when justice so requires." Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2). "[T]his policy is to be applied with extreme liberality." Morongo Band of Mission Indians v. Rose, 893 F.2d 1074, 1079 (9th Cir. 1990). Although the decision whether to allow amendment is in the court's discretion, "[i]n exercising its discretion, a court must be guided by the underlying purpose of Rule 15—to facilitate decision on the merits rather than on the pleadings or technicalities." DCD Programs, Ltd. v. Leighton, 833 F.2d 183, 186 (9th Cir. 1987) (internal quotations omitted). Denial of a request to amend is only proper when it "would be clearly frivolous, unduly prejudicial, cause undue delay or a finding of bad faith is made." United Union of Roofers, Waterproofers and Allied Trades No. 40 v. Ins. Corp. of Am., 919 F.2d 1398, 1402 (9th Cir. 1990); see also Owens

v. Kaiser Found. Health Plan, Inc., 244 F.3d 708, 712-13 (9th Cir. 2001) (no prejudice where amended pleading would not delay proceedings and not require additional discovery).

There is no evidence the amendment is clearly frivolous or made in bad faith. Furthermore, there is no evidence of undue delay. The original counterclaim was filed October 21, 2014 (ECF No. 63) and ten days later, upon the joint motion of the parties, the matter was stayed (ECF No. 67, 70-74). The stay was lifted on July 6, 2015 (ECF No. 78), and DirecTV attempted [*20] to file its Amended Counterclaim on August 17, 2015 (ECF No. 82). The Amended Counterclaim was rejected on August 24 because DirecTV had failed to request permission from the Court pursuant to Rule 15, so five days later, on August 29, 2015, DirecTV filed this motion seeking leave from the Court to file the Amended Counterclaim. The Court finds DirecTV has not delayed filing the Amended Counterclaim.

Doghouse's primary opposition appears to be based on an argument that the amendment would be unduly prejudicial because it is duplicative of a pleading filed in another action, involving other parties, in front of a different judge. Although this Court understands a motion to consolidate that action with this one is pending in that other court, currently two separate actions exist. The fact that DirecTV amended in that other action does nothing to amend the counterclaims in this case. Therefore, this Court rejects Doghouse's argument that it would be unduly prejudiced because the amended counterclaim is "identical and redundant" to a pleading filed in another case. Doghouse fails to show that filing the Amended Counterclaim would be unduly prejudicial at this early stage of the proceedings. In [*21] fact, omitting one cause of action could save Doghouse time and energy.

Accordingly, DirecTV's Motion for Leave to File a First Amended Counterclaim (ECF No. 84) is GRANTED. Consequently, Doghouse's Motion to Dismiss the original counterclaim (ECF No. 68) is DENIED AS MOOT.

IV. CONCLUSION

DirecTV's Motion to Dismiss the ATPC (ECF No. 64) is GRANTED. Doghouse is given leave to amend all counts except for Count Three which is dismissed with prejudice. Any Second Amended Third Party Complaint must be filed no later than March 21, 2016. DirecTV's Motion to file amended counterclaims (ECF No. 84) is GRANTED. The amended counterclaims must be filed no later than March 21, 2016.

Neither party may add any new causes of action. Furthermore, both parties are cautioned that they must comply with Civil Local Rule 15.1 when filing any amended pleading, including Local Rule 15.1(c) requiring that "[a]ny amended pleading . . . must be accompanied by a version of that pleading that shows—through redlining, underlining, strikeouts, or other similarly effective typographic methods—how that pleading differs from the previously dismissed pleading." Civ. L.R. 15.1(c).

Lastly, Doghouse's Motion to Dismiss the Counterclaims (ECF No. 68) is DENIED AS MOOT, and [*22] Doghouse's Motion to File a Supplemental Exhibit (ECF No. 95) is DENIED.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[*128] DECISION AND ORDER

VICTOR MARRERO, United States District Judge.

Plaintiff Merced Irrigation District ("Merced") is a state-recognized irrigation district located in Merced, California. On behalf of itself and others similarly situated (the "Proposed Class"), Merced alleges federal antitrust violations against defendant Barclays Bank PLC ("Barclays"), a financial services corporation headquartered in the United Kingdom. Merced's claims arise out of an alleged unlawful conspiracy to manipulate daily index prices for electricity between November 1, 2006 and December 31, 2008 (the "Class Period") in violation [2] of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act ("Sherman Act"), 15 U.S.C. Sections 1, 2 ("Section 1" and "Section 2"), and the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Section 17200. Merced also alleges claims of unjust enrichment in its complaint. ("Complaint", Dkt. No. 1.)

Barclays filed a motion to dismiss the Complaint in its entirety pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure ("Rule 12(b)(6)"), asserting that Merced fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. ("Motion", Dkt. No. 12.) Merced filed opposition papers ("Opposition", Dkt. No. 14) and Barclays replied. ("Reply", Dkt. No. 17.) For the reasons stated below, Barclays' motion is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND[1]

A. THE ELECTRICITY MARKET

As an irrigation district engaged in the business of generating, distributing, purchasing, and selling electricity to customers, Merced purchased peak electricity[2] from another California irrigation district during the Class Period. Those contracts settled according to the Dow Jones Daily Index price for peak power at the northern California trading hub known as North Path 15, which is set by averaging market prices for electricity-related contracts at North Path 15. North Path 15 was also one of four western electricity trading [*129] hubs (the "Trading Hubs")[3] in which Barclays bought and sold electricity-related contracts through its West Power Desk in New York City.

Two types of electricity-related contracts are relevant to this case: contracts for next-day delivery of physical electricity, or "dailies", and financial "swap" contracts by which parties agree to exchange payments depending on the daily index price on a specified settlement date at a specified location. The prices at which dailies and swap contracts settle are based on the index price published by certain exchanges. Those exchanges calculate index prices based on transactions for electricity at specific trading locations. One of these exchanges is the Intercontinental Exchange ("ICE"), which calculates a Daily Index price based on the weighted average price of all day-ahead fixed-price physical electricity transactions at the relevant location. Dow Jones also calculates prices based on the same dates and trading hub locations, which Merced alleges move in lockstep with the ICE Daily Index price (collectively with the ICE Daily Index price, the "Daily Index Prices"). Market participants trading in physical positions have the obligation to deliver or receive electricity at the Daily Index Prices, while those trading in purely financial positions, including swap contracts, [5] have no obligation to deliver or receive physical electricity.

[1] The factual summary below, except where otherwise noted, derives from the Complaint and the documents cited or relied upon for the facts pleaded therein, which the Court accepts as true for the purposes of ruling on a motion to dismiss. See Spool v. World Child Int'l Adoption Agency, 520 F.3d 178, 180 (2d Cir. 2008) ; see also Chambers v. Time Warner, Inc., 282 F.3d 147, 152 (2d Cir. 2002) . Except where specifically quoted, no further citation will be made to the Complaint or the documents referred to in it. As discussed infra, documents drawn upon by the Court include the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's Order Assessing Civil Penalties against Barclays (the "FERC Order"), which is referenced [3] in and integral to the Complaint. See Chambers, 282 F.3d 152-53; Int'l Audiotext Network, Inc. v. American Tel. and Tel. Co., 62 F.3d 69, 71-72 (2d Cir. 1995).

[2] Electricity contracts are traded for both peak and off-peak products. Peak electricity includes power provided Monday through Saturday between the hours of 7:00 a.m. to 10:00 a.m., excluding holidays.

[3] The four Western United States trading hubs that used the Daily Index Prices for peak or non-peak power are known as Mid-Columbia, located in Washington; Palo Verde, located in Arizona; South Path 15, located in southern California; and North Path 15, located in northern [4] California.

Although Barclays did not have the capability to provide or accept physical electricity, during the Class Period it traded both short-term contracts for physical electricity -- which it then "flattened", or offset, by purchasing or selling physical contracts for an equal volume of electricity in the opposite direction prior to delivery -- and longer-term swap contracts that settled at prices set by the ICE Daily Index. Merced bought peak electricity under contracts settled according to the Dow Jones index price for North Path 15 during the Class Period, including between April and June 2 007. The Proposed Class is defined as "any individual or entity that held any contract which settled against the ICE or Dow Jones published daily index prices for peak or non-peak power" at any of the Trading Hubs during the Class Period, and was damaged by movements in index prices caused by Barclays' manipulation. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶119.)

B. BARCLAYS' ALLEGED INDEX PRICE MANIPULATION

Merced asserts that Barclays, seeking greater revenues on its financial swap contracts, engaged in trading at noncompetitive prices that purposely inflated or [6] depressed ICE Daily Index prices in the direction that benefited Barclays' swap contracts.

The alleged manipulation had three steps. First, Barclays' traders entered into a swap contract that would settle on a particular date based on the ICE Daily Index price. Then the traders purchased physical electricity contracts in the opposite direction from the swap (i.e. contracts to buy if Barclays was a seller in the swap, or vice versa). Finally, Barclays' traders bought or sold large quantities of underlying daily contracts at artificial money-losing prices, ostensibly for the purpose of flattening the contracts for physical electricity, but also enabling Barclays to trade large volumes of daily contracts that would impact the ICE Daily Index price at which [*130] Barclays' swap contract then settled. Although Barclays would lose money on the daily transactions,[4] those losses were more than offset by the profit it accrued by settling the swap contracts at artificial ICE Daily Index prices. Those prices would be either artificially high, if Barclays held a "long" swap contract as a buyer and bought a high volume of daily contracts at inflated prices to raise the index price, or artificially low, [7] if Barclays held a "short" swap contract as a seller and sold daily contracts at less-than-market prices to drive down the index price on the settlement date.

As an illustration, if Barclays held a long swap contract to be settled on a particular day at the North Path 15 trading hub, it would create a large short physical position in the daily markets at that hub by entering into contracts to sell electricity. Then, to avoid having to deliver the physical electricity provided for in the daily contracts while simultaneously inflating the Daily Index Prices to generate maximum revenue for its swap contract, Barclays would "flatten" its entire short physical position prior to the contract's settlement date by buying large quantities of next-day physical contracts at higher than market prices, driving up the weighted average price of electricity and, consequently, the Daily Index Prices. When the swap contract settled, Barclays would have made a sizeable profit even after losing money overpaying for the next-day physical contracts.

Merced alleges that Barclays' large position in swap contracts [8] and significant trading in daily contracts at anticompetitive prices caused increases or decreases in the ICE Daily Index price as well as the Dow Jones Daily Index, which moved in lockstep with the ICE Daily Index rate. Barclays accumulated a net loss of more than $4 million in dailies contract trading but gained $34.9 million on its swap contracts.

C. THE FERC INVESTIGATION AND ORDER

After commencing an investigation in 2 007, the United States Federal Energy Regulatory Commission ("FERC") Office of Enforcement issued an order to show cause in October 2012 directing Barclays and four individual Barclays traders[5] to show cause why they should not be found to have violated FERC's Anti-Manipulation Rule, 18 C.F.R. Section 1c.2, promulgated under Section 222 of the Federal Power Act ("FPA"), 16 U.S.C. Section 824v(a), by manipulating California electricity markets from November 2006 to December 2008. See Order to Show Cause

[4] The FERC Report alleges that Barclays lost money on daily trading at an average of $117,404 per month.

[5] The four West Power Desk traders -- Scott Connelly, Daniel Brin, Karen Levine and Ryan Smith -- are named in the Complaint but are not defendants in this action. The traders' deposition testimony, emails, and instant messages were evidence in the FERC investigation, FERC Report, and FERC Order, and are thereby incorporated into the Complaint.

and Notice of Proposed Penalty, FERC Docket No. 08-0800, 14 FERC ¶ 61,084 (Oct. 31, 2012) ("FERC Report"). Subsequently, FERC issued an order concluding that Barclays and the individual traders violated the Anti-Manipulation Rule through the use of a "coordinated, fraudulent scheme" to manipulate wholesale power markets on 655 product days over 35 product months[6] at the Trading Hubs [9] named in Merced's Complaint. Order [*131] Assessing Civil Penalties, FERC Docket No. 08-0800, 144 FERC ¶ 61, 041 (July 16, 2013) ("FERC Order") at 3. The FERC Order estimated that Merced's manipulations resulted in net profits of $34.9 million while causing at least $139.3 million in losses to other market participants who either paid higher than competitive prices for electricity or sold electricity at lower than competitive prices during the Class Period. Although Barclays disputed that its trading had a. material effect on prices, the FERC Order found that it had, in fact, "distorted market outcomes." The FERC Order assessed Barclays a civil penalty of $4 35 million and disgorgement of $34.9 million in profits.

Merced [10] alleges that it did not learn of Barclays' price manipulation until April 5, 2012, when FERC released a public notice of Barclays' alleged violations of the FPA. Because Barclays' unlawful conduct was not revealed until that time, and because Barclays' traders concealed their price manipulation during the Class Period and afterward, Merced argues that the statute of limitations applicable to its claims should not begin to run until April 5, 2012.

E. MOTION TO DISMISS

Merced brought the instant case against Barclays, claiming that, through its manipulation of the Daily Index Prices, Barclays unreasonably restrained trade and monopolized prices in violation of federal antitrust law. Barclays filed the instant Motion seeking to dismiss the Complaint pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). Barclays argues that Merced failed to allege an adequate claim for federal antitrust violations in the Complaint because it has not shown that Barclays: 1) acted in concert with another party or restrained the competitive freedom of anyone to trade electricity-related products, as required for a Section 1 claim, or 2) possessed monopoly power in a relevant market or excluded competitors, as required for a Section 2 claim. Barclays further moves [11] the Court to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Merced's state law claims and to dismiss Merced's claims for unjust enrichment for failure to plead a contractual or quasi-contractual relationship between Merced and Barclays.

In response, Merced argues that Barclays violated both Section 1 and Section 2, as well as California and New York state law, by entering into daily and longer-term swap contracts that unreasonably restrained trade in the markets in which the Daily Index Prices were set, and by exercising monopoly power over electricity prices as demonstrated through Barclays' direct control over Daily Index Prices during the Class Period.

II. LEGAL STANDARD

A. 12(b)(6) MOTION TO DISMISS

Under Rule 12(b)(6), a complaint should be dismissed if the plaintiff has not offered sufficient factual allegations that render the claim facially plausible. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) . The complaint should not be dismissed if the factual allegations "raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). The pleadings must include more than "a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action," Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555; it must include "factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct [12] alleged." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678.

The role of a court in ruling on a motion to dismiss is to "assess the legal feasibility of the complaint, not to assay the weight of [*132] the evidence which might be offered in support thereof." In re Initial Pub. Offering Sec. Litig., 383 F. Supp. 2d 566, 574 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (internal quotation marks omitted). A court must accept all well-pleaded factual allegations in the complaint as true, and draw all reasonable inferences in the plaintiff's favor. See [6] "Product days" denote trading of a specific contract related to a specific trading hub for a specific calendar day. "Product months" refer to the same information for a specific calendar month.

Chambers v. Time Warner, Inc., 282 F.3d 147, 152 (2d Cir. 2002). Even so, a court should not accept as true any "legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678-79.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8 (a) ("Rule 8(a)") requires only a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). Where Rule 8(a)'s pleading standard governs, "dismissal is improper as long as the complaint furnishes adequate notice of the basis of the plaintiff's claim . . . and * relief could be granted under [some] set of facts consistent with the allegations.'" In re Global Crossing, Ltd. Sec. Litig., No. 02 Civ. 910, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 26942, 2005 WL 2990646, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 7, 2005) (alteration in original) (quoting Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 512-14, 122 S. Ct. 992, 152 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2002)).

When adjudicating a motion to dismiss, a Court may consider documents incorporated in it by reference. See Cortec Indus., Inc. v. Sum Holding L.P., 949 F.2d 42, 47 (2d Cir. 1991) ; see also ATSI Commc'ns, Inc. v. Shaar Fund, Ltd., 493 F.3d 87 (2d Cir. 2007)(considering "documents possessed by or known to the plaintiff upon which it relied in bringing suit" in a 12(b) (6) motion to dismiss) . When [13] a plaintiff chooses not to attach to the complaint or incorporate by reference a document on which it relies and which is integral to the complaint "the court may nevertheless take the document into consideration in deciding the defendants' motion to dismiss, without converting the proceeding to one for summary judgment." Intfl Audiotext Network, Inc. v. American Tel, and Tel. Co., 62 F.3d 69, 71-72 (2d Cir. 1995) ; see also Chambers, 282 F.3d at 152.

III. DISCUSSION

Merced asserts causes of action for violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, violation of California state law, and unjust enrichment on the basis of Barclays' alleged rate manipulation in the electricity markets described above. Merced argues that Barclays' manipulation of Daily Index Prices in favor of its swap contracts restrained normal market forces of supply and demand, causing Merced and other buyers and sellers during the Class Period to pay supracompetitive prices or to accept subcompetitive prices. Because the FERC Report and FERC Order are public documents integral to and incorporated into Merced's Complaint, the Court considers them in deciding the Motion.

A. STANDING

As a threshold matter, the Court must determine whether Merced has established standing to bring a federal antitrust claim. Private plaintiffs suing under either Section 1 [14] or Section 2 of the Sherman Act must bring their claim by way of Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. Section 15, which confers standing on any private plaintiff who "shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws." 15 U.S.C. § 15. For a plaintiff to sue pursuant to the Clayton Act, it must show 1) an antitrust injury and 2) that it is a proper plaintiff in light of four "efficient enforcer" factors. In re DDVAP Direct Purchaser Antitrust Litig., 585 F.3d 677, 688 (2d Cir. 2009). The Court will consider each of these requirements in turn.

[*133] 1. Antitrust Injury

The Second Circuit described the process for determining whether a plaintiff has suffered an antitrust injury in Gatt Commc'ns, Inc. v. PMC Assocs., L.L.C., 711 F.3d 68, 76 (2d Cir. 2013). First, the plaintiff must identify the anticompetitive practice. Second, the court must identify the actual injury the plaintiff alleges. Finally, the court must compare the anticompetitive effect of the practice to the actual injury alleged. Id. at 76. The Circuit Court observed:

> [i]t is not enough for the actual injury to be causally linked to the asserted violation. Rather, in order to establish antitrust injury, the plaintiff must demonstrate that its injury is of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes [or might make] defendants' acts unlawful.

Id; see also Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 334, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990). Merced has pled an antitrust injury causally linked to Barclay's practices: it is a purchaser of electricity on the daily markets in which it alleges it paid higher supra-competitive prices or received lower sub-competitive prices as a result of Barclays' rate-manipulation. (See Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 112.) This is an injury "of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent." Id.; see also Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977).

Conduct [15] similar to the conduct alleged in the Complaint was found sufficient to support antitrust injury in In re Aluminum Warehousing Antitrust Litig., 95 F. Supp. 3d 419 (S.D.N.Y. 2015). In that case, the court found that "the winners and losers of defendants' scheme are not only the counterparties to their trades, but also those who actually need the physical commodity underpinning the trades. . . . [T]his scheme is alleged to have substituted supply and demand-based pricing with pricing driven by the webbed conspiracy described above." Id. at 443. As an electricity distributor, Merced was obligated to purchase electricity at the daily rates to fulfill its contracts with customers. Those daily rates, in turn, were dictated by Barclay's high-volume trading at non-market prices instead of the forces of supply and demand for electricity.

Merced has also demonstrated the connection between Barclays's alleged misconduct and the supracompetitive rates Merced paid for electricity. Barclays argues that it traded only on the Dow Jones index while Merced traded exclusively on the ICE index, and therefore any injury Merced suffered was removed from Barclays's action. That Merced and Barclays traded on different indices is not fatal to Merced's standing, however, because Merced has alleged facts [16] showing that the Dow Jones and ICE indices for peak power at the North Path hub moved in lockstep during the time period in which Barclays manipulated prices. The two indices are "intertwined", Merced alleges, because they published daily index prices for the same dates, trading hub locations and products. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶35.) The Complaint includes a chart displaying peak power rates for Dow Jones and ICE at North Path 15 for April through June 2007, months during which Barclays allegedly engaged in manipulative trading on that hub. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶35, Ex. B.) On only two trading days did the peak rate differ by more than one point between the two indices. "[W]hen market prices move in lockstep, . . . the distinction between them is of no consequence to antitrust standing analysis." In re Copper Antitrust Litig., 98 F. Supp. 2d 1039, 1049 (W.D. Wis. 2000). Merced's allegations are [*134] sufficient to establish an actual injury caused by Barclays's anticompetitive actions.

2. Efficient Enforcer

In addition to establishing antitrust injury, a plaintiff must also satisfy the four "efficient enforcer factors": 1) the directness or indirectness of the asserted injury; 2) the existence of an identifiable class of persons whose self-interest would normally motivate them to [17] vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement; 3) the speculativeness of the alleged injury; and 4) the difficulty of identifying damages and apportioning them among direct and indirect victims so as to avoid duplicative recoveries. In re DDAVP, 585 F.3d at 688 (citing Associated Gen. Contractors of California, Inc. v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 542, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983)).

Each of the four "efficient enforcer" factors favors granting standing to Merced. As to the first factor -- the directness of the asserted injury -- the chain of causation between Barclays's alleged market restraint and Merced's injury is not so remote as to preclude antitrust standing. Although Barclays argues that Merced's injuries are too "indirect and remote" to confer antitrust standing (Dkt. No. 13 at 13), Merced has alleged facts showing how Barclays's price manipulation had a demonstrable effect on the prices Merced paid for electricity. Second, Merced belongs to an identifiable class -- the very Proposed Class it seeks to certify in this action -- of individuals and entities that were injured by movements in the Daily Index Prices caused by Barclays's manipulative trading during the Class Period, and therefore are motivated to enforce the antitrust laws due to their "natural economic self-interest" in avoiding overpaying for [18] electricity. See Daniel v. Am. Bd. of Emergency Med., 428 F.3d 408, 444 (2d Cir. 2005). Third, the allegations presented in Merced's Complaint, supported by the detailed analysis contained in the FERC Report and FERC Order, are not unduly speculative as to nature or amount of loss during the months that Barclays allegedly manipulated electricity markets. An exact accounting of damages is not required at this stage of the proceedings, "especially . . . when the most elementary conceptions of justice and public policy require that the wrongdoer shall bear the risk of the uncertainty which his own wrong has created." In re DDAVP, 585 F.3d at 689 (internal quotation omitted). Finally, identifying and apportioning damages would not be prohibitively difficult and would not lead to duplicative recoveries.

The Court is persuaded that Merced has satisfied both factors required for antitrust standing under Section 4 of the Clayton Act, thereby establishing that Merced is a proper plaintiff to bring suit against Barclays for federal antitrust violations.

B. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS AND FRAUDULENT CONCEALMENT

Having determined that Merced has standing to bring a private civil antitrust action under 15 U.S.C. Section 15, the Court will now consider whether those claims and Merced's state law claims are timely filed or, alternatively, [19] whether Merced has sufficiently alleged fraudulent concealment to toll the statute of limitations.

Private civil antitrust actions have a statute of limitations of four years. 15 U.S.C. § 15b. "An antitrust action accrues and the statute of limitations begins to run when the defendant commits an act that injures the plaintiff." In re Nine West Shoes Antitrust Litig., 80 F. Supp. 2d 181, 191 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). In an alleged [*135] price-fixing conspiracy, "each overt act that is part of the violation and that injures the plaintiff . . . starts the statutory period running again, regardless of the plaintiff's knowledge of the alleged illegality at much earlier times." Id. at 192. Plaintiffs may only recover damages based on acts falling within the statutory period, and not based on previous acts. See Hinds Cty., Miss. v. Wachovia Bank N.A., 620 F. Supp. 2d 499, 519 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). Merced's state law claims are similarly subject to statutes of limitations: the UCL bars claims brought more than four years after the cause of action accrued, Cal. Bus. Prof. Code § 17208; and New York law establishes a six-year statute of limitations for unjust enrichment claims, accruing at the time of the wrongful act. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. § 213.

The alleged acts giving rise to the Complaint took place between November 1, 2006 and December 31, 2008. Merced did not file suit until June 23, 2015, more than six years after the last wrongful act alleged. [20] Merced's claims, then, are all based on events outside of the relevant limitations periods. However, Merced argues that the doctrine of fraudulent concealment prevented the statute of limitations from taking effect prior to April 2012, when the FERC first made public its investigation of Barclays's market manipulation.

To show fraudulent concealment, a plaintiff must show: 1) that the defendant concealed the existence of the antitrust violation; 2) that the plaintiff remained in ignorance of the violation until sometime within the four-year antitrust statute of limitations; and 3) that the plaintiff's continuing ignorance was not the result of lack of diligence. See Hinds County, 620 F. Supp. 2d at 520; In re Nine West, 80 F. Supp. 2d at 192; State of N.Y. v. Hendrickson Bros., 840 F.2d 1065, 1083 (2d Cir. 1988). A claim for fraudulent concealment must be pled with particularity, in accordance with the heightened pleading standards of Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure ("Rule 9(b)"). See Hinds County, 620 F. Supp. 2d at 520; In re Nine West, 80 F. Supp. 2d at 192. The doctrine of fraudulent concealment also applies to claims under California's Unfair Competition Law, see Yumul v. Smart Balance, Inc., 733 F. Supp. 2d 1117, 1132 (C.D. Cal. 2010), and to claims for unjust enrichment under New York law, see *Grynberg v. ENI S.p.A., No. 06 Civ. 6495, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71563, 2009 WL 2482181, at 5 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 13, 2009).

In the Second Circuit, a plaintiff may prove concealment by showing that a defendant "took affirmative steps to prevent the plaintiff's discovery of his claim or injury or that the wrong itself was of such a nature [21] to be self-concealing." In re Natural Gas Commodity Litig., 337 F. Supp. 2d 498, 513 (S.D.N.Y. 2004). Allegations of price-fixing conspiracies in violation of antitrust law constitute the type of unlawful activity that is inherently self-concealing. See In re Nine West, 80 F. Supp. 2d at 193 ("By alleging a price-fixing scheme, the plaintiff sufficiently has alleged the first prong of fraudulent concealment and . . . there is no need to require the pleading of affirmative actions taken by the defendants to prevent the plaintiff's discovery of its claim."). Here, Merced has alleged in extensive detail throughout the Complaint the self-concealing nature of Barclays's unlawful price manipulation scheme, which Merced further alleges could only be discerned by access to internal emails and non-public data. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 115.)

Merced must allege the two remaining prongs of the fraudulent concealment test -- ignorance of the violation until sometime within the limitations period and due [*136] diligence -- with particularity. See *In re Issuer Plaintiff Initial Pub. Offering Antitrust Litig., No. 00 Civ. 7804, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3892, 2004 WL 487222, at 4 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2004). Merced states in its Complaint that "prior to FERC's staff's April 5, 2012 public notice of alleged violations by Barclays for the course of conduct described herein, Plaintiff did not discover, and could not with reasonable due diligence have discovered, facts indicating Barclays [22] was engaged in the misconduct alleged herein." (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 113.) For purposes of this Motion, the Complaint's pinpointing of the precise date when Merced became aware of the violation satisfies the second prong of the test.

Merced must also plead facts supporting the third prong, which requires that the plaintiff's ignorance of the alleged violations before April 2012 was not for a lack of due diligence. As an initial matter, Merced must have been on inquiry notice of some illegality before having a responsibility to respond with reasonable diligence. See In re Nine West, 80 F. Supp. 2d at 193. The Complaint asserts that at no point prior to April 5, 2012 was Merced aware of Barclays's alleged misconduct. If that is the case, it would not have been "apprised of sufficient facts to put [it] on notice" of Barclays's price manipulation such that it could have known of the manipulation "through the exercise of reasonable diligence". Cerbone v. Int'l Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, 768 F.2d 45, 48 (2d Cir. 1985). Merced alleges that "the nature, existence and extent of unlawful activity could only be discerned and uncovered by access to Barclays's emails and detailed review by qualified experts of immense amounts of non-public data." (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 115.) Only with the release of public notice by [23] FERC in April 2012 was Merced alerted to Barclays's manipulation with any specificity, at which point it engaged in investigation and due diligence in preparation to file suit. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 1.)

Barclays argues that a July 2007 article in the "Friday Burrito," a regional energy trade publication, should have alerted Merced to Barclays's alleged manipulation of western electricity markets. The article conjectured about the "specter" of "large physical positions in the [dailies] market," wondering "[w]hat the hell is going on out there?" (Dkt. No. 13 at 16.) But as the Complaint points out, Barclays took action to head off inquiries related to the "Friday Burrito" article, publishing an anonymous response to the "Friday Burrito" article that provided intentionally "false and misleading explanations" for Barclays's large physical trading positions. (Dkt. No. 14 at 20.) The single, speculative "Friday Burrito" article, about which there is no evidence plaintiffs were aware at the time, is an insufficient basis on which to conclude that Merced should have been on notice of Barclays's misconduct. Moreover, in spite of the fact that the Daily Index Prices were published openly, "the issue is [24] not whether plaintiffs knew that the prices paid were higher than they should have been, rather, the primary issue is whether the . . . plaintiffs . . . knew of the alleged conspiracy." *In re Issuer, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3892, 2004 WL 487222, at 5 (quoting In re Mercedes-Benz Antitrust Litig., 157 F. Supp. 2d 355, 373 (D.N.J. 2001)).

At the very least, no facts in the pleadings "conclusively indicate that [Merced] did have or should have had knowledge of the violation within the statute of limitations." In re Natural Gas, 337 F. Supp. 2d at 514. Merced has demonstrated that Barclays engaged in inherently self-concealing conduct, and that questions of fact exist as to whether Merced could have discovered Barclays's unlawful conduct prior to the expiration of the statute of limitations period. "The question of constructive [*137] knowledge and inquiry notice may be one for the trier of fact and therefore ill-suited for determination on a motion to dismiss." In re Sumitomo Copper Litig., 120 F. Supp. 2d at 347; see also *In re Issuer, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3892, 2004 WL 487222, at 5. The Court is persuaded that, for purposes of a motion to dismiss, Merced has pled particularized facts sufficient to make out fraudulent concealment so as to toll the statute of limitations on its federal and state law claims. Accordingly, the Court concludes that dismissal of the Complaint on statute of limitations grounds is unwarranted.

C. SECTION 1 OF THE SHERMAN ACT

1. Legal Standard

Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides that "[e]very contract, [25] combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade of commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1. To establish a claim under Section 1, a plaintiff must establish that the defendants "contracted, combined or conspired among each other, that the combination or conspiracy produced adverse, anticompetitive effects within relevant product and geographic markets, that the objects of and conduct pursuant to that contract or conspiracy were illegal and that the plaintiff was injured as a proximate result of that conspiracy." *Laydon v. Mizuho Bank, Ltd., 12 Civ. 3419, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46368, 2014 WL 1280464, at 10 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 28, 2014).

The critical question for purposes of a Section 1 claim is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct "stems from independent decision or from an agreement, tacit or express." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 553; see also Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, Md. v. Citigroup, Inc., 709 F.3d 129, 135 (2d Cir. 2013). The Supreme Court clarified in Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp. that Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits only concerted conduct among distinct legal entities and does not reach restraints of trade that are "wholly unilateral." 467 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984). Copperweld addressed whether coordinated acts of a company and its wholly owned subsidiary could constitute a "combination or a conspiracy" under Section 1. Answering [26] in the negative, the Supreme Court closed the door to the "intra-enterprise conspiracy doctrine" used by some circuits at the time in favor of a rule that a company and its wholly owned subsidiary are "incapable of conspiring with each other for purposes of Section 1." Id. at 777. Copperweld discussed at length the complementary purposes of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 2, which bars monopolization by a single entity, observing that "[h]ad Congress intended to outlaw unreasonable restraints of trade as such, Section 1's requirement of a contract, combination, or conspiracy would be superfluous, as would the entirety of Section 2." Id. at 775; see also E&L Consulting, Ltd. v. Doman Indus. Ltd., 472 F.3d 23, 29 (2d Cir. 2006) ("Section 1 generally requires a combination or other form of concerted action between two legally distinct entities resulting in an unreasonable restraint on trade."); In re Aluminum Warehousing Antitrust Litig., 95 F. Supp. 3d 419, 438 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("[T]o run afoul of Section 1, the unreasonable restraint must result from an agreement between two or more entities.").

The nature of an agreement required to sustain a Section 1 claim has been defined by the Second Circuit and the Supreme Court. Behavior resulting from "mere interdependence unaided by [*138] an advance understanding among the parties" will not suffice. Starr v. Sony BMG Music Entm't, 592 F.3d 314, 322 (2d Cir. 2010) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556 n.4). Nor will a series of commercial contracts furthering one parties' alleged unlawful [27] objective, since both parties must have "a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding, or a meeting of minds in an unlawful arrangement." Anderson News, L.L.C. v. Am. Media, Inc., 680 F.3d 162, 183 (2d Cir. 2012). That meeting of minds may be shown by a contract that eliminates competition or by evidence of a conspiracy to do so. See Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984) (conspiracy to maintain prices established by evidence tending to exclude possibility of independent-action); United States v. First Nat. Bank & Trust Co. of Lexington, 376 U.S. 665, 669, 84 S. Ct. 1033, 12 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1964) (bank consolidation that eliminated competition was unreasonable restraint on trade despite "predatory purpose").

If a plaintiff establishes the existence of an illegal contract or combination, it must then demonstrate that the alleged agreement unreasonably restrains trade. Certain restraints on trade, such as minimum price fixing, may have "such predictable and pernicious anticompetitive effect, and such limited potential for procompetitive benefit" that they are deemed per se unreasonable. State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 17, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997). Most restraints are analyzed instead under the so-called "rule of reason" which looks to determine whether the alleged restraint is unreasonable because its "anticompetitive effects outweigh its precompetitive benefits." E & L Consulting, Ltd., 472 F.3d at 29.

2. Merced's Allegations

Merced claims that Barclays's daily contracts and swap contracts operated [28] to unreasonably restrain trade in the Trading Hubs during the Class Period. Those contracts, Merced argues, "compensated Barclays for engaging in uneconomic conduct to restrain . . . the normal competitive forces of supply and demand" in those markets. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶¶ 62-65.) By intentionally interfering with competitive market forces through its purchases and sales of daily electricity contracts, Merced argues' that Barclays injected "false and non-competitive" prices into markets that were intended to be based "exclusively on freely-competitive market transactions." (Id.)

Barclays argues in its Motion that Merced has failed to allege any entities acting in concert, as required to establish a Section 1 violation. It points out that the Complaint describes no "concerted action between at least two legally distinct economic entities" as required by Copperweld and subsequent Second Circuit cases. See E&L Consulting Ltd., 472 F.3d at 29. Merced responds that to state a Section 1 cause of action it need only allege the existence of a contract which resulted in an unreasonable restraint of trade -- here, Barclays's execution of numerous daily electricity contracts with an aggregated anti-competitive effect. Because its high-volume trading [29] in daily and swap contracts restrained normal forces of supply and demand, it argues, it need not additionally plead that the parties had a common purpose.

A similar argument was rejected in Rio Grande Royalty Co., Inc. v. Energy Transfer Partners, L.P., 786 F. Supp. 2d 1190 (S.D. Tex. 2009). The plaintiff alleged that defendants' below-market rate contracts with natural gas customers constituted concerted action cognizable under Section 1. [*139] The Rio Grande court found no concerted action, observing that "the fact that a person accepts the terms of a contract does not, without more, generate the type of concerted action necessary to violate Section 1." Id. at 1199. The contracts at issue here, as in Rio Grande, are trades involving unidentified buyers and sellers of a commodity. In Rio Grande, the court found that under such circumstances the plaintiff had "failed to make sufficient allegations to suggest that there was no independence of action between Defendants and their natural gas customers." Id. at 1199.

Merced cites two district court cases, Eskofot A/S v. E.I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co., 872 F. Supp. 81 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) and Procaps S.A. v. Patheon Inc., 36 F. Supp. 3d 1306 (S.D. Fla. 2014) for the proposition that where a plaintiff alleges a contract or combination in restraint of trade, "there is no need to show a common purpose in order to prove the absence of independent action because the relevant merger or contract amply demonstrates that there was no independence [30] of action.". Eskofot, 872 F. Supp. at 92. Eskofot involved allegedly anticompetitive merger and supply agreements between the defendant, a printing equipment supplier, and third parties. The court discussed the distinction between a Section 1 conspiracy claim, which requires proof of a common purpose to differentiate independent action from concerted action, and a Section 1 contract claim, which does not require such a showing because the existence of the contract itself demonstrates concerted action. It found that to survive a motion to dismiss, the plaintiff needed only to allege the specific merger agreements and allege that they resulted in an unreasonable restraint of trade. Procaps similarly involved a "collaboration agreement" allocating customers and territories among competitors, which on a summary judgment motion was found to violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act despite one party's lack of specific agreement to unlawful conduct. The Procaps court distinguished conspiracy claims under Section 1, like that in Monsanto, from "situations where an express contract is itself alleged to restrain trade." Procaps, 36 F. Supp. 3d at 1320.

Eskofot, Procaps, and two other decisions Merced cites, National Society of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 690, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978) and United States v. American Express Co., 88 F. Supp. 3d 143, 167 (E.D.N.Y. 2015), are distinguishable by the fact that in each of those cases the disputed contract [31] 1) demonstrated a lack of independent action and 2) by its terms, created an anti-competitive effect. Each contract on its own operated to diminish competition: by executing a merger, (Eskofot), sharing price information (National Society of Professional Engineers), defining market share (Procaps), imposing a restrictive pricing provision (American Express) or otherwise restraining trade. Here, by contrast, Merced alleges that the aggregate effect of Barclays's trades at non-market rates with unidentified counterparties restrained market competition. The only "meetings of the minds" alleged in the Complaint, though, are agreements between parties acting independently to buy or sell electricity -- even if Barclays had an ultimately anticompetitive purpose in mind. The terms of an immediate agreement to sell "does not . . . without more, place illicit restrictions on the parties' behavior." Rio Grande, 786 F. Supp. 2d at 1199.

In short, what Merced alleges is the type of unilateral action more properly characterized as a Section 2 claim. The Court is not persuaded that the mere existence of a series of contracts between a [*140] defendant and unidentified counterparties in the service of the defendant's unilateral scheme constitutes an [32] agreement to unreasonably restrain trade under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Accordingly, the Court finds that Merced's Section 1 claim falls short of alleging an agreement or concerted effort in restraint of trade. Because no claim may be brought under Section 1 in the absence of such a cognizable agreement, the Court need not discuss further whether Merced has pled a restraint of trade or a relevant product market to find that Merced has failed to "raise a right to relief above the speculative level" as to Count One of the Complaint. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Accordingly, the Court grants the Motion with regard to Merced's Section 1 claim.

D. SECTION 2 OF THE SHERMAN ACT

1. Legal Standard

Where a Section 1 claim demands a showing of concerted actions, Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. Section 2, outlaws "both concerted and unilateral behavior" that threatens actual monopolization. Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 767 n.13. Plaintiffs alleging a claim of monopolization under Section 2 must allege: "1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and 2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen or historic accident." PepsiCo, Inc, v. Coca-Cola Co., 315 F.3d 101, 105 (2d Cir. 2002) (quoting United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 571, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966)). The purpose of Section 2 of the Sherman Act is to prevent conduct which "unfairly tends to destroy competition itself" [33] and to protect the public from the failure of the market. Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993). "To safeguard the incentive to innovate, the possession of monopoly power will not be found unlawful unless it is accompanied by an element of anticompetitive conduct." Verizon, Commc'ns Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004).

A claim of monopoly power may be alleged by pleading power to control prices or exclude competition, or possession of a predominant share of the relevant market. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. at 571; Bonded Concrete, Inc, v, D.A. Collins Constr. Co., 29 F. App'x 725, 726 (2d Cir. 2002) ; Tops Markets, Inc. v. Quality Markets, Inc., 142 F.3d 90 (2d Cir. 1998). Monopoly power is more commonly established by showing that the defendant holds a large percentage share of the relevant market. In order to make this type of showing, a plaintiff proceeds by defining the relevant market in geographic terms and alleging the defendants' share of that market relative to other participants. See United States v. Eastman Kodak Co., 63 F.3d 95, 104 (2d Cir. 1995); see also Todd v. Exxon Corp., 275 F.3d 191, 199 (2d Cir. 2001); AD/SAT, Div. of Skylight, Inc, v. Associated Press, 181 F.3d 216, 226 (2d Cir. 1999). Determining a relevant geographic and product market is a "deeply fact-intensive inquiry," and for that reason courts often hesitate to grant motions to dismiss for failure to plead a relevant product market. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 482, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992); Todd, 275 F. 3d at 199-200.

2. Merced's Monopolization Claim

Merced's Section 2 claims of monopolization and, in the alternative, attempted [*141] monopolization, are premised on Barclays's intent and ability to dictate the Daily Index prices on both the ICE and Dow Jones exchanges. By intentionally [34] engaging in large quantities of money-losing purchases and sales in the daily markets to reap profits from its swap contracts, Merced argues, Barclays used its monopoly power to prevent free markets from operating and control prices. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶ 66-68.) As a result "prices under contracts that settled against or were tied to the Daily Index Prices at the manipulated locations during the Class Period did not result from legitimate market information, supply factors, and demand factors." (Id. at ¶ 135.)

Barclays objects, first, that Merced's Section 2 claim falls short because it does not describe a relevant product market or barriers to entry for other participants in the market. (Dkt. No. 13 at 19.) It contends that although courts may consider ability to control prices in assessing monopoly power, Merced has not shown that a monopoly can be alleged on that basis alone. It relies on United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 393, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956), to argue that analysis of price control makes sense only in the context of other firms' ability to compete.

As Merced points out, though, monopoly power need not be shown through allegations of a defendant's relative market share. (Dkt. No. 14 at 17.) A plaintiff may also establish Section 2 monopoly power by way of [35] direct evidence of a defendants' power to control prices, as the Second Circuit made clear in Tops Markets. Tops Markets held that monopoly power for purposes of a Section 2 claim "may be proven directly by evidence of the control of prices or the exclusion of competition, or it may be inferred from one firm's large percentage share of the relevant market." 142 F.3d at 98 (citing K.M.B. Warehouse Distribs., Inc, v. Walker Mfg. Co., 61 F.3d 123, 128 (2d Cir. 1995)).

The Second Circuit has repeatedly reaffirmed that pleading a defendant's direct control over prices is an alternative to pleading relevant market share. See Heerwagen v. Clear Channel Commc'ns, 435 F.3d 219, 227 (2d Cir. 2006); Geneva Pharms. Tech. Corp. v. Barr Labs., Inc., 386 F.3d 485, 500 (2d Cir. 2 004) ("Monopoly power . . . can be proven directly through evidence of control over prices or the exclusion of competition, or it may be inferred from a firm's large percentage share of the relevant market."); PepsiCo, Inc., 315 F.3d at 107 (finding "authority to support [plaintiff's] claim that a relevant market definition is not a necessary component of a monopolization claim"). The Circuit Court clarified in Heerwagen that a plaintiff seeking to prove monopoly power by direct evidence must still show that the defendant controlled prices "with reference to a particular market." 435 F.3d at 229. Summarizing Circuit law on the question of direct evidence of monopoly power, a recent district court decision, Shak v. JP Morgan [36] Chase & Co., held that "monopoly power may be established, not only by proof of a defendant's market share in a relevant market, but alternatively by direct evidence of a defendant's price control or exclusion of competitors from a particular market in a manner indicative of its possession of monopoly power." No. 15 Civ. 992, 156 F. Supp. 3d 462, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3686, 2016 WL 154119, at *12 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 12, 2016). Other courts have upheld claims of price manipulation in commodities trading through direct evidence of pricing power. See In re Term Commodities Cotton Futures Litig., No. 12 Civ. 5126, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 184374, 2013 WL 9815198, at *24 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 20, 2013) (finding "market anomalies" reasonably suggested Defendants' ability to control prices); [*142] In re Crude Oil Commodity Futures Litig., 913 F. Supp. 2d 41, 53 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) (finding plaintiff pled monopolization by showing close correlation between price shifts and defendants' actions).

Under the standard set out in Top Markets and subsequent case law, Merced presents factual allegations that Barclays did successfully capture market share sufficient to move index prices in its favor. The Complaint incorporates the FERC Report's conclusions that Barclays manipulated the ICE Daily Index Prices during 655 product days over 35 product months. (See Dkt. No. 1 at ¶11 45, Ex. A.) The table appended to Merced's Complaint, taken from the FERC Report, offers a detailed breakdown of Barclays's trading by month, trading hub, product, [37] and price. It shows the number of days during each month that Barclays benefited from its alleged manipulative trades: during 27 out of 35 product months in which Barclays is alleged to have engaged in manipulative trades, the number of days in which it benefited was greater than 25. (Dkt. No. 1, Ex. A.) The duration of time during which Barclays engaged in anticompetitive trading, and the correlation between those trades and the ICE Daily Index prices' increases and decreases in response, make out a plausible claim that Barclays engaged in improper conduct that "ha(d) the effect of controlling prices." PepsiCo, 315 F.3d at 108.

Barclays contends that even if it can be shown that it established large trading positions for the purpose of benefiting its financial swaps, Merced has not pled facts showing that it did so through anti-competitive or exclusionary conduct. (Dkt. No. 13 at 19.) Regardless of Barclays's trading positions, it argues, no competing traders were excluded from accessing or trading on the ICE's electronic platform. Further, it argues, citing Brooke Grp. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 224, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993), that proof of above- or below-cost pricing is insufficient to establish anticompetitive conduct.

Barclays's narrow definition of anticompetitive or [38] exclusionary conduct is not supported by Second Circuit law. The Second Circuit has defined anticompetitive conduct as "conduct without a legitimate business purpose that make sense only because it eliminates competition." In re Adderall XR Antitrust Litig., 754 F.3d 128, 133 (2d Cir. 2014); see also New York ex rel Schneiderman v. Actavis PLC, 787 F.3d 638 (2d Cir. 2015) (finding "willingness to forsake short-term profits to achieve an anticompetitive end" indicative of anticompetitive behavior). Conduct may be characterized as exclusionary if it "does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way." Meredith Corp. v. SESAC, LLC, 1 F. Supp. 3d 180, 222 (S.D.N.Y. 2014); see also Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 605, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985) (whether conduct is exclusionary depends on "whether it has impaired competition in an unnecessarily restrictive way").

Merced has pled facts showing that Barclays "controlled the ICE Daily Index when it wanted to for its own pecuniary benefit" on its financial swaps, through anticompetitive daily contracts that moved the ICE Daily Index. (Dkt. No. 14 at 13.) Barclays's payment of supra-competitive prices to benefit its financial swaps is the type of conduct that "makes sense only because it eliminates competition." Adderall, 754 F.3d at 133. The Court need not infer Barclays's motive for engaging in money-losing daily contract transactions, however, because Merced has included facts in its Complaint [39] that plainly suggest [*143] Barclays's conduct was intended to artificially inflate or deflate market prices and constrain the market for other buyers and sellers of electricity. The allegations in support of Merced's Section 2 claim include specific communications, drawn from the FERC Report, that show Barclays's traders' intentional efforts to achieve and use monopoly power to manipulate prices. For instance, Merced cites one trader telling another via instant message that he was "trying to drive price in fin[ancial] direction" (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶¶ 75-76) and another asking a colleague "how far did you move the index," to which the colleague replied "not too far . . . shoulda started earlier, but my goal was to keep the sp/palo tighter[.)" (Id. at ¶71.) One trader asked the head of the West Power Desk whether he was "going to have fun with the index all month." (Id. at ¶89.)

Not only did Barclays's money-losing trades have no legitimate business purpose, they had an actual exclusionary and anticompetitive effect on the relevant market. Merced alleges in its Complaint that the quantity of electricity available for trading in each Trading Hub is not unlimited, meaning that Barclays's high-volume purchases of daily [40] contracts at money-losing prices, solely for the purpose of maximizing swap contract profits, displaced legitimate purchasers from trading in the supply of electricity encumbered by Barclays. (See Dkt. No. 14 at 16.)

Taking into consideration the preceding allegations of Barclays's ability to distort ordinary forces of supply and demand in setting the Daily Index Prices, and its willful maintenance of that power through uneconomical physical trading positions, the Court is persuaded that Merced has alleged facts sufficient to state a claim for unlawful monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act and denies the Motion as to Counts Two and Three of the Complaint.

E. CALIFORNIA UNFAIR COMPETITION LAW

1. Legal Standard

California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL") bans "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq. To state a claim under the UCL, a plaintiff must show "a loss of deprivation of money or property sufficient to qualify as injury in fact, i.e., economic injury, and that the economic injury was the result of, i.e. caused by, the unfair business practice." Allergan, Inc. v. Athena Cosmetics, Inc., 640 F.3d 1377, 1379 (Fed. Cir. 2011).

Under its "unlawful" prong, "the UCL borrows violations from other laws by making them independently actionable [41] as unfair competitive practices." Korea Supply Co. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 29 Cal. 4th 1134, 1143, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 29, 63 P.3d 937 (Cal. 2003); see also Berryman v. Merit Prop. Mgmt., Inc., 152 Cal. App. 4th 1544, 1554, 62 Cal. Rptr. 3d 177 (Cal. Ct. App. 2007) (quoting Lazar v. Hertz Corp., 69 Cal. App. 4th 1494, 1505, 82 Cal. Rptr. 2d 368 (Cal. Ct. App. 1999). Other federal courts have permitted parties to plead UCL claims predicated on an antitrust violation. See, e.g., *In re LIBOR-Based Fin. Instruments Antitrust Litigation, No. 11 MDL 2262, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147561, 2015 WL 6243526, at 95 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 20, 2015). However, if a plaintiff fails to plead the claim under the 'borrowed' law, it cannot state a UCL claim either. See Tuck Beckstoffer Wines LLC v. Ultimate Distributors, Inc., 682 F. Supp. 2d 1003, 1020 (N.D. Cal. 2010).

The statute also proscribes unfair practices not specifically denoted under another law. An act or practice is deemed unfair "if the consumer injury is substantial, [*144] is not outweighed by any countervailing benefits to consumers or to competition, and is not an injury the consumers themselves could reasonably have avoided." Berryman, 152 Cal. App. 4th at 1555. California cases look to whether the alleged unfair practice affects customers and the public generally rather than an individual holder of a contract. See, e.g., In re Webkinz Antitrust Litigation, 695 F. Supp. 2d 987, 998-99 (N.D. Cal. 2010) (finding the "central issue" to the UCL to be "whether the public at large, or consumers generally, are affected by the alleged unlawful business practice of defendants.") .

The UCL permits a plaintiff to recover only restitution, not general civil damages. See Korea Supply Co., 29 Cal. 4th at 1144. Because recovery is limited to restitution, a plaintiff pleading a violation of the UCL must show [42] that the defendant "obtained something of value to which [it] was not entitled." *In re LIBOR, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147561, 2015 WL 6243526, at 95. However, this need not be as a result of direct business dealings between the parties. See Law Offices of Matthew Higbee v. Expungement Assistance Servs., 214 Cal. App. 4th 544, 557, 153 Cal. Rptr. 3d 865 (Cal. Ct. App. 2015). Lost market share by a business competitor, for instance, is recognized as an injury sufficient to establish a claim under the UCL. See id. at 565.

2. Merced's Allegations under the UCL

In connection with its state law claims, Merced alleges that Barclays' price manipulation constituted "unfair, unconscionable, deceptive or fraudulent acts" causing injury to Merced and other parties trading in the Trading Hubs during the Class Period. Merced seeks restitution under the UCL. (Dkt. No. 1 at ¶¶ 145-48.)

In adjudicating the Motion as it relates to Merced's UCL claim, the Court must first decide whether Merced has pled an economic injury cognizable under the UCL. Merced alleges injury in the form of its payment of supracompetitive prices for physical electricity under contracts that settled based on Daily Index Prices manipulated by Barclays. The California Supreme Court has stated that there are "innumerable" ways in which economic injury from unfair competition may be shown. Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 323, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (Cal. 2011). These ways include overpaying or receiving less [43] in a transaction than a plaintiff otherwise would have. Id.

In its Motion, Barclays takes the position that the UCL's limitation to restitutionary relief, rather than monetary damages, requires Merced to show it lost money directly to Barclays or has an interest in Barclays's earnings on its electricity trades. (See Dkt. No. 13 at 22.) It cites Korea Supply Co.'s holding that "an individual may recover profits unfairly obtained to the extent that these profits represent monies given to the defendant or benefits in which the plaintiff has an ownership interest." 29 Cal. 4th at 1148.

The question of relief, however, is distinct from the question of whether Merced has pled a cognizable claim of unfair competition. Under the UCL, there are "innumerable ways" to show economic injury from unfair competition. Allergan, Inc. v. Athena Cosmetics, Inc., 640 F.3d 1377, 1382 (Fed. Cir. 2011). Allergan rejected a "direct business dealings" requirement, noting that if a complaint sufficiently alleges an injury that was caused by the defendants' unfair business practices, it has satisfied the requirements of the UCL.

[*145] Here, Merced has alleged economic injury on behalf of itself and other members of the Proposed Class. By overpaying for electricity, or receiving less than market rates in sales of [44] electricity, Merced and others holding contracts that settled according to the Daily Index Prices were injured. See Clayworth v. Pfizer, Inc., 49 Cal. 4th 758, 788, 111 Cal. Rptr. 3d 666, 233 P.3d 1066 (Cal. 2010) (finding plaintiffs could bring UCL claim where they paid more than they otherwise would have because of a price-fixing conspiracy in violation of state law); Hall v. Time Inc. 158 Cal. App. 4th 847, 854, 70 Cal. Rptr. 3d 466 (Cal. Ct. App. 2008) (finding UCL standard is satisfied when the plaintiff has "expended money due to the defendant's acts of unfair competition."). Having concluded that Merced has alleged an economic injury, the Court must also decide whether Merced has alleged facts describing an unlawful practice by Barclays. Upon its findings, supra, that Merced has made out a claim for unlawful monopolization by Barclays in violation of federal antitrust law, the Court is persuaded that Merced has adequately pled an unlawful business practice under the UCL causing the economic injury described above.

Although it remains for discovery to shed light on whether Merced will ultimately be able to prove its entitlement to restitution at trial, this "does not demonstrate that it lacks standing to argue for its entitlement to [it]." Clayworth, 49 Cal. 4th at 789; see also Allergan, 640 F.3d at 1382. The question of whether Merced is entitled to restitution, and how much, is a factual issue not to be decided [45] on a motion to dismiss. Merced's allegations in the Complaint set forth an unlawful act -- Barclays's violations of federal antitrust law -- and an economic injury: Merced and other proposed Class members' overpayment for electricity. These allegations are sufficient to state a claim under the UCL. Accordingly, the Court denies the Motion as to Count IV, violation of the UCL.

F. UNJUST ENRICHMENT

a. Legal Standard

Under New York choice of law rules, an interest analysis is applied to claims arising in equity, such as claims for unjust enrichment. See In re Grand Theft Auto Video Game Consumer Litig., 251 F.R.D. 139, 149 (S.D.N.Y. 2008) (applying significant contacts test to determine which state law to apply). In their briefing both parties, without conducting an overt interest analysis, address the unjust enrichment cause of action as a claim under New York law. (See Dkt. No. 13 at 23; Dkt. No. 14 at 24.) Therefore, the Court will address the claim under New York law.[7]

To state a claim of unjust enrichment under New York law, the [46] plaintiff must allege: "(1) that the defendant was enriched; (2) that the enrichment was at the plaintiff's expense; and (3) that the circumstances are such that in equity and good conscience the defendant should return the money or [benefit] to the plaintiff." Golden Pacific Bancorp v. Fed. Deposit Ins. Corp., 273 F.3d 509, 519 (2d Cir. 2001); Kaye v. Grossman, 202 F. 3d 611, 616 (2d Cir. 2000); see also Kidz Cloz, Inc. v. Officially for Kids, Inc., 320 F. Supp. 2d 164, 177 [*146] (S.D.N.Y. 2004). Under New York law, "there is no requirement that the aggrieved party be in privity with the party enriched at his or her expense," see Sperry v. Crompton Corp., 8 N.Y.3d 204, 215, 863 N.E.2d 1012, 831 N.Y.S.2d 760 (N.Y. 2007), but an unjust enrichment claim requires "some type of direct dealing or actual, substantive relationship" with a defendant. Reading Int'l, Inc. v. Oaktree Capital Mgmt., 317 F. Supp. 2d 301, 334 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

b. Merced's Claims

Barclays argues in its Motion that Merced fails to allege facts that, if proven, would establish any direct dealing or relationship between it and Barclays. Merced responds that privity is not required under New York law, and that it has sufficiently alleged a direct relationship between it and Barclays on the basis of both parties having purchased electricity on the North Path trading hub. In In re Amaranth, 587 F. Supp. 2d 513 at 547, the court dismissed an unjust enrichment claim where plaintiff alleged losses based on defendants' market manipulation because the alleged link "from defendants' market manipulations to the general natural gas futures market to plaintiffs' trades" [47] did not make out a direct relationship, trading or otherwise, between the parties to support an unjust enrichment claim. Id.

Merced entered into contracts with other California irrigation districts that settled based on market-derived Daily Index Prices. At no time does it allege that it or any members of the proposed Class traded or dealt directly with Barclays in any manner. Since Merced has not pled facts that make out any direct or substantive relationship between itself, or any other members of the purported Class, and Barclays, the facts alleged in the Complaint do not sustain an unjust enrichment claim. Therefore, the Court grants the Motion as to Count Five, Merced's unjust enrichment claim.

G. LEAVE TO AMEND

Rule 15 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that courts "should freely give leave [to amend] when justice so requires." Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2). Leave to amend should be granted unless there is "any apparent or declared reason - such as undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive on the part of the movant, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, undue prejudice to the opposing party by virtue of allowance of the amendment, [or] futility of the amendment . . . ." Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 182, 83 S. Ct. 227, 9 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1962); see also Commander Oil Corp. v. Barlo Equip. Corp., 215 F.3d 321, 333 (2d Cir. 2000) (noting that leave to amend [48] is "discretionary" but should be "freely given"); Block v. First Blood Assocs., 988 F.2d 344, 350 (2d Cir. 1993) ("The rule in this Circuit has been to allow a party to amend its pleadings in the absence of a showing by the nonmovant of prejudice or bad faith.").

The Court has concluded that Plaintiff's allegations fail to state a claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act and also fail to state a claim for unjust enrichment. The Court is not persuaded that it would be futile for Plaintiff to be given the opportunity to amend its Complaint by adding new factual allegations to restate the claims dismissed. Accordingly, the Court will afford plaintiffs the opportunity to submit a three-page letter to the Court within ten days of the date of this Decision and Order, explaining how it would correct the deficiencies in its Complaint if granted leave to replead.

[7] Under such an analysis, it would appear that California might have the most significant contacts as the state in which plaintiffs reside and suffered losses. However, there is no cause of action in California for unjust enrichment. See Grund v. Delaware Charter Guarantee & Trust Co., 788 F. Supp. 2d 226, 251 (S.D.N.Y. 2011) (citing Levine v. Blue Shield of California, 189 Cal. App. 4th 1117, 1138, 117 Cal. Rptr. 3d 262 (Cal. Ct. App. 2010)).

[*147] IV. ORDER

For the reasons stated above, it is hereby

ORDERED that the Motion (Dkt. No. 12) filed by defendant Barclays Bank PLC to dismiss the Complaint ("Complaint", Dkt. No. 1) of plaintiff Merced Irrigation District ("Plaintiff"), is GRANTED as to Counts I and V of the Complaint and DENIED as to Counts II, III, and IV of the Complaint, and it is further ORDERED that, should Plaintiff wish to seek leave [49] to file an amended complaint, Plaintiff may submit a letter of no more than three pages within ten days of the date of this Decision and Order, setting forth their position as to why leave to amend would not be futile and should be granted.

SO ORDERED.

Designation as a complex business case may be appropriate if disputes within the scope of N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-45.4(a) have not been expressly pleaded but must necessarily be resolved in order to litigate the claims that have been asserted. However, case law cannot be fairly read to support designation merely because the pleadings include factual allegations that arguably touch upon facts that, when read together with other allegations, might have been a basis for a claim that the plaintiff chose not to allege.

ORDER

THIS MATTER is before the Court on Plaintiff's Opposition to Designation as Mandatory Complex Business Case and Motion to Vacate Order of Designation ("Opposition"). The Court concludes that the Opposition should be ALLOWED.

Plaintiff Market America, Inc. ("Market America") instituted this action by filing a verified complaint on November 17, 2015, which was not served on Defendant Javita, Inc. ("Javita") until January 5, 2016, after Defendant Keith Doyle ("Doyle") had answered and asserted a counterclaim on November 30, 2015.

Market America's complaint alleged two claims: (1) a breach-of-contract claim brought solely against Doyle, and (2) a claim for tortious interference with contractual relations against all Defendants.

Javita timely filed its Notice of Designation as Complex Business Case under N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-45.4 ("Notice of Designation"), asserting that this matter should be designated as a mandatory complex business case because it contains disputes that involve material issues arising under antitrust law within the scope of section 7A-45.4(a)(3), as well as trade secrets within the scope of section 7A-45.4(a)(8). N.C. Gen. Stat. § 7A-45.4(a)(3), (8) (2015). The Notice of Designation was proper if, in fact, [*2] the case involves such material issues, but was improper if the case does not involve such material issues. Javita draws upon Market America's complaint and Doyle's counterclaim in seeking designation.

The dispute arises from Doyle's prior independent-contractor relationship with Market America, during which Doyle executed an Advisory Council Agreement ("ACA") that included provisions restricting Doyle after the termination of his position from competing in a defined geographical area for a six-month period and from soliciting other Market America distributors for two years.

Doyle did not seek to designate the case as a mandatory complex business case. He filed counterclaims against Market America on November 30, 2015, alleging claims for libel and for unfair and deceptive trade practices under N.C. Gen. Stat. § 75-1.1. The section 75-1.1 counterclaim is based on allegations that Market America made false statements and engaged in a pattern of unfair conduct, such as sending spies to Doyle's business meetings at which confidential information was discussed.

Superior Court Judge Richard Doughton issued a preliminary injunction against Doyle in Market America's favor on December 3, 2015, directing that Doyle comply with the [*3] ACA's restrictions, including the use of Market America's confidential information.

The Notice of Designation states that Defendant Tami Gaines ("Gaines") had also been an earlier distributor for Market America, in a relationship that ended on October 13, 2014. Market America had earlier obtained a preliminary injunction against Gaines in litigation brought against her. The parties dispute whether Gaines solicited Doyle to leave Market America or to join Javita in violation of her contract or the injunction entered against her.

In its Notice of Designation, Javita contends that this lawsuit includes material issues that are grounded in antitrust law and trade-secrets law, even though no specific claim has been stated in either Market America's complaint or Doyle's counterclaim that asserts relief for antitrust violations or trade-secret misappropriation. While Doyle does assert a claim for unfair and deceptive trade practices under section 75-1.1, HN1[] subsection 7A-45.4(a)(3) explicitly excludes disputes that are based solely on section 75-1.1. See id. § 7A-45.4(a)(3). The Notice of Designation further contends that the pleadings should be construed to present a claim for common-law unfair competition. No such claim is included within the provisions [*4] of section 7A-45.4(a) unless a claim for unfair competition can be classified as a "[d]ispute involving antitrust law." Id.

It is self-evident that Market America did not assert an actual claim for common-law unfair competition or for trade-secret misappropriation. However, this Court has previously recognized that HN2[] designation as a complex business case may be appropriate if disputes within the scope of section 7A-45.4(a) have not been expressly pleaded but must necessarily be resolved in order to litigate the claims that have been asserted. See Order on Opposition to Designation of Action as Mandatory Complex Business Case, Union Corrugating Co. v. Viechnicki, No. 14-CVS-6240 (N.C. Super. Ct. Sept. 9, 2014). However, Union Corrugating cannot be fairly read to support designation merely because the pleadings include factual allegations that arguably touch upon facts that, when read together with other allegations, might have been a basis for a claim that the plaintiff chose not to allege.

Here, the breach-of-contract claim does not necessarily present the Court with a dispute involving trade-secret misappropriation merely because a term in the contract states that Market America owns trade secrets that Doyle agreed to [*5] honor. Market America has not asserted that any trade secrets have been misappropriated, and resolving the breach-of-contract claim does not require the Court to assess whether certain information does or does not constitute a trade secret. The Court is not persuaded otherwise by Javita's argument that, because one of Market America's claims involves the solicitation of other distributors, and because Market America contends that its list of distributors is a trade secret, it logically must follow that this case contains a dispute involving trade secrets.

The Court likewise concludes that there is no material issue of antitrust law that must be resolved to litigate the claims that have been asserted. In its effort to define an antitrust dispute, Javita claims that the impact of a prohibition on soliciting any Market America distributor based on a covenant that Defendants believe is overly broad and unsupported by consideration necessarily extends beyond just the parties in the case, therefore affecting competition in some way that rises to the level of an antitrust issue. Javita's logic appears to be that such a covenant is an agreement in restraint of trade, and when the effect of [*6] enforcing the covenant has an impact beyond just the parties to the covenant so as to restrict competition by others, there is some special antitrust injury that falls within the scope of section 7A-45.4(a)(3). The Court gives Javita fair credit for creativity, but it is not persuaded by this argument.

In sum, the Court concludes that Javita is not entitled to have the case designated as a mandatory complex business case because it has not shown that the case involves material issues involving either an antitrust dispute or a trade-secrets dispute. Consequently, designation is improper. Market America's Opposition should be allowed, and the case should continue as a regular civil matter on the Guilford County Superior Court docket.

This Order is without prejudice to any parties' right to request the senior resident superior court judge to request that the case be designated as an exceptional matter under Rule 2.1 of the General Rules of Practice for the Superior and District Courts.

IT IS SO ORDERED, this the 29th day of February, 2016.

ORDER

I. INTRODUCTION

This matter comes before the Court on the Defendants LG Display Co., Inc. and LG Display America, Inc. and AU Optronics Corporation and AU Optronics Corporation America's (collectively, "Defendants") Combined Motions for Judgment as a Matter of Law, in the Alternative, New Trial, and Amendment of the Findings in Bench Trial. Dkt. # 689. Although Defendants have requested oral argument, the Court finds that oral argument is unnecessary. For the reasons set forth below, the Court DENIES Defendants' Motions.

II. BACKGROUND

In brief, this case concerns Plaintiff Costco Wholesale Corporation's ("Plaintiff") claims regarding a conspiracy spanning nearly a decade to fix the prices for thin-film transistor liquid crystal display panels (or "TFT-LCD panels"). Plaintiff, more specifically, claims that it paid too much for finished products that incorporated the price-fixed panels. Following a lengthy jury trial, judgment [*3] was entered in favor of Plaintiff and against Defendants for $61,971,040 based on the jury's verdict and this Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law. See Dkt. # 682. These motions follow.

III. LEGAL STANDARD

a. Motion for Judgment as a Matter of Law

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 50(b) permits a party to renew a motion for judgment as a matter of law previously raised under Rule 50(a) before the case was submitted to a jury. See E.E.O.C. v. Go Daddy Software, Inc., 581 F.3d 951, 961 (9th Cir. 2009). "A party cannot raise arguments in its post-trial motion for judgment as a matter of law under Rule 50(b) that it did not raise in its pre-verdict Rule 50(a) motion." Freund v. Nycomed Amersham, 347 F.3d 752, 761 (9th Cir. 2003) (citing Fed. R. Civ. P. 50 advisory committee note to 1991 amendment).

In ruling on a motion for judgment as a matter of law, a court may not make credibility determinations or weigh the evidence and must draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmoving party. See Josephs v. Pac. Bell, 443 F.3d 1050, 1062 (9th Cir. 2005) (citing Reeves v. Sanderson Plumbing Prods., Inc., 530 U.S. 133, 149-50, 120 S. Ct. 2097, 147 L. Ed. 2d 105 (2000)). Rule 50 permits a court to grant judgment as a matter of law "when the evidence permits only one reasonable conclusion and the conclusion is contrary to that reached by the jury." Ostad v. Or. Health Servs. Univ., 327 F.3d 876, 881 (9th Cir. 2003) (citing Monroe v. City of Phx., 248 F.3d 851, 861 (9th Cir. 2001)).

A court reviews "a jury's verdict for substantial evidence in ruling on a properly made motion under Rule 50(b)." Go Daddy Software, 581 F.3d at 961 (citing Janes v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 279 F.3d 883, 888 (9th Cir. 2002)). In other words, a court must sustain a jury verdict so long as there is "evidence adequate to [*4] support the jury's conclusion, even if it is also possible to draw a contrary conclusion." See Harper v. City of L.A., 533 F.3d 1010, 1021 (9th Cir. 2008) (quoting Pavao v. Pagay, 307 F.3d 915, 918 (9th Cir. 2002)) (internal quotation marks omitted). In contrast, a court reviewing a Rule 50(b) motion "based on grounds not previously asserted in a Rule 50(a) motion" is "limited to reviewing the jury's verdict for plain error." Go Daddy Software, 581 F.3d at 961 (quoting Janes, 279 F.3d at 888; citing Yeti by Molly, Ltd. v. Deckers Outdoor Corp., 259 F.3d 1101, 1109 (9th Cir. 2001)).

b. Motion for New Trial

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59(a) provides that a "court may, on motion, grant a new trial on all or some of the issues . . . after a jury trial, for any reason for which a new trial has heretofore been granted in an action at law in federal court." Fed. R. Civ. P. 59(a).

Because "Rule 59 does not specify the grounds on which a motion for a new trial may be granted," courts are "bound by those grounds that have been historically recognized." Zhang v. Am. Gem Seafoods, Inc., 339 F.3d 1020, 1035 (9th Cir. 2003). Included among these historically recognized grounds are claims "that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, that the damages are excessive, or that, for other reasons, the trial was not fair to the party moving." Molski v. M.J. Cable, Inc., 481 F.3d 724, 729 (9th Cir. 2007) (quoting Montgomery Ward & Co v. Duncan, 311 U.S. 243, 251, 61 S. Ct. 189, 85 L. Ed. 147 (1940)). Ordinarily, a "trial court may grant a new trial only if the verdict is contrary to the clear weight of the evidence, is based upon false or perjurious evidence, or to prevent a miscarriage of justice." Id. (quoting Passantino v. Johnson & Johnson Consumer Prods., 212 F.3d 493, 510 n.15 (9th Cir. 2000)).

c. Motion for Amendment

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52(b) permits a court [*5] to "amend its findings--or make additional findings" and to correspondingly amend the judgment on a party's motion filed no later than 28 days after the entry of judgment. "Motions under Rule 52(b) are primarily designed to correct findings of fact which are central to the ultimate decision; the Rule is not intended to serve as a vehicle for a rehearing." Crane-McNab v. Cty. of Merced, 773 F. Supp. 2d 861, 873 (E.D. Cal. 2011) (citing Davis v. Mathews, 450 F. Supp. 308, 318 (E.D. Cal. 1978)). Such motions are only "granted in order to correct manifest errors of law or fact or to address newly discovered evidence or controlling case law." Perez v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 291 F.R.D. 425, 431 (N.D. Cal. 2013) (quoting *ATS Prods. Inc. v. Ghiorso, No. 10-4880, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43117, 2012 WL 1067547, at 1 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 28, 2012)).

IV. ANALYSIS

a. Proof of Plaintiff's Antitrust Injury

Defendants begin by arguing that Plaintiff has not shown that it suffered an injury as a result of their conduct. See Dkt. # 689 at 12. Defendants argue that the evidence Plaintiff presented at trial was insufficient to show that Plaintiff actually paid any overcharges. See id.

The Ninth Circuit has held that the rule "in seeking damages for loss of profits in antitrust cases is that the plaintiff is required to establish with reasonable probability the existence of some causal connection between defendant's wrongful act and some loss of anticipated revenue." Flintkote Co. v. Lysfjord, 246 F.2d 368, 392 (9th Cir. 1957). In other words, "[t]o recover treble damages, plaintiffs must prove [*6] actual causation—'injury in fact.'" In re Coordinated Pretrial Proceedings in Petroleum Prods. Antitrust Litig., 691 F.2d 1335, 1341 n.7 (9th Cir. 1982) (citing id.).

Defendants argue that Plaintiff was required to establish with "certainty that LCD panels manufactured by Defendants or co-conspirators were incorporated into the finished products" that Plaintiff purchased. See Dkt. # 689 at 13. They argue, essentially, that Plaintiff presented only generalized evidence of increases in finished product prices and improperly relied on Dr. Douglas Bernheim's model. See id. Plaintiff, for its part, properly characterizes Defendants' proposed standard as requiring proof of "panel-by-panel impact." See Dkt. # 695 at 11 (quoting MDL Dkt. # 4848 at 5).

Defendants propose too strong of a rule in considering antitrust injury. Far from requiring "certainty," courts have held that "[t]o demonstrate injury in fact, it is 'generally sufficient to show with reasonable probability some causal connection between the antitrust violation and [plaintiff's alleged injury].'" Sun Microsystems Inc. v. Hynix Semiconductor Inc., 608 F. Supp. 2d 1166, 1195 (N.D. Cal. 2009) (quoting Nw. Publ'ns, Inc. v. Crumb, 752 F.2d 473, 476 (9th Cir. 1985)). To be sure, "[i]n antitrust cases, a lesser level of proof is needed to support the amount of damages than to support the fact of antitrust injury." Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum Comm'n v. Nat'l Football League, 791 F.2d 1356, 1360 (9th Cir. 1986) (quoting Handgards, Inc. v. Ethicon, Inc., 743 F.2d 1282, 1297 (9th Cir. 1984)). But that does not mean that such evidence cannot be shown through circumstantial evidence [*7] and inference. See Sun Microsystems, 608 F. Supp. 2d at 1197 (citing Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 125, 89 S. Ct. 1562, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129 (1969); William Inglis & Sons Baking Co. v. ITT Cont'l Baking Co., 668 F.2d 1014, 1051 (9th Cir. 1981)). In fact, this Court - and the MDL court - has essentially held as much. See Dkt. # 681 at 8-9 (concluding "that the MDL court's rulings relieve Costco of any burden to prove its standing panel-by-panel").

With this in mind, the Court finds that the evidence sufficiently supports the jury's verdict and that much of this evidence is not specifically tied to Dr. Bernheim's regression model. To begin, this Court has already found sufficient evidence showing that Plaintiff purchased products containing price-fixed panels. See Dkt. # 681 at 9. Plaintiff presented substantial evidence showing sales of price-fixed panels from conspirators to Plaintiff's vendors. See e.g., Trial Ex. 51, 80, 81, 103, 104, 110, 114, 118, 5613 (Defendants' exhibit showing distribution chain). Multiple witnesses testified to the same effect. See e.g., Trial Tr. Oct. 1, 2014 [Do Hoi Koo Test.] 1080:16-24; Trial Tr. Oct. 16, 2014 [Masahiro Yakota Test.] 2752:24-2753:7. Plaintiff's evidence suffices to show that it purchased products containing price-fixed panels.

Furthermore, Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to show that increases in panel prices were passed through. For one, [*8] several witnesses acknowledged monitoring and sharing information regarding finished product demand and pricing. See Trial Tr. Oct. 8, 2014 [Soo Chul Park Test.] 1883:15-19; Trial Tr. Oct. 9, 2014 [Yul Rak Sohn Test.] 2085:22-2087:8. Plaintiff also presented evidence showing that the relationship between panel price and finished product prices was well understood. See Trial Ex. 221, 239, 318, 398. Furthermore, there was evidence showing that the conspirators supplied information regarding their views on the market for finished products with each other. See Trial Tr. Sept. 30, 2014 [Makoto Chiba Test.] 928:1-929:15.

Plaintiff also presented evidence showing that a large portion of the price of the products it purchased was attributable to the price-fixed panels. See e.g., Trial Tr. Oct. 6, 2014 [Geoff Shavey Test.] 1403:15-21; Trial Tr. Oct. 20, 2014 [Douglas Bernheim Test.] 2992:4-2993:19; see also Trial Tr. Oct. 16, 2014 [Dean Snyder Test.] 2613:7-16. In fact, there was substantial evidence that the prices of finished products is closely tied to that of panels. See e.g., Trial Tr. Sept. 24, 2014 [Douglas Bernheim Test.] 443:11-445:5.

This evidence was sufficient to show that Plaintiff [*9] suffered antitrust injury as a result of Defendants' wrongdoing. Moreover, contrary to Defendants' assertions, this was not evidence merely generalized to the industry as a whole. Dr. Bernheim himself testified that he based his analysis, in part, on tracing where panels came from for particular products that Plaintiff purchased. See Trial Tr. Sept. 24, 2014 [Douglas Bernheim Test.] 558:1-559:1. On this record, the jury could have found that it was more likely than not that Plaintiff was injured as a result of the Defendants' conduct.

Because the Court finds that Plaintiff met its burden on this element, it declines to address the Parties' arguments regarding judicial estoppel.

b. Proof of Plaintiff's Antitrust Standing

Next, Defendants argue that Plaintiff did not establish that it had standing to recover under Associated Gen. Contractors of Cal. v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983) ("AGC"). Of course, this Court and the MLD Court have already held that Plaintiff had standing to pursue its antitrust claims. See Dkt. # 681 at 10; MDL Dkt. # 6931 at 3-4; MDL Dkt. # 9144 at 3-4. And, contrary to Defendants' argument, this Court's ruling was not made in response to a defense summary judgment motion, but on evidence adduced at trial. See Dkt. # 681. This Court's [*10] ruling in large part was based on its finding that Plaintiff purchased products containing price-fixed LCD panels. See id. at 11.

As discussed, supra, Plaintiff introduced evidence demonstrating that it purchased products containing price-fixed panels from the members of the price-fixing conspiracy. See also id. at 11. Furthermore, as mentioned above, Plaintiff also presented evidence establishing that a significant portion of the price of finished products was related to the price of the price-fixed panels. This evidence suffices to establish Plaintiff's standing, as it shows that the market for LCD products and LCD panels was inextricably linked. This formulation of AGC antitrust standing is well established. See Dang v. San Francisco Forty Niners, 964 F. Supp. 2d 1097, 1112-13 (N.D. Cal. 2013) (collecting cases and finding that anti competitive effect on market for licensing of sports team logos and trademarks necessarily would affect consumer retail market for apparel bearing these logos and trademarks).

c. The Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act ("FTAIA")

Defendants next argue that no reasonable jury could have found that Plaintiff's claims were permitted under the FTAIA. See Dkt. # 689 at 22.

The FTAIA "lays down a general rule placing all (nonimport) activity involving foreign [*11] commerce outside the Sherman Act's reach." F. Hoffmann-La Roche Ltd v. Empagran S.A., 542 U.S. 155, 162, 124 S. Ct. 2359, 159 L. Ed. 2d 226 (2004). However, the FTAIA "brings such conduct back within the Sherman Act's reach" if "the conduct both (1) sufficiently affects American commerce . . . and (2) has an effect of a kind that antitrust law considers harmful." Id. (quoting 15 U.S.C. §§ 6a(1) & (2)). Furthermore, "[u]nder its plain terms, the FTAIA does not affect import trade." United States v. Hsiung ("Hsiung II"), 778 F.3d 738, 754 (9th Cir. 2014) (citing id.; Dee-K Enters., Inc. v. Heveafil Sdn. Bhd., 299 F.3d 281, 287 (9th Cir. 2002)). In short, the FTAIA does not affect the Sherman Act's coverage of import trade or commerce and excludes nonimport trade or commerce with foreign nations unless the domestic effect exception is met. See Fenerjian v. Nongshim Co., Ltd., 72 F. Supp. 3d 1058, 1080 n.30 (quoting United States v. Hsiung ("Hsiung I"), 758 F.3d 1074, 1086 (9th Cir. 2014)).

The Court instructed the jury that the Sherman Act applied if "[s]ales of LCD panels whose prices were fixed by the conspiracy or finished products containing LCD panels whose prices were fixed by the conspiracy . . . were sold in a transaction between a member of the conspiracy and a customer in the United States." Dkt. # 622 at 30. Defendants contend that the jury could not reasonably have found this to be the case because vendors from whom Plaintiff ultimately purchased the finished products were separate from the conspirators identified [*12] in the verdict. See Dkt. # 689 at 23. As Plaintiff correctly notes, however, the instruction permitted the jury to find that the import commerce exception was met based on evidence that conspirators sold their panels or finished products for resale to Plaintiff in the United States. Indeed, some witnesses testified that vendors would purchase finished products from conspirators to specifically be resold to American customers. See e.g., Trial Tr. Oct. 16, 2014 [Masahiro Yakota Test.] 2751:10-2753:7. Indeed, Plaintiff's theory falls well within an accepted theory of the FTAIA import commerce exclusion. Although the Ninth Circuit declined to address the "outer bounds of import trade" in Hsiung II, it nevertheless acknowledged that it could include defendants whose conduct was merely directed at an American import market. See Hsiung II, 778 F.3d at 755 n.8 (citing Animal Sci. Prods., Inc. v. China Minmetals Corp., 654 F.3d 462, 471 n.11 (3d Cir. 2011)).

Whatever the case, even if the import commerce exclusion did not apply, Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to show that the domestic effects exception was satisfied. Much of Defendants' argument on this point simply repeats its theory that Plaintiff was required to show specific, panel-by-panel impact. As discussed, supra, this Court and the MLD Court [*13] have repeatedly rejected such a stringent level of proof.

This Court instructed the jury that they could find that the domestic effect exception was met if "[t]he panels or products were sold by a member of the conspiracy outside the United States to a customer outside the United States, and the sale had a direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect on later sales to a customer in the United States." See Dkt. # 622 at 30. Furthermore, for an effect to be "direct," the Court instructed that it must have an "immediate impact on the later sales." See id. The jury's finding on this point was well established by the same evidence showing that that the prices Plaintiff paid were directly affected by the conspirators' conduct — i.e., the evidence showing that Plaintiff suffered antitrust injury.

The Ninth Circuit's holding in Hsiung II simply reinforces this point. The court there addressed substantially the same conspiracy at issue in this case — manufacturers of TFT-LCD panels conspired to set and stabilize their prices. See Hsiung II, 778 F.3d at 743. The court found that sufficient evidence was presented to satisfy the domestic effects exception. See id. at 759. The court noted that the evidence showed that "TFT-LCDs [*14] are a substantial cost component of the finished products." Id. Witnesses testified as to the correlation between panel cost and finished product prices. Id. Furthermore, the evidence established that "[i]t was well understood that substantial numbers of finished products were destined for the United States and that the practical upshot of the conspiracy would be and was increased prices to customers in the United States." Id. This "constellation of events that surrounded the conspiracy [led] to one conclusion—the impact on the United States market was direct and followed 'as an immediate consequence' of the price fixing." Id. Plaintiff presented substantially the same evidence in the instant case, as this Court has already outlined above.

Defendants now assert that in order to meet the "gives rise to" prong of the domestic effects exception, Plaintiff must specifically show that its specific injury arose from the domestic effect of which it complains. See Dkt. # 696 at 18. But Motorola Mobility LLC v. AU Optronics Corp., 775 F.3d 816 (7th Cir. 2015), which Defendants cite, dealt with a decidedly different scenario than that here. In Motorola, the court found that the effect of anticompetitive conduct on domestic U.S. commerce did not give rise to an antitrust [*15] cause of action because "the immediate victims of the price fixing were [Motorola's] foreign subsidiaries." See id. at 819-20 (emphasis added). The court stressed that "Motorola's subsidiaries are governed by the laws of the countries in which they are incorporated and operate." See id. at 820. Because Motorola and its foreign subsidiaries were treated as separate entities for other purposes, the court reasoned that they should be similarly treated in applying the FTAIA. See id. As such, there was no domestic effect - the harm was suffered in the foreign subsidiaries' countries. See id.

But Plaintiff did not make its purchases through foreign subsidiaries as Motorola did. It purchased the finished products from U.S. vendors who, in turn, purchased from conspirators. The domestic effect — the increased prices as a result of the cartel's price fixing — was felt by Plaintiff entirely in the U.S. Additionally, the increased prices that Plaintiff paid for the products containing fixed-price panels was, of course, specific to Plaintiff. The domestic effects exception was satisfied.

Finally, Defendants urge this Court to find that Plaintiff's claim does not survive under Washington's Consumer Protection Act ("CPA"). [*16] See Dkt. # 696 at 18. Given that the Court has already found that Plaintiff's claims survive application of the FTAIA, it is functionally irrelevant whether the CPA incorporates those same limitations, though Defendants have provided some authority suggesting that it does. See *In re Optical Disk Drive Antitrust Litig., No. 3:10-MD-2143 RS, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 99965, 2014 WL 3378336, at 3 (N.D. Cal. July 10, 2014); cf. Ass'n of Wash. Pub. Hosp. Dists. v. Philip Morris Inc., 241 F.3d 696, 706 (9th Cir. 2001) (citing RCW § 19.86.920) ("Washington courts are directed to interpret the CPA in light of federal court decisions interpreting federal antitrust law").

d. Plaintiff's Burden of Proving Antitrust Impact

Defendants next argue that Plaintiff's burden in showing antitrust injury, antitrust standing, and domestic effect was not lessened by the Ninth Circuit's holding in Royal Printing Co. v. Kimberly-Clark Corp., 621 F.2d 323, 327 (9th Cir. 1980). See Dkt. # 689 at 25. Essentially, Defendants contend that Plaintiff was required to present upstream pass-on evidence showing that the inflated prices for the fixed-price panels was directly traceable to the prices Plaintiff paid for the finished products. See Dkt. # 696 at 20.

As this Court has previously ruled, such evidence is ordinarily not permitted pursuant to Royal Printing because permitting it "would 'involve all of the evidentiary and [*17] economic complexities' that the Supreme Court 'clearly forbade' in Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977)." See Dkt. # 569 at 3. This was because Illinois Brick foreclosed both offensive and defensive use of such pass-on theories by imposing a direct purchaser rule that eliminated the problems associated with apportioning overcharges between direct and indirect purchasers. See 431 U.S. at 728, 731-33.

First, Defendants urge that the Court should have required Plaintiff to show such upstream pass-on evidence because the instant case involved components rather than finished products. See Dkt. # 689 at 26-28. To this end, Defendants cite In re ATM Fee Antitrust Litig., 686 F.3d 741 (9th Cir. 2012), arguing that the Ninth Circuit changed the rule set forth in Royal Printing. See Dkt. # 689 at 27. But Defendants read too much into ATM Fee - the court there did not modify the Royal Printing rule. Rather, the ATM Fee court mentioned "pass on" just two times, each time simply repeating the plaintiffs' allegations. See 686 F.3d at 750, 753. There is simply no indication that ATM Fee changed Royal Printing's standard. To the contrary, ATM Fee affirms Royal Printing's holding that indirect purchasers may sue when a conspiring seller owns or controls the direct purchaser. See id. at 749.

Next, Defendants contend that Royal Printing's rule does [*18] not extend to AGC's standing requirements or to the FTAIA's exceptions. See Dkt. # 689 at 28-29. Consequently, Defendants contend that Plaintiff was required to adduce upstream pass-on evidence to show these requirements. See id. Simply put, Defendants argue that Plaintiff was put to a more stringent burden of proof on antitrust standing under AGC and to show that Plaintiff's claim fell within the exceptions to the FTAIA. Of course, Defendants do not cite any authority actually standing for requiring separate standards for these elements. This Court sees no reason to do so. AGC established a multi-factor test for determining whether a given plaintiff was a proper party to bring a private antitrust action. See 459 U.S. at 535, 537-44 & n.1. And the Court in AGC was well aware of the standard set forth in Illinois Brick and expressly stated that "[t]he same concerns" guided its holding governing standing. See AGC, 459 U.S. at 544. There seems little reason, then, that different burdens of proof should apply to Illinois Brick's ownership/control rule and to AGC's standard for antitrust standing. Likewise, this Court finds no reason to deviate from the Illinois Brick standard in evaluating whether a party's claims fall within the exceptions [*19] to the FTAIA.

e. Sufficiency of the Evidence Regarding Philips and Panasonic

Next, Defendants argue that the jury could not have reasonably found that Philips or Panasonic participated in the conspiracy. Dkt. # 689 at 30. Defendants thus argue that the Court should reduce the jury's award by approximately $11.7 million prior to trebling. Id. The Court disagrees. There was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that Philips and Panasonic participated in the conspiracy.

With respect to Philips, Plaintiff presented evidence showing that Philips was exchanging confidential information regarding panels.[1] Several internal Epson documents reflect communications with Philips in October and November 2004 discussing price and future production information. See e.g., Trial Ex. 924 ("With Amazon, the supply schedule is being moved up from January to December. 500k/month. Q4: $18.75 Q1:$17.75").[2] Additional documents reflect communications between other conspirators and Philips regarding TFT-LCD panels. See Trial Exs. 788 (discussing panel shortages and production and demand forecasts); 914 at 2 (explaining that "[p]rice requests from (Ph) for cell sales have become severe" and attaching an email explaining [*20] a meeting to discussing methods of reducing "TFT cell costs"); 936 at 3 (discussing "Active" panel quantities); 1056 at 1 (explaining that "Active LCDs" included TFTs). Indeed, as Plaintiff points out, much of this evidence establishes opportunity, method, and actual exchanges of information about non-STN panels. Finally, to the extent that Defendants contend that these exhibits merely show permissible buyer-seller exchanges, the Court disagrees. Many of these documents show impermissible price-fixing - and the jury could well conclude that the referenced discussions with Philips were part of the same scheme.

Likewise, the evidence supports the jury's finding that Panasonic was a conspirator. For one, numerous witnesses (including those who testified to early meetings and exchanges of confidential price information) testified to meeting with Panasonic. See e.g., Trial Tr. Sept. 25, 2014 [Genichi Watanabe Test.] 715:11-18; Trial Tr. Oct. 1, 2014 [C.C. Liu Test.] 1107:8-13, 1108:7-25, 1111:6-10, 1133:4-11 ("Q:You weren't concerned about [Panasonic's] pricing, were you? A: We tried to learn from them."). Other documents indicate that representatives of Panasonic may have met with representatives of other conspirators after 2001. See e.g., Trial Exs. 979; 1024. Additionally, other documents reflect that conspirators had learned Panasonic's willingness to abandon its supply of 15 inch panels to "Viewsonics" if the price dropped below $220. See Trial Ex. 99. Given [*22] the contents of that communication, the jury could well have inferred that a representative of Panasonic was the "separate source" who provided this information. See id. This evidence amply supports the jury's finding that Panasonic was a conspirator.

[1] Defendants argue that it was undisputed that Philips never attended a Crystal Meeting. See Dkt. # 689 at 30. That is true, but Defendants' expert admitted that physical presence was not necessary to be part of a conspiracy. See Trial Tr. Oct. 15, 2014 [Dennis Carlton Test.] 2399:16-2400:9. Furthermore, the MDL Court itself held that parties could be conspirators even without attending the Crystal Meetings. See In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., No. 12-CV-4114 SI, 2013 WL 3387652, at *1 (N.D. Cal. July 8, 2013).

[2] This exchange itself provides evidence that Philips could have exchanged price and production information regarding [*21] TFT-LCD panels for the same time period as Epson produced such panels. Although Defendants point out testimony that Epson did not produce such panels in fall 2004 (see Dkt. # 696 at 22 (citing Trial Tr. Oct. 8, 2014 [Takato Imai Test.] 1942:3-19, 1943:1-12)), this email reflects Philips' information for winter 2004-2005 and spring 2005.

Because the jury could have reasonably found that Philips and Panasonic were conspirators based on this evidence, the Court need not address Plaintiff's alternative theory based on Philips and Panasonic's ownership/control relationship of other conspirators.

f. Motion to Amend the Court's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

The final portion of Defendants' Motion is their request that the Court amend its Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law. See Dkt. # 689 at 33. Such motions are typically only granted "to correct manifest errors of law or fact or to address newly discovered evidence or controlling case law." Perez, 291 F.R.D. at 431.

Defendants first contend that the Court should amend its conclusion that wholly owned subsidiaries of conspirators or conspirators' subsidiaries were "controlled by members of a subsidiary." See Dkt. # 689 at 34 (quoting Dkt. # 681 at 11). Defendants aver that the Court applied the incorrect legal test in reaching this conclusion; [*23] rather, they contend that the proper test was expounded by In re Vitamin C Antitrust Litig., 279 F.R.D. 90, 101 (E.D.N.Y. 2012). See id. Of course, Vitamin C is not binding on this Court and Defendants did not previously raise this argument with this Court, meaning that they are barred from raising it on this Motion. See Diocese of Winona v. Interstate Fire & Cas. Co., 89 F.3d 1386, 1397 (8th Cir. 1996) (citing Concordia College Corp. v. W.R. Grace & Co., 999 F.2d 326, 330 (8th Cir. 1993)) ("Motions to amend a judgment cannot be used to raise arguments which could have been raised prior to the issuance of judgment").

Furthermore, to the extent that Vitamin C holds that a parent-subsidiary relationship standing alone may not satisfy the ownership/control exception (see Vitamin C, 279 F.R.D. at 101-02), that is not the law of this circuit. The Ninth Circuit held in ATM Fee that control may exist through either majority ownership of stock or actual control over a corporation's conduct. See 686 F.3d at 757 (citing Weinstein Enters., Inc. v. Orloff, 870 A.2d 499, 506-08 (Del. 2005); Kaplan v. Centex Corp., 284 A.2d 119, 120-23 (Del. Ch. 1971)) (analogizing necessary control for application of ownership/control exception to rules governing shareholder duties). Defendants have not identified any error to justify the Court's amendment of its findings.

Defendants next contend that the Court incorrectly found that Panasonic controlled JVC after Panasonic's equity ownership declined to less than a majority. See Dkt. # 689 at 35-37. However, the Court also found that there was no realistic possibility [*24] that JVC would have sued prior to July 2007 because it was under the control of Panasonic for the duration of the conspiracy. See Dkt. # 681 at 11-12. Furthermore, this Court does not believe that ATM Fee created a rule categorically precluding standing when a conspirator has less than a majority interest in the direct purchaser. To the contrary, as the MDL Court noted, "the fact that a company's shareholder interest is less than 50% and/or its representation on the board of directors of another company is less than 50% does not necessarily preclude control." MDL Dkt. # 7422 at 5-6. In addition, this Court rejected the Defendants' proposed date-of-suit rule (see Dkt. # 558), meaning that the Court's conclusion that there was no realistic possibility JVC would have sued prior to July 2007 sufficiently establishes Plaintiff's right to recover for its purchases from JVC.

V. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the Court DENIES Defendants' Motions for Judgment as a Matter of Law, in the Alternative, New Trial, and Amendment of the Findings in Bench Trial. Dkt. # 689.

DATED this 3rd day of March, 2016.

ORDER ON DEFENDANT PATHEON'S MOTION FOR ENTRY OF JUDGMENT

In his 1977 hit song, English singer/songwriter/guitarist Dave Mason, co-founder of the band Traffic, explained: "There ain't no good guy, there ain't no bad guy, There's only you and me and we just disagree."[1]

The song lyric phrase "we just disagree" can surely be applied to the relationship between Plaintiff Procaps S.A. ("Procaps") and Defendant Patheon Inc. ("Patheon") in this antitrust lawsuit. Procaps and Patheon have disagreed about pretty much everything in this case, which is now on appeal and which was filed in December 2012. The trial court record has generated 1046 docket entries. The parties have disagreed about substantive issues. They have disagreed about procedural issues. They have disagreed about discovery issues. They have disagreed about whether Patheon is entitled to attorney's fees after prevailing on its summary [*3] judgment motion and whether the Court should stay a fees analysis pending an appellate court ruling.

So it is no surprise that the parties now disagree about whether the Court should enter a judgment against Procaps in connection with an order awarding Patheon $173,480.80 in taxable costs. Procaps has not paid the taxable costs or filed a supersedeas bond. Noting that it cannot execute on a mere order granting a costs application, Patheon has now filed a motion for entry of judgment [ECF No. 1044]. Following Dave Mason's classic musical mantra, Procaps disagrees and filed a response [ECF No. 1045] opposing the motion. Patheon filed a reply. [ECF No. 1046].

The Dave Mason lyrical reference is not completely applicable, though, as the parties do in fact have perceived "good guys" and "bad guys." Without going into detail, suffice it to say that each party views the other as the so-called "bad guy" and has said as much more than once during this case. Regardless of who between them is the bad guy and regardless of whether there even is a bad guy (as opposed to a mere litigation adversary), the parties still continue to "just disagree."

Factual Background

After obtaining summary judgment in [*4] this antitrust claim, Patheon filed a bill of taxable costs. [ECF No. 1023]. Patheon supported its application with a memorandum of law, a declaration and myriad exhibits. Procaps filed an opposition [ECF No. 1026], asking that the costs bill be stayed, that the Court deny all costs or, alternatively, significantly reduce them.

The Undersigned previously entered a stay [ECF No. 1040], at Procaps' request, in connection with Patheon's motion for attorney's fees (of almost $23 million, under three separate theories) and non-taxable costs (of approximately $1.6 million). The order granting the stay was based on the fact that most of the fees and non-taxable costs sought by Procaps arose from the Florida Deceptive and Unfair Trade Practices Act ("FDUTPA"), which provides that an award cannot be entered until all appeals have been exhausted. Procaps' appeal is pending and is only in its preliminary stages. The taxable costs, however, did not arise from FDUTPA, so the Undersigned granted, in part, the taxable costs bill and awarded Patheon $173,480.80 in costs against Procaps. [ECF No. 1043].

The Parties' Positions

Patheon says that it needs a monetary judgment in order to execute on the costs [*5] award. Noting that the Undersigned previously denied a Procaps request to stay the entry of a costs award, Patheon contends that Procaps must file a supersedeas bond if it wishes to postpone its obligation to pay the costs award. Patheon argues that there are no grounds to justify an order postponing Procaps' obligation to pay the costs award in the absence of a supersedeas bond.

Procaps contends that the Court has discretion to delay entry of a costs judgment where the appellate issue is based upon a split of decisions between Circuits or is a case of first impression. Procaps submitted a copy of its initial appellate brief and argues that its appeal raises antitrust issues which the Eleventh Circuit "has not addressed in this context." It also contends that there is "tension" between "certain Eleventh Circuit decisions and United States Supreme Court precedent and decisions from other Circuit Courts of Appeal." Concluding that "the underlying merits judgment is subject to potential reversal in the Eleventh Circuit based on significant questions of antitrust law," Procaps raises a practical point: if the summary judgment were to be reversed, then a costs judgment in Patheon's favor [*6] would be a nullity.

Procaps also argues that this Court has discretion to stay execution of a judgment without the posting of a bond under "proper circumstances," such as where the judgment debtor "objectively demonstrates a present financial ability to facilely respond to a money judgment and presents to the Court a financially secure plan for maintaining the same degree of solvency during the period of appeal." Procaps says that procuring a bond to cover $190,828.88[2] would be a waste of money because it is "a multi-million dollar company fully capable of satisfying this amount."[3] It further points out that the costs award is accruing post-judgment interest from the date of the merits judgment, which it says means that "a costs judgment appears unnecessary to secure Patheon's ability to collect post-judgment interest on its costs award should it later prevail in the Eleventh Circuit." (emphasis added).

Patheon argues that the posting of a bond is required to obtain a stay here and that staying execution of a judgment without a bond is rare. It contends that parties seeking a stay without a bond must present an alternate form of security or present a financially secure plan to pay a judgment after appeal. Noting that Procaps has done neither, Patheon emphasizes that Procaps is a Colombian company and that "collecting will be complicated and could require legal proceedings in a foreign country [*8] if a bond is not posted." And it argues that the non-payment risk "is particularly prevalent here given the acrimonious relationship between the parties."

Applicable Legal Principles and Analysis

It is certainly true that reversal of the summary judgment in Patheon's favor would render the costs judgment a nullity. But that point is also a truism -- it could be said about every money judgment (or fees award or costs award) which the losing party has appealed. If the possibility of reversal was by itself sufficient to justify a stay or a delay in entering a money judgment, then there would never be need for a supersedeas bond (because all judgments would be stayed simply because the appeal could lead to a reversal, thereby rendering moot the appellant's obligation to pay the appellee).

Thus, the Undersigned does not consider that theoretical possibility a convincing reason to not enter a costs judgment.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 58(b) requires that a judgment be entered "promptly." Procaps' position is, of course, fundamentally at odds with this requirement. In effect, Procaps seeks a stay without posting a bond, without posting alternate security and without articulating a plan to pay the judgment should it lose its [*9] appeal.[4]

[2] Procaps used this amount because Local Rule 62.1(a) provides that a supersedeas bond shall be in the amount of 110% of the judgment (but that the Court may "direct otherwise"). 110% of the costs award would be $190,828.88.

[3] Procaps did not submit any evidence of its own to support its claim of being a multi-million-dollar [*7] company. Instead, it referred to Patheon's initial fees motion, which contained a section entitled "Procaps Can Pay a Fee Award." [ECF No. 1030]. The specifics of that section were filed under seal. The Undersigned has access to the unredacted, under-seal motion. [ECF No. 1028]. The motion was accompanied by an exhibit which summarized Procaps' financial results and revealed its market value as of December 2012. Because the financial details were filed under seal, the Undersigned cannot discuss the specifics here. However, the Undersigned notes that the information fully supports Procaps' contention, assuming that its current financial condition has not dramatically changed from December 2012.

[4] Staying execution without a bond is rare. Advanced Estimating Sys., Inc. v. Riney, 171 F.R.D. 327, 328 (S.D. Fla. 1997) (defendants "must post a full security supersedeas bond under normal conditions and courts "should only allow lesser bonds on extraordinary occasions"). A bond secures the rights of the non-appealing party. United States v. O'Callaghan, 805 F. Supp. 2d

Courts apply a 5-factor test to determine whether a stay is appropriate:

> (1) the complexity of the collection process; (2) the amount of time required to obtain a judgment [*10] after it is affirmed on appeal; (3) the degree of confidence that the district court has in the availability of funds to pay the judgment . . . ; (4) whether the defendant's ability to pay the judgment is so plain that the cost of a bond would be a waste of money . . . ; and (5) whether the defendant is in such a precarious financial situation that the requirement to post a bond would place other creditors of the defendant in an insecure position.

O'Callaghan, 805 F. Supp. 2d at 1326 (quoting Dillon v. City of Chicago, 866 F.2d 902, 904-05 (7th Cir. 1988)).

Although Procaps may indeed be a "multi-million-dollar" company, this alone does not generate significant confidence in Patheon's ability to collect. Procaps is a foreign entity and collection proceedings might not necessarily be easy.

Procaps has not called the Court's attention to a case where a bond-free stay was issued without alternative security. Cf. Avirgan v. Hull, 125 F.R.D. 185, 186 (S.D. Fla. 1989) (mentioning "financially secure plan" and rejecting appellant's argument that posting a bond would render it insolvent). If Procaps is indeed a multi-million-dollar company, then it can post 110% of the judgment and avoid the need to obtain a bond and pay a premium to the bonding company. *Lary v. Boston Sci. Corp., No. 11-cv-23820, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27579, 2015 WL 1000966, at 2 (S.D. Fla. March 6, 2015) (rejecting motion for a stay of execution or [*11] waiver of supersedeas bond pending appeal and explaining that "defendants have substantial cash or cash equivalents on hand to post the required amount plus 10% with the Court, thus not incurring the expense of a bond.").

Procaps argues that the Court has discretion to not enter judgment until the appeal is resolved. But the Undersigned does not find the few cases it cites to be applicable or persuasive. Hartford Acc. & Indem. Co. v. Crum & Forster Specialty Ins. Co., No. 10-24590-CIV, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113547, 2012 WL 3291986 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 13, 2012) held that a pending appeal is not a valid ground for a stay. Moreover, the issue concerned whether the court should stay consideration of a bill of costs, not whether it should postpone judgment once it ruled on the costs application. The other cases Procaps relied upon authorize a stay of execution on a judgment without bond where the appellant presents a financially secure plan -- but Procaps failed to present the required plan. See Poplar Grove, 600 F.2d at 1191.

Procaps suggests that there is a Circuit split on an appellate issue it raised in this case, but Patheon filed a response to Procaps' Civil Appeal Statement and advised the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals that the appeal was "unlikely" to reach the issue concerning Levine v. Central Florida Medical Affiliates, Inc., 72 F.3d 1538 (11th Cir. 1996), which [*12] requires that an antitrust plaintiff like Procaps prove that the challenged conduct had no procompetitive benefit or justification. Moreover, Patheon also pointed out that the Undersigned denied Patheon's summary judgment motion on the procompetitive benefit issue addressed in Levine -- which makes that argument irrelevant for purposes of reversing the summary judgment.

Procaps has not come anywhere close to convincing the Undersigned to not enter a judgment or to stay execution of a costs judgment without posting a bond. The Court will enter a separate costs judgment. Procaps, of course, can prevent Patheon from executing on it by posting a supersedeas bond or depositing sufficient cash security with the Court Clerk.

1321, 1324 (M.D. Fla. 2011) (a bond "compensates [the prevailing party] for delay in the entry of final judgment"). The appealing party must "objectively demonstrate" the stay is appropriate. Poplar Grove Planting & Ref. Co., Inc. v. Bache Halsey Stuart, Inc., 600 F.2d 1189, 1191 (5th Cir. 1979) (explaining that full a full security supersedeas bond is the "usual requirement"); *United States v. Dornbrock, No. 06-61669—CIV, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51331, 2008 WL 2894829, at 1 (S.D. Fla. 2008).

Parties seeking a stay without bond must present an alternative form of security or at least present a specific "financially secure plan" to pay a judgment after the appeal. Riney, 171 F.R.D. at 328 (citing Poplar Grove, 600 F.2d at 1191). "Even if a judgment debtor presents sufficient reason to depart from the requirement of a full bond, Poplar Grove strongly suggests that the judgment debtor must provide substitute security that 'furnish[es] equal protection to the judgment creditor.'" O'Callaghan, 805 F. Supp. 2d at 1325 (quoting Poplar Grove, 600 F.2d at 1191).

Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, the Undersigned grants Patheon's motion to enter a costs judgment and rejects Procaps' opposition and de facto request for a stay.[5]

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Robert Balmes and 140 other plaintiffs jointly sued their employer, Illinois Bell Telephone Co., for shortchanging them on overtime pay in violation of the Fair Labor Standards Act ("FLSA"), 29 U.S.C. § 201 et seq. Doc. 21 at ¶ 8. Chief Judge Castillo severed the plaintiffs' claims under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 21, and Balmes's suit was reassigned to the undersigned judge's calendar. Doc. 1-2; Doc. 21 at ¶ 9. Balmes then filed two amended complaints, Docs. 7, 21, the second of which alleges that Illinois Bell, when calculating his wages, routinely ignored time that he spent working before his official shifts and during lunch breaks, and that in so doing it violated the FLSA, the Illinois [*2] Minimum Wage Law ("IMWL"), 820 ILCS 105/1 et seq., and the Illinois Wage Payment and Collection Act ("IWPCA"), 820 ILCS 115/1 et seq. Doc. 21 at ¶¶ 15-53. Illinois Bell has moved to dismiss parts of the second amended complaint under Rule 12(b)(6). Doc. 28. That motion is granted in part and denied in part; Balmes's FLSA and IMWL claims based on pre-shift work and certain lunch break work are dismissed with prejudice to the extent that work was performed before February 28, 2011, but his IWPCA claims survive in their entirety.

Background

In deciding the motion to dismiss, the court assumes the truth of the second amended complaint's factual allegations, though not its legal conclusions. See Lodholtz v. York Risk Servs. Grp., Inc., 778 F.3d 635, 639 (7th Cir. 2015); Munson v. Gaetz, 673 F.3d 630, 632 (7th Cir. 2012). The court must also consider "documents attached to the [second amended] complaint, documents that are critical to the [second amended] complaint and referred to in it, and information that is subject to proper judicial notice," along with additional facts set forth in Balmes's brief opposing dismissal, so long as those facts "are consistent with the pleadings." Geinosky v. City of Chicago, 675 F.3d 743, 745 n.1 (7th Cir. 2012); see also Runnion ex rel. Runnion v. Girl Scouts of Greater Chi. & Nw. Ind., 786 F.3d 510, 528 n.8 (7th Cir. 2015). The following facts are set forth as favorably to Balmes as those materials allow. See Meade v. Moraine Valley Cmty. Coll., 770 F.3d 680, 682 (7th Cir. 2014).

Balmes worked as a Cable Splicer for Illinois Bell from June 15, 1999 until at least September [*3] 8, 2015, when he filed his second amended complaint. Doc. 21 at ¶¶ 16, 19. At all relevant times, his employment was governed by collective bargaining agreements negotiated between the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Illinois Bell. Id. at ¶ 22; Doc. 28 at 4. The agreements required Illinois Bell to pay employees "at the overtime rate of one and one-half ... times their basic hourly wage rate including applicable differentials" for all "[t]ime worked in excess of eight ... hours in a day" and for all "[t]ime worked in excess of forty ... hours in a week." Doc. 28-1 at 3, 27. Illinois Bell reiterated those overtime requirements in internal documents titled "AT&T Code of Business Conduct" and "Reporting Time Worked." Doc. 21 at ¶ 24; Doc. 28-1 at 38, 42. The Code of Business Conduct states that "all overtime hours worked by nonexempt employees must be paid regardless of whether they were approved," Doc. 28-1 at 40, and the Reporting Time Worked document states that "[n]on-exempt employees are eligible for overtime pay for all hours actually worked in excess of 40 hours in a workweek" and that "[n]on-exempt employees must be paid properly for all time worked," including "[p]reparatory work before the [*4] start of shift that is necessary for [their] job[s]" and "work during lunch periods," id. at 42.

Nevertheless, for years Illinois Bell required Balmes to perform work-related tasks without pay before his official shift and during lunch breaks. Doc. 21 at ¶¶ 33-38. Specifically, Balmes had to appear before his shift to check for supplies, review blueprints, discuss the day's jobs with other Cable Splicers and managers, finish timesheets, and perform other administrative tasks, id. at ¶ 34; and he typically had to work through lunch to secure job sites (which often featured open manholes on public streets), test equipment, and travel between job sites, id. at ¶¶ 37-38.

On January 17, 2011, other Illinois Bell employees sued Illinois Bell in Blakes v. AT&T Corp., 11 C 336 (N.D. Ill.), alleging that the company violated the FLSA and the IMWL by requiring Cable Splicers to guard open manholes during lunch breaks, travel between job sites during lunch breaks, and complete timesheets after their shifts, all without pay. Doc. 21 at ¶¶ 6-7; Amended Complaint, Blakes, 11 C 336 (Doc. 11). Section 16(b) of the FLSA, 29 U.S.C. § 216(b), allows workers to bring claims as "collective actions," which operate much like class actions under Rule 23 except that "plaintiffs who wish to be included in a collective action must affirmatively [*5] opt-in to the suit by filing a written consent with the court, while the typical class action includes all potential plaintiffs that meet the class definition and do not opt-out." Alvarez v. City of Chicago, 605 F.3d 445, 448 (7th Cir. 2010). The Blakes plaintiffs sought to bring the IMWL claims as a class action and the FLSA claims as a collective action. Complaint, Blakes, 11 C 336 (Doc. 1 at ¶ 3). Magistrate Judge Kim, who was hearing Blakes, conditionally certified three FLSA claims for collective treatment under § 216(b): (1) claims based on time spent guarding open manholes during lunch breaks; (2) claims based on time spent travelling between job sites during lunch breaks; and (3) claims based on time spent completing timesheets after shifts had ended. See *Blakes v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63225, 2011 WL 2446598, at 3-4 (N.D. Ill. June 15, 2011). Those three claims will be called the "Blakes claims." The Blakes plaintiffs voluntarily withdrew their IMWL class claims on June 23, 2011, and Balmes opted into the FLSA collective action on July 28, 2011. Doc. 31 at 3.

On December 17, 2013, Magistrate Judge Kim decertified the collective action with respect to both lunch-break claims, but not the post-shift claim, and stayed his ruling until February 28, 2014. Doc. 21 at ¶ 7; see *Blakes v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 176496, 2013 WL 6662831, at 21 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 17, 2013). On the last day of the stay, Balmes and 140 other members of the Blakes [*6] collective filed a new complaint against Illinois Bell in Tinoco v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 14 C 1456 (N.D. Ill.), as co-plaintiffs rather than as a collective action. Doc. 21 at ¶ 8; Doc. 28 at 3. Tinoco was assigned to Chief Judge Castillo, and the court issued summons on May 1, 2014. See Docket Sheet, Tinoco, 14 C 1456. Chief Judge Castillo ultimately held that a non-collective action suit joining the individual FLSA claims of 141 different plaintiffs would be too unruly, and so he severed the plaintiffs' claims, which the Clerk then distributed to judges throughout the District. See *Adkins v. Ill. Bell. Tel. Co., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40246, 2015 WL 1508496, at 9-10 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 24, 2015). Balmes's present suit, one of the severed Tinoco actions, was assigned to the undersigned judge's calendar. Doc. 2.

On September 8, 2015, Balmes filed a second amended complaint setting out his personal allegations against Illinois Bell. Doc. 21. The second amended complaint alleges that Illinois Bell violated the FLSA and the IMWL by requiring Balmes to work more than 40 hours per week without paying him one and a half times his normal wage for the extra time, as those statutes require. Id. at ¶¶ 51-52; 29 U.S.C. § 207(a)(1); 820 ILCS 105/4a(1). He also alleges that Illinois Bell violated the IWPCA by breaking its promises of overtime pay. Doc. 21 at ¶ 53. He seeks to recover for all of his unpaid work dating back to July 28, 2008—exactly three years before he opted into the Blakes collective action. Doc. 31 at 6 n.1, 9 n.3, 10 n.4. (A section heading in Balmes's brief gives a different start date—"August 25, 2008"—but because that contradicts other assertions in his brief as well as basic arithmetic, the court assumes it was a mistake.) Balmes's suit includes not only the Blakes claims (guarding job sites and travelling during lunch, completing timesheets after shifts), but also allegations [*7] regarding unpaid time spent preparing for the day's jobs before shifts and testing equipment during lunch, which will be called the "non-Blakes claims." Doc. 21 at ¶¶ 32-38.

Discussion

Illinois Bell moves to dismiss parts of Balmes's FLSA and IMWL claims as time-barred. Doc. 28 at 6-10 & n.3; Doc. 38 at 12 n.9. It also moves to dismiss Balmes's IWPCA claims on the grounds that they are completely preempted by § 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act ("LMRA"), 29 U.S.C. § 185, and that the Code of Business Conduct and Reporting Time Worked documents are not "agreements" between Balmes and Illinois Bell that could give rise to IWPCA liability. Doc. 28 at 10-16.

I. The FLSA Claims

Illinois Bell argues that Balmes's FLSA claim is partly time-barred. Doc. 28 at 6-10. Balmes argues that it is inappropriate to resolve timeliness questions on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Doc. 31 at 4-5. It is true that a Rule 12(c) motion for judgment on the pleadings may have been a more appropriate vehicle for Illinois Bell's limitations argument. See Brownmark Films, LLC v. Comedy Partners, 682 F.3d 687, 690 n.1 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Though district courts have granted Rule 12(b)(6) motions on the basis of affirmative defenses and this court has affirmed those dismissals, we have repeatedly cautioned that the proper heading for such motions is [*8] Rule 12(c), since an affirmative defense is external to the complaint."). Still, no rule categorically prohibits courts from ruling on arguments about timeliness on Rule 12(b)(6) motions. "[I]f it is plain from the complaint that the defense is indeed a bar to the suit[,] dismissal is proper without further pleading." Jay E. Hayden Found. v. First Neighbor Bank, N.A., 610 F.3d 382, 383 (7th Cir. 2010) (emphasis added); see also Chi. Bldg. Design, P.C. v. Mongolian House, Inc., 770 F.3d 610, 613-14 (7th Cir. 2014) ("[A] motion to dismiss based on failure to comply with the statute of limitations should be granted only where the allegations of the complaint itself set forth everything necessary to satisfy the affirmative defense.") (internal quotation marks omitted); Indep. Trust Corp. v. Stewart Info. Servs. Corp., 665 F.3d 930, 935 (7th Cir. 2012) ("[W]hen a plaintiff's complaint nonetheless sets out all of the elements of an affirmative defense, dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) is appropriate."). That is the case here.

Balmes also contends that it is inappropriate for the court "to scrutinize [his] complaint by 'line item'"—that is, to dismiss a portion of a given claim as untimely while allowing the other portion to proceed. Doc. 31 at 5. But that is not even a remarkable practice, much less an inappropriate one. See Chi. Bldg. Design, 770 F.3d at 612 (holding that, because some infringing acts occurred within three years of when the suit was filed, it was inappropriate to dismiss the case outright, but noting [*9] that "[t]o the extent that [the plaintiff] seeks recovery for earlier infringing acts, the issue may have to be revisited on remand ..."); Lyons P'ship, L.P. v. Morris Costumes, Inc., 243 F.3d 789, 797 (4th Cir. 2001) (holding that the district court "erred to the extent that it dismissed Lyons' claims that were premised upon acts that occurred within the applicable [limitations] periods"); *Global Cash Network, Inc. v. Worldpay, US, Inc., 148 F. Supp. 3d 716, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 163443, 2015 WL 8013464, at 2 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 7, 2015) ("That then means that Global Cash has no enforceable right of recovery for breach of contract as to any conduct predating June 12, 2009, and Count I is dismissed to that extent.") (footnote omitted); *Hill v. City of Chicago, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66609, 2014 WL 1978407, at 8 (N.D. Ill. May 14, 2014) ("Count IX is dismissed with prejudice to the extent it is based on time-barred events but may proceed with respect to the issuance of the June 6, 2013 warrant.").

Illinois Bell has moved to dismiss Balmes's non-Blakes claims, insofar as they pertain to work he performed before February 28, 2011, on the ground that they are barred by the FLSA's three-year statute of limitations for willful violations, 29 U.S.C. § 255(a). Illinois Bell concedes that Balmes's second amended complaint relates back to the original complaint in Tinoco filed on February 28, 2014, and therefore that claims based on work that Balmes performed on or after February 28, 2011 are at least plausibly timely. Doc. 28 at 6. Illinois [*10] Bell also concedes for purposes of its motion that Balmes's Blakes claims are timely to the extent they are based on work performed on or after July 28, 2008, which is three years before he opted into the Blakes collective action on July 28, 2011. Id. at 7. But Illinois Bell contends that Balmes's non-Blakes claims are time-barred to the extent they are based on work performed before February 28, 2011, a date three years before the Tinoco suit was filed. Id. at 7-10.

Balmes counters that Blakes tolled the limitations period on his FLSA claims. Doc. 31 at 6. In support, he cites American Pipe and Construction Co. v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538, 94 S. Ct. 756, 38 L. Ed. 2d 713 (1974), which holds that "the commencement of a class action suspends the applicable statute of limitations as to all asserted members of the class who would have been parties had the suit been permitted to continue as a class action." Id. at 554 (footnote omitted); see also Crown, Cork & Seal Co. v. Parker, 462 U.S. 345, 352-53, 103 S. Ct. 2392, 76 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1983); Sawyer v. Atlas Heating & Sheet Metal Works, Inc., 642 F.3d 560, 561 (7th Cir. 2011). American Pipe tolling, Balmes insists, applies to collective actions under the FLSA as well as to class actions, which means that he can recover for unpaid work performed as early as July 28, 2008. Doc. 31 at 6-10.

Illinois Bell does not dispute that American Pipe tolling can apply to collective actions under the FLSA. Doc. 28 at 7. Illinois Bell also admits that Blakes [*11] tolled the statute of limitations for the Blakes claims—which, again, allege that Illinois Bell refused to pay workers for guarding job sites during lunch, for travelling between job sites during lunch, and for completing timesheets after shifts. Ibid. Illinois Bell and Balmes disagree, however, about whether Blakes tolled the statute of limitations on Balmes's FLSA claims based on his non-Blakes claims—namely, that he often worked before his shifts and that he routinely did work during lunch other than guarding job sites and driving from one job site to another. Doc. 28 at 7-10; Doc. 31 at 10.

Judges in this District handling severed Tinoco suits have split over whether American Pipe tolled the limitations periods for non-Blakes claims. Some decisions hold that the lunch-break claims were tolled while the pre-shift claims were not. See, e.g., *Niemiec v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16351, 2016 WL 521060, at 2-3 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 10, 2016); *Tennessen v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16334, 2016 WL 521046, at 2-3 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 10, 2016); *Jones v. Ill. Other decisions hold that none of the non-Blakes claims were tolled. *See Passi v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5381, 2016 WL 193401, at 4 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 15, 2016); Malkowski v. [] Other decisions hold that American Pipe tolling is irrelevant and that it is more appropriate to analyze the severed Tinoco suits [*12] under Rule 15(c)(1)(B). See, e.g., *Ballard v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 143163, 2015 WL 6407574, at 3 & n.1 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 21, 2015). Both Balmes and Illinois Bell agree that American Pipe tolling is the correct framework for holds that none of Balmes's non-Blakes claims were tolled by Blakes. See Scott v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30905, 2016 WL 910507 (N.D. Ill. Mar 10, 2016).

As the Supreme Court explained in Johnson v. Railway Express Agency, Inc., 421 U.S. 454, 95 S. Ct. 1716, 44 L. Ed. 2d 295 (1975), American Pipe applies only when the earlier class suit "involve[s] exactly the same cause of action subsequently asserted." Id. at 467. And as the Seventh Circuit held in In re Copper Antitrust Litigation, 436 F.3d 782 (7th Cir. 2006), American Pipe does not apply when the class claim and subsequent individual claim turn on the same factual allegations but advance different legal theories. Id. at 794 (holding that a class suit in state court alleging violations of state antitrust law did not toll the limitations period for a later-filed suit for violations of federal antitrust law based on the same alleged misconduct); see also Sawyer, 642 F.3d at 562 ("[T]he point of [Copper Antitrust] ... was not that a change of forum was dispositive; it was that state and federal antitrust laws differ."); Williams v. Boeing Co., 517 F.3d 1120, 1135-36 (9th Cir. 2008) (holding that American Pipe did not apply because the class suit alleged that the defendant violated 42 U.S.C. § 1981 with discriminatory failures to promote and by allowing a hostile work environment, while the later individual suit alleged [*13] that the defendant violated § 1981 by compensating black workers differently); *Spann v. Cmty. Bank of N. Va., 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5148, 2004 WL 691785, at 5-6 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 30, 2004) (holding that the statute of limitations on an individual claim under the federal Truth in Lending Act was not tolled by a class complaint that alleged violations of state law); Stutz v. Minn. Mining Mfg. Co., 947 F. Supp. 399, 404 n.2 (S.D. Ind. 1996) ("For the legal fiction of tolling to be equitable to the defendant, the claims in both the class action and the individual action must be identical.").

Balmes points out that the Blakes complaint put Illinois Bell on notice that it was being sued "for unpaid wages dating back to January 17, 2008." Doc. 31 at 9. But notice to the defendant is not enough to trigger American Pipe; otherwise, the doctrine would apply to claims dealing with identical facts but different legal theories or vice versa, which Copper Antitrust, Williams, and the other above-cited cases disprove. Instead, American Pipe tolling exists to prevent "needless duplication" of litigation. American Pipe, 414 U.S. at 554. If an absent class member stands to recover in a putative class action but worries that her individual claim will be time-barred if the court eventually decides not to certify a class or to decertify a certified class, she might file an individual suit just to cover her bases. American [*14] Pipe tolling allays that worry, and therefore dissuades absent class members from filing protective suits. See Chardon v. Fumero Soto, 462 U.S. 650, 659, 103 S. Ct. 2611, 77 L. Ed. 2d 74 (1983); American Pipe, 414 U.S. at 553-54. To have that effect, though, American Pipe need only apply to identical causes of action. As the Eighth Circuit recently explained:

> A broader rule would not enhance the "efficiency and economy" of Rule 23 class actions. The Supreme Court's concern was that without tolling, putative class members would needlessly bring motions to intervene or a multiplicity of actions raising identical claims. But where a putative class member wishes to pursue a claim that is outside the scope of the class action, his separate timely lawsuit is not "needless," because the class action would not prosecute his different claim.

Zarecor v. Morgan Keegan & Co., 801 F.3d 882, 888 (8th Cir. 2015) (emphasis added, citations omitted).

That is exactly what happened here. The lead plaintiffs in Blakes sued for pay for the time they spent guarding manholes during lunch, travelling between job sites during lunch, and filling out timesheets after shifts—the Blakes claims. If Balmes wanted to recover only for the Blakes claims, it would have been a waste for him to file an individual suit while the Blakes collective action was pending, and so it makes sense that the collective [*15] action tolled the statute of limitations for those specific claims. But Balmes also wants to recover for non-Blakes claims—time he spent preparing for work before his shifts, and time he spent doing work during lunch other than guarding manholes and driving between jobs. He could not reasonably have expected for the Blakes collective action to provide recovery for those claims, so it would not have been a waste for him to file an individual suit stating those claims. American Pipe tolling is therefore inappropriate for the non-Blakes claims.

analyzing this suit, so the court need not address Rule 15(c)(1)(B) here. For the undersigned's analysis of the Rule 15(c)(1)(B) issue, see Scott v. Ill. Bell Tel. Co., 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 30905, 2016 WL 910507 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 10, 2016).

In fairness, Balmes's contrary position has support in decisions of the Second and Ninth Circuits. See Cullen v. Margiotta, 811 F.2d 698, 720 (2d Cir. 1987) (holding that American Pipe tolling, much like relation back under Rule 15(c), applies whenever the later-filed claims "involve the same evidence, memories, and witnesses as were involved in the initial putative class action," regardless of "the differences between the legal theories advanced" in the two actions), overruled on other grounds by Agency Holding Corp. v. Malley-Duff & Assocs., Inc., 483 U.S. 143, 107 S. Ct. 2759, 97 L. Ed. 2d 121 (1987); Tosti v. City of Los Angeles, 754 F.2d 1485, 1489 (9th Cir. 1985) ("We find no persuasive authority for a rule which would require that the individual suit must be identical in every respect to the class suit for the statute to be tolled."); see also In re Cmty. Bank of N. Va., 622 F.3d 275, 299-300 (3d Cir. 2010) (describing the circuit [*16] split and collecting cases); but see Zarecor, 801 F.3d at 888 (8th Cir. 2015) (rejecting the contention that "American Pipe tolling should apply because the [individual claims], although different causes of action, were based on the same factual information that underlay the class action complaint"); Raie v. Cheminova, Inc., 336 F.3d 1278, 1283 (11th Cir. 2003) ("As we explained ..., however, a wrongful death action under Florida law is different in kind from any action based on a defective product. Because of this difference, a class action asserting primarily product liability claims would not include wrongful death claims unless wrongful death claims were explicitly included in the class action."). But this court follows the dictates of the Seventh Circuit in Copper Antitrust and Sawyer, not of the Second or the Ninth. See United States v. Glaser, 14 F.3d 1213, 1216 (7th Cir. 1994) ("A district court in Wisconsin must follow [the Seventh Circuit's] decisions, but it owes no more than respectful consideration to the views of other circuits.").

II. The IMWL Claims

A similar analysis applies to Balmes's IMWL claims. Three putative class IMWL claims were pending in Blakes between January 17, 2011, when the original complaint was filed, and June 23, 2011, when the Blakes plaintiffs voluntarily withdrew their class claims that Illinois Bell violated [*17] the IMWL by forcing workers: (1) to guard job sites during lunch; (2) to travel during lunch; and (3) to report their time after their shifts. Doc. 21 at ¶ 13; Complaint, Blakes, 11 C 336 (Doc. 1). Illinois Bell concedes that the limitations periods for Balmes's IMWL claims based on those allegations were tolled under American Pipe during that time. Doc. 38 at 12 n.9. (Illinois Bell does state that Balmes has "at most, six potential weeks of additional IMWL claims based on what was pled in Blakes." Ibid. That is incorrect. January 17 through June 23, a period of 158 days, is more like five months than six weeks.) And while Balmes argues that all of his IMWL claims were tolled during that period, Doc. 31 at 11, that argument fails for the same reason the parallel argument about his FLSA claims fails. The statute of limitations governing Balmes's IMWL claims was tolled from January 17, 2011 until June 23, 2011, but only to the extent that the claims were based on the same allegations as the IMWL claims in Blakes. So Balmes's Blakes claims under the IMWL are dismissed to the extent they are based on work performed before September 23, 2010, which is three years and 158 days before the Tinoco suit was [*18] filed.

III. The IWPCA Claims

Unlike the IMWL and the FLSA, which require employers to pay employees a minimum wage and to pay time and a half for overtime work no matter what, the IWPCA requires only that employers pay their employees whatever they agreed to pay them. See DeMarco v. Nw. Mem'l Healthcare, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 88541, 2011 WL 3510896, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 10, 2011). The IWPCA states that "[e]very employer shall be required, at least semi-monthly, to pay every employee all wages earned during the semi-monthly pay period," 820 ILCS 115/3, and it defines "wages" as "any compensation owed an employee by an employer pursuant to an employment contract or agreement between the 2 parties," 820 ILCS 115/2. Balmes alleges that Illinois Bell violated the IWPCA by reneging on an agreement to pay him time and a half for overtime work. He cites four documents as evidence of the agreement: the two collective bargaining agreements between Balmes's union and Illinois Bell, the Code of Business Conduct, and the Reporting Time Worked document. Doc. 31 at 12-15.

As noted, the Code of Business Conduct states that "all overtime hours worked by nonexempt employees must be paid regardless of whether they were approved," Doc. 28-1 at 40, and the Reporting Time Worked document states that "[n]on-exempt employees are eligible for overtime pay [*19] for all hours actually worked in excess of 40 hours in a workweek" and that "[n]on-exempt employees must be paid properly for all time worked," id. at 42. Illinois Bell argues that, as a matter of law, those documents cannot establish an agreement between Balmes and Illinois Bell for purposes of the IWPCA.

Illinois Bell first points out that the Code of Business Conduct contains a disclaimer stating (in all capital letters) that "the Code of Business Conduct is not a contract of employment and does not create contractual rights of any kind between AT&T and its employees." Doc. 28 at 14; Doc. 28-1 at 39. But an "employment agreement [within the meaning of the IWPCA] need not be a formally negotiated contract"; it is "broader than a contract and requires only a manifestation of mutual assent on the part of two or more persons." Landers-Scelfo v. Corp. Office Sys., Inc., 356 Ill. App. 3d 1060, 827 N.E.2d 1051, 1059, 293 Ill. Dec. 170 (Ill. App. 2005) (quoting Zabinsky v. Gelber Grp., Inc., 347 Ill. App. 3d 243, 807 N.E.2d 666, 671, 283 Ill. Dec. 61 (Ill. App. 2004)); see also Hess v. Kanoski & Assocs., 668 F.3d 446, 452 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Illinois courts have explained that an agreement under the IWPCA is broader than a contract.") (internal quotation marks omitted); Catania v. Local 4250/5050 of Commc'ns Workers of Am., 359 Ill. App. 3d 718, 834 N.E.2d 966, 972, 296 Ill. Dec. 161 (Ill. App. 2005) ("Although a plaintiff must prove the existence of a valid and enforceable contract in order to recover under a common law action for breach of contract, the same cannot be said in an action [*20] under the Wage Payment Act."). The disclaimer establishes only that the Code of Business Conduct does not create a contract; it is still possible, viewing all facts in the light most favorable to Balmes, that the Code represents an agreement between Balmes and Illinois Bell for purposes of the IWPCA. See Wharton v. Comcast Corp., 912 F. Supp. 2d 655, 659 (N.D. Ill. 2012) ("The disclaimers' statements that the handbooks do not create a 'contract' therefore say nothing, by themselves, about whether the handbooks create an agreement.").

The disclaimer here is unlike the broader disclaimers in Brand v. Comcast Corp., 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52098, 2013 WL 1499008 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 11, 2013), and Martino v. MCI Communications Services, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95155, 2008 WL 4976213 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 20, 2008), which stated not only that the handbooks did not create contracts, but also that the employers did not assent to be bound in any way by statements in the handbooks. See *Brand, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52098, 2013 WL 1499008, at 5 ("The individual provisions of the Employee Handbook are simply guidelines, and Comcast reserves sole discretion to interpret them and resolve any conflict between or among policies.") (alteration omitted); *Martino, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 95155, 2008 WL 4976213, at 6 ("The Compensation Plan, including all related materials and documentation, is neither a contract nor a guarantee of employment or compensation of any kind.") (emphasis added). And while the disclaimer here is very similar to the one that *Harris v. Seyfarth Shaw LLP, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93911, 2010 WL 3701322, at 2 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 9, 2010), held prevented a handbook from creating an agreement [*21] under the IWPCA, the undersigned is not bound by that decision and respectfully disagrees with its reasoning.

Illinois Bell next argues that the Code of Conduct and the Reporting Time Worked document are not agreements under the IWPCA because they state only that Illinois Bell will pay time and a half for overtime, which the IMWL and the FLSA already require it to do. Doc. 28 at 14-16. Again, though, that argument confuses agreements with contracts. Contracts require consideration, which usually means that parties cannot contract to do things that they already were required to do. See Contempo Design, Inc. v. Chi. and Ne. Ill. Dist. Council of Carpenters, 226 F.3d 535, 550 (7th Cir. 2000) (en banc) ("The pre-existing duty rule states that promising to perform a duty that already is owed under an existing contract is not consideration, and, thus, a modification to the contract is unenforceable."); Johnson v. Maki & Assocs., Inc., 289 Ill. App. 3d 1023, 682 N.E.2d 1196, 1199, 225 Ill. Dec. 119 (Ill. App. 1997). But an agreement under the IWPCA is only "a manifestation of mutual assent," and nothing prevents an employer and an employee from mutually assenting to follow the law. See Wharton, 912 F. Supp. 2d at 660-61 (rejecting an employer's argument that, because a handbook promised only that the employer "w[ould] comply with existing employment law," it could not be an employment agreement under the IWPCA).

Illinois Bell finds more success [*22] arguing that it is inappropriate for Balmes to rely on the collective bargaining agreements for purposes of his IWPCA claims. Section 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act ("LMRA") provides:

Suits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization representing employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this chapter, or between any such labor organizations, may be brought in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, without respect to the amount in controversy or without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

29 U.S.C. § 185(a). As interpreted by the Supreme Court, the provision does more than authorize federal courts to hear labor disputes; it also completely preempts state law claims "founded directly on rights created by collective-bargaining agreements, and also claims substantially dependent on analysis of a collective-bargaining agreement." Caterpillar Inc. v. Williams, 482 U.S. 386, 394, 107 S. Ct. 2425, 96 L. Ed. 2d 318 (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Nelson v. Stewart, 422 F.3d 463, 467-69 (7th Cir. 2005); In re Bentz Metal Prods. Co., 253 F.3d 283, 285-86 (7th Cir. 2001) (en banc). Preemption under § 301 "covers not only obvious disputes over labor contracts, but also any claim masquerading as a state-law claim that nevertheless is deemed 'really' to be a claim under a labor contract." Crosby v. Cooper B-Line, Inc., 725 F.3d 795, 797.

"[T]o determine whether a purported [*23] state-law claim 'really' arises under Section 301, a federal court must look beyond the face of plaintiff's allegations and the labels used to describe her claims and ... evaluate the substance of plaintiff's claims." Id. at 800 (internal quotation marks omitted). "[A] state-law claim is 'completely preempted' only when it is 'inextricably intertwined with consideration of the terms of [a] labor contract.'" Ibid. (quoting Allis-Chalmers Corp. v. Lueck, 471 U.S. 202, 213, 105 S. Ct. 1904, 85 L. Ed. 2d 206 (1985)). Put another way, § 301 preempts any state law claim whose resolution "requires the interpretation of a collective-bargaining agreement." Lingle v. Norge Div. of Magic Chef, Inc., 486 U.S. 399, 413, 108 S. Ct. 1877, 100 L. Ed. 2d 410 (1988) (footnote omitted); see also Crosby, 725 F.3d at 800 ("[O]nly those state-law claims that require 'interpretation' of a CBA are inevitably federal."); Kimbro v. Pepsico, Inc., 215 F.3d 723, 727 (7th Cir. 2000) (holding that § 301 preempted a tortious interference claim because the claim required the plaintiff to prove that his employer breached a collective bargaining agreement).

