When plaintiff bears the burden of proving an element of his case at trial, defendant will prevail on a motion for summary judgment if plaintiff does not come forward with evidence of that element. Moreover, plaintiff's evidence must establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact, not simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

HN14[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing

Relevant circumstances for purposes of determining if an exclusive arrangement imposes an unreasonable restraint of trade can include such diverse factors as the defendants' intent and purpose in adopting the restriction; the structure of and competitive conditions within the affected industries; the relative competitive positions of the defendants; the presence of economic barriers inhibiting the ability of competitors to respond and offset the challenged practices; and apparent justifications for the restriction such as enhanced efficiency, protection of product or service goodwill, and inducing dealer loyalty. No single such factor is decisive.

A tying arrangement is an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different or tied product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier. Such an arrangement violates § 1 of the Sherman Act if the seller has appreciable economic power in the tying product market and if the arrangement affects a substantial volume of commerce in the tied market.

HN16[] Tying Arrangements, Clayton Act

A manufacturer generally has the right to unilaterally refuse to deal. The refusal to deal with third parties conditioned on failure to purchase other goods or services, however, is not a unilateral refusal. To establish an illegal tying arrangement under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, the Ninth Circuit requires a plaintiff to demonstrate that: (1) two distinct products or services are in fact tied such that the products are offered as a single package; (2) the defendant has sufficient economic power in the tying market to impose restrictions in the tied product market; (3) the amount of commerce in the tied product is not insubstantial.

HN17[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

Substantial power for antitrust purposes is the ability to raise prices or to require purchasers to accept burdensome terms that could not be enacted in a completely competitive market.

[*1390] ORDER

This cause of action was brought under both the court's diversity and federal question (antitrust) jurisdiction. With this motion, defendant USG Interiors, Inc. ("USGI") seeks summary judgment dismissal of all of plaintiff's claims except the one for tortious interference. After full consideration of the briefs and affidavits filed by counsel, the Court dismisses all the antitrust claims, but [*1391] retains part of plaintiff's breach of contract and its tortious interference claims.[1]

[2] FACTS

Ceiling and Interior Systems Supply, Inc. ("CISSI") is a distributor of acoustical products in the Northwest. At issue here are two of those products: "Board," an acoustical tile used on ceilings; and "grid," a metal suspension system for holding the board. CISSI sells in a five-state area (Alaska, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana) which it refers to as the "Northwest market."

CISSI was incorporated in 1970 and had been an authorized distributor of board manufactured by Conwed Corporation and grid manufactured by Donn Corporation prior to the time USGI or one of its affiliates acquired Conwed in 1985 and Donn in 1986. Written agreements existed between CISSI and Conwed, and CISSI and Donn, at the time USGI took over the board and grid firms. (These agreements will be discussed in greater detail under the motion to dismiss the breach of contract claim.) In a letter dated November 18, 1986, USGI stated its policy towards its distributor (also arguably a contract). During the relevant period, CISSI also carried competing lines of grid and board.

In May 1991, CISSI's Portland distributor became an Armstrong distributor. The CISSI distributor in Seattle also became an Armstrong [3] distributor in October 1991. USGI argues that these two CISSI distributors became exclusive distributors for Armstrong board. CISSI disputes the exclusivity. In any event, the Armstrong deal appears to have precipitated an offer of an exclusive dealership from USGI requiring CISSI to abandon Armstrong. USGI canceled its dealerships with Portland and Seattle CISSI after CISSI declined the exclusive dealership. USGI's distributorship with CISSI in Boise and Spokane continued. The question for the Court is whether USGI's actions breached the contract with CISSI and/or violated antitrust laws.

CISSI claims follow:

1. Breach of contract.

2. Wrongful interference with economic relationships.

3. Attempted monopolization under Sherman Act § 2 and RCW 19.86.040.

4. Termination for refusal to accede to exclusionary arrangement in violation of RCW 19.86.030 & .050, and RCW 19.86.090.

5. Termination for refusal to accede to tying arrangement in violation of RCW 19.86.030 and RCW 19.86.090.

Earlier this Court dismissed the claim for breach of duty of good faith and fair dealing, and plaintiff has abandoned claims brought under the Washington Consumer Protection Act and Washington Franchise Investment [4] Act.

[1] Defendant USGI requested oral argument, but plaintiff CISSI indicated that it was unnecessary. The Court agrees in view of the extensive briefing and the excellent presentation of evidence by both parties.

Plaintiff mistakenly relies on this Court's Order of March 13, 1992, denying defendant's motion to dismiss pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). The Court uses a different standard in addressing a motion pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 56. HN1[] Even though summary judgment is disfavored in complex antitrust litigation, it is not precluded. Betaseed, at 1207. HN2[] When plaintiff bears the burden of proving an element of his case at trial, defendant will prevail on a motion for summary judgment if plaintiff does not come forward with evidence of that element. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322-24, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265, 106 S. Ct. 2548 (1986). Moreover, plaintiff's evidence must establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact, not "simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts." Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 585-87, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986).

DISCUSSION

1. Breach of Contract

Defendant USGI is successor to Conwed (board producer) and Donn (grid producer). [*1392] Defendant does [5] not argue at this point the contractual validity of the following agreements: Conwed and CISSI agreement, dated July 28, 1978; and Donn and CISSI agreement undated, but apparently sent in 1983. In addition, USGI sent a letter to CISSI dated November 18, 1986 explaining the basis for its continuing distributorship with CISSI. None of these documents set a specific date on which the distributorship would cease.

Plaintiff CISSI insists that the agreements constitute an ongoing commitment with termination to occur only for cause. USGI counters that the distributorship could be canceled at will with 90 days notice which it gave. USGI terminated CISSI as a distributor of its board and grid at CISSI's Seattle and Portland outlets, effective October 18, 1991. The other CISSI outlets continued to sell USGI board and grid.

There are two aspects to the breach of contract issue. The first relates to events occurring more than three years prior to USGI's termination of the contract; the second relates to the termination itself. USGI asserts different defenses to each aspect.

As to the first, CISSI alleges that USGI set up competing distributorships contrary to the written agreements with CISSI: [6] Rose City in Portland in 1987 and Northwest Acoustical Supply in Seattle in July 1988. Additionally, USGI sold directly to customers during that period. All of this was allegedly in breach of the agreements between USGI and CISSI. USGI's defenses to these alleged breaches are (1) the claim is barred by the three-year statute of limitations governing unwritten contracts and (2) CISSI has waived its claims by failing to act.

In arguing that the three-year statute of limitations applies, USGI points out that the contract in question is part oral and part written, thus the three-year statute (rather than the six-year statute for written contracts) applies. See Cahn v. Foster & Marshall, Inc., 33 Wash. App. 838, 658 P.2d 42 (1983) ("if resort to parol evidence is necessary to establish any material element, then the contract is partly oral . . . ."). There are no written words defining the length of contract in any of the documents. As will be discussed later, the Court would have to look outside the document were it to reach plaintiff's position that the distributorship could, be terminated only for cause. It would therefore appear that Cahn [7] requires application of a three-year statute and CISSI's claims which predate filing by three or more years are foreclosed.

Because the Court concludes that the three-year limitation period applies, it is not necessary to reach the waiver issue. Nonetheless, the Court concludes that USGI has not proved waiver. It is clear that CISSI knew of the competing distributorship but voiced an objection, and had not unequivocally relinquished its rights.

> HN3[] Waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right. It is necessary that the person against whom waiver is claimed have intended to relinquish the right, advantage, or benefit and his action must be inconsistent with any other intent than to waive it.

Wagner v. Wagner, 95 Wash. 2d 94, 102, 621 P.2d 1279 (1980), cited in Central Washington Bank v. Mendelson-Zeller, 113 Wash. 2d 346, 353, 779 P.2d 697 (1989).

Next is the second aspect: Was either contract terminable at will or only for cause; and because for more than one year, was it outside the statute of frauds? USGI insists that the contracts in question (earlier Conwed and Donn agreements [8] and USGI letter) are terminable at will, relying on Birkenwald Distributing Co. v. Heublein, Inc., 55 Wash. App. 1, 776 P.2d 721 (1989). The Birkenwald case does support USGI's argument with the following language:

> Parties contracting in good faith for a continuing performance presumably intend a reasonable time if they do not discuss duration; for this reason, either party may terminate its obligations after a reasonable time has passed.

Birkenwald, at 7 (citations omitted). In Birkenwald, however, the contract at issue was an oral contract. Moreover, Birkenwald preceded the Washington Supreme Court's discussion on interpreting [*1393] contracts in Berg v. Hudesman, 115 Wash. 2d 657, 801 P.2d 222 (1990).

In analyzing a contract, the Berg court differentiated between contract interpretation and contract construction. HN4[] "Interpretation" refers to ascertaining the meaning and intent of the parties in the context of the whole agreement, and may be gleaned from circumstances leading up to the formation and the conduct of the parties before and after formation. "Construction" refers [9] to determining the legal effect of a contract. Id. at 663-69.

Application of the statute of frauds (RCW 19.36.010) in the midst of this argument is problematic. HN5[] The statute of frauds defense is premised on the requirement in Washington that contracts which require more than one year to perform must be in writing. The contracts at issue here are in writing, but the specific time for their performance is not clearly written.

This Court concludes that pursuant to Berg, the written contracts at issue here are subject to extrinsic evidence to explain the meaning and intent of the parties as to termination. The fact that these written contracts do not contain a written date or grounds for termination, however, will not defeat them under the statute of frauds. The Court thus denies summary judgment on the issue of contract termination.

2. Attempted Monopolization in Violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act

HN6[] Section 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 2), criminalizes conduct which creates a monopoly or attempts to monopolize interstate or foreign commerce. Private parties are also given the right [10] to bring civil actions for treble damages. 15 U.S.C. § 15.[2]

CISSI basis its claims of attempted monopolization on the following: (1) USGI's termination of CISSI as both a board and grid distributor because of CISSI's refusal to give up Armstrong and push USGI exclusively; (2) USGI's threats to price CISSI out of the market; (3) USGI's attempt to leverage its dominant position in grid to improve its position in board sales.[3]

[11] USGI admits to terminating CISSI as a distributor in Portland and Seattle after CISSI declined USGI's offer of an exclusive distributorship in Seattle and one of two distributorships in Portland (agreeing to close one of its company-owned outlets). These actions, according to USGI, were motivated by CISSI's decreasing sales of USGI products.

[2] Plaintiff's claim also asserts violation of RCW 19.86.040, which essentially follows section 2 of the Sherman Act. The parties rely almost exclusively on federal cases.

[3] Leveraging (use of market power in one market to gain advantage in another market) may violate antitrust law. Key Enterprises of Delaware, Inc. v. Venice Hospital., 919 F.2d 1550 (11th Cir. 1990), vacated, 979 F.2d 806 (11th Cir. 1992); but see Catlin v. Washington Energy Co., 791 F.2d 1343, 1346 (9th Cir. 1986) (reserving judgment' on the issue of monopoly leveraging as separate antitrust claim).

There are three primary manufacturers of board in the United States: Armstrong (the largest manufacturer of acoustical ceiling products), USGI, and Celotex. There are also three primary manufacturers of grid in the United States: USGI (the largest), National Rolling Mills, and Chicago Metallic Corporation. USGI admits to being the largest national seller of grid, and being second to Armstrong in board sales. USGI holds a patent on its grid design.

HN7[] To prove an attempted monopolization, plaintiff must demonstrate (1) specific intent to control prices and destroy competition; (2) predatory or anti-competitive conduct; (3) a dangerous probability of success; (4) causal antitrust injury. Pacific Express, Inc. v. United Airlines, Inc., 959 F.2d 814, 817 (9th Cir. 1992) cert. denied U.S. , 121 L. Ed. 2d 686, 113 S. Ct. 814. [12] Under a very recent Supreme Court holding, proof of section 2 attempt to monopolize requires "dangerous probability that they would monopolize a particular market and specific intent to monopolize." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247, 113 S. Ct. 884 (1993). Recognizing the distinction between actions of a single firm and concerted activity, the Court reversed the Ninth Circuit and the trial court, [*1394] noting that "section 2 makes the conduct of a single firm unlawful only when it actually monopolizes or dangerously threatens to do so." Id. at 10 (citation omitted). The Supreme Court thus held as follows:

> We hold that petitioners may not be HN8[] liable for attempted monopolization under section two of the Sherman Act absent proof of a dangerous probability that they would monopolize a particular market and specific intent to monopolize. In this case, the trial instructions allowed the jury to infer specific intent and dangerous probability of success from the defendants' predatory conduct, without any proof of the relevant market or of a realistic probability that the defendants could achieve monopoly power in that market. [13] In this respect the instructions misconstrued section two, as did the court of appeals in affirming the judgment of the district court.

CISSI argues that Spectrum Sports is a narrow holding and does not require market share analysis to prove dangerous probability. CISSI does not say how else it would be proved, and the Supreme Court pointedly overruled the Ninth Circuit's position that evidence of unfair or predatory conduct obviated the need for market-analysis. This Court's reading of Spectrum Sports and its specific reversal of Ninth Circuit precedence means HN9[] that CISSI cannot prove that USGI (a single firm) attempted to monopolize without defining the relevant market and offering evidence of the dangerous probability that USGI could achieve a monopoly in that market. CISSI has not done so.

CISSI implies that the relevant product is board, but offers no analysis of alternative products and the elasticity of price and demand. USGI's evidence indicates that even in grid market (where it admits a dominant position) its price increases are considerably less than the inflation rate for 1989-1992. See Watkins Affidavit. CISSI's former president, Don Hagarty, acknowledged [14] that grid is priced competitively and that customers respond to price fluctuation. There is clear evidence that Armstrong is the leading seller of board and no evidence that USGI could overtake Armstrong and achieve a monopoly in board.

Similarly, CISSI has not even attempted to define the relevant geographic market. At various points in its brief, CISSI refers to evidence of a northwest market, a national market, an Alaska market, an Oregon and Eastern Washington market, and a Western Washington market. However, it offers no clear figures to demonstrate market shares for USGI board and grid in a particular geographic market. CISSI refers to a multitude of figures (some based on USGI's internal forecasts) but nowhere settles down to identify the geographic market it accuses USGI of attempting to monopolize.

Because of CISSI failure to define the relevant market which it accuses USGI of attempting to monopolize, and its consequent failure to show dangerous probability that USGI would monopolize, CISSI's section 2 claim is dismissed.

3. Plaintiff's Claim of an Attempt to Create an Exclusionary Arrangement in Violation of RCW 19.86.030 & .050 and RCW 19.86.090

CISSI contends that [15] USGI's offer of an exclusive distributorship (which was refused by CISSI) was in violation of Washington's antitrust statutes, because it was an attempt to create an exclusionary arrangement. USGI describes the offer as one for a vertical nonprice restraint, which would be examined under antitrust law as to whether it was an unreasonable restraint on trade ("the rule of reason").

The Washington statute, HN10[] RCW 19.86.090, permits an action by anyone who is injured in his business or property "because he or she refuses to accede to a proposal for an arrangement which, if consummated, would be in violation of [other antitrust statutes as explained next] . . ." The two statutes plaintiff invokes at this point are HN11[] RCW 19.86.030, prohibiting conspiracies in restraint of trade and HN12[] RCW 19.86.050, which makes it unlawful to agree not to use or deal in commodities "where the effect of such . . . may be to substantially lesson competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." [*1395] CISSI argues that this prohibition parallels federal law proscribing exclusive dealing which is anti-competitive.[4]

[16] Thus this Court looks at exclusive dealing under the "rule of reason," as would a federal court. Ballo, at 26. HN13[] Exclusive dealing is not per se illegal. Rather, under the rule of reason, this Court must consider all the circumstances of the case to determine if the exclusive arrangement imposes an unreasonable restraint of trade. See, e.g., Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery & Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202, 105 S. Ct. 2613 (1985). One expert described the factors to be considered thusly:

> HN14[] Relevant circumstances can include such diverse factors as the defendants' intent and purpose in adopting the restriction; the structure of and competitive conditions within the affected industries; the relative competitive positions of the defendants; the presence of economic barriers inhibiting the ability of competitors to respond and offset the challenged practices; and apparent justifications for the restriction such as enhanced efficiency, protection of product or service goodwill, and inducing dealer loyalty. No single such factor is decisive.

W. Holmes, 1992 Antitrust Law Handbook [17] § 1.04, at 163-64. The Holmes treatise goes on to point out that a rule of reason inquiry necessarily begins with identification of the relevant market.

This takes the Court full circle back to the section 2 analysis "attempt to monopolize" above and the need for market analysis. This conclusion is supported by Jefferson Parish Hospital District No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1984). In addressing an exclusive contract by a hospital for the services of certain anesthesiologists, the Supreme Court again emphasized the need for market analysis to determine the anticompetitive effects. "There is, however, insufficient evidence in this record to provide a basis for finding that the Roux contract, as it actually operates in the market, has unreasonably restrained competition." Id. at 29.[5]

[18] Similarly, in Barr Laboratories, Inc. v. Abbott Laboratories, 978 F.2d 98 (3d Cir. 1992), the court examined an exclusive dealing arrangement in the pharmaceutical field using section 3 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 14) and section 1 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 1). In Barr, the relevant market had been defined in the first half of a bifurcated trial, after which the trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. The Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's conclusion that the exclusive dealing contracts "did not portend an immediate or future anti-competitive backlash." Id. at 111.

The Court simply does not have here the basic information for determining that USGI's offer of an exclusive contract (had it been accepted) would have unreasonably restrained competition. This claim is therefore dismissed.

[4] Washington law recognizes that this statute is patterned after the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that the Legislature "anticipated our courts would be guided by the interpretation given by the federal courts to the corresponding federal statutes. RCW 19.86.920." Ballo v. James S. Black Co., 39 Wash. App. 21, 692 P.2d 182 (1984).

[5] In Jefferson Parish, the Court's analysis was premised on section 1 of the Sherman Act. It is well to remember that in the instant case, the Court is examining an attempted exclusive dealing as it relates to Washington law. In doing so, it is relying on federal cases relying on federal antitrust law, but an attempt at exclusive dealing would probably fall under section 2 of the Sherman Act dealing with attempted monopolization, rather than section 1 (contracts, combinations and conspiracies).

4. Plaintiff's Claim of an Attempt to Impose an Illegal Tying Arrangement in Violation of RCW 19.86.030 and RCW 19.86.090

CISSI contends that the agreement offered by USGI (Seattle and Portland exclusive and semi-exclusive dealerships) if [19] consummated would have constituted an illegal tying arrangement. Here again the Court is directed to RCW 19.86.090 governing refusals "to accede to a proposal for an arrangement which, if consummated, would be in violation of . . ." In this instance, CISSI points to RCW 19.86.030, which states as [*1396] follows: "Every contract, combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce is hereby declared unlawful."

Again the Court looks to federal law to define a tying arrangement:

> HN15[] A tying arrangement is "an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier." Northern Pacific RR. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514 (1958). Such an arrangement violates section 1 of the Sherman Act if the seller has "appreciable economic power" in the tying product market and if the arrangement affects a substantial volume of commerce in the tied market. Fortner Enterprises, Inc. v. United States Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495, 89 S. Ct. 1252 (1969). [20]

Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Services, Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265, 280 (1992). Here, the tying product is grid, and the tied product is board.

CISSI has offered no direct evidence (and defendants USGI denies that any exists) that USGI required CISSI to purchase board in order to gain access to grid. The only evidence is that USGI tried to make CISSI an exclusive distributor, and when that failed, withdrew the entire USGI product line.[6]

[21] HN16[] A manufacturer generally has the right to unilaterally refuse to deal. Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984). The refusal to deal with third parties conditioned on failure to purchase other goods or services, however, is not a unilateral refusal. Kodak, 119 L. Ed. 2d at 282 n.8. To establish an illegal tying arrangement [7] under section 2 of the Sherman Act, the Ninth Circuit requires plaintiff to demonstrate the following:

[6] The Kodak case, supra, was analyzed generally under section 1 (prohibition against contracts, combinations and conspiracies) and unlike this case involved a clear requirement that purchasers of Kodak duplicating machines, purchase Kodak services. Moreover, Kodak had prevented the supply of parts to non-Kodak service agencies. Thus there was an obvious tying arrangement. The issue remanded on the district court's grant of summary judgment, however, was whether or not the tying was illegal -- that is, that it was not justified by business reasons.

[7] Most of the cases refer to "per se" illegal tying arrangement, but not all tying arrangements are declared illegal. In her concurring opinion in Jefferson, supra, Justice O'Connor explained the history of this apparent anomaly and argued for abandoning the per se label:

> Some of our earlier cases did indeed declare that tying arrangements serve "hardly any purpose beyond the suppression of competition." Standard Oil Company v. United States, 337 U.S. 293, 305-306, 93 L. Ed. 1371, 69 S. Ct. 1051 (1949) (dictum). However, this declaration was not taken literally even by the cases that purported to rely upon it. In practice, a tie has been illegal only if the seller is shown to have "sufficient economic power with respect to the tying product to appreciably restrain free competition in the market for the tied product . . ." Northern Pacific RR. Co., 356 U.S. at 6.

> (1) two distinct products or services are in fact tied such that the products are offered as a single package; (2) the defendant has sufficient economic power in the tying market to impose restrictions in the tied product market; (3) the amount of commerce in the tied product is not insubstantial.

General Business Systems v. North American Philips Corp., 699 F.2d 965, 977 (9th Cir.1983). Other cases have referred to additional elements, e.g., Airweld, Inc. v. Airco, Inc., 742 F.2d 1184, (9th Cir. 1984) (financial interest, [22] coercion); Betaseed, Inc. v. U & I Inc., 681 F.2d 1203, 1215 (9th Cir. 1982) ("there must be some modicum of coercion shown -- that is a showing of an onerous effect on an appreciable number of buyers").

[23] While there is evidence that USGI has a substantial share of the tying market (plaintiff alleges more than 50 percent in different geographic markets), there is no evidence that USGI has HN17[] substantial power in the tying market. Substantial power is the ability to "raise prices or to require purchasers to accept burdensome terms that could not be enacted in a completely competitive [*1397] market." General Business Systems, 699 F.2d at 977, (citing U.S. Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enterprises, 429 U.S. 610, 620, 51 L. Ed. 2d 80, 97 S. Ct. 861 (1977) (Fortner II)). Similar statements are made in Kodak, supra, 112 S. Ct. at 2981, "the ability of single seller to raise price and restrict output". Here there is no evidence that USGI possessed such power. Rather, the evidence indicates a very competitive market. As noted above USGI's prices for grid increased at a lower rate than inflation, and customers indicate that they would switch to other products if the prices went up.

This Court concludes that the exclusive dealership offered by USGI would not have been a tying arrangement [24] if consummated. As an alternative basis for dismissing CISSI's claim of illegal tying, the Court concludes that USGI did not have sufficient economic power in the tying market to impose its own terms. CISSI's tying claim is thus dismissed.

THEREFORE, defendant USGI's motion for partial summary judgment is GRANTED IN PART: plaintiff CISSI's antitrust claims under federal and state law are DISMISSED, and plaintiff's claim for breach of contract related to events occurring more than three years prior to filing are DISMISSED.

The Clerk of the Court is directed to send copies of this Order to all counsel of record.

DATED this 28 day of April, 1993.

CAROLYN R. DIMMICK

United States District Judge

ORDER ON RECONSIDERATION

On motion of plaintiff Ceiling and Interior Systems Supply, Inc., the Court reconsidered its Order of April 28, 1993, granting partial summary judgment. After full consideration of the briefs filed by counsel and the record as a whole, the Court declines to vacate its prior Order.

Plaintiff has pointed to a factual error in the April 28 Order: at page 1391, the Order refers to continuation of the distributorship with CISSI in Boise and Spokane, whereas the distributorships continued in Idaho and Montana. This factual discrepancy is not material to the Court's decision. Nor is the Court's categorization of the USGI offer as an "exclusive dealership" at pages 1394 and 1396 material to the decision. This was an offer to sell all USGI products conditioned on discontinuance of the sale of Armstrong products. CISSI's refusal resulted in USGI withdrawing its products for sale elsewhere.

This Court is not persuaded that its prior legal conclusions were faulty, but recognizes the complexity of the issues before it. The Court is also persuaded that its grant of partial summary judgment should be entered as a final judgment pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 54(b), there being no just reason for delay.

THEREFORE, the Court affirms its grant of partial summary judgment April 28, 1993, and directs the clerk to enter judgment accordingly, dismissing plaintiff's claims for breach of contract related to events occurring more than three years prior to filing suit and dismissing plaintiff's antitrust claims under federal and state law.

A court should grant a motion for summary judgment where there exists no genuine issues of material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). The mere existence of some alleged factual dispute is not sufficient to defeat a motion for summary judgment. Rather, such a motion may only be defeated if there exists a genuine issue of material fact. A material fact is one which might affect the outcome of the case under the governing law.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c) limits the information that the court may consider in making its determination on a summary judgment motion. The court is limited to reviewing the pleadings, affidavits, depositions, answers to interrogatories and admissions on file.

HN4[] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

The initial burden of informing the court of the basis for the motion rests with the moving party. In satisfying this burden, the movant must demonstrate that there is no evidence to support the non-movant's case on which that party bears the burden of proof at trial. Should the movant satisfy this burden, the burden then shifts to the non-movant to demonstrate the existence of a genuine issue of material fact. The non-movant must make a preliminary showing establishing all elements of its case on which it would bear the burden of proof at trial. The non-movant must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. Speculation, conclusory allegations and mere denials are insufficient to raise genuine issues of fact. To avoid summary judgment, the nonmovant must present sufficient evidence such that a jury could return a verdict in its favor.

HN5[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Genuine Disputes

In the context of a claim brought under the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., the Supreme Court holds that, to survive a summary judgment motion, a plaintiff must establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the defendants entered into an illegal conspiracy that caused plaintiff to suffer cognizable injury, and that such conspiracy resulted in actual "antitrust injury." Such a conspiracy is not generally susceptible of direct proof, but is generally proven through circumstantial evidence in the form of inferences drawn from the words and conduct of the parties to the alleged agreement and from their course of dealing. Conduct that may be viewed as either permissible competition or an illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy.

HN6[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

To survive a motion for summary judgment, a plaintiff must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently. The plaintiff must proffer direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.

HN7[] Justiciability, Standing

Generally, whether a plaintiff has standing to bring a lawsuit is determined by whether there exists a "case or controversy." In the context of an antitrust action, courts must engage in an analysis of prudential considerations aimed at preserving the effective enforcement of antitrust laws in determining whether standing exists.

HN9[] Clayton Act, Claims

A two-pronged test has evolved for the determination of whether a particular plaintiff is the proper party to enforce a claim under Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15 (Clayton Act). First, the court must determine whether the plaintiff has suffered actual "antitrust injury" at the hands of the defendant. Second, the court must determine whether the plaintiff is an efficient enforcer of the antitrust laws. Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides that any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust law is entitled to treble damages.

HN10[] Remedies, Damages

Under section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 26 (Clayton Act), a plaintiff need only establish "threatened" loss or damage, rather than actual loss or damage, in establishing a violation under this section. As a result of these differences, the standing requirement for a section 16 claim is somewhat less demanding: courts are less concerned about whether a plaintiff is an efficient enforcer of the antitrust laws. However, as under section 4, for section 16 injunctive relief, a plaintiff still must allege "antitrust injury" (in the form of threatened loss or damage) as well as the defendant's causal responsibility for that injury. Under section 16 of the Clayton Act, private parties threatened with loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws may seek injunctive relief.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN11[] Private Actions, Remedies

The United States Supreme Court describes antitrust injury as the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendant's acts unlawful. It should reflect the anti-competitive effect either of the violation or of anti-competitive acts made possible by the violation. It should, in short, be the type of loss that the claimed violations would likely cause. Proof of an unlawful purpose or an anti-competitive effect will satisfy this requirement of antitrust injury due to the fact that competitors may be unable to prove antitrust injury before they are actually driven from the market, thereby lessening competition.

HN13[] Sherman Act, Claims

In order to establish a violation of section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., a plaintiff must prove (1) the existence of a contract, combination or conspiracy among the defendants; and (2) an unreasonable restraint of trade.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq. does not reach conduct that is "wholly unilateral." Rather, there must be concerted activity, which contemplates the agreement of two or more persons or legal entities. Thus, a parent corporation is not legally capable of conspiring with its unincorporated division, its wholly-owned subsidiary or its affiliated corporations for antitrust purposes, because they have a complete unity of interest. Likewise, officers, directors and employees of a single corporation cannot conspire with each other or with the corporation itself for antitrust purposes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Facilities

HN15[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

A court should not foreclose an antitrust claim of conspiracy on the basis of the professional titles of the alleged conspirators alone, but rather must analyze their roles in relation to one another in the context of the alleged antitrust violation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > General Overview

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Facilities

HN16[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

In the context of an antitrust violation, the doctrine of "conscious parallelism" provides that when two or more competitors act separately but in a parallel fashion, the court can conclude that they acted in a concerted manner. In order to establish such a cause of action, a party must typically prove the existence of certain factors, known as "plus factors," which indicate that the allegedly wrongful conduct of the defendants was conscious, rather than the result of independent business decisions of the parties.

HN17[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Plus factors have been found where the alleged action was contrary to the self-interest of any actor who engaged in the action alone. A plus factor has also been found were a plaintiff has proven a high level of inter-firm communications between allegedly culpable parties. However, the mere presence of one or more of these "plus factors" does not necessarily mandate the conclusion that there was an illegal conspiracy between the parties, for a court may still conclude, based upon the evidence before it, that the defendants acted independently of one another, and not in violation of the antitrust laws.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

HN18[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Even if a plaintiff demonstrates that there was a conspiracy which violated the antitrust laws, he is still required to demonstrate that the purpose or effect of the alleged conspiracy constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade resulting in his antitrust injury. The United States Supreme Court has fashioned two tests for courts to utilize in determining whether a restraint on competition is "unreasonable " and therefore violative of the antitrust laws: (A) the per se test of illegality; and (B) the "rule of reason" test.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN19[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

When utilizing the per se test of illegality, the court must analyze the nature of the agreement in order to determine whether it always impacts the market in an anti-competitive manner and has no pro-competitive effect whatsoever. Under this analysis, a plaintiff may prevail even if he fails to prove market power on the part of the defendants. A plaintiff who seeks application of the per se analysis must demonstrate that the challenged activity will likely have predominantly anti-competitive effects.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN20[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Regarding the rule of reason test, the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > General Overview

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN21[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

The rule of reason test requires a case-by-case analysis in which the fact finder weighs all of the evidence before it to determine whether there is an unreasonable restraint of trade. The fact finder must balance the pro-competitive and anti-competitive effects of any restraint on the market to determine its reasonableness.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN22[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Using the rule of reason test, a plaintiff is required to show that the challenged restraint of trade had an adverse impact upon competition in the relevant market. In the context of an alleged antitrust violation, the relevant market is comprised of the relevant product and geographic markets.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN23[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The relevant geographic market when using the rule or reason test, is the geographic area in which there is effective competition in the sale and distribution of particular products or services, and in which persons or entities actually do, or potentially can, compete in the conduct of their business operations.

MEMORANDUM-DECISION AND ORDER

I. Background

Plaintiff Lee A. Balaklaw ("Balaklaw") commenced this action on June 26, 1992. On July 16, 1992, defendant Cortland Memorial Hospital (the "Hospital") moved to dismiss this complaint, and on August 4, 1992, plaintiff moved for a preliminary injunction. Following oral argument on August 28, 1992 in Albany, New York, the Hospital's motion to dismiss was denied and plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction was held in abeyance pending a hearing regarding same. This hearing was conducted on October 5 and 6, 1992. Thereafter, in its Memorandum-Decision and Order filed October [2] 16, 1992, this court denied plaintiff's application for a preliminary injunction based upon the court's determination that the plaintiff failed to demonstrate irreparable harm.

Magistrate Judge Gustave J. DiBianco granted plaintiff's motion to amend his complaint, and on December 11, 1992 Balaklaw filed an amended complaint in this action.

On January 20, 1992, the defendants filed the instant motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's amended complaint. In their motions, the defendants allege that the plaintiff lacks standing to bring this lawsuit and that there is insufficient evidence to support a claimed violation of the Sherman Act. The following day, the plaintiff filed a motion for partial summary judgment on the issue of liability. Oral argument on these motions was heard on February 11, 1992. [1]

[3] II. The Pleadings

The plaintiff's amended complaint asserts two causes of action under section 1 of the Sherman Act. [2] Balaklaw's first cause of action alleges that the defendants engaged in a group boycott of the plaintiff. His second cause of action alleges that the defendants violated the Sherman antitrust act by entering into an exclusive dealing arrangement whereby the defendants, Dr. Delf O. King ("Dr. King"), and a group of anesthesiologists affiliated with Dr. King (the "King Group") agreed to provide anesthetic and related services to the Hospital. Plaintiff's complaint [*896] seeks treble damages, and declaratory and injunctive relief for the "threatened and continued injuries to his business, property, trade and profession caused by the defendants' group boycott and conspiracy to deprive [him] of reasonable, fair, equal and full access to the exercise of professional and clinical staff privileges at CORTLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL, INC. and elsewhere . . . ." Amended complaint at P 2.

[4] Defendants deny the principle allegations contained in this complaint, and have interposed six affirmative defenses in their answer. Defendants contend that (i) plaintiff has failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted under Section 1 of the Sherman Act; (ii) the actions of which the plaintiff complains are not violative of the Sherman Act; (iii) plaintiff has not suffered any antitrust injury within the meaning of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and thereby lacks standing to bring this lawsuit; (iv) the amended complaint alleges insufficient facts to establish a horizontal group boycott and therefore does not state a claim of per se violation under Section 1 of the Sherman Act; (v) the decisions and actions of the defendants were in furtherance of legitimate institutional objectives; and (vi) plaintiff is estopped from bringing this lawsuit due to his endorsement of the concept of an exclusive contract for the provision of anesthesia services at the Hospital and his participation in the Request for Proposal process. See answer at PP 38-43.

III. Discussion

A. Standard for resolving motions for summary judgment.

Before discussing the merits of the motions [5] before the court, it is instructive to review the standard this court must apply in resolving same.

HN2[] A court should grant a motion for summary judgment where there exists no genuine issues of material fact and the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c); Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 247-48, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 2510, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). The mere existence of some alleged factual dispute is not sufficient to defeat a motion for summary judgment. Id. Rather, such a motion may only be defeated if there exists a genuine issue of material fact. Id. at 248, 106 S. Ct. at 2510, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202. A material fact is one which might affect the outcome of the case under the governing law. Id.

HN3[] Rule 56 limits the information that the court may consider in making its determination on a summary judgment motion. The court is limited to reviewing the pleadings, affidavits, depositions, answers to interrogatories and admissions on file. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). Additionally, the movant's uncontested assertions in [6] its Local Rule 10j statement are deemed admitted for purposes the court's determination on the summary judgment motion.

[1] In evaluating the merits of these motions, this court also considered the papers submitted by the Hospital Association of the State of New York, the New York State Society of Anesthesiologists and the Medical Society of the State of New York, which were granted permission to file amicus curiae briefs in this action.

[2] HN1[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, provides, in pertinent part:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal.

HN4[] The initial burden of informing the court of the basis for the motion rests with the moving party. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 2558, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). In satisfying this burden, the movant must demonstrate that there is no evidence to support the non-movant's case on which that party bears the burden of proof at trial. Id. Should the movant satisfy this burden, the burden then shifts to the non-movant to demonstrate the existence of a genuine issue of material fact. The non-movant must make a preliminary showing establishing all elements of its case on which it would bear the burden of proof at trial. Id. at 322, 106 S. Ct. at 2552, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265. The non-movant must do more than "simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material [7] facts. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 1356, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). Speculation, conclusory allegations and mere denials are insufficient to raise genuine issues of fact. To avoid summary judgment, the nonmovant must present sufficient evidence such that a jury could return a verdict in its favor. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. at 248, 106 S. Ct. at 2510, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202.

HN5[] In the context of a claim brought under the Sherman Act, the Supreme Court has held that, to survive a summary judgment [*897] motion, a plaintiff "must establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the [defendants] entered into an illegal conspiracy that caused [plaintiff] to suffer cognizable injury," Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. at 585-86, 106 S. Ct. at 1355, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, and that such conspiracy resulted in actual "antitrust injury." Id. at 586, 106 S. Ct. at 1355, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538. [8] Such a conspiracy is not generally susceptible of direct proof, but is generally proven through circumstantial evidence in the form of inferences drawn from the words and conduct of the parties to the alleged agreement and from their course of dealing. See Norfolk Monument Co. v. Woodlawn Memorial Gardens, Inc., 394 U.S. 700, 704, 89 S. Ct. 1391, 1393, 22 L. Ed. 2d 658 (1969); American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 809-10, 66 S. Ct. 1125, 1138-39, 90 L. Ed. 1575 (1946). Conduct that may be viewed as either permissible competition or an illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy. Matsushita Elec. Indus Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. at 588, 106 S. Ct. at 1356, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (citing Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 1470, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984)); see also Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. , , 112 S. Ct. 2072, 2083, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992). [9] HN6[] To survive a motion for summary judgment, a plaintiff must present evidence "that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. at 588, 106 S. Ct. at 1356, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (quoting Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. at 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1471, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775); H.L. Hayden Co. of N.Y., Inc. v. Siemens Medical Sys., Inc., 879 F.2d 1005, 1013 (2d Cir. 1989). The plaintiff must proffer direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective. Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. at 768, 104 S. Ct. at 1473, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775; H.L. Hayden Co. of N.Y., Inc. v. Siemens Medical Sys., Inc., 879 F.2d at 1013.

Before reaching the issue of whether there is a genuine issue of material fact on any of the elements of plaintiff's Sherman Act claim, [10] the court must ascertain whether this plaintiff has standing to bring his antitrust claims.

B. Defendants' motion for summary judgment based upon lack of standing.

HN7[] Generally, whether a plaintiff has standing to bring a lawsuit is determined by whether there exists a "case or controversy." See Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 94-101, 88 S. Ct. 1942, 1949-53, 20 L. Ed. 2d 947 (1968). In the context of an antitrust action, courts must engage in "an analysis of prudential considerations aimed at preserving the effective enforcement of antitrust laws" in determining whether standing exists. Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d 1438, 1448 (11th Cir. 1991); see also Associated Gen. Contractors of Cal., Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 535, n.31, 103 S. Ct. 897, 907 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983).

HN8[] Sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 & 26, set forth the remedies available for a claimed violation of the Sherman Act. The relief available through § 16 of the Clayton [11] Act differs from that afforded through § 4.

HN9[] A two-pronged test has evolved for the determination of whether a particular plaintiff is the proper party to enforce a claim under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. First, the court must determine whether the plaintiff has suffered actual "antitrust injury" at the hands of the defendant. Second, the court must determine whether the plaintiff is an efficient enforcer of the antitrust laws. [3] [*898] See Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d at 1449 (citing Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colo., Inc., 479 U.S. at 110 n.5, 107 S. Ct. at 489 n.5, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427); see also Trepel v. Pontiac Osteopathic Hosp., 599 F. Supp. 1484, 1493 (E.D. Mich. 1984), aff'd, 780 F.2d 1023 (6th Cir. 1985). Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides that "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust law" is entitled to treble damages.

Under section 16 of this Act, a plaintiff need only establish "threatened" loss or damage, rather than actual loss or damage, in establishing a violation under this section. See Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colo., Inc., 479 U.S. at 111, 107 S. Ct. at 489-90, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427. As a result of these differences, the standing requirement for a section 16 claim is somewhat less demanding: courts are less concerned about whether a plaintiff is an efficient enforcer of the antitrust laws. Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d at 1452. However, as under section 4, for section 16 injunctive relief, a plaintiff still must allege "antitrust injury" (in the form of threatened loss or damage) as well as the defendant's causal responsibility for that injury. Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colo., Inc., 479 U.S. at 111-13, 107 S. Ct. at 490-91, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427. Under section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 26, private parties "threatened [with] loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws" may seek injunctive relief.

In Brunswick [13] Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., HN11[] the Supreme Court described antitrust injury as:

> Injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful. [It] should reflect the anti-competitive effect either of the violation or of anti-competitive acts made possible by the violation. It should, in short, be the type of loss that the claimed violations . . . would likely cause.

Id., 429 U.S. 477 at 489, 97 S. Ct. at 697, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701; see also Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 334, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 1889, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990). Proof of an unlawful purpose or an anti-competitive effect will satisfy this requirement of antitrust injury due to the fact that competitors may be unable to prove antitrust injury before they are actually driven from the market, thereby lessening competition. United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 436 n.13, 98 S. Ct. 2864, 2873 n.13, 57 L. Ed. 2d 854 (1978).

Prior to this lawsuit, Balaklaw [14] claims that he had an arrangement with the defendant Hospital whereby he and a group of fellow anesthesiologists would provide anesthesia services to the patients at the Hospital. After a period of time, the Hospital determined that it wished to enter into an exclusive contract with a group of doctors to provide the Hospital with anesthesia services. The Hospital solicited proposals from various physician groups, including a group headed by Balaklaw. A committee consisting of two members of the Board of Trustees, three members of the Medical Staff and two members of the administration of the Hospital interviewed four of these groups, including the group headed by the plaintiff. Since the defendants chose to enter into an exclusive contract for anesthesia services with a group other than one which included the plaintiff, Balaklaw claims he was effectively ousted from his practice at the Hospital.

Defendants contend that Balaklaw does not have standing to assert his claims alleging violations of the antitrust laws because his purported injuries are not "antitrust injuries" as this term has been interpreted by the courts in the context of Sherman Act claims. They claim that Balaklaw [15] was merely a "disappointed competitor" for the subject contract who may not seek redress for his alleged injuries under the antitrust laws. See generally Defendants' Memorandum of Law ("Def. Mem.") at 55-57.

[*899] The plaintiff contends that by terminating his de facto exclusive contract with the Hospital, the defendants deprived the plaintiff of the opportunity to compete in the relevant market and prevented the plaintiff from competing for the providing of services at the Hospital, thereby causing him antitrust injury. See Plaintiff's Memorandum of Law in Support of his Motion for Summary Judgment ("Pl. Mem.") at 46-47.

In considering the injuries and damages alleged by the plaintiff herein and based upon the evidence before the court, the court concludes that such injuries are not of the nature the antitrust laws were intended to prevent. The plaintiff does not claim that the Hospital's ability to enter into exclusive contracts for services violates antitrust laws. Rather, he claims that the manner in which he was ousted from his position at the Hospital and thus precluded from practicing his profession at the Hospital caused him antitrust injury. However, although the [16] plaintiff asserts that defendants' actions have had an anti-competitive impact on Balaklaw, this court, based upon the evidence before it, determines that his allegations of anti-competitive injury are, in reality, merely injury to the plaintiff of a personal nature. HN12[] While the plaintiff may have an action in tort as a result of the defendants' conduct, not all tort actions are actionable in antitrust. See, e.g., Robles v. Humana Hosp. Cartersville, 785 F. Supp. 989, 999 (N.D. Ga. 1992) (alleged harm was to individual doctor and not an antitrust injury); Capital Imaging Assoc., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Medical Assoc., Inc., 725 F. Supp. 669, 677 (N.D.N.Y. 1989) (plaintiff's radiology practice harmed by defendant's agreement with competitor not an antitrust injury); Trepel v. Pontiac Osteopathic Hosp., 599 F. Supp. at 1493 (causal connection between radiologist's loss of employment at hospital and intentional restraint of trade by hospital not an antitrust injury). [4]

[17] In short, the injury alleged by the plaintiff herein does not appear to this court to be the type of injury the antitrust laws were intended to prevent. Since plaintiff has failed to establish an "antitrust injury" within the meaning of that term, the plaintiff lacks standing to assert the antitrust claims alleged in his complaint and his lawsuit must be dismissed.

However, even if the plaintiff possessed the requisite standing to assert his claims, defendants' motion for summary judgment must nevertheless be granted because the plaintiff has failed to establish the substantive elements of his Sherman Act claims.

C. Defendants' summary judgment motion based upon grounds that there is insufficient evidence to support a Sherman Act claim.

HN13[] In order to establish a violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must prove (1) the existence of a contract, combination or conspiracy among the defendants; and (2) an unreasonable restraint of trade. Capital Imaging Assoc., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Medical Assoc., Inc., 725 F. Supp. at 676 (citation omitted).

1. Existence of a contract, combination or conspiracy.

[4] The court notes that Balaklaw's allegations regarding the "sham" nature of the due process hearing that was conducted prior to his ouster appear to the court to be more appropriate in the context of a breach of contract or intentional interference with contractual relations action, rather than an antitrust claim. See, e.g., Chuz v. St. Vincent's Hosp. & Medical Ctr., 186 A.D.2d 450, 589 N.Y.S.2d 17 (1st Dep't 1992); Saha v. Record, 177 A.D.2d 763, 575 N.Y.S.2d 986, 988 (3d Dep't 1991); Giannelli v. St. Vincent's Hosp. & Medical Ctr., 160 A.D.2d 227, 553 N.Y.S.2d 677 (1st Dep't 1990).

In order to determine whether the [18] plaintiff has sufficiently established that there was a contract, combination or conspiracy between the defendants to deprive Balaklaw of equal and full access to the exercise of professional and clinical staff privileges at the Hospital, this Court must initially review the allegations in Balaklaw's amended complaint. Plaintiff has summarized his assertions regarding the alleged group boycott and exclusive dealing conspiracy in this complaint as follows:

> (1) The defendants would invite proposals for an exclusive group anesthesia contract at the HOSPITAL and would rig the selection process to favor KING and his associates [*900] and block plaintiff from being the successful applicant. As part of their scheme, defendants would provide secret financial support to co-conspirator KING not offered to plaintiff.
> (2) After arranging for the award of the exclusive group anesthesia contract to co-conspirator KING, defendants would then insure that plaintiff . . . would not be permitted to continue to practice at the HOSPITAL or elsewhere through the use of sham Medical Staff Bylaw professional review and appeal proceedings to terminate plaintiff's clinical privileges and limit his staff [19] privileges as an attending physician, thereby preventing him from continuing to practice his profession at the HOSPITAL and damaging his ability to obtain hospital credentials elsewhere.

See amended complaint at P 40. [5]

The defendants assert that plaintiff's amended complaint has failed to assert a legally or factually cognizable conspiracy among the defendants herein. They contend that the conspiracy alleged by Balaklaw is between the Hospital and its medical staff, which defendants submit are but a single entity, and that a single entity is incapable of conspiring with itself. They also argue that even if this court finds that the antitrust laws do apply to the type of conspiracy alleged by plaintiff, Balaklaw has failed to establish sufficient facts to demonstrate that there existed any agreement, or conspiracy, to oust Balaklaw. See Def. Mem. at 24-44.

Plaintiff claims that there is ample evidence of a conspiracy on the part of the defendants to [20] deprive him of his alleged right to exercise professional and clinical staff privileges at the Hospital. Initially, Balaklaw claims that the Hospital and the members of its medical staff conspired together to injure the plaintiff. Secondly, plaintiff alleges that Dr. King and his group entered into a conspiracy with the Hospital to deprive Balaklaw of his rights. Finally, plaintiff contends that the defendants and Dr. King violated antitrust laws by engaging in "conscious parallelism." These arguments will be addressed seriatim.

HN14[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act does not reach conduct that is "wholly unilateral." Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 2740, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984). Rather, there must be concerted activity, which contemplates the agreement of two or more persons or legal entities. Brenner v. World Boxing Council, 675 F.2d 445, 451 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 835, 103 S. Ct. 79, 74 L. Ed. 2d 76 (1982).

Thus, a [21] parent corporation is not legally capable of conspiring with its unincorporated division, its wholly-owned subsidiary or its affiliated corporations for antitrust purposes, because they have a complete unity of interest. Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. at 771, 778, 104 S. Ct. at 2741, 2745, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628; Cohen v. Primerica Corp., 709 F. Supp. 63 (E.D.N.Y. 1989). Likewise, officers, directors and employees of a single corporation cannot conspire with each other or with the corporation itself for antitrust purposes. Id. at 769, 104 S. Ct. at 2740-41, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628; International Distribution Ctrs., Inc. v. Walsh Trucking Co., 812 F.2d 786, 793 n.5 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 482 U.S. 915, 107 S. Ct. 3188, 96 L. Ed. 2d 676 (1987).

In analyzing the allegations in plaintiff's amended complaint concerning the alleged conspiracy between the Hospital and the members of its Medical Staff, the court must determine whether they are separate entities or a single entity incapable of engaging [22] in a conspiratorial violation of the antitrust laws.

[5] See generally amended complaint, PP 21-39.

The Second Circuit has not yet addressed this issue. In the only case within this circuit which discusses this issue, the district court held that, in the appropriate factual setting, a hospital and members of its medical staff are legally capable of conspiring for Sherman Act purposes. Purgess v. Sharrock, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17057 at *6, 1992 WL 349683 at *6 n.7 (S.D.N.Y. 1992).

Turning to the Circuit law that exists on this issue, there is a split among the courts as to whether a hospital and members of its medical staff are a single entity for purposes [*901] of allegations claiming an antitrust conspiracy.

In Weiss v. York Hosp., 745 F.2d 786, 817 (3d Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1060, 105 S. Ct. 1777, 84 L. Ed. 2d 836 (1985), the Third Circuit held that "even where the medical staff has economic interests in competition with each other . . . the hospital cannot as a matter of law conspire with the medical staff." (emphasis added). Similarly, in Nurse Midwifery Assoc. v. Hibbett, 918 F.2d 605, 614-15 (6th Cir.), modified on [23] rehearing, 927 F.2d 904 (6th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. Nurse Midwifery Assoc. v. Hendersonville Community Hosp., U.S. , 112 S. Ct. 406, 116 L. Ed. 2d 355 (1991), the Sixth Circuit held that a hospital and its medical staff cannot conspire among one another since they are not competitors. Finally, the Fourth Circuit has held that a hospital is not legally capable of entering into a conspiracy with its medical staff in making peer review decisions. Oksanen v. Page Memorial Hosp., 945 F.2d 696, 703-05 (4th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, U.S. , 112 S. Ct. 973, 117 L. Ed. 2d 137 (1992).

However, both the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits have held that a hospital and its medical staff can enter into a conspiracy among one another. See Oltz v. St. Peter's Community Hosp., 861 F.2d 1440, 1450 (9th Cir. 1988); Bolt v. Halifax Hosp. Medical Ctr., 891 F.2d 810, 819 (11th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 924, 110 S. Ct. 1960, 109 L. Ed. 2d 322 (1990). [24]

In considering these conflicting authorities, the court finds that the more persuasive reasoning warrants the determination that HN15[] a court should not foreclose an antitrust claim of conspiracy on the basis of the professional titles of the alleged conspirators alone, but rather must analyze their roles in relation to one another in the context of the alleged antitrust violation. See McDonald, "Antitrust Conspiracies and Hospital Privileges: Keep It Simple or Keep It Stupid," 6 A.B.A. Antitrust Section's Antitrust Health Care Chron. 2-16 (1992); see also Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Corp., 467 U.S. at 772-74, 104 S. Ct. at 2742-43, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628; Okusami v. Psychiatric Inst. of Wash., Inc., 295 U.S. App. D.C. 58, 959 F.2d 1062, 1065 (D.C. Cir. 1992); Pudlo v. Adamski, 789 F. Supp. 247, 250-51 (N.D. Ill. 1992). Thus, this court must analyze both the structure and the conduct of the Hospital and its medical staff in order to determine whether they could have conspired to act in an anti-competitive fashion.

Cortland hospital has a three-part organizational structure. Its structure [25] consists of the Board of Trustees, the Medical Staff and the Hospital Administration. Defendants' Rule 10j Statement at P 5.

The Board of Trustees is the governing body of the Hospital and has overall responsibility regarding the Hospital's operations. It also establishes general institutional policies. The Board insures that the Hospital complies with state and federal laws and regulations and is accountable for the quality of health care services rendered to its patients. See Def. Mem. at 1 (citing State Hospital Code, 10 N.Y.C.R.R. § 405.2). Ultimate decisions regarding Medical Staff membership, clinical privileges and services rendered within the institution are made by the Board of Trustees. See Def. Mem. at 3; Defendants' Rule 10j Statement at P 12.

The Medical Staff consists of both individual physicians and health care professionals. Most of the physicians on the Medical Staff are independent practitioners permitted to use the Hospital's facilities. The Medical Staff is responsible for examining and reviewing the credentials of applicants and current members of the Medical Staff, for monitoring the actions of Medical Staff members, for making recommendations [26] to the Board of Trustees regarding the provision of medical services at the institution, and, where necessary, for recommending "corrective action" that should be taken against an individual practitioner. See id. at 3 (citing 10 N.Y.C.R.R. §§ 405.4(a)(2), (3) & (4)). The Medical Staff must account to the Board of Trustees for the quality of care rendered at the Hospital. See id. at 2 (citing 10 N.Y.C.R.R. § 405.4(a)). It has its own set of bylaws which are approved by the Board of Trustees. Thus, while it is an independent body within the framework of the Hospital structure, its existence is validated by the Board of Trustees.

In light of this organizational structure, it appears to the court that Cortland hospital, the Medical Staff and the Board of Trustees are all components that comprise a single entity. Thus, [27] whether this decision was actually made by certain members of the medical staff, Cortland hospital's Board of Trustees, and/or the hospital's administration is irrelevant -- these entities comprise only one organization -- the Hospital. Thus, irrespective of any anti-competitive purpose or impact that such a decision may have had on the plaintiff herein, such conduct is not actionable under section 1 of the Sherman Act because the decision was "unilateral" and therefore not the product of a conspiracy between two separate groups. See, e.g., Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. at 761, 104 S. Ct. at 1469, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775.

Thus, on the facts before it, this court concludes that the Hospital, its Medical Staff and its members are not separate entities and are therefore not legally capable of entering into a conspiracy in violation of the Sherman Act.

(b) Alleged conspiracy between the defendants, Dr. King and his medical group.

The plaintiff also contends that Dr. King and his group were co-conspirators regarding the awarding of the anesthesiologist contract to the King Group, and that the Hospital and/or [28] its Medical Staff conspired with Dr. King and his group to oust plaintiff from his position at the Hospital. See Plaintiff's Memorandum of Law in Opposition at 21-29.

Plaintiff makes two general assertions regarding this aspect of his antitrust claim: (i) Dr. King and the defendants conspired to award the exclusive contract to the King Group and not to him; and (ii) Dr. King and the defendants conspired to preclude him membership in the King Group. Balaklaw bases these allegations on the fact that the Hospital and Dr. King entered into the exclusive contract with King's Group -- a group in which Balaklaw was denied membership -- and a letter written by the Hospital's President and the Chairman of the Board of Trustees which approved of the exclusive contract with the King Group. [6]

[29] Dr. King is an individual separate and apart from the Hospital's infrastructure and, as an anesthesiologist, is plainly a competitor of the plaintiff. However, the evidence proffered by the plaintiff does not tend to exclude the possibility that the defendants and/or Dr. King acted independently by either entering into the exclusive contract at the outset or denying the plaintiff membership in his group. Rather, the testimony heard by this court at the preliminary injunction hearing indicates that the defendants had a legitimate, business reason for entering into the subject contract. The King Group agreed to provide "second call" services for the Hospital -- services which were not provided under the agreement that existed between the Hospital and plaintiff's group. Moreover, the plaintiff was reputedly not permitted to join the King Group due to a conflict which exists between the plaintiff and various other members of the King Group, particularly the two certified registered nurse anesthetists, both of whom had previously been associated with the plaintiff. See Defendants' Exhibit 14 at [*903] 75. Thus, the facts before the court indicate that the conduct of the defendants [30] was as consistent with permissible competition as with an illegal conspiracy. See Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. at 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1471, 79 L. Ed. 2d

[6] The letter of December 5, 1991 which was jointly signed by Mr. Lovell as Hospital President and Mr. Wesley D. Stisser as Chairman of the Board of Trustees and addressed to the members of the Medical Staff, provided, in part, as follows:

> The Board of Trustees, in a specially held meeting on December 3, 1991, approved a resolution that directs the President of the Hospital to elicit proposals from anesthesiologists, both in our community and in a much broader geographic area. The intent of the Board of Trustees is to contract exclusively with one group to provide all anesthesia services at our Hospital. . . .
> After the group awarded the exclusive contract is in place, any other anesthesiologists now having privileges at the Hospital will be unable to utilize those privileges to provide anesthesia care at Cortland Memorial. . . .

(c) Plaintiff's claim of conscious parallelism.

Finally, plaintiff claims that the defendants, Dr. King and the King Group engaged in "conscious parallelism" in violating the alleged rights of the plaintiff.

HN16[] In the context of an antitrust violation, the doctrine of "conscious parallelism" provides that when two or more competitors act separately but in a parallel fashion, the court can conclude that they acted in a concerted manner. Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d at 1456 & n.30. [31] In order to establish such a cause of action, a party must typically prove the existence of certain factors, known as "plus factors," which indicate that the allegedly wrongful conduct of the defendants was conscious, rather than the result of independent business decisions of the parties. See id.; Theatre Enters. v. Paramount Film Distrib. Corp., 346 U.S. 537, 74 S. Ct. 257, 98 L. Ed. 273 (1954). HN17[] Plus factors have been found where the alleged action was contrary to the self-interest of any actor who engaged in the action alone. See Matsushita Elec. Indust. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538. A plus factor has also been found were a plaintiff has proven a high level of inter-firm communications between allegedly culpable parties. See Apex Oil Co. v. Di Mauro, 822 F.2d 246, 254 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 977, 108 S. Ct. 489, 98 L. Ed. 2d 487 (1987). However, the mere presence of one or more of these "plus factors" does not necessarily [32] mandate the conclusion that there was an illegal conspiracy between the parties, for a court may still conclude, based upon the evidence before it, that the defendants acted independently of one another, and not in violation of the antitrust laws. See Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. at 764, 104 S. Ct. at 1470, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775.

Balaklaw contends that the mere fact that the exclusive contract was executed by the parties herein establishes this conspiracy. Plaintiff argues that the Hospital lacked legitimate business reasons for offering financial subsidies to Dr. King and his group. He also claims that the meetings between Dr. King and members of the Hospital's Board of Directors demonstrated a high level of inter-firm communications between these parties which violated the antitrust laws.

However, since the Hospital and the King Group are not competitors, plaintiff may not prevail on his claim alleging conscious parallelism, which requires uniform business conduct on the part of competitors. Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d at 1456 ("conscious parallelism is [33] uniform business conduct by competitors that permits a court to infer the existence of a conspiracy between these competitors" (citing Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 221, 59 S. Ct. 467, 472, 83 L. Ed. 610 (1939).

Based upon the foregoing, this Court finds that the plaintiff has failed to establish sufficient evidence of a "contract, combination or conspiracy" on the part of the defendants.

2. Unreasonable restraint of trade.

HN18[] Even if the plaintiff had demonstrated that there was a conspiracy which violated the antitrust laws, he would still be required to demonstrate that the purpose or effect of the alleged conspiracy constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade resulting in his antitrust injury. See Capital Imaging Assoc., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Medical Assoc., Inc., 791 F.Supp at 964 (citing Oreck Corp. v. Whirlpool Corp., 579 F.2d 126, 133 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1083, 102 S. Ct. 639, 70 L. Ed. 2d 618 (1981)). The Supreme Court has fashioned two tests for courts [34] to utilize in determining whether a restraint on competition is "unreasonable [*904] " and therefore violative of the antitrust laws: (A) the per se test of illegality; and (B) the "rule of reason" test. See Arizona v. Maricopa County Medical Soc., 457 U.S. 332, 342-44, 102 S. Ct. 2466, 2472-73, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48 (1982).

HN19[] When utilizing the per se test of illegality, the court must analyze the nature of the agreement in order to determine whether it always impacts the market in an anti-competitive manner and has no pro-competitive effect whatsoever. Broadcast Music, Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting Sys., Inc., 441 U.S. 1, 19-20, 99 S. Ct. 1551, 1562-

63, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1979). Under this analysis, a plaintiff may prevail even if he fails to prove market power on the part of the defendants. FTC v. Superior Trial Lawyers Ass'n, 493 U.S. 411, 432-36, 110 S. Ct. 768, 780-81, 107 L. Ed. 2d 851 (1990). A plaintiff who seeks application of the per se analysis must demonstrate that the challenged activity will likely [35] have predominantly anti-competitive effects. Id.

With respect to the rule of reason test, in Chicago Bd. of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 38 S. Ct. 242, 62 L. Ed. 683, (1918), Justice Brandeis provided the classic discussion regarding this test. He noted that:

> HN20[] The court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

Id. at 238, 38 S. Ct. at 244, 62 L. Ed. 683; see also Arizona v. Maricopa County Medical Soc., 457 U.S. at 343 n.13, 102 S. Ct. at 2472 n.13, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48. [36] HN21[] The rule of reason test requires a case-by-case analysis in which the fact finder weighs all of the evidence before it to determine whether there is an unreasonable restraint of trade. Continental T. V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36 at 49, 97 S. Ct. 2549 at 2557, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977). The fact finder must balance the pro-competitive and anti-competitive effects of any restraint on the market to determine its reasonableness. United States Football League v. National Football League, 842 F.2d 1335, 1360 (2d Cir. 1988) (citing National Soc. of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 691 & n.17, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 1365 & n.17, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978)).

Based upon the evidence before it, this court concludes that plaintiff's claims must fail under either the per se or the rule of reason tests. Contrary to plaintiff's assertions, the evidence demonstrates that there was a legitimate basis for the change in anesthesia services at the Hospital. The King Group agreed to provide "second call" services for the Hospital -- services [37] which were not provided under the "de facto" contract that existed between the Hospital, the plaintiff and his group. The Hospital considered the provision of these services to be an important aspect of the subject contract. Thus, the agreement between the King Group and the Hospital did not impact the market in an anti-competitive manner. Rather, it fostered competition by awarding such contract to the organization that offered to provide the services needed by the Hospital at the lowest price. Thus, such conduct was not per se illegal.

HN22[] Turning to the rule of reason test, Balaklaw was required to show that the challenged restraint of trade had an adverse impact upon competition in the relevant market. Volvo N. Am. Corp. v. Men's Int'l Professional Tennis Council, 857 F.2d 55 at 73. In the context of an alleged antitrust violation, the relevant market is comprised of the relevant product and geographic markets. See Capital Imaging Assoc., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Medical Assoc., Inc., 791 F. Supp. 956 at 965.

HN23[] The relevant geographic market is the geographic area in which there is effective competition in the sale and distribution of particular products or services, and in which persons or entities actually do, or potentially can, compete in the conduct of their business operations. See United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 395, 76 S. Ct. 994, 1007, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956). In the present case, the relevant geographic market is the area where hospitals compete in offering services to patients or where anesthesiologists compete for positions with such hospitals. Purgess v. Sharrock, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17057 at *19, 1992 WL 349683 at *4 (citing Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 29, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 1567, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984).

The plaintiff claims that the relevant geographic market herein includes the cities [39] of Syracuse, Ithaca, Binghamton and Norwich, New York. Plaintiff claims that the Hospital has the majority of the market share for inpatient surgical cases in these cities. See amended complaint P 9.

The defendants contend that the relevant geographic market is nationwide because the Hospital's services may be provided on a nationwide basis. See Def. Mem. at 50 n.25, 54.

This court concludes that, insofar as the relevant product market is found to include the job market for anesthesia service positions, the relevant geographic market is nationwide. Indeed, the plaintiff himself raises the specter of a national market for his services in arguing that the actions of the defendants may preclude him from seeking alternative professional employment at any accredited hospital in the United States. See amended complaint at 44; Pl. Mem. at 9-10 & n.3.

Thus, for purposes of plaintiff's antitrust claims, based upon the evidence before it, this court finds the relevant product to be both the job market for anesthesia service positions and the market for anesthesia administered in connection with operating room services only, and the relevant geographic market to be nationwide.

[40] However, there is no evidence before the court which addresses the issue of whether the defendants' actions have foreclosed competition with respect to Balaklaw's employment in these markets. Therefore, this court cannot make any determination on the issue of the reasonableness, or unreasonableness, of the alleged restraint of trade in this case. Were the court not inclined to grant the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the grounds hereinbefore discussed, this court would require additional submissions from the parties on these issues. However, in light of the aforementioned findings, such submissions are not necessary.

D. Plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment.

In light of the determinations made above, plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment on the issue of liability is denied.

IV. Conclusion

The Court finds the plaintiff lacks the requisite standing to assert the subject claims under the Sherman act. The Court also finds that there is insufficient evidence of a "contract, combination or conspiracy" on the part of the defendants as required under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. For these reasons, the defendants' motion for summary judgment [41] as to both claims is granted. Additionally, due to the lack of evidence before it, this court is unable to determine whether, in considering the relevant product and geographic area, the defendants' actions constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade. However, in light of the foregoing, further submissions on this aspect of plaintiff's claims are unnecessary.

[*906] Plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment is denied.

INTRODUCTION

Presently [*2] before this Court are the following matters: (1) the motions of General Motors Corporation ("GM"), Volvo White Truck Corporation ("White"), and Volvo GM Heavy Truck Corporation ("VGM") for summary judgment pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 56; (2) the motions of defendants Berggren, Kaczmarek, and Gurley (the "individual defendants") to dismiss plaintiff's Complaint as against them for lack of personal jurisdiction pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(2); and (3) GM's objections to the Report and Recommendation of Hon. Edmund F. Maxwell, United States Magistrate Judge for the Western District of New York, recommending the denial of GM's motion for sanctions against plaintiff for failure to produce expert witness and damages information during discovery.

Plaintiff, Maier-Schule GMC, Inc., has filed a complaint alleging a number of federal and state statutory and state common law causes of action against these defendants. Essentially, these causes of action arise from GM's cancellation of plaintiff's "heavy duty truck addendum", and VGM's failure to award plaintiff a new dealership franchise. This Court has federal question jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, and jurisdiction over plaintiff's [*3] state law claims under this Court's supplemental jurisdiction, 28 U.S.C. § 1367.

Plaintiff possessed a franchise to distribute GM trucks in Western New York and Northern Pennsylvania. Moreover, plaintiff alleges that it had rights under light, medium, and heavy duty truck "addenda", which permitted plaintiff to distribute these individual grades of trucks. Plaintiff alleges that each addendum constituted a separate and distinct "franchise", as that term is defined in the Automobile Dealers' Day in Court Act[1] and the New York State Franchised Motor Vehicle Act.[2] Plaintiff charges that when GM and Volvo joined to create the joint venture VGM, they unlawfully conspired to terminate plaintiff's rights under the heavy duty addendum in bad faith, and to award a VGM franchise to a competing dealer, Buffalo Truck Sales & Service, Inc. ("Buffalo Truck"). Furthermore, plaintiff seeks to hold defendants jointly responsible for certain actions taken by GM in connection with GM's cancellation of the heavy duty addendum, and its provision of discounts on the sales of heavy duty trucks. Plaintiff asserts claims under the following statutes and common law causes of action: (1) the Franchise Act; (2) [*4] the Dealers' Act; (3) New York State General Business Law § 197; breach of contract; Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1; Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2; Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14; the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13; New York State General Business Law § 340 (the "Donnelly Act"); the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"), 18 U.S.C. § 1961 et seq.; the New York State Uniform Commercial Code, N.Y.U.C.C. § 2-306(2); interference with contractual relations; and tortious interference with advantageous business relations.

Defendants respond that they cannot be held jointly liable for the actions of one another. For example, VGM contends that it cannot be held responsible for GM's cancellation of the heavy duty addendum, and GM contends that it cannot be held responsible for VGM's failure to award plaintiff a VGM franchise to sell heavy duty trucks. White argues that it had [*5] no part in either of these decisions, and is therefore completely without liability.

Defendants further argue that the heavy duty addendum was not a separate and distinct franchise, but that it merely constituted a product line. They argue that the addendum was part of a Dealer's Sales and Service Agreement ("Agreement"), which enabled GM to discontinue product lines as it wished. In the alternative, they argue that GM acted in good faith in cancelling the heavy duty addendum, as an alternative to liquidation of its heavy duty truck facilities in the face of severe economic hardship. Moreover, defendants argue that each of plaintiff's claims must fail because plaintiff has failed properly to support its claims with admissible evidence in the record. They point to the dearth of citations to the record in plaintiff's responsive papers. They also maintain that plaintiff has failed to state causes of action under its various federal and state law claims.

Finally, defendants argue that summary judgment in their favor is warranted as to each of plaintiff's claims because plaintiff has failed to provide sufficient evidentiary support for its damage claims. On the same issue, GM objects to the [*6] Report and Recommendation of Magistrate Judge Maxwell denying its motion for sanctions against plaintiff for plaintiff's failure to produce expert witness and damages information.

The individual defendants argue that plaintiff's complaint must be dismissed as against them for this Court's lack of personal jurisdiction over them. They maintain that, according to the federal Constitution and New York State law, they cannot be subjected to this Court's jurisdiction because they do not have sufficient contacts with New York State, and they committed no tortious act in New York.

GM has submitted the following papers in support of its motion for summary judgment: a Notice of Motion for Summary Judgment ("GM Motion); a Memorandum of Law ("GM Memo") with an Appendix containing a number of affidavits; an Affidavit of Elmo Sergo ("Sergo Affid."); a Statement of Undisputed Material Facts ("GM Facts"); and a Reply Memorandum of Law ("GM Reply").

VGM has submitted the following papers in support of its motion for summary judgment: a Notice of Motion for Summary Judgment ("VGM Motion"); a Memorandum of Law ("VGM Memo"); an Affidavit of Kenneth Kaczmarek ("Kaczmarek Affid."); a Reply Memorandum of Law [*7] ("VGM Reply"); a Reply Affidavit of Kenneth Kaczmarek ("Kaczmarek Reply Affid."); a Combined Affidavit and Statement of Material Facts not in Dispute ("VGM Facts"); and a Reply Affidavit of Richard Wells ("Wells Affid."). VGM has also expressly incorporated the GM Reply into its own opposition papers (VGM Reply, p. 1).

White has submitted the following papers in support of its motion for summary judgment: a Notice of Motion for Summary Judgment ("White Motion"); an Affidavit of Marilyn Hochfield, Esq. ("Hochfield Affid."); and a Reply Memorandum of Law ("White Memo"). White has also expressly incorporated all of GM's and VGM's affidavits, statements, memoranda, and reply memoranda (White Reply, p. 1).

The individual defendants have submitted the following papers in support of their motion to dismiss plaintiff's Complaint: a Notice of Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff's Complaint ("Motion to Dismiss"); a Memorandum of Law ("Dismissal Memo"); an Affidavit of Kenneth Kaczmarek ("Kaczmarek Dismissal Affid."); an Affidavit of Thage Berggren ("Berggren Affid."); an Affidavit of Richard Gurley ("Gurley Affid."); a Reply Memorandum of Law ("Dismissal Reply Memo"); a Reply Affidavit of Kenneth Kaczmarek [*8] ("Kaczmarek Reply Affid."); an Affidavit of Deborah Karalunas ("Karalunas Affid."); and a Reply Affidavit of Richard Wells ("Wells Affid.").

Plaintiff has submitted the following papers in opposition to defendants' motions for summary judgment and to dismiss plaintiff's complaint: a Memorandum of Law ("P. Memo"); an Affidavit of F. James Kane, Esq. with exhibits ("Kane Affid."); a Statement in Response to GM's Claims of Undisputed Facts ("P. Facts"); and a Response to the Statement of Material Facts Submitted by Volvo GM Heavy Truck Corporation ("P. Response to VGM Facts"). Plaintiff has also purported to resubmit the following papers: its Memorandum of Law in Support of Plaintiff's Motion for Preliminary Injunction; its Memorandum of Law in Support of Plaintiff's Motion for Partial Summary Judgment; its Reply Memoranda of Law in Response to the Submissions of GM and VGM, the Memorandum of Plaintiff in Opposition to GM's Motion to Amend Order; the Statement of Material Facts submitted by Plaintiff dated May 17, 1990; the Affidavits of Nelson E. Schule sworn to December 10, 1987; and various excerpts from deposition testimony. This second set of papers were originally filed in connection [*9] with the many motions that have been made during the protracted course of this litigation.

This Court strongly discourages the practice employed here by plaintiff's counsel of "resubmitting" such a considerable number of documents, without winnowing out redundant or irrelevant portions. In this case, the previously-submitted papers are voluminous, and reiterate many of the arguments raised in plaintiff's latest memorandum. Moreover, although plaintiff's counsel refers to previous papers for "factual support", there is often no factual support to be found. This is inexcusable and professionally irresponsible. Nonetheless, this Court has taken an extraordinary amount of time to review all the "resubmitted" papers, due to the number and the complexity of the issues involved in this case. Some of this material was helpful; much of it was not.

In addition, this Court should note that plaintiff's counsel made it extremely difficult for this Court to find the admissible factual evidence that plaintiff believed precluded summary judgment for defendants. The failure properly to reference such evidence may well have been fatal to plaintiff's opposition, in light of Rule 56(e) and governing precedent. [*10] See, e.g., Frito-Lay, Inc. v. Willoughby, 863 F.2d 1029, 1034, 274 U.S. App. D.C. 340 (D.C.Cir. 1988). This difficulty could have been remedied by plaintiff's counsel simply by including an appendix containing and clearly indexing all affidavits, exhibits, documents, correspondence, and other factual material believed to support plaintiff's position, rather than referring to or incorporating by reference previously filed affidavits or exhibits.

For example, it took approximately one full working day for this Court to find the factual support for plaintiff's critical assertion that heavy duty truck sales and service accounted for approximately 49% of plaintiff's gross sales and 59% of plaintiff's gross profits. This evidence was buried away in papers pertaining to previous motions, and was not referenced in any of the papers relating to the present motions.

Nonetheless, this Court did draw a line at how far it would search for admissible evidence, in keeping with the principle that the Court is not bound to search the entire record for material issues of fact; rather, the burden is on the non-moving party to establish a genuine issue by designating specific facts. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 250, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 2511, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). [*11] For example, plaintiff's Memorandum refers to portions of the deposition of Nelson E. Schule that have never been made a part of the record or, if they have, are not attached to any memorandum or affidavit. This Court has refused to consider those portions as admissible evidence in support of plaintiff's claims.

For the reasons stated below, the motions of GM, VGM, and White will be Granted in part and Denied in part. The motions of the individual defendants to dismiss plaintiff's Complaint as against them will be Granted. Finally, GM's motion for sanctions against plaintiff will be Granted, insofar as plaintiff will be precluded from introducing evidence of damages at trial. In all other respects, this Court will affirm the Report and Recommendation of Magistrate Judge Maxwell, and GM's motion for other sanctions will be Denied.

FACTS

On July 28, 1985 plaintiff and GM executed a Dealer Sales and Service Agreement ("Agreement"), which became effective on November 1, 1985 (Sergo Affid., exh. B). The Agreement consisted of a two page contract, a booklet containing additional provisions that were incorporated into the contract, and various "addenda", including addenda for light, medium, [*12] and heavy duty trucks. The Agreement governed the relationship between plaintiff and GM during the times relevant to these motions (GM Facts, ¶ 9; P. Facts, ¶ 9; Sergo Affid., exh. B). The Agreement granted plaintiff the right to identify itself as an "authorized GMC Truck Dealer", and to use GM trade names and trademarks (GM Facts, ¶ 10; VGM Facts, ¶ 11 (c); P. Facts ¶ 10; Sergo Affid., exh. B). It also gave plaintiff the right to sell GM trucks and parts, and to perform authorized warranty and other service on GM trucks (Agreement, p. 1; P. Facts, ¶ 10). Paragraph 1.5 of the Agreement provided, "General Motors may discontinue any product at any time and its only obligation shall be to manufacture and deliver to Dealer accepted orders which Dealer does not elect to cancel." (Agreement, ¶ 1.5; GM Facts, ¶ 11; P. Facts, ¶ 11). The Agreement expired by its own terms on October 31, 1990 (Sergo Affid., exh. B).

The relevant addendum to the Agreement concerning heavy duty trucks ("heavy duty addendum") provided:

> Effective October 9, 1986, Dealer, as an authorized GMC Truck dealer, has a non-exclusive right to buy the following new Heavy Duty Truck Motor Vehicles marketed by GMC Truck Operation [*13] of General Motors Corporation:
> J8000 and J9500 Brigadier Models N9500 General Models
> D9500 Astro Models
> This Motor Vehicle Addendum shall remain in effect unless cancelled or until superseded by a new Motor Vehicle Addendum furnished by GMC Truck. This Motor Vehicle Addendum cancels and supersedes any previous Motor Vehicle Addendum furnished Dealer by GMC Truck.

(Agreement, p. 8; GM Facts, ¶ 12).

The term "heavy duty truck" refers to vehicles with a gross weight capacity over 33,000 pounds. Prior to 1986, GM manufactured and marketed four heavy duty truck models: the "Astro", "General", "Brigadier J-8000", and "Brigadier J-9500" (GM Facts, ¶ 1; P. Facts, ¶ 1).

By 1986, the market for heavy duty trucks in North America had become unprofitable for GM, due to increased competition, declining demand, and other economic factors. GM's market share in heavy duty trucks decreased approximately 50% between 1982 and 1985. GM's involvement in the heavy duty truck business became increasingly unprofitable, and GM suffered a loss of over $50 million in 1985 (GM Facts, ¶ 2; VGM Facts, ¶ 11(g), (h); P. Facts, ¶ 2). GM considered a number of options to improve its profitability. In Europe, GM liquidated [*14] its heavy duty truck operations. (GM Facts, ¶ 4; P. Facts, ¶ 4). In the United States, GM entered into a Stock Purchase Agreement with the Swedish company Aktiebolaget Volvo, Volvo Worth America Corporation, and Volvo Lastvagnar AB (together "Volvo"). The Stock Purchase Agreement provided that GM would convey to a newly-formed corporation a certain portion of its assets devoted to the production of heavy duty trucks, together with cash and other consideration. In exchange, GM would receive 24% of the new corporation's stock. The new corporation was VGM, which was a signatory to the Stock Purchase Agreement (GM Facts, ¶ 5; VGM Facts, ¶ 11(i); P. Facts, ¶ 5; Kane Affid., exh. A).

VGM was formed to manufacture and distribute heavy duty trucks in the United States. It was based upon the operations and assets of White, including its management, administrative structure, and manufacturing and distribution facilities. These were contributed by Volvo. (GM Facts, ¶ 6; VGM Facts, ¶ 11 (k), (l); P. Facts, ¶ 6). The Stock Purchase Agreement also provided that for a period of time after the creation of VGM, GM would continue to manufacture and sell the Brigadier model to VGM. The Stock Purchase [*15] Agreement stated:

> Until January 1, 1989, or such earlier time as [VGM] is able to begin manufacturing a successor to the GMC Brigadier Heavy Duty Truck, [GM] will continue to manufacture the GMC Brigadier in response to orders from [VGM] if, in the reasonable judgment of [GM], the volume of orders, at sales prices generally comparable to those in 1986, are sufficient to justify its doing so (based upon ability to cover variable costs, calculated in the manner then used generally throughout GM), and [VGM] will purchase those GMC Brigadiers from [GM].

(Stock Purchase Agreement, p. 25; VGM Facts, ¶ 11 (p)).

VGM is not a subsidiary of GM. According to the Stock Purchase Agreement, GM is excluded from the daily operations of VGM, which are under the control of Volvo. Volvo received 76% of the VGM stock. Seven of the ten members of VGM's board of directors were chosen by Volvo (GM Facts, ¶ 7; VGM Facts, ¶ 11(l); P. Facts, ¶ 7).

On August 14, 1986 plaintiff received correspondence from GM stating:

> It is contemplated that [VGM] will market current GMC models from GM's heavy duty truck assembly operation in Pontiac. The management of [VGM] will eventually determine which products will be built, [*16] and in what quantities, based on market demand. In any event, both White and GMC identification will be preserved and their market presence preserved. . . . GM light and medium duty truck operations are not included in [VGM].

(Schule February 1988 Affid., ¶ 4, exh. A).

On September 10, 1986, General Motors notified all GM truck dealers, including plaintiff, by letter that it had signed a non-binding memorandum of understanding with Volvo concerning the creation of VGM. The letter stated that "not every GMC truck dealer will be selected to be a part of the new joint venture." (GM Facts, ¶ 13; P. Facts, ¶ 13; Sergo Affid., exh. E). On November 7, 1986, each GM truck dealer with a heavy duty addendum was provided with a new motor vehicle addendum for heavy duty trucks. GM dealers were further notified that "General Motors Corporation will discontinue and will no longer distribute or market heavy duty trucks in the United States. Consequently, it is anticipated that the attached addendum will be cancelled no later than December 31, 1987." (GM Facts, ¶ 14; P. Facts, ¶ 14; Sergo Affid., exh. D).

On December 24, 1986, plaintiff was notified by letter, certified mail, return receipt requested, [*17] that on December 9, 1986 GM and Volvo had executed an agreement to form VGM, which was to begin its operations on January 1, 1987. One of the issues addressed in the letter was the selection of dealers to receive a new franchise from VGM. The letter stated that "while preference is being given for experience as a heavy duty truck dealer for GM Truck, Volvo or Volvo-White, it will not be possible for all current dealers to obtain a dealer agreement from the joint venture." The letter also stated that "as a result of the joint venture, GMC Truck will cease offering heavy duty truck products for sale in North America on December 31, 1987." (GM Facts, ¶ 15; P. Facts, ¶ 15; Sergo Affid., exh. C).

Pursuant to the Stock Purchase Agreement, VGM was to give preference to former GM and White truck dealers in awarding VGM franchises. VGM's initial evaluation of dealers was undertaken by a Steering Committee, which was comprised of three representatives from GM and three representatives from White. VGM possessed final authority over the selection of dealers for a new VGM franchise (GM Facts, ¶ 17; VGM Facts, ¶ 11(r); P. Facts, ¶ 17; Hochfield Affid., ¶ 5).

In the Buffalo area, plaintiff and Buffalo [*18] Truck were considered and evaluated for the award of a VGM franchise in the area (VGM Facts, ¶ 11(z), (aa)). Buffalo Truck sold and serviced Freightliner vehicles, as well as Volvo vehicles. Plaintiff sold and serviced Mercedes-Benz vehicles, as well as GM vehicles. Furthermore, plaintiff operated a Kenworth dealership in a separate facility that was adjacent to the GM facility. Buffalo Truck represented to the Steering Committee that it would be willing to lease a separate sales facility to handle its Freightliner business if it were to receive the VGM franchise. Plaintiff represented to the Steering Committee that it would be willing to terminate its Mercedes-Benz dealership if it were to receive the VGM franchise. Nevertheless, plaintiff represented that it would not eliminate its Kenworth facility. (GM Facts, ¶ 21; VGM Facts, ¶ 11 (d); Sergo Affid., exhibit F). On June 8, 1987 Leo St. Amour, a GM business manager, recommended to the Steering Committee that plaintiff receive the VGM franchise. (Sergo Affid., exhibit F). However, despite its many qualifications, plaintiff refused to discontinue its Kenworth business, and this was a decisive factor in awarding the VGM franchise to [*19] Buffalo Truck. (GM Facts, ¶ 21; VGM Facts, ¶ 11(v), (ee); Complaint, p. 12; P. Response to VGM Facts, ¶ (ff)).

On August 4, 1987 GM sent a ietter to plaintiff notifying it that it had not been selected to receive the VGM franchise (VGM Facts, ¶ 11(w); Kane Affid., exh. G). The letter was accompanied by an "acknowledgement" to be signed by plaintiff and returned to GM (Kane Affid., exh. G). The acknowledgement purported to be an offer by GM to buy back all new, unused, and unsold Brigadiers, Generals and Astros at a price equal to the net prices and charges paid to GM, to buy back tools used to service GM heavy duty trucks, and to provide other "assistance".

Both before and after the formation of VGM, the market for heavy duty trucks, both nationally and in Western New York, has been highly competitive, with a number of large manufacturers competing for sales. None of these manufacturers have possessed a dominant market share. For example, in 1986 five separate manufacturers (Ford, Freightliner, International Harvester, Mack, and Kenworth) had market shares that exceeded those of GM and White. Three manufacturers (Freightliner, International Harvester, and Mack) had market shares that [*20] exceeded those of GM and White combined. (GM Facts, ¶ 23; P. Facts, ¶ 23). Neither GM nor Volvo possessed significant market power in the United States market for heavy duty trucks prior to the Stock Purchase Agreement in 1986. Nor has VGM achieved anything near a dominant market share since that time.

GM, White, and VGM accounted for the following percentages of new truck registrations in the United States between 1986 and November 1991 (GM Facts, ¶ 24; VGM Facts, ¶ 11 (oo), (pp); P. Facts, ¶ 24):

	GMC	Volvo-White	Volvo-GM

GM's share of local sales has also been relatively small. In the local market,[3] GM, White, and VGM heavy duty truck market shares between 1986 and November 1991 were as follows (GM Facts, ¶ 25; P. Facts, ¶ 25):

ultimate purchaser of the truck, such as Ryder. CE was designed to make GM heavy trucks, [*21] such as the Brigadier, price competitive with other makes of heavy trucks.

Prior to 1987, GM did not make CE available for Brigadier truck sales to car hauler companies such as Ryder. In May 1987, GM began offering CE on Brigadier trucks ultimately supplied to Ryder. Plaintiff's three competitor dealers, Wink, Byers and General, supplied Brigadier trucks to Ryder in 1987. During 1987 plaintiff supplied no Brigadier trucks to Ryder.

DISCUSSION

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(c) provides in pertinent part that summary judgment is warranted where "there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and . . . the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law." Under the Rule, the moving party has the burden of showing that a genuine issue as to any material fact is absent. Adickes v. S.H. Kress and Co., 398 U.S. 144, 156, 90 S.Ct. 1598, 1608, 26 L. Ed. 2d 142 (1970). The evidence and the inferences drawn from the evidence must be "viewed in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion." id. at 158-59, 90 S.Ct. at 1609.

Once the moving party has properly supported his motion for summary judgment, the non-moving party must counter with "significant probative evidence tending to support [*22] the complaint." First National Bank of Arizona v. Cities Service Co., 391 U.S. 253, 290, 88 S.Ct. 1575, 1592, 20 L. Ed. 2d 569 (1968). However, a summary judgment motion will not be defeated merely on the basis of a "metaphysical doubt" about the facts, Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 1356, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986), "or on the basis of conjecture or surmise." Bryant v. Maffucci, 923 F.2d 979, 982 (2d Cir. 1991).

Rule 56(e) also provides that where the moving party makes a properly supported motion for summary judgment,

> . . . an adverse party may not rest upon the mere allegations or denials of the adverse party's pleading, but the adverse party's response, by affidavits or as otherwise provided in this rule, must set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. If the adverse party does not so respond, summary judgment, if appropriate, shall be entered against the adverse party.

It is also important to note in this case that Rule 56(e) also requires that affidavits opposing summary judgment > shall be made on personal knowledge, shall set forth such facts as would be admissible in evidence, and shall show affirmatively that the affiant is competent [*23] to testify to the matters stated therein. Sworn or certified copies of all papers or parts thereof referred to in an affidavit shall be attached thereto or served therewith.

Under the criteria articulated above, a district court "judge's function is not himself to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter but to determine whether there is a genuine issue for trial." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 249, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 2511, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). This Court has specifically noted that "courts should not be reluctant to grant summary judgment in appropriate cases since '[o]ne of the principal purposes of the summary judgment rule is to isolate and dispose of factually unsupported claims.'" Maier-Schule GMC, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 780 F. Supp. 984, 987 (W.D.N.Y. 1991) (quoting Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323-24, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 2553, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986)).

Applying the foregoing standard to the present facts, this Court finds that plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence to create the genuine issue of material fact of whether GM cancelled a franchise held by plaintiff without due [*24] cause, in contravention of the New York Franchise Act, N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(2)(d)(1). This statute provides that it shall be unlawful "[t]o terminate, cancel or refuse to renew the franchise of any franchised motor vehicle dealer except for due cause, regardless of the terms of the franchise." The central issue is whether GM terminated a "franchise" when it cancelled plaintiff's heavy duty addendum. The New York Franchise Act defines "franchise" as > . . . a written arrangement for a definite or indefinite period in which a manufacturer or distributor grants to a franchised motor vehicle dealer a license to use a trade name, service mark or related characteristic, and in which there is a community of interest in the marketing of motor vehicles or services related thereto at wholesale, retail, by lease or otherwise and/or pursuant to which a franchised motor vehicle dealer purchases and resells.

N.Y. Veh. & T. Law § 462(6).

Consideration of this issue must be guided by Arthur Glick Truck Sales, Inc. v. GMC, 865 F.2d 494 (2d Cir. 1989), in which the Second Circuit was presented with facts similar to those presented here. In Glick, the court reversed the district court's decision that [*25] the heavy duty addendum did not constitute a separate franchise for the purposes of § 463, and held that under certain circumstances the heavy duty addendum could be considered a separate franchise. The court explained that the district court failed properly to consider the following factors: (1) approximately 24% of Glick's gross profits as a dealer were derived from the sale and service of GM heavy duty trucks; (2) GM continued to manufacture the Brigadier iine of vehicles for VGM, and planned to do so until at least January 1, 1989;[6] (3) Glick had made an investment in parts and training service employees; and (4) Glick's heavy duty truck line was directed toward a distinct segment of the market. Therefore, the court held that Glick was entitled to further discovery, or a trial if necessary, to determine whether the heavy duty addendum constituted a distinct franchise. The court also provided some guidelines for such a determination, writing:

> Where a dealer has made an investment in parts and training service employees and where the line of trucks is functionally related to a distinct segment of the market, as heavy-duty trucks appear to be, and where their sale constitutes a substantial [*26] part of the dealer's revenues, it may be that the dealer has been given a "franchise."

Id. at 497. Furthermore, the court posed the rhetorical question, "Surely as to those eighty-five or so dealers who had only the heavy-duty truck line, that is a franchise. Should it be different for the dealers like Glick who carried the full line?" Id.

Defendants rely heavily on cases from other Circuits finding that the heavy duty addendum did not constitute a separate franchise. See, e.g., Central GMC. Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 946 F.2d 327 (4th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 503 U.S. 907, 112 S. Ct. 1265, 117 L. Ed. 2d 493 (1992) (GM entitled to discontinue production and marketing of trucks listed in heavy duty addendum because addendum not a franchise under Maryland statute). Nevertheless, after undertaking the analysis mandated by Glick, this Court concludes that trial is necessary to determine whether the heavy duty truck addendum constituted a franchise and, if so, whether it was wrongfully terminated by GM. Plaintiff has produced evidence that its heavy duty truck addendum was eliminated as of December [*27] 31, 1987 (Schule April 1990 Affid., ¶ 4; Kane Affid., exh. G).

Furthermore, plaintiff has produced evidence addressing the concerns that the Second Circuit raised in Glick. In Glick, the court was concerned that approximately 24% of Glide's gross profits as a dealer came from selling and servicing GM heavy duty trucks. Here, there is evidence that approximately 49% of plaintiff's gross sales and 59%

[6] The court also noted that the Brigadier line accounted for over 70% of GM's heavy duty truck sales in 1987.

of plaintiff's gross profits were derived from heavy duty truck sales and service (Schule April 1990 Affid., ¶ 5; Modaffari December 1987 Affid.).[7]

The Second Circuit was also concerned that Glick's territory for heavy duty trucks differed from its territory for light and medium duty trucks. In this case, [*29] plaintiff's territories were different as well (P. Memorandum of Law in Support of Plaintiff's Motion to Join Parties Plaintiff, exh. A).

Furthermore, Glick instructs that the district court should consider the fact that GM continued to produce the Brigadier model through December 1988. This fact is undisputed, and is contained in GM's own Memorandum and supporting affidavits (GM Memo., p. 25, n. 18; Sergo Affid., ¶ 18). If the addendum constituted a franchise under § 463, this fact raises the issue of whether GM terminated such franchise for due cause.[8]

Glick also expresses the Second Circuit's concern that where a dealer has made an investment in parts and training service employees, and where the heavy duty truck line was directed toward a distinct segment of the market, the heavy duty addendum may be considered a franchise. Here, plaintiff has adduced proof of both of [*30] these facts in Nelson Schule's December 1991 affidavit:

> There is a limited market for these trucks and repeat business is essential. This is a major purchase for most companies and individuals, these trucks selling for $40,000.00 and up. The truck must be in perfect working order when delivered. Parts must be readily available and service promptly and properly performed. The Maier-Schule name had been built up for over 35 years to represent quality and dependability in heavy duty trucks.

This information indicates that plaintiff has made an investment in the heavy duty truck line, and has directed its activities toward a distinct segment of the truck market. Glick holds that, under such circumstances, the heavy duty addendum may comprise a franchise under the New York Franchise Act.

The Second Circuit's primary concern in Glick was that the district court failed to look to the Act itself to determine whether the addendum was a franchise. After considering the statutory language and intent, this Court concludes that an issue of fact remains as to whether the addendum was a franchise. Section 460 expresses the legislative finding that regulation of motor vehicle franchises is necessary "to [*31] prevent frauds, impositions and other abuses upon [New York State] citizens and to protect and preserve the investments and properties of the citizens of [New York]." If the facts adduced by plaintiff are true, GM may have engaged in a type of activity that the statute was drafted to prevent. Furthermore, the statute defines "franchise" as including a "community of interest in the marketing of motor vehicles or services related thereto . . . Id. Glick indicates that such a community of interest may exist under the facts discussed above. The Second Circuit wrote:

[7] The Schule affidavit is attached to plaintiff's Notice of Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on plaintiff's Robinson-Patman Act claims, dated May 11, 1990, and has been incorporated by plaintiff in opposition to the present motion (P. Memo., p. 12). The Modaffari affidavit is referenced in plaintiff's opposition papers (P. Memo., p. 34).

Defendants argue that plaintiff has failed to produce evidence sufficient to rebut GM's evidence suggesting that in 1986, the last full year that plaintiff purchased trucks listed in the heavy duty addendum, heavy duty truck sales contributed less than 2% of plaintiff's gross sales, and approximately 2% of plaintiff's [*28] gross income (GM Reply, p. 20, Wiswall December 1987 Affid., exh.; Consolidated Affid., exh's. C & D). These same documents indicate that from January through October of 1987 heavy duty truck sales contributed less than 3% of plaintiff's gross sales, and approximately 2% of plaintiff's gross income. However, neither the documents nor the figures upon which defendants rely indicate the profit attributable to parts, or to warranty and non-warranty repairs performed by plaintiff on GM heavy duty trucks. Modaffari's affidavit does address income derived from warranty and other service on heavy duty trucks. Furthermore, there is some evidence that a low sales volume in the heavy duty truck line in late 1986 and 1987 may have been attributable to GM's failure to provide plaintiff with competitive equalization ("CE") during this period (Schule April 1990 Affid., ¶ 21). Therefore, the figures contained in Schule's and Modaffari's affidavits regarding the 49% and 59% figures are sufficient to create a material issue of fact for trial.

[8] See Glick at 498, where the Second Circuit noted, "Moreover, GM has not withdrawn completely from the heavy-duty truck business. It continues to manufacture the Brigadier, a successful product so far as appears on the state of this record. Indeed, it is more than just a share-holder in the joint venture with Volvo."

> But here there may have been a "community of interest in the marketing of" heavy-duty trucks and related services, [citation omitted]. There was a written arrangement for a definite period during which General Motors granted the Glick dealership a license to use its trade name, service mark, or a related characteristic. Heavy-duty trucks are a significant segment of the market, calling for a separate addendum to the Dealer Sales and Service Agreement. The heavy-duty truck Addendum itself says that it shall remain in effect "unless cancelled or until superseded by a new Motor Vehicle Addendum furnished Dealer by GMC Truck." Surely [*32] as to those eighty-five or so dealers who had only the heavy-duty truck line, that is a franchise. Should it be different for the dealers like Glick who carried the full line? It is significant, too that Glick's territory for the sale of heavy-duty trucks differed from its territory for other trucks.

Glick, 865 F.2d at 497. These are precisely the facts that operate in the present case. Therefore, plaintiff has raised a genuine issue whether the heavy duty addendum constituted a franchise under the Act.

GM exaggerates the significance of Central and other cases holding that the heavy duty addendum cannot be a franchise. Central expressly failed to address GM's continued manufacture of the Brigadier model, and was based primarily on economic considerations. See Central, 946 F.2d at 333, where the Fourth Circuit wrote, "We need not delve in this hornets' nest of charges and countercharges because to do so would only obscure the central point of the analysis: the cessation of production of heavy duty trucks was a legitimate, lawful reaction by GMC to unfavorable market conditions." This "purely economic" approach was specifically criticized in Glick, 865 F.2d at 497.

Finally, GM's attempt [*33] to distinguish this case from Glick because of its procedural posture is unsuccessful. GM argues that Glick was decided before the parties had the opportunity to engage in substantial discovery, whereas discovery has been completed in the present case (GM Memo., p. 24). However, it appears that both the district court and the Second Circuit in Glick were cognizant of the same set of operative facts present here. After considering such facts, this Court cannot say that plaintiff had no franchise in the heavy duty truck line, or that GM terminated any existing franchise for due cause. This is especially so in view of plaintiff's evidence that the heavy duty truck line constituted a significant proportion of plaintiff's business.

For these reasons, this Court holds that material issues of fact exist, precluding summary judgment for GM on plaintiff's cause of action under N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(2)(d)(1). This Court cannot say as a matter of law that the heavy duty addendum was not a franchise for the purpose of that statutory section, or that GM terminated any existing franchise for due cause. Freedman Truck Center v. GMC, 784 F.Supp. 167, 176 (D.N.J. 1992)(". . . it is a factual issue [*34] whether, in any given instance, termination of product lines will amount to termination of a franchise."). See also C-B Kenworth, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 706 F.Supp. 952 (D.Me. 1988), cited by the Second Circuit in Glick, and holding that the question of a separate franchise under the heavy duty addendum is a factual issue that cannot be resolved on documents submitted on a summary judgment motion.

Plaintiff also asserts claims against VGM and White under the Act, arguing that these defendants acted in concert with GM to terminate its heavy duty addendum and to deny it a new franchise. Specifically, plaintiff has produced evidence that VGM executed the Stock Purchase Agreement providing that GM would terminate all of its existing heavy duty dealers, and that three representatives of White sat on the VGM Steering Committee and recommended dealers to receive a new VGM franchise. VGM and White respond that because they were not parties to a franchise agreement with plaintiff they cannot be held liable under the Act.

Indeed, the Act was intended to provide a cause of action against defendants who are "franchisors" within the meaning of the statute. Section 463(2) begins, "It shall [*35] be unlawful for any franchisor. . . Section 462 defines "franchisor" as "any manufacturer, distributor, distributor branch or factory branch which enters into or is presently a party to a franchise with a franchised motor vehicle dealer."

Nevertheless, construction of § 463(2)(d)(1) can be expedited by reference to the statute's federal counterpart, the Dealers' Day in Court Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1221. As will be discussed below, VGM and White might be held liable as "manufacturers" under the Dealers' Act. Although § 463 refers to "franchisors" rather than "manufacturers", this Court finds that both statutory claims are susceptible to similar analysis, and that summary judgment is not warranted on either claim.

For these reasons, summary judgment will not be awarded to GM, VGM, or White on Count VI of plaintiff's Complaint.

The Commerce Clause

This Court is not persuaded by GM's argument that the New York Franchise Act is unconstitutional because it offends the Commerce Clause, U.S. Const, art. I, § 8, cl. 3, and that it is preempted by the federal Dealers' Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1221 et seq., according to the Supremacy Clause, U.S. Const, art. VI, cl. 2.

With respect to the Commerce Clause, this [*36] Court finds that requiring an automobile franchisor to compensate a franchisee for termination of a franchise without due cause would not unduly regulate or burden interstate commerce. See Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc.. 397 U.S. 137, 90 S.Ct. 844, 25 L. Ed. 2d 174 (1970); General Motors Corp, v. Gallo GMC Truck Sales, 711 F.Supp. 810, 819-20 (D.N.J. 1989).

With respect to the Supremacy Clause, this Court finds that: (1) Congress has not expressly preempted state law in this area of the law, Jones v. Rath Packing Co., 430 U.S. 519, 525, 97 S.Ct. 1305, 1309, 51 L. Ed. 2d 604 (1977); (2) Congress did not intend exclusive federal regulation of this area, Fidelity Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. De la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 153, 102 S.Ct. 3014, 3022, 73 L. Ed. 2d 664 (1982); and (3) there is no conflict between the federal and state statutes, Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Energy Resources Conservation & Dev. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 190, 204, 103 S.Ct. 1713, 1722, 75 L. Ed. 2d 752 (1983); Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142, 83 S.Ct. 1210, 1217-19, 10 L. Ed. 2d 248 (1963) (conflict exists where compliance with both federal and state statutes is impossible); Hines v. Davidowitz. 312 U.S. 52, 67, 61 S.Ct. 399, 404, 85 L. Ed. 581 (1941) (conflict exists where state law interferes with [*37] the "accomplishment and execution" of Congress' regulatory objectives").[9]

Plaintiff's Claims under § 463(2)(d)(1) Are Time Barred

Although this Court has determined that plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence that the heavy duty addendum constituted a separate and distinct franchise and that plaintiff's claims under N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(2)(d)(1) must stand, these claims must nevertheless be dismissed because plaintiff failed to meet the time requirements contained in § 463(2)(e). This section provides that upon receipt of a notice of franchise termination or cancellation, the franchisee has 120 days to seek review of the franchisor's decision in court. On December 24, 1986 GM notified plaintiff that GM would be discontinuing manufacture and [*38] sale of the vehicles listed in plaintiff's heavy duty truck addendum, effective December 31, 1987 (GM Facts, ¶ 15; P. Facts, ¶ 15; Sergo Affid., exh. C).[10] The notice, a certified letter, return-receipt requested, expressly provided that no assurances were being made that plaintiff would be chosen as a dealer for VGM. Accepting for the moment that plaintiff believed the heavy duty addendum constituted a distinct franchise, plaintiff must have realized at that point that the franchise was being terminated. Nelson Schule stated in deposition testimony that he realized upon receiving notice of the formation of the joint venture that GM would no longer be selling any heavy duty trucks to plaintiff after the joint venture began its operations, and realized there was a risk that plaintiff would not receive a VGM franchise (Schule Dep., pp. 96-97, 789[11]). Furthermore, Schule stated in his affidavit that he realized as early as June 4, 1987 that the VGM franchise would be offered to Buffalo Truck (pp. 150-152); yet plaintiff failed to take timely action and did not file its Complaint until December 7, 1987 (see also Schule Dep., p. 151).

Gallo GMC Truck Sales, 711 F.Supp. 810, 819-21 (D.N.J. 1989)*; Freedman Truck Center v. GMC, 784 F.Supp. 167, 174-75 (D.N.J. 1992)(agreeing with Gallo decision finding no preemption of New Jersey franchise act by federal Dealers' Act).

[10] See also, Complaint, p. 9, where plaintiff alleges, "Defendant [*39] GMC terminated Schule's class 8 truck franchise effective December 31, 1987 stating that same would 'expire' on that date even though same by its express terms did not expire until October 31, 1990" (emphasis added). Thus plaintiff recognized that the letter terminated the alleged franchise, yet failed to bring this action within 120 days.

This Court does not accept plaintiff's argument that the "termination" of the franchise did not occur until August 18, 1987, when plaintiff received official notice from VGM that plaintiff would not receive a new franchise. Plaintiff cannot extend its conspiracy theory to claim that the first letter had no effect without reference to the second. Even if there were a conspiracy involved, each of the documents is clear and unambiguous. The first letter clearly notified plaintiff that GM would cease marketing heavy duty trucks through plaintiff, and if plaintiff believed the heavy duty truck addendum was a franchise, it should have taken prompt action.

Finally, this Court does not accept plaintiff's argument that [*40] the filing period should not apply because representatives from GM told plaintiff it was a "shoo-in" for the VGM franchise (P. Memo., p. 27). Plaintiff refers this Court to no admissible evidence to support its argument.

For these reasons, summary judgment will be awarded to the moving defendants on Count VI of plaintiff's Complaint asserting a claim under N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(2)(d)(1).

This Court must now address plaintiff's claims under N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(2)(h) stemming from the extension of CE discounts on Brigadier trucks sold to Ryder in 1987. Although plaintiff's Complaint does not refer to the specific subsection in § 463 upon which it relies, plaintiff maintains that it is relying on § 463(2)(h), which makes it unlawful for an automobile manufacturer" [t]o sell or offer to sell any new motor vehicle to any person, except a distributor, at a lower actual price therefor than the actual price offered and charged to a franchised motor vehicle dealer for the same model vehicle similarly equipped or to utilize any device which results in such lesser actual price" (P. Memo., pp. 29-30). Although [*41] GM has produced evidence that the CE discounts were equally available to any dealer from whom Ryder would buy (Rossow Affid., ¶ 2), plaintiff has countered with evidence tending to show that GM denied plaintiff the same amount of CE discounts that were available through other dealers (e.g., Modaffari Dep., pp. 103-109). The Modaffari Deposition also contains information that GM delayed the award of CE to plaintiff (id., p. 101). There is also evidence that before 1987 plaintiff had been a major supplier to Ryder, but that in 1987 Ryder purchased trucks from Wink, Byers, and General, but not from plaintiff; this is circumstantial evidence that GM adversely affected plaintiff's relationship with Ryder through lower CE discounts. This evidence is sufficient to create the factual issue of whether GM "utilized any device" that resulted in a lesser actual price available to dealers other than plaintiff. See C-B Kenworth, 706 F.Supp. at 955 (evidence showing GM sold heavy duty trucks to one of plaintiff's competitors at below plaintiff's cost and then faulted plaintiff for falling short in sales created issue of whether GM violated Maine Motor Vehicle Dealer's Act).

It is also important to [*42] note that once plaintiff specified the statutory subsection upon which it is relying, that is, § 463(2)(h), GM did not take the opportunity in its reply memorandum to challenge the viability of plaintiff's claim under that section. GM only addressed § 463(2)(g) (GM Memo., pp. 34-37). Therefore, GM has provided no basis for dismissing plaintiff's claim under § 463(2)(h).

For these reasons, GM's motion for summary judgment must be denied insofar as it seeks dismissal of Count VI of plaintiff's Complaint alleging a claim under § 463(2)(h).

Although plaintiff maintains that VGM had some participation in the approval of CE discounts available to plaintiff, and refers to a notation on a CE approval form that one of plaintiff's requests for CE discounts was allegedly "reviewed with legal, the Joint Venture, Jack Kehl and John Rock" (Kane May 1990 Affid., exh. J), this curious notation is insufficient to impose liability upon VGM for GM's alleged differential award of CE discounts. Plaintiff has not introduced evidence indicating who wrote the notation, and has not otherwise explained the relevance of the notation. For instance, plaintiff does not indicate whether the notation was made before or after GM [*43] decided to deny plaintiff greater CE discounts. Nor does plaintiff indicate what type of "review" may have been undertaken by the Joint Venture. Therefore, plaintiff has failed to sustain its burden of proof on the issue of VGM's participation in any differential award of CE discounts. Plaintiff offers no additional evidence implicating White in the CE system. Although these defendants may be liable for lack of good faith in the termination or non-renewal of its heavy duty addendum because they executed the Stock Purchase Agreement and/or participated in the selection of a dealer to receive a new VGM franchise, the CE system is another matter. The award of CE discounts was not contemplated in the Stock Purchase Agreement, nor was any denial of CE discounts a foreseeable result of defendants' agreements. Plaintiff will not be allowed to extend the scope of its conspiracy theory to impose liability on VGM and White under this statute. See Meredith v. Art Metal Const. Co., 97 Misc. 69, 161 N.Y.S. 1 (1916), aff'd, 176 A.D. 945, 162 N.Y.S. 1131 (4th Dept. 1917) (conspirator liable for actions taken in furtherance and in accordance with the general plan of the conspiracy).

Therefore, summary judgment will [*44] be awarded to VGM and White on Count VI of plaintiff's Complaint alleging claims under § 463(2)(h).

Plaintiff's Claims Under the New York Franchise Act, N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(I)

In Count VI of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges a cause of action under N.Y. Veh. and Traf. Law § 463(I), which provides that it is unlawful for a franchisor to > . . . require a franchised motor vehicle dealer to assent to a release, assignment, novation, waiver, or estoppel which would relieve any person from liability imposed under this article, provided that this paragraph shall not be construed to prevent a franchised motor vehicle dealer from entering into a valid release or settlement agreement with a franchisor.

Plaintiff claims that GM required it to release GM from any potential liability arising from the termination of the heavy duty addendum, in exchange for certain termination assistance (see Kane Affid., exh. G).

New York's Vehicle and Traffic Law § 463(2)(o)(2) requires that upon termination of a franchise, the franchisor must repurchase certain equipment and inventory from the franchisee. The "termination assistance" described in Article 5 of the Dealer Sales and Service Agreement is essentially what [*45] is required by the statute. If the heavy duty addendum constituted a distinct franchise, it would have been unlawful for GM to have required plaintiff to execute a release in exchange for assistance that was required to be provided by law.

This Court is not persuaded by GM's argument that it did not "require" the release because plaintiff never executed it. The plain meaning of "require" is "to demand as necessary or essential." Webster's Third New International Dictionary 1929 (1986). Here, plaintiff has adduced evidence that GM demanded the release in exchange for termination assistance. If plaintiff proves that termination assistance was contingent upon the execution of the release, it will have proved that GM "required" the release. Therefore, summary judgment will not be awarded to GM on this claim.

Furthermore, the summary judgment motions of VGM and White will be denied. As discussed in relation to plaintiff's claims under § 463(2)(d)(1) and the federal Dealer's Act, these defendants may be liable for actions taken in connection with the termination of plaintiff's heavy duty addendum. Genuine issues of material fact exist regarding the scope of their knowledge of and participation [*46] in the decision to seek releases from GM franchisees in return for termination assistance.

Therefore, the moving defendants will not be awarded summary judgment on Count VI of plaintiff's Complaint asserting claims under § 463(I). See C-B Kenworth, 706 F.Supp. at 957 ("Plaintiff has generated a genuine issue of fact about whether and under what conditions it was offered compensation for the termination, or 'termination assistance'" under the Maine Motor Vehicle Dealer's Act).

Plaintiff's Claims under New York General Business Law § 197 et seq.

In Count V of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges that GM violated New York General Business Law § 197 et seq, when it cancelled plaintiff's heavy duty truck addendum.[12] Section 197 provided:

> No manufacturer or distributor, or any agent of such manufacturer or distributor, shall terminate any contract, agreement, or understanding or renewal thereof for the sale of new motor vehicles to a distributor, as the case may be, except for cause.

Section 197-a further required that the termination must be made in good faith

GM argues that because the Dealer Sales and Service Agreement itself remained in effect, GM cannot be held liable under this statute. Further, GM argues that, even if the heavy duty addendum constituted a separate "contract, agreement, or understanding," GM had good cause to terminate the addendum, and acted in good faith, for the reasons discussed in relation to plaintiff's claim under N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(2)(d)(1).

The same facts adduced by plaintiff in support of its claim under Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(2)(d)(1) raise the factual issue of whether the heavy duty addendum constituted a "contract, agreement, or understanding" pursuant to Gen. Bus. Law § 197, Likewise, plaintiff has introduced evidence calling into question the propriety of terminating the addendum and the manner in which the termination was executed. Plaintiff has submitted evidence that GM continued to manufacture the Brigadier model for the joint venture, that GM maintained a degree of control over the joint venture, that GM offered a lower CE discount to plaintiff than to other dealers, [*48] and that GM delayed plaintiff's CE application. Thus, "[p]laintiff has introduced sufficient evidentiary support to draw into question [GM's] continued production of heavy-duty trucks, and thereby to raise a genuine factual issue about whether [GM] had good cause, within the meaning of the statute, to terminate Plaintiff's heavy-duty truck addendum." C-B Kenworth, 706 F.Supp. at 956 (addressing the impact of the Maryland franchise statute on the termination of a heavy duty addendum). See also id. at 957 ("good faith" and "good cause" are factual issues for the jury to decide). Therefore, summary judgment on plaintiff's claim against GM under Gen. Bus. Law § 197 is unwarranted.

Summary judgment is also unwarranted on plaintiff's claims against VGM and White under § 197. As discussed in relation to plaintiff's claims under the New York Franchise Act and the federal Dealers' Act, these defendants may be liable for any wrongful termination of plaintiff's heavy duty addendum on the basis of a putative conspiracy. The language of § 197 parallels the language of the New York Franchise Act and dictates a similar result.

Lyon Ford, Inc. v. Ford Mkta. Corp., 337 F.Supp. 691 (E.D.N.Y. 1971), cited [*49] by defendants, does not change this result. In Lyon, the franchisee plaintiff alleged a conspiracy between the franchisor and another dealer to terminate plaintiff's franchise and award it to the other dealer. The court wrote, "The purpose of the conspiracy is alleged to have been to deprive plaintiff of its dealership and confer it on [the other dealer], a "favorite son" dealer of Ford Marketing Corporation and [another defendant], who is the district sales manager of Ford Marketing Corporation." Id. at 693. Despite plaintiff's conspiracy allegations, the court held, "The General Business Law does not grant a dealer a cause of action against a third party who is neither a manufacturer or distributor, and therefore does not give any rights against [the other dealer]." id.

In the present case, however, VGM and White were not plaintiff's competing dealers; rather, they are "manufacturers or distributors." And although they themselves were not signatories to a franchise agreement with plaintiff, they are alleged to have participated in a conspiracy to terminate plaintiff's dealership and deny plaintiff a new VGM franchise. Section 197 provides that a party may be liable as an "agent" of [*50] a manufacturer or distributor. In Sherman v. Leyland Motors, Ltd., 601 F.2d 429 (9th Cir. 1979), discussed below, the Ninth Circuit explained that, under the federal Dealers' Act, a putative conspiracy may supply the element of agency and extend liability over parties who conspire with an automobile franchisor to terminate a franchise in bad faith. Similarly, the element of agency may be supplied in the present case by VGM's and White's participation in the events surrounding the termination of plaintiff's heavy duty addendum. Consequently, a trial is necessary to determine whether their participation gave rise to liability under § 197.

For these reasons, defendants' motions for summary judgment on Count V of plaintiff's Complaint alleging violations of Gen. Bus. Law § 197 et seq, will be denied.

Plaintiff's Claims under the Federal Dealers' Act

In Count III of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges that the facts supporting its claim under N.Y. Veh. & Traf. Law § 463(I) also support its claims under the federal Dealers' Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1221 et seq. This statute provides:

> An automobile dealer may bring suit against any automobile manufacturer engaged in commerce, in any district court of the [*51] United States in the district in which said manufacturer resides, or is found, or has an agent, without respect to the amount in controversy, and shall recover the damages by him sustained and the cost of suit by reason of the failure of said automobile manufacturer from and after August 8, 1956 to act in good faith in performing or complying with any of the terms or provisions of the franchise, or in terminating, canceling, or not renewing the franchise with said dealer: Provided, that in any such suit the manufacturer shall not be barred from asserting in defense of any such action the failure of the dealer to act in good faith.

The Act defines "automobile manufacturer" as:

> . . . any person, partnership, corporation, association, or other form of business enterprise engaged in the manufacturing or assembling of passenger cars, trucks, or station wagons, including any person, partnership, or corporation which acts for and is under the control of such manufacturer or assembler in connection with the distribution of said automotive vehicles.

15 U.S.C. § 1221(a). Furthermore, the Act defines "good faith" as > . . . the duty of each party to any franchise . . . to act in a [*52] fair and equitable manner toward each other so as to guarantee the one party freedom from coercion, intimidation, or threats of coercion or intimidation from the other party.

The courts have interpreted the term "automobile manufacturer" narrowly, and have refused to extend liability to defendants that were not parties to the franchise agreement. For instance, in Stansifer v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 487 F.2d 59 (9th Cir. 1973), the plaintiff was an automobile dealer who entered into a written franchise agreement with defendant Fisher. The agreement provided that it would terminate automatically upon the termination of Fisher's distributorship agreement with its manufacturer, defendant Chrysler Motors Corporation. Fisher and Chrysler agreed to terminate their agreement, which automatically terminated plaintiff's franchise. Thereafter, Chrysler declined to award plaintiff a franchise for the sale of its automobiles. Plaintiff alleged that Fisher and Chrysler conspired wrongfully to terminate his dealership, in violation of § 1221.

The Ninth Circuit explained that a written franchise agreement is a prerequisite to recovery by a plaintiff automobile dealer from an automobile [*53] manufacturer. Id. at 63. The court held that because there was no written franchise agreement between Chrysler and plaintiff, plaintiff could not recover under § 1221. The court indicated that if plaintiff could somehow have shown that Fisher was a "straw man" or an agent of Chrysler, Fisher could have been considered a "manufacturer" for the purposes of the statute; however, the court found insufficient evidence on that theory to withstand summary judgment in favor of Chrysler. See also DeValk Lincoln Mercury, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 550 F.Supp. 1199 (N.D.Ill. 1982) (liability may be imposed on a non-signatory if the non-party was acting as an agent of signatory or was a "straw man"); and *Mar-Ren, Ltd. v. Ford Motor Co., 1987 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15291, 1988 WL 238039, 13 (W.D.Wis. 1987) (liability may exist against a non-signatory where non-signatory had a "unity of interest with, and was subject to the control of" signatory).

In Marquis v. Chrysler Corp., 577 F.2d 624 (1978), the Ninth Circuit elaborated on Stansifer, holding:

> . . . [T]here being no showing that would make either [defendant] responsible for the acts of the other on an agency theory, and the facts indicating that they are separate legal entities [*54] each operating in its own sphere, only the one which has entered into a franchise agreement could be held accountable for performing or complying with it. Since Chrysler Corporation was not a party to the franchise and had no legal responsibility to plaintiffs for the acts of Chrysler Motors, which signed the franchise, it should have been dismissed from the suit and the judgment should not have been entered against it.

Finally, in Empire Volkswagen, Inc. v. World-Wide Volkswagen Corp., 627 F.Supp. 1202 (S.D.N.Y. 1986), aff'd, 814 F.2d 90 (2d Cir. 1987), the court surveyed the case law defining the scope of § 1221 and concluded that the statute "attempts to balance the power of dealers and manufacturers by giving dealers a cause of action against manufacturers, or those under their control . . . Id. at 1209.

Therefore, it would initially appear that VGM and White cannot be held liable under the Act because they had no written franchise agreement with plaintiff. Furthermore, there is no evidence that either VGM or White was a "straw man" or an agent of GM.

Nonetheless, plaintiff has adduced evidence that GM, Volvo, and White joined in concerted activity that resulted in the [*55] cancellation of plaintiff's heavy duty addendum and the award of a new VGM franchise to Buffalo Truck. Specifically, plaintiff has produced the Stock Purchase Agreement executed by representatives of GM and VGM. This Agreement provided that GM would terminate its existing heavy duty truck dealers, and that VGM would select new franchisees. The Stock Purchase Agreement also provided that GM would continue to manufacture heavy duty trucks for VGM, and would acquire a non-controlling stock interest in VGM. The record contains evidence that GM continued to produce the Brigadier model for sale to VGM through 1988. Finally, although White was not a signatory to the Stock Purchase Agreement,[13] the record shows that three members of White were on the Steering Committee that recommended a dealer to VGM for award of a new franchise. These facts are sufficient to bring VGM and White within the scope of the Act.

In Sherman v. Leyland Motors. Ltd., 601 F.2d 429 (9th Cir. 1979), an automobile marketing organization ("BLM") implemented a program to consolidate its wholesale distribution system by means of a "Rationalization Program." Under the Program, the wholesale distribution of automobiles in the United States would be accomplished through a single organization in each distribution territory. As part of its consolidation, BLM lawfully terminated its distributor in southern California ("LCM"), and replaced it with another distributor ("BMCD"). LCM then became BLM's distributor for northern California. The plaintiff in Sherman ("Vinson") was an automobile dealer who had an automobile franchise from LCM. The terms of that franchise provided that if LCM's distribution contract with BLM were terminated, LCM's franchise with plaintiff would also be terminated.

The distribution agreement executed by BLM and BMCD provided:

[13] Plaintiff writes that the abbreviation "VTC" in the Stock Purchase Agreement refers to White (Plaintiff's Memorandum, p. 9). On the contrary, as White indicates in its Memorandum (White Memo., p. 3 n. 2), it is clear from the Stock Purchase Agreement that "VTC" refers to Volvo Lastragner [*56] AB, a/k/a/ Volvo Truck Corporation, a Swedish corporation (See Stock Purchase Agreement, p. 4).

> Dealer Organization, (a) It is acknowledged that neither party is the successor-in-interest of the other in the territory to be taken over. Neither party shall be deemed to assume any liability [*57] under any dealer agreement of the other, or upon any representation made by the outgoing distributor to any of its dealers which exceeds in scope or otherwise differs from the written dealership agreement. . . .
> (b) Without the prior consent of the other party, neither BLM (nor LMS) nor the Distributor [BCMD] will renew or extend any dealer agreement now in force, nor will it appoint any new dealer or make any representations to any dealer as to its future status after transfer of distribution has been effected.

BMCD sent a letter to Vinson and other dealers informing them that BMCD was reviewing dealers in the southern California area with a view toward awarding a new franchise for the sale of BLM automobiles. The letter stated that, in the interim, BMCD would process automobile orders from each of the dealers, and also stated, "Please understand that the enclosed form of agreement is not intended to establish a new dealer arrangement with you, or to renew any agreement that has previously been outstanding." The recipient was asked to sign an acceptance on the bottom of the letter and return it to BMCD. Vincent refused, believing that its relationship with BMCD as successor of LMS would [*58] be governed by the terms of the franchise agreement it had with LMS. Vincent continued to receive some automobiles from BMCD. However, Vincent refused to represent the full line of automobiles marketed by BLM. BMCD, on the other hand, wanted a dealer that would carry the full line. Therefore, BMCD did not award a franchise to Vincent, and Vincent's business collapsed. Vincent asserted a claim against BMCD under § 1221, alleging that BMCD, BLM, and LMS had engaged in a conspiracy to eliminate Vincent as a franchised automobile dealer, and to destroy Vincent's business. Vincent alleged that this was accomplished by attempting to coerce Vincent into carrying the full line of BLM vehicles.

Thus in Sherman the Ninth Circuit was confronted with the issues of whether BMCD could be understood as a "manufacturer" for the purposes of the Dealers' Act, and whether BMCD and BLM could be liable for violations of the Act even though they were not signatories to Vincent's franchise agreement. BMCD and BLM argued that the principles contained in Stansifer and Marquis insulated them from liability. Nonetheless, the court held that those defendants could be liable, based on Vincent's evidence of a conspiratorial [*59] relationship. The court wrote:

> It is contended by plaintiff that all of the appellees were committed to the effectuation of the Rationalization Program in violation [of] the Dealer's Act . . . and that they conspired to implement that plan by the elimination of Vincent as a dealer, particularly if he did not agree to the "tying arrangement" of a full-line dealership. That the existence of such a unified program with its alleged consequences could not have been properly ruled out by summary judgment has been indicated to us by an independent review of the record . . . .

Id. at 443. The court found that BLM wanted to consolidate its wholesale distribution system through a single organization in each territory that would carry the full line of BLM automobiles. Also relevant was the fact that the franchise agreement contained a reservation of the right on the part of the other defendants to veto BMCD's action in appointing dealers. Therefore, the court explained that > . . . there was sufficient evidential indication to preclude summary judgment on the issue of whether such appellees were manufacturers who at this stage should be deemed parties to the franchise because the putative conspiracy [*60] supplied the element of agency. We are mindful that Stansifer rejected a claim of conspiracy in similar context, but this was upon the basis of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain that theory.

Id. at 444. The court determined that Vincent's injury resulted from > . . . the concerted action of BLM, LMS, and BMCD in applying to Vincent and its franchise the consequences of the Rationalization Program pursuant to the agreement among them. This coalescence of forces resulted in the nonrenewal of Vincent's Triumph franchise. Accordingly, and in view of the intendments favorable to the nonmovant at this stage, we reject as too much of a "heads we win, tails you lose" proposition, LMS's argument that there was no duty on its part to grant a renewal of Vincent's franchise because its distributorship had been terminated before the expiration of the franchise, and the argument of BMCD that it had no duty under the franchise because it had not signed any agreement. . . .

Id.

Furthermore, the court found that there was an issue whether plaintiff was wrongfully threatened, intimidated, or coerced to accept full-line representation of BLM automobiles. If this were the case, all the defendants would [*61] be liable as a result of the putative conspiracy.

Here, plaintiff has produced sufficient facts to create a genuine issue of whether GM, Volvo, and White engaged in concerted activity that resulted in the demise of plaintiff's dealership. As in Sherman, there was an agreement to restructure the method of distribution of heavy duty trucks, specifically the Brigadier line. The agreement expressly provided that GM would terminate its existing heavy duty addenda. Therefore, termination of plaintiff's dealership was part of the bargain between GM and Volvo. It was contemplated that new franchises would be awarded, and that GM and White would participate in the recommendation of dealers for award of the new franchises. Finally, GM continued to manufacture the Brigadier for some time, as a subcontractor for VGM.

Plaintiff has also produced facts indicating that it was required to execute a release as a condition of receiving termination assistance to which plaintiff alleges it was entitled under the law and under its Dealer Sales and Service Agreement. As indicated by GM in its Memorandum, coercion may exist if "a dealer faces adverse consequences for failing to comply with a demand to do something [*62] it is not obligated to do." (GM Memo., p. 43, citing Empire Volkswagen, Inc. v. World-Wide Volkswagen Corp., 814 F.2d 90, 95 (2d Cir. 1987)). Here, plaintiff has adduced facts indicating that it faced adverse consequences for failing to sign the release, which, plaintiff argues, it had no obligation to sign. GM fails to address these facts in connection with the Dealers' Act (GM Memo., section E). These facts raise the issue of whether GM acted in "good faith" in its performance and cancellation of the heavy duty addendum. These facts were sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact in C-B Kenworth, 706 F.Supp. at 955, cited by the Second Circuit in Glick. Finally, Sherman indicates that Volvo and White may be held liable for this behavior, due to the concerted activity in which they participated. Therefore, summary judgment will not be awarded to the moving defendants on Count III of plaintiff's Complaint asserting claims under the Dealers' Act.

With respect to plaintiff's claims against VGM, plaintiff alleges that it was coerced to give up it Kenworth dealership as a condition of being awarded a VGM franchise. This aspect of plaintiff's claim must fail. An automobile dealer [*63] has no right to a franchise under the Dealers' Act. Salco Corp. v. General Motors Corp., 517 F.2d 567 (10th Cir. 1975). Moreover, the Act permits manufacturers to condition the provision of new contract rights upon the dealer's agreement to sell and service the manufacturer's products exclusively. Cabriolet Porsche Audi, Inc. v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc., 773 F.2d 1193 (11th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1122, 106 S. Ct. 1641, 90 L. Ed. 2d 186, reh'g denied, 476 U.S. 1189, 106 S. Ct. 2929, 91 L. Ed. 2d 557 (1986).

Plaintiff had no right to a franchise from VGM. Moreover, VGM had the right to condition the award of a franchise upon plaintiff's agreement to serve as an exclusive dealer. This Court finds "nothing coercive in presenting to a car dealer an opportunity to reap substantial profits from an exclusive dealership in exchange for the expenditures necessary to establish the exclusive dealership." Id. at 1210. For these reasons, plaintiff's claim against VGM on this basis must fail.[14]

Plaintiff's Antitrust Claims

Conspiracy to Restrain Trade under § 1 of the Sherman Act

In Count I of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges that the formation of VGM by GM and Volvo constituted an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1. Plaintiff alleges that the conspiracy took the form of a refusal to deal, or group boycott. This category of antitrust activity has, in the appropriate cases, been held a per se violation of the Sherman Act. Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 79 S.Ct. 705, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741 (1959). Causes of action for per se violations do not require proof of anticompetitive effect. However, the mere recital of the term "refusal to deal" or "group boycott" does not have the talismanic effect of transforming defendants' conduct into a per se violation.

The Second Circuit has explained that "'certain concerted refusals to deal or group boycotts [*65] are so likely to restrict competition without any offsetting efficiency gains that they should be condemned as per se violations of § 1, Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery & Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 290, 105 S. Ct. 2613, 2617, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1985), while others do not 'share with the per se forbidden boycotts the likelihood of predominantly anticompetitive consequences,' Id. at 295, 105 S.Ct. at 2620." Volvo North America Corp. v. Men's Int'l Professional Tennis Council, 857 F.2d 55, 73 (2d Cir. 1988). Whether a per se violation exists is a question of law that requires considerable inquiry into market conditions before the evidence justifies a presumption of anticompetitive conduct. Anesthesia Advantage, Inc. v. Metz Group, 759 F.Supp. 638, 647 (D.Co. 1991). See also National Collegiate Athletic Ass'n v. Board of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 104 n. 26, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 2961-62 n. 26, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984). "Plaintiffs may not rely on a naked allegation of group boycott, but must show that the defendants hold 'market power or unique access to a business element necessary for effective competition.'" Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery and Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 289-90, 105 S.Ct. 2613, 2617, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1985); [66] F.T.C. v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 458-59, 106 S.Ct. 2009, 2017-18, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1986)*. Plaintiffs seeking to invoke the per se rule "must present a threshold case that the challenged activity falls into a category likely to have predominantly anticompetitive effects. The mere allegation of a concerted refusal to deal does not suffice. . . ." Northwest Wholesale, 472 U.S. at 295, 105 S.Ct. at 2620.

Here, VGM has raised the argument that no per se violation of the Sherman Act took place and that, therefore, the "rule of reason" should be applied, and proof of anticompetitive effect should be required. Plaintiff has utterly failed to address this point in its opposing papers or affidavits. (See P. Memo., pp. 45-47). Plaintiff refers this Court to no cases analogous to the present case to justify invocation of the per se doctrine. Furthermore, as will be discussed below, plaintiff has made no showing of market power or unique access to a business element necessary for effective competition. Plaintiff has not even argued that these conditions exist. Consequently, plaintiff has failed to introduce evidence sufficient to trigger per se analysis. See Northwest Wholesale, 472 U.S. at 297-98, 105 S.Ct. at 2620-21; [*67] Anesthesia Advantage, 759 F.Supp. at 647 (plaintiffs failed to make the threshold showing necessary to trigger per se analysis).

Moreover, the facts do not reveal the type of "horizontal" group boycott that is typically found to be anticompetitive per se.[15] Arrangements similar to that existing here have been held to be in the "gray area" between horizontal and vertical restraints. See, e.g., L.J. Dreiling Motor Co. v. Peugeot Motors, 605 F.Supp. 597, 603 (D.Co. 1985), aff'd in part, rev'd in part on other grounds, 850 F.2d 1373 (10th Cir. 1988).

The facts in Dreiling are closely analogous to the facts in the present case. There, plaintiff was an authorized Peugeot dealer, which also held Renault and International Harvester franchises. Peugeot terminated plaintiff's dealership for allegedly submitting fraudulent warranty claims. [*68] Meanwhile, Chrysler had acquired a fifteen percent stockholding in Peugeot, S.A., a French corporation that was part of the Peugeot corporate family. Chrysler and Peugeot executed a "Memorandum of Intent," which provided for cooperation in the development and manufacture of a new automobile model, and in the distribution of Peugeot automobiles in the United States and Canada. A short-term loan was also provided to Chrysler by Peugeot. Many of these intentions were formalized. Chrysler agreed to provide consulting services and other assistance to Peugeot in furtherance of Peugeot's goal to expand sales in the United States. Chrysler would also assist Peugeot in the importation and distribution of Peugeot products, and would provide engineering and design assistance. Peugeot would pay Chrysler $300,000.00 per year plus five percent of the net dealer invoice price of each vehicle sold by Peugeot to Chrysler dealers who would become Peugeot dealers during the term of the agreement. The plaintiff in Dreiling claimed that the termination of its Peugeot dealership resulted from a conspiracy between Peugeot and Chrysler systematically to terminate existing Peugeot dealers and replace them [*69] with Chrysler dealers. The plaintiff asserted a claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act, alleging a conspiracy in restraint of trade, Id. at 599-600.

The court in Dreiling awarded summary judgment to Peugeot and Chrysler on plaintiff's Sherman Act claims, explaining that "plaintiff has not shown, nor even attempted to show, that the alleged agreement has affected competition in a way that constitutes an unreasonable restraint of trade or tends to create a monopoly." Id. at 601. The court chose to apply the rule of reason, after posing the preliminary question:

> . . . Dreiling alleges existing Peugeot dealers were to be terminated and replaced with Chrysler-Peugeot dealers. Assuming, arguendo, that the allegation is true, should the agreement be treated as a relatively benign "vertical" restraint, subject to the rule of reason, or as a "horizontal" restraint, potentially subject to per se illegality?

The court concluded that the agreement fell into the "gray area" between horizontal and vertical restraints, largely because "the agreement only involved two of the many automobile manufacturers who sell in the United States market." id. at 603. Therefore, the court looked for guidance in cases [*70] involving exclusive dealership, another "gray area" where the rule of reason has typically been employed. For instance, in Ace Beer Distrib., Inc. v. Kohn, Inc., 318 F.2d 283 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 922, 84 S. Ct. 267, 11 L. Ed. 2d 166 (1963), the Sixth Circuit awarded summary judgment to the defendant on the ground that, even if a conspiracy existed, "the object to be achieved was not one rendered obnoxious by the Sherman Act":

> The substitution of one distributor for another in a competitive market of the kind herein involved does not eliminate or materially diminish the existing competition of distributors of other [products], is not an unusual business procedure, and, in our opinion, is not an unreasonable restraint of trade.

Id. Similarly, the Fifth Circuit has explained:

> Lest any other former distributors succumb to the temptation of treble damages, we reiterate that it is simply not an antitrust violation for a manufacturer to contract with a new distributor, and as a consequence, to terminate his relationship with a former distributor, even if the effect of the new contract is to seriously damage the former distributor's business.

Burdett Sound, Inc. v. Altec Corp., 515 F.2d 1245, 1249 (5th Cir. 1975).

Therefore, [*71] the Dreiling court concluded that the rule of reason should be employed. The court determined that the agreement between Peugeot and Chrysler did not fall into the category of "naked restraints of trade with no purpose except stifling competition." Id. at 604. Important considerations were that the dealers were independent and were not owned by the manufacturers, id. at 603, n. 5, and that competition among distributors of other automobiles was not materially diminished by the agreement.

Similarly, per se analysis is not warranted in the present case. Even if a conspiracy existed, the object of the agreement between GM and Volvo cannot be classified as a naked restraint of trade with no purpose but to stifle competition. Defendants have argued that the agreement was a response to consistent losses attributable to its heavy duty truck business (Sergo Affid., ¶ 14). Indeed, such an agreement may have had a foreseeably better effect on overall competition than a drastic liquidation of GM's heavy duty truck facilities, or the continued market inefficiencies resulting from operational losses. Plaintiff has not countered with any evidence or even arguments that such agreements are "so likely [*72] to restrict competition without any offsetting efficiency gains that they should be condemned as per se violations of § 1." Volvo North America Coro, v. Men's Int'l Professional Tennis Council, 857 F.2d 55, 73 (2d Cir. 1988) (quoting Northwest Wholesale Stationers. Inc. v. Pacific Stationery & Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 290, 105 S. Ct. 2613, 2617, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1985)). Also important are the facts that plaintiff was an independent dealer not owned by any defendant, and that competition among the various manufacturers of heavy duty trucks was not appreciably diminished.

Finally, although the arrangement between GM and VGM was "horizontal", plaintiff has failed to introduce any evidence of other types of activities that ordinarily trigger per se analysis, e.g., price-fixing (see Monsanto v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 104 S.Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, reh'g denied, 466 U.S. 994, 104 S. Ct. 2378, 80 L. Ed. 2d 850 (1984)) or division of markets (see United States v. Topco Associates, Inc., 405 U.S. 596, 92 S.Ct. 1126, 31 L. Ed. 2d 515 (1972)). Therefore, plaintiff's Sherman Act § 1 claim will be considered under the rule of reason. See Beckman v. Walter Kidde & Co., 316 F.Supp. 1321, 1326 (E.D.N.Y. 1970), aff'd, 451 F.2d 593 (2d Cir. 1971), [*73] cert. denied, 408 U.S. 922, 92 S.Ct. 2488, 33 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1972) (court awarded summary judgment to defendants, explaining that a per se violation of § of the Sherman Act does not exist "whenever there is a conspiracy resulting in a refusal to deal").

To sustain an antitrust claim under the rule of reason, plaintiff must prove: (1) that the defendants entered into a "contract, combination . . . or conspiracy"; and (2) that the conspiracy was "in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." Oreck Corp. v. Whirlpool Corp., 639 F.2d 75, 78 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1083, 102 S. Ct. 639, 70 L. Ed. 2d 618 (1981); International Distrib. Centers, Inc. v. Walsh Trucking, 812 F.2d 786, 793 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 482 U.S. 915, 107 S. Ct. 3188, 96 L. Ed. 2d 676 (1987). Although plaintiff need not prove specific intent to create a monopoly on the part of the conspirators, plaintiff must nevertheless prove that "the conspirators had a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding . . . and that the anticompetitive effects of the alleged conspiracy outweigh its pro-competitive effects." Id. (emphasis added). See also National Society of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 688, 98 S.Ct. 1355, 1363, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978)(the [*74] statute "focuses directly on the challenged restraint's impact on competitive conditions"). In proving anticompetitive effects, it is important to note that the statute was intended to protect competition, not competitors, Id. (citing Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Matic, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S.Ct. 690, 697, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977)).

Here, plaintiff has failed to adduce any evidence of the type of anticompetitive effect that the statute was intended to prevent. Although plaintiff incorporates arguments contained in its Memorandum of Law in Support of Plaintiff's Motion for A Preliminary Injunction (P. Memo., p. 45), plaintiff never refers to specific facts in the record. Plaintiff has not undertaken to contradict defendants' evidence showing that no anticompetitive impact resulted (Sergo Affid. ¶¶ 27-31; VGM Affid., ¶¶ 3-4). The record is devoid of any facts indicating that VGM had (or was intended to have) any adverse effect on the relevant market shares,[16] or threatened to have any other anticompetitive impact on the Western New York State or national market. Plaintiff argues vociferously that defendants conspired to put it out of business; however, a conspiracy resulting in plaintiff's demise [*75] is not necessarily a conspiracy that impacts unreasonably on competition in the relevant market. See Business Elecs. Corp. v. Sharp Elecs. Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988); Nifty Foods Corp. v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 614 F.2d 832, 842 (2d Cir. 1980); Oreck Corp. v. Whirlpool Corp., 579 F.2d 126 (2d Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 946, 99 S.Ct. 340, 58 L. Ed. 2d 338, reh'g denied, 439 U.S. 1104, 99 S. Ct. 883, 59 L. Ed. 2d 65 (1978). Whereas plaintiff has adduced no evidence of VGM's effect on any aspect of either the Western New York or national market, plaintiff's claims under § 1 of the Sherman Act must fail. See Dreiling, 605 F.Supp. at 604 (summary judgment awarded to defendant on plaintiff's Sherman Act § 1 claim where plaintiff "ha[d] not presented to [the] court even the most basic market representation data.").

Finally, [*76] plaintiff argues in its Memorandum:

> A competitive dealer with 1987 gross revenues (its last year of full operation) of $31,807,606 was deliberately put out of business and eliminated from the Buffalo, New York market.[17] What could be more anti-competitive

[16] Although market share is not the only indicant of anticompetitive impact, a low market share may suggest little market power and, therefore, no unreasonable restrain on trade. See Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 2081, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992); Reazin v. Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas, Inc., 899 F.2d 951, 964-72 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 497 U.S. 1005 110 S. Ct. 3241, 111 L. Ed. 2d 752 (1990).

[17] Here, plaintiff claims that the relevant market is Buffalo, New York, whereas it maintains elsewhere that the relevant market is all of Western New York, or the entire United States.

> than that? What greater antitrust injury could be caused than the total loss of a business with annual revenues of more than $31 million.

(P. Memo., p. 45). Nonetheless, defendants correctly point out that plaintiff continued to operate as a franchisee for Mercedes-Benz and for GM itself under the light and medium duty addenda. These facts suggest that no unreasonable restraint on trade resulted from defendants' activities. In Diehl & Sons, Inc. v. International Harvester Co., 426 F.Supp. 110 (E.D.N.Y. 1976), the court considered similar facts, and found that no unreasonable restraint of trade resulted from the termination of an International Harvester dealer. The court wrote:

> . . . there is no contention in this case that Harvester trucks are not reasonably interchangeable with those of other, larger manufacturers, e.g., Ford, Chevrolet, Dodge and GMC. . . .
> Under these circumstances, the termination of Diehl as a Harvester distributor [*77] affected only Diehl, not competition.
> Finally, it is undisputed that there are other sources of supply available to Diehl and in fact Diehl does already sell Mercedes-Benz products and has contracted for a Volvo dealership.

Id. at 119. The court also wrote, "Nor is there any serious contention in this case that Harvester was attempting through the use of predatory tactics to destroy Diehl as a potential distributor for other truck manufacturers." id. n. 13. Therefore, the court held that the termination affected only Diehl, not competition. Here, considering the facts that plaintiff maintained its Mercedes-Benz franchise and continued to operate under its GM light and medium duty addenda, and that plaintiff does not seriously contend that the moving defendants attempted to foreclose it from retaining or acquiring franchises from other manufacturers, this Court finds that plaintiff has failed to make a sufficient showing that defendants' activities resulted in an unreasonable restraint of trade.

For [*78] these reasons, summary judgment will be awarded to the moving defendants on Count I of plaintiff's Complaint asserting claims under § 1 of the Sherman Act.

Conspiracy to Monopolize under § 2 of the Sherman Act

In Count I of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges that the acts complained of constituted a conspiracy to monopolize, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2. To withstand defendants' summary judgment motions, plaintiff must produce admissible evidence sufficient to support a jury finding of: (1) a concerted action deliberately entered into with the specific intent to achieve an unlawful monopoly, and (2) the commission of an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy." International Distribution, 812 F.2d at 795. Here, plaintiff does not present a set of facts showing that the defendants joined in a conspiracy with the specific intent to establish a monopoly in the heavy duty truck business, either in the Western New York market, or nationwide. As with plaintiff's claims under § 1 of the Sherman Act, plaintiff never directs this Court's attention to admissible evidence supporting its allegations. Therefore, summary judgment will be awarded to defendants on this [*79] claim. "Although the Federal Rules permit statement of ultimate facts, a bare bones statement of conspiracy or of injury under the antitrust laws without any supporting facts permits dismissal." Heart Disease Research Found. v. General Motors Corp., 463 F.2d 98, 100 (2d Cir. 1972).

In addition, although a claim of conspiracy to monopolize under § 2 of the Sherman Act does not require a showing of the defendant's power to exclude competition, Optivision, Inc. v. Syracuse Shopping Ctr. Assoc., 472 F.Supp. 665, 680 (N.D.N.Y. 1979) (citing American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 789, 66 S.Ct. 1125, 1128, 90 L. Ed. 1575 (1946)), "the absence of any serious likelihood of successfully achieving monopolization is evidence that can be used to support a finding of lack of specific intent, Id. (citing Hudson Valley Asbestos Corp. v. Tougher Heating & Plumbing Co., 510 F.2d 1140, 1144, (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 421 U.S. 1011, 95 S. Ct. 2416, 44 L. Ed. 2d 679 (1975)). Here, defendants have introduced evidence that a monopoly was far beyond their reach (Sergo Affid., ¶¶ 27-31). Plaintiff has not challenged this evidence, nor has it come forward with other admissible evidence that an objective of defendants' actions was [*80] to achieve a monopoly in the heavy duty truck business. Therefore, summary judgment is appropriately rendered in defendants' favor on plaintiff's claim of a conspiracy to monopolize under § 2 of the Sherman Act.

Attempt to Monopolize under § 2 of the Sherman Act

The elements of an attempt to monopolize under § 2 of the Sherman Act are: (1) anticompetitive or exclusionary conduct; (2) specific intent to monopolize; and (3) a "dangerous probability" that the attempt will succeed." H.L. Hayden Co. of N.Y. v. Siemens Medical Systems, 879 F.2d 1005, 1017 (2d Cir. 1989). This Court has already concluded that plaintiff has failed to produce substantive evidence regarding the first two elements. This Court now finds that plaintiff has failed to adduce sufficient proof of the third element as well.

In Hayden, the plaintiff was a dealer in dental equipment whose distributorship had been terminated by the manufacturer. The plaintiff alleged that the termination resulted from pressure put on the manufacturer by primary, full-service dealers, and that these actions constituted an attempt to monopolize the markets for the sale of dental equipment and dental x-ray equipment in violation of § 2 of the [*81] Sherman Act.

In analyzing the plaintiff's claims, the Second Circuit looked closely at the relevant market shares, and concluded that plaintiffs had made no showing of a dangerous probability that defendants would achieve a monopoly. The defendants had introduced proof that they each commanded approximately 20% of the dental equipment market, and plaintiff failed to challenge these figures on appeal. The district court concluded on the basis of these figures that no dangerous probability of success existed. Although the plaintiff argued on appeal that the district court failed to consider market factors other than market share, the Second Circuit found this argument unpersuasive and held:

> In sum, plaintiffs offer nothing of substance to disturb the district court's conclusion that the twenty percent market share which [defendants] each commanded, in the context of a widely diversified and competitive market, was insufficient to establish the "dangerous probability" of success required to establish a Sherman Act section two attempt to monopolize. See Nifty Foods Corp. v. Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., 614 F.2d 832, 841 (2d Cir. 1980) (one-third market share inadequate): United States v. ALCOA, 148 F.2d 416, 424 (2d Cir. 1945) [*82] (same); Levitch v. CBS, 495 F.Supp. 649, 665 (S.D.N.V. 1980)(same), aff'd. 697 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1983) (per curiam) (adopting district court opinion); see also International Distribution Centers, 812 F.2d at 792 (seventeen percent market share inadequate); 3 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law ¶ 835, at 350 (1978) ("[c]laims [of attempted monopolization] involving 30 percent or lower market shares should presumptively be rejected").

This Court is aware that market share is not necessarily determinative of whether a dangerous probability of success existed. International Distribution, 812 F.2d at 793. Other relevant factors are "the strength of the competition, the probable development of the industry, the barriers to entry, the nature of the anticompetitive conduct and the elasticity of consumer demand." Id. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has treated market share as "strong, perhaps presumptive, evidence of the presence or absence of market power, subject to bolstering or rebuttal by other evidence. Broadway Delivery Corp. v. United Parcel Serv., 651 F.2d 122, 128 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 968, 102 S. Ct. 512, 70 L. Ed. 2d 384 (1981) (citing United States v. Citizens & Southern Nat'l Bank, 422 U.S. 86, 120, 95 S.Ct. 2099, 2118, 45 L. Ed. 2d 41 (1975)). [*83] Moreover, "[w]hen the existence of significant market power is an essential element of a claim for treble damages, the plaintiff's market power evidence, whether consisting of the defendant's market share or of specific conduct indicating the defendant's power to control prices or exclude competition, must be substantial." Id. at 130 (citing Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 696-97, 82 S. Ct. 1404, 1409, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777 & n. 6 (1962)).

Here, defendants have introduced strong evidence of low market shares (Sergo Affid., ¶¶ 27-31; VGM Affid., ¶¶ 3-4), which has not been contradicted by plaintiff. Defendants also note that GM's market share had been declining steadily during the relevant period (Sergo Affid., ¶ 14)(see Nifty Foods, 614 F.2d at 841 (evidence of declining market share is relevant in determining dangerous probability of achieving monopoly); Berkey Photo, Inc. v.

Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 273 n.11 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1093, 100 S. Ct. 1061, 62 L. Ed. 2d 783 (1980)(same)). Defendants' evidence also indicates that a competitive market in heavy duty trucks existed; sales were distributed fairly evenly among the major competitors, with International [*84] Harvester capturing the largest percentage of business throughout the relevant period (Sergo Affid., ¶ 29; VGM Affid. ¶¶ 3-4). The facts also indicate that consumers had a number of options available to them in purchasing heavy duty trucks. See Diehl & Sons, Inc. v. International Harvester Co., 426 F.Supp. 110, 122 (E.D.N.Y. 1976) ("Product competition turns on the reasonable interchangeability of available goods considering price, use and quality). On the other hand, plaintiff fails to specify any market factors indicating that defendants could succeed in achieving a monopoly in heavy duty trucks. Therefore, plaintiff has failed properly to substantiate its claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act, and summary judgment will be awarded to defendants. See Broadway Delivery Corp. v. United Parcel Serv., 651 F.2d 122 (1981) (summary judgment awarded to defendant where plaintiff failed to introduce evidence of market share, and other evidence failed to indicate that defendant had power to control prices or exclude competition).

This result is consistent with the majority of courts finding no dangerous probability of a monopoly on similar facts. See cases cited in International Distribution, 812 F.2d at 786; [*85] Hayden, 879 F.2d at 1018.

Plaintiff's Claims under § 3 of the Clayton Act

In Count I of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges that VGM wrongfully made its award of a heavy duty truck franchise to plaintiff contingent upon the termination of plaintiff's Kenworth franchise, in violation of § 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14. Plaintiff's claim must fail. Section 3 provides:

> It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof . . . or fix a price charged thereof, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line [*86] of commerce.

A prerequisite to suit under § 3 is the existence of a contract between plaintiff and defendant, a condition of which is that plaintiff will not deal in the goods of defendant's competitor. It has been held:

> In order to plead a cause of action under § 3, plaintiff must allege that a contract for sale of goods between [defendant] and [plaintiff itself], not [defendant] and others, was conditioned on a promise of not dealing in the goods of a competitor, as is the case in a tying arrangement or in an exclusive dealing transaction. See, e.g., McElhenney Co. v. Western Auto Supply Co., 269 F.2d 332, 336 (4th Cir. 1959); Nelson Radio & Supply Co. v. Motorola. Inc., 200 F.2d 911, 913 (5th Cir. 1952), cert. denied, 345 U.S. 925, 73 S. Ct. 783, 97 L. Ed. 1356 (1953); Thomas v. Amerada Hess Corp., 393 F.Supp. 58, 76 (M.D.Pa. 1975).

In the present case, plaintiff premises its claim on the franchise agreement between VGM and Buffalo Truck. Because no contract existed between VGM and plaintiff itself, plaintiff fails to state a cause of action under § 3. Summary judgment will be awarded to defendants on this claim.

Furthermore, the statute prohibits only those contracts that may "substantially lessen [*87] competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." Because, as previously indicated, plaintiff has failed to adduce evidence of the likely impact of defendants' conduct on the relevant market(s), or of the danger of any party achieving a monopoly in heavy duty truck sales or service, plaintiff's claim must fail for this reason as well. Tampa Electric Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 327, 81 S.Ct. 623, 628, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (1961).

Plaintiff's Claims Under the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13

By a Decision and Order entered on December 31, 1991, this Court granted summary judgment to defendants GM and VGM on plaintiff's Robinson-Patman Act claims contained in Count I of plaintiff's Complaint. That decision was based upon the fact that plaintiff had failed to establish the "two-purchaser" element of a prima facie case under that statute. See Decision and Order, p. 12. Defendant White did not join in the summary judgment motion; however, White now moves for summary judgment on plaintiff's Robinson-Patman Act claims. For the reasons contained in this Court's Decision and Order of December 31, 1991 awarding summary judgment to GM and VGM, summary judgment will be awarded to White [*88] on those claims.

Plaintiff's Claims under New York State's Donnelly Act

Plaintiff relies upon the same set of facts it used to support its Sherman Act claims to assert a cause of action under New York State's Donnelly Act, N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 340. The Donnelly Act was modeled after the Sherman Act, and "the mode of analysis utilized under the state statute is similar to that developed under the federal legislation. Optivision, Inc. v. Syracuse Shopping Ctr. Assoc., 472 F.Supp. 665, 681 (N.D.N.Y. 1979) (citing State v. Mobil Oil Corp., 38 N.Y.2d 460, 463, 344 N.E.2d 357, 381 N.Y.S.2d 426, 428 (1976)). Although the Donnelly Act may be broader than the Sherman Act in some respects, Mobil Oil, 38 N.Y.2d at 464, 381 N.Y.S.2d at 428, the Act still prohibits only those agreements that constitute unreasonable restraints of trade. Optivision, 472 F.Supp. at 681; Dawn to Dusk, Ltd. v. Frank Brunckhorst Co., 23 A.D.2d 780, 258 N.Y.S.2d 746 (2d Dept. 1965). As discussed above, plaintiff has failed to adduce facts demonstrating the effect of defendants' actions on the relevant market(s). For the same reasons that summary judgment will be awarded to defendants on plaintiff's claims under the Sherman Act, summary [*89] judgment will be awarded to defendants on plaintiff's claims under the Donnelly Act.

Plaintiff's Failure to Allege Antitrust Injury

Although this Court has addressed plaintiff's failure to produce sufficient admissible evidence to establish the elements of each individual antitrust claim, all of plaintiff's antitrust claims may be disposed of together for a single reason: plaintiff has failed to allege "antitrust injury". Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, confers a private right of action upon those injured by antitrust activities, and provides treble damages. Simpson v. Union Oil Co. of California, 377 U.S. 13, 16, 84 S.Ct. 1051, 1054, 12 L. Ed. 2d 98, reh'g denied, 377 U.S. 949, 84 S.Ct. 1349, 12 L. Ed. 2d 313 (1964). Nevertheless, standing to sue for antitrust violations is recognized only where the plaintiff has suffered "antitrust injury". "A private plaintiff may not recover damages under § 4 of the Clayton Act merely by showing 'injury causally linked to an illegal presence in the market." Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 334, 110 S.Ct. 1884, 1889, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990) (quoting Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S.Ct. 690, 697, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977)). "The injury should reflect [*90] the anticompetitive effect either of the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation." Brunswick, 429 U.S. at 489, 97 S.Ct. at 697 (emphasis added). "Self-serving statements by a plaintiff's corporate officers are not, alone, substantial enough evidence of antitrust injury for a plaintiff to survive a motion for summary judgment. Midwestern Waffles, Inc. v. Waffle House, Inc., 734 F.2d 705, 714 (11th Cir. 1984) (citing H & B Equip. Co., Inc. v. International Harvester Co., 577 F.2d 239 (5th Cir. 1978)). This is consistent with the principle, expressed above, that the antitrust laws were enacted for "the protection of competition not competitors." Brunswick, 429 U.S. at 488, 97 S.Ct. at 697 (citing Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 82 S.Ct. 1502, 1521, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962)).

Here, plaintiff has not presented sufficient evidence linking its loss of business to any anticompetitive conditions. The only evidence of damages proffered by plaintiff is contained in Nelson Schule's affidavit sworn to on December 27, 1991, in which Schule claims that plaintiff's business failed as a result of defendants' conduct. However, plaintiff has forwarded no admissible evidence [*91] showing that this failure was caused by antitrust conduct. As discussed above, defendants have produced evidence of a fairly neutral impact on the relevant markets; this evidence remains undisputed by plaintiff, which has adduced no admissible evidence of the effect of defendants' conduct on the relevant market(s). In the sections of its Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Summary Judgment and its Memorandum of Law in Support of Plaintiff's Motion for a Preliminary Injunction dealing with its antitrust claims, plaintiff fails to make a single reference to the record to support an allegation of anticompetitive effect or antitrust injury. Therefore, plaintiff's claim for treble antitrust damages under § 4 of the Clayton act must fail. Summary judgment will be awarded to the moving defendants on Count I of plaintiff's Complaint.[18]

Plaintiff's RICO Claims

In Count II of its Complaint, plaintiff asserts a claims against all defendants for violation of the RICO statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1961 et seq. Section 1962(c) provides that it is unlawful > for any person employed by or associated with any enterprise engaged in, or the activities of which affect, interstate or foreign commerce, to conduct or participate, directly or indirectly, in the conduct of such enterprise's affairs through a pattern of racketeering activity. . . .

Section 1964(c) enables a private party to bring a cause of action for injury to his business or property resulting from a RICO violation. To establish such a cause of action, a private plaintiff must plead: "(1) conduct (2) of an enterprise (3) through a pattern (4) of racketeering activity" (5) that has caused injury to plaintiff's business or property. [*93] Sedima S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., 473 U.S. 479, 496, 105 S.Ct. 3275, 3285, 87 L. Ed. 2d 346 (1985). The underlying predicate acts of racketeering activity alleged by plaintiff are mail fraud, 18 U.S.C. § 1341, and wire fraud, 18 U.S.C. § 1343. Plaintiff contends that defendants used the mails and interstate telephone calls to further their fraudulent scheme of causing plaintiff's heavy duty truck "franchise" to be "fraudulently and deceitfully" cancelled, and "falsely and fraudulently" representing to plaintiff that it would receive a franchise from VGM (Complaint, ¶ 34).

To establish mail fraud or wire fraud, plaintiff must prove two elements: (1) that defendants participated in a scheme to defraud; and (2) that defendants knowingly used the mails (or wires) in furtherance of the scheme. Compania Sud-Americana de Vapores v. IBJ Schroder, 785 F.Supp. 411, 424 (S.D.N.Y. 1992) (citing United States v. Rodolitz, 786 F.2d 77, 80 (2d Cir.), cert. denied. 479 U.S. 826, 107 S. Ct. 102, 93 L. Ed. 2d 52 (1986)). Furthermore, "proof of a fraudulent scheme requires evidence showing a specific intent to defraud." id. Specific intent can be shown by proof that the scheme was "reasonably calculated to deceive persons of ordinary prudence [*94] and comprehension." id. (citing Virden v. Graphics One, 623 F.Supp. 1417, 1422 (C.D.Cal. 1985)). "The mail fraud [and wire fraud] statute[s] require[ ] some element of deception." McLaughlin v. Anderson, 962 F.2d 187, 192 (2d Cir. 1992). Or, as the Supreme Court has explained, the words "'to defraud' . . . usually signify the deprivation of something of value by trick, deceit, chicane or overreaching." McNally v. United States, 483 U.S. 350, 358, 107 S.Ct. 2875, 2881, 97 L. Ed. 2d 292 (1987).

Not only must plaintiff prove a scheme to defraud, but also that plaintiff's injury was proximately caused by racketeering activity. "'A defendant who violates section 1962 is not liable for treble damages to everyone he might have injured by other conduct,' but only to anyone whose injuries were caused 'by reason of' a violation of section 1962." Sperber v. Boesky, 849 F.2d 60, 64 (2d Cir. 1988)(citations omitted).

