(xvi) Since -- unlike in the World War II example provided in note 44 of this Opinion -- there is no information establishing either the fact or the span of any Chinese collusive agreements (among Defendant or all Chinese magnesite exporters, or other entities), the Court construes Lamb's resort to dummy variables as Lamb's presumption that a "certain" factor (or a certain combination of certain factors) fluctuated with 0.04 coefficient to Chinese prices on magnesite-based products during the years 2000-2003, and with 0.195 coefficient during the 2004-2007 period. However, the Court has no reason to presume that this "certain" factor was Chinese collusive agreements rather than a collusion-unrelated economic factor other than the six independent variables selected by Lamb (that is, other than growth in Chinese steel production, growth in Chinese cement production, domestic inflation of the Yuan and fluctuation of the Yuan versus the United States Dollar and SDR). [45] Yet, [101] in a [*359] purely conclusory fashion, the Report deduces from Lamb's Regression Result the following statement:

[44] The concept could be illustrated as follows: "For example, suppose you are investigating [United States] consumption behavior with time series data for the period 1930 to 1950. You would expect that consumption behavior would have been significantly different during the years of World War II than it was before and after the war. To take this effect into account, you can create an artificial variable that will take the value 1 during each of the war years and the value 0 during each of the other years." Business Statistics at 394. In such example, the usage of a dummy variable based on the WWII during the years affected by the WWII is warranted since the fact of the WWII occurrence [100] has been unquestionably established, the same as the years during which the United States were engaged in the WWII.

[45] The developments that could have had an influence on the prices of Chinese magnesium oxide (and, thus, might be dummy variables, that is, if the Court is to presume that these developments were, somehow, not quantitative) include: increases in Chinese domestic and export taxation, increases in cost of capital ensuing from borrowing (or issuance of debt), needs for repairs and/or new constructions caused by depreciation of equipment/other fixed assets, rising cost of labor, etc. Indeed, the increase in wages appears to be the most probable factor -- as this Court already pointed out in its December Opinion:

> the cost of labor in Chinese mining and mining-related industries more than doubled from [102] 2000 to 2005. 29 See <<http://www.stats.gov.cn/tjsj/ndsj/2006/html/E0520E.HTM>>; <<http://www.stats.gov.cn/english/statisticaldata/yearlydata/yb2004-e/html/E0526ae.htm >>; <<http://www.stats.gov.cn/english/statisticaldata/yearlydata/YB2002e/html/e0526ae. htm>>; <<http://www.stats.gov.cn/english/statisticaldata/yearlydata/YB2001e/html/ e0526ae.htm>> (information provided by the National Bureau of Statistics of China, indicating that the wages of employees in state-owned facilities increased, between 1999 and 2005, from 8,283 yuan to 20,992 yuan per annum, that is 254%; while the wages in collectively-owned units increased from 4,857 to 11,268 (231%), and in all other units went from 9,842 to 21,207, that is, 215%).

Docket Entry No. 73, at 45-46. It appears rather evident that the "Chinese Consumer Price Inflation" variable factored in the Lamb's Regression Result could not have accounted for these dramatic rise in labor costs, since: (a) the concept of "consumer

> The [dummy] variables included in the model measure the extent by which prices were higher as a result of the alleged conspiracy in this matter. These variables are both statistically significant. This result means that class members were all harmed in that they paid a higher price for magnesite products as a result of the alleged conspiracy.

Docket Entry No. 28-6, at 16 (emphasis supplied).

(xvii) Moreover, the Report not only declares, in conclusory fashion, that Lamb's artificially created dummy variables must be collusive activities of Defendants, the Report also omits to inform the Court of any results of the benchmark comparison of post-2000 data and 1995-2000 data that was promised by Lamb at the outset of his Report. See id. at 10-11 (promising such comparison by stating that [104] "[r]egression is an appropriate technique in this context because it controls for the impact of each explanatory variable upon the dependent variable, while allowing me to quantify the difference between prices during the alleged conspiracy and the benchmark period, e.g. the overcharge"). Instead, the Report merely states:

> Table 3 [("Table 3"), replicated below,] shows the estimated overcharges from the regression model. These results show the percentage by which prices for magnesite were higher as a result of the alleged conspiracy. In order to obtain the percentage overcharge from the estimated coefficient it is necessary to make a technical adjustment. The conspiracy had greater impact in the period after 2004, since the estimated overcharge on magnesite prices was higher during that time period.

2*Table 3

2*Estimated Overcharge Percentages

	Estimated Overcharged
Collusion Period [1]	Percentage
2000-2003	4.03%
2004-2007	21.63%

Id. at 16 and n. 35.

In other words, the Report seems to substitute the promised benchmark analysis [*360] by a percentile conversion of the coefficients of arbitrarily labeled dummy variable with the goal of restating the very same [105] inexplicable conclusion, i.e., that Chinese magnesite prices during 2000-2007 had to be affected by certain "Chinese" collusive activities.

(xviii) Re-repeating the same once again, the Report concludes with Lamb's assertion that, "[b]ased on [his] analysis of the market for Chinese magnesite[, Lamb] ha[s] determined that all class members were injured as a result of the alleged conspiracy." Id. at 18. However, in light of the above-discussed chain of deficiencies (e.g., the unwarranted assumption that the facts borrowed from dismissed Original Complaint were true; the failure to provide the Court with Lamb's pools of data, the sources of this data, as well as with Lamb's regression equations; the discrepancies between the figures and statements made in the Report and Lamb's Regression Results; the discrepancies between the figures and statements made in the Report and the statements made in the Amended price inflation" is qualitatively different from that of "labor costs"; (b) the coefficient of 0.587 detected by Lamb as an assessor of the effect the increases in inflation had on the increases in magnesium oxide prices fails [103] to correspond to the above-quoted over-200% increase in labor costs; and (c) rising cost of Chinese labor was virtually certain to be higher than domestic inflation of the Yuan (causing consumer price inflation) because an increase in wages exceeding the increase in inflation is a feature necessary for an increase in the population's purchasing power (and its standard of living) which, seems, was unquestionably achieved in China during the first decade of the XXI century. See, e.g., Yangtze China Inv. Interim Results, London Stock Exchange Aggregated Regulatory News Service (Dec. 4, 2009); Form 8-k: Cn Dragon Announces Determination to Change Direction of Current Business Operations, US State News (Dec. 4, 2009); Low-carbon Urbanization Is Way Forward for China, Chinadaily.com (Nov. 30. 2009).

[1] Collusion period is April 2000 to Present.

Complaint; the inexplicable deducement that Lamb's dummy variables were necessarily representative of collusive activities; failure to perform the benchmark analysis originally presented as the key analytical step; etc.), the Court cannot accept the Report as proof that "Chinese" collusive [106] activities actually took place and/or that these activities were the source of increase in magnesite prices. A fortiori, the Court cannot apply Lamb's conclusions specifically to Defendants. [46]

With that, the Court now returns to the second sentence composing Plaintiffs' Paragraph Sixty-Five (asserting that "[a]n overcharge analysis from a regression model by . . . Lamb . . . shows that, between 2000 and 2003, the Cartel overcharged U.S. buyers of magnesite by an average of 4 percent, while between 2004 and 2008, as a direct result of the Cartel's activities, U.S. magnesite purchasers were overcharged more than 21 percent"). Am. Compl. P 65. This statement is incorrect even regardless of above-discussed shortcomings of the Report, since the Report neither speaks in terms of "Cartel's activities" (rather, it asserts "overall Chinese" activities) nor covers the year 2008 and any time thereafter (rather, it covers only the period from July 2000 to July 2007). Moreover, [108] the Report merely suggests that the increases in Chinese prices might have been related to intensification of certain factor(s), some of which were assessed through, allegedly, actual pools of data. [*361] The Report, however, clearly states that the "collusion factor" was merely hypothesized by Lamb into a dummy variable as a result of Lamb's taking Plaintiffs' allegations in the Original Complaint as true facts. Simply put, Lamb's Report can be reduced to a sophistic statement, "if Plaintiffs' factual assertions are true, then Lamb's calculations of Plaintiffs' factual assertions shows that these assertions are true." Such statement establishes neither Defendants' intent nor even anyone's intent to affect United States commerce; moreover, it does not even establish the "directness" of these "someone's" actions (since, according to Lamb's results, the collusive activities, even during the "high-tide" period, caused only a price increase of $ 2.16 per metric ton). [47] Consequently, Plaintiffs' second sentence in Paragraph Sixty-Five appears to be nothing but Plaintiffs' unwarranted distortion of the already insufficient Report. In light of the foregoing, the Court will disregard the content [109] of this Paragraph for failure to provide any relevant factual proof of Plaintiffs' position.

k. Paragraph Seventy-Two

Next paragraph, i.e., Paragraph Seventy-Two, alleges as follows:

> During the conspiracy, prices of magnesite and magnesite products exported to the United States from China have not followed the laws of supply and demand [which, in Plaintiffs' opinion, should] exist in a competitive market. Instead, prices have been set and maintained at artificially high levels by Defendants and their [unspecified] co-conspirators.

Am. Compl. P 72.

[46] The Court, having a mere layperson's familiarity and no expert command of statistics, is certainly mindful of the possibility that the Court misconstrued either Lamb's deducements and/or his regression model, and/or the correlation Lamb envisioned between the benchmarking and regression analyses, etc. However, the possibility of the Court's misconstruction of the Report transforms the Report into a document even less suitable to operate as a factual proof: it is axiomatic that HN24[] Rule 702 admits expert testimony "if it will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or a fact in issue," Moses v. Payne, 543 F.3d 1090, 1101 (9th Cir. 2008) (quoting State v. Farr-Lenzini, 93 Wn. App. 453, 970 P.2d 313, 318 (Wash. Ct. App. 1999)); see also Kannankeril v. Terminix Int'l, Inc., 128 F.3d 802, 806 (3d Cir. 1997), and the Court has no obligation to decipher an expert's cryptic message. Moreover, since -- HN25[] under Rule 702 -- expert testimony cannot be misleading, see Moses, 543 F.3d at 1101 (citing Farr-Lenzini, 970 P.2d at 319), [107] an expert's report must be amenable to understanding by a layperson not only with respect to the words composing the end-conclusion but also with regard to the rationale and the steps of the processes employed. Indeed, construing Rule 702 otherwise would invite experts to "create" facts by simply ushering floods of technical terminology on the judiciary stripped of an actual opportunity to analyze the testimony.

[47] Since, according to Plaintiffs, the export price rose during 2000 from $ 104 per metric ton to $ 158 per metric ton (i.e., by $ 54 per ton per year), see Am. Compl. P 55, then the deduced-by-Lamb 4.03% effect, see Table 3, of such $ 54 increase would amount to the yearly price rise of $ 2.16 per metric ton (4.03% of $ 54), i.e., it yields Lamb's conclusion that "Chinese" collusive agreements caused only a $ 2.16 rise in price of magnesium oxide, and the remaining $ 51.84 ($ 54 - $ 2.16) rise in price was attributed to factors unrelated to these "Chinese" collusive agreements.

Both of these statements fail to provide the Court with any proof necessary [110] for the factual review, as defined in Turicentro (moreover, these statements fail to meet even the pleading requirements, as construed by Twombly and Iqbal). Indeed, the first sentence offers the Court only Plaintiffs' self-serving simplistic construction of economic models, virtually repeating the error of the above-discussed Paragraph Fifty-Five. See supra, note 22 of this Opinion (explaining the fallacy of Plaintiffs' overly simplified position). The second sentence does not even aim to state a fact: rather, it offers the Court a recital of a Sherman Act requirement, but attempts to disguise that recital as a fact. However, such pleading is insufficient even for the purposes of facial review. See Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949-54 (HN26[↑] "the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions [or to t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements [, i.e., by] legal conclusion[s] couched as a factual allegation [e.g.,] the plaintiffs' assertion of an unlawful agreement [or] that [defendants] adopted a policy 'because of,' not merely 'in spite of,' its adverse effects upon [111] an identifiable group") (citation omitted). Needless to say, such recital of legal elements fails to provide any proof for the purposes of factual review. Therefore, the Court will disregard the content of Paragraph [*362] Sixty-Three for the purposes of its jurisdictional assessment.

l. Paragraph Seventy-Five

Finally, Paragraph Seventy-Five asserts:

> Defendants' combination and conspiracy have had the following effects, among others: (a) [t]he price of magnesite and magnesite products purchased by Plaintiffs . . . has been fixed, raised, maintained and stabilized at artificial and non-competitive levels; (b) [c]ompetition in the sale of magnesite and magnesite products has been restrained.

Am. Compl. P 75.

The shortcomings of this Paragraph are identical to those of Paragraph Seventy-Two, i.e., Plaintiffs state nothing but a set of legal conclusions depicting "a" Sherman Act scenario and merely paste Defendants' name and the product's name into the picture in an effort to repackage their self-serving legal conclusions into a statement sounding like an assertion of fact. Since the Supreme Court expressly cautioned against such pleading practices even for the purposes of facial review, see Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949-54, [112] the Court certainly cannot accept Plaintiffs' bare legal conclusions as proof for the purposes of factual review, as defined in Turicentro. Therefore, this final set of allegations made by Plaintiffs in an attempt to establish that this Court has subject matter jurisdiction over this case under the FTAIA exception will also be disregarded.

m. Amended Complaint Fails to Meet the FTAIA Exception

As the foregoing discussion illustrates, not a single Paragraph of the Amended Complaint among those advertized in the Opposition as providing the Court with factual proof as to the Court's subject matter jurisdiction under 15 U.S.C. § 6a(1)(A) lives up to its promise. The bulk of Plaintiffs' pleadings related to the FTAIA exception fail to assert any facts (offering, instead, a kaleidoscope of self-serving conclusions and/or recitals of legal elements) and the remainder of Plaintiffs' statements assert facts that either negate Plaintiffs' claims or are self-contradicting, or inapposite to Plaintiffs' position, or unwarranted in light of Plaintiffs' own evidence, or based on deficient assumptions and inexplicable conclusions. Since Plaintiffs failed to offer the Court even a single factual proof [113] meeting the Rule 12 review, as articulated in Turicentro, the Court is constrained to conclude that Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint asserts Sherman Act claims (based on Defendants' status as exporters of Chinese magnesium oxide) that fall outside the Court's subject matter jurisdiction, and these claims should be dismissed.

Such conclusion, however, does not dispose of another reading of the Amended Complaint, which seems to suggest that Plaintiffs might be suing Defendants not in Defendants' capacity as exporters of Chinese goods but as importers of goods into the United States. The Court, therefore, now turns to such reading of the Amended Complaint.

B. Subject Matter Jurisdiction Under the Introductory Clause of the FTAIA

As noted supra, the FTAIA, in its introductory clause provides that:

> HN27[] [The Sherman Act] shall not apply to conduct involving trade or commerce (other than import trade or import commerce) with foreign nations.

15 U.S.C. § 6a (emphasis supplied). Hence, in perhaps ineloquent but nonetheless unambiguous terms, Section 6a provides that the FTAIA-based jurisdictional bar is wholly inapplicable to pleadings alleging that the wrongful conduct was undertaken by defendants as [114] importers (rather than as exporters). The Court's [*363] December Opinion already reviewed the Court of Appeals' guidance as to the issue of whether the defendants are importers or exporters:

> HN28[] [T]he FTAIA asks whether [the] defendants were "involve[d in] import trade or import commerce." See Carpet Group, 227 F.3d at 69, 72. If all that defendants were doing was actually bringing goods or services into the United States, then the FTAIA . . . is not even triggered, i.e., the claim [against the defendants] squarely falls within the scope of the Sherman Act. See Turicentro, 303 F.3d at 302 ("[While the FTAIA] does not define the term 'import,' . . . the term generally denotes a product (or perhaps a service) has been brought into the United States from abroad") (citing Webster's Third New Int'l Dictionary (1986); Black's Law Dictionary (6th ed. 1990)). However, if "[d]efendants did not directly bring items or services into the United States . . . , they cannot be labeled 'importers,' [nor could it be said that defendants] have they engaged in 'import trade or commerce.'" Id. In other words, even if a certain importer purchased or otherwise obtained the defendants' product in a foreign market (be [115] it the defendants' national market or any other market) and brought the defendants' product into the United States, the fact that the product eventually found its way into the United States does not transform the defendant into an "importer" and, hence, an antitrust claim against the defendants must pass muster under the FTAIA['s "substantial, direct and reasonably foreseeable" exception] before the Sherman Act claim can be entertained. See id. at 304 (HN29[] The fact "[t]hat 'some of the goods purchased in [a foreign market] may ultimately have been imported by individuals into the United States' [is] immaterial to determining if defendants [are] involved in 'import trade or import commerce' [since the defendants' own] actions did not directly increase or reduce imports into the United States") (quoting Kruman v. Christie's Int'l PLC, 284 F.3d 384, 395 (2d Cir. 2002).

Docket Entry No. 73, at 26-27 (emphases removed).

1. Plaintiffs' Allegations

The allegations stated in the Amended Complaint are less than clear as to whether Plaintiffs are suing Defendants as exporters or as importers.

Specifically, some Plaintiffs' claims use the term "import" and the phrase "sale of magnesite products to customers [116] in the United States" (rather than "sale to United States customers," which could have been taking place outside the United States). See Am. Compl. PP 1-2 (asserting that "[t]his action seeks no damages or relief with respect to non-import foreign commerce," "Defendants have directly sold and delivered magnesite and magnesite products to customers in the United States"). However, while some Defendants are named as entities that "directly sold . . . and shipped magnesite products to the United States during the period described in the [Amended] Complaint," id. P 12-13, 15, 19-20, 22-25 and 27 (emphasis supplied), hence suggesting that Defendants were importers, other Defendants are described as "producer[s] and exporter[s] of magnesite," suggesting that Defendants were not importers at all. Id. PP 17, 26 (emphases supplied). To add to the uncertainty, Plaintiffs' Paragraph Fifty-One outright merges the "substantial, direct and reasonably foreseeable effect on United States commerce" language of the FTAIA exception from 15 U.S.C. § 6a(1)(A) (applicable to exporters of goods that are brought into the United States by others) with an assertion that [*364] Defendants, on their own, brought these [117] goods into the United States. See id. P 55 ("The conduct of Defendants… has directly, substantially and foreseeably restrained trade and commerce in the United States. [They] directly sold [their goods] in United States commerce"). Finally, to make Plaintiffs' allegations even more confusing, the Amended Complaint opens with the sentence asserting that Defendants ha[d] "the purpose and effect of fixing prices of magnesite . . . products exported to . . . the United States," id. P 1 (emphasis supplied), but then immediately proceeds to state that "Defendants have directly sold and delivered magnesite . . . to customers in the United States." Id. P 2 (emphasis supplied). These inconsistent allegations necessarily allows for two readings of the Amended Complaint: (1) one, where Plaintiffs seem to assert inapplicability of the FTAIA jurisdictional bar on the grounds of the § 6a(1)(A) exporter exception (addressed in the prior section of this Opinion); and (2) another, where Plaintiffs seem to assert an "altogether" inapplicability of the FTAIA on the grounds that Defendants were importers (i.e., relying on the FTAIA's introductory clause). Plaintiffs' statements to the latter effect could [118] be roughly subdivided into three categories: (1) Plaintiffs' conclusory references to certain Defendants as entities that "directly . . . shipped magnesite products to the United States during the period described in the [Amended] Complaint," id. P 12-13, 15, 19-20, 22-25 and 27; (2) Plaintiffs' legal position that Defendants were importers because American entities either purchased Defendants' goods or consumed/resold these goods in the United States; and (3) Plaintiffs' assertion that Defendants were importers in light of the evidence contained in certain Plaintiffs and Defendants' exhibits.

The first category, consisting of numerously repeated factless self-serving assertions, cannot support Plaintiffs' position even for the purposes of facial review under the standard articulated in Iqbal and Twombly and, a fortiori, is insufficient for the purposes of factual review, as defined in Turicentro. Hence, this category of conclusory statements will be disregarded without further discussion. However, Plaintiffs' position based on alleged Defendants' sales to "American" entities, as well as Plaintiffs' reliance on certain exhibits, warrants a detailed review.

2. Claim That Defendants Effectively [119] Acted as Importers

The Amended Complaint is void of any factual statements or references to exhibits related to Defendants' alleged importation of goods into the United States. See, generally, Am. Compl. However, Plaintiffs' included in their amended pleadings a statement seemingly aiming to assert purchases of Defendants' goods by an entity which, upon bringing these goods to the United States, resold them to Plaintiffs (and, hence, introduced these goods in United States stream of domestic commerce). See id. P 11.

Specifically, Plaintiffs' Paragraph Eleven reads:

> Possehl, Inc. [("Possehl")] has assigned to [Plaintiffs all Possehl's] rights, title and interest in and to all causes of action it may have relating to magnesite or magnesite products brokered by Possehl, Inc. and subsequently delivered to [Plaintiffs] during the relevant period. Possehl, Inc. purchased magnesite and magnesite products directly from [D]efendants during the [relevant] period and shipped those products to [Plaintiffs].

Id. All other relevant statements made in the Amended Complaint are entirely factless, i.e., they present mere conclusory assertions lacking even verbal specificity, let alone actual factual proof. [120] See Am. Compl. PP 12-13, 15, 19-20, 22-25 and 27. [*365] Yet, Plaintiffs' factual assertions currently before the Court are not limited to the above-quoted two sentences in Paragraph Eleven. Rather, these statements and evidentiary material are contained in Plaintiffs' Opposition and exhibits attached thereto. See Docket Entry No. 105. Plaintiffs' inclusion of these statements (and exhibits) in their Opposition rather than in their Amended Complaint is a procedural oversight, since a litigant cannot plead claims, state and/or support facts by any non-pleading document, be it moving papers, an opposition to adversaries' motion, the litigant's traverse, etc. See, e.g., Bell v. City of Phila., 275 Fed. App'x 157, 160 (3d Cir. 2008); Gilmour v. Gates, McDonald & Co., 382 F.3d 1312, 1315 (11th Cir. 2004); Veggian v. Camden Bd. of Educ., 600 F. Supp. 2d 615, 628 (D.N.J. 2009). However, for the purposes of this Opinion only, the Court will consider Plaintiffs' Opposition statements and exhibits attached thereto as if they were included in the Amended Complaint by reference, via the above-quoted statement made in Paragraph Eleven.

a. Plaintiffs' Legal Position

Plaintiffs' legal position is not entirely [121] clear, granted that Plaintiffs assert:

> Defendants . . . directly sold magnesite to U.S. customers for delivery in the United States during the relevant time period. . . . Contracts previously submitted to the Court establish that [Defendants] sold magnesite to U.S. companies pursuant to contracts requiring delivery to the United States. Publicly available import records confirm that . . . Defendants . . . sold magnesite directly to customers in the United States for delivery in the United States.

> HN30[] Courts have uniformly concluded that the FTAIA exception for conduct involving import trade applies to claims by domestic importers arising from direct purchases of price-fixed goods. See, e.g., The 'In'Porters, S.A. v. HonesPrintables, Inc., 663 F. Supp. 494, 499 (M.D.N.C. 1987) (applying FTAIA to claims of antitrust plaintiffs "other than [] domestic importers]"); Coors Brewing Co. v. Miller Brewing Co., 889 F. Supp. 1394, 1398 (D. Colo. 1995) (stating that the FTAIA applies to antitrust plaintiffs' claims "with the exception of claims brought by domestic importers"); see also *Caribbean Broad Sys. Ltd. v. Cable and Wireless PLC, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19225, C.A. No. 93-2050, 1995 WL 767164, at 2 (D.D.C. Dec. 21, 1995), [122] rev'd on other grounds, 148 F.3d 1080, 331 U.S. App. D.C. 226 (B.C. Cir. 1998) (noting that the FTAIA "makes clear that the concern of the antitrust laws is protection of American consumers and American exporters, not foreign consumers or producers").
> In Kruman v. Christie's Int'l PLC, 284 F.3d 384, 398 (2d Cir. 2002)[,] the defendant auction houses were accused by plaintiffs that had purchased goods at auctions outside of the United States of conspiring to fix commissions on foreign auctions. In concluding that the import trade exception did not apply, the Second Circuit noted that, although "some of the goods purchased in those auctions may ultimately have been imported by individuals in the United States," "the commerce that is the focus of this case is the charging of fixed commissions on the purchase and sale of goods at foreign auctions, not the trade in and subsequent movement of the goods that were purchased and sold." Id. at 395-96.

Opp. at 14-15, 27-28.

Plaintiffs' invocation of The 'In'Porters does not seem to raise any legal point worthy of discussion, since it merely reiterates the Court's reading of the FTAIA [*366] as wholly inapplicable to claims against importers that bring goods in the United [123] States. Similarly, Plaintiffs' reliance on Kruman does not seem to add any wrinkle, since the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit already adopted the Kruman point highlighted by Plaintiffs in the Court of Appeal's Turicentro decision. See 303 F.3d at 302. That adoption of Kruman by the Court of Appeals was already duly noted by this Court in its December Opinion, when the Court states:

> "[while the FTAIA] does not define the term 'import,' . . . the term generally denotes a product (or perhaps a service) has been brought into the United States from abroad." [Turicentro, 303 F.3d at 302.] However, if "[d]efendants did not directly bring items or services into the United States . . . , they cannot be labeled 'importers,' [nor it could be said that defendants] have they engaged in 'import trade or commerce.'" Id. In other words, even if a certain importer purchased or otherwise obtained the defendants' product in a foreign market (be it the defendants' national market or any other market) and brought the defendants' product into the United States, the fact that the product eventually found its way into the United States does not transform the defendant into an "importer" and, hence, [124] an antitrust claim against the defendants must pass muster under the FTAIA['s "substantial, direct and reasonably foreseeable" exception] before the Sherman Act claim can be entertained. See id. at 304 (The fact "[t]hat 'some of the goods purchased in [a foreign market] may ultimately have been imported by individuals into the United States' [is] immaterial to determining if defendants [are] involved in 'import trade or import commerce' [since the defendants' own] actions did not directly increase or reduce imports into the United States") (quoting Kruman, 284 F.3d [at] 395).

Docket Entry No. 73, at 26-27.

Hence, the excerpt from Plaintiffs' Opposition quoted at the outset of this subsection leaves the Court with only two Plaintiffs' quotations, one from Carribean and another from Coors. However, Carribean is wholly inapposite to the case at hand since it deals with the issue of whether a purchaser in a foreign country can bring a Sherman Act claim based on foreign harm; this question was answered in the negative by the Supreme Court in Empagran S.A., 542 U.S. 155, 124 S. Ct. 2359, 159 L. Ed. 2d 226. One court explained and illustrated the issues associated with the Carribean language quoted by Plaintiffs as follows:

> In [125] asserting [that they have standing to sue], Plaintiffs rely on the FTAIA's introductory language, which states that the FTAIA's requirement of a "direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect" on domestic commerce applies to claims "involving trade or commerce (other than import trade or import commerce) with foreign nations." . . . Based on this language, Plaintiffs assert that the parenthetical exclusion of "import trade or import commerce" means that a foreign antitrust claim need never satisfy the FTAIA as long as it involves products that might be shipped to the United States. . . . The court determines that Plaintiffs' position is not a correct statement of the law. The "main significance" of the FTAIA is to "make[] clear that the concern of the antitrust laws is protection of American consumers and American exporters, not foreign consumers or producers" . . . . Phillip Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 272h2, at 362-63 (1997) . . . . The antitrust laws' goal of protecting American consumers and producers cannot realistically be served by Plaintiffs' version of the FTAIA, which would permit foreign [*367] plaintiffs to bring treble damages suits based on conduct that [126] has only indirect, insubstantial, and unforeseeable effects on commerce in this country.

United Phosphorus, Ltd. v. Angus Chem. Co., 131 F. Supp. 2d 1003, 1022 (N.D. Ill. 2001).

Since Plaintiffs' reference to Carribean is inapposite to the matter at hand, the Court is left to distill Plaintiffs' position from: (a) Plaintiffs' mentioning of Possehl in Paragraph Eleven of the Amended Complaint, see Am. Compl. P 11; (b) Plaintiffs' thrice paraphrased assertion that Defendants "sold magnesite to U.S. customers for delivery in the United States," "sold magnesite to U.S. companies pursuant to contracts requiring delivery to the United States," and "sold magnesite directly to customers in the United States for delivery in the United States," Opp. at 14-15; and (c) Plaintiffs' quotation from Coors that suggests Plaintiffs' reading of Coors as a case standing for the proposition the FTAIA jurisdictional bar is inapplicable to the claims brought by plaintiffs who are United States importers. See id. at 27. Read jointly, these statements seems to express Plaintiffs' position that a foreign exporter automatically becomes a de facto importer of goods in the United States (and, hence, automatically [127] loses his/her ability to invoke the FTAIA jurisdictional bar) if: (a) that exporter sells his/her goods to an importer that is/labels/deems itself an American entity; and (b) that importer brings the goods purchased from that exporter into the United States, either for the importer's consumption or for the importer's further re-sale of these goods to other American end-users. Accord Opp. at 27 (titling this section of the Opposition as "The Sale of . . . Products to U.S. Companies for Delivery in the United States is 'Conduct Involving' '. . . Import Trade or Import Commerce'") (emphasis supplied). [48] Presuming that the Court correctly distilled Plaintiffs' legal position, such position -- as explained below -- is without merit and, hence, Plaintiffs cannot reclassify Defendants-exporters into importing entities prevented from invoking the FTAIA jurisdictional bar. [49]

b. Coors Does Not Lend Support to Plaintiffs' Legal Position

Writing one of the very few pilot FTAIA decisions, the court in Coors grappled with a question completely different, both factually and legally, from the issue [129] of what circumstances could reclassify an exporter defendant into an importer. See Coors Brewing Co. v. Miller Brewing Co., 889 F. Supp. 1394. With finesse of sub-agreements addressed in Coors being factored out, the circumstances in Coors were as follows: Coors Brewing Company (a [48] In other words, Plaintiffs seem to invite the Court to find that the process of "importation" begins right at the loading docks of an exporter if the exporter sells to an American end-user or to a broker who informs the exporter of the broker's intent to resell the goods directly to American end-user once the goods enter [128] the United States. Such reading divorces United States actual geographic borders from Plaintiffs-created "virtual borders" which become drawn at any point where an American end-user or catering-to-Americans broker gets the good.

[49] The Court notes, in passing, that it is not entirely clear as to any rights, title or interests in any cause of action that Possehl might have in this matter, since: (a) Possehl is a German entity, situated in Lubeck (Schleswig-Holstein land of Germany), see <<http://www.possehl.de/en/index.html>>; (b) Possehl is an importer of all kinds of goods and is operating world-wide, see id.; (c) here, Possehl seemingly has been purchasing Chinese goods for further world-wide importation, which bars Possehl's claims under the holding of Empagran S.A., 542 U.S. 155, 124 S. Ct. 2359, 159 L. Ed. 2d 226; and (d) the only injury Possehl might have suffered as a result of the alleged collusive activity is a wholly speculative Possehl's inability to make "more" profit on resale of Chinese goods.

Colorado [*368] corporation engaged in the business of brewing, marketing, and distributing beer) entered into a licensing agreement with Molson Breweries of Canada (a Canadian corporation, also in the beer industry), pursuant to which Molson would brew and distribute Coors products in Canada. See Coors Brewing Co. v. Molson Breweries, 51 F.3d 1511, 1512-13 (10th Cir. 1995). Thereafter, Miller Brewing Company (a Wisconsin corporation also in the business of brewing and marketing beer) entered into a partnership with Molson; under that agreement, Miller became the exclusive distributor of Molson's products in the United States, and Molson became the exclusive distributor of Miller's products in Canada. See id. At no point in the Coors litigation did Molson and/or Miller deny the existence of the Miller-Molson alliance, pursuant to which Molson and Miller jointly targeted United States and Canadian markets through [130] coordination of their marketing and pricing. See id.; see also Coors, 889 F. Supp. 1394. In light of this Miller-Molson agreement, Coors initiated a legal action asserting that the Miller-Molson alliance limited Coors' ability to export its beer to Canada and, in addition, "somewhat restrained" trade in the United States. See Coors, 889 F. Supp. at 1397. In response, Miller and Molson asserted that Coors' claim was jurisdictionally barred by the FTAIA, and that the FTAIA's "direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect" exception (restoring jurisdiction) did not apply. See id. at 1397. Presented with such contentions, the District of Colorado ruled that the Molson-Miller alliance "satisfie[d] both subsections . . . of the FTAIA [exception] because it ha[d] a direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect not only on Coors' export trade with Canada, but also, albeit less directly, on the United States beer market." In other words, the Coors court made its finding primarily under subsection (1)(B) of the FTAIA, which: (a) removes the jurisdictional bar with regard to claims asserting "direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable [effect] on export trade [of American [131] entities selling to] foreign nations," see id. (emphasis supplied); and (b) is entirely inapplicable to the matter at hand, since -- here -- Plaintiffs are not suing in Plaintiffs' capacity as exporters of goods to China or to any other nation. [50]

At no point did the Coors court deal with the question of whether Molson, an exporter, could be re-characterized into an importer of Canadian beer to the United States on the grounds that Miller was "directly" bringing Molson's goods into the United States for sale to American consumers: the importer/exporter roles in Coors were firmly allocated and never contested by the parties. [51] With that observation, the Court now turns to the Coors sentence quoted by Plaintiffs; the paragraph from which Plaintiffs extracted that sentence reads, in its entirety, as follows:

> HN31[] Although cases applying the FTAIA are few, its "inelegant" language has been interpreted to mean that with the exception of claims [132] brought by domestic importers, the Sherman Act will not apply to conduct affecting foreign markets, consumers or producers unless there is [*369] also a direct, substantial, and reasonably foreseeable effect on the domestic market (subsection (1)(A)) or on opportunities to export from the United States ((1)(B)). [See] P. Areeda & H. Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 236'a at pp. 306-07 (1993 Supp.); see McGlinchy v. Shell Chemical Co., 845 F.2d 802, 813 (9th Cir. 1988) (allegations of a refusal to deal in foreign markets injuring only foreign customers and plaintiff insufficient to confer antitrust jurisdiction under FTAIA); The 'In'Porters. S.A. v. Hanes Printables. Inc., 663 F. Supp. 494, 498-99 (M.D.N.C. 1987) (French garment distributor had no cause of action under federal antitrust laws absent evidence of injury within the United States); Liamuiga Tours v. Travel Impressions Ltd., 617 F. Supp. 920, 922-23 (E.D.N.Y. 1985) (court lacked jurisdictional nexus under the FTAIA where restraint of trade and conspiracy claims involved exclusively lost business and anti[-]competitive effects in St. Kitts).

Id. at 1397-98 (language quoted in Plaintiffs' Opposition italicized).

In light of the Coors court's references to Areeda & Hovenkamp, McGlinchy, The 'In'Porters and Liamuiga Tours, none of which suggests, even remotely, that an exporter could be "re-characterized" into an importer if a catering-

[50] This Court does not endorse the Coors court's choice of words suggesting that an antitrust plaintiff might establish a direct effect necessary for subsection (1)(A) by pleadings asserting that the defendants' actions affected United States "less directly."

[51] Hence, even if the Coors [133] court were to make a finding that Molson was a quasi-importer of its Canadian beer to the United States as a result of engaging Miller, such finding would be necessarily a dictum having no precedential value even in the Coors court jurisdiction, and certainly in no other jurisdiction, such as this District. However, it does not seem that the Coors court made such a finding even in dicta.

to-Americans importer or an American end-user purchases the exporter's goods in a foreign market, this Court cannot exclude the possibility that the Coors court's phrase "with the exception of claims brought by domestic importers" (which, it seems, merely made a generic reference to the introductory clause of the FTAIA) was meant to read "with the exception of claims brought against domestic importers," i.e., that the Coors court merely summarized the introductory language of the FTAIA stating the statute's inapplicability to claims against importers of goods into the United States. [134] So read, the Coors decision certainly cannot support Plaintiffs' position, while -- read otherwise -- it would be mere dicta.

c. Plaintiffs' Position Contradicts the Gist of the Third Circuit Law

As noted supra, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit provided some guidance as to what entity qualifies as an "importer" for the purposes of the FTAIA analysis, stating that, while the FTAIA "does not define the term 'import,' . . . the term generally denotes a product [that] has been brought into the United States from abroad. [If d]efendants did not directly bring items or services into the United States . . . , they cannot be labeled 'importers.'" [52] Turicentro,

[52] The Court takes note of Plaintiffs' position that, in order to avoid the FTAIA jurisdictional bar under the introductory language "[the Sherman Act] shall not apply to conduct involving trade or commerce (other than import trade or import commerce) with [137] foreign nations unless . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 6a, Plaintiffs need not show that Defendants were actually "importers" of goods to the United States but could make a "diluted" showing that Defendants were just "involved" in import to the United States. See Opp. at 29-30 ("the FTAIA exception is not limited to claims against importers but extends to claims alleging illegal conduct that involves import trade or import commerce,"emphasis in original, quoting Carpet Group, 227 F.3d at 71, statement that "[t]he proper inquiry [is] whether the alleged conduct by the defendants 'involved' import trade or commerce," and In re Air Cargo Shipping Servs. Antitrust Litig., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107882, at *99 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 26, 2008), rejected in part, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97365 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 21, 2009), for the proposition that "language makes clear that not only import commerce, but conduct involving import commerce, is never removed from the reach of the Sherman Act," retaining the emphasis of Magistrate Judge Victor V. Pohorelsky). Plaintiffs misconstrue the meaning the word "involved," as utilized by the Court of Appeals in Carpet Group and even by Judge Pohorelsky in Air Cargo. The paragraph [138] of the Carpet Group opinion, from which Plaintiffs extracted their quotation, reads, in its entirety, as follows:

> The Magistrate Judge held that this case did not fall into the FTAIA's parenthetical exclusion, i.e., did not "involve" import trade or commerce, because the plaintiffs in this case were not importers . . . . [T]his is plainly an inaccurate reading of the FTAIA. It is an incorrect focus on the plaintiffs' function rather than the defendants' conduct. HN32[] [The] FTAIA's exemption from the Sherman Act focuses on the latter's application to "conduct involving trade or commerce (other than import trade or import commerce) with foreign nations."… The implication that the Sherman Act provisions "apply to import trade and import commerce is unmistakable." Eskofot A/S v. E.I. DuPont de Nemours & Co., 872 F. Supp. 81, 85 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). The proper inquiry was therefore whether the alleged conduct by the defendants "involved" import trade or commerce, not on whether the plaintiff's conduct, which is not being challenged as violative of the Sherman Act, "involved" import trade or commerce.

Carpet Group, 227 F.3d at 71. Hence, the word "involved" was utilized by the Court of Appeals in order [139] to denote which party (i.e., the plaintiff or the defendants) has to be importer(s) in order to render the FTAIA's jurisdictional bar wholly inapplicable to the plaintiff's claims; the word was not used in order to set forth a "diluted" or "relaxed" meaning of the term "import." This is especially obvious in light of the Court of Appeals' unaltered quotation from Eskofot: had the Court of Appeals wished to relax the Eskofot language, it would change it to "the Sherman Act provisions 'apply to [acts somehow involving] import trade and import commerce.'" Magistrate Judge Pohorelsky's focus on the word "involving" is, too, different from Plaintiffs' position. While his end-conclusion does not persuade this Court (and was indeed rejected, in part, by the Eastern District of New York), his "Analysis" section following the quotation extracted by Plaintiffs indicates that Judge Pohorelsky utilized the word in response to defendants' assertion that the act of price fixing outside the United States must be divorced, for the purposes of the FTAIA analysis, from any importation activities, and only the foreign situs of the price fixing could be assessed. See Air Cargo Shipping Servs., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107882, at *99-100. [140] In light of the foregoing, the Court finds Plaintiffs' reliance on Carpet Group and Air Cargo without merit. Simply put, the FTAIA is wholly inapplicable to Plaintiffs' claims if -- and only if -- Defendants were, in fact, importers: so read, the introductory language of the FTAIA yields the result comparable, policy-wise, to the "meant/intended to affect" test of Alcoa/Hartford Fire adopted in the subsection (1)(A)'s requirement for "direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable effect," since an entity which is the "main force" behind the transaction bringing the goods on United States soil is expected to "mean/intend to affect" United States commerce.

303 F.3d at [*370] 302. This definition, while undoubtedly helpful, does not, however, provide a bright-line test as to what process qualifies as "bringing" a product into the United States. True, such inquiry is easy in a scenario where the buyer "X" goes to country "Y" and -- upon purchasing goods from the selling entity "Z" -- brings these goods into the United States and consumes the goods or resells them within the United States: in such case, "X" is undoubtedly the "importer" of Z's goods. (Alternatively, if Z brings Z's goods [135] into the United States and then sells them to X, then Z is both an exporter from Z's country and, also, an importer for the purposes of the United States. However, modern trade is a process infinitely more complicated than the above-described simple scenarios. For instance: (a) seller Z typically receives a pro-forma offer from an intermediary "A" who, in turn, is interested in Z's goods because he either already has a pro-forma offer to buy from a purchaser X or anticipates such offer from X and/or from other X-like buyers; (b) in response to or in anticipation of X's offer, A obtains price quotes from Z and then quotes to X and X-like buyers A's price list (which, typically, factors in A's surcharge); (c) if X contacts A (or already contacted A), accepts A's quotes and [*371] places X's order, then A agrees with both Z and X on the terms of getting the goods from Z and payments to Z, as well as on getting the goods to X and payments from X (that is, unless A already had some arrangement in place with either X or Z, or both); (d) then, typically on agreement or at least in consultation with either X or Z, or both, A arranges for freight forwarder "B" to deliver the goods (that is, unless [136] X or Z already have certain exclusive or preferred freight forwarding arrangements in place); and (e) upon issuance of a stream of negotiable instruments and a chain of payment instruments, e.g., letters of credit, bill of lading, etc., the goods (accompanied by negotiable instruments) begin their voyage from Y to their first port of destination, while the payment instruments start en route from X to A and then from A to Z. See, e.g., Ralph H. Folsom et al., International Business Transactions 28-299 (West 3rd ed. 1995) (taking almost 300 pages to sketch just the basic financial and legal steps associated with international trade in goods). And, since the above-outlined chain of transactions is still a very simplistic way to define the actual intricacies of the trade process, the answer to the question of which entity or entities "bring(s)" Z's goods into the United States, see Turicentro, 303 F.3d at 302, might be less than obvious.

Defendants seem to suggest that this question should be decided on the basis of the particular Incoterms governing Defendants' sale of goods contracts. [53] See, e.g., S/Reply at 11. Plaintiffs, in turn, move the Court to wholly ignore the Incoterms used in Defendants' sales contracts and, instead, determine Defendants' importer/exporter status on the basis of the country of the first official port of destination where the goods were shipped from the seller's country. See Opp. at 28-29 (citing contract law cases assessing transfer of [141] title and risk of loss associated with injury [*372] to or destruction of goods). The Court finds both positions equally unpersuasive.

[53] "Where the goods are to be carried from one location to another as part of the sale transaction, the parties will often adopt a commercial term to state the delivery obligation of the seller. . . . These terms are defined in the UCC [§§ 2-319, 2-320], but the UCC definitions are seldom used intentionally in international trade . . . because the abbreviations used are now associated primarily with water-borne traffic, and the statutory terms do not include the new terminology associated with air freight, containerization, or multi-modal transportation practices. In international commerce, the dominant source of definitions for commercial delivery terms is 'Incoterms,' published by the International Chamber of Commerce (I.C.C.) . . . . Incoterms is an acronym for International Commercial Terms, and provides rules for determining the obligations of both seller and buyer when different commercial terms . . . are used. They state what acts the seller must do to deliver, what acts buyer must do to accommodate delivery, what costs each party must bear, and at [142] what point in the delivery process the risk of loss passes from seller to buyer. Each of these obligations may be different for different commercial terms. . . . There are other sources of such definitions, in addition to the UCC and Incoterms, such as the American Revised Foreign Trade Definitions . . . . widely used in Pacific Ocean trade . . . . Since the I.C.C. is a non-governmental entity, Incoterms is neither a national legislation nor an international treaty [and] it cannot be 'the governing law' of any contract. Instead, it is a written form of custom and usage in the trade, which can be, and often is expressly incorporated by . . . the parties to an international contract for the sale of goods. . . . Although the [the line of aforesaid sources] has definitions for [Incoterms], these definitions are expressly subject to 'agreement otherwise' [and] United States courts have so held. . . . Incoterms gives the parties a menu of thirteen different commercial terms to describe the . . . obligations of the seller and . . . the buyer . . . : (1) EXW; (2) FCA; (3) FAS; (4) FOB; (5) CFR; (6) CIF; (7) CPT; (8) CIP; (9) DAF; (10) DES; (11) DEQ; (12) DDU; (13) DDP." Ralph H. Folsom et [143] al., International Business Transactions in a Nutshell 93-96 (West 5th ed., 1996).

Defendants' hard-and-fast rule based on the Incoterms ignores: (a) the fact that the meaning of any Incoterm is subject to alteration upon agreement between parties (and such alteration might even be a result of a condoned conduct), see supra note 53 of this Opinion; and (b) the axiomatic proposition that form shall not be elevated over substance, and thus the actual content of the contract -- rather than its title/caption/headings -- governs the actions of contracting parties. See, e.g., Farnsworth, Contracts § 6.3 (1982) (the determination of the nature of a transaction "is a question of substance rather than form"); In re Underwood, 2004 Bankr. LEXIS 1461 (Bankr. E.D. Wash. Apr. 9, 2004) ("HN33[] A classic maxim of contract construction dictates that [the] substance of the parties' transaction governs how their relationship is defined rather than the label or form used"); In re Associated Bicycle Serv., 128 B.R. 436, 458 (Bankr. N.D. Ind. 1990) ("The substance of the agreement, rather than its form, is the material issue").

Plaintiffs' mechanical position focusing on the "first port of destination" fares even [144] worse, not just because it aims to import a string of largely irrelevant considerations of contract law into the predominantly policy-driven FTAIA regime, but because adoption of Plaintiffs' simplistic model would automatically transform any foreign seller into a United States importer if the sellers' goods reach the United States without a detour; that would be so regardless of whether or not the seller even cared about where the buyer of the seller's goods would take them. Since, as Judge Hand aptly noted, the idea that Congress meant to mechanically "punish all whom [United States] courts can catch" is incompatible with both the spirit of American antitrust law and constitutional mandate, Alcoa, 148 F.2d at 443-44, Plaintiffs' "first destination port" model would result in an impermissible overreaching and undue "exportation of American law."

Consequently, the Court rejects both sides' invitations to adopt a perfunctory rule and turns to the Court of Appeals' observation that importation is, effectively, a process of "bringing" goods into the United States from abroad. See Turicentro, 303 F.3d at 302. A dictionary meaning of the verb "bring" is to "cause to come along with one toward [145] [a certain] place" or "to cause to move in a special way." <<http://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/BRING>>. While, indeed, this definition is moderately precise at best, it establishes the presence of at least one indelible attribute, i.e., the harbinger's act of pioneering a certain cause, which -- upon a chain of later developments -- eventually results in physical transition of the seller's goods to the buyer's country. Translated in terms of international trade, such attribute necessarily begs the question "was it mainly the seller who engaged his/her agents and/or independently contracted third parties in order to physically tender the seller's goods for sale on the buyer's soil, or was it mainly the buyer who engaged the seller and/or independent third parties in order to have the seller's goods materialize on the soil of the buyer's country?" Accord U.S. v. Berkos, 543 F.3d 392, 396-97 (7th Cir. 2008) ("HN34[] We assume that the legislative purpose [of the statute] is expressed by the ordinary meaning of the words used"). Such question seems to be warranted since it: (a) corresponds to the FTAIA's general objective of limiting the extraterritorial reach of American antitrust law [146] while preserving protections for American consumers; and (b) does not render any portion of the statute "redundant or meaningless." See id. In light of the foregoing, it appears that the term "importer" employed in the introductory language of the FTAIA would be best read [*373] as referring to the "main force" behind the physical movement of goods to the United States; such inquiry is, by definition, unamenable to any hard-and-fast rule and must be resolved on a case-by-case basis. [54] HN35[] The only aspect appearing certain is that a plaintiff (who is asserting that a purely

[54] The Court recognizes that such "main force" inquiry is, perhaps, just as open to an academic debate as the "who brings the goods into the United States?" question in Turicentro. However, it appears rather certain that such entity as a freight forwarder, that is, a retained shipper, would not qualify as the "main force" behind the transaction, even though the freight forwarder is actually charged with an obligation to physically "bring" the goods into the United States. Similarly, since no meeting of minds can be reached and, hence, no sale of goods can take place, unless the seller is interested in selling and the buyer is interested in buying, the fact that the seller is seeking to increase his/her export quotas or is engaged in generic advertisement of his/her goods, or that the intermediary is advertising his/her services, or that the buyer is making generic inquiries with sellers or intermediaries, cannot be reflective of their responsibility for [148] "bringing" the goods into the United States for the purposes of a particular transaction. In contrast, if an intermediary buys a certain batch of the seller's goods because the intermediary has an actual or potential United States purchaser, or if the seller retains an intermediary to bring the goods into the United States and hold them for sale to the seller's potential buyers, or if the buyer approaches an intermediary with a request to obtain a specified amount of certain goods within a certain period of time and at the price the maximum of which is set within a certain foreign seller is, effectively, not a "real" exporter but a de facto importer "bringing" the goods into the United States within the meaning of the introductory clause of the FTAIA) has to show that the seller's activities were "direct" in a degree higher that required under 15 U.S.C. § 6a(1)(A), with regard to exporters: the "directness" under the introductory clause should yield such substantial contacts between the seller and the United States that it establishes a nexus roughly corresponding, in its magnitude, to the nexus needed to show the "directness" sufficient to remove the FSIA-based presumptive immunity under the [147] "commercial activity" exception set forth in 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(2): a conclusion otherwise would invite the danger of putting form over substance. [55] Accord infra, [*374] section "The FSIA Appears Relevant to Some Defendants" of this Opinion.

d. Sales to an "American" Intermediary or End-Consumer

With this conclusion in mind, the Court now turns to Plaintiffs' alternative position inviting the Court to qualify Defendants as importers of magnesite-based products to the United States because Defendants sold their goods to, inter alia: (a) intermediaries alleging that they were planning an immediate resale in the United States; or/and (b) alleged "American" end-consumers. See Opp. at 14-15 and ("Defendant . . . conspired . . . with other Defendants and co-conspirators that sold magnesite directly to customers located in the United States for delivery in the United States"; "[p]ublicly available import records confirm that . . . Defendants and their co-conspirators sold . . . directly to customers in the United States for delivery in the United States"; "[Defendants] were the 'exporters' of record for at least 67 direct sales of magnesite to U.S. companies delivered to ports in the United States"; [Defendants] sold magnesite directly to end-users located in the United States, including LWB Refractories in York, Pennsylvania"); [151] see also Opp. at 15 and Am. Compl. P11 (asserting that Plaintiffs acquired the legal rights of Possehl, and that "Possehl [sold] the magnesite to others, including the end-user[s in the United States]"). [56]

The Court rejects Plaintiffs' argument that the seller's "importer" status may be deduced from the alleged "nationality" or reselling intentions of the buyer that purchases the seller's goods. First, the practical implications of such deducement would invite a wholly anomalous scenario where the seller might be able to ensure against legal liability in the United States only if the seller, in each and every transaction: (a) first conducts a full-fledge due [152] diligence investigation of the purchaser's actual "nationality" or actual reselling intentions; and (b) then delegates a "agent" to follow each particular shipment to ensure that the buyer, in fact, consumes the goods in the United States or actually resells the goods to an American end-user instead of "unduly" diverting the goods to another country, either prior to or after clearance at the United States customs. [57] Consequently, the Court declines bracket, then such actions might be indicative of being the "main force" behind the particular sale of goods. And, since these types of actions are likely to require the "main force" entity to comply with United States customs clearance procedures (or to retain a freight forwarder or customs agent to perform such clearance) and to post a bond to cover customs duties or to deposit estimated customs duties upon filing the entry summary, the entity performing such clearance and liable for import duties within the meaning of United States customs law is likely to be the "importer" for the purposes of the particular transactions [149] in goods if these transactions are examined with an eye on the FTAIA jurisdictional bar. See <<http:// www.customs.gov/linkhandler/cgov/newsroom/publications/trade/iius.ctt/iius.pdf>> at 11 (defining the features of "importer of record"); <<http://www.census.gov/foreign-trade/ regulations/ftsrletters/ftsr174.html>> (same); see also 19 U.S.C. § 1484 (same) and 19 U.S.C. § 1641 (providing relevant clarifications as to customs brokers).

[55] Analogously, HN36[] the "directness" of the seller's contacts with the United States required under the introductory clause of the FTAIA should roughly correspond, in the magnitude of the nexus it produces between the seller and the United States, to the cumulative nexus produced by the "direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable" elements of § 6a(1)(A): then, the defendant (whom, as here, the plaintiff seeks to re-qualify from an exporter into a de facto importer) would be subject to the jurisdiction of United States courts regardless of the plaintiff's or defendant's exercises in semantics, i.e., the mere terms "exporter" and "importer" (being products more of the discipline of economics than of law which tends to operate in such basic terms as "seller" [150] and "buyer") would not invite a risk of inconsistent legal results as to the very same set of facts.

[56] Possehl appears to be either an Aktiengesellschaft, or KGaA, or GmbH (i.e., a typical business entity chartered under the German law), see supra note 49 of this Opinion; Possehl seems to have no articles of incorporation registered in one of the United States' states and no such features as an American nerve-center or main production facility (which might give rise to "local" corporate situs under state law). Therefore, the Court is not entirely clear as to the logic of Plaintiffs' reference to Possehl as an "American" importer.

to adopt this wholly anomalous position differentiating between sales to American and non-American end-consumers and intermediaries catering to American and non-American end-users, or between direct and indirect shipments from the country of export [*375] to the United States: the issue whether the seller is an "importer" can neither legally nor logically depend on those acts or intentions of the buyer which the seller cannot control or verify. [58]

3. Plaintiffs' Factual Proof as to Defendants' Importer Status

In addition to suggesting the above-discussed two models re-characterizing exporters as importers, Plaintiffs also support their claim that Defendants were importers through three means: (a) Plaintiffs' own exhibits; (b) certain Defendants' exhibits; and (c) Plaintiffs' assertions that Defendants' statements are self-contradicting. The Court addresses each category in turn.

a. Plaintiffs' Own Exhibits

Plaintiffs' own exhibits are attached to the declaration of Robert A. [155] Magnanini, Esq. (submitted jointly with Plaintiffs' Opposition); out of the thirty-four such exhibits, Exhibits Five to Nine (docketed as Docket Entries Nos. 105-7 to 105-11) appear relevant to the issue of Defendants' status as importers of goods to the United States. Each of these Exhibits, in turn, contains numerous print-outs of public records of sales of magnesium oxide; each record has the following information:

(i) a line naming the "manifest commodity" as "dead burned magnesite" and stating the applicable tariff code;

(ii) a line naming the "exporter"; such entry is followed by one of the names of Defendants, with some Defendants being named on numerous occasions, others being named only a few times, and yet others not being named at all;

(iii) a line naming the "importer," e.g., Possehl (some of these entries are followed by the importer's address, while others are not);

(iv) a triplet of lines reading "port," "origination" and "destination," with each "origination" entry being followed by the name of some port, usually Chinese (e.g., Bayuquan or Derien (former Dalian), or Hsinkang, etc., or simply by the word "China"), and each "destination" entry being followed by the name of [156] some United States port or an approximated area in the United States (e.g., Gramercy, Takoma, New Orleans or just "S[outhern] Louisiana");

[57] The Court fails to fancy what such "agent" is to do in the event the alleged American intermediary or alleged American end-user attempts to "divert" the goods to a non-United States market. Moreover, the economic implications of a ruling tying the seller's importer status to the buyer's contractually [153] irrelevant promise would invite a self-imposed quasi-embargo (preventing import to the United States), since foreign sellers, worried about liability in the United States, might start selling their goods only to those intermediaries or end-consumers that promise to ship/consume the goods only to non-United States ports, which means that American buyers or a second tier of intermediaries would have then to re-import the goods into the United States, raising the cost of these goods for the purposes of United States domestic trade by dual broker's commissions and additional freight.

[58] To illustrate, it would be anomalous to declare a French vineyard or Spanish tannery "importers" of goods to the United States simply because American tourists keep purchasing wine and hides while visiting the vineyard and tannery and bringing these goods to the United States, where they consume the wine and use the hides to decorate their living rooms. Moreover, a position somewhat similar to that suggested by Plaintiffs was rejected in Dee-K Enters., 299 F.3d 281. Dee-K Enters. involved a price-fixing action by two American companies against Southeast Asian producers. See id. at 283. On appeal, plaintiffs: [154] (a) challenged the district court's adherence to the Hartford Fire standard asserting that Hartford Fire applied only to cases involving "wholly foreign" commerce; and (b) maintained that the sale of price-fixed goods by foreign sellers to an American buyer must be deemed as involving, by definition, United States commerce. The Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit characterized plaintiffs' latter argument as "perilously close to clear conflict with Hartford Fire," id. at 291, and pointed out that such "single-factor test" proposed by plaintiffs would open United States courts to a flood of claims involving "a great variety of foreign conduct." Id. at 292.

(v) a line indicating "unit of measure"; such entry is followed by a specific figure and a phrase "big bags" or the word "bulk";

(vi) a line indicating the "weight" of shipment, typically in thousands of pounds;

(vii) a line stating the "ship[ment]-date," these dates are all post-1999;

[*376] (viii) a line indicating the language, presumably of the print-out, reading "English"; and

(ix) a line stating the "load[ing]-date," usually sometime in 2004 and 2008; it, presumably, reflects the date of Plaintiffs' research of the database and downloading of the results. See Docket Entries Nos. 105-7 to 105-11.

Organized by: (a) alphabetized names of the entities designated as "importers"; (b) the number of such print-out records per each "importer"; and (c) the number of the particular Plaintiffs' Exhibit where copies of such print-outs can be found, these Docket Entries Nos. 105-7 to 105-11 could be reduced to the table ("Importers Table"):

Short [157] of identifying the "importer," none of these print-outs sheds any light on the nature of the underlying transaction. However, even a cursory examination of the Importers Table unambiguously establishes that none of the importers named in the print-outs is a Defendant in this action. [59] In other words, Plaintiffs' own Exhibits tend to establish that Defendants were not importers of goods in the United States; rather, various intermediaries and end-consumers, including Resco itself, were the actual importers of the goods. If this conclusion is true, then the FTAIA would necessarily apply to Plaintiffs' claims, and the Court would necessarily lack subject matter jurisdiction over this action and would be constrained to dismiss it.

[59] The sole suspect print-out appears to be the one where the "importer" is identified as "Order of Shipper," since the Court is left to wonder about the form of notice to -- and the identity of -- the consignee (and the consignee's relation to the shipper, who is likely to be the exporter retaining the consignee as its United States sales agent for the purposes of that particular transaction). See Docket Entry No. 105-8, at 2. However, the nature of the transaction [158] reflected by this print-out appears questionably relevant to the case at bar, since: (a) the "port [of] origination" designated in that particular print-out is "PT ALFRED," that is, a seemingly non-Chinese port having code number "14069," compare Docket Entry No. 105-11, at 54 (suggesting that the codes for all Chinese ports falls within 57000's); see also Docket Entries Nos. 105-7 to 105-11 (identifying all Chinese ports under 57000's numbers); and (b) the only "port Alfred" the Court is aware of is in South Africa rather than in China. See <<http://www.portalfred.co.za>>.

b. Discrepancies in Defendants' Statements

As noted supra, Plaintiffs also seek to establish Defendants' importer status by pointing out that statements made by Defendants are incoherent. Although the incoherence of Defendants' statements, even [*377] if shown, does not assist Plaintiffs (since the burden to establish jurisdiction in this matter is on Plaintiffs, and Defendants have no obligation to disprove a negative), the Court finds a brief discussion of Plaintiffs' points warranted. Specifically:

(i) Plaintiffs point to one of Defendants' previously submitted declarations (which asserted that this Defendant "d[id] not [159] export magnesite from China and d[id] not import magnesite into the United States [but, rather] delivered [it] to the customer, whether a broker . . . or an end[-]user, at some location in China [and was] unaware of the ultimate location where the magnesite may be delivered or used," Opp. at 15 (quoting Docket Entries Nos. 98-16 and 98-17), and argue that this statement contradicts one of Defendants' previously submitted exhibits (attached to Plaintiffs' Opposition as Exhibits 3 and 10) which shows Defendants' awareness of the destination of their goods; Plaintiffs, somehow, deduce from this alleged inconsistency that Defendants must have been "importers" of goods to the United States. See id. at 15-16. [60] Plaintiffs' make an identical deducement from the inconsistency between: (i) Defendants' previously submitted declarations asserting that Defendants "s[old] magnesite to brokers . . . , which then s[old] the magnesite to others, including the end-user"; and (ii) one of the print-outs reflected in the Importers Table which designated LWB Refractories, i.e., an end-user rather than an intermediary, as "importer." See id. at 16. Finally, pointing out the inconsistency between: (i) Defendants' [160] previously submitted declarations asserting that Defendants "d[id] not export magnesite from China"; and (ii) bids for export quotas and award of export quotas to Defendants, Plaintiffs, again, somehow deduce that Defendants must have been importers of goods to the United States; and

(ii) Plaintiffs also point out that the Sinosteel Defendants are listed as exporters in 67 print-outs reflected in the Importers Table, see Opp. at 16, and that the Sinosteel Defendants' affiants averred that, as a result of their employ, they obtained personal knowledge of Chinese exportation practices. See id. at 16-17. Reading, once again, these statements and facts against Defendants' previously submitted declarations asserting that they "d[id] not export magnesite from China," Plaintiffs similarly translate such incoherence into the fact that Defendants must have been importers of goods to the United States. See id.

The Court disagrees. While the choice of words in Defendants' declarations may be ambiguous, this language does not state anything but Defendants' pure exporter status. [61]

c. Defendants' Exhibits

Finally, the Court turns to Defendants' exhibits (rather than declarations) re-submitted by Plaintiffs' in support of Plaintiffs' [*378] position that Defendants were importers of goods to the United States. See Docket Entry No. 105-5, at 7-8 ("Contract/Exhibit 3"); and Docket Entry No. 105-6, at 6-7 ("Contract/Exhibit 4").