Section 301 preemption is not boundless. A state law claim is not preempted simply because it "require[s] reference to" a collective bargaining agreement. Bentz, 253 F.3d at 285. Thus, "the mere need to 'look to' the collective-bargaining agreement for damages computation is no reason to hold the state-law claim defeated by § 301." Livadas v. Bradshaw, 512 U.S. 107, 125, 114 S. Ct. 2068, 129 L. Ed. 2d 93 (1994). Moreover, even a state law claim that turns on the meaning of a collective bargaining [*24] agreement will escape preemption "when the particular contractual provision is so clear as to preclude all possible dispute over its meaning ... [or] if the parties do not dispute the interpretation of the relevant ... provisions." Wis. Cent., Ltd. v. Shannon, 539 F.3d 751, 758 (7th Cir. 2008) (internal quotation marks, brackets, and citations omitted) (discussing the Railway Labor Act, 45 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.); see also Hawaiian Airlines, Inc. v. Norris, 512 U.S. 246, 260, 114 S. Ct. 2239, 129 L. Ed. 2d 203 (1994) (describing the RLA preemption standard as "virtually identical to the pre-emption standard the Court employs in cases involving § 301 of the LMRA"). Thus, a state law claim is not completely preempted under circumstances where a defendant contending that the claim requires interpretation of a collective bargaining agreement advances a frivolous or insubstantial reading of the agreement; preemption applies only where the parties' respective interpretations of the agreement are arguable or plausible. See Baker v. Kingsley, 387 F.3d 649, 659 (7th Cir. 2004) ("Because defendants' interpretation is plausible, and demonstrates a genuine dispute between the parties that can affect liability, it is a sufficient basis for preemption.").

Balmes's IWPCA claims will not require interpretation of the collective bargaining agreements—as explained above, Balmes can rely entirely on the Code of Business Conduct and the Reporting Time [*25] Worked document to prove that Illinois Bell broke an employment agreement—so the claims are not preempted. That said, Balmes may not rely on the collective bargaining agreements to prove that Illinois Bell owed him "wages" under the IWPCA. Both collective bargaining agreements state that "[e]mployees shall be paid at the overtime rate of one and one-half ... times their basic hourly wage rate including applicable differentials for work performed ... in excess of forty (40) hours in a week." Doc. 28-1 at 3, 27. So, to the extent that the IWPCA claims rely on the collective bargaining agreements, the court would have to determine whether the work-related tasks that Balmes performed outside of normal hours count as "work" under the agreements. That question mirrors the question whether those tasks count as "work" under the FLSA and the IMWL, and it likely will be just as fiercely disputed. See Mitchell v. JCG Indus., Inc., 745 F.3d 837, 844 (7th Cir. 2014) (holding that time spent donning and doffing mandatory protective gear was not compensable work under the FLSA or the IMWL). Accordingly, if Balmes continues to try to root his IWPCA claims in the collective bargaining agreements, the claims will be preempted; but they will not be preempted if he relies solely [*26] on the Code of Business Conduct and the Reporting Time Worked document. Cf. Firestone v. S. Cal. Gas Co., 219 F.3d 1063, 1066-67 (9th Cir. 2000) (holding that a suit under California's overtime laws was completely preempted because it would have required the court to determine "whether the plaintiffs were receiving a 'premium wage rate' for overtime under the collective bargaining agreement," which would have exempted them from the state overtime law).

Conclusion

Illinois Bell's partial motion to dismiss is granted in part and denied in part. Balmes's non-Blakes claims under the FLSA and the IMWL—meaning claims pertaining to work that did not consist of guarding job sites or travelling between job sites during lunch—are dismissed with prejudice to the extent they are based on work performed before February 28, 2011. Balmes's Blakes claims under the IMWL were tolled only between January 17, 2011 and June 23, 2011—a period of 158 days—so they are dismissed to the extent they are based on work performed before September 23, 2010, which is three years and 158 days before the Tinoco suit was filed. Balmes's IWCPA claims are not dismissed, but he may not rely on the collective bargaining agreements to prove them.

ORDER DENYING TOSHIBA [*31] CORPORATION'S MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT ON WITHDRAWAL

Re: Dkt. No. 735

On June 30, 2015, defendant Toshiba Corporation ("Toshiba") moved for summary judgment, arguing plaintiffs' claims are time-barred because Toshiba withdrew from any conspiracy by no later than 2004. (Dkt. No. 735.) Having carefully considered the papers submitted, the record in this case, and the arguments of counsel, and good cause shown, the Court DENIES the motion.

I. BACKGROUND

This multidistrict litigation stems from allegations of a multi-year conspiracy, extending back to 2002, among Japanese and Korean corporations and their U.S. subsidiaries to fix the prices of lithium ion battery cells, the chemical core of rechargeable batteries found ubiquitously in consumer electronics products. Toshiba was purportedly a member of the conspiracy, and at the hearing appeared to stipulate to membership solely for purposes of resolving the instant motion. However, Toshiba asserts it withdrew from any conspiracy by the end of 2004 through the sale of its lithium ion cell manufacturing business.

Two groups of plaintiffs, denominated the direct purchaser plaintiffs ("DPPs") and indirect purchaser plaintiffs ("IPPs") (collectively, [*32] "plaintiffs"), seek to represent putative classes of persons, businesses, and, in the case of the IPPs, municipal and regional governments injured by the alleged overcharge. The DPPs sue for both injunctive relief and money damages under the federal antitrust laws, and seek to represent classes of purchasers who bought certain lithium ion batteries and products containing them for purposes of resale. (Dkt. No. 1038 at vii.) The IPPs, by contrast, sue for injunctive relief under federal antitrust law, but seek money damages under state antitrust and consumer protection laws. The IPPs seek to represent classes of purchasers who bought certain lithium ion battery products and replacement batteries for their own use. (Dkt. No. 1036 at 1.) The Court has previously detailed the allegations. (Dkt. No. 512.)[1] Thus, the Court now summarizes the facts relevant to resolution of the instant motion.

On July 15, 2003, Toshiba met with alleged co-conspirator LG Chem to discuss a sale of Toshiba's lithium ion battery business. (SMF, Issue 1, Fact 6.)[2] On July 22, 2003, LG Chem sent a letter to Toshiba expressing [*33] its "great interest in acquiring the whole battery business [of] Toshiba Corporation as you proposed." (Id., Issue 1, Fact 7.)

However, by December 2003, Toshiba instead reached an agreement with alleged coconspirator Sanyo for the sale of Toshiba's cylindrical and electrode battery cell manufacturing equipment located at A&T Battery. (Id., Issue 1, Fact 8.) On January 27, 2004, Toshiba's management approved the plan to transfer the equipment to Sanyo in [1] Subsequent consolidated complaints have been filed generally alleging the same conspiracy.

[2] "SMF" refers to the parties' chart of facts, including undisputed material facts, as reflected in Docket Number 957-1. Unless otherwise noted, the references to the material facts include the underlying evidence referenced by either party in support of the fact.

June 2004. (Id., Issue 1, Fact 10.) That same day, Toshiba notified the Tokyo Stock Exchange that it would "terminate its lithium-ion rechargeable battery business by December 2004" and "dissolve its subsidiary company A&T Battery Co., Ltd." (Id., Issue 1, Fact 11.) The announcement was widely reported around the world and Toshiba likewise informed various customers, suppliers, and government agencies. (Id., Issue 1, Facts 12-13.)

After announcing its plans to sell the business, [*34] Toshiba contacted alleged co-conspirators Sony and LG Chem to ascertain whether they could supply batteries to Toshiba's existing customers going forward. (Id., Issue 1, Fact 14.) Toshiba also entered into discussions with at least one alleged conspirator regarding the sale of Toshiba's remaining battery cell manufacturing equipment. (Id., Issue 1, Fact 15.) On July 1, 2004, Toshiba instead reached an agreement with Sojitz Machinery for the sale of that manufacturing equipment. (Id., Issue 1, Fact 16.)

On July 22, 2004, Toshiba executed the previously contemplated asset transfer agreement with Sanyo. (Id., Issue 1, Fact 17.) Toshiba discarded certain cell manufacturing equipment that Sanyo and Sojitz ultimately did not agree to purchase. (Id., Issue 1, Fact 18.)

After selling its battery business, Toshiba remained a member of the trade group Battery Association of Japan (SMF, Add'l Fact 56), although Toshiba apparently withdrew from the Small Size Secondary Batteries Committee in September 2004 (Dkt. No. 993, Declaration of J. Frank Hogue, Ex. H at 259:5-260:13).

Toshiba also stored lithium ion battery cells it had previously manufactured for future use. (SMF, Add'l Fact 42.) It subsequently [*35] packed the cells and sold the completed lithium ion battery packs to customers through at least 2007. (Id.) A Toshiba witness, Daiichiro Eguchi, testified at a September 1, 2015 deposition that those sales totaled approximately $900,000:

> Q. So is your—is your testimony that Toshiba earned $900,000 in the sale of lithium ion battery packs between 2004 and 2007?
> A. It wasn't an earning. It was the total value of sales.
> Q. And—and how—what is the source of your information?
> A. That is my recollection.

(Dkt. No. 957-2, Declaration of Jessica Moy ("Moy Decl."), Ex. 13, at 190:24-191:6; see also SMF, Add'l Facts 45, 55.)

Furthermore, in the sales to Sanyo and Sojitz, Toshiba did not transfer its patents relating to lithium ion batteries. (SMF, Add'l Facts 47-48.) Toshiba referred to these hundreds of patents as "important IP," stating in an internal document that it had "not completely withdrawn from the [battery] business" as of August 9, 2005. (Moy Decl., Ex. 89; SMF Add'l Facts 47-48.) The Court acknowledges that some of these patents may have been subject to cross-license agreements with certain purported conspirators. (SMF, Add'l Facts 50-51.) Toshiba also considered going after Samsung and [*36] LG for millions of dollars in royalties for their purported use of covered technologies in 2006 and potentially beyond. (Id., Add'l Facts 52-53.)

The first complaint in this multidistrict litigation naming Toshiba as a defendant was filed in December 2012. (Id., Issue 2, Fact 25.)

II. LEGAL STANDARD

A party seeking summary judgment bears the initial burden of informing the court of the basis for its motion, and of identifying those portions of the pleadings and discovery responses that demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). Material facts are those that might affect the outcome of the case. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). A dispute as to a material fact is "genuine" if there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to return a verdict for the nonmoving party. Id.

Where the moving party will have the burden of proof at trial, it "must affirmatively demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could find other than for the moving party." Soremekun v. Thrifty Payless, Inc., 509 F.3d 978, 984 (9th Cir. 2007). Here, Toshiba acknowledges (Dkt. No. 735 at 13) that it bears the initial burden. See also In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., 820 F. Supp. 2d 1055, 1060 (N.D. Cal. 2011) ("[W]ithdrawal is an affirmative defense on which defendants bear the burden of proof.").

If the moving party meets its initial burden, the opposing party must then set out specific [*37] facts showing a genuine issue for trial in order to defeat the motion. Anderson, 477 U.S. at 250; Soremekun, 509 F.3d at 984; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c), (e). The opposing party's evidence must be more than "merely colorable" and must be "significantly probative." Anderson, 477 U.S. at 249-50. Further, the opposing party may not rest upon mere allegations or denials of the adverse party's evidence, but instead must produce admissible evidence showing a genuine dispute of material fact exists. See Nissan Fire & Marine Ins. Co., Ltd. v. Fritz Cos., Inc., 210 F.3d 1099, 1102-03 (9th Cir. 2000). "Disputes over irrelevant or unnecessary facts will not preclude a grant of summary judgment." T.W. Elec. Serv., Inc. v. Pac. Elec. Contractors Ass'n, 809 F.2d 626, 630 (9th Cir. 1987).

Nevertheless, when deciding a summary judgment motion, a court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party and draw all justifiable inferences in its favor. Anderson, 477 U.S. at 255; Hunt v. City of Los Angeles, 638 F.3d 703, 709 (9th Cir. 2011). A district court may only base a ruling on a motion for summary judgment upon facts that would be admissible in evidence at trial. In re Oracle Corp. Sec. Litig., 627 F.3d 376, 385 (9th Cir. 2010); Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). It is not a court's task "to scour the record in search of a genuine issue of triable fact," but rather the Court is entitled to "rely on the nonmoving party to identify with reasonable particularity the evidence that precludes summary judgment." Keenan v. Allan, 91 F.3d 1275, 1279 (9th Cir. 1996) (quoting Richards v. Combined Ins. Co., 55 F.3d 247, 251 (7th Cir. 1995)); see also Carmen v. San Francisco Unified Sch. Dist., 237 F.3d 1026, 1031 (9th Cir. 2001) ("The district court need not examine the entire file for evidence establishing a genuine issue of fact, where [*38] the evidence is not set forth in the opposing papers with adequate references so that it could conveniently be found.").

III. DISCUSSION

Toshiba argues the claims against it should be dismissed with prejudice on statute of limitations grounds because it purportedly withdrew from the lithium ion battery industry—and therefore the alleged conspiracy—in 2004. Plaintiffs contend there are genuine disputes of material fact as to whether: (1) Toshiba effectively withdrew from the conspiracy in 2004; and, in the alternative, (2) Toshiba engaged in fraudulent concealment, such that the claims are timely even with a 2004 withdrawal. The parties also contest whether Toshiba can be liable, as a matter of law, for post-2004 conduct of alleged co-conspirators—an issue which turns on the threshold question of whether Toshiba in fact withdrew from the conspiracy. As the Court finds a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Toshiba withdrew from the conspiracy by the end of 2004, it need not reach the other issues at this time.

A. Legal Framework

"A defendant can establish withdrawal from a conspiracy in various ways." Virginia v. McKesson Corp., No. C 11-02782 SI, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46999, 2013 WL 1287423, at *3 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 28, 2013). Generally speaking, "[a]ffirmative acts inconsistent [*39] with the object of the conspiracy and communicated in a manner reasonably calculated to reach co-conspirators" are typically "sufficient to establish withdrawal or abandonment." See United States v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 464-65, 98 S. Ct. 2864, 57 L. Ed. 2d 854 (1978); see also United States v. Lothian, 976 F.2d 1257, 1261 (9th Cir. 1992) ("Withdrawal negates the element of agreement to the conspiracy's unlawful objective because it 'marks [the] conspirator's disavowal or abandonment of the conspiratorial agreement.'") (alteration in original).

The Eleventh Circuit has held that a defendant's exit from "an otherwise legitimate business enterprise" that is involved in a business conspiracy may constitute effective withdrawal from the conspiracy where the defendant "retired from the business, severed all ties to the business, and deprived the remaining conspirator group of the services which he provided to the conspiracy." Morton's Mkt., Inc. v. Gustafson's Dairy, Inc., 198 F.3d 823, 839

(11th Cir. 1999) amended in part, 211 F.3d 1224 (11th Cir. 2000); see also United States v. Nerlinger, 862 F.2d 967, 974 (2d Cir. 1988); United States v. Steele, 685 F.2d 793, 803 (3d Cir. 1982). "However, the sale of an operating business does not automatically establish the defense." *In re Cathode Ray Tube (CRT) Antitrust Litig., No. 07-5944 SC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 145617, 2010 WL 9543295, at 12 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 5, 2010) ("There must be factual inquiries—again, with the burden of proof on the defendants—into such subjects as the defendants' continued financial interest in the business that was sold, some continued [*40] participation, or some continued benefit from the alleged conspiracy.").

B. Analysis

On the present record, although plaintiffs' evidence is hardly robust, genuine disputes of material fact exist as to whether Toshiba continued to benefit from and participate in the purported conspiracy. For instance, Toshiba potentially remained a member of and participated in a battery trade association alongside alleged conspirators; held onto and selectively licensed "valuable IP" relating to lithium ion battery technology; and discarded certain manufacturing equipment that might have been sold to non-conspirators. Notably, Toshiba admittedly stored cells it had produced prior to selling the manufacturing business, aggregated those cells into battery packs, and sold the lithium ion battery packs through at least 2007—earning nearly $1 million in revenue. Toshiba argues sales of packs in Japan are "irrelevant to whether Toshiba participated in any conspiracy on the price of LiB Cells after 2004." (Dkt. No. 992 at 8.) At this juncture, however, the Court does not resolve the question of whether sales of packed cells, as a matter of law, have no impact on the market for the cells that comprise them. [*41]

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court DENIES the motion. The Court declines to render any further preliminary findings at this time, as such issues must be resolved on a more fulsome record at trial.

This Order terminates Docket Number 735.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

HN1[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

On summary judgment, the moving party bears the burden of demonstrating that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a). A "material" fact is one identified by the substantive law as affecting the outcome of the suit. A "genuine issue" exists with respect to any material fact when the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party. Where a factual record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for the non-moving party, there is no genuine issue for trial, and summary judgment should be granted.

HN2[] Summary Judgment, Entitlement as Matter of Law

In determining whether a genuine issue of material fact exists, the court must construe all facts in the light most favorable to the non-moving party and draw all reasonable and justifiable inferences in that party's favor. However, the non-moving party cannot simply rest on the allegations or denials contained in its pleadings, but must present sufficient evidence to show the existence of each element of its case on which it will bear the burden at trial.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, while § 2 prohibits the use of anticompetitive means to create or maintain a monopoly.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN4[] Tying Arrangements, Sherman Act Violations

In a typical tying arrangement, a seller agrees to sell a product over which the seller has a monopoly (the tying product) only if the buyer also purchases a separate product (the tied product) from the seller, or agrees not to purchase that product from a competing seller. The traditional antitrust concern with such an agreement is that if the seller of the tying product is a monopolist, the tie-in will force anyone who wants the monopolized product to buy the tied product from him as well, and the result will be a second monopoly. In the Seventh Circuit, to demonstrate that a tying arrangement is unlawful per se, a plaintiff must prove the following four elements: (1) two separate products have been tied together; (2) the tying seller has sufficient economic power in the market for the tying product to restrain free competition in the tied product market; (3) the tie affects a not-insubstantial amount of interstate commerce in the tied product; and (4) the tying seller has some economic interest in the sales of the tied product.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN5[] Tying Arrangements, Sherman Act Violations

The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. Thus, an unlawful tie depends on some sort of coercion by the seller to cause the buyer to accept a condition—either purchasing the tied product from the seller or refraining from purchasing that product from a competitor—on the sale of the tying product. Strong persuasion, encouragement, or cajolery to the point of obnoxiousness to induce a buyer to accept a package deal do not suffice. Rather, the seller must somehow convey to the buyer that the buyer must accept the condition in order to receive the tying product.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN6[] Tying Arrangements, Sherman Act Violations

Actual coercion supporting a finding of a tying violation is present only if the manufacturer goes beyond persuasion and conditions its retailer's purchase of one product on the purchase of another product.

HN7[] Tying Arrangements, Sherman Act Violations

If a defendant threatens to withhold the tying product unless a buyer accepts the condition, and the defendant has the market power to make that threat meaningful, then the buyer is coerced to accept the condition.

HN8[] Tying Arrangements, Sherman Act Violations

The U.S. Supreme Court has never stated that proof of harm to competition is required. Likewise, the Seventh Circuit has on multiple occasions articulated the elements of a per se tying claim, and it has not included harm to competition among them.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN9[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

Under a per se rule analysis, a plaintiff is not required to prove any anti-competitive consequences of a defendant's activity.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

Some circuits have required plaintiffs to prove harm to competition as an element of a per se tying claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN11[] Tying Arrangements, Sherman Act Violations

The existence of harm to competition is encompassed in the element of whether the tie affects a not-insubstantial amount of commerce in the tied product. The Seventh Circuit has further stated that this element can be broken into two sub-questions: (1) Is there at least one competitor in the tied product market other than the defendant; and (2) Is the quantity of interstate commerce affected not-insubstantial?

HN12[] Sherman Act, Defenses

A civil antitrust action is barred by the statute of limitations unless it is commenced within four years after the cause of action accrued. 15 U.S.C.S. § 15b. Generally, a cause of action accrues and the statute begins to run when a defendant commits an act that injures a plaintiff's business.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > Time Limitations

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Defenses

HN13[] Sherman Act, Defenses

Antitrust law provides that, in the case of a continuing violation, say, a price-fixing conspiracy that brings about a series of unlawfully high priced sales over a period of years, each overt act that is part of the violation and that injures the plaintiff, e.g., each sale to the plaintiff, 'starts the statutory period running again, regardless of the plaintiff's knowledge of the alleged illegality at much earlier times. An overt act that restarts the statute of limitations is characterized by two elements: (1) it must be a new and independent act that is not merely a reaffirmation of a previous act; and (2) it must inflict new and accumulating injury on the plaintiff.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > Time Limitations

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Defenses

HN14[] Sherman Act, Defenses

A plaintiff may only recover damages that accrued within the limitations period, not damages that were caused by the same course of conduct but that predated the limitations period.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > Time Limitations

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Defenses

HN15[] Sherman Act, Defenses

To start a new limitations period, an overt act must be a new and independent act that is not merely a reaffirmation of a previous act. As some circuits have articulated this rule, overt acts must be more than the "abatable but unabated inertial consequences of some pre-limitations action" in order to trigger a new limitations period. Thus, where a party makes an irrevocable, immutable, permanent and final decision prior to the limitations period, subsequent acts within the limitations period that simply reflect that prior decision will not restart the clock. Conversely, when a party decides to embark on an unlawful course of conduct prior to the limitations period, but that initial decision requires further action to implement, or a party's actions within the limitations period manifest a commitment to renewing and enforcing a prior decision or agreement, those subsequent actions will restart the limitations period. In the context of a tying arrangement, this typically means that a plaintiff must show that the defendant had the ability to and actually did enforce the tie' during the limitations period.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Defenses

HN16[] Sherman Act, Defenses

For overt acts to restart the limitations period, they must inflict new and accumulating injury on the plaintiff. As a matter of antitrust law, when a purchaser is "forced" to buy a product he would not have otherwise bought even from another seller in the tied product market, there can be no adverse impact on competition because no portion of the market which would otherwise have been available to other sellers has been foreclosed.

Torts > Remedies > Damages > Collateral Source Rule

HN17[] Damages, Collateral Source Rule

Typically, the collateral source doctrine applies where a plaintiff receives insurance payments or some other benefits that are triggered by or compensate the plaintiff for the injury in question. In those circumstances, the collateral benefits received by the plaintiff cannot be used to reduce the damages owed by the defendant.

OPINION AND ORDER

This is an antitrust case in which the developer of an upscale shopping center asserts that the defendant, the largest public real estate company in the country, engaged in anticompetitive tactics to coerce retailers to stay out of the new development and [*2] instead sign leases at its nearby mall. The plaintiff, Gumwood HP Shopping Partners, L.P., was developing an outdoor shopping center in Mishawaka, Indiana, named Heritage Square, where it hoped to attract high-end retailers such as Ann Taylor Loft, Coldwater Creek, and Chico's. The defendant, Simon Property Group, Inc., owned an established mall less than a mile away, known as University Park Mall. Around the same time that Gumwood was developing Heritage Square, Simon was redeveloping a portion of University Park to add an outdoor component that also hoped to attract some of the same high-end retailers. According to Gumwood, Simon threatened certain retailers, in particular Ann Taylor, that if they opened stores at Heritage Square instead of University Park, Simon would terminate their leases in some of Simon's best properties elsewhere in the country.

Though Ann Taylor initially signed a lease at Heritage Square, it never opened a store there, and it eventually signed a lease and opened a Loft store at University Park instead.

In this action, Gumwood asserts that Simon's conduct constituted an unlawful tying arrangement, so it has asserted claims under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Discovery [*3] is now closed, and the parties have filed cross-motions for summary judgment. Simon has also filed two motions to strike and a motion for oral argument. For the following reasons, the motions for summary judgment and the other ancillary motions are each denied.

I. FACTUAL BACKGROUND[1]

Simon is a real estate entity that owns hundreds of retail properties around the country and around the world. Simon owns various types of shopping centers, including regional and super-regional malls, lifestyle centers, and outlet malls. Regional and super-regional malls are typically large, indoor shopping centers that are anchored by one or more department stores. Lifestyle centers are smaller, outdoor shopping centers that typically include national retail chains mixed with restaurants and possibly entertainment outlets like a movie theater. Outlet centers [*4] typically house national retailers selling reduced-price versions of their products. While malls and lifestyle centers typically draw customers from five to fifteen miles away, outlet centers may draw customers from up to seventy-five miles away.

Among Simon's properties are Dadeland Mall, located in Miami, Florida, and Lenox Square, in Atlanta, Georgia, both of which are super-regional malls. Simon also owns an outlet center known as Woodbury Common Premium Outlets in New York, which is regarded as one of the premier outlet malls in the country. Simon also owns University Park, a super-regional mall in Mishawaka, Indiana. University Park opened in 1979, and has nearly one million square feet of leasable space. Though it is located near a dense shopping area with strip malls, standalone stores, and plazas with big-box retailers, University Park is the only mall in the area. In 2006, the Marshall Field's department store, which was one of University Park's anchors, closed its store. Rather than replace the store with another department store, Simon demolished the building and constructed an outdoor "streetscape" with outward facing retail stores. In essence, this addition was a lifestyle [*5] center appended to the existing mall.

Beginning around 2005, Gumwood began developing Heritage Square, a lifestyle center located less than a mile from University Park. Heritage Square was anchored by a grocery store, and it also included retail space that it hoped to fill with national retailers like Ann Taylor, Coldwater Creek, Chico's, Lane Bryant, Talbot's, and Barnes and Noble. In April 2006, after negotiations with Gumwood's leasing agent, Ann Taylor internally approved a proposed deal to open one of its Loft stores at Heritage Square. After further negotiations, Ann Taylor executed a ten-year lease for Heritage Square on June 14, 2006, and Gumwood executed the lease shortly thereafter. As is common in the industry, the lease included certain contingencies based on other retailers having signed leases at the shopping center. In particular, the lease stated that Ann Taylor would not be required to open its store at Heritage Square unless certain other retailers had also signed leases, including Coldwater Creek, Brooks Brothers, Ruth's Chris Steak House, and Martin's Super Market. If those requirements were not met but Ann Taylor chose to open its store anyway, it would be entitled [*6] to pay rent at a reduced rate.

Immediately after the lease was executed, Ann Taylor requested to rescind the lease, indicating that it was concerned about the co-tenancy provision. Gumwood refused to rescind the lease, but the parties agreed to an amendment that altered the co-tenancy provision. Under the amendment, Ann Taylor would not be required to open the Loft store at Heritage Square or to pay rent until each of Coldwater Creek, Brooks Brothers 346 (a new concept store being tested by Brooks Brothers), White House/Black Market, and Martin's Super Market had also opened. The parties executed that amendment in mid-August 2006.

[1] Simon has filed two motions to strike certain exhibits and factual assertions. [DE 156, 159]. Having reviewed each of the respective filings, the Court has determined that none of the exhibits or facts that are subject to the motions are necessary to the resolution of the motions for summary judgment. Accordingly, both motions to strike are denied as moot.

Around this same time, Simon learned that Ann Taylor signed a lease at Heritage Square. That came as a surprise to Simon, which believed that Ann Taylor had already orally committed to coming to University Park, and which viewed the Loft store as important to the success of the new lifestyle center component of University Park. Gumwood alleges that, in response, Simon began to impose a tying arrangement by which it threatened to cancel Ann Taylor's leases at Dadeland, Lenox, and Woodbury (where it had very successful stores whose leases were about to expire) [*7] if Ann Taylor opened its store at Heritage Square or did not come to University Park. An internal Simon document that recaps a meeting with Ann Taylor's representatives on August 15, 2006, outlines the following strategy for Simon's business with Ann Taylor: "Create leverage with renewals on more mature accounts . . . . We need a positive decision on University Park before we will move forward with any key renewals. Woodbury and Lenox would be prime centers to kill if the negotiations go south." [DE 129-8].

In an internal email describing that meeting, one of Simon's negotiators wrote:

> [T]hey [Ann Taylor] do have an executed lease, with [H]eritage, however, the developer has yet to satisfy the co tenancy. . . . We are putting the full court pressure on all others who are interested in the market[.] I was very clear that their decision can and will jeopardize our willingness to proceed on new deals and renewals.

[DE 129-33]. The following month, that same individual wrote in another internal email:

> I will still help where needed but in essence DS [David Simon, Simon's CEO] is trying to meet with Kay Krill [Ann Taylor's CEO]. I don't believe John [Scotti, Ann Taylor's negotiator] has told Kay the severity [*8] of the situation. If they go ahead with Heritage we're going to cancel Woodbury and Dadeland. Lose a pinky - take an arm!

[DE 129-34 (punctuation and capitalization modified for clarity)]. In addition, Simon decided at that time to begin negotiating its leases with Ann Taylor on a portfolio basis. Thus, it negotiated the fifty-plus new leases or lease renewals that were pending as a single package, with the understanding that none of the leases would be final until the entire package had been agreed on. Accordingly, it held certain lease agreements that had already been negotiated until the entire portfolio negotiations were complete.

Meanwhile, while its discussions with Simon were ongoing, Ann Taylor took possession of the premises at Heritage Square in August 2006 and began construction of the store with the goal of opening in time for the Christmas shopping season. By taking possession of the premises, Ann Taylor lost its right to terminate the lease after the first year if Heritage Square had not yet satisfied the co-tenancy provisions. However, after about two weeks of construction, during which it incurred over $100,000 in construction costs, Ann Taylor abruptly halted construction. [*9] Ann Taylor had no ability to terminate the lease, and it gave no definitive indication to Gumwood as to its future intent, but the premises began to sit idle, with no efforts being made towards the store's opening. In addition, in December 2006, Brooks Brothers decided that it was going to discontinue its "346" concept stores, so it gave notice to Gumwood that it was not going to open at Heritage Square. Because the "346" store was a required co-tenant under Ann Taylor's lease, that meant that Gumwood would never be able to satisfy the co-tenancy provision and that Ann Taylor would never be required to open its store at Heritage Square. It could still choose to do so, though, and pay rent at a reduced rate.

Then, in April 2007, Ann Taylor initiated discussions with Gumwood to negotiate a second amendment to its lease at Heritage Square. It indicated that it wished to immediately resume construction and open the store at Heritage Square. The lease amendment would have eliminated Brooks Brothers 346 as a required cotenant, and would have called for Ann Taylor to resume construction and open its store. The amendment would have also provided an additional construction allowance for Ann Taylor. However, [*10] on April 20, 2007, after negotiating and drafting the terms of the amendment, Ann Taylor decided not to sign it, and progress again stalled. Subsequently, in July 2007, Ann Taylor considered the possibility of opening an Ann Taylor Factory store at Heritage Square instead of a Loft store, but it decided not to open a Factory store in Mishawaka at all. After that point, Ann Taylor did not take any further concrete steps towards opening a Loft store at Heritage Square. It was still unable to terminate the existing lease, though, and it stayed in periodic contact with Gumwood as to the possibility of opening the store at Heritage Square.

Simon's portfolio negotiations with Ann Taylor also continued for a considerable length of time, and a lease for Ann Taylor Loft at University Park was among the leases included in those negotiations. Simon in particular sought to include it in the deal, though Ann Taylor generally expressed indifference to opening at University Park, and indicated that it might not open a store in Mishawaka at all. By the end of 2007, the portfolio negotiations were approaching their conclusion, though the parties had not executed any leases yet. In January 2008, though, [*11] in response to the economic recession, Ann Taylor announced that it would be closing over 100 stores and that it was cutting back on opening new stores. This threw its pending negotiations with Simon into turmoil, as the closures included a number of Simon properties and stores that had been subject to their portfolio negotiations. On February 11, 2008, Simon's CEO sent a letter to Ann Taylor's CEO, stating in part, "[N]ot going forward with committed deals puts us in an untenable situation. You can't expect us to renew leases at Woodbury Commons, Dadeland Mall and Burlington Mall (just to name a few) while you are closing stores and reneging on recent commitments to us." [DE 129-49]. The CEOs spoke the following week and arrived at a deal by which Ann Taylor agreed to open a store at University Park and delay its closures of certain other stores. In return, Simon agreed to execute lease renewals at other of its properties that were important to Ann Taylor. The parties then began executing the leases in batches, and Ann Taylor's lease for University Park was fully executed on July 11, 2008. Ann Taylor thereafter opened a Loft store at University Park in March 2009.

Despite losing Ann Taylor [*12] as a tenant, Heritage Square still had some success in attracting high-end retailers. Coldwater Creek, White House/Black Market, and Aveda each signed leases with and opened at Heritage Square. Eddie Bauer also closed its store at University Park and relocated to Heritage Square. However, Gumwood asserts that Ann Taylor's absence at Heritage Square not only cost it the rent it would have received from Ann Taylor, but also triggered a snowball effect that caused it to lose other retailers and to receive less rental income from its existing tenants. When its revenues eventually became insufficient to cover its interest expenses and it was unable to restructure its debt, Gumwood defaulted on its loan. The loan, which then had a balance of about $33 million, was sold in November 2010 for $12.5 million. In January 2011, Gumwood transferred ownership of Heritage Square to its lender through a deed in lieu of foreclosure, at which time it was relieved of any further obligation to repay the loan. Gumwood then initiated this action by filing its complaint on June 29, 2011.

III. DISCUSSION

Gumwood asserts antitrust claims against Simon under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2. HN3[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, [*14] while Section 2 prohibits the use of anticompetitive means to create or maintain a monopoly. Both of Gumwood's claims rely on the same theory, which is that Simon engaged in anticompetitive conduct through an unlawful tying arrangement. Specifically, Gumwood alleges that Simon threatened retailers that if they opened stores at Gumwood's Heritage Square or did not open at Simon's University Park Mall, Simon would refuse to renew those retailers' leases in other of its properties.

Both parties have moved for summary judgment. Simon asks that Gumwood's claims be dismissed in their entirety, arguing that Gumwood is unable to establish certain elements of its claims, and also that the claims are barred by the statute of limitations. Gumwood seeks summary judgment in its favor on the merits of its claims, leaving only the measure of damages to be determined. It also seeks a ruling that the collateral source doctrine prevents its damages from being reduced by other sources that have offset its losses. The Court first considers whether summary judgment is warranted in either party's favor on the merits of the claims. The Court then turns to the statute of limitations and collateral source issues.

A. [*15] Merits of the Antitrust Claims

As noted, both of Gumwood's claims arise out of a tying arrangement allegedly imposed by Simon. HN4[] In a typical tying arrangement, a seller agrees to sell a product over which the seller has a monopoly (the tying product) only if the buyer also purchases a separate product (the tied product) from the seller, or agrees not to purchase that product from a competing seller. N. Pac. Ry. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5-6, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958); Carl Sandburg Vill. Condo Ass'n No. 1 v. First Condo. Dev. Co., 758 F.2d 203, 207 (7th Cir. 1985). "The traditional antitrust concern with such an agreement is that if the seller of the tying product is a monopolist, the tie-in will force anyone who wants the monopolized product to buy the tied product from him as well, and the result will be a second monopoly." Sheridan v. Marathon Petroleum Co. LLC, 530 F.3d 590, 592 (7th Cir. 2008); see also *It's My Party, Inc. v. Live Nation, Inc., 811 F.3d 676, 2016 WL 426085, at 5 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Tying suppresses competition in two ways: First, the buyer is prevented from seeking alternative sources of supply for the tied product; second, competing suppliers of the tied product are foreclosed from that part of the market which is subject to the tying arrangement." (internal quotation omitted)). In the Seventh Circuit, to demonstrate that a tying arrangement is unlawful per se, a plaintiff must prove the following four elements: (1) two separate products have been tied together; (2) the tying seller has [*16] sufficient economic power in the market for the tying product to restrain free competition in the tied product market; (3) the tie affects a not-insubstantial amount of interstate commerce in the tied product; and (4) the tying seller has some economic interest in the sales of the tied product. Reifert v. S. Cent. Wisc. MLS Corp., 450 F.3d 312, 317 (7th Cir. 2006) (citing Carl Sandburg, 758 F.2d at 207).

In its motion for summary judgment, Simon focuses on the first element, arguing that there is insufficient evidence to show that it actually imposed a tie between any properties. It also argues that an additional element should be required—harm to competition—and that Gumwood is unable to satisfy that element. The Court considers those issues in turn. Meanwhile, as a plaintiff seeking summary judgment in its favor, Gumwood's motion must address every element of its claims, and it must establish that the evidence indisputably proves every one of those elements. The Court thus need not dwell on Gumwood's motion, as the record reflects deep factual disputes on multiple issues, including in particular the definition of the relevant markets, whether Simon has market power in those markets, and whether Simon actually imposed a tie. Because the dispute over the existence of a tie, which [*17] is central to Simon's motion, is sufficient to deny Gumwood's motion for summary judgment, the Court does not reach the remaining issues raised in Gumwood's motion.

1. The Existence of an Unlawful Tying Arrangement

Both parties argue that the record indisputably supports their positions as to whether Simon tied two products (or in this case, properties) together. The existence of a tie requires more than just a package deal or a request to purchase two products together. As the Supreme Court has stated,HN5[] "the essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer . . . might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms."

Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 12. Thus, an unlawful tie depends on some sort of coercion by the seller to cause the buyer to accept a condition—either purchasing the tied product from the seller or refraining from purchasing that product from a competitor—on the sale of the tying product. "[S]trong persuasion, encouragement, or cajolery to the point of obnoxiousness" to induce a buyer to accept a package deal do not suffice. Bob Maxfield, Inc. v. Am. Motors Corp., 637 F.2d 1033, 1037 (5th Cir. 1981); Unijax, Inc. v. Champion Int'l, Inc., 683 F.2d 678, 685-86 (2d Cir. 1982) (holding that "aggressive salesmanship" [*18] is insufficient to establish a tie). Rather, the seller must somehow convey to the buyer that the buyer must accept the condition in order to receive the tying product. Paladin Assocs., Inc. v. Mont. Power Co., 328 F.3d 1145, 1159 (9th Cir. 2003) ("A plaintiff must present evidence that the defendant went beyond persuasion and coerced or forced its customer to buy the tied product in order to obtain the tying product."); Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 1752b (3d ed. 2011) ("There is no tie for any antitrust purpose unless the defendant improperly imposes conditions that explicitly or practically require buyers to take the second product if they want the first one.").

Simon argues that to meet this element, a plaintiff must establish two distinct requirements: first, that the defendant imposed a condition by refusing or threatening to refuse to sell the tying product without the tied product; and second, that the defendant coerced the buyer into accepting that condition. However, the Court agrees with Gumwood that those requirements are not completely distinct. Instead, a threat to refuse to sell the tying product unless the buyer purchases the tied product is one method of effecting the coercion that this element requires.[2] Collins, 781 F.3d at 272 (defining "coercion" as "requiring [*19] the customer to buy product B when buying product A"); Unijax, 683 F.2d at 685 HN6[] ("Actual coercion supporting a finding of a tying violation is present only if the manufacturer goes beyond persuasion and conditions its retailer's purchase of one product on the purchase of another product."); Bob Maxfield, 637 F.2d at 1037 (finding that coercion had not been proven in the absence of evidence that the defendant required the buyer to take the tied product in order to receive the tying product); Areeda ¶ 1752e ("[G]eneral threats inducing purchase of [a tied product] do not prove tying unless the threats took the form of refusing to sell the tying product to those who would not take the defendant's tied product.").

In other words, HN7[] if a defendant threatens to withhold the tying product unless a buyer accepts the condition, and the defendant has the market power to make that threat meaningful, then the buyer is coerced to accept the condition. Datagate, Inc. v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 60 F.3d 1421, 1423 (9th Cir. 1995) ("To accomplish [a tying arrangement], the competitor agrees to sell the tying product . . . only on the condition that its customers also purchase the tied product . . . . The competitor thus uses its market power in the tying product to coerce the customer into purchasing the tied product."). Thus, the pertinent question is whether the evidence shows that Simon refused or threatened to refuse to renew leases in the tying markets unless Ann Taylor signed a lease at University Park or agreed to stay out of Heritage Square. If so, then Simon's market power in the tying markets—the second element of a per se tying claim, [*21] which Simon has not challenged for the purposes of its motion—supplies the requisite force to coerce Ann Taylor to acquiesce to that threat.

The Court finds that there is a genuine dispute of fact on that question. To begin with, Simon's negotiators denied adopting such a strategy or making such a threat to Ann Taylor, and Ann Taylor's negotiators denied that they received or were influenced by any such a threat, so summary judgment cannot be granted in Gumwood's favor on this issue. To create a factual dispute against that evidence, Gumwood relies primarily on a number of internal Simon documents and communications that reference plans to impose a tie and suggest that threats consistent with those plans had in fact been communicated to Ann Taylor. First, a document entitled "Ann Taylor Meeting Eastman Kodak Co., 781 F.3d 264, 270-73 (6th Cir. 2015)*, or adopting policies or designing a product such that the tied product is the only viable economic option to use in concert with the tying product, e.g., *Smith v. eBay Corp., No. C 10-03825, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1211, 2012 WL 27718, at *6 (N.D. Cal. The buyer must somehow be forced, or coerced, [*20] into accepting the tied product. This coercion could result from (1) an absolute refusal to sell the tying product without the tied product; (2) a discount, rebate or other financial incentive given to buyers who also take the tied product; (3) technological design that makes it impossible to sell the tying product without the tied product.").

Summary" dated August 15, 2006, outlines the following strategy: "Create leverage with renewals on more mature accounts . . . . We need a positive decision on University Park before we will move forward with any key renewals. Woodbury and Lenox would be prime centers to kill if the negotiations go south." [DE 129-8]. A similar document dated the following month contains the same language. [DE [*22] 128-25].

Other communications in that timeframe tend to corroborate Simon's adoption of that strategy and imply that such threats had been communicated to Ann Taylor. In internal emails in August and September 2006, one of Simon's negotiators wrote the following:

- "[T]hey [Ann Taylor] do have an executed lease, with [H]eritage, however, the developer has yet to satisfy the co tenancy. (expires in Dec of this year). We are putting the full court pressure on all others who are interested in the market[.] I was very clear that their decision can and will jeopardize our willingness to proceed on new deals and renewals." [DE 129-33 (emphasis added)].
- "Scotti [Ann Taylor's lead negotiator] may be gone by year end. I do not know what he has or has not communicated to her [Kay Krill, Ann Taylor's CEO] about losing high producing stores (Lenox, Stanford, Woodbury ...) [i]f Mishawaka is not resolved to our satisfaction." [DE 129-32].

- "On the Ann Taylor front. Scotti has his ass in hot water and knows it. We have been very aggressive with him on cleaning up some existing problems prior to us addressing any key renewals so please hold off on woodbury. If he does not rectify his actions we are considering canceling[] [*23] 2 deals so his actions are not repeated." [DE 129-35]
- "I will still help where needed but in essence DS [David Simon] is trying to meet with Kay Krill. I don't believe John [Scotti] has told Kay the severity of the situation. If they go ahead with Heritage we're going to cancel Woodbury and Dadeland. Lose a pinky - take an arm!" [DE 129-34 (punctuation and capitalization modified for clarity)].

While these emails may fall short of a smoking gun, they at least permit an inference that Simon threatened to withhold leases in other properties if Ann Taylor proceeded with its store at Heritage Square or did not sign a lease at University Park. Notably, the first email notes that Simon "was very clear that [Ann Taylor's] decision can and will jeopardize [Simon's] willingness to proceed on new deals and renewals." [DE 129-33 (emphasis added)]. A subsequent email notes, "If they go ahead with Heritage we're going to cancel Woodbury and Dadeland." [DE 129-34]. The emails also imply that these threats had been communicated at least to Mr. Scotti, Ann Taylor's lead negotiator at the time, as they only express uncertainty as to how far he had communicated them within Ann Taylor. There is also [*24] evidence that these threats affected Ann Taylor's actions. Within days of these communications, Ann Taylor abruptly stopped construction of its store at Heritage Square, where it had a long-term lease, had already spent over one hundred thousand dollars in construction costs, and had previously planned to open by Christmas. See Datagate, 60 F.3d at 1426 (finding sufficient evidence of coercion where there was evidence that the defendant threatened to cease providing the tying product if the buyer purchased the tied product from a third party, and there was evidence that this threat impacted the buyer's decision).

In arguing that these statements do not constitute threats for these purposes, Simon cites to Davis v. Marathon Oil, 528 F.2d 395 (6th Cir. 1975). There, the defendant allegedly told the plaintiff, a gas station operator, that if he did not buy more of the tied product, "his lease might be cancelled." Id. at 401. The court found that this did not suffice to establish coercion because this statement was consistent with the defendant merely expressing its displeasure with the plaintiff's performance as a distributor, and because "no express threats to cancel the lease were made." Id. at 401-02. But stating that Ann Taylor's decision can "and will" jeopardize the other leases, [*25] and that "[i]f they go ahead with Heritage we're going to cancel Woodbury and Dadeland," goes beyond the vague and tentative statement at issue in Davis. [DE 129-33, -34]. The statements also suggest that Simon intended for Ann Taylor to come away with the understanding that there would be consequences with its other leases if it stayed at Heritage Square. [DE 129-35 ("Scotti has his ass in hot water and knows it. We have been very aggressive with him on cleaning up some existing problems prior to us addressing any key renewals . . . .")]. Though there is room for a contrary interpretation, and a jury could find that those statements were never communicated to Ann Taylor in the first place, the Court finds that this evidence is sufficient to create a dispute of fact over whether Simon threatened to withhold the tying properties unless Ann Taylor agreed to its conditions in the tied market.

Simon also argues that the fact that Ann Taylor's representatives deny having been coerced is itself sufficient to grant summary judgment. The Court cannot agree. In support of this argument, Simon cites to It's My Party, 811 F.3d 676, 2016 WL 426085, and Paladin, 328 F.3d 1145. In both cases, the courts affirmed summary judgment on tying claims based on an absence [*26] of coercion, and noted during their discussions that even the alleged targets of the coercion denied being coerced. *It's My Party, 811 F.3d 676, 2016 WL 426085, at 6; Paladin, 328 F.3d at 1161. However, neither court suggested that an admission of coercion is required, or that a denial of coercion is sufficient to negate a dispute of fact. Rather, the plaintiffs in both cases failed to provide evidence of any threats having been communicated, and the courts referenced the denials of coercion as an illustration of the absence of a dispute of fact. Here, there is evidence that threats were communicated and that they impacted Ann Taylor's decisions, so the fact that Ann Taylor's representatives (whose credibility Gumwood also contests) deny the coercion only creates (or deepens) a dispute of fact. Accordingly, the Court finds that there is a genuine dispute as to the existence of a tie.

2. Harm to Competition

Simon next argues that Gumwood's claim fails because it has failed to present evidence of any harm to competition, such as evidence that Simon is charging above-market prices as a result of the tying. However, it is debatable whether harm to competition is a distinct element of a per se tying claim.HN8[] The Supreme Court has never stated that proof of harm to [*27] competition is required. Likewise, the Seventh Circuit has on multiple occasions articulated the elements of a per se tying claim, and it has not included harm to competition among them. Reifert, 450 F.3d at 316; Carl Sandburg, 758 F.2d at 207. And in Carl Sandburg, the Seventh Circuit contrasted the per se framework against the rule of reason approach by noting that the latter "requires an inquiry into the actual effects of the agreement on competition." 758 F.2d at 210 n.5; see also Datagate, 60 F.3d at 1425 ("The foundational principle of per se antitrust liability is that some acts are considered so inherently anticompetitive that no examination of their impact on the market as a whole is required."); Herbert Hovenkamp, Federal Antitrust Policy: The Law of Competition and Its Practice § 10.1 p. 535 (5th ed. 2016) ("If a tying arrangement is really a per se violation of the antitrust laws, as the Supreme Court has often stated, then a separate analysis of anticompetitive effects is peculiar. The whole point of per se analysis is to avoid expensive individualized inquiries concerning competitive effects of particular arrangements."). Further, at least one district court in this circuit has stated thatHN9[] "[u]nder a per se rule analysis, a plaintiff is not required to prove any anti-competitive [*28] consequences of a defendant's activity . . . ." KFC Corp. v. Marion-Kay Co., Inc., 620 F. Supp. 1160, 1169 (S.D. Ind. 1985).

As Simon notes in its reply brief,HN10[] some circuits have required plaintiffs to prove harm to competition as an element of a per se tying claim. The Second Circuit first included that requirement in Yentsch v. Texaco, Inc., 630 F.2d 46, 57 (2d Cir. 1980). However, the court's analysis of that element looked to whether there was any proof of "foreclosure of competition in the tied product market," meaning whether the tying affected any buyers' decisions as to whether to buy the tied products from a competitor instead of the defendant. Id. at 57-58 ("As to anticompetitive effects in the tied product markets, the question is whether . . . competitors were foreclosed from selling to [buyers] because of [the defendant's] policies."). The Seventh Circuit essentially incorporates that factor into the third element of its test—whether a not-insubstantial amount of commerce is affected. As the Seventh Circuit stated in Reifert, "The third element of the [per se tying] test states that a tying arrangement violates antitrust law only if 'a substantial volume of commerce is foreclosed' because of the tie." 450 F.3d at 317 (quoting Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2)).

Fox Motors, Inc. v. Mazda Distribs. (Gulf), Inc., which Simon also cites on this point, likewise [*29] focused on whether the practice in question ever caused buyers not to purchase the tied products from competitors. 806 F.2d 953, 958 (10th Cir. 1986) ("The record contains no indication that the alleged tying arrangement . . . influenced the level of dealer purchases from different manufacturers."); see also Driskill v. Dallas Cowboys Football Club, Inc., 498 F.2d 321, 323 (5th Cir. 1974) (also cited by Simon, and holding that the effect-on-competition element was not met where there were no other competitors in the tied market). Thus, even in circuits that include harm to competition as an element of a per se tying claim, the substance of the analysis is still largely on par with the Seventh Circuit's analysis, and looks more generally to whether buyers might have purchased the tied products from a competitor absent the tying, not to whether there is evidence of actual economic effects such as above-market prices in the tied markets, as Simon suggests is required here. See Ohio-Sealy Mattress Mfg. Co. v. Sealy, Inc., 585 F.2d 821, 835 (7th Cir. 1978) (stating that in a per se tying analysis, "we are not free to inquire whether such tying in any given case injures market competition," but that there must be at least some "potential to foreclose access to the tied product market").

Therefore, the Court proceeds under the analysis set forth by the Seventh Circuit for a per [*30] se tying claim. In that framework, HN11[] the existence of harm to competition is encompassed in the element of whether the tie affects a not-insubstantial amount of commerce in the tied product. Reifert, 450 F.3d at 317. The Seventh Circuit has further stated that "[t]his element can be broken into two sub-questions: (1) Is there at least one competitor in the tied product market other than the [defendant]; and (2) Is the quantity of interstate commerce affected not-insubstantial?" Id. at 318. As to the first sub-question, Heritage Square could qualify as a competitor to University Park in the tied market of Mishawaka. And as to the second sub-question, Simon concedes that there is at least a dispute of fact as to whether a not-insubstantial amount of commerce has been affected. [DE 148 p. 19 ("There is a genuine dispute about whether a substantial volume of commerce was foreclosed.")]. Accordingly, Gumwood has satisfied its burden on this element at this stage.

Finally, Simon argues that the Court should not extend the per se tying analysis to the context of portfolio negotiations, where parties negotiate large numbers of leases as a package. The tying theory there would apparently be that if the parties agree that nothing is [*31] final until everything is final, then every item in the negotiation is conditioned on every other item. Simon argues that there are pro-competitive justifications for engaging in portfolio negotiations, and that this arrangement is dissimilar from other arrangements that have been subjected to per se illegality, so the per se analysis should not apply. However, this argument appears to have been raised in anticipation of an argument that Gumwood never actually made. Gumwood does not argue that the portfolio negotiation itself constitutes a tying arrangement (though Dr. Frech, Gumwood's expert, did at his deposition), and the Court agrees that it does not. Portfolio negotiations may facilitate a tying arrangement, but negotiating a package deal does not create a tie until a party conveys that the tied product must be a part of the package or they will withhold the tying product. Thus, as discussed above, Gumwood must show that Simon threatened to refuse to lease other properties depending on Ann Taylor's decision on University Park and Heritage Square, not simply that the parties negotiated multiple properties together or that Ann Taylor's decision on one might have affected the terms [*32] of others.

To the extent that Simon argues that the per se analysis should not apply even where such a threat is present, though, the Court disagrees. That type of coercion is within the heartland of cases that examine tying claims under the per se analysis. E.g., It's My Party, 811 F.3d 676, 2016 WL 426085; Paladin, 328 F.3d 1145; Datagate, 60 F.3d 1421; Unijax, 683 F.2d 687; Bob Maxfield, 637 F.2d 1033. Moreover, though the Court agrees that portfolio negotiations in general are likely to have many desirable effects, Simon has not articulated any competitive justification for threatening a customer to prevent them from doing business with a competitor, and the Court sees no reason why the per se analysis should not apply in that context. Sheridan, 530 F.3d at 593 ("The Court has not discarded the tying rule, and we have no authority to do so.").

B. Statute of Limitations

Simon next argues that Gumwood's claims are barred by the statute of limitations. HN12[] A civil antitrust action is barred by the statute of limitations unless it is "commenced within four years after the cause of action accrued." 15 U.S.C. § 15b; Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 401 U.S. 321, 91 S. Ct. 795, 28 L. Ed. 2d 77 (1971). Gumwood filed its complaint in this action on June 29, 2011, so any claim that accrued prior to June 29, 2007 is barred. "Generally, a cause of action accrues and the statute begins to run when a defendant commits an act that injures a plaintiff's [*33] business." Zenith, 401 U.S. at 336. Gumwood alleges that Simon's tying activity began in 2006 and began harming Heritage Square well before June 29, 2007, including by causing Ann Taylor to discontinue its construction at Heritage Square in August 2006 and to decline to sign an otherwise fully-negotiated lease amendment in April 2007 that would have required it to open its store at Heritage Square. The statute of limitations could thus pose a significant obstacle to Gumwood's claims.

To avoid that result, Gumwood invokes the continuing violation doctrine. HN13[] "Antitrust law provides that, in the case of a 'continuing violation,' say, a price-fixing conspiracy that brings about a series of unlawfully high priced sales over a period of years, 'each overt act that is part of the violation and that injures the plaintiff,' e.g., each sale to the plaintiff, 'starts the statutory period running again, regardless of the plaintiff's knowledge of the alleged illegality at much earlier times.'" Klehr v. A.O. Smith Corp., 521 U.S. 179, 189, 117 S. Ct. 1984, 138 L. Ed. 2d 373 (1997) (quoting 2 P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 338b (rev. ed. 1995)); see also Zenith, 401 U.S. at 338 ("In the context of a continuing conspiracy to violate the antitrust laws, . . . each time a plaintiff is injured by an act of the defendants [*34] a cause of action accrues to him to recover the damages caused by that act and that, as to those damages, the statute of limitations runs from the commission of the act."). "An overt act that restarts the statute of limitations is characterized by two elements: (1) it must 'be a new and independent act that is not merely a reaffirmation of a previous act'; and (2) it must 'inflict new and accumulating injury on the plaintiff.'" DXS, Inc. v. Siemens Medical Systems, Inc., 100 F.3d 462, 467 (6th Cir. 1996) (quoting Pace Indus., Inc. v. Three Phoenix Co., 813 F.2d 234, 238 (9th Cir. 1987)); accord Lehman v. Lucom, 727 F.3d 1326, 1331 (11th Cir. 2013); Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073, 1088 (10th Cir. 2006); Xechem, Inc. v. Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., 372 F.3d 899, 902 (7th Cir. 2004); Varner v. Peterson Farms, 371 F.3d 1011, 1019 (8th Cir. 2004).

In its brief, Gumwood does not acknowledge this analytical framework for continuing violations. Instead, it cites primarily to Taylor v. Meirick, 712 F.2d 1112 (7th Cir. 1983), which addressed a different conception of the continuing violation doctrine in the context of a copyright claim. There, the Seventh Circuit held that "the statute of limitations does not begin to run on a continuing wrong till the wrong is over and done with." Id. at 1118. As a result, the plaintiff's claim for a series of copyright violations was timely where the defendant's conduct continued into the limitations period, even though it began outside the limitations period. Id. And perhaps more importantly, the court permitted the plaintiff to reach back and recover damages that occurred prior to the limitations period [*35] because those damages were part of the same continuing violation. Id. at 1119.

To the extent Gumwood attempts to rely on Taylor to argue that it need not prove new acts and injuries within the limitations period, Taylor does not support that proposition.[3] The court there found that the defendant was accountable for continued sales of the infringing product within the limitations period, id., so it did not suggest that a plaintiff could recover even when a continuing wrong extends into the limitations period but inflicts no new injuries in that span. Moreover, in the antitrust context, courts have widely and quite uniformly held that in order for continuing violations to trigger new limitations periods, there must be a new and independent overt act that inflicts new and accumulating injury on the plaintiff. Klehr, 521 U.S. at 189; Lehman, 727 F.3d at 1331; Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1088; Xechem, 372 F.3d at 902; Varner, 371 F.3d at 1019; DXS, 100 F.3d at 467; Pace Industries, 813 F.2d at 238; see also Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 320c6 (4th ed. 2014) ("Of course, if the damages all occurred more than four years earlier, the plaintiff is time-barred notwithstanding continuation of the defendant's violation."). To the extent Taylor says otherwise, it does not apply in this context.

Taylor's effect in this case, if any, would thus not be on whether Gumwood's claims are barred, but on whether Gumwood can recover damages caused by acts that occurred prior to the limitations period, in that Taylor permitted

[3] For what it's worth, Taylor has arguably been narrowed by the Seventh Circuit, *e.g., [*36] Limestone Dev. Corp. v. Village of Lemont, Ill., 520 F.3d 797, 800-802 (7th Cir. 2008); CSC Holdings, Inc. v. Redisi, 309 F.3d 988, 992-93 (7th Cir. 2002), and has been criticized by other district courts in this circuit to the extent that at least one district court has refused to follow it even in the copyright context, finding itself "powerfully convinced" that the Seventh Circuit would reverse Taylor once given the chance, Leventhal v. Schenberg, 917 F. Supp. 2d 837, 845-46 (N.D. Ill. 2013). See also *Champion Labs., Inc. v. Cent. Ill. Mfg. Co., No. 14 C 9754, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4641, 2016 WL 164364, at 4 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 14, 2016) (describing the limitations and criticisms of Taylor, but nonetheless following its holding in a copyright case).

the plaintiff to recover damages for the entire course of conduct. But there again, Gumwood runs into the problem that this proposition is contrary to the great weight of authority in antitrust cases. E.g., Klehr, 521 U.S. at 189 ("But the commission of a separate new overt act generally does not permit the plaintiff to recover for the injury caused by old overt acts outside the limitations period."); Xechem, 372 F.3d at 902; Stolow v. Greg Manning Auctions Inc., 80 F. App'x 722, 725 (2d Cir. 2003) ("Stolow cannot recover for the loss of [his company] or other injuries he allegedly suffered before April 4, 1998 (four years before he filed this lawsuit) because his claim that the [*37] continuing nature of the alleged illegal conduct tolled the statute of limitations is without merit. . . . Although Stolow refers to Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Morgan, 536 U.S. 101, 122 S. Ct. 2061, 153 L. Ed. 2d 106 (2002), which treated a 'hostile work environment' claim as a single 'unlawful employment practice' under Title VII for statute of limitations purposes, nothing suggests that the Supreme Court intended that decision to displace these well-established antitrust and RICO principles."); Areeda ¶ 320c6 ("Even in the case of the continuing conspiracy or violation, . . . plaintiffs are ordinarily limited to damages for the four years immediately preceding the filing of their lawsuit.").

As Simon notes, this is illustrated by the very cases Gumwood cites that apply the continuing violation doctrine in the antitrust context, which hold that HN14[] the plaintiff may only recover damages that accrued within the limitations period, not damages that were caused by the same course of conduct but that predated the limitations period. Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 88 S. Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968) (allowing the plaintiff to bring an antitrust claim in 1955 for conduct that began in 1912, but permitting recovery of only the damages that accrued within the limitations period); *Smith, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1211, 2012 WL: 27718, at 3 n.2 (denying a motion to dismiss since the continuing violation extended [*38] into the limitations period, but noting that "[a]ny harm that accrues after the tolling of the statute of limitations periods but that is associated with an overt act that occurred prior to the limitations period is not remediable"). The Seventh Circuit has also expressly rejected extending Taylor's damages theory into the RICO context, McCool v. Strata Oil Co., 972 F.2d 1452, 1466 (7th Cir. 1992), which employs the same limitations principles as antitrust law, Klehr, 521 U.S. at 190 (citing this holding from McCool as applying in both the RICO and antitrust contexts); see also Limestone Dev. Corp., 520 F.3d at 800-802. Thus, to decide whether Gumwood's claims are barred in their entirety, as would be required to justify summary judgment, the Court considers, first, whether Simon engaged in any new and independent overt acts within the limitations period, and second, whether those acts inflicted any new and accumulating injury on Gumwood.

1. New and Independent Act

First,HN15[] to start a new limitations period, an overt act must "be a new and independent act that is not merely a reaffirmation of a previous act." DXS, 100 F.3d at 467 ("Even when a plaintiff alleges a continuing violation, an overt act by the defendant is required to restart the statute of limitations and the statute runs from the last overt act."). As some circuits have [*39] articulated this rule, overt acts must be more than the "abatable but unabated inertial consequences of some pre-limitations action" in order to trigger a new limitations period. Z Techs. Corp. v. Lubrizol Corp., 753 F.3d 594, 600 (6th Cir. 2014); Poster Exch., Inc. v. Nat'l Screen Serv. Corp., 517 F.2d 117, 128 (5th Cir. 1975). Thus, where a party makes an "'irrevocable, immutable, permanent and final'" decision prior to the limitations period, subsequent acts within the limitations period that simply reflect that prior decision will not restart the clock. Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1090 (quoting Hennegan v. Pacifico Creative Serv., Inc., 787 F.2d 1299, 1301 (9th Cir. 1986)).

Conversely, when a party decides to embark on an unlawful course of conduct prior to the limitations period, but that initial decision "require[s] further action" to implement, or a party's actions within the limitations period "manifest[] a commitment to renewing and enforcing" a prior decision or agreement, those subsequent actions will restart the limitations period. Id. at 1089; see also DXS, 100 F.3d at 468 (finding that subsequent acts to implement a previously-announced but unenforced policy restarted the limitations clock where they were not "compelled by" the policy announcement and were not "merely reaffirmations of" the policy); Midwestern Mach. Co., Inc. v. Nw. Airlines, Inc., 392 F.3d 265 (8th Cir. 2004) ("[A] continuing violation theory is based on an initial action that violates the antitrust laws followed by injuries caused by illegal actions designed to implement [*40] and effectuate the initial violation."). In the context of a tying arrangement, this typically means that a plaintiff must show that the defendant "'had the ability to and actually did enforce the tie' during the limitations period." Eichman v. Fotomat Corp. 880 F.2d 149, 160 (9th Cir. 1989) (quoting Airweld, Inc. v. Airco, Inc., 742 F.2d 1184, 1190 (9th Cir. 1984)); *Smith, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1211, 2012 WL 27718, at 3 (same).

Here, as Simon argues, the alleged tying activity began prior to June 2007, which suggests that Simon had decided prior to that point (if at all) to require Ann Taylor to sign a lease at University Park or to stay out of Heritage Square in order to retain its leases at the other Simon properties. But there was nothing final or irrevocable about any of Simon's actions prior to the limitations period. As Simon's continued interactions with Ann Taylor revealed, any tying arrangement was tenuous at best, and it took considerable maneuvering and prodding over the ensuing period for Simon to keep Ann Taylor from proceeding at Heritage Square and to cause it to sign a lease at University Park. Nor did Ann Taylor take any action that irrevocably committed it to the tying arrangement prior to the limitations period. It neither terminated its lease with Heritage Square nor signed a lease at University Park until well within the limitations period. [*41] Thus, Simon could not simply sit idly while the inertial consequences of its previous threats played out. To the contrary, the parties' negotiations proceeded in fits and starts, and Simon had to consistently apply pressure to Ann Taylor and maintain the tie to ensure that Ann Taylor would comply.

The nature of the relationship between Ann Taylor and Simon relative to Gumwood makes this clear. This was not a case where two parties with mutually aligned interests agreed not to do business with a plaintiff, such that the initial agreement between those parties can be considered final and the subsequent acts within the limitations period merely reflect that prior decision. E.g., Kaw Valley Elec. Coop. Co., Inc. v. Kan. Elec. Power Coop., Inc., 872 F.2d 931, 933 (10th Cir. 1989) (finding an action time-barred where a cooperative decided prior to the limitations period not to do business with non-members); AMF, Inc. v. Gen. Motors Corp., 591 F.2d 68 (9th Cir. 1979) (similar). The tying arrangement here would have been adverse to Ann Taylor's interests, as it constrained Ann Taylor's ability to freely consider and choose among competing centers. Thus, in the absence of a formalized agreement that Simon could enforce against Ann Taylor, the tying arrangement required continuing action by Simon to keep Ann Taylor aligned.

The Tenth Circuit's decision [*42] in Champagne Metals involved a similar scenario. There, a group of the plaintiff's competitors conspired to harm the plaintiff by pressuring the plaintiff's suppliers not to do business with it. 458 F.3d at 1089. But like Simon's initial decision to impose a tying arrangement, the initial decision among the competitors in Champagne Metals did not itself have any effect on the plaintiff. Id. Rather, the competitors had to take further action to implement that decision by coercing third parties, the suppliers, not to do business with the plaintiff. Id. Thus, the acts that the competitors took within the limitations period to keep the suppliers from doing business with the plaintiff were sufficiently new and independent to restart the statute of limitations. Id. at 1089-90 (noting also that the plaintiff could seek to recover damages "for those acts" that occurred "within the limitations period"); see also Hennegan, 787 F.2d at 1300-01 (finding a continuing violation where a souvenir shop's competitors coerced third parties, tour operators, to steer their tours away from the plaintiff's shop, and actions in furtherance of that arrangement continued into and caused harm within the limitations period).

Likewise here, Simon could not unilaterally [*43] deprive Heritage Square of its tenants. Rather, it could only impact Heritage Square by influencing the actions of those third parties, including Ann Taylor. See Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1089 (distinguishing Kaw Valley, where the defendants' refusals to deal with the plaintiff did not restart the limitations period, on the basis that "the agreeing parties [in Kaw Valley] had exclusive control over the input they sought to deny to the plaintiff; a decision not to supply that input required no further action"). And though Simon allegedly began pressuring Ann Taylor in 2006, it was not until mid-2008 that Ann Taylor finally signed a lease at University Park. That lease itself would constitute a new, independent overt act in furtherance of the tying arrangement, as it was the culmination of the alleged tying and was not an inevitable consequence of any previous acts. It also took concerted and renewed effort by Simon into 2008 to secure the University Park lease, and those various acts could also qualify as new overt acts. [E.g., DE 128-36; 129-43].

There were other potential overt acts within the limitations period, too. For example, there is evidence that around August 2007, Ann Taylor and Simon entered an agreement [*44] by which Ann Taylor agreed not to open any stores in centers that competed with Simon properties. Multiple emails reference such an agreement and note that the parties were working on how to document it. [E.g., DE 129-43 "Yes, we agreed not to go into the other project . . . "); 129-44 ("As the 'new kid on the block', Buck [Sappenfield of Ann Taylor] has said all the right things — ie. no more AT's [Ann Taylors] opening in our backyard."); 128-33 (noting among the "open items" to be addressed between Ann Taylor and Simon: "Discussion and understanding as to how we should document AT's agreement not to go into the markets where they've turned down opportunities with us."). That agreement is a plausible result of Simon's tying threats and could encompass Heritage Square, and could thus be another new and independent overt act as part of the tying arrangement.

Moreover, throughout this period, Simon continued to insist on engaging in a single, global negotiation rather than agreeing on individual properties. [E.g., DE 128-27 ("As it relates to AT, . . . we agreed only to hold up renewals . . . ."); 128-32; 129-36 ("In a meeting yesterday with David and Rick, they reiterated their direction [*45] not to sign any leases (new or renewal) with . . . Ann Taylor unless and until we finish our packages with them."); 129-38 ("We were holding all the deals until they were all complete."); 129-39 (noting that Simon had been holding off on renewing certain leases for about a year as of February 2008); 129-41 ("until things are settled with AT, we should not be pursuing the signing of this lease.")]. As Simon argues, there is nothing inherently improper about that practice, and it is not sufficient to establish a tie. However, it was still a necessary step to maintain a tying arrangement under these circumstances, since Simon could not tie properties together if it negotiated and executed each lease individually. Each of those refusals to renew leases on the tying properties or to negotiate them apart from the tied properties could thus constitute new overt acts, as they continued to implement the tying arrangement. Therefore, the Court finds that there is evidence from which a jury could find that Simon took overt acts within the limitations period that could have triggered a new statute of limitations.

2. New and Accumulating Injury

The more difficult question on this record comes on [*46] the second element, which is whether Gumwood was actually harmed by any overt acts that took place within the limitations period.HN16[] For overt acts to restart the limitations period, they must inflict "new and accumulating injury on the plaintiff." DXS, 100 F.3d at 467 (quoting Pace Indus., 813 F.2d at 238); Areeda ¶ 320c6 ("Of course, if the damages all occurred more than four years earlier, the plaintiff is time-barred notwithstanding continuation of the defendant's violation."). However, after the negotiations between Gumwood and Ann Taylor for the lease amendment fell through in April 2007, there were never any further concrete plans to open the store at Heritage Square that could have been interrupted by any tying arrangement; the store essentially remained in limbo until Ann Taylor signed a lease and later opened its store at University Park. And as a matter of antitrust law, "when a purchaser is 'forced' to buy a product he would not have otherwise bought even from another seller in the tied product market, there can be no adverse impact on competition because no portion of the market which would otherwise have been available to other sellers has been foreclosed." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 16; Reifert, 450 F.3d at 318 ("Forcing a buyer to purchase a product he otherwise would [*47] not have purchased is insufficient to establish the foreclosure of competition."). Thus, if Ann Taylor had decided prior to the limitations period that it was not going to open a store at Heritage Square, as Simon argues, and Simon then "forced" Ann Taylor to open at University Park when it would not have otherwise opened with any other competitors in the market, the subsequent forcing will be of no antitrust concern and will not revive Gumwood's claim.

However, the Court finds that there is sufficient evidence from which a jury could find that Ann Taylor had not conclusively decided prior to the limitations period not to open at Heritage Square, and that it may have opened its store there if not for Simon's continued tying. To begin with, Ann Taylor still had a binding ten-year lease at Heritage Square that it was unable to terminate. It had also spent over one hundred thousand dollars in construction costs building its store at Heritage Square, so it had an investment in that location. Further, because the cotenancy provision in its lease had not been (and could not be) met, Ann Taylor would have been able to pay significantly reduced rent at Heritage Square, saving it twenty percent [*48] or more on rent each year.[4] Under those circumstances, Ann Taylor would have had the ability to return to Heritage Square rather easily had Simon not continued to persist in the tying arrangement, and it would have had incentives to do so, too.

There is also evidence that Ann Taylor believed that Heritage Square was the best location for it even after Simon's tying activity began. In a March 17, 2007 email, one of Ann Taylor's representatives stated: "I'm having problems at heritage. . . . .feeling the pre[]ssure. The sad thing is we all believe that is where we should be." [DE 128-24]. He also explained at his deposition, "We knew this was the right site and market for us to be in or I felt that was the right market to be in . . . ." [DE 129-1 p. 13]. Though that was still prior to the limitations period, it is notable in that it shows that even after Simon's initial salvo, which included the threats noted above and even a meeting between Simon's and Ann Taylor's CEOs, Ann Taylor was still interested in opening a store at Heritage Square and may have preferred that location [*49] to University Park. A jury could infer that Ann Taylor's preference remained the same three months later when the limitations period began.

Simon also notes that Mr. Sappenfield of Ann Taylor testified that as of March 2007, Ann Taylor was putting together an action plan to terminate the lease at Heritage Square because "[t]he division was not wanting to go forward with a store in the shopping center." [DE 132-19 (stating also, "The only caveat is that we already had spent $100,000 on the store and the easiest thing would have been to go forward but we didn't think that the store would be successful.")]. Yet, the following month, Ann Taylor began negotiating with Gumwood over a second amendment to its lease under which it would have immediately resumed construction and opened its store at Heritage Square. Though Ann Taylor did not go forward with that plan, either, this illustrates the back-and-forth nature of Ann Taylor's intentions at Heritage Square.

In addition, though there were never any new concrete plans for Ann Taylor to open at Heritage Square after April 2007, there was no formal or irrevocable decision to terminate Ann Taylor's relationship with Heritage Square at that time. In May 2007, an Ann [*50] Taylor representative told a Heritage Square representative "that with reference to Ann Taylor Loft, that they [Ann Taylor] still had many issues to overcome with Simon before they could determine if they will move forward with us." [DE 151-7]. Internal Ann Taylor communications in July 2007 also suggest that Ann Taylor had no present intention to open a store at Heritage Square, but they were equivocal as to whether Ann Taylor had made any final decision not to ever open at Heritage Square. [DE 151-10 (stating that the deal is "on hold" and that they "will determine if the deal should be killed shortly")]. See Xechem, 372 F.3d at 901-02 (finding that an action was not time-barred even though the project in question had been placed "on permanent hold" prior to the limitations period, since that could be interpreted as merely a decision not to act at that particular time, not a final decision to never do so, and noting that "'on hold' itself implies the possibility of change"). And in February 2008, Ann Taylor inquired as to the status of Heritage Square and indicated to a Gumwood representative that they "still didn't know if [they] could open with" Heritage Square, but that they were "looking for an opportunity [*51] to do that." [DE 132-62 p. 7].

Gumwood's corporate representative also testified that her discussions with Ann Taylor about opening at Heritage Square continued throughout this period, and even continued after Ann Taylor signed a lease at University Park. [DE 151-11 ("They continued to talk with us, that there could be an opening -- or that they could potentially open. So that's why we kept the conversations alive.")]. Ann Taylor never communicated to Gumwood during that period that the deal was dead. [Id.] In fact, an Ann Taylor representative told her in December 2008 that they still were not sure whether Ann Taylor was going to enter the market, and that he would be back in touch with her in January 2009. [Id.] This indicates that even after Ann Taylor signed a lease with University Park in July 2008, it was trying to keep its options open as much as possible, which is inconsistent with Ann Taylor having made a final decision prior to June 29, 2007, when the limitations period began.

Granted, there is other evidence that by the time Ann Taylor finally signed a lease at University Park, it had already decided not to open at Heritage Square and was deciding only between opening at University [*52] Park or not opening in Mishawaka at all. [E.g., DE 129-43 ("Yes, we agreed not to go into the other project, but the division does not want to go to the [University Park] mall either. They will just not have a store in the market.")]. But Ann Taylor's position at that time could be viewed as a product of Simon's continued maintenance of the tying arrangement, too, or of the agreement around August 2007 for Ann Taylor not to open any stores "in [Simon's] backyard." [DE 129-44; 128-33]. Ann Taylor may have preferred not being in the market to opening a store at University Park, but it may have also preferred opening a store at Heritage Square to both of those options. [See DE 128-24; 129-1 p. 13]. The tying arrangement took that option off the table at the time, but that does not mean that if Simon did not continue to maintain its tying requirement, Ann Taylor would not have returned to Heritage Square. And given the other evidence noted above that Ann Taylor may have still considered opening a store at Heritage Square within the limitations period, the Court finds that there is a genuine dispute of fact on this question. Accordingly, the Court cannot grant summary judgment on the basis [*53] that the claims are barred in whole by the statute of limitations.

3. Collateral Estoppel

Finally, Simon argues that Gumwood should be collaterally estopped from contesting that it knew by April 2007 that it had suffered an injury as a result of Simon's conduct. Simon bases this argument on the dismissal of a tortious interference claim Gumwood brought against Simon in state court. However, as Simon notes in its reply brief, Gumwood does not contest that it was aware of that injury by April 2007, so the Court need not address the collateral estoppel argument. Moreover, that fact has no impact on the continuing-violations analysis above as to these antitrust claims[5]—that Gumwood cannot recover any damages for injuries it suffered prior to the limitations period does not mean it cannot recover for injuries caused by conduct within the limitations period that caused new and accumulating harm, if it can make that showing.

C. Collateral Source Doctrine

Finally, Gumwood has moved for summary judgment to preclude Simon from offering evidence to reduce Gumwood's damages under [*54] the collateral source doctrine, under which benefits conferred on a plaintiff by third parties cannot be used to reduce the damages owed by a defendant. Broadly speaking, Gumwood's expert calculated damages by determining the total loss in value to Heritage Square attributable to Simon's conduct. He first determined that Heritage Square was worth either $34.3 or $41.0 million prior to the events at issue here. He then determined that it was worth $11.0 million as of November 2010. After controlling for a substantial drop in value due to the recession, which accounted for about half of the losses, the expert concluded that the loss in value of Heritage Square attributable to Simon's conduct was either $11.0 or $16.7 million.

Meanwhile, Simon's expert contends that if damages are measured based on a change in value at all,[6] they should be measured by the change in the value of Gumwood's interest in Heritage Square, not the change of value of Heritage Square itself. Simon's expert notes that Heritage Square was pledged as security for a $33.5 million non-recourse loan for its construction. She then calculates Gumwood's interest in Heritage Square as the difference between Heritage Square's [*55] value prior to these events and the amount of the loan, which she places at either $4.5 or $12.8 million based on Gumwood's expert's calculations. She thus contends that those amounts were the most that Gumwood stood to lose (much or all of which may have been lost due to the recession and other factors), and that any additional loss in value would have been sustained by the lender when it took ownership of Heritage Square through a deed in lieu of foreclosure and Gumwood's obligation to repay the loan was released. Gumwood objects to this calculation, arguing that it is a backdoor way of introducing evidence of loan forgiveness, which Gumwood argues would be barred by the collateral source doctrine.

HN17[] Typically, the collateral source doctrine applies where a plaintiff receives insurance payments or some other benefits that are triggered by or compensate the plaintiff for the injury [*56] in question. E.g., ADM Investor Servs., Inc. v. Collins, 515 F.3d 753, 755 (7th Cir. 2008); Perry v. Larson, 794 F.2d 279, 285-86 (7th Cir. 1986); see Restatement (Second) of Torts § 920A ("Payments made to or benefits conferred on the injured party from other sources are not credited against the tortfeasor's liability, although they cover all or a part of the harm for which the tortfeasor is liable."). In those circumstances, the collateral benefits received by the plaintiff cannot be used to reduce the damages owed by the defendant. Collins, 515 F.3d at 755; Perry, 794 F.2d at 285-86. For example, the defendant in Collins incurred a debt by making trades on margin, and that debt was guaranteed by a third-party broker. Collins, 515 F.3d at 755. When the plaintiff made a margin call that the defendant could not satisfy, the guarantor paid the plaintiff a portion of the defendant's outstanding debt pursuant to its guarantee. Id. The court held that the payment did not reduce the damages that the defendant owed to the plaintiff, stating, "That a third party reimburses part of a loss does not disable the injured person from recovering under tort or contract law." Id. Similarly, in Molzof v. United States, 6 F.3d 461 (7th Cir. 1993), the Seventh Circuit considered an award of future medical expenses in a tort action. There, even though the plaintiff was entitled to free medical care for life because of his prior military service, the court held that the plaintiff [*57] was still entitled to receive over $1 million in damages for the value of his future medical care. Id. at 464-65. While the injury left the plaintiff no worse off financially relative to his future medical expenses—both before and after the injury, he was entitled to free medical care—the collateral source rule prevented his recovery from being reduced on that basis. Id.

[5] In fact, the same state court denied Simon's motion to dismiss Gumwood's state antitrust claims as untimely. [DE 151-2, -3].

[6] She contends that the proper method is actually to calculate the amount of reduced rent that Heritage Square collected as a result of the loss of Ann Taylor as a tenant. After subtracting certain costs and expenses, she arrives at a net difference of $28,739 in loss to Gumwood based on Ann Taylor's absence.

The circumstances here fit rather oddly, if at all, into the framework of the collateral source doctrine, though. As Simon argues, its expert did not invoke loan forgiveness as such as the basis for her opinion. However, her opinion relies on the premise that Gumwood had no further obligation to repay the loan once the lender took ownership of Heritage Square. If Gumwood remained obligated for the full amount of the loan, it would certainly be damaged in the full amount of the loss of value of Heritage Square, as that would have directly reduced its ability to satisfy the loan and the lender could still pursue Gumwood for the remaining balance. Having instead negotiated a non-recourse loan, Gumwood essentially transferred some of the risk of loss of value of Heritage Square to its lender (for which the lender was presumably compensated), [*58] much as a homeowner might purchase home insurance to transfer some of the risk of damage to its home to an insurer, in which case the insurance payments would not reduce the plaintiff's recovery. By that comparison, the collateral source doctrine might mean that the contractual forgiveness of the outstanding loan balance at the time the lender accepted the deed in lieu of foreclosure will not impact the damages to which Gumwood is entitled. However, neither party has cited any case applying the collateral source doctrine in this unique factual circumstance or suggesting that a non-recourse loan can provide a form of collateral benefit.[7] And for that matter, Simon has cited no authority that the existence of a loan on a property or the terms of that loan should affect a plaintiff's ability to recover damages for harm to that property in the first place, so resort to the collateral source doctrine may be unnecessary.

Moreover, the thrust of Simon's argument is essentially that much of the claim for the loss of value of Heritage Square belongs to the lender because the lender bore much of the risk and realized the loss when it took ownership of the property. Yet Gumwood also represents that when the lender accepted the deed in lieu of foreclosure, the lender permitted Gumwood to retain any claim against Simon relative to Heritage Square. Thus, if the damages in question are recoverable by either Gumwood or the lender, and the lender has relinquished its claim to Gumwood, Gumwood might be entitled to recover those damages either way. Finally, Gumwood argues that the loan was not fully non-recourse, as some of its principals had to make certain personal guarantees. However, Gumwood does not indicate how the personal obligations of the partners should affect the damages recoverable by the partnership, if at all, or how that would be a collateral benefit to Gumwood.

Given the uncertainties of these various moving parts, and because neither party has presented any authority applying the collateral source doctrine in these unique circumstances, the Court cannot [*60] conclude at this time that Gumwood is entitled to summary judgment as to the application of the collateral source doctrine. However, these issues bear further consideration, and the parties may renew or present additional arguments on these issues as appropriate in advance of trial.

[7] States also take various approaches as to whether plaintiffs' recoveries should be reduced where they are able to negotiate discounts on expenses incurred as a result of the injury in question. Those cases seem inapplicable here, though, where both the loan and its non-recourse [*59] terms were in effect prior to the injury.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the parties' cross motions for summary judgment [DE 127, 130] are each DENIED. Simon's motions to strike [DE 156, 159] are also DENIED as moot. Finally, Simon's motion for oral argument [DE 135] is DENIED as unnecessary at this time in light of the depth and quality of the parties' briefs.

ORDER GRANTING APPLICATION FOR A TEMPORARY RESTRAINING ORDER

Before the Court is the United States of America's ("government") Ex Parte Application for a Temporary Restraining Order ("TRO") (Dkt. No. 5.), filed, along with the Complaint (Dkt. No. 1), on March 17, 2016. Defendant Tribune Publishing Company ("Tribune") filed an Opposition, and the government filed a Reply on March 18, 2016. (Dkt. Nos. 12, 16.)[1] Upon consideration of the papers, the Court GRANTS the application.

I. BACKGROUND

The papers set forth the relevant background in detail. The Court will provide only a summary. Tribune owns the Los Angeles Times. The government seeks an order enjoining Tribune from finalizing its acquisition of Freedom Communications, Inc. ("Freedom") and its publications, the Orange County Register and the Riverside County

[1] At 6:30 p.m. on March 18, 2016, Tribune filed an Ex Parte Application [*2] to File a Sur-Reply. (Dkt. No. 17.) The Court GRANTS that application. However, the court has reviewed Tribune's sur-reply and it does not change the analysis herein.

Press-Enterprise. Tribune was the winning bidder — out of two or three bidders — for Freedom's assets in a bankruptcy auction held March 16, 2016 and is scheduled to seek bankruptcy court approval of its acquisition on March 21, 2016. The government argues that the acquisition would immediately end competition between Tribune and Freedom for readers and advertisers in Orange and Riverside counties, leaving Tribune with a monopoly in the market for English-language daily local newspapers in these counties. The government contends that this is prohibited by Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and seeks to enjoin the acquisition to preserve the status quo pending a motion for preliminary injunction. [*3]

II. APPLICABLE LEGAL STANDARDS

A. Standard for a Temporary Restraining Order

A temporary restraining order is "an extraordinary remedy that may only be awarded upon a clear showing that the plaintiff is entitled to such relief." Winter v. NRDC, Inc., 555 U.S. 7, 22, 129 S. Ct. 365, 172 L. Ed. 2d 249 (2008). The purpose of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo and the rights of the parties until a final judgment on the merits can be rendered. See U.S. Philips Corp. v. KBC Bank N.V., 590 F.3d 1091, 1094 (9th Cir. 2010). The purpose of a temporary restraining order is to preserve the status quo before a preliminary injunction hearing may be held. Granny Goose Foods, Inc. v. Bhd. of Teamsters & Auto Truck Drivers Granny Goose Foods, Inc., 415 U.S. 423, 439, 94 S. Ct. 1113, 39 L. Ed. 2d 435 (1974); *Johnson v. Macy, No. CV 15-7165 FMO (ASX), 145 F. Supp. 3d 907, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 158054, 2015 WL 7351538, at 3 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 16, 2015). The standard for a temporary restraining order is identical to the standard for a preliminary injunction. Frontline Med. Assocs., Inc. v. Coventry Healthcare Workers Comp., Inc., 620 F. Supp. 2d 1109, 1110 (C.D. Cal. 2009). Specifically, a party seeking preliminary injunctive relief must establish that he is (1) likely to succeed on the merits, (2) that he is likely to suffer irreparable harm in the absence of preliminary relief, (3) that the balance of equities tips in his favor, and (4) that an injunction is in the public interest. Am. Trucking Ass'ns v. City of Los Angeles, 559 F.3d 1046, 1052 (9th Cir. 2009).

Alternatively, "'serious questions going to the merits' and a hardship balance that tips sharply toward the plaintiff can support the issuance of an injunction," [*4] provided that the plaintiff also shows irreparable harm and that the injunction is in the public interest. Alliance for the Wild Rockies v. Cottrell, 632 F.3d 1127, 1132 (9th Cir. 2011); *SATA GmbH & Co. KG v. Wenzhou New Century Int'l, Ltd., No. CV 15-08157-BRO (Ex), 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147637, 2015 WL 6680807, 3 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 19, 2015). A "serious question" is one on which the movant "has a fair chance of success on the merits." Sierra On-Line, Inc. v. Phoenix Software, Inc., 739 F.2d 1415, 1421 (9th Cir. 1984).

The elements of this test are "balanced, so that a stronger showing of one element may offset a weaker showing of another." Alliance for the Wild Rockies, 622 F.3d 1045, 1049-50 (9th Cir. 2010), rev'd on other grounds, 632 F.3d 1127 (9th Cir. 2011). However, the applicant must demonstrate that immediate or imminent irreparable harm is likely: "Speculative injury does not constitute irreparable injury sufficient to warrant granting a preliminary injunction. A plaintiff must do more than merely allege imminent harm sufficient to establish standing; a plaintiff must demonstrate immediate threatened injury as a prerequisite to preliminary injunctive relief." Caribbean Marine Svcs. Co., Inc. v. Baldrige, 844 F.2d 668, 674 (9th Cir. 1988) (emphasis in original) (internal citations omitted); see also *Fin. & Sec. Prods. Ass'n v. Diebold, Inc., Case No. C 04-04347 WHA, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 45409, 2005 WL 1629813, * 6 (N.D. Cal. Jul. 8, 2005)* ("Irreparable harm must not be speculative or merely alleged to be imminent . . . ."). In the antitrust context, "[r]easonable apprehension of threatened injury" can constitute irreparable harm. Am. Passage Media Corp. v. Cass Commc'ns, Inc., 750 F.2d 1470, 1473 (9th Cir. 1985); accord 15 U.S.C. § 26. Nevertheless, the party seeking injunctive [*5] relief still "must demonstrate irreparable harm," id., by showing "a significant threat of injury from an impending violation of the antitrust laws or from a contemporary violation likely to continue or recur." Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum Comm'n v. Nat'l Football League, 634 F.2d 1197,1201 (9th Cir. 1980) (citation and internal quotations omitted). Unsupported allegations without "factual basis" do not suffice. Id.

B. Elements of a Clayton Act Violation

The government challenges the transaction under Section 7 of the Clayton Act. To prove a violation of Section 7, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the challenged transaction is likely to "substantially . . . lessen competition or tend to create a "monopoly" in a properly defined "market for a particular product in a particular geographic area." United States v. Baker Hughes, Inc., 908 F.2d 981, 982-83 n.1, 285 U.S. App. D.C. 222 (D.C. Cir. 1990). The government must prove that there is a "reasonable probability" of substantial competitive harm; a mere possibility of harm is insufficient to prove a Section 7 violation. United States v. Marine Bancorporation, Inc., 418 U.S. 602, 616-17, 622-23, 94 S. Ct. 2856, 41 L. Ed. 2d 978 (1974) ("[Section] 7 deals in 'probabilities,' not 'ephemeral possibilities.'") (citing Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 323, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962)); United States v. SunGard Data Sys., Inc., 172 F. Supp. 2d 172, 180 (D.D.C. 2001). If, on balance, the transaction is not likely to substantially lessen competition, the government cannot carry its burden. Baker Hughes, 908 F.2d at 982-83.

Courts evaluate mergers under a "burden-shifting" framework by which the government must (1) establish a cognizable relevant product market, (2) [*6] demonstrate market shares that give rise to anticompetitive effects, and (3) show probable adverse effects on customers in the market as a whole. Id. at 981. If the government establishes these elements, there arises a presumption that the merger will substantially lessen competition. California v. Am. Stores Co., 872 F.2d 837, 841-42 (9th Cir. 1989), rev'd on other grounds, 495 U.S. 271, 110 S. Ct. 1853, 109 L. Ed. 2d 240 (1990).

If the government establishes a prima facie case, the burden then shifts to the defendant to produce evidence rebutting the presumption. Baker Hughes, 908 F.2d at 982-83. If the defendant successfully rebuts the presumption, the burden of producing additional evidence of anticompetitive effect shifts to the government and merges with the ultimate burden of persuasion, which remains with the government at all times. Id.

III. DISCUSSION

A. The Government Has Established a Likelihood of Success on the Merits of Its Claim.

Having reviewed the parties' submissions, the Court finds that the Government has shown a likelihood of success on the merits of its claim.

1. The Government Is Likely to Establish Its Proposed Relevant Market.

To prove anticompetitive effect, the government must establish the relevant market, which consists of two components: a product market and a geographic market. FTC v. Freeman Hosp., 69 F.3d 260, 268 (8th Cir. 1995). The relevant product market establishes [*7] the boundaries within which competition meaningfully exists. Those "commodities reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes" constitute a product market for antitrust purposes. United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 395, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956). The relevant market "must be drawn narrowly to exclude any other product to which, within reasonable variations in price, only a limited number of buyers will turn." Times-Picayune Publ'g Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 612 n.31, 73 S. Ct. 872, 97 L. Ed. 1277 (1953); see also Brown Shoe, 370 U.S. at 325 (product markets are delineated "by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it"). A relevant geographic market is an "area in which the seller operates[] and to which the purchaser can practicably turn for supplies." United States v. Phila. Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 359, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915 (1963) (internal quotation marks and emphasis omitted).

Here, the government defines the relevant product market as "the sale of Daily English-language local daily newspapers to subscribers and the sale of local advertising in those newspapers." See TRO 10:14-16, and Exh. B (Decl. of Robin Allen). In particular, the government notes that readers and advertisers are not likely to find local newspapers in other languages to be reasonably interchangeable with local English-language newspapers.

The government defines the relevant geographic [*8] market as Orange County and Riverside County. The government argues that English-language newspapers from elsewhere are not likely to be interchangeable with English-language newspapers in Orange and Riverside counties because the former "do not regularly provide local news specific to that county, nor do they have any significant circulation or sales inside Orange County." See TRO 13:8-11. And, although the Los Angeles Times provides news about and has circulation in these Counties, this fact does not ameliorate but instead exacerbates the potential anticompetitive effects of the acquisition because Tribune also owns the Los Angeles Times. In its Reply, the government claims that over 200,000 residents of Orange and Riverside Counties buy daily newspapers.

Tribune does not contest that local newspapers provide local content and local advertising. Instead, it argues that the government's market definition fails to account for internet-based sources of local news and advertising as potential competition in the relevant product market and that therefore the government's market definition is too narrow. See, e.g., Reilly v. Hearst Corp., 107 F. Supp. 2d 1192, 1201 (N.D. Cal. 2000) (noting that the internet "has opened a staggering array of news sources" [*9] and that "[w]hile a merger of the two dominant San Francisco dailies in 1965 might well have posed an unquestionable threat of undue concentration of market power under the old paradigm, that threat today is far from clear."). If the government's relevant market definition is not sound, then its prima facie case collapses.

The Court is not convinced of Tribune's position that the internet renders geography and distinctions between kinds of news sources obsolete. In Reilly, Judge Walker questioned whether the geographic scope of the market for San Francisco newspapers was in fact broader than San Francisco. But Judge Walker's discussion cited, in addition to the influence of the internet, the presence of other nearby local papers, the region's recent population explosion, and the availability of other free-distribution newspapers as factors suggesting a broader market. See Reilly, 107 F. Supp. 2d at 1200-01. In addition, Judge Walker issued his order after a court trial with a fully-developed record. Thus, Reilly is of little assistance to Tribune.

Meanwhile, Tribune has not meaningfully rebutted the government's market definition. Tribune states in conclusory fashion that "[f]or local news in Orange County, [readers] can turn to [*10] numerous on-line local sources," see Opp'n 16:17-20, without identifying any such sources. Tribune also states that readers can turn to Google News, Apple News, "numerous search engines, or various media," id., for news on any particular topic, but to the Court's knowledge neither Google News, Apple News, nor "search engines" themselves generate local content. Rather, news aggregator sites primarily post links to stories on the websites of other content generators — including local newspapers like the Register or the Press-Enterprise. That other websites post links to local sites only demonstrates that local newspapers continue to serve a unique function in the marketplace: they are the creators of local content. It further stands to reason that local advertisers in search of print advertising would choose to advertise with local news providers. To be sure, there are other "sources" of local news such as bloggers and the like, but Tribune neither argues nor demonstrates that consumers consider the content or advertising they provide as "reasonably interchangeable" with what the local English-language newspapers provide.

The Court is therefore satisfied that the government is likely [*11] to establish its proposed relevant product market.

2. The Government Is Likely to Demonstrate That the Acquisition Would Have Anti-Competitive Effects and Adverse Effects on the Consumers in the Market.

"[A] merger which produces a firm controlling an undue percentage share of the relevant market, and results in a significant increase in the concentration of firms in that market[,] is so inherently likely to lessen competition substantially[,] that it must be enjoined in the absence of evidence clearly showing that the merger is not likely to have such anticompetitive effects." Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. at 363; see also id. at 364 ("Without attempting to specify the smallest market share which would still be considered to threaten undue concentration, we are clear that 30% presents that threat."); United States v. Bazaarvoice, Inc., No. 13-cv-00133-WHO, 2014 U.S.

Dist. LEXIS 3284, 2014 WL 203966, at *68-70 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 8, 2014) (finding that "the government established that the combined market shares of [the merging parties] far exceeds 30 percent, and is in excess of 50 percent," which "easily made a prima facie showing of a Section 7 violation").

Here, the government has shown that, based on the above relevant market definition, Tribune's acquisition of the Register will increase its control of local daily newspaper [*12] circulation from 41 percent to 98 percent in Orange County, and Tribune's acquisition of the Press-Enterprise and Register would increase its share of local daily newspapers from 12 percent to over 81 percent in Riverside County. Tribune only contests the government's relevant market definition, but does not meaningfully dispute these figures. Under the cases cited above, such a concentration clearly constitutes a threat to competition and would likely have adverse effects on consumers in the market as whole. The government will therefore likely establish these elements.

The government has therefore shown a likelihood of success on the merits of its Clayton Act claim.

B. The Government Has Established a Likelihood of Irreparable Harm, That an Injunction is in the Public Interest, and That the Balance of Hardships and Equities Tips in Its Favor.

"In a Government case the proof of the violation of law may itself establish sufficient public injury to warrant relief." California v. Am. Stores Co., 495 U.S. 271, 295, 110 S. Ct. 1853, 109 L. Ed. 2d 240 (1990); see also United States v. Siemens Corp., 621 F.2d 499, 506 (2d Cir. 1980) ("[O]nce the United States demonstrates a reasonable probability that § 7 has been violated, irreparable harm to the public should be presumed."); United States v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., 218 F. Supp. 530, 544 (W.D. Pa. 1963) ("The Congressional pronouncement in § 7 embodies the irreparable injury of [*13] violations of its provisions.").

Even absent a presumption, the government has established a likelihood of irreparable harm. Should an injunction not issue, Tribune would acquire the Register and Press-Enterprise and undertake all of the business actions — consolidating operations, taking ownership of business-sensitive information, terminating employees, etc. — that normally accompany mergers. It would be very difficult — if not impossible — to unwind these actions, so the court could not grant an effective remedy in should the government ultimately prevail. See Consol. Gold Fields PLC v. Minorco, S.A., 871 F.2d 252, 261 (2d Cir. 1989) (irreparable harm established where merged firm would "dominate" the market and the acquired firms "would cease to be viable competitors in the market"); F&M Schaefer Corp. v. C. Schmidt & Sons, Inc., 597 F.2d 814, 818 (2d Cir. 1979) (finding irreparable harm because acquisition would allow defendant immediately to "have access to the confidential trade information of one of its leading competitors" and lead to the "risk of decreased organizational morale" of the acquired firm); United States v. Ivaco, Inc., 704 F. Supp. 1409, 1429 (W.D. Mich. 1989) ("If an injunction is denied and the transaction is later found to violate the Act, then the remedy would be a divestiture of acquired assets," but "[t]hat remedy is typically rejected by the courts as ineffective" as it "would not [*14] effectively remedy the injury to competition threatened by this transaction."). The Court is simply not convinced by Tribune's attempt to downplay the significance of this potential harm.

The public interest and the balance of hardships inquiries are interrelated and both weigh in favor of an injunction. "By enacting Section 7, Congress declared that the preservation of competition is always in the public interest." Ivaco, 704 F. Supp. at 1430; see also F.T.C. v. Swedish Match, 131 F. Supp. 2d 151, 173 (D.D.C. 2000) ("There is a strong public interest in effective enforcement of the antitrust laws . . . ."). The Court finds this especially applicable here where the consumer access to local news is at stake. Newspapers — indeed, local ones — are important to a healthy democracy. Tribune claims that it would be harmed because it would not be able to consummate its purchase before Freedom runs out of financing on March 31, 2016 and the second place bidder would make the purchase instead. It may be that Tribune will lose the opportunity to acquire the Register and Press-Enterprise in favor of the second place bidder. However, this private harm does not outweigh the public interest in the preservation of competition, especially given the government's likelihood of success on the merits. [*15] See, e.g., Ivaco, 704 F. Supp. at 1430 ("This private, financial harm must, however, yield to the public interest in maintaining effective competition."); United States v. Columbia Pictures Indus., Inc., 507 F. Supp. 412, 434 (S.D.N.Y. 1980) ("Far more important than the interests of either the defendants or the existing industry. . . is the public's interest in enforcement of the antitrust laws and in the preservation of competition. The public interest is not easily outweighed by private interests."); Siemens Corp., 621 F.2d at 506 (in Section 7 cases brought by the Government, "private interests must be subordinated to public ones"). That the government enforces antitrust law on behalf of the public interest necessarily weighs heavily in the balance-of-hardships calculus. Furthermore, Tribune could have avoided the risk of harm altogether by vetting the acquisition with the government ahead of time. Finally, the government seeks to preserve the status quo pending a resolution of its case on the merits, thereby avoiding harm to the marketplace that otherwise appears likely.

Some cases discuss the "balance" analysis as the balance of equities. Insofar as the balance of equities is distinct from the balance of hardships, it also tips in the government's favor. Tribune faults the government for not interjecting itself into the allegedly [*16] well-publicized potential acquisition earlier, while the government faults Tribune for not notifying it of its intentions. Perhaps both sides could have anticipated antitrust problems sooner and dealt with them on some basis other than on an application for a TRO resolved in a matter of hours. Indeed, Tribune evidently anticipated potential antitrust issues long ago because it secured antitrust counsel, yet it appears that it failed to vet its intentions with the government voluntarily. The Court finds that the government's alleged eleventh-hour enforcement of the antitrust law and the arguable prejudice this causes Tribune does not influence the equities or outbalance the paramount importance of the public interest. The balance of the equities therefore strongly favors the government.

The likelihood of irreparable harm, the public interest, and the balance of hardships and equities weigh in favor of an injunction.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court GRANTS the Government's Ex Parte Application for a Temporary Restraining Order.

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that, pending a hearing for determination of an Order to Show Cause Why a Preliminary Injunction Should Not Issue, Defendant [*17] Tribune Publishing Co., and all of its respective agents, employees, or attorneys, shall be and hereby are RESTRAINED AND ENJOINED from acquiring any portion of the assets of Freedom Communications, Inc., or in any way taking control of or gaining access to the assets of Freedom Communications, Inc.

Under Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 65(b)(2), a TRO must expire no later than 14 days after the time it is issued unless the court extends it for good cause. Therefore, the Court hereby SETS a hearing on the government's request for an Order to Show Cause Why a Preliminary Injunction Should Not Issue for Monday, March 28, 2016, at 10:00 a.m.

Opinion

[*1101] ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Plaintiffs and Counterclaim Defendants Arapahoe Surgery Center, LLC, Cherry Creek Surgery Center, LLC, Hampden Surgery Center, LLC, Kissing Camels Surgery Center, LLC, SurgCenter of Bel Air, LLC ("SurgCenter"), and Westminster Surgery Center, LLC ("Westminster") (collectively "Plaintiffs" or the "ASCs") are ambulatory surgery centers bringing this action against Defendants Cigna Healthcare, Inc., Connecticut General Life Insurance Co., Cigna Healthcare — Mid-Atlantic, Inc., and Cigna Healthcare of Colorado, Inc. (collectively "Cigna"). (ECF No. 60 at 56-64.) The ASCs bring claims under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act ("ERISA") § 502(a), 29 U.S.C. §§ 1132(a) and 1133; the Sherm an Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 et seq., and the Colorado Antitrust Act, [3] Colo. Rev. Stat. §§ 6-4-101 et seq.; and state law claims for breach of contract and breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. (Id.) Cigna has asserted Counterclaims under ERISA for injunctive relief; a related claim for declaratory relief; a claim under a Colorado criminal statute prohibiting abuse of health insurance, Colo. Rev. Stat. § 18-13-119; and state law claims[1] for unjust enrichment and tortious interference with contract.[2] (ECF No. 17.) Before the Court [*1102] are the parties' respective Motions for Summary Judgment ("Motions"). (ECF Nos. 105, 106.) For the reasons set forth below, the Motions are each granted in part and denied in part: Cigna's Motion is granted in full as to the ASCs' antitrust claims and in part as to the ERISA claims; the ASCs' Motion is granted in full as to Cigna's abuse of health insurance counterclaim and in part as to the unjust enrichment and tortious interference claims; and the Motions are otherwise denied.

I. LEGAL STANDARD

Summary judgment is warranted under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56 "if the movant shows that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a); see also Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248-50, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). A fact is "material" if, under the relevant substantive law, it is essential to proper disposition of the claim. Wright v. Abbott Labs., Inc., 259 F.3d 1226, 1231-32 (10th Cir. 2001). An issue is "genuine" if the evidence is such that it might lead a reasonable trier of fact to return a verdict for the nonmoving party. Allen v. Muskogee, 119 F.3d 837, 839 (10th Cir. 1997). In analyzing a motion for summary judgment, a court must view the evidence and all reasonable inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. Adler v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 144 F.3d 664, 670 (10th Cir. 1998) (citing Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 587, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986)). In addition, the Court must resolve factual ambiguities against the moving party, thus favoring the right to a trial. See Houston v. Nat'l Gen. Ins. Co., 817 F.2d 83, 85 (10th Cir. 1987).

II. BACKGROUND

The following relevant [5] facts are undisputed, unless otherwise noted.

---

[1] Cigna's state law claims against SurgCenter and Westminster are brought under Maryland law, as both are Maryland limited liability companies operating in Maryland, while its state law claims against the remaining ASCs are brought under Colorado law, as they are all Colorado entities. (ECF No. [4] 17 ¶¶ 16-21, 218, 225, 233, 240, 248, 254.) Each of Cigna's state law claims asserts that the ASCs' conduct gives rise to a claim under both Maryland and Colorado law. (Id. ¶¶ 218, 225, 233, 240, 248, 254.)

[2] Cigna also brought additional counterclaims under ERISA, Colorado Criminal Code § 18-4-405, RICO, and COCCA, as well as state law claims alleging fraud and negligent misrepresentation, all of which were previously dismissed. (ECF No. 80.)

Cigna is a managed care company offering health insurance benefit plans, some of which it funds itself, and most of which are funded by the employers or entities that sponsor them, while Cigna serves as claims administrator. (Cigna's Statement of Material Facts ("Cigna's SMF") (ECF No. 90 at 3-27) ¶¶ 1-2.) Cigna maintains a network of medical providers who agree in their network contracts to accept discounted rates for their services. (Id. ¶¶ 5-6.) The ASCs are ambulatory surgery centers providing medical services, and are all considered out-of-network facilities under Cigna's insurance plans. (Id. ¶¶ 23, 26.) Cigna's plans all contain a clause delegating to Cigna "the discretionary authority to interpret and apply plan terms and to make factual determinations in connection with its review of claims under the plan." (Id. ¶ 22.)

Under Cigna's plans, if a patient receives services from an out-of-network medical provider, the patient pays any applicable co-payment, coinsurance, or deductible (collectively referred to as the patient's "cost share"), as specified in the plan. (Id. ¶ 14.) As compared to in-network services, the plans generally [6] require patients to pay a higher cost share for out-of-network services. (Id. ¶ 15.) The plans contain a section entitled "Exclusions, Expenses Not Covered and General Limitations," which reads in relevant part: "Covered Expenses will not include, and no payment will be made . . . [for] charges which you are not obligated to pay or for [*1103] which you are not billed or for which you would not have been billed except that they were covered under this plan." (Id. ¶ 18.) Cigna interprets this exclusion provision to mean that the plan is not responsible for a charge that the provider does not require a member to pay, including any cost share obligation under the member's plan. (Id. ¶ 19.)

Cigna also limits its plans' reimbursement to out-of-network providers to a specified "Maximum Reimbursable Charge," and will not reimburse any charge that is greater than the provider's "normal charge" for that service. (Id. ¶¶ 20-21.) Patients using out-of-network providers are also generally subject to a deductible for those providers, one which is separate from their in-network deductible. (Id. ¶ 17.)

As out-of-network providers, the ASCs adopted a billing policy under which they would charge patients no [7] more than those patients' in-network cost share responsibility, rather than the higher out-of-network cost share provided under Cigna's plans. (Id. ¶ 33.) In discussing these costs with patients, the ASCs sometimes referred to the out-of-network cost share obligations as "penalties." (Id. ¶ 38.) As the ASCs did not have all of Cigna's plan documents, they estimated the patient's in-network cost share, calculating this estimate in many cases by using 150% of the Medicare rate for the relevant procedure. (Id. ¶¶ 39-40.) When the patient had no in-network responsibility, the ASC would collect no cost share from the patient. (Id. ¶ 41; see also ECF No. 116 at 7.) When the ASCs submitted benefits claims to Cigna requesting reimbursement for their services, they charged rates as out-of-network facilities. (Cigna's SMF ¶ 52.)

Cigna contends that, in practice, the ASCs often accepted payments from it and other insurers as payment in full without charging the patients anything at all, and without holding the patient responsible for any difference between the insurer's payment and the amount in the ASCs' claims. (Id. ¶¶ 42-43.) The ASCs dispute this, contending that they only charged a patient [8] nothing when that patient had no in-network responsibility, and that patients for whom Cigna did not pay benefits have since received a bill reflecting the balance due. (ECF No. 116 at 7.) The ASCs required all their patients to sign "Assignment of Benefits" forms, which contain an acknowledgement that the patient understands that he or she is "financially responsible for all charges regardless of any applicable insurance or benefits payments," or on some versions of the form, the patient agrees "to pay all sums due the facility at the usual and customary charge of the facility." (ASCs' Statement of Material Facts ("ASCs' SMF") (ECF No. 97 at 4-19) ¶ 7.) Pursuant to these forms, the ASCs contend that they have billed patients when Cigna denied their claims. (Id. ¶ 8.) Cigna does not dispute that such forms were signed, but it does dispute that patients were billed for outstanding balances, or that the ASCs ever intended to hold patients responsible for more than the calculated in-network cost share. (ECF No. 112 at 2-3.)

Cigna began investigating the ASCs' billing practices, and based on Cigna's belief that the ASCs were forgiving fees, Cigna began sending notices to physicians who [9] had referred patients to the ASCs, reminding them to refer patients to in-network providers and threatening to terminate them from Cigna's network if they did not desist. (Cigna's SMF ¶¶ 62-63.) Cigna also sent surveys to their members who had received services from the ASCs, which revealed that the patients paid lower cost shares than the amounts specified in their plans for out-of-network providers. (Id. ¶ 73.)

[*1104] Based on this information, Cigna implemented a "fee-forgiving protocol" for processing claims from the ASCs, under which it reduced reimbursement to the ASCs based on the amount the patient paid in cost share. (Id. ¶ 79.) Cigna "flagged" the ASCs' claims pursuant to its determination that they were forgiving fees, which routed claim processing to Cigna's Special Investigation Unit. (ASCs' SMF ¶¶ 68.) The ASCs do not dispute that Cigna's fee-forgiving protocol led to reduced reimbursement payments, but also note that on the majority of the ASCs' claims, Cigna denied the claim in full and paid nothing. (ECF No. 116 at 13.) Cigna asserts that, under the protocol, its Special Investigation Unit withheld payment for claims for which the ASCs refused to provide Cigna with information [10] about the amount the patient had paid in cost share. (Cigna's SMF ¶ 68.) However, it is undisputed that, in the fall of 2014, Cigna changed its fee-forgiving protocol for paying the ASCs' claims from "full denial" to processing the claim at 150% of Medicare. (Id. ¶ 75.)

The ASCs had a general policy of appealing claims through Cigna's administrative process when Cigna reimbursed less than 60% of the billed charges. (Id. ¶ 59; ASCs' SMF ¶ 17.) However, one of the ASCs, Westminster, did not appeal any of Cigna's denials of claims until March 14, 2013. (Cigna's SMF ¶ 60.)

The ASCs filed this action on December 18, 2013. (ECF No. 1.) Cigna filed an Answer and Counterclaims on February 10, 2014. (ECF Nos. 16, 17.) On March 6, 2015, the Court entered an Order Granting in Part and Denying in Part the ASCs' Motion to Dismiss Cigna's Counterclaims. (ECF No. 80.) The Court dismissed counterclaims under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO") and its state analogue, some of Cigna's counterclaims under ERISA, and several state law claims. (Id. at 21.)

On April 23, 2015, Cigna and the ASCs each filed their respective Motions. (ECF Nos. 90, 97.) The parties each filed Responses (ECF [11] Nos. 112, 116) and Replies (ECF Nos. 123, 124).

III. ANALYSIS

Cigna's Motion seeks summary judgment on each of the ASCs' claims against it, as well as on its counterclaims against the ASCs. (ECF No. 90.) The ASCs' Motion seeks summary judgment in their favor on each of Cigna's counterclaims, as well as on all of the ASCs' own claims except for their antitrust claims. (ECF No. 97.) The Court will therefore discuss the parties' respective arguments as to each set of claims in turn.

A. Antitrust: ASCs' Claims VI & VII

Cigna challenges the ASCs' Claims VI and VII, which allege antitrust violations under the Sherman Act and the Colorado Antitrust Act, respectively.[3] (ECF No. 90 at 27-36.) Cigna raises three arguments: (1) the ASCs have failed to present any evidence of a conspiracy, either direct or circumstantial; (2) there is no evidence of an unlawful restraint of trade; and (3) there is no evidence of an antitrust injury. (Id.) Because the Court finds the third argument dispositive, its analysis begins there.

[*1105] "An antitrust injury is defined as an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Sports Racing Servs., Inc. v. Sports Car Club of Am., Inc., 131 F.3d 874, 882 (10th Cir. 1997). "Antitrust injury" is not enumerated as an element of any of the Sherman Act claims discussed above, yet it is a necessary element of any antitrust claim. See NYNEX Corp. v. Discon, 525 U.S. 128, 135, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1998) (a plaintiff in a § 1 claim must show harm to the competitive process); Full Draw Prods. v. Easton Sports, Inc., 182 F.3d 745, 750 (10th Cir. 1999) (claim under the Clayton Act requires that the plaintiff show an antitrust injury); Rural Tel. Service Co. v. Feist Publications, Inc., 957 F.2d 765, 768 (10th Cir. 1992) (holding that an antitrust injury is a necessary element of a § 2 claim).

[3] The Colorado Antitrust Act is the state law analogue to the Sherman Act. See Colo. Rev. Stat. § 6-4-119 ("the courts shall use as a guide interpretations given by the federal courts to comparable federal antitrust [12] laws"). Because federal antitrust law principles apply to both the federal and state antitrust claims, the Court will analyze both claims together. See Four Corners Nephrology Assocs., P.C. v. Mercy Med. Ctr. of Durango, 582 F.3d 1216, 1220 n.1 (10th Cir. 2009).

Cigna here argues that the ASCs' antitrust claims must fail for lack of antitrust injury because they allege only injury to themselves as competitors, not injury to competition itself. (ECF No. 90 at 35-37.) Cigna argues that the ASCs remain open for business, demonstrating that they have not been pushed out of the market by Cigna's alleged anticompetitive acts, and that economic losses to the ASCs cannot alone constitute an injury to competition. (Id.)

In response, the ASCs argue that the [13] antitrust injury resulting from Cigna's acts is supported by the expert report of Dr. R. Forrest McCluer, Ph.D. (ECF No. 120-16 at 22-25, 35-37.) The paragraphs the ASCs cite in support of their argument fall under two separate headings in Dr. McCluer's report: "The High Cost of [Hospital Outpatient Departments] Relative to ASC" (which falls under the broader heading "The Rise of Outpatient Surgeries"), and "Demonstrating the Fact of Antitrust Injury." Under the first of these two headings, Dr. McCluer opines that costs for procedures performed at ASCs are typically significantly lower—sometimes by two to three times—than the same procedure performed at a hospital, and that consequently, "the out of pocket costs to [patients] as well as the total cost of health care can rise as a result of excluding Plaintiffs from the market . . . ." (Id. at 22-25.)

Under the second heading, Dr. McCluer explains that antitrust injury exists when an anticompetitive act restricts consumer choices, or results in increased costs to consumers. (Id. at 35.) He opines that "the alleged joint-boycott and conspiracy had the effect of diverting cases away from Plaintiff ASCs and redirected them, at least to some degree, to [hospital [14] outpatient departments]." (Id. at 36.) Finally, Dr. McCluer cites specific examples of physicians that moved the site of planned surgeries from the ASCs to hospitals in Cigna's network, in response to Cigna's warning and termination letters. (Id.)

The ASCs argue that Full Draw Products supports a finding that "a loss resulting from an attempt to cripple or eliminate a competitor is precisely the type of loss to be expected as the result of an illegal boycott," and is therefore an antitrust injury. (ECF No. 116 at 45.) The Court rejects the implication in this argument that any injury caused by a per se illegal boycott is necessarily an antitrust injury, as the Supreme Court has spoken definitively on that issue. Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 341-42, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990) ("We also reject respondent's suggestion that no antitrust injury need be shown where a per se violation is involved. The per se rule is a method of determining whether § 1 of the Sherman Act has been violated, but it does not indicate whether a private plaintiff has suffered antitrust injury and thus whether he may recover damages . . . .").

[*1106] However, the Court agrees that Full Draw Products encourages a case-specific analysis of whether the alleged injury stems from the anticompetitive [15] effects of the challenged conduct. Indeed, in a related case alleging the same underlying conspiracy, this Court previously cited Full Draw Products' holding that a plaintiff's injury alone can constitute antitrust injury under certain circumstances. *Kissing Camels Surgery Ctr., LLC v. Centura Health Corp., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114600, 2015 WL 5081608, at 7 (citing Full Draw Prods., 182 F.3d at 754 ("We have no doubt that alleging the loss of one of two competitors in this case alleges injury to competition. . . . Because defendants' alleged boycott reduced a competitive market of two producers to a market of one monopolist, Full Draw quite clearly alleged substantial injury to competition from defendants' group boycott.")). In Kissing Camels, the Court found that the plaintiffs—which included many of the same Plaintiff ASCs in the instant case—had sufficiently presented evidence of antitrust injury despite a failure to discuss anticompetitive impacts on any competitor other than the plaintiffs themselves. Id. The Court noted that the plaintiffs' antitrust expert analyzed the relevant market and found that, "because it is highly concentrated, elimination of any of the Plaintiffs as competitors would have a substantial negative impact on competition." Id. The Court concluded that, in the concentrated Colorado Springs market [16] at issue in Kissing Camels, the plaintiffs had presented sufficient evidence that the evidence of harm to themselves established harm to competition. Id.

In the instant case, however, the ASCs point to no such market analysis or any similar evidence. Rather, the evidence the ASCs cite from Dr. McCluer's report consists of generalized opinions regarding the lower cost of procedures at ASCs as compared to hospitals, and specific examples of business the ASCs lost as a result of Cigna's actions. Even viewed in the light most favorable to the ASCs, the Court finds this evidence insufficient to defeat summary judgment on the issue of antitrust injury. Notably, there is no evidence that any of the Plaintiff ASCs in this case have actually been excluded from the market; rather, the evidence shows only that they suffered some amount of lost business as a result of Cigna's acts.[4] (See ECF No. 120-16 at 36-37.) The ASCs have not pointed to any part of Dr. McCluer's expert report that analyzes the competitiveness of the relevant markets to indicate that such lost business substantiates an antitrust injury. They have not even directed the Court to evidence showing, for example, that their businesses [17] are likely to fail if such losses continue. Instead, they point to Dr. McCluer's opinions on increased costs to patients, apparently arguing that increased costs demonstrate competitive harm. However, Dr. McCluer does not reference any concrete instances of increases in costs to patients on which a jury could rely to find that such harm occurred, nor does he opine that costs necessarily, or [*1107] even probably, increased in this case. (See id. at 22-25, 35-37.) Without more, it would be unreasonable for a jury to take the large inferential step from Dr. McCluer's generalized opinions to find that patient costs increased as a result of anticompetitive activity in the instant case.

The Court has no obligation to sift through Dr. McCluer's report, or the record as a whole, to determine whether there is any other evidence of an antitrust injury. Mitchell v. City of Moore, 218 F.3d 1190, 1199 (10th Cir. 2000) (holding that the Court is "not obligated to comb the record in order to make [the plaintiff's] arguments for [it]"). "[O]n a motion for summary judgment, 'it is the responding party's burden to ensure that the factual dispute is portrayed with particularity, without depending on the trial court to conduct its own search of the record." Cross v. The Home Depot, 390 F.3d 1283, 1290 (10th Cir. 2004). Given the lack of evidence of an antitrust injury, the Court holds that no reasonable jury could find in the ASCs' favor on its antitrust claims. Accordingly, Cigna's Motion is granted as to the ASCs' Claims VI and VII under the Sherman Act and the Colorado Antitrust Act.

B. ERISA: ASCs' Claims I, II, & III and Cigna's Counterclaim I

The ASCs' Claims [19] I, II, and III are all brought under various provisions of ERISA, arguing that Cigna violated the statute by failing to pay benefits (Claim I), breaching its fiduciary duty as an insurer and third-party administrator (Claim II), and failing to provide a full and fair review of the ASCs' claims (Claim III). (ECF No. 60 at 56-60.) Cigna raises four general arguments that summary judgment is warranted on these claims: (1) under the "abuse of discretion" standard of review, Cigna correctly interpreted its plans, and its actions to deny or reduce benefits payments were supported by substantial evidence; (2) the ASCs failed to exhaust administrative remedies for at least some of their claims; (3) the ASCs' Claim II for restitution fails because purely monetary compensation is unavailable under ERISA § 502(a)(3) and there is no evidence Cigna gained from its acts; and (4) the ASCs' Claim III fails because Cigna reviewed every appeal after the fee-forgiving protocol was implemented. (ECF No. 90 at 37-43.) The ASCs, too, seek summary judgment on these claims, arguing that Cigna's interpretation of its plans was erroneous as a matter of law. (ECF No. 97 at 20-28.)

Cigna's Counterclaim I is also brought under [20] § 502(a)(3), and the sole remaining relief sought is an injunction requiring the ASCs to submit to Cigna only the amounts that the ASCs actually charge the patients and to exclude any additional amount from their future claims.[5] (ECF No. 17 at 41.) Both parties seek summary judgment on that claim as well.

[4] While there is no requirement that a competitor be eliminated to establish an antitrust injury, the ASCs' citation to Full Draw Products is inapposite where no such elimination has occurred. (See ECF No. 116 at 46 (quoting Full Draw Prods., 182 F.3d at 755 ("The mere fact that the number of competitors after the boycott matches the number before . . . does not cure the anticompetitive effect of the boycott, which is the elimination of a competitor by means other than 'the economic freedom of participants in the relevant market.'")).) The cited passage from Full Draw [18] Products explained that an antitrust injury occurred when a competitor was eliminated, even though from a consumer's perspective, it had only one choice in the market both before and after the challenged boycott—not, as the ASCs appear to suggest, that the fact of a competitor's survival after a boycott has no impact on the antitrust injury analysis.

[5] Cigna originally sought declaratory relief under Counterclaim I as well, but that request was dismissed in a prior order. (ECF No. 80 at 8.)

1. Standard of Review

ERISA § 502(a) authorizes a civil action "by a participant or beneficiary . . . (B) to recover benefits due to him under the terms of his plan, to enforce his rights under the terms of the plan, or to clarify his rights to future benefits under the terms of the plan . . . ." 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a)(1). However, "ERISA does not set out the appropriate standard of review for actions under § 1132(a)(1)(B) challenging benefit eligibility determinations." Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 109, 109 S. Ct. 948, 103 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1989). In Firestone, the Supreme Court established the proper standard of review for such claims, holding that "a denial of [*1108] benefits challenged under § 1132(a)(1)(B) is to be reviewed under a de novo standard unless the benefit plan gives the administrator or fiduciary discretionary authority to determine eligibility for benefits or to construe the terms of the plan." [21] Id. at 115. "If the plan provides for such discretion, then the proper standard of review is abuse of discretion." McClenahan v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 621 F. Supp. 2d 1135, 1139 (D. Colo. 2009) aff'd, 416 F. App'x 693 (10th Cir. 2011). The parties here do not dispute that all of the plans at issue in this case contain a provision granting Cigna discretionary authority to interpret and apply plan terms, and to make benefits determinations. (Cigna's SMF ¶ 22.) Thus, it would appear that under Firestone, the abuse of discretion standard applies.

In Colorado, however, the analysis does not end there. On August 6, 2008, Colorado Revised Statutes § 10-3-1116(2) became effective, which reads:

> An insurance policy, insurance contract, or plan that is issued in this state that offers health or disability benefits shall not contain a provision purporting to reserve discretion to the insurer, plan administrator, or claim administrator to interpret the terms of the policy, contract, or plan or to determine eligibility for benefits.

Colo. Rev. Stat. § 10-3-1116(2). On its face, this statute would seem to render void the discretionary clauses for those Colorado plans that Cigna insures, such that the applicable standard of review for those plans would revert to the default de novo. However, despite the fact that Cigna does not raise the issue in its own Motion or in its response to the ASCs' [22] Motion (see ECF No. 90 at 37-38; ECF No. 112 at 17-19), when faced with a potential conflict between state and federal laws, the Court must consider the question of preemption.

"ERISA includes expansive pre-emption provisions . . . to ensure that employee benefit plan regulation would be exclusively a federal concern." Aetna Health Inc. v. Davila, 542 U.S. 200, 208, 124 S. Ct. 2488, 159 L. Ed. 2d 312 (2004) (citing 29 U.S.C. § 1144) (internal quotation marks omitted). "There are two aspects of ERISA preemption: (1) 'conflict preemption' and (2) remedial or 'complete preemption.'" David P. Coldesina, D.D.S. v. Estate of Simper, 407 F.3d 1126, 1135-36 (10th Cir. 2005) (citing 29 U.S.C. § 1144(a)).

The Tenth Circuit has not reached the preemption question with respect to § 10-3-1116(2), but other judges in this District have thoroughly discussed the issue. See McClenahan, 621 F. Supp. 2d at 1140-1142; see also Kohut v. Hartford Life & Acc. Ins. Co., 710 F. Supp. 2d 1139, 1147-49 (D. Colo. 2008). The Court is persuaded by the reasoning in McClenahan, which found that: (1) § 10-3-1116(2) was not expressly preempted by ERISA because it fell within the savings clause for a state regulation of insurance pursuant to the prescribed analysis in Kentucky Association of Health Plans, Inc. v. Miller, 538 U.S. 329, 342, 123 S. Ct. 1471, 155 L. Ed. 2d 468 (2003); and (2) § 10-3-1116(2) was not preempted by ERISA due to a conflict because the abuse of discretion standard of review arises from contractual drafting, not from any ERISA provision, and therefore the state statute does not affect ERISA's statutory enforcement scheme.[6] [*1109] McClenahan, 621 F. Supp. 2d at 1140-42. The Court agrees with and adopts the preemption analysis [23] in McClenahan, and concludes, for the same reasons articulated therein, that § 10-3-1116(2) is not preempted by ERISA. Therefore, for those plans subject to this Colorado statute, [6] Ultimately, McClenahan found that § 10-3-1116(2) did not require de novo review under the facts of that case, because the relevant events giving rise to McClenahan's claims occurred before the effective date of the Colorado statute and the statute could not be applied retroactively under Colorado law. Because the facts in this case occurred well after August 2008, no issue of retroactivity is raised by the facts of the instant case.

namely, any Colorado plans that Cigna insures, the discretionary clause is void and the Court must apply de novo review.[7]

The parties do not dispute that Maryland lacks a parallel statute. The ASCs also agree that Cigna's self-funded plans—those in which, for example, an employer acts as insurer and Cigna as mere administrator—are not subject to § 10-3-1116(2). (See ECF No. 97 at 22.) These plans, all of which contain [24] a discretionary clause, must therefore be reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard of review. See Firestone, 489 U.S. at 115. Under the abuse of discretion standard, the court "will uphold the decision of the plan administrator so long as it is predicated on a reasoned basis, and there is no requirement that the basis relied upon be the only logical one or even the superlative one." Eugene S. v. Horizon Blue Cross Blue Shield of N.J., 663 F.3d 1124, 1134 (10th Cir. 2011) (internal quotation marks omitted) (referring to "arbitrary and capricious" standard); see also Loughray v. Hartford Grp. Life Ins. Co., 366 F. App'x 913, 923 (10th Cir. 2010) ("In the ERISA context, we treat the abuse of discretion and the arbitrary and capricious standards of review as interchangeable."). In determining whether the plan administrator's interpretation was within its discretion, the Court must "look for 'substantial evidence' in the record to support the administrator's conclusion, meaning 'more than a scintilla' of evidence 'that a reasonable mind could accept as sufficient to support a conclusion.'" Eugene S., 663 F.3d at 1134 (quoting Adamson v. UNUM Life Ins. Co. Of Am., 455 F.3d 1209, 1212 (10th Cir. 2006)).

The ASCs raise an additional issue affecting the standard of review: the effect of a potential conflict of interest. The ASCs argue that, for those plans in the abuse of discretion category which Cigna insures itself (limited, of course, to some number of the Maryland plans [25] at issue, since the insured Colorado plans are in the de novo category), Cigna saved money by denying its members' claims, and therefore had an inherent conflict of interest from its dual role as evaluator and payer of benefits claims. (ECF No. 116 at 28.) The ASCs argue that this conflict of interest must be considered as a factor when determining whether Cigna abused its discretion. (Id. (citing Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105, 108, 128 S. Ct. 2343, 171 L. Ed. 2d 299 (2008)).) Cigna argues that a dual role conflict does not alter the standard of review (ECF No. 124 at 16), and the Court does not disagree. But Cigna has not cited any authority contradicting the ASCs' argument that this conflict of interest is a factor that may be considered when reviewing Cigna's exercise of discretion for possible abuse. The Court therefore agrees that conflict of interest is a factor in evaluating a potential abuse of discretion for any plans that Cigna insures.

The ASCs argue that the conflict of interest should also be considered for plans that Cigna merely administered, even though it did not benefit monetarily from denial of claims, because Cigna applied a uniform policy when it denied claims and its decisions were therefore uniformly "tainted by self-interest." (ECF [*1110] No. [26] 116 at 28.) While this argument is logical, it is unsupported; the sole authority the ASCs cite for this proposition deals with a completely unrelated issue. (Id. (citing Phelan v. Wyo. Associated Builders, 574 F.3d 1250, 1255 (10th Cir. 2009) (affirming a district court's remedy reversing member's termination from insurance plan because it was a permissible equitable remedy under ERISA § 502(a)(3))).) The Court therefore declines to apply the conflict of interest factor outside the plans where Cigna has a dual role.

2. Exhaustion of Administrative Remedies

Cigna seeks summary judgment on the ASCs' ERISA claims as to some of the applicable plans for failure to exhaust administrative remedies, based on the argument that the ASCs conceded that they did not appeal some of the benefits claims that were denied or reduced. (ECF No. 90 at 41-42.) Specifically, Cigna states that the ASCs admitted that they do not appeal benefits claims where Cigna paid 60% or more of the amount that was billed, and one ASC—Westminster—admitted that it did not appeal any Cigna benefits claims until March 14, 2013. (Id.; Cigna's SMF ¶ 60.) The ASCs do not dispute these admissions, but they argue that appeals were futile under Cigna's fee-forgiving protocol. (ECF No. 116 at 11, 33-34.)

[7] The same would be true for any plans at issue here that are not subject to ERISA, but as the parties have not enumerated the specific plans, the Court cannot determine at this stage whether any such plans exist.

In an unpublished [27] decision on which Cigna relies, the Tenth Circuit states, "We agree with the Seventh Circuit's approach to evaluating a claim of futility and hold that in order to satisfy the futility exception to the exhaustion requirement, plaintiff must establish that 'it is certain that his claim will be denied on appeal, not merely that he doubts that an appeal will result in a different decision.'" Rando v. Standard Ins. Co., 182 F.3d 933 (10th Cir. 1999) (table) (quoting Lindemann v. Mobil Oil Corp., 79 F.3d 647, 650 (7th Cir. 1996)) (brackets omitted). While this decision is not binding, the Court is persuaded that the bar for showing futility is high.

Nevertheless, the Court concludes that the ASCs have shown futility here for those claims that were not appealed after the imposition of Cigna's fee-forgiving protocol. Once Cigna imposed a blanket policy of how to handle the ASCs' claims, the ASCs could be certain that Cigna would reject their appeals pursuant to that policy. However, the ASCs have presented no evidence that their appeals would have been futile before the imposition of the fee-forgiving protocol. As such, the Court finds that the ASCs' ERISA claims are barred for failure to exhaust administrative remedies as to any claim for benefits that was not appealed through both administrative levels provided [28] under the plans, if those claims were denied before the dates that the fee-forgiving protocol was applied.[8] Cigna's Motion is therefore granted in this limited respect.

3. Interpretation of Plans and Denial of Benefits

Both parties move for summary judgment on the question of whether Cigna was entitled to deny the ASCs' claims for benefits, in whole or in part, pursuant to the terms of their plans. (ECF No. 90 at 38-41; ECF No. 97 at 20-28.) "In interpreting an ERISA plan, [the Court] examine[s] the plan documents as a whole and, if unambiguous, construe[s] them as a matter of law." Foster v. PPG Indus., Inc., 693 F.3d 1226, 1237 (10th Cir. 2012) (internal quotation marks omitted).

[*1111] Cigna's Motion cites three provisions of the plans that it believes supported its actions on the ASCs' claims: (1) an exclusion from the definition of "Covered Expenses" for "charges which you[, the plan member,] are not obligated to pay or for which you are not billed or for which you would not have been billed except that they were covered under this plan" (Cigna's SMF ¶ 18); (2) the requirement to pay an out-of-network deductible amount [29] before receiving any reimbursement for out-of-network services (id. ¶ 16); and (3) the "Maximum Reimbursable Charge," which can be no more than the "provider's normal charge for a similar service" (id. ¶ 20). (ECF No. 90.) Cigna interpreted the Covered Expenses exclusion language as permitting it to refuse requests for reimbursement for more than "the charge that [the ASCs] used to calculate the members' in-network cost-sharing responsibility." (ECF No. 90 at 39.) Cigna further argues that, because of the out-of-network deductible requirement, many members who had not satisfied that requirement would not have received any coverage anyway. (Id.)

As to the Covered Expenses exclusion, the ASCs' Motion argues that it does not support denying the claims because the plan member was never "not obligated to pay or . . . not billed" for the ASCs' services. (ECF No. 97 at 22-23.) Instead, the ASCs argue, their patients sign forms acknowledging that the patient is "financially responsible for all charges regardless of any applicable insurance or benefits payments." (ASCs' SMF ¶ 7.) Cigna disputes whether all patients signed such forms, and also disputes whether the ASCs ever actually intended [30] to make their patients financially responsible for more than the cost-share amount the ASCs calculated. (See ECF No. 112 at 2-3.)

As to the Maximum Reimbursable Charge and deductible requirements, the ASCs argue that these cannot serve as bases for Cigna's decision to deny claims either. (ECF No. 97 at 24-25.) The ASCs contend that neither of these provisions establishes a basis for exclusion from coverage; they merely define terms that might limit payments on covered claims. (Id.) The ASCs also note that Cigna's denial letters issued after it implemented the fee-forgiving protocol all cited only the Covered Expenses exclusion. (ASCs' SMF ¶ 18.) Those letters stated that the denial was based on information that the particular ASC facility "did not obligate its patients to pay their full cost share

[8] These dates are listed in the Affidavit of Mary Ellen Cisar. (ECF No. 104.) They vary by facility as well as by which claims submission system was used. (Id.) obligation . . . or did not bill its patients for the same." (Id.) Cigna does not contest the ASCs' assertion that its cited basis for denial was only the Covered Expenses exclusion.

Both parties cite out-of-circuit decisions to support their arguments, but neither cited decision is precisely on point. The ASCs cite North Cypress Medical Center Operating Co. v. Cigna Healthcare, 781 F.3d 182, 196 (5th Cir. 2015), which discussed Cigna's denial of claims by an out-of-network medical provider [31] who did not charge its patients for the coinsurance provided for in their plans. Evaluating the claim denials under abuse of discretion review, the Fifth Circuit noted that the first step is to determine whether Cigna's interpretation of the plans is "legally correct," viewing the plan language from the perspective of an average plan participant. Id. at 195-96. From that perspective, the Fifth Circuit stated that "[t]here are strong arguments that Cigna's plan interpretation is not 'legally correct,'" because it questioned whether patients reading the Covered Expenses exclusion "would understand that they have no insurance coverage if they are not charged for coinsurance. That is, would a plan member understand the language to condition coverage on the collection of coinsurance, rather than simply describing the fact [*1112] that the insurance does not cover all of a patient's costs." Id. at 196 (emphasis in original). While this case offers a persuasive analysis, it fails to resolve the instant case; the Fifth Circuit's analysis raised questions but did not offer definitive answers, and was arguably dicta, since the issue of legal correctness was not decided but was remanded to the district court. Furthermore, the instant [32] case is distinguishable, at least as to the claims for which Cigna did not completely deny coverage but reduced the amount it paid.