Here, plaintiff has failed to produce sufficient evidence for a jury reasonably to conclude that defendants engaged in a fraudulent scheme, or that plaintiff's loss of business was proximately caused by racketeering activity. Plaintiff has not shown that defendants intended to further a plan to terminate [*95] plaintiff's heavy duty addendum by employing misrepresentation or deception in order to induce reliance. See id. at 191 (plaintiff "has never explained how [defendant's] scheme was furthered by using false statements to lure [plaintiff] into bidding for the project"). Plaintiff argues that although GM told plaintiff that it would cease offering heavy duty trucks for sale in North

[18] See, supra, this Court's discussion of Diehl & Sons, Inc. v. International Harvester Co., 426 F.Supp. 110 (E.D.N.Y. 1976) in connection with plaintiff's claim of a conspiracy to restrain trade, under § 1 of the Sherman Act. Diehl demonstrates that plaintiff's allegations of injury to itself are insufficient to establish anticompetitive effect or injury. Furthermore, [*92] defendants have introduced evidence that no such effect resulted, because heavy duty automobiles are interchangeable, and because plaintiff maintained its Mercedes-Benz franchise and continued to operate under the GM light and medium duty addenda. This evidence further indicates that plaintiff has failed to introduce sufficient proof of antitrust injury.

America, GM continued to manufacture the Brigadier model as a subcontractor for VGM. Nevertheless, even if defendants did not specifically explain to plaintiff that GM would continue to produce the Brigadier model for a limited time as a subcontractor for VGM, it did explain that GM would continue to produce heavy duty truck models for VGM. On August 14, 1986 plaintiff received correspondence from GM stating:

> It is contemplated that [VGM] will market current GMC models from GM's heavy duty truck assembly operation in Pontiac. The management of [VGM] wilt eventually determine which products will be built, and in what quantities, based on market demand. In any event, both White and GMC identification will be preserved and their market presence preserved. . . . GM light and medium duty truck operations are not [*96] included in [VGM].

(Schule February 1988 Affid., ¶ 4, exh. A). This letter clearly states that GM will continue to produce for VGM. This would indicate to the reasonable person that items covered in the heavy duty addendum would continue to be produced by GM and marketed by VGM. Therefore, no justifiable reliance could have occurred, and defendants cannot be liable for fraud. Compania Sud-Americana de Vapores v. IBJ Schroder, 785 F.Supp. 411, 424 (S.D.N.Y. 1992).

Moreover, the activities described by plaintiff simply do not constitute fraud. There is no evidence that it relied on deception to further its objective, or that deception played any part whatsoever in defendants' actions. As explained above, GM's termination of the heavy duty addendum may have been a breach of contract or a violation of the New York Franchise Act or the federal Dealers' Act; however, this does not mean that it was a RICO violation. Id. at 192 ("mail fraud statute does not reject all business practices that do not fulfill expectations, nor does it taint every breach of a business contract").

As for plaintiff's allegation that defendants led it to believe that it would receive a VGM franchise, plaintiff has failed [*97] to show a fraudulent scheme, or that it suffered any deprivation that was proximately caused by fraud. Plaintiff fails to show that defendants intended to further a plan to award a VGM franchise to Buffalo Truck by employing misrepresentations or deceptions in order to induce reliance. See id. at 191 (plaintiff "has never explained how [defendant's] scheme was furthered by using false statements to lure [plaintiff] into bidding for the project"). Although plaintiff may have taken certain actions as a result of statements made by defendants, plaintiff has produced no evidence to support an inference that deceit was either necessary or desired by defendants as part of the franchising process. Therefore, plaintiff has failed to make a sufficient showing of intent to defraud, which is an essential element of a RICO cause of action predicated upon the commission of mail fraud or wire fraud.

Furthermore, plaintiff has failed to show that its loss of business was proximately caused by mail fraud or wire fraud. The wrongs complained of are the termination of plaintiff's franchise by GM and the failure to award plaintiff a VGM franchise. Even if defendants did engage in a pattern of racketeering [*98] activity, plaintiff cannot trace its injury to mail fraud or wire fraud. The injury was caused by the defendants' simple decisions to terminate the heavy duty addendum and to award the VGM franchise to Buffalo Truck. Deception and misrepresentation did not contribute to the injury, and plaintiff has failed to show that its demise was attributable to any detrimental reliance. Therefore, plaintiff has failed to demonstrate an intent to defraud or a fraudulent scheme on the part of defendants.

In addition, plaintiff has failed adequately to plead its RICO claim. The pleading requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) apply to RICO claims where the predicate acts alleged are mail fraud and wire fraud. Filmtrucks, Inc. v. Earls, 635 F.Supp. 1158, 1163 (S.D.N.Y. 1986). Therefore, plaintiff was required to allege with particularity:

> (1) precisely what statements were made in what documents or oral representations or what omissions were made, and (2) the time and place of each such statement and the person responsible for making (or, in the case of omissions, not making) the same, (3) the context of such statements and the manner in which they misled plaintiff and (4) what the defendants "obtained [*99] as a consequence of the fraud."

Id. (quoting Conan Properties, Inc. v. Mattel. Inc., 619 F.Supp. 1167, 1172 (S.D.N.Y. 1985)). Here, plaintiff has failed to allege the dates and places of the representations that were allegedly made to it, the manner in which it was misled, and what the defendants allegedly obtained as a result of the misrepresentations. Although plaintiff refers to portions of the Nelson Schule deposition to support its allegations, these portions are not attached to plaintiff's memoranda or affidavits, and have not been considered by this Court, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e).[19]

Finally, summary judgment must be granted on plaintiff's RICO claims because plaintiff has failed to make the requisite showing of a "pattern" of racketeering activity. "[T]o establish a RICO pattern it must also be shown that the predicates themselves amount to, or that they [*100] otherwise constitute a threat of, continued racketeering activity." H.J., Inc. v. Northwestern Bell Tel. Co., 492 U.S. 229, 109 S.Ct. 2893, 2901, 106 L. Ed. 2d 195 (1989) (emphasis in original). Here, although plaintiff has proffered evidence of an agreement between GM and VGM to terminate heavy duty addenda, plaintiff has made no showing that VGM was a RICO enterprise engaged in continuing illegal behavior. The alleged wrongs of which plaintiff complains took place during a discrete period of time during which the addenda were cancelled and new franchisees were selected. Therefore, plaintiff has failed to establish a RICO pattern, and its claim cannot stand.

For these reasons, summary judgment will be awarded to the moving defendants on Count II of plaintiff's Complaint.

Plaintiff's Breach of Contract Claims

In Count VIII of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges that GM breached the Dealer Sales and Service Agreement when it discontinued the heavy duty truck addendum. Plaintiff indicates that Article 4 of the Agreement contains the reasons for which GM could cancel the Agreement, but that GM's cancellation of the addendum was not based upon any of these reasons. On the other hand, GM points to language in Article [*101] 1.5 of the Agreement indicating that GM reserved the right to discontinue any products listed in the addendum at any time.

In Glick, the Second Circuit addressed the plaintiff's breach of contract claim as follows:

> On the breach of contract claim, we agree with Glick that Article 1.5 of the Agreement could be a means of circumventing Article 4's termination provisions: If there were a single Addendum attached to the Agreement, discontinuance of the models covered by that Addendum would, effectively, terminate the entire Agreement. This would contradict the plain language of the contract and render Article 4 meaningless . . . . Glick has, at the very least, raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Article 1.5 of this form document permits discontinuance of individual models but not of entire product lines.

This Court believes that resolution of this issue is dictated by Glick. The contractual language in Glick parallels that in the instant case. The language in Articles 1.5 and 4 of the Agreement creates the issue of whether termination of the heavy duty addendum constituted a breach of contract. Again, plaintiff has adduced evidence that the heavy duty line contributed [*102] a significant percentage of plaintiff's business. This is relevant to the question of whether termination of the addendum in this case was tantamount to a breach of the Agreement.

It is true that Glick was decided before substantial discovery had taken place, yet discovery has been completed in the present case. However, upon the present record this Court cannot say as a matter of law that GM did not breach a contract with plaintiff. Furthermore, although GM argues that the decision in Glick was premised upon the erroneous assumption that one-third of GM heavy duty truck dealers sold only heavy duty GM trucks, and that the percentage is closer to eight percent (Sergo Affid., ¶ 9), this factor would not be decisive. The language contained in the Agreement, the continued production of the Brigadier model, and the percentage of business plaintiff derived from the heavy duty line create the issue of whether GM breached a contract with plaintiff, Id. at 498. It is also significant that in Glick. as well as the present case, the plaintiff continued to operate under GM's light and medium duty addenda. Thus, any "erroneous assumption" as to the percentage of dealers who operated solely under [*103] the heavy duty addendum would not dictate a result contrary to Glick. Therefore, GM's motion for summary judgment on Count VIII of plaintiff's Complaint will be denied.

Nevertheless, summary judgment will be awarded to VGM and White on plaintiff's breach of contract claim. Plaintiff has failed to introduce any evidence of a contractual relationship with these defendants. Therefore, the primary element of a claim for breach of contract is lacking, and judgment will be awarded to VGM and White on Count VII of plaintiff's Complaint. The potential liability of these defendants under plaintiff's claim for tortious interference with contractual relations will be addressed below.

Plaintiff's Claims for Interference with Contractual Relations, as Against VGM and White

In Count IX of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges that VGM and White wrongfully interfered with its heavy duty truck dealership by agreeing that GM would terminate its heavy duty addendum and would continue to manufacture the Brigadier model as a subcontractor for VGM.

The elements of the tort of interference with a contractual relationship are: (1) the existence of a valid contract; (2) defendant's knowledge of that contract; (3) [*104] defendant's intentional procuring of breach of that contract; and (4) damages. Nifty Foods Corp. v. Great Atlantic & Pac. Tea Co., 614 F.2d 832, 839 (2d Cir. 1980); Israel v. Wood Poison Co., 1 N.Y.2d 116, 134 N.E.2d 97, 151 N.Y.S.2d 1 (1956). Wegman v. Dairylea Coop., Inc., 376 N.Y.S.2d 728, 731, 50 A.D.2d 108 (4th Dept. 1975). It is also necessary for plaintiff to prove that the defendant's actions caused the breach. Sieven v. Kane*, 4 A.D.2d 774, 165 N.Y.S.2d 225 (2d Dept. 1957)*.

The issue of whether the heavy duty addendum constituted a valid contract will be resolved in the same manner as plaintiff's claims under N. Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 197. As evidence of VGM and White's interference, plaintiff relies solely on the Stock Purchase Agreement executed by GM and VGM on December 9, 1986 (Kane Affid., exh. A). This evidence alone is sufficient to create the factual issue of whether VGM interfered with plaintiff's heavy duty addendum. The Stock Purchase Agreement expressly provided that GM would cancel all outstanding heavy duty addenda with its dealers. This is evidence that VGM had at least constructive knowledge of plaintiff's relationship with GM, and that it intended to procure GM's termination [*105] of the addendum. Although defendants argue that GM intended to terminate the heavy duty truck addenda prior to the formation of VGM (Sergo Affid., ¶ 14), this alone would not extinguish VGM's potential liability for inducement of any breach. The fact that the party who breached the contract contemplated the breach in any event is not controlling where he had not done so at the time of the defendant's actions. Gold Medal Farms v. Rutland Co. Creamery, 9 A.D.2d 473, 195 N.Y.S.2d 179 (3d Dept. 1960). There remains an issue of whether VGM's conduct was a substantial factor in GM's termination of the addendum. See State Enter. v. Southridge Coop., 18 A.D.2d 226, 238 N.Y.S.2d 724 (1st Dept. 1963); Duane Jones Co. v. Burke, 306 N.Y. 172, 117 N.E.2d 237 (1954). Therefore, VGM's motion for summary judgment on Count IX of plaintiff's Complaint will be denied.

Nevertheless, White will be awarded summary judgment on this claim. Plaintiff has produced no evidence showing White's role in the termination of its heavy duty addendum and, as discussed above, White was not a signatory to the Stock Purchase Agreement. Furthermore, White's participation in the selection of a VGM franchisee is too remote [*106] to constitute evidence that White actually procured any breach of a contract between plaintiff and GM.

Finally, GM will be awarded summary judgment on this claim because a party cannot be held liable for inducing a breach of its own contract. Robbins v. Ogden Corp., 490 F.Supp. 801, 810 (S.D.N.Y. 1980); Ryan v. Brooklyn Eye & Ear Hosp., 46 A.D.2d 87, 360 N.Y.S.2d 912 (2d Dept. 1974).

to respond as required by Rule 56(e). There has been a complete failure of proof regarding these claims, and summary judgment must be granted to GM as a matter of law. Celotex v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 2552-54, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986) (moving party can meet its burden under rule 56 by showing an absence of evidence to support the non-moving party's case; non-moving party cannot then simply rely on its pleadings to defeat summary judgment). Summary judgment will be entered in GM's favor on Count X of plaintiff's Complaint.

Plaintiff's Claims for Tortious Interference with Advantageous Business Relations

In Count X of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges that defendants' actions "were undertaken deliberately with the calculated purpose of injuring and destroying plaintiff's business and goodwill, and of injuring [*107] and destroying plaintiff's business relations with its franchisor, its suppliers, employees and its customers." (Complaint, ¶ 76). The parties have treated this Count as a claim for tortious interference with advantageous business relations. To prevail on this claim, plaintiff must establish that defendants interfered with "business relations existing between the plaintiff and a third party, either with the sole purpose of harming the plaintiff or by means that are dishonest, unfair or in any other way improper." Schmid, Inc. v. Zucker's Gifts, Inc., 766 F.Supp. 118, 122 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) (citing PPX Enter, v. Audio Fidelity Enter., 818 F.2d 266, 269 (2d Cir. 1987)). "In other words, if the defendant's interference is intended, 'at least in part, to advance its own competing interests, the claim will fail unless the means employed include criminal or fraudulent conduct.'" Id.; see also Nifty Foods Corp. v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., 614 F.2d 832, 838 (2d Cir. 1980).

Here, defendants have proffered a legitimate business motive for the formation of VGM (Sergo Affid., ¶ 14), yet plaintiff has not countered with admissible evidence is support of its claim. Plaintiff's Memorandum contains [*108] a single paragraph concerning this cause of action. In that paragraph, there is no reference to any admissible evidence supporting plaintiff's claim. Likewise, there is no reference to admissible evidence in support of this claim in any of plaintiff's supporting affidavits. And although page 50 of Plaintiff's Memorandum of Law in Support of Plaintiff's Motion for a Preliminary Injunction contains a number of allegations attributing malicious motives to certain individuals, these allegations are not supported by reference to admissible evidence. Therefore, although defendants may not have acted with the "due cause" or good faith required by the New York Franchise Act and the federal Dealers' Act, plaintiff has offered no evidence that their conduct falls within the scope of this common law tort. Summary judgment will be awarded to the moving defendants on Count X of plaintiff's Complaint to the extent that it states a claim for tortious interference with advantageous business relations.

Plaintiff's Claim under N.Y. U.C.C. § 2-306(2)

In Count VII of its Complaint, plaintiff alleges a claim against GM for breach of New York's Uniform Commercial Code § 2-306(2). This statute provides, "A [*109] lawful agreement by either the seller or the buyer for exclusive dealing in the kind of goods concerned imposes unless otherwise agreed an obligation by the seller to use best efforts to supply the goods and by the buyer to use best efforts to promote their sale." Under an exclusive dealing contract, the principal is "expected . . . to refrain from supplying any other dealer or agent within the exclusive territory." N.Y. U.C.C. § 2-306, Official Comment 5. "Agreement" is defined by the U.C.C. as "the bargain of the parties in fact as found in their language or by implication from other circumstances including course of dealing or usage of trade or course of performance . . . ." N.Y. U.C.C. § 1-201(3).

Plaintiff's claim under § 2-306(2) must fail. By the express terms of the Dealer Sales and Service Agreement and the heavy duty addendum itself, plaintiff was not an exclusive dealer of GM products. Article 1 of the Agreement gives plaintiff the non-exclusive rights to purchase GM products and to use the GM name in connection with its dealership. The language is unambiguous and can only be understood to mean that GM had the right to award similar rights to other dealers in plaintiff's geographical [*110] area. Plaintiff argues that exclusivity did not extend to the heavy duty addendum; however, the addendum itself provides that plaintiff has the "non-exclusive right to buy" the products listed in the addendum. Furthermore, there was obviously no duty on plaintiff's part to deal only in GM products, since plaintiff also sold Mercedes-Benz and Kenworth automobiles.

Plaintiff argues that the course of dealing between the parties indicates that plaintiff was the sole dealer of heavy duty trucks in its geographic area (P. Memo., p. 55). Plaintiff's Memorandum contains a number of allegations that there could only be one heavy duty dealer in any given area; however, GM introduces contrary evidence (Sergo Affid., ¶ 11), and plaintiff refers this Court to no admissible proof in this regard. And although there is some indication that VGM sought only one dealer of such trucks in a given area (St. Amour Memo., p. 1), this does not mean that GM was contractually bound to do so.

Therefore, neither the Dealer Sales and Service Agreement nor the heavy duty addendum falls within the scope of N.Y. U.C.C. § 2-306(2), and summary judgment will be awarded to GM on Count VII of plaintiff's Complaint. Plaintiff's [*111] arguments regarding GM's good faith vel non in the termination of the addendum are more appropriately directed toward plaintiff's claims for breach of contract and for violation of the New York Franchise Act and the federal Dealers' Act, which are addressed above.

Personal Jurisdiction Over the Individual Defendants

Defendants Berggren, Kaczmarek, and Gurley move for dismissal of plaintiff's Complaint as against them due to this Court's lack of personal jurisdiction. For purposes of a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, the plaintiff must meet the burden of making a prima facie showing of jurisdiction over the defendants. United States v. Montreal Trust Co., 358 F.2d 239 (2d Cir.), cert. denied. 384 U.S. 919, 86 S.Ct. 1366, 16 L. Ed. 2d 440, reh'g denied, 384 U.S. 982, 86 S.Ct. 1858, 16 L. Ed. 2d 693 (1966). Ultimately, the plaintiff must bear the burden of proving jurisdiction over the person by a preponderance of the evidence. However, on a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(2) the plaintiff will be held to the preponderance burden only if a pretrial evidentiary hearing has been held. If the motion is decided on the pleadings and affidavits, the prima facie burden applies. CutCo Indus., Inc. v. Naughton, 806 F.2d 361 (2d Cir. 1986). [*112] Here, the parties have submitted affidavits, but no evidentiary hearing has been held. Therefore, plaintiff need make only a prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction to defeat defendants' motions to dismiss.

Personal jurisdiction over a non-domiciliary in a diversity action is governed by the law of the forum state. Arrowsmith v. United Press Int'l, 320 F.2d 219 (2d Cir. 1963). Plaintiff in this case has not indicated what statute subjects the individual defendants to personal jurisdiction; however, plaintiff writes, "The defendants have at least tacitly conceded that they have transacted business within New York State making them amenable to long-arm jurisdiction under CPLR § 302(a)" (P. Memo., p. 66). Therefore, plaintiff appears to be relying upon New York's Civil Practice Law and Rules ("CPLR") § 302(a)(1), which provides:

> (a) As to a cause of action arising from any of the acts enumerated in this section, a court may exercise personal jurisdiction over any non-domiciliary . . . who in person or through an agent:
> > (1) transacts any business within the state or contracts anywhere to supply goods or services in the state. . . .

The Due Process Clause of the federal Constitution requires [*113] that the transaction of business within the state must meet the "minimum contacts" test set forth in International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316, 66 S. Ct. 154, 158, 90 L. Ed. 95 (1945), such that maintenance of the suit would not offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." In Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. 235, 253, 78 S. Ct. 1228, 1240, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1283 (1958), the Supreme Court held that this requirement is satisfied when "the defendant purposefully avails itself of the privileges of conducting activities within the forum state, thus invoking the benefits and protections of its law."

This Court does not agree with plaintiff's conclusory statement that there has been a "tacit agreement" by the individual defendants that they have transacted business in New York State. Moreover, plaintiff fails to note that more than simply transacting business is required. The cause of action alleged must arise from the business transacted by the defendants. Here, plaintiff fails to make a prima facie showing of any substantial business transacted by the defendants in New York State that gave rise to plaintiff's claims. Nowhere in plaintiff's Complaint, affidavits, or Memorandum does plaintiff indicate [*114] when or where or which of the individual defendants were in the State; plaintiff fails to describe the "business" conducted by defendants; and plaintiff refers in certain instances to communications with the "Committee" without specifying which individuals were involved. Uncontradicted evidence exists showing that defendant Gurley was not even a member of the Steering Committee

(Kaczmarek Reply Affid., ¶ 2). Hence, plaintiff has failed to establish "the existence of facts lending themselves to personal jurisdiction over the defendants." Maier-Schule, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 1988 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16078, 1988 WL 128602 (W.D.N.Y. 1988)(Elfvin, J.). In that earlier decision in this case, Judge Elfvin dismissed plaintiff's Complaint against certain members of the Steering Committee pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(2), due to plaintiff's failure to make a prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction under CPLR § 302(a)(1). Judge Elfvin indicated that plaintiff had failed to allege the types of facts listed above. It appears that plaintiff has not learned its lesson during the course of this matter.[20]

On the other hand, the individual defendants have submitted affidavits refuting plaintiff's assertion of jurisdiction. See Bialek v. Racal-Milgo, Inc., 545 F.Supp. 25 (S.D.N.Y. 1982)(to defeat plaintiff's prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction prior to trial, defendant must refute, not simply rebut, plaintiff's allegations). These affidavits show that the defendants have never transacted business in New York on their own behalf; they have never visited any of plaintiff's facilities or met with any of plaintiff's officers or employees within New York State; they have never conferred directly by telephone or correspondence with any of plaintiff's officers or employees, and any actions relating to plaintiff [*116] took place outside New York. Moreover, the decision to award the VGM franchise to Buffalo Truck was, in fact, made in North Carolina (Kaczmarek Reply Affid., ¶ 8). These affidavits are uncontradicted by plaintiff.

Therefore, plaintiff has failed to show that any of its causes of action arose from the individual defendants' activities within New York State; plaintiff has failed to show that the defendants individually and "purposefully avail[ed] [themselves] of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State, thus invoking the benefits and protections of its laws." Hanson, 357 U.S. at 253, 78 S.Ct. at 1240.

Indeed, courts have extended jurisdiction over individual defendants who travelled to New York actually to negotiate the contract at issue, see, e.g., Philipp Bros., Inc. v. Schoen, 661 F. Supp. 39 (S.D.N.Y. 1987); however, the courts have not extended personal jurisdiction on contacts as tenuous as those suggested here. See Apicella v. Valley Forge Mil. Academy, Etc., 103 A.D.2d 151, 478 N.Y.S.2d 663 (2d Dept. 1984), Plaintiff's causes of action do not arise out of the acts alleged. Indeed, plaintiff alleges no individual acts by the moving defendants. Therefore, plaintiff's [*117] Complaint will be dismissed as against defendants Berggren, Kaczmarek, and Gurley.

Defendants' Motions for Summary Judgment on the Issue of Damages

Defendants move for summary judgment due to plaintiff's failure to substantiate its claim of damages throughout the course of this action. Furthermore, on January 24, 1992 GM moved for sanctions against plaintiff, alleging failure to respond to its interrogatories on the issue of damages. GM argued that plaintiff had flagrantly disregarded Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 and 37, and this Court's orders to produce expert witness information and damage calculations. GM sought the following sanctions: (1) dismissal of plaintiff's Complaint; (2) preclusion of expert witness testimony; (3) preclusion of evidence regarding damages; (4) contempt; and (5) costs and attorney fees. GM's motion for sanctions was referred to the Hon. Edmund F. Maxwell, United States Magistrate Judge for the Western District of New York, for a report and recommendation, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(B). On July 29, 1992 Magistrate Judge Maxwell issued a Report and Recommendation that GM's motion be denied. On August 13, 1992 GM filed objections to the Report and Recommendation. [*118] The parties have submitted papers on this issue.

With regard to their summary judgment motion, defendants emphasize the point that plaintiff has failed to retain an expert witness, although this case has been pending since 1987. Defendants argue that plaintiff has failed to support its damage claim with admissible evidence, and that the affidavit prepared by Nelson Schule outlining alleged damages is insufficient to prove damages (Appendix to GM's Notice of Motion for Sanctions, exh. D). Plaintiff replies that it cannot afford an expert witness to calculate damages, but that such a witness will be retained when a final trial date is set (Appendix to GM's Notice of Motion for Sanctions, exh. P). Plaintiff argues that the Schule Affidavit of December 1991 sufficiently outlines damages to defeat summary judgment, because it refers to a settlement letter dated October 31, 1991, in which damages are "calculated." (GM Memo., Appendix, exh. 0).

[20] In fact, plaintiff offers even less support for its claim of personal jurisdiction over the defendants than it [*115] did in connection with that earlier decision. Judge Elfvin's decision refers to an affidavit of Nelson Schule indicating that the individual defendants made personal visits to plaintiff in New York and conducted written and telephonic communications with it, in connection with GM's decision to terminate its "franchise" and the subsequent decision by VGM to award its new franchise to Buffalo Truck. This Court is referred to no similar documentation in plaintiff's responsive papers.

This Court will award summary judgment to the moving defendants on the issue of damages because, once again, plaintiff has failed to produce admissible evidence sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact for trial. In Karetsos v. Cheung, 670 F.Supp. 111 (S.D.N.Y. 1987), [*119] the plaintiff tried to defeat summary judgment by arguing that she would "establish at the time of trial that she had a definite earning capacity and a market for her items. . . " and that "it is for the trier of the facts to determine from the evidence presented at trial as to the amount of her lost profits, . . . plaintiff need not produce the evidence which would determine the amount of her lost profits, if any, as indicated above." Id. at 115. The court disagreed with plaintiff, and granted summary judgment to defendant on the issue of damages. The court held that the plaintiff had failed properly to respond to the summary judgment motion, and had failed to "set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial." Id. (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e)).

This Court believes that plaintiff's failure to produce facts indicating its damages warrants a result similar to Karetsos. In its Memorandum, plaintiff states, "Maier-Schule is a dealer with a proven track of selling heavy duty GMC trucks and GMC breached its 5 year contract to supply those trucks after only two years. Therefore, Maier-Schule is entitled to its lost profits for the remainder of the contract period." [*120] (P. Memo., p. 61). This is not fact, this is argument. This Court has also considered the Schule Affidavit regarding damages, and the settlement letter prepared by plaintiff on October 31, 1991, to which GM referred in its motion papers (GM Memo., Appendix, exh. 0); however this Court finds that the information contained therein is wholly insufficient to defeat summary judgment.

Although a plaintiff "need only demonstrate the amount of damages with reasonable certainty, and a wrongdoer has no right to insist upon a mathematically precise evaluation of damages suffered," Contemporary Mission, Inc. v. Bonded Mailings, 671 F.2d 81, 84 (2d Cir. 1982), "[p]ure speculation or guesswork and estimates based on false or unreasonable assumptions are unacceptable." Martin Motor Sales v. Saab-Scania of America, 452 F.Supp. 1047, 1052 (S.D.N.Y. 1978), aff'd, 595 F.2d 1209 (2d Cir. 1979) (citing Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, Inc., 327 U.S. 251, 264, 66 S.Ct. 574, 579, 90 L. Ed. 652 (1946)). Here, plaintiff's documentation does not even approach reasonable certainty, and plaintiff's estimates are based upon sheer speculation. In the Contemporary Mission case, which involved breach of a contract to perform mailing [*121] services and in which plaintiff alleged approximately $200,000.00 in damages, the court held that the plaintiff "provided sufficient documentation—comparisons of sales and costs of late mailings with test mailing of the publications as well as overhead—to permit the jury to reach a reasonable estimate of damages." Id. at 84-85. But here, where there is an allegation of many millions of dollars in damages, plaintiff fails to provide similar documentation.

The Affidavit of Nelson Schule offers insufficient factual support for plaintiff's claim of damages. Rule 56(e) requires that affidavits opposing summary judgment > shall be made on personal knowledge, shall set forth such facts as would be admissible in evidence, and shall show affirmatively that the affiant is competent to testify to the matters stated therein. Sworn or certified copies of all papers or parts thereof referred to in an affidavit shall be attached thereto or served therewith.

The settlement letter to which the Schule Affidavit refers would not be admissible at trial, pursuant to Fed. R. Evid. 802. Moreover, it is not a sworn document, and is based solely upon the opinions of Schule and Farner, who are not parties to this [*122] action. In his Affidavit, which is more full of argument than it is admissible evidence, Schule states only that "I believe the proposal letter states an accurate picture of damage suffered by the Schule enterprise. . . . " (Schule December 1991 Affid., ¶ 4). Furthermore, the affidavit refers only to certain examples from the letter. More importantly, the damage figures are based upon a 15 year period, which Schule describes as "the balance of my remaining work life, I believe that succession was available and as my father and I had carried on this business for 35 years before defendants destroyed it, I believe that it could have gone on for the next 35 years easily." (Schule December 1991 Affidavit, ¶ 5). Again, Schule is not the plaintiff here; therefore, there is no proof that the 15 year period based upon Schule's "work life" expectancy is appropriate. Compare Garvin v. American Motor Sales Corp., 202 F.Supp. 667 (W.D.Pa. 1962), rev'd on other grounds, 318 F.2d 518 (3d Cir. 1963), holding that mortality tables referring to the plaintiff himself may be used to calculate future damages.

Although the gross and net profit figures and rental payments contained in the letter are allegedly [*123] "based upon financial statements which are already in the hands of the defendants, having been acquired in discovery proceedings in this case," (Schule December 1991 Affid., ¶ 6) this is entirely irrelevant. What is critical is that plaintiff has submitted none of these documents to this Court in connection with the present motion, so that this Court could determine whether plaintiff's damage estimates were "reasonably certain." Contemporary Mission, 671 F.2d at 84. This is contrary to Rule 56(e), which requires that " [s]worn or certified copies of all papers or parts thereof referred to in an affidavit shall be attached thereto or served therewith." Even the settlement proposal letter was not attached to the Schule Affidavit, let alone the documents to which the letter refers.

Furthermore, plaintiff's figures include damages for lost salary for individuals who are not parties to this action. Plaintiff admittedly does not have a copy of an updated appraisal done on the corporate property, but Nelson Schule states that he "will attempt to locate one." (Schule December 1991 Affid., ¶ 7). This is entirely insufficient to defeat summary judgment. There is no way to determine whether the [*124] portion of damages that plaintiff claims is attributable to loss of real property is accurate. Plaintiff bases damage calculations on past performance and business conditions, but fails to explain how or whether these calculations may change in response to future performance and business conditions. Finally, plaintiff admits that there are a number of other elements of damages "now known to exist, but not yet completely quantified" (Schule December 1991 Affid., ¶ 12). Thus plaintiff has utterly failed to substantiate its damage claims with admissible evidence.

Most importantly, the letter underlying the Schule Affidavit was prepared by Schule himself, with the assistance of William Farner, plaintiff's general counsel. Although Schule appears to have been in the heavy duty truck business for some time, there is no indication that either he or Farner has the requisite expertise or experience to appraise real estate, computers, office furniture, and corporate goodwill with "reasonable certainty." In fact, Schule repeatedly confessed in deposition testimony that he could not value the worth of his business because he was neither an accountant, nor was he an expert in valuating businesses [*125] (see, e.g., Schule Dep., pp. 1104-1105). This contradicts Fed. R. Evid. 702, and Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e), which provides that an affidavit "shall show affirmatively that the affiant is competent to testify to the matters stated therein." Perhaps this is the reason for the consistently round figures that are bandied about in Schule's Affidavit, and in the settlement proposal letter, e.g., the "1,000,000.00 added to net profit over 15 years," the office equipment worth $800,000.00, the loan interest reduction, about which Schule says "there is little doubt that these interest amounts would have been reduced by approximately $500,000.00 per year," $100,000.00 in corporate goodwill, and the claim that plaintiff was a "$35,000,000.00 per year business."

With respect to the proposal letter, there is a serious question whether the figures contained therein are even presumed by plaintiff to be accurate. The letter states that "in order the [sic] calculate damages, it will be necessary to value the entire Schule-Kenworth business as a going concern. It will also be necessary to calculate the damages to Nelson E. Schule and Martin Modaffari, principals of plaintiff who have lost their livelihood [*126] and, through foreclosure, have lost the equity in the real property on which the businesses were conducted which was owned by them in their individual names." Nonetheless, the proposal letter does not undertake such a valuation. In fact, the letter further states, "For the purposes of this proposal, we have calculated damages. . . " (emphasis added). This language, and the fact that the letter begins with the phrase, "WITHOUT PREJUDICE FOR SETTLEMENT PURPOSES ONLY" (emphasis in original), indicate that the letter was not intended to be an accurate calculation of plaintiff's total damages. Furthermore, by including damages inuring to Schule, Modaffari, and the Kenworth business, the letter is of even less evidentiary value. Finally, the proposal letter lists the indefinite totals of $450,000.00 in damages, and $500,000.00 in attorney fees, and states that recent sales had been "between the 35 to 40 million dollar mark." Plaintiff offers no documentary support for these amounts, and the use of such multi-million dollar figures only decreases the veracity of plaintiff's calculations. In the same vein, plaintiff states that "a sales estimate of $50,000,000.00 for the next 15 years would [*127] not be out of line. Presumably, a logical argument could be made that gross sales would increase over time as well, thus, further supporting this conservative estimate." Again, no documentary evidence has been produced to substantiate these pie-in-the-sky figures.

In Hodge v. Caterpillar, Inc., 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6566, 1992 WL 98415 (E.D.Pa. 1992), the court awarded summary judgment to defendant corporation where plaintiff failed to provide sufficient evidence of damages. Hodge was a product liability action in which plaintiff was claiming damages for necessary medical treatments and lost earning capacity. The court ordered plaintiff to obtain expert reports to substantiate his claims of liability and damages; however, plaintiff failed to do so. Therefore, the court entered summary judgment against him, finding that neither a liability determination or a calculation of damages could properly be done without an expert witness. With regard to liability, the court wrote, "Notwithstanding [plaintiff's allegations] and the provisions of the Court's scheduling order, plaintiff 'has offered neither competent evidence nor expert testimony to establish the essential elements in this products liability action.' . . . [*128] Plaintiff's failure to do so entitles Caterpillar to summary judgment in its favor." *1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6566, [WL] at 2 (citing *Woelpper v. Scott Aviation, 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12913, 1991 WL 183774 (E.D.Pa. 1991) at 3). With regard to the issue of damages, the court wrote:

> The foregoing principles apply with equal force to plaintiff's failure to produce reports of opinions from medical and vocational experts. Because this is a personal injury action, Hodge must prove, inter alia, that the medical treatments he received were necessary and that the charges for those treatments were reasonable [citation omitted] . . . . Establishing those facts involves special skills and training not common to the ordinary lay person, and Hodge can only do so through expert opinion testimony. Additionally, Hodge cannot prevail on his claims that he has not fully recovered and may require additional medical treatment without the opinion of a medical expert [citations omitted] . . . .
> Similarly, any claims by Hodge that he has suffered diminution in his future earning capacity must be founded upon the expert opinion of an economist or a vocational specialist. It is clearly beyond the skill and knowledge of the average juror to calculate "future lost earning [*129] capacity" or "work life expectancy", calculations which are virtual necessities in presenting a claim for wage loss damages.
> Hodge's failure to produce medical, economic or vocational expert witness reports makes it impossible for him to sufficiently establish the existence of those elements of his case. Accordingly, Caterpillar is entitled to summary judgment for these independent reasons.

Similarly, in Schroeder v. Barth, 969 F.2d 421 (7th Cir. 1992), the Seventh Circuit upheld an award of summary judgment to defendant on the issue of damages where plaintiffs failed to provide sufficient admissible evidence of damages, and failed to show the basis for their damage calculations. Schroeder involved a breach of warranty action brought by the purchasers of a mobile home. Plaintiffs alleged that product defects had rendered the mobile home worthless, and one of the plaintiffs submitted an affidavit to that effect. Nevertheless, plaintiffs failed to explain the method by which they determined the mobile home's worthlessness. The court held that plaintiffs had failed to create a genuine issue of fact regarding damages, writing:

> Nowhere in the two-inch thick record of the seven years [*130] of proceedings below do the Schroeders indicate under which of [the] alternative methods they calculate their damages. They simply, adamantly, insist their damages are $146,705, which coincidentally is the price of the motor home. . . . And despite repeated opportunities to offer more, the only evidence of damages they proffered was Lester Schroeder's subjective opinion that the motor home was worthless. . . . The problem with [the affidavit] is that it offers only subjective opinion, not the kind of documentary evidence [contemplated by Fed. R. Civ. P. 56]. Although Lester's opinion may be competent evidence of the value of the motor home to the Schroeders, it is not sufficient to meet their burden of proving damages. . . .

Although plaintiff was not explicitly ordered to retain an expert witness, calculation of damages in this case is beyond the ken of the average juror, and appears to have been beyond the ken of Nelson Schule as well. As discussed above, calculation of antitrust damages is a particularly formidable task, and one at which plaintiff has entirely failed.

Aside from expert witness reports, plaintiff was ordered during discovery to produce itemized damage statements, [*131] and to indicate the documents supporting its damage calculations. Plaintiff has failed to do so. Instead, plaintiff has submitted conclusory damage estimates that include damages for individuals who are not parties to this litigation, and that do not indicate the method of calculation. Therefore, plaintiff has utterly failed to support its damage claims by admissible evidence. This Court finds that defendants have thereby been prejudiced in their preparation of this case for trial, and for the present motions. Summary judgment will therefore be awarded to defendants on the issue of damages. See Peugeot Motors v. Eastern Auto Distrib., 892 F.2d 355, 360 (4th Cir. 1989). cert. denied, 497 U.S. 1005, 110 S. Ct. 3242, 111 L. Ed. 2d 752 (1990) ("We first note that Eastern has acknowledged that it can prove no damages with respect to that claim, so any part of the claim relating to damages will not be litigated.").

Plaintiff has been instructed on a number of occasions to substantiate its alleged damages with further precision and to provide defendants with expert witness information. In June of 1990, GM served interrogatories upon plaintiff that pertained to expert witness testimony regarding damages. The interrogatories [*132] requested the name and qualifications of any expert witness plaintiff had retained. Interrogatory 7 requested information on the amount of damages plaintiff demands, the detail of the calculation of each component of such damages, and an identification of "all documents relied on, used, or created by plaintiff, or by any expert retained by plaintiff, in making such calculations." When plaintiff failed to respond to these interrogatories, GM moved for an order to compel discovery, and Magistrate Judge Maxwell issued such an order on February 2, 1991, giving plaintiff until 45 days after a decision on plaintiff's motion for partial summary judgment on its Robinson-Patman Act claims was issued. This Court issued a Decision and Order denying plaintiff partial summary judgment on July 31, 1991; plaintiff failed to answer the interrogatories, as ordered. On October 2, 1991 this Court extended plaintiff's time to answer the interrogatories until October 31, 1991. On November 1, 1991 plaintiff served an "Answer to Interrogatory" stating simply that "As of this date, October 31, 1991, plaintiff has not retained any expert witness. Plaintiff accepts this interrogatory as a continuing demand [*133] and will notify defendants immediately upon retaining an expert witness."

By a letter dated November 1, 1991 GM objected to the vagueness of plaintiff's Answer, and indicated that Fed. R. Civ. P. 33(a) requires that answers to interrogatories be answered separately and fully. By an order entered on December 24, 1991 this Court directed plaintiff to supplement its Answer on or before December 31, 1991, and deemed discovery otherwise to be closed. In ordering plaintiff to respond to Interrogatory 7, this Court considered the expense involved, the burden to plaintiff, and the importance of the issue of damages in litigation such as this, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(1). This Court concluded that plaintiff needed to produce information concerning damages that was more substantial than that which plaintiff had already provided.

On December 26, 1991 GM sent a letter to plaintiff's counsel explaining precisely what information it requested with respect to Interrogatory 7. On December 28, 1991 GM received Nelson Schule's Affidavit dated December 27, 1991, which purported to be a supplemental answer to Interrogatory 7, and which purported to detail plaintiff's alleged damages. On December [*134] 31, 1991 GM sent a letter to plaintiff's counsel objecting to the Schule Affidavit as incomplete and inaccurate. This Court agrees with such a characterization of Schule's Affidavit.

This Court recognizes that plaintiff may not be able to afford an expert witness. Nevertheless, plaintiff has alleged throughout the course of litigation that it will retain an expert once a trial date has been set (Kane February 1992 Affid., ¶¶ 3, 8). In any event, plaintiff's lack of an expert witness does not justify the type of incomplete and inaccurate responses to discovery requests that plaintiff has made over the last two years. Even without an expert witness, plaintiff was required to set forth the calculations for each element of its alleged damages. It did not do so. Plaintiff was required to supply documentary support for its damage calculations. It did not do so. Plaintiff's failure to retain an expert does not justify plaintiff's failure to adhere to the orders of this Court directing plaintiff otherwise to answer defendants' interrogatories fully and accurately. It does not justify plaintiff's disregard for Fed. R. Civ. P. 13(b), 26(b)(4)(A)(1), the Local Rules in this District, and this [*135] Court's calendar guidelines regarding discovery orders.

To date, plaintiff has failed to supply defendants with all the damages information they requested. More importantly, however, plaintiff has failed to produce sufficient information for this Court to find a genuine issue of fact regarding damages. Perhaps plaintiff could have adduced sufficient evidence without retaining an expert witness. Regardless, plaintiff has brought this extremely complex litigation and should have been prepared to produce evidence on each of the issues involved. One of those issues is damages. In Martin Motor Sales, a case that is factually similar to the present case, the court explained that "in this type of case, where the proof of damages is so difficult and speculative under the best of circumstances, plaintiff is obligated to offer the court the best evidence available in proving its damages." The court further explained that where the plaintiff fails to produce records indicating its damages, damages may not be awarded due to "speculation and conjecture." Id. (citing Cecil Corley Motor Co., Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 380 F.Supp. 819 (M.D.Tenn. 1974)). Although Martin Motor Sales arose in a trial [*136] context, the principle enunciated is equally applicable in the summary judgment context. Here, plaintiff has failed to produce sufficient admissible evidence to create a genuine issue of fact regarding damages. Plaintiff has not even produced the documentation it claims to have disclosed during discovery. Consequently, summary judgment will be awarded to defendants on the issue of damages.

Likewise, GM's motion for sanctions will be granted to the extent that plaintiff will be precluded from introducing evidence of damages. In all other respects, this Court adopts the findings and conclusions contained in Magistrate Judge Maxwell's Report and Recommendation of July 29, 1992, and denies GM's motion for various other sanctions.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the motions of GM, VGM, and White will be Granted in part and Denied in part. The motions of the individual defendants to dismiss plaintiff's Complaint as against them will be Granted. Finally, GM's motion for sanctions against plaintiff will be Granted, insofar as plaintiff will be precluded from introducing evidence of damages at trial. In all other respects, this Court will affirm the Report and Recommendation of Magistrate [*137] Judge Maxwell, and GM's motion for other sanctions will be Denied.

Recourse to agencies and courts should not be condemned as sham until a reviewing court has discerned and drawn the difficult line separating objectively reasonable claims from a pattern of baseless, repetitive claims which leads the factfinder to conclude that the administrative and judicial processes have been abused. The Supreme Court's recognition of a sham in California Motor Transport signifies that the institution of legal proceedings "without probable cause" will give rise to a sham if such activity effectively bars competitors from meaningful access to adjudicatory tribunals and so usurps the decisionmaking process.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

HN12[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The United States Supreme Court has a two-part definition of "sham" litigation. First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. If an objective litigant could conclude that the suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, the suit is immunized under Noerr, and an antitrust claim premised on the sham exception must fail. Only if challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation. Under the second part of the definition of sham, the court should focus on whether the baseless lawsuit conceals an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor, through the use of the governmental process -- as opposed to the outcome of that process -- as an anticompetitive weapon. This two-tiered process requires the plaintiff to disprove the challenged lawsuit's legal viability before the court will entertain evidence of the suit's economic viability.

Evidence > Inferences & Presumptions > General Overview

HN13[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

Even a plaintiff who defeats the defendant's claim to Noerr immunity by demonstrating both the objective and the subjective components of a sham must still prove a substantive antitrust violation. Proof of a sham merely deprives the defendant of immunity; it does not relieve the plaintiff of the obligation to establish all other elements of his claim.

HN14[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

A winning lawsuit is by definition a reasonable effort at petitioning for redress and therefore not a sham. On the other hand, when the antitrust defendant has lost the underlying litigation, a court must resist the understandable temptation to engage in post hoc reasoning by concluding that an ultimately unsuccessful action must have been unreasonable or without foundation. The court must remember that even when the law or the facts appear questionable or unfavorable at the outset, a party may have an entirely reasonable ground for bringing suit.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN15[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The word "genuine" has both objective and subjective connotations. On one hand, "genuine" means actually having the reputed or apparent qualities or character. "Genuine" in this sense governs Fed. R. Civ. P. 56, under which a "genuine issue" is one that properly can be resolved only by a finder of fact because it may reasonably be resolved in favor of either party. On the other hand, "genuine" also means sincerely and honestly felt or experienced. To be sham, therefore, litigation must fail to be "genuine" in both senses of the word.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > General Overview

Torts > ... > Elements > Lack of Probable Cause > Determinations of Probable Cause

HN16[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The existence of probable cause to institute legal proceedings precludes a finding that an antitrust defendant has engaged in sham litigation. The notion of probable cause, as understood and applied in the common-law tort of wrongful civil proceedings, requires the plaintiff to prove that the defendant lacked probable cause to institute an unsuccessful civil lawsuit and that the defendant pressed the action for an improper, malicious purpose. Probable cause to institute civil proceedings requires no more than a reasonable belief that there is a chance that a claim may be held valid upon adjudication. Because the absence of probable cause is an essential element of the tort, the existence of probable cause is an absolute defense.

HN17[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

When a court has found that an antitrust defendant claiming Noerr immunity had probable cause to sue, that finding compels the conclusion that a reasonable litigant in the defendant's position could realistically expect success on the merits of the challenged lawsuit. Therefore, a proper probable-cause determination irrefutably demonstrates that an antitrust plaintiff has not proved the objective prong of the sham exception and that the defendant is accordingly entitled to Noerr immunity.

Decision

Copyright infringement action held not to be "sham," within exception to antitrust exemption for efforts to influence government action, where copyright holders had probable cause for suit.

Summary

Several motion picture studios, alleging that the operators of a resort hotel had infringed the studios' copyrights in various films by renting videodiscs to guests for viewing in hotel rooms, filed an action against the operators in the United States District Court for the Central District of California. The operators filed a counterclaim charging the studios with violations of 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1, 2), based in part on the allegation that the studios' copyright action was a mere sham which cloaked underlying acts of monopolization and conspiracy to restrain trade. The District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the operators on the studios' copyright claim (228 USPQ 743), and the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed (866 F2d 278). On remand, the District Court granted the studios' motion for summary judgment on the operators' antitrust counterclaim, on the grounds that (1) the studios had clearly sought and expected a favorable judgment on the copyright claim and had had probable cause to bring such an action; and (2) the copyright action therefore was not a "sham" and was entitled to antitrust immunity under the "Noerr-Pennington" doctrine as a legitimate effort to influence governmental action (1990-1 CCH Trade Cases 68,971). The Court of Appeals, affirming, (1) characterized "sham" litigation as involving either misrepresentations in the adjudicatory process or the pursuit of a pattern of baseless, repetitive claims instituted without probable cause and regardless of the merits; and (2) noted that the operators had neither alleged that the copyright action involved misrepresentations nor challenged the District Court's finding of probable cause, but had argued only that the action was a sham because the studios had not honestly believed the action to be meritorious (944 F2d 1525).

On certiorari, the United States Supreme Court affirmed. In an opinion by Thomas, J., joined by Rehnquist, Ch. J., and White, Blackmun, Scalia, Kennedy, and Souter, JJ., it was held that (1) regardless of the subjective intent of a litigant, an objectively reasonable effort to litigate cannot be a "sham" for purposes of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine; (2) in order for litigation to be a "sham," (a) the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits, and (b) only if challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation to determine whether the lawsuit conceals an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor; (3) the existence of probable cause to institute legal proceedings--as understood and applied in the common-law tort of wrongful civil proceedings--precludes a finding that an antitrust defendant has engaged in sham litigation; and (4) in the case at hand, even though the studios' copyright action was unsuccessful, the studios had had probable cause to bring such an action because the law was then unclear as to whether the operators' videodisc rental activities intruded on the studios' copyrights.

Souter, J., concurred, expressing the view that the court's opinion was not intended to transplant every substantive nuance and procedural quirk of the common-law tort of wrongful civil proceedings into federal antitrust law, but used "probable cause" merely as shorthand for a reasonable litigant's realistic expectation of success on the merits.

Stevens, J., joined by O'Connor, J., concurred in the judgment, expressing the view that (1) the court correctly held that an objectively reasonable effort to litigate cannot be a "sham" regardless of subjective intent; but (2) the court's opinion was unnecessarily broad, as there might be lawsuits (a) in which a reasonable litigant could realistically expect some form of success on the merits, but (b) which would be objectively unreasonable and thus would be shams.

Regardless of the subjective intent of a litigant, an objectively reasonable effort to litigate cannot be a "sham" for purposes of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine--(1) the Noerr-Pennington doctrine providing that efforts to influence governmental actions qualify for antitrust immunity, and (2) the sham exception providing that activity that is ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action, but is a mere sham to cover an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor, does not qualify for antitrust immunity; the legality of objectively reasonable petitioning directed toward obtaining governmental action is not affected by any anticompetitive purpose the actor may have had; in order for litigation to be a "sham," (1) the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits, and (2) only if challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation to determine whether the lawsuit conceals an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor; the existence of probable cause to institute legal proceedings precludes a finding that an antitrust defendant has engaged in sham litigation, as a finding of probable cause compels the conclusion that a reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits of the challenged lawsuit and irrefutably demonstrates that the antitrust plaintiff has not proved the objective prong of the sham exception. Summary judgment is properly issued in favor of motion picture studios with regard to a counterclaim by the operators of a resort hotel, who allege that the studios violated 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 2, 2) by bringing a copyright infringement action against the operators for renting videodiscs of copyrighted movies to hotel guests for in-room viewing, because (1) the studios' antitrust immunity cannot be pierced, under the "sham" exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine of antitrust immunity as to efforts to influence governmental action, in the absence of proof that the copyright action was objectively baseless or frivolous; (2) even though the copyright action was unsuccessful, the studios had had probable cause to bring such an action, given that (a) under 17 USCS 106(4), the studios enjoyed the exclusive right to perform their copyrighted movies publicly, (b) the studios acquired this statutory right for motion pictures, as original audiovisual works of authorship fixed in a tangible medium of expression under 17 USCS 102(a)(6), regardless of whether they intended any monopolistic or predatory use, and (c) at the time a Federal District Court entered summary judgment for the operators on the copyright infringement claim, the law was unclear as to whether the operators' videodisc rental activities intruded on the studios' copyrights; and (3) the existence of probable cause eliminates any genuine issue of material fact for purposes of Rule 56(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9.5 > immunity -- > Headnote:

Those who petition government for redress are generally immune from antitrust liability.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9.5 > immunity -- sham exception -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[4][] [4]

The institution of legal proceedings without probable cause will give rise to a "sham," for purposes of the "sham" exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine of antitrust immunity as to efforts to influence governmental action, if such activity effectively bars competitors from meaningful access to adjudicatory tribunals and so usurps the decisionmaking process.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9.5 > immunity -- sham exception -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[5A][] [5A]LEdHN[5B][] [5B]

A winning lawsuit is by definition a reasonable effort at petitioning for redress and is therefore not a "sham," for purposes of the "sham" exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine of antitrust immunity as to efforts to influence governmental action; however, an ultimately unsuccessful lawsuit is not necessarily unreasonable or without foundation for purposes of the "sham" exception.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9.5 > immunity -- sham exception -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[6][] [6]

In a private action under the federal antitrust laws, a plaintiff who defeats a claim of antitrust immunity with respect to an allegedly anticompetitive lawsuit by the defendant, by demonstrating both the objective and the subjective components of the "sham" exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine of antitrust immunity as to efforts to influence governmental action, must still prove a substantive antitrust violation, because proof of a sham merely deprives the defendant of immunity and does not relieve the plaintiff of the obligation to establish all other elements of the antitrust claim.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION §1 > probable cause -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[7A][] [7A]LEdHN[7B][] [7B]

The notion of probable cause, as understood and applied in the common-law tort of wrongful civil proceedings--frequently called "malicious prosecution," which, strictly speaking, governs the malicious pursuit of criminal proceedings without probable cause--requires the plaintiff to prove that the defendant lacked probable cause to institute an unsuccessful civil lawsuit and that the defendant pressed the action for an improper, malicious purpose; because the absence of probable cause is an essential element of the tort, the existence of probable cause is an absolute defense; probable cause to institute civil proceedings requires no more than a reasonable belief that there is a chance that a claim may be held valid upon adjudication, and a showing of malice alone will neither entitle the plaintiff in a wrongful civil proceedings action to prevail nor permit the factfinder to infer the absence of probable cause; the threshold for showing probable cause is no higher in the civil context than in the criminal context.

TRIAL §92 > question of law or fact -- probable cause -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[8][] [8]

For purposes of determining whether there was probable cause to institute a legal proceeding, a court may decide probable cause as a matter of law where there is no dispute over the predicate facts of the legal proceeding.

DEPOSITIONS AND DISCOVERY §29 > antitrust actions -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[9][] [9]

A Federal Court of Appeals--in reviewing a Federal District Court's granting of summary judgment in favor of motion picture studios with regard to a counterclaim by operators of a resort hotel, who allege that the studios violated 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1, 2) by bringing a copyright infringement action against the operators for renting videodiscs of copyrighted movies to hotel guests for in-room viewing--properly refuses the operators' request for further discovery on the economic circumstances of the underlying copyright litigation, which request was also refused by the District Court, because (1) the studios' antitrust immunity cannot be pierced, under the "sham" exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine of antitrust immunity as to efforts to influence governmental action, in the absence of proof that the copyright action was objectively baseless or frivolous; and (2) the District Court thus had no occasion to inquire whether (a) the studios were indifferent to the outcome on the merits of the copyright suit, (b) any damages for infringement would be too low to justify the studios' investment in the suit, or (c) the studios had decided to sue primarily for the benefit of collateral injuries inflicted through the use of legal process.

Although those who petition government for redress are generally immune from antitrust liability, Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523, such immunity is withheld when petitioning activity "ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action, is a mere sham to cover . . . an attempt to interfere directly" with a competitor's business relationships, id., at 144. Petitioner resort hotel operators (collectively, PRE) rented videodiscs to guests for use with videodisc players located in each guest's room and sought to develop a market for the sale of such players to other hotels. Respondent major motion picture studios (collectively, Columbia), [*2] which held copyrights to the motion pictures recorded on PRE's videodiscs and licensed the transmission of those motion pictures to hotel rooms, sued PRE for alleged copyright infringement. PRE counterclaimed, alleging that Columbia's copyright action was a mere sham that cloaked underlying acts of monopolization and conspiracy to restrain trade in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The District Court granted summary judgment to PRE on the copyright claim, and the Court of Appeals affirmed. On remand, the District Court granted Columbia's motion for summary judgment on PRE's antitrust claims. Because Columbia had probable cause to bring the infringement action, the court reasoned, the action was no sham and was entitled to Noerr immunity. The District Court also denied PRE's request for further discovery on Columbia's intent in bringing its action. The Court of Appeals affirmed. Noting that PRE's sole argument was that the lawsuit was a sham because Columbia did not honestly believe its infringement claim was meritorious, the court found that the existence of probable cause precluded the application of the sham exception as a matter of law and rendered irrelevant any [*3] evidence of Columbia's subjective intent in bringing suit.

Held:

1. Litigation cannot be deprived of immunity as a sham unless it is objectively baseless. This Court's decisions establish that the legality of objectively reasonable petitioning "directed toward obtaining governmental action" is "not at all affected by any anticompetitive purpose [the actor] may have had." Id., at 140. Thus, neither Noerr immunity nor its sham exception turns on subjective intent alone. See, e.g., Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., 486 U.S. 492, 503, 100 L. Ed. 2d 497, 108 S. Ct. 1931. Rather, to be a "sham," litigation must meet a two-part definition. First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. Only if challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's subjective motivation. Under this second part of the definition a court should focus on whether the baseless suit conceals "an attempt to interfere directly" with a competitor's business relationships, Noerr, supra, at 144, through the "use [*4] [of] the governmental process -- as opposed to the outcome of that process -- as an anticompetitive weapon," Columbia v. Omni Outdoor Advertising, Inc., 499 U.S. 365, 380, 113 L. Ed. 2d 382, 111 S. Ct. 1344. This two-tiered process requires a plaintiff to disprove the challenged lawsuit's legal viability before the court will entertain evidence of the suit's economic viability. Pp. 55-61.

2. Because PRE failed to establish the objective prong of Noerr's sham exception, summary judgment was properly granted to Columbia. A finding that an antitrust defendant claiming Noerr immunity had probable cause to sue compels the conclusion that a reasonable litigant in the defendant's position could realistically expect success on the merits of the challenged lawsuit. Here, the lower courts correctly found probable cause for Columbia's suit. Since there was no dispute over the predicate facts of the underlying legal proceedings -- Columbia had the exclusive right to show its copyrighted motion pictures publicly -- the court could decide probable cause as a matter of law. A court could reasonably conclude that Columbia's action was an objectively [*5] plausible effort to enforce rights, since, at the time the District Court entered summary judgment, there was no clear copyright law on videodisc rental activities; since Columbia might have won its copyright suit in two other Circuits; and since Columbia would have been entitled to press a novel claim, even in the absence of supporting authority, if a similarly situated reasonable litigant could have perceived some likelihood of success. Pp. 62-65.

3. The Court of Appeals properly refused PRE's request for further discovery on the economic circumstances of the underlying copyright litigation, because such matters were rendered irrelevant by the objective legal reasonableness of Columbia's infringement suit. Pp. 65-66.

LEdHN[1A][] [1A] LEdHN[2A][] [2A]This case requires us to define the "sham" exception to the doctrine of antitrust immunity first identified in Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961), as that doctrine applies in the litigation context. HN1[] Under the sham exception, activity "ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action" does not qualify for Noerr immunity if it "is a mere sham to cover . . . an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships [*7] of a competitor." Id., at 144. We hold that HN2[] litigation cannot be deprived of immunity as a sham unless the litigation is objectively baseless. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit refused to characterize as sham a lawsuit that the antitrust defendant admittedly had probable cause to institute. We affirm.

Petitioners Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc., and Kenneth F. Irwin (collectively, PRE) operated La Mancha Private Club and Villas, a resort hotel in Palm Springs, California. Having installed videodisc players in the resort's hotel rooms and assembled a library of more than 200 motion picture titles, PRE rented videodiscs to guests for in-room [*52] viewing. PRE also sought to develop a market for the sale of videodisc players to other hotels wishing to offer in-room viewing of prerecorded material. Respondents, Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., and seven other major motion picture studios (collectively, Columbia), held copyrights to the motion pictures recorded on the videodiscs that PRE purchased. Columbia also licensed the transmission of copyrighted [*8] motion pictures to hotel rooms through a wired cable system called Spectradyne. PRE therefore competed with Columbia not only for the viewing market at La Mancha but also for the broader market for in-room entertainment services in hotels.

[1643] In 1983, Columbia sued PRE for alleged copyright infringement through the rental of videodiscs for viewing in hotel rooms. PRE [1924] counterclaimed, charging Columbia with violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-2, [1] and various state-law infractions. In particular, PRE alleged that Columbia's copyright action was a mere sham that cloaked underlying acts of monopolization and conspiracy to restrain trade.

[9] The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment on Columbia's copyright claim and postponed further discovery on PRE's antitrust counterclaims. Columbia did not dispute that PRE could freely sell or lease lawfully purchased videodiscs under the Copyright Act's "first sale" doctrine, see 17 U.S.C. § 109(a), [619] and PRE conceded that the playing of videodiscs constituted "performance" of motion pictures, see 17 U.S.C. § 101 (1988 ed. and Supp. III). As a result, summary judgment depended solely on whether rental of videodiscs for in-room viewing infringed Columbia's exclusive right to [*53] "perform the copyrighted work[s] publicly." § 106(4). Ruling that such rental did not constitute public performance, the District Court entered summary judgment for PRE. 228 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) 743 (CD Cal. 1986). The Court of Appeals affirmed on the grounds that a hotel room was not a "public place" and that PRE did not "transmit or otherwise communicate" Columbia's motion pictures. 866 F.2d 278 (CA9 1989). See 17 U.S.C. § 101 (1988 ed. and Supp. III).

On remand, Columbia sought [*10] summary judgment on PRE's antitrust claims, arguing that the original copyright infringement action was no sham and was therefore entitled to immunity under Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., supra. Reasoning that the infringement action "was clearly a legitimate effort and therefore not a sham," 1990-1 Trade Cases P 68,971, p. 63,242 (CD Cal. 1990), the District Court granted the motion:

> "It was clear from the manner in which the case was presented that [Columbia was] seeking and expecting a favorable judgment. Although I decided against [Columbia], the case was far from easy to resolve, and it was evident from the opinion affirming my order that the Court of Appeals had trouble with it as well. I find that there was probable cause for bringing the action, regardless of whether the issue was considered a question of fact or of law." Id., at 63,243.

The court then denied PRE's request for further discovery on Columbia's intent in bringing the copyright action and dismissed PRE's state-law counterclaims without prejudice.

The Court of Appeals affirmed. 944 F.2d 1525 (CA9 1991). [*11] After rejecting PRE's other allegations of anticompetitive conduct, see id., at 1528-1529, [2] the court focused on [*54] PRE's contention that the copyright

[1] HN3[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "every contract, combination . . ., or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Section 2 punishes "every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States."

[2] The Court of Appeals held that Columbia's alleged refusal to grant copyright licenses was not "separate and distinct" from the prosecution of its infringement suit. 944 F.2d at 1528. The court also held that PRE had failed to establish how it could have suffered antitrust injury from Columbia's other allegedly anticompetitive acts. Id., at 1529. Thus, whatever antitrust injury Columbia inflicted must have stemmed from the attempted enforcement of copyrights, and we do not consider whether Columbia could have made a valid claim of immunity for anticompetitive conduct independent of petitioning activity. Cf. Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 707-708, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777, 82 S. Ct. 1404 (1962).

action was indeed sham and that Columbia could not claim Noerr immunity. The Court of Appeals characterized "sham" litigation as one of two types of "abuse of . . . judicial processes": either "'misrepresentations . . . in the adjudicatory process'" or the pursuit of "'a pattern of baseless, repetitive claims'" instituted "'without probable cause, and regardless [1925] of the merits.'" 944 F.2d at 1529 (quoting California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 513, 512, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609 (1972)). PRE neither "allege[d] that the [copyright] lawsuit involved misrepresentations" nor "challenge[d] the district court's [620] finding that the infringement action was brought with probable cause, i.e., that the suit was not baseless." 944 F.2d at 1530. Rather, PRE opposed summary judgment solely by arguing that "the copyright infringement lawsuit [was] a sham because [Columbia] did not honestly believe that [*12] the infringement claim was meritorious." Ibid.

The Court of Appeals rejected PRE's contention that "subjective intent in bringing the suit was a question of fact precluding entry of summary judgment." Ibid. Instead, the court [*13] reasoned that the existence of probable cause "preclude[d] the application of the sham exception as a matter of law" [1644] because "a suit brought with probable cause does not fall within the sham exception to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine." 944 F.2d at 1531, 1532. Finally, the court observed that PRE's failure to show that "the copyright infringement action was baseless" rendered irrelevant any "evidence of [Columbia's] subjective intent." Id., at 1533. It accordingly rejected PRE's request for further discovery on Columbia's intent.

[*55] The Courts of Appeals have defined "sham" in inconsistent and contradictory ways. [3] We once observed that "sham" might become "no more than a label courts could apply to activity they deem unworthy of antitrust immunity." Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., 486 U.S. 492, 508, n.10, 100 L. Ed. 2d 497, 108 S. Ct. 1931 (1988). The array of definitions adopted by lower courts demonstrates that this observation was prescient.

PRE contends that "the Ninth Circuit erred in holding that an antitrust plaintiff must, as a threshold prerequisite [*56] . . . , establish that a sham lawsuit is baseless as a matter of law." Brief for Petitioners 14. It invites us to adopt an approach under [621] which either "indifference to . . . outcome," ibid., or failure to prove that a petition for redress of grievances "would . . . have been brought but for [a] predatory motive," Tr. of Oral Arg. 10, would expose a defendant to antitrust liability [1926] under the sham exception. We decline PRE's invitation.

LEdHN[3][] [3]HN4[] Those who petition government for redress are generally immune from antitrust liability. We first recognized in Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed.

[3] Several Courts of Appeals demand that an alleged sham be proved legally unreasonable. See McGuire Oil Co. v. Mapco, Inc., 958 F.2d 1552, 1560, and n.12 (CA11 1992); Litton Systems, Inc. v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 700 F.2d 785, 809-812 (CA2 1983), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 1073, 79 L. Ed. 2d 220, 104 S. Ct. 984 (1984); Hydro-Tech Corp. v. Sundstrand Corp., 673 F.2d 1171, 1177 (CA10 1982); Federal Prescription Service, Inc. v. American Pharmaceutical Assn., 214 U.S. App. D.C. 76, 85, 89, 663 F.2d 253, 262, 266 (1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 928, 71 L. Ed. 2d 472, 102 S. Ct. 1293 (1982). Still other courts have held that successful litigation by definition cannot be sham. See, e.g., Eden Hannon & Co. v. Sumitomo Trust & Banking Co., 914 F.2d 556, 564-565 (CA4 1990), cert. denied, 499 U.S. 947, 113 L. Ed. 2d 467, 111 S. Ct. 1414 (1991); South Dakota v. Kansas City Southern Industries, Inc., 880 F.2d 40, 54 (CA8 1989), cert. denied sub nom. South Dakota v. Kansas City Southern R. Co., 493 U.S. 1023, 107 L. Ed. 2d 745, 110 S. Ct. 726 (1990); Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc. v. Redd Horne, Inc., 749 F.2d 154, 161 (CA3 1984).

Other Courts of Appeals would regard some meritorious litigation as sham. The Sixth Circuit treats "genuine [legal] substance" as raising merely "a rebuttable presumption" of immunity. Westmac, Inc. v. Smith, 797 F.2d 313, 318 (1986) (emphasis added), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1035, 93 L. Ed. 2d 838, 107 S. Ct. 885 (1987). The Seventh Circuit denies immunity for the pursuit of valid claims if "the stakes, discounted by the probability of winning, would be too low to repay the investment in litigation." Grip-Pak, Inc. v. Illinois Tool Works, Inc., 694 F.2d 466, 472 (1982), cert. denied, 461 U.S. 958, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1317, 103 S. Ct. 2430 (1983). Finally, in the Fifth Circuit, "success on the merits does not . . . preclude" proof of a sham if the litigation was not "significantly motivated by a genuine desire for judicial relief." In re Burlington Northern, Inc., 822 F.2d 518, 528 (1987), cert. denied sub nom. Union Pacific R. Co. v. Energy Transportation Systems, Inc., 484 U.S. 1007, 98 L. Ed. 2d 652, 108 S. Ct. 701 (1988).

2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961), that "the Sherman Act does not prohibit . . . persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with [*15] respect to a law that would produce a restraint or a monopoly." Id., at 136. Accord, Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 669, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965). In light of the government's "power to act in [its] representative capacity" and "to take actions . . . that operate to restrain trade," we reasoned that the Sherman Act does not punish "political activity" through which "the people . . . freely inform the government of their wishes." Noerr, 365 U.S. at 137. Nor did we "impute to Congress an intent to invade" the First Amendment right to petition. 365 U.S. at 138.

Noerr, however, withheld HN5[] immunity from "sham" activities because "application of the Sherman Act would be justified" when petitioning activity, "ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action, is a mere sham to cover . . . an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor." Id., at 144. In Noerr itself, we found that a publicity campaign by railroads seeking legislation [*16] harmful to truckers was no sham in that the "effort to influence legislation" was "not only genuine but also highly successful." Ibid.

LEdHN[1B][] [1B]In California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609 (1972), we elaborated on Noerr in two relevant [*57] respects. First, we extended HN6[] Noerr to "the approach of citizens . . . to administrative agencies . . . and to courts." 404 U.S. at 510.Second, we held that the complaint showed a sham not entitled to immunity when it contained allegations that one group of highway carriers "sought to bar . . . competitors from meaningful access to adjudicatory [1645] tribunals and so to usurp that decisionmaking process" by "institut[ing] . . . proceedings and actions . . . with or without probable cause, and regardless of the merits of the cases." Id., at 512 (internal quotation marks omitted). We left unresolved the question presented by this case -- whether litigation may [*17] be sham merely because a subjective expectation of success does not motivate the litigant. We now answer this question in the negative and hold that HN7[] an objectively reasonable effort to litigate cannot be sham regardless of subjective intent. [4]

[18] [622] Our original formulation of antitrust petitioning immunity required that unprotected activity lack objective reasonableness. Noerr rejected the contention that an attempt "to influence the passage and enforcement of laws" might lose immunity merely because the lobbyists' "sole purpose . . . was to destroy [their] competitors." 365 U.S. at 138. Nor were we persuaded by a showing that a publicity campaign "was intended to and did in fact injure [competitors] in their relationships with the public and with their customers," since such "direct injury" was merely "an incidental effect of the . . . campaign to influence governmental action." Id., at 143. [*58] We reasoned that "the right of the people to [1927] inform their representatives in government of their desires with respect to the passage or enforcement of laws cannot properly be made to depend upon their intent in doing so." Id., at 139. In short, "Noerr shields from the Sherman Act a concerted effort to influence public officials regardless of intent or purpose." Pennington, 381 U.S. at 670.

LEdHN[4][] [4] [*19] Nothing in California Motor Transport retreated from these principles. Indeed, we recognized that HN9[] recourse to agencies and courts should not be condemned as sham until a reviewing court has "discern[ed] and draw[n]" the "difficult line" separating objectively reasonable claims from "a pattern of baseless, repetitive claims . . . which leads the factfinder to conclude that the administrative and judicial processes have been abused." 404 U.S. at 513. Our recognition of a sham in that case signifies that the institution of legal proceedings "without probable cause" will give rise to a sham if such activity effectively "bar[s] . . . competitors from meaningful access to adjudicatory tribunals and so . . . usurp[s] the decisionmaking process." Id., at 512.

[4] California Motor Transport did refer to the antitrust defendants' "purpose to deprive . . . competitors of meaningful access to the . . . courts." 404 U.S. at 512. See also id., at 515 (noting a "purpose to eliminate . . . a competitor by denying him free and meaningful access to the agencies and courts"); id., at 518 (Stewart, J., concurring in judgment) (agreeing that the antitrust laws could punish acts intended "to discourage and ultimately to prevent [a competitor] from invoking" administrative and judicial process). HN8[] That a sham depends on the existence of anticompetitive intent, however, does not transform the sham inquiry into a purely subjective investigation.

LEdHN[1C][] [1C]Since California Motor Transport, we have consistently assumed that the sham exception contains an indispensable objective component. We have described a sham as "evidenced by repetitive lawsuits carrying the [*20] hallmark of insubstantial claims." Otter Tail Power Co. v. United States, 410 U.S. 366, 380, 35 L. Ed. 2d 359, 93 S. Ct. 1022 (1973) (emphasis added). We regard as sham "private action that is not genuinely aimed at procuring favorable government action," as opposed to "a valid effort to influence government action." Allied Tube & Conduit Corp. v. Indian Head, Inc., 486 U.S. at 500, n.4. And we have explicitly observed that a successful "effort to influence governmental action . . . certainly cannot be characterized as a sham." Id., at 502. See also Vendo Co. v. Lektro-Vend Corp., 433 U.S. 623, 645, 53 L. Ed. 2d 1009, 97 S. Ct. 2881 (1977) (BLACKMUN, J., concurring [623] in result) (describing a successful lawsuit as a "genuine attempt to use the . . . adjudicative process legitimately" [*59] rather than "'a pattern of baseless, repetitive claims'"). Whether applying Noerr as an antitrust doctrine or invoking it in other contexts, we have repeatedly reaffirmed that evidence of anticompetitive intent or purpose alone cannot transform otherwise legitimate activity into a sham. See, [*21] e.g., FTC v. Superior Court Trial Lawyers Assn., 493 U.S. 411, 424, 107 L. Ed. 2d 851, 110 S. Ct. 768 (1990); NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 913-914, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1215, 102 S. Ct. 3409 (1982). Cf. Vendo, supra, at 635-636, n.6, 639, n.9 (plurality opinion of REHNQUIST, J.); id., at 644, n., 645 (BLACKMUN, J., concurring in result). Indeed, by analogy to Noerr's sham exception, we held that even an "improperly motivated" lawsuit may not be enjoined under the National Labor Relations Act as an unfair labor practice unless such litigation is "baseless." Bill Johnson's Restaurants, Inc. v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 731, 743-744, 76 L. Ed. 2d 277, 103 S. Ct. 2161 (1983). Our decisions therefore establish that HN10[] the legality of objectively reasonable petitioning "directed toward obtaining governmental action" is "not at all affected by any anticompetitive purpose [the actor] may have had." Noerr, 365 U.S. at 140, quoted in Pennington, supra, at 669. [*22]

Our most recent applications of Noerr immunity further demonstrate that HN11[] neither [1646] Noerr immunity nor its sham exception turns on subjective intent alone. In Allied Tube, supra, at 503, and FTC v. Trial Lawyers, supra, at 424, 427, and n.11, we refused to let antitrust defendants immunize otherwise unlawful restraints of trade by pleading a subjective intent to [1928] seek favorable legislation or to influence governmental action. Cf. National Collegiate Athletic Assn. v. Board of Regents of Univ. of Okla., 468 U.S. 85, 101, n.23, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70, 104 S. Ct. 2948 (1984) ("Good motives will not validate an otherwise anticompetitive practice"). In Columbia v. Omni Outdoor Advertising, Inc., 499 U.S. 365, 113 L. Ed. 2d 382, 111 S. Ct. 1344 (1991), we similarly held that challenges to allegedly sham petitioning activity must be resolved according to objective criteria. We dispelled the notion that an antitrust plaintiff could prove a sham merely by showing that its competitor's "purposes were to [*23] delay [the [*60] plaintiff's] entry into the market and even to deny it a meaningful access to the appropriate . . . administrative and legislative fora." Id., at 381 (internal quotation marks omitted). We reasoned that such inimical intent "may render the manner of lobbying improper or even unlawful, but does not necessarily render it a 'sham.'" Ibid. Accord, id., at 398 (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

In sum, fidelity to precedent compels us to reject a purely subjective definition of "sham." The sham exception so construed would undermine, if not vitiate, Noerr. And despite whatever "superficial certainty" it might provide, a subjective standard would utterly fail to supply "real 'intelligible guidance.'" Allied Tube, supra, at 508, n.10.

LEdHN[1D][] [1D] LEdHN[5A][] [5A] LEdHN[6][] [6]HN12[] We now outline a two-part definition [*24] of "sham" litigation. First, the lawsuit must be objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits. If an objective litigant could conclude that the suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, the suit is immunized under Noerr, and an antitrust claim premised on the sham exception must fail. [5] Only if challenged litigation is objectively meritless may a court examine the litigant's

[5] HN14[] A winning lawsuit is by definition a reasonable effort at petitioning for redress and therefore not a sham. On the other hand, when the antitrust defendant has lost the underlying litigation, a court must "resist the understandable temptation to engage in post hoc reasoning by concluding" that an ultimately unsuccessful "action must have been unreasonable or without foundation." Christiansburg Garment Co. v. EEOC, 434 U.S. 412, 421-422, 54 L. Ed. 2d 648, 98 S. Ct. 694 (1978). Accord, subjective motivation. Under this second part of our definition of sham, the court should focus on whether the baseless lawsuit conceals "an attempt to interfere [*61] directly with the business relationships of a competitor," Noerr, supra, at 144 (emphasis added), through the "use [of] the governmental process -- as opposed to the outcome of that process -- as an anticompetitive weapon," Omni, 499 U.S. at 380 (emphasis in original). This two-tiered process requires the plaintiff to disprove the challenged lawsuit's legal viability before the court will entertain evidence of the suit's economic viability. Of course, [*25] HN13[] even a plaintiff who defeats the defendant's claim to Noerr immunity by demonstrating both the objective and the subjective components of a sham must still prove a substantive antitrust violation. Proof of a sham merely deprives the defendant of immunity; it does not relieve the plaintiff of the obligation to establish all other elements of his claim.

[26] Some of the apparent confusion over the meaning of "sham" may stem from our use of the word "genuine" to denote the opposite of "sham." See Omni, supra, at 382; Allied Tube, 486 U.S. at 500, n.4; Noerr, supra, at 144; Vendo Co. v. Lektro-Vend Corp., supra, at 645 (BLACKMUN, J., concurring in result). HN15[] The word "genuine" has both objective and subjective connotations. On [1929] one hand, "genuine" means "actually having the reputed or apparent qualities or character." Webster's Third New International Dictionary 948 (1986). "Genuine" in this sense governs Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56, under which a "genuine issue" is one "that properly can be resolved only by a finder of fact because [it] may reasonably be resolved in favor of either party." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 250, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 106 S. Ct. 2505 (1986) (emphasis added). On the other hand, "genuine" also means "sincerely and honestly felt or experienced." Webster's Dictionary, supra, at 948. [*27] To be sham, therefore, litigation must fail to be [625] "genuine" in both senses of the word. [6]

[1647] [*28] [*62] IV

LEdHN[2B][] [2B]We conclude that the Court of Appeals properly affirmed summary judgment for Columbia on PRE's antitrust counterclaim. Under the objective prong of the sham exception, the Court of Appeals correctly held that sham litigation must constitute the pursuit of claims so baseless that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect to secure favorable relief. See 944 F.2d at 1529.

California Motor Transport, 404 U.S. at 512-513. We need not decide here whether and, if so, to what extent Noerr permits the imposition of antitrust liability for a litigant's fraud or other misrepresentations. Cf. Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 60(b)(3) (allowing a federal court to "relieve a party . . . from a final judgment" for "fraud . . . , misrepresentation, or other misconduct of an adverse party"); Walker Process Equipment, Inc. v. Probable cause to institute civil proceedings requires no more than a "reasonable belief that there is a chance that [a] claim [*63] may be held valid upon adjudication" (internal quotation marks omitted). Because the absence of probable cause is an essential element of the tort, the existence of probable cause is an absolute defense. See Crescent City Live Stock Co. v. Butchers' Union Slaughter-House Co., 120 U.S. 141, 149, 30 L. Ed. 614, 7 S. Ct. 472 (1887); Wheeler, supra, at 551; Liberty Loan Corp. of Gadsden v. Mizell, 410 So. 2d 45, 48 (Ala. 1982). [*30] Just as evidence of anticompetitive intent cannot affect the objective prong of Noerr's sham exception, a showing of malice alone will neither entitle the wrongful civil proceedings plaintiff to prevail nor permit the factfinder to infer the absence of probable cause. [31] LEdHN[2C][] [2C]LEdHN[8][] [8]The District Court and the Court of Appeals correctly found that Columbia had probable cause to sue PRE for copyright infringement. Where, as here, there is no dispute over the predicate facts of the underlying legal proceeding, a court may decide probable cause as a matter of law. Crescent, supra, at 149;Stewart, supra, at 194;Nelson v. Miller, 227 Kan. 271, 277, 607 P.2d 438, 444 (1980);Stone v. Crocker, 41 Mass. 81, 84-85 (1831); J. Ct. 52 (1923) ("The question is not whether [the defendant] thought the facts to [*64] constitute probable cause, but whether the court thinks they did"). Columbia enjoyed the "exclusive right . . . to perform [its] copyrighted" motion pictures "publicly." 17 U.S.C. § 106(4). Regardless of whether it intended [*32] any monopolistic or predatory use, Columbia acquired this statutory right for motion pictures as "original" audiovisual "works of authorship fixed" in a "tangible medium of expression." § 102(a)(6). Indeed, to condition a copyright upon a demonstrated lack of anticompetitive intent would upset the notion of copyright as a "limited grant" of "monopoly privileges" intended simultaneously "to motivate the creative activity of authors" and "to give the public appropriate access to their work product." Sony Corp. of America v. Universal City Studios, Inc., 464 U.S. 417, 429, 78 L. Ed. 2d 574, 104 S. Ct. 774 (1984).

LEdHN[2D][] [2D]When the District Court entered summary judgment for PRE on Columbia's copyright claim in 1986, it was by no means [1648] clear whether PRE's videodisc rental activities intruded on Columbia's copyrights. At that time, the Third Circuit and a District Court within the Third Circuit had held that the rental of video cassettes for viewing in on-site, private screening rooms infringed on the copyright owner's right of public performance. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc. v. Redd Horne, Inc., 749 F.2d 154 (1984); [*33] Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc. v. Aveco, Inc., 612 F. Supp. 315 (MD Pa. 1985), aff'd, 800 F.2d 59 (1986). Although the District Court and the Ninth Circuit distinguished these decisions by reasoning that hotel rooms offered a degree of privacy more akin to the home than to a video rental store, see 228 U.S.P.Q. (BNA) at 746; 866 F.2d 278, 280-281, copyright scholars criticized both the reasoning and the outcome of the Ninth Circuit's decision, see 1 P. Goldstein, Copyright: Principles, Law and Practice § 5.7.2.2, pp. 616-619 (1989); 2 M. Nimmer & D. Nimmer, Nimmer on Copyright § 8.14[C][3], pp. 8-168 to 8-173 (1992). The Seventh Circuit expressly "decline[d] to follow" the Ninth Circuit and adopted instead [627] the Third Circuit's definition of a "public place." Video [*65] Views, Inc. v. Studio 21, Ltd., 925 F.2d 1010, 1020, cert. denied, 502 U.S. 861 (1991). In light of the unsettled condition of the law, Columbia plainly had probable cause to sue.

Any reasonable copyright owner in Columbia's position could have believed that it had some chance of winning [*34] an infringement suit against PRE. Even though it did not survive PRE's motion for summary judgment, Columbia's copyright action was arguably "warranted by existing law" or at the very least was based on an objectively "good faith argument for the extension, modification, or [1931] reversal of existing law." Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 11. By the time the Ninth Circuit had reviewed all claims in this litigation, it became apparent that Columbia might have won its copyright suit in either the Third or the Seventh Circuit. Even in the absence of supporting authority, Columbia would have been entitled to press a novel copyright claim as long as a similarly situated reasonable litigant could have perceived some likelihood of success. A court could reasonably conclude that Columbia's infringement action was an objectively plausible effort to enforce rights. Accordingly, we conclude that PRE failed to establish the objective prong of Noerr's sham exception.

LEdHN[2E][] [2E] LEdHN[9][] [9]Finally, the Court of Appeals properly refused PRE's request for further [*35] discovery on the economic circumstances of the underlying copyright litigation. As we have held, PRE could not pierce Columbia's Noerr immunity without proof that Columbia's infringement action was objectively baseless or frivolous. Thus, the District Court had no occasion to inquire whether Columbia was indifferent to the outcome on the merits of the copyright suit, whether any damages for infringement would be too low to justify Columbia's investment in the suit, or whether Columbia had decided to sue primarily for the benefit of collateral injuries inflicted through the use of legal process. Contra, Grip-Pak, Inc. v. Illinois Tool Works, Inc., 694 F.2d 466, 472 (CA7 1982), cert. denied, 461 U.S. 958, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1317, 103 S. Ct. 2430 (1983). Such matters concern Columbia's [*66] economic motivations in bringing suit, which were rendered irrelevant by the objective legal reasonableness of the litigation. The existence of probable cause eliminated any "genuine issue as to any material fact," Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 56(c), and summary judgment properly issued.

We affirm the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

JUSTICE SOUTER, concurring.

The Court holds today that a person cannot incur antitrust liability merely by bringing a lawsuit as long as the suit is not "objectively baseless in the sense that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits." Ante, at 60. The Court assumes that the District Court and the Court of Appeals were finding this very test satisfied when they concluded that Columbia's suit against PRE for copyright infringement was supported by "probable [628] cause," a standard which, as the Court explains it in this case, requires a "reasonable belief that there is a chance that [a] claim may be held valid upon adjudication." Ante, at 62-63 (internal quotation marks omitted). I agree that this term, so defined, is rightly read as expressing the same test that the Court announces today; the expectation of a reasonable litigant can be dubbed a "reasonable belief," and realistic expectation of success on the merits can be paraphrased as "a chance of being held valid upon adjudication."

Having established this identity of meaning, however, the Court proceeds to discuss the particular facts [*37] of this case, not in terms of its own formulation of objective baselessness, but in terms of "probable cause." Up to a point, this is understandable; the Court of Appeals used the term "probable cause" to represent objective reasonableness, and it [1649] seems natural to use the same term when reviewing that court's conclusions. Yet as the Court acknowledges, ante, at 63, since there is no dispute over the facts underlying the suit [*67] at issue here, the question whether that suit was objectively baseless is purely one of law, which we are obliged to consider de novo. There is therefore no need to frame the question in the Court of Appeals's terms. Accordingly, I would prefer to put the question in our own terms, and to conclude simply that, on the undisputed facts and the law as it stood when Columbia filed its suit, a reasonable litigant could realistically have expected success on the merits.

My preference stems from a concern that other courts could read today's opinion as [1932] transplanting every substantive nuance and procedural quirk of the common-law tort of wrongful civil proceedings into federal antitrust law. I do not understand the Court to mean anything [*38] of the sort, however, any more than I understand its citation of Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, see ante, at 65, to signal the importation of every jot and tittle of the law of attorney sanctions. Rather, I take the Court's use of the term "probable cause" merely as shorthand for a reasonable litigant's realistic expectation of success on the merits, and on that understanding, I join the Court's opinion.

While I agree with the Court's disposition of this case and with its holding that "an objectively reasonable effort to litigate cannot be sham regardless of subjective intent," ante, at 57, I write separately to disassociate myself from some of the unnecessarily broad dicta in the Court's opinion. Specifically, I disagree with the Court's equation of "objectively baseless" with the answer to the question whether any "reasonable litigant could realistically expect success on the merits." [1] [*40] There might [629] well be lawsuits that fit the latter definition [*68] but can be shown to be objectively unreasonable, and thus shams. It might not be objectively reasonable [*39] to bring a lawsuit just because some form of success on the merits -- no matter how insignificant -- could be expected. [2] With that possibility in mind, the Court should avoid an unnecessarily broad holding that it might regret when confronted with a more complicated case.

As the Court recently explained, a "sham" is the use of "the governmental process -- as opposed to the outcome of that process -- as an anticompetitive weapon." Columbia v. Omni Outdoor Advertising, Inc., 499 U.S. 365, 380, 113 L. Ed. 2d 382, 111 S. Ct. 1344 (1991). The distinction between abusing the judicial process to restrain competition and prosecuting a lawsuit that, if successful, will restrain competition must guide any court's decision whether a particular filing, or series of filings, is a sham. The label "sham" is appropriately applied to a case, or series of cases, in which the plaintiff is indifferent to the outcome of the litigation itself, but has nevertheless [*41] sought to impose a collateral harm on the defendant by, for example, impairing his credit, abusing the discovery process, or interfering with his access to governmental agencies. It might also apply to a plaintiff who had some reason to expect success on the merits but because of its tremendous cost would not bother to achieve that result without the benefit of collateral injuries [*69] imposed on its competitor by the legal process alone. Litigation filed or pursued for such collateral purposes is fundamentally different from a case in which the relief sought in the litigation itself would give the plaintiff a competitive advantage or, perhaps, exclude a potential competitor from entering a market with a product that either infringes the plaintiff's patent or copyright or violates an exclusive franchise granted by a governmental body.

[1933] The case before us today is in the latter, obviously legitimate, category. There was no unethical or other improper use of the judicial system; instead, respondents invoked the federal court's jurisdiction to determine [1650] whether they could lawfully restrain competition with petitioners. The relief they sought in their original action, [*42] if granted, would have had the anticompetitive consequences authorized by federal copyright law. Given that the original copyright infringement action was objectively reasonable -- and the District Court, the Court of Appeals, and this Court all agree that it was -- neither the respondents' own measure of their chances of success

See also ante, at 62: "Sham litigation must constitute the pursuit of claims so baseless that no reasonable litigant could realistically expect to secure favorable relief"; ante, at 60: "If an objective litigant could conclude that the suit is reasonably calculated to elicit a favorable outcome, the suit is immunized under Noerr . . . ." But see ante, at 62: "The existence of probable cause to institute legal proceedings precludes a finding that an antitrust defendant has engaged in sham litigation." And see ante, at 65: "Columbia's copyright action was arguably 'warranted by existing law'" under the standards of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11. These varied restatements of the Court's new test make it unclear whether it is willing to affirm the Court of Appeals by any of these standards individually, or by all of them together.

[2] The Court's recent decision in Farrar v. Hobby, 506 U.S. 103, 121 L. Ed. 2d 494, 113 S. Ct. 566 (1992) makes me wonder whether "10 years of litigation and two trips to the Court of Appeals" to recover "one dollar from one defendant," id., at 116 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring), would qualify as a reasonable expectation of "favorable relief" under today's opinion.

nor an alleged goal of harming petitioners provides a sufficient basis for treating it as a [630] sham. We may presume that every litigant intends harm to his adversary; moreover, uncertainty about the possible resolution of unsettled questions of law is characteristic of the adversary process. Access to the courts is far too precious a right for us to infer wrongdoing from nothing more than using the judicial process to seek a competitive advantage in a doubtful case. Thus, the Court's disposition of this case is unquestionably correct.

I am persuaded, however, that all, or virtually all, of the Courts of Appeals that have reviewed similar claims (involving a single action seeking to enforce a property right) would have reached the same conclusion. To an unnecessary degree, therefore, the Court has set up a straw man to justify its elaboration of [*43] a two-part test describing all potential shams. Of the 10 cases cited by the Court as evidence of [*70] widespread confusion about the scope of the "sham" exception to the doctrine of Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961), and Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965), see ante, at 55, n.3, 5 share three important characteristics with this case: The alleged injury to competition was defined by the prayer for relief in the antitrust defendant's original action; there was no unethical conduct or collateral harm "external to the litigation or to the result reached in the litigation"; [3] [*44] and there had been no series of repetitive claims. Each of those courts concluded, as this Court does today, that allegations of subjective anticompetitive motivation do not make an otherwise reasonable lawsuit a sham. [4]

In each of the five other cases cited by the Court, the plaintiff alleged antitrust violations more [*45] extensive than the filing of a single anticompetitive lawsuit. In three of those cases the core of the alleged antitrust violation lay in the act of petitioning the government for relief: One involved the repetitive filing of baseless administrative claims, [5] [*47] another involved [*71] extensive evidence [1934] of anticompetitive motivation [631] behind the lawsuit that followed an elaborate and unsuccessful lobbying effort, [6] [48] and in the [1651] third a Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777, 82 S. Ct. 1404 (1962), and Cantor v. Detroit Edison Co., 428 U.S. 579, 49 L. Ed. 2d 1141, 96 S. Ct. 3110 (1976) (plurality opinion), that tariff filings with the Federal Communications Commission were acts of private commercial activity in the marketplace rather than requests for governmental action, and thus were not even arguably protected by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. Litton Systems, 700 F.2d at 806-809.

[6] Westmac, Inc. v. Smith, 797 F.2d 313 (CA6 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1035, 93 L. Ed. 2d 838, 107 S. Ct. 885 (1987). Although the Sixth Circuit did hold that the genuine substance of an anticompetitive lawsuit creates a rebuttable presumption of objective reasonableness, given the facts of that case -- in which the antitrust plaintiff had presented strong evidence that the defendants' lawsuit, which followed a long and unsuccessful lobbying effort, had been motivated solely for the anticompetitive harm the judicial process would inflict on it -- that modest reservation was probably wise. Evidence of anticompetitive animus in Westmac was in fact so great that Chief Judge Merritt thought that the plaintiff had successfully rebutted the presumptive reasonableness of defendants' lawsuit. The delay from the defendants' combined lobbying and litigation attack had allegedly sent the plaintiff into bankruptcy, and memos from one defendant to its attorney had stated, "'If this [lobbying activity] doesn't succeed, start a lawsuit -- bonds won't sell,'" 797 F.2d at 318, and (in a statement repeated to a codefendant), "'if nothing else, collateral lawsuit was only one of the many ways in which the antitrust defendant had allegedly tried to put the plaintiff out of business. [7] In each [*72] of these cases the court showed appropriate deference to our opinions in Noerr and Pennington, in which we held that the act of petitioning the government (usually in the form of lobbying) deserves especially broad protection from antitrust liability. The Court can point to nothing in these three opinions that would require a different result here. The two remaining cases -- in which the Courts of Appeals did state that a successful lawsuit could be a sham -- did not involve lobbying, but did contain much broader and more complicated allegations than petitioners [*46] presented below. [8] Like the three opinions described above, these decisions should not be expected to offer guidance, nor be blamed for spawning confusion, in a case alleging that the filing of a single lawsuit violated the Sherman Act.

[49] [632] Even in this Court, more complicated cases, in which, for example, the alleged competitive injury has involved something more than the threat of an adverse outcome in a single [*73] lawsuit, have produced less definite rules. Repetitive filings, some of which are [1935] successful and some unsuccessful, may support an inference that the process is being misused. California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609 (1972). In such a case, a rule that a single meritorious action can never constitute a sham cannot be dispositive. Moreover, a simple rule may be hard to apply when there is evidence that the judicial process has been used as part of a larger program to control a market and to interfere with a potential competitor's financing without any interest in the outcome of the lawsuit itself, see Otter Tail Power Co. v. United States, 410 U.S. 366, 379, n.9, 35 L. Ed. 2d 359, 93 S. Ct. 1022 (1973); Westmac, Inc. v. Smith, 797 F.2d 313, 322 (CA6 1986) (Merritt, C. J., dissenting). It is in more complex cases that courts have required a more sophisticated [*50] analysis -- one going beyond a mere evaluation of the merits of a single claim.

In one such case Judge Posner made the following observations about the subtle distinction between suing a competitor to get damages and filing a lawsuit only in the hope that the expense and burden of defending it will make the defendant abandon its competitive behavior:

> "But we are not prepared to rule that the difficulty of distinguishing lawful from unlawful purpose in litigation between competitors is so acute that such litigation can never be considered an actionable restraint of trade, provided it has some, though perhaps only threadbare, basis in law. Many claims not wholly groundless would never be sued on for their own sake; the stakes, discounted by the probability of winning, would be too low to repay the investment in litigation. Suppose a monopolist brought a tort action against its single, tiny competitor; the action had a colorable basis in law; but in fact the monopolist would never have brought the suit -- its chances of winning, or the damages it could hope to get if it did win, were too small compared to what it would we'll delay sale of the bonds,'" id., at 322 (Merritt, C. J., dissenting) (emphasis omitted). In any event, the Sixth Circuit rule -- to the extent that it would apply in a case as simple as this one -- would result in the same conclusion we reach here.

[7] Federal Prescription Service, Inc. v. American Pharmaceutical Assn., 214 U.S. App. D.C. 76, 663 F.2d 253 (1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 928, 71 L. Ed. 2d 472, 102 S. Ct. 1293 (1982). In that case, the antitrust plaintiff alleged a 2-decade long conspiracy to lobby, boycott, and sue it (in state licensing boards, state legislatures, the marketplace, and both state and federal courts) out of existence. In spite of those allegations, the Court of Appeals found that the defendant's actions, which primarily consisted in lobbying for the abolition of plaintiff's mail-order prescription business, were immune under Noerr-Pennington.

[8] In Grip-Pak, Inc. v. Illinois Tool Works, Inc., 694 F.2d 466 (1982) (Posner, J.), cert. denied, 461 U.S. 958, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1317, 103 S. Ct. 2430 (1983), the antitrust defendant's alleged violations of several provisions of the Sherman and Clayton Acts included much more than the filing of a single lawsuit; they encompassed a broad scheme of monopolizing the entire relevant market by: purchasing patents; threatening to file many other, patently groundless lawsuits; acquiring a competitor; dividing markets; and filing a fraudulent patent application. In In re Burlington Northern, Inc., 822 F.2d 518 (CA5 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1007 (1988), the plaintiffs alleged, and produced evidence to support their theory, that the defendant had filed suit solely to cause them a delay of crippling expense, and the defendants had either brought or unsuccessfully defended a succession of related lawsuits involving plaintiff's right to compete. In both of these cases the Courts of Appeals ably attempted to balance strict enforcement of the antitrust laws with possible abuses of the judicial process. That they permitted some reliance on subjective motivation -- as even we have done in cases alleging abuse of judicial process, see California Motor Transport Co. v. Trucking Unlimited, 404 U.S. 508, 513-518, 30 L. Ed. 2d 642, 92 S. Ct. 609 (1972) -- is neither surprising nor relevant in a case involving no such allegations.

have to spend on the litigation -- except that it wanted to [*51] [*74] use pretrial discovery to discover its competitor's trade secrets; or hoped that the competitor would be required to make public disclosure of its potential liability [1652] in the suit and that this disclosure would increase the interest rate that the competitor had to pay for bank financing; or just wanted to impose heavy legal costs on the competitor in the hope of deterring entry by other firms. In these examples the plaintiff wants to hurt a competitor not by getting a judgment against him, which would be a proper objective, but just by the maintenance of the suit, regardless of its outcome. See City of Gainesville v. Florida Power & Light Co., 488 F. Supp. 1258, 1265-66 (S.D. Fla. 1980).

"Some students of antitrust law would regard all of our examples of anticompetitive litigation as fanciful, and in all the evidentiary problems of disentangling real from professed motives would be acute. Concern with the evidentiary problems may explain why [633] some courts hold that a single lawsuit cannot provide a basis for an antitrust claim (see Fischel, Antitrust Liability for Attempts to Influence Government Action: The Basis and Limits of the Noerr-Pennington [*52] Doctrine, 45 U. Chi. L. Rev. 80, 109-10 (1977)) -- an issue we need not face here since three improper lawsuits are alleged, and it can make no difference that they were not all against Grip-Pak. Still, we think it is premature to hold that litigation, unless malicious in the tort sense, can never be actionable under the antitrust laws. The existence of a tort of abuse of process shows that it has long been thought that litigation could be used for improper purposes even when there is probable cause for the litigation; and if the improper purpose is to use litigation as a tool for suppressing competition in its antitrust sense, see, e.g., Products Liability Ins. Agency, Inc. v. Crum & Forster Ins. Cos., 682 F.2d 660, 663-64 (7th Cir. 1982), it becomes a matter of antitrust concern. This is [*75] not to say that litigation is actionable under the antitrust laws merely because [1936] the plaintiff is trying to get a monopoly. He is entitled to pursue such a goal through lawful means, including litigation against competitors. The line is crossed when his purpose is not to win a favorable judgment against a competitor but to harass him, [*53] and deter others, by the process itself -- regardless of outcome -- of litigating. The difficulty of determining the true purpose is great but no more so than in many other areas of antitrust law." Grip-Pak, Inc. v. Illinois Tool Works, Inc., 694 F.2d 466, 472 (1982).

It is important to remember that the distinction between "sham" litigation and genuine litigation is not always, or only, the difference between lawful and unlawful conduct; objectively reasonable lawsuits may still break the law. For example, a manufacturer's successful action enforcing resale price maintenance agreements, [9] restrictive provisions in a license to use a patent or a trademark, [10] or an equipment lease, [11] may evidence, or even constitute, violations of the antitrust laws. On the other hand, just because a sham lawsuit has grievously harmed a competitor does not necessarily mean that it has violated the Sherman Act. See Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 455-459, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247, 113 S. Ct. 884 (1993). The rare plaintiff who successfully proves a sham must still satisfy the exacting elements of an antitrust demand. See ante, at 61. [*54]

In sum, in this case I agree with the Court's explanation of why respondents' copyright infringement action was not "objectively baseless," and why allegations of improper subjective [*76] motivation do not make such a lawsuit a "sham." I would not, however, use this easy case as a [634] vehicle for [*55] announcing a rule that may govern the decision of difficult cases, some of which may involve abuse of the judicial process. Accordingly, I concur in the Court's judgment but not in its opinion.

ORDER

The appellant, Adams Insulation, brought suit against a number of labor unions alleging a conspiracy in violation of federal Antitrust law. After judgment was entered against Adams Insulation in the district court, the defendant unions filed a motion to bill costs. On October 30, 1991, the unions filed a notice indicating that their application for costs would be presented to the clerk of the court on November 13, 1991.

Under Local Rule 16.5 of the Central District of California, a party must file objections to items specified in a Bill of Costs no later than seven days before the date noticed for the application. Adams Insulation filed a memorandum in opposition to the unions' motion to bill costs on November 12, 1991, one day before the date noticed for the application. Thus, Adams [*2] Insulation's objection was untimely and the clerk was entitled to disregard it. See Lee v. United States, 238 F.2d 341, 343-44 (9th Cir. 1956).

Both Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 54(d) and Local Rule 16.7 of the Central District of California provide a mechanism through which a party may seek district court review of the clerk's assessment of costs. Adams

Insulation, however, made no effort to request district court review of the clerk's award. We therefore have no power to review the finding of the clerk. *Jacobson v. HN1[] Injunctions, Grounds for Injunctions

In order to determine whether a preliminary injunction should issue, the court must weigh the following factors: 1) whether the plaintiff has a reasonable probability of success on the merits; 2) whether the plaintiff will be irreparably harmed if the injunction does not issue; 3) whether other interested parties will be harmed by either a grant or denial of the injunction; and 4) whether issuance of the injunction is in the public interest. The plaintiff has the burden of showing that it will likely succeed on the merits and that it will be irreparably harmed if the preliminary injunction does not issue. If the plaintiff makes this prerequisite showing, then the court must determine the weight of the other two factors, namely, harm to other interested parties and the public interest, to determine if the preliminary injunction should issue.

Parens patriae is a concept of standing utilized to allow states to protect quasi-sovereign interests such as the health, comfort, and welfare of the people of a state and the general economy of that state. A state can sue as parens patriae for the protection of its people or its general economy. This ability of a state to seek protection of its general economy in the federal as well as the state forum includes suits under federal antitrust law.

In order to show the likely effect on an area of competition, the plaintiff must show what the line of commerce is that it contends may be substantially effected. This is determined with reference to the relevant product market.

HN12[] Clayton Act, Claims

The boundaries of the relevant market must be drawn with sufficient breadth to include the competing products of each of the merging companies and to recognize competition where, in fact, competition exists. In determining the relevant product market, well-defined submarkets may exist which constitute the relevant product market for antitrust purposes. The boundaries of such a submarket may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Claims

In order to utilize the Herfindahl-Hirschmann Index to support its case, a plaintiff must establish the relevant market and then must provide reliable data establishing the market share of the participants in that market.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

VanARTSDALEN, S.J.

May 6, 1993

On April 15, 1993, plaintiff, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, filed this action alleging that the acquisition of the Division of Pet, Inc. (Pet), known as Whitman's Chocolates (Whitman's), by Whitman's Candies, Inc. (WCI), violates federal antitrust law, specifically section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. Pennsylvania seeks an injunction preventing Pet from transferring any remaining assets in its Whitman's Chocolate Division to WCI, and ordering that WCI divest itself of assets that have been previously transferred to it by Pet. Defendants Russell Stover, Inc. (Stover) and WCI have filed a motion to dismiss this action, joined in by Pet, contending that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania lacks standing to seek the requested relief. (filed Doc. No. 12).

After holding a conference on plaintiff's application for a temporary restraining order filed with the complaint, I scheduled a hearing for April 26, 1993, on plaintiff's application for a temporary restraining order and/or preliminary injunction. (filed Doc. No. 5). Presently [*2] pending are plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction requesting essentially mandatory divestiture by WCI, and defendants' motion to dismiss for lack of standing. On April 26, 1993, and on April 27, 1993, a full evidentiary hearing and argument was held on these motions. Defendants' motion to dismiss will be denied as I find that plaintiff, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, has parens patriae standing to maintain this action. However, plaintiff has failed to show a likelihood of success on the merits. Therefore, plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction will be denied. In accordance with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 52, I enter the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

I. Findings of Fact

1. Plaintiff is the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, suing in its parens patriae capacity.

2. Defendant, Pet, Inc., (Pet) is a publicly held corporation based in Missouri that operates a division known as the Whitman's Chocolates Division (Whitman's), producer of the "Whitman's Sampler," boxed chocolates, and other confectionery items.

3. Defendant, Whitman's Candies Inc. (WCI), is a Missouri Corporation owned by Scott Ward, Tom Ward, and Linda Ward. (P-unmarked, [*3] Merrifield Dep. at 45-46). [1]

4. Defendant, Russell Stover, Inc. (Stover), is a privately held company based in Missouri. It manufactures and sells boxed chocolates and other confectionery items.

5. Whitman's has experienced declining sales and profits in recent years.

6. Pet has no intent to continue manufacturing the Whitman's line of chocolates after the scheduled plant closing in May, 1993, regardless of the outcome of this proceeding.

7. In June of 1992, Pet announced its intention to sell Whitman's, either as an operating concern, if possible, otherwise to liquidate Whitman's by sale of its assets.

8. In its efforts to sell the assets of the Whitman's Division, Pet engaged the investment banking firm of Lazard Freres & Co. (Lazard).

[1] Plaintiff's exhibits will be referred to as P-unmarked, P-1, etc., and defendants' as D-1, etc.

9. Lazard prepared a confidential memorandum, (P-8, Lazard Memorandum), to be given to parties seriously interested in purchasing Whitman's assets.

10. The Lazard Memorandum was given [*4] only to those apparently seriously interested parties who agreed to sign a confidentiality agreement.

11. Although several parties indicated interest in purchasing the assets of Whitman's, only approximately six or seven parties obtained a copy of the Lazard Memorandum.

12. On or about March 5, 1993, WCI purchased certain assets of Whitman's from Pet, including the Whitman's Trademark, recipes, trade secrets, and certain equipment.

13. Termination of production at Whitman's only plant, located in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, is contemplated for early May, 1993, after exhaustion of Whitman's existing raw materials and packaging.

14. Under the agreement of sale, Pet may continue to use the Trademark, and various other Whitman's assets until final distribution and sale of Whitman's product inventory which is in existence at the time of the termination of production at Whitman's Plant.

15. It is unclear what the relevant product market is for antitrust purposes.

16. Gift boxed chocolates, brand name boxed chocolates, and boxed chocolates are similar products distributed through similar outlets and are substitutes.

17. Other boxed confectionery products, such as peanut brittle, fudge, [*5] and nut clusters, compete with boxed chocolate for sales, and are substitutes.

18. The boxed chocolate industry and the confectionery industry in general are highly competitive.

19. Distribution outlets that sell boxed chocolates to ultimate consumers include national and regional chain drugstores, national and regional mass merchandisers, manufacturer's retail stores, local drugstores, department stores, and specialty candy stores. Ultimate consumers also purchase boxed chocolates and other confectionery items through mail order catalogues published by various distributors, including manufacturers and wholesalers.

20. Chain drugstores and mass merchandisers, [2] as purchasers of boxed chocolates, have considerable if not complete control over what brand of boxed chocolates are sold and displayed in their stores and the retail pricing of those items. Some chain drugstores and some mass merchandisers frequently select Stover's and Whitman's boxed chocolates from a variety of manufacturers' boxed chocolates to sell nationally.

[*6] 21. Stover's boxed chocolates and Whitman's boxed chocolates directly compete for sales.

Testimony

Ms. Beatrice Cozzolino

22. Beatrice Cozzolino, a forklift operator at Whitman's, testified that at annual meetings Whitman's executives mentioned Stover as its competitor. Ms. Cozzolino also testified that the Whitman's employees received notice that the plant will close on or about May 8, 1993.

[2] Chain drugstores include companies such as Rite-Aid, Thrift Drugs, Eckerd's, Pharmor, Revco and CVS, and mass merchandisers include companies such as K-Mart, Wal-Mart, and Target. The witnesses interchangeably referred to chains and chain drugstores, and also interchangeably referred to mass merchandisers, mass marketers, and mass marketeers.

Ms. Blanche Standback

23. Blanche Standback, an hourly supervisor in packaging who has worked for Whitman's for thirty-nine years, testified, based on discussions at annual employee meetings, that Whitman's considered Stover as its "chief competitor." Mr. Jay Shoemaker

24. Jay Shoemaker, former President and CEO of Whitman's from approximately August, 1990, until approximately June, 1991, was hired by Whitman's because of his experience with and knowledge of mass merchandisers and chain drugstores. Mr. Shoemaker described his hiring as a "turn around situation."

25. According to Mr. Shoemaker, previous to his employment at Whitman's, Pet had neglected Whitman's and advertising for Whitman's products had been eliminated. Also, he testified that Whitman's had suffered [*7] "customer deterioration." Part of Whitman's difficulties stemmed from Whitman's rapid price increases, which were not followed by competitors. Whitman's strategy at the time Mr. Shoemaker was President and CEO was to make Whitman's boxed chocolates more attractive for purchase as a gift.

26. The channels of distribution, according to Mr. Shoemaker, are relevant to defining the applicable market. He testified that with respect to particular channels of distribution the consumers within a particular channel are similar and purchase boxed chocolates for similar occasions.

27. Mr. Shoemaker placed Whitman's in the middle priced tier of the branded boxed chocolate market. He testified that the other competitors in the middle priced tier of the branded boxed chocolate market were Stover, See's, Fannie Mae, and Fannie Farmer. According to Mr. Shoemaker, only Stover competed on a national level with Whitman's, and See's, Fannie Mae, and Fannie Farmer were regional competitors. 28. Mr. Shoemaker testified that there is heavy competition for shelf space within mass merchandisers and chain drugstores.

29. Mr. Shoemaker stated that boxed fudge, nut clusters, and peanut brittle compete with boxed [*8] chocolate for sales.

30. According to Mr. Shoemaker, Asher's, a chocolatier located in Germantown, Pennsylvania, does not compete on a regional basis with Whitman's because Mr. Shoemaker considers Asher's inferior in quality and considers Asher's boxed chocolates to be located as a competitor in the lower price tier of the boxed chocolate market.

31. Mr. Shoemaker testified that mass merchandisers and chain drugstores often sold the Whitman's Sampler at $ 3.99, which was below the manufacturer's wholesale price.

Mr. Thomas McNulty

32. Thomas McNulty, who currently works as New Business Development Manager for New England Confectionery Co. of Cambridge, Massachusetts (NECCO), was a former Vice-President of Sales for Whitman's from 1986 until 1990. Mr. McNulty has nearly forty years of experience in the confectionery industry. NECCO produces Candy Cupboard boxed chocolates. Mr. McNulty testified that Candy Cupboard's Masterpieces, a line of boxed chocolates, is sold nationally through K-Mart. He further testified as to what he considers to be two separate product markets: gift boxed chocolates and promotional boxed chocolates. Attempting to distinguish between the two, Mr. McNulty [*9] described promotional boxed chocolates as typically being chocolates packaged in boxes containing larger quantities of chocolate pieces and purchased for office or family consumption.

33. Mr. McNulty testified that although he would consider Whitman's Sampler to be a gift boxed chocolate, in the opinion of some in the industry, Whitman's Sampler has become a promotional boxed chocolate. The perception of Whitman's Sampler as a promotional boxed chocolate is perhaps due to the fact that mass merchandisers and chain drugstores often sell the Whitman's Sampler at a retail price of $ 3.99, a price less than that at which Whitman's sells the product to the retail outlets.

34. Mr. McNulty testified that in general the boxed chocolate business is highly competitive, and has become even more competitive in the past year.

35. Mr. McNulty testified that the buyers for mass merchandisers and chain drugstores are constantly called upon by purveyors of confections, including boxed chocolates, who would like to sell their products to and obtain store shelf space from the mass merchandisers and chain drugstores for retail distribution.

36. Mr. McNulty testified that significant competition exists [*10] for shelf space in the chain drugstores and in mass merchandisers.

37. Mr. McNulty testified that promotional boxed chocolates were developed at the request of retailers.

38. Mr. McNulty testified that Hershey's, Mars, and Nestle's have considerable influence with mass merchandisers and chain drugstores, and admitted on cross-examination that all manufacture boxed chocolates.

39. Mr. McNulty testified that the ultimate consumer of boxed chocolates and confections in general has a wide array of outlets to choose from when purchasing boxed chocolates and confections, including department stores, manufacturers' retail stores, specialty candy stores, and through mail order catalogues, in addition to mass merchandisers and chain drugstores.

40. Based on his extensive experience in the confectionery business, and on available information in the confectionery industry, Mr. McNulty testified as to his estimates of Whitman's and Stover's current respective percentage of sales in a particular market segment. Mr. McNulty based this testimony on United States Commerce Department figures for confectionery products, National Confectioners Association data, sales information based on his experience [*11] with confections, and information in newspaper and magazine articles. The percentages estimated by Mr. McNulty were for branded gift boxed chocolates sold through mass merchandisers and chain drugstores. According to Mr. McNulty, Whitman's accounted for approximately 15-20% and Stover's accounted for 50%.

41. Mr. McNulty stated that Hershey's, Mars, and Nestle's have the resources (productive, financial, and strategic) to enter the national gift boxed chocolate market.

Mr. James L. Rawlings

42. After Pittsburgh Food & Beverage Company, Inc., obtained a copy of the Lazard Memorandum, James L. Rawlings, who serves as a consultant, representative, and agent for Pittsburgh Food & Beverage Company, Inc., discussed with Mr. Gold of Lazard the potential interest of Pittsburgh Food & Beverage in acquiring the assets of Whitman's that Pet intended to sell.

43. The sum of Mr. Rawlings' testimony is that Pittsburgh Food & Beverage Company, Inc., expressed interest in Whitman's assets to Mr. Gold of Lazard, and if Whitman's assets were again available for sale, Pittsburgh Food & Beverage Company, Inc., would still be interested in purchasing the assets. However, Mr. Rawlings never communicated [*12] to Mr. Gold a firm offer from Pittsburgh Food & Beverage for the purchase of Whitman's assets.

44. Eugene Smith, a consultant and private investor for Mr. Sagra, spoke with Mr. Gold on behalf of Mr. Sagra concerning Mr. Sagra's potential interest in Whitman's. Mr. Smith testified that neither he nor Mr. Sagra received a copy of the Lazard Memorandum, and Mr. Sagra was not allowed access to Whitman's plant. Apparently, Mr. Sagra refused to sign the confidentiality agreement Whitman's required before it would allow access to the plant or provide a copy of the Lazard Memorandum.

Dr. John L. Stanton

45. Dr. Stanton, professor and the C.J. McNutt Chair of Food Marketing Research in the Department of Food Marketing at St. Joseph's University, has a Ph.D. in marketing from Syracuse University and extensive experience in the field of marketing as a professor and consultant.

46. Dr. Stanton testified that significant competition exists for shelf space in chain drugstores and in mass merchandisers.

47. For a portion of his testimony, Dr. Stanton relied on certain documents prepared by Whitman's, such as the Lazard Memorandum (P-8) and Whitman's Marketing Plan [*13] for 1992-1993 (P-19). [3]

48. Based on his experience in marketing, Dr. Stanton testified as to the importance of marketing plans and the general reliability of information contained within those plans. Based on his review of P-19, Whitman's is a chief competitor of Stover. 49. Dr. Stanton testified that Whitman's and Stover have high brand name recognition with consumers, which is also referred to as brand equity.

50. Dr. Stanton described the substantial control that retailers have over their scarce shelf space and testified that retailers such as chain drugstores and mass marketers often charge slotting allowances, a rental fee for the shelf space, and "goodbye money," which is a fee retailers charge manufacturers for taking unsuccessful products off the shelves.

51. Dr. Stanton testified that Hershey's, Mars, and Nestle's have considerable influence [*14] with mass merchandisers and chain drugstores.

52. Dr. Stanton testified that the ultimate consumer of boxed chocolates and confections in general has a wide array of outlets to choose from when purchasing boxed chocolates and confections, including Department Stores, Manufacturer's Retail Stores, and Specialty Candy Stores.

Mr. Michael H. Siemer

53. Mr. Michael H. Siemer, C.P.A., is Vice-President of Operations Control and Analysis at Pet.

54. In 1989, Mr. Siemer recommended to Pet that it sell Whitman's assets.

55. Since 1985, Whitman's sales volume have declined and the costs for the manufacture of its products have increased due to the age of its factory, an increase in competition, and the inefficient methods of distribution utilized by Whitman's.

56. Mr. Siemer testified that Whitman's had suffered losses in recent years.

57. Pet decided to sell Whitman's assets because the Division required substantial capital investment if it was to continue operations due to the seasonal nature of its sales, it was suffering declining sales, and it did not fit into Pet's overall corporate plans.

58. Mr. Siemer was involved in the preparation of the Lazard Memorandum. He testified [*15] that reliable industry data for market share purposes is unavailable, and that certain numbers provided in the Lazard Memorandum are based solely on estimates of Whitman's management, as clearly noted in the Lazard Memorandum itself. Although he described the numbers as management's best estimates, he also characterized them as unreliable for market share purposes due to lack of accurate industry data and the purpose for which the estimates were prepared.

[3] Although admissible as against Pet, both documents, as well as testimony based on those documents, on objection was ruled inadmissible as against WCI and Stover.

59. According to Mr. Siemer's testimony, Pet does not intend to continue to operate Whitman's after the plant closing, even if WCI is ordered to divest of Whitman's assets.

Other Evidence

Mr. Thomas Merrifield [4]

60. Mr. Merrifield was not sure if the Whitman's Sampler should be categorized as a gift boxed chocolate or promotional boxed chocolate. (Merrifield Dep. at 35).

61. Whatever market category the Whitman's Sampler [*16] currently falls into, WCI intends to manufacture and market the Whitman's Sampler as a gift boxed chocolate. (Merrifield Dep. at 36).

62. According to Mr. Merrifield, the retailer determines whether a boxed chocolate is a promotional boxed chocolate or a gift boxed chocolate. (Merrifield Dep. at 32).

63. Mr. Merrifield also stated that as to sales of boxed chocolates to national chain drugstores and mass merchandisers, Whitman's was Stover's number one competitor, (Merrifield Dep. at 19), and that boxed chocolates are Stover's best selling product, accounting for 50% of Stover's total sales. (Merrifield Dep. at 11).

Stipulation as to Purchase of Certain Confectionery Items

64. Defendants introduced into evidence a stipulation between plaintiff and defendants, for purposes of the preliminary injunction hearing, providing a list of described items that were purchased since the filing of the complaint at the indicated locations and prices. (Defs. Ex. Nos. 100-169, filed Doc. No. 24). The list includes confectionery products ranging in price, description, and outlet where purchased.

65. This evidence shows, as does the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, that there is an abundance [*17] of competition in the market for chocolates in general, including boxed chocolate products purchased for gift-giving, and there is a variety of outlets from which ultimate consumers can purchase those products. Lazard Memorandum

66. The Lazard Memorandum, principally relied on by plaintiff, provides a general description of the United States confectionery market, and the United States chocolate confectionery market, and describes boxed chocolates as a segment of this market.

II. Discussion

Standard for Preliminary Injunction

HN1[] In order to determine whether a preliminary injunction should issue, the court must weigh the following factors: 1) whether the plaintiff has a reasonable probability of success on the merits; 2) whether the plaintiff will be irreparably harmed if the injunction does not issue; 3) whether other interested parties will be harmed by either a grant or denial of the injunction; and 4) whether issuance of the injunction is in the public interest. Plaintiff has the burden of showing that it will likely succeed on the merits and that it will be irreparably harmed if the preliminary injunction does not issue. If plaintiff makes this prerequisite showing, [*18] then I must determine the weight of the other two factors, namely, harm to other interested parties and the public interest, to determine if the preliminary injunction should issue. See Eli Lilly and Co. v. Premo Pharmaceutical Labs., 630 F.2d 120, 136 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1014 (1980).

[4] Plaintiff introduced into evidence the deposition of Mr. Thomas Merrifield, the vice-president of WCI. (P-Unmarked, Merrifield Dep.).

HN2[] A preliminary injunction is ordinarily granted for the purpose of maintaining the status quo during the litigation. HN3[] Divestiture is an appropriate remedy under the Clayton Act, California v. American Stores, Co., 495 U.S. 271 (1990); however, plaintiff's request for a preliminary injunction ordering that WCI mandatorily divest of Whitman's assets seeks not to maintain but rather to alter the status quo. United States v. Price, 688 F.2d 204 (3d Cir. 1982), provides that HN4[] under appropriate circumstances a district court may direct mandatory preliminary injunctive relief. 688 F.2d at 210-212. HN5[] Because plaintiff seeks to alter the status quo by requesting mandatory preliminary relief, plaintiff's burden of establishing entitlement to that preliminary [*19] relief is heightened. Punnett v. Carter, 621 F.2d 578, 582 (3d. Cir. 1980). Applying either the traditional or heightened standard, plaintiff has failed to meet its burden.

Antitrust Standing

Defendants raise the issue of plaintiff's standing in their motions in opposition to issuance of a preliminary injunction and in their motions to dismiss the complaint. Defendants assert that parens patriae standing is lacking in this case, and therefore, the preliminary injunction should be denied for failure to show that Pennsylvania, lacking standing, will likely succeed on the merits. They further assert that the case should be dismissed based on the same reason.

HN6[] Parens patriae is a concept of standing utilized to allow states to protect quasi-sovereign interests [5] such as the health, comfort, and welfare of the people of a state and the general economy of that state. Gibbs v. Titelman, 369 F. Supp. 38, 54 (E.D. Pa. 1973), rev'd on other grounds, 502 F.2d 1107 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1039 (1974). A state can sue as parens patriae for the [*20] protection of its people or its general economy. See Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. v. Puerto Rico, 458 U.S. 592, 607 (1982), Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R., 324 U.S. 439, 446-448 (1945). This ability of a state to seek protection of its general economy in the federal as well as the state forum has been well recognized and includes suits under federal antitrust law. As Justice Douglas stated in Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R., 324 U.S. 439 (1945), "suits by a State, parens patriae, have long been recognized. There is no reason why those suits should be excluded from the purview of the anti-trust acts." 324 U.S. at 447. Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R. involved a suit brought by the State of Georgia, parens patriae, seeking an injunction under federal antitrust law. The Supreme Court held that Georgia could maintain the suit.

[*21] Defendants principally rely on Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104 (1986), in asserting that Pennsylvania does not have parens patriae standing to pursue this action to prevent harm to its general economy. Defendants read Cargill as effectively overruling Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R., as it applies to parens patriae actions seeking an injunction under federal antitrust law. Particular importance is attached by defendants to the statement in Cargill that it would be anomalous to allow a party to seek an injunction to prevent harm when the party would not have standing to seek damages if the harm were to occur. Cargill, 479 U.S. at 112. [6] The Supreme Court in Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., 405 U.S. 251 (1972), held that states cannot seek damages for injury to a state's general economy caused by a violation of federal antitrust law. Thus, defendants argue, a state cannot seek injunctive relief for harm to its general economy.

[*22] A close look at both Standard Oil Co. and Cargill suggests to me that, under Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R., HN8[] a state may still seek injunctive relief for harm to its general economy that is caused by a violation of federal antitrust law. The Supreme Court in Standard Oil Co. recognized the difficulty in allowing damage awards for harm to a state's general economy. While theoretically cognizable as a direct injury, the practicalities of attempting to measure damages and the likelihood of duplicative recovery counselled against permitting state suits

[5] HN7[] "A state that sues as parens patriae must seek to redress an injury to an interest that is separate from the interests of particular individuals." People of State of New York by Abrams v. Seneci, 817 F.2d 1015, 1017 (2d Cir. 1987).

[6] The Court stated that "it would be anomalous, we think, to read the Clayton Act to authorize a private plaintiff to secure an injunction against a threatened injury for which he would not be entitled to compensation if the injury actually occurred." Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, 479 U.S. at 112.

for damages to that state's general economy. However, the parties in Standard Oil Co. did not suggest that lack of availability of damages affected the availability of injunctive relief. 405 U.S. at 256 n.7. [7]

[*23] In fact, Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the Court in Standard Oil Co. reiterated the holding of Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R. and stated that > the Court upheld Georgia's claim as parens patriae with respect to injunctive relief, but had no occasion to consider whether the antitrust laws also authorized damages for an injury to the State's economy . . . . Nowhere in Georgia did the court address itself to the question whether § 4 of the Clayton Act authorizes damages for an injury to the general economy of a State. Thus, the question presented here is open.

405 U.S. at 260. Justice Marshall's opinion indicates that a state's parens patriae standing to seek an injunction to prevent harm to the state's general economy caused by a violation of federal antitrust law remains a closed question until the Court expressly decides to revisit that issue.

In Cargill the issue of a state's parens patriae standing to seek an injunction under federal antitrust law to prevent harm to the state's general economy was not before the Supreme Court and the Court did not suggest any intention to eradicate the traditional precepts [*24] of parens patriae standing for purposes of injunctive relief. Although the Court in Cargill did state that it would be anomalous to allow a private party to sue for an injunction when that party could not sue for damages, and the state is considered a private party under the antitrust laws, the Supreme Court did not discuss Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R. Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R. involved precisely the anomaly intimated in Cargill and the Court in Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R. found that although Georgia had standing to seek an injunction preventing the antitrust behavior, it would not have standing to seek damages. Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R., 324 U.S. at 453. It would be imprudent to infer that Cargill intended to overrule Georgia v. Pennsylvania R.R., when the issue of parens patriae standing was not before the court.

The contours of antitrust standing as it relates to a state in its parens patriae capacity are perhaps different from antitrust standing as it applies to other private parties. Precedent involving standing of individual private parties may not control the issue of parens patriae standing as those [*25] cases do not implicate quasi-sovereign interests. Although the state is considered a private party, to some extent, when it brings an action parens patriae, defendants fail to realize possible nuances between an individual and a state which are relevant to the issue of antitrust standing.

The Commonwealth asserts that it seeks through this action to prevent the harm that WCI's acquisition of Whitman's would cause to the general economy of Pennsylvania due to a substantial decrease in competition. At least for purposes of deciding the pending motion for a preliminary injunction, I conclude that Pennsylvania has standing to proceed under the doctrine of parens patriae. Therefore, defendants' motion to dismiss will be denied. However, before any relief may be granted on Pennsylvania's claim as parens patriae, plaintiff will have to prove an antitrust injury to the general economy of Pennsylvania.

Antitrust Law

Plaintiff is bringing this suit under 15 U.S.C. § 18. Section 18 provides:

> HN9[] No person engaged in commerce or in any activity affecting commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or [*26] other share capital and no person subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire the whole or any part of the assets of another person engaged also in commerce or in any activity affecting commerce, where in any line of commerce or > in any activity affecting commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly.

[7] The Court stated that "although the Court of Appeals directed that the count be dismissed in its entirety, the parties have not suggested that its decision foreclosed any relief the State might obtain by way of injunction." Standard Oil Co., 405 U.S. at 256 n.7.

15 U.S.C. § 18 (emphasis added).

Plaintiff asserted on the second day of the hearing that it does not contend that WCI's purchase of the Whitman assets from Pet will tend to create a monopoly. Therefore, the issue is whether Pennsylvania is likely to succeed in proving at trial that the effect of WCI's acquisition of Whitman's assets may be substantially to lessen competition in a line of commerce. Pennsylvania bears the burden of proving that the acquisition of Whitman's assets by WCI may substantially lessen competition in a line of commerce. Plaintiff argues that WCI is in effect controlled by Stover, so that WCI's acquisition of Whitman's should be viewed as if Stover had actually acquired the assets. The majority [*27] of the evidence dealt with comparison of Stover and Whitman's, apparently equating WCI, the actual purchaser of Whitman's assets, with Stover for purposes of this antitrust action. Although Stover is not directly acquiring the assets of Whitman's, apparently plaintiff intends to show that Stover will control WCI, and therefore, acquisition of Whitman's by WCI may substantially lessen competition by virtue of Stover's influence on WCI decisionmaking.

Stover's Potential Control of WCI

The deposition of Mr. Merrifield, the Vice President of WCI, (P-unmarked, Merrifield Dep. at 3), provides some evidence of the connection. Mr. Merrifield served as Vice President of Eastern Sales for Russell Stover prior to his current position as Vice President of WCI, and had been employed by Stover since he graduated from college. (Merrifield Dep. at 4-5).

A few responses by Mr. Merrifield in his deposition relate to commonality of ownership. Mr. Merrifield engaged in the following colloquy with plaintiff's counsel:

> Q. Are you still presently employed at Russell Stover?
> A. I'm employed by Whitman's Candies, Inc. [WCI].
> Q. You resigned from Russell Stover?
> A. No, I was [*28] appointed to vice-president of Whitman's Candies, Inc., when we bought the company. . . .
> Q. When you say "we," do you mean Russell Stover?
> A. Yes.

(Merrifield Dep. at 13).

Mr. Merrifield stated that: Tom Ward, Scott Ward, and Jack Carr will have input into pricing decisions at WCI, (Merrifield Dep. at 20); Jack Carr is employed by Stover and not by WCI, but will have pricing input at WCI, (Merrifield Dep. at 20-21); and Tom Ward, Vice-President of Stover, and Scott Ward, President of WCI, each own one-third of WCI, (Merrifield Dep. at 20). WCI will use Stover's distribution centers. (Merrifield Dep. at 25). However, Mr. Merrifield testified that WCI is an entirely separate entity from Stover. (Merrifield Dep. at 46). Although, plaintiff's evidence to establish the essential link between WCI and Stover is extremely weak, the evidence produced for purposes of deciding the preliminary injunction motion will suffice. For present purposes only, I will accept plaintiff's contention that the purchase by WCI is functionally the same as a purchase by Stover, and I will view the effect of WCI's acquisition as if Stover had directly acquired the assets of Whitman's.

Geographic [*29] Market

HN10[] Ordinarily, plaintiff bears the burden of proving the relevant geographic market as an essential element of its antitrust claim. See United States v. Marine Bancorporation, 418 U.S. 602, 618 (1974). Plaintiff asserts that the United States is the relevant geographic market. Defendants do not contest plaintiff's allegation that the United States constitutes the relevant geographic market for purposes of the preliminary injunction. Utilizing the entire United States as the relevant geographic market, I must determine whether plaintiff has shown that it will likely succeed in proving that WCI's purchase of Whitman's assets may substantially lessen competition on a nationwide basis within the relevant product market.

Relevant Product Market

HN11[] In order to show the likely effect on an area of competition of WCI's acquisition of Whitman's, plaintiff's must show what the line of commerce is that it contends may be substantially effected. See Marine Bancorporation, 418 U.S. at 618 (1974). This is determined with reference to the relevant product market. See Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 324 (1962). [*30] Plaintiff suggests alternative choices for what the relevant market is, asserting that it is either branded gift boxed chocolates sold nationally through chain drugstores and mass marketers, or it is the slightly broader market of boxed chocolates sold through those same channels of distribution.

HN12[] "The boundaries of the relevant market must be drawn with sufficient breadth to include the competing products of each of the merging companies and to recognize competition where, in fact, competition exists." Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 326. In determining the relevant product market, well-defined submarkets may exist which constitute the relevant product market for antitrust purposes. Id. at 325. "The boundaries of such a submarket may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors." Id.

Mr. Shoemaker and Mr. McNulty differentiated gift boxed chocolates from other confectionery [*31] products. Their attempt to distinguish between the products does not establish that gift boxed chocolates or boxed chocolates constitutes a submarket within the general confectionery market. Mr. McNulty testified that promotional boxed chocolates were largely created at the behest of retailers. Whitman's Sampler, Whitman's top volume seller, often sold at retail for $ 3.99, indicating that it was used as a promotional boxed chocolate, selling to the consumer at a loss to the retailer (referred to in the testimony as a "loss leader"). The evidence indicates that gift boxed chocolates and promotional boxed chocolates, although potentially distinct products, compete in the same product market due to the fluidity between the two. This fluidity is evidenced by Mr. McNulty's testimony that the Whitman's Sampler is viewed by some as a promotional boxed chocolate and by testimony that the retailer determines whether a boxed chocolate is a gift boxed chocolate or a promotional boxed chocolate.

The relevant product market, however, is not limited to the combination of the gift boxed chocolates and promotional boxed chocolates markets. A large variety of products compete with boxed chocolates. [*32] In fact, Mr. Shoemaker admitted on cross-examination that other items, including such items as boxed fudge, peanut brittle, and nutclusters, compete with boxed chocolates for sales. Plaintiff's difficulty in delineating the relevant product market is understandable in light of the wide variety of product substitutes and consumer outlets for the purchase of those products. Plaintiff has failed to show that it will likely prove at trial that the relevant product market is limited to gift boxed chocolates or even boxed chocolates. Without a clear showing of the relevant market, plaintiff is not entitled to the requested preliminary relief.

Likely Effect On Market Competition

Plaintiff must show that it will likely succeed in proving that the acquisition of Whitman's assets by WCI may substantially lessen competition in the relevant market. Although plaintiff has failed to show that gift boxed chocolates or boxed chocolates is the relevant market, I will assume for purposes of discussing the likely effect on competition that the relevant product market is the broader boxed chocolate market.

It is unclear from plaintiff's evidence just what effect WCI's purchase of Whitman's may [*33] have on competition in the relevant market. Whitman's and Stover compete most heavily against each other in selling to mass merchandisers and chain drugstores. Plaintiff urges the court to consider the potential effect of the acquisition on the competition in those two channels of distribution only, virtually eliminating all other significant competition in the boxed chocolates market, including Godiva, See's, Fannie Mae, Fannie Farmer, Hallmark, and many other manufacturers who distribute boxed chocolates through department stores, manufacturer's retail stores, specialty candy stores, local drugstores, and other outlets.

At the hearing, some of plaintiff's witnesses considered the relevant product market to exclude boxed chocolates, gift or otherwise, that are high-priced or low-priced, leaving only middle-priced boxed chocolates as competition. Arguments factoring quality and price as determining the relevant product market often fail. See, e.g., Murrow Furniture v. Thomasville Furniture, 889 F.2d 524 (4th Cir. 1989). This is so because the definition of the relevant product market as articulated by Brown Shoe Co. "presumes that consumers are [*34] willing to make tradeoffs on some of the very factors the [plaintiff] attempts to use to define [the] market." Murrow Furniture, 889 F.2d at 528. HN13[] Where the antitrust plaintiff articulates product differences along a spectrum of price and quality, the product market distinctions are economically meaningless, see Murrow Furniture, 889 F.2d at 528, and unrealistic. See Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 326. However, the price and quality distinctions are relevant in analyzing the effect WCI's acquisition of Whitman's will likely have on competition. See Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 326 (taking the distinctions into account for purposes of discerning the likely effect of a merger).

Dr. Stanton testified as to Stover's potential marketing strategy involving differing price-points. Relating this case to his own experience, Dr. Stanton stated that Stover could block out a price range for its products by utilizing Whitman's to block competitors at the lower price and quality range from entering the middle price range. Stover could keep its boxed chocolate products at the upper [*35] end of the middle price range and could, through WCI, price Whitman's boxed chocolate products in the lower price range. Products competing with Whitman's boxed chocolate products would be unable to raise their prices to the middle range above Whitman's prices, thus, effectively blocking out several "price-points" from the competition.

This two-tiered pricing scenario aimed at keeping new entrants out of the middle-tier is purely speculative and does not make sound economic sense. The technique seems slightly unrealistic at best, and at worst could prove disastrous for Stover. Assuming Whitman's and Stover's products compete, Stover would stand to lose substantial sales in implementing this technique. If Whitman's and Stover do not compete, WCI's purchase of Whitman's assets will not greatly impact Stover's market power; Whitman's Sampler, the highest volume seller of Whitman's, currently sells quite often below the manufacturer's price to the retailer; Stover, which manufactures more than one type of boxed chocolate, could implement the scheme without WCI's acquisition of Whitman's; and the evidence indicates that WCI intends to revitalize Whitman's products, such as the famous Whitman's [*36] Sampler. If this marketing technique was successfully implemented in a different product market as illustrated by Dr. Stanton, it may have been because the product utilized to block entrants from the middle-price tier was not in competition with the higher priced product. Dr. Stanton testified that the higher-priced product was developed to replace the lower-priced one, indicating that the lower-priced product may not have been a substitute for the newer product.

Even if I were to narrow the market so drastically, as plaintiff urges me to do, it remains unclear just what effect this would have on competition within mass merchandisers and chain drugstores channels of distribution. Plaintiff's witnesses portrayed the mass merchandisers and chain drugstores as having considerable control over manufacturers of boxed chocolates and other confectionery products. Dr. Stanton's testimony concerning slotting allowances and goodbye money, and his description of retailers as being shelf space realtors, would seem to characterize manufacturers as the customers who purchase and consume retail shelf space, rather than characterizing retailers as the direct customers of manufacturers such as Whitman's [*37] and Stover. Dr. Stanton's description of retailers' substantial control of shelf space and testimony as to the great demand of potential competitors in these channels of distribution for such shelf space, if accurate, would seem to obviate the effects of any attempted anticompetitive behavior on the part of Stover.

Existing Competition In The Market

The evidence established that in the confectionery industry competition is heavy. In the middle tier pricing level Stover and Whitman's are the major players on a national level selling to mass marketers and chain drugstores. However, there are strong regional players. For example, plaintiff's evidence showed that, on the West Coast, See's is a tough competitor in the boxed chocolate market, [8] although they do not compete in the mass marketers and chain drugstores because See's primary chain of distribution is its own retail outlet stores. Plaintiff's witness, Thomas McNulty, a former Vice President of Sales for Whitman's, considered the Candy Cupboard brand of boxed chocolates by NECCO as a regional competitor of Whitman's but, citing confidentiality concerns, he did not provide any statistics as to the strength of its competition. [*38] Further, testimony of plaintiff's witnesses portrayed the retail drugstore chains and mass marketers as having significant power in determining which manufacturers will be allowed to stock the retailer's shelves. Chain drugstore buyers and buyers for the mass marketers are bombarded with calls from candy manufacturers of all kinds who would like to have their products sold on and who compete for those retailer's shelf slots or spaces. In effect, Mr. McNulty testified that if a chain drugstore or mass merchandiser approached NECCO for national distribution of Candy Cupboard, that company would jump at the opportunity to supply boxed chocolates to it. The evidence is quite clear that other large regional confectionery manufacturers are seeking opportunities to place their products in chain drugstore and mass merchandiser outlets.

Market Share Information

Accurate information on the respective [*39] market share of boxed chocolate manufacturers is scarce. Jay Shoemaker, Thomas McNulty, and Dr. Stanton all testified that the tracking data in the industry is very poor and difficult, if not impossible, to obtain. At argument, defendants asserted that in order to succeed on a claim alleging that the WCI acquisition of Whitman's may substantially lessen competition, plaintiff must produce hard evidence of market share. Although hard evidence of market share certainly would aid the finder of fact, accepting defendants' argument would permit an industry to shield itself from liability under section 7 of the Clayton Act by poorly tracking, collecting, or assessing data as to market share among competitors. The availability of hard data must be taken into consideration before holding plaintiff responsible for failure to present that data. Proof of market share may be made by introducing evidence of the best available data. At least for present purposes, the evidence of market share need not be perfectly precise, provided it is sufficient for drawing reasonable conclusions.

In order to grant plaintiff effective relief, I would have to mandatorily enjoin WCI to divest itself of Whitman's [*40] assets. At a minimum, plaintiff must introduce market share data for the relevant product market that is admissible against WCI in order to be entitled to the requested relief. Unfortunately, because the market share evidence introduced at the hearing was inconclusive and largely unreliable, and as noted, the majority of that evidence is inadmissible against WCI and Stover, plaintiff has failed to show a likelihood of success on the merits.

Plaintiff relies in part on Whitman's estimates of its share of the boxed chocolate market sold through certain channels of distribution as provided in the Lazard Memorandum. (P-8). Counsel for defendants Stover and WCI appropriately objected to admission of the Lazard Memorandum and Whitman's Marketing Report for 1992-1993 (P-19) as evidence against Stover and WCI because the purported estimates were solely that of Whitman's. The objection was sustained. The information in that memorandum, testimony based on that information, and testimony as to other statements made on behalf of Whitman's, is not admissible against Stover and WCI. Dr. Stanton's testimony as to the relative strengths of Stover and Whitman's was based on information inadmissible [*41] against WCI and Stover. Mr. McNulty's testimony as to the relative market strengths of Stover and Whitman's, although based on independent data, limited the market to branded gift boxed chocolates sold nationally through mass merchandisers and chain drugstores. [9] The extremely narrow market for which Mr. McNulty provided figures does not substantially aid in determining the post acquisition market power Stover, through WCI, will possess even as to boxed chocolates in general. [10] [8] There is evidence that See's total annual sales volume is approximately 150 million, which if true, exceeds Whitman's.

[9] Such narrowing of the relevant product market has been referred to as describing the proverbial "strange red-haired, bearded, one-eyed man-with-a-limp." City of Detroit v. Grinnell Corp., 495 F.2d 448, 457 n.4 (2d Cir. 1974) (quoting United States v. Grinnell, 384 U.S. 563, at 591 (1966) (Fortas, J., dissenting)).

[10] Mr. McNulty estimated that for sales of branded gift boxed chocolates sold through mass merchandisers and chain drugstores Whitman's accounted for approximately 15-20% and Stover's accounted for 50%.

[*42] For antitrust purposes, Pennsylvania imports too much weight to the product differentiation indicated in the Lazard Memorandum. "Market share" information provided in the Lazard Memorandum, when taken in the context of the entire memorandum is inconclusive and not wholly reliable for the purposes for which Pennsylvania seeks to utilize it. Further, the information is inadmissible against Stover and WCI. It is admissible against Pet because it is a document prepared by Pet's agent, Lazard, with the assistance of Pet. Stover and WCI have never adopted nor acknowledged the Lazard Memorandum as accurate and the document was not otherwise authenticated. According to the Lazard Memorandum, as to boxed chocolates, Whitman's competes with Stover nationally, and in various regional areas throughout the United States with regional manufacturers in distribution to chain drugstores and mass merchandisers, and also competes with boxed chocolates sold through other outlets and for other end-markets. To exclude the effect of this competition, Pennsylvania attempted to severely restrict the definition of the relevant product market.

Little market share information was submitted that was admissible [*43] against WCI and Stover. No market share information was submitted which would include the substitutes mentioned by Mr. Shoemaker as competing with boxed chocolates. Without this information it is impossible to determine exactly how WCI's acquisition of Whitman's may affect the relevant market. Thus, plaintiff's assertion of the concentration in the market has not been established by the admissible and relevant evidence. Plaintiff asserts that market concentration should be calculated with reference to the Herfindahl-Hirschmann Index (HHI). Plaintiff did not introduce into evidence the application of the HHI. Moreover, HN14[↑] in order to utilize the HHI to support its case, plaintiff must establish the relevant market and then must provide reliable data establishing the market share of the participants in that market. [11]

HN15[↑] Once plaintiff makes out a prima facie showing that the acquisition may likely substantially lessen competition, defendant can rebut the evidence by showing that the barriers to entry are not significant. See United States v. Baker Hughes, Inc., 285 U.S. App. D.C. 222, 908 F.2d 981, 984 (D.C. Cir. 1990). If I were to determine that plaintiff's would likely prove that branded gift boxed chocolates sold through mass merchandisers and chain drugstores is the relevant market, then, accepting Mr. McNulty's figures, acquisition by WCI, presumably controlled by Stover, of Whitman's could presumptively violate antitrust law. See United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321 (1963). However, the barriers to entry in even that market are not significant.

Plaintiff's witness, David Ganong, President of Ganong Bros. Limited, a Canadian manufacturer of packaged chocolates, provided in his sworn statement that his company has "found it difficult to penetrate the market positioning held by Russell Stover and Whitman, due to very strong market power, the strength of the two brands and strong trade contacts and historic sales [*45] relationships by both companies." (P-unmarked, Ganong Aff.). Mr. Shoemaker, Mr. McNulty, and Dr. Stanton testified that significant barriers exist to entry into the market on a national level. Those barriers, according to the testimony, were essentially brand equity, name recognition, and the substantial monetary investment required.

Although plaintiff's witnesses made blanket statements as to significant barriers to entry, other statements made by those same witnesses tended to show that as to certain manufacturers those barriers are not significant. Mr. Shoemaker, Mr. McNulty and Dr. Stanton admitted that Hershey's, Mar's and Nestle's, referred to as the "big three," had the power and manufacturing resources to enter even the assertedly narrow market of gift boxed chocolates sold nationally through chain drugstores and mass marketers. Mr. McNulty testified that his company, NECCO, as a regional competitor, would be ready, willing and able to supply boxed chocolates for chain drugstores and mass marketers nationally. [12] If the company Mr. McNulty works for is representative, other similarly situated regional competitors (and there are many) are ready, willing, and able to enter [*46] the market. Contrary to plaintiff's assertions, the sum of the testimony supports a finding that the barriers to entry in the boxed chocolate market are not significant.

[11] The relevant market must be correctly defined, "if not, the HHI's computed are meaningless and do not reflect market reality." F.T.C. v. PPG Industries, Inc., 255 U.S. App. D.C. 69, 798 F.2d 1500, 1503 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

[12] Candy Cupboard Masterpieces, a boxed chocolate manufactured by NECCO, is already distributed nationally through K-Mart.

Harm to the General Economy of Pennsylvania

Even if plaintiff had met its burden of showing a likelihood of success on the merits, it has failed to show irreparable harm that will occur if the preliminary injunction is not granted. The sale of Whitman's assets to WCI has taken place, and Pennsylvania seeks to change the status quo in seeking mandatory divestiture by WCI. [13] The imminent closing of the Whitman's plant in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, will certainly affect the surrounding community. I am aware and concerned about the impact the closing will have on the employees of Whitman's and their families. Although I recognize the likely detrimental effect of the plant closing, it is clear that any potential "anticompetitive [*47] effect" of WCI's acquisition cannot be causally linked to the plant closing. Unfortunately, the antitrust laws are not designed to prevent the effects likely to occur after Whitman's ceases operations in Philadelphia. The evidence does not establish that the plant closing by Pet will have any anticompetitive effect on the sale of boxed chocolates or that Pet's sale of Whitman's assets to WCI as opposed to some other hypothetically interested entity can be considered the cause of the plant closing. Nothing in the Clayton Act or other federal antitrust laws addresses Pennsylvania's concern about the plant closing.

Plaintiff brought this parens patriae action to protect its quasi-sovereign interest in the general economy of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania from harm caused by a violation of federal [*48] antitrust law. Other than stating that WCI's acquisition will harm Pennsylvania's general economy, plaintiff has not articulated how the alleged antitrust violation will harm its quasi-sovereign interest in Pennsylvania's general economy. At this stage of the litigation, it is difficult to discern from plaintiff's evidence how Pennsylvania's general economy will suffer from the violation alleged by plaintiff. The evidence produced at the preliminary injunction hearing does not establish that Pennsylvania consumers will pay more for gift or promotional boxed chocolates or that as a result of the acquisition, Stover, in exerting increased power, will drive local chocolatiers out of business. The evidence does not show that Pennsylvania retailers will suffer from anticompetitive behavior on the part of Stover. Plaintiff's witnesses readily admitted the variety of outlets for purchasing boxed chocolates and a substantial variety of manufacturers of boxed chocolates. The retailers have scare shelf space and a variety of manufacturers willing to stock their shelves with boxed chocolates. In fact, certain Pennsylvania confectionery manufacturers such as Asher's may benefit if Stover attempts [*49] to raise prices for boxed chocolates it sells to chain drugstores and mass merchandisers. If Stover attempts to raise prices it will invite retailers to take advantage of their control over scarce shelf space and provide access for local and regional candy manufacturers to the retailers' channels of distribution.

Because of my conclusion that plaintiff failed to show a likelihood of success on the merits, I need not consider a balancing of the equities as to the harm that a grant or denial of the preliminary injunction will cause to the parties or the public. Due to the imminent plant closing, which is of major concern to the public and all parties, this memorandum opinion was prepared without transcription of notes of testimony and is not as detailed in findings of fact and conclusions of law as would ordinarily be provided absent extreme time constraints. To the extent the foregoing "Discussion" contains findings of fact or conclusions of law not specifically set forth under the sections entitled "Findings of Fact" and/or "Conclusions of Law," the same shall be deemed as additional findings of fact and/or conclusions of law.

III. Conclusions of Law

1. Civil Action 93-1972 [*50] is an action brought by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, parens patriae, seeking injunctive relief under federal antitrust law.

2. The court has jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties.

[13] Although originally requested in the complaint's prayer for relief, (Complaint, at 10, P 28(e)), plaintiff concedes that this court could not order Pet to continue manufacturing Whitman's at the Philadelphia plant.

3. Pennsylvania has standing to bring this action.

4. Pennsylvania failed to prove that it will likely succeed on the merits.

5.. Pennsylvania failed to show that it will likely establish that the relevant market for antitrust purposes is branded gift boxed chocolates sold nationally at chain drugstores and mass merchandisers. Plaintiff further failed to show that boxed chocolates is the relevant market.

6. Pennsylvania failed to show that it will prove WCI's acquisition of Whitman's may substantially lessen competition in a relevant market.

7. Pennsylvania failed to prove it will suffer irreparable harm to its general economy if the preliminary injunction is not granted.

8. Pennsylvania is not entitled to a preliminary injunction ordering WCI and Stover to divest Whitman's assets purchased from Pet, and ordering further that Pet not transfer any remaining assets of Whitman's to WCI or Stover, or any other preliminary relief.

An appropriate order follows.

ORDER

For the reasons [*51] set forth in the accompanying memorandum opinion, containing findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a discussion of the issues relating to plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, plaintiff's motion is DENIED. Defendants' motion to dismiss for lack of standing, (filed Doc. No. 12), is likewise DENIED.

[*805] OPINION AND ORDER

For a period of nine years, plaintiff, Caribe BMW, Inc. ("Caribe") was the sole importer-retailer in Puerto Rico of certain BMW automobiles [*806] and parts. Caribe worked under an "Importer Contract" it negotiated in Germany with codefendant Bayerische Motoren Werke Aktiengesellschaft ("BMW AG"), the German manufacturer of BMW cars and parts and Caribe's only supplier of BMW products. Caribe would buy BMW products directly from BMW AG in Germany, import them into Puerto Rico, and sell them to consumers in Puerto Rico. In December 1990, BMW AG terminated its contract with Caribe.

Thereafter, Caribe filed the present action against BMW AG for breach of contract, [2] violation of the Puerto Rico Dealers' Contracts Act ("Act 75"), and violation of Federal and Puerto Rico antitrust laws. Under the same antitrust laws and allegations it raised against BMW AG, Caribe also sued BMW of North America ("BMW NA"), a wholly-owned subsidiary of BMW AG that imports BMW automobiles and parts into the continental United States where it sells them to various retailers. These retailers, in turn, sell the BMW products to consumers. There has never been a contractual relation between Caribe and BMW NA.

Plaintiff has amended its Complaint three times, twice in an attempt to cure various deficiencies raised by the defendants in a succession of dispositive motions. Before the Court are a combination of motions to dismiss the entire Second Amended Complaint (the "Complaint") and their respective oppositions. BMW NA and BMW AG have moved to dismiss the antitrust claims in Caribe's Complaint for failure to state a cause of action. BMW AG also avers that the court lacks in personam jurisdiction and that plaintiff's contract-based allegations should be dismissed because of a mandatory forum-selection clause in the Importer Contract making Germany the exclusive [3] jurisdiction for all disputes.

I. BACKGROUND

A. THE COMPLAINT

There are four "counts" or causes of action alleged in Caribe's Complaint. Count one (Robinson-Patman Act and Puerto Rico's Antimonopolistic law) states that: (1) BMW AG charged Caribe higher prices than BMW NA contemporaneously charged retail outlets in the United States that were competing with Caribe in the resale of BMW automobiles of like grade and quality, in violation of Section 2(a) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(a), and the analogous Puerto Rico antitrust statute, P.R. Laws Ann. tit. 10 § 265; (2) BMW AG and BMW NA paid unidentified brokerage commissions or discounts in lieu thereof to its dealers, where no services were provided in return, in violation of Section 2(c) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(c); (3) BMW NA offered retail outlets in the continental United States competing with Caribe unspecified economic advantages unavailable to Caribe on proportionally equal terms, in violation of Sections 2(d) and 2(d) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 13(d) and (e), [4] and P.R. Laws Ann. tit. 10 §§ 263(b) and (c); and (4) if BMW NA is deemed separate from BMW AG for Robinson-Patman Act purposes, then BMW NA knowingly induced and received a price discrimination in violation of Section 2(f) of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(f), and P.R. Laws Ann. tit. 10, § 263(d).

Count two (Sherman Act and Puerto Rico law) states that: Caribe, under threat that it would be terminated as a BMW importer/retailer, agreed to a "secret condition" in the Importer's Contract prohibiting it from raising its retail prices above levels set by BMW AG and BMW NA, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, and the analogous Puerto Rico antitrust statute, P.R. Laws Ann. tit. 10 § 258.

Count three (Breach of Contract) alleges that BMW AG breached the Importer Contract by: (a) incorrectly representing that these contracts were "standard;" (b) charging Caribe prices that were not those that were "valid on the dates of the invoices;" (c) failing to sell Caribe the 318i model or its substantial equivalent; (d) failing to offer "factory support;" (e) directly or indirectly selling and [5] delivering "cars destined to be sold in Puerto Rico;" and (f) unjustifiably terminating the contract.

Count four (Act 75) states that BMW AG violated the Puerto Rico Dealers' Contracts Act, P.R. Laws Ann. tit. 10, § 278, et seq. [*807] (1964), by terminating the Importer Contract without just cause.

B. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Plaintiff's original complaint was filed on February 1, 1991 (Docket No. 1). It was quickly followed by a "First Amended Complaint" on March 18, 1991 (Docket No. 3).

On May 14, 1991, BMW NA filed a Motion to Dismiss and/or for Summary Judgment regarding the two antitrust claims in the First Amended Complaint, which were, and still are, the only claims asserted against BMW NA (Docket No. 9). Attached to BMW NA's motion was a three-paragraph affidavit by James Ryan, a BMW NA executive, as well as copies of blank "dealer agreements" BMW NA used in the mainland United States. BMW NA's motion also included a separate statement of material facts as to which BMW NA alleged there was no genuine issue to be tried. In essence, BMW NA argued that the amended complaint failed to state critical factual elements to properly assert antitrust claims.

During the early [6] summer of 1991, plaintiff notified BMW NA with various wide-ranging discovery requests and deposition notices. BMW NA responded with an extensive "Motion for Protective Order," pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(c) (Docket No. 13), enclosing copies of all the disputed discovery requests. In its Rule 26(c) motion, BMW NA argued that plaintiff's "broad-based merits discovery" should not be allowed or, in the alternative, that discovery should be limited to the antitrust issues raised in the pending motion to dismiss and/or for summary judgment, as allowed by Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f).

On June 17, 1991, plaintiff responded by filing motions requesting discovery be compelled, opposing defendants' motion to dismiss, and tendering an amended complaint. [1]

[7] The sum effect of plaintiff's multiple filings was that it refused BMW NA's alternative suggestion that discovery be limited to the antitrust issues in BMW NA's motion to dismiss. Indeed, through its Rule 56(f) motion and its motion to compel, Caribe insisted on obtaining all the extensive discovery it originally sought. In addition, Caribe submitted a complete -- despite its "preliminary" title -- opposition to BMW NA's motion to dismiss and for summary judgment. And, finally, Caribe tendered a Second Amended Complaint expressly directed towards defeating BMW NA's motion to dismiss.

On July 10, 1991, the Court (Fuste, J.) granted BMW NA's motion for protective order, denied Caribe's Rule 56(f) motion and its motion to compel discovery, and stayed all discovery pending resolution of BMW NA's motion to dismiss the antitrust claims. The Court also allowed the Second Amended Complaint. (Docket No. 25) (the "Complaint").

Apparently unaware of the Second Amended Complaint, BMW AG's first pleading in the case, a motion to dismiss and/or for summary judgment, was directed towards the, by then moot, First Amended Complaint. (Docket No. 27, July 15, 1991). BMW AG's motion sought [8] dismissal of the Complaint for lack of in personam jurisdiction and failure to state a cause of action as to the antitrust claims. Regarding the Act 75 and breach of contract claims (the "contract claims"), BMW AG requested summary judgment in its favor on the basis of a choice-of-forum clause in its contract with Caribe that designated Germany, and not Puerto Rico, as the only forum to [*808] resolve their disputes. It supported its motion with a separate statement of uncontroverted material facts which was founded on two affidavits by BMW AG executives, to wit, Mr. Horst Dihlmann and Dr. Jost J. Schmitt. [2]

[9] Meanwhile, BMW NA filed yet another motion to dismiss addressed to the antitrust claims in the Second Amended Complaint. (Docket No. 36). This time, however, BMW NA changed procedural tack: it withdrew its original request for summary judgment and framed its motion as strictly one to dismiss the Complaint. Arguing, correctly we believe, [3] that the Second Amended Complaint had wiped the procedural slate clean, BMW NA asked the court to ignore the Ryan affidavit and other exhibits it attached to its original motion, and to focus solely on the latest version of the Complaint. BMW NA argued that the Complaint by itself failed to state a cause of action. BMW

[1] The motions were: (a) a "Cross Motion to Compel Answers to Caribe's Discovery Requests" and Opposition to BMW NA's Rule 26(c) motion (Docket No. 14); (b) a motion for leave to file a "Second Amended Complaint" (in direct response to BMW NA's Motion to Dismiss and/or for Summary Judgment) (Docket No. 15); (c) a tendered "Second Amended Complaint" (Docket No. 15); (d) a Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f) motion to deny BMW NA's dispositive motion or to "continue a hearing on the motion until discovery has been conducted" (Docket No. 18) with an affidavit from William R. Pakalka, one of Caribe's attorneys; and (e) a motion obliquely entitled "Caribe BMW, Inc.'s Memorandum of Law in Preliminary Opposition to Motion by Defendant BMW of North America, Inc. to Dismiss and for Summary Judgment" (Docket No. 17). Though the title of this last motion is confusing, the motion was clearly an opposition to BMW NA's motion for summary judgment since it included a separate "Statement of Material Facts as to Which There Exists a Genuine Issue to be Tried," as well as an affidavits from Juan Antonio Quintano Heilpern, President and principal stockholder of Caribe.

[2] BMW AG's mistiming of its Motion for Summary Judgment, as opposed to its Motion to Dismiss included in the same document, has little practical effect regarding plaintiff's contract claims, since the only allegations that plaintiff had amended dealt exclusively with antitrust law. Regardless, BMW AG later slightly revised its original Motion to Dismiss and Motion for Summary Judgment and refiled it to correspond to the Second Amended Complaint (Docket No. 37, August 1, 1991).