[60] Plaintiffs' Exhibit 3 does not support Plaintiffs' point; rather, it shows a transaction by the Defendant that does not assert importation. Plaintiffs' Exhibit 10 contains a blank boilerplate contract shedding no light on this matter, plus one contract between one of the Sinosteel Defendants [161] and Possehl. See Docket Entry No. 105-12, at 10-11. That contract suggests that Possehl was likely the importer of goods (since Possehl purchased the goods in Dalian, China, and insured the goods, and arranged for their transportation to New Orleans).

[61] The "incongruent" language -- upon which Plaintiffs try to capitalize -- is a product of the Sinosteel Defendants' affiants, both of whom are Chinese nationals; the overall content of their declaration suggest limited fluency in English. See Docket Entries Nos. 98-16 and 98-17.

Unlike Plaintiffs' print-outs reflected in the Importers Table, both the Contract/Exhibit 3 and the Contract/Exhibit 4 are actual agreements for sale of goods [162] shedding some light on the nature of particular transactions. The Contract/Exhibit 4 was executed between one of the Minmetals Defendants and an entity named "American Minerals, Inc.," which advertises itself as an intermediary facilitating sales and purchases world-wide. See <<http://www.infomine.com/ index/suppliers/American_Minerals,_Inc.html>> (stating on its homepage that it is "Connecting Mining Suppliers & Buyers Worldwide"). The sale in this Contract/Exhibit 4 was executed F.O.B., see Docket Entry No. 105-6, at 6, with a clarification that the goods would be leaving Chinese port Bayuquan en route to New Orleans, that "the carrying vessel [would] be provided by the Buyer[, and] partial shipments and transshipments [would] not [be] allowed," i.e., that the Buyer was interested in delivering the entire purchase to the United States in one "chunk" and in one "shot," that is without breaking bulk and without switching from one mode of transportation to another. Id. at 6-7. The combination of these statements strongly suggests that American Minerals, Inc., the buyer, was the actual importer in that transaction, and the Minmetals Defendant was acting solely as an exporter seller. [163] In other words, the content of the Contract/Exhibit 4 gives the Court no reason to presume that the FTAIA jurisdictional bar might be inapplicable to Plaintiffs' claim.

However, the same cannot be said about the Contract/Exhibit 3, which suggests the opposite. See Docket Entry no. 105-5, at 7-8. That contract was executed between a seller named "China Metallurgical Import & Export Corporation" (which, according to the Amended Complaint, is a former name of one of the Sinosteel Defendants) and a buyer named "Allied Mineral Products, Inc.," resident in Columbus, Ohio. See id. at 7. The contract arranged for sale of magnesium oxide and for delivery of the goods from Xingang, China, to Columbus. See id. at 7. Moreover, the contract specified that: (a) the sale would be C.I.F., that is, with freight and insurance arranged by the seller; and (b) "the carrying vessel [would also] be provided by the Seller[, plus] partial adjustments, transshipment [(i.e., that change in the means of transportation)] and container transportation [would be] allowed," id. at 8, which is hardly surprising since Columbus (being situated on the Scioto River, which is too small for modern commercial shipping) is [164] the place where goods are delivered by air or motor transportation, rather than by ocean vessels. The combination of these statements allows for an inference that Sinosteel, the seller, was the actual importer in that transaction, since it seems that Sinosteel retained a chain of freight-forwarders to transfer the goods to the American soil, clear the goods through the United States Customs onto the American soil, pay the duties, reload the goods and bring them to Columbus. In other words, the Contract/Exhibit 3 strongly suggests the possibility that at least in this transaction one of Defendants might have been an actual importer of magnesium oxide to the United States.

VI. LEAVE TO AMEND

HN37[] Ordinarily, the plaintiff may be granted "leave [to amend,] . . . when justice so requires." See Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 182, 83 S. Ct. 227, 9 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1962); Lorenz v. CSX Corp., 1 F.3d 1406, 1414 (3d Cir. 1993). Indeed, "[t]he Federal Rules reject the approach that pleading is [*379] a game of skill in which one misstep by counsel may be decisive to the outcome and accept the principle that the purpose of pleading is to facilitate a proper decision on the merits." Foman, 371 U.S. at 182-83. However, "[a]llowing leave to amend [165] where 'there is a stark absence of any suggestion by the plaintiffs that they have developed any facts since the action was commenced, which would, if true, cure the defects in the pleadings . . . , would frustrate Congress's objective in enacting this statute of 'provid[ing] a filter at the earliest stage (the pleading stage) to screen out lawsuits that have no factual basis.'" Chubb, 394 F.3d at 164 (quoting GSC, 368 F.3d at 246). For instance, where the plaintiff had already amended plaintiffs complaint and yet failed to allege sufficient facts, the courts may find that "[the previous number of] bites at the apple is enough," and conclude that it is proper to deny leave to replead. Salinger v. Projectavision. Inc., 972 F. Supp. 222,236 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (citing Olkey v. Hyperion 1999 Term Trust, Inc., 98 F.3d 2 (2d Cir. 1996); *Career Educ. II, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23635, at 36 (where "plaintiffs have had ample opportunities to research and plead their claims," but failed to compose a sufficient pleading, the complaint is dismissed with prejudice).

The foregoing, however, shall be read in light of theHN38[] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a), which provides that, where "a party may amend [166] [its] pleading only by leave of court[, such] leave shall be freely given when justice so requires." Correspondingly, the Supreme Court has identified several factors to be considered when applying Rule 15(a):

> If the underlying facts or circumstances relied upon by a plaintiff may be a proper subject of relief, he ought to be afforded an opportunity to test his claim on the merits. In the absence of any apparent or declared reason -- such as undue delay, bad faith or dilatory motive on the part of the movant, repeated failure to cure deficiencies by amendments previously allowed, undue prejudice to the opposing party by virtue of allowance of the amendment, futility of amendment, etc. -- the leave sought should, as the rules require, be "freely given."

Foman, 371 U.S. at 182; see also Heyl & Patterson Int'l, Inc. v. F.D. Rich Housing of the Virgin Islands, Inc., 663 F.2d 419, 425 (3d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 455 U.S. 1018, 102 S. Ct. 1714, 72 L. Ed. 2d 136 (1982).

Thus, HN39[] while "Rule 15(a) gives the court extensive discretion to decide whether to grant leave to amend after the time for amendment as of [right] has passed," Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure: Civil 2d § 1486 (2d ed. 1990), the Rule 15(a) [167] "generous standard is tempered by the necessary power of a district court to manage a case" in light of the factors listed in Foman. See Shivangi v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 825 F.2d 885, 891 (5th Cir. 1987). The Foman list of factors, however, appears to be non-exhaustive, i.e., leaving it for the district court to consider, on a case-by-case basis, whether consideration of additional factors would be appropriate in order to assure that plaintiff is granted leave "when justice so requires." Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a).

Here, two groups of considerations drive the Court's analysis. The first one consists of the Court's realization that: (a) since Plaintiffs' filing of the Original Complaint, the Supreme Court provided guidance in Twombly and Iqbal as to the construction of Rule 8, archiving the Conley v. Gibson standard operable during filing of [*380] the Original Complaint; and (b) the Court's order accompanying its December Opinion directed Plaintiffs to submit proof for the purposes of factual review, as defined in Turicentro, rather than facial review under Iqbal and Twombly.

A. Implications of Twombly, Iqbal and Factual Review Under Turicentro

Since, as noted supra, the Supreme Court issued [168] its Iqbal and Twombly decisions after the filing of the Original Complaint and the Court's December Opinion and accompanying order, the Court finds it proper to examine the issue of whether leave to amend should be granted on the grounds of these factors (rather than those expressly listed in Foman). The Court believes that the gist of such inquiry is sufficiently analogous to that conducted pursuant to Rule 59(e) and, hence, allows a parallel test.

HN40[] "Rule 59(e) permits motions to amend or alter a judgment and may be granted to submit new, previously undiscovered evidence or to correct a clear error of law or prevent manifest injustice." Gutierrez v. Gonzales, 125 Fed. App'x 406, 416 (3d Cir. 2005) (citing North River, 52 F.3d at 1218, and Harsco Corp. v. Zlotnicki, 779 F.2d 906, 909 (3d Cir. 1985)). Relief under Rule 59(e) is also appropriate when there has been an intervening change in the controlling law. See Buffa v. N.J. State Dep't of Judiciary, 56 Fed. App'x 571, 574 (3d Cir. 2003) (citing Rule 59(e) and New Jersey Local Rule of Civil Procedure 7.1(i)). This Court turns for guidance to a decision the Court finds most pertinent to the circumstances at hand, Schiller v. Physicians Res. Group, Inc. ("Schiller-Appellate"), 342 F.3d 563 (5th Cir. 2003) [169] .

The opinion of the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Schiller-Appellate was entered in response to an appeal taken by plaintiffs from the decision entered by the District Court for the Northern District of Texas in Schiller v. Physicians Res. Group, Inc. ("Schiller-District"), 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3240 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 26, 2002). In Schiller-District, the plaintiffs claimed that the defendants made false and misleading statements to investors concerning the issuer's integration of practices that it had acquired across the nation and other issuer's business operations in order to inflate stock prices. See Schiller-Appellate, 342 F.3d at 565. The Schiller plaintiffs filed their complaint in December 1997 and amended their complaint numerous times from July 1998 to December 2000. See id. On February 5, 2001, the defendants moved to dismiss the then-pending third amended complaint under Rule 12(b)(6). See id. In response -- and instead of requesting to amend their then-pending third amended complaint for the fourth time in order to correct the deficiencies -- the plaintiffs stood by their third amended complaint [170] and requested the court to grant a further amendment only if the third amended complaint failed to state a claim. See id.

The district court, in response, found that the plaintiffs' pleadings failed to state a claim and granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, but refused to give the plaintiffs "four bites at the apple." See id. at 565-66.

On appeal, the plaintiffs > argue[d] that leave to amend [was] warranted because [the] decision [issued by the Fifth Circuit, that is, the court whose decisions are binding upon the District Court] in Nathenson, 267 F.3d 400, represents an intervening change in the law. [The Fifth Circuit] reject[ed the plaintiffs'] argument for two reasons. First, Nathenson was decided on September 25, 2001, approximately five [*381] months before the district court granted the motions to dismiss, and thus cannot constitute an intervening change in the law. Second, [the Fifth Circuit] conclude[d] that Nathenson did not change the law with respect to the pleading requirements . . . . The Court in Nathenson merely confirmed that [a certain element] remained a valid basis for liability under [the applicable law]. [The Fifth Circuit] likewise reject[ed the plaintiffs'] argument [171] that [other binding decision entered in conjunction with Nathenson and reflecting on the pleading requirements], represent[ed] an intervening change in the law. [The plaintiffs were] well aware of the pleading standards, but simply failed to meet them.

Schiller-Appellate, 342 F.3d at 568, n. 3; see also Capstead Mortg. Corp. Secs. Litig., 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16525 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 19, 2003) (conducting the same inquiry).

Therefore, under Schiller-Appellate,HN41[] an entry of a binding precedent, which: (a) is issued while the matter is still pending, and (b) clarifies -- rather than alters the existing legal regime -- cannot qualify as an intervening change in the law. If so, the Supreme Court's decisions in Twombly and Iqbal do not provide this Court with grounds to grant Plaintiffs yet another leave to amend, since both Supreme Court's decisions clarified -- rather than altered -- Rule 8 pleading standard, which existed at the time of Plaintiffs' filing of both the Original and Amended Complaints. In other words, the fact that Plaintiffs -- at the time of drafting the Original Complaint -- were unaware of the yet-to-come Supreme Court clarifications in Twombly, and -- at the time of their [172] drafting of the Amended Complaint -- were not aware of the yet-to-come Supreme Court's clarifications in Iqbal, is of no import, since Plaintiffs were obligated to inventory the facts underlying their pleadings under the Conley v. Gibson regime, where they could just plead these facts with lesser specificity. And, if Plaintiffs had duly developed their facts, they should have had little trouble stating them with precision. Accord Dura Pharms., Inc. v. Broudo, 544 U.S. 336, 161 L. Ed. 2d at 588-89 (2005) ("[The Court recognizes] that ordinary pleading rules are not meant to impose a great burden upon a plaintiff. But it should not prove burdensome for a plaintiff . . . to provide a defendant with some indication of the [facts] that the plaintiff has in mind. . . . [A]llowing a plaintiff to forego giving any indication of the [facts] that the plaintiff has in mind would . . . permit a plaintiff with a largely groundless claim to simply take up the time of a number of other people, with the right to do so representing an in terrorem increment of the settlement value, rather than a reasonably founded hope that the [discovery] process will reveal relevant evidence") (citations omitted). [173] In sum, the pleading requirements of Rule 8, as articulated in Twombly and Iqbal, should not have caught Plaintiffs by surprise.

The same, however, cannot be said about this Court's decision to subject Plaintiffs' subject matter jurisdictional position to factual review under Turicentro: it can reasonably be assumed that Plaintiffs did not know about this development until the Clerk's entry of the December Opinion and accompanying order three months prior to Plaintiffs' filing of the Amended Complaint. Therefore, it is not unfathomable that the requirement to produce actual proof of their position - rather than to merely state their facts -- caught Plaintiffs by surprise and found them unprepared and unable to rally their evidence within three months. With that in mind, the Court assesses Plaintiffs' ability to cure the deficiencies of their factual [*382] proof in the event another leave to amend is granted.

B. Limited Leave to Amend Is in the Interests of Justice

The factual proof submitted by Plaintiffs with regard to the position that Defendants are exporters falling within the reach of the Sherman Act under subsection (1)(A) (requiring that the defendants' conduct had a direct, substantial, [174] and reasonably foreseeable effect on United States domestic trade) could be tallied up as follows: (a) six paragraphs in the Amended Complaint reiterated in the Opposition and making entirely factless assertions and inviting the Court to construe Plaintiffs' conclusory self-serving statements as "factual proof"; and (b) six paragraphs in the Amended Complaint, reiterated or paraphrased in the Opposition, which refer to irrelevant or unverifiable documents, the content of which -- even if deemed true -- fails to provide any relevant factual proof establishing (or even strongly suggesting) that Defendants' alleged collusive activities resulted in export that caused direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable effect on United States domestic commerce within the meaning of clarifications provided in Alcoa/Hartford Fire. [62] Thus, the statements made and documents submitted by Plaintiffs indicate that the jurisdictional requirement of subsection (1)(A) is neither met nor likely to be met, since Plaintiffs -- even if granted leave to [*383] amend -- are unlikely to improve on their already-almost-five-year-long efforts and, hence, would produce just another mix of self-serving conclusions, irrelevant [175] tables and exponential layers of heavily technical language disguising the stark absence of facts and factual proof.

Hence, leave allowing Plaintiffs to amend their claims based on subsection (1)(A) appears futile. See *Career Educ. II, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23635, at 36 (HN42[] leave to amend is not warranted where "plaintiffs have had ample opportunities to research and plead their claims," but failed to produce sufficient pleadings). This conclusion seems to be particularly warranted in light of Plaintiffs' statements that: (a) "[t]his action seeks no damages or relief with respect to non-import foreign commerce," Am. Compl. P 1; and (b) "[t]he Amended Complaint alleges [only] import commerce, [178] which [falls] outside the scope of the [FTAIA]" under the statute's introductory language. Opp. at 10-11. Since these statements -- regardless of Plaintiffs' occasional use of the "direct, substantial and reasonably foreseeable" language of subsection (1)(A) -- strongly indicate Plaintiffs' lack of interest in pursuing claims under this subsection, the combination of such lack of interest and lack of factual support after almost five years of litigation signifies to this Court that another leave to amend would not be in the interests of justice. Therefore, Plaintiffs' claims based on subsection (1)(A), that is, if such claims were actually intended to be raised, will be dismissed with prejudice.

However, the opposite conclusion appears warranted with regard to Plaintiffs' claims based on the assertion that the FTAIA is wholly inapplicable to this matter because Defendants were importers that actually brought their price-fixed magnesium oxide into the United States. [63] True, virtually all documents and statements provided by Plaintiffs [62] A policy point made by Plaintiffs warrants a comment. See Opp. at 11 (asserting that the Court's focus on the Alcoa/Hartford Fire requirement to show that Defendants meant to increase prices in the United States,"prevents U.S. courts from adjudicating claims [based on any defendant's] global price-fixing [affecting exportation] without regard to the harm caused to U.S. consumers. This is plainly contrary to the language and intent of the FTAIA and controlling precedent. To dismiss this case on subject matter jurisdiction grounds would jeopardize numerous ongoing prosecutions and investigations of the Department of Justice, as well as private damages actions, against [foreign] cartels exporting products [that enter] into U.S. commerce"). The Court disagrees. Historically, federal courts and Congress have been careful in crafting their language, cautious to not unduly superimpose United States law outside United States borders. This was the reason for the Alcoa court's creation of the "intended" effect test, see 148 F.2d at 444, for Judge Hand's rejection of the idea [176] that Congress meant "to punish all whom [United States] courts can catch," id. at 443, and for the Supreme Court's adoption of the same in Hartford Fire. Moreover, a similar concern prompted Congress to limit Section (1)(A) exception to the export conduct that causes "direct" and "substantial" and "foreseeable" effect in the United States, see LSL Biotechnologies, 379 F.3d at 679, rather than to expand Section (1)(A) to all export conduct that "harms" United States consumers: had Congress wished to so state, it would have done so. Upon analyzing "the language and intent of the FTAIA and controlling precedent," this Court concludes that foreign exporters' global price-fixing is wholly indifferent to whether their goods might be imported into any particular state, the United States included, falls within the FTAIA jurisdictional bar, accord supra note 19 (discussing the anomaly of punishing indiscriminating exporters on the grounds of the choices made by United States importers); any conclusion otherwise is likely to yield an overreaching mandate directing "special competition" catering to American consumers with full ignorance of consumers in all other nations and even in the exporters' [177] own state. Accord S/Reply at 7 ("Congress specifically adopted the effects test in the FTAIA to balance the concern for over-extending the antitrust laws to foreign trade in precisely the sort of situation present here, H.R. Rep. 97-686, at 9 - 12, 97th Cong., (2nd Sess. 1982), reprinted in U.S.C.C.A.N. 2487, at 2492-97 (1982), a principle similarly recognized by the Department of Justice Antitrust Enforcement Guidelines for International Operations, § 3.121, Illus. C, Var.(1) at 13 [clarifying that] wholly foreign sales activities not subject to U.S. anti-trust laws absent express agreement directed to the U.S.").

after almost five years of litigation strongly suggest that Defendants were nothing but world-wide exporters of magnesium oxide wholly indifferent to [179] where their goods would be imported. However, the Court cannot ignore: (a) the potentially ambiguous print-out that refers to "Order of Shipper"; and, especially (b) the highly suspicious agreement replicated in Plaintiffs' Contract/Exhibit 3. In light of the content of the Contract/Exhibit 3, the Court finds that it would not be in the interests of justice to dismiss, with prejudice, Plaintiffs' claims based on the exclusionary language of the FTAIA introductory clause. Consequently, leave to amend will be granted with regard to these claims, and -- in recognition of the perhaps somewhat stricter standard Plaintiffs might have been facing since the issuance of the December Opinion informing them of the Court's intentions to conduct factual rather than facial review -- Plaintiffs will be allowed another ample opportunity to produce detailed and, hopefully, more abundant factual proof than the sole exhibit fortuitously provided to them by Defendants. [64]

[*384] C. Prudential Considerations

The Court's conclusion that limited leave to amend and a grant of ample time to Plaintiffs to comply with that leave are warranted invites considerations related to the speed of administering justice. Specifically, in light of: (a) the fact that Defendants challenge the Court's subject matter jurisdiction over this matter under the FSIA and, in addition, argue that a host of comity-sourced doctrines warrants abstention; and (b) the Court's recognition that postponement of its decision as to these arguments until after Plaintiffs' filing of their next amended complaint might result in undue waste of the parties' and the Court's time and resources since -- if the matter is dismissed on the grounds of the FSIA or a comity-sourced doctrine -- Plaintiffs' efforts associated with re-pleading, the parties' motion practice based on such re-pleading and the Court's resolution of the same, would be rendered wholly academic and, hence, wasteful for all practical purposes.

HN43[] The [182] Court, indeed, is mindful of the general rule that abstention factors should be deemed relevant only if the court determines that subject matter jurisdiction exists in the first place, see, Hartford Fire 509 U.S. at 797 n. 24 (citing Mannington Mills, Inc. v. Congoleum Corp., 595 F.2d 1287, 1298 (3d Cir. 1979)), and, thus, a decision as to abstention grounds prior to resolution of the subject matter jurisdiction issue might yield a wasteful, if not facially premature, ruling. However, here, an exception to the general rule appears warranted since Defendants' abstention grounds are closely intertwined with Defendants' subject matter jurisdiction challenges under the FSIA, which means that the Court's resolution of Defendants' FSIA challenges: (a) has to come first; and (b) is likely to dispose of at least a substantial number of aspects associated with Defendants' abstention grounds. Therefore, it appears prudentially unwise to address the FSIA challenges without addressing abstention. Rather, it appears in the interests of justice to not shelve either Defendants' FSIA-based and/or their abstention challenges until after a ruling is entered as to the applicability of the FTAIA's introductory [183] language to Plaintiffs' claims. Cf. Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Preate, 797 F. Supp. 436, 440 (W.D. Pa. 1992) (relying, inter alia, on Pennzoil Co. v. Texaco, Inc., 481 U.S. 1, 107 S. Ct. 1519, 95 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1987), in order to first conduct abstention analysis and then follow it with a determination as to the court's subject matter jurisdiction).

[63] While the Court notes its deep concern with what appears to be Plaintiffs' position that neither the specific composition of the alleged "cartel" nor the relation between such cartel and the collusive agreement or the collusive agreement [180] and the actual imports into the United States could matter for the purposes of stating a claim, see Opp. at 35 (seemingly so suggesting), these issues fall within the scope of the Sherman Act, rather than the FTAIA. The Court, therefore, need not reach these issues at the instant juncture.

[64] Plaintiffs maintain that they should not be "required to provide [any] sales agreements, purchase orders, shipping confirmations, . . . bills of lading" or other similar documentary proof verifying Defendants' activities as importers of goods into the United States because all "[t]hese documents are, of course, in Defendants' possession." Opp. at 30. Plaintiffs' assertion appears half-hearted at best, since any typical international sale of goods leaves voluminous paper trail in the hands of the seller, the buyer and all intermediaries, plus the United States Department of Customs. Therefore, the Court is not clear as to how there could be no documentary or, at the very least, detailed first-hand testimonial evidence if, as the Amended Complaint maintains, Defendants have been in fact bringing hundreds of thousands of tons of magnesium oxide into the United States, year after year, for almost a [181] decade. Cf. Paul Morelli Design, Inc. v. Tiffany & Co., 200 F. Supp. 2d 482, 488 (E.D. Pa. 2002) ("We do not leave our common sense at the courthouse door"). See also infra note 149 of this Opinion.

Consequently, the remainder of this Opinion will examine Defendants' abstention challenges, as well as those raised by Defendants under the FSIA with respect to the Court's subject matter jurisdiction.

VII. THE FSIA AND ABSTENTION ASPECTS

As noted supra, Defendants raise a cluster of affirmative defenses based on the FSIA [65] and interrelated abstention-causing [*385] tenets referred to by the courts as the "act of state doctrine," "international comity" and "government compulsion" (which is also known as "sovereign" or "foreign" compulsion). See S/Mot. at 45-54 (listing and discussing these tenets as related but nonetheless wholly independent defenses); S/Reply at 7, 18, 20, 24 (same); M/Mot. at 23-36 (same); M/Reply at 11-17 (same); accord Opp. at 34-65.

A. Standard of Review

It has been argued that, HN44[] for the purposes of the FSIA, the defendant has to establish a prima facie case of immunity, and only if the defendant succeeds at that, does the burden shift to the plaintiff to rebut the presumption. See Alberti v. Empresa Nicaraguense de La Carne, 705 F.2d 250, 256 (7th Cir. 1983) (relying on H.R. Rep. No. 1487, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. 17, reprinted in, U.S.C.C.A.N. 6604, 6616). Since the standard of review applied to the defendant's prima facie showing has been typically construed as imposing the burden of producing factual proof rather than merely making factual allegations, accord Matter of Sedco, Inc., 543 F. Supp. 561 (S.D. Tex. 1982); [185] De Sanchez v. Banco Central de Nicaragua, 515 F. Supp. 900 (E.D. La. 1981); Jet Line Services. Inc. v. M/V Marsa El Hariga, 462 F. Supp. 1165 (D. Md. 1978), the Court concludes that Defendants are obligated to make a showing under the standard comparable to the factual review process, as it was defined by the Third Circuit in Turicentro.

Moreover, a substantively identical standard of review appears to be applicable to Defendants' position advocating abstention, since HN45[] the prevalent practice of federal courts facing abstention issues has been to focus on the factual proof presented by the abstention-advocating litigant rather than on conclusions and assertions of the litigant unsupported by evidentiary proof. Accord Colorado River Water Conservation Dist. v. United States, 424 U.S. 800, 817, 96 S. Ct. 1236, 47 L. Ed. 2d 483 (1976) (addressing the concept of abstention in domestic setting and cautioning that federal courts should exercise abstention only in "exceptional" circumstances, as the litigant proves the reason to forego the "virtually unflagging obligation of the federal courts to exercise the jurisdiction given them"); Grammar, Inc. v. Custom Foam Sys., Ltd., 482 F. Supp. 2d 853, 855 (E.D. Mich. 2007) (applying [186] Colorado River to an international setting); cf. Turner Entertainment Co. v. Degeto Film GmbH, 25 F.3d 1512, 1518 (11th Cir. 1994) (noting two similar standards, one based on Colorado River and another based on Landis v. North American Co., 299 U.S. 248, 57 S. Ct. 163, 81 L. Ed. 153 (1936)); I. J. A., Inc. v. Marine Holdings, Ltd., 524 F. Supp. 197, 199 (E.D. Pa. 1981) (applying the standard analogous to Colorado River).

The Court, therefore, will examine Defendants' position with regard to the FSIA and their abstention-prompting grounds under the standard substantively identical to the Court's factual review applied to Plaintiffs' FTAIA-related contentions, i.e., the Court will "accord no presumption of truth" to Defendants' statements unless such statements are supported by evidential proof actually presented in this matter or amenable to judicial notice. Accord Turicentro, 303 F.3d at 299, n.4.

B. Applicable Legal Tests

[65] While, from the point of its legislative history, the FSIA is an affirmative defense, see H.R. Rep. No. 1487, 94th Cong., 2d Sess. at 17, [184] reprinted in, U.S.C.C.A.N. 6604, 6616 (1976), the Supreme Court noted that the congressional position to that effect was not entirely accurate since a district court lacks jurisdiction over a suit against a foreign state until it is determined that the defendant does not have immunity, which means that the absence of sovereign immunity must be determined regardless of whether it was raised by the defendant or even defendant's entry of appearance. See Verlinden B.V. v. Central Bank of Nigeria, 461 U.S. 480, 493 n.20, 103 S. Ct. 1962, 76 L. Ed. 2d 81 (1983).

1. The FSIA [66]

[*386] Nearly [187] two hundred years ago, in The Schooner Exchange v. M'Faddon, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the Supreme Court, held that the United States had impliedly waived jurisdiction over certain conduct of foreign sovereigns, see 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116, 145-147, 3 L. Ed. 287 (1812), hence creating what is known as "absolute immunity" for foreign sovereigns, see Verlinden, 461 U.S. at 486 (citing Berizzi Bros. Co. v. S. S. Pesaro, 271 U.S. 562, 46 S. Ct. 611, 70 L. Ed. 1088 (1928)), i.e., the policy is based on the principles that all sovereigns possess equal rights and equal independence under international law, and that a sovereign enters the territory of a friendly foreign nation confident that immunities conferred on it by reason of its sovereignty will be preserved. See Arango v. Guzman Travel Advisors, 761 F.2d 1527, 1534 (11th Cir. 1985). However, in 1952, the State Department abandoned the absolute immunity policy in favor of the "restrictive" foreign sovereign immunity, see Alfred Dunhill of London, Inc. v. Republic of Cuba, 425 U.S. 682, 711, 96 S. Ct. 1854, 48 L. Ed. 2d 301 (1976); letter from Jack B. Tate, Acting Legal Adviser, Dept. of State, to Acting Attorney General Philip B. Perlman, reprinted in, 26 Dept. of State Bull. 984-985 (1952), which confined [188] immunity to suits involving only the foreign sovereign's public acts. See Verlinden, 461 U.S. at 487 (1983). However, since application of this restrictive theory was inconsistent at best, see id., Congress effectively codified the restrictive theory in 1976, when it enacted the FSIA, which bestowed limited immunity upon so-called "foreign states." [67] See 28 U.S.C. § 1330.

HN46[] The statute defined the term "foreign state" broadly, including in the definition political subdivisions of a foreign state, as well as the state's "agencies and instrumentalities." [68] See 28 U.S.C. § 1603(a); Gates v. Victor Fine Foods, 54 F.3d 1457, 1460 (9th Cir. 1995). The latter means an entity that is a separate juridical person (corporate or otherwise) and, in addition, is an organ of a foreign state, or a majority of whose shares or other ownership [189] interest is owned by a foreign state or its political subdivision. [69] See, e.g. *Abrams v. [387] Societe Nationale des Chemins de Fer Francais, 332 F.3d 173, 178-180 (2d Cir. 2003) (French national railroad company is agency or instrumentality of foreign state because it is a separate legal entity wholly-owned by French government); EIE Guam Corp. v. Long Term Credit Bank of Japan, Ltd., 322 F.3d 635, 639-649 (9th Cir. 2003) (Japanese government funded corporation, expressly created by the government to perform exclusive task of [66] In light of the breadth and complexity of the FSIA, a multitude of aspects of the statute, its case law interpretations and its legislative history are omitted from this discussion --not for lack of significance but for having little relevance to the factual circumstances at hand.

[67] The primary purpose of the FSIA was to depoliticize sovereign immunity decisions by transferring them from the executive branch to the judiciary, hence assuring litigants that the decisions would be made on legal rather than political grounds. See Dames & Moore v. Regan, 453 U.S. 654, 685, 101 S. Ct. 2972, 69 L. Ed. 2d 918 (1981); Nat'l Airmotive Corp. v. Iran, 499 F. Supp. 401, 406 (D.D.C. 1980).

[68] HN47[] For the purposes of the FSIA, an "agency or instrumentality of a foreign state" is not the same legal entity as the foreign state itself. See TransAmerica Leasing. Inc. v. La Republica de Venezuela, 200 F.3d 843, 847-848, 339 U.S. App. D.C. 385 (D.C. Cir. 2000); Gates v. Victor Fine Foods, 54 F.3d 1457, 1462 (9th Cir. 1995).

[69] The statute's legislative history suggests that the term "agency or instrumentality" should be interpreted broadly, see EIE Guam, 322 F.3d at 639-649; cf. Refco. Inc. v. Galadari, 755 F. Supp. 79, 82 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) (statements of foreign officials to be accorded great weight in determining whether entity is foreign state within meaning of FSIA). An entity may qualify for immunity even if it has some autonomy and independence from its government, see Venus Lines, 210 F.3d at 1311-1313, and without regard to its line of business, e.g., trading, mining, shipping, banking, procurement, etc. See H.R. Rep. No. 1487, 94th Cong. 2d Sess., at 15-16, reprinted in, U.S.C.C.A.N. 6604, 6614 (1976). HN48[] The [191] Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit explained that the "agency or instrumentality" nature is determined under the seven-factor test: (1) the circumstances surrounding the entity's creation; (2) the purposes of the entity's activities; (3) the degree of supervision by the government; (4) the level of governmental financial support; (5) the entity's employment policies, particularly regarding whether the foreign state requires the hiring of public employees and pays their salaries; (6) the entity's obligations and privileges under the foreign state's laws; (7) the ownership structure of the entity. See USX Corp. v. Adriatic Ins. Co., 345 F.3d 190, 206-208 (3d Cir. 2003) (holding that an Irish insurer was an organ of the Irish government in light of Ireland's indirect ownership and control over the insurer's shares, and the government's decision-making role).

revitalizing financial system is a state organ); Venus Lines Agency v. CVG Industria Venezolana de Aluminio, 210 F.3d 1309, 1311-1313 (11th Cir. 2000) (defendant corporation is considered a foreign state because it is majority-owned by agency or instrumentality of Venezuelan government); Mangattu v. M/V IBN Hayyan, 35 F.3d 205, 207 (5th Cir. 1994) (entity 100% owned by several foreign states, created by agreement of all participating states, is a foreign state for the purposes of the FSIA). However, the Supreme Court held that a subsidiary of an "instrumentality" (or an entity otherwise owned by "instrumentality") is not itself an "instrumentality" for the purposes [190] of the FSIA, since the exponential-level connection between such subsidiary and the state renders the entity too removed to qualify. See Dole Food Co. v. Patrickson, 538 U.S. 468, 477-479, 123 S. Ct. 1655, 155 L. Ed. 2d 643 (2003).

HN49[] Once the defendant's status as a "foreign state" is established, the FSIA presumes the defendant's immunity to be the rule, not an exception, see Saudi Arabia v. Nelson, 507 U.S. 349, 355, 113 S. Ct. 1471, 123 L. Ed. 2d 47 (1993); Argentine Republic v. Amerada Hess Shipping Corp., 488 U.S. 428, 438, 109 S. Ct. 683, 102 L. Ed. 2d 818 (1989); Corzo v. Banco Central de Reserva del Peru, 243 F.3d 519, 522 (9th Cir. 2001); [192] Kelly v. Syria Shell Petroleum Dev't B.V., 213 F.3d 841, 847 (5th Cir. 2000); Export Group v. Reef Indus., Inc., 54 F.3d 1466, 1470 (9th Cir. 1995); General Elec. Capital Corp. v. Grossman, 991 F.2d 1376, 1380 (8th Cir. 1993), even though the FSIA includes a number of exceptions, one of which is based on the defendant's commercial activity carried on in the United States. See 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(2). For purposes of the exception, the commercial character of the activity is determined by examination of the nature of defendant's conduct rather than of its purpose, see 28 U.S.C. § 1603(d); Republic of Argentina v. Weltover, Inc., 504 U.S. 607, 615-616, 112 S. Ct. 2160, 119 L. Ed. 2d 394 (1992); Behring Int'l, Inc. v. Imperial Iranian Air Force, 475 F. Supp. 383, 390 (D.N.J. 1979), aff'd, 699 F.2d 657 (3d Cir. 1983) (en banc), with recognition that: (a) the term "commercial activity" was legislatively intended to include a broad spectrum of endeavors, such as extraction of minerals, commute of passengers, trade, etc.; and (b) if an activity is customarily carried on for profit, then its commercial nature can readily be assumed. [70] See H.R. Rep. No. 1487, 94th Cong., 2d Sess., at 16, reprinted in, U.S.C.C.A.N. 6604, 6614-6615 [193] (1976). In sum, the gist of the commercial exception inquiry is whether the particular actions, [*388] regardless of the motive behind them, were of the type in which a private party would engage for the purposes of commerce. See, e.g., Morel de Letelier v. Republic of Chile, 748 F.2d 790, 797 (2d Cir. 1984). For instance, the Supreme Court clarified that when a foreign government acts not as regulator of a market, but in the manner of a private player within it, the foreign sovereign's actions are "commercial" for the purposes of the FSIA. See Republic of Argentina v. Weltover, Inc., 504 U.S. 607, 614-615, 112 S. Ct. 2160, 119 L. Ed. 2d 394 (1992) (issuance of bonds by Argentina as part of currency stabilization plan was commercial activity because bonds were "in almost all respects garden-variety debt instruments").

2. Act of State Doctrine

HN51[] While the act of state doctrine, being judicially created, is more flexible than the FSIA --and, hence, [194] might perhaps warrant abstention even where the FSIA does not strip the court of jurisdiction over a certain case, see Republic of Austria v. Altmann, 541 U.S. at 700-701 (leaving this question open) -- the key features of the act of state doctrine and the FSIA are somewhat similar, since the doctrine prompts United States courts to refrain from judging the validity of a foreign state's governmental acts as to matters within that state's borders, see Banco Nacional de Cuba v. Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 84 S. Ct. 923, 11 L. Ed. 2d 804 (1964), building on the premise that the most fundamental aspect of foreign relations is the recognition of foreign governments. Cf. Corzo v. Banco Central de Reserva del Peru, 243 F.3d 519, 524 (9th Cir. 2001) (observing that the purpose of the FSIA is to promote harmonious international relations). However, while being more flexible than the statute, the doctrine has evolved from a generic expression of international law into an relatively narrow inquiry into "a consequence of domestic separation of powers." W.S. Kirkpatrick & Co. v. Environmental Tectonics Corp., Int'l, 493 U.S. 400, 404,

[70] HN50[] In enacting the commercial-activity exception, Congress sought to make it difficult for foreign defendants engaged in commercial activity to invoke sovereign immunity with regard to commercial wrongs. See Alberti v. Empresa Nicaraguense de La Carne, 705 F.2d 250, 256 (7th Cir. 1983).

110 S. Ct. 701, 107 L. Ed. 2d 816 (1990); Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 84 S. Ct. 923, 11 L. Ed. 2d 804. Thus, the doctrine could be summarized as a merely strong belief [195] of the judiciary that engaging in the task of passing on the validity of foreign acts of state could hinder rather than further the conduct of foreign relations. See Sabbatino, 376 U.S. at 421-423; accord Kirkpatrick, 493 U.S. at 409; see also Gross v. German Found. Indus. Initiative, 456 F.3d 363 (3d Cir. 2006) (the court must dismiss the suit if its resolution would require the court to declare invalid an official act of a foreign sovereign). Consequently, the doctrine knows numerous exceptions which include, inter alia, non-abstention in matters challenging: (a) the acts performed outside the sovereign territory of a foreign government, see Drexel Burnham Lambert v. Galadari, 777 F.2d 877, 881 (2d Cir. 1985) (the act of state doctrine does not apply to claims based on ownership of shares securing note of Dubai national because situs of debt was outside Dubai); Allied Bank Int'l v. Banco Credito Agricola de Cartago, 757 F.2d 516, 520-523 (2d Cir. 1985) (claims based on notes payable by Costa Rican banks fell outside the protection of the doctrine because situs of debt was outside Costa Rica); or (b) the acts qualified as "commercial activity." See Alfred Dunhill, 425 U.S. at 703-706 [196] (declining to extend act of state doctrine to acts committed by foreign sovereigns in course of purely commercial operations); Williams v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 694 F.2d 300, 302-305 and n. 2 (3d Cir. 1982); compare Callejo v. Bancomer, S.A., 764 F.2d 1101, 1114-1115 (5th Cir. 1985) (claim that Mexican bank breached contract by repayment of debt in devalued pesos did not qualify for commercial activity exception to act of [*389] state doctrine because promulgation of exchange control regulations was sovereign and not commercial in nature); Clayco Petroleum Corp. v. Occidental Petroleum Corp., 712 F.2d 404, 408 (9th Cir. 1983) (claim that bribe to obtain offshore oil concession violated antitrust laws did not qualify for commercial activity exception to act of state doctrine because granting of concessions involved exercise of powers peculiar to sovereigns). Therefore, the HN52[] defendant successfully establishes the act-of-state defense if the "commercial activity" exception does not remove the reasons for abstention. See id.

3. The Concept of Comity

The main point of the parties' confusion appears to relate to the concept of comity, that is, considering the multitude of tests offered in their briefs. [197] While the tests stated therein are all correct, theoretically, such theoretical correctness does not, in and by itself, render these tests applicable to the case at bar. The Court surmises that the parties' confusion as to the proper test might be rooted in the federal courts' frequent wholesale utilization of the phrase "doctrine of comity," even though such utilization blends the distinctions between various tests and corresponding circumstances.

> The use of the term "comity" to describe a theory for accommodating conflicting legal policies of territorial sovereigns was developed by scholars in 17th-century Holland to resolve conflicts between the laws of the various Dutch provinces. See Davies, The Influence of Huber's de Conflictu Legum on English Private International Law, 18 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 49, 52 (1937). The Dutch scholar, Ulrich Huber, set out to reconcile the fact and theory of national territorial authority with the needs of a developing international system in which persons and commerce moved across state lines. Huber summarized his analysis in three now well-known axioms: (1) the laws of every sovereign authority have force within the boundaries of its state, and bind [198] all subject to it, but not beyond; (2) those are held to be subject to a sovereign authority who are found within its boundaries, whether they be there permanently or temporarily; (3) those who exercise sovereign authority so act from comity, that the laws of every nation having been applied within its own boundaries should retain their effect everywhere so far as they do not prejudice the powers or rights of another state and another state's courts. See [id. at] 26 (1937).

Windt v. Qwest Communs. Int'l, Inc., 544 F. Supp. 2d 409, 434 n. 34 (D.N.J.), aff'd 529 F.3d 183 (3d Cir. 2008).

Huber's theory and his choice of word "comity" derived, in turn, from the principle of "comity of nations." See Morguard Investments, Ltd. v. De Savoye [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1077 (where the Supreme Court of Canada, quoting The Schooner Exchange, 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116, 3 L. Ed. 287, traced this development, relating the fact that "states cannot live in splendid isolation" to the "common interest [which] impels sovereigns to mutual intercourse" on the legal plane). Since "comity of nations" was not a natural state of affairs but born of necessity, see Connaught Labs.

v. Medeva Pharma., 1999 F.T.R. LEXIS 1817, at *25 (Fed. Its basis is not simply respect for other nations, but convenience and necessity, recognizing the need to facilitate inter-jurisdictional transactions"), the principle was necessarily fluid, conceptually. See id. (noting that "the content of comity must be adjusted in light of a changing world order" and citing Morguard). This fluid principle, in turn, provided a basis for an equally fluid legal concept of the same name. See Hilton v. [*390] Guyot, 159 U.S. 113, 163-64, 16 S. Ct. 139, 40 L. Ed. 95 (1895) ("HN54[] The extent to which the law of one nation, as put in force within its territory, whether by executive order, by legislative act, or by judicial decree, shall be allowed to operate within the dominion of another nation, depends upon what our greatest jurists have been content to call 'the comity of nations.' Although the phrase has been often criticized, no satisfactory substitute has been suggested. 'Comity,' in the legal sense, is neither a matter of absolute obligation, on the one hand, nor of mere courtesy and good will, upon the other"). The fluid concept, in turn: (a) [200] indirectly provided theoretical support to areas of law related to international interactions, e.g., by supplying jurisprudential solutions for conflict of law problems, or bases for enforcement of foreign judgments or for resolutions of forum non conveniens challenges; and, in addition, (b) mushroomed into a panoply of legal doctrines, all bearing the name "the doctrine of comity," even though each of these doctrines eventually developed its own distinct set of considerations ensuring application of the umbrella concept of comity to the particular issue tackled by the doctrine. > HN55[] In the United States[,] the foundation of private international law is the [concept] of international comity. Roughly speaking, courts, according to this [concept], should apply foreign law or limit domestic jurisdiction out of respect for foreign sovereignty. [See] Mark Janis, An Introduction to International Law 327 (2003). [Since] international comity requires courts to balance competing public and private interests in a manner that takes into account any conflict between the public policies of the domestic and foreign sovereigns[,] scholars and courts have characterized international comity inconsistently as a choice-of-law principle, see, e.g., Ian F. Baxter, Essays on Private Law 22 (1966), a synonym for private international law, see, e.g., Joseph H. Beale, A Treatise on the Conflicts of Law, vol. 1 § 6.1 (1935); L. See, e.g., Harold Maier, Interest Balancing and Extraterritorial Jurisdiction, 31 Am. J. Comp. L. 579, 589 (1983). . . . For all these reasons, international comity [might have been perceived as] too vague, incoherent, illusory, and ephemeral to serve as a foundation for U.S. private international law. Yet, it is precisely these qualities that have allowed the [concept] of comity to mutate over time in ways that [allowed for creation of various "doctrines of comity" that] responded to different geopolitical circumstances. [203] [In its direct manifestations, the concept of] international comity [yielded] comity []as a discretionary doctrine that empowered courts to decide when to defer to foreign cases [and to the] broader concept of comity as a rule and a justification for deference encompasses a wider constellation of . . . [inter]related doctrines -- like the foreign-act-of-state doctrine -- which, though analytically distinct . . . , nonetheless share[] certain methods, values, and justificatory rhetoric.

Hence, the panoply of "doctrines of comity," distinctly named doctrines (e.g., "the act of state") and even the statutory language of the FSIA, are different legal faces expressing an overall position of United States legislators and the judiciary as to the modern "comity of nations." 4. Government Compulsion

While just a handful of courts addressed the doctrine of government compulsion and its being moored to the broad concept of comity, a string of judicial decisions forming the doctrine can clearly be detected. The seminal decision appears to be Hartford Fire, the case where the Supreme Court read comity as a jurisdictional rule of reason applied to potential impossibility of compliance with conflicting regimes (rather than to the scenarios where simultaneous but potentially conflicting or forum non conveniens-like adjudications might be conducted). Cf. Hartford Fire, 509 U.S. at 817 (Scalia, J., dissenting) (clarifying that "[t]he 'comity' [the Court] refer[s] to is not the comity of courts, [205] whereby judges decline to exercise jurisdiction over matters more appropriately adjudged elsewhere, but rather what might be termed 'prescriptive comity': the respect sovereign nations afford each other by limiting the reach of their laws"). Applying the principles of prescriptive comity to the challenges presented in that particular matter, the Court in Hartford Fire held that such form of comity did not prevent the extraterritorial application of the Sherman Act to British reinsurers because the requirements of the Sherman Act did not directly conflict with British regulations covering the defendants, see id., 509 U.S. at 799, i.e., because conforming with United States law did not require the foreign defendants to violate British law. See id. It is, however, an error to construe the holding of Hartford Fire as a decision stating that the absence of a "true conflict between domestic and foreign law" automatically precludes abstention on the basis of preclusive comity. As one court noted, > Hartford Fire's holding is not necessarily that expansive. [See] In re Maxwell Commc'n Corp. plc, 93 F.3d 1036, 1050 (2d Cir. 1996) ("As we have previously noted, Hartford Fire recognized that 'other [206] concerns' might be implicated if the context were different") (citing Sterling Drug, Inc. v. Bayer AG, 14 F.3d 733, 747 (2d Cir. 1994)). [Hence, courts] decline[] to construe Hartford Fire's conflict analysis as a prerequisite to the application of comity principles . . . because of numerous countervailing considerations that counsel in favor of abstention. . . . The limited scope of the Supreme Court's comity holding is demonstrated [*392] by its statement that the presence of a conflict between domestic and foreign law was "[t]he only substantial question" before the Court with respect to the comity issue. Id. at 798. Moreover, the main authority cited in Hartford Fire for the "true conflict" proposition -- the Third Restatement Foreign of Relations Law § 403 and comment j --requires conflict analysis only if the exercise of jurisdiction is first found to be reasonable. See id. at 821 (Scalia, J., dissenting in part). The Hartford Fire Court appears to have assumed that exercising jurisdiction over the foreign defendants was reasonable in that case. See id. at 799 ("We have no need in this litigation to address other considerations that might inform a decision to refrain from the exercise [207] of jurisdiction on grounds of international comity"); see also id. at 799 n.25. Therefore, Hartford Fire did not forbid [rule of reason] abstention on comity grounds in the absence of [expressly] conflicting laws; it merely assumed that no other considerations existed in the [Hartford Fire] case that justified abstention.

Freund v. Republic of France, 592 F. Supp. 2d 540, 573-74 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

In sum, it appears that the holding of Hartford Fire is best read as: (a) articulating a broad rule-of-reason approach to prescriptive comity; (b) specifying that the defendant's inability to comply simultaneously with the laws of the defendant's nation and United States laws would necessarily warrant abstention, accord Report of the Attorney General's Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws 83 (1955), quoted in, Wilbur L. Fugate, Foreign Commerce and the Antitrust Laws 148 (1958) ("should the laws of another country require uniform non-competitive prices by companies doing business there, then compliance with that law should constitute a defense in this country to an antitrust charge of price fixing solely in that country"); and (c) guiding that abstention based on prescriptive comity might also [208] be appropriate in other scenarios, e.g., where a foreign government's manifestation of its sovereign power (through the means other than issuance of a legal provision directly contradicting United States law) compels defendants' conduct which, if assessed under United States law, would be deemed illegal. See, e.g., Timberlane Lumber Co. v. Bank of America, 549 F.2d 597 (9th Cir. 1976), and Mannington Mills, 595 F.2d 1287 (the leading cases that declined to read the jurisdictional rule of reason narrowly).

F.3d 1279, 1294-1298 (11th Cir. 1999) (since Congress intended international law to inform the courts in their interpretation of the FSIA, courts may look to the concepts of international law as a guide to the meaning of the FSIA).

It seems the Court of Appeals in Mannington Mills and the Ninth Circuit in Timberlane Lumber were the pilot tribunals that bridged the prescriptive comity of Hartford Fire into what has developed as its sprout: the doctrine of government compulsion. Addressing the considerations that might be pertinent to the application of the doctrine, both courts came up with similar lists of factors setting forth a "tidy framework, easily workable in practice." Zenith Radio Corp. v. Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., 494 F. Supp. 1161, 1188 n.63 (E.D. Pa. 1980), vacated sub nom, In re Japanese Elec. Prods. Antitrust Litig., 631 F.2d 1069 (3d Cir. 1980), rev'd sub nom, Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). [209] [72] However -- being [*393] merely framework-building guideposts -- these compilations of factors were not offered by both courts as either exhaustive lists of pertinent considerations or as sets of mandatory elements, each of which must be present to trigger an application of the doctrine. Cf. Trugman-Nash, Inc. v. New Zealand Dairy Board, 954 F. Supp. 733, 737 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (observing that, "[i]n Hartford [Fire], the Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the Ninth Circuit's decision in In re Insurance Antitrust Litigation, 938 F.2d 919 (9th Cir. 1991), [where t]he Ninth Circuit referred to the factors [it already] articulated in its prior Timberlane decision[. The Ninth Circuit in Insurance Antitrust Litigation] concluded [that all these factors, short of one] militated in favor of [non-abstention], but [the remaining] factor . . . requir[ed] abstention. . . The Supreme Court reversed, finding [that this remaining factor was not present in light of the evidence in the record]. In doing so, the Court did not have before it, and accordingly expressed no view upon, the validity of [the analysis had it been performed only under] other Timberlane factors"); see also Laker Airways. Ltd. v. Pan American World Airways, Inc., 604 F. Supp. 280, 292 (D.D.C. 1984) [210] (employing a selective application of the Mannington Mills factors).

Since Mannington Mills and Timberlane Lumber, a handful of courts reflected, either in holding or in dicta, upon the gist and/or the sketchy parameters of the government compulsion doctrine. See, e.g., Williams v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 694 F.2d 300, 303 (3d Cir. 1982) (stating that abstention pursuant to the doctrine of "governmental compulsion . . . is available [where] the [allegedly illegal] action was mandated by a foreign sovereign," relying on Interamerican Refining Corp. v. Texaco Maracaibo, Inc., 307 F. Supp. 1291, 1293 (D. Del. 1970), the case observing that it "should be self-evident [that a]nticompetitive practices compelled by foreign nations are not restraints of commerce, as . . . understood in the Sherman Act, because refusal to comply would put an end to commerce [since c]ommerce may exist [only] at the will of the government, and to impose liability for obedience to that will would eliminate for many companies the ability to transact [212] business in foreign lands[, including the United States" and citing Kingman Brewster, Antitrust and American Business Abroad 94 (1976)); accord In re Vitamin C Antitrust Litig. ("Vitamin C"), 584 F. Supp. 2d 546, 559 (E.D.N.Y. 2008) (outlining the perimeter of the government compulsion doctrine as ensuing from the circumstances where the alleged wrongdoers-defendants were "acting as private citizens pursuant to governmental directives "); Linseman v. World Hockey., 439 F. Supp.

[72] The Timberlane factors are: (a) the degree of conflict with foreign law or policy; (b) the nationality or allegiance of the parties and their place of business; (c) the likelihood of compliance with judicial orders; (d) the effects on the countries involved; (e) whether there was an explicit intention to harm United States commerce or the foreseeability of such effect; and (f) where the conduct occurred. See Timberlane, 549 F.2d at 614. The Court of Appeals refined the Timberlane list by offering the following list of considerations: (a) the degree of conflict with foreign law or policy; (b) nationality of the parties; (c) relative importance of the alleged violation of conduct here compared to that abroad; (d) availability of a remedy abroad or pendency of litigation there; (e) existence of intent to harm or affect United States commerce; (f) possible effect upon foreign relations if the court grants relief; (g) whether the defendant will be under conflicting requirements by both countries if the requested relief is granted; (h) whether the court's order could be made effective in practice; (i) whether the same [211] type of order would be acceptable in the United States if made by a foreign nation under similar circumstances; and (j) whether a treaty with the affected nations has already addressed the issue at bar. See Mannington Mills, 595 F.2d at 1297.

1315, 1324 (D. Conn. 1977) (quoting Timberlane Lumber, 549 F.2d at 606, for a somewhat-doctrines-conflating observation that "corporate conduct which is compelled by a foreign sovereign is also protected from antitrust liability, as if it were an act of the state itself").

All these statements seemingly build on the Court of Appeals' broad observation [*394] that HN56[] the government compulsion doctrine "shields from . . . liability the acts of [the defendant that were] carried out in obedience to the mandate of a foreign government" and so, in order to successfully invoke the doctrine, the defendants must show that the defendants' act challenged as a violation of United States law was compelled by the foreign government [213] through a compulsion that was "basic and fundamental" to the defendants' acts (rather than served as a mere peripheral aspect which landed certain supporting considerations to the defendants' decision to engage in the challenged conduct). Mannington Mills, 595 F.2d at 1293-94. This Court, therefore, distills from the aforesaid observation that the defendant invoking government compulsion must show that: (a) a certain entity in the defendant's nation qualifies as an arm of the state by enjoying governmental or quasi-governmental powers that are either uniquely peculiar to sovereigns or of essentially sovereign nature; (b) there is a direct link between the entity's powers and the defendant, which enables the entity to compel the defendant to act in accordance with the entity's prescripts as a result of the entity's ability to subject the defendant to a significant negative repercussion for failure to comply with the entity's prescripts; and (c) the entity, in fact, compels the defendant to act in accordance with a certain prescript, and such compulsion is the fundamental force causing the defendant's act challenged as a violation of United States law. See id; see also Interamerican Refining, 307 F. Supp. at 1298 [214] (observing that actual compulsion need not be based on a validly promulgated foreign mandate or a duly published binding order); accord Parker v. Brown, 317 U.S. 341, 63 S. Ct. 307, 87 L. Ed. 315 (1943) (compliance with a state regulatory program shields individuals from liability).

C. Parties' Relevant Exhibits and Factual Assertions

1. Defendants' Moving Papers

The Minmetals Defendants open the relevant part of their assertions with an observation that, since "China is still in the process of transitioning from a completely state-controlled economy to a market-based system [like] the United States[, t]he Chinese government still practices extensive intervention in its economy and, in particular, in the export of commodities." M/Mot. at 9 (citing Docket Entry No. 99-3 (U.S. Trade Representative ["USTR"], 2008 Report to Congress on China's WTO Compliance (Dec. 2008)), which, in turn, states that "[d]espite its [WTO] commitments, . . . China has continued to impose restrictions on exports of raw materials, including[, inter alia,] minimum export prices . . . as China's economic planners have continued to guide the development of downstream industries. These export restrictions are widespread. For example, China maintains [215] some or all of these types of export restrictions on [such goods as] magnesium [oxide and] magnesium carbonate [i.e., crude magnesite]"). Switching then to the pertinent aspect of Chinese governmental administration, Minmetals Defendants state:

> The Chinese . . . government relies . . . on two actors to carry out its export control policies[: (a)] the Ministry of Commerce ("MOFCOM"), [which, being] an executive agency of the State Council [("State Council")] of the People's Republic of China, is responsible for formulating, promulgating, supervising and enforcing policies and regulations pertaining to the exportation of products and commodities from China[; and (b)] numerous "chambers of commerce" [that] were created and organized by commodity type [to assist MOFCOM in its goals]. The [particular] [*395] chamber responsible for assisting MOFCOM in [regard] to the export of magnesite is the Chamber of Commerce of Metals, Minerals & Chemicals Importers & Exporters ("CCCMC"), which was established in 1988. . . . [With regard to, inter alia,] magnesite[-based goods], China has instituted [an] export quota and license system . . . in April 1994 [in order] to enable stricter control of export volumes [216] and prices, reduce smuggling and minimize allegations of dumping. . . . [Such] control over the [export practices with regard to] magnesite . . . is achieved through two mechanisms. First, MOFCOM directly controls [these practices] by setting an aggregate export quota that caps the total amount of magnesite that may be exported from China in a single year . . . MOFCOM also controls each exporter's individual [exportation] of > magnesite . . . by requiring prospective exporters to "bid" on an allotment from the aggregate quota. [Thus, t]wice a year [all] exporters bid [on licenses] to export a portion of the aggregate export quota. The "bidding" [process] is administered by the CCCMC on behalf of the government, and t]he allocations to individual exporters . . . are made by a Bidding Committee . . . consist[ing] of individuals employed by MOFCOM and the CCCMC. It is only through participating in this process that exporters may receive a license to export, and the [Chinese] government requires that every magnesite export be licensed[since the Chinese] Customs Bureau will not allow exports of commodities subject to licensing without an export license. . . . [Each] exporter must export [217] its quota allotment during the calendar year for which it received the allotment ([with a very] limited extension . . .) [and n]o exporter may stockpile magnesite to manipulate [its business strategy] because [a] fail[ure] to [export its allotted share would cause the exporter to] lose [this unexported] portion of [its] allotment [for the purposes of] the following year. Like-wise, an exporter cannot export in excess of its lawful allotment [in order to manipulate its business strategy] without risking termination of its right to export and potential criminal liability. . . . In addition to restricting the [amount] of magnesite [allotted] for export, MOFCOM also mandates that exporters follow a uniform minimum export price . . . . [Specifically,] the minimum export price . . . is arrived at through a meeting of exporters convened by the CCCMC. MOFCOM regulations explicitly prohibit entities from exporting at prices below those established within the CCCMC and prohibit the issuance of export licenses [to exporters that sell at] prices . . . lower than the coordinated prices fixed by the [CCCMC. Consequently], pricing below the minimum export price in violation of MOFCOM regulations [218] can subject [the so-selling] exporter[] to the loss of [its export] quota allotment[, to] imposition of fines and [even full] revocation of [its] export license[]. In addition to mandating a minimum export price for magnesite, the Chinese government manipulates the price of magnesite exports through other means[, e.g., reduction of export-geared tax "rebate," levy of customs duty and export tax, and imposition of "resource protection" fees by the local governments of relevant Chinese provinces]. . . . The U.S. Executive Branch has repeatedly raised its concerns about China's . . . export restrictions [with regard to magnesite-based products] both bilaterally and at the [WTO,] has pressured China to eliminate [these] restrictions . . . and has expressed its intention to continue to do so in 2009.

The statements made in the moving papers of the Sinosteel Defendants are substantively identical with regard to their discussion of the nature and operations of the MOFCOM and CCCMC, both generally and specifically as to the exporters of magnesite-based products. See S/Mot. at 38-40 (providing a brief overview analogous to the statements made by the Minmetals Defendants and relying on selected Li Exhibits, as well as citing Li Exhibits for an additional clarification that: (a) after the MOFCOM requires exporters to [*397] coordinate production volume and set certain minimum prices at which magnesite-based products would be sold for export, these minimum prices are registered with the MOFCOM; so (b) when Chinese entities seek to obtain export licenses for magnesite-based goods, they must submit documentation, including their magnesite sales contracts, to the Office of the Special Commissioner ("Special Commissioner") at the MOFCOM, which physically issues such export licenses; but (c) the Special Commissioner reviews the submissions and issues export licenses only upon establishing that the price stated in [223] the sales contracts meets the minimal price registered with the MOFCOM).

2. Plaintiffs' Opposition

In response to the above-described Defendants' assertions as to the nature of the MOFCOM and the CCCMC, and the MOFCOM/CCCMC's operation of Chinese export of magnesite-based products, Plaintiffs state their position, which is as follows:

> China began the shift from a [planned] economy [75] to a market economy in the 1970s. Starting in the 1980s, the pace of change increased . . . as China negotiated its accession to the . . . WTO. During negotiations prior to its accession, China's trade representative explained to the WTO . . . that "[t]here were [] three types of prices [in China]: government price, government guidance price and market regulated price." . . . "[M]arket-regulated prices" were prices that companies were free to set in accordance with traditional market factors (i.e., supply and demand). China represented in 2001 that 94.7% of products from China were subject to market-regulated pricing. [Since m]agnesite [was] not on the . . . list[] of . . . products . . . subject to government guidance pricing or government pricing submitted by the Chinese government [to the WTO] in 2001[, [224] and] China . . . agreed that it would not add any products or services to [that] list, . . . China functionally repealed any . . . law [existing as of 2001] that controlled the price of magnesite for export. The WTO accession is an international agreement of law, and the legislative approach for China is to incorporate international agreements and law as its own. [Since] China explicitly abolished or amended more than 3,000 laws and regulations to bring its policies in line with WTO requirements, . . .[t]he government of China has stated in official comments to the U.S. Department of Commerce that these changes have resulted in industries exporting to the United States becoming independent and market-oriented[, and, i]n 2006, China declared that since its accession to the WTO, it had avoided any government intervention in the economic activities of state

[74] Docket Entries Nos. 99-11 to 99-14 include the following documents (replicated in their original Chinese sinographs and in English translation): (a) CCCMC charter; (b) CCCMC's bylaws; (c) Assistant Minister of Commerce Liu Xiangdong's Speech to the Third Congress of the CCCMC; and (d) CCCMC's Bidding Committee's Announcement Regarding the First Public Bidding for the Export Quota of Magnesium Oxide in 2005 and Announcement [222] Regarding the Second Public Bidding for the Export Quota of Magnesium Oxide in 2005.