Cigna relies on Kennedy v. Connecticut General Life Insurance Co., 924 F.2d 698 (7th Cir. 1991), which evaluated a similar decision by Cigna to deny claims by the plaintiff medical provider because he had waived his patients' co-payments and had agreed to accept as payment "whatever the insurer would pay." Id. at 699. The Seventh Circuit found that the Covered Expenses exclusion applied to relieve Cigna of its coverage obligation under the applicable plan, because "[b]y promising that he would look exclusively to CIGNA for payment, Kennedy relieved [the patient] of any legal obligation to pay. So Kennedy's charge to the patient was zero, and 80% of nothing is nothing." Id. at 701 (emphasis in original). Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the ASCs, however, Kennedy is distinguishable from the instant case. Here, there is a factual dispute as to whether the ASCs did, in fact, charge their patients some cost share and hold them financially responsible for the entire claimed amount if Cigna refused to pay. If the ASCs' patients were billed for the charges and obligated to pay them, then the Covered Expenses exclusion does not apply.

Given the factual [33] dispute in the record regarding whether the ASCs' patients were or were not held financially responsible for the charges here, the Court cannot determine whether the Covered Expenses exclusion applied as a matter of law. Consequently, with respect to this issue, the ASCs' Motion must be denied, and Cigna's Motion must also be denied, at least as to the plans subject to de novo review.

As to the plans subject to abuse of discretion review, however, further analysis is required. A legally incorrect reading of the plans may still be enforced if it was reasonable, within Cigna's discretion, to interpret its plans in this manner. On this point, Cigna argues that it had substantial evidence to support its decision, because it surveyed its plan members and determined that the ASCs charged patients less than their full cost share responsibility under the plans, and sometimes charged them nothing. (ECF No. 90 at 40-41.) Relying on North Cypress, the ASCs respond that Cigna's decisions were unreasonable because the plans' language does not condition coverage on full cost share payments. (ECF No. 116 at 30-33; ECF No. 97 at 23-25.) However, the ASCs' arguments are aimed at those circumstances [34] where Cigna's ultimate decision was to deny the claim in its entirety and pay nothing at all. It is undisputed that, at least after the fall of 2014, Cigna changed its fee-forgiving protocol from "full denial" to paying some percentage of the claim based on its calculation of 150% of Medicare reimbursements. (ASCs' SMF ¶ 75.) Thus, there were some circumstances where Cigna appeared to decide that the Covered Expenses exclusion applied to bar coverage completely, and other circumstances where it determined that the charge was covered but calculated a lower reimbursable amount.

Whether Cigna's decision was within its discretion depends on which of these two circumstances applied to a particular claim. When Cigna determined that the expense was covered, its decision to reduce [*1113] payment on the claim was based on its interpretation of the Covered Expenses exclusion in the context of the amount the patient was charged. For example, where Cigna had performed patient surveys and investigations and understood that the ASCs calculated a patient's cost share as 150% of Medicare, Cigna's decision to cover only 150% of Medicare was based on substantial evidence because the information it had at the [35] time suggested that the patient was being billed only for 150% of Medicare. See Adamson, 455 F.3d at 1212, 1214 ("The substantiality of the evidence is evaluated against the backdrop of the administrative record as a whole. . . . In applying this standard of review, we consider the evidence before the plan administrator at the time he made the decision to deny benefits.").

Even viewing these facts in the light most favorable to the ASCs, and considering Cigna's conflict of interest for those plans that it insures, the Court finds that Cigna's decision to reduce these payments was not unreasonable and was within its discretion. As such, Cigna's decision to reduce payments on the ASCs' claims must be upheld for those plans that are subject to abuse of discretion review. Cigna's Motion is therefore granted as to those plans.

However, the patient surveys and cost share calculations do not provide substantial evidence for Cigna to completely decline coverage. For those claims on which Cigna chose to pay nothing, Cigna's decision was reasonable only if it was supported by substantial evidence that the patients were "not obligated to pay or . . . not billed" for anything at all. Because this rests on the same disputed evidence [36] discussed above regarding whether the ASCs held patients responsible for the charges, the Court must deny summary judgment for both parties on these claims.

In summary, the Court grants Cigna's Motion on Claim I with respect to those plans that are subject to abuse of discretion review (the Maryland plans and the self-funded plans) where Cigna paid on the claim but reduced the amount to 150% of Medicare, and denies the ASCs' Motion with respect to those plans. As to those same plans where Cigna denied the claim completely, and as to all other plans, both parties' motions are denied on Claim I.

4. Breach of Fiduciary Duty: Claim II

Cigna argues that Claim II fails because it is duplicative of Claim I, and that insofar as it seeks restitution, such purely monetary compensation is unavailable under ERISA § 502(a)(3). (ECF No. 90 at 42.) Cigna further argues that the claim fails on the merits because there is no evidence Cigna gained any benefit from its acts. (Id.)

As to the first argument, the ASCs state that Cigna has merely misread the Second Amended Complaint. (ECF No. 116 at 34.) While Claim I seeks restitution of unpaid benefits, Claim II seeks "equitable, injunctive and declaratory relief." (ECF No. [37] 60 at 57-59.) Given this clarification, and in reliance on the ASCs' representation that they do not seek restitution under Claim II, the Court rejects Cigna's first argument.

As to Cigna's argument that the breach of fiduciary duty claim fails on the merits, the ASCs respond that Cigna's decisions to deny the ASCs' claims benefited Cigna, and/or the sponsors for which it administered the plan, at the expense of subscribers, which is the behavior prohibited under 29 U.S.C. § 1106. (ECF No. 116 at 35.) Because the fee-forgiving protocol undisputedly reduced or eliminated claim payments, the ASCs argue that Cigna saved money for whichever entity funded the plan by implementing the protocol, and the subscriber was left to pay out of pocket. (Id.) This characterization supports a [*1114] finding that Cigna did, in fact, gain from denying or reducing claim payments.

Since the Court has found a material factual dispute as to whether Cigna's fee-forgiving protocol was permissible under ERISA, the same dispute prevents the Court from determining as a matter of law whether the use of the protocol constituted a breach of Cigna's fiduciary duty. As such, both parties' Motions are denied as to Claim II.

5. Full and Fair [38] Review: Claim III

The ASCs' Claim III challenges Cigna's acts in denying the ASCs' claims for benefits on the basis that Cigna failed to provide a "full and fair review" of the claims. (ECF No. 60 at 59-60.)

Pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 1133(2), an employee benefit plan must "afford a reasonable opportunity to any participant whose claim for benefits has been denied for a full and fair review by the appropriate named fiduciary of the decision denying the claim." This full and fair review must include "knowing what evidence the decision-maker relied upon, having an opportunity to address the accuracy and reliability of the evidence, and having the decision-maker consider the evidence presented by both parties prior to reaching and rendering his decision." Sage v. Automation, Inc. Pension Plan & Trust, 845 F.2d 885, 893-94 (10th Cir. 1988) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Cigna's sole argument in its Motion is that it fully reviewed every one of the ASCs' appeals after the fee-forgiving protocol was implemented. (ECF No. 90 at 43.) But, as the ASCs point out, the fee-forgiving protocol itself was a blanket policy that did not provide them with an opportunity to challenge the evidence Cigna relied upon in issuing its denials. (ECF No. 116 at 35.) As there is a factual dispute preventing summary [39] judgment on whether the fee-forgiving protocol was permissible under ERISA, the Court cannot grant summary judgment as to whether its use deprived the ASCs of a full and fair review. Accordingly, both parties' Motions are denied as to Claim III.

6. Counterclaim I

Cigna's Counterclaim I seeks injunctive relief requiring the ASCs to limit their future claims to only the amounts that the ASCs actually charge the patients. (ECF No. 17 at 41.) Cigna argues that it merits summary judgment because the ASCs' policy of discounting patients' cost share "violated the terms of Cigna's ERISA-governed plans." (ECF No. 90 at 45.) However, the Court's finding that Cigna's decision to reduce payment on some of its claims was within its discretion does not equate to a finding that the ASCs violated the terms of the plans. Cigna's Motion fails to articulate a genuine argument for summary judgment on this counterclaim, and it is therefore denied.

Similarly, because the Court found above that there are material factual disputes such that it cannot determine as a matter of law whether Cigna's interpretation of its plans was permissible, the ASCs' Motion on this counterclaim is also denied.

C. Contract: ASCs' [40] Claims IV & V

The ASCs bring claims for breach of contract and breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing with regard to any plans at issue in this case that are not covered by ERISA. (ECF No. 60 at 60, 62.) The ASCs seek damages resulting from the alleged breaches as assignees of the plan subscribers. (Id.) Cigna contends that summary judgment should be granted on these claims, arguing that (1) no breach occurred; (2) the ASCs cannot recover damages; and (3) Claim V, the implied covenant claim, is duplicative and fails on the merits. (ECF No. 90 at 43-44.) [*1115] On these claims as well, the ASCs argue that Cigna's legally incorrect interpretation of its plans mandates judgment in the ASCs' favor as to those plans not covered by ERISA. (ECF No. 97 at 27-28.)

As to the argument that no breach occurred because the Covered Expenses exclusion permitted denial of the claims, the same factual dispute identified above prevents the Court from granting summary judgment on this issue. Cigna's argument that it merely "enforc[ed] this contractual term" has not been established as a matter of law at this stage of the case.

The same factual dispute precludes summary judgment on Cigna's damages argument. [41] Cigna argues that no damages are recoverable by the ASCs because they bring these claims solely as assignees of their patients, and their patients were never obligated to pay more than a fraction of what their plans required. (ECF No. 90 at 43-44.) Because this factual assertion is in dispute, the question of what damages were suffered remains in dispute.

Finally, as to the implied covenant claim, Cigna argues that it should be dismissed as duplicative of the breach of contract claim, and that it cannot be used to contradict the express terms of the contract. (Id. at 44.) Cigna cites only one unpublished case for its argument that an implied covenant claim should not proceed alongside a contract claim arising from the same facts, and in that case, the plaintiff stipulated to dismiss the claim without prejudice. *See Aurora Commercial Corp. v. PMAC Lending Servs., Inc., 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28064, 2014 WL 859253, at 5 (D. Colo. Mar. 5, 2014). The Court therefore rejects this argument as completely unsupported. Cigna's other argument on this claim relies on its position that its interpretation of the plans was permissible, which is the subject of a factual dispute and cannot support summary judgment.

Accordingly, Cigna's Motion is denied as to the ASCs' Claims IV and V. Given the factual disputes on which these claims [42] rely, the ASCs' Motion is also denied as to these claims.

D. Abuse of Health Insurance: Cigna's Counterclaim IX

Cigna's Counterclaim IX seeks declaratory relief under Colorado Criminal Code § 18-13-119, which states in relevant part as follows:

> Health care providers - abuse of health insurance
> (1) The general assembly hereby finds, determines, and declares that:
> (a) Business practices that have the effect of eliminating the need for actual payment by the recipient of health care of required copayments and deductibles in health benefit plans interfere with contractual obligations entered into between the insured and the insurer relating to such payments;
> * * *
> (2) Therefore, the general assembly declares that such business practices are illegal and that violation thereof or the advertising thereof shall be grounds for disciplinary actions. . . .
> (3) Except as otherwise provided in subsections (5), (6), and (8) of this section, if the effect is to eliminate the need for payment by the patient of any required deductible or copayment applicable in the patient's health benefit plan, a person who provides health care commits abuse of health insurance if the person knowingly:
> (a) Accepts from any third-party payor, as payment in [43] full for services rendered, the amount the third-party payor covers; or
> (b) Submits a fee to a third-party payor which is higher than the fee he has [*1116] agreed to accept from the insured patient with the understanding of waiving the required deductible or copayment.
> (4) Abuse of health insurance is a class 1 petty offense.

Cigna requests a declaration that the Colorado ASCs' billing practices violated § 18-13-119, and that therefore Cigna is entitled to recover any amounts illegally obtained through such violation. (ECF No. 17 at 53-55.)

The ASCs argue that Cigna lacks standing to enforce a criminal statute against the ASCs, and that no private right of action exists for a violation of § 18-13-119. (ECF No. 97 at 29-30.) The ASCs also argue that they have not violated the statute on the merits. (Id. at 30-31.) The Court agrees that this claim fails because there is no civil cause of action for a violation of § 18-13-119, and therefore it need not discuss the ASCs' other arguments.

Cigna contends that the fact that § 18-13-119 is a criminal statute providing for no explicit civil remedy does not bar its claim, because the Court should imply a private civil cause of action. (ECF No. 112 at 30.) Cigna urges the Court to apply the analysis of whether [44] to imply a private right of action set forth in Allstate Insurance Co. v. Parfrey, 830 P.2d 905 (Colo. 1992). However, Allstate dealt not with a criminal statute, but with a civil statute providing for certain disclosures in sales of automobile insurance, which was "totally silent on the matter of remedy." Id. at 910. The court was therefore required to determine whether a private cause of action existed "[b]ecause the statutory scheme does not expressly provide a method for enforcing a violation" of the statute. Id. at 911 (setting forth three factors for consideration).

The instant case is distinguishable, as § 18-13-119 provides explicitly for criminal sanctions, treating violations as "a class 1 petty offense." Cigna responds to this argument in a footnote, citing an unpublished case from this District and quoting from it as follows: "provision of a criminal penalty does not necessarily preclude implication of a private cause of action." (ECF No. 112 at 31 n.5 (citing *Chafin v. Stasi, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42173, 2015 WL 1525542, at 16 (D. Colo. Mar. 31, 2015).) This is a serious misstatement of the cited case, which reads in context as follows:

> Though a provision of a criminal penalty does not necessarily preclude implication of a private cause of action, a 'bare criminal statute,' which contains absolutely no indication that a civil remedy is available, does not provide [45] a basis from which to infer a private cause of action. Indeed, congressional intent to create such a remedy, the most important factor to consider when determining if an implied private remedy exists, cannot > be found on the face of this statute. Instead, the purpose of the statute is to provide protection against interference with the legislative process. Accordingly, not only does this statute fail to provide a private cause of action to support Plaintiff's claims, but there is no legislative intent to support an implied private remedy.

*Chafin, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42173, 2015 WL 1525542, at 16 (citations omitted).

Read in context, the Court finds Chafin persuasive and concludes that a similar analysis applies here. Cigna notes that the statutory purpose of § 18-13-119 is to protect insurers' contractual relationships with their insureds, but the statute also explicitly states that its violation "shall be grounds for disciplinary actions," not for a civil cause of action. Colo. Rev. Stat. § 18-13-119(2). Cigna has pointed to nothing that suggests a congressional intent to create a private right of action on which an insurer may sue to protect its contracts [*1117] with its insureds; indeed, such action would likely be duplicative of a tort claim for interference with contract, since the statute [46] provides that the prohibited business practices "interfere with contractual obligations entered into between the insured and the insurer." Id. § 18-13-119(1)(a).

The Court concludes that no private right of action is implied in § 18-13-119. Accordingly, the Court finds that Cigna may not bring a claim for declaratory relief as to § 18-13-119, and the ASCs' Motion is granted as to Counterclaim IX.

E. State Law Claims: Cigna's Counterclaims VII & VIII

Cigna brings state law claims for unjust enrichment and tortious interference with contract. (ECF No. 17 at 44-53.) The ASCs' Motion raises the following arguments against these claims: (1) both the unjust enrichment claim and the tortious interference with contract claim fail because the Court already found that Cigna failed to allege misrepresentation; (2) the unjust enrichment claim is preempted by ERISA; (3) the statute of limitations bars at least some of these claims; (4) the unjust enrichment claim fails because the ASCs did not receive any benefit to Cigna's detriment; (5) the tortious interference claim fails because Cigna has not shown that the ASCs intentionally induced the patients to breach their contracts, that the ASCs acted wrongfully, or that Cigna suffered damages; [47] and (6) Cigna lacks standing to bring these claims on behalf of employer-funded plans because Cigna suffered no damages. (ECF No. 97 at 31-40.) The Court will discuss each argument in turn.

1. Misrepresentation

The ASCs' Motion argues that the Court's rulings with respect to Cigna's allegations of fraud and misrepresentation in its order on the ASCs' Motion to Dismiss Cigna's Counterclaims mandate summary judgment on both the unjust enrichment and tortious interference claims. (ECF No. 97 at 31-32, 35.) The ASCs argue that both claims are based on alleged misrepresentations or fraud, and that the Court rejected Cigna's allegations that the ASCs misrepresented their billing practices. (Id.)

In its ruling on the ASCs' Motion to Dismiss Cigna's Counterclaims, the Court found that Cigna failed to plausibly plead that the ASCs misrepresented their billing practices because Cigna admitted that the ASCs disclosed on their claim forms that they reduced the patient's portion of the bill and made the patient responsible for only an approximate in-network deductible and co-pay amount. (ECF No. 80 at 11-12.) The Court concluded that Cigna had not plausibly pled misrepresentations constituting predicate [48] acts under RICO, and dismissed that counterclaim and its parallel state claim. (Id.) The Court found that the same alleged misrepresentations were the basis for Cigna's counterclaims for fraud, aiding and abetting fraud, negligent misrepresentation, and aiding and abetting negligent misrepresentation, and dismissed those claims as well. (Id. at 16.) However, the Court found that Cigna had sufficiently stated a claim for unjust enrichment and tortious interference with contract, and denied the Motion to Dismiss as to those claims. (Id. at 16-18.)

The ASCs' argument in the instant Motion is based on Cigna's allegations in its Counterclaims, which reference alleged misrepresentations of charges for the ASCs' services on both of the remaining claims. (ECF No. 17 at 50-53.) While the Court's findings as to misrepresentations impact the factual narrative on which both claims are predicated, neither of these claims necessarily fails without proof of these misrepresentations or fraud. The essence of Cigna's unjust enrichment claim is [*1118] that Cigna overpaid benefits claims in amounts that exceeded the value of the reimbursed service, and that it would be unjust for the ASCs to retain these additional amounts. (Id. at 50-51.) The [49] tortious interference claim alleges that the ASCs induced patients not to pay the amounts they were contractually obligated to pay and misrepresented the terms of their insurance plans, causing the patients to breach their contracts and causing Cigna to overpay claims. (Id. at 51-53.) Notably, the alleged misrepresentation of the terms of the patients' insurance plans was not within the scope of the Court's findings in its prior order. (ECF No. 80 at 11 ("While Cigna also alleges that the ASCs misrepresented to patients that they could use in-network benefits at the ASCs' facilities, Cigna does not allege that its RICO and COCCA claims are based on such misrepresentations. Instead, it alleges that the ASCs used such tactics to conceal the nature of the inflated charges.").)

Accordingly, the Court rejects the ASCs' argument that the Court's prior order requires granting summary judgment on the unjust enrichment and tortious interference claims.

2. Preemption

The Court previously found, in the context of the ASCs' Motion to Dismiss, that Cigna's state law counterclaims were not subject to either express preemption or conflict preemption. (ECF No. 80 at 13-16.) The ASCs' Motion now argues that the unjust [50] enrichment claim is preempted because it requires interpretation of Cigna's benefit plans to determine whether the claims were overpaid. (ECF No. 97 at 33-34.) In response, Cigna argues that the unjust enrichment claim does not require such interpretation, because it is based on a determination that the amounts Cigna paid the ASCs exceeded the value of the services the ASCs provided. (ECF No. 112 at 33.) The Court agrees with Cigna that, read properly, the unjust enrichment claim is based on a finding that Cigna made overpayments relative to the actual value of the services rather than relative to what Cigna was contractually permitted to pay under the plans. Therefore, this claim is not preempted, and the Court denies the ASCs' Motion in that respect.

3. Statute of Limitations

The ASCs argue that both the unjust enrichment claim and the tortious interference claim are barred in part by the applicable statute of limitations. (ECF No. 97 at 32-33, 36.) As to the unjust enrichment claim, the ASCs argue that the Maryland statute of limitations for an unjust enrichment claim seeking monetary restitution is three years, and that Cigna was aware of Westminster's billing practices more than [51] three years before it filed its counterclaim against Westminster. (Id. at 32-33.) As to the tortious interference claim, the ASCs argue that Cigna was aware of and began investigating the ASCs' claim practices more than two years before it brought its counterclaim against Kissing Camels (in Colorado), and more than three years before it brought its counterclaim against Westminster (in Maryland). (Id. at 36.)

Cigna opposes on three bases: (1) the unjust enrichment and tortious interference claims were compulsory counterclaims that relate back to the date the ASCs filed their initial complaint (December 18, 2013), not the date the counterclaims were filed (February 10, 2014); (2) these claims did not accrue when Cigna began investigating the ASCs' billing practices, but rather when Cigna knew that it was overpaying claims or that its plan members had been induced to breach; and (3) separate claims accrued as to each patient whose benefits were overpaid or who breached the contract, such that at least those claim s based on later transactions are not barred. (ECF No. 112 at 37-39.) [*1119] Cigna does not dispute the applicable statutory limitation periods. (See id.)

As to the question of relation back, the ASCs argue [52] that these are not compulsory counterclaims, under the test articulated in Pipeliners Local Union No. 798 v. Ellerd, 503 F.2d 1193, 1198 (10th Cir. 1974). The Court disagrees. Cigna's counterclaims for unjust enrichment and tortious interference are based on largely the same issues of fact as the ASCs' principal claims, much of the same evidence supports or refutes both sets of claims, and the two sets of claims are logically related in the sense that they arose from the same business practices by each party that are challenged by the opposing party. See Pipeliners Local, 503 F.2d at 1198. Therefore, the relevant date for measuring whether these claims are timely is December 18, 2013.

As to accrual, the Court agrees with Cigna that separate claims accrued as to each overpaid claim or each patient who was induced to breach the contract, rather than a generalized accrual for the entire category of unjust enrichment or tortious interference claims when Cigna began investigating each ASC's practices. Each benefits claim gives rise to separate damages based on the particular facts of that patient's services. As such, the Court holds that the following claims are time-barred: (1) any claims for tortious interference by Colorado ASCs that accrued before December 18, 2011, and (2) any claims for unjust [53] enrichment, or for tortious interference by Westminster, that accrued before December 18, 2010. The ASCs' Motion as to these claims is granted in part in that limited respect.

4. Unjust Enrichment: Counterclaim VII

The ASCs argue that Cigna's claim for unjust enrichment fails because the ASCs provided services to the patients for which they sought reimbursement and thus were not unjustly enriched, and because Cigna did not suffer a detriment from paying the claims. (ECF No. 97 at 34-35.) In response, Cigna contends that there is evidence the ASCs were overpaid based on the value of the service provided, because the ASCs charged their patients based on lower rates than that submitted to Cigna, and because the fee schedule was set to achieve an average reimbursement of 20-30% of the billed charges. (ECF No. 112 at 33.) Cigna further argues that it has necessarily suffered a detriment because it has paid the difference between the charges the ASCs submitted and the true value of their services. (Id. at 33-34.)

The Court finds that Cigna has presented sufficient evidence of unjust enrichment, when viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Cigna. An unjust enrichment claim requires evidence that [54] the defendant knowingly received a benefit at the plaintiff's expense that it would be unjust for the defendant to retain. See Lewis v. Lewis, 189 P.3d 1134, 1141 (Colo. 2008); Hill v. Cross Country Settlements, LLC, 402 Md. 281, 936 A.2d 343, 351 (Md. 2007). Cigna has presented evidence on which a reasonable jury could rely that the actual value of the services the ASCs provided was lower than the amount of the claims it submitted. If the jury finds as much, then Cigna paid claims at rates higher than the value of the services provided, which constitutes a detriment. Therefore, Cigna has stated a claim for unjust enrichment, and the ASCs' Motion is denied as to Counterclaim VII.

5. Tortious Interference with Contract: Counterclaim VIII

Cigna's tortious interference claim alleges that the ASCs' billing practices interfered with the contracts between Cigna and the patients whom it insured through its plans. (ECF No. 17 at 51-53.) The ASCs argue that Cigna has failed to present [*1120] evidence supporting all the elements of a claim for tortious interference. (ECF No. 97 at 36-40.)

A tortious interference claim has five elements under both Colorado and Maryland law: (1) existence of a contract between the plaintiff and a third party; (2) knowledge of that contract by the defendant; (3) the defendant's intentional, improper [55] interference with that contract; (4) breach of that contract by the third party; and (5) resulting damages to the plaintiff. Fowler v. Printers II, Inc., 89 Md. App. 448, 598 A.2d 794, 802 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1991); Colo. Nat'l Bank of Denver v. Friedman, 846 P.2d 159, 170 (Colo. 1993). The ASCs challenge the latter three elements of this claim.

As to breach, the ASCs argue that the plans do not require a member to pay his or her full cost share as a condition of coverage. (ECF No. 97 at 37-38.) But Cigna explains that the cost share provisions of its plans require payment of specified portions of out-of-network services, and to the extent that the ASCs' patients did not do so, they breached their contracts. (ECF No. 112 at 34-35.) The Court agrees with Cigna that a reasonable jury could find that cost share payments were required under the contracts and that a patient's failure to pay under this provision in full was a breach. This finding is not made unreasonable by a Cigna employee's statement that a patient's choice to obtain treatment at the ASCs' facilities did not breach the contract, as the ASCs suggest. (ECF No. 97 at 38; see also ECF No. 112 at 35 n.7.)

As to intent and improper interference, the ASCs contend that there is no evidence they intended to induce a breach. (ECF No. 97 at 38-39.) Again, the Court finds that Cigna has presented [56] sufficient evidence to satisfy this element. A reasonable jury could infer intent from the ASCs' admitted practices of offering to provide out-of-network services at in-network rates, and of accepting much lower cost share payments from patients than provided for in their plans. Such an inference could support a jury's conclusion that the ASCs therefore intended to obtain these patients' business by discounting their cost share rates below what their plans called for, which caused resulting interference with the contracts under Cigna's theory of the case.

Finally, the ASCs challenge Cigna's evidence of damages, arguing that Cigna paid no more than its plans required it to pay. (ECF No. 97 at 40.) However, this depends on whether Cigna's plans in fact permitted it to discount or deny claims under its fee-forgiving protocol, as it later did. As discussed above, there are factual disputes as to whether the fee-forgiving protocol was appropriate under the plans. If the protocol was permissible, then Cigna's acts to pay claims in full (before the protocol was implemented) resulted in overpayments that caused it damages. Consequently, there is a factual dispute preventing summary judgment. [57]

The Court finds that Cigna has provided sufficient evidence to satisfy all elements of its tortious interference with contract claim, and therefore the ASCs' Motion is denied as to that claim.

6. Standing

The ASCs argue that, as to the self-funded plans, Cigna lacks standing to seek money damages for its unjust enrichment and tortious interference claims because any damages were suffered by the plan sponsor, not Cigna. (ECF No. 97 at 41.) Cigna points out that its agreements with clients for self-funded plans explicitly authorize it to "take all reasonable steps to recover . . . overpayment[s]" on behalf of the plan sponsor. (ECF No. 112 at 40.) The ASCs respond that these claims do not seek "overpayments," and even assuming [*1121] they do, such overpayments can only be determined with reference to plan interpretation such that the claims are preempted by ERISA. (ECF No. 123 at 22-23.) The Court rejects this revived preemption argument, for the same reasons discussed above.

As to whether the restitution and damages sought in the unjust enrichment and tortious interference claims are "overpayments," the Court's above analysis of each of these claims at Parts III.E.4-5 clarifies that the relief sought by both [58] claims may be characterized as overpayments. The unjust enrichment claim seeks restitution of the amount it paid above the actual value of the ASCs' services, while the tortious interference claim seeks damages for the difference between what Cigna paid and what it could have paid for the ASCs' services in the absence of interference. As such, the Court finds that the relief sought in these claims is covered by the agreement between Cigna and its plan sponsors for it to seek overpayments on their behalf, and therefore Cigna has standing to pursue these claims.

F. Declaratory Relief: Cigna's Counterclaim XII

Lastly, the ASCs argue that Cigna's Counterclaim XII for declaratory relief should have been dismissed in the Court's prior Order on the ASCs' Motion to Dismiss, because it seeks "a declaration that the claims for reimbursement submitted by the ASCs are not for covered services, and are not payable under employee health and welfare benefit plans that are insured or administered by Cigna . . . [and] that the ASCs must return all sums received from Cigna." (ECF No. 17 at 61.) The ASCs point to the Court's analysis of Cigna's request for declaratory relief encompassed in its Counterclaim [59] I, which held that "it merely couche[d] the restitution claim in the form of a declaration" and that such relief was not cognizable under ERISA § 502(a). (ECF No. 80 at 8.) The ASCs also argue that this claim is redundant because the issues contained therein will be resolved by resolution of the ASCs' own claims. (ECF No. 97 at 41.)

Cigna agrees that the first part of its declaratory relief claim—seeking a declaration that the ASCs' claims are not for covered services—was dismissed by the Court's prior order. (ECF No. 112 at 39.) As to the second part of the claim, which seeks a declaration that the claims are not payable, Cigna argues that this request for relief is like the injunctive relief sought in Counterclaim I under ERISA that the Court permitted to proceed. (Id. at 39-40.)

The Court agrees with Cigna on this issue, and now clarifies its prior order. Cigna's counterclaims for declaratory relief that only seek restitution of payments fall outside the scope of § 502(a) and were therefore dismissed, whether they occurred in Counterclaim I or Counterclaim XII. (See ECF No. 80 at 8-9.) That ruling included Cigna's request for declarations that "any payments the ASCs received under such claims should be returned to Cigna," [60] and that "the claims for reimbursement submitted by the ASCs are not for covered services . . . ." (ECF No. 17 at 60-61.) While the remaining request for declaratory relief, which seeks a declaration that the ASCs' claims "are not payable under employee health and welfare benefit plans that are insured or administered by Cigna," may ultimately reveal itself to be redundant, the Court cannot find as much at this stage given the factual disputes in the remaining claims.

Accordingly, summary judgment is not appropriate on Cigna's remaining request for declaratory relief, and the ASCs' Motion is denied as to Counterclaim XII.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the Court ORDERS as follows:

> [*1122] 1. Cigna's Motion for Summary Judgment (ECF No. 105) is GRANTED IN PART as to Plaintiffs' Claims VI and VII under the Sherman Act, as to Plaintiffs' Claim I solely on certain theories of liability specified at Part III.B.3, above, and as to certain unexhausted ERISA benefits claims as described at Part III.B.2, above, and DENIED IN PART in all other respects;

Plaintiffs' and Counterclaim Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment (ECF No. 106) is GRANTED IN PART as to Cigna's Counterclaim IX for [61] declaratory relief under Colorado Criminal Code § 18-13-119, and as to certain portions of Cigna's Counterclaims VII and VIII that are time-barred as described at Part III.E.3, above, and DENIED IN PART in all other respects; and

HN1[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act prohibits any contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN2[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Sherman Act

The question cannot be answered in the abstract as to whether a joint venture constitutes a single entity incapable of conspiring with itself in an anticompetitive manner, or whether, instead, it becomes a vehicle to facilitate separate entities to conspire illegally to restrain trade. To determine whether a joint venture constitutes a combination under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, the true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint is imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

The Sherman Antitrust Act is based on an often-difficult distinction between concerted and independent, unilateral action. Concerted activity is scrutinized more closely than unilateral behavior because concerted activity inherently is fraught with anticompetitive risk insofar as it deprives the marketplace of independent centers of decisionmaking that competition assumes and demands. Specifically, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 regulates concerted activity between two or more entities, outlawing every contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, a provision that has subsequently been limited to target only unreasonable restraints of trade.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN4[] Sherman Act, Claims

To prevail on a claim under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, a plaintiff must prove: (1) a contract, combination, or conspiracy; (2) producing adverse, anticompetitive effects in the relevant market; and (3) resulting in injury.

HN6[] Sherman Act, Claims

Concerted action under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 does not turn simply on whether the parties involved are legally distinct entities. Rather, substance, not form, should determine whether an entity is capable of conspiring under § 1. It is not dispositive that defendants organize themselves under a single umbrella or into a structured joint venture. The key is whether the contract, combination, or conspiracy joins together independent centers of decisionmaking. If it does, the entities are capable of conspiring under § 1, and the court must decide whether the restraint of trade is an unreasonable and therefore illegal one.

HN8[] Sherman Act, Claims

The American Needle test directs courts to look at a number of factors when determining whether multiple parties joined together in a joint venture are functioning as a single entity for purposes of 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Courts first look to the actual conduct of the parties to the joint venture: concerted activity does not turn simply on whether the parties involved are legally distinct entities. Instead, judicial precedent has eschewed formalistic distinctions in favor of a functional consideration of how the parties involved in the alleged anticompetitive conduct actually operate. In looking at how the parties actually operate, judicial precedent repeatedly finds instances in which members of a legally single entity violated § 1 when the entity was controlled by a group of competitors and served, in essence, as a vehicle for ongoing concerted activity.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > Sherman Act

HN9[] Cartels & Horizontal Restraints, Sherman Act

For purposes of 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, the American Needle standard looks to other factors in addition to actual conduct, examining the nature of the business relationship among defendants, focusing on whether that relationship remains that of separate, competing entities or whether there is a single center of decisionmaking.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > Sherman Act

HN10[] Sherman Act, Claims

The American Needle test emphasizes that it is not dispositive that the parties to the joint venture have organized and created a legally separate entity that centralizes certain management functions. An ongoing 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 violation cannot evade § 1 scrutiny simply by giving the ongoing violation a name and label. Perhaps every agreement and combination in restraint of trade could be so labeled.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Opinion

[*2] [*936] MERRITT, Circuit Judge. Section 1 of the Sherman Act broadly prohibits "combinations in restraint of trade."[1] Plaintiff claims that defendants conspired to deny it access to managed care contracts that plaintiff needed to compete in the hospital market in Dayton, Ohio. The question in this case is whether defendants, four previously independent hospitals now operating [2] as a hospital "network" under the name "Premier Health Partners," is a "combination" subject to liability under § 1 of the Sherman Act, or whether it should be characterized as a single entity competing in the marketplace for hospital services in the Dayton area. The four hospitals entered into a joint operating agreement that merged[2] some of their healthcare functions, but retained control of others, and they continued to compete with each other. The district court held that the Premier group was a single entity and dismissed this antitrust case on summary judgment without adjudicating the question of whether the behavior of the Premier group of hospitals constitutes impermissible anticompetitive conduct. We disagree and reverse and remand for further proceedings under the Sherman Act.

I. Background

Plaintiff, The Medical Center at Elizabeth Place, opened in [3] 2006 and operates a 26-bed, for-profit, physician-owned hospital in Dayton, Ohio.[3] Plaintiff specializes in acute-care surgical services. Its competitors for surgical patients in the Dayton market include the defendant hospitals. Defendant Premier Health Partners was formed in 1995 when two Dayton-area hospitals entered into a joint operating agreement. Over the next 13 years, several additional [3] hospital corporations in the area entered into Premier's joint operating agreement.[4] Premier

[1] HN1[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits any "contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations." 15 U.S.C. § 1.

[2] A merger was not possible because one of the hospitals, Catholic Health Initiatives, Inc., was prohibited from joining a non-Catholic entity.

[3] In 2009, after struggling financially for three years, which plaintiff claims resulted from defendants' illegal boycott, plaintiff sold a 49% ownership interest to Kettering Health Network, a major competitor of defendant Premier Health Partners in the Dayton market. The sale allowed plaintiff to gain access to Kettering's managed-care contracts with local insurance companies and thereby increase its patient volume.

Health Partners, [*937] through the joint operating agreement, operates four hospitals: Good Samaritan Hospital, Miami Valley Hospital, Atrium Medical Center, and Upper Valley Medical Center. See Second Amended and Restated Joint Operating Agreement of Premier Health Partners (executed Feb. 2008). Premier is not a hospital, does not provide any health care itself, and has no assets of its own. Instead, Premier handles much of the financial business of the hospitals through the joint operating agreement, including negotiating managed-care contracts with insurance carriers. The defendant hospitals share revenues and losses through an agreed-upon formula set forth in the joint operating agreement, but each defendant [4] maintains separate ownership of its assets. Defendant hospitals file separate tax returns and other corporate forms and documents filed with the government.

Plaintiff claims that the hospital defendants are not a single entity, but instead a group of hospitals capable of concerted action to keep plaintiff from competing in the market. Plaintiff offers proof that the group engaged in concerted action in three principal ways: (1) to coerce commercial health insurers that collectively represent at least 70% of the insured consumers in Dayton to refuse to negotiate contracts for managed [5] care with plaintiff and to otherwise deny it access to their networks, thereby depriving plaintiff of the ability to serve a large segment of the Dayton consumer market; (2) by threatening punitive financial consequences to physicians who affiliated with plaintiff, including terminating leases that physicians had with defendant hospitals for office space or terminating or evicting physicians already leasing from defendant facilities, and threatening to withhold referrals; and (3) by compelling physicians, either through threats of punitive measures or through financial incentives, to refuse to admit their patients to plaintiff hospital.

HN2[] The question cannot be answered in the abstract as to whether a joint venture like the one here constitutes a single entity incapable of conspiring with itself in an anticompetitive manner, or whether, instead, it becomes a vehicle to facilitate separate entities to conspire illegally to restrain trade. In American Needle, Inc. v. National Football League, 560 U.S. 183, 203 n.10, 130 S. Ct. 2201, 176 L. Ed. 2d 947 [4] (2010), the Supreme Court relied on Justice Brandeis's multi-factored test in Board of Trade of Chicago v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 38 S. Ct. 242, 62 L. Ed. 683 (1918), to determine whether a joint venture constitutes a "combination" under Section 1:

> The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps [6] thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint is imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

(Emphasis added.)[5] The summary judgment record leaves little doubt on the [*938] question of the intent of the network to prevent plaintiff hospital from entering the Dayton healthcare market. The deposition of the eventual

[5] Our dissenting colleague does not agree that this statement from Justice Brandeis in American Needle is relevant because it discusses facts relating to defendants' [8] intent, history and coercive behavior. The objection is strange because Justice Brandeis's admonition is quoted at length in a case where the issue was whether the defendant was a single entity. Surely if the Supreme Court had thought that Justice Brandeis's factors concerning conduct and intent were irrelevant, it would not have said they were relevant and directed lower courts to consider them. We understand that, at least on paper, the joint venture agreement, written by defendants themselves, aims to legitimate the cartel. But further factual determination is required to resolve whether the neutral words of the agreement belie the true aim of defendants' association. We are tasked with looking at the evidence before us, which includes evidence of defendants' unveiled threats to plaintiff and the words of defendants' employees and agents concerning their views on the nature of the relationship among defendants. See Freeman v. San Diego Ass'n of Realtors, 322 F.3d 1133, 1150 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Defendants sabotage their theory by their own admissions. . . . Rarely do antitrust defendants serve up their own heads on so shiny a silver platter."). Our colleague's refusal to consider anything head of plaintiff hospital contains the following testimony about a phone conversation he had with Thomas Arquilla, Executive Vice President of the Premier group of hospitals, one afternoon before the plaintiff hospital opened:

> The conversation started with him asking [7] me the question, John, I understand that you are an investor in this new Regent Hospital [plaintiff hospital]. And I said yes, Tom, that's true. I also understand that you are the chairman of the board of the hospital. Is that true? I said yes, it's true. He said I want you to know that you are the enemy and that this is war, and you are not going to open this hospital. I replied to him are you going to kick me off of staff at Miami Valley Hospital? And he said John, I'm not going to tell you what we are going to do to you, but [5] there are many things that we can do to you, and we are going to do them. I said Tom, are you going to blow the facility up? And he laughed, and he said I already told you, John, there's lots of things that we can do to you, and we are going to do them. You are not going to open this hospital. He then went on to say that our facility would suck off good paying patients, that we were going to be cherry pickers, and that we would suck off good patients.

Fleishman Dep. at 118:12-119:10 (Oct. 22, 2013).

American Needle sets out the framework we are to follow in deciding the "single entity" versus "concerted activity" question at issue in this appeal. Based on defendants' stated intent to keep plaintiff out of the Dayton market, the evidence of coercive conduct threatening both physicians and insurance companies with financial loss if they did business with plaintiff, evidence of continued actual and self-proclaimed competition among the defendant hospitals, and evidence that the defendant hospitals' business operations are not entirely unitary, we conclude that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the defendant hospitals' network constitutes a single entity or concerted action among competitors for purposes of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

II. Analysis

HN3[] The Sherman Antitrust Act is based on an often-difficult distinction between concerted and independent, unilateral action. Concerted activity is scrutinized [*939] more closely than unilateral behavior because "?[c]oncerted activity inherently is fraught with anticompetitive risk' insofar as it 'deprives the marketplace of independent centers [10] of decisionmaking that competition assumes and demands.'" Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 190 (quoting Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768-69, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984)). Specifically, Section 1 regulates concerted activity between two or more entities, outlawing "[e]very contract, combination . . . or conspiracy, in restraint of trade," 15 U.S.C. § 1, a provision that has subsequently been limited to target only "unreasonable" restraints of trade. HN4[] To prevail on a claim under § 1, a plaintiff must prove: (1) a contract, combination, or conspiracy; (2) producing adverse, anticompetitive effects in the relevant market; and (3) resulting in injury. See [6] Expert Masonry, Inc. v. Boone Cty., Ky., 440 F.3d 336, 342 (6th Cir. 2006). This appeal looks only at the element addressed by the district court, which is the first element: whether defendants' conduct is the result of two or more entities acting in concert or whether defendants, based on their participation in the joint operating agreement, function as a single entity in the market place. Our analysis is guided by HN5[] American Needle, which sets out the standard to apply in distinguishing concerted from unilateral action.

In American Needle, the Court looked at the conduct of members of an incorporated joint venture that organized the 32 NFL teams for purposes of marketing the NFL trademark for apparel. [11] American Needle explained that HN6[] "concerted action under § 1 does not turn simply on whether the parties involved are legally distinct entities." 560 U.S. at 191. Rather, "substance, not form, should determine whether a[n] . . . entity is capable of conspiring under § 1." Id. at 195 (quoting Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 773 n.21). It is not dispositive that defendants organize themselves "under a single umbrella or into a structured joint venture," id. at 196, as defendant hospitals did here. The "key," according to the Court, is whether the "contract, combination . . ., or conspiracy" joins together "independent centers of decisionmaking . . . . If it does, the entities are capable of conspiring under § 1, and the other than the joint venture agreement is tantamount to repealing Section 1 [9] of the Sherman Act by allowing the cartel members themselves to write up the only facts to be considered.

court must decide whether the restraint of trade is an unreasonable and therefore illegal one." Id. (citation omitted). The Court went on to hold that the 32 teams "remain separately controlled, potential competitors with economic interests that are distinct from [National Football League Properties'] financial well-being." Id. at 201 (citing Herbert Hovenkamp, Exclusive Joint Ventures and Antitrust Policy, 1995 Colum. Bus. L.R. 1, 52-61 (1995)). Given this explanation, the Court in American Needle concluded that the joint venture formed by 32 NFL teams, "at least" with regard to their decision collectively [12] to license the teams' independently owned intellectual property, was engaged in concerted rather than single-entity action and thus potentially violated Section 1. The Court reasoned that apart from the teams' agreement to cooperate in exploiting these assets, they would be competitors in the market to produce and sell team-logo apparel and headgear by licensing their intellectual property and dealing with suppliers.

Applying American Needle to examine the relationship among the defendant hospitals pursuant to the joint operating agreement, we come to the same conclusion. Like the joint [7] venture in American Needle, the joint operating agreement brings together "independent centers of decisionmaking" that "remain separately controlled, potential competitors with economic [*940] interests that are distinct" and thus are capable of concerted action. See Nathaniel Grow, American Needle and the Future of the Single Entity Defense under Section One of the Sherman Act, 48 Am. Bus. L.J. 449, 484 (Fall 2011) ("[W]henever the entity is controlled by, or itself controls, competing economic actors, it is engaged in concerted activity rendering single entity status improper."); see also Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 1478a (2010) (The "most significant [13] competitive threats arise when joint venture participants are actual or potential competitors.").

HN7[] The Supreme Court looks beyond labels to recognize underlying collusion among competitors as violations of the Sherman Act. See Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 191 ("[W]e have repeatedly found instances in which members of a legally single entity violated § 1 when the entity was controlled by a group of competitors and served, in essence, as a vehicle for ongoing concerted activity."); accord Timken Roller Bearing Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 593, 594-95, 71 S. Ct. 971, 95 L. Ed. 1199 (1951) (failing to "find any support in reason or authority for the proposition that agreements between legally separate persons and companies to suppress competition among themselves and others can be justified by labeling the project a 'joint venture'"), overruled on other grounds by Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 764-65; United States v. Am. Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106, 187, 31 S. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663 (1911) (where the trust or holding company device brought together previously independent firms to lessen competition and achieve monopoly power, "the combination was in and of itself" is a restraint of trade); see also Federal Trade Comm'n & U.S. Dep't of Justice, Antitrust Guidelines for Collaborations Among Competitors 9 (2000) ("[L]abeling an arrangement a 'joint venture' will not protect what is merely a device to raise price or restrict output . . . .").

HN8[] American Needle directs [14] us to look at a number of factors when determining whether multiple parties joined together in a joint venture are functioning as a single entity for purposes of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. We first look to the actual conduct of the parties to the joint venture: "We have long held that concerted activity does not turn simply on whether the parties involved are legally distinct entities. Instead, we have eschewed formalistic distinctions in favor of a functional consideration of how the parties involved in the alleged anticompetitive conduct [8] actually operate." 560 U.S. at 191 (emphasis added). The Court went on to say that in looking at how the parties actually operate, "we have repeatedly found instances in which members of a legally single entity violated § 1 when the entity was controlled by a group of competitors and served, in essence, as a vehicle for ongoing concerted activity." Id. (citing United States v. Sealy, Inc., 388 U.S. 350, 87 S. Ct. 1847, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1238 (1967) (holding that Sealy was not a single entity, but instead an "instrumentality of the individual" parties)).

The stated intent on the part of the defendants to engage in coercive behavior, as well as conduct providing evidence of that intent, is demonstrated by the conversation recited above between the CEO of plaintiff [15] and the Executive Vice President of Premier, in which the Premier official stated his intention to keep plaintiff from entering the Dayton healthcare market. The record also contains evidence, through letters and emails, that physicians who collaborated with plaintiff in any way lost their leases for office space in properties owned by defendants and were threatened with loss of treating privileges at defendant hospitals.

[*941] Boycott by Health Insurance Companies

Another example of alleged conduct indicating possible anticompetitive intent on the part of defendants arises from evidence that insurance companies were refusing to deal with plaintiff at the behest of defendant hospitals. Defendant hospitals each executed separate managed-care contracts with each insurance company. Plaintiff offered evidence that defendant hospitals each individually executed managed-care contracts with the insurance companies that contained language prohibiting the insurer from also contracting with plaintiff by including an explicit restriction on the insurer's ability to add a new hospital to its network. See, e.g., Email dated Aug. 10, 2009, from Mark Shaw of Premier to Renee Johnson of Premier with subject [16] line referencing "Medical Center at Elizabeth Place" and requesting that Ms. Johnson investigate whether certain insurance companies were violating their contracts with Premier by adding new hospitals to their networks. Access to managed-care contracts offered by insurers is crucial to a hospital's financial success. The managed-care contracts with insurers provide the hospital with the volume (patients who are covered by the insurers) that is necessary to survive. If a hospital cannot contract with a number of insurers, or at least several insurers with large numbers of insureds, it is unlikely to admit enough patients, and it is only through patients that the hospital [9] generates revenue. Hospitals generally seek to become "in-network" or "preferred" providers for a number of insurers, often accepting lower rates from the insurance companies in exchange for a higher volume of patients. In this case, the forming of the joint venture, bringing the defendant hospitals under the umbrella of Premier Health Partners, facilitated negotiation with insurers for managed-care contracts. The Federal Trade Commission and the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department recognize that "collaboration [17] that eliminates or reduces price competition or allows providers to gain increased bargaining leverage with [insurers] raises significant antitrust concerns." Deborah L. Feinstein, Director, Bureau of Competition, Federal Trade Commission, Antitrust Enforcement in Health Care: Proscription, not Prescription, at 2, Address at the Fifth National Accountable Care Organization Summit (June 19, 2014). In this address, Director Feinstein also noted that "management contracts whereby one hospital manages another hospital with which it also competes may raise concerns similar to horizontal acquisitions." Id. at 9.

Negotiating contracts that explicitly exclude the insurers' ability to contract with other parties is anticompetitive on its face and normally serves no proper business function, a fact recognized by the district court in its first order denying the motion to dismiss. *The Med. Ctr. at Elizabeth Place v. Premier Health Partners, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123408, 2012 WL 3776444, at 5 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 30, 2012) ("Organizing a group boycott of [plaintiff] does not promote any legitimate objective of the [joint operating agreement] or achieve any procompetitive benefits."). Plaintiff has submitted evidence that each insurer knew that the other insurers had included this limitation in their contracts, as demonstrated by the excerpt below from a Dayton [18] industry publication:

> Premier has threatened to revoke privileges for physicians participating in [plaintiff hospital] and contracts with health plans such as Anthem and UnitedHealth are known to be contingent on excluding [plaintiff hospital] from the network.

HealthLeaders InterStudy, Dayton Market Overview at 7-8 (Apr. 2008). In addition to this published account, plaintiff also [*942] offered evidence from insurance company emails and defendant hospitals' Board of Directors meetings that, in addition to demonstrating knowledge among the insurers of the restriction on adding new hospitals to their networks in their managed-care contracts with defendant hospitals, the insurance companies regularly monitored each other to [10] ensure that the other insurance companies were complying with the contract restriction on dealing with a new hospital.

The Joint Operating Agreement

HN9[] American Needle also looked to other factors in addition to actual conduct, examining the nature of the business relationship among defendants, focusing on whether that relationship remains that of separate, competing entities or whether there is a single center of decisionmaking. As noted above, Premier owns no assets and it does not provide any healthcare services. Like the joint venture under [19] scrutiny in American Needle, Premier is a separate corporate entity with its own management structure, including a CEO and a Board of Directors, some of whom are employees of the individual defendant hospitals. The joint operating agreement provides for certain management functions to be carried out by Premier on behalf of the defendant hospitals. Premier's duties under the joint operating agreement are an attempt to achieve efficiencies in billing and collecting payments, managing physicians and physician groups, property management and other similar duties. HN10[] American Needle emphasized that it is not dispositive that the parties to the joint venture have organized and created a legally separate entity that centralizes certain management functions. The Court stated that an "ongoing § 1 violation cannot evade § 1 scrutiny simply by giving the ongoing violation a name and label. 'Perhaps every agreement and combination in restraint of trade could be so labeled.'" Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 197 (quoting Timken Roller Bearing, 341 U.S. at 598). The joint operating agreement provides for some degree of unitary management, but questions remain as to whether "their general corporate actions are guided or determined by separate corporate consciousnesses." Id. at 196 (quotation [20] marks and citations omitted).

The Premier joint operating agreement also provides for sharing revenue pursuant to an agreed upon formula. But, if the fact that potential competitors shared in profits or losses from a venture meant that the venture was immune from § 1, then any cartel "could evade the antitrust laws simply by creating a 'joint venture' to serve as the exclusive seller of their competing products." Major League Baseball Props., Inc. v. Salvino, Inc., 542 F.3d 290, 335 (2d Cir. 2008) (Sotomayor, J., concurring in judgment). Indeed, a joint venture with a single management structure is generally a better way to operate a cartel because it decreases the risk that a party to [11] an illegal agreement will defect from that agreement. But, HN11[] competitors "cannot simply get around" antitrust liability by acting "through a third-party intermediary or joint venture." Am Needle, 560 U.S. at 201 (internal quotations omitted).

Although joining together to carry out certain functions, defendant hospitals remain separate legal entities, each with their own assets, filing their own tax returns and maintaining a separate corporate identity with its own CEO and Board of Directors. The record also demonstrates that defendant hospitals compete with each other for physicians and patients, with each defendant [21] hospital continuing to market certain hospital services to the public. Each of the defendant hospitals [*943] makes material independent decisions concerning their respective medical operations that are not managed by Premier, including staffing decisions and medical strategies concerning patient care.

Like the NFL teams in American Needle, each defendant hospital holds its own assets. Thus, the defendant hospitals only "partially" unite their economic interests, and they continue to have distinct, potentially competing interests. See Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 198. HN12[] Any joint venture involves multiple sources of economic power cooperating to produce a product or provide a service. The benefits of cooperation do not transform concerted action into unilateral action that puts the joint venture beyond the reach of § 1. As the Court noted, "Apart from their agreement to cooperate in exploiting those assets, . . . there would be nothing to prevent each of those teams from making its own market decisions . . . ." Id. at 200. Here, the defendant hospitals clearly did not completely align their interests, economic or otherwise. The defendant hospitals continue to function more or less as independent and competing hospitals that entered into [22] the joint operating agreement largely to derive the benefit of conforming certain business practices to a uniform standard. The evidence shows that the joint venture under Premier's management is composed of individual hospitals that are separately incorporated, hold their assets separately, and compete with each other for patients. Like the NFL teams, each defendant hospital "is a substantial, independently owned" business that is "guided [by a] 'separate corporate consciousness[ ].'" Id. at 196 (quoting Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 771).

[*12] Defendant Hospitals Continue to Compete

The record also provides evidence that defendant hospitals continue to view themselves not as a single entity, but as competitors in the market. Defendants made statements to the public, among themselves and to a consultant hired by Premier, that demonstrate that they view themselves as separate entities. In 2010, Premier retained H*Works Consulting to help it devise a strategic five-year plan (2010-2015). One aspect of the study was to analyze the role of Premier and its relationship to its constituent elements, the defendant hospitals. As part of the process, 44 of defendants' "executives and key stakeholders" were interviewed by H*Works on a number [23] of topics, including the integration of defendant hospitals. Pearce Fleming of H*Works conducted all of the interviews of defendants' executives, including Premier's Board of Trustees, the top level executives at Premier, and senior management from all the defendant hospitals. Fleming took contemporaneous notes of each interview, generating 11 sets of handwritten notes.

Based on these statements by defendants' top administrators, H*Works made a number of findings, including the following: "[Premier] partners do not collaborate or act as a system today, more often [Premier] partners find themselves competing with each other;" "[Premier] does not have an identity as a collaborative group, rather act as a confederacy that collaborates in a few areas (i.e., supplies, financing/access to capital, electronic medical records);" "[Premier] does not think of itself as integrated organization;" and "[Premier] Partners compete with each other for market share." H*Works Consulting, Key Interview Findings, at 8 (Apr. 2010). Specific statements from the interviews include: Premier is a "confederation of autonomous organizations" that cooperate in certain areas; "[t]he brand is the hospital, not [Premier];" defendant hospitals [*944] "do their own thing and act in their [24] own self interest above that of [Premier];" and the joint venture structure was "designed to keep everyone separate." H*Works Consulting Interview Statements at 2-5 (Apr. 2010). The H*Works findings and interview statements set forth in its reports to Premier provide evidence that defendant hospitals uniformly agree that the they are driven to pursue individual hospital goals even after entering into the joint venture.

The district court refused to consider most of this compelling evidence, labeling it inadmissible hearsay. In refusing to consider the findings from H*Works, the district court [13] found the statements "incomplete, anonymous personal opinions . . . . lack[ing] any context," ruling them "inadmissible, anonymous hearsay and speculation . . . ." *The Med. Ctr. at Elizabeth Place v. Premier Health Partners, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 169186, 2014 WL 7739356, at 4 (S.D. Ohio Oct. 20, 2014). To the contrary, many of the statements were attributable to a particular person. But, whether a specific identity is given or not, it was error to exclude these statements as they are admissions of a partyopponent, admissible under the hearsay exception in Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2).[6] HN13[] An anonymous statement may be admissible under Rule 801(d)(2) in certain circumstances that demonstrate sufficient indicia of reliability as to the authenticity of the statement. Davis v. Mobil Oil Expl. & Prod. Se., Inc., 864 F.2d 1171, 1174 (5th Cir. 1989) (holding that anonymous [25] statement was admissible as a statement by a party's agent under Rule 801(d)(2)(D), and noting that "a district court should be presented with sufficient evidence to conclude that the person who is alleged to have made the damaging statement is in fact a party or an agent of that party . . . .").

The statements fall within the hearsay exception for admissions of party opponents under Rule 801(d)(2)(D) because the district court was presented with "sufficient evidence" to conclude that the person who made the statement is in fact "a party or an agent" of defendants. It is [26] undisputed that the speakers, though some are unidentified by name or specific title, were all executives or "key" stakeholders of defendant hospitals. The statements were made in the scope of their employment relationship and during the existence of the joint venture. They acted within the scope of their employment in stating their views on the state of their operations and

[6] The Rule states in relevant part:

(d) Statements That Are Not Hearsay. A statement that meets the following conditions is not hearsay:

HN14[] (2) An Opposing Party's Statement. The statement is offered against an opposing party and:

(A) was made by the party in an individual or representative capacity;

(B) is one the party manifested that it adopted or believed to be true;

(C) was made by a person whom the party authorized to make a statement on the subject;

(D) was made by the party's agent or employee on a matter within the scope of that relationship and while it existed; or

(E) was made by the party's coconspirator during and in furtherance of the conspiracy integration of those operations at the request of Premier's CEO. Thus, the sources of the [14] statements are identified sufficiently to establish that they were made by agents of defendants acting within the scope of and during the existence of their employment relationship. See Ryder v. Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 128 F.3d 128, 134 (3d Cir. 1997) (holding in a similar situation that statements from unidentified executives [*945] were admissible because evidence established that though their precise identity was unknown, they were all "Westinghouse executives who had authority to make personnel decisions [and thus were] act[ing] within the scope of their employment in stating their views on the state of their workforce . . . ."). HN15[] The crucial question is whether there is evidence that the unidentified declarants were speaking on a matter within the scope of their employment, not their identity. Back v. Nestlé USA, Inc., 694 F.3d 571, 578 (6th Cir. 2012).

[27] III. Conclusion

The gravamen of plaintiff's complaint is that in creating a joint venture, defendants colluded to keep plaintiff from competing in the Dayton hospital market through a number of avenues. The evidence of emails, letters, and the statements elicited by the consultant, together with the lack of shared assets by the defendants, raises a genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant hospitals have "separate" corporate consciences or whether they should be considered a single entity for purposes of the antitrust laws. All of these facts suggest that defendant hospitals are actually competitors attempting to eliminate another competitor through concerted action. When viewing the record in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable juror might conclude that, aside from a business relationship pursuant to the joint operating agreement, defendant hospitals maintained separate identities and acted more like competitors than one unit. Expert Masonry, Inc. v. Boone Cty., Ky., 440 F.3d 336, 341 (6th Cir. 2006) ("In this circuit, courts are generally reluctant to use summary judgment dispositions in antitrust actions due to the critical 'role that intent and motive have in antitrust claims and the difficulty of proving conspiracy by means [28] other than factual inference.'")(quoting Smith v. Northern Mich. Hosps., 703 F.2d 942, 947 (6th Cir. 1983)).

Because plaintiff presented evidence of conduct and business operations that raise the possibility of concerted action among defendant hospitals, the question remains upon remand [15] whether hospitals that had previously pursued their own interests separately, and that continue to seem to compete, combined unlawfully to restrain competition.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Dissent by: GRIFFIN

Dissent

[*16] GRIFFIN, Circuit Judge, dissenting. To succeed on a § 1 claim under the Sherman Antitrust Act, a plaintiff must establish that the defendants: "(1) participated in an agreement that (2) unreasonably restrained trade in the relevant market." Worldwide Basketball and Sport Tours, Inc. v. NCAA, 388 F.3d 955, 959 (6th Cir. 2004). Because § 1 "does not reach conduct that is wholly unilateral," Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984) (internal quotation marks omitted), proving the first element involves a threshold showing that the defendants are separate entities capable of concerted action. That is the only question before us: "whether defendants . . . should be characterized as a single entity." (Majority opinion.)

The test we apply to determine single-entity status is from American [29] Needle and Copperweld: whether the defendants are "separate economic actors pursuing separate economic interests," such that their agreement "'deprives the marketplace of independent centers of decisionmaking,' . . . and thus of actual or potential competition." Am. Needle, Inc. v. Nat'l Football [*946] League, 560 U.S. 183, 195, 130 S. Ct. 2201, 176 L. Ed. 2d 947 (2010) (quoting Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 769).

My colleagues begin not with American Needle and Copperweld, but with the "rule of reason" as articulated in Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 38 S. Ct. 242, 62 L. Ed. 683 (1918)—a test that may come into play only for the second part of the inquiry—i.e., in determining whether the agreement itself constitutes an "unreasonable restraint" on trade. See Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 203 ("[T]he restraint must be judged according to the flexible Rule of Reason.") (footnote omitted); see also Worldwide Basketball, 388 F.3d at 959 ("Whether an agreement unreasonably restrains trade is determined under one of two approaches: the per se rule and the rule of reason.").[1] Reaching this issue is premature. Because of its ruling that defendants are a single entity for § 1 purposes, the district court never considered whether defendants "participated in [any] agreement," much less an agreement to restrain trade unreasonably.

[*17] The majority's misapplication of American Needle is problematic. Invoking the rule of reason steers focus to defendants' intent to avoid competition with plaintiff and away from the relevant question: whether, under the terms of their Joint Operating Agreement (JOA), defendant hospitals and their joint operating company, Premier Health Partners (Premier), share "a complete unity of interest," Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 771, and represent a single center of decisionmaking. I conclude they do. Thus, I would affirm summary judgment in favor of defendants and respectfully dissent.

I.

"The Sherman Act contains a 'basic distinction between concerted and independent action.'" Id. at 767 (quoting Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984)). Section 2 of the Act governs conduct by a single firm that "threatens actual monopolization," while § 1 reaches "unreasonable restraints of trade effected by a 'contract, combination or . . . conspiracy' between separate entities." Id. at 767-68 (quoting 15 U.S.C. § 1). Concerted activity between two parties is "inherently . . . fraught with anticompetitive risk." Id. at 768-69. "In any conspiracy, two or more entities that previously pursued their own interests separately are combining to act as one for their common benefit." Id. at 769. As a result, [31] the conspirators profit from increased economic power, while depriving the market "of the independent centers of decisionmaking that competition assumes and demands." Id.

That concern does not apply, however, when the actors share "a complete unity of interest," such as when the coordinated conduct occurs between officers and employees of the same company, or a corporation and one of its unincorporated divisions. Id. at 769-71. "[O]fficers of a single firm are not separate economic actors pursuing separate economic interests, so agreements among them do not suddenly bring together economic power that was previously pursuing divergent goals." Id. at 769. Following this reasoning in Copperweld, the Supreme Court held that the coordinated activity of a parent corporation [*947] and its wholly owned subsidiary "must be viewed as that of a single enterprise for purposes of § 1 of the Sherman Act." Id. at 771.

[*18] Although Copperweld limited its inquiry to the context of parent and wholly owned subsidiary corporations, see id. at 767, the Court emphasized "the broader principle that substance, not form, should determine whether a separately incorporated entity is capable of conspiring under § 1." Id. at 773 n.21. Whether two legally separate entities constitute a single actor [32] depends upon commonality of interest, not corporate formality. Thus, "although a parent corporation and its wholly owned subsidiary are 'separate' for the purposes of incorporation or formal title, they are controlled by a single center of decisionmaking and they control a single aggregation of economic power. Joint conduct by two such entities does not 'depriv[e] the marketplace of independent centers of decisionmaking.'" Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 194 (quoting Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 769).

The Supreme Court reiterated the substance-over-form analysis in American Needle, which involved an antitrust claim against National Football League Properties (NFLP), an organization formed by the 32 teams in the National Football League (NFL), "to develop, license, and market [each team's] intellectual property." 560 U.S. at 187. Traditionally, NFLP granted nonexclusive licenses to vendors, including American Needle, to manufacture and sell clothing bearing NFL team insignias. Id. In 2000, however, NFLP granted Reebok an exclusive license to sell trademarked headwear for all 32 teams. Id. American Needle sued, claiming the NFL, its teams, the NFLP, and Reebok violated §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Id. at 187-88. Defendants NFL and NFLP asserted they were incapable of conspiring with each other [33] "because they are a single economic enterprise, at least with respect to the conduct challenged." Id. at 188. The district court agreed and granted defendants' motion for summary judgment. The Seventh Circuit affirmed, noting the teams "can function only as one source of economic power when collectively producing NFL football." Id.

[1] Citing the rule of reason seems all the more misplaced here, where plaintiff alleges that defendants' conduct constitutes a per se violation of § 1, not [30] a violation under the "flexible Rule of Reason." Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 203.

The Supreme Court reversed. Explaining the single-entity inquiry, the Court stated:

> [T]he question is not whether the defendant is a legally single entity or has a single name; nor is the question whether the parties involved "seem" like one firm or multiple firms in any metaphysical sense. The key is whether the alleged "contract, combination . . . or conspiracy" is concerted action—that is, whether it joins together separate decisionmakers. The relevant inquiry, therefore, is whether there is a "contract, combination . . . or conspiracy" amongst "separate economic actors pursuing separate economic interests" . . . such that the [19] agreement "deprives the marketplace of independent centers of decisionmaking," and therefore of "diversity of entrepreneurial interests," and thus of actual or potential competition.

Id. at 195 (citations omitted).

Applying this test, the Court ruled the independently [34] owned NFL teams were capable of conspiring with one another. Though "partially unite[d]" by the fact that they all benefit from the success of the NFL brand, each team "still ha[d] distinct, potentially competing interests." Id. at 198. Teams compete with one another on the field for fans, for contracts with managerial and player personnel, [*948] and "in the market for intellectual property." Id. at 196-97. A team licensing its intellectual property "is not pursuing the common interests of the whole league but is instead pursuing interests of [the] 'corporation itself,'. . . teams are acting as 'separate economic actors pursuing separate economic interests,' and each team therefore is a potential 'independent cente[r] of decisionmaking.'" Id. at 197 (quoting Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 770) (citation omitted). The fact that the teams had formed the NFLP to market their brands through a single outlet was not dispositive. "An ongoing § 1 violation cannot evade § 1 simply by giving the ongoing violation a name and a label." Id.

Whether the NFLP's decisions constituted concerted action was a closer question. "This is so both because NFLP is a separate corporation with its own management and because the record indicates that most of the revenues generated by NFLP are shared by the teams [35] on an equal basis." Id. at 200. Nevertheless, because each team acted for its own separate interest in making NFLP decisions, the Court held that those decisions fell within the reach of § 1. Id. "Thirty-two teams operating independently through the vehicle of the NFLP are not like the components of a single firm that act to maximize the firm's profits." Id. at 201. Instead, each team garnered economic benefits "separate and apart from NFLP profits as a result of the decisions they make for the NFLP." Id. Accordingly, because each team was acting for its own interest, and not simply the interest of the NFLP as a whole, "decisions by the NFLP regarding the teams' separately owned intellectual property constitute[d] concerted action." Id.

[*20] II.

As the majority states, American Needle "eschewed formalistic distinctions in favor of a functional consideration of how the parties involved in the alleged anticompetitive conduct actually operate." Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 191. Guided by the rule of reason, my colleagues interpret this directive to mean that we should ask how defendants "actually operate" with regard to plaintiff—specifically, their intent to keep plaintiff out of the market as expressed through apparent threats by Premier's executives and [36] the boycott defendants allegedly arranged among the insurance companies. This view is flawed. Defendants' intent to exclude others from the market is irrelevant to determining whether defendants themselves constitute a single entity. To resolve that question, we should consider how defendants "actually operate" amongst each other.

American Needle asks if "the [anticompetitive] agreement joins together independent centers of decisionmaking" between the defendant entities. 560 U.S. at 196 (internal quotation marks omitted). Defendant hospitals were independent centers of decisionmaking before forming Premier as their joint operating company, but the question here is whether that independence survived the creation of the joint venture; whether, when acting through Premier, defendants are "pursuing the common interests of the whole," or whether each defendant has a remaining, independent economic interest, such that it could be "pursuing the interests of [the] corporation itself," even in the course of taking joint action. Id. at 197 (internal quotation marks omitted). What matters then is whether defendants remain in competition with each other, not whether they intend to ward off competition with a third party. [37] The Supreme Court's reasoning makes this point plain:

> [*949] Agreements made within a firm can constitute concerted action covered by § 1 when the parties to the agreement act on interests separate from those of the firm itself . . . .
> For that reason, decisions by the NFLP regarding the teams' separately owned intellectual property constitute concerted action. Thirty-two teams operating independently through the vehicle of the NFLP are not like components of a single firm that act to maximize the firm's profits. The teams remain separately controlled, potential competitors with economic interests that are distinct from NFLP's financial well-being. Unlike typical decisions by corporate shareholders, NFLP licensing decisions effectively require the assent of more than a mere [21] majority of shareholders. And each team's decision reflects not only an interest in NFLP's profits but also an interest in the team's individual profits.

Id. at 200-01 (citations and footnotes omitted). Defendants' wish to avoid competing with plaintiff tells us nothing about whether defendant hospitals are themselves "potential competitors with economic interests that are distinct from [Premier's] financial well-being" as a whole.

III.

[38] The best evidence of how Premier and the defendant hospitals "actually operate" is the parties' JOA. The majority concedes that the JOA vests Premier with control over the hospitals' "management functions," but insists—without discussion of the agreement's terms—that "questions remain" as to whether defendants are guided by a single corporate consciousness. Review of the JOA should resolve those questions. From the outset, the JOA identifies corporate unification as an overarching goal: "The vision of the Parties is to create and operate the JOC [joint operating company] Network as a multi-entity, integrated health care delivery system for the Miami Valley Region that is positioned for the future and not simply a continuation of the large JOC Hospitals."

Executing on that vision, the agreement creates a "unity of interest" among defendant hospitals by establishing a system of shared income:

- The JOA provides that its financial arrangements are intended to promote the functioning of Premier and defendant hospitals as an "integrated health system."
- Defendants' net incomes are totaled each year into a single "network net income," to be allocated to the parties based on predetermined percentages [39] in the JOA.
- Defendants also share losses according to the same predetermined percentages.

Most importantly, the allocation of network net income is not linked to any individual hospital's revenue or profitability. For example, defendant MedAmerica Health Systems is entitled to 55.35% of the network net income under the JOA. Because defendants' revenues are combined in totaling the network net income, MedAmerica receives 55.35% of the profit earned from a patient regardless of whether that patient is treated at Atrium Health System, Samaritan Health [22] Partners, Catholic Health Initiatives, UVMC, or MedAmerica's own facility. Unlike the NFL teams in American Needle, who maintained "economic interests . . . distinct from NFLP's financial well-being," 560 U.S. at 201, no single hospital has any incentive to become more profitable by attracting more patients than the [*950] other.[2] The majority is therefore incorrect to say "defendant hospitals compete with each other for . . . patients." They do not.

To be sure, revenue sharing is not dispositive of single-entity status. Competitors cannot side-step antitrust liability merely by sharing revenue through a joint venture. "If the fact that potential competitors shared in profits or losses from a venture meant that the venture was immune from § 1, then any cartel 'could evade the antitrust law simply by creating a "joint venture" to serve as the exclusive seller of their competing products.'" Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 201 (quoting Major League Baseball Props., Inc. v. Salvino, Inc., 542 F.3d 290, 335 (2d Cir. 2008) (Sotomayor, J., concurring in judgment)).

But defendants' integration is not limited to profits and losses on a balance sheet. The JOA grants Premier significant operational authority over each defendant hospital. In particular:

- It designates Premier as the "operator" for all health system activities and requires Premier to coordinate and have authority over all of those activities. Premier has general authority to operate and manage the operations of the health system activities of all defendants.
- Defendant hospitals' CEOs report to Premier's COO.
- Each defendant's management reports to Premier's executives, and Premier's system vice presidents and senior vice presidents serve at the top of each department throughout the system.
- Premier [41] has integrated a number of system management functions among defendant hospitals, such as managed care and legal functions, into single departments for the entire system.
- The JOA grants Premier authority and control over defendants' strategic plans, budgets, and business plans.
- The JOA requires Premier to develop and oversee the implementation of a strategic plan for all system activities, and each defendant must comply with and implement the strategic plan.
- [23] It also requires Premier to develop annual capital expenditure and operating budgets for the system, and each defendant must adopt and implement the budget approved for it by Premier.
- Premier's CEO has the power to remove each defendant hospital's CEO.
- Premier controls defendant hospitals' material debt incurrence and negotiates and manages their relationships with insurance companies.

Although each defendant hospital retains its separate corporate existence, along with the right to amend or repeal their corporate governing documents, the JOA requires them to "take all corporate action . . . as required to implement" Premier's authority. Defendants are also prohibited from modifying corporate documents in a manner inconsistent [42] with the JOA without prior approval. To the extent defendant hospitals' corporate documents conflict with the JOA, the JOA controls.

The majority's reply that "defendant hospitals remain separate legal entities . . . [each] filing their own tax returns and maintaining a separate corporate identity with its own CEO and Board of Directors" is beside the point. Finding an issue of fact on these grounds elevates form over substance. "[T]he question is not whether [*951] the defendant is a legally single entity or has a single name"; rather, the question is one of functional reality. Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 195. And the functional reality is that the JOA unifies defendant hospitals under Premier's flagship.

That reality is not changed by the fact that the hospitals maintain individually-owned assets. Neither American Needle, nor Copperweld, discusses the role of asset ownership as part of the single-entity inquiry. Yet the majority makes a point of quoting the single mention of "assets" in American Needle: "NFLP's licensing decisions are made by the 32 potential competitors, and each of them actually owns its share of the jointly managed assets. Apart from their agreement to cooperate in exploiting those assets, including their [43] decisions as the NFLP, there would be nothing to prevent each of the teams from making its own market decisions relating to purchases of apparel and

[2] Additionally, defendants' counsel represented at oral argument that Premier sets prices for all hospital services performed by physician-employees, ensuring that each hospital charges the same price for the same service. [40]

headwear, to the sale of such items, and to the granting of licenses to use its trademarks." Id. at 200 (citation omitted).

This language does not establish that asset ownership is important to the single-entity inquiry. Viewed in context, the Court's mention of assets is merely a reiteration of its primary [24] holding; "there would be nothing to prevent each of the [NFL] teams from making its own market decisions" because they remained independent centers of decisionmaking capable of acting on separate economic interests—even while making joint decisions through the NFLP:

> The 32 teams capture individual economic benefits separate and apart from NFLP profits as a result of the decisions they make for the NFLP. NFLP's decisions thus affect each team's profits from licensing its own intellectual property. "Although the business interests of" the teams "will often coincide with those of the" NFLP "as an entity in itself, that commonality of interest exists in every cartel." In making the relevant licensing decisions, NFLP is therefore "an instrumentality" [44] of the teams.

Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 201 (citations omitted). Here, by contrast, defendant hospitals are not capable of acting on separate economic interests. All of their profits are shared as part of the network net income. They do not "capture individual economic benefits separate and apart from" that income. Id. Individual ownership of assets carries little weight when all the economic benefit of those assets is mutually shared. Defendant hospitals are also distinguishable from the teams in American Needle by virtue of their decision to cede substantial operational control over to Premier. Consequently, there is something to prevent them from making "[their] own market decisions" wholly "[a]part from their agreement to cooperate in exploiting [their individually-owned] assets." Id. at 200.

To the extent that asset ownership matters, it must be evaluated as part of American Needle's "functional analysis," id. at 192, which in this case directs us back to the JOA. The JOA grants Premier substantial control over the defendant hospitals' individually-owned assets—a fact the majority does not address. Defendant hospitals are prohibited from "sell[ing], convey[ing], transfer[ring], or otherwise dispos[ing] of any material asset used in JOC Activities" to any entity other than a fellow [45] defendant hospital without Premier's prior approval. Further:

- It gives Premier authority to use any of defendant hospitals' resources, facilities, or supplies for the system's activities.

- [*952] Plaintiff cited no evidence to dispute defendants' claim that Premier has, in fact, consolidated programs, moved equipment between facilities, and limited procedures occurring in certain facilities.

- [25] The JOA also authorizes Premier to assess costs to the hospitals for implementation of new technologies and programs—including building, equipment acquisition, and training costs—and Premier exercises that authority.

Functionally, defendant hospitals own their assets in name only, without deriving any individual benefit from those assets. Defendants' inability to manage their own assets should therefore serve as another marker of Premier's centralized control—not a fact that brings their corporate unification into question.

IV.

In addition to defendants' anticompetitive intent, and individually-owned assets, the majority finds that the anonymous H*Works statements are evidence "that defendant hospitals continue to view themselves . . . as competitors in the market." I disagree.

Setting aside the question [46] of admissibility, this evidence does not create a genuine issue of material fact. "When the moving party has carried its burden . . . , its opponent must do more than simply show there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986) (footnote and citation omitted). While we may reasonably infer that the issue of economic integration was within the scope of employment for some of the 44 "executives and key stakeholders" involved in the H*Works project, the circumstances surrounding the statements do not prove that the statements are related to that issue.

The purpose of the H*Works project was to help Premier "devise a strategic five-year plan," and "analyze the role of Premier and its relationship to . . . defendant hospitals." (Majority opinion.) According to plaintiff, defendants "hoped to . . . improve strategic integration, coordination, systems thinking and market leverage"—goals that involve more than just economic integration. The variety of topics addressed in the H*Works statements confirms as much; they include thoughts on creating a more "patient centered approach," Premier's need to "expand to other communities," and complaints from doctors that Premier "must answer [47] the 'what's in it for me' question for physicians and prove it to them."

[*26] The JOA establishes "control[] by a single center of decisionmaking [i.e., Premier]," as well as "a single aggregation of economic power." Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 194. Defendants have therefore carried their burden to establish an overall unity of interest. Plaintiff has not rebutted the factual basis for defendants' motion. Considered in context, the H*Works statements cast no more than a "metaphysical doubt" upon that unity. Thus, "the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for the non-moving party," and "there is no genuine issue for trial." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 587 (internal quotation marks omitted).

V.

Defendants' alleged conduct in this case, if proven at trial, is indeed anticompetitive. But the Sherman Act does not proscribe unreasonable restraints on trade by a single entity; "it leaves untouched a single firm's anticompetitive conduct (short of threatened monopolization) that may be indistinguishable in economic effect from the conduct of two firms subject to § 1 [*953] liability." Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 775. "Congress left this 'gap'" purposefully, "for eminently sound reasons." Id. A prohibition against independent action "that merely restrains trade . [48] . . could deter perfectly competitive conduct by firms that are fearful of litigation costs and judicial error." Am. Needle, 560 U.S. at 190 n.2. Regardless of their intent to keep plaintiff out of the market, defendants have demonstrated a complete unity of interest and a single center of decisionmaking. "Unless we second-guess the judgment of Congress to limit § 1 to concerted conduct," Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 776, we are without authority to check them.

For these reasons, I respectfully dissent. I would affirm the judgment of the district court.

39 U.S.C.S. § 3642(b)(1), the governing statute's definition of a market-dominant product, includes all products meeting the following description: Each product in the sale of which the U.S. Postal Service exercises sufficient market power that it can effectively set the price of such product substantially above costs, raise prices significantly, decrease quality, or decrease output, without risk of losing significant levels of business to other firms offering similar products.

A statutory price cap, indexed to inflation, is meant to assure that the U.S. Postal Service does not abuse a dominant position. This is not unlike rate regulation for other state-granted monopolies. The language of 39 U.S.C.S. § 3642 has been consistently taken to reflect basic antitrust concerns with market power.

In the context of 39 U.S.C.S. § 3642(b)(1), market power analysis need account for only potential substitutes that constrain pricing in the reasonably foreseeable future.

Counsel: David C. Belt, Attorney, U.S. Postal Service, argued the cause and filed the briefs for petitioner. Stephan J. Boardman, Chief Counsel, entered an appearance.

Henry C. Whitaker, Attorney, U.S. Department of Justice, argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief were Benjamin C. Mizer, Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Michael S. Raab, Attorney, David A. Trissell, General Counsel, Postal Regulatory Commission, Christopher J. Laver and Anne J. Siarnacki, Deputy General Counsels, and Richard A. Oliver, Attorney.

Joy M. Leong, David M. Levy, and John F. Cooney were on the brief for intervenors GameFly, Inc. and Netflix, Inc. in support of respondent. Matthew D. Field entered an appearance.

Opinion

[*884] [487] SILBERMAN, Senior Circuit Judge: The Postal Service offers a host of different products for consumers and businesses. HN1[] By statute, the Postal Service's products are divided into "competitive" products, which are subject to a statutory price floor, and "market-dominant" [2] products, which are subject to a statutory price ceiling. In this case, the Postal Service applied to the Postal Regulatory Commission to have one of the Service's products, the "round-trip mailer," used in the DVD-by-mail industry, classified as competitive rather than market-dominant. The Commission denied the request, and the Postal Service petitioned for review. We deny the petition.

I.

The round-trip mailer is a product used by intervenors Netflix and GameFly whereby customers receive a DVD disc by mail that they can return with an enclosed envelope. Netflix, a provider of movies, is the dominant purchaser of this product, with nearly 97 percent of purchases.[1] It is provided only by the Postal Service; Fed Ex and UPS do not offer anything similar. Customers, to be sure, can also rent DVDs at various physical locations, such as storefronts and kiosks, but these alternatives are declining. Movies can also be delivered to customers through streaming directly to televisions or computers, and that is a booming market in which Netflix, which also offers streaming, meets a number of direct competitors.

Netflix customers are, in huge numbers, leaving the [3] DVD-by-mail service. After peaking in 2010, DVD-by-mail declined 14 percent, and then another 41, 21, and 22 percent, year over year. Meanwhile, streaming service continues to expand, growing 26, 25, and 19 percent, year over year, from 2012 to 2014. Nevertheless, a significant core continues to use the round-trip mailer service, in part because the content available through the round-trip mailer is more extensive than that available through streaming and, in part, for difficulties in reception with streaming. Indeed, nearly two-thirds of all DVD-by-mail customers also subscribe to streaming. Importantly, although the round-trip mailer is a declining product, it remains quite profitable to Netflix, with a profit margin of nearly 50 percent. That makes it considerably more profitable than streaming.

In 2013, the Postal Service formally requested that the Commission remove the round-trip mailer from the market-dominant list, where it is subject to a statutory price ceiling, and place it on the competitive product list, where it would be subject to only a statutory price floor. The request was opposed by intervenors Netflix and GameFly, as well as by a Commission-appointed public representative. [4] HN2[] Market-dominant products obviously include those that are an actual monopoly, but the governing statute describes market-dominant products more broadly as those "in the sale of which the Postal Service exercises sufficient market power." See 39 U.S.C. §3621-3634.

As noted, the Commission denied the request. Applying antitrust concepts, it defined the relevant market as the physical delivery of DVDs by mail, and ruled that the Postal Service, as the only entity producing the round-trip mailer, exercised sufficient power within that market to justify a market-dominant classification.

II.

HN3[] Section 39 U.S.C. § 3642(b)(1), the governing statute's definition of a market-dominant [*885] [488] product, includes all products meeting the following description:

> [E]ach product in the sale of which the Postal Service exercises sufficient market power that it can effectively set the price of such product substantially above costs, raise prices significantly, decrease quality, or decrease output, without risk of losing significant levels of business to other firms offering similar products. (emphasis added)

It would seem that a permissible reading of the statute would foreclose the Postal Service's position because arguably there really are no products in the marketplace [5] "similar" to the round-trip mailer. But the Commission does not rely on that interpretation of the language. Instead, the Commission and all parties agree that the statute should be read as incorporating general concepts of federal antitrust law.[2]

[2] HN4[] A statutory price cap, indexed to inflation, is meant to assure that the Postal Service does not abuse a dominant position, see U.S. Postal Serv. v. Postal Regulatory Comm'n, 785 F.3d 740, 744, 415 U.S. App. D.C. 141 (D.C. Cir. 2015). This

In that regard, the Postal Service contends that the Commission erred in its definition of the market. First, it made too much of the difference between DVD-by-mail and streaming services, whereas antitrust law has traditionally recognized that even differentiated products, provided they are reasonable substitutes for one another, may be included in the same market. In this case, the precipitous drop in DVD-by-mail customers, which has attended the concurrent rise in streaming services, strongly suggests, argues the Postal Service, that a substantial substitution is taking place, at the consumer level, between the two forms of delivery. That substitution [6] is an indication that whatever the differences between DVD-by-mail and streaming, customers see them as similar enough that they ought be considered in the same market. And as DVD-by-mail service is in the same market as streaming services downstream, the Service argues that streaming services have the effect of disciplining the price the Postal Service can charge for DVD-by-mail service upstream, thus mitigating any market power.

Secondly, the Postal Service argues that the Commission relied too heavily on the "core" group of DVD-by-mail consumers who do not use streaming services. While any product will have core consumers who refuse to switch products even in the face of price increases, the Commission, we are told, overemphasized their numbers or loyalty. This misconception led to an unduly narrow definition of the downstream market, failing to take account of the constraints faced by the Postal Service upstream in setting its price for the round-trip mailer.

In the alternative, the Postal Service offers two arguments apart from market definition. Even if the definition of the relevant market was not unreasonable, the Commission still failed to consider that Netflix, as a near-monopsonist [7] in purchasing the round-trip mailer upstream, can exercise strong countervailing buyer power. As such, it would limit the Postal Service's pricing discretion. And the Commission did not consider that the market, defined as either DVD-by-mail or distribution of content generally, is in a constant state of technological evolution. Such change provides an intrinsic limitation on the exercise of market power.

The Commission's arguments dovetail with its considerations set forth in its order. In defending its definition of the relevant market as limited to DVD-by-mail, [*886] [489] the Commission emphasizes evidence that DVD-by-mail provides a different range of material, and services a different base of consumers, than streaming and other distribution channels. Regarding substitutability, it is noteworthy that many customers subscribe to both DVD-by-mail and streaming services. It further disputes the Postal Service's assertion that the simultaneous decline in DVD-by-mail subscriptions and increase in streaming subscriptions suggests a high enough substitutability to justify a unified market, because the shift toward streaming may have nothing to do with price sensitivity of DVD-by-mail customers; it [8] may just as well result from broader market trends unrelated to price-based substitution.

The Commission stresses that the Postal Service bore the burden in the present case. It was obliged to present evidence demonstrating that, despite the fact that the Postal Service is the only entity providing the round-trip mailer for DVD-by-mail services, it nevertheless lacked market power. That evidence, particularly in the form of price elasticity data, was lacking. Thus, the Commission argues it was reasonable to conclude that the Postal Service did not meet its burden.

Finally, the Commission contends that even if there is downstream competition between delivery by mail and delivery by other means (such as streaming and kiosks), the Postal Service still failed to show that it would not be in a position to simply capture more of Neflix and GameFly's profits upstream. Even if increased prices resulting from a new classification could not be passed on by Netflix and GameFly because of rugged downstream competition, the removal of a price ceiling would allow the Postal Service to use its position as the sole provider of the round-trip mailer to capture a larger portion of the intervenors' profits. [9]

Petitioner's case essentially rests on the proposition that the proliferation of competitors in the downstream market (direct sales to consumers) restricts the capacity of the Postal Service to raise prices to Netflix and GameFly. Therefore, the Postal Service contends, streaming services and DVD-by-mail services compete with each other is not unlike rate regulation for other state-granted monopolies. The language of 39 U.S.C. § 3642 has been consistently taken to reflect basic antitrust concerns with market power.

and, under antitrust law, should be treated as a single market. We should note at the outset of our analysis that we do not sit as an appellate court reviewing an antitrust case from the district court. Rather HN5[] we are reviewing an administrative agency decision under the APA — which means the agency is entitled to deference. Even if we were to disagree with the Commission's economic analysis, we are obliged to affirm if the agency was at least reasonable.[3] See City of Los Angeles v. Dept. of Transp., 165 F.3d 972, 977, 334 U.S. App. D.C. 185 (D.C. Cir. 1999) ("[W]e do not sit as a panel of referees on a professional economics journal, but as a panel of generalist judges obliged to defer to a reasonable judgment by an agency acting pursuant to congressionally delegated authority.").

But we think the Commission was more than just reasonable; its decision seems rather compelling. As the Commission found, [10] the petitioner produced no evidence to establish that a significant increase in the price of DVD-by-mail — the cost to Netflix and GameFly in the upstream market — would result in a significant shift by Netflix or GameFly away from purchasing DVD-by-mail services upstream. In other words, there was no evidence presented to [*887] [490] establish at what point an increase in the price the Service charged would cause Netflix and Gamefly to look elsewhere for distribution.

There is a fundamental logical flaw in the Service's argument. The Service enjoys market power in the (upstream) distribution market regardless of conditions in the (downstream) content market because it does not face any competition in the distribution market. Whether because of economic or legal hurdles, no other business offers or seems reasonably poised to offer a competing distribution channel that Netflix could readily take advantage of. If the Postal Service were to raise the price of its round trip mailer to Netflix and GameFly, there are only two possibilities. First, it may be the downstream market is not sufficiently competitive, and thus Netflix and GameFly could pass on the price increase to consumers without consequence. [11] Second, alternatively, it may be the downstream market is competitive, and thus Netflix and GameFly could not pass on the price increase to consumers without losing them. In the first instance, the Postal Service's market power upstream coexists with Netflix and Gamefly's market power downstream. They would share in the supracompetitive price. In the second instance, although Netflix and Gamefly lack power downstream, the Service's power upstream remains, and puts it in a position to extract more of the profit margin of its captive suppliers. In either case, the Postal Service employs market power.[4]

There remain petitioner's two other arguments, even assuming it can be thought to have market power. First, that Netflix — after all, a market behemoth — has sufficient economic clout to counter petitioner's market power. But that theory simply doesn't apply in this case because Netflix and GameFly have no alternative means to transport DVDs by mail, so there is no way that Netflix could exercise any bargaining leverage vis-a-vis the Postal Service. It should be obvious that as long as the DVD-by-mail business is quite profitable, Netflix has no rational economic course but to pay the market-dominant piper. As to the second alternative argument, regarding the speed of technological change, we have said that HN6[] market power analysis need account for only potential "substitutes that constrain pricing in the reasonably foreseeable future." United States v. Microsoft Corp., 253 F.3d 34, 53-54, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330 (D.C. Cir. 2001). The Commission was not, therefore, unreasonable to hold that the potential technological evolution suggested by the Service was too speculative to condition its market power analysis here.

HN1[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

A Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1) motion challenges the court's subject matter jurisdiction to hear the case. A case is properly dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under Rule 12(b)(1) when the district court lacks the statutory or constitutional power to adjudicate it. In reviewing a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(1), a court must take all facts alleged in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the plaintiff, but jurisdiction must be shown affirmatively, and that showing is not made by drawing from the pleadings inferences favorable to the party asserting it. Moreover, a court may consider affidavits and other materials beyond the pleadings to resolve the jurisdictional issue, but the court may not rely on conclusory or hearsay statements contained in the affidavits. The plaintiff bears the burden of proving subject matter jurisdiction by a preponderance of the evidence.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion tests the legal sufficiency of a complaint and requires a court to determine whether the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to show that the plaintiff has a plausible claim for relief. When ruling on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, a court must accept the factual allegations set forth in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the plaintiff. To survive such a motion, however, the plaintiff must plead sufficient facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. A claim is facially plausible when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > Injury in Fact

Constitutional Law > ... > Case or Controversy > Standing > Elements

HN3[] Standing, Injury in Fact

To ensure that federal courts resolve only those disputes in which the parties have a concrete stake, U.S. Const. art. III requires a plaintiff seeking relief in federal court to show an injury-in-fact, that is, the invasion of a legally protected interest in a manner that is concrete and particularized, not conjectural or hypothetical. Injury in fact, however, is a low threshold, which the Second Circuit has held need not be capable of sustaining a valid cause of action. A "paid too much" or "received too little" harm is classic economic injury-in-fact. Discovery may well show that, for some plaintiffs on some days, the alleged wrongdoing actually resulted in a benefit. But the mere fact that an injury may be outweighed by other benefits, while often sufficient to defeat a claim for damages, does not negate standing. At the motion to dismiss stage, the appropriate question is whether the alleged wrongdoing plausibly caused each plaintiff to suffer some loss at some point during the time period at issue.

Sherman Act § 1 (15 U.S.C.S. § 1) declares illegal every contract, combination, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce.

HN5[] Remedies, Damages

Clayton Act § 4 (15 U.S.C.S. § 15) provides a private right of action, with recovery of treble damages, to any person who has been injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws. § 15(a).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN6[] Sherman Act, Claims

To survive a motion to dismiss, a Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., claim must (1) define the relevant geographic market, (2) allege an antitrust injury, and (3) allege conduct in violation of antitrust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Sherman Act

HN7[] Sherman Act, Claims

Sherman Act § 1 (15 U.S.C.S. § 1) prohibits only restraints of trade effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy, so plaintiffs must allege that defendants entered into an agreement or conspiracy— be it tacit or express — to state a claim. Direct evidence is not required, as concrete, smoking gun proof of an illegal conspiracy between sophisticated actors can be hard to come by, especially at the pleadings stage. Instead, circumstantial facts supporting the inference that a conspiracy existed are sufficient. More specifically, a horizontal agreement or conspiracy may be inferred on the basis of conscious parallelism when such interdependent conduct is accompanied by circumstantial evidence and plus factors. Such plus factors may include a common motive to conspire, evidence that shows the parallel acts were against the apparent individual economic self-interest of the alleged conspirators, and evidence of a high level of interfirm communications. That list, however, is neither exhaustive nor exclusive, but rather illustrative of the type of circumstances which, when combined with parallel behavior, might permit a jury to infer the existence of an agreement. The ultimate question is whether allegations of parallel conduct are placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > Sherman Act

HN8[] Sherman Act, Claims

The mere existence of ongoing government investigations is a circumstance that, when combined with parallel behavior, may permit a jury to infer the existence of an agreement prohibited by Sherman Act § 1 (15 U.S.C.S. § 1).

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN9[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

The choice between two plausible inferences that may be drawn from factual allegations is not a choice to be made by the court on a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion. Instead, the sole question for the court is whether the plaintiffs put forward enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal sufficient evidence.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

Constitutional Law > ... > Case or Controversy > Standing > Particular Parties

HN10[] Standing, Requirements

Antitrust standing is a concept that is distinct from standing under U.S. Const. art. III. To establish antitrust standing, a plaintiff must plausibly allege two things: (a) that it suffered a special kind of antitrust injury; and (b) that it is a suitable plaintiff to pursue the alleged antitrust violations and thus is an efficient enforcer of the antitrust laws. With respect to the former, it is not enough for the actual injury to be causally linked to the alleged violation; instead, in order to establish antitrust injury, the plaintiff must demonstrate that its injury is of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful. That requirement helps ensure that the harm claimed by the plaintiff corresponds to the rationale for finding a violation of the antitrust laws in the first place.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > Price Fixing

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN11[] Cartels & Horizontal Restraints, Price Fixing

Restricting supply may be a hallmark of much anticompetitive behavior, but it is not a prerequisite to showing antitrust injury. Conspiring to artificially flood the market with manipulative transactions is the sort of coordinated action in a supposedly competitive market that is precisely the sort of anticompetitive behavior the antitrust laws were intended to prevent. More broadly, engaging in a cooperative endeavor to manipulate prices (or components thereof) does not insulate otherwise-competing entities from antitrust liability to parties harmed by that manipulation. The machinery employed by a combination for price-fixing is immaterial to the antitrust laws. Cooperative organization is rife with opportunities for anticompetitive activity. If anything, therefore, the fact that otherwise-competing entities acted together as part of a cooperative endeavor is reason for more scrutiny, not less — and certainly not a basis for immunity from antitrust liability altogether.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > Price Fixing

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN12[] Cartels & Horizontal Restraints, Price Fixing

Requiring buyers to pay supra-competitive prices as a result of a horizontal price-fixing conspiracy is the quintessential antitrust injury.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > Price Fixing

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Sherman Act

HN13[] Cartels & Horizontal Restraints, Price Fixing

Collusion in the setting of a benchmark rate (or its functional equivalent) that is then used as a component of price results in antitrust injury. Such collusion gives rise to a claim under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., by purchasers of the affected products. The fact that the alleged conspiracy involved misrepresentations about the rate-setting process does not mean that the plaintiffs' injuries sound in tort rather than antitrust. It is the rare price fixer indeed who truthfully discloses his or her illegal conduct to consumers. Instead, it should go without saying that most antitrust conspiracies involve misrepresentations, if not outright falsehoods. It would be perverse to grant such wrongdoers immunity from liability under the antitrust laws to those harmed by their anticompetitive conduct merely because, in addition to engaging in that misconduct, they took steps to conceal it through misrepresentations.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN14[] Standing, Requirements

Antitrust injury is necessary, but not always sufficient, to establish standing. Plaintiffs must also show that they are efficient enforcers of the antitrust laws. To determine whether a putative antitrust plaintiff is an efficient enforcer of the antitrust laws, courts in the Second Circuit consider: (1) the directness or indirectness of the asserted injury; (2) the existence of an identifiable class of persons whose self-interest would normally motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement; (3) the speculativeness of the alleged injury; and (4) the difficulty of identifying damages and apportioning them among direct and indirect victims so as to avoid duplicative recoveries. One factor that raises particular standing concerns is the presence of other efficient antitrust enforcers whose self-interest would normally motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Class Members > Named Members

Constitutional Law > ... > Case or Controversy > Standing > Particular Parties

HN17[] Class Members, Named Members

To establish U.S. Const. art. III standing in a class action, for every named defendant there must be at least one named plaintiff who can assert a claim directly against that defendant. Each claim must be analyzed separately, and a claim cannot be asserted on behalf of a class unless at least one named plaintiff has suffered the injury that gives rise to that claim. Although some circuits have allowed such claims to proceed pursuant to the juridical link doctrine, in no case in the Second Circuit has that doctrine been applied. The Second Circuit has expressly disavowed at least one version of the juridical link doctrine.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Breach > Breach of Contract Actions > Elements of Contract Claims

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN18[] Breach of Contract Actions, Elements of Contract Claims

To state a claim for breach of contract, a plaintiff must allege (1) an agreement, (2) breach by the defendant, and (3) damages. A list of the precise contracts the defendants allegedly breached is not required to survive a motion to dismiss. Allegations that provide the defendants with sufficient information to permit them to have a fair understanding of what the plaintiffs are complaining about, and to know whether there is a legal basis for recovery, is all that is required at this stage of the litigation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Contracts Law > Contract Interpretation > Good Faith & Fair Dealing

HN19[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

An implied-covenant claim can survive a motion to dismiss only if it is based on allegations different than those underlying the accompanying breach of contract claim and the relief sought is not intrinsically tied to the damages allegedly resulting from the breach of contract. An implied-covenant claim is not a valid alternative theory of recovery when it is based on the exact same allegations as a breach-of-contract claim.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Contracts Law > Breach > Breach of Contract Actions

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Contracts Law > Types of Contracts > Quasi Contracts

HN20[] Breach, Breach of Contract Actions

Under the laws of Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and Michigan, plaintiffs are routinely allowed to bring alternative claims for unjust enrichment and breach of contract. By contrast, New York law provides that a party can pursue alternative claims for unjust enrichment and breach of contract only where there is a bona fide dispute as to whether an express contract governs the subject matter of the disagreement.

Torts > ... > Contracts > Intentional Interference > Elements

HN21[] Intentional Interference, Elements

A claim for tortious interference with contract generally requires the plaintiffs to plead (1) each defendant's knowledge of the contract, (2) each defendant's intentional and improper procurement of a breach of that contract, and (3) damages proximately caused by the defendant's conduct. The plaintiffs must plead a specific intent to injure a known contractual relationship with another.

Under New York law, when a nonresident plaintiff sues upon a cause of action that arose outside of New York, the court must apply the shorter limitations period, including all relevant tolling provisions, of either: (1) New York; or (2) the state where the cause of actions accrued.

Contracts Law > Defenses > Affirmative Defenses > Statute of Limitations

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > Time Limitations

HN24[] Affirmative Defenses, Statute of Limitations

Breach-of-contract and unjust enrichment claims are subject to a six-year statute of limitations in New York. N.Y. C.P.L.R. § 213(2). The statutes of limitations in some other states are the same or shorter: three years in Alaska under Alaska Stat. § 09.10.053; four years in Pennsylvania under 42 Pa. Cons. Stat. § 5525(a) and Connecticut under Conn. Gen. Stat. § 52-576(a); and six years in Michigan under Mich. Comp. Laws § 600.5807(8).

Governments > Legislation > Statute of Limitations > Equitable Estoppel

HN25[] Statute of Limitations, Equitable Estoppel

The statute of limitations is tolled where a plaintiff shows that a defendant committed fraudulent acts intended to conceal its misconduct and that the plaintiff's ignorance of the concealed misconduct was not a product of its own lack of reasonable diligence.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > Leave of Court

HN27[] Amendment of Pleadings, Leave of Court

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 15, a party may amend its pleading only with the opposing party's written consent or the court's leave. The court should freely give leave when justice so requires. Rule 15(a)(2). The Second Circuit has held that a Rule 15(a) motion should be denied only for such reasons as undue delay, bad faith, futility of the amendment, and perhaps most important, the resulting prejudice to the opposing party. Nevertheless, the grant or denial of an opportunity to amend is within the discretion of the district court.

Opinion

[*49] OPINION AND ORDER

JESSE M. FURMAN, United States District Judge:

These consolidated putative class actions are the latest in a series of cases in recent years to allege a longstanding conspiracy by some of the world's largest banks to manipulate a benchmark interest rate. In the other cases, plaintiffs allege efforts to fix the London InterBank Offered Rate ("LIBOR"), see, e.g., In re LIBOR-Based Fin. Instr. Antitrust Litig., 935 F. Supp. 2d 666 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("LIBOR I"), and the leading benchmark interest rate for the foreign exchange market, see In re Foreign Ex. Benchmark Rates Antitrust Litig., 74 F. Supp. 3d 581 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("FX"). In these cases, Plaintiffs allege a scheme to manipulate U.S. Dollar ISDAfix ("ISDAfix"), which is a benchmark interest rate incorporated into a broad range of financial derivatives. Defendants are (1) fourteen banks that [6] dominate the market for interest rate derivatives and set ISDAfix (collectively, "the Banks" or "Defendant Banks"); and (2) ICAP Capital Markets LLC ("ICAP"), an inter-dealer broker that served as the administrator in charge of setting the ISDAfix rates until January 26, 2014. Plaintiffs, several institutional investors, allege that Defendants abused their respective roles in the rate-setting process to manipulate ISDAfix in order to extract higher profits from outstanding interest rate swaps and "swaptions" (essentially, options on interest rate swaps). Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint raises an antitrust claim under the Sherman Act as well as various state-law claims.

Defendants now move, pursuant to Rule 12(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, to dismiss all of Plaintiffs' claims. Defendants' motion raises several questions, one of which — whether manipulation of a benchmark interest rate by defendants who are supposed to cooperate (albeit at arms' length) in setting that rate causes "antitrust injury" to those harmed by investments tied to the benchmark — has divided courts in this District and is currently under consideration by the Second Circuit. For the reasons stated below, the Court holds that such collusion in manipulating [7] a benchmark rate that is then incorporated into the price of financial instruments can indeed result in antitrust injury. For that reason and others discussed below, Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claim is DENIED; their motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' state-law claims is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

BACKGROUND

The following facts — taken from the Amended Complaint, documents referenced [*50] therein, and matters of which the Court can take judicial notice — are assumed to be true for purposes of this motion and viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs as the non-moving parties. See, e.g., Kleinman v. Elan Corp., 706 F.3d 145, 152 (2d Cir. 2013); Chambers v. Time Warner, Inc., 282 F.3d 147, 153 (2d Cir. 2002).

A. Interest Rate Derivatives

Derivatives are financial instruments, "the value of which depends on the value of another underlying asset." (Consolidated Am. Class Action Compl. (Docket No. 164) ("AC") ¶ 47). Derivatives "permit market participants to manage and transfer risk by allowing parties to separate out and trade individual risk components, such as interest rate risk." (Id.). The largest derivatives market is the interest rate derivatives market; the most common type of interest rate derivative is the interest rate "swap." (Id. ¶ 48). An interest rate swap is an [8] agreement between two counterparties to exchange interest rate payments on an agreed notional amount over a set period of time. (Id.). "Typically, one party will pay based on a 'fixed' interest rate on the notional amount that does not vary from one payment to the next, while the other party will pay based on a variable 'floating' interest rate that is tied to an independent benchmark such as LIBOR." (Id.). Such a "fixed-for-floating rate swap allows parties with floating rate debt to hedge their interest rate exposure by receiving a variable rate on the notional amount in exchange for paying a fixed rate on that same notional amount." (Id. ¶ 49).

Another (related) interest rate derivative instrument is a "swaption," which is a contract pursuant to which a buyer pays a seller a premium for the option to enter into an interest rate swap at a specified rate on some set future date. (Id. ¶¶ 55-56). When entering a swaption, "the parties may choose whether the swaption is to be physically settled," which means the parties actually enter into the swap if exercised, "or cash settled," which means the seller pays the buyer the value of the swap on the exercise date. (Id. ¶¶ 56-57). In most [9] cases, ISDAfix is used to determine the settlement value of a cash-settled swaption on its exercise date. (Id. ¶¶ 58-59, 61). If the fixed rate specified in the swaption is more favorable than the ISDAfix rate, the option is "in the money," meaning the swaption has value and the buyer can claim a cash payment from the seller. (Id. ¶¶ 57, 61). If the ISDAfix rate is less favorable than the fixed swaption rate, the option is "out of the money" and will simply expire without being exercised. (Id.). In that instance, the seller of the swaption profits by retaining the premium paid up front when the buyer purchased the swaption. (See id. ¶¶ 55, 57). "[A]ccurate calculation and reporting of the ISDAfix rate is critical to the fair settlement of swaptions, and even the smallest movement of ISDAfix can drastically affect the value of a cash-settled swaption." (Id. ¶ 61).

Over the past thirty years, the market for interest rate derivatives in general (and interest rate swaps in particular) has grown dramatically. (Id. ¶ 51). According sources cited in the Amended Complaint, the collective nominal amounts on outstanding interest rate swaps has grown from about $2.3 trillion in 1990 to about $342 trillion [10] as of June 2012, including $164 trillion of U.S. dollar swaps alone. (Id.). The value of swaption contracts outstanding as of July 2013 was $29.5 trillion as measured by notional amount. (Id. ¶ 55). The Defendant Banks collectively dominate the market for interest rate derivatives. (Id. ¶ 53). Indeed, over the course of the putative class period — from January 1, 2006, to June 30, 2013 (see id. ¶ 235) — the collective interest rate holdings of the Defendant Banks represented over ninety percent of the total reported notional [*51] amounts of interest rate derivatives held by U.S. dealers. (Id. ¶ 53).

B. The ISDAfix Benchmark Interest Rate

ISDAfix is the most common interest rate benchmark used to determine the value upon expiration of cash-settled interest rate swaptions. (Id. ¶ 58). The ISDAfix rate purports to "represent the average fixed interest rate that an over-the-counter derivatives market dealer would bid or offer for a swap of a certain tenor and currency in exchange for a specified floating LIBOR rate." (Id. ¶ 71). Different ISDAfix rates are calculated each day for transactions of varying tenors (that is, lengths) in different currencies. (Id. ¶ 68). During the class period, ICAP [11] was responsible for compiling ISDAfix benchmark rates. Every morning at 11:02 a.m., ICAP would circulate to the Defendant Banks a set of reference points generated using (1) the rates offered in completed inter-dealer trades and executable inter-dealer bids at 11:00 a.m. and (2) information "reflecting executed trades and executable bids and offers at 11 a.m. for US Treasury securities from ICAP's" inter-dealer electronic trading platform. (Id. ¶ 72). ICAP then asked each Defendant Bank to submit, for each maturity, the midpoint of where "that dealer would itself offer and bid a swap" in that maturity for a set notional amount "to an acknowledged dealer of good credit in the swap market." (Id. ¶¶ 71, 224). Banks could accept the reference rate provided at 11:02 a.m., submit a different value, or take no action. (Id. ¶ 72). Thomson Reuters would then compile the day's ISDAfix rates by eliminating a set number of the highest and lowest rates submitted through ICAP and then averaging the remainder. (Id.).

C. Plaintiffs' Allegations of Wrongdoing

Plaintiffs allege that Defendants took advantage of their respective roles in the ISDAfix rate-setting process to manipulate the daily ISDAfix [12] benchmarks for their own financial gain. In particular, they contend that the Defendant Banks manipulated daily ISDAfix rates to benefit their own trading positions and that ICAP assisted in that manipulation in order to earn brokerage commissions. (Id. ¶¶ 137-139). The Amended Complaint identifies a number of practices that Defendants used to perpetrate their manipulation. First, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants agreed to rubberstamp the reference rate posted by ICAP each day in contravention of ICAP's publicly disseminated submissions rules, which indicated that the Defendant Banks should not submit a rate "where the dealer sees the mid-market away from itself, but should be a function of its own bid/offer spread." (Id. ¶¶ 8-9, 71). Second, Plaintiffs allege that the Defendant Banks manipulated the reference rate itself by flooding the inter-dealer swap market just before 11 a.m. with transactions designed to move ICAP's reference rate to whatever point the Defendant Banks desired — a process known as "banging the close." (Id. ¶¶ 134, 136-37). To facilitate this strategy, Defendants allegedly shared information with one another in order to coordinate their trading activities. ([13] Id. ¶¶ 6, 130). Finally, Plaintiffs contend that, when "banging the close" failed to move the reference rate to the desired level, "ICAP could and would also simply set the reference rate at the predetermined level" irrespective of the state of the market. (Id. ¶ 130 n.45). According to Plaintiffs, this manipulation of ISDAfix took place on nearly every trading day during the class period — and abruptly came to an end only when government agencies began investigating the ISDAfix benchmark process in the wake of well-publicized revelations that banks were conspiring to fix LIBOR. (Id. ¶¶ 7, 80-81). In or about November 2012, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission ("CFTC") [*52] issued a first round of subpoenas relating to ISDAfix. (Id. ¶ 81-83). In September 2014, the CFTC reportedly told the U.S. Department of Justice that it had "found evidence of criminal behavior following" its investigation of "banks' alleged manipulation of ISDAfix." (Id. ¶ 82-83).

Plaintiffs are various institutions that "transacted in interest rate derivatives expressly tied to ISDAfix or directly impacted by Defendants' manipulation of ISDAfix" with one or more Defendant Banks on "days that have been identified [14] as being subject to manipulation." (Id. ¶¶ 23-27). More specifically, the Amended Complaint alleges that "Plaintiffs' swaptions and other interest rate derivatives that settled by reference, or otherwise had cash flows tied to ISDAfix rates were made less profitable" for Plaintiffs (and more profitable to the Defendant Banks) "than they would have been in the absence of manipulation." (Id. ¶ 262; see id. ¶¶ 192-209). In the Amended Complaint, they bring antitrust claims under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, et seq., as well as state-law claims for breach of contract, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, unjust enrichment, and tortious interference with contract.

LEGAL STANDARDS

Defendants' motion is brought pursuant to Rules 12(b)(1) and 12(b)(6). HN1[] A Rule 12(b)(1) motion challenges the court's subject matter jurisdiction to hear the case. "A case is properly dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under Rule 12(b)(1) when the district court lacks the statutory or constitutional power to adjudicate it." Makarova v. United States, 201 F.3d 110, 113 (2d Cir. 2000). In reviewing a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(1), a court "must take all facts alleged in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of plaintiff, but jurisdiction must be shown affirmatively, and that showing [15] is not made by drawing from the pleadings inferences favorable to the party asserting it." Morrison v. Nat'l Austl. Bank Ltd., 547 F.3d 167, 170 (2d Cir. 2008) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted), aff'd, 561 U.S. 247, 130 S. Ct. 2869, 177 L. Ed. 2d 535 (2010). Moreover, a court "may consider affidavits and other materials beyond the pleadings to resolve the jurisdictional issue, but [the Court] may not rely on conclusory or hearsay statements contained in the affidavits." J.S. ex rel. N.S. v. Attica Cent. Schs., 386 F.3d 107, 110 (2d Cir. 2004). "The plaintiff bears the burden of proving subject matter jurisdiction by a preponderance of the evidence." Aurecchione v. Schoolman Transp. Sys., Inc., 426 F.3d 635, 638 (2d Cir. 2005).

By contrast, HN2[] a Rule 12(b)(6) motion tests the legal sufficiency of a complaint and requires a court to determine whether the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to show that the plaintiff has a plausible claim for relief. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 679, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). When ruling on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, a court must accept the factual allegations set forth in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the plaintiff. See, e.g., Holmes v. Grubman, 568 F.3d 329, 335 (2d Cir. 2009). To survive such a motion, however, the plaintiff must plead sufficient facts "to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). A claim is facially plausible "when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." [16] Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556).

DISCUSSION

Defendants move to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims on various grounds. First, they contend [*53] that all of Plaintiffs' claims should be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because Plaintiffs do not have standing under Article III of the Constitution. Second, they seek to dismiss Plaintiffs' antitrust claims on the grounds that the Amended Complaint fails to plausibly allege a conspiracy to restrain trade and that Plaintiffs lack "antitrust standing." Third, they claim that each of Plaintiffs' state-law claims fails as a matter of law. And finally, they assert that many of Plaintiffs' claims are time barred. The Court considers the challenge to Plaintiffs' constitutional standing first, see, e.g., Ross v. Bank of Am. N.A., 524 F.3d 217, 222 (2d Cir. 2008) ("Standing is the threshold question in every federal case, determining the power of the court to entertain the suit." (internal quotation marks omitted)), and then turns to Defendants' other arguments.

A. Constitutional Standing

Defendants' argument that Plaintiffs lack standing under Article III can be swiftly rejected. HN3[] To ensure that federal courts resolve only "those disputes in which the parties have a concrete stake," Article III requires a plaintiff seeking relief in federal court to show [17] an "injury-in-fact, that is, the invasion of a 'legally protected interest' in a manner that is 'concrete and particularized' . . . not 'conjectural or hypothetical.'" Bhatia v. Piedrahita, 756 F.3d 211, 218 (2d Cir. 2014) (quoting Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560, 112 S. Ct. 2130, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351 (1992)). "Injury in fact," however, "is a low threshold," which the Second Circuit has held "'need not be capable of sustaining a valid cause of action.'" Ross, 524 F.3d at 222 (quoting Denney v. Deutsche Bank AG, 443 F.3d 253, 263 (2d Cir. 2006)). Plaintiffs cross that "low threshold" here. As discussed more fully below, Plaintiffs plausibly allege that each Defendant participated in a conspiracy to manipulate ISDAfix rates. Plaintiffs also allege that they "transacted in interest rate derivatives expressly tied to ISDAfix or directly impacted" by that alleged manipulation. (AC ¶¶ 23-27). Defendants do not seriously contest that a plaintiff could establish injury-in-fact if it were to demonstrate that, because of an artificially induced shift in ISDAfix on a given day, it paid more than it should have (or was paid less than it should have been) under the terms of a particular transaction. That sort of "paid too much" or "received too little" harm is classic economic injury-in-fact. Of course, discovery may well show that, for some Plaintiffs on some days, the alleged ISDAfix manipulation actually [18] resulted in a benefit. But the mere fact "that an injury may be outweighed by other benefits, while often sufficient to defeat a claim for damages, does not negate standing." Ross, 524 F.3d at 222 (internal quotation marks omitted). At this stage, the appropriate question is whether the alleged manipulation of ISDAfix plausibly caused each Plaintiff to suffer some loss under the terms of some derivative at some point during the years the conspiracy allegedly took place. See FX, 74 F. Supp. 3d at 595 ("[A]ny particular transaction that a particular Plaintiff entered into with a particular Defendant on a day that the Fix was manipulated to that Plaintiff's detriment would sufficiently demonstrate injury in fact as to that Plaintiff."). Given the sheer volume of transactions identified by Plaintiffs in the Amended Complaint (see AC, App. A), it is not hard to conclude that the answer to that question is yes.

B. The Antitrust Claims

Plaintiff's principal claim is brought under HN4[] Section One of the Sherman Act, which declares illegal "[e]very contract, combination . . ., or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce." 15 U.S.C. § 1. HN5[] Section Four of the Clayton Act, in [*54] turn, provides a private right of action, with recovery of treble damages, to "any person [19] who [has been] injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws." 15 U.S.C. § 15(a). HN6[] "To survive a motion to dismiss, a Sherman Act claim must (1) define the relevant geographic market, (2) allege an antitrust injury, and (3) allege conduct in violation of antitrust laws." *Concord Assocs., L.P. v. Entm't Props. Trust, 817 F.3d 46, 2016 U.S. App. LEXIS 4946, 2016 WL 1075947, at 3 (2d Cir. Mar. 18, 2016) (internal quotation marks omitted). Here, Defendants argue that Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claim must be dismissed for either of two reasons. First, they contend that Plaintiffs fail to allege conduct in violation of the antitrust laws because the Amended Complaint does not plausibly allege a conspiracy to restrain trade. Second, relying almost exclusively on LIBOR I, Defendants assert that Plaintiffs lack "antitrust standing." The Court will address each argument in turn.

1. Conspiracy To Restrain Trade

HN7[] Section One of the Sherman Act prohibits only restraints of trade "effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy," so Plaintiffs must allege that Defendants entered into an agreement or conspiracy— be it "tacit or express" — to state a claim. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 553 (internal quotation marks omitted). Significantly, direct evidence is not required, as concrete, "smoking gun" proof of an illegal conspiracy between [20] sophisticated actors "can be hard to come by, especially at the pleadings stage." Mayor & City Council of Baltimore v. Citigroup, Inc., 709 F.3d 129, 136 (2d Cir. 2013). Instead, "circumstantial facts supporting the inference that a conspiracy existed" are sufficient. Id.; see also United States v. Snow, 462 F.3d 55, 68 (2d Cir. 2006) ("[C]onspiracy by its very nature is a secretive operation, and it is a rare case where all aspects of a conspiracy can be laid bare in court with . . . precision."); In re Elec. Books Antitrust Litig., 859 F. Supp. 2d 671, 681 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) ("[C]onspiracies nearly always must be proven through inferences that may fairly be drawn from the behavior of the alleged conspirators.").

More specifically, a horizontal agreement or conspiracy, the sort of pact alleged here, "may be inferred on the basis of conscious parallelism when such interdependent conduct is accompanied by circumstantial evidence and plus factors." Todd v. Exxon Corp., 275 F.3d 191, 198 (2d Cir. 2001). Such "'plus factors' may include: a common motive to conspire, evidence that shows the parallel acts were against the apparent individual economic self-interest of the alleged conspirators, and evidence of a high level of interfirm communications." Mayor of Baltimore, 709 F.3d at 136 (internal quotation marks omitted). That list, however, is "neither exhaustive nor exclusive, but rather illustrative of the type of circumstances which, when combined with parallel behavior, might permit a jury to infer the existence [21] of an agreement." Id. at n.6. The ultimate question is whether allegations of parallel conduct are "placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557.

Applying those standards here, and drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiffs' favor, the Court concludes that the Amended Complaint plausibly alleges that a conspiracy among Defendants existed. For starters, the Amended Complaint contains extensive allegations of parallel conduct. According to the Amended Complaint, the Defendant Banks "claimed to have the exact same bid/ask spread" for "nearly every day for multiple years" (AC ¶¶ 9, 102) and coordinated open-market trades before 11 a.m. to "bang the close" (see, e.g., id. ¶¶ 133-34). Additionally, the [*55] Amended Complaint includes several "plus factors" that "raise[] a suggestion" of illegal agreement rather than mere independent action. First, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants had a common motive to conspire — namely that Defendants were major players in the market for interest rate derivatives who were jointly motivated by a desire to maximize profits by manipulating the ISDAfix benchmark [22] rates. (See, e.g., AC ¶¶ 2, 10, 74, 80, 122, 138, 156). The plausibility of that motive is reinforced by other allegations in the Amended Complaint. For example, the very nature of ISDAfix suggests that any attempt to unilaterally control ISDAfix would be risky and likely futile, as any individual bank's submission to ICAP would be drowned out in the polling process by which ISDAfix was set each day. Defendants counter that a conspiracy to move ISDAfix "makes no economic or logical sense" unless the Defendant Banks' positions "were aligned throughout the putative class period." (Defs.' Mem. Law Supp. Joint Mot. To Dismiss Consolidated Class Action Compl. (Docket No. 173) ("Defs.' Mem.") 11). But that is not the case. The Amended Complaint plausibly alleges that "[t]here were more profits to be earned for Defendants in maintaining the shared ability to manipulate ISDAfix over the long term than there were to be lost due to a divergence of interest on any particular day." (AC ¶ 10). And contrary to Defendants' suggestion (Defs.' Mem 11-12), it appears that that sort of rate manipulation can be economically sensible and feasible given that many banks (including some Defendants) have admitted [23] that, in approximately the same period of time, they conspired to rig similar benchmark rates — namely, LIBOR and the leading benchmark interest rate for the foreign exchange market — in order to maximize profits. (See, e.g., AC ¶ 91).

Additionally, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants' parallel conduct required them to act against their own economic self-interest. For example, the Amended Complaint alleges that, in order to facilitate their parallel submissions, Defendants shared commercially sensitive information with one other. (AC ¶ 6). It also alleges that the Defendant Banks' process of rubberstamping the ISDAfix reference rate violated ISDA's rules, exposing them to scrutiny and penalties (both civil and criminal) if their behavior became public. (See, e.g., id. ¶¶ 71-73). And as Defendants themselves point out, rubberstamping the reference rate and "banging the close" every day almost certainly harmed some banks on some days given that Defendants' swap and swaption positions could not have been perfectly aligned throughout the putative class period. (See Defs.' Mem. 11-12). Finally, the Amended Complaint alleges ongoing government investigations into manipulation of ISDAfix. HN8[] The [24] mere existence of such investigations is a circumstance that, "when combined with parallel behavior, might permit a jury to infer the existence of an agreement." Mayor of Baltimore, 709 F.3d at 136 n.6; see also Starr v. Sony BMG Music Entm't, 592 F.3d 314, 324-25 (2d Cir. 2010). Moreover, Plaintiffs here allege not only that government investigations are pending, but also that those investigations have actually turned up "evidence of criminal behavior" relating to the Defendant Banks' manipulation of ISDAfix. (AC ¶¶ 14, 83). Significantly, Plaintiffs also allege that Defendants abruptly and simultaneously ceased engaging in parallel conduct when they were served with subpoenas in connection with government investigations (see, e.g., id. ¶¶ 112, 115, 117, 140-41), strengthening substantially the inference that a conspiracy existed.

To be sure, Defendants offer plausible non-collusive explanations for many of the facts alleged in the Amended Complaint. But HN9[] "[t]he choice between two plausible inferences that may be drawn from factual allegations is not a choice to be made by [*56] the court on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion." Anderson News, L.L.C. v. Am. Media, Inc., 680 F.3d 162, 185 (2d Cir. 2012). Instead, the sole question for the Court is whether Plaintiffs put forward "enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. Taking all of [25] Plaintiffs' allegations together, as the Court must, see, e.g., Cont'l Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 699, 82 S. Ct. 1404, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777 (1962), and drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor, the Court concludes that they have.

2. Antitrust Standing

Next, Defendants contend that Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claim must be dismissed because Plaintiffs lack HN10[] "antitrust standing" — a concept that is distinct from standing under Article III. See, e.g., Atl. Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 339 n.8, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990) ("ARCO"). To establish antitrust standing, a plaintiff must plausibly allege two things: "(a) that it suffered 'a special kind of antitrust injury,' and (b) that it is a suitable plaintiff to pursue the alleged antitrust violations and thus is an 'efficient enforcer' of the antitrust laws." Gatt Comm., Inc. v. PMC Assocs., LLC, 711 F.3d 68, 75 (2d Cir. 2013) (quoting Port Dock & Stone Corp. v. Oldcastle Ne., Inc., 507 F.3d 117, 121-22 (2d Cir. 2007)). With respect to the former, "[i]t is not enough for the actual injury to be causally linked" to the alleged violation; instead, "in order to establish antitrust injury, the plaintiff must demonstrate that its injury is of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Id. (internal quotation marks and alteration omitted). That requirement helps ensure "that the harm claimed by the plaintiff corresponds to the rationale for finding a violation of the antitrust [26] laws in the first place." ARCO, 495 U.S. at 342; see, e.g., Assoc. Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 534, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983) ("Congress did not intend the antitrust laws to provide a remedy in damages for all injuries that might conceivably be traced to an antitrust violation."); Blue Shield of Va., Inc. v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 477, 102 S. Ct. 2540, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149 (1982) ("It is reasonable to assume that Congress did not intend to allow every person tangentially affected by an antitrust violation to maintain an action to recover threefold damage for the injury to his business or property.").

a. Antitrust Injury

Relying primarily on LIBOR I, Defendants argue first that Plaintiffs cannot establish antitrust injury because the setting of ISDAfix "is based on a cooperative process" rather than "the product of competition to win Plaintiffs' business." (Defs.' Mem. 21).[1] The facts in LIBOR I and the facts in these cases are indeed similar. In LIBOR I, as here, the plaintiffs alleged that banks participating in a process to set a benchmark interest rate under the auspices of a trade association manipulated that rate in ways that negatively affected financial instruments in which the plaintiffs had invested. Concluding that the plaintiffs failed to allege antitrust injury, the Court dismissed the plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims. "[T]he process of setting LIBOR," the Court [27] reasoned, "was never intended to be competitive. Rather, it was [*57] a cooperative endeavor wherein otherwise-competing banks agreed to submit estimates of their borrowing costs to the [trade association] each day to facilitate the [trade association's] calculation of an interest rate index." 935 F. Supp. 2d at 688 (citation omitted). Even if the defendants "subverted this process by conspiring to submit artificial estimates instead of estimates made in good faith," the Court continued, "it would not follow that plaintiffs have suffered antitrust injury. Plaintiffs' injury would have resulted from defendants' misrepresentation, not from harm to competition." Id.

Much like the Court in FX, 74 F. Supp. 3d at 596-98, this Court declines to follow LIBOR I here for two independent reasons. First, these cases are factually distinguishable from LIBOR I in one critical respect: The Amended

[1] LIBOR I is on appeal to the Second Circuit, which held oral argument on November 13, 2015. See In re: LIBOR-Based Financial Instruments Antitrust Litig., No. 13-3565 (Docket No. 567) (2d Cir. Nov. 13, 2015).

Complaint here alleges not only that Defendants manipulated ISDAfix through the ICAP reference-rate process — a process that was arguably intended to be a [28] "cooperative endeavor" akin to the LIBOR-setting process — but also that Defendants conspired to move prices for swaps in the inter-dealer market by acting as a trading bloc (specifically, by "banging the close"). (See AC ¶¶ 134, 136-137). That is, whereas "the LIBOR-setting process was a 'cooperative endeavor wherein otherwise-competing banks agreed to submit estimates of their borrowing costs . . . to facilitate the . . . calculation of an interest rate index,'" ISDAfix was set, at least in part, "by actual transactions in a market where Defendants [were] supposed to be perpetually competing by offering independently determined bid-ask spreads." FX, 74 F. Supp. 3d at 596 (quoting LIBOR I, 935 F. Supp. 2d at 688).

Notably, Defendants do not (and could not) dispute that the inter-dealer market for swaps is itself competitive or that the Defendant Banks were horizontal competitors in that market. Instead, they argue that, although coordinating behavior to "bang the close" involves market activity, it cannot give rise to antitrust injury because it is not competition-reducing behavior. To reach that surprising conclusion, Defendants emphasize the fact that Plaintiffs allege that the Defendant Banks "introduce[ed] more — not fewer — transactions into the [29] inter-dealer interest rate swap market around 11 a.m." (Defs.' Mem. 26). Arguing that "[a] hallmark of price fixing is an agreement to elevate price by restricting supply," they contend that "banging the close" can never be anticompetitive because it involves increasing, rather than restricting, supply. (See id.). The Court disagrees. HN11[] Restricting supply may be "a hallmark" of much anticompetitive behavior, but Defendants cite no authority for the proposition that it is a prerequisite to showing antitrust injury. Plaintiffs allege that, instead of competing in the inter-dealer market, the Defendant Banks conspired and agreed to artificially flood the market with transactions to manipulate ISDAfix. That sort of coordinated action in a supposedly competitive market is precisely the sort of anticompetitive behavior the antitrust laws "were intended to prevent." In re DDVAP Direct Purchaser Antitrust Litig., 585 F.3d 677, 688 (2d Cir. 2009) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Second, and more broadly, the Court respectfully disagrees with the LIBOR I Court's legal conclusion that engaging in a "cooperative endeavor" to manipulate prices (or components thereof) insulates "otherwise-competing" entities from antitrust liability to parties harmed by that manipulation. [30] As an initial matter, the Supreme Court has long held that "the machinery employed by a combination for price-fixing is immaterial" to the antitrust laws. *United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 223, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 [58] L. Ed. 1129 (1940). And far from viewing cooperative endeavors with favor, the Court has expressly cautioned that cooperative organization is "rife with opportunities for anticompetitive activity." Am. Soc. of Mech. Eng'rs, Inc. v. Hydrolevel Corp., 456 U.S. 556, 571, 102 S. Ct. 1935, 72 L. Ed. 2d 330 (1982); see also, e.g., MCI Telecommc'ns. Corp. v. AT&T Co., 512 U.S. 218, 233, 114 S. Ct. 2223, 129 L. Ed. 2d 182 (1994) ("The Court itself has policed trade associations and rate bureaus under the antitrust laws precisely because the sharing of pricing information can facilitate price fixing . . . ."); Arizona v. Maricopa Cty. Med. Soc., 457 U.S. 332, 339-40, 102 S. Ct. 2466, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1982) (applying the Sherman Act to a non-profit "association" of doctors "organized for the purpose of promoting fee-for-service medicine and to provide the community with a competitive alternative to existing health insurance plans"); cf. Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., 486 U.S. 492, 506-09, 108 S. Ct. 1931, 100 L. Ed. 2d 497 (1988) ("[P]rivate standard-setting by associations comprising firms with horizontal and vertical business relations is permitted at all under the antitrust laws only on the understanding that it will be conducted in a nonpartisan manner offering procompetitive benefits. . . . [T]he hope of procompetitive benefits depends upon the existence of safeguards sufficient to prevent the standard-setting process from being biased by members with economic [31] interests in restraining competition."). If anything, therefore, the fact that "otherwise-competing" entities acted together as part of a "cooperative endeavor" is reason for more scrutiny, not less — and certainly not a basis for immunity from antitrust liability altogether.

More fundamentally, Defendants' argument ignores the gravamen of Plaintiffs' antitrust claim. According to the Amended Complaint, Defendants were not engaged in a "cooperative endeavor" in any meaningful sense of that phrase. To be sure, the Defendant Banks "cooperated" with one another by providing rate information to ICAP, which then used the information to calculate the benchmark. But that benchmark was intended "to represent the going rate in a fully competitive market." (AC ¶ 248; see also id. ¶ 4 ("From start to finish, ISDAfix was supposed to be set based on real transactions and prices drawn from a competitive market.")). To that end, the Defendant Banks were "required . . . to make submissions to ICAP based on their own, personal bid/offer spreads" in a competitive market. (AC ¶ 72 (emphasis added)). Viewed in that way, Defendants' "cooperation" was merely an efficient conduit for their competition in [32] the interest rate market. Put differently, Plaintiffs do not argue that the antitrust laws barred Defendants from cooperating in any respect to arrive at a benchmark rate. If each of the Defendant Banks had actually shared with ICAP the average of where it "would itself [have] offered and bid a swap" in a competitive market, as it was supposed to do, Plaintiffs would presumably have no claim. (AC ¶ 71). Instead, Plaintiffs contend that Defendants' cooperation extended beyond that relatively minimal level to actual collusion on the rate — and that, by doing so, Defendants earned (at Plaintiffs' expense) supra-competitive profits from financial instruments that incorporated that rate as a component of price. (See Pls.' Mem. Law Opp'n Defs.' Joint Mot. To Dismiss Am. Consol. Class Action Compl. (Docket No. 194) ("Pls.' Mem.") 31 ("Plaintiffs here allege that Defendants agreed to hijack the process, whatever it was in the abstract, so they could earn supra-competitive profits (off of interest rate derivatives) in a market where they competed (the market for interest rate derivatives)."). In other words, Plaintiffs contend that they had "to pay supra-competitive prices as a result of a [*59] [33] horizontal price-fixing conspiracy" to fix a component of the price of financial instruments that they purchased in an otherwise competitive market. FX, 74 F. Supp. 3d at 598. HN12[] That is "the quintessential antitrust injury." Id. (emphasis added).

Notably, this Court and the FX Court are not alone in concluding that HN13[] collusion in the setting of a benchmark rate (or its functional equivalent) that is then used as a component of price results in antitrust injury. LIBOR I— and two cases that adopted its reasoning, *7 West 57th Street Realty Co. v. Citigroup, Inc., No. 13-CV-981 (PGG), 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 44031, 2015 WL 1514539, at 15-20 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2015), and *Laydon v. Mizuho Bank, Ltd., No. 12-CV-3419 (GBD), 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46368, 2014 WL 1280464, at 7-8 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 28, 2014) — aside, courts have long held that such collusion gives rise to a claim under the Sherman Act by purchasers of the affected products. See, e.g., Knevelbaard Dairies v. Kraft Foods, Inc., 232 F.3d 979, 987-89 (9th Cir. 2000) (holding that a conspiracy to manipulate the benchmark for bulk cheese auction prices, which were then used to determine the government-mandated minimum price for milk, caused antitrust injury to milk buyers); In re Aluminum Warehousing Antitrust Litig., 95 F. Supp. 3d 419, 443 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) (holding that a conspiracy to raise the "Platts Midwest Premium" benchmark, which was commonly used as a component of price in contracts for the purchase of aluminum, caused antitrust injury to aluminum buyers); Ice Cream Liquidation, Inc. v. Land O'Lakes, Inc., 253 F. Supp. 2d 262, 272-74 (D. Conn. 2003) (holding that a conspiracy to inflate the price of butter, which was used as a component of minimum milk prices, caused antitrust injury [34] to milk buyers); see also, e.g., In re High Fructose Corn Syrup Antitrust Litig., 295 F.3d 651, 656 (7th Cir. 2002) (holding that fixing a "list price" would constitute a per se antitrust violation even if the list price was only a "guide to likely transaction purchases"); Plymouth Dealers' Ass'n of N. Cal. v. United States, 279 F.2d 128, 132 (9th Cir. 1960) (holding that a trade association's circulation of list prices for cars was per se illegal even though dealers used the list prices "only as a starting point"); 12 Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 2022a (3d ed. 2010) ("The per se rule generally governs not only explicit price fixing but also agreements to fix a 'price element.'").

Contrary to Defendants' contentions (Defs.' Mem. 21), and the conclusions of the LIBOR I Court, see 935 F. Supp. 2d at 688, the fact that conspiracy alleged in these cases involved misrepresentations about the ISDAfix rate-setting process does not mean that Plaintiffs' injuries sound in tort rather than antitrust. It is the rare price fixer indeed who truthfully discloses his or her illegal conduct to consumers. Instead, it should go without saying that most antitrust conspiracies involve misrepresentations, if not outright falsehoods. See, e.g., National Ass'n. of Pharm. Mfrs., Inc. v. Ayerst Labs., 850 F.2d 904, 916-17 (2d Cir. 1988) (discussing the publication of a false and misleading letter as part of an antitrust claim); *In re Monosodium Glutamate Antitrust Litig., No. 00-MD-1328 (PAM), 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23237, 2003 WL 23022001, at 1 (D. Minn. Dec. 23, 2003) [35] (discussing an antitrust conspiracy in which the co-conspirators provided customers "with false or misleading explanations" for pricing); see also, e.g., Knevelbaard Dairies, 232 F.3d at 990 ("The result for purposes of antitrust injury analysis should be no different than if the cheese makers had conspired to report a fictitious NCE price in order to depress the milk price, which clearly would cause direct injury to the milk producers." (emphasis added)). It would be perverse to grant such wrongdoers immunity from liability under the antitrust laws to those harmed by their anticompetitive conduct merely because, in addition to engaging in [*60] that misconduct, they took steps to conceal it through misrepresentations.