[3] Our impression is apparently shared by Caribe who in its most recent motion conceded that "BMW NA thus currently has pending before this Court only a motion to dismiss." Docket No. 50, at 2. We will proceed to consider only the allegations of the complaint for purposes of the requested dismissal of the antitrust claims.

NA also asserted that the requested dismissal should be with prejudice given that plaintiff has had no less than three opportunities to sufficiently plead its antitrust allegations, and had failed.

[10] Plaintiff, for its part, filed a supplement to its opposition to BMW NA's Motion to Dismiss (Docket No. 39) (to which BMW NA responded, Docket No. 41). Then, on September 27, 1991, it simultaneously filed the following motions: (a) a renewal Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f) motion, specifically requesting discovery only as to BMW NA and BMW AG's motions to dismiss the antitrust claims and as to BMW AG's Motion to Dismiss for lack of in personam jurisdiction (Docket No. 50); [4] (b) an opposition to BMW AG's Motion to Dismiss and Motion for Summary Judgment (Docket No. 51); and (c) an Opposition to BMW NA and BMW AG's Motion to Dismiss the antitrust claims (Docket No. 52). BMW NA and BMW AG filed their respective replies and opposition to the Rule 56(f) request (Docket Nos. 56 and 57). We again find plaintiff's Rule 56(f) request unavailing as an unfocused and unsubstantiated "fishing expedition" and hereby DENY it.

[11] On December 19, 1991, the case was reassigned to the undersigned judge (Docket No. 58).

The following motions are currently before the Court for resolution:

(a) BMW NA's motion to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint (Docket No. 36);

(b) BMW AG's Motion to Dismiss and/or for Summary Judgment (Docket No. 37);

(c) plaintiff's "Memorandum of Law in Preliminary Opposition to Motion by Defendant [BMW AG] to Dismiss and/or for Summary Judgment (Docket No. 51);

(d) Plaintiff's "Memorandum of Law in Preliminary Opposition to Defendants' BMW NA and BMW AG's Motion to Dismiss" (Docket No. 52); and

(e) BMW NA and BMW AG's "Reply" to plaintiff's three motions (Docket Nos. 56 and 57).

II. ISSUES

The following issues raised by the outstanding motions will be addressed by the Court seriatim.

1. Should this Court exercise in personam jurisdiction over BMW AG?

2. Does the Complaint fail to state an antitrust cause of action against BMW NA and BMW AG?

3. Assuming the Court has personal jurisdiction over BMW AG, should it specifically enforce the forum-selection clause which designates [*809] Germany as the exclusive jurisdiction for this dispute?

[4] Plaintiff's Rule 56(f) motion was completely silent as to BMW AG's motion to dismiss the contract claims.

[5] Although, as stated above, the Court will limit its review of the defendants' motions to dismiss the antitrust claims strictly to the well-pleaded facts in the Complaint, no such limitation applies to our review of BMW AG's motion to dismiss the contract claims. Regarding these claims, we have reviewed the affidavits of Mr. Dilhmann and Dr. Schmitt, as well as a statement of uncontroverted facts submitted by BMW AG which, on the specific issue of the effect of the forum-selection clause, was not controverted by plaintiff. In fact, plaintiff focused its evidence and discovery requests on the antitrust and personal jurisdiction issues and never attempted to show that the clause was unreasonable or that Germany was a fundamentally unfair forum. Since plaintiff has the burden of proof on this issue, and given that BMW AG's motion was presented as one to dismiss the complaint and/or for summary judgment, then BMW AG's statement of facts and affidavits must be taken as true. *See Alvarado Morales v. [14] BMW AG, a German corporation, manufactures automobiles and parts in Germany, which it sells throughout the world. BMW AG does not have offices, employees, manufacturing operations, real property or a license to do business in Puerto Rico.

Caribe is a Puerto Rico corporation. Caribe's major stockholders during 1981 through 1990 were Mr. Juan Quintano Heilpern and Mr. Pablo Benoit Hamel. Neither are American citizens nor residents of Puerto Rico: Mr. Quintano Heilpern is a citizen of Spain and Mr. Benoit Hamel is a citizen of either France, Spain or Chile.

BMW NA is a Delaware corporation with its principal place of business in New Jersey. BMW NA, not BMW AG, sells BMW automobiles and parts to retail outlets in the continental United States. Caribe competed with these retail outlets insofar as some consumers in Puerto Rico bought BMW automobiles and parts from continental retail outlets and shipped them privately into Puerto Rico.

In June 1981, BMW AG and Caribe negotiated a contract, titled the "Importer Contract," whereby Caribe agreed to purchase BMW cars and parts in Germany and import them into Puerto Rico for resale to the "motoring public." Title to the vehicles BMW AG [15] sold to Caribe was transferred in Germany. The vehicles were paid for in German marks, and payment was made in Germany.

The negotiations that led to the Importer Contract in 1981 were conducted primarily in Munich, Germany between BMW AG and Mr. Quintano and/or Mr. Benoit, with some correspondence and telephone calls to and from Germany and Spain between these parties. These negotiations, and the transactions that sustained the contractual relationship between the parties over the years, were conducted by Messrs. Quintano or Benoit on behalf of Caribe and by various officers of BMW AG located in Germany. (No negotiations with Messrs. Quintano or Benoit took place in Puerto Rico.) The Importer Contract was renewed every year from 1982 until 1987.

[*810] At some point in 1988, the parties conducted additional contractual negotiations in Munich, Germany. As a result, by letter dated July 8, 1988, BMW AG offered Caribe to enter into a three-year Importer Contract, effective until 1991. The offer was in German. Mr. Quintano accepted the offer on behalf of Caribe, although he objected to the automatic expiration clause. His objection was made in writing in German.

The following forum-selection [16] clause appeared in the German language Importer Contract:

> Place of performance and fulfillment of this agreement, as well as the exclusive jurisdiction for disputes concerning the beginning and termination of this agreement, as well as all and any rights and duties arising out of this agreement, is Munich, Federal Republic of Germany.

This forum-selection clause was a part of all the renewals executed by the parties between 1981-1988. The Importer Contract also has a choice-of-law clause that states as follows:

> All disputes concerning the beginning and termination of this agreement, as well as all and any rights and duties arising out of this agreement, will be subject to the laws of the Federal Republic of Germany as applied between the German merchants.

BMW AG has similar Importer Contracts in approximately one hundred countries.

District of Puerto Rico (failure to submit statement of contested facts in opposition to a motion for summary judgment results in movants' statement of uncontroverted facts being deemed admitted).

Sometime in 1987, BMW AG and BMW NA offered Caribe the opportunity to switch from being a direct purchaser of BMW AG to a direct purchaser of BMW NA. Caribe did not accept this offer. Thereafter, BMW AG extended Caribe's contract through June 1991, and Caribe continued to purchase from BMW AG.

During 1987, BMW NA gave its retail [17] dealers in the continental United States payments of value and other considerations as compensation for services and facilities furnished by or through such retailers in connection with processing, handling, sale and offering for sale of BMW automobiles offered for sale by such retailers, none of which BMW AG made available on proportionally equal terms to Caribe. Also, Caribe's prices were higher than its competitors, i.e., BMW retail outlets in the continental United States. Caribe was not specifically told that the payments, rebates, allowances and other considerations that were extended by BMW NA to its retail dealers in the continental United States would be made available to Caribe on proportionally equal terms should it accept the offer to become a BMW NA retailer.

If Caribe had accepted the 1987 offer to buy directly from BMW NA, it would have been required to give up unspecified benefits resulting from its Importer Contract with BMW AG while remaining responsible for shipping BMW automobiles from the continental United States into Puerto Rico.

Caribe was unable to sell BMW vehicles at a price low enough to compete for consumer business with BMW dealers in the continental [18] United States.

Consumers in Puerto Rico were charged higher prices by Caribe than they would have paid BMW retailers in the continental United States.

In 1990, BMW AG terminated its contract with Caribe.

A. PERSONAL JURISDICTION

BMW AG asserts that it does not meet the minimum contacts test [6] to satisfy due process requirements because it does not own property, run business operations or conduct purposeful activities in Puerto Rico. Consequently, BMW AG argues that this Court cannot exercise jurisdiction over it and that the claims against it should be dismissed as a matter of law.

Plaintiff rejects BMW AG's contention and essentially argues that BMW AG's long term contractual relationship with Caribe and its predecessors--to sell cars in Puerto Rico and thus obtain benefits [19] from Puerto Rico's economy and laws--sufficiently meets the minimum contacts test. Caribe also suggests that the Court cannot properly make this [*811] determination until it has allowed certain requested discovery on this issue. See Procedural Background ante.

Normally, contentions of this nature, given the circumstances alleged, would require greater scrutiny and the submission of additional evidence. However, we need not resolve this difficult jurisdictional issue, however, since we are dismissing the antitrust claims on the merits and the contract claims for improper venue.

This dismissal of the Complaint in favor of the party challenging our jurisdiction forecloses any need to consider the jurisdictional challenge since, for all practical purposes, it has become academic. See *Carnival Cruise Lines, Inc. v. Shute, 111 S. Ct. 1522, 1528, 113 L. B. ANTITRUST CLAIMS

1. Robinson-Patman Act

(a) "Single Seller" Requirement

HN4[] To assert a prima facie claim under any of the provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, a plaintiff must allege that the asserted discriminations involved a single seller. See, e.g., Walpa Constr. Corp. v. Mobile Paint Mfg. Co., 701 F. Supp. 23, 27 (D.P.R. 1988). [7] [22] In its Complaint, Caribe in the first instance bases its Robinson-Patman claims on sales by BMW AG to Caribe and sales by BMW AG's wholly-owned subsidiary BMW NA to BMW retail dealers in the continental United States. Caribe recognizes that the two defendants are located in two different countries and that they are separately incorporated. Nevertheless, plaintiff attempts to satisfy the "single seller" requirement of the Robinson-Patman Act by lumping BMW AG and BMW NA together as "collectively BMW." [8] This is clearly insufficient.

HN5[] Although sales by two affiliated companies can, under certain circumstances, be treated as having been made by a single seller for Robinson-Patman Act purposes, such linkage cannot be presumed even if one [*812] seller is wholly owned by the other. Acme Refrigeration of Baton Rouge, Inc. v. Whirlpool Corp., 785 F.2d 1240, 1243 (5th Cir.) ("HN6[] the same seller doctrine, however, is not to be invoked merely upon a showing that one seller is wholly owned by another"), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 848, 93 L. Ed. 2d 108, 107 S. Ct. 171 (1986). Rather, a Robinson-Patman Act plaintiff must make an "affirmative showing" that the parent actually controls [23] the subsidiary's selling activities. Id. (citing III E. Kintner & J. Bauer, Federal Antitrust Law § 21.16 at 212 (1983); 4 J. Von Kalinowski, Antitrust Laws and Trade Regulation § 24.04[2][a] (1985)). Specifically, a parent will not be considered to be the same seller as its wholly-owned subsidiary for purposes of the Robinson-Patman Act unless the plaintiff affirmatively pleads and shows that the parent actively controls the subsidiary by dictating the customers to whom it sells merchandise, as well as the prices, terms, and conditions of the sales made by the subsidiary. See, e.g., Acme Refrigeration of Baton Rouge, Inc. v. Whirlpool Corp., 785 F.2d 1240, 1243 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 848, 93 L. Ed. 2d 108, 107 S. Ct. 171 (1986), Island Tobacco Co. v. R.J. Reynolds Indus., 513 F. Supp. 726, 734 (D. Supp. 791, 845 (D. Minn. 1989).

[8] This lumping together of the defendants is so indiscriminate and confusing as to constitute an attempt to make BMW AG and BMW NA look like a single entity by the simple fiat of referring to them collectively or separately to suit plaintiff's purposes. For example, in paragraph 11 of the Complaint, plaintiff refers to "BMW" as the manufacturer of BMW products, where clearly BMW NA, as opposed to BMW AG, is not a manufacturer of anything.

Under this clear precedent, Caribe's unsupported conclusion that BMW AG and BMW NA are a single entity, and thus a single seller for Robinson-Patman purposes, cannot survive the defendants' well-founded challenge, particularly considering that plaintiff has had ample warning and opportunities to meet its burden. In short, Caribe has not alleged the essential facts necessary to support an assertion that BMW AG and BMW NA are a single seller for purposes of the statute.

Because Caribe has failed to allege sufficiently that the alleged discriminatory sales were made by the same seller, a crucial jurisdictional element of its Robinson-Patman claims has not been satisfied, thus requiring dismissal of each such claim.

Plaintiff's counsel has argued that BMW AG impermissibly discriminated against Caribe by selling on more favorable terms to Caribe's alleged "competitor" BMW NA. However, there is no such claim in Caribe's pleadings. Its Second Amended Complaint, as did its prior complaints, alleges only that Caribe is an "importer-retailer purchasing directly from the factory" and that Caribe resells those automobiles solely "to the motoring public." (Complaint, PP 15 and 14). Also, [25] Caribe has contended throughout that it competes with the BMW retailers that buy from BMW NA, not with BMW NA itself. Nowhere is it alleged that Caribe is an "importer-distributor" competing with BMW NA for sales of BMW automobiles to retail dealers. Caribe's counsel cannot substitute with argument what is Caribe's affirmative duty to plead with specificity. See Daury v. Smith, 842 F.2d 9, 15 (1st Cir. 1988) ("we do not think our duty to liberally construe the pleadings gives a plaintiff the license to amend the complaint by memorandum . . . ."); Glaros v. Perse, 628 F.2d 679, 681 (1st Cir. 1980) (same). The cases cited by Caribe apply only to the situation in which the same supplier sells goods to its subsidiary at more favorable prices than it sells to a purchaser competing with the subsidiary in the resale of the goods. Because Caribe does not contend in the Complaint that it resells to dealers in competition with BMW NA or has ever sought to compete with BMW NA, Caribe's argument is misplaced. Acme Refrigeration, 785 F.2d at 1242-1244.

In sum, Caribe's repeated failure to allege [26] in any of its complaints that it competes with BMW NA in sales to retail dealers in the mainland United States, or that it has sought to do so, compels dismissal of the Robinson-Patman claims.

(b) Availability

Plaintiff's Robinson-Patman claims are subject to dismissal for yet another reason. Caribe's basic Robinson-Patman claims rest upon the conclusory allegation that prices, allowances and services given by BMW NA to the retail dealers in the continental [*813] United States which competed with Caribe allegedly were more favorable than the prices, allowances, and services provided by BMW AG to Caribe. Caribe also asserts, however, that it was offered the opportunity to become a BMW NA retailer--an offer it rejected. However, Caribe argues that it was not told at that time about these favorable terms. But, importantly, Caribe fails to claim that if it had known, it would have switched suppliers from BMW AG to BMW NA. Instead, Caribe alleges that it had no duty to make such a switch and did not want to lose unspecified benefits as BMW AG's importer-retailer. Thus, regardless of how the opportunity to become a BMW NA retailer were presented to Caribe, it would have rejected it.

[27] HN7[] A Robinson-Patman Act claim will not lie if the buyer fails to take advantage of favorable prices or arrangements that were in fact made available to it. See, e.g., Bouldis v. U.S. Suzuki Motor Corp., 711 F.2d 1319, 1326 (6th Cir. 1983); Shreve Equip., Inc. v. Clay Equip. Corp., 650 F.2d 101, 105 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 897, 70 L. Ed. 2d 213, 102 S. Ct. 397 (1981); Rod Baxter Imports, Inc. v. Saab-Scania of America, Inc., 489 F. Supp. 245, 249 (D. Minn. 1980). Thus, Caribe's factual averments indicate that its alleged injury was self-inflicted and beyond Robinson-Patman protection.

Caribe attempts to salvage its Robinson-Patman Act claims by asserting that the favorable prices and concessions it sought were not made "practically available" to it because to have taken advantage of the offers would have required Caribe to alter its purchasing status. This argument cannot withstand close scrutiny.

All that Caribe had to do to obtain the prices and concessions allegedly offered to BMW NA's retail dealers was to become one--and purchase BMW automobiles from BMW NA rather than from [28] BMW AG. We find no judicial authority for the point of view that a favorable treatment is 'practically' unavailable to a buyer if the buyer has to change suppliers to obtain such treatment. In fact, the case law is to the contrary. See, e.g., Hanson v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Indus., Inc., 482 F.2d 220, 227 (5th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1136, 38 L. Ed. 2d 761, 94 S. Ct. 880 (1974); Tri-Valley Packing Ass'n v. F.T.C., 329 F.2d 694, 703-04 (9th Cir. 1964).

Caribe also states in the Complaint that it was never told it would not be discriminated against if it had agreed to become a BMW NA dealer. Caribe seems to be saying that when the defendants offered it the opportunity to purchase from BMW NA, they had a legal duty to inform Caribe that it would not be discriminated against.

However, absent factual allegations to the contrary--allegations that Caribe has not made--the law presumes that BMW NA would have behaved properly, not unlawfully. See P.R.R. Evidence, T. 32 Ap. IV R. 16, presumption 32; 29 Am. Jur. 2d Evidence §§ 168-169 at 209-10 (1967) (1993 Supplement). As our Court of Appeals has cautioned, [29] the liberal pleading rules do not "entitle a plaintiff to rest on 'subjective characterizations' or conclusory descriptions of a general scenario which could be dominated by unpleaded facts." Correa-Martinez v. Arrillaga-Belendez, 903 F.2d 49, 52-53 (1st Cir. 1990) (citing Dewey v. Univ. of New Hampshire, 694 F.2d 1, 3 (1st Cir. 1982)), cert. denied, 461 U.S. 944, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1301, 103 S. Ct. 2121 (1983). Rather, "it is only when such conclusions are logically compelled, or at least supported, by the stated facts, that is, when the suggested inference rises to what experience indicates is an acceptable level of probability, that 'conclusions' become 'facts' for pleading purposes." Dartmouth Review v. Dartmouth College, 889 F.2d 13, 16 (1st Cir. 1989) (emphasis added).

(c) Sections 2(c), 2(d) and (e)

Caribe also alleges claims under sections 2(c), 2(d) and 2(e) of the Robinson-Patman Act. In doing so, Caribe simply quotes or paraphrases statutory language without providing any factual support.

HN8[] The mere incantation of antitrust "buzzwords" cannot substitute for necessary factual allegations [30] establishing a valid claim for recovery. Since plaintiff's bald statements [*814] that these antitrust violations occurred are not supported by facts, it has failed to state a claim for which relief may be granted. See, e.g., Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1110 (7th Cir. 1984) ("Invocation of antitrust terms of art does not confer immunity from a motion to dismiss . . . ."), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1054, 84 L. Ed. 2d 821, 105 S. Ct. 1758 (1985); Kaiser Aluminum v. Avondale Shipyards, Inc., 677 F.2d 1045, 1050 (5th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1105, 74 L. Ed. 2d 953, 103 S. Ct. 729 (1983); Klebanow v. New York Produce Exchange, 344 F.2d 294, 299 (2d Cir. 1965).

(d) Section 2(f)

Caribe also charges BMW NA with knowingly receiving a forbidden price discrimination in violation of section 2(f) of the Robinson-Patman Act. This claim must be dismissed as well.

HN9[] A customer cannot claim injury under the Robinson-Patman Act for preferences allegedly given to another customer with whom it does not compete. See, e.g., White Indus., Inc. v. Cessna Aircraft Co., 845 F.2d 1497, 1498-1500 [31] (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 856, 102 L. Ed. 2d 118, 109 S. Ct. 146 (1988); Best Brands Beverage, Inc. v. Falstaff Brewing Corp., 842 F.2d 578 (2d Cir. 1987); National Distillers & Cham. Corp. v. Brad's Machine Prods., Inc., 666 F.2d 492 (11th Cir. 1982).

As already explained, Caribe's Complaint alleges solely that Caribe is an "importer-retailer" selling to the "motoring public" in competition with dealers purchasing from BMW NA. Nowhere is it alleged that Caribe is in competition with BMW NA for sales to dealers, as it must be alleged for Caribe's claim under section 2(f) to withstand dismissal.

2. Sherman Act Claims

Caribe alleges that it was forced--on threat of termination of its contract with BMW AG--to agree not to raise its retail prices above levels set by BMW AG, in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. Caribe claims that it lost profits as a result of this alleged maximum resale price maintenance agreement.

However, plaintiff lacks standing to pursue such relief. HN10[] Section 4 of the Clayton Act limits standing to bring an action for treble damages under the Sherman Act only to "persons who [32] shall be injured in [their] business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws." 15 U.S.C. § 15. Thus, to have standing under section 4, a plaintiff must have suffered "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful." Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977). See also Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 1889-90, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990).

In USA Petroleum, the Supreme Court limited HN11[] dealer standing for maximum resale price maintenance claims to three kinds of injury: (i) injury caused when prices are fixed too low for the dealer to furnish services essential to the value which goods have for the consumer, or to furnish services and conveniences which consumers desire; (ii) injury caused to smaller dealers when the fixed prices channel distribution through a few large or specifically advantaged dealers; and (iii) injury that results when the maximum price approaches the actual cost to the dealer and acquires the attributes of an arrangement fixing [33] minimum prices. Because it is not included in any of these categories, recovery of profits alleged to have been lost as a result of a maximum resale price maintenance scheme--the only injury claimed by Caribe--is barred by USA Petroleum. [9]

[34] [*815] 3. *Puerto Rico Antitrust Laws

Caribe also seeks relief under the antitrust laws of Puerto Rico, P.R. Laws Ann. tit. 10, §§ 258, 264. We look, as we must, to the jurisprudence interpreting the federal antitrust laws as a guide in applying the statute. See Diario de Sesiones, 1964, Vol. 18, Part 4, pp. 1425-26, 1509, 1512, 1707-1709; see also Whirlpool Corp. v. U.M.C.O. Int'l Corp., 748 F. Supp. 1557, 1565 n.4 (S.D. Fla. 1990) (Puerto Rico antitrust law claims).

Accordingly, Caribe's claims under the antitrust statute of Puerto Rico are dismissed for the same reasons that dismissal of Caribe's federal antitrust claims is required.

4. Conclusion

It is by now clear to us that plaintiff's repeated failure to cure the defects in its Complaint are not problems with drafting, but of substance. After three failures to meet its burden of properly pleading antitrust claims, the issue should be foreclosed permanently. Gooley v. Mobil Oil Corp., 851 F.2d 513, 515 n.2 (1st Cir. 1988) ("To borrow a baseball aphorism, three strikes and out seems to us not unfair . . . where--as here--plaintiff has had (and [35] used) several prior opportunities to amend his complaint"); see also Albrecht v. Lund, 845 F.2d 193 (9th Cir. 1988) ("Plaintiff was given every opportunity to cure a formal defect in his pleadings, it now appears to a certainty that plaintiff cannot state a claim.").

Therefore, plaintiff's antitrust claims are hereby DISMISSED with prejudice.

C. FORUM-SELECTION CLAUSE

Plaintiffs' breach of contract and violation of Act 75 claims (collectively the "contract claims") are predicated, inter alia, on allegations that BMW AG breached various provisions or representations in the Importer Contract and terminated the same "unjustifiably" or "without just cause." Although there is a dearth of facts in the record to support these two causes of action, we must first determine the effect to be accorded the forum-selection clause negotiated by the parties.

[9] The Supreme Court has consistently recognized that HN12[] lost profits, without more, is not antitrust injury. USA Petroleum, 110 S. Ct. at 1890-91; Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 109-10, 116, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427, 107 S. Ct. 484 (1986); Brunswick Corp., 429 U.S. at 488. In any event, the assertions underpinning Caribe's maximum resale price maintenance claim are inconsistent with the facts allegedly at the heart of this dispute. Caribe's basic claim is that it could not compete with dealers located in the continental United States because those dealers' prices for BMW automobiles were allegedly too low to permit Caribe to compete. Yet, in its Sherman Act claim, Caribe contends that it has been damaged, through the loss of profits, by its alleged inability to raise its prices above a level purportedly set by its supplier. Surely, Caribe cannot have it both ways.

BMW AG moves the Court to dismiss the contract claims and requests that the Court enforce the forum-selection clause in the Importer Contract calling for Germany as the exclusive jurisdiction. BMW AG also argues that Germany would be the more convenient forum for this dispute.

In opposition, Caribe [36] argues [10] that the forum-selection clause cannot "oust this court of jurisdiction;" that the clause does not cover Caribe's claims; that Caribe could not have "foreseen litigating in Germany" and that the clause "offends" Puerto Rico public policy.

In sum, Caribe does not challenge the validity of the forum-selection clause, but questions its scope and enforceability. Caribe, however, has not even attempted to controvert any of BMW AG's statements of uncontroverted facts or affidavits that support its motion to dismiss for improper venue. Nor has Caribe specifically requested that it be allowed to conduct discovery on this particular issue, thus conceding the matter is ready for summary disposition.

1. Applicable Law

[37] (a) The Erie Issue

Forum-selection clauses, particularly regarding international commercial agreements, have long been enforced by the federal courts as a matter of federal common law. M/S Bremen v. Zapata Off-Shore Co., 407 U.S. 1, 10, 32 L. Ed. 2d 513, 92 S. Ct. 1907 (1972); Lambert v. Kysar, 983 F.2d 1110 (1st Cir. 1992). Historically, however, such clauses were discouraged by federal and state courts as an unnecessary restraint on access to the courts. See, e.g., Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U.S. (20 Wall) 445, 451, 22 L. Ed. 365 (1874). The Morse view, though now widely considered outmoded, apparently still [*816] has not been completely discarded by some state courts. See, e.g., Lambert, supra (discussing Massachusetts law).

In the context of a diversity case such as the present one, there is some confusion as to whether forum-selection clauses are to be treated as substantive or procedural under the Erie doctrine. Erie R.R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 82 L. Ed. 1188, 58 S. Ct. 817 (1938). The Supreme Court has not squarely resolved the issue [11] and the circuits are split. See Lambert v. Kysar, 983 F.2d at 1116, n.10 [38] (for a discussion of the cases). The issue seems important at first blush because were we to consider the matter procedural, federal law governs. If, however, we conclude it is a substantive issue, then we must apply Puerto Rico law. The choice could be significant if Puerto Rico, like other state fora, has not closely followed the more enlightened perspective first articulated by The Bremen Court two decades ago.

The First Circuit Court of Appeals has determined, in a case very similar to this one, that questions of venue are procedural in nature and, therefore, federal common law, and not Puerto Rico law, controls. [39] Royal Bed & Spring Co. v. Famossul Industries e Comercio de Moveis Ltda., 906 F.2d 45, 49 (1st Cir. 1990) (Act 75 claims; diversity jurisdiction; Brazilian venue chosen under the forum non conveniens doctrine). In Royal Bed, the court considered significant a forum-selection clause that provided "that . . . Brazil is the proper forum to settle any disputes . . . ." and held that Act 75 was not a bar to dismissal for improper venue when there existed no fundamental unfairness in sending the case to the foreign tribunal.

[10] Among its arguments, Caribe places great emphasis on the public policy behind keeping antitrust suits in the United States, and avoiding two separate actions involving BMW AG and BMW NA. We need not consider these arguments given our dismissal of the claims against BMW NA.

[11] Cf. Julia L. Erickson, Forum Selection Clauses in Light of the Erie Doctrine and Federal Common Law: Stewart Organization v. Ricoh Corporation, 72 Minn. L. Rev. 1090 (1988) (for the proposition that after the Supreme Court's Stewart opinion, 487 U.S. 22, 108 S. Ct. 2239, 101 L. Ed. 2d 22 (1988), only federal common law applies to forum-selection clauses).

Royal Bed, therefore, did not specifically resolve the present issue: whether or not in diversity cases the enforcement of a forum-selection clause by itself is ruled by federal or state law.

Recently, however, the First Circuit discussed this problem in the context of a Massachusetts contract dispute that included a Washington choice-of-forum clause. In essence, the court found that the applicable state law (Washington) did not conflict with federal law. Therefore, the court declined to reach the Erie issue and held that the forum-selection clause was enforceable. Lambert, supra. [40]

Thus, though we have the Royal Bed decision as an important beacon, the Lambert decision leaves us in the same twilight zone of uncertainty faced by many others over whether forum-selection clauses are procedural or substantive for purposes of Erie. Nonetheless, following the analysis in Lambert, we have carefully studied Puerto Rico law and conclude that it too is in accord with federal common law; thus, we need not try to resolve the vexing problem created by the Erie doctrine.

(b) Puerto Rico Law

The most recent pronouncement by the Supreme Court of Puerto Rico on forum-selection clauses is Unisys P.R. Inc. v. Ramallo Brothers Printing Inc., 91 J.T.S. 69 (1991). In Unisys, the Court discussed the validity and enforceability of a clause requiring a Michigan venue in a contract between the defendant and the third party defendant. The plaintiff was not a party to that contract. The Court found that forum-selection clauses should be generally enforced, but that under the circumstances of the case, it would be patently unfair to enforce the clause because plaintiff was an indispensable party who would not be available in the Michigan forum.

The [41] Court determined that since there was no Puerto Rico jurisprudence on forum-selection clauses, it would resort to the extensive federal common law on the issue. Id. at 8855.

The lucid opinion adopts step-by-step the basic tenets of federal common law on forum-selection clauses. To wit, the Puerto Rico Supreme Court held that:

(i) HN13[] forum-selection clauses are prima facie valid if reasonable, absent any fraud or overreaching, id. (citing Midwest Mech. Contr. v. [*817] Tampa Constructors, Inc., 659 F. Supp. 526, 530 (1987));

(ii) forum-selection clauses are "intimately related to the public policy of not imposing obstacles on interstate and international commerce." Id. (citing and quoting The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 16) (translation ours);

(iii) HN14[] there is a "strong presumption" in favor of the validity of such clauses, and their application extends to all types of cases; Id. (citing and quoting Houston Intern. Televideo v. Technicolor Inc., 647 F. Supp. 554, 555 (1986)) (translation ours);

(iv) "enforcing a forum-selection clause protects the legitimate interests of the parties, [42] their expectations, and above all, fosters vital interests of the system of justice," Id. (citing Stewart Organization v. Ricoh Corp., 487 U.S. 22, 101 L. Ed. 2d 22, 33-34, 108 S. Ct. 2239 (1988) (Concurrence; Kennedy, J.)) (translation ours); and

(v) HN15[] the party resisting enforcement of the clause bears a heavy burden of proof to show unreasonableness (citing Kline v. Kawai America Corp., 488 F. Supp. 868, 871 (1980)).

The Court thus held that forum-selection clauses are presumptively valid and necessary for the freedom of international commerce and to promote "vital interests of the system of justice." Consequently, a party trying to avoid its part of a valid bargain bears a very heavy burden to prove that the clause is unreasonable.

In sum, the Puerto Rico Supreme Court has fully adopted the federal jurisprudence on forum-selection clauses and established a doctrinal approach that is in complete accord with federal law, thus obviating any Erie-type problems at bar.

(c) Federal Common Law

The seminal case in the area of forum-selection clauses is The Bremen. In that case, an American and a German corporation entered into an international [43] towage contract that required that all disputes be heard in England. The tug and tow were forced by a severe Gulf storm to safe harbor in Tampa, where the American corporation, in violation of its agreement, sued for damages caused to its property. The lower courts, reflecting the historical disdain for forum-selection clauses, denied the German corporation's motion to enforce the forum-selection clause. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the enforcement of such clauses "accords with ancient concepts of freedom of contract and reflects an appreciation of the expanding horizons of American contractors who seek business in all parts of the world." The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 11.

The Supreme Court found that forum-selection clauses are "prima facie valid and should be enforced" unless the resisting party meets its "heavy burden" and proves that enforcement would be unreasonable under the circumstances. Id. at 10. HN16[] A clause is unreasonable only if it is invalid, or fundamental fairness compels that it not be enforced. The clause is invalid, said the Court, only if it is shown to have been the product of "fraud, [44] undue influence, or overweening bargaining power." Id. at 12. It should be held unenforceable, added the Court, "if the chosen forum is seriously inconvenient for the trial of the action." id. at 16 (emphasis in original), or enforcement would be manifestly unjust.

The Court made clear, however, that the issue was not one of convenience of the forum, as with the doctrine of forum non conveniens, [12] but of holding the parties to their " [*818] freely negotiated private international commercial agreement" absent a clear showing that the chosen forum "will be so manifestly and gravely inconvenient to [the resisting party] that it will be effectively deprived of a meaningful day in court . . . ." Id. at 16 and 19-20. Indeed, the Court emphasized that: "where it can be said with reasonable assurance that at the time they entered the contract, the parties to a freely negotiated private international commercial agreement contemplated the claimed inconvenience, it is difficult to see why any such claim of inconvenience should be heard to render the forum clause unenforceable. Id. at 16 [45] (emphasis added).

[46] Finally, The Bremen Court rejected the lower court's outdated jurisdictional conceptions by articulating the forum-selection clause credo:

> The expansion of American business and industry will hardly be encouraged if, notwithstanding solemn contracts, we insist on the parochial concept that all disputes must be resolved under our laws and in our courts . . . . We cannot have trade and commerce in world markets and international waters exclusively on our terms, governed by our laws and resolved in our courts.

Id. at 9.

"While Bremen involved a suit in admiralty, its wisdom has been unhesitatingly applied in land-based diversity actions." D'Antuono v. CCH Computer Systems, Inc., 570 F. Supp. 708, 711 (D.R.I. 1983) (Selya, J.) (case citations omitted).

[12] The lower courts in The Bremen approached the motion to dismiss as one under forum non conveniens, that is, whether the movant could prove that the London forum was more convenient than the Tampa forum. The Supreme Court said that this was the wrong approach since the contract "expressly resolved that issue [of convenience of forum]. The correct approach would have been to enforce the forum clause specifically unless [non-movant] could clearly show that enforcement would be unreasonable or unjust, or that the clause was invalid for such reasons as fraud or overreaching." Id. at 15. Various federal courts have applied this approach, that is, specifically enforcing the forum-selection clause rather than analyzing the forum non conveniens doctrine. See, e.g., Crown Beverage Co. v. Cerveceria Moctezuma, 663 F.2d 886 (9th Cir. 1981) (antitrust and distributorship contract between American and foreign companies providing for Mexican forum); Coastal Steel Corporation v. Tilghman Wheelabrator Ltd., 709 F.2d 190 (3d Cir. 1983) (England); Warner & Swasey Co. v. Salvagnini Transferica, 633 F. Supp. 1209 (W.D.N.Y.), aff'd on basis of opinion below, 806 F.2d 1045 (Fed. Cir. 1986) (Italy); Manetti-Farrow, Inc. v. Gucci, 858 F.2d 515 (9th Cir. 1988) (Italy) (similar facts); Bonny v. Society of Lloyd's, 784 F. Supp. 1350 (N.D. Ill. 1992) (England); Riley v. Kingsley Underwriting Agencies, 969 F.2d 953 (10th Cir. 1992) (England); and Paper Express Ltd. v. Pfankuch Maschinen, 972 F.2d 753 (7th Cir. 1992) (Germany).

On the strength of The Bremen, the First Circuit has held that: HN17[] "To establish that a particular choice of forum clause is unreasonable, a resisting party must present evidence of fraud, undue influence, overweening bargaining power or . . . serious inconvenience in litigating." Fireman's Fund American Insurance Companies v. Puerto Rican Forwarding Co., Inc., 492 F.2d 1294, 1297 (1st Cir. 1974). [47] See also GKG Caribe, Inc. v. Nokia-Mobira, Inc., 725 F. Supp. 109, 112 (D.P.R. 1989) (Gierbolini, J.) (Act 75 claims) ("no basis for assuming forum inadequate or selection unfair absent a showing [of The Bremen factors]"); and McCain Foods Ltd. v. Puerto Rico Supplies, Inc., 766 F. Supp. 58, 60 (D.P.R. 1991) (Cerezo, J.) (Act 75 claim, Canada arbitration) ("the forum-selection clause must be strictly enforced").

As will be discussed in more detail, in the present case Caribe has failed to meet its burden of showing that, pursuant to The Bremen and its progeny, the forum-selection clause is invalid or should not be enforced. Thus, like The Bremen Court, we hold that "in light of present day commercial realities and expanding international trade, we conclude that the forum clause should control . . . ." The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 15.

2. Scope and Validity of Forum-Selection Clause

Caribe's argument regarding the scope of the forum-selection clause as it pertains to the contract claims seems to be that the clause is not as "narrowly drafted" as certain others that it cites, [48] thus it cannot cover Caribe's contractual claims. This argument is misconceived. First, the clauses Caribe compares contain distinctions without any difference. This is particularly true regarding its reliance on Bense v. Interstate Battery System of America, Inc., 683 F.2d 718, 720 (2d Cir. 1982). [13]

Second, we fail to see how the clear and mandatory import of the clause at issue here can be avoided. It reads: ". . . the exclusive jurisdiction for disputes concerning the . . . termination of this agreement as well as any rights and duties arising out of this agreement is . . . Germany."

[*819] The simple reading of the forum-selection clause is that Germany is the exclusive jurisdiction for all disputes. Caribe has failed to prove this language is in any manner permissive or ambiguous or that it does [49] not cover contractual claims, particularly when plaintiff's main contractual claim is that it was unjustly terminated (and the text of the clause specifies termination). On its face, the clause appears fully applicable and enforceable. Lambert, 983 F.2d at 1116 (citing Docksider, Ltd. v. Sea Technology, Ltd., 875 F.2d 762, 764 (9th Cir. 1989)("HN18[] The prevailing rule is clear . . . that where venue is specified with mandatory language, the clause will be enforced")).

Third, Caribe's attempt to challenge the scope of the clause by arguing tort-based theories is completely unconvincing. This is primarily because Caribe has not alleged any tort causes of action and even if it had, these would be inexorably tied to its contractual claims and thus bound to the clause. See Clinton v. Janger, 583 F. Supp. 284, 287 (N.D. Ill. 1984); Crescent Corp. v. Procter & Gamble Corp., 627 F. Supp. 745, 748 (N.D. Ill. 1986). See also Ronar, Inc. v. Wallace, 649 F. Supp. 310, 313-314 (S.D.N.Y. 1986); Weidner Communications, Inc. v. Faisal, 671 F. Supp. 531, 537 (N.D. Ill. 1987). [50] Besides, "the better general rule, we think, is that HN19[] contract-related tort claims involving the same operative facts as a parallel claim for breach of contract should be heard in the forum selected by the contracting parties." Lambert, 983 F.2d at 1121-1122.

Lastly, Caribe's implication that the forum-selection clause "ousts" this Court of jurisdiction does not comport to the well-established modern view that such clauses do not deprive courts of jurisdiction, but simply may compel them to decline it. "The argument that such clauses are improper because they tend to 'oust' a court of jurisdiction is hardly more than a vestigial legal fiction." The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 12; LFC Lessors, Inc. v. Pacific Sewer Maintenance, 739 F.2d 4 (1st Cir. 1984); Frances M. Dougherty, Annotation, Validity of Contractual Provision Limiting Place of Court in Which Action May be Brought, 31 A.L.R. 4th 404, 409 (1992).

[13] The clause in Bense read: "the exclusive venue of any suits or causes of action arising directly or indirectly from this Agreement shall be in Dallas County, Texas."

Therefore, we hold that the forum-selection clause is valid and that the contract claims are clearly within its scope.

3. Application of Forum-Selection Clause

[51] The facts in this case, under a favorable reading for plaintiff, fail to reveal anything unreasonable about enforcing the forum-selection clause at issue. Quite the contrary, failure to enforce the clause would not only be unfair under the circumstances, but would violate the important public policy that sustains the doctrine itself: Unfettered international transactions, international comity and "sensitivity to the need of the international commercial system for predictability in the resolution of disputes," Mitsubishi Motors Corp. v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, 473 U.S. 614, 613, 87 L. Ed. 2d 444, 105 S. Ct. 3346 (1985), as well as judicial and contractual efficiency. Carnival Cruise Lines, supra.

The place of the execution and performance of the contract at issue was Germany. The parties freely negotiated the clause in Germany, and in the German language. Plaintiff's main principals are European citizens and sophisticated businessmen with extensive experience in the German market system as can be logically deduced from the transactions that took place between BMW AG and Caribe (through Messrs. Quintano and Benoit).

The main negotiations for the forum-selection and choice-of-law [52] clauses, took place in Germany. These clauses called for German law and exclusive German venue to resolve any disputes. The venue clause was broad and mandatory. It was made an essential part of each contract renewal and was not altered despite other changes to the contract. Thus, the clause "could hardly have escaped [Caribe's] attention." The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 15, n.16. The parties exchanged communications in German. The products at issue were manufactured in Germany. They were bought in Germany with German marks. And title to them passed in Germany.

It is difficult to comprehend how Caribe can legitimately claim that it could not foresee [*820] litigating the termination of its contract with BMW AG--and matters related to that contractual relationship--in Germany given the extensive contacts with that jurisdiction and its agreement to litigate there. Indeed, the conduct of the parties revolved around Germany throughout the nine years of their relationship.

In addition, Caribe has not presented any evidence to show that it could not have its contract claims fully adjudicated in the German courts. Mr. Eberhard Rohm, one of Caribe's attorneys [53] and apparently an expert on German law, submitted an affidavit which speaks only to the treatment German courts give antitrust claims, particularly regarding treble damages. Mr. Rohm's affidavit says nothing about any problem in Germany with Caribe's contractual claims. [14] Also, it would seem that with Mr. Rohm's assistance, plaintiff has little to fear of the German forum in which he voluntarily did business.

Caribe's failure to show that the German forum is unfavorable or that litigating there would be seriously inconvenient compels enforcement of the forum-selection clause. The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 18 (HN20[ ] the party avoiding a choice-of-forum clause must show it would to so "gravely difficult and inconvenient that he will for all practical purposes be deprived of his day in court. Absent that, there is no basis for concluding [54] that it would be unfair, unjust or unreasonable to hold that party to its bargain.").

The international quality of the contract and the parties involved here is patent. This is not a local dispute. The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 17. BMW AG with its far-flung operations is entitled to the uniformity and predictability for which it bargained. Carnival Cruise Lines, supra ("A clause establishing ex ante the dispute resolution forum has the salutary effect of dispelling confusion as to where suits may be brought and defended, thereby sparing litigants time and expense and conserving judicial resources."). [15] The private international agreement at issue is [14] Also, the fact that Germany has a civilist tradition and jurisdiction similar in many ways to Puerto Rico's code-ruled system, would seem more favorable than not.

[15] The Bremen Court has said about this issue that one of the compelling factors to enforce forum-selection clauses is that "at the very least [they are] an effort to eliminate all uncertainty as to the nature, location and outlook of the forum in which these companies of differing nationalities might find themselves . . . . The elimination of all such uncertainties by agreeing in advance fundamentally fair and should be given full effect. The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 12-13; see also Scherk v. Alberto-Culver Co., 417 U.S. 506, 519, 41 L. Ed. 2d 270, 94 S. Ct. 2449 (1974).

[55] Finally, we reject plaintiff's reasoning that enforcement of the forum-selection clause regarding its Act 75 claims would violate Puerto Rico public policy.

First, the Puerto Rico Supreme Court itself has established that valid forum-selection clauses fulfill their own significant public policy of not imposing obstacles in interstate and international commerce, as well as "vital interests of the system of justice." Unisys, 91 J.T.S. at 8855. See also Manetti-Farrow, 858 F.2d at 518 ("we conclude that the federal procedural issues raised by forum-selection clauses significantly outweigh the state interests and the federal rule announced in The Bremen controls enforcement of forum clauses in diversity cases."). The Bremen Court specifically held that in a domestic context choice-of-forum clauses should not be enforced if they "contravene a strong public policy of the forum . . . [However,] those considerations [of local public policy] are not controlling in an international commercial agreement." The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 15-16. The Importer Contract is clearly such an "international commercial agreement."

[56] Second, plaintiff has not shown any evidence, let alone met its burden, that its claims, including its Act 75 claims, cannot be fairly heard in the German forum.

Third, and lastly, judges in this District and our Court of Appeals have dismissed Act 75 claims on grounds of forum-selection clauses, as well as forum non conveniens, [*821] with full knowledge of the local public policy implications. Therefore, it can not be said that such clauses "violate" that "public policy" nor that Act 75 concerns are paramount over other federal common law considerations. See, e.g., Royal Bed, supra; and Royal Bed & Spring Co. v. Famossul Industria E. Comercio De Moveis Ltda. (Civil No. 87-1054) 89 D.C.O. 164 (August 15, 1989) (Gierbolini, J.).

Caribe has failed to meet its burden. Therefore, finding nothing in the record that would support a refusal to enforce the forum-selection clause, we dismiss plaintiff's contract claims on the grounds of improper venue.

D. FORUM NON CONVENIENS

We echo the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in concluding that "because we hold that the forum-selection clause should have been enforced, the forum non conveniens [57] ruling need not be addressed in detail." Coastal Steel, 709 F.2d at 204 (holding in a contract dispute between an American and English corporation that "defendants' motions to dismiss the complaint so as to enforce the forum selection clause . . . which stated that disputes would be determined [in England] according to English law should have been granted").

As the preceding discussion demonstrates, there are various reasons requiring dismissal of the present action. The doctrine of forum non conveniens also mandates that result.

In presenting this alternative holding that Germany is a more convenient forum than Puerto Rico for this dispute, we have kept well in mind the Supreme Court's admonition in The Bremen that the correct approach is to "enforce the forum-selection clause specifically" and that "claims of inconvenience" should not defeat "freely negotiated private international commercial agreements." This is so precisely because any inconvenience--and the corresponding guaranty of predictability of the choice of forum of law--are factored into the benefits and costs of the bargain achieved between sophisticated businessmen experienced [58] in international trade as in the present case. The Bremen, 407 U.S. at 15-17.

Essentially, HN21[] the forum non conveniens doctrine permits discretionary dismissals on a "case-by-case" basis where an alternative forum is available in another nation which is fair to the parties and substantially more convenient for them and the courts. See Mercier v. Sheraton International, Inc., 981 F.2d 1345 (1st Cir. 1992). The Court's task is to determine whether the availability of an adequate alternative forum would in fairness be sufficient to overcome a presumption in favor of plaintiff's choice of forum. Tramp Oil & Marine Ltd. v. M/V Mermaid I, 743 F.2d 48, 50 (1st Cir. 1984). To perform this task, we must consider the private and public interests at stake. Gulf Oil Corp. v. Gilbert, 330 U.S. 501, 91 L. Ed. 1055, 67 S. Ct. 839 (1947) and Mercier, supra (discussing factors).

For many of the same reasons discussed in the prior section, we find that Germany is indeed the more convenient forum for this dispute.

The availability of Germany as a forum is unquestioned [59] since BMW AG would clearly be amenable to process there. Likewise, the adequacy of the forum is also well-grounded insofar as the remedy that could be provided there is not "so clearly inadequate or unsatisfactory that it is no remedy at all." Piper Aircraft v. Reynoso, 454 U.S. 235, 254, 70 L. Ed. 2d 419, 102 S. Ct. 252 (1981).

After all, "the parties did not enter into a contractual relationship in a foreign jurisdiction in reliance upon our courts. They cannot complain if our courts refuse to meddle in their affairs and remitted them to the place that established and would enforce their rights." Lockman Foundation v. Evangelical Alliance Mission, 930 F.2d 764, 768 (9th Cir. 1991). It is important to keep in mind that, pursuant to the uncontested facts in this case, Germany was the "place of performance and fulfillment of [the Importer Contract]" as the title of the forum-selection clause itself clearly states.

HN22[] While there is ordinarily a strong presumption in favor of the plaintiff's choice of forum, the presumption is simply inapplicable where, as here, plaintiff brings its lawsuit [*822] in a forum different from that chosen in its international [60] contract and where the dispute essentially is not a local one involving local interests.

This district, as well as the First Circuit, has recognized that the existence of a forum selection contract is relevant to the forum non conveniens analysis. In Royal Bed, 89 D.C.O. 164, this court (Gierbolini, J.) dismissed on forum non conveniens considerations an action brought by a Puerto Rico distributor against the Brazilian manufacturer pursuant to the provisions of Act 75. The agreement between the parties contained a provision which designated the courts of Brazil as competent to settle any disputes derived from the contract, and specified the Brazilian Civil Code as the governing law. Id at 439-440. Among others, the court considered the Act 75 public policy argument and concluded that:

> Here we are dealing with a freely negotiated international commercial transaction between a Brazilian and a Puerto Rican corporation for the distribution of Brazilian products in Puerto Rico. The choice of forum is a contract element which, like all others, is subject to negotiation between the parties. Clearly, whatever inconvenience plaintiff would suffer by being forced to [61] litigate in the contractual forum was foreseeable at the time of contracting. Before we will upset the provisions of the contract, plaintiff must demonstrate that trial in the contractual forum will be so gravely inconvenient so as to deprive it of its day in court.

The Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal of the action on forum non conveniens considerations, in spite of its recognition that Act 75 "refuses to enforce forum-selection clauses providing for out-of-state or foreign venues as a matter of public policy." 906 F.2d at 47. The First Circuit concluded that "the convenience of a Brazil forum, given the parties' expressed preference for that venue, the fairness of transfer in light of the forum-selection clause and the parties' relative bargaining power, as well as their familiarity with the procedure and laws of that forum" required dismissal in favor of Brazil as the most convenient forum. Id.

In sum, the private factors in this case show that Germany is an adequate forum because the access to sources of proof is not difficult given the witnesses and records that are there and the transactions that took [62] place there as well. The availability of compulsory process is unquestioned and the cost of obtaining witness attendance, from the plaintiff's perspective, is negligible given that BMW AG has its operations in Germany. There are no premises that need to be viewed in Puerto Rico and the practical problems inherent in all litigation seem not disproportionate regarding litigation in Germany since most, if not all, the substantial merits discovery will take place outside Puerto Rico, and much of it in Germany. Mercier, supra.

The public interest considerations equally weigh in favor of the German forum. There is an unchallenged choice-of-law clause for the application of German law by plaintiff. The calendar congestion of this Court is considerable not only in terms of an excessively demanding and complex criminal and civil caseload, but also because of the well-publicized fiscal crisis facing the federal judiciary which recently has triggered a proposed moratorium on civil jury trials because of the lack of funds to pay jurors. The considerable lack of discovery on the merits also militates toward the foreign jurisdiction. And, finally, as discussed [63] above, there are no local interests violated by a dismissal based on this doctrine given that such dismissals have occurred in this District under very similar circumstances as, for example, in Royal Bed, supra. It appears to us that the foreign tribunal can more appropriately conduct this litigation, and should. Howe v. Goldcorp. Investments Ltd., 946 F.2d 944 (1st Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 117 L. Ed. 2d 418, 112 S. Ct. 1172 (1992); Piper Aircraft Co., 454 U.S. at 235.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons discussed above defendants' motions are hereby GRANTED as follows:

[*823] Counts one and two (antitrust) of the Second Amended Complaint are DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE for failure to state a cause of action;

Counts three and four (contract) are DISMISSED for improper venue and, in the alternative, on grounds of forum non conveniens.

Further, on July 12, 1991, El Fenix de Puerto Rico, Caribe's insurer, tendered an "Intervention Complaint." El Fenix sought leave to intervene claiming a right to any monies Caribe might obtain in the present suit. (Docket [64] No. 12.) On July 10, 1991, the Court granted leave. Since the main action will be dismissed in its entirety, there is no need to discuss the particulars of El Fenix's complaint, and the same is hereby DISMISSED.

Judgment to be entered accordingly.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Before summary judgment may be granted against a party, *Fed. R. Civ. Where a district court is contemplating entering sua sponte summary judgment against one of the parties, that party is entitled to unequivocal notice of the court's intentions.

HN2[] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

The United States Supreme Court rejects the notion that a defendant seeking summary judgment must produce evidence disproving the plaintiff's case. The moving party need not support its motion with affidavits or other similar materials negating the opponent's claim. Once a defendant seeking summary judgment meets this threshold, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show that its evidence is sufficient to establish the essential elements of its case. If the plaintiff cannot gather enough evidence to support its claim, a trial would serve no worthy purpose and summary judgment is warranted.

Opinion by: PER CURIAM

Opinion

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a district court order granting summary judgment for Mapco Petroleum, Inc. (Mapco) in this diversity action brought by Ghem, Inc. (Ghem) under the Tennessee Petroleum Trade Practices Act (TPTPA), Tenn. Code Ann. §§ 47-25-611 to 626. Ghem alleged that Mapco violated section 47-25-611(a)(1) of the TPTPA by selling regular unleaded gasoline at retail at a price [*2] below cost to Mapco. The district court granted summary judgment on the ground that Ghem failed to establish a prima facie case under the TPTPA. Ghem appeals. After oral argument, we certified various questions to the Supreme Court of Tennessee. Having received answers to those questions, we AFFIRM.

I.

Ghem is a Tennessee corporation that operates a Shell service station in Murfreesboro, Tennessee. Mapco is a Delaware corporation that operates Delta Express stores. Two Delta Express stores in Murfreesboro sell gasoline at retail in direct competition with Ghem's Shell station. The Delta Express and Shell stations also compete directly with Dodge, Exxon, Gulf, Jiffy Oil, Jim Dandy, Marathon Oil, and Texaco stations.

In its amended complaint, Ghem alleged that on certain days in 1989, Mapco sold regular unleaded at its Delta Express stores at a price below cost to Mapco, with the intent to injure competitors and lessen competition. Arguing that Mapco's below-cost sales violated section 47-25-611(a)(1) of the TPTPA, Ghem sought compensatory and treble damages, attorney's fees, and an order enjoining Mapco from selling gasoline below cost.

Mapco filed a motion for [*3] summary judgment in which it conceded that it had made below-cost sales at retail, but argued that section 47-25-611(h) of the TPTPA exempted it from liability, because the sales were made in good faith to meet the equally low or lower prices of competitors. Before ruling on the motion, the district court ordered the parties to file supplemental briefs to assist the court in identifying the elements of a prima facie case under section 47-25-611(a)(1). The district court's order suggested that the parties address the question of whether a plaintiff must prove antitrust injury, as required under federal antitrust law, to recover under section 47-25-611(a)(1).

In its supplemental brief, Mapco included antitrust injury and injury to competition as two of four elements that it believed the TPTPA requires a plaintiff to prove to recover damages. It asserted that Ghem failed to cite sufficient evidence to establish those two elements. Ghem's responsive supplemental brief also listed four elements necessary to state a claim under section 47-25-611(a)(1), but it rejected antitrust injury as an element. In addition, Ghem asserted that it had satisfied the injury to competition element.

[*4] After Mapco filed a supplemental reply brief, the district court granted summary judgment in favor of Mapco, holding that Ghem had failed to establish a prima facie case under section 47-25-611(a)(1) becasue Ghem had shown neither antitrust injury nor injury to competition. Ghem, Inc. v. Mapco Petroleum, Inc., 767 F. Supp. 1418 (M.D. Tenn. 1990). This appeal followed.

II.

A. Sua Sponte Summary Judgment

Ghem first argues that the district court clearly erred when it failed to give Ghem notice of its intent to consider issues other than Mapco's good faith competition defense in deciding whether to grant summary judgment for Mapco. We disagree. [1]

As this court stated in Routman v. Automatic Data Processing, Inc., 873 F.2d 970, 971 (6th Cir. 1989), HN1[] "before summary [*5] judgment may be granted against a party, Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c) mandates that the party opposing summary judgment be afforded notice and a reasonable opportunity to respond to all issues to be considered by the court." We have also stated that "where a district court is contemplating entering sua sponte summary judgment against one of the parties, that party is entitled to unequivocal notice of the court's intentions." Yashon v. Gregory, 737 F.2d 547, 552 (6th Cir. 1984). After reviewing the record, we conclude that the district court's grant of summary judgment comported with the requirements of Routman and Yashon.

The district court's order requiring supplemental briefs put the parties on notice that the court would consider the sufficiency of Ghem's claim at the outset, before it would consider the merits of Mapco's good faith competition defense under section 47-25-611(h). The court stated that "before the issue of whether Mapco is entitled to the good faith competition defense can be addressed, the court must first identify the elements necessary to a successful claim under § 47-25-611(a)(1)." (emphasis added). The implication is [*6] clear that the district court suspected a deficiency in Ghem's claim under the TPTPA and endeavored to first establish the legitimacy of the claim before turning to the merits of Mapco's defense.

Our review of the parties' supplemental briefs reveals that they understood that the district court intended to consider whether Ghem alleged, and could support with evidence, a prima facie case under the TPTPA. In its supplemental brief, Mapco sought summary judgment on the ground that Ghem could not establish the elements of a prima facie case under section 47-25-611(a)(1). It stated specifically that "plaintiff's inability to prove and its failure to even allege that any below-cost sales by MAPCO had an adverse effect on competition is sufficient grounds for granting MAPCO's Motion for Summary Judgment." In the last sentence of its supplemental brief, Mapco's challenge was explicit and unequivocal: "because Plaintiff in this case cannot prove, and has not even alleged, the elements necessary to establish a cause of action under Tenn. Code Ann. § 47-25-611(a)(1), the Court should grant MAPCO's Motion for Summary Judgment." Ghem's supplemental response brief employs similar language regarding [*7] the adequacy of its averments and proofs as they related to the elements of a prima facie case under the TPTPA. In its brief, Ghem stated: "based upon the foregoing, GHEM, Inc., has set forth a legally sufficient cause of action under the Tennessee Petroleum Trade Practices Act." Thus, it was apparent to the parties that the issue of whether Ghem could establish the elements of its case was squarely before the district court on motion for summary judgment. Accordingly, we find no error.

B. Shifting Burdens Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56

[1] In its motion for summary judgment, Mapco argued initially that the good faith competition defense provided under section 47-25-611(h) of the TPTPA exempted it from liability.

Ghem also claims that the district court made a procedural error by forcing Ghem to come forward with evidence to support each element of its prima facie case. Ghem contends that the district court should have placed on Mapco the burden to produce evidence showing the absence of a genuine issue of material fact. We disagree.

In Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317 (1986), HN2[] the Supreme Court rejected the notion that a defendant seeking summary judgment must produce evidence disproving the plaintiff's case. The Court noted that the moving party need not "support its motion with affidavits or other similar materials [*8] negating the opponent's claim." Id. at 323. Once a defendant seeking summary judgment meets this threshold, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show that its evidence is sufficient to establish the essential elements of its case. Id. at 322-23. If the plaintiff cannot gather enough evidence to support its claim, a trial would serve no worthy purpose and summary judgment is warranted.

We see no reason why the Supreme Court's analysis should change merely because a district court, rather than a defendant, raises the question whether a plaintiff can prove its case. Thus, we hold that HN3[] a plaintiff opposing summary judgment has the burden of coming forward with evidence necessary to support its claim, regardless of whether the defendant moves for summary judgment or the district court notifies the plaintiff to identify its proofs in support of its claim. Ghem's second claim, therefore, fails.

C. The Prima Facie Case

Last, Ghem contends that the district court erred in identifying the elements of a prima facie case under section 47-25-611(a)(1) of the TPTPA and erred in identifying the nature of the proofs [*9] required to establish a prima facie case. In relation to these claims, and after oral argument, we certified the following questions to the Tennessee Supreme Court:

> I. What are the necessary elements to a cause of action under Tenn. Code Ann. § 47-25-611(a)(1)?
> II. Is an actual adverse effect on competition, as opposed to an adverse effect on a competitor, a necessary prerequisite to a cause of action under Tenn. Code Ann. § 47-25-611(a)(1)?
> III. Is an "antitrust injury" an essential element to a cause of action under the foregoing statute, and, if so, what type of proof is sufficient to establish an "antitrust injury"?

In its opinion addressing these questions, the Tennessee Supreme Court stated, inter alia, that HN4[] to establish a prima facie case under section 47-25-611(a)(1), a plaintiff must prove five elements: (1) that the defendant is a dealer; (2) that the defendant sells petroleum distillates at retail; (3) that the distillates were sold at a price below the dealer's cost; (4) that the below cost sales had an actual or threatened adverse effect on competition; and (5) that the plaintiff suffered "antitrust injury." Ghem, Inc. v. Mapco Petroleum, Inc., 1993 Tenn. LEXIS 113, 1993-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P 70161 (Tenn. 1993). [*10]

The district court's order granting summary judgment is consistent with the dictates of the Tennessee Supreme Court. The district court's decision turned, in part, on Ghem's failure to prove injury to competition. The district court found that although Ghem alleged harm to itself, a mere competitor, it did not offer any evidence of harm to competition, as required by the Tennessee Supreme Court. Further, the district court noted that Ghem failed to offer any evidence regarding the relevant market for petroleum distillates. This failure was crucial, because according to the Tennessee Supreme Court, HN5[] the "injury to competition" inquiry demands a threshold examination of the geographic and product line markets as well as the number of competitors and their approximate market shares. After reviewing the record, we agree with the district court's assessment of the evidence. Thus, we conclude that Ghem failed to plead and/or prove a prima facie case under the TPTPA. Summary judgment was therefore appropriate. [2]

[2] Ghem's failure to show an adverse effect on competition justifies affirmance and obviates the need to address the issue of whether Ghem proved "antitrust injury."

For all of the reasons stated, we AFFIRM the district court's order granting summary judgment in favor of Mapco.

A federal appellate court's decision at an earlier stage of the same case represents the law of the case as to matters decided explicitly and by necessary implication. A federal district court must follow the appellate decision as to these issues on remand, and generally speaking the appellate court must do so in future rulings in the case as well. The doctrine is not an inexorable command that rigidly binds the court to its former decisions, but rather n expression of good sense and wise judicial practice; thus an appellate court's decision of issues must be followed in all subsequent trial or intermediate appellate proceedings in the same case except when there are the most cogent of reasons, such as a change in controlling authority, new evidence or the need to avoid manifest injustice. The law of the case directs a court's discretion, it does not limit the tribunal's power.

[*1189] OAKES, Senior Circuit Judge:

The critical question presented by this case involves a conspiracy between a manufacturer and a favored distributor. The object of the conspiracy was to raise wholesale prices to other distributors, including the plaintiff, on products to be sold to one large customer. It is of some significance that the wholesale price, as raised, was higher than prevailing retail prices. The antitrust law question is whether this conspiracy was a device to force an increase in the resale price, or a vertical agreement to fix the minimum resale price in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 (1988) (the "Act"). HN1[] Resale price maintenance agreements are, of course, per se illegal restraints of trade within § 1 of the Act. Absent such per se illegality here, defendants concededly prevail.

This is the third time this court has addressed this [2] case. The second time here, on appeal from a grant of summary judgment for the defendants, this court held that evidence proving such a conspiracy would support a finding of antitrust injury within the line of cases commencing with Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 31 S. Ct. 376, 55 L. Ed. 502 (1911), extending through Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977), to and including Business Elecs. Corp. v. Sharp Elects. Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988). DeLong Equip. Co. v. Washington Mills Abrasive Co., 887 F.2d 1499 (11th Cir.1989), rehearing and rehearing en banc denied, 896 F.2d 560, cert. denied, 494 U.S.

* Honorable James L. Oakes, Senior U.S. Circuit Judge for the Second Circuit, sitting by designation.

1081, 110 S. Ct. 1813, 108 L. Ed. 2d 943 (1990) (DeLong II). [1] In Delong II, this court indicated that the essence of the alleged conspiracy between the manufacturer [3] and the favored distributor was to inflate the price of the manufacturer's standard product by labeling it "special" and "charging Pratt [the Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Division of United Technologies Corp., a significant customer] a significantly higher price than Washington Mill's list price for [the] identical [product]." 887 F.2d at 1509. Following this court's ruling in DeLong II, a jury trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff distributor against the defendant manufacturer, the favored distributor defendant having settled with the plaintiff after DeLong I. We are now faced with an appeal from the district court's denial of motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the plaintiff-distributor's Sherman Act price-fixing, Robinson-Patman Act price-discrimination and common-law fraud verdicts; with a cross-appeal from the district court's grant of a new trial on Sherman Act damages and Robinson-Patman Act damages; and with an appeal from the awarding to the manufacturer defendant of pre-judgment interest on a counterclaim for outstanding debts.

[4] Because the key questions in the case involve consideration of issues addressed in this court's last opinion, this appeal thus [*1190] requires consideration of the ancient but venerable doctrine of "the law of the case." In addition, the case raises questions of sufficiency of proof, injury in fact, and conspiracy. Problems of interlocutory review are not involved, however, since this court granted petitions for review of all of the issues following district court certification, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (1988).

A. Facts:

While the background facts were well set forth in DeLong II, in the interests of easier understanding, we will recount them here. The plaintiff distributor is DeLong Equipment Company ("DeLong"), a Georgia corporation wholly owned by Harold DeLong. DeLong distributes equipment and supplies used to polish and deburr metal parts in industrial manufacturing processes. The critical product in this process, called "media," consists of abrasive materials which are placed in vibratory machinery with the metal parts to be polished and deburred. Media can consist of natural products, such as sand without the backing [5] paper used in sandpaper. The media involved in this case, however, known as "preformed ceramic media," is made from a blend of clays, sands and polishing agents, extruded through metal molds and cut into different shapes, such as cylinders, stars, rectangles or triangles, after which it is baked and dried. The media is packed by the manufacturer and shipped either to distributors such as DeLong or directly to customers. Distributors, as pointed out in DeLong II, not only provide regular and prompt delivery of media and related supplies, but also consult with the end user, helping it select the appropriate equipment, media, power, speed and time to bring the user's product to the correct state of polish.

The manufacturer defendants-appellants and cross-appellees are Washington Mills Electro Minerals Corporation, formerly known as Washington Mills Abrasive Company, located in North Grafton, Massachusetts and in the business since 1868, and its wholly-owned subsidiary Washington Mills Ceramic Corporation, located in Lake Wales, Florida. They are joined in their appeal by the two individual defendants-appellants, officer/owners John T. Williams and Peter Williams (who are not related). [6] For simplicity, we will refer to the Washington Mills Electro Minerals Corp., its officers and its subsidiary collectively as "Washington Mills."

The other primary actor in this case, the BCS Company, Inc. ("BCS"), settled with DeLong before DeLong II. BCS, located in Thompson, Connecticut, is a distributor of media with a business quite similar to DeLong's. Both BCS and DeLong have distributed Washington Mills' products since the early 1980s, and BCS was Washington Mills' primary distributor in the northeastern United States during all times relevant to this litigation. Neither DeLong nor BCS itself manufactures media, but both distribute media manufactured by other companies, including but not limited to Washington Mills. Like other Washington Mills distributors, generally speaking, DeLong and BCS purchased media for resale at a wholesale discount rate of 25% off the retail list price. Since no Washington Mills distributors had exclusive territories or franchise areas, the distributors competed for end-user accounts. They received standard price lists showing the size, shape, composition and price per pound of each kind of "stock" media in the Washington Mills manufacturing [7] inventory. The price list also indicated that customers could request "special" media if they met minimum volume requirements and paid for a new die if one was needed to produce the media.

The specific, key customer involved was the Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Division of United Technologies Corporation ("Pratt"). Pratt, which manufactures aircraft engines and uses ceramic preformed media to polish its jet engine blades, is not a party to this action but, before this case, was one of Washington Mills' largest end-user customers. As one might suspect, Pratt's engineering department tests and approves the use of specific materials in its manufacturing processes and issues specifications used by the purchasing department to solicit [*1191] bids for any given products necessary; these specifications appear on Pratt product material control dockets ("PMCs"). With exceptions not relevant here, the Pratt purchasing department may only purchase pre-approved items specified on the PMCs from pre-approved dealers and the materials delivered must have the PMC numbers stamped on the box. The media at issue here, manufactured by Washington Mills for Pratt and known as "special," were approved by Pratt after [8] testing and designated on the appropriate PMCs as "P & W 5,000" (PMC 3175), "P & W 6,000" (PMC 3178) and "P & W 7,000" (PMC 3179). The testing and approval of the Washington Mills products was done by Pratt engineers in East Hartford, Connecticut, in consultation with William and Robert Biebel of BCS. James Neal, a Pratt engineer and a friend of the Biebels, obtained the issuance of the PMCs for the "special" Washington Mills media furnished by BCS. BCS was designated in the Pratt PMC as "manufacturer" and the product was labeled accordingly both by BCS itself and by Washington Mills on empty boxes for the products to be supplied to Pratt.

There was ample proof at trial to support the allegations in DeLong's complaint that the "special" media involved in this case was actually generic, that is, media that Washington Mills regularly produced and carried in stock, and that this "special" media, sold to the specific customer around whom this case revolves, did not differ in composition from the generic media stocked by Washington Mills. Thus, the evidence is essentially conclusive that it cost Washington Mills no more to produce the "special" media involved in this case than it did to [9] produce its regular line set forth in its standard price list. Pratt, in other words, was duped.

At the time Pratt issued its PMC for the purchase of "BCS-manufactured" special media, Washington Mills was selling the very same media generically to BCS for .495 dollars per pound. This price was based on Washington Mills's standard distributors' discount of 25% off its retail price of .66 dollars per pound. BCS's resale price to Pratt on its initial sales from February through October 5, 1983, however, was .97 dollars per pound, giving BCS a profit of .475, or 96%. Meanwhile, Pratt was both designing a new jet engine and planning on building a new production facility; as of the spring of 1983 it did build such a facility in Columbus, Georgia, not far from DeLong's place of business. Harold DeLong became aware of Pratt's plans and decided to pursue the account as an approved vendor. He began by asking the Washington Mills sales representative, Peter Ford, what type of media was being provided to the Pratt East Hartford plant, but was told only that BCS was "handling" the Pratt account. Harold DeLong was not able to learn from Ford what specific products Pratt required.

Nevertheless, [10] DeLong solicited business from Pratt as early as June, 1983. Evidently when word of this got back to Connecticut, the Washington Mills sales representative, Ford, asked Harold DeLong to meet in Atlanta with Robert Biebel of BCS in August, 1983. Biebel indicated to Harold DeLong that he was willing to work with DeLong in a joint venture and that there was "plenty of money in it" for both DeLong and BCS. Harold DeLong declined the offer, reasoning that he did not need BCS's help. After the Atlanta meeting and perhaps after Harold DeLong expressed his suspicions that the Pratt "special" media was really generic, stock Washington Mills media, BCS and Washington Mills agreed on the price-fixing scheme brought into question here. The scheme was that Washington Mills would raise the wholesale price paid by BCS for media to be resold to Pratt from .495 dollars to .85 dollars per pound, but Washington Mills would pay back to BCS the difference. This was to be and was in fact done by sending disguised payments through Wood & Thompson, a foreign corporation in Nassau, the Bahamas, created by BCS shortly after BCS learned that Pratt was locating its new jet engine facility in Georgia. The payback [11] checks and internal vouchers did not identify BCS and were issued for fictitious invoices made payable to Wood & [*1192] Thompson and mailed directly to the Bahamas. The evidence was that the offshore company was established in order to keep such payments "private," and Washington Mills did not report them to the I.R.S. on a Form 1099. Not surprisingly, perhaps, the payback checks are called "kickbacks" by DeLong and "commissions" by Washington Mills.

At an August, 1983 meeting at Pratt's East Hartford, Connecticut plant between representatives of Washington Mills and Pratt, the Washington Mills personnel present gave Pratt the Washington Mills designation of "P & W special 5,000" in connection with the Pratt PMC 3175 and "P & W special 6,000 and 7,000" to correspond to the two Pratt PMCs, 3178 and 3179. As previously indicated, the "P & W special 5,000" was a stock item available at .495 per pound to all Washington Mills distributors, and the "P & W special 6,000 and 7,000" also were identical to media listed in the stock price list at .495 per pound for distributors (at the 25% discount from the retail list price of .66 per pound). On September 1, 1983, the day after BCS filled a purchase [12] order for 10,000 pounds of PMC 3175 destined for the Columbus facility, various Pratt representatives visited DeLong to survey DeLong in response to its previous request for formal supplier qualification. In that meeting, they provided DeLong with a list of the products that Pratt needed, setting forth BCS computer code numbers. DeLong understood from this meeting that it was qualified as a Pratt vendor. On October 6, 1983, Pratt issued a blanket purchase order number 4929748 for 86,400 pounds of PMC 3175 for use at the Columbus plant. DeLong could not bid on this order because Washington Mills had not as yet supplied it with the product identification for Pratt media, with the result that BCS made the sale. Between October 7, 1983 and October 17, 1984 BCS was to fill this entire order at .91 dollars per pound, although at first the order was fulfilled from earlier purchases of media and before the kickback arrangement went into effect.

By letter of November 4, 1983, Washington Mills finally provided DeLong with Pratt media designations, but informed DeLong that the wholesale price to DeLong would be .85 dollars per pound. As stated, until that time Washington Mills had charged BCS [13] only .495 dollars per pound for identical media. DeLong immediately called and questioned the "special" designation and the 85-cent price, stating that the media samples appeared to be standard Washington Mills stock media which could be ordered at .495 dollars per pound from the price list. When the Washington Mills representative insisted that the media were special, DeLong replied that "everyone had better be paying the same price for the 'specials'." Indeed, on January 18, 1984, in BCS's first purchase of PMC 3175 thereafter, BCS was charged 85 cents per pound for 12,500 lb. of a Pratt special. Pursuant to the payback agreement, however, Washington Mills paid .355 dollars per pound to BCS through Wood & Thompson, making the BCS price for the special media exactly .495 dollars per pound, the very same price that BCS had paid for the media prior to the Washington Mills November 4, 1983 letter to DeLong. Both Robert Biebel of BCS and the treasurer of Washington Mills testified that the payments to Wood & Thompson were calculated to maintain BCS's pre-November, 1983 price.

In the spring of 1984, the Washington Mills representative with whom DeLong had dealt left the company and two [14] new salesmen, Robert Baldauf and Hans Van der Sande, began dealing with DeLong. According to them, DeLong raised the issue of "special designation of Pratt media every time he had the opportunity." DeLong also conducted independent laboratory tests, concluding that the media were identical. Nevertheless, Washington Mills continued to charge DeLong the .85 price and, while DeLong sold some small amounts to the Pratt plant at Columbus, Pratt's requirements for this plant were satisfied largely by deliveries from BCS under the prior October, 1983 order. There was no reason for Pratt to stop ordering media from BCS, though it could have canceled that order under its terms, since it was receiving the product at a price of 91 [*1193] cents a pound, which DeLong could not meet, given its cost from Washington Mills of 85 cents a pound F.O.B. Lake Wales, Florida. Consequently, DeLong sold a total of only 6,150 pounds of media to Pratt during 1984.

Van de Sande testified that after the last deliveries were made by BCS under the October, 1983 order, Biebel, Van der Sande and Baldauf visited Pratt in Columbus, Georgia (almost simultaneously visiting DeLong in Atlanta), to lay the groundwork for using [15] Washington Mills trucks and Lake Wales warehousing to deliver media directly to Pratt at the rate of 750,000 to 1 million pounds per year. According to Biebel, BCS felt secure for three years, since that was the time it ordinarily took Pratt to get a material approved, "unless DeLong did not play the game." According to Van der Sande, this meant that DeLong might "upset the apple cart." As a result of this visit, Pratt's orders were placed directly with Washington Mills as of November 12, 1984, with special retail prices charged for what was actually generic media, and on these direct sales BCS continued to receive kickbacks, though in varying amounts. DeLong, smarting, perhaps, continued to raise concerns regarding the "special" designation and inflated price. Washington Mills terminated DeLong as a distributor in August, 1985, and while it introduced evidence to the effect that the termination was because DeLong had made incorrect payments and DeLong personnel had been abusive, the jury found these claims to be pretextual.

B. Procedural History:

DeLong brought this action in February, 1986, alleging violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 [16] and 2 (1988); § 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by § 1 of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13(a) (1988); § 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14, and various violations of Georgia law, including breach of contract, tortious interference with business relationships and fraud. DeLong alleged, inter alia, that it was terminated for failure to participate in the scheme between Washington Mills and BCS to fix the price of media sold to Pratt, and Washington Mills asserted as defenses that the termination was in response to payment delays and abusive DeLong employees. This court reversed the dismissal of Robert Biebel and BCS for lack of personal jurisdiction (affirming as to William Biebel) in DeLong I, 840 F.2d 843 (11th Cir.1988). Thereafter, the district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on all counts except some aspects of the Robinson-Patman Act count, but certified the grant under Fed.R.Civ.P. 54(b) to the Court of Appeals which, in Delong II, reversed. 887 F.2d 1499 (11th Cir.1989). After that reversal, the district court [17] vacated its directed verdict in a trial limited to the Robinson-Patman Act count which had been held pending the appeal in DeLong II, granted a new trial as to the claims there tried, and consolidated all counts for a second jury trial which began July 30, 1990 and was concluded after five weeks with 19 witnesses and thousands of pages of exhibits. The district court directed a verdict for Washington Mills on a counterclaim for outstanding bills and submitted DeLong's Sherman Act, Robinson-Patman Act, and fraud claims to the jury. The jury returned a verdict for DeLong on August 21, 1990 on the Sherman Act count in the sum of $ 2,033,295, on the Robinson-Patman Act count in the sum of $ 50,216.25 and on the common law count for $ 117,824, including $ 100,000 in punitive damages. The district court entered its judgment on September 21, 1990, trebling the antitrust damages to $ 6,099,885 on the Sherman Act count and $ 150,648.75 on the Robinson-Patman Act count. On October 1, 1990, DeLong moved to alter or amend the judgment on the counterclaim to eliminate pre-judgment interest, and on October 5, 1990, Washington Mills moved alternatively for judgment notwithstanding the verdict [18] or a new trial as to DeLong's judgment. On April 1, 1991, the district court entered an order deferring ruling on the post-judgment motions, held a hearing on May 2, 1991, and entered an order on September 30, 1991 denying the Washington Mills motions for judgment [*1194] notwithstanding the verdict on all counts, [2] and denying the motion for a new trial as to liability on the antitrust claims and liability and damages on the common-law fraud count. The district court, however, granted a new trial as to the measure of damages under both the Sherman Act and Robinson-Patman Act counts, and denied DeLong's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict as to the interest awarded on Washington Mills' counterclaim. The trial court granted cross motions to certify for interlocutory review pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) on November 20, 1991, and this court granted cross petitions for such review.

[19] C. Standard of Review:

HN2[] This court reviews de novo a denial of judgment notwithstanding the verdict, see Watts v. Great Atl. & Pac. Tea Co., 842 F.2d 307, 309-10 (11th Cir.1988), including in an antitrust case the question of antitrust injury which is one component of whether or not the plaintiff has standing, a question of law. See Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d 1438, 1448 (11th Cir.1991). HN3[] The grant of the motion, as here, for a new trial is generally reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard, though when it is on evidentiary grounds the verdict must be against the great weight of the evidence to sustain the grant. E.g., Rixey v. West Paces Ferry Hosp., Inc., 916 F.2d 608, 611-12 (11th Cir.1990); Jackson v. Magnolia Brokerage Co., 742 F.2d 1305, 1307 (11th Cir.1984).

[2] Effective December, 1991, Fed.R.Civ.P. 50(b) refers to such motions as renewed motions for judgment as a matter of law. Since these motions were filed before the amendment became effective, we use the old language of motion for "judgment notwithstanding the verdict" or "JNOV."

Review is of course de novo where the trial court's order involves an error of law. See, e.g., Allstate Ins. Co. v. Springer, 269 F.2d 805, 808 (6th Cir.1959), cert. denied, 361 U.S. 932, 80 S. Ct. 370, 4 L. Ed. 2d 353 (1960). [20] We recognize that bearing on the above are the points that the grant of a new trial on an evidentiary basis involves a possible intrusion upon the function of a jury, Hewitt v. B.F. Goodrich Co., 732 F.2d 1554, 1556 (11th Cir.1984); Spurlin v. General Motors Corp., 528 F.2d 612, 619-20 (5th Cir.1976), and that damages are an issue as to which considerable discretion is committed to the jury, *Quality Foods, Inc. v. U.S. Fire Ins. At the same time, we recognize that both Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986), [21] involving a horizontal restraint on trade, and Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984), involving a vertical restraint, limit the permissible range of inferences of conspiracy that may be drawn in the antitrust context of restraints of trade.

II. DISCUSSION

We will discuss the issues in the case much as the parties have in their briefs, viz: by separating the issues appealed by Washington Mills resulting from the denial of its motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and the issues on the cross-appeal by DeLong resulting from the grant of the Washington Mills motions for a new trial in respect to damages, on both the Sherman Act and the Robinson-Patman Act counts.

A. Proof of Conspiracy:

Washington Mills claims that there was insufficient evidence at trial to support a finding of conspiracy, and that the inferences of concerted action between BCS and Washington Mills were negated at trial by the testimony of plaintiff's own witnesses, Washington Mills having called Robert Biebel, Baldauf and Van der Sande. We note that Baldauf, a former southeastern [22] sales [*1195] representative for Washington Mills, and Van der Sande, Washington Mills' former national sales manager, both left Washington Mills to form a competing manufacturer, Ceratech. Baldauf and Van der Sande testified that they had not known of any effort to fix prices of media or acted in furtherance of a conspiracy to fix those prices. Robert Biebel testified that he had nothing to do with the 85 cents per pound charged BCS or DeLong for the Pratt "special" media by Washington Mills, or had any agreement with anybody at Washington Mills as to the price at which BCS would sell media, whether before or after DeLong was terminated, or the price at which Washington Mills would sell media to DeLong, or with anyone as to termination of DeLong as a distributor. Washington Mills contends that against this "direct and positive evidence" DeLong offered only a string of inferences that an agreement on price could have been reached, and that this evidence is "so highly ambiguous" as not to support a finding of conspiracy according to the terms of Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 763, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 1470, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984) [23] and Riverview Invs., Inc. v. Ottawa Community Improvement Corp., 899 F.2d 474 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 855, 111 S. Ct. 151, 112 L. Ed. 2d 117 (1990). We agree with DeLong, however, that there was substantial evidence to support the finding of conspiracy. There was evidence that the so-called "special" media for Pratt was identical to stock media, and that the increased price charged by Washington Mills for the product to Pratt was not justified by any cost differential. Indeed, two of the "special" media, known as P & W 6,000 and P & W 7,000, were clearly identified as stock media on Washington Mills' price list. As for P & W 5,000, while it was not listed on a stock price list, it was available at all relevant times at the stock price on orders for more than 10,000 lbs. or at the stock price plus a nominal charge for producing a die on smaller orders; as to it, the actual added cost was minimal, and it was composed of the same materials as the other generic media. Moreover, Washington Mills sold all three types of "Pratt" media to other customers as well as to BCS, at the stock price.

[24] In addition, it was the Washington Mills sales representative, Peter Ford, who arranged the meeting between Robert Biebel of BCS and Harold DeLong in August, 1983, at which meeting Biebel proposed a "joint venture," saying "there is plenty of money in it" for everyone. It was after this meeting that Washington Mills joined in the arrangement for special pricing of $ .85 per pound to BCS, with a "kickback" or "commission" to BCS through BCS's offshore affiliate, Wood & Thompson, reducing the effective price to the original $ .495 per pound.

At about the same time that Ford met with DeLong, he met with Pratt in August, 1983 and gave it the new Washington Mills special media designations for the stock media sold to distributors at .495 per pound, retailing for $ .66 per pound. BCS quoted Pratt a price of $ .91 per pound in its successful October, 1983 order but Ford ignored DeLong's September 1, 1983 request for confirmation of the identity and price of these "specials" and delayed giving DeLong a Washington Mills quotation long enough to prevent DeLong from bidding on the October, 1983 order. When Ford did finally write to DeLong on November 4, 1983, calling the Pratt media "specials" [25] and quoting the distributor price as $ .85 per pound, BCS did not receive a price announcement letter. As DeLong points out, the jury could have concluded properly that BCS was not informed because it was part of the conspiracy which already knew the price arrangements, including the kickback arrangement, which would enable it to make up the difference between the regular price for generic media and the .85 quote to DeLong.

A year later, in October, 1984, Van der Sande and Baldauf came into the picture, at the time BCS was scheduled to make the last delivery to Pratt under the October, 1983 order. By this time, Washington Mills and BCS had a new scheme to support the Pratt price. They urged Pratt to purchase media directly from the manufacturer, bypassing DeLong, with Washington [*1196] Mills agreeing to pay kickbacks to BCS even on the direct sales. Indeed, Van der Sande's report of that meeting stated that Robert Biebel had said he had several good friends at Pratt who from time to time took trips on his boat to the Bahamas, which friendships gave him an edge on the competition. Van der Sande thought that Pratt would likely become Washington Mills' largest media customer, buying $ 750,000-$ [26] 1,000,000 worth of media per year. Van der Sande reported to Washington that "Bob Biebel feels we are secure for at least three years unless DeLong does not play the game." Van der Sande did not mention his meeting with the Pratt people in Georgia the day before he visited DeLong, but he did say that DeLong was "not very happy" with BCS and Pratt.

Perhaps the critical fact in terms of a conspiracy is that Washington Mills rebated to BCS the total difference, right to the half penny, between its new 85 cent price and the 49.5 cent stock price. This totally destroyed any argument that increased costs justified a higher price. If it was supposed to reflect some greater care or concern on the part of BCS toward Pratt, then DeLong should have been allowed to accept the same degree of responsibility at the same price. Instead, Delong, when it continued to complain about the pricing and the use of stock media under "special" labels to Pratt, was terminated on what the jury found were the pretextual reasons of being behind in payments to Washington Mills and abusive to Washington Mills personnel, allegations that were identified by the Court of Appeals in DeLong II as "genuine issues [27] of material fact…." 887 F.2d at 1513.

The long and the short of it is that the jury could properly conclude that Washington Mills and BCS conspired to fix the price of Washington Mills media both to DeLong and to Pratt under the fraudulent cover that the generic media was "special," and by the fraudulent means of kickbacks by way of "commissions" to BCS's offshore shell corporation.

B. Legal Arguments on the Sherman Antitrust Act Claims:

Of considerably more stature are appellant's three principal legal arguments, namely, that DeLong failed to establish "antitrust injury"; that DeLong failed to establish "injury in fact" (because numerous other sources of supply were available to DeLong); and that DeLong failed to establish an agreement regarding resale price, as required by Business Electronics, on the basis that resale price maintenance is a required element of a vertical price-fixing claim, and that there was no evidence at trial of a fixed "pad" to be added to BCS's resale price or any other agreement or restriction on the price to be charged by BCS.

Each of these legal arguments runs headlong into the doctrine of "law of the case." As well [28] put in another antitrust act case decided by this court's predecessor, the Fifth Circuit, HN4[] a decision of the Court of Appeals at an earlier stage of the same case represents the law of the case not only as to matters "decided explicitly" but also as to those "decided by necessary implication." Terrell v. Household Goods Carriers' Bureau, 494 F.2d 16, 19 (5th Cir.1974), cert. dismissed, 419 U.S. 987, 95 S. Ct. 246, 42 L. Ed. 2d 260 (1974). The district court must follow the appellate decision as to these issues on remand, id., and generally speaking the appellate court must do so in future rulings in the case as well, id. at 19-20. Recognizing that the doctrine "is not an inexorable command that rigidly binds the court to its former decisions, but rather is an expression of good sense and wise judicial practice," id. at 19, the general rule is that "an appellate court's decision of issues must be followed in all subsequent trial or intermediate appellate proceedings in the same case" except when there are "the most cogent of reasons," [29] such as a change in controlling authority, new evidence or the need to avoid manifest injustice. Id. at 19-20. See also, e.g., Virgin Atl. Airways, Ltd. v. National Mediation Bd., 956 F.2d 1245, 1255 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, __ U.S. ---- , 113 S. Ct. 67, 121 L. Ed. 2d 34 (1992). As the [*1197] Supreme Court has said, the "law of the case directs a court's discretion, it does not limit the tribunal's power." Arizona v. California, 460 U.S. 605, 618, 103 S. Ct. 1382, 1391, 75 L. Ed. 2d 318 (1983). See also 18 Charles A. Wright, Arthur R. Miller and Edward H. Cooper, Federal Practice and Procedure § 4478 at 790 (1981).

Under the law of the case doctrine, DeLong II basically decided the Sherman Act liability claims against Washington Mills on the matters of law argued here, and there has been no intervening change in the law since DeLong II was decided. See DeLong II, 887 F.2d 1499. The DeLong II court addressed these issues in the context of a grant of summary judgment to the defendants [30] on the theory that the conspiracy alleged and the evidence adduced to establish it did not describe a vertical restraint on trade. The DeLong II court held that the alleged conspiracy to restrain competition here was "to fix prices of media sold to Pratt by designating ordinary media as 'special' media and selling it at an artificially inflated price to Pratt." 887 F.2d at 1505. The DeLong II court ruled that such a conspiracy, if proven, was a vertical restraint within the meaning of Business Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. at 730 & n. 4, 109 S. Ct. at 1522 & n. 4, DeLong II, 887 F.2d at 1505-06, and furthermore that it was a vertical restraint that "included some agreement on price or price levels." Id. at 1506 (quoting Business Elecs, 485 U.S. at 736, 109 S. Ct. at 1525). After pointing out that this case involves termination of DeLong as a distributor of Washington Mills "in furtherance of" the vertical price restraint conspiracy, DeLong II, 887 F.2d at 1505, [31] the court in DeLong II, citing Monsanto v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. at 760-61, 104 S. Ct. at 1469, distinctly held that the restraints alleged there and proven on remand were not "non-price in nature" as the district court had held, 887 F.2d at 1506-07, but, rather, constituted "a vertical price conspiracy," id. at 1507, within the meaning of Business Electronics, "to artificially inflate or 'pad' the price." 887 F.2d at 1507 & n. 11. The DeLong II court went on to hold that the conspiracy alleged was an objectively and economically reasonable one within the meaning of Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 and that there was not only evidence of concerted action by inference, but a tendency of the evidence "to exclude the inference of independent action." DeLong II, 887 F.2d at 1508-09 (quoting Helicopter Support Sys., Inc. v. Hughes Helicopter, Inc., 818 F.2d 1530, 1534 & n. 4 (11th Cir.1987)). [32] Reciting the evidence of conspiracy above mentioned, the DeLong II court went on to demonstrate how the evidence supported DeLong's assertion that it was an obstacle to the continuation of the scheme between Washington Mills and BCS to "pad" the Pratt price, and that DeLong was terminated to remove that obstacle, 887 F.2d at 1512-15, adding that DeLong had "adduced evidence which tends to exclude the possibility that Washington Mills was acting independently when it terminated DeLong." 887 F.2d at 1514.

Thus, the law of the case doctrine is applicable and we see no reason to hold otherwise. While DeLong II did not say that the evidence presented necessarily established the vertical price conspiracy, it did say that the evidence of such a conspiracy sufficed to defeat summary judgment. On remand, a jury presented with evidence at least as strong as that recounted in the DeLong II opinion concluded that such a conspiracy had been established.

Nevertheless, we realize that HN5[] the doctrine of the law of the case "permits a change of position if it appears that the court's original ruling was erroneous." DiLaura v. Power Auth. of the State of N.Y., 982 F.2d 73, 77 (2d Cir.1992), [33] quoting Petitions of the Kinsman Transit Co., 388 F.2d 821, 825 n. 9 (2d Cir.1968). See also Arizona v. California, 460 U.S. 605, 618 n. 8, 103 S. Ct. 1382, 1391, 75 L. Ed. 2d 318 n. 8 (1983). Recognizing the great deference that is owing to the unanimous determination of the previous panel on summary judgment, "reached in a case that [was] already well advanced and designed to control further proceedings," 18 Wright, Miller & Cooper § 4478 at 796, we nevertheless in the interests of [*1198] certitude reexamine on the merits the points of law raised.

1. Injury in Fact.

Perhaps least susceptible to law of the case argumentation is Washington Mills' point that DeLong did not establish injury in fact because it was undisputed that numerous other sources of media were and are available to it; thus, the defendants argue that there is no causal connection between the termination and DeLong's claimed lost profits because there were "alternative comparable substitutes for the desired merchandise." Elder-Beerman Stores Corp. v. Federated Dep't Stores, Inc., 459 F.2d 138, 148 (6th Cir.1972). The [34] basis for this argument is an admission by DeLong's expert, Dr. Seaman, that it was a "possibility" that DeLong could capture all of Pratt's business, selling media furnished by other manufacturers DeLong "[could] get approved." That condition -- that DeLong could get other media approved -- was explicit in the question put to Dr. Seaman. [3] As we have noted, however, Pratt, presumably concerned with the extraordinarily high standards applicable to jet aircraft engine propellers, had careful procedures for approving products to which the Washington Mills media already had been subjected. It would not automatically approve any preformed ceramic abrasive media, made by any manufacturer. The verdict indicates that the jury rejected the "possibility" that DeLong could compete effectively by simply getting Pratt to approve alternative products.

[35] Washington Mills' more significant argument is that DeLong failed to establish antitrust injury, that is, injury "of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful." Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 697, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977). In other words, as later put in Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Corp., 495 U.S. 328, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990), HN6[] even where the conduct complained of is illegal per se, a plaintiff must show that it is "adversely affected by an anti-competitive aspect of the defendant's conduct." Id. at 339, 110 S. Ct. at 1891 (re claims under § 4 of Clayton Act). See also id. at 339 n. 8, 110 S. Ct. at 1890 n. 8 (quoting Phillip P. Areeda and Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 340.3b at 411 (1989 supp.); Areeda and Hovenkamp P 340.3b at 470 (1991 supp.). Washington Mills also refers to Todorov v. D.C.H. Healthcare Authority, 921 F.2d 1438 (11th Cir.1991), [36] for the proposition that determining antitrust standing "involves an analysis of prudential considerations aimed at preserving the effective enforcement of the antitrust laws." Id. at 1448. Todorov recognizes that a showing of antitrust injury, while necessary, is not always sufficient to establish standing. In short, these cases involve plaintiffs who protested their not being allowed to participate in an anti-competitive arrangement, or their loss of a monopolistic position.

However, DeLong's injury was a loss of opportunity to compete. DeLong made no further sales of preformed ceramic media to Pratt after its termination. DeLong sought to obtain the list price for purposes of its charges to Pratt, doing what it could to reveal the padded price, and, hence, it can be said that DeLong was willing to subject itself to the competitive market for Washington Mills media and was not in the quest for "super-competitive" profits. Washington Mills, with a better product, offered better-than-competitive prices for its stock media.

Todorov, which incidentally cites DeLong II with approval on the means of establishing conspiracy, 921 F.2d at 1456, [37] is not to the contrary. The plaintiff in that case relied upon a monopolistic profit theory to support recovery; unlike Dr. Todorov, DeLong was not interested in forestalling [*1199] competition and maintaining an inflated price, but in obtaining the stock price at which he could make a profit that was usual in the business with the basic markup. In short, nothing in this case indicates that DeLong sought to benefit from the Washington Mills-BCS anti-competitive conduct or to obtain super-competitive prices. DeLong's contentions properly gave it standing on the basis that Washington Mills, at BCS's instigation and with BCS's assistance, unfairly took advantage of its short-term position as the only approved source of media by artificially inflating the wholesale price and thereby extracting super-competitive profits which it shared with BCS by payment of "commissions" or "kickbacks"; that it blocked competition among distributors of its generic media in the market for one of its largest end-customers; and that it terminated DeLong as a Washington Mills distributor when DeLong threatened not to "play the game." Thus, DeLong has sustained antitrust injury by loss of its Washington Mills distributorship [38] and consequent loss of sales and profits. Because Washington Mills media had certain competitive advantages over alternative media, DeLong has not suffered damage simply from its own failure to compete in an open market with identical media made by other manufacturers. DeLong was not allowed to participate in the competitive market for Washington Mills media because it refused to go along with the Washington Mills/BCS price-fixing scheme.

[3] Q. [By Mr. Coe]: Given his perfect setup and his positioning and his competitive pricing, Doctor, there's not a reason in the world why he [DeLong] can't capture all of Pratt's business selling Wisconsin Porcelain, Abrasive Finishing, Capco, Vibra-finish or anybody else he can get approved, is there, Ceratech; isn't that true? [Wisconsin Porcelain, Abrasive Finishing, Capco, and Ceratech are competing manufacturers of ceramic media.]

But Washington Mills goes a step farther in arguing that DeLong's claimed injury boils down to the contention that, absent Washington Mills overcharging, Pratt would simply have continued to purchase Washington Mills products, without examining alternative sources of supply. On this basis, it is argued that DeLong's injury results from increased competition, which is by definition not an antitrust injury. Washington Mills and BCS, however, had seen "a window of opportunity," according to the testimony of Washington Mills President and controlling shareholder John Williams, during which they could charge non-market prices without regard to competition. Given BCS's approval and Pratt's purchasing practices, the conspirators had the power to exclude [39] competition and maintain high prices over a longer haul -- Biebel was quoted as saying "we are secure for at least three years unless DeLong does not play the game" -- so long as DeLong cooperated. True, Pratt has switched to another brand of media, and a witness for DeLong suggested that DeLong could have won that contract had it bid competitively. But DeLong was at a disadvantage in bidding for the Pratt business since it could not offer Washington Mills media. The jury could have decided that DeLong lost the share of the competitive market which it would have had if it had it been able to offer Washington Mills media in the future. No quarrel is had by Washington Mills with the court's repeated instructions to the jury that only losses of business which would have been retained in a competitive market were actionable.

2. Failure to show a conspiracy over resale prices.

Washington Mills argues, as best we fathom, that Business Electronics made it abundantly clear that the only vertical restraints deemed to be per se illegal under the Sherman Act are agreements relating to resale price, and that the relevant price in the vertical context is "agreement on the price or price [40] levels to be charged by the remaining dealer." Business Elecs. Corp., 485 U.S. at 726, 109 S. Ct. at 1521. The alleged agreement here, the argument runs, was not to fix the retail price, but to fix the wholesale price of media sold to DeLong, or at best to Pratt. Since there was no showing here of any agreement between Washington Mills and BCS as to the price at which the latter would resell to Pratt, the argument continues, there is no per se illegality.

This argument meets the law of the case doctrine head-on. As the DeLong II court recognized, all that is required is proof of a fixing of retail price "levels"; this is all that Business Electronics addresses, referring to "a further agreement on the price or price levels to be charged by the remaining [*1200] dealer." Id., 485 U.S. at 726, 109 S. Ct. at 1521 (emphasis added). While there was no requirement of adding a "fixed pad" to the price to Pratt, there is no question but what Washington Mills and BCS voluntarily agreed to pad the Pratt price. It will be recalled that Biebel of BCS suggested that BCS [41] and DeLong handle the Georgia Pratt business together, assuring DeLong that there was "plenty of money in it for both of us." When DeLong refused to "play the game," Washington Mills raised the price to DeLong to 85 cents and schemed with BCS so as facially to raise the BCS price to the same amount, while surreptitiously rebating the difference between the 85 cents and the 49.5 cent list price for the same stock media. By fixing the wholesale price level at 85 cents, DeLong or any other distributor would have been required to sell to Pratt at the wholesale price plus expenses and market profits, so that what would result would be the equivalent of resale price maintenance. Price-fixing at the wholesale level, as testified to by a DeLong expert economist, was the mechanism by which the retail price was maintained. The agreement in this case, then, was that future sales by anyone -- Washington Mills, BCS, or a duped distributor such as DeLong -- would be at the premium price.

HN7[] In general, of course, the fixing of wholesale prices poses no antitrust problem. See 8 Phillip P. Areeda, Antitrust Law P 1627 at 316 (1988) ("otherwise, every wholesale price would be illegal -- an obviously [42] senseless result"). However, as Areeda notes, complex wholesale price formulae may be the means by which resale price fixing is accomplished, where the formula "so varies the wholesale price in accord with each dealer's resale price as to be the full or substantial functional equivalent of resale price-fixing agreements." Id. at 317. See also id. P 1627d at 319, et seq. As an example of such a functional equivalent retail price fix, Areeda cites Newberry v. Washington Post Co., 438 F. Supp. 470 (D.D.C.1977), in which a manufacturer raised the wholesale price to a particular dealer by the amount by which the actual retail price exceeded the manufacturer's suggested resale price, thus effectively preventing the dealer from charging more; there, it was significant that the increase was applicable only to one dealer. Id. P 1627 at 320-21. Here, to be sure, the wholesale price was not set in response to a dealer's price reduction or increase, but, rather, so as to retain the sweetheart arrangement between the manufacturer and the favored dealer BCS; when DeLong would not comply with the scheme, his dealership was terminated, and, as we read [43] Areeda, he would find this "a vertical price-fixing agreement." Id. P 1627 at 321.

To be sure, Areeda recently criticized DeLong II as having "adopted an unduly broad concept of what constitutes resale price maintenance." Areeda and Hovenkamp P 1622' at 1049 (Supp.1991). The supplement's analysis of the DeLong II case in this respect is not up to that well-known treatise's customary high standards, however. It refers to the fact that the plaintiff was "allegedly terminated because it frequently called the attention of customers [sic] and others to this fraudulent scheme," a misstatement of fact. The analysis suggests that the defendant (Washington Mills) might be guilty "merely of successful product differentiation," a far cry from the facts of this case where there was considerable evidence of fraud; or of Robinson-Patman violations "(if the high-priced customer competes with low-price customers)," id., surely not the case here. The supplement then says "but the supposition of the supplier and the actual charge of higher prices for supposedly premium products do not constitute an agreement setting a resale price…." Id. We do not know to which "supposition" the [44] quotation refers, nor do we know how this squares with the analysis in the main volume of wholesale price schemes which operate as the functional equivalent of resale price-fixing. Certainly an agreement is required to present antitrust problems, but here we have one: an agreement between Washington Mills and BCS to inflate all distributors' end price of products destined for one large customer by eliminating price competition at the dealer level. The Areeda supplement [*1201] describes the supplier and distributor's agreement to divide the excess profits from their fraud-tainted sales as an agreement with "some" of the attributes of a resale price maintenance agreement, but treats the BCS-Washington Mills deal as "no more than the distributor's reward for participating in the fraudulent scheme." Id. It was not only a reward, however, but an integral part of the very scheme to inflate prices charged by both dealers, and thus a boon for eliminating distributor competition. While it may generally be true, as Areeda argues both in the supplement and in the main volumes, that the supplier would be better off if the distributor charged less than the agreed-on price, because then it would make [45] even more fraudulent sales, the fact is that in this case the supplier's temporary monopoly position, achieved by fraud and by Pratt's careful approval practices for choosing media, allowed it to reap the benefits as well. This may have been short-sighted, in light of the fact that Pratt now uses another brand of * MESSAGE(S) * MORE SECTIONS FOLLOWmedia, but nonetheless Washington Mills evidently chose to combine with one of its dealers to eliminate price competition in the market for media sales to Pratt. We believe that the Areeda supplement analysis overlooks the functional equivalence argument made in the main volume and, as such, does not carry the day with us.

3. Argument that failure of proof of Sherman Act damages mandated a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, not merely a new trial on damages.

The defendants further argue that while the trial court correctly found that the verdict awarding lost profits was based entirely on unsupported assumptions and must be set aside, the appropriate relief should have been the grant of judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Cf. Chrysler Credit Corp. v. J. Truett Payne Co., Inc., 670 F.2d 575, 582 (5th Cir.), [46] cert. denied 459 U.S. 908, 103 S. Ct. 212, 74 L. Ed. 2d 169 (1982) (defendant entitled to directed verdict on Robinson-Patman Act claims because "self-serving and unsupported assumptions cannot sustain a calculation of going concern value. HN8[] The burden of putting forth substantial evidence is not satisfied by mere speculation and guess work."). However, as we note in the discussion of the new trial motion, DeLong provided substantial evidence of the damages resulting from its loss of the distributorship and consequent loss of sales and profits, based on evidence of its past performance in the marketplace and not simply on "speculation and guess work." As the Supreme Court has noted, antitrust damages of this sort are difficult to prove, and "it does not '"come with very good grace"' for the wrongdoer to insist upon specific and certain proof of the injury which it has itself inflicted." J. Truett Payne Co. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 451 U.S. 557, 566-67, 101 S. Ct. 1923, 1929, 68 L. Ed. 2d 442 (1981) (quoting Hetzel v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 169 U.S. 26, 39, 18 S. Ct. 255, 260, 42 L. Ed. 648 (1898) [47] (in turn quoting United States Trust Co. v. O'Brien, 143 N.Y. 284, 289, 38 N.E. 266 (1894)).

C. Legal Arguments on the Robinson-Patman Act claim:

The district court's denial of judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the Robinson-Patman Act claims is unassailable. HN9[] Section 1 of the Robinson-Patman Act, which of course amends and appears as section 2 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13 (1988), makes it unlawful for a seller engaged in commerce to discriminate in price between different buyers. This case involves Washington Mills' charging BCS $ .495 per pound for the same media it sold to DeLong for $ .85 per pound, thereby permitting BCS to sell to Pratt for $ .91, below DeLong's retail price of $ .97. On the surface, this is discrimination in price. It is not suggested that the statutory defenses of meeting competition or due allowance for differences in cost are available here, and the judicially-created "availability defense" as stated, e.g., in Shreve Equipment, Inc. v. Clay Equipment Corp., 650 F.2d 101, 105 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 897, 102 S. Ct. 397, 70 L. Ed. 2d 213 (1981), [48] is foreclosed by the law of the case [*1202] under DeLong II, 887 F.2d at 1516-17. The only argument seriously advanced here -- and to state it makes it appear to border on the ridiculous -- is that DeLong and BCS were not in functional or geographic competition with one another, see, e.g., Parrish v. Cox, 586 F.2d 9, 11 (6th Cir.1978) (competition must be in same geographical market); M.C. Manufacturing Co., Inc. v. Texas Foundries, Inc., 517 F.2d 1059, 1068 n. 20 (5th Cir.1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 968, 96 S. Ct. 1466, 47 L. Ed. 2d 736 (1976). However, there is no doubt but that both BCS and DeLong were after the same Pratt dollar and, while BCS was primarily a New England distributor and DeLong a southeastern one, both were obviously in head-to-head competition for the Pratt Columbus, Georgia expenditures for jet propeller polishing media, and at corresponding or overlapping time periods. Both were competitors during the startup period for Pratt's Columbus plant beginning in 1983. Deliveries to BCS for fulfilling the Pratt Georgia orders [49] were initially made to a warehouse in Manchester, Connecticut and transported to Columbus periodically for a year's period during which DeLong, which had begun soliciting business in June of 1983 from Pratt, made only minimal sales to Pratt's relatively nearby new plant. BCS sales to Pratt thus directly competed with potential sales by DeLong. Cf. Hartley & Parker, Inc. v. Florida Beverage Corp., 307 F.2d 916, 921 (5th Cir.1962) (competition could be established if plaintiff showed "that it had a substantial stock on hand ... and that in selling that stock it was in present and active competition with [the defendant]."). Moreover, at least by September 1, 1983, DeLong had been approved as a vendor by Pratt and the subsequent releases of sales under the earlier October contract made by BCS were thus directly competitive with any DeLong sales. True, BCS had no local Georgia warehouse to meet Pratt's 24-hour delivery requirements, but by virtue of its sweetheart price arrangements with Washington Mills it was enabled both to foreclose DeLong from competing in Georgia for a year and to weaken DeLong's long-term position. While there must be two sales made [50] by the same seller to at least two different purchasers at two different prices, Pierce v. Commercial Warehouse, Div. of Thompson Automotive Warehouse, Inc., 876 F.2d 86, 87 (11th Cir.1989) cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1045, 110 S. Ct. 841, 107 L. Ed. 2d 836 (1990), there is no requirement that the two sales be made at precisely the same time or place. It is sufficient if the complaining party demonstrates some sort of real competitive injury. Chrysler Credit Corp. v. J. Truett Payne Co., 670 F.2d at 581-82; M.C. Mfg. Co., 517 F.2d at 1065-68. Washington Mills' motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict on the Robinson-Patman Act claim was properly denied.

Washington Mills also argues that there is no proof of recoverable damages under the Robinson-Patman Act since the jury awarded the exact amount of "commissions" or kickbacks received by BCS, $ 50,216.25, as damages under the Robinson-Patman Act claim. While this matter will be discussed further in connection with the motion granting a new trial, Washington Mills argues that whatever [51] benefits accrued to BCS did not establish any injury to DeLong. However, this argument conveniently overlooks the fact that DeLong was qualified for approval as a Pratt vendor when the first purchase order let out for bid in late 1983, the October contract, went to BCS because BCS was given the lower $ .495 per pound price by Washington Mills and, hence, was able to quote to Pratt a $ .91 per pound price while DeLong was unable even to obtain from Washington Mills the necessary product identification for Pratt media.

D. Motion for Judgment Notwithstanding the Verdict on the Common-Law Fraud Claims:

Washington Mills argues that there can be no recovery on the common-law fraud claim of deceptive labeling of special media because DeLong's "admitted knowledge of the falsity of the representations negates any finding of reasonable reliance." This argument was addressed in DeLong II, 887 F.2d at 1519-20 and, while [*1203] the law of the case is therefore a complete answer to this argument, the fact is that in reversing the district court's prior dismissal of this claim for lack of justifiable reliance, the DeLong II court specifically pointed out that where [52] a plaintiff repeatedly confronts a defendant with the apparent falsity of its representations, and the defendant repeatedly confirms its original statement, asserting special knowledge, reliance is justified. See Georgia-Carolina Brick & Tile Co. v. Brown, 153 Ga.App. 747, 755, 266 S.E.2d 531, 539 (1980). Washington Mills argues that at trial Harold DeLong did not testify that he was deceived by the special label or that he relied on Washington Mills' alleged "superior knowledge," but, rather, said that he never believed Washington Mills "from day one." But DeLong's inward lack of belief in Washington Mills' fraudulent assertions did not demonstrate itself in any external manifestation other than continued questioning, only to be met by continued misrepresentation. We see no need for any further showing of reliance.

Washington Mills points out that the fraud was the sale by Washington Mills of essentially stock media (for which DeLong would normally have been charged $ .495 per pound), deceptively labeled as "P & W special" and bearing a premium price of 85 cents. It then goes on to say that, multiplying this extra $ .355 per pound by [53] the pounds DeLong actually purchased and resold to Pratt, the total amount comes to $ 17,824, which, together with $ 100,000 in punitive damages, was the exact amount awarded by the jury. We find no fault with this judgment, since it appears to be an appropriate award, given a finding of liability.

E. Washington Mills' appeal of the denial of its motion for a new trial on liability and DeLong's appeal on the grant of a new trial on antitrust damages.

Washington Mills appeals, in connection with its argument that a new trial should have been awarded on liability, alleged errors in the district court's jury charges. First, on the Sherman Act claim, Washington Mills argues that the district court failed to charge that the jury must find some agreement to fix resale, not merely wholesale, prices; second, on the Robinson-Patman Act claim, that the court failed to charge that recoverable damages must reflect actual loss, if any, to the plaintiff, not just the benefit to the favored customer; and third, on the fraud claim, that the district court erred by charging that the plaintiff could recover the amount of the difference between the price actually charged for so-called P & W specials [54] and the price that otherwise would have prevailed had the material been sold as generic. Each of these points is subsumed either in the arguments as to liability above or in the arguments as to damages below, and will not be dealt with further here.

DeLong appeals, first, the setting aside of the Sherman Act damage award of $ 2,033,295 for lost profits, before trebling. Before reaching that verdict, the jury was charged, essentially, to discount Pratt's usage of preformed ceramic abrasive media over the foreseeable future in order to arrive at DeLong's share of that market had DeLong not been terminated as a dealer. The jury verdict was based on the general factual evidence relating to DeLong's past and likely continued success as a dealer, favorable evidence of which was produced by DeLong; Pratt's needs at the Columbus plant; DeLong's willingness to meet price competition and special delivery requirements; DeLong's reputation for technical know-how, testing and delivery capacity, and willingness to work with customers; and DeLong's work history of long-term dealings with Pratt and its other customers. Evidence was adduced to show past loss profits including the amount of Pratt's [55] media usage to the date of trial and its purchase prices. Bud Henry, Pratt's chief media buyer, testified as to Pratt's likely demand for media for 25 years after Pratt's achieving full capacity at its Columbus plant. Scott Thurman, a certified public accountant, provided expert testimony for DeLong in respect to lost profits during Pratt's startup period through its reaching of full capacity in 1994, but concentrating [*1204] on the computation of factors for inflation and discount to present value. Dr. Bruce Seaman, an economist and professor at Georgia State University, offered alternative projections of lost profits from 1994 forward to 2019, the life of the Columbus plant, and testified to the assumptions underlying the five damage alternatives he presented. The defendants cross-examined the witnesses as to their assumptions, but offered no expert testimony of their own.

The district court, in setting aside the Sherman Act damages verdict, indicated that it was doing so because the expert projections were based upon the key assumption that "every single pound of Pratt and Whitney's projected media usage to the year 2019 would be Washington Mills media and that every pound of it would [56] be sold by plaintiff." DeLong Equip. Co. v. Washington Mills Electro Minerals Corp., No. 1:86-cv-275-RLV, slip op. at 3 (N.D.Ga. Sept. 30, 1991) (order vacating judgment and, inter alia, granting motion for new trial on antitrust damages) ("DeLong Order"). This interpretation of the expert testimony, while apparently suggested by Washington Mills' post-judgment brief, does not comport with the testimony. Thurman's testimony that DeLong had suffered a loss of $ 694,743 in lost sales from 1985 to 1994 started from a base calculation of all sales to the Columbus plant by all manufacturers and distributors, but adjusted profits by assuming a discount of 10% in price, which, as the jury was correctly informed, is the functional and mathematical equivalent of assuming that a significant portion of the Columbus media business would go to other distributors or manufacturers. Thurman's assumption of a discount of sales price by 10% to only 90% of list, amounts to a loss of a third or more of the profit on each individual sale -- the substantial equivalent of losing the same proportion of sales. The evidence supports the Thurman calculations, and we find no error that would justify [57] setting aside that portion of the verdict. To be sure, Thurman also offered one estimate of the damages for the entire projection period, through the year 2019, which utilized the constant assumption of this price reduction, and it was apparently on the basis of this assumption that the trial court was led astray. Thurman's calculation produced a figure almost identical to one of Dr. Seaman's five alternative damage scenarios, the one on which the jury settled. However, again, Dr. Seaman presented the jury with five scenarios in which DeLong achieved different degrees of success in the market for the Pratt media business, and the assumptions behind these were based in evidence and subject to cross-examination.

The trial court, in its review of the evidence completed more than a year after the verdict, made certain additional factual assumptions that were simply not the case. These include the following:

First, Thurman did not assume that all media sold to Pratt would be Washington Mills media, except in a pricing sense, that is to say, in his own words he "identified products from Washington Mills' price lists" and used the corresponding prices from those lists to arrive at his own [58] list price assumptions. His method of arriving at sales volume did not attribute all sales to Washington Mills.

Second, the trial court questioned whether Pratt would continue to buy through middlemen as opposed to going directly to the manufacturer. True, the media purchaser for Pratt, Bud Henry, testified that Pratt had a "goal" of reducing prices by buying directly, but he did not suggest that all sales categorically would be made directly or that Pratt would ignore the advantages of going through distributors where they outweighed the advantages of direct sales. Pratt did and does in fact use distributors, since servicing capacity and timely delivery were and presumably are of value to the company, and at the time of trial Pratt was buying the bulk of its media through another distributor, not directly. There was ample evidence to indicate that special services were provided by distributors. One could just as well suppose that Pratt could make its own media. Henry himself concluded that there was no reason that DeLong could not have continued indefinitely as one of Pratt's suppliers.

[*1205] Third, as we have noted, Dr. Seaman examined the case for the lost future profits for 1994-2019 [59] by addressing five alternative models. Despite Washington Mills' and the trial court's claims, he did assume that DeLong was not the only distributor and Washington Mills not the only manufacturer. While he assumed that in the early stages Washington Mills would have had the inside track, he also assumed that DeLong would have "made an adjustment" to be "better positioned to maintain the Pratt accounts." He thus chose different levels of competition and different responses to that competition to make his projections. His case one, not in issue here, was a mathematical extrapolation of "maximum damages." This case was based on the assumption that the trial court mistakenly thought all expert testimony rested upon -- "that every single pound of Pratt & Whitney's projected media usage to the year 2019 would be Washington Mills media and that every pound of it would be sold by DeLong." DeLong Order, slip op. at 3. Case one assumed no retail price discount and no lost sales volume, and projected damages of $ 5,659,618.

Dr. Seaman's case two adjusted for increased competition and assumed -- as had Mr. Thurman in his projections -- a 10% retail price discount to protect sales volume, [60] which produced a damage figure of $ 3,371,865. His case three adjusted for increased competition by assuming that DeLong would continue charging the full retail price but lose 50% of sales volume to other distributors or manufacturers, resulting in a damage figure of $ 3,177,181. Case four, however, made both adjustments by assuming both a 10% retail price discount and a 50% loss of sales volume to other distributors or manufacturers, arriving at the figure which the jury apparently accepted, $ 2,033,295. Dr. Seaman's fifth case consisted of a variation of case four in which the retail price was further reduced from 63 cents to 55 cents, resulting in total damages of $ 1,468,355. All of the cases, as stated, incorporate Thurman's estimate of lost profits for 1985-94 of $ 694,743.

The damage figure which the jury selected, Dr. Seaman's case four, then, assumed that DeLong would cut its price to 90% of list in order to meet competition but would still suffer a 50% loss of Pratt sales, and assumed that DeLong would make only one-half of all sales to Pratt with Washington Mills media. It certainly did not assume that "every single pound of Pratt & Whitney's projected media usage" [61] would be sold by DeLong. We see nothing to indicate that the assumptions made were unreasonable or fanciful.

In sum and substance, the combination of the basic evidence and the testimony of the expert witnesses supported the Sherman Act verdict by providing a basis for the jury to project DeLong's lost profits, assuming different levels of sales volume and profit per sale, and utilizing a discount factor reflecting all of these other potential sales. See J. Truett Payne, 451 U.S. at 565-67, 101 S. Ct. at 1929 (1980); Copper Liquor, Inc. v. Adolph Coors Co., 624 F.2d 575, 580-81 (5th Cir.1980). We think the assumptions used here were reasonable in light of the evidence.

Alternatively, Washington Mills argues that Dr. Seaman's case four assumption that DeLong would have captured half of the Pratt business to the year 2019 is subject to the same fundamental fallacies as Thurman's theory of damages through 1994, namely, that there is no more basis for assuming that DeLong would have had one-half of Pratt's future business but for the termination than there is for assuming that it would have captured [62] it at all. But the damages proof here reduced DeLong's potential sales volume to show loss of profits in open competition, and the jury verdict, to the extent it rested on Dr. Seaman's case number four, also incorporated a second adjustment assuming sales at a 90% discount off list price. We are basically dealing with a hypothetical question, in any event: what would have occurred if the defendants had not violated the antitrust laws and terminated DeLong's distributorship? See Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 123-24, 89 S. Ct. 1562, 1576-77, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129 (1969); Malcolm v. Marathon Oil Co., 642 F.2d 845, 858-59 & n. 24 (5th Cir. Unit B [*1206] 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1125, 102 S. Ct. 975, 71 L. Ed. 2d 113 (1981); and Lehrman v. Gulf Oil Corp., 464 F.2d 26, 46-47 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1077, 93 S. Ct. 687, 34 L. Ed. 2d 665 (1972). On the strength of the overall evidence, exclusive of the mathematical and economic [63] projections, the jury properly could have concluded that DeLong would have continued to sell to Pratt on the basis of the advantages of the Washington Mills product and DeLong's superior servicing and delivery capacity. The fact that Washington Mills has in fact lost the Pratt media business to another manufacturer is, at most, an indication that its overcharging and fraud preempted its participation in future sales.

In sum, because the district court's grant of a new trial, in a 5-page order filed more than a year after the close of trial, was based on a misreading of the evidence, the court abused its discretion in discarding the jury's verdict.

DeLong also appeals the grant of a new trial on the Robinson-Patman Act damages, arguing that the jury's award of $ 50,216.15 should be reinstated. This sum, as we have said, is identical to the amount of kickbacks which BCS received for DeLong's sales of media to Pratt. The district court granted a new trial on these damages because it concluded that the jury had latched onto this figure despite the fact that "Robinson-Patman damages must be measured by what the disfavored buyer suffered, not by what the favored buyer gained." DeLong [64] Order, slip op. at 4. See also J. Truett Payne, 451 U.S. at 568, 101 S. Ct. at 1930 (must prove injury from price discrimination as well as fact of price discrimination in order to recover under Robinson-Patman Act), and id. on remand, 670 F.2d 575, 583 (concluding that there was insufficient evidence of damages).

Washington Mills defends the grant of a new trial on the theory that the J. Truett Payne cases, and Hasbrouck v. Texaco, Inc., 842 F.2d 1034 (9th Cir.1988), aff'd, 496 U.S. 543, 110 S. Ct. 2535, 110 L. Ed. 2d 492 (1990), bar the award of "automatic damages" in Robinson-Patman cases, and that the jury in this case has awarded just such automatic damages by reasoning that the benefit to BCS should be the measure of the Robinson-Patman award. However, the cases actually say something much narrower: that it is impermissible to assume, from evidence of price discrimination, that the plaintiff suffered antitrust injury. While we certainly agree that the appropriate measure of DeLong's damages should [65] be the extent of DeLong's injury, and not the extent of BCS's gain, we note that these sums may be related. It may be that the extra money paid to BCS corresponded, at least roughly, to DeLong's lost profits on sales made of the media for which it was overcharged and on sales lost to BCS, and to other damage resulting from the drain on DeLong's business of competing with a distributor receiving favorable prices. Although DeLong still was able to make a profit on the sales it did make to Pratt, the Supreme Court has made clear that passing on the increased price does not prevent a middleman from collecting Robinson-Patman Act damages. Kansas and Missouri, et. al. v. Utilicorp United, Inc., 497 U.S. 199, 110 S. Ct. 2807, 111 L. Ed. 2d 169 (1990); Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977); Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 88 S. Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968); see also Austin v. Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Ala., 903 F.2d 1385 (11th Cir.1990). [66]

Nonetheless, we do not think it was error for the court to have concluded that the jury's award indicated that it had misunderstood or misapplied the law of Robinson-Patman Act damages by focusing not on the injury to DeLong but on the benefit to BCS. Nor did the trial court make any factual errors in setting aside the Robinson-Patman Act damages. While this is not a case in which the amount of the damages award was outside of the range of permissible verdicts, see 11 Wright and Miller § 2820, there are other circumstances in which HN10[] a new trial may be awarded. In particular, where the verdict suggests that the jury was confused and misapplied the law, it is not an abuse of [*1207] discretion to grant a new trial. E.g., Schneider v. Lockheed Aircraft Corp., 212 U.S. App. D.C. 87, 658 F.2d 835, 849 (D.C.Cir.1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 994, 102 S. Ct. 1622, 71 L. Ed. 2d 855 (1982); Wood v. Holiday Inns, Inc., 508 F.2d 167, 175 (5th Cir.1975). While we think it conceivable that the jury viewed the kickbacks as a likely minimum measure of DeLong's damages as a result of the price discrimination, [67] we think the district court was in a better position to determine whether the verdict in fact was the product of confusion. In addition to the verdict itself, the judge might have considered the possibility that the jury was distracted by the much larger Sherman Act damages claim and confused by the comparative weakness of the instructions he gave for calculating Robinson-Patman damages. The judge admonished the jury generally that recovery on all antitrust claims should be for injury to the plaintiff's business, but he offered no specific instructions for calculating the Robinson-Patman Act damages. Indeed, the district court's only explicit statement to the jury on the subject was the following:

Now, in calculating or figuring the measure of damages for price discrimination, one way that you might do that is this: The plaintiff would be entitled to recover the difference in the price of the product -- strike that, that's not what I want to charge there.

In part because of this misstatement, Washington Mills sought a specific jury charge that DeLong could recover only in the amount of its own injury from the price discrimination, and not in the amount of BCS's gain. The court rejected [68] this suggestion on the theory that the general admonition covered the point. He might have recalled, too, that DeLong's lawyers had advised the jury during closing argument that DeLong's injury, and not BCS's gain, was the appropriate measure of Robinson-Patman damages. Nonetheless, we cannot say that it was error to conclude, once the jury returned a verdict in the precise sum of the paybacks to BCS, that the jury had chosen this figure for impermissible reasons. Accordingly, we affirm the grant of a new trial on the Robinson-Patman damages.

Finally, the trial court did not err in allowing pre-judgment interest on Washington Mills' counterclaim on DeLong's open account. DeLong admitted owing the $ 24,532.68 amount awarded, and, hence, it is a liquidated sum within the meaning of Georgia law. Council v. Hixon, 11 Ga.App. 818, 827, 76 S.E. 603 (1912). HN11[] Under Georgia law, if a party admits liability in some amount, not necessarily the amount claimed or ultimately recovered by the other party, interest may be had from the date of such admission on that amount. See Boston-Old Colony Ins. Co. v. Warr, 127 Ga.App. 364, 364, 193 S.E.2d 624, 625 (1972); [69] Walton Motor Sales, Inc. v. Ross, 736 F.2d 1449, 1459 n. 20 (11th Cir.1984) (applying Georgia law).

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the district court insofar as it denied Washington Mills' motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict is affirmed. The judgment insofar as it granted the motion for a new trial on Sherman Act damages is reversed, and on Robinson-Patman Act damages is affirmed. The judgment awarding pre-judgment interest on the counterclaim for open account indebtedness is affirmed.

The focus of the doctrine of antitrust standing is somewhat different from that of standing as a constitutional doctrine. Harm to the antitrust plaintiff is sufficient to satisfy the constitutional standing requirement of injury in fact, but the court must make a further determination whether the plaintiff is a proper party to bring a private antitrust action. Whether a plaintiff is the proper party involves considerations of doctrines such as foreseeability and proximate cause, directness of injury, certainty of damages, and privity of contract.

To establish antitrust standing a plaintiff must show both: 1) harm of the type the antitrust laws are intended to prevent; and 2) an injury to the plaintiff which flows from that which makes defendant's acts unlawful.

Where a plaintiff executes a general settlement instrument which settles multiple claims with a defendant, but a non-settling defendant is not a party to that agreement, the non-settling defendant need show only that the plaintiff settles a claim on which the non-settling defendant is found liable at trial. If the defendant makes this showing, the burden then shifts to the plaintiff to prove that, under the terms of its agreement with the settling defendant, the settlement or part thereof does not represent damages arising under the same theory of liability as those forming the basis for the jury award.

Opinion

[*428] OPINION OF THE COURT Except as to Part II(A)(1)(c)

SEITZ, Circuit Judge.

Gulfstream III Associates, Inc. ("plaintiff"), instituted this antitrust action against seven manufacturers of business jet aircraft. It charged a horizontal price-fixing conspiracy among these manufacturers [2] to fix, raise and stabilize the prices of new business jets in the United States, including those plaintiff agreed to purchase.

Six of the manufacturers settled. The seventh, Cessna Aircraft Company ("defendant") resisted the three claims asserted against it. The district court granted summary judgment to defendant on two of the three claims arising out of agreements to purchase aircraft. One of these claims, that of Gulfstream IV Associates, Inc., was abandoned on appeal. The judgments of the district court on plaintiff's two claims form the bases for these appeals. In resolving these issues, with one exception later addressed, neither party raises any objection to the fact that the district court decided all issues on a paper record.

I. BACKGROUND

Plaintiff's first claim against defendant arose out of an agreement made on March 25, 1983, under which plaintiff agreed to purchase a Gulfstream Model IV aircraft ("G-IV") from a settling codefendant, Gulfstream Aerospace Corporation ("GAC"), for $ 13,470,000. Subsequently, plaintiff settled its antitrust claims against GAC. Under the terms of the settlement with GAC, plaintiff transferred all of its rights in the G-IV Purchase Agreement [3] back to GAC. The district court granted summary judgment for defendant after concluding that "plaintiff[] could have suffered no overcharge or consequential damages on a contract which was canceled." (J.A. at 35).

Plaintiff's second claim against defendant arose out of an agreement made in September 1981, under which plaintiff agreed to purchase a Gulfstream Model III aircraft ("G-III") from GAC for $ 9,975,000, subject to a price escalation clause. After the district court denied defendant's motion for summary judgment on the second claim, the claim went to trial and the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff which, when trebled, amounted to $ 2,992,500.

Thereafter, defendant moved for a judgment dismissing the second claim or, in the alternative, for a declaration that plaintiff was entitled to no damages. The district court found that plaintiff had received from pretrial settlements with codefendants an aggregate sum greater than treble the amount awarded by the jury in this action. As a result, although it did not dismiss the complaint, it reduced the verdict to zero and entered final judgment for defendant. However, it subsequently granted plaintiff attorneys' fees.

Despite the [4] fact that defendant was the beneficiary of the judgment on the second claim, it filed a notice of appeal from the judgment except to the extent it ordered that plaintiff was entitled to no damages (No. 91-5932). The appeal asserts that its pretrial motion for summary judgment should have been granted. Thus, its appeal is taken to negate the jury verdict and the possible collateral consequence flowing therefrom, viz., the allowance of attorneys' fees. Thereafter, plaintiff filed an appeal attacking the final judgment of the district court as well as the denial of its motion to amend the judgment (No. 91-5965). Both sides later appealed the award of attorneys' fees (No. 92-5263 and No. 92-5273). Those appeals are decided in a separate opinion filed this day.

The district court had jurisdiction over this action under the federal antitrust laws pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1337(a) and 15 U.S.C. § 15(a). This court has jurisdiction over the appeals from the final judgment of the district court pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291.

[*429] II. DISCUSSION

A. Defendant's Appeal

We turn first to defendant's [5] limited appeal of the judgment in its favor on the second claim. We do so because the attacks on plaintiff's standing, if cognizable and meritorious, would result in a determination that defendant should have been granted pretrial judgment, thus vitiating the jury's verdict for plaintiff.

Plaintiff does not assert that defendant lacks standing to appeal the judgment because it was entered in defendant's favor. In any event, we conclude that defendant has such standing because it "retains a stake in the appeal satisfying the requirements of Art. III," viz., the allowance of attorneys' fees. Deposit Guar. Nat'l Bank v. Roper, 445 U.S. 326, 334, 100 S. Ct. 1166, 63 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1980). We turn then to defendant's appeal mindful that these threshold issues were decided against defendant pretrial by the district court.

1. Plaintiff's Antitrust Standing

We understand defendant's appeal on these standing-related issues to be limited to the district court's denial of defendant's motion for summary judgment. Our standard of review is plenary. See Schafer v. Board of Pub. Educ. of Sch. Dist. of Pittsburgh, Pa., 903 F.2d 243, 246 (3d Cir. 1990) ("Our review of [6] the district court's order . . . denying appellant's summary judgment motion is plenary.").

Before addressing defendant's specific attacks on plaintiff's standing, some exposition of the law of antitrust standing is in order. "HN1[] The focus of the doctrine of 'antitrust standing' is somewhat different from that of standing as a constitutional doctrine. Harm to the antitrust plaintiff is sufficient to satisfy the constitutional standing requirement of injury in fact, but the court must make a further determination whether the plaintiff is a proper party to bring a private antitrust action." Associated Gen. Contractors v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 535 n.31, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983) (emphasis added). Whether a plaintiff is the "proper party" involves considerations of "doctrines such as foreseeability and proximate cause, directness of injury, certainty of damages and privity of contract." Id. at 532-33 (footnotes omitted).

In Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977), the Supreme Court set forth a two-part test for antitrust standing that has recently been applied [7] by our court. See International Raw Materials, Ltd. v. Stauffer Chem. Co., 978 F.2d 1318, 1327-28 (3d Cir. 1992). HN2[] To establish antitrust standing a plaintiff must show both: 1) harm of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent; and 2) an injury to the plaintiff which flows from that which makes defendant's acts unlawful. Id.

Based on the pretrial record, the first requirement is easily satisfied. The "decreased competition" in the business jet market is "the type of harm targeted by the antitrust laws." Id. at 1328. The second requirement is generally met if the plaintiff is a "competitor []or a consumer in the relevant market." Id. Alternatively, this requirement is fulfilled if there exists a "significant causal connection" such that the harm to the plaintiff can be said to be "inextricably intertwined" with the antitrust conspiracy. Id. (quoting Blue Shield v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 484, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149, 102 S. Ct. 2540 (1982)).

As to the second requirement, plaintiff was either a consumer or a competitor, or both, in the relevant market. [1] In addition, the harm to plaintiff through lost profits [8] (or increased losses) on the G-III Purchase Agreement was inextricably intertwined with the horizontal price fixing conspiracy. Thus, unless certain other issues raised by defendant negate plaintiff's standing, defendant was not [*430] entitled to summary judgment based on lack of standing. We turn to those issues.

a. Proximate Causation

HN3[] Antitrust standing requires proximate causation between defendant's conduct and the injury to plaintiff. See Associated Gen. Contractors, 459 U.S. at 535-37. Defendant asserts that plaintiff [9] lacks standing to bring the G-III claim because defendant's antitrust violation was not the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff. It says that, on the contrary, the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury was its inability to find a lessee for the G-III.

[1] Plaintiff enters into purchase agreements with manufacturers years in advance of the date on which the planes will be ready for delivery. In that sense plaintiff is a consumer. In addition, however, plaintiff routinely sells its interest in these planes/purchase agreements shortly before the planes are ready for delivery. Thus, in some instances plaintiff is competing with the manufacturer who is also selling another such product, at the same time, to the same consumers.

The defendant's argument is without merit even though the record shows that plaintiff contemplated taking title to the G-III only if it could find a lessee. Plaintiff's financing for the G-III Purchase Agreement was conditioned by plaintiff's bank upon plaintiff's doing one of two things when the plane was ready for delivery; either: 1) selling the plane/purchase agreement to a third party; or 2) entering into an agreement to lease the plane to a third party and then taking title to the plane. Under either of these options, the defendant's antitrust violation (which caused an overcharge in purchase price) would have been the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. Under the first option plaintiff would suffer the injury because the amount of the overcharge would reduce plaintiff's profits (or increase plaintiff's losses) from the sale of the plane/purchase agreement. Under the second option, plaintiff would suffer injury because [10] plaintiff would pay the full purchase price (including the overcharge) before taking title to the plane.

In sum, defendant's antitrust violation caused an overcharge in the purchase price of the plane. That overcharge was incorporated into the purchase agreement signed by plaintiff. From the date plaintiff signed that agreement through the date the plane was delivered to a third party, subsequent to an assignment by plaintiff, it is not disputed that plaintiff remained obligated to pay the overcharge upon exercising either option. Thus, defendant's proximate cause argument did not entitle defendant to summary judgment.

b. "Purchase" of the G-III

Defendant next asserts that plaintiff lacks standing to bring the G-III claim because plaintiff assigned the agreement and thus never "purchased" the G-III. Defendant's argument seems to be predicated on the assumption that only a purchaser can have antitrust standing.

Almost fifty years ago, the Supreme Court rejected such an argument. See Mandeville Island Farms, Inc. v. American Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U.S. 219, 236, 92 L. Ed. 1328, 68 S. Ct. 996 (1948) ("The statute does not confine its protection to consumers, or to purchasers [11] , or to competitors, or to sellers. . . . The Act is comprehensive in its terms and coverage, protecting all who are made victims of the forbidden practices by whomever they may be perpetrated." (emphasis added)). HN4[] On their face, the antitrust laws purport to provide a remedy to "any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws . . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 15. Recent Supreme Court cases have espoused a narrower reading of the statutes' coverage. See, e.g., Associated Gen. Contractors, 459 U.S. at 529 & n.19 (quoting Mandeville; rejecting argument that "statute is as broad as its words suggest"). Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has never intimated that only purchasers have standing.

In addition, even if this court accepted the view that standing should generally be limited to purchasers, defendant's argument seeks to exalt form over substance. Admittedly, plaintiff assigned its rights in the plane and purchase agreement and never took title to the G-III. Thus, plaintiff was not a purchaser in the ordinary sense of that word. Nevertheless, plaintiff executed [12] a purchase agreement and remained contractually bound to pay the G-III's total purchase price up to and including the date of delivery. We believe in these circumstances that plaintiff's continuing contractual obligation nullifies this objection to its standing and, thus, summary judgment was properly denied.

[*431] c. Assignment of the G-III Purchase Agreement

Defendant next argues that plaintiff lacks standing to bring this action because it unconditionally assigned its antitrust rights in January of 1984 when it transferred its interest in the G-III and purchase agreement to JB&A Aircraft, Inc. Under the terms of that assignment, plaintiff "[sold], assigned, transferred and set over . . . all of its rights, title and interest in and to the [G-III] and the Purchase Agreement . . . ." (J.A. at 356). This action was commenced against defendant in June of 1985, eighteen months after the assignment.

In a pretrial ruling, the district court recognized that antitrust claims are assignable, but rejected the argument that plaintiff had assigned its antitrust claim in this case. It contrasted this case with one previously decided by our court which involved, in part, an express assignment of [13] antitrust rights and noted that no "language in plaintiff's assignment . . . so much as alluded to rights under the antitrust laws." (J.A. at 58). The court stated: "On this record, the Court will not infer an assignment of plaintiff's Clayton Act rights." The defendant takes issue with that ruling.

Under controlling federal law, as the district court recognized, HN5[] antitrust claims are assignable. In re Fine Paper Litig., 632 F.2d 1081, 1090 (3rd Cir. 1980). The critical question is whether the general assignment here encompassed plaintiff's federal antitrust claim despite the fact that it is not specifically identified in the assignment that transferred all of plaintiff's interest in the G-III and the purchase agreement.

In its separate opinion, the majority of this court holds that HN6[] federal rather than state law controls the issue as to whether there has been an assignment of an antitrust claim and that such law requires specific reference thereto in the assignment to transfer such claim. The author of this opinion is dubitante as to the majority determination because he believes that the case for the application of state law rather than federal "common [14] law" may be more compelling and thus dictate a contrary conclusion. However, since the vote of the majority constitutes the holding of this court, it follows that there is no merit to defendant's argument that, because of the general assignment here, plaintiff lacked standing to maintain this antitrust action.

2. Refusal to Compel Production of Settlement Documents

In its brief on its cross appeal, defendant argues in a footnote that the "district court's refusal to permit Cessna access to the settlement agreements relied upon by the court in its summary judgment holding is reversible error."

The defendant's argument is not clearly discernible. We will therefore first interpret it to be an attack on the court's pretrial denial of defendant's motion for summary judgment. We understand such an argument to be premised on defendant's contention that the amount of the setoffs exceeded any reasonable potential verdict.

Even if one assumes that summary judgment would be appropriate in such a case, the short answer to this contention is that we cannot find in the record any application for the production of the settlement documents before the argument and decision on the summary judgment [15] motion. Thus, given the record, defendant cannot rely on any such refusal as the basis for holding that the court's ruling constituted error entitling it to a pretrial judgment. Nor is our conclusion changed because the court had in camera access to the settlement agreements.

Alternatively, if defendant's footnote can be read to attack the denial by the court of defendant's later formal pretrial motion for production of the settlement agreements, the answer is that had they been produced they would not, without more, have entitled defendant to summary judgment even assuming that the motion was timely. This is so because further evidentiary proceedings would have been necessary, at least with respect to the Falcon Jet settlement, before the court could possibly have determined that the settlement proceeds exceeded any potential verdict. [2] [16] [*432] Thus, defendant did not show that it was entitled to pretrial judgment. [3]

3. Exclusion of Certain Defense Evidence

Finally, defendant contends that the district court erred in its pretrial ruling on plaintiff's motion-in-limine that excluded evidence at trial tending to show that plaintiff resold the G-III Purchase Agreement. The district court ruled that such evidence was "irrelevant and inadmissible for the purpose of showing that plaintiff did not suffer the full amount of the alleged overcharge." (J.A. at 65). We review the district court's ruling under an abuse of discretion

[2] Plaintiff brought a separate action against the Falcon Jet Corporation, a manufacturer of business jet aircraft that is not a party to this suit. The Falcon Jet litigation involved, in part, the same price fixing conspiracy. The Falcon Jet Settlement contained an express allocation of the monies received among claims and attorneys' fees. Only $ 1 was allocated to the category of "all other claims" which included the antitrust claims arising out of the price fixing conspiracy. Defendant argues that the $ 1 allocation was made in bad faith and that a substantially greater portion of the settlement should be set off from the jury's verdict in this suit.

[3] Although not specifically headed in its briefs, defendant also argues that the district court should have granted its post trial motion for judgment nunc pro tunc dismissing the complaint on the ground that the trebled jury verdict was wholly setoff by the amounts received by plaintiff in the prior settlements. We cannot find that the district court erred in declining to grant this relief post-trial. We so conclude because, as we have held, defendant was not entitled to pretrial judgment.

standard. See Pfeiffer v. Marion Ctr. Area Sch. Dist, Bd. of Sch. Directors, 917 F.2d 779, 781 (3d Cir. 1990) [17] ("Relevance decisions are discretionary and reviewable only for abuse of discretion.").

We have affirmed the district court's conclusion that plaintiff had antitrust standing. We also agree with the district court that, because plaintiff was the proper party to bring this action, it had "a right to recover all damages for [the] overcharge, regardless of how much of the overcharge it actually absorbed . . . ." (J.A. at 63). Accord Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 746, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707, 97 S. Ct. 2061 (1977). Thus, there was no abuse of discretion in excluding this evidence if offered to "prove that plaintiff [could not] recover as damages the entire amount of the overcharge." (J.A. at 63).

The court therefore concludes that the various grounds asserted in defendant's appeal lack merit.

B. Plaintiff's Appeal

1. The G-IV Purchase Agreement

Plaintiff's appeal first attacks the order of the district court granting defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's claim arising out of its agreement to purchase the G-IV from GAC--the manufacturer of the G-IV jet aircraft and a codefendant in this case. Our review is plenary.

It is not seriously disputed [18] that the price specified in the G-IV Purchase Agreement may have included an overcharge caused by defendant's antitrust violation. Pursuant to that purchase agreement, plaintiff made installment payments to GAC of approximately ten percent of the total purchase price. However, prior to the date on which the G-IV would have been delivered (and the remaining ninety percent of the purchase price would have been due), plaintiff settled its antitrust claims against GAC. As part of the GAC Settlement Agreement, plaintiff transferred all its right, title and interest in the G-IV and the G-IV Purchase Agreement back to GAC. In return for its interest in the G-IV and the purchase agreement, plaintiff received a payment of $ 2,171,866. This amount exceeded plaintiff's ten percent down payment on the G-IV by over $ 800,000. [4]

Plaintiff argues that because the GAC Settlement Agreement refers to the transaction [19] as a "sale" of plaintiff's interest to GAC rather than a "cancellation" of the purchase agreement, plaintiff is entitled to recover damages from defendant in the amount of any overcharge reflected in the G-IV Purchase Agreement.

[*433] Plaintiff, in our view, seeks to attach unwarranted significance to the words "cancellation" and "sale." Whether the GAC Settlement Agreement is termed a cancellation or a sale, the substance of the transaction remains the same. Plaintiff was effectively released from any obligation under the G-IV Purchase Agreement prior to the date on which the plane would have been delivered and the bulk of the purchase price would have been due. In addition, plaintiff appears to have made a significant "profit" on the transaction.

The Supreme Court has cautioned against permitting "legality for antitrust purposes [to] turn on clever draftsmanship." Simpson v. Union Oil Co., 377 U.S. 13, 24, 12 L. Ed. 2d 98, 84 S. Ct. 1051 (1964). Otherwise, the antitrust laws could be circumvented "merely by clever manipulation of words, not by . . . substance." Id. at 22; cf. Commissioner v. Danielson, 378 F.2d 771, 774 (3d Cir.) [20] (applying similar rule under the federal tax laws), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 858, 19 L. Ed. 2d 123, 88 S. Ct. 94 (1967). The district court properly looked to the undisputed effect of the settlement agreement and concluded that plaintiff had received an amount that more than compensated it for its payment plus interest and thus it could not have suffered any overcharge or consequential damages. [5] The district court correctly granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on this claim.

[4] Plaintiff also received an additional $ 400,000 in settlement of any antitrust claims it might have had against GAC.

[5] Plaintiff attempts to bolster its argument by asserting that it would never have agreed to cancel the purchase agreement because such a cancellation would have resulted in the loss of a $ 1,000,000 tax deduction. This argument was not raised before the district court and we decline to address it. See Knop v. McMahan, 872 F.2d 1132, 1143 n.20 (3rd Cir. 1989).

2. The G-III Purchase Agreement

As previously noted, plaintiff's G-III claim went to trial and the jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff. Thereafter, [21] the district court determined, based on a post-verdict motion, that the sums the plaintiff received from the other six manufacturers by way of settlements exceeded the amount of the jury verdict. In accordance with the governing law, it therefore properly entered judgment for defendant, unless it committed error in calculating the setoffs. See Baughman v. Cooper-Jarrett, Inc., 530 F.2d 529, 533 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 825, 50 L. Ed. 2d 87, 97 S. Ct. 78 (1976).

Both plaintiff and defendant agree that HN7[] the proper determination of damages requires a two-part calculation. First, the court must treble the jury's award. Second, the court must then set off any amounts received earlier as settlements of the antitrust claims involved in this case. See Baughman, 530 F.2d at 533; Flintkote Co. v. Lysfjord, 246 F.2d 368 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 835, 2 L. Ed. 2d 46, 78 S. Ct. 54 (1957). The parties also agree that the district court correctly trebled the jury verdict of $ 997,500 to arrive at a total verdict of $ 2,992,500. Plaintiff argues, however, that the district [22] court committed an error in arriving at the amount it received in settlement of its antitrust claims from the defendant Mitsubishi Aircraft International, Inc. ("Mitsubishi"). It was partly because of such error, says plaintiff, that the total setoff from the six settlements was in excess of the trebled verdict.

a. Mitsubishi Settlement

We address plaintiff's settlement with the defendant Mitsubishi, keeping in mind that the following facts are undisputed. Plaintiff ultimately executed two separate settlement documents with Mitsubishi. Pursuant to the First Mitsubishi Settlement, plaintiff was to receive: 1) $ 300,000 in cash; 2) one Mitsubishi Diamond II airplane for $ 2,600,000; and 3) options to purchase two additional Diamond II airplanes for $ 2,600,000 each. Mitsubishi represented to plaintiff that the market price for a Diamond II was approximately $ 3,200,000. The First Mitsubishi Settlement also obligated plaintiff to forfeit $ 75,000 of the $ 300,000 in cash if plaintiff did not purchase at least one Diamond II.

The First Mitsubishi Settlement contained a most favored nation clause under which plaintiff promised Mitsubishi that it would not settle its claims against any [23] other defendant for less than a specified dollar amount. Despite the apparent value of the First Mitsubishi Settlement, the most favored nation [*434] clause stated in pertinent part: "The parties hereto stipulate that for purposes of this paragraph of this agreement only, and for no other purposes, this settlement has a present value of $ 400,000.00 for the benefit of the plaintiff[] and as a cost to Mitsubishi." (J.A. at 823).

Subsequently, when plaintiff tried to sell its options on the Diamond II's, it became aware that the market price for a Diamond II was actually $ 600,000 less than Mitsubishi had represented. Thus, plaintiff's right/options to purchase Diamond II's were worthless and the value of the Mitsubishi Settlement to plaintiff was reduced by approximately $ 1,800,000. Plaintiff contacted Mitsubishi and threatened, inter alia, to rescind the First Mitsubishi Settlement and/or to sue Mitsubishi under Texas law for damages for misrepresentation. Although plaintiff never formally revoked the First Mitsubishi Settlement, ultimately Mitsubishi paid plaintiff $ 1,800,000 in cash and plaintiff and Mitsubishi signed the Second Mitsubishi Settlement covering all claims between [24] the parties (including the earlier antitrust claims).

The basic issue presented is whether, under the undisputed facts above, the district court was entitled to include the $ 1,800,000 in calculating the Mitsubishi setoff. [6] Plaintiff, relying largely on the most favored nation clause, says that the amount of the setoff should be no more than $ 400,000. It notes that it never formally revoked the first settlement and argues that the $ 1,800,000 in cash was received in settlement of a potential state law fraud claim and not in partial settlement of plaintiff's antitrust claim.

[6] The parties do not explicitly contend that the resolution of this issue requires us to determine whether federal or state law applies. In either event, we think that the same considerations of preventing duplicative recovery would obtain. See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 885(3) (1979).

Momentarily passing over the fact that a most favored nation clause is generally included for the benefit of a settling defendant (rather than a plaintiff), [25] by its express terms the most favored nation clause in this case is inapplicable to the valuation of the settlement for purposes of calculating setoff. Even if we were to indulge in the unlikely assumption that plaintiff intended that the most favored nation clause be somehow applicable for setoff purposes, the $ 400,000 amount improperly fails to include the represented value of the options that plaintiff received. See Merola v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 515 F.2d 165, 172 (3d Cir. 1975) (discussing valuation of antitrust settlement for purposes of attorneys' fees; "Where the benefit [from a settlement] is in non-monetary form, the district court must bring an informed economic judgment to bear in assessing its value. If probative evidence of the monetary value of such a benefit is available, it should of course be used."). As other courts have recognized, HN8[] the value of options received in an antitrust settlement must be considered when valuing that settlement, at least where the plaintiff intends to exercise those options. See Basile v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 640 F. Supp. 697 (S.D. Ohio 1986); [26] see also Bal Theatre Corp. v. Paramount Film Distrib. Corp., 206 F. Supp. 708, 714 (N.D. Cal. 1962) (recognizing that in antitrust context, "the rule . . . seems to be that anything of value received should be set off in addition to the cash settlement").

It is true that courts have adopted the parties' valuation of their settlement, provided the record supported that valuation. In this case, however, we think the record supports the district court's finding that the $ 1,800,000 received in the second settlement was properly set off. The fact that plaintiff threatened to sue Mitsubishi for fraud does not alter the reality that the second settlement proceeds were part of the true value of the original settlement. [7] Any other approach [*435] to the second settlement would do violence to the equitable principle that one who has recovered from one coconspirator may not recover the same item of damage from another conspirator. Baughman, 530 F.2d at 533.

[27] Finally, we do not consider that the affidavit of Mitsubishi's in-house counsel, Yukihisa Hotta, creates a disputed issue of material fact. Mr. Hotta stated that the $ 1,800,000 "represented threatened single damages under the Texas [fraud] statute . . . ." (J.A. at 913). [8] Plaintiff says this representation is unchallenged. Nevertheless, it amounts to no more than a mathematical truism. The pertinent question is not what the $ 1,800,000 may have "represented", but rather, what claim or claims it was in fact paid to settle. By the terms of the Second Mitsubishi Settlement, the $ 1,800,000 was paid to settle all claims between the parties--including the antitrust claims. In addition, we note that Mr. Hotta's affidavit refers to "threatened single damages" of $ 1,800,000. The

[7] As the district court stated:

> The Second Mitsubishi Settlement Agreement, although releasing Mitsubishi from any claims that could have arisen out of the options in the First Mitsubishi Settlement Agreement, also releases it from causes of action "specifically including but not limited to all causes of action pleaded or that could have been pleaded or asserted in" this action. Plaintiff[] [has] not explained this language away. Nor [has it] explained away the fact that . . . . the approximate value of each of plaintiff['s] three options . . . was $ 600,000. The amount of cash transferred in the second Mitsubishi settlement thus demonstrates the value of the options conveyed in the first Mitsubishi settlement.

[8] Mr. Hotta's affidavit states, in pertinent part:

> (3) The claims threatened by Gulfstream III Associates, Inc. and Gulfstream IV Associates, Inc. in the fall of 1986 related to alleged misrepresentations pertaining to the term of sale of a Diamond II aircraft and an option to purchase two additional Diamond II aircraft. The claims were threatened under the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act and were viewed as serious claims by myself and Mitsubishi's outside counsel, the law firm of Fulbright & Jaworski.
> (4) Mitsubishi denied liability, but agreed to settle these claims in December, 1986 for $ 1.8 million, which represented threatened single damages under the Texas statute, which provides for treble damages plus attorneys' fees.

(J.A. at 913).

amount of these threatened damages was simply the amount plaintiff believed it was defrauded in the First Mitsubishi Settlement.

[28] The district court ruled that the total amount of this settlement set off from the jury award should be $ 2,025,000 rather than the $ 400,000 specified in the most favored nation clause of the first settlement agreement. Thus, whether presenting an issue of law or ultimate fact, we conclude that the district court committed no error in including the amount of the second settlement in the setoff calculation. In so concluding, we reiterate that neither in the district court nor on appeal does plaintiff challenge the district court's right to resolve the merits of this issue on the record before it.

b. Application Of Total Amounts of All Settlements

To Verdict on G-III

The amount of the total Mitsubishi Settlement when combined with the other five settlements exceeded the trebled amount of the jury verdict and thus seemingly dictated a judgment for defendant. However, plaintiff argues that the district court erred in refusing to allocate the proceeds received from the settlements among the three claims originally at issue in this lawsuit. It emphasizes that the settlements occurred prior to the date the district court granted summary judgment on two of the claims.

The allocation issue [29] is important because, if meritorious, the so-called Falcon Jet settlement aside, [9] it would mean that the aggregate amounts of the setoffs would only partially cover the amount of the jury verdict and would thus require that the judgment for defendant be vacated. In refusing to make the allocations sought by plaintiff, the district court seems to have relied primarily on its conclusion that such an allocation would have been "irreconcilable with the outcome of this case" because "two of the three claims did not survive summary judgment." (J.A. at 81). While the district court also relied on the "equities," we need not reach that ground here.

We are not persuaded that hindsight evaluation of a general settlement of claims based on a subsequent determination of their relative merits as against a non-settling defendant should be dispositive of their settlement values. After all, the incentive to settle typically flows from uncertainty as to the outcome. But our disagreement with the hindsight [30] approach here does not end the matter.

[*436] None of the six settlement instruments here purported to allocate the settlement proceeds among the three common claims asserted against all defendants on a joint-liability basis. Plaintiff, nevertheless, asserted in the district court as it does here that each settlement sum should be allocated for setoff purposes among the three claims, in certain percentages, based on the purchase prices of the three planes in question. Thus, in plaintiff's view, only 30 percent of each of the six settlements should be set off against the verdict, because of the relationship of the base price of the G-III to the total of the base prices of all three planes. Nevertheless, such an allocation, in and of itself, would have no inexorable relationship to the litigation value the settling parties attached to each claim when all were still viable. We therefore agree with the district court that such an approach is not acceptable here and that Baughman does not dictate otherwise. See Baughman, 530 F.2d 529.

Plaintiff next argues that the district court should have held an evidentiary hearing to determine a "fair" allocation of the [31] claims for each of the six settlements. Determining after the fact how parties to a general settlement valued various claims in arriving at their settlement is inherently difficult. Consequently, such valuations would be unlikely to represent precisely what factors each party weighed and how it valued them in reaching the settlement. To add to the uncertainty, the settling defendants would ordinarily have no interest in how the proceeds were allocated among the various claims. On the other hand, the plaintiff would have a real interest in aggrandizing by hindsight the amounts attributable to the claims now known to have been decided in favor of the defendant.

Given the foregoing considerations, we conclude that HN9[] where a plaintiff executes a general settlement instrument which settles multiple claims with a defendant, but a non-settling defendant is not a party to that agreement, the non-settling defendant need show only that the plaintiff settled a claim on which the non-settling defendant was found liable at trial. If the defendant makes this showing, the burden then shifts to the plaintiff to prove that, under the terms of its agreement with the settling defendant, the settlement [32] or part thereof did not represent damages arising under the same theory of liability as those forming the basis for the jury award. The view we adopt is consistent with the rule that a settling plaintiff is entitled to only one full recovery while at the same time it protects the plaintiff from the application of amounts received in settlement of unrelated claims.

We note that our conclusion is in substantial agreement with the position of the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit, albeit in a federal securities law context. See U.S. Indus., Inc. v. Touche Ross & Co., 854 F.2d 1223, 1262-63 (10th Cir. 1988). Nor does the rule we adopt do a disservice to the antitrust enforcement scheme. This rule does not deter a plaintiff from incorporating a good-faith allocation of the settlement proceeds among multiple claims. What it does do is prevent a plaintiff from waiting "for the jury's verdict to allocate the settlement in a way that reduces the remaining defendants' credit." McDermott, Inc. v. Clyde Iron, 979 F.2d 1068, 1080 (5th Cir. 1992). To the extent other circuits can be said to have taken a different position, e.g., [33] I.T.O. Corp. v. Sellman, 967 F.2d 971 (4th Cir. 1992), we conclude that their rulings do not fully serve the purposes of meaningful predictability and certainty. Thus, we find no error in the refusal of the district court to allocate the amounts of the settlements of the six codefendants among all three claims for setoff purposes. [10]

3. Refusal of District Court to Enter Judgment Promptly

The judgment was not entered in this case until four months after the jury verdict in order to first resolve the setoff issues. Plaintiff says the judgment should have been entered at once, thereby starting interest to run. The contention is based on the assumption [*437] that the judgment would be modified. Since we have not done so, the [34] issue is academic.

III. CONCLUSION

The judgment of the district court will be affirmed as to the appeals at Nos. 91-5932 and 91-5965.

Part II is my concurring opinion with respect to an issue raised by Cessna which I believe should be met by the court but which is not resolved in the majority opinion.

I.

Cessna has argued that Gulfstream III Associates is not a proper plaintiff because its antitrust cause of action was transferred to JB&A Aircraft, Inc. as part of a general assignment. Gulfstream III Associates entered into a "Purchase Agreement Assignment" with JB&A, assigning "all of [Gulfstream III Associates'] rights, title and interest in and to the [G-III] Aircraft and [the original Purchase [35] Agreement between Gulfstream III Associates and manufacturer Gulfstream American Corporation]." (J.A. 356.) JB&A later assigned the Purchase Agreement to R.H.

[10] Because we have affirmed the judgment here, it is unnecessary to consider on these appeals whether, as defendant asserts, all or some part of the settlement in the Falcon Jet litigation should also have been set off against the verdict. See supra note 2.

Macy & Co., which ultimately took delivery of the completed aircraft. In asserting that this general assignment must include antitrust claims, Cessna relies upon a general provision of the Uniform Commercial Code, Section 1.201(36), enacted in, inter alia, Texas, Georgia, and New Jersey. [11] Section 1.201(36) provides in toto that "'rights' includes remedies," from which Cessna apparently concludes that the assignment of a contract necessarily includes the assignment of all related causes of action. To the contrary, Gulfstream III Associates argues that antitrust claims can be transferred only by means of an express assignment; in Gulfstream III Associates' view, the general assignment of the Purchase Agreement therefore did not abrogate its right to bring this action. We agree with Gulfstream III Associates' position, and thus will affirm the district court's holding that Gulfstream III Associates is the correct plaintiff to pursue this action.