[75] "Planned economy" is an economic regime where the central government makes all decisions on the production and sale of goods and services. See Alec Nove, The New Palgrave: A Dictionary of Economics vol. 3, at 879-80 (1987). Although a planned economy may consist of state-owned enterprises, private enterprises directed by the state, or a combination of both, the term is most often associated with the economy of the Soviet Union prior to its "perestroika" [230] period, of China before 1978 and of India before 1991. See, e.g., Andrew C. Wilson, Politics and Market Forces in China's Planned Economy: the Case of Grain Self-sufficiency Versus Cash Crop Benefits (1986); T. Mathew, Fiscal Policy in the Planned Economy of India (1960); V. Ossinsky et al., Socialist Planned Economy in the Soviet Union (1932).

trading enterprises and that [even its] state[-owned] trading enterprises [have become] fully independent, responsible for their own gains and losses, and make their export decisions based on factors such as supply/demand [*398] and price in the domestic and international markets[, there is no reason to presume that the export of magnesite-based [225] products is regulated by Chinese government. True,] MOFCOM includes magnesite [in its] list of products subject to export quota bidding and licensing requirements[, but t]he rules and regulations cited by . . . Defendants [in regard to] the export quota and licensing system do not mandate a minimum price and do not compel industry members to agree on export prices . . . . [Specifically, Exhibit 27 among Li Exhibits states the rules that] do not [expressly] mention a minimum price or compulsory price-fixing. [Similarly, Exhibit 24 among Li Exhibits] does not [expressly] refer to any minimum export price or mandatory price-fixing. [Analogously, Exhibit 4 among Chen Exhibits consists of a]nnouncements [that] do not [expressly] mention a minimum price or compulsory price fixing. [In the same vein, Exhibit 25 among Li Exhibits replicates the regulation that] do[es] not [expressly] mention a minimum price or compulsory price-fixing[, plus, this regulation was] repealed in 2008. [Similarly, Exhibit 23 among Li Exhibits uses the word "when" in the statement] "when the export prices are recommended by the chambers of commerce, the export price shall be in compliance with the relevant price [226] limit regulations" [so the use of the word "when" should be read as a statement that t]he rules do not compel price-fixing for any product. [Likewise, Exhibit 21 among Li Exhibits] do[es] not mention a minimum price or compulsory price-fixing. [Also, Exhibit 20 among Li Exhibits] do[es] not [expressly] mention a minimum price or compulsory price-fixing. [And Exhibit 19 among Li Exhibits is a regulation] specifically repealed on December 10, 2004. Further, [it] only refers to recommended export prices fixed by the relevant chamber of commerce [but] it does not [expressly] require the fixing of any price for any specific product. [Similarly, Exhibit 18 among Li Exhibits] describe[s] the export quota licensing system but do[es] not [expressly] require -- and do[es] not [expressly] authorize any ministry to require -- minimum prices or the coordination of prices among competitors. [Rather, it] require[s] the promulgation of new rules governing export quota licensing that conform to the State Council Regulations[, which should be interpreted to mean that] the State Council Regulation effectively repealed any existing export quota licensing rule issued by MOFCOM including minimum pricing [227] requirements. [Analogously, Exhibit 16 among Li Exhibits reproduced] rules [that] were officially abolished on September 7, 2007. Moreover, these rules were based on the export license regulations effective in 1999, which were revised in 2001 and again in 2004 [to] state only that a price cannot be lower than the coordinat[ed] price regulated by the relevant import and export commerce commission[, but this language did not expressly] compel price-fixing for any particular product[, and so it might have not included magnesite-based products. In the same fashion, Exhibit 13 among Li Exhibits] does not [expressly] refer to any minimum export price or mandatory price-fixing and [this regulation] was abolished in 2005. [In sum, t]he only document cited by Defendants that specifically refers to a coordinated price for magnesite is [the regulation] promulgated in 1994[, but it should be presumed repealed because, i]n 1998 and 1999, [the] MOFCOM promulgated new rules and regulations governing the export bidding process[, especially since] the 2001 export quota bidding rules do not mention [*399] minimum prices or mandatory price fixing. [Consequently, the fact that t]he export quota licensing system [228] . . . was effective during the [Class P]eriod . . . does not [mean that it was] requiring price-fixing of magnesite by members of the [CCCMC] or any other group of [Chinese] exporters. [Moreover, Defendants' assertions that non-compliance with minimal price requirement could result in reduction of the non-complying exporter's export allotment should not be deemed credible in light of the fact that t]he volume of export quotas for magnesite changes from year to year[, and, i]n 2001, the export quotas awarded by the government far exceeded the [overall] actual volume of magnesite exports by more than 300,000 tons[, and the e]xport quotas were also left unused in 2004[, same as i]n 2009, [when Chinese] export quotas have again exceeded the total volume of [the nation's magnesite] export[. Finally, the governmental nature of the CCCMC is not true, since] Defendants are members of the CCCMC, [and it] is a non-governmental trade organization. The CCCMC was established in 1988, prior to the establishment of a market economy in China and prior to the vast reform of China's export laws and regulations. The Magnesite Product Branch of the CCCMC was formed in 1994. The CCCMC currently describes [229] itself as a self-disciplined organization that [merely] provides service to enterprises, including the provision of information and offering of coordination and guidance to its members. [The] CCCMC also describes itself as a non-government organization under the current market economy system in China[; it] is a corporate body[] funded through the receipt of membership fees from its member entities[, and s]ome of [its] employees [are also employed by CCCMC's members and] continue to be paid by the[se] member[s.] . . . With > respect to export activities of its members, the CCCMC has stated that Chinese enterprises are all independent in decision making . . . .

Opp. at 18-25 (quotation marks omitted, original brackets and ellipses removed). [76]

[*400] In light of the foregoing, Plaintiffs conclude that, "[even r]egardless of [the] CCCMC's legal status, no document submitted by Defendants demonstrates that the price collusion . . . was initiated at the direction of the CCCMC or was required by the CCCMC." Id. at 52.

3. Defendants' Reply

Disagreeing with Plaintiffs' position, the Sinosteel Defendants point out that > Plaintiffs admit that [the MOFCOM] includes magnesite among the products subject to government-mandated export bidding and licensing requirements [but] then . . . cite various regulations [not expressly referring to the minimum price] in an attempt to show that lack of [such] requirement. [Yet,] Plaintiffs do not challenge that the . . . [r]ules requiring [233] coordinated pricing were in place from December 4, 1999, through September 7, 2007, and thus were in effect at all times during [the Class] period [including] when the original Complaint was filed in 2005. [Since these] 1999 . . . [r]ules provided that a price cannot be lower than the coordinating price regulated by . . . the CCCMC[,] . . . [t]he fact that [the] regulations adopted in the interim may not [expressly] mention price coordination is no more relevant than the fact that not all securities regulations promulgated since the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 mention insider trading, nor does every antitrust regulation adopted since the Sherman Act mention horizontal price fixing. Plaintiffs also . . . omit mention[ing] other Chinese regulations adopted in the interim that confirm the requirement of export price coordination[, e.g.: (a) the January 1, 2000, regulation stating that, w]hen examining an application for an export license, the [Office of the Special Commissioner] shall . . . [e]xamine export contract [and] especially examine [the] price [because the p]rice of goods [subject to] export . . . shall be . . . not lower than the coordinating price regulated by [the] CCCMC[; [234] (b) the January 1, 2002, regulation providing that Chinese] license issuing [administrative body] shall stress . . . verification of the prices of export commodities when examining the export contracts, [and if] the prices in the export contracts are lower than the recommended export price fixed by the . . . CCCMC, the license issuing [administrative body] shall refuse to issue the export licenses[; (c) the December

S/Reply at 18-19 (citing Docket Entries Nos. 35-54, 35-57 and 35-61). The response of the Minmetals Defendants largely corresponds to the position of the Sinosteel Defendants, since the Minmetals Defendants state:

> Plaintiffs . . . characterize China as[, effectively,] a market economy wherein its industrial enterprises act independently and are not subject to price controls [but none of Plaintiffs'] sources pertains [specifically to export of] magnesite[-based products from] China [which turns on Chinese] export licensing system. . . [*401] [While] Plaintiffs . . . argue that many of the regulations [relied upon by] Defendants [235] [were] repealed [and, thus, do not pertain to the issue of minimum price, this] is . . . incorrect [because a]ll of the regulations cited by Defendants were in effect and applicable to magnesite at some time from September 2001 to the present, which is the [Class Period. Magnesite has been listed as a commodity subject to export quota and licensing system in each] Catalogue of Goods [issued by Chinese government during the] 2000-2009 [period. Thus, w]hile some of the export price regulations have been repealed and replaced, at all times during the [Class Period, Chinese] exporters were in fact subject to uniform, minimum export price requirements. [For instance, such chain of changing but never disappearing minimum price requirements can be established in Li Exhibits that include a regulation] effective through Jan[uary] 1, 2002; [a regulation effective] through Jan[uary] 1, 2005; [and a regulation effective] through Sept[ember] 7, 2007. Furthermore, many . . . other regulations [that did not epressly refer to minimum price] provide[d, nonetheless,] the context in which both the quota and minimum pricing [we]re implemented . . . through [the type of] bidding process [employed in China [236] with regard to magnesite-based products].

D. Relevant Legal Proceedings and Evidence Submitted Therein

In addition to stating their legal positions and directing the Court's attention to the exhibits which they read as supporting their assertions, the parties also make reference to a certain legal proceeding conducted in the European Union and to another legal action still pending before the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York. The Court's own research of the issues presented by this matter revealed two additional proceedings that appear just as relevant as the legal matters brought to the Court's attention by the parties. Therefore, a detailed discussion of these four proceedings appears warranted. However, in light of the parties' apparent confusion as to the precedential value of the legal decisions reached by the tribunals presiding over those matters and the value of evidence submitted in those matters, the Court finds it proper to precede its discussion of these four [237] legal proceedings with a clarification as to the distinction between a legal precedent and material subject to judicial notice.

1. Judicial Notice and the Concept of Stare Decisis

HN57[] At common law and under the Federal Rules, most proof is presented by means of testimonial evidence or by the offering of documentary evidence. One an exception to the requirement that a party who relies on a certain proposition must prove it is judicial notice. Rule 201 of the Federal Rules of Evidence governs judicial notice, providing that facts noticed cannot be subject to reasonable dispute and specifying certain procedural requirements that must be followed.

> Rule 201(b) . . . permits a district court to take judicial notice of facts that are "not subject to reasonable dispute in that [they are] either[:] (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court[;] or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned." Rule 201(b).

In re NAHC, Inc. Sec. Litig., 306 F.3d 1314, 1331 (3d Cir. 2002) (finding that HN58[] judicial notice could be properly taken with [*402] respect to three different categories of documents which include: (1) [238] documents relied upon in the complaint; (2) documents filed with a United States law enforcement agency; and (3) undisputable data, e.g., purely informational opinion-free data compiled by a very widely quoted and, thus, deemed reliable, news service); accord *Jackson v. Broad. Music. Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3960, at 18 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 31, 2006) ("the court may take judicial notice of public records and of 'admissions in pleadings and other documents in the public record filed by a party [to the instant matter] in other judicial proceedings that contradict the party's factual assertions in [the instant] action,' [and the court may do so even] without converting the motion [to dismiss] into one for summary judgment") (quoting Harris v. New York State Dep't of Health, 202 F. Supp. 2d 143, 173 (S.D.N.Y. 2002), and citing Munno v. Town of Orangetown, 391 F. Supp. 2d 263, 268 (S.D.N.Y. 2005)). In addition, since the court may take judicial notice of a fact "capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources [which] accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned," Rule 201(b), the court "'may take judicial notice of records and reports of administrative bodies,' such as notices [239] and opinion letters." Wible v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 375 F. Supp.2d 956, 965 (C.D. Cal. 2005) (taking judicial notice of a notice and opinion letter issued by the Department of Justice and citing, inter alia, Interstate Natural Gas Co. v. Southern California Gas Co., 209 F.2d 380, 385 (9th Cir. 1953)); see also Toth v. Automobile Club of California Long Term Disability Plan, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40746 (CD. Cal. 2005) (same).

Conversely,HN59[] judicial notice is improper if a question exists as to the legitimacy of the source of the information. See Hinton v. Dep't of Justice, 844 F.2d 126 (3d Cir. 1988); see also Oneida Indian Nation of New York v. State of N.Y., 691 F.2d 1070 (2d Cir. 1982). Therefore, contentions made by the parties are not subject to judicial notice, see e.g., Taylor v. Charter Medical Corp., 162 F.3d 827 (5th Cir. 1998) (the court cannot take judicial notice of defendant's status as a state actor); General Electric Capital Corp. v. Lease Resolution Corp., 128 F.3d 1074 (7th Cir. 1997) (trial court erred in taking judicial notice of a finding that a settlement in a prior proceeding was fair, reasonable and adequate), since "judicial notice applies [only] to self-evident [240] truths that no reasonable person could question, truisms that approach platitudes or banalities." Hardy v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 681 F.2d 334, 347 (5th Cir. 1982).

HN60[] The tool of judicial notice is qualitatively different from the concept of legal precedent, since a legal conclusion reached by another tribunal (or a particular court during its prior ruling) is assessed not under the requirements of Rule 201(b) but under the common law doctrine of stare decisis.

> [J]udicial precedent attaches a specific legal consequence to a detailed set of facts in an adjudged case or judicial decision, which is then considered as furnishing the rule for the determination of a subsequent case involving identical or similar material facts and arising in the same court or a lower court in the judicial hierarchy.
> Allegheny General Hospital v. NLRB, 608 F.2d 965, 969-970 (3rd Cir. 1979) (footnote omitted). Stare decisis is the policy of the court to stand by precedent; the term is but an abbreviation of stare decisis et non quieta movere -- "to stand by and adhere to decisions and not disturb what is settled."

United States IRS v. Osborne, 76 F.3d 306, 309 (9th Cir. 1996); see also *Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. [403] Casey, 947 F.2d 682, 691-92 (3d Cir. 1991), [241] aff'd in part and rev'd in part on other grounds, 505 U.S. 833, 112 S. Ct. 2791, 120 L. Ed. 2d 674 (1992).

HN61[] It has become axiomatic that the doctrine has two applications, vertical and horizontal. Vertical stare decisis could be summarized as a principle that a controlling precedent by a superior court is binding upon the lower courts. [77] See, e.g., Briley v. City of Trenton, 164 F.R.D. 26, 29 (D.N.J. 1995) ("[where] the Supreme Court declined to rule with respect to [a certain issue], the doctrine of stare decisis compels this Court to apply the Third Circuit's . . . standard to [that issue]"); compare Rodriguez de Ouijas v. Shearson/American Express. Inc., 490 U.S.

[77] MoreoverHN62[] , the following factors must be present before a prior decision has stare decisis effect: (a) the decision must be from the same court or from a court which the court applying stare decisis owes obedience; (b) an issue was actually determined by the decision; (c) the decision must constitute a holding of the majority of the court and, if a particular result is adopted by a clear majority of the court, it has [243] absolute precedential effect; (d) the decision must involve an issue of law; and (e) the decision was rendered in substantially identical legal and factual circumstances. See 3-30 Moore's Manual-Federal Practice and Procedure § 30.11, (2007) (citing, inter alia, City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 285, 120 S. Ct. 1382, 146 L. Ed. 2d 265 (2000), and Rappa v. New Castle County, 18 F.3d 1043, 1061 (3d Cir. 1994)).

477, 486, 109 S. Ct. 1917, 104 L. Ed. 2d 526 (1989) (observing that a circuit court "engage[s] in an indefensible brand of judicial activism" when it "refuse[s] to follow" a "controlling precedent" of the Supreme Court). In contrast, horizontal stare decisis merely implies a court's discretional consideration of non-binding decisions, which that court can -- and, perhaps, is even obligated to -- ignore if it finds that the rationale of these decisions is insufficiently persuasive or outright unsound, or that the legal issues and/or the facts addressed in these decisions are too removed from [242] the legal issues and facts at hand to have a meaningful impact on the court's judicial analysis. Accord Planned Parenthood, 947 F.2d at 691-92 ("As Justice Kennedy has stated, courts are bound to adhere not only to results of cases, but also 'to their explications of the governing rules of law.' Our system of precedent or stare decisis is thus based on adherence to both the reasoning and result of a case, and not simply to the result alone. This distinguishes the American system of precedent, sometimes called 'rule stare decisis,' from the English system, which historically has been limited to following the results or disposition based on the facts of a case and thus referred to as 'result stare decisis'") (citations and later procedural treatment of the case omitted).

With these rules and principles in mind, the Court now turns to the four proceedings the Court finds relevant to the case at bar.

2. Antidumping and Countervailing Proceedings

Two of these four proceedings involve antidumping or countervailing issues. Since, in the United States, the legal matters raising such challenges fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States Court of International Trade, see 28 U.S.C. § 1581(i); <<http://www.cit.uscourts. gov/informational/about.htm#FOREWORD>> and, hence, these issues are rarely considered by federal district courts, a brief explanation as to the economic underpinnings and legal rationale of these regimes appears warranted.

HN63[] In general terms of economics, the practice of "dumping" means sale at "predatory pricing," i.e., sale of the product so cheaply that [244] the seller's competitors are eventually forced out of business. See Brian [*404] Hindley, The Economics of Dumping and Anti-Dumping Action: Is There a Baby in the Bathwater?, in Policy Implications 27 (Workshop on Policy Implications of Antidumping Measures of the European Institute for Advanced Studies in Management, Brussels, Belgium (Oct. 1989)). In the more specific terms of international trade, "dumping" means that a seller from one country is exporting its product to another country at a predatory price, e.g., at the price which is below the price the seller charges for its goods in its home market (such low price is referred to as "less than fair value" price or "LTFV"): since the seller's predatory practices might endanger the well-being and even the very existence of the industry producing the seller's types of goods in the importing country, the law of the importing country might be crafted to alleviate some of the harsher consequences of this controversial reality of free trade; [78] such remedy is usually a penalty (i.e., an import duty) aiming to either economically force the seller to raise its export price or to dissuade the seller from a future LTFV export practice. See Lucius [245] B. Lau, Agency Interpretation of the Statute After Mead with a Special Emphasis on the Antidumping and Countervailing Duty Laws 4-11 (Comm. Litig. Branch, Civ. Div., U.S. Dep't of Justice, Apr. 8, 2002). Correspondingly, both United States law and the WTO condemn dumping if the practice causes (or threatens to cause) material injury to the domestic industry of the importing country. See 19 U.S.C. § 1673; see also Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization, Annex 1A (presenting the Agreement on Implementation of Article VI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) (Apr. 15, 1994).

[78] Therefore, it can be argued that LTFV sales arise from "profit-discrimination" rather than "price-discrimination." See Tara Gingerich, Why the WTO Should Require the Application of the Evidentiary Threshold Requirement in Antidumping, 48 Am. U. L. Rev. 135 (1998). Consequently, while the allegations of antitrust and antidumping are often raised jointly, these legal regimes often put the sellers between the proverbial rock and hard place, since sellers' heavy-handed tilt from one direction to another could place the sellers seeking to avoid dumping accusations in the position where [246] these very same sellers get accused of antitrust practices. This is so largely because the policies driving these two legal regimes could get occasionally at odds in terms of their economic goals, since the goal of antitrust law is to create the maximum market competition between the sellers of the same goods and, hence, to drive the price on these goods as much down as possible, while the goal of antidumping law is to limit this very same market competition by forcing the sellers striving to charge their lowest prices into selling their goods at higher prices that are comparable to those charged by their competitors. See, e.g., Christopher M. Barbuto, Toward Convergence of Antitrust and Trade Law: An International Trade Analogue to Robinson-Patman, 62 Fordham L. Rev. 2047 (1994) (discussing this incongruity of policies).

HN64[] The concept of countervailing is analogous, in its gist, to that of antidumping, although it introduces a third player into the equation, i.e., the state of the exporting seller. Similar to antidumping duties, countervailing duties ("CVDs") are imposed to neutralize the negative effects of predatory pricing if it has been determined that the seller's state subsidized [247] the seller's exports through certain governmental measures, and these subsidies enabled the seller to charge predatory prices causing or threatening to cause an injury to the producers of the seller's types of goods in the importing state. See <<http://www.ustr.gov/trade-agreements/wto-multilateral-affairs/ wto-issues/trade-remedies/countervailing-duties>>. In the United States, investigations of countervailing activities and determinations as to the propriety and magnitude of CVDs imposed, is performed [*405] by the International Trade Administration ("ITA"). See <<http://www.trade.gov/ITAoverview.asp>>. Here: (a) Plaintiffs bring to the Court's attention an antidumping legal matter resolved by the Court of First Instance of the European Communities in Zhejiang Xinan Chemical Industrial Group Co. Ltd v Council ("Zhejiang Xinan"), 2009 ECJ EUR-Lex LEXIS 529 (Gen. Ct., June 17, 2009); [79] and (b) the Court, on its own, notes a relevant countervailing investigation that has been recently conducted by the ITA in Certain Magnesia Carbon Bricks from the People's Republic of China ("Magnesite from China").

a. [249] *European Union Proceedings

The parties' statements made in this matter are not exactly reflective of what was asserted and concluded in Zhejiang Xinan. Specifically, Plaintiffs maintain that, in light of Zhejiang Xinan, > [any argument that] the CCCMC is a de facto instrument of the Chinese government [is unwarranted]. The European Court of Justice squarely rejected this argument [in Zhejiang Xinan], holding, based on the urging of a CCCMC member, that the CCCMC is a non-governmental body that is not directed or controlled by the government of China. The [Zhejiang Xinan court] concluded that price agreements among members of the CCCMC ([involved in production and export of glyphosate rather than magnesite-based products]) were voluntary agreements initiated by the members themselves, not imposed by [Chinese government]. Finally, the [Zhejiang Xinan court] concluded that the [plaintiff in Zhejiang Xinan, a business entity and] a member of the CCCMC . . . agreed with other members [involved in glyphosate production and export] to fix export prices . . . under market conditions and was free to decide export prices without significant [Chinese government] interference.

Opp. at 50-51 (citations [250] omitted). In response, the Minmetals Defendants assert that

> [the CCCMC] is a unique organization with no parallel in the United States, and thus is a de facto instrument of the Chinese government. This is not contradicted by the [Zhejiang Xinan court's] ruling [since that] court had before it the unrelated issue of whether the European Commission applied the proper [formula while] computing an anti-dumping duty [with respect to export by] a single Chinese producer of glyphosate [rather than multiple producers/exporters of magnesite-based goods. Moreover, the Zhejiang Xinan] court based its [79] The General Court ("Trial Court") was previously known as the "Court of First Instance." [248] The Trial Court procedural rules envision a written phase and an oral phase; at the oral hearing, the parties' lawyers state their legal positions, and the judicial panel poses questions (While the General Court has on its staff at least one judge from each European Union state, 80% of the cases are presided by a panel of three judges, although it might be five judges, thirteen judges, or even an en banc tribunal if the matter is deemed truly complex or important). One of the panelists, "Judge-Rapporteur" (a position which, duties-wise, encompasses the tasks performed in the United States by magistrate judges), prepares a report and a recommended decision ("R&R"). This R&R is then deliberated by the presiding panel that delivers the judgment which is subject to appeal to the European Court of Justice, the highest court in the EU on the matters of European Union law. See<<http://curia.europa.eu/jcms/jcms/Jo2_7033/ presentation>>. An appeal as to the Trial Court's decision in Zhejiang Xinan was filed on June 17, 2009, by the Council of the European Union. > finding about the nature of the CCCMC on only a CCCMC brochure[, a]nd the court's finding regarding glyphosate [*406] pricing decisions was based on submissions from the [Zhejiang Xinan plaintiff that were left] unchallenged by [the EU Council].

M/Reply at 13, n. 9. Since the Plaintiffs' and the Minmetals Defendants' statements read Zhejiang Xinan as if they reflected on two completely different proceedings, a clarification as to what was -- and was not -- asserted and determined in that proceeding appears necessary.

Pursuant to Article 230 (previously, Article 173) of the European Community Treaty, [80] a juridical [251] or natural individual applicant may seek annulment of a measure adopted against that individual by an institution of the EU; this is exactly what occurred in Zhejiang Xinan, where the Trial Court set aside a prior EU determination refusing market economy treatment ("MET") to Zhejiang Xinan Chemical Industrial Group Co. Ltd ("Zhejiang"), a Chinese agrochemical producer and exporter specializing in glyphosate. [81] The Trial Court summarized the factual and procedural background as follows:

> In February 1998, the [EU] adopted . . . anti-dumping [regulation] applicable to [Zhejiang, and this regulation remained active until late 2002, subjecting Zhejiang to the non-MET level of duty. In] 2002, . . . an interim review [was initiated. In] April 2004, . . . decision refusing [Zhejiang] grant [of the MET status was re-entered. In] September 2004, [another determination was made as to Zhejiang, also] imposing . . . anti-dumping duty [of the non-MET level; this is] the contested regulation[. [82] This] regulation [explained that, even though the majority of Zhejiang shares] were owned by private persons, . . . [Zhejiang was] under State control [since] the majority of the directors of the board [was] [252] either State officials or officials of State-owned enterprises [plus, the Chinese government] had entrusted the . . . CCCMC with the right [to approve export] contract[s upon] verifying export prices . . . , [and t]his system include[d] setting of a minimum price for glyphosate exports and . . . allowed the CCCMC to veto exports that did not respect these prices. [In light of these facts,] it was decided not to grant [the MET status] to [Zhejiang. [83]] . . . Since [*407] [Zhejiang's] request for [the MET status] was refused, [it continued paying higher anti-dumping duties but] brought the [Zhejiang Xinan] action [in] December 2004 [asserting that] the contested regulation [shall be annulled as to Zhejiang personally. In response, the EU] Council contend[ed] that [Zhejiang's application had to be] dismiss[ed, and the EU] Commission contend[ed the same].

Zhejiang Xinan, 2009 ECJ EUR-Lex LEXIS 529, PP 4-28 (original brackets and quotation marks removed). A typical panel of three judges presided over Zhejiang Xinan and detailed Zhejiang' position as follows:

[80] Treaty Establishing the European Community, 298 U.N.T.S. [257] 11 (Mar. 25, 1957), amended by, Treaty of Amsterdam, 1997 O.J. 1 (Oct. 2, 1997), amended by, Treaty of Nice, consolidated version reprinted in, 2002 O.J. 33 (Feb. 26, 2001).

[81] To be granted the MET status, a business must demonstrate that it meets five criteria so composed that this status is typically refused to businesses unable to show that their decisions as to prices, costs, etc., have been taken free of significant interference of their government (in other words, the end result of the inquiry turns not on whether the government could or did interfere, but on whether the government actually succeeded in interfering with that particular businesses' operations). Since the MET status directly affects one of the elements plugged into the applicable calculative formula for anti-dumping duties, lack of the status means that the exporter is charged higher duties. Therefore, there is a direct financial incentive for exporters to obtain the MET status through asserting that they, in particular, operate free of significant interference of their government. See Van Bael & Bellis, Brussels Monitor 3-4 (July 10, 2009).

[82] EU legal decisions, including the decisions of the Trial Court, are drafted [258] in a style different from that common to modern United States jurisprudence, especially in terms of their structure, limited citations to legal and factual sources and their terminology.

[83] Hence, in September 2004, that is, halfway into the Class Period asserted in the instant matter, the EU held that the CCCMC was setting minimum export price on behalf of the Chinese government and that Zhejian's personal export practices were subject to this price requirement.

> [Zhejiang] claims that it [made] its business decisions [on the basis of] supply and demand without significant State interference[, and] that [253] it negotiated prices at arm's length . . . . [Zhejiang] disputes the relevance of the . . . composition of its board of directors . . . . [Zhejiang also] observes that [the] 1998 amend[ment of a certain EU provision allowed for the possibility that a certain business entity in transitional economy such as China might operate under market conditions, and this provision was expressly enacted] to enable qualified Chinese exporters, however few they may be, to show . . . that they [operate in accordance with] market economy forces . . . .

Id. PP 45-78 (original brackets and quotation marks removed). Finding that Zhejiang sufficiently established that its own export of glyphosate was free from a substantial interference of the Chinese government, the Trial Court explained its conclusion as follows:

> [The issue here is solely] whether the . . . actions by the State . . . render [Zhejiang's] decisions incompatible with market economy conditions . . . . [Consequently], State control, as established in this case, [may be not] incompatible with the taking of commercial decisions by [Zhejiang. Here, Zhejiang] claims . . . that it showed that its export prices were freely set on the sole basis of [254] commercial considerations [because] the Chinese glyphosate [exporters] agreed among themselves on the need for guided export pricing in order to minimi[z]e the risks of anti-dumping [actions] in foreign markets[; and t]he CCCMC's role in that regard was to facilitate such coordination and provide the services of a secretariat. . . . [Zhejiang] claims that . . . all [Zhejiang's] export contracts[, since at least September of 2004, were approved] by the CCCMC[] regardless of price, and, therefore, that the alleged minimum export price was not binding . . . so far as [Zhejiang] was concerned. . . . Finally, [Zhejiang] claims that [even if it were possible that] the CCCMC could refuse to [approve] an export contract because of the price, that possibility could not, in view of [Zhejiang's own export] practice . . . justify the refusal of [Zhejiang's] request for [the MET status, because a] right of veto without any use of that right cannot constitute [a] significant State interference [with respect to Zhejiang]. In response, t]he Council contends . . . that there was a very efficient control system in place, that it was run by [China] through the CCCMC and customs authorities and [the very [255] existence of that system] constituted interference by [China] in the setting of [Zhejiang's] export prices. . . . [T]he fact that the CCCMC [approved Zhejiang's] contracts in which the price was lower than the [minimum] price is irrelevant [since Zhejiang concedes that] all export contracts had to be submitted to the CCCMC, which checked the selling prices and [approved] the contract if the selling price exceeded the [minimum] price[, plus] [*408] China directed the Chinese customs authorities not to permit exports . . . unless the contract bore the CCCMC's [approval. In sum, the fact] that . . . the CCCMC was . . . entitled to refuse [approval of] a contract wh[ich] price was lower than the [minimum] price [in and of itself indicated the power of the CCCMC] to ensure . . . the pricing of Chinese glyphosate exports[, including Zhejiang's. Zhejiang] does not dispute that [this CCCMC's approval and veto] mechanism . . . exists [but it] maintains, however, . . . that such mechanism [is] not inconsistent with the criterion [applied by the EU grant to the grant of the MET status. Zhejiang stresses that the] CCCMC [should be deemed] a non-governmental body [in light of the statement to that effect [256] in] the CCCMC's brochure [and because compliance with the CCCMC's guide] price . . . was not enforced either by the government, or by the CCCMC [against Zhejiang. Therefore, in Zhejiang's practice,] the CCCMC's role [was] only [to note] the contract price, enter[] it in a database for statistical purposes and [approve] the contract [after that ministerial task. The lack of enforcement of minimum price by the CCCMC was verified by the fact that, in] 200 sales . . . investigat[ed by the EU for Zhejiang Xinan], the average price was below the [minimum] price [set by the CCCMC. In light of the fact that the Council] never challenged [Zhejiang's] statements that the CCCMC was a non-governmental body and [the Council also] did not take issue with [Zhejiang's] statements that . . . the glyphosate [exporters] themselves . . . took the initiative in establishing the system [of the minimum price, the Trial Court concluded that Zhejiang should qualify for the MET status, finding, inter alia,] the CCCMC's role [in Zhejiang's price control was] not sufficient [to conclude otherwise].

Id. PP 79-136 (original brackets and quotation marks removed).

The goal of the parties' debate over Zhejiang Xinan is not entirely clear to this Court. Since the Trial Court is not a tribunal whose decisions could be binding on this Court, the value of Zhejiang Xinan for the purposes of the principle of stare decisis cannot be more than persuasive. However, since the case deals with a different area of law, different legal standard and even the focus of that standard, plus a different factual inquiry, any ruling "by analogy" would be unwarranted. Moreover, the Court cannot take judicial notice of anything related to Zhejiang Xinan, that is, short of the fact that such decision was actually entered: none of the Zhejiang Xinan litigants is a party to this action (i.e., the statements in the [259] CCCMC's brochure, even if true, cannot be deemed as an admission by the CCCMC, which was neither a party to Zhejiang Xinan nor is a party here), the evidence relied upon by the Trial Court is not before this Court, and -- to top it all off -- no detailed description of the factual matters considered by the Trial Court are given in the Zhejiang Xinan, that is, short of the statement that the CCCMC described itself as a non-governmental body in "a" brochure, and that the Council representing the EU failed to challenge the truthfulness of that statement. See Hinton v. Dep't of Justice, 844 F.2d 126 (3d Cir. 1988) (judicial notice is improper if a legitimate question exists as to the underlying source of the information); Oneida Indian Nation of New York v. State of N.Y., 691 F.2d 1070 (2d Cir. 1982) (same); accord Dashiell v. Meeks, 396 Md. 149, 174-75, 913 A.2d 10 (2006) (HN65[] matters of which judicial notice may be taken must include facts capable of verification by resort to sources); State v. Green, 890 So. 2d 1283 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 2005) (sources of a judicially-noticed fact must [*409] necessarily exist and be known to the court to enable even the very consideration of whether the fact is amenable [260] to judicial notice).

b. Proceedings Before the International Trade Administration

Unlike in Zhejiang Xinan, some statements made in the countervailing proceedings in Magnesite from China, ITA Matter No. C-570-955 (Preliminary Negative Countervailing Duty Determination, 74 Fed. Reg. 68,241 (Dec. 23, 2009)), appear to be amenable to judicial notice.

According to the ITA, the procedural history of Magnesite from China was as follows:

> On July 29, 2009 (i.e., three weeks prior to Plaintiffs' filing of their Opposition), the [ITA] received a countervailing duty . . . petition concerning [magnesite] from . . . China filed by Resco Products, Inc. ([i.e., by one of the two named Plaintiffs in the instant matter]). [Consequently, an] investigation was initiated on August 18, 2009. See . . . , 74 F[ed.] R[eg.] 42858 (Aug[.] 25, 2009) . . . . On September 15, 2009, the [ITA] selected Liaoning Mayerton Refractories Co., Ltd. ("LMR") and RHI Refractories Liaoning Co., Ltd. ("RHIL") as mandatory respondents in this investigation. See Memorandum [of] Sept[.] 15, 2009. On September 15, 2009, [the ITA also] issued the initial . . . questionnaire to the Government . . . of China (["China"]), LMR, and RHIL. [261] . . On November 5, 2009, [China] submitted a response to the initial . . . questionnaire . . . . Also on November 5, 2009, LMR submitted a response for itself and for its affiliate Dalian Mayerton Refractories Co. Ltd., . . . and RHIL submitted a response for itself and for its affiliates RHI Refractories (Dalian) Co., Ltd. (RHI Dalian) and Liaoning RHI Jinding Magnesia Co., Ltd. (RHI Jinding) . . . . On December 8, 2009, [the ITA] issued supplemental questionnaires to [China] and the respondent[s] . . . . On December 14, 2009, counsel for [Resco] met with [ITA] officials. . . . Also on December 14, 2009, [Resco] submitted further information regarding the provision of preferential loans [by China to magnesite-products] industry. . . . [In its petition to the ITA and/or during its December 14, 2009, meeting with ITA officials, Resco] alleged that [China] has established export quotas and a minimum acceptable export sales price (i.e., export restraints) for a number of raw materials, including three types of magnesi[te] used in the production of [the products at issue. According to Resco, a]ll [Chinese] exporters of magnesi[te] are subject to these export restraints, including the affiliated [262] and unaffiliated magnesi[te] suppliers of the [respondents named by the ITA]. Under this system, [Resco asserts, China] appears to rank "bids" received from exporters by price and quantity and then awards exporting rights to the companies that can command the highest export prices. In its response, [China did not deny the existence of governmental control over export price and export quotas alleged by Resco, rather China] stated that there [was] no basis under WTO rules to treat [such] export restraints as a countervailable [subsidy]. Moreover, [China] reported that the purpose of setting export quotas for magnesi[te was] to help regulate an exhaustible natural resource and protect the environment, as processing magnesi[te into, e.g., magnesium oxide] is an energy-intensive, high-polluting activity. . . . The [ITA] has issued a supplemental questionnaire requesting that [China] fully describe and document the process [of setting] that export quota and minimum acceptable export price. In addition, [the ITA sent] supplemental [*410] questions to the > respond[ents] request[ing] that each provide complete volume and value information. . . relevant to [that] analysis. . . . [Upon receipt of this [263] supplemental information, the ITA determined that] the countervailable subsidy rates for all . . . exporters [were] de minimis [regardless of the existence of the above-defined export restraints].

74 Fed. Reg. 68,241-49 (emphasis supplied).

Since Resco is a Plaintiff in this matter, and the ITA expressly clarified that Resco, either in its petition filed with the ITA or in its supplemental statements made for the record to the ITA officials, expressly asserted that Resco was basing its ITA claims on the facts that: (a) Chinese exporters of magnesite were subject to price export restraints, and these restraints applied to all Chinese entities dealing in magnesite-based products; and (b) the Chinese government system of export quota was directly tied to export prices, the Court finds it proper to take judicial notice of Resco's admissions made in Magnesite from China. [84] See *Jackson, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3960, at 18 ("HN66[] the court may take judicial notice of . . . admissions in pleadings and other documents in the public record filed by a party in other judicial proceedings that contradict the party's factual assertions in [the instant] action") (quoting Harris, 202 F. Supp. 2d at 173), [264] and citing Munno 391 F. Supp. 2d at 268) (internal quotation marks omitted).

3. Antitrust Proceedings

a. Proceedings in the Western District of Pennsylvania

Resco is no stranger [265] to litigation. The magazine Industrial Minerals, seemingly identified as Plaintiffs' data source through their reliance on Lamb's Report (which, in turn, relied on Industrial Minerals data, see supra note 34 of this Opinion), provides the following headlines (and accompanying articles) as to Resco's recent litigation endeavors: (a) "US Probes Refractory Dumping -- Resco Alerts USITC to Alleged Refractory [Product] Dumping by China and Mexico" (Jul. 30, 2009) (referring to the ITA proceedings other than Magnesite from China [85]); (b) "Resco revives magnesite case" (Apr. 1, 2009) (referring to the [411] instant matter); and (c) "Resco Bites Bauxite Dragon -- The US Refractory Producer Has Submitted an Amended Complaint Against Chinese Bauxite Suppliers" (Aug. 2009); etc. See <<http>>. This last entry seems to refer to a putative class action currently pending in the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania before Judge Joy Flowers Conti. See Resco v. Bosai Minerals Group, et al. ("Resco WDPa"), Civil Action No. 06-235 (JFC) (W.D. Pa.). [86] [84] Although this matter cannot be conclusively resolved on the basis of Resco's statements made in Magnesite from China, the fact that, with only three weeks difference, Resco asserted in its Opposition that no government-mandated system of price restraint exists with regard to magnesite-based goods exported from China (or that none was enforced, or that the prices were not tied to export quotas and the export bidding process), and yet asserted an opposite position in its petition filed with the ITA, brings Resco's objective good faith belief in question. HN67[] "The first prong of the test to determine if Rule 11 sanctions should be imposed is met if the complaint is frivolous, legally unreasonable, or without factual foundation, even though the paper was not filed in subjective bad faith. Aug. 25, 1992) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

[86] In its Resco WDPa action, Resco is represented by four attorneys (the United States Department of Justice, being seemingly invited by Resco's counsel to make an appearance in the Resco WDPa declined that invitation two months after the Resco

The procedural records of the instant matter and Resco WDPa are strikingly similar. Initiated five-and-a-half month after the case at bar, see Resco WDPA, Docket Entry No. 1, Resco WDPa was: [267] (a) triggered by a complaint virtually identical, in its substantive respects, to the Original Complaint in this matter; and (b) then lingered in extensions of time until Resco's filing of a motion for default judgement, see id. Docket Entry No. 42, which raised the service of process issues and Judge Conti's denial of default. See, generally, id. Docket Entries Nos. 1-88. On July 13, 2009, Judge Conti granted Resco leave to file amended complaint. See id. Docket Entry No. 90. The amended complaint followed, mimicking in all substantive respects the Amended Complaint currently before this Court. See id. Docket Entry No. 92. On October 7, 2009, defendants in Resco WDPa filed motions: (a) seeking dismissal of Resco's amended complaint on the grounds of the act of state and government compulsion doctrines; (b) raising an argument as to lack of jurisdiction grounded on the defendants' lack of minimum contacts with the United States (since the Resco WDPa defendants were exporters rather than importers), [87] see id. Docket Entries Nos. 98-101; see also Docket Entries Nos. 102-109 (supporting exhibits); and (c) requesting stay of discovery. See id. Docket Entry No. 121. Stay of discovery has [268] been granted, see id. Docket Entry No. 125, and the dismissal motions are pending decision.

Perhaps the most remarkable aspect of Resco's opposition to the dismissal motions filed in Resco WDPa and Plaintiffs' Opposition in the instant matter is the striking, nearly cut-and-paste, similarity of plaintiffs' arguments in both matters. Compare Resco WDPa, Docket Entry No. 117 to Instant Matter, Docket Entry No. 105. While the arguments with respect to the FTAIA and the "minimum contacts"-based subject matter jurisdiction differ due to the distinction in the underlying law (although both oppositions sought to establish a relaxed "involving importation" test and "directness" through sales to alleged American intermediaries and/or American buyers), the arguments presented here and in Resco WDPa with regard to abstention repeat each other almost verbatim. Compare Resco WDPa, Docket Entry No. 117 to Instant Matter, Docket Entry No. 105. Effectively, the sole distinction between the instant matter and Resco WDPa is that, in Resco WDPa, the challenge lies [269] against Chinese exporters of bauxite-based products (that are members of the bauxite section of the CCCMC), while here the [*412] challenge lies against Chinese exporters of magnesite-based products (that are members of the magnesite section of the CCCMC).

All other aspects are effectively the same, i.e., Resco asserted that the bauxite section of the CCCMC was a democratic and voluntary association of Chinese exporters of bauxite-based products that joined the CCCMC as a voluntary trade association and were free not to comply with any minimum price their section of CCCMC was setting but, nonetheless, somehow elected to enter into collusive agreements producing their own "cartel(s)," which were operating in a succession largely similar of the chain of "Cartels" alleged in this matter. See Resco WDPa, Docket Entry No. 92; Docket Entry No. 117, at 24-25. Peculiarly enough, the Resco WDPa defendants asserted -- in response to Resco's Resco WDPa claims -- a governmental regulatory scheme of the MOFCOM and CCCMC substantively identical to the scheme asserted by Defendants in this matter. Basing their position on the compulsive force of such governmental regulatory scheme, the Resco WDPa defendants, [270] too, asserted abstention stating:

> [T]o combat the perceived competitive evils of "low price selling," the Chinese government adopted, among others, regulations prohibiting exporters from selling commodities at "lower than normal" prices. [That regulation was the MOFCOM's] 1996 Interim Regulations on Punishment for the Conduct of Exporting at Lower Than Normal Price. . . . [Resco] concedes that [this] 1996 [MOFCOM's] regulation is currently valid [88] . . . [T]he WDPa was initiated, without making even an appearance and without filing any document). Two of Resco's counsel in Resco WDPa are also among Resco's counsel in the instant matter.

[87] In other words, the Resco WDPa asserted a point substantively analogous to that addressed by this Court under the FTAIA exporter exception.

[88] The [273] Resco WDPa defendants cite to their exhibit docketed as Docket Entry No. 103-5. Resco's Resco WDPa opposition concedes the current validity of this 1996 regulation but maintains that the regulation's reference to "lower-than-normal price [did] not require collusive pricing" reached under the auspices of the CCCMC. Resco WDPa, Docket Entry No. 117, at 16. The Court disagrees. See infra, note 121 of this Opinion, for discussion of this aspect.

> U.S. government has no doubt that the Chinese government continues to impose both quantity and price controls on bauxite exports, in violation of China's WTO obligations, as part of "pursuit of industrial policies that rely on excessive . . . government intervention intended to promote or protect China's domestic industries."[] These measures led the USTR last June to request consultations with China. . . . [Moreover, o]n November 9, 2009, dissatisfied with the Chinese government's responses in the consultations, the U.S. requested the WTO to convene a panel to hear and decide whether China's bauxite export measures violate China's treaty commitments as a WTO member. The U.S. specifically charges that these measures are administered, [271] in part, through chambers of commerce:
> > China administers the export quotas imposed on bauxite, . . . through its ministries and other organizations under the State Council as well as chambers of commerce and [*413] industry associations, in a manner that restricts exports and is not uniform, impartial and reasonable. In connection with the administration of the quotas for these materials, China imposes restrictions on the right of Chinese enterprises as well as foreign enterprises and individuals to export . . . . China allocates the export quotas . . . through a bidding system. China administers the requirements and procedures for this bidding system through its ministries and other organizations under the State Council as well as chambers of commerce and industry associations, in a manner that restricts exports and is not uniform, impartial and reasonable . . . . China also imposes quantitative restrictions on the exportation of the materials by requiring that prices for the materials meet or exceed a minimum price before they may be exported. Further, through its ministries and other organizations under the State Council as well as chambers of commerce and industry associations, China administers [272] the price requirements in a manner that restricts exports and is not uniform, impartial, and reasonable.
> In support of these charges,. . . the U.S. cites the CCCMC charter [that is, the very document upon which Plaintiffs in this matter and Resco in Resco WDPa rely for their position that the CCCMC is a voluntary trade organization not being an arm of Chinese government] and [various Chinese] governmental measures [implemented through corresponding letters, notices and regulations.]

Id. Docket Entry No. 123, at 3-6 (emphasis removed in part) (citing: (a) documents filed as the defendants' exhibits in Resco WDPa and as exhibits of Defendants in this matter; and (b) Resco WDPa Docket Entries Nos. 123-2 and 123-4 (replicating the USTR Report and its Panel Request)). Since Plaintiffs seem to draw the Court's attention to Zheiiang Xinan in order to suggest the CCCMC's general modi operandi on the basis of the CCCMC's treatment of one member of the glyphosate section of the CCCMC, it appears logical to similarly consider the CCCMC's treatment of its entire bauxite section as an indication of the CCCMC's general modi operandi with regard to all members of the CCCMC, including Defendants.

b. Vitamin C Proceedings

If the Court were to look for a matter informative as to the general modi operandi of the MOFCOM and its "chambers of commerce," one of which is the CCCMC, the Court would be hard pressed to find proceedings more enlightening than Vitamin C, Civil Action No. 06-md-1738 (DGT) (E.D.N.Y.). Much like Resco WDPa, the gist of the Vitamin C controversy is strikingly similar to the matter at hand. [89] On November 6, 2008, Judge David G. Trager, presiding over Vitamin C, issued an opinion summarizing the claims, defenses and the then-docketed documentary evidence, as well as Judge Trager's concerns and conclusions, as follows:

> [The p]laintiffs in [the Vitamin C] case allege that defendants, Chinese corporations that manufacture and [274] sell vitamin C, formed an illegal cartel to fix prices . . . for exports of vitamin C . . . to the United States.

[89] Two of Plaintiffs' counsel in this matter also represent the plaintiffs in the Vitamin C litigation, and one of these attorneys [282] is also Resco's counsel in Resco WDPa. Moreover, one of Resco's counsel in Resco WDPa is also among counsel for Animal Science (the other of the two named Plaintiffs in the instant matter) in another action, Animal Science v. Hebei Welcome Pharm., Civil Action No. 05-453 (DGT) (E.D.N.Y.), which was joined by the Eastern District of New York with the Vitamin C, Civil Action No. 06-md-1738 (DGT) (E.D.N.Y.), proceedings.

. . . Defendants . . . move to dismiss[] on the grounds that their price-fixing activities were compelled by the Chinese government . . . . [The plaintiffs maintain that,] beginning in December 2001, defendants and their co-conspirators formed a cartel to control prices . . . of exports for vitamin C [under the auspices of their respective "chamber of commerce" dedicated to] Medicines and Health Products of China [*414] [("CCMHPC") and to] restrict quantity [of exported Vitamin C, and] to safeguard [their export] prices . . . [The p]laintiffs allege that . . . defendants' sales constitute . . . "virtually 100 percent of the manufacturers who can produce vitamin C for a cost below $ 4.50 to $ 5 per kilogram" [i.e., that the defendants' prices are the cheapest in the world]. . . . The complaints allege that [as a result of the alleged] collusive price increases . . . , prices remained substantially above [those that they should have been had Chinese vitamin C producers actually competed with each other. The defendants move to dismiss on grounds of act of state, foreign sovereign [275] compulsion and international comity. [In other words, the defendants do not deny the allegations in the complaints [as to their collusion for the purposes of price fixing]. Rather, they argue that their actions were compelled by the [MOFCOM, through the CCMHPC. The] defendants insist that this case may be properly dismissed at the pleadings stage because the [MOFCOM] has submitted an amicus brief detailing the [MOFCOM's] role in orchestrating and maintaining the vitamin C cartel. The Chinese government's appearance as amicus curiae is unprecedented. It has never . . . come before the United States as amicus to present its views. This fact alone demonstrates the importance the Chinese government places on this case. [The MOFCOM's brief states that the MOFCOM] is the highest administrative authority in China authorized to regulate foreign trade, and is the equivalent in the Chinese governmental system of a cabinet level department in the U.S. governmental system. The [MOFCOM states] that [the CCMHPC] is an entity under the [MOFCOM's] direct and active supervision that plays a central role in regulating China's vitamin C industry. [The MOFCOM also points out that, i]n contrast to the [276] voluntary, non-governmental chambers of commerce that exist in the United States, chambers of commerce in China have played a central role in China's shift from a command economy to a market economy. In particular, the [MOFCOM] asserts that the [CCMHPC] stepped into the shoes of stated-owned national exporting entities when those entities stopped regulating exports of pharmaceutical products, including vitamin C [prior to China entering the endeavor of transitioning away from pure command economy. The CCMHPC] had its origins in 1991, when the [MOFCOM] promulgated Measures for Administration over Foreign Trade and Economic Social Organizations[("Measures"); these] Measures dictate that ["s]ocial organization[s"] established with coordination and industry regulation functions as authorized by [the MOFCOM] must implement the administrative rules and regulations relating to foreign trade and economy. The [MOFCOM] represents that the [CCMHPC] was one of those ["]social organizations["] authorized to implement rules and regulations, thus imbuing it with governmental regulatory authority. Indeed, the [MOFCOM] asserts that the [CCMHPC] act[s] in the name, with the authority, and under active [277] supervision of the [MOFCOM], thus performing a governmental function so authorized under Chinese law. The . . . Measures further provide . . . that the [MOFCOM] shall be directly responsible for the daily management of social organizations established with coordination and industry regulation functions. In 1997, the [MOFCOM] and State Drug Administration . . . issued a notice . . . requiring . . . the [CCMHPC] [*415] to . . . coordinate . . . export market [and] price . . . [and] explain[ing] that [t]he specific method for coordination shall be formulated by the [CCMHPC], and filed [with the MOFCOM] for [the] record. In 1998, the [MOFCOM approved the CCMHPC's request to establish a vitamin C section and] declared that the major responsibilities of [that section would be]: to be responsible for coordinating the Vitamin C export . . . price . . . . [This section's] charter . . . provides that [it had to] coordinate and administrate market [and] price . . . of [v]itamin C export [and] requires [its] members to strictly execute export coordinated price set by the [CCMHPC] and keep it confidential. [In addition, t]he charter provides for sanctions for failure to perform any member's obligation, [278] [such sanctions included various measures, up to] revocation of . . . membership. In describing the ultimate penalty for non-compliance, the charter notes that the [section would] suggest to the competent governmental department, through the [CCMHPC], to suspend and even cancel the . . . export right of such violating member. In 2002, the [MOFCOM] changed the method of price review in order to accommodate the new situations since China's entry into WTO. The new regulation subjected 30 categories of export products (including vitamin C) to [p]rice [v]erification . . . by their respective chambers . . . The [verification] procedure . . . [required] exporters to send the[ir] export contracts to the relevant chambers for verification before [completing their c]ustoms declaration. [The department of c]ustoms [was obliged to] only allow for export those shipments that [were] accompanied by export contracts with the required [verification. In light of the foregoing, the MOFCOM] > argue[s] that [the] defendants were compelled under Chinese law to collectively set a price for vitamin C exports. Although [the MOFCOM is] careful to note that [the MOFCOM] itself did not decide what specific prices [279] should be, [it] assert[s] that [the] defendants could not have exported vitamin C that did not conform to the agreed-upon price. . . . [The p]aintiffs attack the exhibits attached to the [MOFCOM's] brief as mere notices [rather that "laws"] and charter documents of [the CCMHPC, which, they claim is a] nongovernmental organization. . . . They note, furthermore, that the price collusion [asserted] began in December 2001, long after the [CCMHPC and the vitamin C section] were established and purportedly compelled to set prices. [The plaintiffs assert] that [the] defendants' price agreements were voluntary [because the defendants] were able to reach a self-regulated agreement [which should mean that the defendants had control over the] export prices. [In other words, the plaintiffs assert that, if defendants reached the price requirement by a] self-restraint[, it must mean that they did it] without any government intervention. . . . The [MOFCOM] argues that [a reference to a self-restraint] should not be taken at face value [because such terms as self-regulation and self-restraint, etc. are] many of the terms [that] have meanings in the context of China's government and economic policy [280] that are quite different from their literal translations [and American perceptions as to the meaning of these concepts]. Among the controversial terms are [such terms as] social organization, voluntary self-restraint, coordination, industry self-discipline, and verification. [The p]laintiffs [however,] rely on [the opinion of their] expert in Chinese law, Professor . . . Feinerman [("Feinerman")], [*416] who [opined] that defendants' conduct was not compelled by Chinese law [because] many of the [MOFCOM's] exhibits [did] not contain a [certain stamp, and because these documents, in his opinion, should be qualified not as "real"] laws or regulations, [or as "real" laws and regulations but only if they were] not specific to vitamin C. . . . Feinerman note[d] that the document [addressing the creation of the vitamin C section] merely authorize[d but did not require] the creation of th[is] entity [and] point[ed] out that this reflected [his understanding of Chinese law, where anything] not expressly allowed would be prohibited, in contrast to the long-standing Western norm that anything not expressly prohibited is allowed. [Judge Trager found Feinerman's point questionably helpful to the plaintiffs' [281] cause, observing that, a]ccepting . . . Feinerman's characterization leads to the conclusion that a cartel in China could only exist with governmental sanction[, and that makes it] difficult to differentiate between a cartel that was [allegedly] voluntarily formed . . . and a cartel that was mandated by governmental fiat.

Vitamin C, 584 F. Supp. 2d at 547-55 (original brackets and quotation marks removed, citation to exhibits verifying Judge Trager's factual observations and case law citations omitted). Judge Trager, however, denied the defendants' motion to dismiss finding that "[i]t [was] not clear from the record [accumulated] at th[at] stage . . . whether defendants [themselves, that is, the exporters of vitamin C] were performing a government function, [or] whether they were acting as private citizens pursuant to governmental directives or whether they were acting as unrestrained private citizens. . . [Simply put,] the record[,] as it st[ood, was] simply too ambiguous to foreclose further inquiry into the voluntariness of defendants' actions." [90] Id. at 559.

[90] Plaintiffs assert that Judge Trager reached his decision to deny the defendants' motion because the act-of-state and government compulsion "defenses rest on facts that are not found within the complaints -- namely, [that] the Chinese government required defendants to fix prices in violation of the Sherman Act," and such inquiry "could not be resolved at the motion to dismiss stage even after limited discovery." Opp. at 64 (quoting Vitamin C, 584 F. Supp. 2d at 555-56). Plaintiffs misread Judge Trager's decision. Had Judge Trager found the inquiry into the evidentiary material submitted by the Vitamin C defendants and amicus not a viable ground for dismissal, he would have ended his decision at page 11 and footnote 6, skipping the remaining 25 pages of his opinion. See [283] Vitamin C, Civil Action No. 06-md-1738 (E,D.N.Y.), Docket Entry No. 338. In light of the content of Judge Trager's footnote 6 and the context in which it was entered, it appears that Judge Trager merely observed the general rule that a Rule 12(b) motion is a motion on pleadings, i.e., a motion on what is alleged in the plaintiff's complaint. However, Judge Trager did not directly address the issue of subject matter jurisdiction (since the defendants in Vitamin C did not raise a FSIA-based challenge) or the prudential considerations of judicial economy associated with resolution of claims substantively intertwined with the FSIA. Moreover, Judge Trager's discussion did not involve the issue of judicial notice which allows the court consider evidence not made part of the plaintiff's submission at the motion to dismiss stage. See, e.g., *Jackson, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3960, at 18.

Since Judge Trager's issuance of the above-quoted decision, the MOFCOM filed another amicus statement, dated August 31, 2009, reading as follows: [91]

> [The MOFCOM] authorizes its Department of Treaty and Law to respectfully submit this [s]tatement ([reproduced [*417] herein in Chinese sinographs and submitted] together [284] with an authorized English translation). [The MOFCOM] has attached great importance to the antitrust litigation in the United States. . . . [The MOFCOM] would like to . . . reiterate here that the alleged conduct by the defendant[s who are] Chinese . . . exporters is the result of the defendants' performing their obligations to comply with Chinese laws, rather than conduct on their own initiative. In order to prevent self-destructive competition through distorted pricing by Chinese exporters caught unprepared for the drastic change of China's export policies, and to mitigate potential exposures to antidumping investigations in other countries against Chinese exporters, the [MOFCOM] took active measures by exerting export regulation over certain commodities that might encounter or have encountered such problems. Although different regulatory measures may have been implemented in line with changes of circumstances at different times, enterprises in regulated industries were nevertheless compelled to comply with relevant rules and regulations, or they would otherwise be subject to penalties. The actual specific measures taken by China to effect its regulatory policies include what is [285] referred to as a "system of self-discipline." This system has a long history in China and has been well known to, and complied with by, Chinese companies. Self-discipline does not mean complete voluntariness or self-conduct. In effect, self-discipline refers to a system of regulation under the supervision of a designated agency acting on behalf of the Chinese government. Under this regulatory system, the parties involved consult with each other to reach consensus on coordinated activities for the purpose of reaching the objectives and serving the interest as set forth under Chinese laws and policies. Persons engaged in such required self-discipline are well aware that they are subject to penalties for failure to participate in such coordination, or for non-compliance with self-discipline, including forfeiting their export right. . . . The [MOFCOM] authorized and instructed the [CCMHPC] and its Vitamin C [section] to implement relevant policies related to the export of vitamin C products. Embodied in the [MOFCOM's] delegation of authority to the [CCMHPC] were industry regulatory functions and powers as well as necessary enforcement measures. [The] exporters were thus subject to the [286] regulation by the [CCMHPC], including compliance with the [CCMHPC's] requirements of self-discipline, the very purpose of which was to coordinate each exporter's behavior. No . . . exporter could ignore these policies, nor could they abstain from such coordination with regard to export price and production volume when asked to by the [CCMHPC]. The self-disciplinary system of export coordination also includes meetings and discussions between and among the parties subject to the [CCMHPC's] direction and supervision, and reaching agreements among themselves on taking appropriate actions in the interest of the country as a whole. Participation in such discussions, taking a vote and conducting other similar activities to reach their final consensus constitutes an integral part of the self-discipline process. [The] exporters must comply with the above procedures and the agreements reached in compliance with such procedures; otherwise, the [CCMHPC] would be required to exercise its power to penalize those who were in violation of such procedures and agreements. The [MOFCOM] has read the report issued by plaintiffs' expert, [and] believes that statements of representatives of the [MOFCOM] [287] and other [*418] government agencies, with regard to China's market economy status, and remarks regarding Chinese companies setting price and production volume according to the principle of market demand, quoted by [the plaintiff's expert] were made in a different context -- one that had nothing to do with export price regulations -- and were general descriptions of the current status of China's market economy presented in a special context. These general descriptions are irrelevant to the present case and should not be deemed as explicit or implicit statements of China's abandonment of its . . . regulatory policies over certain designated industries . . . , or of China's waiver of its power to continue to regulate according to Chinese . . . law. The [MOFCOM] believes that maintaining its regulation in a limited manner (such as its regulation over . . . export [of certain goods]) is consistent with China's national goal of establishing a socialist market economy.

[91] The documents filed in the Vitamin C proceedings which the Court finds worthy of mentioning but not amenable to judicial notice are accompanied by appropriate clarifications.

E. The FSIA Appears Relevant [288] as to Some Defendants

Here, Plaintiffs concede that Defendant Minmetals and Defendant Sinosteel are fully owned by the Chinese government and, hence, are instrumentalities of China. See Opp. at 43. Plaintiffs simultaneously assert -- and Defendants seem to concede -- that Defendants China National Minerals, Sinosteel Trading and Liaoning Jiayi Metals & Minerals are not directly owned by the state; rather, they are either subsidiaries of Minmetals and Sinosteel or privately owned. Thus, there seems to be no dispute among the parties that the FSIA-based presumption of immunity applies to Defendants Sinosteel and Minmetals. Rather, the disagreement between the parties focuses on the reach of the "commercial activity" exception which, as both sides seem to concede, is interpreted broadly and includes such activities as trade/extraction of minerals, i.e., the business activities of the Defendants. See, e.g., Behring, 475 F. Supp. at 390.

As the Court noted supra, HN68[] the most commonly invoked form of the "commercial activity" exception is based on the claim that the activities at issue were carried on in the United States. See 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(2). However, subsection (a)(2) (i.e., the subsection [289] dealing with various forms of "commercial activity" restoring federal jurisdiction by invalidating the presumption of immunity) sets also two other forms of "commercial activity" removing immunity. Specifically, under these two additional options, the grant of immunity is also unwarranted if "the action is based upon[: (a)] an act performed in the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere; or [(b)] upon an act outside the territory of the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere and that act causes a direct effect in the United States." Id.

Plaintiffs maintain that the Court has jurisdiction under the option "(a)" because Defendant "Minmetals has directly sold and continues to sell magnesite products to U.S. companies and in U.S. commerce. And [Defendant] Sinosteel conspired with [other] Defendants to fix the export price to the United States and, in fact, is on the Standing Committee of the CCCMC. [92] The commercial activity of [Defendants] Minmetals and Sinosteel[,] thus[,] had a direct effect on U.S. commerce[,] and the FSIA[-based immunity] is inapplicable." [93] Opp. at 42-43.

[*419] This assertion is both legally and logically flawed. As the Court already explained in its discussion of the [291] FTAIA, HN69[] the Court's jurisdiction over an exporter cannot depend on whether an American purchaser (be it an intermediary or a purported end-consumer) elects to actually bring the exporter's goods into the United States or "diverts" these goods to another country: the reach of the United States jurisdiction cannot depend on the whim of the purchaser who is free to create his own injury by first deciding whether the purchased goods cross -- or get consumed after crossing -- a particular meridian, and then filing a suit against the exporter who has no meaningful control over the purchaser's business elections (or over the purchaser's choice not to act in accordance with its contractually non-binding representations that might have been made to the exporter at the time of the exporter's sale of goods). And, indeed, one's entry into a "conspiracy" or one's "sitting on a committee" cannot qualify as one's "commercial activity" of the type in which a private party engages for the purposes of "trade

[92] Sinosteel points [290] out that Plaintiffs' exhibit allegedly showing that Sinosteel is on the Standing Committee of the CCCMC actually lacks such information. See S/Reply at 18.