In short, the Amended Complaint in these cases alleges that Plaintiffs "are purchasers" of Defendants' products "who allege being forced to pay supra-competitive prices as a result of [Defendants'] anticompetitive conduct. Such an injury plainly is 'of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent.'" DDAVP Direct Purchaser Antitrust Litig., 585 F.3d at 688 (quoting Brunswick Corp., 429 U.S. at 489).[2]

b. Efficient Enforcers

As noted above, HN14[] "antitrust injury is necessary, but not always sufficient, [37] to establish standing." Daniel v. Am. Bd. of Emergency Med., 428 F.3d 408, 443 (2d Cir. 2005) (internal quotation marks omitted). Plaintiffs must also show that they are "efficient enforcer[s] of the antitrust laws." Balaklaw v. Lovell, 14 F.3d 793, 798 n.9 (2d Cir. 1994). To determine whether a putative antitrust plaintiff is an "efficient enforcer" of the antitrust laws, courts in this Circuit consider: "(1) the directness or indirectness of the asserted injury; (2) the existence of an identifiable class of persons whose self-interest would normally motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement; (3) the speculativeness of the alleged injury; and (4) the difficulty of identifying damages and apportioning them among direct and indirect victims so as to avoid duplicative recoveries." Gatt Comm., 711 F.3d at 78 (quoting Paycom Billing Servs., Inc. v. Mastercard Int'l, Inc., 467 F.3d 283, 290-91 (2d Cir. 2006)). One factor that "raises particular standing concerns" is "the presence of other efficient antitrust enforcers 'whose self-interest would normally motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement.'" Daniel, 428 F.3d at 443-44 (quoting Assoc. Gen. Contractors, 459 U.S. at 542). In these cases, Defendants focus their argument on that factor, arguing that there is another class of antitrust plaintiffs that would be more "efficient enforcers" — namely, non-defendant banks that participated in the inter-dealer market. (Defs.' Mem. 27-28). But based [38] on the allegations contained in the Amended Complaint, the Court has no reason to believe that the non-defendant banks suffered any financial injury at all from Defendants' manipulation of that market, and therefore cannot conclude that those banks could serve as a more "efficient enforcers" than Plaintiffs. In any event, the other three factors all favor the [*61] conclusion that Plaintiffs are "efficient enforcers": Plaintiffs have alleged that they were directly harmed by Defendants' anticompetitive conduct by having to pay higher prices (or earning lower profits) from instruments tied to ISDAfix, there is nothing particularly speculative about the injury alleged, and the damages at issue are tied to particular transactions and contracts, obviating the danger of duplicative recovery. Given those factors, the Court has no basis to doubt that Plaintiffs are "efficient enforcers" whose financial injury will adequately "motivate them to vindicate the public interest in antitrust enforcement." See Daniel, 428 F.3d at 443-44. It follows that they have "antitrust standing" to pursue the claim under the Sherman Act.

C. The State-Law Claims

In addition to their antitrust claim, Plaintiffs allege state-law claims (against [39] all Defendants other than ICAP) for breach of contract, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, unjust enrichment, and tortious interference with contract. The Court considers each of those claims in turn.[3]

---

[2] The Supreme Court's decisions in ARCO and Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477 (1977), 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 — the principal authorities upon which the LIBOR I Court relied, see 935 F. Supp. 2d at 689-92, and upon which Defendants rely (although not as heavily) here (Defs.' Br. [36] 26) — do not call for a different conclusion. As the FX Court explained, those cases "were brought by competitors against their rivals, not by consumers alleging the per se wrong of horizontal price-fixing against colluding competitors." 74 F. Supp. 3d at 598. The cases thus stand for the uncontroversial proposition that a competitor cannot use the antitrust laws to recover lost profits as a result of being confronted with an increase in competition. They do not stand for the proposition that a plaintiff fails to show antitrust injury if it "could have suffered the same harm under normal circumstances of free competition." LIBOR I, 935 F. Supp. 2d at 689; see In re Cardizem CD Antitrust Litig., 332 F.3d 896, 912 (6th Cir. 2003) (rejecting an argument that where a "defendant could have in theory caused the same injury without engaging in an antitrust violation, the plaintiff has not suffered an 'antitrust injury,' even if in fact it was the antitrust violation that caused the actual injury in a particular case"); see also, e.g., Irvin Indus., Inc. v. Goodyear Aerospace Corp., 974 F.2d 241, 245-46 (2d Cir. 1992) ("The possibility that [the defendant] might have submitted a lawful bid, and, if so, the same damage might have resulted, cannot in and of itself negate causation as a matter of law.").

1. The Contract and Quasi-Contract Claims Against Nomura Securities

Before turning to Plaintiffs' claims generally, however, the Court addresses their claims against Defendant Nomura Securities ("Nomura") in particular. In supplemental memoranda, Defendant [40] Nomura argues that all contract and quasi-contractual claims against it — namely, the claims for breach of contract, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and unjust enrichment — should be dismissed because Plaintiffs fail to allege "any transaction, contract, or relationship between any plaintiff and Nomura." (Supp. Mem. Def. Nomura Securities International, Inc. Supp. Mot. To Dismiss (Docket No. 175) 1). The Court agrees. HN16[] An essential element of each contractual and quasi-contractual claim Plaintiffs raise is the existence of some relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant. See, e.g., In re LIBOR-Based Fin. Instruments Antitrust Litig., 27 F. Supp. 3d 447, 479 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) ("LIBOR III") ("While parties need not be in privity with one another to sustain an unjust enrichment claim, a plaintiff must still plead that it had some relationship with a defendant."); id. at 478 ("[I]t is clear that the law requires an agreement between the parties for a defendant to be liable for a breach of contract."). Here, although Appendix A to the Amended Complaint lists almost 2,000 transactions between Plaintiffs and the Defendant Banks, none of those transactions is with Nomura.

Notably, Plaintiffs point to no authority (and indeed make no argument) suggesting that [41] their claims against Nomura should survive despite their failure to allege any relationship, contractual or otherwise, with the bank. The fact that members of the putative class may have engaged in transactions with Nomura (see AC ¶ 38) is plainly not enough to keep [*62] the claims alive. See NECA-IBEW Health & Welfare Fund v. Goldman Sachs & Co., 693 F.3d 145, 159 (2d Cir. 2012) ("HN17[] [T]o establish Article III standing in a class action . . . for every named defendant there must be at least one named plaintiff who can assert a claim directly against that defendant . . . ." (emphasis added)); Griffin v. Dugger, 823 F.2d 1476, 1483 (11th Cir. 1987) ("[E]ach claim must be analyzed separately, and a claim cannot be asserted on behalf of a class unless at least one named plaintiff has suffered the injury that gives rise to that claim."). And although some Circuits have allowed such claims to proceed pursuant to the "juridical link" doctrine, see Payton v. Cty. of Kane, 308 F.3d 673, 678-82 (7th Cir. 2002), Plaintiffs point to no case in this Circuit where that doctrine has been applied, see McCall v. Chesapeake Energy Corp., 817 F. Supp. 2d 307, 315 (S.D.N.Y. 2011) ("[The plaintiff] does not cite to any case where the juridical link doctrine was found to cure a named plaintiff's lack of Article III standing, and other courts in the Second Circuit have dismissed this same argument."). In fact, as Plaintiffs concede (Pls.' Mem. Law Opp'n Def. Nomura Securities International, Inc.'s [42] Suppl. Mem. Law (Docket No. 195) 1 n.1), the Second Circuit has expressly disavowed at least one version of the juridical link doctrine. See, e.g., Mahon v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 683 F.3d 59, 64 (2d Cir. 2012). The Court therefore concludes that the juridical link doctrine does not save Plaintiffs' contractual and quasicontractual claims against Nomura and that those claims must be dismissed.

2. Breach of Contract

HN18[] To state a claim for breach of contract, a plaintiff must allege (1) an agreement, (2) breach by the defendant, and (3) damages. See, e.g., Fischer & Mandell, LLP v. Citibank, N.A., 632 F.3d 793, 799 (2d Cir. 2011).[4] Defendants challenge all three elements of Plaintiffs' contract claim here. First, Defendants complain that, although Plaintiffs list a series of almost 2,000 contracts in Appendix A to the Amended Complaint, "they fail to allege sufficient facts about each of those transactions to allow Defendants to determine which of them will be a basis for Plaintiffs' claim." (Defs.' Mem. 35). Plaintiffs could certainly have done a better job of identifying the precise contracts Defendants allegedly breached. But Defendants provide no authority to suggest that such a list is required to survive a motion to dismiss. The only cases Defendants cite in support of their argument are *Langreich v. Gruenbaum, No. 06-CV-4931 (BSJ) (MHD), 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40296, 2009 WL 321253, at 4 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 30, 2009) [43] , where the Court dismissed a "muddled" breach-of-contract claim under Rule 8(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure because it could not even discern whether the plaintiff was alleging breaches of oral contracts, written contracts, or both, and *Sedona Corp. v. Ladenburg Thalmann & Co., Inc., No. 03-CV-3120 (LTS) (THK), 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16382, 2005 WL 1902780, at 20 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 9, 2005), where the Court was similarly unable to identify what specific provisions of the "myriad alleged oral and written agreements" defendants had allegedly breached. In these cases, by contrast, the Amended Complaint explains that (1) Plaintiffs' breach-of-contract claims are based only on contracts with the Defendant Banks "whose cash flows were expressly tied to USD ISDAfix" (AC ¶ 254); (2) that those contracts were each "governed by ISDA Master Agreements" (id. ¶¶ 210, 256); and (3) [*63] that each contract expressly required the Defendant Banks to act "in good faith" and in accordance with the law (id. ¶¶ 213-14, 216). Those allegations provide Defendants with "sufficient information to permit [them] to have a fair understanding of what [Plaintiffs are] complaining about and to know whether there is a legal basis for recovery," which is all that is required at this stage of the litigation. Kittay v. Kornstein, 230 F.3d 531, 541 (2d Cir. 2000) (internal quotation marks [44] omitted).

[3] Applying New York choice-of-law rules, see Follman v. World Fin. Network Nat'l Bank, 721 F. Supp. 2d 158, 161 (E.D.N.Y. 2010), Plaintiffs' state-law claims may be governed by the law of New York, Alaska, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, or Michigan (the last four of which are where Plaintiffs are domiciled (see AC ¶¶ 23-27)). The parties do not brief choice of law; instead, they appear to agree (if not explicitly, see Defs.' Br. 34 n.39, then implicitly), that the Court need not reach choice-of-law questions at this stage because the results would be the same under any applicable law. See Fin. One Pub. Co. Ltd. v. Lehman Bros. Special Fin., Inc., 414 F.3d 325, 331 (2d Cir. 2005) HN15[] ("[W]here the court has determined that the result would be the same under either jurisdiction's law, it need not decide which to apply." (emphasis omitted)). In light of that, the Court leaves choice of law to another day.

Defendants' other contentions — that the Amended Complaint fails to allege that they breached the contracts and fails to allege that Plaintiffs "were harmed or even affected by the alleged breach" (Defs.' Mem. 35-36) — are similarly unpersuasive. First, as discussed above, Plaintiffs allege that each Defendant engaged in a conspiracy to artificially manipulate ISDAfix throughout the class period in violation of antitrust laws. (See, e.g., AC ¶¶ 6, 8, 115-17, 141, 145, 163, 171-76). Plaintiffs also allege that Defendants knowingly misrepresented the nature of ISDAfix, affirming that ISDAfix was an objective, market-based rate even though all Defendants knew ISDAfix to be artificially manipulated throughout the putative class period. Those allegations are plainly sufficient to state a claim that Defendants breached their commitment to make calculations and payments in good faith and in accordance with the law. Second, Plaintiffs plausibly allege that the whole point of Defendants' conspiracy to manipulate ISDAfix was to maximize profits for the Defendant Banks on certain [45] instruments by decreasing revenues or increasing prices for the counterparties to those instruments. And, at least according to the Amended Complaint, which the Court must treat as true, Defendants were ultimately successful in that endeavor: "Plaintiffs' swaptions and other interest rate derivatives that settled by reference, or otherwise had cash flows tied to ISDAfix rates were made less profitable" for Plaintiffs (i.e., more profitable to the Banks) "than they would have been in the absence of manipulation." (AC ¶ 262). Given the nature of the alleged conspiracy between Defendants, that allegation is entirely plausible. The fact that some Plaintiffs on some days may have benefitted from the manipulation of the ISDAfix rates under their contracts does not alter the fact that Plaintiffs plausibly allege that they were harmed by Defendants' agreement to manipulate ISDAfix in a way that would favor the Banks (and, by implication, harm Plaintiffs). The Amended Complaint therefore adequately makes out a claim for breach of contract.

3. Breach of the Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

In addition to their breach-of-contract claim, Plaintiffs raise a claim for breach of the [46] implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. HN19[] "An implied-covenant claim can survive a motion to dismiss only if it is based on allegations different than those underlying the accompanying breach of contract claim and the relief sought is not intrinsically tied to the damages allegedly resulting from the breach of contract." *Grant & Eisenhofer, P.A. v. Bernstein Liebhard LLP, No. 14-CV-9839 (JMF), 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51685, 2015 WL 1809001, at 4 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 20, 2015) (internal quotation marks omitted). Here, Plaintiffs' implied-covenant claim is based on precisely the same allegations as their breach-of-contract claim — namely, that Plaintiffs and certain of the Defendant Banks entered into ISDA Master Agreements, which required the Banks to act in good faith and in accordance with the law, and that the Banks breached that duty when they calculated cash settlement amounts with reference to an ISDAfix rate they knew to be manipulated. (Compare AC ¶¶ 260-61, with id. ¶¶ 266-67). Plaintiffs only response is that they permissibly plead two theories of recovery in the alternative, [*64] which "makes sense" here because the Court or a jury might ultimately reject the breach-of-contract claim. (Pls.' Mem. 47). But an implied-covenant claim is not a valid alternative theory of recovery "when [it is] based on the exact same allegations" [47] as a breach-of-contract claim, as it is here. *Grant & Eisenhofer, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51685, 2015 WL 1809001, at 4 (internal quotation marks omitted). Plaintiffs' implied-covenant claim must therefore be dismissed.[5]

[4] A plaintiff must also prove "adequate performance by the plaintiff." Fischer & Mandell, LLP, 632 F.3d at 799. That element is not at issue here.

4. Unjust Enrichment

Next, Plaintiffs raise an unjust enrichment claim against all the Defendant Banks. For this claim, the choice of law does appear to be relevant. HN20[] Under the laws of Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and Michigan, plaintiffs are routinely allowed to bring alternative claims for unjust enrichment and breach contract. See Stein v. Horton, 99 Conn. App. 477, 914 A.2d 606, 613 (Conn. App. Ct. 2007) ("Parties routinely plead alternative counts alleging breach of contract and unjust enrichment, although in doing so, they are entitled only to a single measure of damages arising out of these alternative claims."); Lugo v. Farmers Pride, Inc., 2009 PA Super 5, 967 A.2d 963, 970 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2009) (holding that plaintiffs may "plead . . . breach of contract in the alternative with a cause of action under a theory of unjust enrichment"); H.J. Tucker & Assocs., Inc. v. Allied Chucker & Eng'g Co., 234 Mich. App. 550, 595 N.W.2d. 176, 182 (Mich. Ct. App. 1999) (holding that "plaintiff was entitled to plead alternative" claims of contract and quasi-contract).[6] By contrast, New York law provides that a party can pursue alternative claims for unjust enrichment and breach of contract only "[w]here there is a bona fide dispute as to whether" an express contract governs the subject matter of the disagreement, which — given [49] the Court's conclusions with respect to Plaintiffs' implied-covenant claim — may not be the case here. Marshall v. Hyundai Motor Am., 51 F. Supp. 3d 451, 471 (S.D.N.Y. 2014); see also LIBOR III, 27 F. Supp. 3d at 483 ("[T]he predicate for dismissing quasi-contract claims is that the contract at issue clearly covers the dispute between the parties."). But because the parties did not brief the issue of choice of law, see supra note 3, and at least some Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claims would likely survive [*65] based on the more permissive law in their domiciles, the Court sees little reason at this point to parse the question of whether there is a "bona fide dispute as to whether" an express contract governs the subject matter of the parties' disagreement. Instead, Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' unjust enrichment claim is therefore denied without prejudice to renewal on summary judgment.

[5] The Court would reach that conclusion regardless of what state's law is to be applied. The law of every relevant state either does not recognize breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing as a separate cause of action, see *Casper v. Combustion Eng'g, Inc., No. CV 97-0570516S, 1998 Conn. Super. LEXIS 1883, 1998 WL 389215, at 8 (Conn. Super. Ct. June 23, 1998) ("Notwithstanding that our Supreme Court has recognized the covenant of good faith and fair dealing as a rule of contract construction, the covenant is widely misused and pled as a separate cause of action which generally does nothing more than restate a breach of contract claim."); McCann v. U.S. Bank, N.A., 873 F. Supp. 2d 823, 848 (E.D. Mich. 2012) ("Michigan law does not recognize a cause of action for breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing." (internal quotation marks omitted)); King of Prussia Equip. Corp. v. Power Curbers, Inc., 158 F. Supp. 2d 463, 466-67 (E.D. Pa. 2001) (concluding that "the courts of Pennsylvania would not entertain [plaintiff's] good faith and fair dealing claim as a separate cause of action" where based on the same allegations as a breach of contract claim), or appears to recognize it as an independent cause of action only in limited circumstances not present [48] here, see Reed v. Mun. of Anchorage., 782 P.2d 1155, 1158 (Ala. 1989) (explaining that the implied duty of good faith and fair dealing creates an enforceable cause of action in the context of employment contracts).

[6] The state of Alaska law on this question is less clear, but it appears that Alaska also allows separate claims for unjust enrichment and breach of contract to be brought in the alternative. See Reeves v. Alyeska Pipeline Serv. Co., 56 P.3d 660, 664 (Alaska 2002) (reviewing a special jury verdict involving alternative claims of express contract and unjust enrichment claims without suggesting the claims cannot be pursued in the alternative).

5. Tortious Interference [50]

Finally, the Court turns to Plaintiffs' claims for tortious interference with contract. Under any potentially applicable state law, HN21[] such a claim generally requires Plaintiffs to plead (1) each Defendant's knowledge of the contract, (2) each Defendant's intentional and improper procurement of a breach of that contract, and (3) damages proximately caused by the Defendant's conduct. See, e.g., RAN Corp. v. Hudesman, 823 P.2d 646, 648 (Alaska 1991); *Smith v. Brown, No. CV91288536S, 1992 Conn. Super. LEXIS 2599, 1992 WL 219300, at 1 (Conn. Super. Ct. Aug. 28, 1992); CMI Int'l, Inc. v. Intermet Int'l Corp., 251 Mich. App. 125, 649 N.W.2d 808, 812 (Mich. Ct. App. 2002); Ullmannglass v. Oneida, Ltd., 86 A.D.3d 827, 927 N.Y.S.2d 702, 705 (N.Y. App. Div. 2011); Walnut St. Assocs., Inc. v. Brokerage Concepts, Inc., 2009 PA Super 191, 982 A.2d 94, 97-98 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2009), aff'd, 610 Pa. 371, 20 A.3d 468 (2011). Here, Plaintiffs fail to plead actual intent to interfere with known contracts, so their tortious-interference claim must be dismissed. Plaintiffs attempt to muddy the water on this point by arguing that "[i]mpacting ISDAfix contracts was . . . not an unintended side-effect, but the focus of Defendants' behavior." (Pls.' Mem. 51). Although that is undoubtedly true on one level — according to the Amended Complaint, Defendants hoped to impact ISDAfix contracts to which they themselves were party—it is not enough. Instead, Plaintiffs must plead a specific intent to injure a known contractual relationship with another. See, e.g., RAN Corp., 823 P.2d at 648 (holding that a plaintiff in Alaska must show that "the defendant . . . knew of the contract and intended to induce a breach"); *Smith, 1992 Conn. Super. LEXIS 2599, 1992 WL 219300, at 1 (noting [51] that a claim for tortious interference under Connecticut law requires a plaintiff to establish, inter alia, "the existence of a contractual relationship," "a third party's knowledge of this relationship" and "a third party's intent to interfere with that contract" (citing Solomon v. Aberman, 196 Conn. 359, 364, 493 A.2d 193 (1985))); CMI Int'l, 649 N.W.2d at 812 (holding that, under Michigan law, tortious interference with a contract requires a plaintiff to allege that the defendant acted "for the purpose of invading the contractual rights" of another); Ullmannglass, 927 N.Y.S.2d at 705 (holding that to "sustain a claim for tortious interference with a contract" under New York law "it must be established that a valid contract existed which a third party knew about, the third party intentionally and improperly procured the breach of the contract and the breach resulted in damage to the plaintiff" (internal quotation marks omitted)); Walnut St. Assocs., 982 A.2d at 98 (observing that the "necessary elements" of a claim for intentional interference in Pennsylvania include "(1) the existence of a contractual relationship between the complainant and a third party" and "(2) an intent on the part of the defendant to harm the plaintiff by interfering with that contractual relationship"). As Plaintiffs do not do so, they fail to state a claim [52] for tortious interference.

D. Timeliness

Finally, Defendants contend that many of the claims in Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint — which relates back, in most if not all respects, to Plaintiffs' original complaint, which was filed on September 4, 2014 (see Complaint (Docket No. 1); see also Defs.' Br. 42 & n.52)— are time-barred. HN22[] [*66] Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claim is subject to a four-year statute of limitations. See 15 U.S.C. § 15b. To determine the statute of limitations for Plaintiffs' breach-of-contract and unjust enrichment claims — the only state-law claims that survive in light of the Court's rulings above — the Court would have to apply New York's choice-of-law rules. See, e.g., Carroll v. LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae, L.L.P., 392 F. Supp. 2d 621, 628 (S.D.N.Y. 2005). HN23[] Under New York law, "when a nonresident plaintiff sues upon a cause of action that arose outside of New York, the court must apply the shorter limitations period, including all relevant tolling provisions, of either: (1) New York; or (2) the state where the cause of actions accrued." Stuart v. Am Cyanamid Co., 158 F.3d 622, 627 (2d Cir. 1998); see N.Y. C.P.L.R. § 202. HN24[] Breach-of-contract and unjust enrichment claims are subject to a six-year statute of limitations in New York. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. § 213(2). But the statutes of limitations in the states where Plaintiffs' claims accrued are the same or shorter: three years in [53] Alaska, see Alaska Stat. § 09.10.053; four years in Pennsylvania, see 42 Pa. Cons. Stat. § 5525(a), and Connecticut, see Conn. Gen. Stat. § 52-576(a); and six years in Michigan, see Mich. Comp. Laws § 600.5807(8).

The Court need not decide which statute of limitations applies at this stage, however, because Plaintiffs plausibly allege that Defendants fraudulently concealed their conspiracy. In every relevant jurisdiction, HN25[] the statute of limitations is tolled where a plaintiff shows that a defendant committed fraudulent acts intended to conceal its misconduct and that the plaintiff's ignorance of the concealed misconduct was not a product of its own lack of reasonable diligence. See, e.g., Koch v. Christie's Int'l PLC, 699 F.3d 141, 157 (2d Cir. 2012) (federal law); Williams v. Williams, 129 P.3d 428, 432 (Alaska 2006); BellSouth Telecomms., Inc. v. W.R. Grace & Co.-Conn., 77 F.3d 603, 615 (2d Cir. 1996) (Connecticut law); Doe v. Roman Catholic Archbishop of Archdiocese of Detroit, 264 Mich. App. 632, 692 N.W.2d 398, 404-05 (Mich. Ct. App. 2004); Simcuski v. Saeli, 44 N.Y.2d 442, 448-50, 377 N.E.2d 713, 406 N.Y.S.2d 259 (1978); Sarpolis v. Tereshko, 26 F. Supp. 3d 407, 420 (E.D. Pa. 2014). Applying those doctrines here, Plaintiffs plausibly allege that the running of the potentially applicable statutes of limitations was tolled at least through September 4, 2011 — three years prior to the filing of their initial complaint — which is all they need to do to for all remaining claims to survive Defendants' motion to dismiss. See Santos v. Dist. Council of N.Y. City & Vicinity of United Bhd. of Carpenters & Joiners of Am., AFL-CIO, 619 F.2d 963, 967 n.4 (2d Cir. 1980) (providing that a statute of limitations defense "may be raised in a pre-answer motion pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6)" only "if it appears on the face of the complaint that the cause of action has not been brought within the statute of limitations"). [54]

First, the alleged conspiracy in these cases was secretive and covert by its very nature — it was an agreement that was "designed to endure over a period of time" and, "[i]n order to endure, it [had to] remain concealed" from the market. State of N.Y. v. Hendrickson Bros., Inc., 840 F.2d 1065, 1084 (2d Cir. 1988). Additionally, Plaintiffs explicitly allege that Defendants committed affirmative acts of concealment. For example, Plaintiffs contend that, throughout the putative class period, Defendants falsely maintained that ISDAfix was an accurate, market-based rate through public statements describing the process by which ISDAfix was set. Cf. Palmer v. Borg-Warner Corp., 838 P.2d 1243, 1249 (Alaska 1992) (discussing and relying on prior Alaska case law that held there was "no reason for a reasonable [*67] person to doubt the truth of the representations made" by a defendant where evidence calling those representations into doubt would only have been available through "extensive testing"). Indeed, the Amended Complaint identifies several statements made during the putative class period by ISDA — a trade association with which all Defendants were involved — that allegedly amounted to affirmative misrepresentations regarding how ISDAfix was calculated. (AC ¶¶ 222-28).

Defendants contend that Plaintiffs cannot avail themselves of the [55] fraudulent concealment doctrine because they failed to exercise reasonable diligence in investigating their claims. (Defs.' Mem. 45-46). But HN26[] requiring Plaintiffs, "at the motion to dismiss stage, to make a showing of reasonable diligence" would be "premature." BPP Ill., LLC v. Royal Bank of Scotland Grp., PLC, 603 F. App'x 57, 59 (2d Cir. 2015) (summary order) (internal quotation marks omitted). In any event, Plaintiffs plausibly allege that they did not know about Defendants' conduct until after September 4, 2011, and that their failure to uncover the conspiracy earlier was not due to a lack of diligence on their part. Among other things, the trends identified in the Amended Complaint are subtle and required the aggregation of massive quantities of data. (See Pls.' Mem. 57). And perhaps the most important data — the Defendant Banks' individual submissions to ICAP — were (at least according to the Amended Complaint, which must be taken as true) not publicly available at all. (AC ¶ 232; see id. ¶ 69 ("While the final ISDAfix rates are published, the Defendant Banks' individual submissions are not.")). Contrary to Defendants' contentions (Defs.' Mem. 45-46), the fact that there was a single article published in 2010 that raised "suspicion[s]" about the ISDAfix rate-setting process [56] does not call for a different result at this stage of the litigation. See Michael Mackenzie & Gillian Tett, Markets: Frozen in Time, Fin. Times (June 16, 2010). Nothing in that article made clear that the Defendant Banks were making false submissions to ICAP or that ICAP and the Defendant Banks had in any way agreed to manipulate ISDAfix. Id. In fact, if anything, the article only underscores that the rate-setting process was opaque and difficult to meaningfully evaluate without substantial investments of time, money, and energy. See id. (describing the ISDAfix rate-setting process as "opaque" and quoting then-CFTC Chairman Gary Gensler as stating that many of the transactions in the swap market were "internali[zed]" and "not made publicly available"). In any event, a single article raising suspicions about the rate-setting process is not enough to establish, on a motion to dismiss, that Plaintiffs failed to exercise reasonable diligence. See BPP Ill., LLC, 603 F. App'x at 59 (holding that the district court had "acted too hastily" in dismissing claims relating to the fixing of LIBOR as time-barred despite multiple articles detailing the alleged rate fixing).

In short, Plaintiffs plausibly allege that Defendants fraudulently concealed [57] their conspiracy until after September 4, 2011. It follows that, whether the applicable statute of limitations is three years or longer, Plaintiffs' remaining claims cannot be dismissed as untimely.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, Defendants' motion to dismiss is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part. Specifically, Plaintiffs' tortious interference and breach-of-implied-faith claims are dismissed in their entirety, as are Plaintiffs' breach-of-contract [*68] and unjust enrichment claims against Nomura. Plaintiffs' remaining claims — namely, their antitrust claim against all Defendants and their breach-of-contract and unjust enrichment claims against all Defendants other than Nomura (and ICAP, against whom they were not brought) — survive.

One issue remains: In the final line of their opposition, Plaintiffs ask for leave to amend their complaint for a second time in the event that the Court grants Defendants' motion in any part. (Pls.' Mem. 60). HN27[] Under Rule 15 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, "a party may amend its pleading only with the opposing party's written consent or the court's leave. The court should freely give leave when justice so requires." Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2). The Second Circuit has held that a Rule 15(a) motion — as the Court construes Plaintiff [58] passing request — "should be denied only for such reasons as undue delay, bad faith, futility of the amendment, and perhaps most important, the resulting prejudice to the opposing party." Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Aniero Concrete Co., 404 F.3d 566, 603 (2d Cir. 2005) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Loreley Fin. (Jersey) No. 3 Ltd. v. Wells Fargo Sec., LLC, 797 F.3d 160, 190 (2d Cir. 2015) ("leav[ing] unaltered" prior case law on denial of leave to amend, including the rule that "leave may be denied where amendment would be futile"). Nevertheless, "the grant or denial of an opportunity to amend is within the discretion of the District Court." Williams v. Citigroup Inc., 659 F.3d 208, 214 (2d Cir. 2011) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Applying those principles here, the Court concludes that leave to amend is not warranted here because further amendment would be futile. First, the problems with Plaintiffs' impliedcovenant and tortious interference claims are "substantive" and "better pleading will not cure" them. Cuoco v. Moritsugu, 222 F.3d 99, 112 (2d Cir. 2000). Second, although Plaintiffs could cure the defects in their contract and quasi-contract claims against Nomura simply by naming transactions involving Nomura, it is safe to assume that they would have done so if they could have done so. That is, with respect to the claims against Nomura that are dismissed, Plaintiffs fail to give "any indication that [they are] in possession of facts that would [59] cure the problems identified in this opinion." *Clark v. Kitt, No. 12-CV-8061 (CS), 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113494, 2014 WL 4054284, at 15 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 15, 2014). The fact that Plaintiffs already amended their complaint once in an attempt to cure the deficiencies raised in Defendants' initial motion to dismiss — a motion that, notably, raised many of the same arguments as the motion addressed in this Opinion and Order (see Docket No. 151) — and that they were expressly cautioned that they would "not be given another opportunity to amend their complaint to address the alleged deficiencies identified in" Defendants' earlier motion (Docket No. 154), underscores the futility of further amendment. See, e.g., Ruotolo v. City of N.Y., 514 F.3d 184, 191 (2d Cir. 2008) (affirming the district court's denial of leave to amend in part because of the previous opportunities that the plaintiff had received to amend the complaint). Plaintiffs' request for leave to amend is therefore denied.

The Clerk of Court is directed to terminate Docket No. 172.

SO ORDERED.

ORDER DENYING PLAINTIFF LIPPINCOTT'S MOTION TO REMAND [24]

I. INTRODUCTION

Pending before the Court is Plaintiff Robert Gary Lippincott, Jr.'s Motion to Remand. (Dkt. No. 24.) After consideration of the papers filed in support of and in opposition to the instant Motion, the Court deems this matter appropriate for decision without oral argument of counsel. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 78; C.D. Cal. L.R. 7-15. As discussed further below, because the Court finds that Plaintiff's artfully pleaded Complaint necessarily states a substantial federal question under the Sherman Act, the Court DENIES Plaintiff's Motion to Remand.

II. FACTUAL & PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

On October 6, 2015, Plaintiff Robert Gary Lippincott, Jr. ("Plaintiff") filed a Class Action Complaint in the Superior Court of the State of California, County of Sonoma. (See Robert Gary Lippincott, Jr. v. DIRECTV, Inc. et al., No. 2:15-cv-09996 (hereinafter, "Lippincott"), Dkt. No. 1-1 (hereinafter, "Compl.").) Plaintiff's Complaint alleges that Defendants DirecTV, Inc.[1] and DirecTV Holdings [*2] LLC (collectively, "DirecTV" or "Defendants") engaged and continue to engage in conduct that violates: (1) California's Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA"), Cal. Civ. Code § 1770; (2) California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq.; and, (3) quasi-contract/unjust enrichment common law. (Compl. ¶¶ 51-79.)

According to Plaintiff, Defendants' "NFL Sunday Ticket product is [an] exclusive product that allows viewers to watch Sunday afternoon NFL out-of-market live game video telecasts—telecasts of games played on Sundays and not within the subscriber's home television market." (Compl. ¶ 4.) Plaintiff alleges that DirecTV is "the exclusive marketer of out of market Sunday afternoon NFL games," and claims that "DirecTV's monopoly over the broadcast of out of market Sunday afternoon NFL games allows [Defendants] to charge consumers unreasonably high, supra-competitive prices for its NFL Sunday Ticket programming within" California. (Compl. ¶¶ 5, 7.) Plaintiff's CLRA and UCL claims are based on Plaintiff's allegations that Defendants' contracts [*3] with Plaintiff and other similarly-situated California consumers contain unfair and unconscionable price provisions. (Compl. ¶ 14.)

Defendants removed Plaintiff's case to the Northern District of California on November 6, 2015, claiming that federal question jurisdiction exists over this case because "Plaintiff's claims are based on alleged 'monopolistic' conduct by DIRECTV, are necessarily federal in character, and Plaintiff's right to relief depends on the resolution of substantial, disputed questions of federal antitrust law." (Lippincott, Dkt. No. 1 at 3.) That same day, Defendants filed a Notice of Related Action with the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation ("JPML"), providing the JPML with information regarding Plaintiff's case. (In re Nat'l Football League's "Sunday Ticket" Antitrust Litig., MDL No. 2668 (hereinafter "JPML MDL"), Dkt. No. 66.)[2] Plaintiff filed his initial motion to remand in the Northern District of California on November 13, 2015.

On December 14, 2015, before the district court in the Northern District of California had ruled on Plaintiff's then-pending motion to remand, the JPML issued a Conditional Transfer Order transferring Plaintiff's Complaint to this Court. (JPML MDL, Dkt. No. 114.) Plaintiff did not oppose the JPML's Conditional Transfer Order, (see id. at 1 (providing that any party may file "a notice of opposition" to the Conditional Transfer Order within seven days)), and the JPML finalized the Transfer Order on December 22, 2015. (JPML MDL, Dkt. No. 117.)

Plaintiff filed the instant Motion to Remand with this Court on January 29, 2016. (In re Nat'l Football Leagues Sunday Ticket Antitrust Litigation, No. 2:15-ml-02668-BRO-JEM (hereinafter, "MDL"), Dkt. No. 24; see MDL, Dkt. No. 25 (hereinafter, "Mot.").) This Court's Order Setting Case Management Conference and Briefing Schedule terminated Plaintiff's Motion to Remand, (MDL, Dkt. Nos. 27, 28), however, the Court subsequently reinstated Plaintiff's Motion and set a briefing schedule, (MDL, Dkt. No. 96). According to that schedule, Defendants [*5]

[1] According to Defendants, DirecTV, Inc. "no longer exists," as it "merged into DIRECTV, LLC, with DIRECTV, LLC as the surviving entity." (Lippincott, Dkt. No. 1 at 2 n.1.)

[2] On August 27, 2015, Movant Ninth Inning Inc. dba The Mucky Duck requested that the JPML centralize related actions alleging violations concerning the exclusive distribution of the NFL's Sunday Ticket product, "as well as any tag-along [*4] actions or other cases such as may be subsequently filed asserting related or similar claims." (JPML MDL, Dkt. No. 1.)

timely opposed Plaintiff's Motion to Remand on March 15, 2016, (MDL, Dkt. No. 107 (hereinafter, "Opp'n")), and Plaintiff timely replied on March 22, 2016, (MDL, Dkt. No. 113 (hereinafter, "Reply")).

III. LEGAL STANDARD

Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1441, a civil action may be removed to the district court only if that court has original jurisdiction over the issues alleged in the state court complaint. See 28 U.S.C. § 1441(a). Under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, federal courts have jurisdiction over "all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States." 28 U.S.C. § 1331. A case "arises under" federal law if a plaintiff's "well-pleaded complaint establishes either that federal law creates the cause of action" or that the plaintiff's "right to relief under state law requires resolution of a substantial question of federal law in dispute between the parties." Franchise Tax Bd. v. Constr. Laborers Vacation Tr. for S. Cal., 463 U.S. 1, 13, 27, 103 S. Ct. 2841, 77 L. Ed. 2d 420 (1983).

In determining whether removal in a given case is proper, a court should "strictly construe the removal statute against removal jurisdiction." Gaus v. Miles, Inc., 980 F.2d 564, 566 (9th Cir. 1992). "Federal jurisdiction must be rejected if there is any doubt as to the right of removal in the first instance." Id. The removing party therefore bears a heavy burden to rebut the presumption against removal. See id.

IV. DISCUSSION

Plaintiff [*6] claims "there is no basis for federal subject matter-jurisdiction" because Plaintiff's Complaint alleges "exclusively California state law causes of action against Defendants." (Mot. at 1-2.) Defendants argue, on the other hand, that "[t]he artful pleading doctrine . . . forecloses Plaintiff's attempt to avoid federal jurisdiction" where Plaintiff's Complaint "raises substantial, disputed federal questions that can only be resolved with reference to the federal Sherman Act." (Opp'n at 1.)

As discussed above, whether removal jurisdiction exists must be determined by reference to a plaintiff's "well-pleaded complaint." Merrell Dow Pharm. Inc. v. Thompson, 478 U.S. 804, 808, 106 S. Ct. 3229, 92 L. Ed. 2d 650 (1986). The well-pleaded complaint rule makes plaintiff the "master of the claim." Caterpillar Inc. v. Williams, 482 U.S. 386, 392, 107 S. Ct. 2425, 96 L. Ed. 2d 318 (1987). Thus, where a plaintiff can bring claims under both federal and state law, the plaintiff can prevent removal by ignoring the federal claim and alleging only state law claims. Rains v. Criterion Sys., Inc., 80 F.3d 339, 344 (9th Cir. 1996). Plaintiff's Complaint in this case explicitly references only state causes of action under California's CLRA, UCL, and common law. (Compl. ¶¶ 51-79.)

An exception to the well pleaded complaint rule exists, however. Vasserman v. Henry Mayo Newhall Mem'l Hosp., 65 F. Supp. 3d 932, 950 (C.D. Cal. 2014). Under the "artful pleading" doctrine, a court may recharacterize a plaintiff's claims as federal if the plaintiff [*7] has attempted to defeat removal by omitting to plead necessary federal questions. Franchise Tax, 463 U.S. at 22; Federated Dep't Stores, Inc. v. Moitie, 452 U.S. 394, 398 n.2, 101 S. Ct. 2424, 69 L. Ed. 2d 103 (1981) (concluding that the district court properly found that respondents "had attempted to avoid removal jurisdiction by 'artful[ly]' casting their 'essentially federal law claims' as state-law claims"); Lippitt v. Raymond James Fin. Servs., Inc., 340 F.3d 1033, 1041 (9th Cir. 2003) (describing the artful pleading doctrine as a "corollary" to the well-pleaded complaint rule that "allows courts to delve beyond the face of the state court complaint and find federal question jurisdiction by recharacterizing a plaintiff's state-law claim as a federal claim"); Sparta Surgical Corp. v. Nat'l Ass'n of Sec. Dealers, Inc., 159 F.3d 1209, 1212-13 (9th Cir. 1998) ("The rule that state law claims cannot be alchemized into federal causes of action by incidental reference . . . has no application when relief is particularly predicated on a subject matter committed exclusively to federal jurisdiction."); Brennan v. Sw. Airlines Co., 134 F.3d 1405, 1409 (9th Cir. 1998) (explaining that "the artful pleading doctrine creates an exception to [the] general rule" that "district courts have federal-question jurisdiction only if a federal question appears on the face of a plaintiff's complaint"), amended sub nom. Brennan v. Sw. Airlines, 140 F.3d 849 (9th Cir. 1998).

"[T]he mere presence of a federal issue in a state cause of action does not automatically confer federal-question jurisdiction." Lippitt, 340 F.3d at 1040 (quoting Merrell Dow, 478 U.S. at 808). "Federal question jurisdiction [*8] extends only in those cases in which a well-pleaded complaint establishes 'either that federal law creates the cause of action or that the plaintiff's right to relief necessarily depends on a resolution of a substantial question of federal law.'" Easton v. Crossland Mortg. Corp., 114 F.3d 979, 982 (9th Cir. 1997) (quoting Franchise Tax Bd. v. Constr. Laborers Vacation Tr., 463 U.S. 1, 27-28, 103 S. Ct. 2841, 77 L. Ed. 2d 420 (1983)).

The Supreme Court clarified the standard for finding "substantial federal question" jurisdiction in Gunn v. Minton, which is required for this Court to possess subject matter jurisdiction over this case:

> [F]ederal jurisdiction over a state law claim will lie if a federal issue is: (1) necessarily raised, (2) actually disputed, (3) substantial, and (4) capable of resolution in federal court without disrupting the federal-state balance approved by Congress. Where all four of these requirements are met, . . . jurisdiction is proper because there is a "serious federal interest in claiming the advantages thought to be inherent in a federal forum," which can be vindicated without disrupting Congress's intended division of labor between state and federal courts.

A. Plaintiff's Complaint Necessarily Raises a Federal Issue

As an initial matter, Plaintiff argues that his claims make no reference to federal statutes. (Mot. at 8.) But under [*9] the artful pleading doctrine described above, the Court is not limited to Plaintiff's characterization of his claims as state causes of action. "In addition to examining the literal language selected by the plaintiff, the district court must analyze whether federal jurisdiction would exist under a properly pleaded complaint." Sparta, 159 F.3d at 1212 (citing Easton, 114 F.3d at 982). The Ninth Circuit has explained that a "plaintiff may not avoid federal jurisdiction by omitting from the complaint federal law essential to his or her claim or by casting in state law terms a claim that can be made only under federal law." Id. (citing Easton, 114 F.3d at 982; Rains, 80 F.3d at 344). Thus, if the Court concludes that Plaintiff "has 'artfully pleaded' claims in this fashion, it may uphold removal even though no federal question appears on the face of the plaintiff's complaint." Rivet v. Regions Bank of La., 522 U.S. 470, 475, 118 S. Ct. 921, 139 L. Ed. 2d 912 (1998).

Plaintiff also maintains that "[o]n its face, Plaintiff's complaint does not state a claim that 'arises under' federal law" because "[t]he factual allegations of the complaint are narrowly tailored to support Plaintiff's primary theory of liability—unconscionability of the consumer contracts under California state law." (Mot. at 2.) Plaintiff explains that his "intent in using . . . descriptive words [that Plaintiff [*10] admits are sometimes associated with federal antitrust claims] was not to assert federal claims, but rather to establish the procedural and substantive elements of unconscionability under California law." (Mot. at 8.) "When a claim can be supported by alternative and independent theories—one of which is a state law theory and one of which is a federal law theory—federal question jurisdiction does not attach because federal law is not a necessary element of the claim." Rains, 80 F.3d at 346.

Plaintiff states that "[a]ll three of Plaintiff's claims are premised on an unconscionability theory." (Reply at 4; see Mot. at 2-3.) In order to establish the procedural and substantive elements for Plaintiff's underlying unconscionability theory, Plaintiff alleges that "Defendants abused their monopoly position, leaving Plaintiff . . . with no available market alternatives," (Compl. ¶ 55), and that Defendants "maliciously and oppressively abuse[d] that position by imposing unreasonably high prices," (Compl. ¶ 58). Plaintiff also asserts that "[t]he price charged by DirecTV for its NFL Sunday Ticket service is disproportionately and unreasonably high . . . compared to the prices a competitive market would produce," (Compl. ¶ 59), and [*11] that Defendants "extract[ed] monopoly profits by charging . . . supra-competitive prices," (Compl. ¶ 60). Plaintiff argues that the substantive element for unconscionability is satisfied by Plaintiff's allegation that Defendants' unequal bargaining position causes consumers to pay unfair and unreasonable prices. (Reply at 4.) "[A] contractual term is substantively suspect," however, if the term "reallocates the risks of the bargain in an objectively unreasonable or unexpected manner." Appalachian Ins. Co. v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 214 Cal. App. 3d 1, 23, 262 Cal. Rptr. 716 (Cal. Ct. App. 1989).

If the Court were to disregard the allegations regarding Defendants' alleged "monopoly position" and "supra-competitive prices," no alternative and independent unconscionability theory would remain. Plaintiff's allegations would amount to the conclusion that Defendants' contracts contained "unconscionable provisions—the price of DirecTV's NFL Sunday Ticket service." (Compl. ¶ 54.) Pleading unconscionability requires something more than merely alleging that the price of a product was unfairly high. See Walter v. Hughes Commc'ns, Inc., 682 F. Supp. 2d 1031, 1046-47 (N.D. Cal. 2010) (finding that plaintiffs did not plead sufficient facts to support a claim for unconscionability in violation of the CLRA because plaintiffs "simply state[d] that the imposition of the fee was unconscionable, without explaining [*12] how it 'shocked the conscience' or was 'harsh or oppressive'" and that "[t]he 'shock the conscience' standard is a high one"); Perdue v. Crocker Nat'l Bank, 38 Cal.3d 913, 926, 216 Cal. Rptr. 345, 702 P.2d 503 (Cal. 1985) (en banc) (explaining that "[a]llegations that the price exceeds cost or fair value, standing alone, do not state a cause of action," but require "further allegations and proof setting forth the circumstances of the transaction"). As such, without Plaintiff's allegations regarding Defendants' allegedly monopolistic conduct, all three of Plaintiff's claims—each based on Plaintiff's unconscionability theory—would fail as a matter of law. Although Plaintiff argues that Defendants' alleged CLRA violation "can succeed on a theory of unconscionability as alleged in the complaint," (Mot. at 9), the Court does not find Plaintiff's unconscionability theory adequately provides for an independent state law theory for Plaintiff's CLRA claim.

Rather, Defendants' monopolistic conduct, as alleged by Plaintiff in his Complaint, is only actionable under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, particularly where "[n]o California statute deals expressly with monopolization." Dimidowich v. Bell & Howell, 803 F.2d 1473, 1478 (9th Cir. 1986) (explaining that California's Cartwright Act, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720, "does not address unilateral conduct"), modified on denial of reh'g, 810 F.2d 1517 (9th Cir. 1987); see also Flagship Theatres of Palm Desert, LLC v. Century Theatres, Inc., 198 Cal. App. 4th 1366, 1386, 131 Cal. Rptr. 3d 519 (Cal. Ct. App. 2011) ("[T]he Cartwright [*13] Act contains no provision parallel to the Sherman Act's prohibition against monopolization (15 U.S.C. § 2), and the Cartwright Act applies only to a 'combination' involving 'two or more persons' (§ 16720), not to unilateral conduct."). Moreover, it is clear that "[t]he federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over federal antitrust claims." Turf Paradise, Inc. v. Arizona Downs, 670 F.2d 813, 821 (9th Cir. 1982); see also Marrese v. Am. Acad. of Orthopaedic Surgeons, 470 U.S. 373, 379-380, 105 S. Ct. 1327, 84 L. Ed. 2d 274 (1985) (citing Gen. Inv. Co. v. Lake Shore & Mich. S. Ry. Co., 260 U.S. 261, 286-88, 43 S. Ct. 106, 67 L. Ed. 244, 1 Ohio Law Abs. 162 (1922)).

Although federal jurisdiction over the entire case is proper even when only one asserted state law claim turns on a substantial federal question, the Court also finds that Plaintiff's UCL and common law claims necessarily raise federal issues. See Cty. of Santa Clara v. Astra USA, Inc., 401 F. Supp. 2d 1022, 1025 (N.D. Cal. 2005) ("If only one of several state claims satisfies the requirements for removal on federal-question grounds, then any other purely state claims in the same complaint may also be determined by the federal court under its supplemental jurisdiction.").

Plaintiff similarly argues that his UCL claim "can succeed on a theory that Defendants' conduct and pricing was unfair, even if not rising to the level of being unlawful, or alternatively, on a theory that Defendants' conduct was unlawful for violating the CLRA." (Mot. at 9.) As discussed above, however, Plaintiff's CLRA claim would fail as a matter of law if the [*14] Court disregarded Plaintiff's allegations regarding Defendants' monopolistic conduct. Although the Court agrees that "a violation of the unfair prong of the UCL does not necessarily require establishing a violation of the Sherman Act," *PeopleBrowsr, Inc. v. Twitter, Inc., No. C-12-6120 EMC, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31786, 2013 WL 843032, at 4 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 6, 2013), Plaintiff's UCL cause of action relies on Defendants' alleged "abuse of its monopoly position" and charging "supra-competitive prices," (Compl. ¶¶ 67, 68). Unlike in PeopleBrowsr, Plaintiff's Complaint does not allege conduct that "'significantly threatens or harms competition,' regardless of whether it represents an actual or incipient violation of an antitrust law." *PeopleBrowsr, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 31786, 2013 WL 843032, at 4 (quoting Cel—Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 187 (Cal. 1999)) (emphasis added). Instead, Plaintiff's claim depends on Defendants' actual or incipient violation of a federal antitrust law; Plaintiff's unconscionability theory is not "independent" of a federal antitrust theory. See Rains, 80 F.3d at 346.

Finally, Plaintiff contends that his quasi-contract and unjust enrichment cause of action "can succeed on a theory that Plaintiff's contract with Defendants is void as an illegal contract based on the CLRA and UCL violations and that Defendants have been [*15] unjustly enriched, a purely state law issue." (Mot. at 9.) For the same reasons that Plaintiff's CLRA and UCL claims fail to state an alternative and independent state law theory, Plaintiff's quasi-contract and unjust enrichment cause of action does not establish an independent state law claim.

For Plaintiff to prevail on his unconscionability theory that underlies his CLRA, UCL, and quasi-contract/unjust enrichment claims, Plaintiff must show that Defendants obtained a monopoly, and that Defendants charged supra-competitive prices. In fact, Plaintiff's class action allegations explicitly indicate that a "common legal and factual question[]" as to all class members is "[w]hether Defendants have obtained a monopoly with respect to Sunday afternoon out-of-market NFL game video presentations." (Compl. ¶ 47(a).) "That will necessarily require application of [federal antitrust] law to the facts of [Plaintiff's] case." See Gunn, 133 S. Ct. at 1065. A federal issue—namely, a federal antitrust issue under Section 2 of the Sherman Act—is necessarily raised in Plaintiff's artfully pleaded Complaint.

B. Defendants Dispute the Federal Antitrust Issue Raised by Plaintiff's Complaint

Defendants "vigorously den[y] all of the allegations in Plaintiff's [*16] Complaint," which include Plaintiff's assertions regarding Defendants' monopoly power and supra-competitive prices—allegations relevant to the federal antitrust issue. (Opp'n at 19.) Plaintiff's papers do not reference whether the federal antitrust issue is disputed in this case. (See generally Mot.; see Reply at 10; see also Opp'n at 19 ("[T]his factor is easily satisfied, and Plaintiff has not argued otherwise.").) Plaintiff alleges that DirecTV is a monopoly, that it abuses its monopoly position to charge supra-competitive prices and extract monopoly profits, (Compl. ¶¶ 35, 36); Defendants deny these assertions, (Opp'n at 19). This case thus involves a "dispute or controversy respecting the . . . effect of [federal] law." Grable, 545 U.S. at 313. The Court accordingly finds that the federal antitrust issue is "actually disputed" here. See Gunn, 133 S. Ct. at 1065-66.

C. The Federal Antitrust Issue is Substantial

The Supreme Court has explained that the third Gunn factor, the substantiality requirement, "looks . . . to the importance of the issue to the federal system as a whole." Gunn, 133 S. Ct. at 1066; see also id. at 1068 (explaining that "something more [than the vital importance of the resolution of a federal issue to the particular parties in the case], demonstrating [*17] that the question is significant to the federal system as a whole, is needed"). Plaintiff states, in conclusory fashion, that "any potential application of federal case law in this case will have limited effect on the federal system as a whole" because a "state court's consideration of the definitions of 'monopoly' or 'supra-competitive' in the context of the CLRA or UCL [has] little, if any, precedential effect." (Mot. at 11.)

As discussed above, Plaintiff's claims necessarily arise under the Sherman Act. The Supreme Court has expressly highlighted that "[t]he federal interest embodied in the Sherman Act is well-recognized and substantial." Miller v. Hedlund, 813 F.2d 1344, 1352 (9th Cir. 1986); see Cal. Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97, 111, 100 S. Ct. 937, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233 (1980) ("The federal interest in enforcing the national policy in favor of competition is both familiar and substantial. . . . We must acknowledge the importance of the [Sherman] Act's procompetition policy."). The Ninth Circuit has also acknowledged the "federal interest in promoting competition under the Sherman Act." Costco Wholesale Corp. v. Maleng, 522 F.3d 874, 903 (9th Cir. 2008).

In Grable, the Supreme Court explained that removal is permitted in substantial federal question cases because such cases "justify resort to the experience, solicitude, and hope of uniformity that a federal forum offers on federal issues." [*18] 545 U.S. at 312. Similarly, here, the JPML found that "centralization [of the various related cases concerning DirecTV's Sunday Ticket product] will . . . promote the just and efficient conduct of this litigation" and will "prevent inconsistent pretrial rulings." (JPML MDL, Dkt. No. 112 at 1-2.) Based on the express guidance of the Supreme Court and the Ninth Circuit, as well as the MDL context in which this case arises, the Court finds that the federal antitrust issue raised in Plaintiff's Complaint is substantial because of its importance to the federal system as a whole.

D. The Federal Antitrust Issue is Capable of Resolution in Federal Court Without Disrupting the Federal-State Balance Approved by Congress

The artful pleading doctrine is invoked "only in exceptional circumstances" because the doctrine "raises difficult issues of state and federal relationships and often yields unsatisfactory results." Salveson v. W. States Bankcard Ass'n, 731 F.2d 1423, 1427 (9th Cir. 1984). Plaintiff acknowledges that "the Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction of all cases arising under Section 2 of the Sherman Act," but claims that because federal courts do not have jurisdiction over "all questions in which monopolistic conduct may be the subject-matter of the controversy," the fourth [*19] Gunn factor is not met. The Court agrees that federal courts do not have jurisdiction over all cases alleging any type of monopolistic conduct. But, as discussed above, Plaintiff's Complaint artfully pleaded conduct that is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the federal court, namely under Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Plaintiff otherwise makes the same inapposite arguments discussed and dismissed by this Court above. (See Mot. at 12 ("Defendants have attempted to deprive Plaintiff of his rights as the master of his complaint. Where the same conduct is prohibited by both federal and state law, Plaintiff has every right to choose to enforce state law claims instead of federal law claims.").) The Court finds that the federal antitrust issue is capable of resolution by this Court without the risk of disrupting the federal-state balance.

Because the Court finds that Defendants have satisfied all four Gunn factors, the Court concludes that it may exert federal subject matter jurisdiction over Plaintiff's artfully pleaded Complaint.

V. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court DENIES Plaintiff's Motion to Remand. The Court hereby VACATES the hearing scheduled for March 29, 2016.

IT IS SO ORDERED [*20] .

HN1[] Preliminary Considerations, Jurisdiction

Federal courts are of limited jurisdiction, possessing only those powers conferred by the Constitution and Congress. Consequently, if the court lacks either the constitutional or statutory authority to adjudicate a claim, then the claim shall be dismissed. The requirement that jurisdiction be established as a threshold matter springs from the nature and limits of the judicial power of the United States and is inflexible and without exception. Motions filed under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1) allow a party to challenge the subject matter jurisdiction of the district court to hear a case. Because ensuring that a federal court has proper jurisdiction is fundamental and necessary before touching the substantive claims of a lawsuit, when a Rule 12(b)(1) motion is filed in conjunction with other Rule 12 motions, the court should consider the Rule 12(b)(1) jurisdictional attack before addressing any attack on the merits.

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Jurisdiction > Subject Matter Jurisdiction

HN2[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

In examining a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1) motion, the district court may consider matters of fact which may be in dispute. Lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be found in any one of three instances: (1) the complaint alone; (2) the complaint supplemented by undisputed facts evidenced in the record; or (3) the complaint supplemented by undisputed facts plus the court's resolution of disputed facts. The burden of proof lies with the party asserting jurisdiction. A Rule 12(b)(1) motion should only be granted if it appears certain that the plaintiff cannot prove any set of facts in support of his claim that would entitle plaintiff to relief.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Motions to dismiss for failure to state a claim are appropriate when a defendant attacks the complaint because it fails to state a legally cognizable claim. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). Under the Federal Rules, a pleading must contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). This requirement exists in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. Although Rule 8's pleading standard does not require detailed factual allegations, it demands more than an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN4[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

To survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. A claim has facial plausibility when a court can draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged based on the factual content pled. In determining plausibility, courts first disregard formulaic recitations of the elements of the legal claim as conclusory. The court then assumes the truth of all factual allegations and determines whether those factual allegations allege a plausible claim. Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. Where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged—but it has not shown—that the pleader is entitled to relief. If the facts fail to nudge the claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, then the complaint must be dismissed. On a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) review, the court may consider documents attached to or incorporated in the complaint and matters of which judicial notice may be taken.

HN5[] Jurisdiction, Subject Matter Jurisdiction

The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action arising under any Act of Congress relating to patents, plant variety protection, copyrights and trademarks. 28 U.S.C.S. § 1338.

Constitutional Law > The Judiciary > Case or Controversy

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Declaratory Judgments > Federal Declaratory Judgments

Civil Procedure > ... > Declaratory Judgments > Federal Declaratory Judgments > Scope of Declaratory Judgments

HN6[] Case & Controversy Requirements, Actual Controversy

The Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C.S. § 2201, authorizes courts to adjudicate controversies between parties before a conflict blossoms into a larger and costlier claim. The Act provides that in a case of actual controversy within its jurisdiction any court of the United States may declare the rights and other legal relations of any interested party seeking such declaration, whether or not further relief is or could be sought. 28 U.S.C.S. § 2201(a). The U.S. Supreme Court has stated that the phrase "case of actual controversy" in the Act refers to the type of cases and controversies that are justiciable under Article III. Accordingly, the federal Declaratory Judgment Act does not create a substantive cause of action it is merely a vehicle that allows a party to obtain an early adjudication of an actual controversy arising under other substantive law. Because the availability of such relief presupposes the existence of a judicially remediable right, a plaintiff cannot use the Declaratory Judgment Act to create a private right of action where none exists.

Civil Procedure > ... > Declaratory Judgments > Federal Declaratory Judgments > Discretionary Jurisdiction

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Declaratory Judgments > Federal Declaratory Judgments

HN7[] Federal Declaratory Judgments, Discretionary Jurisdiction

When analyzing whether to decide or dismiss a declaratory judgment suit, district courts engage in the three-step inquiry set out in Orix Credit Alliance, Inc. v. Wolfe. The court must consider: (1) whether the declaratory action is justiciable; (2) whether the court has the authority to grant declaratory relief; and (3) whether the court should exercise its discretion to decide or dismiss the action.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Declaratory Judgments > Federal Declaratory Judgments

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Jurisdiction > Federal Court Jurisdiction

Copyright Law > Copyright Infringement Actions > Civil Infringement Actions > Registration Requirement

HN8[] Declaratory Judgments, Federal Declaratory Judgments

The Copyright Act requires that certain conditions be fulfilled before infringement actions may be brought. 17 U.S.C.S. §§ 401-412. Copyright registration is one such jurisdictional prerequisite to asserting a copyright infringement action. As the opposite side of the same coin, a number of courts to address the issue have held that this jurisdictional prerequisite applies with equal force to declaratory judgment actions of copyright noninfringement. Accordingly, to bring a declaratory judgment action for copyright noninfringement, the declaratory judgment defendant's original complaint should include a copy of the registration certificate, indicate compliance with the registration provisions of the Copyright Act, and include a description of the specific works allegedly copyrighted.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Case & Controversy Requirements > Actual Controversy

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Declaratory Judgments > Federal Declaratory Judgments

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Ripeness > Tests for Ripeness

HN9[] Case & Controversy Requirements, Actual Controversy

A declaratory judgment action is ripe for adjudication only where an actual controversy exists. In order to meet the "actual controversy" requirement, a dispute must be definite and concrete, real and substantial, and admit of specific relief through a decree of a conclusive character. While declaratory judgment actions cannot be used to seek an opinion advising what the law would be on a hypothetical set of facts, declaratory judgment plaintiffs need not actually expose themselves to liability before bringing suit.

Patent Law > Remedies > Declaratory Judgments

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Remedies > Declaratory Judgments

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Declaratory Judgments > Federal Declaratory Judgments

HN10[] Trademark, Causes of Action Involving Trademarks

The new question in each patent, copyright, and trademark declaratory judgment suit is whether the facts alleged, under all the circumstances, show that there is a substantial controversy, between parties having adverse legal interest, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment. Although threats of legal action are no longer dispositive in this analysis, they can help establish an actual controversy if they are sufficiently specific and concrete. Likewise, actual manufacture, use, or sale of a potentially infringing product can indicate the presence of an actual controversy.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Declaratory Judgments > Federal Declaratory Judgments

HN11[] Declaratory Judgments, Federal Declaratory Judgments

The difference between an abstract question and a controversy contemplated by the Declaratory Judgment Act is necessarily one of degree, and it would be difficult, if it would be possible, to fashion a precise test for determining in every case whether there is such a controversy.

Texas antitrust law is founded on federal law. The current Texas Antitrust Act is modeled on both the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Clayton Act and provides that it is to be interpreted in harmony with federal judicial interpretations of federal laws.

HN13[] State Regulation, Claims

Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 15.05(b) states: It is unlawful for any person to monopolize, attempt to monopolize, or conspire to monopolize any part of trade or commerce. This provision mirrors § 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Accordingly, courts look to federal law interpreting § 2 of the Sherman Act for guidance in interpreting § 15.05(b) of the Texas Antitrust Act. To prevail on an attempted monopolization claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must prove: (1) that the defendant engaged in predatory or exclusionary conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize the relevant market, and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power. Predatory or exclusionary conduct under the first prong is behavior that tends to impair the opportunities of rivals and either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way.

Constitutional Law > Bill of Rights > Fundamental Freedoms > Freedom to Petition

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > Sham Exception

HN14[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The First Amendment right to petition the government protects the right to bring suit in state and federal courts. As a corollary to this right, the U.S. Supreme Court created the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, which immunizes defendants from antitrust liability for engaging in conduct (including litigation) aimed at influencing decision-making by the government. Courts recognize only one exception to Noerr-Pennington. Under the "sham exception" to this doctrine, activity ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action does not qualify for Noerr immunity if it is a mere sham to cover an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor. In order to constitute sham litigation, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits, and such baseless lawsuit must conceal an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

HN15[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

A "dangerous probability" is analyzed by considering the relevant market and the defendant's ability to lessen or destroy competition in that market. The relevant market must have both product and geographic dimensions. Moreover, in order to demonstrate that defendants have the capacity to achieve, let alone a dangerous probability of achieving, monopoly power, a plaintiff must provide evidence that defendants possess some legally significant share of the market.

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

Torts > ... > Contracts > Intentional Interference > Elements

HN16[] Burdens of Proof, Allocation

A plaintiff must establish the following elements to succeed on a tortious interference with contract claim: (1) the existence of a contract subject to interference; (2) willful and intentional interference; (3) that proximately causes damage; and (4) actual damage or loss. To establish intent, the plaintiff must show either that the interfering party had actual knowledge of the existence of the contract and of the plaintiff's interest in it or that the interfering party had knowledge of such facts and circumstances that would lead a reasonable person to believe in the existence of the contract and the plaintiff's interest in it. To show proximate cause, a plaintiff must allege that the defendant took an active part in persuading a party to a contract to breach it. In order for liability to arise, there must be some act of interference or of persuading a party to breach, for example by offering better terms or other incentive.

Torts > ... > Prospective Advantage > Intentional Interference > Elements

HN17[] Intentional Interference, Elements

Texas law protects prospective contracts and business relations from tortious interference. In order to prevail on a tortious interference with prospective business relationships claim, the plaintiff must establish: (1) there was a reasonable probability that the plaintiff would have entered into a business relationship with a third party; (2) the defendant either acted with a conscious desire to prevent the relationship from occurring or knew the interference was certain or substantially certain to occur as a result of the conduct; (3) the defendant's conduct was independently tortious or unlawful; (4) the interference proximately caused the plaintiff injury; and (5) the plaintiff suffered actual damage or loss as a result.

Torts > ... > Prospective Advantage > Intentional Interference > Elements

Torts > ... > Commercial Interference > Prospective Advantage > Intentional Interference

HN18[] Intentional Interference, Elements

Intentional interference does not require intent to injure, only that the actor desires to cause the consequences of his act, or that he believes that the consequences are substantially certain to result from it. Absent actual knowledge of the prospective contract or business relation, interference cannot be intentional. Moreover, interference is not improper if the defendant had no desire to effectuate the interference by his action but knew that it would be a mere incidental result of conduct he was engaging in for another purpose.

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

Torts > ... > Prospective Advantage > Intentional Interference > Elements

HN19[] Burdens of Proof, Allocation

The Supreme Court of Texas has made it clear that to establish liability for interference with a prospective contractual or business relation the plaintiff must prove that it was harmed by the defendant's conduct that was either independently tortious or unlawful. "Independently tortious" means that the conduct objected to would violate some other recognized tort duty. Conduct that is merely sharp or unfair is not actionable and cannot be the basis for an action for tortious interference with prospective relations. Wrongful litigation may be used as the basis for a tortious interference claim. However, litigation is not "wrongful" if instituted (1) in a bona fide exercise of the defendant's own rights or (2) pursuant to a good faith assertion of colorable legal rights.

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

Torts > ... > Prospective Advantage > Intentional Interference > Elements

HN20[] Burdens of Proof, Allocation

In a tortious interference with prospective relationship claim, a plaintiff must be able to show that the act of interference was the proximate cause of the damages suffered by it. The components of proximate cause are cause in fact and foreseeability. The test for cause in fact, or "but for causation," is whether the act or omission was a substantial factor in causing the injury without which the harm would not have occurred. "Foreseeability" means that the actor, as a person of ordinary intelligence, should have anticipated the dangers that his act created for others. In other words, proximate cause is that cause, unbroken by any new and independent cause, that produces injury and without which the injury would not have occurred.

18 U.S.C.S. § 1030(a)(2)(C) prohibits intentionally accessing a computer without authorization or exceeding authorized access, thereby obtaining information from any protected computer. Section 1030(a)(4) prohibits the knowing access of a protected computer without authorization, and with intent to defraud, if such conduct furthers the intended fraud and the violator obtains anything of value. 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(4). And a section of § 1030(a)(6) proscribes trafficking knowingly and with intent to defraud in any password or similar information through which a computer may be accessed without authorization when such trafficking affects interstate or foreign commerce.

The Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (CFAA), 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030, defines a "computer" as an electronic, magnetic, optical, electrochemical, or other high speed data processing device performing logical, arithmetic, or storage functions, and includes any data storage facility or communications facility directly related to or operating in conjunction with such device, but does not include an automated typewriter or typesetter, a portable hand held calculator, or other similar device. 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030(e)(1). A "protected computer" is one which is used in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce or communication. 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030(e)(2)(B). However, the term "facility" as used in the phrase "data storage facility or communications facility" within the definition of "computer" is not defined. 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030.

HN24[] Computer & Internet, Civil Actions

The Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (CFAA), 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030, does not define "authorization" or "authorized access." However, it clearly differentiates between unauthorized users and those who exceed authorized access. The term "exceeds authorized access" is defined in § 1030(e)(6): the term "exceeds authorized access" means to access a computer with authorization and to use such access to obtain or alter information in the computer that the accesser is not entitled so to obtain or alter. In conditioning the nature of the intrusion in part on the level of authorization a computer user possesses, Congress distinguished between insiders, who are authorized to access a computer, and outside hackers who break into a computer. Accordingly, courts typically analyze the scope of a user's authorization to access a protected computer on the basis of the expected norms of intended use or the nature of the relationship established between the computer owner and the user.

In light of the plain language of the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (CFAA), 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030, several courts have determined that there is no ownership requirement of the protected computer at issue to state a viable CFAA claim. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Texas agrees with these authorities' reading of the statute.

In the context of the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (CFAA), 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030, access to a computer and data that can be obtained from that access may be exceeded if the purposes for which access has been given are exceeded. The only potential concern the Fifth Circuit has expressed about finding CFAA liability when the access terms of an employment policy or license/confidentiality agreement have been exceeded is in the criminal context.

HN27[] Computer & Internet, Civil Actions

The civil-claims provision of the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (CFAA), 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030, states that any person who suffers damage or loss by reason of a § 1030 violation may maintain a civil action against the violator to obtain compensatory damages and injunctive relief or other equitable relief. 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030(g). However, the provision goes on to limit civil actions to only those situations involving one of the factors set forth in subclauses (I), (II), (III), (IV), or (V) of subsection (c)(4)(A)(i). Subclause (I) covers loss to 1 or more persons during any 1-year period aggregating at least $5,000 in value. 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030(c)(4)(A)(i)(I). The CFAA defines "loss" as "any reasonable cost to any victim, including the cost of responding to an offense, conducting a damage assessment, and restoring the data, program, system, or information to its condition prior to the offense, and any revenue lost, cost incurred, or other consequential damages incurred because of interruption of service. 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030(e)(11). Based on this language, courts have concluded that the term "loss" encompasses only two types of harm: costs to investigate and respond to an offense, and costs incurred because of a service interruption. "Damage" is defined as any impairment to the integrity or availability of data, a program, a system, or information. 18 U.S.C.S. § 1030(e)(8).

HN29[] Computer & Internet, Privacy & Security

The Electronic Communications Privacy Act provides a cause of action against anyone who intentionally accesses without authorization a facility through which an electronic communication service is provided; or intentionally exceeds an authorization to access that facility; and thereby obtains, alters, or prevents authorized access to a wire or electronic communication while it is in electronic storage in such system. 18 U.S.C.S. §§ 2701(a)(1), 2707(a). Accordingly, for defendants to be liable under the Stored Communications Act, they must have gained unauthorized access to a facility through which electronic communication services are provided (or the access must have exceeded the scope of authority given) and must thereby have accessed electronic communications while in storage.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Privacy & Security > Computer & Internet Law > Privacy & Security

Computer & Internet Law > Privacy & Security > Electronic Communications Privacy Act

HN30[] Computer & Internet, Privacy & Security

While the Stored Communications Act does not define the term "facility," it does define the terms "electronic communication," "electronic communication service" and "electronic storage." 18 U.S.C.S. § 2510. Electronic communication means any transfer of signs, signals, writing, images, sounds, data, or intelligence of any nature transmitted in whole or in part by a wire, radio, electromagnetic, photoelectronic or photooptical system that affects interstate or foreign commerce. 18 U.S.C.S. § 2510(12). The statute defines an "electronic communication service" (ECS) as any service which provides to users thereof the ability to send or receive wire or electronic communications. § 2510(15). "Electronic storage" is defined as (A) any temporary, intermediate storage of a wire or electronic communication incidental to the electronic transmission thereof; and (B) any storage of such communication by an electronic communication service for purposes of backup protection of such communication. § 2510(17).

Computer & Internet Law > Privacy & Security > Electronic Communications Privacy Act

HN31[] Privacy & Security, Electronic Communications Privacy Act

To state a claim under the Stored Communications Act (SCA), a plaintiff must show not only that defendants accessed a facility through which an electronic communication service is provided, but furthermore, that defendants obtained, altered, or prevented authorized access to a wire or electronic communication while it was in electronic storage in such system. 18 U.S.C.S. § 2701(a). The SCA defines "electronic storage" as (A) any temporary, intermediate storage of a wire or electronic communication incidental to the electronic transmission thereof; and (B) any storage of such communication by an electronic communication service for purposes of backup protection of such communication. 18 U.S.C.S. § 2510(17). A number of courts have read subsection (A) of the definition of "electronic storage" narrowly, concluding that data residing on an individual's hard drive or cell phone is not in electronic storage because, unlike emails waiting on the server to be delivered to the recipient, it is not in "temporary, intermediate storage" as required by the Act. Nevertheless, subsection (B) provides an alternative avenue to qualification as electronic storage. By its plain terms, subsection (B) applies to backup storage regardless of whether it is intermediate or post-transmission.

Authorized users cannot be held liable under § 2701 of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act. Under 18 U.S.C.S. § 2701(c)(1), a party is excepted from liability if the conduct is authorized by the provider of the electronic communications service.

Computer & Internet Law > Privacy & Security > Electronic Communications Privacy Act

HN33[] Privacy & Security, Electronic Communications Privacy Act

Section 2701(c) of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act allows those who are "authorized by a user" (i.e., third-party users) of the electronic communication service to access a communication "of or intended for that user." 18 U.S.C.S. § 2701(c)(2). The plain language of § 2701(c)(2) indicates that only a "user" of the service can authorize third-party access to the communication. The statute defines "user" as one who "1) uses the electronic communication service; and 2) is duly authorized by the provider of such service to engage in such use." 18 U.S.C.S. § 2510(13). Because the statutory language is unambiguous, it must control the construction of the statute, notwithstanding the legislative history.

In Texas, when one person has obtained a benefit from another by fraud, duress, or the taking of an undue advantage, he may recover under a theory of unjust enrichment. However, unjust enrichment is not a proper remedy merely because it might appear expedient or generally fair that some recompense be afforded for an unfortunate loss to the claimant, or because the benefits to the person sought to be charged amount to a windfall. Texas courts have also made it clear that unjust enrichment is based on quasi-contract and is unavailable when a valid, express contract governing the subject matter of the dispute exists.

Copyright Law > Constitutional Copyright Protections > Federal & State Law Interrelationships > Federal Preemption

HN35[] Federal & State Law Interrelationships, Federal Preemption

Section 301(a) of the Copyright Act, 17 U.S.C.S. § 301(a), accomplishes the general federal policy of creating a uniform method for protecting and enforcing certain rights in intellectual property by preempting other claims. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit follows a two-step approach to determine whether a state-law claim is preempted by § 301. At the first step, the cause of action is examined to determine if it falls within the subject matter of copyright. Second, the cause of action is examined to determine if it protects rights that are equivalent to any of the exclusive rights of a federal copyright, as provided in 17 U.S.C.S. § 106. In applying this test to cases involving software, the Fifth Circuit has made it clear that software falls within the ambit of § 301. However, claims not wholly limited to software are broader than the scope of copyright protection.

Copyright Law > ... > Civil Infringement Actions > Elements > Copying by Defendants

Torts > ... > Concerted Action > Civil Conspiracy > Elements

HN36[] Elements, Copying by Defendants

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit evaluates the equivalency of rights under what is commonly referred to as the "extra element" test. For example, § 106 of the Copyright Act, 17 U.S.C.S. § 106, grants the holder of a copyright the exclusive right to reproduce, distribute, perform, and display the copyrighted work. Thus, a state law claim protects rights equivalent to a federal copyright claim where the core of the state law theory of recovery speaks to wrongful copying. Conspiracy is considered a derivative tort because liability is presumed on participation in some underlying tort. The elements of civil conspiracy in Texas are: (1) a combination of two or more persons; (2) an object to be accomplished (an unlawful purpose or a lawful purpose by unlawful means); (3) a meeting of the minds on the object or course of action; (4) one or more unlawful, overt acts; and (5) damages as the proximate result. Specific intent is required. In evaluating the elements of civil conspiracy in the context of the extra-element test, the court has concluded that the intent element of the conspiracy claim does not constitute qualitatively different conduct where the element of intent only goes to an intent to form an agreement to copy and use copyrightable trade secrets and confidential information.

OPINION & ORDER

Pending in the above-referenced cause and addressed in this Order are Defendant Geo-Steering Solutions, Inc. and Geo-Steering Solutions USA, Inc's (collectively, "GSSI") Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) (Doc. 18), Plaintiff BHL Boresight, Inc.'s ("BHL") Motion to Dismiss GSSI Defendants' Counterclaim Counts I-III and VI-VIII for Lack of Subject Matter Jurisdiction and/or Failure to State a Claim (Doc. 27), Defendant Statoil Gulf Services LLC's ("Statoil") Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) and Memorandum in Support Thereof (Doc. 28), Defendant Statoil's Motion for Leave of Court to File a Reply Memorandum to Plaintiff BHL's Opposition of Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 48) and Plaintiff's Opposition and Alternative Motion for Leave to File Surreply (Doc. 56).[1] Having considered the parties' motions, responses, replies, and the relevant law, the Court concludes that BHL's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 27), Statoil's Motion [*3] for Leave of Court to File a Reply Memorandum (Doc. 48), and BHL's Motion for Leave to File Surreply (Doc. 56) should be GRANTED. GSSI's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 27) and Statoil's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 28) are GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

I. Background

This case arises from a soured business relationship and subsequent claims of license-agreement violations in the highly competitive oil and gas exploration industry. As the leading provider of geosteering software to oil and gas companies, Plaintiff BHL and Defendant Statoil's predecessor-in-interest, Brigham Oil & Gas, L.P. ("Brigham"), enjoyed a mutually beneficial working relationship for many years. (Doc. 1 at ¶ 12.) Pursuant to a 2009 licensing agreement between Brigham and BHL (the "Brigham License Agreement"), BHL provided Brigham access to its proprietary [*4] software. (Id.)

Under the terms of the Brigham License Agreement, BHL's software was loaded onto Brigham's computers. (See id. at ¶¶ 9, 12.) Because BHL's software is encrypted, however, Brigham and other licensees are provided with USB "bitlock" hardware devices as an additional security feature. (Id. at ¶ 9.) These bitlocks connect to a single computer, allowing access to the encrypted software on that particular device. (Id.) Since each computer running the software requires a bitlock in order to open the software, the licensee's needs determine the number of bitlocks provided. (Id.)

A number of years into the Brigham-BHL relationship, Statoil acquired Brigham and became a licensee of BHL's software by virtue of the acquisition. (Id. at ¶ 12.) On November 5, 2012, BHL and Statoil amended the Brigham License Agreement to reflect that Statoil would be subject to all terms and conditions of the original agreement between Brigham and BHL. (Id. at ¶ 13.) These terms and conditions included provisions stating that Statoil's rights were limited, third-party consultants could only use BHL's software and bitlocks after executing a separate usage

[1] The Court is aware that Plaintiff's Opposed Motion for Leave to File First Amended Complaint and Add Additional Parties (Doc. 75) remains pending. However, the Court defers a ruling on that motion at this time. Should Plaintiff wish to update Exhibit 1 to this motion, Plaintiff's First Amended Complaint (Doc. 75-1), in light of the Court's rulings herein, it is advised to do so.

agreement with BHL, and any use beyond the express [*5] terms and conditions of any sublicense agreement was automatically void and without authority. (Id. at ¶¶ 15-18.)

Although BHL permits its licensees to use BHL's software with third-party consulting entities, it only does so "[i]n limited cases, and with advanced notice and prior written agreement." (Id. at ¶ 10.) If the consulting entity is a direct competitor in the geosteering software market, the entity is subject to "extensive use restrictions and conditions," including "acknowledgement and protection of BHL's intellectual property." (Id.) In this case, BHL only authorized one consultant, Neset Consulting Services, to use its software with Statoil. (Id. at ¶ 14.) However, in the fall of 2014, BHL discovered that Statoil had provided BHL's software and bitlocks to GSSI—a new geosteering software provider and direct competitor of BHL. (Id. at ¶¶ 21, 23, 25.) When BHL confronted Statoil, it was informed that GSSI was indeed in possession of BHL's bitlocks. (Id. at ¶ 25.)

Believing that GSSI used this unrestricted and unauthorized access to develop its own geosteering software program (Id. at ¶ 24), BHL initiated this action. BHL brings claims against Statoil and GSSI for violations of [*6] the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act ("CFAA") and Electronic Communications Privacy Act ("ECPA") (Counts I-III), unjust enrichment (Count V), and civil conspiracy (Count VIII). (Id. at ¶¶ 28-51, 60-64, 77-80.) BHL also alleges misappropriation of trade secrets (Count IV) and civil theft (Count VII) against GSSI and breach of contract (Count VI) against Statoil. (Id. at ¶¶ 52-59, 65-76.) GSSI has asserted counterclaims against BHL for: request for declaratory judgment of independent creation of the GSSI software (Count I), request for declaratory judgment that the GSSI software is an original work (Count II), request for declaratory judgment that GSSI did not copy BHL's software in creating GSSI's software (Count III), Lanham Act violation (Count IV), common law unfair competition (Count V), state antitrust violation (Count VI), tortious interference with existing contract (Count VII), and tortious interference with prospective business relationships (Count VIII). (Doc. 19 at ¶¶ 10-56.) All parties have filed motions to dismiss under either Rule 12(b)(1) or 12(b)(6), which are now ripe for adjudication. (Docs. 18, 27, 28.)

II. Legal Standard

A. 12(b)(1)

HN1[] Federal courts are of limited jurisdiction, possessing only [*7] those powers conferred by the Constitution and Congress. Kokkonen v. Guardian Life Ins. Co., 511 U.S. 375, 377, 114 S. Ct. 1673, 128 L. Ed. 2d 391 (1994); Halmekangas v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 603 F.3d 290, 292 (5th Cir. 2010). Consequently, if the court lacks either the constitutional or statutory authority to adjudicate a claim, then the claim shall be dismissed. Krim v. pcOrder.com, Inc., 402 F.3d 489, 494 (5th Cir. 2005) (citations omitted). The requirement that jurisdiction be established as a threshold matter "spring[s] from the nature and limits of the judicial power of the United States" and is "inflexible and without exception." Mansfield, C. & L.M.R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U.S. 379, 382, 4 S. Ct. 510, 28 L. Ed. 462 (1884).

Motions filed under Rule 12(b)(1) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow a party to challenge the subject matter jurisdiction of the district court to hear a case. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1). Because ensuring that a federal court has proper jurisdiction "is fundamental and necessary before touching the substantive claims of a lawsuit," Arena v. Graybar Elec. Co., Inc., 669 F.3d 214, 223 (5th Cir. 2012), "[w]hen a Rule 12(b)(1) motion is filed in conjunction with other Rule 12 motions, the court should consider the Rule 12(b)(1) jurisdictional attack before addressing any attack on the merits." Ramming v. United States, 281 F.3d 158, 161 (5th Cir. 2001) (per curiam) (citing Hitt v. City of Pasadena, 561 F.2d 606, 608 (5th Cir. 1977)).

HN2[] In examining a Rule 12(b)(1) motion, the district court may consider matters of fact which may be in dispute. Id. (citing Williamson v. Tucker, 645 F.2d 404, 413 (5th Cir. 1981)). Lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be found in any one of three instances: (1) the complaint alone; (2) the complaint supplemented by undisputed facts evidenced in the record; or (3) the complaint supplemented [*8] by undisputed facts plus the court's resolution of disputed facts. Id. (citing Barrera—Montenegro v. United States, 74 F.3d 657, 659 (5th Cir. 1996)). The burden of proof lies with the party asserting jurisdiction. *Choice Inc. of Tex. v. A 12(b)(1) motion should only be granted "if it appears certain that the plaintiff cannot prove any set of facts in support of his claim that would entitle plaintiff to relief." Ramming, 281 F.3d at 161 (citing Home Builders Ass'n of Miss., Inc. v. City of Madison, 143 F.3d 1006, 1010 (5th Cir. 1998)).

B. 12(b)(6)

HN3[] Motions to dismiss for failure to state a claim are appropriate when a defendant attacks the complaint because it fails to state a legally cognizable claim. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). Under the Federal Rules, a pleading must contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). This requirement exists in order to "give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests," Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (quoting Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957)) (internal citation marks omitted). Although Rule 8's pleading standard "does not require 'detailed factual allegations,' it demands more than an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555).

HN4[] "To survive a motion to dismiss [for failure to state a claim], a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief [*9] that is plausible on its face.'" Id. at 678 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570). "A claim has facial plausibility when a court can draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged based on the factual content pled." Id. at 678 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). In determining plausibility, courts first disregard "formulaic recitation[s] of the elements" of the legal claim as conclusory. Id. at 678. The court then assumes the truth of all factual allegations and determines whether those factual allegations allege a plausible claim. See id. "Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will . . . be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense." Id. at 679 (citation omitted).

"[W]here the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged—but it has not 'show[n]'—'that the pleader is entitled to relief.'" Id. (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2)). If the facts fail to "nudge[] the[] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, [then] the[] complaint must be dismissed." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. On a Rule 12(b)(6) review, "the court may consider documents attached to or incorporated in the complaint and matters of which judicial notice may be taken." *U.S. ex rel. Willard v. III. Analysis

A. BHL's Motion to Dismiss GSSI's Counterclaims

BHL seeks to have this Court dismiss six of GSSI's eight counterclaims against Plaintiff for lack of subject matter jurisdiction and/or failure to state a claim. (Doc. 27.) Specifically, BHL requests dismissal of the following claims: (1) request for declaratory judgment of independent creation of the GSSI software (Count I); (2) request for declaratory judgment that the GSSI software is an original work (Count II); (3) request for declaratory judgment that GSSI did not copy BHL's software in creating GSSI's software (Count III); (4) state antitrust claim (Count VI); (5) tortious interference with existing contract (Count VII); and (6) tortious interference with prospective business relationships (Count VIII). GSSI opposes this motion, arguing that it has pleaded its claims sufficiently to withstand BHL's attack. (Doc. 37.) Should the Court disagree, however, GSSI requests leave to amend. (Id.)

a. Declaratory Judgment Claims of Copyright Non-Infringement (Counts I-III)

BHL contends that this Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over GSSI's three counterclaims seeking declarations of copyright non-infringement. (Doc. 27 at [*11] 12.) Specifically, BHL argues that because it did not assert a copyright claim in its complaint there is no "substantial controversy of sufficient immediacy and reality between Boresight and the GSSI Defendants to warrant the Court's jurisdiction over these three counterclaims." (Id.) GSSI responds that "it cannot be argued that there is not an actual [copyright] case or controversy" for several reasons: (1) BHL's counsel sent a letter threating legal action for alleged violations of BHL's "copyrights;" (2) BHL's complaint states that this Court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1338;[2] (3) BHL's complaint notes that its software devices provide an electronic reminder to the licensed user that "Boresight's Software is subject to copyright protection;" (4) BHL claims sole ownership of the software in its complaint; and (4) BHL seeks remedies exclusive to copyright. (Doc. 37 at 11-13.) Moreover, GSSI asserts that this Court his subject matter jurisdiction over its declaratory judgment counterclaims because "Plaintiff's state law trade secret claims (Count IV) are pre-empted by the Copyright Act."[3] (Id. at 16).

HN6[] The Declaratory Judgment Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2201, authorizes courts to adjudicate [*13] controversies between parties before a conflict blossoms into a larger and costlier claim. The Act provides that "[i]n a case of actual controversy within its jurisdiction . . . any court of the United States . . . may declare the rights and other legal relations of any interested party seeking such declaration, whether or not further relief is or could be sought." 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a). The Supreme Court has stated that "the phrase 'case of actual controversy' in the Act refers to the type of 'Cases' and 'Controversies' that are justiciable under Article III." MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 549 U.S. 118, 127, 127 S. Ct. 764, 166 L. Ed. 2d 604 (2007) (quoting Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Haworth, 300 U.S. 227, 240, 57 S. Ct. 461, 81 L. Ed. 617 (1937)).

Accordingly, "[t]he federal Declaratory Judgment Act . . . does not create a substantive cause of action . . . [it] is merely a vehicle that allows a party to obtain an early adjudication of an actual controversy arising under other substantive law." *Perez v. Ocwen Loan Servicing, LLC, 4:15-CV-1751, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 156895, 2015 WL 7430920, at 5 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 20, 2015) (alteration in original) (citation and internal citation marks omitted). Because "the availability of such relief presupposes the existence of a judicially remediable right," Schilling v. Rogers, 363 U.S. 666, 677, 80 S. Ct. 1288, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1478 (1960), "a plaintiff cannot use the Declaratory Judgment Act to create a private right of action where none exists." Reid v. Aransas Cnty., 805 F. Supp. 2d 322, 339 (S.D. Tex. 2011) (citation omitted).

HN7[] When analyzing whether to decide or dismiss a declaratory [*14] judgment suit, district courts engage in the three-step inquiry set out in Orix Credit Alliance, Inc. v. Wolfe, 212 F.3d 891, 895 (5th Cir. 2000). The Court must consider: (1) whether the declaratory action is justiciable; (2) whether the court has the authority to grant declaratory relief; and (3) whether the court should exercise its discretion to decide or dismiss the action. Id. Because the Court decides this case on the first step, it need not discuss the second or third.

[2] HN5[] "The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action arising under any Act of Congress [*12] relating to patents, plant variety protection, copyrights and trademarks." 28 U.S.C. § 1338.

[3] The Court can easily dispose of this argument. Count IV of Plaintiff's complaint is a claim for misappropriation of trade secrets under the Texas Uniform Trade Secrets Act ("TUTSA"). (See Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 52-59.) It is well established that a misappropriation of trade secrets claim under TUTSA is not preempted by the Copyright Act because it contains an "extra element" of breach of confidentiality or improper methods, which is not equivalent to any of the exclusive rights of copyright. *Beardmore v. Jacobson, 4:13-CV-361, 131 F. Supp. 3d 656, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123365, 2015 WL 5530398, at 11 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 18, 2015); M-I LLC v. Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d 759, 786 (S.D. Tex. 2010); *GlobeRanger Corp. v. Software AG USA, Inc., 3:11-CV-0403-B, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76059, 2015 WL 3648577, at 4-5 (N.D. Tex. June 11, 2015). This stands in stark contrast to trade secret claims under TUTSA's predecessor, the Texas Theft Liability Act ("TTLA"), which courts in this district uniformly held was preempted by copyright law. *Beardmore, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123365, 2015 WL 5530398, at 10 (citing Spear Mktg., Inc. v. BancorpSouth Bank, 791 F.3d 586, 598 (5th Cir. 2015)) ("The Fifth Circuit has held theft of trade secrets under § 31.05 as applied to software is preempted by the Copyright Act."). Accordingly, GSSI cannot rely on preemption of Count IV for subject matter jurisdiction of their declaratory judgment claims of copyright non-infringement.

i. Justiciability: Substantive Cause of Action

GSSI contends that this Court has subject matter jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1338(a), which gives a federal court original jurisdiction over any civil action arising under federal copyright law. In its counter complaint, GSSI seeks copyright noninfringement declarations from this Court affirming that: (1) GSSI software was independently created; (2) GSSI software is an original work; and (3) GSSI did not copy BHL software in creating GSSI software. (Doc. 19 at ¶¶ 24, 30, 36.)

HN8[] The Copyright Act requires that certain conditions be fulfilled before infringement actions may be brought. See 17 U.S.C. §§ 401-412. Copyright registration is one such jurisdictional prerequisite to asserting a copyright infringement action. *FedEx Ground Package Sys., Inc. v. Applications Intern. Corp., CIV.A. 03-1512, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107896, 2008 WL 4279751, at 7 (W.D. Pa. Sept. 12, 2008); see also Feist Publ'ns, Inc. v. Rural Tel. Serv. Co., 499 U.S. 340, 361, 111 S. Ct. 1282, 113 L. Ed. 2d 358 (1991) (stating that to prove copyright infringement, [*15] a plaintiff must show (1) ownership of a valid copyright and (2) actionable copying); Galiano v. Harrah's Operating Co., Inc., 416 F.3d 411, 414 (5th Cir. 2005) (same). As the opposite side of the same coin, a number of courts to address the issue have held that this jurisdictional prerequisite applies with equal force to declaratory judgment actions of copyright noninfringement. *See, e.g., Audio Sys. of Florida, Inc. v. SimplexGrinnell LP, 603CV404ORL22DAB, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23344, 2003 WL 25571401, at 3 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 11, 2003) ("[W]here, as here, the Counter-defendant has not made any application for registration, Counter-claimant's declaratory judgment action for copyright non-infringement is barred"); *Prospect Planet, LLC v. Paychecks for Life.com, A3-02-91, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 835, 2003 WL 751023, at 2 (D.N.D. Jan. 16, 2003) ("Plaintiff's declaratory judgment action for copyright non-infringement is barred because of Defendant's failure to register its copyright"); Burns v. Rockwood Distrib. Co., 481 F. Supp. 841, 849 n.14 (N.D. Ill. 1979) ("defendants cannot rely on 28 U.S.C. § 1338(a) as a basis for federal jurisdiction" of their counterclaim for a declaration of copyright noninfringement because "satisfaction of the jurisdictional prerequisites of copyright registration and recordation . . . is not shown . . . ."). Accordingly, to bring a declaratory judgment action for copyright noninfringement, the declaratory judgment defendant's original complaint should include a copy of the registration [*16] certificate, indicate compliance with the registration provisions of the Copyright Act, and include a description of the specific works allegedly copyrighted. See Burns, 481 F. Supp. at 845, 845 n.3, n. 14 (N.D. Ill. 1979) (declaratory judgment plaintiff barred from bringing action for noninfringement because declaratory judgment defendant had not indicated compliance with copyright-action prerequisites in her original complaint).

Here, BHL's complaint makes no reference to copyright aside from one brief statement that "Boresight's Software is subject to copyright protection." (Doc. 1 at ¶ 20.) BHL's complaint does not include a registration certificate, indicate compliance with the registration provisions of the Copyright Act, or describe specific works. As a result, it could not assert a copyright infringement claim against Defendants. GSSI's declaratory judgment claims for copyright non-infringement are, therefore, likewise barred.

ii. Justiciability: Actual Controversy

There is another ground for this Court's conclusion that it lacks subject matter jurisdiction over GSSI's copyright non-infringement claims. Like any other action, declaratory judgment actions must be ripe in order to be justiciable. Orix, 212 F.3d at 896 (5th Cir. 2000) (citation omitted). HN9[] "A declaratory judgment [*17] action is ripe for adjudication only where an 'actual controversy' exists." Id. (citing 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a)). In order to meet the "actual controversy" requirement, a dispute must be "definite and concrete, real and substantial, and admit of specific relief through a decree of a conclusive character." Vantage Trailers, Inc. v. Beall Corp., 567 F.3d 745, 748 (5th Cir. 2009) (citing MedImmune, 549 U.S. at 127). While declaratory judgment actions "cannot be used to seek an opinion advising what the law would be on a hypothetical set of facts," declaratory judgment plaintiffs "need not actually expose themselves to liability before bringing suit." Id. (citing MedImmune, 549 U.S. at 127, 129-30).

Courts apply a common framework to the justiciability analysis in all patent, copyright, and trademark declaratory judgment suits. Id. (citation omitted). Prior to the Supreme Court's decision in MedImmune, this was a two-part test, which required the declaratory plaintiff to show: (1) an explicit threat or other action by the [holder of a patent, trademark, or copyright], which creates a reasonable apprehension on the part of the declaratory plaintiff that it will face an infringement suit, and (2) present activity which could constitute infringement or concrete steps taken with the intent to conduct such activity. See, e.g., Texas v. West Pub. Co., 882 F.2d 171, 175 (5th Cir. 1989) (adopting the Federal [*18] Circuit's two-part test). MedImmune invalidated the first prong of this test. SanDisk Corp. v. STMicroelectronics, Inc., 480 F.3d 1372, 1380 (Fed. Cir. 2007). Consequently, HN10[] the new "question in each case is whether the facts alleged, under all the circumstances, show that there is a substantial controversy, between parties having adverse legal interest, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment." MedImmune, 549 U.S. at 127 (quoting Md. Cas. Co. v. Pac. Coal & Oil Co., 312 U.S. 270, 273, 61 S. Ct. 510, 85 L. Ed. 826 (1941)).

Although threats of legal action are no longer dispositive in this analysis, they can help establish an actual controversy if they are sufficiently specific and concrete. Young v. Vannerson, 612 F. Supp. 2d 829, 840 (S.D. Tex. 2009) (citing Prasco, LLC v. Medicis Pharm. Corp., 537 F.3d 1329, 1336 (Fed. Cir. 2008)) ("[F]ollowing MedImmune, proving a reasonable apprehension of suit is one of multiple ways that a declaratory judgment plaintiff can satisfy the more general all-the-circumstances test to establish that an action presents a justiciable Article III controversy."). Likewise, actual manufacture, use, or sale of a potentially infringing product can indicate the presence of an actual controversy. Id. (citing Int'l Harvester Co. v. Deere & Co., 623 F.2d 1207, 1215 (7th Cir. 1980)). Here, the parties are already involved in litigation and GSSI is using contested software.[4] (Doc. 37 at 13.) However, the analysis does not end here.

Both parties cite the same cases, Vantage Trailers and Spindletop Films, highlighting language and facts relevant to their respective positions. (Compare Doc. 27 at 13-14 with Doc. 37 at 14-15.) The Court concedes that the applicability of these and other justiciability cases to the facts at hand depends on how the dispute is framed. As the Supreme Court itself has admitted, HN11[] "[t]he difference between an abstract question and a 'controversy' contemplated by the Declaratory Judgment Act is necessarily one of degree, and it would be difficult, if it would be possible, to fashion a precise test for determining in every case whether there is such a controversy." Md. Cas. Co., 312 U.S. at 273.

Nevertheless, even were the Court to conclude that the current litigation and the issue of contested software indicates there is some copyright controversy between the parties, it "is less clear . . . whether the controversy is sufficiently immediate and real to render it an 'actual controversy' under the Declaratory Judgment Act." Wright v. Spindletop Films, 830 F. Supp. 2d 280, 285 (citing Vantage Trailers, 567 F.3d at 750-51). Plaintiff did not bring a copyright infringement claim in this case and very likely may never do so (depending on the resolution of [*20] the other claims currently pending before the Court and whether it has a valid copyright registration in the first place).[5] As a result, the Court concludes GSSI is essentially requesting an "opinion advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical state of [copyright] facts."[6] MedImmune, 549 U.S. at 127 (citation and internal citation marks omitted). Accordingly, there is no dispute that is "definite and concrete, real and substantial . . . and admit[s] of specific relief through a decree of a conclusive character." Vantage Trailers, 567 F.3d at 748 (citation and internal citation marks omitted). GSSI's declaratory judgment claims for copyright non-infringement must be dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

[4] It is important to note that BHL alleges the software was created using misappropriated trade secrets, [*19] not that the software is infringing a copyright that BHL owns.

[5] Moreover, as mentioned in the previous section, based on the pleadings it is questionable whether Plaintiff could bring a copyright claim against Defendants in the first place.

[6] I.e., there was a valid, registered copyright, it can be compared to the software that GSSI has developed for purposes of copyright infringement analysis, it was copied, etc.

b. State Antitrust Claim (Count VI)

Count VI of GSSI's counterclaims asserts a state antitrust claim against BHL. (Doc. 19 at ¶¶ 47-49.) GSSI alleges that "[t]hrough the assertion of their claims and [*21] this litigation against the GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs, BHL has attempted to stifle competition in an effort to monopolize the geosteering software market in contravention of § 15.01 et seq. of the Texas Business and Commerce Code." (Doc. 19 at ¶ 48.) GSSI Defendants also allege that "[t]hrough the assertion of their claims and this litigation against the GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs, BHL has attempted to stifle competition in an effort to monopolize the geosteering consultancy market in contravention of § 15.01 et seq. of the Texas Business and Commerce Code." (Doc. 19 at ¶ 49.)

BHL seeks dismissal of the antitrust claim under Rule 12(b)(6). (Doc. 27 at 18-23). BHL claims that GSSI failed to plead the required elements for an antitrust claim. (Id.) Specifically, BHL alleges that GSSI failed to plead anticompetitive conduct, allege damages or injury, and define the relevant market. (Id.) BHL also argues that its lawsuit against GSSI is immunized under Noerr-Pennington as "protected petitioning" and GSSI cannot plead sham litigation so as to discredit this immunity. (Id. at 19-21.) In response, GSSI admonishes the Court to "read the Complaint in its entirety, [because] dismissal of an antitrust claim at the motion to dismiss stage for failure to plead the [*22] relevant market adequately should not be done lightly." GSSI goes on:

> In this case, Boresight has alleged that it is the market leader in the U.S. oil and gas exploration industry, which indicates that Boresight exercises substantial market power in the geosteering market, and may in fact be attempting to exercise monopoly power in that market. In view of that fact, GSSI's complaint alleges that Boresight is attempting to use that market power in an effort to stifle competition and monopolize the geosteering software market in contravention of Texas Antitrust law. (Dkt. 19 at ¶¶ 48-49). These allegations, if proved, would largely substantiate GSSI's antitrust claims.

(Doc. 37 at 20.)

HN12[] Texas antitrust law is founded on federal law. The current Texas Antitrust Act is modeled on both the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Clayton Act and provides that it is to be interpreted in harmony with federal judicial interpretations of federal laws. Caller-Times Pub. Co., Inc. v. Triad Commc'ns, Inc., 826 S.W.2d 576, 580 (Tex. 1992); see also Tex. Bus. & Com. Code § 15.04 ("The provisions of this Act . . . shall be construed in harmony with federal judicial interpretations of comparable federal antitrust statutes to the extent consistent with this purpose.").

GSSI's antitrust counterclaim is best characterized as an [*23] attempted monopolization claim premised on the "anticompetitive conduct" of BHL's "assertion of their claims and this litigation against the GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs." (Doc. 19 at ¶¶ 48-49.) The provision of the Texas Antitrust Act implicated by this counterclaim is § 15.05(b), HN13[] which states: "It is unlawful for any person to monopolize, attempt to monopolize, or conspire to monopolize any part of trade or commerce." Tex. Bus. & Com. Code § 15.05(b). This provision mirrors § 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act.[7] Accordingly, courts look to federal law interpreting § 2 of the Sherman Act for guidance in interpreting section 15.05(b) of the Texas Antitrust Act. Caller-Times, 826 S.W.2d at 580.

To prevail on an attempted monopolization claim under § 2, a plaintiff must prove: (1) that the defendant engaged in predatory or exclusionary conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize the relevant market, and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power. Surgical Care Ctr. of Hammond, L.C. v. Hosp. Serv. Dist. No. 1 of Tangipahoa Parish, 309 F.3d 836, 839 (5th Cir. 2002) (citing [*24] Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 456, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993)). Predatory or exclusionary conduct under the first prong is "behavior that tends to impair the opportunities of rivals and either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way." Cascade Health Sols. v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 894 (9th Cir.

[7] Section 2 provides: "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony . . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 2.

2008) (citing Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 605 n.32, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985)). One type of exclusionary conduct that may form the basis of an antitrust claim is known as "sham litigation."[8] See Rockbit Indus. U.S.A., Inc. v. Baker Hughes, Inc., 802 F. Supp. 1544, 1552 (S.D. Tex. 1991) ("The remaining exclusionary conduct alleged by Rockbit is sham litigation."); RPC, Inc. v. Rick Prudhomme, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3946, at *9 (E.D. Tex. Jan. 19, 2007) ("Defendants contend that by initiating litigation against them, Plaintiffs engaged in anti-competitive conduct in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act and Texas Business and Commerce Code § 15.05 as the litigation 'is a mere sham . . . .'").

i. Predatory or Exclusionary Conduct: Sham Litigation & Noerr-Pennington

HN14[] The First Amendment right to petition the government protects the right to bring suit in state and federal courts. Cal. Motor Transp. Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 510, 92 S. Ct. 609, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642 (1972). As a corollary to this right, the Supreme Court created the Noerr-Pennington doctrine,[9] which immunizes defendants from antitrust liability for [*25] engaging in conduct (including litigation) aimed at influencing decision-making by the government. Octane Fitness, LLC v. ICON Health & Fitness, Inc., 134 S. Ct. 1749, 1757, 188 L. Ed. 2d 816 (2014) (citing Prof'l Real Estate Investors, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Indus., Inc., 508 U.S. 49, 56, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1993)). Courts recognize only one exception to Noerr-Pennington. Under the "sham exception" to this doctrine, "activity 'ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action' does not qualify for Noerr immunity if it 'is a mere sham to cover . . . an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor.'" Id. (quoting Prof'l Real Estate Investors, 508 U.S. at 51). In order to constitute sham litigation, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits, and such baseless lawsuit must conceal an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor. Prof'l Real Estate Investors, 508 U.S. at 60-61.

Here, BHL filed suit against Defendants alleging violations of the Computer Fraud and Abuse and Electronic Communications Privacy Acts, misappropriation of trade secrets, unjust enrichment, breach of contract, civil theft, and civil conspiracy. (Doc. 1.) Given the allegations as they are laid out in the Original Complaint, the Court cannot say that BHL's claims are baseless. Nor did GSSI allege [*26] facts to show otherwise in its antitrust counterclaim. Accordingly, the Court finds that the instant lawsuit is protected activity under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine.

i. Dangerous Probability: Defining the Relevant Market

Although the Court may stop here, there are additional grounds for this Court's conclusion that GSSI's counterclaims are deficient. The Court also concludes that GSSI's claim should be dismissed under 12(b)(6) because GSSI fails to define the relevant market. HN15[] "A 'dangerous probability' is analyzed by considering the relevant market and the defendant's ability to lessen or destroy competition in that market." Rio Grande Royalty Co., Inc. v. Energy Transfer Partners, L.P., 786 F. Supp. 2d 1190, 1194-95 (S.D. Tex. 2009) (citing Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 456, 459). The relevant market must have both product and geographic dimensions. Domed Stadium Hotel, Inc. v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 732 F.2d 480, 487 (5th Cir. 1984) (citing Fort Worth Nat'l Corp. v. Fed. Sav. and Loan Ins. Corp., 469 F.2d 47, 59 (5th Cir. 1972); Hornsby Oil Co. v. Champion Spark Plug Co., 714 F.2d 1384, 1393 (5th Cir. 1983)). Moreover, "[i]n order to demonstrate that defendants have the capacity to achieve, let alone a dangerous probability of achieving, monopoly power, a plaintiff must provide evidence that defendants possess some legally significant share of the market." Benson v. St. Joseph Reg'l Health Ctr., CIV.A.H-04-4323,

[8] Although GSSI is not explicit in calling the litigation a "sham," since there are no other allegations of "predatory or exclusionary conduct," the Court treats GSSI's counterclaim, for the purpose of this analysis, as resting on the sham litigation doctrine.

[9] The Noerr-Pennington doctrine was established in Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961), and United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965).

2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 99255, 2007 WL 7120757, at *12 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 22, 2007), aff'd, 575 F.3d 542 (5th Cir. 2009) (citing Domed Stadium, 732 F.2d at 490).

GSSI half-heartedly attempts to delineate the relevant market by referencing the "geosteering software" and "geosteering consultancy" markets. (See Doc. 19 at ¶¶ 48-49.) Unfortunately, these allegations standing [*27] alone are inadequate. GSSI does not define the geographic boundaries of the market, and "does not provide allegations about market conditions [or BHL's market power] to assist the Court in determining whether [BHL] might have possessed sustained monopoly power sufficient to support a claim for attempted monopolization." Rio Grande Royalty, 786 F. Supp. 2d at 1213. This failure is fatal to GSSI's counterclaim. See, e.g., Star Tobacco Inc. v. Darilek, 298 F. Supp. 2d 436, 448 (E.D. Tex. 2003) (dismissing attempted monopolization counterclaim for failure to "include key factual allegations regarding the composition of the relevant geographic and product markets."); Rockbit, 802 F. Supp. at 1553 (dismissing attempted monopolization claim because "Rockbit's bare allegation that there is a dangerous probability that Baker Hughes will be successful in its attempt to monopolize is insufficient to support its claim. . . . without any allegation of supporting facts").

c. Tortious Interference with Contractual Relationship (Count VII)

HN16[] A plaintiff must establish the following elements to succeed on a tortious interference with contract claim: (1) the existence of a contract subject to interference; (2) willful and intentional interference; (3) that proximately causes damage; and (4) actual damage or loss. Butnaru v. Ford Motor Co., 84 S.W.3d 198, 207 (Tex. 2002) (citations omitted); Specialties of Mex. Inc. v. Masterfoods USA, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58782, 2010 WL 2488031, at *9 (S.D. Tex. June 14, 2010) (citation [*28] omitted). To establish intent, "the plaintiff must show either that the interfering party had actual knowledge of the existence of the contract and of the plaintiff's interest in it or that the interfering party had knowledge of such facts and circumstances that would lead a reasonable person to believe in the existence of the contract and the plaintiff's interest in it." Exxon Corp. v. Allsup, 808 S.W.2d 648, 656 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 1991, writ denied) (citations omitted). To show proximate cause, "a plaintiff must allege that 'the defendant took an active part in persuading a party to a contract to breach it.'" Hambric Sports Mgmt., LLC v. Team AK, Inc., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65491, 2010 WL 2605243, at *9 (N.D. Tex. June 29, 2010) (citing Amigo Broad., LP v. Spanish Broad. Sys., Inc., 521 F.3d 472, 493 (5th Cir. 2008)). In order for liability to arise, "there must be some act of interference or of persuading a party to breach, for example by offering better terms or other incentives . . . ." M-I LLC v. Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d 759, 775 (S.D. Tex. 2010) (citation omitted).

Pointing to Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Sturges, 52 S.W.3d 711, 726 (Tex. 2001), BHL argues that a plaintiff must plead factual allegations that would be actionable under a recognized tort to state a claim for tortious interference with an existing contract. (Doc. 27 at 24) Because GSSI failed to plead independently tortious conduct, BHL insists that GSSI's tortious interference with existing contract claim must be dismissed.[10] (Id. at 24-26.) BHL misreads Sturges. Sturges involved claims for tortious interference with prospective [*29] business relations, not with an existing contract. See Sturges, 52 S.W.3d at 726 ("We therefore hold that to recover for tortious interference with a prospective business relation a plaintiff must prove that the defendant's conduct was independently tortious or wrongful.") (emphasis added). Indeed, as another district court bound to Texas law and addressing an argument identical to BHL's concluded:

> Texas law—perhaps reflecting a desire to afford existing contracts more protection than prospective ones, as well as to distinguish between actionable interference and desirable competition during that period before a contract is formed—appears to require only that the alleged interference with an existing contract be "willful and intentional."

U.S. Enercorp, Ltd. v. SDC Montana Bakken Expl., LLC, 966 F. Supp. 2d 690, 705 (W.D. Tex. 2013) (collecting cases).

[10] More particularly, BHL argues that GSSI's failure to present facts that indicate BHL's conduct in filing the lawsuit would be actionable under a recognized tort dooms both tortious interference claims. (Doc. 27 at 25.)

Here, GSSI alleges that it had an existing service agreement with Statoil and "[t]hrough the assertion of its wanton, specious, baseless, and malicious claims, BHL willfully and intentionally interfered with the service agreement, affecting and interrupting [*30] the scope of the service agreement and the relationship between the parties moving forward." (Doc. 19 at ¶¶ 51-52.) Although it need not allege independently wrongful conduct and it has adequately alleged the existence of a contract subject to interference, GSSI must plead the remaining elements of tortious interference with existing contract in order to state a claim. However, nowhere does GSSI set forth facts that allege how BHL interfered with the existing GSSI-Statoil contract, or that it persuaded Statoil to breach the contract. Nor does GSSI allege damages. GSSI has therefore failed to allege all of the required elements of its claim—but not for the reason that BHL asserts. The Court will afford GSSI an opportunity to remedy these deficiencies by amending its pleading.

d. Tortious Interference with Prospective Business Relationships (Count VIII)

As already alluded to, HN17[] Texas law also protects prospective contracts and business relations from tortious interference, albeit with different rules. Sturges, 52 S.W.3d at 713. In order to prevail on a tortious interference with prospective business relationships claim, the plaintiff must establish: (1) there was a reasonable probability that the plaintiff would [*31] have entered into a business relationship with a third party; (2) the defendant either acted with a conscious desire to prevent the relationship from occurring or knew the interference was certain or substantially certain to occur as a result of the conduct; (3) the defendant's conduct was independently tortious or unlawful; (4) the interference proximately caused the plaintiff injury; and (5) the plaintiff suffered actual damage or loss as a result. Coinmach Corp. v. Aspenwood Apartment Corp., 417 S.W.3d 909, 923 (Tex. 2013) (citations omitted); Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d at 775.

BHL argues that GSSI's pleading is "devoid of any facts giving rise to tortious interference." (Doc. 27 at 24-27.) Specifically, BHL points to GSSI's failure to point out how BHL's actions were "independently wrongful," offer any factual support or allegations of damages other than a conclusory statement that it was "harmed", or plead proximate cause. (Id.) GSSI responds by announcing that it "has likewise pleaded a claim . . . for tortious interference with prospective business relationships," reciting the elements of a tortious interference with prospective business relationships claim and concluding with a nearly verbatim repetition of the allegations from its complaint.[11] (Doc. 37 at 20-21.) The Court agrees with [*32] BHL that these allegations are insufficient to state a claim for tortious interference with prospective business relationships for a number of reasons.

i. Prevention of Business Relationship

In this case, GSSI acknowledges that it had a contract with Statoil and uses that contract as the basis for its tortious interference with existing contractual relationship counterclaim. Consequently, as a basis for its tortious interference with prospective business relationships claim, it must plead facts indicating that BHL's "wanton, specious, baseless, and malicious claims" prevented the formation of another contract. See Enercorp, 966 F. Supp. 2d at 702-03 ("[B]ecause Enercorp acknowledges that it did consummate a contract with SEPCO, it must, at a minimum, plead [*33] facts that would indicate that Defendants prevented the formation of another contract—one that was separate and distinct from the one eventually consummated.") GSSI has not done so.

GSSI includes no factual allegations of any prospective business relationship aside from the conclusory statement that "[t]he GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs had a reasonable probability of entering into a business relationship with a third party." (Doc. 19 at ¶ 54.) Courts in this district have found that far more detailed allegations are insufficient. For example, in concluding that plaintiff's allegations were insufficient in M-I LLC v. Stelly, the court stated:

[11] "The GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs had a reasonable probability of entering into a business relationship with a third party. BHL asserted its wanton, specious, baseless and malicious claims against the GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs with the intent of harming their ["GSSI's"] business and the market for their geosteering services and the GSSI Software . . . . The GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs have been harmed, resulting in actual damages and the loss of prospective contracts." (Doc. 37 at 21.)

> M—I fails to set forth any allegations establishing a reasonable probability that it would have entered into a business relationship. The closest it comes is its averment that it "has provided [w]ellbore cleanout tools and services to BP for other ThunderHorse wells, and expected to provide the same for 778 # 2," but instead lost the project to WES. (Doc. No. 355, ¶ 29.) This statement, however, does not plead a reasonable probability that M-I and BP would have entered into a contractual relationship for the ThunderHorse project. Furthermore, M—I fails to plead any other [*34] business relationships that are the subject of this claim.

733 F. Supp. 2d at 776.

GSSI's claim is even less complete than the one in Stelly. GSSI does not name what third parties or contracts it refers to, preventing the Court from inferring that there was a reasonable probability that GSSI would have entered into a business relationship with a third party. Its claim is subject to dismissal on this ground.

ii. Conscious Desire

HN18[] "Intentional interference does not require intent to injure, only that the actor desires to cause the consequences of his act, or that he believes that the consequences are substantially certain to result from it." Sw. Bell Tel. Co. v. John Carlo Texas, Inc., 843 S.W.2d 470, 472 (Tex. 1992) (citations and internal citation marks omitted). Absent actual knowledge of the prospective contract or business relation, interference cannot be intentional. Texas Oil Co. v. Tenneco Inc., 917 S.W.2d 826, 834 (Tex. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 1994), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Morgan Stanley & Co., Inc. v. Texas Oil Co., 958 S.W.2d 178 (Tex. 1997). Moreover, interference is not improper if the defendant "had no desire to effectuate the interference by his action but knew that it would be a mere incidental result of conduct he was engaging in for another purpose . . . ." Bradford v. Vento, 48 S.W.3d 749, 757 (Tex. 2001) (quoting Restatement (Second) of Torts § 766B cmt. d (1979)) (internal citation marks omitted).

Here, GSSI summarily alleges intent by stating "BHL asserted its wanton, specious, baseless, and malicious [*35] claims against the GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs with the intent of harming their business and the market for geosteering services and the GSSI software." (Doc. 19 at ¶ 55.) Without more, this claim cannot survive. It is utterly devoid of any factual allegation that BHL had actual knowledge of a prospective business relation and its desire to interfere in that relation was its primary purpose in doing so. See Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d at 776 (dismissing claim because "M-I has not pled that Defendants committed misappropriation and/or breach of fiduciary duty with a conscious desire to cause, or with the certain knowledge that, it was preventing MI's specific business relationship from forming."). GSSI's claim may be dismissed for this deficiency as well.

iii. Independently Tortious Conduct

HN19[] The Supreme Court of Texas has made it clear that to establish liability for interference with a prospective contractual or business relation the plaintiff must prove that it was harmed by the defendant's conduct that was either independently tortious or unlawful. Sturges, 52 S.W.3d at 726. "'Independently tortious' means that the conduct objected to would violate 'some other recognized tort duty.'" Star Tobacco, 298 F. Supp. 2d at 448 (citing Sturges, 52 S.W.3d at 713). "Conduct that is merely 'sharp' or unfair is not [*36] actionable and cannot be the basis for an action for tortious interference with prospective relations . . . ." Sturges, 52 S.W.3d at 726.

Wrongful litigation may be used as the basis for a tortious interference claim. *Strategic Capital Corp. v. New Strong Grp. Ltd., 4:08-CV-1651, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 175939, 2012 WL 6202182, at 10 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 12, 2012) ("Litigation is a powerful weapon, and when instituted in bad faith for the purpose of causing damage or loss, it is a wrongful method of interference.") (quoting Hughes v. Hous. Nw. Med. Ctr., Inc., 680 S.W.2d 838, 842 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1984, writ ref'd n.r.e.)); McCall v. Tana Oil & Gas Corp., 82 S.W.3d 337, 347 (Tex. App.—Austin 2001), rev'd in part on other grounds, 104 S.W.3d 80 (Tex. 2003) (same). Malice may not. Sturges, 52 S.W.3d at 724. However, litigation is not "wrongful" if instituted (1) in a bona fide exercise of the defendant's own rights or (2) pursuant to a good faith assertion of colorable legal rights. Pers. Preference Video, Inc. v. Home Box Office, Inc., 986 F.2d 110, 111-12 (5th Cir. 1993) (citing Victoria Bank & Trust Co. v. Brady, 811 S.W.2d 931, 939 (Tex. 1991); Int'l Shortstop, Inc. v. Rally's, Inc., 939 F.2d 1257, 1271 (5th Cir. 1991)).

In this case, it is unclear from GSSI's pleading what BHL conduct was allegedly "independently tortious or unlawful." GSSI's claim is barred to the extent it argues malice as the basis for the claim. However, even assuming GSSI asserts wrongful litigation as the independently tortious act of interference, it fails to allege bad faith in instigating this lawsuit. Accordingly, its claim may be dismissed on this ground as well.

iv. Proximate Cause

HN20[] In a tortious interference claim, "a plaintiff must be able to show that the act of interference [*37] was the proximate cause of the damages suffered by it." *Tex. Campaign for the Env't v. Partners Dewatering Int'l, LLC, 13-14-00656-CV, 485 S.W.3d 184, 2016 Tex. App. LEXIS 537, 2016 WL 300233, at 10 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi Jan. 21, 2016, no pet.) (citation and internal citation marks omitted). The components of proximate cause are cause in fact and foreseeability. W. Invs., Inc. v. Urena, 162 S.W.3d 547, 551 (Tex. 2005) (citation omitted). The test for cause in fact, or "but for causation," is whether the act or omission "was a substantial factor in causing the injury without which the harm would not have occurred." Doe v. Boys Clubs of Greater Dallas, Inc., 907 S.W.2d 472, 477 (Tex. 1995) (citation and internal citation marks omitted). "Foreseeability" means that the actor, as a person of ordinary intelligence, should have anticipated the dangers that his act created for others. *Lunn v. Fragomen, Del Rey, Bensen & Loewy P.C., CIV.A. H-04-404, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11160, 2006 WL 492098, at 7 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 28, 2006) (citing Doe 907 S.W.2d at 478). "In other words, proximate cause is that cause, unbroken by any new and independent cause, that produces injury and without which the injury would not have occurred." *Tex. Campaign for the Env't, 2016 Tex. App. LEXIS 537, 2016 WL 300233, at 10 (citations omitted).

Without clear allegations of (1) the prospective relationship(s) interfered with; (2) the independently tortious or unlawful activity BHL employed to interfere with such relationships; and (3) damages sustained,[12] the Court cannot reasonably [*38] infer proximate causation. Accordingly, GSSI's claim may likewise be dismissed on this ground. C.f. In re Burzynski, 989 F.2d 733, 739 (5th Cir. 1993) (finding proximate cause sufficiently pled when other essential elements of tortious interference were sufficiently pled and connected).[13]

v. Damages

Aside from its conclusory statement that "the GSSI Counter-Plaintiffs have been harmed, resulting in actual damages and the loss of prospective contracts" (Doc. 19 at ¶ 56), the Court concludes that GSSI "also fail[s] to allege facts or explain how or whether [GSSI] suffered any actual damage or loss." *Seeberger Bank of Am., N.A. Ventures Trust 2013 I.H.R. v. Seeberger, EP-14-CV-366-KC, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 168348, 2015 WL 9200878, at 22 (W.D. Tex. Dec. 16, 2015). This too is fatal to GSSI's counterclaim. However, the Court will afford GSSI an opportunity to replead in order to properly [*39] assert each element of its claim.

B. Defendants' Motions to Dismiss

[12] See infra, Section III.A.d.v.

[13] At that time, the essential elements of tortious interference with existing contract under Texas law were the same as they are now: intentional act, contract existence, proximate cause, and damages. In re Burzynski, 989 F.2d at 738. Although In re Burzynski dealt with a tortious interference with existing contract claim, the Court believes the proximate-cause analysis is equally applicable to a tortious interference with prospective relationship claim.

In their motions to dismiss, GSSI and Statoil both argue that BHL fails to allege facts that adequately plead violations of the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, 18 U.S.C. § 1030, and Electronic Communications Privacy Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2701, (Counts I-III). (Docs. 18 at 6-13, 36 at 7-16.) GSSI ends its offensive here, but Statoil additionally attacks the sufficiency of BHL's unjust enrichment and civil conspiracy claims (Counts V, VIII). (Doc. 28 at 16-23.) BHL responds that its claims are sufficient, however, if the Court disagrees, it seeks leave to amend. (Doc. 36 at 11-12.)

a. CFAA (Counts I - GSSI & II - Statoil)

HN21[] The CFAA punishes various fraudulent and damaging activities related to the use of computers. Although primarily a criminal statute, under § 1030(g) civil actions are authorized for some violations of its substantive provisions. Fiber Sys. Int'l, Inc. v. Roehrs, 470 F.3d 1150, 1156 (5th Cir. 2006); see 18 U.S.C. § 1030(g).[14] In order to maintain a civil action, a party must "suffer[] damage or loss by reason of a violation of . . . section [1030]." 18 U.S.C. § 1030(g).

Utilizing the civil liability provision, BHL alleges that both Statoil and GSSI violated §§ 1030(a)(2), 1030(a)(4), and 1030(a)(6). (Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 34, 36, 45, 47.) The only provision of HN22[] § 1030(a)(2) that is implicated by the facts of this case prohibits "intentionally access[ing] a computer without authorization or exceed[ing] authorized access," thereby "obtain[ing] information from any protected computer."[15] 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(2)(C). Section 1030(a)(4) prohibits the "knowing[ ] . . . access[of] a protected computer without authorization," and "with intent to defraud," if "such conduct furthers the intended fraud and [the violator] obtains anything of value."[16] 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(4). And the relevant section of 1030(a)(6) proscribes [*41] trafficking "knowingly and with intent to defraud . . . in any password or similar information through which a computer may be accessed without authorization" when "such trafficking affects interstate or foreign commerce."[17] 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(6).

[14] The full text of 18 U.S.C. § 1030(g) reads:

> Any person who suffers damage or loss by reason of a violation of this section may maintain a civil action against the violator to obtain compensatory damages and injunctive relief [*40] or other equitable relief. A civil action for a violation of this section may be brought only if the conduct involves 1 of the factors set forth in subclauses[4] (I), (II), (III), (IV), or (V) of subsection (c)(4)(A)(i). Damages for a violation involving only conduct described in subsection (c)(4)(A)(i)(I) are limited to economic damages. No action may be brought under this subsection unless such action is begun within 2 years of the date of the act complained of or the date of the discovery of the damage. No action may be brought under this subsection for the negligent design or manufacture of computer hardware, computer software, or firmware.

[15] The full text of 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(2) reads:

> Whoever—intentionally accesses a computer without authorization or exceeds authorized access, and thereby obtains . . . (A) information contained in a financial record of a financial institution, or of a card issuer as defined in section 1602(n) of title 15, or contained in a file of a consumer reporting agency on a consumer, as such terms are defined in the Fair Credit Reporting Act (15 U.S.C. 1681 et seq.); (B) information from any department or agency of the United States; or (C) information from any protected computer . . . shall be punished as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

[16] The full text of 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(4) reads:

> Whoever—knowingly and with intent to defraud, accesses a protected computer without authorization, or exceeds authorized access, and by means of such conduct furthers the intended fraud and obtains anything of value, unless the object of the fraud and the thing obtained consists only of the use of the computer and the value of such use is not more than $5,000 in any 1-year period [*42] . . . shall be punished as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

[17] The full text of 18 U.S.C. § 1030(a)(6) reads:

With regard to the CFAA claims, GSSI argues that BHL fails to allege that GSSI accessed a protected computer or acted without or in excess of authorization. (Doc. 18 at 6-10.) Statoil joins GSSI in this assertion (Doc. 28 at 10-11), but it additionally argues that BHL fails to allege a cognizable loss under the CFAA (Doc. 28 at 7-10). BHL responds that it has sufficiently pleaded all elements of its CFAA claims, but seeks leave to amend if the Court decides otherwise. (Docs. 24 at 7-17, 36 at 9-18.) The Court will address each of the three elements that Defendants take issue with in turn: (1) "protected computer;" (2) "access . . . without authorization or exceed[ing] authorized access;" and (3) "loss."

i. Protected Computer

HN23[] The CFAA defines a "computer" [*43] as "an electronic, magnetic, optical, electrochemical, or other high speed data processing device performing logical, arithmetic, or storage functions, and includes any data storage facility or communications facility directly related to or operating in conjunction with such device, but . . . does not include an automated typewriter or typesetter, a portable hand held calculator, or other similar device . . . ." 18 U.S.C. § 1030(e)(1). A "protected computer" is one "which is used in or affecting interstate or foreign commerce or communication." 18 U.S.C. § 1030(e)(2)(B). However, the term "facility" as used in the phrase "data storage facility or communications facility" within the definition of "computer" is not defined. See 18 U.S.C. § 1030.

GSSI argues that BHL fails to allege the "protected computer" element of its claim because BHL's complaint states that GSSI's unauthorized access was to "Boresight's Software and bitlocks." (Doc. 18 at 7.) GSSI avers that bitlocks are simply USB storage devices, and because neither software nor bitlocks are high speed data processing devices, they are not covered by the plain language of the statute. (Id.) GSSI also argues that because BHL alleges that Statoil provided BHL's bitlocks to GSSI to access BHL's [*44] software without BHL's authorization, BHL "at best alleges that the GSSI Defendants received the Boresight Software using the bitlock storage devices, but does not allege access to a computer." (Doc. 18 at 8.) (emphasis added). GSSI goes on to cite a district court case from Maryland for the proposition that "[r]eceiving electronic information is . . . not the same as 'accessing' the computer from which the information is derived . . . ." (Id.) Finally, GSSI avers that BHL's complaint "clearly alleges that the access to the software was unauthorized," however, the CFAA only provides a cause of action "for accessing a protected computer without authorization or exceeding authorization." (Doc. 18 at 9.) (emphasis in original).

BHL responds by distinguishing the main case relied upon by GSSI and arguing that the legislative history of the CFAA confirms the broad scope of the meaning of "protected computer." (Doc. 24 at 10-11.) BHL further avers that, at this stage, it need only allege sufficient facts to allow the Court to reasonably infer that the computers Defendants used may meet the interstate or foreign commerce requirement for its software and bitlocks to fall within the plain language of "protected [*45] computer"—a requirement that it claims it has fulfilled. (Id. at 11-13.) In its response to Statoil, BHL also claims that "[t]he Complaint clearly alleges facts that indicate that Boresight's 'information' that Statoil accessed and obtained must function with an individual computer," thereby bringing it within the plain language of the statute. (Doc. 36 at 12-13.)

In light of the second phrase of the definition of "computer," courts regularly conclude that systems and devices that function with individual data processing devices are covered by the statute. See, e.g., *Genesco Sports Enter., Inc. v. White, 3:11-CV-1345-N BF, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147599, 2011 WL 6593415, at 5 (N.D. Tex. Oct. 27, 2011), report and recommendation adopted, 3:11-CV-1345-N BF, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 147063, 2011 WL 6433704 (N.D. Tex. Dec. 22, 2011) (corporate server is protected computer); Donahue v. Tokyo Electron Am., Inc., 42 F. Supp. 3d 829, 843 (W.D. Tex. 2014) (computer network is protected computer). See also *NovelPoster v. Javitch Canfield Group, No. 13-cv-05186-WHO, 140 F. Supp. 3d 938, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106804, at 13 n.4 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 4, 2014) (online accounts are protected computer). Here, BHL's complaint alleges that the information Defendants

Whoever—knowingly and with intent to defraud traffics (as defined in section 1029) in any password or similar information through which a computer may be accessed without authorization, if—(A) such trafficking affects interstate or foreign commerce; or (B) such computer is used by or for the Government of the United States . . . shall be punished as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

obtained resides on computers and the computer network and its bitlock devices and software function with these covered devices. (Doc. 1 at ¶ 30, 38, 40.) Moreover, by alleging the bitlocks are USB devices (Doc. 1 at ¶ 9), the Court can infer they provide data storage functions, potentially [*46] bringing them within the ambit of the definition of a computer ("computer . . . includes any data storage facility . . . directly related to or operating in conjunction with such [data processing] device."). Without further factual development on the interplay of the software, network, bitlocks, and individual computers to negate this inference, the Court can reasonably infer that BHL's software and bitlocks fall within the CFAA's definition of a "protected computer." BHL has sufficiently pled this element of its CFAA claim.

ii. Authorized Access

HN24[↑] The CFAA does not define "authorization" or "authorized access." United States v. Phillips, 477 F.3d 215, 219 (5th Cir. 2007). However, it clearly differentiates between unauthorized users and those who exceed authorized access. Id. (citing 18 U.S.C. §§ 1030(e)(6), 1030(a)(1), (a)(2), (a)(4)) (internal citation marks omitted). The term "exceeds authorized access" is defined in § 1030(e)(6): "the term 'exceeds authorized access' means to access a computer with authorization and to use such access to obtain or alter information in the computer that the accesser is not entitled so to obtain or alter . . . . " United States v. John, 597 F.3d 263, 270-71 (5th Cir. 2010) (quoting 18 U.S.C. § 1030(e)(6)). As the Fifth Circuit has noted, "[i]n conditioning the nature of the intrusion in part on the level of authorization a computer user possesses, [*47] Congress distinguished between 'insiders, who are authorized to access a computer,' and 'outside hackers who break into a computer.'" Phillips, 477 F.3d at 219 (citing S.Rep. No. 104-357, at 11 (1996); S.Rep. No. 99-432, at 10, as reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2479, at 2488 (1986)). Accordingly, "courts typically analyze[] the scope of a user's authorization to access a protected computer on the basis of the expected norms of intended use or the nature of the relationship established between the computer owner and the user." Id.

GSSI claims that it could not access a computer without authorization or by exceeding authorization because GSSI owned the computers on which the BHL software was accessed. (Doc. 18 at 9.) Building on this argument, GSSI cites a Northern District of California case to claim that "it is the owner of the protected computer that decides whether someone is authorized to access its computer's [sic] or not." (Id. at 9-10.) (alteration in original). GSSI then concludes that it cannot act without authorization because either GSSI or Statoil—as the owners of the computers on which the software was accessed—determine access. (Id. at 9-10.)

Statoil joins GSSI's offensive, citing the Ninth Circuit's decision in United States v. Nosal, 676 F.3d 854, 858 (9th Cir. 2012), to [*48] argue that ownership of the protected computer is dispositive to access. (Doc. 28 at 10-11.) Because "Statoil accessed its own computers to use and view BHL's software as authorized by the licensing agreement between the parties," Statoil claims that "BHL has not alleged that Statoil acted in a manner which would run afoul of the CFAA." (Id. at 11.) At most, BHL alleges "unauthorized disclosure or use of information," which is not actionable under the statute. (Id.)

In its response to GSSI, BHL argues there is no ownership or control of the computer required for a CFAA claim, citing a number of non-binding cases in support. (Doc. 24 at 9-10, 14-17.) (citing Theofel v. Farey-Jones, 359 F.3d 1066, 1078 (9th Cir. 2004); State Analysis Inc. v. American Financial Servs. Assoc., 621 F. Supp. 2d 309, 316 (E.D. Va. 2009); *AtPac, Inc. v. Aptitude Solutions, Inc., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42109, 14 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 28, 2010); Secureinfo Corp. v. Telos Corp., 387 F. Supp.2d 593, 609 (E.D. Va. 2005)). Instead, it argues, the central issue in third-party computer cases is the scope of the authorization to access the data. (Id. at 14-17.) BHL also cites several cases for the proposition that authorization is exceeded when defendants violate the terms of a prior grant of authorization, either by subterfuge or express breach of agreement. (Id. at 15-16.) (citing EF Cultural Travel BV v. Explorica, Inc., 274 F.3d 577, 581-82 (1st Cir. 2001); Shurgard Storage Centers, Inc. v. Safeguard Self Storage, Inc., 119 F. Supp. 2d 1121, 1125 (W.D. Wa. 2000); State Analysis, 621 F. Supp. 2d at 316; *AtPac, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42109, at 12-13).

BHL renews a number of these arguments in its response to Statoil. (Doc. 36 at 13-18.) Specifically directed at Statoil, however, is BHL's argument that although Statoil may have had authorization [*49] to access BHL's software initially, it contractually agreed that it would forfeit all rights of access immediately upon breach of the license agreement. (Id. at 14-15.) When Statoil granted access to GSSI, Statoil's authorization was void from that point forward. (Id. at 14.) BHL also argues that Statoil's reliance on Ninth Circuit law is "neither instructive or binding" since the Fifth Circuit has held that the CFAA should be "broadly construed." (Id. at 15.)

Circling back to the argument regarding how access is determined, BHL cites United States v. John for the proposition that in the Fifth Circuit, "access to a computer or data that can be obtained from that access may be exceeded if the purposes for which access has been given are exceeded." (Id. at 16.) Citing to John's rejection of the Ninth Circuit's interpretation of the CFAA in Brekka as too narrow, BHL alleges that Brekka is easily distinguishable. (Id.) (citing LVRC Holdings LLC v. Brekka, 581 F.3d 1127 (9th Cir. 2009)). BHL points out that in rejecting the plaintiff's argument that defendant's authorized computer access was exceeded when he accessed and used stored information to further his own competing business, the Brekka court specifically noted that there was no written agreement governing access terms and no [*50] written guidelines prohibiting the employee from emailing documents to a personal computer. (Id. at n.8.) According to BHL, both John and Brekka actually support BHL's argument that a CFAA claim exists when there is an agreement delineating the parameters of authorized use, which is then exceeded. (Id. at 16-17.) Because BHL's complaint alleged that Statoil and BHL had such an agreement specifically prohibiting disclosure to or access by a third-party consultant such as GSSI, and providing for automatic, immediate revocation of authorized use as the penalty for such unauthorized conduct, BHL argues it has stated a claim for civil liability under the CFAA. (Id. at 18.)