[36] There is no serious doubt that an antitrust claim can be expressly assigned. In many cases, such assignments are accepted sub silentio; indeed, it is commonplace for individual persons claiming antitrust injury to assign their claims to an association formed for the specific purpose of pursuing litigation. See, e.g., Jefferson County Pharmaceutical Ass'n, Inc. v. Abbott Lab., 460 U.S. 150, 103 S. Ct. 1011, 74 L. Ed. 2d 882 (1983) (trade association of retail pharmacists pursued Robinson-Patman Act claims as assignee of claims of its individual members); Chiropractic Coop. Ass'n of Michigan v. American Medical Ass'n, 867 F.2d 270 (6th Cir. 1989) (association brought monopolization claims that had been assigned to it by individual chiropractors); Hahn v. Oregon Physicians' Service, 786 F.2d 1353 (9th Cir. 1985) (podiatrists formed corporation to which they assigned their antitrust claims). See also In re Fine Paper Litig., 632 F.2d 1081, 1090 (3d Cir. 1980) (citing "a number of cases [which] have assumed that such assignments [of antitrust claims] are valid").

[37] We believe it is also clear that the validity of the assignment of an antitrust claim is a matter of federal common law. We so stated, albeit without analysis, in Fine Paper, supra: "In any event, the status of assignments under the Sherman and Clayton [*438] Acts is a matter of federal law." There, numerous plaintiffs, including paper distributors and several states, had brought antitrust class actions against paper manufacturers. The distributors were granted class certification; but most of the states, including Washington, were denied such certification. However, Washington was also the assignee of certain distributors' antitrust claims pertaining to paper products that Washington had purchased. We upheld the validity of those partial express assignments. Id. at 1090-91.

There are two bases for considering the status of an assignment of antitrust claims to be a matter of federal common law. First, the issue of assignment is appropriate for the development of interstitial federal common law in harmony with the overall purposes of the antitrust statutes. Second, assignments of antitrust claims cannot appropriately be left to determination under possibly [38] differing state law standards, because such assignments may implicate the "direct purchaser" rule enunciated in Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), and in Kansas v. UtiliCorp United Inc., 497 U.S. 199, 110 S. Ct. 2807, 111 L. Ed. 2d 169 (1990).

It has long been assumed that federal courts have the power to create so-called "interstitial" federal common law to govern issues closely interwoven with a broad scheme of federal statutory regulation. See generally 1A James W. Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice, pt. 2, P 0.324 (1993). This power is exercised frequently in antitrust law. See, e.g., National Soc'y of Professional Engineers v. United States, 435 U.S. 679, 688, 98 S. Ct. 1355, 1363, 55 L. Ed. 2d 637 (1978) ("the legislative history [of the Sherman Act] makes it perfectly clear that [Congress] expected the courts to give shape to the statute's broad mandate by drawing on common-law tradition"). In particular, the assignment issue of the present case is analogous to a limitations question resolved by application of federal common [39] law in American Pipe & Constr. Co. v. Utah, 414 U.S. 538, 94 S. Ct. 756, 38 L. Ed. 2d 713 (1974). American Pipe was an action involving Sherman and Clayton Act claims, originally brought by the State of Utah as a class action. Class status was denied for failure to fulfill the numerosity requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a). Parties who would have been members of the rejected class later sought to intervene; the district court held the intervenors' claims to be time-barred, because even though Utah's action was timely filed, the applicable limitations period had run before the filing of the motions to intervene. The Supreme Court held that the intervenors were not time-barred, because the filing of Utah's putative class action tolled the limitation statute for all purported class members who made a later, but otherwise timely, motion to intervene. The applicable limitation statute, Section 5(b) of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 16(b), specified the limitation period but did not provide for tolling for purported class members. The Court nonetheless thought it appropriate to create the tolling provision in a situation where [40] "tolling the limitation . . . is consonant with the legislative scheme." Id., 414 U.S. at 558, 94 S. Ct. at 768.

[11] The Purchase Agreement Assignment provided that Texas law would govern its provisions (J.A. 360); New Jersey is of course the forum state; and the original Purchase Agreement provided that Georgia law would apply to its provisions (J.A. 416). Because we conclude that federal common law governs the assignment of an antitrust cause of action, there is no issue as to what state's law would apply.

In American Pipe, the judicial creation of a tolling provision was proper because it furthered the Clayton Act limitation period's purposes of balancing a finite end to litigation against fair opportunity for injured parties to assert meritorious antitrust claims. In the present case, we believe that the determination of an assignment's validity similarly is related to the broader questions of antitrust injury and standing. We therefore make explicit what was implicit in Fine Paper, i.e., that the status of an assignment of antitrust claims is a matter of federal common law. The analogy of American Pipe would itself be sufficient basis for this determination.

However, our foregoing determinations that express assignments of antitrust claims are permissible, and that the validity of assignments is determined by federal common law, do not fully answer the question raised by Cessna, namely, whether a general assignment can include antitrust claims. To answer that question, we must consider the potential relationship [41] between the UtiliCorp/Illinois Brick "direct purchaser" rule and the assignments of antitrust claims. Because we conclude that the inclusion of antitrust [*439] claims in a general assignment would be disfavored under the direct purchaser rule, we hold that only an express assignment of an antitrust claim can be valid.

The direct purchaser rule had its genesis in Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 88 S. Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968), which held that a Clayton Act defendant could not assert a defense that the plaintiff had suffered no "injury" because it had passed on any illegal overcharges to consumers. Illinois Brick subsequently made this "direct purchaser" rule bilateral, i.e., that case held that a state, the indirect purchaser of concrete block, could not pursue price-fixing claims against manufacturers -- only the direct purchasers, masonry contractors, could pursue such claims. The rule of Illinois Brick was founded on the difficulty of analyzing pricing decisions, the risk of multiple liability for defendants, and the weakening of private antitrust enforcement that might result from splitting damages for [42] overcharges among direct and indirect purchasers. UtiliCorp further strengthened the direct purchaser rule; there, the Court refused to create an exception to Illinois Brick for states suing in a parens patriae capacity to redress economic harms to their citizens from an alleged natural gas price-fixing conspiracy. The petitioner states had argued that an exception was appropriate where, as they claimed, it could be demonstrated that the direct purchasers, public utilities, had passed along all of the alleged overcharges to utility customers. The Court rejected this argument, noting that even in that instance, pricing decisions by utilities could be based on other factors. The Court cautioned that any suggestion in Hanover Shoe and Illinois Brick of a possible exception for pre-existing cost-plus contracts must be construed very narrowly.

In the present case, Cessna has argued both that the general assignment to JB&A precludes Gulfstream III Associates from pursuing its claim, and that the direct purchaser rule would not dictate that Gulfstream III Associates is the proper plaintiff. We agree with Cessna's approach insofar as we see the issues of assignment and [43] application of the direct purchaser rule as corollaries. However, we disagree with Cessna in that we believe the present state of the direct purchaser doctrine requires that Gulfstream III Associates, and not JB&A or any later purchaser of the aircraft, is the proper party to seek a recovery for antitrust injury. It is true that this case as presented for trial dealt with only a single aircraft whose price when originally purchased by Gulfstream III Associates easily can be compared to the prices later agreed to by JB&A and by the ultimate purchaser, R. H. Macy & Co. Nonetheless, we believe that any exception to the direct purchaser rule would be inappropriate in this case for the same reasons that the Supreme Court held an exception would be inappropriate in UtiliCorp.

In our case, determining the relative extent of injury incurred by the direct or remote purchasers would entail several highly speculative inquiries. Could Gulfstream III Associates have charged JB&A the same price even absent the illegal overcharge? What alternative products might provide elasticity in the resale market for aircraft purchase agreements? What factors other than the original overcharge influenced [44] the price of the product in the assignment to JB&A? In addition, direct purchaser Gulfstream III Associates probably remained liable by contract for any shortfall between prices paid by the remote purchasers and the original price it had agreed to pay the manufacturer. [12] Nor is there any indication that the indirect purchasers were interested in pursuing the antitrust claims. Those facts weigh heavily in favor of considering Gulfstream III Associates to have suffered the entire antitrust injury of the price-fixing [*440] overcharges. In this case, just as in UtiliCorp, unwarranted complexities would arise from trying to apportion losses among direct and indirect purchasers. Id., 497 U.S. at 208-09, 110 S. Ct. at 2813-14. Despite Cessna's arguments concerning the unique nature of the G-III aircraft transaction, we see no circumstances here that could justify disregarding the Supreme Court's clear admonition that "it [would be] an unwarranted and counterproductive exercise to litigate a series of exceptions" to the direct purchaser rule. UtiliCorp, 497 U.S. at 217, 110 S. Ct. at 2817.

[45] Gulfstream III Associates' status as direct purchaser, and the concomitant inference that neither JB&A nor Macy could assert this claim, lends crucial support to our holding on the assignment issue, i.e., that any assignment of antitrust claims, as a matter of federal common law, must be an express assignment; general assignments, without specific reference to antitrust claims, cannot validly transfer the right to pursue those claims. We so conclude because many routine transfers of ownership may involve a general assignment of rights. Because of the direct purchaser rule, such transfers cannot carry with them the right to assert antitrust claims. Therefore, interpreting a general assignment to include antitrust claims would run afoul of the direct purchaser rule. This conflict would be obviated by an express assignment, which entirely eliminates any problems of split recoveries or duplicative liability. There would be nothing to prevent a direct purchaser from expressly assigning its antitrust claims to a remote purchaser; see, e.g., Fine Paper Litigation, supra. However, in this case, Gulfstream III Associates made no express assignment of its antitrust claims [46] to JB&A or any other remote purchaser, and Gulfstream III Associates therefore remained the proper plaintiff. Thus, we will affirm the district court's determination that the general assignment to JB&A did not abrogate Gulfstream III Associates' right to pursue price-fixing claims pertaining to the G-III aircraft.

II.

I agree with the reasoning and result of Judge Seitz's opinion for the majority and thus join in the judgment of the court. However, I write separately to address an issue that I believe Cessna has squarely presented, but the majority has not confronted. The issue is whether, if an antitrust defendant can demonstrate before trial that prior settlements will offset any recovery of damages for the plaintiff, the plaintiff must nonetheless be permitted a trial on liability in order to establish that it is, within the meaning of Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, a "person . . . injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws," who thus is entitled to a mandatory award of attorneys' fees. I conclude that the mandatory nature and the usual magnitude of antitrust fee awards dictate that [47] a plaintiff must be permitted the opportunity to establish liability at trial, even when a fee award is the only remaining relief at issue. [13]

During the time that plaintiff Gulfstream III Associates was pursuing this case, it was also, along with other entities and individual plaintiffs, pursuing two related actions that had been filed separately in the District of New Jersey and were later consolidated: and Rosefielde v. Falcon Jet Corp., 701 F. Supp. 1053 (collectively, the "Falcon Jet actions"). See Rosefielde v. Falcon Jet Corp., 701 F. Supp. 1053 (D.N.J. 1988). The Falcon Jet actions asserted claims of price-fixing and monopolization substantively similar to the [48] original claims in our case, although the Falcon Jet actions apparently sought recovery of overcharges for aircraft manufactured by Falcon Jet Corporation, whereas our case sought recovery of overcharges for aircraft manufactured by Gulfstream Aerospace Corporation. The Falcon Jet actions involved several contract and tort claims distinct from the antitrust allegations, and apparently involved different defendants than the present case. Those cases were settled by an agreement dated [*441] November 17, 1988, later amended as of March 30, 1989. The Falcon Jet settlement agreement called for a total consideration of $ 4,650,001.00 to be paid by the defendants. The agreement specifically allocated the settlement payment among the various claims, apportioning only a nominal $ 1.00 payment to antitrust claims, and apportioning all the rest of the payment to contract and tort claims.

[12] The district court in its opinion of August 30, 1990, rejecting Cessna's argument that Gulfstream III Associates was not a direct purchaser and thus lacked standing, indicated that "Cessna does not dispute plaintiff['s] contentions that plaintiff[] remained liable for the balance of the contract price" after the assignment. In its opening brief on the appeal, Cessna did not dispute this statement, though in its reply brief it equivocated, indicating that it was "assuming, for argument's sake" that Gulfstream III Associates remained liable. We need not pursue the point because even if we concluded that the assignment terminated Gulfstream III Associates' liability under the original agreement, we would not change our result.

[13] My discussion presumes that the present state of the law would not permit set-offs to be applied against a fee award. See Auwood v. Harry Brandt Booking Office, Inc., 850 F.2d 884, 894 (2d Cir. 1988).

In our case, Cessna brought a pretrial motion for summary judgment asserting, inter alia, that all possible damages had been satisfied by previous settlements with other co-defendants and with the Falcon Jet defendants. Cessna argued that the Falcon Jet allocation of $ 1.00 to antitrust claims [49] was not a good-faith apportionment, and urged the district court to count a much larger part of the Falcon Jet settlement toward set-offs in the present case. By the time of Cessna's motion, plaintiff's expert economist had established the maximum possible measure of damages as a 15 percent overcharge due to price-fixing. While the district court did grant summary judgment to Cessna on claims relating to two other aircraft, it rejected Cessna's arguments as to the G-III aircraft. The district court reasoned that the total potential value of a damages award of 15 percent of the purchase price for that aircraft would be $ 4,488,750. Examining the confidential settlement agreements in camera, the court determined that the aggregate amount of all settlements with Cessna's former co-defendants in this case would be less than the maximum potential trebled damages. Further, the court held that Cessna would not be entitled to any set-off for the Falcon Jet settlement, because the settlement agreement applied the payments to claims distinct from the claims in this case. Thus, in resolving Cessna's summary judgment motion, the district court accepted the validity of the allocations [50] of the Falcon Jet settlement payments.

Cessna renewed its argument on this point in two post-trial motions for a judgment dismissing the complaint, one motion brought before entry of judgment and a second motion to amend the final judgment. Cessna again asserted that some part of the Falcon Jet settlement actually related to claims identical to those in this case. By this point, of course, the jury had determined Gulfstream III Associates' damages to be only a 10 percent, not a 15 percent, overcharge, yielding trebled damages of $ 2,992,500. In response to Cessna's motions the district court reduced the amount of the verdict to zero, because the amounts received in settlement from Cessna's co-defendants in this action exceeded $ 2,992,500. However, the district court declined to revisit the question of whether Cessna was entitled to any set-off for the settlement of the Falcon Jet actions, reasoning that the issue was moot in view of the complete set-offs from settlements within the present action. The district court also refused Cessna's request to dismiss the complaint, and thus permitted Gulfstream III Associates to proceed with a fee application. The ultimate fee award [51] exceeded $ 1.1 million.

I think the district court incorrectly characterized the Falcon Jet issue as moot in view of the continuing entitlement to a fee award. I believe that post-trial, Cessna clearly was arguing that some reasonable set-off for the Falcon Jet settlements would mean that Gulfstream III Associates would have had no potential damage recovery going into trial, and this would have required dismissal of the complaint and a denial of any fee award. This is also the point Cessna has, I think, clearly raised on appeal, though it again has been unsuccessful in this attempt, as the majority has determined that other set-offs have rendered the Falcon Jet issue moot. See majority opinion, typescript at 27 n.10.

I would address Cessna's question, although I would not arrive at an answer to its liking. I do not think the validity of the Falcon Jet allocations needs to be revisited, because I would find that regardless of a complete set-off of any potential damages, an antitrust plaintiff, for whom a fee award is, of course, a mandatory part of the recovery dictated by statute, must be afforded an opportunity to establish, by trial if necessary, the liability [52] of the defendant that is a predicate of the plaintiff's entitlement to fees.

It is axiomatic that Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, is a mandatory fee award provision:

> [*442] any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws . . . shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

The courts have often distinguished this mandatory fee award from the permissive fee award provision of the Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1988 ("the court, in its discretion, may allow the prevailing party, other than the United States, a reasonable attorney's fee as part of the costs"). See, e.g., United States Football League v. National Football League, 887 F.2d 408, 412 (2d Cir. 1989) ("prevailing party" analysis under 42 U.S.C. § 1988 is not relevant to mandatory fee scheme of Section 4 of Clayton Act); see also Baughman v. Cooper-Jarrett, Inc., 530 F.2d 529, 531 n.2 (3d Cir.) (fee [53] award is mandatory under 15 U.S.C. § 15), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 825, 97 S. Ct. 78, 50 L. Ed. 2d 87 (1976); Home Placement Serv., Inc. v. Providence Journal Co., 819 F.2d 1199, 1210 (1st Cir. 1987) (award of fees is mandatory to encourage private prosecution of antitrust violations); Hydrolevel Corp. v. American Soc. of Mechanical Engineers, Inc., 635 F.2d 118, 130 (2d Cir. 1980) (15 U.S.C. § 15 "expressly requires" an award of attorneys' fees), aff'd, 456 U.S. 556, 102 S. Ct. 1935, 72 L. Ed. 2d 330 (1982).

It is clear that an antitrust plaintiff is entitled to recover substantial attorneys' fees even if it is awarded only nominal damages. That is exactly what happened in United States Football League v. National Football League, 704 F. Supp. 474 (S.D.N.Y.), aff'd, 887 F.2d 408 (2d Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1071, 110 S. Ct. 1116, 107 L. Ed. 2d 1022 (1990). In that case, the jury had determined, on special [54] interrogatories, that defendant NFL had monopolized the market for major league professional football in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, and that the NFL's anticompetitive behavior had injured the plaintiff. However, the jury chose to award only nominal damages of $ 1.00. 704 F. Supp. at 476. The defendant asserted, by analogy to cases involving fee awards under 42 U.S.C. § 1988, that plaintiff USFL was not a "prevailing party" and had not achieved a threshold level of damages sufficient to be entitled to attorneys' fees. The district court rejected any analogy to permissive fee awards, and held that "the jury's finding of injury and an antitrust violation precludes the NFL's arguments that the USFL was not a prevailing party under Section 4 of the Clayton Act. . . . A reasonable fee award under the statute is mandatory." 704 F. Supp. at 480. The court awarded the USFL attorneys' fees of $ 5,515,290.81. Id. at 488. The court of appeals affirmed the fee award in its entirety. 887 F.2d 408 (2d Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1071, 110 S. Ct. 1116 (1990). [55]

Even granting that a nominal damages award can support Clayton Act attorneys' fees, would a plaintiff whose entire damages are offset by prior settlement, and who therefore receives zero damages as a result of the trial, still be entitled to attorneys' fees? The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit answered that precise question affirmatively in Sciambra v. Graham News, 892 F.2d 411 (1990). In Sciambra, the district court had entered a default judgment against one remaining defendant because of discovery abuse. (A second defendant had settled previously for $ 165,000.) A damages judgment was entered for $ 271,896.00, but was reversed because the district court had applied an incorrect measure of damages. On remand, the plaintiff conceded that his damages according to the proper measure would be less than the amount of the prior settlement. The district court therefore awarded no damages, but did enter judgment for over $ 90,000 in attorneys' fees and costs. In affirming the award, the court of appeals found that in an antitrust case, an attorneys' fee award should not necessarily be dependent on a compensatory damages award: "the effect of the [56] [prior] settlement on [plaintiff's] recovery of compensatory damages has no effect on [plaintiff's] right to recover attorneys' fees." Id. at 416. So long as plaintiff has established an antitrust violation and injury therefrom, the court concluded, an award of attorneys' fees is mandatory. That result, the court noted, was consistent with the established policies of encouraging private prosecution of antitrust violations and [*443] deterring violations of the antitrust laws. Id. at 416.

The reasoning and the result in Sciambra follow inexorably from the holdings of USFL, and both those cases follow from the classic rationales supporting mandatory Clayton Act fee awards. If one accepts that USFL and Sciambra were rightly decided, then it is clear that an antitrust plaintiff can proceed to trial for a determination of liability and a potential fee award, even where prior settlements already have clearly negated any actual receipt of further damages. The very magnitude of antitrust fee awards indicates that they are a crucial component of a plaintiff's recovery, and in many instances fee awards may exceed certain [57] components of the compensatory damages. In USFL the plaintiff received over $ 5.5 million in fees; in our case, Gulfstream III Associates has been awarded fees of over $ 1.1 million, or more than 25% of the amount that it received in settlements. Surely such fee awards are a cornerstone of the accepted private-attorneys-general rationale of the antitrust statutes; and if a plaintiff has established violation of the law and injury, then, as the Sciambra court recognized, the amounts realized from settlements cannot properly be used to exonerate a non-settling defendant from liability for fees.

One might fear that permitting trials merely for the sake of determining fee awards would lead to frequent abuse and a waste of judicial resources. However, such fears are unfounded because of the rarity of circumstances that might require such trials. For example, it is exceptional to have a case, such as the present one, where maximum potential damages can be determined precisely and where one could ascertain clearly that settlement amounts exceeded the maximum damages. Even when such exceptional cases might occur, a plaintiff and remaining defendant(s) may well be more likely to settle [58] without trial once they can focus on the amount of a potential fee award.

Moreover, a defendant need not remain inert while a plaintiff racks up ever-larger fees. At the point where a defendant thinks the plaintiff has settlements exceeding the amount of its damages as trebled, the defendant could move for partial summary judgment establishing that it could not be liable for additional damages. At the same time, at its option, the defendant, subject to the court's granting its motion on damages, could concede its liability for the plaintiff's fees to that point in the litigation, with the fees to be fixed by the court in the usual manner. [14] If the court determined that the settlements did offset any possible trebled damages, it would then fix the fees and the matter would be over in the district court. On the other hand, if the defendant obtained a judgment that the plaintiff could recover no further damages but did not offer to pay the plaintiff's fees to that point, the plaintiff would be forced to reappraise the strength of its case to determine if it wanted to proceed against the nonsettling defendant. Overall, I think it would be a rare case which would continue simply to [59] determine a defendant's liability for fees after a court had held that the plaintiff's damages were offset completely by settlement.

Further, I would emphasize that in the present case the potential set-offs derived from settlements reached between the time of filing suit and the time the case came on for trial. This action originally was filed in the Central District of California in 1985 (having been transferred thereafter to the District of New Jersey); the Falcon Jet settlements were not reached until late 1988 and early 1989. We are not faced here with a situation in which a potential plaintiff receives from several potential defendants settlements that would be large enough to offset all damages before a suit is filed, but nonetheless commences an action purely to seek attorneys' fees from a recalcitrant defendant. I presume [60] that, if faced with such a situation, a court rightly might reject such a plaintiff's claim for fees.

Altogether, holding that an antitrust plaintiff may proceed to trial even if only a fee award remains to be determined, is the only outcome consistent with the weight of authority on entitlement to antitrust fees. I do [*444] not think such a ruling would create significant practical problems for trial courts, because the cases in which it would be applicable would be very rare. Therefore, I would resolve the question raised by Cessna and would hold that even where settlements entered into following the commencement of litigation have offset all damages, an antitrust plaintiff may try the issue of liability as the necessary predicate to establishing an entitlement to attorneys' fees.

[14] Cessna did not offer to pay Gulfstream III Associates' fees when it made its pretrial motion for summary judgment, so I do not consider the implications of such an offer in this case.

As the majority opinion recognizes, this appeal and cross-appeal raise several [61] difficult and previously unaddressed issues about the calculation of settlement offsets in an antitrust case. Although the court is fractured on several of the issues raised by the appeal and cross-appeal, I note that we are unanimous on many of the issues resolved by Judge Seitz's opinion. I join all of that opinion except Part II B.2.a holding that all of the $ 1.8 million Second Mitsubishi Settlement was properly included in the $ 2,025,000 which the district court offset against the trebled jury verdict. [15] I also join in Part I of Judge Greenberg's separate opinion representing the majority view on the issue of the effect of the assignment of the purchase contract by Gulfstream III.

I.

Central to my view of the effect of the two settlement agreements Gulfstream III entered into with Mitsubishi are the following facts from the record. When Gulfstream III entered into the First Mitsubishi [62] Settlement, dated August 6, 1985, settling its antitrust claims against Mitsubishi, it had been led by Mitsubishi to believe that the market price for the Diamond II aircraft which it agreed to purchase from Mitsubishi for $ 2,600,000 (and the two for which it received options to purchase) was approximately $ 3,200,000. After Alan Rosefielde, President of Gulfstream III, discovered that the market price for a Diamond II was approximately $ 2,600,000, he wrote to Raymond S. Vinton, Vice President and General Counsel of Mitsubishi, alleging that Mitsubishi had "defrauded" him by representing to him "as a material condition of [the first] settlement that the selling price of the Diamond II aircraft was to be held at $ 3,195,000" and asserting that "[a] review of [Mitsubishi's] files indicates that the [represented selling price] was an outright lie uttered in an attempt to deceive me into entering the settlement agreement." App. at 922. Rosefielde's letter identified three possible responses Gulfstream III could make to the alleged fraud: (1) sue for fraud; and/or (2) sue for rescission and put Mitsubishi back in the antitrust suit; or (3) reach a settlement. App. at 924.

In the letter [63] Rosefielde suggested that as a settlement he would expect "a concession of $ 600,000 per aircraft for three aircraft for a total sum of $ 1,800,000" and that this alternative favored Mitsubishi because if, instead, Rosefielde were to "retain counsel in Texas [he would] seek this amount plus an equal amount in punitive damages." App. at 924.

On December 22, 1986, Gulfstream III and Mitsubishi, without rescinding the First Mitsubishi Settlement, entered into the Second Mitsubishi Settlement whereby Mitsubishi paid Gulfstream III an additional $ 1.8 million and in exchange Gulfstream III released all claims, > specifically including but not limited to all causes of action pleaded or that could have been pleaded or asserted in [the antitrust suit] . . . and all claims that have been made or could have been made by [plaintiff] relating to or arising out of the negotiation, entry, signing and performance of the following:

> (a) The settlement agreement dated August 6, 1985 and all options and agreements referred to therein [the First Mitsubishi Settlement]. . .;
> (b) The Joint and Mutual Release in Full dated August 14, 1985;
> (c) The Diamond II Purchase Agreement [64] dated August 21, 1985 and all options [*445] and agreements referred to therein.

App. at 803, 805 (emphasis added).

Notwithstanding the express reference in the Second Mitsubishi Settlement to the potential fraud claims, the district court included all of the $ 1.8 million from that settlement in the amount to be offset against the trebled jury verdict Gulfstream III received against Cessna. The court concluded that "the approximate value of each of plaintiffs' three options [to purchase an aircraft at a set price] in the First Mitsubishi Settlement Agreement [16] was $ 600,000" and that the $ 1.8 million transferred in the Second Mitsubishi Settlement "demonstrates the value of the options conveyed in the First Mitsubishi Settlement." App. at 75. In reaching this conclusion, the district court rejected the parties' own valuation of the First Mitsubishi Settlement as $ 400,000. Instead, it included the full $ 1.8 million because the language in the Second Mitsubishi Settlement expressly released Mitsubishi from any of Gulfstream III's potential antitrust claims against Mitsubishi and because the $ 1.8 million paid in that settlement "approximately" equaled the difference between the misrepresented [65] market price of the Diamond II aircraft and the purchase and/or option price in the First Mitsubishi Settlement.

[15] There is no dispute about the inclusion of $ 225,000, which was the total cash received from the First Mitsubishi Settlement.

[16] Notwithstanding the district court's reference to "three options," Gulfstream III agreed to purchase one Diamond II aircraft and had only conditional options to purchase two more, dependent on Gulfstream III taking financial delivery of the first aircraft. App. at 819, 822-23.

The majority essentially agrees with the district court, stating that "the fact that [Gulfstream III] threatened to sue Mitsubishi for fraud does not alter the reality that the second settlement proceeds were part of the true value of the original settlement." Majority typescript op. at 21 (emphasis added). Assuming that a subsequent settlement and other evidence not known or available to the parties at the time of a settlement can be used to quantify the value of the initial settlement, I believe that there is no basis on this record to allocate the entire $ 1.8 million cash received to the First Mitsubishi Settlement. [66] Moreover, the majority fails to elucidate the facts on record on which it relies to establish "the reality" of the settlement transaction. II.

In the portion of its opinion dealing with the allocation of settlements to multiple claims (Part II B.2.b), the majority establishes a sequential order of proof and burden shifting that I think is apt for all calculations of settlement offsets in antitrust cases. The majority states that a non-settling defendant meets its burden when it shows that the plaintiff settled the claim at issue, after which the burden shifts to the plaintiff to prove that the settlement did not represent damages arising under the same theory of liability as that forming the basis for the jury award. [17] I would adopt that framework in dealing with the issue whether the $ 1.8 million conveyed in the Second Mitsubishi Settlement represented only damages for the antitrust claim for which the jury awarded Gulfstream III damages against Cessna.

[67] Cessna met its initial burden by showing that the Second Mitsubishi Settlement covered, inter alia, the antitrust claim. The burden then shifted to plaintiff to show that it covered more. However, the majority never discusses whether it is holding that plaintiff failed to meet that burden. It merely states that "the record supports the district court's finding that the $ 1,800,000 received in the second settlement was properly set off." Majority typescript op. at 21. The district court also [*446] failed to analyze this issue under that burden shifting framework. I think it is clear from uncontradicted evidence in the record that plaintiff met its burden to show that the Second Mitsubishi Settlement resolved more than just the antitrust claims resolved in the First Mitsubishi Settlement.

In the first place, we must look to the language of the settlement agreement itself. As the district court acknowledged, and as Cessna admitted at oral argument, the plain language of the Second Mitsubishi Settlement covers "all claims that have been made or could have been made by [plaintiff] relating to or arising out of the negotiation, entry, signing, and performance of" the First Mitsubishi Settlement, [68] not merely the antitrust claims settled by the First Mitsubishi Settlement. App. at 75, 805. The plaintiff's claim of fraud arising out of the negotiation of the First Mitsubishi Settlement is obviously encompassed by this language.

The second inquiry must be the intent of the parties. In Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 401 U.S. 321, 28 L. Ed. 2d 77, 91 S. Ct. 795 (1971), the Supreme Court stated that the intentions of the parties to a

[17] Specifically, the majority's rule states:

> Where a plaintiff executes a general settlement instrument which settles multiple claims with a defendant, but a non-settling defendant is not a party to that agreement, the non-settling defendant need show only that the plaintiff settled a claim on which the non-settling defendant was found liable at trial. If the defendant makes this showing, the burden then shifts to the plaintiff to prove that, under the terms of its agreement with the settling defendant, the settlement or part thereof did not represent damages arising under the same theory of liability as those forming the basis for the jury award. The view we adopt is consistent with the rule that a settling plaintiff is entitled to only one full recovery while at the same time it protects the plaintiff from the application of amounts received in settlement of unrelated claims.

Majority typescript op. at 26.

settlement agreement in an antitrust case as to what that agreement covers were controlling in determining whether the settlement agreement should be offset against the jury verdict. Specifically, the Court said that > to the extent that the . . . settlement which [plaintiff] received in return for the . . . release was understood by the parties to provide compensation for future damages[,]

> . . . [the antitrust coconspirator who was not a party to the release] would have available to it a defense of payment [for the same future damages it was ordered to pay]. . . . However, the record below indicates that a defense of payment could not here be sustained for . . . the undisputed and unimpeached testimony of [plaintiff's] [69] witnesses was that the . . . settlement was understood by the parties as compensation only for [plaintiff's] damages up to the date of the release.

Id. at 348 (emphasis added) (citations omitted); see also Carpa, Inc. v. Ward Foods, Inc., 536 F.2d 39, 55 (5th Cir. 1976) ("The intention of the parties to the release is the controlling factor as to just what damages are covered.").

Here again, Gulfstream III has met its burden to demonstrate that the intent of the parties to the Second Mitsubishi Settlement was to settle more than Gulfstream III's antitrust claims by producing evidence to that effect from both parties to that agreement. Plaintiff filed a declaration by Rosefielde, its President and negotiator, stating:

> I considered this [state law fraud and misrepresentation] action against Mitsubishi to be very strong. I subsequently settled this matter . . . with Mitsubishi paying to [Gulfstream III] the single amount of damages for which Mitsubishi would be liable under the Texas statute, namely $ 1.8 million. . . . In short, [the Second Mitsubishi Settlement] was for new claims of fraudulent conduct under state [70] law which I asserted against Mitsubishi, and not [a] settlement of the price fixing claims in this action, which had been settled in [the First Mitsubishi Settlement].

App. at 908.

Thereafter, plaintiff filed a supplemental declaration by Rosefielde that stated that the Second Mitsubishi Settlement > settled new, independent state law fraud and misrepresentation claims which had arisen against Mitsubishi, as set forth fully in my prior declaration . . . and in the affidavit of Yukihisa Hotta. The [First Mitsubishi Settlement], which settled the price fixing claim on the Gulfstream airplanes at issue in this action, remained intact. That prior agreement was not rescinded, nor was the consideration Mitsubishi paid refunded.

App. at 935 (emphasis added).

Further, plaintiff filed an affidavit as to the intent of Mitsubishi, the only other party to that settlement, from Yukihisa Hotta (Hotta Affidavit), Mitsubishi's in-house counsel, stating:

> The claims threatened by [Gulfstream III] in the fall of 1986 related to alleged misrepresentations pertaining to the term of sale of a Diamond II aircraft and an option to purchase two additional Diamond [*447] II aircraft. The claims [71] were threatened under the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act and were viewed as serious claims by myself and Mitsubishi's outside counsel, the law firm of Fulbright & Jaworski.
> . . . Mitsubishi denied liability, but agreed to settle these claims in December, 1986 for $ 1.8 million, which represented threatened single damages under the Texas statute, which provides for treble damages plus attorneys' fees. [18]

App. at 913 (emphasis added).

[18] See Texas Deceptive Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act, Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. §§ 17.41-17.63 (Vernon 1987).

Cessna produced no refutation of the signed and sworn affidavits by the representatives of the two parties to the Second Mitsubishi Settlement Agreement and thus they remain unimpeached. The district court never found that the credibility of either of the affiants was at issue, nor is it likely that it could have since there was no evidentiary hearing on this issue. The majority opinion dismisses the significance of the statement in the Hotta [72] Affidavit that the $ 1.8 million "represented threatened single damages" for fraud and misrepresentation, as a "mathematical truism." Majority typescript op. at 22-23. I do not understand that statement. If, as the majority acknowledges, the $ 1.8 million was paid to settle "all claims between the parties," Majority typescript op. at 23, then Hotta's statement that the money "represented" a settlement for the fraud and misrepresentation is not inconsistent with a finding that the settlement covered more than merely the antitrust claims.

Once plaintiff met its burden to produce evidence showing that the $ 1.8 million was not paid merely to settle antitrust claims which Mitsubishi had already settled and for which it already had a release, the burden of proof once again shifted to Cessna. Payment is an affirmative defense which must be proven by the party asserting it. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(c). In a comparable situation where an employer obliged to pay workers' compensation benefits seeks to offset a later settlement, the courts have held that the employer bears the burden of proof regarding the apportionment of that settlement. See I.T.O. Corp. v. Sellman, 967 F.2d 971, 973 (4th Cir. 1992), [73] cert. denied, 123 L. Ed. 2d 147, 61 U.S.L.W. 3651, 113 S. Ct. 1579 (Mar. 22, 1993); Force v. Director, Office of Workers' Compensation Programs, 938 F.2d 981, 985 (9th Cir. 1991).

In light of plaintiff's production of unimpeached and unrebutted evidence that it had a viable claim under the Texas fraud statute which was released by the Second Mitsubishi Settlement, defendant's burden to prove otherwise was not a light one. I do not think it was met by the slender reed of evidence that Rosefielde had accused Mitsubishi of overvaluing the price of the Diamond II plane by $ 600,000 and multiplying that amount by three because there were three planes referenced in the First Mitsubishi Settlement (one for purchase and two via conditional options to purchase). There is no other evidence of record to support the district court's conclusion, which the majority has adopted. There are many reasons on the record why that mere fact cannot support the conclusion reached.

First, it is based on the unreasonable assumption that Mitsubishi would settle with Rosefielde at the full demanded price. There is no evidence to support that; every other defendant settled plaintiff's [74] claim at a discounted figure. Second, the district court valued no other option in an equal manner. For example, the district court valued the Atlantic Aviation Settlement based on actual receipts even though the settlement included an unexercised option (essentially valuing the option at $ 0). Third, it is unrealistic to value the option to purchase the plane at $ 600,000 (even if the represented price had been overvalued by $ 600,000) because of the transaction costs to Gulfstream III, a secondary seller, of financing the purchases, finding a buyer, and selling the planes. Fourth, valuing each option at $ 600,000 fails to account for the fact that the option to purchase the two planes was conditional on the purchase of the first, and in fact Gulfstream III never did so. Thus, even if those conditional options had some value, it could not have been [*448] the full $ 600,000 discount from the sales price.

Fifth, the $ 2,025,000 value which the district court assigned to the Mitsubishi Settlements is grossly out of line with the values of the other settlements which ranged from $ 251,392.58 (the Atlantic Aviation Settlement) to $ 600,000 (the Gates Learjet Settlement). Neither the majority [75] nor the district court proffers any explanation why Mitsubishi, one of seven jointly and severally liable codefendants, would pay Gulfstream III in settlement almost $ 1.5 million more than any other defendant. Finally, the district court did not assign any value at all to the released claim of fraud, although it never made a finding that claim had no value under the Texas statute.

The majority sidesteps whether the issue of the allocation of the settlement between claims is one of fact or law. If it is an issue of law, then I believe the mere fact that the amount paid in the Second Mitsubishi Settlement approximated the claimed discrepancy in represented sales price is simply insufficient as a matter of law to overcome unrefuted evidence which shows that the Second Mitsubishi Settlement covered the potential fraud and misrepresentation claim. If it is a question of fact, then there was at least a genuinely disputed factual issue presented, and an evidentiary hearing should have been held.

It may be that it was a tactical error for plaintiff to have argued that all of the $ 1.8 million was paid solely to settle the potential state law fraud and misrepresentation claim against [76] Mitsubishi for its conduct in the course of the first settlement and that none of that amount was attributable to the earlier antitrust claim. But it was no more, and probably less, of a tactical error than that committed by Cessna, who had the burden of proof on the payment issue, and who made no showing of the amount of the $ 1.8 million that should have been attributed to the fraud. Although it appears that neither party sought an evidentiary hearing on the apportionment issue, I believe that there was an inadequate evidentiary basis for the district court's conclusion and, in the present posture of the case, I would remand for an evidentiary hearing and appropriate factfinding.

The issue of valuation and allocation of settlement offsets is a significant one for antitrust policy. I fully agree with the majority that antitrust verdicts must be offset by settlements received from jointly and severally liable codefendants to prevent the plaintiff from receiving a windfall recovery from the non-settling defendants. See Zenith Radio, 401 U.S. at 348 ("the law . . . does not permit a plaintiff to recover double payment"). However, as the majority recognizes, [77] ensuring that plaintiffs receive a full recovery for their injuries is a second and equally important policy concern. See Flintkote Co. v. Lysfjord, 246 F.2d 368, 398 (9th Cir.) ("a plaintiff is entitled to one full satisfaction of his claim in an action against joint defendants"), cert. denied, 355 U.S. 835, 2 L. Ed. 2d 46, 78 S. Ct. 54 (1957); see also U.S. Industries, Inc. v. Touche Ross & Co., 854 F.2d 1223, 1236 (10th Cir. 1988) ("where two or more defendants are responsible for separate injuries, an amount received in settlement from one defendant for one of the injuries may not be used to reduce the liability of the other defendant for the other injury").

This second policy is particularly applicable in the antitrust context where Congress enacted a treble damages provision and authorized private antitrust suits to ensure the most complete enforcement of the antitrust laws. See Burlington Indus., Inc. v. Milliken & Co., 690 F.2d 380, 393 (4th Cir. 1982) ("One purpose of the trebling provision is to encourage private plaintiffs to bring suit. Any ultimate recovery totaling less than [78] three times proven damages would weaken the statutory incentive through judicial construction."), cert. denied, 461 U.S. 914, 77 L. Ed. 2d 283, 103 S. Ct. 1893 (1983); Hydrolevel Corp. v. American Soc'y of Mechanical Eng'rs, Inc., 635 F.2d 118, 130 (2d Cir. 1980) (same quotation), aff'd, 456 U.S. 556, 72 L. Ed. 2d 330, 102 S. Ct. 1935 (1982); Flintkote, 246 F.2d at 398 (holding that offsets are calculated after trebling the verdict because the "efficacy [of the treble damages provision] should not be weakened by judicial construction"); see also Texas Indus., Inc. v. [*449] Radcliff Materials, Inc., 451 U.S. 630, 639, 68 L. Ed. 2d 500, 101 S. Ct. 2061 (1981) (refusing to adopt contribution rule in antitrust cases and noting that Congress was not "concerned with softening the blow on joint wrongdoers").

I believe the majority's holding on the Mitsubishi offset undermines this strong policy.

It would be necessary for the plaintiff to prove, also, that the hypothetical lower rate would conform to the requirements of the Act to Regulate Commerce. For unless the lower rate is one which the carrier could maintain legally, the changing of it could not conceivably give a cause of action.

A number of factors to consider in § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, actions to determine if the plaintiff has suffered an injury which bears a causal relation to an alleged antitrust violation are: (1) the causal connection between the antitrust violation and the harm to the plaintiff and the intent by the defendant to cause that harm, with neither factor alone conferring standing; (2) whether the plaintiff's alleged injury is of the type for which the antitrust laws were intended to provide redress; (3) the directness of the injury, which addresses the concerns that liberal application of standing principles might produce speculative claims; (4) the existence of more direct victims of the alleged antitrust violations; and (5) the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages.

[*1150] OPINION OF THE COURT

MANSMANN, Circuit Judge.

Industries involved in the transportation and manufacturing of iron ore are the adversaries [*1151] in this complex multi-district antitrust litigation. Five steel companies, three dock companies and three trucking companies filed [4] civil actions in various federal district courts, alleging that the railroad companies serving the lower Lake Erie industrial region conspired in violation of federal and state antitrust laws to preclude potential competitors from entering the market of lake transport, dock handling, storage and land transport of iron ore. [1] The cases were consolidated and transferred to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania for pre-trial proceedings.

[5] The eventual trial was bifurcated into liability and damages phases. The liability jury reached a verdict against Bessemer and Lake Erie Railroad Company ("B&LE"), the sole remaining defendant, and in favor of all plaintiffs but one - David W. Reaney and Reaney Dock Co. The first jury was discharged and a new jury, empaneled for the damages phase, reached a verdict awarding all but one claim for damages. B&LE's motion for judgment n.o.v. was denied in most respects. Post-trial motions lodged by the Wills plaintiffs were likewise denied.

On appeal and cross-appeal, numerous issues have been raised. In its appeal, B&LE contends, as threshold arguments, that (1) the conduct complained of as violative of the antitrust laws was exempt from liability under the doctrine of Keogh v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway, 260 U.S. 156, 67 L. Ed. 183, 43 S. Ct. 47 (1922), and the statutory immunity conferred by section 5a of the Interstate Commerce Act, 49 U.S.C. § 5(b) (1970); (2) some plaintiffs lacked standing under Illinois Brick v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707, 97 S. Ct. 2061 (1977), and Associated General Contractors, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983), [6] to raise antitrust claims; and (3) the claims were time-barred by the federal statute of limitations and the doctrine of laches. B&LE also argues that the proof offered at trial did not establish that its misconduct caused damage to the plaintiffs. In addition, claims B&LE, the evidence of damages was too speculative to be sustained. Finally, as a post-verdict matter, B&LE asserts that post-judgment interest was calculated from the wrong date.

Cross-appeals include the issues of whether the district court erred in disallowing the steel companies' fraudulent concealment defense to toll the running of the statute of limitations and whether there was error in the district court's refusal to award prejudgment interest under Ohio law.

National Steel cross-appealed on the ground that judgment n.o.v. was improperly granted in favor of B&LE with respect to National Steel's investment cost damage claim.

Finally, the Wills plaintiffs claim that their Seventh Amendment right to a fair trial was violated because the district court allowed the damage phase jury to hear and evaluate liability evidence.

[1] The steel company plaintiffs are Republic Steel Corporation, Jones & Laughlin Steel Incorporated (which includes Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company), National Steel Corporation, Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corporation and Sharon Steel Corporation. The dock company plaintiffs are Erie-Western Pennsylvania Port Authority and Codan Corporation (Erie), Toledo World Terminal, Inc., and David W. Reaney and Reaney Dock Company. The trucking company plaintiffs are Wills Trucking, Inc., Tauro Brothers Trucking Company, and C.D. Ambrosia Trucking Company. Toledo World and Wills Trucking are corporate affiliates and will be referred to as the Wills plaintiffs.

When the action commenced, the railroad companies named as defendants were the Bessemer and Lake Erie Railroad Company, ("B&LE"), Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, CSX Corporation, Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad Company, Consolidated Rail Corporation, Norfolk and Western Railway Company, Norfolk Southern Corporation, Penn Central Transportation Company and Penn Central Corporation. The claims against all of the defendants, except B&LE, were settled or dismissed before or during trial, leaving B&LE as the sole defendant.

We will affirm, in most respects, the order of the district court. We will reverse the grant [7] of judgment n.o.v. against National Steel and remand for entry of judgment for National Steel because the ground upon which it was based was not preserved by B&LE. We will also reverse the district court's denial of Wills' post-trial motions because as [*1152] to these plaintiffs, the conduct of the bifurcated trial violated the Seventh Amendment. We will, therefore, remand for a new trial limited strictly to a calculation of damages suffered by the Wills plaintiffs.

I.

A. Regulatory Background

HN1[] The Interstate Commerce Act ("the ICA") governs "any individual or joint rate . . . charged . . ." by the railroads. 49 U.S.C. § 15(1) (1970) repealed, Pub. L. 95-473, § 4(b), (c), October 17, 1978, 92 Stat. 1466, 1470; Pub. L. 96-258, § 3(b), June 3, 1980, 94 Stat. 427. [2] HN2[] The enforcement arm of the ICA, the Interstate Commerce Commission ("the ICC"), is charged with regulating the rates filed and charges levied by the railroads in a manner consistent with the purposes of the ICA. 49 U.S.C. § 15(1)(1976).

[8] Under the ICA and directly contrary to activity forbidden in other industries, the railroads were legally permitted to engage in joint rate-making activity. However, in 1944 the inevitable tension presented by the ICC's policy of condoning concerted action and the general prohibition against industry consortia embraced in the antitrust laws prompted the Justice Department to invoke the provisions of the Sherman Act in an effort to enjoin some railroad rate-setting practices. See United States v. Association of American Railroads, 4 F.R.D. 510 (D.Neb. 1945) (denying defense motion to dismiss). In that same year, the State of Georgia alleged that an eastern railroad conspiracy in restraint of trade caused an increase in freight rates throughout its state. Georgia v. Pennsylvania Railroad Company, 324 U.S. 439, 89 L. Ed. 1051, 65 S. Ct. 716 (1945). Sitting as the court of original jurisdiction, the Supreme Court responded to the defendants' allegation that Georgia's complaint failed to state a cause of action, by holding that HN3[] "regulated industries are not per se exempt from the Sherman Act," 324 U.S. at 456-47, and suit was permitted [9] to proceed.

Congress responded by passing the Reed-Bullwinkle Act, ch. 491, 62 Stat. 472 (1948), (current version codified at 49 U.S.C. § 10706), authorizing the creation of rate bureaus which would provide a sanctioned forum for the railroads to set agreements on rates. In section 5a of the 1970 version of the Act, Congress expressly granted railroads antitrust immunity for any collective rate-making activity accomplished in accordance with the procedures described in the Act. 49 U.S.C. § 5(b). Unless and until "suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be disapproved . . . by a court," these rates are lawful as between the carrier and shipper. 49 U.S.C. § 15(2).

B&LE was a member of the Coal, Coke and Iron Ore Committee, an ICC-approved rate bureau. Through this vehicle the defendants established the rates of concern here. At issue is whether the railroads' rate-making activity occurred within the legal framework of the ICA. The plaintiffs do not challenge the original agreement or the defendants' right collectively to set rates pursuant to the terms and conditions [10] of the agreement. Instead the anti-competitive activity charged here allegedly arises from the collective response of the members of the rate bureau to a technological innovation in the iron ore industry.

B. Factual Background

HN4[] Given the jury verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, we review the evidence in a light favorable to their position.

The theory of the plaintiffs' case is that beginning approximately 25 years ago, B&LE conspired with its industry partners to eliminate competition and monopolize the transportation and handling of iron ore. The iron ore originates from mines in Michigan, Minnesota and eastern Canada. It is brought to the steel companies' plants by ship transport across the Great Lakes and is unloaded at railroad-owned docks along lower Lake Michigan, Lake Erie and the Detroit River.

[2] The Interstate Commerce Act was originally enacted in 1887 and was codified and recodified with little change until its substantial revision in 1980 by the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act and the Staggers Rail Act. These changes are not implicated here.

[*1153] The traditional method of unloading ore from the vessels, known as bulkers, was by the use of huletts, large cranes affixed to the docks. The huletts lifted the ore from the bulkers and either placed it in waiting railroad cars for immediate shipment or positioned it for later movement to a storage facility. Some of the docks are located directly adjacent to steel mills, but [11] most of the ore was reloaded at the dock onto land-based transportation, most often railroads, for delivery to the inland mills. The non-railroad docks were not competitors for this segment of the ore business because they were not equipped with huletts.

A change in ore producing technology catalyzed a different method of moving iron ore across Lake Erie. In the 1950s, some iron ore producers began to "pelletize" their ore. As the term implies, instead of a mud-like form, the iron was formulated into pellets. This innovation made possible the transport of the ore by means of self-unloading vessels, capable of unloading cargo by means of a conveyor belt without the use of a hulett.

Self-unloaders could carry greater loads than the conventional bulkers and could unload in significantly less time at docks which did not require special handling equipment. Using self-unloaders, non-railroad docks could now compete as unloading sites for iron ore, and could receive, store and tranship ore from self-unloaders at lower cost than railroad hulett docks because they did not need land-based unloading equipment and crews. In addition, demurrage charges, the amount assessed while equipment stands [12] idle, were reduced. The non-railroad docks, in combination with self-unloaders, were able to compete directly with the railroad-owned docks for the iron ore transport market. The plaintiffs contend that the railroads, perceiving the threat presented by the existence of the non-railroad docks and unwilling to jeopardize their substantial investment in the off-loading equipment, plotted to halt the progress of self-unloader technology to maintain the railroads' dominance in the iron ore transport market.

Because the railroads also controlled access to their docks and provided inland transportation of ore from the docks only by rail, the self-unloader/non-railroad dock system also compromised the railroads' monopoly on the inland transportation of iron ore. With self-unloaders discharging cargo at private docks, less costly trucks could haul the ore from the non-railroad docks and provide land transportation savings to the steel companies.

Roused by the possibility of the demise of the railroad industry as the literal mover and shaker of the iron ore transport business, its high ranking officials convened to discuss a course of action designed to circumvent the incorporation of self-unloaders [13] into the iron ore industry. Railroad officials orally agreed that leases of railroad docks or facilities should be examined or modified to frustrate the efforts of non-railroad docks to handle ore from self-unloaders. They also agreed to refuse to provide competitively-priced inland rail service, i.e., to publish commodity line haul rates for moving ore from such docks. Finally, it was agreed that railroad docks should assess the same handling charges for unloading ore from bulkers as from self-unloaders, regardless of the extent of service performed.

The words were converted into action. To effectuate the goal of market preclusion, the railroads used coercion to enforce adherence to the agreement to foreclose competition from private docks. B&LE and its co-conspirators did indeed restrict the lease and sale of railroad-owned dock property and boycotted non-railroad docks. These activities eliminated much of the economic incentives to use self-unloaders. By impeding the progress of the private dock system, the railroads were also effective in foreclosing competition from trucks.

C. The Litigation

On October 13, 1981, a federal grand jury returned an indictment charging [14] B&LE and other railroads operating docks and inland rail lines with criminal conspiracy in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. B &LE pled nolo contendere and was convicted and fined. The conviction was affirmed on appeal. United States v. Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Co., 230 U.S. App. D.C. 316, 717 F.2d 593, 602 (D.C. Cir. 1983).

[*1154] After the indictment, between 1982 and 1984, the original complaints were filed in this civil action in various federal district courts. Seeking recovery under sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2, section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, and the Ohio Valentine Act, Ohio Revised Code §§ 1331.01-1331.99, the plaintiffs claimed that a conspiracy existed among the defendant railroads to delay the utilization of self-unloading vessels for the transportation of iron ore. On April 17, 1984, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation consolidated the ten cases.

The steel company plaintiffs requested damages for the savings lost to them, alleging that the railroads' anti-competitive behavior generally denied them savings that would have resulted from [15] swifter development of self-unloader technology. Specifically, the plaintiffs identified as compensable: (1) savings resulting from lower dock handling rates from private commercial docks had the self-unloader industry been more dynamic; (2) savings from lower dock handling rates at the railroad docks had there been competition from private docks; (3) savings from lower trucking rates had their market entry not been restrained; (4) savings lost because of the railroads' failure to publish commodity line haul rates and (5) in a catchall provision, the savings it would have enjoyed had the steel companies had the option to choose the most efficient and economical combination of transportation alternatives.

The dock company plaintiffs claimed injury due to the railroads' refusal to permit them entry into the iron ore unloading business. Their damage claims thus represented the profits that their industry would have realized had they been able to break into the market. The trucking companies' claim for damages is similar. Had they not been precluded from entering the market of the land transport of ore, they would have engaged in such operations and realized significant profits.

In [16] a series of pre-trial rulings, the district court dismissed the steel companies' claims for the damages based on the allegation that, absent the conspiracy, these plaintiffs would have paid lower rates for costs associated with the transportation of ore. The court ruled that these claims were barred by Keogh v. Chicago & Northwestern Railway, 260 U.S. 156, 67 L. Ed. 183, 43 S. Ct. 47 (1922) (antitrust liability in private action cannot be predicated on rates approved by the ICC). The district court, however, permitted to proceed to trial those damage claims that resulted from "defendants' elimination of competitive non-railroad dock facilities." These claims were not considered rate-related, because they required proof that the defendants conspired to exclude low cost competitors from the market. The court determined that Keogh did not bar the damage claims of the dock and trucking companies because they were competitors, and not customers, of the railroads.

In motions to dismiss, the defendants challenged the standing of some classes of plaintiffs to pursue antitrust claims. The court dismissed the steel companies' damage claim that was based on the theory that had the conspiracy [17] not delayed the use of self-unloading vessels, the steel companies would have paid vessel companies a lower rate for lake transportation. Applying Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707, 97 S. Ct. 2061 (1977), and Associated General Contractors, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983), the district court concluded that claims for such lake freight savings were indirect, potentially duplicative and too speculative. The court held that because the steel companies were only potential customers of non-conspiring competitors, (the vessel companies), damages could be ascertained only by speculating when the vessel companies would have begun using self-unloaders absent a conspiracy. Assessment of damages would also require additional conjecture related to the rates the private docks would have charged to handle the self-unloaders.

Because the steel company plaintiffs had also pled that they were directly involved in the ownership and operation of self-unloaders, however, the court held that self-unloader damages could sustain a standing challenge. Similarly, the steel companies' damages [*1155] resulting from [18] the inability to use non-railroad docks were not barred because the court perceived that these damages arose from the inability to seek lower prices from competitors who were either denied participation or experienced entry delay in the relevant market due to the illegal conspiracy.

On the issue of whether application of the federal statute of limitations precluded recovery or whether the statute was tolled because the railroads fraudulently concealed the conspiracy, the district court granted B&LE's motion for summary judgment against the steel company plaintiffs and Erie but denied it against Wills and the trucking company plaintiffs. The court ruled that the steel company plaintiffs and Erie knew or should have known about the conspiracy, thereby denying the fraudulent concealment defense and limiting recovery to damages sustained within four years of the commencement of this suit. The period was, however, tolled during the pendency of the related criminal case.

The consolidated trial was bifurcated into liability and damage phases. After six weeks of trial, the liability phase concluded in a jury verdict in favor of all the plaintiffs except David W. Reaney and Reaney Dock Company. [19] The jury's findings, as set forth on special verdict forms, are summarized as follows:

The conspiracy in which B&LE participated was a material cause of injury to each steel company plaintiff. Each injury resulted from foreclosure or delay in utilizing self-unloading vessels for the delivery of iron ore and from the inability to use non-railroad docks to handle iron ore.

With regard to the dock companies, the jury found, first, that Erie's injuries resulted from acts designed to prevent it from purchasing or leasing dock property at Erie, Pennsylvania, and from acts designed to foreclose competitive inland rail service from that dock. Second, the injury found that the Wills' injuries resulted from acts which precluded it from purchasing or leasing dock property at Toledo, Ohio and from trucking ore inland from that dock. The jury rejected Wills' claims that it had been injured by the railroads' refusal to sell or lease other dock property.

As to the trucking companies, the jury found that Ambrosia Trucking Company's injury resulted from acts which prevented or delayed the handling of iron ore by non-railroad docks which would have permitted the trucking of ore. The jury denied [20] the recovery of damages on claims that B&LE interfered with Ambrosia's trucking from railroad docks and from one non-railroad dock in Ashtabula, Ohio.

The jury further found that Tauro Brothers Trucking Company's injury resulted from the foreclosure or delay in the utilization of self-unloading vessels to bring iron ore to docks that granted access to truckers, as well as the inability of steel mills to use to their fullest capacity non-railroad docks to which trucks were allowed access. The jury rejected Tauro's claim that it had been injured by unlawful acts designed to prevent trucking from railroad docks.

The court discharged the liability jury and subsequently empaneled a new jury for the damages phase. It reached a verdict awarding all but one claim of damages. The steel companies were awarded damages measured by the difference between the lower prices that would have been charged by the excluded competitors and the higher prices actually paid. Damages sustained by the docks and the trucking companies were measured by the profits that each would have earned on the businesses from which they had been excluded. Wills Trucking Company and Toledo World Terminal were awarded [21] only nominal damages ($ 1) on their claim that the railroads refused to sell or lease dock property to them.

On February 27, 1991, the district court denied, in substantial part, B&LE's motion for judgment n.o.v., rejecting all of B&LE's arguments except that concerning National Steel's investment cost damage award. First, the court upheld the jury's determinations that 1) B&LE had violated the antitrust laws by conduct which was not immune, i.e., not protected by regulatory statutes or Supreme Court decisions, notably Keogh; and 2) the plaintiffs' damages were attributable to this conduct.

[*1156] The court next rejected B&LE's argument that the plaintiffs lacked standing to bring this action. Specifically, the court held that no serious standing issue arose with respect to the steel companies' dock handling awards nor with respect to the claims of the Erie or trucking company plaintiffs. The court, with admitted reservation ("although with less than complete confidence"), App. at 2108, also held that the steel companies had standing to seek self-unloader damages since the steel companies had assumed responsibility for financing and operating ore carrying vessels.

The district court [22] also denied B&LE's argument that certain of the plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims were barred by the four-year statute of limitations and that laches barred all of the plaintiffs' Ohio Valentine Act claims. The court found that the injuries did not result solely from pre-limitations periods acts and that Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazelton Research, Inc., 401 U.S. 321, 28 L. Ed. 2d 77, 91 S. Ct. 795 (1971), did not require plaintiffs to trace each item of damages to specific overt acts within the limitations period. The court ruled alternatively that the plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims fit within the Zenith exception that permits assertion of claims which were too conjectural to have been litigated earlier.

With respect to the Valentine Act claims, the district court held that under Ohio law, an equitable defense does not apply to actions at law for damages; but that, in any event, the jury's findings that the railroads acted affirmatively to conceal their conspiratorial activities, as well as B&LE's failure to show that significant prejudice attributed to any delay in filing suit, ruled out a laches defense.

The court further rejected B&LE's argument that plaintiffs' damages were not caused [23] by the unlawful conspiracy. The court noted that throughout both phases of the trial B&LE vehemently argued and sought to prove that any damages actually sustained by the plaintiffs were attributable to economic factors other than the alleged conspiracy. The court stated that these factual issues were properly submitted to the jury and that viewing the record in the light most favorable to the verdict winner, there was no doubt that the evidence supported the jury's determinations.

B&LE has appealed the judgment of the district court. The plaintiff steel companies have cross-appealed on two issues: whether the district court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of B&LE on the statute of limitations concealment issue when it ruled that the steel companies, as a group, had knowledge of facts which would have reasonably given them notice of the conspiracy. Second, the plaintiffs argue that the district court erred in refusing to award them prejudgment interest under Ohio law. The Erie dock company and Ambrosia Trucking join in cross-appealing the issue of prejudgment interest.

As noted, the district court granted B&LE's motion for judgment n.o.v. with respect to National Steel's [24] claim for investment cost damages. The court held that National Steel's claim was not recoverable under the antitrust laws because it represented inflation, a non-compensable loss. National Steel has cross-appealed on this issue.

The Wills plaintiffs, although prevailing on the issue of liability, were only awarded nominal damages. In their cross-appeal, the Wills plaintiffs contend that the district court impermissibly allowed the damage phase jury to re-examine a liability issue - the fact of damage of the Wills' antitrust claim - in violation of the Seventh Amendment. The Wills plaintiffs also argue that even if nominal damages were appropriate, the district court erred in not trebling them.

We turn now to discussion of each of the issues presented, beginning with the appeal brought by B&LE.

II. B&LE's Appeal

A. Antitrust Immunity

HN5[] Pursuant to Keogh v. Chicago & N. R. Co., 260 U.S. 156, 67 L. Ed. 183, 43 S. Ct. 47 (1922) and 49 U.S.C. § 5(b) (1970), railroads may engage in some joint activity which might otherwise run afoul of the antitrust laws. A major issue permeating this case is whether the railroads' activity, upon which [*1157] the plaintiffs [25] based their treble-damages causes of action, is protected by Keogh or by statute. It is a question of law over which we exercise plenary review.

1. The Doctrine of Keogh

In Keogh, a shipper sued a railroad carrier for participating in a conspiracy to fix rates in violation of the Sherman Act. The ICC had previously approved the rates. The Supreme Court held that HN6[] even though the ICA does not immunize regulated carriers from government antitrust prosecution, it does preclude treble damage awards to private litigants. The Court gave a number of reasons for its holding. First, because the subject rates were accepted by the ICC, they were the "legal" rates. The Court believed it inconsistent that Congress, in enacting the ICA, would intend that carriers could be sued for price-fixing when they were charging the rates required by law. 260 U.S. at 162-63. Second, if Keogh were to prevail, he would receive a lower rate not available to other shippers. This situation would create, in effect, a discriminatory rebate, avoidance of which was one of the reasons for the ICA. Id. Third, to establish injury, Keogh would be put to the task of proving hypothetical [26] lower rates which would have been charged in the absence of the conspiracy and the acceptability of those rates to the ICC. Additionally, Keogh would have to overcome the problem of speculative calculation of damages. Id. at 164.

The Court re-examined the Keogh doctrine in Square D Co. v. Niagara Frontier Tariff Bureau Inc., 476 U.S. 409, 90 L. Ed. 2d 413, 106 S. Ct. 1922 (1986). In Square D, shippers brought antitrust actions against motor carriers and their rate-making bureau, claiming that the carriers and the bureau had conspired to fix rates without complying with their ICC-approved rate agreement. The shippers claimed entitlement to the difference, trebled, between the rates actually paid and the rates which would have prevailed in an open market. The district court dismissed the actions under the authority of Keogh.

While the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed the district court's principal ruling, Square D Co. v. Niagara Frontier Tariff Bureau, 760 F.2d 1347, 1349 (2d Cir. 1985), it noted a possible distinction between rate-making activity, shielded by Keogh, and other, unprotected, concerted activity. The Square [27] D shippers had alleged that the defendant carrier rate bureau had: (1) used an unauthorized Committee to "set rates and inhibit competition"; (2) ignored "the notice, publication, public hearing, and recordkeeping requirements of its [freight agreement] and ICC regulations"; (3) strategized "threats, retaliation, and coercion against [rate bureau] members to inhibit independent actions"; and, (4) employed "pressures, threats, and retaliation to interfere with independent actions." Square D, 476 U.S. at 412-13. [3] The court of appeals identified these four allegations as potential support for a claim that the carriers jeopardized the shippers' economic health by blockading their ability to sell their goods. "Thus, HN7[] on remand, appellants should be afforded an opportunity, if they believe the facts justify it, to amend their complaint to state a proper claim for damages." Square D, 760 F.2d at 1366.

[28] On certiorari, the Supreme Court acknowledged that HN8[] while the joint setting of rates is protected activity under 49 U.S.C. § 5(b), the "statute strictly limits the exemption to actions that conform to the terms of the agreement approved by the ICC." Square D, 476 U.S. at 413-14. The Court [*1158] also recognized that HN9[] "nothing in the language of the Interstate Commerce Act, moreover, necessarily precludes a private antitrust treble damages remedy for actions that are not specifically immunized within the terms of the Reed-Bullwinkle Act," 476 U.S. at 414. The Court nonetheless determined that, under Keogh, the Square D shippers could not bring a treble damages action because:

> Keogh simply held that HN10[] an award of treble damages is not an available remedy for a private shipper claiming that the rate submitted to, and approved by, the ICC was the product of an antitrust violation.

Id. at 422. The Court then affirmed the dismissal of the complaints, albeit without specific discussion of whether Keogh protected the carriers from liability for concerted, [29] non-rate activity.

Thus the question left unresolved by Square D remains for us to answer today: Does Keogh, with its reaffirmation in Square D, preclude treble-damage recovery for private litigants claiming that members of a regulated industry conspired to preclude competition in which ICC-approved rates played a role in thwarting market entry? As with many of the other issues before us, our response differs depending upon the particular group of plaintiffs and the damages sought.

a. The Steel Companies [4]

[3] According to one commentator, secret price fixing and retaliation against carriers exercising independent action were not unusual in the 1960s and 1970s, yet the ICC was apparently unaware of such activity until government and private antitrust lawsuits focused upon the problem. Dissatisfaction with the ICC's overall performance led to the 1980 enactment of the Staggers Rail Act which substantially deregulated rail and motor transportation. The legislation endorsed greater competition as the best way to stimulate transportation industry development, accomplished by circumscribing the immunity of a rate bureau's activities and by substantially removing from the ICC its rate setting function. This 1980 statute did not specifically overrule Keogh, but significantly undermines its central rationale. See William Eskridge, Jr., Overruling Statutory Precedents, 76 Geo. L.J. 1361 (1988).

The district court, without the benefit of the Supreme Court's Square D opinion, relied upon Keogh to dismiss the plaintiffs' original claims for damages based upon rates charged by the defendant railroads. According to the district [30] court, two steel company antitrust claims survived this dismissal:

> (1) [a claim] that [the steel companies] could have paid lower dock-handling rates (sooner) to the private docks than they did to the railroad docks if the railroads had not retarded the development of the self-unloader industry; and (2) [a claim] that [the steel companies] could have paid lower land transport rates (sooner) to the truckers, had the railroads not restrained competition by that industry and monopolized line-hauling from their docks. In my view, plaintiffs' generalized claims regarding savings they would have realized had defendants not impeded self-unloader development and had they been able to choose the most economic combination of transportation alternatives come within these two categories.

App. at 234 (footnote omitted). [5]

[31] In a subsequent order, the district court dismissed any damage claims that would require estimating what rates the ICC would have accepted, an estimation forbidden by Keogh. According to the district court, the sole remedy for these claims would be before the ICC. App. at 362-63.

As to the surviving claims, the district court reasoned:

> With respect to Keogh . . . plaintiffs need not prove what prices, but for the conspiracy, defendants would have charged; plaintiffs need prove only that, in the context of tariffs that I must accept as legitimate, defendants' exclusionary activities and other antitrust violations slowed penetration of the relevant markets by defendants' competitors. Thus, plaintiffs' damages do not depend on proof of price-fixing by defendants, which Keogh would bar, but on proof that defendants conspired to exclude low cost competitors from the market, which does not implicate the ICC's exclusive jurisdiction and therefore is not barred by Keogh. In short, as Judge Friendly as explained, '[a] shipper may [*1159] recover damages if it can show that carriers caused injury to the shipper's business or property other than by higher tariffs . . . .' Square D, 760 F.2d at 1365. [32]

App. at 372-73.

The district court also discussed Republic Steel's claims for damages emanating from the delay in the construction and use of Republic's own dock facilities. To apply Keogh to bar this complaint, opined the court, would allow a blockade of a competitor to escape scrutiny. This would overextend Keogh's reach and could produce a rule that one who pays for services governed by ICC tariffs is foreclosed from asserting that antitrust violations prevented use of a less expensive, equivalent service.

Before the liability jury, the plaintiffs presented evidence of the railroads' agreements to restrict the sale and lease of dock property, boycotts of unregulated docks, refusals to handle self-unloaders in a way that would make economic sense for a steel company to utilize them, and coercion to prevent independent action. Indeed, the district court described the forcefulness of the evidence against B&LE as follows:

> Literally thousands of documents, from the railroads' own files, establish beyond dispute the existence of an illegal conspiracy, dating back to at least 1950, to prevent self-unloading vessels, private docks, and trucking firms from gaining a foothold [33] in the transportation of ex-lake iron ore. The record is so clear and complete, in fact, that it can be read to suggest that the participants may have genuinely believed that the antitrust laws did not apply to railroads at all.

[4] National Steel, which invested in and operated its own self-unloading vessel, was a competitor, not a customer of the railroads. Thus, as to the various immunity issues, it stands in the shoes of the dock and trucking companies and not the steel companies.

[5] The district court elsewhere described these claims in terms of damages resulting from the defendants' conduct as:

> damages directly resulting from defendants' elimination of competitive non-railroad dock facilities from the market of providing unloading and trans-shipment services to plaintiffs . . . [and] damages directly resulting from the defendants' elimination of competition from trucking in the market of inland transportation services to plaintiffs.

App. at 372.

We conclude that the district court correctly characterized B&LE's anti-competitive activity as market preclusion, and Keogh's protective rule cannot apply to forbid recovery for the resulting economic detriment. As the Supreme Court has succinctly stated, Keogh merely prevents private shippers from sustaining an award of treble damages by claiming that ICC-approved rates were the product of an antitrust violation. Square D, 476 U.S. at 422. That statement of Keogh's protection does not preclude liability based on non-rate anticompetitive activity. Indeed, the steel companies' case involves damage claims based on non-rate activity that targeted potential low-cost competitors.

We recognize that the success of anticompetitive non-rate activity would coincidentally implicate rates promulgated under the jurisdiction of the ICC. It is fully consistent with Keogh, however, to accept these rates as lawful [34] and nonetheless to conclude that through non-rate activities, particularly the restriction on the sale or lease of dock space and the refusal to deal with potential competitors, the railroads effectively retarded entry of lower cost competitors to the market. The instrument of damage to the steel companies was the absence of the lower-cost combination. In contrast, the Supreme Court in Keogh made it clear that "the instrument by which Keogh is alleged to have been damaged is rates approved by the Commission." 260 U.S. at 161. As a result, > HN11[] the burden resting upon the plaintiff would not be satisfied by proving that some carrier would, but for the illegal conspiracy, have maintained a rate lower than that published. It would be necessary for the plaintiff to prove, also, that the hypothetical lower rate would have conformed to the requirements of the Act to Regulate Commerce. For unless the lower rate was one which the carrier could have maintained legally, the changing of it could not conceivably give a cause of action.

The proof required to show the harm alleged here thus differs from [35] that deemed objectionable in Keogh. In this case, the plaintiffs showed that the railroads conspired to protect their stronghold in the ore transport market by blocking entry by low-cost competitors, not that the railroads charged an unlawful rate.

The facts in Square D also differ from those proven at trial here. The Square D plaintiffs contended that unlawful conduct caused shipping rates to be higher than a freely competitive market. They sought treble damages measured by that difference. [*1160] Thus, the Square D plaintiffs, like the plaintiff in Keogh, grounded their damage claims on the allegation that the motor carriers, a group regulated by the ICC, would have charged a lower rate absent the conspiracy. Here, the question of hypothetical lower rates is ancillary. If the self-unloader/private dock/trucking triad had been permitted to develop, conceivably the steel companies would no longer be captive customers of the railroads and the rates charged by them would not be so pervasive a consideration. Admittedly, to remain competitive, the railroads would no doubt be forced to lower their rates, but the goal of the antitrust laws is to provide an open and competitive [36] market place. It was the railroads' hindering the development of the market which defines this antitrust litigation.

The opinion of the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit in Pinney Dock and Transport Corp. v. Penn Central Corp., 838 F.2d 1445 (6th Cir. 1988), while not binding on us, does provide some guidance. The Pinney Dock case involves the same defendants and the same conspiracy at issue here. The plaintiffs were a dock company, Pinney, and a builder of self-unloading vessels, Litton. On motions to dismiss, the court of appeals held that Keogh would bar claims based on the handling and line-haul rates charged by the railroads. Id. at 1457. However, the court of appeals also deemed certain claims outside the scope of the Keogh doctrine. These claims included Litton's contention that the defendants refused to permit Litton to purchase, lease or use dock facilities that could have accommodated Litton's self-unloading vessels and the contention of both plaintiffs that "defendants used harassing tactics and spurious challenges to try to forestall legitimate business activities of competitors." Id. [37] After a full trial, we are in a different procedural position than that of Pinney Dock. We have definite evidence of the railroads' refusal to handle self-unloaders at their docks, restrictions on the sale and lease of dock property to unregulated entities, boycotts of unregulated docks, and intra-industry coercion claims which mirror those deemed by the court of appeals in Pinney Dock to escape Keogh. Because the railroads derailed their potential competitors, the steel companies could not use alternative, lower-cost, private docks, and thus they lacked the economic incentive to develop self-unloaders. The by-product of this delay in introducing these vessels was that the steel companies were compelled to continue to pay the railroad fixed rates. Even strained to simplification, the railroads' anticompetitive behavior involved far more than the assessment of rates. The mere measure of damages, which begins with an ICC-approved rate, does not define the nature of the conspiracy.

Although we conclude from the evidence produced that the steel company plaintiffs proved at trial an antitrust conspiracy that was not grounded in rate-related claims, the question remains whether [38] the district court properly instructed the jury concerning the types of rate activity protected by Keogh. In a liability segment of the trial, the district court charged on Keogh, in part, as follows:

> What is forbidden by the antitrust law are joint actions, actions taken pursuant to an agreement which restrains trade unreasonably -- that is, which adversely affect competition -- and which are not within the protection, the immunity, granted by the rate bureau proceeding -- that is to say, which are not rate related.

> But once a rate is being charged pursuant to a duly filed tariff which has not been disapproved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, then it is conclusively presumed so far as the law is concerned that the charge is a reasonable one. And what that means is that nobody can claim damages under the antitrust laws or any other law -- no shipper who pays railroad rates, who pays freight charges to a railroad -- can complain to have been damaged either by the antitrust laws or by other laws merely by the allegation that those charges were higher than they should have been.

The district court also instructed the jury concerning [39] B&LE's good faith and regulatory climate defenses and informed the jury [*1161] that, if the company's conduct was consistent with the overall policies of the ICC, it was not in violation of the antitrust laws. App. at 5002.

B&LE takes issue with the charge, arguing that, under the Keogh doctrine, no matter how unlawful the means to fix or maintain rates, and no matter how anti-competitive those means may be, the tariff rates are the legal rates and cannot give rise to liability for antitrust damages. We disagree. Keogh does not give ICC-regulated industries carte blanche to preclude competition. The instruction, as a whole, recognized this principle and so did not misinform the jury as to the scope of the Keogh doctrine's protection.

In sum, we conclude that Keogh and Square D, prohibiting treble-damage recovery for private litigants based upon rate-related activity, cannot be applied here to deny antitrust recovery to the steel companies.

b. The Dock and Trucking Companies

The dock companies and trucking companies argue that Keogh does not bar their damage awards because Keogh and its progeny apply only to customers and not to competitors.

We have held [40] that Keogh does not apply to claims of competitors. In Essential Communications Systems, Inc. v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 610 F.2d 1114 (3d Cir. 1979), we stated that "the filed tariff rule has little or nothing to do with [defendants'] duties under the antitrust laws toward its competitors . . .; competitors are not the intended beneficiaries of the rule of public utility regulation." Id. at 1121. We then distinguished Keogh as follows:

> In this case the plaintiff is not suing in the capacity of a customer for communication services. Essential seeks recovery for injury to its business or property from actions taken by the defendants in formulating a tariff, and in rendering customer services. The Bell System will not be asked to disgorge to any customers any revenues derived under the filed tariff. Indeed, it can continue to collect those revenues until a new tariff is filed. There is no policy conflict, actual or potential, therefore, between the Section 4 Clayton Act remedy and the antidiscrimination purposes of the filed tariff rule.

Id. at 1122; see also Barnes v. Arden Mayfair, Inc., 759 F.2d 676, 679 (9th Cir. 1985); [41] Kirkwood v. Union Electric Co., 671 F.2d 1173, 1179 (8th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1170, 74 L. Ed. 2d 1013, 103 S. Ct. 814

(1983); Groton v. Connecticut Light & Power Co., 662 F.2d 921, 929 (2d Cir. 1981). But see Pinney Dock, 838 F.2d at 1457 (applying Keogh to bar competitors' claims).

Although in Essential Communications we dealt with regulation of a utility by the FCC rather than of a common carrier by the ICC, our reasoning there is forceful here and we will apply this precedent. The section 4 claims of the dock and trucking companies are therefore not impacted by the Keogh rule. [6]

[42] [*1162] 2. Section 5a Immunity and the Doctrine of Primary Jurisdiction

HN12[] Collective rate-making activity by regulated railroads is also afforded a measure of protection by section 5a of the Interstate Commerce Act:

> HN13[] Parties to any agreement approved by the Commission under this section and other persons are, if the approval of such agreement is not prohibited by paragraph (4), (5), or (6) of this section, relieved from the operation of the antitrust laws with respect to the making of such agreement, and with respect to the carrying out of such agreement in conformity with its provisions and in conformity with the terms and conditions prescribed by the Commission.

49 U.S.C. § 5b(9) (1970). B &LE argues that, under the doctrine of primary jurisdiction, the district court should have referred to the ICC the question of whether the railroads' activity was immune under section 5a. However, > the doctrine of primary jurisdiction, despite what the term may imply, does not speak to the jurisdictional power of the federal courts. It simply structures the proceedings as a matter of judicial discretion, so as to engender an orderly and sensible coordination [43] of the work of agencies and courts.

United States v. Bessemer & L.E. R. Co., 230 U.S. App. D.C. 316, 717 F.2d 593, 599 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (footnotes omitted), quoting Cheyney State College Facility v. Hufstatler, 703 F.2d 732, 736 (3d Cir. 1983). Cf. United States v. Western Pacific Railroad, 352 U.S. 59, 64, 1 L. Ed. 2d 126, 77 S. Ct. 161 (1956) ("No fixed formula exists for applying the doctrine of primary jurisdiction"). HN14[] A district court's decision not to submit an issue for initial determination by the agency will be reversed only for an abuse of discretion. Puerto Rico Maritime Shipping Authority v. Valley Freight Systems, Inc., 856 F.2d 546, 549 (3d Cir. 1988).

[6] B&LE contends that the Supreme Court applied Keogh to bar suits by a competitor in Georgia v. Pennsylvania Railroad Company, 324 U.S. 439, 89 L. Ed. 1051, 65 S. Ct. 716 (1945). In that case, the state of Georgia alleged that the defendant railroads had "fixed arbitrary and non-competitive rates and charges for transportation of freight by railroad to and from Georgia so as to prefer the ports of other states over the ports of Georgia." Id. at 443. Georgia sued both in its parens patriae capacity and as owner of a railroad and other public institutions. Id. at 447. Although Georgia's ownership of a railroad placed it in competition with the defendants, the court clearly focused on Georgia's parens patriae claim and treated the injury to the state as proprietor merely as "make weight." Id. at 450.

In dismissing Georgia's claims for antitrust damages, the Court held:

> We think it is clear from the Keogh case alone that Georgia may not recover damages even if the conspiracy alleged were shown to exist. . . . The [Keogh] Court held . . . the legal rights of a shipper against a carrier in respect to a rate are to be measured by the published tariff. That rate until suspended or set aside was for all purposes the legal rate as between shipper and carrier and may not be varied or enlarged either by the contract or tort of the carrier. And it added: "This stringent rule prevails, because otherwise the paramount purpose of Congress -- prevention of unjust discrimination -- might be defeated. If a shipper could recover under § 7 of the Anti-Trust Act for damages resulting from the exaction of a rate higher than that which would otherwise have prevailed, the amount recovered might, like a rebate, operate to give him a preference over his trade competitors." 260 U.S. p.163.

Despite B&LE's diligence in presenting the pleadings in Georgia to support its cast of the case as one between competitors, it is obvious that in rendering its decision the Court's focus was on Georgia's claims as a customer. We, therefore, do not construe Georgia as Supreme Court precedent to apply Keogh to bar competitor suits.

In Pinney Dock, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit decided that whether the ICC-approved rate bureau agreement had been violated and thus whether section 5a immunity applied "should be addressed, at least first, to the wisdom and expertise of the ICC." 838 F.2d at 1459. In the related criminal antitrust case, United States v. Bessemer & L.E., 717 F.2d at 600, in which B&LE pled [44] nolo contendere and then appealed the sufficiency of the indictment, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit reached a different conclusion, holding that "the activities described in the indictment do not fit within the narrow 5a privilege." 717 F.2d at 600. [7] We agree with the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that the conduct alleged and proven violated both the substantive and procedural requirements of section 5a. We therefore conclude that the district court exercised sound discretion in not referring the section 5a immunity issue to the ICC.

[45] B&LE then argues that the jury instruction, particularly the district court's equation of the agreement not to establish line haul rates from non-railroad docks to an illegal refusal to deal - a rate-related activity subject to a section 5a immunity - manifestly prejudiced their case.

In the relevant portion of the charge concerning the refusal to deal, to which the defendant has lodged a specific objection, the district court instructed as follows:

> Now, I mentioned that we have various claims relating to the alleged agreement [*1163] not to establish line haul rates from non-railroad docks and not to allow the use of hopper cars by the steel companies in ways that would enable the trucking companies better to compete. A whole set of claims by various plaintiffs have to do with this allegation that the railroads refused to deal - that is to say, refused to enable the private docks to be established.
> I mentioned earlier that each railroad acting independently had a perfect right to decide whether to lease the property to another company or not, but that it would be a violation of the antitrust laws for them to get together and agree that none of them would lease land to a private dock [46] that could be used for a private dock or that could accommodate self-unloader vessels or that could be used by trucking companies.

App. at 4996.

Reading, as we must, the jury instructions as a whole, we find that the district court competently charged the jury regarding the scope of immunity afforded concerted railroad activity under the Reed-Bullwinkle Act.

The district court did not, as B&LE contends, tell the jury that failure to establish line haul rates amounted to a boycott. Instead, the court recounted the plaintiffs' allegations that certain railroad activities were refusals to deal and informed the jury that it must decide whether or not the railroads did conspire to foreclose private dock competition. There is nothing erroneous about this charge. [8]

We, to the contrary, do not find these role classifications as indicative of whether the court properly exercised its discretion in retaining jurisdiction. The same conspiratorial conduct described in the criminal indictment is the subject of this civil antitrust suit.

Three important policies supported this holding: avoiding the risk of multiple liability for defendants, avoiding evidentiary complications in identifying affected parties and measuring their damages, and avoiding the difficulties of managing large and complex suits. Id. at 741, 745. Although the development of the doctrine is important to understanding the concerns of the Court in granting or denying standing, it is the AGC analysis - the most recent, comprehensive and relevant statement by the Court - which will resolve the standing question here. We exercise plenary review over application of the legal principle of standing.

1. B&LE's Standing Arguments

B&LE challenges the standing of Republic, Wheeling-Pitt and J&L to claim "lake transport damages," that is, damages resulting from the steel companies' higher cost of shipping ore via vessel companies during the conspiracy-induced delay in introducing low-cost self-unloaders. [11] B&LE characterizes these payments of the steel

> It has been suggested that although standing is closely related to antitrust injury, the two concepts are distinct. HN16[] Once antitrust injury has been demonstrated by a causal relationship between the harm and the challenged aspect of the alleged violation, standing analysis is employed to search for the most effective plaintiff from among those who have suffered loss. However, in the sense that plaintiffs who sustain no antitrust injury may not recover, they may be loosely said to lack standing. (Citations omitted.)

[10] In Illinois Brick, a defendant manufacturer of bricks sold its product to masonry contractors, who provided the materials to building contractors. The contractor incorporated the bricks into buildings owned by the plaintiffs, numerous government entities. The plaintiffs claimed that they were injured by the prior purchasers' payment of excessive prices of the bricks charged by the manufacturer. The Court held that § 4 did not permit these indirect purchasers, with two narrow exceptions, to recover for the overcharge passed through the chain of distribution. The Court relied heavily on its earlier decision in Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231, 88 S. Ct. 2224 (1968), that a seller who imposes an illegal overcharge on a direct purchaser cannot escape antitrust liability by arguing that the first purchaser passed on the illegal overcharge by increasing the prices it charged for the products when it sold them to the public. In Hanover Shoe, the Court rejected the pass-on theory for a seller and in Illinois Brick made the symmetrical decision, consistent with Hanover, to disallow an offensive use of the theory.

Although Illinois Brick is often cited as the standard bearer of antitrust standing cases, we note that the Court specifically stated that "we do not address the standing issue. . . ." 431 U.S. at 728 n.7. Instead, the Court based its holding on the grounds of remoteness of injury and defined this consideration as analytically distinct from the issue of standing.

[11] National Steel Corporation, which owned and operated self-unloader vessels, offered substantial evidence that their intent and readiness to enter into the lake transportation business was frustrated by the conspiracy. National Steel actually purchased its own self-unloading vessel, the Stinson, in 1974. Because National Steel transported its own iron ore, rather than contracting companies to the vessel companies as "inherently indirect" and argues that Illinois Brick and Mid-West Paper Products Co. v. Continental Group, Inc., 596 F.2d 573 (3d Cir. 1979), [50] which hold that only those who suffer direct injury have standing to seek antitrust damages, prevent the steel companies from asserting a § 4 claim for lake transport damages.

B&LE also challenges the steel companies' standing to seek damages based on the difference between [51] the dock handling rates that they actually paid to the railroad docks and Pinney Dock [12] and the rates that they would have paid in an open and competitive market. [13] B&LE contends that the amount of savings the docks would have passed on to the steel companies presents problems of double recovery and complex apportionment of damages condemned by the Supreme Court in Illinois Brick. [14]

[52] The district court resolved the standing issue in its post-verdict opinion by concluding, with reference to the "indirect purchaser" rule of Illinois Brick, that the steel companies' de facto ownership of bulker vessels allowed the jury to conclude reasonably that, but for the conspiracy, the steel companies would have become similarly involved with self-unloaders. Ownership of the vessels, reasoned the court, translated to direct cost [*1165] reduction of the steel companies' cost related to the movement of ore.

Although de facto ownership of the vessels might well relieve that steel companies from dismissal under Illinois Brick, we conclude that the standing requirement is satisfied under a different rationale. [15] The Supreme Court's cumulative pronouncements concerning directness of injury in antitrust cases mandates a more complex and differently focused inquiry.

[53] 2.Associated General Contractors, Inc. v. California State Counsel of Carpenters with outside vessel companies, it did not offer evidence concerning lake transport damages. Also, because it was a vessel owner, notions of indirect injury concerning dock handling charges do not apply to National Steel. Further, National's claim is not jeopardized by the threat of overlapping damages as no other plaintiff suffered this distinct type of injury.

[12] Although Pinney was a privately owned dock, the plaintiffs claimed that the rates charged by it were artificially inflated by the conspiracy. According to the plaintiffs, because Pinney was the only private game in town, it was not required to set its prices based upon competition from other privately owned docks.

[13] In addition to the three steel companies awarded lake transport damages, Sharon Steel and National Steel were awarded dock handling damages.

[14] Because the private dock companies themselves were direct competitors of the railroads and because they were injured by the conspiracy's goal to preclude them from market entry, no standing problem is posed by their quest for damages.

[15] The three companies averred in discovery that they were not in the business of purchasing, leasing, chartering, hiring or investing in vessels in the transshipment of bulk commodities over the Great Lakes. Indeed, the district court originally dismissed the self-unloader damage claims asserted by the steel companies, but gave the steel companies the opportunity to amend their complaints to allege the requisite ownership. To avoid a subsequent dismissal, the steel companies amended their complaint to allege that they had ownership interests in the vessels. However, the steel companies have not provided any record reference which points to an intent or preparation on their part to acquire self-unloaders. The only evidence of de facto ownership of the vessels that was offered was admitted during the damages phase of the trial. Nor were we directed towards evidence identifying the specifics of contractual relationships that would indicate ownership interests by means of either significant financing or other proprietary rights.

Moreover the jury was not required to find that the steel companies intended to acquire self-unloaders and were prevented by the conspiracy from doing so. The specific question submitted to the jury was whether the plaintiffs suffered antitrust injury from "foreclosure and delay in the utilization of self-unloading vessels for the delivery of iron ore." (Emphasis added.) True, the term "utilization" could be read to encompass an "ownership" determination, but, given the specific nature of the district court's reliance on the finding to confer entitlement to recovery, a definite statement by the jury that the lease and contracts conferred de facto ownership would be necessary. Given the evidence, we express concern that such a finding is supported.

In Associated General Contractors, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters ("AGC"), the Court reviewed concerns addressed in previous cases [16] [54] and set forth an integrated § 4 "standing" analysis. In AGC, unions representing California construction workers sued an association of employers with whom the union had collective bargaining agreements. The complaint charged the association and its members with coercing some employers into doing business with non-union contractors and sub-contractors. In assessing the union's standing to sue, the Court did not distinguish between antitrust standing and antitrust injury. [17]

Instead, the Court provided a number of factors to consider in § 4 actions to determine if the plaintiff has suffered an injury which bears a causal relation to an alleged antitrust violation. These factors provided a theoretical framework for courts to utilize when [55] presented with a standing challenge. HN17[] They are: (1) the causal connection between the antitrust violation and the harm to the plaintiff and the intent by the defendant to cause that harm, with neither factor alone conferring standing; (2) whether the plaintiff's alleged injury is of the type for which the antitrust laws were intended to provide redress; (3) the directness of the injury, which addresses the concerns that liberal application of standing principles might produce speculative claims; (4) the existence of more direct victims of the alleged antitrust violations; and (5) the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of [*1166] damages. This fifth factor addresses the disfavor, expressed in Illinois Brick, of complex antitrust trials which not only "burden the courts, but also undermine the effectiveness of treble damages suits." AGC, 459 U.S. at 545, citing Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 745.

At least one commentator suggests that although deciphering a distinction between the two concepts is not obligatory, it is important to understand that even after the Court's consolidating opinion in AGC, antitrust [56] injury is more than a component to be factored in a standing analysis, it must be present in every case. [18]

In a case decided shortly after the AGC decision, we characterized the Supreme Court's discourse:

> The Court's case-by-case approach reflects the fact that § 4 standing analysis is essentially a balancing test comprised of many constant and variable factors and there is no talismanic test capable of resolving all § 4 standing problems.

Ed. 2d 80, 98 S. Ct. 69 (1977)*. In Merican we indicated (albeit with citation to a different case) that the AGC factors should be weighed and balanced. The AGC opinion does not assign specific weight to its factors, [57] individually, collectively or relatively. Nor for that matter does the decision explicitly instruct us to balance the factors, although implicit instruction is discernable from

> There is a similarity between the struggle of common-law judges to articulate a precise definition of the concept of "proximate cause," and the struggle of federal judges to articulate a precise test to determine whether a party injured by an antitrust violation may recover treble damages. It is common ground that the judicial remedy cannot encompass every conceivable harm that can be traced to alleged wrongdoing. In both situations the infinite variety of claims that may arise make it virtually impossible to announce a blackletter rule that will dictate the result in every case. Instead, previously decided cases identify factors that circumscribe and guide the exercise of judgment in deciding whether the law affords a remedy in specific circumstances.

[58] The plaintiffs in Merican were independent distributors who purchased Caterpillar-manufactured products from its authorized dealers for resale in the foreign market. The plaintiffs alleged that by imposing a service fee on its dealers for certain transactions, Caterpillar violated the Sherman Act. The service fee was characterized as a mechanism through which Caterpillar conspired with its authorized dealers to eliminate the plaintiff's position in the market place. While recognizing that the Supreme Court had recently enumerated the list of factors to be utilized in analyzing standing in § 4 cases in AGC, we decided the case solely on the operation of the Illinois Brick concern, i.e., that the potential for duplicative recovery and complex apportionment of damages meant that the plaintiffs were "not persons injured in their business or property by reason of violation of the antitrust laws within the meaning of section 4." 713 F.2d at 969. Mercedes-Benz of North America, Inc., 788 F.2d 918, 932 (3d Cir. 1986)* (under Illinois Brick, threat of duplicative recovery and potential for complex [59] theory of damages bars consumer price fixing claims against automobile manufacturer).

The facts of the present case, however, require, under AGC, a more complete analysis, [*1167] to which we now turn. [20]

[19] Some elucidation concerning the balancing of factors was provided by the Court in its decision last term in Holmes v. Securities Investor Protection Corp., 117 L. Ed. 2d 532, 112 S. Ct. 1311 (1992). In discussing the right to sue under the treble damages provision of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act (borrowed from the Clayton Act), the Court stressed that although the AGC case did not identify directness of relationship between plaintiff and defendant as the "sole requisite of Clayton Act causation," id. at 1318, directness of injury was construed as the focal point by which the remainder of the AGC factors are guided:

> First, the less direct an injury is, the more difficult it becomes to ascertain the amount of a plaintiff's damages attributed to the violation as distinct from other independent factors. Second, quite apart from the facts of proving factual causation, recognizing claims of the indirectly injured would force courts to adopt complicated rules apportioning damages among plaintiffs removed at different levels of injury from the violative acts to obviate the risk of multiple recoveries. And finally, the need to grapple with these problems is simply unjustified by the general interest in deterring injurious conduct, since directly injured victims can generally be counted on to vindicate the law as private attorneys general without any of the problems attendant upon suits by plaintiffs injured more remotely.

Id. (citations omitted).

[20] Before we undertake such an analysis, the most recent Supreme Court case discussing standing must be noted. This case is Kansas v. Utilicorp United Inc., 497 U.S. 199, 111 L. Ed. 2d 169, 110 S. Ct. 2807 (1990), where antitrust claims arose out of an alleged conspiracy to inflate natural gas prices. Defendants in this action were three companies and two limited partnerships that produced natural gas. Among the plaintiffs were three investor-owned public utilities that had purchased gas directly from the pipeline in the states of Kansas and Missouri, whose attorneys general asserted claims in parens patriae capacity on behalf of its residential customers who purchased gas from the utilities.

The gas producers in defense claimed that the public utilities, despite the fact that they were direct purchasers, lacked standing because they had raised their own prices to offset the illegal charge, and thus had not suffered any damage. The district court rejected this pass-on defense and, moreover, dismissed the states as parens patriae on the same theory. The court of appeals affirmed.

In a 5-4 decision, the Supreme Court rejected the States' argument that indirect purchaser standing should be allowed in cases involving a regulated activity that has passed on 100 percent of an overcharge to its customers. The Court opined that the mere fact that a price rise followed an unlawful cost increase was insufficient proof of antitrust injury. The indirect purchaser, stated the Court, would have to show that the utilities had not incurred any damage from the overcharge and would have to demonstrate that the utilities would not have raised prices had there not been an increase in fuel costs. The Court then took the opportunity to caution courts not to carve out exceptions to the general rules announced in its prior standing decisions:

> The rationales underlying Hanover Shoe and Illinois Brick will not apply with equal force in all cases. We nonetheless believe that ample jurisdiction exists for our stated decision 'not to carve out exceptions to the [direct purchaser] rule for

[60] a. The Steel Companies' Lake Transport Charges

i. and ii. Directness of Injury and Causation

The lake transport injury asserted by the steel companies is that the payments made to the vessel companies to tranship their ore were inflated because B &LE illegally thwarted the development of self-unloaders.

To determine if lake freight savings are recoverable, our decision in Mid-West Paper Products Co. v. Continental Group, 596 F.2d 573 (3d Cir. 1979), is helpful. In that case, like this one, damages were predicated on amounts paid to a non-conspiring party. While recognizing that a non-conspiring competitor of a defendant supplier was included under the "umbrella" of those suffering economic impact from the defendants' conspiracy, we denied standing "in light of the tenuous line of causation between the defendants' price fixing and the prices paid by [the plaintiff]." Id. at 583. Standing was also denied because "the outcome of any attempt to ascertain what price the defendants' competitors would have charged had there not been a conspiracy would at the very least be highly conjectural." Id. at 584. [61] [21]

Thus, Mid-West Paper instructs, consistent with AGC, that we inquire whether the injury resulting from payment of excessive lake transport charges is directly traceable to the railroad's anti-competitive behavior. This AGC causation focus is not an overruling of Illinois Brick - an AGC analysis [62] incorporates the Illinois Brick principles of discouraging speculative and overly complex [*1168] claims. Thus, although we remain loyal to upholding the concerns voiced by the Supreme Court in Illinois Brick, echoed by our precedent in Mid-West Paper and Merican, the mere fact that monies paid to third parties (the vessel companies) represent a component by which the steel companies measure their damages does not foreclose further inquiry as to whether standing existed.

We agree with the district court and B&LE that the steel companies, in respect to lake transport damages, are, in some sense, "indirect" purchasers. Although B&LE suggests that indirect purchaser status is the death knell of plaintiffs' claim, this conclusion is not supported by the current law. We are, instead, instructed by AGC to ascertain the nature of the relationship between the parties. This directness factor thus sets the tone for our standing analysis.

The form of this conspiracy was market exclusion. B&LE concedes that an agreement existed among the railroads to take anticompetitive action to maintain its dominance in the ore transport market. Although this aim itself is not illegal, the nefarious [63] means to achieve it were. By charging the same rate for unloading a self-unloader as for unloading a bulker, by refusing to approve commodity line haul rates from private docks which would have handled self-unloaders, and by concertedly refusing to make dock property available for use by private docks, the particular types of markets'. The possibility of allowing an exception, even in rather meritorious circumstances, would undermine the rule.

497 U.S. at 216, quoting Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 744.

B&LE avers that this language in Utilicorp prohibits us from examining the facts of this case to determine if an exception lies under Illinois Brick. Utilicorp, however, does not rule because it concerned the pass-on theory of standing and whether the regulated consumer-energy market, or any other market involving a distribution chain that resembled a series of "cost-plus" contracts, would justify an exception to the unavailability of standing on the basis of the pass-on theory. The broader concerns of Illinois Brick and later cases are discussed infra.

[21] We do not, however, interpret this statement in Mid-West Paper or the "indirect purchaser" rule of Illinois Brick as announcing a strict prohibition against recovery by indirect purchasers. Despite the Court's remark in Utilicorp that permitting parties with indirect purchaser status to proceed with a § 4 claim would require it to "create an exception to the direct purchaser rule established in Hanover Shoe and Illinois Brick . . . ." 497 U.S. at 207, we discount the import of this language because the Utilicorp decision was addressing the peculiarities of applying the pass-on theory of standing in the public utility arena. See n.9, supra.

railroads delayed the introduction of the more efficient self-unloader. This delay caused loss of the profits which would have been realized had the less costly transport system been in place.

The relevant question is whether B&LE's antitrust activity directly impacted the steel companies. Undeniably it did. The steel companies were the sole customers of the industry involved in the transhipment of ore; indeed, the industry existed for them. True, the steel companies made payments for ore movement services to various parties, defendants and non-defendants alike, but it was unquestionably the steel companies who bore the brunt of the increased costs attributed to the railroad's agreement to thwart development of the less expensive technology.

The direct nature of the injury absorbs the question of causal connection. There are no missing links in the causation chain here. [64] The correlation between the steel companies' inability to utilize the lower cost method to carry its ore and the railroad's attempt to close the ore transport market is obvious. The goal of the railroads in preventing the self-unloader/private dock/private trucking company system from coming into existence left four victims in its wake, the three component industries, and the steel companies. However, the steel companies suffered the greatest harm in connection with the delay of the use of the self-unloader technology. This all-important, directness factor thus weighs greatly in the steel companies' favor.

iii. Goal of Antitrust Laws

We ask next whether the alleged injury was the type that Congress sought to redress in providing a private remedy for violations of the antitrust laws. AGC, 459 U.S. at 538, quoting Blue Shield of Virginia, 457 U.S. at 483. "The Sherman Act was enacted to assure customers [here, the steel companies] the benefits of price competition, and our prior cases have emphasized the central interest in protecting the economic freedom of participants in the relevant market. Id. (footnote omitted.) [65] Thus, factor three clearly favors the steel company plaintiffs.

iv. Other Victims

As discussed, others suffering economic harm here included the vessel companies, the dock companies and the trucking companies. They, too, as competitors for the ore transport business, have suffered direct antitrust injury, yet the unique circumstances of this conspiracy compel us to classify their injuries as tangential to that of the steel companies. The economic health of the dock and trucking companies was, nonetheless, significantly compromised as part and parcel of the railroads' scheme to force the steel companies to remain loyal to a system where the railroads would reap the greatest profits. Therefore, other direct victims exist, but their presence does not diminish the directness of the steel [*1169] companies' injury. This factor, thus, weighs evenly.

v. Duplicative Recovery and Complex Apportionment

The concern for duplicate recovery and the potential for complex apportionment of damages are real. Nonetheless, the involvement of other parties and their resultant damages here are not the particular kind of double recovery Illinois Brick sought to prevent. In Illinois Brick the [66] concern was that overlapping parties would compete for the same pool of illegal profits garnered from the antitrust activity. This type of duplication would be implicated here if B &LE's illegal activity were subject to suit by a "downstream" industry alleging, as was alleged in Illinois Brick, that the steel companies had passed on the transportation increase in the price of steel. Here, different parties allege different injuries - the steel companies' claim is for the savings which would be realized if the less expensive method of transport was in place, while the vessel and dock companies' claim focuses on lost profits.

The distinctive labelling of the claims does not solve the problem of overlap when the steel companies' claim of damages is called to proof. The steel companies would have to demonstrate meticulously that none of its lost savings includes any amounts which the vessel companies might potentially claim as lost profits. [22]

[22] An illustration of why the steel companies' damages would not necessarily duplicate the damages of the vessel and docking companies can be made by hypothesizing that the steel companies paid $ 10 in transport and docking charges for a ton of ore under the old system; with self-unloading bulkers they would pay $ 7 for transport and docking the same amount of ore. The

Nevertheless, while complex apportionment problems are implicated here, we do not hold that litigation must be avoided solely because it might be difficult to ascertain damages. Injured parties cannot be penalized and left without recourse because [67] measurement of their damages is difficult. In this vein, it is important to focus on the word "potential." We are either gifted or vexed by hindsight in this matter, but standing is a threshold determination. It decides if the plaintiffs have alleged a cause of action and have requested the recovery of damages that are cognizable under the law. The damage theories here should not be deemed complex simply because that is the way in which they were ultimately presented. Reliability is instead an evidentiary question properly decided under evidentiary standards - are the figures economically reliable? Was the expert witness credible? At the standing stage we look to the initial allegation of damages, and, at that point, the steel companies' damages did not appear incapable of accurate calculation.

The facts as found by the jury were that self-unloaders were generally less expensive to utilize. The steel companies' damages were measured as the difference between the amounts they actually paid to transport their ore and the lower prices they would have paid had the conspiracy not excluded a lower cost system. Although, as in antitrust matters involving traditionally defined direct purchasers, [68] other pricing considerations no doubt would factor, that the operating costs would be reduced overall does not require undue speculation. While we recognize that the potential for overlap existed, we are not convinced that it should prevent the matter from proceeding. Thus, although this factor weighs against the steel companies, we do not find it a reason, standing alone, sufficiently compelling to support a standing challenge. A balancing of the AGC factors, thus, weighs in favor of the steel companies' standing; the lake transport damages are recoverable.

b. The Steel Companies Dock Handling Damages

B&LE contends that the steel companies' dock damages are also barred by Mid-West Paper, because these damages resulted from amounts paid to non-conspiring competitors of the defendant. In Midwest Paper we dismissed antitrust damage claims [*1170] of indirect purchasers of defendant's consumer bags under Illinois Brick. We held that direct purchasers from defendants' competitors lacked standing to sue on the grounds that the competitors' prices would have been lower but for the defendants' illegal price fixing. We concluded that this claim was highly speculative, and [69] that any "attempt to determine the effect of the defendants' overcharges upon their competitors' prices would transform this antitrust litigation into the sort of complex economic proceeding that Illinois Brick Court was desirous to avoid if at all possible." Id. at 585 (footnote omitted). B&LE characterizes the steel companies' request for dock damages as an attempt to recover the difference between the prices set and actually paid by the steel companies to the railroad docks and prices they would have paid private docks if their services had been available. Thus, B&LE argues, the claim is dependent upon prices paid to parties other than the defendants and Midwest Paper bars recovery.

The defect in this argument is apparent. The steel companies directly purchased from, and paid monies to, the railroads for dock services. Thus, the amounts contested as being paid to third parties reflect only the second part of the damage equation. To refute the directness factor, the railroads break down the component costs of the dock handling charge and argue that because a portion of the charge was actually paid by the vessel companies to the railroad, here too, the steel companies [70] are indirect purchasers.

We disagree. The dominant relationship in the context of the steel companies purchasing dock services from B&LE is one of customer-provider. The specter of indirectness does not haunt us here and a full AGC analysis is not mandated. The presence of the dock companies as another direct victim does not dilute the causal connection between the inflated dock handling charges paid by the steel companies and the railroads' conspiracy. The jury awarded dock damages for the steel companies' inability to utilize the private docks to handle iron ore. Thus, the damages arose from the conspiracy's effective attempt to eliminate competition from private docks, not from the charges which might have been paid to those private docks.

steel company damages would then be $ 3, the difference between $ 10 and $ 7. The vessel and docking companies' lost profits would, however, have been incorporated in the $ 7 and thus would not be duplicative.

We have already determined that the potential for complex apportionment is not a sufficient reason to deny standing. Therefore, the AGC factors likewise support and uphold standing of the steel companies to claim dock handling damages.

c. The Trucking Companies

In Pre-Trial Order 49 filed in this matter, the district court dismissed all trucking company claims "relating to the alleged suppression of self-unloader technology, denial [71] of line haul rates, and suppression of (refusal to sell to) private docks." App. at 1429. Nonetheless, at the conclusion of the liability phase of the trial, the jury, in response to the special verdict questionnaire found that C. D. Ambrosia Trucking Company was injured by "acts to prevent or delay iron ore handling by private docks", App. at 1898, and that Tauro Brothers Trucking Company was injured by "foreclosure and/or delay in the utilization of self-unloader vessels" and the "inability of steel mills to fully use private docks." App. at 1899. The jury rejected other related claims of Ambrosia and Tauro. In response to the post-trial standing challenge levied against the trucking companies, in its judgment n.o.v. opinion the district court summarily stated that the rule of Illinois Brick did not arise in connection with the trucking companies' claims for damages.

In its main argument, B&LE does not urge that the jury instruction was faulty; rather, it argues that, under AGC, the trucking companies' injuries were too remote to confer standing to bring these claims. [23] B&LE also asserts, under the authority of Matsushita Electronic Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986), [72] that the trucking companies' [*1171] § 4 claims are barred because these companies were the benefactors of the excessive handling charges assessed by the railroads. By B&LE's logic, its refusal to provide lower line haul rates from private docks opens the door for the trucking companies to step in and offer their allegedly lower cost service.

The evidence, typified by the following excerpts from railroad communiques, shows that a primary goal of the railroad conspiracy was to prevent or delay the trucking of ore from non-railroad facilities: "We have strongly resisted for years all proposals to sell or lease Erie [73] ore dock as a bulk materials handling facility which would be open to trucking . . ." (App. at 7952); providing line haul rates to a non-railroad dock "might influence a movement by truck" (App. at 6626); "There is one thing about rates from a private facility which has always bothered me, and that is the possibility of trucking ore and pellets to a steel plant" (App. at 7026); and, "If you lease ground to Litton, trucks could break the rail rate on iron ore - particularly on short haul moves" (App. at 7458). The actions taken by B&LE and the other railroads thus were clearly intended to inhibit the trucking companies' entry into the business of land transportation of ore. There is thus a direct relationship between the defendants' antitrust activity and the trucking companies' injuries.

This type of injury, a restraint upon market entry, is precisely the type of injury that the antitrust laws were designed to prevent. There is no question of overlap here because no other plaintiff could seek the lost profits that the trucking companies request.

While the concern for speculation regarding the measurement of damages is present, the nature of the speculation chiefly concerns when, [74] absent the conspiracy, the steel companies would have adopted the self-unloader/private dock/trucking company system. It is the railroads who took measures to impede the development of the technology and who thus are responsible for any uncertainty concerning when market entry would have been accomplished. The AGC factors, thus, weigh in favor of granting the trucking companies standing to assert a claim for § 4 damages.

[23] In its reply brief, B &LE also contends that it was unfairly prejudiced by what it refers to as the trial court's "subsequential overruling of PTO 49" in its judgment n.o.v. opinion. It does not, however, detail the form of the prejudice such as an allegation that it would have presented its evidence in a different manner or objected to testimony offered by the trucking companies regarding the fact of damage.

We, therefore, conclude that all plaintiffs, directly injured by B&LE's conspiratorial activity with the other railroads, have standing to assert § 4 claims for damages.

C. Limitation of Actions

B&LE claims that the federal actions filed against it are time-barred by the four-year Sherman Act statute of limitations. The Ohio actions suffer the same fate, according to B&LE, by application of the doctrine of laches. These issues present mixed questions of law and fact which implicate our plenary review of the questions of law and the clearly erroneous standard to the district court's factual findings.

1. Federal Law

Pointing out that the conspiracy began in the 1950's and that some plaintiffs had knowledge of the conspiracy as early as 1972, B&LE argues [75] that those plaintiffs' claims were barred by the 4-year statute of limitations. [24] B&LE also argues that the statute of limitations permits recovery only of damages resulting from "injury-causing overt acts" that occurred within the limitations period; therefore, it would follow that the district court misapplied the statute of limitations by not requiring the jury to link damages to specific overt acts.

The Supreme Court has considered and rejected the argument that, in the context of a defendant's continuing violation of the Sherman Act, the statute of limitations runs from the violation's earliest impact on a plaintiff. Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 502, n.15, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231, 88 S. Ct. 2224 (1968). In Hanover Shoe, the defendant had initiated an illegal policy in 1912, some forty-three years before [76] the plaintiff sued in 1955. The Court allowed damages within the limitations period, opining:

> We are not dealing with a violation which, if it occurs at all, must occur within some specific and limited time span. Rather, we [*1172] are dealing with conduct which constituted a continuing violation of the Sherman Act and which inflicted continuing and accumulating harm . . . . Although [the plaintiff] could have sued in 1912 for the injury then being inflicted, it was equally entitled to sue in 1955.

Id. (citation omitted). To the extent that the steel companies' continued shipment of ore on Lower Lake Erie resembles the continued rents paid to the defendants in Hanover Shoe, the cases are indistinguishable.

The main thrust of B&LE's limitations argument has not been to distinguish Hanover Shoe, to which it refers briefly only in its reply brief. Rather, B&LE first argues that another Supreme Court decision, Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 401 U.S. 321, 338-42, 28 L. Ed. 2d 77, 91 S. Ct. 795 (1971), applies. B&LE contends that Zenith generally requires proof that a newly accruing claim be based on an injurious act within the limitations period, then [77] further argues that Zenith allows recovery of only those damages attributable to overt acts occurring within the limitations period. In Zenith, the Court articulated an exception to the general rule that a cause of action accrues each time an act causes an injury. The exception in Zenith was for damages that would be speculative at the time the injury-causing act was committed. Id.

We have held that HN18[] an injurious act within the limitations period may serve as a basis for an antitrust suit. Harold Friedman, Inc. v. Thorofare Markets, Inc., 587 F.2d 127, 139 & n.45 (3d Cir. 1978). In the present matter, the plaintiffs have met their burden of showing that the conspiracy continued into the limitations period. For example, rebuffed efforts to lease dock property from the railroads extended into 1978. Also in that year, the refusal to grant commodity line haul rates from non-railroad docks was still at issue. Coercion to prevent independent action continued into the limitations period. Finally, post-October 1977, dock handling rates charged to discharge ore from self-unloaders remained artificially inflated. The existence of the continued conspiracy [78] thus undermines B&LE's argument that damages within the limitations period were caused "solely from acts committed by the defendant outside the four-year [limitations] period."

[24] B&LE's argument and this discussion do not apply to the trucking company plaintiffs and Reaney, who had no knowledge of the conspiracy until events within the limitations period.

B&LE's further argument - that Zenith and its progeny limit recovery to damages resulting "from injury-causing overt acts" - has no merit because it fails to recognize, in circumstances such as here, that continuing and accumulating damage may result from intentional, concerted inaction. The purposeful nature of the inaction - here an ongoing refusal to sell or lease - obviously constitutes an injurious act, although perhaps not an overt one in the commonly-understood sense.

B&LE's argument results from an overreading in which B&LE directs a myopic gaze at a general rule not at issue in Zenith:

> HN19[] In the context of a continuing conspiracy to violate the antitrust laws . . ., each time a plaintiff is injured by an act of the defendants, a cause of action accrues to him to recover the damages caused by that act, and . . . as to those damages, the statute of limitations runs from the commission of the act.

Zenith, 401 U.S. at 338. B &LE focuses tightly on the words [79] "injured by an act . . . caused by that act" to propose a narrow rule that a plaintiff must tie all damages to specific overt acts within the limitations period.

B&LE's argument obfuscates the difference between, on the one hand, an "overt act" necessary to show the existence of a conspiracy, and, on the other hand, an "injurious act" causing damages within the limitations period. This argument fails to recognize that certain conspiracies, such as boycotts, operate through inaction. As the district court observed in this case, "overt acts aren't what cause damage. It is the effectiveness of the overall conspiracy that causes damages." App. at 2376. [25]

[80] [*1173] Indeed, in Poster Exchange, Inc. v. National Screen Service Corp., 517 F.2d 117 (5th Cir. 1975), from which B&LE quotes out of context to support its proposed "injury causing overt act" rule, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit recognized that a conspiracy's refusal to deal, which began outside the limitations period, "may be viewed as a continuing series of acts upon which successive causes of action may accrue." Id. at 125. Far from requiring that the plaintiff tie its damages to specific acts, the court acknowledged that a continuing conspiracy may give rise to "continually accruing rights of action," and the court simply required the plaintiff to support its allegation that the defendant had "continued during the period in suit to refuse to deal." Id. at 128. [26]

[81] Here, with respect to the statute of limitations, the district court instructed the jury during the liability phase of the trial that "the plaintiffs would have to establish that the conspiracy was still in effect after October 1977, and that at least one of the conspirators took some overt action in furtherance of the conspiracy after October 13, 1977, and that the particular plaintiff whose case you are considering was damaged after October 13, 1977." App. at 4999. While the interrogatories did not require the jury to link the overt act and injury-producing act, as a whole, the requisite findings to defeat a statute of limitations defense were present. Via separate questions, the compilation of the jury's verdicts was that B&LE committed Sherman Act violations within the limitations period which caused

[25] Although B&LE has couched its challenge in terms of the limitations period and we therefore discuss the challenge in that context, we note that, at root, B&LE is arguing about proximate cause and attempting to limit its liability by seeking to narrow the scope of causes from the conspiracy itself (within the limitations period) to particular "overt acts" (within the limitations period). This argument formulation accounts for the district court's "cause and effect" description. We are in agreement with this observation by the district court.

[26] Our decision in Pennsylvania Dental Asso. v. Medical Service Asso., 815 F.2d 270 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 851, 98 L. Ed. 2d 109, 108 S. Ct. 153 (1987), upon which B &LE in part relies, is not to the contrary. Pennsylvania Dental was concerned with the resolutions of various dental associations not to deal with Blue Cross and with the concomitant withdrawal from Blue Cross participation by numerous dentists. Most of the resolutions and withdrawals had taken place outside the limitations periods, but as none of the resolutions had been rescinded and there was evidence of overt acts -- within the limitations period -- in furtherance of the conspiracy, we held that the plaintiff's claim for injunctive relief, if subject to the limitations period at all, was not time barred. Id. at 278. Furthermore, citing Hanover Shoe, we opined that "damages caused by any overt act taking place from [the beginning of the limitations period] may also be recovered." Id. Although the clause, read narrowly, appears to support B&LE's proposed rule that damages must be tied to particular overt acts, it is clear from the context of the opinion that the conspiracy as a whole caused damages. The opinion, read in proper context, thus reiterates the rule that damages caused by injurious activity (such as an conspiracy active within the limitations period) could be recoverable.

injury to most of the plaintiffs. These responses, together with the district court's emphasis on causation in its charge to the jury, see App. at 4784-89, were sufficient to inform the jury that damages must have been caused within the limitations period by an active, injurious conspiracy. As the statute of limitations did not provide a basis to grant B&LE's motion for judgment [82] n.o.v., the district court properly denied the motion. [27]

2. State Law - Laches

The state antitrust claims asserted are governed by the Ohio Valentine Act. HN20[] The Act expressly provides that "no statute of limitations shall prevent or be a bar to any suit or proceeding for any violation of [this Act]." Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 1331.12 (Anderson 1979 and Supp. 1990). B &LE contends that the steel companies' and Erie's Ohio Valentine Act claims are nonetheless [83] time-barred by the doctrine of laches.

The district court rejected B&LE's laches contention for three reasons. First, the court held that laches is an equitable defense that had no application under Ohio law to actions at law for damages. Second, the district court held that the liability jury's finding that the defendant railroads took affirmative [*1174] acts to conceal the conspiracy or conceal any act in furtherance of the conspiracy, precluded the application of laches. Finally, the district court found that B&LE had not demonstrated any significant prejudice attributable to the delay.

We need not determine whether the law of Ohio permits assertion of a laches defense to antitrust suits [28] or whether the fraudulent concealment claims of the steel companies and Erie should have been submitted to the jury. HN21[] "'Delay in asserting a right does not of itself constitute laches, and in order to successfully invoke the equitable doctrine of laches it must be shown that the person for whose benefit the doctrine will operate has been materially prejudiced by the delay of the person asserting his claim.'" Emrick v. Multicon Builders, Inc., 57 Ohio St. 3d 107, 566 N.E.2d 1189, 1194 (Ohio 1991), [84] quoting Smith v. Smith, 168 Ohio St. 447, 156 N.E.2d 113, 119-20 (Ohio 1954).

[85] The district court found that B&LE had not shown any significant prejudice attributable to the delay. Unless clearly erroneous, we will not disturb that finding. B&LE contends that it was prejudiced by the death of many critical witnesses and the loss of numerous documents; B&LE, however, details neither the substance of these witnesses' testimony nor the content of lost documents and what they would have revealed concerning its defense against the conspiracy. Given the number of witnesses and documents which were admitted in evidence, it is difficult to see how B&LE was prejudiced by the lack of either of those two components of evidence. We therefore conclude that laches is not a bar to the Valentine Act claims.

Since the plaintiffs have survived the threshold challenges to the legality of the lawsuit, we now address the issues raised concerning the evidence presented at trial and the amount of damages awarded.

D. Sufficiency of Evidence

[27] Moreover, the district court alternatively found, on sufficient evidence, that damages were not ascertainable until within the limitations period. This would suffice to bring them within the Zenith exception for speculative damages. See Zenith, 401 U.S. at 338-42. Because we have concluded that an active, injury-causing conspiracy suffices to bring the cause of action, we need not address B&LE's disputations regarding Zenith's exception to the rule that an action for damages occurs at the time of an injurious act.

[28] It is not clear from the caselaw that laches, an equitable defense, applies only to defenses at equity. See Smith v. Smith, 168 Ohio St. 447, 156 N.E.2d 113, 120 (Ohio 1954) (recognizing equitable nature of laches doctrine, but noting its applicability in certain statutory actions). See also Thirty-Four Corp. v. Sixty-Seven Corp., 15 Ohio St. 3d 350, 474 N.E.2d 295, 298 (Ohio 1984) (court referred to mortgage foreclosure action as "lawsuit" and considered whether laches applied). HN22[] It is also the law in Ohio that assertion of the defense and its applicability is one which should be presented to the jury. See, Ferree v. Sparks, 77 Ohio App. 3d 185, 601 N.E.2d 568, 570 (Ohio App.3d 1991) (evaluation of evidence concerning application of laches is for trier of fact). The jury's findings here concerning fraudulent concealment are not conclusive as to the steel companies, and, as to Erie, are not applicable since the jury found that the Erie plaintiffs had actual knowledge of the conspiracy prior to October 14, 1977.

In support of its argument that the plaintiffs failed to prove the necessary elements to establish both the fact of antitrust injury and the amount of damages, B &LE submits three reasons for reversal: (1) that unrelated economic factors [86] impacted upon the steel companies' decisions to delay investment in self-unloaders; (2) even if injury was demonstrated, the jury was not instructed nor could it discern from the special verdict questions that a causal connection must be established between the alleged violations and the amount of damages awarded; and (3) the damage models upon which the awards were predicated were either speculative or unrealistic.

1. The Liability Verdict

While B&LE advances thought-provoking factual assertions that economic causes other than those connected to illegal antitrust activity made the use of self-unloaders financially unappealing, we are not free to revisit the factual issues other than to determine whether the evidence supports the jury's verdict.

The district court evaluated the sufficiency question as follows:

> Throughout both phases of the trial, the defendant vehemently argued, and sought to prove, that any damages actually sustained by the plaintiffs were attributable to economic factors other than the alleged conspiracy; that the economic studies upon which plaintiffs' damage claims were predicated were unreliable and erroneous; and that the damages claimed were either [87] speculative, grossly exaggerated or non-existent. [*1175] It is certainly true, in my view at least, that the evidence of damages did not so heavily preponderate in favor of the plaintiffs as to render the jury's verdict a foregone conclusion. The evidence as a whole did not suffice to remove all reasonable questions concerning the timing and profitability of the charges in ore transport the defendants' conspiracy allegedly delayed.
> But these are all factual issues and were properly submitted to the jury. Viewing the record in the light favorable to the verdict, there can be no doubt that the evidence sufficed, in all respects, to support the jury's determinations.

App. at 2129.

Relying on our similarly circumscribed review and the deference owing to the trial judge presiding over this lengthy and complex matter, we agree that the evidence sufficed to establish liability. We have discussed, in the context of other issues presented here, the persuasive evidence against B&LE documenting anticompetitive behavior violative of the antitrust laws. The presence of contrary evidence does not eradicate the probative worth of the plaintiff's case. The jury heard all the evidence and rendered a [88] verdict, in most part, favorable to the plaintiffs. HN23[] Unless the evidence is critically deficient as to the prevailing party's side so that no reasonable jury could grant it relief, we will affirm the district court's denial of the motion. Kinnel v. Mid-Atlantic Mausoleums, Inc., 850 F.2d 958, 961-62 (3d Cir. 1988).

Our review of the record more than satisfies us that the jury's verdicts for the plaintiffs were bolstered by sufficient evidence. Documents from the railroads' files establish their agreement to prevent the steel companies from utilizing the self-unloader transportation alternative. Specifically, memos and letters chronicled cancellation of railroad services from non-railroad docks, denial of competitive rates for inland rail transport from private docks, and refusal to sell or lease dock properties - all aimed toward precluding entry of the plaintiffs into the ore transport business. Also documented were the railroads' refusal to accept self-unloaders at their docks and their assessment of the same rates for bulkers and self-unloaders, regardless of the difference in services performed.

At trial, steel company officials testified concerning [89] their interest in investing in the more cost-effective self-unloaders but that they were discouraged from doing so by the railroads' refusal to alter their rates to make the system economical. In addition, expert economic testimony offered by the plaintiffs concluded that the railroad conspiracy, delaying the utilization of the self-unloader/private dock system, caused the steel companies to pay more to transport iron ore to its facilities.

Accordingly, as to the claim of insufficiency of the evidence, the district court did not err in refusing to grant B&LE's motion for judgment n.o.v.

2. The Antitrust Claims of the Erie Plaintiffs

B&LE contends that the Erie plaintiffs' damages, traceable to an alleged refusal by Penn Central to sell dock property to Erie, were caused by Erie's own financial disability and not by railroad misconduct. Once again, this is a point argued during trial which the jury heard and disregarded.

We have reviewed the record and find that the quantum of evidence needed to uphold this award is present. A former member of the Erie Port Commission testified that the sale of the dock property was unacceptable to it because it included a restriction on the [90] handling of iron ore. When Penn Central offered to remove the restrictions in exchange for an approximately 40 percent increase in the selling price, the Commission deemed the sale uneconomical. In contrast, the documentary evidence which B&LE asserted demonstrated that the sale failed because of a funding shortfall was, at best, equivocal. The damages award granted on this basis will not be disturbed.

3. The Jury Instructions and Special Verdict Questions

B&LE asserts that only a retrial can cure the prejudicial windfall to the plaintiffs resulting from the district court's failure to provide the jury with proper guidance. According [*1176] to B&LE, the jury was never told to limit the plaintiffs' monetary recovery to amounts directly related to the defendants' illegal activity.

B&LE is correct when it asserts that HN24[] one pursuing antitrust recovery must establish that the damages suffered were caused by the defendant's participation in a scheme repugnant to the antitrust laws. Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701, 97 S. Ct. 690 (1977). Once causation is determined, however, the actual amount of damages may result from a "reasonable estimate, as long [91] as the jury verdict is not the product of speculation or guess work." MCI Communications Corp. v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 708 F.2d 1081, 1161 (7th Cir. 1983), citing J. Truett Payne, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 451 U.S. 557, 566-67, 68 L. Ed. 2d 442, 101 S. Ct. 1923 (1981); Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 123-24, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129, 89 S. Ct. 1562 (1969). The Supreme Court, in its decisions of Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 699, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777, 82 S. Ct. 1404 (1962) and Story Parchment Co. v. Paterson Parchment Paper Co., 282 U.S. 555, 75 L. Ed. 544, 51 S. Ct. 248 (1931), did not impose stringent proof requirements regarding the damages alleged in the injury-causing acts. It was emphasized, however, in Bigelow v. RKO Radio Pictures, 327 U.S. 251, 264-65, 90 L. Ed. 652, 66 S. Ct. 574 (1946), that antitrust recovery can constitute compensation for only those damages directly caused by unlawful competition. The relaxed measure of proof is afforded to the amount, not the causation of loss - HN25[] the nexus between the defendant's illegal activity and the injuries suffered must be reasonably proven. [92] MCI Communications, 708 F.2d at 1081.

We overturned a jury verdict when review of the evidence showed that a damage award was partially based on legally-permitted competition by the defendant, Coleman Motor Co. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 525 F.2d 1338 (3d Cir. 1975), but similar considerations are not operable here. The damages awarded here were not attributable, in any extent, to lawful railroad activity. Rather, B&LE asserts that outside economic factors, totally unrelated to its industry, made investment in self-unloader technology unattractive. And, forming the focus of B&LE's challenge, the jury instruction and special interrogatories were inadequate to convey to the jury the importance of the link of causation to damages. [29]

[29] B&LE contends that the district court erred as a matter of law in not instructing the jury on the fact and import of market power. The primary ground for this assertion is that the plaintiffs claimed and recovered damages for ore moved outside the lower Lake Erie region, on Lake Michigan and Lake Detroit.

We note that B&LE stipulated to the tonnages of ore involved in the conspiracy. During the damages charge, the district court informed the jury that "everyone agrees on the total amount of pelletized ore that was transported during the relevant time." App. at 6338. Because B&LE agreed to the specific tonnages involved in the conspiracy, it cannot now come forward and dispute the amount as improperly including tonnages which were moved beyond the geographic range of the conspiracy.

[93] To the contrary, the instruction to the damages jury explained the proper focus of the jury's deliberation - how damages were to be calculated, how to evaluate the evidence and the ways in which the parties disagreed on the method of calculation of damages.

> What is required, and the burden is upon the plaintiff, is to provide you with a reasonable estimate of their damages, what your regard as a reasonably reliable estimate. You are not permitted to simply guess or speculate or pull figures out of the air. You have to have a rationale, reasonable basis for supposing the damages' figure that you come up with is a reasonable estimate, a fair estimate of the probable loss sustained by the plaintiffs. To the extent that you find that any money was lost because of general conditions in the steel industry not attributable to this conspiracy and so forth, you should, of course, not include any such sums in your calculation of damages . . . there should not be any overlapping or duplication of damages.

App. at 6377.

The jurors could deduce from the charge that they were to divorce from their deliberations any non-conspiratorial activity. Because [*1177] the language conveyed this clearly, [94] the challenge to the instruction fails.

Concerning the specificity of the interrogatories, we must determine whether the district court abused its discretion in their formulation. McNally v. National Ins. Co., 815 F.2d 254 (3d Cir. 1987). HN26[] The interrogatories are adequate if they will determine the facts essential to the judgment. Kornicki v. Calmar S.S. Corp., 460 F.2d 1134, 1139 (3d Cir. 1972).

Our review shows that the questions sent to the jury here met that criteria. There was no abuse of discretion calling for a new trial.

4. The Damage Models

B&LE next points to the models designed by the plaintiffs to assess damage and characterizes them as overspeculative and in conflict with the economic realities of the time. As with its sufficiency of evidence causation claim, B&LE was given the opportunity to confront the plaintiff's evidence, aggressively seized upon the opportunity to do so and presented its own version of the extent of damages to the jury.

Our review of the record convinces us that the jury's verdict in the plaintiffs' favor is fully supported. The district court did not err in refusing to award [95] a new trial on the damages issue.

E. Post-Judgment Interest

The last issue we address on B &LE's appeal is the date from which post-judgment interest should be calculated. 28 U.S.C. § 1961, the governing statute, reads in relevant part:

> § 1961. Interest
> HN27[] (a) Interest shall be allowed on any money judgment in a civil case recovered in a district court. . . . Such interest shall be calculated from the date of the entry of judgment . . . .

With the statute in mind, we examine, under plenary review, the order of events here.

On April 19, 1989, the district court, in Pre-Trial Order No. 49, determined that "all claims against the defendant Penn Central Corporation are dismissed." App. at 1430. On July 18, 1989, the damages jury returned its verdict against B&LE in favor of the plaintiffs. On July 20, 1989, the court ordered judgment on the jury's verdict.

On August 2, 1989, B&LE moved for judgment n.o.v. and on February 27, 1991, the district court issued its opinion and orders on post-trial motions.

On March 5, 1991, B&LE filed a supplemental motion to correct the final judgment to substitute July 19, 1989 for July 18, 1989 as the date [96] of final judgment and the date from which interest accrues. The court responded to the motion and amended its order to reflect that interest on the judgment runs from July 19, rather than July 18, 1989.

On March 28, 1991, B&LE filed its notices of appeal. Amended notices of appeal were filed on March 29, 1991. Then, on June 17, 1991, the district court re-entered judgment in favor of the appellees/cross-appellants against B&LE in accordance with its order on post-trial motions. At this time, the court also entered judgment in favor of the defendant Penn Central Corporation.

In response, on July 15, 1991, B&LE filed a supplemental motion to amend the judgment, contending that post-judgment interest should not run from July 19, 1989 as previously requested but rather from June 17, 1991, when the trial court for the first time entered the final judgment in this complex matter - the order in favor of Penn Central against plaintiffs. App. at 2205.

We conclude that July 19, 1989 - the date upon which judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs and against B&LE - is the appropriate date from which post-judgment interest should run. In Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp. v. Bonjorno, 494 U.S. 827, 108 L. Ed. 2d 842, 110 S. Ct. 1570 (1990), [97] the Supreme Court identified the purpose of post-judgment interest as the successful plaintiff's compensation for the loss between determination of damages and payment by the defendant. Id. at 835-36; 28 U.S.C. § 1961. The statute does not, by its terms, mandate that the judgment from which interest is calculated must be a final judgment. Our view is consistent [*1178] with the statute's philosophy of providing compensation from a point at which the loss-causing defendant's liability is entered on record.

Here, judgment against the loss-causing defendant, B&LE, was entered on July 19, 1989. The subsequent "housekeeping" entry, dismissing finally the plaintiffs' claims against Penn Central, was completely divorced from a determination of the prevailing plaintiffs' loss. While concerns of finality and appealability might be implicated by the eventual entry of judgment against Penn Central, the statute's purpose in awarding post-judgment interest was satisfied when judgment was entered against B&LE in July of 1989.

We turn now to the issues raised in the cross-appeals.

III. The Cross-Appeals

A. Fraudulent Concealment [98] - The Steel Companies

To surmount the four year statute of limitations hurdle which would preclude recovery for pre-October 1977 damages, the steel companies claimed that the statute was tolled because the railroads fraudulently concealed the conspiracy.

In Pretrial Order 49, the district court granted summary judgment for B&LE on the steel companies' fraudulent concealment assertion. The court ruled:

> The steel company plaintiffs are precluded from recovering damages sustained more than four years before the respective complaints in this action were filed. Not only did they plainly have knowledge of facts which should have reasonably made them aware of a basis for asserting the very claims now being asserted, but it is also clear that they were specifically being urged to support an antitrust suit by Pinney Dock -- at least as early as 1972, and more than four years before the criminal indictment.

App. at 1427-28.

At a subsequent pretrial argument, the steel companies challenged the entry of summary judgment referring, as one basis, to the statement of the court regarding Pinney's request to the steel companies to support Pinney's antitrust cause of action. The steel companies [99] disputed first, that Pinney was soliciting support for an antitrust lawsuit and, second, that each steel company was an individual recipient of Pinney's petition for participation. The court replied:

> Well there was a slight misunderstatement [sic] I agree. They were asked to support an application to the ICC. And certainly from the standpoint of Pinney it was also Pinney's knowledge that it was considering an antitrust action, and this would be the first step before it.
> I agree there is nothing in some instances at least to suggest that they were requested to support an antitrust action.

> The important thing is, however, that they were certainly aware of what the railroads' policies had been.

App. at 2321 (emphasis added). The court did not substantively respond to the challenge to the lack of evidence that some steel companies (National, Republic and Sharon), were even approached by Pinney.

On review, we apply the same test that district courts employ in summary judgment matters. HN28[] The facts must be viewed favorably to the non-movant, B&LE. If there is no disputed question of material fact, and B&LE is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, then summary judgment [100] will be affirmed.

The steel companies contend that because twenty-eight of its officials testified at trial that they had neither knowledge nor suspicion of the conspiracy, the question of fraudulent concealment was not factually foreclosed and should have been submitted to the jury.

We have not specifically elucidated the standards for pleading fraudulent concealment in the antitrust context. However, in a case decided under Pennsylvania law, Bohus v. Beloff, 950 F.2d 919 (3d Cir. 1991), we identified the HN29[] three factors necessary to forestall the running of the limitations statute by way of a fraudulent concealment allegation: (1) an affirmative act of concealment; (2) which misleads or relaxes the plaintiff's [*1179] inquiry, who (3) exercised due diligence in investigating his cause of action. Id. at 925-26.

The Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit directly addressed the issue of the tolling of antitrust claims by fraudulent concealment in Dayco Corp. v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 523 F.2d 389 (6th Cir. 1975). Holding that HN30[] the exercise of due diligence is required in antitrust cases to [101] employ the fraudulent concealment doctrine to avoid bar of the statute of limitations, the court referred to the requirement for the defense set out by the Supreme Court many years ago in Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U.S. 135, 25 L. Ed. 807 (1879):

> Any fact that should excite his suspicion is the same as actual knowledge of his entire claim. Indeed, the means of knowledge are the same thing in effect as knowledge itself. 101 U.S. at 143. HN31[] If the plaintiff has delayed beyond the limitations period, he must fully plead the facts and circumstances surrounding his belated discovery and the delay which has occurred and must be shown to be consistent with requisite diligence.

The Sixth Circuit revisited the issue of fraudulent concealment in the Pinney Dock case. There, the court rejected the defense because the antitrust causes of action "were nonetheless discovered or could with reasonable diligence have been discovered notwithstanding such a concealment and well within the appropriate time for commencing such actions." 838 F.2d at 1483.

Given our precedent in Bohus, we agree with the Court [102] of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit that the exercise of due diligence must be shown in the antitrust context. The steel companies, who have the burden of proof, see Pinney Dock, 838 F.2d at 1465 (plaintiff has burden of proving fraudulent concealment elements), have identified areas of factual dispute concerning their ignorance of the railroads' sub rosa rate-setting activity and anti-competitive non-rate actions. But these assertions did not include evidence of due diligence. Given the scope of the steel companies' knowledge of publicized railroad rate-making decisions - the same rates charged for handling self unloaders as bulkers and the refusal to grant commodity line haul rates from private docks - we find that the steel companies have failed to satisfy the diligence component of the defense. What the steel companies did know about the railroads' rate-making should reasonably have made them aware of a basis for asserting the very claims now being raised. The district court properly granted summary judgment for B &LE on this issue.

B. Waiver - National Steel

Like the other steel company plaintiffs, National Steel sought recovery under federal [103] and state antitrust laws for damages resulting from B &LE's participation in the conspiracy to delay the introduction of the self-unloader/private dock system. Setting National Steel apart from the other steel company plaintiffs is the fact that National Steel owned and operated its own fleet of vessels for the transportation of iron ore. National Steel's established proprietary interest in vessels, in particular the self-unloader, the Stinson, gave rise to National Steel's additional claim for damages - that, absent the conspiracy, National Steel would have built the Stinson earlier and at a lower cost.

The liability jury found that the conspiracy caused injury to National Steel resulting from "foreclosure and or delay in the utilization of self-unloading vessels for the delivery of iron ore" and "the ability to fully use private docks to handle iron ore." App. at 1894. At the damages phase of the trial, National Steel's expert witness testified that National Steel would have purchased the Stinson in 1972 instead of 1974, which would have resulted in a significant cost savings.

B&LE moved for a directed verdict at the conclusion of the damages phase of the trial, [104] alleging that National Steel failed to present evidence from which the jury could reasonably calculate damages, that its evidence rested on false assumptions and ignored significant contributing factors to its alleged injuries, and that B&LE's expert damages witnesses demonstrated the inadequacy and unreasonableness of National [*1180] Steel's allegation. App. at 2037-38. The district court denied B&LE's motion.

The damages jury determined that the cost savings to which National Steel was entitled amounted to $ 16,700,000, portions of which were trebled under federal law and doubled under Ohio state law, for a total award of $ 39,700,000.

In its judgment n.o.v. opinion, the district court determined that B&LE had properly preserved the issue concerning the amounts awarded to National and concluded that the jury's cost savings verdict was impermissible, reasoning that the cost savings damages reflected only the impact of inflation, an aspect of monetary damage not recoverable under the relevant antitrust laws. Granting B&LE's motion for judgment n.o.v., the court elaborated its rationale:

> National did eventually invest in self-unloader vessels. It claimed that the vessels cost more to [105] build than would have been the case if they had been constructed earlier. The inescapable conclusion, however, is that the difference in costs reflects merely the impact of inflation, presumably offset by the time value of money, and not an actual loss to the plaintiff.

App. at 2108-09.

National Steel cross-appealed on two grounds. First, National Steel claims that by asserting only a general objection to the evidence of damages in its directed verdict motion, B&LE waived its right to argue that the award of cost savings damages was not cognizable under the antitrust laws. Second, even if the argument was properly preserved, National Steel argues that the additional amount paid for the Stinson was legally recoverable as actual damages resulting from B&LE's conduct and that the jury's verdict was rationally based on the expert testimony presented by National Steel.

We need not decide the merits issue because we conclude that B&LE has not preserved its argument in accordance with our decision in Bonjorno v. Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., 752 F.2d 802, 814-15 (3d Cir. 1984). In Bonjorno, the district court granted judgment n.o.v. in an [106] antitrust action concluding that damages for diminution of "going concern" value were not recoverable. We reversed because the defendant only challenged damages generally and failed to raise that specific reason in its motion for a directed verdict. 752 F.2d at 814-15. We explained that HN32[] the "specific grounds for a JNOV must be asserted in the motion for a directed verdict," 752 F.2d at 814, citing Abraham v. Pekarski, 728 F.2d 167, 172 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1242, 82 L. Ed. 2d 822, 104 S. Ct. 3513 (1984), and the lack of specificity on a particular issue will defeat a motion for judgment n.o.v. on that ground. Id. This requirement affords the non-moving party a chance to respond with additional evidence, and avoids infringement of the non-moving party's Seventh Amendment rights. Id., citing Lowenstein v. Pepsi-Cola Bottling Co., 536 F.2d 9, 11 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 966, 50 L. Ed. 2d 334, 97 S. Ct. 396 (1976).

While B&LE contends that its directed verdict motion explicitly contested the inclusion of inflation as a component of damages, B&LE additionally [107] argues that, by the content of the trial, National Steel was put on notice that there was a challenge to National Steel's recovery for cost savings resulting from the delayed construction of the Stinson.

We disagree with B&LE's assertions. First, the portion of the directed verdict mounting a challenge to the damages claims of all plaintiffs did not confront National Steel's cost savings damages claim with the required specificity such as would have alerted National Steel that B&LE was contesting damages attributed solely to inflation. National Steel argued that such notice would have prompted it to develop an alternative theory of recovery, and to introduce evidence that the timing of the construction of the self-unloader exposed National Steel to increased competition in the building of these vessels, and hence diminished its profit. We believe that the lack of opportunity to present additional evidence, followed by a grant of judgment n.o.v., is tantamount to the trial court deciding an issue already submitted to and deliberated on by the jury which compromises the non-moving parties' right to a fair trial. Bonjorno*, 752 F.2d at 814*.

[*1181] Second, [108] we do not credit B&LE's assertion that, during the course of the trial, it was challenging National Steel's recovery as representing only inflation. We have reviewed the record references and do not find that the evidence cited would have put National Steel on guard that its proof of damages was inadequate. By our reading, the questioning at trial concerned whether National Steel's expert computed a deduction for the use of equity; that is, because National Steel did not invest in the self-unloader, it had additional cash to invest elsewhere. This other investment and its return, argued B&LE, should have been deducted from the figure representing the amount suffered because National Steel did not buy the self-unloading vessel earlier. This challenge to the evidence is not specific as to how inflation factored into the calculations nor does it even mention inflation as a disputed element.

We conclude that B&LE failed to preserve, in its motion for a directed verdict, the ground upon which the district court relied to grant judgment n.o.v. in B&LE's favor. The district court was, thus, without authority to decide the merits of the issue and the judgment abrogating the award of damages [109] to National Steel will be reversed.

C. Prejudgment Interest - The Steel and Dock Companies

HN33[] Under Ohio law, the prevailing party may recover prejudgment interest if the losing party failed to make a good- faith effort to settle the case. Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 1343.03(C) (Anderson 1979 and Supp. 1990). This includes consideration of whether a party rationally evaluated its risks and potential liability and whether a good faith monetary settlement offer or response to an offer by the other party occurred. Kalain v. Smith, 25 Ohio St. 3d 157, 495 N.E.2d 572, 574 (Ohio 1986). If a party has a good faith, objectively reasonable belief that liability does not exist, the party does not need to offer a cash settlement in order to avoid prejudgment interest liability in the event it does not prevail. Id.

The district court refused to award prejudgment interest on the plaintiffs' Ohio Valentine Act judgments because it found that B&LE's refusal to settle the case was based on the reasonable belief that it was without liability to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs contend that B&LE's plea of nolo contendere in its criminal prosecution and the substantial settlements by co-conspirators [110] evidence B&LE's lack of a good faith, objectively reasonable belief that it was not liable. In light of this, B&LE's repeated refusals to engage in settlement negotiations were in bad faith and thus subject B&LE to liability for prejudgment interest. The plaintiffs refer to several settlement overtures which they offered both pre-trial and after the liability verdict which B&LE declined to pursue. Although B&LE did make a settlement proposal during the second day of the damages trial deliberations, plaintiffs classified the offer as grossly inadequate because it was far exceeded by the then current toll of attorney's fees.

We review the district court's decision whether to grant prejudgment interest for abuse of discretion. Given the difficulty in resolving many of the legal issues presented here, we agree with the district court that B&LE had a reasonable expectation that it would not be liable to the plaintiffs. We thus conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion in failing to award prejudgment interest under Ohio law. [30]

[111] D. The Seventh Amendment Right to a Fair Trial - The Wills Affiliates

Despite a finding of antitrust liability in favor of the Wills affiliates, the damages jury awarded them only nominal damages. Wills asserts that this award results from the trial court's failure to confine the second trial to a calculation of the amount of damage sustained. Instead, complains Wills, B&LE was permitted to retry its liability defense. Because causation elements re-entered the damage phase of the trial, Wills contends that its Seventh Amendment right [*1182] to a fair trial was violated. HN34[] We exercise plenary review when constitutional questions are presented on appeal.

Seventh Amendment problems are inherent when separate juries determine fact of damage and amount of damages. According to the Supreme Court, HN35[] bifurcated trials are permitted only if the separate issues are so distinct that a trial of one without the other may be had without injustice. Gasoline Products Co. v. Champlin Refining Co., 283 U.S. 494, 500, 75 L. Ed. 1188, 51 S. Ct. 513 (1931). HN36[] If "the question of damages . . . is so interwoven with that of liability that the former cannot be submitted to the jury independently of the latter [112] without confusion and uncertainty, [this] would amount to a denial of a fair trial." Id.

Although we have not, in a majority opinion, discussed the Seventh Amendment dilemma posed by bifurcation of an antitrust case, the constitutional concerns have been recognized by our colleagues. See Bonjorno v. Kaiser Aluminum, 752 F.2d at 816 ("Bifurcation of trial resulting in different juries determining liability and damages raises serious questions under the standard set forth by the Supreme Court in Gasoline Products . . . .") (Statement of Adams, J., sur denial of the petition for rehearing en banc.) Also, in Link v. Mercedes-Benz, 550 F.2d 860, 875, the dissenting judge rendered this prescient opinion:

> Admittedly, in an action under § 4 the task of defining which issues are so separate and distinct as to satisfy the test of Gasoline Products is complex. Since liability under § 4 necessarily includes proof of injury to business and property, bifurcation to separate juries of liability and damages in a § 4 case inevitability introduces the possibility that in the liability phase the first jury might find that there [113] was such injury, while the second jury might on the same evidence of injury in the damage phase, find none.

Id. (Gibbons, J., dissenting).

This articulated possibility became reality here.

During the liability phase of the trial, Wills presented evidence to show that its attempts to purchase dock facilities to accommodate self-unloading vessels were continually thwarted by the railroad conspiracy. To demonstrate injury to its business, Wills contended that had it been able to acquire the necessary dock space, its companies would have handled the iron ore unloading and land transport needs of Armco Steel. This loss of Armco's business was the sole evidence of property injury to Wills. Thus, Wills' claims were tied to its ability to serve a specific customer and it was required to show, during the liability phase, that Armco would have used its dock and truck service. This basis of liability was vigorously challenged by B&LE who attempted to show that Armco would not have utilized Wills' services to the extent alleged, if at all.

The liability jury was instructed that to find for all plaintiffs here they must determine that:

> The particular plaintiff . . . was genuinely [114] interested in doing it, it requested the transaction, and was financially able to carry it out . . . . You can't claim to have been damaged unless you were genuinely damaged, [30] B &LE also doubts that an award of prejudgment interest is permissible for damages awarded under Ohio's Valentine Act. Since we are denying the cross-appeal on other grounds, we need not reach this issue.

> and you can't be genuinely damaged unless if the [private docks] [31] had been willing and would have been in a position and would have carried through with the project.

App. at 4998.

After hearing the evidence and the instruction, the liability jury answered "yes" to the following questions concerning B&LE's antitrust liability to Wills:

> Was the agreement, combination or conspiracy a material [115] cause of any injury to the business or property of Wills' Dock Company (Toledo World Terminals, Inc. and its predecessors, Consolidated Dock, Inc. and Consolidated Dock & Storage, Inc.)?

[*1183] Did the injury result from:

> acts in furtherance of the conspiracy, including the refusal to sell or lease dock properties or the refusal to lease or sell dock properties without restrictions, to prevent Wills from engaging in an iron ore business at Toledo, Ohio?
> Was the agreement, combination or conspiracy a material cause of any injury to the business or property of Wills Trucking, Inc. because it was unable to provide a trucking service in combination with Wills' dock service?

App. at 1900.

Since the jury found that Wills had suffered damage to its property by the conspiracy, in order not to violate the Seventh Amendment, the role of the second jury should have been limited to determining the amount of damages Wills incurred from acts taken in furtherance of the conspiracy. Nonetheless the Seventh Amendment prohibition against reexamination of the issue of fact of damage was compromised soon after the damages jury was empaneled. Upon seating the jury, the district court informed [116] it that "the defendant will be entitled to defense on the ground that these damages have not been established or that any damages that they might have suffered stem from causes other than the antitrust conspiracy claim." App. at 5113-14 (emphasis added). This comment, although not starkly objectionable, set the tone for the overlap of causation questions which the damages jury was permitted to hear.

During the course of the damages trials, Wills offered evidence necessary to calculate damages under a lost profits theory. B&LE's key defense witness on damages was Dr. H. W. Pifer, who was also B&LE's primary witness during the liability phase. At the damages trial, Dr. Pifer began to discuss documents relevant to events dated in the mid-1950's, before any plaintiff's damage period began. The court denied an objection to the entry of this evidence. Dr. Pifer then cited to exhibits indicative of potential causes for the plaintiff's damage other than the antitrust conspiracy. At this point the plaintiffs were granted a continuing objection to the use of testimony and documents relevant to causation and fact of damage issues. When the objection was raised, the court responded, "I [117] am not so sure it is limited to impact. Objection overruled. It conceivably might have something to do with the amount." App. at 6041.

After further testimony by Dr. Pifer, the plaintiffs moved for a mistrial or, in the alternative, to strike the testimony of Dr. Pifer because of its direct contradiction to what the prior jury had held. The court, in overruling the objection and denying the mistrial, stated that he would "straighten it out in the charge of the court." App. at 6078.

However, as the following excerpts reveal, the subsequent charge to the jury could not be construed as curative:

> In an antitrust conspiracy case, the law is that each member of the conspiracy is equally responsible for all the damages caused by the entire conspiracy. So that it is not necessary for the plaintiffs to have shown that the [31] We have signified a change from the text which requires some explanation. In the transcript, the word "railroads" appeared where we have bracketed "private docks." We altered the quote because it is obvious from the full context, that the reference was to the dock companies and not the defendant. We are confident, too, that, in hearing the instruction as a whole, the jury understood the court to be discussing the burden of the dock companies.

> Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Company in and of itself caused each and every element of damage that is claimed. All that they had to show was that they were injured as a result of the antitrust conspiracy of which it has been established that the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Company was an active participant.

App. 6355 (emphasis added). And later,

> Now, [118] with respect to the claims of the dock company plaintiffs, the issue is relatively straightforward at least in theory. If they were deprived of the chance to handle iron ore at their private docks, they were deprived of the chance to get into the private dock business for handling iron ore, the question is: When would they have gotten into that business? How much tonnage would they have handled? And what would have been their profit on the tonnage they would have handled?

App. at 6367. Finally, as to nominal damages:

> Now, I mentioned in passing, but I will recapitulate, that the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs in any case which the plaintiffs [*1184] are seeking to recover damages. But once the plaintiffs have established that they did suffer an injury, it is not encumbent upon the plaintiffs to show their damages with mathematical certainty.
> In any case such as this where you are trying to reconstruct what would have happened in the absence of a conspiracy, it is obviously beyond human possibility to know for certain exactly what would have happened. What we are trying to do here is reconstruct in our minds a hypothetical world which would have existed in the absence of [119] this suppression of competition.
> In that situation the law says the plaintiff who has shown injury is not to be faulted because of the inability to prove damages with mathematical precision or with any very great degree of certainty.
> What is required, and the burden is upon the plaintiffs, is to provide you with a reasonable estimate of their damages, what you regard as a reasonably reliable estimate. . . . If you conclude that the plaintiffs have not established a reasonably sound basis on which you can make a rational estimate that is satisfactory to you, you would have the right to say they haven't proven their damages. In that case you would award only nominal damages, a dollar.

App. at 6375-77.

The instructions given concerning the function of the jury at this juncture were confusing. Taken as a whole, and in combination with the court's opening statement and the liability-type evidence which was introduced during the damage phase, the jury could have easily understood that they were to consider causation. Of particular concern is the court's statement that "all that they had to show was that they were injured as a result of the antitrust conspiracy." Although the past [120] tense utilized might indicate that the court was describing the necessary proof in the first trial, since that was not spelled out, the opposite interpretation is just as easily understood - that the plaintiffs were now required to show injury resulting from the antitrust conspiracy. We point also to the language of the court when it explained to the jury how it should determine dock company damages. The district court stated that if the plaintiffs were deprived of the chance to handle iron ore at their private docks, then the jury should proceed to answer further questions. Once again, causation considerations were put before the jury. [32]

[121] Finally, the award of nominal damages to Wills can only be understood if the jury considered causation. The sole injury alleged by Wills was its inability to acquire a private dock and to truck ore for Armco Steel. For the liability jury to return a verdict in its favor can only mean that Wills proved that it was injured, to some extent, by the preclusion from handling Armco's business. The first jury heard both the plaintiffs' case and the defense's evidence concerning the prospects of Wills to serve Armco's transport needs and found in favor of Wills. It impliedly found that, by virtue of the conspiracy, Wills was precluded from making profits by handling at least some of Armco Steel's iron ore. HN37[] Nominal damages are appropriate only when plaintiffs are unable to prove any amount of damages and are not properly awarded when a plaintiff, like Wills, has established a quantifiable loss of revenue.

[32] The district court's clouding of the fact and the amount of damages is exemplified in a portion of its judgment n.o.v. opinion where it observed: "Throughout both phases of the trial, the defendant vehemently argued, and sought to prove, that any damages actually sustained by the plaintiffs were attributable to economic factors other than the alleged conspiracy . . . ." App. at 2129 (emphasis added).

While Wills' calculations as to the quantity of ore it would have handled and the amount of potential profit were certainly challengeable in the damage phase, an award of nominal damages was simply inappropriate.

We note a similarity to our decision in Rea v. Ford Motor Co., 497 F.2d 577 [122] (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 868, 42 L. Ed. 2d 106, 95 S. Ct. 126 (1974). In Rea, an antitrust defendant argued that the trial court erred when at a retrial for damages it refused to allow one defendant to introduce evidence that its acts were not the cause of the plaintiff's [*1185] injury. We rejected the defendant's contention that these elements of causation were really damages issues. "Causation is an element of liability. Our remand left open only the amount of damages, not the fact of damage." Id. at 577.

The admonition of Rea against retrial of causation issues in a damages trial was violated here. Even B&LE does not dispute that it put before the jury facts tending to disprove that its conspiratorial actions were the cause of Wills' injury. This is a clear violation of the Seventh Amendment.

We therefore reverse the order of the district court denying Wills' Seventh Amendment claim and order a retrial of Wills' damage phase case. Because we are reversing on legal grounds, we need not address the other issue raised by Wills - that a new trial is mandated by allegedly objectionable remarks concerning causation presented by defense counsel [123] to the jury during the damages trial.

IV.

At the outset of this opinion, we stated our substantial affirmation of the order of the district court. We conclude here with grateful acknowledgment of the district court's careful analysis and profound scholarship in shepherding the parties and issues through the complexities of the lawsuit.

We will, therefore, affirm all but two aspects of the order of the district court. We will reverse the grant of judgment n.o.v. against National Steel and remand for entry of judgment in its favor. We will also reverse the denial of the Wills' post-trial motions and remand for a new trial limited to a calculation of damages.

[*480] MORRIS SHEPPARD ARNOLD, Circuit Judge.

The events as recounted by the parties are difficult to reconstruct. Nonetheless, what follows is a factual summary that is as accurate as we can make it, given the state of the record submitted to us. Ronald Johnson originally owned three independent but related corporations -- Information Exchange Systems (IXI), IXI Laboratories (Labs), and Qwix Media (Qwix). IXI is a research company and holds various patents related to magnetic tape recording (it was previously a subsidiary of Memorex). Labs is a licensee of IXI and manufactures recording and tape duplication equipment (computer diskettes) using the patents owned by IXI. Qwix puts data onto computer diskettes [*481] using equipment acquired from Labs (essentially, as we understand it, Qwix is a publisher for software originated by others).

In 1984, Labs borrowed money from a predecessor bank of what is now First Bank. The loan was secured by an interest in the assets of Labs. That loan was also later guaranteed by Qwix; the guaranty [2] was secured by an interest in the assets of Qwix. In 1985, Qwix itself borrowed money from a second predecessor bank of what is now

First Bank. Both of these predecessor banks were owned in part by a holding company bank that later merged the predecessor banks into what is now First Bank.

By late 1985 and early 1986, the holding company bank had placed both Labs and Qwix into "workout," which is evidently a state of control by the bank in which the operations of Labs and Qwix were directed, or at least closely supervised, by the bank. Eventually, the bank threatened to foreclose on the collateral for the loan to Labs. The bank gave February 6, 1987, as the deadline for Labs's repayment of the outstanding loan. On that day, however, instead of foreclosing on the collateral, the bank sold the loans of both Labs and Qwix, including the bank's security interests, to two individuals, Ronald Fletcher and Richard McNamara (for the sake of simplicity, F&M). The locks on the buildings holding IXI, Labs, and Qwix were changed on that day, and F&M evidently took physical possession of the buildings and their contents at that time. F&M eventually foreclosed on the collateral for the loans and [3] formed other businesses with the assets of Labs and Qwix obtained through the foreclosure.

In 1991, through two lawsuits that were subsequently consolidated, IXI, Labs, and Qwix sued First Bank in federal court. They asserted federal claims relating to intellectual property (trademarks, copyrights, and patents), antitrust law, racketeering, and unlawful banking practices. They also asserted claims under state statutes and common law. First Bank moved for summary judgment in April and May, 1992. In July, 1992, the trial court granted summary judgment to First Bank on all of the federal claims and declined to exercise jurisdiction over the state claims. The trial court therefore dismissed the federal claims with prejudice and dismissed the state claims without prejudice. The trial court subsequently denied a motion to reconsider. The plaintiffs appeal.

The plaintiffs contend, initially, that summary judgment was inappropriate while discovery was incomplete. The plaintiffs then assert, as to each of the federal claims, that even with the discovery accomplished at the time of the motions for summary judgment, enough evidence was presented to establish the existence of genuine issues of [4] material fact. The plaintiffs apparently do not appeal the trial court's decision to decline jurisdiction over the state claims. We affirm the trial court [1] in all respects.

I.

In its opinion granting summary judgment to First Bank, the trial court noted that although the plaintiffs had argued "that the motions for summary judgment are premature" in view of discovery disputes that had only recently been resolved by a magistrate, the plaintiffs did not "detail what discovery is outstanding or how it relates to the current motions." The trial court declined, therefore, to postpone ruling on the summary judgment motions.

In its opinion denying reconsideration of the ruling on summary judgment, the trial court stated that the plaintiffs "now present detailed materials concerning [the] outstanding discovery … [but] have not shown why these materials were unavailable before" (emphasis added). The trial court further stated [5] that the plaintiffs "have not shown that discovery subsequently produced or requested would be material to the outcome." The trial court therefore rejected the outstanding discovery as a basis for reconsideration of the ruling on summary judgment.