[93] Given Plaintiffs' stretch of logic, the Court is not entirely clear as to Plaintiffs' preference of the option "(a)" over the option "(b)". If Plaintiffs assert that the FSIA-based immunity is inapplicable because Defendants' goods were sold in China but, allegedly, used in the United States, or because Defendants' conspiracy allegedly affected the prices of goods used in the United States, then any usage/consumption of Defendants' goods in the United States could just as well be qualified as "an act performed in the United States in connection with [Defendants' export sales in China, which could be just as well qualified as] a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere," thus yielding an option "(b)" scenario. In sum, Plaintiffs' position, taken to its logical conclusion, removes the FSIA-based immunity from any foreign state's activity, provided there is an American usage/consumption of that foreign state's goods.

and traffic or commerce," see Weltover, 504 U.S. at 614, this is so regardless of how broadly the term "commercial activity" is defined by the FSIA legislative history and case law. [94]

However, regardless of incongruence of Plaintiffs' argument, the Court cannot ignore that HN70[] the language of the FSIA does envision jurisdiction based "upon an act outside the territory of the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere [if] that act causes a direct effect in the United States," 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(2). Hence, the Court, mindful of Defendants' obligation to meet the burden of establishing inapplicability of the "commercial activity" exception, cannot cease its inquiry upon Defendants' mere assertion that [293] they were instrumentalities of China.

As noted supra, HN71[] the meaning of "directness" under Subsection 1605(a)(2) was clarified in Weltover, 504 U.S. 607, 112 S. Ct. 2160, 119 L. Ed. 2d 394, and this "directness" is, seemingly, of the same nature (although, perhaps, of different magnitude) as that referred to in 15 U.S.C. § 6a(1)(A). See LSL Biotechnologies, 379 F.3d at 679. [95]

The Supreme Court in Weltover guide-posted the "directness" test by finding "little [*420] difficulty [to] conclud[e] that [the defendant's actions] had a direct effect in the United States" because New York was the contractually-designated "place of [the defendant's] performance." 504 U.S. at 618-19 (internal quotation marks omitted). This Court is reluctant to read Weltover as narrowly stating that the "commercial exception" restores the Court's jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' claims against the presumptively immune Defendants if -- and only if -- these Defendants' express contractual obligations required performance in the United States. See Weltover, 504 U.S. at 618-19 (stressing that [294] the difficulty of determining "directness" was "little" in a scenario of such express contract and, hence, suggesting that a less obvious connection to the United States than a contract directing the defendant's actual performance on American soil might still suffice to establish the requisite degree of "directness"). Consequently, in the event the focus (or, at least, the end-goal) of Defendants' business endeavors actually was a physical materialization of their goods on the United States soil, and Defendants acted in accordance with such goal, then a substantial contact/nexus between Defendants' business and the United States might be established, triggering the "commercial activity" exception. See BP Chems. Ltd. v. Jiangsu Sopo Corp., 285 F.3d 677, 686-687 (8th Cir. 2002) (suggesting a "substantial contact" test); see also Shapiro v. Republic of Bolivia, 930 F.2d 1013, 1018 (2d Cir. 1991) (same); accord Filetech S.A. v. France Telecom S.A., 304 F.3d 180 (2d Cir. 2002) (setting forth an analogous "nexus test"); NYSA-ILA Pension Trust Fund v. Garuda Indonesia, 7 F.3d 35, 38 (2d Cir. 1993) (same).

Consequently, in coherence with the Court's finding reached under the introductory clause [295] of the FTAIA, the Court would requiring Defendants to show that the presumptively immune Defendants were not a "main force" behind the transactions that placed their goods on American soil (as the term "main force" is explained supra, see note 54 of this Opinion) in order establish to the Court's satisfaction that the presumptively immune Defendants were not engaged in commercial activities restoring the Court's jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1605(a)(2). [96]

F. The Act of State Doctrine Does Not Warrant Abstention

[94] The nature [292] of Defendants' business activities, i.e., production/sale of magnesite-based goods, squarely qualifies as "commercial activities" under the FSIA, but Defendants' alleged "conspiratorial" meetings, partaking in administrative duties at the CCCMC, reports to and deliberations at the CCCMC, etc. fall outside of the realm of "commercial activities," even if Plaintiffs allege that the goal of such "extracurricular" endeavors was an increase in Defendants' business: the commercial character of the activity is determined by the nature of the defendant's conduct, not by its purpose. See 28 U.S.C. § 1603(d); Weltover, 504 U.S. at 615-616.

[95] It would be indeed anomalous if the conclusions reached by this Court under the FTAIA and the FSIA on the very same set of facts would, nonetheless, yield different results.

[96] Hence, the FSIA-based burden of the presumptively immune Defendants would be largely a mirror image of Plaintiffs' FTAIA-based burden.

The bulk of the parties' abstention-related arguments focus on the act of state doctrine, even though the doctrine is facially inapplicable to the case at bar. As noted supra, HN72[] the doctrine is, effectively, an inquiry into "a consequence of domestic separation of powers," W.S. Kirkpatrick, 493 U.S. at 404 (1990); Sabbatino, 376 U.S. 398, 84 S. Ct. 923, 11 L. Ed. 2d 804, and it directs the court to "dismiss the suit if its resolution would require the court to declare invalid an official act of a foreign sovereign." Gross, 456 F.3d 363. Although the law is unsettled as to whether [296] the doctrine is amenable to the FSIA's expansive definition of the term of "foreign state" (i.e., whether "instrumentalities," such as 100% state-owned entities, might be deemed a "foreign sovereign" for the purposes of the doctrine), it is well settled that the doctrine envisions a "commercial activity" exception, pursuant to which abstention is unwarranted as to the acts committed by foreign sovereigns in course of commercial operations. See Alfred Dunhill, 425 U.S. at 703-706; Williams, 694 F.2d at 302-305 and n. 2; see also Clayco Petroleum, 712 F.2d 404, 408. Hence, in no ambiguous terms, the [*421] doctrine mandates the defendant to make a direct connection between its sovereign status and the uniquely sovereign qualities of its activity being challenged, and allows no cross-matching. See, e.g., Callejo, 764 F.2d at 1114-1115. Here, however, Defendants try to do exactly that: they match themselves with the regulatory activities of the MOFCOM and CCCMC. See M/Mot. at 36; S/Mot. at 31-32; S/Reply at 21-22; M/Reply at 11-15. Specifically, Defendants' position can be reduced to the following chain of sentiments: (a) the Chinese government, operating through the MOFCOM and CCCMC, adopts [297] regulations and similar measures with regard to the export of magnesite-based goods; (b) Defendants' business actions comply with such governmental regulations and measures; and (c) since an inquiry into the validity of Chinese regulations shall be abstained from, Defendants' business actions shall similarly be left unexamined. See id.

Defendants mix apples and oranges. Defendants' business activities were purely commercial and not regulatory, [97] which means that, even if the broad construction of the phrase "foreign state" were borrowed by the act of state doctrine from the FSIA, all Defendants, including 100% state owned enterprises, would still be unable to establish grounds for abstention due to the operation of the doctrine's "commercial activity" exception. Simply put, the name of the principle is "act-of-state doctrine," not "act-because-of-state doctrine." Once Defendants add the preposition "because" into their argument, they are asserting the doctrine of government compulsion which, as Judge Trager aptly observed, "recognizes that a defendant trying to do business under conflicting legal regimes may be caught between the proverbial rock and a hard place where compliance with [298] [the requirements posed by] one country . . . results in violation of [laws of] another." Vitamin C, 584 F. Supp. 2d at 551. Therefore, abstention on the grounds of the act of state doctrine will be: (a) denied as factually inapplicable, if taken at face value; but (b) Defendants' position will be construed as a mislabeled argument seeking abstention on the basis of government compulsion.

G. Doctrine of Government Compulsion Appears Relevant

1. Preliminary Considerations

a. Concept of Compulsion through the Prism of Common Law

While the doctrine of government compulsion enjoyed few clarifications (short of the guidance provided in Mannington Mills and Timberlane Lumber), the legal principle of compulsion has been known to humanity since the Roman canon law, and became part of the United States jurisprudence since its inception in the British common law: being known as defense of duress, where the defense implied both lack of voluntary [299] conduct by the defendant and the resulting inequity of sanctioning the defendant for compliance with a compulsive force. See, e.g., Rick Bigwood, Coercion in Contract: The Theoretical Constructs of Duress, 46 U. Toronto L.J. 201, 206 (1996) ("the emphasis of legally cognizable coercion -- duress -- appears . . . to do with questions of 'freedom [of will]' or 'voluntariness' [and] with questions of . . . 'unfairness'"); Laurence A. Benner, Requiem for Miranda: The Rehnquist

[97] The only entity vaguely hinting that Defendants' activities were "regulatory" are Plaintiffs, since their Opposition stresses that Defendants partook in administration of the CCCMC and in CCCMC's coining of the minimum price applicable to magnesite export.

Court's Voluntariness Doctrine in Historical Perspective, 67 Wash. U.L.Q. 59, 93 (1988) (tracing the ancient history of defense of duress). The concept of common [*422] law duress has been summarized as follows:

> Duress is constraint of another's will . . . Persuasion amounting to a form of constraint can take various forms . . . Some forms of "economic duress" such as the threat of infliction of pecuniary loss, as in the case in which the actor threatens to obtain the other's discharge from his employment, may be ground for relief of an equitable origin and character . . . The early common law view that duress is restricted to imprisonment or threats sufficient to put a brave man in fear of loss of life or limb or of imprisonment [300] of himself or a member of his immediate family clearly does not apply. . . . [Rather, d]uress means a threat of [repercussion] that is intended to prevent and does prevent another from exercising free will and judgment in his conduct. [Duress] is commonly committed by an oral or written threat but may be accomplished by acts [conveying an unwritten and even unspoken threat of repercussion]. The test of what act or threat produces the required degree of fear is not entirely objective. The threat need not be one that would put a brave person or even a person of ordinary firmness in fear. [Rather, the personal circumstances of the threatened entity, as well as] the relation of [the threatened entity to the entity seeking to extract consent] and antecedent circumstances must all be considered. It is therefore not essential that a threat be made under such circumstances that a reasonable [entity] would believe that it will be executed, provided the threatened [entity] believes the [entity seeking to extract consent] has the means and intends to carry it out. However, in determining whether the fear that is essential for duress did in fact exist in a particular case, the trier of fact can [301] properly consider whether a reasonable person would be put in fear under the circumstances [present in the particular case at bar].

Restatement 2d, Torts, §§ 871, comment f; 892B, comment j. [98]

Reflecting on these tenets through the comity-driven prism of government compulsion doctrine, it appears logical to presume that the HN73[] defendant could successfully invoke the doctrine if (s)he shows that a reasonable entity standing in the defendant's shoes (that is, having a similar-to-defendant's understanding of the local legal, economic, political and cultural peculiarities, as well as being exposed to similar antecedent circumstances and current relation to the entity seeking to extract consent) would feel compelled to consent by the totality of these conditions. Conversely, it appears wholly illogical to factor in this [302] concept: (a) the socio-political and cultural perceptions of a foreigner; or (b) the concerns of an entity which is in notably different circumstances; or (c) the degree of bravery common only to bold risk takers. In other words, it appears unreasonable to obligate the defendant to either ignore the realities of his/her world or to take an excessive risk.

b. Concept of Compulsion through the Prism of Foreign Regimes

Reflecting on the position taken by Plaintiffs in this matter (which is substantively identical to the position taken by Resco in Resco WDPa and the Vitamin C plaintiffs), this Court surmises that the three key points of logical deducement [*423] Plaintiffs are aiming to foster are: (a) Defendants cannot be deemed "actually compelled" because Defendants concede that they partook in those aspects of the CCCMC's operations that led to systemic rendition and registration with the MOFCOM of the minimum price figure, i.e., because Defendants were de facto creating the numerical figure they claim they were compelled to comply with; (b) Defendants were not "actually compelled" because Defendants do not assert facts showing they actually suffered any negative repercussion for not complying [303] with the minimum price requirements, i.e., Defendants could have just as easily refused compliance, and could have done it with Zhejiang's rate of success; and (c) Defendants were not "actually compelled" because the minimum price requirement was only occasionally referenced in certain "regulations," "circulars," "measures," "notices" and oral statements of Chinese government officials/agencies (instead of being made part of a codified statute or, at the very least, instead of being expressly repeated in each new regulation, circular, measure, notice, etc., that dealt with Defendants' specific area of business operations) and, in addition, [98] Federal constitutional law provides a somewhat relevant test with regard to First Amendment retaliation: it requires the plaintiff seeking to state such claim to show, inter alia, that there is a causal link between the plaintiffs' activity at issue and the adverse action that the supervising official takes against him. See Rauser v. Horn, 241 F.3d 330, 333 (3d Cir. 2001).

Defendants were not "actually compelled" because the broad language of these prescripts utilized such terms as "self-discipline" or "self-restraint," which rendered these prescripts not as mandatory as a "real law" would be.

The Court finds each of these positions logically flawed. The fact that a certain natural or juridical entity fails to comply with the requirements of the legal regime, or that this entity succeeds at avoiding negative repercussions, cannot be read as a sign that the legal regime is not compelling, e.g., it would be wholly anomalous [304] to expect one to keep committing serious crimes as a means to establish the actual might of the penal code. Similarly, the unfortunate reality that a rather substantial number of individuals elects to disregard the prescripts of the penal code and commit crimes, as well as the even more unfortunate reality of some individuals' success at avoiding law enforcement, in no way renders the penal code less compulsory. Moreover, one need not focus on a crime as dire as murder (where the rate of detection and law enforcement is statistically rather high): the same sense of compulsion applies to less-publicized offenses, e.g., to shoplifting, where the rate of actual detection and law enforcement is statistically rather low, i.e., the very realization that an applicable prescript (with criminal penalties attached) exists causes the shoplifter fear of repercussions. [99]

Furthermore, law need not be actually codified in order to be a "real law" that may be enforced: for example, the common law of torts has been "codified" only in the Restatement of Torts, but the legal might of tort principles is present through the power of the injured party to act as a "private attorney general" and to rely on government institutions, i.e., the courts, to civilly penalize the wrongdoer; this is so [*424] regardless of the fact that certain victims of tortious conduct might -- and in fact do -- elect not to enforce their rights. [100] Likewise, it cannot [99] In addition, the fact that a certain prescript is rarely enforced or even has not been invoked for many years fails to reclassify the prescript into "not-law." For instance, the United States government relied on an 18th-century law on sedition to investigate the September 11 terror attacks. See <<http://www.cbsnews.com/stories/2001/11/09/terror/main317461.shtml>>. [305] Similarly, the Intelligence Identities Protection Act of 1982, 50 U.S.C. §§ 421-426, was enacted in 1982 but never invoked until 2003, when Valerie Plame's identity was leaked. See <<http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2003/oct/01/20031001-113800-2356r/>>. In the same vein, in 2001, a Mormon Fundamentalist was sentenced under Utah law that outlawed plural marriages since 1896, which has been barely invoked over the past decades regardless of the state officials' estimate that as many as 30,000 Utahans live in polygamy. See Valerie Richardson, Mormon Polygamist - and a Lifestyle - Go on Trial Today, Wash. Times A3 (May 14, 2001).

[100] The Court finds Plaintiffs' position that, in order to be "real law," a mandate must be reduced to a recent statute, executive order, agency regulation, etc. (i.e., a written statement issued by a government) unduly condescending toward foreign legal regimes structured differently from the system used in the United States, Europe, or akin. To illustrate, many prescripts of religious law (carrying, on occasion, very severe punishment for non-obedience) were originally orally stated many centuries ago -- often, in indefinite and largely aspirational terms selected by authors whose authority and even existence is hard to verify, or in terms attributed directly to the Almighty -- but, reduced to non-governmental writings centuries ago, they remain very "real law" till today, even though they have not been "re-enacted," republished or validated by government stamp, and even though they have been coexisting [307] with newer religious or civil prescripts rendered with regard to the same issues without reciting the contents of the older laws. The same applies with even more force to the countries where there is a complex interplay between civil, religious and local customary laws, many of which are unwritten but, nonetheless, enjoy the force of "real law" and entail very real sanctions. See, generally, Richard Frimpong Oppong, Private International Law in Africa: The Past. Present, and Future, 55 Am. J. Comp. L. 677 (2007); Christina Jones-Pauly & Neamat Nojumi, Legal Steps Toward National Reconciliation and Reconstruction of Afghanistan, 52 Am. J. Comp. L. 825 (2004); Ruth Lapidoth, The Fundamental Agreement Between the Holy See and the State of Israel, 47 Cath. U. L. Rev. 441, 462 (1998). As one judge in this District noted:

> The legal system in Saudi Arabia is fundamentally different from that of the United States. Western conceptions of the role that law plays in society, the legal process, and methods of legal interpretation, often mistakenly assumed to be universal in nature, are in many ways poles apart from those concepts in Islamic countries such as Saudi Arabia. . . . [T]he Saudi Arabia [308] legal system is governed exclusively by what is known as the "Shari'a," or divine law. In fact, there are no "laws" in Saudi Arabia other than Islamic law, and any supplemental rules promulgated by the Saudi government are actually considered regulations . . . . These regulations, issued under the authority of the King [and] the Council of Ministers, are valid only to the extent that they are consistent with Shari'a. The Shari'a is the product of several interrelated sources of religious authority. The doctrines comprising Shari'a are derived primarily from the Qur'an, the "Book of God." . . . Because the Qur'an commands adherents of Islam to obey the Prophet, the recorded examples of the acts and words of [306] be said that a prescript is not "real law," and its violation would not result in repercussions if the prescript is merely set forth in terms of a broad caution: not every type of prescript enacted by every legal regime in the world is open to the constitutional challenge of vagueness. [101]

Finally, one's participation in coining a legal/regulatory prescript does not render [*425] such participant exempt from the compulsion of the law (s)he helped to create. Indeed, had it been otherwise, all the legislators enacting state and federal statutes, agency officials crafting regulations, reporters [310] compiling the Restatements of Law, judges sitting on advisory committees, etc., would be deemed exempt from the reach of laws they helped to create. And, of course, it would be an error to automatically qualify a foreign prescript as non-mandatory on the grounds that a literal translation of a certain term employed in that prescript has non-compulsory connotations to an American ear in light of the socio-political and cultural peculiarities of United States life. [102] Rather, the law of the foreign sovereign has to be examined, with due consideration given to interpretative statements made by that foreign sovereign.

c. Deference to Statements Made by an Arm of a Foreign Sovereign

HN74[] Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 44.1 governs the judicial determination of foreign law. The Rule states that, in deciding issues of foreign law, the court may consider any relevant material or source, including testimony, [312] whether or not submitted by a party or admissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence. The court's determination shall be treated as a ruling on a question of law. See Nat'l Group for Communs. & Computers, Ltd. v. Lucent Techs. Int'l, Inc., 331 F. Supp. 2d 290, 294 (D.N.J. 2004). Moreover, the Rule provides courts with broad authority -- and, perhaps, even with an obligation -- to conduct their own independent research in order to determine the meaning of foreign law. [103] See id.; see also *Bel-Ray Co., Inc. [426] v. Chemrite Ltd., 181 F.3d > [Prophet] Muhammed, known as the "Sunnah," constitute an additional integral part of the Shari'a. In the centuries since the founding of Islam, Islamic religious-legal scholars . . . have produced opinions known as "fiqh" [that must, too, be factored in as law].

Nat'l Group for Communs. & Computers Ltd. v. Lucent Techs. Int'l Inc., 331 F. Supp. 2d 290, 294-95 (D.N.J. 2004); accord Mannington Mills, 595 F.2d at 1297 ("The legislation and policy of each nation is not likely to be the [309] same").

[101] For example, Canon 1 of the Model Code of Judicial Conduct merely states that "[a] judge shall . . . avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety," without either specifying the meaning of the phrase "appearance of impropriety" or consequences for a violation of the prescript; this broadly-termed Canon could be viewed as a United States counterpart of a foreign mandate directing exercise of professional self-discipline. Accord Brian C. Buescher, Out with the Code and in with the Rules: The Disastrous Nebraska "Bright Line" Rule for Conflict of Interest: A Direct Consequence of the Shortcomings in the Model Code, 12 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 717 (1999) (providing a thoughtful discussion of the grounds that might be utilized for questioning of a certain negative repercussion, which ensued from the Supreme Court of Nebraska's interpretation of the "appearance of impropriety" phrase).

[102] For instance, the phrase "Soviet Union" is composed of two words, the first of which, "soviet," literally means "advice, opinion, consultation." See V.K. Muller, Russian-English Dictionary 651 (1947). However, it would be wrong to claim that the decisions rendered by the Soviet Union upon its subjects were nothing but non-mandatory invitations to unite for consultations. Analogously, the phrase "Supreme Arbitration Court of Russian Federation" implies the Supreme Court of Russia, Commercial Part, a government body that has nothing to do with the process of arbitration, [311] as it is known in the United States (i.e., the "Arbitration Court" obtains jurisdiction on the grounds of the nature of disputes, not because the parties voluntary agreed to its jurisdiction, and its decisions are enforced as mandatory legal judgments and not open to the test applicable to arbitral awards). See <<http://www.arbitr.ru/eng/>>. This is so regardless of a multitude of United States legal articles, which are written by scholars who are well aware of the distinction but, nonetheless, utilize the literal translation "Arbitration Court," i.e., the phrase having very different connotations to an American legal ear. See, e.g., Robert Rothenberg, Tatyana V. Melnikova, Comparative Forms of Doing Business in Russia and New York State, 40 Am. Bus. L.J. 563 (2003); Hon. Sidney Brooks, The International Scene: Russia's March to a Market Economy Assisted by New Bankruptcy Law, Am. Bankr. Institute J. (1998).

[103] HN75[] Translations of foreign provisions, be they actually provided by the parties or obtained by the court from other sources, may be used by the court in its determinations of foreign law. See Grand Entm't Group, Ltd. v. Star Media Sales, Inc., 988 F.2d 476, 489 (3d Cir. 1993); Overseas Dev. Disc Corp. v. Sangamo Constr. Co., 840 F.2d 1319, 1324-1326 (7th Cir. 1988)

AMR Corp., 153 F.3d 5, 12-13 (2d Cir. 1998) ("We urge district courts . . . to determine issues relating to the law of foreign nations"). Moreover, the courts may extract from foreign legal material, see Access Telecomm., Inc. v. MCI Telcomms. Corp., 197 F.3d 694, 713 (5th Cir. 1999) and may even consider material that would be inadmissible at trial, see Sidali v. I.N.S., 107 F.3d 191, 198 n. 10 (3d Cir. 1997); as the Advisory Committee's Original Committee Note to Rule 44.1 clarified that "the ordinary rules of evidence are often inapposite to the problem [313] of determining foreign law and have in the past prevented examination of material which could have provided a proper basis for the determination," and the 1975 Committee Note to an amendment to Rule 44.1, further stressed that, even if not admissible under the Federal Rules of Evidence, evidence of foreign law is properly considered, "[s]ince the purpose of the provision is to free the judge, in determining foreign law, from any restrictions imposed by evidence rules . . . ." See 9-44.1 Moore's Federal Practice - Civil § 44.1 App.01 and App. 02. Hence, "differences of opinion among experts on the content, applicability, or interpretation of foreign law do not create a genuine issue as to any material fact" for the purposes of the court's review and final ruling. See Banco de Credito Indus., S.A. v. Tesoreria General, 990 F.2d 827, 838 (5th Cir. 1993) ("even differences of opinion on the content, applicability, or interpretation of the foreign provision may not be characterized as a 'genuine issue as to any material fact' under Rule 56") (citation omitted); Access Telecomm., 197 F.3d at 713 (differences of opinion among experts on the content, applicability, or interpretation of foreign [314] law do not create genuine issue as to material fact).

Moreover, HN76[] a foreign sovereign's admission of legal compulsion of its subjects might warrant a high -- often, nearly binding -- degree of deference, even if the admitted compulsion was based on what might be deemed, in American jurisprudence, a form of "unwritten law."

> [Here, "the Ministry] of Justice of the [Soviet Union] certifies that[,] by virtue of the laws of the organs of the Soviet Government[,] all nationalized funds and property of former private enterprises and companies, in particular by virtue of the decree of November 28, 1918 . . . , the funds and property of former insurance companies, constitute the property of the State, irrespective of the nature of the property and irrespective of whether it was situated [316] within the territorial limits of the [Soviet Union] or abroad." . . . [T]his official declaration is conclusive so far as the intended extraterritorial effect of the Russian decree is concerned. . . . [I]t is clear that the [lower] court ha[d] authority to consider [this declaration] even though [it was] rendered subsequently to the trial [and judicial] notice of [this declaration as an interpretation of] the foreign law [can be] taken. We conclude that this official declaration of Russian law [is] not only properly before the court . . . , but also that it has embraced . . . "written authorities" [*427] [even if] it was not "printed"[:] it would seem to be "other written law" of unquestioned authenticity and authority . . . .

Ilchert, 765 F.2d 877, 881-883 (9th Cir. 1985) (in determining the validity of customary adoptions under the law of Tonga, the court considered an interpretation adopted in an earlier case involving same legal prescripts). Although courts may be faced with varying translations of the same foreign statute or unauthenticated copies of foreign law, such discrepancies or lack of authentication does not prevent a Rule 44.1 resolution. See Pittway Corp. v. United States, 88 F.3d 501, 503, 504, n.1 (7th Cir. 1996) (determining the meaning of French statutes notwithstanding inconsistent translations); United States v. First Nat'l Bank, 699 F.2d 341, 344, n.2 (7th Cir. 1983) [315] (determining Greek law after concluding that variations in translations were not substantive); Ramirez v. Autobuses Blancos Flecha Roja, S.A., 486 F.2d 493, 497, n.11 (5th Cir. 1973) (reliance on unauthenticated copy of Mexican law did not violate Rule 44.1); Forzley v. AVCO Corp. Elecs. Div., 826 F.2d 974, 979, n.7 (11th Cir. 1987) (allowing usage of unofficial translation of Saudi Labor Law because there is no such thing as an "official translation" of that law).

[104] Considerations of "unwritten law" appear particularly pertinent to Chinese regulatory regime, which has a substantial history of so-called "drawer regulations." "['The drawer regulations'] are regulations . . . issued by various ministries [such regulations], even though not labeled secret, have not been publicly disseminated. They are kept in a ministry official's drawer, removed on one occasion, and left in the drawer on another . . . . [These regulations] may be applied with an inconsistency permitted by the lack of public disclosure." Michael W. Gordon, Of Aspirations and Operations: The Governance of Multinational Enterprises by Third World Nations, 16 U. Miami Inter-Am. L. Rev. 301, 334 (1984). China seems to be still in the process of eradicating this mode of administering Chinese law. See Vitamin C, 584 F. Supp. 2d at 549 (observing that "[t]he [MOFCOM] has been forthright public/guidelines/internat.htm>> ("DOJ Guidelines") ("Although U.S. antitrust jurisdiction extends to conduct and parties in foreign countries whose actions have the required effects on U.S. commerce, as discussed above, those parties may find themselves subject to conflicting requirements [317] from the other country (or countries) where they are located. . . . In these circumstances, at least one court has recognized [the] defense [of government compulsion], and the [DOJ] will also recognize it. There are two rationales underlying the defense of foreign sovereign compulsion. First, Congress enacted the U.S. antitrust laws against the background of well recognized principles of international law and comity among nations, pursuant to which U.S. authorities give due deference to the official acts of foreign governments. . . . Second, important considerations of fairness to the defendant require some mechanism that provides a predictable rule of decision for those seeking to conform their behavior to all pertinent laws. Because of the limited scope of the defense, the [DOJ] will refrain from enforcement actions on the ground of [government] compulsion . . . when . . . the foreign government [asserts that the compulsion at issue was made] under circumstances in which a refusal to comply with [its] command would give rise to the imposition of. . . severe sanctions. As a general matter, the [DOJ would] regard the foreign government's formal representation that refusal to comply [318] with its command would have such a result as being sufficient to establish that the conduct in question has been compelled, as long as that representation contains sufficient detail to enable the [DOJ] to see precisely how the compulsion would be accomplished under local law").

In the instant matter, the Court takes notice of the MOFCOM's statements [*428] (made in its capacity of a cabinet level department of the Chinese government) in the Vitamin [320] C proceedings. However, in light of the fact that these statements discussed not the operations of the CCCMC but those of its sister "chamber of commerce," the high degree of deference that seems to ensue from the holding of Pink and DOJ Guidelines appears unwarranted for the purposes of the case at bar. [105] However, it appears equally erroneous to wholly ignore these statements: a foreign sovereign's views regarding its own laws typically merit at least some degree of deference. Accord Karaha Bodas Co. v. Perusahaan Pertambangan Minyak Dan Gas Bumi Negara, 313 F.3d 70, 92 (2d Cir. 2002) (citing In re Oil Spill by The Amoco Cadiz, 954 F.2d 1279 (7th Cir. 1992) (per curiam) and Access Telecomm, 197 F.3d at 714)), cert. denied, 539 U.S. 904, 123 S. Ct. 2256, 156 L. Ed. 2d 113 (2003).

Here, the Court finds the facts and conclusions of Access Telecomm, instrumental [321] as to setting a pertinent "floor" with respect to the issue of the degree of deference. See 197 F.3d 694, reh'g, en banc. denied, 210 F.3d 365, cert. denied, 531 U.S. 917, 121 S. Ct. 275, 148 L. Ed. 2d 200 (2000). In Access Telecomm., the issue was whether the defendants' challenged conduct was compelled by Mexican law.

Specifically,

> [t]he defendants focus[ed] on . . . the [Mexican] Secretary of Communications and Transportation's [("SCT")] Official Circular Letter [("Official Circular"), which] condemn[ed certain] services in addition to "other similar or equivalent procedures with the same purpose" [asserting] that [all] such services are "rendered outside the legal provisions established by [Mexican] Federal Law on Telecommunications" [("MFLT Provisions)]." The way the Chinese system operates is that you have the state council and the state council is then composed of a number of key ministries. [105] It is unclear from the holding of Pink whether the fact that the MOFCOM's statements were addressed to Judge Trager rather than this Court should diminish the degree of deference since, in Pink, the statements by the Soviet Union were addressed not to the Supreme Court, which relied on the statement for its determination, but to a state court. See Pink, 315 U.S. 203, 62 S. Ct. 552, 86 L. Ed. 796.

> agency's interpretation of the laws which it administers and enforces, citing Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837, 104 S. Ct. 2778, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1984) [(that is, the decision detailing the degree of deference given, under various circumstances, by United States courts to United States agencies empowered to interpret United States law). The plaintiffs, [322] however, pointed out] that the [O]fficial [C]ircular[had] no legal effect [because,] in Mexico, only federal courts have the power to issue resolutions determining the legality or illegality of acts[, and a Mexican governmental entity other than the SCT had] the sole power to "establish and systematize" the legal criteria concerning the application of legal and regulatory provisions . . . . Recognizing the difficulty of interpreting foreign law, [the Access Telecomm. court noted that] courts may defer to foreign government interpretations [and pointed out that t]he Seventh Circuit reached this conclusion in deferring to an administrative agency in France[,] see Amoco Cadiz, 954 F.2d [at] 1312[where the Seventh Circuit concluded that "g]iving the conclusions of a sovereign nation less respect than those of [a U.S.] administrative agency [was] unacceptable" [being presented with the situation where] the Republic of France [itself] was before the court . . . . [In contrast, in Access Telecomm., t]he Republic of Mexico [was] not a litigant before th[e] [*429] court and neither is the SCT. [Moreover,] while the evidence in [Access Telecomm.] show[ed] that the SCT was empowered to enforce Mexican [323] law, it d[id] not. . . show that the SCT was empowered to interpret Mexican law. . . . For these reasons, [the Access Telecomm. court did] not feel compelled to credit the SCT's determinations [as to the meaning of MFLT Provisions] without analysis.

Access Telecomm., 197 F.3d at 714.

This Court finds the distinction drawn between an official circular issued by a governmental agency, which is a non-litigant, and a statement made by a litigating foreign sovereign instructive. Similarly, this Court finds the distinction drawn between an agency's power to merely enforce a regulatory provision and a governmental entity's power to promulgate or interpret a regulatory provision both valuable and highly relevant to the case at bar.

Since the two MOFCOM's statements were made part of public record by being filed in the Vitamin C proceedings ("MOFCOM's E.D.N.Y. Statements"), but neither China nor the MOFCOM are litigants before this Court, the MOFCOM's E.D.N.Y. Statements appear to have --for the purposes of this action -- worth and significance no lower than those of an official circular discussed in Access Telecomm. Moreover, since the bulk of evidentiary material presented in this matter (as [324] well as in Resco WDPa and Vitamin C) consists of actual regulatory directives issued by the MOFCOM (either singularly or jointly with other Chinese governmental agencies) rather than the MOFCOM's interpretations of Chinese law, it appears that the MOFCOM's E.D.N.Y. Statements warrant a higher degree of deference than that given in Access Telecomm. for the purposes of the Fifth Circuit's assessment of the SCT's interpretations of Mexican provisions not enacted or promulgated by the SCT: indeed, it would be unseemly of this Court to claim that it could determine the scope or the goals of the MOFCOM's directives (or the meaning of the terminology that the MOFCOM elected to use in these directives) better than the MOFCOM itself. Consequently -- for the purposes of reading the MOFCOM's E.D.N.Y. Statements -- the Court will consider the MOFCOM's interpretations the final authority unless the Court detects a Chinese legal provision or an alternative MOFCOM's statement that clearly and convincingly establishes the incorrectness of these interpretations.

In contrast, for the purposes of construing directives or statements made by other entities, (or for the purposes of assessing the MOFCOM's [325] perhaps supervisory but, nonetheless, still a third party's opinion as to the mode of operations employed by Chinese "chambers of commerce"), this Court will utilize an analysis recommended in Access Telecomm., 197 F.3d at 714, i.e., the Court will examine other evidence (presented in this matter and also detected by the Court) in order to establish: (a) whether there is an incongruence between such body of evidence and the interpretations offered in the MOFCOM's E.D.N.Y. Statements; and, in the event such incongruence is detected, (b) whether this incongruence is of such nature or magnitude to render MOFCOM's interpretations unreliable.

2. The CCCMC Is a Government Entity for the Purposes of the Doctrine

Plaintiffs cite Ungaro-Benages v. Dresdner Bank AG, 379 F.3d 1227, 1237 (11th Cir. 2004), for an inference that this matter is but a garden-variety proceeding because "[f]ederal courts adjudicate claims against foreign corporations every day." Opp. at 61, n. 24. This is not exactly true. The matter at bar falls within the handful of cases where, as Judge Trager observed, defendants do not deny compliance with a [*430] fixed minimum price but rather "move to dismiss[] on the grounds that their [326] price-fixing activities were compelled by the . . . government," Vitamin C, 584 F. Supp. 2d at 547, i.e., Defendants effectively admit to collusion thus making, at least in part, Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claim. [106]

Challenging Defendants' position, Plaintiffs maintain that Defendants were not compelled by the Chinese government because, inter alia, "[t]he CCCMC is not the Chinese [g]overnment." Opp. at 50-52. In support of that assertion, Plaintiffs state as follows:

(i) the Trial Court in Zhejiang Xinan "squarely rejected [the] argument [that the CCCMC is a government organization by] holding [that the CCCMC was] a non-government body that [327] is not directed or controlled by the government of China"; [107]

(ii) "the CCCMC has given testimony and submissions to the U.S. government stating [that it is not an arm of the state]";

(iii) the CCCMC charter, adopted at the CCCMC's formation in 1988, "[merely] states that the CCCMC follows state policies and guidelines and is subject to supervision by the state[, but this statement in the charter does not] establish the CCCMC as a de facto arm of Chinese government";

(iv) since Chinese "Measures" of 1991 were followed by Chinese "Regulations" of 1998, the former were repealed by the beginning of the Class Period, and overall "Chinese foreign trade regulations have undergone dramatic changes since 1991 and every law or regulation relating to exports has been abolished or amended[, so] the CCCMC now represents itself as a non-government organization"; [108] and

(v) the MOFCOM's Circular of February 12, 1998, "pre-dates the formation of two initial export cartels by two years and pre-dates the formation of the unified export cartel by three years[, as well as] China's accession to the WTO [during which] China explained to the WTO [that,] by 2000[,] there [was] only a limited number of products [328] subject to government price control[. Plaintiffs believe that, if the 1998] Circular applied to all export products and all chambers of commerce [then the Circular would be] mandating price-fixing of all exports by all chambers of commerce[, but s]uch an interpretation [would be] clearly contrary [to the] interpretation [given] by the CCCMC." Id. (emphasis removed). [109]

[106] A graph of the relationships between the CCCMC and its various "cartels" and "sub-cartels" of magnesite exporters sketched by the parties depicts a structure uncommon to the law of antitrust (which usually deals with polygon-like agreements typical to international treaties); rather, it resembles a structure frequent to 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961-68, where a hub-and-spoke combination may yield an organizational chart akin to an "exponential tree" (a graph common to computer science, which resembles a tree trunk with multiple levels of branches and twigs).

[107] This Court is not entirely clear as to Plaintiffs' logic underlying this argument. A claim that the CCCMC "is not directed or controlled by the government of China" cannot serve as a premise needed to draw the conclusion that the CCCMC is a "non-government body"; this is so because the conclusion is also the premise, since any sovereign can governmentally control/direct only its subjects, but not itself.

[108] The Court gathers from this argument that Plaintiffs read the 1991 "Measures" as supporting Defendants' position, although the Court is not entirely clear as to whether the Plaintiffs' reading is related to the CCCMC's status or the existence of compulsion, or both.

[109] The Court gathers from this argument that Plaintiffs read the Circular of February 12, 1998, as a document supporting Defendants' position, although [329] it appears that Plaintiffs' reading is unrelated to the CCCMC's status, since it addresses the other issue: compulsion.

[*431] The Court disagrees. Plaintiffs' arguments are either without merit or simply inapposite to the issue of whether the CCCMC is an integral part of the Chinese government.

Plaintiff's first argument is erroneous because the Trial Court in Zhejiang Xinan did not, actually, rule that the CCCMC is a non-government organization ("NGO"). Rather, the Trial Court found that Zhejiang, the plaintiff, perceived the CCCMC as posing no sufficient threat of punishment for failure to comply with the requirements the CCCMC issues or was empowered to enforce, and that personal perception and Zhejiang's actions in accordance with its perception entitled Zhejiang to the MET status. See Zheiiang Xinan, 2009 ECJ EUR-Lex LEXIS 529, PP 79-136. This is why the Trial Court in Zhejiang Xinan outlined the issue in that case as an inquiry into whether "[Zhejiang's business] decisions [were not so] incompatible with market economy conditions" to deny Zhejiang the MET status. [110] Id. P 80. Conversely, the Trial Court made no findings as to the nature of the CCCMC, either for the purposes of the entire [330] EU antidumping regime or for the purposes of passing a political judgement transferrable into any area of law of any nation in the world. [111] See generally, Zhejiang Xinan, 2009 ECJ EUR-Lex LEXIS 529. Therefore, the Court finds that the holding of Zhejiang Xinan has no bearing on the CCCMC's actual status, while the background discussion provided in that case vaguely suggests that the CCCMC was, and still is, an integrated appendage of the state.

In support of their second argument, i.e., that "the CCCMC has given testimony [*432] and submissions to the U.S. government stating [that it was not an arm of the state]," Plaintiffs rely on two exhibits. However, neither one of these exhibits contains any statement by the CCCMC suggesting that it is an NGO. One of these exhibits replicates the CCCMC's undated letter addressed, seemingly, to the United States Department of Commerce ("DOC") with the goal of assisting Chinese exporters in obtaining the MET status for the purposes of their United States antidumping duties. See Docket Entry No. 77-1, at 1-3. In that exhibit, the entire discussion of the CCCMC's "status" is limited to the statement "[w]e [333] are [the CCCMC]. With a membership of 4,000 [business entities], we are the largest and most representative association in the field of metals, minerals and chemicals." Id. at 1. Plaintiffs' other exhibit, Docket Entry No. 105-4, is another CCCMC's letter to the DOC, dated April 19, 2007; in that letter, the CCCMC was still advocating its MET point. That letter is equally silent as to the issue of the CCCMC's "status" as a government entity or as an NGO: rather, this document merely begins with a paraphrase of the statement already given by the CCCMC in the prior letter. See Docket Entry No. 105-4, at 2 ("On behalf of [the CCCMC] and our 4[,]000 companies, we submit the following comments on [the non-MET status applied by the DOC to the Chinese goods imported into the United States]").

[110] The Trial Court merely acknowledged that Zhejiang's perceptions of the CCCMC as an NGO were "borne out by the contents of the CCCMC's brochure," and that "the wording [of the brochure was such that it omitted to expressly] contradict [Zhejiang's] statements that the [price-fixing] mechanism was not imposed by the State," id. PP 141. 153, hence allowing the possibility of Zhejiang's qualification for the MET status.

[111] Indeed, a number of observations made by the Zhejiang Xinan court suggests against deeming the CCCMC an NGO. First, at least as of September 2004, that is, halfway through the Class Period in this matter, the EU consistently held that Zhejiang's business activities were under such strict governmental control that they were incompatible [331] with operations under free market conditions and, as part of this strict regime, "[the Chinese government] had entrusted the . . . CCCMC with the right [to approve export] contract[s upon] verifying export prices." Zhejiang Xinan, 2009 ECJ EUR-Lex LEXIS 529, P 14. Second, the Trial Court observed that such governmental powers of the CCCMC were well integrated with governmental powers of other Chinese agencies, see id. P 131 ("[Zhejiang concedes that] all export contracts had to be submitted to the CCCMC, which checked the selling prices and [approved] the contract if the selling price exceeded the [minimum] price[, plus] China directed the Chinese customs authorities not to permit exports . . . unless the contract bore the CCCMC's [approval] "), and these CCCMC's powers were operative at least as of the date of rendition of the Zhejiang Xinan decision. Consequently, the statements of the Zhejiang Xinan court: (a) reject Plaintiffs' claim that the CCCMC became an NGO by 1998 (or by 2000); and (b) indicate that the CCCMC exercised governmental power through the CCCMC's ability to approve or disapprove an export contract on the grounds of the export price. See id. PP 130, 140 (noting [332] that there was no dispute -- as to the system, in which the CCCMC was an appendage of the state, -- by observing that "[t]he Council contends . . . that there was a very efficient control system in place, that it was run by [China] through the CCCMC and customs authorities and [the very existence of that system] constituted interference by [China] in the setting of [Zhejiang's] export prices" and that Zhejiang "d[id] not dispute that [this CCCMC's approval and veto] mechanism exist[ed in 2009]").

Consequently, Plaintiffs' decision to rely on these two exhibits is not entirely clear to this Court, since: (a) these exhibits suggest the DOC's opinion that, at least as of April 19, 2007, the members of the CCCMC have been presumed by the United States government to operate under a Chinese government-compelled trade regime; but (b) these exhibits do not suggest that the CCCMC was an NGO. The Court, [334] thus, will disregard Plaintiffs' factually unsupported second argument. See also note 146, infra (discussing, inter alia, Plaintiffs' Exhibit 15, which -- although not cited in Plaintiffs' Opposition in support of Plaintiffs' second argument -- appears relevant to their point).

The logic of Plaintiffs' third argument, i.e., that the CCCMC charter "[merely] states that the CCCMC follows state policies and guidelines and is subject to supervision by the state[, but the charter] does [not] establish the CCCMC as a de facto arm of the Chinese government," is, too, not entirely clear to this Court because the CCCMC charter, being a document (that is, a stamped, signed and registered piece of paper) rather than a course of conduct (that is, a number of consistent overt actions manifesting relationships between the parties), cannot possibly establish anything de facto. [112] The Court, hence, presumes that Plaintiffs' usage of the phrase "de facto" is meant to express Plaintiffs' opinion that the CCCMC's governmental status was not "written between the lines" in the charter. If so, the Court disagrees.

The articles of the CCCMC charter provide as follows:

> [The] CCCMC is [an] authorized department to deal with import and export trade of metals, minerals and chemicals. It . . . is responsible for coordination within the industry. . . . The aims of [the] CCCMC include: coordinating import and export trade activities in the industry of metals, minerals and chemicals; maintaining import and export trade orders; protecting the legal rights and interests of the State, industry and member enterprises . . . . [The] CCCMC . . . carries out the state policies and [*433] guidelines in foreign trade and economic relations, and accepts guidance and supervision of the competent authority [e.g., the MOFCOM and other Chinese government agencies involved in export, e.g., the Chinese department of customs]. . . . Functions of CCCMC include . . . coordinating commodity prices for import and export; . . . [a]ssisting the competent authority in direction and supervision of member enterprises to manage and utilize their import and export quotas and permits legally; . . . [b]eing responsible for specific actions including the bidding for import and export quotas under the authorization of the [336] competent authority[;] . . . coordinating . . . the bargaining and bid for foreign customers[; and p]erforming other functions which are authorized by the competent authority. . . . Obligations of [the CCCMC's m]embers [are: a]biding by [the] CCCMC [c]harter and carrying out resolutions and regulations made by CCCMC; [t]aking part . . . actively [in] the work assigned by [the] CCCMC; [p]roviding relevant information, materials and statistical data for [the] CCCMC; [p]aying membership fees . . . . The . . . CCCMC shall have the right to . . . terminate the membership of any member who violates this charter or any regulations . . . . For anyone who commits serious violations, the competent authority may be advised to suspend or revoke part or all of its right to deal with import and export trade.

Docket Entry No. 99-11, at 2-3.

While it is true that this language does not contain a sentence expressly stating that the CCCMC is an appendage of the Chinese government, the gist of these statements suggests such governmental status by pointing out: (a) the integrated relationship between the CCCMC and the MOFCOM (and between the CCCMC and other bodies of the Chinese Government) typical for [337] a large governmental department and one of its agencies; and (b) the CCCMC's right to enjoy the powers of governmental nature, e.g., the power to allocate (and/or hold bidding for) export quotas with regard to China's natural non-renewable resources, [113] as well as the powers to supervise the use of export licenses, to recommend punitive measures for non-compliance and to partake in enforcement of such measures. Thus, the Court construes the charter as a document suggesting the CCCMC's status as a governmental appendage rather than an NGO.

[112] See Black's Law Dictionary 416 (6th ed. 1990) (defining the phrase "de facto" as "in fact, [335] in deed, actually").

[113] Although some natural resources are renewable, the resources falling within the province of the CCCMC appear non-renewable or renewable at great expense. For instance, magnesite is a non-renewable natural resource, and magnesium oxide, while being amenable to production from seawater, see supra, note 17, could be so produced only at substantial expense.

Plaintiffs' fourth argument consists of two groups of statements: (a) one group is asserting that, since China underwent certain economic changes since 1991, and the MOFCOM's "Regulations" of 1998 were issued after the MOFCOM's "Measures" of 1991, the "Measures" must be deemed inapplicable to the [338] CCCMC as of 1998 (or as of 2000) because "every law or regulation relating to exports [must be deemed] abolished or amended"; and (b) another group is limited to the contention that "the CCCMC now represents itself as a non-government organization." Docket Entry No. 105-1, at 51.

The "(a)" group of Plaintiffs statements appears unwarranted. Had all Chinese laws been abolished, China would, by now, be a lawless state. Similarly, the claim that "all" pre-1998 Chinese laws must be deemed amended by the mere promulgation of later-issued provisions is facially [*434] overreaching. Typically, a provision is deemed repealed or amended when a statement to that effect is actually made; otherwise, the newer law is deemed supplementing the older and construed with an aim to harmonize the two. Plaintiffs do not direct the Court's attention to any source stating that Chinese law does not follow this, rather basic, approach. See Sullivan v. Finkelstein, 496 U.S. 617, 623, 110 S. Ct. 2658, 110 L. Ed. 2d 563 (1990) ("the expression of a legislator relating to a previously enacted statute may bear upon the meaning of a provision in a bill under consideration . . . since statutes in pari materia should be interpreted harmoniously"); State v. Stoll, 84 U.S. 425, 431, 21 L. Ed. 650 (1873) [339] ("To justify this court in holding that the act passed in that year repealed or modified the [prior statute], it must appear that the later provision is certainly and clearly in hostility to the former. If, by any reasonable construction, the two statutes can stand together, they must so stand. If harmony is impossible, and only in that event, the former law is repealed in part or wholly"). Thus: (a) the fact that the 1998 "Regulations" were issued after the 1991 "Measures" in no way suggests that the regime set forth in the "Measures" was necessarily repealed, since no language in the 1998 "Regulations" so states; and (b) the content of the "Measures" [114] depict the CCCMC as a governmental agency operating as a limb of the MOFCOM and, hence, an appendage of China.

The "(b)" group is the statement asserting that "the CCCMC now represents itself as a non-government organization." Opp. at 51. In support, Plaintiffs cite Docket Entry No. 77-1, at 30-39, a United States Government Survey on Magnesium Compounds, issued with regard to the year 2000. See id. However, the Court's reading of Docket Entry No. 77-1 failed to locate any mentioning of the CCCMC, moreover an express statement as to how the CCCMC represented itself and to whom; [115] the sole relevant statement, which the Court detected sua sponte, reads, "[i]n spite of export licensing requirements imposed by the Chinese Government, magnesia exports from China to the United States continued to rise [throughout 2000]." Id. at 31-32 (emphasis supplied). Since the CCCMC charter indicates that the CCCMC enjoyed certain powers with regard to export licensing, the Survey's reference to the export licensing in the context of "the Chinese Government" suggests that the CCCMC was an appendage of China. Therefore, Plaintiffs' fourth argument appears without merit.

Finally, Plaintiffs' fifth argument -- that the MOFCOM's Circular of February 12, 1998, should be deemed repealed because, during China's accession to the WTO, China stated that it had only a limited number of price-controlled products, and the Circular could not have mandated price-fixing of all exports by all chambers of commerce ("Misplaced Argument") -- is wholly inapposite to the issue of the CCCMC being a government body or an NGO; rather, it addresses the issue of compulsion. Thus, the Misplaced Argument will be disregarded for the purposes of the inquiry at hand [*435] and addressed in the "Miscellaneous Considerations" section of this Opinion.

[114] The 1991 "Measures" stated that "[the MOFCOM] shall take charge of vocational administration of all . . . trade social organizations such as chamber of commerce, . . . which are organized within the territory of . . . China . . . in accordance with these Measures. [Such MOFCOM's] administration . . . will be either . . . direct . . . or [through MOFCOM's] authorized departments concerned [with the particular social] organizations." [340] Docket Entry No. 35-39, at 2.

[115] Plaintiffs' Opposition, unfortunately, did not direct the Court's attention to any particular page of this exhibit [341] and did not quote the language which Plaintiffs read as a support.

Since Plaintiffs' arguments (and evidence provided by Plaintiffs) neither establish nor even suggest that the CCCMC was/is an NGO, the Court turns to Defendants' evidence and evidence detected by the Court in Magnesite from China, Resco WDPa and Vitamin C.

In Magnesite from China, Resco (one of the two named Plaintiffs in this matter) represented to the ITA that the Chinese government established and enforced export quotas for a number of raw materials (including magnesite), and [342] that the Chinese government established a bidding system for such exports. See Magnesite from China, 74 Fed. Reg. at 68,248. Since the CCCMC charter unambiguously states that the CCCMC is the entity responsible for allocating export quotas and holding the bidding (including for magnesite), and Plaintiffs' allegations in Magnesite from China concede that these activities are performed by the "Chinese government," the content of Magnesite from China suggests an express admission that the CCCMC is, indeed, an appendage of the Chinese government [116] for the purposes of the instant matter, where Resco is also a Plaintiff.

The defendants in Resco WDPa rely on the USTR's November 9, 2009, Request for a WTO panel with regard to China's export practices; the Request [343] is: (a) asserting that the Chinese government administers export quotas and bidding for export quotas with regard to bauxite (one of the minerals falling within the province of the CCCMC's authority); and (b) clarifying that such measures have been administered by the Chinese government through Chinese "chambers of commerce." See Resco WDPa Docket Entry No. 123-4. Moreover, the USTR cited the CCCMC charter in support of its WTO charges against China. See id. Since the USTR, the agency responsible, inter alia, for recommending United States trade policy to the President and for coordinating trade policy within the United States government, unambiguously states its perception of the CCCMC's status as that of a government entity, the Court reads the USTR's WTO Request as strongly suggesting that the CCCMC is an appendage of China.

The documents provided by Defendants in the instant matter suggest the same. For instance, the MOFCOM's 1994 "Program on the Reform of the Administration of Licenses for Quotas of Commodities for Export" was addressed expressly to the "chambers of commerce," like the CCCMC, see Docket Entry No. 35-42, at 2, and designated such "chambers" as entities to hold export [344] bidding and allocate export quotas as to the country's natural resources, which suggests vesting of governmental powers in the CCCMC. See id. at 5-6. Similarly, the statement made by Assistant Minister Liu Xiangdong of the MOFCOM to the Third Congress of the CCCMC suggests the same, informing the audience that, being "overseen by Central Committee and State Council, guided by MOFTEC, . . . and supported by [other] departments [of Chinese national government and] local government[,] . . . [the] CCCMC has . . . taken many very effective measures to carry out state guidelines, policies and regulations . . . safeguard[ing the] interests of the state." Docket Entry No. 99-13, at 2. Since this statement indicates [*436] the CCCMC's power to execute (or partake in) export licensing, allocation of export quotas, holding export quota bidding and punishing for non-compliance with Chinese export regime, the Court reads these powers as strongly suggesting governmental nature of the CCCMC. See also Docket Entry No. 77-3, at 12-13 (Plaintiffs' exhibit replicating an article in the Industrial Minerals magazine, stating that, "[o]f critical importance was the introduction of control on export prices and [345] volumes by China's central government in 1994 . . . Export licenses . . . initiative is unique to China [since] China's central government, through the . . . CCCMC[,] implemented its export license system") (emphasis supplied); Docket Entry No. 35-57 (MOFCOM's 2001 "Measures for the Administration of Export Commodities Quotas" detailing the process of obtaining an export license and referring to the entities involved in the process of issuing a license as "bodies authorized by the MOF[COM]"); Docket Entry No. 35-57, at 3 (MOFCOM's 2001 "Measures for the Invitation of Bid for Export Commodity Quotas" directing that the "offices for the invitation for bid for export commodity quotas [shall be set] within the relevant chambers of commerce for import and export according to the types of commodities subject to the invitation for bid").

[116] Notably, since Magnesite from China was a countervailing -- rather than anti-dumping -- proceeding, the Court cannot factor in the possibility that Resco, being the petitioner in Magnesite from China, "accidentally" referred to the Chinese government: this is so because countervailing proceedings are necessarily the proceedings based on a foreign government's (rather than an NGO's) interference with the exporters' trade activities.

And while it is true that, in some statements issued by the CCCMC, the CCCMC utilized the term "self-discipline," which -- to a Western ear -- suggests the entity's complete discretion, see, e.g., Docket Entry No. 99-4, at 6 (replicating the CCCMC's brochure which includes a statement that the "CCCMC guides and oversees members['] . . . conduct [of] self-discipline [346] within the industry"), the Court finds the statement made by the MOFCOM in the Vitamin C proceedings enlightening as to the Chinese meaning of this term, which suggests a disguised form of strict government compulsion. [117] See Vitamin C, Docket Entry 400-1, at 2 ("The actual specific measures taken by China to effect its regulatory policies include what is referred to as a "system of self-discipline." This system has a long history in China and has been well known to, and complied with by, Chinese companies. Self-discipline does not mean [as it would be in the Western world,] complete voluntariness or self-conduct. In effect, self-discipline refers to a system of regulation under the supervision of a designated agency acting on behalf of the Chinese government"); accord Vitamin C, 584 F. Supp. 2d at 555, n.7 ("The [MOFCOM] argues that [a reference [*437] to a self-restraint] should not be taken at face value [because such terms as self-regulation and self-restraint, etc. are] many of the terms [that] have meanings in the context of China's government and economic policy that are quite different from their literal translations [and American perceptions as to the meaning of these concepts]").

Assessing the evidence presented in this matter and detected sua sponte, the Court concludes that the totality of evidence convincingly suggests that the CCCMC was and is a governmental appendage, especially in light of the CCCMC's power to affect its members' ability to practice their licensed vocation (or the extent of that ability): under the United States law, this is the power to legally affect one's constitutional property right -- something no NGO can do. [118] Cf. Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, 545 U.S. 748, 789, 125 S. Ct. 2796, 162 L. Ed. 2d 658 (2005) ("The types of interests protected as 'property' are varied and, as often as not, intangible, relating to the whole domain of social and economic fact") (citation omitted).

[117] Both [347] sides seem to agree that the CCCMC was chartered (and its bylaws were adopted) in 1988, and no superceding charter or bylaws were ever registered or even attempted. Since the structure and powers of the CCCMC were settled in the charter and bylaws that were adopted: (a) long before Chinese economic reforms began to affect such industry as export of China's natural resources, see Animal Sci. Prods. v. China Nat'l Metals & Minerals Imp. & Exp. Corp., 596 F. Supp. 2d 842, 867 (D.N.J. 2008) (setting the time line): (b) three years prior to the issuance of 1991 "Measures" detailing the intertwined relationship between the MOFCOM and its "chambers of commerce," see supra note 114; and (c) thirteen years prior to China's accession to the WTO, and no changes in charter/bylaws were ever entered or attempted, the Court has no reason to presume that the use of the term "self-discipline" in the CCCMC's brochure was a sign that the CCCMC transformed into an NGO, or that the Chinese mandatory version of term "self-discipline" existing at the CCCMC's inception had mutated into a qualitatively different Western type of "self-discipline" simply as a result of China's accession to the WTO or China's [348] decision to start a gradual transition from centrally planned economy to socialist market economy. See Barry Naughton, The Chinese Economy: Transitions and Growth (MIT Press, 2007) (discussing qualitative differences between a pure market economy and China's socialist market economy).

[118] "[T]he term 'NGO' is generally used to mean what its initials stand for -- a 'non-governmental organization' -- a group of persons in the private sector working in concert, playing a significant role in the [349] public sphere in order to garner support for influencing government policies." Judith Resnik et al., Ratifying Kyoto at the Local Level: Sovereigntism. Federalism, and Translocal Organizations of Government Actors (TOGAs), 50 Ariz. L. Rev. 709, 784 (2008); see also Jude L. Fernando & Alan W. Heston, The Role of NGOs: Charity and Empowerment: NGOs Between States, Markets and Civil Society, 554 Annals 8 (1997) (providing a detailed answer to the question "what is an NGO?"). For instance, the New Jersey State Bar Association ("NJBA") is an NGO. Conversely, the New Jersey Office of Attorney Ethics ("OAE") is not an NGO; rather, it is an appendage of the state: an agency at the New Jersey Supreme Court. However, the attorneys employed by the OAE came to their AOE employ after being admitted to practice, and they were and still are subject to the very rules the AOE enforces. Moreover, over 600 volunteer members of NJ Bar (i.e., members of the industry over which the OAE enjoys investigative and prosecutorial powers) work each year on OAE matters initiated against other members of the Bar. Furthermore, the membership fees paid by the members of NJ Bar (that is, the "regulated industry") fund [350] the operations of the OAE, entirely. Finally, the OAE also has the power to recommend new rules, which -- upon a notice by the New Jersey Supreme Court -- are commented upon by the "regulated industry" and issued after these comments are considered. However, none of these features transforms the OAE into an NGO, and while non-compliance with a decision rendered by the NJBA (or a non-membership in the NJBA) has no effect on the attorney's ability to practice law, a failure to comply with the rules enforced by the OAE (or a failure to pay one's Bar fees that fund the OAE) entails punitive consequences verifying the true governmental nature of the OAE's powers.

3. Presence of Compulsory Processes

Here, both sides tend to conflate three distinct aspects of the alleged compulsory processes: (a) the relevant source of compulsion; (b) the maximum severity of theoretically possible repercussions for non-compliance; and (c) the actual existence of punitive compulsion. However, each aspect shall be treated separately in order to ensure the clarity of discussion.

a. Source of Compulsion

The initial confusion appears to be rooted in Plaintiffs' position that the compulsion at issue cannot be deemed [351] governmentally produced because Defendants, effectively, "compelled themselves" by attending the meetings held under the auspices of the CCCMC, disclosing to the CCCMC (and, hence, to each other) their accounting and managerial data, deliberating on the actual figure of the minimum price and submitting the result of their deliberation to the CCCMC for registration with the MOFCOM. See, generally, Opp. at 18-25, 45-53.

[*438] There is, however, a qualitative distinction between the inquiries into whether: (a) Defendants obeyed these registered with -- and enforced by -- the government minimum price requirement; and (b) Defendants partook in coining of the minimum price figures plugged into the requirement. The distinction is important since, in the former, the focus is on the source of compulsion that forced Defendants to performed the very acts challenged by Plaintiffs (namely, employ the minimum price requirement at the time when Defendants were consummating their export contracts), while -- in the latter -- the focus is on the compulsion that forced Defendants to partake in a ministerial task entirely different from the challenged conduct.

The latter inquiry, while presenting a perhaps interesting [352] academic exercise, is inapposite to the doctrine of government compulsion, since the process of coining a regulatory regime is distinct from governmental enforcement of the same: as the Court already noted, the fact that the state legislators debate the language of various prescripts (or that the members of regulated industries submit comments to proposed agency regulations, etc.) does not affect the "compulsiveness" of the resulting statutes, regulations or agency rules: each of these prescripts becomes a governmental -- and, hence, compulsive -- force upon its enactment, adoption, registration, etc., and applies with equal force to the public in general and to those who participated in coining these prescripts. [119]

[119] It appears that this conflation of the "law-coining" and "law-enforcement" aspects is also present in Resco WDPa and Vitamin C, since -- in response to the Vitamin C plaintiffs' similar claim the MOFCOM clarified that,

> [u]nder [Chinese] regulatory system, the parties involved [in exportation must] consult with each other to reach consensus on coordinated activities for the purpose of reaching the objectives and serving the interest as set forth under Chinese laws and [353] policies. [Natural and juridical p]ersons engaged in such required [consultations based on the Chinese version of] self-discipline are well aware that they are subject to penalties for failure to participate in such coordination[,] . . . including forfeiting their export right. . . . [The] exporters were thus subject to the regulation by the [chamber of commerce], including compliance with the [chamber of commerce's] requirements of self-discipline, the very purpose of which was to coordinate each exporter's behavior. No . . . exporter could ignore these policies, nor could they abstain from such coordination with regard to export price and production volume when asked to by the [chamber of commerce]. The self-disciplinary system of export coordination also includes meetings and discussions between and among the parties subject to the [chamber of commerce's] direction and supervision, and reaching agreements among themselves on taking appropriate actions in the interest of the country as a whole. Participation in such discussions, taking a vote and conducting other similar activities to reach their final consensus constitutes an integral part of the self-discipline process. [The] exporters [354] must comply with the above procedures and the agreements reached in compliance with such procedures; otherwise, the [chamber of commerce] would be required to exercise its power to penalize those who were in violation of such procedures and agreements.