Initially, the Court notes that to the extent Statoil argues that BHL's complaint should be dismissed because Statoil had authorization to the software and bitlocks, this type of argument is a merits argument that is irrelevant at this stage. *See Simmonds Equip., LLC v. GGR Int'l, Inc., CIV.A. H-15-0862, 126 F. Supp. 3d 855, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113629, 2015 WL 5089169, at 5 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 27, 2015) ("GGR's argument that Simmonds' CFAA claim should be dismissed because GGR had lawful access . . . is a merits argument not relevant for purposes of determining whether Simmonds has stated a claim for which relief may be granted."); *St. Jude Med. S.C., Inc. v. Janssen-Counotte, A-14-CA-877-SS, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173835, 2014 WL 7237411, at 13 (W.D. Tex. Dec. 17, 2014) [*51] ("Janssen argues the CFAA claim should be dismissed because she accessed the computer with authorization and for the purpose of doing her job. This is a merits argument and irrelevant at the Rule 12 stage.").

Moving on to the issue of pleading sufficiency, HN25[] in light of the plain language of the statute, several courts—including one recently within our circuit—have determined that there is no ownership requirement of the protected computer at issue to state a viable CFAA claim. *See St. Jude, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 173835, 2014 WL 7237411, at 13 (citation omitted) ("The Court sees no support for Janssen's position there is an ownership requirement."); Theofel, 359 F.3d at 1078 ("The district court erred by reading an ownership or control requirement into the Act. . . . Nothing in the provision's language supports the district court's restriction. Individuals other than the computer's owner may be proximately harmed by unauthorized access, particularly if they have rights to data stored on it."). The Court agrees with these authorities' reading of the statute. Accordingly, BHL's complaint need not be dismissed because it alleges that GSSI and Statoil accessed the software and bitlocks at issue using GSSI and Statoil computers and [*52] computer networks.

Defendants are correct to note that there has been some disagreement among the circuits as to how broadly or narrowly to interpret the CFAA. Pointing out that the CFAA was targeted at computer hackers, some authorities have argued that it only applies in situations where an outsider, or someone without authorization, accesses a computer. State Analysis, 621 F. Supp. 2d at 315 (internal citations omitted). These courts have rejected attempts to apply the CFAA to cases where defendants did not break into a system, but simply abused the privileges of a license. Id. Other courts, however, including a majority in this circuit, have held that the CFAA does apply to authorized users who use programs in an unauthorized way, such as when users obtain and use proprietary information in violation of employer policies or confidentiality or licensing agreements.[18]

[18] See, e.g., John, 597 F.3d at 272 (defendant exceeded access by knowingly violating terms of acceptable-use policy as part of illegal scheme); Phillips, 477 F.3d at 221, 221 n.5 (noting that "authorized access typically arises only out of a contractual or

Defendants cite a number of cases in support of their contentions that (1) exceeding the terms of a licensing agreement or duty of loyalty is insufficient to demonstrate that an individual exceeds authorization; and (2) [*55] third-party defendants cannot be liable where their access was made possible by another party violating its license agreement with the plaintiff. See (Doc. 18 at 9-10; Doc. 28 at 10-11) (citing Nosal, 676 F.3d at 862-63; *NovelPoster, 140 F. Supp. 3d 938, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106804, at 24-25). The Court is unswayed by these authorities. The Fifth Circuit has clearly stated, HN26[] "[a]ccess to a computer and data that can be obtained from that access may be exceeded if the purposes for which access has been given are exceeded." John, 597 F.3d at 272. As illustrated by footnote 16, this pronouncement has been broadly applied within this circuit.

The only potential concern the Fifth Circuit has expressed about finding CFAA liability when the access terms of an employment policy or license/confidentiality agreement have been exceeded is in the criminal context. See id. at 272-73. In John, the Fifth Circuit examined the Ninth Circuit's Brekka decision in detail, noting that the Ninth Circuit declined to find civil liability in a case in which the defendant breached a state law duty of loyalty to his employer by accessing and using information he was entitled to access to further his own competing business. Id. at 273. As the court stated:

> The Ninth Circuit's reasoning in Brekka was influenced by its recognition that "[f]irst, and most important, § 1030 [*56] is primarily a criminal statute, and §§ 1030(a)(2) and (4) create criminal liability for violators of the statute." The court explained its view that, "[a]lthough this case arises in a civil context, our interpretation of [the statute] is equally applicable in the criminal context," and that "ambiguity concerning the ambit of criminal statutes should be resolved in favor of lenity." The Ninth Circuit explained that "[i]f the employer has not rescinded the defendant's right to use the computer, the defendant would have no reason to know that making personal use of the company computer in breach of a state law fiduciary duty to an employer would constitute a criminal violation of the CFAA. It would be improper to interpret a criminal statute in such an unexpected manner.

Rowland, CIV.A. 13-6109, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 161964, 2014 WL 6485641, at 21 (E.D. La. Nov. 18, 2014) (citing favorably Dupre's discussion of the Fifth Circuit's likelihood to recognize liability when a defendant accesses and misuses information in contravention of a confidentiality agreement). Cf. Feb. 3, 2009) (finding that plaintiffs were unlikely to succeed on their CFAA claim because defendants "had signed no confidentiality agreement with Bridal Expo or any other agreement restricting their access to the files they had been working with at their jobs at Bridal Expo" and, therefore, did not act in excess of their authorization).

As in John, there are no such concerns in this case. There are no criminal ramifications for Defendants here. There is, therefore, no need to reinterpret Fifth Circuit precedent—particularly since Judge Kozinski's invitation to do so was not addressed to this Court.[19] Moreover, in Brekka, the Ninth Circuit was faced with a situation in which the defendant and employer "did not have a written employment agreement, nor did LVRC promulgate employee guidelines that would prohibit employees from emailing LVRC documents to personal computers." Brekka, 581 F.3d at 1129. In contrast, BHL's complaint clearly alleges that (1) BHL never granted access to GSSI; (2) BHL never granted Statoil permission to share access to BHL's software and bitlocks with GSSI; [*57] (3) BHL and Statoil had an express license agreement delineating the terms of Statoil's access and providing for automatic forfeiture of access privileges in case of breach; (4) GSSI accessed the software and bitlocks through Statoil; and (5) Statoil continued to access the software and bitlocks after it breached the license agreement. (Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 11, 15-19, 21-22, 25-26, 30, 32, 40.) The Court finds these allegations are more than sufficient to allow the Court to draw the inference that GSSI and Statoil acted without authorization and/or exceeded authorization.

iii. Cognizable Loss

HN27[] The civil-claims provision of the CFAA states that "any person who suffers damage or loss by reason of a [§ 1030] violation . . . may maintain a civil action against the violator to obtain compensatory damages and injunctive relief or other equitable relief." 18 U.S.C. § 1030(g). However, the provision goes on to limit civil actions to only those situations involving one of the factors set forth in subclauses (I), (II), (III), (IV), or (V) of subsection (c)(4)(A)(i). Id. The only subclause potentially applicable here is subclause (I), which covers "loss to 1 or more persons during any 1-year period . . . aggregating at least $5,000 in value." 18 U.S.C. § 1030(c)(4)(A)(i)(I).

The CFAA defines "loss" as "any reasonable cost to any victim, including the cost of responding to an offense, conducting a damage assessment, and restoring the data, program, system, or information to its condition prior to the offense, and any revenue lost, [*59] cost incurred, or other consequential damages incurred because of interruption of service." 18 U.S.C. § 1030(e)(11). Based on this language, courts have concluded that the term "loss" encompasses only two types of harm: costs to investigate and respond to an offense, and costs incurred because of a service interruption. Alliantgroup, L.P. v. Feingold, 803 F. Supp. 2d 610, 630 (S.D. Tex. 2011) (citations omitted). "Damage" is defined as "any impairment to the integrity or availability of data, a program, a system, or information." 18 U.S.C. § 1030(e)(8).

Although BHL's complaint avers that it sustained damage "exceeding $5,000 in a single calendar year," it goes on to list its losses as "reduced business, harm to its goodwill, and loss of licensing fees associated with the use of Boresight's Software." (Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 32, 34.) Statoil argues that this is insufficient because BHL fails to allege that Statoil's conduct involves either of the type of costs recognized by this Court and the CFAA—costs to investigate and respond to an offense or costs incurred because of a service interruption. (Doc. 28 at 9.) The Court agrees.

[19] As Judge Kozinski noted in Nosal, a case on which Defendants heavily rely, the Fifth Circuit has not yet been faced with an opportunity to differentiate between the licensee and third-party in defining the parameters of exceeding or lacking authorization:

> We remain unpersuaded by the decisions of our sister circuits that interpret the CFAA broadly to cover violations of corporate computer use restrictions or violations of a duty of loyalty. See United States v. Rodriguez, 628 F.3d 1258 (11th Cir. 2010); United States v. John, 597 F.3d 263 (5th Cir. 2010); Int'l Airport Ctrs., LLC v. Citrin, 440 F.3d 418 (7th Cir. 2006). These courts looked only at the culpable behavior of the defendants before them, and failed to consider the effect on millions of ordinary citizens caused by the statute's unitary [*58] definition of "exceeds authorized access." They therefore failed to apply the long-standing principle that we must construe ambiguous criminal statutes narrowly so as to avoid "making criminal law in Congress's stead." United States v. Santos, 553 U.S. 507, 514, 128 S.Ct. 2020, 170 L.Ed.2d 912 (2008).
> We therefore respectfully decline to follow our sister circuits and urge them to reconsider instead.

Nosal, 676 F.3d at 862-63.

In its response, BHL appears to attempt to remedy this defect by stating that BHL "incurred in-house labor costs when investigating, assessing, and quantifying the extent/reach of Statoil's [*60] infractions" and then listing the man hours a number of its employees spent on the investigation. (Doc. 36 at 11.) However, as Statoil correctly notes in its Motion for Leave to File Reply Memorandum (Doc. 48), BHL's averments are too little, too late. Without converting the parties' motions to ones for summary judgment, the Court is bound to the pleadings. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). See, e.g., Clark v. Tarrant Cnty., 798 F.2d 736, 745 (5th Cir. 1986) ("The district court considered matters outside the pleadings in ruling on the Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, so that, as expressly provided in Rule 12(b)(6), the motion to dismiss was converted into a motion for summary judgment under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56."); Collins v. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter, 224 F.3d 496, 498 (5th Cir. 2000) (citing Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6)) (HN28[] "In considering a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, a district court must limit itself to the contents of the pleadings, including attachments thereto."). Without allegations that allow the Court to infer that Defendants are liable for cognizable losses under the CFAA, the Court must conclude that BHL's complaint runs afoul of Rule 12(b)(6) requirements. See Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d at 780 ("M—I's . . . claim fails because M-I does not allege any facts showing at least $5,000 of loss, or any loss as a result of investigation or interruption of computer service.") BHL may replead its CFAA claim [*61] to allege cognizable loss.

b. ECPA (Count III)

In 1986, Congress passed the Electronic Communications Privacy Act, Pub.L. No. 99-508, 100 Stat. 1848, which was intended to afford privacy protection to electronic communications. Title I of the ECPA amended the federal Wiretap Act, which previously had addressed only interception of wire and oral communications, to also address interception of electronic communications. See Pub.L. No. 99-508, 100 Stat. 1848; S.Rep. No. 99-541, at 3 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 3555, 3557; 18 U.S.C. §§ 2510(12); 2511(1)(a); Konop v. Hawaiian Airlines, Inc., 302 F.3d 868, 874 (9th Cir. 2002); United States v. Steiger, 318 F.3d 1039, 1046-47 (11th Cir. 2003). At the same time, Title II of the ECPA created the Stored Communications Act ("SCA") to cover access to stored communications and records. See Pub.L. No. 99-508, 100 Stat. 1848; S.Rep. No. 99-541, at 3 (1986), reprinted in 1986 U.S.C.C.A.N. 3555, 3557; 18 U.S.C. § 2701(a); Konop, 302 F.3d at 874; Steiger, 318 F.3d at 1047.

The potential breadth of these statutes and the date of last amendment make them notoriously difficult for modern courts to grapple with. As the Ninth Circuit has noted:

> [T]he intersection of these . . . statutes is a complex, often convoluted, area of the law. [T]he difficulty is compounded by the fact that the ECPA was written prior to the advent of the Internet and the World Wide Web. As a result, the existing statutory framework is ill-suited to address modern forms of communication . . . . Courts [*62] have struggled to analyze problems involving modern technology within the confines of this statutory framework, often with unsatisfying results. [U]ntil Congress brings the laws in line with modern technology, protection of the Internet . . . will remain a confusing and uncertain area of the law.

Konop, 302 F.3d at 874 (citations and internal citation marks omitted) (collecting law review articles criticizing judicial interpretations of the ECPA). Part of the confusion arising from the ECPA comes from the courts' application of the statutory definitions to a vast and ever growing list of electronic systems and devices that interface with "electronic communications."

HN29[] The ECPA provides a cause of action against anyone who "intentionally accesses without authorization a facility through which an electronic communication service is provided; or intentionally exceeds an authorization to access that facility; and thereby obtains, alters, or prevents authorized access to a wire or electronic communication while it is in electronic storage in such system." 18 U.S.C. §§ 2701(a)(1), 2707(a). "Accordingly, for Defendants to be liable under the SCA, they must have gained unauthorized access to a facility through which electronic communication services are [*63] provided (or the access must have exceeded the scope of authority given) and must thereby have accessed electronic communications while in storage." Garcia v. City of Laredo, 702 F.3d 788, 791 (5th Cir. 2012).

In attacking the sufficiency of BHL's ECPA claims, GSSI argues that BHL fails to allege that GSSI "accessed a facility through which an electronic communication service is provided" or "obtained, altered, or prevented authorized access to a wire or electronic communication while it is in electronic storage." (Doc. 18 at 11-13.) Statoil joins GSSI in arguing that BHL fails to allege that Defendants accessed a "facility" recognized by the ECPA. (Doc. 28 at 12-14). Statoil also argues that BHL admits Statoil's access was authorized and, therefore, fails to state a claim that access was unauthorized or exceeded. (Id. at 14-15). Finally, Statoil alleges that BHL's position is counter to the purpose of the SCA.[20] (Id. at 15-16.)

Essentially, the parties here dispute whether the terms "facility," "electronic storage," and "access" are applicable to the facts alleged in BHL's complaint. HN30[] While the SCA does not define the term "facility," it does define [*64] the terms "electronic communication," "electronic communication service" and "electronic storage." See 18 U.S.C. § 2510. "'Electronic communication' means any transfer of signs, signals, writing, images, sounds, data, or intelligence of any nature transmitted in whole or in part by a wire, radio, electromagnetic, photoelectronic or photooptical system that affects interstate or foreign commerce . . . ." Id. § 2510(12). The statute defines an "electronic communication service" ("ECS") as "any service which provides to users thereof the ability to send or receive wire or electronic communications." Id. § 2510(15). "Electronic storage" is defined as "(A) any temporary, intermediate storage of a wire or electronic communication incidental to the electronic transmission thereof; and (B) any storage of such communication by an electronic communication service for purposes of backup protection of such communication." Id. § 2510(17).

i. Facility

Courts have had no trouble concluding that the terms "electronic communication service" and "facility" comfortably fit providers of communication services—such as telephone companies, Internet or email service providers, and bulletin board services—and the facilities they use to operate these services. [*65] Steve Jackson Games, Inc. v. United States Secret Service, 36 F.3d 457, 462 (5th Cir. 1994) (electronic bulletin board system allowing for email communication is electronic communication service); United States v. Councilman, 418 F.3d 67, 81-82 (1st Cir. 2005) (email service is electronic communication service); In re DoubleClick, Inc. Privacy Litig., 154 F. Supp. 2d 497, 508 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (Internet access is electronic communications service); Fraser v. Nationwide Mut. Ins. Co., 352 F.3d 107, 114 (3d Cir. 2003), as amended (Jan. 20, 2004) (company email service is electronic communication service); Theofel, 359 F.3d at 1075 (ISP is electronic communication service). Importantly to the case at bar, however, the term has not been constrained to these obvious entities. Several courts have determined that the term also encompasses protected websites and databases. State Analysis, 621 F. Supp. 2d at 313 (searchable, proprietary online database available only by subscription sufficiently alleges electronic communication service for ECPA claim); Konop, 302 F.3d at 879 (password-protected website is electronic communication service).

Notably, a majority of the opinions interpreting "electronic communication service" do not explicitly state what the "facility" is that functions with the service. As a result, it is difficult to determine what characteristics define the relationship between a facility and an electronic communications service. However, a careful reading of these cases indicates that the services at issue all depend on or interact with a network or server. [*66] This conclusion is bolstered by a number of recent district court decisions.

The majority of federal courts to address the facility question have done so in the context of personal devices, such as desktop computers, laptops, and mobile phones. The courts have held, nearly universally, that such devices are not "facilities" under the Act.[21] In reaching this conclusion, these courts "have consistently concluded that an

[20] Since we are only dealing with Title II of the ECPA, i.e., the SCA, the Court uses the terms ECPA and SCA interchangeably.

[21] See, e.g., Garcia, 702 F.3d at 792-93 (noting that courts agree that a home computer is not protected by the SCA and finding that defendant's argument that her cell phone was a facility under the statute was unsupported by legislative history or other courts' decisions); Cousineau v. Microsoft Corp., 6 F. Supp. 3d 1167, 1174-75 (W.D. Wash. 2014) (discussing similar cases and individual's personal computer does not 'provide [] an electronic communication service' simply by virtue of enabling use of electronic communication services." In re iPhone Application Litig., 844 F. Supp. 2d 1040, 1058 (N.D. Cal. 2012) (citing Crowley v. CyberSource Corp., 166 F. Supp. 2d 1263, 1270-71 (N.D. Cal. 2001)).

Accordingly, courts attempting to define what makes a "facility" distinct have recently begun to coalesce around the idea that server-like functions are a necessary attribute of a "facility." As one district court has observed: "Notably, cases after iPhone have determined that for a device to be a "facility" under the SCA, "it must perform server-like functions." *Vaquero Energy, Inc. v. Herda, 1:15-CV-0967-JLT, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 115717, 2015 WL 5173535, at 11 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 3, 2015); [*68] see also In re Pharmatrak, Inc. Privacy Litig., 220 F. Supp. 2d 4, 13 (D. Mass. 2002), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. In re Pharmatrak, 329 F.3d 9 (1st Cir. 2003) ("While it is possible for modern computers to perform server-like functions, there is no evidence that any of the Plaintiffs used their computers in this way."); Cousineau v. Microsoft Corp., 6 F. Supp. 3d 1167, 1175 (W.D. Wash. 2014) (concluding that plaintiff's phone not a "facility" because it "did not provide location services to other users in a server-like fashion . . . .").

BHL's complaint alleges that by accessing the software and using the bitlocks, GSSI and Statoil obtained access to electronic communications that "were in electronic storage in that database." (Doc. 1 at ¶ 49.) Elsewhere in the complaint BHL states that the unauthorized use of the bitlocks granted GSSI and Statoil access to BHL's software, which was accessed through either Statoil or GSSI's computer network. (Id. at 40.) Finally, BHL avers that its software and trade secrets, reside on "computers and the computer network." (Id. at 29, 38.)

Although BHL's allegations are not a model of clarity in apprising this Court how the software, bitlocks, individual computers, and the computer networks function, at this stage, Plaintiff's averments still allow the Court to draw a reasonable inference that its software and bitlocks come within [*69] the ambit of the ECPA. The Court notes, however, that upon further factual development regarding the functions performed by BHL's software and bitlocks, it may become apparent that BHL was overly optimistic in asserting an ECPA claim.

ii. Electronic Storage

HN31[] To state a claim under the SCA, BHL must show not only that Defendants accessed a "facility through which an electronic communication service is provided," but furthermore, that Defendants "obtain[ed], alter[ed], or prevent[ed] authorized access to a wire or electronic communication while it [was] in electronic storage in such system . . . ." 18 U.S.C. § 2701(a). The SCA defines "electronic storage" as "(A) any temporary, intermediate storage of a wire or electronic communication incidental to the electronic transmission thereof; and (B) any storage of such communication by an electronic communication service for purposes of backup protection of such communication." 18 U.S.C. § 2510(17).

Supp. 2d 748, 755-56 (N.D. Ohio June 5, 2013)* (explaining why reasoning in iPhone is persuasive).

A number of courts have read subsection (A) of the definition of "electronic storage" narrowly, concluding that data residing on an individual's hard drive or cell phone is not in electronic storage because, unlike emails waiting on the server to be delivered to the recipient, it is not in "temporary, intermediate storage" as required [*70] by the Act. See, e.g., Garcia, 702 F.3d at 793 (citations omitted); In re DoubleClick, 154 F. Supp. 2d at 512; In re iPhone, 844 F. Supp. 2d at 1059. Nevertheless, subsection (B) provides an alternative avenue to qualification as electronic storage. See Theofel, 359 F.3d at 1076 ("By its plain terms, subsection (B) applies to backup storage regardless of whether it is intermediate or post-transmission.").

Here, BHL simply alleges that the software and data therein was accessed using the bitlocks and "[t]hrough these actions, Defendants . . . violated Title II of the ECPA." (Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 49-50.) These conclusory allegations are insufficient to give rise to an inference that the data resides in "temporary, intermediate" storage or is stored "for purposes of backup protection" as required to demonstrate "electronic storage" under the SCA. BHL may attempt to rectify this inadequacy in an amended pleading.

iii. Access

Statoil is correct to note that HN32[] authorized users cannot be held liable under § 2701 of the ECPA. See In re Am. Airlines, Inc., Privacy Litig., 370 F. Supp. 2d 552, 558-59 (N.D. Tex. 2005) (plaintiffs fail to state a § 2701 claim because "their amended complaints each assert that American authorized AAI to disclose the PNRs to TSA."). Under § 2701(c)(1), a party is excepted from liability if the conduct is authorized by the provider of the electronic communications service, which in this case would be BHL. However, unlike the plaintiffs' complaints [*71] in In re American Airlines, BHL's complaint clearly alleges that (1) BHL and Statoil had an express license agreement delineating the terms of Statoil's access and providing for automatic forfeiture of access privileges in case of breach, and (2) Statoil continued to access the software and bitlocks after it breached the license agreement. (Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 15-19, 21-22, 25-26, 30, 49.) This is sufficient to allege unauthorized access under the ECPA.

Moreover, it is worth mentioning that BHL likewise sufficiently alleges unauthorized access by GSSI. HN33[] Section 2701(c) also allows those who are "authorized by a user" (i.e., third-party users) of the electronic communication service to access a communication "of or intended for that user." 18 U.S.C. § 2701(c)(2). The plain language of § 2701(c)(2) indicates that only a "user" of the service can authorize third-party access to the communication. The statute defines "user" as one who "1) uses the electronic communication service; and 2) is duly authorized by the provider of such service to engage in such use." 18 U.S.C. § 2510(13) (emphasis added).

Because the statutory language is unambiguous, it must control the construction of the statute, notwithstanding the legislative history. United States v. Turkette, 452 U.S. 576, 580, 101 S. Ct. 2524, 69 L. Ed. 2d 246 (1981). Accordingly, GSSI would be authorized [*72] only if Statoil was "duly authorized" at the time access was granted. As already discussed, however, BHL has clearly alleged that Statoil's license agreement provided for immediate revocation of access privileges if access was granted to a third party without BHL's consent. Accordingly, Statoil was no longer a "duly authorized" user capable of providing third-party authorization at the time it did in fact provide access to GSSI. BHL has sufficiently pleaded unauthorized access for both Statoil and GSSI.

c. Unjust Enrichment (Count V - Statoil Only)

Count Five of BHL's complaint asserts a claim for unjust enrichment against GSSI and Statoil. (Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 60-64.) Statoil asks this Court to dismiss this claim, arguing that because the parties had a contractual relationship outlining the terms of Statoil's use of BHL's software, and BHL failed to plead that the contract was invalid for any reason, BHL is precluded from asserting this claim under Texas law. (Doc. 28 at 16-17.)[22]

---

[22] Statoil also argues that Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim is preempted by the Copyright Act. (Doc. 28 at 22-23.) Because the Court agrees with Statoil's primary argument, the Court need not address this secondary [*73] attack.

HN34[] In Texas, when one person has obtained a benefit from another by fraud, duress, or the taking of an undue advantage, he may recover under a theory of unjust enrichment. Heldenfels Bros., Inc. v. City of Corpus Christi, 832 S.W.2d 39, 41 (Tex. 1992). However, "[u]njust enrichment is not a proper remedy merely because it might appear expedient or generally fair that some recompense be afforded for an unfortunate loss to the claimant, or because the benefits to the person sought to be charged amount to a windfall." Heldenfels, 832 S.W.2d at 42 (citation and internal citation marks omitted). Texas courts have also made it clear that "unjust enrichment is based on quasi-contract and is unavailable when a valid, express contract governing the subject matter of the dispute exists." Coghlan v. Wellcraft Marine Corp., 240 F.3d 449, 454 (5th Cir. 2001) (citations omitted); Casa Orlando Apartments, Ltd. v. Fed. Nat'l Mortg. Ass'n, 624 F.3d 185, 196 n.32 (5th Cir. 2010) (citation omitted); McGowan & Co., Inc. v. Bogan, 93 F. Supp. 3d 624, 652 (S.D. Tex. 2015) (citations omitted).

The dispute in this case arises from Statoil's use of BHL's software and bitlocks in breach of its agreement with BHL. BHL's complaint clearly alleges that Statoil and BHL had a license agreement that expressly governed both Statoil's use of the software and bitlocks and its right to share them with third-party consultants. (Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 13-15.) This averment dooms Plaintiff's claim. Because a valid, express contract governs the terms of Statoil's use of [*74] BHL's software and outlines remedies for breach, Plaintiff's claim for unjust enrichment against Statoil must be dismissed.

d. Civil Conspiracy (Count VIII)

Statoil seeks dismissal of Plaintiff's civil conspiracy claim on the ground that it is completely preempted by the Copyright Act. (Doc. 28 at 17-22.) Statoil relies heavily on Stelly to make this argument. (Id. at 21-22.) Plaintiff responds that Statoil erroneously characterizes the underlying tort in its civil conspiracy claim as unauthorized copying and use of BHL's software rather than as the breach of the confidential relationship with BHL, and therefore, misreads Stelly. (Doc. 36 at 27-29.)

HN35[] Section 301(a) of the Copyright Act "accomplishes the general federal policy of creating a uniform method for protecting and enforcing certain rights in intellectual property by preempting other claims." Daboub v. Gibbons, 42 F.3d 285, 288 (5th Cir. 1995). The Fifth Circuit follows a two-step approach to determine whether a state-law claim is preempted by § 301. Id. at 288-89. At the first step, "the cause of action is examined to determine if it falls within the subject matter of copyright." Id. at 289 (citation and internal citation marks omitted). "Second, the cause of action is examined to determine if it protects rights that are equivalent [*75] to any of the exclusive rights of a federal copyright, as provided in 17 U.S.C. § 106." Id. (citation omitted).

i. Step One: Subject Matter of Copyright

In applying this test to cases involving software, the Fifth Circuit has made it clear that software falls within the ambit of § 301. See, e.g., Alcatel USA, Inc. v. DGI Techs., Inc., 166 F.3d 772, 786 (5th Cir. 1999) (concluding that operating system software is tangible media falling within the subject matter of copyright); Spear Mktg., Inc. v. BancorpSouth Bank, 791 F.3d 586, 597 (5th Cir. 2015) ("computer software is a tangible medium protected by the Copyright Act."). However, "claims not wholly limited to software" are broader than the scope of copyright protection. GlobeRanger Corp. v. Software AG, 691 F.3d 702, 709 (5th Cir. 2012).

Here, BHL alleges that Statoil misappropriated BHL's proprietary software in breach of the parties' confidential relationship. However, the extent of the allegedly misappropriated trade secrets—and whether software is solely at issue—is not clearly described in the complaint. (Doc. 1 at ¶¶ 77-80.) If more than software is at issue, then BHL would survive the first step of the analysis. On the other hand, if software is solely at issue, the dispositive question is whether BHL's civil conspiracy claim protects rights that are "equivalent" to any of the exclusive rights protected by copyright. Regardless of whether software is [*76] solely at issue, however, the Court concludes that BHL's claim survives. This is because BHL's claim is premised on an underlying tort that does not "protect[] rights that are 'equivalent' to any of the exclusive rights of a federal copyright as provided in 17 U.S.C. § 106." Daboub, 42 F.3d at 289 (citations omitted).

i. Step Two: Equivalency

HN36[] The Fifth Circuit "evaluate[s] the equivalency of rights under what is commonly referred to as the 'extra element' test." Alcatel, 166 F.3d at 787. For example, "[s]ection 106 [of the Act] grants the holder of a copyright the exclusive right to reproduce, distribute, perform, and display the copyrighted work." Kane v. Nace Intern., 117 F. Supp. 2d 592, 597 (S.D. Tex. 2000) (alteration in original) (quoting Daboub, 42 F.3d at 289) (internal citation marks omitted). Thus, "[a] state law claim protects rights equivalent to [a] federal copyright claim where the core of the state law theory of recovery speaks to wrongful copying." Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d at 783 (citing Daboub, 42 F.3d at 289.

Conspiracy is considered a derivative tort because liability is presumed on participation in some underlying tort. Tilton v. Marshall, 925 S.W.2d 672, 681 (Tex. 1996) (citation omitted). The elements of civil conspiracy in Texas are: (1) a combination of two or more persons; (2) an object to be accomplished (an unlawful purpose or a lawful purpose by unlawful means); (3) a meeting of the minds on the object or course of action; [*77] (4) one or more unlawful, overt acts; and (5) damages as the proximate result. Ultraflo Corp. v. Pelican Tank Parts, Inc., 823 F. Supp. 2d 578, 588 (S.D. Tex. 2011) (citations omitted); Ins. Co. of N. Am. v. Morris, 981 S.W.2d 667, 675 (Tex. 1998). Specific intent is required. Triplex Commc'ns Inc. v. Riley, 900 S.W.2d 716, 719 (Tex. 1995).

In evaluating the elements of civil conspiracy in the context of the extra-element test, this Court has concluded that "'the intent element of the conspiracy claim does not constitute qualitatively different conduct where the element of intent only goes to an intent to form an agreement to copy and use' copyrightable trade secrets and confidential information." Ultraflo, 823 F. Supp. 2d at 588 (quoting Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d at 791). In this case, however, the underlying tort that the intent element attaches to is misappropriation of trade secrets—a claim that courts have concluded is not preempted by the Copyright Act, because it includes an "extra element" of breach of confidentiality or improper methods, which is not equivalent to any of the exclusive rights of copyright. Id. at 587 (citing Stelly, 733 F. Supp. 2d at 786); GlobeRanger, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76059, 2015 WL 3648577, at *4-5; Emerald City Mgmt., LLC v. Kahn, 4:14-CV-358, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2143, 2016 WL 98751, at *18 (E.D. Tex. Jan. 8, 2016) (citations omitted); see also Stromback v. New Line Cinema, 384 F.3d 283, 303-304 (6th Cir. 2004) (collecting cases). Because the underlying tort alleged in this case (trade-secret misappropriation) survives the extra-element test and conspiracy is a derivative tort, this Court concludes that Plaintiff's civil conspiracy claim is likewise not preempted [*78] by § 301.

C. Defendant Statoil's Motion for Leave to File a Reply Memorandum

Statoil filed its Motion for Leave to File a Reply Memorandum to Plaintiff's Opposition of Motion to Dismiss on August 6, 2015. (Doc. 48.) In its preliminary statement, Statoil states that its purpose in filing the brief is to "make this [C]ourt aware of new, controlling precedent," and to "identify for the [C]ourt, numerous allegations contained" in BHL's brief "that are not set forth in the complaint and therefore, must not be considered on a motion to dismiss." (Doc. 48-2 at 2.) In this motion, Statoil argues that Spear Marketing—a case that Statoil alleges has numerous "similar, if not identical" claims as those in the case at bar—dictates a favorable outcome for Statoil's motion to dismiss. (Doc. 48 at 2 n.1.) BHL opposes Statoil's motion, arguing that Spear Marketing has no bearing on the arguments in Statoil's Motion to Dismiss" because it "does not address or change the existing law regarding preemption of conspiracy and unjust enrichment claims by the Copyright Act." (Doc. 56 at 1.) BHL also argues that "[i]n its proposed Reply, Statoil . . . proposes for the first time that all of Boresight's trade secrets are embodied completely [*79] in its software, thus implying that that [sic] copyright preemption of Boresight's state-law claims may be appropriate in this case." (Id. at 2.) Because this is a new argument not raised in Statoil's original motion to dismiss, BHL asks this Court to deny Statoil's motion. (Id. at 4.) In the alternative, BHL requests leave to file a surreply if the Court grants Statoil's motion because "no injustice would exist where Boresight is given a fair opportunity to respond." (Id. at 3-4.)

The Court initially notes that BHL is correct in pointing out that Spear Marketing has little to no bearing on Statoil's motion to dismiss[23] and that Statoil raises a new argument in its proposed reply. Moreover, while it appreciates Statoil's eagerness to assist, the Court is capable of determining what "must not be considered on a motion to dismiss" on its own. However, in the interest of having full briefing on all issues raised in the pending motions, the Court grants Statoil leave to file its reply memorandum. However, for the same reason—and in fairness to BHL—the Court likewise grants BHL leave to file its surreply.

IV. Conclusion

As discussed, the Court finds that it lacks subject matter jurisdiction of GSSI's declaratory judgment claims. This is an incurable defect. Accordingly, these claims must be dismissed with prejudice.

The Court also finds that a number of the parties' claims fail to meet the 12(b)(6) standard. However, the Court will grant the parties' requests for leave to amend these claims rather than dismissing them outright. See Great Plains Trust Co. v. Morgan Stanley Dean Witter & Co., 313 F.3d 305, 329 (5th Cir. 2002) ("[D]istrict courts often afford plaintiffs at least one opportunity to cure pleading deficiencies before dismissing a case, unless it is clear that the defects are incurable or the plaintiffs advise the court that they are unwilling or unable to amend in a manner that will avoid dismissal.") The Court believes that additional allegations could cure the existing deficiencies. For the forgoing reasons, the Court hereby

ORDERS that Plaintiff BHL's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 27) is GRANTED, Defendant Statoil's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 28) is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part, and Defendant GSSI's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 27) is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part. Accordingly, GSSI's [*81] declaratory judgment counterclaims (Counts I-III) are dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction and the following claims are dismissed, without prejudice, for failure to state a claim:

- BHL's ECPA claim (Count III)
- BHL's unjust enrichment claim against Statoil (Count V)
- GSSI's state antitrust counterclaim (Count VI)
- GSSI's tortious interference with existing contract counterclaim (Count VII)
- GSSI's tortious interference with prospective business relationships counterclaim (Count VIII)

The parties shall have 21 days to amend their pleadings to conform with the Court's rulings. It is further ORDERED that Defendant's Motion for Leave to File a Reply Memorandum to Plaintiff's Opposition of Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 48) is GRANTED. BHL's Motion for Leave to File Surreply (Doc. 56-1) is likewise GRANTED.

SIGNED at Houston, Texas, this 29th day of March, 2016.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In ruling on a motion to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), the court analyzes the complaint and takes all allegations of material fact as true and construes them in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. Dismissal may be based on a lack of a cognizable legal theory or on the absence of facts that would support a valid theory. A complaint must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory. A pleading that offers labels and conclusions or a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Nor does a complaint suffice if it tenders naked assertions devoid of further factual enhancement. Rather, the claim must be plausible on its face, meaning that the plaintiff must plead sufficient factual allegations to allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Heightened Pleading Requirements > Fraud Claims

HN3[] Heightened Pleading Requirements, Fraud Claims

Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) sets a heightened pleading standard for claims based on fraud. In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). In order to meet this standard, a complaint must specify such facts as the times, dates, places, benefits received, and other details of the alleged fraudulent activity. The heightened standard does not apply to malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b).

HN4[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

Where a jurisdictional challenge is based on the allegations of a plaintiff's complaint rather than on extrinsic evidence, courts assume the plaintiff's allegations to be true and draw all reasonable inferences in his favor. The inquiry is therefore much like a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) analysis.

Absent a duty to disclose, the failure to do so does not support a claim under the fraudulent prong of the Unfair Competition Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200-17210.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN15[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

When a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's "unfair" act or practice invokes Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200, the word "unfair" in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > State Regulation

HN16[] False Advertising, State Regulation

The False Advertising Law (FAL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500-17509, makes it unlawful for any person to make or disseminate or cause to be made or disseminated before the public any statement which is untrue or misleading, and which is known, or which by the exercise of reasonable care should be known, to be untrue or misleading. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17500. The plain language of the statute—which prohibits making, disseminating, or causing the dissemination of false or misleading statements—does not encompass omissions. There can be no FAL claim where there is no statement at all—or in other words that an omission, even of material facts, does not violate the FAL.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > State Regulation

HN17[] False Advertising, State Regulation

There must be at least some affirmative misrepresentation to support a claim under the False Advertising Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500-17509.

[*654] ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO DISMISS

Re: Dkt. No. 22

I. INTRODUCTION

"The use of child slave labor in the Ivory Coast is a humanitarian tragedy." Doe I v. Nestle USA, Inc., 766 F.3d 1013, 1016 (9th Cir. 2014). The fact that major international corporations source ingredients for their products from supply chains involving slavery and the worst forms of child labor raises significant ethical questions. The issue before [2] this Court, however, is whether California law requires corporations to inform customers of that fact on their product packaging and point of sale advertising. Every court to consider the issue has held that it does not. This Court agrees.

This is a putative class action in which Plaintiff Laura Dana claims that Defendants The Hershey Company and Hershey Chocolate & Confectionary Corporation (collectively, "Hershey") violated California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL," Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200-17210), Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA," Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1750-1784), and False Advertising Law ("FAL," Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500-17509) by failing to disclose on the packaging of Hershey's chocolate products that some of the cocoa used therein originated at farms in Côte d'Ivoire (also known as the Ivory Coast) that use slave labor and the worst forms of [*655] child labor. Hershey moves to dismiss all claims. The Court held a hearing on March 18, 2016.[1] For the reasons stated below, Hershey's Motion is GRANTED, and this action is dismissed with prejudice.[2]

II. BACKGROUND

A. Allegations of the Complaint[3]

Côte d'Ivoire is the world's largest producer of cocoa beans, the raw ingredient for chocolate, and supplies 40% of global cocoa production and 47% of total imports to the United States. Compl. (dkt. 1) ¶¶ 19, 46. Slave labor and the worst forms of child labor are common in Ivorian cocoa production, as is well documented by United States government agencies, academic studies, nonprofit organizations, investigative journalists, and former laborers. Id. ¶¶ 5-8, 23-25, 32-42. Children are frequently injured in the course of dangerous work involving machetes, chemicals, and heavy loads, and workers (both children and adults) may be beaten, whipped, and locked in to prevent escape. Id. ¶¶ 23-25. The Ninth Circuit has also acknowledged the existence of such conditions. Id. ¶ 26; Doe I, 766 F.3d at 1016.

Hershey is one of the largest chocolate companies in the United States and sells a number of popular chocolate products. Id. ¶ 3. In 2001, members if the United States chocolate [4] industry including Hershey signed a voluntary protocol, negotiated by Representative Eliot Engel and Senator Tom Harkin, to develop standards for certifying chocolate produced without labor abuses. Id. ¶ 27. After failing to meet the initial 2005 deadline, the industry extended the self-imposed deadline to 2008, then to 2010, and then to 2020. Id. ¶¶ 29-31.

Despite adopting a "supplier code" that prohibits child labor and forced labor, and a "Corporate Social Responsibility Report" stating that "Hershey has zero tolerance for the worst forms of child labor in its supply chain," Hershey sources much of its chocolate from Côte d'Ivoire through a multi-level supply chain of independent growers, cooperatives, distributors, and other intermediaries. Id. ¶¶ 4, 11, 20, 45, 47 51, 52. "Hershey acknowledges . . . the child and slave labor in its Ivorian supply chain,"[4] but does not disclose the existence of those labor abuses on its product labels. Id. ¶¶ 21, 22, 48, 50.

Dana "has purchased Hershey Chocolate Products at various retail stores including Target and Walmart in Brentwood and Antioch, California from 2011 through 2014." Id. ¶ 13. Citing studies showing that consumers will pay a premium for ethically produced coffee, clothing, and seafood, id. ¶¶ 55-59, Dana alleges that she and other customers "would not have purchased Hershey Chocolate Products or paid as much for them" if Hershey had disclosed labor violations on the product labels. Id. ¶ 10, see also id. ¶¶ 60, 95, 106.

The Complaint includes three claims, under the UCL, the CLRA, and the FAL, respectively. The UCL claim is based on three separate theories arising from Hershey's failure to disclose labor abuses in its [*656] supply chain on the packaging of its chocolate products: (1) the omission is "unlawful," because it violates the CLRA, id. ¶ 74; (2) the omission is "unfair," because the abusive labor practices themselves are immoral and the failure to disclose them

---

[1] The Court also heard argument in McCoy v. Nestle USA, Inc., No. 15-cv-4451, which involves different parties but substantially similar claims and arguments. A separate order has been published concurrently in that [3] case.

[2] The parties have consented to the jurisdiction of the undersigned magistrate judge for all purposes pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(c).

[3] Dana's allegations are taken as true in the context of a motion to dismiss.

[4] Certain Hershey products, sold under the brand names Bliss, Dagoba, and Scharffen Berger, are certified by the Rainforest Alliance (a nongovernmental organization) as using ethically produced cocoa and are not at issue in this [5] case. Compl. ¶ 49.

impairs competition and prevents consumers from making informed decisions, id. ¶ 75; and (3) the omission is "fraudulent" because it is likely to deceive a reasonable consumer and the true facts would be material [6] to reasonable consumer, id. ¶ 76. The CLRA claim asserts that Hershey's failure to disclose labor abuses in its supply chain constitutes a misrepresentation of the "source, characteristics, and standard" of the products. Id. ¶ 91, see also id. ¶¶ 88-90 (citing Cal. Civ. Code § 1770(a)(2), (5), (7)). The FAL claim asserts that Hershey had a duty to disclose the labor abuses in its supply chain because it had superior knowledge as compared to customers, and because it made "partial representations and/or misrepresentations to the contrary." Id. ¶ 102. In her Opposition, Dana disclaims any theory of an obligation to disclose arising from partial misrepresentations. Opp'n (dkt. 25) at 13 n.58.

B. Procedural History

Dana filed this action on September 28, 2015, seeking to represent herself and other similarly situated consumers who purchased Hershey chocolate products in the last four years. See generally Compl. Dana's counsel also represents plaintiffs who filed similar actions against two other large chocolate manufacturers, Mars and Nestlé. See Hodsdon v. Mars, Inc., No. 3:15-cv-04450-RS (N.D. Cal.); McCoy v. Nestlé USA, Inc., No. 3:15-cv-04451 (N.D. Cal.). Defendants moved to dismiss in all three cases. Judge Seeborg [7] granted the motion to dismiss in Hodsdon, as discussed in detail below. The undersigned heard argument on the motion in McCoy concurrently with Hershey's motion in the present case.[5]

C. Parties' Arguments

Hershey argues that the case must be dismissed for several reasons, starting with the safe harbor doctrine, which provides that plaintiffs cannot use California's consumer protection laws to pursue relief that [8] is foreclosed by other, more specific statutes. Mot. (dkt. 22) at 6-9. According to Hershey, the California Transparency in Supply Chains Act of 2010 (the "Supply Chains Act") bars Dana's claims because it regulates disclosures related to labor abuses in supply chains and does not require the disclosures Dana seeks. Id. Dana responds that the Supply Chains Act does not specifically permit Hershey's omissions or bar Dana's claims, and that the labor violations addressed by that statute (slavery and human trafficking) do not encompass all of the violations at issue here (which also include dangerous but non-slave child labor). Opp'n at 5-10.

[*657] Next, Hershey argues that it has no duty to disclose labor conditions in its supply chain because the information at issue does not relate to product safety, and because Hershey did not have exclusive knowledge, actively conceal the information, make misleading partial representations, or have a fiduciary relationship with Dana. Mot. at 9-17. Dana contends that the limitation of the duty to disclose to safety issues only applies in post-warranty product defect cases, which this is not, and that a duty arises from Hershey's superior (albeit not actually [9] exclusive) knowledge of labor abuses in its supply chain. Opp'n at 11-15. She "does not here contend that Hershey's partial disclosures give rise to its duty to disclose." Id. at 13 n.58.

Turning to Dana's specific claims, Hershey argues that Dana cannot proceed on a UCL claim for "unlawful" conduct because her CLRA claim is deficient, nor for "fraudulent" conduct because such a claim does not encompass omissions absent a duty to disclose. Mot. at 17-18. Dana responds that her CLRA claim is sufficient to support an "unlawful conduct" UCL claim, and the "fraudulent conduct" claim should survive because she contends that Hershey did have a duty to disclose. Opp'n at 17-18. As for "unfair" conduct, Hershey contends that Dana cannot succeed under any of the tests that courts have used, because she has not identified a legislative policy against Hershey's non-disclosure, the non-disclosure at issue is not inherently immoral or oppressive, and there is no substantial injury to consumers. Mot. at 18-21. Dana argues that the labor abuses in Hershey's supply chain contravene legislatively declared policies in the form of United Nations prohibitions of forced labor and the worst forms of child labor that the [10] United States has ratified, and that those abuses are immoral and unethical. Opp'n at 18-19. She also contends that the harm of deceiving consumers outweighs the cost to Hershey of changings its product labeling. Id. at 19-20. Hershey notes in reply that the United Nations sources that Dana cites relate only to labor practices, not product labeling. Reply (dkt. 30) at 10.

[5] Four other cases based on nondisclosure of supply chain labor violations, brought by plaintiffs who also share counsel with Dana, have been dismissed for failure to state a claim in the Central District of California. Wirth v. Mars Inc., No. SA CV 15-1470-DOC (KESx), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14552, 2016 WL 471234 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 5, 2016); Barber v. Nestlé USA, Inc., 154 F. Supp. 3d 954, 2015 WL 9309553 (C.D. Cal. 2015); De Rosa v. Tri-Union Seafoods, LLC, No. CV 15-7540-CJC (AGRx), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5497, 2016 WL 524059 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 15, 2016) (summarily dismissing for the reasons stated in Barber); Hughes v. Big Heart Pet Brands, No. CV 15-8007-CJC (AGRx), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5508, 2016 WL 524057 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 15, 2016) (same). Those cases, all of which concern seafood (or pet food that includes seafood products) rather than chocolate, were decided at least in part based on the safe harbor doctrine, which Hodsdon, McCoy, and this Order decline to reach. The four Central District cases are presently pending on appeal before the Ninth Circuit.

Hershey argues that Dana's CLRA claim fails because Hershey had no duty to disclose, and also because the omissions regarding labor abuses do not relate to the specific provisions of the statute Dana cites, which govern representations regarding attributes including the "source," "characteristics," and "standard" of goods. Mot. at 21-22. Dana contends that "Hershey's failure to disclose that its supply chain is not child and slave free is likely to deceive a reasonable consumer regarding the chocolate's source (from plantations using child and slave labor) and characteristics/standard (produced by child and slave labor)." Opp'n at 20. Hershey responds that the provisions at issue are intended "to target misrepresentations regarding the identity of the seller, . . . a product's physical features or capabilities, . . . or its inherent [11] level of quality or performance," not the labor standards used to produce the product. Reply at 12.

Hershey does not address Dana's FAL claim separately in detail, but contends in a footnote that the FAL only governs affirmative misrepresentations, not omissions. Mot. at 17 n.18. Dana disputes that proposition and argues that some cases have allowed FAL claims to proceed based on omissions. Opp'n at 17.

According to Hershey, Dana lacks both Article III and statutory standing to bring any of her claims because she cannot trace the cocoa used in the specific chocolate products she bought back to a specific plantation, and thus cannot know whether the products she bought were produced with slave or child labor. Mot. at 22-23. Hershey contends that without that knowledge, [*658] whether the products Dana bought were misrepresented (even under Dana's theory of misrepresentation by omission) is uncertain, and if they were not, Dana has not suffered any cognizable injury. Id. Dana responds that her injury and standing arise from misrepresentation of the supply chain for the chocolate, and if Hershey had better disclosed the labor abuses in the supply chain, she would not have bought the products regardless [12] of whether she knew the origin of the cocoa in a specific item. Opp'n at 22. Dana relies on case law holding that a consumer who purchased or paid more for a product based on misrepresentations has both constitutional and statutory standing to bring claims under California's consumer protection laws. Opp'n at 21-22 (citing Hinojos v. Kohl's Corp., 718 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2013); Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 330, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (2011)).

Finally, Hershey argues that requiring the labeling Dana seeks would compel speech in violation of the First Amendment. Mot. at 23-25. Dana contends that laws against misleading advertising are constitutional, and that a mere rational basis is required to support laws compelling affirmative factual product labeling to avoid misleading consumers. Opp'n at 23-25 (citing, e.g., Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel, 471 U.S. 626, 105 S. Ct. 2265, 85 L. Ed. 2d 652, 17 Ohio B. 315 (1985)). Hershey responds that Dana has not alleged any misleading affirmative representations that require labeling to redress consumer confusion, and that the disclosure Dana seeks is not '"purely factual and uncontroversial."' Reply at 14-15 (quoting Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651).

D. Hodsdon v. Mars, Inc.

In Hodsdon, Judge Seeborg granted a motion by chocolate manufacturer Mars, Inc. to dismiss claims very similar those in the case at hand. Hodsdon v. Mars, Inc., 162 F. Supp. 3d 1016, No. 15-CV-04450-RS, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 17, 2016). As a preliminary matter, the court held that the plaintiff had standing because: (1) "California [13] law permits litigants to pursue claims under the UCL, CLRA, and FAL if they show . . . that 'the consumer paid more than he or she actually valued the product'"; (2) the plaintiff adequately alleged that the use of forced labor in the supply chain caused him to devalue the product even if he could not prove that forced labor was used to produce the specific chocolate products that he purchased; and (3) the plaintiff adequately alleged that he saw the product labels before he purchased the products. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 3 (quoting Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1104). Turning to the merits, however, the court held that the plaintiff failed to state a claim under California law.

With respect to the FAL claim, the court reconciled cases holding that omissions were not actionable with others that allowed FAL claims based on omissions to proceed, ultimately determining that omissions accompanying misleading incomplete statements are actionable, but omissions with no corresponding statements are not. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 4. Compare *Norcia v. Samsung Telecomms. Am., LLC, No. 14-CV-00582-JD, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110454, 2015 WL 4967247, at 8 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 20, 2015) ("There can be no FAL claim where there is no 'statement' at all."), and Stanwood v. Mary Kay, Inc., 941 F. Supp. 2d 1212, 1222 (C.D. Cal. 2012) (same), with In re Sony Gaming Networks & Customer Data Sec. Breach Litig., 996 F. Supp. 2d 942, 991 (S.D. Cal. 2014) (denying motion to dismiss where defendant claimed to have taken steps to secure information but [14] failed to disclose security deficiencies), and *Tait v. BSH Home Appliances Corp., No. SACV 10-00711 DOC (ANx), 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103584, 2011 WL 3941387, at 2 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2011) (denying a motion to dismiss where the [*659] defendant marketed a washing machine as "sanitary" but failed to disclose its tendency to accumulate mold). Because the plaintiff in Hodsdon "asserted the former type of claim, i.e., that Mars violated the FAL by failing to issue any statement at all," the court dismissed the claim. *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383 at 4.

Next, the court turned to the plaintiff's CLRA claim and his claim under the "unlawful" prong of the UCL, which was based on the purported CLRA violation. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 5-6. Noting the Ninth Circuit's holding that "California courts have generally rejected a broad obligation to disclose," the court looked to whether Mars had any such obligation. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 5. The court held that despite one case to the contrary, "the overwhelming majority of courts to consider the issue" have held that omissions are only actionable under the CLRA if they relate to product safety or defects. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 5-6. Because the omissions at issue related instead to "admittedly horrific labor practices" in the supply chain, the court dismissed the plaintiff's CLRA claim and the "unlawful conduct" aspect of the UCL claim that derived from it. [15] *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 6.

The plaintiff also brought UCL claims based on the "fraudulent" and "unfair" prongs of the statute. The court followed two California appellate decisions holding that omissions cannot satisfy the "fraudulent" prong unless there was a duty to disclose, and therefore dismissed that claim. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 6 (citing Berryman v. Merit Prop. Mgmt., Inc., 152 Cal. App. 4th 1544, 1557, 62 Cal. Rptr. 3d 177 (2007); Daugherty v. Am. Honda Co., 144 Cal. App. 4th 824, 838, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 118 (2006)). As for the "unfair" prong, the court held that the plaintiff's complaint did not satisfy any of the tests used by California courts to assess such claims: (1) unlike the underlying labor conditions themselves, the lack of disclosure could not be said to be "'immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers,'" because the harm was merely the purchase of a chocolate bar and the information that was absent from the packaging was readily available elsewhere; and (2) again unlike the underlying labor conditions, the harm from lack of disclosure was not tied to any established public policy expressed in "'specific constitutional, statutory, or regulatory provisions.'" *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 7 (quoting S. Bay Chevrolet v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp., 72 Cal. App. 4th 861, 887, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 (1999); McVicar v. Goodman Glob., Inc., 1 F. Supp. 3d 1044, 1054 (C.D. Cal. 2014)). The court therefore dismissed the UCL claim in its entirety.

Because the plaintiff failed to state a claim for the reasons summarized above, the court did not reach Mars's argument [16] that the Supply Chains Act creates a safe harbor, but expressed doubt that any such harbor is as broad as Mars contended. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 8-9. The court found that amendment would be futile and denied leave to amend. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 9. Hodsdon's appeal of Judge Seeborg's decision is currently pending before the Ninth Circuit.

III. ANALYSIS

A. Legal Standard

HN1[] A complaint may be dismissed for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. "The purpose of a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) is to test the legal sufficiency of the complaint." N. Star Int'l v. Ariz. Corp. Comm'n, 720 F.2d 578, 581 (9th Cir. 1983). Generally, a plaintiff's burden at the pleading stage is relatively light. Rule 8(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure states that "[a] pleading which sets forth a claim for relief . . . shall contain . . . a short [*660] and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a).

HN2[] In ruling on a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), the court analyzes the complaint and takes "all allegations of material fact as true and construe[s] them in the light most favorable to the non-moving party." Parks Sch. of Bus. v. Symington, 51 F.3d 1480, 1484 (9th Cir. 1995). Dismissal may be based on a lack of a cognizable legal theory or on the absence of facts that would support a valid theory. Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). A complaint must "contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary [17] to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 562, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (citing Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1106 (7th Cir. 1984)). "A pleading that offers 'labels and conclusions' or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). "Nor does a complaint suffice if it tenders 'naked assertion[s]' devoid of 'further factual enhancement.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557). Rather, the claim must be "'plausible on its face,'" meaning that the plaintiff must plead sufficient factual allegations to "allow[] the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570).

HN3[] Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure sets a heightened pleading standard for claims based on fraud. "In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). The Ninth Circuit has held that in order to meet this standard, a "complaint must specify such facts as the times, dates, places, benefits received, and other details of the alleged fraudulent activity." Neubronner v. Milken, 6 F.3d 666, 672 (9th Cir. 1993); see also McMaster v. United States, 731 F.3d 881, 897 (9th Cir. 2013). The heightened standard does not apply to "[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b).

Hershey also moves to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(1), apparently on the basis that the Court lacks jurisdiction because Dana lacks Article III [18] standing. See Mot. at ECF p. 2 (Notice of Motion identifying Rule 12(b)(1) as a basis for dismissal); id. at 22-23 (arguing that Dana lacks standing). HN4[] Where, as here, a jurisdictional challenge is based on the allegations of a plaintiff's complaint rather than on extrinsic evidence, courts "assume [the plaintiff's] allegations to be true and draw all reasonable inferences in his favor." Wolfe v. Strankman, 392 F.3d 358, 362 (9th Cir. 2004). "[T]he inquiry is therefore much like a Rule 12(b)(6) analysis." Animal Legal Def. Fund v. HVFG LLC, 939 F. Supp. 2d 992, 997 (N.D. Cal. 2013).

B. Standing

Hershey argues that Dana lacks Article III and statutory standing to pursue these claims because she does not and cannot allege that the specific products she purchased were made from cocoa produced with the labor abuses at issue in this case—slave labor or the worst forms of child labor—and therefore fails to allege an actual, particularized injury. Mot. at 22-23; Reply at 12-14. The parties agree that Hershey currently cannot trace the cocoa used in a particular Hershey chocolate product to a specific plantation, and there is thus no way to know what labor [*661] practices were used in its production. See Compl. ¶ 10; Mot. at 22; Reply at 13. Dana argues that she has standing because she would have either not purchased or paid less for Hershey's products if she had known [19] that the supply chain involved the labor abuses at issue, regardless of where the cocoa in a particular chocolate bar originated. Opp'n at 22. Judge Seeborg held that the plaintiff in Hodsdon had standing under similar circumstances, and the Court agrees that Dana has standing here. See Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383 at *3.

The issue of Article III standing is straightforward. "HN5[] [W]hen, as here, 'Plaintiffs contend that class members paid more for [a product] than they otherwise would have paid, or bought it when they otherwise would not have done so' they have suffered an Article III injury in fact." Hinojos v. Kohl's Corp., 718 F.3d 1098, 1104 (9th Cir. 2013) (quoting Mazza v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 666 F.3d 581, 595 (9th Cir. 2012)) (second alteration in original).

Dana also has standing under the California statutes at issue. HN6[] The UCL and FAL require that private plaintiffs "ha[ve] suffered injury in fact and ha[ve] lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition" or false advertising. Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1103 (quoting Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204 (UCL); citing id. § 17535 (FAL)) (alterations in original).[6] In Hinojos, the Ninth Circuit examined the California Supreme Court's decision in Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, which held that a "'consumer who relies on a product label and challenges a misrepresentation contained therein can satisfy the standing requirement of [the UCL and the FAL] by alleging . . . that he [20] or she would not have bought the product but for the misrepresentation,'" and that "such allegations are sufficient to establish economic injury within the meaning of [those statutes]." Id. at 1105 (quoting Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 330, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (2011)) (ellipsis in original).

In both Kwikset, where the defendant marketed locks as "Made in U.S.A." despite some foreign components and assembly work, and Hinojos, where the defendant allegedly advertised its normal prices as "reduced," plaintiffs who relied on those representation had standing to sue under the UCL and FAL. Id. at 1107; Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th at 330. Those courts also listed a number of other scenarios where a plaintiff's reliance on false advertising could give rise to standing: "meat falsely labeled as kosher or halal, wine labeled with the wrong region or year, blood diamonds mislabeled as conflict-free, and goods falsely suggesting they were produced by union labor." Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1105 (citing Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th at 328-29). Dana's claim that she would have paid less for (or declined to purchase) Hershey's products [21] but for Hershey's misrepresentations of the labor practices in its supply chain fits well within these examples.

The Ninth Circuit's decision in Birdsong v. Apple, Inc., 590 F.3d 955 (9th Cir. 2009), does not deprive Dana of standing. See Mot. at 22; Reply at 13 (citing Birdsong for the argument that Dana lacks standing unless the specific product she purchased was produced by slave labor or child labor). In that case, the plaintiffs alleged that Apple violated the UCL by selling iPods that were capable of producing dangerous volume levels and thus causing [*662] hearing loss. Id. at 957. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's holding that the plaintiffs failed to show a particularized and actual injury sufficient for standing under the UCL—despite the plaintiffs' argument that the risk of hearing loss diminished the value of the iPods—in part because "the alleged loss in value . . . rests on a hypothetical risk of hearing loss to other consumers who may or may not choose to use their iPods in a risky manner," and the plaintiffs did "not claim that they, or anyone else, have suffered or [were] substantially certain to suffer hearing loss from using an iPod." Id. at 959-62. Here, in contrast, Dana alleges that the value of the chocolate products was diminished [22] because consumers did not wish to support a supply chain that included severe labor abuses. The alleged damage was therefore done by the purchase itself, not by any contingency that might happen after the purchase.[7]

[6] HN7[] The CLRA allows a consumer who has suffered "any damage" to sue, and "any plaintiff who has standing under the UCL's and FAL's 'lost money or property' requirement will, a fortiori, have suffered 'any damage' for purposes of establishing CLRA standing." Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1107-08.

[7] Hershey also cites a number of district court cases finding that plaintiff purchasers did not have standing merely because products were defective as to other purchasers. Mot. at 23 & n.21 (citing In re McNeil Consumer Healthcare, Mktg. & Sales Practices Litig., No. MDL 2190, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 76800, 2011 WL 2802854 (E.D. Pa. July 15, 2011); Meaunrit v. The Pinnacle Foods Grp., LLC, No. C 09-04555 CW, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43858, 2010 WL 1838715 (N.D. Cal. May 5, 2010); Myers-Armstrong v. Actavis Totowa, LLC, No. C 08-04741 WHA, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38112, 2009 WL 1082026, (N.D. Cal.

Hershey argues, essentially, that a UCL claim based on misrepresentation of labor practices can only succeed where a plaintiff is certain that the objectionable practice was used to produce the specific item that the plaintiff purchased. See Reply at 12-13. Stepping back from [23] the fact pattern of this case, that argument would dictate that even if Hershey had—hypothetically—concealed Ivorian labor conditions from its customers, falsely labeled all of its chocolate as certified to be free of child labor, and run a fraudulent national ad campaign touting its child-labor-free chocolate, a customer who relied on that false promotion would lack standing to sue for fraudulent business practices and false advertising so long as some fraction of Hershey's cocoa met those descriptions and the customer was unable to tell what labor conditions produced the cocoa in the actual product he or she purchased. Such a result would undermine the holding of Hinojos and Kwikset.[8] The difference between that hypothetical scenario and Dana's allegation of mere omission is critical to the outcome of the present motion, as discussed in the [*663] sections below, but it is a difference relevant to the merits of the claims, not to standing.

"'For a significant segment of the buying public, labor practices do matter in making consumer choices.'" Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th at 329 (quoting Kasky v. Nike, Inc., 27 Cal. 4th 939, 969, 119 Cal. Rptr. 2d 296, 45 P.3d 243 (2002)). It is plausible that a consumer would place less value on a product produced from a supply chain involving severe labor abuses. Dana alleges that she purchased products or paid a higher price for them because she was deceived regarding the labor practices in the supply chain. That actual, particularized injury is [25] sufficient to establish standing.

C. CLRA Claim

HN8[] The CLRA prohibits certain enumerated "unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices undertaken by any person in a transaction intended to result or which results in the sale or lease of goods or services to any consumer." Cal. Civ. Code § 1770(a). Dana argues that Hershey's failure to disclose labor abuses on its packaging violates subsection (a)(2) by "[m]isrepresenting the source" of the chocolate, subsection (a)(5) by "[r]epresenting that goods . . . have . . . characteristics . . . which they do not have," and subsection (a)(7) by "[r]epresenting that goods . . . are of a particular standard." Id. § 1770(a)(2), (5), (7); see Compl. ¶¶ 88-91; Opp'n at 20. In her Opposition, Dana makes clear that these theories are based on "Hershey's omission of known child and slave labor in its supply chain," and that she "does not here contend that Hershey's partial misrepresentations give rise to its duty to disclose." Opp'n at 13 n.58.

HN9[] "[A]lthough a claim may be stated under the CLRA in terms constituting fraudulent omissions, to be actionable the omission must be contrary to a representation actually made by the defendant, or an omission of a fact the defendant was obliged to disclose." Daugherty v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 144 Cal. App. 4th 824, 835, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 118 (2006). "California courts have generally rejected a broad obligation to disclose . [26] . . ." Wilson v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 668 F.3d 1136, 1141 (9th Cir. 2012). In Wilson, the Ninth Circuit held that, absent affirmative misrepresentations, an obligation to disclose under California law extends only to matters of product

Apr. 22, 2009), aff'd, 382 F. App'x 545 (9th Cir. 2010); Whitson v. Bumbo, No. C 07-05597 MHP, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 32282, 2009 WL 1515597 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 16, 2009)). To the extent those cases are consistent with the more recent Ninth Circuit decisions in Hinojos and Mazza, all of them—like Birdsong—involved at most an unrealized risk of future harm, and are not analogous to the case at hand where Dana alleges that failure to disclose ethical practices in the supply chain affected her willingness to purchase and pay for the products.

[8] Similarly, to use some of the examples given in those cases, it would be a bizarre result if sellers advertising food as halal or kosher, diamonds as conflict-free, or products as union-made could knowingly mix compliant and non-compliant products with [24] impunity so long as there was no way for a buyer to trace the specific item he or she purchased back to the source. The Eighth Circuit has nevertheless adopted that rule. See Wallace v. ConAgra Foods, Inc., 747 F.3d 1025, 1030-31 (8th Cir. 2014) (holding that customers lacked Article III standing to bring a claim based on allegedly false advertising of a product as using 100% kosher beef, where the plaintiffs could not show that the specific products they purchased contained non-kosher beef). This Court respectfully disagrees with that result. In this Court's view, if a customer has paid a premium for an assurance that a product meets certain standards, and the assurance turns out to be meaningless, the premium that the customer has paid is an actual, personal, particularized injury that is cognizable under Article III. See Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1104.

safety. Id. at 1141-43 (examining Daugherty, 144 Cal. App. 4th at 836, and subsequent decisions); see also Oestreicher v. Alienware Corp., 322 F. App'x 489, 493 (9th Cir. 2009) (unpublished and non-precedential) ("A manufacturer's duty [of disclosure] to consumers is limited to its warranty obligations absent either an affirmative misrepresentation or a safety issue.").

At least one district court decision has limited Wilson to cases where a product was covered by a warranty that expired before the defect became apparent. Stanwood v. Mary Kay, Inc., 941 F. Supp. 2d 1212, 1221 (C.D. Cal. 2012). Central to the Central District's holding was its determination that "[t]he Ninth Circuit acknowledged that its requirement of a safety issue does not necessarily apply outside the products defect context where warranty protections are not available," and that Wilson "list[ed] cases where a safety issue was not required to trigger a duty to disclose." Id. (citing Wilson, 668 F.3d at 1142). The Court respectfully disagrees with Stanwood's reading of Wilson. The cases listed at the page cited in Wilson by Stanwood do not support Stanwood's holding: four cases explicitly based the materiality of an omission at least in part on [*664] whether it related to safety, [27] [9] and the Ninth Circuit characterized the remaining two[10] as having "arguably concerned safety issues." Wilson, 668 F.3d at 1142 & n.2. Accordingly, the Court does not agree that Wilson is limited to cases where a warranty once existed but has since expired. There are cases holding that a manufacturer has a greater duty to disclose defects that arise during a product's express warranty period. E.g., Collins v. eMachines, Inc., 202 Cal. App. 4th 249, 257-58 (2011); see also Wilson, 668 F.3d at 1142 n.1 (discussing Tietsworth v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 720 F. Supp. 2d 1123 (N.D. Cal. 2010)). But there is no allegation that Hershey made any warranty of its chocolate products that would be relevant in this case.[11]

The Court agrees with Judge Seeborg's [28] conclusion that HN10[] the weight of authority limits a duty to disclose under the CLRA to issues of product safety, unless disclosure is necessary to counter an affirmative misrepresentation. See *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383 at 6 (declining to follow Stanwood in light of "overwhelming authority to the contrary," and collecting cases). The Court also concludes that a plain reading of Wilson governs this case, and this "Court is not free to deviate from the Ninth Circuit's construction of California law in Wilson absent a subsequent interpretation from California's courts that the interpretation was incorrect." Rasmussen v. Apple, Inc., 27 F. Supp. 3d 1027, 1036 (N.D. Cal. 2014) (following Wilson despite concluding that its basis in California law is "subject to reasonable debate") (citing Kona Enters., Inc. v. Estate of Bishop, 229 F.3d 877, 885 n.7 (9th Cir. 2000)). Further, the Court agrees with Judge Seeborg and Hershey that some bright-line limitation on a manufacturer's duty to disclose is sound policy, given the difficulty of anticipating exactly what information some customers might find material to their purchasing decisions and wish to see on product labels. See *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383 at 6 ("[Stanwood's and Dana's] definition of a material omission has stunning breadth, and could leave manufacturers (chocolate or otherwise) little guidance about what information, if any, it must disclose [29] to avoid CLRA or UCL liability."); Mot. at 12-13 (discussing examples of consumers making purchasing decisions based on "businesses' positions on social issues; their support for or opposition to legislation; their political donations; their environmental record; their employment practices; and their ties to certain nations or regimes" (footnotes omitted)). There are [*665] countless issues that may be legitimately important to many customers, and the courts are not suited to determine which should occupy the limited surface area of a chocolate wrapper.

HN11[] A duty to disclose under California law does not extend to all "information [that] may persuade a consumer to make different purchasing decisions." *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383 at 6 (citing *Wirth, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14552, 2016 WL 471234 at 5-6). Because Dana does not allege any omission of known dangers to the safety of customers, there is no duty to disclose applicable to this case, and Dana's CLRA claim is therefore DISMISSED. A contrary result would create "a broad obligation to disclose," which "California courts have generally rejected." Wilson, 668 F.3d at 1141.

Even if that were not so, the parties agree Dana would still need to show one of the following to support a duty to disclose: (1) a fiduciary relationship between Hershey and Dana; (2) [30] that Hershey had "exclusive knowledge of material facts not known or reasonably accessible to" its customers; (3) that Hershey actively concealed a material fact; or (4) that Hershey had made misleading partial representations. Opp'n at 12 (quoting Doe v. SuccessfulMatch.com, 70 F. Supp. 3d 1066, 1076 (N.D. Cal. 2014)); Mot. at 9-10. Dana relies solely on the "exclusive knowledge" test. Opp'n at 13-15. But even if "courts do not apply 'exclusivity' with . . . rigidity," see Johnson v. Harley-Davidson Motor Co. Grp., 285 F.R.D. 573, 583 (E.D. Cal. 2012), it is difficult to see how any definition of "exclusive knowledge" could include a case where, by Dana's own allegations: "Hershey acknowledges as it must, the child and slave labor in its Ivorian supply chain" in its Corporate Social Responsibility Report, Compl. ¶ 21; the industry acknowledged the issue in the Harkin-Engel Protocol in 2001—more than ten years before the statute of limitations period for Dana's CLRA claim—and has repeatedly admitted its failure to even develop a comprehensive certification system in the years since, id. ¶¶ 27-31; and in 2006 the United States Department of Labor commissioned Tulane University to publish reports detailing labor abuses in the chocolate industry supply chain, id. ¶¶ 32-36; among other public disclosures detailed in the Complaint.

Further, [31] even if Dana could adequately plead that Hershey had a duty to disclose the labor abuses in its supply chain on its product labels, it is far from clear that such information falls within the categories of representations governed by the CLRA. Dana invokes provisions barring misrepresentation of the "source," "characteristics," and "standard" of a product. Opp'n at 20 (citing Cal. Civ. Code § 1770(a)(2), (5), (7)). HN12[] While the CLRA provides that it "shall be liberally construed and applied to promote its underlying purposes" of consumer protection, Cal. Civ. Code § 1760, it does not explicitly discuss representations regarding labor practices, see id. § 1770(a), and Dana cites no authority holding that any of the enumerated categories she relies on are so broad as to encompass labor abuses. Because the Court holds that Hershey did not have a duty to disclose labor abuses in its supply chain on its product labels, the Court declines to resolve whether misrepresentations regarding labor practices can fall within the scope of the CLRA.

D. UCL Claim

HN13[] California's UCL prohibits unfair competition, defined as "any unlawful, unfair, or fraudulent business act or practice." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Dana brings her claim under each of these prongs, and Hershey argues that each must [32] be dismissed.

[*666] The "unlawful" prong of Dana's Complaint is based solely on Hershey's purported violation of the CLRA. Compl. ¶ 74. As discussed above, the Court holds that Dana fails to state a CLRA claim. Hershey's Motion is therefore GRANTED as to this prong of Dana's UCL claim.

The "fraudulent" prong fails for similar reasons. As Judge Seeborg noted in Hodsdon, California courts have held that "'HN14[] [a]bsent a duty to disclose, the failure to do so does not support a claim under the fraudulent prong of the UCL.'" *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383 at 6 (quoting Berryman v. Merit Prop. Mgmt., Inc., 152 Cal. App. 4th 1544, 1557, 62 Cal. Rptr. 3d 177 (2007)); see also Daugherty, 144 Cal. App. 4th at 838 ("We cannot agree that a failure to disclose a fact one has no affirmative duty to disclose is 'likely to deceive' anyone within the meaning of the UCL."). Because, as discussed above, the Court holds that Hershey had no affirmative duty to disclose severe labor abuses in its supply chain on its product labels, Hershey's Motion is GRANTED as to the "fraudulent" prong of Dana's UCL claim.

That leaves the "unfair" prong, the test for which remains somewhat unsettled in the California courts. Courts previously held a practice to be "'unfair' . . . when it offends an established public policy or when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially [33] injurious to consumers." S. Bay Chevrolet v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp., 72 Cal. App. 4th 861, 886-87, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 (1999) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). "This test involves balancing the harm to the consumer against the utility of the defendant's practice." Lozano v. AT & T Wireless Servs., Inc., 504 F.3d 718, 735 (9th Cir. 2007) (citing S. Bay, 72 Cal. App. 4th at 886). The California Supreme Court, however, found that the South Bay test was "too amorphous and provide[d] too little guidance to courts and businesses" in a UCL case between competitors, and held instead that:

> HN15[] When a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's "unfair" act or practice invokes section 17200, the word "unfair" in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.

Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 185, 187, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527. The Cel-Tech court explicitly declined to decide what test applied to actions brought by consumers, as opposed to by competitors. Id. at 197 n.12.

In the years since Cel-Tech, some courts have continued to use the South Bay test for cases brought by consumers, while others have followed Cel-Tech's lead and "require[d] that the unfairness be tied to a 'legislatively declared' policy," Lozanoa v. AT & T Wireless Servs., Inc., 504 F.3d 718, 736 (9th Cir. 2007), or in other words, "'that the UCL claim [34] be tethered to specific constitutional, statutory, or regulatory provisions,'" *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 7 (quoting McVicar v. Goodman Global, Inc., 1 F. Supp. 3d 1044, 1054 (C.D. Cal. 2014)). "Absent guidance from the California courts about the proper definition of an 'unfair' business practice, federal courts have applied both tests." Id. (citing Lozano, 504 F.3d at 736).

The "legislative policies" on which Dana relies are the United Nations' International Labor Convention No. 182 and the United [*667] Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights—the former forbidding the worst forms of child labor, the latter forbidding slavery, and both having been ratified by the United States. Opp'n at 18-19. The crux of Dana's claim, however, is not that Hershey utilized slave labor or the worst forms of child labor, but rather that Hershey does not disclose the existence of those labor abuses in its supply chain on the packaging of its products. Dana has not identified any legislatively declared policy requiring such disclosure,[12] nor does she cite any authority for the proposition that where some of a manufacturer's suppliers contravene a legislatively established policy, it is "unfair" within the meaning of the UCL for the manufacturer to fail to disclose those violations on its product packaging. The Court declines to [35] make that leap.

At the hearing, Dana's counsel suggested for the first time that Dana could amend her UCL claim to tether the "unfair" prong to the Department of Labor's listing of goods produced with child labor and forced labor, see 22 U.S.C. § 7112(b), and to California's Supply Chains Act, which is discussed in more detail below in the context of Hershey's safe harbor doctrine argument, see Cal. Civ. Code § 1714.43. Although both statutes call for certain disclosures related to labor conditions, neither expresses any policy of disclosure on product labels. Amending Dana's Complaint to reference those statutes would not remedy the defects of her UCL claim.

[12] While Dana does not argue in the context of the "unfair" prong that either the CLRA or the FAL constitutes such a policy, her arguments that those statutes compel the disclosure she seeks could perhaps be transposed to this claim. For the reasons discussed above and below in the context of Dana's CLRA and FAL claims, the Court holds that neither statute represents a policy requiring the disclosure of labor abuses in a supply chain on product labels.

Turning to the South Bay balancing test, the distinction between the underlying labor practices and the failure to disclose [36] once again undermines Dana's claim. The slave labor and child labor alleged in the Complaint would certainly qualify as "immoral, unethical, oppressive, [and] unscrupulous." See S. Bay, 72 Cal. App. 4th at 887. But can the same be said about the failure to disclose Hershey's suppliers' labor abuses on Hershey's product packaging? Considering this issue in Hodsdon, Judge Seeborg held as follows:

> The harm at issue here is that Hodsdon may not have purchased Mars's chocolate products at all, or would have paid less for them, had he been aware of the prospect for child labor in Mars's supply chain. Such information is, in fact, readily available to consumers on Mars's website. Given that Hodsdon, like any other consumer, has access to information about the source of Mars's cocoa beans, the absence of such information on the packaging is not "substantially injurious to consumers" or necessarily immoral. Granting that the labor practices at issue are immoral, there remains an important distinction between them and the actual harm for which Hodsdon seeks to recover, namely his purchase of Mars's chocolate products absent any disclosure. Mars's failure to disclose information it had no duty to disclose in the first place [37] is not substantially injurious, immoral, or unethical, and Hodsdon's UCL claim may therefore not advance.

Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at *7. This Court agrees. Because Dana has not adequately alleged a violation of either test for the "unfair" [*668] prong, or a violation of the "unlawful" or "fraudulent" prongs, her UCL claim is DISMISSED.

E. FAL Claim

HN16[] The FAL makes it unlawful for any person "to make or disseminate or cause to be made or disseminated before the public . . . any statement . . . which is untrue or misleading, and which is known, or which by the exercise of reasonable care should be known, to be untrue or misleading." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17500. The plain language of the statute—which prohibits making, disseminating, or causing the dissemination of false or misleading statements—does not encompass omissions. Several cases have therefore held that "[t]here can be no FAL claim where there is no 'statement' at all"—or in other words that an omission, even of material facts, does not violate the FAL. Norcia v. Samsung Telecomms. Am., LLC, No. 14-CV-00582-JD, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110454, 2015 WL 4967247, at *8 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 20, 2015); see also Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at *4; Stanwood, 941 F. Supp. 2d at 1222.

Dana cites four federal district court cases and two California appellate cases that purportedly held to the contrary, allowing FAL claims to proceed based on omissions. Opp'n at [38] 17 nn.89 & 91. One of those cases actually dismissed the plaintiff's FAL claim to the extent that it was based on affirmative misrepresentations, and did not address the FAL claim at all in its discussion of the plaintiff's fraudulent omission theory. Elias v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 950 F. Supp. 2d 1123, 1135-36, 1140 (N.D. Cal. 2013) (discussing only the CLRA, UCL, and common law in the context of fraudulent omissions, and granting leave to amend only as to those claims). Both of the California cases were based on claims that print, television, and/or telephone advertising campaigns—which inherently consist of affirmative statements—were misleading for failure to disclose fees associated with financial products or limitations on the use of coupons. People v. JTH Tax, Inc., 212 Cal. App. 4th 1219, 1224, 151 Cal. Rptr. 3d 728 (2013) ("The lawsuit claimed there were misleading or deceptive statements in print and television advertising . . . ."); People v. Toomey, 157 Cal. App. 3d 1, 17, 203 Cal. Rptr. 642 (1984) ("We encounter little difficulty concluding that Holiday's telephone solicitations and newspaper advertisements were likely to deceive consumers."). Two of the other cases, which Judge Seeborg considered in Hodsdon, both also involved some degree of affirmative misrepresentation. See Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at *4. In one, the defendant allegedly "misrepresented that it would take 'reasonable steps' to secure Plaintiffs' Personal Information [39] [stored on or transmitted via the defendant's network], and that [it] use[d] industry-standard encryption to prevent unauthorized access to sensitive financial information," but failed to disclose that its safeguards were inadequate and network intrusions occurred. In re Sony Gaming Networks & Customer Data Sec. Breach Litig., 996 F. Supp. 2d 942, 990-91 (S.D. Cal. 2014) (quoting the plaintiffs' complaint; final alteration in original). In the other case, the defendants advertised their washing machines as "Xxtra Sanitary" and "high efficiency," but allegedly concealed that the machines developed mold and were not efficient. Tait v. BSH Home Appliances Corp., No. SACV 10-00711 DOC (ANx), 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103584, 2011 WL 3941387, at *1-3 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2011). That leaves only a decision by the Southern District of California, which held without analysis that the FAL's prohibition of untrue or misleading statements also "requires a duty to disclose" in at least certain circumstances. Cortina v. [*669] Goya Foods, Inc., 94 F. Supp. 3d 1174, 1192 (S.D. Cal. 2015) (holding that the plaintiffs plausibly stated a claim under the FAL where the defendant failed to disclose a "potentially dangerous substance" in the beverages it sold).

Although neither Sony nor Tait cited the alleged misrepresentations as the reason for allowing the plaintiffs' omissions claims to proceed, the Court agrees with Judge Seeborg's conclusion that the outcome in both cases is consistent [40] with a requirement that HN17[] there be at least some affirmative misrepresentation to support a claim under the FAL. See Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at *4. As for Cortina, and also to the extent that any of the other cases discussed above are not consistent with that rule, the Court respectfully disagrees with their interpretation of the FAL's statutory language. Because Dana bases her claims on pure omissions, Opp'n at 13 n.58, she fails to allege that Hershey "ma[d]e or disseminate[d] or cause[d] to be made or disseminated" any false or misleading statement, and thus fails to state a claim under the FAL.[13]

F. Additional Defenses

In light of the holdings above that each of Dana's claims must be dismissed, the Court need not reach the parties' arguments regarding Hershey's two additional defenses: that the California legislature has created a "safe harbor" against Dana's claims by enacting the Supply Chains Act, see Mot. at 6-9; and that the relief Dana seeks would compel Hershey's speech in violation of the First Amendment, id. at 23-25. Although this Order need not and does not resolve either of [41] those issues, the Court briefly addresses the safe harbor argument.

"[T]he reach of the UCL is broad, but it is not without limit and may not be used to invade 'safe harbors' provided by other statutes." Loeffler v. Target Corp., 58 Cal. 4th 1081, 1125, 171 Cal. Rptr. 3d 189, 324 P.3d 50 (2014) (citing Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 182). "If the Legislature has permitted certain conduct or considered a situation and concluded no action should lie, courts may not override that determination." Id. The California Supreme Court has described the scope of the doctrine as follows:

> A plaintiff may thus not "plead around" an "absolute bar to relief" simply "by recasting the cause of action as one for unfair competition." (Manufacturers Life Ins. Co. v. Superior Court (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 257, 283, 41 Cal. Rptr. 2d 220, 895 P.2d 56.) The rule does not, however, prohibit an action under the unfair competition law merely because some other statute on the subject does not, itself, provide for the action or prohibit the challenged conduct. To forestall an action under the unfair competition law, another provision must actually "bar" the action or clearly permit the conduct.

Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 182-83; see also Loeffler, 58 Cal. 4th at 1125 (emphasizing the requirement that another statute "clearly permit" the challenged conduct).

The Supply Chains Act requires certain large corporations to disclose on their websites their "efforts to eradicate slavery and human trafficking from [their] [42] direct supply chain[s] for tangible goods offered for [*670] sale." Cal. Civ. Code § 1714.43(a)(1). The statute does not "actually 'bar'" any action. See Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 183. Nor does it "clearly permit" any conduct except disclosure of efforts to eradicate slavery and human trafficking. See id.; Loeffler, 58 Cal. 4th at 1125. There are also discrepancies between the subject matter of the Supply Chains Act and the disclosure Dana seeks in this case. As Judge Seeborg noted in Hodsdon, the statute "concerns slavery and human trafficking, not [other forms of abusive] child labor," and "the legislative history is silent about whether the legislature contemplated disclosure on labels." Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at *9. Moreover, there is a difference between, on one hand, advertising the steps a company has taken to reduce slavery in its supply chain (as the statute requires), and on the other, disclosing that such slavery persists (as Dana seeks here). That the legislature mandated the former in certain instances does not necessarily indicate a conclusion that the latter could never be required under existing consumer protection laws.

[13] Moreover, even if the FAL allowed claims based on omissions, Dana has not established any duty to disclose the information at issue, as discussed above in the context of her CLRA claim.

The Ninth Circuit very recently addressed the safe harbor doctrine in Ebner v. Fresh, Inc., a case alleging deception where a cosmetic product label disclosed the net weight of [43] the product contained in a tube but failed to disclose that "only 75% of that product is reasonably accessible." *Ebner, 818 F.3d at 804, 2016 WL 1056088, at 3 (9th Cir. 2016). The panel held that the disclosure of the actual net weight fell within the safe harbor because "[b]oth federal and California law affirmatively require cosmetic manufacturers to include an accurate statement of the net weight of included cosmetic product." Id. The plaintiff also brought an omission claim, however, arguing that failure to explain how much of the product was accessible rendered the accurate weight disclosure "deceptive and misleading." Id. The panel held that "[u]nlike a claim seeking to alter the net weight declaration itself, this [omission] claim does not fall within the safe harbor because there is no law expressly permitting the omission of supplemental statements." Id. Similarly, here, Hershey has not identified any law "expressly permitting the omission of" disclosures on product labels regarding slave labor and the worst forms of child labor in a product's supply chain. See id.

The Court recognizes that recent district court decisions have held that the Supply Chains Act creates a safe harbor against claims based on non-disclosure [44] of labor abuses in a supply chain. *Wirth, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14552, 2016 WL 471234 at 6-9; *Barber, 154 F. Supp. 3d 954, 2015 WL 9309553, at 2-5; De Rosa, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5497, 2016 WL 524059 (summarily dismissing for the reasons stated in Barber); Hughes, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5508, 2016 WL 524057 (same).[14] Because this Court holds for the reasons stated above that California's consumer protection laws do not create any obligation to make the disclosures Dana seeks, the question of whether the Supply Chains Act would shield against such a duty is ultimately moot, and the Court need not and does not resolve whether Wirth and Barber are correct or applicable to the case at hand. The Court nevertheless echoes Judge Seeborg's skepticism that the safe harbor doctrine is as broad as Hershey contends.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, Dana's claims under the CLRA, the UCL, and the FAL fail to state a claim on which relief may be granted, and are therefore DISMISSED. Dana has made clear that she [*671] does not intend to pursue a claim based on affirmative misrepresentations. See Opp'n at 13 n.58. The Court therefore finds that leave to amend would be futile, and dismisses this action with prejudice.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A complaint may be dismissed for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). The purpose of a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) is to test the legal sufficiency of the complaint. Generally, a plaintiff's burden at the pleading stage is relatively light. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) states that a pleading which sets forth a claim for relief shall contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a).

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In ruling on a motion to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), the court analyzes the complaint and takes all allegations of material fact as true and construes them in the light most favorable to the non-moving party.

Dismissal may be based on a lack of a cognizable legal theory or on the absence of facts that would support a valid theory. A complaint must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory. A pleading that offers labels and conclusions or a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Nor does a complaint suffice if it tenders naked assertions devoid of further factual enhancement. Rather, the claim must be plausible on its face, meaning that the plaintiff must plead sufficient factual allegations to allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Heightened Pleading Requirements > Fraud Claims

HN3[] Heightened Pleading Requirements, Fraud Claims

Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) sets a heightened pleading standard for claims based on fraud. In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). In order to meet this standard, a complaint must specify such facts as the times, dates, places, benefits received, and other details of the alleged fraudulent activity. The heightened standard does not apply to malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind. Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b).

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

Civil Procedure > Preliminary Considerations > Jurisdiction > Subject Matter Jurisdiction

HN4[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

Where a jurisdictional challenge is based on the allegations of a plaintiff's complaint rather than on extrinsic evidence, courts assume the plaintiff's allegations to be true and draw all reasonable inferences in his favor. The inquiry is therefore much like a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) analysis.

The Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200-17210 and the False Advertising Law (FAL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500-17509, require that private plaintiffs have suffered injury in fact and have lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition or false advertising. A consumer who relies on a product label and challenges a misrepresentation contained therein can satisfy the standing requirement of the UCL and the FAL by alleging that he or she would not have bought the product but for the misrepresentation, and that such allegations are sufficient to establish economic injury within the meaning of those statutes.

Constitutional Law > ... > Case or Controversy > Standing > Elements

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > Injury in Fact

HN7[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

The Consumers Legal Remedies Act (CLRA), Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1750-1784, allows a consumer who has suffered "any damage" to sue, and any plaintiff who has standing under the Unfair Competition Law's, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200-17210, and the False Advertising Law's, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500-17509, lost money or property requirement will, a fortiori, have suffered any damage for purposes of establishing CLRA standing.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN8[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

The Consumers Legal Remedies Act, Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1750-1784, prohibits certain enumerated unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices undertaken by any person in a transaction intended to result or which results in the sale or lease of goods or services to any consumer. Cal. Civ. Code § 1770(a).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN9[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Although a claim may be stated under the Consumers Legal Remedies Act, Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1750-1784, in terms constituting fraudulent omissions, to be actionable the omission must be contrary to a representation actually made by the defendant, or an omission of a fact the defendant was obliged to disclose. California courts have generally rejected a broad obligation to disclose. Absent affirmative misrepresentations, an obligation to disclose under California law extends only to matters of product safety.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN10[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

The weight of authority limits a duty to disclose under the Consumers Legal Remedies Act, Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1750-1784, to issues of product safety, unless disclosure is necessary to counter an affirmative misrepresentation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN11[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

A duty to disclose under California law does not extend to all information that may persuade a consumer to make different purchasing decisions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN12[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

While the Consumers Legal Remedies Act, Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1750-1784, provides that it shall be liberally construed and applied to promote its underlying purposes of consumer protection, Cal. Civ. Code § 1760, it does not explicitly discuss representations regarding labor practices, Cal. Civ. Code § 1770(a).

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN13[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

California's Unfair Competition Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200-17210, prohibits unfair competition, defined as any unlawful, unfair, or fraudulent business act or practice. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN14[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Absent a duty to disclose, the failure to do so does not support a claim under the fraudulent prong of the Unfair Competition Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200-17210.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN15[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

When a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's "unfair" act or practice invokes Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200, the word "unfair" in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > State Regulation

HN16[] False Advertising, State Regulation

The False Advertising Law (FAL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500-17509, makes it unlawful for any person to make or disseminate or cause to be made or disseminated before the public any statement which is untrue or misleading, and which is known, or which by the exercise of reasonable care should be known, to be untrue or misleading. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17500. The plain language of the statute—which prohibits making, disseminating, or causing the dissemination of false or misleading statements—does not encompass omissions.

There can be no FAL claim where there is no statement at all—or in other words that an omission, even of material facts, does not violate the FAL.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > State Regulation

HN17[] False Advertising, State Regulation

There must be at least some affirmative misrepresentation to support a claim under the False Advertising Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500-17509.

[*956] ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO DISMISS

Re: Dkt. No. 16

I. INTRODUCTION

"The use of child slave labor in the Ivory Coast is a humanitarian tragedy." Doe I v. Nestle USA, Inc., 766 F.3d 1013, 1016 (9th Cir. 2014). The fact that major international corporations source ingredients for their products from supply chains involving slavery and the worst forms of child labor raises significant ethical questions. The issue before this Court, however, is whether California law requires corporations to inform customers of that fact on their product packaging and point of sale advertising. Every court to consider the issue has held that it does not. This Court agrees.

This is a putative [2] class action in which Plaintiff Elaine McCoy claims that Defendant Nestlé USA, Inc. ("Nestlé") violated California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL," Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200-17210), Consumers Legal Remedies Act ("CLRA," Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1750-1784), and False Advertising Law ("FAL," Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17500-17509) by failing to disclose on the packaging of Nestlé's chocolate products that some of the cocoa used therein originated at farms in Côte d'Ivoire (also known as the Ivory Coast) that use slave labor and the worst forms of child labor. Nestlé moves to dismiss all claims. The Court held a hearing on March 18, 2016.[1] For the reasons stated below, Nestlé's Motion is GRANTED, and this action is dismissed with prejudice.[2]

[1] The Court also heard argument in Dana v. The Hershey Company, No. 15-cv-4453, which involves different parties but substantially similar claims and arguments. A separate order has been published concurrently in that case.

II. BACKGROUND

A. Allegations of the Complaint[3]

Côte d'Ivoire is the world's largest producer of cocoa beans, the raw ingredient for [3] chocolate, and supplies 40% of global cocoa production and 47% of total imports to the United States. Compl. (dkt. 1) ¶¶ 20, 51. Slave labor and the worst forms of child labor are common in Ivorian cocoa production, as is well documented by United States government agencies, academic studies, nonprofit organizations, investigative journalists, and former laborers. Id. ¶¶ 5-9, 24-26, 33-47. Children are frequently injured in the course of dangerous work involving machetes, chemicals, and heavy loads, and workers (both children and adults) may be beaten, whipped, and locked in to prevent escape. Id. ¶¶ 24-26. The Ninth Circuit has also acknowledged the existence of such conditions. Id. ¶ 27; Doe I, 766 F.3d at 1016.

Nestlé is one of the largest food companies in the United States and sells a number of popular chocolate products. Id. ¶ 3. In 2001, members if the United States chocolate industry including Nestlé signed a voluntary protocol, negotiated by Representative Eliot Engel and Senator Tom Harkin, to develop standards for certifying chocolate produced without labor abuses. Id. ¶ 28. After failing to meet the initial 2005 deadline, the industry extended the self-imposed deadline to 2008, then to 2010, and [4] then to 2020. Id. ¶¶ 30-32.

Despite adopting "Corporate Business Principles" that require ethical business [*957] practices in its supply chain and a "Supplier Code" that "strictly prohibit[s]" child labor and forced labor, Nestlé sources much of its chocolate from Côte d'Ivoire through a multi-level supply chain of independent growers, cooperatives, distributors, and other intermediaries. Id. ¶¶ 4, 11, 21, 50, 52, 60-66, 52. Nestlé acknowledges child and slave labor in its Ivorian supply chain, including children engaged in unsafe work, but does not disclose the existence of those labor abuses on its product labels. Id. ¶¶ 21, 53. Certain Nestlé products also advertise that Nestlé "works with [a certification program that does not permit child labor] to help improve the lives of cocoa farmers." Id. ¶¶ 54-55. Although McCoy disputes the accuracy of that certification, her claims here are based only on Nestlé's omissions, not on any affirmative misrepresentations. Id. ¶ 57; Opp'n (dkt. 18) at 12 n.64.

McCoy "has purchased Nestlé Chocolate Products at various retail stores including Sam's Club and Safeway in and around Vacaville, and Fairfield, California from 2011 through present." Id. ¶ 14. Citing studies [5] showing that consumers will pay a premium for ethically produced coffee, clothing, and seafood, id. ¶¶ 67-71, McCoy alleges that she and other customers "would not have purchased Nestlé's Chocolate Products or paid as much for them" if Nestlé had disclosed labor violations on the product labels. Id. ¶ 11, see also id. ¶¶ 14, 49, 78, 93, 107, 118.

The Complaint includes three claims, under the UCL, the CLRA, and the FAL, respectively. The UCL claim is based on three separate theories arising from Nestlé's failure to disclose labor abuses in its supply chain on the packaging of its chocolate products: (1) the omission is "unlawful," because it violates the CLRA, id. ¶ 86; (2) the omission is "unfair," because the abusive labor practices themselves are immoral and the failure to disclose them impairs competition and prevents consumers from making informed decisions, id. ¶ 87; and (3) the omission is "fraudulent" because it is likely to deceive a reasonable consumer and the true facts would be material to reasonable consumer, id. ¶ 88. The CLRA claim asserts that Nestlé's failure to disclose labor abuses in its supply chain constitutes a misrepresentation of the "source, characteristics, [6] and standard" of the products. Id. ¶ 103, see also id. ¶¶ 100-02 (citing Cal. Civ. Code § 1770(a)(2), (5), (7)). The FAL claim asserts that Nestlé had a duty to disclose the labor abuses in its supply chain because it had superior knowledge as compared to customers, and because it made "partial representations and/or misrepresentations to the contrary." Id. ¶ 114. In her Opposition, McCoy disclaims any theory of an obligation to disclose arising from partial misrepresentations. Opp'n at 12 n.64.

B. Procedural History

McCoy filed this action on September 28, 2015, seeking to represent herself and other similarly situated consumers who purchased Nestlé chocolate products in the last four years. See generally Compl. McCoy's counsel also represents plaintiffs who filed similar actions against two other large chocolate manufacturers, Mars and Hershey. See Hodsdon v. Mars, Inc., No. 3:15-cv-04450-RS (N.D. Cal.); Dana v. The Hershey Company, No. 3:15-cv-04453 (N.D. Cal.). Defendants moved to dismiss in all three cases. Judge Seeborg granted the motion to dismiss in Hodsdon, as discussed in detail below. The undersigned heard argument on Hershey's motion in Dana concurrently with Nestlé's motion in the present case.[4]

[*958] C. Parties' Arguments

Nestlé argues that the case must be dismissed for several reasons, starting with the safe harbor doctrine, which provides that plaintiffs cannot use California's consumer protection laws to pursue relief that is foreclosed by other, more specific statutes. Mot. (dkt. 16) at 8-11. According to Nestlé, the California Transparency in Supply Chains Act of 2010 (the "Supply Chains Act") bars McCoy's claims [8] because it regulates disclosures related to labor abuses in supply chains and does not require the disclosures McCoy seeks. Id. McCoy responds that the Supply Chains Act does not specifically permit Nestlé's omissions or bar McCoy's claims, and that the labor violations addressed by that statute (slavery and human trafficking) do not encompass all of the violations at issue here (which also include dangerous but non-slave child labor). Opp'n at 3-8.

Nestlé also argues that the Court should dismiss the case based on the doctrine of equitable abstention, because: (1) the economic policies at issue are better suited for resolution by legislative bodies or administrative agencies; (2) enforcement of injunctive relief would be unduly burdensome for the Court due to the need to monitor foreign labor conditions; and (3) the foreign relations issues implicated by McCoy's claims require a uniform federal policy and should be entrusted to the legislative or executive branch. Mot. at 11-13. McCoy argues that the subject matter of the case falls within the experience and competence of the Court, and that overseeing an injunction requiring Nestlé to change its labeling would not be unduly burdensome. [9] Opp'n at 8-10.

Next, Nestlé argues that it has no duty to disclose labor conditions in its supply chain because the information at issue does not relate to product safety, and because Nestlé did not have exclusive knowledge, actively conceal the information, make misleading partial representations, or have a fiduciary relationship with McCoy. Mot. at 14-18. Nestlé contends that all of McCoy's claims fail because, as a matter of law, reasonable consumers are not likely to be deceived by the omission of something that Nestlé had no duty to disclose—and even if it were legally possible, McCoy has not adequately alleged that consumers expect supply chains to be entirely free of labor abuses. Id. at 18-19. McCoy responds that the limitation of the duty to disclose to safety issues only applies in post-warranty product defect cases, which this is not, and that a duty arises from Nestlé's superior (albeit not actually exclusive) knowledge of labor abuses in its supply chain. Opp'n at 10-14. She "does not here contend that Nestlé's partial disclosures give rise to its duty to disclose." Id. at 12 n.64. McCoy also argues that she has adequately pled that, absent disclosure to the contrary, consumers would expect that [10] chocolate is not produced using slave labor or the worst forms of child labor, and that reliance is at least a question of fact. Id. at 14-16.

[4] Four other [7] cases based on nondisclosure of supply chain labor violations, brought by plaintiffs who also share counsel with McCoy, have been dismissed for failure to state a claim in the Central District of California. Wirth v. Mars Inc., No. SA CV 15-1470-DOC (KESx), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14552, 2016 WL 471234 (C.D. Cal. Feb. 5, 2016); Barber v. Nestle USA, Inc., 154 F. Supp. 3d 954, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170608, 2015 WL 9309553 (C.D. Cal. 2015); De Rosa v. Tri-Union Seafoods, LLC, No. CV 15-7540-CJC (AGRx), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5497, 2016 WL 524059 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 15, 2016) (summarily dismissing for the reasons stated in Barber); Hughes v. Big Heart Pet Brands, No. CV 15-8007-CJC (AGRx), 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5508, 2016 WL 524057 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 15, 2016) (same). Those cases, all of which concern seafood (or pet food that includes seafood products) rather than chocolate, were decided at least in part based on the safe harbor doctrine, which Hodsdon, Dana, and this Order decline to reach. The four Central District cases are presently pending on appeal before the Ninth Circuit.

[*959] Turning to McCoy's specific claims, Nestlé contends that the FAL only governs affirmative misrepresentations, not omissions. Mot. at 19. McCoy disputes that proposition and argues that some cases have allowed FAL claims to proceed based on omissions. Opp'n at 16.

Nestlé argues that McCoy's CLRA claim fails because omissions regarding labor abuses do not fall within the statutory provisions she invokes—which govern representations regarding the "source, characteristics, and standard" of the chocolate, see Compl. ¶ 103—and that she therefore also cannot proceed on a UCL claim for "unlawful" conduct based on her CLRA claim. Mot. at 17-18. McCoy contends that "Nestlé's failure to disclose that its supply chain is not child and slave free is likely to deceive a reasonable consumer regarding the chocolate's source (from plantations using child and slave labor) and characteristics/standard (produced by child and slave labor)." Opp'n at 17.

As for "unfair" conduct under the UCL, Nestlé contends that McCoy cannot succeed under any of the tests that courts have used, [11] because she has not identified a legislative policy against Nestlé's non-disclosure, nor has she plausibly alleged that the harm caused was "substantial" or that it outweighed the utility of Nestlé's conduct. Mot. at 19-21. McCoy argues that the labor abuses in Nestlé's supply chain contravene legislatively declared policies in the form of United Nations prohibitions of forced labor and the worst forms of child labor that the United States has ratified, and that those abuses are immoral and unethical. Opp'n at 18-19. She also contends that the harm of deceiving consumers outweighs the cost to Nestlé of changings its product labeling. Id. at 19. Nestlé notes in reply that the United Nations sources that McCoy cites relate only to labor practices, not product labeling. Reply (dkt. 27) at 12.

According to Nestlé, McCoy lacks both Article III and statutory standing to bring any of her claims because she cannot trace the cocoa used in the specific chocolate products she bought back to a specific plantation, and thus cannot know whether the products she bought were produced with slave or child labor. Mot. at 21-22. Nestlé contends that without that knowledge, whether the products McCoy bought were [12] misrepresented (even under McCoy's theory of misrepresentation by omission) is uncertain, and if they were not, McCoy has not suffered any cognizable injury. Id. McCoy responds that her injury and standing arise from misrepresentation of the supply chain for the chocolate, and if Nestlé had better disclosed the labor abuses in the supply chain, she would not have bought the products regardless of whether she knew the origin of the cocoa in a specific item. Opp'n at 19-21. McCoy relies on case law holding that a consumer who purchased or paid more for a product based on misrepresentations has both constitutional and statutory standing to bring claims under California's consumer protection laws. Id. at 20-21. (citing Hinojos v. Kohl's Corp., 718 F.3d 1098 (9th Cir. 2013); Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 330, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (2011)).

Nestlé also argues that McCoy lacks standing because she has not adequately alleged reliance on any misrepresentation. Mot. at 22. According to Nestlé, McCoy has not alleged that she saw or relied on any misleading affirmative representations, nor that she would have read the disclosure she seeks on Nestlé's product packaging. Id. McCoy contends that her claim is based only on omission of material facts and that her Complaint adequately alleges that she would not have bought Nestlé [13] products if the packaging had disclosed severe labor abuses in Nestlé's supply chain. Opp'n at 20-21.

[*960] Next, Nestlé argues that McCoy's Complaint does not satisfy the heightened pleading standard of Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure because it does not identify the specific products McCoy purchased, provide a complete list of the products she is suing over, include copies of packaging for all of the products at issue. Mot. at 23. McCoy argues that her Complaint meets the pleading standard that courts have applied in fraudulent omission cases, and that she need not list the specific products she purchased because "the omission is identical" across Nestlé's product line. Opp'n at 21-23.

Finally, Nestlé argues that requiring the labeling McCoy seeks would compel speech in violation of the First Amendment. Mot. at 23-25. McCoy contends that laws against misleading advertising are constitutional, and that a mere rational basis is required to support laws compelling affirmative factual product labeling to avoid misleading consumers. Opp'n at 23-25 (citing, e.g., Zauderer v. Office of Disciplinary Counsel, 471 U.S. 626, 105 S. Ct. 2265, 85 L. Ed. 2d 652, 17 Ohio B. 315 (1985)). Nestlé responds that McCoy has not alleged any misleading affirmative representations that require labeling to redress consumer confusion, and that the disclosure McCoy seeks is [14] not "'purely factual and uncontroversial.'" Reply at 13-15 (quoting Zauderer, 471 U.S. at 651).

D. Hodsdon v. Mars, Inc.

In Hodsdon, Judge Seeborg granted a motion by chocolate manufacturer Mars, Inc. to dismiss claims very similar those in the case at hand. Hodsdon v. Mars, Inc., 162 F. Supp. 3d 1016, No. 15-CV-04450-RS, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 17, 2016). As a preliminary matter, the court held that the plaintiff had standing because: (1) "California law permits litigants to pursue claims under the UCL, CLRA, and FAL if they show . . . that 'the consumer paid more than he or she actually valued the product'"; (2) the plaintiff adequately alleged that the use of forced labor in the supply chain caused him to devalue the product even if he could not prove that forced labor was used to produce the specific chocolate products that he purchased; and (3) the plaintiff adequately alleged that he saw the product labels before he purchased the products. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 3 (quoting Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1104). Turning to the merits, however, the court held that the plaintiff failed to state a claim under California law.

With respect to the FAL claim, the court reconciled cases holding that omissions were not actionable with others that allowed FAL claims based on omissions to proceed, ultimately determining that omissions accompanying misleading incomplete [15] statements are actionable, but omissions with no corresponding statements are not. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 4. *Compare Norcia v. Samsung Telecomms. Am., LLC, No. 14-CV-00582-JD, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110454, 2015 WL 4967247, at 8 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 20, 2015) ("There can be no FAL claim where there is no 'statement' at all."), and Stanwood v. Mary Kay, Inc., 941 F. Supp. 2d 1212, 1222 (C.D. Cal. 2012) (same), with In re Sony Gaming Networks & Customer Data Sec. Breach Litig., 996 F. Supp. 2d 942, 991 (S.D. Cal. 2014) (denying motion to dismiss where defendant claimed to have taken steps to secure information but failed to disclose security deficiencies), *and Tait v. BSH Home Appliances Corp., No. SACV 10-00711 DOC (ANx), 2011 WL 3941387, at 2 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2011) (denying a motion to dismiss where the defendant marketed a washing machine as "sanitary" but failed to disclose its tendency to accumulate mold). Because the plaintiff in Hodsdon "asserted the former type of claim, i.e., that Mars violated the FAL by failing to issue any statement at all," the court dismissed the claim. Hodsdon, [*961] *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 4.

Next, the court turned to the plaintiff's CLRA claim and his claim under the "unlawful" prong of the UCL, which was based on the purported CLRA violation. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 5-6. Noting the Ninth Circuit's holding that "California courts have generally rejected a broad obligation to disclose," the court looked to whether Mars had any such obligation. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 5. The court held that despite one case to the contrary, "the overwhelming majority of courts to consider the issue" [16] have held that omissions are only actionable under the CLRA if they relate to product safety or defects. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 5-6. Because the omissions at issue related instead to "admittedly horrific labor practices" in the supply chain, the court dismissed the plaintiff's CLRA claim and the "unlawful conduct" aspect of the UCL claim that derived from it. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 6.

The plaintiff also brought UCL claims based on the "fraudulent" and "unfair" prongs of the statute. The court followed two California appellate decisions holding that omissions cannot satisfy the "fraudulent" prong unless there was a duty to disclose, and therefore dismissed that claim. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 6 (citing Berryman v. Merit Prop. Mgmt., Inc., 152 Cal. App. 4th 1544, 1557, 62 Cal. Rptr. 3d 177 (2007); Daugherty v. Am. Honda Co., 144 Cal. App. 4th 824, 838, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 118 (2006)). As for the "unfair" prong, the court held that the plaintiff's complaint did not satisfy any of the tests used by California courts to assess such claims: (1) unlike the underlying labor conditions themselves, the lack of disclosure could not be said to be "'immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers,'" because the harm was merely the purchase of a chocolate bar and the information that was absent from the packaging was readily available elsewhere; and (2) again unlike the underlying labor conditions, the harm from [17] lack of disclosure was not tied to any established public policy expressed in "'specific constitutional, statutory, or regulatory provisions.'" *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 7 (quoting S. Bay Chevrolet v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp., 72 Cal. App. 4th 861, 887, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 (1999); McVicar v. Goodman Glob., Inc., 1 F. Supp. 3d 1044, 1054 (C.D. Cal. 2014)). The court therefore dismissed the UCL claim in its entirety.

Because the plaintiff failed to state a claim for the reasons summarized above, the court did not reach Mars's argument that the Supply Chains Act creates a safe harbor, but expressed doubt that any such harbor is as broad as Mars contended. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 8-9. The court found that amendment would be futile and denied leave to amend. *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, [WL] at 9. Hodsdon's appeal of Judge Seeborg's decision is currently pending before the Ninth Circuit.

III. ANALYSIS

A. Legal Standard

HN1[] A complaint may be dismissed for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. "The purpose of a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) is to test the legal sufficiency of the complaint." N. Star Int'l v. Ariz. Corp. Comm'n, 720 F.2d 578, 581 (9th Cir. 1983). Generally, a plaintiff's burden at the pleading stage is relatively light. Rule 8(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure states that "[a] pleading which sets forth a claim for relief . . . shall contain . . . a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a).

HN2[] In ruling on a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), the court analyzes the complaint and takes "all allegations [18] of material [*962] fact as true and construe[s] them in the light most favorable to the non-moving party." Parks Sch. of Bus. v. Symington, 51 F.3d 1480, 1484 (9th Cir. 1995). Dismissal may be based on a lack of a cognizable legal theory or on the absence of facts that would support a valid theory. Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). A complaint must "contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 562, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (citing Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1106 (7th Cir. 1984)). "A pleading that offers 'labels and conclusions' or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). "Nor does a complaint suffice if it tenders 'naked assertion[s]' devoid of 'further factual enhancement.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557). Rather, the claim must be "'plausible on its face,'" meaning that the plaintiff must plead sufficient factual allegations to "allow[] the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570).

HN3[] Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure sets a heightened pleading standard for claims based on fraud. "In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). The Ninth Circuit has held that in order to meet this standard, a "complaint must specify such facts as the times, dates, [19] places, benefits received, and other details of the alleged fraudulent activity." Neubronner v. Milken, 6 F.3d 666, 672 (9th Cir. 1993); see also McMaster v. United States, 731 F.3d 881, 897 (9th Cir. 2013). The heightened standard does not apply to "[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b).

Nestlé also moves to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(1) on the basis that the Court lacks jurisdiction because McCoy lacks Article III standing. See Mot. at 8. HN4[] Where, as here, a jurisdictional challenge is based on the allegations of a plaintiff's complaint rather than on extrinsic evidence, courts "assume [the plaintiff's] allegations to be true and draw all reasonable inferences in his favor." Wolfe v. Strankman, 392 F.3d 358, 362 (9th Cir. 2004).

"[T]he inquiry is therefore much like a Rule 12(b)(6) analysis." Animal Legal Def. Fund v. HVFG LLC, 939 F. Supp. 2d 992, 997 (N.D. Cal. 2013).

B. Standing

Nestlé argues that McCoy lacks Article III and statutory standing to pursue these claims because she does not and cannot allege that the specific products she purchased were made from cocoa produced with the labor abuses at issue in this case—slave labor or the worst forms of child labor—and therefore fails to allege an actual, particularized injury. Mot. at 21-22. The parties agree that Nestlé currently cannot trace the cocoa used in a particular Nestlé chocolate product to a specific plantation, and there is thus no way to know what labor practices were [20] used in its production. See Compl. ¶ 11; Mot. at 22. McCoy argues that she has standing because she would have either not purchased or paid less for Nestlé's products if she had known that the supply chain involved the labor abuses at issue, regardless of where the cocoa in a particular chocolate bar originated. Opp'n at 20-21. Judge Seeborg held that the plaintiff in Hodsdon had standing under similar circumstances, and the Court agrees that McCoy has standing here. See Hodsdon, [*963] *2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 3.

The issue of Article III standing is straightforward. "HN5[] [W]hen, as here, 'Plaintiffs contend that class members paid more for [a product] than they otherwise would have paid, or bought it when they otherwise would not have done so' they have suffered an Article III injury in fact." Hinojos v. Kohl's Corp., 718 F.3d 1098, 1104 (9th Cir. 2013) (quoting Mazza v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 666 F.3d 581, 595 (9th Cir. 2012)) (second alteration in original).

McCoy also has standing under the California statutes at issue. HN6[] The UCL and FAL require that private plaintiffs "ha[ve] suffered injury in fact and ha[ve] lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition" or false advertising. Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1103 (quoting Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204 (UCL); citing id. § 17535 (FAL)) (alterations in original).[5] In Hinojos, the Ninth Circuit examined the California Supreme Court's decision in Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, which held [21] that a "'consumer who relies on a product label and challenges a misrepresentation contained therein can satisfy the standing requirement of [the UCL and the FAL] by alleging . . . that he or she would not have bought the product but for the misrepresentation,'" and that "such allegations are sufficient to establish economic injury within the meaning of [those statutes]." Id. at 1105 (quoting Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 330, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (2011)) (ellipsis in original).

In both Kwikset, where the defendant marketed locks as "Made in U.S.A." despite some foreign components and assembly work, and Hinojos, where the defendant allegedly advertised its normal prices as "reduced," plaintiffs who relied on those representation had standing to sue under the UCL and FAL. Id. at 1107; Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th at 330. Those courts also listed a number of other scenarios where a plaintiff's reliance on false advertising could give rise to standing: "meat falsely labeled as kosher or halal, wine labeled with the wrong region or year, blood diamonds mislabeled [22] as conflict-free, and goods falsely suggesting they were produced by union labor." Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1105 (citing Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th at 328-29). McCoy's claim that she would have paid less for (or declined to purchase) Nestlé's products but for Nestlé's misrepresentations of the labor practices in its supply chain fits well within these examples.

The Ninth Circuit's decision in Birdsong v. Apple, Inc., 590 F.3d 955 (9th Cir. 2009)—which Nestlé does not discuss in its briefs but which Hershey relies on to make a similar argument in Dana—does not deprive McCoy of standing. In that case, the plaintiffs alleged that Apple violated the UCL by selling iPods that were capable of producing dangerous volume levels and thus causing hearing loss. Id. at 957. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's holding that the plaintiffs failed to show a particularized and actual injury sufficient for standing under the UCL—despite the plaintiffs' argument that the risk of hearing loss diminished the value of the iPods—in part because "the alleged loss in value . . . rests on a hypothetical risk of hearing loss to other consumers who may or may not choose to use their iPods in a risky manner," and the plaintiffs did "not claim that they, or anyone else, have suffered or [were] substantially certain to suffer hearing [23] loss from using an iPod." Id. at [*964] 959-62. Here, in contrast, McCoy alleges that the value of the chocolate products was diminished because consumers did not wish to support a supply chain that included severe labor abuses. The alleged damage was therefore done by the purchase itself, not by any contingency that might happen after the purchase.

[5] HN7[] The CLRA allows a consumer who has suffered "any damage" to sue, and "any plaintiff who has standing under the UCL's and FAL's 'lost money or property' requirement will, a fortiori, have suffered 'any damage' for purposes of establishing CLRA standing." Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1107-08.

Nestlé argues, essentially, that a UCL claim based on misrepresentation of labor practices can only succeed where a plaintiff is certain that the objectionable practice was used to produce the specific item that the plaintiff purchased. See Mot. at 21-22. Stepping back from the fact pattern of this case, that argument would dictate that even if Nestlé had—hypothetically—concealed Ivorian labor conditions from its customers, falsely labeled all of its chocolate as certified to be free of child labor, and run a fraudulent national ad campaign touting its child-labor-free chocolate, a customer who relied on that false promotion would lack standing to sue for fraudulent business practices and false advertising so long as some fraction of Nestlé's cocoa met those descriptions and the customer was unable to tell what labor conditions produced the cocoa in the actual [24] product he or she purchased. Such a result would undermine the holding of Hinojos and Kwikset. The difference between that hypothetical scenario and McCoy's allegation of mere omission is critical to the outcome of the present motion, as discussed in the sections below, but it is a difference relevant to the merits of the claims, not to standing.

Similarly, to use some of the examples given in Hinojos and Kwikset, it would be a bizarre result if sellers advertising food as halal or kosher, diamonds as conflict-free, or products as union-made could knowingly mix compliant and non-compliant products with impunity so long as there was no way for a buyer to trace the specific item he or she purchased back to the source. The Eighth Circuit has nevertheless adopted that rule. See Wallace v. ConAgra Foods, Inc., 747 F.3d 1025, 1030-31 (8th Cir. 2014) (holding that customers lacked Article III standing to bring a claim based on allegedly false advertising of a product as using 100% kosher beef, where the plaintiffs could not show that the specific products they purchased contained non-kosher beef). This Court respectfully disagrees with that result. In this Court's view, if a customer has paid a premium for an assurance that a product meets certain standards, [25] and the assurance turns out to be meaningless, the premium that the customer has paid is an actual, personal, particularized injury that is cognizable under Article III. See Hinojos, 718 F.3d at 1104.

"'For a significant segment of the buying public, labor practices do matter in making consumer choices.'" Kwikset, 51 Cal. 4th at 329 (quoting Kasky v. Nike, Inc., 27 Cal. 4th 939, 969, 119 Cal. Rptr. 2d 296, 45 P.3d 243 (2002)). It is plausible that a consumer would place less value on a product produced from a supply chain involving severe labor abuses. McCoy alleges that she purchased products or paid a higher price for them because she was deceived regarding the labor practices in the supply chain. That actual, particularized injury is sufficient to establish standing.

Nestlé also argues that McCoy lacks standing because she has not sufficiently alleged reliance. Mot. at 22. The Court agrees with McCoy that, at least for the purpose of Article III standing, McCoy adequately pleads reliance by alleging that she saw the product labeling and would not have purchased the products if labor abuses in the supply chain had been disclosed. See Compl. ¶ 14. Whether Nestlé had a duty to disclose those conditions, see Mot. at 22, is relevant to whether the Complaint states a claim on which relief can be granted, but is not an issue [26] of standing.

[*965] C. CLRA Claim

HN8[] The CLRA prohibits certain enumerated "unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices undertaken by any person in a transaction intended to result or which results in the sale or lease of goods or services to any consumer." Cal. Civ. Code § 1770(a). McCoy argues that Nestlé's failure to disclose labor abuses on its packaging violates subsection (a)(2) by "[m]isrepresenting the source" of the chocolate, subsection (a)(5) by "[r]epresenting that goods . . . have . . . characteristics . . . which they do not have," and subsection (a)(7) by "[r]epresenting that goods . . . are of a particular standard." Id. § 1770(a)(2), (5), (7); see Compl. ¶¶ 100-03; Opp'n at 17. In her Opposition, McCoy makes clear that these theories are based on "Nestlé's omission of known child and slave labor in its supply chain," and that she "does not here contend that Nestlé's partial misrepresentations give rise to its duty to disclose." Opp'n at 12 n.64.

"HN9[] [A]lthough a claim may be stated under the CLRA in terms constituting fraudulent omissions, to be actionable the omission must be contrary to a representation actually made by the defendant, or an omission of a fact the defendant was obliged to disclose." Daugherty v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 144 Cal. App. 4th 824, 835, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 118 (2006). "California courts have generally rejected a broad obligation to disclose . . . ." Wilson v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 668 F.3d 1136, 1141 (9th Cir. 2012). In Wilson, the [27] Ninth Circuit held that, absent affirmative misrepresentations, an obligation to disclose under California law extends only to matters of product safety. Id. at 1141-43 (examining Daugherty, 144 Cal. App. 4th at 836, and subsequent decisions); see also Oestreicher v. Alienware Corp., 322 F. App'x 489, 493 (9th Cir. 2009) (unpublished and non-precedential) ("A manufacturer's duty [of disclosure] to consumers is limited to its warranty obligations absent either an affirmative misrepresentation or a safety issue.").

At least one district court decision has limited Wilson to cases where a product was covered by a warranty that expired before the defect became apparent. Stanwood v. Mary Kay, Inc., 941 F. Supp. 2d 1212, 1221 (C.D. Cal. 2012). Central to the Central District's holding was its determination that "[t]he Ninth Circuit acknowledged that its requirement of a safety issue does not necessarily apply outside the products defect context where warranty protections are not available," and that Wilson "list[ed] cases where a safety issue was not required to trigger a duty to disclose." Id. (citing Wilson, 668 F.3d at 1142). The Court respectfully disagrees with Stanwood's reading of Wilson. The cases listed at the page cited in Wilson by Stanwood do not support Stanwood's holding: four cases explicitly based the materiality of an omission at least in part on whether it related to safety,[6] and the Ninth Circuit [28] characterized the remaining two[7] as having "arguably concerned safety [*966] issues." Wilson, 668 F.3d at 1142 & n.2. Accordingly, the Court does not agree that Wilson is limited to cases where a warranty once existed but has since expired. There are cases holding that a manufacturer has a greater duty to disclose defects that arise during a product's express warranty period. E.g., Collins v. eMachines, Inc., 202 Cal. App. 4th 249, 257-58, 134 Cal. Rptr. 3d 588 (2011); see also Wilson, 668 F.3d at 1142 n.1 (discussing Tietsworth v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 720 F. Supp. 2d 1123 (N.D. Cal. 2010)). But there is no allegation that Nestlé made any warranty of its chocolate products that would be relevant in this case.[8]

The Court agrees with Judge Seeborg's conclusion that HN10[] the [29] weight of authority limits a duty to disclose under the CLRA to issues of product safety, unless disclosure is necessary to counter an affirmative misrepresentation. See *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 6 (declining to follow Stanwood in light of "overwhelming authority to the contrary," and collecting cases). The Court also concludes that a plain reading of Wilson governs this case, and this "Court is not free to deviate from the Ninth Circuit's construction of California law in Wilson absent a subsequent interpretation from California's courts that the Estate of Bishop, 229 F.3d 877, 884 n.7 (9th Cir. 2000))*. Further, the Court agrees with Judge Seeborg and Nestlé that some bright-line limitation on a manufacturer's duty to disclose is sound policy, given the difficulty of anticipating exactly what information some customers might find material to their purchasing decisions and wish to see on product labels. *See Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 6 ("[Stanwood's and McCoy's] definition of a material omission has stunning breadth, and could leave manufacturers (chocolate or otherwise) little guidance about what information, if any, it must disclose to avoid CLRA [30] or UCL liability."); Reply at 8. There are countless issues that may be legitimately important to many customers, and the courts are not suited to determine which should occupy the limited surface area of a chocolate wrapper.

HN11[] A duty to disclose under California law does not extend to all "information [that] may persuade a consumer to make different purchasing decisions." *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 6 (citing *Wirth, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14552, 2016 WL 471234, at 5-6). Because McCoy does not allege any omission of known dangers to the safety of customers, there is no duty to disclose applicable to this case, and McCoy's CLRA claim is therefore DISMISSED. A contrary result would create "a broad obligation to disclose," which "California courts have generally rejected." Wilson, 668 F.3d at 1141.

Even if that were not so, the parties agree McCoy would still need to show one of the following to support a duty to disclose: (1) a fiduciary relationship between Nestlé and McCoy; (2) that Nestlé had "exclusive knowledge of material facts not known or reasonably accessible to" its customers; (3) that Nestlé actively concealed a material fact; or (4) that Nestlé had made misleading partial representations. Opp'n [*967] at 11 (quoting Doe v. SuccessfulMatch.com, 70 F. Supp. 3d 1066, 1076 (N.D. Cal. 2014)); Mot. at 15. McCoy relies solely on the "exclusive knowledge" test. Opp'n at [31] 12-14. But even if "courts do not apply 'exclusivity' with . . . rigidity," see Johnson v. Harley-Davidson Motor Co. Grp., 285 F.R.D. 573, 583 (E.D. Cal. 2012), it is difficult to see how any definition of "exclusive knowledge" could include a case where, by McCoy's own allegations: Nestlé acknowledges on a public website its suppliers' use of slave labor and the worst forms of child labor, Compl. ¶ 21; the industry acknowledged the issue in the Harkin-Engel Protocol in 2001—more than ten years before the statute of limitations period for McCoy's CLRA claim—and has repeatedly admitted its failure to even develop a comprehensive certification system in the years since, id. ¶¶ 28-32; and in 2006 the United States Department of Labor commissioned Tulane University to publish reports detailing labor abuses in the chocolate industry supply chain, id. ¶¶ 33-37; among other public disclosures detailed in the Complaint.

Further, even if McCoy could adequately plead that Nestlé had a duty to disclose the labor abuses in its supply chain on its product labels, it is far from clear that such information falls within the categories of representations governed by the CLRA. McCoy invokes provisions barring misrepresentation of the "source," "characteristics," and "standard" [32] of a product. Opp'n at 17 (citing Cal. Civ. Code § 1770(a)(2), (5), (7)). HN12[] While the CLRA provides that it "shall be liberally construed and applied to promote its underlying purposes" of consumer protection, Cal. Civ. Code § 1760, it does not explicitly discuss representations regarding labor practices, see id. § 1770(a), and McCoy cites no authority holding that any of the enumerated categories she relies on are so broad as to encompass labor abuses. Because the Court holds that Nestlé did not have a duty to disclose labor abuses in its supply chain on its product labels, the Court declines to resolve whether misrepresentations regarding labor practices can fall within the scope of the CLRA.

D. UCL Claim

HN13[] California's UCL prohibits unfair competition, defined as "any unlawful, unfair, or fraudulent business act or practice." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. McCoy brings her claim under each of these prongs, and Nestlé argues that each must be dismissed.

The "unlawful" prong of McCoy's Complaint is based solely on Nestlé's purported violation of the CLRA. Compl. ¶ 86. As discussed above, the Court holds that McCoy fails to state a CLRA claim. Nestlé's Motion is therefore GRANTED as to this prong of McCoy's UCL claim.

The "fraudulent" prong fails for similar reasons. As Judge Seeborg [33] noted in Hodsdon, California courts have held that "HN14[] '[a]bsent a duty to disclose, the failure to do so does not support a claim under the fraudulent prong of the UCL.'" *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 6 (quoting Berryman v. Merit Prop. Mgmt., Inc., 152 Cal. App. 4th 1544, 1557, 62 Cal. Rptr. 3d 177 (2007)); see also Daugherty, 144 Cal. App. 4th at 838 ("We cannot agree that a failure to disclose a fact one has no affirmative duty to disclose is 'likely to deceive' anyone within the meaning of the UCL."). Because, as discussed above, the Court holds that Nestlé had no affirmative duty to disclose severe labor abuses in its supply chain on its product labels, Nestlé's Motion is GRANTED as to the "fraudulent" prong of McCoy's UCL claim.

That leaves the "unfair" prong, the test for which remains somewhat unsettled in the California courts. Courts previously held a practice to be "'unfair' . . . when it [*968] offends an established public policy or when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers." S. Bay Chevrolet v. Gen. Motors Acceptance Corp., 72 Cal. App. 4th 861, 886-87, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 (1999) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). "This test involves balancing the harm to the consumer against the utility of the defendant's practice." Lozano v. AT & T Wireless Servs., Inc., 504 F.3d 718, 735 (9th Cir. 2007) (citing S. Bay, 72 Cal. App. 4th at 886). The California Supreme Court, however, found that the South Bay test was "too amorphous and provide[d] too little guidance to courts and businesses" in a UCL [34] case between competitors, and held instead that:

> HN15[] When a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's "unfair" act or practice invokes section 17200, the word "unfair" in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.

Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 185, 187, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527. The Cel-Tech court explicitly declined to decide what test applied to actions brought by consumers, as opposed to by competitors. Id. at 197 n.12.

In the years since Cel-Tech, some courts have continued to use the South Bay test for cases brought by consumers, while others have followed Cel-Tech's lead and "require[d] that the unfairness be tied to a 'legislatively declared' policy," Lozano v. AT & T Wireless Servs., Inc., 504 F.3d 718, 736 (9th Cir. 2007), or in other words, "'that the UCL claim be tethered to specific constitutional, statutory, or regulatory provisions,'" *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 7 (quoting McVicar v. Goodman Global, Inc., 1 F. Supp. 3d 1044, 1054 (C.D. Cal. 2014)). "Absent guidance from the California courts about the proper definition of an 'unfair' business practice, federal courts have applied both tests." Id. (citing Lozano, 504 F.3d at 736).

The "legislative policies" on which McCoy relies are the United Nations' International [35] Labor Convention No. 182 and the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights—the former forbidding the worst forms of child labor, the latter forbidding slavery, and both having been ratified by the United States. Opp'n at 18-19. The crux of McCoy's claim, however, is not that Nestlé utilized slave labor or the worst forms of child labor, but rather that Nestlé does not disclose the existence of those labor abuses in its supply chain on the packaging of its products. McCoy has not identified any legislatively declared policy requiring such disclosure,[9] nor does she cite any authority for the proposition that where some of a manufacturer's suppliers contravene a legislatively established policy, it is [9] While McCoy does not argue in the context of the "unfair" prong that either the CLRA or the FAL constitutes such a policy, her arguments that those statutes compel the disclosure she seeks could perhaps be transposed to this claim. For the reasons discussed above and below in the context of McCoy's CLRA and FAL claims, [36] the Court holds that neither statute represents a policy requiring the disclosure of labor abuses in a supply chain on product labels.

"unfair" within the meaning of the UCL for the manufacturer to fail to disclose those violations on its product packaging. The Court declines to make that leap.

[*969] At the hearing, McCoy's counsel suggested for the first time that McCoy could amend her UCL claim to tether the "unfair" prong to the Department of Labor's listing of goods produced with child labor and forced labor, see 22 U.S.C. § 7112(b), and to California's Supply Chains Act, which is discussed in more detail below in the context of Nestlé's safe harbor doctrine argument, see Cal. Civ. Code § 1714.43. Although both statutes call for certain disclosures related to labor conditions, neither expresses any policy of disclosure on product labels. Amending McCoy's Complaint to reference those statutes would not remedy the defects of her UCL claim.

Turning to the South Bay balancing test, the distinction between the underlying labor practices and the failure to disclose once again undermines McCoy's claim. The slave labor and child labor alleged in the Complaint would certainly qualify as "immoral, unethical, oppressive, [and] unscrupulous." See S. Bay, 72 Cal. App. 4th at 887. But can the same be said about the failure to disclose Nestlé's suppliers' labor abuses on Nestlé's product packaging? Considering this issue in Hodsdon [37] , Judge Seeborg held as follows:

> The harm at issue here is that Hodsdon may not have purchased Mars's chocolate products at all, or would have paid less for them, had he been aware of the prospect for child labor in Mars's supply chain. Such information is, in fact, readily available to consumers on Mars's website. Given that Hodsdon, like any other consumer, has access to information about the source of Mars's cocoa beans, the absence of such information on the packaging is not "substantially injurious to consumers" or necessarily immoral. Granting that the labor practices at issue are immoral, there remains an important distinction between them and the actual harm for which Hodsdon seeks to recover, namely his purchase of Mars's chocolate products absent any disclosure. Mars's failure to disclose information it had no duty to disclose in the first place is not substantially injurious, immoral, or unethical, and Hodsdon's UCL claim may therefore not advance.

*Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 7. This Court agrees. Because McCoy has not adequately alleged a violation of either test for the "unfair" prong, or a violation of the "unlawful" or "fraudulent" prongs, her UCL claim is DISMISSED.

E. FAL Claim

HN16[] The FAL makes it unlawful [38] for any person "to make or disseminate or cause to be made or disseminated before the public . . . any statement . . . which is untrue or misleading, and which is known, or which by the exercise of reasonable care should be known, to be untrue or misleading." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17500. The plain language of the statute—which prohibits making, disseminating, or causing the dissemination of false or misleading statements—does not encompass omissions. Several cases have therefore held that "[t]here can be no FAL claim where there is no 'statement' at all"—or in other words that an omission, even of material facts, does not violate the FAL. *Norcia v. Samsung Telecomms. Am., LLC, No. 14-CV-00582-JD, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 110454, 2015 WL 4967247, at 8 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 20, 2015); see also *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 4; Stanwood, 941 F. Supp. 2d at 1222.

McCoy cites three federal district court cases and two California appellate cases that purportedly held to the contrary, allowing FAL claims to proceed based on omissions. Opp'n at 16 nn.92 & 95. One of those cases actually dismissed the plaintiff's FAL claim to the extent that it was [*970] based on affirmative misrepresentations, and did not address the FAL claim at all in its discussion of the plaintiff's fraudulent omission theory. Elias v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 950 F. Supp. 2d 1123, 1135-36, 1140 (N.D. Cal. 2013) (discussing only the CLRA, UCL, and common law in the context of fraudulent omissions, [39] and granting leave to amend only as to those claims). Both of the California cases were based on claims that print, television, and/or telephone advertising campaigns—which inherently consist of affirmative statements—were misleading for failure to disclose fees associated with financial products or limitations on the use of coupons. People v. JTH Tax, Inc., 212 Cal. App. 4th 1219, 1224, 151 Cal. Rptr. 3d 728 (2013) ("The lawsuit claimed there were misleading or deceptive statements in print and television advertising . . . ."); People v. Toomey, 157 Cal. App. 3d 1, 17, 203 Cal. Rptr. 642 (1984) ("We encounter little difficulty concluding that Holiday's telephone solicitations and newspaper advertisements were likely to deceive consumers."). One of the other cases, which Judge Seeborg considered in Hodsdon, also involved some degree of affirmative misrepresentation. See Hodsdon, 2016 WL 627383, at *4. There, the defendant allegedly "misrepresented that it would take 'reasonable steps' to secure Plaintiffs' Personal Information [stored on or transmitted via the defendant's network], and that [it] use[d] industry-standard encryption to prevent unauthorized access to sensitive financial information," but failed to disclose that its safeguards were inadequate and network intrusions occurred. In re Sony Gaming Networks & Customer Data Sec. Breach Litig., 996 F. Supp. 2d 942, 990-91 (S.D. Cal. 2014) (quoting the plaintiffs' complaint; final alteration in original).[10] That leaves [40] only a decision by the Southern District of California, which held without analysis that the FAL's prohibition of untrue or misleading statements also "requires a duty to disclose" in at least certain circumstances. Cortina v. Goya Foods, Inc., 94 F. Supp. 3d 1174, 1192 (S.D. Cal. 2015) (holding that the plaintiffs plausibly stated a claim under the FAL where the defendant failed to disclose a "potentially dangerous substance" in the beverages it sold).

Although the Sony decision did not cite the alleged misrepresentations as the reason for allowing the plaintiffs' omissions claim to proceed, the Court agrees with Judge Seeborg's conclusion that the outcome is consistent with a requirement thatHN17[] there be at least some affirmative misrepresentation to support a claim under the FAL. See Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at *4. As for Cortina, and also to the extent that any of the other cases discussed above are not consistent with that rule, the Court [41] respectfully disagrees with their interpretation of the FAL's statutory language. Because McCoy bases her claims on pure omissions, Opp'n at 12 n.64, she fails to allege that Nestlé "ma[d]e or disseminate[d] or cause[d] to be made or disseminated" any false or misleading statement, and thus fails to state a claim under the FAL.[11]

[*971] F. Additional Defenses

In light of the holdings above that each of McCoy's claims must be dismissed, the Court need not reach the parties' arguments regarding Nestlé's remaining defenses: that the California legislature has created a "safe harbor" against McCoy's claims by enacting the Supply Chains Act, see Mot. at 8-11; that the equitable abstention doctrine requires dismissal, id. at 11-13; that the Complaint falls short of the Rule 9(b) pleading standard, id. at 23; and that the relief McCoy seeks would compel Nestlé's speech in violation of the First Amendment, id. at 23-25. Although this Order need not and does not resolve any of those issues, the Court briefly addresses the safe harbor argument.