The plaintiffs' responses to the summary judgment motions were not submitted with the record, so we do not know exactly what the plaintiffs said in their briefs about the outstanding discovery. During the hearing [*482] on the summary judgment motions, the only details given to the trial court on that point were that the magistrate had just granted the plaintiffs "access specifically to communications between the bank and [F&M] that we have not previously been given" (emphasis added). (The magistrate's order grants access to communications between the bank or its counsel and F&M or their counsel "regarding any matter relating directly or indirectly" to Labs or Qwix, except for documents constituting work product or protected by attorney-client privilege.) Counsel for the plaintiffs then stated, "Clearly this is too early to be saying that this is all we know or all we can discover about these transactions."

[1] The Honorable Diana E. Murphy, United States District Judge for the District of Minnesota.

Given the vagueness of the plaintiffs' [6] statements to the trial court, and the trial court's own remarks that the briefs "relied heavily upon discovery undertaken in earlier state court actions," we affirm the trial court's refusal to delay ruling on the summary judgment motions. We turn, then, to the merits.

II.

The predicate for all of the plaintiffs' claims is that it was actually First Bank that took over the three businesses on February 6, 1987, and that F&M were only the bank's agents in that takeover, since they did not actually obtain ownership of the outstanding loans, and the concomitant security interests, until nearly two weeks later, when all of the requisite payments were made to the bank and F&M took physical possession of the documents relating to the outstanding loans. As to the intellectual property claims, then, the plaintiffs contend that use of the plaintiffs' trademarks, copyrights, and patents after February 6, 1987, was an infringement by the bank on the plaintiffs' intellectual property rights. The plaintiffs also claim that the bank induced others to infringe the plaintiffs' intellectual property rights. See 15 U.S.C. § 1114(1) (trademarks), 17 U.S.C. § 504 [7] (a) (copyrights), and 35 U.S.C. § 271(a) (patents).

In its opinion granting summary judgment to First Bank on the intellectual property claims, the trial court held that First Bank had conveyed (apparently by assignment) its security interests in the plaintiffs' intellectual property rights to F&M as of February 6, 1987, and therefore that the plaintiffs had failed to establish any genuine issue of material fact relating to the use of those intellectual property rights by the bank itself, rather than by F&M. Construing an "agreement" between the bank and F&M, and finding the language of that document to be unambiguous, the trial court rejected the plaintiffs' argument that the actual transfer of rights occurred at any time except on February 6, 1987. With respect to inducement to infringe, the trial court stated that the plaintiffs had "pointed to no evidence that First Bank had the requisite intent, knowledge, or constructive knowledge" that F&M "would infringe plaintiffs' rights, assuming for present purposes that they did."

The plaintiffs argue on appeal that there was evidence of a request from Mr. Fletcher to the bank after February 6, [8] 1987, for a release of all of the bank's "rights in Labs." The plaintiffs further contend that the "agreement" between the bank and F&M stated that no assignment of the notes would occur until final payment was received; that Mr. McNamara's payment was not received until February 13, 1987; and that the documents relating to the outstanding loans were not delivered to F&M until February 18, 1987. Finally, the plaintiffs contend, the evidence is that it was the bank, and not F&M, that ordered the changing of the locks at the buildings of the three businesses. All of these facts, the plaintiffs assert, allow the factual inference and the legal conclusion that the actual transfer of ownership to F&M took place sometime after February 6, 1987.

It seems to us that the critical evidence is the language in the contract between the bank and F&M. HN1[] If the language is unambiguous, construction of the contract (and, therefore, determination of the effective date of transfer of ownership) is a matter of law. See, e.g., 4 S. Williston, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts § 616 at 649, 651-52 (3d ed. 1961), and 3 A. Corbin, A Comprehensive Treatise on the Rules of Contract Law § 554 [9] at 222-25 (1960).

[*483] The only "agreement" that we could find in the materials originally submitted to us substantiates the trial court's summary of the relevant language and the trial court's finding that the language is unambiguous. (The "agreement" does refer to another document, an "assignment," but that second document was not included with the materials submitted in the record. Upon request by the court at oral argument, counsel for the bank subsequently submitted a document of "assignment," dated February 6, 1987, that declares that the bank "hereby assigns" to F&M the notes in question. The plaintiffs object to the addition of that document to the record. We need not decide whether that document may be added to the record, for we find no inconsistency between the terms of the "agreement" that is undisputedly in the record and the terms of the document of "assignment" subsequently submitted to us.) We see no language in the "agreement" making the transfer of ownership conditional on any subsequent payments by F&M. We therefore affirm the trial court's dismissal of the direct infringement claims.

As to the inducement claim, the plaintiffs argue on appeal that the bank induced F&M [10] to infringe the plaintiffs' intellectual property rights by representing to F&M that F&M could use the trademarks, copyrights, and patents that secured the outstanding loans (the plaintiffs evidently offer this argument regardless of whether F&M are considered to have been the bank's agents or to have acted on their own behalf). The plaintiffs contend that the security interests originally held by the bank did not include the right to use the intellectual property in question; that the bank knew it; that the bank nonetheless told F&M that the intellectual property could be used; that the bank should, therefore, have known that F&M would use that intellectual property; and that F&M did in fact use that intellectual property.

In its opinion granting summary judgment to First Bank, the trial court stated that the plaintiffs made these same assertions at the trial court level "without citation to record evidence." The plaintiffs make no citation to specific evidence in their opening appellate brief, either. The portions of the record cited in the plaintiffs' reply brief, moreover, are inscrutable, ambiguous, or not to the effect ascribed to them. Under these circumstances, we affirm [11] the trial court's dismissal of the inducement claims relating to intellectual property rights.

III.

The gist of the plaintiffs' antitrust claims is that by taking over and then transferring the plaintiffs' businesses to F&M, First Bank reduced competition and restrained trade in, and attempted or conspired to monopolize, the marketplace for diskettes and their duplication. See 15 U.S.C. § 1, § 2, § 15(a), § 18. Qwix also alleges that by requiring it to guarantee the loan to Labs, to secure that guarantee with Qwix's assets, and to submit to bank supervision through "workout," all as a condition of continued credit for Qwix itself, First Bank conspired to restrain trade (in the diskette duplication marketplace, evidently, by increasing Qwix's operating costs compared to those of other diskette duplication businesses; the effect on competition in the banking industry is addressed through Qwix's claim with respect to unlawful banking practices). See 15 U.S.C. § 1, § 15(a).

In its opinion granting summary judgment to First Bank, the trial court stated that the plaintiffs had "not shown how competition was suppressed [12] through the actions of First Bank. They fail to define the relevant market, the nature of competition in that market, or any share of the market which F&M may have had before February 6, 1987." The trial court further declared that the plaintiffs' allegations of "loss due to First Bank's assignment of its security interests in their property, and the assignees' subsequent foreclosure," state no antitrust claim. (This declaration implies, we believe, that while the plaintiffs may have been injured by the acts of First Bank, the injuries were not of a nature actionable under the antitrust laws. See, e.g., Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Sales, Inc. v. Avondale Shipyards, Inc., 677 F.2d 1045, 1056 (5th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1105, 74 L. Ed. 2d 953, 103 S. Ct. 729 (1983).) As far as we can tell, the trial court's opinion on summary judgment did not [*484] address the antitrust allegations, made only by Qwix, in relation to the requirements placed upon it by the bank as a condition of continued credit.

In their appellate brief, the plaintiffs state that competition was ultimately reduced in the marketplace for diskettes and their duplication, first, [13] because of the takeover of the plaintiffs' businesses by F&M's diskette duplication businesses subsequent to First Bank's takeover of the plaintiffs' businesses, and, second, because of the eventual merger of the plaintiffs' businesses with "long-time competitor MST." Both of those arguments are foreclosed by the determination that F&M, and not the bank, owned the outstanding loans (and the securing collateral) on February 6, 1987. It is undisputed that F&M's own businesses were incorporated after that date. Any subsequent merger, therefore, by F&M of their businesses with the plaintiffs' businesses, and eventually with MST, would be an act by F&M, not the bank. We therefore affirm the trial court's dismissal of the antitrust claims related to the marketplace for diskettes and their duplication.

The trial court did not specifically address the antitrust allegations, made only by Qwix, in relation to the requirements placed upon it by the bank as a condition of continued credit. We hold, however, that those claims are barred by the statute of limitations. HN2[] The limitations period for suits under the antitrust laws is four years. See 15 U.S.C. § 15b. [14] HN3[] A cause of action accrues under the antitrust laws when the defendant commits an act that injures the plaintiff's business. See, e.g., Kaiser Aluminum, 677 F.2d at 1051. In the context of banking practices that restrict a plaintiff's options and thus increase its operating costs (so-called tying arrangements), the injury to competition occurs when the alleged tying arrangement is imposed. Id. at 1056.

It is not clear when the arrangements complained of here occurred, but it has to have been before February, 1987, when the bank sold the loans, and their securing collateral, to F&M. Qwix sued the bank in July, 1991, more than four years after February, 1987. The antitrust claims based on the requirements placed on Qwix as a condition of continued credit, then, are barred unless the bank fraudulently concealed its activities from Qwix. See, e.g., Kansas City, Missouri v. Federal Pacific Electric Co., 310 F.2d 271, 284 (8th Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 912, 9 L. Ed. 2d 171, 83 S. Ct. 256 (1962), 373 U.S. 914, 83 S. Ct. 1297, 10 L. Ed. 2d 415 (1963).

We see no application of the fraudulent concealment [15] doctrine in the context of the antitrust claims related to the requirements imposed on Qwix as a condition of continued credit. Certainly Qwix knew of those requirements at the time they were imposed. We do not find persuasive Qwix's argument (actually made in the context of its claim with respect to unlawful banking practices) that First Bank's refusal to release certain documents amounts to fraudulent concealment of the "'facts that are the basis of [Qwix's] cause of action,'" Berkson v. Del Monte Corp., 743 F.2d 53, 55 (1st Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1056, 84 L. Ed. 2d 826, 105 S. Ct. 1765 (1985), quoting Dayco Corp. v. Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co., 523 F.2d 389, 394 (6th Cir. 1975). Those documents may have provided evidentiary proof of facts to be asserted by Qwix in court, but the actual facts themselves, related to the conditions imposed, were known by Qwix as of the time those requirements were placed upon it as a condition of continued credit. Since the statute of limitations was not tolled by fraudulent concealment, the limitations period expired at the latest in February, 1991, well before Qwix sued. We therefore [16] affirm the trial court's dismissal of the antitrust claims related to the requirements imposed on Qwix as a condition of continued credit.

IV.

The essence of the plaintiffs' racketeering claims is threefold -- that First Bank made false representations by mail and by phone (mail fraud and wire fraud), first, between 1985 and 1987, to obtain control of Qwix and Labs and, second, as of February 6, 1987, to defraud Qwix and Labs by leading others to believe that the businesses operated by F&M after that date were the same as those operated before then by Ronald Johnson and [*485] his associates; and that between 1985 and the present, First Bank conspired with F&M to obtain control of and to defraud Qwix and Labs. See 18 U.S.C. § 1962(b), § 1962(c), § 1962(d).

In its opinion granting summary judgment to First Bank, the trial court concluded that "there is no indication in the record that the actions of First Bank prior to the various negotiations involving [F&M] were related as defined under RICO." Drawing on that conclusion, the trial court stated that the "relevant related conduct" began in December, 1986, and ended on February 6, 1987. The trial [17] court stated further that the few acts "taken by First Bank after that date were ministerial in nature, transferring various documents and performing official tasks necessitated by the February 6 agreement." The trial court held, accordingly, that because "the alleged related acts occurred within a short period of time, … with no evidence of the threat of any future criminal activity by First Bank," the plaintiffs "are unable to sustain an essential element of their RICO claims" (the pattern requirement).

We construe the trial court's opinion as drawing three separate legal conclusions -- first, that the acts of First Bank prior to its involvement with F&M were not sufficiently "related" to be considered part of a racketeering scheme; second, that the acts of First Bank after February 6, 1987, neither amount to nor pose a threat of "continued criminal activity"; and, third, that any conspiracy between First Bank and F&M was of such short duration that it could not support the statutory requirement of a "pattern" of racketeering activity. See, e.g., H.J. Inc. v. Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., 492 U.S. 229, 232, 239-43, 106 L. Ed. 2d 195, 109 S. Ct. 2893 (1989). We agree with [18] all of those conclusions.

On appeal, the plaintiffs argue that First Bank engaged in a scheme between 1985 and 1987 to take over the plaintiffs' businesses and furthered that scheme by mail and by phone. See 18 U.S.C. § 1962(b). They cite no specific evidence, however, of motive for such a scheme, particular communications, how those communications were fraudulent, or how those communications furthered the alleged scheme. Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate both the requisite predicate acts and the requisite relatedness of those acts. See, e.g., Manion v. Freund, 967 F.2d 1183, 1186 (8th Cir. 1992). We therefore affirm the trial court's dismissal of the non-conspiracy racketeering claims involving the acts of First Bank between 1985 and 1987.

As to the acts of First Bank after February 6, 1987, the plaintiffs argue that the bank has continued to participate in conducting the business affairs of the plaintiffs' businesses. See 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c). The only specific evidence the plaintiffs offer, however, is that First Bank retains [19] an interest in the proceeds from any eventual sale of the intellectual property rights at issue, and that First Bank has given F&M "further advice on how to use" the plaintiffs' businesses. The plaintiffs point to nothing that we can see that shows how a retained interest in the intellectual property rights amounts to participation in the conduct of the plaintiffs' businesses' affairs. Nor do they offer any examples of the alleged "further advice" given to F&M. Under these circumstances, we agree that no genuine issue of material fact exists on the question of threatened continued criminal activity by First Bank (separate from a conspiracy with F&M) after February 6, 1987. See, e.g., Lange v. Hocker, 940 F.2d 359, 362 (8th Cir. 1991). We therefore affirm the trial court's dismissal of the non-conspiracy racketeering claims involving the acts of First Bank after February 6, 1987.

Finally, it is apparently undisputed that communications between First Bank and F&M began no earlier than late 1986. Since even the plaintiffs acknowledge that by March, 1987, F&M had ownership of the loans, and their securing collateral, we agree that any alleged conspiracy, [20] see 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d), could not have lasted longer than three or four months. Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs have failed to establish a conspiracy of sufficient duration to sustain a racketeering claim. See, e.g., Primary Care Investors, Seven, Inc. v. PHP Healthcare [*486] Corp., 986 F.2d 1208, 1215-16 (8th Cir. 1993); see also Lange, 940 F.2d at 361, and Terry A. Lambert Plumbing, Inc. v. Western Security Bank, 934 F.2d 976, 981 (8th Cir. 1991). We therefore affirm the trial court's dismissal of the conspiracy-related racketeering claims.

V.

With respect to unlawful banking practices, Qwix is the only plaintiff that makes a claim. The import of that claim is that by requiring Qwix to guarantee the loan to Labs, to secure that guarantee with Qwix's assets, and to submit to bank supervision through "workout," all as a condition of continued credit to Qwix itself, First Bank committed acts prohibited by the federal banking statutes. See 12 U.S.C. § 1972(1), § 1975.

In its opinion granting summary [21] judgment to First Bank, the trial court dismissed that claim as barred by the four-year statute of limitations, see 12 U.S.C. § 1977(1). The trial court rejected Qwix's argument that First Bank's refusal to release certain documents amounted to fraudulent concealment of facts related to that claim, finding instead that all of the fraudulent concealment alleged by Qwix was in relation to the bank's transactions with F&M and not to the conditions placed upon Qwix. On appeal, Qwix argues that documents related to the conditions placed upon it were withheld by First Bank and therefore that the bank did engage in fraudulent concealment related to the unlawful conduct. We disagree.

HN4[] A cause of action under the statute at issue accrues when the bank commits the unlawful conduct. See, e.g., Lancianese v. Bank of Mount Hope, 783 F.2d 467, 470 (4th Cir. 1986). All of the bank's acts in that regard had to have occurred before February 6, 1987, when the bank sold the loans, and their securing collateral, to F&M. Qwix did not file its complaint until July, 1991, more than four years later.

Even though First Bank may [22] have withheld the relevant documents, we have no question that Qwix was aware of the requirements imposed on it at the time they were imposed. See, e.g., Jackson v. Union National Bank, 715 F. Supp. 892, 896 (C.D. Ill. 1989). Under these circumstances, we do not find persuasive Qwix's argument that the statute of limitations should be tolled in regard to the alleged unlawful banking practices. We therefore affirm the trial court's dismissal of the unlawful banking practices claims.

VI.

For the reasons stated, we affirm the judgment of the trial court.

In this the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, an applicant for a preliminary injunction must show that it is likely to suffer irreparable harm if equitable relief is denied. The Second Circuit consistently holds that perhaps the single most important prerequisite for the issuance of a preliminary injunction is a demonstration that if it is not granted the applicant is likely to suffer irreparable harm before a decision on the merits can be rendered. An antitrust plaintiff must make the same showing of irreparable harm as any other plaintiff. The Clayton Act requires a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate.

Each of the activities which § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, seeks to proscribe has its own elements. Attempted monopolization has three elements: (1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anti-competitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.

HN10[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Courts tolerate the existence of monopoly power only insofar as necessary to preserve competitive incentives and to be fair to the firm that has attained its position innocently. There is no reason to allow the exercise of such power to the detriment of competition, in either the controlled market or any other. That the competition in the leveraged market may not be destroyed but merely distorted does not make it more palatable. Accordingly, the use of monopoly power attained in one market to gain a competitive advantage in another is a violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, even if there is no attempt to monopolize the second market. It is the use of economic power that creates the liability.

A Sherman Act claim is stated both where a company leverages power in one market to create monopoly in another, and where a company uses monopoly power in one market to impede competition in another, whether or not it attempts to monopolize the second market, with resulting tangible harm to competition.

HN15[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

It is well established that § 1 of the Sherman Act does not render illegal every contract that in any way restrains trade, but rather only those contracts which effect an unreasonable restraint of trade. The courts have formulated two analytical approaches to determining when a restraint on trade is unreasonable: the per se test, and the "rule of reason" test. The basic difference between the two approaches lies in the extent to which a court must examine the actual effect on competition which an allegedly anti-competitive business practice has. Under the rule of reason test, the court must determine the competitive impact of a particular practice in the context of a relevant market. Under the per se rule, a court does not conduct this extensive inquiry, because the practice in question has been held to be manifestly anti-competitive.

HN16[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

Under certain conditions, tie-ins are per se unreasonable restraints of trade under the antitrust laws. The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. When such "forcing" is present, competition on the merits for the tied item is restrained and the Sherman Act is violated.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN17[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

The packaging or tying of different products is only condemned when the firm possesses enough market power in the tying product to force the purchaser to buy the tied product. Furthermore, where the purchaser is free to buy the items separately, no tie-in exists. The elements of an illegal tie-in arrangement have been consistently stated by the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit as the following: (1) a tying and a tied product; (2) evidence of actual coercion by the seller forcing the buyer to accept the tied product; (3) sufficient economic power in the tying market to coerce purchaser acceptance of the tied product; (4) anticompetitive effects in the market for the tied product; and (5) the involvement of a "not insubstantial" amount of interstate commerce in the tied product.

By Order dated May 26, 1993, this Court denied a preliminary injunction and briefly deferred the filing of this Opinion to enable the parties to examine the Opinion for the sole purpose of advising the Court if any material contained herein is regarded as being confidential. In this Opinion we have set forth our reasons for the denial of preliminary injunctive relief.

This case is before the Court on a motion by plaintiff, Ortho Diagnostic Systems, Inc. ("Ortho") for a preliminary injunction, seeking to enjoin implementation of a contract entered into between defendant Abbott Laboratories, Inc. ("Abbott") and the Council of Community Blood Centers ("CCBC") on the [2] ground that the contract violates various provisions of the antitrust laws. Because we find that plaintiff has not demonstrated a likelihood that it will suffer irreparable harm if the contract is not enjoined, we must deny the preliminary injunction. However, in recognition of the significant interests at stake, both private and public, we have set a date for trial on the merits of November 15, 1993.

Procedural Background

Plaintiff filed its complaint on April 22, 1993. On April 23, 1993, this Court signed an order to show cause in which plaintiff requested expedited discovery and a hearing on the preliminary injunction. The Court heard argument on the order to show cause on April 27, 1993, and granted the motion, providing for certain limited expedited discovery. At that argument, the Court scheduled a hearing on the preliminary injunction for May 20 and 21, 1993. On April 30, 1993, the Court heard argument on a motion by defendant to transfer the case to the Northern District of Illinois. That motion was denied. On May 21, 1993 the Court heard oral argument regarding the issuance of a preliminary injunction. We have taken all care to resolve the issue before the effective [3] date of the contract, which is June 1, 1993, and our decision follows.

Factual Background

HN1[] Findings of fact and conclusions of law made by the Court at the preliminary injunction stage of a case are not binding at trial on the merits. University of Texas v. Camenisch, 451 U.S. 390, 395, 68 L. Ed. 2d 175, 101 S. Ct. 1830 (1981). The following facts are those which we find have been demonstrated by the submissions of the parties and during the hearing for the purpose of determining the propriety of a preliminary injunction only.

Plaintiff Ortho is a New Jersey corporation having its principal place of business in New Jersey and is a wholly owned subsidiary of Johnson & Johnson. Defendant Abbott is an Illinois corporation having its principal place of business in Illinois and licensed to do business in New York.

Both Ortho and Abbott sell blood screening tests used by blood donor centers ("BDCs") and plasma centers [1] to ensure the purity of blood collected across the country. [2] There are five tests which are used by BDCs to screen

[1] Ortho is also involved in the "diagnostic" market, which is composed of hospitals, commercial laboratories and other facilities which test blood to diagnose disease. The diagnostic market is not implicated in this lawsuit, but Ortho's role in that market is a factor which increases the improbability of Ortho exiting the blood-screening market as a result of the CCBC contract.

each unit of blood donated for transfusion: (1) HBsAg tests for hepatitis B surface antigens; (2) HIV 1/2 tests for two strains of the HIV AIDS virus; [4] (3) Anti-core is a further test for hepatitis B; (4) HTLV tests for a form of leukemia; and (5) HCV tests for hepatitis C. These tests are not interchangeable; each must be performed on every unit of blood collected. Plasma centers usually provide blood components, rather than whole blood, to hospitals and industry. [*148] Plasma centers use three of these five tests, specifically the HCV, HBsAg, and HIV 1/2 tests. Abbott and Ortho use different technologies to perform the test which are incompatible with each other; Abbott uses a "bead" technology, and Ortho uses a "micro-plate" technology.

[5] In addition to the tests, many BDCs use a computer software data management system to record and correlate the results of the thousands of individual units of blood tested daily. Abbott's proprietary data management system, upon which many BDCs depend, is known as "DMS". The American Red Cross ("ARC") owns the DMS system outright. Other BDCs which use DMS must obtain it from Abbott. Some large BDCs have developed their own data management systems, and therefore do not use DMS at all. Abbott estimates that 23.7 percent of the screening tests performed each year by BDCs and plasma centers are processed by Abbott-owned DMS systems. (Bryant Decl. at P 17). Ortho is in the process of developing a comparable computer software system, "LOMS", which is currently undergoing field testing.

Four companies sell the blood screening tests in the United States. Only Abbott sells all five of the blood screening tests. Ortho sells HCV, HBsAg and Anti-core. Ortho also offers an HTLV test, but it has not gained acceptance in the market. Ortho currently has applications pending for FDA approval of both an improved HTLV test, and an HIV 1/2 test. Ortho's internal estimates indicate that the [6] HTLV test could gain approval by as early as June of this year (Michels Dep. at 35) and the HIV 1/2 test could gain approval by the second half of 1993 (Michels Dep. at 33). Abbott's and Ortho's only other competitors have a negligible share of the market and therefore do not play a part in this lawsuit.

BDCs and plasma centers together collect approximately 25 million units of blood annually. BDCs collect blood from volunteer donors and screen approximately 13 million units of blood annually. The BDC customer group includes the American Red Cross, which tests approximately 50 percent of these 13 million units; the CCBC, an association of approximately 55 BDCs which together accounts for approximately 35 to 40 percent, or approximately 5 million units, of the blood collected and tested; and unaffiliated BDCs which account for the balance of the blood collected.

Abbott and Ortho differ on whether the relevant customer market is the BDCs alone or the BDCs and the plasma centers taken together. However, it is clear that Abbott holds a predominant share of the market, defined either way, in four out of five of the tests. For example, Abbott's unit and dollar market shares of sales [7] to BDCs in 1992 were approximately as follows:

Product	Units	Dollars
HTLV	91%	90%
HIV	86%	87%
HBsAg	75%	73%
Anti-core	70%	69%
HCV	21%	20%

[2] Both companies also compete in the international market, but there is no dispute that the relevant geographic market for purposes of this lawsuit is the United States. We note the participation in the international market because it casts doubt on Ortho's claim that it will greatly reduce its expenditures for research and development if the contract at issue here takes effect.

This market power is reinforced by high barriers to entry into the market for blood screening tests, including the high costs of research and development, and the expense of acquiring patents, maintaining a large sales and technical support staff and obtaining FDA approvals.

The Contract

At the core of this action is a contract which Abbott signed in April, 1993 with the CCBC. This group purchasing agreement is intended to govern the prices of Abbott's blood screening assays for the next three years, and goes into effect on June 1, 1993. The individual BDCs have the choice of whether to sign on to the master contract, or to negotiate individual deals. According to Abbott's U.S. Marketing Manager, not all of the CCBC's members participate in group purchasing agreements. Only about 30 out of the 55 or so CCBC members, or about 60 percent, participated in the prior group agreement with Abbott which expires on May 31, 1993 (Bryant Decl. at P 4). The CCBC collects a 1.5 percent commission on all sales [8] under its master agreements, the proceeds of which it uses to run programs and provide services for its members.

[*149] In the fall of 1992, the CCBC formed a negotiating team for the purpose of negotiating a new long-term group purchasing agreement. The CCBC negotiators met separately with both Abbott and Ortho in the fall of 1992, and then submitted a "request for proposal" ("RFP") to both companies. The RFP asked both companies to submit bids that included prices for various combinations of the tests, including a five-assay package, as well as prices for each test individually. The RFP also requested prices which included data management software, and prices for the software separately.

Although the Court was presented with a great deal of deposition testimony on the bidding process, it is sufficient to note that both companies competed for the CCBC contract, providing pricing for all five tests and software and for various other combinations. [3] After lengthy negotiations and submission of supplemental proposals, the negotiating team forwarded its recommendation of the Abbott proposal to the CCBC Group Purchasing Subcommittee, which ultimately decided to recommend the proposal to [9] the CCBC members.

Ortho alleges that Abbott's contract with the CCBC is designed to foreclose Ortho from competing with Abbott for the next three years. Abbott has accomplished this, Ortho alleges, by devising a pricing scheme which would in effect force any rational buyer to purchase all five tests from Abbott, even though the buyer might rather purchase one or more tests from Ortho or one of the other competing companies.

The pricing structure which would go into effect according to the CCBC contract is as follows:

CCBC members who agree to purchase all five tests exclusively from Abbott pay the following:

Test	Price
HBsAg	0.66
Anti-core	0.85
HIV-1/2	1.93
HCV	2.90
Total	7.37

[10]

Also included in this package is the DMS system.

CCBC members who agree to purchase four tests from Abbott must pay:

Test	Price w/DMS	Price w/o DMS
HBsAg	0.81	0.72

[3] In its five-assay package, Ortho offered its own HTLV test, which is not generally accepted on the market, and an HIV 1/2 test manufactured by Genetic Systems (one of the two smaller competitors). Ortho also offered its LOMS computer software system, although Ortho alleges that the CCBC understood that the system was not yet ready to be implemented.

Test	Price w/DMS	Price w/o DMS
Anti-core	1.14	1.05
HTLV	1.18	1.09
HIV-1/2	2.08	1.99
HCV	2.90	2.90
Total	8.11	7.75

CCBC members who agree to buy three or less tests from Abbott pay according to the following schedule, and DMS is not included with purchase of three of fewer assays:

Test	Price
HBsAg	1.20
Anti-core	1.25
HIV-1/2	2.47
Total	10.02

Plaintiff provides a number of examples of how the pricing structure allegedly will exclude Ortho from selling to CCBC members. Plaintiff alleges that Abbott has exploited the fact that the great majority of purchasers buy the Abbott HTLV and HIV-1/2 tests, and has used price penalties to force purchasers to buy the other three tests from Abbott as well. A few of the examples are set out in the footnote. [4]

[11] [*150] In addition to this pricing structure, the CCBC contract contains what plaintiff has referred to as a "bridge" clause. This clause provides that if a competing company develops a new test, a customer may switch over from Abbott only until that time when Abbott develops a comparable test approved by the FDA. This provision was included as a response to the BDCs' concerns that if a new or improved test were to be developed in the micro-plate technology, the centers might be locked in to the Abbott contract and not be able to use the new test, or might be charged a prohibitive price by the company offering the new test. The provision allows a BDC to switch to the other technology with Abbott picking up the cost of the switch and any increased cost of the new test, as long as the customer agrees to switch back when Abbott has developed a comparable new or improved test in the bead technology. Ortho alleges that this provision improperly limits Abbott's competitors to short-term profits from technological gains and would therefore have an adverse effect on research and development.

The third feature of the master contract with which Ortho takes issue is the alleged tie-in of the DMS [12] system to the tests. Ortho argues, in essence, that by refusing to quote a price on DMS for BDCs who wish to purchase less than four assays from Abbott, Abbott has effectively made it impossible for many BDCs to purchase tests from Ortho because the BDCs are dependent on the DMS system. In response, Abbott argues that it will negotiate individual deals with BDCs who enter contracts for three assays or less with a high enough volume to warrant inclusion of DMS in the deal.

Finally, Ortho has alleged that Abbott intends to enter into a contract with the American Red Cross during the next few months, which will impose similar arrangements on another 50 percent of the BDC market. If this happens, Ortho alleges, Abbott will have effectively forced Ortho out of the market for blood screening tests entirely. Abbott argues that there is no evidence that Abbott will be able to enter into a similar contract with the ARC when that [4] If a customer wishes to buy Abbott's HTLV and HIV-1/2 together with its HCV, the price for the three would cost 7.57, while its price for all five of the tests would be 7.37, including the DMS system which is not available with the three assay package. Therefore, in order to sell the remaining two tests at a competitive price, Ortho alleges it would have to give the two tests away, plus give the customer a .20 cent rebate and a free data management software system, which it does not have at this time.

While perhaps not as dramatic as that example, other combinations of tests produce similar pricing effects. For example, if a customer were to buy all the tests except the HBsAg test from Abbott, the price for the Abbott tests would be $ 7.30. Therefore, to meet the price of the Abbott five-test package, $ 7.37, Ortho alleges it would have to offer the HBsAg test for 0.7 cents.

contract expires at the end of this year. First of all, Abbott argues that by that time, Ortho will likely have FDA approval of the HIV and enhanced HTLV tests, and will therefore be in a better position to offer a more competitive five-assay deal to the ARC. [13] Secondly, Abbott argues that any alleged leveraging of the DMS system cannot be part of a deal with the ARC, since the ARC already owns the DMS system.

Discussion

HN2[] A preliminary injunction is appropriate on "'a showing of (a) irreparable harm and (b) either (1) likelihood of success on the merits or (2) sufficiently serious questions going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation and a balance of hardships tipping decidedly towards the party requesting the preliminary relief.'" Savage v. Gorski, 850 F.2d 64, 67 (2d Cir. 1988) (quoting Jackson Dairy, Inc. v. H.P. Hood & Sons, Inc., 596 F.2d 70, 72 (2d Cir. 1979)).

A. Irreparable Injury:

HN3[] In this Circuit, an applicant for a preliminary injunction must show that "it is likely to suffer irreparable harm if equitable relief is denied." JSG Trading Corp. v. Tray-Wrap, Inc., 917 F.2d 75, 79 (2d Cir. 1990). The Second Circuit has consistently held that "perhaps the single most important prerequisite for the issuance of a preliminary injunction is a demonstration that if it is not granted the applicant is likely to suffer irreparable [14] harm before a decision on the merits can be rendered." Bell & Howell: Mamiya Co. v. Masel Supply Co., 719 F.2d 42, 45 (2d Cir. 1983). An antitrust plaintiff must make the same showing of irreparable harm as any other plaintiff. See Jack Kahn Music Co. v. Baldwin Piano & Organ, 604 F.2d 755, 759 (Clayton Act "requires 'a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate.'").

We find that plaintiff has not satisfied its burden of demonstrating that it is likely to suffer irreparable injury if this Court does [*151] not enjoin the CCBC contract. We have reached this conclusion based on a number of factors, which we will discuss in turn.

Abbott argues that even if plaintiff proves its antitrust claims, its only damages will be the loss of customers, an injury which can be fully compensated by monetary relief. HN4[] It is well settled in this Circuit that "irreparable injury means injury for which a monetary award cannot be adequate compensation, and that where money damages is adequate compensation a preliminary injunction will not issue." Jackson Dairy, Inc. v. H.P. Hood & Sons, 596 F.2d 70, 72 (2d Cir. 1979). [15]

We agree with Abbott's characterization. Assuming Ortho can prove liability, it appears to this Court that Ortho's losses, if any, can be compensated by money damages. Plaintiff will be able to demonstrate which customers switched from Ortho to Abbott, and the amount of revenues foregone from that loss of business. Ortho argues that it will not be able to prove lost opportunity; i.e. those customers which it might have been able to sign had Abbott's illegal pricing scheme not been in effect. However, while such damages may be difficult to prove, that difficulty is not insurmountable. Furthermore, the availability of treble damages under the antitrust laws might well counteract this perceived problem.

Abbott further argues that because Ortho is a very successful corporation, which sells many other products aside from the blood-screening tests, and moreover is a subsidiary of Johnson & Johnson, it can sustain any loss of business which might occur. Abbott thereby distinguishes the cases cited by Ortho in its papers, which involve the destruction of "mom and pop" businesses. Roso-Lino Beverage Dist., Inc. v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 749 F.2d 124, 125-26 (2d Cir. 1984); [16] Semmes Motors, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 429 F.2d 1197, 1205 (2d Cir. 1970).

Again, we find Abbott's position persuasive. Ortho has not presented credible evidence that it will be forced out of the U.S. blood screening business if the CCBC contract is not enjoined. This is a highly volatile market, and too many variables are in flux to make it likely that Ortho would suddenly drop out of the running. We believe that much of Ortho's argument was premised on the misconception that it could be many years before a trial on the merits. [5] However, we have set a date of November 15, 1993 for trial, and therefore the relevant question is whether plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury between today and November 15, 1993, six months from now.

[17] Most importantly in this regard, a large portion of Ortho's existing business with CCBC is secured by long-term contracts which do not expire until July, 1994 at the earliest (Michels Dep., Exh. 13). These sales will continue regardless of the new master agreement, and well beyond the date set for trial on the merits. The continuation of this business makes it quite unlikely that Ortho will drastically cut its sales staff, research and development, or support services in the coming months. As noted above, Ortho's participation in the diagnostic market, which uses some of these same blood-screening tests as well as others which Ortho manufactures, also leads us to the conclusion that Ortho will not disappear from this market overnight.

Additionally, in order to prevail on the irreparable injury prong of the test, Ortho would have had to convince the Court that the difficulty and costs of switching between the two technologies was so burdensome, that once the BDCs switched to the Abbott technology on June 1, 1993 they would be lost to Ortho. Plaintiff however failed to provide any estimate of the time or cost involved in switching between the two technologies. Although some deponents [18] testified that switching would be disruptive, Mr. MacPherson, the Executive Director of the CCBC, testified that many centers told him that "they didn't see it as a big deal to go to [*152] make two technology switches if you were going back to a system that you were already comfortable with." (MacPherson Dep. at 120) Therefore, the mere fact that some centers will have switched to the bead technology as of June 1, 1993 does not mean that Ortho necessarily will lose the customer base if the preliminary injunction does not issue.

Various other factors also make it unlikely that Ortho will suffer irreparable harm during this time frame. Ortho's allegation that Abbott will sign a similar master agreement with the ARC in the near future, closing Ortho out of 50 percent of the BDC market, is not supported by the evidence thus far. The ARC contract does not expire until the end of 1993; again, this is after the date set for trial on the merits. Furthermore, by the end of 1993, Ortho may very well have FDA approval for the HIV and enhanced HTLV tests, placing Ortho in a different position to compete with Abbott by its ability to offer a five-assay package. As noted above, the "leverage" which [19] Abbott allegedly enjoys by virtue of DMS has no impact on the ARC, which already owns the program.

Ortho's proximity to developing a comparable data management system, LOMS, is another factor which weighs against a finding of irreparable injury. If Ortho is successful in this regard, it will be able to compete for much of the business which Abbott allegedly controls because of the BDCs' dependence on DMS. It is implausible that Ortho would cease its efforts in this market when it is possibly so close to achieving true competitive status.

For all the foregoing reasons, we find that plaintiff has not met its burden of demonstrating that it is likely to suffer irreparable harm if this Court does not enjoin the CCBC contract. Ortho's reliance on the Seventh Circuit's decision in General Leaseways, Inc. v. National Truck Leasing Ass'n, 744 F.2d 588, 591 (7th Cir. 1984) is misplaced. That circuit does not require a showing of irreparable harm, but instead engages in an analysis of the relative harms that each side would suffer from the grant or denial of an injunction. It is by no means clear that Ortho would prevail even upon that analysis, but in any [20] event, it is inapplicable.

Because Ortho has not met the threshold burden of proving irreparable injury, the first prong of the test for a preliminary injunction, we do not need to address the second prong of the test, namely whether Ortho has demonstrated likelihood of success on the merits or sufficiently serious questions going to the merits to warrant litigation and a balance of the hardships tipping in its favor. However, because courts have considered the interrelationship between the two prongs, we note briefly our views on the question of likelihood of success on the merits. See Kahn, 604 F.2d at 759:

B. Likelihood of Success on the Merits/ Serious Questions Going to the Merits:

Ortho's claims fall [21] into two categories: (1) claims that Abbott is abusing its monopoly power or attempting to monopolize through monopoly leveraging, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act; and (2) claims that Abbott's price structure and/or use of DMS are effectively illegal tying arrangements in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act, and New York General Business Law § 340. We find that on the state of the record thus far, plaintiff has demonstrated serious questions going to merits on both categories of claims, but has not shown likelihood of success.

(1) Monopoly Leveraging:

Section 2 of the Sherman Act makes it unlawful to HN6[] "monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 2.

[*153] HN7[] Each of the activities which Section 2 seeks to proscribe has its own elements. Unlawful monopolization has two elements: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development [22] as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-571, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966). Attempted monopolization has three elements: "(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anti-competitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247, 113 S. Ct. 884, 890-891 (1993).

Although monopolization and attempted monopolization are separate offenses under the antitrust law, and Ortho alleges that Abbott has committed both, the allegations can be reduced to essentially one theory. Ortho alleges that Abbott has leveraged its lawfully gained monopoly power in the HTLV and HIV markets to unlawfully monopolize or attempt to monopolize the markets in the other three tests through an anti-competitive pricing scheme which forces purchasers to buy all five tests from Abbott. In the same vein, Ortho alleges that Abbott is leveraging its monopoly power in DMS by refusing to offer DMS to purchasers who wish to buy three or fewer tests.

Turning briefly to the DMS question [23] first, there are a number of facts which have not been established but which may make plaintiff's case difficult to prove. First of all, because the ARC owns DMS outright, it is probably inappropriate to include the ARC in an estimate of Abbott's market power in DMS. Therefore, it is unclear whether Abbott actually possesses the requisite market power to sustain a leveraging claim. Secondly, the parties dispute whether Abbott has actually refused to offer DMS to customers purchasing fewer than four tests. However, Abbott's bundling of the DMS program with its four and five assay packages does raise a serious question going to the merits of the claim to make it a fair ground for litigation.

The heart of plaintiff's leveraging claims revolves around Abbott's pricing structure. It is clear that Abbott satisfies the first element of a monopolization claim, monopoly power, because Abbott has 90 percent of the market share in HTLV, and 87 percent of the market share in HIV. It is a closer call whether Abbott enjoys monopoly power in the HBsAg and Anti-core markets, where Abbott's market share is approximately 70 percent. [6] HN8[] Courts routinely

[6] For the purposes of this motion, we have concluded that it is inappropriate to exclude the ARC from the calculation of market share, as Abbott would have the Court do. The only reason offered for such exclusion is that the ARC contract will be expiring at the end of the year. By that logic, we should include an estimate of the new market share which Abbott will enjoy by virtue of the new CCBC master contract. Rather than engage in such speculation, we prefer to assess market share as it exists at this point in time.

find monopoly power where the market share [24] is greater than 70 percent. See Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571 (87 percent of the market constituted monopoly); Hiland Dairy, Inc. v. Kroger Co., 402 F.2d 968, 974 & n.6 (8th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 961, 23 L. Ed. 2d 748, 89 S. Ct. 2096 (1969) (surveying cases and noting that percentages greater than 70 percent generally are found to constitute monopoly power.)

The critical question therefore becomes whether Abbott has abused its [25] monopoly power in HTLV and HIV either to maintain monopoly power in those markets and the Anti-core and HBsAg tests or to attempt to attain monopoly power in those tests, and, in the case of attempted monopolization, whether there is a dangerous probability of success.

Ortho alleges that the type of anti-competitive behavior in which Abbott is engaging is monopoly leveraging. Monopoly leveraging is where a party uses its monopoly power in one market to distort or affect competition in another market. The Supreme Court has explained that HN9[] "the use of monopoly power, however lawfully acquired, to foreclose competition, to gain a competitive advantage, or to destroy a competitor, is unlawful." United States v. Griffith, 334 U.S. 100, 107, [*154] 92 L. Ed. 1236, 68 S. Ct. 941 (1947). In this case, Ortho alleges that by bundling together the tests which consumers prefer to buy from Abbott, the HIV and the HTLV, with the other three tests which consumers may wish to purchase from another manufacturer, at a price which cannot be matched by Ortho without drastically cutting its prices or giving the tests away free, Abbott effectively closes out all competition.

Ortho relies principally on two [26] cases in support of its monopoly leveraging claim: SmithKline Corp. v. Eli Lilly & Co., 575 F.2d 1056 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 838, 58 L. Ed. 2d 134, 99 S. Ct. 123 (1978), and Berkey Photo Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1093, 62 L. Ed. 2d 783, 100 S. Ct. 1061 (1980).

In SmithKline, the Third Circuit was faced with a factual scenario which appears to be similar at this stage of the record to the one confronting this Court. The parties in SmithKline were pharmaceutical manufacturers, which had each developed certain antibiotics. The defendant, Eli Lilly, had a lawful monopoly in two of the drugs, Keflin and Keflex, by virtue of patents. In a third, Kefzol, Eli Lilly did not have a patent and faced competition on that drug from SmithKline, which marketed an equivalent called Ancef. The lawsuit arose when Eli Lilly adopted a new pricing structure which effectively bundled Keflin and Keflex together with Kefzol, at a price which would have forced SmithKline to offer Ancef rebates of between 16 and 33 percent in order to compete. We say "effectively bundled" because [27] purchasers were still free to buy the drugs separately, thus avoiding liability on a tying claim, but the pricing structure made that choice economically irrational.

The Third Circuit found that Eli Lilly's pricing plan violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act. The court first defined the relevant product market as that composed of all of the various types of cephalosporin antibiotics, and affirmed the district court's finding that Eli Lilly possessed monopoly power in that market. The court then went on to find that Eli Lilly's monopoly power was being unlawfully maintained by the pricing structure. The court's language is instructive:

> In sum, the act of willful acquisition and maintenance of monopoly power was brought about by linking products on which Lilly faced no competition--Keflin and Keflex--with a competitive product, Kefzol. The result was to sell all three products on a non- competitive basis in what would have otherwise been a competitive market for Ancef and Kefzol. The effect of the [new pricing plan] was to force SmithKline to pay rebates on one product, Ancef, equal to rebates paid by Lilly based on volume sales of three products . . . The goal of the plan [28] was to associate Lilly's legal monopolistic practices with an illegal activity that directly affected the price, supply, and demand of Kefzol and Ancef. Were it not for Lilly's [new pricing plan], the price, supply and demand of Kefsol and Ancef would have been determined by the economic laws of a competitive market. The [new pricing plan] blatantly revised those economic laws and made Lilly a transgressor under § 2 of the Sherman Act.

Abbott argues that SmithKline is not authority for a leveraging claim, because, among other reasons, the court found that there was only one market at issue, that of cephalosporin drugs, and the Second Circuit requires two markets for a leveraging claim. While that is true, the reasoning of SmithKline is still persuasive, and has even greater force where a similar pricing scheme is employed where there are two or more markets.

Ortho has demonstrated that there are sufficiently serious questions regarding whether Abbott's new pricing scheme has similar anti-competitive qualities. The linking of the HTLV and HIV tests, in which Abbott has a lawful monopoly, with the other three tests in which [29] it faces competition at prices which would allegedly force Ortho to give rebates of over 100% in certain combinations, more likely than not will foreclose competition for these customers. The situation is especially severe where, as here, the contract is for an extended period of time.

[*155] Ortho relies on the Berkey decision for the proposition that a violation of Section 2 based on a claim of monopoly leveraging does not have to entail an actual monopolization of the leveraged market. Rather, it is sufficient if competition in the leveraged market, here the three tests over which Abbott does not already have monopoly power, is distorted. Defendant argues that the Berkey decision was wrongly decided, and cites to cases in other circuits which hold that merely gaining a competitive advantage in a second market by means of monopoly power in a primary market is not a violation of the antitrust law. Abbott also maintains that it has not contravened Berkey, because that case does not prohibit actions taken in pursuit of "a valid business policy." 603 F.2d at 284.

There are certain difficulties with defendant's argument. First, Abbott downplays the [30] fact that Berkey remains the law of this Circuit. Berkey involved a challenge to Kodak's use of its monopoly in the camera, film and color paper markets to affect the photofinishing market, in which it faced competition from Berkey. The court found that Kodak was never close to attaining monopoly power in the photofinishing market, and therefore could not be held liable for "attempted monopolization" because the third element, dangerous probability of success, had not been met. However, the court explained that a firm still violates Section 2 where, although not attempting to monopolize the second market, the firm uses its monopoly power in the first market to distort competition or to gain a competitive advantage in the second. The court stated:

> This conclusion appears to be an inexorable interpretation of the antitrust laws. HN10[] We tolerate the existence of monopoly power . . . only insofar as necessary to preserve competitive incentives and to be fair to the firm that has attained its position innocently. There is no reason to allow the exercise of such power to the detriment of competition, in either the controlled market or any other. That the competition in the [31] leveraged market may not be destroyed but merely distorted does not make it more palatable.

The Berkey analysis has been recently reaffirmed by this Court in Viacom Int'l Inc. v. Time Inc., 785 F. Supp. 371, 378 (S.D.N.Y. 1992), where the court held that HN11[] a Sherman Act claim "is stated both where a company leverages power in one market to create monopoly in another, see United States v. Griffith, 334 U.S. 100, 92 L. Ed. 1236, 68 S. Ct. 941 (1948), and where a company uses monopoly power in one market to impede competition in another, whether or not it attempts to monopolize the second market, Berkey, 603 F.2d at 275, with resulting 'tangible harm to competition' Twin Labs, Inc. v. Weider Health & Fitness, 900 F.2d 566, 571 (2d Cir. 1990)".

Plaintiff [32] has demonstrated to the Court's satisfaction that Abbott's new pricing structure may, at the least, impede competition in the markets for the three tests in which Abbott does not have monopoly power.

Another difficulty with Abbott's argument is that certain of the cases Abbott cites in opposition to the monopoly leveraging claim are cases from other circuits which, although in conflict with Berkey, simply do not control in this Circuit. For example, defendant relies on Fineman v. Armstrong World Industries, Inc., 980 F.2d 171 (3d Cir. 1992) cert. denied, 122 L. Ed. 2d 677, 113 S. Ct. 1285 (1993), which involved a challenge to defendant's alleged use of monopoly power in the resilient floor covering market to gain a competitive advantage in the market for video magazines sold to distributors of floor coverings. The Fineman court held that in order to state a claim under Section 2 for monopoly leveraging, it is insufficient to show that the firm has used its monopoly power in one market to gain a competitive advantage in a second market; rather, it is necessary to demonstrate threatened or actual monopoly in the leveraged market. [33] Although [*156] Fineman flatly rejects the Berkey holding that proof of use of monopoly power in a primary market in order to gain a competitive advantage in the leveraged market is sufficient, Fineman simply does not control our decision. The same holds true for the Ninth Circuit's rejection of Berkey in Alaska Airlines, Inc. v. United Airlines, Inc., 948 F.2d 536, 541-549 (9th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 118 L. Ed. 2d 316, 112 S. Ct. 1603 (1992).

Abbott however does present arguments which give the Court pause. Abbott contends that its pricing structure arises from its ability to provide all five tests, which is an advantage it possesses legitimately due to its size. Abbott explains that its bundling is merely a package discount, i.e. a lower per-test price when more tests are purchased. At oral argument, Abbott drew the analogy to a car rental agency, which can offer lower prices when renting a fleet of cars than when renting one car separately.

In support of this argument, Abbott relies on Chillicothe Sand & Gravel Co. v. Martin Marietta, 615 F.2d 427 (7th Cir. 1980). In Chillicothe, [34] the court explained that one must look to the complained of conduct's effect on competition, and not on specific competitors. Furthermore, the court ruled that HN12[] where a package deal is offered but the customer is also able to purchase the components of the package separately at greater cost, and where the package price is not below cost, there is no antitrust violation. See also Southern Pacific Commun. Co. v. AT&T, 556 F. Supp. 825, 947 (D.D.C. 1983), aff'd, 238 U.S. App. D.C. 309, 740 F.2d 980 (D.C. Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1005, 84 L. Ed. 2d 380, 105 S. Ct. 1359 (1985).

Abbott argues that the CCBC itself recognized that a package deal including all five assays would result in greater volume of sales and could save its members considerable sums of money, and that is why it specifically requested the bundling in the RFP. Ortho argues in response that this is not a true volume discount, because a BDC which purchases all five tests from Abbott obtains lower prices per test under the master agreement than a BDC which purchases four or three tests from Abbott even if the latter does a far greater volume of testing overall.

Because Ortho [35] has not met its burden of demonstrating that it would suffer irreparable harm if an injunction does not issue, we do not need to determine who has the better argument on the monopoly leveraging claim. It suffices to say that plaintiff has not proven that it is likely to succeed on the merits, but it has shown that there are sufficiently serious questions on the merits to warrant litigation. We will address the question of the balance of the hardships below.

(2) Illegal Tying Claims:

Plaintiff's claims regarding illegal tying may be more difficult to prove, but again it appears that there are sufficiently serious questions going to the merits of these claims to warrant preliminary injunctive relief if Ortho had demonstrated both that the balance of the equities is in its favor and that it would suffer irreparable injury. Although the law of tying is well-developed, the facts of this case, specifically that the tests are available for separate purchase and are therefore not explicitly tied, make the law more difficult to apply. With regard to plaintiff's second tying argument, that DMS is the tying product used to force purchasers to buy either four or five tests, we noted [36] above that it is unclear whether DMS is separately available or not.

Ortho's tying claims come under Section 1 of the Sherman Act and Section 3 of the Clayton Act. Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides:

> HN13[] Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal . . .

Section 3 of the Clayton Act provides:

> HN14[] It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to . . . make a sale or contract for sale of goods . . . for use, consumption or resale within the United States . . . or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the . . . purchaser thereof shall not [*157] use or deal in the goods of a competitor or competitors of the . . . seller, where the effect of such . . . sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

HN15[] It is well established that Section 1 of the Sherman Act does not render illegal every [37] contract that in any way restrains trade, but rather only those contracts which effect an unreasonable restraint of trade. Arizona v. Maricopa County Medical Society, 457 U.S. 332, 73 L. Ed. 2d 48, 102 S. Ct. 2466 (1982). The courts have formulated two analytical approaches to determining when a restraint on trade is unreasonable: the per se test, and the "rule of reason" test. The basic difference between the two approaches lies in the extent to which a court must examine the actual effect on competition which an allegedly anti-competitive business practice has. Under the rule of reason test, the court must determine the competitive impact of a particular practice in the context of a relevant market. Under the per se rule, a court does not conduct this extensive inquiry, because the practice in question has been held to be manifestly anti-competitive.

The Supreme Court has held that HN16[] under certain conditions, tie-ins are per se unreasonable restraints of trade under the antitrust laws. In Jefferson Parish Hosp. v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 12, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1984), the Supreme Court explained that > the essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement [38] lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. When such "forcing" is present, competition on the merits for the tied item is restrained and the Sherman Act is violated.

Ortho argues that Abbott's pricing structure constitutes a per se illegal tie-in because Abbott is exploiting its control over the HIV and HTLV markets to force the buyer into purchasing the other three tests, some or all of which the buyer might rather purchase from Ortho. The DMS tying claim is essentially the same. HN17[] The packaging or tying of different products is only condemned when the firm possesses enough market power in the tying product to force the purchaser to buy the tied product. Furthermore, where the purchaser is free to buy the items separately, no tie-in exists. Northern Pacific Railroad Corp. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545, 78 S. Ct. 514 (1958).

The elements of an illegal tie-in arrangement have been consistently stated by the Second Circuit as the following:

> (1) a tying and a tied [39] product; (2) evidence of actual coercion by the seller forcing the buyer to accept the tied product; (3) sufficient economic power in the tying market to coerce purchaser acceptance of the tied product; (4) anticompetitive effects in the market for the tied product; and (5) the involvement of a "not insubstantial" amount of interstate commerce in the tied product.

Suburban Propane v. Proctor Gas, Inc., 953 F.2d 780, 788 (2d Cir. 1992).

Ortho concedes, as it must, that there is nothing in the CCBC contract which explicitly conditions the purchase of the HIV and HTLV tests on purchase of any of the other three tests. Therefore, Ortho is constrained to argue that although purchasers appear to have the choice to buy the tests separately, in fact, that choice is illusory because the prices have been set to ensure that any rational purchaser will be coerced to buy all five tests. With regard to

DMS, Ortho argues that there is an explicit tie by virtue of Abbott's refusal to offer DMS to purchasers of three tests or less; Abbott responds that in fact, it is willing to negotiate individual deals for DMS to purchasers of sufficient volume, and in any event, [40] it does not possess market power in DMS.

There is some case law to support the position that a tie does not have to be explicit but can instead be inferred from the pricing structure of two products and the market power which the party has. See for example, United States v. Loew's, Inc., 371 U.S. 38, 54, 9 L. Ed. 2d 11, 83 S. Ct. 97 (1962) (remedy [*158] for antitrust violation included provision that company could not use an unjustified price differential between goods sold separately and those sold as a package which would have the effect of creating a tie); Virtual Maintenance, Inc. v. Prime Computer, Inc., 957 F.2d 1318, 1323 (6th Cir.) vacated and remanded on other grounds, 121 L. Ed. 2d 235, 113 S. Ct. 314 (1992) ("A tying arrangement clearly exists here because the large price differential between the software support alone and the software/hardware maintenance package induces all rational buyers of Prime's software support to accept its hardware maintenance").

Absent an explicit condition in the contract, there is a question of fact for the fact-finder regarding the existence of the tie, and we are unable on this state of the record [41] to determine if plaintiff is likely to prevail on the merits of the tying claims. What is evident however is that there are sufficiently serious questions going to the merits of the tying claims to make them a fair ground for litigation.

(3) Balance of the Hardships:

We cannot find on this state of the record that the balance of the hardships tip decidedly towards Ortho. If this Court enjoins the CCBC contract, Abbott will most likely negotiate a new contract that will result in higher prices charged to the BDCs. The centers will then pass this higher cost on to the ultimate consumers, which are the hospitals and patients who need blood for transfusions. If it turns out that the injunction was improvidently granted, that cost to the public cannot be recouped. On the other hand, if the contract goes into effect on June 1, 1993, and the Court later finds in favor of Ortho, all that has been lost are profits which Ortho should have realized, and which the Court can award. Thus, the balance of the equities does not tip decidedly towards Ortho in this case.

Finally, we wish to acknowledge the brief we received from the CCBC as amicus curiae. We appreciate the various concerns which [42] the CCBC expressed regarding the possible consequences which a preliminary injunction could have on the BDC market. However, we want to stress that the CCBC's concern regarding "confusion" which the BDCs may experience if an injunction were to issue is not resolved by our denial of the preliminary relief. A preliminary injunction is just that: a decision made at a preliminary stage of the proceedings to address the immediate circumstances. Our denial of the preliminary injunction should not leave the impression that the Court has addressed the merits of Ortho's claims in any but the most preliminary way. Six months from now, after trial on the merits, the application of the law to the facts may appear very differently, and a permanent injunction may be manifestly appropriate. Any uncertainty this state of affairs may cause the CCBC and its members is an unfortunate but inevitable consequence of pending litigation.

Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, we deny Ortho's motion for a preliminary injunction. We set the case down for trial on November 15, 1993. We ask that Magistrate-Judge Grubin continue her pretrial supervision of discovery in this case.

A motion for summary judgment should be granted when the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue of material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). An issue of fact is "material" if it might affect the outcome of the case under the governing law. It is "genuine" if the record taken as a whole could lead a rational trier of fact to find for the non-moving party.

The moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law if the nonmoving party cannot sufficiently show an essential element of the case to which the nonmoving party has the burden of proof. 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act provides: Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations is declared to be illegal. The threshold requirement of a conspiracy claim under this statute is existence of an agreement between two or more persons demonstrating a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding, or a meeting of minds in an unlawful arrangement.

HN6[] Conspiracy, Elements

It is the rare case in which plaintiff can establish the existence of a conspiracy by showing an explicit agreement. Therefore, most conspiracies are inferred from the behavior of the alleged conspirators. However, the range of inferences that may be drawn from circumstantial evidence to prove an unlawful conspiracy is limited.

HN7[] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

To make out a conspiracy, and thus avoid summary judgment, the circumstantial evidence upon which plaintiff relies must establish a non-legitimate motive for entering into such a conspiracy. In other words, plaintiff must show that collective behavior is economically reasonable in that it accomplishes a goal that would economically inure to defendants' benefit, and therefore reasonably exclude the possibility that defendants acted independently. To make this showing, plaintiff must adduce evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged co-conspirators acted independently and in a manner consistent with rational business objectives. This means that conduct that is as consistent with permissible, unilateral activity as with an illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, permit the inference of an antitrust conspiracy.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Physicians

HN8[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Sherman Act

Plaintiff need not show a specific intent to restrain trade or to build a monopoly. So long as the purported conspiracy has an anticompetitive effect, plaintiff has made out a case under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. Therefore, in determining whether a conspiracy exists, if an economic motive is evident, plaintiff need only show (1) a conscious commitment on the part of the alleged conspirators to adhere to an agreement that is (2) designed to achieve an objective prohibited by the statute.

Criminal Law & Procedure > ... > Inchoate Crimes > Conspiracy > Elements

Healthcare Law > Healthcare Litigation > Antitrust Actions > Physicians

HN9[] Conspiracy, Elements

Once plaintiff makes out a conspiracy, the court must decide whether the agreement had an adverse impact on competition. Certain conspiracies are deemed to have such a pernicious effect on competition, that they are said to be illegal per se. That is, the conduct involved always or almost always tends to restrict competition and decrease output without any countervailing procompetitive benefits. The per se label should be applied infrequently and with caution. Therefore, the presumption in 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 cases is that the rule of reason standard applies.

HN10[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

The rule of reason asks whether, in the circumstances of a particular case, a restrictive practice imposes an unreasonable restraint on competition. A restraint is unreasonable if it has an adverse impact on competition and cannot be justified as a procompetitive measure. Thus, the rule of reason standard hinges the ultimate legality of a restraint on whether plaintiff has demonstrated an anticompetitive effect that is not offset by a need to achieve a procompetitive benefit or justification.

HN11[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In order to show an injury to competition using the rule of reason analysis, plaintiff first must establish a particularized or relevant market in which defendant's actions unreasonably restrain trade. The relevant market is defined generally as the area of effective competition. The market must contain both a product dimension and a geographic dimension. The product dimension is determined by the availability of substitutes to which consumers can turn in response to price increases and other existing or potential producer's ability to expand output. The geographic dimension is the area in which the product or its reasonably interchangeable substitutes are traded.

HN12[] Antitrust Actions, Physicians

Once plaintiff has established the relevant market, the rule of reason analysis focuses on defendants' power within the market. The meaning of market power in rule of reason cases has not been clearly explained or defined by the United States Supreme Court. However, the court agrees with the description of market power as the power to raise price above the competitive level without losing so many sales that the price increase would be unprofitable.

HN13[] Evidence, Privileges

The denial or revocation of hospital privileges are presumed to be economically motivated, and are, therefore, evidence of an economic conspiracy between defendant hospital and its staff. In such a case, plaintiff need only show a conscious commitment to the agreement and that the agreement was designed to achieve an anticompetitive effect.

Reciprocal dealing is conceptually similar to tying. In a tying arrangement, a seller uses its power in the market for product A to coerce the buyer of product A to purchase product B. However, a reciprocal dealing arrangement exists when the two parties face each other as both buyer and seller. The buyer of product A offers to buy from the other party, but only if that second party will buy product B from the first party. The two cases are similar in that, in each case, one side of a transaction has special power in the market place in reciprocal dealings, a buyer with economic power forces a seller to buy something from it.

HN19[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Reciprocal Dealing

The difference between a tying arrangement and a reciprocal dealing arrangement is that the strict standard of coercion applied to tying cases is not applicable to reciprocal dealing cases. If the coercion necessary for per se treatment is not present, the court may analyze the case under the rule of reason. Therefore, where plaintiff shows that one party has sufficient market power to unduly influence a second party to treat the first more favorably than the free market would otherwise dictate, and the second party acts in conformity with the reciprocal arrangement, plaintiff has proved the existence of an arrangement that unreasonably restrains trade.

In order to prevail in the absence of per se liability, plaintiff must show that defendant's conduct unreasonably restrained competition. In the absence of evidence of actual detrimental effects, the rule of reason dictates that plaintiff define the relevant market (both its product and geographical boundaries), as well as demonstrate defendant's market power.

HN23[] Antitrust Actions, Physicians

Evidence of conscious parallelism does not permit an inference of conspiracy unless plaintiff establishes that each defendant engaging in the parallel action acted contrary to its economic self-interest. Thus, plaintiff must establish that each defendant would have acted unreasonably in a business sense if it had engaged in the challenged conduct unless that defendant had received assurances from the other defendants that they would take the same action.

Competition between Health Maintenance Organizations creates something of a paradox. On one level, their restrictive practices promote competition. Thus, the question becomes whether the procompetitive benefits offset the anticompetitive effect in the relevant product and geographic markets (the rule of reason).

Tortious interference with business relationships and tortious interference with contractual relations are basically the same cause of action under Florida law. The only material difference appears to be that in one there is a contract and in the other there is only a business relationship. In order to prove a tortious interference claim, plaintiff must demonstrate: (1) the existence of a business or contractual relationship under which plaintiff had legal rights; (2) an intentional and unjustified interference with the relationship; and (3) damage to plaintiff as a result of the tortious interference with that relationship. The relationship involved can be based on a business expectancy arising even from an unenforceable agreement that would have been completed had defendant not intervened. In order to be actionable, the interference must be direct; conduct that has only indirect consequences on plaintiff will not support a claim for tortious interference.

ORDER

Defendants Sacred Heart Hospital of Pensacola ("Sacred Heart"), Baptist Hospital, Inc. ("Baptist"), Health First Network, Inc., and Keith T. Shearlock, M.D. all have moved for reconsideration of this court's order of December 27, 1991, denying their several motions for summary judgment. (doc. 332). Upon consideration of the motions and the memoranda of the parties, the evidence in the record, and the argument of counsel at the hearing held in this matter, I have concluded that further amplification of the factual record is necessary, and that, in turn, requires a number of revisions in the legal analysis set out in my earlier order. Accordingly, these motions are GRANTED and my order of December 27, 1991, is vacated and set aside, and this order is substituted therefor. Except as noted, the material facts are not in dispute.

I. BACKGROUND

A. DR. WILLIAMSON AND PENSACOLA DIAGNOSTIC CENTER & BREAST CLINIC

Plaintiff Angel Yuh Williamson, M.D. [*2] is a board certified radiologist. In May 1984, Dr. Williamson formed, and has been the sole owner of, plaintiff Pensacola Diagnostic Center & Breast Clinic, P.A. ("Pensacola Diagnostic"). Pensacola Diagnostic is an outpatient radiology clinic located in Pensacola, Florida. While it provides general radiological services, it specializes in the area of comprehensive breast care. [1] In particular, Pensacola Diagnostic places special emphasis on the detection and diagnosis of breast cancer.

In 1984, Pensacola Diagnostic was unique. In the traditional approach to breast care, a patient would see a primary care physician such as a family practitioner or an obstetrician/gynecologist. The primary care physician then would refer the patient to a radiologist for a mammogram. The patient would go to the hospital with which the [*3] radiologist was affiliated, and a radiology technician would perform the mammogram. The radiologist would read and interpret the mammogram and send a written report to the primary care physician for consultation regarding any further action.

In contrast, Dr. Williamson, through her clinic, does not utilize the hospital radiology departments and emphasizes patient consultation and education. Normally, Dr. Williamson's patients are referred to her by their primary care physician. [2] Dr. Williamson then consults with the patient, performs the mammogram or other diagnostic procedures at her clinic, interprets the results there, and discusses them with the patient. She then makes a written report to the primary care physician.

When the results of a particular diagnostic test reveal the need for further treatment or hospitalization, it is still the referring primary care physician or a surgeon who provides the treatment or admits the patient to the hospital. Thus, even though Dr. Williamson was on the staff of the University Hospital in Pensacola from shortly after arriving here in 1983, she never admitted a patient to that hospital. It is now closed. Similarly, between the time she obtained courtesy privileges at defendant Baptist Hospital in 1988, and the taking of her deposition in October 1989, Dr. Williamson visited only three patients there. During these visits, she consulted with the patients and their families by giving them medical advice, but did not prescribe treatments or make entries on their hospital charts. [3]

Since it began operations in 1984, Pensacola Diagnostic has enjoyed continuous growth. Dr. Williamson opened Pensacola Diagnostic by herself with three employees. As of October 1989, there were nine full-time employees. As of early 1991, Pensacola Diagnostic maintained approximately 10,000 to 11,000 patient files. [*4] The work load at her clinic is such that, for the last several years, Dr. Williamson has been exploring the possibility of adding another radiologist to her practice.

Dr. Williamson and Pensacola Diagnostic have also enjoyed a steady increase in income. Clinic revenue has increased every year, growing from $ 187,881.00 in the fiscal year ending April 30, 1985, to $ 670,996.27 for the first eleven months of the fiscal year ending April 30, 1990. During the same period, Williamson's annual salary and benefits package increased in value from $ 45,139.00 to over $ 250,000.00.

B. DR. WILLIAMSON'S ATTEMPTS TO GAIN PRIVILEGES AT SACRED HEART AND BAPTIST.

1. The 1984 Applications

(a) Sacred Heart, Pensacola Radiology Associates and Albert A. Post, M.D.

In November 1984, shortly after opening Pensacola Diagnostic, Dr. Williamson sought staff privileges in the Departments of Radiology at defendant Sacred Heart Hospital of Pensacola ("Sacred Heart") and at defendant Baptist Hospital, Inc. ("Baptist"). Defendant Sacred Heart is a non-profit corporation engaged in the business of

[1] Since Dr. Williamson is the sole owner of Pensacola Diagnostic, I will frequently refer to both as "the plaintiff" for brevity purposes. As a practical matter, their interests are identical.

[2] Defendants claim that plaintiff's patient logs show that, from 1984 and 1989, only 7% to 15% of Pensacola Diagnostic's business consisted of "self-referrals", i.e. patients who come directly to plaintiff for breast care. In such case, plaintiff would perform diagnostic functions, and then would refer the patient to a physician or surgeon if further care was necessary. Plaintiff claims that self-referrals accounted for approximately half of her business.

[3] At least one of these patients was a "self-referral" for whom Dr. Williamson was acting as the "primary care" physician. Accordingly, she referred the patient to a surgeon who then admitted the patient to Baptist. Since receiving her privileges at Baptist, Dr. Williamson has not attempted to admit any patients there. Nor has she ever admitted any patient to any hospital where she has privileges.

providing full service health care in the Pensacola, Florida, area. [4] At the time Dr. [*5] Williamson submitted her application, Sacred Heart had an exclusive contract with defendant Pensacola Radiology Consultants, P.A. ("PRC") for the provision of radiological services at the hospital. [5] Defendant Albert A. Post, M.D. is PRC's founder and president, and is also the chairman of Sacred Heart's Department of Radiology.

Section 7.1 of Sacred Heart's "Credentialling Procedures Manual of the Bylaws, Rules and Regulations of the Medical and Dental Staff" sets out an "exclusivity [*6] policy" that specifically provides for this type of contract. According to the bylaws, certain hospital facilities and services, including radiology, are designated to be used on an exclusive basis in accordance with contracts between the hospital and qualified practitioners. Applications for initial appointment or for clinical privileges related to those hospital facilities and services under exclusive contract cannot be accepted for processing unless they are submitted in accordance with an existing or proposed contract with the hospital.

Upon receiving Dr. Williamson's application, Sacred Heart's medical director, John Whitcomb, M.D., consulted with Dr. Post. During their discussion, Dr. Post stated that, in his view, the exclusive contract with PRC prohibited Dr. Williamson from practicing radiology at Sacred Heart. Therefore, he questioned whether the hospital could grant the requested privileges. [6] There was some further discussion as to what services Dr. Williamson sought to render, and Dr. Post noted that the hospital routinely granted courtesy rights to non-staff physicians who merely wanted to view films or to visit and consult with their patients.

[*7] What exactly happened to Dr. Williamson's application at this point is unclear. Dr. Whitcomb admits having made no immediate effort to process it through regular channels. [7] At the same time, S. Randall Hobgood, M.D., another of PRC's partners, admits having questioned the propriety of granting Dr. Williamson's request for privileges in the face of the exclusive contract with PRC. In addition, there also is evidence that, during a conversation with David Allen Cross, M.D., a local surgeon, Dr. Post questioned the quality of Dr. Williamson's equipment, as well as her competency as a radiologist.

It is undisputed that Dr. Williamson frequently telephoned Dr. Whitcomb's office concerning her application. In particular, on February 8, 1985, Dr. Whitcomb's administrative secretary, Carol Beem, telephoned Dr. Williamson's office and told her secretary that Dr. Whitcomb and Dr. Post had discussed [*8] her application, and had concluded that she would not need privileges.

Dr. Williamson claims to have understood Ms. Beem's remarks to mean that Drs. Whitcomb and Post had decided that she did not need privileges "in order to properly care for her patients," and therefore, that her application was no longer being considered for approval. Dr. Williamson felt that such patient care decisions were hers alone to make. [8] [*9] Of course, Sacred Heart contends that Ms. Beem merely explained Dr. Post's conclusion that, [4] Pensacola and the bordering communities of Cantonment, Gulf Breeze and Milton account for 82% of Sacred Heart's patients.

[5] Defendant Albert A. Post, M.D. is a radiologist and a shareholder in PRC. He also is chairman of Sacred Heart's radiology department. Dr. Post's partners in PRC, S. Randall Hobgood, M.D., William R. Balchunas, M.D., and Anthony J. DeRaimo, M.D., all were originally named as defendants in plaintiff's complaint. They all have been dismissed with prejudice by stipulation of the plaintiffs. (Doc. 284).

[6] S. Randall Hobgood, M.D., another of PRC's physician partners, expressed similar concerns to Dr. Whitcomb.

[7] Indeed, given the wording of the bylaws, it is doubtful whether Dr. Whitcomb had authority to process the application.

[8] PRC and Dr. Post correctly point out that Dr. Williamson's description of her conversation with Ms. Beem is inadmissible hearsay as to them. However, PRC and Dr. Post have based their motion in part on the deposition testimony of Dr. Whitcomb in which he admits both that his office was in contact with Dr. Williamson during this time period, and that Ms. Beem did have a conversation with Dr. Williamson, the substance of which was substantially as alleged by plaintiffs. Thus, I reiterate that the fact of the phone call and the essentials of its content are not in dispute as to either Sacred Heart or PRC and Dr. Post. The only dispute over the conversation relates to interpretation of Ms. Beem's statement that Dr. Williamson "did not need privileges".

because of the standard courtesies extended to non-staff physicians, Dr. Williamson would not need privileges "to visit patients or to view the results of tests." [9]

On February 12, 1985, Dr. Whitcomb followed up this phone conversation with a letter in which he advised Dr. Williamson that the Executive Committee had discussed "what kind of privileges could be offered to [her] since we do have a closed contract situation for radiology." He then informed her that the Committee had concluded that she would not need privileges to visit her patients or to see the results of their tests. Dr. Whitcomb also offered to continue processing Dr. Williamson's application, stating that, if accepted, she would be afforded staff membership rights without radiology procedure or interpretation privileges.

Dr. Whitcomb's letter is the only evidence that the Executive Committee actually met and discussed Dr. Williamson's application. [10] In any event, on February 13, 1985, Dr. Williamson requested that Sacred Heart continue processing her application for staff [*10] membership. Subsequently, Dr. Williamson received several requests from Carol Beem for additional information regarding her education and references.

On April 4, 1985, Dr. Whitcomb again wrote Dr. Williamson and stated that he had begun the procedure of verifying her license and other qualifications, but that, contrary to his letter of February 12, he could not process her application for staff membership only. He explained that the Credentialling Procedures Manual required that each application for appointment to the medical staff contain a request for specific clinical privileges. Since the exclusive contract with PRC prevented Sacred Heart from granting privileges in the Department of Radiology, it could not process Dr. Williamson's associated request for appointment to the medical staff.

On April [*11] 15, 1985, Dr. Williamson wrote back to Dr. Whitcomb and explained that she did not wish to work in the radiology department, and that she only wanted to be able to admit her clinic patients and attend to their general care. [11] This letter also alludes to several telephone conversations with Dr. Whitcomb's office during which Dr. Williamson allegedly explained the precise nature of the services she wanted to perform at the hospital.

On April 17, 1985, Dr. Williamson met with the Credentials [*12] Committee to discuss her unique request. Once again, she stated that she did not want to practice diagnostic radiology, but only wanted to be able to provide continuing care to her clinic patients. She explained that the provision of such care required that she have the privilege of admitting patients as the attending physician, that she be able both to consult with them during their stay, and to order clinical tests and patient care.

The Credentials Committee considered her request, but determined that the exclusive contract with PRC prevented them from recommending approval of her application for membership in the Department of Radiology as a radiologist. [12] Instead, the Committee, along with Dr. Whitcomb, suggested that Dr. Williamson apply for staff

Oddly, Dr. Williamson has submitted an excerpt of Ms. Beem's deposition testimony, in which she confirms Sacred Heart's interpretation of the conversation, i.e. Ms. Beem told Dr. Williamson she would not need privileges because the radiology department would extend her the courtesy of visiting her patients and viewing their films.

[9] In the original order, I determined that this conversation was hearsay. However, upon further reflection, it appears to be an adopted admission under Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d)(2)(B), and if so, not hearsay.

[10] Though Sacred Heart has attached to its motion for summary judgment the minutes of other Executive Committee meetings in which plaintiff's application was discussed, the minutes of this meeting are absent.

[11] Dr. Williamson claims that, at this time, independent radiologist Thomas Brown, M.D. had privileges at Sacred Heart even though he was not then a member of PRC. Sacred Heart points out, however, that, at one time, Dr. Brown was associated with PRC. After he severed this relationship, Dr. Brown did remain a member of the Sacred Heart staff, but was not permitted to furnish radiology services or exercise clinical privileges. Dr. Brown resigned from the staff in December 1985, and has not had staff privileges since then.

[12] Only the Board of Directors can grant staff membership and privileges. Under the normal procedure, an application for medical staff privileges is reviewed first by the Credentials Committee. After examining the applicants qualifications and receiving input from the relevant medical department, the Credentials Committee makes findings as to the applicant's qualifications and membership and Level I privileges in either the Department of Family Practice or the Department of Internal Medicine. Dr. Williamson agreed to amend her application, and the committee provided her with a copy of the Bylaws, Rules and Regulations of the Medical and Dental Staff setting out the staff membership and privilege eligibility requirements for all the medical departments at the hospital. They also provided her with copies [*13] of proposed amendments to the Rules and Regulations of the Departments of Medicine and Family Practice then under consideration by the hospital. Because Dr. Williamson later withdrew her application for privileges in the Department of Family Practice, it is not at issue in this case. Therefore, I will refer only to her application for privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine.

[*14] The bylaws in effect at the time Dr. Williamson submitted her original application provided for four categories of privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine. Category I privileges allowed the physician to "render emergency care and care of the most preliminary nature. Further management must then be provided by an appropriately qualified physician." To be eligible for such privileges, the physician had to have completed one year of postgraduate clinical training.

In the fall of 1984, shortly before Dr. Williamson submitted her application, the Department of Internal Medicine began the process of amending its departmental Rules and Regulations. [13] [*15] The proposed rule changes would create a three-tiered system of privileges wherein "Level I" privileges would require the least amount of medical expertise, and "Level III" privileges would require the most expertise. [14]

From as early as October 23, 1984, the proposed rules defined "Level I" privileges to permit the physician "to treat mild, uncomplicated illnesses or disorders. Should the patient's medical condition progress to an acute or unstable phase, consultation by a member of the Department with Level III privileges is required." The proposed eligibility requirements for "Level I" privileges added the words "in a medically [*16] oriented specialty" to the existing requirements. Thus, as proposed, the rules included the phrase: "To be eligible for Level I privileges, the physician must provide evidence of satisfactorily completing one year of approved postgraduate clinical training in a medically oriented specialty." [15]

On March 11, 1985, the Bylaws Committee approved the Department of Internal Medicine's proposed rule changes and passed them on to the Medical Executive Committee. On March 26, 1985, several weeks before Dr. Williamson's April 17 meeting with the Credentials Committee, the Medical Executive Committee approved these amendments without change. In the version of the proposed rule that the general staff considered at its regular meeting of May 28, 1985, the words "primary care" appeared before the words "medically oriented specialty. " Thus, the [*17] proposed rule then read: recommends either approval or denial. It then passes the application on to the Executive Committee of the Medical and Dental Staff for review. After making its own recommendation, the Executive Committee passes the application on to the Board of Directors of Sacred Heart Hospital for final action.

[13] In addition to matters of general concern, the Bylaws of the Medical and Dental Staff of Sacred Heart Hospital contain the Rules and Regulations for each medical department within the hospital. The delineation of privileges for a particular department is listed within the "Rules and Regulations" pertaining to that department. Subject to the approval of the Bylaws Committee, the Executive Committee, the General Staff and the Board of Directors, each department has the power to adopt its own Rules and Regulations.

[14] Amending the bylaws to incorporate the rules changes was a four-step process. First, the department changing its rules drafts a proposed rule. The Bylaws Committee then reviews the proposed rule and makes any changes it deems appropriate. Next the proposed rule goes before the Executive Committee for input from the administration. If the Executive Committee makes any changes, the proposed rule goes back to the department for review, and the process starts over. Once the Executive Committee approves the rule, the general staff votes on it. Finally, if the general staff approves the change, it is submitted to the Board of Directors for final approval and incorporation into the bylaws.

[15] Both definitions appeared in the minutes of an October 23, 1984, Department of Internal Medicine monthly meeting and remained unchanged throughout the amendment process.

> To be eligible for Level I privileges, the physician must provide evidence of satisfactorily completing one year of approved post-graduate clinical training in a primary care medically oriented specialty. (emphasis added)

This addition is not reflected in the minutes of any committee meeting. [16] Nevertheless, the general staff approved the amendment as presented and passed it on to the Board of Directors for their approval.

The change is significant insofar as it concerns Dr. Williamson's pending application. After finishing medical [*18] school, Dr. Williamson completed a one year residency in nuclear medicine. It is undisputed that nuclear medicine has been recognized by the AMA since 1971 as a "medically oriented" specialty. However, it is not a "primary care medically oriented" specialty. [17]

[*19] At the Board of Directors meeting on July 19, 1985, Dr. Whitcomb presented the revised Rules and Regulations for the Department of Internal Medicine and, in the words of the Board's minutes, "highlighted the levels of privileges, eligibility requirements, and supervision requirements." The Board then adopted the proposed rules without change.

On July 17, 1985, two days before Board approval of the revised eligibility requirements, Dr. Whitcomb sent a memo to the Credentials Committee in which he stated that Dr. Webb, the Chairman of the Department of Internal Medicine, had reviewed Dr. Williamson's credentials and concluded that she failed to meet the minimum requirements for the granting of Level I privileges within his department. Accordingly, Dr. Webb recommended that Dr. Williamson's applications for medical staff membership and privileges be denied. In accordance with Dr. Webb's evaluation of her medical qualifications, the Credentials Committee concluded at its July 17 meeting that Dr. Williamson did not qualify for privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine.

In lieu of recommending the outright rejection of her application, the Credentials Committee voted to request [*20] the Department of Radiology to consider accepting Dr. Williamson in the Department of Radiology "Courtesy Staff, with consultant privileges." The committee defined consultant privileges as "being available for consultation [with] other physicians or patients, to permit patient interaction within the hospital, but without the privilege to give official readings of x-rays or radiological procedures and without the privilege to write orders."

This recommendation notwithstanding, the Executive Committee of the Medical and Dental Staff determined at its July 23, 1985, meeting that the exclusive contract with PRC precluded the hospital from offering any type of privileges in the Department of Radiology. The Executive Committee also determined that Dr. Williamson's lack of clinical experience precluded granting privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine. Accordingly, the committee voted to recommend to the Board of Directors that it deny Dr. Williamson's applications.

As the Chairman of the Department of Radiology, Dr. Post did serve on the Executive Committee, and was present at this meeting. However, Dr. Post claims to have abstained from making any comments about Dr. Williamson, [*21] and there is no evidence to the contrary. Neither Dr. Post nor any other physician associated with PRC otherwise played any role in the processing of Dr. Williamson's application. [18] One member of the Executive Committee did vote against a negative recommendation, but this physician is not identified.

[16] This wording does appear in a copy of the bylaws plaintiff has submitted in support of her opposition to defendants' original motions for summary judgment. (See App. III to plaintiff's opposition at p. 213-14). This copy is dated March 1985. Another copy of the bylaws bearing the same date, and also submitted by the plaintiff, does not include the words "primary care" before "medically oriented specialty". (See Id. at 158-59).

[17] Dr. Williamson also had completed a three year residency in diagnostic radiology. During that residency, she rotated through the different sections of diagnostic radiology including angiography and interventional radiology. During these rotations, Dr. Williamson visited patients prior to performing the necessary procedures, and discussed with them the procedures and the associated risks. She issued premedication orders and post procedure orders on these patients including antiocoagulant or other medications required for the procedures. Most of the patients with whom Dr. Williamson dealt during her residency were referred to radiology for specific procedures by the admitting physician. However, in those cases where patients were admitted to the hospital by the radiology staff, the residents participated in taking medical histories and administering physical exams.

[18] None of the radiologists sits on the Credentials Committee.

Under the "Fair Hearing Plan" of the Medical Staff By-laws, a physician who receives an adverse recommendation from the Executive Committee is entitled to an opportunity to show, by clear and convincing evidence, that the adverse recommendation was arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable. On July 30, 1985, Dr. Williamson requested a hearing on the Executive Committee's adverse recommendation. A hearing was set for September 17, 1985, but was postponed at Dr. Williamson's request. The Executive Committee then rescheduled the hearing for November 5, 1985, but Dr. Williamson again requested that it be postponed. On November 25, 1985, Dr. Whitcomb wrote [*22] Dr. Williamson to ask that she submit a tentative date for rescheduling the hearing. Dr. Williamson did not respond, and there was no further discussion of her application for approximately two and one-half years. Thus, the application was considered to be abandoned.

(b) Baptist Hospital

Defendant Baptist Hospital, Inc. ("Baptist") also is a nonprofit corporation engaged in the business of providing full service health care in the Pensacola, Florida, area. [19] Dr. Williamson's concurrent attempt to attain privileges at Baptist is similar to her efforts at Sacred Heart.

Pursuant to an oral agreement, Radiology Associates of Pensacola ("Radiology Associates") had been providing radiology services at Baptist from the time the hospital opened in 1951. The specifics of this agreement were very vague. At the time Dr. Williamson submitted her application, some of the physicians practicing [*23] with Radiology Associates did not even realize that the contract was exclusive. Similarly, over the years several exceptions had been made, most notably for perinatologists performing fetal ultrasound, and neurologists performing CT scans. [20]

In the summer of 1984 - - - well before plaintiff submitted her application for privileges - - - Baptist's Board of Directors directed the hospital administration to reduce the Radiology Associates contract to writing. Discussions regarding the written contract continued through the winter, and the contract was executed on June 28, 1985.

In the meantime, Dr. Williamson contacted Baptist in November 1984, and requested an application for medical staff membership and privileges in the Department of Radiology. On December 7, 1984, John N. Robbins, Baptist's [*24] administrator, responded with a letter explaining that the hospital was then negotiating a written contract with Radiology Associates for the provision of radiology services. Robbins informed Dr. Williamson that, in view of these negotiations, Baptist would be unable to consider an application for privileges in radiology from a physician who was not affiliated with Radiology Associates.

In April, Dr. Williamson contacted Baptist and, as with Sacred Heart, explained that she did not wish to practice diagnostic radiology. She informed Baptist that she only desired privileges sufficient to allow her to admit patients, and to provide continuing care to those patients she had treated at her clinic, but who had been admitted to Baptist by other physicians. In a letter to Thomas B. Williams, M.D., the president of Baptist's medical staff, dated May 6, 1985, Dr. Williamson reiterated her desire and stated that she had discussed the matter with Radiology Associates and had made it quite clear to them that she had no intention of practicing radiology at Baptist. [21] Subsequently, on May 13, 1985, Baptist forwarded an application and a copy of the hospital bylaws and rules and regulations to [*25] Dr. Williamson.

Dr. Williamson submitted her application on or about May 28, 1985. On June 4, 1985, the Executive Committee met, and although there is no evidence that Radiology Consultants objected to Dr. Williamson's application, it concluded that, although she was qualified for privileges in diagnostic radiology, the exclusive contract then being [19] Pensacola and the bordering communities of Cantonment, Gulf Breeze, and Milton account for 88.88% of Baptist's patients.

[20] As described more fully below, at one time radiologists performed fetal ultrasound. Gradually, responsibility for performing the procedure shifted to obstetricians and perinatologists This is now the standard practice.

[21] In their depositions, Wiley Howard Cooper, M.D. and William R. Bender, M.D., both of whom are principals in Radiology Associates, stated that the P.A. had no objection to Dr. Williamson obtaining staff membership at Baptist as long as she did not practice diagnostic radiology at the hospital. According to Drs. Cooper and Bender, both John Robbins, Baptist's chief administrator, and Spencer Mitchum, the hospital's attorney, told the physicians of Radiology Associates that the hospital considered the issue of medical staff membership separate from the issue of privileges.

negotiated would preclude her from practicing her specialty at Baptist. The minutes of the [*26] Committee's meeting reveal that it recognized that Dr. Williamson did not want to practice radiology. However, after much discussion, it was agreed "that the Medical Staff Bylaws do not appear to provide for granting privileges such as she is requesting, since it appears that with her training she would be eligible only for privileges in radiology and the Executive Committee does not perceive a need to amend the bylaws to change this."

Nevertheless, hospital policy required the Committee to consider the issue of privileges separately from the issue of the exclusive contract. [22] In other words, the exclusive contract with Radiology Associates would not prevent Dr. Williamson from obtaining privileges at Baptist merely because she was a radiologist. If she could show that she otherwise qualified under the bylaws for privileges in an area not covered by the exclusive contract, the Committee would recommend approval of her application. Accordingly, by letter dated July 8, 1985, Dr. Williams explained the Executive Committee's dilemma

> From information submitted, it would appear that under our bylaws your qualifications if acceptable would be only in the specialty of Diagnostic [*27] Radiology. Further, as you have been advised, you will not be able to practice Diagnostic Radiology in Baptist Hospital because of the exclusive contract the hospital has with Radiology Associates of Pensacola.
> With these constraints, there is almost nothing that you can do at Baptist Hospital with your present qualifications. Therefore, it appears to us that membership on our Medical staff would be of no benefit to you. If you disagree with this conclusion, please advise us specifically and in detail what it is that you wish to do at Baptist Hospital that is allowed under the Rules and Regulations applicable to Diagnostic Radiology and not precluded by the exclusive contract which we have with Radiology Associates of Pensacola. We will hold your application pending our receiving your reply to this correspondence. If it can be determined that there is any meaningful practice in Diagnostic Radiology open to you at Baptist Hospital, we will be happy to proceed with processing your application.

[*28] Dr. Williamson claims that, because she felt that she already had provided the requested information, she interpreted Dr. Williams' letter as a denial of her application. At this point, Dr. Williamson also abandoned her application to Baptist for approximately two and one-half years.

2. Dr. Williamson's First Application For Membership in Health First

While her applications were being processed at Sacred Heart and Baptist in 1984 and 1985, Dr. Williamson also was seeking membership in defendant Health First Network, Inc. ("Health First"). Health First is an "independent physician's association", and it is the sole authorized provider of health care for members of a health maintenance organization ("HMO") known as Health Options of Pensacola ("HOP"). HOP is jointly and equally owned by Health First; Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Florida; Gulf Coast Diversified, Inc., an affiliate of defendant Sacred Heart; and BCI Enterprises, Inc., an affiliate of defendant Baptist.

As originally drafted, Health First's bylaws provided that, at a minimum, a physician applying for membership

[22] In her memorandum, plaintiff consistently mischaracterizes the nature of this policy, relying on a statement by counsel for Baptist at the deposition of Wiley Howard Cooper, M.D. to the effect that the Board of Directors had adopted a policy of keeping the issue of privileges separate from the issue of exclusive contracts. Plaintiff argues that Baptist had a policy that would have allowed the Executive Committee to grant limited privileges in the Department of Radiology so long as she promised not to practice diagnostic radiology at the hospital.

The plain language of plaintiff's own evidence belies this interpretation. First, the Medical Staff Bylaws make no provisions for such partial privileges. Second, the minutes of the June 4 Executive Committee meeting clearly show that it was willing to grant Dr. Williamson privileges in a manner that was consistent with both the Bylaws and the exclusive contract. As discussed in the text, it subsequently wrote her a letter inviting her to explain her qualifications in an area not covered by the exclusive contract.

> (2) shall have been granted permanent admitting or clinical privileges or other major privileges, [*29] without supervision, by at least one Participating Hospital, and shall not have had any such privileges suspended, revoked, or otherwise terminated at any hospital anywhere. [23]

The bylaws defined "Participating Hospital" as a "participating provider that is a hospital." At the time the bylaws were drafted in early 1985, the only participating hospitals were Sacred Heart and Baptist. Later, Gulf Breeze Hospital became a participating hospital.

[*30] Shortly after HOP became operational on August 1, 1985, it decided to expand its operation to areas outside Pensacola. Accordingly, in late 1985, HOP added several outlying hospitals to the organization. At the same time, it requested that Health First correspondingly admit physician providers from these areas. To encourage physician participation outside of the Pensacola area, Health First waived the requirement that all members buy an $ 8500.00 share of stock in the Health First corporation.

Health First also amended its credentialling criteria to permit physicians who practiced primarily in the outlying areas to qualify for membership in Health First, and hence HOP, by obtaining privileges at an outlying participating hospital. At the same time, Health First retained the requirement that physicians practicing primarily in Pensacola obtain privileges at a hospital affiliated by ownership or control with the hospital owners of HOP. At the time, the only such hospitals were Baptist, Sacred Heart, Gulf Breeze Hospital and Jay Hospital. [24]

[*31] Dr. Williamson initially inquired into membership in Health First by telephone on May 20, 1985. At that time she spoke to Health First's president, defendant Keith T. Shearlock, M.D. [25] Dr. Shearlock explained that, in order

[23] The remaining included minimum credentialling criteria required that applicants:

> (1) shall at all times be licensed to practice allopathic or osteopathic medicine within the State of Florida;
> (3) shall not have been denied membership in the American Medical Association or any state or county medical association or society;
> (4) shall at all times be and have been in compliance with the Current Opinions of the Judicial Council of the American Medical Association;
> (5) shall have made no act or omission which tends to disrupt the operation of the business of [Health First] or any Physician Provider;
> (6) shall at all times maintain professional malpractice liability insurance satisfactory to the Board; and,
> (7) shall be in compliance with all provisions of these Medical Staff Bylaws, the Bylaws of [Health First], any applicable Physician Provider Agreement, and any other rules, regulations, policies and procedures of the Staff or [Health First].

[24] The new credentialling criteria provided that an applicant

> (2) shall have been granted or shall be actively seeking or making progress toward obtaining, permanent admitting or clinical privileges or other major privileges, without supervision, by at least one Participating Hospital (which must be an affiliated hospital if the Applicant practices primarily within the central portion of the service area), and shall not have had any such privileges suspended, revoked, or otherwise terminated at any hospital anywhere . . .

A "Participating hospital" still was defined as a "Participating Provider that is a hospital," and included the newly recruited hospitals. However, "Affiliated Hospital" means > Sacred Heart Hospital or Baptist Hospital of Pensacola, Florida, or any other Participating Hospital . . . directly or indirectly associated by ownership or control with Gulf Coast Diversified, Inc. or Mobile Diagnostics, Inc., which are the two hospital related Florida corporations that are stockholders in Health Options of Pensacola, Inc.

"Central portion of the service area" is not defined in the bylaws, but it is undisputed that the term refers to the greater Pensacola area, including Escambia, Santa Rosa, Okaloosa Counties, along with parts of Walton County, Florida.

[25] Defendant Keith Shearlock, M.D. is a nephrologist (a kidney specialist). It is undisputed that Dr. Shearlock does not compete with Dr. Williamson, and that, as a nephrologist, he would not refer patients to a radiologist such as Dr. Williamson.

to become a member of Health First, its bylaws required that physicians practicing in the greater Pensacola, Florida, area first obtain staff membership and associated privileges without supervision at Sacred Heart or Baptist. Since Dr. Williamson did not have privileges at either hospital, Dr. Shearlock told her that she would not be eligible for membership.

In response, Dr. Williamson wrote to Health First's Medical Director, Paul T. Baroco, M.D., requesting a waiver of the privileges requirement. In her letter, which was dated September [*32] 30, 1985, Dr. Williamson set out her qualifications, and explained that because of the exclusive contracts at Baptist and Sacred Heart, she was not eligible for radiology privileges. She also offered to discount her fees in exchange for a waiver.

Dr. Baroco passed this letter on to Dr. Shearlock, who responded by letter on February 9, 1986. In this letter, Dr. Shearlock simply stated that "one must have major staff privileges at either Baptist or Sacred Heart Hospital to be eligible as a physician provider. It is my understanding that you have not achieved that status and therefore there is no opportunity to offer you a contract as a physician provider."

Dr. Shearlock rejected Dr. Williamson's inquiry without supplying her with an application or discussing her request with the Health First Board of Directors (which also functions as the credentialling committee). Dr. Shearlock stated that, as Health First's president and only administrative employee, he felt it was within his purview to screen applications in order to determine whether the applicant met the threshold requirements for membership. Since it was clear that Dr. Williamson did not have the appropriate privileges, Dr. Shearlock [*33] stated that he felt it unnecessary and wasteful to continue processing her application.

3. Dr. Williamson's Negotiations With PRC

While her various applications were pending, and even after they had been rejected, Dr. Williamson was attempting to negotiate an employment contract with PRC. At this same time, Sacred Heart was laying the groundwork for the creation of its own women's health care clinic. During the preliminary planning stages, and in conjunction with the Williamson/PRC negotiations, there was some discussion of Sacred Heart buying Dr. Williamson's equipment and making her the radiologist for the proposed clinic.

In the context of the parties' negotiations, it is clear that Dr. Williamson viewed joining PRC and operating the proposed Sacred Heart clinic as akin to a corporate merger. Consistent with this view, Dr. Williamson envisioned joining PRC as a shareholder and combining her assets, i.e. her clinical expertise, equipment and substantial client files, with those of PRC to form a single entity.

In contrast, PRC wanted Dr. Williamson to join the group as an employee, with the possibility of shareholder status in two years. In mid-August 1986, PRC in fact offered [*34] Dr. Williamson such a proposed contract in writing. However, by her own admission, Dr. Williamson was not interested in doing "hospital radiology." In particular, she did not want to be on call" at night or on weekends. Apparently, PRC was willing to accommodate Dr. Williamson's scheduling request in exchange for a 25% decrease in salary, but Dr. Williamson rejected this arrangement.

The proposed contract also contained a non-compete clause forbidding her to practice medicine in Escambia and Santa Rosa Counties for two years if she should separate from the group. Finally, it contained a termination clause that would have allowed PRC to terminate Dr. Williamson without cause upon 90-days' notice. Dr. Williamson had severe misgivings about the inclusion of these clauses. PRC, however, refused to change them, as they are commonly utilized. As a result, negotiations broke down, and on October 3, 1986, PRC withdrew its offer. [26]

[*35] The withdrawal of PRC's offer also eliminated the possibility of Dr. Williamson playing a part in the operation of Sacred Heart's proposed women's center. After discussions with PRC, the Ad Hoc Committee on the Women's [26] Plaintiff's clinic operated on a regular "9 to 5" type business schedule, and Dr. Williamson did not work nights or weekends. In addition, plaintiff's own figures show that association with PRC would have resulted in a decrease in her income.

Center had determined as early as January of 1986 that the creation of its own women's center and a formal relationship with Pensacola Diagnostic were mutually exclusive alternatives. [27]

After the negotiations between PRC and Dr. Williamson ended, Sacred Heart completed its plans for a free-standing women's center on the Sacred Heart grounds. In March of 1987, the Ann L. Baroco Center for Women's Health ("Ann Baroco Center") opened its doors. Located adjacent to Sacred Heart, the Center offers a broad range of services, including mammography, fetal ultrasound, and localization of breast lesions through the use of a Kopan's needle and wire. From the beginning, its planners had envisioned the [*36] Center as a self-supporting addition to the network of clinic based health care facilities that Sacred Heart was developing through its affiliate, Gulf Coast Diversified, Inc. It also was anticipated that the Center would be both the source and the beneficiary of referrals to and from Sacred Heart physicians and programs. In short, Sacred Heart was now in direct competition with Dr. Williamson and Pensacola Diagnostic.

4. Dr. Williamson's Second Application to Health First

On May 18, 1987, approximately two months after the Ann Baroco Center opened, Dr. Williamson contacted Dr. Baroco's office and renewed her request for a Health First membership. At that time, it was again explained to her that she did not have the requisite privileges. Nevertheless, Health First sent her an application. Dr. Williamson returned the completed application on June 5, 1987.

Although it was clear that Dr. Williamson did not meet the hospital privileges requirement, several Health First members (most notably Dr. Irvin) spoke to Dr. Shearlock and Dr. Baroco on her behalf. These recommendations notwithstanding, Health First denied Dr. Williamson's application. Although Health First's Board of Directors [*37] did not meet to consider the application until June 16, 1987, Dr. Shearlock wrote Dr. Williamson on June 11, and once again told her that, without privileges at either Baptist or Sacred Heart, she was not eligible for membership. Health First's Board of Directors later confirmed Dr. Shearlock's actions by rejecting Dr. Williamson's application.

Between August and September 1987, Dr. Williamson obtained privileges at two of HOP's outlying participating hospitals (Abernathy Hospital in Flomaton, Alabama, and at Greenlawn Hospital in Atmore, Alabama). When Dr. Williamson notified Dr. Shearlock of her newly acquired privileges, she may have assumed that she would then be eligible for Health First membership. However, it is undisputed that Dr. Williamson practices primarily within HOP's central" service area, i.e. within the greater Pensacola area. Her privileges at these "outlying" hospitals notwithstanding, the bylaws still required her to obtain privileges at either Sacred Heart or Baptist. Since Dr. Williamson still had not obtained these privileges, Dr. Shearlock again rejected her request for membership.

5. Dr. Williamson's 1987 Applications for Privileges

(a) Sacred [*38] Heart.

In December 1987, several months after she had been denied membership in Health First, Dr. Williamson contacted both Sacred Heart and Baptist and requested that they reconsider her applications for privileges. Because of the time lapse, Sacred Heart requested that Dr. Williamson update her application. Accordingly, on January 22, 1988, Dr. Williamson submitted an application requesting privileges in the Department of Family Practice. Subsequently, On March 8, 1988, she requested that she also be considered for privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine.

On March 11, 1988, Dr. Williamson met with the Credentials Committee and the Chairman of the Department of Internal Medicine. She explained her qualifications for Level I privileges, and, after describing her education and residency in nuclear medicine, she argued that her unique specialty qualified as a "primary care, medically oriented specialty" within the meaning of the Department of Internal Medicine Rules and Regulations provisions describing the eligibility criteria for Level I privileges.

[27] Obviously, if Sacred Heart had pursued both options, it would have ended up competing with itself.

She also argued that her eight years' experience in the primary care of breast cancer patients was at least the functional [*39] equivalent of "one year of approved post graduate clinical training in a primary care medically oriented specialty." Finally, Dr. Williamson pointed out that she satisfied the "experienced physician" exception to the requirements for Level II privileges.

Dr. Williamson again stated that she did not wish to practice radiology at Sacred Heart. She explained that many of her patients were frustrated by the fact that when surgery was indicated, she could not admit them to Sacred Heart, but instead had to turn them over to the care of another physician. She only desired to be able to admit those patients as the attending physician, consult with the appropriate surgeon, introduce her patients to the consultants, explain the procedures, write orders, and supervise the overall care of her patients.

The Credentials Committee concluded that Dr. Williamson had not completed the required one-year residency in a "primary care medically oriented" specialty as required by the bylaws. At its meeting on March 22, 1988, the Executive Committee accepted the Credentials Committee's recommendation that Dr. Williamson's application be denied.

At Dr. Williamson's request, a hearing committee convened [*40] on April 27, 1988, to determine whether the rejection was arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable. Present at the hearing were the committee members, counsel for Sacred Heart, Dr. Williamson and her counsel, representatives from the Departments of Radiology, Family Practice, Internal Medicine, and Obstetrics/Gynecology. As the Department of Radiology's representative, Dr. Hobgood of PRC attended the hearing as an observer. There is no evidence that he otherwise participated in the proceedings.

At the beginning of the hearing, Dr. Williamson voluntarily withdrew her application for membership and privileges in the Department of Family Practice. She then admitted that she had not completed a year of post-graduate clinical training in a "primary care medically oriented specialty" as required by the Rules and Regulations of the Department of Internal Medicine. However, she was prepared to present evidence showing that she was uniquely qualified by experience in a heretofore unrecognized sub-specialty of internal medicine that she described as comprehensive breast care.

Although the credentialling criteria for the Department of Internal Medicine does not allow for waiver of their requirements [*41] by a showing of practical expertise, Dr. Williamson took the position that Section 4.6 of the Sacred Heart Bylaws allowed the Board of Directors of the hospital to waive eligibility requirements where such waiver would serve the best interests of patient care. [28] Thus, she sought to create a record establishing her unique qualifications in the area of breast care.

The Hearing Committee determined that the only issue was whether her rejection had been arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable, which narrowed down to whether Dr. Williamson satisfied the requirements for Level I privileges as set out in the Rules and Regulations of the Department of Internal Medicine, i.e. whether she had completed one year of post-graduate clinical training. Therefore, [*42] the parties concluded that it was unnecessary, if not improper, for Dr. Williamson to present evidence unrelated to this narrow issue. In short, having admitted that she did not meet the literal requirements for Level I privileges, the Hearing Committee determined that its job was at an end.

Subsequently, Dr. Williamson wrote to Jay Hardman, the Hospital Administrator and representative of the Board of Directors, asking that the Board take up the issue of her request for a Section 4.6 exemption. At the same time, Dr. Williamson exercised her right under the Fair Hearing Plan to request appellate review of the Hearing Committee's adverse decision.

[28] Section 4.6 of Bylaws, Rules and Regulations of the Medical and Dental Staff of Sacred Heart Hospital provide: "The Board [of Directors] may waive any qualification when in its discretion such waiver will serve the best interests of patient care in the hospital."

At the Appellate Review Committee hearing on August 24, 1988, Dr. Williamson argued that the Hearing Committee erroneously had excluded evidence that her experience in the care and treatment of breast disease patients qualified her for privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine. Dr. Williamson further argued that the bylaws are primarily concerned with maintaining the quality of patient care, and therefore, that they should be interpreted broadly to allow her to show that her qualifications are at least equivalent to those she would [*43] have obtained in a one-year primary care residency.

The Appellate Review Committee nevertheless determined that the Hearing Committee properly had excluded the evidence of Dr. Williamson's equivalent training in her subspecialty. The Committee pointed out that the bylaws do not recognize breast care as a subspecialty within the Department of Internal Medicine, and concluded that neither it, nor the Hearing Committee, were authorized to amend the by-laws to create a new subspecialty or to waive the one-year residency requirement for Level I privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine. According to the Appellate Committee, these issue were solely within the purview of the Board of Directors. The Committee then affirmed the adverse recommendations of both the Hearing Committee and the Executive Committee, and recommended that Dr. Williamson's application for staff membership and privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine be denied.

On September 23, 1988, the Board of Directors reviewed the Appellate Review Committee's decision and recommendation, and adopted a resolution finding that the exclusion of the evidence relating to Dr. Williamson's medical expertise in the area [*44] of breast care was proper. The Board then denied her application for staff membership and privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine.

In another resolution adopted at the same time, the Board denied Dr. Williamson's request for a Section 4.6 waiver. The Board specifically concluded that there was no compelling reason to waive the eligibility requirements established by the Department of Internal Medicine, and that such a waiver would not serve the best interests of patient care.

(b) Baptist Hospital.

Dr. Williamson's second attempt to obtain privileges at Baptist proved much more fruitful than her attempts at Sacred Heart. In December 1987, Dr. Williamson wrote to Administrator John Robbins requesting that he reconsider her application. At this time, Dr. Williamson also requested information regarding privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine and the Department of Family Practice.

Robbins responded by letter dated January 12, 1988, in which he advised Dr. Williamson that, in order to qualify for privileges in the Department of Radiology, the Baptist Bylaws required the physician to spend at least 30 percent of her diagnostic radiology time in the Baptist [*45] Radiological Department. Inasmuch as the exclusive contract with Radiology Associates precluded her from practicing radiology at Baptist, it would be impossible for Dr. Williamson to meet this requirement. Nevertheless, Robbins again invited Dr. Williamson to detail what she wished to accomplish through membership on the Baptist medical staff.

By letter dated February 25, 1988, Dr. Williamson again explained that she had no desire to use her staff privileges to practice radiology, and that she only wished to admit patients and to provide follow-up care to patients she already had treated at her clinic. Dr. Williamson also discussed her qualifications in the fields of internal medicine and family practice. Finally, Dr. Williamson argued that, under the Baptist Bylaws, her medical staff privileges at University Hospital made her eligible for courtesy staff privileges at Baptist. Accordingly, she requested that Baptist also consider her application as one for courtesy staff privileges.

Baptist continued to process Dr. Williamson's application, and sometime in May 1988, the radiology department met and determined that she satisfied the minimum standards for privileges in diagnostic radiology [*46] at Baptist Hospital. Several telephone conversations then ensued between Dr. Williamson and Michael Fry, M.D., the Chief of Baptist's Department of Internal Medicine, during which the two physicians discussed Dr. Williamson's application for privileges in the Departments of Family Practice and Internal Medicine. The parties were able to work out an accommodation, and, in a letter dated July 27, 1988, Dr. Williamson agreed to withdraw her applications for privileges in those departments if Baptist would grant her application for courtesy privileges in the Department of Radiology.

On August 2, 1988, both the Credentials and Executive Committees recommended approval of Dr. Williamson's application for appointment to the courtesy medical staff with major privileges under supervision in diagnostic radiology. Subsequently, on August 23, 1988, the Board of Directors of Baptist Hospital approved her appointment.

As Baptist made clear during the processing of her application, Dr. Williamson's ability to practice radiology at Baptist would be circumscribed by its exclusive contract with Radiology Associates. However, plaintiff does not contend that the privileges granted to her were insufficient [*47] for her purposes. Further, Dr. Williamson expressed no objection to the bylaws requirement that her privileges be "under supervision" for the first two years of her membership on the Baptist medical staff.

As of the filing of her complaint in this case, Dr. Williamson had not attempted to admit any patients to Baptist. She has visited with patients on three separate occasions. According to Dr. Williamson, she did not review their medical records or make any entries on their charts. However, she did "consult" with these patients and their families on matters concerning the continuing care and treatment of their respective breast diseases.

6. Dr. Williamson's Renewed Attempt to Gain Membership in Health First

On August 10, 1988, Dr. Williamson informed Health First that she had obtained courtesy staff privileges under supervision at Baptist, and requested that her application for membership be processed. In again denying her application, Dr. Shearlock pointed out that the credentialling criteria of the Health First Bylaws require unsupervised privileges at either Baptist or Sacred Heart.

7. Dr. Williamson's Request For A Change In Privileges

Initially, Dr. Williamson [*48] expressed no outward signs of dissatisfaction with her privileges at Baptist. However, after she was rejected for membership in Health First, Dr. Williamson wrote to Al Stubblefield (Robbins' replacement as administrator) on January 9, 1989, requesting that her privileges be changed from "under supervision" to "unsupervised".

In her letter, Dr. Williamson emphasizes that her request was prompted by Health First's rejection. Furthermore, Dr. Williamson stated in her deposition that her current privileges were sufficient to meet the needs of her patients, and that she sought reclassification only to gain entrance into Health First.

Stubblefield responded on January 26, 1989, by pointing out that the bylaws, which Dr. Williamson had signed upon accepting her privileges, required that all initial appointments to both the associate and courtesy medical staff be provisional, i.e. "under supervision", for a period of two years before regular membership is granted. In addition, he reminded Dr. Williamson that the bylaws also required her to spend at least 30% of her practice in diagnostic radiology at Baptist before being eligible for regular privileges. Dr. Williamson met neither requirement. [*49] Hence, Stubblefield informed the plaintiff that Baptist could not change her privileges.

In a letter dated February 15, 1989, Dr. Williamson questioned Stubblefield's interpretation of the bylaws. Under Dr. Williamson's view, the thirty percent requirement would come into play if she sought promotion from the courtesy staff to the active staff, but would not bar her promotion from "provisional" (i.e. under supervision) courtesy staff to "regular" courtesy staff (i.e. not under supervision). Dr. Williamson reasoned that, because courtesy staff members are, by definition, physicians who "only occasionally attend patients" at Baptist Hospital, the imposition of the 30% practice requirement would defeat the purpose of having a courtesy staff.

Baptist rejected plaintiff's interpretation of its bylaws, and on March 16, 1989, Stubblefield wrote Dr. Williamson to inform her that both requirements applied to promotions from provisional courtesy to regular courtesy staff privileges. He also reminded Dr. Williamson that the hospital had warned her when she applied for privileges that the exclusive contract would make it impossible for her to meet the 30% practice requirement.

B. THREATS [*50] TO "BLACKBALL" DR. WILLIAMSON

Before Dr. Williamson opened her clinic, she contends that she met with Sacred Heart administrator Jay Hardman. Over the course of the meeting, Dr. Williamson says that she explained the organization of the clinic as well as her goal in creating it. At the conclusion of the meeting, Dr. Williamson alleges that Hardman told her that if she opened her clinic, Sacred Heart would close her one way or another, and threatened to "blackball" her. It is plaintiff's contention that Sacred Heart attempted to make good on this threat in three ways. First, Sacred Heart attacked her referral base. Second, it pressured Pensacola Pathologists into firing her husband, Michael Williamson M.D. Finally, it refused to accept her "needle placement" patients. Sacred Heart strongly denies making any threats against Dr. Williamson and disputes her three alleged theories of implementation.

1. Attacks on Dr. Williamson's Referral Base

It is undisputed that referrals from other physicians are vital to the success of Dr. Williamson's practice. According to Dr. Williamson, both Sacred Heart and PRC attacked this referral base in two ways. First, they threatened or [*51] otherwise pressured several physicians into reducing the number of patients they referred to her. Second, plaintiff alleges that between 1986 and 1988 Sacred Heart entered into contractual arrangements of one kind or another with several physicians in her referral base. Dr. Williamson alleges that Sacred Heart used its contractual leverage to coerce these physicians into referring patients back to Sacred Heart.

Dr. Murphy: According to plaintiff, the most important physicians in her referral base were B.L. Stalnaker, M.D. and Eugene Murphy, M.D. Drs. Stalnaker and Murphy practiced together as Obstetrician/gynecologists On October 14, 1986, Dr. Murphy gave an interview to the FTC in which he stated that Sacred Heart was not happy that he referred patients to Dr. Williamson. He stated that in several meetings with Sacred Heart administrators, Jay Hardman and defendant Dr. Post tried to convince him to divert referrals to Sacred Heart. According to Murphy, Sacred Heart focused on loyalty to the hospital, rather than on quality of care. Murphy allegedly rebuffed Sacred Heart's entreaties, and stated that because he had an established practice that could be taken elsewhere, he had [*52] enough leverage to "resist that, the gentle arm twisting." [29]

Dr. Stalnaker: Similarly, Williamson states that in 1985, and again in 1986 or 1987, Dr. Murphy's partner, Dr. Stalnaker, told her that Hardman threatened to pull his group's perinatal care contract unless he stopped referring patients to Dr. Williamson. Dr. Stalnaker also allegedly told Williamson that Hardman offered him kickbacks worth $ 300,000.00, as [*53] well as a reduction in his medical malpractice coverage requirement worth another $ 300,000.00, if he would refer his patients back to Sacred Heart. Finally, Dr. Williamson claims that Dr. Stalnaker told her that Hardman had threatened to call in the loans the hospital had made to various other practices if they continued to refer patients to Williamson.

Of course, all of Dr. Williamson's testimony concerning Dr. Stalnaker's statements to her is inadmissible hearsay. This leaves Dr. Stalnaker's own deposition testimony as the only credible evidence in the record regarding his dealings with Sacred Heart. Dr. Stalnaker flatly denies ever having told Dr. Williamson that Sacred Heart pressured him to divert referrals away from her clinic. He also denies having been offered kickbacks. In fact, Dr. Stalnaker stated that, unless a patient had a specific request, or was an in-patient at a hospital, he referred all his patients to Dr. Williamson.

The evidence on this point is hotly disputed, although it does not appear to be material. Defendants claim that, in 1985, Drs. Stalnaker and Murphy accounted for 354.5 referrals to Dr. Williamson. In 1986, the number of referrals from these two doctors [*54] increased to 409.5. [30]. Dr. Williamson counters that defendants' figures fail to [29] Defendants argue that Dr. Murphy's statements before the FTC are inadmissible hearsay. Actually, Dr. Murphy's statements may include hearsay within hearsay: The FTC testimony involves not only Dr. Murphy's own statements, but also Hardman's statements to Dr. Murphy. In the case of double hearsay, both levels of hearsay must fall within exception to the hearsay rule, or the entire statement is inadmissible. Dr. Murphy is now deceased. Plaintiff seems to be contending that these statements are within one of the exceptions to the hearsay rule, but that cannot be determined at this point.

[30] These figures were complied by Sacred Heart from Dr. Williamson's patient logs. Instances where two physicians names were listed as referral sources have been counted as half referrals to each doctor.

distinguish between new referrals and repeat visits from old referrals. Taking this factor into account, Dr. Williamson claims that new referrals from Drs. Stalnaker and Murphy dropped from approximately 450 in 1985, to 375 in 1986, and to fewer than 50 per year after 1987.

In viewing these statistics, however, it must be remembered that Dr. Murphy became gravely ill in 1986 and died in December of that year. Subsequently, Dr. Stalnaker sold his practice to Drs. Horan and Turner, and took a position as Director of Sacred Heart's obstetrics/gynecology residency program. As a result, he reduced his private practice to two and one-half days a week in 1986, and to one and one-half days a week beginning in 1989. In 1987 Dr. Stalnaker [*55] referred 55 new patients to Dr. Williamson, and in the years 1988-1990 he referred 16, 13, and 17 new patients respectively. In short, the decrease in referrals seems to be fully explained by the circumstances.

Dr. Horan and Dr. Turner: In 1985 Drs. Murphy and Stalnaker took in Charles A. Horan, M.D. as an associate. Subsequently, in 1986, they hired David Turner, M.D. After Dr. Murphy's death at the end of 1986, and pending his appointment as Director of Sacred Heart's OB/GYN residency program, Dr. Stalnaker agreed to sell his practice to Drs. Horan and Turner. Because they were young and had little or no collateral, Drs. Horan and Turner did not believe that they could get a bank loan for the purchase.

Consequently, Sacred Heart agreed to lend them the money. The loan agreement called for interest only payments during the first year, interest and principal payments in the second and third years, and a balloon payment in the third year with an option to renew. In addition, Sacred Heart did not require that the loan be fully collateralized. Both physicians stated that these terms were very advantageous.

According to the agreement, Sacred Heart made the loan as an inducement [*56] to Drs. Horan and Turner to maintain their practice in the Sacred Heart service area and to provide professional services to their patients at Sacred Heart. In addition, paragraph 3(b) of the agreement, under "covenants", also provides:

> In consideration for the aforesaid inducements from Hospital to Corporation, Corporation agrees that its physician shareholders and employees shall utilize the in-patient and out-patient facilities operated by Hospital and its affiliated corporations for their patients, to the extent feasible, and unless patient choice dictates otherwise.

Drs. Horan and Turner stated that maintaining the viability of their practice was important to Sacred Heart since it stood to lose approximately 30% of its OB-GYN service if their practice collapsed.

According to Dr. Williamson, Drs. Horan and Turner told her that Sacred Heart threatened not to renew their note unless they referred their radiology patients to Sacred Heart. Once again, Dr. Williamson's statements concerning Drs. Horan and Turner are hearsay and do not appear to fall within any exception to the hearsay rule. Therefore, the only credible evidence in the record concerning the relationship [*57] between Sacred Heart and Drs. Horan and Turner are the statements of the doctors themselves. Both physicians deny that the referral covenant created a quid pro quo requiring them to refer patients to the hospital's radiology department, or that they were under any pressure to make such referrals. Dr. Horan also denies having made any statements to the contrary to Dr. Williamson.

According to Dr. Horan, he and Dr. Turner were free to refer their patients as they saw fit. In this regard, defendants have submitted statistics which show that during the years 1986, 1987, 1988, and 1989, these two doctors accounted for 81, 80, 106.5, and 187.5 breast referrals to Dr. Williamson. Plaintiff does not agree with these statistics. Furthermore, Dr. Turner states that they chose not to renew the note in 1989 when the balloon payment came due, and had no further agreement after 1989.

Dr. Antonelli: In August 1987, Sacred Heart loaned Emilio Antonelli, M.D. and Stricker Mays, M.D. $ 300,479.00 to buy the OB/GYN practice of Eddie M. Frazier, M.D. This agreement is very similar to that of Drs. Horan and Turner, except that the "utilization" clause reads:

> In consideration of the aforesaid [*58] inducements from Hospital to Corporation, Antonelli and Mays agree that they shall utilize the inpatient and outpatient facilities operated by Hospital and its affiliated corporations for > their patients, to the extent feasible, and in accordance with acceptable medical practice, and unless patient choice dictates otherwise.

According to Dr. Antonelli, Sacred Heart wanted to insert a more restrictive clause, but backed down after he refused.

In his deposition, Dr. Antonelli praised Dr. Williamson, and stated that, unless a patient requested otherwise, he always referred his patients to Dr. Williamson. There is absolutely no evidence that his relationship with Sacred Heart affected his referral patterns.

Drs. Fowler and Willis: Sacred Heart also loaned Louis B. Fowler, M.D. and Wayne Willis, M.D., partners in a family care practice, $ 50,000.00 to build a small pharmacy building on their office property. Drs. Fowler and Willis then leased the building back to Sacred Heart, which operated it as a pharmacy. During initial negotiations, Sacred Heart evidently asked them to refer their patients to the hospital. According to Drs. Fowler and Willis, they told Sacred Heart that [*59] they wouldn't have anything to do with such an arrangement, after which Sacred Heart "immediately" backed down. Subsequently, neither physician has received any pressure from Sacred Heart to refer patients to the hospital. Nor is there any evidence that their referral pattern vis-a-vis Dr. Williamson changed after they entered into the agreement with Sacred Heart.

In fact, Drs. Fowler and Willis subsequently entered into an arrangement whereby Dr. Williamson agreed to overread their x-rays on an "as needed" basis. Drs. Fowler and Willis previously had approached PRC at Sacred Heart with the same proposal. When Dr. Post of PRC insisted not only that his group read all films generated by the Fowler/Willis clinic, but also that PRC have supervisory control over their clinic's radiology department and employees, Drs. Fowler and Willis discontinued negotiations with PRC and reached the agreement with Dr. Williamson.

Shortly after this agreement was consummated, Sacred Heart's lease on the pharmacy expired, and they chose not to renew it. Plaintiff attempts to link her agreement with Drs. Fowler and Willis with Sacred Heart's abandonment of the pharmacy. However, Sacred Heart's representative [*60] in charge of the pharmacy, Richard Zeiler, as well as Drs. Fowler and Willis, denied any such linkage and stated in their depositions that the pharmacy was closed because it was not financially successful. Though it turned a small profit, the parties anticipated that sales would continue to fall off when a national drug store chain completed construction of a nearby store.

Dr. McMahon: Dr. Williamson further alleges that Dr. McMahon - - - who is the Medical Director of the Sacred Heart Surgery Center, and the Chairman of the Department of Surgery - - - told her that, because he had to support the hospital, he could not work with her. As with Dr. Stalnaker, Dr. McMahon denies ever having made such a comment to plaintiff.

Drs. Belk and Irvin: Dr. Williamson also claims that William W. Belk, M.D. and E. Coy Irvin, Jr., M.D. - - - partners in a family care practice - - - told her that Sacred Heart told them not to talk to her. According to Dr. Williamson, Drs. Belk and Irvin succumbed to the pressure from Sacred Heart, and stopped sending patients to her in 1987. In support of her argument, she points out that in 1986 and 1987 Drs. Belk and Irvin accounted for over 200 new referrals [*61] per year. However, after August 1987, when they entered into what Dr. Belk described as a "joint venture" with Sacred Heart to open a satellite office in Pace, Florida, their referrals decreased to 108 for 1988, and to 70 and 25 in 1989 and 1990, respectively. The precise nature of this "joint venture" is unclear, but it is undisputed that Sacred Heart rented the office and subleased it to Drs. Belk and Irvin. It is also undisputed that the contract contained no provisions relating to referrals.

Again, Dr. Williamson's statements are hearsay and are not admissible to prove the truth of what Drs. Belk and Irvin told her. And, once again, Drs. Belk and Irvin, like Drs. Horan and Turner, deny being under any pressure to disassociate themselves from Dr. Williamson. Instead, they mention a number of factors that lead to a decrease in referrals to Dr. Williamson.

Prior to 1987, Drs. Belk and Irvin were located next door to Dr. Williamson, making her services very convenient. Sometime in 1987, they acquired x-ray equipment for their Pensacola office and started to do much of their own x-ray work. In addition, they moved their Pensacola office to a new Gulf Coast Medical Arts Center several [*62] miles away from Dr. Williamson's clinic. [31] This move placed Dr. Williamson's facilities and Sacred Heart's facilities equally distant from their offices. At the same time, Sacred Heart opened its own women's clinic, the Ann Baroco Center. Dr. Belk stated that as the Ann Baroco center became more established, patients began asking to go there. Finding no difference in the quality of care between Dr. Williamson and the Ann Baroco Center, Drs. Belk and Irvin respected these requests. [32]

Despite the fact that, after 1987, they performed their own simple x-ray procedures, defendants claim that referrals to Dr. Williamson from Drs. Belk and Irvin actually increased. They claim that plaintiff's records show that in [*63] 1987, Drs. Belk and Irvin accounted for 136.5 referrals to her clinic. [33] This number decreased in 1988 to 132 referrals, but increased again in 1989 to 157 referrals.

Dr. Howard: On December 13, 1984, Joseph D. Howard, M.D. entered into an agreement with Gulf Coast Diversified ("Gulf Coast"), an affiliate of Sacred Heart and co-owner of HOP, to operate a family care clinic. According to the agreement, Gulf Coast would provide the administrative support and Dr. Howard would provide the physician services. The agreement states that Dr. Howard is an independent contractor. The agreement also states that "[Gulf Coast] shall be notified of any referral of patients . . . for medical services to any entity other than Sacred Heart Hospital of Pensacola." Finally, the agreement states that "[Dr. Howard] agrees to utilize specialty physicians who are members of the medical staff of Sacred [*64] Heart Hospital of Pensacola wherever practical to ensure continuity of patient care."

There is no indication that Dr. Williamson ever had a referral relationship with Dr. Howard. Instead, she alleges that Dr. Howard's referrals to Thomas Brown, M.D., another independent radiologist for whom Dr. Williamson worked when she first came to Pensacola, virtually ceased after Dr. Howard entered into the agreement with Sacred Heart.

In her affidavit, Mary Ellen Neal, Dr. Howard's head nurse at the time, stated that, when Sacred Heart established its relationship with Dr. Howard, she became an employee of Sacred Heart. She was supervised by a head nurse who came to the clinic from Sacred Heart Hospital, and who, in turn, reported to the Sacred Heart administration.

Ms. Neal states that prior to Dr. Howard's relationship with Sacred Heart, the majority of his referrals for out-patient radiological services went to Dr. Brown. Immediately after the relationship began, the supervising nurse told Ms. Neal that the clinic staff was to send all out-patient radiological referrals to Sacred Heart. She was told not to ask the patient where they wanted to go, but instead, to simply schedule the patient [*65] for Sacred Heart. Only if the patient objected were the staff to consider referring the patient to another facility. As a result, referrals to Dr. Brown virtually ceased. Of course, as previously noted, Dr. Brown is not a party to this case, and there is no evidence of any relationship between plaintiff and Dr. Howard that is relevant to this issue.

Dr. Mixon: On April 10, 1989, shortly after Dr. Williamson filed her complaint in this case, Fred S. Mixon, M.D. entered into an agreement to operate a family care clinic similar to that between Gulf Coast and Dr. Howard. As with Dr. Howard, Gulf Coast supplied administrative support, while Dr. Mixon provided physician services. Also like Dr. Howard, Dr. Mixon is an independent contractor. In addition, Dr. Mixon's agreement contains the same requirement that he utilize specialty physicians from Sacred Heart "wherever practical to ensure continuity of patient care." However, Dr. Mixon's agreement contains an additional restriction specifically requiring him to utilize radiology services provided by Sacred Heart unless Sacred Heart instructs him to use an outside radiologist. According to Dr. Brown, referrals from Dr. Mixon ceased after [*66] he entered into this agreement. As with Dr. Howard, the record reflects no relationship between Dr. Mixon and the plaintiff that is relevant to this issue.

[31] Gulf Coast Medical Arts Center is a group of several practices that pooled their resources to build an office complex. Sacred Heart is not associated with Gulf Coast Medical Arts Center.

[32] Drs Belk and Irvin do not contend that there was any problem with Dr. Williamson's quality of care.

[33] As discussed above, defendants' numbers do not differentiate between new referrals and repeat visits by old referrals.

Dr. Cross: Dr. Williamson has alleged that David Alan Cross, M.D., a local surgeon, intimated to her that he and others with whom he was familiar were under pressure from Sacred Heart to route their radiology referrals back to Sacred Heart. As with the other physicians alleged to have been under such pressure, Dr. Cross stated under oath that he was under no pressure, had not been threatened by Sacred Heart, knew of no other physicians subject to pressure or threats, knew of no direct attempts to interrupt Dr. Williamson's referral patterns and that he never communicated any information to the contrary to Dr. Williamson. Dr. Williamson's testimony again appears to be inadmissible hearsay.

Dr. Westafer: Remarkably, Dr. Williamson next points to the contract between Anita S. Westafer, M.D. and Baptist Hospital. As with the contracts between Drs. Mixon and Howard and Sacred Heart, Baptist agreed to help equip and staff Dr. Westafer's office, in return for which Dr. Westafer agreed to provide the specified physician services. [*67] Dr. Williamson argues that after Dr. Westafer signed this contract in April of 1988, her referrals to Dr. Williamson decreased from approximately 70 new referrals on 1987 to 30 and 40 referrals in 1988 and 1989.

What plaintiff fails to mention is that Dr. Westafer's new referrals to Dr. Williamson had been dropping off steadily since 1985. In that year Dr. Westafer referred approximately 130 new patients. New referrals dropped to just under 100 in 1986, and to approximately 70 in 1987. In 1988, the year Dr. Westafer signed the contract with Baptist, her new referrals dropped to a low of approximately 30, but began to rise again to 40 in 1989, and to over 50 in 1990.

Moreover, Dr. Westafer's contract specifically states that she is not required to refer patients to Baptist. Quite to the contrary, the agreement provides:

> [Dr. Westafer] hereby acknowledges that the choice of services and the choice of service of suppliers that [Dr. Westafer] makes on behalf of its patients must be, and will be, made only with regard to the best interest of the patients themselves. Physician hereby specifically acknowledges, that the compensation that [Dr. Westafer] [*68] is to receive hereunder in no way requires, and is in no way contingent upon, the admission, recommendation, referral or any other form of arrangement by [Dr. Westafer] for utilization by patients or others of any item or service offered by the Hospital.

Drs. French and Montgomery: In October 1988, Baptist advanced Barbara French, M.D. and Paula Montgomery, M.D. working capital in the amount of $ 40,000.00 to open up their family care practice in Escambia County. Their loan agreement contained a clause identical to that quoted above from Dr. Westafer's contract. Plaintiff does not argue that Drs. French and Montgomery ever referred significant numbers of patients to her. Instead, she advances the novel theory that, but for their contractual relationship with Baptist, their referrals to her would have grown significantly.

In support of her contention, plaintiff compares the referral patter of Drs. French and Montgomery to that of Dr. Epps. Not a party to a contract with any hospital, Dr. Epps increased his new referrals to Dr. Williamson from 34 in 1987 to 325 in 1990.

Dr. Williamson also claims that members of the Sacred Heart Staff made disparaging remarks to others concerning [*69] the quality of her medical care and that of her clinic. Again, the only evidence supporting this allegation is the testimony of Dr. Williamson, which is inadmissible hearsay. And again, every physician that plaintiffs deposed denied ever having heard or made any of the disparaging remarks as claimed by the plaintiff, so the only material evidence of record fails to support plaintiff's claims.

2. Alleged Threats to Michael Williamson

When the Williamsons moved to Pensacola, Dr. Williamson's husband, Michael Williamson, M.D., a pathologist, became a professional employee of Pensacola Pathologists. In 1985, after two years employment, Dr. Michael Williamson became a shareholder and director of the professional association. Throughout his employment with Pensacola Pathologists, the corporation held an exclusive contract with Sacred Heart for the provision of pathology services. Eighty percent of the corporation's income came from this contract.

Shortly after Dr. Angel Williamson began advertising her clinic in 1984, Jerrard H. Hilbert, M.D., Pensacola Pathologists' founder, called a meeting of the group. According to Dr. Michael Williamson, Dr. Hilbert told him in front of the other [*70] physicians that Sacred Heart was upset with the Pensacola Diagnostic's advertising. He also allegedly stated that the advertising could mean trouble for the group and that trouble for the group would mean trouble for Michael Williamson. Dr. Hilbert then allegedly requested Dr. Michael Williamson to ask his wife to tone down her advertising.

David P. Nicholson, M.D., another shareholder in Pensacola Pathologists, stated that, around the time Dr. Angel Williamson began advertising her clinic, he had conversations with Dr. Hilbert in which Dr. Hilbert expressed concern over the fact that plaintiff's advertising might have a negative impact on Pensacola Pathologists' relationship with Sacred Heart. However, Dr. Nicholson stated that Dr. Michael Williamson was not present during these conversations, and that he had no knowledge of anyone from the group discussing the matter with Sacred Heart.

Dr. Michael Williamson further stated that, around the same time he commented on Pensacola Diagnostic's advertising, Dr. Hilbert told him that Sister Mary Carroll, a Sacred Heart administrator, had questioned him (Dr. Hilbert) about the quality of his (Dr. Michael Williamson's) work. Dr. Michael [*71] Williamson stated that such questioning by the Sisters was very unusual, and that he took it to be a threatening gesture.

Dr. Hilbert denies ever having made any of these statements. In addition, as discussed more fully below, these statements attributed to Dr. Hilbert are hearsay to the extent they are offered to show that Sacred Heart, in fact, threatened or pressured Pensacola Pathologists.

Dr. Angel Williamson also has testified to a number of conversations she allegedly had with Pensacola Pathologists shareholders concerning the effect of her practice on her husband's job. She states that Dr. Hilbert and Dr. Nicholson, along with Everett S. Harvard, M.D. and Fenner McConnell, M.D. (the two remaining Pensacola Pathologists shareholders), told her that Sacred Heart was very angry about her advertising, that this meant trouble for Pensacola Pathologists, which meant trouble for Dr. Michael Williamson.

Dr. Angel Williamson also states that, during the time when she was negotiating with PRC and Sacred Heart for the purchase of her practice, Dr. McConnell told the Williamsons at dinner one night that Jay Hardman had tried very hard to make the corporation fire Dr. Michael Williamson. [*72] He allegedly went on to state that things would be better for everyone if she reached an agreement with Sacred Heart. Once again, all of the Williamsons' statements concerning what Dr. McConnell and other members of Pensacola Pathologists said are inadmissible hearsay.

According to Dr. McConnell, the Williamsons invited him and his wife to dinner at a local restaurant, where Dr. Angel Williamson told him that she was negotiating with Sacred Heart and PRC to join the radiology group. Dr. McConnell states that he responded that he was happy because it would make his job easier. He admitted that the controversy between Sacred Heart and Dr. Angel Williamson made him uncomfortable in the negotiation of his own contract with Sacred Heart. He denied that any threats, of any type, were made by Sacred Heart.

When Dr. McMahon and Jay Hardman visited Dr. Angel Williamson in December 1985 to tell her that Sacred Heart no longer would accept her needle placement patients, Hardman allegedly asked her how she would feel if her husband's group lost its contract. Dr. Angel Williamson claims that she understood this to mean that if she fought the decision to ban her patients, Sacred Heart would have [*73] her husband fired.

Pensacola Pathologists' contract with Sacred Heart expired on December 31, 1988. Although negotiations to renew the contract began as early as September 1988, the parties did not reach an agreement on a new contract until June 1989. Until that time, Pensacola Pathologists continued to work without a contract. According to Dr. Angel Williamson, Drs. Hilbert and McConnell told her husband that this delay was occasioned by Sacred Heart's displeasure over her competition with them. These statements are also inadmissible hearsay.

Dr. McConnell expressed his concern over this delay in a conversation with Dr. David Cross. According to Dr. McConnell, he told Dr. Cross that he felt that, in general, Sacred Heart was putting undue pressure on hospital based physicians to accept increasingly more restrictive contract terms. In particular, Dr. McConnell commented on the fact that Sacred Heart was pressuring his own group into accepting a 90-day termination clause that he felt was unfair to the physicians. It also appears that Sacred Heart would not agree to an increase in the reimbursement rates for certain services. Although Dr. McConnell denies that any of this pressure [*74] was connected to Sacred Heart's ongoing controversy with Dr. Angel Williamson, he did indicate that the group had decided to terminate its relationship with Dr. Michael Williamson.

Dr. Cross tells a different story. According to Dr. Cross, sometime in May 1989, he had gone to the pathology department to speak with Dr. McConnell. Their conversation turned to the subject of Pensacola Pathologists' negotiations to renew their contract. At this point, Dr. McConnell allegedly told Dr. Cross that his group had acquiesced to pressure from Sacred Heart to get rid of Dr. Michael Williamson, and that, as a result, they would be able to renew their contract.

Several weeks later, on June 14, 1989, Pensacola Pathologists and Sacred Heart completed negotiations on the pathology contract. On the same day, Drs. Hilbert and Harvard informed Dr. Michael Williamson that Pensacola Pathologists would terminate his employment as of November 30, 1989. On June 15, 1989, Sacred Heart signed the pathology contract. On June 22, 1989, the Board of Directors of Pensacola Pathologists formally voted to terminate Dr. Michael Williamson, as their professional agreement allowed. As a result, he lost his privileges [*75] to practice at Sacred Heart, and was forced to sell his shares in the corporation.

Drs. Hilbert, Harvard and McConnell have denied that there was any connection between the renewal of the pathology contract and the termination of Dr. Michael Williamson. In addition, they point out that, at the same time Sacred Heart and Pensacola Pathologists completed their negotiations, Pensacola Pathologists also decided not to renew its contract with Roche Laboratories. During his time with the group, Dr. Michael Williamson had spent at least 50 percent of his time at Roche on behalf of the group. Thus, Pensacola Pathologists maintains that it simply had no further need for Dr. Michael Williamson's services.

Drs. Hilbert, Harvard, and McConnell also have stated that Sacred Heart never expressed any concern or complaints over Dr. Angel Williamson's advertising, and that the hospital never exerted any pressure on the group to fire Dr. Michael Williamson. In addition, each has stated that he never told Dr. Angel Williamson that the group was in danger of losing its contract because of its association with her husband. To the contrary, when the pathologists approached Sacred Heart with their concern [*76] that Dr. Michael Williamson's association with the group might influence the upcoming contract negotiations, Jay Hardman is alleged to have told Dr. McConnell that Dr. Michael Williamson would have to be judged on his own merits.

3. The Needle Placement Controversy

Occasionally, Dr. Williamson's examination will reveal a lesion in the patient's breast which must be removed for analysis. Often these lesions are nonpalpable, and too small to be found easily by the surgeon. The accepted procedure in these circumstances is to insert a Kopan's needle containing a very thin hook-wire into the breast at the point of the suspected lesion. After properly positioning the needle so that it isolates the lesion, the radiologist removes the needle, leaving the hook-wire attached to, or very near, the lesion. The surgeon need only follow the wire to find the suspected lesion.

Once the suspected lesion is removed, the specimen is then transported to the radiologist and a pathologist for examination and testing. The pathologist dissects the specimen, after which the radiologist performs an x-ray on the dissection. The radiologist then compares this film to the original x-ray to ensure that the [*77] proper tissue has been removed. The specimen is then sent to a pathologist who determines whether the lesion is cancerous.

When a Sacred Heart radiologist initiates the needle placement procedure, each subsequent step is performed on the Hospital premises. The radiologist performs the mammogram, places the needle, and then escorts the patient to the Sacred Heart surgi-center. A Sacred Heart surgeon removes the specimen, which is then transported back to the radiology department. There, a pathologist dissects the specimen and examines it along with the radiologist. The radiologist then re-mammograms the specimen. The pathologist then takes the specimen back to the pathology department for further testing. In the meantime, the patient remains in the surgery area in case further specimens are needed.

In the fall of 1985, shortly after Sacred Heart denied her first request for privileges, Dr. Williamson met with Drs. Hilbert, McConnell, Havard, and Nicholson of the Sacred Heart Pathology Department. They discussed the feasibility of Dr. Williamson performing the needle placement procedure at her clinic and then sending the patient to Sacred Heart for specimen removal and pathological [*78] examination. Dr. Williamson would identify the lesion, position the needle and localize the wire. A technician would then walk with the patient across the Sacred Heart parking lot to the Sacred Heart surgi-center, where a surgeon would remove the specimen. [34]

Once removed, the specimen would be returned to Dr. Williamson's clinic for dissection and another x-ray. After determining that the proper tissue had been removed, Dr. Williamson would send the specimen to the Sacred Heart pathology department for further testing. While Dr. Williamson performed these procedures, the patient would remain on the operating table at the surgi-center.

The pathologists agreed that an arrangement could probably be worked out, and Dr. Williamson was permitted to follow this procedure with several patients. No quality of care problems ever [*79] arose on these occasions. Nevertheless, shortly after Dr. Williamson implemented this protocol, technicians at the surgi-center contacted the pathologists and questioned whether it was appropriate to send specimens off the Sacred Heart grounds.

At the same time, William R. Bell, M.D., a member of the pathology group not present at the meeting with Dr. Williamson, expressed a number of concerns related to quality assurance and legal liability. First, Dr. Williamson's procedure did not allow for joint review of the biopsy specimen by the radiologist and the pathologist. Second, the procedure involved dissection of the specimen by Dr. Williamson, who, as a radiologist, is not specifically trained in such procedures. Third, the transportation of the specimen to Dr. Williamson's clinic would involve loss of control over the integrity of the specimen. Fourth, delays in processing the specimen might lead to deterioration. Finally, because she did not have staff privileges, Dr. Williamson was outside the Sacred Heart quality assurance mechanism.

Dr. Bell discussed his concerns with Dr. Hilbert, Dr. McMahon (the Medical Director of the Sacred Heart Surgical Center and the Chairman of the [*80] Department of Surgery), and Sacred Heart administrator Edward Lohmiller. As a result, the administration called a meeting of the Medical Advisory Board. The Board met on December 4, 1985. After much discussion, it concluded that the breaks in the quality control chain not only threatened the integrity of the needle placement procedure, but also unnecessarily exposed the hospital to civil liability. Although no one could demonstrate that Dr. Williamson's protocol resulted in a decrease or decline in the quality of care, and despite the fact that several of the physicians present apparently felt that there was no serious problem, the Advisory Board recommended both that the hospital not allow specimens removed at Sacred Heart to be transported outside the Sacred Heart complex, and that Sacred Heart not accept needle placement patients whose lesions had been localized in a physician's office outside the hospital.

Several days later, Jay Hardman, Sacred Heart's administrator, and Dr. McMahon visited Dr. Williamson at her office and told her of the Advisory Board's decision. However, it was not until April 1, 1987, that the Surgical Center issued a written policy statement directing that [*81] all specimens removed from a patient's body be submitted directly to the pathology department. This statement did not address the needle localization, and it was not until October 17, 1989, that Dr. Whitcomb wrote Dr. Williamson and made it clear that Sacred Heart would no longer accept patients with needle localizations for breast biopsy unless they were under the care of a Sacred Heart staff radiologist.

Despite its stated concern over the removal of specimens from the Sacred Heart campus, it is undisputed that the pathology department received thousands of samples, including breast biopsies, from places other than the Sacred Heart Surgical Center. In addition, it is undisputed that the pathology department routinely sends specimens to outside laboratories. [35] Other doctors utilize couriers to send samples to Sacred Heart's pathologists. Dr.

[34] Dr. Williamson's clinic is adjacent to the Sacred Heart Hospital grounds, and is no farther from the surgi-center, which is free-standing, than the Sacred Heart radiology department.

Williamson argues that Sacred Heart's professed quality control concerns were illusory, and that her needle placement procedure posed no greater quality assurance concerns than Sacred Heart's procedure. Specifically, she contends that board certified radiologists are qualified to dissect breast biopsy specimens, and that the removal of the [*82] specimen to her clinic poses no greater risk than the use of any outside laboratory.

PLAINTIFFS' CLAIMS

Dr. Williamson and her clinic filed the complaint in this case on March 29, 1989. Count I of the complaint alleges a conspiracy among Sacred Heart, PRC, and Dr. Post to restrain trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act [15 U.S.C. § 1] by making it impossible for independent radiologists to compete against them in the provision of radiology services. Count II alleges a similar conspiracy between Baptist and Radiology Associates. Count III alleges a conspiracy among all the defendants to restrain trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act by excluding [*83] Dr. Angel Williamson from Health First, and thus from HOP and its patient base. Count IV alleges a pendent state law claim against Sacred Heart, PRC, and Dr. Post for tortious interference with present and prospective business relationships.

Defendants counter that there is no evidence of an antitrust conspiracy and that plaintiff Williamson has failed to show an antitrust injury. In addition, Sacred Heart, Baptist and Health First argue that their actions in denying Dr. Williamson's requests for privileges and staff membership are immune from antitrust liability under the Health Care Quality Improvement Act, Title 42, United States Code, Sections 11101, et seq. Finally, Sacred Heart, PRC and Dr. Post argue that there is no evidence that they improperly interfered with plaintiff's business relationships.

II. ANALYSIS

A. Defendants' Joint Motion to Strike Expert Witnesses' Affidavits

Before taking up the substance of defendants' several motions for summary judgment, I first must address their joint motion to strike certain expert witnesses' affidavits submitted by plaintiff Williamson in support of her opposition to defendants' motions. (doc. 317). For the reasons [*84] set out below, that motion is GRANTED.

On May 26, 1989, I entered my standard scheduling order. To facilitate expert witness discovery pursuant, the order provided:

> Expert Witnesses. The identification of expert witnesses and their opinions is commonly the source of most pretrial delay. In order to expedite the discovery process, and in addition to the requirements of Rule 26(B)(4)(A), each party shall submit to the opposing party at the earliest opportunity a list of all expert witnesses anticipated to testify at trial. The list shall also included the address and area of expertise of each expert witness. A copy of each expert's written opinion with supporting facts and grounds, or a written summary thereof, shall be attached to the list. Although no time deadline is set herein for the submission of this information, the parties are directed to do so sufficiently in advance of the discovery deadline set in paragraph (a) of this Order so depositions may be scheduled and taken before the discovery period ends. Expert witnesses not timely identified as required herein, or whose expert opinions have been significantly modified or changed after discovery has ended, [*85] will normally not be permitted to testify at trial. [35] As a matter of standard procedure, specimens entering or leaving the Pathology Department are transported by courier. However, on occasion, a patient or a doctor may bring a sample directly to the department for analysis. Sacred Heart employed its own couriers to transport specimens between different locations within the Sacred Heart complex.

[36] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(4) provides:

> (4) Trial Preparation: Experts. Discovery of facts known and opinions held by experts, otherwise discoverable under the provisions of subdivision (b)((1) of this rule and acquired or developed in anticipation of litigation or for trial, may be obtained only as follows:
> (A)(i) A party may through interrogatories require any other party to identify each person whom the other party expects to call as an expert witness at trial, to state the subject matter on which the expert is expected to testify, and to state the

Before the discovery period closed on April 30, 1990, the defendants propounded interrogatories seeking the name of each person Dr. Williamson expected to call as an expert witness at trial in this matter. In connection with [*86] each expert, defendants also requested that Dr. Williamson identify (1) the subject matter on which each expert would testify, (2) the substance of the opinions to which each expert would testify, and (3) a summary of the facts upon which the opinions were based.

In her responses, which are dated January 26, 1990, April 13, 1990 and April 25, 1990, Dr. Williamson interposed a general objection to the interrogatories as a whole, stating that due to delays in discovery occasioned by defendants' failure to produce relevant documents, she had been unable to fully develop responses. Specifically with regard to the expert witness interrogatories, Dr. Williamson answered that she "has not yet determined which expert may be called as a witness at trial of this matter. When this determination is made, Williamson will respond to this interrogatory."

As early as March 7, 1990, plaintiff's attorney had written to defendants' attorneys explaining that plaintiff's experts would not be able to form their opinions until all discovery was complete. Therefore, he suggested that the parties agree to engage in expert discovery after the completion of fact discovery. Defendants refused to agree to extend [*87] discovery beyond the April 30, 1990, cut-off date.

At the end of the discovery period, defendant Sacred Heart identified one expert. However, the expert's report was not produced until February 27, 1991, when Sacred Heart filed it as an exhibit to its motion for summary judgment. No other defendant has identified an expert. Plaintiff did not reveal any experts until April 1, 1991, almost a year after the discovery period had ended, when she incorporated their affidavits into her opposition to defendants' several motions for summary judgment.

Alleging a failure to comply with Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 26(b)(4) and 26(e), and this court's Scheduling Order of May 26, 1989, setting the April 30, 1990, discovery deadline, defendants moved to strike these affidavits, as well as the affidavits of several fact witnesses whom defendants claim plaintiff has not previously identified. In response, plaintiff claims that delays in the completion of discovery prevented her from identifying her experts until just before filing her response.

The plaintiff failed to comply with the Scheduling Order's clear requirements concerning expert witnesses. Therefore, the testimony of such witnesses [*88] must be disallowed, as the order expressly warns.

B. Summary Judgment Standard

HN1[] A motion for summary judgment should be granted when "the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue of material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c) See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 2552, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265, 273 (1986); Everett v. Napper, 833 F.2d 1507, 1510 (11th Cir. 1987). An issue of fact is "material" if it might affect the outcome of the case under the governing law. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 2510, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 211 (1986). It is "genuine" if the record taken as a whole could lead a rational trier of fact to find for the non-moving party. Id. See also Matsushita Electric Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 1356, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 552 (1986).

HN3[] On summary judgment motion, the record and all inferences that can be drawn from it, must be viewed in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. United States v. Diebold, Inc., 369 U.S. 654, 655, 82 S. Ct. 993, 994, 8 L. Ed. 2d 176, 177 (1962). Furthermore, the court must consider the entire record in the case, not just those pieces of evidence which have been singled out for attention by the parties. See Clinkscales v. Chevron USA, Inc., 831 F.2d 1565, 1570 (11th Cir. 1987).

C. Health Care Quality Improvement Act

In their several motions for summary judgment, defendants argue that plaintiffs claims are barred by the Health Care Quality Improvement Act, Title 42, United States Code, Section 11101, et seq. ("HCQIA"). HN4[] This statute creates antitrust immunity for a "professional [*90] review body" in connection with a "professional review action." 42 U.S.C. § 11111(a). Defendants correctly point out that Sacred Heart, Baptist, and Health First qualify as "professional review bodies," and that their decisions regarding privileges and membership qualify on their face as "professional review actions." [37] However, they also concede, as they must, that for immunity to attach under the HCQIA, the review action must have been taken "in the reasonable belief that the action was in the furtherance of quality care," and "in the reasonable belief that the action was warranted by the facts known after [a] reasonable effort to obtain the facts and after [providing] notice and hearing procedures." Id. at § 11112(a). The statute creates a rebuttable presumption that these requirements have been met. Id.

[*91] In this case, the major thrust of plaintiff's claims is that the defendants did not act in a reasonable belief that their actions furthered quality health care. As the evidence amply demonstrates, Dr. Williamson is a qualified professional whose services are well regarded by many of her peers. I agree with defendants that there is a substantial amount of evidence supporting the application of the HCQIA to the actions in question, but it cannot be resolved on summary judgment. Sufficient evidence exists to create a genuine issue of fact on the question of whether defendants acted reasonably in the furtherance of quality of care.

In addition, there is a question as to whether Dr. Williamson was afforded notice and a hearing within the meaning of the Act. I realize that there is no evidence suggesting that Dr. Williamson requested such a hearing, but the record is silent as to whether one was readily available. Furthermore, with regard to the hearings incident to Sacred Heart's denial of plaintiff's application, the evidence indicates that plaintiff was not given an opportunity to present evidence on quality of care issues or her expertise.

Therefore, defendants' several motions for [*92] summary judgment must be denied to the extent that they are based on the HCQIA. Further discussion of this issue is unnecessary in light of my conclusion, set out below, that plaintiff has failed to establish a genuine issue of material fact as to the existence of an antitrust conspiracy.

D. Conspiracy In Restraint Of Trade

HN5[] Section 1 of the Sherman Act, Title 15, United States Code, Section 1, provides:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations is declared to be illegal.

The threshold requirement of a conspiracy claim under this statute is existence of an agreement between two or more persons demonstrating a "unity of purpose or a common design and understanding, or a meeting of minds in an unlawful arrangement." Seagood Trading Corp. v. Jerrico, Inc., 924 F.2d 1555, 1573 (11th Cir. 1991) (quoting American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 810 66 S. Ct. 1125, 1139, 90 L. Ed. 1575 (1946). See also Bolt v. Halifax Hospital Medical Center, 891 F.2d 810, 818-19 (11th Cir. 1990).

[37] Not all of the actions alleged to have been taken by the defendants necessarily qualify as "professional review actions." For example, the alleged actions taken to divert referrals from plaintiff to defendants do not so qualify. Thus, even if the HCQIA acted to bar liability for the denial of privileges, antitrust liability in theory still could exist with respect to such non-qualifying activities.

The courts recognize that HN6[] it is the rare [*93] case in which the plaintiff can establish the existence of a conspiracy by showing an explicit agreement. Therefore, most conspiracies are inferred from the behavior of the alleged conspirators. Seagood Trading, 924 F.2d at 1573. However, the range of inferences that may be drawn from circumstantial evidence to prove an unlawful conspiracy is limited. Id. at 1574 (citations omitted).

HN7[] To make out the conspiracy, and thus avoid summary judgment, the circumstantial evidence upon which the plaintiff relies must establish a non-legitimate motive for entering into such a conspiracy. Seagood Trading, supra, 924 F.2d at 1574; Bolt, supra, 891 F.2d at 819. In other words, the plaintiff must show that collective behavior is economically reasonable in that it accomplishes a goal that would economically inure to the defendants' benefit, and therefore reasonably exclude the possibility that defendants acted independently. See Seagood Trading, supra, 924 F.2d at 1574; Bolt, supra, 891 F.2d at 819 (citations omitted). To make this showing, the plaintiff must adduce evidence "that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged co-conspirators acted independently and in [*94] a manner consistent with rational business objectives." Bolt, supra, 891 F.2d at 819 (citations omitted). This means that conduct which is as consistent with permissible, unilateral activity as with an illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, permit the inference of an antitrust conspiracy. Matsushita Elect. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 588, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 1356, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986); Seagood Trading, supra, 924 F.2d at 1574.

HN8[] The plaintiff need not show a specific intent to restrain trade or to build a monopoly, however. Id. at 819-20. "So long as the purported conspiracy has an anticompetitive effect, the plaintiff has made out a case under Section 1." Id. at 820. Therefore, in determining whether a conspiracy exists, if an economic motive is evident, the plaintiff need only show (1) a conscious commitment on the part of the alleged conspirators to adhere to an agreement that is (2) designed to achieve an objective prohibited by the statute. Id.

HN9[] Once the plaintiff makes out a conspiracy, the court must decide whether the agreement had an adverse impact on competition. *Seagood Trading Corp. v. Jerrico, Inc., 924 F.2d 1555, 1570 [95] (11th Cir. 1991). Certain conspiracies are deemed to have such a pernicious effect on competition, that they are said to be illegal "per se". Id. at 1567. "That is, the conduct involved 'always or almost always tends to restrict competition and decrease output'" without any countervailing procompetitive benefits. Id. (quoting Northwest Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery & Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 289-90, 105 S. Ct. 2613, 2617, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202, 208 (1985) (citation omitted)). The Supreme Court has made it clear that the "per se" label should be applied infrequently and with caution. Id. (citing Business Electronics Corp. v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 723, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 1519, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808, 816 (1988)). Therefore, the presumption in Section 1 cases is that the "rule of reason" standard applies. Id. at 1567.

HN10[] The rule of reason asks whether, in the circumstances of a particular case, a restrictive practice imposes an unreasonable restraint on competition. Seagood Trading Corp., supra at 1569 (citations omitted). A restraint is "unreasonable" if it has an adverse impact on competition and cannot be justified as a procompetitive [*96] measure. Id. Thus, "the rule of reason standard hinges the ultimate legality of a restraint on whether the plaintiff has demonstrated an anticompetitive effect which is not offset by a need to achieve a procompetitive benefit or justification." Id. at 1569 (quoting from Kestenbaum v. Falstaff Brewing Corp., 575 F.2d 564, 571 (5th Cir. 1978).

HN11[] In order to show an injury to competition using the rule of reason analysis, the plaintiff first must establish a "particularized or relevant market in which the defendant's actions unreasonably restrain trade." L.A. Draper & Son v. Wheelabrator-Frye, Inc., 735 F.2d 414, 422 (11th Cir. 1984). The relevant market is defined generally as the "area of effective competition." Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 324, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 1523, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 535 (1962). The market must contain both a product dimension and a geographic dimension. L.A. Draper, supra, 735 F.2d at 423. The product dimension is "determined by the availability of substitutes to which consumers can turn in response to price increases and other existing or potential producer's ability to expand output." Id. The geographic dimension is "the [*97] area in which the product or its reasonably interchangeable substitutes are traded." Id.

HN12[] Once a plaintiff has established the relevant market, the rule of reason analysis focuses on the defendants' power within the market. The meaning of market power in rule of reason cases has not been clearly explained or defined by the Supreme Court. However, I agree with Judge Posner's description of market power as the "power to raise price above the competitive level without losing so many sales that the price increase would be unprofitable." Morrison v. Murray Biscuit Co., 797 F.2d 1430, 1435 (7th Cir. 1986) (citations omitted).

As described above, Dr. Williamson alleges a swirl of conspiracies. First, she contends that Sacred Heart conspired with PRC, Dr. Post, and others to prevent her from competing for radiology patients. Next, she alleges a similar conspiracy among Baptist, Radiology Associates, and unnamed others for that same purpose. Finally, she asserts that there was a "community wide" conspiracy among all the defendants to prevent her from gaining membership in Health First, which effectively disqualified her from treating HOP subscribers, and thereby prevented her from [*98] competing for patients in need of radiology services.

Dr. Williamson's argument proceeds from the premise that rational economic actors in the defendants' positions would have accommodated her various requests for privileges. Their failure to do so, according to Dr. Williamson, is evidence that they acted in a manner inconsistent with rational economic objectives, and hence conspired to drive her out of the market.

1. PRC, Sacred Heart and Dr. Post Conspiracy

As previously noted, there is no direct evidence that PRC, Dr. Post, and Sacred Heart conspired to prevent Dr. Williamson from competing for radiology patients. Accordingly, the plaintiff relies entirely on circumstantial evidence of (a) defendants' failure to accommodate Dr. Williamson's requests for staff privileges, and (b) Sacred Heart's attempts to "blackball" Dr. Williamson.

(a) Denial of Staff Privileges. (i) The Bolt Case: In Bolt v. Halifax Hospital Medical Center, 891 F.2d 810 (11th Cir. 1990), the Eleventh Circuit held that HN13[] the denial or revocation of hospital privileges are presumed to be economically motivated, and are, therefore, evidence of an economic conspiracy between the defendant hospital [*99] and its staff. In such a case, the plaintiff need only show a conscious commitment to the agreement and that the agreement was designed to achieve an anticompetitive effect.