Vitamin C, Civil Action No. 06-md-1738 (E.D.N.Y.), Docket Entry No. 400-1, at 2. Hence, even if the question of how the minimum price figures came about were relevant to the doctrine of government compulsion, the statement made by the MOFCOM unambiguously indicates the exporters' mandatory obligation to partake in deliberations held by the exporters'

[*439] Consequently, for the purposes [355] of this Court's abstention analysis, the inquiry into the "source" of compulsion should be limited to the existence and enforcement of Chinese governmental prescripts compelling obedience with "a" minimum price requirement, regardless of how the actual minimum price figures plugged into that requirement were coined. [120]

b. Theoretical Severity

Another source of confusion appears to be the parties' failure to distinguish the issue of "theoretical severity" of [356] repercussion from that of "practical severity" (which is effectively the issue of enforcement of the theoretically possible punishment).

The degree of the "theoretical severity" of repercussion is not exactly spelled out by the documentary evidence filed in this case and detected by the Court in other matters, i.e., no statement issued by the MOFCOM, CCCMC or other Chinese agencies is accompanied by "sentencing guidelines" correlating a particular form (or a particular frequency) of noncompliance to a specific punishment. Rather, this evidence suggests that the degree of punishment has been left to the discretion of the MOFCOM, CCCMC and other Chinese government bodies. However, those documents that skirt the issue clearly set forth the range of the possible punishment, encompassing such measures as: (a) forfeiture of the enterprise's export license (i.e., loss of the ability to practice one's vocation which, for an exporting enterprise, would be loss of livelihood); (b) reduction of one's export quota (i.e., reduction of the ability to make living); (c) monetary fines imposed upon the enterprise, as well as upon natural persons employed as executives of such enterprises (plus, imposition [357] of legal liability on such persons). [121]

"chamber of commerce," so an attempt to filibuster would cause a substantial punishment. The Court has no reason to presume that such compulsion was limited only to the CCMHPC, since all MOFCOM's regulations, circulars, working rules, etc., invariably referred to "chambers of commerce," see generally, exhibits docketed in Docket Entries Nos. 98, 99, 109 and 110, i.e., utilized a generic definition suggesting that the mandatory obligation to partake in deliberations applied to the CCCMC members (like Defendants) as much as it did to the members of the CCMHPC.

[120] Moreover, HN77[] the availability of the doctrine of government compulsion cannot depend on the presence or absence of any collusion: had it been otherwise, the doctrinal abstention would be limited only to antitrust, racketeering and similar matters that require proof of collusion. Consequently, for the purposes of the government compulsion doctrine, it would be a logical error to ask whether Defendants reached an agreement to comply with the minimum price requirement. Rather, where the doctrine is applicable, such "agreement" aspect should be automatically supplied by the defendant's obedience of his/her/its sovereign's law: so, if there is an alleged hub-and-spokes agreement, then the foreign sovereign should be viewed as the "hub."

[121] See Docket Entry No. 35-51, at 15 (the MOFCOM's regulation stating that "[t]he Bidding Committee is entitled to revoke the quotas won in the bidding and rescind the qualification for quota bidding . . . of the enterprises which . . . [e]xported at prices lower than the regulated prices set forth by relevant . . . chambers of commerce"); see also Docket Entry No. 35-49, at 2-3 (the MOFCOM's regulation explaining that the MOFCOM "shall mete out the following punishments on enterprises which commit conducts of exporting at lower-than-normal price: enterprises . . . shall be fined, investigations can also be [conducted] to affix the administrative or economic responsibility on the legal representative of the enterprise or any person who is directly responsible for the conduct of exporting at lower-than-normal price," and stating the definition of "lower-than-normal [358] price means [as] the export price [which is] lower than the necessary price for the product[, where the] necessary price [is the sum of] the cost for the production . . . , the expenses for storage, transport, insurance and management [plus a] reasonable profit"). Defendants' perception that the term "lower-than-normal price" used in Docket Entry No. 35-49 has the meaning identical to the phrase used in Docket Entry No. 35-51 ("price[] lower than the regulated prices set forth by relevant . . . chambers of commerce") appears warranted since: (a) the phrase "reasonable profit" used in Docket Entry No. 35-49 is not defined anywhere else; (b) only 37 days passed between the MOFCOM's issuance of Docket Entries No. 35-49 and No. 35-51; and (c) the very goal of the CCCMC's price coordination was a determination of what is "normal profit" in light of the interest of China, as a sovereign under which rule Defendants had to operate and were mandated to prospect in accordance with China's vision of how prosperity is to be achieved. See Docket Entry No. 99-11, at 2 (the CCCMC charter, providing that the "CCCMC is authorized . . . to deal with . . . export trade, . . . [t]he aims of [the] CCCMC [359] include. . . protecting the legal rights and interests of the State[, with] . . . guidance and supervision of [the MOFCOM, by] . . . coordinating commodity prices [as to its members'] export"); see also Vitamin C, Civil Action No. 06-md-1738 (E,D.N.Y.), Docket Entry No. 400, at 2 (the MOFCOM's statement that "[n]o . . . exporter could ignore [minimum price] policies" imposed by its chamber of commerce); accord the instant matter, (statement made by MOFCOM Assistant Minister Liu Xiangdong, noting that, "guided by [the MOFCOM], . . . [the]

Moreover, an [*440] analogously severe theoretical punishment applies to prospective non-compliance, i.e., to a mere attempt to export goods priced below the required minimum price; such punishment is denial of export licence to consummate sale, i.e., the exporter's inability to make living. [122]

The Court, of course, recognizes that the phrase "severity of punishment" necessarily entails cultural perceptions, and what might be a severe deprivation in one country could easily be a way of life in another. However, being mindful of the Court of Appeals' guidance in Mannington Mills, 595 F.2d at 1297 (teaching that this Court's determination would be best reached upon considering [362] whether an analogous determination rendered by a foreign court against a United States defendant would be acceptable in the United States), the Court finds that the theoretical "severity of punishment" would be best addressed by assessing the punishment as an "injury" under the United States law. Since the maximum punishment envisioned under the prescripts issued by the MOFCOM, CCCMC and other Chinese government [*441] bodies was akin to what the United States jurisprudence qualifies as loss of livelihood as a result of suspension/loss of one's licence to practice one's vocation, the Court assesses such punishment accordingly. [123]

HN78[] The Supreme Court of the United States invariably recognized that a license to practice a certain trade should be treated similarly to a property right and an injury to this right invokes protections of the Due Process Clause. See Barry v. Barchi, 443 U.S. 55, 63-64, 99 S. Ct. 2642, 61 L. Ed. 2d 365 (1979) (finding a horse trainer's license similar to property right); Goldsmith v. United States Bd. of Tax Appeals, 270 U.S. 117, 123, 46 S. Ct. 215, 70 L. Ed. 494 (1926) (same, as to an accounting license); *Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114, 121-22, 9 S. Ct. 231, 32 L. Given that the United States law considers one's loss of license to practice one's vocation an injury of constitutional magnitude, see, e.g., Jeffrey M. Gamso, Cleveland Board of Education v. Loudermill, 17 Tex. Tech. L. Rev. 255, 256-57 (1986) (explaining the reasons why the inclusion of the [122] See Docket Entry No. 35-47, at 6 (the MOFCOM's regulation directing that, "[w]hen applying for export licences, every export enterprise should submit to the licence-issuing body the export permits and contract[, and an] application form . . . for the export license. . . . When examining the export contracts, the license-issuing body concerned should pay major attention to the prices of the export commodities. . . . When the prices in the export contracts are lower than the coordinated prices by the related import and export chamber of commerce, . . . the license-issuing body should refuse to issue the export license"); Docket Entry No. 35-51, at 14 (the MOFCOM's regulation clarifying that "[e]vidence [needed for] issuance of export license [include a proof of e]xport contract price[, which should be] not less than the prices set forth by the chambers of commerce for . . . exporters"); Docket Entry No. 35-53, at 5 (the MOFCOM's circular stating that, "[w]hen examining an application for an export license, the releasing authority shall inspect the contents [of] export contract[,] especially examine [the] price. The license issuing agencies shall stress on the examination and verification of the prices of export commodities when examining the export contracts, the commodity prices on the export licenses issued shall be the same as the prices in the export contracts; but when the prices in the export contracts are lower than the recommended export prices fixed by the relevant chambers of commerce, the license issuing agencies shall refuse to issue the export licenses").

[123] Since the range of monetary fines envisioned by the MOFCOM's regulation Docket Entry No. 35-49 is unknown to this Court, it appears unwarranted to conclude that such fines must necessarily be a "severe" punishment, since these fines might, just as well, be of nominal value, even within the meaning of Chinese average income. Moreover, since Docket Entry No. 35-49, at 2-3, merely refers to "legal liability" of the person responsible for exportation at a "lower-than-normal" price, the court concludes that it would be an undue generalization to equate this unspecified [363] "legal liability" to "penal liability" (which is a severe punishment per se).

Due Process Clause and its source in law of England suggests that protection of intangible property rights is among those of constitutional magnitude), the Court concludes that the direct ties drawn by [364] the Chinese regulations, circulars, working rules, etc., between the prohibition on exportation at a price lower than the minimum price and the exporter's ability to obtain an export licenses (or to fully exercise it, or to keep exercising it in the future) establish a sufficiently severe theoretical punishment, i.e., the punishment sufficient to compel compliance and, thus, trigger the doctrinal abstention. Cf. Negusie v. Holder, 129 S. Ct. 1159, 1170, 173 L. Ed. 2d 20 (2009) (Scalia, J., Alito, J., concurring) ("The rationale for the duress defense . . . is conventionally 'not that the defendant . . . somehow loses his mental capacity to commit the [conduct] in question,' but rather that 'even though he has done the [physical] act [he is charged with,] . . . and[had] the mental state which the [conduct] requires, his conduct . . . is excused") (quoting 2 W. LaFave, Substantive Criminal Law § 9.7(a), at 73 (2d ed. 2003)).

c. Actual Existence of Prescripts

Plaintiffs' position that Defendants' actions were not governmentally compelled "in reality" appears two-fold. First, Plaintiffs assert that the danger of punishment for non-compliance was not "real" because the relevant prescripts were: (a) paraphrased [365] in terms of "self-discipline" or used analogous language that allowed Defendants' discretion; and/or (b) not "actually enforced." See, generally, Opp. at 18-25, 45-53. Second, Plaintiffs maintain that the regime of mandatory minimum price requirement did not exist throughout the entire Class Period because: (a) some prescripts were expressly repealed; (b) other prescripts were amended; (c) the topics addressed by yet other prescripts were tackled in later-issued [*442] provisions that omitted to mention the minimum price requirement; and (d) the remaining prescripts -- left unaffected by all of the above -- must have developed a "new meaning" as a result of China's efforts to transition from a centrally planned economy to socialist market economy, as well as a result of China's accession to the WTO. See id. For the reasons detailed below, the Court disagrees.

Specifically:

(i) Plaintiffs begin by claiming irrelevance of the "Working Rules on the Issuance of an Export License, [issued by the] MOFCOM [on] September 7, 2007 [("Working Rules II"), because their Working Rules II did] not mention a minimum price." Opp. at 20. However, the "Working Rules II" provide that "[the MOFCOM] shall authorize [366] its Quota & License Administrative Bureau to conduct the uniform . . . inspection . . . of . . . the issuance of an export license. . . A business applying for an export license shall submit . . . [t]he approval documents on export issued by the competent authorities[, the] . . . contract o[f sale for] export[, and o]ther materials that [are] required by the [MOFCOM]." Docket Entry No. 35-64, at 2-3. Since the regulatory regime established by the pre-"Working Rules II" prescripts required a proof that the export sale was conducted at above minimum price in order to obtain an export licence, and the bidding/customs authorities could deny export quota/actual exportation in the even of noncompliance with the minimum price, the Court has no reason to presume that all prior prescripts were "repealed" or "amended" by the "Working Rules IF'; rather, the "Working Rules II"-based obligation to present the export contract and unspecified other "approval documents" to the "competent authority" could be a paraphrased version of the previously spelled-out duty to show proof of sale at or above the minimum price. Moreover, even if the "approval documents" language referred to other matters, the [367] Court detects no reason for finding that the minimum price requirement was abolished on or prior to September 7, 2007, since not a single statement in the "Working Rules II" expressly states or even suggests so. [124] Accord infra subsection (x) (discussing the "Working Rules I").

(ii) Plaintiffs also maintain that the "Notice of the Strengthening of the Export Administration of Caustic-Calcine (Dead-Burned) Magnesite, [issued by the] MOFCOM and the State Administration of Quality, Supervision, Inspection, and Quarantine, [on] November 10, 2004 ("Notice II"), indicated that the minimum price requirement was abolished because the Notice did] not refer to any minimum export price." Opp. at 20. However, the "Notice II" explains why it was issued, stating that,"[i]n order to strengthen [Chinese] export" of magnesium oxide, the government designated certain exclusive ports as points of exit and initiated the mode of inspections to eradicate the practice of "smuggling" magnesium oxide by declaring the [*443] goods to be "kaolin clay, calcined brucite, dead-burned ironstone, dolomite, wollastonite, fireclay, dinas earth" (products having physical appearance similar to that of magnesium oxide). Docket [368] Entry No. 35-61, at 2. No statement made in the "Notice II" suggests that the minimum price requirement was abolished on or prior to November 10, 2004: [125] on the contrary, the "Notice II" strongly suggests a concern of numerous Chinese governmental bodies with the fact of exportation of magnesium oxide at prices cheaper than those required by the prescripts addressing the issue of the minimum price. Accord infra subsection (xi) (discussing the "Notice I").

[124] Even if [380] a certain prescript had abolished the minimum price requirement on September 7, 2007, Defendants' conduct would still be subject to abstention from the inception of the Class Period (in mid-2000) to September 7, 2007. That might effectively dispose of Plaintiffs' claims altogether, since the Amended Complaint ends its account of Defendants' alleged collusive activities with the statement that, "[i]n February 2007, [that is, seven months prior to the issuance of the "Rules," unspecified] members of [the ever-changing] Cartel met to discuss a possible agreement to increase the export price," Docket Entry No. 77, P 64, with no allegations as to any other manifestations of Defendants' alleged post-February 2007 collusion.

(iii) Plaintiffs also assert that the "Announcements Regarding the First and Second Public Bidding for Export Quota of Light-Burnt and Dead-Burnt Magnesite, [issued by the] MOFCOM [on] December 3, 2004[,] and May 25, 2005[, indicated that the minimum price requirement was abolished because t]hese Announcements d[id] not mention a minimum price." Opp. at 20. However, both "Announcements" contain the following language: "Minimum price for the bid[:] A minimum bid price is set up [by the government] for this invitation for bidding. A bidding enterprise may directly adopt the minimum price for the bid as determined by the [government] in its own electronic bidding document. Electronic bidding documents with prices lower than those determined [369] by the [government] shall be regarded as invalid." Docket Entry No. 4, 6-7. Thus, while no statement made in the "Announcements" suggests that the minimum price requirement was abolished by December 3, 2004, or even by May 25, 2005, [126] the language of both "Announcements" indicates that the Chinese government took extra precautions to ensure impossibility of exporting at a price lower than those selected by the government, i.e., the minimum price.

(iv) Analogously, Plaintiffs contend that the "Measures for the Administration of Licenses for the Export of Goods, [issued by the] MOFCOM [on] December 10, 2004[, indicated that the minimum price requirement was abolished because t]hese Measures d[id] not mention a minimum price [and, as a prescript,] were repealed in 2008." Opp. at 21. However, the "Measures" did not contain any statement suggesting that the minimum price requirement was abolished: rather, the "Measures" reiterated that, "[w]hen applying for an export license, an operator shall submit the relevant quota of export goods or other relevant documents of approval to the license issuing agency," Docket Entry No. 35-62, at 3 (emphasis supplied), hence allowing for a reasonable [370] deducement that the mandate of all prior prescripts tying export licenses with the minimum price requirement remained intact and incorporated by the "Measures" reference to "other relevant documents [that have to be submitted for] approval to the license issuing agency." Consequently, the Court has no reason to read the "Measures" as stating that the minimum price requirement was [*444] abolished on or prior to December 10, 2004. [127]

[125] Even if a certain prescript had abolished the minimum price requirement on November 10, 2004, Defendants' conduct would still be subject to abstention from the inception of the Class Period (in mid-2000) to November 10, 2004: for almost half of the Class Period.

[126] Even if a certain prescript had abolished the minimum price requirement on May 25, 2005, Defendants' conduct would still be subject to the government compulsion-based abstention from the inception of the Class [381] Period (in mid-2000) and until May 25, 2005, that is, for more than half of the proposed Class Period.

[127] Even if a certain prescript had abolished the minimum price requirement on December 10, 2004, Defendants' conduct would still be subject to the government compulsion-based abstention from the inception of the Class Period (in mid-2000) and until December 10, 2004, that is, for almost half of the Class Period. A foriori, if the "Measures" were a statement reinforcing the minimum price requirement, this fact could effectively dispose of Plaintiffs' claims altogether, since the Amended Complaint ends its account of Defendants' alleged collusive meetings with the statement that, "[i]n February 2007, [that is, more than a year prior to the repeal of the "Measures," unspecified] members of [the ever-changing] Cartel met to discuss a possible agreement to increase the export price," Docket Entry No. 77, P 64, and provides no facts as to any other manifestations of Defendants' alleged post-February 2007 collusion.

(v) Plaintiffs continue by asserting that the "Working Rules on the Application for an Export License, [isued by the] Dailan [Division of the MOFCOM in] December 2003 [still cannot be read as imposing the minimum price requirement, even though these R]ules state that, '[w]hen the export prices are recommended by the chambers of commerce, the export price shall be in compliance with the relevant price limit regulations,' [because these R]ules do not compel price-fixing for any [particular] product." Opp. at 21. Plaintiffs' argument is, at best, half-hearted, since the CCCMC is a chamber of commerce subject to the MOFCOM's rule, and the CCCMC's magnesite section (of which Defendants are members) are, too, subject to this rule. Therefore, it would be anomalous to [371] deem the "Rules" inapplicable to any particular section simply because the MOFCOM did not bother to expressly list each and every product falling within the authority of each and every section of each and every chamber of commerce the MOFCOM controlled. Moreover, and paramountly here, as the Court already explained, the process of price-fixing, i.e., how the actual figure of the minimum price comes about, is irrelevant to the inquiry posed by the government compulsion doctrine, which concerns itself not with the legislative niceties of a foreign sovereign's enactment process but with whether this foreign sovereign's prescripts compel the defendant's behavior. Consequently, all that the "Rules" unambiguously establish is that, as of December 2003 (that is, at least more than one quarter into the proposed Class Period), the threat of repercussion for non-compliance with the minimum price requirement was actually existing.

(vi) In the same fashion, Plaintiffs maintain that the "Measures for the Invitation to Bid for Export Commodity Quotas, [issued by the] MOFCOM [on] December 20, 2001[, indicated that the minimum price requirement was abolished simply because t]hese [M]easures do not [372] mention a minimum price." Opp. at 21. The Court disagrees. There is no statement in the "Measures" indicating that the minimum price requirement was abolished, since the "Measures" -- while detailing certain new ministerial aspects of the bidding process -- did not include any language suggesting that the minimum price requirement was repealed. [128] Docket Entry No. 35-58, at 3-5. Therefore, the Court can not read [*445] the "Measures" as stating that the requirement was abolished on or prior to December 20, 2001. [129]

(vii) Identically, Plaintiffs assert that the "Measures for the Administration of Export Commodities Quotas, [issued by the] MOFCOM [on] December 20, 2001[, indicated that the minimum price requirement was abolished simply because t]hese [M]easures do not mention a minimum price." For the reasons reiterated time and again in subsections (i) to (vi), the Court finds this argument invalid. As the Sinosteel Defendants correctly observed, a government's decision not to reiterate each and every previously established aspect of the regulatory regime in each newly adopted provision cannot be construed as an abolition of all previously adopted aspects. See S/Reply at 19 ("The fact that [373] [the] regulations adopted in the interim may not [expressly] mention price coordination is no more relevant than the fact that not all securities regulations promulgated since the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 mention insider trading"). Plaintiffs invite the Court to reach an odd conclusion that, by the end of 2001, Chinese law lost all its continuity and started so much "from scratch" that every provision, rule and legal policy not expressly re-enacted was necessarily deemed abolished. However, neither China's decision to initiate a gradual transition from centrally planned to socialist market economy nor China's accession to the WTO transformed China into a "new" nation, with a legal regime wholly divorced from all Chinese pre-WTO/pre-transition law. Accord United States v. Grainger, 346 U.S. 235, 248, 73 S. Ct. 1069, 97 L. Ed. 1575 (1953) (HN79[] "Codification contemplates, implies and produces continuity of existing law in clarified form rather than its interruption"); Halsbury's Laws of

[128] Moreover, a MOFCOM's regulation issued prior to the "Measures" already clarified, while addressing the very same issue of the bidding process, that "[t]he Bidding Committee [382] is entitled to revoke the quotas won in the bidding and rescind the qualification for quota bidding. . . of the enterprises which . . . [e]xported at prices lower than the regulated prices set forth by relevant. . . chambers of commerce." Docket Entry No. 35-51, at 15; and (b)

[129] Even if a certain prescript had abolished the minimum price requirement in December 2001, Defendants' conduct would still be subject to the government compulsion-based abstention from the inception of the Class Period (in mid-2000) and until December 2001, that is, for about a year and a half of the proposed Class Period.

Hong Kong, Commentary, Continuity of Hong Kong's Judicial System After Reunification of Hong Kong with the People's Republic of China (Oct. 3, 2008), at HLHK Courts and Judicial System 2, LEXIS. [130]

(viii) Plaintiffs also assert that [374] the "Provisions on the Export License Administration, [issued by the] MOFCOM [on] December 20, 2001," should be construed as indicating that the minimum price requirement was repealed because these "Provisions" were operable only until December 10, 2004, and -- while operable -- "only refer[red] to 'recommended export prices fixed by the relevant [*446] chamber of commerce' [but the "Provisions" did] not require the fixing of any price for any specific product." For the reasons already articulated by the Court in the subsection (v), supra, Plaintiffs' position is without merit. [131]

(ix) Plaintiffs then point at the "Regulations" issued on December 10, 2001, by the State Council (i.e., by the highest governmental body in China) with regard to the "Administration of the Import and Export of Goods." See Opp. at 21. Plaintiffs maintain that the "Regulations" verify that no mandatory minimum price requirement existed by December 10, 2001, because the "[Regulations] describe the export quota licensing system but . . . do not authorize any ministry to require . . . minimum prices . . . . [According to Plaintiffs, repeal of the minimum price requirement is particularly evident because these] Regulations [375] further require[d] promulgation of new rules governing export quota licensing that conform to [these] Regulations." Id. This statement presents a compilation of legal and logical errors. First, the fact that the "Regulations" did not authorize the MOFCOM (or the CCCMC, or any other Chinese governmental agency) to issue prescripts requiring compliance with the minimum price has no bearing on whether such prescripts (if actually issued) resulted in government compulsion, see Interamerican Refining, 307 F. Supp. at 1298 (explaining that the issue of whether the compulsion-causing provision was issued with or without authority is irrelevant to the doctrine). [132] Second, the fact that the "Regulations" were silent as to the minimum price requirement in no way indicates that they repealed that requirement. See supra, subsection (vii) and note 130 of this Opinion (explaining why issuance of a provision silent as to certain aspect cannot be deemed as a breach of legal continuum). Moreover, contrary to Plaintiffs' position, the relevant language of the "Regulations" seems to the suggest a conclusion opposite to that prompted by Plaintiffs. Specifically, the "Regulations" include a section titled [376] "The Goods Limited in Exportation," which provides, inter alia, that "[t]he term 'export license' [means] the various kinds of certificates and documents that [relate to] export . . . as provided in laws and administrative regulations," hence suggesting an incorporation of the minimum price requirement that was adopted in previous administrative regulations. See Docket Entry No. 35-55, at 9; accord Docket Entry No. 35-47, at 6 (a pre-"Regulations" MOFCOM's mandate directing that, "[w]hen applying for export licences, every export enterprise should submit to the licence-issuing body the export permits and contract[, and an] application form . . . for the export license. . . . When examining the export contracts, the license-issuing body concerned should pay major attention to the prices of the export commodities. . . . When the [*447] prices in the export contracts are lower than the coordinated prices by the related import and export chamber of commerce, . . . the license-issuing body should

These changes and the rhetoric are extremely important, but . . . while the [language of the provisions have] changed, the underlying principles and policies on which Chinese . . . law is based have not. [131] Even if a certain prescript had abolished the minimum price requirement on December 10, 2004, Defendants' conduct would be subject to abstention from the inception of the Class Period (in mid-2000) to December 10, 2004, that is, for almost half of the Class Period.

[132] As the Court already explained, many provisions are treated as "law" regardless of the fact that the delegated authority of the authors is not -- or cannot -- be established. See supra, note 100 of this Opinion (discussing the sources of religious law and customary law that are enforceable regulatory mandates regardless of [384] coming about without any "delegated authority").

refuse to issue the export license"); Docket Entry No. 35-51, at 14 (another pre-"Regulations" MOFCOM's mandate clarifying that "[e]vidence [needed for] issuance of export license [include a proof of [377] e]xport contract price[, which should be] not less than the prices set forth by the chambers of commerce for . . . exporters"); Docket Entry No. 35-53, at 5 (a pre-"Regulations" MOFCOM's circular stating that, "[w]hen examining an application for an export license, the releasing authority shall inspect the contents [of] export contract[,] especially examine [the] price. [The p]rice of goods on export license shall be the same as that in the export contract [and] not lower than the coordinating price regulated by relevant import and export commerce commission"). [133]

(x) Next, Plaintiffs' claim that the "Working Rules on the Application for and Release of an Export License, [issued by the] MOFCOM [on] December 14, 1999 [("Working Rules I") indicate that the minimum price requirement was abolished on or prior to September 7, 2007, because t]hese [R]ules were officially abolished on September 7, 2007 . . . , [and because] these [R]ules were based on the export license regulations effective in 1999, which were revised in 2001 and again in 2004. Like the other regulations, these . . . [R]ules state[d] only that a price [could not] be lower 'than the coordinating price regulated by the relevant [378] import and export commerce commission' [but the Rules did] not compel price-fixing for any particular product." Opp. at 21-22 (emphasis supplied). The net result of Plaintiffs' statement appears to be the sum of: (a) a concession that the original 1999 version of the Rules expressly directed exportation at minimum price or above; (b) another concession that this minimum price requirement was present, expressly or implicitly, in 2001 and 2004 related provisions; and (c) yet another concession that this minimum price requirement was made part of many other Chinese regulations. See id. Since the issue of how the actual minimum price came about is inapposite to the government compulsion doctrine, see supra, subsection (v), Plaintiffs' statement does nothing but concede that numerous governmental prescripts consistently compelled the exporters to obey the minimum price requirement, and did so throughout the period stretching from the pre-Class Period time to, at the very least, September 7, 2007 (that is, until seven months after the last alleged meeting of "Cartel," see Docket Entry No. 77, P 64). Moreover, the post-Working-Rules-I period appears, too, marked by the minimum price requirement [379] since: (a) the September 7, 2007, "abolition" of the Working Rules I occurred as a result of the enactment of the later Working Rules ("Working Rules II), issued by the MOFCOM on the same date, that is, on September 7, 2007; and (b) these Working Rules II cannot be [*448] read as abolishing the minimum price requirement. See supra, subsection (i) (discussing the "Working Rules II").

(xi) Finally, much in line with their statements detailed in subsections (i) to (x), supra, Plaintiffs maintain that the "Notice of the Strengthening of the Export Administration of [Magnesium Oxide, issued by the] MOFCOM and the State Administration for Import and Export Commodity Inspection [on] March 27, 1996 [("Notice I") indicates that, as early as 1996, the minimum price requirement stopped existing simply because t]his Notice [I] does not refer to any minimum export price . . . and was abolished in 2005." Opp. at 22. For the reasons numerously reiterated in the preceding subsections, this argument is without merit. Moreover, the post-"Notice-I" period cannot be deemed as the period during which the minimum price requirement was abolished. See supra, subsection (ii) (discussing the "Notice II").

In sum, the evidence challenged by Plaintiffs invariably indicates, although with a different degree of forte, that -- throughout the Class Period -- a stream of prescripts was issued; these prescripts either expressly stated the minimum price requirement or employed a language strongly suggesting that the requirement was remaining in force, or made directives reading as entirely compatible with the minimum price requirement, or were simply silent as to the issue.. [134]

[133] Finally, even if the Court were to adopt Plaintiffs' reading of the "Regulations" as repealing the actually existing minimum price requirement, the logical conclusion of such presumption would be that, until December 10, 2001, Defendants were, in fact, subject to the minimum price requirement imposed by the highest governmental body of China which, in turn, calls into question Plaintiffs' good faith with respect to their argument that, since the inception of the proposed Class Period, that is, since in mid-2000, Defendants could not have been subject to any government compulsion as to the minimum price requirement.

[134] In addition, Plaintiffs dedicate substantial effort [385] to asserting that: (a) the "Detailed Rules for the Implementation of Calling for Bids for Light (Dead) Burned Magnesia Export Commodity Quotas (for Trial Implementation)," which were promulgated by the MOFCOM in 1994 and expressly directed both collusive agreement on a particular minimum price as to export of magnesite-based products and compliance with that minimum price, had to be deemed repealed by the MOFCOM's

d. Composite Effect

As stated above, each piece of documentary evidence referred to by Plaintiffs either evinces the minimum price requirement or strongly suggests the same, or is entirely compatible with the requirement. The same conclusion applies to: (a) the multitude of Defendants' exhibits not challenged in Plaintiffs' Opposition, see supra notes 73-74 of this Opinion (listing Defendants' exhibits); and even to (b) Plaintiffs' own exhibits. [387] See supra note 76 of this Opinion (listing Plaintiffs' exhibits). In sum, not a single document before the Court states -- or otherwise indicates -- that the minimum price requirement was abolished [*449] for any period of time, let alone permanently. However, Plaintiffs appear to be correct in their observation that there has been no particular single prescript issued by the MOFCOM that expressly mandated Defendants' compliance with the minimum price requirement while remaining operable, without any amendment or re-issuance, throughout the entire Class Period which started sometime in mid-2000 and is, allegedly, still running as the Court writes this Opinion.

Rather, the evidence before the Court is an amalgamation of mutually corroborating prescripts. [135] This particular aspect makes the factual scenario at hand more complex than that addressed in Trugman-Nash, 954 F. Supp. 733, and even that examined in Interamerican Refining, 307 F. Supp. 1291, i.e., the cases dealing with more straight-forward examples of government compulsion.

As Judge Trager observed in Vitamin C, the Trugman-Nash scenario "involved [a] much clearer example[] of government compulsion [since] the court in Trugman-Nash, . . . consider[ed the effect of only] the New Zealand Dairy Board Act of 1961, a formally codified New Zealand law[, expressly] 'mandat[ing] . . . disapproval of sales price competition among New Zealand dairy producers in respect of exports to nations . . . that restrict import quantities." 584 F. Supp. 2d at 558. And while the circumstances in Interamerican Refining were less clear-cut, see 307 F. Supp. at 1295-98 (explaining that the Venezuelan government directed boycott of the plaintiff [389] not through a codified provision but through two phone calls from Venezuelan Coordinating Commissioner to the defendants directing them to cease sale to the plaintiff and through a soon-thereafter-issued order of the Minister of Mines and Hydrocarbons who made a public promise that "an end will be put to it" in the wake of a national media upheaval scorning sales to the plaintiff), the time-span during which the foreign prescripts examined in Interamerican Refining was rather short, and the content of these prescripts was not affected by amendments, re-issuance, etc.

Here, in contrast, the alleged governmental compulsion has stretched for more than a decade and was achieved not through a simple issuance of a single legal mandate that remained continuously operative; rather, it was created issuance of 1998 and 1999 rules that addressed the subject of export bidding, and that these 1998 and 1999 rules were, too, repealed by the MOFCOM's 2001 "Measures for Administration of Export Commodities Quotas and the 2001 Measures for the Invitation of Bid for Export Commodity Quotas"; and (b) this chain of enactments necessarily discarded the minimum price requirements because, "[u]nder Chinese law, [the later enacted rules] prevail over any conflicting provisions in prior rules governing the same subject matter." Opp. at 22-23 (citing to Docket Entries Nos. 35-44 (the 1994 "Rules"); 35-57 (one 2001 "Measure"); and 35-58 (another 2001 "Measure")). The Court studied Docket Entries Nos. 35-44, 35-57 and 35-58 but failed to locate any language in Docket Entries Nos. 35-57 [386] and 35-58 conflicting with the minimum price-related language in Docket Entry No. 35-44. Conversely, the MOFCOM's statements that "[t]he export enterprises shall file the [export] quota applications [together with] the relevant documents [that are] according to the requirements" (included in the language of Docket Entry No. 35-57, at 4) and that "[an export bid that is] lower than the minimum limit shall be deemed as an invalid one" (included in Docket Entry No. 35-58, at 5) appear fully in coherence -- or, at the very least, easily harmonizable and certainly not in conflict with the MOFCOM's 1994 requirement that "[the bidding] price for export shall not be lower than the . . . price determined by [the CCCMC]." See Docket Entry No. 35-44, at 4.

[135] Inductive logic is the mode of reasoning by detecting a general conclusion from a set of specific facts. See United States v. McGlory, 968 F.2d 309, 334 (3d Cir. 1992) [388] (illustrating the process of inductive reasoning by quoting the Supreme Court's observation in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171, 179-80, 107 S. Ct. 2775, 97 L. Ed. 2d 144 (1987), which explained that "[i]ndividual pieces of evidence, insufficient in themselves to prove a point, may [--] in cumulation [--] prove it. The sum of an evidentiary presentation may well be greater than its constituent parts. Taken together, these two propositions demonstrate that a piece of evidence, unreliable in isolation, may become quite probative when corroborated by other evidence").

by a legal "regime" that employed various regulatory mechanisms producing a composite effect of a never-ceasing correlation between the minimum price requirement and punitive measures for non-compliance with it. Both the gist and the continuum of such regime was, seemingly, left unaffected by China's decision to embark on the path of gradual reforms toward socialist market economy or by China's accession [390] to the WTO: the MOFCOM's statement filed in the Vitamin C expressly stressed the MOFCOM's opinion that Chinese economic reforms had neither automatic nor direct effect on Chinese export regulations falling within the MOFCOM's rein. See Vitamin C, Civil Action No. 06-md-1738 (E.D.N.Y.), Docket Entry No. 400-1, at 3 (explaining that the "statements of representatives [*450] of the [MOFCOM] and other government agencies, with regard to China's market economy status, and remarks regarding Chinese companies setting price and production volume according to the principle of market demand . . . were made in a different context -- one that had nothing to do with export price regulations -- and were general descriptions of the current status of China's market economy presented in a special context . . . . [These statements] should not be deemed as explicit or implicit statements of China's abandonment of its . . . regulatory policies over certain designated industries"). Given that the MOFCOM has had such perceptions throughout the entire Class Period and, hence, promulgated all its prescripts with the intention to convey its views to the "chambers of commerce" and the industries regulated by these [391] "chambers," Defendants' reading of the relevant regulations in the way identical to the intentions the Chinese government wished to convey appears reasonable.

Moreover, here, Defendants established the actual danger of enforcement through showing constant governmental monitoring: the existence of such monitoring follows from the language of the CCCMC charter, i.e., the document that remained operable and unchanged from 1988 and throughout the entire Class Period. In its relevant parts, the charter reads as follows:

> The aims of [the] CCCMC include[] coordinating . . . export trade activities in the industry of . . . minerals[, like magnesite-based products. The] CCCMC conforms to the laws and regulations of the State, carries out the state policies and guidelines in foreign trade . . . . Functions of [the] CCCMC include . . . coordinating commodity prices for . . . export . . . according to . . . the [MOFCOM and assisting the [MOFCOM] in . . . supervision of [the] member enterprises [so they would] utilize their . . . export quotas and permits legally. . . . Obligations of [the CCCMC m]embers [include] carrying out resolutions and regulations made by [the] CCCMC . . . .For anyone who [392] commits serious violations, the [MOFCOM] may . . . suspend or revoke part or all of [the violator's] right to deal with . . . export trade. The general meeting for [the CCCMC] members . . . is the supreme body of CCCMC, [it is] held every three years [but, in the interim, the] powers and authorities of the general meeting [are] exercised by the Council [which] duties include[s]upervising . . . the work of its branches [like the branch of magnesite-based products. In the interim] of any meeting of the Council, [the] powers and authorities of the Council [are] exercised by its Standing Committee[, which has a] meeting . . . every six months . . . . [In the interim,] several functional departments [are] set up [which are] responsible for the daily work of [the] CCCMC . . . . Branches . . . carry out their activities in accordance with CCCMC [c]harter and [under the] supervision of [the] CCCMC . . . . [B]ranches . . . hold their meetings [during which they] examin[e] the implementation of regulations in regard to coordinated prices for . . . exports and . . . deal with problems occurring due to enterprises that violate the regulations . . . . [In between such branch meetings,] the branch [393] council [has the] powers and authorities to [act] in accordance with CCCMC [c]harter . . . .

Docket Entry No. 99-11, at 2-5.

The language of the charter unambiguously establishes that each member of the CCCMC, including Defendants, could reasonably expect to have: (a) its affairs monitored by the CCCMC on regular basis; and (b) the regulatory regime, including its minimum price requirement, punitively enforced through invocation of those particular prescripts which the CCCMC and/or [*451] the MOFCOM could construe as operable at the time of each particular violation of the minimum price requirement. ---

[136] Plaintiffs erroneously assert that the CCCMC could not be a true enforcement arm of the Chinese government simply because the CCCMC's website describes it as a "self-disciplined organization." See Opp. at 24. However, the MOFCOM clearly indicated that it intended to use [395] the term "self-discipline" in its Chinese meaning, i.e., as a mandate conveying the members' obligation to obey and be ruled by their "chambers of commerce," see Vitamin C, Civil Action No. 06-md-1738

Chambers of Commerce, ("Minister Wu") Vitamin C, Civil Action No. 06-md-1738 (E.D.N.Y.), Docket Entry No. 394-2, at 84, 87 (a publication in which Xu Guo Ming, a "specially invited correspondent," related Minister Wu's explanation that: (a) "[b]usinesses having the right to conduct foreign trade . . . all shall obey the coordination of the [CCCMC]"; (b) "[c]oordination means that all [c]hambers of [c]ommerce must . . . coordinate the . . . export transactions of [their] members from the perspective of safeguarding . . . the normal [394] order of China's foreign trade"; (c) "[China's] socialist market economy is still in a nascent stage [where s]ome enterprises[,] after their operational discretion has expanded[,] have not formed their own mechanism enabling [the Chinese versions of] self-determination . . . , self-discipline and self-development [corresponding to the government policies, and caused t]he phenomemnon of blind competition among domestic companies and disruption of market order"; (d) "[w]ith respect to any individual business found to be in violation of the government regulations and the industry-wide agreement [e.g., as to the minimum price, the CCCMC] shall punish these businesses [and] may propose to the [MOFCOM] to impose sanctions upon such business; and (e) "[t]o facilitate the coordination of the [CCCMC, the MOFCOM plans to] set up several examples by seriously punishing businesses that do not follow the coordination process").

A person applying the United States standard of reasonableness would read the language of the CCCMC charter and Minister Wu's statement as evidence of the CCCMC's: (a) actual enforcement powers; and (b) intent to use these powers punitively. Accord Resco WDPa, Civil Action No. 06-235 (JFC) (W.D. Pa.), Docket Entry No. 123-4, at 7 and 9 (the November 4, 2009, Request for a WTO Panel by the USTR, asserting that "China . . . imposes . . . restrictions on the exportation of the [minerals falling within the scope of the [*452] CCCMC] by requiring that prices for the[se] materials meet or exceed a minimum [397] price before they may be exported" and relying, inter alia, on the language of the charter). A fortiori, a reasonable person standing in Defendants' shoes could duly conclude that a violation of the minimum price requirement would entail, in actuality, such high risk of punishment that it would warrant compliance. [137] Therefore, Defendants's actions could be viewed as governmentally compelled, even if Defendants never decided to challenge the CCCMC/MOFCOM by non-compliance with the minimum price requirement: the defense of duress does not require the defendant to act self-destructively.

(E,D.N.Y.), Docket Entry No. 400-1, at 3, and the Court has no reason to presume that the CCCMC, being directly controlled by the MOFCOM, defined itself by using the American rather than the Chinese meaning of the phrase "self-discipline." See, e.g., Wang Xiaoye, The Prospect of Antimonopoly Legislation in China, 2002 Wash. U. Glob. Studies 2001, 208-09, available at <<http://law.wustl.edu/wugsh/issues/volume1/p201Wang.pdf>> (where the author, a professor of law at the Chinese Academy of Social Studies, being unaffiliated with any litigation, observed that "[o]ne always should view 'industrial self-discipline prices' as a synonym for government intervention in price competition among enterprises. In August 1998, the State Economic and Trade Commission [of China] issued its 'Opinions On Self-Discipline Pricing For Certain Industrial Products,' which, on the grounds that it was necessary to end price wars and disorderly competition, demanded that the producers of certain industrial products [396] observe the minimum price limits set by their respective trade associations. . . . 'Industrial self-discipline prices' operate as a type of compulsory price cartel because they force enterprises to sell their products according to 'coordinated prices' . . . which [are] based . . . on the average costs within a particular industry [and, thus, necessarily] exceed[] the individual costs of . . . efficient enterprises[; that, in turn,] restrict[s] the scope of price reduction for these enterprises and deprive[s] them of the opportunity to expand their production and operation") (footnote omitted).

[137] Charles Sanders Peirce, an American philosopher, logician and scientist, introduced the method of logical inference known as abductive reasoning, where an assessment of a set of facts that appear related is performed with a presumption that these facts are indeed related. See Collected Papers of Charles Sanders Peirce 248, 268 (Charles Hartshorne & Paul Weiss editors, 1934). "We proceed by guesses, Pierce explain[ed], because 'our knowledge is never absolute." Louis Menand, American Prodigy, N.Y. Rev. Books 30, 35 (Dec. 2, 1993). Abductive reasoning permits use of a known rule in order to explain [398] an observation: the statement "if it rains, the grass is wet" is an example, since the technically correct observation should be an Occam razor "if the grass is wet, the most probable explanation is that it recently rained." Piercian philosophy is manifested in human tendency to accept one's word as one knows it, and it has become an indelible part of the United States jurisprudence after the decisions written by Oliver Wendell Holmes, Louis Brandeis, Benjamin Cardozo and Learned Hand, who transformed American legal formalism into contextualism. See Richard A. Posner, The Problems of Jurisprudence 26-28 & n.41 (1990); Robert L. Hayman Jr. & Nancy Levit, Jurisprudence 453 (1994); see also Wilson Huhn, The Five Types of Legal Arguments 13-68 (2002); Jeremy Paul, The Politics of Legal Semiotics, 69 Tex. L. Rev. 1779 (1991); accord Warner v. Goltra, 293 U.S. 155, 156, 55 S. Ct. 46, 79 L. Ed. 254 (1934) (Cardozo, J., utilizing the "policy of liberal construction" to correct a prior line of cases where "verbal niceties were bent to the over-mastering purpose of the [law]"). Thus, Defendants' correlation of the monitoring/enforcement by the CCCMC to the stream of prescripts creating the legal regime and to the possible [399] maximum punishment is a valid exercise in contextual logic.

e. Miscellaneous Considerations

Plaintiffs, however, appear to be of opinion that the risk of punishment Defendants faced for non-compliance was insufficiently high to substantiate compulsion. In support of that position:

(i) Plaintiffs assert that a third of Chinese exporters of magnesite products did not comply with the minimum price requirement. This argument seemingly aims at suggesting that a persistent non-compliance with the requirement did not endanger the operations of those exporters ("Market-split Point");

(ii) Fostering, it seems, an analogous point, Plaintiffs rely on the asserted export practices of Zhejiang, the litigant which European Union case was built on its alleged non-compliance with the minimum price requirement applicable to the members of the glyphosate section of the CCCMC ("Zhejiang Xinan Point"); and, in addition

(iii) Plaintiffs point out that the respective yearly export quotas allotted by the Chinese government to the magnesite products industry were frequently not fully used. This argument, seemingly, aims to suggest that the punishment of having one's export quota reduced as a result of non-compliance [400] with the minimum price requirement would not be a "real" punishment because the so-punished enterprise would stand to lose an opportunity it cannot use anyway ("Quota-allotment Point"). See Opp. at 23, 50-51 and 58.

For the reasons detailed below, the Court is not persuaded.

[*453] The gist of Plaintiffs' Zhejiang Xinan Point appears to be that, if Zhejiang was not punished for not complying with the minimum price requirement, then the requirement existed only "on paper" and, thus, could not compel Defendants "in actuality." However, Plaintiffs' reading of Zhejiang Xinan omits to take into account that Zhejiang was a member of the glyphosate section of the CCCMC, see Zhejiang Xinan, 2009 ECJ EUR-Lex LEXIS 529, P 4, which might have had far less stringent supervision/enforcement than the magnesite section, of which Defendants were members. In addition, Plaintiffs ignore the Trial Court's careful clarification that the EU amended its antidumping law hoping to "enable qualified Chinese exporters, however few they may be," to achieve the MET status, see id. P 62 (emphasis supplied): such acknowledgment suggests the Trial Court's realization that non-compliance with the minimum price requirement [401] was recognized by the European Union to be an exception rather than the rule of the Chinese exportation. Similarly, Plaintiffs omit noticing Zhejiang's own concession of the EU Council's position that MOFCOM/CCCMC's well-developed regulatory, monitoring and enforcement mechanisms remained invariably operable (at least until the date of the issuance of Zheiiang Xinan, that is, until June 17, 2009). See id. PP 130, 140 ("[t]he Council contends . . . that there was a very efficient control system in place . . . [Zhejiang] does not dispute that [this CCCMC's approval and veto] mechanism"). Therefore, the conclusions that can be drawn from Plaintiffs' Zhejiang Xinan Point is that Defendants' situation might have been different from Zhejiang's, and Defendants were not as intrepid in their business affairs as Zhejiang was in his. However, these conclusions are inapposite to the issue of actual risk of punishment faced by Defendants because a duress inquiry turns on the ability to resist pressure of an average person and, in addition, on the "egg-shell" qualities of the defendant. See Restatement 2d, Torts, §§ 871, comment f; 892B, comment j.

Advancing their Market-split Point, Plaintiffs' [402] claim that, "if the law had compelled magnesite exporters to fix-prices, all magnesite exporters would have participated in the cartel. Instead, up to 30% of the exporters declined to participate in 2001." Opp. at 58 (citing Am. Compl. P 54). However, the allegations stated in Paragraph Fifty-Four are silent as to anyone's refusal to comply with the minimum price requirement; rather, Paragraph Fifty-Four merely states that "[t]he members of the two Jiyuan and Huaxia Magnesite Groups [i.e., the initial "sub-cartels,"] collectively represented more than 70 percent of the export volume of magnesite in China." Docket Entry No. 77, P 54. Hence, it appears that Plaintiffs simply deduced from the compulsion-unrelated statement in the Amended Complaint that the remaining less-than-thirty percent of Chinese exporters ("Remaining Exporters") did not comply with the minimum price requirement because they did not feel "compelled enough."

Plaintiffs' deducement is logically flawed, being not only a stretch of logic but also inconsistent in light of other statements made in the Amended Complaint. Specifically, in Paragraph Sixty-Nine of the Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs contend that "Defendants have [403] been able to increase [export] prices [for magnesite-based products] without maintaining 100 percent control of the market [because they] have competitive advantage of lower costs than their competitors," that is, the Remaining Exporters. Id. P 69 and note 22. [138]

[*454] In other words, Plaintiffs concede that these Remaining Exporters were exporting their magnesite-based goods at the prices equal to or exceeding [407] Defendants' prices which, in turn, were equal to or exceeding the minimum price mandated by the government. Consequently, Plaintiffs effectively concede that these Remaining Exporters were automatically complying with the minimum price requirement by exporting at above the minimum price, [*455] which -- in turn -- means that none of these exporters could have possibly displayed a Zhejiang-like non-compliance with the requirement. In light of the foregoing, this Court cannot conclude that the conduct of these Remaining Exporters somehow indicated that the risk of punishment for non-compliance was absent, granted that these Remaining Exporters invariably complied with the minimum price requirement. [139]

[138] Note 22 of the Amended Complaint refers the Court to CEH, the document seemingly central to Lamb's Report. See supra note 26 of this Opinion (observing that CEH was not attached to Lamb's Report, and the Court could only locate the "product review" titled "Magnesium Oxide and Other Magnesium Chemicals" online which allows the reader only the table of contents but, otherwise, requires a $ 3,000 subscription, see <<http://www.sriconsulting. com/cgi-bin/listoptions.pl?/CEH/Public/Reports/747.2000/>>). Same as Lamb's Report, Plaintiffs' Opposition, in footnote 3, referred to this "product review" and advised the Court that certain "excerpts [of this 'product review' were] attached [to Plaintiffs' Opposition] as Exhibit 2." Opp. at 14, n.3. However, the Declaration of Robert A. Magnanini ("Magnanini Declaration"), also attached to the Opposition, advises the Court that "[a]ttached hereto as Exhibit 2 is a . . . copy of the Comments [404] from the [CCCMC] to [the DOC]." Docket Entry No. 105-2, at 2. Giving Plaintiffs the benefit of the doubt, the Court examined the entire Magnanini Declaration and all exhibits attached to the Opposition in order to determine whether the promised excerpts of CEH were attached as an exhibit other than Exhibit 2, but detected no such exhibit. See, generally, Docket Entry No. 105-2. Since Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint was also accompanied by certain exhibits, the Court -- in order to ensure fairness to Plaintiffs -- also examined all those exhibits aiming to locate these excerpts of CEH, but detected none. See Docket Entries Nos. 77-1, 77-2 and 77-3. Therefore, the Court has no information as to either the content or reliability of CEH statements on the basis of which Plaintiffs reached their conclusion that Defendants' costs were lower than the costs of the remaining less-than-thirty percent of Chinese exporters. Moreover, it is unclear to the Court how could CEH authors possibly provide such information since: (a) in order to make an accounting determination as to average costs, data was needed as to the actual identities and actual fixed and variable costs (plus marginal costs) of each [405] member of such "sub-cartels," as well as to the identities and the corresponding costs of alleged non-members of these "sub-cartels," see Cascade Health Solutions v. PeaceHealth,* 515 F.3d 883, 909 (9th Cir. 2008) (detailing the calculation of per-unit cost); (b) CEH, not being a member of the CCCMC, could not have access to Defendants' (and other CCCMC members') accounting data, which was disclosed only internally; and (c) any public information upon which the authors of CEH could have relied had to be facially insufficient, because the Chinese Accounting Standards ("CAS"), rather than Accounting Standards for Business Enterprises ("ASBE"), governed the disclosure requirement until January 1, 2007 (that is, until six years after CEH was produced), see, e.g., <<http://www.chinaorbit.com/ china-economy/chinese-accounting- standards.html>>, and -- unlike the ASBE (which still differ from and are perceived as less stringent than the International Accounting Standards ("IAS"), see, e.g., Songlan Peng, Chinese Accounting Standards (VDM Verlag Dr. Mueller e.K. 2007)) --the CAS required only a limited disclosure of the enterprise's accounting and financial data, and, in addition, directed [406] the accounting approaches, which -- under the IAS and the Generally Accepted Accounting Principles United States -- should be qualified as data distortion. See Michael E. Burke IV, China's Stock Markets and the World Trade Organization, 30 Law & Pol'y Int'l Bus 321, 363-64 (1999) ("[the CAS] require that fixed assets be stated at cost[,] . . . inventories [be] stated at cost [too,] . . . [d]epreciation [information be distorted because] residual value [could not be disclosed in excess of] 3% to 5% of original cost[,] . . . [p]re-operating expenses [had to be] amortized in equal installments over five years [rather than as they were in reality], [s]hareholder equity [had to be] valued at the official rate [rather than at market rate, and] bad debts [could not be disclosed in excess of] 0.3% to 0.5% of total receivables") (relying on CAS provisions discussed in detail in Matthew Harrison, Asia-Pacific Securities Markets (2d ed. 1994), and Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu International, International Tax and Business Guide: People's Republic of China (1997)).

[139] Moreover, it seems that Plaintiffs' position could be reduced to a concession that the entire Chinese magnesite industry complied with the minimum price requirement, but Defendants and their unidentified "co-conspirators" were not "truly compelled" because they embraced the law willingly, while the Remaining Exporters "rebelled responsibly" by complying with the minimum

Finally, Plaintiffs' Quota-allotment Point is flawed both statistically and economically. Plaintiffs assert that, "[i]n 2001, the export quota[] awarded by the [Chinese] government [to all Chinese exporters, as an industry,] exceeded the actual volume of magnesite exports by more than 300,000 tons. [Unspecified amount of such industry-wide e]xport quota[was] also left unused in 2004. In 2009, export quota [allotted, too, industry-wide] have again exceeded the total volume of exports." Opp. at 23 (citing Docket Entry No. 99-15, at 3 (addressing 2001); Docket Entry No. 105-28, at 4 (addressing 2004); and Docket Entry No. 105-29 (addressing 2009)). However, the Court has no reason to deduce from such [409] industry-wide statistics that Defendants personally did not fully use their allotted quotas and, hence, that the danger of having their personal quotas reduced was necessarily perceived by Defendants as a punishment too irrelevant to remove the compulsive force of the minimum price requirement. Moreover, even if the Court were to presume that the danger of having the export quota reduced was only a nominal concern to Defendants, such presumption has no effect on Defendants' concerns as to their ability to make a living altogether, i.e., the concern that non-compliance with the minimum price requirement might result in revocation of the exporter's license, thus yielding the "allotted quota" of zero. Since there is a dramatic distinction between: (a) one's lack of concern with being able to conduct hypothetical extra business; and (b) one's ability to conduct any business, Plaintiffs' Quota-allotment Point cannot change the outcome of the Court's analysis. [140]

The remaining points made by Plaintiffs are, alas, outlined rather faintly. However, recognizing that HN80[] abstention is a case-dispositive measure that shall not be imposed lightly, see Mannington Mills, 595 F.2d at 1293, the Court feels obligated to address every Plaintiffs' argument the [*456] Court can detect. For instance, the Court notes Plaintiffs' statement that, "the most that can be said of the [Chinese legal regime] is that the Chinese government [was] enforc[ing] agreements among members of a chamber of commerce regarding minimum export prices[; however, legislation of a foreign country that merely aids defendants' conspiracy does not convert defendants' deliberate acts into acts of the [411] foreign government." Opp. at 48 (citing United States v. Sisal Sales Corp., 274 U.S. 268, 276, 47 S. Ct. 592, 71 L. Ed. 1042 (1927), and Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 705, 82 S. Ct. 1404, 8 L. Ed. 2d 777 (1962)). The Court agrees with Plaintiffs as to the latter aspect (that is, as to the statement of the legal rule), but not with Plaintiffs' application of that rule to the fact in the instant matter, since both cases cited by Plaintiffs expressly turned on lack of direct (or even indirect) government compulsion, [141] which is not the case here.

Another ambiguous argument fostered by Plaintiffs is the Misplaced Argument (raised in support of Plaintiffs' position that the CCCMC was/is not an appendage of the Chinese government). As noted supra, the Misplaced Argument asserts, in part, that the MOFCOM's Circular of February 12, 1998, should be deemed repealed by the price out of business necessity but being "emotionally opposed" to the legal regime and "hypothetically willing" to not comply [408] with its requirement. The Court cannot accept Plaintiffs' assertion of such hypothetical rebellion by unspecified enterprises as a proof that the risk of punishment was not actually present. Moreover, Plaintiffs' reference to unspecified "co-conspirators" of Defendants, see supra note 14 of this Opinion, allows for a conclusion that, after 2001, all exporters became Defendants' "co-conspirators" by abandoning their hypothetical rebellion and willingly embracing the minimum price requirement.

[140] Plaintiffs' Quota-allotment Point appears particularly duplicitous in light of Plaintiff Resco's claim to the ITA that China has successfully utilized the process of export quota allotment (jointly with China's minimum price [410] requirement) to achieve compulsive control over the business practices of Chinese exporters dealing in magnesite-based goods. See Magnesite from China, 74 Fed. Reg. 68,247-48 ("[China] has established export quotas and a minimum acceptable export sales price (i.e., export restraints) for a number of raw materials, including three types of magnesi[te] used in the production of [the products at issue in the instant matter. All Chinese] exporters of magnesi[te] are subject to these export restraints").

[141] Plaintiffs' reading of Sisal Sales is virtually identical to the reading of Sisal Sales by the plaintiffs in In re Refined Petroleum Prods. Antitrust Litig., 649 F. Supp. 2d 572 (S.D. Tex. 2009). The Refined Petroleum court provided a detailed discussion of Sisal Sales and carefully explained why the holding of Sisal Sales does not apply to the scenario where a foreign sovereign creates -- and/or directs compliance with -- the prescript that lies at the root of the defendants' conduct. See Refined Petroleum, 649 F. Supp. 2d at 590-91. Hence, for the reasons provided by the Refined Petroleum court, Plaintiffs' position is without merit. Similarly, Plaintiffs' reliance [412] on Continental Ore is misplaced: in that matter, the Supreme Court dealt with a scenario where "nothing . . . indicate[d] that [the foreign sovereign's] law in any way compelled [the defendants' conduct,]" and where "there [was] no indication that . . . any . . . official within the structure of the [foreign] Government approved or would have approved [the defendants' conduct] or directed that [conduct]." Continental Ore, 370 U.S. at 706-07.

beginning of the Class Period because the Circular "pre-date[d] the formation of two initial export cartels by two years and pre-date[d] the formation of the unified export cartel by three years[, as well as] China's accession to the WTO [during which] China explained to the WTO [that,] by 2000[,] there [was] only limited number of products subject to government price control." The errors in Plaintiffs' position that the passage [413] of time or China's decision to embark on the path of gradual economic reforms (or China's accession to the WTO) interrupted the legal continuum of Chinese law were already addressed supra. What has not been addressed thus far is Plaintiffs' position that Defendants' reading of the 1998 Circular is "clearly contrary to [the] interpretation [given] by the CCCMC." Opp. at 52 (emphasis removed) (relying on Plaintiffs' exhibits filed as Docket Entries Nos. 105-4 and 105-21).

Plaintiffs misread the Circular, the position taken by Defendants, and the content of their own exhibits evincing the position of the Chinese government. The Circular reads as follows:

> . . . All chambers . . . shall actively do a good job in the coordination of export goods. [The MOFCOM] hereby notif[ies the chambers as follows : You must be s]trengthening [your] investigation on the export situation of price coordination . . . . [You must be] adjusting the coordinating prices of export commodities . . . : at present, being affected by the Asian Financial Crisis, [142] the condition of some commodities in the international market is not stable, and [*457] China's competitiveness in export has been under threat. Therefore, all [414] chambers . . . shall clean up the current export price coordination plans in an all-round way and organize member enterprises to deliberate and adjust the negotiated prices of some export commodities so as to, under the precondition of maintaining the [profitable] economic effects of exports, improve China's competitiveness of export and enhance [the Chinese version of] the normal development of export.

Docket Entry 35-52, at 2-3. Defendants' reliance on the Circular is limited to two statements made in the Minmetals' Motion, reading: "[t]he chamber responsible for assisting [the] MOFCOM in connection with the coordination of numerous issues relating to the export of magnesite is the [CCCMC]," and "[the] MOFCOM . . . mandates [inter alia,] that exporters follow [the] minimum export price [the actual figures of which are e]stablished through [Defendants'] chambers of commerce." M/Mot. at 10, 14. Hence, Defendants in no way asserted that all "chambers of commerce" were engaged in developing minimum price figures or in enforcement of the minimum price requirement: they merely stated that the CCCMC was performing these functions, and that these functions were in accord with the MOFCOM's [415] mandate stated in the Circular.

The content of the exhibits relied upon by Plaintiffs in support of their assertion that the CCCMC's reading of the Circular is contrary to the reading offered in the Minmetals' Motion provides Plaintiffs with no such support. In fact, Plaintiffs' exhibit filed as Docket Entry No. 105-4 was already discussed supra, in conjunction with Plaintiffs' position that the CCCMC is not an appendage of the Chinese government. As noted supra, this exhibit is the CCCMC's letter to the DOC, dated April 19, 2007, which begins with the statement, "[o]n behalf of [the CCCMC] and our 4[,]000 companies, we submit the following comments on [the non-MET status applied by the DOC to the Chinese goods imported into the United States]." Docket Entry No. 105-4, at 2. The other exhibit upon which Plaintiffs rely, filed as Docket Entry No. 105-21, is the MOFCOM's comments ("Comments") dated June 25, 2007, and addressed to the DOC. Same as the CCCMC's letter of April 19, 2007, the MOFCOM's Comments seek to persuade the DOC

United States, 477 F. Supp. 2d 1313, 1324 n.12, 31 Ct. Int'l Trade 313 (C.I.T. 2007)* (citation and quotation marks omitted). The crisis started in Thailand upon financial collapse of baht, the Thai currency, and swiftly spread throughout most of Southeast Asia, affecting predominantly Japan, Indonesia, South Korea and Thailand, but also hurting the economies of Hong Kong, Malaysia, Laos and the Philippines, and causing losses in China, India, Taiwan, Singapore, Brunei and Vietnam, with a prolong ripple effect throughout the entire global community. that the non-MET status shall apply to Chinese enterprises importing goods into the United States. The Comments [417] state, in relevant part, as follows:

> [T]he United States has persistently refused China's application [for the MET status] on various pretexts and fully ignored the evidence and facts that have [*458] been provided by China. Because the United States has persisted in designating China as a non-market economy country in its antidumping investigations, the result is that Chinese enterprises cannot [get more favorable MET] treatment in antidumping investigations. Over more than 20 years of accelerating reforms in its economic system, China has established a market economy system [that] has not only been written into the Chinese constitution, but is, in fact, a more developed market economy system than the system of some countries which the U.S. has actually recognized as market economies . . . . We hope that the U.S. government can also objectively see the achievements that China has achieved in its reforms and in opening-up and becoming a true market economy. There is no basis to deny the status of market orientation to China's exporting industries on the pretext that the prices of . . . main raw materials inputs by enterprise are controlled by the government. [China does not see such price [418] control as an intervention qualifying China as a non-market economy because] China does not intervene in these prices any more than do governments in countries that the U.S. considers market oriented. Market economy countries, including the United States, are no exception to selective interventions [employed by China]. Governments in market economies attempt to influence price trends in the same way that China attempts to influence price trends. [Since t]his practice is not unique to China and not unique to non-market economies[, China should be deemed a market economy].