"[T]he reach of the UCL is broad, but it is not without limit and [42] may not be used to invade 'safe harbors' provided by other statutes." Loeffler v. Target Corp., 58 Cal. 4th 1081, 1125, 171 Cal. Rptr. 3d 189, 324 P.3d 50 (2014) (citing Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 182). "If the Legislature has permitted certain conduct or considered a situation and concluded no action should lie, courts may not override that determination." Id. The California Supreme Court has described the scope of the doctrine as follows:

> A plaintiff may thus not "plead around" an "absolute bar to relief" simply "by recasting the cause of action as one for unfair competition." (Manufacturers Life Ins. Co. v. Superior Court (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 257, 283, 41 Cal. Rptr. 2d 220, 895 P.2d 56.) The rule does not, however, prohibit an action under the unfair competition law merely because some other statute on the subject does not, itself, provide for the action or prohibit the challenged conduct. To forestall an action under the unfair competition law, another provision must actually "bar" the action or clearly permit the conduct.

[10] Judge Seeborg similarly distinguished a Central District decision allowing a claim to proceed under the FAL where the defendants advertised their washing machines as "Xxtra Sanitary" and "high efficiency," but allegedly concealed that the machines developed mold and were not efficient. *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 4 (discussing *Tait v. BSH Home Appliances Corp., No. SACV 10-00711 DOC (ANx), 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103584, 2011 WL 3941387, at 1-3 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2011)).

[11] Moreover, even if the FAL allowed claims based on omissions, McCoy has not established any duty to disclose the information at issue, as discussed above in the context of her CLRA claim.

Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 182-83; see also Loeffler, 58 Cal. 4th at 1125 (emphasizing the requirement that another statute "clearly permit" the challenged conduct).

The Supply Chains Act requires certain large corporations to disclose on their websites their "efforts to eradicate slavery and human trafficking from [their] direct supply chain[s] for tangible goods offered for sale." Cal. Civ. Code § 1714.43(a)(1). The statute does not "actually 'bar'" any action. See Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 183. Nor does it "clearly [43] permit" any conduct except disclosure of efforts to eradicate slavery and human trafficking. See id.; Loeffler, 58 Cal. 4th at 1125. There are also discrepancies between the subject matter of the Supply Chains Act and the disclosure McCoy seeks in this case. As Judge Seeborg noted in Hodsdon, the statute "concerns slavery and human trafficking, not [other forms of abusive] child labor," and "the legislative history is silent about whether the legislature contemplated disclosure on labels." *Hodsdon, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19268, 2016 WL 627383, at 9. Moreover, there is a difference between, on one hand, advertising the steps a company has taken to reduce slavery in its supply chain (as the statute requires), and on the other, disclosing that such slavery persists (as McCoy seeks here). That the legislature mandated the former in certain instances does not necessarily indicate a conclusion that the latter could never be required under existing consumer protection laws.

The Ninth Circuit very recently addressed the safe harbor doctrine in Ebner v. Fresh, Inc., a case alleging deception where a cosmetic product label disclosed the net weight of the product contained in a tube but failed to disclose that "only 75% [*972] of that product is reasonably accessible." *Ebner, __ F.3d __, No. 13-56644, Slip [44] Op. at 8, 818 F.3d 799, 2016 U.S. App. LEXIS 4875, 2016 WL 1056088, at 3 (9th Cir. Mar. 17, 2016). The panel held that the disclosure of the actual net weight fell within the safe harbor because "[b]oth federal and California law affirmatively require cosmetic manufacturers to include an accurate statement of the net weight of included cosmetic product." Id. The plaintiff also brought an omission claim, however, arguing that failure to explain how much of the product was accessible rendered the accurate weight disclosure "deceptive and misleading." Id. The panel held that "[u]nlike a claim seeking to alter the net weight declaration itself, this [omission] claim does not fall within the safe harbor because there is no law expressly permitting the omission of supplemental statements." Id. Similarly, here, Nestlé has not identified any law "expressly permitting the omission of" disclosures on product labels regarding slave labor and the worst forms of child labor in a product's supply chain. See id.

The Court recognizes that recent district court decisions have held that the Supply Chains Act creates a safe harbor against claims based on non-disclosure of labor abuses in a supply chain. *Wirth, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14552, 2016 WL 471234, at 6-9; *Barber, 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 170608, 2015 WL 9309553, at 2-5; De Rosa, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5497, 2016 WL 524059 (summarily dismissing for the reasons stated in Barber); Hughes, 2016 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5508, 2016 WL 524057 (same).[12] Because this Court holds for [45] the reasons stated above that California's consumer protection laws do not create any obligation to make the disclosures McCoy seeks, the question of whether the Supply Chains Act would shield against such a duty is ultimately moot, and the Court need not and does not resolve whether Wirth and Barber are correct or applicable to the case at hand. The Court nevertheless echoes Judge Seeborg's skepticism that the safe harbor doctrine is as broad as Nestlé contends.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, McCoy's claims under the CLRA, the UCL, and the FAL fail to state a claim on which relief may be granted, and are therefore DISMISSED. McCoy has made clear that she does not intend to pursue a claim based on affirmative misrepresentations. See Opp'n at 12 n.64. The Court therefore finds that leave to amend would be futile, and dismisses this action with prejudice.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

This matter is before the Court on Defendants' Motion To Dismiss and Supporting Authority. [Doc. 5] Defendants move to dismiss the Complaint under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim. Defendants filed a Response [Doc. 17], and Plaintiff filed a Reply [Doc. 18].

Having reviewed the motion, briefs, and relevant law, the Court concludes that the motion should be granted. The case will therefore be dismissed.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

The following summary of statements and factual allegations,[1] taken from the Complaint, views the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff. [Doc. 1, pp. 1-12] See Archuleta v. Wagner, 523 F.3d 1278, 1283 (10th Cir. 2008).

The Santa Fe Solid Waste Management Agency ("SFSWMA") was created in 1995 as a joint authority of the City [*2] of Santa Fe and Santa Fe County ("SFC"). The purpose of SFSWMA was to create, maintain, and operate a landfill for use by residents of the City of Santa Fe and Santa Fe County.

SFSWMA began operations at the Caja del Rio Landfill in 1997. Caja del Rio has a solid waste landfill permit. The original plan called for soil cover from each disposal cell to be removed and stored until used for final covers of compacted solid waste. The basalt bedrock was to be blasted into lumps and transported to a storage waste (tailings) pile located next to the landfill disposal area. For many years, the basalt was considered a waste product.

Randall Kippenbrock, director of SFSWMA, later determined that the basalt could be crushed and sold as aggregate. SFSWMA and SFC entered into an eight-year contract with Del Hur Industries to crush and sell aggregate materials from the Caja del Rio Landfill. Kippenbrock's July 23, 2014 letter to the Board of County Commissioners states that it is estimated there is a stockpile of 1.6 million tons of unprocessed basalt at the landfill, which is anticipated to take eight to sixteen years to sell. [Doc. 1, pp. 16-17] The letter expresses the opinion that another basalt [*3] rock quarry is not needed in Santa Fe County.

The Complaint asserts: "In the operating agreement between SFSWMA, SFC and Del Hur Industries, rather than indicate they will operate under an appropriate County special use permit and County conditions, they attempt to contract for typical and required special use provision in lieu of obtaining appropriate zoning and special use permits." [Doc. 1, p. 6, ¶ 2] The Complaint further asserts: "SFSWMA and SFC knowingly formed the mining operation of Caja del Rio Landfill without proper permitting and zoning for the operation." [Doc. 1, p. 6, ¶ 3] There has been no public notice by SFSWMA of Caja del Rio's aggregate production blasting and sale of aggregate.

On November 8, 2013, Plaintiff Buena Vista Estates submitted an application to SFC for approval to create a mining zone to allow the extraction of aggregate for use as a construction material. After various reviews and hearings, the second public hearing before the Board of County Commissioners ended on August 12, 2014, without Plaintiff's application having yet been approved.

On September 16, 2014, the Board of County Commissioners of Santa Fe County adopted Ordinance No. 2014-8: "An Emergency [*4] Interim Development Ordinance Imposing a Twelve Month Moratorium on Development Approvals or the Issuance of Development Permits for Specified Developments of Countywide Impact" (the "Moratorium"). [Doc. 1 (Exhibit B), pp. 18-22] The Moratorium only applies to: (1) landfills, (2) junkyards, and (3) "sand and gravel extraction activity requiring blasting." [Doc. 1, p. 20, Sec. 4] The Moratorium does not apply to "sand and gravel extraction that does not require blasting." [Doc. 1, p. 20, Sec. 5.5]

The Moratorium recites that: the Board of County Commissioners previously found that Developments of Countywide Impact ("DCIs") have potential for far reaching effects on the community; DCIs are "developments that would place major demands on public facilities, the County's capital improvement plan and budget, and/or have the potential to affect the environment and public health, safety, and welfare beyond the impacts on immediately neighboring properties"; DCIs have the potential to create serious adverse noise, light, odor and vibration, explosive hazards, traffic congestion, and burdens on county emergency response services. [Doc. 1, p. 19, Sec. 3.1] The Board therefore found that special regulation of DCIs was [*5] necessary for the following purposes:

[1] The Court notes that the Complaint mixes factual allegations and legal assertions and conclusions in sections entitled "Background" and "Introduction." This summary, taken from those sections of the Complaint, includes some conclusions of law. The Court accepts as true all well pleaded facts, but does not accept as true legal conclusions or legal conclusions couched as factual allegations. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009); Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). Where necessary to the Court's decision, any allegations not accepted as true will be specifically discussed below; where not necessary to the decision, however, the Court will not separate legal conclusions from factual allegations.

3.1.1. to protect the health, safety and welfare of the citizens, residents, and businesses of the County from the potentially harmful or hazardous impacts of DCIs;

3.1.2. to ensure short and long-term compatibility (both on-site and offsite) of DCIs and the County at large;

3.1.3. to preserve the quality and sustainability of life, the economy, infrastructure, environment, natural and cultural resources, and natural landscapes; and

3.1.4. to protect the degradation of air, surface water and groundwater, soils, environmentally sensitive lands and visual and scenic qualities.

[Doc. 1, p. 19] The Board found that existing regulations of the specified DCIs[2] were non-existent or inadequate to meet the special regulatory needs identified in Sections 3.1.1 to 3.1.4, and that a twelve-month moratorium on new applications and approvals was necessary to allow development of regulations for these DCIs. [Doc. 1, p. 19, Secs. 3.3, 3.4, 3.6]

The Moratorium states that it is based on the County's "express and implied zoning authority and police power," under NMSA 1978, § 3-21-1 (2007) (granting counties zoning authority, including the power to regulate and restrict the "location and use of buildings, structures, and land [*6] for trade, industry, residence or other purposes"), and NMSA 1978, § 4-37-1 (1975) (granting counties "those powers necessary and proper to provide for the safety, preserve the health, promote the prosperity and improve the morals, order, comfort and convenience of any county or its inhabitants").

PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Plaintiff filed the Complaint on March 13, 2015. [Doc. 1] Count I asserts a claim under the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1. Count II asserts a claim under the New Mexico Antitrust Act, NMSA 1978, §§ 57-1-1 to -19 (1995).

This Court has jurisdiction over this case. See 28 U.S.C. § 1337; 15 U.S.C. §§ 15, 26. The Court has jurisdiction over the claim under the New Mexico Antitrust Act. See 28 U.S.C. § 1367.

LEGAL STANDARDS

I. Rule 12(b)(6)

On a motion to dismiss, the court assesses the legal sufficiency of the allegations contained within the four corners of the complaint. Archuleta v. Wagner, 523 F.3d 1278, 1281 (10th Cir. 2008). Rule 8 requires the complaint to contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). The court accepts as true all well-pleaded facts, viewing them in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and allowing all reasonable inferences in favor of the plaintiff. Archuleta, 523 F.3d at 1283. This deference is inapplicable to legal conclusions in the complaint. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). The court "should disregard all conclusory [*7] statements of law and consider whether the remaining specific factual allegations, if assumed to be true, plausibly suggest the defendant is liable." Kansas Penn Gaming, LLC v. Collins, 656 F.3d 1210, 1214 (10th Cir. 2011); see Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. The court does not accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007).

The complaint "does not need detailed factual allegations," but the factual allegations "must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Id. The complaint must go beyond "an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. Conclusory statements unsupported by factual allegations are not sufficient. Id.; Hall v. Bellmon, 935 F.2d 1106, 1110 (10th Cir. 1991). "Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678; see Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (holding that mere "labels and conclusions" and "formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action" are insufficient); Robbins v. Oklahoma, 519 F.3d 1242, 1247 (10th Cir. 2008).

The allegations of fact must "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570; see Archuleta, 523 F.3d at 1281, 1283. "The allegations must be enough that, if assumed to be true, the plaintiff plausibly (not just speculatively) has a claim for relief." Robbins, 519 F.3d at 1247. The Tenth Circuit observed that "plausible" cannot mean "likely to be true," but "must refer to the scope of the allegations in a [*8] complaint: if they are so general that they encompass a wide swath of conduct, much of it innocent, then the plaintiffs 'have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570).

II. Antitrust Immunity

Section 1 of the Sherman Act makes unlawful "every contract, combination ... or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." 15 U.S.C. § 1. In Parker v. Brown, the Supreme Court established "state action immunity." Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 350-51, 63 S. Ct. 307, 87 L. Ed. 315 (1943). Parker held that the Sherman Act was not intended "to restrain state action or official action directed by a state." Id. at 351. "States may regulate economic activity as they wish, pursuing even patently anticompetitive policies without having to look over their shoulders to see if Congress approves." Kay Elec. Coop. v. City of Newkirk, 647 F.3d 1039, 1042 (10th Cir. 2011).

Because substate governmental entities—including municipalities and counties—are not sovereign, state action immunity under Parker does not apply to them directly, but they do receive immunity "when they act 'pursuant to state policy to displace competition with regulation or monopoly public service.'" FTC v. Phoebe Putney Health Sys., Inc., 568 U.S. 216, 133 S. Ct. 1003, 1010, 185 L.Ed. 2d 43 (2013) (quoting City of Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. 389, 413, 98 S. Ct. 1123, 55 L. Ed. 2d 364 (1978) (plurality opinion)). "[I]f a state expressly adopts an anticompetitive policy and chooses to use its municipal subdivisions as instruments [*9] to effect that policy, then the federal-state comity concerns undergirding the Parker state immunity doctrine do come into play." Kay Elec. Coop., 647 F.3d at 1042. A municipality or county "shares the state's 'immunity' when but only when it is implementing anticompetitive policies authorized by the state." Id.

DISCUSSION

I. Federal Antitrust Law

Citing the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, Count I of the Complaint asserts that SFC and SFSWMA "have unreasonably challenged restraint of trade in the relevant markets by knowingly joining together to operate an unpermitted and illegally zoned sand and gravel operation while opposing legal competition." [Doc. 1, p. 12] Defendants characterize the Complaint as alleging an antitrust violation based on the conjunction of two acts: (1) operating a sand and gravel operation at the Caja del Rio Landfill, including blasting; and (2) at the same time imposing a moratorium on granting new permits and approvals for sand and gravel extraction activities involving blasting. [Doc. 5, p. 2] Defendants argue that SFC is immune from federal and state antitrust laws.

As the Court understands the Complaint and Response, Plaintiff agrees with Defendants' characterization of the basis for its antitrust [*10] claims: anticompetitive conduct by engaging in its own sand and gravel business by marketing basalt, while SFC's Moratorium prevents the entry of new parties into that business. [Doc. 17, pp. 2-3] Plaintiff responds that SFC is deprived of immunity under the "market participant" exception:

> The Defendants are not immune from federal and state antitrust claims because they are market participants in the local and regional sand and gravel market, utilizing anti-competitive practices.
> . . . .

> Santa Fe County's antitrust liability arises first from its anticompetitive use of zoning powers. Though municipalities have been given wide latitude to engage in anticompetitive practice through the use of zoning ordinances following the Supreme Court's decision in City of Columbia, 499 U.S. 365, 111 S. Ct. 1344, 113 L. Ed. 2d 382 (1991), Santa Fe County's use of them exceeds the scope contemplated by City of Columbia because the County is also a market participant in the area it is regulating.

[Doc. 17, pp. 2, 10; see id. p. 7 ("The facts, accepted as true, show and support that the Defendants are market participants.")] Thus Plaintiff concedes that SFC would normally have state action immunity when utilizing its zoning powers. Plaintiff presents two arguments that SFC was deprived [*11] of immunity in this case: (A) Plaintiff relies squarely on the "market participant exception"; and (B) Plaintiff relies on the letter from Randall Kippenbrock, Executive Director of SFSWMA.

A. State Action Immunity

Defendants assert that the Moratorium is authorized by state law. As the Moratorium recites, its enactment is authorized under New Mexico statute, Section 3-21-1, granting counties zoning authority, including the power to regulate and restrict the "location and use of buildings, structures, and land for trade, industry, residence or other purposes." "Restrictions upon the use of one's property are imposed by state and local governments pursuant to police power." Brazos Land, Inc. v. Board of County Comm'rs, 1993-NMCA-013, ¶ 29, 115 N.M. 168, 848 P.2d 1095, 1101. "The United States Supreme Court has long held that governments may, pursuant to police power, adopt zoning ordinances that regulate the manner in which real property may be used." Id. When zoning is used to promote the public interest, it is upheld as a legitimate exercise of the police power. Id. Applying these principles, the New Mexico Court of Appeals upheld the county's enactment of a moratorium for the purpose of promulgating more stringent waste disposal requirements. Id. ¶¶ 29-30, 848 P.2d at 1101. As in Brazos Land, enactment of the [*12] Moratorium by SFC is an exercise of the zoning authority granted by the State of New Mexico under Section 3-21-1. Plaintiff does not dispute this argument or conclusion.

Defendants further argue that the exercise of zoning authority is inherently anticompetitive. Thus SFC's grant of zoning authority allowed suppression of competition.

In Omni, the Supreme Court held that the city's ordinance restricting the size, location, and spacing of billboards necessarily protected existing billboards against some competition from newcomers. City of Columbia v. Omni Outdoor Advert., Inc., 499 U.S. 365, 373, 111 S. Ct. 1344, 113 L. Ed. 2d 382 (1991). Thus, the Court held, the city was prima facie entitled to Parker immunity. Columbia Outdoor Advertising ("COA") controlled more than 95% of the relevant market by 1981. Id. at 367. The mayor and other city council members were personal friends of COA's majority owner; COA and its officers occasionally contributed funds and free billboard space to their campaigns. Id. Omni began erecting billboards in 1981. Id. at 368. COA met with City officials to seek enactment of zoning ordinances restricting billboard construction; ultimately, in 1982, the City passed a new ordinance restricting billboards, which obviously benefitted COA and severely hindered Omni's ability to compete. Id. Omni brought [*13] an antitrust suit, asserting a "secret anticompetitive agreement" in which the City and COA would each use its power and resources to protect COA's monopoly position. Id. at 367-68.

The Supreme Court recognized in Omni that the state statutes under which the City acted authorized municipalities to regulate the use of land and the construction of buildings and other structures, and that these statutes authorized the City to regulate billboards. Id. at 370-71. The Court rejected the argument that the City would lose Parker immunity if the City acted beyond its delegated authority—i.e., if the nature of its regulation were substantively or procedurally defective; to allow such a challenge under antitrust law would undermine Parker and the federalism interests it was designed to protect. Id. at 372-73. State action immunity requires that there be "'clear articulation of a state policy to authorize anticompetitive conduct,'" at least as the "foreseeable result." Id. (quoting Town of Hallie v. City of Eau Claire, 471 U.S. 34, 40, 42, 105 S. Ct. 1713, 85 L. Ed. 2d 24 (1985)). The Supreme Court held that the zoning authority granted to the City entailed authority to suppress competition: "The very purpose of zoning regulation is to displace unfettered business freedom in a manner that regularly has the effect of preventing normal [*14] acts of competition, particularly on the part of new entrants." Id. at 373 (emphasis added). It was not required that suppression of competition was explicitly permitted; instead, the Court held that it is enough "if suppression of competition is the 'foreseeable result' of what the statute authorizes." Id. at 372-73. "A municipal ordinance restricting the size, location, and spacing of billboards (surely a common form of zoning) necessarily protects existing billboards against some competition from newcomers." Id. at 374. The Supreme Court concluded that the City's restriction of billboard construction was prima facie entitled to Parker immunity. Id. at 374.

As in Omni, SFC was given the authority to regulate by the state's grant of zoning power, and that zoning power may have the effect of suppressing competition. As in Omni, the Moratorium "necessarily protected existing [sand and gravel extraction businesses] against some competition from newcomers." As in Omni, the very purpose of SFC's Moratorium was "to displace unfettered business freedom in a manner that regularly has the effect of preventing normal acts of competition, particularly on the part of new entrants" like Plaintiff Buena Vista Estates. SFC determined that [*15] the Moratorium was necessary for the purposes set forth in Sections 3.1.1 to 3.1.4—purposes in accordance with those in NMSA 1978, § 3-21-1 (2007).

Citing Kay Electric, Plaintiff argues that "the Tenth Circuit noted that a state hasn't authorized all forms of municipal anticompetitive conduct just because it has authorized some," and the county "must demonstrate that the state authorized the specific anticompetitive conduct at issue," this "particular monopolistic conduct." [Doc. 17, pp. 12-13] See Kay Elec. Coop., 647 F.3d at 1044. If Plaintiff means to say that the state must have specifically authorized SFC to restrict new sand and gravel extraction activity requiring blasting, Plaintiff misapprehends the relevant principles. The Omni Court rejected this degree of specificity. See Omni, 499 U.S. at 373 n.4. The anticompetitive conduct at issue specifically authorized by the state is zoning regulation, which is inherently anticompetitive and which "regularly has the effect of preventing normal acts of competition, particularly on the part of new entrants," as stated in Omni, 499 U.S. at 373. The state has specifically authorized SFC to exercise zoning authority, regulating and restricting the use of land. See NMSA 1978, § 3-21-1. The Moratorium regulating one use of land is an incident of this specific grant of general [*16] zoning authority.

Citing Midcal, Plaintiff mentions that in addition to a clearly articulated state policy, there must be active supervision by the state. California Retail Liquor Dealers Ass'n v. Midcal Aluminum, Inc., 445 U.S. 97, 105, 100 S. Ct. 937, 63 L. Ed. 2d 233 (1980). [Doc. 17, p. 12] Plaintiff does not, however, argue that this requirement applies here and was not satisfied. And, as Defendants observe in their Reply, this case involves local governmental entities that "are not subject to the 'active state supervision requirement.'" Phoebe Putney Health Sys, 133 S. Ct. at 1011 (stating that active state supervision requirement only applies to private parties). [Doc. 18, pp. 5-6] The reason is that local government entities "have less of an incentive to pursue their own self-interest under the guise of implementing state policies." Id. There is no need to require the state to actively supervise a local government entity's execution of a properly delegated function—here, zoning regulation. See Town of Hallie v. City of Eau Claire, 471 U.S. 34, 46-47, 105 S. Ct. 1713, 85 L. Ed. 2d 24 (1985).

Defendants argue that their operation of the Landfill is authorized by state law. [Doc. 5, pp. 6-7] Both cities and counties are authorized to regulate collection and disposal of refuse, and to operate refuse disposal areas and facilities including landfills. See NMSA 1978, § 3-48-2 (1965) (city); NMSA 1978, § 4-56-3 (1971) (county). SFSWMA was created to jointly exercise this authority [*17] to operate a landfill. [Doc. 5, p. 7 & n.1 (citing Joint Powers Agreement Act, authorizing public agencies to create an administering agency to jointly exercise a common power, NMSA 1978, §§ 11-1-3, 11-1-5)] As Plaintiff admits in the Complaint, "Caja del Rio operates under EPA and State standards for landfills, and has a solid waste landfill permit." [Doc. 1, p. 3] Defendants assert that their operation of the Landfill, including the basalt processing operations, is properly authorized.

The Court recognizes, however, that Plaintiff alleges that the Landfill is "unpermitted and illegally zoned." Although the Complaint "does not need detailed factual allegations," these overly general and conclusory allegations are not sufficient. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929; see Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678; Hall, 935 F.2d at 1110. The Court accepts only well pleaded facts, not conclusory allegations. See Mitchell v. King, 537 F.2d 385, 386 (10th Cir. 1976). Moreover, these allegations appear to be legal conclusions couched as factual allegations—which the Court does not accept as true on a motion to dismiss. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. The Complaint would need more detailed factual allegations about the existing permit and zoning, together with citation of applicable laws or regulations regarding permitting and zoning; a determination that the Landfill's activities were "unpermitted" [*18] or "illegally zoned" would be a conclusion of law reached by application of those laws or regulations to the facts. The Court disregards conclusory statements of law in considering a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. See Kansas Penn Gaming, LLC, 656 F.3d at 1214.

The Court further observes that Plaintiff undercuts its argument of permit and zoning violations somewhat by admitting: "The landfill permit and the Solid Waste Act may contemplate and to a limited extent govern the blasting and excavation of basalt rock"; and: "even if a sold waste permit under the Solid Waste Act allows blasting and stockpiling of waste basalt material, it does not permit the processing, crushing, screening, stockpiling and transporting of the aggregate materials." [Doc. 17, pp. 3, 9] These admissions appear to show that Plaintiff's antitrust claims are based instead on the conjunction of the Moratorium with participation in the market.

Even if the Court were to take as true the allegations of an "unpermitted and illegally zoned" Landfill, however, that does not affect the antitrust analysis discussed above. As the Supreme Court observed in Omni, the "antitrust court" is not transformed into "the standard reviewer" whenever a plaintiff alleges "that the governmental body, [*19] though possessing the power to engage in the challenged conduct, has actually exercised its power in a manner not authorized by state law." Omni, 499 U.S. at 371-72. Once it has been established that SFC has zoning authority under state statute, and that both a city and county have authority to establish and operate a landfill, further review of exactly how that authority was exercised is not "a federal antitrust job," but instead a matter for state review upon a claim of state statutory violations. Id. at 372.

The Court concludes that Defendants are "prima facie entitled to Parker immunity," as in Omni. 499 U.S. at 374. Plaintiff makes two arguments that Defendants are deprived of this state action immunity. Plaintiff's primary argument is that the "market participant exception" precludes state action immunity. [Doc. 17, pp. 2, 7, 10-11] In addition, Plaintiff attached the Kippenbrock letter to the Complaint, and argues that this letter shows "Defendants' clear intention and efforts to maintain a monopoly."

B. Market Participant Exception

Plaintiff argues that "Defendants are not immune from federal and state antitrust claims because they are market participants in the local and regional sand and gravel market, utilizing anti-competitive [*20] practices." [Doc. 17, p. 2] But the Supreme Court has not established a "market participant exception." In Omni, the Supreme Court did not adopt such an exception—instead, merely recognizing in dicta a "possible" exception to the broad principle reaffirmed in that case: "We reiterate that, with the possible market participant exception, any action that qualifies as state action is 'ipso facto ... exempt from the operation of the antitrust laws.'" Omni, 499 U.S. at 379 (quoting Hoover v. Ronwin, 466 U.S. 558, 568, 104 S. Ct. 1989, 80 L. Ed. 2d 590 (1984)); see id. at 374-75 (observing "this immunity does not necessarily obtain where the State acts not in a regulatory capacity but as a commercial participant in a given market"). In 2013, the Supreme Court recognized that it had not established a market participant exception, stating that Omni had left the question open and declining to "recognize and apply a 'market participant' exception to state-action immunity" because the argument was not raised by the parties or ruled on by the lower courts. Phoebe Putney Health Sys., Inc., 133 S. Ct. at 1010 n.4.

The only authority cited by Plaintiff in support of a market participant exception is the Tenth Circuit opinion in Kay Electric Cooperative. [Doc. 17, pp. 11-12] Plaintiff argues: "The State of New Mexico did not intend to establish a municipal aggregate [*21] materials monopoly through the conferral of zoning powers and the grant of a solid waste disposal permit"; and: "The state did not clearly articulate or affirmatively express a policy favoring Defendants' monopolization of aggregate reclamation and sale simply because Caja del Rio Landfill was given a solid waste disposal permit and engages in solid waste collection and disposal activities." [Doc. 17, p. 11] Plaintiff's argument concludes: "Therefore, the anticompetitive conduct Santa Fe County has engaged in by placing a moratorium on Plaintiff's permit application while concurrently favoring and participating in their own aggregate reclamation and sale operation could not have been contemplated by the legislature as a consequence of the Solid Waste Act." [Doc. 17, pp. 11-12] Plaintiff's argument misapprehends the applicable principles, erring in focusing on the Landfill's solid waste permit. The point is that the zoning authority granted to SFC under NMSA 1978, Section 3-21-1, constitutes a "clear articulation of a state policy to authorize anticompetitive conduct," because the "very purpose of zoning regulation is to displace unfettered business freedom in a manner that regularly has the effect of preventing [*22] normal acts of competition, particularly on the part of new entrants." Omni, 499 U.S. at 372-73 (internal quotation marks omitted). It is not required that the state be shown to have specifically intended that a "municipal aggregate materials monopoly" result. See City of Lafayette v. Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. 389, 415, 98 S. Ct. 1123, 55 L. Ed. 2d 364 (1978) ("This does not mean, however, that a political subdivision necessarily must be able to point to a specific, detailed legislative authorization before it properly may assert a Parker defense to an antitrust suit."); Paragould Cablevision, Inc. v. City of Paragould, 930 F.2d 1310, 1312 (8th Cir. 1991) (stating Louisiana Power & Light Co. "has made clear that a specified, detailed legislative authorization of monopoly service need not exist to infer the necessary state intent" (internal quotation marks omitted)). What is required is that the state authorized SFC to regulate zoning, despite the fact that anticompetitive conduct of some kind may be the regular result. See Omni, 499 U.S. at 373; Louisiana Power & Light Co., 435 U.S. at 415 (stating that an "adequate state mandate for anticompetitive activities of cities and other subordinate governmental units exists when it is found from the authority given a governmental entity to operate in a particular area, that the legislature contemplated the kind of action complained of" (internal quotation marks omitted; emphasis added)).

As the Reply argues, [*23] Plaintiff's description of the alleged anticompetitive behavior here is substantially similar to the circumstances of Omni (unless a "market participant exception" were applicable). In Omni, the City's use of its zoning power to restrict billboards favored an existing billboard business and was detrimental to a newer company's ability to compete. Here, SFC's use of its zoning power favored the existing operation, which marketed basalt, and was detrimental to a newcomer to the market, Plaintiff.

The distinction between Omni and this case is that SFC has a commercial interest in the existing operation. Plaintiff argues that this distinction is significant because of the market participant exception, which Plaintiff asserts was "articulated by the Tenth Circuit in Kay Electric." [Doc. 17, p. 11] As Defendants argue, however, Kay Electric did not adopt the market participant exception. [Doc. 18, pp. 3-4]

Instead, Kay Electric involved the issue of whether the state had authorized anticompetitive conduct. The Tenth Circuit concluded that the state "expressed a clear preference for, not against, competition" for electricity services in annexed areas, with statutes specifically sanctioning [*24] a "battle for electricity customers in annexed areas." Kay Electric, 647 F.3d at 1044-45. Contrasting the circumstances in Hallie, in which "the city's conduct was just the sort of thing the state legislature had authorized," the Tenth Circuit stated that "there's nothing on Oklahoma's statute books to suggest that the legislature authorized the species of antitrust violation alleged here—refusing to provide an end customer one service (sewage) unless he purchased something entirely different (electricity)." Id. at 1046-47. The fact that the city was a market participant was merely an incidental fact; the decision turned on the fact that the state had done the opposite of authorizing anticompetitive conduct. The Tenth Circuit did not use the term "market participant exception," or cite the dicta in Omni regarding a "market participant exception." Neither the language nor the analysis of Kay Electric supports Plaintiff's reliance on a market participant exception having been adopted in the Tenth Circuit.

Defendants further argue that they were not market participants, at any event, citing authority that a governmental entity does not become a market participant because of actions incidental to its primary activity. [Doc. 18, p. 5] [*25] See Wooster Indus. Park, LLC v. City of Wooster, 55 F. Supp. 3d 990 (N.D. Ohio 2014) (holding City not a market participant when it earned rental income from permitting company to collocate on a cell tower owned by City); Wheeler v. Beard, No. Civ. A. 03-4826, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9778, 2005 WL 1217191 (E.D. Pa. 2005) (unpublished)[3] (holding that Department of Corrections' agreements with vendors to provide goods to inmates was "purely incidental" to the primary purpose of operating prisons). This analysis gains credence from the Supreme Court's citation in Omni of an example of what it would mean to be a "market participant": Union Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 313 U.S. 450, 61 S. Ct. 1064, 85 L. Ed. 1453 (1941). In that case, Kansas City, Kansas, constructed, and was the owner and operator of, a wholesale produce market. The project was formulated in conjunction with the Union Pacific Railroad, and the City gave rebates and concessions to entice prospective tenants to move from an old market (in Kansas City, Missouri) to the new one. Id. at 457-58. The rebates and concessions were held unlawful under the Elkins Act, which prohibits concessions in respect to transportation. Id. at 1072. In citing Union Pacific as an example of a market participant, the Supreme Court in Omni stated that Kansas City, Kansas, was acting "not in a regulatory capacity but as a commercial participant in a given market." Omni, 499 U.S. at 374-75. In Union Pacific, no regulatory purpose was involved. In contrast, [*26] SFC and SFSWMA are acting primarily in their state-approved capacities to exercise zoning authority and to operate waste disposal facilities; sale of basalt is a mere byproduct of these primary roles. The Court concludes, however, that, in absence of persuasive authority for adoption of a market participant exception, it need not reach this further argument.

[3] The Court cites this and other unpublished opinions for their persuasive value. See 10th Cir. R. 32.1(A).

Plaintiff assumes that a market participant exception exists. Plaintiff provides no authoritative caselaw, and no reasoned or persuasive analysis, to support the adoption of a market participant exception. Plaintiff provides no analysis of the limits of such an exception when sale of basalt is merely a byproduct of Defendants' acting in their regulatory capacity, rather than Defendants' primary activity. Without authority from the Supreme Court or the Tenth Circuit, this Court declines to adopt a market participant exception.

The Court thus concludes that Defendants' sale of basalt does not deprive them of state action immunity under Parker.

C. Randall Kippenbrock letter

Plaintiff argues that the Kippenbrock letter shows "Defendants' clear intention and efforts to maintain a monopoly on a sand and gravel operation—not just landfill [*27] operations." [Doc. 17, p. 11] Defendants' Motion argues that this communication is protected by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, which holds that: "The federal antitrust laws also do not regulate the conduct of private individuals in seeking anticompetitive action from the government." Omni, 499 U.S. at 379-80; see E. R.R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 141, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961); United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 670, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965). [Doc. 5, p. 10] "That a private party's political motives are selfish is irrelevant: 'Noerr shields from the Sherman Act a concerted effort to influence public officials regardless of intent or purpose.'" Omni, 499 U.S. at 380 (quoting Mine Workers, 381 U.S. at 670). Once a governmental entity "establishes it is entitled to state action immunity, the subjective motivation of the actors involved in the decisionmaking process should not come into play." Allright Colorado, Inc. v. City of Denver, 937 F.2d 1502, 1511 (10th Cir. 1991); see Omni, 499 U.S. at 377.

Under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, Kippenbrock's letter—even if it were by a private party—does not support an antitrust claim; the Court concludes that the doctrine applies to this letter from the director of a government agency. See Manistee Town Ctr. v. City of Glendale, 227 F.3d 1090, 1093 (9th Cir. 2000) (applying doctrine to lobbying by city); Mariana v. Fisher, 338 F.3d 189, 200 (3d Cir. 2003) (holding that the doctrine applies to government as well as private actors). Plaintiff's Response makes no response to this argument, set forth in Defendant's Motion.

If Plaintiff meant to suggest the Kippenbrock [*28] letter evidenced a conspiracy, that claim would also be unavailing. Omni held that there is no conspiracy exception to state action immunity. Omni, 499 U.S. at 374. It "is both inevitable and desirable that public officials often agree to do what one or another group of private citizens urges upon them"; if "'conspiracy' means nothing more than an agreement to impose the regulation in question, ... such an exception would virtually swallow up the Parker rule: All anticompetitive regulation would be vulnerable to a 'conspiracy' charge." Id. at 375. Omni rejected a conspiracy exception between a local government entity and a private company. On the same analysis, the Court concludes that there is no conspiracy exception to state action immunity in this case, involving two governmental entities.

D. Conclusion on Count I

The Court concludes that SFC and SFSWMA are entitled to state action immunity, and the Complaint should be dismissed for failure to state a claim.

II. New Mexico Antitrust Act

Count I under federal antitrust law and Count II under New Mexico antitrust law make the same claims. [Doc. 1, pp. 12-14] Plaintiff's Response confirms that the claims and the applicable analysis are the same. [Doc. 17, p. 10]

The [*29] language of the New Mexico Antitrust Act, NMSA 1978, §§ 57-1-1 to -19 (1995), is virtually identical to that of the federal antitrust law. Section 57-1-16 provides:

Nothing contained in the Antitrust Act is intended to prohibit actions which are:

> A. clearly and expressly authorized by any state agency or regulatory body acting under a clearly articulated and affirmatively expressed state policy to displace competition with regulation; and
> B. actively supervised by the state agency or regulatory body which is constitutionally or statutorily granted the authority to supervise such actions when the agency or regulatory body does not have any proprietary interest in the actions.

The New Mexico Legislature explicitly provided that New Mexico's Antitrust Act should follow the same judicial interpretations as federal antitrust law. Section 57-1-15 states:

> Unless otherwise provided in the Antitrust Act, the Antitrust Act shall be construed in harmony with judicial interpretations of the federal antitrust laws. This construction shall be made to achieve uniform application of the state and federal laws prohibiting restraints of trade and monopolistic practices.

Plaintiff provides no claim or argument that the same result should not obtain under [*30] the New Mexico Act as under federal antitrust law. The Court therefore concludes, on the same analysis discussed above, that the Complaint under New Mexico's Antitrust Act should be dismissed for failure to state a claim.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that:

Defendants' Motion To Dismiss and Supporting Authority [Doc. 5] is GRANTED.

Civil Procedure > Judicial Officers > Magistrates > Standards of Review

HN1[] Magistrates, Standards of Review

When a magistrate judge issues a recommendation on a dispositive matter, Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b)(3) requires that the district judge determine de novo any part of the magistrate judge's recommended disposition that has been properly objected to. In conducting its review, the district judge may accept, reject, or modify the recommended disposition; receive further evidence; or return the matter to the magistrate judge with instructions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN2[] Sherman Act, Claims

Because Section 1 under the Sherman Act does not prohibit all unreasonable restraints of trade, but only those restraints effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy, the crucial question is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct stems from independent decision or from an agreement. To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must present enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made and to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement. An agreement, however, need not be in writing or be explicit, and may be established by either direct or circumstantial evidence.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN3[] Sherman Act, Claims

Direct evidence of a Section 1 Sherman Act conspiracy must be evidence that is explicit and requires no inferences to establish the proposition or conclusion being asserted. However, because direct evidence of concerted action is so rare, the antitrust law has granted fact finders some latitude to find collusion or conspiracy from parallel conduct and inferences drawn from the circumstances. Specifically, if a complaint does not contain direct evidence of an agreement, but instead makes only allegations of so-called parallel conduct, e.g., allegations of similar pricing behavior, etc., such allegations must be placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action. That is, the complaint must contain allegations plausibly suggesting (not merely consistent with) agreement. In considering whether a plaintiff has alleged sufficient circumstantial evidence of conspiracy, the court considers the allegations as a whole.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN4[] Sherman Act, Claims

Allegations are deemed conclusory where they state a legal conclusion without supplying a factual narrative for that conclusion, such that they amount to nothing more than a formulaic recitation of the elements of a claim. For example, a conclusory allegation of a Section 1 Sherman Act claim would state little more than that the defendant joined a conspiracy to unreasonably restrain trade"

HN5[] Burdens of Proof, Nonmovant Persuasion & Proof

A plaintiff can survive summary judgment if he or she presents a combination of direct evidence and circumstantial evidence positing an economically rational theory of an agreement; by definition, then, such a plaintiff can withstand a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion.

[*1070] ORDER ADOPTING AND AFFIRMING IN PART FEBRUARY 22, 2016 RECOMMENDATION OF UNITED STATES MAGISTRATE JUDGE

This matter is before the Court on the February 22, 2016 Recommendation of United States Magistrate Judge Kathleen M. Tafoya (Doc. # 240) on a handful of motions to dismiss in the instant case.

I. BACKGROUND

In her Recommendation, Magistrate Judge Tafoya analyzed five separate motions to dismiss brought by some combination of the fifteen Defendants named in this matter: Defendant Cultural Care, Inc.'s Motion to Dismiss All Claims in First Amended Complaint (Doc. # 127), Motion to Dismiss the First Amended Complaint by Defendant Interexchange, Inc. (Doc # 130), Defendant American Cultural Exchange, LLC, D/B/A Go Au Pair's Motion to Dismiss Counts I, III, IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, IX and X of the First Amended Complaint (Doc. # 131), Joint Motion by Certain Sponsor Defendants to Dismiss the First Amended Complaint (Doc. [4] # 135), and Defendant American Institute for Foreign Study's Motion to Dismiss Amended Complaint (Doc. # 136). She recommended the Joint Motion by Certain Defendants to Dismiss the First Amended Complaint (Doc. # 135) be denied. (Doc. # 240 at 43.) Additionally, she recommended that the remaining motions (Doc. ## 127, 130, 131, and 136) should be granted in part and denied in part; specifically, that Plaintiffs' claim under the Utah Minimum Wage Act and Plaintiffs' claim for breach of contract should be dismissed,[1] but that Plaintiffs' remaining claims should proceed. (Id.)[2]

On March 14, 2016, Defendants filed two timely, consolidated objections to Judge Tafoya's [5] Recommendation; one relates to her recommendation regarding Plaintiffs' antitrust claims (Doc. # 248), and the other relates to her recommendation regarding Plaintiffs' remaining claims (Doc. # 247). Plaintiffs also filed a Response to Defendants' Objections. (Doc. # 256.)

The Recommendation is incorporated herein by reference. See [28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(B)]; [Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b)]. As such, the Recommendation's thorough recitation of the factual background of this case will be reiterated only to the extent necessary to resolve Defendants' objections.

II. ANALYSIS

A. Legal Standard

HN1[] When a magistrate judge issues a recommendation on a dispositive matter, [Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b)(3)] requires that the district judge "determine de novo any part of [*1071] the magistrate judge's [recommended]

[1] Plaintiffs did not object to this aspect of the Recommendation. (See Doc. # 256 at 1 n.1.)

[2] Judge Tafoya also ordered that certain motions to strike relating to the motions to dismiss — specifically, Defendant Cultural Care, Inc.'s Motion to Strike Material in Plaintiffs' Consolidated Opposition to Defendants' Motions to Dismiss (Doc. # 206) and Plaintiffs' Cross-Motion to Strike Certain Exhibits Submitted by the Defendants" (Doc. # 221) — were denied as moot. The parties did not object to this ruling. (See Doc. ## 247, 248, 256.)

disposition that has been properly objected to." In conducting its review, "[t]he district judge may accept, reject, or modify the recommended disposition; receive further evidence; or return the matter to the magistrate judge with instructions." Id.

B. Application

1. Plaintiffs' Sherman Act Claims

Plaintiffs sue fifteen so-called "Sponsor" organizations (Sponsors), a mix of for-profit and non-profit organizations that are formally designated by the U.S. Department of State (DOS) as the exclusive [6] entities permitted to recruit and place au pairs[3] with host families in the United States under the J-1 Visa program.[4] (Doc. # 110, ¶¶ 45-47, 72.) Judge Tafoya's Recommendation found that Plaintiffs' allegations were sufficient to state a claim for price fixing under Section 1 of the Sherman Act (Doc. # 240 at 13), which provides, in relevant part, that "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1 (Section 1).

Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint alleges that the Sponsors, who have "100% of the market power within the relevant market, including the power jointly to set au pair compensation below competitive and legal levels," have violated Section 1 by engaging in a conspiracy not to compete with one another with respect to au pair wages. (Doc. # 110, ¶¶ 2, 72.) In other words, Plaintiffs allege that the Sponsors have agreed among themselves to create an artificially low, anticompetitive "wage floor" for au pairs — that is, to "fix" the price of au pair wages. Plaintiffs allege that such an agreement is to the Sponsors' economic advantage, as wages are one of several components of the overall "price" of providing an au pair to a host family, and the Sponsors must compete both for au pairs and for host families. In particular, they allege that this so-called "wage-fixing" agreement benefits the Sponsors in at least two ways: first, it allows them to effectively increase the portion of the overall costs to host families [8] that are comprised of Sponsors' fees without increasing overall costs to host families for employing an au pair;[5] second, it allows the Sponsors to expand the number of potential host families they can attract (i.e., customers), by increasing the affordability of au pair child care child arrangements for host families vis-à-vis other kinds of child care arrangements. (Id., ¶ 132.) "Both of these results increase Sponsors' profits, at the expense of au pairs." (Id.)

As a preliminary matter, Defendants' objection to the legal standard employed by Judge Tafoya is without merit. Defendants [*1072] assert that Judge Tafoya erred because her Recommendation > failed to address the fact that Plaintiffs fail to allege facts in their Amended Complaint sufficient to exclude the possibility of independent action, even where parallel conduct is present, as required by *Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984) (cited by the Court in Twombly for that [9] proposition at 550 U.S. 544, 556, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929).

[3] Under the DOS' au pair program, young, foreign nationals (between the age of 18 and 26), with some secondary school education and English proficiency, are permitted to obtain a so-called "J-1" visa and stay in United States for one or two years. Au pairs live with an American host family, for whom they provide live-in child care services for 45 hours per week (as well as, in some cases, housekeeping and cooking). In exchange for these services, they are provided with, among other things, (1) a weekly stipend (which the Plaintiffs allege violates the FLSA's minimum wage and overtime regulations); and (2) up to $500 in an "education credit" to cover tuition [7] (per year). (Doc. # 101, ¶¶ 44, 99, 108.)

[4] The J-1 visa au pair program is one of several official J-1 visa "cultural exchange" programs overseen and administered by the DOS. (Doc. # 101, ¶ 43.)

[5] Sponsors generate revenue at least in part from "placement" or "program" fees paid by host families in order to participate in the au pair program. For example, Au Pair in America's website indicates that it charges a host family an annual $8,245 "Program Fee" plus a $400 "Match Fee." (Doc. # 101, ¶ 99.)

(Doc. # 238 at 8) (emphasis added). In making this argument, Defendants conflate the summary judgment standard (i.e., the standard applicable in Monsanto) and the motion to dismiss standard (i.e., the standard applicable here). As Plaintiffs explained long ago in their Response brief to Defendants' Consolidated Motion to Dismiss (Doc. # 199 at 18), in Monsanto, the United States Supreme Court held that, in order to survive a motion for a directed verdict (which is analogous to the standard applied to a summary judgment motion), "there must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility of independent action." Id. at 769. Obviously, Judge Tafoya's decision to apply the correct standard for the 12(b)(5) Motions before her, rather than the directed verdict/summary judgment standard, was not erroneous.[6]

In Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007), the seminal case outlining the pleading standard for Section 1 under the Sherman Act, plaintiffs brought [10] a class action suit against several telephone companies, alleging that the companies had conspired to stay in their own markets and to keep other companies out of those markets in violation of Section 1. The United States Supreme Court explained that HN2[] because Section 1 does not prohibit all unreasonable restraints of trade, but only those restraints "effected by a contract, combination, or conspiracy, the crucial question is whether the challenged anticompetitive conduct stems from independent decision or from an agreement." Id. at 553 (emphasis added). Accordingly, that Court held that, to survive a Motion to Dismiss, a complaint must present "enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made . . . [and] to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement." Id. at 556. An agreement, however, need not be in writing or be explicit, and may be established by either direct or circumstantial evidence. See id. at 553 (stating that the agreement may be "tacit or express"); Cayman Expl. Corp. v. United Gas Pipe Line Co., 873 F.2d 1357, 1361 (10th Cir. 1989) ("In the absence of an explicit agreement, conspiratorial conduct may be established by circumstantial evidence.").

HN3[] "Direct evidence [of] a Section 1 conspiracy must be evidence that is explicit and requires no [11] inferences to establish the proposition or conclusion being asserted." Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073, 1083 (10th Cir. 2006) (citing In re Baby Food Antitrust Litig., 166 F.3d 112, 118 (3d Cir. 1999)). However, because direct evidence of concerted action is "so rare," the antitrust law has "granted fact finders some latitude to find collusion or conspiracy from parallel conduct and inferences drawn from the circumstances." Oltz v. St. Peter's Cmty. Hosp., 861 F.2d 1440, 1450-51 (9th Cir. 1988). Specifically, if a complaint does not [*1073] contain direct evidence of an agreement, but instead makes only allegations of so-called "parallel conduct,"[7] e.g., allegations of similar pricing behavior, etc., such allegations "must be placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557. That is, the complaint must contain "allegations plausibly suggesting (not merely consistent with)

[6] Plaintiffs' assertion that Monsanto simply does not apply to this stage of the dispute is easily verifiable with a simple Westlaw or LexisNexis search. Thus, the Court is puzzled as to why this argument appeared yet again in Defendants' Objection to the Magistrate Judge's Recommendation.

[7] In White v. R.M. Packer Co., the First Circuit Court of Appeals provided the following helpful explanation of the difference between a tacit agreement, which is prohibited under the Sherman Act, and parallel conduct (otherwise known as "conscious parallelism"), which is not:

> Conscious parallelism is a phenomenon of oligopolistic markets in which firms "might in effect share monopoly power, setting their prices at a profit-maximizing, supracompetitive level by recognizing their shared economic interests and their interdependence with respect to price and output decisions." Each producer may independently decide that it can maximize its profits by matching one or more other producers' price, on the hope that the market will be able to maintain high prices if the producers do not undercut one another.
> A tacit agreement—one in which only the conspirators' actions, and not any express communications, indicate the existence of an agreement—is distinguished from mere conscious parallelism by "uniform behavior among competitors, [13] preceded by conversations implying that later uniformity might prove desirable or accompanied by other conduct that in context suggests that each competitor failed to make an independent decision."

635 F.3d 571, 575-76 (1st Cir. 2011) (citations omitted).

agreement." Id. (emphasis added); see also Mitchael v. Intracorp, Inc., 179 F.3d 847, 859 (10th Cir.1999) ("While consciously parallel behavior may contribute to a finding of antitrust conspiracy, it is insufficient, standing alone, to prove conspiracy"). In considering whether a Plaintiff has alleged sufficient circumstantial evidence of conspiracy, the Court considers the allegations as a whole. Evergreen Partnering Group, Inc. v. Pactiv Corp., 720 F.3d 33, 47 (1st Cir. 2013) ("While each of [the plaintiff's] allegations of circumstantial agreement standing [12] alone may not be sufficient to imply agreement, taken together, they provide a sufficient basis to plausibly contextualize the agreement necessary for pleading a [Section] 1 claim.")

At bottom, Defendants' Objection is rooted in the proposition that Judge Tafoya "stray[ed] from the law by failing to recognize the impermissibility of inferring anticompetitive conspiracy from parallel conduct where there is independent business rationale for the behavior." (Doc. # 248 at 2) (emphasis added). Defendants' argument, however, fails to properly consider Plaintiffs' allegations of a direct agreement, that is, the fact that Plaintiffs allege that there was more than mere parallel conduct indicative of an agreement among the Sponsors.

Although the Sponsors filed a Motion to Strike sections 90 through 94 of Plaintiffs' Complaint at an earlier juncture in this case — i.e., those sections of the Complaint in which Plaintiffs allege that several of the Sponsors' employees (the "Directors") explicitly admitted to Plaintiffs' investigator that the Sponsors had expressly agreed among themselves to keep au pair wages at the lowest possible level — Judge Tafoya denied their Motion and Defendants did [14] not appeal her ruling. (Doc. # 235.) As such, in resolving Defendants' Motions to Dismiss, Judge Tafoya properly considered these allegations and took them to be true, and this Court must do the same. Although Judge Tafoya did not discuss these allegations in great detail, the Court finds it worth doing so here, as they amount to what Judge Richard Posner has termed [*1074] the "the smoking gun in a price-fixing case" — namely, "direct evidence, . . . [in] the form of an admission by an employee of one of the conspirators, that officials of the defendants had met and agreed explicitly on the terms of a conspiracy to raise prices." See In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litig., 630 F.3d 622, 628 (7th Cir. 2010) (Posner, J.); see also Gen. Chemicals, Inc. v. Exxon Chem. Co., USA, 625 F.2d 1231, 1233 (5th Cir. 1980) (quotation omitted) (noting that "Rarely, if ever, can a plaintiff point to a 'smoking gun'" of "direct evidence of a specific agreement between defendants" in a Sherman Act case).

Specifically, in the instant case, Plaintiffs allege as follows:

> • In a telephone conversation on November 20, 2014, a representative of one Sponsor Defendant, with the title of "Director," admitted that there was an understanding between all of the Sponsors to pay standard au pairs the same amount. The sponsor explained that the government sets a minimum amount, [15] but that all of the Sponsors then agreed among themselves to pay exactly that minimum amount. This Sponsor thus characterized the "stipend paid to the au pairs" as a "fixed expense." The Sponsor explained that the stipend "is where pricing becomes standard across all agencies," and that "there is no difference in prices, as far as the stipend goes, between all of the agencies."
> • In a telephone conversation on November 21, 2014, a representative of another Sponsor, also with the title of "Director," admitted that all of the Sponsors agreed to set au pair wages at $195.75 per week. Specifically, the Sponsor acknowledged that each and every Sponsor got together and agreed to pay au pairs a stipend of no more than $195.75 a week. As the representative added, the Sponsors "all agreed to pay that amount, no more."
>
> • In yet another telephone conversation on November 21, 2014, a representative of yet another Sponsor, again with a "Director" title, explained why "the stipend is identical across all companies." The representative admitted that the Sponsors all agreed to pay that exact same minimum rate. As the Sponsor noted, "[e]verybody agrees" to pay au pairs no more than the minimum weekly wage.

(Doc. [16] # 101, ¶¶ 92-94) (emphasis added).

Defendants argue that the statements quoted above are not sufficiently specific to infer that there was an agreement among the Sponsors, because Plaintiffs (1) did not identify the specific individuals involved in the alleged agreement or the time or place where the agreement was made, and (2) provide "no information to suggest the individuals actually had authority to speak for one, much less all, of sponsor Defendants." (Doc. # 248 at 14).[8] [*1075] In support of this proposition, they cite a footnote from Twombly, in which the Supreme Court stated

> Apart from identifying a 7-year span in which the [Section] 1 violations were supposed to have occurred . . . the pleadings mentioned no specific time, place, or person involved in the alleged conspiracies . . . . [A] defendant seeking to respond to plaintiffs' conclusory allegations in the § 1 context would have little idea where to begin.

550 U.S. at 565 n. 10 (emphasis added). There are a variety of reasons why Twombly offers very little guidance in this case. First, the above-quoted allegations of direct evidence in the form of admissions by the Sponsors are well-plead, not "conclusory," because they supply "a factual narrative" supporting their [17] legal conclusions, in providing details like the specific dates of the admissions, that they were made by the Sponsor's employees, and exact quotes about the admissions themselves. See Arapahoe Surgery Ctr., LLC v. Cigna Healthcare, Inc., 80 F. Supp. 3d 1257, 1263-64 (D. Colo. 2015) (quoting Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 681, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (explaining that HN4[] "[a]llegations are deemed 'conclusory' where they state a legal conclusion without supplying a factual narrative for that conclusion, such that they 'amount to nothing more than a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a . . . claim.' For example, a conclusory allegation [of] a [Section] 1 claim would state little more than that the defendant joined a conspiracy to unreasonably restrain trade")). Additionally, Twombly offers no guidance regarding the specificity required in a well-pleaded allegation of an explicit/direct agreement, because plaintiffs' complaint in that case was based solely on circumstantial evidence of an agreement. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 564 (noting that "the complaint leaves no doubt that plaintiffs rest their [Section] 1 claim on descriptions of parallel conduct and not on any independent allegation of actual agreement"). However, a Tenth Circuit case — Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073, 1084 (10th Cir. 2006) — is particularly instructive in analyzing the instant case, which, as described above, involves well-plead allegations of a direct agreement along with allegations [18] of circumstantial evidence of such an agreement.

In Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073, 1084 (10th Cir. 2006), a smaller, newer entrant to the aluminum distribution business [19] brought suit under Section 1 against seven larger, more established aluminum distributors, alleging that those established distributors had agreed among themselves to exclude new competitors. The Tenth Circuit characterized the following statement as "weak" direct evidence in support of the plaintiff's Section 1 claim:

> [Wiley, an employee of an established aluminum distributor, said that he] felt . . . that himself and other potential customers [distributors] within the industry would find that Commonwealth [a mill] selling to Champagne [Metals] [a distributor], they — they would find that as, again, not in the best interest of the industry, and would cause other distributors in that area of the country to source their metals from other mill sources, and that by developing a relationship with Champagne Metals, we would be putting other business with potential customers [distributors] at risk.

Id. at 1083. The Tenth Circuit explained that this evidence was "direct" because it [*1076] was explicit — that is, the agent of the established distributor claimed that "'himself and other potential customers [distributors] . . . would cause other service centers [distributors] to remove their business from Commonwealth [a mill] if [20] [that mill] continued selling to Champagne Metals [a distributor]." Id. The court also specifically held that "viewed in the light

[8] Defendants also assert that the Directors' statements are analogous to the statements made by the former CEO of Qwest in Twombly, to the effect that encroaching on another defendant's territory "[m]ight be a good way to turn a quick dollar but that doesn't make it right." 550 U.S. at 568 n. 13. However, Twombly's pleading standard offers little guidance as to the necessary level of specificity in the pleading of an explicit agreement, and in any case, this citation is in no way supportive of Defendants' argument. Although Defendants assert that the Supreme Court held in Twombly that "a comment by the chief executive of one of the seven defendant entities [was] insufficient to adequately plead a plausible conspiracy" (Doc. # 238 at 11), in fact, the Supreme Court noted that the district court (correctly) did not consider the CEO's statements because "[t]his was only part of what he reportedly said," and after it took "notice of the full contents of the published articles referenced in the complaint, from which the truncated quotations were drawn," the full context effectively neutralized the statements. See 550 U.S. at 568 n. 13.

most favorable to [the distributor], this statement indicates an agreement . . . to take collective action." Id. (emphasis added). However, it also explained that this evidence, standing alone, was too weak to allow the distributor to withstand summary judgment, because, "[f]or example, [the statement] does not indicate which, if any, of the Established Distributors were among the 'other customers' which were part of the agreement." Id. at 1084 (emphasis added).

In the instant case, the statements of the Sponsors' Directors are, if anything, far more explicit about the existence of an agreement among "all" of the Sponsors than the statement involved in Champagne Metals. In Champagne Metals, the plaintiff sued his "day-to-day competitors," but did not sue not every distributor in the market (as such, there was some justifiable doubt about which, "if any" of the "customers" were included in the alleged agreement). Id. at 1077, 1084. In contrast, Plaintiffs have sued every single Sponsor in the relevant au pair market, and they also specifically allege that every single Sponsor was in agreement: [21] one Director admitted that "every Sponsor got together and agreed to pay au pairs a stipend of no more than $195.75 a week," and another admitted that "all [Sponsors] agreed to pay that amount, no more." (Doc. # 101, ¶¶ 92, 93) (emphasis added). Particularly when such statements are viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, they are certainly sufficient to indicate there may have been a direct agreement to take collective action among Defendant-Sponsors. See Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1083; see also Rossi v. Standard Roofing, Inc., 156 F.3d 452, 468-72 (3d Cir. 1998) (finding the plaintiff's testimony that he was told by one of his competitors that "if [he] went into business that [the competitor] and [another competitor] would do anything they could, stop supplies, cut the prices, whatever they had to do they were going to do to keep me out of business" to be direct evidence of concerted action).

At the same time, the Court does recognize that this evidence — at least as it is currently pled — is "weak" direct evidence, insofar as it does not provide critical details, such as the individuals with whom the investigator spoke, and whether such individuals (who allegedly identified themselves as "Directors") had the "authority to speak for one, much less all, of sponsor Defendants." [22] (Doc. # 248 at 14). Compare Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1084 (emphasis added) (stating that statement of employee of a distributor constituted "weak" direct evidence of agreement because, "[f]or example, [the statement] does not indicate which, if any, of the Established Distributors were among the 'other customers' which were part of the agreement."); Heartland Surgical Specialty Hosp., LLC v. Midwest Div., Inc., 527 F. Supp. 2d 1257, 1301 (D. Kan. 2007) (emphasis added) (citing Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1084, and characterizing testimony regarding an alleged agreement between managed care organizations as "weak" direct evidence because the testimony did not "identify who was included in the unwritten understanding amongst the 'managed care organizations'"). However, the relative weakness of Plaintiffs' allegation of direct evidence is not the end of the analysis; per Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1085, HN5[] a plaintiff can survive summary judgment if he or she presents a combination of direct evidence and circumstantial evidence positing an economically rational theory of an agreement; by [*1077] definition, then, such a plaintiff can withstand a 12(b)(6) Motion.[9] See Champagne Metals, 458 F.3d at 1085.[10]

In the instant case, in addition to providing evidence of a direct agreement among Sponsors, for purposes of withstanding a motion to dismiss, Plaintiffs also provide circumstantial evidence of an agreement that is at least as strong as that which was presented in Champagne Metals.[11] Specifically, in Champagne Metals, the Tenth Circuit

[9] This is because a plaintiff must withstand a relatively higher burden to survive a defendant's summary judgment motion than a motion to dismiss, especially in the antitrust context, which limits the range of permissible inferences [23] from ambiguous evidence. Specifically, "a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of [Section] 1 must present evidence 'that tends to exclude the possibility' that the alleged conspirators acted independently. . . . [I]n other words, [a plaintiff] must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed [plaintiff]." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 588, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986); accord Abraham v. Intermountain Health Care Inc., 461 F.3d 1249, 1262 (10th Cir. 2006).

[10] In Champagne Metals, the Tenth Circuit specifically reserved what it called the "more difficult question" of whether, on summary judgment, "when direct evidence has been introduced, we must still evaluate the economic rationality of the alleged conspiracy when considering the accompanying circumstantial evidence." 458 F.3d at 1085.

first noted that HN6[] "when a plaintiff makes out a case based only on circumstantial evidence," then "the more economically rational [24] a conspiracy is in a given situation, the broader the range of inferences that can be drawn from the evidence" at summary judgment. Id. at 1084 (emphasis added). The court then found that the plaintiff's theory that established distributors "acted together to attempt to keep a new, aggressive entrant out of the market" was economically rational based on fears of new competitors eroding profit margins or fears of losing market share. Id. at 1084-86. Similarly, here, Judge Tafoya determined that Plaintiffs' circumstantial evidence presented sufficient circumstantial evidence of a viable economic theory of collusion,[12] citing the following allegations:

(1) At least one Sponsor, Cultural Care, has informed prospective au pairs, in writing, that the weekly stipend arranged by Cultural Care would be "the same regardless of which au pair agency you use." (Am. Comp. at 20; Resp. at 14);

(2) Sponsors informed au pairs and host families that $195.75/week plus room and board is the only permitted compensation for au pairs (Am. Comp. at 73-74, 76-77);

(3) As the exclusive entities authorized to recruit, provide training, place and supervise au pairs with host families in the United States, Defendants control au pair opportunities within the United States (Am. Comp. at 10-11, Resp. at 14);

(4) The [25] Sponsors' industry structure facilitates collusion as they are a relatively small group, 15 agencies, with 100% market share (Am. Comp. at 32);

[*1078] (5) In addition to industry structure, many Sponsors are members of the Alliance for International Education and Cultural Exchange and the International Au Pair Association ("IAPA"), individuals from certain Sponsors sit on IAPA's Board, and the featured speaker at a recent IAPA conference published an article arguing for strict maintenance of the fixed $195.75 weekly wage for standard au pairs, stating that "host families do each other a disservice when they start to compete with each other (or try to stand out as a 'better family') by offering more pocket money. We don't want au pairs shopping for a higher stipend." (Am. Comp. at 30-31);

(6) The Sponsors uniformly advertise au pair wages at an identical amount even though the federal government does not require that au pairs only receive minimum wage (Am. Comp. at 13-15, 20, 22-29; Resp. at 15, see also supra);[13]

(7) There are no adjustments to advertised compensation with relation to geographic differences, varying state laws and/or the number of children in the home (Am. Comp. at 29-30; Resp. at 15);

---

[11] In stating this conclusion, the Court emphasizes that it is not finding that Plaintiffs have, in fact, presented sufficient evidence to withstand summary [27] judgment (nor could it do so at this juncture); for example, for whatever reason, Plaintiffs may ultimately fail to uncover evidence in discovery to shore up their allegations of a direct agreement, in which case the summary judgment calculus could shift significantly.

[12] Specifically, Judge Tafoya found that "[t]he Amended Complaint alleges a mixture of 'parallel behaviors, details of industry structure, and industry practices, that facilitate collusion.'" (Doc. # 240 at 13) (quoting In re Text Messaging Litig., 630 F.3d 622, 627 (7th Cir. 2010)).

[13] With regard to this allegation, Defendants assert that Magistrate Judge Tafoya's Recommendation "disregard[ed] the admission that over a third of the Defendant sponsors advertised stipends above $195.75" for so-called non-standard au pairs (i.e., au pairs with additional training and education in child care), asserting that this amounts to the Court "ignor[ing] inconvenient evidence." (Doc. # 247 at 3-4.) To the contrary, Magistrate Judge Tafoya's Recommendation addressed this evidence, and she specifically explained that she considered this argument to be "disingenuous" because Plaintiffs, and those they seek to represent in a class action, are "standard" au pairs, and "[t]he only instance in which Defendants advertise a higher compensation [28] rate is for non-standard positions. . . . [T]herefore, the only issues relevant to the current inquiry[] pertain to Defendants' practices with regard to standard au pairs." (Doc. # 220 at 14.)

(8) By depressing wages for au pair services, the Sponsors reap artificially [26] high profits because if the host family's direct cost for an au pair does not increase, then any increase, while still costing the family less than a full-time nanny on the open market, goes to the Sponsor in the form of fees, and keeping the cost down will theoretically increase the number of potential host families (Am. Comp. at 32);
. . . [and][14]

(10) Defendants advertise that their labor costs are set lower than the cost of a comparable child-care worker in the free market. (Am. Comp. at 5, 54, 55; Resp. at 23-24.) Plaintiffs also contend that in a competitive marketplace, at least some Defendants would either offer higher salaries to potential au pairs, thereby attracting more and higher quality au pairs and charging higher fees to families, or the Sponsors might have to compete with agencies that place other domestic workers, such as nannies, or react to market forces, including location or higher salaries based on unique childcare responsibilities, such as the number of children. (Resp. at 23.) None of these natural consequences have occurred.

(Doc. # 240 at 11-12.)

Thus, although Defendants' Objection asserts that Judge Tafoya mis-applied Twombly and improperly disregarded the "common-sense and independent business rationale[s]" for Plaintiffs' allegations of circumstantial evidence, unlike Twombly, Plaintiffs' complaint does not rely exclusively on parallel conduct, but contains well-pled allegations of a direct agreement among the Sponsors as well circumstantial evidence to establish a setting that would [*1079] make such an agreement plausible. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557. Because HN7[] the Court must take Plaintiffs' factual allegations as true, consider them as a whole, and view them in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs in evaluating a motion to dismiss, the Court finds Defendants' arguments unpersuasive at this stage, particularly in light of Plaintiffs' well-plead allegations of direct agreement. See Arapahoe Surgery Ctr., LLC v. Cigna Healthcare, Inc., 80 F. Supp. 3d 1257, 1265 (D. Colo. 2015) (citing [29] Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556) (noting that a defendant's arguments about an alleged conspiracy's remote plausibility "suggest that the alleged conspiracy is less likely," but because the plaintiffs sufficiently pled an overt agreement, such arguments "do not render Plaintiffs' allegations implausible, and thus do not mandate dismissal"); Heartland Surgical Specialty Hosp., LLC v. Midwest Div., Inc., 527 F. Supp. 2d 1257, 1309 (D. Kan. 2007) (citing Champagne Metals and finding that plaintiff's "weak" direct evidence plus circumstantial evidence outlining a plausible economic theory were sufficient to survive summary judgment).

For the foregoing reasons, the Court determines that, although Judge Tafoya did not apply the framework from Champagne Metals, she still correctly concluded that Plaintiffs have adequately stated a Section 1 Claim; accordingly, this claim remains.

2. Defendants' Status as "Joint Employers" of Plaintiffs

In her Recommendation, Judge Tafoya applied the Tenth Circuit's "economic realities" test[15] to Plaintiffs' allegations and determined that Plaintiffs stated a plausible claim that the Sponsors are "joint employers" of au pairs (along with the au pairs' host families). (Doc. # 240 at 23.) Specifically, she noted that Plaintiffs make the following allegations: (1) the Sponsors recruit, interview, and hire [30] au pairs for host families; (2) the Sponsors

---

[14] Item number nine in Judge Tafoya's list was Plaintiffs' allegation that three of the Sponsors expressly admitted that they had agreed to keep au pair wages at $195.75 per week. (Doc. # 240 at 12.)

[15] This test "includes inquiries into whether the alleged employer has the power to hire and fire employees, supervises and controls employee work schedules or conditions of employment, determines the rate and method of payment, and maintains employment records." Baker v. Flint Eng'g & Constr. Co., 137 F.3d 1436, 1439 (10th Cir. 1998) (citing Watson v. Graves, 909 F.2d 1549, 1553 (5th Cir.1990)). In applying the economic realities test, courts consider the following factors: "(1) the degree of control exerted by the alleged employer over the worker; (2) the worker's opportunity for profit or loss; (3) the worker's investment in the business; (4) the permanence of the working relationship; (5) the degree of skill required to perform the work; and (6) the extent to which the work is an integral part of the alleged employer's business." Baker, 137 F.3d at 1440.

effectively dictate au pair wages (as described in their antitrust allegations); (3) the Sponsors have a statutory obligation to ensure that au pairs are paid a stipend, do not provide more than 10 hours of child care per day or 45 hours of child care in any week, receive a minimum of one and one-half days off per week in addition to one complete weekend off each month, and receive two weeks of paid vacation; (4) the Sponsors exert control over au pair working conditions, including providing au pairs with training, visiting au pairs on a monthly basis (and twice-monthly visits in the first two months of au pair placement), making quarterly contact with host families, and even providing specific employment tasks;[16] (4) the Sponsors act as [*1080] the final arbiters of any disputes between au pairs and host families regarding wages and hours; (5) the Sponsors can terminate au pairs without the consent of the host family and cause their removal from the United States,[17] and a host family cannot terminate an au pair without approval from the Sponsor; (6) the Sponsors draft the contracts governing the relationships between au pairs and their host families; [31] and (7) the Sponsors provide au pairs with health insurance. (Doc. # 240 at 18-23.) She also noted that, "as 'a general rule, determining whether an entity qualifies as an employer is HN8[] a fact issue for the jury.'" (Id. at 17, 18) (citing Bristol v. Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs of Clear Creek, 312 F.3d 1213, 1221 (10th Cir. 2012)).

Defendants contend that Judge Tafoya erred because she essentially "confuse[d] the host family's status as employer of an au pair with the sponsor's role as a visa sponsor," citing to federal regulations that generally describe the au pair program as an "exchange program," rather than an employment program. (Doc. # 247 at 7.) That the au pair program has been generally described an "exchange [33] program" is in no way probative of the Sponsors' status as a joint employer. Indeed, the doctrine of "joint employment" exists to recognize that an apparently-independent entity can still "employ" an individual for purposes of the FLSA, and Defendants point to no legal authority, either from the joint employment case law or otherwise, indicating that a "visa sponsor" cannot be considered a joint employer. The Court also determines that Judge Tafoya properly distinguished Ivanov v. Sunset Pools Mgmt., Inc., 567 F. Supp. 2d 189 (D.D.C. 2008). As such, the Court adopts this aspect of her Recommendation.

3. Plaintiffs' FLSA Claims

Plaintiffs' FLSA claims are based upon four purported violations of the FLSA: (1) the Sponsors' failure to pay them minimum wage; (2) the Sponsors' failure to compensate them for their mandatory week-long training; (3) the Sponsors' unlawful deduction of room and board from their compensation (including but not limited to during vacations when they are not provided room and board), and (4) the Sponsors' failure to pay them overtime compensation when they worked in excess of 40 hours per week.[18]

a. Whether the FLSA Applies to Plaintiffs' Wage Claims

[16] Indeed, Defendant Go Au Pair's contract with its au pairs sets out an au pair's daily employment responsibilities, including "daily maintenance of the children, including meal preparation, doing the children's laundry, transporting the children to various activities, [32] assisting with homework, playing, teaching and caring for the children. [] Minor housekeeping, including but not limited to, washing the children's dishes, tidying up the children's rooms and making their beds, vacuuming and dusting the children's rooms and cleaning their bathrooms. [] pick up after the children in any room in which they have played." (Doc. # 101 at 66-67.)

[17] Defendant Cultural Care's employment contract provides that the au pair must agree that Cultural Care (not the host family) will terminate the au pair if it determines that her emotional or physical state makes her unsuitable for providing childcare, if she gets married or pregnant, engages in behavior Cultural Care determines to be unsuitable, or Cultural Care deems her performance unsatisfactory "for whatever reason." (Doc. # 101 at 63.)

[18] As Magistrate Judge Tafoya noted, "Defendants do not request dismissal of Plaintiffs' FLSA claims based upon Defendants' failure to pay them [34] for the one-week mandatory training, nor Plaintiffs' claims that room and board is unlawfully deducted from their weekly stipends during vacations." (Doc. # 240 at 16, n. 7.)

The Sponsors' objections to Judge Tafoya's Recommendation are that:

1. Au pair wages have never been governed by the FLSA, but rather, by a so-called separate "DOS formula" - a term of their own invention - that purportedly "governs calculations of the weekly stipend." (Doc. # 247 at 2.)

2. "Nothing in the language of the 1997 regulation or the accompanying commentary [*1081] reflects any intent to depart from th[e] 1995 [DOS] formula." (Id. at 4).

3. A DOS Notice issued to Sponsors in 2007, for example, is an indication that the FLSA does not apply to Plaintiffs' claims, because the DOS issued such notices after 1997 that purportedly continued to use "the stipend formula adopted in 1995 to calculate the weekly stipend." (Id. at 5).

Specifically, the Sponsors point to the fact the DOS' predecessor, the United States Information Agency (USIA), promulgated an interim rule in 1995 providing that au pairs should receive a weekly stipend of "not less than $115 per week," which was calculated by [35] multiplying the federal minimum wage rate at that time by 45 hours (i.e., the maximum number of hours an au pair could work under the regulations) and subtracting $36 per week for room and board. See 60 Fed. Reg. 8547-02 at 8443. In 1997, however, the USIA implemented amended regulations, which contain no mention of a "formula," much less a stipend of "not less than $115 per week." See 62 Fed. Reg. 34632 (June 27, 1997). The amended regulations, however, specifically provided that the Sponsors "shall require that au pair participants" are "compensated at a weekly rate based upon 45 hours per week and paid in conformance with the requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act as interpreted and implemented by the United States Department of Labor." Id. at 34634 (codified at 22 C.F.R. § 62.31(j)(1)). Additionally, the interim final rule specifically explained that such a change was necessary because "[t]he United States Department of Labor has determined that au pair participants are covered under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and therefore must receive federal minimum wage. The [USIA] is amending this regulation to ensure that there is no future confusion regarding the payment of minimum wage." 62 Fed. Reg. 34632, 34633.

Accordingly, both the plain language of the regulation (explicitly requiring [36] au pairs to be "paid in conformance with" the requirements of the FLSA, "as interpreted and implemented by the United States Department of Labor" - not "as interpreted and implemented by" the DOS), as well as the DOL's explanation for the change ("to ensure that there is no future confusion regarding payment of the minimum wage), belies both of the Sponsors' assertions that (1) "[t]he 1997 stipend provision simply codifies the [prior DOS] formula on which the previous fixed-sum stipend of $115 was based, while referencing the FLSA in a way that incorporates adjustments in the [wage] rate" and (2) "Nothing in the language of the 1997 regulation or the accompanying commentary reflects any intent to depart from th[e] 1995 formula." (See Doc. # 247 at 4).

Although the Sponsors acknowledge the 1997 amendment to the au pair regulations as well as the amendment's explanatory language (that au pairs are "covered under the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act" and that the amendment was necessary to "ensure that there is no future confusion regarding the payment of minimum wage"), they conclusorily characterize this language as simply "repeat[ing] [the] conclusions that USIA reached in 1995." (Doc. # 247 at [37] 4.) In 1995, however, the USIA did not opine broadly regarding whether au pairs should be "paid in conformance with the requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act as interpreted and implemented by the United States Department of Labor," but rather, concluded that au pairs were "employees" of host families. See 60 Fed. Reg. at 8550-51 (noting that "the Agency has been obligated to examine the question of whether au pairs are employees [of host families] subject to [*1082] the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. . . . The Department of Labor has specifically advised the Agency that an employment relationship is established").

Moreover, with regard to the DOS' conduct in continuing to issue Notices to Sponsors, the Sponsors have cited no legal authority for the notion that the conduct of an agency like the DOS can somehow trump the plain language of a regulation. Regardless, these Notices in no way support Defendants' theory that an entirely separate, DOS regime governs au pair wages. Rather, the 2007 Notice simply advises "[a]ll Au Pair sponsors" of an increase to the federal minimum wage, correctly notes that "[t]he weekly stipends for the standard Au Pair Program and EduCare Program are directly connected to the [38] federal minimum wage," and indicates that au pair stipends, given this increase in the minimum wage, will be $195.75 per week as of July 24, 2009. (Doc. # 127-1 at 2) (emphasis added).[19] As such, the Court agrees with Judge Tafoya's conclusion that the FLSA applies to Plaintiffs' claims.

b. Whether Sponsors May Lawfully Deduct Room and [39] Board

The Sponsors first argue that the Recommendation's determination that the Sponsors may not deduct the costs for room and board against au pairs' wages is erroneous because it is "premised on the incorrect conclusion that the FLSA, rather than the DOS's stipend formula, governs credit of the stipend." (Doc. # 247 at 6.) This argument necessarily fails because, as discussed above, the Court believes that the FLSA does, in fact, apply to Plaintiffs' claims here.

Judge Tafoya's Recommendation also noted that HN9[] pursuant to 29 C.F.R. § 531.27(a), an employer may include the reasonable cost or fair value of furnishing an employee board, lodging or other facilities in the employee's wages. However, pursuant to 29 C.F.R. § 531.30,[20] an employer may not credit the cost of facilities toward an employee's wages if the employer is required by law to provide the same. 22 C.F.R. § 62.31(e)(6) provides that "Sponsors shall secure . . . a host family placement for each participant. Sponsors shall not . . . place the au pair with a family who cannot provide the au pair with a suitable private bedroom.'" Additionally, the DOL issued a Wage and Hour Opinion Letter in 1997, cited by Judge Tafoya, stating that with regard to the hiring of an employee on an au pair [40] visa, "an employer may not take credit for facilities which the employer is required by law or regulation to provide," and specifically noting that a host family could not deduct the use of the family automobile to meet the minimum wage requirement. 1997 WL 998029. Judge [*1083] Tafoya concluded that the Sponsors and host families were accordingly prohibited from deducting the cost of room and board because

> There is no question that pursuant to 22 C.F.R. § 62.31(e)(6) host families are required to provide room and board to their au pairs. Defendants do not cite to any FLSA provision providing an exception from 29 C.F.R. § 531.30's requirement for the au pair program that otherwise prohibits an employer from crediting the cost of room and board from an employee's wages if the employer is required by law to provide the same.

(Doc. # 240 at 25.)

Defendants' Objection obliquely [41] addresses Judge Tafoya's argument about Defendant's failure to cite an exception to 29 C.F.R. § 531.30, in citing generalized language about the benefits to the au pair from the immersion of the home life of the host family, and asserting that "provision of room and board, thus, benefits both the host family and the au pair." (Doc. # 247 at 7.) The Sponsors also (unironically) cite another regulation interpreting the FLSA, which provides that acceptance of lodging must be "voluntary and uncoerced," but that "[i]n the case of lodging furnished to live-in domestic service employees, the Administrator will accept a credit taken by the employer of up to seven and one-half times the statutory minimum hourly wage for each week lodging is furnished." 29 C.F.R. § 552.100(a), (c). These arguments represent, at best, red herrings, as neither the statutory provisions cited nor the Sponsors' generalized assertions that au pairs also benefit from housing trump the far more specific provision at 29 C.F.R. § 531.30, nor do they indicate, in any way, that the au pair program is exempt from 29 C.F.R. § 531.30.

[19] Defendants' arguments that the terms of the so-called "DOS formula" are "irreconcilable" with the FLSA are also unavailing. (Doc. # 187 at 3.) Specifically, the Sponsors note that the FLSA has no cap on weekly hours, but that au pairs are only permitted to work 45 hours a week; this presents no conflict whatsoever, and simply indicates that the au pair regulations are more restrictive in terms of work hours than the FLSA - not that the FLSA does not apply. They also cite a 1997 Opinion Letter issued by the DOL, in which it stated that it did not have the authority to lower the amount of the stipend if an au pair works fewer than 45 hours. Again, this says nothing about whether the au pair stipend must conform with the FLSA generally, because paying an au pair for 45 hours of week when that au pair actually worked fewer hours would result in a higher wage.

[20] 29 C.F.R. § 531.30 provides that "The reasonable cost of board, lodging, or other facilities may be considered as part of the wage paid an employee only where customarily 'furnished' to the employee. Not only must the employee receive the benefits of the facility for which he is charged, but it is essential that his [or her] acceptance of the facility be voluntary and uncoerced." (Emphasis added).

Accordingly, Judge Tafoya did not err in determining that Plaintiffs have stated a plausible claim that the Sponsors' unlawfully deducted the cost of room and board from their [42] wages.

c. Whether Sponsors Must Pay Overtime Compensation Under the FLSA

Defendants' Objections did not challenge Judge Tafoya's analysis regarding Plaintiffs' entitlement to federal overtime provisions. (See Doc. # 247.) Nevertheless, the Court agrees with Judge Tafoya's conclusion that Plaintiffs have stated a viable claim for overtime for any work performed after January 1, 2015, due to a new DOL regulation, recently upheld by the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals,[21] providing that HN10[] "[T]hird party employers of employees engaged in live-in domestic service employment [] may not avail themselves of the overtime exemption provided by [29 U.S.C. § 213(b)(21)], even if the employee is jointly employed by the individual or member of the family or household using the services." 29 C.F.R. § 552.109(c).

4. Plaintiffs' State Wage Law Claims

a. Preemption

Defendants assert that Plaintiffs' state wage law claims are preempted by virtue of the "regulatory framework designed by USIA, which embodies the government's policy judgments regarding au pair compensation. USIA expressly recognized 'the programmatic need for a uniform wage' and adopted a compensation structure that would 'ensure that all au pair participants receive uniform wage compensation' [43] . . . Application of state minimum wage laws presents an obstacle to the accomplishment of this objective because it eliminates any uniformity in the wage calculation," as some states have [*1084] higher minimum wages than those required by the FLSA. (Doc. # 247 at 10) (citing 60 Fed. Reg. at 8551; 49 Fed. Reg. at 64298.) The Sponsors also assert that the "regulatory framework" establishing a uniform wage "reflects a careful balance of policy objectives concerning the government's interest in furthering cultural exchange, affording adequate protection to au pair participants and their American host programs, and safeguarding the continuing viability of au pair program." (Id. at 9-10.) Although Defendants have slightly recast their arguments from those that appeared before Judge Tafoya (which focused on the immigration aspects of the au pair program),[22] the Court nevertheless agrees that Judge Tafoya properly decided that state wage laws are not preempted. First, as has already been discussed, the regulations implemented by the USIA expressly provided that the au pair program must conform with the FLSA, without exception; the FLSA, in turn, explicitly provides that, HN11[] if a state sets a higher minimum wage than that mandated by the FLSA, employees [44] within that state are entitled to receive that higher wage. See 22 C.F.R. § 62.31(j)(1); 29 U.S.C. § 218(a). Additionally, the Court agrees with Judge Tafoya's analysis of the Sponsors' arguments regarding uniformity in wage calculation:

> Defendants cite to 60 Fed. Reg. 8547 (1995) as indicating that the federal government "identified a programmatic need for a uniform wage." Defendants' characterization of this statement is misleading. In the Supplementary Information section preceding the Final Rule, the USIA discussed the appropriate amount of credit a host family could use with regard to the room and board provided to an au pair and considered the options of crediting actual cost or a fixed cost. Id. at 8551. The USIA weighed the preference for crediting actual cost against the need for the credit to be uniform so that host families would not have to maintain individualized records. Id.

[21] Home Care Ass'n of Am. v. Weil, 799 F.3d 1084 (D.C. Cir. 2015).

[22] To the extent that the Sponsors are presenting "new" arguments before the Court in their Objection, "issues raised for the first time in objections to the magistrate judge's recommendation are deemed [45] waived." Marshall v. Chater, 75 F.3d 1421, 1426 (10th Cir. 1996).

(Doc. # 240 at 30-31 n. 10.) Accordingly, the Court agrees that Plaintiffs' claims under state wage laws are not, in fact, preempted by some kind of amorphous "federal framework."

b. Plaintiffs' Claims Under Colorado Minimum Wage Law

Colorado Minimum Wage Order Number 31 provides that "domestic employees employed by households or family members to perform duties in private residences," are not entitled to overtime compensation under Colorado state law ("Domestic Employee Exemption"). 7 Colo. Code Regs. § 1103-1:5. The "preamble" to the Minimum Wage Order, however, provides as follows:

> [I]f either of the following two situations applies to an employee, then the employee is entitled to the $8.31 state minimum wage . . .
> [1] The employee is covered by the minimum wage provisions of Colorado Minimum Wage Order Number 32.2.
> [2] The employee is covered by the minimum wage provisions of the *Fair Labor Standards Act.
> Some restrictions and exemptions may apply; contact the Colorado Division of Labor for additional information.

7 Colo. Code Regs. § T.1100 (emphasis added). Noting that au pairs are covered by the FLSA's minimum wage provisions, [*1085] see 22 C.F.R. § 62.31(j)(1), Judge Tafoya concluded that Plaintiffs fall within the second of the two categories enumerated above, and thus, that the Domestic Employees Exemption did not apply. (Doc. # 240 at 33.) Defendants, however, note that the last sentence of the preamble states [46] that "[s]ome restrictions and exemptions may apply." (Doc. # 247 at 11) (emphasis added). Judge Tafoya apparently did not consider this language, and the existing briefing on this matter does not allow the Court to make a determination at this juncture as to whether au pairs do, in fact, qualify for the Domestic Employees Exemption. Accordingly, the Court neither adopts nor rejects Judge Tafoya's determination on this issue, and Defendants' Motion to Dismiss is denied without prejudice with respect to Plaintiffs' wage claims under Colorado state law.

c. Plaintiffs' Claims Under New York Minimum Wage Law

Defendants merely reiterate their arguments about how a "Fact Sheet for Employers," disseminated by the New York Department of Labor, indicated that au pairs are exempted from New York state labor law coverage. Specifically, that "Fact Sheet" stated that that New York State labor laws "cover ALL workers. Their Immigration status does not matter," but that there was one exception, namely, "au pairs hired through the federal au pair program and admitted into he United States under a J-1 visa . . . [who] are subject to special federal rules." (Doc. # 127-4 at 4; Doc. # 247 at 12.) Judge Tafoya's [47] analysis on this point is well-taken:

> The Fact Sheet upon which Defendants rely does not cite to any state law that exempts au pairs from minimum wage and/or overtime exemptions, nor do Defendants. The Fact Sheet is most analogous to an opinion letter and therefore, may be entitled to a certain amount of deference with regard to the interpretation of New York's wage and hour laws, but it does not displace or supersede a court's own interpretation and judgment. *See Salazar v. Butterball, LLC, No. 08-cv-02071-MSK-CBS, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125989, 2009 WL 6048979, at 8 (D. Colo. Dec. 3, 2009) (finding that [DOL's] opinion letters are entitled to deference, but the level of deference accorded depends upon the "thoroughness evident in its consideration, the validity of its reasoning, its consistency with earlier and later pronouncements, and all those factors which give it power to persuade, if lacking power to control.") (citing McGraw v. Barnhart, 450 F.3d 493, 501 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Under Skidmore, the degree of deference given informal agency interpretations will vary with circumstances, and courts have looked to the degree of the agency's care, its consistency, formality, and relative expertness, and to the persuasiveness of the agency's position.")). While the New York DOL's opinion with regard to whether its state [48] labor laws applies to au pairs may be persuasive depending upon the above mentioned factors, it is not determinative of whether Plaintiffs have stated a viable claim. As that is the only authority upon which Defendants have relied, the court finds their request for dismissal should be denied.

(Doc. # 240 at 33-34.) Accordingly, the Court will adopt the Recommendation with respect to New York wage laws.[23]

5. Plaintiffs' Fraud Claims

Defendants claim that Plaintiffs fail to plead fraud with the particularity [*1086] required by Rule 9(b) of the Colorado Rules of Civil Procedure, in alleging that the Sponsors falsely informed them, other au pairs, and host families that $195.75 was a "set" or "fixed" salary and that they could not receive higher wages. Specifically, they assert that Judge Tafoya "simply concluded" that Plaintiffs met their burden "without analysis." (Doc. # 247 at 13.) To the contrary, Judge Tafoya specifically noted that Plaintiffs provided the following specific examples of fraudulent statements,[24] including the fact that > Plaintiffs [49] . . . allege that through a blog entry on its website, Defendant InterExchange informed au pairs that if they received offers for higher salaries, they should consider such offers bogus and/or the product of a scam. . . . Defendant InterExchange informed au pairs through another blog post that the salary of $195.75 per week was the product of a "strict equation." Plaintiffs allege that Defendant AIFS has informed au pairs that if they received more than $195.75/week, they could be subject to deportation and that its website listed the weekly stipend as simply $195.75 and instructed host families that they "needed to 'pay th[at] published fee.'" Similarly, Plaintiffs allege that Defendant American Cultural Exchange LLC d/b/a GoAuPair created a handbook entitled, "GoAuPair Au Pair Household Handbook," that instructs GoAuPair host families that au pair wages are set by the federal government at $195.75. . . . Finally, Defendant Cultural Care again argues (alone) that the $195.75 is the maximum amount au pairs are permitted to receive. As an alternative argument, it argues that if its position in that regard is inaccurate, "Plaintiffs have failed to plead facts sufficient to show that Cultural [50] Care was aware of this . . . . and therefore acted to mislead au pairs." The fact that $195.75/week does not represent a fixed wage is well established. With regard to its alternative argument, Defendant Cultural Care has essentially conceded they informed au pairs that $195.75 was a fixed rate, which aligns with Plaintiffs' allegations.

(Doc. # 240 at 36-37) (internal citations omitted, emphasis added). The Court agrees with Judge Tafoya that these allegations are sufficient to satisfy Rule 9(b). Additionally, even though Defendants' objection to Judge Tafoya's analysis of Plaintiffs' fraud claims was limited to the claims' purported lack of particularity, the Court notes that it is undisputed that the $195.75 represented, at best, a "wage floor," such that families could pay au pairs more if they wished[25] - but Plaintiffs' allegations indicate that the Sponsors led both au pairs and host families to believe otherwise. As such, Plaintiffs' fraud claims will not be dismissed.

6. Plaintiffs' Fiduciary Duty Claims

The Sponsors' arguments regarding Magistrate Judge Tafoya's conclusions about Plaintiffs' fiduciary duty claim are [*1087] cursory, conclusory, and difficult to follow, but as far as the Court can surmise from an examination of the

---

[23] The Sponsors did not object to Judge Tafoya's recommendations regarding the applicability of the state wage laws of Pennsylvania or California. (See Doc. # 47.)

[24] The Sponsors note that Judge Tafoya improperly referenced Plaintiffs' assertion, made in their Response to Defendants' Motion to Dismiss, that Defendant InterExchange's website informed au pairs that they can make "almost [51] $10,000 per year," in considering whether Plaintiffs pled their fraud allegations with sufficient particularity, as this allegation did not appear in Plaintiff's Complaint. (Doc. # 247 at 14 n. 5.) The Court reviewed the Complaint and determined that this allegation was not, in fact, included (see Doc. # 101); as such, the Court did not consider that particular assertion here.

[25] Of course, Plaintiffs also allege that the Sponsors should have ensured the host families did, in fact, pay more than $195.75 per week, because they allege that the au pairs were entitled to additional wages under the FLSA and/or state wage law.

Defendants' Motions to Dismiss, the Sponsors apparently are attempting to argue that Judge Tafoya erred in finding that Plaintiffs stated a plausible claim for breach of fiduciary duty because she entirely "failed to address" issues relating to contracts between the au pairs and the Sponsors and how such contracts [52] essentially preclude a fiduciary duty claim. (Doc. # 147 at 14.) In fact, she discussed these issues in depth, including an extensive analysis of DerKevorkian v. Lionbridge Techs., Inc., 316 F. App'x 727 (10th Cir. 2008), a case which specifically addressed a breach of fiduciary duty under Colorado law in the context of an employment contract and employer-employee relationship, and noted that HN12[] "[a] confidential relationship exists when one party justifiably reposes confidence in another such that the parties drop their guard and assume that each side is acting fairly. Colorado does not recognize a separate tort founded upon breach of a confidential relationship. However, a confidential relationship may serve as an indication of fiduciary status." Id. at 737.

Defendants ignore Judge Tafoya's treatment of DerKevorkian, much less attempt to distinguish it, and the Court agrees with her conclusion that, taking Plaintiffs' allegations as true, they present "a stronger basis to find a confidential relationship than that described in DerKevorkian." (Doc. # 240 at 40.) As such, the Court agrees with Judge Tafoya's analysis and adopts her Recommendation as to Plaintiffs' Fiduciary Duty Claims.

7. Plaintiffs' Quasi-Contract and Unjust Enrichment Claims

Finally, Defendants note [53] that the Recommendation properly dismissed Plaintiffs' breach of contract claim because "Plaintiffs do not allege that Defendants violated a provision within their respective contracts with the au pairs." (Doc. # 240 at 41-42.) Nevertheless, they object that she did not also dismiss Plaintiffs' quasi-contract or unjust enrichment claims. (Doc. # 247 at 15.) However, she correctly noted that "Defendants have not requested dismissal" of either of those claims in any of their Motions to Dismiss, and Defendants do not disagree with this conclusion. (Id. at 42.) HN13[] "Issues raised for the first time in objections to the magistrate judge's recommendation are deemed waived." Marshall v. Chater, 75 F.3d 1421, 1426 (10th Cir. 1996). Accordingly, both of these claims will stand.

III. CONCLUSION

The Court has conducted a full de novo review of this matter, including reviewing all relevant pleadings, the Recommendation, Defendants' Objections thereto, and the Plaintiffs' Response to Defendants' Objections. Based on this de novo review, the Court concludes that Judge Tafoya's thorough and thoughtful Recommendation is correct and is not called into question by Defendants' Objections, except as discussed above.

Accordingly, it is hereby ORDERED that Defendants' Objections [54] (Doc. ## 247, 248) are OVERRULED IN PART. It is

FURTHER ORDERED that the Recommendation of United States Magistrate Judge Kathleen Tafoya (Doc. # 240) is ACCEPTED IN PART AND REJECTED IN PART; specifically, the Court adopts Judge Tafoya's conclusions regarding the dismissal of Plaintiffs' claim under the Utah Minimum Wage Act and Plaintiffs' claim for breach of contract; neither accepts nor rejects Judge Tafoya's conclusions regarding Plaintiffs' Colorado wage claim; and adopts her conclusions regarding the remainder of Plaintiffs' claims. Accordingly, it is

FURTHER ORDERED that Defendants' Motions to Dismiss (Doc. ## 127, [*1088] 130, 131, and 136) are GRANTED IN PART (with respect to Plaintiffs' claim under the Utah Minimum Wage Act and Plaintiffs' claim for breach of contract), denied without prejudice with respect to the Colorado wage claim, and denied as to the remainder. It is

FURTHER ORDERED that the Joint Motion by Certain Defendants to Dismiss the First Amended Complaint (Doc. # 135) is DENIED in its entirety. Finally, it is FURTHER ORDERED that Defendants' Unopposed Motion for Oral Argument Regarding Recommendation of United States Magistrate Judge (Doc. # 257) is hereby DENIED AS MOOT. [55]

[*611] MEMORANDUM RULING

Plaintiffs BRFHH Shreveport, LLC ("BRFHH"), and Vantage Health Plan, Inc. ("Vantage"), a healthcare provider and a healthcare insurer respectively, allege that [2] past and present acquisitions by the Defendant, also a healthcare provider, in Shreveport and Bossier City, Louisiana, violate federal antitrust laws. Before the Court is the Defendant's Motion To Dismiss, [Record Document 30], limited at this stage in the litigation to the question of whether Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) requires dismissal of Plaintiff Vantage Health Plan Inc.'s federal monopolization claims, Record Document 83. The parties have extensively briefed this question, together filing three memorandums on the initial, broader dismissal arguments raised by the Defendant, Record Documents 30, 65, 75, and four memorandums on the narrower dismissal issue now before the Court, Record Documents 89, 90, 93, 97. After consideration of the foregoing, the Court hereby DENIES the Defendant's motion.

I. Background

A. The Parties

Plaintiff BRFHH Shreveport, LLC, is the operator of University Health Hospital ("University Health") in Shreveport. Once a state-owned and -operated charity hospital, University Health has been operated by BRFHH Shreveport since September of 2013, when Louisiana State University ("LSU"), whose neighboring medical school has traditionally supplied physicians for University Hospital, and the [3] parent entities of BRFHH Shreveport signed a Cooperative Endeavor Agreement transferring hospital management authority from the state of Louisiana to BRFHH Shreveport's parent entity. Record Documents 49, p. 3, and 77-1, p. 89. The privatization effected by the 2013 agreement, however, is not unbounded: under the terms of the 2013 agreement, University Hospital continues to depend exclusively on admissions from LSU physicians and treat a substantial portion of the Shreveport area's indigent population. Record Document 1, p. 6, 8. According to BRFHH Shreveport, sustaining these mandates while remaining financially viable requires that a critical, if minority, mass of the patients treated at University Health have private, commercial insurance; the higher reimbursement rates associated with commercial insurance help offset the relatively low profitability of treating the indigent. Id. at 8. Vantage Health Plan, Inc., is a health insurance provider specializing in lower-cost HMO coverage. Id. at 6, 18. Vantage is headquartered in Monroe, Louisiana, where the large majority of its 35,000 subscribers reside. Id. at p. 6, 18, 43. Defendant Willis-Knighton Medical Center ("Willis-Knighton") is a competing healthcare provider that [4] operates four hospitals and at least six free-standing clinics in Shreveport and Bossier City. Record Document 48, p. 39. University Health participates in Vantage's Tier-1 network; Willis-Knighton does not. Id. at 18.

B. Relevant Geographic Market

According to the Plaintiffs, Shreveport and Bossier City (the "Shreveport area") together form the relevant geographic market in which Defendant's antitrust violations occurred and will occur. Id. at 43. Within the Shreveport area there are three entities that operate hospitals: Willis-Knighton, BRFHH Shreveport, and CHRISTUS Health Northern Louisiana ("CHRISTUS"). Id. at 7. According to the Plaintiffs, Willis-Knighton's share of hospital admissions in the Shreveport area is approximately 60% overall and approximately 75% among commercially insured [*612] patients, while University Health and CHRISTUS each approximately have a 12% share of commercially insured patients. Id.

C. Plaintiffs' Claims

1. Past Conduct

BRFHH Shreveport and Vantage describe two sets of antitrust claims. The first set is about prior conduct: Vantage—and Vantage alone—asserts that some of Willis-Knighton's prior acquisitions, physician referral practices, and non-compete employment contracts violated section 2 [5] of the Sherman Act, which prohibits monopolization and attempted monopolization, and section 7 of the Clayton Act, which prohibits anticompetitive acquisitions and mergers. Id. at 10, 15-21, 74-76. From Vantage's perspective, this prior-conduct theory of liability explains how Willis-Knighton has historically violated antitrust laws to exclude Vantage from participating in the Shreveport area healthcare insurance market and why Vantage is therefore entitled to recover damages. It proceeds in four parts.

First, at some point in the last fifteen years, Willis-Knighton allegedly gained monopoly power in the Shreveport area in at least the markets for general acute-care hospital services, adult primary care, and Obstetrics/Gynecology ("Ob/Gyn"). Id. at 10, 74. As broad evidence of this ascent, the complaint states that since 2000, Willis-Knighton has enjoyed a sevenfold increase in the number of physicians it employs and a fivefold increase in revenues.[1] Id. at 10. It cites assertions made by Willis-Knighton CEO James Elrod in his autobiography that Willis-Knighton is the "dominant" provider in the area. Id. at 10. It also alleges that based on Blue Cross reimbursement rates, Willis-Knighton now charges up to three times more than University Health does for the same general category of service, such as inpatient stays. Id. at 14. More [6] specifically, Vantage alleges that as of 2014-2015, Willis-Knighton's market share of commercially insured patients in the Shreveport area was 78% for general acute-care hospital services, 80% for adult primary care, and 60% for Obstetrics/Gynecology ("Ob/Gyn"). Id. at 10-11, 42-43, 74-75.

Second, over this same period, and while it had monopoly power, Willis-Knighton is alleged to have engaged in various anticompetitive acts in the Shreveport area to gain or maintain the monopolies described above. Some of these anticompetitive acts were acquisitions of rival healthcare providers. Specifically, the complaint alleges Willis-Knighton acquired the following five providers: Bossier Medical Center, Doctor's Hospital, CHRISTUS's acute-care services, the Northwest Louisiana Surgery Hospital, and "a previously independent cardiology group." Id. at 5-6, 10, 17. With respect to the acquisitions of Bossier Medical Center, Doctor's Hospital, and CHRISTUS's acute care services, the complaint describes a type [7] of multi-step acquisition in which first Willis-Knighton acquired physicians from the competing provider, then the competing provider failed, and finally, in two (unidentified) instances, Willis-Knighton purchased the remaining physical assets of the shuttered entities. Id. at 5-6. According to the complaint, the closure of CHRISTUS Schumpert's acute care services occurred in 2013. The complaint does not date the other acquisitions.[2]

[*613] In addition to acquisitions, Vantage also alleges that Willis-Knighton gained or maintained its monopoly [8] power through coercive offers to buy medical offices of competing physicians, non-compete contracts with its physicians, and "ruthless" control of physician referrals. Id. at 12-13. According to the Plaintiffs, Willis-Knighton has coerced competing physicians by "offering to purchase their medical offices and move them to the Willis-Knighton campus." Id. at 12. If the physicians decline the offer, they likely suffer "huge declines in referrals from Willis-Knighton's primary care physicians." Id. Willis-Knighton also allegedly requires anticompetitive non-compete agreements with its physicians. Id. The agreements allegedly prohibit "the physician from practicing anywhere in Caddo or Bossier Parishes for two years after termination of the agreement." Id. Further, many of the agreements provide a financial penalty for failing to treat a prescribed number of patients annually but also defer collection of that penalty until the physician leaves Willis-Knighton, the alleged result of which is that the debt accumulated by many Willis-Knighton physicians deters them from leaving Willis-Knighton when they otherwise would do so. Id. Finally, Willis-Knighton allegedly restricts virtually all of the referrals by its [9] physicians to other Willis-Knighton physicians. Id. at 13. According to the Plaintiffs, Willis-Knighton accomplishes this by imposing sanctions on noncompliant physicians. Those sanctions allegedly include "the termination or non-renewal of leases for physician office space, and the direction of its network primary care physicians' referrals away from those specialty physicians who compete with Willis-Knighton or do not refer the bulk of their patients to Willis-Knighton facilities." Id.

[1] The complaint does not specify whether those gains occurred within the Shreveport area or whether Willis-Knighton enjoyed those gains in all markets it serves. Willis-Knighton also operates a hospital in Arkansas. Record Document, p. 9.

[2] Filings subsequent to the complaint, however, have shed additional light on some of these acquisitions. One of the exhibits filed in conjunction with the Plaintiffs' Motion for Preliminary Injunction indicates that Willis-Knighton "purchased" Bossier Medical Center for $3.7 million in 2012. Record Document 24-30. In its briefing supporting its motion to dismiss Vantage, Willis-Knighton alleges that "Doctor's Hospital was forced into bankruptcy by in [sic] creditors in 2007, and eventually closed its doors in February 2010 . . . ." Record Document 97, p. 7-8 n. 1 (citation omitted) (citing In re Shreveport Doctors Hospital 2003 Ltd., Case No. 07-BK-10415 (W.D. La.)).

Third, throughout this same period, Willis-Knighton never accepted Vantage's repeated offers to include Willis-Knighton in Vantage's Tier-1 network. Id. at 15-16. According to Vantage, it has unsuccessfully tried to contract with Willis-Knighton for fifteen years. Id. Those attempts were apparently fruitless because Willis-Knighton either was unwilling to engage with Vantage or was willing to engage but only under terms—90% reimbursement of Willis-Knighton's charges—that Vantage saw as "completely uneconomic for any health plan, and would not allow it to compete effectively in virtually any market."[3] Id. at 16. Vantage labels Willis-Knighton's posture toward it as "effectively a refusal to deal." Thus, Willis-Knighton has never been [10] a participant in Vantage's primary Tier-1 network. Id. at 16-17. And while Willis-Knighton does participate in Vantage's Tier-2 network, its Tier-2 status means that Vantage subscribers must pay a markedly higher out-of-pocket rate to receive care at Willis-Knighton. Id.; see also id. at 32, 64.

Fourth, according to Vantage, the effect of these combined Willis-Knighton efforts [*614] has been to foreclose business opportunities in the Shreveport area that otherwise would have been available to Vantage. Id. at 66. But for Willis-Knighton monopolizing the Shreveport area provider market through its acquisitions, referral practices, and non-compete agreements and then leveraging that monopoly power to box Vantage out of the Shreveport area market, Vantage estimates that it "would have achieved a per capita level of success in the Shreveport area of at least one-third of the level that it has achieved in the Monroe [11] area." Id. at 17, 66. The loss Vantage describes is thus not a loss of preexisting business, but the loss of opportunities to expand its business in the Shreveport area. Id. at 17. Vantage monetizes this loss of business at a minimum of $5.7 million annually, or at least $22.8 million in the last four years, the relevant limitation period. Id. at 66; see 15 U.S.C. § 15b (2012). Pursuant to the Sherman Act's treble-damages scheme, 15 U.S.C. § 15(a), Vantage seeks an award of "three times any damages suffered," which presumably means it seeks roughly $67 million in damages. Id. at 76.

2. Present and Future Conduct

The second set of antitrust claims revolve around present and future conduct. Vantage and BRFHH Shreveport assert that a new joint venture to open clinics located at Willis-Knighton facilities but staffed by LSU physicians—the same LSU physicians who staff University Hospital—constitutes an illegal combination under section 1 of the Sherman Act, both an illegal monopoly and an illegal attempted monopoly under section 2 of the Sherman Act, and an illegal merger under section 7 of the Clayton Act.[4] Id. at 70-76. The Plaintiffs seek the Court to enjoin the opening of the new clinics. Id. at 76.

In March of 2015, Willis-Knighton and LSU's medical school in Shreveport signed a series of agreements governing the operation of several new clinics providing care in as many as eleven specialty or subspecialty fields of medicine. Id. at 27; Record Documents 24-6 to 24-15, 30-6, and 42. According to the terms of these agreements, LSU would supply the physicians for the clinics and Willis-Knighton would supply the facilities and remaining staff. Record Documents 24-6 to 24-15, 30-6, 42.

The Plaintiffs' description of control over the clinics goes further, placing Wills-Knighton at the center of both business and medical decision making—to the point that LSU physicians involved in the clinics "would effectively be working for Willis-Knighton." Record Document 1, pp. 23-24. According to the Plaintiffs, Willis-Knighton will supervise physician performance—giving it more influence over physician referrals—and control billing—meaning the clinics will not accept coverage by managed care providers like Vantage without substantially increasing its charges. Id. at 23-24, 28, 46-47. Plaintiffs also assert that the clinics will [13] primarily treat commercially insured patients. Id. at 24.

[3] Vantage argues that a more customary rate would be 50% of charges that are set by Medicare's Diagnostic Related Group system, not by the hospital. Record Document 1, p. 16. Plaintiffs also assert that "Willis-Knighton's reimbursement rates are from 50% to several hundred percent higher than those at UH-Shreveport." Id. at 14.

[4] The complaint also initially alleged that Willis-Knighton was planning an outright takeover of University Hospital. [12] Record Document 1, p. 23-30. But Plaintiffs later abandoned this theory. Record Document 83, p. 2.

Given this alleged level of control and the assumption that more time worked by LSU physicians at the new joint clinics means less time worked at University Health, Plaintiffs believe that by design these clinics will shift the treatment of all of University Health's commercially insured patients from University Health facilities to Willis-Knighton facilities. Id. Plaintiffs thus allege that Willis-Knighton is in effect attempting to acquire the commercially insured business of BRFHH Shreveport. Id. at 2. Willis-Knighton would accomplish this coup not only by shifting [*615] initial treatment away from University Health, but also by steering all subsequent referrals away from University Health. Id. at 46-47. To substantiate this allegation, Plaintiffs indicate that the capacity of the new clinics to treat new patients will meet the current volume of commercially insured patients currently treated at University Health. Id. at 27. Further, Plaintiffs point to the alleged pattern of Willis-Knighton's previous acquisitions and offer statements by BRFHH, LSU, and Willis-Knighton officials suggesting, in Plaintiffs' eyes, a scheme to deprive University Health of it commercially [14] insured business. Id. at 27. BRFHH estimates that the loss of its commercially insured business would cause it to lose $15 million annually in profits and endanger its survival as the operator of University Health.

Inversely, the migration of commercially insured patients from University Health to Willis-Knighton would significantly increase Willis-Knighton's market share in the Shreveport area, according to the Plaintiffs. Id. at 47-51. Were the new clinics to siphon away all of University Health's commercially insured care, "Willis-Knighton's 75% share in the relevant hospital market will increase to even higher levels, near 90%." Id. at 4. Among some of the specialties identified in the clinic agreements, a total shift in care to the clinics would result in Willis-Knighton's share of the commercially insured market increasing to 50% in Otorhinolaryngology (ENT), 58% in hematology/oncology, 80% in neurology, 70% in Ob/Gyn, and 65% in general pediatrics. Id. at 55.

The new clinics would also allegedly injure Vantage. Id. at 67-69. Because University Health is currently in Vantage subscribers' Tier-1 network but Willis-Knighton is not, Vantage contends that a migration of commercially insured patients from University Health to Willis-Knighton [15] will be followed by an equivalent loss of Vantage subscribers. Id. at 5, 18, 58, 67-69. This is so allegedly because in the past, whenever a physician under contract with Vantage joined the Willis-Knighton Physician Network, that contract was immediately terminated. Id. at 58. Vantage also alleges that in the past whenever a LSU physician in other regions of the state joined a clinic operated by a provider with whom Vantage does not have a relationship, that physician stops accepting Vantage coverage. Id. Thus, because LSU physicians allegedly represent more than half of the physicians in Vantage's Shreveport area network, the loss of those patients would "effectively shut Vantage out of the market in the Shreveport Area." Id. at 67. Vantage believes this loss would be irreparable. Id. at 69.

D. Procedural History

After limited initial discovery, Plaintiffs moved to preliminarily enjoin the Willis-Knighton/LSU clinics, Record Document 24, and Willis-Knighton moved to dismiss all claims against them soon thereafter, Record Document 30. The Court held a hearing to address the parties' motions. Record Document 83. Ruling from the bench, the Court denied the Plaintiffs' Motion for Preliminary Injunction and denied Willis-Knighton's Motion [16] To Dismiss on all but one ground. Record Document 83, p. 2. With respect Vantage's section 2 claims, the Court declined to rule on dismissal and instead ordered additional briefing from both parties. Id. After thorough briefing from the parties, see Record Documents 89, 90, 93, and 97, the question now ripe before the Court is whether Vantage's section 2 claims should be dismissed pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6).

Willis-Knighton argues that there are three principal reasons to dismiss Vantage's claims. First, Vantage has not, according to Willis-Knighton, alleged a cognizable theory of anticompetitive conduct, [*616] an element of a section 2 claim. Record Document 90, p. 6-7. Second, Willis-Knighton asserts that Vantage has not established antitrust injury, a threshold requirement for a plaintiff in any antitrust claim. Id. at 7. Because antitrust injury is a universal requirement for antitrust claims, Willis-Knighton further argues that Vantage's inability to establish it warrants dismissal of all of its antitrust claims, not just its section 2 claims. Id. Third, Willis-Knighton argues that the conduct of which Vantage complains is so vaguely or conclusorily described in its complaint that it cannot support a plausible, non-speculative claim under Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) [17] .

II. Dismissal Pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6)

To survive a challenge under Rule 12(b)(6), "a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)). Courts are required to accept the plaintiff's "well-pleaded" facts as true and construe the complaint in a light favorable to that plaintiff. In re Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., 624 F.3d 201, 210 (5th Cir. 2010) (citations omitted). Nonetheless, courts are not required to accept the veracity of legal conclusions framed as factual allegations. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678 (reasoning that under Rule 8, it is not sufficient to merely recite a cause of action's elements with supporting conclusory statements). Overall, determining when a complaint states a plausible claim is a context-specific task, requiring courts to rely on judicial experience and common sense to assess when a complaint crosses the line from conceivable to plausible. Id. at 678-80.

A claim is facially plausible when a plaintiff pleads factual content that permits the court to reasonably infer a defendant is liable for the alleged misconduct. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678-79. This plausibility standard is not a probability requirement, "but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. "Where a complaint pleads facts that are 'merely [18] consistent with' a defendant's liability, it 'stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of 'entitlement to relief.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557).

III. Discussion

A. Failure To Plead Anticompetitive Conduct Under Section 2 of the Sherman Act

Willis-Knighton argues that Vantage fails to plead anticompetitive conduct, an element of a monopolization claim asserted pursuant to section 2 of the Sherman Act. Record Document 90, 4-8. A defendant is liable for monopolization under section 2 where it (1) possesses monopoly power and (2) achieves or maintains its monopoly power through anticompetitive conduct.[5] See 15 U.S.C. § 2 (2012); *Verizon [617] Commc'ns, Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, 540 U.S. 398, 407-08, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004); United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966). The necessity of proving more than monopoly power reflects federal courts' judgment that in the short term, the monopolist's ability to charge above-market prices invites more, rather than less, competition. Trinko, 540 U.S. at 407 ("The opportunity to charge monopoly prices . . . induces risk taking that produces innovation and economic growth."). Thus, while the definition of anticompetitive conduct[6] has many accepted permutations,[7] the essence of the conduct that it makes actionable is the [5] Vantage has alleged attempted monopolization, another cause of action under section 2 of the Sherman Act. See 15 U.S.C. § 2 (2012); Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 456, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993); Record Document 1, pp. 73-75. Vantage's attempted monopolization claim is indistinguishable from Vantage's monopolization claim for the purposes of evaluating Willis-Knighton's dismissal arguments. Because anticompetitive conduct is still an element of an attempted monopolization claim, Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 456, the viability of both Vantage's monopolization and attempted monopolization claims turns in equal measure on whether Vantage can show anticompetive conduct. Moreover, Willis-Knighton's remaining two dismissal arguments—lack of antitrust injury and lack of Twombly specificity—also equally affect Vantage's monopolization [20] and attempted monopolization claims. The Court therefore need not separately address Vantage's attempted monopolization claim for a large part of this ruling.

[6] Courts also label anticompetitive conduct exclusionary conduct, predatory conduct, and improper conduct. See Taylor Pub. Co. v. Jostens, Inc., 216 F.3d 465, 475 n.2 (5th Cir. 2000) ("We use the terms 'predatory' and 'exclusionary' interchangeably . . . ."); Berkey Photo, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 298 (2d Cir. 1979) ("improper" conduct). Some authorities, however, view the term "exclusionary" as too narrow. See 3 Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 701b (3d ed. 2008) ("Although we often say that § 2 requires an 'exclusionary' act, our real meaning is that § 2 requires one or more forbidden anticompetitive acts. Not all anticompetitive acts are exclusionary.").

achievement or maintenance of monopoly power by means other than competition on the merits. See Stearns Airport Equip. Co. v. FMC Corp., 170 F.3d 518, 522 (5th Cir. 1999) (citing Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands, 472 U.S. 585, 605, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985) ("If a firm has been [19] attempting to exclude rivals on some basis other than efficiency, it is fair to characterize its behavior as [anticompetitive]."); see also United States v. Microsoft Corp., 253 F.3d 34, 58-59, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330 (D.C. Cir. 2001) (To be condemned as anticompetitive under section 2, the conduct "must harm the competitive process and thereby harm consumers.").[8] In the Fifth Circuit, proving anticompetitive conduct also "[g]enerally" requires "some sign that the monopolist engaged in behavior that—examined without reference to its effects on competitors—is economically irrational." Stearns, 170 F.3d at 523.

Vantage argues that by alleging that Willis-Knighton has acquired (and is attempting to acquire) competing healthcare providers, has used punitive non-compete contracts with its physicians, and has restricted patient referrals to other Willis-Knighton [*618] providers, the complaint has plead anticompetitive conduct.[9] The Court separately addresses whether any of these three groups of allegations constitute a viable theory of anticompetitive conduct.[10]

1. Acquisitions

In general, Willis-Knighton argues that none of the conduct that Vantage claims is anticompetitive—the acquisitions, the non-competes, the referrals—can be anticompetitive because in the Fifth Circuit, conduct is anticompetitive under section 2 only where it is economically irrational for the defendant and here Willis-Knighton had a rational business purpose for all of its challenged actions: growing its business. See id; Record Document 90, pp. 9-10.

---

[7] See Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 605 n.32, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985) ("[E]xclusionary comprehends at the most behavior that not only (1) tends to impair the opportunities of rivals, but also (2) either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way.") (quoting 3 Phillip E. Areeda & Donald F. Turner, Antitrust Law 78 (1978)); United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966) (The monopolist must have "acquired or maintained that power wilfully, as distinguished from the power having arisen and continued by growth produced by the development of a superior product, business [21] acumen, or historic accident."); 3 Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 651a (3d ed. 2008) ("We define monopolistic conduct as acts that: (1) are reasonably capable of creating, enlarging or prolonging monopoly power by impairing the opportunities of rivals; and (2) that either (2a) do no benefit consumers at all, or (2b) are unnecessary for the particular consumer benefits claimed for them, or (2c) produce harms disproportionate to any resulting benefits.")

[8] See also United States v. Aluminum Co., 148 F.2d 416, 430 (2d. Cir. 1945) (Hand, J.) ("The successful competitor, having been urged to compete, must not be turned upon when he wins.").

[9] Notably, Vantage does not contend that Willis-Knighton's "effective refusal to deal" with it constituted anticompetitive conduct. A refusal to deal may qualify as anticompetitive [22] conduct, but only under limited circumstances. See Aspen Skiing, 472 U.S. 585, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467; Trinko, 540 U.S. 398, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823. Instead, Vantage alleges that Willis-Knighton's refusal to deal with it represents its injury. Record Document 89, p. 25.

[10] The separate analysis of these three groups of conduct is not impermissible "compartmentalizing" of allegedly anticompetitive conduct. See Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 698, 82 S. Ct. 1404, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777 (1962). As Vantage has alleged elsewhere Continental Ore and Associated Radio Services Co. v. Page Airways, Inc. hold that courts should determine anticompetitive conduct by measuring the cumulative effect of the defendant's allegedly anticompetitve conduct, rather than evaluating each instance of allegedly illegal conduct in isolation. See Continental Ore, 370 U.S. at 698; Assoc. Radio Serv. Co. v. Page Airways, Inc, 624 F.2d 1342, 1356 (5th Cir. 1980). This instruction, however, is limited to the analysis of conduct that although in theory may constitute anticompetitive conduct, in fact has such a de minimis effect on competition that it should not be actionable. See Assoc. Radio, 624 F.2d at 1353-56 ("We agree . . . that a de minimis rule should be applied by our courts, but we believe that [there were] enough instances of exclusionary behavior on the part of defendants to constitute far more than de minimis violations of section 2."). The Court may therefore separately address whether Willis-Knighton's acquisitions, non-competes, [23] or referrals theoretically could give rise to anticompetitive conduct before cumulatively determining the effect of these actions.

In Stearns, a manufacturer of airport-to-airplane boarding bridges sued a rival manufacturer for monopolization under section 2 of the Sherman Act. Id. at 520-21. Stearns, the plaintiff manufacturer, alleged in relevant part that its competitor, FMC, illegally gained and maintained its monopoly through exclusionary manipulation of municipal bids. Specifically, Stearns alleged that FMC illegally manipulated the airport competitive bid process through four strategies:

> First, FMC was to attempt to convince municipalities that they should avoid competitive bidding and strike a purchase agreement with FMC directly—so called "sole-sourcing." [24] Second, if bidding appeared inevitable, FMC should strive to drive the criteria for the award away from price alone by requesting various product features be weighted against cost in the final calculation of the best bid. Third, efforts were to be made to insure that the specifications adopted by a municipality were tailored to fit FMC's product and exclude Stearns. Lastly, FMC would "induce complexities in the bidding process" by suggesting certain certifications and restrictions be added that worked to the detriment of Stearns.

Id. at 522. The Fifth Circuit held that these strategies did not amount to anticompetitive conduct for the purposes of a section 2 monopolization claim. Id. at 527. The court found that the test for determining when conduct becomes anticompetitive [*619] is when the conduct does not involve competition on the merits. Id. at 522-23, 527. For three reasons, Stearns failed to show that FMC's four-part strategy did not constitute competition on the merits. Id. at 523-27. One reason was that this type of competition generally is not an antitrust violation under section 1 of the Sherman Act. Id. at 522-523, 527 (citing Security Fire Door Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 484 F.2d 1028, 1030-31 (9th Cir. 1973)). The second reason that FMC's conduct was competition on the merits was that it was done for a rational business purpose. Id. at 523-24. The court found [25] that the lack of a rational business purpose, i.e., engaging in conduct that may harm a competitor but also knowingly causes itself real losses, is the key factor in determining when there is competition on the merits: "If the conduct has no rational business purpose other than its adverse effects on competitors, an inference that it is exclusionary is supported." Id. at 522.[11] The court stated that there was an "obvious" rational business justification for FMC's four-part strategy: selling more of its product. Id. at 524. The third reason that FMC's strategy was competition on the merits was that it could not succeed without the active, voluntary consent of the consumer, the airport. Id. at 524.[12] Based on these reasons, the court concluded that "Stearns does not and cannot claim that it has been excluded from competing on the merits" and affirmed summary judgment dismissal of Stearn's section 2 claims. Id. at 527.

Vantage argues that Stearns notwithstanding, the allegations of Willis-Knighton acquiring competitors is a viable theory of anticompetitive conduct because courts—including the Supreme Court—recognize horizontal acquisitions as anticompetitive conduct. Record Document 89, pp. 13-14. The Supreme Court has established that acquiring a viable competitor constitutes anticompetitive conduct under section 2. See Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 576; see also 3 Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 701a (3d ed. 2008) ("Historically and today, merging viable competitors to create a monopoly is a clear § 2 offense . . . ."). In Grinnell, the Court held that a home security conglomerate had engaged in anticompetitive conduct under section 2 because it achieved its monopolization through the acquisition of competing entities, among other acts. 384 U.S. at 576. The Court explained that because the acquired entities were previously the defendant's competitors, their acquisitions by the defendant lessened competition in the given market and increased the defendant's market power, allowing [27] the Court to determine that they qualified as the types of anticompetitive conduct that section 2 forbids. See id.

Courts continue to hold that acquisitions can give rise to anticompetitive conduct for the purposes of a section 2 claim. See *Behrend v. Comcast Corp., No. CIV.A. 03-6604, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51889, 2012 WL 1231794, at 20 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 12, 2012). In Behrend, consumers sued Comcast, a cable provider, in part under section 2 of the [11] See also id. at 523 ("Generally, a finding of exclusionary conduct requires some sign that the monopolist engaged in behavior that—examined without reference to its effects on competitors—is economically irrational.").

[12] Although the court stated that this determination would be upset if there were evidence that airports' decision making [26] had been coopted or coerced, id. at 526 ("Bribery and threats are not competition on the merits."), the court found that Stearns had failed to introduce any such evidence. Id.

Sherman Act for monopolizing cable services in the greater Philadelphia market. *2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51889, [WL] at 1. Comcast accomplished this monopolization through a series of acquisitions, taking the various forms of outright acquisitions, swaps of assets in different geographic regions, and [*620] purchases of assets in receivership through bankruptcy, over the span of a decade. *2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51889, [WL] at 3-5. These acquisitions increased Comcast's market share in the greater Philadelphia area from 24% in 1998 to 69.5% in 2007. *2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51889, [WL] at 20. On summary judgment, the plaintiff consumers argued that the acquisitions themselves represented the anticompetitive conduct required to prevail on a section 2 claim. Id. The court agreed, holding that the acquisitions constituted anticompetitive conduct. The court reasoned that because the consumers had provided evidence that the acquisitions and the increased market power that followed the acquisitions allowed Comcast to increase price, [28] the consumers could rely on the "transactions themselves . . . as proof of [anticompetitive] conduct."[13] Id.

For three reasons, Willis-Knighton argues that Grinnell and its progeny do not support a finding that the acquisitions challenged in this lawsuit are anticompetitive under section 2.

First, as a threshold issue, Willis-Knighton argues that the label "acquisition" mischaracterizes its past conduct. According to Willis-Knighton, the complaint only pleads that it has hired talent from its rivals, not that it has acquired them. Record Document 90, pp. 6-8. And whether hiring talent from a rival is anticompetitive under section 2 is governed by a standard that is far more stringent than the one set forth in Grinnell. Vantage for its part asserts that the complaint alleges more than the mere hiring of talent. The complaint, according to Vantage, alleges that hiring talent from a target provider is but one initial step Willis-Knighton takes in accomplishing its ultimate aim of acquiring the target provider.

The question then becomes how courts distinguish an acquisition from hiring talent for the purposes of assessing section 2 anticompetitive conduct. Unfortunately, neither the parties nor the Court have been able to find any law that draws this distinction. But the law in the Fifth [30] Circuit is that the hiring of rival talent, even if it strengthens a monopolist and weakens a competitor, is generally not anticompetitive. Taylor Pub. Co. v. Jostens, Inc., 216 F.3d 465, 480-81 (5th Cir. 2000). Because of the "high social and personal interest in maintaining a freely functioning market for talent," "hiring talent cannot generally be held exclusionary even if it does weaken actual or potential rivals and strengthen a monopolist." Id. at 479 (citing 3 Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 702, at 204). Consequently, in the Fifth Circuit, a monopolist hiring rival talent is anticompetitive only where the monopolist (1) engages in predatory hiring, [*621] i.e., acquiring talent from a rival firm not for its own use but only to deny it to the competitor, and (2) induces the targeted talent, while still employed by the competitor, to act disloyally toward the competitor by steering its customers toward the monopolist. Id. at 480-81. In Taylor Publishing, a monopolist in the school yearbook publishing industry instituted a multi-faceted campaign "to take [the plaintiff competitor] out of business." 216 F.3d at 471. One prong of the defendant's strategy was to hire away key sales personnel from the plaintiff. Id. The court held that the defendant's hiring of talent was anticompetitive because [31] the plaintiff was able to demonstrate at trial that (1) the defendant had hired talent away from the plaintiff not for its own use but to deny it to the plaintiff and (2) the defendant had induced the plaintiff's employees, while still in the plaintiff's employ, to violate their non-compete agreements and convert their sales accounts to the defendant. See id. at 480-81.

[13] Vantage also asserts that Electronic Data Systems v. Computer Associates, 802 F. Supp. 1463 (N.D. Tex. 1992), and Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962), support its contention that acquisitions alone constitute anticompetive conduct under section 2. Record Document 89, p. 20. No such holding is found in either case. In Electronic Data Systems, the defendant moved to dismiss the plaintiff's section 2 claim not because it did not allege anticompetive conduct, but because it did not allege monopoly power. See id. at 1466-67. The question of whether the defendant's acquisitions gave rise to anticompetitive conduct was therefore not before the court. In Brown Shoe, the Court, in evaluating whether a horizontal and vertical merger violated section 7 of the Clayton Act, stated, "If the share of the market foreclosed is so large that it approaches monopoly proportions, the Clayton Act will, of course, have been violated; but the arrangement will also have run afoul of the Sherman Act." 370 U.S. at 328. This statement does not support Vantage's position because it was not the holding of the Court and, even if it were, its import is substantially diminished by the fact that it was made before Grinnell, which was the first Supreme Court case requiring anticompetitive [29] conduct as an element of a section 2 violation.

Taylor Publishing governs any acquisition alleged by the Plaintiffs in which the target provider fails because Willis-Knighton hires away its physicians but otherwise does not involve Willis-Knighton acquiring assets of the target provider before it fails. See id. at 471, 480-81. The acquisitions in the complaint that meet these criteria are the acquisitions of Bossier Medical Center,[14] Doctor's Hospital, CHRISTUS's acute-care services, and University Hospital's commercially insured business. Like the hiring of talent in Taylor Publishing, Willis-Knighton's hiring of physicians from these four entities is alleged to have weakened (or will weaken) those entities and was (or is) part of Willis-Knighton's alleged plan to put them out of business. See id. at 471; Record Document 1, pp. 2, 5-6.

And with respect to these four alleged acquisitions, Vantage has pleaded no facts to support either element of anticompetitive hiring under Taylor Publishing. The complaint has not alleged that Willis-Knighton hired physicians not for its own use but to deny them to any of the target entities. See Taylor Publ'g, 216 F.3d at 480. The complaint has also not alleged that Willis-Knighton induced any physicians to act disloyally before their employ with Willis-Knighton. See id. Consequently, these four acquisitions do not give rise to section 2 liability.

However, the two remaining acquisitions identified in the complaint, the acquisitions of Northwest Louisiana Surgery Hospital and "a previously independent cardiology group," were apparently outright takeovers and therefore are not governed by Taylor Publishing. For these acquisitions, Willis-Knighton's second argument against the application of Grinnell is relevant. Willis-Knighton contends that Grinnell does not support a blanket rule that [33] acquisitions establish anticompetitive conduct under section 2. Record Document 97, p. 4. Willis-Knighton emphasizes that in Grinnell, the defendant's prior acquisitions were not an independent ground for a finding of anticompetitive conduct. See 384 U.S. at 576; Record Document 97, p. 4. In addition to the defendant's prior acquisitions, the Court in Grinnell also included defendant's inclusion of restrictive agreements among the defendant's subsidiaries that prevented competition among them[15] and [*622] the defendant's pricing practices in its catalogue of acts that together "plainly and explicitly" established anticompetitive conduct. See Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571, 576. Willis-Knighton thus distinguishes this matter from Grinnell, arguing that unlike the Grinnell defendant's multifaceted anticompetitive conduct, Willis-Knighton is only alleged to have acquired competing entities. See 384 U.S. at 576; Record Document 97, p. 4. Willis-Knighton also argues, perhaps implicitly, that Grinnell must be read in concert with Stearns, which means that an acquisition is anticompetitive only where it is not done for a rational business purpose. Record Document 90, pp. 4-5.

This line of argument is unpersuasive for several reasons. First, although not explicit, the language in Grinnell suggests that acquisitions of viable competitors alone may establish the anticompetitive conduct element of a section 2 claim. In its relatively brief discussion of the defendant's anticompetitive conduct, the Court in Grinnell stated that the defendant's "monopoly was achieved in large part by unlawful and exclusionary practices. The restrictive agreements . . . were one device. Pricing practices . . . were another. The acquisitions . . . were still another." 384 U.S. at 576 (emphasis added). This language implies that any of the three practices by the defendant could have satisfied the Court that the defendant's actions constituted anticompetitive conduct. See id. Second, courts continue to hold that acquisitions alone establish anticompetitive conduct under section 2. See, e.g., Behrend v. Comcast Corp., No. CIV.A. 03-6604, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51889, 2012 WL 1231794, at *20 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 12, 2012) (citing Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 576) (finding that defendant's acquisitions were prima facie evidence of anticompetitive conduct). Third, Willis-Knighton offers no authority challenging or even questioning the relevant holding in Grinnell as good law. Although it is true, as Willis-Knighton states, that the Second Circuit [35] has held that a vertical acquisition is not by itself anticompetitive conduct, see Record Document 97, pp. 3-4; Port Dock & Stone Corp. v. Oldcastle Ne., Inc., 507 F.3d 117, 124-25 (2d Cir. 2007), that holding has no bearing on Willis-Knighton's alleged acquisitions because neither party characterizes them as vertical. Fourth, Stearns does not require that acquisitions must lack a rational business justification before they may be characterized as [14] The Court notes that while a filing subsequent to the complaint indicates [32] that Willis-Knighton "purchased" Bossier Medical Center for $3.7 million in 2012, Record Document 24-30, that filing was not an exhibit attached to the complaint and therefore the Court may not consider it in a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss.

[15] Courts no longer consider intrabrand restrictions on competition enforced by the parent company [34] to be anticompetitive. See Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 752-53, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984).

anticompetitive. In Stearns, the court stated that it "generally" requires "some sign that the monopolist engaged in behavior that . . . is economically irrational," Stearns, 170 F.3d at 523. Thus, by its very own terms, the lack of a rational business purpose is not a universal requirement for anticompetitive conduct. See id. Instead, under Stearns, the universal test is whether the conduct is competition on the merits. Id. at 522-23, 527. Thus, while a rational business purpose is the most important factor in determining whether there is competition on the merits, it is still a component of the overarching test of competition on the merits. See id. And even if Stearns does conflict with Grinnell, it must give way to Supreme Court precedent. Finally, as shown below, the tension between the analyses of Grinnell and Stearns is alleviated by the viability of a rational [36] business justification as an affirmative defense.

Willis-Knighton's third argument against the application of Grinnell is that even if the Court does not adopt economic [*623] irrationality as the test for establishing section 2 anticompetitive conduct, it provides Willis-Knighton with an affirmative defense. Record Document 97, pp. 4-5. To assess anticompetitive conduct under section 2 of the Sherman Act, many courts have adopted the burden-shifting framework articulated by the D.C. Circuit in United States v. Microsoft Corp., 253 F.3d 34, 59, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330 (D.C. Cir. 2001). See, e.g., New York ex rel. Schneiderman v. Actavis PLC, 787 F.3d 638, 652 (2d Cir.), cert. dismissed sub nom., Allergan PLC v. New York ex. rel. Schneiderman, 136 S. Ct. 581, 193 L. Ed. 2d 421 (2015). Under Microsoft, once a plaintiff has met his burden of demonstrating a prima facie case of section 2 anticompetitive conduct, the burden shifts to the defendant to offer a procompetitive justification, i.e., "a nonpretextual claim that its conduct is indeed a form of competition on the merits because it involves, for example, greater efficiency or enhanced consumer appeal." Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 59. Then, "if the monopolist's procompetitive justification stands unrebutted . . . the plaintiff must demonstrate that the anticompetitive harm of the conduct outweighs the procompetitive benefit." Id. Though the Fifth Circuit has not explicitly accepted or rejected the Microsoft framework, it previously has suggested [37] that some type of burden-shifting framework is appropriate for analyzing section 2 claims. See Mid-Texas Commc'ns Sys., Inc. v. Am. Tel. & Tel. Co., 615 F.2d 1372, 1389 n.13 (5th Cir. 1980) (finding that analysis of a section 2 claim is similar to the rule of reason analysis for a section 1 claim, which weighs the anticompetitive effects of the plaintiff's conduct against its procompetitive benefits).