In Bolt, the plaintiff was granted probationary privileges at each of three hospitals. At the end of the probation period, one of the hospitals conditioned the plaintiff's reappointment to the active staff on his agreement to seek psychiatric counseling through the Impaired Physicians Program operated by the Florida Medical Association. Shortly thereafter, the remaining two hospitals denied reappointment.

In reversing a directed verdict in favor of the defendant hospitals, the Eleventh Circuit held that hospitals and doctors always have a "rational economic motive" sufficient for antitrust purposes when they deny or revoke a physician's privileges. Id. at 820. Relying solely on a simplified application of the inverse relationship between supply and demand and a law review article, and without citation to any legal authority, the court seems to presume that excluding a physician from practice in a hospital always allows the remaining doctors to charge a higher price. Id.

Bolt, however, is distinguishable [*100] from this case. It does not address the role of exclusive contracts in the staffing of hospital diagnostic facilities; nor does it deal with the role of HMO participation in the granting of privileges. In addition, Bolt presumed that the physician subject to denial of privileges was facially qualified under the hospital bylaws to practice medicine within the relevant department. In this case, there is no question that Dr. Williamson had the medical training necessary to qualify for privileges in the Department of Radiology. But there is no legal impropriety claimed or shown regarding Sacred Heart's exclusive contract with PRC, so it is undisputed that plaintiff is not entitled to have regular radiological privileges. Instead, Sacred Heart denied her amended and second applications for privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine on the ground that her medical training in radiology was insufficient under the bylaws to qualify her for privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine.

I realize that plaintiff is challenging Sacred Heart's reliance on the bylaws on the grounds that it was pretextual. Nevertheless, the fact that plaintiff's medical credentials have been questioned, [*101] along with the other factors mentioned above, makes application of the Bolt "economic motive" presumption to this case inappropriate. Accordingly, I must review all the evidence in the record to determine whether there is any genuine issue of material fact concerning the existence of an antitrust motive.

(ii) The Exclusive Contract: Preliminarily, as noted above, Dr. Williamson does not, and cannot, challenge the exclusive contract between PRC and Sacred Heart on the grounds that, by itself, it establishes a violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Jefferson Parish Hospital v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984). To the contrary, it is well established that HN14[] such contracts are completely consistent with rational economic objectives. For example, the exclusive contracts in this case ensure that a radiologist will be available 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, thereby minimizing the risk of treatment delays. Dealing with a single radiology group also allows Sacred Heart to offer continuous, high quality care with a minimum of administrative effort. In this way, the exclusive contract "preserve[s] the efficiency of the department's operation and thus [*102] its ability to compete in the market place." Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Authority, 921 F.2d 1438, 1458 (11th Cir. 1991).

Since the exclusive contract itself is facially procompetitive, it follows that the denial of Dr. Williamson's initial application for privileges in the Department of Radiology on the grounds that it violated the contract also was a facially procompetitive measure. Therefore, it is not circumstantial evidence of an antitrust conspiracy between PRC and Sacred Heart.

(iii) Exclusive Contract as a Pretext: According to plaintiff, her services were so desirable to both Sacred Heart and PRC that a rational economic actor in their position would have jumped at the chance to bring her on board. Faced with the exclusive contract and the apparent bylaws restrictions, rational business objectives should have compelled them to find a way to work around these obstacles. Accordingly, plaintiff contends that Sacred Heart invoked the exclusive contract as a pretext to delay, and later to deny, her initial application for privileges in radiology. Sacred Heart then used the contract as a pretext to trick her into requesting privileges in the Department of Internal Medicine.

[*103] Plaintiff correctly points out that both Dr. Post and Dr. Whitcomb admitted that the exclusive contract involved only the use of imaging modalities at the hospital. In addition, they acknowledged that the procedures Dr. Williamson wished to perform (i.e. admit patients, consult with them and the attending physician, do physical histories and medical exams, give medical advise, and review and make notations on patients' charts) were not radiology procedures within the meaning of the contract and did not require radiology privileges. In fact, any member of the staff could perform these procedures.

It is plaintiff's assessment that, under these circumstances, the economically rational decision would have been to give her privileges necessary to allow her to perform those patient care procedures not covered by the exclusive contract while imposing whatever limitations were required to protect those procedures reserved exclusively to PRC. She contends that the defendants' failure to accommodate her in this manner is not only evidence that their reliance on the contract was pretextual, but also that they conspired to drive her out of the outpatient radiology market. I cannot agree.

Plaintiff's [*104] argument is fundamentally flawed in that it completely ignores the fact that Sacred Heart was committed to opening the Ann Baroco Center. Under its exclusive contract, PRC would be the beneficiary of the center's business. It is undisputed that plaintiff's clinic competed with Sacred Heart for outpatient radiology referrals and that plaintiff herself competed with the physicians of PRC. The opening of its own women's center would place Sacred Heart and PRC into even more direct competition with plaintiff.

In fact, the undisputed evidence establishes that, since Baptist then had no plans to open a women's center, Pensacola Diagnostic would be the Baroco Center's primary competitor. The undisputed evidence in the record also indicates that Dr. Williamson was a very formidable competitor. In two years she carved out a specialty that brought her substantial remuneration. Before the Baroco Center opened, Pensacola Diagnostic's revenues were three times those of Sacred Heart for procedures and services encompassed by Dr. Williamson's specialty. As late as 1989, a full two years after opening the Baroco center, Dr. Williamson's revenues were still greater than those of Sacred Heart for [*105] the procedures encompassed by Dr. Williamson's specialty. Furthermore, Dr. Williamson's specialized practice grew rapidly: between 1986 and 1989 the number of breast exams that she performed more than doubled from 2007 to 4421.

In light of plaintiff's position in the market, granting her any type of privileges while she still operated her own clinic would put Sacred Heart in the position of supporting its main competition. Essentially, Sacred Heart would be competing with itself. Faced with this possibility, it clearly had a rational, pro-competitive reason for acting independently to deny Dr. Williamson's request for privileges.

Dr. Williamson counters that if PRC and Sacred Heart were acting rationally, they would have tried to "neutralize" her by merging with her. Accepting plaintiff's assertion that the relevant product and geographic markets at issue in this case are outpatient mammography in the greater Pensacola area, her argument for merging the only two significant competitors in that market would seem to have its own antitrust implications.

Putting this telling point aside, it is undisputed that PRC, with Sacred Heart's approval, did in fact enter into negotiations to [*106] hire Dr. Williamson. As discussed above, the parties were not able to reach an agreement. In particular, Dr. Williamson did not want to work nights, weekends, or holidays. PRC was willing to accommodate her schedule in exchange for a reduction in salary, but Dr. Williamson rejected the proposed amount as too low.

Similarly, Dr. Williamson had justifiable misgivings about the interaction between the non-compete covenant and the termination clause. Observing that, taken together, the two clauses could allow PRC to put her out of practice in Pensacola in as little as three months, Dr. Williamson asserts that these negotiations were not "genuine". She characterizes PRC's written offer as a "take it or leave it" proposition and characterizes the proposed contract as a "sham". In addition, plaintiff contends that Dr. Post wanted her to change her style of practice.

It is true that the termination clause and the non-compete clause could have harsh consequences. But such clauses are commonly utilized by professional practices, and there is no evidence that they were specifically directed toward plaintiff. Even if I accept plaintiff's contention, arguendo, that the proposed contract was a [*107] thinly disguised attempt to lure her into a professional trap, I cannot conclude that PRC's conduct was evidence of an antitrust conspiracy.

It is undisputed that PRC and Pensacola Diagnostic were direct competitors. I also accept the fact that PRC rationally could have chosen to address this competition by merging with Pensacola Diagnostic or by hiring Dr. Williamson. However, in her zeal to isolate economic irrationality, plaintiff appears to take the position that any action on the part of PRC and Sacred Heart short of a complete accommodation through a merger is circumstantial evidence of concerted action. She ignores the fact that PRC just as rationally could have chosen to compete with her. Clearly, the proposed Baroco Center would be a more than ample foundation upon which to base such a choice.

PRC could choose to compete by offering superior service or a lower price. Similarly, PRC rationally could choose to compete through its long term relationship with Sacred Heart. If so, that is not evidence of an antitrust conspiracy unless the method itself is inconsistent with both independent action and rational business objectives, even if deemed to be unfair. L.A. Draper [*108] & Sons v. Wheelabrator-Frye, Inc., supra, 735 F.2d 414, 421 (11th Cir. 1984). HN15[] "The use of unfair means in substituting one competitor for another without more does not violate the antitrust laws." Id. (citations omitted).

In this case, it is perfectly rational for PRC to attempt to compete with the plaintiff. After all, competition is what the antitrust laws are supposed to promote:

> Who says that competition is supposed to be fair, that we judge the behavior of the marketplace by the ethics of the courtroom? Real competition is bruising rivalry, in which people go out of business under intense pressure. . . . Competition is a gale of creative destruction.

Fishman v. Estate of Wirtz, 807 F.2d 520, 577 (7th Cir. 1986) (Easterbrook, J., dissenting).

Moreover, there is no evidence that Sacred Heart influenced PRC's negotiating posture. Sacred Heart did encourage PRC to choose a female physician to service its new women's center. In fact, there is even evidence that it encouraged PRC to reach an agreement with Dr. Williamson, perhaps for the same reason. However, PRC conducted the negotiations through its own counsel, and there is no evidence that Sacred Heart [*109] had any control over, or participation in, PRC's ultimate choice. For these reasons, I must conclude that the conduct of both Sacred Heart and PRC in denying plaintiff's request for privileges, and in failing to come to a contractual agreement with her, are at least as consistent with rational, independent business conduct as with an antitrust conspiracy, as Matsushita requires on motions for summary judgment.

In further support of her pretext argument, plaintiff points to so-called "accommodations" that Sacred Heart made for other physicians whose areas of specialty were covered by "exclusive" contracts. However, a brief examination of these "accommodations" reveals that they bear no resemblance to plaintiff's situation. For instance, the Department of Gastroenterology and the Department of Pulmonology are both subject to exclusive contracts. The exclusive contract applicable to the former specifically preserved the staff privileges of six gastroenterologists who were not Parties to the contract.

The exclusive contract associated with the Department of Pulmonology provided that > the termination or cancellation of this agreement shall not affect the staff membership or [*110] clinical privileges of any physician employee of the group, except that such physician employee may not thereafter obtain or exercise any clinical privileges for which exclusive contractual arrangements have been made between the hospital and a third party.

Thus, the pulmonologists in question would retain their staff membership, as well as the privilege to perform any service not specifically named in the exclusive contract. Similarly, Sacred Heart's exclusive contract with Dr. Frank for the provision of neurological services states that exceptions may be made after consultation and joint approval of Dr. Frank and the hospital.

These contracts show only that the parties involved negotiated certain exceptions to their exclusive rights. Whatever factors led to the inclusion of these terms are unknown, but make them clearly distinguishable from the plaintiff's circumstances. In addition, each contract was an independent event completely unrelated either to the PRC contract or to Dr. Williamson's applications for staff privileges. For these reasons, they cannot be evidence that the denial of plaintiff's request was anomalous, and therefore, pretextual. It is simply not reasonable [*111] to infer a conspiracy from the fact that these contracts are different from the PRC contract.

The case of independent radiologist Thomas Brown, M.D. presents a somewhat different situation. Between 1975 and 1980, Dr. Brown practiced with PRC at Sacred Heart, and consequently, had full privileges there. When he left PRC in 1981 to open his own radiology clinic, Sacred Heart permitted him to retain his privileges. No objection to this arrangement was raised until 1984, when Sacred Heart told Dr. Brown he would have to resign his membership or face revocation proceedings.

Sacred Heart claims that it did not realize that Dr. Brown had retained his privileges, and that when it discovered the error, it asked him to resign. Plaintiff contends that Sacred Heart forced Dr. Brown to resign only after it discovered that his having privileges allowed him to compete for Blue Cross/Blue Shield PRC patients. Which interpretation is more accurate is immaterial. The material fact is that when Dr. Williamson submitted her application for privileges, Dr. Brown's privileges had been revoked. Thus, Dr. Williamson and Dr. Brown received the same treatment. [38]

[*112] Plaintiff's strongest argument involves the case of obstetrical ultrasound. Traditionally, this procedure was performed by radiologists. However, developments in the procedure and in the medical profession made it more common for obstetricians to perform it. In 1986, Sacred Heart determined that it was in its best interest to respond to these changes by hiring a perinatologist (a specialist in high-risk pregnancies) to perform obstetrical ultrasounds at the hospital. Initially, PRC objected to this arrangement on the basis of its exclusive contract. Nevertheless,

[38] Of course, plaintiffs argue that the treatment itself was evidence of a conspiracy. I address this issue below. Right now I am only dealing with plaintiff's argument that her treatment was anomalous, and therefore, evidence of pretext. The evidence shows that, with respect to Dr. Brown, it was not.

Sacred Heart and PRC eventually reached an agreement to modify the exclusive contract to permit the perinatologist to perform obstetric ultrasounds.

Dr. Williamson argues that a similar transformation was occurring in the detection and treatment of breast cancer. Therefore, she contends that an accommodation along the lines of that made for the perinatologists could have, and should have, been made for her. This brings us back to the core of plaintiff's argument, which is that Sacred Heart's failure to accommodate her practice was economically unsound and was antitrust conduct. Once again, this argument ignores the fact [*113] that Sacred Heart had a rational business reason, in the form of its own Ann Baroco Center, for refusing to accommodate plaintiff. Failure to make special exceptions to established policy in order to accommodate a competitor is not antitrust behavior.

(iv) Unilateral Conduct and Causation: Even if I were to accept plaintiff's evidence of pretext as true, such evidence, standing alone, would not be sufficient to show joint action in violation of the antitrust laws. DeLong Equipment Co. v. Washington Mills Abrasive Co., 887 F.2d 1499, 1514 (11th Cir. 1989). Rather, HN16[] evidence of pretext only serves to rebut an assertion of independent action on the part of the defendant. Id. In this case, however, plaintiff's argument overlooks the fact that the final authority to grant privileges or to waive bylaws requirements lies solely with Sacred Heart's Board of Directors. The Board of Directors also has the sole authority to negotiate contract modifications.

The Eleventh Circuit faced a similar set of facts in Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Authority, 921 F.2d 1438 (11th Cir. 1991). In that case, the plaintiff neurologist brought an antitrust claim against a hospital and its radiologists. [*114] The plaintiff had applied for privileges to perform CT scans in the hospital's radiology department. The radiologists, who had developed numerous protocols for this procedure, recommended that the application be denied. The hospital followed this recommendation, and the neurologist filed his antitrust claim.

The court held that even if the radiologists had conspired among themselves to deprive the neurologist of privileges, they could not have caused his application to be denied. Id. at 1459. Only the Board of Directors could deny the application. Therefore, such denial was a unilateral action on the part of the hospital. Id. HN17[] As with all tort-like causes of action, the failure to show causation is fatal to a Section 1 claim. Id.

To the extent that PRC was involved in the denial of plaintiff's request for privileges, its participation was limited to the comments that Drs. Post and Hobgood made in December of 1985, in opposition to Dr. Williamson's original application for privileges in the Department of Radiology. None of PRC's physician employees sat on the Sacred Heart's Board, and none of them played any part in the drafting of the Department of Internal Medicine's [*115] credentialling criteria. Furthermore, with the exception of Dr. Post, who sat on the Executive Committee, none of the PRC physicians sat on any of the committees that reviewed plaintiff's application.

Plaintiff points out that all of the physicians sitting on the Credentials and Executive Committees considered Dr. Williamson a skilled practitioner, and many referred patients to her. Some were in favor of adding her to the staff, and they lobbied on her behalf with both the hospital and the Department of Radiology. Accepting plaintiff's interpretation of the facts as true, these physicians, though they personally wanted to see her on the staff, ultimately were constrained by the bylaws and were forced to recommend that her application be denied. Nevertheless, support for Dr. Williamson is evident from the occasions that the Credentials Committee, despite its adverse recommendation, continued to encourage the hospital to accommodate Dr. Williamson's practice. But, as in the Todorov case, the decision with regard to these matters constitutes unilateral action on the part of Sacred Heart, and does not implicate an antitrust conspiracy.

(b) Attempts to Blackball Dr. Williamson. [*116] The alleged attempts to "blackball" Dr. Williamson are much more difficult to analyze. These attempts fall into three main categories. First, there are the alleged attempts to attack Dr. Williamson's referral base through coercive reciprocal agreements with other physicians, as well as through the use of threats and pressure to force physicians to refer patients back to Sacred Heart. Second, there is the evidence relating to the needle placement controversy. Third, there is the alleged pressure on Pensacola Pathologists to fire Dr. Michael Williamson.

(i) Attacks on Dr. Williamson's Referral Base: Plaintiff's allegations of threats and pressure are based almost entirely on her own hearsay testimony describing what other physicians allegedly told her about what Sacred Heart administrators, in turn, told them.

Insofar as plaintiff offers her own testimony to prove that Sacred Heart, in fact, intimidated or coerced the named physicians, it is clearly inadmissible hearsay. Recognizing this fact, plaintiff argues that this testimony nevertheless is admissible as circumstantial evidence to show the state of mind of the declarant physicians. However, the plaintiff misunderstands [*117] the state of mind rule regarding what would otherwise be hearsay: it's the state of mind of the secondary declarant that must be affected without regard to the truth or falsity of the statement. In short, it does not apply to the declarant physicians. Even if it did, it does not assist plaintiff in establishing the existence of a conspiracy to blackball her. To the extent that the alleged statements may be circumstantial evidence of the physicians' states of mind, they would be admissible only for the purpose of inferring the conduct of the declarant physician, not to infer conduct on the part of Sacred Heart. Therefore, plaintiff must establish the conspiracy through other admissible evidence.

Plaintiff attempts to do this through proof of the circumstances surrounding the several contracts between Sacred Heart and the declarant physicians. Essentially, plaintiff argues that the contracts between Sacred Heart and Drs. Horan, Turner, Antonelli, Howard and Mixon were coercive reciprocal agreements requiring the physicians to refer patients back to Sacred Heart in exchange for much needed financial support.

As the Eleventh Circuit observed in *Key Enterprises of Delaware, Inc. [118] v. Venice Hospital, 919 F.2d 1550, 1561 (11th Cir. 1990), "reciprocal dealing has received little attention in the courts; however, when the subject has arisen, courts have not hesitated to condemn the practice." HN18[] Reciprocal dealing is conceptually similar to tying. Id. In a tying arrangement, a seller uses its power in the market for product A to coerce the buyer of product A to purchase product B. Id. However, "[a] reciprocal dealing arrangement exists when the two parties face each other as both buyer and seller." Id. (citing Spartan Grain & Mill Co. v. Ayers, 581 F.2d 419, 424 (5th Cir. 1978). The buyer of product A offers to buy from the other party, but only if that second party will buy product B from the first party. Id. The two cases are similar in that, in each case, one side of a transaction has special power in the market place . . . in reciprocal dealings, a buyer with economic power forces a seller to buy something from it." Id.

HN19[] The difference between the two types of arrangements is that the strict standard of coercion applied to tying cases is not applicable to reciprocal dealing cases. Id. If the coercion necessary for per se treatment [*119] is not present, the court may analyze the case under the rule of reason. Id. Therefore, "where a plaintiff shows that one party has sufficient market power to unduly influence a second party to treat the first more favorably than the free market would otherwise dictate, and the second party acts in conformity with the reciprocal arrangement, the plaintiff has proved the existence of an arrangement which unreasonably restrains trade." Id.

In Venice Hospital, supra, the Eleventh Circuit determined that it was appropriate to allow the jury to determine the existence of a coercive reciprocal agreement where the evidence showed that the defendant hospital entered into agreements with one or more home health care agencies whereby the home health care nurses would have access to patients prior to discharge in exchange for the nurses preferentially referring their patients to Medical Patient Aid Center ("MPAC"), a hospital owned company that supplied "durable medical equipment" ("DME") for home use. Id. 919 F.2d at 1561. At the time it entered into the agreement, the defendant hospital was the dominant hospital in the area. It controlled 76% of the available hospital beds, [*120] 80% of patient admissions, and 81% of the patient days in the relevant geographic market.

The defendant hospital also was the source of at least 46% of the total market for durable medical equipment. In the two-year period beginning with the agreement between the MPAC and the home health care agencies, MPAC's total market share rose from 9.2% to 61%. A total of 64% of MPAC's business originated with a referral from a home health care nurse counseling patients at the defendant hospital. Thus, MPAC got a large part of the market simply by capturing a large percentage of the defendant hospital's referrals.

Under these facts, the court concluded that although the arrangement did not fit precisely the contours of the classical reciprocal agreement, it had sufficient representative elements to allow the issue to go to the jury. Id. at

Here, plaintiff contends that, similarly, Sacred Heart has entered into agreements with several physicians whereby [*121] Sacred Heart provides financial support to their practices in exchange for, or in expectation of, the physician's referral of patients back to Sacred Heart for outpatient services, including radiology services. [39] Defendants, of course, argue that these contracts contained nothing that constitutes an arrangement which unreasonably restrains trade.

In the case of Drs. Horan, Turner, and Antonelli, the contracts with Sacred Heart contain language requiring them to utilize Sacred Heart's outpatient services "to the extent feasible, and unless patient choice dictates otherwise." [40] In the case of Drs. Howard the so-called "utilization" clauses provides that "Gulf Coast Diversified (Sacred Heart's for-profit affiliate) shall be notified of any referral of patients . . . for medical services to any entity other than Sacred Heart Hospital of Pensacola." In addition, it provides [*122] that "[Dr. Howard] agrees to utilize specialty physicians who are members of the medical staff of Sacred Heart Hospital of Pensacola wherever practical to ensure continuity of patient care." Dr. Mixon's contract contains the same utilization clause, but with the additional specific requirement that he utilize radiology services provided by Sacred Heart unless Sacred Heart instructs him to use an outside radiologist.

Factually, as previously noted Dr. Mixon and Dr. Howard had no history of any referrals to plaintiff, and there is nothing to tie their agreements to this case. Dr. Antonelli said he always referred his patients requiring a radiologist to the plaintiff and that his agreement with Sacred Heart had no effect on referrals. The statistics regarding Drs. Moran and Turner are basically inconclusive, but [*123] they each deny any pressure to move referrals from plaintiff to Sacred Heart.

Nevertheless, the question remains as to whether the potential restraint imposed by these agreements was unreasonable. Plaintiff argues that the coercion involved was sufficient to allow application of the per se rule. I cannot agree.

HN20[] A coercive reciprocal agreement, like a tying agreement, is unreasonable per se whenever one party has sufficient economic leverage in one market to gain an unfair advantage in another market. See Venice Hospital, supra, 919 F.2d at 1560-64; Betaseed, Inc. v. U and I, Inc., 681 F.2d 1203, 1216-18 (9th Cir. 1982); Spartan Grain & Mill Co. v. Ayers, 581 F.2d 419, 425-26 (5th Cir. 1978). In this case, the products exchanged are loans and financial credit on the one hand, and outpatient referrals of all types on the other hand. There is no evidence in the record whatsoever relating to Sacred Heart's leverage in the lending or financial market.

The Supreme Court addressed this very issue in United States Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enterprises, Inc., 429 U.S. 610, 97 S. Ct. 861, 51 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1977) ("Fortner II"). In that case, a subsidiary of U.S. Steel [*124] offered 100% financing to Fortner for the purchase of prefabricated homes manufactured by U.S. Steel. The financing was at particularly low rates, and on terms favorable to Fortner. The financing was available, however, only on sales of homes from U.S. Steel to Fortner. The homes themselves were more expensive than those of U.S. Steel's competitors. The relationship between Fortner and U.S. Steel soured, and Fortner brought an antitrust action contending that the credit had been tied to the purchase of the homes in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

The only issue before the Supreme Court was whether Fortner had shown that U.S. Steel had economic power in the market for credit, not the market for prefabricated homes. Ignoring several other arguments, including the size

[39] I note that plaintiff never uses the term "coercive reciprocal agreement" in her pleadings or opposition to defendants' several motions.

[40] The wording of Dr. Antonelli's contract is slightly different, and reads "to the extent feasible, and in accordance with acceptable medical practice, and unless patient choice dictates otherwise."

of U.S. Steel and the number of similar arrangements it had made, the Supreme Court determined that the question came down to one of uniqueness:

> The most significant finding made by the District Court related to the unique character of the credit extended to Fortner. This finding is particularly important because the unique character of the tying product has provided critical support for the finding [*125] of illegality in prior cases.

Id. at 619, 97 S. Ct. at 867, 51 L. Ed. 2d at 89. "In short, the question is whether the seller has some advantage not shared by his competitors in the market for [credit]." Id. at 620, 97 S. Ct. at 868, 51 L. Ed. 2d at 89-90.

The fact that the financing arrangement was unique, i.e. "without like or equal", did not mean that U.S. Steel possessed economic power. The Court concluded that the evidence merely showed that the credit terms were unique because the seller was willing to accept a lesser profit, or to incur greater risk, than its competitors. This kind of uniqueness did not give rise to an inference of economic power. Without any evidence that U.S. Steel had some cost advantage over its competitors - - - or could offer a form of financing that was significantly differentiated from that which other lenders could offer if they so elected - - - the unique character of the financing did not support the conclusion that U.S. Steel had the kind of economic power that would sustain a finding of per se illegality. Id. at 621-22, 97 S. Ct. at 868, 51 L. Ed. 2d at 90-91.

Assuming that the relevant geographic market in this case, [*126] for this issue, is the greater Pensacola area, there is no evidence in the record to support the conclusion that Sacred Heart had some competitive advantage over other potential lenders. Common sense requires a contrary conclusion. The fact that the physicians in question felt that they could not get as good a deal at a bank, for example, is irrelevant to my inquiry under Fortner II. See also Spartan Grain, supra, 581 F.2d at 425-27 (citing Fortner II). Accordingly, I must conclude that application of a per se analysis to the reciprocal agreement alleged in this case is inappropriate.

HN21[] In order to prevail in the absence of per se liability, plaintiff must show that Sacred Heart's conduct unreasonably restrained competition. Jefferson Parish Hospital v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 29, 104 S. Ct. 1551, , 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 23 (1984); Venice Hospital, supra, 919 F.2d at 1562. In the absence of evidence of actual detrimental effects, the rule of reason dictates that the plaintiff define the relevant market (both its product and geographical boundaries), as well as demonstrate the defendant's market power. As discussed above, there is no evidence that Sacred Heart's [*127] power in the lending and financial market was sufficient to restrain trade within the greater Pensacola area.

In the alternative, even assuming, as plaintiff seems to argue, that the relevant product market is not access to credit, but access to hospital services, she has still failed to meet her burden. As discussed above, the Eleventh Circuit's decision in Venice Hospital, supra, 919 F.2d at 1550, was based, in large part, on the factual showing of the hospital's monopoly power within the relevant geographic market - - - 80% of the hospital patients and in excess of 46% of the "durable medical equipment" market.

Unlike the defendant in Venice Hospital, Sacred Heart has no unreasonable ability to control access to hospital services. It is undisputed that Sacred Heart and its two main competitors, Baptist and West Florida Regional Hospital ("West Florida"), compete neck and neck within the greater Pensacola area. [41] The Navy Hospital and (at the relevant time) University Hospital were also competitors within the Pensacola market. There is nothing to indicate that Sacred Heart was able to exert any control over this market.

[*128] (ii) The Needle Placement Controversy: Next, plaintiff argues that banning her needle placement patients from its surgi-center is circumstantial evidence of an antitrust conspiracy.

[41] Although it is not a part of the record, the affidavit of plaintiff's own expert establishes, by way of comparison, that Sacred Heart has only 28.3% of patient days, while Baptist and West Florida have 29.8% and 31.4%, respectively. Similarly, Sacred Heart has only 21.6% of the available beds, while Baptist and West Florida have 28.9% and 30.4%. Finally, Sacred Heart has 35.8% of the admissions, while Baptist and West Florida have 24.6% and 27.6%, respectively.

Essentially, plaintiff argues that her needle placement protocol, involving as it did, the placement of the needle at her clinic and then walking the patient across the parking lot to the surgi-center for removal, presented no greater risk to the patient or to the specimen once removed than did Sacred Heart's own protocol. Once again, plaintiff has overlooked the fact that she was in competition with Sacred Heart. As discussed above in greater detail, there is nothing in the antitrust law that mandates aid to a competitor.

In addition, there is another, procompetitive reason for the advisory board's recommendation: Dr. Williamson is outside Sacred Heart's quality assurance mechanism. It is true that Sacred Heart routinely receives specimens from outside the hospital. However, when Sacred heart takes in specimens from physicians who are on its staff, it has the power to enforce compliance with its quality assurance protocol. Similarly, when Sacred Heart sends its own specimens to an outside lab, [*129] it has control over the choice of labs and may adjust its choices as quality concerns dictate. It also has control over its couriers and the means of transport.

Under plaintiff's proposed needle placement protocol, Sacred Heart has no such control. She is outside its review and, more importantly, its enforcement mechanisms. If legitimate questions arise or problems occur, Sacred Heart's only recourse would be to discontinue plaintiff's use of its surgery and lab facilities. After weighing the risks and benefits of plaintiff's proposal, this is precisely what it did. The fact that the decision may have made plaintiff's needle placement practice less desirable for plaintiff to use does not detract from the legitimacy or reasonableness of the decision. Nor does it create an inference of an antitrust conspiracy.

(iii) Termination of Michael Williamson: As with her allegations of intimidation, plaintiff's contention that Pensacola Pathologists terminated Michael Williamson under pressure from Sacred Heart is almost entirely based on plaintiff's own and her husband's hearsay testimony. That evidence cannot be considered for purposes of the pending motion.

The admissible evidence in [*130] the record is what the doctors themselves have testified: that they were under no pressure from Sacred Heart, and that their termination of Michael Williamson had nothing to do with the delay in the renewal of their contract. Therefore, this does not support the plaintiff's antitrust claim. Further, Dr. Michael Williamson is not a party to this action. Any claim he may have is in a separate case in state court.

(iv) Involvement of PRC and Dr. Post: I must now assess the involvement of PRC and Dr. Post in all these activities. The evidence of PRC's and Dr. Post's attempts to intimidate physicians into using the Sacred Heart outpatient radiology facilities consists of Dr. Murphy's statement to the FTC. According to Dr. Murphy, Dr. Post attempted to persuade him to refer his patients to the Sacred Heart radiology department by appealing to his sense of loyalty to the hospital. Assuming that it occurred, this attempt to lobby Dr. Murphy can hardly be characterized as a threat. A threat implies the ability to harm. In this case, Dr. Post and PRC had no ability to harm Dr. Murphy's practice.

Similarly, there is no evidence that PRC or Dr. Post participated in the negotiation of the [*131] pathology contract, or of the allegedly coercive reciprocal agreements with Dr. Williamson's referring physicians. It is true that PRC stood to benefit from these arrangements, but so did all of Sacred Heart's other outpatient diagnostic facilities. Even if they knew about Sacred Heart's conduct, and hoped that it would succeed in diverting referrals back to the hospital, the fact that PRC and Dr. Post would benefit from Sacred Heart's allegedly improper actions is not evidence that they participated. More importantly, there is no evidence whatsoever, that PRC or Dr. Post was in position to influence Sacred Heart's lending and contract decisions.

Finally, the participation of PRC and Dr. Post in the alleged scheme to ban Dr. Williamson's needle placement patients was limited to Dr. Post's role as an advisor to the Medical Advisory Board. The evidence shows that in this capacity he did nothing more than describe the needle placement process. He was not a member of the board, and had no vote in the matter. Similarly, no other physician employee or shareholder of PRC sat on the board. For these reasons, I must conclude that the evidence is insufficient to link either PRC or Dr. Post [*132] to a conspiracy to drive plaintiff out of business or to limit her ability to compete for radiology patients.

(v) Summation: In sum, there is no genuine issue of material fact in the record as to whether the defendants PRC, Sacred Heart, and Dr. Post conspired to violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act, and these defendants' motions for summary judgment are GRANTED.

2. Baptist and Radiology Associates Conspiracy

As with the Sacred Heart/PRC conspiracy, there is no direct evidence that Baptist and Radiology Associates conspired to prevent plaintiff from competing for radiology patients. Moreover, the plaintiff's circumstantial evidence relating to this conspiracy is quite limited.

Plaintiff's application for privileges at Baptist is distinguished not only by the fact that Radiology Associates interposed no objection, but also by the fact that Baptist eventually gave the plaintiff the privileges that she requested. Plaintiff argues that the process was delayed for three years. However, she ignores the fact that two and one-half years of that delay are attributable to her own lack of diligence. The events prior to February 25, 1988, are simply not relevant to plaintiff's claim [*133] against Baptist. There was no delay that can be attributable to anyone except the plaintiff.

Plaintiff next interposes the specious argument that Baptist did not give her all the privileges she requested. In other words, Baptist failed to accommodate plaintiff on her terms. She claims that this is evidence of an antitrust conspiracy. I do not agree.

Based on plaintiff's representations to the hospital, Baptist made the precise accommodation she had been seeking. Plaintiff requested privileges that would allow her to provide specific follow up care to the patients she saw at her clinic. Within five months of her renewal application in February 1988, Baptist granted plaintiff full courtesy privileges under supervision. It is undisputed that these privileges satisfied the professional needs plaintiff had expressed to Baptist, and that were known to it at the time.

Upon granting these privileges, Baptist explained that the interaction of the bylaws' practice requirement and the exclusive contract with Radiology Associates, plaintiff would not be eligible for unsupervised privileges. Baptist provided her with a copy of the bylaws, which she then signed, signifying her agreement to be [*134] bound by them in her dealings with the hospital. At the time plaintiff voiced no dissatisfaction with this arrangement.

Plaintiff's dissatisfaction with the level of her privileges arose only after Health First continued to deny her request for membership. It was only then that she revealed her true purpose in seeking privileges; and it is only since filing her complaint that plaintiff claims not to have received all the privileges for which she originally asked. Plaintiff will not now be heard to argue that Baptist's compliance with plaintiff's actual, written request is somehow evidence of an antitrust conspiracy.

Plaintiff next challenges the interaction between the exclusive contract with Radiology Associates and the bylaws practice requirement. Prior to June 1985, Baptist's contract with Radiology Associates was oral, and its terms were rather vaguely defined. In the summer of 1984, several months preceding plaintiff's first application for privileges, Baptist's Board of Directors ordered the administrative staff to negotiate a written contract.

Although the contract was not signed until June 28, 1985, Baptist represented to plaintiff that it was bound by its negotiations, [*135] and therefore could not process her application. When the hospital later reached an accommodation with plaintiff, it explained, as described above, that the contract, together with the bylaws practice requirement, would prevent it from granting her unsupervised privileges.

Plaintiff now attacks the exclusive contract on the grounds that the switch from a vaguely defined oral contract to a written contract "unnecessarily tied Baptist's hands." In other words, it prevented the hospital from accommodating plaintiff on her terms. The switch, according to plaintiff, was therefore economically irrational, and is evidence of an antitrust conspiracy.

This is essentially an attack on the economic validity of the exclusive contract, and I reject it out of hand. I already have discussed this issue in connection with the PRC contract, and it is settled law that the mere existence of an exclusive contract is not evidence of an antitrust conspiracy.

Plaintiff counters that Baptist decided to put its 35-year-old oral contract into writing precisely as she was applying for privileges, which implies an improper motive. However, the evidence is undisputed that negotiations on the written contract [*136] began several months before plaintiff submitted her application to any of the defendants in this case. Except for the actual coincidence of her application and the contract negotiations, there is absolutely nothing in the record to refute Baptist's evidence that the hospital was in the process of converting all their preexisting oral contracts into writing, and that the radiology contract was simply the next in line for conversion. Given that Baptist's explanation is consistent with permissible, unilateral business activity, I cannot conclude that the mere drafting of a contract at about the same time plaintiff submitted her application is evidence of anything.

Plaintiff also argues that, because the privileges requirement in the bylaws was not objectively necessary to assure quality medical care, Baptist's reliance on it to deny her unsupervised privileges is circumstantial evidence of an antitrust conspiracy between it and Radiology Associates. Again, this argument is, at best, specious. The bylaws existed long before plaintiff submitted her application. Nor is there any evidence that they were changed.

Plaintiff argues that, because the requirement prevents her from obtaining [*137] unsupervised privileges, it is irrational. Obviously, that is not the test. No requirement can satisfy every applicant. The test is whether the requirement is objectively economically reasonable in light of Baptist's legitimate business objectives. The answer, of course, is yes.

Plaintiff argues in the alternative that while the privileges requirement may be objectively rational, Baptist acted irrationally by refusing to waive the requirement for plaintiff. In other words, plaintiff argues that Baptist's failure to modify the privileges requirement is pretextual.

My previous analysis of this argument in connection with the alleged conspiracy between Sacred Heart and PRC applies with equal force here, and needs no repeating. There is simply no material evidence of pretext. Suffice it to say that, HN22[] even if Baptist's reliance on the privileges requirement was pretextual, such pretext would constitute unilateral action by Baptist. Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Authority, supra, 921 F.2d 1438, 1459 (11th Cir. 1991). Therefore, it is not evidence of a conspiracy between Baptist and Radiology Associates.

The same may be said for the contracts between Baptist and Drs. Westafer, French, and [*138] Montgomery. The Baptist situation is even stronger than with Sacred Heart, because the Baptist contracts contain a clause specifically stating that the loan in no way obligates the physician to refer patients to Baptist, and that referrals are to be made according to the best medical interests of the patient. Additionally, there is absolutely no evidence that anyone from Baptist or Radiology Associates pressured Drs. Westafer, French, or Montgomery into diverting referrals away from plaintiff and to Baptist.

Nevertheless, plaintiff makes the astounding argument that the mere lack of growth in referrals from these physicians is evidence of a conspiracy. Plaintiff does not even contend that she ever had a referral base at Baptist, or with these doctors, which was eroded by Baptist's action. Rather, she points to the growth in referrals from Dr. Epps, a Baptist physician not encumbered by a loan agreement, and concludes that referrals from Drs. Westafer, French, and Montgomery would have grown if they had not been parties to the offending contracts.

This comparison is meaningless. As discussed earlier, the Supreme Court has expressly held that conduct that is as consistent with [*139] permissible, unilateral activity as with an illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, permit the inference of an antitrust conspiracy. There are numerous rational explanations for the disparate growth in referrals from these four physicians. Location, patient preference, and physician preference are just a few that come to mind. Under the facts of this case, each of these explanations is just as likely as plaintiff's explanation - - - if not more so. Therefore, plaintiff's contrived speculation cannot support the inference of an antitrust conspiracy.

Plaintiff herself argues that the possibility of increased referrals from her clinic provided an economic incentive for the hospital defendants to grant her requests for privileges. She does not explain why a similar, rational business-motivated exchange of benefits between Baptist and Drs. Westafer, French, and Montgomery should be subject to antitrust liability. In short, the mere referral of patients to a hospital that has loaned the referring physician money to open a practice is at least as consistent with legitimate unilateral activity as with illegal concerted activity.

I make one more observation regarding Baptist's relation [*140] with plaintiff. As with Sacred Heart, Baptist and plaintiff are direct competitors. Plaintiff's own statistics reveal that as of 1989, the market for services encompassed by plaintiff's specialty was split almost equally among Baptist, Sacred Heart (Ann Baroco Center), and Pensacola Diagnostic. [42] All appear to be competing with each other for patients. Thus, Baptist would have a rational economic motive to refrain from granting plaintiff's request for privileges.

Plaintiff has argued that Baptist (or Sacred Heart) would realize an economic gain from establishing a relationship with her because she often must refer [*141] patients to hospitals for surgery. Yet, it is undisputed that she has never admitted a patient to any hospital at which she has privileges. Since attaining privileges at Baptist, she has visited only three patients there. In only one of these cases was Dr. Williamson acting as the "primary care" physician. And, even then, it was the surgeon who admitted the patient. Similarly, at least half of plaintiff's patients are referred to her by traditional primary care physicians who, if further treatment was indicated, would dictate the choice of hospital. Regardless, it is undisputed that, as competitors, Baptist had no legal obligation to make special accommodations to aid the plaintiff.

In sum, Baptist's motion for summary judgment is GRANTED insofar as it pertains to the alleged conspiracy between Baptist, Radiology Associates, and unnamed others to prevent plaintiff from competing for radiology patients.

3. The Community Conspiracy

In Count III of her complaint, plaintiff alleges that there was a "community wide" conspiracy among all the defendants to prevent her from gaining membership in Health First. This effectively disqualified her from treating HOP subscribers, and thereby [*142] prevented her from competing for patients in need of radiology services. The evidence in support of this conspiracy consists of the parallel refusals of the defendants to accommodate plaintiff's practice. According to plaintiff, Health First's denial of her application for membership was economically irrational unless all the defendants "toed the line" by refusing to accommodate her.

The rule in this circuit is that HN23[] evidence of conscious parallelism does not permit an inference of conspiracy unless the plaintiff establishes that each defendant engaging in the parallel action acted contrary to its economic self-interest. Bolt v. Halifax Hospital Medical Center, supra, 891 F.2d 810, 826 (11th Cir. 1990). "Thus, the plaintiff must establish that each defendant would have acted unreasonably in a business sense if it had engaged in the challenged conduct unless that defendant had received assurances from the other defendants that they would take the same action." Id. at 826-27.

I already have determined that the evidence in this case does not tend to exclude the possibility that both Sacred Heart and Baptist acted independently and in a manner consistent with rational business [*143] objectives in denying plaintiff's applications for privileges. Accordingly, plaintiff's claim of conscious parallelism cannot support an inference of conspiracy.

It is important to note here that, aside from the parallel denials of staff privileges (or membership in the case of Health First), there is no evidence that the defendants conspired to deprive her of membership in Health First. It is true that the physicians serving on Health First's Board of Directors were affiliated in one way or another with either [42] These figures in the record are based on revenues from procedures encompassed by plaintiff's specialty and were compiled by plaintiff's expert. The data omits figures for the privately-owned West Florida Regional Medical Center, an H.C.A. hospital, which is the major competitor of both Sacred Heart and Baptist, as well as the two other Pensacola hospitals, Navy and (at that time) University.

Baptist or Sacred Heart. However, HN24[] the mere opportunity to conspire among antitrust defendants is insufficient to permit the inference of conspiracy. Bolt, supra, 891 F.2d at 827.

There are other factors at work in the marketplace. By their very nature, HMOs restrict competition. As described above, Health First's bylaws initially required applicants to have privileges at a "participating hospital". At the time, the only such hospitals were Sacred Heart and Baptist. Health First maintains that it adopted this "ready made" credentialling procedure to avoid the cost of hiring a staff to screen applicants, and there is no evidence to the contrary.

The efficiency of this arrangement [*144] notwithstanding, it is clear that it effectively forfeits control over the selection of both physician participants and practice formats to the participating hospitals. Sacred Heart and Baptist therefore had de facto control over Health First's membership. Obviously, physicians who are otherwise competent in their specialties may be excluded from the HOP patient pool simply because they do not have privileges at one of these two hospitals.

In late 1985, shortly after becoming operational, HOP decided to begin admitting hospitals located outside the Pensacola area. To accommodate physicians who practiced at these hospitals, Health First amended its bylaws to provide that physicians who practiced primarily outside the greater Pensacola area could become members of Health First by obtaining privileges at one of the outlying hospitals. At the same time it retained the requirement that physicians practicing primarily within Pensacola must have privileges at Baptist or Sacred Heart. [43]

[*145] It is clear that the amended bylaws allowed Sacred Heart and Baptist to retain effective control over Health First membership within the greater Pensacola area. In order to fully understand the nature of this control, one must look to the nature of the competition between doctor owned, for-profit hospitals and nonprofit hospitals like Baptist and Sacred Heart within the greater Pensacola market.

As the record shows, Baptist and Sacred Heart compete neck and neck with the privately owned West Florida Regional Hospital. In 1984, the Medical Center Clinic at West Florida Regional created its own HMO. In order to compete, Baptist and Sacred Heart created HOP. Obviously, if Health First was to compete successfully, it could not open its membership to physicians associated with West Florida Regional, and vice versa. Viewed in this context, the procompetitive aspects of Health First's credentialling criteria become apparent.

As can be seen, HN25[] competition between HMOs creates something of a paradox. On one level, their restrictive practices promote competition. On another level, they have an obvious anticompetitive effect. Thus, the question becomes whether the procompetitive benefits offset [*146] the anticompetitive effect in the relevant product and geographic markets (the "rule of reason"). Seagood Trading Corp. v. Jerrico, Inc., supra, 924 F.2d 1555, 1569 (11th Cir. 1991) (citations omitted); Construction Aggregate Transport, Inc. v. Florida Rock Indus., Inc., 710 F.2d 752, 771-72 (11th Cir. 1983). [44]

For the purposes of the rule of reason analysis, there does not appear to be any evidence that the relevant geographic market is other than the greater Pensacola area. This includes Pensacola proper, along with the surrounding cities of Cantonment, Gulf Breeze, and Milton. [45] Similarly, there is no real dispute over the definition of the product component of the relevant market. It is the use of outpatient diagnostic radiology in the detection and [43] Plaintiff's claim that the 1985 amendments were adopted for the specific purpose of excluding her from membership is without merit. Plaintiff did not obtain privileges at any of the outlying hospitals until 1987. Unless Health First's Board members could foretell the future, they would have no way of knowing that their actions would impact any particular individual. Additionally, I note that plaintiff was ineligible under both the original and amended version of the bylaws.

[44] I emphasize that I am not dealing here with the conspiracy alleged by plaintiff. I already have determined that there was no conspiracy. Rather, I am looking at the fundamental structure of the HMO itself.

[45] Defendants merely assert that plaintiff has failed to present evidence establishing the relevant geographic market. It is undisputed that over 80% of Health Options subscribers live within the greater Pensacola area. In addition, over 80% of Baptist's and Sacred Heart's patients reside in this geographic area.

treatment of breast cancer. [46] In this [*147] case, consumers are generally limited in their choice of physicians by the type of insurance they carry.

Although HOP met with some measure of success, the health insurance market in the greater Pensacola area has been, and remains, highly fragmented. At the time Dr. Williamson filed her complaint, two HMOs, in addition to HOP, operated within the market. They were Medical Center Health Plan ("MCHP") and Metlife [*148] Healthcare Network of Florida ("Metlife") (formerly HMO America). At their peaks, which came around 1988, MCHP, Metlife, and HOP had enrollments of approximately 31,000, 7,000, and 23,000 respectively. From this peak, HOP membership gradually declined to approximately 15,000.00 in June of 1989. Enrollment in the other two HMOs declined similarly. As of April 1990, HOP still had approximately 15,000 members, MCHP also had about 15,000 members, while Metlife had declined to roughly 3,000 members.

In addition to the three HMOs, there are at least eight other providers of group health insurance operating in the greater Pensacola area. These include Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Florida PPC, Met-Elect PPO, and American General PPO. All of these are preferred provider programs ("PPOs"). [47] There are also three government funded programs: Champus, Medicare, and Medicaid. Finally, there are commercial indemnity insurance companies that supply group health insurance; Aetna and Providence are the largest in the Pensacola area.

[*149] Together with the three HMOs, these entities service almost the entire group health insurance market in the greater Pensacola area. This market consists of over 300,000 people. Thus, while it controlled between 38% and 45% of the HMO market between 1988 and 1990, HOP controlled only between 5% and 8% of total group health insurance market. Obviously, these percentages would be much lower if the market were expanded to include all people treated by doctors.

Although plaintiff has been excluded from HOP, she has been, and continues to be, a physician provider for Metlife, Blue Cross/Blue Shield PPC, MetElect PPO, American General PPO, Lawrence Health Care Administrative Services, Inc., Champus, and Medicare. Thus, it appears that a maximum of 8% of potential patients are excluded from choosing plaintiff's services. Under these circumstances, it would appear that the procompetitive benefit of allowing consumers the choice of an additional HMO outweighs the anticompetitive effect of the HMO structure.

In addition, it does not appear that HOP's presence has resulted in any detriment to competition in the relevant market. Plaintiff's own figures show that from the fiscal year ending [*150] April 30, 1985, to the fiscal year ending April 30, 1990, plaintiff's clinic receipts increased by over 300%, while her income increased in excess of 500%.

Plaintiff argues, of course, that these figures would have been even higher if defendants had not "prevented her from competing". The evidence clearly shows that plaintiff was a highly effective competitor. The injuries she complains of are merely those that every competitor must endure. Given HOP's small share of the total group health insurance market, along with plaintiff's obvious penetration and successful competition in the market, I must conclude that HOP's restrictive membership does not impose an unreasonable restraint on trade in the relevant geographic and product markets.

In sum, I conclude that defendants' parallel denials of plaintiff's various applications for privileges and staff membership do not support the inference of an antitrust conspiracy among the defendants. Moreover, I conclude that Health First's restrictive admissions practices do not unreasonably restrain trade in the relevant market. Accordingly, Defendants' various motions for summary judgment are GRANTED as to Count III.

[46] As discussed above, the product dimension of the relevant market is "determined by the availability of substitutes to which consumers can turn in response to price increases and other existing or potential producer's ability to expand output." L.A. Draper, supra, 735 F.2d at 423.

[47] In a PPO, members are permitted to choose any physician or treatment facility they please. The insurer then reimburses the provider for a fixed amount per service or for a fixed percentage of the fee for the service. The provider then bills the subscriber for any outstanding balance. Many PPOs also have a deductible that the subscriber must pay out of his own pocket before he is eligible for reimbursement.

E. Tortious Interference

[*151] Count IV of plaintiff's complaint alleges that defendants Sacred Heart, PRC, and Dr. Post intentionally and wrongfully interfered with existing and prospective business relationships which plaintiff had with patients at her clinic and with other doctors, and that they further interfered with prospective relationships plaintiff had with HOP patients. Baptist is not named in this count. This is a pendent state law claim.

HN26[] Tortious interference with business relationships and tortious interference with contractual relations are "basically the same cause of action" under Florida law. Smith v. Ocean State Bank, 335 So. 2d 641, 642 (Fla. 1st DCA 1976). "The only material difference appears to be that in one there is a contract and in the other there is only a business relationship." Id. In order to prove a tortious interference claim, the plaintiff must demonstrate: (1) the existence of a business or contractual relationship under which the plaintiff had legal rights; (2) an intentional and unjustified interference with the relationship; and (3) damage to the plaintiff as a result of the tortious interference with that relationship. Ad-Vantage Telephone Directory Consultants, [*152] Inc. v. GTE Directories, 849 F.2d 1336, 1348-49 (11th Cir. 1987) (applying Florida law); Tamiami Trail Tours, Inc. v. Cotton, 463 So. 2d 1126, 1127 (Fla. 1985). The relationship involved can be based on a business expectancy arising "even from an unenforceable agreement which would have been completed had the defendant net intervened." Scussel v. Balter, 386 So. 2d 1227, 1228 (Fla. 3d DCA 1980), citing United Yacht Brokers, Inc. v. Gillespie, 377 So. 2d 668 (Fla. 1979).

In order to be actionable, the interference must be direct; conduct that has only indirect consequences on the plaintiff will not support a claim for tortious interference. See Lawler v. Eugene Wuesthoff Memorial Hospital Ass'n, 497 So. 2d 1261, 1263 (Fla. 5th DCA 1986); Rosa v. Florida Coast Bank, 484 So. 2d 57 (Fla. 4th DCA 1986). For instance, in Lawler, supra, the plaintiff physician brought a claim for intentional interference with his doctor-doctor and doctor-patient relationships after the defendant hospital terminated staff privileges. The trial court dismissed the claim, and the appellate court affirmed, holding that the claimed interference was "only an indirect consequence of the [*153] termination of staff privileges." Lawler, 497 So. 2d at 1263. In contrast, the court in Scheller v. American Medical Int'l, Inc., 502 So. 2d 1268 (Fla. 4th DCA), cert. denied, 513 So. 2d 1060 (Fla. 1987), held that a physician stated a valid claim for tortious interference where he alleged that the defendant hospital wrongfully denied him access to laboratories and billing information.

Closely related is the rule HN27[] in Florida that no liability for tortious interference exists where the defendant acted to protect its own legitimate economic interests. Genet Co. v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 498 So. 2d 683, 684 (Fla. 3d DCA 1986). "So long as improper means are not employed, activities taken to safeguard or promote one's own financial and contractual interests are entirely non-actionable." Ethyl Corp. v. Balter, 386 So. 2d 1220, 1224-25 (Fla. 3d DCA 1980) review denied 392 So. 2d 1271 (Fla.), cert. denied, 452 U.S. 955, 101 S. Ct. 3099, 69 L. Ed. 2d 965 (1981).

1. Sacred Heart

Sacred Heart contends that it did not directly interfere with plaintiff's practice, but even if it did interfere directly, it did so for legitimate business reasons. I agree. Sacred [*154] Heart correctly points out that, in Florida, no tortious liability interference exists where the defendant acted to protect its own legitimate economic interests. Insofar as plaintiff's claim relates to the needle placement controversy, I already have determined that Sacred Heart's conduct was consistent with the maintenance of quality care, and was in the best interests of its patients. Any effect on plaintiff's practice, therefore, was incidental. Further, there seems to be no reason in the record to require Sacred Heart to change its policy in order to accommodate the plaintiff as a competitor.

The same is true for the contractual agreements between Sacred Heart and various physicians. As previously discussed, the record does not support the plaintiff's allegations regarding referrals. Even assuming that these contracts in fact lead to a decrease in referrals from these doctors, there is nothing to support plaintiff's contention that the interference was intentional. Each contract promoted Sacred Heart's legitimate business interests, and each physician gained a concomitant business benefit. Any decrease in referrals was incidental, and therefore, not actionable. For these reasons, [*155] Sacred Heart's motion for summary judgment on Count IV is GRANTED.

The only evidence supporting plaintiff's tortious interference claim against Dr. Post and PRC is the fact that Dr. Post tried to convince Dr. Murphy to refer his patients to Sacred Heart's radiology department by appealing to Dr. Murphy's sense of loyalty to the hospital. This conduct simply is not tortious. HN28[] Competitors have a right to attract patronage by lobbying potential customers for their business. That is the essence of competition. Such conduct becomes actionable only when the competitor uses improper means. See, e.g., Ad-Vantage Telephone, supra, 849 F.2d at 1348-49 (defendant contacted customers of plaintiff, improperly imposing additional burdens on them if they continued to deal with plaintiff); Manufacturing Research Corp. v. Greenlee Tool Co., 693 F.2d 1037 (11th Cir. 1982) (defendant contacted customers and employees of plaintiff with false information, which constituted direct interference); Insurance Field Servs., Inc. v. White & White Inspection & Audit Serv., Inc., 384 So. 2d 303 (Fla. 5th DCA 1980) (direct tortious interference found where defendants contacted [*156] plaintiff's customers to solicit their business in a wrongful manner).

In this case there is no evidence that Dr. Post did anything but talk to Dr. Murphy. There is also no evidence that PRC or Dr. Post had any ability to affect Dr. Murphy's practice. Finally, Dr. Murphy himself testified that Dr. Post's efforts were unsuccessful and that he continued to refer patients to plaintiff. Accordingly, the motion of Dr. Post and PRC for summary judgment on plaintiff's tortious interference claim is GRANTED.

3. Dismissal of State Law Claims

In the alternative, I also conclude that the state law claims against these defendants should be, and are DISMISSED, without prejudice, in the absence of any viable federal claims and as a matter of comity. See United Mine Workers of America v. Gibbs, 383 U.S. 715, 726, 86 S. Ct. 1130, 16 L. Ed. 2d 218, 228 (1966).

III. CONCLUSION

In sum, I conclude that, after a thorough review of the voluminous evidentiary record, there are no genuine issues of material fact remaining in this case and that the defendants are entitled to summary judgment on all claims. The defendants' motions are GRANTED, and the Clerk shall enter judgment in their [*157] favor and against the plaintiff on all claims, together with taxable costs.

DONE AND ORDERED this 28th day of May, 1993.

JERRY E. SMITH, Circuit Judge:[*]

Hibernia National Bank filed this action to recover from Industrial Alloys Company ("Industrial") on a promissory note. Industrial asserted a third-party claim against Acadia State Bank ("Acadia") under the anti-tying provisions of the Bank Holding Company Act Amendments of 1970, 12 U.S.C. §§ 1971-1978 (the "Act"). Following removal, Acadia raised defenses including the bar of the four-year statute of limitations of 12 U.S.C. § 1977. The district court dismissed the third-party claim, concluding that it had prescribed. We agree and affirm.

[*] Local Rule 47.5.1 provides: "The publication of opinions that have no precedential value and merely decide particular cases on the basis of well-settled principles of law imposes needless expense on the public and burdens 9 profession." Pursuant to that rule, the court has determined that this opinion should not be published.

Industrial alleged that an agent of Acadia induced Industrial's principal, Donald Surkand, to purchase stock in Acadia by promising a loan on a real estate project. The funds to acquire the stock [*2] were advanced by First National Bank of Covington, as evidenced by a promissory note dated May 8, 1986. Industrial claims that on June 20, 1986, Surkand was informed that the loan would not be approved. Industrial filed its third-party claim on June 20, 1990, exactly four years after that alleged notification but more than four years after the loan was made to buy the stock.

II.

Industrial argues that limitations did not begin to run until Acadia refused to go forward with the loan for the real estate purchase, which constituted the alleged tied credit. We may use antitrust law by analogy in anti-tying cases. Swerdloff v. Miami Nat'l Bank, 584 F.2d 54, 58-59 (5th Cir. 1978). In applying the antitrust laws, we consider that the limitations period begins to run when the defendant commits an act that injures the plaintiff's business. Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Sales v. Avondale Shipyards, 677 F.2d 1045, 1051 (5th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1105, 103 S. Ct. 729, 74 L. Ed. 2d 953 (1983).

As the district court correctly held, "The violations of the Bank Anti-tying Act occurred at the latest on the date that plaintiff purchased the stock in Acadia, as evidenced by the promissory note dated May 8, 1986." That is, the limitations period begins to run when the alleged violation occurs. Jackson v. Union Nat'l Bank, 715 F. Supp. 892, 895 (C.D. Ill. 1989) (citing Brunswick Corp. v. Riegel Textile Corp., 752 F.2d 261, 268 (7th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1018, 105 S. Ct. 3480, 87 L. Ed. 2d 615 (1985)).

The logic of this is that the anti-tying violation, if any, occurred when the unwanted [*3] product — i.e., the Acadia stock — was offered to Surkand in exchange for prospective favorable loan treatment and when Surkand, acting for Industrial,[1] purchased the stock on May 8, 1986. By that time, the forbidden act — tying one product to another — had occurred, and damages were cognizable.

Industrial argues, to the contrary, that there was no anti-tying claim until the loan application was rejected. We rejected a similar assertion in Swerdloff, 584 F.2d at 60, in which we stated, "Simply by demanding that the [plaintiffs] sell their stock, however, the bank violated the statutory prohibition." As Acadia notes, the ultimate rejection of the loan is irrelevant to this analysis, as the anti-tying injury would have been present even if Acadia had approved the loan: In either case, Surkand would have been forced to buy stock he did not want and that, under the Act, he could not be forced to buy as a condition of receiving the loan.

In support of its conclusion, the district court relied upon [*4] Jackson. Although that district court opinion from another circuit is not binding on us, we find its reasoning persuasive. There, the bank required the borrower's brother to execute a mortgage in order for the borrower to renew a note. The court held that limitations "expired . . . four years after [the brother] executed the . . . mortgage . . . [T]he fact that the bank customers do not suffer the final harm caused by the bank's conduct until some later time is irrelevant to the determination of whether their claim against the bank is time barred." 715 F. Supp. at 894 (citing Lancianese v. Bank of Mount Hope, 783 F.2d 467, 470 (4th Cir. 1986)). In Lancianese, the court held that "[i]t is not sufficient that the plaintiff may have suffered the damages caused by the defendant's violation within the limitations period. 783 F.2d at 470 (citing, inter alia, Kaiser Aluminum).

III.

Industrial argues that a recognized exception to the running of the four-year limitations statute applies to this case. That exception applies when there is a "continuing benefits violation" and the damages sustained are speculative and unprovable during the ordinary limitations period. See Poster Exch. v. National Screen Serv. Corp., 456 F.2d 662, 666-68 (5th Cir. 1972).

[1] In light of our disposition of the prescription claim, we pretermit deciding Acadia's assertion that Industrial has standing to assert an anti-tying claim on Surkand's behalf and assume, arguendo, that there is standing.

We have squarely held, however, that the continuing benefits theory cannot be applied where the damages were not speculative or unprovable [*5] at the time of the alleged anti-tying injury. See Kaiser Aluminum, 677 F.2d at 1053; City of El Paso v. Darbyshire Steel Co., 575 F.2d 521, 523 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1121, 99 S. Ct. 1033, 59 L. Ed. 2d 82 (1979). Here, any damages that Surkand sustained were determinable on May 8, 1986, when he paid for the Acadia shares he allegedly did not want and would not have bought but for the illegal tying arrangement.

Finally, citing Imperial Point Colonnades Condominium v. Mangurian, 549 F.2d 1029, 1043 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 859, 98 S. Ct. 185, 54 L. Ed. 2d 132 (1977), Industrial argues that a new cause of action was triggered each time Industrial made a periodic payment and when Hibernia filed suit on the note. See Al George, Inc. v. Envirotech Corp.., 939 F.2d 1271, 1274 (5th Cir. 1991) (per curiam). We addressed this argument in Kaiser Aluminum, holding that "[t]o the extent that Kaiser received benefits under the contract, such receipts were merely the abatable but unabated inertial consequences of some pre-limitation actions, rather than from some injurious act actually occurring during the limitation period." 677 F.2d at 1053 (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).[2] Moreover, the alleged benefits, i.e., the note payments, were received by Hibernia, not Acadia.

In summary, the district court correctly concluded that the four-year statute of limitations began running, at the latest, when the stock was purchased. The summary judgment, accordingly, is AFFIRMED.

End of Document

[2] As we noted in City of El Paso, 575 F.2d at 523, Imperial Point, unlike the case at bar, involved damages that could not be ascertained at the time of the violation. An anomaly may be Spitz v. Buchwald, 551 F.2d 1051, 1053 (5th Cir. 1977), which, relying upon Imperial Point, suggests that limitations are renewed when payments are made. The panel failed to [*6] address the distinction, later made by this court in City of El Paso, between damages that are ascertainable at the time of the initial violation and those that are not.

The elements of a per se tying claim are as follows: (1) There must be a tying arrangement between two distinct products or services; (2) the seller must have sufficient economic power in the tying market to restrain appreciably competition in the tied product market; and (3) the amount of commerce affected must be not insubstantial.

[*1325] SUHRHEINRICH, Circuit Judge. In our original decision in this case, [1] we reversed the judgment of the trial court, which implemented the jury's general verdict in favor of plaintiff and overruled defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict ("j.n.o.v."). We did so upon our conclusion that each of three alternative legal theories of anticompetitive conduct that were presented to the jury were erroneous as a matter of law. We then vacated the award of damages and the injunction issued by the trial court and remanded with instructions to enter judgment in favor of the defendant. The United States Supreme Court directed us to reconsider our original decision in light of Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Serv. Inc., 119 L. Ed. 2d 265, 112 S. Ct. 2072 (1992), in HN1[] which the Supreme Court held that the existence of competition in a primary equipment market does not preclude, as a matter of law, a finding of market or monopoly power in derivative aftermarkets.

[2] The opinion only briefly revisits the relevant facts. [2] Defendant Prime Computer, Inc. ("Prime") manufactures and markets computer systems, and provides maintenance services for those systems. Of significance to this lawsuit is one of its hardware lines, the "50 Series" minicomputer, and one of its applications software products, the so-called Computer-Aided Design/Computer-Aided Manufacturing system ("CAD/CAM"), which can be used with the 50 Series minicomputers.

Ford Motor Company ("Ford") created and owns a CAD/CAM software design program for use in designing automobiles. Ford's CAD/CAM program is called Product Design Graphic System ("PDGS"). Ford frequently revises the software program, and requires the automotive design companies with which it does business to use the most recent version of Ford's PDGS in order to facilitate the transmission of design specifications through CAD/CAM software.

Ford licenses defendant Prime as the exclusive distributor of Ford's [3] version of PDGS under a year-to-year contract. Ford's version of PDGS runs only in Prime's 50 Series minicomputers, but can be translated to other systems at a higher cost.

Prime also distributes software support (i.e., revisions, modifications, updates, and [*1326] support services) for PDGS software. Prime offers this software support to Ford's design companies as part of a package that includes hardware maintenance on the Prime 50 Series minicomputers. The Prime 50 Series minicomputers may be purchased separately from the hardware maintenance, but only at a prohibitive expense. In contrast, the general contract to purchase PDGS does not contain a hardware maintenance requirement.

Plaintiff Virtual Maintenance, Inc. ("Virtual") brought this antitrust action after unsuccessfully attempting to enter into hardware maintenance contracts with owners of Prime 50 Series computers. Virtual contended that Prime's package constituted an illegal tying arrangement in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, HN2[] 15 U.S.C. § 1, by conditioning the purchase of software support required by Ford to hardware maintenance from Prime (the tying product).

Virtual's case was presented [4] to the jury on three alternative theories of liability based on the alleged tie of hardware maintenance services to PDGS: (1) a per se claim based on a tying market of all CAD/CAM software; (2) a per se claim based on a tying product market of Ford-required PDGS; and (3) a rule of reason claim alleging that the clause in Prime's software maintenance package contract requiring the customer to use Prime's hardware maintenance services created unreasonable and anticompetitive effects in the market for maintaining Prime's 50 Series computer systems. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of Virtual. The district court denied Prime's motion for j.n.o.v. and entered judgment in favor of Virtual.

On appeal, we rejected each of Virtual's theories, and reversed the judgment of the district court with instructions to enter judgment in favor of Prime. In accordance with the Supreme Court's directive, we will consider whether any of these prior rulings are impacted by Eastman Kodak.

I.

A.

In Eastman Kodak, the antitrust plaintiffs were a group of independent service organizations (ISO's) that had been servicing Kodak copying and micrographic equipment since the early 1980s. [5] They brought suit after Kodak began restricting the sale of replacement parts for its photocopiers and micrographic equipment to only those buyers who also purchased Kodak service or repaired their own machines. Kodak equipment is unique; its parts are not compatible with its competitors' machines. Because of Kodak's restrictive policy, the ISO's were unable to obtain suitable parts and many were forced out of business. The plaintiffs also offered evidence that some customers who preferred the plaintiffs' service were forced, as a result of Kodak's practice, to switch to Kodak's service. Plaintiffs alleged, inter alia, that Kodak had tied the sale of service to the sale of parts in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act. Id. at 2076-77. [3]

The district court granted summary judgment for Kodak. A divided panel of the Ninth Circuit reversed, [6] finding a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Kodak had sufficient economic power in the tying product market (parts) to restrict competition appreciably in the tied product market (service). Id. at 2078.

Before the Supreme Court, Kodak did not offer any actual data on the proposed markets, but rather urged the adoption of a substantive legal rule that interbrand competition foreclosed finding of monopoly power in derivative aftermarkets as a matter of law. Id. at 2082. The Supreme Court framed the issue as "whether a defendant's lack of market power in the primary equipment market precludes--as a matter of law--the possibility of market power in derivative aftermarkets." Starting with the assumption that Kodak lacked market power in the equipment market, the Supreme Court nonetheless refused to accept on faith Kodak's proposed rule absent evidence to support [*1327] it. Thus, contrary to Kodak's assertion, "there [was] no immutable physical law--no 'basic economic reality'--insisting that competition in the equipment market cannot coexist with market power in the aftermarkets." Id. at 2084. [4]

[7] The Court found that the plaintiffs had offered a "forceful reason" why Kodak's theory might not accurately explain the behavior of the primary and derivative markets for complex and durable goods: "the existence of significant information and switching costs." Id. at 2085. Regarding information costs, the Court observed that in order for the service-market price to affect equipment demand, consumers must engage in accurate "lifecycle pricing"--that is, they must inform themselves of the total cost of the package at the time of purchase. Lifecycle pricing, however, is difficult to perform. Id. at 2085-86.

[3] Plaintiffs also claimed that Kodak had unlawfully monopolized and attempted to monopolize the sale of service for Kodak machines in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

[4] The Supreme Court made clear that Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 587, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986), did not create a special burden on plaintiffs responding to summary judgment challenges in antitrust cases, but requires only that the non-moving party's inferences be reasonable and not "economically senseless." Eastman Kodak*, 112 S. Ct. at 2083*.

Furthermore, the cost of switching products may be high, and consumers who have already purchased the equipment will tolerate some level of service-price increase before switching equipment brands. Id. at 2087*. "Under this scenario, a seller profitably could maintain supra-competitive prices in the aftermarket if the switching costs were high relative to the increase in service prices, and the number of locked-in customers were high relative to the number of new purchases." Id.

Also critical [8] to the Court's conclusion that summary judgment on the ISO's claims was improper was evidence presented by the plaintiffs that certain parts were available exclusively through Kodak, that Kodak had control over the availability of parts it didn't manufacture, and that Kodak's control over its parts market had excluded service competition, boosted service prices, and forced unwilling consumption of Kodak service when plaintiffs' service would have been preferred. Id. at 2081. The Court stated that under existing precedents, the foregoing evidence "would be sufficient to entitle [the plaintiffs] to a trial on their claim of market power." Id. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the appellate court reversing the district court's grant of summary judgment to Kodak.

Eastman Kodak did not involve a rule of reason theory of liability, and we see no reason to alter our conclusion that there was insufficient evidence to support a jury verdict under the rule of reason. Even with Ford-required software support as the tying product market, Virtual failed to demonstrate a substantial threat that Prime would acquire market power in the most [9] narrowly defined tied product market of hardware maintenance of Prime 50 Series systems. [5] See Virtual I, 957 F.2d at 1330 (the foreclosure of at most the 400 50 Series systems out of thousands of systems capable of using PDGS is insignificant as a matter of law). Given Virtual's failure of proof under the most restrictive definition of tied product market, we do not think our ruling on this issue is affected by Eastman Kodak.

Under Virtual's first per se claim [6] [11] , the district court defined the relevant market as "the sale of software revisions and support for the CAD/CAM industry in general." We [*1328] found no error in the legal adequacy of the district court's definition, but concluded that Prime possessed at most an 11% share of the market, which is insufficient as a matter of law [10] to confer market power. Virtual I, 957 F.2d at 1325 (citing Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 in Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 26, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1984) (30% market share does not confer market power); A.I. Root v. Computer/Dynamics, Inc., 806 F.2d 673, 675 (6th Cir. 1986)* (2-4% market share is insufficient); Grappone, Inc. v. Subaru of New England, Inc., 858 F.2d 792, 796 (1st Cir. 1985)* (5% market share insufficient)). [7] We find nothing in Eastman Kodak which requires us to alter this analysis. We therefore hold that a per se tying violation could not be established under Virtual's first per se theory because Prime lacks market power in the general CAD/CAM product market, for the reasons stated here and in section II.B.1. of our decision in Virtual I.

[5] Virtual claimed that a jury could find that Prime possessed almost total control over the Prime 50 Series hardware maintenance market. Virtual I, 957 F.2d at 1330*.

[6] As noted in Virtual I, HN3[] the elements of a per se tying claim are as follows: "(1) There must be a tying arrangement between two distinct products or services; (2) the seller must have sufficient economic power in the tying market to restrain appreciably competition in the tied product market; and (3) the amount of commerce affected must be not insubstantial." Virtual I, 957 F.2d at 1323* (quoting Directory Sales Management v. Ohio Bell Tel. Co., 833 F.2d 606, 609 (6th Cir. 1982)* (other quotations omitted)).

[7] We stated: HN4[] "An 11% market share, standing alone, is insufficient as a matter of law to confer the 'great market power, evidenced by an exceptional demand for the tying product' necessary for a per se illegal tie." Virtual I, 957 F.2d at 1325* (quoting A.I. Root, 806 F.2d at 676*).

Our ruling regarding Virtual's second per se claim requires much closer scrutiny. The other market that Virtual urged was defined as "the sale of software revisions and support of software necessary to do business with Ford Motor Company." Virtual I, 957 F.2d at 1325. Prime argued that this instruction defined the tying product market too narrowly as a matter of law, and we agreed. We found that HN5[] market definition defective as a matter of law because it was "based solely on one customer's requirements," which "this court has held . . . does not create a separate product market." Id. at 1327 (citing International Logistics Group, Ltd. v. Chrysler Corp., 884 F.2d 904, 908 (6th Cir. 1989), [12] cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1066, 108 L. Ed. 2d 784, 110 S. Ct. 1783 (1990); Dunn & Mavis, Inc. v. NU-Car Driveaway, Inc., 691 F.2d 241 (6th Cir. 1982)).

In response to Virtual's contention that Ford is not the only customer of Prime's products, but that all of Ford's design suppliers made up the customer market for "Ford-required CAD/CAM," we stated:

Virtual seeks to distinguish these cases by pointing out that Ford is not the only customer of Prime's products; rather, all of Ford's design suppliers make up the customer market for "Ford-required CAD/CAM." This ignores the fact that Ford requires its suppliers to purchase the software updates for Ford's benefit. Ford is ultimately the single consumer of its specialized design software because Ford's requirements define the demand for the software and the updates. But defining the market by Ford's requirements creates the appearance of market power based only upon the demand side of the market. Defining a market, or "submarket," on the basis of demand considerations alone is erroneous because such an approach fails to consider the supply side of the market. Philip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law [13] , 518.1g at 471 & n.26 (Supp. 1990) (citing United States v. Central State Bank*, 817 F.2d 22 (6th Cir. 1987))*. The relevant product market cannot be determined without considering the cross-elasticity of supply.

Virtual countered that Prime has no supply side competition because of its exclusive license for PDGS. We rejected this argument as "confusing the tying product (software support for PDGS) with the interbrand market relevant for antitrust analysis," id., [8] [*1329] and ruled that "the relevant tying market is comprised of all CAD/CAM software reasonably interchangeable with PDGS." Id. Critical to this analysis was the view that PDGS software support is an intrabrand "submarket":

[14] Prime has market power in the trivial sense that no one else makes PDGS. But true market power--power sufficient to change and sustain anticompetitive prices--cannot be inferred from this because were Prime to charge exorbitant prices for its software support, its customers would simply switch to some other manufacturer of PDGS-type software. Prime's lack of market power over the general market for CAD/CAM software thus prevents Prime from controlling the "submarket" for PDGS software.

[8] We observed that this court previously had refused to ignore interbrand competition by limiting the product market to one manufacturer's product, citing A.I. Root Co. v. Computer/Dynamics, Inc., 806 F.2d 673 (6th Cir. 1986) and Kingsport Motors, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., 644 F.2d 566 (6th Cir. 1991). Both of these cases can be distinguished from the instant one. The disposition in A.I. Root turned on the fact that the evidence in the case established that equipment using BOSS software had "close substitutes." Id. 806 F.2d at 676. The relevant market was not BOSS software as a unique product market, but small business computers. Id. at 675-76. Thus, the defendant lacked that "essential characteristic" of an illegal tying arrangement, the seller's ability to coerce customers into buying an unwanted tied product. Id. at 677. In fact, the plaintiff in that case, rather than submitting to the tie, purchased new IBM equipment and software. Id. at 675.

Kingsport Motors*, 644 F.2d 566*, is likewise distinguishable because there the relevant product market, "properly analyzed," was "all medium priced cars available for sale in the United States." Id. at 571. So defined, there was simply no proof that the seller had any power to raise prices or that the tying arrangement at issue affected any appreciable number of buyers within the applicable market. Id. Thus, Kingsport Motors, by focusing on the primary equipment market rather than the aftermarket cannot compel a similar result in this case.

Id. 957 F.2d at 1327-28. [9] Upon refusing to view Ford-required PDGS software support as a separate tying product market, we rejected Prime's lock-in and switching costs arguments as a matter of law:

[15] Virtual responds that Ford and its design suppliers cannot switch to a new supplier of software support because they are "locked-in" to Prime as the sole supplier due to their substantial investments in Prime 50 Series computers and other hardware. While Ford might believe it is "locked-in," this is due in large part to its own decision to purchase Prime's software and invest in Prime's computer systems. But a customer's initial purchase of a particular manufacturer's product does not justify a limited market definition. Defining the market by customer demand after the customer has chosen a single supplier fails to take into account that the supplier (here Prime) must compete with other similar suppliers to be designated the sole source in the first place.

Id. at 1328 (citation omitted).

Under Eastman Kodak, our rejection of Virtual's second per se claim based on a tying product of Ford-required software support was misguided. That Ford had many competitors to choose from when it made its initial decision to grant the exclusive license to Prime cannot, after Eastman Kodak, preclude as a matter of law Virtual's proposed theory of market power because it ignores information [16] costs. It follows that our rejection of Virtual's "lock-in" argument, on the basis of an interbrand competitive market in the initial purchase of Prime's software package and Prime 50 Series minicomputers, was also in error.

Eastman Kodak also requires us to rethink our characterization of the tying product market here as merely the preference of one customer. Unlike Eastman Kodak, the initial decision to purchase Prime equipment and software was made by a single consumer, Ford. However, by shifting the focus to the derivative aftermarket of software support, there is not a single consumer, but numerous automotive design companies doing business with Ford. In contrast [1330] with International Logistics, 894 F.2d 902 at 904*, which involved vertical nonprice restraints unilaterally imposed by defendant Chrysler upon its distributors, the automotive design companies in the present case are independent companies, not a part of Ford. Unlike Dunn & Mavis*, 691 F.2d 241*, where it was held that an agreement between a single seller of transportation services and a single automobile manufacturer was not an illegal "group boycott," the [17] present case does not involve merely an arrangement between a single consumer and a single supplier. Thus, the market in this case is not defined by Ford, as a customer of Prime, but by Ford's requirements that affect the choice of Prime's other customers, Ford suppliers. [10]

The similarities between this case and Eastman Kodak [18] are apparent. As in Eastman Kodak, the alleged tie is not between equipment and parts, where interbrand competition would defeat market power and a per se tying claim. Rather, the alleged tie is in the derivative aftermarkets. Like Kodak, Prime is able to exercise control over the

[9] In rejecting Virtual's contention that PDGS constitutes a relevant "submarket," we relied, in part, on the proposition in A.I. Root Co. v. Computer/Dynamics, Inc., 806 F.2d 673 (6th Cir. 1986), that "competitors of [defendant] could produce computer hardware and software equivalent to that manufactured by [defendant]. Accordingly, [defendant's product] did not compose a separate and distinct submarket within the computer industry as to which we should measure 'market share.'" Virtual I*, 957 F.2d at 1327* (quoting A.I. Root*, 806 F.2d at 675-76*. As previously noted, see supra note 7, A.I. Root rejected the plaintiff's attempts to define BOSS as a separate market because although it was copyrighted, there was proof of close substitutes. Id. Closer to the mark is a case discussed in A.I. Root, Digidyne Corp. v. Data General*, 734 F.2d 1336 (9th Cir. 1984)*. A.I. Root distinguished Digidyne on the basis that the tying product (RDOS), a computer command system, was unique. In contrast, the plaintiff in A.I. Root had not presented any evidence that BOSS was particularly unique or desirable. Here, Virtual has offered proof of PDGS's desirableness; namely, Ford's requirement that all the design companies with which it does business use the software and software updates.

[10] This view is not inconsistent with dicta in International Logistics*, 884 F.2d at 909*. There, we stated that Chrysler products could not be a relevant market "absent a government imposed distinctions between Chrysler manufactured replacement parts and Chrysler compatible replacement parts . . . ." Id. By implication, had such a government imposed distinction existed, it may have had the "unique characteristics that would support its consideration as a separate geographic market." Id. In this case, the "imposed distinction" is Ford's requirement that its automotive design suppliers use the most current version of PDGS marketed exclusively through Prime.

sale of software support because of its exclusive distribution license from Ford, and Ford's requirement that its automotive design suppliers use the most current version of Prime's software support. Thus, it can be argued that Prime enjoys a significant advantage in the Ford-required software support market by virtue of Ford's license and the requirement Ford places on the automotive design companies to use the most current version of PDGS. In other words, there is evidence to make the argument that Prime's tying arrangement bears HN6[] that "essential characteristic" of an illegal tying arrangement, the ability to exploit control over the tying product to force the buyer to purchase an unwanted tied product. Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 12.

Like the ISO's in Eastman Kodak, Virtual presented evidence of price manipulation. An expert for Virtual testified that although Prime [19] offered software support for sale separately, repurchase of software to obtain updates would cost as much as 900% more than if purchased in the software support/hardware maintenance package. There was also evidence that Prime does not treat all customers equally. Prime apparently allows one customer, Ford Aerospace, to continue to receive software support without purchasing hardware maintenance from Prime. Virtual also offered proof that customers would have preferred Virtual's service to Prime's, but were effectively precluded by the tie.

Virtual offered expert testimony concerning lock-in and switching costs. Virtual's industry experts testified that customers were "locked-in" to the hardware maintenance by the substantial cost incurred for hardware, maintenance, and training, most of which would be substantially worthless if the customer switched to another manufacture's system. A Ford employee, called by Prime, testified that Ford itself felt "locked-in" to Prime, stating that Ford could not change from Prime's computer system and remain economically viable in the automotive industry. Virtual's expert also opined that Prime could substantially raise its maintenance prices before [20] customers would abandon their investment.

Finally, Virtual made a showing that a "not insubstantial" amount of commerce was affected in that it stood to lose an estimated $ 8 million dollars over a five-year period. Thus, under Eastman Kodak, we conclude that Virtual's second definition of market power was proper.

C.

Eastman Kodak dictates that we vacate our holding as to Virtual's second definition of market power on a per se tying claim. All other aspects of our holdings in Virtual I [1331] are reaffirmed and reinstated. Because the general jury verdict in the first trial provides no indication of the jury's reliance on this theory in support of the original verdict, we are obligated to reverse the verdict and remand for a new trial. See Sunkist Growers, Inc. v. Winckler & Smith Citrus Products Co., 370 U.S. 19, 29-30, 8 L. Ed. 2d 305, 82 S. Ct. 1130 (1962)*; United New York and New Jersey Sandy Hook Pilots Assoc. v. On remand, the district court is instructed to conduct a new trial on the sole theory of a per se claim based on a tying product market of Ford-required PDGS software support.

A firm with lawful monopoly power has no general duty to help its competitors.The lone exception to this "no-duty-to-help competitors" rule is the essential facilities doctrine. For a monopolist to be liable under the essential facilities doctrine, a plaintiff must show: (1) control by the monopolist of the essential facility; (2) the inability of the competitor seeking access to practically or reasonably duplicate the facility; (3) the denial of the facility to the competitor; and (4) the feasibility of the monopolist to provide the facility. The plaintiff has the burden of proving each of these elements.

PER CURIAM:

Plaintiffs, the North Carolina Electric Membership Corp. and sixteen of its member retail electric cooperatives (together, "NCEMC"), appeal the district court's grant of a directed verdict for defendant Carolina Power & Light (CPL) on NCEMC's claim under Section 2 of the Sherman Act. We find no error in the district court's decision and affirm.

I

The retail electric cooperatives that are members of NCEMC purchase electric power at wholesale and sell it at retail in several areas of North Carolina. These cooperatives purchase their wholesale power from CPL, Duke Power Company, and Virginia Power Company, all of whom generate and transmit wholesale power. With some exceptions, CPL, Duke Power and Virginia Power serve different areas in North Carolina; in the areas that CPL serves, for example, it supplied 97% of the wholesale electric power during the period at issue in this case. Each cooperative buys its wholesale power from the company that serves the area in which the cooperative is located.

In 1974, a new Rural Electrification Administration (REA) [*3] financing program became available to the cooperatives. NCEMC determined that it would attempt to use its members' new financing ability to acquire its own generation facilities and enter into the wholesale power market in those areas of North Carolina where its members operated at retail. Its idea was that by entering the wholesale power market and generating power itself, it could obtain cheaper wholesale power for its member retail cooperatives.

To this end, NCEMC initiated discussions with CPL in August, 1974, about purchasing a part interest in one or more of CPL's generation units. CPL, which had never before sold a part interest in one of its generation plants, responded that it was not interested in selling any plants currently in operation or nearing completion, but that it was willing to discuss joint ownership of a plant that would be constructed in the future. NCEMC and CPL continued talks about joint ownership of a generation plant for eighteen months until February, 1976, at which point NCEMC broke them off because it did not feel that CPL was serious about the possibility.

NCEMC and those member retail cooperatives that buy wholesale power from CPL filed suit against [*4] CPL in August, 1977, claiming that CPL had refused to sell NCEMC a part interest in one of its generation plants and that this refusal violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act. They sought treble damages of $ 1.2 billion. After an extensive pretrial period, NCEMC's case was tried before Judge Bullock in February, 1992. The following evidence was presented.

When NCEMC sought to produce its own power and enter the wholesale power market, two general alternatives were available to it: building its own generation plant or buying a part interest in another plant operated by another wholesaler. Testimony of NCEMC's employees indicated that it considered both alternatives. NCEMC's cooperatives only serve a small percentage of the retail markets in which they are located; those cooperatives that purchase wholesale power from CPL, for example, have an average market share of ten percent. If NCEMC were to build a generation plant to generate wholesale power only for its own retail cooperatives, the plant would have been relatively small. While generation plants of the size NCEMC required were built during the period when NCEMC was considering building one, [1] large economies of scale are available [*5] in generating electrical power. It appears that, as a result, NCEMC determined that it could generate its own power more efficiently by purchasing a part interest in a generation plant operated by a large wholesale company than by constructing its own plant.

NCEMC, therefore, entered into the discussions with CPL that are the subject of this suit; it also initiated negotiations with Virginia Power Company, Duke Power Company, and Georgia Power Company about purchasing a part interest in one of their generation plants. The negotiations with CPL were unsuccessful, as described above. NCEMC also elected not to purchase a part interest in one of Virginia Power's plants because the savings to its cooperatives of purchasing wholesale power that NCEMC would generate at this plant, rather than purchasing wholesale power under their existing arrangements, [*6] were too small. Negotiations between NCEMC and Georgia Power for NCEMC to purchase a part interest in one of Georgia Power's generation plants were similarly unsuccessful, although there was conflicting testimony as to why. CPL asserted that Georgia Power's asking price was too high for NCEMC; NCEMC offered testimony that in order for it to market wholesale power in North Carolina that it generated at the joint Georgia Power plant in Georgia, CPL would have had to supply NCEMC with "back-up power," which CPL declined to do because it did not have "back-up power" available at the time.

[1] CPL presented testimony that the City of Fayetteville, North Carolina built a generation plant during this period approximately the size that NCEMC would have required.

NCEMC's efforts to generate its own power and enter the wholesale power market through acquiring a part interest in a generation plant came to fruition, however, when it purchased a part interest in Duke Power's Catawba plant for $ 1 billion in 1980. After Catawba was completed, NCEMC used the power generated under its part interest there to enter the wholesale power market in all of the areas of North Carolina where its retail cooperatives are located. [2] 5 At the conclusion of the NCEMC's evidence, the district court granted CPL's Fed. R. Civ. P. 50 motion for a directed verdict. Judge Bullock stated [*7] from the bench that NCEMC's claim failed because even if CPL had a monopoly in the market for wholesale power, it had no duty to sell NCEMC an equity interest in one of its plants. Judge Bullock supplemented his oral statement with a brief written opinion indicating that NCEMC had not presented evidence from which a reasonable jury could find:

> (1) that the relevant market was other than the generation market, (2) that Defendant possessed monopoly power in the generation market, (3) that Defendant caused injury or fact of damage to Plaintiffs in the generation market, (4) that Defendant's conduct improperly excluded Plaintiffs from the wholesale requirements power market, and (5) that Defendant's conduct was not as consistent with permissible competition as with the illegal exercise of monopoly power.

NCEMC appeals from the district court's directed verdict.

NCEMC contends that the district court erred in granting a directed verdict for CPL. Taken in pieces, NCEMC's argument is as follows. CPL had monopoly power in the market for wholesale power in those areas of North Carolina where CPL operated. By initiating discussions with CPL about acquiring a part interest in one of CPL's generation plants, NCEMC sought to compete with CPL in this market for wholesale power. The failure of CPL and NCEMC to reach an agreement for NCEMC to purchase a part interest in a CPL generation plant constituted a refusal by CPL to sell it such an interest. Because this refusal was motivated by CPL's desire to avoid competition in its wholesale power market, CPL's actions violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act.

HN1[] We review de novo the district court's decision to grant a directed verdict for CPL, Gairola v. Virginia Dept. of General Services, 753 F.2d 1281, 1285 (4th Cir. 1985), and find that its decision was correct. Even if NCEMC established that the relevant market in this case was the market for wholesale power in those areas of North Carolina where CPL sold wholesale power and CPL possessed monopoly power in this [*9] market, [3] NCEMC's claim must fail.

[2] A negotiator for NCEMC, Robert Cleveland, testified that CPL, Virginia Power, and Duke Power all refused from 1974-1976 to sell NCEMC a part interest in one of their generation plants unless NCEMC would agree to sell the power generated from the joint plant only in those areas of the state where their company controlled the wholesale market. As a result, Cleveland stated that NCEMC was precluded from purchasing a joint interest in a single generation plant owned by CPL, Duke Power, or Virginia Power, and using that joint interest to generate power for all of its cooperatives throughout North Carolina. Retail cooperatives in CPL's areas, thus, were precluded from having NCEMC purchase a part interest in a Duke Power or a Virginia Power plant and sell the power from its part interest to them.

The strength of the wholesale companies' refusal, however, is questionable given that Duke Power later sold NCEMC the part interest in its Catawba plant and allowed NCEMC to sell the wholesale power generated at Catawba throughout North Carolina. There was some evidence that Duke Power dropped its requirement that power generated at Catawba only be sold in areas of the state where Duke Power controlled the wholesale market when REA, which helped finance NCEMC's purchase of the part interest in Catawba, asked Duke Power to drop this requirement.

[3] There are obvious problems with defining the areas in which CPL sold wholesale power as the relevant market, and the district court did not find that NCEMC presented evidence to establish such a market. Because NCEMC's Section 2 claim fails for other reasons, however, we need not address this issue.

HN2[] "[A] firm with lawful monopoly power has no general duty to help its competitors . . . ." Olympia Equipment Leasing Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 797 F.2d 370, 375 (7th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 480 U.S. 934, 94 L. Ed. 2d 765, 107 S. Ct. 1574 (1987). The lone exception to this"no-duty-to-helpcompetitors" rule is the "essential facilities doctrine." Olympic Equipment Leasing Co., 797 F.2d at 376. For a monopolist to be liable under the essential facilities doctrine, a plaintiff must show: "(1) control by the monopolist of the essential facility; (2) the inability of the competitor seeking access to practically or reasonably duplicate the facility; (3) the denial of the facility to the competitor; and (4) the feasibility of the monopolist to provide the facility." Laurel Sand & Gravel, Inc. v. CSX Transp., Inc., 924 F.2d 539, 544 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 116 L. Ed. 2d 39, 112 S. Ct. 64 (1991); Advanced Health-Care Services v. Radford Community Hosp., 910 F.2d 139, 150 (4th Cir. 1990); MCI Communications Corp. [*10] v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 708 F.2d 1081, 113233 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 891 (1983). The plaintiff has the burden of proving each of these elements. Laurel Sand, 924 F.2d at 544.

We need not examine all of these elements because we find that NCEMC failed to meet the second one. HN3[] To satisfy the second element, NCEMC had to show that, in seeking to generate its own power, it had no "economically feasible" alternative to purchasing a part interest in a CPL generation plant. MCI Communications, 708 F.2d at 1133. See Phillip E. Areeda and Herbert Hovencamp, Antitrust Law P 736.2, at 808 (1991 Supp.) ("An essential facility is, at minimum, a resource possessed by the defendant that is vital to the plaintiff's competitive viability.").

[*11] NCEMC failed to make this showing. One alternative for NCEMC to purchasing a part interest in a CPL generation plant was purchasing 7 a part interest in a generation plant owned by one of the other large power companies in the region. NCEMC did not demonstrate that it was not economically feasible to purchase such a part interest from any of these companies; in fact, the evidence appears to have established that it was quite feasible. NCEMC conducted serious negotiations with both Virginia Power and Georgia Power over purchasing a part interest in one of their plants, and only in the case of the Georgia Power negotiations did NCEMC present any evidence that such a purchase was not feasible. [4] In addition, four years after CPL and NCEMC had failed to come to agreement, NCEMC actually purchased a part interest in Duke Power's Catawba generation plant. In light of this evidence, no reasonable jury could have found that buying a part interest in a generation plant from a company other than CPL was not economically feasible for NCEMC. See City of Malden v. Union Elec. Co., 887 F.2d 157, 162 (8th Cir. 1989) (reasonable alternatives existed to a monopolist's [*12] transmission lines when neighboring companies had available, though more expensive, transmission lines). [5]

[*13] In short, NCEMC's only possible claim that CPL violated section 2 of the Sherman Act by refusing to sell it a part interest in a CPL generation plant was under the "essential facilities" doctrine. NCEMC clearly did not have a valid claim under this doctrine because it failed to show that, in seeking to generate its own power, it had no economi 8 cally feasible alternative to purchasing a part interest in a CPL plant. The district court, therefore, correctly dismissed NCEMC's claim. [6]

For the reasons stated, we affirm the district court's order dismissing NCEMC's claim.

[4] NCEMC asserts that the reason it did not buy a part interest in a Georgia Power plant was that, in order to use the power generated at the Georgia Power plant, it needed CPL to supply it with"back-up power" and CPL could not supply this "back-up power" at the time it was requested.

[5] NCEMC asserts that purchasing a part interest in one of Virginia Power's or Duke Power's generation plants and using it to produce power in the market at issue here, the market where CPL generated power, was impossible because Virginia Power and Duke Power refused to sell NCEMC a part interest in a generation plant that could be used to supply wholesale power in areas of North Carolina controlled by CPL. We find this assertion untenable because four years after NCEMC's claim arose, Duke Power agreed, without any great fight, to sell NCEMC a part interest in a generation plant that NCEMC could use to market wholesale power throughout North Carolina, including in areas controlled by CPL.

[6] NCEMC also contends that the district court abused its discretion in not admitting a number of its exhibits. We find this contention without merit. In addition, we deny NCEMC's motion to strike a portion of CPL's brief.

HN1[] Summary Judgment, Opposing Materials

Summary judgment is appropriately entered for the moving party as a matter of law when all the papers before a trial court show that there are no genuine issues of material fact. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). The litigant seeking summary disposition of a case bears the initial burden of demonstrating, through affidavits or otherwise, the absence of genuine factual issues. If the moving party meets its burden, the non-moving party then has the obligation to produce probative evidence supporting its view that a dispute exists. The party opposing summary judgment must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts, the nonmoving party must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. In the context of antitrust litigation the range of inferences that may be drawn from ambiguous evidence is limited; the non-moving party must set forth facts that tend to preclude an inference of permissible conduct.

Conduct considered illegal per se is invoked only in a limited class of cases, where a defendant's actions are so plainly harmful to competition and so obviously lacking in any redeeming pro-competitive values that they are conclusively presumed illegal without further examination. Per se violations include, for example, horizontal and vertical price-fixing, division of a market into territories, certain tying arrangements, and some group boycotts involving concerted refusals to deal with a competitor. In discussing group boycotts the Supreme Court cautions against application of the per se rule against professional associations because the economic impact of professional activities is so difficult to track.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN5[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In the general run of cases, a plaintiff must prove an antitrust injury under the rule of reason. Under this test, the plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that the challenged action has had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market; to prove it has been harmed as an individual competitor will not suffice. Insisting on proof of harm to the whole market fulfills the broad purpose of the antitrust law that was enacted to ensure competition in general, not narrowly focused to protect individual competitors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > General Overview

HN6[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

After the plaintiff satisfies its threshold burden of proof under the rule of reason, the burden shifts to the defendant to offer evidence of the pro-competitive "redeeming virtues" of their combination. Assuming defendant comes forward with such proof, the burden shifts back to plaintiff for it to demonstrate that any legitimate collaborative objectives proffered by defendant could have been achieved by less restrictive alternatives, that is, those that would be less prejudicial to competition as a whole.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN7[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Ultimately, it remains for the factfinder to weigh the harms and benefits of the challenged behavior in antitrust cases. The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

HN8[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Sherman Act

The mere opportunity to conspire does not by itself support the inference that such an illegal combination actually occurred. A plaintiff must prove the defendants illegally conspired. The plaintiff's evidence must prove the actors had an intent to adhere to an agreement that was designed to achieve an unlawful objective; it is not required that the proof show the actors specifically intended to restrain trade.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > General Overview

HN9[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

Rule of reason analysis requires antitrust plaintiffs to bear initial burden of demonstrating that defendants' conduct or policy has had a substantially harmful effect on competition. The plaintiff may satisfy this burden without detailed market analysis by offering proof of actual detrimental effects, such as a reduction of output. Yet, where plaintiff is unable to demonstrate such actual effects, it must at least establish that defendants possess the requisite market power so that their arrangement has the potential for genuine adverse effects on competition.

[*538] CARDAMONE, Circuit Judge:

We have before us on this appeal a claimed violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Certainly one strand of the philosophical underpinning leading to the passage of that Act is derived from the thinking of John Stuart [*539] Mill, who, in his influential essay "On Liberty," observed: "trade is a social act. Whoever undertakes to sell any description of goods to the public, does what affects [2] the interest of other persons, and of society in general; and thus his conduct, in principle, comes within the jurisdiction of society," J.S. Mill, On Liberty, Chapt. V, 303 (Harv. Class., Eliot ed., 1909). Plainly, not all competitive conduct that injures another allows resort to laws regulating trade. Antitrust law is not intended to be as available as an over-the-counter cold remedy, because were its heavy power brought into play too readily it would not safeguard competition, but destroy it. Determining whether conduct allegedly in restraint of trade violates the Sherman Act requires careful analysis and fine discernment between those actions that generally tend to inhibit competition and those that either tend to promote it or at least not injure it. Such an analysis is our task on the present appeal.

A private radiology group brought this antitrust action in the district court against a health maintenance organization and the group of physicians organized to provide medical care to the health plan's enrollees. The radiologists complained that they were improperly excluded from providing services to the patients of the health care purveyor. Such exclusion, they argued, constituted [3] a violation of the Sherman Act. After limited discovery, the district court granted the defendants summary judgment. In so doing, it examined only the "vertical" relationship between the health maintenance organization and its physicians' association, which the plaintiff radiologists argue was error. Although we agree with the radiology group that certain "horizontal" aspects of the defendants' practices improperly were not considered, we affirm the judgment of the district court, though for somewhat different reasons, because it reached the correct result.

BACKGROUND

A. The Parties

Capital Imaging Associates, P.C. (Capital, plaintiff or appellant) is a private radiology group of doctors who practice in Latham, a suburb of Albany, located at the northern tip of Albany County, New York, only a few miles from the borders of Schenectady, Saratoga, and Rensselaer Counties. Capital operates as a referral practice, that is, its physicians do not treat their own patients; rather, they supervise the performance of diagnostic radiological procedures on patients referred to the group by general clinicians, interpret the resulting images, and report their findings to the primary care physicians. [4] The radiology group offers a full range of diagnostic imaging services, including such specialized radiological procedures as ultrasound, Magnetic Resonance Imaging (MRI), and Computerized Axial Tomography (CAT) scanning. The only comparable full-service radiology practice within a 100-mile radius of Albany County is Two Rivers Radiology, P.C. (Two Rivers), which has two offices, one in Rensselaer County and the other in Albany County directly across the street from Capital in Latham.

Mohawk Valley Medical Associates (Mohawk Valley, defendant or appellee) is an independent association of private physicians providing medical care to over 100,000 enrollees in appellee Mohawk Valley Physicians Health Plan (Plan). Mohawk Valley and the Plan were defendants at the district court. Together the physicians' association and the Plan constitute an independent practice association (IPA) model health maintenance organization (HMO). Under the IPA-HMO arrangement, the managed health care purveyor (in this case the Plan) contracts with the physicians' practice association, Mohawk Valley, to provide a full range of medical services for the HMO's enrollees, who must then go to Mohawk Valley physicians [5] for all their medical care needs.

According to the terms of their agreement, the Plan purchases medical services from Mohawk Valley at a fixed contract or capitation rate per individual health plan enrollee. Although the arrangement among the Mohawk Valley physicians apparently does not permit price competition among the doctors, the capitation system promotes efficiency and is viewed as pro-competitive because it gives the independent practice physicians an incentive to keep medical costs down. That is, unless Mohawk Valley agrees to a sufficiently [*540] low capitation rate, the Plan will be unable to compete with other health care providers in the private insurance market, in which case the Mohawk Valley physicians will not receive a steady stream of patients and income from the HMO. See generally U.S. Healthcare, Inc. v. Healthsource, Inc., 1993 WL 47370 (1st Cir. Feb. 26, 1993) (describing HMO cost containment procedures).

In order to operate as an HMO in New York, the Plan was required to apply for and receive a certificate of authority from the New York State Department of Health (Department). The Department regulates HMOs to ensure that patients are afforded with comprehensive [6] and continuous medical care. It also certifies the service area within which an HMO may offer its benefits package. See N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 4402 (McKinney 1985). At the commencement of this lawsuit, the Plan was licensed to operate in several central and upstate New York communities, but not in Albany County.

Mohawk Valley is also regulated by the Department. In accordance with state law it is obligated to, inter alia, staff itself with physicians and other health care professionals as necessary to meet the full needs of the Plan's enrollees, and to establish credential requirements for membership in its practice association. Consonant with these obligations, Mohawk Valley promulgated standards for admission of doctors into its association. To be admitted, a member physician must have (1) privileges in hospitals participating with the Plan, (2) offices within the state-certified service area, and (3) staff and facilities to provide adequate and continuous care to Plan patients. Limited exceptions to these admission requirements have been made when a pressing need exists for additional primary care physicians or specialists.

An application for membership is reviewed by the [7] Mohawk Valley credentials committee, which makes a recommendation to its board of directors. According to the association's guidelines, the board may either approve the admission request or inform the applicant that it intends to deny it. If the board chooses the latter course, the applicant may request a hearing, during which he or she may present materials to support the application.

B. The Complaint

This litigation came about as a result of the denial of appellant Capital's application for membership in Mohawk Valley. Appellant alleges that on February 24, 1987 it sent a written request for admission into the practice association, which was denied on July 21 because Capital was located outside of the Plan's designated service area. According to Capital, its application was spurned without prior notice and an opportunity for a hearing before the association's board of directors, procedures mandated by Mohawk Valley's standards for admission. Moreover, appellant contends the purported reason for denial is inconsistent with the Plan's description of its service area in its promotional literature to enrollees and with Mohawk Valley's treatment of other Latham-based physicians [8] seeking membership.

In support of that contention, Capital points out that following the veto of its admissions application, it was asked to bid on an exclusive one-year contract to provide imaging services for Mohawk Valley. In October 1987 the association's board of directors rejected Capital's bid and voted instead to award the contract to Two Rivers because Two Rivers' bid was $ 40 per scan lower. Appellant believes the bidding process was flawed and provides further evidence of appellees' hostility towards it.

As a result of these events, on December 5, 1988, Capital commenced the instant litigation against both appellees in the United States District Court for the Northern District of New York (McCurn, C.J.). The complaint alleged that commencing September 1986 and continuing to the present time, appellees, along with Two Rivers and other unnamed parties, engaged in a conspiracy to exclude Capital from membership in the independent practice association. According to Capital this action constitutes an unlawful combination in restraint of trade in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act and an attempt to monopolize trade and commerce in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. The complaint [9] further alleged that these activities violate [*541] New York State's General Business Law and the common law barring unfair competition.

C. Prior Proceedings

Appellees made a motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(1) and for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). They also moved, in the alternative, for summary judgment under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 on the ground that there were no genuine issues of material fact. In a memorandum and order dated November 28, 1989, the district court granted the Rule 12(b)(6) motion with respect to Capital's claim of monopolization under Sherman Act § 2 because the court found it to be "against logic." Capital Imaging Assocs., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs. (Capital I), 725 F. Supp. 669, 678 (N.D.N.Y. 1989). By contrast, it held that Capital's allegation of antitrust conspiracy under Sherman Act § 1 was sufficient to withstand a dismissal motion. With respect to this claim, the court reserved decision on appellees' motion for summary judgment and granted Capital limited discovery under Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(f). Id. at 679-80. [10]

Following the completion of discovery, appellees renewed their motion for summary judgment, which the district court then granted on May 8, 1992. See Capital Imaging Assocs., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs. (Capital II), 791 F. Supp. 956, 967-68 (N.D.N.Y. 1992). In so doing, the court noted that the plaintiffs demonstrated neither an illegal antitrust combination nor an unreasonable restraint of trade -- the two essential elements to a § 1 claim. Id. at 968. The only evidence of a conspiracy to exclude Capital from membership in Mohawk Valley was the imaging award to Two Rivers and even if, as Capital alleged, the bidding process was flawed, it did not indicate, so the district court thought, an unlawful conspiracy, especially in light of Capital's concession that the contract between Two Rivers and Mohawk Valley was not in itself an antitrust violation. See id. at 963-64. In reaching the conclusion that Capital failed to demonstrate an unreasonable restraint of trade, the court reasoned that the Plan's and Mohawk Valley's exclusivity practice constituted "a vertical, nonprice restraint" [11] and that such a restraint needed to be analyzed under the rule of reason. Id. at 964 (quoting Capital I, 725 F. Supp. at 677). Employing such rule, it held that Capital, "as a preliminary matter, must demonstrate that defendants have significant market power in the relevant market," and determined that the plaintiff failed to come forward with such proof. Id. at 966-67. The trial court stated that even though appellees' conduct may have adversely impacted appellant as an individual competitor, competition as a whole was not harmed. It refused to entertain Capital's state law claims since, having dismissed the federal causes of action, it had discretion to decline to exercise pendent or supplemental jurisdiction over them. See id. at 968. This appeal followed.

DISCUSSION

I Summary Judgment in the Antitrust Arena

Because this appeal arises from a grant of summary judgment dismissing a complaint, we discuss the rules guiding application of that remedy in the antitrust context. Capital appeals only that portion of the final order summarily dismissing its § 1 antitrust cause of action. Several courts have noted summary [12] disposition of antitrust cases is difficult to obtain because of their inherent factual complexity. See Hayden Publishing Co. v. Cox Broadcasting Corp., 730 F.2d 64, 68 (2d Cir. 1984); Bhan v. NME Hosps., Inc., 929 F.2d 1404, 1409 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 116 L. Ed. 2d 639, 112 S. Ct. 617 (1991). But that does not mean summary disposition is thereby precluded or even disfavored in antitrust law; rather, as the Supreme Court observed in Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 585-88, 593-94, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986), summary judgment remains a vital procedural tool to avoid wasteful trials and may be particularly important in antitrust litigation to prevent lengthy and drawn-out litigation that has a chilling effect on competitive market forces. See Oksanen v. Page Memorial Hosp., 945 F.2d 696 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc), cert. denied, 117 L. Ed. 2d 137, 112 S. Ct. 973 (1992); Indiana Grocery, Inc. v. [*542] Super Valu Stores, Inc., 864 F.2d 1409, 1412 (7th Cir. 1989).

HN1[] Summary judgment is appropriately entered [13] for the moving party as a matter of law when all the papers before a trial court show that there are no genuine issues of material fact. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). The litigant seeking summary disposition of a case bears the initial burden of demonstrating, through affidavits or otherwise, the absence of genuine factual issues. See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265, 106 S. Ct. 2548 (1986). If the moving party meets its burden, the non-moving party then has the obligation to produce probative evidence supporting its view that a dispute exists. The party opposing summary judgment "must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts . . ., the nonmoving party must come forward with 'specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.'" Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 586-87 (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e)). In the context of antitrust litigation the range of inferences that may be drawn from ambiguous evidence is limited; the non-moving party must set forth facts that tend to preclude an inference of permissible conduct. Id. at 587-88; accord Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 822 F.2d 246, 252 [14] (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 977, 98 L. Ed. 2d 487, 108 S. Ct. 489 (1987).

Our role is to determine whether the district court correctly ruled that there was no genuine factual issues for trial as to Capital's claim of a § 1 Sherman Act violation, thereby entitling the appellees to judgment as a matter of law. See H.L. Hayden Co. of N.Y. v. Siemens Medical Sys., Inc., 879 F.2d 1005, 1011 (2d Cir. 1989). HN2[] In carrying out this task, we view the evidence in a light most favorable to appellant, the non-moving party, see Burtnieks v. City of New York, 716 F.2d 982, 985 (2d Cir. 1983), and apply a de novo standard of review to ensure that the substantive antitrust law was correctly applied. See Hayden, 879 F.2d at 1011.

II The Sherman Act, § 1

A. Overview

In reviewing the substantive law, it is initially useful to set out the general contours of § 1 of the Sherman Act (Act), which states: HN3[] "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States . . . is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1 [15] (1988). Thus, according to the statute, a plaintiff claiming a § 1 violation must first establish a combination or some form of concerted action between at least two legally distinct economic entities. Unilateral conduct on the part of a single person or enterprise falls outside the purview of this provision in the antitrust law. See Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984); Belfiore v. New York Times Co., 826 F.2d 177, 181-82 (2d Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1067, 98 L. Ed. 2d 994, 108 S. Ct. 1030 (1988). For that reason, an agreement between a parent corporation and its wholly-owned subsidiary or its agents is not a concerted action for purposes of the Act. See Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 771, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628, 104 S. Ct. 2731 (1984).

If a plaintiff establishes the existence of an illegal contract or combination, it must then proceed to demonstrate that the agreement constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade either per se or under the rule of reason. HN4[] Conduct considered illegal per se is invoked only in a limited class of cases, see Continental T. V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 49-50, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568, 97 S. Ct. 2549 (1977), [16] where a defendant's actions are so plainly harmful to competition and so obviously lacking in any redeeming pro-competitive values that they are "conclusively presumed illegal without further examination." Broadcast Music, Inc. v. CBS, 441 U.S. 1, 8, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1, 99 S. Ct. 1551 (1979). Per se violations include, for example, horizontal and vertical price-fixing, see United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 218, 84 L. Ed. 1129, 60 S. Ct. 811 (1940); Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. Park & Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, 405, 55 L. Ed. 502, 31 S. Ct. 376 (1911); division of a market into territories, see United States v. Topco Assocs., 405 U.S. 596, 609, 92 S. Ct. [*543] 1126, 31 L. Ed. 2d 515 (1972); certain tying arrangements, see Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 9, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1984); and some group boycotts involving concerted refusals to deal with a competitor, see Klor's, Inc. v. Broadway-Hale Stores, Inc., 359 U.S. 207, 211-12, 3 L. Ed. 2d 741, 79 S. Ct. 705 (1959). In discussing group boycotts the Supreme Court cautions against application of the per se rule against professional associations because the economic impact of professional activities [17] is so difficult to track. See Federal Trade Comm'n v. Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 458-59, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445, 106 S. Ct. 2009 (1986).

Most cases fall outside these narrow, carefully demarcated categories held to be illegal per se. HN5[] In the general run of cases a plaintiff must prove an antitrust injury under the rule of reason. Under this test plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that the challenged action has had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market; to prove it has been harmed as an individual competitor will not suffice. Insisting on proof of harm to the whole market fulfills the broad purpose of the antitrust law that was enacted to ensure competition in general, not narrowly focused to protect individual competitors. See, e.g., Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 1893-94, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990); Austin v. McNamara, 979 F.2d 728, 739 (9th Cir. 1992). Were the law construed otherwise, routine disputes between business competitors would be elevated to the status of an antitrust action, thereby trivializing the Act because of its too ready availability. [18] See Oksanen, 945 F.2d at 708; Ball Memorial Hosp., Inc. v. Mutual Hosp. Ins., Inc., 784 F.2d 1325, 1338 (7th Cir. 1986) ("antitrust laws are not balm for rivals' wounds").

HN6[] After the plaintiff satisfies its threshold burden of proof under the rule of reason, the burden shifts to the defendant to offer evidence of the pro-competitive "redeeming virtues" of their combination. 7 Phillip Areeda, Antitrust Law P 1502, at 371 (1986); accord Bhan, 929 F.2d at 1413. Assuming defendant comes forward with such proof, the burden shifts back to plaintiff for it to demonstrate that any legitimate collaborative objectives proffered by defendant could have been achieved by less restrictive alternatives, that is, those that would be less prejudicial to competition as a whole. See Bhan, 929 F.2d at 1413; see also Kreuzer v. American Academy of Periodontology, 237 U.S. App. D.C. 43, 735 F.2d 1479, 1493-95 (D.C. Cir. 1984); Areeda, supra.

HN7[] Ultimately, it remains for the factfinder to weigh the harms and benefits of the challenged behavior. The classic articulation [19] of how the rule of reason analysis should be undertaken is found in Chicago Bd. of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 62 L. Ed. 683, 38 S. Ct. 242 (1918), where Justice Brandeis speaking for the Supreme Court said:

> The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. To determine that question the court must ordinarily consider the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied; its condition before and after the restraint was imposed; the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable. The history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained, are all relevant facts. This is not because a good intention will save an otherwise objectionable regulation or the reverse; but because knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences.

This classic test is easier to state than to apply. It at least seems clear that the factfinder must decide the overarching question of whether the [20] challenged action purports to promote or to destroy competition. Resolving this under the rule of reason approach requires a careful and complete analysis of the competitive effects of the challenged restraint.

Capital avers it has set forth enough facts to meet its threshold burden of showing that appellees' actions constituted an antitrust conspiracy; it also contends it has demonstrated an unreasonable restraint of trade [*544] under the rule of reason sufficient to withstand appellees' motion for summary judgment. It further asserts that in finding no horizontal antitrust conspiracy, the district court was led by this error into employing an improper analytical approach to the rule of reason, focusing too narrowly on appellees' market share.

B. Contract, Combination or Conspiracy

We address this contention in light of the § 1 principles just reviewed. Our attention is first directed to whether the district court's failure to find an antitrust conspiracy was predicated on its erroneous focus on the vertical relationship between the health Plan and Mohawk Valley, the physicians' group with which it contracted. See Capital II, 791 F. Supp. at 963; Capital I, 725 F. Supp. at 677. [21] This ordinary contract between a buyer and seller of medical services at different levels in the market structure, Capital itself acknowledges, poses few antitrust problems. But, its argument goes, the district court ignored the antitrust concerns that arise from the horizontal collaboration of competing independent physicians that make up the roster of Mohawk Valley. This association of sellers of medical services, Capital continues, conspired illegally to boycott Capital, another seller of the same medical services.

Appellees have two responses to appellant's allegation of horizontal collaboration. Initially, they declare the physicians associated with Mohawk Valley are a single entity economically, incapable of forming a § 1 conspiracy among themselves. Next they declare that even were this not to be the fact, appellant failed to proffer sufficient proof of an actual illegal horizontal boycott to negate permissible inferences of proper conduct on appellees' part.

1. Capacity to Conspire. The first question is -- are member physicians of an independent practice association legally capable of conspiring among themselves? We think the answer is "yes," they have such a capacity. [22] The nature of the combination here at issue is similar to that described in Bolt v. Halifax Hosp. Medical Ctr., 891 F.2d 810 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 924, 109 L. Ed. 2d 322, 110 S. Ct. 1960 (1990). The plaintiff physician in Bolt was denied staff membership and privileges in several Florida hospitals, just as Capital here was denied membership in Mohawk Valley's practice association. Dr. Bolt filed suit alleging the defendant hospitals conspired with their medical staffs to restrain competition in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. The Eleventh Circuit ruled that nothing prevents members of a medical staff from conspiring, if they are so inclined, with one another. Each doctor practices medicine in his or her own individual capacity; each is a "separate economic entity potentially in competition with other physicians." Id. at 819; accord Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d 1438, 1455-56 (11th Cir. 1991).

The Fourth Circuit sitting en banc similarly recognized that hospital staff physicians have independent and competing economic interests. When such is the case, the court [23] reasoned, the doctors are not a single entity, as Mohawk Valley insists it is, and have the ability "to conspire as a matter of law." Oksanen, 945 F.2d at 706. But in Oksanen the conspiratorial capacity was not found as a fact because the physicians lacked final decisionmaking authority, that authority having been vested in the hospital board of directors. Id. Hence, the defendant doctors were corporate agents of the hospital and not separate economic actors. Cf. Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 769.

The reasoning of Bolt and Oksanen is persuasive and we adopt it. Mohawk Valley is a multi-member association of competing doctors, including radiologists, all of whom are in private practice for themselves and who allegedly joined together to deny Capital access to the HMO's patients. As members of an independent practice association, the doctors are not staff physicians employed by the HMO on a salaried basis, that is, they are not agents of the HMO. Instead, these health care professionals are independent practitioners with separate economic interests. See Clark Havighurst, Doctors and Hospitals: An Antitrust [24] Perspective on Traditional Relationships, 1984 Duke L.J. 1071, 1073 n.3 (describing HMO arrangements with physicians). Accordingly, the physicians associated together in Mohawk Valley had the [*545] capacity to conspire among themselves much like the members of the medical staff in Bolt.

2. Actual Conspiracy. Our finding of a legal capacity to conspire does not resolve the issue of whether § 1 of the Sherman Act has been shown to be violated. HN8[] The mere opportunity to conspire does not by itself support the inference that such an illegal combination actually occurred. A plaintiff must prove the defendants illegally conspired. See Todorov, 921 F.2d at 1456; cf. Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 763-64. As stated before, this means that a plaintiff -- to withstand defendants' summary judgment motion -- must present evidence that casts doubt on inferences of independent (not combined) action or proper conduct by defendants. See Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588. The plaintiff's evidence must prove the actors had an intent to adhere to an agreement that was designed to achieve an [25] unlawful objective; it is not required that the proof show the actors specifically intended to restrain trade. See Bolt, 891 F.2d at 819-20.

Capital has made such a showing. It has presented circumstantial evidence that Mohawk Valley excluded it from the practice association in order to insulate Mohawk Valley's member radiologists from increased competition. For example, Capital has shown that Mohawk Valley recruited primary care doctors -- who, like Capital, were located in Latham -- because they could attract new patients and bring increased referrals to Mohawk Valley medical specialists. By contrast, Mohawk Valley excluded Capital's referral practice because accepting it would only increase internal competition among its members for radiology referrals.

As further circumstantial evidence of an agreement to boycott Capital, appellant demonstrated that its application for admission was denied despite its offer to open an office within the Plan's service area and despite the New York State Department of Health's lack of objection to the inclusion of a medical purveyor located outside the HMO's service area. Again, Capital noted its application was denied [26] by Mohawk Valley without adherence to its membership admission practices, which require pre-rejection notification and an opportunity for a hearing. Ignoring its own written standards in the case of Capital's application for membership strongly suggests the objection to that application based on appellant's geographic location may have been a sham.

This evidence -- when viewed as it must be in a light most favorable to appellant -- tends to prove "a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective." Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 768. Thus, the district court erred when it failed to find a § 1 contract, combination or conspiracy. It apparently feared that such a finding would create a danger that "all HMOs would be illegal as per se violations of the antitrust laws." Capital II, 791 F. Supp. at 963. This concern is misplaced, at least with respect to the finding of a horizontal conspiracy. Our view does not interfere with either an HMO's ability to enter into vertical agreements with doctors associations or with physicians' abilities to regulate membership in practice associations for medically [27] supportable reasons. Concluding that conspiracy was sufficiently shown in the instant case, at least for purposes of escaping summary judgment, leads to the second question in antitrust analysis: whether the defendants' action constitutes an unreasonable restraint of trade.

C. Unreasonable Restraint of Trade

Despite its determination that no antitrust conspiracy existed, the district court undertook an assessment of the alleged restraint under the rule of reason. See Capital II, 791 F. Supp. at 964. Capital does not contend on appeal that the district court erred in utilizing the rule of reason instead of the rule of per se illegality. It apparently recognizes that such an argument would be futile given not only the Supreme Court's caution about extension of the per se doctrine into new areas, see Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. at 458-59, but also the recognized procompetitive virtues of independent practice association forms of HMOs. Rather, appellant argues the district court's inquiry was fatally flawed because it viewed the relevant restraint as being vertical in nature. This misapprehension, according [28] [*546] to Capital, led the court to focus too narrowly on the appellees' market power and ignore the other necessary elements of a rule of reason inquiry into horizontal restraints.

The precise role that market power plays in rule of reason analysis of horizontal combinations or conspiracies is a matter of some dispute. Some courts and commentators have argued for a "safe harbor" approach. Thomas M. Jorde & David J. Teece, Rule of Reason Analysis of Horizontal Agreements: Agreements Designed to Advance Innovation and Commercialize Technology, 61 Antitrust L.J. 579, 606 (1993). Under this concept, unless an antitrust plaintiff makes a threshold demonstration that the defendants possess significant market power, the defendants' cooperative effort is immune from further rule of reason inquiry. See Polk Bros. v. Forest City Enters., 776 F.2d 185, 191 (7th Cir. 1985). Compare Rothery Storage & Van Co. v. Atlas Van Lines, Inc., 253 U.S. App. D.C. 142, 792 F.2d 210, 229 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (Bork, J.) (employing safe harbor analysis), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1033, 93 L. Ed. 2d 834, 107 S. Ct. 880 (1987) with id. at 230 [29] (Wald, J. concurring) (criticizing this method and arguing that reliance on market power alone is inappropriate).

The Supreme Court has never explicitly endorsed such a preclusive threshold approach. See Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. at 460; National Collegiate Athletic Assoc. v. Board of Regents of the Univ. of Okla., 468 U.S. 85, 108-09, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70, 104 S. Ct. 2948 (1984). Nor have we embraced the view that market power is the sine qua non of antitrust liability. See North American Soccer League v. National Football League, 670 F.2d 1249, 1259-60 (2d Cir.) (market power not mentioned as threshold factor), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1074, 74 L. Ed. 2d 639, 103 S. Ct. 499 (1982); see also State of N.Y. v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 673 F. Supp. 664, 667-68 (E.D.N.Y. 1987) (assessing, in a vertical restraint case, this Court's view of the role of market power). Still, we recognize that in most cases where horizontal restraints on competition are alleged, market power remains a highly relevant factor in rule of reason analysis because market power bears a particularly strong relationship to [30] a party's ability to injure competition. Cf. Cox Broadcasting Corp., 730 F.2d at 69-70.

HN9[] Rule of reason analysis requires the antitrust plaintiff to bear the initial burden of demonstrating that the defendants' conduct or policy has had a substantially harmful effect on competition. The plaintiff may satisfy this burden without "detailed market analysis" by offering "'proof of actual detrimental effects, such as a reduction of output.'" Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. at 460-61 (quoting Areeda, supra, P 1511, at 429). Yet, where the plaintiff is unable to demonstrate such actual effects, it must at least establish that defendants possess the requisite market power so that their "arrangement has the potential for genuine adverse effects on competition." Id. Market power in that way serves as a "'surrogate for detrimental effects,'" id. (quoting Areeda, supra, P 1511, at 429), because > firms lacking substantial market power act against their own self-interest when they raise prices, reduce output, or otherwise restrain trade. The marketplace itself will discipline such misguided efforts as buyers [31] switch to substitutes or new sources of supply enter the market. When market power is lacking, antitrust litigation is not needed to police restraints and maintain competition . . . .

Jorde & Teece, supra, at 602-03.

In the case at hand, Capital believes its exclusion from Mohawk Valley has had actual detrimental effects: an increase in prices for and a deterioration of the quality of radiological services to Plan enrollees. But, Capital concedes in its brief that whether or not it is admitted into the physicians' association, the fee for radiological services would remain the same. In addition, Capital failed to adduce significant evidence that its exclusion has, in fact, resulted in any decrease in the quality of radiology services to the HMO's patients. Therefore, Capital has not made an adequate showing of detrimental effects to obviate the need to show that appellees possess market power sufficient to stifle competition.

[*547] Thus, turning to the question of market power, we agree with the district court that Capital has failed to demonstrate that a genuine issue of material fact exists with respect to appellees' strength in the marketplace. Capital defined the relevant geographic [32] market as that area lying within a 100-mile radius of Albany, New York, and it defined the product market as the market for radiological services. See Capital II, 791 F. Supp. at 965. Appellees have accepted these market boundaries and have presented proof that within this 100-mile radius, the Plan's 100,500 enrollees represent only 2.3 percent of the region's HMO subscribers and Mohawk Valley's membership includes only 6.75 percent of the region's physicians. Once competition from non-HMO sources within the 100 mile radius is included, the appellees' market share drops even further to merely 1.15 percent of the total insured patient population. Capital has not contravened the accuracy of these figures. Consequently, it is clear that with such a de minimis market share, appellees lack the power to injure competition or force consumers to accept supracompetitive health care premiums or lower quality medical care.

Capital objects that reliance on these statistics is improper because Mohawk Valley competes in the market for radiology referrals and not in the health insurance market, within which the Plan competes. We disagree. The radiology referrals [33] controlled by the appellees are those referrals emanating from the HMO's enrollees and, therefore, focusing on the HMO's share of the consumer population is appropriate. Appellant next attempts to have us consider a new smaller geographic market within the 100-mile radius of Albany. This new market definition was not presented to the trial court and comes too late for our consideration. See Singleton v. Wulff, 428 U.S. 106, 120, 49 L. Ed. 2d 826, 96 S. Ct. 2868 (1976). Moreover, even if we were to accept appellant's attempted new market definition, Capital's cause of action still would not withstand summary judgment because it has presented us with no claim -- either in its briefs or after repeated inquiries at oral argument -- that it would be able to present reliable data indicating what share of this new smaller market appellees control.

Finally, appellant points out that appellees have not put forward any pro-competitive justifications for their conduct. This argument is unavailing. Such justifications are unnecessary where Capital, as the plaintiff in this case, has not carried its own initial burden of showing a restraint on competition. See Bhan, 929 F.2d at 1413. [34] Only after a plaintiff has successfully met its initial burden under the rule of reason must an antitrust defendant offer evidence to exonerate its conduct.

In sum, Capital's position is simply that it has been harmed as an individual competitor. It has not shown that defendants' activities have had any adverse impact on price, quality, or output of medical services offered to consumers in the relevant market. In Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 31, the Supreme Court rejected a rule of reason claim arising out the exclusion of an anesthesiologist from staff privileges at a hospital, stating that "without a showing of actual adverse effect on competition, [a plaintiff] cannot make out a case under the antitrust laws . . . . " Id. Because no such showing has been made in the instant case, appellant's claim must also fail.

CONCLUSION

We have carefully considered all the other arguments raised by the parties and find they do not warrant further discussion because our opinion fully disposes of them. Accordingly, for the reasons stated the order of the district court granting summary judgment to the defendants-appellees is affirmed.

HN6[] Summary Judgment, Motions for Summary Judgment

During a motion for summary judgment the court must view the facts in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, and must resolve all ambiguities and draw all inferences against the moving party. In determining whether to grant a motion for summary judgment, the court is not to weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter but to determine whether there is a genuine issue for trial.

Under a summary judgment motion the moving party bears the initial burden of establishing the absence of a material issue of fact. However, if the non-moving party would bear the burden of proof on a claim at trial, the moving party may satisfy its burden by demonstrating an absence of evidence to support an essential element of such a claim.

The standard of proof required to find an antitrust conspiracy in violation of, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, is that there must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility of independent action by the manufacturer and distributor. That is, there must be direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the manufacturer and others had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.

Antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 case. Thus, conduct as consistent with permissible competition as with illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy. To survive a motion for summary judgment a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of § 1, must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently. Respondent must show that the inference of conspiracy is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents.

SAND, J.

This case requires the Court to revisit questions relating to the application of the antitrust laws to professional basketball. Cf. United States Football League v. National Football League, 842 F.2d 1335 (2d Cir. 1988); North American Soccer League v. National Football League, 670 F.2d 1249 (2d Cir. 1982), [2] cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1074, 74 L. Ed. 2d 639, 103 S. Ct. 499 (1982). Plaintiff Joe L. Caldwell, a former professional basketball player, was suspended on December 3, 1974 by The Spirits of St. Louis Basketball Club (the "Spirits"), a member team of the now defunct American Basketball Association ("ABA"). In his complaint, Caldwell alleges that the circumstances surrounding his suspension constitute a "concerted refusal to deal" or a "group boycott" on the part of all named defendants, in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-2. Plaintiff also asserts a pendent claim for either intentional tort or prima facie tort under New York law against the Spirits, Donald Schupak, and Daniel Silna (collectively the "Spirits Defendants").

The Spirits Defendants have moved for summary judgment. Defendant Tedd Munchak has also moved for summary judgment. The other defendants -- the American Basketball Association, Inc., Ozzie Silna, and Harry Weltman -- have not moved for summary judgment and, according to Caldwell, are in default. Pl.'s Mem. at 1 n.1. The Spirits Defendants have also moved to strike, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e), [3] portions of the plaintiff's papers in opposition to the defendants' motions for summary judgment.

For the reasons that follow, the defendants' motions for summary judgment are granted in their entirety, and the complaint is dismissed as against the moving defendants. The Spirits Defendants' motion to strike is granted to the extent set forth herein.

HN1[] When considering a motion for summary judgment, all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in the non-movant's favor. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Services, Inc., 119 L. Ed. 2d 265, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 2076-77 (1992); Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 255, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 106 S. Ct. 2505 (1986). Accordingly, the Court will resolve any factual disputes in favor of the plaintiff.

In 1964 plaintiff Joe L. Caldwell, who had been an all-American basketball player at Arizona State University, was drafted to play professional basketball for the Detroit Pistons, a member team of the National Basketball Association ("NBA"). Caldwell was subsequently traded to the St. Louis Hawks, also a member team of the NBA. The Hawks later moved to Atlanta and became known as the Atlanta Hawks.

When Caldwell's contract [4] with the Hawks expired in 1970, both the Hawks and the Carolina Cougars, an ABA team, offered Caldwell lucrative contracts. On October 30, 1970, Caldwell signed a five year contract with Southern Sports Corporation ("Southern Sports"), the corporate owner of the Cougars. The contract provided for annual compensation of $ 220,000, a pension of $ 600 per month for each of Caldwell's years of service as a professional basketball player, and life insurance equal to 100 times the cash value of the pension. Defendant Tedd Munchak, one of the owners of Southern Sports, personally guaranteed the contract. The contract expired by its own terms on October 29, 1975. See Caldwell Employment Agreement ("Caldwell Agreement") P 2, attached [*561] as Ex. A to the Affidavit of Jack David ("David Aff.").

Because Caldwell was a nationally recognized player -- known by his fans as "Jumping Joe Caldwell" -- he had the bargaining power to negotiate a contract which incorporated by reference only certain provisions of the ABA Uniform Player's Contract ("ABAUPC"). See Caldwell Agreement P 11(b). Among those provisions of ABAUPC that were incorporated by reference was Article 3(b) which provided, in pertinent [5] part:

> Compliance with CLUB Rules. The CLUB may from time to time . . . establish reasonable rules for the government of its players. . . . The CLUB may also suspend the player for violation of any rules so established, and during such suspension, the player shall not be entitled to any compensation under this contract. All of the foregoing shall be in addition to any other rights and remedies the CLUB may have at law, equity or otherwise. When the player is fined or suspended, he shall be given notice in writing, stating the amount of the fine or the duration of the suspension and the reasons therefore.

ABAUPC P 3(b). The Caldwell Agreement also incorporated by reference ABAUPC P 12(c)(3), which gave the Cougars the power to terminate the contract in the event of a breach by Caldwell. The Caldwell Agreement did not incorporate P 14 of ABAUPC pursuant to which the player agreed to be bound by the ABA's Constitution and by-laws. See Caldwell Aff. P 13; Caldwell v. American Basketball Ass'n, 75 Civ. 1235 (LBS), 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17902, 1991 WL 270473 at *5 (S.D.N.Y. December 11, 1991).

The ABA by-laws provided that a suspended player was placed on a "reserve list" and that no ABA team [6] could "contract with" a player on a member team's reserve list. [1] [7] In order to remove a player from the reserve list, the team suspending the player was required to provide written notice to the Commissioner of the ABA. [2] The

[1] Section 14.12 of the ABA by-laws provided in part:

> A. The reserve list of a Member Club shall consist of:

> (3) Players suspended or declared ineligible, or expelled from the League for violation of the contract between the player and the club or for other reasons permitted by the Certificate of Incorporation and By-Laws of the League;
> B. A player on a club's reserve list shall not be eligible to contract with any other club unless and until the player is released or his contract assigned as provided in the Certificate of Incorporation and By-laws of the League.

ABA By-laws § 14.12, attached as Ex. 10 to Munchak's 3(g) Statement.

Commissioner, in turn, was required to send written notice to each ABA member team that the player was no longer on the reserve list of the team that had suspended him. These notice requirements are sometimes referred to as "waivers." The Spirits Defendants claim that Caldwell was never placed on such a reserve list and that the plaintiff has not come forward with any proof that such a reserve list existed. The plaintiff avers that when Caldwell was suspended he automatically was placed on the Spirits' reserve list by operation of the ABA by-laws.

During the four basketball seasons between 1970 and 1974, Caldwell played ably for the Carolina Cougars and was elected to the All-Star team during two of those four years. In addition, Caldwell was elected Vice-President and later President of the ABA Players Association ("ABAPA"), the player's union. Caldwell was also selected as the player representative for the Cougars and as the Cougars' team captain.

After Caldwell's fourth season with the Cougars, defendant Munchak sold [8] the team [*562] to a group of investors headed by Defendants Ozzie Silna and Daniel Silna. See generally Caldwell v. Munchak, 548 F. Supp. 755, 755 & n.1 (N.D. Georgia 1982) (describing details of sale of Cougars). The new owners assumed all unexpired obligations to Caldwell under his employment contract except that their obligation to provide pension benefits was limited to $ 10,000. Also in connection with the sale, the ABA provided Munchak with a broad "hold harmless" if the Spirits defaulted on their obligations to Caldwell. However, this indemnification, with respect to the pension benefits, was limited to $ 10,000. The cougars subsequently moved to St. Louis and were renamed The Spirits of St. Louis.

Munchak became Commissioner of the ABA after he sold his interest in the Cougars. Although Munchak initially told the ABA member clubs that we would agree to serve as Commissioner only for sixty days, his tenure lasted from June 1974 until July 1975. In return for his services as Commissioner, Caldwell received an annual salary of one dollar. Caldwell states in his affidavit that at this time he believed that Munchak continued to own the spirits based upon [9] alleged representations made by Munchak that such was the case. Caldwell Aff. PP 19-21.

The Barnes Incident and Caldwell's Suspension

On November 20, 1974, Marvin Barnes, another star player for the Spirits, failed to appear for an important game between the Spirits and the New York Nets. Just prior to the game, Caldwell had accompanied Barnes and Marshall Boyer, Caldwell and Barnes' agent, in a limousine to LaGuardia Airport. Barnes and Boyer boarded a plane for Dayton, Ohio. Apparently Barnes' dissatisfaction with the contract he had negotiated with the Spirits motivated him to adopt this negotiating tactic. When the Spirits' Coach Jack MacKinnon inquired later that evening where Barnes was, Caldwell denied any knowledge of Barnes' whereabouts. Caldwell claims that he never advised Barnes to "jump" the team, breach his contract, or do anything else detrimental to the team.

Although Barnes returned to the team shortly thereafter, the Spirits suspended Caldwell because they believed that Caldwell had played a role in the Barnes episode. On December 3, 1974, Caldwell received a telegram from the Spirits informing him that "THE SPIRITS OF ST LOUIS HAVE SUSPENDED YOU INDEFINITELY." [10] David Aff., Ex. G. Caldwell was also advised of his suspension in a letter dated December 3, 1974 which stated in pertinent part:

> We wish to advise you that you are hereby suspended without pay or other privileges in accordance with Section 11(c) of an agreement between you and Southern Sports Corporation entered into in October 1970. The duration of your suspension has not as yet been determined and unless good cause is shown by you to the contrary, the suspension will remain in effect for the remainder of the current basketball season and/or your contract will be terminated pursuant to Section 11(i) thereof.

[2] Section 14.11 of the ABA by-laws provided in part:

> Except as otherwise provided in the By-Laws, a player shall be considered a member of a team until the Commissioner shall have received notice from that team that the other Member Clubs are free to negotiate with such player. The Commissioner shall upon receipt of such notice immediately and simultaneously notify all the other Member Clubs accordingly; until such notice is sent, no team shall negotiate with any player who is either under contract or on the reserve list of another member team.

ABA By-laws § 14.11, attached as Ex. 10 to Munchak's 3(g) Statement.

The reason for the foregoing act is as follows:

(i) violation of Section 11(b) of your contract; and

(ii) tortious conduct against the Club . . . .

Letter from Harry Weltman to Joe Caldwell, dated December 3, 1974, attached as Ex. G to David Aff. This letter also informed Caldwell that he was free to contact the Spirits or the ABA Commissioner to discuss the matter further.

The parties are in dispute as to precise duration of Caldwell's suspension. The defendants claim that at some point in early 1975, the Spirits terminated Caldwell's services altogether. [11] They rely on the findings of fact in Caldwell v. Munchak, 548 F. Supp. 755, 759 (N.D. Georgia 1982), discussed below, to support their position. Defendants argue in the alternative that if Caldwell's contract was not terminated by the Spirits in December 1974, it would have expired by its own terms on October 29, 1975. In contrast, Caldwell claims that he "was never told that his suspension was lifted, or that the Spirits had terminated his contract, or that other teams were free to negotiate with him." Pl.'s 3(g) Statement at 27; Caldwell Aff. P 26. In other words, Caldwell claims that he was [*563] placed on the Spirit's reserve list "forever." Pl.'s Mem. at 32.

In early December 1974, Caldwell appealed his suspension through the ABAPA to the Office of the Commissioner. By letter dated December 6, 1974, Prentiss Q. Yancey, the General Counsel of the ABA Players' Association, urged Munchak to commence an investigation of the Caldwell suspension and to hold a hearing. On December 10, 1974, the Commissioner's Office advised Yancey that the investigation would commence promptly and that a hearing date would be set. A hearing was set for February 12, 1975 and [12] then adjourned to March 1, 1975.

All parties agree that ABA Commissioner Munchak told the Spirits' management that an indefinite suspension would not be permitted. Munchak also informed the parties that he was willing to recuse himself as an arbitrator because he had personally guaranteed Caldwell's basketball contract.

Shortly thereafter, Caldwell decided he no longer wanted to pursue his remedies before the ABA but instead wanted to litigate his suspension in court. Caldwell claims that the factors that influenced his decision not to arbitrate included: the fact that he had played approximately twenty-five percent of the 1974-75 season for the Spirits and had not received any salary; that Munchak's lawsuit regarding the pension obligations was still pending; that his role as president of the ABAPA made him a target for ABA management; and that he had valuable rights that were negotiated in his contract that he was afraid he would lose in an arbitration. Caldwell Aff. P 32.

Accordingly, in February 1975 Caldwell brought an action in federal district court in Georgia (the "Georgia action") against Munchak, as guarantor of his contract, for unpaid 1974-75 salary that Caldwell claimed [13] was due under the contract. The dispositive issue in the Georgia action was whether the Spirits (and thus Munchak as personal guarantor) were excused from their obligation to pay Caldwell's salary because of the role that Caldwell played in the Barnes incident. After a bench trial, Judge Evans rendered a judgement in Caldwell's favor for unpaid salary in the amount of $ 220,000, plus interest, costs, and expenses. See Caldwell, 548 F. Supp. at 764. The judgment in this action was paid in full. The parties disagree as to the res judicata effect of Judge Evans's findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Caldwell also filed the instant antitrust lawsuit in early 1975. Two factors account for the extraordinary lapse of time between the filing of the complaint and the making of the instant motions. First, in the belief that collateral litigation, especially the Georgia action, would resolve or enable the parties to resolve this controversy, this case was placed on the Court's suspense calendar at the request of the parties. Thereafter, Caldwell went into personal bankruptcy and reactivated this suit only after his discharge. See Caldwell v. American Basketball [14] Ass'n, 75 Civ. 1235 (LBS), 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17902, 1991 WL 270473 at *4 (S.D.N.Y. December 11, 1991) (discussing procedural history of instant lawsuit).

Other Litigation Involving Caldwell

In addition to the Georgia action and the instant lawsuit, some of the parties to this action were involved in several other disputes, litigated in various fora, at the time Caldwell was suspended. Caldwell claims that these disputes provided defendants with a motive to conspire to keep him from playing professional basketball.

First, a dispute arose between Caldwell and Munchak regarding pension obligations owed to Caldwell under Caldwell's contract. In 1972 Munchak brought suit against Caldwell in North Carolina state court to reform the employment contract. Munchak contended that the pension was supposed to be $ 60.00 per month for each year Caldwell played professional basketball, not $ 600.00 per month. Caldwell counterclaimed to enforce the provisions of his contract. The trial in this action was scheduled to begin on the day that Caldwell was suspended, but was adjourned several times. Ultimately a jury returned a verdict in Caldwell's favor.

Second, at the time the Spirits suspended him, Caldwell, then [15] president of the ABA Player's Association, had refused to sign or approve a labor agreement with the ABA because Caldwell believed that the agreement failed to provide the players with adequate [*564] pension benefits, adequate medical benefits, or contract protection in the event the NBA and ABA merged. In October of 1973, a member of the ABAPA negotiating team, William Melchionni, signed a hand-written contract with Mike Storen, who served as the Commissioner of the ABA at that time. Caldwell refused to acknowledge that contract, as did the other representatives of the ABAPA, since it was done without the consent of the ABAPA negotiating committee. This matter was pending before the National Labor Relations Board when Caldwell was suspended.

Finally, at the time of his suspension, Caldwell was one of the plaintiffs in Robertson v. National Basketball Ass'n, 389 F. Supp. 867 (S.D.N.Y. 1975), which was pending in the Southern District of New York before Judge Carter. One of the purposes of this lawsuit was to challenge the merger of the NBA and the ABA as violative of federal antitrust law.

Caldwell's Professional History After his Suspension

After [16] he was suspended by the Spirits, Caldwell never again played professional basketball. In fact, no professional basketball team ever gave him a tryout or an opportunity to compete for a spot on a team.

Caldwell states that he was at all times, ready, willing, and able to perform all obligations and duties required of him under his contract with the Spirits and that he was otherwise fit to play professional basketball at the time of his suspension. He concludes that the failure of any other NBA or ABA team to hire him evidences the boycott of his professional services that he alleges in his complaint. Defendants dispute Caldwell's ability to play basketball at a professional level at the time of his suspension on several grounds. First, defendants claim that Caldwell's age at the time of his suspension -- he was 34 years old -- made him an undesirable recruit. The defendants provide statistics, undisputed by the plaintiff, that demonstrate that less than two percent of NBA players during the five basketball seasons between 1976 and 1981 were 34 years old or older. Spirits' Defs.' Mem. at 22 n.17. Second, defendants claim that a torn ligament Caldwell sustained during the 1971 season [17] interfered with his playing ability. Finally, defendants claim an injury sustained by Caldwell in a January 15, 1975 automobile accident adversely affected Caldwell's ability to play basketball at a professional level.

We will discuss below, in much greater detail, the relevant facts concerning the existence of the alleged boycott of plaintiff's services.

The Demise of the ABA

The Spirits lost money in both of the two years the team played, an experience not uncommon to member teams of the ABA. On or about July 1976, five ABA teams were invited to join the NBA; four teams accepted the invitation. The Spirits desired to join the NBA, but were not allowed to for reasons that are not clear. The ABA ceased operations after the 1975-76 season.

DISCUSSION

I.

VIOLATION OF SECTION 1 OF THE SHERMAN ACT

The plaintiff's § 1 claim is straightforward: he claims that "the defendants combined and conspired to blacklist him and deprive him of the opportunity to continue his career as a professional basketball player." Pl.'s Mem. at 29. Plaintiff contends that this constitutes a "group boycott" or a "concerted refusal to deal" in violation of § 1.

Section 1 provides in pertinent [18] part:

> HN2[] Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in the restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal.

15 U.S.C. § 1. HN3[] To establish a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must prove two elements: (1) a conspiracy; and (2) an unreasonable restraint of trade. HN4[] A particular restraint may be adjudged unreasonable:

> Either because it fits within a class of restraints that has been held to be 'per se' unreasonable, or because it violates what has come to known as the 'Rule of Reason,' under which the test of legality is whether [*565] the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition.

Federal Trade Comm'n v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 458, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445, 106 S. Ct. 2009 (1986) (citations omitted).

A. Summary Judgment

HN5[] Summary judgment is appropriate where there is "no genuine issue as to any material fact," and the moving party is entitled to "judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). HN6[] The Court [19] must view the facts in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, and must resolve all ambiguities and draw all inferences against the moving party. Coach Leatherware Co., Inc. v. AnnTaylor, Inc., 933 F.2d 162, 167 (2d Cir. 1991). In determining whether to grant a motion for summary judgment, the Court is not to "weigh the evidence and determine the truth of the matter but to determine whether there is a genuine issue for trial." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 249, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 106 S. Ct. 2505 (1986).

HN7[] The moving party bears the initial burden of establishing the absence of a material issue of fact. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265, 106 S. Ct. 2548 (1986). However, if the non-moving party would bear the burden of proof on a claim at trial -- as would Caldwell on his antitrust claims -- the moving party may satisfy its burden by demonstrating an absence of evidence to support an essential element of such a claim. Id. at 325. HN8[] To defeat the motion, the non-moving party must "do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt at to the material facts," Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986), [20] but instead must point to evidence sufficient to establish each element of his case. Celotex Corp., 477 U.S. at 322.

In the last decade, the Supreme Court has considered the propriety of summary judgment in cases arising under § 1 several times. In Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984), the Court affirmed a judgment for a terminated distributor of agricultural herbicides who had alleged a § 1 conspiracy between the manufacturer and other distributors to fix resale prices, and termination of the distributor in furtherance of the conspiracy. Addressing the question of HN9[] the standard of proof required to find an antitrust conspiracy in violation of § 1, the Court held:

> The correct standard is that there must be evidence that tends to exclude the possibility of independent action by the manufacturer and distributor. That is, there must be direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove that the manufacturer and others had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective.

Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 768.

The Court later [21] revisited the issue in Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986), where a group of American corporations that manufactured or sold consumer electronic products alleged that the defendants, 21 Japanese corporations, had engaged in a 20-year predatory pricing conspiracy. The Court held that a reasonable jury could not return a verdict for the plaintiffs because of the speculative nature of the plaintiffs' theory of predatory pricing, id. at 588-89, and "the absence of any plausible motive to engage in the conduct charged," id. at 596. Turning to the applicable standards for summary judgment in antitrust cases, the Court noted:

> HN10[] Antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case. Thus in [Monsanto], we held that conduct as consistent with permissible competition as with illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy. To survive a motion for summary judgment . . . a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of § 1 must present evidence that 'tends to exclude the possibility' [22] that the alleged conspirators acted independently. Respondents in this case, in other words, must show that the inference of conspiracy [*566] is reasonable in light of the competing inferences of independent action or collusive action that could not have harmed respondents.

Id. at 588 (citations omitted). The Court was particularly concerned that courts "not permit factfinders to infer conspiracies when such inferences are implausible, because the effect of such practices is often to deter procompetitive conduct." Id. at 593.

Most recently, in Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Services, Inc., 119 L. Ed. 2d 265, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 2083 (1992), the Court reviewed, again, the standards for summary judgment in a § 1 case. The Court held:

> The Court's requirement in Matsushita that the plaintiffs' claims make economic sense did not introduce a special burden on plaintiffs facing summary judgment in antitrust cases. The Court did not hold that if the moving party enunciates any economic theory supporting its behavior, regardless of its accuracy in reflecting the actual market, it is entitled to summary [23] judgment. Matsushita demands only that the nonmoving party's inferences be reasonable in order to reach the jury, a requirement that was not invented, but merely articulated, in that decision. If the plaintiff's theory is economically senseless, no reasonable jury could find in its favor, and summary judgment should be granted.

Id. at 2083 (footnote omitted).

With these standards in mind, we turn to the specifics of Caldwell's § 1 claim.

B. Contract, Combination, or Conspiracy

The defendants contend that Caldwell did not offer evidence of any contract, combination, or conspiracy to deprive Caldwell of the opportunity to play professional basketball after the Spirits suspended him in 1974. Spirits Defs.' Reply at 8-9. Defendant Munchak claims that Caldwell has presented no evidence that he was part of the alleged conspiracy.

The terms "contract, combination . . ., or conspiracy" are used interchangeably to describe the requisite agreement between two or more persons to restrain trade. HN11[] To prove that an agreement exists between two or more persons, a plaintiff must demonstrate "a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding, [24] or a meeting of minds in an unlawful arrangement." American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 810, 90 L. Ed. 1575, 66 S. Ct. 1125 (1946). Section 1 does not proscribe conduct that is wholly unilateral. Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 761. The Court recognizes that it is the rare case in which a plaintiff bringing a § 1 claim can establish the existence of an explicit agreement among the defendants; most conspiracies are proven by inferences drawn from behavior of the alleged conspirators.

1. The ABA By-Laws

Caldwell contends that the operation of the ABA's by-laws "is sufficient by itself," Pl.'s Mem. at 32-33, to satisfy § 1's concerted action requirement because all of the ABA teams "automatically agreed to an indefinite group boycott of Caldwell's services, in accordance with their By-laws" once he was suspended by the Spirits. [3] Id. at 11. When the Spirits suspended him, Caldwell argues, he was automatically placed on the Spirits' "reserve list" by operation of § 14.11 and § 14.12 of the ABA by-laws. Consequently all other ABA teams were prohibited from negotiating or contracting with Caldwell unless and until the Spirits effected "waivers" [25] -- i.e., unless and until the Spirits gave notice to the Commissioner that Caldwell was removed from the reserve list, and then the Commissioner gave notice of the same to the other ABA teams. No such "waiver" was ever effected. Caldwell further argues that these by-laws prohibited other ABA teams from negotiating with him even if the Spirits terminated his contract in late 1974 -- a fact which Caldwell contests vigorously -- and even after his contract with the Spirits expired by its own terms on October 29, 1975, simply because the Spirits never gave the [*567] notice required by § 14.11 of the by-laws. Pl.'s Mem. at 10-11; see also id. at 15.

Essentially, Caldwell claims that the manner in which the by-laws were applied in his case, so as to leave him on the Spirits' reserve list permanently, satisfies the concerted action requirement of § 1. Although the enforcement [26] of sports league by-laws or rules can constitute concerted action for the purposes of § 1, see, e.g., North American Soccer League v. National Football League, 670 F.2d 1249, 1256-57 (2d Cir. 1982) (NFL's rule banning franchise owners from having ownership interest in any other professional sports team in competing league), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1074, 74 L. Ed. 2d 639, 103 S. Ct. 499 (1982), we do not believe that Caldwell has come forward with evidence sufficient to convince a reasonable jury that the ABA by-laws were enforced in the manner he suggests.

First, the only evidence offered by Caldwell to prove that the Spirits had a "reserve list" or that Caldwell was placed on a "reserve list" is the existence of the by-laws themselves and certain ambiguous deposition testimony. [4] The Court has serious doubts as to whether a reasonable jury could infer, based on this evidence, that Caldwell was ever placed on the Spirits' reserve list.

[27] Second, even if the Court were inclined to presume that by operation of the ABA by-laws Caldwell was placed on the Spirits' reserve list when he was suspended and that he was never "waived" off the list by the Spirits, there is absolutely no evidence in the record that Caldwell was placed on the reserve list "forever" as Caldwell argues. Pl.'s Mem. at 32. In other words, plaintiff has failed to come forward with any evidence supporting his contention that he remained on the Spirits' reserve list after his contract expired by its own terms (or after he was terminated by the Spirits, if he was terminated). Indeed, the undisputed evidence leads to the contrary conclusion.

The letter notifying Caldwell that he had been suspended specifically stated:

[3] Although Caldwell's contract exempted him from the ABA by-laws, the Spirits and all other member teams of the ABA were bound by the by-laws.

[4] To "confirm" that this is the manner in which the ABA by-laws operated, Caldwell cites the deposition testimony of Prentiss Yancey and Dave DeBusschere. Yancey was the General Counsel of the ABA Player's Association. DeBusschere was general manager of the New York Nets at the time of Caldwell's suspension; he later became Commissioner of the ABA.

In his deposition, Yancey stated that he was "almost certain that [Caldwell's contract] under either the bylaws or a combination of bylaws and the contract extended beyond the termination date." Yancey Dep. at 96. Yancey also stated, not without equivocation, that it was his opinion at the time of the events giving rise to this lawsuit that the ABA by-laws applied to Caldwell even though they were referenced out of his contract. Id. at 98.

Caldwell also cites portions of Dave DeBusschere's Deposition. When asked whether he had any independent recollection of the ABA procedures regarding the waiver of players, DeBusschere answered unequivocally "not really." DeBusschere Dep. at 55. DeBusschere's answers to a long series of questions put to him regarding the ABA by-laws were based on the assumption that the by-laws, as described to him by plaintiff's counsel, were the ones in effect during his time as ABA commissioner. See id. at 52. Specifically, DeBusschere testified that he did not recall whether he did or did not ever receive notice when he was general manager of the Nets that Caldwell was a free agent. Id. at 71-72.

> The duration of your suspension has not as yet been determined and unless good cause is shown by you to the contrary, the suspension will remain in effect for the remainder of the current basketball season and/or your contract will be terminated pursuant to Section 11(1) thereof.

Letter from Harry Weltman to Joe Caldwell, dated December 3, 1974, attached as Ex. G to David Aff (emphasis added). The language of the letter [28] contradicts Caldwell's claim that his suspension was to last perpetually; the letter specifically says that the suspension would remain in effect until the end of the 1974-1975 basketball season unless Caldwell was notified otherwise. In any event, Caldwell has presented no evidence, nor presented a credible interpretation of his employment contract or the ABA by-laws, that would permit a reasonable jury to conclude that Caldwell remained on the Spirits' reserve list after his contract with the Spirits expired by its own terms on October 29, 1975. [5] [29] Accordingly, the longest period of [*568] time during which Caldwell could have been on the Spirits' reserve list, by operation of the ABA by-laws, is from the date of his suspension until October 29, 1975. [6] The Court also notes that Caldwell never requested a waiver from the Spirits. Indeed, he never even made an application to the ABA for a clarification of his status. See Transcript of Proceedings, March 11, 1993, at 44.

Finally, and most importantly, Caldwell has presented no evidence that the ABA member teams failed to offer Caldwell a position with their teams because he was on the Spirits' reserve list. To prove concerted action under § 1 by resort to the ABA by-laws, Caldwell would be required to prove that the other ABA teams failed to offer [30] Caldwell a position on account of those by-laws. There is no evidence that, subsequent to his suspension, any ABA team believed itself impeded from employing Caldwell by the ABA by-laws.

To summarize, this Court concludes, after resolving all doubts in Caldwell's favor, that there is no evidence that Caldwell was on the Spirits' reserve list beyond October 29, 1975, the date on which his contract expired by its own terms. Caldwell claims only that "the enforcement of the By-Law under which Caldwell was placed and remained forever on the Spirits' reserve list" constitutes concerted action in violation of § 1. Pl.'s Mem. at 32-33 (emphasis supplied). Since we believe that no reasonable jury could conclude that Caldwell was placed "forever" on the Spirits' reserve list, and since Caldwell does not claim that the placement of him on the reserve list for the period of time remaining under his contract would constitute concerted action in violation § 1, [7] we conclude that the ABA by-laws are not sufficient by themselves to satisfy § 1's requirement of concerted action.

[5] The defendants contend that Caldwell was terminated shortly after he was suspended, and therefore even if he had been placed on the Spirits' reserve list, he would have been removed at that time. The parties dispute whether this issue is res judicata based on the district court's finding in the Georgia action. We need not address this issue since we take the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and assume that Caldwell was never terminated.

[6] Caldwell's charge that an antitrust conspiracy prevented him from playing major league professional basketball in 1975 and thereafter is further belied by the terms of the settlement of American Basketball Ass'n Players Ass'n v. National Basketball Ass'n, 72 F.R.D. 594, 596 (S.D.N.Y. 1976). The settlement provided that all former ABA players not employed on the expansion teams -- i.e., the ABA teams that joined the NBA -- and not selected in the NBA draft of players from the two excluded ABA teams were free agents and could seek to compete for placement on team rosters in the NBA as of July 26, 1976. Id. Accordingly, Caldwell could not have been on the Spirits' reserve list after the execution of the Robertson settlement.

[7] As noted above, Caldwell argues that "the enforcement of the ABA By-Law under which Caldwell was placed and remained forever on the Spirits' reserve list is sufficient by itself to satisfy Section 1's requirement of concerted action." Pl.'s Mem. at 32-33 (emphasis supplied). Nowhere in these protracted proceedings has Caldwell attempted to limit his boycott claim to a specific period of time shorter than "forever." Specifically, Caldwell does not claim that placement of him on the Spirits' reserve list for the period remaining under his contract violates the Sherman Act. Defendants pointed this out to the Court in its moving papers, see Spirits Defs.' Reply at 19-20, and again at oral argument, see Transcript of Proceedings, March 11, 1993, at 16. Caldwell never informed the Court that he was in fact making such a claim.

If Caldwell were making such a claim, he would face the formidable task of demonstrating to the satisfaction of a jury that the operation of these by-laws violated § 1 under a Rule of Reason analysis. See Federal Trade Comm'n v. Indiana Federation of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 458-59, 90 L. Ed. 2d 445, 106 S. Ct. 2009 (1986) ("per se approach has generally been limited to cases in which firms with market power boycott suppliers or customers in order to discourage them from doing business with a

[31] 2. Caldwell's Other Evidence of an Antitrust Conspiracy

The Court must determine whether the other evidence proffered by Caldwell is sufficient to raise genuine issues of material fact as to whether the defendants participated in a concerted refusal to deal with Caldwell. Caldwell's claims are as follows:

[*569] 1. Caldwell contends that the failure of any member teams of the ABA or the NBA to offer him a contract, or even a tryout, gives rise to the inference that a boycott was in effect.

2. Caldwell claims that he was suspended for no legitimate reason, and that the Spirits Defendants knew this because defendant Munchak had told the Spirits Defendants that he believed that an "indefinite" suspension was not permitted under the ABA by-laws.

3. Caldwell argues that the evidence supports the inference that the defendants had an "economic incentive to conspire to make sure that Caldwell" would never play professional basketball again. Pl.'s Mem. at 7. Specifically, Caldwell claims that the Spirits could not afford to pay his $ 120,000 salary for the 1974-1975 season in part because they had also contracted to pay Barnes a large salary, and that the Spirits suspended Caldwell to relieve [32] themselves of the salary obligation.