Docket Entry No. 105-21, at 2-7. Since the case at bar is not an antidumping proceeding, this Court need not address the issue of whether the DOC/ITA correctly calculate antidumping duties imposed on Chinese enterprises bringing their goods for sale in the United States. However, the content of Comment appears enlightening as to what seems to be a conflict in the CCCMC/ MOFCOM's tendency to simultaneously claim that: (a) the exporting enterprises have been operating under "market economy conditions"; but, nonetheless, (b) the exporting enterprises have been subject to enforcement of the minimum price requirement. This [419] seeming incongruence appears to be rooted in the difference between: (a) the Western world's perception of a market economy as a materialization of the laissez-faire concepts articulated by Adam Smith; [143] and (b) the Chinese unique vision of "socialist market economy." See also, supra note [*459] 117 of this Opinion (discussing the difference between "pure" and "socialist" market economies).

This Court is neither in the position nor has a mandate to pass judgment on the economic route or economic goals chosen by the Chinese government. Accord Vitamin C, 584 F. Supp. 2d at 559 ("The court does not question th[e] goal or even China's methods of [transition from a command to a market economy]"). The inquiry before the Court is narrow, i.e., whether the Chinese government compelled Defendants' compliance with the minimum price requirement. The MOFCOM's Comments answer this question in the affirmative, explaining that the Chinese government exercised such compulsion while perceiving it wholly compatible with the Chinese version of [421] socialist market economy. Such answer eliminates the conflict in the position taken by the MOFCOM and CCCMC, and -- jointly with the MOFCOM's E.D.N.Y. Statements filed in Vitamin C, Resco's admissions noted in [143] Adam Smith is perceived as the father of political economics. His "Theory of Moral Sentiments" (1756) and his magnum opus "The Wealth of Nations" (1776) set the framework of what is known as laissez-faire market economy, driven by the invisible hand consisting of such forces as self-interest, competition, and supply and demand. See Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corp. v. Public Service Comm'n, 447 U.S. 557, 592, 100 S. Ct. 2343, 65 L. Ed. 2d 341 (1980) (Rehnquist, J. dissenting) (detailing the concept of the invisible hand and discussing Smith's influence on the theories of markets); Hume v. Moore-McCormack Lines, Inc., 121 F.2d 336,338-45 (2d Cir. 1941) (same). The concepts articulated by John Maynard Keynes in "The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money," published in 1936, altered laissez-faire economics by introducing the [420] concept of a "mixed economy," based predominantly on private sector but, nonetheless, envisioning a large role played by the government. See Ronconi v. Larkin, 253 F.3d 423, 427 and n. 3 (9th Cir. 2001) (summarizing the rationale of Keynesian economics); see also United States Dep't of Labor v. Triplett, 494 U.S. 715, 724, 110 S. Ct. 1428, 108 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1990) (quoting Keynes' famous justification for governmental intervention, "[i]n the long run, we are all dead"). It appears that the MOFCOM's Comments were referring to the Keynesian model widely employed by many current nations.

Magnesite from China, the USTR's request for a WTO panel filed in Resco WDPa, evidence filed in this matter and those detected by the Court -- concludes the Court's inquiry into whether abstention is warranted: this inquiry is limited to the actual presence and enforcement of governmental compulsion, and it does not concern itself with how China harmonized such compulsion with the economic terminology and goals she selected.

That being said, the Court cannot ignore the implications of one more, although rather vaguely articulated, Plaintiffs' argument that reads as follows:

> Plaintiffs allege the formation of two separate [sub-] cartels acting outside the purview of the CCCMC in 2000 and the unification of those cartels [into a single "Cartel"] in 2001. The[] acts [of creating these specific "sub-cartels" and "Cartel"] were not contemplated or directed by any CCCMC document[] submitted to the Court.

Opp. at 53 (citing Am. Compl. PP 1, 52-55, 57-65 and 68).

It appears that Plaintiffs' [422] logic is as follows: since (a) there is no CCCMC's document on the record directing, in express writing, creation of the first two alleged "sub-cartels"; and (b) there is also no CCCMC's document on the record directing, in express writing, unification of these alleged "sub-cartels" into the alleged "unified Cartel," such lack of documentary proof as to the government-mandated stages of "cartelization" must also mean lack of government-mandated minimum price requirement, because -- had it been a government-mandated minimum price -- it would have applied to all exporters of magnesite-based goods at once and long before the two alleged "sub-cartels" came about.

The argument -- if correctly distilled by the Court -- is flawed with regard to the issue of government compulsion, as a concept, due to Plaintiffs' misreading of the exhibits filed in this matter. Here, the CCCMC charter indicates that the magnesite section of the CCCMC was continuously operating by holding mandatory meetings at various levels. See Docket Entry No. 99-11, at 4-5. The fact that the list of attendees of these meetings varied (and, at each meeting, different attendees expressed their ardor in supporting China's export [423] goals or in deliberating the actual minimum price figures) in no way renders a nation-wide governmental enforcement of the minimum price requirement impossible. [144] However, this fact [*460] also suggests that -- unrelated to the issue of MOFCOM/CCCMC's enforcement of the government-mandated minimum prices --certain members of the Chinese magnesite industry could have entered into a number of their private agreements to sell their goods at a certain "supra-minimum price" ("SMP"). See Opp. at 53 (citing Am. Compl. PP 1, 52-55, 57-65 and 68, where the relevant Paragraphs [145] rely on Plaintiffs' Exhibits 6-9 and 11-20, filed as Docket Entries Nos. 77-1, 77-2 and 77-3). [146]

[144] China covers 9,596,961 square kilometers, being just slightly smaller than the United States, and is the fourth largest country in the world. See, e.g., <<https://www.cia.gov/library/ publications/the-world-factbook/geos/ch.html>>. Climate conditions, infrastructure, technical advancement, cost of labor, standards of living, etc., differ dramatically throughout China, although some of these differences are gradually dissipating. See, e.g., Stephen L. Morgan, Richer and Taller: Stature and Living Standards in China, 1979-1995, [424] The China Journal 44 (July 2000) (discussing the differences between regions at the end of the 20th century). Therefore, it would be improper for this Court to presume that the "minimum price" was necessarily a single figure rendered for a country-wide application: indeed, such "one price" approach is typical only to a centrally planned economy, with which China is trying to part. Rather, China's decision to transition to a socialist market economy appears far more compatible with an initial balkanization of the industry and a "schedule of minimum prices" factoring in the peculiarities of different locales, state or private ownership of the enterprises, size of production facilities, length of export license operation, etc., with progressive harmonization of such schedule later on, as the differences in the exporters' operations fade out. The Court, being a United States district court, is not in the position to fancy the political or economic considerations utilized by the CCCMC/ MOFCOM throughout a decade of administrative regulations: the federal courts tend to avoid second guessing even the expertise of the agencies operating in the United States, see, e.g., Browning-Ferris Indus. of South Jersey, Inc. v. Muszynski, 899 F.2d 151, 160 (2d Cir. 1990) [425] ("HN81[] [c]ourts should be particularly reluctant to second-guess agency choices involving [technical matters] that are in the agency's province of expertise"), and they are certainly not in the position to render on or guess the considerations falling within the expertise of a foreign agency.

[145] The Court is not entirely clear as to the rationale underlying Plaintiffs' citations to the paragraphs in the Amended Complaint that state either irrelevant information or factless self-serving conclusions, i.e., Paragraph One (asserting that "[t]his case arises out of a conspiracy among all Defendants and their co-conspirators that has the purpose and effect of fixing prices of magnesite and magnesite products"); Paragraph Fifty-Five (asserting that, "[a]s a result of [Defendants'] agreements, despite slumping

Specifically:

[*461] (i) Exhibits 6, 7 and 8 seem to describe the creation of the first alleged "sub-cartel," stating: "China Jiayuan Magnesite Export Group has been formed by 13 Chinese [428] magnesite enterprises. . . Currently, this group produces more than 70% of total magnesite output and 50% of the export quota in China"; "A magnesite export group has been set up in Dalian, a coastal city in Northeast China's Liaoning Province. The group has 13 member companies"; and "Chinese leading magnesite producers formed an alliance, Jia Yuan Magnesite Export Group, on [April 9,] 2000." Exhibit 9 seems to describe the creation of the second "sub-cartel," stating: "[a] second magnesium carbonate group has been formed in China. Huaxia Magnesium Products Export Group is made up of 25 companies . . . . The group indicates that it will account for over 55% of Chinese magnesium products. However, the first export group[,] Jia Yuan, has also claimed to have 50-60% of total export licence for magnesite." Hence, if -- as Plaintiffs assert -- both alleged "sub-cartels" were created at the same time, see Am. Compl. P 53, the Chinese export industry dealing in magnesite-based goods was simultaneously "cartelized," in its entirety: this scenario seems highly compatible with a nation-wide government compulsion (and government-imposed minimum price requirement), but it appears utterly peculiar [429] in the absence of it.

(ii) Exhibits 11, 12, 13 and 14 seem to describe the creation of the "unified Cartel" (which appears to be the entire magnesite section of the CCCMC) and its initial operations, reporting: "the formation of a new single unified group to take the place of two previous separate groups designed to control China's magnesite prices and exports"; "The Chinese Magnesite Export Association . . . so far the group has acted in unity"; "One of the major developments over the past year has been the formation of a powerful magnesite exporters' group -- the Chinese Magnesite Export Association." Hence, these exhibits also suggest a government compulsion and a governmentally imposed minimum price requirement.

(iii) Exhibit 16 seems to describe one of the meetings held by the magnesite section, stating: "[o]n March 22, 19 major enterprises from the [m]agnesite export industry held a meeting in Shenyang to thoroughly review and analyze the [m]agnesite export industry and to discuss and forecast the international market demand and price trend for the year 2003. After much discussion and exchange of ideas, the group agreed to the immediate setting up of the Magnesite Export Industry [430] Self-regulating Group . . . . demand, the price of magnesite products imported from China to the United States increased during 2000"); Paragraph Sixty-Five (asserting that, "[d]ue to the efforts to increase prices at the end of 2003, the [unified] Cartel achieved significant price increases in the U.S., stabilized U.S. prices, and avoided major price cutting despite low levels of demand"); and Paragraph Sixty-Eight (asserting [426] that "Defendants' decision to enter into the per se unlawful agreements . . . was and is wholly voluntary").

[146] Exhibits 6-9, 11-14, 16-17, and 19-20 replicate: (a) China Jiayuan Magnesite Export Group, Engineering & Mining J. (Aug. 1, 2000); (b) Magnesite Export Group Set up in China's Dalian, Asia Pulse (Apr. 11, 2000); (c) Magnesium Carbonate Producers Form Export Syndicates, Indus. Exhibit 15 does not address the issue of "cartelization"; rather, it reproduces a statement by Liu Jianwei, the head of Legal Services Department of the CCCMC, stating that the CCCMC [427] "is a non-government organization" but, nonetheless, it acts "as a bridge between the government and its [2600] members," thus suggesting that the CCCMC is an appendage of China within the meaning of Chinese version of socialist market economy. Exhibit 18, Docket Entry 77-2, presents no information as to the issue of "cartel-creation." Exhibit 20, Docket Entry 77-3, at 13-14, advocates against Plaintiffs' position since the Exhibit states that, "[o]f critical importance was the introduction of controls on export prices and volumes by China's central government in 1994, which had an immediate and lasting effect on minerals trade from China . . . . Export licenses [are] unique to China but has transformed the trade in certain minerals from China to the West. China's central government, through the [CCCMC], implemented its export license system [since] 1994 . . . to enable stricter control of export volumes and prices [and] reduce smuggling." The Court is not entirely clear as to why Plaintiffs' rely on Exhibit 20.

(iv) Exhibit 17 seems to describe either another local meeting or, potentially, the creation of an unrelated-to-the-CCCMC's-operations collusive group that entered into its own SMP agreement, stating: "[i]n February [2004, under the name] the China Magnesite Self-disciplined Association[,]. . . the fifth version of the group was established. . . . The new group represents [only] five . . . Chinese producers . . . ." The Exhibit is silent as to the identities of the producers that entered into that agreement.

(v) Same as Exhibit 17, Exhibit 19 seems to describe either another local meeting or, potentially, the creation of an unrelated-to-the-CCCMC's-operations [431] collusive group entering into its own SMP agreement (or a re-creation of the collusive group described in Exhibit 17), stating: "In December [2006], the four principal producers of magnesite in China agreed on a $ 10-per-metric-ton price increase for their [magnesium oxide]. This followed the $ 30-per-metric-ton price increases that were [already] announced in November [2006]." Just as Exhibit 17, the Exhibit 19 is silent as to the identities of the producers that entered into that agreement. See Docket Entries Nos. 77-1 and 77-3.

5. Compulsion Established and Asserted

As the foregoing illustrates, the evidence presented in this matter, jointly with the evidence detected by the Court, establishes to the Court's satisfaction that the Chinese government indeed compelled compliance with "a" minimum price, which -- in turn -- means that Defendants' conduct prompted by that particular compulsion warrants this Court's abstention.

This conclusion, however, leaves two aspects unresolved. The first requires establishing the minimum price figures that applied to Defendants' export operations during the period at issue: if such actual figures were never coined or coined but left unknown to Defendants [432] and to the Chinese governmental bodies enforcing the minimum price requirement (i.e., the CCCMC, MOFCOM, Chinese customs, etc.), then such actual figures were, for all practical purposes, equal to zero, and every agreement to comply with a minimum price above zero would, in that case, be just a private contract lacking governmentally compelled nature and not warranting abstention. [147]

Moreover, even if it is determined that the minimum price figures were known to Defendants and the Chinese governmental bodies enforcing the minimum price requirement, such determination cannot eliminate the possibility that [433] certain Chinese entities, opportunely taking advantage of Chinese governmentally-imposed minimum export prices, entered into their private SMP agreements. [148] If so, such [*463] SMP agreements could be illegal

[147] As the Court pointed out in its notes 104 and 145 of this Opinion, the Court is mindful of the possibility that the minimum price figures might exist in the form of complex schedules and might even be available for verification only through testimonial rather than documentary evidence in light of the secrecy shrouding the process of Chinese minimum price creation and compliance. Accord Vitamin C, 584 F. Supp. 2d at 553 (observing that the charter of the CCMHPC required its members to strictly follow the minimum price but simultaneously directed them keep this matter "confidential").

[148] An SMP scenario is, in its workings, identical to the scenario where the governmental minimum price figures are unknown to Defendants/Chinese government bodies because, there, any agreement privately reached between the parties as to the sale at/above a certain minimum price would automatically be an SMP agreement, with the SMP equal to itself (SMP minus zero). Conversely, if the governmentally-imposed minimum price is known to Defendants/Chinese government bodies, then the entities that purchased these [434] defendants' goods could have suffered the base injury equal to the market-forces-unrelated share of the SMP (where the SMP is the difference between the price actually charged and the government-compelled minimum price). Accord Docket Entry No. 77-1, at 70 (Plaintiffs' Exhibit 17, a United States Survey discussing increases in Chinese magnesium oxide prices "[b]ecause of increasing prices in China for fuel coke and increasing freight costs" and, hence, suggesting, that price increases could be a result of market forces unrelated to collusion); Docket Entry No. 77-3, at 3 (a United for the purposes of the United States antitrust law, regardless of whether or not the CCCMC was standing ready to enforce them. The involvement of the CCCMC would have no relevance to the issue of government compulsion, just as the fact that American courts stand ready to direct performance upon finding a breach of a specific performance contract: no adjudication/enforcement of a contractual obligation transforms the underlying contract into a mandate "compelled" by the government.

Defendants appear to be of the opinion that Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint [435] is wholly void of any statements suggesting allegations based on such SMP agreements. See S/Reply at 20 ("here, plaintiffs at best allege price coordination consistent with China's regulatory scheme for magnesite[,] and their Opposition is noticeably silent [as to] exports of magnesite above the set price"). This is not entirely true. Plaintiffs at no point admit Defendants' "price coordination consistent with China's regulatory scheme" (indeed, had Plaintiffs so stated, they would come dangerously close to conceding that Defendants qualify for abstention). See generally, Am. Compl. Moreover, Plaintiffs' Opposition asserts that Defendants failed to "demonstrate[] that the price collusion alleged [in the Amended Complaint] was initiated at the direction of [--] or was required by [--] the CCCMC [or any other Chinese government body]" Opp. at 52. This statement suggests Plaintiffs' intent to assert claims based on agreements unrelated to Defendants' compliance with the government-mandated minimum price requirement, and it would be an error for this Court to ignore Plaintiffs' intended assertions, even if they were stated rather nebulously. See Foman, 371 U.S. at 182-83 ("HN82[] [t]he Federal [436] Rules reject the approach that pleading is a game of skill in which one misstep by counsel may be decisive to the outcome and accept the principle that the purpose of pleading is to facilitate a proper decision on the merits").

Consequently, Plaintiffs will be allowed an opportunity to re-amend their pleadings (by factually establishing -- in accord with the requirements of Turicentro -- that those defendants whom Plaintiffs would name in their re-amended pleadings, were importers into the United States within the meaning of the introductory clause of the FTAIA and, in addition, by asserting -- in accord with the requirements of Iqbal and Twombly -- the facts of such named defendants' agreement(s) to sell their goods at SMP. Defendants then, will be in a position to provide the Court with evidentiary proof, if such is in existence, showing that the SMP prices alleged by Plaintiffs were, in fact, the actual minimum price figures: (a) mandated by the Chinese [*464] government; and (b) known to Defendants and Chinese governmental bodies capable of enforcing -- or otherwise punishing Defendants for non-compliance with - the minimum price requirement. [149] States Survey suggesting the same by noting China's imposition of a new 10% export tax on the export of magnesite-based goods in 2007); see also Docket Entry No. 35-59, at 3 (the MOFCOM's 2004 regulation that prompts the same conclusion by informing the reader about China's reduction of its magnesite export stimulus, which existed in the form of "rebate" allowing exporters to keep prices low); Docket Entry No. 35-63, at 2 (the MOFCOM's 2005 regulation informing the industry about complete elimination of this magnesite export stimulus).

[149] The Court stresses that Plaintiffs and [437] Defendants' facts cannot be "sketched": they must be established in detail. Simply put, the Court will not credit Plaintiffs' assertions that --regardless of a decade of United States importation of thousands of tons of magnesite-based products from China -- all (or the bulk of) documentary evidence verifying such transactions disappeared and all witnesses, too, developed a memory failure. Accord supra note 64 of this Opinion. State and federal courts consistently refused to accept such "dog ate my homework" defense/evidentiary submission, and the Court will not change this rule. See Lowe v. McGraw-Hill Cos., 361 F.3d 335, (7th Cir. 2004) (refusing to accept the claim that evidence vanished and noting "[t]his 'the dog ate my homework' defense [is] no defense at all") (citing In re Riggs, 240 F.3d 668, 670 (7th Cir. 2001)); *Allen v. Dockery, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27447, at 4-5 (M.D. Ga. Apr. 4, 2008) ("Such an excuse, which sadly sounds like the proverbial and desperate 'dog ate my homework' defense, is not legally sufficient"); Alsentzer v. Bulboff, 2006 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 816 (N.J. Super. App. Div. Jan. 26, 2006) ("[The trial court correctly] observed that [the litigant's] excuses [438] for the lack of evidence most closely resembled 'the dog ate my homework' [defense]. Yet, in this case, we have no dog, [and even] no x-ray of the dog, to establish . . . an appropriate excuse") (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). In the same vein, the Court will not allow Plaintiffs to conduct discovery of to the entire Chinese magnesite industry in search for the entities, which Plaintiffs might deem suitable defendants for purposes of their re-amended pleadings, i.e., the entities that were importers of goods into the United States. Similarly, the Court will not accept re-amended pleadings failing to state the identities of the entities that entered into SMP agreements or to detail the facts/circumstances of such SMP agreements, as well as the prices of these SMP agreements. Accord Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1954 ("[The plaintiff] is not entitled to discovery [where the complaint asserts some wrongs] "generally, [i.e., as] a conclusory allegation [since] Rule 8 does not [allow] pleading the bare

VIII. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons:

(i) Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint will be dismissed. Such dismissal will be with prejudice as to Plaintiffs' claims based on the exporter [440] exception to the FTAIA. However, Plaintiffs' claims invoking this Court's subject matter jurisdiction under the introductory clause of the FTAIA will be dismissed without prejudice, and Plaintiffs will be allowed an opportunity to amend these claims and submit factual proof in support. Plaintiffs will also be allowed an opportunity to amend their pleadings by stating facts showing that the defendants named in Plaintiffs' re-amended pleadings entered in private collusive agreements: such allegations shall specify the particular defendants that entered in such agreements, the circumstances of [*465] these agreements and the particular SMP prices agreed upon;

(ii) Defendants' application for abstention on the grounds of the act of state doctrine will be denied, with prejudice, as factually inapplicable;

(iii) Defendants' motions to dismiss, for lack of jurisdiction and pursuant to the FSIA, Plaintiffs' claims against those Defendants that are 100% owned by the Chinese government will be denied, without prejudice to renewal, for insufficiency of evidence currently on the record; and

(iv) The Court's decision as to Defendants' application for abstention on the grounds of the government compulsion [441] doctrine is reserved. In the event Plaintiffs establish this Court's subject matter jurisdiction pursuant to the factual review, as defined in Turicentro, and, in addition, duly plead the facts of Defendants' SMP agreements, the Court will re-visit the issue of abstention by directing Defendants to produce a verified schedule of the actual minimum prices:

(a) that existed during every three months of the Class Period;

(b) that ensued from the Chinese regulatory regime (imposing a minimum price requirement as to Chinese export of magnesite-based goods) composed by the prescripts issued by the State Council of China and/or China's Ministry of Commerce, and/or China's Chamber of Commerce of Metals, Minerals & Chemicals Importers & Exporters, and/or China's Department of Customs and/or similar Chinese government entities, and/or by public letters, addresses or similar statements or pronouncements made by officials of the aforesaid Chinese government entities;

and

(c) that were known to Defendants and to the Chinese government entities capable of enforcing -- or otherwise punishing Defendants for non-compliance with -- the aforesaid minimum prices, in order to determine whether complete abstention [442] is warranted in light of Plaintiffs' SMP prices arid Defendants' schedule of the actual minimum prices being identical.

elements of [the] cause of action [and] affix[ing] the label 'general allegation' [in hope of developing actual facts through discovery]"); Am. Compl. at 4 (expressly stating that [439] this matter is not based on any parallel pricing by any Defendant). Simply put, Plaintiffs' belief that they suffered an injury cannot substitute for a valid complaint. Accord Kumho Tire, 526 U.S. 137, 119 S. Ct. 1167, 143 L. Ed. 2d 238 (explaining that the law of evidence eliminates claims based on "phantom" injuries, i.e., cases involving actual harms, in a literal sense, but unwieldy in a legal sense for the lack of means to trace the injury to a specific action of a specific defendant); compare Opp. at 10 (where Plaintiffs, inexplicably, claim that "[t]he only remarkable feature of [the] Amended Complaint is the specificity with which agreements on price are alleged and the accompanying documentary evidence supporting those allegations," even though the Amended Complaint's allegations, e.g., as to the last "conspiratorial" meeting, are limited to a mere statement that, "[on] February 2007, [unspecified] members of the Cartel met [at unspecified location] to discuss a possible agreement to increase the export price [to an unspecified level]").

[*139] MEMORANDUM & ORDER

MATSUMOTO, United States District Judge:

In their Second Amended Complaint ("Complaint"), plaintiffs Eugene M. LaFlamme and World Wide Tours of Mission Valley, Inc. (collectively, "plaintiffs"), individually and on behalf of all others similarly situated, allege that Societe Air France ("Air France"), Koninklijke Luchtvaart Maatschappij N.V. ("KLM"), Deutsche Lufthansa AG ("Lufthansa"), and United Air Lines, Inc. ("United"), all international air carriers (collectively, "defendants"), [1] of conspiring to fix prices for air passenger fares and passenger fuel surcharges [2] on transatlantic flights between the United States, Germany, [3] and various other transatlantic destinations within the European Union, during the period between August 2004 and June 2006 in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act ("Sherman Act"), 15 U.S.C. § 1 ("Section 1"). Through their Complaint, plaintiffs plead a single count of Sherman Act Section 1 liability against all defendants and claim that because of defendants' unlawful conduct, plaintiffs and other members of a putative class paid artificially inflated fares and surcharges for transatlantic flights and are therefore entitled to, inter alia, injunctive relief and treble damages. All defendants move to dismiss the Complaint for failure to state a claim pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) ("Rule 12(b)(6)"), and alternatively to dismiss certain claims for lack of subject matter jurisdiction pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(1) ("Rule 12(b)(1)"). [3] Additionally, United moves separately to dismiss the claims against it on the grounds that the Complaint asserts a claim that was discharged by United's 2006 emergence from bankruptcy. [4]

For the reasons that follow, defendants' Rule 12(b)(6) motions are granted and this [*140] case is dismissed because plaintiffs' Complaint fails to state a claim. The court thus finds it unnecessary to address either defendants' alternative motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(1) or United's alternative motion to dismiss based on its bankruptcy.

---

[1] Although the Second Amended Complaint also originally named American Airlines ("American") as a defendant, American is no [4] longer a party to this action pursuant to a Stipulated Order of Voluntary Dismissal Without Prejudice dated February 17, 2009. (See Doc. No. 48.)

[2] The Complaint defines surcharges as "fees charged to passengers by airlines purportedly to compensate the airlines for increased fuel and other costs." (Doc. No. 17, Second Amended Complaint ("Compl.") P 1.)

[3] The parties have submitted the following briefs in connection with all defendants' motions to dismiss: Doc. No. 57, Memorandum of Law in Support of Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the Second Amended Complaint ("Defs. Mem."); Doc. No. 58, Declaration of Ruth E. Harlow in Support of Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the Second Amended Complaint ("Harlow Decl."); Doc. No. 64, Plaintiffs' Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the Second Amended Complaint ("Pls. Mem."); Doc. No. 63, Declaration of William B. Scoville, Jr. in Opposition to Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the Second Amended Complaint ("Scoville Decl."); Doc. No. 59, Reply Memorandum of Law in Support of Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the Second Amended Complaint ("Defs. Reply Mem."); Doc. No. 73, Plaintiff's Letter dated 2/4/10 ("Pls. 2/4/10 Ltr."); and Doc. [5] No. 74, Defendants' Letter dated 2/8/10 ("Defs. 2/8/10 Ltr.").

[4] The parties have submitted the following briefs in connection with United's alternative motion to dismiss: Doc. No. 52, Brief of Defendant United Air Lines, Inc. in Support of Motion to Dismiss the Second Amended Complaint; Doc. No. 65, Plaintiff's Memorandum of Law in Opposition to Defendant United Air Lines, Inc.'s Motion to Dismiss the Second Amended Complaint; Doc. No. 56, Defendant United Air Lines' Reply Memorandum of Law in Support of Motion to Dismiss the Second Amended Complaint.

A court considering a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) must accept all factual allegations of a complaint as true, but need not give any effect to legal conclusions couched as factual allegations. Starr v. Sony BMG Music Entm't, 592 F.3d 314, 321 (2d Cir. 2010). The well-pleaded factual [6] allegations of the Complaint are as follows.

According to the Complaint, plaintiffs represent a putative class numbering "at least in the hundreds-of-thousands," consisting of "all persons and entities . . . who purchased [p]assenger [a]ir [t]ransportation and paid passenger surcharges that included at least one direct flight segment between the United States, Germany, and other transatlantic European Union destinations directly from Defendants" in the period between August 2004 and June 2006 (the "class period"). (Compl. PP 23, 24.) Both named plaintiffs, Eugene M. LaFlamme, a Wisconsin resident, and World Wide Tours of Mission Valley, Inc., a travel agency incorporated and doing business in California, claim to have purchased air passenger fares directly from one or more defendants and paid the related surcharges on airfare between the United States and certain transatlantic destinations during the class period. (Id. PP 10-11.)

Defendants are international airline carriers. (Id. PP 12-16.) Each defendant is also a member of the International Air Transport Association ("IATA"), a trade organization that includes most of the world's international airlines and which was "established to [7] enable members to discuss and agree upon international rates and fares for scheduled cargo and passenger transportation services." (See id. P 32; see also Scoville Decl. Ex. 8 (DOT Order 2006-7-3) at 1, 3.) [5] Defendants are also each members of various Global Alliances with other domestic and foreign airlines. (Compl. PP 42-48.)

A. Immunized IATA and Global Alliance Activity

As part of its mission to coordinate international airline service, the IATA conducts tariff conferences where competing airline members discuss the passenger fares and surcharges they wish to charge for international markets and establish proposed fares and rates by passing resolutions. (Compl. PP 32-34; Scoville Decl. Ex. 8 at 1, 3.) During the putative class period, IATA and its member airlines received [*141] limited U.S. antitrust immunity from the United States Department of Transportation ("DOT") to conduct tariff conferences. (Compl. PP 33, 37, 43; Scoville. Decl. Ex. 8 at 1.) The various Global Alliances to which defendants belong also received limited antitrust immunity from DOT. (Compl. PP 42-48.) The limited immunity for both IATA tariff conferences and the airlines' Global Alliances applied under [9] certain conditions. (See id. PP 33, 37, 44.)

Among other things, in order to maintain the tariff conference antitrust immunity, the IATA or the member airlines were required to submit all tariff conference resolutions and other agreements to DOT for approval and to withhold implementation of any such resolution or agreement until DOT approval was granted. (Id. P 37; Scoville Decl. Ex. 8 at 15.) However, by order dated March 30, 2007 and effective June 30, 2007, DOT prospectively terminated this limited antitrust immunity for fare coordination on transatlantic routes without altering the immunity existing prior to the effective date. (See Harlow Decl. Ex. B (DOT Order 2007-3-23) at 2-3; see also Compl. P 44 (citing DOT Order 2007-3-23).) Additionally, to preserve both IATA and Global Alliance antitrust immunity, the airline carriers were required to refrain from participating in IATA tariff conference discussions involving routes between the United States and the home countries of their Global Alliance partner airlines. (Compl. PP 33, 43-44.)

[5] In accordance with the well-settled law of this Circuit, along with the Complaint, in deciding this Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, the court will consider those documents submitted by the parties which are matters of public record or which are deemed included in the Complaint. See Pani, M.D. v. Empire Blue Cross Blue Shield, 152 F.3d 67, 75 (2d Cir. 1998) (noting that it is "well-established" that a court may rely on matters of public record in deciding a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss); see also Sira v. Artuz, 380 F.3d 57, 67 (2d Cir. 2004) (noting that a court deciding a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) may consider all documents included in the complaint whether by attachment as an exhibit, through incorporation by reference, or because the documents are "integral" to the pleading) (internal citations omitted). However, as discussed further infra, [8] note 18, the court declines to consider those documents submitted by plaintiffs to support allegations first raised in their motion papers and found nowhere in the Complaint. See, e.g., Wright v. Ernst & Young LLP, 152 F.3d 169, 178 (2d Cir. 1998) (noting a party is not entitled to amend pleadings through statements made in motion papers).

B. Alleged Agreement Regarding Resolution 001w and Surcharge Adjustments

Plaintiffs allege that defendants and others unlawfully conspired in July [10] 2003 to fix fuel surcharges on transatlantic air passenger flights by agreeing, without DOT approval, to implement an IATA resolution known as "Resolution 001w." [6] (Id. PP 70, 88.) According to the Complaint, Resolution 001w was introduced in July 2003 at an IATA tariff conference in Geneva, Switzerland ("July 2003 IATA Tariff Conference"), and had an intended effective date of April 2004. (Compl. PP 58, 62, 63.) Resolution 001w proposed an air passenger surcharge facility that would include "fuel insurance and security applied by components to be prorated by all participating air carriers." (Id. PP 58, 60, 62.)

According to its publicly filed DOT Application, Resolution 001w was designed not as a "limitation" on airlines, but as a means to facilitate "the application of interline fares worldwide [by] applying surcharges that have been adopted by individual airlines." (See Harlow Decl. Ex. E (2003 IATA Application, Docket [11] OST-2003-_) ("DOT Resolution 001w Application").) Specifically, the terms of Resolution 001w: (i) proposed a procedure by which carriers could make a filing with IATA to change existing surcharges or introduce new surcharges; (ii) identified the required contents for such a proposed filing; (iii) permitted proposed surcharges in the form of "a percentage of the fare, tiered, capped or flat rate"; and (iv) placed the onus on the filing carrier to obtain any necessary government approvals. (See id.)

At the July 2003 IATA Tariff Conference, Resolution 001w was adopted by the IATA pending government approvals and later submitted to DOT for approval of antitrust immunity. (Id. PP 58, 62, 67; see also DOT Resolution 001w Application.) Defendants Air France, KLM and Lufthansa voted in principle to support Resolution 001w. (Compl. P 64.) United expressed opposition to Resolution 001w on [*142] grounds that it was concerned the resolution would not be able to obtain DOT approval and would not fulfill carrier needs, but it ultimately indicated that it would abstain from voting on the Resolution. (Id. P 65.) The request for DOT approval of Resolution 001w was withdrawn in 2007 prior to any DOT determination [12] on the issue. (Id. PP 67-71.)

The Complaint alleges that despite the lack of DOT approval, "[i]t appears that Defendants and others decided to adopt the terms of Resolution 001w during May and August 2004." [7] (Id. P 70.) The Complaint does not contain any specific allegations about which defendants or which other parties "decided" to adopt the terms of Resolution 001w absent DOT approval, or when, where, how, or whether this decision was collectively agreed to. [8] (See id.)

The Complaint then alleges that IATA convened another tariff conference on May 28, 2004 ("May 2004 IATA Tariff Conference"), and at that meeting "additional proposals to adopt coordinate and/or adjust air passenger surcharges on a worldwide basis . . . were discussed." (Id. P 75.) According to the Complaint, during that discussion various IATA members, including defendants Lufthansa and United, asserted conflicting views regarding the amounts and

[6] The court notes that while plaintiffs allege a conspiracy involving both passenger fares and surcharges (Compl. P 1), the sole agreement alleged in the Complaint involved Resolution 001w, which plaintiffs allege concerned only fuel surcharges (Compl. PP 60, 62, 70).

[7] In what appears to be an alternative argument, in their motion papers, but not in their Complaint, plaintiffs also contend that apparently aside from agreeing to implement Resolution 001w without DOT approval as alleged in the Complaint, (P 70), defendants used the IATA discussions of Resolution 001w as a "pretextual device for a much deeper level of pricing discussions and agreements that were never submitted to the DOT, never received governmental approval, and never received DOT antitrust immunization." (See Pls. Mem. at 21.) Plaintiffs do not allege what specific agreement, if any, resulted from such "discussions" or whether such agreement, if one existed, was ever implemented.

[8] The Complaint later alleges that [13] the defendants went forward with charging uniform surcharges even without DOT approval "as previously agreed upon" during the July 2003 IATA Tariff Conference, apparently in reference to the adoption of Resolution 001w. (See Compl. PP 70, 72.) Although plaintiffs allege that "it appears that [d]efendants . . . decided to adopt the terms of Resolution 001w during May and August 2004 absent DOT approval," (Compl. P 70), plaintiffs do not allege that the defendants actually agreed to do so at the July 2003 Tariff Conference or at any later date.

methods of deriving proposed air passenger surcharges. (Id.) Although illustrating the disagreement between the various IATA members about possible passenger fuel surcharge adjustments, the Complaint does [14] not allege that the IATA members or defendants reached any agreement on the issue at the May 28, 2004 tariff conference. [9] (Id.)

The Complaint later refers to the defendants' implementation of "planned" adjustments to transatlantic passenger surcharges without identifying when, where, and by whom such adjustments were "planned." (Id. P 80.) Presumably, the Complaint intends to imply that the adjustments were "planned" at the May 2004 IATA Tariff Conference. (See id.; see also Pls. Mem. at 7-8.)

Finally, the Complaint alleges that "[c]ertain IATA carrier members also appear to have agreed to cancel passenger surcharges if the market price for oil dropped below a collar for a fixed amount of time." (Compl. P 81.)

C. Subsequent Alleged Parallel Conduct and Alleged Further Discussion

The Complaint alleges that despite the absence of DOT approval for Resolution [*143] 001w, in May 2004, shortly after the Resolution's proposed effective date, Air France, KLM, United, and other non-parties began to implement fuel surcharges or surcharge adjustments. (Id. P 73.) [15] Specifically, the Complaint alleges that on May 16, 2004, Air France implemented a surcharge of 3 Euros ($ 3.56); and on May 18, 2004, KLM implemented a surcharge of 5 Euros ($ 6.01); while on May 27, 2004, United increased its existing surcharge by upwards of $ 10 U.S. (Id.; see also Defs. Mem. at 5.) [10] The Complaint also alleges that sometime after May 28, 2004, American and other members of the OneWorld Alliance re-introduced passenger fuel surcharges in unspecified amounts. (Compl. P 77.)

Additionally, the Complaint alleges that non-parties British Airways and Virgin Atlantic, as well as certain defendants made "planned adjustments" to transatlantic passenger surcharges in August and September 2004. (See id. P 80.) Specifically, the Complaint alleges that in August and September 2004, defendants and other non-parties such as TAP Air, Czech Air CSA, and Olympic Air [16] adopted or adjusted passenger surcharges in varying amounts ranging from 5 to 15 Euros ($ 6.09 to $ 18.21 USD). [11] (Id. PP 73, 80; see also Defs. Mem. at 5.)

Additionally, the Complaint alleges that other co-conspirators, who are not parties to this action, also implemented surcharges and adjustments of varying amounts during the period between May 13 and September 4, 2004. (Compl. PP 73, 80.) The Complaint contains no allegations that defendants or others implemented any fuel surcharge facility or that the surcharges imposed by defendants adhered to any sort of fuel index. [12] (See generally Compl.)

The Complaint alleges that in May 2004, a single airline, United, implemented [17] fare increases for long-haul passenger fares and blamed higher jet fuel costs for the increases. (Id. P 74.) Additionally, citing media reports dated June 7, 2004, the Complaint alleges that following the May 28, 2004 IATA tariff conference Lufthansa

[9] However, plaintiffs' motion papers characterize these discussions as a "meeting of the minds" regarding surcharge amounts. (Pls. Mem. at 8.)

[10] The allegations in the Complaint refer to various currencies. For ease of comparison, the court cites both the Complaint's figures as well as defendants' calculations of those figures in equivalent United States dollars at the relevant time (Defs. Mem. at 5) which are undisputed by plaintiffs (see generally Pls. Mem.).

[11] Plaintiffs have not disputed defendants' calculation that at the relevant time, 5-15 Euros was equivalent to $ 6.09 - $ 18.21 USD. (See Compl. PP 73, 80; see also Defs. Mem. at 5.)

[12] However, plaintiffs' motion papers make allegations, again not contained in the Complaint, asserting that at a July 2005 IATA Tariff Conference, "air carriers agreed to resume distribution of an 'index for fuel prices'" without alleging the actual existence or use of such an index. (Pls. Mem. at 8-9 (citing Scoville Decl. Ex. 5), 12.).

announced a 3% upward adjustment of fares as of July 1, 2004 along with two other unidentified airlines announcing adjustments between 3-7%. (Id. P 77.)

Finally, the Complaint alleges that defendants Air France, KLM and Lufthansa reduced their passenger surcharges in unspecified amounts during the fourth quarter of 2006 when fuel prices had fallen for thirty consecutive days from the $ 75 per barrel mark. (Id. P 82.)

D. Evidence of Other Allegedly Anticompetitive Conduct

The Complaint also contains allegations of other allegedly anticompetitive conduct by certain defendants and other non-parties to this action, including allegations that certain defendants and others are or [*144] were under investigation by various U.S. and foreign bodies in connection with possible antitrust violations.

1. Alleged Anticompetitive Conduct Related to Global Alliances

The Complaint claims that at unspecified times during the class period, defendants participated in [18] IATA discussions for fares and surcharges on routes between the U.S. and the home countries of Global Alliance partner airlines in violation of their limited DOT antitrust immunity. (Id. PP 44-45.)

2. Air Cargo Surcharges

Although not at issue in the instant action, the Complaint discusses at some length IATA members' past alleged attempts to adopt a fuel surcharge pricing index for air cargo rates through enactment of IATA "Resolution 116ss." (Id. PP 49-57.) Resolution 116ss proposed the use of a standardized fuel index to aid in the implementation and adjustment of fuel surcharges on air cargo rates, and was submitted to DOT for antitrust immunity approval. (Id. PP 49, 56; see also Pls. Mem. at 3.) However, the Complaint alleges that prior to a DOT determination on immunity for Resolution 116ss, a fuel index was provided to IATA members at a tariff conference in February 2000, and that in the early part of that year "certain air carriers went forward with their agreement to adopt air cargo surcharges." (Compl. PP 50, 51, 54.) The Complaint further alleges that "many of the same air carriers that adopted air cargo surcharges" have pled guilty to charges brought by the United States [19] Department of Justice ("DOJ") that they conspired to fix prices on air cargo services and surcharges in violation of the Sherman Act. (Id. PP 54-55.)

Additionally, the Complaint alleges that after DOT denied immunity for Resolution 116ss, certain "IATA air carrier members discussed methods to get around" that denial. (Id. PP 56, 57.) Plaintiffs also claim that during the early part of 2000, defendants participated in concurrent discussions at IATA meetings regarding both air cargo and passenger surcharges. (Id. P 54.) Finally, the Complaint notes that in May 2000, David Short, an individual involved in IATA's Legal Department, allegedly advised IATA air carrier members that they must avoid the appearance of "conscious parallelism" in connection with air cargo surcharges. (Id. P 57.)

3. Other Antitrust Investigations

The Complaint notes that in June 2006, United received a subpoena from DOJ requesting information related to pricing of air passenger fares and surcharges on international routes. (Id. PP 16, 89.) Similarly, in May 2007, the United States Federal Bureau of Investigation served subpoenas on various airlines (notably the Complaint does not specify any defendant) at a May 2007 [20] IATA meeting and interviewed various unidentified airline managers. (Id. P 90.)

Further, the Complaint alleges in August 2007, the DOJ charged IATA members Korean Airlines and British Airways with violations of the Sherman Act, and the two airlines each pleaded guilty to conspiring with rivals to fix passenger fares and surcharges during what appeared to be, according to the Complaint, the same August 2004 timeframe when many IATA members adjusted or adopted passenger surcharges. (Id. P 91.) Notably, public records identified by defendants make clear that the guilty plea by Korean Airlines [13] solely involved flights between [*145] the United States and Korea, and the guilty plea by British Airways [14] involved flights between the United States and the United Kingdom and its collusion with a single "co-conspirator" elsewhere identified [15] as Virgin Atlantic Airways.

The Complaint also references investigations and charges involving defendants and others carried out by other global antitrust authorities. For example, the Complaint alleges that the European Commission investigated defendants Lufthansa, Air France and KLM in March 2008 in connection with price fixing on routes between Europe and Japan. (Id. P 92.) Similarly, the Complaint alleges that in April 2008 Brazilian antitrust authorities charged United with violations of Brazilian law relating to air cargo surcharges. (Id. P 93.)

DISCUSSION

I. Motion to Dismiss

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) provides for the dismissal of a complaint based on allegations which fail "to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." When attacked on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, "[o]nly a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives . . . ." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1950, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (emphasis added). The Supreme Court and Second Circuit have provided guidance about the general contours of a "plausible claim for relief" at the pleading stage and the appropriate standards [22] for determining whether such a claim has been sufficiently stated in the context of a Sherman Act antitrust claim. See, e.g., id.; see also Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007); Starr, 592 F.3d 314. [16]

A. Legal Standard

1. Pleading [23] Standards Generally

Pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2), a pleading must contain only a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief[.]" While Rule 8's requirement of a "short and plain statement" obviates the need for detailed factual allegations at the pleading stage, "[t]o survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570).

The facial plausibility standard is met when "the plaintiff pleads factual content [*146] that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949. Such factual content must consist of more than mere labels, legal conclusions, or a "formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action." See id. at 1949-50 ("Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice.") (internal citations omitted). This does not require a showing of a "probability" of misconduct, but it does demand more than "a sheer possibility [24] that a defendant has acted unlawfully." See id. at 1949.

Indeed, a well-pleaded complaint may survive a motion to dismiss even where "it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of those facts is improbable, and that a recovery is very remote and unlikely." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556 (citations and internal quotation omitted). However, "where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct," dismissal is appropriate. Starr, 592 F.3d at 321 (quoting Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1950); see also Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570 ("Because the plaintiffs here have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, their complaint must be dismissed.").

Assessing whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief is "a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1950. In conducting such an assessment on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, it is well-settled that a court must "assume [the] veracity" of all well-pleaded factual allegations contained in the complaint, id., 129 S. Ct. at 1950, and afford the plaintiff every reasonable inference, see Zinermon v. Burch, 494 U.S. 113, 118, 110 S. Ct. 975, 108 L. Ed. 2d 100 (1990). [25] However, allegations amounting to no more than bare legal conclusions are "not entitled to the assumption of truth." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1950.

2. Pleading Standards for Sherman Act § 1 Claims

The Supreme Court in Twombly discussed the application of these general principles to a Sherman Act Section 1 claim. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. Section 1 of the Sherman Act proscribes "every contract, combination . . . or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce . . . ." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Because Section 1 of the Sherman Act does not prohibit all restraints of trade, but rather only agreements to restrain trade, "[t]he crucial question in a Section 1 case is therefore whether the challenged conduct 'stem[s] from independent decision or from an agreement, tacit or express.'" Starr, 592 F.3d at 321 (quoting Theatre Enters., Inc. v. Paramount Film Distrib. Corp., 346 U.S. 537, 540, 74 S. Ct. 257, 98 L. Ed. 273 (1954)).

Thus, in order to state a viable Section 1 claim, a complaint must provide "enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. A plausible suggestion of agreement can be derived from specific allegations of actual agreement among defendants. See id. at 565 n.10. [26] Additionally, a plausible suggestion of agreement may be derived from allegations of parallel conduct. See id. at 564-65. However, as the Supreme Court noted, alone, "lawful parallel conduct fails to bespeak unlawful agreement . . . [and] an allegation of parallel conduct and a bare assertion of conspiracy will not suffice. Without more, parallel conduct does not suggest conspiracy, and a conclusory allegation of agreement at some unidentified [*147] point does not supply facts adequate to show illegality." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556-57. Accordingly, to survive a motion to dismiss, a Sherman Act Section 1 complaint must contain "enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement." Id. at 556.

B. Application

Plaintiffs principally contend that their Complaint gives rise to a plausible inference of illegal agreement in three ways: (1) allegations of actual agreements made at antitrust-immunized IATA meetings; (2) allegations of parallel conduct; and (3) evidence suggesting other anticompetitive conduct by defendants and others in the United States and abroad. Under any of these methods, plaintiffs' allegations fail to plausibly suggest an agreement, [27] and are therefore insufficient to state a claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

1. Conclusory Allegations of Agreement at Antitrust-Immunized IATA Meetings

Plaintiffs contend that the Complaint contains direct evidence of conspiracy. (Pls. Mem. at 1-2, 16-18.) Specifically, plaintiffs contend that the allegations of "joint discussion" of surcharges under the guise of Resolution 001w at the July 2003 IATA Tariff Conference and the subsequent alleged implementation of Resolution 001w by defendants and others comprise enough direct evidence to state a plausible claim for relief. [17] (See Pls. Mem. at 18; see also Compl. P 70 ("It appears that [d]efendants and others decided to adopt the terms of Resolution 001w during May and August 2004 absent U.S. DOT approval.") and P 72 ("Defendants went forward without U.S. DOT approval and began to uniformly charge passenger surcharges as previously agreed upon during the July 2003 IATA meeting in Geneva.").) The court disagrees.

At the outset, the court notes that plaintiffs are incorrect in their contention that the Twombly plausibility standard does not apply to their allegations of direct evidence of conspiracy (Pls. Mem. at 2, 16). See Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1953 ("Twombly expounded the pleading standard for 'all civil actions'") (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555-56 and n.3). Rather, the allegations that the meetings and discussions which took place at the July 2003 Tariff Conference constitute direct evidence of a price-fixing agreement must meet the standard of "facial plausibility" set forth in Twombly. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. [29] Plaintiffs' allegations fail to do so for three reasons.

First, plaintiffs' purported "direct evidence" of agreement is based on a bald, conclusory allegation that "it appears that [d]efendants and others decided to adopt the terms of Resolution 001w during May and August 2004 absent U.S. DOT approval." (Compl. P 70.) Indeed, plaintiffs fail to allege any specific facts providing any basis to infer an actual unlawful agreement by defendants to implement [*148] Resolution 001w without DOT approval. (See Compl. PP 70, 72.) Such conclusory allegations are not entitled to the presumption of truth by a reviewing court deciding a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. [18] See Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1951 ("the conclusory nature of respondent's allegations . . . disentitles them to the presumption of truth"). Moreover, such allegations fail to identify any specifics regarding the claimed illegal agreement as Twombly contemplates. See Starr, 592 F.3d at 325 (noting in dicta that allegations in a Sherman Act § 1 complaint based on direct evidence of agreement would likely require references to "'specific time, place, or person involved in the alleged conspiracies'") (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 565 n.10).

[17] Plaintiffs also allege that a 3% fare increase announced by a single defendant allegedly "in line with IATA adjustments" is "direct evidence" of conspiracy. (Compl. P 77; see also Pls. Mem. at 8 ("A few days after discussing [28] the 3% increase with the other Defendants . . . Lufthansa announced that it would implement the 3% increase 'in response to the oil price increase and to the latest recommendation by the [IATA].").) The Complaint does not allege whether or when any 3% fare increase was implemented, if ever, either by any defendant or any other party. Because a conspiracy necessarily involves more than a single participant, and because the Complaint fails to articulate how the isolated announcement of a sole defendant can constitute direct evidence of conspiracy, the court declines to further consider this argument.

[18] The [30] Complaint itself contains only one allegation of direct evidence of illegal agreement. (See Compl. P 88 ("But for [d]efendants' anti-competitive conduct . . . [d]efendants would have been unable to implement the July 2003 agreement and increase and sustain the prices of their fares and passenger surcharges.").) Yet plaintiffs' motion papers attempt to characterize the discussions at the May 2004 IATA Tariff conference as a "meeting of the minds" regarding the imposition of surcharge adjustments. (Compare Compl. P 75-77 and Pls. Mem. at 8.) Thus, it appears that plaintiffs' motion papers may also intend to offer the May 2004 IATA Tariff Conference discussion of fuel surcharges as additional direct evidence of conspiracy. However, the court disregards these allegations which are first raised in plaintiffs' motion papers because it is well-settled that a claim for relief may not be amended by the briefs in opposition to a motion to dismiss. See, e.g., Wright, 152 F.3d at 178. Similarly, the court cannot consider plaintiffs' conclusory arguments regarding the alleged agreement to circulate a passenger fuel surcharge price index which is first raised in their briefs and nowhere discussed [31] in the Complaint. (Compare Compl. and Pls. Mem. at 8-9, 12, 21-22.) Regardless, even had such allegations been included in the Complaint, they would still be insufficient to state a plausible claim for relief, as discussed fully infra.

Second, to the extent plaintiffs suggest that defendants did not actually agree to implement Resolution 001w absent DOT approval but instead used discussions surrounding Resolution 001w as an "avenue" to conspire to fix fuel surcharge prices, their bald argument fails to give rise to a plausible inference of conspiracy. The court notes as an initial matter that membership and participation in a trade association alone does not give rise to a plausible inference of illegal agreement. See, e.g., Twombly, 550 U.S. at 567 n.12 (rejecting inference of conspiracy based upon mere participation in an industry trade association); *In re Elevator Antitrust Litig., No. 04-CV-1178 (TPG), 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34517, at 30-31 (S.D.N.Y. May 30, 2006) ("allegation that elevator company executives attend trade, industry, or social functions together is clearly insufficient to state a claim") aff'd 502 F.3d 47 (2d Cir. 2007).

Thus the critical issue here, and the crux [32] of plaintiffs' Complaint, is the allegation that defendants violated their limited antitrust immunity by using the July 2003 IATA Tariff Conference to conspire secretly to implement Resolution 001w without DOT approval or as an avenue to conspire generally about surcharges. (Compl. PP 3, 49-88; see also Pls. Mem. at 16-18.) This necessarily raises an issue about the scope of the limited antitrust immunity afforded to defendants' IATA activities by DOT.

Plaintiffs contend that it would be improper to consider the scope of defendants' IATA immunity at the 12(b)(6) stage because the Second Circuit has held that qualified immunity defenses "cannot ordinarily support dismissal under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6)." (Pls. Mem. at 14 (quoting [*149] Liffiton v. Keuker, 850 F.2d 73, 76 (2d Cir. 1988)) (emphasis added)). Certainly, plaintiffs are correct that most immunities are affirmative defenses, and as such, not ordinarily considered at the pre-answer stage. See, e.g., McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 435 (2d Cir. 2004) (noting that qualified immunity is an affirmative defense "normally asserted in an answer" and observing that "'usually, the defense of qualified immunity cannot support the grant of [33] a [Rule] 12(b)(6) motion'") (quoting Green v. Maraio, 722 F.2d 1013, 1018 (2d Cir. 1983)) (emphasis in quoting authority); see also 2 Moore's Federal Practice-Civil § 8.08[5] (Mathew Bender 3d ed.) (noting that affirmative defenses "have been found to include common law immunity, statutory immunity, [and] exemption under a statute or regulation").

Nonetheless, plaintiffs' blanket assertion that defendants' immunity cannot properly be considered at the motion to dismiss stage is unsupported by the case law. Indeed, the Second Circuit has "broadly stated" that "an affirmative defense may be raised by a pre-answer motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), without resort to summary judgment procedure, if the defense appears on the face of the complaint." McKenna, 386 F.3d at 436 (internal citation and quotation omitted). Further, the Second Circuit has noted that it has allowed a qualified immunity defense to be "successfully asserted in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion on at least two occasions" where "the complaint itself established the circumstances required as a predicate to a finding of qualified immunity." Id. at 435 (internal citation and quotation omitted). A plaintiff, however, is entitled [34] to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged that defeat the immunity defense. Id. at 436.

Here, the Complaint on its face asserts facts as to the immunized nature of defendants' discussion of fuel surcharges at the July 2003 IATA Tariff Conference. (See Compl. PP 33-34, 37, 67.) It is undisputed that during the relevant time period, defendants' attendance at and participation in the IATA trade association meetings enjoyed limited antitrust immunity under federal law so long as the defendants submitted any proposed resolutions and agreements to the DOT for approval and received approval prior to implementation. (See Compl. PP 33-34, 37; see also Pls. Mem. at 11 (" . . . Defendants' IATA participation immunity is predicated on the submission and approval of all agreements reached at IATA to the U.S. Department of Transportation prior to their implementation.").) It is also undisputed that here, the IATA and defendants followed that mandatory protocol when discussing and voting on Resolution 001w and then submitting it to DOT for approval prior to its contemplated implementation. (See Compl. P 67.) Thus, the Complaint itself recites defendants' adherence to the protocols which [35] are the predicates to a finding of immunity, and the court concludes as a matter of law that defendants' discussions of fuel surcharges at the IATA tariff conferences prior to June 30, 2007 were immunized. (See generally U.S. DOT Order 2007-3-23 at 1-3, attached as Ex. B to Scoville Decl. (discussing exemption under United States antitrust laws for IATA tariff conferences occurring prior to June 30, 2007).)

Therefore, the allegations that defendants discussed fuel surcharges in connection with Resolution 001w at an IATA meeting do not plausibly suggest an illegal agreement because such immunized conduct cannot be the basis for antitrust liability. See Pani, 152 F.3d at 74-75 (permitting immunity defense to be asserted on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss because the facts supporting the defense "appeared on the face of the complaint"); see [*150] also Green, 722 F.2d at 1018 (finding qualified immunity defense a proper basis for dismissal on Rule 12(b)(6) motion).

Third, even assuming that defendants secretly agreed at the July 2003 IATA Tariff Conference to implement Resolution 001w without DOT approval - a notion which is rendered even more implausible by the fact that the Complaint nowhere [36] alleges that any actual facility was implemented - plaintiffs fail to make any allegations tending to show that such an agreement could constitute an illegal agreement to fix prices under the Sherman Act as alleged in the Complaint. Rather, as plaintiffs' Complaint makes clear, Resolution 001w was an "air passenger surcharge facility." (See Compl. P 60.) As such, Resolution 001w proposed a means for airlines on interline (multi-carrier) fares to prorate existing or future fuel surcharges implemented by individual airlines. (See DOT Resolution 001w Application (describing Resolution 001w as a means to "facilitate[] the application of interline fares worldwide applying surcharges that have been adopted by member airlines").) Indeed, IATA documents reveal that Resolution 001w did not set or adjust fuel surcharge rates or amounts, or even set a process for determining uniform surcharge amounts. (See id. (noting that Resolution 001w "is by no means a limitation on airlines").) Accordingly, even if defendants were sufficiently alleged to have agreed to implement Resolution 001w without DOT approval in violation of the defendants' limited antitrust immunity, plaintiffs have failed to allege [37] facts establishing how such an agreement would constitute a price-fixing agreement in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. [19]

In short, after sweeping away the conclusory allegations of conspiracy forbidden by Twombley and Iqbal, as well as the allegations involving defendants' immunized conduct, what remains of plaintiffs' direct evidence allegations is insufficient to state a plausible claim for conspiracy and survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss.

2. Allegations of Parallel Conduct

In the alternative, plaintiffs contend that the Complaint states a viable claim based upon allegations of parallel conduct supported by a factual context giving rise to an inference of illegal agreement to fix prices. (See Pls. Mem. at 18-22.) Twombly made clear that "[a]n allegation of parallel conduct . . . gets the complaint close to stating a claim, but without some further factual enhancement it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557 (internal quotation and citation omitted). Indeed, as the Court noted, "[a] statement of parallel conduct, even conduct consciously undertaken, needs some setting suggesting the agreement necessary to make out a § 1 claim; without that further [*151] circumstance pointing toward a meeting [39] of the minds, an account of a defendant's commercial efforts stays in neutral territory." Id.

Thus, "when allegations of parallel conduct are set out in order to make a § 1 claim, they must be placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action." Id. (emphasis added); see also Starr, 592 F.3d at 328 (Newman, J. concurring) (noting that "[i]t is the context in which the defendants' parallel conduct occurred" which caused the "rejection of the complaint in Twombly"). Yet, despite the need to show some factual context supporting a plausible inference of conspiracy, at the motion to dismiss stage a plaintiff need not allege facts that fully exclude "independent self-interested conduct as an explanation for defendants' parallel behavior." See Starr, 592 F.3d at 325.

Rather, to allow an inference of conspiracy to arise from allegedly parallel conduct, Twombly contemplates a "factually suggestive" context involving some sort of anomalous behavior on the part of defendants. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557 n.5 ("to enter the realm of plausible liability" an allegation of parallel conduct requires some factual [40] enhancement that crosses it from "the factually neutral" to "the factually suggestive"). For example, the Twombly court catalogued various factual contexts which could create such an inference of conspiracy including: (i) "parallel behavior that would probably not result from chance, coincidence, independent responses to common stimuli, or mere interdependence unaided by an advance understanding among the parties"; (ii) "conduct [that] indicates the sort of restricted freedom of action and sense of obligation that one generally associates with agreement"; and (iii) "complex and historically unprecedented changes in pricing structure made at the very same time by multiple competitors, and made for no other discernible reason" other than collusion. See id. at 557 n.4 (internal citations and quotations omitted).

Here, it is dubious at the outset as to whether the conduct alleged in the Complaint can accurately be characterized as "parallel." (See Defs. Mem. at 15-17; Defs. Reply Mem. at 6-8.) Defendants contend that "when corrected for currency differences, the surcharges alleged in the Complaint are divergent (in some instances varying by a factor of three), not parallel and were not [41] imposed in tandem, but in some instances weeks apart." (See Defs. Reply Mem. at 6-7 (citing Compl. PP 73-83).) Further, defendants note that contrary to plaintiffs' claims of "uniform" parallel behavior, in several instances plaintiffs plead disagreement among defendants, (see Compl. PP 73-86), action by only some defendants and no action by other defendants, (see id. PP 72-88, 81-82), or action by a solitary defendant, (see id. P 74). (See Defs. Mem. at 6-8.) Plaintiffs counter that "[a] finding of illegal price fixing . . . does not require a showing of perfectly synchronous conduct." (See Pls. Mem. at 20.)

The court agrees that illegal price fixing need not be exactly simultaneous and identical in order to give rise to an inference of agreement. See, e.g., *City of Moundridge v. Exxon Mobil Corp., No. 04-CV-940 (RWR), 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 123954, at 20 (D.C. Cir. Sept. 30, 2009) ("Price-fixing can occur even though the price increases are not identical in absolute or relative terms."); see also In re Baby Food Antitrust Litig., 166 F.3d 112, 132 (3d Cir. 1999) ("[P]arallel pricing does not require 'uniform prices,' and permits prices within an [*152] agreed upon range.") (quoting United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 222, 60 S. Ct. 811, 84 L. Ed. 1129 (1940) [42] ("Nor is it important that the prices paid by the combination were not fixed in the sense that they were uniform and inflexible.")).