For Willis-Knighton to prevail on this affirmative defense at the 12(b)(6) stage in the litigation, the complaint alone must prove its requisite elements, i.e., the complaint must demonstrate as a matter of law (1) nonpretextual, procompetitive justifications for Willis-Knighton's allegedly anticompetitive actions, which would include its acquisitions, the non-compete agreements, and the restrictive referrals, and (2) that the procompetitive benefit of these actions outweigh their anticompetitive harm. See Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 59; Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Sales, Inc. v. Avondale Shipyards, Inc., 677 F.2d 1045, 1050 (5th Cir. 1982). Vantage argues that Willis-Knighton cannot prevail on a procompetitive justification affirmative defense at the 12(b)(6) stage because the defense requires proof of facts that lie beyond the complaint. Record Document 93, p. 3. Willis-Knighton responds by asserting that courts regularly entertain antitrust affirmative defenses and procompetitive/efficiency arguments in 12(b)(6) motions. Record Document [38] 97, pp. 4-5. Willis-Knighton therefore asserts that the complaint itself supports dismissal under this defense because it alleges a legitimate business purpose for all of Willis-Knighton's challenged actions: treating more patients. See id. at 4; Record Document 90, pp. 10-11.

The Fifth Circuit has long held that "a claim may [] be dismissed if a successful affirmative defense appears clearly on the face of the pleadings." Clark v. Amoco Prod. Co., 794 F.2d 967, 970 (5th Cir. 1986) (citing Kaiser, 677 F.2d at 1050); see also Airline Car Rental, Inc. v. Shreveport Airport Auth., 667 F. Supp. 293, 297 (W.D. La. 1986) ("[A] cause of action cannot be dismissed on a 12(b)(6) motion on the basis of an affirmative defense unless the defense clearly appears on the face of the pleading."). In Kaiser Aluminum, the defendant filed an antitrust counterclaim that the plaintiff sought to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) based on the affirmative defense that the claim was filed after the relevant limitation period. 677 F.2d at 1049. The counterclaim, filed in 1979, alleged that a [*624] contract executed between the defendant and the plaintiff in 1973 constituted an illegal tying arrangement under antitrust law. Id. at 1048. The court affirmed dismissal, reasoning that the face of the counterclaim revealed that it was barred by antitrust's four-year statute of limitations and the facts pleaded in the counterclaim, even if taken [39] as true, could not support any judicially recognized exception to the limitation period. Id. at 1050-57. In Airline Car Rental, the defendant sought dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) based on the affirmative defense that the claim was barred by the state action doctrine. 667 F. Supp. at 297 (citing Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 63 S. Ct. 307, 87 L. Ed. 315 (1943)). In its complaint, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant, Shreveport Airport Authority, was "a body politic and corporate organized and existing pursuant to the laws of the State of Louisiana." Id. at 297-98. But the court denied dismissal, holding that the complaint had not stated facts sufficient to meet the requirements of the state action doctrine because that defense requires that the state entity party acted pursuant to a state policy to displace competition and the complaint had made no such claim. Id. at 298.[16]

Because the Plaintiffs' complaint does not demonstrate as a matter of law either that there were nonpretextual, procompetitive justifications for Willis-Knighton's allegedly illegal conduct or that the procompetitive benefits of the acquisitions outweighed their anticompetitive harm, Willis-Knighton is not entitled to prevail on a Microsoft procompetitive affirmative defense at this stage in the litigation. Unlike the statute of limitation defense in Kaiser Aluminum, but like the state action doctrine defense in Airline Car Rental, the procompetitive defense that [*625] Willis-Knighton raises cannot be resolved based solely on the Plaintiffs' complaint because, at the very least, the complaint does not reveal whether the procompetitive benefits of the acquisitions, [42] non-competes, and control of referrals outweigh their anticompetitive harm. See Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 59. This affirmative defense is thus better suited for a summary judgment motion. See Behrend, 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51889, 2012 WL 1231794, at *22-24 (holding that although consumer plaintiff's allegations of Comcast's acquisitions constituted a viable theory of anticompetitive conduct under section 2, Comcast was entitled to summary judgment on that claim because Comcast had shown that it had legitimate business justifications for its acquisitions and the consumers could not demonstrate that there was a genuine dispute of material fact that Comcast's business justifications were pretextual).

Therefore, Willis-Knighton's alleged acquisitions of Northwest Louisiana Surgery Hospital and "a previously independent cardiology group" constitute anticompetitive conduct under section 2 of the Sherman Act. See Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 576; Record Document 1, pp. 10, 17. These acquisitions could plausibly constitute the type of competitor acquisitions described in Grinnell. See 384 U.S. at 576; Record Document 1, pp. 5-6, 10, 17. Like the entities acquired in Grinnell, Northwest Louisiana Surgery Hospital and the cardiology group were competitors of the defendant in the relevant market so their acquisition lessened competition and increased [43] the defendant's market share[17] in the relevant market. See 384 U.S. at 576; Record Document 1, pp. 10, 17. Thus, based on its

[16] The other cases on which Willis-Knighton relies to support its affirmative defense argument, Port Dock, 507 F.3d at 124-25, and Morris Commc'ns Corp. v. PGA Tour, Inc., 364 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2004), are misplaced. See Record Document 97, pp. 3-4.

In Port Dock, the Second Circuit held that a section 2 monopolization claim alleging a vertical acquisition accompanied by a refusal to deal should be dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) because it failed to allege anticompetitive conduct. 507 F.3d at 124-26. The court noted that a vertical acquisition standing alone does not qualify as anticompetitive [40] conduct, id. at 124 (citing Belfiore v. N.Y. Times Co., 826 F.2d 177, 181 (2d Cir. 1987)), and that a refusal to deal generally does not qualify as anticompetitive conduct unless there is an absence of a valid business purposes, id. (citing Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 608, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985)). The court further noted that in the Second Circuit, "when a monopolist has acquired its monopoly at one level of a product market, its vertical expansion into another level of the same product market will ordinarily be for . . . a prototypical valid business purpose." Id. (citing G.K.A. Beverage Corp. v. Honickman, 55 F.3d 762 (2d Cir. 1995). Vantage's monopolization claims and the monopolization claim dismissed in Port Dock are easily distinguishable. Unlike the relevant challenged acquisition in Port Dock, the acquisitions that Vanta challenges were horizontal, not vertical. See id. at 119; Record Document 5-6, 10, 17. Thus, the relevant holdings from Port Dock, that vertical acquisitions are not anticompetitive under section 2 and are usually done for a rational business purpose, have no bearing on Willis-Knighton's acquisitions.

In Morris Communications, a publisher sued the Professional Golf Association for monopolizing the publication of real-time golf scores. Id. at 1290-93. The Eleventh Circuit affirmed summary judgment dismissal of the publisher's claim, holding that the defendant had demonstrated, [41] as a defense, that its conduct had a nonpretextual, valid business justification. Id. at 1297-98. Because the court in Morris Commc'ns affirmed dismissal of the publisher's monopolization claim on summary judgment, rather than under Rule 12(b)(6), Morris Commc'ns does not support Willis-Knighton's argument that it is entitled to prevail on its affirmative defense of a nonpretextual, procompetitive justification for its allegedly illegal acquisitions. See id. at 1292.

allegation that Willis-Knighton acquired Northwest Louisiana Surgery Hospital and an unknown cardiology group, Vantage has plead anticompetitive conduct.

2. Non-Compete Agreements and Control of Referrals

Vantage also asserts that its allegations of Willis-Knighton's non-compete agreements with its physicians and its control of physician referrals are anticompetitive under section 2 of the Sherman Act. Vantage, however, has offered no authority specifically holding or suggesting that non-compete agreements or control of physician referrals are anticompetitive under section 2. Absent any conflicting authority, the non-competes and the control of referrals are anticompetitive if they lacked competition on the merits. See Stearns, 170 F.3d at 522-23, 527. And the most important factor in determining competition on the merits is whether Willis-Knighton had a rational business purpose for its actions. See id. Other relevant factors under Stearns are whether courts find these acts violate section 1 of the Sherman [44] Act and whether Willis-Knighton could have accomplished these acts without the consent and participation of consumers. See id. at 522-24.

Willis-Knighton has a rational business purpose for both the non-compete agreements and its control of referrals. See id. at 524. As previously stated, Willis-Knighton argues that its rational business purpose for both of these actions was the same: to treat more patients. The complaint alleges nothing to contradict Willis-Knighton's argument that the purpose and the effect of the non-compete agreements and the restriction of referrals was to treat more patients. There is no allegation, for [*626] instance, that Willis-Knighton does not need the physicians subject to the non-compete agreements and keeps them at a loss just for the sake of ensuring that other hospitals do not have access to them. Nor is there any allegation that Willis-Knighton has steered patients back to Willis-Knighton not because their treatment would be profitable, but because it would ensure that they are not treated by other providers. These acts therefore had a rational business purpose.

The other two, less important, factors under Stearns point in different directions. Neither party has argued that these [45] acts may violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act. See id. at 522-23. On the other hand, these acts were done without the participation of consumers, i.e., patients. See id. at 523. On the whole, then, the strict application of Stearns to the allegations of Willis-Knighton's non-compete agreements and control of physicians referrals shows that they are not anticompetitive under section 2 of the Sherman Act and therefore do not give rise to a claim of monopolization or attempted monopolization under the Sherman Act.

For the reasons stated above, the Court finds that Vantage has plead anticompetitive conduct with respect to the acquisitions of Northwest Louisiana Surgery Hospital and the cardiology group listed in the complaint. The Court therefore DENIES Willis-Knighton's motion to dismiss for failure to plead anticompetitive conduct.

B. Antitrust Injury

Willis-Knighton argues that Vantage has not suffered antitrust injury. Antitrust injury is a component of antitrust standing. Antitrust standing, in turn, is a judicially-created set of threshold requirements that a private plaintiff must show before a court can entertain its antitrust claims. See Associated Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. Cal. State Council of Carpenters ("AGC"), 459 U.S. 519, 535, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 & n. 31 (1983). [46] The three antitrust standing requirements are "1) injury-in-fact, [i.e.,] an injury to the plaintiff proximately caused by the defendants' conduct; 2) antitrust injury; and 3) proper plaintiff status, which assures that other parties are not better situated to bring suit." Sanger Ins. Agency v. HUB Int'l, Ltd., 802 F.3d 732, 737 (5th Cir. 2015) (citing Jebaco, Inc. v. Harrah's Operating Co., 587 F.3d 314, 318 (5th Cir. 2009)). These requirements, which supplement Article III standing requirements, ensure that successful antitrust claims only redress the types of harm that antitrust law was designed to prevent, rather than create a fortuitous windfall for all parties proximate to the defendant, regardless of whether they were injured by anticompetitive conduct. See AGC, 459 U.S. at 535.

[17] While not dispositive of market power, market share often serves as an imperfect proxy for market power. See Domed Stadium Hotel, Inc. v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 732 F.2d 480, 489-90 (5th Cir. 1984) (citing United States v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 148 F.2d 416, 424 (2d Cir. 1945) (Hand, J.)).

The second component of antitrust standing, antitrust injury, requires that a plaintiff's injury is "of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and . . . flows from that which makes the defendant's acts unlawful." Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977). This means that in an antitrust suit, but-for causation is insufficient. Instead, a plaintiff must be able to trace its injury to the anticompetitive effects of the defendant's antitrust violation. See id. An inquiry into antitrust injury thus always asks whether there is a causal connection between the alleged injury of the plaintiff and [47] the anticipated anticompetitive effect of the specific practice that allegedly violates antitrust law. See Port Dock, 507 F.3d at 122 ("We can ascertain antitrust injury only by identifying the anticipated anticompetitive effect of the specific practice [*627] at issue and comparing it to the actual injury the plaintiff alleges.").

Vantage asserts that it has suffered antitrust injury because Willis-Knighton's refusal to contract with it (its alleged injury) was made possible by the monopoly power Willis-Knighton achieved through its anticompetitive acquisitions (the anticompetitive effect of the specific practice that allegedly violates antitrust law). See Record Document 89, p. 25.

For monopolization claims, refusals to contract with the plaintiff do not constitute antitrust injury because the injury suffered by the plaintiff is one that could have just as easily occurred in the absence of monopoly power. See Jebaco, 587 F.3d at 319-20; Port Dock, 507 F.3d at 123; Fischer v. NWA, Inc., 883 F.2d 594, 596 (8th Cir. 1989); Serpa Corp. v. McWane, Inc., 199 F.3d 6 (1st Cir. 1999). In Jebaco, the Fifth Circuit held that a lessor assignee did not suffer antitrust injury from lessee casinos where the complaint alleged that the casinos had violated antitrust law through an illegal market division and the lessor was injured because the casinos terminated the lease and moved elsewhere. [48] 587 F.3d at 316-17, 319-20. The lessor plaintiff, Jebaco, was an assignee to a lease with Harrah's casino for two riverboat casinos and as such was entitled to a per-patron fee. Id. at 16. After Hurricane Rita, Harrah's decided to sell the casinos and all related licensing rights. Id. Though Jebaco bid for the casinos and licensing rights, Harrah's sold them to another defendant, Pinnacle, and coordinated with Pinnacle to secure the license transfer with the Louisiana Gaming Control Board. Id. at 316-17. As part of the licensing process, Pinnacle represented that it would move the operations of the two casinos to different locations. Id. at 317. Jebaco alleged that these acts injured it in antitrust by depriving it of all revenue under the lease assignment.[18] Id. at 319. The Fifth Circuit disagreed, ruling that Jebaco had not suffered antitrust injury in part because Jebaco could have been deprived of its per-patron fees just as easily if Harrah's had not engaged in the illegal market-division scheme.[19] Id. at 320. The court reasoned: "[I]f a different firm had purchased Harrah's assets, it too might have chosen not to operate at Jebaco's preferred berths. No antitrust violation would have occurred, but Jebaco would have suffered the same injury." Id. The court therefore [49] held that Jebaco had not suffered antitrust injury by the casinos terminating the leases. Id.

Similarly, in Port Dock, the Second Circuit held that a distributer did not suffer antitrust injury from a manufacturer where the complaint alleged that the manufacturer [*628] illegally monopolized the manufacturing level through acquisitions and the retailer was injured because the manufacturer, post-monopolization, refused to sell to it. 507 F.3d at 122-24. The plaintiff distributer, Port Dock, alleged that prior to their alleged antitrust violations, the defendant entities (collectively "Tilcon") possessed an 85% market share in the manufacture of crushed stone in the [18] Jebaco also alleged it was injured because the defendants deprived it of an opportunity to compete for the casino bid. Id. The court dismissed this claim as failing to allege antitrust injury, albeit for reasons not relevant to Vantage's claims. See id. at 321.

[19] The court also reasoned that there was no antitrust injury because the termination of the lease was the product of "downstream" allegedly anticompetitive conduct. Id. at 320. The court found that courts generally do not recognize antitrust injury for the termination of a contract or lease that is caused by "downstream" anticompetitive conduct, i.e., conduct by entities that are closer to the consumer in the stream of commerce than the plaintiff. See id. (citing 2 P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law, 350(f-g), at 422-23 (2d ed. 2000) ("When a downstream firm merely substitutes one supplier for another, there is certainly injury-in-fact to the terminated supplier, but there is rarely antitrust injury.")). Applying this rule to Jebaco's claims, the court reasoned that Jebaco had not suffered antitrust injury because it alleged that its lease (assignment) [50] was terminated as a result of anticompetitive acts by casinos operators, which are farther "downstream" in the market for gambling than Jebaco as lessor. Id.

relevant geographic market, with only one viable competitor, Trap Rock. Id. at 119. As a distributor of the crushed stone, Port Dock was Tilcon's biggest customer. Id. In that same time period, Tilcon tried to raise prices unilaterally, but when Trap Rock did not follow suit, Tilcon was forced to lower prices to their former levels. Id. Tilcon then decided to sell its crushed stone directly to Port Dock's customers, thereby integrating vertically into the distributer level of the market and competing [51] with Port Dock. Id. at 120. After its vertical integration, Tilcon acquired Trap Rock, perfecting a complete monopoly in the manufacture of crushed stone in the relevant market. Id. With its newfound monopoly, Tilcon refused to sell stone to Port Dock, and, because Port Dock lacked any alternate supply of stone, proposed buying Port Dock's assets at a sacrifice to Port Dock. Id. Port Dock sold its assets and eventually filed for bankruptcy; Tilcon, after acquiring Port Dock's assets, raised the price for crushed stone. Id. The Second Circuit held that Port Dock had not suffered antitrust injury. Id. at 124. The anticompetitive effect of Tilcon's acquisition of Trap Rock, according to the court, was the specter of Tilcon rasing prices and restricting output due to its enhanced monopoly power. Id. at 123. The court identified the injury to Port Rock as Tilcon's complete refusal to deal with Port Rock, an injury that the court distinguished from a claim that Tilcon had raised prices, which Port Rock conceded had never occurred. Id. Based on these findings, the court reasoned that Port Dock's injury of being cut off by Tilcon was unconnected to the anticompetitive danger of monopolization, i.e., increased prices, because [52] it was something Tilcon "could have just as well done without having monopoly power." Id. The court stated that antitrust injury was suffered not by Port Dock, but instead by "the dealers or consumers who were forced to buy at higher prices (or inferior quality) because the defendant had acquired the market power to charge monopoly prices." Id. at 124.

In Fischer, the Eighth Circuit held that a regional airline did not suffer antitrust injury from a national airline where the complaint alleged that the national airline monopolized the market for air service to a particular destination and the regional airline was injured because the national airline, post-monopolization, terminated its service contract with the regional airline at that destination. Id. at 600. The regional airline plaintiff, Fischer, was the exclusive carrier for all of Northwest Airlines's regional flights originating in Detroit under a contract that either party could terminate with or without cause. Id. at 595-96. Northwest then acquired Republic Airlines, another national carrier at the time, which had its own regional airline partner, Simmons Airlines, exclusively servicing its regional flights through Detroit. Id. at 596. That contract was not terminable [53] at will. Id. After considerable effort to mediate the inevitable conflicting demands of Fischer and Simmons, Northwest terminated Fischer, its Detroit carrier. Id. at 597. Fischer sued Northwest under Section 2 for monopolizing the Detroit market, of which Northwest had gained a 75% share though its acquisition of Republic. Id. The court reasoned that Fischer had not plead antitrust injury because its injury, the termination of its Detroit service agreement, had not been caused by the anticompetitive effects of the Republic acquisition, such as [*629] increased prices; instead it was caused by Northwest's need to eliminate redundant services out of Detroit, a need that Northwest would have had irrespective of its market power. Id. at 600.

In Serpa, the First Circuit held that a distributer did not suffer antitrust injury from a manufacturer where the complaint alleged that the manufacturer illegally monopolized the manufacturing level through acquisitions and the retailer was injured because the manufacturer, post-monopolization, terminated their distribution arrangement. See 199 F.3d at 8, 12. Prior to it filing suit, Serpa had been the exclusive distributor for certain plumbing parts manufactured by Anaco, one of several manufacturers [54] for these parts. Id. at 9. One of those competing manufacturers, McWane, acquired Anaco, giving it an 85% share of the relevant manufacturing market, and thereafter terminated Serpa as a distributor of Anaco products. Id. Serpa sued McWane for attempting to monopolize the relevant manufacturing market. Id. Relying heavily on Fischer, the court reasoned that Serpa had not suffered antitrust injury because its alleged injury, McWane's termination of the distribution contract, was "neither connected with, nor resulted from, defendant's market power in the [relevant plumbing part manufacturing] industry." Id. at 11-12.

Vantage argues that almost all of these cases are distinguishable from its claims. Record Document 89, pp. 25-59. Vantage distinguished the position and nature of the plaintiff in Jebaco, a lessor standing above the defendants in the stream of commerce, from itself, a customer standing below Willis-Knighton in the healthcare stream of commerce. Id. at 28 (emphasizing that the consumer is the intended beneficiary under antitrust law). This distinction, while in itself true, does not disturb Jebaco's reasoning of the defendant's termination of the lease contract could have been done just as easily regardless [55] of its antitrust violations. See 587 F.3d at 320. Next, Vantage attempts to distinguish Willis-Knighton's refusal to contract from the contract termination in Fischer and Serpa, arguing in effect that while those courts found that those specific acquisitions had not in fact increased the monopolist's power to terminate the contracts at issue there, those findings do not compel a conclusion that monopoly power can never under any circumstance enhance the ability of a monopolist to terminate or create a contract. Regarding Fischer, Vantage argues that unlike Northwest's power to terminate its contract with Fischer, which the court found "was in no way enhanced by the acquisition," 883 F.2d at 600, Willis-Knighton's power to refuse to contract with Vantage was enhanced by its acquisitions of competing healthcare providers because the acquisitions "resulted in fewer and fewer physicians who were available to Vantage in its network," Record Document 89, pp. 23-27. Vantage makes essentially the same argument with respect to Serpa.

Vantage's reasoning here is faulty for two reasons. First, it misses the logic underlying the holdings in Fischer and its cousin cases, which is that in all instances, a firm can terminate a [56] contractual relationship (or refuse to start a contractual relationship) just as easily without market power as it can with market power. Second, it seems to recharacterize Vantage's injury not as Willis-Knighton's refusal to deal, but the shrinking pool of providers available to contract with Vantage. This is the consequence of Vantage's injury, not its injury in itself. If Willis-Knighton had agreed to contract with Vantage, Vantage would be unaffected by the shrinking pool of non-Willis-Knighton providers in the Shreveport area.

Vantage also argues that Christian Schmidt Brewing v. G. Heileman Brewing [*630] supports the conclusion that acquisitions coupled with refusals to deal can give rise to antitrust injury. See 753 F.2d 1354 (6th Cir. 1985). There, the Sixth Circuit held that small brewers in the Midwest suffered antitrust injury from two large Midwest brewers where the complaint alleged that large brewers illegally merged (under Section 7 of the Clayton Act) and the small brewers would be injured because the brewers combined together would be so big that they would be able to predatorily induce all wholesalers and distributors not to do business with the small brewers.[20] Id. at 1355-57. This holding is distinguished from Port Dock and [57] the like for two reasons. First, the plaintiff competed with the defendant at the market level that the defendant is alleged to have monopolized, rather than participated with the defendant sitting upstream, see Jebaco, 587 F.3d at 319-20, or downstream, see, e.g., Serpa, 199 F.3d at 8-9, of the market level that the defendant is alleged to have monopolized. Second, and more important, the plaintiff's injury, the deprivation of wholesalers and distributors, resulted from the anticompetitive effects of the merger because it could only could have occurred with the heightened monopoly power that flowed from the merger, unlike the injuries in Port Dock and its kin, which did not result from anticompetitive effects of the acquisitions because they just as easily could have occurred without the increased monopoly power that flowed from the acquisitions, see, e.g., Port Dock 507 F.3d at 124.

Thus, to the extent that Vantage has alleged that it was injured by Willis-Knighton refusing to contract with it, Vantage has not alleged anticompetitive conduct. See, e.g., Jebaco, 587 F.3d at 319-20. Like the defendants' refusals to contract with the plaintiffs in Jebaco and its kin, Willis-Knighton's refusal [58] to contract with Vantage was unrelated to its ability to exploit its monopoly power because Willis-Knighton could have decided not to contract with Vantage even if it had no market power whatsoever. See, e.g., id.

However, to the extent that Vantage has alleged that it was injured because Willis-Knighton demanded exorbitant reimbursement rates, it has plead antitrust injury. Unlike the injuries alleged by the plaintiff in Port Dock and the like, Willis-Knighton requiring high reimbursement rates is the type of injury that flows from Willis-Knighton's market power because Willis-Knighton could not have demanded what were effectively higher prices without market power. See Port Dock, 507 F.3d at 123 (finding that the plaintiff never alleged that the defendant was injured by increased prices.) Although it survives 12(b)(6) dismissal, this theory of antitrust standing may not constitute antitrust injury if later Vantage cannot demonstrate that Willis-Knighton increased prices as result of its anticompetitive acts. That is, if Willis-Knighton had always demanded high prices from Vantage—both before and after its attainment of market power—then Vantage suffered no antitrust injury because the high prices demanded [59] of it did not flow from Willis-Knighton's increased market power. In its complaint, Vantage indicates that for fifteen years, it has tried to contract with Willis-Knighton, but without success. The complaint is silent on when these efforts were unsuccessful because Willis-Knighton demanded high prices and when they were unsuccessful because Willis-Knighton refused to deal. The complaint is also silent on whether the prices [*631] demanded by Willis-Knighton ever increased. Nonetheless, Vantage's allegation of Willis-Knighton demanding high reimbursement rates for its services states a plausible theory of antitrust injury and is thus sufficient to survive 12(b)(6) dismissal.

Based on the above discussion, the Court therefore DENIES Willis-Knighton's motion to dismiss based on Vantage's lack of antitrust injury.

C. Insufficient Detail Under Iqbal and Twombly

Finally, Willis-Knighton argues that all of Vantage's claims must be dismissed because they lack the specificity required under Twombly and Iqbal. Record Document 90, pp. 21-27. Under Twombly, a complaint must allege facts sufficient "to raise a right to relief above the speculative level" so that a right to relief "is plausible on its face." [60] 550 U.S. at 555, 570. Also, "[a] complaint must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain a recovery under some viable legal theory." In re Plywood Antitrust Litig., 655 F.2d 627, 641 (5th Cir. Unit A Sept. 1981). So long as it raises a plausible right of recovery and puts the defendant on notice of the plaintiff's claim and grounds upon which it rests, however, the complaint does not need to specify detailed factual allegations. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Generally, then, Vantage's complaint must allege facts that, either directly or inferentially, plausibly show that Vantage has met all the elements of all of its causes of action in this suit. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555; In re Plywood, 655 F.2d at 641. Willis-Knighton, however, has not challenged all aspects of Vantage's allegations under Twombly and instead attacks two categories of Vantage's allegations.

1. Whether Vantage Plausibly Alleged that LSU Physicians Working at the Joint Clinics Will Drop Vantage

Willis-Knighton argues that Vantage's allegations about Willis-Knighton's involvement with LSU fail to state a claim under Twombly because they are conclusory with respect to how Vantage would be injured by LSU physicians treating patients at Willis-Knighton clinics. Record Document 90, pp. 21-24.

Vantage's complaint must allege facts [61] that, either directly or inferentially, plausibly show that Vantage has been injured. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555; In re Plywood, 655 F.2d at 641; Torch Liquidating Trust ex rel. Bridge Assocs. L.L.C. v. Stockstill, 561 F.3d 377, 384 (5th Cir. 2009). Although injury is not strictly an element of an antitrust cause of action, it is necessary for recovery and thus courts may dismiss a claim under Twombly for failing to provide sufficient detail explaining how the defendant's conduct would injure the plaintiff. See Torch Liquidating, 561 F.3d at 384 ("A complaint must contain direct allegations or permit properly drawn inferences to support 'every material point necessary to sustain a recovery.'" (quoting Campbell v. City of San Antonio, 43 F.3d 973, 975 (5th Cir. 1995))).

Willis-Knighton cites two cases to support its argument. Corr Wireless Commc'ns, L.L.C. v. AT&T, Inc., is illustrative of the level of specificity required to plead injury. See 893 F. Supp. 2d 789 (N.D. Miss. 2012). There, a regional wireless carrier, Corr, sued AT&T in antitrust in part because it alleged that AT&T was going to abuse its monopoly power over certain wireless frequencies to deny Corr access to roaming service. Id. at 799. The extent of the pleaded basis for this allegation was Corr's "prior knowledge and experience." Id. At oral argument Corr was [*632] likewise unable to produce any allegations of present conduct by AT&T that served as the basis for its assertion that AT&T would deny it roaming service. [62] Id. The court dismissed Corr's roaming antitrust claim under Rule 12(b)(6) in part because its allegation of future conduct was too conclusory and speculative to state a claim for relief under Twombly. Id. at 807. The court reasoned that similar to the plaintiff's assertion in Twombly that an agreement to conspire, a section 1 element, existed because there was parallel conduct among the defendants, "conclusory speculation [by Corr] regarding what could happen at some unknown date in the future also fails to plausibly state a violation of federal antitrust laws." Id.

The second case cited by Willis-Knighton, In re Elevator Antitrust Litigation, shows the limits to which an antitrust plaintiff can rely on conduct by the defendant in one context to plausibly plead that the defendant has engaged in the same conduct in another context. See 502 F.3d 47, 52 (2d Cir. 2007). There, the Second Circuit held that the plaintiff's claim was not entitled to relief under Twombly where its allegation of an agreement to violate antitrust law was supported in part by allegations that the defendants were under investigation in Europe for similar agreements to violate antitrust law. Id. 50-52. The plaintiffs, elevator maintenance companies, sued the defendants, manufacturers and sellers [63] of elevators, for conspiring to fix prices and to monopolize the elevator maintenance market, causes of action under sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act that require proof of an agreement among the defendant manufacturers to so conspire. Id. at 49. The complaint supported its allegation of such an agreement in part with an allegation that the defendants were under investigation by European antitrust officials for colluding to similarly fix prices for their elevators in the European market. Id. at 51 & n.6. The court held that the allegations about European antitrust collusion by itself did not provide a plausible ground to support the inference of an unlawful agreement to conspire in the United States and dismissed the plaintiffs' claims. Id. at 49, 52. The court reasoned, "Allegations of anticompetitive wrongdoing in Europe—absent any evidence of linkage between such foreign conduct and conduct here—is merely to suggest (in defendants' words) that 'if it happened there, it could have happened here.'" Id. at 52 (emphasis added). "Without an adequate allegation of facts linking transactions in Europe to transactions and effects" in the United States, the court concluded that "plaintiffs' conclusory allegations do not 'nudge[their] [64] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 550).

Vantage's allegation of how physicians migrating from University Health to LSU clinics would harm Vantage is distinguishable from the allegation of harm in Corr Wireless. Unlike the plaintiff in Corr Wireless, who was unable to produce any allegations of present conduct by the defendant that served as the basis for its assertion that the defendant would injure it in the future, Vantage has described with some detail how Willis-Knighton is presently engaged in a joint clinic with LSU physicians working at University Health. And Vantage's reliance on prior conduct by Willis-Knighton and LSU to establish that LSU physicians working at the joint clinics will drop Vantage is distinguishable from the plaintiff's reliance in Elevator Antitrust on the defendant's antitrust violations in Europe to establish that the defendant violated antitrust laws in the United States. Unlike the plaintiff in Elevator Antitrust, who was unable to provide any link explaining why the antitrust violations by the defendants in one market [*633] would make it plausible that the defendants committed the same violations in a different market, Vantage [65] has provided a link to explain how the LSU/Willis-Knighton clinics are like other Willis-Knighton clinics in which LSU physicians practice and do not accept Vantage Tier-1 coverage. Specifically, Vantage has alleged that LSU physicians, currently in their Tier-1 network, will effectively become employees of Willis-Knighton when they participate in the joint LSU-Willis-Knighton clinics because of Willis-Knighton's control over billing and referrals. Id. at 23-24, 28, 46-47. Vantage has also alleged that in the past, whenever a physician under contract with Vantage joined the Willis-Knighton Physician's Network, that physician immediately cancels his contract with Vantage. Id. at 58. These facts provide the causal link that was missing in Elevator Antitrust. Vantage's claims of future harm by Willis-Knighton's actions thus should not be dismissed under Twombly.

Amid this discussion, Willis-Knighton also inserts an Article III standing rationale for its arguments that Vantage's claims of injury are too speculative. See Record Document 90, p. 23, and 97, p. 8. Vantage does not directly address this argument. Article III standing requires in part that the plaintiff demonstrate it has suffered injury in fact, which is "an [66] invasion of a legally protected interest that is (a) concrete and particularized and (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical." Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560, 112 S. Ct. 2130, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351 (1992) (citations omitted). Allegations of future injury "must be certainly impending to constitute injury in fact." Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 158, 110 S. Ct. 1717, 109 L. Ed. 2d 135 (1990).

To establish standing for future injury, a plaintiff needs to credibly explain how present facts create a realistic threat of future injury. See Lyons, 461 U.S. at 98; United Transp. Union v. Interstate Commerce Comm'n, 891 F.2d 908, 913, 282 U.S. App. D.C. 38 (D.C. Cir. 913). In Lyons, the Supreme Court reviewed the claim of an individual who alleged that he had been injured by an unjustified chokehold administered to him by a Los Angeles police officer and that he "justifiably fears that any contact he has with Los Angeles Police officers may result in his being choked and strangled to death." 461 U.S. at 98. The Court dismissed on Article III grounds the complainant's prayer for an injunction forbidding the use of such chokeholds by police officers, finding it unduly speculative that the complainant "was likely to suffer future injury from the use of the chokeholds by police officers." Id. at 105. The Court asserted that, "to have a case or controversy with the City that could sustain [his claim for an injunction, the complainant] would have to credibly allege that he faced a realistic [67] threat from the future application of the City's policy." Id. at 106-07 n.7.

Similarly, in United Transportation Union, the D.C. Circuit held that a union plaintiff failed to plead Article III injury where it alleged that the ICC's approval of interlocking directorates of railroad companies would injure the workers of the affected railroad companies. 891 F.2d at 913. The union had alleged that its members "stand to be hurt" by the "financial wrecking" that would result from the ICC approving the interlocking directorate and sought to enjoin the ICC's approval of the interlocking directorate. Id. The court held that the union had failed to allege Article III injury because it offered no explanation for how or why the interlocking directorate would hurt either the companies or the union workers. Id. at 913-14. Without any causal explanation for how the approval of the interlocking directorate [*634] would hurt the union workers, the court reasoned that the allegation of injury in the case was "unadorned speculation" and dismissed the union's claims for want of Article III standing. Id.

Vantage has credibly explained how present facts create a realistic threat of future injury. Unlike the plaintiff's claims in Lyons and United Transportation [68] Union, which provided no information to link present facts with future injury, Vantage has, as discussed above, provided facts explaining why LSU physicians practicing at the LSU/Willis-Knighton clinics would result in those physicians leaving Vantage's Tier-1 network. See Lyons, 461 U.S. at 98; United Transp. Union 891 F.2d, at 913-14; Record Document 1, p. 58. These facts provide the causal link that creates a realistic threat of future injury to Vantage from the joint clinics. Vantage has therefore satisfied the injury-in-fact requirement of Article III standing.

2. Whether Vantage Plausibly Stated a Claim for Past Antitrust Violations by Willis-Knighton

Next, Willis-Knighton argues that Vantage's allegations about Willis-Knighton's past conduct fail to state a claim under Twombly because they allege insufficient details about either the prior alleged acquisitions or the relevant markets that Willis-Knighton monopolized/attempted to monopolize. The complaint must plead facts that, either directly or inferentially, plausibly show Willis-Knighton had market power/a dangerous probability of market power and committed acts that, when viewed as a whole, constitute anticompetitive conduct.[21] See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555; In re Plywood, 655 F.2d at 641; Assoc. Radio Serv. Co. v. Page Airways, Inc., 624 F.2d 1342, 1356 (5th Cir. 1980).

Specifically, Willis-Knighton argues that the complaint does not plausibly plead market power for Willis-Knighton's past conduct because it does not [70] provide any past market shares for Willis-Knighton. To demonstrate monopoly power, a complaint must specify the specific product and geographic market which defendant is alleged to have monopolized. Rockbit Indus. U.S.A., Inc. v. Baker Hughes, Inc., 802 F. Supp. 1544, 1550-51 (S.D. Tex. 1991). The complaint satisfies this requirement because it alleges Shreveport-Bossier as the relevant geographic market at all times and the product markets as general acute-care services, primary care, and OB/GYN. Willis-Knighton also insists that the complaint needs to state Willis-Knighton's shares in these markets at the times at which it is alleged to have committed illegal acts, but cites no case so [*635] requiring. The Court finds this standard too high; instead, all the complaint must do is plead facts that inferentially make a high market share in the past plausible. By providing the high shares in these markets that Willis-Knighton currently enjoys, the complaint has provided sufficient information to make past monopoly power plausible.

[21] The elements of Vantage's monopolization claim based [69] on Willis-Knighton's past conduct are (1) Willis-Knighton possessed market power in the relevant market and (2) Willis-Knighton engaged in anticompetitive conduct. See Stearns, 170 F.3d at 522. The elements of Vantage's attempted monopolization claim based on Willis-Knighton's past conduct are (1) Willis-Knighton engaged in anticompetitive conduct, (2) with a specific intent to monopolize, while (3) there was a dangerous probability of Willis-Knighton achieving monopoly power in a relevant market. See Spectrum Sports v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 456, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993). With respect to the anticompetitive conduct element, where the defendant is alleged to have engaged in a pattern of illegal conduct, courts assess whether a section 2 claim demonstrates anticompetitive conduct by measuring the cumulative effect of the defendant's allegedly illegal conduct, rather than evaluating each instance of allegedly illegal conduct in isolation. See Assoc. Radio, 624 F.2d at 1356 ("[N]o one of the instances of improper conduct, standing alone, would lead to section 2 liability. Taken together, however, they show a pattern of exclusionary behavior sufficient to support the jury's verdict.").

Willis-Knighton also specifically argues that the complaint provides insufficient detail about the past acquisitions, such as their dates, to plausibly plead anticompetitive conduct. The Court finds that requiring the complaint to identify the details of every [71] prior acquisition would ask more than Twombly demands. Instead, the complaint must plead facts that, when viewed together, make anticompetitive conduct plausible. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555; Assoc. Radio, 624 F.2d at 1356. The complaint accomplishes this by providing the names of all entities that Willis-Knighton has acquired, the way in which Willis-Knighton controls referrals, and the type of non-compete agreements it employs. The complaint has therefore stated a plausible claim for Willis-Knighton's prior antitrust violations. Accordingly, the Court DENIES Willis-Knighton's motion to dismiss based on Twombly and Article III.

IV. Conclusion

For all of the foregoing reasons, the Defendant's motion to dismiss [Record Document 30] is DENIED.

[*819] OPINION AND ORDER

JED S. RAKOFF, U.S.D.J.

On December 16, 2015, plaintiff Spencer Meyer, on behalf of himself and those similarly situated, filed this putative antitrust class action lawsuit against defendant Travis Kalanick, CEO and co-founder of Uber Technologies, Inc. ("Uber"). See Complaint, Dkt. 1. Mr. Meyer's First Amended Complaint, filed on January 29, 2016, alleged that Mr. Kalanick had orchestrated and facilitated an illegal price-fixing conspiracy in violation of Section 1 of the federal Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, [*820] and the New York State Donnelly Act, New York General Business Law § 340. See First Amended Complaint ("Am. Compl."), [2] Dkt. 26, ¶¶ 120-140. Plaintiff claimed, in essence, that Mr. Kalanick, while disclaiming that he was running a transportation company, had conspired with Uber drivers to use Uber's pricing algorithm to set the prices charged to Uber riders, thereby restricting price competition among drivers to the detriment of Uber riders, such as plaintiff Meyer. See id. ¶¶ 1, 7.

On February 8, 2016, defendant Kalanick moved to dismiss the Amended Complaint. See Notice of Motion, Dkt. 27. Plaintiff opposed on February 18, 2016; defendant replied on February 25, 2016; and oral argument was held on March 9, 2016.[1] Having considered all of the parties' submissions and arguments, the Court hereby denies defendant's motion to dismiss.

In ruling on a motion to dismiss, the Court accepts as true the factual allegations in the complaint and draws all reasonable inferences [3] in favor of the plaintiff. Town of Babylon v. Fed. Hous. Fin. Agency, 699 F.3d 221, 227 (2d Cir. 2012). "To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (internal quotation marks omitted). In the antitrust context, stating a claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act "requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made. Asking for plausible grounds to infer an agreement does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 556, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007).

The relevant allegations of the Amended Complaint are as follows. Uber, founded in 2009, is a technology company that produces an application for smartphone devices ("the Uber App") that matches riders with drivers (called "driver-partners"[2] . See Am. Compl. ¶¶ 2, 21, 24, 27. Uber states that it is not a transportation company and does not employ drivers. See id. ¶¶ 2, 23. Defendant Kalanick, in addition to being the co-founder and CEO of Uber, is a driver who has used the Uber app. See id. ¶ 3. Plaintiff Meyer is a resident of Connecticut, who has used [4] Uber car services in New York. See id. ¶ 7.

Through the Uber App, users can request private drivers to pick them up and drive them to their desired location. See id. ¶ 24. Uber facilitates payment of the fare by charging the user's credit card or other payment information on file. See id. ¶ 32. Uber collects a percentage of the fare as a software licensing fee and remits the remainder to the driver. See Am. Compl. ¶ 27. Drivers using the Uber app do not compete on price, see id. ¶ 2, and cannot negotiate fares with drivers for rides, see id. ¶ 34. Instead, drivers charge the fares set by the Uber algorithm. See [*821] id.

[1] During oral argument, the Court invited both sides to submit letters regarding certain studies cited by plaintiff in the Amended Complaint. See Transcript of Proceedings dated March 9, 2016 ("Tr."), 24:12-16. These letters, respectively dated March 11, 2016 ("Pl. Letter") and March 15, 2016 ("Def. Letter"), will be docketed along with this Opinion.

[2] The Court uses "drivers" and sometimes "Uber drivers" instead of Uber's term "driver-partners" for the sake of simplicity, but this usage is not meant to imply any employment relationship between Uber and these drivers, which defendant firmly denies.

¶ 2. Though Uber claims to allow drivers to depart downward from the fare set by the algorithm, there is no practical mechanism by which drivers can do so. See id. ¶ 69. Uber's "surge pricing" model, designed by Mr. Kalanick, permits fares to rise up to ten times the standard fare during times of high demand. See id. ¶¶ 26, 48, [5] 50. Plaintiff alleges that the drivers have a "common motive to conspire" because adhering to Uber's pricing algorithm can yield supra-competitive prices, Am. Compl. SI 90, and that if the drivers were acting independently instead of in concert, "some significant portion" would not agree to follow the Uber pricing algorithm. See id. ¶ 93.

Plaintiff further claims that the drivers "have had many opportunities to meet and enforce their commitment to the unlawful agreement." Am. Compl. ¶ 92. Plaintiff alleges that Uber holds meetings with potential drivers when Mr. Kalanick and his subordinates decide to offer Uber App services in a new geographic location. See id. ¶ 40. Uber also organizes events for its drivers to get together, such as a picnic in September 2015 in Oregon with over 150 drivers and their families in attendance, and other "partner appreciation" events in places including New York City. See id. ¶ 41. Uber provides drivers with information regarding upcoming events likely to create high demand for transportation and informs the drivers what their increased earnings might have been if they had logged on to the Uber App during busy periods. See id. ¶ 58. Moreover, plaintiff [6] alleges, in September 2014 drivers using the Uber App in New York City colluded with one another to negotiate the reinstitution of higher fares for riders using UberBLACK and UberSUV services (certain Uber car service "experiences"). See id. ¶¶ 25, 87. Mr. Kalanick, as Uber's CEO, directed or ratified negotiations between Uber and these drivers, and Uber ultimately agreed to raise fares. See id. ¶ 87.

As to market definition, plaintiff alleges that Uber competes in the "relatively new mobile app-generated ride-share service market," of which Uber has an approximately 80% market share. Amended Complaint ¶ 94-95. Uber's chief competitor in this market, Lyft, has only a 20% market share, and a third competitor, Sidecar, left the market at the end of 2015. See id. ¶¶ 95-96. Although, plaintiff contends, neither taxis nor traditional cars for hire are reasonable substitutes for mobile app-generated ride-share service, Uber's own experts have suggested that in certain cities in the U.S., Uber captures 50% to 70% of business customers in the combined market of taxis, cars for hire, and mobile-app generated ride-share services. See id. ¶ 107.

Plaintiff claims to sue on behalf of the following [7] class: "all persons in the United States who, on one or more occasions, have used the Uber App to obtain rides from Uber driver-partners and paid fares for their rides set by the Uber pricing algorithm," with certain exclusions, such as Mr. Kalanick. See id. ¶ 113. Plaintiff also identifies a "subclass" of riders who have paid fares based on surge pricing. See id. ¶ 114. Plaintiff alleges that he and the putative class have suffered antitrust injury because, were it not for Mr. Kalanick's conspiracy to fix the fares charged by Uber drivers, drivers would have competed on price and Uber's fares would have been "substantially lower." See id. ¶ 109. Plaintiff also contends that Mr. Kalanick's design has reduced output and that, as "independent studies have shown," the effect of surge pricing is to lower demand so that prices remain artificially high. Am. Compl. ¶ 110. Based on these allegations, plaintiff claims that Mr. Kalanick has violated the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, and [*822] the Donnelly Act, New York General Business Law § 340. See id. ¶¶ 120-140.

The Sherman Act prohibits "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce." 15 U.S.C. § 1. "[A] plaintiff claiming a § 1 violation must first [8] establish a combination or some form of concerted action between at least two legally distinct economic entities." Capital Imaging Associates, P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Associates, Inc., 996 F.2d 537, 542 (2d Cir. 1993). "If a § 1 plaintiff establishes the existence of an illegal contract or combination, it must then proceed to demonstrate that the agreement constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade either per se or under the rule of reason." Id. at 542.

"Conduct considered illegal per se is invoked only in a limited class of cases, where a defendant's actions are so plainly harmful to competition and so obviously lacking in any redeeming pro-competitive values that they are conclusively presumed illegal without further examination." Id. (internal citation and quotation marks omitted). By contrast, "most antitrust claims are analyzed under a Arule of reason,′ according to which the finder of fact must decide whether the questioned practice imposes an unreasonable restraint on competition, taking into account a variety of factors, including specific information about the relevant business, its condition before and after the restraint was imposed, and the restraint's history, nature, and effect." State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 10, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997).

Antitrust law also distinguishes between vertical and horizontal price restraints. "Restraints imposed [9] by agreement between competitors have traditionally been denominated as horizontal restraints, and those imposed by agreement between firms at different levels of distribution as vertical restraints." Bus. Elecs. Corp. v. Sharp Elecs. Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 730, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988). "Restraints that are per se unlawful include horizontal agreements among competitors to fix prices," while, at least in the context of resale price maintenance, "[v]ertical price restraints are to be judged according to the rule of reason." Leegin Creative Leather Products, Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 886, 907, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007). In the instant case, the Court finds that plaintiff has adequately pled both a horizontal and a vertical conspiracy.

As to the horizontal conspiracy, plaintiff alleges that Uber drivers agree to participate in a conspiracy among themselves when they assent to the terms of Uber's written agreement (the "Driver Terms") and accept riders using the Uber App. See Am. Compl. ¶¶ 70-71. In doing so, plaintiff indicates, drivers agree to collect fares through the Uber App, which sets fares for all Uber drivers according to the Uber pricing algorithm. See id.[3] In [*823] plaintiff's view, Uber drivers forgo competition in which they would otherwise have engaged because they "are guaranteed that other Uber drivers will not undercut them on price." See id. ¶ 72; Memorandum of [10] Law in Opposition to Defendant Travis Kalanick's Motion to Dismiss ("Pl. Opp. Br."), Dkt. 33, at 11. Without the assurance that all drivers will charge the price set by Uber, plaintiff contends, adopting Uber's pricing algorithm would often not be in an individual driver's best interest, since not competing with other Uber drivers on price may result in lost business opportunities. See Am. Compl. ¶ 72. The capacity to generate "supra-competitive prices" through agreement to the Uber pricing algorithm thus provides, according to plaintiff, a "common motive to conspire" on the part of Uber drivers. See Amended Complaint ¶ 90. Plaintiff also draws on its allegations about meetings among Uber drivers and the "September 2014 conspiracy," in which Uber agreed to reinstitute higher fares after negotiations with drivers, to bolster its claim of a horizontal conspiracy. See Pl. Opp. Br. at 14-15; Am. Compl. ¶¶ 41, 87, 92. In plaintiff's view, defendant Kalanick is liable as the organizer of the price-fixing conspiracy, Am. Compl. ¶¶ 76, 88; Pl. Opp. Br. at 9, and as an Uber driver himself, see id. ¶¶ 80-85.

Defendant Kalanick argues, however, that the drivers' agreement to Uber's Driver Terms evinces no horizontal agreement among drivers themselves, as distinct from vertical agreements between each driver and Uber. See Memorandum of Law in Support of Defendant Travis Kalanick's Motion to Dismiss ("Def. Br."), Dkt. 28, at 9, 12-13; Transcript of Oral Argument dated March 9, 2016 ("Tr.") 3:19-22. According to Mr. Kalanick, drivers' individual decisions to enter into contractual arrangements with Uber constitute mere independent action that is insufficient to support plaintiff's claim of a conspiracy. See Def. Br. at 9. Defendant asserts that the most "natural" explanation for drivers' conduct is that each driver "independently decided it was in his [13] or her best interest to enter a vertical agreement with Uber," and doing so could be in a driver's best interest because, for example, Uber matches riders with drivers and processes payment. See Def. Br. at 12-13. In defendant's view, the fact that "a condition of [the agreement with Uber] was that the driver-partner agree to use Uber's pricing algorithm" does not diminish the independence of drivers' decisions. See id. at 13.

[3] Defendant Kalanick contends that Uber's Driver Terms "do provide that driver-partners [11] have the discretion to charge less than the suggested price determined by Uber's pricing algorithm." Reply Memorandum of Law in Support of Defendant Travis Kalanick's Motion to Dismiss, Dkt. 34 ("Def. Reply Br.") at 2 n.1, citing Declaration of Michael Colman, Dkt. 29, Exhibit 2 ("Driver Terms") ¶ 4.1 ("Customer shall always have the right to: (i) charge a fare that is less than the pre-arranged fare . . ."). "Customer" here refers to "an independent company in the business of providing transportation services," that is, Uber's driver-partners. See Driver Terms; Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Defendant Travis Kalanick's Motion to Dismiss ("Pl. Opp. Br.") at 4. Plaintiff points out, however, that the Driver Terms also require drivers to agree that "the Fare provided under the Fare Calculation is the only payment Customer will receive in connection with the provision of Transportation Services," Driver Terms ¶ 4.1, and that more importantly, "there is no mechanism by which drivers can charge anything but the Appdictated fare." Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Defendant Travis Kalanick's Motion to Dismiss ("Pl. Opp. Br."), Dkt. 33, at 4. For the purposes of evaluating defendant's [12] motion to dismiss, the Court will assume that drivers have no practical mechanism by which to depart from the fares set by Uber's algorithm. Defendant acknowledges that any discretion drivers may have to charge a lower fare "is not material to this motion," Def. Reply Br. at 2 n.l, and oral argument proceeded on the assumption that Uber sets mandatory prices for drivers to charge. See Transcript of Oral Argument dated March 9, 2016 at 4:12-16.

It follows, defendant contends, that such vertical arrangements do not support a horizontal conspiracy claim. See Def. Br. at 13-14, citing, e.g., Leegin, 551 U.S. at 885 (manufacturer's agreements requiring retailers to charge certain minimum prices, a form of "vertical minimum resale price maintenance," were to be judged by the rule of reason); United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307, [*824] 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992, 1919 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 460 (1919) (a manufacturer with no purpose to create a monopoly may "exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal" and "announce in advance the circumstances under which he will refuse to sell").

The Court, however, is not persuaded to dismiss plaintiff's horizontal conspiracy claim. In Interstate Circuit v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 59 S. Ct. 467, 83 L. Ed. 610 (1939), the Supreme Court held that competing movie distributors had unlawfully restrained trade when they each agreed to a theater operator's terms, [14] including price restrictions, as indicated in a letter addressed to all the distributors. For an illegal conspiracy to exist, the Supreme Court stated:

> It was enough that, knowing that concerted action was contemplated and invited, the distributors gave their adherence to the scheme and participated in it. Acceptance by competitors, without previous agreement, of an invitation to participate in a plan, the necessary consequence of which, if carried out, is restraint of interstate commerce, is sufficient to establish an unlawful conspiracy under the Sherman Act.

Interstate Circuit, 306 U.S. at 226-27. Much more recently, the Second Circuit stated:

> [C]ourts have long recognized the existence of "hub-and-spoke" conspiracies in which an entity at one level of the market structure, the "hub," coordinates an agreement among competitors at a different level, the "spokes." These arrangements consist of both vertical agreements between the hub and each spoke and a horizontal agreement among the spokes to adhere to the [hub's] terms, often because the spokes would not have gone along with [the vertical agreements] except on the understanding that the other [spokes] were agreeing to the same thing.

United States v. Apple, Inc., 791 F.3d 290, 314 (2d Cir. 2015), cert. denied, Mar. 7, 2016 (internal citation [15] and quotation marks omitted); see also Laumann v. Nat'l Hockey League, 907 F. Supp. 2d 465, 486-87 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) ("where parties to vertical agreements have knowledge that other market participants are bound by identical agreements, and their participation is contingent upon that knowledge, they may be considered participants in a horizontal agreement in restraint of trade.").

In this case, plaintiff has alleged that drivers agree with Uber to charge certain fares with the clear understanding that all other Uber drivers are agreeing to charge the same fares. See Amended Complaint ¶¶ 70-71. These agreements are organized and facilitated by defendant Kalanick, who as at least an occasional Uber driver, is also a member of the horizontal conspiracy. See id. ¶¶ 76, 84.

On a motion to dismiss, the Court is required to draw all reasonable inferences in plaintiff's favor. See Town of Babylon, 699 F.3d at 227. Given this standard, the Court finds that plaintiffs have plausibly alleged a conspiracy in which drivers sign up for Uber precisely "on the understanding that the other [drivers] were agreeing to the same" pricing algorithm, and in which drivers' agreements with Uber would "be against their own interests were they acting independently." Apple, 791 F.3d at 314, 320. Further, drivers' ability to benefit from reduced [16] price competition with other drivers by agreeing to Uber's Driver Terms plausibly constitutes "a common motive to conspire." Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 822 F.2d 246, 254 (2d Cir. 1987). The fact that drivers may also, in signing up for Uber, seek to benefit from other services that Uber provides, such as connecting riders to drivers and processing [*825] payment, is not to the contrary. Of course, whether plaintiff's allegations are in fact accurate is a different matter, to be left to the fact-finding process.

The Court's conclusion that plaintiff has alleged a plausible horizontal conspiracy is bolstered by plaintiff's other allegations concerning agreement among drivers. Plaintiff, as noted supra, contends that Uber organizes events for drivers to get together, see Am. Compl. ¶ 41, and, more importantly, that Mr. Kalanick agreed to raise fares following drivers' efforts to negotiate higher rates in September 2014. See id. ¶ 87.[4] While it is true that these allegations about agreements among drivers reaching even beyond acceptance of Uber's Driver Terms are not extensive, see Def. Reply Br. at 7 n.8, nonetheless, they provide additional support for a horizontal conspiracy, and plaintiff need not present a direct, "smoking gun" evidence of a conspiracy, [17] particularly at the pleading stage. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, Md. v. Citigroup, Inc., 709 F.3d 129, 136 (2d Cir. 2013).

More basically, it is well to remember that a Sherman Act conspiracy is but one form of conspiracy, a concept that is as ancient as it is broad. It is fundamental to the law of conspiracy that the agreements that form the essence of the misconduct are not to be judged by technical niceties but by practical realities. Sophisticated conspirators often reach their agreements as much by the wink and the nod as by explicit agreement, and the implicit agreement may be far more potent, and sinister, just by virtue of being implicit. Recently, for example, in United States v. Ulbricht, the Government alleged that defendant Ulbricht had organized an online marketplace for illicit goods and services called Silk Road. See United States v. Ulbricht, 31 F. Supp. 3d 540, 546-47 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). In ruling on motions in limine [18] in Ulbricht, Judge Forrest rejected the defense's argument that transactions among Silk Road's users gave rise to "only buy-sell relationships and not conspiratorial behavior" or, at most, to "a multitude of discrete conspiracies." United States v. Ulbricht, 79 F. Supp. 3d 466, 481 (S.D.N.Y. 2015). Instead, Judge Forrest noted that the Government charged the defendant with sitting "atop an overarching single conspiracy, which included all vendors who sold any type of narcotics on Silk Road at any time." Id. at 490. In the instant case, Uber's digitally decentralized nature does not prevent the App from constituting a "marketplace" through which Mr. Kalanick organized a horizontal conspiracy among drivers.

Defendant argues, however, that plaintiff's alleged conspiracy is "wildly implausible" and "physically impossible," since it involves agreement "among hundreds of thousands of independent transportation providers all across the United States." Def. Br. at 1. Yet as plaintiff's counsel pointed out at oral argument, the capacity to orchestrate such an agreement is the "genius" of Mr. Kalanick and his company, which, through the magic of smartphone technology, can invite hundreds of thousands of drivers in far-flung locations to agree to Uber's terms. See Tr. [19] 12:15-16. The advancement of technological means for the orchestration of large-scale price-fixing conspiracies need not leave antitrust law behind. Cf. Ulbricht, 31 F. Supp. 3d at [*826] 559 ("if there were an automated telephone line that offered others the opportunity to gather together to engage in narcotics trafficking by pressing "1," this would surely be powerful evidence of the button-pusher's agreement to enter the conspiracy. Automation is effected through a human design; here, Ulbricht is alleged to have been the designer of Silk Road ."). The fact that Uber goes to such lengths to portray itself - one might even say disguise itself - as the mere purveyor of an "app" cannot shield it from the consequences of its operating as much more.

Recent jurisprudence on vertical resale price maintenance agreements does not, as defendant would have it, undermine plaintiff's claim of an illegal horizontal agreement. See Def. Br. at 15. In Leegin, the Supreme Court held that resale price maintenance agreements - e.g., a retailer's agreement with a manufacturer not to discount the manufacturer's goods beneath a certain price - are to be judged by the rule of reason, unlike horizontal agreements to fix prices, which are per [20] se illegal. See Leegin, 551 U.S. at 886, 907. The Court cited various "procompetitive justifications for a manufacturer's use of resale price maintenance," id. at 889, and concluded that although this practice may also have anticompetitive effects, the rule of reason is the best approach to distinguishing resale price maintenance agreements that violate the antitrust laws from those that do not. See id. at 897-900.

[4] Though defendant's counsel argued at oral argument that if these events were "an antitrust violation, Mr. Kalanick would be a victim and not a participant in the conspiracy," since he allegedly initially opposed the higher rates, Tr. 37:8-9, the fact remains that, if plaintiff's allegations are taken as true, Mr. Kalanick agreed to a fare raise that set higher fares for all Uber drivers in the relevant groups.

Here, unlike in Leegin, Uber is not selling anything to drivers that is then resold to riders.[5] Moreover, the justifications for rule of reason treatment of resale price maintenance agreements offered in Leegin are not directly applicable to the instant case. See Pl. Opp. Br. at 15-16; Tr. 20-21. In particular, the Court's attention has not been drawn to concerns about free-riding Uber drivers, or to efforts that Uber drivers could make to promote the App that will be under-provided if Uber does not set a pricing algorithm. See Leegin, 551 U.S. at 890-91. While Mr. Kalanick asserts that Uber's pricing algorithm facilitates its market entry as a new brand, see Def. Br. at 16-17, this observation - which is fairly conclusory - does not rule out a horizontal conspiracy among Uber drivers, facilitated by Mr. Kalanick both as Uber's CEO and as a driver himself. [21] The Court therefore finds that plaintiff has adequately pleaded a horizontal antitrust conspiracy under Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

As to plaintiff's claim of a vertical conspiracy, a threshold question is whether plaintiff has alleged a vertical conspiracy in the Amended Complaint, which defendant denies. See Def. Reply Br. at 8; Def. Letter at 1. Although plaintiff's allegations of a vertical conspiracy are much more sparse than his contentions about a horizontal conspiracy, the Court finds that the Amended Complaint adequately pleads a vertical conspiracy between each driver and Mr. Kalanick.[6] In particular, plaintiff [*827] alleges that "[a]ll of the independent driver-partners have agreed [22] to charge the fares set by Uber's pricing algorithm," Am. Compl. ¶ 68, and that Mr. Kalanick designed this business model, see id. ¶¶ 76, 78. The Amended Complaint also includes several allegations that would be pertinent to a rule of reason, vertical price-fixing theory. See id. ¶¶ 94-108. Under the Sherman Act count, plaintiff states that the "unlawful arrangement consists of a series of agreements between Kalanick and each of the Uber driver-partners, as well as a conscious commitment among the Uber driver-partners to the common scheme of adopting the Uber pricing algorithm . . ." Am. Compl. ¶ 124. Plaintiff claims that Mr. Kalanick is per se liable as organizer of the conspiracy and as an occasional Uber driver, ¶¶ 128-29, and then states that "[i]n the alternative, Kalanick is also liable under Section 1 of the Sherman Act under a 'quick look' or 'rule of reason' analysis." Id. ¶ 130. In the Court's view, these allegations of legal theory, when coupled with the allegations of pertinent facts, are sufficient to plead a vertical conspiracy theory.

The question, then, is whether this theory is plausible under a "rule of reason" analysis. Under this analysis, "plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that the challenged action has had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market." Capital Imaging, 996 F.2d at 543. "To survive a Rule 12(b) (6) motion to dismiss, an alleged product market must bear a rational relation to the methodology courts prescribe to define a market for antitrust purposes — analysis of the interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand, and it must be plausible." Todd v. Exxon Corp., 275 F.3d 191, 200 (2d Cir. 2001) (internal citation and quotation marks omitted).

As to market definition, plaintiff defines the relevant market as the "mobile app-generated ride-share service market." Am. Compl. ¶ 94. Plaintiff alleges that Uber has an approximately 80% market share in the United States in this market; Uber's chief competitor Lyft has nearly a 20% market share; and a third competitor, Sidecar, left the market at the end of 2015. Id. ¶¶ 95-97. Plaintiff then explains that traditional taxi service is not a reasonable substitute for [24] Uber, since, for example, rides generated by a mobile app can be arranged at the push of a button and tracked on riders' mobile phones; riders need not carry cash or a credit card, or, upon arrival, spend time paying for the ride; and riders can rate drivers and see some information on them before entering the vehicle. Id. ¶ 104. Indeed, plaintiff claims, Uber has itself stated that it does not view taxis as ride-sharing competition. Id. ¶ 105.

[5] Leegin's statement that "[t]o the extent a vertical agreement setting minimum resale prices is entered upon to facilitate either type of cartel, it, too, would need to be held unlawful under the rule of reason," 551 U.S. at 893, thus does not clearly apply to the instant case, since Uber is setting no minimum resale prices. Moreover, Leegin did not purport to overrule Interstate Circuit, which, for the reasons described supra, permits a finding of a conspiracy among competitors in circumstances such as those of the instant case. See Interstate Circuit, 306 U.S. at 226-27.

[6] Indeed, defendant himself referred in the briefing to "a vertical price arrangement like that described in the Amended Complaint." Def. Br. at 17. [23] But see Def. Reply Br. at 8 ("The Amended Complaint . . . does not allege a vertical restraint in violation of the antitrust laws.").

Plaintiff also alleges that traditional cars for hire are not reasonable substitutes, since they generally need to be scheduled in advance for prearranged locations. Id. ¶ 106. However, plaintiff nevertheless contends that "Uber has obtained a significant share of business in the combined markets of taxis, cars for hire, and mobile-app generated ride-share services," and that Uber's own experts have suggested that in some U.S. cities, Uber has 50% to 70% of business customers "among all types of rides," which seems to refer to these combined markets. Id. ¶ 107.

Defendant contests plaintiff's proposed market definition, arguing that plaintiff provides inadequate justification for the exclusion not just of taxis and car services, but also of public [25] transit such as subways and buses, personal vehicle use, and walking. See Def. Br. at 18; Def. Reply Br. at [*828] 8. In defendant's view, "[e]ach of these alternatives is a clear substitute for the services provided by driver-partners." Def. Br. at 18.

One could argue this either way (and defendant's attorneys are encouraged to hereinafter walk from their offices to the courthouse to put their theory to the test). But for present purposes, plaintiff has provided plausible explanations for its proposed market definition, and the accuracy of these explanations may be tested through discovery and, if necessary, trial. "Market definition is a deeply fact-intensive inquiry [and] courts [therefore] hesitate to grant motions to dismiss for failure to plead a relevant product market." Chapman v. New York State Div. for Youth, 546 F.3d 230, 238. Plaintiff's allegation that Uber - an industry member - recognizes that it does not compete with taxis, see Am. Compl. ¶ 105, also deserves consideration. See Todd v. Exxon Corp., 275 F.3d 191, 206 (2d Cir. 2001) (declining to exclude evidence of industry recognition from the analysis of market definition). The Court finds that plaintiff has pleaded a plausible relevant product market. See Capital Imaging Associates, 996 F.2d at 546.

The Court further finds that plaintiff has adequately pleaded adverse effects in the [26] relevant market. Specifically, plaintiff pleads that "Kalanick's actions have further restrained competition by decreasing output," Am. Compl. ¶ 110 (citing "independent studies"); "Uber's market position has already helped force Sidecar out of the marketplace," id. ¶ 102; "Uber's dominant position and considerable name recognition has also made it difficult for potential competitors to enter the marketplace," id. ¶ 103.[7]

Defendant counters that Uber provides many pro-competitive benefits, see Def. Reply Br. at 9, and also disputes the conclusions that plaintiff purports to draw from the cited studies. See Def. Letter. Defendant's counter-assertions, while certainly well worth a fact-finder's consideration, do not persuade the Court to grant a motion to dismiss. The Court hence determines that plaintiff has plausibly pleaded adverse effects in the relevant market. Consequently, the Court finds that plaintiff has presented a plausible claim of a vertical conspiracy under Section 1 of the [27] Sherman Act.

Finally, the Court addresses plaintiff's state law Donnelly Act claim. The Second Circuit has held that this New York antitrust statute "was modeled on the Sherman Act and has generally been construed in accordance with federal precedents." Williams v. Citigroup Inc., 659 F.3d 208, 211 n.2 (2d Cir. 2011). Though plaintiff contends that his Donnelly Act claim survives even if his Sherman Act claim fails, see Pl. Opp. Br. at 21, the Court has no occasion to assess this contention, for it holds that plaintiff's Sherman Act claim withstands defendant's motion to dismiss and, for the same reasons, the Court declines to dismiss plaintiff's Donnelly Act claim.[8] [7] In plaintiff's letter submitted after oral argument, plaintiff further described the "independent studies" quoted anonymously in Amended Complaint ¶ 110 that supposedly support these assertions. See Pl. Letter.

---

[8] Defendant argues that plaintiff is equitably estopped from avoiding the class action waiver in the user agreement that plaintiff made with Uber. See Def. Br. at 21; Colman Declaration, Dkt. 29, Exhibit 1 (User Agreement), at 8-9. The relevant provision of the User Agreement reads:

> Dispute Resolution: You and Company agree that any dispute, claim or controversy arising out of or relating to this Agreement . . . will be settled by binding arbitration . . . You acknowledge and agree that you and Company are each waiving the right to a trial by jury or to participate as a plaintiff or class User in any purported [28] class action or representative proceeding.

[*829] For these reasons, the Court denies defendant Kalanick's motion to dismiss. Concomitantly, the Court lifts the stay of discovery previously imposed pending the Court's decision on this motion. Counsel are directed to submit to the Court, by no later than April 7, 2016, a case management plan in the Court's Form D that will have this case ready for trial by November 1, 2016.

The Clerk of Court is directed to close docket entries 22 and 27.

End of Document

User Agreement at 8-9. Although plaintiff has sued Mr. Kalanick personally and not Uber, defendant claims that plaintiff's claims against Mr. Kalanick are "intimately founded in and intertwined with" the underlying agreement with Uber. See Def. Br. at 23, quoting Kramer v. Toyota Motor Corp., 705 F.3d 1122, 1128 (9th Cir. 2013). The Court finds, however, that since defendant is not seeking to compel arbitration, and plaintiff is not seeking to enforce the User Agreement against defendant, plaintiff is not equitably estopped from pursuing a class action suit against Mr. Kalanick, nor has plaintiff waived the right to proceed through this mechanism.

[*845] MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

This matter comes before the Court on Defendants Dennis Ballinger, Sr., Dennis Ballinger, Jr., Empire Tax Corp. and Vista Securities, Inc.'s ("Defendants") Combined Motion to Dismiss Pursuant to Rules 9(a) and 12(b)(6) (Doc. 59). Plaintiffs responded (Doc. 92). For the following reasons, Defendants' motion is DENIED.

BACKGROUND

Plaintiffs' Complaint (Doc. 2) alleges that persons who owned property located in St. Clair County and who redeemed that property at county tax auctions paid a "penalty" rate in excess of that which would have been required had they not been forced to participate in a "rigged tax sale." Specifically, Defendants Dennis Ballinger, Sr., Dennis Ballinger, Jr., Empire Tax Corp. and Vista Securities, Inc. (referred to collectively in the Complaint as the "Ballinger Defendants") are alleged to have conspired with co-defendants St. Clair Co. and Suarez to diminish competitive bidding in order to ensure that lucrative [*846] properties were sold at the statutory maximum penalty percentage of 18% beginning at least as early as November 2006.

Plaintiffs further allege that the Ballinger Defendants knowingly participated [4] in the conspiracy as tax purchasers as follows: Dennis Ballinger Jr. and Dennis Ballinger Sr. are alleged to have purchased 222 properties at the 2006 tax sale and 190 properties at the 2007 tax sale, Empire Tax Corp. is alleged to have purchased 60 properties at the 2006 tax sale and 135 properties at the 2007 tax sale and Vista Securities, Inc. is alleged to have purchased 92 properties at the 2006 tax sale and 133 properties at the 2007 tax sale all at the conspiratorial maximum 18% interest rate. Plaintiffs claim civil conspiracy against all Defendants (Count I), money had and received against all Defendants except Suarez (Count II), violations of the Sherman Act against all Defendants (Counts III and IV), violations of the Illinois Antitrust Act against all Defendants (Counts V-VII) and breach of fiduciary duty against Suarez (Count VIII).

Defendants contend that Plaintiffs' Complaint (Doc. 2) fails to include the necessary factual allegations to support antitrust claims and the existence of a conspiracy. Defendants further contend that all of Plaintiffs' claims are time-barred and that the fraudulent concealment claim is insufficient under Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b).

DISCUSSION

When reviewing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to [5] dismiss, the Court accepts as true all allegations in the complaint. Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081 (2007) (citing Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)). The federal system of notice pleading requires only that a plaintiff provide a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). However, the allegations must be "more than labels and conclusions." Pugh v. Tribune Co., 521 F.3d 686, 699 (7th Cir. 2008). This requirement is satisfied if the complaint (1) describes the claim in sufficient detail to give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests and (2) plausibly suggests that the plaintiff has a right to relief above a speculative level. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555; see Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556

U.S. 662, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009); EEOC v. Concentra Health Servs., 496 F.3d 773, 776 (7th Cir. 2007). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556).[1]

Statute of Limitations

Defendants argue for dismissal of all counts as barred by the applicable statute of limitations. They assert that antitrust and conspiracy actions must commence within four years and that a claim for money had and received must commence within five years of the accrual of the claim. Further, Defendants contend that Plaintiffs have failed to adequately allege a proper basis for tolling these statutes of limitations.

[*847] Plaintiffs acknowledge the statutes of limitations but argue that the discovery rule tolled the statute of limitations in this case. In support of their position, Plaintiffs cite Clark v. City of Braidwood, 318 F.3d 764 (7th Cir. 2003). In Clark, the Seventh Circuit held that the question was "whether any set of facts that if proven would establish a defense to the statute of limitations..."and that where a plaintiff relies on the discovery rule, a determination of timeliness is premature at the pleading stage. Clark, 318 F.3d at 768 (emphasis in original)

The discovery rule "postpones the beginning of the limitations period... to the date when [a plaintiff] discovers he has been injured." In re Copper Antitrust Litig., 436 F.3d 782, 789 (7th Cir. 2006), quoting Cada v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 920 F.2d 446, 450 (7th Cir.1990). Therefore, the appropriate inquiry is whether the Complaint [7] pleads sufficient facts that, if proven, would raise a reasonable inference that the limitations period was tolled until 2014 when Plaintiffs discovered the injury. Accepting all allegations of the Complaint as true, the Court finds they are sufficient to raise such an inference.

The Complaint alleges that Defendants and tax purchaser Co-Defendants directed "contributions" to the Democrat Party instead of to Suarez, that Suarez seated Co-Defendants at the front of the auction room to facilitate the conspiracy and that other bids were allowed on less lucrative properties in order to cover up the conspiracy. The Complaint further alleges that Defendants' conspiracy to rig tax auctions was inherently self-concealing so that Plaintiffs could not have discovered through reasonable diligence that they had been injured until 2014. Accordingly, Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims as barred by the applicable statutes of limitations is denied.

Civil Conspiracy

Defendants argue Count I should be dismissed because antitrust claims cannot be asserted as civil conspiracy claims under Illinois law. Plaintiffs respond that independent, actionable tortious conduct is not required and that [8] their Complaint alleges unlawful acts sufficient to plead a claim of civil conspiracy.

Section 9 of the Illinois Antitrust Act provides, "No contract, combination, conspiracy, or other act which violates this Act shall constitute or be deemed a conspiracy at common law." 740 ILCS § 10/9. The Committee Comment clarifies that the purpose of the provision is "to confine remedies for what were formerly common law conspiracies to proceedings under the new Act, if violative of the new Act, and thus prevent another form of 'double jeopardy.'" *Id (*emphasis added). The statute is clear that a plaintiff may not recover under both theories but is silent as to whether a plaintiff may allege both theories.

[1] While Defendants entitle their motion "Motion to Dismiss... Pursuant to Rules 9(a) and 12(b)(6)," Defendants' arguments implicate Rule 9(b), not 9(a). Further, Plaintiffs' Complaint does not include a claim for fraud or fraudulent concealment. Plaintiffs raise the issue of fraudulent concealment as a negation to the statute of limitations defense and in regards to the discovery rule. Therefore, Rule 9 is inapplicable. Accordingly, [6] the Court declines to consider Defendants' arguments arising under Rule 9(b).

Defendant cites Nichols Motorcycle Supply, Inc. v. Dunlop Tire Corp., No. 93-C-5578, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17761, 1994 WL 698486, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 12, 1994) in support of their argument that Section 9 also prohibits Plaintiff from alleging a civil conspiracy based upon a purported violation of the Illinois Antitrust Act. The court in Nichols did, in fact, hold that a civil conspiracy claim is redundant and duplicative of the antitrust claims arising under the same set of facts and dismissed a conspiracy claim on that basis.

However, the statute does not bar a plaintiff from asserting claims under both theories. In fact, the Committee Comment to Section 9 also states, "an injured [9] party might still recover under the doctrine of a common law conspiracy where the conduct in question did not violate the new Act." 740 ILCS § 10/9. Additionally, plaintiffs may plead alternative legal theories and, at trial, choose which theories of recovery [*848] to pursue. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(d). Accordingly, Defendants' motion as to Count I is denied.

"Money Had And Received"

Defendants further argue that Count II should be dismissed because the Complaint fails to state a claim for money had and received. Specifically, Defendants contend that the Illinois Property Tax Code expressly permits an 18% penalty rate. Because no more than an 18% penalty was charged, Defendants argue Plaintiffs' allegations in Count II fail to state a claim.

In Illinois, a plaintiff bringing a claim for money had and received must allege that "(1) he was compelled to pay money to the defendant, (2) the defendant had no legal right to demand the money, and (3) payment was necessary in order to avoid an injury to his business, person or property." Butitta v. First Mortgage Corp., 218 Ill. App. 3d 12, 578 N.E.2d 116, 118-19, 160 Ill. Dec. 937 (Ill. App. 1991). If allegations demonstrate that the receipt of money is "unjust given the unfair practice under which it was obtained," the claim is sufficient to survive a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. [10] Fields v. Alcon Labs., Inc., No. 313CV00197DRHDGW, 2014 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34897, 2014 WL 1041191, at *4 (S.D. Ill. Mar. 18, 2014).

Here, Plaintiffs allege illegally rigged tax sales that unfairly ensured the highest penalties would be charged. This is sufficient to state a claim for money had and received. Accordingly, Defendants' motion is denied as to Count II.

The Sherman Act

Defendants move to dismiss Counts III and IV for failure to state a claim under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. In particular, Defendants assert that Plaintiffs' claim under Section 1 for unlawful agreement or conspiracy in restraint of trade contains "fundamentally deficient allegations." Defendants also assert a lack of antitrust injury and defined market under Section 1 and argue that the named Plaintiffs lack standing. Under Section 2, Defendants assert "fundamentally deficient allegations" of monopoly power and exclusionary conduct and lack of a market definition.

Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides that "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1. To plead a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must plead: "(1) a contract, combination, or conspiracy; (2) a resultant unreasonable restraint of trade [11] in [a] relevant market; and (3) an accompanying injury." Agnew v. Nat'l Collegiate Athletic Ass'n, 683 F.3d 328, 335 (7th Cir. 2012) (quoting Denny's Marina, Inc. v. Renfro Prods., Inc., 8 F.3d 1217, 1220 (7th Cir.1993)).

Proof of an explicit agreement is not required to plead a Sherman Act antitrust conspiracy claim. United States v. General Motors Corp., 384 U.S. 127, 142-43, 86 S. Ct. 1321, 16 L. Ed. 2d 415 (2010). Rather, a Section 1 claim of conspiracy "requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 556, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). Here, Plaintiffs plead sufficient facts to survive a motion to dismiss. The factual allegations include specific details about the agreement and how sales were structured to eliminate competition. This is sufficient to plausibly suggest an illegal conspiracy for purposes of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

As to the second requirement—an unreasonable restraint of trade in a relevant market resulting from the conspiracy— Plaintiffs must allege a cognizable market on which Defendants' actions could have [*849] had anticompetitive effects. Agnew, 683 F.3d at 337-338. "Relevant market" has been defined by the United States Supreme Court as "commodities reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes." United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 395, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956). Unless it is inconceivable that Plaintiffs could prove a set of facts supporting the market definition alleged, Count III should not be dismissed. MCM Partners, Inc. v. Andrews-Bartlett & Associates, Inc., 62 F.3d 967, 977 (7th Cir. 1995) (reversing a 12(b)(6) dismissal as erroneous where district court "believed [12] [plaintiff] had not alleged facts to support the complaint's market definition").

Here, Plaintiffs do not provide an explicit definition of the alleged relevant market. Rather, the Complaint allegations provide an overview of the Illinois tax sale procedure, an outline of the situations in which a successful purchaser of property at a tax sale may double his initial investment or gain title to property at less than market value and citations to the Illinois Property Tax Code regarding the public sale process. Further, the Complaint cites Illinois case law to support the allegation that the Illinois Property Tax Code "envisions that the public sale process will foster competition in bidding, reducing the [penalty rate] percentage, thereby enabling property owners to redeem their property for the lowest amount." Doc. 2, p. 12, P60. The Complaint further alleges that the auctioneer is "obligated to engage in a 'reverse auction' process whereby he solicits and accepts bids to obtain this least penalty percentage." Id.

The Court finds that these allegations sufficiently identify the relevant market. Competition is clearly envisioned by the Property Tax Code. Plaintiffs' allegations reasonably [13] set forth tax lien certificates as products that fall within the definition of commodity. The Complaint sufficiently defines the relevant market in terms of its product (tax lien certificates) and its location (St. Clair County).

To meet the third requirement, because "[t]he purpose of the Sherman Act is to protect consumers from injury that results from diminished competition," Plaintiffs must allege not only an injury to themselves, but an injury to the market as well. Agnew, 683 F.3d at 334-35. "Such injury must involve 'loss [that] comes from acts that reduce output or raise prices to consumers.'" James Cape & Sons Co. v. PCC Const. Co., 453 F.3d 396, 399 (7th Cir. 2006) (quoting Chi. Prof'l Sports Ltd. P'ship v. Nat'l Basketball Ass'n, 961 F.2d 667, 670 (7th Cir.1992)).

Contrary to Defendants' contentions, it is not necessary to show that one plaintiff was injured by the sale of another property owner's taxes. What needs to be shown is a loss that comes from acts that raise prices to consumers. Plaintiffs' Complaint alleges an inflated penalty rate caused by Defendants' anticompetitive activity— a rate that Plaintiffs and hundreds of other property owners would have been forced to pay in order to redeem their properties. Doc. 2, p. 18, ¶ 87. These allegations are sufficient to establish injury. Accordingly, Defendants' motion to dismiss Count III is denied.[2]

Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, makes it unlawful for a person or company to "monopolize" and exclude competition. To prove monopolization under § 2, a plaintiff must allege: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful . . . maintenance of that power as distinguished [*850] from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historical accident." United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966). The Supreme Court has defined monopoly power as "the power to control prices or exclude competition." United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956).

[2] Pursuant to Local Rule 7.1(d) [14] , the Court declines to consider Defendants' standing argument— unsupported by citations to relevant legal authority.

A plaintiff may establish monopoly power by evidence that a firm has profitably raised prices above the competitive level. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 253 F.3d 34, 51, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330 (D.C. Cir. 2001). However, possessing monopoly power does not by itself constitute monopolization. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. at 570-71. Rather § 2 of the Sherman Act makes it unlawful to maintain monopoly power through exclusionary conduct. Verizon Commc'ns, Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004).

The test for exclusionary conduct is set forth in United States. v. Microsoft Corp. First, a plaintiff must prove that a monopolist's conduct has had an "anticompetitive effect." Microsoft, 253 F.3d at 58. Second, if a plaintiff is successful in showing an anticompetitive effect, the alleged [15] monopolist may proffer a non-pretextual "procompetitive justification" for its conduct. Id. at 59. Lastly, if the alleged monopolist's proffering of procompetitive justification is unrebutted, the plaintiff "must demonstrate that the anticompetitive harm of the conduct outweighs the procompetitive benefit." Id.

Here, the Complaint includes allegations of assigned seating arrangements to place tax-buyer defendants in the front and purposeful ignoring of non-defendant bidders who were not part of the illegal agreement. Plaintiffs further allege that winning bids that were not a result of "superior business acumen" but rather were a result of an illegal agreement to eliminate competition in bidding for tax liens. The alleged conduct is exclusionary in that it "had the effect of preventing other competitors from receiving the winning bid at the tax sale auctions" by "fixing, controlling, maintaining, limiting, and/or discontinuing the bidding of lower rates during the auction process...." Doc. 2, p. 29, ¶¶ 131-132. The alleged arrangement between Defendant Suarez and tax-purchaser defendants (including the Ballinger Defendants) prevented competitive bids except on less lucrative properties, which [16] were allowed in order to conceal the conspiracy. Based on these allegations, Plaintiffs have sufficiently pled exclusionary conduct and monopoly power to survive a motion to dismiss. Defendants' motion as to Count IV is denied.

The Illinois Antitrust Act

Defendants next move to dismiss Plaintiffs' state law antitrust claims, Counts V, VI and VII, on the same bases as their federal counterparts— Counts V and VI (antitrust conspiracy claims) mirror Count III and Count VII (monopolization claim) mirrors Count IV. "Illinois law provides that its courts should use the construction of federal antitrust law by federal courts to guide their construction of those state antitrust laws that are substantially similar to federal antitrust law." State of Ill., ex rel. Burris v. Panhandle Eastern Pipe Line Co., 935 F.2d 1469, 1480 (7th Cir. 1991). As such, Defendants' motion as to Counts V, VI and VII is denied for the reasons set forth in the Court's analysis under the Sherman Act.

For the above-stated reasons, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss is DENIED in its entirety.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

AMENDED MEMORANDUM AND ORDER

NOTICE: On March 3, 2016, the Court entered a Sealed Memorandum and Order (Doc. 310) ruling on the parties' summary judgment motions. The Court also entered a Notice of Unsealing and Order (Doc. 312) that advised the parties that the Court intended to unseal the entire Memorandum and Order unless the parties filed a notice identifying the portions of the Memorandum and Order that qualify to remain under seal. In response to the Court's order, the parties filed a Joint Notice of Portions of Memorandum and Order to Redact (Doc. 318). The Court has considered the parties' submissions and issues this Amended Memorandum and Order. As identified below, the Court has removed certain references to specific customers and membership associations and confidential business information identified in the sealed version of the Memorandum and Order because the parties have demonstrated that "countervailing interests heavily outweigh the public interests in access." Mann v. Boatright, 477 F.3d 1140, 1149 (10th Cir. 2007) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Moreover, the Court [*3] does not find the identity of these entities and the specific confidential business information essential to its analysis. Instead, the Court references these entities and information generically in this publically-filed Amended Memorandum and Order. If the specific identities of the entities or confidential business information should become important to the analysis at some later stage of the proceedings, the sealed Memorandum and Order (Doc. 310) contains them.

This case arises under federal and state antitrust laws. Plaintiff Suture Express, Inc. ("Suture Express") alleges that defendants Owens & Minor Distribution, Inc. ("O&M") and Cardinal Health 200, LLC ("Cardinal") have violated antitrust laws by tying and bundling the sale of suture and endomechanical ("endo") distribution to the sale of other medical-surgical ("med-surg") distribution. This matter comes before the Court on defendants O&M and Cardinal's Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. 253) and plaintiff Suture Express' Partial Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. 254). After considering the parties' arguments, the Court grants defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment and denies Suture Express' Partial Motion for Summary Judgment. [*4]

I. Undisputed Facts

The following facts are either stipulated by the parties in the Pretrial Order (Doc. 251), or are uncontroverted.

Med-Surg Product Distribution

Med-surg products are single-use, disposable products that healthcare providers use on a regular basis. Thousands of med-surg products exist. They fall into about 30 categories that include, for example, custom surgical kits, packs and trays, IV sets and solutions, wound staples, gloves, bedpans, hospital gowns, woven and nonwoven goods, needles and syringes, sutures, endosurgical and endoscopic products, respiratory products, adhesives, bandages, dressings and sponges, and incontinence products.

Suture Express distributes only two categories of med-surg products to healthcare providers: sutures and endo products. Suture Express also provides distribution services to health care providers, including clinics, ambulatory surgery centers, and acute care facilities.

O&M and Cardinal are "broadline distributors" of med-surg products, which means that they distribute a full line of med-surg products in the 30 categories to healthcare providers. This includes suture and endo products. O&M and Cardinal are two of three national broadline [*5] distributors in the United States. The third national broadline distributor is Medline Industries, Inc. ("Medline"), which is not a party to this case. O&M and Cardinal, when measured by sales volume, are the two largest distributors of med-surg products to acute care providers in the United States. Cardinal currently distributes more than 300,000 med-surg products. O&M distributes more than 220,000 med-surg products.

Broadline Distributors

National broadline med-surg distributors, like O&M and Cardinal, acquire med-surg products in bulk from the manufacturers of those products. They store, keep in inventory, and distribute those products to healthcare providers through a network of distribution centers spread across the country. The distribution centers are large warehouse-like facilities that, typically, are located within several hours' drive from any given customer's hospital. O&M operates 43 distribution centers nationwide; Cardinal operates 48.

O&M and Cardinal staff each of their local distribution centers with warehouse personnel who pick, pack, and load products onto pallets and then onto trucks, which deliver the products to customers on a regular schedule. O&M and Cardinal [*6] use fleets of trucks to make those deliveries. Truck delivery is the primary delivery method that O&M, Cardinal, and other broadline distributors use for med-surg distribution.

Distributors' Relationships With Purchasers

Healthcare providers may contract directly with one or more med-surg distributors. They typically have a primary distributor who provides the large majority of their med-surg needs. Some of O&M and Cardinal's contracts define "primary distributor" to mean that the customer purchases a contractually-specified percentage of med-surg (including suture and endo) from the distributor. Also, healthcare providers sometimes use secondary distributors to fill other product orders for a variety of reasons, including times when the primary distributor cannot provide a requested product.

Healthcare providers also may belong to one or more Group Purchasing Organizations ("GPOs"), Integrated Delivery Networks ("IDNs"), Regional Purchasing Cooperatives ("RPCs"), member alliances, or other buying groups that have consolidated the purchasing power of their members to negotiate contracts with one or more med-surg distributors. The majority of acute healthcare providers are members of one [*7] or more GPOs. GPO members often purchase med-surg distribution from a distributor under the terms of the GPO's agreement with that distributor. And GPO agreements often include volume discount tiers. Acute healthcare providers evaluate, change, and join new GPOs in an effort to obtain more favorable contract terms with med-surg distributors.

RPCs and member alliances are coalitions of GPO members that join together to negotiate contract terms with med-surg distributors. RPCs, member alliances, or even individual hospitals sometimes negotiate for different terms than those found in GPO distribution contracts accessible to them. These groups may enter into a "local contract" with a med-surg distributor, which could represent an amendment to a national GPO contract or an entirely different contract.

Alternatively, some hospital systems use a self-distribution strategy. This means that they purchase products directly from manufacturers and perform distribution functions themselves. Self-distribution customers still may use outside distributors for services that they choose not to handle themselves. But some purchasers recognize the disadvantages of purchasing med-surg products directly from [*8] a manufacturer instead of using a distributor. Using a manufacturer instead of a distributor may increase a purchaser's administrative and staff costs because the purchaser must establish separate purchasing relationships with each manufacturer and manage receipt of separate shipments from each manufacturer. In contrast, a purchaser who uses a distributor can purchase multiple manufacturers' goods from that one distributor and receive a shipment containing those goods from multiple manufacturers.[1]

Some med-surg distributors testified in their depositions that healthcare providers have consolidated recently, thereby creating larger hospital systems. This has consolidated buying power, and, as some med-surg distributors testified, produced a more competitive marketplace.

Revenues

[1] This description is a paraphrase of the parties' Stipulated Fact No. 20 (Doc. 251-1 at 5).

Med-surg distributors generate income from two sources: (1) funding paid by manufacturers ("vendor funding"); and (2) "markups," or distribution fees paid by purchasers. Many manufacturers of med-surg products pay distributors various forms of vendor funding, and generally, it is paid as a percentage of the underlying product [*9] cost.

Med-surg distributors, including Cardinal, O&M, and Suture Express, acquire products from manufacturers at a standard list price. Then, they charge most customers on a cost-plus basis, which means that they add a negotiated, fixed percentage distribution fee ("cost-plus markup") to the product cost agreed to by the customer and the manufacturer.[2] Sometimes, O&M and Cardinal include the cost of freight in their cost-plus markup. Certain regional distributors, such as Seneca Medical and MMS Inc., LLC, also offer cost-plus markup pricing. As an alternative, some broadline distributors, including Cardinal and O&M, charge some customers a service fee based on the specific distribution services received ("activity-based fee"). The services covered by med-surg distribution contracts differ from customer to customer.

Suture Express' Entry into Suture and Endo Distribution

Suture Express opened its business in 1998. It developed a business model to respond to the differences between suture and endo distribution and other med-surg distribution. Sutures and endo products account for about 10% of the med-surg supplies [*10] distributed in the United States to acute care providers. No acute care providers need just sutures and endo products but no other med-surg products. And no acute care providers need other med-surg products but not sutures and endo products. However, more stock keeping units (SKUs) exist for sutures than any other category of med-surg products. And while suture and endo products are smaller and lighter than most other med-surg products, they have a high-dollar value relative to their size and weight. Because the products are lightweight and small volume—"low cube"—a distributor easily can ship them in a FedEx box to an acute care provider.

Suture Express has one, centralized warehouse located in Lenexa, Kansas. There, it stocks a large variety of suture and endo SKUs, including "slower moving" SKUs. It ships those products from its warehouse across the country via overnight delivery by FedEx (or by courier within the Kansas City metropolitan area). Suture Express imposes no requirements on its customers for order size or frequency. But typically it charges a separate freight fee. This fee is often $7 per day/per location on top of its cost-plus markups. But Suture Express may charge [*11] some customers less, more, or not at all for freight. When the $7 per freight fee is added, it increases a customer's actual distribution costs above the cost-plus markup, adding, on average, one quarter of a percent (0.25 %) to the markup.

Suture Express achieves high "fill rates" for its customers. A "fill rate" represents the percentage of times that a distributor can fill a customer's order on a timely basis. For example, if a distributor ships nine of ten items a customer orders, then the fill rate for that particular customer is 90%. Many acute care customers demand high fill rates for suture and endo distribution. Historically, Suture Express has maintained a fill rate higher than 99%, and, in many instances, has higher fill rates than O&M and Cardinal.

Market Definitions and Market Share

Market definitions are an important piece of antitrust analysis. Here, the parties largely agree on the summary judgment definitions of the relevant geographic and product markets. They agree that: (1) the geographic market is national in scope, that is, limited to the United States, and (2) the product market is for distribution of med-surg products to acute care customers (i.e., hospitals).[3]

---

[2] The parties recite these facts in Stipulated Fact No. 27 (Doc. 251-1 at 6).

[3] [*12] O&M and Cardinal do not dispute Suture Express' Statement of Fact No. 34: "For purposes of this case, the relevant markets are appropriately limited to distribution of Med-Surg products to acute care customers (i.e., hospitals)." Doc. 269 at 21

Industry-wide med-surg (including suture and endo distribution) revenues increased year-over-year during the relevant period, 2007 to 2012. From 2007 to 2012, O&M's sales of other med-surg products accounted for 32-38% of the total distribution of other med-surg products to acute care customers. In 2012 (the last year for which data is available), O&M had 38% of those sales. O&M attributes over half its growth during these five years to acquisitions of two smaller distributors and the addition of two large hospital systems as customers. The remainder of O&M's growth came from acquiring new customers and organic growth from existing customers. From 2007 to 2012, O&M's sales accounted for 40-43% of the total sales of distribution of suture and endo products to acute care customers. In 2012 (the last year for which data is available), O&M had 42% of those sales.

From 2007 to 2012, Cardinal's sales accounted for 27-31% of the total distribution of other med-surg products to acute care customers. In 2012 (the last year for which data is available), Cardinal had 27% of those sales. From 2007 to 2012, [*14] Cardinal's sales accounted for 26-31% of the total distribution of suture and endo products to acute care customers. In 2012 (the last year for which data is available), Cardinal had 26% of those sales.

Suture Express' market share in the suture and endo distribution market has varied between 8% and 10% from 2007 to 2012. In 2010, Suture Express' market share was 10% but decreased to 8% by 2012.

O&M and Cardinal's Implementation of Bundling Contract Terms

Between 1998 and about 2008, Suture Express successfully grew its business. Both O&M and Cardinal engaged in separate, internal communications about the increasing threat that Suture Express, because of its superior fill rates and low pricing, posed to their businesses. Around the same time, O&M and Cardinal adopted contractual terms that made pricing contingent on a customer's purchase of suture and endo distribution through them.

Cardinal implemented these contractual terms in different ways. In some contracts, Cardinal imposes markups on med-surg distribution unless the customer purchases 100% of its suture and endo products from Cardinal. Other Cardinal contracts give Cardinal the right to renegotiate the distribution markup and the [*15] payment terms provided in the contract if the customer stops buying its suture and endo products from Cardinal. Yet other agreements provide for higher markups on med-surg distribution if the customer reserves the right to purchase suture and endo products from other distributors. And, some agreements make markups on med-surg distribution contingent on the customer purchasing a certain percentage (in some cases, 95%) or a minimum dollar amount (specifically tailored to that customer) of all med-surg products from Cardinal. Suture Express' expert, Professor Einer Elhauge, calculated that almost 70% of Cardinal's contracts included at least one of the following contract terms: (1) an 80%+ med-surg distribution purchase requirement, or (2) a suture and endo distribution volume purchase requirement.

Cardinal also included similar contract terms in standardized agreements that it negotiated with GPOs. Currently, Cardinal's standardized agreements with the five largest GPOs have contingent pricing terms or impose markups if the customer fails to purchase a certain percentage (in some cases 100%) of suture and endo distribution from Cardinal. Many of Cardinal's customers have not entered into [*16] individually-negotiated contracts. Instead, they have purchased med-surg distribution from Cardinal under a GPO standardized agreement.

(Suture Express' Memo. in Support of Partial Summary Judgment); Doc. 304 at 2 (stating that Suture Express' Statement of Fact No. 34 is not disputed for purposes of summary judgment).

O&M and Cardinal assert in their summary judgment motion that the relevant market is for distribution services, rather than the physical items themselves. Doc. 266 at 6; Doc. 303 at 6 (sealed corrected version). Suture Express disputes this statement of fact, arguing that the relevant market is for the distribution of physical items because meg-surg distributors provide the actual products in addition to distribution-related services. Doc. 280 at 7. The Court views this statement of fact in the light most favorable to Suture Express, as it must when it considers defendants' motion for summary judgment. The Court therefore concludes that the relevant market is the distribution of med-surg products. Moreover, O&M and Cardinal fail to dispute that characterization of [*13] the relevant market in their response to Suture Express' motion for partial summary judgment.

O&M uses similar contract strategies. O&M includes contractual terms in its customer agreements that allow O&M to increase the price charged for other med-surg distribution if the customer switches suture and endo distribution to another distributor. For instance, one version of O&M's contracts imposed a markup on other med-surg distribution if the customer purchased suture and endo distribution from a distributor other than O&M. Other O&M agreements rendered markups on all med-surg distribution contingent on the customer purchasing a high percentage of med-surg distribution from O&M. Other O&M agreements required the customer to purchase a minimum amount (measured in dollars) of total med-surg distribution. That minimum amount was tailored to that particular customer so that the customer would violate the contract if it switched all of its suture and endo distribution to another distributor. And, in other agreements, O&M made markups contingent on customers purchasing the top 10 Healthcare Products Information Services categories (which include suture [*17] and endo) from O&M. Based on his review of O&M contracts, Professor Elhauge opined that almost every agreement included a term allowing O&M to increase prices on other med-surg distribution if the customer switched its suture and endo distribution to another distributor, such as Suture Express.

O&M also included similar contract terms in standardized agreements that it negotiated with GPOs. Many O&M customers who did not enter into individually-negotiated contracts purchased med-surg distribution from O&M under a GPO standardized agreement. O&M's current standardized agreements with the five largest GPOs impose markups if the customer fails to purchase a certain percentage of suture and endo distribution from O&M.

Typically, O&M, Cardinal, and Suture Express' contracts with customers have three to five year terms. Many of O&M and Cardinal's contracts include provisions allowing the customer to terminate without cause after giving notice of six months or less. Although customers may have the ability to change distributors under their contracts, customers have described the process as a time consuming one and not insignificant. Those customers also recognize the overhead costs and investment [*18] required to switch distributors. Despite the complexity of switching distributors, about one-half of Cardinal's acute care customers continue to do business with Cardinal within three or four years of initiating the relationship. The same is true for O&M.

Effect of O&M and Cardinal's Contract Terms as Analyzed by Plaintiff's Expert

Suture Express' expert, Professor Elhauge, analyzed the contract terms for 102 of O&M and Cardinal's customers. He created this pool of sample contracts by identifying Cardinal's 50 largest customers and O&M's 52 largest customers. Together, these 102 customers account for 3,271 separate acute care facilities. The 50 Cardinal customers account for 53% of Cardinal's med-surg sales. And the 52 O&M customers account for 47% of O&M's med-surg sales. After reviewing these 102 contracts, Professor Elhauge concluded that between 2006 and 2013, O&M made about 98% of its suture and endo sales and Cardinal made about 71% of its suture and endo sales under a contract containing one of the contractual terms described above—that is, one that makes pricing contingent on the purchase of suture and endo distribution through them.

Professor Elhauge also analyzed cost data produced [*19] by Cardinal to calculate the minimum markup that an equally efficient suture and endo distributor would have to charge to remain in the market. Professor Elhauge then used data about the contingent pricing terms in Cardinal's contracts to determine how often Cardinal's incremental suture and endo markups fell below the minimum markups. To put it another way, Professor Elhauge examined how often the contract terms produced sales of suture and endo distribution products below cost. For Cardinal, he concluded that customers with contracts containing the bundling provision paid an incremental price lower than the minimum markup 67% of the time. For O&M customers[4] with such contracts, Professor Elhauge opined that the resulting incremental price was lower than the minimum markup 85% of the time.

Professor Elhauge also applied an economic test to determine whether bundled discounts have the same economic effect as a tying arrangement. Applying that test, Professor Elhauge used sales data from Suture [*20] Express,

[4] O&M did not produce cost data sufficient for Professor Elhauge to perform a similar calculation for its markups. So, Professor Elhauge relied on Cardinal's cost data to perform the analysis for O&M.

Cardinal, and O&M to calculate whether purchases of Suture Express' suture and endo distribution by customers who purchased other med-surg distribution from O&M and Cardinal (i.e., customers who "broke the bundle") are less than 10% of the sum of those purchases plus purchases of defendants' suture and endo distribution by customers who accepted the bundle.[5] Professor Elhauge determined that this ratio ranged from 3% to 7%, depending on the year.

Professor Elhauge also examined Suture Express' performance among defendants' customers who had entered into contracts containing the bundling terms and compared them to customers who were not bound by contracts containing the bundling terms. Professor Elhauge determined that Suture Express' market share among customers who had entered into contracts with bundling terms ranged from 2% to 6% between 2006 and 2013, while its market share for customers [*21] not bound by the contractual bundling terms ranged from 13% to 41% for the same time period. From his conclusions, Suture Express' market share among customers not subject to the bundling terms (depending on the year) was four to 15 times greater than its share among customers who were subject to bundling terms.

Practical Effects of the Bundling Terms and Market Structure

O&M and Cardinal have acknowledged that the bundling terms successfully prevented Suture Express from selling suture and endo distribution to many of their customers. In a 2010 document, O&M noted that it has had some success defending against Suture Express by bundling pricing for suture and endo with other med-surg products. In another document, O&M recognized that customers subject to bundling will face higher prices if they choose to purchase suture and endo distribution from Suture Express. Cardinal identified "contract obligations" as a reason that one of its customers did not switch its business to Suture Express. Cardinal also described a situation when a customer agreed to stop purchasing suture and endo from Suture Express and move the business to Cardinal after Cardinal informed the customer of a "compliance [*22] issue." The Court understands Cardinal's reference to this "compliance issue" to mean that the customer was not complying with the bundling terms in its contract that required the customer to purchase suture and endo from Cardinal to obtain certain pricing on other med-surg distribution. Cardinal noted other situations when it had retained customers' suture and endo distribution purchases because of contractual requirements that effectively prevented the customers from purchasing suture and endo distribution from other sources (including Suture Express).

Many customers have informed Suture Express that they understand that the bundling terms in defendants' contracts prevent them from purchasing suture and endo distribution from Suture Express. Some customers stated that they could not purchase suture and endo distribution from Suture Express because their contracts with defendants effectively prevented them from doing so. Other customers moved their business away from Suture Express after signing contracts with defendants containing the bundling terms. And some customers informed Suture Express that any savings they realized by moving their business to Suture Express was offset by the [*23] costs they incurred under their contracts' bundling requirement. But, the bundling provisions notwithstanding, some customers subject to such contractual terms continued to purchase suture and endo distribution from Suture Express. For example, one Suture Express customer[6] paid increased prices on its med-surg distribution purchased from Cardinal because it failed to abide by the suture and endo commitment requirement in its contract with Cardinal after it purchased suture and endo distribution from Suture Express.

Also, customers testified under subpoena about their decisions and how they made them when entering into contracts with O&M, Cardinal, and other distributors that contain bundling terms. For example, a hospital membership association[7] entered into a contract with Cardinal in January 2008. Cardinal was the only distributor [5] See Doc. 262-1 at 148 (Elhauge report at ¶ 154) (explaining that Professor Elhauge used this formula because it is "a prominent economic test" used to determine if a bundled discount has the same economic effect as tying (citing X Areeda, Elhauge, & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 1758b (1996)).

---

[6] The sealed version of this Memorandum and Order (Doc. 310) identifies this customer specifically.

awarded a contract by this membership association at that time. Of the membership association's 34 members, no more than 22 of them entered into the Cardinal contract. In December 2011, Medline beat Cardinal, O&M, and Suture Express to win a sole-source contract [*24] with this membership association.

One hospital, who is a member of this association and thus had the option to sign the membership association's med-surg distribution contracts, contracted with Cardinal until April 2012, when it switched to Medline as its primary distributor. In 2006, this hospital declined to move business to Suture Express from Cardinal because the move would produce minimal savings over its existing Cardinal contract. This existing contract called for an increase in the cost plus markup for med-surg distribution if the hospital failed to meet the 90% suture and endo purchase requirement.

A second hospital who is a member of this association also had the option to enter into the membership association med-surg distribution contracts or contract locally with a different distributor. This hospital signed the membership association contract with Cardinal for med-surg distribution services until 2012, when it moved its business to Medline. The hospital did not [*25] move its business to Suture Express because it made fiscal sense to purchase suture and endo through Medline based on the pricing structure of Medline's contract.

A third hospital[8] is an equity member of a GPO and thus had committed to use a med-surg distributor authorized by the GPO. In 2008, this hospital had the choice of four authorized med-surg distributors—O&M, Cardinal, Medline, or Suture Express. The hospital switched from Cardinal to O&M in 2008, after having switched from O&M to Cardinal in 2007. The hospital declined to move its suture and endo distribution to Suture Express because it wanted to consolidate services, and it recognized that moving the business would increase its costs under its existing contract with O&M.

A fourth hospital chose to contract with O&M instead of Cardinal, Medline, and Professional Hospital Supply (a regional distributor). The hospital was subject to bundling terms under its O&M contract, which it considered when making the decision not to move business to Suture Express. But [*26] that was not the "overriding reason" for the decision. Instead, this hospital decided to keep its business with O&M because of the benefits of having a local distributor.

A fifth hospital purchased suture and endo distribution from Suture Express and other med-surg from Medline until 2010, when it switched its med-surg distribution to O&M and was subject to a bundling term. In 2012, the hospital switched from O&M to Medline as its distributor for med-surg products, including suture and endo. When it made the switch, the hospital considered contract proposals from O&M, Cardinal, Medline, and Seneca (a regional distributor).

A sixth hospital understood that it had many options for contracting with med-surg distributors through its GPO. It even had switched GPOs to receive better contracting opportunities. In 2009, the hospital signed a contract with O&M through a regional purchasing group within its GPO. Before entering that contract, the hospital purchased suture and endo distribution from Suture Express. After signing the contract with O&M, the hospital moved its suture and endo business to O&M because the contract required it to do so or incur increased markups. The contract also provided [*27] that the hospital could move suture and endo distribution back to Suture Express if O&M failed to comply with a 99% fill rate requirement.

A seventh hospital chose to contract with Cardinal in 2009, as its primary med-surg distributor, over Medline and O&M. The hospital considered purchasing suture and endo distribution from Suture Express but chose not to do so for efficiency reasons, and because it wanted to work with one single distribution channel. While the hospital's contract with Cardinal required it to purchase suture and endo distribution through Cardinal, the hospital testified that the bundling contractual terms were not necessarily a factor in its decision to keep its suture and endo distribution with Cardinal instead of Suture Express.

[8] The sealed version of this Memorandum and Order (Doc. 310) specifically identifies this hospital and the six additional hospitals described in the following six paragraphs.

An eighth hospital implemented an expense reduction plan in 2009 or 2010, part of which involved reevaluating its med-surg distribution contract with Cardinal. The hospital solicited RFPs, and Cardinal, O&M, Medline, and Claflin (a regional distributor) responded. The hospital did not send an RFP to Suture Express because it decided to seek bids only from broadline distributors. The hospital awarded the contract to Cardinal because of its [*28] lower markup, better payment terms, and other considerations. The hospital purchased suture and endo from Suture Express before it entered the new agreement with Cardinal in 2010, but stopped doing so because it wanted to achieve the financial benefits of its Cardinal contract. The Cardinal contract included a bundling provision that required the hospital to repay part of Cardinal's discount if the hospital failed to meet its suture and endo commitment.

A ninth hospital changed distributors from Medline and Suture Express to O&M in 2011. The hospital told Suture Express that it was moving its business to O&M in an effort to consolidate purchases, minimize inventory, and realize savings. The hospital's contract with O&M contained a bundling term that required it to purchase a certain volume of suture and endo from O&M, or incur price markups.

Broadline Distributors' Distribution of Suture and Endo and Value-Added Services

Broadline distributors, like O&M and Cardinal, provide economies of scale. This means that per-unit costs are lower when they distribute high volumes of med-surg products. Some common costs exist when O&M and Cardinal distribute suture and endo products and other med-surg [*29] products together by truck. As described above, suture and endo products account for about 10% of an acute care provider's total spending on med-surg products. Suture and endo products are smaller and lighter than most other med-surg products, and have high-dollar value relative to their size and weight. They also are more expensive than most other med-surg products, yielding higher revenue for distribution services priced on a cost-plus basis. In contrast, med-surg products that are bulky or heavy are more expensive to deliver, and they contribute relatively less revenue for the amount of space they consume on a distribution truck.

A broadline distributor's trucks make regular deliveries of med-surg products to its customers regardless whether the customers have ordered suture and endo through it. The distributor can add suture and endo products to the customer's existing delivery without adding meaningful cost to that delivery because the same truck and driver, using virtually the same amount of fuel, will deliver the customer's med-surg products regardless of whether the load contains suture and endo products.

But O&M and Cardinal also recognize that some customers prefer more frequent [*30] deliveries of suture and endo products than other med-surg products. To that end, O&M and Cardinal have established distribution practices specific to suture and endo products. Cardinal has the National Suture Center, a separate, centralized distribution facility for suture and endo distribution. Cardinal set up this facility to improve customer service and reduce eroding sales to Suture Express. O&M operates a centralized facility that resupplies its local facilities and from which certain customers can order suture and endo products directly.

Broadline distributors, including O&M and Cardinal, also offer special services,[9] such as inventory management that can help customers save money. But, in many cases, customers pay additional fees for these special services. Some broadline distributors, including O&M and Cardinal, offer logical- or low-unit-of-measure ("LUM") programs. Other broadline distributors, including O&M and Cardinal, offer just-in-time ("JIT") inventory replenishment programs that may require additional deliveries to customers. O&M and Cardinal also offer wound closure inventory management programs; they permit the distributor to work directly with the purchasing customer [*31] to manage their suture and endo inventory. Cardinal's Wound Closure Management Services program enables Cardinal to make recommendations to customers about the appropriate size, storage, and stocking locations for suture and endo inventory. Less than 1% of Cardinal's customers use this program. O&M's program—PANDAC—involves on-site cost containment and inventory management services for suture and endo and certain other med-surg products. About 20% of O&M's suture and endo customers use PANDAC. Some broadline distributors also provide same-day delivery to customers if they operate within specified driving distance of the nearest distribution center. However, requests for same-day deliveries are rare. Same-day deliveries also may cost more, and a distributor is able to fulfill a same-day request only if it already has the product in stock at its local distribution center.

Competition Among National and Regional Distributors

O&M and Cardinal have won and lost customers from and to one another. As already discussed, O&M and Cardinal also compete against a third national broadline distributor, Medline. Medline has grown its business in recent years. [*32] In early 2014, it acquired Professional Hospital Supply ("PHS"), a regional distributor located primarily in the western United States. Medline's med-surg product distribution to acute and non-acute providers has grown from less than $2 billion in sales in 2008 to over $5 billion in sales in 2014. These numbers exclude growth derived from Medline's acquisition of PHS. For suture and endo distribution only, Medline distributed about $35 million to both acute and non-acute providers in 2008. By 2014, Medline's suture and endo distribution to both acute and non-acute providers increased to about $220 million (not including PHS suture and endo distribution figures). Medline has won customers from O&M and Cardinal. Medline also has negotiated contracts with GPOs and regional buying groups. Suture Express also has won and lost contracts against Medline.

The three national broadline distributors also sometimes compete with regional med-surg distributors for business. Suture Express also has lost and won contracts against certain regional distributors. For example, Seneca Medical ("Seneca") is a regional distributor that distributes 90,000 different products from 1,500 different manufacturers. [*33] Seneca operates in 12 states out of six distribution centers. It has a fleet of more than 80 trucks and 30 account managers in the field. Since 2007, Seneca has opened three additional distribution centers. A Seneca representative estimated that in the last five or six years, Seneca has grown by 50%. The Seneca representative also estimated that Seneca's market share has grown to 50% (and as high as 75% market share in some geographic areas it serves), and that Seneca has a 15% to 16% share overall in the 12-state region that it serves. Seneca has won customers from O&M and Cardinal. Between January 2011 and May 2014, Seneca won several major health systems customers competing against Cardinal, O&M, and Medline.

MMS Inc., LLC ("MMS") is another regional full-line distributor. It has distribution centers in eight states and Guam. MMS provides same day service by distributing to its acute care customers located within a six hour drive of its distribution centers. The Claflin Company ("Claflin") is a regional distributor of med-surg supplies located in Providence, Rhode Island. It serves the New England region, and it has grown in the last 30 years by purchasing other distributors. In [*34] 2009, Claflin beat both O&M and Cardinal to win an estimated $25 million med-surg distribution contract with a certain hospital.[10] Before that, Cardinal had served as the distributor for that hospital for five years.

Before Medline acquired it in 2014, PHS operated as a regional acute care distributor. It had eight distribution centers in six states. Buffalo Hospital Supply is another distributor of med-surg products. It currently serves over 500 healthcare organizations, and it competes with O&M and Cardinal for business. DeKroyft-Metz & Co., Inc. ("DeKroyft") is another regional distributor based in Peoria, Illinois. It operates one distribution center that serves three states. Kreisers Inc. ("Kreisers") is a regional med-surg distributor located in Sioux Falls, South Dakota. It operates six distribution centers. Midland Medical Supply is a regional med-surg distributor located in Lincoln, Nebraska, with a customer base of nearly 600 clients that includes hospitals, clinics, doctor's offices, surgery centers, long term care homes, and medical and industrial laboratories. American Medical [*35] Depot is another regional med-surg distributor with two corporate offices—one in Florida and the other in Pennsylvania. It carries 350,000 products from over 2,000 suppliers.

[10] The sealed version of this Memorandum and Order (Doc. 310) identifies this hospital specifically.

In 2007, O&M bought the acute care business of McKesson Medical-Surgical ("McKesson"). McKesson operates a med-surg business unit that supplies med-surg products to physicians' offices, home care agencies, long-term care facilities, and surgery centers. It carries more than 200,000 med-surg products which it distributes from a network housed in more than 45 different locations. Although O&M now operates McKesson's acute care business, McKesson is not subject to a non-compete agreement that prevents it from reentering the acute-care market.

Also, Henry Schein Medical is a broadline distributor of med-surg products to primary care physicians and specialists, group practices, physician-owned labs, and ambulatory surgery centers. In 2006, it sold its hospital supply (which is the relevant market here). But all the parties in this case recognize Henry Schein Medical as a competitor in the non-acute and ambulatory care markets.

Competition from Manufacturers

As described above, some hospital systems use a self-distribution [*36] strategy. That is, they purchase products directly from manufacturers and perform distribution functions themselves. With self-distribution, an IDN or collective of hospitals uses its own distribution center or centers to distribute products to member hospitals. But self-distribution customers still may rely on outside distributors for services that they choose not to handle themselves.

O&M has lost at least two customers to self-distribution. Suture Express likewise identifies direct distribution from suture and endo manufacturers Johnson & Johnson (Ethicon) and Covidien as competition in the market. Ethicon and Covidien provide direct purchasing services to customers, and, in recent years, have offered changes in their pricing structure for customers making direct purchases.

Pricing in Distribution Contracts

Many factors may influence the distribution pricing that a distributor and acute care customer agree to in a contract. As already mentioned, GPOs tend to negotiate contracts with one or more med-surg distributors on behalf of their members. For several GPOs, the RFP and negotiation process is handled by GPO member advisory councils. Usually, this process starts with a GPO issuing [*37] an RFP, and then med-surg distributors respond. The RFP describes various contract terms and asks the distributors if they are willing to agree to those terms. The contract terms in the RFP are a starting point for negotiation.

Some RFPs from GPOs specifically have requested contract terms containing product category commitments from customers. But GPOs earn administrative fees in proportion to the total volume of med-surg distribution that passes through the distributors. For that reason, GPOs have an incentive to include volume commitments in med-surg distribution contracts.

Some, but not all, of the national and regional med-surg distributors include volume and product commitments in their customer contracts. A customer who purchases higher volumes from a distributor has greater leverage to obtain lower prices. Suture Express also includes volume commitments in its contracts. These contractual terms offer more favorable pricing in exchange for purchasing larger quantities of products. But such terms do not make pricing contingent on the purchase of another type of product, similar to the bundling provisions used by O&M and Cardinal.

Other national and regional broadline distributors [*38] have included in their contracts terms similar to the terms used by O&M and Cardinal, where pricing depends on the customer's commitment to purchase a certain volume of suture and endo distribution. Medline includes in its agreements a price increase by one half point if a customer stops purchasing suture and endo distribution from Medline. The majority of Seneca's local agreements also include a percentage or other commitment to obtain suture and endo products and custom procedure trays from Seneca. Two distributors, MMS and Seneca, testified that they include suture and endo commitment terms in their contracts because the product category is important to their profitability and pricing.

Some of O&M and Cardinal's contracts contain a cost-plus markup fee for med-surg distribution that represents one blended rate for all med-surg product categories. Other of their contracts contain more than one cost-plus markup fee, with markup fees that may differ for certain specific product categories. Suture and endo products are two product categories that, sometimes, have a different distribution markup than the one that applies to med-surg product markups.

Suture Express' expert, Professor Elhauge, [*39] performed an analysis that concluded that defendants' markup to acute care facilities for other med-surg products has been over 50% higher than the distribution markup charged to acute care facilities for suture and endo products. But, when customers contracted with defendants on a "blended" rate for both types of distribution, defendants sometimes based the rate on the product mix, and charged lower rates when customers bought more suture and endo products.

Profits

On average, O&M and Cardinal's markups for the distribution of med-surg products were lower in 2013 than they were in 2008. Markups also have declined for regional distributors Seneca and MMS. And, on average, O&M and Cardinal's markups for the distribution of suture and endo products were lower in 2013 than they were in 2008. Professor Elhauge and Suture Express' former CEO concede that Suture Express restrains the prices that O&M and Cardinal can charge for suture and endo distribution services. Suture Express also acknowledges that competition has pushed the markups for suture and endo products down.

O&M and Cardinal's profit margins have declined since 2008. Cardinal's operating margins for distribution-only activity have [*40] decreased by about 80% from 2008 to the end of 2011. O&M's operating margins for med-surg distribution also have decreased by about 17% between 2008 and 2013. O&M and Cardinal's distribution services margins also declined during this period. Cardinal's distribution services margin (which is roughly seven to eight times greater than its operating margin) decreased by about 75% between 2008 and 2013. But O&M's distribution services margin (which is about 10 to 11 times greater than its operating margin) only decreased by about 8% from 2008 to 2013.[11] Suture Express' distribution services margin is higher than either O&M or Cardinal's med-surg distribution services margins.

Barriers to Entry [*41] in the Market

A business seeking to enter the med-surg distribution market would incur large investment costs associated with that effort, including costs for building or leasing one or more distribution center(s) and leasing or purchasing delivery trucks. For example, O&M has distribution centers located throughout the country. Each distribution center distributes med-surg products within a geographic area consisting of one to three states. Cardinal also has located distribution centers across the country in close proximity to heavily populated areas.

The process for switching broadline distributors requires time and expense on the customer's part. One customer has described it as a complex and detailed process, especially if the customer operates more than one facility. The process of switching involves an assessment of current inventories and order histories of the different types of med-surg products with the incumbent distributor, ensuring availability of the current products with the new distributor, determining pricing structures, loading and coordinating computer systems with the new distributor, and coordinating placement of orders and deliveries with the new distributor. But, [*42] as shown by examples described above, acute care customers often switch distributors for various reasons, including more favorable contract terms.

---

[11] The sealed version of this Memorandum and Order contains specific data for defendants' profit margins described in the above paragraph. Defendant O&M argued, persuasively, that revealing of this specific data could place it at a competitive disadvantage in the marketplace. The Court thus expresses this data in broader terms in the Amended Memorandum and Order. If that data should become relevant to issues in later proceedings, the sealed version of this Memorandum and Order recites this data specifically.

Challenges to Suture Express' Business

Since its inception, Suture Express has never distributed the full range of med-surg products. Thus, most of the med-surg product categories purchased by hospitals are not available from Suture Express. Suture Express also does not offer same-day service outside of the area near its warehouse in Kansas.

From 2006 to 2008, Suture Express successfully gained suture and endo business from Medline customers. But this success declined after Medline improved its service in suture and endo distribution, offered discounted pricing, and included bundling terms in its contracts. Since 2010, Medline has experienced significant growth in its suture and endo distribution to both acute and non-acute providers, more than doubling the amount of its sales in this market.

In mid-2010, a certain hospitall[12] notified Suture Express that, effective January 2011, it would move its business to O&M. This hospital was Suture Express' largest revenue-producing customer between 2006 and 2010. The hospital accounted for about 20% of [*43] Suture Express' net sales in 2009 and 2010. The loss of this customer had a negative effect on Suture Express' revenues and profits.

II. Summary Judgment Standard

The standard for deciding summary judgment is well-known. Summary judgment is appropriate if the moving party demonstrates that there is "no genuine dispute as to any material fact" and that it is "entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(a); see also In re Aluminum Phosphide Antitrust Litig., 905 F. Supp. 1457, 1460 (D. Kan. 1995). When it applies this standard, the Court "view[s] the evidence and make[s] inferences in the light most favorable to the non-movant." Nahno-Lopez v. Houser, 625 F.3d 1279, 1283 (10th Cir. 2010) (citing Oldenkamp v. United Am. Ins. Co., 619 F.3d 1243, 1245-46 (10th Cir. 2010)).

"An issue of fact is 'genuine' 'if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the non-moving party' on the issue." Id. (quoting Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986)); see also In re Urethane Antitrust Litig., 913 F. Supp. 2d 1145, 1150 (D. Kan. 2012) (explaining that "[a]n issue of fact is 'genuine' if 'the evidence allows a reasonable jury to resolve the issue either way.'" (quoting Haynes v. Level 3 Commc'ns, LLC, 456 F.3d 1215, 1219 (10th Cir. 2006)). "An issue of fact is 'material' 'if under the substantive law it is essential to the proper disposition of the claim' or defense." Nahno-Lopez, 625 F.3d at 1283 (quoting Adler v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 144 F.3d 664, 670 (10th Cir. 1998) (citing Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248)).

The moving party bears "'both the initial burden of production on a motion for summary judgment and the [*44] burden of establishing that summary judgment is appropriate as a matter of law.'" Kannady v. City of Kiowa, 590 F.3d 1161, 1169 (10th Cir. 2010) (quoting Trainor v. Apollo Metal Specialties, Inc., 318 F.3d 976, 979 (10th Cir. 2002)). To meet this burden, the moving party "'need not negate the non-movant's claim, but need only point to an absence of evidence to support the non-movant's claim.'" Id. (quoting Sigmon v. CommunityCare HMO, Inc., 234 F.3d 1121, 1125 (10th Cir. 2000)); see also In re Urethane Antitrust Litig., 913 F. Supp. 2d at 1150 (explaining that "a movant that does not bear the ultimate burden of persuasion at trial need not negate the other party's claim; rather, the movant need simply point out to the court a lack of evidence for the other party on an essential element of that party's claim." (citation omitted)).

If the moving party satisfies its initial burden, the non-moving party "'may not rest on its pleadings, but must bring forward specific facts showing a genuine issue for trial as to those dispositive matters for which it carries the burden of proof.'" Id. (quoting Jenkins v. Wood, 81 F.3d 988, 990 (10th Cir. 1996)); see also Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 324, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986); Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248-49. "To accomplish this, the facts must be identified by reference to affidavits, deposition transcripts, or specific exhibits incorporated therein."

[12] The sealed version of this Memorandum and Order (Doc. 310) identifies this hospital specifically.

Adler, 144 F.3d at 671 (citing Thomas v. Wichita Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 968 F.2d 1022, 1024 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 506 U.S. 1013, 113 S. Ct. 635, 121 L. Ed. 2d 566 (1992)).

Here, plaintiff and defendants both have filed motions for summary judgment. When the parties file cross-motions for summary judgment, the legal standard does not change. Each [*45] movant bears the burden of establishing that no genuine issue of material fact exists and it is entitled to judgment as a matter of law under its summary judgment theory. Atl. Richfield Co. v. Farm Credit Bank of Wichita, 226 F.3d 1138, 1148 (10th Cir. 2000). The Court must treat cross motions for summary judgment separately—"the denial of one does not require the grant of another." Buell Cabinet Co. v. Sudduth, 608 F.2d 431, 433 (10th Cir. 1979). However, where the cross motions overlap, the Court may address the legal arguments together. Berges v. Standard Ins. Co., 704 F. Supp. 2d 1149, 1155 (D. Kan. 2010) (citation omitted). Also, the Court may assume that it need not consider evidence beyond that cited by the parties. Atl. Richfield Co., 226 F.3d at 1148 (quoting James Barlow Family Ltd. P'ship v. David M. Munson, Inc., 132 F.3d 1316, 1319 (10th Cir. 1997)). Nevertheless, the Court must deny summary judgment if disputes remain about material facts. Id. (quoting James Barlow, 132 F.3d at 1319).

Finally, summary judgment is not a "disfavored procedural shortcut." Celotex, 477 U.S. at 327. Instead, it is an important procedure "designed 'to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action.'" Id. (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 1). And, summary judgment has "particular importance in the area of antitrust law, because it helps to avoid wasteful trials and prevent lengthy litigation that may have a chilling effect on pro-competitive market forces." Major League Baseball Props., Inc. v. Salvino, Inc., 542 F.3d 290, 309 (2d Cir. 2008) (citation, internal quotation marks, and alterations omitted); see also Race Tires Am., Inc. v. Hoosier Racing Tire Corp., 614 F.3d 57, 73 (3d Cir. 2010) (stating that "[t]he entry of summary judgment in favor of an antitrust [*46] defendant may actually be required in order to prevent lengthy and drawn-out litigation, which may have a chilling effect on competitive market forces." (citation omitted)). Indeed, the Supreme Court has recognized that "[s]ummary judgments have a place in the antitrust field" because "[s]ome of the law in this area is so well developed that [when] the gist of the case turns on documentary evidence, the rule at times can be divined without a trial." White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 259, 83 S. Ct. 696, 9 L. Ed. 2d 738 (1963); see also SEC v. Geyser Minerals Corp., 452 F.2d 876, 881 (10th Cir. 1971) (explaining that "even in antitrust litigation, if the pertinent area of law is well developed and the case turns on documentary evidence, disposition by summary judgment may be appropriate" (citing White Motor Corp., 372 U.S. at 259)).

III. Analysis

Suture Express has filed a Partial Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. 254) asking the Court to find that O&M and Cardinal's bundling actions are an illegal tying practice that violates: (1) Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act; (2) Section 3 of the Clayton Act; and (3) the Kansas Restraint of Trade Act ("KRTA"), K.S.A. § 50-101 et seq. Defendants have filed a Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. 253), seeking summary judgment against all three legal theories invoked by Suture Express' claims. The Court exercises its discretion to address the parties' cross-motions together. [*47]

A. Sherman Act § 1

Suture Express asserts that defendants' bundling practices constitute an illegal tying arrangement that violates section 1 of the Sherman Act. A tying arrangement exists when a seller conditions its sale of a product (the "tying" product) on the purchase of a second product (the "tied" product). Ill. Tool Works, Inc. v. Indep. Ink, Inc., 547 U.S. 28, 31, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26 (2006). The Supreme Court has explained that "'the essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms.'" Id. (quoting Jefferson Par. Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 12, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984)). But, even in concentrated markets, tying arrangements "may serve procompetitive purposes, such as quality control, production and sales efficiencies, and facilitation of indirect price competition." Town Sound & Customer Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 477 (3d Cir. 1992); see also Cascade Health Sols. v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 895 (9th Cir. 2007) (explaining tying in the form of bundled discounts "generally benefit[s] buyers because the discounts allow the buyer to get more for less" and that tying can produce "savings to the seller because it usually costs a firm less to sell multiple products to one customer at the same time than it does to sell the products individually").

Here, Suture [*48] Express claims that defendants have conditioned the sale of other med-surg distribution (the "tying" product) on the purchase of suture and endo distribution (the "tied" product). Each defendant imposed a tying arrangement, according to Suture Express, by offering a bundled discount that makes it uneconomic for customers to contract for suture and endo distribution separate and apart from other med-surg distribution. Suture Express characterizes the bundled discount as a "penalty" that defendants impose on customers who choose to purchase suture and endo distribution elsewhere. And, Suture Express contends, this bundling arrangement amounts to an unreasonable restraint on trade in violation of the Sherman Act § 1.

Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Notwithstanding its words, § 1 does not prohibit every restraint of trade, but only "unreasonable restraints of trade." Law v. NCAA, 134 F.3d 1010, 1016 (10th Cir.), cert denied, 525 U.S. 822, 119 S. Ct. 65, 142 L. Ed. 2d 51 (1998) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Courts employ two different tests to determine whether a defendant's conduct unreasonably restrains trade. Id. They are: (1) the per [*49] se rule, and (2) the rule of reason. Id. (citing SCFC ILC, Inc. v. Visa USA, Inc., 36 F.3d 958, 963 (10th Cir. 1994)).

The elements of a tying violation are: "(1) two separate products or services are involved; (2) the sale or agreement to sell one product or service is conditioned on the purchase of another; (3) the seller has sufficient economic power in the tying product market to enable it to restrain trade in the tied product market; and (4) a not insubstantial amount of interstate commerce in the tied product is affected." Sports Racing Servs., Inc. v. Sports Car Club of Am., Inc., 131 F.3d 874, 886 (10th Cir. 1997) (citations omitted); see also Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Tech. Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 461-62, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992); Jefferson Par., 466 U.S. at 12-18, abrogated on other grounds by Ill. Tool Works, Inc., 547 U.S. at 31; Multistate Legal Studies, Inc. v. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich Legal & Prof'l Publ'n, Inc., 63 F.3d 1540, 1546 (10th Cir. 1995) (reciting the elements of a "per se violation").

The per se rule "condemns practices that 'are entirely void of redeeming competitive rationales.'" Id. (quoting SCFC ILC, Inc., 36 F.3d at 963). When presented with a practice that is illegal per se, the court "need not examine the practice's impact on the market or the procompetitive justifications for the practice advanced by a defendant before finding a violation of antitrust law." Id. Some courts have recognized, however, that the "per se" rule in tying cases is not "like other, truly per se rules in antitrust law" because it requires an "inquiry into [the] tying product market structure (which is frequently costly and time-consuming) . [*50] . . but if the defendant is found to have market power there, the plaintiff is, in theory, relieved of proving actual harm to competition and of rebutting justifications for the tie-in." Town Sound & Customer Tops, Inc., 959 F.2d at 477; see also Sheridan v. Marathon Petroleum Co., 530 F.3d 590, 593-94 (7th Cir. 2008) (explaining that despite several Supreme Court decisions applying the rule of reason test to vertical restraints, the Supreme Court has not discarded the "per se" tying rule and, instead, it has modified the rule by requiring that the seller hold market power in the tying product); U.S. Healthcare, Inc. v. Healthsource, Inc., 986 F.2d 589, 593 n.2 (1st Cir. 1993) (stating that "[t]ying is sometimes also described as a per se offense but, since some element of power must be shown and defenses are effectively available, 'quasi' per se might be a better label." (citing Eastman Kodak Co., 504 U.S. 451, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265)).

Absent per se liability, a plaintiff still may prevail on a tying claim if the challenged practice unreasonably restrains competition. See Jefferson Par., 466 U.S. at 29; *Fortner Enters., Inc. v. When Judge Rogers decided defendants' motion to dismiss, he ruled that the Complaint failed to state a plausible Sherman Act violation under a per se analysis. Doc. 50 at 8-10. But, Judge Rogers held that Suture Express' tying claim properly stated a claim under the rule of reason analysis. Id. at 10-11. In its summary judgment motion, Suture Express recites the [*52] elements of a tying violation (Doc. 268 at 67), and asserts that the summary judgment facts demonstrate each of these elements under a rule of reason analysis, thereby warranting summary judgment in its favor. See Doc. 268 at 66-80. Suture Express also argues that the bundling provisions have affected competition adversely and no procompetitive justifications exist for the practice. Conversely, defendants argue in their summary judgment motion that the undisputed facts, even when viewed in Suture Express' favor, fail to establish the elements of a tying claim. And, defendants assert, even if Suture Express could establish the elements of a tying claim under a rule of reason analysis, the summary judgment facts present no anticompetitive effects from defendants' bundling but instead demonstrate pro-competitive and valid business reasons for the bundling practices. Thus, analyzing Suture Express' claim under a rule of reason analysis, defendants contend they are entitled to summary judgment.

The Court addresses each of these arguments below and concludes that the summary judgment facts, even when viewed in the light most favorable to Suture Express, present no basis for a reasonable jury [*53] to find the existence of an illegal tying arrangement violating § 1 of the Sherman Act. Thus, Cardinal and O&M are entitled to summary judgment against Suture Express' Sherman Act § 1 claim.

1. Elements of a Tying Arrangement

Suture Express asserts that the undisputed summary judgment facts establish all four elements of an illegal tying arrangement in violation of § 1. As stated, those four elements require proof of: "(1) two separate products or services are involved; (2) the sale or agreement to sell one product or service is conditioned on the purchase of another; (3) the seller has sufficient economic power in the tying product market to enable it to restrain trade in the tied product market; and (4) a not insubstantial amount of interstate commerce in the tied product is affected." Sports Racing Servs., Inc., 131 F.3d at 886 (citations omitted). Suture Express contends that the summary judgment facts entitle it to summary judgment on the issue of liability on its Sherman Act claim.

In contrast, defendants O&M and Cardinal assert that Suture Express cannot establish all four elements. They argue that certain disputed facts exist on some elements, and they thus preclude summary judgment for Suture Express. More specifically, O&M and [*54] Cardinal argue that any disputed facts germane to the first element of a tying claim—whether two separate products are involved—preclude summary judgment for Suture Express. But those disputes do not matter, defendants say, to the legal theory advanced by their summary judgment motion. Defendants assert that no triable issue of material fact exists about the second and third elements of the Sherman Act claim.

The Court examines the second and third elements below. In subpart a, the Court considers the second element of a tying claim—whether the agreement to sell med-surg distribution is conditioned on purchasing suture and endo distribution. As explained in that section, the Court concludes that factual issues preclude a summary judgment finding for either party on this element. In subpart b, the Court concludes that the summary judgment facts preclude the possibility that Suture Express can establish the third element of a tying claim, i.e., that O&M and Cardinal have sufficient market power in the tying product to permit them to restrain trade in the tied product market. This conclusion leads the Court to grant summary judgment for defendants against Suture Express' §1 tying claim. [*55] Likewise, it negates Suture Express' motion for summary judgment.

a. The Court Cannot Decide on Summary Judgment whether Defendants Condition the Sale of Med-Surg Distribution on the Purchase of Suture and Endo Distribution.

In its discretion, the Court begins with Suture Express' summary judgment motion, addressing the conditioning element of a tying claim. In this analysis, the Court views the evidence in the light most favorable to defendants, and concludes that these summary judgment facts present triable issues about the conditioning element of a tying claim.

i. Suture Express' Summary Judgment Arguments on the Conditioning Element

Suture Express asserts that defendants have conditioned the sale of other med-surg distribution on the sale of suture and endo distribution. Suture Express does not assert that the bundling discounts actually prohibit customers from purchasing the two types of distribution separately. Instead, Suture Express contends that the economic penalties imposed by defendants' bundling contracts coerce customers into purchasing both kinds of distribution services from them. See Monument Builders of Greater Kansas City, Inc. v. Am. Cemetery Ass'n of Kan., 891 F.2d 1473, 1476, 1483 (10th Cir. 1989) (holding that plaintiff had stated a tying claim against defendants who had imposed "prohibitively [*56] expensive" surcharges on purchasers of cemetery plots who bought grave markers separately instead of purchasing them from the cemetery).

Suture Express relies on two different tests to prove that defendants' bundling practices have an illegal, coercive effect: (1) the buyer behavior test, which focuses on the percentage of buyers of the tied product that take the bundle; and (2) the discount attribution test which examines, after allocation of the alleged discounts to the tied product, whether the incremental price of the tied product is below its costs.