Caldwell also contends that the defendants had a further motive for removing Caldwell. As noted above, Caldwell was both president of the ABAPA and the Spirits' player representative. During the relevant period, the ABA was attempting to merge with the NBA. To ensure competitive bidding with the NBA for players' services, Caldwell opposed a merger between the NBA and the ABA, and had taken some steps to prevent the fruition of such a merger. Caldwell was a plaintiff in a pending antitrust action which sought, inter alia, to block any such merger. See Robertson v. National Basketball Ass'n, 389 F. Supp. 867, 873 (S.D.N.Y. 1975). In addition Caldwell, in his role as president of the ABAPA, had refused to sign a collective bargaining agreement with the ABA because he believed the agreement did not adequately provide for pension or health care benefits for the players. Based on these facts, Caldwell concludes:

> Removing Caldwell thus would eliminate an aggressive union leader who was a major obstacle to a merger the ABA needed and to a collective bargaining agreement the ABA owners, but not the players, wanted; and [33] it would send a chilling message to the other ABA players, and especially union leaders, that aggressive union action, or even counseling a teammate, might jeopardize their careers.

Pl.s' Mem. at 8.

4. In September of 1975, nine months after his suspension, the ABA teams negotiated a new agreement with their players which outlawed indefinite suspensions of players. Caldwell claims that the ABA Players Association wanted the agreement to be retroactive, and therefore to apply specifically to Caldwell, and that the ABA teams insisted that the agreement operate prospectively only. Yancey Aff. at 3-9. Caldwell contends that the ABA teams' ultimate decision that the new agreement would have prospective effect only is evidence of the ABA teams' continued group boycott of Caldwell.

5. Caldwell claims that the defendants acted, on at least one occasion, to prevent an NBA team from hiring Caldwell. Caldwell claims that sometime in 1975, after Caldwell's contract expired by its terms, Jerry Colangelo, then general manager of the NBA's Phoenix Suns, expressed an interest in Caldwell. Caldwell claims that Dave DeBusschere [8] called to ask Colangelo whether the Suns were "talking" with [34] Caldwell. Colangelo allegedly competitor"); North America Soccer League, 670 F.2d at 1259 ("Because agreements between members of a joint venture can under some circumstances have legitimate purposes as well as anticompetitive effects, they are subject to scrutiny under a rule of reason."); see also Molinas v. National Basketball Ass'n, 190 F. Supp. 241 (S.D.N.Y. 1961). We also note that if Caldwell were claiming that his placement on the Spirits' reserve list until the expiration of his contract violated the Sherman Act, any recovery would be off-set by the amount he collected in the Georgia action.

[8] Caldwell claims that at this time DeBusschere was Commissioner of the ABA. However the newspaper article which Caldwell relies on describes DeBusschere as the general manager of the New York Nets. See also Pl.s' Mem at 12 (DeBusschere was told reporter Robert Eger that he "asked [DeBusschere] what concern that was of his." Since the Suns thereafter discontinued their pursuit of Caldwell, Caldwell concludes that DeBusschere "at least implicitly warned [Colangelo] against signing Caldwell." Pl.'s Mem. at 22. Caldwell further concludes that the fact that Caldwell remained on the Spirits' reserve list "chilled NBA teams from pursuing him and it led [DeBusschere] to warn at least one NBA [*570] team not to sign him, or, presumably, face additional charges in the pending antitrust suit." Pl.'s Mem. at 23. DeBusschere is not named as a defendant in this case.

[35] As proof that this "implicit threat" was made, Caldwell cites Eger's December 8, 1975 newspaper article which contains the statements attributed to DeBusschere and Colangelo, within quotation marks. In an accompanying affidavit, Eger states that he would not have placed quotation marks around these statements unless he had accurately reported the precise words spoken by Colangelo and DeBusschere. Eger Aff. PP 9-11. Defendants have moved to strike the affidavit of Robert Eger and the article in their entirety as inadmissible hearsay.

6. Caldwell claims that a letter from Schupak to the ABA, dated February 4, 1975, indicated that Schupak would object to Caldwell's playing for another team unless he received "some assurance" that the terms of Caldwell's new employment represented a bona fide agreement. In that letter, Schupak wrote:

> I personally advised Prentiss Yancey and Caldwell's then attorney, Bynum Hunter, that the Spirits would release Caldwell from any contractual obligation he had to them, and gave him virtual carte blanche to seek other employment. I also agreed, on behalf of the Spirits, not to object to employment with another basketball club as long as I received [36] some assurance that the terms of employment represent a bona fide agreement. The Spirits had and have no intention of conducting a vendetta against Caldwell, and while he has not met the standards for employment by the Spirits, the Club has no interest whatsoever in seeing Caldwell remain unemployed.

Letter from Donald Schupak to Michael Goldberg, counsel for the ABA, dated February 4, 1975, attached as Ex. I to David Aff. Caldwell contends that this letter created a Catch-22: the Spirits would release Caldwell only if he received a bona fide offer from another team, but the by-laws prohibited all other teams from offering him a position. Pl.'s Mem. at 14 n.14.

7. Finally, Caldwell repeats several times in his opposition papers that defendant Schupak said to Prentiss Yancey that Caldwell "would never play basketball again." Yancey also testified that Schupak said he would not terminate Caldwell's contract or cap the suspension. Yancey Dep. Tr. at 52-53.

Resolving all relevant factual disputes in Caldwell's favor, this Court concludes that the defendants have demonstrated an absence of evidence supporting elements of Caldwell's § 1 claim and, accordingly, summary judgment is [37] appropriate. Celotex, 477 U.S. at 325. Eighteen years after the complaint in this action was filed, and after extensive discovery has been conducted, plaintiff has failed to come forward with sufficient evidence of the existence of a contract, combination, or conspiracy to allow a reasonable jury to find in his favor. We will briefly explain our reasons for reaching this conclusion.

First, the mere fact that Caldwell never again was offered a position to play professional basketball does not, in and of itself, give rise to the inference that the defendants conspired to blacklist Caldwell from professional basketball. This is especially true since the defendants have proffered a great deal of evidence, much of it uncontroverted by the plaintiff, that Caldwell's age and physical condition made him a less than appealing prospect to other ball clubs.

Second, the fact that ABA Commissioner Munchak, was of the opinion that an "indefinite" suspension of Caldwell was not permitted under the ABA by-laws, and that Caldwell's suspension may not have been justified, does not give rise to the inference that the defendants acted in concert to blacklist Caldwell. [38] At most it indicates that some of the defendants may have breached Caldwell's contract. This, of course, cannot give rise to an antitrust National Basketball Ass'n, 190 F. Supp. 241* [*571] (S.D.N.Y. 1961) (Kaufman, J.) (NBA reserve clause did not convert basketball player's indefinite disciplinary suspension into a group boycott against him).

Third, the fact that the Spirits Defendants, and the ABA, may have had an "economic motive" to see that Caldwell was suspended, does not give rise to the inference that they entered into a contract, combination or conspiracy to forever ban Caldwell from playing professional basketball. [9] It does not even give rise to an inference that the defendants conspired to make sure that Caldwell was suspended, absent [39] other evidence supporting such a claim.

Nor does Schupak's letter of February 4, 1975, support Caldwell's contention that the defendants engaged in a concerted failure to deal. Caldwell claims that Schupak put impossible conditions on Caldwell's obtaining other employment: specifically that Caldwell get a bona fide offer from another team before the Spirits would agree not to object to Caldwell's employment with another club. Caldwell claims that this was a Catch 22 because no other club could offer Caldwell a position because ABA by-laws [40] prohibited all other teams from negotiating with him. However, Schupak has stated in an affidavit that the concern he was addressing in this letter was that another team would obtain Caldwell's services for some nominal salary, with the Spirits remaining potentially liable for Caldwell's $ 220,000 per year contractual salary while Caldwell played for another team. Schupak's Reply Aff. P 3. This is consistent with a common sense reading of the letter. Further, since the Court concluded, supra, that no reasonable jury could find that the by-laws operated in the manner contended by Caldwell, it follows that no reasonable jury could conclude that this letter created a Catch 22 or that it gives rise to an inference of a group boycott.

The only overt act alleged on the part of any of the defendants in furtherance of the alleged boycott is the alleged "implicit threat" made by DeBusschere to Colangelo. As we have already noted, the Spirits Defendants have moved to strike the affidavit. We will consider defendants' motion to strike first.

HN12[] To defeat a motion for summary judgment, it is not required that the non-moving party "produce evidence in a form that would be admissible at trial [41] in order to avoid summary judgment. Obviously, Rule 56 does not require the nonmoving party to depose her own witnesses." Celotex, 477 U.S. at 324. However, the non-moving party must proffer evidence that is admissible in substance. HN13[] Affidavits supporting and opposing summary judgment "shall be made on personal knowledge, shall set forth such facts as would be admissible in evidence, and shall show affirmatively that the affiant is competent to testify to the matters stated therein." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e). Thus it is well established that the non-moving party "cannot rely on inadmissible hearsay in opposing a motion for summary judgment." Burlington Coat Factory Warehouse Corp. v. Esprit de Corp., 769 F.2d 919, 924 (2d Cir. 1985); see also Schwimmer v. Sony Corp. of America, 637 F.2d 41, 45 n.9 (2d Cir. 1980) ("A hearsay affidavit is a nullity on a motion for summary judgment."); United States Football League v. National Football League, 634 F. Supp. 1155, 1177 (S.D.N.Y. 1986). We note that the Eger affidavit and Eger's article constitute hearsay that does not [42] fall within one of the traditional exceptions rendering it admissible. Plaintiff argues that Eger's article is admissible under the catch-all exception to the hearsay rules because it has "circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness." Fed. R. Evid. 803(24). [10] [*572] This Court disagrees. Eger's reliance not on his memory but on [9] Furthermore, Caldwell's postulated motives can only be described as speculative. For example, Caldwell's claim that the Spirits could not afford to pay Caldwell's salary is not supported by any evidence in the record. Moreover, even if the Spirits were motivated to suspend Caldwell to avoid paying his salary, it does not follow that the Spirits were motivated to enter into an illegal agreement to boycott Caldwell from playing baseball for other teams for the remainder of his career.

[10] Rule 803(24) provides:

> HN14[] Other exceptions. A statement not specifically covered by any of the foregoing exceptions but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rule and the interests of justice the fact that he employed quotation marks does not furnish circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness. Accordingly, defendants' motion to strike is granted.

[43] In any event, even were the "evidence" admissible, it is doubtful that a reasonable trier of fact would have concluded that Caldwell's description of the events as an "implicit threat" was accurate. The article reports that DeBusschere called Colangelo to inquire "about whether the Suns were talking with Caldwell," to which Colangelo reportedly responded, "I asked him what concern that was of his." We believe that it is doubtful that a reasonable jury could conclude that either DeBusschere's alleged question, or Colangelo's alleged answer, suggests intimidation. Further, the article reports that Colangelo's statement that "ABA pressure had nothing to do with the Suns' decision not to give Caldwell a shot," but rather that the Sun's decision was based on observation of Caldwell in the 1975 summer league. Finally, DeBusschere is not a defendant in this action, nor does Caldwell present evidence that DeBusschere made this "implicit threat," if that it be, at the behest of the ABA or in furtherance of a conspiracy between the ABA and the other defendants.

The Court also does not believe that a reasonable jury could find concerted action on the part of the moving defendants based on [44] the fact that the ABA did not give retroactive effect to the agreement with the players outlawing indefinite suspensions. The reason for this is simple: plaintiff does not allege that the moving defendants participated in the decision to apply the new agreement prospectively only.

Finally, Caldwell speculates a great deal about what might have motivated the defendants to engage in a conspiracy or "boycott" against Caldwell. Even assuming that these motives as postulated by Caldwell are accurate -- and the Court seriously doubts Caldwell could prove them to the satisfaction of a jury -- we do not believe that the various motives each individual defendant may or may not have had to be rid of Caldwell gives rise to an inference that the defendants conspired to boycott Caldwell in violation of the antitrust laws. As the Supreme Court has noted, HN15[] there must be direct or circumstantial evidence that reasonably tends to prove "a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective." Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 768. At a minimum, the circumstances must "warrant a jury in finding that the conspirators had a unity of purpose or a common [45] design and understanding, or a meeting of the minds in an unlawful arrangement." American Tobacco Co., 327 U.S. at 810. The evidence presented by Caldwell does not support that such a common design existed in this case. For similar reasons, defendant Schupak's alleged threat that Caldwell "would never play basketball again" cannot, standing alone, give rise to a justifiable inference that Schupak and the other defendants conspired to blacklist Caldwell. Caldwell presents no evidence that Schupak took any action to back up this threat in concert with others.

At trial, Caldwell would ask the jury to construct a conspiracy from the fact that he never obtained employment after the Spirits suspended him -- although there are other explanations for the lack of interest demonstrated by other teams -- and that the defendants had economic motives to be rid of him -- although these so-called "motives" are speculative. As we have noted above, HN16[] "to survive a motion for summary judgment . . . a plaintiff seeking damages for a violation of § 1 must present evidence that tends to exclude the possibility that the alleged conspirators acted independently." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588. [*573] [46] Even assuming that the Spirits' suspension of Caldwell was improper; that the Spirits had an economic motive to remove Caldwell from the team; that the ABA would have been advantaged by Caldwell's exit from professional basketball, no inference of concerted action is proper based on the evidence submitted by the parties. The defendants' motions for summary judgment on the first claim is granted.

Having considered each of Caldwell's claims individually, we state, in the interests of clarity, that his evidence, when considered in the aggregate fares no better in raising a genuine issue of material fact upon which a reasonable jury could infer the existence of concerted action by the defendants in violation of § 1.

will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence. However, a statement may not be admitted under this exception unless the proponent of it makes known to the adverse party sufficiently in advance of the trial or hearing to provide the adverse party with a fair opportunity to prepare to meet it, the proponent's intention to offer the statement and the particulars of it, including the name and address of the declarant.

Fed. R. Evid. 803(24).

3. Munchak's Alleged Participation in the Conspiracy [11]

[47] While Caldwell concedes that there is no "direct evidence" that Munchak endorsed the Caldwell suspension, see Pl.'s Mem. at 17, he contends that Munchak nonetheless was part of the boycott. In support, Caldwell claims that Munchak (1) did not warn Caldwell of the boycott and thereby deprived Caldwell of the opportunity to seek preemptive injunctive relief and (2) ultimately did nothing to stop the boycott.

Caldwell further claims that Munchak had an economic incentive to terminate Caldwell's career: Munchak was personally liable for all but $ 10,000 of the pension obligation to Caldwell. Since this obligation increased with each additional year that Caldwell played professional basketball, shortening Caldwell's career, this argument goes, would reduce Munchak's contractual obligation for pension benefits. As further support that Munchak wanted to limit his contractual obligation to Caldwell, Caldwell notes that Munchak had sued Caldwell to reduce his pension obligation from $ 600 to $ 60 per month for each year he played professional basketball. Caldwell also emphasizes that he was notified of his suspension on the day his trial against Munchak regarding Munchak's pension obligations [48] was scheduled to begin and that this "resulted in a lengthy adjournment of that case," which purportedly inured to Munchak's benefit. Id.

Even assuming the existence of a conspiratorial boycott of Caldwell by the other defendants (or by other persons), this Court concludes that Caldwell did not offer any evidence that could support the inference that Munchak participated in or approved a conspiracy to boycott Caldwell from professional basketball. While admitting that no "direct evidence" exists which demonstrates Munchak's participation in the boycott, Caldwell claims that Munchak should have acted affirmatively to prevent the boycott. Specifically, Caldwell argues that Munchak was empowered under ABA By-laws to unilaterally reinstate Caldwell with back pay, an assertion disputed by Munchak. Munchak's Mem. at 17. Caldwell claims that Munchak should have used this unilateral power despite the fact that Caldwell decided to bring suit in federal court rather than pursue remedies available to him through the Office of the Commissioner.

Even assuming that Munchak had the unilateral power to reinstate Caldwell with back pay -- and there is much undisputed evidence in the record that [49] indicates that Munchak acted entirely appropriately and in accordance with relevant by-laws -- Caldwell does not point to a single shred of evidence that shows that Munchak's failure to act was in furtherance of a conspiracy to boycott Caldwell. See also Caldwell, 548 F. Supp. at 761 (ABA by-laws "merely gives the Commissioner the power to resolve all disputes that are submitted to him"). There is no evidence in the record to suggest that Munchak's alleged failure to act was anything but unilateral.

Moreover, the undisputed evidence indicates that: (1) Munchak did not participate in the decision to suspend Caldwell; (2) as ABA Commissioner, he scheduled a hearing, at the joint request of Caldwell and the [*574] Players' Association, to resolve the dispute between Caldwell and the Spirits; and (3) he also offered to recuse himself from presiding over his hearing to avoid any conflict of interest. It is not without significance that it was Caldwell who decided not to pursue remedies available through the Office of the ABA Commissioner. Having stripped the Office of the Commissioner of jurisdiction over his dispute with the Spirits, Caldwell cannot plausibly [50] assert that Munchak's failure to resolve that dispute unilaterally is a conspiratorial act in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act.

Finally, Caldwell's postulated economic motive on the part of Munchak, without more, does not support the conclusion that Munchak participated in a group boycott of Caldwell. This motive argument is undercut by the undisputed evidence that Munchak advanced funds to enable Caldwell to participate in an exhibition summer league. Further, this Court does not believe that the so-called economic motive makes any sense: if Munchak really wanted to limit his exposure as guarantor of the pension provisions in Caldwell's contract, why would he wait until the final year of the five year contract to attempt to minimize his potential exposure?

[11] Although we conclude that there is insufficient evidence to allow a reasonable jury to conclude that there was concerted action on the part of any of the defendants to boycott Caldwell, we write separately with regard to defendant Munchak to address the issues raised in Munchak's motion and to emphasize the dearth of evidence supporting Caldwell's § 1 claim.

Therefore, even if this Court had found that genuine issues of fact existed as to whether the other defendants had engaged in a concerted refusal to deal with Caldwell, summary judgment would still have been appropriate in favor of Munchak because Caldwell has presented no evidence that he participated in such a boycott.

II.

VIOLATION OF SECTION 2 OF THE SHERMAN ACT

Section 2 of the Sherman Act provides that: [51]

> HN17[] Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony . . .

15 U.S.C. § 2. Caldwell claims that the defendants violated § 2 of the Sherman Act in three ways: "they monopolized the market for professional basketball player services; they attempted to monopolize that market; and they conspired to monopolize that market." Pl.'s Mem. at 68. For many of the reasons already stated, this Court concludes that the plaintiff has failed to present evidence sufficient to support elements of his § 2 claims, and, accordingly, the defendants are entitled to summary judgment. We will discuss each of Caldwell's § 2 claims separately.

1. Unlawful Monopolization

HN18[] Unlawful monopolization has two elements: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." Eastman Kodak Co., 112 S. Ct. at 2089 [52] (quoting United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778, 86 S. Ct. 1698 (1966)); accord Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 596, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467, 105 S. Ct. 2847 n.19 (1985).

The Court must first determine the relevant market and then decide whether the defendants had "monopoly power" in that market. Trans Sport, Inc. v. Starter Sportswear, Inc., 964 F.2d 186, 188 (2d Cir. 1992). Defining the relevant product and geographic markets in an antitrust case is often a difficult task. See generally United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 100 L. Ed. 1264, 76 S. Ct. 994 (1956); United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 91 L. Ed. 2010, 67 S. Ct. 1560 (1947). In its opposition papers, the plaintiff has defined the relevant market as "the market for professional player services." [12] Pl.'s Mem. at 68. The defendants have accepted, for the purposes of this motion, that the plaintiff's market definition is correct. The parties [*575] assume that this market includes all ABA and NBA teams during the mid 1970s.

[53] "Monopoly Power is the power to control prices or exclude competition." E.I. du Pont, 351 U.S. at 391. See also Jefferson Parish Hospital Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 14, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551 (1984) (market power is the "power to force a purchaser to do something he would not do in a competitive market"); Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 713 F. Supp. 587, 600 (S.D.N.Y. 1989) (HN19[] monopoly power defined as "the impairment of competition through an unlawfully acquired market structure which allows the monopolist to exclude competition or to raise prices without being undercut"). The existence of monopoly power "ordinarily is inferred from the seller's possession of a predominant share of the market." Eastman Kodak Co., 112 S. Ct. at 2081; Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 17; Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. at 571. Judge Learned Hand's rule of thumb in the ALCOA case has guided courts for nearly half a century: 90 percent "is enough to constitute a monopoly; it is doubtful whether sixty or sixty-four percent would be enough; and certainly [54] thirty-three percent is not." United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 148 F.2d 416, 424 (1945). Courts routinely find monopoly power where the defendant possesses a market share greater than 70 percent. See Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571 (87 percent of the market constituted monopoly power); Hiland Dairy, Inc. v. Kroger Co., 402 F.2d 968, 974 & n.6 (8th Cir. 1968) (surveying cases and noting that percentages greater than 70 percent generally are found to constitute monopoly power), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 961, 23 L. Ed. 2d 748, 89 S. Ct. 2096 (1969).

[12] In his complaint, Caldwell defines the relevant market as "producing, staging and performing professional basketball in the United States." Complaint P 12.

The Second Circuit has stated that HN20[] summary judgment is appropriate in § 2 cases where the defendant's market share is "less than 50%, or even somewhat above that figure, and the record contains no significant evidence concerning the market structure to show that the defendant's share of that market gives it monopoly power." Broadway Delivery Corp. v. United Parcel Serv. of America, Inc., 651 F.2d 122, 129 (2d Cir.) (emphasis in original), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 968, 70 L. Ed. 2d 384, 102 S. Ct. 512 (1981). This is such [55] a case.

Plaintiff contends that the ABA member teams held 36% of the relevant market's capacity for professional basketball player services at the time Caldwell was suspended. This number is arrived at by creating a fraction in which the number of ABA teams (10) is the numerator, and the total number of teams in the MBA and the ABA (28) is the denominator. We believe that plaintiff's approach to define market share can be described, charitably, as simplistic. The Supreme Court has recently reiterated that in determining the existence of market power, the court must "examine[] closely the economic reality of the market at issue." Eastman Kodak Co., 112 S. Ct. at 2082. Plaintiff's conclusion regarding the ABA's market share does not take into account disparities between the leagues in ticket sales, broadcast revenues, licensing fees, and other income. In addition, the fact that the ABA was never as successful as the MBA at recruiting the best basketball players and that the ABA collapsed approximately two years after Caldwell's suspension emphasizes that measuring the ABA's monopoly power by reference to the number of teams in the league greatly overstates [56] its strength in the relevant market. [13]

Moreover, even assuming that the ABA had a market share of 36%, that would hardly be sufficient to constitute "market power." Plaintiff, however contends that it is the ABA's market share, combined with additional actions taken by the defendants, which "gave them total market control and which permitted them to ban Caldwell from professional basketball throughout the entire United States." Pl.'s Mem. at 69. These other factors are as follows:

> a) the filing of antitrust suits against the NBA accusing the NBA of trying to drive the ABA out of business by raiding ABA players; b) the threat of a lawsuit for contract interference if an NBA team [*576] signed an ABA player to whom an ABA team claimed exclusive rights; and c) actual intervention by the ABA Commissioner to dissuade an NBA team from giving Caldwell a tryout, even after Caldwell's [57] contract with the Spirits had expired.

Pl.'s Mem. at 69.

We conclude there is no basis in fact or law for concluding that the defendants obtained "total market control," id., "complete monopsony control over the players services market," id. at 70, or "control over the market for player services," id., as Caldwell alleges based on the ABA's position in the market coupled with these other factors. These other factors cannot be equated with monopoly power, as that term is defined under § 2. This is an obvious attempt by Caldwell to dress his unsuccessful § 1 claim in the garb of § 2, which must fail.

2. Attempted Monopolization

HN21[] To make out a claim for attempted monopolization, the plaintiff must demonstrate: "(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anti-competitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247, 113 S. Ct. 884, 890-91 (1993); see also Ortho Diagnostic Systems, Inc. v. Abbott Laboratories, Inc., 822 F. Supp. 145, 1993 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7101, 93 Civ. 2656 (LBS), 1993 WL 181333 at *7 (S.D.N.Y. May 28, 1993). We do not believe [58] that Caldwell has demonstrated a genuine issue of fact as to any of the three elements.

Caldwell's evidence of the first element -- intent to monopolize -- simply reiterates the evidence from which Caldwell claims that concerted action under § 1 can be inferred. See Pl.'s Mem. at 72. Caldwell relies on the same body of evidence to support the second element -- predatory or anticompetitive conduct. Id. We do not believe that a reasonable jury could conclude that this evidence, discussed at length in Part I of this Opinion, satisfies either element.

[13] Obviously, the Spirits' share of the relevant market is significantly less than 36% since the Spirits were merely one member team of the ABA.

Plaintiff contends that the third element of attempted monopolization -- a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power -- is satisfied because "defendants were effectively able to control 100% of the market as demonstrated by the fact that Caldwell was not even able to get a tryout with any pro team in either league after his suspension." Pl.'s Mem. at 73 (emphasis in original). We have considered and rejected this argument in connection with Caldwell's § 1 claim. We conclude that no reasonable trier of fact could infer, based on the fact that no team ever expressed an interest in hiring Caldwell, that the defendants were [59] dangerously close to monopolizing the professional basketball market.

Plaintiff also claims that he has shown more than a mere probability of achieving monopoly: he claims that "the defendants actually succeeded here because they cut Caldwell off from the entire market." Pl.'s Mem. at 72. Even assuming, arguendo, that the defendants "cut Caldwell off," [14] this does not indicate that there was a dangerous probability that the ABA or the Spirits or any of the other named defendants were close to monopolizing the market of "professional player services." Once again, it appears that Caldwell's confusion originates in his obvious attempt to fit his § 1 group boycott claim within the elements of a claim of attempted monopolization under § 2. Plaintiff's attempted monopolization claim is without merit.

3. Conspiracy to Monopolize

Finally, [60] HN22[] under § 2 of the Sherman Act, the offense of conspiracy to monopolize requires proof of "(1) concerted action, (2) overt acts in furtherance of the conspiracy, and (3) specific intent to monopolize." Volvo North America Corp. v. Men's Int'l Professional Tennis Council, 857 F.2d 55, 74 (2d Cir. 1988); accord United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 225, 91 L. Ed. 2010, 67 S. Ct. 1560 (1947); Apex Oil Co. v. DiMauro, 713 F. Supp. 587, 599-600 (S.D.N.Y. 1989). As we have discussed at great length in Part I of this Opinion, Caldwell has failed to offer evidence which would enable a reasonable jury to find concerted action on the part of [*577] any of the defendants. Accordingly, Caldwell's final claim under § 2 must be rejected as meritless.

III.

CALDWELL'S PENDENT STATE CLAIMS

In his complaint, Caldwell asserts:

> At the time the Defendants indefinitely suspended Plaintiff, Defendants acted maliciously with the intent to destroy Plaintiff's ability to further practice and work in his chosen profession.

Complaint, P 35. Caldwell admits that this was not well pleaded, Pl.'s Mem. at 75, and now contends -- eighteen [61] years after this lawsuit was instituted -- that it sets forth a claim for either intentional tort or prima facie tort under New York law. This claim is asserted against the Spirits Defendants only. Pl.'s Mem. at 74.

1. Prima Facie Tort

HN23[] The elements of prima facie tort are: "(1) intentional infliction of harm; (2) resulting in special damages; (3) without excuse or justification; (4) by an act or series of acts that would otherwise be lawful." Burns Jackson Miller Summit & Spitzer v. Lindner, 59 N.Y.2d 314, 332, 451 N.E.2d 459, 467, 464 N.Y.S.2d 712, 720 (1983); accord Twin Laboratories v. Weider Health & Fitness, 900 F.2d 566, 571 (2d Cir. 1990). This tort is "designed to provide a remedy for intentional and malicious actions that cause harm and for which no traditional tort provides a remedy." Curiano v. Suozzi, 63 N.Y.2d 113, 118, 469 N.E.2d 1324, 1327, 480 N.Y.S.2d 466, 469 (1984).

[14] Of course, in Part I of this Opinion we concluded that no reasonable jury could conclude that the defendants conspired to boycott Caldwell in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act.

Consequently, an action for prima facie tort will not lie where the allegations fall within the scope of a traditional tort theory. [62] Id.

The touchstone of prima facie tort is "disinterested malevolence," meaning that the plaintiff cannot recover unless the defendant's conduct was not only harmful, but done with the sole intent to harm. Burns Jackson Miller Summit & Spitzer v. Lindner, 59 N.Y.2d 314, 333, 451 N.E.2d 459, 468, 464 N.Y.S.2d 712, 721 (1983); Twin Laboratories, 900 F.2d at 571. Motives other than disinterested malevolence -- e.g., profit, self-interest, or business advantage -- will defeat a prima facie tort claim. Id. Caldwell has, throughout these proceedings, ascribed motives to the defendants which cannot be described as "disinterested malevolence," but rather are properly characterized as for profit, self-interest, or business advantage. See also Amodei v. New York State Chiropractic Ass'n, 160 A.D.2d 279, 553 N.Y.S.2d 713, 716 (3d Dep't 1990) (claim for prima facie tort barred where defendants' motivation for suspending plaintiff was the "maintenance of appropriate professional standards or the resolution of grievances"), aff'd, [63] 77 N.Y.2d 891, 571 N.E.2d 70, 568 N.Y.S.2d 900 (1991). Although alternative pleading of prima facie tort is acceptable, and therefore alternative pleading of motives on the part of the defendants is also acceptable, nowhere in the complaint or in the papers responding to this motion does plaintiff claim, or offer evidence to support a claim, that the Spirits Defendants' sole motivation for acting as they did was disinterested malevolence rather than self-interest, profit, or business advantage. Accordingly, plaintiff's contention that the defendants are liable for prima facie tort is without merit.

In addition, it appears that Caldwell's complaint is insufficient to state a cause of action for prima facie or intentional tort insofar as it fails to plead special damages. See, e.g., Curiano v. Suozzi, 63 N.Y.2d at 117, 480 N.Y.S.2d at 469. This would provide alternative grounds for dismissing Caldwell's third claim. The Court denies Caldwell's belated request for leave to amend his complaint to remedy this omission. Caldwell did not seek leave to amend [64] his complaint when he successfully moved to reinstate his claims in 1990, or when the defendants moved to dismiss this cause of action in 1991. More importantly, for eighteen years, the defendants had no notice that Caldwell's third claim was for prima facie or intentional tort. Indeed, in their initial moving papers defendants surmised that the plaintiff's pendent claim was for interference with prospective business advantage. Even the plaintiff characterizes this surmise under the circumstances [*578] as "understandable." Pl.'s Mem. at 75 n.36.

2. Intentional Tort

HN24[] To prove intentional tort under New York law, Caldwell must demonstrate, in the very least: "(1) the intentional infliction of harm, (2) resulting in special damages, and (3) without excuse or justification." Chen v. United States, 854 F.2d 622, 627 (2d Cir. 1988); see also Board of Education v. Farmingdale Classroom Teachers Ass'n, 38 N.Y.2d 397, 406, 380 N.Y.S.2d 635, 644, 343 N.E.2d 278 (1975) ("Whenever there is an intentional infliction of economic damage, without excuse or justification, we will eschew formalism and recognize the existence of a cause [65] of action."). Caldwell argues that the defendants' conduct is actionable as an intentional tort "if the [defendants'] conduct did violate the antitrust laws or was otherwise unlawful." Pl.'s Mem. at 78. See also Chen, 854 F.2d at 628 ("intentional tort involves means which are illegal and corrupt") (citation omitted). As we have already concluded in Parts I and II of this Opinion, Caldwell has failed to offer sufficient evidence to convince a reasonable jury that the defendants, individually or collectively, violated the antitrust laws. Nor has Caldwell offered evidence which tends to prove that the defendants used means which would otherwise be illegal or corrupt. Accordingly, summary judgment is granted to the defendants on plaintiff's claim for intentional tort. [15]

[66] CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, The Spirits of St. Louis, Donald Schupak, Daniel Silna, and Tedd Munchak are entitled to summary judgment on all remaining claims asserted against them by plaintiff, and the complaint should be dismissed as against them. Plaintiff contends that the other defendants -- American Basketball Association, Inc.,

[15] It would appear that plaintiff's failure to plead special damages would also provide alternative grounds for dismissing Caldwell's intentional tort claim. See Chen, 854 F.2d at 627 (noting that special damages is an element of prima facie tort and intentional tort).

Ozzie Silna, and Harry Weltman -- have failed to appear in this action and are therefore in default. See Pl.'s Mem. at 1 n.1. The plaintiff is hereby ordered to inform the Court in writing, no later than July 16, 1993, of the status of this case with regard to these other defendants.

Under § 16 of the Clayton Act, a private plaintiff is entitled to injunctive relief against loss or damage threatened by a violation of § 7, 15 U.S.C.S. § 18, under general equitable principles and upon a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate. 15 U.S.C.S. § 26. Therefore, to obtain preliminary injunctive relief, the state must establish (1) irreparable harm; and (2) either (a) likelihood of success on the merits; or (b) sufficiently serious questions going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation and a balance of hardships tipping decidedly toward the party requesting the preliminary relief.

In an anti-trust action by a plaintiff-state on behalf of its citizens, to obtain an injunction under the Clayton Act before a defendant has had an opportunity to conduct full discovery and put on its case at trial, a court must find that plaintiff, or the consumers represented by plaintiff, will be irreparably harmed prior to the conclusion of the trial of plaintiff's claims. [*1031] OPINION AND ORDER

WOOD D.J.

Background

On February 10, 1993 the State of New York ("the State") sued Kraft General Foods, Inc. ("Kraft") and RJR Nabisco Holdings Corp. ("Nabisco"), attacking Kraft's acquisition of Nabisco's ready-to-eat ("RTE") cereal assets (the "Acquisition"). The State also seeks either to rescind the transaction or to divest Kraft of Nabisco's RTE cereal assets. The State claims that the Acquisition violates Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18; Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1; and Section 340 of New York's Donnelly Act, N.Y. Gen. Bus. L. § 340.

Pending a final determination, the State sought to preliminarily enjoin Kraft from taking any action that would alter the status quo as of November 11, 1992, with respect to the RTE cereal assets purchased from Nabisco and any assets currently used by Nabisco for the production of RTE cereals. The order sought by the State would bar Kraft from altering the trade dress of the former Nabisco brands so that Kraft would be required to sell the newly acquired RTE cereals under the Nabisco trademark [2] and trade dress pending the outcome of trial.

The court denied the motion for a preliminary injunction at the conclusion of a hearing conducted on May 5, 1993. The following constitutes the court's factual findings and conclusions of law with respect to plaintiff's motion, and supplements the court's May 5, 1993 oral ruling.

I. The RTE Cereal Industry

Sales of RTE cereals in 1991 totalled more than $ 7 billion. First Cotterill Aff. P 8. Before and after Kraft acquired Nabisco's RTE cereal assets, Kraft was the third largest RTE cereal producer in the United States. Kraft sells RTE cereals under the "Post" trademark, including Grape Nuts, Raisin Bran, Honeycomb, Pebbles, Honey Bunches of Oats, Alphabits and Cocoa Pebbles.

Prior to Nabisco's exit from the RTE cereal business after almost half a century, Nabisco was the sixth largest RTE cereal producer, making such products as Big Biscuit Shredded Wheat, Spoon Size Shredded Wheat, Shredded Wheat 'N Bran, Shredded Wheat with Oat Bran (collectively "Shredded Wheat"), 100% Bran, Frosted Wheat Squares, various Fruit Wheats and Team Flakes. Krash May 21, 1993 Letter, Schedule 1.1C. From 1988 to 1992, Nabisco adopted a short-term, [3] profit maximization strategy of raising prices well above the industry average [1] and reducing marketing support for its RTE cereal products by 70%. First Cotterill Aff. P 30. Nabisco also did not introduce any new brands. The result of this strategy was a steady erosion in Nabisco's market share from 5.52% percent in 1988 to 2.94% in 1992. By April 1, 1992, Nabisco's core brands, Spoon Size Shredded Wheat and Big Biscuit Shredded Wheat, were in danger of being dropped from trade accounts if market share declined any further, because [*1032] their sales volume would not have justified their shelf space. Thomas Aff. P 3. [2] Such delisting occurred with respect to Nabisco's Frosted Wheat Squares, Fruit Wheats and Team Flakes, whose market share of less than 1% each led to their distribution in only limited geographic markets. Id.

[1] In 1988, Nabisco priced its Shredded Wheat products at 93% of the industry average. By 1992, the per pound price of $ 3.13 was 106% of the industry average. Hrg. Tr. at 97.

[2] As of April 1, 1992, the market share of Spoon Size Shredded Wheat and Big Biscuit Shredded Wheat was 1.1% and 0.7%, respectively. Thomas Aff. P 2.

[4] Prior to the Acquisition, the United States market for RTE cereal sales in 1992 was shared by six major companies and private label and other firms as follows:

Kellogg	37.03%
General Mills	25.58
Kraft/Post	11.79
Quaker	7.13
Ralston	4.63
Nabisco	2.94
Private Label & Other	10.90

Following the Acquisition, Kraft remained in third place, increasing its market share to 14.73%. Cotterill Reply Aff. Ex. A.

II. The Acquisition

In the Spring of 1992, Nabisco decided to leave the cereal business. Thomas Aff. P 2; Marram Aff. P 7. Nabisco initially agreed to sell its cereal assets to General Mills, the second largest RTE cereal seller (in terms of market share); that transaction was abandoned on November 3, 1992. Weisberg Aff. PP 2-6; Thomas Aff. P 2. According to plaintiff, the sale to General Mills was abandoned due to antitrust concerns raised by the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") and the New York Attorney General. Pl. Mem. Supp. at 8 n.15.

On November 12, 1992 Nabisco agreed to sell its U.S. and Canadian cereal assets to Kraft for $ 450 million. Of the total acquisition price, $ 388 million was allocated to the assets in the United States and $ 62 million [5] was allocated to the Canadian assets. Hinkes Aff. P 32. Roughly three quarters of the total $ 450 million acquisition price was allocated to the good will associated with the Nabisco Shredded Wheat brand identity. Hinkes Aff. P 15. Under the terms of the Acquisition

1. Kraft acquired for four years the exclusive and nonassignable right to use the "Nabisco" trademarks on the Nabisco cereals;
2. Kraft acquired Nabisco's Naperville, Illinois plant;
3. Nabisco agreed to supply Kraft with as much RTE cereal product as Kraft requires from the Nabisco plant in Niagara Falls, New York for at least five years;
4. Nabisco agreed not to compete in the RTE cereal market for 15 years, and not to compete with a shredded wheat product for 25 years; and
5. Kraft agreed not to compete in the "Triscuit-type product" market for 15 years.

II. Review by the FTC and New York Attorney General

On November 18, 1992, Nabisco and Kraft notified the FTC and the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice of their intent to consummate the transaction, in accordance with the terms of the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976, 15 U.S.C. § 18a [6] et seq. Kraft and Nabisco provided the FTC's lawyers and economists with documents and information about the transaction. The New York State Attorney General's Office received copies of the documents supplied by the defendants to the federal authorities in early December 1992 pursuant to the information sharing protocol between state and federal authorities. See Program for Federal-State Cooperation in Merger Enforcement, 4*Trade Reg. Rep.* (CCH) P 13,212 (May 27, 1992).

On December 15, 1992, the New York Attorney General's office asked defendants to produce additional information not requested by, and not produced to, the FTC. The additional information requested by the State centered on the price/cost ratios of defendants' RTE cereal brands over the past five years. Sampson Aff. P 10. On December 23, 1992 Kraft responded in part to the State's information request; the State issued a further request that same day. Id. P 8.

[*1033] On December 24, 1992, the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period expired. The FTC took no action with respect to the proposed asset sale, presumably finding insufficient reason to seek additional information or to sue [7] to enjoin the transaction.

On December 30, 1992, Kraft responded in part to the State's December 23, 1992 information request. On January 4, 1993, defendants consummated the asset sale. On January 11, 1993, Nabisco responded to the State's December 23, 1992 information request and completed its response to the State's December 15, 1993 information request. On January 22, 1993, Kraft completed its response to the State's December 23, 1992 request.

Since the end of January 1993, Nabisco's RTE cereal operations have been thoroughly integrated with Kraft's operations with respect to production, marketing, pricing and promotion. Hinkes Aff. PP 24-30; Marram Aff. PP 2-3. On January 6, 1993 Kraft notified Nabisco's brokers, who distributed Nabisco's products to the retail trade, that they would be terminated as of February 12, 1993 and replaced with Kraft's sales force. Hinkes Aff. P 26. All of Nabisco's former salaried employees who were hired by Kraft are now participating in Kraft's benefit plans. The union contracts covering hourly employees at the Naperville plant were assigned to Kraft, which has assumed responsibility for the management of the hourly employees' benefit plans. [8] Id. P 28.

As of January 25, 1993, Nabisco dissolved its RTE cereal marketing department. One member of Nabisco's former marketing staff joined Kraft; the others transferred to various positions within Nabisco or left the company entirely. Marram Aff. P 3. To date, Kraft has marketed the Nabisco cereal lines using only the Nabisco trademark under the four year license. May 18, 1993 Tr. at 5.

On February 10, 1993 the State commenced this action and moved for a preliminary injunction.

Discussion

I. Standard for Preliminary Injunctive Relief

HN1[] Under Section 16 of the Clayton Act, a private plaintiff is entitled to injunctive relief against loss or damage threatened by a violation of Section 7 under general equitable principles and upon "a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate. . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 26 (West's Supp. 1993). See also R.C. Bigelow, Inc. v. Unilever N.V., 867 F.2d 102, 107 (2d Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. Thomas J. Lipton, Inc. v. R.C. Bigelow, Inc., 493 U.S. 815, 107 L. Ed. 2d 31, 110 S. Ct. 64 (1989). Section 7 of the Clayton Act prohibits the acquisition of [9] the assets of another corporation "where in any line of commerce . . . in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition. . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 18 (West's Supp. 1993).

The State of New York sues as parens patriae on behalf of the citizens of New York. Although the State of New York is a governmental actor, it is considered a private party when seeking an injunction pursuant to the Clayton Act. See California v. American Stores Co., 495 U.S. 271, 110 S. Ct. 1853, 1867, 109 L. Ed. 2d 240 (1990). The State, therefore, does not benefit from the presumption of irreparable harm enjoyed by the FTC or the Department of Justice when those agencies sue to stop a merger. See FTC v. University Health, Inc., 938 F.2d 1206, 1218 (11th Cir. 1991). Therefore, to obtain preliminary injunctive relief, the State must establish "(1) irreparable harm and (2) either (a) likelihood of success on the merits or (b) sufficiently serious questions going to the merits to make them a fair ground for litigation and a balance of hardships tipping decidedly toward the party requesting [10] the preliminary relief." Consolidated Gold Fields, PLC v. Minorco, S.A., 871 F.2d 252, 256 (2d Cir.) (citation omitted) (emphasis added), cert. dismissed, 492 U.S. 939 (1989).

Because the States has failed to establish irreparable harm, the court must deny its motion. HN2[] To obtain an injunction before the defendant has had an opportunity to conduct full discovery and put on its case at trial, the court must find that the plaintiff, or here the consumers of RTE cereal, will be irreparably harmed prior to the conclusion of [*1034] the trial of plaintiff's claims, which is scheduled for March 1, 1994. See, e.g., Reuters, Ltd v. United Press Int'l, Inc., 903 F.2d 904, 907 (2d Cir. 1990). The danger to competition "must be real, not fancied, actual not prospective, and threatened, not imagined." Fein v. Security Banknote Co., 157 F. Supp. 146, 148 (S.D.N.Y. 1957) (discussing criteria for injunctive relief under § 16).

II. Application of Standard for Injunctive Relief

In this case, much of the conduct that is typically viewed as constituting potentially "irreparable [11] harm" in the merger context either took place prior to the commencement of this action, or has been dealt with by stipulation. This case thus poses a very different problem from that posed in Consolidated Gold Fields, 871 F.2d at 261, where difficulties in undoing the transaction after the operations are combined militated in favor of enjoining the merger before it was consummated. One of the most drastic changes was completed before the preliminary injunction motion was filed: Nabisco's RTE cereal operations were fully integrated into Kraft's operations. Hinkes Aff. PP 24-30; Marram Aff. PP 2-4. In addition, by operation of law, Kraft was required to state on the cereal boxes that it is the manufacturer of the cereal; this information now appears in small type on the cereal boxes. May 18, 1993 Tr. at 5-6. Kraft stipulated that it would maintain the current status quo regarding the packaging of the former Nabisco products until December 31, 1993 id., and that the only change that will occur during the first few months of 1994 is that the Post name will be added to the cereal boxes; it will appear there along with the prominently displayed [12] Nabisco mark and logo. June 9, 1993 Tr. at 3-5. The conduct sought to be enjoined at this stage is thus fairly finite: between January 1, 1994 and March 1994, when this case is due to be tried, Kraft expects to begin test marketing slightly altered cereal boxes, that will bear the Post logo along with the Nabisco logo.

The State ultimately seeks either (1) to rescind the Acquisition and to require Nabisco to return to the RTE cereal business [3] June 9, 1993 Tr. at 13, or (2) to divest Kraft of the former Nabisco assets by selling them to a new entrant and to order Nabisco, over any objections it may have, to license this new entrant to use the Nabisco trademark on the former Nabisco cereals. [4] Id. at 12-13; Hrg. Tr. at 246-47. The State asserts that the brand identity and good will associated with the former Nabisco brands represent an important source of competition in the RTE cereal industry. Pl. Reply Mem. at 29. The State's purpose in seeking to preserve the value of the Nabisco mark is to enable either Nabisco or a third party to capitalize on the good will Nabisco built up over many years. The court now considers what detrimental effect, if any, the actions contemplated [13] by Kraft will have on the Nabisco mark on RTE cereals.

The State does not counter Kraft's assertion that Post is a good name in the cereal business and that mere association with the Post name will not devalue the Nabisco name or the products. June 9, 1993 Tr. at 9, 11. [5] [15] [*1035] New York State nevertheless contends that consumers of these products will suffer irreparable harm from the addition of the Post logo, because consumers will be confused by (1) the simultaneous association of two [14] brands with a product, and (2) a later un-coupling of the brands if the court orders divestiture. Sampson June 10, 1993 Letter at 3-7. [6] The State asserts that Kraft's conduct will diminish the demand for these Nabisco

[3] A court should not order rescission unless the seller's return to the industry is feasible under the circumstances and the remedy is the most effective way to cure the antitrust violation. See generally, Earl W. Kintner, 5 Federal Antitrust Law*,* § 40.8 at 121, § 40.14 at 156-57 (1984 & Supp. 1993).

[4] A court may be reluctant to order this latter relief, given that Nabisco continues to use the Nabisco name and trademark to sell over $ 3 billion worth of cookies and crackers each year. Thomas Aff. P 4; Hrg. Tr. at 246.

[5] As the Business Director for Nabisco's RTE cereal business put it, Post is "in the long run, a better brand umbrella for RTE cereal products than 'Nabisco,' which most consumers identify primarily with cookies and crackers." Thomas Aff. P 7. The State concedes that Kraft will maintain the high quality of Shredded Wheat. Further, since acquiring Nabisco's RTE cereal assets, Kraft has increased marketing above Nabisco's low levels, and lowered the price of Shredded Wheat relative to competitive cereals. Hrg. Tr. at 72-73, 76, 101. Thus, association with Post may enhance the value of the former Nabisco cereals.

The State argues that courts have upheld trademark infringement claims where the infringer has a stronger reputation than the trademark holder, despite the "apparent lack of injury to [the trademark holder's] reputation," Banff, Ltd. v. Federated Dep't Stores, Inc., 841 F.2d 486, 492 (2d Cir. 1988). The State's reliance on trademark infringement cases involving competing products is unavailing here. Sampson June 10, 1993 Letter at 3-7. Banff is distinguishable because the concerns of trademark law are avoiding confusion as to the source of the goods in question and preserving fair competition. Here, there are no competing goods at issue. The sole question is whether the addition of the Post name on products manufactured by Kraft will cause Shredded Wheat consumers nationwide not to buy the hypothetical new entrant's products because the Nabisco name appears on the box with the Post name for several months in a few test markets.

products and will diminish the value of the Nabisco mark as used on formerly Nabisco cereals. Cotterill Reply Aff. P 48. As the State puts it, Kraft's placing its own trademark on the products, either with the Nabisco trademark or by itself, "will place the integrity of that brand identity, and consequently the availability of any effective relief in this action, in jeopardy." Pl. Reply Mem. at 29.

The State offers little evidence that the small change contemplated by Kraft, in test markets, over a two-to-three month period, will diminish the value of the Nabisco mark on cereals. The State's expert opines that once the changeover from Nabisco to Post begins, "it would be at best extremely difficult for any other firm to obtain consumer acceptance of yet another switch in the trademark and firm name under which Shredded Wheat products are sold." Cotterill Reply Aff. P 48. He asserts that confusion, and therefore, an erosion of brand loyalty, will ensue, but offers no further support for that statement. Id.

Thus, the Court is left with the State's largely unsupported contention that the addition of the Post name will diminish the value of the Nabisco mark and product, simply because consumers will find that change confusing, [16] when coupled with any post-divestiture change in mark. The Court views that contention as too speculative to support a finding of irreparable harm.

Because plaintiff has failed to show HN3[] irreparable injury, the "single most important prerequisite" to the issuance of an interlocutory injunction, Reuters, Ltd., 903 F.2d at 907, the court need not reach the issue of State's likelihood of success on the merits. The court denies the motion for a preliminary injunction. If the State wishes to present additional evidence of the likelihood of consumer confusion and consequent detriment to consumers from a weaker Shredded Wheat brand, if Kraft alters its stated plans with respect to the former Nabisco RTE cereals, or if trial is delayed, the court retains the power to reconsider the need for injunctive relief.

Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, the court denies plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction.

SO ORDERED.

"Standing" may be broadly construed to involve all the elements of the cause of action. That is, a plaintiff may not have "standing" unless he can satisfy each requirement of the § 4 action under the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15--antitrust violation, antitrust injury and proximate cause.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN9[] Private Actions, Remedies

Antitrust injury involves a causation requirement in order to define the class of potential plaintiffs eligible to bring suit--those injured by anything forbidden in the antitrust laws. In establishing antitrust injury, courts must first delineate the type of interests protected by the antitrust laws, and second, must determine whether the violation was the cause-in-fact of the injury: that "but for" the violation, the injury would not have occurred.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > General Overview

HN10[] Justiciability, Standing

Standing examines the connection between the asserted wrongdoing and the claimed injury to limit the class of potential plaintiffs to those who are in the best position to vindicate the antitrust infraction.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > General Overview

HN11[] Justiciability, Standing

Factors a court must consider in deciding whether a plaintiff has standing include: the potential for duplicative recovery, the complexity of apportioning damages, and the existence of other parties that have been more directly harmed. Standing involves a case-by-case analysis of the plaintiff's harm, the alleged wrongdoing by the defendants, and the relationship between them.

To maintain a § 4 action under the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, for treble damages, a plaintiff must show antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN19[] Private Actions, Remedies

In determining whether the injury alleged is the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent, the court is directed to look at the type of loss that the claimed violations would be likely to cause, or, in other words, to consider whether the injuries fall squarely within the area of congressional concern.

HN20[] Clayton Act, Claims

To satisfy the antitrust injury requirement, a § 4 plaintiff under the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, must show that its injury flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful; that "but for" the alleged violation, the injuries would not have occurred.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Remedies > General Overview

HN21[] Private Actions, Remedies

An antitrust violation need not be the sole cause of the alleged injuries, but the plaintiff must establish, with a fair degree of certainty, that the violation was a material element of, and substantial factor in producing, the injury. The proof required to show causation of damages is greater than that required to prove the amount of damages, where a plaintiff is afforded more latitude due to the "vagaries of the marketplace." In ascertaining the amount of damages, the plaintiff nonetheless must be able to trace its damages to the injury which was in fact caused by the violation.

* The Honorable Donald P. Lay of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit is sitting by designation.

[*393] CUDAHY, Circuit Judge. Ethanol producers and gasohol blenders sued a number of oil companies for treble damages and injunctive relief pursuant to §§ 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15, 26 (1988), alleging that the companies violated, inter alia, the Gasohol Competition Act of 1980, 15 U.S.C. § 26a (1988). The district court granted summary judgment against the plaintiffs [6] on the ground that they lacked antitrust standing. Because we find that the plaintiffs have failed to show antitrust injury, we affirm.

Ethanol is an alcohol produced from the fermentation of grain, molasses and other agricultural products. When blended with gasoline (generally in a ratio of one part ethanol to nine parts gasoline), the motor fuel gasohol is formed. The plaintiffs, eleven ethanol manufacturers and/or sellers [1] and two gasohol blenders [2] (collectively, the plaintiffs), brought this action against eight integrated oil companies for treble damages and injunctive relief under §§ 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act. [3] They alleged violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2 (1988), § 26a of the Clayton Act, otherwise known as the Gasohol Competition Act of 1980, 15 U.S.C. § 26a (1988), the Illinois Antitrust Law, 740 ILCS 10/1 et seq. (1992) (Ill. Rev. Stat. ch. 38 § 60-1 et seq. (1991)), and the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act, 815 ILCS 505/1 et seq. (1992) (Ill. Rev. Stat. ch. 121 1/2, P 261, et seq. (1991)). The plaintiffs assert that the defendants, [7] individually and in combination, discriminated against and disparaged ethanol and gasohol to eliminate competition in the motor fuel market. In particular, the plaintiffs allege that the oil companies restricted the purchase and sale of gasohol by their dealers and jobbers, limited the use of their credit instruments in transactions involving gasohol, engaged in an anti-alcohol campaign by labeling their gasoline with signs indicating that the product contains "no alcohol" and, finally, communicated among themselves sensitive competitive information regarding ethanol and gasohol.

[8] The district court held that the plaintiffs did not have standing to sue under § 4 and granted summary judgment for the defendants. 790 F. Supp. 804 (C.D. Ill. 1992). The court applied the factors discussed in Associated [*394] General Contractors, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 537-45, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723, 103 S. Ct. 897 (1983), and found that the injuries which the plaintiffs alleged, namely, lost profits resulting in the plaintiffs' business failures, [4] were indirect, derivative, speculative and duplicative given that the plaintiffs were not competitors or consumers in the market allegedly restrained and that there was an abundance of other causes for the plaintiffs' economic troubles. [5]

[5] Having dismissed the federal claims for lack of antitrust standing, the district court dismissed the pendent claims under Illinois law for lack of jurisdiction. By failing to challenge the dismissal, the plaintiffs effectively concede that if summary judgment on the federal claims was appropriate, the dismissal of the pendent state claims was also appropriate.

Of course, HN3[] we review the grant of summary judgment de novo, evaluating the evidence in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 587. We can affirm the grant of summary judgment on any ground, even one not relied on by the district court, if the record fairly supports that justification and it has not been waived by the appellee. Martinez v. United Auto., etc., Local 1373, 772 F.2d 348, 353 (7th Cir. 1985).

Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides

> HN4[] Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason [10] of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws may sue . . . and shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained, and the cost of the suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

Although the language of this provision could be read to provide a treble-damage remedy to anyone who was injured in some way by an antitrust violation, the provision has not been construed so expansively. Associated General Contractors, 459 U.S. at 535 ("'It is reasonable to assume that Congress did not intend to allow every person tangentially affected by an antitrust violation to maintain an action to recover threefold damages for the injury to his business or property.'" (quoting Blue Shield of Virginia v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 476-77, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149, 102 S. Ct. 2540 (1982))). Given the potential scope of antitrust violations and the availability of treble damages, an over-broad reading of § 4 could result in "overdeterrence," imposing ruinous costs on antitrust defendants, severely burdening the judicial system and possibly chilling economically efficient competitive behavior. See Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 594; William H. Page, The Scope [11] of Liability for Antitrust Violations, 37 Stan. L. Rev. 1445, 1453 (1985). Accordingly, the Supreme Court has placed several limitations on the scope of antitrust liability. In Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., the Court held that § 4 HN5[] plaintiffs must prove "antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." 429 U.S. 477, 487-88, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977) (emphasis in original). And in Associated General Contractors, it applied traditional common-law tort principles to read a proximate cause element into § 4 actions. Thus, the Court held that HN6[] a plaintiff does not have standing to sue under § 4 if its injuries were indirect and speculative. [6]

[12] A great deal of confusion has surrounded these two limitations. See Local Beauty [*395] Supply, Inc. v. Lamaur Inc., 787 F.2d 1197, 1201 (7th Cir. 1986) (noting confusion between antitrust injury and antitrust standing doctrines, and citing cases); Phillip Areeda & Herbert Hovencamp, Antitrust Law P 334.3 (Supp. 1991). Lack of standing and antitrust injury often have been invoked interchangeably against a plaintiff even though each concept involves a distinct element of the § 4 action. The elements of the § 4 action correspond to the components of a common-law action in tort. See Associated General Contractors, 459 U.S. at 533 ("Congress simply assumed that antitrust damages litigation would be subject to constraints comparable to well-accepted common-law rules applied to comparable litigation."). An action in tort has four elements: (1) a duty recognized by law requiring the defendant to conform to a standard of conduct; (2) a breach of the duty; (3) damage or injury to a legally recognized interest; and (4) causation, including both causation in fact, or "but for" cause, and legal, or proximate cause. See W. Page Keeton [13] et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts § 30, at 164-65 (5th ed. 1984) [hereinafter Prosser & Keeton]. Correspondingly, HN7[] the elements a plaintiff must satisfy to bring a § 4 action for treble damages are: (1) a duty recognized by the antitrust laws; (2) a violation of the antitrust laws; (3) injury to an interest protected by the antitrust laws and attributable to the antitrust violation--that is, antitrust injury; and (4) a direct link between the antitrust violation and the antitrust injury, that is to say, standing. [7]

[6] The standing requirement similarly has been applied to treble-damage actions under RICO. See, e.g., Holmes v. Securities Investor Protection Corp., 117 L. Ed. 2d 532, 112 S. Ct. 1311 (1992); Illinois v. Life of Mid-America Ins. Co., 805 F.2d 763 (7th Cir. 1986).

[7] HN8[] "Standing" may be broadly construed to involve all the elements of the cause of action. That is, a plaintiff may not have "standing" unless he can satisfy each requirement of the § 4 action--antitrust violation, antitrust injury and proximate cause. There is some logic to this interpretation, for as we shall discuss, infra, "standing" limits access to the cause of action to those [14] Both antitrust injury and standing are, of course, necessary to proceed under § 4. Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 110 nn.5 & 6, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427, 107 S. Ct. 484 (1986); Southwest Suburban Bd. of Realtors, Inc. v. Beverly Area Planning Ass'n, 830 F.2d 1374, 1377 (7th Cir. 1987). HN9[] Antitrust injury involves a causation requirement in order to define the class of potential plaintiffs eligible to bring suit--those "injured . . . by anything forbidden in the antitrust laws." See In re Indus. Gas Antitrust Litig., 681 F.2d at 516; Page, supra, at 1484. In establishing antitrust injury, courts must first delineate the type of interests protected by the antitrust laws, see Indiana Grocery, Inc. v. Super Valu Stores, Inc., 864 F.2d 1409, 1419 (7th Cir. 1989); Local Beauty Supply, 787 F.2d at 1202, and second, must determine whether the violation was the cause-in-fact of the injury: that "but for" the violation, the injury would not have occurred, MCI Communications Corp. v. American Telephone & Telegraph Co., 708 F.2d 1081, 1161 [15] (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 891, 78 L. Ed. 2d 226, 104 S. Ct. 234 (1983); In re Indus. Gas Antitrust Litig., 681 F.2d at 515; Page, supra at 1462-63.

HN10[] Standing, on the other hand, examines the connection between the asserted wrongdoing and the claimed injury to limit the class of potential plaintiffs to those who are in the best position to vindicate the antitrust infraction. See Cargill, 479 U.S. at 111 n.6; In re Indus. Gas Antitrust Litig., 681 F.2d at 516, 519; Page, supra, at 1484. Antitrust standing, however, is primarily a matter of legal policy, namely: "Whether the policy of the law will extend the responsibility for the conduct to the consequences which have in fact occurred." Prosser & Keeton, supra, § 42, at 273; cf. Daniel Berger & Roger Bernstein, An Analytical Framework for Antitrust Standing, 86 Yale L.J. 809 (1977) (proposing policy-oriented [*396] approach to standing analysis). In Associated General Contractors, the Court identified HN11[] factors we must consider in deciding whether a plaintiff has standing, such as "the potential for [16] duplicative recovery, the complexity of apportioning damages, and the existence of other parties that have been more directly harmed." Cargill, 479 U.S. at 111 n.6 (citing Associated General Contractors, 459 U.S. at 544-45); Southwest Suburban Board of Realtors, 830 F.2d at 1377. Ultimately, standing involves a case-by-case analysis of "the plaintiff's harm, the alleged wrongdoing by the defendants, and the relationship between them." Associated General Contractors, 459 U.S. at 535.

A. Violation of the Antitrust Laws

1. The Sherman Act Claims

The plaintiffs allege that the defendants violated §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and the Gasohol Competition Act (section 26a of the Clayton Act). The plaintiffs voluntarily withdrew their monopolization claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act, and the district court dismissed that claim with prejudice. Plaintiffs do not attempt to resuscitate the claim here. HN12[] With respect to the § 1 claims, a plaintiff, to show a violation, must establish a contract, conspiracy or combination intended to restrain competition and which [17] actually has an anticompetitive effect. Havoco of America, Ltd. v. Shell Oil Co., 626 F.2d 549, 553-54 (7th Cir. 1980); City of Vernon v. Southern Cal. Edison Co., 955 F.2d 1361, 1365 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 121 L. Ed. 2d 228, 113 S. Ct. 305 (1992). HN13[] To show a conspiracy to restrain trade, a plaintiff must proffer evidence, either direct or circumstantial, "'that tends to exclude the possibility' that the alleged conspirators acted independently." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588 (quoting *Monsanto Co. v. Plaintiffs have failed to show a § 1 violation because they have not presented evidence tending to show an agreement to restrain trade. Indeed, the conspiracy claim is belied by the fact that four of the eight defendants--Amoco, Arco, Chevron and Mobil--sold alcohol-blended gasoline during the time of the alleged conspiracy to properly suited to vindicate the violation. A person cannot be the most effective plaintiff if he cannot satisfy all of the elements of § 4. For purposes of clarity and in accord with what seems to be the approach of this circuit, see Local Beauty Supply, 787 F.2d at 1201; In re Indus. Gas Antitrust Litig. (Bicahn), 681 F.2d 514, 519-20 (7th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1016 (1983), and of the commentators, see, e.g., Page, supra, at 1484-85, we prefer, however, to treat antitrust injury and standing separately. We will, therefore, refer to standing only when discussing the element of proximate cause. Of course, this is merely a matter of semantics and the essential elements of the § 4 action remain the same under either approach.

restrain trade in gasohol. [8] The only evidence suggesting concerted action among the defendants is their common [18] membership in organizations such as the American Society for Testing and Materials (ASTM), a private group which sets standards and specifications for, among other things, motor fuels. The defendants also belong to the American Petroleum Institute (API), a trade association representing all sectors of the domestic oil industry. The plaintiffs allege that the defendants combined in these organizations to restrain trade (1) by delaying issue of an ASTM motor fuel specification that included gasohol and (2) by lobbying governmental authorities through the API to discourage the marketing and acceptance of gasohol. Neither of these claims, however, amounts to a § 1 violation.

First, HN14[] the failure of a private, standard-setting body to certify a product is not, by itself, a violation of § 1. In Consolidated Metal Products, Inc. v. American Petroleum Institute, 846 F.2d 284 (5th Cir. 1988), [19] a manufacturer of "sucker rods"--a steel rod used to pump oil from wells--argued that the API's delay in certifying its innovative product was an illegal restraint of trade in violation of § 1. The Fifth Circuit disagreed and affirmed summary judgment against the plaintiff. It held that "a trade association that evaluates products and issues opinions, without constraining others to follow its recommendations, does not per se violate section 1, when for whatever reason, it fails to evaluate a product favorably to the manufacturer." Id. at 292; see also Schachar v. American Academy of Ophthalmology, Inc., 870 F.2d 397, 399-400 (7th Cir. 1989). The Fifth Circuit then found that the delay in certification did not violate § 1 under a rule-of-reason [*397] analysis. First, the plaintiff failed to show a conspiracy, for "a trade association is not by its nature a 'walking conspiracy.'" Id. at 293-94; Wilk v. American Medical Ass'n, 895 F.2d 352, 374 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 982, 112 L. Ed. 2d 524, 111 S. Ct. 513 (1990); see also Moore v. Boating Indus. Ass'n, 819 F.2d 693, 712 [20] (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 854, 108 S. Ct. 160, 98 L. Ed. 2d 115 (1987) (membership in trade association alone not sufficient evidence of agreement to restrain trade). Second, there was no evidence of an intent to restrain trade, the court held, noting that the API followed its normal certification procedures. Finally, the court found no evidence of an anticompetitive effect because the certification, although influential, was not required to compete in the market. Reliance by oil pump buyers on the certification was voluntary, and the record indicated that the plaintiff had no problem selling its product without the API's certification.

The plaintiffs' § 1 claim fails here for analogous reasons. As we have noted, there is no evidence of concerted action. In addition, the plaintiffs have not proffered evidence of an unlawful purpose. The ASTM did not stray from its normal procedures. Indeed, the plaintiffs concede as much, but argue that "the defendants did not even adopt an emergency specification for gasohol, although ASTM procedures plainly provided that emergency specifications could be adopted to fill a pressing need while a proposal went through the normal ASTM standards-writing [21] process and ballots." Pls.' and Intervs.' Mem. in Opp'n to Defs.' Mots. for Summ. J. at 62. The failure to take emergency steps to specify gasohol and proceeding through the normal specification process, however, is not evidence of an unlawful purpose. Finally, there is no evidence of an anticompetitive effect. The record indicates that in the period 1978-1987, during which the defendants, acting through the ASTM, allegedly restrained trade by not issuing a gasohol specification, ethanol fuel sales increased continuously from 20 million gallons per year to 825 million gallons per year--a 4000 percent increase. It would be difficult to show an anticompetitive effect on ethanol sales in the face of this increase.

Moreover, the API's lobbying efforts do not support a § 1 claim. HN15[] Under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, lobbying that would arguably restrain trade is protected political activity and does not violate the antitrust laws. United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626, 85 S. Ct. 1585 (1965); Eastern R.R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464, 81 S. Ct. 523 (1961). Although HN16[] there is an exception from First Amendment [22] protection for "sham lobbying," Noerr, 365 U.S. at 144, the Supreme Court has recently explained that "a sham situation involves a defendant whose activities are not genuinely aimed at procuring favorable governmental action at all, not one who genuinely seeks to achieve his governmental result but does so through improper means." City of Columbia v. Omni Outdoor Advertising, Inc., 499 U.S. 365, 113 L. Ed. 2d 382, 111 S. Ct. 1344, 1354 (1991) (citations and quotation marks omitted) (emphasis in original). Here, the plaintiffs do not allege that the lobbying efforts were not intended to get legislative results. In fact, the plaintiffs assert that the efforts achieved their desired legislative effect. Hence, these activities are protected and do not violate the Sherman Act.

2. The Gasohol Competition Act Claims

The only remaining basis for a violation of the antitrust laws lies in the claims under the Gasohol Competition Act, which we duplicate in the margin. [9] The plaintiffs [*398] first assert that the oil companies engaged in an "anti-alcohol" campaign (1) by posting signs at their stations announcing that their products contain no alcohol, thus implying [23] that there is something wrong with gasohol, and (2) by not including on such signs recognition of gasohol's quality. Initially, we doubt that the signs unreasonably discriminate against gasohol. In Schachar v. American Academy of Ophthalmology, Inc., 870 F.2d at 400, for example, we held that an ophthalmological academy did not commit an antitrust violation by labeling a particular surgery "experimental." We found that the speech did not "restrain trade" but simply affected demand for the surgery by informing patients of its nature. We held that the appropriate remedy was not antitrust litigation but "more speech."

[24] Even assuming that the signs here discriminate against gasohol, subsection (b)(3)(A) of the Act permits petroleum companies to label pumps dispensing gasohol to distinguish that product from other products manufactured and distributed by the companies. In addition, subsection (b)(3)(B) authorizes petroleum companies to issue disclaimers of liability for any damage attributable to gasohol. The apparent intent of these provisions is to permit oil companies to distinguish petroleum products from gasohol and to disavow any adverse consequences from gasohol use. Signs stating "No alcohol" are not qualitatively different from those which the petroleum companies seem to be free under the Act to post--signs providing, in effect, that a product contains alcohol [10] and that the petroleum company did not manufacture the product and is not responsible for damage it may cause. Indeed, the signs posted by the defendants seem less likely to convey the message that gasohol is an inferior motor fuel than do signs which seem to be specifically permitted under the Act. With respect to the defendants' failure to include positive information about gasohol in its signs, subsection (b)(3)(C) explicitly [25] provides that companies are not required to provide advertising support for gasohol.

The plaintiffs next argue that the defendants have refused to permit the use of existing tanks and pumps for storage and dispensing of gasohol and have done the [*399] same with respect to the storage and blending of ethanol. The plaintiffs maintain that this refusal is an unreasonable limitation on the sale of gasohol. They direct us to language in the House and Senate Reports on the gasohol legislation defining what an unreasonable limitation on the sale of gasohol includes. The House Report states

> Paragraph [(a)(2)] also prohibits unreasonable limitations on the sale of gasohol and other synthetic fuels. The phrase "unreasonably limits" was used to cover obstacles to the marketing of gasohol that were not necessarily discriminatory. For example, if an oil company forbids the use [26] of its pumps and tanks for dispensing any noncompany product, gasohol is not singled out, but its sale is impeded. This limitation, although nondiscriminatory, should be prevented and will be reached under paragraph [(a)(2)] of this act.

H.R. Rep. No. 1464, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. 6 (1980), reprinted in 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5353, 5397-98; accord S. Rep. No. 868, 96th Cong., 2d Sess., at 10-11 (1980) (same). The plaintiffs also recognize, and the defendants rely upon, subsection (b)(3)(D), which provides that the Act does not "require such person to furnish or provide, at such person's own expense, any additional pumps, tanks, or other related facilities required for the sale of the gasohol or other synthetic motor fuel." The plaintiffs, however, point to the word "additional" and argue that Congress only meant to relieve franchisors from the obligation of installing new equipment for gasohol distribution. Mindful that any exemptions from the antitrust laws are to be construed narrowly, "with beady eyes and green eyeshades," Chicago Professional Sports Ltd. Partnership v. National Basketball Ass'n, 961 F.2d 667, 672 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, [27] 121 L. Ed. 2d 334, 113 S. Ct. 409 (1992), we agree with the plaintiffs that this is the only interpretation consistent with the Act's language and intent. In fact, the House and Senate Reports specifically state that the exemption from furnishing additional facilities does not permit franchisors to prohibit dealers from using existing tanks and pumps for the sale of gasohol. 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 5398; S. Rep. No. 868 at 11. In addition, the plaintiffs have asserted that the defendants limited the use of credit instruments in the sale of gasohol. This is in direct violation of subsection (a)(1) of the Act, which makes it unlawful to limit the use of credit instruments in any gasohol transaction.

Viewing the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, as we must on a motion for summary judgment, we find that there is a genuine issue of fact as to whether the defendants violated the Gasohol Act. Thus, for purposes of summary judgment, we assume the existence of a violation, and continue our review of the § 4 requirements to determine whether summary judgment against the plaintiffs was appropriate.

B. Antitrust Injury

[10] As we discuss, infra, a number of states have enacted laws requiring dealers to post "gasohol" or "contains alcohol" labels on their gasohol pumps.

In Brunswick, the Supreme Court held that [28] HN18[] to maintain a § 4 action for treble damages, a plaintiff must show "antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." 429 U.S. at 489. We will analyze both of these requirements in turn.

1. Type of Injury

HN19[] In determining whether the injury alleged is the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent, the Supreme Court has directed us to look at " 'the type of loss that the claimed violations . . . would be likely to cause," Id. at 489 (quoting Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 125, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129, 89 S. Ct. 1562 (1969)), or, in other words, to consider whether the injuries "fall squarely within the area of congressional concern." McCready, 457 U.S. at 485. Thus, when defining the scope of antitrust injury for a violation of the Gasohol Competition Act, it is the purpose of that legislation, and the interests it seeks to protect, which is controlling. [11] Upon reviewing the purposes [*400] of the Gasohol Act, we believe that the plaintiffs have alleged [29] the type of injury the Act was intended to avert.

[30] The basic intent of the Gasohol Act, as gleaned from the House and Senate Reports, is "simply to promote generally the sale of gasohol and other synthetic fuels and not to affect the sale of specific brands of those products." 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 5395. The House Report provides

> In recent months, there has been increasing recognition of the need for rapid and effective development of alternative energy sources to offset this nation's dependence on the ever-dwindling supply of foreign and domestic oil. One program that will help to decrease America's reliance on foreign energy sources is the production and use of gasohol. Should the consuming public be denied the opportunity to purchase such alternative fuels, public and private efforts to encourage alternative fuel development will be frustrated.

Id.; accord S. Rep. No. 868 at 5. The second, more specific purpose of the Act is to "ensure that retailers and distributors of synthetic fuels, including gasohol, will not be discriminated against by their suppliers and/or owners of their retail stations because of sales of synthetic fuels." 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 5393; accord S. Rep. No. 868 at 2 ("Moreover, the committee [31] wants to insure that dealers will be permitted to market newly developed alternative fuels when those fuels reach gasohol's level of quality and acceptability."). Therefore, the congressional purpose in enacting the Gasohol Competition Act transcends the short-term economic interests of consumers. The Gasohol Act was intended to promote the development of alternative motor fuels. It did this not only by protecting competition generally, but went further by protecting, in a limited way, competitors--those who develop, produce and market alternative motor fuels. Unlike the Sherman Act, the Gasohol Competition Act imposes affirmative obligations on companies to promote the growth of gasohol, such as requiring companies to permit dealers to use

[11] This comports with the approach taken by courts in defining antitrust injury for § 4 suits predicated upon a violation of the Robinson-Patman Act. These courts have recognized that the interests Congress sought to protect in enacting the Sherman Act and the Robinson-Patman Act "do not mirror one another," J.F. Feeser, Inc. v. Serv-A-Portion, Inc., 909 F.2d 1524, 1540 n.17 (3d Cir. 1990); see also United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 450-51, 57 L. Ed. 2d 854, 98 S. Ct. 2864 (1978) (noting distinction and potential tension between Sherman Act and RobinsonPatman Act). Thus, courts have relied on the purposes of the Robinson-Patman Act to determine whether the plaintiffs have satisfied the antitrust injury requirement for a Robinson-Patman violation. See, e.g., J.F. Feeser, 909 F.2d at 1533-35, 1539-41 & n.17 (secondary-line plaintiff need only show injury to competitor to satisfy competitive injury requirement, and correspondingly, the antitrust injury requirement; injury to consumers unnecessary); Alan's of Atlanta, Inc. v. Minolta Corp., 903 F.2d 1414, 1418 n.6, 1426-28 (11th Cir. 1990) (same); Hasbrouck v. Texaco, Inc., 842 F.2d 1034, 1040 (9th Cir. 1987) (noting that "in order for a plaintiff to prove competitive injury under Robinson-Patman, he need only show that a substantial price discrimination existed as between himself and his competitors over a period of time."), aff'd on other grounds, 496 U.S. 543, 110 L. Ed. 2d 492, 110 S. Ct. 2535 (1990); Areeda & Hovencamp, supra, P 340.5 (citing with approval finding of antitrust injury in favor of injured competitor in Hasbrouck). Indeed, even the courts which have held the interpretation of "competitive injury" under the Robinson-Patman Act to be analogous to that applied under the Sherman Act have done so by reviewing the intent and legislative history of the Robinson-Patman Act, concluding only then that the two acts have similar purposes. See, e.g., Boise Cascade Corp. v. FTC, 267 U.S. App. D.C. 124, 837 F.2d 1127, 1138-39, 1143-48 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (reviewing purpose of Robinson-Patman Act and concluding that, as in the case of the Sherman Act, absence of consumer injury is evidence in rebuttal of showing of competitive injury).

company tanks and pumps for the sale of gasohol and to extend credit for gasohol purchases on terms equal to those offered for non-gasohol purchases.

The defendants argue that the interests protected by the Act are solely those of the dealers and distributors, and thus maintain that only dealers and distributors may suffer antitrust injury from a violation of the Gasohol Act. They rely on Rebel Oil Co., Inc. v. Atlantic Richfield Co., [32] 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21056, No. CV-S-90-076-PMP (D. Nev. Dec. 27, 1991), where the court held that two marketers of gasohol did not have standing to sue under the Gasohol Act because the Act "confers standing only upon franchisees or those who have directly acquired petroleum products from the supplier accused of the discriminatory or limiting behavior." Id. [slip op.] at 4, 1991 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21056 at *5. But Rebel Oil cites only those portions of the House Report that refer to franchisees [*401] and distributors. It is true that the Act was enacted to protect dealers and distributors, but that was not the only, or even the most central, purpose of the Act.

In that connection, the Senate Report, in summarizing the purposes of the Act, states: "In order to relieve our tenuous energy supply, the committee believes that domestically available alternatives to conventional oil and gas resources are necessary. It is to this effort that [the Gasohol Competition Act] is addressed." As this and other provisions demonstrate, the protection of dealers is simply a means to the end of promoting the sale of gasohol and other synthetic motor fuels. See, e.g., 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 5393 (the Act "will promote the sale of gasohol and other synthetic motor fuels [33] by ensuring that franchisees of existing major oil companies can utilize the company's credit arrangements and marketing facilities to promote these alternative sources of energy and to preclude unreasonable discrimination against dealers desiring to market these synthetic fuels."). Confining the interests protected by the Act to those of dealers and consumers so that only they are capable of suffering antitrust injury, is belied by the overall purposes of the Act. Indeed, we believe that the interests protected by the Act extend beyond the simple sale and marketing of gasohol--and therefore the interests of gasohol blenders and dealers--and include the development and production of alcohol-blended motor fuels. Id. at 5395; see also S. Rep. No. 868 at 1 (emphasizing "urgent need for rapid and effective development of viable alternative fuels to offset . . . dependence on . . . foreign oil"). [12] Hence, the interests of ethanol manufacturers and sellers, integral to the promotion and development of gasohol, "fall squarely within the area of congressional concern." McCready, 457 U.S. at 485. Accordingly, we believe that these blenders, manufacturers [34] and sellers all may suffer the type of injury that Congress meant to preclude. [13]

2. "But for" Cause

HN20[] To satisfy the antitrust injury requirement, a § 4 plaintiff must [35] show that its injury "flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful," Brunswick, 429 U.S. at 489--that "but for" the alleged violation, the injuries would not have occurred. MCI, 708 F.2d at 1161; Areeda & Hovencamp, supra, P 334.3a; Page, supra, at 1461. HN21[] An antitrust violation need not be the sole cause of the alleged injuries, but the plaintiff must establish, with a fair degree of certainty, that the violation was a material element of, and substantial factor in producing, the injury. See Zenith Radio Corp., 395 U.S. at 114 n.9; Tire Sales Corp. v. Cities Serv. Oil Co., 637 F.2d 467, 474-75 (7th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 451 U.S. 920, 68 L. Ed. 2d 312, 101 S. Ct. 1999 (1981). The proof required to show causation of damages is greater than that required to prove the amount of damages, where a plaintiff is afforded

[12] Although these purposes may transcend to a degree the accustomed, consumer-oriented purposes of the "antitrust" laws, we do not think that Congress's concern for fostering new products and new competitors in this context in any way marks the Gasohol Act as something other than an antitrust law, or the injury resulting from its violation as something other than an antitrust injury.

[13] The mere showing that gasohol blenders and ethanol manufacturers and sellers may suffer the type of injury protected against by the Gasohol Act does not mean that these categories of interests necessarily have standing to sue for a violation of the Act. As noted, antitrust injury and antitrust standing involve two separate inquiries. The crux of the standing analysis is whether the plaintiff is the proper party to vindicate the antitrust interest.

more latitude due to the "vagaries of the marketplace." J. Truett Payne Co. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 451 U.S. 557, 566, 68 L. Ed. 2d 442, 101 S. Ct. 1923 (1981); MCI, 708 F.2d at 1168. [14]

[36] In Argus Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 801 F.2d 38, 44 (2d Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1088, 94 L. Ed. 2d 151, 107 S. Ct. 1295 (1987), for example, a wholesaler of photography equipment and a licensor of camera equipment sued Kodak for damages resulting from Kodak's Sherman Act violation in signing a confidentiality agreement with the developer [*402] of a new and improved flash unit. The Second Circuit affirmed the grant of summary judgment against the plaintiff on the ground that the plaintiffs failed to show that, but for the antitrust violation, they would not have suffered the losses they alleged. The plaintiffs had been suffering economic hardship before the antitrust violation, had recently lost the supplier of their lead line of camera and had lacked a supplier for a projected leading product. See also Southwestern Sheet Metal Works, Inc. v. Semco Mfg., Inc., 788 F.2d 1144, 1145-47 (5th Cir. 1986) (holding that plaintiff failed to show, given the existence of other competitive bidders, that but for the violation granting a competitor a bidding advantage, plaintiff would have been awarded the projects at issue), cert. [37] denied, 480 U.S. 917 (1987); Federal Prescription Serv., Inc. v. American Pharmaceutical Ass'n, 214 U.S. App. D.C. 76, 663 F.2d 253, 268-72 (D.C. Cir. 1981) (holding that mail-order prescription service failed to show that, but for the American Pharmaceutical Association's attempt to restrain mail-order competition, it would not have undertaken the expense of identifying forged prescriptions), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 928, 71 L. Ed. 2d 472, 102 S. Ct. 1293 (1982).

Defendants identify numerous intervening economic and market factors which they argue may have been the actual cause of the plaintiffs' injuries. They contend that the alleged antitrust violations played an insignificant role (or none at all) in the plaintiffs' economic woes, and that therefore no reasonable trier of fact could find that the violation caused the plaintiffs' injuries. We agree and find that as a matter of law, plaintiffs have failed to show with a fair degree of certainty that the antitrust violation was a material and substantial factor causing their alleged injuries. Hence, the plaintiffs did not suffer antitrust injury.

There are many alternative explanations for the [38] injuries which the plaintiffs allege. First, many automobile owner's manuals warned consumers against the use of motor fuels containing alcohol. For example, the owner's manual for the 1986 Chrysler LeBaron GTS stated that "Chrysler does not recommend using fuels containing alcohol because some gasoline/alcohol blends may degrade the starting, driveability and fuel efficiency of your vehicle." Numerous other owner's manuals of record suggested precautions owners should take when using gasoline containing alcohol. These precautions involve, among other things, verifying the amount and type of alcohol blended with the gasoline. [15] These cautionary counsels likely dissuaded some owners from using gasohol.

[39] Second, reports in the media criticized alcohol-blended motor fuels and discouraged the use of gasohol by consumers. In particular, the April, 1987, issue of Consumer Reports suggested that consumers "avoid gasoline/alcohol blends altogether--if you can."

Third, a number of state laws hurt gasohol sales by requiring retailers to post pump labels disclosing that a motor fuel contained alcohol. A Louisiana law adopted in 1986 was particularly damaging to gasohol sales. This labeling law required a black and gold label with three-inch letters stating that the fuel was "gasohol" or "contains ethanol." After enactment of the law, gasohol sales in Louisiana--where seven of the thirteen plaintiffs operated--"dropped anywhere from approximately 66 to 72 percent" according to Robert Love, the general manager of one of the plaintiffs, Cajun Energy. Representatives of other plaintiff companies also acknowledged the negative effect of the labeling law, reflected in reduced sales and lost clients. One of the plaintiffs' experts, J.B. Smith, for example, acknowledged that the labeling law "killed ethanol in the marketplace." Mr. Smith further maintained that a Florida labeling law reduced sales [40] by 33 percent.

[14] In ascertaining the amount of damages, the plaintiff nonetheless must be able to trace its damages to the injury which was in fact caused by the violation. MCI, 708 F.2d at 1168.

[15] The record contains owner's manuals from the 1991 Honda Accord, 1990 Mitsubishi Eclipse, 1986 Nissan Stanza Wagon, 1986 Porsche Audi, 1984 Saab 900, 1986 Subaru, 1984 Toyota Tercel, 1984 Volkswagen Rabbit, 1987 AMC, 1989 Eagle Summit, 1989 Dodge Ram, 1985 Ford Tempo, 1984 Buick Regal, 1986 Buick Riviera and 1986 Chevrolet.

Fourth, states that had exempted gasohol in whole or in part from state fuel taxes eliminated or reduced those exemptions. Since 1986, twenty-seven of the thirty-three states that had enacted exemptions eliminated [*403] or reduced them. [16] This increase in taxes made gasohol more expensive, effectively reducing the price gasohol marketers would pay for gasohol and gasohol blenders would pay for ethanol.

[41] Fifth, the drop in gasoline prices in 1986 caused a corresponding drop in ethanol prices which inflicted serious financial consequences on the plaintiffs. Wendall Harris, president of plaintiff CEPO, summarized the result of the drop in gas prices:

> The past several months have witnessed a drastic decline in gasoline prices which, in turn, leads to a corresponding decline in ethanol prices. In January [1986], the price was $ 1.56, by March it fell to $ 1.20, and by May it sank to $ .97. Our company has undergone serious financial loss for the past several months due, in substantial part, to those price declines.

Representatives of other plaintiff companies echoed these views about the effect of the decline in gas prices on gasohol and ethanol prices.

Sixth, the United States Department of Agriculture in 1986 instituted a program to subsidize grain-based ethanol producers. The subsidy effectively reduced the raw material costs of grain-based ethanol producers by forty percent by giving them one free bushel of grain for every two and one-half used. Most of the present plaintiffs could not take advantage of the subsidy because they relied on other, non-grain feedstocks, such as [42] molasses. Two of the current plaintiffs--Alpebo and Shepherd--being molasses-based producers, sued the Secretary of Agriculture in an attempt to defeat the subsidy, arguing that the subsidy would "give grain-based producers a competitive advantage over plaintiffs, which they will use to drive the price of ethanol down to a point at which plaintiffs are unable to compete." Richard Dodd, vice-president of plaintiff Shepherd Oil, related that the subsidy would permit its grain-based competitors to drive down prices to a point where Shepherd would not have the financial strength to compete very long. He noted that this was true especially given that the price of Shepherd's feedstock, molasses, had nearly doubled in one year. Similarly, Mr. Harris of CEPO candidly stated that unless CEPO was eligible for the same or a similar subsidy, "I strongly doubt whether CEPO would stay in the ethanol market for any length of time. We cannot sell into a market at prices which guarantee losses."

Seventh, in 1987 Louisiana terminated its state subsidy providing $ 1.40 for each gallon of ethanol produced and sold in Louisiana. Four of the current plaintiffs--Alpebo, Shepherd, Shreveport and Vidalia--were [43] ethanol producers in Louisiana, [17] and were seriously hurt by the loss of the subsidy. Instead of collecting the price of a gallon of ethanol plus the subsidy of $ 1.40 for every gallon of ethanol produced, Louisiana ethanol producers were suddenly collecting only the price per gallon the market would allow. Matthew Kling, former director of marketing and commodities for Shepherd Oil, conceded that "Shepherd was not a profitable business because its ethanol production was reliant on state subsidies. It is simple economics to determine that, if ethanol is priced competitive with the price of gasoline, it simply cannot be sold at a consistent profit by small producers without a state subsidy." Representatives from other plaintiffs also acknowledged that once the subsidy stopped, the ethanol industry in Louisiana all but shut down.

Finally, the plaintiffs conceded that they did not enjoy [44] sufficient economies of scale to compete effectively against larger, grain-based ethanol producers, like Archer Daniels [*404] Midland (ADM), a midwestern grain-based producer with approximately 60 percent of the U.S. ethanol market. [18] Kling testified that the large [16] The states exempting gasohol in whole or in part from state fuel taxes in 1985 were Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, Washington and Wyoming. Of these, only Alaska, Connecticut, Hawaii, Idaho, Washington and Wyoming have not since eliminated or reduced the exemption. Only Missouri and South Carolina have begun to exempt gasohol since 1985 without any subsequent reduction or elimination of the exemption.

[17] Three other plaintiffs--Wurster, Cajun Energy and Public Terminals--were Louisiana-based wholesale marketers of ethanol and gasohol.

midwestern ethanol producers were able to achieve economies of scale, were more reliable and could compete more effectively due to their direct rail access, location near the grain supply and ability to sell some of their by-products. Representatives of High Plains, Greater Rockford, Lakefield Ethanol and Shepherd recognized that ADM had significant economies of scale, and was able to produce more ethanol, of better quality and at a lower price per gallon than any of the plaintiffs.

Standing alone one of these alternative causes of the plaintiffs' injuries might be insufficient to put causation-in-fact in question. Taken together, [45] however, the plaintiffs have failed to show with a fair degree of certainty that "but for" the alleged antitrust violation, the plaintiffs would not have suffered the injuries of which they complain. Consequently, as a matter of law the plaintiffs have failed to show antitrust injury, and summary judgment was, therefore, appropriate.

III.

Because a showing of both antitrust injury and antitrust standing are necessary to proceed under § 4, the plaintiffs' inability to show antitrust injury is a sufficient basis for dismissing their case; we need not address the other issues raised on appeal. HN22[] The lack of antitrust injury, moreover, is fatal to their claim for injunctive relief under § 16 of the Clayton Act. See Cargill, 479 U.S. at 113. This conclusion is buttressed by the fact that all but one of the plaintiffs have gone out of business, and thus, cannot show threatened loss or damage by the defendants' conduct. Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is

MEMORANDUM

[1]

By order dated September 30, 1991, this Court found that Plaintiff's pricing policies were not violative of Section 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, or the Minnesota Antitrust Law, [*2] Minn. Stat. § 325D.53. See Order, Docket No. 11. This Court also enjoined Defendant Penco from violating the franchise agreement with Plaintiff. In part this Court found that:

> On their face, Great Clips' even-dollar and single price restrictions create the appearance of restricting franchisee's prices. If a franchisee may only choose between one or two prices (e.g. $ 8.00 or $ 9.00) out of a possible one hundred (prices lying between and including $ 8.00 and $ 9.00), the franchisee has only one-fiftieth the options he would have without the even-dollar restriction. The market effectively determines the parameters of a minimum and maximum price within several dollars. However, Great Clips does not restrict discounts by duration or price. The record shows that discounting is a regularly conducted activity, with widely varying prices determined by market pressures. Thus, the effect is that a franchisee is free to set whatever price the market will bear. The potential anti-competitive effect of Great Clips policy is nonexistent.
> Penco is only required to post on its price board even-dollar prices and a single price for haircuts. Whatever price it decides to charge in order to [*3] maximize its profits and attain maximum competition may be achieved by discounting, sales, special events, couponing, or whatever other marketing devices it may choose to utilize and which the market will allow.

Order, Docket No. 11 at pp. 13-14.

At the time of this Court's initial order, Plaintiff imposed no restrictions on a franchisee's ability to run discounts from even-dollar prices. Defendants are correct in noting that this fact formed an important part in this Court's finding that Plaintiff's policies were not anti-competitive. However, it goes too far to say that such freedom formed the lynch-pin in the Court's opinion. As the above excerpt from this Court's opinion demonstrates, other factors also informed this Court's opinion, particularly the franchisee's freedom to substantially set his or her own prices by whatever means.

Since this Court's initial order, Plaintiff has instituted substantial restrictions on a franchisee's ability to discount prices. Under the new policies discounts or sales may only be conducted for 21 days out of every three months. Defendants are correct in arguing that this is a marked departure from previous policy. Plaintiff represents that this [*4] new policy was instituted to insure compliance with various consumer protection laws that involve false advertising and consumer fraud in connection with permanent sale situations. It is not contested that Defendants have engaged in such permanent sales, discounting from a posted even-dollar price that in actual practice is never charged.

Franchisees remain free to coupon. [2] Couponing is a wide-ranging form of advertising that can include direct mail promotions, return customer coupons, newspaper advertisements with or without coupons that may be redeemed for a discount, flyer distributions, radio offers, and business discounts through paycheck stuffers. See Affidavit of Olsen. This list is not exhaustive.

[1] This Court notes that there is no motion before the Court to compel compliance with this Court's previous order enjoining Defendant Penco from violating the franchise agreement. This Court rules only on those motions properly before it.

[2] During oral argument, this Court inquired into exactly hat couponing could amount to and a franchisee's freedom to engage in such activity. Plaintiff's counsel was unable to answer authoritatively and has submitted the affidavit of Rhoda Olsen in this regard. Defendants object to this affidavit as an untimely brief. Defendants are in error.

As an initial matter, the pricing restrictions under which a franchisee operated at the time of this Court's prior order must be kept in mind. [3] First, Plaintiff, while requiring franchisees to post even-dollar prices, makes no attempt to tell franchisees what those even-dollar prices must be. Second, franchisees may only charge a single even-dollar price for a haircut, however Plaintiff again makes no attempt to tell franchisees what this single price must be. Thus, while Plaintiff's do not attempt to set a franchisee's prices, a franchisee's freedom to adopt a particular pricing structure is restricted. This Court reiterates that the combination of these two restrictions is not in and of itself anti-competitive.

However, Plaintiff's have now added a third restriction; franchisees may only conduct sales for 21 days out of every three months. Defendant's argue that in combination with the previous two restrictions, [*6] even-dollar pricing and single price haircuts, Plaintiff's polices now cross over the anti-competitive line. This Court does not agree and finds no reason to alter or modify this Court's previous judgment. [4]

Defendants now labor under greater restrictions and while this Court has some concern over the appearance of a policy of creeping anti-competitive restrictions, Plaintiff's policy has as its reasonable genesis concern about consumer protection laws and compliance therewith as regards the practice of permanent sales. [5] This Court is not persuaded that these concerns are chimerical or a smoke screen behind which Plaintiff is attempting to fix prices. However, good intentions aside, this Court must still examine the practical effect of the new restriction in combination with the pre-existing restrictions to determine if the facts underlying this Court's prior order have [*7] so changed as to merit a different result. This Court finds that they have not.

Franchisees retain substantial freedom to set prices. First, a franchisee may adopt any even-dollar price for haircuts. Second, within any three month period a franchisee may run a sale or offer a discount for any amount for 21 days. During these 21 days, a franchisee's discretion to discount prices to any figure is entirely unfettered. During the remaining approximately two months, the franchisee is free to adopt any even-dollar price for haircuts. Extrapolating these figures, over the course of a year a franchisee may freely discount for a total of approximately 84 days and may charge any even-dollar figure the remainder of [*8] the time. [6]

Third, at all times and separately or in conjunction with other promotions a franchisee may freely coupon. The variety of techniques available through couponing as discussed, supra, allows considerable pricing freedom.

In short, there remains myriad ways in which a franchisee may legitimately set a price he or she may choose and still not run afoul of the franchise agreement. While a franchisee may be heard to complain, legitimate restrictions are the price franchisees pay for the benefits of the franchise. It is important to remember that the franchisor has legitimate and important interests in how the franchise is run, marketability of further franchises not the least among them.

[3] These restrictions are still in place and are unaffected by this Court's instant ruling.

[4] However, this Court finds that Defendants have a colorable argument and for this reason this Court declines to award Plaintiff attorneys fees.

[5] Defendants argument that no conflicts with consumer protection laws have thus far developed is spurious. The law is the law. Not having been found to have broken any laws, yet, is not synonymous with adhering to the law. This Court will not endorse a catch-me-if-you-can theory of legal reasoning.

[6] The 84 days of free discounting could not be consecutive. The discounting is limited to 21 days in any three month period.

In evaluating a claim to determine whether it adequately states a claim for relief, the court must accept the facts pleaded as true and construe them in a light most favorable to the claimant. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b). A motion to dismiss may not be granted unless it appears beyond a reasonable doubt that no relief could be granted under any set of facts that could be proved consistent with the allegations.

HN2[] Heightened Pleading Requirements, Fraud Claims

Notice pleading is all that is necessary for a valid claim. The system of notice pleading set up by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires that a claim include only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) means that a claimant need only give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. The rule does not require a claimant to set out in detail the facts upon which he bases his claim. Moreover, this liberal system of notice pleading applies to all causes of action unless otherwise specified in the rules, such as the particularity requirement imposed by Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) for averments of fraud or mistake.

HN3[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

It is no longer open to question that Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) applies in full force to antitrust actions. Courts may no longer demand as they did in the past, out of a perceived danger of abuse of the antitrust laws, that a claimant provide a detailed pleading beyond the general notice requirements of Rule 8(a)(2). Nevertheless, the liberal pleading requirements of the federal rules do not negate the need to plead sufficient facts so that each element of the alleged antitrust violation can be identified. An antitrust complaint must comprehend a so-called prima facie case. Moreover, conclusory allegations of antitrust violations will not survive a motion to dismiss if not supported by facts constituting a legitimate claim for relief. The alleged facts, however, need not be spelled out with exactitude, nor must recovery appear imminent.

HN4[] Antitrust & Trade Law, Sherman Act

In testing an antitrust claim under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), a court should be very circumspect in applying substantive legal rules to market conditions based on a factually undeveloped record. Legal presumptions that rest on formalistic distinctions rather than actual market realities are generally disfavored in antitrust law. Courts should resolve antitrust claims on a case-by-case basis, focusing on the particular facts disclosed by the record, that is, after the court has examined closely the economic reality of the market at issue. Generally, unless the court can conclude beyond a doubt--after applying an economic approach which is not subject to serious question and which, if possible, has a sound empirical basis--that the complainant's underlying theory is economically senseless, the complainant should be allowed to proceed with factual development, including expert testimony regarding the economic reality of the market at issue.

To recover under § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, a plaintiff must establish three elements. It must show that the defendants (1) entered into a contract, combination or conspiracy, which was (2) in restraint of trade or commerce. The plaintiff must further show (3) that it was damaged by the violation, thereby entitling it to treble damages under § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15(a). To invoke the jurisdiction of the Sherman Act, a claimant must show (1) that the local activity has a (2) substantial effect on (3) interstate commerce. Because the antitrust laws are concerned primarily with the integrity of interstate markets, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit requires that a determination of Sherman Act jurisdiction focus on the interstate markets involved in the defendant's business activities.

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, does not prohibit independent business decisions and actions; it addresses concerted action and therefore requires some agreement, express or implied, between two or more persons. The first inquiry in any § 1 claim, then, is to locate the agreement that restrains trade.

HN9[] Higher Education & Professional Associations, Colleges & Universities

The Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, does not prohibit all agreements that restrain trade or commerce. The section is understood to prohibit only those that impose "unreasonable restraints" on trade. Certain agreements subject to § 1 have been held to be per se illegal, meaning that no demonstration of an unreasonable restraint on competition is required. Other types of agreements, such as "exclusive dealing" arrangements, are subject to a "rule of reason" analysis.

HN10[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

Under the rule of reason, a restraint is considered unreasonable if it has an adverse impact on competition and cannot be justified as a procompetitive measure. Thus, proof of actual competitive injury or anti-competitive effect is required to establish an unreasonable restraint of trade. This sort of arrangement, referred to as exclusive dealing, does not give rise to antitrust liability without proof of actual competitive injury. Implicit in the freedom to deal exclusively with one merchant, of course, is the freedom to refuse to deal with a competitor of that merchant.

HN11[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason

In determining whether there has been an unreasonable restraint of trade, the factfinder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition. The circumstances to be considered include the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied, its condition before and after the restraint was imposed, the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable, they also include the history of the restraint, the evil believed to exist, the reason for adopting the particular remedy, the purpose or end sought to be attained.

HN12[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

In determining whether a vertical exclusive dealing arrangement between a supplier and an operator has resulted in an impermissible restraint of trade among cable operators in a local market, the focus of the court should be on "consumer welfare." The court must determine whether the restraint has had a substantial adverse effect on consumer welfare by eliminating an important source of competitive pressure on price. To do this, the court must examine competition and market power in not only the local market of cable operators--called the "intrabrand" market--but also in the broader market of cable program suppliers--called the "interbrand" market. This is true because, without market power at the interbrand level, a supplier's refusal to deal with a distributor or operator in the intrabrand market would not allow either the supplier or operator to set prices unaffected by a competitive market and thus create an overall anti-competitive effect.

HN13[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

To mount a successful challenge to an exclusive dealing agreement between a program supplier and a cable television operator, a claimant must establish not only that there is a diminution or elimination of competition in the intrabrand market but also that the supplier has sufficient power to restrain trade in the interbrand market.

HN14[] Regulated Industries, Communications

The first step in determining whether competition has been foreclosed at the intrabrand level and whether a supplier has sufficient market power to restrain trade in the interbrand market is to identify the relevant markets, both the interbrand and intrabrand. An antitrust policy divorced from market considerations would lack any objective benchmarks. A relevant market is defined generally as the area of effective competition. The outer boundaries of a relevant market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it. Within a broad market, there may also exist well-defined submarkets, which in, themselves, constitute markets for antitrust exclusive dealing purposes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > General Overview

HN15[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

In exclusive dealing questions, the boundaries of a submarket are determined by a number of factors. These include: industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity; the product's peculiar characteristics and uses; unique production facilities; distinct customers; distinct prices; sensitivity to price changes; and specialized vendors. Thus, if a product is specially designed for a distinct group of purchasers, and there is an almost exclusive concentration of efforts on those purchasers, the relevant market for antitrust purposes may be limited to the sale of that product to those purchasers. Similarly, where one product is distinct from another because of its salability to customers, the relevant market can consist solely of that product.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing > General Overview

HN16[] Regulated Practices, Market Definition

Market power is the ability to raise price significantly above the competitive level without losing a substantial portion of one's business. Because market power is conceptually difficult to define in any given case, two criteria are used to measure it: (1) market share and (2) product differentiation. Market share is used as an indicator of market power because it relates directly to a supplier's ability to affect competition. Product differentiation is examined because where it exists, a company will have additional freedom to raise the price of its product above that of competing brands while still retaining a substantial portion of its business. Thus, where there is strong product differentiation, significant market power may exist without market dominance.

HN17[] Exclusive & Reciprocal Dealing, Exclusive Dealing

After it is shown that competition in the intrabrand market has been reduced or eliminated and that a supplier has interbrand market power, it is then necessary to determine whether the vertical restraint or exclusive dealing agreement has an overall actual anti-competitive effect or purpose, that is, has eliminated or significantly diminished an important source of competitive pressure on price and thus has had a substantial adverse effect on consumer welfare. This determination is accomplished through a systematic comparison of any negative effects with any positive effects, that is, the negative effects of the restraint on both intrabrand and interbrand competition with any positive, that is, pro-competitive, effects on the interbrand market stemming from the restraint.

Under some circumstances a trade restriction has the potential simultaneously to reduce intrabrand competition and to stimulate interbrand competition. Possible pro-competitive effects on interbrand competition that might stem from an intrabrand restriction include increased market access for the cable supplier, increased consumer services by the distributor, and enhanced product safety and quality. When the sellers of services are numerous and mobile, and the number of buyers is large, exclusive-dealing arrangements of narrow scope pose no threat of adverse economic consequences. To the contrary, they may be substantially pro-competitive by ensuring stable markets and encouraging long-term, mutually advantageous business relationships.

HN19[] Regulated Industries, Communications

Where a cable supplier has considerable market power in the interbrand market, a distribution restriction may reduce intrabrand competition without stimulating interbrand competition. If a particular brand or product is powerful because of a lack of adequate alternative brands, the imposition of a trade restraint may serve to increase a supplier's and an operator's market power and competitive advantage. In such situations, interbrand competition--or the absence thereof--fails to act as a significant check on the exploitation of intrabrand market power. The supplier and the operator may set prices and provide services in the intrabrand market unaffected by market competition and thus adverse to consumer welfare.

Under the law of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, if a supplier has considerable market power, a reduction or elimination of intrabrand competition alone may be sufficient to show that a trade restraint has an anti-competitive effect.

HN21[] Sherman Act, Claims

In determining whether a vertical restraint on trade--that is, a exclusive dealing arrangement--is unreasonable in the cable television industry, it is necessary to analyze first the effect of the intrabrand restraints on consumer welfare, in light of the interbrand market structure, and then look to any possible pro-competitive effects on interbrand competition. A complainant need not show, however, an actual restraint on competition at the interbrand level to establish a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. Rather, in the Eleventh Circuit, the focus for the court is whether competition at the interbrand level adequately checks the exploitation of intrabrand market power.

There is no magic unique to the terms "contract, combination, or conspiracy" as used in the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. Rather, the terms are used interchangeably to describe the requisite agreement between two or more persons to restrain trade, and courts sometimes simply refer instead to an "agreement."

The right to refuse to deal with those whom a company chooses is not absolute and exists only if there are legitimate competitive reasons for refusal. Sellers do not have an antitrust carte blanche to select those with whom they will deal, a refusal to deal becomes unlawful when it produces an unreasonable restraint on trade, i.e., if there is an anticompetitive purpose or effect in selecting those with whom one will deal. A refusal to deal, may not be used as a device to achieve some anticompetitive goal such as to acquire a monopoly or to establish market dominance and drive out existing competitors or to increase the seller's own market dominance.

In some instances, one brand of a product can constitute a separate market for antitrust purposes. That is, a company's own particular product can be a relevant market under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. The relevant market for antitrust purposes is determined by the choices available to consumers. If there are no substitutes available, then a single brand of a product can be a proper market.

HN27[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Vertical Restraints

Although intrabrand restraints are often imposed by and for the benefit of suppliers or manufacturers, in some instances, distributors or dealers seek to have restraints imposed upon them by their supplier or manufacturer. Such arrangements are desired to restrict intrabrand competition and enhance distributor power by promoting excess prices and profits. In such cases, the supplier or manufacturer participates merely as the enforcement agent in furthering the distributor's anti-competitive conduct. Suppliers will agree to such restraints to appease dealer interests in excess profits or the quiet life. Although a supplier is often induced to accommodate distributor interests where a dealer cartel has been formed, an individually powerful dealer or distributor may also be able to coerce a supplier to restrict distribution. Because distribution restrictions are coerced from suppliers to further the monopolistic desires of a dealer, it is widely agreed that such restraints are anti-competitive and illegal.

The most obvious circumstance in which an individual dealer is able to coerce a limitation on intrabrand competition is where the dealer possesses something approaching monopoly power in the relevant market. But a "dominant" dealer's request for a restraint might coerce a manufacturer in the same way. Dominance for this purpose is generally indicated by a distributor who has 30-50 percent of a manufacturer's local or total sales.

The offense of monopoly under § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, has two elements: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business, acumen, or historic accident.

HN31[] Scope, Monopolization Offenses

To establish the offense of attempted monopolization under § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, it is necessary to prove (1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power. Furthermore, as with the offense of monopolization, the attempt must occur in a defined relevant market. Thus, to demonstrate the dangerous probability of monopolization in an attempt case, it is also necessary to inquire into the relevant market and the defendant's economic power in that market.

The offense of conspiracy to monopolize under § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, requires: (1) concerted action deliberately entered into with the specific intent of achieving a monopoly; and (2) the commission of at least one overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy. Thus, a § 1 Sherman Act claim, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, and a § 2 conspiracy to monopolize claim require the same threshold showing--the existence of an agreement to restrain trade. Once this showing is made, then it must be established that the conspiracy was formed with the specific intent to obtain or maintain a monopoly.

To prevail on a motion to dismiss under *Fed. R. Civ. A claimant who posits a reasonable motive, even if there are other reasonable but contrary motives, should be allowed to survive a motion to dismiss and produce evidence of the true motive.

Several cable television companies initially brought this lawsuit against defendant City of Montgomery, Alabama, challenging the legality of two municipal ordinances. The plaintiffs -- Storer Cable Communications, Inc., ESPN, Inc., Satellite Services, Inc., and Turner Network Television, Inc. -- contended that the ordinances violated a number of federal constitutional provisions and statutes, as well as Alabama law. Montgomery Cablevision Entertainment, Inc., a new local cable television operator in Montgomery, intervened as a defendant and filed a counterclaim against the plaintiffs and Tele-Communications, Inc., Turner Broadcasting Systems, Inc., and Turner Cable Network Sales, Inc. As the counterclaim plaintiff, Montgomery Cablevision charges these counterclaim defendants with violating the following [2] federal, state, and municipal antitrust laws: §§ 1 & 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1, 2; 1975 Ala. Code § 6-5-60; Alabama state common law governing monopolies; and City of Montgomery Ordinance 48-90 §§ 3, 4. The cable company also charges the counterclaim defendants with the state-law tort of intentional interference with business relations. Montgomery Cablevision seeks declaratory and injunctive relief and treble damages pursuant [*1345] to § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 15(a). [1]

On October 9, 1992, this court entered an order regarding the validity of the two municipal ordinances. The court found that federal law preempted certain aspects of the ordinances, but declared [3] the ordinances to be valid in other respects. See Storer Cable Communications, Inc. v. City of Montgomery, 806 F. Supp. 1518 (M.D. Ala. 1992) (Thompson, J.). This cause is again before the court, this time on motions to dismiss filed pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure by the counterclaim defendants. They contend that Montgomery Cablevision has failed "to state a claim upon which relief can be granted" in its counterclaim. Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). For the reasons that follow, the court concludes that the motions to dismiss should be denied.

I. BACKGROUND

The allegations of Montgomery Cablevision's counterclaim are as follows. The production, transmission, distribution, and sale of cable television programming is a major industry in the United States, grossing billions of dollars in annual sales. This industry affects interstate commerce, and the parties involved in this litigation transact business in interstate commerce.

Cable television programming is produced by "program suppliers" or "programming services," such as Turner Network and ESPN, who develop and produce a variety of television programs. Program suppliers [4] contract with distributors, such as Satellite Services, to distribute their programs to cable television "exhibitors" or "operators," who own local cable television systems. Cable television operators, such as Storer Cable, Montgomery Cablevision, and Tele-Communications, receive the programming by satellite and exhibit the programming to subscribers on local cable television systems for a monthly fee in particular service areas. The provision of programming to subscribers is often referred to as "retail cable sales."

According to Montgomery Cablevision, most local markets for cable television service in the United States are de facto monopolies. Because the market for retail sales of cable television is a capital intensive industry, there are substantial barriers to entry into the market. Moreover, "overbuilders," or new entrants into local cable services markets, have had to face a variety of anti-competitive practices by incumbent monopolists intent on foreclosing markets to the newly franchised cable operators. [2] For example, existing local operators secure exclusive dealing contracts with program suppliers to shut new competitors out of programming critical to their ability [5] to compete with the incumbent cable franchise. In some cases, these exclusive dealing contracts are carried out by a program supplier who is vertically integrated with a local cable system operator or who has ownership or managerial interests in it.

In 1990, Montgomery Cablevision was awarded a new franchise by the City of Montgomery to provide cable television services to subscribers in the Montgomery area. It is currently in the start-up phase of providing such services and intends to compete directly with Storer Cable, which has been providing cable television services to subscribers in the Montgomery area since 1976. Montgomery Cablevision plans to offer consumers more channels, superior picture quality, more responsive customer service, and competitive prices in the retail cable television services market. [3] [6] Before Montgomery Cablevision received its franchise in 1990, Storer Cable was the only cable television company operating in the Montgomery area. Storer Cable currently provides service to 92% of the homes in the Montgomery area that subscribe to cable television.

[1] Jurisdiction is premised on the following: 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 15, 26; 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1331, 1337; and the doctrine of supplemental jurisdiction, 28 U.S.C.A. § 1367.

[2] The term "overbuilder" refers to a cable television operator who enters an area already served by an existing local cable operator and who must build over the operations of the incumbent franchisee.

[*1346] To begin providing competitive cable services, Montgomery Cablevision has acquired property and equipment, built and installed a receiving station, contracted for system mapping, design, and engineering, hired and trained sales people, placed advertisements, and begun selling subscriptions in certain areas of Montgomery. It has also attempted to secure long-term contracts with suppliers of attractive and competitive cable programs. For example, in May 1990, Montgomery Cablevision approached Turner Cable Network Sales, a company engaged in the business of programming sales, to request an affiliation contract to carry the Turner Network program [7] service. Turner Network, a cable television program supplier, produces a television program service consisting of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer ("MGM") movies, dramatic shows, situation comedies, game shows, special children's programming, entertainment programming, and sports programs, including National Football League ("NFL") games and National Basketball Association ("NBA") playoff games. [4] [8] Later that month, Turner Cable Network Sales informed Montgomery Cablevision that it would not sell the Turner Network program service to the cable company. In August 1990, Montgomery Cablevision made a second request for a contract to carry the Turner Network program service, which was again denied. On or about the time that Montgomery Cablevision requested a contract to carry the Turner Network program service, Storer Cable entered into an exclusive contract for it. The Turner companies are allegedly vertically integrated with Storer Cable or otherwise financially or managerially related or affiliated with it. [5]

In May 1990, Montgomery Cablevision requested an affiliation contract also from ESPN to carry ESPN's NFL Football Package. This package consists of three preseason NFL games, eight regular season Sunday night NFL games, and the post-season Pro Bowl. ESPN refused to sell its NFL package to Montgomery Cablevision. In August 1990, Montgomery Cablevision again requested the NFL package from ESPN, which was again denied. At the same time, Storer Cable received an affiliate contract for the NFL package from ESPN. Moreover, Storer Cable entered into an exclusive contract with ESPN, which provided that none of Storer Cable's competitors in the Montgomery area would receive ESPN's football package.

According to Montgomery Cablevision, ESPN's football programming and the Turner Network program service -- in particular, [9] the Sunday night NFL games -- are demanded or desired by a substantial number of current and potential cable subscribers in the Montgomery area. Moreover, this particular programming is not available from any other cable programming source. Montgomery Cablevision maintains that, because of the exclusive contracts, it has been placed at a competitive disadvantage with regard to Storer Cable, which is able to offer this highly desirable programming to its customers. It has encountered substantial difficulty in signing up subscribers and obtaining financing; it has also suffered a reduction in the value of its business exceeding three million dollars. [6]

[3] This market is also referred to as the "retail cable sales market" or the "multi-channel video services market."

[4] Montgomery Cablevision alleges that both Turner Cable Network Sales and Turner Network are wholly-owned subsidiaries of Turner Broadcasting Systems, Inc., which is engaged in the business of producing and distributing cable television programming.

[5] Montgomery Cablevision also alleges that Tele-Communications, the largest cable television operator in the United States, and Satellite Services, a cable television program distributor, are vertically integrated with Storer Cable or otherwise financially or managerially related to it.

[6] Montgomery Cablevision also alleges that its franchise from the City of Montgomery requires it to build over 200 miles per year over a five-year period with penalties of $ 250,000 per year for failure to meet that goal. The denial of the Turner Network program service and ESPN's football package jeopardizes its ability to meet its franchise requirements.

Montgomery [10] Cablevision contends that not only has it suffered injuries but the exclusive dealing arrangements among the counterclaim defendants have hindered and restrained competition among cable operators in the Montgomery market in price, service, quality of transmission and facilities, and cable programming, in violation of federal, state, and municipal antitrust law. Montgomery [*1347] Cablevision also maintains that Storer Cable entered into the exclusive contracts with Turner Network and ESPN with the specific intent and purpose of protecting its monopoly on the provision of cable television services in the Montgomery area and of foreclosing competition in this area, also in violation of federal, state, and municipal antitrust law. Montgomery Cablevision further contends that, by agreeing to these exclusive contracts for programming, the counterclaim defendants who are cable television program suppliers and distributors -- that is, Tele-Communications, Satellite Services, the Turner companies, and ESPN -- have assisted Storer Cable in its efforts to monopolize the Montgomery market for cable television services and to restrain competition. Finally, Montgomery Cablevision charges the counterclaim [11] defendants with intentional interference with business relations; it contends that it has "initiated or commenced business relationships both with individuals who have subscribed or wish to subscribe" to Montgomery Cablevision's services and that the exclusive dealing arrangements among the counterclaim defendants were "intended to disrupt and did disrupt these relationships."

II. STANDARD FOR MOTION TO DISMISS

The counterclaim defendants contend that Montgomery Cablevision's counterclaim fails to allege sufficient facts to state a claim under federal, state, or municipal antitrust law. They also maintain that Montgomery Cablevision has failed to state a claim for intentional interference with business relations. Consequently, they contend that Montgomery Cablevision's entire counterclaim should be dismissed pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

HN1[] In evaluating a claim to determine whether it adequately states a claim for relief, the court must accept the facts pleaded as true and construe them in a light most favorable to the claimant. Brower v. County of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593, 598, 109 S. Ct. 1378, 1382, 103 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1989); [12] Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b). A motion to dismiss may not be granted unless it appears beyond a reasonable doubt that "no relief could be granted under any set of facts that could be proved consistent with the allegations." Hishon v. King & Spalding, 467 U.S. 69, 73, 104 S. Ct. 2229, 2232, 81 L. Ed. 2d 59 (1984)); accord Luckey v. Harris, 860 F.2d 1012, 1016 (11th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 957, 110 S. Ct. 2562, 109 L. Ed. 2d 744 (1990).

It is also well-settled that HN2[] notice pleading is all that is necessary for a valid claim. The system of notice pleading set up by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires that a claim include only "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). As the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed, this rule means that a claimant need only "give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests." Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, U.S. , , 113 S. Ct. 1160, 1163, 122 L. Ed. 2d 517 (1993) (quoting [13] Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47, 78 S. Ct. 99, 103, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957)). The rule "does not require a claimant to set out in detail the facts upon which he bases his claim." Id. Moreover, this "liberal system of 'notice pleading'" applies to all causes of action unless otherwise specified in the rules, such as the particularity requirement imposed by Rule 9(b) for averments of fraud or mistake. Id. The Supreme Court explained that "Perhaps if Rules 8 and 9 were rewritten today, [other] claims . . . might be subjected to the added specificity requirement of Rule 9(b)." Id. "But that is a result which must be obtained by the process of amending the Federal Rules, and not by judicial interpretation," the Court continued. Id. "In the absence of such an amendment, federal courts and litigants must rely on summary judgment and control of discovery to weed out unmeritorious claims sooner rather than later." Id.

In the wake of the Supreme Court's reaffirmation and admonition in Leatherman that the liberal pleading requirements of the Federal Rules apply to all causes of action unless otherwise specified in the rules, HN3[] it is no longer [14] open to question that Rule 8(a)(2) applies in full force to antitrust [*1348] actions. Courts may no longer demand as they did in the past, out of a perceived "danger of abuse of the antitrust laws," that a claimant provide a "detailed pleading beyond the general notice requirements of rule 8(a)(2)." Quality Foods de Centro America, S.A. v. Latin American Agribusiness Development Corp., 711 F.2d 989, 995 (11th Cir. 1983). Nevertheless, the liberal pleading requirements of the Federal Rules do not negate the need to plead sufficient facts so that each element of the alleged antitrust violation can be identified. Municipal Util. Bd. v. Alabama Power Co., 934 F.2d 1493, 1501 (11th Cir. 1991). An antitrust complaint "must comprehend a so-called prima facie case." Quality Foods, 711 F.2d at 995 (citation omitted). Moreover, conclusory allegations of antitrust violations will not survive a motion to dismiss "if not supported by facts constituting a legitimate claim for relief." Municipal Util. Bd., 934 F.2d at 1501 (citation omitted). The alleged facts, however, "need not be spelled [15] out with exactitude, nor must recovery appear imminent." Id.

Finally, HN4[] in testing an antitrust under Rule 12(b)(6), a court should be very circumspect in applying "substantive legal rules" to market conditions based on a factually undeveloped record. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Serv., Inc., 498 U.S. 1080, , 112 L. Ed. 2d 1037, 111 S. Ct. 949, (1992). As the Supreme Court recently cautioned, "Legal presumptions that rest on formalistic distinctions rather than actual market realities are generally disfavored in antitrust law." Id. Courts should "resolve antitrust claims on a case-by-case basis, focusing on the 'particular facts disclosed by the record,'" id. (quoting Maple Flooring Mfrs. Ass'n v. United States, 268 U.S. 563, 579, 45 S. Ct. 578, 583, 69 L. Ed. 1093 (1925)), that is, after the court "has examined closely the economic reality of the market at issue." Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2082. Generally, unless the court can conclude beyond a doubt -- after applying an economic approach which is not subject to serious question and which, if possible, has a sound empirical basis [16] -- that the complainant's underlying theory is "economically senseless," id. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2083, the complainant should be allowed to proceed with factual development, including expert testimony regarding the "economic reality of the market at issue."

III. SECTION ONE OF THE SHERMAN ACT

As stated, Montgomery Cablevision claims that the exclusive dealing arrangements among the counterclaim defendants have hindered and restrained competition among cable operators in the Montgomery area market. The cable company charges the counterclaim defendants with violating § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 1, and seeks treble damages under § 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 15(a). [7]

[17] 15 U.S.C.A. § 1. Section 4 of the Clayton Act provides in pertinent part:

> HN6[] "Any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws . . . shall recover threefold the damages by him sustained."

15 U.S.C.A. § 15(a).

A. Elements

HN7[] To recover under § 1 of the Sherman Act, Montgomery Cablevision must establish three elements. It must show that the counterclaim defendants (1) entered into "a contract, combination or conspiracy," which was (2) "in restraint of trade or commerce." 15 U.S.C.A. § 1. The cable company must further show (3) that it was damaged by the violation, thereby entitling it to treble damages under § 4 of the Clayton Act. Orval Sheppard Real Estate Co., Inc. v. Valinda Freed & Assoc., Inc., 608 F. Supp. 354, 357 (M.D. Ala. 1985) (Thompson, J.), aff'd 800 F.2d 265 (11th Cir. 1986) (Table). [8]

> HN5[] "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal."

[8] To invoke the jurisdiction of the Sherman Act, a claimant must show "(1) that the local activity has a (2) substantial effect on (3) interstate commerce." El Shahawy v. Harrison, 778 F.2d 636, 639 (11th Cir. 1985). Because "the antitrust laws are concerned primarily with the integrity of interstate markets," the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals requires that a determination of Sherman Act Jurisdiction "focus on the interstate markets involved in the defendant's business activities." Id. at 640 (citation omitted). In this case, Montgomery Cablevision has sufficiently alleged that the counterclaim defendants are substantially involved in interstate commerce to meet the jurisdictional requirement of the Sherman Act. See id. at 641.

Div., 932 F.2d 1384, 1388 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 116 L. Ed. 2d 279, U.S. , 112 S. Ct. 339 (1991). Section 1 addresses concerted action and therefore requires some agreement, express or implied, between two or more persons. Monsanto Co., 465 U.S. at 761, 104 S. Ct. at 1469. The first inquiry in any § 1 claim, then, is to locate the agreement that restrains trade. Tidmore Oil, 932 F.2d at 1388.

As to the second element, § 1 of the Sherman Act HN9[] does not prohibit all agreements that restrain trade or commerce. The section is understood to prohibit only those that impose "unreasonable restraints" on trade. NCAA v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 98, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 2959, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984). Accord Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d 1438, 1455 (11th Cir. 1991). [19] Certain agreements subject to § 1 have been held to be per se illegal, meaning that no demonstration of an unreasonable restraint on competition is required. Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 768, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 2740, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984). Itek Corp., 717 F.2d 1560, 1566 n. 7 (11th Cir. 1983).

Jerrico, Inc., 924 F.2d 1555, 1569 (11th Cir. 1991). [20] Thus, proof of actual competitive injury or anti-competitive effect is required to establish an unreasonable restraint of trade. [10] As the court of appeals explained in Constr. Aggregate Transp.:

> "This sort of arrangement, referred to as 'exclusive dealing,' does not give rise to antitrust liability without proof of actual competitive injury. Implicit in the freedom to deal exclusively with one merchant, of course, is the freedom to refuse to deal with a competitor of that merchant."

[21] HN11[] In determining whether there has been an unreasonable restraint of trade, the factfinder "weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition." Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 49, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 2557, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977). The circumstances to be considered include "the facts peculiar to the business to which the restraint is applied[,] its condition before and after the restraint was imposed[,] the nature of the restraint and its effect, actual or probable," Bd. of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238, 38 S. Ct. 242, 244, 62 L. market power at the interbrand level, a supplier's refusal to deal with a distributor or operator in the intrabrand market would not allow either the supplier or operator to set prices unaffected by a competitive market and thus create an overall anti-competitive effect. Id. As then Professor, now Judge, Richard Posner has explained, the rationale for assessing the market power of a supplier in antitrust analysis is that:

> "The absence of market power in the interbrand market implies that the defendant is in competition with firms that [23] sell products regarded by the consumer as close substitutes for the defendant's. The defendant therefore will lose most or all of its sales if its retail price exceeds its competitors' retail price for any reason, including a lack of intrabrand competition that drives its costs of distribution up . . . . If a firm lacks market power, it cannot affect the price of its product; that price is determined by the market."

Richard A. Posner, The Next Step in the Antitrust Treatment of Restricted Distribution: Per Se Legality, 48 U. Chi. L. Rev. 6, 16 (1981). Or to put it another way, "when interbrand competition exists . . . it provides a significant check on the exploitation of intrabrand market power because of the ability of consumers to substitute a different brand of the same product." Continental T.V., 433 U.S. at 52 n.19, 97 S. Ct. at 2558 n.19. Therefore, HN13[] to mount a successful challenge to an exclusive dealing agreement between a program supplier and a cable television operator, a claimant must establish not only that there is a diminution or elimination of competition in the intrabrand market but also [24] that the supplier has sufficient power to restrain trade in the interbrand market.

HN14[] The first step in determining whether competition has been foreclosed at the intrabrand level and whether a supplier has sufficient market power to restrain trade in the interbrand market is to identify the relevant markets, both the interbrand and intrabrand. As the Supreme Court explained in Continental T.V., "an antitrust policy divorced from market considerations would lack [25] any objective benchmarks." 433 U.S. at 53 n.21, 97 S. Ct. at 2559 n.21. A relevant market is defined generally as "the area of effective competition," Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 324, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 1523, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962) (citation omitted). The outer boundaries of a relevant market are determined by "the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it." Id. (quoting Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 325-26, 82 S. Ct. at 1523-24). [12] Within a broad market, there may also exist well-defined submarkets, which in, themselves, constitute markets for antitrust purposes. Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 325, 82 S. Ct. at 1524. See also Fineman v. Armstrong World Indus. Inc., 980 F.2d 171, 199 (3rd Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 122 L. Ed. 2d 677, U.S. , 113 S. Ct. 1285 (1993); T. Harris Young, 931 F.2d at 824; L.A. Draper & Son, 735 F.2d at 423. [26] HN15[] The boundaries of a submarket are determined by a number of factors. [*1351] These include: industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity; the product's peculiar characteristics and uses; unique production facilities; distinct customers; distinct prices; sensitivity to price changes; and specialized vendors. Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 325, 82 S. Ct. at 1524; T. Harris Young, 931 F.2d at 824. Thus, if a product is specially designed for a distinct group of purchasers, and there is an almost exclusive concentration of efforts on those purchasers, the relevant market for antitrust purposes may be limited to the sale of that product to those purchasers. See, e.g., Heatransfer Corp. v. Volkswagenwerk, A.G., 553 F.2d 964, 980-81 (5th Cir. 1977) (relevant market consisted of sale of air conditioners for only Volkswagen, Porsche, and Audi automobiles, rather than sale of air conditioners for all automobiles), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1087, 98 S. Ct. 1282, 55 L. Ed. 2d 792 (1978). Similarly, where one product is distinct from another [27] because of its salability to customers, the relevant market can consist solely of that product. See, e.g., Int'l Boxing Club of New York, Inc. v. United States, 358 U.S. 242, 250-52, 79 S. Ct. 245, 250-51, 3 L. Ed. 2d 270 (1959) (because of high salability of championship boxing contests, as opposed to non-championship fights, relevant market consisted of only championship boxing contests).

[11] Generally, interbrand competition is defined as competition among suppliers or manufacturers of the same generic product, while intrabrand competition is the competition between distributors -- wholesale or retail -- of the product of a particular supplier or manufacturer. Continental T.V., 433 U.S. at 52 n.19, 97 S. Ct. at 2558 n.19. In the cable industry, interbrand competition would include competition among program suppliers, while intrabrand competition would occur among cable television operators.

[12] See also L.A. Draper & Son, 735 F.2d at 423 (the product dimension is determined by "the availability of substitutes to which consumers can turn in response to price increases and other existing or potential producer's ability to expand output").

Once the relevant markets are defined, a court then must determine whether there is a diminution or elimination of competition in the intrabrand market and whether the supplier has sufficient power to restrain trade in the interbrand market. The counterclaim alleges that Storer Cable provides cable television services to [28] 92% of the homes in the Montgomery area. With this allegation, the counterclaim raises a substantial factual allegation as to whether competition in the intrabrand market has been substantially reduced if not completely foreclosed. [13] Indeed, a 92% market share would be considered an indicator of monopoly power. See Eastman Kodak Co., U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2090 (80-95% of market is a monopoly); United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 571, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 1704, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966) (87% of the market is a monopoly). The critical question for the court, therefore, is whether Montgomery Cablevision has sufficiently alleged that the program suppliers have interbrand market power.

Market power is "the ability to raise price significantly above the competitive [29] level" without losing a substantial portion of one's business. Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1570. [14] [30] Because market power is conceptually difficult to define in any given case, two criteria are used to measure it: (1) market share and (2) product differentiation. Id. See also MHB Distrib., Inc. v. Parker Hannifin Corp., 800 F. Supp. 1265, 1270-71 (E.D. Pa. 1992). Market share is used as an indicator of market power because it relates directly to a supplier's ability to affect competition. Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1570. Product differentiation is examined because where it exists, "a company will have additional freedom to raise the price of its product above that of competing brands while still retaining a substantial portion of its business." Id. at 1570 n.15. [15] Thus, where there is strong product differentiation, significant market power may exist without market dominance. See 8 Phillip E. Areeda, Antitrust Law*: An Analysis of Antitrust Principles and Their Application* § 1604f at 60 (1989).

HN17[] After it is shown that competition in the intrabrand market has been reduced or eliminated and that a supplier has interbrand market power, it is then necessary to determine [*1352] whether the vertical restraint -- in this case, the exclusive dealing agreements -- has an overall actual anti-competitive effect or purpose, that is, has eliminated or significantly diminished an important source of competitive pressure on price and thus has had a substantial adverse effect on consumer welfare. This determination is accomplished through a systematic comparison of any negative effects with any positive effects, that is, the negative effects of the restraint on both intrabrand and interbrand competition with any positive, that is, pro-competitive, effects on the interbrand market stemming from the restraint. Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1571-1573. See also Muenster Butane, 651 F.2d at 296 [31] ("Comparison of the effects of any vertical restriction on intrabrand and interbrand competition is the critical analysis required"). This comparison is necessary because, as the Supreme Court explained in Continental T.V., HN18[] under some circumstances a trade restriction has the potential simultaneously to reduce intrabrand competition and to stimulate interbrand competition. 433 U.S. at 51-52, 97 S. Ct. at 2558. Possible pro-competitive effects on interbrand competition that might stem from an intrabrand restriction include increased market access for the supplier, increased consumer services by the distributor, and enhanced product safety and quality. See Continental T.V., 433 U.S. at 54-55, 97 S. Ct. at 2560; 8 Areeda, Antitrust Law § 1601 at 12-22. As Justice O'Connor has explained:

> "When the sellers of services are numerous and mobile, and the number of buyers is large, exclusive-dealing arrangements of narrow scope pose no threat of adverse economic consequences. To the contrary, they may > be substantially pro-competitive by ensuring stable markets and encouraging long-term, mutually [32] advantageous business relationships."

[14] Market power has also been defined as the power "to force a purchaser to do something that he would not do in a competitive market." Jefferson Parish Hospital Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 14, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 1559, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984). Market power, however, differs from monopoly power. The former requires less market influence. Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2090.

[15] Product differentiation may be based on styling, packaging, advertising, service and other non-price competition. See Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1570 n.15.

Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 45, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 1575-76, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984), (O'Connor, J. with whom Burger, C.J., and Powell and Rehnquist, JJ. join, concurring in judgment) (citation omitted).

On the other hand, HN19[] where, for example, a supplier has considerable market power in the interbrand market, a distribution restrict ion may reduce intrabrand competition without stimulating interbrand competition. If a particular brand or product is powerful because of a lack of adequate alternative brands, the imposition of a trade restraint may serve to increase a supplier's and an operator's market power and competitive advantage. See Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1571-73 & n.20. See also Peter M. Gerhart, The "Competitive Advantages" Explanation for Intrabrand Restraints: An Antitrust Analysis, 1981 Duke L.J. 417, 426-29 (1981). In such situations, interbrand competition -- or the absence thereof --fails to act as a significant check on the exploitation of intrabrand market power. Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1572 & n.20. [33] The supplier and the operator may set prices and provide services in the intrabrand market unaffected by market competition and thus adverse to consumer welfare.

The required systematic comparison of negative and positive effects of the distribution restraint on intrabrand and interbrand competition should not be understood, as suggested by the counterclaim defendants, to require the claimant to show that the restraint has had an actual anti-competitive effect on interbrand competition. As Judge Tjoflat has explained, "The argument, pressed . . . at length here, that the reduction or elimination of intrabrand competition is, by itself, never sufficient to show that a trade restraint is anti-competitive must rest, at bottom, on the view that intrabrand competition -- regardless of the circumstances -- is never a significant source of consumer welfare." Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1572 n.20. He responded that "This view is simply not supported by economic analysis, or by the cases." Id. He then explained that:

> "A seller with considerable market power in the interbrand market -- whether stemming from its dominant position in the market [34] structure or from the successful differentiation of its products -- will necessarily have some power over price. In that situation, intrabrand competition will be a significant source of consumer welfare because it alone can exert downward pressure [*1353] on the retail price at which the good is sold. Dealers, by competing against each other and bidding the retail price down, will in turn exert downward pressure on the seller's wholesale price in order to maintain their profit margins. Thus, in situations of manufacturer market power, intrabrand restrictions on distributor competition can have a substantial adverse effect on consumer welfare by eliminating an important source of competitive pressure on price. Rather than promoting nonprice competition, vertical restraints in this context may enable a manufacturer to retain monopoly profits arising from an interbrand competitive advantage."

Id. HN20[] Under the law of the Eleventh Circuit, therefore, if a supplier has considerable market power, a reduction or elimination of intrabrand competition alone may be sufficient to show that a trade restraint has an anti-competitive effect. Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1572 & n.20. [35] [16]

To summarize, HN21[] in determining whether a vertical restraint on trade -- that is, a exclusive dealing arrangement -- is unreasonable, it is necessary to analyze first the effect of the intrabrand restraints on consumer welfare, in light of the interbrand market structure, and then look to any possible pro-competitive effects on interbrand competition. Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1573. A complainant need not show, however, an actual restraint on competition at the interbrand level to establish a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Rather, in this circuit, the focus for [36] the court is whether competition at the interbrand level adequately checks the exploitation of intrabrand market power. [17]

[37] B. Application of Elements

The counterclaim defendants contend that the § 1 Sherman Act claim against them should be dismissed for several reasons. First, they maintain that Montgomery Cablevision has not properly alleged the existence of a contract, combination, or conspiracy. Second, they contend that the counterclaim does not sufficiently allege relevant markets. Finally, they maintain that the counterclaim fails to allege the requisite anti-competitive effect on trade.

First, the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has sufficiently alleged the existence of "a contract, combination . . ., or conspiracy" in restraint of trade. 15 U.S.C.A. § 1. Montgomery Cablevision contends that the conspiracy in this case centers on the exclusive dealing agreements between Storer Cable and Turner Network and between Storer Cable and ESPN. [18] Admittedly, [*1354] the counterclaim generally uses the terms "contract" or "agreement," rather than "conspiracy," to refer to the exclusive dealings arrangements among the counterclaim defendants. But as the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals has stated, HN22[] "there is no magic unique to each term." Tidmore Oil Co., Inc. v. BP Oil Co./Gulf Prod. Div., 932 F.2d 1384, 1388 [38] (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 116 L. Ed. 2d 279, U.S. , 112 S. Ct. 339 (1991). Rather, the terms are used interchangeably to describe the requisite agreement between two or more persons to restrain trade, Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d 1438, 1455 (11th Cir. 1991), and courts sometimes simply refer instead to an "agreement." Tidmore Oil, 932 F.2d at 1388.

There are numerous references to the exclusive dealing agreements throughout the counterclaim. Montgomery Cablevision alleges that "exclusive dealing contracts between programmers and existing local operators" are one [39] tactic that is used to shut out new competitors in the local cable services markets from programming critical to their ability to compete and offer comparable services. The cable company also states that Storer Cable is being provided "affiliate contracts" for the Turner Network program service and ESPN's football package, while Montgomery Cablevision has been denied these program services. Moreover, Montgomery Cablevision alleges that "Storer Cable agreed with ESPN to exclude competitors to Storer" from receiving the football programming and that there was an "agreement" to deny the Turner Network program service to Montgomery Cablevision. Finally, the cable company avers that the "exclusive agreements at issue" have caused injury to the competition.

As to the participants in the conspiracy, Montgomery Cablevision's counterclaim charges that Tele-Communications, Satellite Services, Turner Broadcasting Systems, Turner Network, Turner Cable Network Sales, and Storer Cable have "combined, agreed or conspired" to refuse to enter into a contract with Montgomery

[17] The Supreme Court's 1992 decision in Eastman Kodak does not undermine, and indeed could be said to support, this economic approach. There, the court was similarly confronted with the economic relationship between a "primary" market and a "derivative" market or "aftermarket," albeit within the context of an alleged tying arrangement. U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2076. The primary market was for a company's equipment and the aftermarkets were for that company's services and parts. The Court stated a economic truth equally applicable here, that "The extent to which one market prevents exploitation of another market depends on the extent to which consumers will change their consumption of one product in response to a price change in another, i.e., 'cross-elasticity of demand.'" Id. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2083. The court observed that "there is no immutable physical law -- no 'basic economic reality' -- insisting that competition in the equipment market cannot coexist with market power in the aftermarkets." Id. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2084. The court then concluded, after engaging in a complex economic analysis, that there could conceivably be an impermissible restraint on trade in the aftermarket even in the absence of market power in the primary market. In reaching this conclusion, the Court admonished courts to rely on "actual market realities" rather than "legal presumptions that rest on formalistic distinctions." Id. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2082.

[18] Although the counterclaim alleges that several of the counterclaim defendants "contracted, combined or acted alone" to refuse to sell the Turner Network program service to Montgomery Cablevision, Montgomery Cablevision does not intend to pursue a § 1 claim against any unilateral behavior. Nor does it intend to pursue a group boycott theory at this time.

Cablevision for the Turner Network program service. In support of this claim, Montgomery Cablevision alleges that it contacted [40] Turner Cable Network Sales about an affiliation contract for Turner Network and that Turner Cable Network Sales communicated the refusal to sell the program service to Montgomery Cablevision. Shortly after this communication, Storer Cable received an exclusive contract with the Turner Network. Montgomery Cablevision further contends that Turner Network and Turner Cable Network Sales are wholly-owned subsidiaries of Turner Broadcasting Systems. HN23[] For purposes of antitrust law, therefore, they are considered a single enterprise, with a unity of interest and purpose. Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 771-72 & n.18, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 2741-42 & n. 18, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628. Moreover, although a parent company cannot conspire or combine with its wholly-owned subsidiaries for antitrust purposes, id. at 769-71, 104 S. Ct. at 2740-41, a parent company and its subsidiaries can certainly conspire or agree with other parties for purposes of the antitrust laws. Based on the facts alleged in this case, it is plausible to infer that either Turner Network or Turner Cable Network Sales agreed with Storer Cable [41] to enter into an exclusive contract in restraint of trade. As to the participation of Tele-Communications and Satellite Services, they are alleged to be "vertically integrated or otherwise financially or managerially related or affiliated corporations" with Storer Cable.

The court thus finds that these facts and allegations provide sufficient and fair notice to the counterclaim defendants as to the nature of Montgomery Cablevision's claim that they have "combined, agreed or conspired" in restraint of trade and as to the basis upon which it relies.

The court further finds that Montgomery Cablevision has sufficiently identified relevant markets. Because there are two levels of competition at issue this case -- that is, the intrabrand and interbrand levels -- two relevant markets must be considered.

With regard to the intrabrand level of competition in this case, as noted previously, the counterclaim defendants have not put forward any serious dispute that the relevant [*1355] market is the retail cable television sales market in the Montgomery area. However, the parties hotly dispute how the market for interbrand competition should be defined.

Montgomery Cablevision contends that the [42] broadest relevant market at the interbrand level is the cable programming market. However, because of the highly differentiated content of cable programs, Montgomery Cablevision also suggests that there are a number of economically significant submarkets within the cable television programming market. Given the structure of the cable television industry, it maintains that the relevant markets at the interbrand level of competition might be as narrow as the markets for Sunday night NFL games, telecast exclusively on ESPN and the Turner Network, [19] and for the other "major television" or "cream" events to which the Turner Network holds exclusive rights. [20]

In response, the counterclaim defendants who operate at the interbrand level [43] of competition in this case -- that is, the program suppliers and distributors -- maintain that Montgomery Cablevision has alleged only that they have market power over their own products. They argue that the market cannot be defined by a defendant company's own product. The court, however, disagrees with this argument for two reasons. First, the counterclaim defendants appear to base this contention on the argument that a company does not violate the Sherman Act by virtue of the natural monopoly it holds over its own product and that it has a right to refuse to deal with those whom it chooses. But in Eastman Kodak, the Court noted that HN24[] this "right is not absolute" and "exists only if there are legitimate competitive reasons for refusal." U.S. at n. 32, 112 S. Ct. at 2091 n.32. Similarly, the former Fifth Circuit has written that "sellers do not have an antitrust carte blanche to select those with whom they will deal," Aladdin Oil Co. v. Texaco, Inc., 603 F.2d 1107, 1115 (5th Cir. 1979); "a refusal to deal becomes unlawful when it produces an unreasonable restraint on trade, i.e., if there is an anticompetitive purpose or effect in [44] selecting those with whom one will deal." Id. "A refusal to deal," the court continued, "may not be used as a device to achieve some anticompetitive goal such as to acquire a monopoly . . . or to establish market dominance and drive out existing competitors . . . or to increase the seller's own market dominance." Id. at 1115-16 (footnotes omitted).

[19] The rights to televise Sunday night NFL games are divided between Turner Network and ESPN. Each telecasts 8 games per season.

[20] These major television events include telecasts of certain NBA playoffs games and MGM movies that are carried exclusively on the Turner Network.

But second and more importantly, the Supreme Court recently held that, HN25[] in some instances, "one brand of a product can constitute a separate market" for antitrust purposes. Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2090. That is, a company's own particular product can be a relevant market under the Sherman Act. As the Court explained, "The relevant market for antitrust purposes is determined by the choices available to [consumers]." Id. If there are no substitutes available, then a single brand of a product can be a proper market. Id. Here, Montgomery Cablevision has alleged that there are no substitutes for the programming at issue in this suit. The counterclaim clearly states that ESPN's NFL football package and the Turner Network program service, consisting of major television [45] events such as NBA playoff games and MGM movies, "are not available from any other cable programming source and are widely demanded by cable consumers."

The counterclaim defendants, however, also contest Montgomery Cablevision's characterization of the relevant market at the interbrand level of competition in this case. They contend that it is neither the market of cable television programming nor the narrower markets of Sunday night NFL football and the special events programming available on the Turner Network. According to the counterclaim defendants, the proper market is the much broader market of passive visual entertainment, which includes programming for satellite television, video cassette recordings, and free over-the-air television. They further maintain that when this [*1356] broader market is considered, it is impossible for Montgomery Cablevision to prove that they have sufficient market power to foreclose market alternatives and to create an unreasonable restraint on trade.

The court, however, agrees with Montgomery Cablevision that, if the structure of the cable television industry is taken into account and the factors relating to submarkets are considered, see Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 325, 82 S. Ct. at 1524, [46] it might be possible to establish that the relevant market at the interbrand level of competition is no broader than the market for cable programming and might be as narrow as the markets for Sunday night NFL football and for the Turner Network. For example, in NCAA v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. 85, 112 n.49, 104 S. Ct. 2948, 2966 n.49, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70 (1984), the Supreme Court concluded that there was "no doubt that college football constitutes a separate market for which there is no reasonable substitute." This separate market was based on "generic qualities differentiating viewers," and on the "unique appeal of NCAA football telecasts" for consumers. Id. at 112 & n.49, 104 S. Ct. at 2966 & n.49 (citation omitted). Similarly, in Int'l Boxing Club of New York, Inc. v. United States, 358 U.S. 242, 249-252, 79 S. Ct. 245, 249-251, 3 L. Ed. 2d 270 (1959), the Court found that championship boxing events were uniquely attractive to fans; hence, they constituted a market separate from that for non-championship events. [21] See also United States v. Paramount Pictures, Inc., 334 U.S. 131, 172-73, 68 S. Ct. 915, 936, 92 L. Ed. 1260 (1948) [47] (first-run movies, the "cream" of the exhibition business, constituted distinct market for antitrust analysis); Syufy Enter. v. Am. Multicinema, Inc., 793 F.2d 990, 994-95 (9th Cir. 1986) (evidence supported finding that industry anticipated top-grossing films constituted market separate from exhibition of all other films), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1031, 107 S. Ct. 876, 93 L. Ed. 2d 830 (1987).

It is plausible to infer that factors similar to those [48] in NCAA v. Bd. of Regents and Int'l Boxing Club of New York could be established in this case. As noted above, the counterclaim alleges that ESPN's football programming and the Turner Network program service -- in particular, the Sunday night NFL games -- are "demanded or desired by a substantial number of current or potential cable subscribers in Montgomery," and that this particular

[21] The Court also noted:

> "Numerous representatives of the broadcasting, motion picture and advertising industries testified to the general effect that a 'particular and special demand exists among radio broadcasting and telecasting [and motion picture] companies for the rights to broadcast and telecast [and make and distribute films of] championship contests in contradistinction to similar rights to non-championship contests."

programming is "not available from any other cable programming source." Moreover, Montgomery Cablevision contends that it has "encountered substantial difficulty in signing up subscribers and obtaining financing" without this programming. These allegations indicate that Montgomery Cablevision may be able to prove that from the consumer's perspective -- whose interests the antitrust statutes were especially intended to serve [22] -- these highly popular programs are not interchangeable with other cable programs and that they are without substitutes. In other words, for consumers of these programs, there may be no comparable alternative programming available and thus no "cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it." T. Harris Young & Assoc., Inc. v. Marquette Elec., 931 F.2d 816, 824 [49] (11th Cir.) (quoting Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 325-36, 82 S. Ct. at 1523-24), cert. denied, 116 L. Ed. 2d 749, U.S. , 112 S. Ct. 658 (1991). [23] [50] Of course, the proper market definition in this case may be determined only after there has been a factual [*1357] inquiry into the "commercial realities" faced by consumers. Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2072 (quoting United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 572, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 1704, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966)). At this time, however, the court is satisfied that Montgomery Cablevision has pled sufficient facts indicating plausible relevant markets and has provided fair notice to the counterclaim defendants as to the nature of the markets at issue in this case. [24]

[51] Furthermore, if there are separate markets for Sunday night NFL football and for the major television events broadcast on the Turner Network, as Montgomery Cablevision contends, then it appears that Turner Network and ESPN would possess sufficient market power to foreclose market alternatives. Turner Network and ESPN between them control all the NFL games broadcast on Sunday night. Turner Network also has complete control over the major television events broadcast on its network, including certain NBA playoff games and MGM movies. HN26[] "When a product is controlled by one interest, without substitutes available in the market, there is monopoly power." *NCAA v. [25] [52] Thus, when submarkets and product differentiation are considered, it cannot be said that there is no set of facts that would show that the [23] In its brief in opposition to the motions to dismiss, Montgomery Cablevision also points out that the nature of the cable television industry, with its high channel capacity, is to reach a broad spectrum of targeted, specialized audiences through targeted, specialized programming. Consequently, there are numerous narrow programming submarkets that have "peculiar characteristics and uses," "distinct customers," and "specialized vendors." See Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 325, 82 S. Ct. at 1524.

[24] The cases cited by the counterclaim defendants to support their contention that the appropriate market for cable television services is the broader market of passive visual entertainment are not to the contrary. In those cases, the appropriate market for antitrust purposes was determined only after extensive fact-finding had been conducted. For example, in Cable Holdings of Georgia, Inc. v. Home Video, Inc., 825 F.2d 1559 (11th Cir. 1987), a jury, at the end of a trial, determined that the appropriate market for cable television services was passive visual entertainment, which included cable television, satellite television, video cassette recordings, and free over-the-air television. The appellate court upheld this finding as "not clearly erroneous." Id. at 1563. Similarly, in Satellite Television & Associated Resources, Inc. v. Continental Cablevision of Virginia, Inc., 714 F.2d 351 (4th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1027, 104 S. Ct. 1285, 79 L. Ed. 2d 688 (1984), a district court defined the relevant market in ruling on a motion for summary Judgment. The court concluded that the provision of cable television services in that particular case was part of the broader market of "cinema, broadcast television, video disks and cassettes, and other types of leisure and entertainment-related businesses." Id. at 355. This determination, however, was reached only after the parties stipulated that customers perceived cable television services to be "reasonably interchangeable" with the offerings of movie theaters and that the cable companies were in competition with the wide variety of entertainment services enumerated above.

[25] As the Court explained:

> "It inexorably follows that if college football broadcasts be defined as a separate market -- and we are convinced they are -- then the NCAA's complete control over those broadcasts provides a solid basis for the District Court's conclusion that the NCAA possesses market power with respect to those broadcasts."

NCAA v. Bd. of Regents, 468 U.S. at 112, 104 S. Ct. at 2966.

counterclaim defendants have sufficient market power in the relevant markets so as to foreclose market alternatives. [26]

iii.

Finally, the court concludes that Montgomery Cablevision's counterclaim sufficiently alleges an anti-competitive effect as a result of the exclusive [53] dealing arrangements among the counterclaim defendants. First, Montgomery Cablevision has alleged that competition in the intrabrand market -- that is, the market for cable television services -- is all but eliminated. The counterclaim states that Storer Cable provides cable television services to 92% of the homes in the Montgomery area. As previously indicated, a 92% market share would be considered an [*1358] indicator of monopoly power, not merely of market power. See Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2090. Montgomery Cablevision further alleges that the exclusive contracts granted to Storer Cable have had a negative effect on the intrabrand market in that they have reinforced Storer Cable's almost total market power. [27] The counter-claim specifically states that the denial of the Turner Network program service and ESPN's NFL package has unreasonably restrained competition in the Montgomery area market for retail cable television sales "by injuring the business and threatening the viability as a going concern of Storer Cable's only competitor": Montgomery Cablevision. The counterclaim goes on to allege that not only does this restraint harm Montgomery Cablevision, [54] but it also "threatens, hinders and restrains competition in price, service, quality of transmission and facilities, and cable programming in the Montgomery area market for multi-channel video services." In other words, Montgomery Cablevision contends that the exclusive agreements act as "overbuild protection." They ensure that a new cable television operator in a given franchise area cannot compete effectively and successfully with the incumbent cable franchisee. Consequently, they discourage and foreclose competition in the provision of cable television services and deny to consumers "intrabrand choices that are sources of consumer welfare." Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1571. See also Peter M. Gerhart, The "Competitive Advantages" Explanation for Intrabrand Restraints: An Antitrust Analysis, 1981 Duke L.J. 417, 439 (1981). [28]

[55] In fact, the counterclaim further alleges that, because "competition among programmers in the provision of programming content at issue is limited," the elimination of intrabrand competition has particularly pernicious effects on consumer welfare. Montgomery Cablevision maintains that, because of the market power of some of the counterclaim defendants at the interbrand level of competition -- that is, at the level of programming -- interbrand competition in this case "does not act as a significant check on the exploitation of intrabrand market power among providers of cable services in Montgomery." In other words, consumers are unable to substitute other products for the products that are unavailable to them. In instances where a supplier has considerable market power in the interbrand market, as Montgomery Cablevision alleges is the case here, substantial reduction or elimination of intrabrand competition alone may be sufficient to show that a trade restraint is anti-competitive and therefore unreasonable. Graphic Prod. Distrib., 717 F.2d at 1572 n.20. [29]

[26] This case therefore differs markedly from Futurevision Cable Systems of Wiggins, Inc. v. Multivision Cable TV Corp., 789 F. Supp. 760 (S.D. Miss. 1992), aff'd, 986 F.2d 1418 (5th Cir. 1993) (Table). There, the court dismissed a complaint brought by a new cable television company alleging that exclusive dealing arrangements between cable television programmers and an existing cable television operator violated the antitrust laws. However, no allegations were made regarding the market power of the programmers to foreclose market alternatives. Id. at 766-75. Moreover, comparable and competitive alternative programming appears to have been available. Id. at 769-70. It is also noteworthy, that in reaching its conclusions, the court in Futurevision did not consider the issue of submarkets nor product differentiation.

[27] This market is alternatively referred to as the market for "multi-channel video services."

[28] This litigation, therefore differs from Futurevision, 789 F. Supp. at 770, where the district court dismissed an anti-trust claim because of an absence of allegations that competition in provision of cable television services was adversely affected by exclusive contracts among programmers and incumbent franchisee.

[29] Contrast with Futurevision, 789 F. Supp. at 769, where the court found that interbrand competition acted as a check on the exploitation of intrabrand market power and that the effect of exclusive licenses on intrabrand competition was "insignificant."

[56] Montgomery Cablevision also contends that the exclusive contracts not only reduce intrabrand competition but they also have negative effects at the interbrand level of competition. The counterclaim alleges that, by discouraging and foreclosing competition among cable television operators, the contracts eliminate precisely those sources who "otherwise could support alternative programming competitive with that supplied exclusively to the incumbents." That is, Montgomery Cablevision contends that, because the programming offered by Turner Network and ESPN is so highly desirable and non-interchangeable, the exclusive contracts threaten its very existence. [30] [57] If Montgomery Cablevision is unable to survive, any support it could offer for alternative programming [*1359] would be eliminated. Moreover, it is reasonable to infer from the counterclaim that even if Montgomery Cablevision is able to survive, the pro-competitive effects that could result from the exclusive contracts might be quite limited. Only a limited number of customers would take advantage of its enhanced services, such as superior service technology and channel capacity. [31]

Finally, it is possible that Montgomery Cablevision will also be able to establish that the exclusive dealing arrangements in this case were entered into for the benefit of and at the behest of the counterclaim defendants who operate at the retail level in this case -- that is, the cable television exhibitors or operators. HN27[] Although intrabrand restraints are often imposed by and for the benefit of suppliers or manufacturers, in some instances, distributors or dealers seek to have restraints imposed upon them by their supplier or manufacturer. Such arrangements are desired to restrict intrabrand competition and enhance distributor power by promoting excess prices and profits. In such cases, the supplier or manufacturer participates merely as the enforcement agent in furthering the distributor's anti-competitive conduct. See Constr. Aggregate Transp., Inc. v. Florida Rock Indus., Inc., 710 F.2d 752, 774-76 & nn.38-43. [58] See also Richard A. Posner, The Rule of Reason and the Economic Approach: Reflections on the "Sylvania" Decision, 45 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1, 17-18 (1977); 8 Areeda, Antitrust Law § 1604 at 37-54. Suppliers will agree to such restraints to "appease dealer interests in excess profits or the quiet life." 8 Areeda, Antitrust Law § 1604 at 37. Although a supplier is often induced to accommodate distributor interests where a dealer cartel has been formed, an individually powerful dealer or distributor may also be able to coerce a supplier to restrict distribution. Because distribution restrictions are coerced from suppliers to further the monopolistic desires of a dealer, it is widely agreed that such restraints are anti-competitive and illegal. Id. at 38 ("a competition-limiting restraint extracted from [a manufacturer] by dealer power is generally understood to be anticompetitive"); Posner, Reflections on "Sylvania" at 17 ("The goal is to isolate, and condemn, restrictions that are posed nominally by the manufacturer but are in fact desired for monopolistic purposes by dealers using the manufacturer as their enforcement [59] agent").

HN28[] The most obvious circumstance in which an individual dealer is able to coerce a limitation on intrabrand competition is where the dealer possesses something approaching monopoly power in the relevant market. 8 Areeda, Antitrust Law § 1604 at 38. But a "dominant" dealer's request for a restraint might coerce a manufacturer in the same way. Dominance for this purpose is generally indicated by a distributor who has 30-50% of a manufacturer's local or total sales. Id. at 60-61, 70.

From the facts alleged in the counterclaim, it is plausible to infer that Storer Cable initiated the exclusive dealing arrangements with Turner Network and ESPN. Storer Cable allegedly provides cable television service to 92% of the homes in the Montgomery area. If this is true, it would undoubtedly qualify as a dominant dealer. The counterclaim also alleges that Tele-Communications is vertically integrated or otherwise financially or managerially related or affiliated with Storer Cable and that it represents itself as the largest provider of cable television services in America. It is therefore possible that Tele-Communications also has sufficient dealer power [60] to demand exclusive contracts from Turner Network and ESPN. Furthermore, if, based on these facts, Montgomery

[30] The elimination of Montgomery Cablevision as a competitor to Storer Cable would alone not constitute a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. But when considered in conjunction with the overall effects on the intrabrand and interbrand markets, the elimination of Montgomery Cablevision as a provider of retail cable television services could be the basis of an antitrust injury.

[31] Contrast with Futurevision, 789 F. Supp. at 778 (exclusive contracts had pro-competitive effects on interbrand competition because comparable alternative programming was available).

Cablevision is able to prove that Storer Cable or Tele-Communications demanded the exclusive contracts, then the anticompetitive effects of the contracts could easily be established. As stated above, such a restriction is considered clearly anticompetitive because it diminishes consumer welfare by promoting the monopoly powers of the distributors. 8 Areeda, Antitrust Law § 1648 at 528. Moreover, where an exclusive dealing arrangement involves a product that itself has significant market power, as alleged here, the anti-competitive [*1360] effects are recognized as especially pernicious. Id. at § 1651 at 568.

In sum, the court concludes that Montgomery Cablevision has alleged sufficient facts to state a claim against the counterclaim defendants for a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. The necessary elements of a § 1 Sherman Act violation -- that the counterclaim defendants entered into a conspiracy or combination that imposes an unreasonable restraint on trade -- can be identified from the counterclaim.