The buyer behavior test, examines "whether nearly all or a very high percentage of buyers purchased the [bundle] from the defendant rather than purchasing [the tying product] from defendant and [the tied product] from a rival." X Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 1758a (3d ed. 2011). Suture Express' expert, Professor Elhauge, performed the buyer behavior test two different ways.

First, he examined Suture Express' performance among defendants' customers who had entered into contracts containing the bundling terms and compared it to Suture Express' performance with customers who were not bound by bundling terms. From [*57] that data, plaintiff's expert determined that Suture Express' market share among customers who had entered into contracts with bundling terms ranged from 2% to 6%. Second, Professor Elhauge performed a similar buyer behavior test by using sales data from Suture Express, Cardinal, and O&M to calculate whether purchases of Suture Express' suture and endo distribution by customers who purchased other med-surg distribution from O&M and Cardinal (i.e., customers who "broke the bundle") was less than 10% of the sum of those purchases plus purchases of defendants' suture and endo distribution by customers who accepted the bundle. Professor Elhauge determined that this ratio ranged between 3% and 7%, depending on the year.

Defendants respond that Professor Elhauge performed the buyer behavior tests incorrectly, using only Suture Express' sales data as the rival tied product. Indeed, Areeda and Hovenkamp suggest a presumption of non-tying if "a sufficiently large number of customers are observed who purchase the secondary product from someone other than defendant." X Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1758a (emphasis added). Here, Professor Elhauge only examined the percentage of customers who broke the bundle [*58] by purchasing the tied product (suture and endo distribution) from Suture Express—not the percentage of all purchases of the tied product from any rival med-surg distributor. Suture Express counters defendants' attack by explaining that Professor Elhauge used all the data available to him to make his calculations, but this data did not include data from non-party med-surg distributors. But, even if he had, Professor Elhauge asserts that the data would not favor defendants because the other broadline distributors also use bundling contracts and any suture and endo sales made by other broadline distributors under their bundling contracts would increase the denominator in the ratio, thereby producing an even smaller percentage than the 3% to 7% that he calculated from just the parties' data (and, thus, the Court infers, establishing even stronger evidence of coercion). Professor Elhauge also opines that, if a customer orders other med-surg from defendants but not suture and endo, then the customer likely orders suture and endo from Suture Express; and not from another broadline distributor because Suture Express offers lower markups than any other distributors in the market. Defendants [*59] launch yet another line of attack on Professor Elhauge's analysis, asserting that neither of these buyer behavior tests is dispositive. Therefore, defendants say, Suture Express cannot show it is entitled to summary judgment based solely on these tests.

Areeda and Hovenkamp explain that the results of the buyer behavior test can play a useful—but not dispositive—role. That is, the test may suggest an illegal tying arrangement, or even create presumptions or inferences for and against illegal tying under certain circumstances. X Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1758a. But the commentators never endorse the test as a dispositive one, capable of deciding the entire question. Id.

The Court concludes that defendants' criticisms of Professor Elhauge's analysis under the buyer behavior test present fact issues that preclude Suture Express from establishing coercion on summary judgment. While these tests might persuade a reasonable jury to conclude that coercion exists, a reasonable jury also could conclude otherwise—i.e., that consumer choices and preferences drive the results, not coercion from defendants' bundling provisions. Based on this record, the undisputed facts fail to establish that defendants' [*60] contracts have a coercive effect.

This leaves Professor Elhauge's analysis under the discount attribution test. He used this test to analyze cost data produced by Cardinal to determine how often the contract terms brought the suture and endo distribution charges below cost. He concluded that among Cardinal customers with contracts containing the bundling provision, the resulting incremental price was lower than the minimum markup 67% of the time. He also opined that among O&M customers[13] with such contracts, the resulting incremental price was lower than the minimum markup 85% of the time.

Other courts have applied the discount attribution test to tying or bundled discount cases to assess the likelihood that coercion exists. See Collins Inkjet Corp. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 781 F.3d 264, 275 (6th Cir. 2015) (applying the discount attribution standard and finding a likelihood that plaintiff could prove coercion because the record suggested that defendant was selling the product below its incremental cost); Cascade Health Sols. v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 906 (9th Cir. 2007) (adopting a discount attribution standard that examined whether "the resulting [*61] price of the competitive product or products is below the defendant's incremental cost to produce them," and, if it is, "the trier of fact may find that the bundled discount is exclusionary for the purpose of § 2.").

Defendants contend that Suture Express cannot use the discount attribution test to prove coercion here, and they make two principal arguments. First, defendants argue that the discount attribution test applies only to monopolization claims under Sherman Act § 2, and that no court ever has applied the test to non-monopolists, as are defendants in this case. In Collins Inkjet Corp., the Sixth Circuit applied the discount attribution test when plaintiff asserted a § 1 Sherman Act claim because it found no reason to treat economically identical behavior differently under §§ 1 and 2 when both sections prohibit anticompetitive conduct. 781 F.3d at 267. But, in that case, defendant had a 100% monopolistic share of the market. Id. at 281.

[13] Because O&M did not produce cost data sufficient for Professor Elhauge to perform a similar calculation for its markups, he used Cardinal's cost data to perform the analysis for O&M.

Defendants contend that no court ever has applied the discount attribution test to a non-monopolist. The Court's research reveals the same. This absence of authority makes sense because the test examines whether defendant is selling "the competitive (or tied) [product at a] price below [*62] cost," which may exclude a rival who sells only the tied product. Id. at 274. But, in a market without a monopolist, a seller of a full range of products has no incentive to exclude the rival who sells only the tied product because other full range sellers competing in the market still can defeat any effort to raise prices. Here, defendants are not monopolists. And so, even if defendants excluded Suture Express, other med-surg distributors in the market (such as Medline) can prevent defendants from raising prices. In a market without a monopolist, customers have the option to move their business from defendants to other med-surg distributors (such as Medline) if they are unsatisfied with defendants' prices.

When discussing the "formulation for cost-based tests for determining when a bundled discount is 'exclusionary' in the sense that it keeps rivals out of the market," the commentators have described a scenario similar to the one presented here:

> In order to have antitrust significance a bundle must not merely keep one rival out of the market; it must exclude all of them. That is to say, a firm's aggregate discount of product A, B, and C might very well exclude a rival who produces only B and [*63] C, but not A. However, if there are other rivals in the market who also make the full range of A, B, and C, then the practice is not exclusionary, although it may limit the range of effective competition to those firms capable of competing across the full range of goods.

Herbert Hovenkamp & Eric Hovenkamp, Complex Bundled Discounts and Antitrust Policy, 57 Buff. L. Rev. 1227, 1231 (July 2009). As applied here, defendants' bundling of suture and endo distribution does not exclude all rivals. For instance, defendants' bundling arrangements have not excluded Medline, a third national broadline distributor who offers similar bundling provisions. Likewise, defendants have not excluded Seneca and MMS, regional broadline distributors who also offer bundling, from competing in the relevant market. The summary judgment facts thus fail to show that defendants' bundling practices have excluded all rivals, and the discount attribution test cannot serve as a strong indicator of coercion because defendants are not monopolists.

Second, defendants attack Professor Elhauge's analysis by asserting that he used an improper measure of costs and an unrepresentative sample size. These criticisms create fact issues that preclude Suture Express [*64] from prevailing on the coercion element of a tying claim and thus preclude summary judgment in its favor. Also, like the buyer behavior test, the discount attribution test may suggest evidence of coercion, but it is not a dispositive test that warrants summary judgment for Suture Express. See Hovenkamp & Hovenkamp, 57 Buff. L. Rev. at 1255 (explaining that the discount attribution test "produces very severe false positives and should be regarded as nothing more than a starting point for analysis"). In short, the results of Professor Elhauge's discount attribution test cannot establish coercion at the summary judgment stage.

Finally, Suture Express relies on anecdotal statements by its customers to establish coercion. Suture Express cites comments from defendants' customers giving their understanding of the bundling terms in defendants' contracts, i.e., that they prevented the customer from purchasing suture and endo distribution from Suture Express. Some customers informed Suture Express that their contracts prohibited the purchases while other customers explained that any savings that they may realize from purchasing suture and endo distribution from Suture Express was offset by the costs incurred under their [*65] contracts with defendants. Defendants respond that evidence of customers adhering to their contract terms is not coercion. If that were true, defendants argue, the antitrust laws would prohibit all contracts restraining a customer's ability to do business with another. But that is not the law. See, e.g., NCAA v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 98, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984) (explaining that "every contract is a restraint of trade, and as we have repeatedly recognized, the Sherman Act was intended to prohibit only unreasonable restraints of trade").

Viewing this evidence in the light most favorable to defendants, as the Court must when it considers Suture Express' summary judgment motion, the Court concludes that the summary judgment facts present genuine issues precluding Suture Express from establishing the second element of a tying claim—that defendants have conditioned the sale of other med-surg distribution on the sale of suture and endo distribution. Because Suture Express cannot prove at least one element of a tying claim on summary judgment, the Court denies Suture Express' motion for partial summary judgment.

ii. Defendants' Summary Judgment Arguments on the Conditioning Element

The Court now turns to defendants' summary judgment arguments on this [*66] same element. Defendants contend that the Court must grant summary judgment against Suture Express' § 1 tying claim because the summary judgment facts present no triable issues about the conditioning element of that claim. Specifically, defendants argue that no evidence of coercion exists because med-surg distributors compete vigorously for contracts before a customer enters into a med-surg distribution contract. And, defendants assert, customers are not coerced into entering those contracts. Instead, defendants claim that the evidence simply shows that customers freely decide to enter contracts and then adhere to the contract terms they have chosen. Also, defendants argue that the contracts allow customers to terminate them, generally with six months' notice, and defendants have a history of lax enforcement of the bundling terms.

The summary judgment record contains conflicting evidence about this last point—defendants' enforcement of their contracts. A jury could examine defendants' evidence and conclude that no coercion exists. But a reasonable jury also could find that the results of Professor Elhauge's tests, notwithstanding defendants' criticism of them, prove coercion. Thus, the [*67] Court finds that disputed factual issues preclude it from deciding on summary judgment whether defendants condition the purchase of other med-surg distribution on the purchase of suture and endo distribution.

Because the summary judgment facts present a genuine issue of fact on the second element of a tying claim—that is, whether defendants have conditioned the sale of other med-surg distribution on the sale of suture and endo distribution—the Court turns now to defendants' other summary judgment theory. As the next section explains, the summary judgment facts present no genuine issues about a separate element of Suture Express' tying claim—market power.

b. Defendants Lack Economic Power in Tying Market.

The Supreme Court requires that "in all cases involving a tying arrangement, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying product." Ill. Tool Works, 547 U.S. at 46. But "[t]he standard of 'sufficient economic power' does not . . . require that the defendant have a monopoly or even a dominant position throughout the market for the tying product." Fortner Enters., 394 U.S. at 502. Instead, "economic power over the tying product can be sufficient even though the power falls far short of dominance and even though the power exists [*68] only with respect to some of the buyers in the market." Id. at 502-03 (citations omitted). "'Even absent a showing of market dominance, the crucial economic power may be inferred from the tying product's desirability to consumers or from uniqueness in its attributes.'" Id. at 503 (quoting United States v. Loew's Inc., 371 U.S. 38, 45, 83 S. Ct. 97, 9 L. Ed. 2d 11 (1962)).

A plaintiff can demonstrate that market power exists by adducing evidence of either "power to control prices" or "the power to exclude competition." Westman Comm'n Co. v. Hobart Int'l, Inc., 796 F.2d 1216, 1225 n.3 (10th Cir. 1986); see also Fortner Enters., Inc. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 503 (1969), 89 S. Ct. 1252, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495 ("Market power is usually stated to be the ability of a single seller to raise price and restrict output."). The power to control prices and the power to exclude competition "may, in turn, depend on various market characteristics, including the existence and intensity of entry barriers, elasticity of supply and demand, the number of firms in the market, and market trends." Reazin v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Kan., Inc., 899 F.2d 951, 967 (10th Cir. 1990) (citing Shoppin' Bag of Pueblo, Inc. v. Dillon Cos., 783 F.2d 159, 162 (10th Cir. 1986)); see also FTC v. Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 460-61, 106 S. Ct. 2009, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1986) (explaining that "[s]ince the purpose of the inquiries into market definition and market power is to determine whether an arrangement has the potential for genuine adverse effects on competition, 'proof of actual detrimental effects, such as a reduction of output,' can obviate the need for an inquiry into market power, which is but a 'surrogate for detrimental effects'" (quoting [*69] 7 P. Areeda, Antitrust Law ¶ 1511, p. 429 (1986)).

i. Suture Express' Summary Judgment Arguments on the Market Power Element

Again, the Court begins by addressing Suture Express' summary judgment arguments. In so doing, the Court views the evidence in the light most favorable to defendants, the non-moving parties on Suture Express' summary judgment motion.

Suture Express argues that the summary judgment facts establish that defendants possess power in the market for other med-surg distribution. To support this claim, Suture Express points to defendants' large market share in other med-surg products, the substantial barriers to entering this market, the imposition of the bundling terms in a large percentage of defendants' contracts, the infrequency of customers "breaking" the bundle, and Suture Express' sales losses to defendants because of the bundling provisions.

First, Suture Express asserts that defendants comprise the large majority of nationwide broadline distribution of other med-surg products. From 2007 to 2012, O&M's share of the market ranged from 32% to 38%, and Cardinal's share ranged from 27% to 31%. Suture Express cites several cases in which courts have determined that lesser [*70] market shares establish market power. But defendants correctly explain that those cases involved different market conditions than those presented here. See, e.g., United States v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 344 F.3d 229, 239-40 (2d Cir. 2003) (finding market power existed when one defendant had 47% market share and the other defendant had 26% market share in a highly concentrated market where customers could not refuse to do business with defendants, even when subject to significant price increases, because of customer preference); Toys "R" Us, Inc. v. F.T.C., 221 F.3d 928, 937 (7th Cir. 2000) (finding market power when a retailer, with 20% of the national wholesale market and up to 49% in some local wholesale markets, successfully had reduced output from manufacturers thereby insulating it from having to lower prices); Eiberger v. Sony Corp. of Am., 622 F.2d 1068, 1080-81 (2d Cir. 1980) (explaining that defendant had a "strong market position" because it had established 12% market share within just four years of entering the market and defendant was the fastest growing company among four other competitors who accounted for 96% of the market); United States v. Am. Express Co., 88 F. Supp. 3d 143, 188-91 (E.D.N.Y. 2015) (concluding that defendant's 26.4% market share of a highly concentrated market with significant barriers to entry alone was not likely sufficient to prove market power without "the amplifying effect of cardholder insistence" on paying with [*71] an American Express card); Johnson v. Blue Cross/Blue Shield of New Mexico, 677 F. Supp. 1112, 1119-20 (D.N.M. 1987) (concluding that genuine issues precluded summary judgment for defendant on market power because defendant's market share of 25% to 30% was "artificially depress[ed]" and entering companies were unable to capture any significant portion of the market).

Importantly, while defendants' market share is relevant to determining market power, it "alone is insufficient to establish market power." Reazin, 899 F.2d at 967 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, the Court cannot conclude that O&M and Cardinal have sufficient market power based on their market shares alone.

Second, the barriers to entry into the market fail to establish market power. "Entry barriers are particular characteristics of a market which impede entry by new firms into that market." Reazin, 899 F.2d at 968 (citations omitted). Barriers to entry "may include high capital costs or regulatory or legal requirements such as patents or licenses." Id. Suture Express argues that the barriers to entry here are substantial because national broadline distribution requires a network of local distribution facilities and sufficient infrastructure that is expensive to build. It also requires hospital customers to support the operation. But, the summary [*72] judgment facts show that competitors in this med-surg market are growing their businesses as they compete against O&M, Cardinal, and Suture Express for acute care customers. For example, Medline has grown its business significantly from 2008 to 2014. It has won customers from O&M, Cardinal, and Suture Express, and it has successfully negotiated contracts with GPOs and regional buying groups. Also, regional distributors are competing successfully in this market, winning contracts from national broadline distributors. For example, regional distributor Seneca has grown its business by 50% in the last five or six years, and it has opened three new distribution centers since 2007. As these competitors have expanded in the market, O&M and Cardinal's market shares have declined or remained relatively flat. These facts fail to establish that barriers to entry exist in the market.

Suture Express also argues that a customer's cost to switch med-surg distribution precludes competitors from entering the market. But, the summary judgment facts establish just the opposite. While some customers describe the process of switching distributors as an involved one requiring an investment of time and overhead, [*73] the record is filled with examples of customers who, in fact, have switched distributors on a regular basis. Indeed, O&M and Cardinal retain only about half of all acute care customers after three or four years of beginning to do business with them.

Third, that defendants have managed to secure the bundling terms in a large number of defendants' contracts fails to establish market power. Suture Express' expert reviewed 102 of defendants' customer contracts and concluded that, between 2006 and 2013, O&M made about 98% of its suture and endo sales and Cardinal made about 71% of its suture and endo sales under contracts containing a bundling provision. But the mere existence of these terms in customer contracts cannot create an inference of market power. See *Tele Atlas N.V. v. NAVTEQ Corp., No. C-05-01673 RMW, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 111866, 2008 WL 4809441, at 16 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 28, 2008) (explaining that "[t]o permit the mere existence of a tying arrangement to satisfy the plaintiffs' burden of production on market power is to permit every tying case to proceed to a jury, even where the defendant lacks a shred of market power. This is bad policy, as '[m]any tying arrangements, even those involving patents and requirements ties, are fully consistent with a free, competitive market.'" [*74] (quoting Ill. Tool Works, 547 U.S. at 45)).

The summary judgment facts also establish that other competitors in the market, including national distributor Medline and regional distributors Seneca and MMS, use similar bundling terms for suture and endo distribution in their customer contracts. And Suture Express does not contend that these firms have market power. The undisputed facts reveal a market where customers have a range of choices before deciding which contracts to enter. They can contract through a GPO or regional buying group, or they can contract directly with a med-surg distributor. Customers make the choice to enter into contracts containing bundling terms, both with defendants and other competitive rivals. The existence of these terms in defendants' contracts does not raise an inference of market power.

Also, competitive rivals offer similar bundling terms, which demonstrates that defendants' bundling is not a barrier to entry. As the Seventh Circuit has explained, "[i]f rivals may design and offer a similar package for a similar cost, there is no barrier, and without a barrier there is no market power." Will v. Comprehensive Accounting Corp., 776 F.2d 665, 672 (7th Cir. 1985). Here, other med-surg distributors, including Medline, Seneca, and MMS, offer contractual terms similar [*75] to the ones used by defendants. Thus, defendants' use of bundling terms is not unique among competitors in the market, and this practice fails to establish market power.

Fourth, Suture Express asserts that defendants' bundling terms are predatory because they fail the discount attribution test. But, as described above, the Court cannot find on summary judgment that defendants fail this test because fact issues preclude such a finding. The Court also refuses to find that the fact issues attendant to this test demonstrate market power. Suture Express cites no legal authority for that conclusion. And, as noted above, no court has applied the discount attribution test to a non-monopolist. Defendants are not monopolists, and they would not benefit from excluding a rival who produces less than a full range of products because other broadline distributors exist to compete against defendants and prevent them from raising prices.

Fifth, because defendants' customers "break the bundle" infrequently, Suture Express contends this establishes O&M and Cardinal's market power. This fact, it contends, shows an indirect detrimental effect on competition, thereby demonstrating market power. However, as [*76] already explained, customers have many alternatives in this market before deciding to enter contracts. That customers make business decisions to enter into contracts and then adhere to their terms does not support a finding of market power.

Sixth, Suture Express asserts that its loss of sales to defendants because of the bundling provisions shows market power. Suture Express' expert concluded that Suture Express' market share among "unrestrained customers" (i.e., those not parties to contracts containing the bundling terms) was four to 15 times greater than its share among customers who were subject to bundling terms, depending on the year. But, like other arguments Suture Express makes, this fact reveals nothing more than customers adhering to their contracts' terms after they have made the decisions to enter into them. Suture Express cites no authority for the proposition that this fact demonstrates market power.

Seventh, Suture Express argues that defendants' intent in implementing the bundling terms was to leverage its market power and protect its business from Suture Express. See Doc. 268 at 78 (citing Chicago Bd. of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 38 S. Ct. 242, 62 L. Ed. 683 (1918) ("knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences"); [*77] Hahn v. Or. Physicians' Serv., 868 F.2d 1022, 1026 (9th Cir. 1988) (explaining the intent of defendants may be relevant to the effect on competition)). Several of defendants' internal documents and communications acknowledge that using bundling terms successfully has prevented Suture Express from selling suture and endo distribution to their customers. But, as the Ninth Circuit recognized in Hahn, intent is not dispositive. 868 F.2d at 1026. And, the Tenth Circuit has held that "intent to harm a rival, protect and maximize profits, or 'do all the business [ ] they can,' is neither actionable nor sanctioned by the antitrust laws." SCFC ILC, Inc., 36 F.3d at 969 (quoting Ball Mem'l Hosp., Inc. v. Mut. Hosp. Ins., Inc., 784 F.2d 1325, 1339 (7th Cir. 1986)). The Court cannot find market power from defendants' intent to protect its suture and endo business from Suture Express' rival business model.

The Court concludes that none of Suture Express' arguments establish that defendants have sufficient market power to entitle Suture Express to summary judgment. Thus, the Court cannot grant summary judgment for Suture Express on this element of their § 1 tying claim.

ii. Defendants' Summary Judgment Arguments on the Market Power Element

The Court now turns to defendants' summary judgment arguments on the market power element. In this analysis, of course, the Court views the facts in the light [*78] most favorable to Suture Express, the non-moving party. And, the Court concludes that the undisputed facts, when viewed in Suture Express' favor, present no triable issues about defendants' power to exclude competition or control prices. See Westman Comm'n Co. v. Hobart Int'l, Inc., 796 F.2d 1216, 1225 n.3 (10th Cir. 1986) (explaining that an antitrust plaintiff may demonstrate market power with evidence of either power to control prices or the power to exclude competition). Thus, the summary judgment facts preclude Suture Express from establishing market power, and the Court must grant summary judgment for defendants.

As described above, the summary judgment facts describe a market rife with competitive rivals who are growing and expanding their business while Cardinal and O&M's market shares have declined or remained relatively flat. Indeed, O&M and Cardinal compete vigorously against one another, winning and losing customers back and forth. They also compete with a third national broadline distributor, Medline, who has grown its business significantly in recent years. The record also includes undisputed examples of growth among regional distributors who compete against national broadline distributors, including defendants, for acute care business. And, at least [*79] two competitors in the non-acute care business, McKesson and Henry Schein Medical, potentially could enter the acute care markets and compete against defendants using their existing national distribution networks for non-acute care distribution. The parties also face competition from manufacturers who sell directly to hospital systems that have implemented a self-distribution strategy. All of this evidence demonstrates that defendants lack the power to exclude competition.

Also, the existence of a competitive rival that offers similar bundling—Medline—forecloses defendants' ability to exclude competition here. As Hovenkamp & Hovenkamp explain, "if bundle-to-bundle discount competition can occur in a market, then a particular firm's bundled discount cannot be exclusionary unless its overall price is below its costs. Otherwise an equally efficient firm exists that would be able to match the discounted price and earn a profit."[14] Herbert Hovenkamp & Eric Hovenkamp, Complex Bundled Discounts and Antitrust Policy, 57 Buff. L. Rev.

[14] Suture Express does not allege that defendants' overall price is below its costs.

1227, 1231 (July 2009). Cf. Cascade Health Sols. v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 915 (9th Cir. 2007) (concluding that defendant possessed "substantial market power" when it was the exclusive provider of tertiary services in the market). Here, Medline uses similar bundling [*80] provisions, is growing its business, and competing with O&M and Cardinal. These undisputed facts prevent Suture Express from demonstrating any triable issues about defendants' ability to exclude competition.

The record also lacks evidence of defendants' ability to control prices. Instead, the summary judgment facts show that O&M and Cardinal's markups for the distribution of med-surg products were lower, on average, in 2013 than they were in 2008. Their markups for suture and endo distribution also were, on average, lower in 2013 than they were in 2008. Regional distributors Seneca and MMS also experienced declines in markups, which they attributed to competitive pressures from customers and other distributors. And, as Suture Express concedes, competition has lowered markups for suture and endo products.

Also, O&M and Cardinal's profit margins have declined since 2008. Cardinal's operating margins for distribution-only activity have decreased by about 80% from 2008 to 2011. O&M's operating margins for med-surg distribution also have decreased by about 17% between 2008 and 2013. Suture Express contends that [*81] these figures are misleading because they calculate the ratio using a figure that includes the value of the product distributed, thereby understating the margins. Suture Express asserts that the more appropriate figure to examine is the distribution services margin. But both O&M and Cardinal's distribution services margins also declined during this time period. The margin for Cardinal's distribution services (which is roughly seven to eight times greater than its operating margins) decreased by about 75% between 2008 and 2013; and O&M's margin (which is about 10 to 11 times greater than its operating margin) decreased by about 8% between 2008 and 2013.[15] This decline in markups and margins shows that defendants lack the ability to control prices.

The summary judgment record also establishes that acute care customers are consolidating, thereby forming larger and larger hospital systems. While Suture Express argues that no causal relationship exists between customers' consolidation and lowered prices in the market, several med-surg distributors, [*82] including Suture Express' CFO, testified that consolidation has increased customers' buying power and created a very competitive marketplace. The evidence of customer consolidation in a competitive market with declining profits also demonstrates that defendants lack the power to control prices.

Under these facts, no reasonable jury could conclude that defendants have the power to exclude competition or control price. Instead, the undisputed facts demonstrate a market where O&M and Cardinal compete vigorously against Medline, certain regional distributors, and each other. And, after three or four years, O&M and Cardinal can retain only about half of their acute care customers. These facts preclude any triable dispute about defendants' market power. See In re Wireless Tele. Servs. Antitrust Litig., 385 F. Supp. 2d 403, 417 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (granting summary judgment for defendants because plaintiff failed to present evidence raising a question of fact that any one of the defendants had sufficient market power to force a tie when "defendants compete against each other in terms of service and price" and "the high churn rate is striking evidence of their respective lack of control over the market and the impediments each of them faces to any effort to control price").

Because [*83] the summary judgment facts fail to present a triable issue about market power—one of the required elements for proving a tying claim—Suture Express' Sherman Act § 1 claim fails as a matter of law. Consequently, the Court must grant summary judgment for defendants.

2. The Summary Judgment Facts Fail to Establish Harm to Competition or an Antitrust Injury.

Defendants argue that they also are entitled to summary judgment against Suture Express' Sherman Act § 1 claims for another, independent reason—Suture Express cannot establish an antitrust injury. The Court agrees.

---

[15] The sealed version of this Memorandum and Order contains specific data for defendants' profit margins described in the above paragraph. See supra n.11.

A plaintiff asserting an antitrust claim must establish an antitrust injury, as the Sherman Act defines this term. Cohlmia v. St. John Med. Ctr., 693 F.3d 1269, 1280 (10th Cir. 2012) (quoting Tal v. Hogan, 453 F.3d 1244, 1253 (10th Cir. 2006)). "'The primary concern of the antitrust laws is the corruption of the competitive process, not the success or failure of a particular firm' or individual." Id. (quoting Tal, 453 F.3d at 1258). Therefore, the antitrust laws require a plaintiff to demonstrate "'an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful.'" Id. (quoting Tal, 453 F.3d at 1253).

Here, Suture Express argues that it has demonstrated an antitrust injury because defendants' bundling terms have prevented customers [*84] from purchasing suture and endo distribution from it. As a result, Suture Express contends, customers are denied Suture Express' superior service and higher fill rates and, in some cases, lower prices. Suture Express asserts that, but for defendants' conduct, it would have won more customers and experienced greater growth. At oral argument on the summary judgment motions, Suture Express emphasized that it offers a superior product—"a better mousetrap." That is, Suture Express contends that its overnight delivery of suture and endo products by air is a more efficient distribution method. And, Suture asserts that customers should have access to it.

But the antitrust laws are not designed to protect competitors like Suture Express; instead, those laws were enacted to promote competition so that market participants could decide who had "a better mousetrap." See Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977) (stating that the "antitrust laws . . . were enacted for the protection of competition not competitors" (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)); Reazin v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Kan., Inc., 899 F.2d 951, 960 (10th Cir. 1990) (explaining that a challenged practice must adversely impact competition, not just an individual competitor or plaintiff's business). Thus, Suture Express must show harm to competition, [*85] not just harm to Suture Express. See Cohlmia, 693 F.3d at 1281 ("'An antitrust plaintiff must prove that challenged conduct affected the prices, quantity or quality of goods or services, not just his own welfare.'" (quoting Mathews v. Lancaster Gen. Hosp., 87 F.3d 624, 641 (3d Cir. 1996)).

The Supreme Court has described raised prices and reduced output as the "hallmarks of anticompetitive behavior." NCAA v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 113, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984). Neither one exists here. The summary judgment facts, when viewed in Suture Express' favor, fail to demonstrate raised prices. Instead, as described above, the facts show declining markups for many competitors in the market—including both defendants, certain regional distributors, and Suture Express. The facts also show that defendants experienced declining margins. The record also contains evidence from med-surg distributors, including Suture Express' CFO, about competitive pressures in the marketplace that have produced pricing decreases.

The record also lacks admissible evidence of reduced output. Instead, rival national and regional competitors are growing and expanding their businesses. And, even Suture Express' expert calculated that industry-wide med-surg (including suture and endo distribution) revenues increased year-over-year during the relevant period. These summary [*86] judgment facts prevent a reasonable jury from inferring harm to competition, even when viewed in the light most favorable to Suture Express.

Suture Express argues that the Court should not examine the harm to competition by examining historical prices or output in the market. Instead, Suture Express asserts that it has demonstrated anticompetitive harm through its expert's analysis which shows that prices are higher than they would be but for the defendants' contracts containing bundling terms. And, Suture Express contends, customers paid these higher prices while suffering lower fill rates. Professor Elhauge estimates that customers paid higher prices, amounting to $36 million from 2007 to 2012. To calculate this figure, Professor Elhauge compared the average of defendants' markups on suture and endo distribution overall to Suture Express' markups overall. Defendants argue that by limiting the analysis to these firms, Suture Express fails to show that market-wide prices were higher and quality was lower than it would have been absent defendants' bundling. See Elec. Commc'ns Corp. v. Toshiba Am. Consumer Prods., Inc., 129 F.3d 240, 244 (2d Cir. 1997) (explaining that an antitrust violation requires a showing "of an actual adverse effect on competition market-wide").

The Court [*87] agrees. The difference in price for suture and endo distribution between these three competitors fails to show that competition is harmed across the market. As one court has explained, "[i]f a plaintiff could generate a jury question on injury to competition simply by asserting that his less expensive or superior product was excluded from the market, the distinction between injury to a competitor and injury to competition would be lost." *Brookins v. Int'l Motor Contest Ass'n, No. CIV. C96-134 MJM, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14225, 1998 WL 937242, at 4 (N.D. Iowa July 15, 1998). It is "[f]or that reason, the courts have held that the mere fact that a certain supplier is prevented from participating in the market does not of itself show an actual adverse effect." Id. (citation omitted).

Defendants challenge Professor Elhauge's analysis for another reason, asserting that it fails to account for the fact that acute care customers also require distribution of other med-surg products. Professor Elhauge concedes that the theory of anticompetitive harm depends on the harm in the tied market not being offset by a consumer surplus benefit in the tying market. While Suture Express contends that customers would have paid less for suture [*88] and endo distribution but for defendants' bundling, the analysis fails to show that prices for other med-surg distribution would not increase if defendants omitted the contractual bundling terms and thereby lost the benefit of efficiencies created by the bundle. See, e.g., Town Sound & Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 492 (3d Cir. 1992) (pointing out the flaw in plaintiff's logic that defendant would not raise the price of the tying product if the challenged tie-in was prohibited; instead, in a competitive market where defendant lacked supranormal profits, defendant would have to raise the price of the tying product "and consumers would be no better off than before").

Professor Elhauge's analysis does not present a genuine issue that the challenged practice harmed competition in the overall market. *See It's My Party, Inc. v. Live Nation, Inc., 811 F.3d 676, 2016 WL 426085, at 5 (4th Cir. 2016) (affirming summary judgment against plaintiff's antitrust claims and holding that the district court was not required "to accept uncritically" an expert's opinion "that coincidentally fit plaintiff's precise circumstances" because "[n]o party can expect to gerrymander its way to an antitrust victory without due regard for market realities."). Thus, Suture Express cannot withstand summary judgment because the facts, even when viewed in Suture Express' [*89] favor, fail to show a harm to competition. And without it, Suture Express cannot establish an antitrust injury.

3. Defendants Have Established Procompetitive Justifications for the Contractual Bundling.

Defendants also argue that, even if Suture Express could make a showing that the challenged action has an adverse effect on competition under the rule of reason approach described above, defendants' pricing terms provide customers with procompetitive benefits that are greater than any alleged anticompetitive harm. See Law, 134 F.3d at 1017 (explaining that if the challenged conduct results in an adverse effect on competition, then "[t]he inquiry . . . shifts to an evaluation of whether the procompetitive virtues of the alleged wrongful conduct justifies the otherwise anticompetitive impacts." (citation omitted)); see also NCAA v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 104 n.26, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984) (explaining that the Supreme Court recognizes that "tying may have procompetitive justifications that make it inappropriate to condemn without considerable market analysis" (citing Jefferson Par., 466 U.S. at 11-12)); Grappone, Inc. v. Subaru of New England, Inc., 858 F.2d 792, 798-99 (1st Cir. 1988) (Breyer, J.) (concluding that a tying arrangement was lawful under a rule of reason analysis because of an "absence of serious anticompetitive impact" and "evidence of justification").

Because the Court has determined [*90] that Suture Express has failed to present a triable tying claim when it cannot establish market power or anticompetitive harm, the Court could stop short of this argument and decline to address it. But given the case's breadth and complexity and to facilitate a full review on appeal, the Court elects to address this argument. See, e.g., United States v. Microsoft, 253 F.3d 34, 94-95, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330 (D.C. Cir. 2001) (remanding case to the district court to consider the procompetitive justifications of a tying arrangement under a rule of reason analysis). And, for the reasons explained below, the Court agrees with defendants.

Defendants argue that the contracts' bundling terms benefit customers because it is more efficient to distribute suture and endo products with other med-surg products, and defendants can pass the savings from those efficiencies on to customers. Indeed, as Areeda and Hovenkamp explain, "tying doctrine and antitrust policy do not condemn the defendant who [sells packaged products and] merely passes on [the] cost savings [from the package] because this "improve[s] customer welfare immediately, tend[s] to increase sales and profits and thereby encourage[s] cost-cutting innovations, and would occur in perfectly competitive markets." X Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1758d1.

Defendants [*91] recognize these efficiencies because: (1) sutures and endo products are light weight and take up little space, and therefore little incremental cost results from adding suture and endo to an existing distribution of other med-surg products; (2) suture and endo products are more expensive than other med-surg products, and thus yield higher revenues for distribution services marked up on a percentage basis of the product's cost; (3) suture and endo manufacturers fund distribution of their products on a higher basis than funding provided by other med-surg vendors; and (4) suture and endo products constitute a high volume of customers' med-surg product needs in comparison to the other categories of med-surg products.

Customers who purchase other med-surg distribution from defendants will receive those products from defendants by truck regardless of whether they also purchase suture and endo products. By adding suture and endo products to the truck with the other med-surg products, defendants realize efficiencies. They also can allocate the costs for the truck delivery that it must incur already while generating more revenue dollars. This, in turn, allows defendants to charge a lower mark-up [*92] on other med-surg products than they otherwise would charge for delivery of only the lowered-priced and higher-cost med-surg products.

Suture Express argues that the summary judgment record fails to demonstrate these efficiencies. It contends that the efficiencies do not exist if a customer wants more frequent deliveries of suture and endo than other med surg products. It also asserts that distribution of suture and endo by truck creates additional, significant costs that do not exist when delivering suture and endo by air. But defendants respond. To establish competitive benefits, defendants say, they need not prove that their distribution model by truck is more efficient than Suture Express' model. Instead, defendants must demonstrate that their distribution of suture and endo and other med-surg together produces savings compared to what they would incur if they distributed them separately. See Cascade Health Sols. v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 895 (9th Cir. 2007) (explaining that bundling discounts "generally benefit buyers" and may produce "savings to the seller because it usually costs a firm less to sell multiple products to one customer at the same time than it does to sell the products individually"); see also *It's My Party, Inc. v. Live Nation, Inc., 811 F.3d 676, 2016 WL 426085, at 10 (4th Cir. 2016) (describing defendant's bundling [*93] as a "one-stop shop" and stating that "[i]n such a case, the practice of 'bundling obviously saves distribution and consumer transaction costs . . . [and] can also capitalize on certain economies of scope.'" (quoting United States v. Microsoft Corp., 253 F.3d 34, 87, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330 (D.C. Cir. 2001)).

The summary judgment facts, when viewed in Suture Express' favor, show that defendants realize savings by adding suture and endo distribution to other med surg distribution, thereby producing a procompetitive benefit. Defendants use the same inputs to distribute suture and endo that they employ for other med-surg distribution. They rely on the same warehouses, trucks, and personnel to distribute thousands of types of med-surg products (including suture and endo). And, they experience economies of scope when they can distribute multiple products at the same time. As described above, defendants incur very little incremental cost to add suture and endo distribution to a customer's existing delivery of other med-surg products. But, when they deliver them together, defendants generate substantially more revenue because suture and endo are more expensive products and produce higher funding from vendors.[16] When that occurs, defendants can charge lower prices for distribution of the [*94] products together. The joint distribution of both kinds of products together produces efficiencies and thus a procompetitive benefit.

In contrast, if a customer does not purchase suture and endo from defendants, then they must charge higher markups on the other med-surg products to cover the costs incurred for that delivery. The removal of suture and endo from the order does not eliminate much cost but results in substantially less revenue. But, defendants still incur the same costs for delivery without the suture and endo, and thus the increased pricing on other med-surg products bears those costs.

Suture Express also asserts that, even if defendants realize efficiencies from their bundling, they offer no evidence to demonstrate that they have passed any cost savings from the bundle on to customers. But the bundling terms, themselves, demonstrate such savings. When customers purchase suture and endo distribution along with other med-surg distribution, they realize savings in the form of lower markups for other [*95] med surg distribution than they otherwise would pay if they purchased other med-surg distribution without the bundle.

Trying to neutralize the undisputed facts, Suture Express contends that the bundled pricing terms do not reflect discounted savings to customers but instead allow defendants to impose penalties on customers who chose to buy suture and endo from another distributor. If that were true, defendants must increase prices artificially before discounting them. The record contains no admissible evidence of that practice. Also, no evidence suggests that prices are higher than they would be but for defendants' bundling terms. And, even if they were, the market here includes competitors (like Medline) who can prevent defendants from inflating prices artificially.

Suture Express also argues that defendants cannot realize efficiencies or justify anticompetitive conduct by claiming that any anticompetitive effects in one market (suture and endo distribution) are offset by the benefits to competition in another (other med surg distribution). Suture Express asserts that Eastman Kodak Co. v Image Tech. Servs., Inc.[17] rejected a firm's use of a tie to take profits from one market to cover [*96] their investment in another market. But the material facts here are different. No evidence suggests that defendants are taking profits from suture and endo distribution to invest in other med-surg distribution. Instead, the summary judgment facts show that defendants realize efficiencies from selling both types of distribution together. Thus, if customers purchase both types of distribution together thereby producing the efficiency, defendants can offer them lower prices for other med-surg distribution.

Providing additional support for these recognized efficiencies, other broadline distributors offer similar bundling provisions. This reinforces the undisputed facts about the bundle's efficiency. Here, the summary judgment record establishes that rival distributors who lack market power, including Medline, Seneca, and MMS, use similar bundling provisions. They require the same types of suture and endo commitments from customers in exchange for lower pricing on other med-surg products. As one court has observed, "firms without market power will bundle two goods only when the cost savings from joint sale outweigh the value consumers place on separate choice." United States v. Microsoft Corp., 253 F.3d 34, 88, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330 (D.C. Cir. 2001). Some distributors also [*97] testified that when a customer orders a certain product mix that allows the distributor to realize economics of scale, and the distributor is able to reflect those efficiencies through lower pricing to the customer.

Suture Express also testified that it offers discounted prices to customers who commit to purchase a certain volume of product. These types of commitments differ from defendants' bundling arrangements because they do not involve tying two products together, but nevertheless they are premised on similar efficiencies. Indeed, Suture Express' CFO testified that Suture Express offers discounted prices for volume commitments because different cost components exist when a customer brings all of its suture and endo business to Suture Express instead of "cherrypick[ing]" certain products for distribution. Doc. 303-3 at 5. Suture Express' CFO also agreed that the customer should pay a different price under the two different scenarios because of the "very different" cost components involved. Id.

As the case law cited above recognizes, bundling allows a seller to save on costs and capitalize on economies of scope. Because of efficiencies like these, "cost-justified bundled discounts [are] essential [*98] to the efficient operation of markets, even though such discounts may exclude an equally efficient rival." X Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1758d1. Areeda and Hovenkamp describe how a seller realizes efficiencies through a bundled discount in the following example:

> Consider this illustration: to drive a truck from Chicago to St. Louis costs $100, no matter how full the truck is. The buyer needs half a load of beans and half a load of corn and shipping them separately would cost $100 per shipment, but shipping them together costs $100 total. So the seller offers a discount of $60 if the buyer purchases both corn and beans and accepts them in a single shipment, effectively "tying" the corn and bean purchases via the discount. In this case the buyer profits by $60 over what separate sales from separate sellers would produce. The seller is $40 ahead after taking a $60 price cut but avoiding a $100 truck trip, and the rest of society is better off because unneeded truck trips consume resources. Nevertheless, the policy injures a rival who sells beans but not corn, even if that seller is an equally efficient bean producer and has tucking costs that are no higher.

X Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1758d1. Suture [*99] Express asserts that this example does not apply here, where the comparison is distribution by truck to distribution by air. It argues that joint distribution by truck does not offer a procompetitive benefit to the market when Suture Express can distribute suture and endo more efficiently by air. But, as stated above, defendants need not prove that their model is more efficient than Suture Express' business model. Instead, the procompetitive benefit realized in the market at issue here is the lower pricing offered to customers on other med-surg distribution. Suture Express cannot match the bundle offered by defendants, but that is because of a decision it and it alone has made: to limit its business model to suture and endo distribution.

In essence, Suture Express is asking the Court to insert itself into the market and decide which business model customers should choose when they purchase suture and endo distribution. The Court declines. The Court's involvement in this type of discussion could very well "lead to an environment of commercial parochialism." *It's My Party, Inc., 811 F.3d 676, 2016 WL 426085, at 13. Actually, it could produce harm to competition. Suture Express wants the Court to enjoin defendants from offering the bundled [*100] terms to customers. But this order, if the Court were to issue it, would not stop other market participants like Medline, Seneca, and MMS from offering similar bundling terms—as they do already. The Court cannot issue an order that restrains defendants from bundling but leaves their competitors free to use them to their benefit (and to defendants' harm). Under these facts, it is most appropriate to let the market's customers decide which business model offers the most efficient distribution of their med-surg needs. See id. (concluding that plaintiff could not employ the antitrust laws for "anticompetitive ends" and stating that it was "sending this tussle between two rivals back to the marketplace from whence it came").

Suture Express also argues that defendants cannot demonstrate procompetitive justifications for their bundling because this practice fails the "less restrictive alternative test." Under this test, an antitrust plaintiff may rebut a claim that a tie is procompetitive "by showing that the claimed function is not legitimate in principle, is served poorly by the restraint, or is adequately attainable by substantially less restrictive means." IX Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1729a; [*101] see also Law, 134 F.3d at 1019 (stating that "[i]f the defendant is able to demonstrate procompetitive effects, the plaintiff then must prove that the challenged conduct is not reasonably necessary to achieve the legitimate objectives or that those objectives can be achieved in a substantially less restrictive manner"). Here, Suture Express argues, if bundling produces efficiencies, then the less restrictive approach to implementing that efficiency is for defendants to lower the price of suture and endo distribution. Defendants did not take that approach, but instead altered the price for distribution of other med-surg products. Thus, Suture Express contends, defendants fail the less restrictive alternative test.

Defendants respond that the less restrictive alternative advanced by Suture Express fails to realize the efficiencies described above when defendants are able to distribute both suture and endo and other med-surg together. If defendants discounted only the suture and endo distribution, they would fail to cover the costs incurred for delivery to a customer who purchased only suture and endo distribution but not other med-surg. Defendants also could not match the bundled prices to customers who purchased [*102] both suture and endo and other med-surg, thereby producing the described efficiencies and cost savings.

Defendants also reject Suture Express' suggestion that they should reverse the bundle. That is, Suture Express asserts that the less restrictive alternative is for defendants to offer lower pricing on suture and endo distribution in exchange for loyalty in purchasing other med-surg products. This proposal again fails to recognize the efficiencies of distributing the products together, which reduces the overall costs of distribution and not simply the cost of one subset of products. Also, defendants assert that customers do not select a broadline distributor based on one category of med-surg products. Instead, customers select broadline distributors based on their ability to distribute across the broader line of med-surg distribution. Thus, defendants would not offer a bundle premised on a discount of one category of med-surg products in exchange for purchase of other-med surg because customers already go to the distributor to purchase their other med-surg needs. The undisputed facts, viewed in Suture Express' favor, do not establish that defendants could achieve the procompetitive [*103] benefits of defendants' bundling through a less restrictive alternative.

The Court finds that the summary judgment facts demonstrate procompetitive benefits of bundling, and they justify any anticompetitive effect. Thus, Suture Express cannot survive summary judgment under a rule of reason analysis on its Sherman Act § 1 claim.

B. Clayton Act § 3

Suture Express also asserts that defendants' contractual terms violate § 3 of the Clayton Act. Section 3 of the Clayton Act prohibits "any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to . . . make a sale or contract for sale of goods . . . for use, consumption, or resale within the United States . . . on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods . . . of a competitor or competitors of the . . . seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." 15 U.S.C. § 14.

Defendants seek summary judgment against this Clayton Act claim because, defendants argue, the Clayton Act applies only to the sale of "goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, [*104] supplies, or other commodities." 15 U.S.C. § 14. And, it does not apply to services. See Hudson Valley Asbestos Corp. v. Tougher Heating and Plumbing Co., 510 F.2d 1140, 1145 (2d Cir. 1975) (explaining that "[i]t is, of course, well settled that section 3 [of the Clayton Act] does not apply to sales of services"). Here, defendants argue, the relevant market is distribution services, not the products themselves. Thus, defendants contend the Court must grant summary judgment against Suture Express' Clayton Act claim.

As explained above, the Court has determined that the undisputed facts establish that the relevant product market here is distribution of med-surg products to acute care customers, not distribution services as defendants assert. See supra n.3. And Suture Express cites several cases in which courts have held that the Clayton Act applies to distribution agreements for physical goods. *See, e.g., W. Power Sports, Inc. v. Polaris Indus. Partners L.P., 951 F.2d 365, 1991 WL 266523, at 3 (9th Cir. 1991) (unpublished table opinion) (reversing district court's grant of summary judgment on a Clayton Act § 3 claim and holding that the statute applied to distribution agreements requiring distributors to purchase a certain amount of snowmobiles from the manufacturer); see also Chelson v. Oregonian Publ'g Co., 715 F.2d 1368, 1369 (9th Cir. 1983) (holding that the Clayton Act applied to an agreement between a newspaper publishing company and its retail distributors that prohibited the [*105] distributors from distributing advertising inserts for another company because the agreement provided that that distributors would purchase goods and resell them); see also X Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1752f2 (explaining that the Clayton Act applies even when "services [are] embodied in corporeal goods" and "[w]hen the item sold is a physical product from which buyers derive value, it should be considered a commodity").

Defendants distinguish these cases because they involve the traditional purchase and resale of goods but do not discuss prices that customers pay for distribution services, as customers of med-surg distribution pay in this case. Indeed, Suture Express' expert opined that the relevant product market here is the market for distribution services, not the physical items themselves. He also based his analysis on that market definition. Though defendants seem to have the better end of this argument, the Court concludes that it need not decide this issue to determine the viability of the Clayton Act claim. Even assuming that the Clayton Act applies to the med-surg distribution at issue here, Suture Express' claim fails for the same reasons described above in the context of the Sherman [*106] Act.

Suture Express asserts that the economic effect of defendants' bundling terms makes them exclusive contracts that violate § 3. Thus, Suture Express' claim under the Clayton Act mirrors its tying claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act.

And, "the standard for adjudicating tying [under Sherman Act § 1 and Clayton Act § 3] are now recognized to be the same." Sheridan v. Marathon Petroleum Co., 530 F.3d 590, 592 (7th Cir. 2008) (citing Southern Card & Novelty, Inc. v. Lawson Mardon Label, Inc., 138 F.3d 869, 874 (11th Cir. 1998); Town Sound & Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 495-96 (3d Cir. 1992) (en banc); Smith Mach. Co. v. Hesston Corp., 878 F.2d 1290, 1298-99 (10th Cir. 1989)); see also IX Areeda & Hovenkamp ¶ 1719b (explaining that although the words of Sherman Act § 1 and Clayton Act § 3 "differ, the two statutes apply a single substantive standard"). Thus, for the same reasons explained in the analysis for Suture Express' Sherman Act claim, defendants are entitled to summary judgment against Suture Express' tying claim under § 3 of the Clayton Act.[18]

C. Kansas Restraint of Trade Act

Finally, Suture Express and defendants both move for summary judgment on Suture Express' claim under the Kansas Restraint of Trade Act. The KRTA "is broad in scope" but case law under the Act is "largely undeveloped" and "the bulk of [the Act's] provisions have not [*107] been meaningfully interpreted by Kansas courts." O'Brien v. Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc., 294 Kan. 318, 277 P.3d 1062, 1068 (Kan. 2012) (citing Bergstrom v. Noah, 266 Kan. 829, 974 P.2d 520, 530 (Kan. 1999)). The Kansas Supreme Court has noted that the KRTA and federal antitrust laws share some similarities, but "they are not, in fact, the same." Id. (citing Bergstrom, 974 P.2d at 531). Federal antitrust law may supplement the remedies available under this Kansas law, but it does not displace the substantive antitrust provisions of the KRTA. Id. Therefore, "[w]hile . . . cases [interpreting federal antitrust statutes] may be persuasive authority for any state court interpreting [Kansas'] antitrust laws, such authority is not binding upon any court in Kansas interpreting Kansas antitrust laws." Bergstrom, 974 P.2d at 531.

K.S.A. § 50-112 prohibits all agreements or contracts "made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the . . . sale of articles imported into [Kansas]" and those "designed or which tend to advance, reduce or control the price . . . of any such products or articles." In O'Brien, the Kansas Supreme Court held that K.S.A. § 50-112, in its form on the date of that opinion,[19] omitted any mention of reasonableness, or a rule of reason. 277 P.3d at 1079. The Kansas Supreme Court thus held that the statute "leaves no room" for applying a rule of reason approach, and held that "reasonableness does not [*108] set the antitrust violation standard in Kansas . . . ." Id. at 1083. Given this holding, the Court cannot simply apply its federal analysis to decide whether the KRTA claim survives summary judgment.

Instead, the Court begins its analysis of the KRTA claim with the requirement of antitrust injury. While this requirement originates in "federal antitrust jurisprudence,"[20] it undoubtedly plays an important role under the KRTA. As the Kansas Supreme Court explained in O'Brien, the antitrust injury requirement "equates to the Kansas concept of causation, or the 'requirement that a plaintiff's theory of damages ... correspond[s] to an economic effect that the statute ... invoked as the basis for liability aims to prevent.'" 277 P.3d at 1075 (quoting Ronald W. Davis, [*109] Standing on Shaky Ground: The Strangely Elusive Doctrine of Antitrust Injury, 70 Antitrust L.J. 697, 698 (2003) (first ellipsis in original)). O'Brien illustrates how Kansas law applies this requirement, whether one thinks of it as antitrust injury or damages causation.

[18] And, for the same reasons explained above when discussing the Sherman Act claim, the Court denies Suture Express' summary judgment motion on its Clayton Act claim.

[19] The Kansas legislature enacted "substantial changes" to the KRTA after the Kansas Supreme Court's opinion in O'Brien. Smith v. Phillip Morris Cos., 50 Kan. App. 2d 535, 335 P.3d 644, 652 (Kan. Ct. App. 2014). The amendments to the KRTA went into effect on April 18, 2013, but generally do not apply retroactively to cases already pending at the amendments' effective date. Id. (citing K.S.A. § 50-164 (Supp. 2013)) (further citation omitted). Because this case was filed before the 2013 effective date of the KRTA amendments, the current version of the KRTA does not apply to this case.

[20] O'Brien, 277 P.3d at 1075 (citing Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977)).

In O'Brien, a class of retail consumers who had purchased a particular brand of fashion accessories and luggage from retail stores sued the products' manufacturer. This class claimed that the manufacturer had violated the KRTA by adopting a pricing policy "suggesting" retailers should sell its products at "keystone," which was "twice wholesale plus a small amount that varie[d] by product." Id. at 1068. The manufacturer also shipped its products to retailers tagged with a "manufacturer's suggested retail price (MSRP)." Id. And while the manufacturer characterized its policy merely as "suggested pricing," id., the summary judgment facts established that:

• the manufacturer required its retailers to initial and sign an acknowledgment that violating the pricing policy was "grounds for dismissal" from selling the products at retail;

• while never "systematic[ally]" or "comprehensive[ly]" monitoring compliance with this pricing policy, the manufacturer "occasionally enforced" it by refusing to deal [*110] with retailers who sold its products at discounted prices; and

• the pricing policy had increased the price that the plaintiff class of retail buyers had paid to purchase the products.

Id. at 1068-70.

These summary judgment facts sufficed, the Kansas Supreme Court held, to permit a reasonable jury to find that the plaintiff class "actually [had] paid prices for [the manufacturer's goods that were] inflated by its pricing combinations or arrangements with retailers." Id. at 1078 (emphasis added). The Kansas court deemed these facts sufficient to avoid summary judgment because the KRTA requires a plaintiff seeking to recover under this act to "come forward with evidence that [the plaintiff] has been injured or damaged by" conduct that the KRTA renders illegal. Id. at 1077. But O'Brien also held that not just any kind of injury will do. A KRTA plaintiff also must seek to recover for "an economic effect that the [KRTA] aims to prevent." Id. at 1075. The Kansas court concluded that the manufacturer's policy had caused retail customers to pay an inflated price, and this was sufficient to support a finding that the claimed damages met both aspects of the KRTA's requirement for antitrust injury/damage causation. Id. at 1078. The Kansas Supreme Court [*111] thus reversed the trial court's decision granting summary judgment. Id.

Close attention to O'Brien's rationale focuses the analysis on the very facts that make summary judgment appropriate here. The summary judgment facts in this case establish a market where both defendants, many regional broadline competitors, and even Suture Express are experiencing declining prices and declining markups. See supra Part III.A.2. Such declines, though bad news for defendants, Suture Express, and other participants in the distribution market, actually are good news for acute care providers who purchase distribution from them. These declining prices also are good news for patients who pay the bills issued by those acute care providers.[21]

Offering discounts to customers does not inflate prices—the condition that O'Brien held to satisfy the requirement that the claimed [*112] harm must be one that the KRTA "aims to prevent." To the contrary, price discounts give customers who choose to subscribe to them the chance to purchase at deflated prices. This kind of market condition provides no basis for a reasonable jury to find the kind of "economic effect" that the KRTA "aims to prevent." 277 P.3d at 1075. In short, the summary judgment facts preclude the possibility that Suture Express can satisfy the KRTA's requirement of antitrust injury/damages causation. This makes summary judgment appropriate.

In addition, the summary judgment facts fail to show that defendants' contracts were "made with a view," "designed to," or "tend to" prevent full and free competition, as the KRTA requires. O'Brien explained that "it is enough [for a plaintiff] to show that the arrangement is 'designed to' or 'tends to' control prices . . . a plaintiff does not have to show that the arrangement actually succeeds in increasing prices." 277 P.3d at 1075. Also, "the phrase 'designed to' contemplates a subjective standard [while] 'tend to' contemplates an objective standard, one that requires [21] Also, the summary judgment record contains no admissible evidence of reduced output. Rival national and regional competitors are growing the distribution market. Even Suture Express' expert calculates that industry-wide revenue figures for med-surg distribution had increased, not decreased, during the relevant period. See supra Part III.A.2. examination of the defendant's behavior to discern whether it would reasonably be expected to produce a particular result, regardless [*113] of the defendant's intention." Id. at 1075-76. Suture Express cites various documents where defendants discussed, separately, their use of bundling contract terms to defend against Suture Express taking defendants' suture and endo distribution business. But no reasonable jury could find that these communications show that the contracts were designed to prevent full and free competition. To the contrary, a reasonable jury only could find that these communications reveal competitors engaged in the activity that the KRTA seeks to promote—trying to meet and counter the effects of competition that Suture Express' innovative business model brought to the market. If the Court were to view these communications sufficient for a jury to find conduct intended to prevent full and free competition, every attempt by one competitor to gain business from a rival would require a trial under Kansas' antitrust laws. The Court does not understand the Kansas Supreme Court's interpretation of the KRTA to require such a result.

Even under the broadest permissible view of the KRTA and viewing all evidence in the light most favorable to Suture Express, the summary judgment record lacks evidence that defendants' contracts [*114] were designed to or tend to harm competition. To the contrary, Suture Express cannot demonstrate harm to competition sufficient to survive summary judgment on its KRTA claim.

And, for the same reasons, the Court denies Suture Express' summary judgment motion on its KRTA claim because it cannot establish harm to competition, especially when the Court views the evidence in the light most favorable to defendants, as it must when considering Suture Express' summary judgment motion.

IV. Conclusion

This case exposes the rough-and-tumble business of competition in the American marketplace. In 1998, Suture Express launched an innovative business model designed to capture the most lucrative channel of med-surg distribution. It worked. By 2010, Suture Express had managed to capture a 10% share of that lucrative market segment, suture and endo distribution. Defendants and other broadline distributors didn't like losing that market share to Suture Express, so they did what motived competitors do. They fought back with their own pricing innovation—pricing designed to recapture those lost suture and endo customers. Their innovation worked as well, and it cost Suture Express some of the customers it [*115] originally had taken from broadline distributors, including defendants.

The next move in this competitive saga belongs to the market's participants—Suture Express, defendants, other distributors, acute care providers, and other innovators who, as Suture Express once did, can come up with a new idea that customers may fancy. But the Court can find nothing in our antitrust laws that assigns a role, on these summary judgment facts, to the courts. Therefore, the Court grants summary judgment for defendants on all three claims asserted by Suture Express.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED THAT defendants Owens & Minor Distribution, Inc. and Cardinal Health 200, LLC's Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. 253) is granted.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED THAT plaintiff's Partial Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. 254) is denied.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

INTRODUCTION

This litigation arises out of the decision of the City of San Diego (the City) to award a competitively bid contract to provide the City a computerized system for dispatching tow trucks (the towing contract) to TEGSCO, LLC, doing business as San Francisco AutoReturn (AutoReturn). In providing similar services to other municipalities, AutoReturn used tow dispatching communications software provided by Dispatch & Tracking Solutions, LLC (DTS) known as Law Enforcement Towing System (LETS) and Towing Management System (TMS). AutoReturn's bid proposal to the City referenced AutoReturn's intended use of DTS's LETS/TMS software as a component of AutoReturn's own tow dispatch and impound management software package known as the AutoReturn Integrated Enterprise [*3] System (ARIES).

Authorized City Towing and five towing companies it subcontracted with (together ACT) submitted a competing bid for the towing contract in which ACT also proposed using LETS/TMS.[1] ACT had provided computerized tow dispatch services to the City using LETS/TMS before the City awarded the contract to AutoReturn. During the competitive bidding process for the towing contract, ACT informed the City and AutoReturn that it held an exclusive license to use LETS/TMS software in San Diego County. Because of ACT's exclusive license claim, after the City awarded the towing contract to AutoReturn, AutoReturn decided to replace DTS's LETS/TMS software with similar software provided by Orion Communications, Inc. (Orion). However, as a result of the present litigation, Orion decided not to work with AutoReturn in San Diego. After Orion withdrew, AutoReturn developed its own tow management software to replace the LETS/TMS component of its ARIES package.

ACT sued the City, AutoReturn, DTS, Orion and related parties for—among other causes of action—breach of contract, intentional interference with contractual relations, intentional interference with prospective economic advantage, unfair business practices, and misappropriation of trade secrets arising out of its alleged exclusive license agreement with DTS and the City's award of the towing contract to AutoReturn. DTS filed a cross-complaint against ACT, the City, AutoReturn, and Orion. At issue in this appeal are DTS's cause of action under the California Uniform Trade Secrets Act (Civ. Code,[2] § 3426 et seq.) (CUTSA or UTSA) against AutoReturn, the City, and Orion and Orion's chief executive officer, Leslie DeLatte,[3] for misappropriation of trade secrets, and a cause of action against AutoReturn for breach of a joint venture agreement.

The trial court [*5] entered judgment against ACT and in favor of AutoReturn on ACT's operative fourth amended complaint after granting AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment on that complaint. The court also entered

[1] The five towing companies that contracted with Authorized City Towing are Allied Gardens Towing, Inc.; C & D Towing Specialists, Inc.; Starrue, Inc.; Nancar, Inc.; and San Diego Police Towing Operators. ACT's opening brief omits Nancar, [*4] Inc., from its list of towing subcontractors.

[2] All subsequent statutory references are to the Civil Code unless otherwise specified.

judgment against DTS and in favor of AutoReturn, Orion, and the City on DTS's second amended cross-complaint after granting Orion's motion for summary judgment and AutoReturn and the City's motion for summary judgment on the second amended cross-complaint. The court granted a motion by Orion for attorney fees and costs against DTS under section 3426.4 and awarded Orion fees of $120,000 based on its finding that DTS prosecuted its misappropriation of trade secrets claim against Orion in bad faith. AutoReturn and the City moved for attorney fees and costs under section 3426.4 against both ACT and DTS. The court denied the motion as to ACT on the ground it lacked jurisdiction to award fees against ACT under section 3426.4 because ACT had dismissed its trade secret cause of action. The court granted the motion as to DTS and awarded AutoReturn and the City attorney fees and costs against DTS in the amount of $450,000.[4]

DTS, ACT, Orion, and AutoReturn and the City have all appealed. DTS contends the court erred in (1) denying its motions to redact and seal its proprietary information under section 3426.5; (2) summarily adjudicating its misappropriation of trade secrets claim in favor of Orion, AutoReturn, and the City; (3) denying its motion to reconsider the summary adjudication of its misappropriation of trade secrets claim; (4) summarily adjudicating its cause of action for breach of joint venture agreement in AutoReturn's favor; (5) awarding Orion attorney fees under section 3426.4; (6) awarding AutoReturn attorney fees under section 3426.4; and (7) denying it leave to amend its cross-complaint to add causes of action for interference with contractual relations and breach of fiduciary duty against Orion and AutoReturn, respectively, on the ground the proposed causes of action were superseded under the CUTSA.

ACT contends the court should have denied AutoReturn's motion for summary [*7] judgment as procedurally defective because AutoReturn did not provide its supporting evidence with the motion. ACT further contends that the court erred in summarily adjudicating, in AutoReturn's favor, ACT's seventh cause of action for unfair business practices, eighth cause of action for intentional interference with contractual relations, and ninth cause of action for intentional interference with prospective economic advantage.

Orion contends the court erred in denying attorney fees incurred by its Texas counsel as part of the fee award to Orion under section 3426.4. AutoReturn and the City contend that the court erred in denying their motion for attorney fees under section 3426.4 as to ACT. They also contend that the court erred in denying AutoReturn certain expert witness fees against DTS under section 3426.4.

We affirm the summary adjudications of DTS's statutory cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets and reverse the summary adjudication of DTS's cause of action for breach of joint venture agreement. We affirm the orders awarding Orion and the City and AutoReturn attorney fees and costs against DTS under section 3426.4. We reverse the orders denying DTS's requests to file records under seal. We reverse the order denying [*8] AutoReturn's request for attorney fees under section 3426.4 against ACT with directions to reconsider that request, and reverse the summary adjudication of ACT's causes of action against AutoReturn for unfair business practices, intentional interference with contractual relations, and intentional interference with prospective economic advantage.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

ACT's History with DTS and LETS/TMS

In 1994 ACT contracted with Ball Corporation (Ball), a company that had created satellite tracking software, to design and develop a computer automated tow dispatch system for vehicle tows requested by the San Diego Police Department (SDPD). The system that Ball agreed to develop "to facilitate dispatching and accounting of SDPD tow

[4] AutoReturn and the City also filed a motion for sanctions under Code of Civil Procedure section 128.7 against both ACT and DTS based on their having brought [*6] a frivolous motion to disqualify AutoReturn and the City's counsel. The court granted the motion and awarded sanctions jointly against ACT and DTS and their respective counsel in the amount of $13,925. Neither ACT nor DTS appeal the award of sanctions under Code of Civil Procedure section 128.7.

requests" included a message router system and database query system (MRDBQ), and a computer automated tow system known as CATS. Ball incorporated CATS into the MRDBQ system to interface between an individual tow company's dispatch terminal and MRDBQ. The CATS software took tow requests from SDPD officers and communicated them in a format that was understandable by the tow companies. Ball installed CATS software and supporting hardware at each of the tow companies [*9] as a "stand alone" platform for the tow companies to manage their towing. An enhanced version of MRDBQ became known as LETS, and CATS became known as TMS. The Ball contract was assigned to DTS in 2003. The City awarded each of the ACT towing companies a tow contract with a commencement date of January 1, 1995.

In October 2003 DTS and ACT entered into an agreement that extended and modified the original Ball contract (the 2003 amendment). The 2003 amendment provided that in the event ACT's contract with the City was extended past its expiration date of December 31, 2004, DTS was "strictly prohibited from entering into any communications or negotiations with the City . . . or any other person relating to operational or dispatching/communications without first obtaining prior written consent from [ACT's] president or other authorized representative[,]" and that the original Ball contract and the 2003 amendment would "remain in full force and effect . . . for a period of sixty (60) months after the termination of [ACT's] members' services under the City Contract." The 2003 amendment also provided that DTS granted ACT "and its members an irrevocable license for the exclusive use in San Diego [*10] County, California, of the TMS software, including, but not limited to, any related software and/or updates or revisions thereto." The 2003 amendment also stated that "DTS shall refrain from offering any similar or competing service to any person operating a tow company or engaged in tow and/or related services within [San Diego County], including, but not limited to . . . the City, and/or any third party tow company."

AutoReturn's History with DTS and LETS/TMS

AutoReturn was founded in 2002 and offers automated, computerized tow management services to municipalities across the United States. In 2012 when AutoReturn filed its motion for summary judgment in this case, it was providing towing management services to the City of San Diego, the City and County of San Francisco, and Baltimore County, Maryland.

According to AutoReturn's chief technology officer, John Pendleton, from 2004 to 2011 AutoReturn included LETS/TMS as part of ARIES, its own integrated tow management software package. AutoReturn used LETS/TMS under a license agreement that gave AutoReturn access and use of the LETS/TMS system to carry out its Baltimore County and San Francisco contracts in return for regular payments [*11] to DTS in the form of either a monthly flat rate usage fee or a certain amount for each tow request processed by LETS/TMS. AutoReturn maintains that DTS's relationship to AutoReturn was always that of a vendor and licensor, and that AutoReturn never contemplated forming a joint venture with DTS in which AutoReturn and DTS would share profits, control, and ownership. DTS claims that it formed a joint venture with AutoReturn in 2008 to jointly pursue municipal tow dispatch and management contracts throughout the United States.

The City's Request for Proposals and Award of the Towing Contact

In 2008 the City issued a request for proposals (RFP) seeking bids to provide the City with computerized tow dispatch services. The RFP did not require that any bidding company use LETS/TMS software or any other particular software in its proposal. ACT, the City's incumbent tow dispatch provider, submitted a proposal in response to the RFP.

AutoReturn also submitted a proposal in response to the City's RFP. AutoReturn wanted to use LETS/TMS in its proposal to avoid incurring additional expenses and having to retrain its employees on different software. In the course of AutoReturn's preparing its bid, [*12] DTS management notified AutoReturn that DTS had been sold to a company called C:Logic. Before the change in ownership, AutoReturn executives spoke to DTS management about licensing LETS/TMS for use in San Diego. DTS's management suggested that ACT would take issue with DTS's licensing LETS/TMS to AutoReturn for use in San Diego, but agreed to work with AutoReturn on its proposal. After DTS changed ownership, C:Logic's chief executive officer (CEO), Larry Estes, informed AutoReturn that ACT claimed an exclusive license to use LETS/TMS in San Diego. However, based on the assurances of Estes and DTS management that the exclusive license was invalid and unenforceable, AutoReturn submitted a proposal to the City in May 2008 that specified LETS/TMS as a component of ARIES. ACT also included LETS/TMS in its bid proposal.

In December 2008 the City informed AutoReturn that it had won the towing contract. The City gave AutoReturn's bid an "Overall Rank" of 1 and gave ACT's bid a rank of 2. In January 2009, ACT's counsel sent the City a letter giving notice that ACT intended to protest the bid on the grounds that (1) "City employees and the evaluation team members engaged in misconduct or impropriety [*13] in knowingly awarding the [towing] contract to a bidder interfering with [ACT's exclusive license to use LETS/TMS in San Diego County]"; and (2) "the bid of AutoReturn should have been deemed as nonresponsive by virtue of its unauthorized incorporation of LETS and/or TMS into their [sic] bid package." The City responded by letter stating that "the City's RFP did not require that the winning bidder use the LETS and/or TMS systems." (Original italics.) The City concluded that ACT had not shown any misconduct or impropriety by City staff or other grounds for a formal bid protest hearing. In August 2009 the City and AutoReturn executed a memorandum of agreement (MOA) confirming that AutoReturn would provide tow dispatch services to the City.

Because of the dispute over ACT's claimed exclusive license to use LETS/TMS in San Diego County and the City's award of the towing contract to AutoReturn, AutoReturn contracted with Orion to provide towing services software that would replace LETS/TMS software as a component of AutoReturn's ARIES software package. However, when Orion's CEO DeLatte became aware of the dispute over AutoReturn's use of LETS/TMS in its bid and the potential for Orion to [*14] become involved in the present litigation, she terminated Orion's work with AutoReturn. In response to Orion's withdrawal, AutoReturn directed its own software engineers to redesign ARIES to cover the functions that LETS/TMS would have performed under the towing contract with the City. Since completing its overhaul of ARIES in August 2011, AutoReturn has relied exclusively on its own software for tow management.

Procedural Background

As noted, ACT filed a fourth amended complaint against the City, AutoReturn, DTS, and Orion. Relevant to this appeal are ACT's seventh cause of action against AutoReturn for "Unfair Business Practices—Violation of Business & Professions Code [s]ection 17200 et seq."; eighth cause of action against AutoReturn for intentional interference with contractual relations; ninth cause of action against DTS and AutoReturn for intentional interference with prospective economic advantage; and 18th cause of action against DTS, AutoReturn, and the City for misappropriation of trade secrets. On appeal, ACT challenges the court's summary adjudication of the seventh, eighth and, ninth causes of action in AutoReturn's favor.[5]

DTS filed a second amended cross-complaint that included a fifth cause of action against AutoReturn for breach of joint venture agreement; a sixth cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets and seventh cause of action for "Common Law Misappropriation" against AutoReturn, the City, and Orion; an eighth cause of action against Orion for interference with contractual relations; and a 12th cause of action against AutoReturn and Orion for unfair competition. In July 2012 the court ruled that none of DTS's causes of action against Orion had merit and granted Orion's motion for summary judgment.

In September 2012 the court granted the City and AutoReturn's motion for summary judgment that targeted DTS's fifth cause of action for breach of joint venture agreement and sixth cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets, resulting in entry of judgment in favor of the City and AutoReturn on DTS's second amended cross-complaint.[6] The minute order granting the City and AutoReturn's summary judgment motion noted that DTS had

---

[5] ACT does not challenge the disposition of any of its causes [*15] of action as to the City or DTS.

[6] A minute order denying DTS leave to file a third amended cross-complaint notes that a previous judge assigned to the case ruled, in sustaining a demurrer, that "DTS's claims for common law misappropriation, interference with contract and contractual filed "several motions/applications seeking leave to file under seal documents that were previously filed conditionally under [*16] seal. The court denied the first of these on July 6, 2012, and has ruled consistently on the follow-on motions but has stayed the actual unsealing. . . . DTS has appealed these rulings."

As noted, on motions by Orion and the City and AutoReturn seeking attorney fees and costs under section 3426.4, the court awarded Orion $120,000 and awarded the City and AutoReturn $450,000 in attorney fees and costs. On February 28, 2013, the court entered an amended judgment that reflects its summary judgment rulings and awards of attorney fees and costs.

DISCUSSION

DTS'S APPEAL

I. Summary Adjudication of DTS's Sixth Cause of Action for Misappropriation of Trade Secrets

DTS contends the trial court erred in granting summary adjudication of its sixth [*17] cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets in favor of Orion, AutoReturn, and the City.

Standard of review

A motion for summary judgment or adjudication must be granted when there is no triable issue of material fact and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. (Code Civ. Proc., § 437c, subd. (c).) "A defendant 'moving for summary judgment bears an initial burden of production to make a prima facie showing of the nonexistence of any triable issue of material fact.' [Citation.] A defendant may meet this burden either by showing that one or more elements of a cause of action cannot be established or by showing that there is a complete defense. [Citation.] . . . 'A defendant moving for summary judgment may establish that an essential element of the plaintiff's cause of action is absent by reliance on the pleadings, competent declarations, binding judicial admissions contained in the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, responses or failures to respond to discovery, and the testimony of witnesses at noticed depositions.'" (Mills v. U.S. Bank (2008) 166 Cal.App.4th 871, 894, 83 Cal. Rptr. 3d 146 (Mills).) "The defendant may, but need not, present evidence that conclusively negates an element of the plaintiff's cause of action. The defendant may also present [*18] evidence that the plaintiff does not possess, and cannot reasonably obtain, needed evidence . . . ." (Aguilar v. Atlantic Richfield Co. (2001) 25 Cal.4th 826, 855, 107 Cal. Rptr. 2d 841, 24 P.3d 493 (Aguilar).)

"If the defendant's prima facie case is met, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show the existence of a triable issue of material fact with respect to that cause of action or defense. [Citations.] '"When opposition to a motion for summary judgment is based on inferences, those inferences must be reasonably deducible from the evidence, and not such as are derived from speculation, conjecture, imagination, or guesswork."'" (Mills, supra, 166 Cal.App.4th at p. 894.) "[R]esponsive evidence that gives rise to no more than mere speculation cannot be regarded as substantial, and is insufficient to establish a triable issue of material fact." (Sangster v. Paetkau (1998) 68 Cal.App.4th 151, 163, 80 Cal. Rptr. 2d 66.) For an inference to be sufficient to establish a triable issue of material fact, the inference must show or imply the existence of the required finding more likely than the nonexistence of the finding, either by itself or together with other inferences or evidence. (Aguilar, supra, 25 Cal.4th at p. 857; accord, Smith v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (2005) 135 Cal.App.4th 1463, 1474, 38 Cal. Rptr. 3d 653.) That is because an "inference is reasonable if, and only if, it implies [existence of the finding is] more likely than [its nonexistence]." (Aguilar, at p. 857; accord, Smith v. Wells Fargo Bank, at p. 1474.)

"On appeal after a motion for summary judgment has been [*19] granted, we review the record de novo, considering all the evidence set forth in the moving and opposition papers except that to which objections have relations, and undue business practices were superseded by DTS's claim for Misappropriation of Trade Secrets (Civil Code section 3426 et seq.), as all of these claims were premised on a common nucleus of fact relating to alleged misuse of DTS's software."

been made and sustained." (Guz v. Bechtel National, Inc. (2000) 24 Cal.4th 317, 334, 100 Cal. Rptr. 2d 352, 8 P.3d 1089.) "'In practical effect, we assume the role of a trial court and apply the same rules and standards which govern a trial court's determination of a motion for summary judgment.' [Citation.] '[W]e are not bound by the trial court's stated reasons for its ruling on the motion; we review only the trial court's ruling and not its rationale.'" (Mills, supra, 166 Cal.App.4th at p. 895.) "In performing our de novo review, we must view the evidence in a light favorable to plaintiff as the losing party [citation], liberally construing [plaintiff's] evidentiary submission while strictly scrutinizing defendants' own showing, and resolving any evidentiary doubts or ambiguities in plaintiff's favor." (Saelzler v. Advanced Group 400 (2001) 25 Cal.4th 763, 768, 107 Cal. Rptr. 2d 617, 23 P.3d 1143 (Saelzler); Aguilar, supra, 25 Cal.4th at p. 843.) However, "[a] different standard of review applies to the court's evidentiary rulings in connection with the motion, which we review for abuse of discretion." (Garrett v. Howmedica Osteonics Corp. (2013) 214 Cal.App.4th 173, 181, 153 Cal. Rptr. 3d 693; Kincaid v. Kincaid (2011) 197 Cal.App.4th 75, 82-83, 127 Cal. Rptr. 3d 863.)

Authority regarding misappropriation of trade secrets

Under the UTSA, "[a] 'trade secret' is 'information, including a formula, pattern, compilation, program, device, method, technique, or [*20] process that: [¶] (1) Derives independent economic value, actual or potential, from not being generally known to the public or to other persons who can obtain economic value from its disclosure or use; and [¶] (2) Is the subject of efforts that are reasonable under the circumstances to maintain its secrecy.' (Civ. Code, § 3426.1, subd. (d).)" (Whyte v. Schlage Lock Co. (2002) 101 Cal.App.4th 1443, 1452, 125 Cal. Rptr. 2d 277 (Whyte).) "The test for trade secrets is whether the matter sought to be protected is information (1) which is valuable because it is unknown to others and (2) which the owner has attempted to keep secret." (Id. at p. 1454.) "Under the UTSA, a prima facie claim for misappropriation of trade secrets 'requires the plaintiff to demonstrate: (1) the plaintiff owned a trade secret, (2) the defendant acquired, disclosed, or used the plaintiff's trade secret through improper means, and (3) the defendant's actions damaged the plaintiff.'" (CytoDyn of New Mexico, Inc. v. Amerimmune Pharmaceuticals, Inc. (2008) 160 Cal.App.4th 288, 297, 72 Cal. Rptr. 3d 600.) "The ultimate determination of trade secret status is subject to proof presented at trial." (Whyte, supra, 101 Cal.App.4th at p. 1453.)

In an action for misappropriation of a trade secret under the UTSA, "before commencing discovery relating to the trade secret, the party alleging the misappropriation shall identify the trade secret with reasonable particularity subject to any orders that may be [*21] appropriate under Section 3426.5 of the Civil Code." (Code Civ. Proc., § 2019.210.) "[A] party seeking to protect trade secrets must 'describe the subject matter of the trade secret with sufficient particularity to separate it from matters of general knowledge in the trade or of special knowledge of those persons who are skilled in the trade, and to permit the defendant to ascertain at least the boundaries within which the secret lies.'" (Whyte, supra, 101 Cal.App.4th at p. 1453.)

"[Code of Civil Procedure] section 2019.210 serves four interrelated goals: '"First, it promotes well-investigated claims and dissuades the filing of meritless trade secret complaints. Second, it prevents plaintiffs from using the discovery process as a means to obtain the defendant's trade secrets. [Citations.] Third, the rule assists the court in framing the appropriate scope of discovery and in determining whether plaintiff's discovery requests fall within that scope. [Citations.] Fourth, it enables defendants to form complete and well-reasoned defenses, ensuring that they need not wait until the eve of trial to effectively defend against charges of trade secret misappropriation."'" (Brescia v. Angelin (2009) 172 Cal.App.4th 133, 144, 90 Cal. Rptr. 3d 842.)

In the present case, DTS filed a "second amended statement . . . in compliance with Code of Civil Procedure [section] 2019.210" that identified the following five "trade secret databases:" (1) The "reasons [*22] code database," which collects, tracks, and propagates information about the reasons for a tow; (2) the "beat or district database," which provides information about the geographic region at issue; (3) the "hold reasons database," which collects information concerning the reasons that vehicles are held; (4) the "holding unit database," which collects information relevant to the agency holding an impounded vehicle; and (5) the "administrative fees database," which collects information relative to reason codes connected with fee charges.

DTS's trade secret statement also identified "[f]low of control trade secrets" with the following explanation: "The static information in the [specified trade secret] databases is valuable in and of itself, but of greater value in any automated system is the way in which that information is used. The data in each of the databases . . . also controls both the functioning of the program and the flow of information. Each new data entry triggers different parts of each database and directs both the program and its users to do different things. The database can direct the program to ask the users for additional information, transmit information to a third party, [*23] or direct the users to take specific courses of action outside the confines of the program. Because each combination of instances can trigger a different set of directions, the number of different direction sets is enormous. DTS contends that each possible combination is a trade secret that has been misappropriated by Cross-Defendants and is at issue in this litigation. Each instruction set which translates a combination of inputs into a concrete course of action represents a use of the underlying data and is therefore a trade secret distinct from the trade secret claimed in the static databases. [¶] . . . In the present case, DTS alleges the Cross-Defendants misappropriated both the static data and the dynamic flow of control or instruction sets."

A. Summary Adjudication in Favor of Orion

In its motion for summary judgment/adjudication, Orion argued there was no evidence that it misappropriated any trade secrets and that DTS's specified trade secrets did not qualify as trade secrets because DTS did not make reasonable efforts to maintain their secrecy. The trial court concluded that DTS failed to raise a triable issue of fact on any of these points and that DTS did not show that it [*24] was damaged by Orion's alleged misappropriation of trade secrets.

Assuming, without deciding, that DTS's opposition evidence was sufficient to raise a triable issue of facts as to whether the databases DTS specified as trade secrets qualify as trade secrets and DTS made reasonable efforts to maintain their secrecy, we conclude the court nevertheless correctly granted Orion's motion for summary judgment based on the lack of evidence that Orion misappropriated any trade secret. As evidence that Orion misappropriated DTS's trade secret databases, DTS presented an e-mail sent by AutoReturn employee Jason Miller that includes XML schema[7] that DTS suggests was from Orion. DTS also presented an e-mail from Miller that included reason code script allegedly prepared by Orion that was similar to DTS's reason code script.

DTS's computer science expert Bruce Abramson stated in a declaration that "[t]he defendants had access to DTS's software [*25] including its databases, and at least some if not all of the underlying source code[,]" and that "DTS granted the Defendants such access subject to an agreed code of confidentiality and limitations on the ways that the Defendants could use the software." Abramson asserted that "[a]t least some parts of the Defendants' competing software system was copied directly from DTS's software," and that evidence "proves conclusively that the Defendants made at least some improper use of DTS's software." Abramson had "seen one document purporting to be part of the Defendants' implementations of its database paralleling one of DTS's claimed trade secret databases, and compared it to the analogous portion of the DTS system." He opined that "the two database fragments are similar enough to suggest that Defendants['] inappropriate use of DTS's software extended to this particular trade secret."[8]

Orion objected to these statements by Abramson on the grounds of lack of foundation and assuming facts not in evidence. Orion explained that Abramson's opinions were not based on reasonable inferences, there was no evidence that DTS granted Orion access to DTS's software subject to a code of confidentiality and limitation on the ways the software could be used, Abramson did not state the basis for his opinion that Orion had access to or copied DTS's software, and he assumed without factual support that the document he referred to was developed by Orion. The court sustained Orion's objections.

[7] In its opposition to Orion's summary judgment motion, DTS explained that "XML is a 'markup language' designed to present materials in a way that both machines and humans can read and understand. [Citation.] An XML schema is one type of document written in XML language."

[8] The record does not contain a complete copy of the declaration that Abramson prepared in opposition to Orion's summary judgment motion. The copy in the record begins on page seven and portions of the declaration are redacted. In DTS's sealed appendix, the declaration that Abramson prepared in opposition to AutoReturn [*26] and the City's motion for summary judgment appears twice, presumably through inadvertence. However, portions of Abramson's declaration in opposition to Orion's motion not otherwise in the record are quoted in Orion's written objections to DTS's evidence.

Abramson also compared the alleged Orion XML schema and reason code script to DTS's XML schema and reason code script and noted "a number of stylistic similarities that are unlikely to have arisen by sheer coincidence, including words misspelled the same way in both schemas, and arbitrary-length lists assigned the same arbitrary lengths." He concluded [*27] that "[t]he only plausible explanation for such stylistic similarities is that the designers of the second schema-Orion's by assumption-simply copied the first schema (i.e. DTS's schema)." (Italics added.) Regarding his comparison of the reason code scripts, Abramson stated: "Though they are not identical, the similarities overwhelm the differences—thereby suggesting that Defendants' inappropriate use of DTS's systems and software extended into the specific components claimed as trade secrets." Abramson concluded that "it appears quite clear that Orion copied DTS's schema—thereby making inappropriate use of DTS's property in violation of existing confidentiality agreements—and likely continued its copying to the full extent possible given the access that DTS granted it, including into the realm of the protected trade secrets that DTS has indentified in this matter."

Orion objected to Abramson's statements about the similarities between the XML schema he compared, his opinion that the only plausible explanation for the similarities was that Orion copied DTS's schema, and his suggestion that "Defendants' inappropriate use of DTS's systems and software extended into the specific components [*28] claimed as trade secrets" on the grounds they were irrelevant, lacked foundation, assumed facts not in evidence, and were speculative. Regarding relevancy, Orion noted that Abramson did not opine that Orion misappropriated DTS's claimed trade secrets; his opinion was limited to his conclusion that Orion copied a schema that was not one of DTS's claimed trade secrets. Orion also objected that Abramson did not support his assumption that the XML schema in question was Orion's, and the e-mail containing the schema showed that it was sent by an AutoReturn employee. The court sustained the objections.

Orion objected to Abramson's statements that stylistic similarities between the schemas he compared were "unlikely to have arisen by sheer coincidence, including words misspelled the same way in both schemas, and arbitrary-length lists assigned the same arbitrary lengths," and that "[t]he only plausible explanation for such stylistic similarities is that the designers of the second schema—Orion's by assumption—simply copied the first schema (i.e. DTS's schema)." Orion objected the statements were irrelevant because Abramson's opinion was "limited to his conclusion that Orion copied a schema, which [*29] DTS does not claim to be a trade secret." Orion further objected that the statements lacked foundation, assumed facts not in evidence, and were speculative, contending that the XML schema in question was AutoReturn, and Abramson did not support his assumption that it was Orion's. The court sustained Orion's objections on all stated grounds.

Among other grounds, Orion objected to Abramson's statement that the similarities between the reason code scripts he compared "overwhelm the differences-thereby suggesting that Defend[an]ts' inappropriate use of DTS's systems and software extended into the specific components claimed as trade secrets[,]" as speculative and lacking foundation. Orion argued that Abramson had not provided "any factual basis for his speculation that copying of the non-trade secret code fragment suggests inappropriate use that extended to claimed trade secrets." The court sustained the objection. The court also sustained Orion's objection on grounds of lack of foundation and speculation to Abramson's conclusion that Orion copied DTS's, "thereby making inappropriate use of DTS's property in violation of existing confidentiality agreements—and likely continued its copying to the full [*30] extent possible given the access that DTS granted it, including into the realm of the protected trade secrets that DTS has indentified in this matter."

We find no abuse of discretion in the court's evidentiary rulings. The court reasonably sustained the noted objections for the reasons stated by Orion. DTS complains that the court denied it due process by not allowing it "discourse" on the sustained objections and an opportunity to cure any foundational defects. There was no due process violation. DTS received Orion's evidentiary objections and the court's rulings on them before oral argument and therefore had the opportunity to address them then. The court was not required to provide the parties an opportunity to argue the merits of each other's evidentiary objections; it was required only to rule on them. (See Cal.

Rules of Court, rule 3.1354; Mora v. Big Lots Stores, Inc. (2011) 194 Cal.App.4th 496, 512, fn. 15, 124 Cal. Rptr. 3d 535 [trial court is not required to explain evidentiary rulings; it need only expressly rule on each evidentiary objection].)

In any event, Abramson's declaration had no evidentiary value on the issue of Orion's alleged copying of DTS's trade secrets. It was purely speculative for Abramson to infer from evidence that Orion may have copied material that was not a trade secret that [*31] Orion also copied trade secret material. It was further speculative for Abramson to assume that the copying (i.e., designing of the second schema) was done by Orion without articulating any basis for that assumption. Orion submitted DeLatte's declaration explaining that the EML schema was not Orion's and that Jason Miller, the sender of the e-mail that included the XML schema in question, was an AutoReturn employee. The Abramson declaration that DTS filed in opposition to AutoReturn and the City's later motion for summary judgment was modified to reflect that AutoReturn rather than Orion authored the XML code that was copied.

As noted, to defeat summary judgment, inferences from opposition evidence must be reasonably deducible and not constitute mere "'speculation, conjecture, imagination, or guesswork.'" (Mills, supra, 166 Cal.App.4th at p. 894.) An inference must show or imply the existence of the required finding more likely than the nonexistence of the finding, either by itself or together with other inferences or evidence. (Aguilar, supra, 25 Cal.4th at p. 857.) Further, although an expert may rely on inadmissible matter in forming an opinion, "that matter relied upon must 'provide a reasonable basis for the particular opinion offered.' [Citation.] An [*32] expert opinion may not be based on conjectural or speculative matters." (Howard Entertainment, Inc. v. Kudrow (2012) 208 Cal.App.4th 1102, 1115, 146 Cal. Rptr. 3d 154.) Abramson's inference that Orion or some other entity "likely" copied DTS's trade secret material based on evidence that someone copied DTS's non-trade-secret XML schema is conjectural and insufficient to raise a triable issue of material fact on the issue of trade secret misappropriation.

Moreover, notwithstanding its rulings on Orion's evidentiary objections to Abramson's declaration, the court considered the XML schema and reason code documents that Abramson compared and ruled that they did not raise a triable issue of fact as to whether Orion misappropriated DTS's trade secrets. The court stated: "[T]he only two pieces of evidence DTS argues creates a material issue of fact whether Orion misappropriated DTS's trade secrets, an XML schema and reason code script, do not do so. The XML schema and reason code script are not the five (5) databases DTS . . . identified as its trade secrets. Further, DTS has not shown that these . . . documents have any independent economic value to DTS by virtue of being secret. The XML schema was not created by Orion . . . . Thus, it is not evidence of Orion copying anything belonging [*33] to DTS. Also, the reason script does not create a triable issue as it is nothing more than a program used to harvest the reason cars are towed from the City's database. There is nothing secret, or valuable by virtue of being secret, about the reason cars are towed, nor about a script to migrate the City's tow reason data from one system to the other. Many of the 'reason codes' are simply citations to the California Vehicle Code or the Municipal Code, undeniably public documents. There is no evidence that Orion copied the DTS system or the database programming. Rather, it only prepared to harvest the data (which is owned by the City) from that database. Orion never got to that point, as it pulled out of the project when it found out DTS was suing over the bid it lost."

The court's key findings, which the record supports, were that DTS did not identify the XML schema and reason code script as trade secrets,[9] the XML schema was not created by Orion, and there is nothing secret, or valuable by virtue of being secret, about the reason cars are towed. Further, as Abramson acknowledged, there were differences between DTS's reason codes database and the reason code script Abramson compared it [*34] to that the court noted were "sufficient to negate the assertion of wholesale copying." The court correctly granted summary judgment in Orion's favor as to DTS's cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets.

---

[9] Although DTS identified its "reasons code" database as one its trade secrets, Abramson stated in his declaration that the reason code script and DTS's database were not identical. As noted, Abramson stated that "the similarities overwhelm the differences—thereby suggesting that Defend[an]ts' inappropriate use of DTS's systems and software extended into the specific components claimed as trade secrets." The trial court correctly sustained Orion's objection to Abramson's "suggestion" of trade secret misappropriation on the grounds it lacked foundation and was speculative.

B. Summary Adjudication in Favor of AutoReturn and the City

AutoReturn and the City sought summary adjudication of DTS's sixth cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets on the grounds that DTS failed to identify a trade secret and neither AutoReturn nor the City misappropriated any trade secret. In its order granting summary judgment as to the sixth cause of action, the court stated it "continues to be of [*35] the view that DTS has failed to demonstrate the existence of any trade secrets in the first place."

The court further ruled that there was "no material evidence of misappropriation." Similar to its ruling on Orion's summary judgment motion, the court noted that depositions had "narrowed the dispute to two documents AutoReturn allegedly sent to Orion: an XML schema file and an Orion reason code script." The court concluded that the City was entitled to summary adjudication because "[t]here is nothing implicating the City in any misappropriation." The court ruled that as to AutoReturn, DTS failed to raise a triable issue of fact, noting, among other things, that "DTS failed to indentify the 'schema' as a trade secret[, and that Abramson stated in] his declaration that '[l]ittle if anything about XML is important . . . to the present dispute.'" Regarding the reason code script, the court stated that it had "already expressed its view that this document is largely based on the California Vehicle Code, the exact opposite of a protectable trade secret, and even if it were otherwise, there are differences between the databases . . . sufficient to negate the assertion of wholesale copying."

We conclude the [*36] trial court correctly found that DTS failed to raise a triable issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn or the City misappropriated any alleged trade secret. AutoReturn presented evidence that it developed ARIES for use in San Diego from the public information and SDPD's tow operations manual provided by the City. AutoReturn's former chief technology officer Pendleton stated in a declaration that AutoReturn developed AIRES based on AutoReturn's 10 years of experience in towing and impound management and consideration of the specific needs of San Francisco, Baltimore County, San Diego and other prospective clients. During the development of ARIES, AutoReturn isolated the development team from other competing tow dispatch platforms, including LETS/TMS. Pendleton averred that although he had used LETS/TMS, neither he nor anyone on the ARIES development team had knowledge of LETS/TMS's internal functions and "inner workings" beyond what can reasonably be deduced from using the software and having a software engineering background. Pendleton stated no part of LETS/TMS was used in developing ARIES and he had "never seen the LETS/TMS source code, object code, database components or any other [*37] programming code for LETS and TMS, and [had] no knowledge of any part of LETS and TMS that might be considered a 'trade secret.'"

DTS's opposing evidence included a declaration by Abramson that was substantially the same as his declaration filed in opposition to Orion's motion for summary judgment. Like Orion, AutoReturn and the City objected to Abramson's assertions and suggestions that "Defendants" copied DTS's software as lacking foundation, and the court properly sustained the objections. The exclusion of Abramson's opinion evidence left no evidence raising a triable issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn or the City misappropriated any trade secrets from DTS.

We recognize that Pendleton testified during his deposition that DTS had provided AutoReturn access to DTS's source code with a log-in and password to enable AutoReturn to review the code as part of AutoReturn's "due diligence effort" in connection with discussions about AutoReturn acquiring DTS. Pendleton testified that he did not log into "that passcode," but he provided the passcode to two AutoReturn employees. Only one of those employees, Maxim Glaezer, accessed the source code and reported to Pendleton that he saw "a bunch [*38] of files that appeared to be source code" and asked Pendleton what he wanted him to do. Pendleton told the Glaezer it was unnecessary to do anything further because the acquisition was not going to happen and, therefore, there was no need to "go[] through this due diligence exercise." He did not ask Glaezer to make copies of the source code.

Although Pendleton admitted it was possible for him or his employees to have copied the source code, there is no evidence that any such copying occurred. AutoReturn submitted a declaration by Glaezer in which he stated that in early 2009, Pendleton asked him to review and evaluate the LETS/TMS source code as part of due diligence for a potential acquisition, but before he had time to review the code, "DTS and AutoReturn terminated acquisition talks, and DTS rescinded AutoReturn's access to the LETS/TMS code." Glaezer averred that he has never reviewed the code. Pendleton's acknowledgement that it was theoretically possible for AutoReturn employees to have copied DTS's source code is insufficient to raise a triable issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn actually misappropriated a trade secret because it does not imply the existence of misappropriation [*39] more likely than the nonexistence of misappropriation, either by itself or together with other inferences or evidence. (Aguilar, supra, 25 Cal.4th at p. 857.)

DTS argues that it presented evidence that the City misappropriated DTS's trade secrets within the meaning of section 3426.1 by knowing that DTS's software was confidential material and using it without DTS's approval. Specifically DTS cites the following paragraph in the declaration of former manager of DTS Sushil Garg: "From my interactions with various City personnel over the years I understood that the City was aware that DTS's software was required to be kept confidential. It was my intent as manager of DTS that the City have the same confidentiality obligations relating to DTS software as AutoReturn had under the San Francisco Agreement and Baltimore Agreement. AutoReturn and the City were exposed to the structure of DTS's software every time they used DTS's programs. Furthermore, AutoReturn was provided source code and script on a need to know basis. However, it was understood that AutoReturn and the City were to keep DTS's information confidential."

DTS also cites the following paragraph in Estes's declaration: "DTS and AutoReturn also agreed that the City of San Diego [*40] would be permitted to operate the LETS software as a 'User,' as the term is defined in the Definition section of the San Francisco Agreement. As a User, the City was to be provided limited security access (i.e.[,] password protected) for use by specified personal [sic] on a 'need to know' basis only, and for use solely related to performance of the City's tow communications contract with AutoReturn. Furthermore, the City understood it was not to share the contents of DTS's software with any prospective competitors of DTS. While DTS has disclosed portions of its reasons codes and hold reasons databases to the public for marketing purposes, it has not disclosed the majority of these databases as I have been advised AutoReturn contends. Furthermore, contrary to AutoReturn's assertions, the contents of the reasons codes database, holds reasons database and beat or district database were not 'nearly all' derived from public materials or documents provided from the City. While much of the information was publically available, DTS also had to conduct extensive interviews with City employees and other research to collect and compile the information needed for these databases. Moreover, while [*41] the information contained in the administrative fee database consists of public information, aggregation of this information took time and effort on DTS's part."

The trial court sustained AutoReturn and the City's objections on the ground of lack of foundation to Garg's statements that he understood the City was aware that DTS's software was required to be kept confidential, that AutoReturn was provided source code and script on a need to know basis, and that "it was understood that AutoReturn and the City were to keep DTS's information confidential." The court also sustained AutoReturn and the City's foundation objections to Estes's statements that the City understood it was not to share the contents of DTS's software with any prospective competitors of DTS, and that "'contrary to AutoReturn's assertions, the contents of the reasons codes database, holds reasons database and beat or district database were not "nearly all" derived from public materials or documents provided from the City.'" The court's sustaining the foundation objections to Garg's and Estes's assertions about what the City understood was not an abuse of discretion.

In any event, evidence that use of DTS's software by [*42] the City was password protected and that City employees understood the software was to be kept confidential does not support a reasonable inference that City employees misappropriated any trade secret aspect of the software. DTS acknowledges that the databases it identifies as trade secrets are, in DTS's words, "largely comprised of public information." DTS argues that the trade secret aspect of the databases is "how these specific databases operate to correlate complex sets of information and make those correlated data sets generate results. . . . [H]ow the data bases interrelate to pull information, query users for more information, and generate results based on data sets is the 'flow of control['] trade secret."[10] Even if

[10] In its second amended trade secret statement under Code of Civil Procedure section 2019.210, DTS [*43] stated the following under the heading, "Flow of control trade secrets:" "The static information in the [specified trade secret] databases is valuable in and of itself, but of greater value in any automated system is the way in which that information is used. The data in each of the databases . . . also controls both the functioning of the program and the flow of information. Each new data entry triggers different parts of each database and directs both the program and its users to do different things. The database can there were substantial evidence that the City, through unspecified employees, understood that DTS's software was required to be kept confidential, there is no evidence that any agent of the City had sufficient knowledge and understanding of DTS's claimed "flow of control" secrets to be able to misappropriate them. The court properly ruled that there was no evidence "implicating the City in any misappropriation."

The court did not err in summarily adjudicating DTS's cause of action for misappropriation of trade secrets in the City and AutoReturn' favor.

II. Denial of DTS's Motion for Reconsideration

DTS contends the court abused its discretion in denying DTS's motion for reconsideration of the order granting AutoReturn and the City's motion for summary judgment. Code of Civil Procedure section 1008, subdivision (a) provides that "any party affected by [an] order may, within 10 days after service upon the party of written notice of entry of the order and based upon new or different facts, circumstances, or law, make application to the same judge or court that made the order, to reconsider the matter and modify, amend, or revoke the prior order." "The party seeking reconsideration must provide not just new evidence or different facts, but a satisfactory explanation for the failure to produce it at an earlier time. . . . A trial court's ruling on a motion for reconsideration is reviewed under the abuse of discretion standard." (Glade v. Glade (1995) 38 Cal.App.4th 1441, 1457, 45 Cal. Rptr. 2d 695.)

DTS moved for reconsideration based on the [*45] "newly discovered fact" that AutoReturn did not produce relevant components of its ARIES software for inspection by DTS's computer science expert Abramson. Specifically, DTS complained that AutoReturn failed to provide access to the maintenance section of the ARIES software, and that without access to maintenance screens, DTS could not determine whether AutoReturn copied significant portion of DTS's software.

In opposition to DTS's motion, AutoReturn and the City noted that after amending its cross-complaint to allege misappropriation of trade secrets, DTS obtained over 40,000 pages of documents from the cross-defendants, took six depositions, and demanded a five-day review of ARIES by its software expert. Pendleton and AutoReturn's counsel submitted declarations stating that the parties agreed that DTS's expert Abramson's access to ARIES would be limited to the portions of the software that a typical user would see, with DTS reserving the right to seek greater access if it deemed it reasonably necessary. AutoReturn complied with the agreement and provided Abramson full user-level access, which included all of the ARIES maintenance screens. Abramson conducted his review over a period [*46] of five days, before DTS filed its opposition to AutoReturn and the City's summary judgment motion. At one point he requested a link to the ARIES administrative module and AutoReturn provided the link. DTS never requested additional access to ARIES or indicated that the access it was provided was inadequate. DTS did not refer to its review of ARIES in its opposition to AutoReturn and the City's motion for summary judgment.

AutoReturn asserted that DTS's motion for reconsideration was based on the incorrect assumption that the ARIES software contained similar maintenance screens to those in DTS's software. AutoReturn contended that "ARIES does not manage its data in the same way as DTS, and has just a handful of maintenance screens, unlike the dozens of screens in DTS's software." AutoReturn and the City requested sanctions against DTS for bringing a frivolous motion for reconsideration.

The court denied the motion for reconsideration, ruling that "DTS had ample time and opportunity to conduct discovery necessary to establish its trade secret claim. It received 40,000 pages of documents, took numerous depositions, and was granted wide access to the ARIES software." The court concluded [*47] that DTS failed "to direct the program to ask the users for additional information, transmit information to a third party, or direct the users to take specific courses of action outside the confines of the program. Because each combination of instances can trigger a different set of directions, the number of different direction sets is enormous. DTS contends that each possible combination is a trade secret that has been misappropriated by Cross-Defendants and is at issue in this litigation. Each instruction set which translates a combination of inputs into a concrete course of action represents a use of the underlying data and is therefore a trade secret distinct from the trade secret claimed [*44] in the static databases. [¶] . . . In the present case, DTS alleges the Cross-Defendants misappropriated both the static data and the dynamic flow of control or instruction sets."

demonstrate legally cognizable 'new or different' facts [or] circumstances,' as the moving papers do not provide a satisfactory explanation for failing to present the information at or before the [summary judgment] hearing or other indicia of reasonable diligence." The court denied AutoReturn and the City's request for sanctions. Given the evidence that before DTS filed its opposition to the AutoReturn and the City's summary judgment motion, AutoReturn provided DTS full user-level access to the ARIES software in accordance with the parties' agreement, including access to ARIES maintenance screens, the court did not abuse its discretion in denying DTS's motion for reconsideration based on AutoReturn's alleged failure to produce ARIES maintenance screens.

III. Denial of DTS's Motions to Redact and Seal Its Proprietary Information

DTS contends the court erred in denying five motions that DTS brought under section 3426.5 to redact and seal its proprietary information. None of the parties responding to DTS's appeal have addressed this assignment of error. We agree that the court erred in denying the motions.

On June 4, 2012, DTS sought an order under section 3426.5 to redact and seal verbatim quotes [*48] of two of its interrogatory responses that were filed conditionally under seal with AutoReturn and Orion's summary judgment motions. The court denied this sealing motion as a motion under California Rules of Court, rule 2.550. The court found it was tardy under rule 2.551(b)(3)(B). The court acknowledged that DTS sought to seal under section 3426.5, but ruled that section 3426.5 did not apply, stating: "This theory was undermined with the withdrawal of the trade secret claims from the main action, as evidenced by paragraph 6 of the Carey Declaration filed May 25[, 2012]. DTS claims this is still a viable theory as the sixth count of the second amended cross-complaint . . . still contains such a claim."

The court ruled that "DTS has failed to substantiate its claim that the lodged documents will disclose a trade secret, and has failed to make a showing justifying the sort of express and detailed findings necessary under [California Rules of Court, r]ule 2.550(d) if the presumption of [r]ule 2.550(c) is to be overcome." Accordingly, the court denied DTS's sealing request and ordered the clerk to unseal all documents lodged provisionally under seal. However, the court stayed that portion of the order for 30 days.

On June 29, 2012, DTS filed two additional motions to seal. One [*49] of those motions requested to redact and seal the following documents filed conditionally under seal in connection with AutoReturn's and the City's summary judgment motion: (1) Exhibits 1 through 5 to its second amended trade secret statement under Code of Civil Procedure section 2019.210, (2) portions of attorney Matthew Yan's declaration, (3) portions of AutoReturn and the City's points and authorities in support of their summary judgment motion, and (4) portions of AutoReturn and the City's separate statement.

DTS's other motion filed on June 29 requested to redact or seal the following documents filed conditionally under seal in connection with Orion's summary judgment motion: (1) seal Exhibits 1 through 5 to its second amended trade secret statement under Code of Civil Procedure section 2019.210, (2) seal DTS's XML schema (DTS's Exh. 6), (3) redact Orion's XML schema represented in July 10, 2010 e-mail from Miller to Hendry (DTS's Exh. 7), (4) seal DTS's summary judgment opposition exhibits 8 through 27, (5) redact Abramson's opposition declaration at paragraphs 21 and 22.

The court denied these sealing requests on September 4, 2012, stating: "The court finds, as it did [in ruling on DTS's first sealing motion], that DTS has failed to substantiate its claim that [*50] the lodged documents will disclose a trade secret, and has failed to make a showing justifying the sort of express and detailed findings necessary under [California Rules of Court, r]ule 2.550(d) if the presumption of [r]ule 2.550(c) is to be overcome. The court incorporates fully its detailed findings in part 2 of the July 6 minutes." The court again ordered the clerk to unseal all documents lodged provisionally under seal, but stayed that portion of the order because it was aware that DTS had appealed the court's previous order denying DTS's motion to seal. The court assumed DTS would also appeal the second order denying its sealing requests and stated: "The stay will expire if DTS does not file a timely notice of appeal on this issue."

DTS's fourth motion to seal was an ex parte application on September 13, 2012, that again sought to fully redact and seal its summary judgment opposition exhibits 6 through 27 and to redact specified portions of Abramson's opposition declaration, and to redact and seal certain documents it submitted in opposition to Orion's motion for attorney fees, including portions of a declaration by Abramson. The court denied DTS's requests to seal and redact, but again [*51] stayed the unsealing of the conditionally sealed documents "pending the appellate decision."

DTS's fifth request to seal was an ex parte application in December 2012 to seal documents filed in support of AutoReturn and the City's motion for attorney fees and costs. Specifically, DTS sought to seal an exhibit "O," which consisted of excerpts from the deposition transcript of DTS employee Reba Hildebrand and to file a copy of the exhibit with specified redactions. DTS also sought to seal all of AutoReturn and the City's exhibit "P," which was previously an exhibit to Hildebrand's deposition. The court again denied the application but stayed the unsealing.

The court erred in applying California Rules of Court, rule 2.550 to DTS's requests to seal instead of section 3426.5, which provides: "In an action under this title, a court shall preserve the secrecy of an alleged trade secret by reasonable means, which may include granting protective orders in connection with discovery proceedings, holding in-camera hearings, sealing the records of the action, and ordering any person involved in the litigation not to disclose an alleged trade secret without prior court approval." (Italics added.) California Rules of Court, rules 2.550 and 2.551 regarding sealed records "do not apply 'to records [*52] that courts must keep confidential by law.'" (In re Providian Credit Card Cases (2002) 96 Cal.App.4th 292, 298, 116 Cal. Rptr. 2d 833 (Providian).) A mandatory confidentiality requirement is imposed only in actions for misappropriation of trade secrets under the UTSA. (Providian, at p. 298.)

As the plain meaning of section 3426.5 and Providian make clear, because DTS was prosecuting an action for misappropriation of the alleged trade secrets under the UTSA, it was entitled to file its alleged trade secret material under seal to preserve its secrecy. DTS has not been prejudiced so far by the court's denials of its requests to seal because all of the documents that DTS sought to seal or redact were filed conditionally under seal and remain under seal as a result of the trial court's staying their unsealing pending this appeal. Because DTS claims the right to trade secret protection under section 3426.5 and we have affirmed summary adjudication of its statutory trade secret cause of action solely based on lack of evidence of misappropriation and not on the ground there is no trade secret, DTS is entitled to maintain the material in question under seal. Accordingly, we will reverse the orders denying DTS's requests to seal and direct the court to grant those requests.

IV. Attorney Fee Awards Under Section 3426.4

DTS contends the trial [*53] court erred in awarding attorney fees to Orion and AutoReturn under section 3426.4.[11] Section 3426.4 provides: "If a claim of misappropriation is made in bad faith, . . . the court may award reasonable attorney's fees and costs to the prevailing party. Recoverable costs hereunder shall include a reasonable sum to cover the services of expert witnesses, who are not regular employees of any party, actually incurred and reasonably necessary in either, or both, preparation for trial or arbitration, or during trial or arbitration, of the case by the prevailing party."

"'Although the Legislature has not defined "bad faith"' for purposes of section 3426.4, 'our courts have developed a two-prong standard: (1) objective speciousness of the claim, and (2) subjective bad faith in bringing or maintaining the action, i.e., for an improper purpose.'" (Cypress Semiconductor Corp. v. Maxim Integrated Products, Inc. (2015) 236 Cal.App.4th 243, 260, 186 Cal. Rptr. 3d 486 (Cypress), quoting FLIR Systems, Inc. v. Parrish (2009) 174 Cal.App.4th 1270, 1275, 95 Cal. Rptr. 3d 307 (FLIR).) "Objective speciousness is said to be present 'where the action superficially appears to have merit but there is a complete lack of evidence to support the claim.' [Citation.] The [*54] first clause, of course, is superfluous; there is no logical reason to require that the action 'superficially appear[ ] to have merit.'" (Cypress, supra, at p. 261.) "Subjective bad faith may be inferred by evidence that appellants intended to cause unnecessary delay, filed the action to harass respondents, or harbored an improper

---

[11] Although the court awarded attorney fees and costs to AutoReturn and the City jointly, DTS's challenge on appeal to that award addresses only the propriety of the award as to AutoReturn.

motive. [Citation.] The timing of the action may raise an inference of bad faith. [Citation.] Similar inferences may be made where the plaintiff proceeds to trial after the action's fatal shortcomings are revealed by opposing counsel." (FLIR, supra, at p. 1278.)

"An award of attorney fees for bad faith constitutes a sanction [citation], and the trial court has broad discretion in ruling on sanctions motions. [Citation.] 'Assuming some evidence exists in support of the factual findings, the trial court's exercise of discretion will not be disturbed unless it exceeds the bounds of reason. [Citation.] [¶] In reviewing the facts which led the trial court to impose sanctions, we must accept the version thereof which supports the trial court's determination, and must indulge in the inferences which favor its findings.'" (Gemini Aluminum Corp. v. California Custom Shapes, Inc. (2002) 95 Cal.App.4th 1249, 1262-1263, 116 Cal. Rptr. 2d 358 (Gemini).) Thus, on an appeal from an order under section 3426.4, "the appellant has an 'uphill battle' [*55] and must overcome both the 'sufficiency of evidence' rule and the 'abuse of discretion' rule. . . . We do not retry cases on appeal and we do not substitute our discretion for that of the trial court." (FLIR, supra, 174 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1275-1276.)

"A defendant moving for attorney fees under section 3426.4 is 'not required to conclusively prove a negative (i.e., that they did not steal [the plaintiff's] trade secrets). Instead, under the "objectively specious" standard, it [i]s enough for defendants to point to the absence of evidence of misappropriation in the record.' [Citation.] Further, the sufficiency of the evidence to support a given finding is not tested solely by examining evidence presented by one party, but raises the question whether 'on the entire record, there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which will support the determination . . . . [W]hen two or more inferences can reasonably be deduced from the facts, a reviewing court is without power to substitute its deductions for those of the trial court.'" (Cypress, supra, 236 Cal.App.4th at p. 260.)

Attorney fee award to Orion

We conclude substantial evidence supports the trial court's determination that DTS maintained its trade secret claim against Orion in bad faith. Accordingly, we conclude the court did [*56] not exceed the bounds of reason in awarding Orion attorney fees under section 3426.4 as a sanction against DTS. Although the trial court did not expressly state that DTS's trade secret claim was "objectively specious," the court expressly noted in its order that "'bad faith" as used in section 3426.4 consists of both 'objective speciousness' of the plaintiff's claim and 'subjective bad faith in bringing or maintaining the claim.'" In ruling on Orion's motion for attorney fees, the court stated: "As foreshadowed by the court's . . . ruling on the DeLatte/Orion motion for summary judgment, DTS's decision to drag them into the case was made without any admissible evidence (as opposed to rumor and suspicion) of any wrongdoing by them, and was thus objectively unreasonable and in bad faith." (Italics added.) Regarding subjective bad faith, the court ruled: "And there is more than a little evidence, outlined in [Orion's] moving and reply papers, to suggest that [DTS's] decision to file the cross-action was also made for an improper purpose, and that the cross[-]action was thereafter maintained for an ulterior purpose by DTS long after it should have been clear that DeLatte and Orion had no liability."

During oral argument [*57] on the attorney fee motions, DTS's counsel equated "objective bad faith" with "objective speciousness," arguing: "Orion has failed to meet its burden of proof by a preponderance of the evidence. They are required not just to show subjective bad faith, but also to show objective bad faith. And the court doesn't specifically address that in its tentative." (Italics added.) The court disagreed, stating, "I specifically say [in the written order] 'and was thus objectively unreasonable and in bad faith,' so you are starting off on the wrong foot. I did make a ruling on that." (Italics omitted.) Thus, the court clarified that the word "objectively" in its written order modified both "unreasonable" and "bad faith." Taking our cue from DTS's counsel and the trial court, we construe "objective bad faith" to mean the same as "objective speciousness" for purposes of Orion's motion for attorney fees under section 3426.4.[12]

Bearing in mind that we must accept the version of the facts that supports the trial court's determination, if supported by substantial evidence, and must indulge in the inferences that favor the court's findings (Gemini, supra, 95 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1262-1263), we conclude the trial court reasonably found that DTS's trade secret claim against both Orion was objectively specious and subjectively maintained in bad faith. Orion submitted a declaration by its counsel (Kenneth Fitzgerald), with supporting e-mails and other documentation, recounting negotiations between him and DTS's counsel (Mark Bailey) and ACT's counsel (Patrick Webb) regarding Orion's request to be dismissed from DTS's and ACT's lawsuits. Bailey and Webb informed Fitzgerald that "they had sued Orion to dissuade Orion from moving forward in San Diego, and their hope was that without Orion's participation in the project, AutoReturn would not be able to meet the City's [towing] needs, and the City would drop AutoReturn as its vendor." Orion rejected certain settlement demands by ACT and DTS[13] and decided to proceed with the litigation and produce all documents requested by DTS with the view that "DTS would see that none of its source code or trade secrets were [*59] provided to or used by Orion, and that DTS would then voluntarily dismiss Orion from the action."

In ensuing e-mail exchanges, Fitzgerald repeatedly requested that DTS dismiss Orion from its lawsuit based on the absence of any evidence that Orion had misappropriated DTS's trade [*60] secret. Fitzgerald asserted that the documents Orion produced in discovery showed that Orion and DeLatte "did not receive any source code or other arguably proprietary information belonging to [DTS or ACT], and they certainly were unaware of any possible proprietary status of any information they did receive in the course of their dealings with AutoReturn. . . . [¶] There is no factual basis for the allegations that [Orion] misappropriated [DTS's or ACT's] trade secrets . . . . The continued prosecution of this action against [Orion] makes no sense, and is in bad faith. There is no legitimate reason that my clients remain parties to this case. Please dismiss them immediately."

Before incurring the expense of preparing Orion's summary judgment motion, Fitzgerald again asked DTS to dismiss Orion from its lawsuit and gave DTS notice that Orion would seek sanctions under section 3426.4 if it were not dismissed. After receiving a message from DTS's counsel asking Orion to identify documents that exonerated Orion from DTS's trade secret misappropriation claim, Fitzgerald pointed out: "I'm afraid you have things reversed. It is not [Orion's] burden to prove a negative, that is, the absence of theft. It [*61] is your burden to prove there was theft. In [Orion's] document production there is no transmittal of code, no transmittal of your client's information, and no communication that reflects any copying or transmission of [DTS's] information. There is no evidence of trade secret theft because there was no trade secret theft. If you think I am mistaken, please identify the documents you believe show that [DTS's] trade secrets were stolen." DTS did not identify documents or other evidence of trade secret misappropriation by Orion and Orion successfully moved for summary adjudication of DTS's trade secret cause of action.

DeLatte filed a declaration in support of Orion's motion for attorney fees in which she recounted a number of conversations with DTS officer Morgan Hill in which Hill promised to dismiss Orion from DTS's lawsuit. DeLatte agreed to be interviewed by DTS's counsel in exchange for a dismissal, but DTS never dismissed Orion from the

[12] Later during oral argument, DTS's counsel again equated objective bad faith with objective speciousness, stating: "Your Honor, for purposes of ruling on this motion, the issue with regard to objective bad faith is whether there is any evidence that supports the filing of this [trade secret] [*58] claim."

[13] Bailey told Fitzgerald that DTS and ACT would be willing to dismiss Orion from the litigation if DeLatte provided a predeposition interview with Bailey and if Orion provided an informal production of its documents. Orion agreed to those terms, but was unwilling to produce documents and disclose information that would violate a confidentiality agreement between Orion and AutoReturn. However, Orion agreed to produce documents that would potentially violate the confidentiality agreement if DTS would subpoena them. Rather than subpoena the documents, DTS proposed that Orion assign to DTS claims it might have against AutoReturn so that Orion and DTS would be in privity and could therefore share AutoReturn's confidential information. DTS also suggested that Orion did not have to comply with its confidentiality agreement because AutoReturn had breached the agreement by not disclosing the present litigation to Orion.

case. DeLatte declared: "I tried to do everything possible to obtain a dismissal from this lawsuit, starting with the decision to withdraw from the San Diego project. Then, I agreed to cooperate, to the extent I lawfully could, to provide information [*62] to DTS, and to provide a deposition in San Diego if Orion would be dismissed. Orion and I provided all of the discovery requested of us, in the hopes that the parties would see from this discovery that Orion had done nothing wrong, and did not belong in this lawsuit."

In a reply declaration, DeLatte stated that Hill had told her on a number of occasions that his lawyers said they had to sue her in order to obtain her cooperation. Delatte told Hill he did not have to sue her to get information; he could simply take her deposition. Hill said that he did not know he could depose someone without suing them, and that he would talk to his lawyers and get them to dismiss Orion. DeLatte averred that Hill's statement in his opposition declaration that DeLatte told him AutoReturn had provided her with DTS's data and other information was "completely false," and that AutoReturn never provided her with any DTS data.

Based on Orion's evidence, the court could reasonably find that DTS's trade secret claim against Orion was objectively specious and brought in subjective bad faith—i.e., for the improper purpose of dissuading Orion from moving forward in San Diego in the hope Orion's withdrawal from [*63] the project would cause the City to drop AutoReturn as its towing contractor.

DTS contends the court's bad faith finding was improperly based on statements by DTS's and ACT's counsel that the court should have excluded from evidence under Evidence Code sections 1152[14] and 1154[15] as statements made during settlement negotiations between Orion, DTS, and ACT. The court rejected that argument in its order, stating: "The information [in Fitzgerald's declaration] is not offered to show liability or damage but rather is offered to show the presence or absence of good faith."

The trial court's consideration of statements made by DTS's counsel during settlement negotiations was not an abuse of discretion. Evidence Code sections 1152 and 1154 do not absolutely bar admission of evidence of settlement negotiations; such evidence "may be admissible for a purpose other than proving liability[,]" including proving bad faith. (Volkswagen of America, Inc. v. Superior Court (2006) 139 Cal.App.4th 1481, 1491, 43 Cal. Rptr. 3d 723; White v. Western Title Ins. Co. (1985) 40 Cal.3d 870, 887, 221 Cal. Rptr. 509, 710 P.2d 309 [Evidence Code section 1152 does not preclude evidence of settlement negotiations that is offered to prove an insurer's bad faith rather than liability for the original loss or damage.].) The court properly considered statements by DTS's counsel during settlement negotiations in determining whether DTS acted with subjective bad faith in suing Orion for misappropriation of trade secrets. DTS's counsel's statements are admissible against DTS under the rule that "[s]tatements made by agents authorized to act on behalf of a party are admissible against that party." (Volkswagen of America, Inc. v. Superior Court, supra, 139 Cal.App.4th at p. 1492.)

DTS complains that the court considered only Orion's evidence in ruling on the motion for attorney fees and did not consider Hill's declaration, which DTS contends is the only direct evidence of DTS's subjective state of mind. We assume in support of the judgment that the [*65] court considered DTS's evidence and found Orion's evidence more credible on the issue of whether DTS maintained its trade secret claim against Orion in bad faith. As noted, we must accept the version of the facts that supports the trial court's determination. (Gemini, supra, 95 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1262-1263.)

[14] Evidence Code section 1152, subdivision (a), provides: "Evidence that a person has, in compromise or from humanitarian motives, furnished or offered or promised to furnish money or any other thing, act, or service to another who has sustained or will sustain or claims that he or she has sustained or will sustain loss or damage, as well as any conduct or statements made in negotiation thereof, is inadmissible to prove his or her liability for the loss or damage or any part of it."

[15] Evidence Code section 1154 provides: "Evidence that a person has accepted or offered or promised to accept a sum of money or any other thing, act, or service in satisfaction of a claim, as well as any conduct or statements made in negotiation thereof, [*64] is inadmissible to prove the invalidity of the claim or any part of it."

Hill's opposition declaration contains his recounting of settlement negotiations with Orion (DeLatte and Fitzgerald) and his assessment of why the negotiations were unsuccessful, but it does not compel a finding that Hill reasonably thought that Orion had misappropriated DTS's alleged trade secrets. Hill averred that software engineers had advised him "that it simply was not possible to create a complex software system such as DTS's from whole cloth[,]" and that the only way to develop such a system in a short time was to copy DTS's existing system. Thus, Hill concluded it was likely that Orion and AutoReturn were copying DTS's proprietary information "with the City's help in providing access." Hill stated: "I was advised that Orion did not need to see DTS's source code to perpetrate this copying, and in fact viewing DTS's source code would be a slow and ineffective way to steal DTS's proprietary information. It would be much [*66] more effective . . . for Orion [and AutoReturn] to simply look at LETS [and TMS] and copy how it was set up and the data that was contained on the system. This readily viewable information took DTS years to configure and compile so that it was optimally useful by the City." (Italics added.) Based on these statements by Hill, the court could reasonably find that DTS merely suspected AutoReturn and Orion of copying only "readily viewable" information that was not trade secret information-a finding that supports the court's conclusion that DTS had no evidence that Orion or AutoReturn misappropriated a trade secret and that DTS did not maintain its trade secret claim against Orion and AutoReturn in subjective good faith.

The court did not abuse its discretion in awarding Orion attorney fees under section 3426.4.

Attorney fee award to AutoReturn

We conclude that substantial evidence also supports the trial court's determination that DTS maintained its trade secret claim against AutoReturn in bad faith within the meaning of section 3426.4. In ruling on AutoReturn's motion for attorney fees, the court found that the "trade secret counts" in this case were "specious" and that "ACT's and DTS's decision to drag [the] City [*67] and AutoReturn into the case was made without any admissible evidence (as opposed to rumor and suspicion) of any wrongdoing by the City and AutoReturn, and was thus objectively unreasonable and in bad faith." The court further stated that "DTS fail[ed] to offer any evidence that its trade secret claims were objectively reasonable, instead regurgitating arguments rejected in the prior summary judgment/adjudication motions." Regarding subjective bad faith, the court ruled that "DTS fail[ed] to address or dispute any of the evidence that it acted with subjective bad faith and engaged in gamesmanship." The court noted that DTS "prosecut[ed] its claims against the City and AutoReturn for several months even though an identical claim against DeLatte/Orion was dismissed by summary judgment on July 6, 2012." The court concluded that "without any evidence in support of its trade secrets claim, DTS litigated and pursued this action against the City and AutoReturn without any good faith basis for believing that a trade secret theft had taken place."

As noted, under the "objectively specious" standard, it is enough for a defendant to a trade secret claim to point to the absence of evidence of misappropriation in the record [*68] (Cypress, supra, 236 Cal.App.4th at p. 260.) Accordingly, the court reasonably based its finding of objective speciousness on its prior determination on summary judgment that DTS presented "no material evidence of actual misappropriation"—i.e., that there was insufficient evidence to raise a material issue of fact as to whether AutoReturn misappropriated a trade secret.

Hill's declaration in opposition to AutoReturn's motion for attorney fees was similar to his declaration in opposition to Orion's motion. Hill stated that "the only means that DTS had to determine whether AutoReturn was in fact copying DTS's proprietary software was to file suit." This statement supports the court's finding that the suit was filed based on suspicion rather than evidence of trade secret misappropriation. Hill mentioned DTS's discovery that Orion was in possession of DTS's XML schema and reason code information, but Abramson's declaration filed by DTS in opposition to summary judgment motions did not identify those as trade secrets; Abramson merely speculated that because they had been copied, the copying "likely" extended to trade secret information. Hill's declaration reiterated statements in his prior declaration regarding Orion and AutoReturn's [*69] suspected copying of "readily viewable" LETS/TMS information that "took DTS years to configure and compile so that it was optimally useful by the City." As we discussed, these statements reasonably support a finding that DTS merely suspected AutoReturn and Orion of copying "readily viewable" information that was not trade secret information. The court could reasonably find DTS's trade secret claim against AutoReturn was objectively specious based on the lack of evidence that AutoReturn misappropriated a trade secret. The court could reasonably find subjective bad faith based on DTS's continuing to prosecute the claim "after [its] fatal shortcomings [were] revealed by opposing counsel[,]" as well as the court's prior ruling on Orion's summary judgment motion. (FLIR, supra, 174 Cal.App.4th at p. 1278.)

The court did not abuse its discretion in awarding AutoReturn attorney fees under section 3426.4. In light of our affirmance of the attorney fee award to AutoReturn under section 3426.4, we need not address AutoReturn's argument that it is, alternatively, entitled to attorney fees under section 1717 as a prevailing party in a contract dispute.[16]

V. Summary Adjudication of Cause of Action for Breach of Joint Venture Agreement

DTS contends the court erred in summarily adjudicating its cause of action for breach of joint venture agreement in AutoReturn's favor. In its fifth cause of action for breach of joint venture agreement, DTS alleged that DTS and AutoReturn "teamed up and entered into an oral and/or implied joint venture agreement in order to jointly submit a bid for the 2008 RFP to provide dispatch communications services to the City and the City's tow contractors. Under the joint venture, AutoReturn and [DTS] agreed to use [DTS's] LETS, TMS, . . . and other communications and integration software and hardware to fulfill the requirements of the 2008 RFP." DTS further alleged that AutoReturn breached the "joint venture agreement by terminating [DTS's] responsibilities under the 2008 RFP, and contracting to have those services performed by Orion, or performing [DTS's] responsibilities under the joint venture in house . . . ."

"'A joint venture . . . is an undertaking by two or [*71] more persons jointly to carry out a single business enterprise for profit.' [Citation.] 'There are three basic elements of a joint venture: the members must have joint control over the venture (even though they may delegate it), they must share the profits of the undertaking, and the members must each have an ownership interest in the enterprise. [Citation.]' [Citation.] 'Whether a joint venture actually exists depends on the intention of the parties. [Citations.] [¶] . . . [¶] . . . [W]here evidence is in dispute the existence or nonexistence of a joint venture is a question of fact to be determined by the jury.'" (Unruh-Haxton v. Regents of the University of California (2008) 162 Cal.App.4th 343, 370, 76 Cal. Rptr. 3d 146.)

In its motion for summary judgment, AutoReturn, presented declarations of its CEO, Wicker, and chief technology officer, Pendleton. Both averred that DTS did not form a joint venture with AutoReturn and did not share profits, control, or ownership of a separate entity with AutoReturn. Pendleton declared that at all times, AutoReturn considered DTS to be a vendor and that the parties never discussed forming a joint venture. Wicker stated that AutoReturn considered DTS to be a subcontractor, as it had in all of its prior dealings with DTS. The parties contemplated the same type [*72] of licensing arrangement they had in San Francisco and Baltimore County—i.e., DTS would provide software and technical support for the software in return for AutoReturn's payment of a fee.

DTS's opposition evidence included deposition testimony and declarations from Estes and Garg. Estes testified that in the spring of 2008, DTS and AutoReturn entered into an oral "global joint venture agreement," which they intended to later put in writing. The parties agreed to "jointly propose deals for prospective clients and share in the revenue and the costs." Estes initially testified that the parties agreed to percentages of revenue they would share, but he did not recall the specific percentages and did not know where to find "that number." However, later in his deposition Estes testified that AutoReturn and DTS agreed to share gross profits on a "pro rata" or percentage basis with a "60/40" split, meaning that AutoReturn would receive 60 percent and DTS would receive 40 percent of the gross profits. At the hearing on AutoReturn and the City's summary judgment motion, AutoReturn's counsel represented that Estes recalled the 60/40 profit percentages after having lunch with his counsel.

In his [*73] declaration, Estes averred that in the spring of 2008 "AutoReturn and DTS entered into an oral joint venture agreement to jointly pursue municipal contracts throughout the United States" and that he personally negotiated the agreement with AutoReturn's principals, including Wicker and Pendleton. Under the joint venture

[16] AutoReturn contends it was a prevailing party in its licensing agreements with DTS because, in AutoReturn's words, "DTS's trade-secret [*70] claim against AutoReturn was (and still is) premised largely on these 'two agreements that required AutoReturn to keep DTS's software confidential.'" agreement, DTS and AutoReturn agreed to share the profits and losses associated with pursuing each contract, with the parties sharing joint control over the business of the venture. Regarding profit sharing, Estes declared: "During my deposition in this case, I was asked what the compensation structure was for the joint venture arrangement with AutoReturn in San Diego. At that time I could not recall the figure, but since my deposition I have been able to refresh my recollection and recall that we agreed to split the $22.00 per-tow fee for City authorized tows in San Diego at 60% AutoReturn and 40% DTS."

Garg testified in his deposition that DTS had "pretty vast discussions with AutoReturn about a joint venture relationship which centered around the San Diego contract being in the RFP stage. We had talked about over time . . . having a closer joint venture whereby [AutoReturn] would [*74] go out and become . . . an exclusive marketing arm for DTS to go market. [DTS would] do all the development and [AutoReturn would] do all the marketing, and that would be the nature of a joint venture." Garg testified that he sold DTS before the joint venture agreement was finalized, but DTS and AutoReturn reached an "agreement in principle" and "clear understanding" regarding how the joint venture relationship would be structured for San Diego. The parties agreed that DTS would assist AutoReturn in the RFP process, and would work with AutoReturn "to provide whatever they needed to get the response and work with the City to let them know that they are [DTS's] partner in this process, and in return, when they get the contract, [DTS gets] a split of the revenue and provide[s] all the software services." DTS expected "[a] percentage split of the revenue" and agreed to AutoReturn's receiving 60 percent and DTS's receiving 40 percent.

In AutoReturn and the City's reply to DTS's opposition to the summary judgment motion, AutoReturn asserted that DTS's joint venture claim was based entirely on Estes's declaration and that the court should strike the declaration because of DTS's discovery abuse regarding [*75] Estes's deposition. AutoReturn contended that DTS had refused to produce Estes to complete his deposition despite a court order.

Although the court overruled AutoReturn and the City's four evidentiary objections that were directed at the portions of Estes's declaration regarding AutoReturn and DTS's joint venture agreement, in its order granting the motion for summary judgment, the court struck Estes's entire declaration. The court stated:

"DTS has not created a triable issue of fact as to the joint venture claim, count 5. The key declarant in opposition to the motion as to count 5 is Lawrence Estes. Much of the Estes declaration is inadmissible, and that which does not run afoul of the Evidence Code is a classic sham declaration. The key passage of the Declaration is in paragraph 14 on page 5. Estes admits that when deposed he 'could not recall' the key element of the joint venture, the 'compensation structure.' He then purports to testify in the Declaration that 'since [his] deposition, I have been able to refresh my recollection.' He never states by what means he was refreshed. There were several other instances of Mr. Estes not recollecting important information . . ., at least until [*76] after the lunch break . . . . During argument, counsel for DTS tacitly acknowledged he could not have been refreshed by a document, as there are no documents which reflect the existence of the purported 'joint venture.'"

Regarding Estes's deposition testimony that AutoReturn and DTS agreed to share gross profits on a percentage basis with a 60/40 split, the court stated that "this does not change the result. Contrary to the suggestion at oral argument, this is not a credibility determination, but rather a determination that the referenced testimony is so equivocal in context that it does not raise a triable issue of fact. This is confirmed by the fact that even Estes did not reference it in his own Declaration."

The court struck Estes's entire declaration on the ground it was a "sham declaration," but viewed DTS's discovery abuse regarding Estes's deposition as further support for its decision.[17] The court stated: "The failure of DTS to produce Estes for completion of his deposition until the day before the reply brief was due, despite Judge Denton's order to the contrary and following a series of emails seeking to confirm he would be produced in a timely fashion (which emails went without [*77] response), confirms the court's view that the Estes Declaration should be stricken in its entirety."

[17] AutoReturn did not ask the court to strike Estes's declaration on the ground it contradicted his deposition testimony; its request to strike the declaration was based solely on alleged discovery abuse regarding his deposition.

DTS contends the court erred in striking Estes's entire declaration. We agree. One of the cases the court cited in its ruling as authority for striking Estes's declaration is Yeager v. Bowlin (9th Cir. 2012) 693 F.3d 1076, in which the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals applied what is referred to in federal case law as the "sham affidavit rule." (Id. at p. 1079.) Under that rule, "'a party cannot create an issue of fact by an affidavit contradicting his prior deposition testimony.'" (Van Asdale v. International Game Technology (9th Cir. 2009) 577 F.3d 989, 998 (Van Asdale).)

However, federal cases have "recognized that the sham affidavit rule is in tension with the principle that a court's role in deciding a summary judgment motion is not to make credibility determinations or weigh conflicting evidence. Aggressive invocation of the rule also threatens to ensnare parties who may have simply been confused during their deposition testimony and may encourage gamesmanship by opposing attorneys. [The Ninth [*78] Circuit has] thus recognized that the sham affidavit rule 'should be applied with caution.'" (Van Asdale, supra, 577 F.3d at p. 998.)

There are "two important limitations on a [trial] court's discretion to invoke the sham affidavit rule. First, . . . the rule 'does not automatically dispose of every case in which a contradictory affidavit is introduced to explain portions of earlier deposition testimony,' [citation]; rather, 'the [trial] court must make a factual determination that the contradiction was actually a "sham."' [Citation.] Second, . . . the inconsistency between a party's deposition testimony and subsequent affidavit must be clear and unambiguous to justify striking the affidavit." (Van Asdale, supra, 577 F.3d at pp. 998-999, italics added.)