IV. SECTION TWO OF THE SHERMAN ACT

Montgomery Cablevision also charges [61] the counterclaim defendants with monopolization, attempted monopolization, and conspiracy to monopolize in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. § 2. [32]

A. Monopolization

HN30[] The offense of monopoly under § 2 of the Sherman Act has two elements: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business, acumen, or historic accident." Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2089 (quoting United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 1705, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966)). [62]

Montgomery Cablevision states in its brief in opposition to the motions to dismiss that its claim of monopolization is directed primarily at Storer Cable and its monopoly over the retail cable sales market in the Montgomery area. The other counterclaim defendants are implicated only insofar as they are financially or managerially related to Storer Cable. In support of the monopoly claim against Storer Cable, the counterclaim alleges that Storer Cable serves 92% of all cable television subscribers in the Montgomery area. As previously indicated, if this contention is accepted as true, Storer Cable's control over the retail cable sales market in the Montgomery area would satisfy the first element of a § 2 claim of monopolization. See Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2090 (80-95% of market is a monopoly); United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. at 571, 86 S. Ct. at 1704 (87% of the market is a monopoly).

The second element of a § 2 claim is the use of monopoly power to "foreclose competition, to gain a competitive advantage, or to destroy a competitor." Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2090 [63] (citation omitted). Montgomery Cablevision alleges that Storer Cable entered into exclusive contracts for the Turner Network program service and ESPN's football package with the specific "purpose and intent to inhibit competition" and to "protect itself against overbuilders." Moreover, the factual allegations surrounding the formation of the contracts indicate that it is entirely plausible to infer that Storer Cable entered the contracts with the specific intent to maintain its monopoly over the Montgomery area market for retail cable television sales. Storer Cable secured its exclusive rights to carry the Turner Network program service and ESPN's football package on or about the time that Montgomery Cablevision requested affiliation contracts for this programming. Storer Cable's actions, therefore, could be seen as part of a scheme of willful acquisition or maintenance of its in violation of § 2 of Sherman Act. See id. at , 112 S.

[32] Section 2 of the Sherman Act provides in pertinent part:

> HN29[] "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations shall be deemed guilty of a felony."

15 U.S.C.A. § 2.

Ct. at 2090-91. Accordingly, the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has adequately stated a claim of monopolization against Storer Cable.

B. Attempted Monopolization

HN31[] To establish the offense of attempted monopolization, it is necessary to [64] prove "(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly [*1361] power." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, U.S. , , 122 L. Ed. 2d 247, 113 S. Ct. 884, 890-91 (1993); see also T. Harris Young & Assoc., Inc. v. Marquette Elec., Inc., 931 F.2d 816, 823 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 116 L. Ed. 2d 749, U.S. , 112 S. Ct. 658 (1991). Furthermore, as with the offense of monopolization, the attempt must occur in a defined relevant market. Thus, to demonstrate the dangerous probability of monopolization in an attempt case, it is also necessary to inquire into the relevant market and the defendant's economic power in that market. Spectrum Sports, U.S. at , 113 S. Ct. at 892; accord T. Harris Young & Assoc., 931 F.2d at 823.

As with its monopolization claim, Montgomery Cablevision maintains that the § 2 claim for attempted monopolization is directed toward only Storer Cable and those counterclaim defendants who are financially or managerially related [65] to Storer Cable. The court finds that the allegations of the counterclaim, if accepted as true, sufficiently support a claim of attempted monopolization in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. First, with regard to the element of specific intent, as noted above, the counterclaim states that Storer Cable entered into the exclusive contracts with Turner Network and ESPN "with the purpose and intent to inhibit competition" and that Storer Cable "specifically intended to protect itself against overbuilders" in furtherance of its attempt to monopolize. Moreover, as noted previously, the facts relating to Storer Cable's actions in securing the exclusive contracts support the allegations regarding its intent.

Second, the counterclaim's factual allegations indicate that Storer Cable has a dangerous probability of success in achieving and preserving its monopoly over the retail cable sales market in the Montgomery area. According to Montgomery Cablevision, Storer Cable already has a tremendous share of the retail cable sales market in the Montgomery area. Moreover, the injuries alleged to the competition in the market of cable television services as a result of the exclusive contracts indicate [66] that Storer Cable will likely succeed in its attempt to monopolize the retail cable sales market in the Montgomery area. If it is true that consumers in the Montgomery area widely demand the Turner Network program service and ESPN's football package and that there is no comparable alternative programming, then it is plausible to infer that the exclusive contracts will hinder the ability of any other cable television company to compete effectively with Storer Cable in the retail cable sales market. The court thus finds that Montgomery Cablevision has sufficiently stated a claim for relief against Storer Cable for attempting to monopolize the retail cable sales market in the Montgomery area in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

C. Conspiracy to Monopolize

HN32[] The offense of conspiracy to monopolize under § 2 of the Sherman Act requires: "(1) concerted action deliberately entered into with the specific intent of achieving a monopoly; and (2) the commission of at least one overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy." Seagood Trading Corp. v. Jerrico, Inc., 924 F.2d 1555, 1576 (11th Cir. 1991). Thus, a § 1 Sherman Act claim and a § 2 conspiracy to monopolize [67] claim require the same threshold showing -- the existence of an agreement to restrain trade. Once this showing is made, then it must be established that the conspiracy was formed with the specific intent to obtain or maintain a monopoly. Id. See also Todorov v. DCH Healthcare Auth., 921 F.2d 1438, 1460 n.35 (11th Cir. 1991).

Montgomery Cablevision maintains that its claim for conspiracy to monopolize is based on Storer Cable's monopolization or attempted monopolization of the retail cable television sales market in the Montgomery area and the assistance of the other counterclaim defendants in Storer Cable's efforts to attain or preserve this monopoly. According to Montgomery Cablevision, the conspiracy centers on the exclusive contracts entered into among the counterclaim defendants. The counterclaim defendants, however, contend that it is implausible to infer that the counterclaim defendants in this case who are cable program suppliers and distributors -- that is, Tele-Communications, Satellite Services, the Turner Companies, and ESPN -- would conspire with Storer Cable to assist it [*1362] in its efforts to monopolize the retail cable sales market. They maintain [68] that there is no rational economic motive for them to enter such an alleged conspiracy and that Montgomery Cablevision has thus failed to provide an inference of specific intent to conspire to achieve the stated goal of the conspiracy. For the reasons that follow, the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has alleged sufficient facts to support its claim of conspiracy to monopolize based on Storer Cable's monopolization or attempted monopolization of the retail cable sales market in the Montgomery area and the assistance of the other counterclaim defendants in this effort.

First, for the reasons discussed previously with regard to the § 1 Sherman Act claim, the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has sufficiently alleged the existence of an agreement to restrain trade. In this case, the conspiracy to monopolize centers on the exclusive contracts between Storer Cable and Turner Network and between Storer Cable and ESPN. Second, in support of its claim that the exclusive contracts are part of a conspiracy to monopolize the retail cable sales market, Montgomery Cablevision specifically alleges that the cable television program suppliers and distributors who are counterclaim defendants [69] in this case "have sufficient market power over the . . . programming at issue in this suit to aid Storer Cable in its efforts to monopolize" the retail cable sales market. Moreover, as discussed previously, these allegations of market power are supported by claims regarding the high desirability of the programming offered by Turner Network and ESPN and the lack of comparable alternative programming. [33] From these allegations, it is possible to infer that the cable television program suppliers and distributors involved in this case are in a position to help Storer Cable monopolize the retail cable sales market.

[70] Third, the counterclaim alleges that Tele-Communications, Satellite Services, and the Turner companies "knew or should have known" that the exclusive contract for the Turner Network program service would be used for monopolistic reasons. To support this conclusion, the counterclaim states that Tele-Communications, Satellite Services, the Turner companies, and Storer Cable are "vertically integrated or otherwise financially or managerially related or affiliated corporations." In other words, Montgomery Cablevision suggests that because of their corporate relationship with Storer Cable, Tele-Communications, Satellite Services, and the Turner companies should have been aware of Storer Cable's intent regarding the exclusive contract. Similarly, the counterclaim alleges that ESPN "knew or should have known" that the exclusive contract for ESPN's NFL football package would be used by Storer Cable for monopolistic purposes. In support of this claim, the counterclaim specifically states that ESPN "promoted its exclusive contracts as 'overbuild protection.'" That is, ESPN marketed its exclusive contract as a means through which an incumbent cable franchise could protect itself against overbuilders [71] and thereby monopolize the market for retail cable sales. Sufficient facts, therefore, have been alleged to support the claims that the counterclaim defendants charged with aiding Storer Cable in its attempt to monopolize knew or should been aware of Storer Cable's intent to monopolize. [34]

[72] [*1363] Finally, the court finds that the counterclaim contains sufficient facts to support an inference that the counterclaim defendants were intentional parties to the alleged conspiracy to monopolize. Admittedly, although the counterclaim makes specific allegations regarding the intent of Storer Cable to monopolize the market for retail cable television sales, it does not explicitly allege that the other counterclaim defendants entered the conspiracy with the intent to monopolize. However, the counterclaim provides a sufficient basis to infer that the other counterclaim defendants intentionally aided Storer Cable in its attempt to monopolize the retail cable sales market. For example, the alleged vertical integration of Tele-Communications, Satellite Services, the Turner companies, and Storer Cable indicates that these counterclaim defendants had a financial interest in assisting Storer Cable's attempt to monopolize. ESPN's marketing technique with regard to the exclusive contracts also points to an intent to aid Storer Cable in its monopoly effort. Furthermore, the counterclaim specifically alleges that the cable program suppliers and distributors had "no valid business reason" for their [73] refusal to deal with Montgomery Cablevision other than the attempt to monopolize. [35] Finally, contrary to the contentions of the counterclaim defendants, it is plausible that the counterclaim defendants had a rational motive to enter the alleged conspiracy, which would provide an inference of specific intent to conspire. See Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 595, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 1360, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986) (discussing need to establish motive to enter conspiracy in antitrust cases).

[34] Contrast with Syufy Enter. v. Am. Multicinema, Inc., 793 F.2d 990, 1000-1001 (9th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1031, 107 S. Ct. 876, 93 L. Ed. 2d 830 (1987) and Futurevision, 789 F. Supp. at 777-78. In Syufy, the court of appeals found there was no conspiracy to monopolize where there was no evidence indicating that certain film distributors, who were alleged co-conspirators, knew or should have known that their licensee intended to exploit its exclusive film licensing rights for its own monopolistic purposes. Similarly, in Futurevision, the district court dismissed a claim for conspiracy to monopolize where there were no allegations that cable television programmers knew or should have known that certain cable television operators were using their exclusive rights to monopolize the cable services markets nor any facts to support such an inference. In this case, in contrast, there are specific allegations concerning the knowledge of the counterclaim defendants regarding Storer Cable's intentions to monopolize the retail cable sales market in Montgomery and facts to support these contentions.

The counterclaim defendants contend that the program suppliers and distributors have no rational economic motive to conspire with Storer Cable to monopolize the cable television services market in the Montgomery area because such a conspiracy [74] would be against their interests. They maintain that the creation of a monopoly at the level of retail cable sales would enable Storer Cable, the cable system operator, to drive down the price that it pays to the programmers for their programming. Thus, according to the counterclaim defendants, the cable programmers and distributors have every incentive not to engage in a conspiracy to monopolize. This is essentially the same position as taken by the court in Futurevision, 789 F. Supp. at 779. There, the district court held that it would be contrary to the program suppliers' interest to aid cable system operators in achieving monopoly power. Moreover, the court was persuaded that the cable program suppliers had no rational economic motive to conspire against their own interests. [36]

[75] Where there is significant intrabrand competition, the counterclaim defendants and the court in Futurevision may be correct that it would be against the interests of the cable program suppliers to assist a cable television operator in achieving a monopoly in the cable television services market. However, they both overlook the situation where a local cable operator already possesses significant market power in the retail cable sales market and is in the position to coerce the program suppliers into exclusive dealing arrangements. As discussed above in the context of the § 1 Sherman Act claim, it is possible that Storer Cable and Tele-Communications, as dominant dealers in the market of cable television [*1364] services, had sufficient power to coerce the Turner companies and ESPN into offering them exclusive contracts for their programming. Thus, in this case, there may well be plausible reasons why the cable programmers and distributors would conspire with Storer Cable. Furthermore, contrary to the assertion that a monopoly at the retail cable sales level would necessarily enable Storer Cable to drive down the price paid for programming, in some instances, intrabrand restrictions enable [76] a supplier to keep prices to dealers higher than would otherwise be possible. See Peter M. Gerhart, The "Competitive Advantages" Explanation for Intrabrand Restraints: An Antitrust Analysis, 1981 Duke L.J. 417, 447-448 (1981). For example, where there is active intrabrand competition, a dealer's profitability on a particular brand decreases and the supplier or manufacturer can be forced to lower his wholesale price to compensate for his brand's lower profitability in the retail market. However, without active intrabrand competition, the supplier can maintain higher wholesale prices, and hence, retain more profits for itself. Id.; see also 8 Areeda, Antitrust Law § 1603 at 34.

[35] Contrast with Futurevision, 789 F. Supp. at 778, where complaint failed to allege that there were no valid business reasons for cable programmers to refuse to supply programming to a new cable franchise.

[36] The counterclaim defendants also point to TV Communications Network, Inc. v. Turner Network Television, Inc., 964 F.2d 1022 (10th Cir. 1992), to support their contention that the program suppliers and distributors in this case had no rational economic motive to aid Storer Cable in its efforts to achieve a monopoly over the retail cable sales market. However, that case is inapposite. There, the court was faced with allegations that cable television operators had conspired with program suppliers to aid the program suppliers in maintaining their monopolies over the cable programming market. The court concluded that the cable operators would have no rational motive to create such an environment. In this case, in contrast, Montgomery Cablevision has alleged that the program suppliers conspired with a cable television operator, Storer Cable, to aid the cable operator in its efforts to monopolize the retail cable sales market.

Finally, the allegations regarding the vertical integration of the Turner companies and Storer Cable indicate that to some extent the economic interests of the programmers in this case coincide with those of the cable operator.

It is also important to emphasize that, HN33[] to prevail on a motion to dismiss, it is not enough for a defendant to articulate any economic motive -- or absence thereof -- in support of its behavior, regardless of its accuracy in reflecting what [77] actually happened. Cf. Eastman Kodak, U.S. at , 112 S. Ct. at 2083 ("The Court did not hold that if the moving party enunciates any economic theory supporting its behavior, regardless of its accuracy in reflecting the actual market, it is entitled to summary judgment") (emphasis in original). A claimant who posits a reasonable motive, even if there are other reasonable but contrary motives, should be allowed to survive a motion to dismiss and produce evidence of the true motive.

In sum, the court concludes that Montgomery Cablevision's counterclaim sufficiently states a claim for conspiracy to monopolize. [37]

V. STATE ANTITRUST CLAIMS

Montgomery Cablevision [78] also charges that the exclusive contracts among the counterclaim defendants have resulted in the creation and operation of an unlawful monopoly in violation of 1975 Ala. Code § 6-5-60 (1975). [38] It further alleges that the counterclaim defendants have monopolized or attempted to monopolize "both cable programming and the market for cable television services in Montgomery" in violation of state colon law prohibiting monopolies.

HN35[] Alabama's antitrust laws, both statutory and common law, are analytically identical to federal antitrust laws and are interpreted by Alabama courts in accordance with federal law. Ex parte Rice, 259 Ala. 570, 67 So. 2d 825, 829 (Ala. 1953) [79] (per curiam) ("The federal statutes . . . prescribe the terms of unlawful monopolies and restraints of trade as they should also be administered in Alabama"). See also Avery Freight Lines, Inc. v. Alabama Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 267 Ala. 646, 104 So. 2d 705, 709 (Ala. 1958) HN36[] ("In construing the terms and provisions of Alabama statutes derived from federal statutes, such terms and provisions will usually be considered as having the meaning given by the federal courts"). For the reasons given above regarding the claims for relief under §§ 1 & 2 of the Sherman Act, the court thus concludes that Montgomery Cablevision has sufficiently stated claims for relief under 1975 Ala. Code § 6-5-60 and Alabama state common law [*1365] prohibiting monopolies, to the extent that the claims under state law parallel the claims under federal law. [39]

[80] VI. ORDINANCE 48-90

[37] Because the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has adequately stated a cause of action under § 2 of the Sherman Act, the court need not address whether the "essential facilities" doctrine also provides a basis for a § 2 claim in this case. See, e.g., McKenzie v. Mercy Hosp., 854 F.2d 365, 369 (10th Cir. 1988).

[38] Section 6-5-60 provides in pertinent part:

> HN34[] "Any person, firm or corporation injured or damaged by an unlawful trust, combine or monopoly, or its effect, direct or indirect, may, in each instance of such injury or damage, recover the sum of $ 500.00 and all actual damages from any person, firm or corporation creating, operating, aiding or abetting such trust, combine or monopoly."

[39] Montgomery Cablevision alleges that the counterclaim defendants have monopolized or attempted to monopolize the cable programming market in violation of state common law, in addition to monopolizing the cable television services market. However, monopolization of the cable programming market is not alleged in the § 2 Sherman Act claim against the counterclaim defendants. Nor has Montgomery Cablevision presented any facts to support such a claim. The court thus concludes that although Montgomery Cablevision has sufficiently alleged a claim to monopolize or attempt to monopolize the cable television services market, it has not stated a claim to monopolize or attempt to monopolize the cable programming market.

Montgomery Cablevision charges the counterclaim defendants with restraining or attempting to restrain trade, or monopolizing or attempting to monopolize the production, control, or sale of program material or program services used in the provision of cable television service in violation of § 3 of the City of Montgomery, Ordinance 48-90. [40] [81] The counterclaim also alleges that the counterclaim defendants have contracted or combined to refuse to provide program material or program services used in the provision of cable service, with the purpose or effect of creating a monopoly or injuring competition in the provision of cable television service in Montgomery, in violation of § 4 of Ordinance 48-90. [41]

In an order entered earlier in this litigation, this court noted that the language and structure of Ordinance 48-90 appears to be modeled on federal antitrust laws. See Storer Cable Communications, Inc. v. City of Montgomery, 806 F. Supp. 1518, 1537 (M.D. Ala. 1992) (Thompson, J.). Moreover, the court assumed that the city, by borrowing language and phrases from federal antitrust laws, meant also to import the accumulated case [82] law interpreting that language. Id. at 1538. Because the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has adequately stated claims for relief under §§ 1 & 2 of the Sherman Act, the court thus concludes that it has also stated claims for relief under Ordinance 48-90. [42]

VII. INTENTIONAL INTERFERENCE WITH BUSINESS RELATIONS

Montgomery Cablevision also charges the counterclaim defendants with the state-law tort of intentional interference with business relations. It contends that it has "initiated or commenced business relationships both with individuals who have subscribed or wish to subscribe" to Montgomery Cablevision's services, and that the exclusive dealing arrangements among the counterclaim defendants [83] were "intended to disrupt and did disrupt these relationships." The counterclaim defendants maintain that Montgomery Cablevision has failed to state a claim for intentional interference with business relations, particularly with regard to potential subscribers [*1366] of Montgomery Cablevision's services.

HN39[] The elements of a cause of action for intentional interference with business relations under Alabama law are: (1) the existence of a contract or business relation; (2) the defendant's knowledge of the contract or business relation; (3) intentional interference by the defendant with the contract or business relation; and (4) damage to the plaintiff as a result of the defendant's interference. Utah Foam Prod. Inc. v. Polytec, Inc., 584 So. 2d 1345, 1353 (Ala. 1991); Gross v. Lowder Realty Better Homes & Gardens, 494 So. 2d 590, 597 (Ala. 1986). Justification for the [40] Section 3 of Ordinance 48-90 provides:

> HN37[] "It shall be unlawful for a cable television exhibitor providing or intending to provide cable service within the City to restrain, or attempt to restrain the freedom of trade or production, or to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize the production, control or sale of program material or program services used in the provision of cable television service within the City.
> "It shall be unlawful for a cable television distributor or cable television program supplier to restrain, or attempt to restrain the freedom of trade or production, or to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize the production, control or sale of program material or program services used in the provision of cable television service within the City."

[41] Section 4 of Ordinance 48-90 provides in pertinent part:

> HN38[] "It shall be unlawful for a cable television exhibitor providing or intending to provide cable television service within the City to contract or combine with any other person to fix or limit the lease, license, sale or exchange . . . of program material or program services used in the provision of cable television service where the purpose or effect of such contract [or] combination is or may be to tend to create a monopoly or to injure, destroy, inhibit, prevent or lessen substantially competition with respect to the provision of cable television service within the City."

[42] Because the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has stated claims under §§ 1 & 2 of the Sherman Act, the court need not reach the question whether a particular set of facts could give rise to a valid cause of action under Ordinance 48-90 but not fall under the federal antitrust laws.

interference is an affirmative defense that has to be pleaded and proved by the defendant. Utah Foam Prod., 584 So. 2d at 1353; Century 21 Academy Realty, Inc. v. Breland, 571 So. 2d 296, 297-98 (Ala. 1990). [43] [84]

[85] For the following reasons, the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has stated a claim of intentional interference with business relations with regard to those individuals who have subscribed to its services. First, the relationships between Montgomery Cablevision and its subscribers qualify as business relations protected under the tort of intentional interference in Alabama. See Gross v. Lowder, 494 So. 2d at 597 (tort covers interference with business relations non necessarily involving a contract). Second, as the counterclaim states, Montgomery Cablevision is in direct competition with Storer Cable; therefore, it is reasonable to infer that the counterclaim defendants were aware of Montgomery Cablevision's business relations with its subscribers. Third, the factual allegations of the counterclaim support the contention that the counterclaim defendants interfered with these relations by entering into exclusive contracts that were intended to deprive Montgomery Cablevision of programming that is in high demand by its subscribers. And finally, the allegations of the counterclaim, if true, indicate that Montgomery Cablevision has suffered damage as [86] a result of this interference -- that is, it has lost subscribers because of its inability to provide the programming at issue in this case. Of course, the justification for the interference is an affirmative defense that has to be pleaded and proved by the counterclaim defendants.

Moreover, the court finds that Montgomery Cablevision has alleged sufficient facts to state a claim for punitive damages in relation to the intentional interference with its subscribers. As the Alabama Supreme Court explained in Gross v. Lowder Realty, 494 So. 2d 590 (Ala. 1986), HN40[] because interference with business relations is an intentional tort, punitive damages may be awarded if the act of interference was carried out wantonly, or spitefully, or maliciously. Id. at 597 n.4. See also Sparks v. McCrary, 156 Ala. 382, 47 So. 332, 334 (1908). As noted previously, the counterclaim states that by entering into the exclusive contracts at issue in this case, the counterclaim defendants "began a course of conduct which was intended to disrupt and did disrupt" Montgomery Cablevision's business relations with its subscribers and that [87] this conduct was "intentional, unfair and improper." Moreover, it is plausible to infer from the factual allegations of the counterclaim that the conduct of the counterclaim defendants was committed with the intent to injure the property of Montgomery Cablevision. See 1975 Ala. Code § 6-11-20(b)(2) (1975 & Supp. 1992) ("malice" required for punitive damages defined as "the intentional doing of a wrongful act without just cause or excuse . . . With an intent to injure the person or property of another person or entity"). As discussed above, there is support for the contention [*1367] that Storer Cable entered into the contracts with the intent to inhibit competition and to protect itself against overbuilders, such as Montgomery Cablevision, and that the other counterclaim defendants assisted Storer Cable in its efforts to monopolize the cable television services market in the Montgomery area.

The court, however, declines to decide at this time whether Montgomery Cablevision has stated a claim of intentional interference with business relations in relation to its potential subscribers. This claim presents novel and close issues of first impression under state law, which the Alabama Supreme [88] Court has not yet resolved. Although the tort of intentional interference under Alabama law covers relationships not necessarily evidenced by an enforceable contract -- that is, business relations among parties that are not founded in a contract -- it is not clear whether an action may be maintained for interference with business relations which are prospective or potential, in other words, expected business relations. In developing the tort of intentional interference with contractual and business relations, the Alabama Supreme Court relied on 45 Am. Jur. 2d, Interference §§ 49-50 (1969) and James O. Pearson, Jr., Annotation, Liability for Interference with At Will Business Relationship, 5 A.L.R. 4t (1981), both of which explicitly recognize a cause of action for interference with existing and prospective [43] In the past, the Alabama Supreme Court has listed absence of justification for the defendant's interference as one of the elements of the plaintiff's cause of action. See, e.g., Caine v. Am. Life Assurance Corp., 554 So. 2d 962, 964 (Ala. 1989); Lowder Realty, Inc. v. Odom, 495 So. 2d 23, 25 (Ala. 1986); Gross v. Lowder Realty, 494 So. 2d at 597. However, in Century 21 Academy Realty, Inc. v. Breland, 571 So. 2d 296 (Ala. 1990), the court recognized that it was illogical to continue to list absence of justification as one of the elements of the plaintiff's cause of action and then to place the burden on the defendant to disprove it. The court, therefore, eliminated absence of justification from the elements and held that justification is an affirmative defense that must be pleaded and proved by the defendant. Id. at 297-98. See also Underwood v. S. Cent. Bell Tel. Co., 590 So. 2d 170, 176 n.4 (Ala. 1991).

business relations. See Gross v. Lowder Realty Better Homes Gardens, 494 So. 2d 590, 597 (Ala. 1986). [44] However, in establishing the elements of the tort of intentional interference with business or contractual relations, the Alabama Supreme Court required that the plaintiff prove "the existence of a contract [89] or business relation." Gross v. Lowder Realty, 494 So. 2d at 597 (emphasis added). Moreover, it did not incorporate into its definition of the tort the language regarding "prospective" or "potential" or "expectant" business relations that is found in 45 Am. Jur. 2d, Interference §§ 49-50 and Annotation, 5 A.L.R.4th 9 . This absence may indicate that the Alabama Supreme Court intended to define the tort as narrowly as possible and to exclude from its definition a cause of action for interference with potential business relations. On the other hand, it may be that the court did not want to address this issue at that time and that such an action is not entirely precluded. As the court stated, "We have set forth above what we consider to be the broad framework of the cause of action, but defer to future cases a determination of the more detailed questions that undoubtedly will be raised as the cause of action moves from its formative stages and develops into a solidified body of law." Gross v. Lowder Realty, 494 So. 2d at 597.

[90] Unfortunately, subsequent cases have shed little light on the scope of the tort and the type of "business relations" that are covered. They also provide little indication as to whether the Alabama Supreme Court would recognize an action for interference with prospective business relations. The most extensive recent discussion of the tort is found in Utah Foam Products, Inc. v. Polytec, Inc., 584 So. 2d 1345 (Ala. 1991). There, the Alabama Supreme Court provided some insight into the reasons underlying the tort of interference with a business relation. The Court stated that it is "designed to protect property interests in business and to compensate for the damage caused by that interference," and that "it is the right to do business in a fair setting that is protected." Id. at 1353. Based on these principles, the Court held that it was not necessary for a plaintiff to prove that it would have received a particular contract but for the tortious interference with business relations. It is unclear, however, whether this holding indicates that the Court includes prospective business advantage or relations within the tort of [91] intentional interference. In Utah Foam, there was substantial contact between the plaintiff and the prospective client in an attempt to attain a contract. Thus, the Court may have considered this contact as establishing the existence of a business relation between the parties. Unfortunately, however, the Court did [*1368] not discuss or elaborate on this aspect of the tort.

Because Montgomery Cablevision's claim of intentional interference with potential subscribers is a minor one and will not entail additional discovery, the court believes that the issues raised should be resolved later in this litigation. Indeed, it is possible that after further factual development, the court will not have to reach the difficult issues raised by the claim. At this time, it is difficult to characterize the exact nature of the relations between Montgomery Cablevision and its potential subscribers. The counterclaim does not indicate the nature and extent of Montgomery Cablevision's contact with potential subscribers. Further factual development, however, may reveal that there was substantial and significant contact between Montgomery Cablevision and its potential subscribers -- for example, through advertising [92] or phone calls or inquiries on the part of potential subscribers. Therefore, it is possible that Montgomery Cablevision established business relations with its potential subscribers that are protected by the tort of intentional interference. It may also be that the claim is resolved on other than Rule 12(b)(6) grounds. For these reasons, the court declines to decide at this time whether Montgomery Cablevision has stated a claim for intentional interference with business relations with regard to its potential subscribers.

Accordingly, for the reasons discussed above, it is the ORDER, JUDGMENT, and DECREE of the court that the motions to dismiss filed by the counterclaim defendants on January 27 and February 5, 1993, are denied.

DONE, this the 17th day of June, 1993.

Decision

Evidence presented in action against cigarette manufacturer held insufficient as matter of law to sustain claim of price discrimination injuring competition in violation of Robinson-Patman Act.

Summary

The plaintiff, a cigarette manufacturer which was one of six firms which dominated the cigarette manufacturing industry, increased its declining share of the market by introducing a line of unbranded "black and white" generic cigarettes at a list price about 30 percent below those of branded cigarettes, as to which there had been no significant price competition. A large part of the plaintiff's market gains came at the expense of the defendant, another cigarette manufacturer, which responded by introducing its own black and whites and other discounted cigarettes, beating the first manufacturer's prices and volume discounts and by giving wholesalers larger rebates than the plaintiff gave, both initially and throughout an ensuing rebate war. The plaintiff, alleging trademark infringement and unfair competition, filed suit against the defendant in the United States District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina. The complaint was later amended to allege that the defendant's rebates to wholesalers violated 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), because the rebates were integral to a supposed scheme of predatory price discrimination. The plaintiff's theory of competitive injury was that (1) the defendant entered the generic market with list prices matching the plaintiff's but with massive discriminatory rebates directed at the plaintiff's biggest wholesalers, (2) the net price paid by wholesalers for the defendant's generic cigarettes would drop below the defendant's cost, (3) the plaintiff would suffer losses trying to defend its market share and wholesale customer base by matching the defendant's rebates, (4) to avoid further losses, the plaintiff would raise its list prices on generics or acquiesce in price leadership by the defendant, (5) higher list prices to consumers would shrink the percentage gap in retail price between generic and branded cigarettes, and (6) this narrowing of the gap would make generics less appealing to consumers, thus slowing the growth of the economy cigarette market and reducing loss of sales of branded cigarettes and their associated supracompetitive prices. A jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the price discrimination claim; but the District Court, after reviewing the record, ruled that the defendant was entitled to judgment notwithstanding the verdict, partly because (1) no slowing of the growth rate of generics, and thus no injury to competition, was possible unless there had been tacit coordination of prices among the various manufacturers in the economy cigarette market, and (2) a reasonable jury could only have found that there was no such coordination (748 F Supp 344). The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed (964 F2d 335).

On certiorari, the United States Supreme Court affirmed. In an opinion by Kennedy, J., joined by Rehnquist, Ch. J., and O'Connor, Scalia, Souter, and Thomas, JJ., it was held that the defendant was entitled to judgment as a matter of law--even though the record contained sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that the defendant envisioned or intended the anticompetitive course of events alleged by the plaintiff, that the net prices charged to wholesalers by the defendant for generic cigarettes were below the defendant's cost for a period of 18 months, and that this imposed losses on the plaintiff which the plaintiff was unwilling to sustain--because the evidence was inadequate to show that the defendant had a reasonable prospect of recovering its losses from below-cost pricing through slowing the growth of generics and producing sustained supracompetitive pricing in the generic market, as the evidence neither (1) supported a reasonable inference that the defendant and the other cigarette manufacturers actually elevated prices for generic cigarettes above a competitive level, nor (2) demonstrated that the alleged scheme was likely to have brought about tacit coordination and oligopoly pricing in the generic cigarette market.

Stevens, J., joined by White and Blackmun, JJ., dissented, expressing the view that the evidence presented was sufficient to support a finding that the defendant's price discrimination plan, in which the defendant invested millions of dollars for the purpose of achieving an admittedly anticompetitive result, had a reasonable possibility of injuring competition.

A defendant cigarette manufacturer is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, notwithstanding a jury verdict in favor of the plaintiff, in an action by a competing cigarette manufacturer alleging that the defendant violated the price discrimination provisions of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), because no adequate basis for a finding of liability is provided by the alleged oligopolistic price coordination scheme--whereby (1) the defendant would enter the generic segment of the cigarette market, previously dominated by the plaintiff cigarette manufacturer, with list prices matching the plaintiff's but with massive discriminatory volume rebates directed at the plaintiff's biggest wholesalers, (2) the net price charged to wholesalers by the defendant for generic cigarettes would drop below the defendant's cost, (3) the plaintiff would suffer losses trying to defend its market share and wholesale customer base by matching the defendant's rebates, (4) to avoid further losses, the plaintiff would raise its list prices on generics or acquiesce in price leadership by the defendant, (5) higher list prices to consumers would shrink the percentage gap in retail price between generic and branded cigarettes, and (6) this narrowing of the gap would make generics less appealing to consumers, thus slowing the growth of the economy cigarette market and reducing loss of sales of branded cigarettes and their associated supracompetitive prices--where, although the record contains sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that the defendant envisioned or intended this anticompetitive course of events, that the net prices charged to wholesalers by the defendant for generic cigarettes were below the defendant's cost for a period of 18 months, and that this imposed losses on the plaintiff which the plaintiff was unwilling to sustain, the evidence is inadequate to show that the defendant manufacturer had a reasonable prospect of recovering its losses from below-cost pricing through slowing the growth of generics and producing sustained supracompetitive pricing in the generic market, as the evidence neither (1) supports a reasonable inference that the defendant and other cigarette manufacturers actually elevated prices for generic cigarettes above a competitive level, nor (2) demonstrates that the alleged scheme was likely to have brought about tacit coordination and oligopoly pricing in the generic cigarette market. RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §36.3 > price discrimination -- purpose of statute -- > Headnote:

The provision of 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, condemning price discrimination (15 USCS 13(a)) is not intended to outlaw price differences that result from or further the forces of competition; thus, the Robinson-Patman Act should be construed consistently with broader policies of the antitrust laws.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §36.5 > price discrimination -- anticompetitive effect -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[3A][] [3A]LEdHN[3B][] [3B]

Primary-line competitive injury, as required under the price discrimination provisions of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), is of the same general character as the injury inflicted by predatory pricing schemes actionable under 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 2); there are differences between the two statutes, as, for example, the Sherman Act provision condemns predatory pricing when it poses a dangerous possibility of actual monopolization, whereas the Robinson-Patman Act requires only that there be a reasonable possibility of substantial injury to competition before that Act's protections are triggered; however, the essence of the claim under either statute is the same, namely that a business rival has priced its products in an unfair manner with an object to eliminate or retard competition and thereby gain and exercise control over prices in the relevant market; thus, under either statute, two prerequisites to recovery remain the same, requiring a plaintiff seeking to establish competitive injury resulting from a rival's low prices to prove that (1) the prices complained of are below an appropriate measure of the rival's costs, and (2) the rival has a reasonable prospect--or, under the Sherman Act, a dangerous probability--of recouping the rival's investment in below-cost prices.

The United States Supreme Court--in reviewing on certiorari lower court decisions in a case involving alleged violations by a cigarette manufacturer, with respect to the generic cigarette market, of the price discrimination provisions of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a))--will not resolve a conflict among the lower courts over the appropriate measure of cost to be used in determining whether prices complained of under 2(a) are below cost, where the parties in the case at hand agree that the relevant measure of cost is average variable cost.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §6 > purpose -- acts prohibited -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[5][] [5]

The federal antitrust laws are intended for the protection of competition, not competitors; even an act of pure malice by one business competitor against another does not, without more, state a claim under the federal antitrust laws, which do not create a federal law of unfair competition or purport to afford remedies for all torts committed by or against persons engaged in interstate commerce.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §36.5 > price discrimination -- competitive harm -- recoupment -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[6][] [6]

In order for recoupment to occur--for purposes of the rule that there is no competitive injury actionable either as price discrimination under 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), or as predatory pricing under 2 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 2), unless the competitor has a reasonable prospect or a dangerous probability of recouping its investment in below-cost prices--(1) below-cost pricing must be capable, as a threshold matter, of producing the intended effect on the rivals of the firm accused of such conduct, whether that effect is driving the rivals from the market or causing them to raise their prices to supracompetitive levels within a disciplined oligopoly, and (2) if circumstances indicate that below-cost pricing could likely produce its intended effect on the target, then the further question arises whether such pricing would likely injure competition in the relevant market; with respect to the first factor, determining the likelihood of recoupment requires an understanding of the extent and duration of the alleged predation, the relative financial strength of the predator and of its intended victim, and their respective incentives and will, the inquiry being whether, given the aggregate losses caused by the below-cost pricing, the intended target would likely succumb; with respect to the second factor, the plaintiff is required to demonstrate a likelihood that the alleged predatory scheme would cause a rise in prices above a competitive level that would be sufficient to compensate for the amounts expended on the predation, including the time value of the money invested in the predation, and determining whether recoupment is likely requires an estimate of the cost of the alleged predation and a close analysis of both the scheme alleged by the plaintiff and the structure and conditions of the relevant market; if market circumstances or deficiencies in proof would bar a reasonable jury from finding that the scheme alleged would likely result in sustained supracompetitive pricing, then the plaintiff's case has failed, and in certain situations--such as where the market is highly diffuse and competitive, new entry is easy, or the defendant lacks adequate excess capacity to absorb the market shares of rivals and cannot quickly create or purchase new capacity--summary disposition of the case is appropriate.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §37 > price control -- tacit collusion -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[7][] [7]

It is not in itself unlawful for firms in a concentrated market to effectively share monopoly power through a process variously known as tacit collusion, oligopolistic price coordination, or conscious parallelism, whereby such firms set their prices at a supracompetitive, profit-maximizing level by recognizing their shared economic interests and their interdependence with respect to price and output decisions.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §36.5 > predatory pricing -- competitive harm -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[8A][] [8A]LEdHN[8B][] [8B]

The interdependent pricing of an oligopoly may provide a means for achieving recoupment, and so may form the basis of a primary-line injury claim for purposes of the price discrimination provisions of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), as a predatory pricing scheme designed to preserve or create a stable oligopoly, if successful, can injure consumers in the same way, and to the same extent, as a predatory pricing scheme designed to bring about a monopoly; however unlikely that possibility might be as a general matter, when the realities of the market and the record facts of a case indicate that the possibility has occurred and was likely to have succeeded, theory will not stand in the way of liability; there is no per se rule of nonliability for predatory price discrimination when recoupment is alleged to take place through supracompetitive oligopoly pricing.

Although it is not customary for the United States Supreme Court, on certiorari, to review the sufficiency of the evidence in a case, the court will do so when the issue is properly before the court and the benefits of providing guidance concerning the proper application of a legal standard and avoiding the systemic costs associated with further proceedings justify the required expenditure of judicial resources.

EVIDENCE §343.5 > inference -- antitrust -- restricted output -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[11][] [11]

The record evidence--in a case involving alleged violations by the defendant, a cigarette manufacturer, with respect to the generic cigarette market, of the price discrimination provisions of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a))--does not permit a reasonable inference that the total industry output of generic cigarettes would have been greater but for the defendant's entry into the generic market, and thus that such entry resulted in the restriction of output which would be essential to supracompetitive pricing, where (1) the rate at which generic cigarettes were increasing their share of the overall cigarette market did not slow following the defendant's entry into the generic market, and in fact the average rate of growth doubled; (2) there is no concrete evidence that the generics' growth rate would have been even greater but for the defendant's alleged predatory price discrimination; (3) the output of generics expanded more robustly following the defendant's entry into the generic market than the defendant had previously estimated would occur if the defendant did not enter the generic market; and (4) an observation by the defendant that its entry appeared to have slowed the generic market's growth rate was made at a time when it is claimed that the defendant was selling its generics below cost and before any anticompetitive contraction in output is alleged to have occurred.

EVIDENCE §343.5 > inference -- antitrust -- supracompetitive prices -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[12][] [12]

A reasonable jury--being presented, in a case involving alleged price discrimination in the generic cigarette market in violation of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), with evidence that the list prices on all types of cigarettes rose to a significant degree during the period in question, that these price increases outpaced increases in costs, taxes, and promotional expenditures, and that the list prices of generic cigarettes rose at a faster rate than the prices of branded cigarettes, thus narrowing the list price differential between the two cigarette types--cannot draw an inference that the defendant cigarette manufacturer succeeded in bringing about oligopolistic price coordination and supracompetitive prices in the generic cigarette category sufficient to slow the category's growth, preserve supracompetitive branded profits, and recoup the manufacturer's losses from alleged predatory price discrimination, where (1) there is undisputed evidence that list prices were not the actual prices paid by consumers during the period in question, and it would be unreasonable--especially in an oligopoly setting such as the cigarette industry in which price competition is most likely to take place through less observable and less regulable means than list prices--to draw conclusions about the existence of tacit coordination or supracompetitive pricing from data that reflects only list prices, and (2) the list price data as to generic and full-price branded cigarettes ignores the effect of the introduction, during the period in question, of "subgeneric" cigarettes discounted 50 percent or more from the list prices of normal branded cigarettes, expanding rather than narrowing the differential between highest and lowest cigarette prices; even if a reasonable jury could conclude that the cumulative discounts attributable to subgenerics and various consumer promotions did not cancel out the full effect of the increases in list prices, and that actual prices to consumers rose, rising prices do not themselves permit an inference of a collusive market dynamic, since when output is expanding at the same time prices are increasing, as in the case at hand, rising prices are equally consistent with growing product demand; under these conditions, a jury may not infer competitive injury from price and output data absent some evidence tending to prove that output was restricted or prices were above a competitive level. (Stevens, White, and Blackmun, JJ., dissented from this holding.)

EVIDENCE §343.5 > inference -- antitrust -- denial -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[13][] [13]

An inference of supracompetitive pricing is particularly anomalous, in a case involving alleged price discrimination in the generic cigarette market in violation of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), where the very party alleged to have been coerced into pricing through oligopolistic coordination has denied that such coordination existed, as the officers and directors of the plaintiff cigarette manufacturer consistently denied that they or other firms in the industry priced their cigarettes through tacit collusion or reaped supracompetitive profits; an explanation that the officers and directors are businessmen who do not ascribe the same meanings to terms like "competitive" and "collusion" that an economist would is entitled to little, if any, weight where the officers and directors--having made such statements in pretrial depositions, and thereafter having claimed that they were confused by opposing counsel's questions and had not meant to contradict the testimony of the manufacturer's expert economic witness, repeated their denials as to collusion and profits at trial after having consulted extensively with the expert witness and having had adequate time to familiarize themselves with the relevant concepts.

EVIDENCE §979 > sufficiency -- restraint of trade -- > Headnote:

A reasonable jury--being presented, in a case involving alleged price discrimination in the generic cigarette market in violation of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), with evidence of a pricing structure whereby the defendant cigarette manufacturer maintained existing list prices while offering substantial rebates to wholesalers--cannot conclude that this pricing structure eliminated or rendered insignificant the risk that other firms in the cigarette industry might misunderstand the defendant manufacturer's entry into the generic cigarette market, supposedly intended to stifle competition and to produce oligopolistic price coordination, as a competitive move, since the likelihood that the manufacturer's rivals would have regarded the pricing structure as an important signal that the manufacturer did not intend to attract additional smokers to the generic cigarette market is low given that other firms, including the plaintiff competing manufacturer which was the purported target of the defendant manufacturer's predatory pricing, had been using similar rebates.

EVIDENCE §343.5 > inference -- sufficiency -- antitrust -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[15][] [15]

Although some of a defendant cigarette manufacturer's corporate planning documents--introduced in evidence in a case involving alleged price discrimination in the generic cigarette market in violation of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a))--speak of a desire to slow the growth of that market, no objective evidence of the manufacturer's conduct permits a reasonable inference that the manufacturer had any real prospect of achieving such a slowdown through anticompetitive means, where (1) the manufacturer, in introducing a line of generic cigarettes, offered them to 1,000 wholesalers who had never before purchased generic cigarettes, (2) the unprecedentedly large volume rebates which the manufacturer offered to wholesalers provided substantial incentives for wholesalers to place large orders and so created strong pressure for wholesalers to sell more generic cigarettes, (3) many wholesalers stimulated demand by passing portions of the rebates on to consumers, and (4) the manufacturer provided further direct stimulus by spending $ 10 million placing discount stickers on cartons of generic cigarettes to reduce prices to the ultimate consumer; in the light of these facts, it is not reasonable to conclude that the manufacturer threatened in a serious way to restrict output, raise prices above a competitive level, and artificially slow the growth of the economy cigarette market.

EVIDENCE §874 > sufficiency -- expert testimony -- > Headnote:

When an expert opinion is not supported by sufficient facts to validate the opinion in the eyes of the law, or when indisputable record facts contradict or otherwise render the opinion unreasonable, the opinion cannot support a jury's verdict.

EVIDENCE §979 > sufficiency -- antitrust -- expert testimony -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[17][] [17]

In an antitrust case, expert opinion evidence has little probative value in comparison with the economic factors that may dictate a particular conclusion; specifically, in a case involving alleged price discrimination in the generic cigarette market in violation of 2(a) of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act (15 USCS 13(a)), an expert economic witness' opinion that the defendant cigarette manufacturer had a reasonable prospect of recouping its predatory losses cannot sustain a jury verdict in favor of the plaintiff competing manufacturer, where the evidence on which the expert's opinion was based amely (1) the fact that the defendant's pricing structure maintained existing list prices while offering substantial rebates to wholesalers, (2) corporate documents showing an intent to shrink the price differential between generic and branded cigarettes, and (3) evidence that the defendant had reduced its net prices to wholesalers for generic cigarettes below the defendant's cost--is insufficient as a matter of law to support a finding, for purposes of the Robinson-Patman Act, of primary-line injury to competition.

EVIDENCE §147 > presumption -- knowledge of law and facts -- > Headnote:

A reasonable jury in an antitrust case is presumed to know and understand the law, the facts of the case, and the realities of the market.

Syllabus

Cigarette manufacturing is a concentrated industry dominated by only six firms, including the two parties here. In 1980, petitioner (hereinafter Liggett) pioneered the economy segment of the market by developing a line of generic cigarettes offered at a list price roughly 30% lower than that of branded cigarettes. By 1984, generics had captured 4% of the market, at the expense of branded cigarettes, and respondent Brown & Williamson entered the economy segment, beating Liggett's net price. Liggett responded in kind, precipitating a price war, which ended, according to Liggett, with Brown & Williamson selling its generics at a loss. Liggett filed this suit, alleging, inter alia, that volume rebates by Brown & Williamson to wholesalers amounted to [*2] price discrimination that had a reasonable possibility of injuring competition in violation of § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. Liggett claimed that the rebates were integral to a predatory pricing scheme, in which Brown & Williamson set below-cost prices to pressure Liggett to raise list prices on its generics, thus restraining the economy segment's growth and preserving Brown & Williamson's supracompetitive profits on branded cigarettes. After a jury returned a verdict in favor of Liggett, the District Court held that Brown & Williamson was entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Among other things, it found a lack of injury to competition because there had been no slowing of the generics' growth rate and no tacit coordination of prices in the economy segment by the various manufacturers. In affirming, the Court of Appeals held that the dynamic of conscious parallelism among oligopolists could not produce competitive injury in a predatory pricing setting.

Held: Brown & Williamson is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Pp. 219-243.

(a) The Robinson-Patman Act, by its terms, condemns price discrimination only to the extent that [*3] it threatens to injure competition. A claim of primary-line competitive injury under the Act, the type alleged here, is of the same general character as a predatory pricing claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act: A business rival has priced its products in an unfair manner with an object to eliminate or retard competition and thereby gain and exercise control over prices in the relevant market. Utah Pie Co. v. Continental Baking Co., 386 U.S. 685, 18 L. Ed. 2d 406, 87 S. Ct. 1326, distinguished. Accordingly, two prerequisites to recovery are also the same. A plaintiff must prove (1) that the prices complained of are below an appropriate measure of its rival's costs and (2) that the competitor had a reasonable prospect of recouping its investment in below-cost prices. Without recoupment, even if predatory pricing causes the target painful losses, it produces lower aggregate prices in the market, and consumer welfare is enhanced. For recoupment to occur, the pricing must be capable, as a threshold matter, of producing the intended effects on the firm's rivals. This requires an understanding of the extent and duration of the alleged predation, the relative financial [*4] strength of the predator and its intended victim, and their respective incentives and will. The inquiry is whether, given the aggregate losses caused by the below-cost pricing, the intended target would likely succumb. If so, then there is the further question whether the below-cost pricing would likely injure competition in the relevant market. The plaintiff must demonstrate that there is a likelihood that the scheme alleged would cause a rise in prices above a competitive level sufficient to compensate for the amounts expended on the predation, including the time value of the money invested in it. Evidence of below-cost pricing is not alone sufficient to permit an inference of probable recoupment and injury to competition. The determination requires an estimate of the alleged predation's cost and a close analysis of both the scheme alleged and the relevant market's structure and conditions. Although not easy to establish, these prerequisites are essential components of real market injury. Pp. 219-227.

(b) An oligopoly's interdependent pricing may provide a means for achieving recoupment and thus may form the basis of a primary-line injury claim. Predatory pricing schemes, in [*5] general, are implausible, see Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 588-590, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348, and are even more improbable when they require coordinated action among several firms, id., at 590. They are least likely to occur where, as alleged here, the cooperation among firms is tacit, since effective tacit coordination is difficult to achieve; since there is a high likelihood that any attempt by one oligopolist to discipline a rival by cutting prices will produce an outbreak of competition; and since a predator's present losses fall on it alone, while the later supracompetitive profits must be shared with every other oligopolist in proportion to its market share, including the intended victim. Nonetheless, the Robinson-Patman Act suggests no exclusion from coverage when primary-line injury occurs in an oligopoly setting, and this Court declines to create a per se rule of nonliability. In order for all of the Act's words to carry adequate meaning, competitive injury under the Act must extend beyond the monopoly setting. Pp. 227-230.

(c) The record in this case demonstrates that the [*6] scheme Liggett alleged, when judged against the market's realities, does not provide an adequate basis for a finding of liability. While a reasonable jury could conclude that Brown & Williamson envisioned or intended an anticompetitive course of events and that the price of its generics was below its costs for 18 months, the evidence is inadequate to show that in pursuing this scheme, it had a reasonable prospect of recovering its losses from below-cost pricing through slowing the growth of generics. No inference of recoupment is sustainable on this record, because no evidence suggests that Brown & Williamson was likely to obtain the power to raise the prices for generic cigarettes above a competitive level, which is an indispensable aspect of Liggett's own proffered theory. The output and price information does not indicate that oligopolistic price coordination in fact produced supracompetitive prices in the generic segment. Nor does the evidence about the market and Brown & Williamson's conduct indicate that the alleged scheme was likely to have brought about tacit coordination and oligopoly pricing in that segment. Pp. 230-243.

LEdHN[1A][] [1A] [*8] This case stems from a market struggle that erupted in the domestic cigarette industry in the mid-1980's. Petitioner Brooke Group Ltd., whom we, like the parties to the case, refer to as Liggett because of its former corporate name, charges that to counter its innovative development of generic cigarettes, respondent Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation introduced its own line of generic cigarettes in an unlawful effort to stifle price competition in the economy segment of the national cigarette market. Liggett contends that Brown & Williamson cut prices on generic cigarettes below cost and offered discriminatory volume rebates to wholesalers to force Liggett to raise its own generic cigarette prices and introduce oligopoly pricing in the economy segment. We hold that Brown & Williamson is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

I

In 1980, Liggett pioneered the development of the economy segment of the national cigarette market by introducing a line of "black and white" generic cigarettes. The economy segment of the market, sometimes called the generic segment, is characterized by its bargain prices and comprises a variety of different products: black and whites, which are true [*9] generics sold in plain white packages with simple black lettering describing their contents; private label generics, which carry the trade dress of a specific purchaser, usually a retail chain; branded generics, which carry a brand name but which, like black and whites and private label generics, are sold at a deep discount and with little or no advertising; and "Value-25s," packages of 25 cigarettes that are sold to the consumer some 12.5% below the cost of a normal 20-cigarette pack. By 1984, when Brown & Williamson entered the generic segment and set in motion the series of events giving rise to this suit, Liggett's black and whites represented 97% of the generic segment, which in turn accounted for a little [*213] more than 4% of domestic cigarette sales. Prior to Liggett's introduction of black and whites in 1980, sales of generic cigarettes amounted to less than 1% of the domestic cigarette market.

Briefs of amici curiae were filed for the Business Roundtable by Thomas B. Leary; and for the Grocery Manufacturers of America, Inc., by Terry Calvani, W. Todd Miller, and C. Douglas Floyd.

Because of the procedural posture [180] of this case, we view the evidence in the light most favorable to Liggett. The parties are in basic agreement, however, regarding the central, historical facts. Cigarette manufacturing has long been one of America's most concentrated [*10] industries, see F. Scherer & D. Ross, Industrial Market Structure and Economic Performance 250 (3d ed. 1990) (hereinafter Scherer & Ross); App. 495-498, and for decades, production has been dominated by six firms: R. J. Reynolds, Philip Morris, American Brands, Lorillard, and the two litigants involved here, Liggett and Brown & Williamson. R.J. Reynolds and Philip Morris, the two industry leaders, enjoyed respective market shares of about 28% and 40% at the time of trial. Brown & Williamson ran a [2583] distant third, its market share never exceeding 12% at any time relevant to this dispute. Liggett's share of the market was even less, from a low of just over 2% in 1980 to a high of just over 5% in 1984.

The cigarette industry also has long been one of America's most profitable, in part because for many years there was no significant price competition among the rival firms. See Scherer & Ross 250-251; R. Tennant, American Cigarette Industry 86-87 (1950); App. 128, 500-509, 531. List prices for cigarettes increased in lockstep, twice a year, for a number of years, irrespective of the rate of inflation, changes in the costs of production, or shifts in consumer demand. Substantial [*11] evidence suggests that in recent decades, the industry reaped the benefits of prices above a competitive level, though not through unlawful conduct of the type that once characterized the industry. See Tennant, supra, at 275, 342; App. 389-392, 514-519, 658-659; cf. American Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 90 L. Ed. 1575, 66 S. Ct. 1125 (1946); United States [*214] v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U.S. 106, 55 L. Ed. 663, 31 S. Ct. 632 (1911); Scherer & Ross 451.

By 1980, however, broad market trends were working against the industry. Overall demand for cigarettes in the United States was declining, and no immediate prospect of recovery existed. As industry volume shrank, all firms developed substantial excess capacity. This decline in demand, coupled with the effects of nonprice competition, had a severe negative impact on Liggett. Once a major force in the industry, with market shares in excess of 20%, Liggett's market share had declined by 1980 to a little over 2%. With this meager share of the market, Liggett was on the verge of going out of business.

At the urging of a distributor, Liggett took an unusual step to [*12] revive its prospects: It developed a line of black and white generic cigarettes. When introduced in 1980, black and whites were offered to consumers at a list price roughly 30% lower than the list price of full-priced, branded cigarettes. They were also promoted at the wholesale level by means of rebates that increased with the volume of cigarettes ordered. Black and white cigarettes thus represented a new marketing category. The category's principal competitive characteristic was low price. Liggett's black and whites were an immediate and considerable success, growing from a fraction of a percent of the market at their introduction to over 4% of the total cigarette market by early 1984.

As the market for Liggett's generic [181] cigarettes expanded, the other cigarette companies found themselves unable to ignore the economy segment. In general, the growth of generics came at the expense of the other firms' profitable sales of branded cigarettes. Brown & Williamson was hardest hit, because many of Brown & Williamson's brands were favored by consumers who were sensitive to changes in cigarette prices. Although Brown & Williamson sold only 11.4% of the market's branded cigarettes, [*13] 20% of the converts to [*215] Liggett's black and whites had switched from a Brown & Williamson brand. Losing volume and profits in its branded products, Brown & Williamson determined to enter the generic segment of the cigarette market. In July 1983, Brown & Williamson had begun selling Value-25s, and in the spring of 1984, it introduced its own black and white cigarette.

Brown & Williamson was neither the first nor the only cigarette company to recognize the threat posed by Liggett's black and whites and to respond in the economy segment. R.J. Reynolds had also introduced a Value-25 in 1983. And before Brown & Williamson introduced its own black and whites, R.J. Reynolds had repriced its "Doral" branded cigarette at generic levels. To compete with Liggett's black and whites, R.J. Reynolds dropped its list price on Doral about 30% and used volume rebates to wholesalers as an incentive to spur orders. Doral was the first competition at Liggett's price level.

[2584] Brown & Williamson's entry was an even graver threat to Liggett's dominance of the generic category. Unlike R. J. Reynolds' Doral, Brown & Williamson's product was also a black and white and so would be in [*14] direct competition with Liggett's product at the wholesale level and on the retail shelf. Because Liggett's and Brown

& Williamson's black and whites were more or less fungible, wholesalers had little incentive to carry more than one line. And unlike R. J. Reynolds, Brown & Williamson not only matched Liggett's prices but beat them. At the retail level, the suggested list price of Brown & Williamson's black and whites was the same as Liggett's, but Brown & Williamson's volume discounts to wholesalers were larger. Brown & Williamson's rebate structure also encompassed a greater number of volume categories than Liggett's, with the highest categories carrying special rebates for orders of very substantial size. Brown & Williamson marketed its black and whites to Liggett's existing distributors as well as to its own full list of [*216] buyers, which included a thousand wholesalers who had not yet carried any generic products.

Liggett responded to Brown & Williamson's introduction of black and whites in two ways. First, Liggett increased its own wholesale rebates. This precipitated a price war at the wholesale level, in which Liggett five times attempted to beat the rebates offered [*15] by Brown & Williamson. At the end of each round, Brown & Williamson maintained a real advantage over Liggett's prices. Although it is undisputed that Brown & Williamson's original net price for its black and whites was above its costs, Liggett contends that by the end of the rebate war, Brown & Williamson was selling its black and whites at a loss. This rebate war occurred before Brown & Williamson [182] had sold a single black and white cigarette.

Liggett's second response was to file a lawsuit. Two weeks after Brown & Williamson announced its entry into the generic segment, again before Brown & Williamson had sold any generic cigarettes, Liggett filed a complaint in the United States District Court for the Middle District of North Carolina alleging trademark infringement and unfair competition. Liggett later amended its complaint to add an antitrust claim under § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 49 Stat. 1526, 15 U.S.C. § 13(a), which alleged illegal price discrimination between Brown & Williamson's full-priced branded cigarettes and its low-priced generics. See Liggett Group, Inc. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 1989-1 Trade Cas. (CCH) P 68,583, p. 61,099 (MDNC 1988). [*16] These claims were either dismissed on summary judgment, see ibid., or rejected by the jury. They were not appealed.

Liggett also amended its complaint to add a second Robinson-Patman Act claim, which is the subject of the present controversy. Liggett alleged that Brown & Williamson's volume rebates to wholesalers amounted to price discrimination that had a reasonable possibility of injuring competition, [*217] in violation of § 2(a). Liggett claimed that Brown & Williamson's discriminatory volume rebates were integral to a scheme of predatory pricing, in which Brown & Williamson reduced its net prices for generic cigarettes below average variable costs. According to Liggett, these below-cost prices were not promotional but were intended to pressure it to raise its list prices on generic cigarettes, so that the percentage price difference between generic and branded cigarettes would narrow. Liggett explained that it would have been unable to reduce its wholesale rebates without losing substantial market share to Brown & Williamson; its only choice, if it wished to avoid prolonged losses on its principal product line, was to raise retail prices. The resulting reduction in [*17] the list price gap, it was said, would restrain the growth of the economy segment and preserve Brown & Williamson's supracompetitive profits on its branded cigarettes.

[2585] The trial began in the fall of 1989. By that time, all six cigarette companies had entered the economy segment. The economy segment was the fastest growing segment of the cigarette market, having increased from about 4% of the market in 1984, when the rebate war in generics began, to about 15% in 1989. Black and white generics had declined as a force in the economy segment as consumer interest shifted toward branded generics, but Liggett's overall volume had increased steadily to 9 billion generic cigarettes sold. Overall, the 2.8 billion generic cigarettes sold in 1981 had become 80 billion by 1989.

The consumer price of generics had increased along with output. For a year, the list prices for generic cigarettes established at the end of the rebate war remained stable. But in June 1985, Liggett raised its list price, and the other firms followed several months later. The precise effect of the list price increase is difficult to assess, because all of the cigarette firms offered a variety of discounts, [*18] coupons, and other promotions directly to consumers on both [183] generic and [*218] branded cigarettes. Nonetheless, at least some portion of the list price increase was reflected in a higher net price to the consumer.

In December 1985, Brown & Williamson attempted to increase its list prices, but retracted the announced increase when the other firms adhered to their existing prices. Thus, after Liggett's June 1985 increase, list prices on generics did not change again until the summer of 1986, when a pattern of twice yearly increases in tandem with the full-priced branded cigarettes was established. The dollar amount of these increases was the same for generic and full-priced cigarettes, which resulted in a greater percentage price increase in the less expensive generic cigarettes and a narrowing of the percentage gap between the list price of branded and black and white cigarettes, from approximately 38% at the time Brown & Williamson entered the segment to approximately 27% at the time of trial. Also by the time of trial, five of the six manufacturers, including Liggett, had introduced so-called "subgenerics," a category of branded generic cigarettes that sold at a [*19] discount of 50% or more off the list price of full-priced branded cigarettes.

After a 115-day trial involving almost 3,000 exhibits and over a score of witnesses, the jury returned a verdict in favor of Liggett, finding on the special verdict form that Brown & Williamson had engaged in price discrimination that had a reasonable possibility of injuring competition in the domestic cigarette market as a whole. The jury awarded Liggett $ 49.6 million in damages, which the District Court trebled to $ 148.8 million. After reviewing the record, however, the District Court held that Brown & Williamson was entitled to judgment as a matter of law on three separate grounds: lack of injury to competition, lack of antitrust injury to Liggett, and lack of a causal link between the discriminatory rebates and Liggett's alleged injury. Liggett Group, Inc. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 748 F. Supp. 344 (MDNC 1990). With respect to the first issue, which is the [*219] only one before us, the District Court found that no slowing of the growth rate of generics, and thus no injury to competition, was possible unless there had been tacit coordination of prices in the [*20] economy segment of the cigarette market by the various manufacturers. Id., at 354-355. The District Court held that a reasonable jury could come to but one conclusion about the existence of such coordination among the firms contending for shares of the economy segment: it did not exist, and Brown & Williamson therefore had no reasonable possibility of limiting the growth of the segment. Id., at 356-358.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed. Liggett Group, Inc. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 964 F.2d 335 (1992). The Court of Appeals held that the dynamic of conscious parallelism among oligopolists could not produce competitive injury in a predatory pricing setting, which necessarily involves a price cut by one of the oligopolists. Id., at 342. In the [2586] Court of Appeals' view, "to rely on the characteristics of an oligopoly to assure recoupment of losses from a predatory pricing scheme after one oligopolist has made a competitive move is . . . economically irrational." Ibid.

We granted certiorari, 506 U.S. 984 (1992), and now affirm.

[21] LEdHN[2][] [2]Price discrimination is made unlawful by § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, which provides:

> HN1[] "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality . . . where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent [*220] competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them." 15 U.S.C. § 13(a).

Although we have reiterated that HN2[] "'a price discrimination within the meaning of [this] provision is merely a price difference,'" Texaco Inc. v. Hasbrouck, 496 U.S. 543, 558, 110 L. Ed. 2d 492, 110 S. Ct. 2535 (1990) [*22] (quoting FTC v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 363 U.S. 536, 549, 4 L. Ed. 2d 1385, 80 S. Ct. 1267 (1960)), the statute as a practical matter could not, and does not, ban all price differences charged to "different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality." Instead, the statute contains a number of important limitations, one of which is central to evaluating Liggett's claim: HN3[] By its terms, the Robinson-Patman Act condemns price discrimination only to the extent that it threatens to injure competition. The availability of statutory defenses permitting price discrimination when it is based on differences in costs, § 13(a), "changing conditions affecting the market for or the marketability of the goods concerned," ibid., or conduct undertaken "in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor," § 13(b); Standard Oil Co. v. FTC, 340 U.S. 231, 250, 95 L. Ed. 239, 71 S. Ct. 240 (1951), confirms that Congress did not intend to outlaw price differences that result from or further the forces of competition. Thus, [*23] HN4[] "the Robinson-Patman Act should be construed consistently with broader policies of the antitrust laws." Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. v. FTC, 440 U.S. 69, 80, n. 13, 59 L. Ed. 2d 153, 99 S. Ct. 925 (1979). See also Automatic Canteen Co. of America v. FTC, 346 U.S. 61, 63, 74, 97 L. Ed. 1454, 73 S. Ct. 1017 (1953).

Liggett contends that Brown & Williamson's discriminatory volume rebates to wholesalers threatened substantial competitive injury by furthering a predatory pricing scheme designed to purge competition from the economy segment of the cigarette market. This type of injury, which harms direct competitors of the discriminating seller, is known as primary-line injury. See FTC v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., supra, at 538. We last addressed primary-line injury over 25 years ago, in Utah Pie Co. v. Continental Baking Co., [*221] 386 U.S. 685, 18 L. Ed. 2d 406, 87 S. Ct. 1326 (1967). In Utah Pie, we reviewed the sufficiency of the evidence supporting jury verdicts against three national pie companies that had engaged in a variety of [185] [*24] predatory practices in the market for frozen pies in Salt Lake City, with the intent to drive a local pie manufacturer out of business. We reversed the Court of Appeals and held that the evidence presented was adequate to permit a jury to find a likelihood of injury to competition. Id., at 703.

LEdHN[3A][] [3A]Utah Pie has often been interpreted to permit liability for primary-line price discrimination on a mere showing that the defendant intended to harm competition or produced a declining price structure. The case [2587] has been criticized on the ground that such low standards of competitive injury are at odds with the antitrust laws' traditional concern for consumer welfare and price competition. See Bowman, Restraint of Trade by the Supreme Court: The Utah Pie Case, 77 Yale L. J. 70 (1967); R. Posner, Antitrust Law: An Economic Perspective 193-194 (1976); L. Sullivan, Antitrust 687 (1977); 3 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law P720c (1978) (hereinafter Areeda & Turner); R. Bork, The Antitrust Paradox 386-387 (1978); H. Hovenkamp, Economics and Federal Antitrust Law 188-189 (1985). [*25] We do not regard the Utah Pie case itself as having the full significance attributed to it by its detractors. Utah Pie was an early judicial inquiry in this area and did not purport to set forth explicit, general standards for establishing a violation of the Robinson-Patman Act. As the law has been explored since Utah Pie, it has become evident that HN5[] primary-line competitive injury under the Robinson-Patman Act is of the same general character as the injury inflicted by predatory pricing schemes actionable under § 2 of the Sherman Act. See, e.g., Henry v. Chloride, Inc., 809 F.2d 1334, 1345 (CA8 1987); D. E. Rogers Associates, Inc. v. Gardner-Denver Co., 718 F.2d 1431, 1439 (CA6 1983), cert. denied, 467 U.S. 1242, 82 L. Ed. 2d 822, 104 S. Ct. 3513 (1984); William Inglis & Sons Baking Co. v. ITT Continental Baking Co., 668 F.2d 1014, 1041 (CA9 1981), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 825, 74 L. Ed. 2d 61, 103 S. Ct. 57, 103 S. Ct. 58 (1982); [*222] Malcolm v. Marathon Oil Co., 642 F.2d 845, 853, n. 16 [*26] (CA5), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1125, 71 L. Ed. 2d 113, 102 S. Ct. 975 (1981); Pacific Engineering & Production Co. of Nevada v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 551 F.2d 790, 798 (CA10), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 879, 54 L. Ed. 2d 160, 98 S. Ct. 234 (1977); International Telephone & Telegraph Corp., 104 F.T.C. 280, 401-402 (1984); Hovenkamp, supra, at 189; 3 Areeda & Turner P720c; P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P720c (Supp. 1992) (hereinafter Areeda & Hovenkamp). There are, to be sure, differences between the two statutes. For example, we interpret § 2 of the Sherman Act to condemn predatory pricing when it poses "a dangerous probability of actual monopolization," Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 455, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247, 113 S. Ct. 884 (1993), whereas the Robinson-Patman Act requires only that there be "a reasonable possibility" of substantial injury to competition before its protections are triggered, Falls City Industries, Inc. v. Vanco Beverage, Inc., 460 U.S. 428, 434, 75 L. Ed. 2d 174, 103 S. Ct. 1282 (1983). But whatever additional flexibility the Robinson-Patman [*27] Act standard may imply, the essence of the claim under either statute is the same: A business rival has priced its products in an unfair manner with an object to eliminate or retard competition and thereby gain and exercise [186] control over prices in the relevant market.

LEdHN[3B][] [3B]LEdHN[4A][] [4A]Accordingly, whether the claim alleges predatory pricing under § 2 of the Sherman Act or primary-line price discrimination under the Robinson-Patman Act, two prerequisites to recovery remain the same. First, HN6[] a plaintiff seeking to establish competitive injury resulting from a rival's low prices must prove that the prices complained of are below an appropriate measure of its rival's costs. [1] See, e.g., Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 117, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427, 107 S. Ct. 484 (1986);Matsushita [*223] Elec. Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 585, n. 8, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986); [*28] Utah Pie, 386 U.S. at 698, 701, 702-703, n. 14;In re E. I. DuPont de Nemours & Co., 96 F.T.C. 653, 749 (1980).Cf. United States v. National Dairy Products Corp., 372 U.S. 29, 9 L. Ed. 2d 561, 83 S. Ct. 594 (1963) (holding that below-cost prices may constitute "unreasonably [2588] low" prices for purposes of § 3 of the Robinson-Patman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 13a). Although Cargill and Matsushita reserved as a formal matter the question "'whether recovery should ever be available . . . when the pricing in question is above some measure of incremental cost,'" Cargill, supra, at 117-118, n. 12 (quoting Matsushita, supra, at 585, n. 9), the reasoning in both opinions suggests that only below-cost prices should suffice, and we have rejected elsewhere the notion that HN7[] above-cost prices that are below general market levels or the costs of a firm's competitors inflict injury to competition cognizable under the antitrust laws. See Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 340, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333, 110 S. Ct. 1884 (1990). [*29] "Low prices benefit consumers regardless of how those prices are set, and so long as they are above predatory levels, they do not threaten competition. . . . We have adhered to this principle regardless of the type of antitrust claim involved." Ibid. As a general rule, the exclusionary effect of prices above a relevant measure of cost either reflects the lower cost structure of the alleged predator, and so represents competition on the merits, or is beyond the practical ability of a judicial tribunal to control without courting intolerable risks of chilling legitimate price cutting. See Areeda & Hovenkamp PP714.2, 714.3. "To hold that the antitrust laws protect competitors from the loss of profits due to such price competition would, in effect, render illegal any decision by a firm to cut prices in order to increase market share. The antitrust laws require no such perverse result." Cargill, supra, at 116.

[30] Even in an oligopolistic market, when a firm drops its prices to a competitive level to demonstrate to a maverick the unprofitability of straying from the group, it would be [*224] illogical to condemn the price cut: The antitrust laws then would be an obstacle to the chain of events most [187] conducive to a breakdown of oligopoly pricing and the onset of competition. Even if the ultimate effect of the cut is to induce or reestablish supracompetitive pricing, discouraging a price cut and forcing firms to maintain supracompetitive prices, thus depriving consumers of the benefits of lower prices in the interim, does not constitute sound antitrust policy. Cf. Areeda & Hovenkamp PP714.2d, 714.2f; Areeda & Turner, Predatory Pricing and Related Practices under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 88 Harv. L. Rev. 697, 708-709 (1975); Posner, Antitrust Law: An Economic Perspective, at 195, n. 39.

HN8[] The second prerequisite to holding a competitor liable under the antitrust laws for charging low prices is a demonstration that the competitor had a reasonable prospect, or, under § [*31] 2 of the Sherman Act, a dangerous probability, of recouping its investment in below-cost prices. See Matsushita, supra, at 589; Cargill, supra, at 119, n. 15. "For the investment to be rational, the [predator] must have a reasonable expectation of recovering, in the form of later monopoly profits, more than the losses suffered." Matsushita, supra, at 588-589. Recoupment is the ultimate object of an unlawful predatory pricing scheme; it is the means by which a predator profits from predation. Without it, predatory pricing produces lower aggregate prices in the market, and consumer welfare is enhanced. Although unsuccessful predatory pricing may encourage some inefficient substitution toward the product being sold at less than its cost, unsuccessful predation is in general a boon to consumers.

[1] Because the parties in this case agree that the relevant measure of cost is average variable cost, however, we again decline to resolve the conflict among the lower courts over the appropriate measure of cost. See Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colorado, Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 117-118, n. 12, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427, 107 S. Ct. 484 (1986); Matsushita Elec. Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 585, n. 8, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986).

LEdHN[5][] [5]That below-cost pricing may impose painful losses on its target is of no moment to the antitrust laws if competition is not injured: It is axiomatic that the antitrust laws were passed for "the protection of competition, not competitors." Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510, 82 S. Ct. 1502 [2589] (1962). [*32] Earlier this Term, we held in the Sherman Act § 2 context [*225] that it was not enough to inquire "whether the defendant has engaged in 'unfair' or 'predatory' tactics"; rather, we insisted that the plaintiff prove "a dangerous probability that [the defendant] would monopolize a particular market." Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 459. HN9[] Even an act of pure malice by one business competitor against another does not, without more, state a claim under the federal antitrust laws; those laws do not create a federal law of unfair competition or "purport to afford remedies for all torts committed by or against persons engaged in interstate commerce." Hunt v. Crumboch, 325 U.S. 821, 826, 89 L. Ed. 1954, 65 S. Ct. 1545 (1945).

LEdHN[6][] [6]For recoupment to occur, below-cost pricing must be capable, as a threshold matter, of producing the intended effects on the firm's rivals, whether driving them from the market, or, as was alleged to be the goal here, causing them to raise their prices to supracompetitive levels within a disciplined oligopoly. This requires an understanding of [*33] the extent and duration of the alleged predation, the relative financial strength of the predator and its intended victim, and their respective incentives and will. See 3 Areeda & Turner P711b. The inquiry is whether, given the aggregate losses [188] caused by the below-cost pricing, the intended target would likely succumb.

If circumstances indicate that below-cost pricing could likely produce its intended effect on the target, there is still the further question whether it would likely injure competition in the relevant market. The plaintiff must demonstrate that there is a likelihood that the predatory scheme alleged would cause a rise in prices above a competitive level that would be sufficient to compensate for the amounts expended on the predation, including the time value of the money invested in it. As we have observed on a prior occasion, "in order to recoup their losses, [predators] must obtain enough market power to set higher than competitive prices, and then must sustain those prices long enough to earn in excess [*226] profits what they earlier gave up in below-cost prices." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 590-591.

[34] HN10[] Evidence of below-cost pricing is not alone sufficient to permit an inference of probable recoupment and injury to competition. HN11[] Determining whether recoupment of predatory losses is likely requires an estimate of the cost of the alleged predation and a close analysis of both the scheme alleged by the plaintiff and the structure and conditions of the relevant market. Cf., e.g., Elzinga & Mills, Testing for Predation: Is Recoupment Feasible?, 34 Antitrust Bull. 869 (1989) (constructing one possible model for evaluating recoupment). If market circumstances or deficiencies in proof would bar a reasonable jury from finding that the scheme alleged would likely result in sustained supracompetitive pricing, the plaintiff's case has failed. In certain situations -- for example, where the market is highly diffuse and competitive, or where new entry is easy, or the defendant lacks adequate excess capacity to absorb the market shares of his rivals and cannot quickly create or purchase new capacity -- summary disposition of the case [*35] is appropriate. See, e.g., Cargill, 479 U.S. at 119-120, n. 15.

These prerequisites to recovery are not easy to establish, but they are not artificial obstacles to recovery; rather, they are essential components of real market injury. As we have said in the Sherman Act context, "predatory pricing schemes are rarely tried, and even more rarely successful," Matsushita, supra, at 589, and the costs of an erroneous finding of liability are high. "The mechanism by which a firm engages in predatory pricing -- lowering prices -- is the same mechanism by which a firm stimulates competition; because 'cutting prices in order to increase business often is the very essence of competition . . . [;] mistaken inferences . . . are especially costly, [2590] because they chill the very conduct the antitrust laws are designed to protect.'" Cargill, supra, at 122, n. 17 (quoting Matsushita, supra, at 594). It would be ironic indeed if the standards for predatory pricing liability [*227] were so low that antitrust suits themselves became a tool for keeping prices high.

LEdHN[7][] [7] [*36] Liggett does not allege that Brown & Williamson sought to drive [189] it from the market but that Brown & Williamson sought to preserve supracompetitive profits on branded cigarettes by pressuring Liggett to raise its generic cigarette prices through a process of tacit collusion with the other cigarette companies. Tacit collusion, sometimes called oligopolistic price coordination or conscious parallelism, describes the process, not in itself unlawful, by which firms in a concentrated market might in effect share monopoly power, setting their prices at a profit-maximizing, supracompetitive level by recognizing their shared economic interests and their interdependence with respect to price and output decisions. See 2 Areeda & Turner P404; Scherer & Ross 199-208.

In Matsushita, we remarked upon the general implausibility of predatory pricing. See 475 U.S. at 588-590. Matsushita observed that such schemes are even more improbable when they require coordinated action among several firms. Id., at 590. Matsushita involved an allegation of an express conspiracy to engage in predatory pricing. The Court noted that in addition to the usual [*37] difficulties that face a single firm attempting to recoup predatory losses, other problems render a conspiracy "incalculably more difficult to execute." Ibid. In order to succeed, the conspirators must agree on how to allocate present losses and future gains among the firms involved, and each firm must resist powerful incentives to cheat on whatever agreement is reached. Ibid.

However unlikely predatory pricing by multiple firms may be when they conspire, it is even less likely when, as here, there is no express coordination. Firms that seek to recoup predatory losses through the conscious parallelism of oligopoly must rely on uncertain and ambiguous signals to achieve concerted action. The signals are subject to misinterpretation and are a blunt and imprecise means of ensuring smooth [*228] cooperation, especially in the context of changing or unprecedented market circumstances. This anticompetitive minuet is most difficult to compose and to perform, even for a disciplined oligopoly.

From one standpoint, recoupment through oligopolistic price coordination could be thought more feasible than recoupment through monopoly: In the oligopoly setting, the victim itself has [*38] an economic incentive to acquiesce in the scheme. If forced to choose between cutting prices and sustaining losses, maintaining prices and losing market share, or raising prices and enjoying a share of supracompetitive profits, a firm may yield to the last alternative. Yet on the whole, tacit cooperation among oligopolists must be considered the least likely means of recouping predatory losses. In addition to the difficulty of achieving effective tacit coordination and the high likelihood that any attempt to discipline will produce an outbreak of competition, the predator's present losses in a case like this fall on it alone, while the later supracompetitive profits must be shared with every other oligopolist in proportion to its market share, including the intended victim. In this case, for example, Brown & Williamson, with its 11-12% share of the cigarette market, would have had to generate around $ 9 in supracompetitive profits for each $ 1 invested in predation; the remaining [190] $ 8 would belong to its competitors, who had taken no risk.

Liggett suggests that these considerations led the Court of Appeals to rule out its theory of recovery as a matter of law. Although [*39] [2591] the proper interpretation of the Court of Appeals' opinion is not free from doubt, there is some indication that it held as a matter of law that the Robinson-Patman Act does not reach a primary-line injury claim in which tacit coordination among oligopolists provides the alleged basis for recoupment. The Court of Appeals' opinion does not contain the traditional apparatus of fact review; rather, it focuses on theoretical and legal arguments. The final paragraph appears to state the holding: Brown & Williamson [*229] may not be held liable because oligopoly pricing does not "'provide an economically rational basis'" for recouping predatory losses. 964 F.2d at 342.

LEdHN[8A][] [8A]To the extent that the Court of Appeals may have held that the interdependent pricing of an oligopoly may never provide a means for achieving recoupment and so may not form the basis of a primary-line injury claim, we disagree. A predatory pricing scheme designed to preserve or create a stable oligopoly, if successful, can injure consumers in the same way, and to the same extent, as one designed to bring about [*40] a monopoly. However unlikely that possibility may be as a general matter, when the realities of the market and the record facts indicate that it has occurred and was likely to have succeeded, theory will not stand in the way of liability. See Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Services, Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 466-467, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265, 112 S. Ct. 2072 (1992).

LEdHN[8B][] [8B]LEdHN[9][] [9]The Robinson-Patman Act, which amended § 2 of the original Clayton Act, suggests no exclusion from coverage when primary-line injury occurs in an oligopoly setting. Unlike the provisions of the Sherman Act, which speak only of various forms of express agreement and monopoly, see 15 U.S. C. §§ 1, 2, the Robinson-Patman Act is phrased in broader, disjunctive terms, prohibiting price discrimination "where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly," 15 U.S. C. § 13(a). For all the words of the Act to carry adequate meaning, competitive injury under [*41] the Act must extend beyond the monopoly setting. Cf. Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 339, 60 L. Ed. 2d 931, 99 S. Ct. 2326 (1979) ("Canons of construction ordinarily suggest that terms connected by a disjunctive be given separate meanings, unless the context dictates otherwise"). The language referring to a substantial lessening of competition was part of the original Clayton Act § 2, see Act of Oct. 15, 1914, ch. 322, 38 Stat. 730, and the same phrasing appears in § 7 of that Act. In the § 7 context, it has long been settled that excessive concentration, and the oligopolistic price coordination [*230] it portends, may be the injury to competition the Act prohibits. See, e.g., United States v. Philadelphia Nat. Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915, 83 S. Ct. 1715 (1963). We adhere to HN12[] "the normal rule of statutory construction that identical words used in different parts of the same act are intended to have the same meaning." Sullivan v. Stroop, 496 U.S. 478, 484, 110 L. Ed. 2d 438, 110 S. Ct. 2499 (1990) [*42] (internal quotation marks omitted). See also J. Truett Payne Co. v. [191] Chrysler Motors Corp., 451 U.S. 557, 562, 68 L. Ed. 2d 442, 101 S. Ct. 1923 (1981) (evaluating the competitive injury requirement of Robinson-Patman Act § 2(a) in light of analogous interpretations of Clayton Act § 7). We decline to create a per se rule of nonliability for predatory price discrimination when recoupment is alleged to take place through supracompetitive oligopoly pricing. Cf. Cargill, 479 U.S. at 121.

LEdHN[1B][] [1B]LEdHN[10][] [10]Although Liggett's theory of liability, as an abstract matter, is within the reach of the statute, we agree with the Court of Appeals and the District Court that Liggett was not entitled to submit its case to the jury. HN13[] It is not customary for this Court to review the sufficiency of the evidence, but we will do so when the issue is properly before us and the benefits of providing guidance [*43] [2592] concerning the proper application of a legal standard and avoiding the systemic costs associated with further proceedings justify the required expenditure of judicial resources. See, e.g., Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 605-611, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467, 105 S. Ct. 2847 (1985);Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 765-768, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775, 104 S. Ct. 1464 (1984);United States v. Pabst Brewing Co., 384 U.S. 546, 550-552, 16 L. Ed. 2d 765, 86 S. Ct. 1665 (1966). The record in this case demonstrates that the anticompetitive scheme Liggett alleged, when judged against the realities of the market, does not provide an adequate basis for a finding of liability.

LEdHN[1C][] [1C]Liggett's theory of competitive injury through oligopolistic price coordination depends upon a complex chain of cause [*231] and effect: Brown & Williamson would enter the generic segment with list prices matching Liggett's but with massive, discriminatory volume rebates directed at Liggett's biggest wholesalers; as a result, [*44] the net price of Brown & Williamson's generics would be below its costs; Liggett would suffer losses trying to defend its market share and wholesale customer base by matching Brown & Williamson's rebates; to avoid further losses, Liggett would raise its list prices on generics or acquiesce in price leadership by Brown & Williamson; higher list prices to consumers would shrink the percentage gap in retail price between generic and branded cigarettes; and this narrowing of the gap would make generics less appealing to the consumer, thus slowing the growth of the economy segment and reducing cannibalization of branded sales and their associated supracompetitive profits.

Although Brown & Williamson's entry into the generic segment could be regarded as procompetitive in intent as well as effect, the record contains sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Brown & Williamson envisioned or intended this anticompetitive course of events. See, e.g., App. 57-58, 67-68, 89-91, 99, 112-114, 200, 241, 253, 257, 262-263, 279-280, 469-470, 664-666. There is also sufficient evidence in the record from which a reasonable jury could conclude that for a period of approximately [*45] 18 months, Brown & Williamson's prices on its generic cigarettes were below its costs, see id., at 338-339, 651, 740, and that this below-cost pricing imposed losses on Liggett [192] that Liggett was unwilling to sustain, given its corporate parent's effort to locate a buyer for the company, see id., at 74, 92, 200, 253, 596-597. Liggett has failed to demonstrate competitive injury as a matter of law, however, because its proof is flawed in a critical respect: The evidence is inadequate to show that in pursuing this scheme, Brown & Williamson had a reasonable prospect of recovering its losses from below-cost pricing through slowing the growth of generics. As we have noted, HN14[] "the success of any predatory [*232] scheme depends on maintaining monopoly power for long enough both to recoup the predator's losses and to harvest some additional gain." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 589 (emphasis omitted).

No inference of recoupment is sustainable on this record, because no evidence suggests that Brown & Williamson -- whatever its intent in introducing black and whites [*46] may have been -- was likely to obtain the power to raise the prices for generic cigarettes above a competitive level. Recoupment through supracompetitive pricing in the economy segment of the cigarette market is an indispensable aspect of Liggett's own proffered theory, because a slowing of growth in the economy segment, even if it results from an increase in generic prices, is not itself anticompetitive. Only if those higher prices are a product of nonmarket forces has competition suffered. If prices rise in response to an excess of demand over supply, or segment growth slows as patterns of consumer preference become stable, the market is [2593] functioning in a competitive manner. Consumers are not injured from the perspective of the antitrust laws by the price increases; they are in fact causing them. Thus, the linchpin of the predatory scheme alleged by Liggett is Brown & Williamson's ability, with the other oligopolists, to raise prices above a competitive level in the generic segment of the market. HN15[] Because relying on tacit coordination among oligopolists as a means of recouping [*47] losses from predatory pricing is "highly speculative," Areeda & Hovenkamp P711.2c, at 647, competent evidence is necessary to allow a reasonable inference that it poses an authentic threat to competition. The evidence in this case is insufficient to demonstrate the danger of Brown & Williamson's alleged scheme.

Based on Liggett's theory of the case and the record it created, there are two means by which one might infer that [*233] Brown & Williamson had a reasonable prospect of producing sustained supracompetitive pricing in the generic segment adequate to recoup its predatory losses: first, if generic output or price information indicates that oligopolistic price coordination in fact produced supracompetitive prices in the generic segment; or second, if evidence about the market and Brown & Williamson's conduct indicate that the alleged scheme was likely to have brought about tacit coordination and oligopoly pricing in the generic segment, even if it did not actually do so.

LEdHN[1D][] [1D]LEdHN[11][] [11]In this case, the price and output data [*48] do not support a reasonable inference that Brown & Williamson and the other cigarette companies [193] elevated prices above a competitive level for generic cigarettes. Supracompetitive pricing entails a restriction in output. See National Collegiate Athletic Assn. v. Board of Regents of Univ. of Okla., 468 U.S. 85, 104-108, 82 L. Ed. 2d 70, 104 S. Ct. 2948 (1984);Broadcast Music, Inc. v. Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc., 441 U.S. 1, 19-20, 60 L. Ed. 2d 1, 99 S. Ct. 1551 (1979); P. Samuelson & W. Nordhaus, Economics 516 (12th ed. 1985); Sullivan, Antitrust, at 32; Bork, The Antitrust Paradox, at 178-179; 2 Areeda & Turner P403a; Easterbrook, The Limits of Antitrust, 63 Texas L. Rev. 1, 20, 31 (1984).In the present setting, in which output expanded at a rapid rate following Brown & Williamson's alleged predation, output in the generic segment can only have been restricted in the sense that it expanded at a slower rate than it would have absent Brown & Williamson's intervention. Such a counterfactual proposition is difficult to prove in the best of circumstances; here, the record evidence does not permit a reasonable [*49] inference that output would have been greater without Brown & Williamson's entry into the generic segment.

Following Brown & Williamson's entry, the rate at which generic cigarettes were capturing market share did not slow; indeed, the average rate of growth doubled. During the [*234] four years from 1980 to 1984 in which Liggett was alone in the generic segment, the segment gained market share at an average rate of 1% of the overall market per year, from 0.4% in 1980 to slightly more than 4% of the cigarette market in 1984. In the next five years, following the alleged predation, the generic segment expanded from 4% to more than 15% of the domestic cigarette market, or greater than 2% per year.

While this evidence tends to show that Brown & Williamson's participation in the economy segment did not restrict output, it is not dispositive. One could speculate, for example, that the rate of segment growth would have tripled, instead of doubled, without Brown & Williamson's alleged predation. But there is no concrete evidence of this. Indeed, the only industry projection in the record estimating what the segment's growth would have been without Brown & Williamson's entry supports [*50] the opposite inference. In 1984, Brown & Williamson forecast in an [2594] important planning document that the economy segment would account for 10% of the total cigarette market by 1988 if it did not enter the segment. App. 133, 135. In fact, in 1988, after what Liggett alleges was a sustained and dangerous anticompetitive campaign by Brown & Williamson, the generic segment accounted for over 12% of the total market. Id., at 354-356. Thus the segment's output expanded more robustly than Brown & Williamson had estimated it would had Brown & Williamson never entered.

Brown & Williamson did note in 1985, a year after introducing its black and whites, that its presence within the generic segment "appears to have resulted in . . . a slowing in the segment's growth rate." Id., at 257. But this statement was made in early 1985, when Liggett itself contends the below-cost pricing was still in effect and before any anticompetitive contraction in output is alleged to have occurred.

[*235] Whatever it may [194] mean, [2] this statement has little value in evaluating the competitive implications of Brown & Williamson's later conduct, which was alleged to provide [*51] the basis for recouping predatory losses.

LEdHN[12][] [12]In arguing that Brown & Williamson was able to exert market power and raise generic prices above a competitive level in the generic category through tacit price coordination with the other cigarette manufacturers, Liggett places its principal reliance on direct evidence of price behavior. This evidence demonstrates that the list prices on all cigarettes, generic and branded alike, rose to a significant degree during the late 1980's. Id., at 325. From 1986 to 1989, list prices on both generic and branded cigarettes increased twice a year by similar amounts. Liggett's economic expert testified that these price increases outpaced increases in costs, taxes, [*52] and promotional expenditures. Id., at 525. The list prices of generics, moreover, rose at a faster rate than the prices of branded cigarettes, thus narrowing the list price differential between branded and generic products. Id., at 325. Liggett argues that this would permit a reasonable jury to find that Brown & Williamson succeeded in bringing about oligopolistic price coordination and supracompetitive prices in the generic category sufficient to slow its growth, thereby preserving supracompetitive branded profits and recouping its predatory losses.

A reasonable jury, however, could not have drawn the inferences Liggett proposes. All of Liggett's data are based upon the list prices of various categories of cigarettes. Yet the jury had before it undisputed evidence that during the period in question, list prices were not the actual prices paid by consumers. 100 Tr. 227-229. As the market became unsettled [*236] in the mid-1980's, the cigarette companies invested substantial sums in promotional schemes, including coupons, stickers, and giveaways, that reduced the actual cost of cigarettes to consumers below list prices. 33 Tr. 206-209, 51 Tr. 130. This promotional activity [*53] accelerated as the decade progressed. App. 509, 672. Many wholesalers also passed portions of their volume rebates on to the consumer, which had the effect of further undermining the significance of the retail list prices. Id., at 672, 687-692, 761-763. Especially in an oligopoly setting, in which price competition is most likely to take place through less observable and less regulable means than list prices, it would be unreasonable to draw conclusions about the existence of tacit coordination or supracompetitive pricing from data that reflect only list prices.

[2] This statement could well have referred to the rate at which the segment was growing relative to prior years' generic volume; this "internal" rate of growth would inevitably slow as the base volume against which it was measured grew.

Even on its own terms, the list price data relied upon by Liggett to demonstrate a narrowing of the price differential between generic and full-priced branded cigarettes could not support the conclusion that supracompetitive pricing had been introduced into the generic segment. Liggett's gap data ignore the effect of "subgeneric" cigarettes, which [2595] were priced at discounts of 50% or more from the list prices of normal branded cigarettes. See, e.g., id., at 682-686. Liggett itself, while [195] supposedly under the sway of oligopoly power, pioneered this development in 1988 with the introduction of [*54] its "Pyramid" brand. Id., at 326. By the time of trial, five of the six major manufacturers offered a cigarette in this category at a discount from the full list price of at least 50%. Id., at 685-686; 147 Tr. 107. Thus, the price difference between the highest priced branded cigarette and the lowest price cigarettes in the economy segment, instead of narrowing over the course of the period of alleged predation as Liggett would argue, grew to a substantial extent. In June 1984, before Brown & Williamson entered the generic segment, a consumer could obtain a carton of black and white generic cigarettes from Liggett at a 38% discount from the list price of a leading brand; after the conduct Liggett [*237] complains of, consumers could obtain a branded generic from Liggett for 52% off the list price of a leading brand. See App. 325-326, 685.

It may be that a reasonable jury could conclude that the cumulative discounts attributable to subgenerics and the various consumer promotions did not cancel out the full effect of the increases in list prices, see id., at 508-509, and that actual prices to the consumer did indeed rise, but rising prices do not themselves permit [*55] an inference of a collusive market dynamic. Even in a concentrated market, the occurrence of a price increase does not in itself permit a rational inference of conscious parallelism or supracompetitive pricing. Where, as here, output is expanding at the same time prices are increasing, rising prices are equally consistent with growing product demand. Under these conditions, a jury may not infer competitive injury from price and output data absent some evidence that tends to prove that output was restricted or prices were above a competitive level. Cf. Monsanto, 465 U.S. at 763.

LEdHN[13][] [13]Quite apart from the absence of any evidence of that sort, an inference of supracompetitive pricing would be particularly anomalous in this case, as the very party alleged to have been coerced into pricing through oligopolistic coordination denied that such coordination existed: Liggett's own officers and directors consistently denied that they or other firms in the industry priced their cigarettes through tacit collusion or reaped supracompetitive profits. App. 394-399, 623-631; 11 Tr. 170-174, 64 Tr. 51-56. Liggett [*56] seeks to explain away this testimony by arguing that its officers and directors are businesspeople who do not ascribe the same meaning to words like "competitive" and "collusion" that an economist would. This explanation is entitled to little, if any, weight. As the District Court found:

> "This argument was considered at the summary judgment stage since these executives gave basically the same testimony at their depositions. The court allowed [*238] the case to go to trial in part because the Liggett executives were not economists and in part because of affidavits from the Liggett executives stating that they were confused by the questions asked by B[rown] & Williamson lawyers and did not mean to contradict the testimony of [their economic expert] Burnett. However, at trial, despite having consulted extensively with Burnett and having had adequate time to familiarize themselves with concepts [196] such as tacit collusion, oligopoly, and monopoly profits, these Liggett executives again contradicted Burnett's theory." 748 F. Supp. at 356.

LEdHN[1E][] [1E]Not only does the evidence [*57] fail to show actual supracompetitive pricing in the generic segment, it also does not demonstrate its likelihood. At the time Brown & Williamson entered the generic segment, the cigarette industry as a whole faced declining demand and possessed substantial excess capacity. App. 82-84. These circumstances tend to [2596] break down patterns of oligopoly pricing and produce price competition. See Scherer & Ross 294, 315; 2 Areeda & Turner P404b2, at 275-276; 6 P. Areeda, Antitrust Law P1430e, p. 181 (1986). The only means by which Brown & Williamson is alleged to have established oligopoly pricing in the face of these unusual competitive pressures is through tacit price coordination with the other cigarette firms.

Yet the situation facing the cigarette companies in the 1980's would have made such tacit coordination unmanageable. Tacit coordination is facilitated by a stable market environment, fungible products, and a small number of variables upon which the firms seeking to coordinate their pricing may focus. See generally Scherer & Ross 215-315; 6 P. Areeda, supra, PP1428-1430. Uncertainty is an oligopoly's greatest enemy. By 1984, however, the cigarette market was in an [*58] obvious state of flux. The introduction of generic cigarettes in 1980 represented the first serious price competition [*239] in the cigarette market since the 1930's. See Scherer & Ross 250-251; App. 128. This development was bound to unsettle previous expectations and patterns of market conduct and to reduce the cigarette firms' ability to predict each other's behavior.

The larger number of product types and pricing variables also decreased the probability of effective parallel pricing. When Brown & Williamson entered the economy segment in 1984, the segment included Value-25s, black and whites, and branded generics. With respect to each product, the net price in the market was determined not only by list prices, but also by a wide variety of discounts and promotions to consumers and by rebates to wholesalers. In order to coordinate in an effective manner and eliminate price competition, the cigarette companies would have been required, without communicating, to establish parallel practices with respect to each of these variables, many of which, like consumer stickers or coupons, were difficult to monitor. Liggett has not even alleged parallel behavior with respect to these [*59] other variables, and the inherent limitations of tacit collusion suggest that such multivariable coordination is improbable. See R. Dorfman, The Price System 99-100, and n. 10 (1964); Scherer & Ross 279.

In addition, R. J. Reynolds had incentives that, in some respects, ran counter to those of the other cigarette companies. It is implausible that without a shared interest in retarding the growth of the economy segment, Brown & Williamson and its fellow oligopolists could have engaged in parallel pricing and raised generic prices above a competitive level. "Coordination will not be possible when any significant firm [197] chooses, for any reason, to 'go it alone.'" 2 Areeda & Turner P404b2, at 276. It is undisputed -- indeed it was conceded by Liggett's expert -- that R. J. Reynolds acted without regard to the supposed benefits of oligopolistic coordination when it repriced Doral at generic levels in the spring of 1984 and that the natural and probable consequence [*240] of its entry into the generic segment was procompetitive. 55 Tr. 15-16; 51 Tr. 128. Indeed, Reynolds' apparent objective in entering the segment was to capture a significant amount of volume in order to [*60] regain its number one sales position in the cigarette industry from Philip Morris. App. 75, 130, 209-211. There is no evidence that R. J. Reynolds accomplished this goal during the period relevant to this case, or that its commitment to achieving that goal changed. Indeed, R. J. Reynolds refused to follow Brown & Williamson's attempt to raise generic prices in June 1985. The jury thus had before it undisputed evidence that contradicts the suggestion that the major cigarette companies shared a goal of limiting the growth of the economy segment; one of the industry's two major players concededly entered the segment to expand volume and compete.

Even if all the cigarette companies were willing to participate in a scheme to restrain the growth of the generic segment, they [2597] would not have been able to coordinate their actions and raise prices above a competitive level unless they understood that Brown & Williamson's entry into the segment was not a genuine effort to compete with Liggett. If even one other firm misinterpreted Brown & Williamson's entry as an effort to expand share, a chain reaction of competitive responses would almost certainly have resulted, and oligopoly [*61] discipline would have broken down, perhaps irretrievably. "Once the trust among rivals breaks down, it is as hard to put back together again as was Humpty-Dumpty, and non-collusive behavior is likely to take over." Samuelson & Nordhaus, Economics, at 534.

LEdHN[14][] [14]Liggett argues that the means by which Brown & Williamson signaled its anticompetitive intent to its rivals was through its pricing structure. According to Liggett, maintaining existing list prices while offering substantial rebates to wholesalers was a signal to the other cigarette firms that Brown & Williamson did not intend to attract additional smokers to the generic segment by its entry. But a reasonable [*241] jury could not conclude that this pricing structure eliminated or rendered insignificant the risk that the other firms might misunderstand Brown & Williamson's entry as a competitive move. The likelihood that Brown & Williamson's rivals would have regarded its pricing structure as an important signal is low, given that Liggett itself, the purported target of the predation, was already using similar rebates, as was R. J. Reynolds in [*62] marketing its Doral branded generic. A Reynolds executive responsible for Doral testified that given its and Liggett's use of wholesaler rebates, Brown & Williamson could not have competed effectively without them. App. 756. And despite extensive discovery of the corporate records of R. J. Reynolds and Philip Morris, no documents appeared that indicated any awareness of Brown & Williamson's supposed signal by its principal rivals. Without effective signaling, it is [198] difficult to see how the alleged predation could have had a reasonable chance of success through oligopoly pricing.

LEdHN[15][] [15]Finally, although some of Brown & Williamson's corporate planning documents speak of a desire to slow the growth of the segment, no objective evidence of its conduct permits a reasonable inference that it had any real prospect of doing so through anticompetitive means. It is undisputed that when Brown & Williamson introduced its generic cigarettes, it offered them to a thousand wholesalers who had never before purchased generic cigarettes. Record, Plaintiff's Exh. No. 4079; 87 Tr. 191; 88 Tr. 143-147. The inevitable [*63] effect of this marketing effort was to expand the segment, as the new wholesalers recruited retail outlets to carry generic cigarettes. Even with respect to wholesalers already carrying generics, Brown & Williamson's unprecedented volume rebates had a similar expansionary effect. Unlike many branded cigarettes, generics came with no sales guarantee to the wholesaler; any unsold stock represented pure loss to the wholesaler. By providing substantial incentives for wholesalers to place large orders, Brown & Williamson created [*242] strong pressure for them to sell more generic cigarettes. In addition, as we have already observed, see supra, at 236, many wholesalers passed portions of the rebates about which Liggett complains on to consumers, thus dropping the retail price of generics and further stimulating demand. Brown & Williamson provided a further, direct stimulus, through some $ 10 million it spent during the period of alleged predation placing discount stickers on its generic cartons to reduce prices to the ultimate consumer. 70 Tr. 246. In light of these uncontested facts about Brown & Williamson's conduct, it is not reasonable to conclude that Brown & Williamson threatened [*64] in a serious way to restrict output, raise prices above a competitive level, and artificially slow the growth of the economy segment of the national cigarette market.

LEdHN[16][] [16] LEdHN[17][] [17]To be sure, Liggett's economic expert explained Liggett's theory of predatory [2598] price discrimination and testified that he believed it created a reasonable possibility that Brown & Williamson could injure competition in the United States cigarette market as a whole. App. 600-614. But this does not alter our analysis. HN16[] When an expert opinion is not supported by sufficient facts to validate it in the eyes of the law, or when indisputable record facts contradict or otherwise render the opinion unreasonable, it cannot support a jury's verdict. Cf. J. Truett Payne Co., Inc., 451 U.S. at 564-565 (referring to expert economic testimony not based on "documentary evidence as to the effect of the discrimination on retail prices" as "weak" at best). [*65] Expert testimony is useful as a guide to interpreting market facts, but it is not a substitute for them. As we observed in Matsushita, "expert opinion evidence . . . has little probative value in comparison with the economic factors" that may dictate a particular conclusion. 475 U.S. at 594, n. 19. Here, Liggett's expert based his opinion that Brown & Williamson had a reasonable prospect of recouping its predatory losses on three factors: Brown & Williamson's [199] black and white pricing structure, corporate [*243] documents showing an intent to shrink the price differential between generic and branded cigarettes, and evidence of below-cost pricing. App. 601-602. Because, as we have explained, this evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to support a finding of primary-line injury under the Robinson-Patman Act, the expert testimony cannot sustain the jury's verdict.

IV

LEdHN[1F][] [1F] LEdHN[18][] [18]We understand that the chain of reasoning by which we have concluded that Brown & Williamson is entitled to judgment as a [*66] matter of law is demanding. But a reasonable jury is presumed to know and understand the law, the facts of the case, and the realities of the market. We hold that the evidence cannot support a finding that Brown & Williamson's alleged scheme was likely to result in oligopolistic price coordination and sustained supracompetitive pricing in the generic segment of the national cigarette market. Without this, Brown & Williamson had no reasonable prospect of recouping its predatory losses and could not inflict the injury to competition the antitrust laws prohibit. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is Affirmed.

Dissent

JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE WHITE and JUSTICE BLACKMUN join, dissenting.

For a period of 18 months in 1984 and 1985, respondent Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation (B&W) waged a price war against petitioner, known then as Liggett & Myers (Liggett). Liggett filed suit claiming that B&W's pricing practices violated the Robinson-Patman Act. [1] After a 115-day [*244] trial, the jury agreed, and awarded Liggett substantial damages. The Court of Appeals, however, found that Liggett could not succeed on its claim, because B&W, as an independent [*67] actor controlling only 12% of the national cigarette market, could not injure competition. Liggett Group, Inc. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 964 F.2d 335, 340-342 (CA4 1992).

Today, the Court properly rejects that holding. See ante, at 229-230. Instead of remanding the case to the Court of Appeals to resolve the other issues raised by the parties, however, the Court goes on to review portions of the [*68] voluminous trial record, and comes to the conclusion that the evidence does not support the jury's finding that B&W's price discrimination "had a reasonable [2599] possibility of injuring competition." [2] [200] In my opinion the evidence is plainly sufficient to support that finding.

The fact that a price war may not have accomplished its purpose as quickly or as completely as originally intended does not immunize conduct that was illegal when it occurred. A proper understanding of this case therefore requires a brief description of the situation before the war began in July 1984; the events that occurred during the period between July 1984 and the end of 1985; and, finally, the facts bearing on the predictability of competitive harm during or at the end of that period. [1] "It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality . . . where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition with any person who either grants or knowingly receives the benefit of such discrimination, or with customers of either of them . . . ." 15 U.S. C. § 13(a).

[2] The jury gave an affirmative answer to the following special issue:

"1. Did Brown & Williamson engage in price discrimination that had a reasonable possibility of injuring competition in the cigarette market as a whole in the United States?" App. 27.

The jury made its finding after being instructed that "injury to competition" means "the injury to consumer welfare which results when a competitor is able to raise and to maintain prices in a market or well-defined submarket above competitive levels. In order to injure competition in the cigarette market as a whole, Brown & Williamson must be able to create a real possibility of both driving out rivals by loss-creating price cutting and then holding on to that advantage to recoup losses by raising and maintaining prices at higher than competitive levels.

"You must remember that the Robinson-Patman Act was designed to protect competition rather than just competitors and, therefore, injury to competition does not mean injury to a competitor. Liggett & Myers can not satisfy this element simply by showing that they were injured by Brown & Williamson's conduct. To satisfy this element, Liggett & Myers must show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Brown & Williamson's conduct had a reasonable possibility of injuring competition in the cigarette market and not just a reasonable possibility of injuring a competitor in the cigarette market." Id., at 829-830.

[3] As the majority notes, the procedural posture of this case requires that we view the evidence in the light most favorable to Liggett. Ante, at 213. On review of a judgment notwithstanding the verdict, the party against whom the judgment is entered "must be given the benefit of every legitimate inference that can be drawn from the evidence." See C. Wright & A. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2528, pp. 563-564 (1971).

Background

B&W is the third largest firm in a highly concentrated [*70] industry. Ante, at 213. For decades, the industry has been marked by the same kind of supracompetitive pricing that is characteristic of the textbook monopoly. [4] Without the necessity of actual agreement among the six major manufacturers, "prices for cigarettes increased in lockstep, twice a year, for a number of years, irrespective of the rate of inflation, changes in the costs of production, or shifts in consumer demand." Ibid. Notwithstanding the controversy over the health effects of smoking and the increase in the federal excise tax, profit margins improved "handsomely" during the period between 1972 and 1983. [5]

[71] [*246] [201] The early 1980's brought two new developments to the cigarette market. First, in 1980, when its share of the market had declined to 2.3%, Liggett introduced a new line of generic cigarettes in plain black and white [2600] packages, offered at an effective price of approximately 30% less than branded cigarettes. Ante, at 214. A B&W memorandum described this action as "the first time that a [cigarette] manufacturer has used pricing as a strategic marketing weapon in the U.S. since the depression era." App. 128. This novel tactic proved successful; by 1984, Liggett's black and whites represented about 4% of the total market and generated substantial profits. The next development came in 1984, when R.J. Reynolds (RJR), the second largest company in the industry, "repositioned" one of its established brands, Doral, by selling it at discount prices comparable to Liggett's black and whites. App. 117-118; ante, at 215.

B&W executives prepared a number of internal memoranda planning responses to these two market developments. See App. 120, 127, 157, 166. With respect to RJR, B&W decided to "follo[w] precisely the pathway" of that company, id. [*72] , at 121, reasoning that "introduction of a branded generic by B&W now appears to be feasible as RJR has the clout and sales force coverage to maintain the price on branded generics," id., at 145. Accordingly, B&W planned to introduce a new "branded generic" of its own, known as Hallmark, to be sold at the same prices as RJR's Doral. Id., at 124, 142-144.

[*247] B&W took a more aggressive approach to Liggett's black and whites. It decided to launch its own line of black and white cigarettes with the "same style array" and list price as Liggett's, but with "superior discounts/allowances." Id., at 124. B&W estimated that its own black and whites would generate a "trading profit" of $ 5.1 million for the second half of 1984 and $ 43.6 million for 1985. Id., at 125. At the same time, however, B&W, anticipating "competitive counterattacks," was "prepared to redistribute this entire amount in the form of additional trade allowances." Ibid. B&W's competitive stance was confined to Liggett; the memorandum outlining B&W's plans made no reference to the possibility of countermoves by RJR, or to the use of B&W's trading profits to increase allowances on any product other [*73] than black and whites.

This "dual approach" was designed to "provide B&W more influence to manage up the prices of branded generics to improve profitability," id., at 123, and also the opportunity to participate in the economy market, with a view toward "managing down generic volume," id., at 109. Notwithstanding its ultimate aim to "limit generic segment growth," id., at 113, B&W estimated an aggregate potential trading profit on black and whites of $ 342 million for [4] When the Court states that "substantial evidence suggests that in recent decades, the industry reaped the benefits of prices above a competitive level," ante, at 213, I assume it accepts the proposition that a reasonable jury could find abnormally high prices characteristic of this industry.

[5] An internal B&W memorandum, dated May 15, 1984, states in part:

"Manufacturer's price increases generally were below the rate of inflation but margins improved handsomely due to favorable leaf prices and cost reductions associated with automation. For example, Brown & Williamson's variable margin increased from $ 2.91/M in 1972 to $ 8.78/M in 1981, an increase of over 200%. In 1982, the industry became much more aggressive on the pricing front, fueled by a 100% increase in the Federal Excise Tax. Brown & Williamson's variable margin increased from $ 10.78/M in 1982 and [sic] to $ 12.61/M in 1983.

"The impact of these pricing activities on the smoking public was dramatic. The weighted average retail price of a pack of cigarettes increased 56% between 1980 and 1983 (from $ .63 to $ .98)." App. 127.

1984 to 1988, id., at 146. Though B&W recognized that it might be required to use "some or all of this potential trading profit" to maintain its market position, it also believed that it would recoup its losses as the segment became "more profitable, [202] particularly as it approaches maturity." Ibid.

B&W began to implement its plan even before it made its first shipment of black and whites in July 1984, with a series of price announcements in June of that year. When B&W announced its first volume discount schedule for distributors, Liggett responded by increasing its own discounts. Though Liggett's discounts remained lower than B&W's, B&W responded in turn by increasing its rebates still [*74] further. After four or five moves and countermoves, the dust settled [*248] with B&W's net prices to distributors lower than Liggett's. [6] B&W's deep discounts not only forfeited all of its $ 48.7 million in projected trading profits for the next 18 months, but actually resulted in sales below B&W's average variable cost. Id., at 338-339.

[2601] Assessing the pre-July 1984 evidence tending to prove that B&W was motivated by anticompetitive intent, the District Court observed that the documentary evidence was "more voluminous and detailed than any other reported case. This evidence not only indicates [*75] B&W wanted to injure Liggett, it also details an extensive plan to slow the growth of the generic cigarette segment." Liggett Group, Inc. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 748 F. Supp. 344, 354 (MDNC 1990).

The 18-Month Price War

The volume rebates offered by B&W to its wholesalers during the 18-month period from July 1984 to December 1985 unquestionably constituted price discrimination covered by § 2(a) of the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, 49 Stat. 1526, 15 U.S.C. § 13(a). [7] [*76] Nor were the discounts justified by any statutory or affirmative defense: They were not cost justified, [8] App. 525, were [*249] not good-faith efforts to meet the equally low price of a competitor, [9] and were not mere introductory or promotional discounts, 91 Tr. 42.

The rebate program was intended to harm Liggett and in fact caused it [203] serious injury. [10] The jury found that Liggett had suffered actual damages of $ 49.6 million, App. 28, an amount [*77] close to, but slightly larger than, the $ 48.7 million trading profit B&W had indicated it would forgo in order to discipline Liggett. See supra, at [6] On June 4, 1984, B&W announced a maximum rebate of $ 0.30 per carton for purchases of over 8,000 cases per quarter; a week later, Liggett announced a rebate of $ 0.20 on comparable volumes. On June 21, B&W increased its rebate to $ 0.50, and a day later, Liggett went to $ 0.43. After three more increases, B&W settled at $ 0.80 per carton, while Liggett remained at $ 0.73. See App. 327, 420-421.

[7] That quantity discounts are covered by the Act, and prohibited when they have the requisite effect on competition, has been firmly established since our decision in FTC v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U.S. 37, 42-44, 92 L. Ed. 1196, 68 S. Ct. 822 (1948).

[8] "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent differentials which make only due allowance for differences in the cost of manufacture, sale, or delivery resulting from the differing methods or quantities in which such commodities are to such purchasers sold or delivered." § 13(a).

[9] "Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall prevent a seller rebutting the prima-facie case thus made by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor." § 13(b).

The jury gave a negative answer to the following special issue:

"3. Did Brown & Williamson engage in price discrimination in good faith with the intention to meet, but not beat, the equally low net prices of Liggett Group, Inc.?" App. 27-28.

[10] By offering its largest discounts to Liggett's 14 largest customers, App. 168-169, 174, B&W not only put its "money where the volume is," id., at 402, but also applied maximum pressure to Liggett at a lesser cost to itself than would have resulted from a nondiscriminatory price cut.

247. To inflict this injury, B&W sustained a substantial loss. During the full 18-month period, B&W's revenues ran consistently below its total variable costs, with an average deficiency of approximately $ 0.30 per carton and a total loss on B&W black and whites of almost $ 15 million. App. 338-339. That B&W executives were willing to accept losses of this magnitude during the entire 18 months is powerful evidence of their belief that prices ultimately could be "managed up" to a level that would allow B&W to recoup its investment.

The Aftermath

At the end of 1985, [*78] the list price of branded cigarettes was $ 33.15 per carton, and the list price of black and whites, $ 19.75 per carton. App. 325. Over the next four years, the list price on both branded and black and white cigarettes [*250] increased twice a year, by identical amounts. The June 1989 increases brought the price of branded cigarettes to $ 46.15 per carton, and the price of black and whites to $ 33.75 -- an amount even higher than the price for branded cigarettes when the war ended in December 1985. Ibid. [11] Because the rate of increase was higher on [2602] black and whites than on brandeds, the price differential between the two types of cigarettes narrowed, ibid., from roughly 40% in 1985 to 27% in 1989. See 964 F.2d at 338.

[79] The expert economist employed by Liggett testified that the post-1985 price increases were unwarranted by increases in manufacturing or other costs, taxes, or promotional expenditures. App. 525. To be sure, some portion of the volume rebates granted distributors was passed on to consumers in the form of promotional activity, so that consumers did not feel the full brunt of the price increases. Nevertheless, the record amply supports the conclusion that the post-1985 price increases in list prices produced higher consumer prices, as well as higher profits for the manufacturers. [12]

[80] The legal question presented by [204] this evidence is whether the facts as they existed during and at the close of the 18-month period, and all reasonable inferences to be drawn from [*251] those facts, see n. 3, supra, justified the finding by the jury that B&W's discriminatory pricing campaign "had a reasonable possibility of injuring competition," see supra, at 244, and n. 2.

II

The Sherman Act, 26 Stat. 209, enacted in 1890, the Clayton Act, 38 Stat. 730, enacted in 1914, and the Robinson-Patman Act, which amended the Clayton Act in 1936, all serve the purpose of protecting competition. Because they have a common goal, the statutes are similar in many respects. All three prohibit the predatory practice of deliberately selling below cost to discipline a competitor, either to drive the competitor out of business or to raise prices to a level that will enable the predator to recover its losses and, in the long run, earn additional profits. Sales below cost and anticompetitive intent are elements of the violation of all three statutes. Neither of those elements, however, is at issue in this case. See ante, at 231 (record contains sufficient evidence of anticompetitive [*81] intent and below-cost pricing).

[11] It is also true that these same years, other major manufacturers entered the generic market and expanded their generic sales. Ante, at 217. Their entry is entirely consistent with the possibility that lockstep increases in the price of generics brought them to a level that was supra-competitive, through lower than that charged on branded cigarettes.

[12] "Q Does this mean that the price increases, which you testified are happening twice a year, are used up in these consumer promotions?

"A Not by any stretch of the imagination. Although there has been an increase in the use of this type of promotional activity over the last four or five years, the increase in that promotional activity has been far outstripped by the list price increases. The prices go up by a lot; the promotional activity, indeed, does go up. But the promotional activity has not gone up by anywhere near the magnitude of the list price increases. Further, those price increases are not warranted by increasing costs, since the manufacturing costs of making cigarettes have remained roughly constant over the last five years." App. 509.

The statutes do differ significantly with respect to one element of the violation, the competitive consequences of predatory conduct. Even here, however, the three statutes have one thing in common: Not one of them requires proof that a predatory plan has actually succeeded in accomplishing its objective. Section 1 of the Sherman Act requires proof of a conspiracy. It is the joint plan to restrain trade, however, and not its success, that is prohibited by § 1. Nash v. United States, 229 U.S. 373, 378, 57 L. Ed. 1232, 33 S. Ct. 780 (1913). Section 2 of the Sherman Act applies to independent conduct, and may be violated when there is a "dangerous probability" that an attempt to achieve monopoly power will succeed. Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. 375, 396, 49 L. Ed. 518, 25 S. Ct. 276 (1905). The Clayton Act goes beyond the "dangerous probability" standard to cover price discrimination "where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce." § 2, 38 Stat. 730.

[*252] The element of competitive injury as defined [*82] in the Robinson-Patman Act is broader still. [13] See S. Rep. No. 1502, 74th Cong., 2d Sess., 4 (1936) (Act substantially [2603] broadens similar clause of Clayton Act). [14] The Robinson-Patman Act was designed to [205] reach discriminations "in their incipiency, before the harm to competition is effected. It is enough that they 'may' have the prescribed effect." Corn Products Refining Co. v. FTC, 324 U.S. 726, 738, 89 L. Ed. 1320, 65 S. Ct. 961 (1945) (internal quotation marks omitted). Or, as the Report of the Senate Judiciary Committee on the proposed Act explained, "to catch the weed in the seed will keep it from coming to flower." S. Rep. No. 1502, at 4.

> [*253] "There are specific findings that such injuries had resulted from respondent's discounts, although the statute does not require the Commission to find that injury has actually resulted. The statute requires no more than that the effect of the prohibited price discriminations 'may be substantially to lessen competition . . . or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition.' After a careful consideration of this provision of the Robinson-Patman Act, we have said that 'the statute does not require that the discrimination must in fact have harmed competition, but only that there is a reasonable possibility that they "may" have such an effect.' Corn Products Refining Co. v. Federal Trade Comm'n, 324 U.S. 726, 742, 65 S. Ct. 961, 89 L. Ed. 1320." FTC v. Morton Salt Co., 334 U.S.37, 46, 68 S. Ct. 822, 92 L. Ed. 1196 (1948).

See also Falls City Industries, Inc. v. Vanco Beverage, Inc., 460 U.S. 428, 435, 75 L. Ed. 2d 174, 103 S. Ct. 1282 (1983) ("In keeping with the Robinson-Patman [*84] Act's prophylactic purpose, § 2(a) does not require that the discriminations must in fact have harmed competition" (internal quotation marks omitted)).

In this case, then, Liggett need not show any actual harm to competition, but only the reasonable possibility that such harm would flow from B&W's conduct. The evidence presented supports the conclusion that B&W's price war

[13] See text of statute, n. 1, supra.

[14] One of the purposes of broadening the Clayton Act's competitive injury language in the Robinson-Patman Act was to provide more effective protection against predatory price cutting. As the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws explained in its 1955 report:

"In some circumstances, to be sure, injury to even a single competitor should bring the Act into play. Predatory price cutting designed to eliminate a smaller business rival, for example, is a practice which inevitably frustrates competition by excluding competitors from the market or deliberately impairing their competitive strength. The invalidation of such deliberate price slashes for the purpose of destroying even a single competitor, moreover, accords distinct recognition to the narrower tests of 'injury' added to the price discrimination provisions of the Clayton Act through the 1936 Robinson-Patman amendments. The discrimination provisions in the original Clayton Act were feared by the legislators as inadequate to check the victimization of individual businessmen by predatory price cuts that nevertheless created no general impairment of competitive conditions in a wider market. To reach such destructive price cuts endangering the survival of smaller rivals of a powerful seller was an express objective of the liberalizing amendments in the 'injury' clause of the Robinson-Patman Act." Report of the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws 165-166 (1955) (footnotes omitted).

was intended to discipline Liggett for its unprecedented use of price competition in an industry that had enjoyed handsome supracompetitive profits for about half a century. The evidence also demonstrates that B&W executives were confident enough in the feasibility of their plan that they were willing to invest millions of company dollars in its outcome. And all of this, of course, must be viewed against a back-ground of supracompetitive, parallel pricing, in which "prices for cigarettes increased in lockstep, twice a year . . . irrespective of the rate of inflation, changes in the cost of production, or shifts in consumer demand," ante, at 213, bringing with them dramatic increases in profit margins, see n. 5, supra. In this context, it is surely fair to infer that B&W's disciplinary [*254] program [*85] had a reasonable prospect of persuading Liggett to forgo its maverick price [206] reductions and return to parallel [2604] pricing policies, and thus to restore the same kind of supracompetitive pricing that had characterized the industry in the past. When the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to Liggett, I think it clear that there is sufficient evidence in the record that the "reasonable possibility" of competitive injury required by the statute actually existed.

III

After 115 days of trial, during which it considered 2,884 exhibits, 85 deposition excerpts, and testimony from 23 live witnesses, the jury deliberated for nine days and then returned a verdict finding that B&W engaged in price discrimination with a "reasonable possibility of injuring competition." 748 F. Supp. at 348, n. 4; n. 2, supra. The Court's contrary conclusion rests on a hodgepodge of legal, factual, and economic propositions that are insufficient, alone or together, to overcome the jury's assessment of the evidence.

First, as a matter of law, the Court reminds us that the Robinson-Patman Act is concerned with consumer welfare and competition, as opposed to protecting [*86] individual competitors from harm; "the antitrust laws were passed for the protection of competition, not competitors. " See ante, at 224 (internal quotations marks and emphasis omitted). For that reason, predatory price cutting is not unlawful unless the predator has a reasonable prospect of recouping his investment from supracompetitive profits. Ibid. The jury, of course, was so instructed, see n. 2, supra, and no one questions that proposition here.

As a matter of fact, the Court emphasizes the growth in the generic segment following B&W's entry. As the Court notes, generics' expansion to over 12% of the total market by 1988 exceeds B&W's own forecast that the segment would grow to only about 10%, assuming no entry by B&W. Ante, at 234. What these figures do not do, however, is answer the [*255] relevant question: whether the prices of generic cigarettes during the late 1980's were competitive or supracompetitive.

On this point, there is ample, uncontradicted evidence that the list prices on generic cigarettes, as well as the prices on branded cigarettes, rose regularly and significantly during the late 1980's, in a fashion remarkably similar to the price [*87] change patterns that characterized the industry in the 1970's when supracompetitive, oligopolistic pricing admittedly prevailed. See supra, at 245; ante, at 213. Given its knowledge of the industry's history of parallel pricing, I think the jury plainly was entitled to draw an inference that these increased prices were supracompetitive.

The Court responds to this evidence dismissively, suggesting that list prices have no bearing on the question because promotional activities of the cigarette manufacturers may have offset such price increases. Ante, at 235-236. That response is insufficient for three reasons. First, the promotions to which the majority refers related primarily to branded cigarettes; accordingly, while they narrowed the differential between branded prices and black and white prices, they did not reduce the consumer price of [207] black and whites. See 33 Tr. 208-210. Second, the Court's speculation is inconsistent with record evidence that the semiannual list price increases were not offset by consumer promotions. See n. 12, supra. See also ante, at 218 ("at least some portion of the list price increase was reflected in a higher net price [*88] to the consumer"). Finally, to the extent there is a dispute regarding the effect of promotional activities on consumer prices for generics, the jury presumably resolved that dispute in Liggett's favor, and the Court's contrary speculation is an insufficient basis for setting aside that verdict. [15]

[89] [*256] [2605] As a matter of economics, the Court reminds us that price cutting is generally procompetitive, and hence a "boon to consumers." Ante, at 224. This is true, however, only so long as reduced prices do not fall below cost, as the cases cited by the majority make clear. [16] [*90] When a predator deliberately engages in below-cost pricing targeted at a particular competitor over a sustained period of time, then price cutting raises a credible inference that harm to competition [*257] is likely to ensue. [17] None of our cases disputes that proposition.

[91] Also as a matter of economics, the [208] Court insists that a predatory pricing program in an oligopoly is unlikely to succeed absent actual conspiracy. Though it has rejected a somewhat stronger version of this proposition as a rule of decision, see ante, at 229-230, the Court comes back to the same economic theory, relying on the supposition that an "anticompetitive minuet is most difficult to compose and to perform, even for a disciplined oligopoly," ante, at 228. See ante, at 238-243 (implausibility of tacit coordination among cigarette oligopolists in 1980's). I would suppose, however, that the professional performers who had danced the minuet for 40 to 50 years would be better able to predict whether their favorite partners would follow them in the future than would an outsider, who might not know the difference between Haydn and Mozart. [18] In any event, the jury was [*258]

[15] In finding an absence of actual supracompetitive pricing, the Court also relies on the testimony of Liggett executives, who stated that industry prices were fair. Illustrative is the following exchange:

"Q I want to know -- yes or no -- sir, whether or not you say that the price you charged for branded cigarettes, which is the same price you say everybody else charged, was a fair and equitable price for that product to the American consumer.

"A It's what the industry set, and based on that it's a fair price." App. 396.

The problem with this testimony, and testimony like it, is that it relates to the period before the price war, as well as after, see id., at 392, when there is no real dispute but that prices were supracompetitive. ("The profits in the cigarette industry are the best of any industry I've been associated with, very much so." Ibid.) Some of the testimony cited by the Court, for instance, is that of an outside director who served only from 1977 or 1978 until 1980, see 64 Tr. 51-56, cited ante, at 237; his belief in the competitiveness of his industry must be viewed against the "substantial evidence suggesting that in recent decades, the industry reaped the benefits of prices above a competitive level" to which the majority itself refers, ante, at 213.

The jury was, of course, entitled to discount the probative force of testimony from executives to the effect that there was no collusion among tobacco manufacturers, App. 397-398, and that they had appeared before a congressional committee to vouch for the competitive nature of their industry, id., at 623-631. The jury was also free to give greater weight to the documentary evidence presented, the inferences to be drawn there-from, and the testimony of experts who agreed with the textbook characterization of the industry. See App. 640-645; R. Tennant, American Cigarette Industry 342 (1950).

surely entitled to [2606] infer that at the time of the price war itself, B&W reasonably believed that it could signal its intentions to its fellow oligopolists, see App. 61, assuring their continued cooperation.

[92] Perhaps the Court's most significant error is the assumption that seems to pervade much of the final sections of its opinion: that Liggett had the burden of proving either the actuality of supracompetitive pricing, or the actuality of tacit collusion. See ante, at 233-237 (finding absence of actual supracompetitive pricing), 238-243 (finding absence of evidence suggesting actual coordination). In my opinion, the jury was entitled to infer from the succession of price increases after 1985 -- when the prices for branded and generic cigarettes increased every six months from $ 33.15 and $ 19.75, respectively, to $ 46.15 and $ 33.75 -- that B&W's below-cost pricing actually produced supracompetitive prices, with the help of tacit collusion among the players. See supra, at 255. But even if that were not so clear, the jury would surely be entitled to infer that B&W's predatory plan, in which it invested millions of dollars for the purpose of achieving an admittedly anticompetitive result, carried a "reasonable possibility" of injuring competition.

Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

Decision

Conspiracy claims under Sherman Act against domestic and foreign insurers held (1) cognizable as within McCarran-Ferguson Act's boycott exception; and (2) not barred by international comity.

Summary

According to complaints filed in multiple federal actions by 19 states and many private plaintiffs, certain members of the insurance industry had conspired to restrict the terms of coverage of commercial general liability (CGL) insurance available in the United States, in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1). Among the allegations made in the complaints, it was claimed that four domestic primary insurers had conspired with domestic and foreign reinsurers, insurance brokers, and insurance associations to procure desired changes with respect to insurance coverage in the terms of the standard CGL forms used in the United States, and in particular that (1) some reinsurers had threatened to withdraw from reinsuring primary insurers who used a CGL form which the reinsurers disfavored; (2) reinsurers had threatened to boycott reinsuring North American CGL risks; (3) foreign and domestic reinsurers had presented positions at an insurance association meeting that the standard CGL forms had to be changed or else there would be no reinsurance; (4) insurers and reinsurers had told insurance brokers and agents that a reinsurance boycott would ensue if revised CGL forms were not approved; (5) the largest domestic reinsurer had agreed either to coerce the adoption of demands for changes in CGL forms or to derail the forms program; and (6) domestic reinsurers had agreed to boycott the CGL forms unless certain terms were added. The complaints also alleged that (1) a group of reinsurers and brokers based in London, England, had conspired to coerce primary insurers in the United States to offer CGL coverage only for claims made during the policy period; (2) a group of London reinsurers had conspired to withhold reinsurance for certain coverage; (3) a group of domestic primary insurers, the association which issued the CGL forms, and foreign reinsurers had conspired to restrain trade in the markets for excess and "umbrella" insurance; and (4) a group of London and domestic retrocessional reinsurers--that is, insurers of the risks of reinsurers--had conspired to withhold retrocessional reinsurance for certain risks. The actions were consolidated for litigation in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California. The District Court granted the defendants' motions to dismiss the Sherman Act claims for failure to state a cause of action (723 F Supp 464). On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, reversing, expressed the view that (1) the domestic defendants were not exempt from federal antitrust liability under 2(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act (15 USCS 1012(b)), which provides that the Sherman Act applies to the business of insurance to the extent that such business is not regulated by state law, because the domestic defendants forfeited their exemption when they conspired with the foreign reinsurers, who were not exempt; (2) even if the defendants' alleged conduct was exempt from Sherman Act liability under 2(b), such conduct was within the exception to immunity under the McCarran-Ferguson Act provided by 3(b) (15 USCS 1013(b)) for any "act of boycott, coercion, or intimidation"; and (3) the principle of international comity did not bar the exercise of federal jurisdiction against the foreign defendants (938 F2d 919).

On certiorari, the United States Supreme Court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded the case for further proceedings. It was held, with different majorities of the Justices for each holding, that (1) the domestic insurers were immune from antitrust liability under 2(b); (2) there were sufficient allegations of a "boycott" under 3(b)--defined as the refusal to deal with another in unrelated transactions in order to achieve the terms desired in a targeted transaction--to sustain several counts of complaint against a motion to dismiss; and (3) international comity did not counsel against exercising jurisdiction over the London-based reinsurers.

In those portions of the opinion of Souter, J., which constituted the opinion of the court, it was held in pertinent part (1) in a portion (Part II-A) expressing the unanimous view of the court, that domestic insurers did not lose their immunity from antitrust liability under 2(b) by acting in concert with foreign insurers that were assumed for the sake of argument not to be regulated by state law within the meaning of 2(b); and (2) in a portion (Part III) joined by Rehnquist, Ch. J., and White, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., that, even assuming that in a proper case a court could decline to exercise Sherman Act jurisdiction over foreign conduct, the principle of international comity did not counsel against exercising jurisdiction with respect to allegations that the London-based reinsurers had engaged in unlawful conspiracies to affect the market for insurance in the United States and that their conduct in fact had produced substantial effect, because there was no conflict with British law, where the London reinsurers did not claim that (a) British law required them to act in some fashion prohibited by the law of the United States, or (b) their compliance with the laws of both countries was otherwise impossible. Also, Souter, J., in a portion (Part II-B) joined by White, Blackmun, and Stevens, J., expressed the view that (1) neither the Supreme Court's precedents nor 3(b) warranted a definition of "boycott" which was confined to refusals to deal that were unrelated or collateral to the objective sought by those refusing to deal; and (2) those claims which asserted a conspiracy among the primary insurers, reinsurers, brokers, and associations to procure changes in the CGL forms alleged one or more acts of "boycott" under 3(b) and were thus sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss.

In that portion (Part I) of the opinion of Scalia, J., which constituted the opinion of the court, it was held by Scalia, J., joined by Rehnquist, Ch. J., and O'Connor, Kennedy, and Thomas, JJ., that (1) for purposes of 3(b), a "boycott" meant the refusal to deal with another in unrelated transactions in order to achieve the terms desired in a targeted transaction; and (2) there were sufficient allegations of a "boycott" under such standard to sustain counts of complaint against a motion to dismiss, with respect to those claims asserting a conspiracy to procure changes in the CGL forms. Also, Scalia, J., in a dissenting portion (Part II) joined by O'Connor, Kennedy, and Thomas, JJ., expressed the view that in the case at hand (1) there was a conflict of laws with respect to the extraterritorial application of the Sherman Act to British corporations and other British subjects; and (2) application of the Sherman Act to the British defendants was unreasonable, since (a) the relevant activity took place primarily in the United Kingdom, (b) the defendants had their principal places of business and residence outside the United States, (c) England had comprehensive regulations governing reinsurance and a heavy interest in regulating such activity, and (d) the fact that 2(b) generally allowed states to override the Sherman Act in the insurance field suggested that the importance of regulation to the United States was slight.

Domestic insurers do not lose their immunity from antitrust liability under 2(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act (15 USCS 1012(b)), which immunity applies to the business of insurance to the extent that such business is regulated by state law, by acting in concert with foreign insurers that are assumed for the sake of argument not to be regulated by state law within the meaning of 2(b).

For purposes of 3(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act (15 USCS 1013(b)), which provides that nothing in such Act--under which the business of insurance generally is exempt from antitrust liability to the extent that such business is regulated by state law--renders the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 et seq.) inapplicable to any act of "boycott," a "boycott" means the refusal to deal with another in unrelated transactions in order to achieve the terms desired in a targeted transaction; the parties to a concerted agreement to terms--that is, a cartelization--are not engaging in a conditional boycott within the meaning of 3(b) because such parties are not coercing anyone in the usual sense of the word; accordingly, there are sufficient allegations of a "boycott" under such standard to sustain several counts of complaint against a motion to dismiss, in a consolidated action alleging a conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of commerce among members of the insurance industry in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1), insofar as such counts contain allegations that (1) reinsurers threatened to withdraw from reinsuring primary insurers who used a certain commercial general liability (CGL) form which the reinsurers disfavored, (2) reinsurers threatened to boycott reinsuring North American CGL risks, (3) foreign and domestic reinsurers presented positions at an insurance association meeting that the standard CGL forms had to be changed or else there would be no reinsurance, (4) insurers and reinsurers told insurance brokers and agents that a reinsurance boycott would ensue if revised CGL forms were not approved, (5) the largest domestic reinsurer agreed either to coerce the adoption of demands for changes in CGL forms or to derail the forms program, and (6) domestic reinsurers agreed to boycott the CGL forms unless certain terms were added. Even assuming that, in a proper case a court may decline to exercise jurisdiction under the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 et seq.) over foreign conduct, the principle of international comity does not counsel against exercising jurisdiction with respect to Sherman Act allegations that reinsurers based in London, England, engaged in unlawful conspiracies to affect the market for insurance in the United States and that their conduct in fact produced substantial effect, because there is no conflict with British law, where the London reinsurers do not claim that (1) British law requires them to act in some fashion prohibited by the law of the United States, or (2) their compliance with the laws of both countries is otherwise impossible. APPEAL §1293 > complaint -- acceptance of allegations -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[4][] [4]

On certiorari to review a Federal Court of Appeals' judgment reversing a Federal District Court's grant of motions to dismiss complaints in a consolidated action alleging a conspiracy among members of the insurance industry in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1), the United States Supreme Court will take the allegations of the complaints as true.

On certiorari to review a Federal Court of Appeals' judgment reversing a Federal District Court's grant of motions to dismiss complaints by states and private parties in a consolidated action alleging a conspiracy among members of the insurance industry in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1), the United States Supreme Court will assume that where the private parties have chosen in their brief to use one state's complaint as a representative model of their claims, the private parties' complaints track that state's complaint; upon the Supreme Court's remand of such case, the courts below will be free to take into account any relevant differences among the complaints that the parties may bring to their attention.

APPEAL §1293 > complaints -- assumptions -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[6A][] [6A]LEdHN[6B][] [6B]

With respect to complaints in a consolidated action against members of the insurance industry in violation of 1 of the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1), the United States Supreme Court, on certiorari to review a Federal Court of Appeals' judgment reversing a Federal District Court's grant of motions to dismiss such complaints, will assume that domestic reinsurers alleged to be involved in a conspiracy to withhold retrocessional insurance--that is, insurers of the risks of reinsurers--for certain risks are among the unnamed coconspirators mentioned in the complaints where (1) the complaints' statements of facts describe the conspiracy as involving reinsurers in "London and the United States"; but (2) the claims for relief name only the London reinsurers.

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §9.7 > insurance exemption -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[7][] [7]

With respect to the provision of 2(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act (15 USCS 1012(b)) that "the business of insurance" is exempt from antitrust liability to the extent that such business is regulated by state law, the definite article before the word "business" shows that such word is most naturally read to refer to mercantile transactions, buying and selling, and traffic; for purposes of 2(b), "the business of insurance" is not meant to refer to a single entity and should be read to single out one activity from others, rather than to distinguish one entity from another.

EVIDENCE §343.5 > antitrust -- assumption -- > Headnote:

The grant of immunity, under 2(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act (15 USCS 1012(b)), from liability under the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 et seq.), the Clayton Act (15 USCS 12 et seq.), or the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 USCS 41 et seq.) for acts constituting "the business of insurance" to the extent that such business is regulated by state law assumes that acts which, but for that grant, would violate such federal statutes are part of "the business of insurance."

Upon reversing a Federal Court of Appeals' judgment to the extent that such judgment held that domestic primary insurers, reinsurers, insurance trade associations, and a reinsurance broker lost their exemption from antitrust liability under 2(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act (15 USCS 1012(b)) because they acted in concert with foreign reinsurers, the United States Supreme Court will leave to the Court of Appeals on remand the question whether the activities of the domestic reinsurers were "regulated by state law" within the meaning of 2(b).

The Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 et seq.) applies to foreign conduct which produces a substantial intended effect in the United States; concerns of comity come into play, if at all, only after a court has determined that the acts complained of are subject to Sherman Act jurisdiction.

COURTS §530 > jurisdiction -- Congress -- > Headnote:

LEdHN[13A][] [13A]LEdHN[13B][] [13B]

The alleged conduct of reinsurers based in London, England, in engaging in unlawful conspiracies which substantially affected the market for insurance in the United States meets the requirements of the exception to 402 of the Foreign Trade Antitrust Improvements Act of 1982 (15 USCS 6a)--which generally makes the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 et seq.) inapplicable to conduct involving nonimport foreign trade or commerce--for conduct which has a direct, substantial, and reasonably forseeable effect on domestic or import commerce.

CONFLICT OF LAWS §97.5 > INTERNATIONAL LAW §6 > RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §21 > foreign conduct -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[14][] [14]

The fact that conduct is lawful in the foreign state in which it took place will not, of itself, bar application of the United States antitrust laws, even where such foreign state has a strong policy to permit or encourage such conduct; no conflict of law exists, for these purposes, where a person subject to regulation by two states can comply with the laws of both. (Scalia, O'Connor, Kennedy, and Thomas, JJ., dissented in part from this holding.)

RESTRAINTS OF TRADE, MONOPOLIES, AND UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES §30.3 > license refusal -- employment -- > Headnote:
LEdHN[15][] [15]

Although both an agreement among competing motion picture distributors under which they refuse to license films to exhibitors except on standardized terms, and an attempt by an association of employers to establish industrywide terms of employment, are unreasonable restraints of trade under the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 et seq.), neither of such concerted actions are properly characterized as boycotts as far as the Sherman Act is concerned.

BOYCOTT §1 > activities -- > Headnote:

"Boycott" is a multifaceted phenomenon that includes conditional boycotts, punitive boycotts, coercive boycotts, partial boycotts, labor boycotts, political boycotts, and social boycotts, but it does not include refusals to deal because of objections to proposed terms.

LABOR §123 > boycott -- > Headnote:

For purposes of 3(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act (15 USCS 1013(b))--which provides that nothing in such Act, under which the business of insurance generally is exempt from antitrust liability to the extent that such business is regulated by state law, renders the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 et seq.) inapplicable to any act of "boycott, coercion, or intimidation"--the alleged insistence by a number of reinsurers upon certain primary insurance terms as a condition of writing reinsurance is a concerted agreement to terms and not a "boycott," since the terms of primary insurance policies are the subject matter insured by reinsurance; furthermore, it follows from such determination that the reinsurers' alleged actions do not constitute "coercion" or "intimidation" within the meaning of 3(b). (Souter, White, Blackmun, and Stevens, JJ., dissented from this holding.)

Claims for relief made in complaints in a consolidated action in Federal District Court fail to allege any boycotts within the meaning of 3(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act (15 USCS 1013(b))--which provides that nothing in such Act, under which the business of insurance generally is exempt from antitrust liability to the extent that such business is regulated by state law, renders the Sherman Act (15 USCS 1 et seq.) inapplicable to any act of boycott--where such claims allege a conspiracy among a group of domestic primary insurers, some foreign insurers, and an association of domestic insurers, to draft restrictive model forms and policy language for "umbrella" and "excess" insurance.

Syllabus

Nineteen States and many private plaintiffs filed complaints alleging that the defendants -- four domestic primary insurers, domestic companies who sell reinsurance to insurers, two domestic trade associations, a domestic reinsurance broker, and reinsurers based in London -- violated the Sherman Act by engaging in various conspiracies aimed at forcing certain other primary insurers to change the terms of their standard domestic commercial general liability insurance policies to conform with the policies the defendant insurers wanted to sell. After the actions were consolidated for litigation, the District Court granted the defendants' motions to dismiss. The Court of Appeals reversed, rejecting the District Court's [*2] conclusion that the defendants were entitled to antitrust immunity under § 2(b) of the McCarran-Ferguson Act, which exempts from federal regulation "the business of insurance," except "to the extent that such business is not regulated by State Law." Although it held the conduct involved to be "the business of insurance," the Court of Appeals ruled that the foreign reinsurers did not fall within § 2(b)'s protection because their activities could not be "regulated by State Law," and that the domestic insurers had forfeited their § 2(b) exemption when they conspired with the nonexempt foreign reinsurers. Furthermore, held the court, most of the conduct in question fell within § 3(b), which provides that nothing in the McCarran-Ferguson Act "shall render the . . . Sherman Act inapplicable to any . . . act of boycott . . . ." Finally, the court rejected the District Court's conclusion that the principle of international comity barred it from exercising Sherman Act jurisdiction over the three claims brought solely against the London reinsurers.

Held: The judgment is affirmed in part and reversed in part, and the cases are remanded.

JUSTICE SOUTER delivered the opinion [*3] of the Court with respect to Parts I, II-A, III, and IV, concluding that:

1. The domestic defendants did not lose their § 2(b) immunity by conspiring with the foreign defendants. The Court of Appeals's conclusion to the contrary was based in part on the statement, in Group Life & Health Ins. Co. v. Royal Drug Co., 440 U.S. 205, 231, 59 L. Ed. 2d 261, 99 S. Ct. 1067, that, "in analogous contexts, the Court has held that an exempt entity forfeits antitrust exemption by acting in concert with nonexempt parties." Even assuming that foreign reinsurers were "not regulated by State Law," the Court of Appeals's reasoning fails because the analogy drawn by the Royal Drug Court was a loose one. Following that language, the Royal Drug Court cited two cases dealing with the Capper-Volstead Act, which immunizes certain "persons" from Sherman Act liability. Ibid. Because, in contrast, the McCarran-Ferguson Act immunizes activities rather than entities, an entity-based analysis of § 2(b) immunity is inappropriate. See id., at 232-233. Moreover, the agreements at issue in Royal Drug Co. were made with "parties wholly outside the insurance [*4] industry," id., at 231, whereas the alleged agreements here are with foreign reinsurers and admittedly concern "the business of insurance." Pp. 781-784.

2. Even assuming that a court may decline to exercise Sherman Act jurisdiction over foreign conduct in an appropriate case, international comity would not counsel against exercising jurisdiction in the circumstances alleged here. The only substantial question in this litigation is whether "there is in fact a true conflict between domestic and foreign law." Societe Nationale Industrielle Aerospatiale v. United States Dist. Court for Southern Dist. of Iowa, 482 U.S. 522, 555, 96 L. Ed. 2d 461, 107 S. Ct. 2542 (BLACKMUN, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). That question must be answered in the negative, since the London reinsurers do not argue that British law requires them to act in some fashion prohibited by United States law or claim that their compliance with the laws of both countries is otherwise impossible. Pp. 794-799.

JUSTICE SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Part I, concluding that a "boycott" for purposes of § 3(b) of the Act occurs where, [*5] in order to coerce a target into certain terms on one transaction, parties refuse to engage in other, unrelated transactions with the target. It is not a "boycott" but rather a concerted agreement to terms (a "cartelization") where parties refuse to engage in a particular transaction until the terms of that transaction are agreeable. Under the foregoing test, the allegations of a "boycott" in this litigation, construed most favorably to the respondents, are sufficient to sustain most of the relevant counts of complaint against a motion to dismiss. Pp. 800-811.

[*769] [621] [2895] JUSTICE SOUTER announced the judgment of the Court and delivered the opinion of the Court with respect to Parts I, II-A, III, and IV, and an opinion concurring in the judgment with respect to Part II-B. *

[11] LEdHN[1A][] [1A] LEdHN[2A][] [2A] LEdHN[3A][] [3A]HN1[] The Sherman Act makes every contract, combination, or conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of interstate or foreign commerce illegal. 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1. These consolidated cases present questions about the application of that Act to the insurance industry, both here and abroad. The plaintiffs (respondents here) allege that both domestic and foreign defendants (petitioners here) violated the Sherman Act by engaging in various conspiracies to affect the American insurance market. A group of domestic [622] defendants argues that the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 59 Stat. 33, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1011 et seq., precludes application of the Sherman Act to the conduct alleged; a group of foreign defendants argues that the principle of international comity requires the District Court to refrain [*12] from exercising jurisdiction over certain claims against it. We hold that most of the domestic defendants' alleged conduct is not immunized [*770] from antitrust liability by the McCarran-Ferguson Act, and that, even assuming it applies, the principle of international comity does not preclude District Court jurisdiction over the foreign conduct alleged.

LEdHN[4][] [4] LEdHN[5A][] [5A]The two petitions before us stem from consolidated litigation comprising the complaints of 19 States and many private plaintiffs alleging that the defendants, members of the insurance industry, conspired in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act to restrict the terms of coverage of commercial general liability (CGL) insurance [1] available in the United States. Because the cases come to us on motions to dismiss, we take the allegations of the complaints as true. [2]

[1] CGL insurance provides "coverage for third party casualty damage claims against a purchaser of insurance (the 'insured')." App. 8 (Cal. Complaint P4.a).

[2] Following the lower courts and the parties, see In re Insurance Antitrust Litigation, 938 F.2d 919, 924, 925 (CA9 1991), we will treat the complaint filed by California as representative of the claims of Alabama, Arizona, California, Massachusetts, New York, West Virginia, and Wisconsin, and the complaint filed by Connecticut as representative of the claims of Alaska, Colorado, Connecticut, Louisiana, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Washington. As will become apparent, the California and Connecticut Complaints differ slightly in their presentations of background information and their claims for relief; their statements of facts are identical. Because the private party plaintiffs have chosen in their brief in this Court to use the California Complaint as a "representative model" of their claims, Brief for Respondents (Private Party Plaintiffs)

According to the complaints, the object of the conspiracies was to force certain primary [2896] insurers (insurers who sell insurance directly to consumers) to change the terms of their [*771] standard CGL insurance policies to conform with the policies the defendant insurers wanted to sell. The defendants wanted four changes. [3]

First, CGL insurance has traditionally been sold in the United States on an "occurrence" basis, through a policy obligating the insurer "to pay or defend claims, whenever made, resulting from an accident [*15] or 'injurious exposure to conditions' that occurred during the [specific time] period the policy was in effect." App. 22 (Cal. Complaint P52). In place of this traditional "occurrence" trigger of coverage, the [623] defendants wanted a "claims-made" trigger, obligating the insurer to pay or defend only those claims made during the policy period. Such a policy has the distinct advantage for the insurer that when the policy period ends without a claim having been made, the insurer can be certain that the policy will not expose it to any further liability. Second, the defendants wanted the "claims-made" policy to have a "retroactive date" provision, which would further restrict coverage to claims based on incidents that occurred after a certain date. Such a provision eliminates the risk that an insurer, by issuing a claims-made policy, would assume liability arising from incidents that occurred before the policy's effective date, but remained undiscovered or caused no immediate harm. Third, CGL insurance has traditionally covered "sudden and accidental" pollution; the defendants wanted to eliminate that coverage. Finally, CGL insurance has traditionally provided that the insurer [*16] would bear the legal costs of defending covered claims against the insured without regard to the policy's stated limits of coverage; the defendants [*772] wanted legal defense costs to be counted against the stated limits (providing a "legal defense cost cap").

To understand how the defendants are alleged to have pressured the targeted primary insurers to make these changes, one must be aware of two important features of the insurance industry. First, most primary insurers rely on certain outside support services for the type of insurance coverage they wish to sell. Defendant Insurance Services Office, Inc. (ISO), an association of approximately 1,400 domestic property and casualty insurers (including the primary insurer defendants, Hartford Fire Insurance Company, Allstate Insurance Company, CIGNA Corporation, and Aetna Casualty and Surety Company), is the almost exclusive source of support services in this country for CGL insurance. See id., at 19 (Cal. Complaint P38). ISO develops standard policy forms and files or lodges them with each State's insurance regulators; most CGL insurance written in the United States is written on these forms. Ibid. (Cal. Complaint P39); [*17] id., at 74 (Conn. Complaint P50). All of the "traditional" features of CGL insurance relevant to this litigation were embodied in the ISO standard CGL insurance form that had been in use since 1973 (1973 ISO CGL form). Id., at 22 (Cal. Complaint PP51-54); id., at 75 (Conn. Complaint [2897] PP56-58). For each of its standard policy forms, ISO also supplies actuarial and rating information: it collects, aggregates, interprets, and distributes data on the premiums charged, claims filed and paid, and defense costs expended with respect to each form, id., at 19 (Cal. Complaint P39); id., at 74 (Conn. Complaint PP51-52), and on the basis of these data it predicts future loss trends and calculates advisory premium rates, id., at 19 (Cal. Complaint P39); id., at 74 (Conn. Complaint P53). Most ISO members cannot afford to continue to use a form if ISO withdraws these support services. See id., at 32-33 (Cal. Complaint PP97, 99).

Second, primary insurers themselves usually purchase insurance to cover a portion of the risk they assume from the [*773] consumer. This so-called "reinsurance" may serve at least two purposes, protecting the primary insurer [*18] from catastrophic [624] loss, and allowing the primary insurer to sell more insurance than its own financial capacity might otherwise permit. Id., at 17 (Cal. Complaint P29). Thus, "the availability of reinsurance

3, n.6, we will assume that their complaints track that complaint. On remand, the courts below will of course be free to take into account any relevant differences among the complaints that the parties may bring to their attention.

[3] The First Claim for Relief in the Connecticut Complaint, App. 88-90 (PP115-119), charges all the defendants with an overarching conspiracy to force all four of these changes on the insurance market. The eight federal-law Claims for Relief in the California Complaint, id., at 36-49 (PP111-150), charge various subgroups of the defendants with separate conspiracies that had more limited objects; not all of the defendants are alleged to have desired all four changes.

affects the ability and willingness of primary insurers to provide insurance to their customers." Id., at 18 (Cal. Complaint P34); id., at 63 (Conn. Complaint P4(p)). Insurers who sell reinsurance themselves often purchase insurance to cover part of the risk they assume from the primary insurer; such "retrocessional reinsurance" does for reinsurers what reinsurance does for primary insurers. See ibid. (Conn. Complaint P4(r)). Many of the defendants here are reinsurers or reinsurance brokers, or play some other specialized role in the reinsurance business; defendant Reinsurance Association of America (RAA) is a trade association of domestic reinsurers.

The prehistory of events claimed to give rise to liability starts in 1977, when ISO began the process of revising its 1973 CGL form. Id., at 22 (Cal. Complaint P55). For the first time, it proposed two CGL forms (1984 ISO CGL forms), one the traditional "occurrence" type, the other "with a new [*19] 'claims-made' trigger." Id., at 22-23 (Cal. Complaint P56). The "claims-made" form did not have a retroactive date provision, however, and both 1984 forms covered "'sudden and accidental' pollution" damage and provided for unlimited coverage of legal defense costs by the insurer. Id., at 23 (Cal. Complaint PP59-60). Within the ISO, defendant Hartford Fire Insurance Company objected to the proposed 1984 forms; it desired elimination of the "occurrence" form, a retroactive date provision on the "claims-made" form, elimination of sudden and accidental pollution coverage, and a legal defense cost cap. Defendant Allstate Insurance Company also expressed its desire for a retroactive date provision on [*774] the "claims-made" form. Id., at 24 (Cal. Complaint P61). Majorities in the relevant ISO committees, however, supported the proposed 1984 CGL forms and rejected the changes proposed by Hartford and Allstate. In December 1983, the ISO Board of Directors approved the proposed 1984 forms, and ISO filed or lodged the forms with state regulators in March 1984. Ibid. (Cal. Complaint P62).

Dissatisfied with this state of affairs, the defendants began to take other steps [*20] to force a change in the terms of coverage of CGL insurance generally available, steps that, the plaintiffs allege, implemented a series of conspiracies in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. The plaintiffs recount these steps as a number of separate episodes corresponding to different claims for relief in their complaints; [4] because it will become important to distinguish among these counts and the acts and defendants associated with them, we will note these correspondences.

The first four Claims for Relief in the California Complaint, id., at 36-43 (PP111-130), [2898] and the Second Claim for Relief in the Connecticut Complaint, id., at 90-92 (PP120-124), charge [625] the four domestic primary insurer defendants and varying groups of domestic and foreign [*21] reinsurers, brokers, and associations with conspiracies to manipulate the ISO CGL forms. In March 1984, primary insurer Hartford persuaded General Reinsurance Corporation (General Re), the largest American reinsurer, to take steps either to procure desired changes in the ISO CGL forms, or "failing that, [to] 'derail' the entire ISO CGL forms program." Id., at 24 (Cal. Complaint P64). General Re took up the matter with its trade association, RAA, which created a special committee that met and agreed to "boycott" the 1984 ISO CGL forms unless a retroactive-date provision was added to the [*775] claims-made form, and a pollution exclusion and defense cost cap were added to both forms. Id., at 24-25 (Cal. Complaint PP65-66). RAA then sent a letter to ISO "announcing that its members would not provide reinsurance for coverages written on the 1984 CGL forms," id., at 25 (Cal. Complaint P67), and Hartford and General Re enlisted a domestic reinsurance broker to give a speech to the ISO Board of Directors, in which he stated that no reinsurers would "break ranks" to reinsure the 1984 ISO CGL forms. Ibid. (Cal. Complaint P68).

The four primary insurer defendants (Hartford, [*22] Aetna, CIGNA, and Allstate) also encouraged key actors in the London reinsurance market, an important provider of reinsurance for North American risks, to withhold reinsurance for coverages written on the 1984 ISO CGL forms. Id., at 25-26 (Cal. Complaint PP69-70). As a consequence, many London-based underwriters, syndicates, brokers, and reinsurance companies informed ISO of their intention to withhold reinsurance on the 1984 forms, id., at 26-27 (Cal. Complaint PP71-75), and at least some of them told ISO that they would withhold reinsurance until ISO incorporated all four desired changes, see supra, at 771, and n. 3, into the ISO CGL forms. App. 26 (Cal. Complaint P74).

[4] The First Claim for Relief in the Connecticut Complaint, id., at 88-90 (PP115-119), charging an overarching conspiracy encompassing all of the defendants and all of the conduct alleged, is a special case. See n. 18, infra.

For the first time ever, ISO invited representatives of the domestic and foreign reinsurance markets to speak at an ISO Executive Committee meeting. Id., at 27-28 (Cal. Complaint P78). At that meeting, the reinsurers "presented their agreed upon positions that there would be changes in the CGL forms or no reinsurance." Id., at 29 (Cal. Complaint P82). The ISO Executive Committee then voted to include a retroactive-date provision in the claims-made form, and to exclude all pollution coverage from [*23] both new forms. (But it neither eliminated the occurrence form, nor added a legal defense cost cap.) The 1984 ISO CGL forms were then withdrawn from the marketplace, and replaced with forms (1986 ISO CGL forms) containing the new provisions. Ibid. [*776] (Cal. Complaint P84). After ISO got regulatory approval of the 1986 forms in most States where approval was needed, it eliminated its support services for the 1973 CGL form, thus rendering it impossible for most ISO members to continue to use the form. Id., at 32-33 (Cal. Complaint PP97, 99).

The Fifth Claim for Relief in the California Complaint, id., at 43-44 (PP131-135), and the virtually identical Third Claim for Relief in the Connecticut Complaint, id., at 92-94 (PP125-129), charge a conspiracy among a [626] group of London reinsurers and brokers to coerce primary insurers in the United States to offer CGL coverage only on a claims-made basis. The reinsurers collectively refused to write new reinsurance contracts for, or to renew longstanding contracts with, "primary . . . insurers unless they were prepared to switch from the occurrence to the claims-made form," id., at 30 (Cal. Complaint P88); [*24] they also amended their reinsurance contracts to cover only claims made before a "'sunset date,'" thus eliminating reinsurance for claims made on occurrence policies after that date, id., at 31 (Cal. Complaint PP90-92).

[2899] The Sixth Claim for Relief in the California Complaint, id., at 45-46 (PP136-140), and the nearly identical Fourth Claim for Relief in the Connecticut Complaint, id., at 94-95 (PP130-134), charge another conspiracy among a somewhat different group of London reinsurers to withhold reinsurance for pollution coverage. The London reinsurers met and agreed that all reinsurance contracts covering North American casualty risks, including CGL risks, would be written with a complete exclusion for pollution liability coverage. Id., at 32 (Cal. Complaint PP94-95). In accordance with this agreement, the parties have in fact excluded pollution liability coverage from CGL reinsurance contracts since at least late 1985. Ibid. (Cal. Complaint P94).