However, the court need not decide whether plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged parallel conduct, for even assuming, arguendo, that defendants' imposition of fare increases and surcharges was parallel, plaintiffs have failed to allege a factual context that supports an inference of conspiracy as required by Twombly. See id. 550 U.S. at 557. Indeed, unlike the examples enumerated in Twombly, defendants' purportedly parallel behavior as alleged in the Complaint is not of the type that "would probably not result from . . . independent responses to common stimuli" nor does defendants' imposition of surcharges comprise "complex and historically unprecedented changes in pricing structures . . . made for no other discernible reason" than the presence of illegal agreement. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557 n.4 (internal quotations and citations omitted).

Rather, as alleged in the Complaint itself, the factual context, and indeed defendants' actions therein, involved rapidly rising jet fuel prices - an obvious potential "stimuli" and "discernible reason" aside from collusion [43] that plausibly could have instigated independent decisions by defendants to impose surcharges. (See Compl. PP 72, 74, 82.) Thus, the Complaint lacks the types of anomalous behavior identified by the Twombly court as strong indicia allowing an inference of conspiracy. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557 n.4; see also In re Elevator Antitrust Litig., 502 F.3d at 51 (finding that allegations of parallel conduct including similarities in contractual language, pricing, and equipment design "do not constitute 'plausible grounds to infer an agreement' because, while that conduct is 'consistent with conspiracy, [it is] just as much in line with a wide swath of rational and competitive business strategy unilaterally prompted by common perceptions of the market'") (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 554.)

For the same reasons the instant case is analogous to Twombly and Elevator Antitrust Litigation in failing to allege a factual context that plausibly gives rise to an inference of conspiracy, this action is different from Starr, 592 F.3d 314, in several crucial respects. In Starr, the Second Circuit reversed the dismissal of an antitrust case against major record labels finding that the "present complaint [44] succeeds where Twombly's failed because the complaint alleges specific facts sufficient to plausibly suggest that the parallel conduct alleged was the result of an agreement among the defendants." Starr, 592 F.3d at 323. The Starr court first noted the array of non-conclusory allegations of defendants' parallel conduct including parallel pricing at unreasonably high levels, mandated customer adherence to unpopular Digital Rights Management ("DRMs") terms for music purchases through either joint ventures established by defendants or entities not controlled by defendants, failure to respond to dramatic cost reductions with price reductions as would be expected in a competitive market, enforcement of a wholesale price floor [20] through the use of Most Favored Nation ("MFN") clauses in [*153] their licenses, and a collective boycott against the number two internet music provider. Id. at 318-19, 323.

But "more importantly," the Starr court found that the complaint in that case succeeded because of allegations which, "taken together, place[d] the parallel conduct 'in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, not merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action.'" Id. at 323 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557). Specifically, the Starr court observed, inter alia, that the defendants' own conduct suggested the existence of a conspiracy because defendants attempted to conceal their MFNs in a "secret side letter" and also that the same alleged price-fixing conduct at issue in the complaint was the subject of investigations by the New York State Attorney General as well as the DOJ. Starr, 592 F.3d at 324. Further, the Starr court noted that some kind of illegal agreement could be inferred as the only rational explanation for defendants' adherence to such unreasonable prices and DRM conditions for customers that one industry commentator noted that "nobody in their right minds" would want to pay the fees and adhere to the DRM conditions in order to use the defendants' internet music services. Id. [46] Moreover, the Starr court noted that defendants continued to charge unreasonably high prices despite substantial decreases in costs. Id. (citing Richard A. Posner, Antitrust Law 88 (2d ed. 2001) ("Simultaneous price increases . . . unexplained by any increases in cost may therefore be good evidence of the initiation of a price-fixing scheme.")). The factual allegations in Starr mirror the types of anomalous behavior also outlined in Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557 n.4, and are absent in the instant action.

Indeed, the facts here are plainly distinguishable. First, the questionable allegations of parallel conduct here do not match the brazen parallel pricing, price floors, lockstep price increases, and use of joint ventures linking each defendants' financial interest to all others, as found in Starr. See Starr, 592 F.3d at 318-19, 323. Additionally, and as defendants point out, rather than eliciting inferences from defendants' attempts to conceal their allegedly illicit activities behind the "thicket of 'secret' conspiracy-specific MFN agreements" as in Starr, plaintiffs here seek to draw inferences from defendants' open participation in regulated, recorded, antitrust-immunized trade association [47] meetings such as the IATA tariff conferences. (See Defs. 2/8/10 Ltr.) Also, as discussed further below, unlike Starr, where defendants were simultaneously subject to multiple investigations for the very conduct at issue in the complaint, here the allegations regarding other investigations are generally inapposite.

Finally, and most importantly, unlike Starr, 592 F.3d at 324, or the examples provided in Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557 n.4, here plaintiffs' Complaint does not allege the type of anomalous actions giving rise to a strong inference of conspiracy because there could be no other "discernible reason" for such behavior. Rather, in the instant case plaintiffs themselves have alleged that defendants were "facing increased jet fuel costs" when they allegedly imposed surcharges, and that after fuel costs fell, some - but not all - defendants reduced their surcharges. (See Compl. PP 72, 74, 82.) This kind of independent and individualized rational response to common external stimuli does not suffice to create the factual context necessary to give rise to an inference of unlawful agreement. Cf. Starr, 592 F.3d at 327 (given that "plaintiffs have alleged behavior that would plausibly contravene [48] each defendant's self-interest 'in the absence of [*154] similar behavior by rivals'," rejecting defendants' argument that agreement implausible on grounds that defendants' conduct "would be entirely consistent with independent, though parallel, action") (quoting 7 Areeda & Hovenkamp § 1415a (2d ed. 2003).

[20] The Starr court first noted that the allegation regarding defendants' adherence to a price floor was "obviously conclusory" (Starr, 592 F.3d at 319 n.2), but later listed defendants' use of MFNs to "enforce a wholesale price floor of about 70 cents per song" as an example of plaintiffs' "non-conclusory [45] factual allegations of parallel conduct," (id. at 323).

Thus, because plaintiffs' allegations of parallel conduct here are not "placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement, [but] merely [suggests] parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action," Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557, plaintiffs' allegations of parallel conduct fail to allege a plausible conspiracy claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

3. Allegations of Other Allegedly Anticompetitive Conduct

Finally, plaintiffs' host of allegations regarding other purportedly anticompetitive conduct by defendants and others are patently insufficient for several reasons.

First, the allegations regarding violations of the conditional immunities afforded to Global Alliance members, (Compl. PP 33, 44), even if true, would not give rise to a violation of Section of the Sherman Act1 which is the basis of plaintiffs' Complaint. Second, plaintiffs' allegations regarding [49] the air cargo surcharges at issue in Resolution 116ss occurred in August 1997, long before the class period here allegedly began in 2004, and plaintiffs fail to establish any probative connection between the air cargo surcharges in Resolution 116ss and the passenger fuel surcharges imposed during the class period at issue here. Similarly, the vague allegations regarding pending investigations based on interviews with unidentified individuals and a subpoena, (see Compl. PP 16, 89, 90), are not probative of the Sherman Act Section 1 violations alleged here because neither mere participation in an investigatory interview nor the receipt of a subpoena is necessarily probative of conspiracy. See, e.g., In re Graphics Processing Units Antitrust Litig., 527 F. Supp. 2d 1011, 1024 (N.D.Cal. 2007) (investigation alone "carries no weight in pleading an antitrust conspiracy claim"). Third, public records reveal that the allegations involving actual guilty pleas referenced in the Complaint, (P 91), concerned unrelated markets (such as for flights between the United States and Korea) or only non-parties to this action (such as British Airways and Virgin Atlantic Airways).

Finally, none of the remaining [50] allegations regarding antitrust investigations by various global authorities against defendants and other non-parties to this action even relate to the transatlantic passenger surcharges at issue in the Complaint. (See Compl. PP 92-93.) As such, there is no basis from which to infer that those localized investigations or proceedings involving other products (such as air cargo fares) implicate defendants in the conspiracy plaintiffs allege here with respect to passenger fares and surcharges in the transatlantic market alleged in the Complaint. See, e.g., Elevator Antitrust Litig., 502 F.3d at 52 (rejecting conclusory "if it happened there, it could have happened here" logic based on allegations of anticompetitive wrongdoing in Europe absent any evidence of linkage between such foreign conduct and conduct here).

Thus, because the allegations in the Complaint, "however true," do not allow the court to infer any "more than the mere possibility of misconduct," dismissal here is required. See Starr, 592 F.3d at 321 (quoting Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1950); see also Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570 (where plaintiffs "have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, their complaint [51] must be dismissed"). The court cannot sanction an enormously expensive and time-consuming [*155] discovery expedition involving "hundreds of thousands" of class members and flights on a mere possibility. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 558 (when, "however true," the allegations in a complaint "could not raise a claim of entitlement to relief, this basic deficiency should be exposed at the point of minimum expenditure of time and money by the parties and the court") (internal quotation and citation omitted).

II. The Issue of Re-pleading

Plaintiffs have already twice amended the pleadings in this action. (See Doc. Nos. 1, Complaint; 6, Amended Complaint; Doc. No. 17, Second Amended Complaint.) After their third attempt to sufficiently plead a cause of action, plaintiffs have neither requested any further leave to re-plead nor suggested any additional facts that would merit an amended pleading. [21] Accordingly, this case is dismissed finally, with prejudice, and without leave to re-plead. See Horoshko v. Chase Manhattan Mortgage Co., 373 F.3d 248, 249 (2d Cir. 2004) (per curiam) (finding that absent any request for leave to amend and "'some indication as to what appellants might add to their complaint [52] in order to make it viable,'" amendment is not warranted and the "District Court was under no obligation to provide [plaintiffs] with leave to amend their complaint, much less provide such leave sua sponte" and rejecting as "frivolous" claim that district court abused its discretion in not permitting an amendment that was never requested) (quoting Nat'l Union of Hosp. & Health Care Employees v. Carey, 557 F.2d 278, 282 (2d Cir. 1977)); see also *Trautenberg v. Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton, Garrison LLP, No. 08-2010-cv, 351 Fed. Appx. 472, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 22454, 4 (2d Cir. Oct. 13, 2009) (finding that district court did not abuse its discretion by failing to grant plaintiff, sua sponte, leave to re-plead given that plaintiff did not move for leave to re-plead in opposition to defendant's motion to dismiss his original complaint with prejudice); Anatian v. Coutts Bank (Switz.) Ltd., 193 F.3d 85, 89 (2d Cir. 1999) ("we will not deem it an abuse of the district court's discretion to order a case closed when leave to amend has not been sought") (internal quotation and citation omitted).

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the defendants' motion to dismiss the Complaint is granted in its entirety and the action is dismissed without leave to re-plead. The Clerk of the Court is respectfully requested to enter judgment in favor of defendants and to close this case.

SO ORDERED.

[21] Although, as noted supra, plaintiffs' motion papers raise certain allegations not contained in the Complaint, even [53] if the Complaint were amended yet again to include such allegations, the Complaint would still fail to cure the deficiencies identified supra and state a plausible claim for relief sufficient to withstand defendants' motions to dismiss.

AMENDED MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Kane, J.

Plaintiffs are a purported class of companies engaged in the business of developing, administering, and implementing drug and alcohol screening services and programs for corporate employers (referred to as "TPA Services"). They bring suit, seeking injunctive relief and treble damages for Defendants' alleged violations of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, § 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14, as well as a variety of state laws. This case is currently before me on Defendants' Motions [*5] to Dismiss (Docs. 104 and 133). [1] For the reasons stated below, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), Plaintiffs' Second Amended Class Action Complaint and Jury Demand, Doc. 130 ("Second Amended Complaint") is dismissed without prejudice for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

JURISDICTION AND VENUE

Plaintiffs have filed claims under §§ 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 26, alleging Defendants' violation of both §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2, as well as § 3 of the Clayton Act. Plaintiffs also allege a variety of state law claims. I have jurisdiction over the federal claims pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331 (Federal Question) and 1337 (Antitrust Jurisdiction); 15 U.S.C. § 4 (providing U.S. District Courts with jurisdiction over Sherman Act violations); and 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 26 (which both provide for a private cause of action in the U.S. District Courts for violations of the antitrust laws). As the state law claims "form part of the same case or controversy" as the federal claims, supplemental [*6] jurisdiction over them is proper pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367.

As all Defendants transact business in and are found within this district, one or more Plaintiffs have a principal place of business within this district, and a substantial portion of the events giving rise to this complaint occurred within this district, venue in the District of Colorado is proper pursuant to 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 22, as well as 28 U.S.C. § 1391(b) and (c).

Defendants CHS, Inc.; ConocoPhillips Company; Marathon Petroleum Company LLC; Marathon Oil Company; Equilon Enterprises LLC d/b/a Shell Oil Products US; Tesoro Companies, Inc.; Valero Energy Corporation; Apache Corporation; EnCana Oil & Gas (USA) Inc.; EnCana Corporation; and Shell Exploration & Production Company [3] (collectively "Operator Defendants") are large national or international [*7] energy companies that own and/or operate oil and gas exploration, development, production, and refining facilities. To meet their needs for a specialized workforce in a highly cyclical industry, Operator Defendants often retain subcontractors, called "Service Companies," to provide specialized services and equipment at their various job sites and facilities. The individuals indirectly employed by Operator Defendants through the Service Companies are required to work around heavy machinery, with potentially dangerous chemicals, and at facilities where there is a risk of fire or explosion. Given the safety-sensitive nature of this work environment, employees who are under the influence of drugs and/or alcohol pose an undue risk not only to their own safety, but also to the safety of others. [4] [5]

[1] Though these motions vary to a certain degree, most of the discussion overlaps. Where necessary, I will discuss the motions separately.

[2] For purposes of considering a motion to dismiss, "[a]ll well-pleaded facts, as distinguished from conclusory allegations, must be taken as true." Ruiz v. McDonnell, 299 F.3d 1173, 1181 (10th Cir. 2002) (quoting Swanson v. Bixler, 750 F.2d 810, 813 (10th Cir. 1984)). Accordingly, these facts are drawn exclusively from Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint, Doc. 130.

[3] Plaintiffs have voluntarily dismissed Defendants Sunoco, Inc., Doc. 144; B.P. America, Inc.; and Stone Energy Corporation, Doc. 158.

[4] As Operator Defendants note in their Reply Memorandum in Support of their Motion to Dismiss, Doc. 146, the magnitude of these risks is illustrated by "the enormous environmental damage and huge liability to the operator that resulted from alcohol abuse on the Exxon [*8] Valdez tanker . . .." Id. at 3.

Thus, as a condition of working on Operator Defendants' job sites, Operator Defendants require Service Companies performing work for them to implement and enforce substance abuse testing programs provided by drug screening companies. Compliance Marketing, Inc.; Compliance Services of East Texas; Connie D. Hagen, Inc. d/b/a DATCS: Drug & Alcohol Testing Compliance Services; Drug Testing, Inc.; Fleetscreen, LTD; Kristina Consulting Group, LLC; Panhandle Employers Services, [*9] Inc.; Kim Jenon Baldwin d/b/a Alliance Drug & Alcohol Testing; and Professional Compliance & Testing, LLC (collectively "Plaintiffs") and Defendants Drugtest, Inc. d/b/a DISA, Inc. and Drugtest Inc., d/b/a Drug Intervention Services of America, Inc. (collectively "DISA") are among hundreds of drug screening companies (referred to as "TPAs") competing to provide TPA Services to Service Companies in the Energy Industry. [6]

In the past, many TPAs, including Plaintiffs and DISA, competed to provide TPA Services to Service Companies in the Energy Industry based on price, convenience, quality, and service. By 2005, however, DISA had secured an advantage over its competitors through the establishment of the DISA Contractors Consortium ("DCC"). Through this consortium, DISA catalogs drug and alcohol test results for Energy Industry workers in a proprietary database (the "DCC Database"). Within the Energy Industry, the DCC Database is the only industry-wide database of individuals who have tested positive [*10] for drug or alcohol use in the past, or whose profiles have not been updated with recent results. Thus, it is a valuable tool for Operators wishing to preclude workers with unacceptable test histories from working on their job sites as employees of Service Companies. [7] [8]

Given the mobility of workers within the Energy Industry and each Operator's use of numerous Service Companies, however, the usefulness of the DCC database is dependent upon the participation of a significant number of Operators. Accordingly, DISA entered into a series of agreements with Operator Defendants, under the terms of which Operator Defendants require their Service Companies to use the DCC database to screen potential employees. [9] [10] As a result, before a Service Company's employee may come on to an Operator's job site, the Service [*11] Company must pay DISA a fee to search and retrieve the employee's drug and alcohol test result history from the DCC Database.

DISA has refused to populate the DCC Database with the drug-testing information collected by other TPAs, despite the fact that all providers use licensed and regulated collectors, breath alcohol technicians, medical record officers, and labs in conformance with state and federal testing guidelines. [11] Furthermore, DISA will not allow a company to use the DCC database unless it also uses DISA for TPA Services, and it has raised the prices of its drug and

[5] In light of these safety concerns and in part because of the de-centralized nature of its workforce, one or more of the Operator Defendants (including, but not limited to, EnCana Oil & Gas, Marathon Oil Company, Shell, and others) have in the past supported and collaborated in efforts to "define the standard [for] health, safety, & environmental orientation for US upstream oil and gas industry." Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint, Doc. 130, p. 13 (quoting the SafeLandUSA website). Through these efforts, participating Operator Defendants sought to secure "reciprocal agreements" regarding acceptance of training certification and "access to orientation records through a common database." Id.

[6] TPA Services are a discrete type of service; no other services can be reasonably interchanged or substituted for the testing of employees or potential employees for their use of alcohol or drugs.

[7] The DCC database currently contains information on more than 1 million individuals and includes participation of more than thirty-eight hundred companies.

[8] This is similar to the "LA Clean Card" program created by DISA and several of Operator Defendants in the 1990s. Though Plaintiffs note the similarity, they do not specify which Operator Defendants participated in this program.

[9] Some of the Operator Defendants, however, do not themselves use DISA or the DCC database in administering drug and alcohol screening for their own employees, independent contractors, or consultants.

[10] As will be discussed infra at p. 14, n. 20, Plaintiffs have only offered proof that some of the Operator Defendants entered into agreements with DISA.

[11] The fungibility of these services is demonstrated by the fact that DISA has sub-contracted sample collection and testing back to some of the very TPAs who lost their Service Company clients to DISA after the implementation of the DCC Database.

alcohol screening and program administration services as a condition to using the DCC Database. [12] [13] Thus, in order to meet the requirements of Operator Defendants and gain access to the DCC database, Service Companies must also hire DISA as their TPA Service provider [*12] despite the fact that DISA charges higher prices for its TPA Services and fails to provide the full range of services supplied by competitors. [14]

Operator Defendants require use of the DCC Database knowing that DISA will not allow a Service Company to use the DCC Database without using DISA for TPA Services. As a result, Plaintiffs have been precluded from providing TPA Services to the Service Companies supplying services and equipment to Operator Defendants and DISA has acquired more than 75% of the market share for the provision of TPA Services to Service [*13] Companies in the Energy Industry. [15]

LEGAL STANDARD

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2), a pleading must contain a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief," in order to "give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests." Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (quoting Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957)). The Complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim "unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." Conley, 355 U.S. at 45-46.

As the Supreme Court recently clarified, however, "Conley . . . described the breadth of opportunity to prove what an adequate complaint claims, not the minimum standard of adequate pleading to govern a complaint's survival." Twombly., 550 U.S. at 563 (emphasis added). [*14] Accordingly, as the court explained in Twombly and reiterated in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009), "to survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570); see also Robbins v. Oklahoma, 519 F.3d 1242, 1247 (10th Cir. 2008). Significantly, though a court will accept as true all well-pleaded facts alleged for purposes of determining plausibility, it will not consider "[t]hreadbare recitals of elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements . . .." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1950.

Plausibility does not require "detailed factual allegations," but it does require that a complaint have sufficient factual assertions "to raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. [16] As this Circuit has held, "the mere metaphysical possibility that some plaintiff could prove some set of facts in support of the pleaded claims is insufficient; the complaint must give the court reason to believe that this plaintiff has a reasonable likelihood of mustering factual support for these [*15] claims." Ridge at Red Hawk, LLC v. Schneider, 493 F.3d 1174, 1177 (10th Cir. 2007)(emphasis in original).

[12] Like Plaintiffs, DISA also provides its TPA Services on a stand-alone basis for its customers.

[13] The Service Companies pay all expenses associated with DISA's TPA Services and the DCC database. The Operators do not directly pay any of the costs of these services.

[14] For instance, unlike many of the Plaintiffs, DISA does not offer on-site sample collection and testing as part of its TPA Services.

[15] By means of illustration, Service Company representatives attending a meeting of the Association of Energy Service Companies repeatedly informed representatives of TPA Service providers that their Service Companies could not send TPA work to those providers because they had to use DISA.

[16] Significantly, in formulating this standard the Twombly court was particularly aware of and concerned with the unusually high cost of discovery in antitrust cases, such as the case at hand. See 550 U.S. at 559 (quoting Dura Pharms., Inc. v. Broudo, 544 U.S. 336, 347, 125 S. Ct. 1627, 161 L. Ed. 2d 577 (2005)) ("Probably, then, it is only by taking care to require allegations that reach the level suggesting conspiracy that we can hope to avoid the potentially enormous expense of discovery in cases with 'no reasonably founded hope that the [discovery] process will reveal relevant evidence' to support a § 1 claim").

DISCUSSION

Plaintiffs' federal claims are based primarily on alleged violations of the Sherman Act. 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq. [17] The Sherman Act, signed into law in 1890, "was enacted in the era of 'trusts' and of 'combinations' of businesses and of capital organized and directed to control of the market by suppression of competition in the marketing of goods and services, the monopolistic tendency of which had become a matter of public concern." Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader, 310 U.S. 469, 492-93, 60 S. Ct. 982, 84 L. Ed. 1311 (1940). The Act, [*16] therefore, focuses not on "the vindication of general 'notions of fair dealing,'" but on "the protection of competition or prevention of monopoly. . .." Four Corners Nephrology Assocs. v. Mercy Med. Ctr. of Durango, 582 F.3d 1216, 1225 (10th Cir. 2009); see also Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993) ("The purpose of the Sherman Act is not to protect businesses from the working of the market; it is to protect the public from the failure of the market").

The Act is organized into two sections. Section 1 specifically prohibits "contract[s], combination[s] . . ., or conspirac[ies] in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states . . .," 15 U.S.C. § 1; it does not, however, apply to unilateral conduct, regardless of its impact on trade or commerce. See Abraham v. Intermountain Healthcare, Inc, 461 F.3d 1249, 1256 (10th Cir. 2006). Section 2 applies to "[e]very person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any person or persons, to monopolize any part of trade or commerce . . .." 15 U.S.C. § 2. "The possession of monopoly [*17] power will not be found unlawful," however, "unless it is accompanied by an element of anticompetitive conduct." Verizon Commc'ns. Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004).

First Claim for Relief: Section 1 of the Sherman Act

Section 1 of the Sherman Act specifically prohibits "contract[s], combination[s] . . ., or conspirac[ies] in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states . . .." 15 U.S.C. § 1. As a threshold matter, Plaintiffs must first establish their standing to bring an antitrust claim in order to assert a violation of § 1.

A. Antitrust Standing

In order to establish Article III standing, Plaintiffs must allege that (1) they have suffered or imminently will suffer an injury; (2) the injury is fairly traceable to the conduct of the defendant; and (3) a favorable federal court decision is likely to redress the injury. See Wilderness Soc'y v. Kane County, 581 F.3d 1198, 1209 (10th Cir. 2009) (citing Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560-61, 112 S. Ct. 2130, 119 L. Ed. 2d 351 (1992)). Antitrust standing, however, requires a heightened inquiry. Though "[h]arm to the antitrust plaintiff is sufficient to satisfy the constitutional standing requirement of injury in fact, [*18] . . . the court must make a further determination whether the plaintiff is a proper party to bring a private antitrust action." Tal v. Hogan, 453 F.3d 1244, 1253 (10th Cir. 2006). Thus, Plaintiffs must show (1) an antitrust injury and (2) a causal connection between the defendant's antitrust violation and their alleged antitrust injury. See id. An antitrust injury is "an injury of the type the antitrust laws were designed to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Abraham, 461 F.3d at 1267.

Here, Plaintiffs allege that DISA and Operator Defendants have entered into agreements which have restrained competition for the provision of TPA Services to the Energy Industry. They further allege that they "have been injured in their business property as a result of these illegal contracts, combinations, agreements and conduct . . .." Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint, Doc. 130, p. 29. If proven, these allegations are sufficient basis for Plaintiffs' antitrust standing. They allege an injury, restraint of competition, which the Sherman Act is specifically designed to prevent, and that the injury flows from concerted action by the Defendants.

[17] As will be briefly discussed infra at p. 34, Plaintiffs also allege violations of § 3 of the Clayton Act.

B. Concerted Action

In [*19] order to establish a violation of § 1, a party must show the existence of "a contract, combination, or conspiracy [('concerted action)] that unreasonably restrains trade in the relevant market." Full Draw Prods. v. Easton Sports, Inc., 182 F.3d 745, 756 (10th Cir. 1999) (quoting TV Commc'ns Network, Inc. v. Turner Network Television, 964 F.2d 1022, 1027 (10th Cir. 1992)). Concerted action involves "two or more entities that previously pursued their own interests separately . . . combining to act as one for their common benefit." Abraham, 461 F.3d at 1256 (quoting Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 769, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984)). "When two formerly separate entities combine for their common benefit, their activity is 'fraught with anti-competitive risk' because it 'deprives the marketplace of the independent centers of decisionmaking that competition assumes and demands.'" Id. (quoting Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 768-69).

Concerted action may be shown either by direct or circumstantial evidence. Direct evidence is evidence "that is explicit and requires no inferences to establish the proposition or conclusion being asserted . . .." Champagne Metals v. Ken-Mac Metals, Inc., 458 F.3d 1073, 1083 (10th Cir. 2006)(quoting [*20] In re Baby Food Antitrust Litg., 166 F.3d 112, 118 (3rd Cir. 1999)). Circumstantial evidence is, by contrast, evidence that requires some inference on the part of the fact-finder. Antitrust law, however, "limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case." Abraham, 461 F.3d at 1257 (quoting Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 588, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986)). "Conduct as consistent with permissible competition as with illegal conspiracy does not, standing alone, support an inference of antitrust conspiracy." Id.

C. Unreasonable Restraint on Trade

A party seeking to establish a violation of § 1 must also show that the alleged concerted action imposes an unreasonable restraint on trade. Full Draw Prods., 182 F.3d at 756; see also Law v. NCAA, 134 F.3d 1010, 1016 (10th Cir. 1998) ("Because nearly every contract that binds the parties to an agreed course of conduct 'is a restraint of trade' of some sort, the Supreme Court has limited the restrictions contained in section 1 to bar only 'unreasonable restraints of trade'"). Generally, courts evaluate the reasonableness of a restraint on trade based on a "rule-of-reason" analysis. Under the rule of reason [*21] analysis, the fact-finder is required to "weigh all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition." Gregory v. Fort Bridger Rendezvous Ass'n, 448 F.3d 1195, 1203 (10th Cir. 2006) (quoting Diaz v. Farley, 215 F.3d 1175, 1182 (10th Cir. 2000)). As the 10th Circuit explained in Law v. NCAA:

> Courts have imposed a consistent structure on rule of reason analysis by casting it in terms of shifting burdens of proof. Under this approach, the plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that an agreement had a substantially adverse effect on competition. If the plaintiff meets this burden, the burden shifts to the defendant to come forward with evidence of the procompetitive virtues of the alleged wrongful conduct. If the defendant is able to demonstrate procompetitive effects, the plaintiff then must prove that the challenged conduct is not reasonably necessary to achieve the legitimate objectives or that those objectives can be achieved in a substantially less restrictive manner. Ultimately, if these steps are met, the harms and benefits must be weighed against each other in order to judge [*22] whether the challenged behavior is, on balance, reasonable.

134 F.3d at 1019 (citations omitted). Significantly, "rule of reason" analysis requires a court to "analyze the relevant market power of the defendants and therefore requires the plaintiff to allege a valid market." Campfield v. State Farm Mut. Auto Ins. Co., 532 F.3d 1111, 1119 (10th Cir. 2008). In most cases, this analysis is an intensive, time-consuming inquiry.

In recognition of the burden the rule of reason analysis places on the fact-finder, courts have applied a per se illegality standard where "the challenged action falls into the category of 'agreements or practices which because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue are conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use.'" Nw. Wholesale Stationers, Inc. v. Pacific Stationery & Printing Co., 472 U.S. 284, 289, 105 S. Ct. 2613, 86 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1985). Once conduct is deemed per se unreasonable, "a court need not examine the practice's impact on the market or the procompetitive justifications for the practice advanced by a defendant before finding a violation [*23] of antitrust law." Law, 134 F.3d at 1016. Most relevant for purposes of this case, courts have found that, in some situations, tying and group boycotts are per se violations of the Sherman Act.

Here, Plaintiffs explicitly allege that DISA has engaged in two types of anticompetitive conduct constituting unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of § 1: exclusive dealing with Operator Defendants to the exclusion of Plaintiffs and "tying" the DCC Database to DISA's TPA Services. Further, Plaintiffs implicitly allege Operator Defendants have engaged in an illegal group boycott which unreasonably restrains trade in violation of § 1. [18] I will begin by analyzing Plaintiffs' exclusive dealing claim before turning my attention to the tying and group boycott claims.

D. Plaintiffs' [*24] § 1 Arguments

1. Exclusive Dealing

Plaintiffs allege agreements exist between DISA and Operator Defendants requiring "Service Companies who wish to perform services for the Operators . . . to retain DISA to input and store records of their employees' drug and alcohol tests in the DCC Database." [19] Second Amended Complaint, Doc. 130, p. 7. As a threshold matter, Plaintiffs' generalized allegations of agreements between Operator Defendants and DISA do not provide sufficient factual basis to demonstrate concerted action between each Operator Defendant and DISA. Plaintiffs do, however, offer evidence that (1) EnCana, Conoco, SEPCO, Marathon, and Apache required their Service Companies to enroll in the DCC Database; (2) these Operator Defendants used similar language in notifying their Service Companies of this requirement; and (3) DISA directly contacted the Service Companies working with these Operator Defendants to remind them of the requirement. Id. at 17-20. [20] This circumstantial evidence is sufficient to establish concerted action between DISA and, individually, EnCana, Conoco, SEPCO, Marathon, and Apache. As Plaintiffs do not adequately allege concerted action between DISA and CHS, [*25] Equilon, Tesoro, or Valero, however, any claim of exclusive dealing between DISA and these parties must be dismissed. Even accepting these pleadings as adequate, however, Plaintiffs have failed to establish the plausibility of their claim that the alleged arrangements constitute unlawful exclusive dealing.

Arrangements between parties at different levels of the distribution chain are referred to as "vertical agreements." See Business Elecs. Corp. v. Sharp Elecs. Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 730, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988). A vertical agreement in which firms agree that they will deal only with each other (or not deal with each others' competitors) is considered an "exclusive dealing arrangement." Town Sound & Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 473 n.2 (3rd Cir. 1992). [*26] Exclusive dealing arrangements, like other non-price vertical restraints, are generally considered procompetitive and are judged under the rule of reason. See Business Elecs. Corp., 485 U.S. at 724; Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 44-45, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L.

[18] As Operator Defendants note in their Reply Memorandum in Support of Their Motion to Dismiss, Doc. 146, the Plaintiffs do not even use the word "boycott" in their Second Amended Complaint. Id. at 9. I will, nevertheless, analyze whether Plaintiffs have adequately pled an unlawful group boycott for purposes of these Motions to Dismiss. See generally, F. R. Civ. P. 8(e) ("Pleadings must be construed so as to do justice").

[19] In their Response to Drugtest, Inc.'s Motion to Dismiss, Doc. 142, Plaintiffs claim that they have also sufficiently alleged a horizontal agreement among Operator Defendants which constitutes a per se unlawful group boycott. Id. at 14. That claim is analyzed in the context of my analysis of the group boycott claim, infra at pp. 23-27.

[20] With respect to the other four Operator Defendants (CHS, Equilon, Tesoro, and Valero), there are no specific allegations whatsoever.

Ed. 2d 2. In order to establish that an exclusive dealing arrangement is an unreasonable restraint on trade in violation of § 1, the Plaintiffs must plead a relevant market and that the agreement substantially forecloses their ability to compete in the relevant market. C.f., Tampa Elec. Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320, 327, 81 S. Ct. 623, 5 L. Ed. 2d 580 (discussing exclusive dealing in the context of a Clayton Act § 3 violation). Here, Plaintiffs have failed on both counts.

a. Relevant Market

The Plaintiffs bear the burden of defining the relevant market. Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 436 (3rd Cir. 1997). In defining the relevant market, Plaintiffs must allege both a relevant product market and a relevant geographic market. Id. at 435. "The geographic market is 'the narrowest market which is wide enough so that products from adjacent areas . . . cannot compete on substantial parity with those included in the market.'" Westman Comm'n Co. v. Hobart Int'l, Inc., 796 F.2d 1216, 1222 (10th Cir. 1986). [*27] The parties do not contest, nor do I find lacking, Plaintiffs' definition of the relevant geographic market as the United States. [21] Accordingly, my analysis focuses on the Plaintiffs' definition of the relevant product market.

The Plaintiffs must specifically define the product market by reference to the "reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product [in question] and substitutes for it." Brown Shoe Co., Inc. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962); see also Telecor Commc'ns, Inc. v. Sw. Bell Tel. Co., 305 F.3d 1124, 1131 (10th Cir. 2002). "Interchangeability implies that one product is roughly equivalent to another for the use to which it is put; while there may be some degree of preference for the one over the other, either would work effectively." Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 437. Factors to be considered include price, use, and qualities. Id. "Cross-elasticity of demand is a measure of the substitutability of products from the point of view of buyers. More technically, [*28] it measures the responsiveness of the demand for one product to changes in the price of a different product." Id. (citing E. Thomas Sullivan and Jeffrey L. Harrision, Understanding Antitrust and its Economic Implications 217 (1994)).

Though the Plaintiff is responsible for defining the relevant market, it cannot "artificially create antitrust claims by narrowly defining the relevant market to create the appearance of an antitrust injury." Smalley & Co. v. Emerson & Cuming, Inc., 808 F. Supp. 1503, 1512 (D. Colo. 1992). The relevant market must "reflect[] the total market demand for plaintiffs' product, not just defendants' demand . . .. When there are numerous sources of interchangeable demand, the plaintiff cannot circumscribe the market to a few buyers in an effort to manipulate those buyers' market share." Campfield, 532 F.3d at 1119 (emphasis added). "Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, [*29] the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted." Id. at 1118 (quoting Queen City Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d at 436).

Plaintiffs allege that, for purposes of analyzing its claims, the relevant product market is "the provision of TPA Services to Service Companies in the Energy Industry." [22] Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint, Doc. 130, p. 12. In support of their definition of the relevant market, Plaintiffs assert that jobs in the Energy Industry are unique, safety in the industry is of paramount importance, drug and alcohol testing is necessary to ensure safety, and [21] Though Plaintiffs make passing reference to geographic sub-markets in the Rocky Mountain and Gulf Coast regions, they do not offer any evidence in support of those markets.

[22] Plaintiffs also allege "[a]n additional relevant market exists for the services of a database holding the results of the drug and alcohol screenings" [*30] -- essentially the DCC Database. Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint, Doc. 130, p. 14. Even if this was accepted as the relevant market, however, Defendant DISA "does not violate the Sherman Act by virtue of the natural monopoly it holds over its own product." TV Commc'ns Network, Inc., 964 F.2d at 1025. Though in Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc. the Supreme Court found that a single brand of a product or service can, in limited circumstances, constitute the relevant market, that finding was based on the fact that the service at issue was not interchangeable. 504 U.S. 451, 481-82, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992). As Plaintiffs have failed to address either the interchangeability or cross-elasticity of demand for a market defined as a DCC-type database, Eastman Kodak is inapposite.

Operator Defendants have collaborated in the past to standardize safety training. Id. at 12-14. Plaintiffs also allege that "TPA Services are a discrete type of service." Id. at 14. Though Plaintiffs allege sufficient facts to support a relevant market consisting of the provision of TPA Services generally, Plaintiffs fail to address the interchangeability or cross-elasticity of the provision of TPA Services to Service Companies in the Energy Industry.

Plaintiffs' references to the uniqueness of the Energy Industry and past efforts to coordinate safety training do not support a finding that TPA Services provided to the Energy Industry differ in any material way from TPA Services provided to other industries. To the contrary, Plaintiffs' arguments suggest that TPA Services provided to the Energy Industry are interchangeable with TPA Services in general. Plaintiffs' [*31] lone reference to "interchangeability" merely reinforces this conclusion. See id. ("No other services reasonably can be interchanged or substituted for the testing of employees or potential employees for their use of alcohol or drugs"). Plaintiffs' failure to plead the relevant market adequately is fatal to their exclusive dealing claim. [23]

b. Anticompetitive Effects

In addition to alleging a relevant market, Plaintiffs must show anticompetitive effects resulting from a substantial foreclosure of their ability to compete in the relevant market in order to establish a violation of § 1 in the context of an exclusive dealing arrangement. C.f., Tampa Elec. Co., 365 U.S. at 327 (discussing exclusive dealing in the context of a Clayton Act § 3 violation). In light of the above conclusion that Plaintiffs have failed to plead the relevant market adequately, it is impossible for them to prove substantial foreclosure. Even if this market definition was adequately pled, however, Plaintiffs fail to allege [*32] facts which could support a finding of substantial foreclosure.

In order to show substantial foreclosure, Plaintiffs must demonstrate that "the competition foreclosed by the [exclusive dealing arrangements] . . . constitute[s] a substantial share of the relevant market." Id. at 328. "To determine substantiality in a given case, it is necessary to weigh the probable effect of the contract on the relevant area of effective competition, taking into account the relative strength of the parties, the proportionate volume of commerce involved in relation to the total volume of commerce in the relevant market area, and the probable immediate and future effects which preemption of that share of the market might have on effective competition therein." Id. at 329. Plaintiffs have failed to plead any facts demonstrating the total volume of commerce involved in the provision of TPA services to Service Companies in the Energy Industry as a whole. [24] In light of this failure, it is impossible to determine the extent to which DISA's conduct has foreclosed Plaintiffs' ability to compete. Accordingly, Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged substantial foreclosure.

Given Plaintiffs' failure to allege adequately either the relevant product market or substantial foreclosure of their ability to compete in the relevant market, dismissal of their exclusive dealing claim is appropriate.

2. Tying

Plaintiffs also allege that DISA unlawfully ties the sale of its TPA Services to use of its proprietary DCC Database. A tying arrangement is "an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchase a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier." Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S.at 461 [*34] (quoting N. Pacific R.. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5-6, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958)). "[T]he essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's

[23] As is discussed infra, Plaintiffs' failure to plead the relevant product market adequately is also fatal, under a rule of reason analysis, to its group boycott claim, as well as to its § 2 claims.

[24] As Defendant DISA notes in its Memorandum [*33] of Law in Support of its Motion to Dismiss the First Amended Class Action Complaint, Doc. 105, Plaintiffs "acknowledge there are other, unnamed companies in the 'Energy Industry' . . .." Id. at 12. Further, Plaintiffs fail to suggest that "DISA had exclusive agreements with any of the unnamed energy companies, including massive energy companies like ExxonMobil." Id. Perhaps even more significant, in their Response to Drugtest Inc.'s Motion to Dismiss, Doc. 142, the Plaintiffs make no effort to demonstrate that they have pled any facts which could support a finding of substantial foreclosure.

exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of the tied product." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 12. Though historically the Supreme Court considered all tying arrangements to be per se illegal under § 1 of the Sherman Act, see Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 337 U.S. 293, 305, 69 S. Ct. 1051, 93 L. Ed. 1371 (U.S. 1949) (assuming that "[t]ying arrangements serve hardly any purpose beyond the suppression of competition"), the Court began applying rule of reason analysis in some instances where it acknowledged the theoretical validity of some tying arrangements. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 12. Recently, the Court confirmed that market factors must be evaluated in analyzing tying claims and pro-competitive benefits may justify tying arrangements. Illinois Tool Works Inc. v. Independent Ink, Inc., 547 U.S. 28, 33-46, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26 (2006). The Court stated unequivocally, "in all cases involving a tying arrangement, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying product." Id. at 46. As Plaintiffs have failed [*35] to plead the relevant market adequately, any attempt to argue that Defendants' conduct constitutes an illegal tying arrangement necessarily fails under a rule of reason analysis. [25] Thus, I will focus my analysis on whether Defendants' conduct constitutes a per se illegal tying arrangement.

As a preliminary matter, the Complaint makes no allegations that Operator Defendants have market power in the DCC Database. Defendants in this action include both DISA, a competitor of Plaintiffs in the tied market, and Operator Defendants, direct customers of the tying product and secondary customers of the tied product. While DISA has a clear economic interest as the purveyor of both the tying and the tied product, the economic interest of Operator Defendants is less clear. "[W]here a third party is involved in selling the tied product to the plaintiff, most courts have required that the tying product seller have a direct economic interest in the sale of the tied product before an illegal tying arrangement will be found." Sports Racing Servs. v. Sports Car Club of Am., 131 F.3d 874, 888 (10th Cir. 1997). [*36] The Tenth Circuit has held that absent an economic interest, a tying claim cannot succeed. Abraham, 461 F.3d at 1266. Though Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint alleges that there is no economic detriment to the Operators as the additional cost of the tied services is borne by the Service Companies (Compl. 107, 109), it fails to allege any economic benefit to Operator Defendants. Without an economic interest in the sale of TPA Services, Operator Defendants cannot be liable for tying.

Though DISA has the requisite economic interest in the provision of both the tying and the tied products, Plaintiffs fail to allege all four elements of tying sufficiently. In order to establish the existence of an illegal tying arrangement, Plaintiffs must adequately plead the existence of: "(1) two separate products, [26] (2) a tie -- or conditioning of the sale of one product on the purchase of another, (3) sufficient economic power in the tying product market, and (4) a substantial volume of commerce affected in the tied product market." Multistate Legal Studies, Inc. v. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich Legal & Prof'l Publ'n, Inc., 63 F.3d 1540, 1546 (10th Cir. 1995).

a. Two Separate Products

As a threshold matter, Plaintiffs must adequately plead the existence of two distinct products. The existence of distinct products "turns not on the functional relation between [the products] but rather on the character of the demand for the two items." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 19. In the instant case, the two alleged products are drug testing services and a database containing the results of the drug tests. Though it seems unlikely that there is any demand for an unpopulated database, for purposes of this motion I assume that Plaintiffs could establish that the DCC Database, the tying product, is distinct from the TPA Services, the tied product, and that each constitutes a separate product or service.

b. The Existence of a "Tie"

It is self-evident that Plaintiffs must allege the existence of a "tie" in order to plead tying adequately. A "tie" exists where a party coerces or conditions the sale of one product on the purchase of another. Multistate Legal Studies,

[25] For more discussion of Plaintiffs' failure to plead the relevant market, see discussion supra at pp. 15-17.

[26] In the context of a Sherman Act § 1 claim, [*37] the term "products" includes services and is not limited to goods. See Eastman Kodak Co., 504 U.S. at 461-62 (1992).

63 F.3d at 1546. I find Plaintiffs' allegations that DISA conditions access to its [*38] database on the use of DISA for TPA Services and that DISA charges separate fees for TPA Services and database access adequately establish the existence of a tie in this case.

c. Sufficient Economic Power in the Tying Market

In order to establish their tying claim, Plaintiffs must also show that DISA has market power in the tying product market. Illinois Tool Works Inc., 547 U.S. at 36. "The existence of such power ordinarily is inferred from the seller's possession of a predominant share of the market." Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 464. I find Plaintiffs' allegations that DISA maintains the only industry-wide database and that the DCC program is the largest screening program in existence constitutes sufficient evidence of economic power in the tying product market.

d. Substantial Volume of Commerce Affected

Finally, Plaintiffs must show that the tying arrangement affects a substantial volume of commerce in the tied product market. Multistate Legal Studies, 63 F.3d at 1546. The product market may be further developed after discovery, but a legally cognizable product market must be present in the pleadings. Newcal Indus. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1045 (9th Cir. 2008). As discussed [*39] previously, Plaintiffs fail to adequately allege the existence of a market for the provision of TPA Services to Service Companies in the Energy Industry. Furthermore, Plaintiffs fail to assert facts suggesting that the tying arrangement complained of has a substantial affect on the general market for TPA Services.

In order to survive a motion to dismiss under FRCP 12(b)(6), Plaintiffs must plead factual allegations establishing each element of their tying claim. As Plaintiffs fail to adequately allege that the complained of tying arrangement affects a substantial volume of commerce in the market for the provision of TPA Services, their tying claim must be dismissed.

3. Group Boycott

As noted above, group boycotts may be found to be unreasonable restraints of trade in violation of § 1 under either a rule of reason analysis or a per se illegality standard. Nw. Wholesale Stationers, 472 U.S. at 293. As Plaintiffs have failed to plead the relevant market adequately, any attempt to argue that Defendants' conduct constitutes an illegal group boycott necessarily fails under a rule of reason analysis. [27] Thus, I will focus my analysis on whether Defendants' conduct constitutes a per se illegal [*40] group boycott.

In the context of group boycotts, reviewing courts usually find conduct to be per se illegal where there are "joint efforts by a firm or firms to disadvantage competitors by 'either directly denying or persuading or coercing suppliers or customers to deny relationships the competitors need in the competitive struggle.'" Id. at 294. Such conduct usually takes one of three forms:

1. Horizontal agreements among traders to exclude direct competitors;
2. Vertical combinations that are "widespread" in nature to exclude competitors of some members of the combination; and
3. Combinations designed to influence trade practices of boycott victims rather than to eliminate them as competitors.

Genetic Sys. Corp. v. Abbott Labs., 691 F. Supp. 407, 416 (D.D.C. 1988). Presumably, Plaintiffs assert that the group boycott was of the second type -- a vertical group boycott -- consisting of Plaintiffs' direct competitor DISA and the indirect purchasers of Plaintiffs' product, Operator Defendants. The case law and the facts do not, however, support Plaintiffs' allegations that the Defendants' [*41] conduct constitutes a per se illegal group boycott.

To the extent Plaintiffs allege vertical agreements between DISA and Operator Defendants, these do not, standing alone, constitute a per se illegal group boycott. [28] In order to establish that a group boycott is per se illegal, "there must be an agreement among conspirators whose market positions are horizontal to each other." Coffey v. Healthtrust, Inc., 955 F.2d 1388 (10th Cir. 1992)(quoting Westman Comm'n Co., 796 F.2d at 1224, n.1 (emphasis added)). Accordingly, in order to prove the complained of conduct constitutes a per se illegal group boycott, Plaintiffs must prove that there exists some agreement among the Operator Defendants.

As a threshold matter, Plaintiffs fail to specifically allege the existence of an agreement among the Operator Defendants to mandate that Service Company workers be cleared through DISA as a condition of working on Operator Defendants' job sites. [29] As in Twombly, Plaintiffs "complaint leaves no doubt that [they] rest their [group boycott] claim on descriptions of parallel conduct and not on any independent [*42] allegation of actual agreement among the [Operator Defendants]." 550 U.S. at 564. And, again, as in Twombly, Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint fails to "mention[] [a] specific time, place, or person involved in the alleged conspiracies." Id. at 565, n. 10; see also Robbins, 519 F.3d at 1248. At most, the few allegations related to specific Operator Defendants in Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint suggest that some (but not all) Operator Defendants required Service Companies to use DISA-cleared workers at various points over a five-year period (starting in 2003 and ending in 2009), which in itself refutes the idea of some overarching agreement to impose such a requirement.

Instead of direct evidence of a horizontal agreement, Plaintiffs suggest past collaboration by some Operator Defendants on similar initiatives involving employee training and workplace management constitutes a "track [*43] record" of cooperation giving rise to an inference of such cooperation in the instant case. Such "track record" allegations, however, do not give rise to an inference of agreement under Twombly. See, e.g., In re Digital Music Antitrust Litig., 592 F. Supp. 2d 435, 444 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

Plaintiffs also seek to establish the existence of a horizontal agreement by providing evidence of conscious parallelism. Standing alone, circumstantial evidence such as conscious parallelism "falls short of 'conclusively establishing agreement or itself constituting a Sherman Act offense.'" Twombly, 550 U.S. at 553 (quoting Theatre Enter., Inc. v. Paramount Film Distrib. Corp., 346 U.S. 537, 540-41, 74 S. Ct. 257, 98 L. Ed. 273 (1954)). "[I]f the defendants had no rational economic motive to conspire, and if their conduct is consistent with other, equally plausible explanations, the conduct does not give rise to an inference of conspiracy." Abraham, 461 F.3d at 1257-58 (quoting Rossi v. Standard Roofing, 156 F.3d 452, 466 (3rd Cir. 1998)). A party may, however, support an inference of concerted action by producing evidence that "the parties are acting against their own individual business interests, or that there is motivation to [*44] enter into an agreement requiring parallel behavior." Monument Builders of Greater Kansas City, Inc. v. American Cemetery Ass'n of Kansas, 891 F.2d 1473, 1481 (10th Cir. 1989).

As evidence of conscious parallelism, Plaintiffs cite statements by representatives of Operator Defendants acknowledging that they have a common workforce and common interests as well as a "striking" similarity between letters sent by Conoco, SEPCO, Marathon, and Apache notifying their Service Companies of the requirement to use DISA. [30] Finally, Plaintiffs assert that "[t]he DCC Database would not accomplish its stated purpose unless as many Service Companies as possible are compelled to sign up for DISA's database service." Plaintiffs' arguments

[28] Nor do they, as discussed supra at pp. 13-19, constitute illegal exclusive dealing arrangements.

[29] Though Plaintiffs make passing reference to agreements between and among DISA and Operator Defendants, they fail to discuss with any particularity any agreement among the Operator Defendants. Such conclusory assertions of agreements are ignored for purposes of Rule 12(b)(6). Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557.

[30] Plaintiffs specifically cite correspondence from EnCana (requiring compliance [*45] by March 2004), ConocoPhillips (requiring compliance by January 1, 2008), SEPCO (requiring compliance by August 4, 2008), Marathon (requiring compliance by September 29, 2008), and Apache (requiring compliance by May 1, 2009). Each of these letters was followed by correspondence from DISA reiterating the requirement to enroll in the DCC program. Plaintiffs also generally allege similar correspondence from the other Operator Defendants.

necessarily fail to establish conclusively the existence of a horizontal agreement, however, as they acknowledge plausible explanations for the conscious parallelism noted by Plaintiffs -- namely that each Operator Defendant would have a powerful incentive to require its Service Companies to use only workers cleared through the DCC Database whether or not any Operator Defendants did so. [31]

Even if Plaintiffs adequately pled the existence of a horizontal agreement between Operator Defendants, I find it likely that the procompetitive effects of those agreements outweighs any potential repugnance. Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint cites many reasons why the supposed agreement to require Service Companies to use only DISA-cleared workers would benefit occupational health and safety and, thus, be procompetitive. See, e.g., Diaz, 215 F.3d at 1183-84 (rejecting per se analysis to group boycott in question and holding that "Northwest Wholesale explicitly allows courts to consider plausible arguments concerning procompetitive effects in determining whether the per se rule or the rule of reason should apply to a [*46] horizontal group boycott").

As Plaintiffs fail to plead an adequate relevant market or adequately allege the existence of a horizontal agreement between the Operator Defendants, their group boycott claim must be dismissed.

Second and Third Claims for Relief: Section 2 of the Sherman Act

Section 2 of the Sherman Act applies to "[e]very person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any person or persons, to monopolize any part of trade or commerce . . .." 15 U.S.C. § 2. Plaintiffs allege that Defendants have monopolized, attempted to monopolize, or in the alternative conspired to monopolize the provision of TPA Services to the Energy Industry. [32] As noted above, Plaintiffs must first establish their antitrust standing to bring claims under § 2 of the Sherman Act.

A. Antitrust Standing

As noted above, to establish antitrust standing Plaintiffs must show (1) an antitrust injury and (2) a causal connection between [*47] Defendant's antitrust violation and its alleged antitrust injury. Here, Plaintiffs allege that DISA and Operator Defendants have engaged in conduct which has resulted in the monopolization of the market for the provision of TPA Services to the Energy Industry; that DISA and Operator Defendants have attempted to monopolize the market for the provision of TPA Services to the Energy Industry; or, in the alternative, that DISA and Operator Defendants have conspired to monopolize the market for the provision of TPA Services to the Energy Industry. They further allege that they have been injured as a result of DISA's and Operator Defendant's actions. If proven, these allegations provide sufficient basis for Plaintiffs' antitrust standing in relation to their monopolization and attempted monopolization claims against DISA and their conspiracy claim against DISA and Operator Defendants. They fail, however, to establish standing for their monopolization and attempted monopolization claims against Operator Defendants.

As a matter of law, a party cannot monopolize or attempt to monopolize a market in which it is not a supplier. See, e.g., Pastore v. Bell Tel. Co., 24 F.3d 508, 513 (3rd Cir. 1994) [*48] (Dismissing a claim of attempted monopolization as "[w]ithout any share in the relevant market as described by plaintiffs, there can be no inference that defendants hold sufficient economic power in that market to create a dangerous probability of monopoly" (emphasis in original)); Genetic Sys. Corp., 691 F. Supp. at 421 (dismissing § 2 claims because the plaintiff was "[u]nable to allege or show that the [defendant] had a specific intent to monopolize a market in which it does not participate"). Therefore, as Operator Defendants are not suppliers of TPA Services, they cannot monopolize or attempt to monopolize the market pled by the Plaintiffs and their conduct is not an actionable antitrust injury. [33]

[31] See discussion supra, pp. 3-6.

[32] Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint does not explicitly include a claim of conspiracy to monopolize. As with the group boycott claim, however, I undertake analysis of this claim in the interest of judicial efficiency and in an abundance of caution.

Accordingly, Plaintiffs' monopolization and attempted monpolization claims against Operator Defendants must be dismissed for lack of standing.

B. Relevant Market

As a threshold matter, Plaintiffs "must define a relevant market within which the defendants allegedly engaged in anticompetitive behavior." Campfield, 532 F.3d at 1117; Walker Process Equip., Inc. v. Food Mach. & Chem. Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 177, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1965) ("Without a definition of the relevant market there is no way to measure a defendant's ability to lessen or destroy competition"). "Failure to allege a legally sufficient market is cause for dismissal of the claim." Campfield, 532 F.3d at 1118 (citing TV Commcn's Network Inc., 964 F.2d at 1025-26)).

As discussed above in relation to Plaintiffs' § 1 claims, Plaintiffs have [*50] failed to allege the relevant product market adequately. [34] This failure is fatal to its § 2 claims. Even if Plaintiffs adequately alleged a relevant product market, however, their claims against DISA and Operator Defendants are still subject to dismissal.

C. Monopolization

In order to plead monopolization adequately, the Plaintiffs must allege possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and "the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." Verizon Commcn's, Inc., 540 U.S. at 407; see also Campfield, 532 F.3d at 1117. Accordingly, "the possession of monopoly power will not be found unlawful unless it is accompanied by an element of anticompetitive conduct." Id. at 407. Plaintiffs have failed to adequately [*51] allege the existence of either monopoly power or anticompetitive conduct.

1. Monopoly Power

Monopoly power requires proof of both the power to control price and the power to exclude competition. Full Draw Prods., 182 F.3d at 757 (citing Reazin v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Kansas, 899 F.2d 951, 967 (10th Cir. 1990)). In order for monopoly power to be meaningful for antitrust purposes, it must be durable. Reazin, 899 F.2d at 968. Durability is demonstrated by the existence of entry barriers, such as high capital costs or regulatory or legal requirements. Id. Plaintiffs simply allege that there exist substantial entry barriers, without providing any facts as to the nature of those barriers. Second Amended Complaint, Doc. 130, p. 31. Such a conclusory allegation is insufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6).

2. Anticompetitive Conduct

Even if Plaintiffs had adequately pled a relevant market and the existence of monopoly power, their claim would still be subject to dismissal for failure to adequately allege anticompetitive conduct. Plaintiffs allege three types of [33] This restriction is not absolute, as courts have applied § 2 protections in cases of monopsony. Campfield, 532 F.3d at 1118. As the 10th Circuit recognized in Campfield, "A monopsony is different from the usual form of monopolistic control in which suppliers utilize market power to restrict output and thereby raise prices. In a monopsony, the [*49] buyers have market power to decrease market demand for a product and thereby lower prices." Id. at 1118 (emphasis added). In this case, however, Plaintiffs do not allege that the Operator Defendants have exercised their market power to reduce demand and lower prices. To the contrary, Plaintiffs allege that (1) Operator Defendants are not buyers and (2) as a result of Operator Defendants' conduct, prices have actually increased. As a result, Plaintiffs have alleged no grounds for finding Operator Defendants liable under § 2 for monopsonistic behavior.

[34] See supra pp. 15-17. The analysis under § 1 is directly applicable to my analysis under § 2. See Queen City Pizza Co., 124 F.3d at 442 n.18 ("Monopoly power under § 2 requires something greater than the market power under § 1 . . . this does not imply, however, that the analyses employed in the two types of cases to define relevant markets differ").

anticompetitive conduct: exclusive dealing between DISA and Operator Defendants, tying of the DCC database [*52] to DISA's TPA service, and DISA's refusal to deal with Plaintiffs regarding the DCC Database.

a. Exclusive Dealing and Tying

For the reasons discussed above, Plaintiffs' exclusive dealing and tying claims are insufficiently pled. [35]

b. Refusal to Deal

Plaintiffs allege that DISA's refusal to populate the DCC Database with the drug-testing information collected by other TPAs constitutes an unlawful refusal to deal. They argue that there is no discernible difference between the validity of the information collected by regulated TPAs and that the only reason for DISA's refusal to deal is its desire to gain a competitive advantage over its competitors. Even accepting these claims as true, Plaintiffs fail to allege adequately that DISA's refusal to deal constitutes anticompetitive conduct within the meaning of the Sherman Act.

Generally, the Sherman Act "does not restrict the long recognized right of [a] trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal." Christy Sports, LLC v. Deer Valley Resort Co., 555 F.3d 1188, 1194 (10th Cir. 2009) (quoting Verizon Commc'ns, 540 U.S. at 408). [*53] As the Supreme Court has recognized, "[c]ompelling such firms to share the source of their advantage is in some tension with the underlying purpose of antitrust law, since it may lessen the incentive for the monopolist, the rival, or both to invest in those economically beneficial facilities." Verizon Commc'ns, Inc., 540 U.S. at 407-08. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has found a duty to deal in only one limited circumstance: where a monopolist terminates a pre-existing profitable relationship with a competitor without a lawful business purpose if that termination has an anticompetitive effect. See id. at 409 (citing Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985). Plaintiffs do not allege any prior course of dealing between themselves and DISA. DISA has, therefore, no duty to deal.

Though Plaintiffs fail to establish a duty to deal, they also claim that the DCC Database is an "essential facility." "The [essential facilities] doctrine generally applies in situations in which the plaintiff is unable to compete in the relevant market . . . without access to a facility controlled by another." Gregory, 448 F.3d at 1204. "In order to establish antitrust liability based [*54] on the essential facilities doctrine, a plaintiff must show: '(1) control of the essential facility by a monopolist; (2) a competitor's inability to duplicate the facility; (3) denial of the use of the facility to a competitor; and (4) the feasibility of providing the facility.'" Id. Here, Plaintiffs have failed to allege that they are unable to create their own version of the DCC Database. Accordingly, Plaintiffs fail to allege anticompetitive conduct in the form of denial of access to an "essential facility."

As Plaintiffs have failed to adequately allege a relevant product market, monopoly power, or anticompetitive conduct, their monopolization claim must be dismissed.

D. Attempted Monopolization

To plead attempted monopolization adequately, Plaintiffs must allege a dangerous probability of success in monopolizing the relevant market, specific intent to monopolize, and conduct in furtherance of such attempt. Full Draw Prods., 182 F.3d at 756. As discussed above, Plaintiffs have failed to allege a relevant market or any form of anticompetitive conduct. Further, Plaintiffs have failed to adequately allege a dangerous probability of success in monopolizing the market.

In order to demonstrate [*55] dangerous probability of success, Plaintiffs must plead facts sufficient to establish the durability of DISA's market power. See United States v. Microsoft Corp., 253 F.3d 34, 82, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330

[35] See discussion, supra at pp. 13-22.

(D.C. Cir. 2001) ("Because a firm cannot possess monopoly power in a market unless that market is also protected by significant barriers to entry . . . it follows that a firm cannot threaten to achieve monopoly power in a market unless that market is, or will be, similarly protected"). Just as Plaintiffs failed to allege durability in relation to their claim of actual monopolization, they fail to do so in relation to their claim of attempted monopolization. In light of Plaintiffs' failure to adequately allege a relevant market, a dangerous probability of success, or anticompetitive conduct, their claim of attempted monopolization must be dismissed.

E. Conspiracy to Monopolize

Even if Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint is liberally interpreted to include a claim that Operator Defendants conspired with DISA to monopolize in violation of § 2, such a claim must be dismissed for failure to state a claim. In order to establish a conspiracy to monopolize, a plaintiff must offer proof of, "(1) the existence of a combination [*56] or conspiracy to monopolize; (2) overt acts done in furtherance of the combination or conspiracy; (3) an effect upon an appreciable amount of interstate commerce; and (4) a specific intent to monopolize." TV Commc'ns Network, Inc., 964 F.2d at 1026 (quoting Olsen v. Progressive Music Supply, Inc., 703 F.2d 432, 438 (10th Cir. 1983)). As discussed above in relation to Plaintiffs' group boycott claim, the Second Amended Complaint fails to plead facts adequately which would support an inference of a conspiracy between DISA and Operator Defendants. [36] Even if Plaintiffs had pled the existence of a conspiracy, agreements that do not harm the competitive process do not amount to a conspiracy to monopolize. NYNEX Corp. v. Discon, Inc., 525 U.S. 128, 139, 119 S. Ct. 493, 142 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1998). As Plaintiffs have insufficiently pled that Defendants' conduct has harmed the competitive process under § 1, this is additional grounds for dismissing any potential conspiracy to monopolize claim. See Gregory, 448 F.3d at 1206.

Fourth Claim for Relief: Section 3 of the Clayton Act

Plaintiffs allege that both DISA and Operator Defendants have engaged in unlawful tying and exclusive dealing. Section 3 [*57] of the Clayton Act, however, only applies to "goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities." 15 U.S.C. § 14. As Plaintiffs claims relate to the provision of TPA Services, § 3 of the Clayton Act provides no remedy. See Sports Racing Servs., 131 F.3d at 880 n.8.

Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Claims for Relief: Violations of State Antitrust Statutes

Plaintiffs allege monopolization, attempted monopolization, and restraint of trade in violation of state antitrust laws, including those of California, Colorado, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and Texas. As a threshold matter, these claims are predicated on the same alleged conduct as Plaintiffs' federal antitrust claims, and the states apply their antitrust laws in harmony with federal antitrust law. [37] Thus, for the reasons stated above in relation to Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims, their state law claims are appropriately dismissed.

Eighth Claim for Relief: Unfair Competition

Plaintiffs claim that Defendants have engaged in unlawful business practices [*59] in violation of California law. As Plaintiffs have failed to adequately allege that Defendants' conduct is unlawful under either federal or state antitrust statutes, its claim of unfair competition must be dismissed. See, e.g., *LiveUniverse, Inc. v. MySpace, Inc., 304 Fed. Appx. 554, 2008 WL 5341843, at 3 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Where . . . the same conduct is alleged to support both a plaintiff's federal antitrust claims and state-law unfair competition claim, a finding that the conduct is not an antitrust violation precludes a finding of unfair competition"). Furthermore, Plaintiffs' failure to allege specifically that the complained of conduct occurred in California provides additional basis for dismissal. See, e.g., Norwest Mortgage, Inc. v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 4th 214, 222, 227, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 18 (Cal. App. 1999) (explaining that the California UCL "contains no express declaration that it was designed or intended to regulate claims of nonresidents arising from conduct occurring entirely outside of California").

Ninth and Tenth Claims for Relief: Tortious Interference with Contractual and Prospective Business Relations

Plaintiffs allege that Defendants, though their violations of the Sherman [*60] Act and state antitrust statutes, have tortiously interfered with their existing contractual relations and prospective business relations. In order to establish tortious interference with contractual relations, Plaintiffs must show: "(1) [they] had a contract with a third party; (2) defendants knew of the contract's existence; (3) defendants intentionally induced the third party to breach the existing contract; (4) defendants acted improperly; and (5) defendants' actions caused plaintiff[s] to incur damages." Campfield, 532 F.3d at 1122 (quoting Steinbach v. Dillon Cos., Inc., 253 F.3d 538, 540 (10th Cir.2001)). "Tortious interference with prospective business relations requires identical elements, with the exception that an existing contract need not be alleged. Rather, [Plaintiffs] must show that there was a reasonable likelihood that a contract would have resulted but for the wrongful interference." Id. (quoting Klein v. Grynberg, 44 F.3d 1497, 1506 (10th Cir. 1995)).

As discussed above, Plaintiffs have failed to allege adequately that Defendants have violated the Sherman Act or any state antitrust statute. As Plaintiffs assert no other grounds that Defendants acted improperly, they [*61] have failed to allege adequately claims for tortious interference with either existing contractual relations or prospective business relations and these claims must be dismissed. Additionally, Plaintiffs fail to plead adequately either the existence of contracts between themselves and the Service Companies or that any contract was breached. This pleading deficiency provides further grounds for dismissing Plaintiffs' claim that Defendants tortiously interfered with their contractual relations. Finally, Plaintiffs' failure to allege specifically the business lost as a result of Defendants' conduct requires dismissal of their claim that Defendants tortiously interfered with their prospective business relations.

CONCLUSION

Though Plaintiffs' claim may have been sufficient under the more permissive "no set of facts" standard which long constituted the pleading standard in federal courts, the Supreme Court has explicitly directed lower courts to dismiss claims which fail, on their face, to state a plausible claim for relief. As detailed above, Plaintiffs have failed to set forth sufficient facts to support any of their ten asserted claims for relief. As I find that Plaintiffs' Second Amended [*62] Complaint fails to state a plausible claim for relief, Defendants' Motions to Dismiss, Docs. 104 and 133, are GRANTED. Plaintiffs' Second Amended Class Action Complaint and Jury Demand, Doc. 130, is dismissed without prejudice.

A party seeking to certify a class action must meet two conditions. First, the movant must show the putative class satisfies the four prerequisites of Fed. R. Civ. P. Rule 23(a): (1) numerosity, (2) commonality, (3) typicality, and (4) adequacy of representation. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a). HN3[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes Courts retain broad discretion in determining whether a proposed class meets the Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 certification requirements. While the requirements of Rule 23 should be liberally construed to support the policy favoring the maintenance of class actions, a moving party bears the burden of showing that the requirements for class certification have been met.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN4[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

To meet the typicality requirement, the named plaintiffs' claims or defenses must be typical of the class. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3). The typicality requirement focuses on the class representatives; indeed, a plaintiff's claim is typical if it arises from the same event or practice or course of conduct that gives rise to the claims of other class members and his or her claims are based on the same legal theory. Typical does not mean identical, and the typicality requirement is liberally construed. Factual distinctions between the named plaintiffs' claims and those of other class members do not necessarily undermine typicality. The typicality requirement presents a low hurdle, which requires neither complete co-extensivity or even substantial identity of claims.

HN5[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The issue of typicality requires a court to determine whether the named plaintiffs' claims are typical of those of the class, not whether their claims will ultimately be meritorious. A court may not refuse to certify a class on the ground that it thinks the class will eventually lose on the merits.

HN6[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Whether the named plaintiffs' claims have the same essential characteristics as the claims of other class members for purposes of the Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3) typicality requirement depends on whether all such claims arise from the same course of conduct and are based on the same legal theories. The fact that a class member may have a claim concerning a service that no named plaintiff received does not indicate a lack of typicality.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

HN7[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

To meet Fed. R. Civ. P. 23's adequacy of representation requirement, a representative must be able to fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4)). Under Rule 23(a)(4), the adequacy determination has two parts: the adequacy of the named plaintiff's counsel, and the adequacy of representation provided in protecting the different, separate, and distinct interest of the class members. A class is not fairly and adequately represented if class members have antagonistic or conflicting claims.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) provides that a class can be maintained if questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). To determine whether predominance and superiority are satisfied, courts examine the substantive elements of plaintiffs' claims, the proof necessary for those elements, and the manageability of trial on those issues.

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Commonality

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN11[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Although related to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)'s commonality requirement, the predominance inquiry is far more demanding. To satisfy this aspect of Rule 23(b)(3), a plaintiff must show that common issues not only exist but outweigh the individual questions. The common questions must be central to all claims. If proof of the essential elements of the cause of action requires individual treatment, then class certification is unsuitable.

HN14[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The mere fact that individualized statute of limitations determinations may arise and may affect different class members differently does not compel a finding that individual issues predominate over common ones. As long as a sufficient constellation of issues binds class members together, variations in the sources and application of statutes of limitations will not automatically foreclose class certification under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). Challenges based on the statutes of limitations will not bar predominance satisfaction because those issues go to the right of a class member to recover, in contrast to underlying common issues of a defendant's liability.

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Allocation

HN15[] Private Actions, Remedies

Individual injury, also known as antitrust impact, is an element of an antitrust cause of action; to prevail on the merits, every class member must prove at least some antitrust impact resulting from the alleged violation. In antitrust cases, impact often is critically important for the purpose of evaluating Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement because it is an element of the claim that may call for individual, as opposed to common, proof. Plaintiffs' burden at the class certification stage is not to prove the element of antitrust impact, rather, it is to demonstrate that the element of antitrust impact is capable of common proof at trial through evidence that is common to the class rather than individual to its members. Where impact cannot be established for every class member through proof common to the class, the need to establish antitrust liability for individual class members defeats Rule 23(b)(3) predominance.

Fed. R. Evid. 702 governs the admissibility of expert witness testimony. [*59] OPINION AND ORDER (REDACTED)

Defendant, Evanston Northwestern Healthcare Corporation ("ENH"), [1] merged with Highland Park Hospital on January 1, 2000. Plaintiffs, Amit Berkowitz, Steven Messner, Henry Lahmeyer, and Painters District Council No. 30 Health & Welfare Fund ("Painters [3] Fund") (collectively, "plaintiffs"), filed a consolidated amended class action complaint on November 11, 2008, alleging two alternative counts under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2, for unlawful monopolization or attempt to monopolize, and one count of unlawful monopolization under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. Before the court are plaintiffs' motion for class certification [# 240], plaintiffs' motion to strike the report of Dr. Monica Noether [# 317], and ENH's motion to strike the reply report of Dr. David Dranove [# 321]. For the reasons set forth below, plaintiffs' motion for class certification [# 240] is denied. Plaintiffs' motion to strike [# 317] and ENH's motion to strike [# 321] are both denied.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

ENH is a not-for-profit corporation that consists of three hospitals located in the suburbs just north of Chicago: Evanston Hospital, Glenbrook Hospital, and Highland Park Hospital. ENH merged with Highland Park Hospital on January 1, 2000. Since that date, ENH has operated the three hospitals as a single, integrated entity.

I. FTC Proceeding

On February 10, 2004, the Federal Trade Commission [4] ("FTC") filed an administrative complaint against ENH, alleging that the merger between ENH and Highland Park Hospital substantially lessened competition and enabled ENH to raise its prices of inpatient services to private payers [2] above the prices that the hospitals would have charged absent the merger, in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. The complaint also alleged that the manner in which ENH contracted for physician services on behalf of its independent physicians constituted unfair methods of competition in violation of Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45.

On October 20, 2005, a FTC Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") found ENH to be in violation of Section 7 of the Clayton Act and ordered ENH to divest the acquired assets of Highland Park Hospital. On appeal, the full Commission affirmed the ALJ's finding of liability, but reversed the divestiture order. See In re Evanston Northwestern Healthcare, No. 9315, 2007 FTC LEXIS 95, 2007 WL 2286196 (F.T.C. Aug. 6, 2007) [5] (order). Instead, the Commission ruled that a conduct remedy (rather than a structural remedy such as divestiture) was appropriate and ordered ENH to establish two separate and independent teams for negotiating contracts with payors -- one team for Evanston Hospital and Glenbrook Hospital and another for Highland Park Hospital.

[*60] II. Background to this Proceeding

Plaintiffs are direct purchasers of healthcare services from ENH. There are four named plaintiffs: (1) Berkowitz, an individual who received outpatient services from ENH; (2) Messner, an individual who received outpatient services from ENH; (3) Lahmeyer, an individual who received outpatient services from ENH; and (4) Painters Fund, a not-for-profit trust established and maintained to provide comprehensive healthcare benefits to participants, including workers employed under various collective bargaining agreements, and to their dependents. Plaintiffs allege that "[b]y virtue of [the merger] on or about January 1, 2000, ENH acquired monopoly power in the marketing of Healthcare Services in the relevant geographic market and has abused and continues to abuse that power to maintain and enhance its market dominance in the marketing [6] and sale of Healthcare Services by unreasonably restraining trade, thus artificially and anti-competitively raising the price of Healthcare Services sold to Plaintiffs and the Class." Compl. P 43.

Plaintiffs have moved for an order certifying this case as a class action pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. They seek to certify the following class:

> All persons or entities in the United States of America and Puerto Rico, except those who solely paid fixed amount co-pays, uninsureds who did not pay their bill, Medicaid and Traditional Medicare patients, governmental entities, defendant, other providers of healthcare services, and the present and former parents,

[2] In the FTC proceeding, "private payers" was limited to managed care organizations ("MCO") that contracted with ENH during the relevant time period. A MCO is an organization that combines the functions of health insurance, delivery of care, and administration.

> predecessors, subsidiaries, and affiliates of defendant and other providers of healthcare services, who purchased or paid for inpatient hospital services or hospital-based outpatient services directly from NorthShore University Healthcare (formerly known as Evanston Northwestern Healthcare), its wholly-owned hospitals, predecessors, subsidiaries, or affiliates other than those acquired as a result of the merger with Rush North Shore Medical Center (the "Class") from at least as early as January 1, 2000 [7] (the "Class Period").

LEGAL STANDARD

HN1[] A party seeking to certify a class action must meet two conditions. First, the movant must show the putative class satisfies the four prerequisites of Rule 23(a): (1) numerosity, (2) commonality, (3) typicality, and (4) adequacy of representation. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a); Oshana v. Coca-Cola Co., 472 F.3d 506, 513 (7th Cir. 2006); Rosario v. Livaditis, 963 F.2d 1013, 1017 (7th Cir. 1992). Second, the action must qualify under at least one of the three subsections of Rule 23(b). Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b); Rosario, 963 F.2d at 1017; Hardin v. Harshbarger, 814 F. Supp. 703, 706 (N.D. Ill. 1993). Here, plaintiffs seek certification under HN2[] Rule 23(b)(3), which requires a finding that "questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

HN3[] Courts retain broad discretion in determining whether a proposed class meets the Rule 23 certification requirements. Keele v. Wexler, 149 F.3d 589, 592 (7th Cir. 1998). While the requirements of Rule 23 [8] should be liberally construed to support the policy favoring the maintenance of class actions, King v. Kansas City S. Indus., 519 F.2d 20, 25-26 (7th Cir. 1975), the moving party bears the burden of showing that the requirements for class certification have been met. Hardin, 814 F. Supp. at 706.

The parties agree that plaintiffs have satisfied the requirements of numerosity and commonality. [3] They disagree, however, as to [*61] the remaining requirements of typicality, adequacy of representation, predominance, and superiority. ENH argues that plaintiffs fail to establish each of the four remaining requirements and, as a result, that plaintiffs' motion for class certification must be denied.

I. Rule 23(a) Requirements

A. Typicality

HN4[] To meet the typicality requirement, the named plaintiffs' claims or defenses must be typical of the class. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(3); Keele, 149 F.3d at 594. The typicality requirement focuses on the class representatives; indeed, "[a] plaintiff's claim is typical if it arises from the same event or practice or course of conduct that gives rise to the claims of other class members and his or her claims are based on the same legal theory." Keele, 149 F.3d at 595 (citations omitted) (internal quotation marks omitted); De La Fuente v. Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., 713 F.2d 225, 232 (7th Cir. 1983) (citations omitted) (internal quotation marks omitted). "Typical does not mean identical, and the

[3] ENH does not agree that plaintiffs have established commonality but states that "whether Plaintiffs can establish commonality is not important because they cannot meet the higher standard of predominance." Def.'s Resp. at 11 n.4. As defendant does not offer any argument disputing commonality, the court finds plaintiffs have satisfied their burden with respect to this requirement. See Vaughn v. King, 167 F.3d 347, 354 (7th Cir. 1999) ("It is not the responsibility of this court to make arguments [9] for the parties.") typicality requirement is liberally construed." Gaspar v. Linvatec Corp., 167 F.R.D. 51, 57 (N.D. Ill. 1996). Factual distinctions between the named plaintiffs' claims and those of other class members do not necessarily undermine typicality. De La Fuente, 713 F.2d at 232; Owner-Operator Indep. Ass'n, Inc. v. Allied Van Lines, Inc., 231 F.R.D. 280, 282 (N.D. Ill. 2005) (stating that the typicality requirement presents a "low hurdle . . . , which requires [10] neither complete coextensivity or even substantial identity of claims.").

Plaintiffs argue that they have satisfied the requirement of typicality because the claims of the named plaintiffs arise from the same conduct -- "ENH's common practice or course of conduct in charging inflated prices to various MCOs and their insureds for medical services" -- and are based on the same legal theories -- antitrust violations -- as the claims of all class members. Pls.' Reply at 28.

ENH offers several arguments in response. First, ENH argues that plaintiffs cannot demonstrate typicality because none of the named plaintiffs is a MCO or "remotely resemble[s]" a MCO. Def.'s Resp. at 38. ENH notes that while MCOs engage in sophisticated contract negotiations to generate prices, none of the named plaintiffs participated in any pricing negotiations. As a result, ENH argues, the named plaintiffs do not have claims that are typical of those of any MCO. For support, ENH relies on In re Graphics Processing, 253 F.R.D. 478, 490 (N.D. Cal. 2008), an antitrust case involving a proposed class of individuals and wholesalers that purchased computer graphics products at allegedly inflated prices. Because each named [11] plaintiff was an individual purchaser (and none was a wholesaler), the court found their claims to be atypical of the class. Id. ("[W]holesale purchasers [] came to the negotiating table in a fundamentally different position than the representative plaintiffs."). Indeed, while the individuals in Graphics Processing paid retail prices and the terms of their purchases were not negotiable, the wholesalers purchased products at a variety of prices on individually-negotiated terms. Id. at 489. As a result, the proof needed to establish the individuals' claims differed from the proof required for the wholesalers' claims. See id. at 490.

Plaintiffs argue that Graphics Processing is distinguishable from the case at bar because here, the named plaintiffs' claims are derivative of the MCO's claims because the prices charged to the named plaintiffs were determined by the pricing structures negotiated by the MCOs, whereas in Graphics Processing, the claims of (and prices charged to) the individual purchasers were entirely independent of the claims of (and prices charged to) the wholesalers. The court agrees. Unlike the circumstances in Graphics Processing, here, the named plaintiffs' claims are [12] based on the same course of conduct as the claims of the MCOs. That is, the proof needed to establish the named plaintiffs' claims is the same proof needed to establish their MCO's claims. For example, to prove that Painters Fund, a self-insured entity, paid an anti-competitive price for a given service, plaintiffs must prove that Blue Cross Blue Shield of Illinois ("BCBSI"), the MCO that passed on its negotiated rates to [*62] Painters Fund, was charged that same anti-competitive price. [4] The fact that none of the named plaintiffs is a MCO does not, therefore, demonstrate that plaintiffs failed to establish typicality, as the MCOs and the named plaintiffs seek to hold ENH liable for the same allegedly inflated prices.

Second, ENH argues that the typicality requirement is not satisfied because self-insured entities do not have a legitimate named representative. Although Painters Fund is a self-insured entity, ENH argues that its claims "cannot be typical of any member of the proposed class because it has no claim." Def.'s Resp. at 38. To support its argument that Painters Fund has no claim, [13] it relies on a declaration of Joseph Arango, a BCBSI executive, stating that "[f]rom 1990 to the present, BCBSI paid [ENH] . . . fair and reasonable prices for health care services," that "BCBSI did not pay artificially inflated prices," and finally that "BCBSI declines to be included as a class member in any class that may be certified." Arango Decl. at PP 1, 2, and 4. Because Painters Fund's claim is derivative of BCBSI's, and because the Arango declaration states that BCBSI did not pay anti-competitive prices, ENH argues that Painter's Fund's claims are without merit and therefore cannot be typical of the class.

HN5[] The issue of typicality requires the court to determine whether the named plaintiffs' claims are typical of those of the class, not whether their claims will ultimately be meritorious. See Loeb Indus., Inc. v. Sumitomo Corp., 306 F.3d 469, 480 (7th Cir. 2002) ("[A] court may not refuse to certify a class on the ground that it thinks the class will eventually lose on the merits."). Accordingly, the court cannot say with certainty that BCBSI did not suffer injury, as it will not consider the Arango declaration to be conclusive evidence of this fact at this time. Moreover, the [14] Arango declaration does not indicate that Painters Fund's claims are atypical of claims of other self-insured entities within the proposed class. As a result, ENH's second argument is unavailing.

Finally, ENH argues that plaintiffs cannot demonstrate typicality because the named plaintiffs do not share "essential characteristics" of the proposed class, as proof of their claims would not prove the claims of any other class member. See Retired Chi. Police Ass'n v. City of Chi., 7 F.3d 584, 596-97 (7th Cir. 1993). "For example, if Plaintiff Messner proved that he was overcharged for one visit under his Unicare plan, it would not prove that Plaintiff Lahmeyer was overcharged for any visits while he was covered by Cigna." Def.'s Resp. at 39. [5] ENH then, for the second time, analogizes this case to Graphics Processing, arguing that the "overwhelming disparities" separating named plaintiffs (individual patients) from MCOs and self-insured entities also demonstrate that their claims do not share the same "essential characteristics." See Graphics Processing, 253 F.R.D. at 490. They highlight the fact that of ENH's 6,200 outpatient services, Berkowitz received four, Messner received six, and [15] Lahmeyer received five. [6]

HN6[] Whether the named plaintiffs' claims have the same "essential characteristics" as the claims of other class members depends on whether all such claims [16] arise from the same course of conduct and are based on the same legal theories. See Retired Chi. Police Ass'n, 7 F.3d at 589-97. Here, all class members' claims involve allegations that [*63] ENH charged anti-competitive prices for healthcare services. The fact that the named plaintiffs did not receive the same services as all other class members does not render their claims atypical. Rather, all of the claims and allegations involve an evaluation of ENH pricing and arise from an alleged course of conduct in charging anti-competitive prices. The fact that a class member may have a claim concerning a service that no named plaintiff received, therefore, does not indicate a lack of typicality. See Elias v. Ungar's Food Prods., Inc., 252 F.R.D. 233, 243-44 (D.N.J. 2008) (holding that claims of named plaintiffs were typical though they bought three of the five products included in the class definition).

For these reasons, the court finds that the claims of the named plaintiffs are typical of the claims of the proposed class.

B. Adequacy of Representation

HN7[] To meet Rule 23's adequacy of representation requirement, "the representative must be able to 'fairly and adequately protect the interests of the [17] class.'" Keele, 149 F.3d at 594 (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4)). Under Rule 23(a)(4), the adequacy determination has "two parts: 'the adequacy of the named plaintiff's counsel, and the adequacy of representation provided in protecting the different, separate, and distinct interest' of the class members." Retired Chi. Police Ass'n, 7 F.3d at 598 (quoting Sec'y of Labor v. Fitzsimmons, 805 F.2d 682, 697 (7th Cir. 1986) (en banc)). "A class is not fairly and adequately represented if class members have antagonistic or conflicting claims." Rosario, 963 F.2d at 1018 (internal citation omitted).

ENH does not contest that plaintiffs' counsel is adequate. ENH argues, however, that the named plaintiffs are not adequate representatives of the putative class because (1) Painters Fund cannot be a class representative; (2) the individual named plaintiffs cannot represent any class of inpatient claims; and (3) irreconcilable conflicts of interest exist within the proposed class.

[5] As discussed supra, the proof required to establish the named plaintiffs' claims will also serve to establish the claims of other class members. In other words, the proof required to establish that Messner was overcharged may not prove that another named plaintiff was overcharged, but it would prove that Unicare, the MCO through which he received healthcare coverage and a class member, was overcharged.

[6] Defendant further argues that "[t]he prices that [named] Plaintiffs paid to ENH depend on too many individualized facts to even determine if there was impact," including list prices of services, whether the service was covered by an individual's health plan, whether an individual carried coinsurance or was subject to a co-pay, an out-of-pocket maximum, or an annual deductible limit, or whether ENH improved quality of care for that service during the class period. Def.'s Resp. at 39. This is an argument pertaining to the requirement of predominance; the court will not consider it within the context of typicality.

First, ENH argues that Painters Fund "simply has no claim relating to the merger and cannot represent the proposed class [because] . . . . the Painters Fund health insurance plan contracted through Blue Cross." Def.'s Resp. [18] at 26; see Robinson v. Sheriff of Cook County, 167 F.3d 1155, 1157 (7th Cir. 1999) ("If when class certification is sought it is already apparent . . . that the class representative's claim is extremely weak, this is an independent reason to doubt the adequacy of his representation."). As discussed supra, the question of whether BCBSI and, by association, Painters Fund, suffered injury is left undecided. It is not clear, however, that BCBSI did not suffer injury such that the court should doubt the ability of Painters Fund to provide adequate representation.

Second, ENH argues that "[o]nce Painters Fund is set aside, Plaintiffs lack a class representative not only for any entities that are not individual patients (including self-insured), but also for any claims related to inpatient services." Def.'s Resp. at 28. Because the court will not disqualify Painters Fund as a class representative, and further because Painters Fund offered an insurance plan covering inpatient and outpatient services, however, ENH's argument is moot.

Finally, ENH argues that "several" inconsistencies between the interests of the named plaintiffs and the members of the proposed class render the named plaintiffs [19] inadequate representatives. Def.'s Resp. at 28. First, ENH states that the claims of the named plaintiffs are antagonistic to those of individuals who received services that improved in quality as a result of the merger. It argues that these individuals suffered no antitrust impact because they actually benefitted from the merger. Due to the fact that some putative class members benefitted and some were harmed by the merger, ENH argues, the claims of the proposed class members necessarily conflict and prohibit this court from certifying the proposed class. ENH relies on several cases, all of which stand for the proposition that class certification is inappropriate where some class members derived benefit from the allegedly wrongful conduct. See, e.g., Bieneman v. City of Chi., 864 F.2d 463, 465 (7th Cir. 1988) (affirming denial of class certification in airport noise case where [*64] some putative class members "undoubtedly" benefitted from increased airport traffic in the form of increased land value and business opportunities). Plaintiffs agree that case law prohibits certification where class members were both helped and harmed by the relevant conduct, however, they argue that here, ENH [20] cannot demonstrate that any class members, even those who received services of higher quality, benefitted from the merger. They argue that the improvement in the quality of services was not the result of the merger but, rather, due to other, non-merger-specific factors. As support, plaintiffs rely on the FTC's finding that "the quality improvements asserted by ENH are not properly credited as benefits of the merger because Highland Park could, and likely would, have made similar improvements without a merger." *In re Evanston Northwestern Healthcare, 2007 FTC LEXIS 95, 2007 WL 2286196, at 38.

HN8[] At the class certification stage, it is plaintiffs' burden to come forward with evidence to demonstrate that all requirements for class certification are satisfied. Oshana, 472 F.3d at 513; Retired Chi. Police Ass'n, 7 F.3d at 596. Here, plaintiffs have met their burden. While the FTC's finding is not binding on this court, it is strong evidence that increases in the quality of services at ENH were not a consequence of the merger. Because ENH proffered no evidence to dispute or discredit this finding, the court is satisfied that the interests of the putative class members who received services of increased quality [21] after the merger will not conflict with the interests of those individuals who paid higher prices for services of pre-merger quality. Further, even if the increase in quality for some services was attributable to the merger, it is not clear that this fact would put the interests of putative class members into conflict. Unlike Bieneman, where some putative class members "undoubtedly" benefited from the alleged wrongful conduct such that they likely would have opposed the class action, here, the court is not convinced that class members who received services of increased quality due to the merger would oppose the instant action. See Bieneman, 864 F.2d at 465.

Finally, ENH states that the named plaintiffs' interests will likely conflict with those of the MCOs covered by the class definition because of the "inherent conflict of interest between insurer and insured." Def.'s Resp. at 30-31 ("Wherever there is cost-sharing among purported class members, there will be conflict."). ENH states that this conflict will emerge at the damages allocation stage of the litigation, as each party will want to demonstrate that it bore the brunt of the overcharge. As a final point, it highlights the difference [22] between MCOs -- "sophisticated businesses motivated by generating profits" -- and typical patients -- "more motivated by receiving quality health care" -- and argues that these differences defeat adequacy. Id. at 31. Plaintiffs argue that this alleged conflict is an insufficient reason to deny certification because it pertains to the allocation of damages, an issue that is not proper to consider at the class certification stage. See Kohen v. Pac. Inv. Mgmt. Co., 244 F.R.D. 469, 476 (N.D. Ill. 2007), aff'd, 571 F.3d at 677 ("Inquiry into matters of damage is not ordinarily made at the class certification stage."); Katz v. Comdisco, Inc., 117 F.R.D. 403, 412 (N.D. Ill. 1987) ("Traditionally . . . the courts have not allowed individual questions of damages to prevent class certification.").

The legal principles cited by plaintiffs are not specific to the adequacy requirement. Nonetheless, the court agrees that because a conflict between insurers and insured individuals will arise (if at all) at the damages allocation stage, it does not preclude a finding of adequacy. HN9[] The adequacy requirement evaluates whether the claims and interests of the named plaintiffs conflict with the claims and [23] interests of other putative class members. See Rosario, 963 F.2d at 1018. Though insurers and insured individuals may disagree as to the calculation of damages, their respective claims and interests are exactly aligned. Both insurers and insured individuals seek to hold ENH liable under the same antitrust laws for charging the same anti-competitive prices for the same healthcare services. Moreover, the relationship between insurer and insured is governed by contract -- whatever disagreement the parties may have over damage allocation can be [*65] resolved with reference to the relevant contractual provisions.

For the reasons discussed above and because the court finds plaintiffs' counsel to be adequate, plaintiffs have satisfied the adequacy of representation requirement.

II. Rule 23(b)(3) Requirements

HN10[] Rule 23(b)(3) provides that a class can be maintained if "questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and . . . a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). To determine whether predominance and superiority are satisfied, [24] courts examine "the substantive elements of plaintiffs' claims, the proof necessary for those elements, and the manageability of trial on those issues." *Reed v. Advocate Health Care, No. 06-c-3337, 268 F.R.D. 573, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89576, 2009 WL 3146999, at 4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2009) (citing Simer v. Rios, 661 F.2d 655, 672-73 (7th Cir. 1981)).

A. Predominance

HN11[] "Although related to Rule 23(a)'s commonality requirement, 'the predominance inquiry is far more demanding . . .' To satisfy this aspect of Rule 23(b)(3), 'the plaintiff must show that common issues not only exist but outweigh the individual questions. The common questions must be central to all claims.'" *Pavone v. Aegis Lending Corp., No. 05-c-1529, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62157, 2006 WL 2536632, at 4 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 31, 2006) (citing, inter alia, Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 623-24, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 2250, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997)). Indeed, "[i]f proof of the essential elements of the cause of action requires individual treatment, then class certification is unsuitable." In re Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litig., 552 F.3d 305, 311 (3d Cir. 2008) (citing Newton v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 259 F.3d 154, 172 (3d Cir. 2001)).

HN12[] To prevail on each of their claims, [25] plaintiffs must prove (1) a violation of antitrust law; (2) individual injury, or impact, caused by that violation; and (3) measurable damages. *Reed, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89576, 2009 WL 3146999, at 5 (citing Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311; Cordes & Co. Fin. Servs., Inc. v. A.G. Edwards & Sons, Inc., 502 F.3d 91, 105 (2d Cir. 2007)). HN13[] For class certification, plaintiffs need only show that common proof will predominate with respect to each element of their claims. Id. Each party advances several arguments with respect to the predominance requirement. These arguments focus on whether plaintiffs can prove with common evidence two elements of their antitrust claims: (1) a violation of antitrust law and (2) impact.

1. Violation of Antitrust Law

ENH argues that plaintiffs cannot establish a violation of antitrust law with common evidence because individualized issues predominate with respect to the applicability of (1) the alternative dispute resolution ("ADR") provisions contained in the insurance contracts of several putative class members and (2) ENH's statute of limitations defense.

a. Alternative Dispute Resolution Provisions

ENH first argues that plaintiffs cannot establish predominance because "nearly all" of [26] the MCOs within the proposed class have ADR provisions in their contracts with ENH, the applicability of which requires individualized analysis. Def.'s Resp. at 24 ("The individual issues implicated by determining the extent to which each purported MCO class member has a claim that is arbitrable predominates over any common issues."). Specifically, ENH argues that the presence of materially different contract provisions (such as dispute resolution provisions) across class members defeats a finding of predominance, relying on Christie Clinic for this proposition. *See Christie Clinic, P.C. v. MultiPlan, Inc., No. 08-c-2065, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5750, 2009 WL 175030, at 11 (C.D. Ill. Jan. 26, 2009) ("This court concludes that Defendants have conclusively shown that the contracts between [defendants] and the proposed class members are materially different from the contract between [defendants] and [named] Plaintiff. Therefore, . . . the issues common to the class members do not predominate.").

[*66] Plaintiffs argue that the enforceability of the ADR provisions is an issue of fact and law common to the class and therefore that the presence of such provisions does not defeat a finding of predominance. They also argue that [27] ENH's reliance on Christie Clinic is unavailing, as the ADR provisions here are not materially different, but materially the same. Finally, they rely on this court's decision to reserve ruling on arbitrability until after the class certification decision as evidence that the issue of arbitrability does not threaten to predominate over common issues in this matter.

Whether the ADR provisions are enforceable is an issue common to all MCOs that have such provisions in their contracts. Further, it is an issue that can be resolved with the same evidence for every affected MCO. Indeed, in its motion to compel arbitration, ENH moved to compel arbitration for all MCOs. It did not make individualized arguments regarding any MCO or specific contract; rather, it stated that "[t]hough the specific language may vary, in general, the arbitration clauses cover all controversies, disputes, or claims 'arising out of or relating to' the private payor's agreement with ENH. . . . In substance, all contemplate the arbitration of the type of claims in this suit." Def.'s Mot. to Compel Arb. at 4. This statement undermines ENH's reliance on Christie Clinic, which found a lack of predominance where individual [28] class members had materially different contracts. *See Christie Clinic, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5750, 2009 WL 175030, at 11.

In fact, Christie Clinic helps to illustrate why the presence of these ADR provisions do not undermine predominance. Christie Clinic involved, in relevant part, a breach of contract claim. The proposed class was comprised of individuals who each had a different contract with the defendant and, as a result, the court found that individual issues with respect to their claims predominated. Here, by contrast, the viability of plaintiffs' claims do not rest on specific (or different) contractual provisions. Rather, the viability of plaintiffs' claims (and the issues underlying those claims) is entirely separate from the contractual ADR provisions at issue.

Because the applicability of the ADR provisions is an issue divorced from plaintiff's substantive claims and can be determined for all affected potential class members with common evidence, the court finds that the possible arbitration of some class members claims does not destroy predominance in the case at bar. See Lerner v. Haimsohn, 126 F.R.D. 64, 66 (D. Colo. 1989) ("[T]he possible arbitration of some class members claims will not, by itself, [29] defeat class certification."); Shankroff v. Advest, Inc., 112 F.R.D. 190, 194 (S.D.N.Y 1986) (same).

b. Statute of Limitations

ENH next argues that an evaluation of its statute of limitations defense will require individualized, claim-by-claim analysis and that, as a result, individual issues predominate in the instant case. It states that "Rule 23(b)(3) prohibits certification in cases where individual statute of limitations determinations are required," Def.'s Resp. at 31, relying on Broussard for support. See Broussard v. Meineke Discount Muffler Shops, Inc., 155 F.3d 331(4th Cir. 1998). In Broussard, the Fourth Circuit held that "when the defendant's 'affirmative defenses (such as . . . the statute of limitations) may depend on facts peculiar to each plaintiff's case,' class certification is erroneous." Id. at 342 (quoting In re N. Dist. of Cal. Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 853 (9th Cir. 1982)). [7] Plaintiffs, by contrast, argue that ENH's statute of limitations defense does not automatically prohibit class certification. They rely on Waste Mgmt. Holdings, Inc. v. Mowbray, 208 F.3d 288, 296 (1st Cir. 2000), which rejected the Fourth Circuit's holding in Broussard, [30] stating that "to the extent that [Broussard] purports to establish a per se [*67] rule, [the holding] contradicts the weight of authority and ignores the essence of the predominance inquiry." Id. They further argue that, contrary to ENH's assertion, an evaluation of its statute of limitations defense involves a determination of several issues of fact and law common to the class.

Though the Seventh Circuit has not opined on the issue, the First Circuit, in Waste Mgmt. Holdings, held that individualized statute of limitations determinations do not automatically preclude class certification:

> HN14[] [T]he mere [31] fact that such concerns may arise and may affect different class members differently does not compel a finding that individual issues predominate over common ones. As long as a sufficient constellation of issues binds class members together, variations in the sources and application of statutes of limitations will not automatically foreclose class certification under Rule 23(b)(3).

Id. at 296; see also In re Linerboard Antitrust Litig., 305 F.3d 145, 162 (3d Cir. 2002) ("Challenges based on the statutes of limitations . . . have usually been rejected and will not bar predominance satisfaction because those issues go to the right of a class member to recover, in contrast to underlying common issues of the defendant's liability."). The Northern District of Illinois has also adopted this reasoning. See Saltzman v. Pella Corp., 257 F.R.D. 471, 486 (N.D. Ill. 2009) ("[T]his Court has rejected the per se prohibition against certification based upon statute of limitations differences . . . .") (citing Sparano v. Southland Corp., No. 94-c-2098, 1996 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17485, 1996 WL 681273, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 21, 1996) ("[T]he presence of unresolved individual issues of compliance with the statute of limitations does [32] not prevent class actions from proceeding.") (citation omitted)).

In light of this case law and because an examination of the parties' respective arguments indicates that common issues (supported by common evidence) underlie a determination of the applicability of ENH's statute of limitations defense, the presence of ENH's statute of limitations defense does not defeat a finding of predominance. ENH's primary argument in support of its defense is that plaintiffs' claims accrued as a matter of law on January 1, 2000, the date on which the merger was finalized, more than four years before plaintiffs filed this suit. It argues that all putative class members had knowledge -- actual, imputed or constructive -- of the merger either on or before that date. Specifically, it argues that (1) MCOs, self-insured, and fully-insured entities had actual knowledge because ENH sent letters to these organizations announcing the merger; (2) the entities' knowledge is imputed to all insured individual class members under principles of agency law; and (3) all class members had constructive notice of the merger as a result of its large amount of coverage in the media. In response, plaintiffs argue that [33] (1) ENH engaged in a continuing violation of antitrust law such that the statute of limitations begins to run anew with each injury; (2) there are only three dates on which individual plaintiffs could have learned of their injury and all three are within the statute of limitations period; and (3) ENH engaged in fraudulent concealment such that the statute of limitations should be tolled.

[7] ENH also argues that "[e]ven if the Court entertains such individualized evidence, the record will show that no MCO or self- or fully-insured entity has an actionable claim. Moreover, none of the Named Plaintiffs have a claim." Def.'s Resp. at 31. This argument conflates the issue of whether common issues predominate the merits decision with the merits decision itself. See Loeb Indus., Inc., 306 F.3d at 480; Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litig., 552 F.3d at 311-12. Accordingly, the court will not consider either party's arguments with respect to the merits of ENH's statute of limitations defense.

Underlying these arguments are issues of fact and law common to all class members. These common issues include (1) whether the statute of limitations was triggered by knowledge of the merger or at some other time; (2) whether ENH engaged in a continuing violation of antitrust law; (3) whether the letters sent from ENH to various entities put them on notice of the merger; (4) whether such letters provide evidence of fraudulent concealment; (5) whether the knowledge of a MCO, self-insured entity, or fully-insured entity can be imputed to insured individuals under the principles of agency law.

Despite the presence of these common issues, ENH argues that an individual class member would have to resort to highly individualized evidence to challenge any of its arguments and that, as a result, individual issues [34] predominate. For example, to challenge ENH's contention that a MCO's knowledge is imputed to its insured customers, a customer would have to present "highly-individualized evidence -- e.g., evidence concerning the scope of a particular agent's duties to its principal." Def.'s. Resp. at 35. This argument is unsound. The applicability of the [*68] statute of limitations will turn on the resolution of the above-described common issues and will not likely be affected by any such (highly unlikely) individualized evidence.

2. Antitrust Impact and Damages

The Third Circuit recently articulated the standards for the element of antitrust impact and the requirements imposed on plaintiffs at the class certification stage of litigation:

> HN15[] [I]ndividual injury (also known as antitrust impact) is an element of the cause of action; to prevail on the merits, every class member must prove at least some antitrust impact resulting from the alleged violation. In antitrust cases, impact often is critically important for the purpose of evaluating Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement because it is an element of the claim that may call for individual, as opposed to common, proof. Plaintiffs' burden at the class certification [35] stage is not to prove the element of antitrust impact, . . . [rather, it] is to demonstrate that the element of antitrust impact is capable of common proof at trial through evidence that is common to the class rather than individual to its members.

Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311-12. "[W]here [impact] cannot be established for every class member through proof common to the class, the need to establish antitrust liability for individual class members defeats Rule 23(b)(3) predominance." Bell Atl. Corp. v. AT&T Corp., 339 F.3d 294, 302 (5th Cir. 2003).

Here, with respect to the issue of impact, the parties have presented competing opinions of expert economists. Plaintiffs have submitted two reports prepared by Dr. David Dranove, Ph.D., a health industry management professor at Northwestern University's Kellogg School of Management. Dranove concludes that the Difference-in-Difference ("DID") methodology can demonstrate impact on a classwide basis, and plaintiffs rely on his conclusion to support their position that common issues predominate the impact analysis.

ENH's expert is Dr. Monica Noether, an executive vice president at Charles River Associates International, a consulting firm [36] that offers economic, financial, and business expertise. Noether disagrees with Dranove's conclusion. ENH relies on her report to support its arguments that plaintiffs cannot prove classwide impact because (1) the proposed class includes several members who were not impacted at all; (2) Dranove's method impermissibly relies on averages; and (3) Dranove's method relies on an invalid control group. [8] [8] In its response, ENH also argues that plaintiffs' proposed method for demonstrating impact does not satisfy the "rigorous analysis" requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). It argues that Dranove's report contained mere promises to perform an analysis. See Def.'s Resp. at 20-24. In his reply report, however, Dranove does perform his own analysis. In ENH's motion to strike Dranove's reply report or in the alternative, to file a sur-response, ENH requested that his new analysis be stricken, as it was presented for the first time on reply. The court denied the motion, but held oral arguments to allow ENH to respond to the new analysis. Accordingly, ENH's arguments regarding Dranove's failure to perform an analysis are moot.

Before evaluating plaintiffs' proposed method for proving classwide impact, the [37] court will summarize the contents of the three expert reports as well as the expert testimony given during oral argument, which took place on February 23, 2010.

a. First Dranove Report

Dranove opines that DID regression analysis provides a reliable method of proving classwide impact. DID regression "examines the change in an outcome of interest for a group of individuals or firms affected by an event such as a merger (the 'treatment' group) while controlling for the contemporaneous change in outcome for an otherwise similar group that was not affected by that event (the 'control' group)." Expert Report of David Dranove, Feb. 12, 2009, at 23 (hereinafter "Dranove Rep."). DID analysis has two steps: (1) compute the difference in the outcome before and after the event for both the control and treatment groups; and (2) compute the difference between the differences across the two groups (the "DID estimate"). A researcher will also often include additional control variables to account for [*69] other factors that may affect the outcome. The DID estimate indicates whether there is any additional difference in the outcome for the treatment group beyond what occurred for the control group.

Dranove [38] indicates that he will perform DID analysis for each insurer that contracted with ENH during the relevant time. He explains that here, the "outcome" is the price of healthcare services, the treatment group is the three ENH hospitals, and the control group is a set of hospitals that did not merge during the relevant time period but that are otherwise similar to ENH. He also explains that he will implement additional control variables to account for, inter alia, changes in patient medical conditions and in hospital characteristics (i.e. teaching status). The DID estimates will represent the increase (if any) in the price of healthcare for the average ENH patient covered by a given insurer. Dranove refers to this estimate as the amount of "overcharge." He acknowledges that, in theory, an increase in average price charged an insurer does not imply that all patients covered by that insurer paid higher prices for healthcare services; he states, however, that the nature of contracting between ENH and insurers allows for this conclusion. Indeed, his review of the healthcare industry and of the structure and nature of contracts between insurers and hospitals shows that "if [ENH] overcharged [39] an insurer by a certain percentage, all or substantially all class members covered by that insurer will be overcharged by approximately the same percentage. This is equally true across all types of fully and self-funded plan sponsors covered by an insurer, and it also applies to those uninsured who paid their hospital charges in full or approximately in full." Id. at 2.

I. Pricing Methodologies Used in ENH Contracts

Dranove first reviews the three pricing methodologies used by ENH to charge for inpatient care, outpatient care, and uninsured individuals. He then describes how each set of methodologies allows for a finding of common impact from increases in average prices.

A. Inpatient Services

ENH implements three pricing methodologies within its contracts for inpatient services: (1) case rate pricing, (2) per diem pricing, and (3) discount-off pricing. Case rate pricing calculates the price of services by using the Diagnosis Related Group ("DRG"), which is both a descriptor of and a numerical value assigned to a patient admission. Computer software assigns patients to DRGs based on diagnosis, comorbidities, age, applicable procedure(s), and discharge status. [9] For each contract, there [40] are also "relative value weights" assigned to each DRG, which measure the cost of treating a particular patient relative to the cost of an average patient within that DRG nationwide. An average value weight is 1, and values range from .15 to 23.67. Each patient who is admitted to a hospital is assigned to a DRG and is assigned a relative value weight. The DRG value and the relative value weight are multiplied to generate the "DRG weight" for that admission. To derive the price of an admission, a patient's DRG weight is multiplied by a base rate, which is determined during contract negotiations. Case rate prices are therefore a function of two variables: (1) DRG weight and (2) an insurer's negotiated base rate.

Dranove states that as a consequence of this pricing structure, any negotiated price increase takes the form of an increase in the base rate because DRG weights do [41] not fluctuate. He states that it is possible to determine the increase in the base rate charged an insurer by looking at the overall increase in average payments from that insurer. If DID analysis demonstrates that the base rate charged an insurer increased at a statistically significant rate (compared to increases in base rates at control hospitals), Dranove states that this will allow for a conclusion that prices for all or substantially all patients covered by that insurer increased by a significant [*70] amount. Dranove therefore concludes that the DID method is able to determine, for case rate contracts, whether an insurer and all of its customers were commonly impacted by price increases.

Per diem pricing requires patients to pay a fixed price for each day spent in the hospital. Prices are therefore a function of the length of a patient's stay. Some per diem contracts specify a uniform per diem rate applicable to all inpatient care, while some specify different rates based on the kind of inpatient admission. Because of this pricing structure, Dranove concludes that an increase in per diem rates charged an insurer will result in a common percentage increase in the price of services for [42] all patients covered by that insurer. He will calculate whether per diem rates increased for an insurer by examining the overall increase in average payments from that insurer. If DID analysis demonstrates that an increase in an insurer's per diem rates was statistically significant, Dranove concludes that this will prove common impact across all or substantially all individuals covered by that insurer.

Discount-off pricing calculates price by taking a fixed percentage discount from a service's list price. [10] Price increases can take several forms; the two most common are a decrease in the negotiated discount and an across-the-board increase in list prices. [11] Dranove concludes that common impact is inherent in this pricing structure because if list prices increase by a certain percentage, the price charged each patient will increase by that same percentage. Similarly, if an insurer's discount rate decreases by a certain percentage, each patient covered by that insurer will pay the same increased price for services across the board. Dranove notes that he will be able to determine whether such price increases occurred for an insurer by looking at the overall increase in average payments [43] from that insurer. If DID analysis indicates that average payments from an insurer increased by a statistically significant amount, Dranove concludes that this will prove common impact -- that all patients covered by that insurer were impacted by the price increase.

B. Outpatient Services

The most common methodology used for outpatient care contracts is discount-off pricing, which is described above. According to Dranove, common impact is inherent in this system because if list prices increase or an insurer's discount rate decreases, prices for all patients covered by that insurer will increase by the same percentage. Dranove will rely on DID analysis to determine if there is a statistically significant increase in payments for outpatient services.

C. Uninsured Individuals

[10] Hospitals refer to their price lists as chargemasters.

[11] There is no meaningful mathematical distinction between a decrease in discount and an increase in price.

Uninsured patients are typically billed at full list prices. [12] Dranove will perform DID analysis on actual payments by the uninsured to determine whether these patients paid statistically significant higher prices. Because he believes that common impact is inherent [44] for all discount-off contracts, he states that he can demonstrate common impact across uninsured individuals, whom he treats as using a discount-off pricing system in which the discount is zero.

ii. Potential Variations in Pricing Methodologies

Dranove acknowledges that some of ENH's contracts may contain variations of the above-described pricing methodologies. He specifically considers "whether a departure from the most basic forms of implementation could reasonably undermine [his] finding of common impact. For example, it is possible that a lack of common impact would result from [ENH's] raising prices for one set of inpatient services but not another." Id. at 33. Dranove concludes that such disparate effects will not likely pose a problem [*71] because (1) ENH most commonly adopts payment rules across the board, and rules apply to all or nearly all inpatient and outpatient services; (2) research [45] shows that hospitals do not limit their exercise of market power to certain inpatient services or ailments; and (3) DID analysis can be adjusted to calculate damages at a contract-specific level and can include "dummy variables" to control for these adjustments.

Dranove first considers the possibility that ENH increased list prices for different services at substantially different rates, which would affect his analysis of discount-off contracts. If this occurred, [13] he concludes that ENH's exercise of market power would still have a common impact on class members but notes that the magnitude of that impact (i.e. the amount of damages) could differ across class members. Dranove indicates that he would take the following steps to address and calculate such variance: "(1) identify the service classes subject to different percentage increases by reviewing ENH billing documents that report charges and DRGs, (2) include in the DID analysis dummy variables for those services that faced a differential increase, and (3) obtain an estimate of the overcharges that reflects the differential increase." Id. at 35.

Second, he considers the possibility that a contract employed multiple per diem rates, all of which increased at different rates. If this occurred, [14] he concludes that ENH's exercise of market power would still have a common impact on class members, but notes that the magnitude of the overcharge may differ across patients. To calculate differential overcharges, Dranove will conduct a DID analysis using dummy variables to account for differing classes of service. [15]

Third, Dranove considers the possibility that a contract used multiple pricing methods. If prices increased by the same percentage, he concludes that the combination of multiple methods would not affect DID analysis, as

[12] In many cases, uninsured individuals do not pay their hospital bills. These individuals are excluded from the class definition. Dranove believes that those who do pay (in full or approximately in full) can be "readily identified by data that either are or are likely to be available." Id. at 25.

[13] To determine whether ENH increased list prices in its chargemaster at substantially [46] different rates for different services, Dranove indicated that he would need to perform "a review of [ENH]'s strategic documents, contracts with insurers, and the chargemaster itself." Id. at 35. At the time he authored his first expert report, he had not conducted any such analysis.

[14] Dranove states that if a particular contract employed multiple per diem rates and ENH increased such rates by substantially different amounts, "any such differential increase will be readily apparent in both the relevant contracts and in [ENH]'s billing data ([ENH]'s billing data records the payment and the length of stay, so the per diem rate can be recovered directly)." Id. at 35-36.

[15] Dranove explains how dummy variables will correct for [47] variation in price increases: "The applicable contract will likely identify the classes of services that should have a dummy variable. For example, if a contract specifies one per diem rate for maternity stays and another for general medical/surgical stays, then a dummy variable that equals one if the patient is a maternity patient will suffice to estimate any differential effect for these patients. The most likely basis upon which to define classes of service is the patient's [DRG]." Id. at 36 n. 82.

increases would still be evenly distributed across services and customers. If percentage increases differed, Dranove will account for the differentiation by including suitably defined dummy variables. [16] He states that "[t]his approach generalizes in a straightforward fashion to encompass more complicated possibilities," including the possibility of a single contract with all three pricing methods. Id. For more complicated possibilities, he will incorporate dummy variables [48] to control for variations in the data.

Fourth, Dranove considers the possibility of outlier payments. Outlier provisions specify that when list charges associated with a patient exceed a predetermined threshold, payment will be made on a discount-off basis rather than a per diem or case rate basis. Conceptually, this is very similar to the possibility of the mixed-methodology scenario; however, the difference is that in the mixed-methodology scenario, the form of payment is determined by the class of service, whereas with outlier payments, the form of payment is determined by the level of list charges. Dranove will use dummy variables [*72] to control for outlier provisions as they appear. [17]

Finally, Dranove considers the possibility that pricing methods in a contract will change over time. Because DID [49] analysis focuses on price rather than form of payment, the only required adaptation is that the analysis be performed at the level of services, rather than the insurer level.

iii. Summary of Findings

In short, Dranove's initial report states that DID analysis provides a reliable framework to determine impact on a classwide basis. His research shows that the impact of overcharges is intrinsically common to all categories of private healthcare payers, so that any overcharges would result in impact to all or substantially all class members, regardless of the pricing methodology used in the relevant contract. DID analysis reports overcharges as percentage increases, which form the basis for all damage calculations for all class members. If a contract contains variations on the standard pricing methodologies, such variations are readily identifiable and DID analysis can easily accommodate them. Finally, he believes that the data he needs for his DID analysis is either already available or is likely to be available.

b. Noether Report

In support of its response, ENH filed its own expert report authored by Monica Noether. Noether disputes many of Dranove's conclusions and offers four main responses: [50] (1) it is not possible to define a class with members who were all impacted by ENH's actions without performing substantial analysis of the circumstances facing each individual member; (2) several individuals within the proposed class did not suffer impact; (3) Dranove's proposed DID analysis cannot demonstrate impact across all (or even most) class members; and (4) the named plaintiffs are not typical or adequate members of the proposed class.

i. MCO Contracting With ENH is Complex and Requires Individualized Analyses to Determine Impact

Noether's examination of ENH contracts with MCOs leads her to conclude that payment terms are "substantially more heterogeneous" than Dranove assumes. Expert Report of Monica Noether, June 9, 2009, at 5 (hereinafter "Noether Rep."). She finds that contracts often use multiple pricing mechanisms, contain multiple "price terms" (i.e. multiple discounts), and employ multiple carve-out and stop-loss provisions. She further finds that contract terms are often modified according to unique, contract-specific rules. Her report identifies potential variations across the standard payment methods for inpatient services and highlights additional complexities that [51] arise within MCO-entity and entity-employee contractual relationships.

[16] "In this case, including a dummy variable that equals 1 for all classes of services that are reimbursed under a per diem rate will identify the differential overcharges under the two systems." Id. at 36.

[17] "Incorporating a dummy variable into the DID analysis that equals 1 if list charges exceed the outlier threshold will estimate any differential overcharge for outlier patients." Id. at 38.

A. Pricing Methodologies for Inpatient and Outpatient Services

Noether points out that case rate contracts often contain multiple pricing methodologies that may apply multiple base rates to a single stay and may not increase base rates by uniform percentages or simultaneously. She further notes that per diem contracts often apply multiple per diem rates that may not increase uniformly over time. With respect to discount-off contracts, Noether notes that (1) payors negotiate a variety of discounts for different services that may change over time; (2) it is common to have multiple discounts in a single contract; (3) changes in list prices vary across services; [18] and (4) there are other complexities in the ways in which MCOs reimburse hospitals, including contractual terms such as stop-loss provisions, which cover varying percentages of total charges and may only apply to certain services, and carve-out provisions, which exempt services from a given pricing method. Finally, with respect to pricing for outpatient services, [*73] Noether states that contracts often employ multiple pricing methodologies.

To illustrate the complexities in a given contract, Noether reviews a 2005 Payor B contract, which she describes as fairly typical. The contract employs per diem, case rate, and discount-off pricing for inpatient services. There are 11 inpatient services subject to per diem pricing and 8 unique per diem amounts. There are 3 inpatient services subject to case rate pricing and 3 unique base rates. There are 37 inpatient services subject to carve-out provisions and 37 unique carve-out prices. There are two inpatient services subject to discount-off pricing. There are 11 outpatient services subject to case rate pricing with 7 unique prices. Within these services exist 9 subcategories of services that are subject to carve-out provisions, and within those 9 subcategories, there are 7 unique prices. Finally, there are 5 outpatient services subject to discount-off pricing. These 5 services have subcategories subject to carve-out provisions; 4 subcategories are subject to unique discount percentages and [53] one is subject to a maximum payment cap. Noether concludes that Dranove is incorrect to assume that payment terms were most commonly adopted across-the-board by ENH.

B. Relationship Between a MCO and its Customers

Noether explains that contracts between MCOs and their customers are "complex and varied" and states that Dranove "overlook[s] these contract features and their impact on class definition and damage allocation entirely." Id. at 11. She explains that a group can either self-insure or purchase a fully-insured contract and opines that the distinction bears directly on the viability of plaintiffs' class definition and the issue of damage allocation.

If an entity self-insures, it bears the risk for all medical costs and a MCO will act as a third party administrator ("TPA"). The MCO negotiates pricing with ENH, pays ENH for any healthcare services used by the entity, and then passes those charges along to the entity. The entity fully reimburses the MCO for the services it consumes and pays an administrative fee, which is either flat or varied depending on the discount rate negotiated by the MCO. Noether states that MCOs acting as TPAs "would not generally have been harmed" by a price [54] increase because they pass along costs to the self-insured groups. Id. at 11.

If an entity is fully-insured, it pays a MCO a premium, which covers medical costs, administrative costs, and the cost of bearing the risk associated with the uncertainty of the entity's medical claims. Noether states that it is difficult to determine how the premium is calculated, but notes that "it is likely that at least the majority of the medical cost increases that affect all MCOs are passed on to the MCO's customers." Id. at 12. She explains that "[w]hile during the life of existing contracts with fully-insured customers a MCO probably cannot pass on provider cost increases, when those contracts come up for renewal, it is likely to pass on most or all of any cost increases." Id. at 21.

Finally, Noether states that the available ENH data (on which Dranove intends to rely) does not identify which payments were made on behalf of self-insured entities and which were made on behalf of fully-insured entities. The [18] Noether's analysis [52] found that in a given year at ENH, most chargemaster prices did not change. For the prices that did increase, she found the pattern of increase to be highly varied. See Noether Rep. at 17-18.

ENH data only identifies the direct payor (the MCO) of a particular service. To determine which payments came from which entities, Dranove would have to investigate every single contract from each [55] MCO and Expectation of Benefit ("EOB") forms, which list transaction prices, for each visit by a covered individual. This would require plaintiffs to issue discovery (at least) on every self-funded entity whose members received services at ENH.

C. Relationship Between Employers and Covered Employees

Noether also examines the relationship between an entity and its enrollees and states that benefit packages "vary along a number of dimensions that affect the impact any anti-competitive activity could have had on different individual members of the proposed class." Id. at 12. She argues that the variety of factors to be considered implies that any assessment of impact must be done on an individual basis, as no single model can accommodate all relevant factors.

[*74] She first notes that many individuals are subject to cost-sharing provisions such as co-pays and coinsurance. Coinsurance generally covers a percentage of a bill and thus generally can be expected to rise proportionately with the bill. Coinsurance rates, however, can vary across different services within a given plan. Noether also points out that both co-pays and coinsurance are further affected by deductibles and out-of-pocket maximums. [56] She states that there is variation in the way deductibles are applied, as some services may be exempt, while others may be subject to a separate deductible. She notes that individuals enrolled in a plan as part of a family likely share a deductible amount with other family members. With respect to out-of-pocket maximums, she notes that some services may be exempt and that maximums are shared within families. In light of these complexities, Noether concludes that substantial individual analysis is needed to determine whether any individual patient suffered impact.

ii. "No-Impact" Class Members

Noether criticizes (1) plaintiffs' proposed class definition, because it includes individuals and entities that were not impacted by ENH price increases, and (2) Dranove's proposed method of determining impact, because it provides no mechanism to exclude class members who did not suffer impact. These "no-impact" class members include (1) MCOs acting as TPAs; (2) rental networks; (3) self-insured entities with stop-loss coverage; (4) individuals subject to out-of-pocket maximums or supplemental or secondary insurance; (5) Blue Cross Blue Shield of Illinois ("BCBSI"); (6) individuals who received [57] services that were (a) not subject to price increases, (b) of increased quality proportionate to any price increase, and (c) administered after the FTC remedy, which was designed to restore competitive pricing; and (7) uninsured individuals who paid for services using ENH's charity care policy.

A. MCOs Acting as TPAs and Rental Networks

Noether states that MCOs acting as TPAs "would not generally have been harmed" by a price increase because they pass along costs to self-insured entities. [19] Id. at 11. She makes a similar point with respect to rental networks, such as Preferred Healthcare Systems ("PHCS"), which assemble provider networks by negotiating rates with a set of payers in the area and then "rent" such networks to self-insured employers, TPAs, and other MCOs. Because rental networks fully pass on medical costs for an administrative fee, Noether argues that they could not have been injured by ENH price increases.

[19] Noether also appears to argue that MCOs not acting as TPAs also might be no-impact members. She notes that "it is likely that at least the majority of the medical cost increases that affect all MCOs are passed on to the MCO's [fully insured] customers." Id. at 12. "While [58] during the life of existing contracts with fully-insured customers, a MCO probably cannot pass on provider cost increases, when those contracts come up for renewal, it is likely to pass on most or all of any cost increases." Id. at 21.

B. Self-Insured Entities with Stop-Loss Coverage; Individuals with Out-of-Pocket Maximums or Supplemental Insurance

Noether states that individuals subject to cost-sharing provisions such as co-pays [20] and coinsurance were likely not impacted by ENH price increases because these provisions likely precluded individuals from paying out-of-pocket for healthcare services. She further states that once a patient reaches an out-of-pocket maximum or an entity reaches its stop-loss threshold, neither can be harmed by an ENH price increase.

C. Blue Cross Blue Shield of Illinois

Noether relies on the Arango declaration (stating that BCBSI suffered no impact and paid reasonable prices) to demonstrate that BCBSI did not suffer impact.

iii. Dranove's Proposed Method Cannot [59] Adequately Address Individual Damages

Noether identifies two main flaws in Dranove's proposed DID analysis: (1) there is no [*75] appropriate control group and (2) his analysis impermissibly relies on averages.

A. No Appropriate Control Group

Noether states that for DID analysis to be reliable, the control group must be "identical to the merging facilities in all dimensions that affect prices both before and after the merger." Id. at 25. "The methodology relies critically on the ability to define an appropriate comparison or control group that is matched in every way with the studied firm except the merger." Id. Noether argues that because hospitals are "all unique" in terms of service quality, range of services, medical staff, locations, amenities, and market, "it is not possible to identify an ideal control group, and therefore it is not possible to be certain that the results of a DID analysis can in fact be attributed to the merger." Id. at 26. She states that because Dranove did not identify a method for selecting a control group, it is not certain whether his DID analysis will be reliable.

B. DID Analysis Impermissibly Relies on Averages

Next, she states that DID analysis is not a reliable [60] method because it is unable to account for the specific circumstances of a given plaintiff. "The most that even the ideal DID analysis can measure is the average change in prices over time." Id. at 27. To reliably assess impact and allocate damages, Noether states that "at the very least, the impact of the alleged anti-competitive price increases should be expected to vary across payors, type of plan (HMO/PPO), patient cost-sharing arrangements, and type of service. It is not possible to design a DID analysis that comprehensively reflects all these sources of variation." Id. Though Dranove will correct for variations across pricing methodologies and price terms by conducting the DID analysis at the service-level if necessary, Noether states that this still ignores other sources of variation and could require Dranove to conduct over 18,000 separate analyses. [21]

Noether next argues that Dranove's analysis rests on an assumption that when average prices increased, the price of each service increased by the same [61] amount for each patient. She notes that Dranove performed no analysis to test or support this assumption and conducts her own DID analysis to discredit it. She again uses the 2005 Payor B contract as an example. Her DID analysis indicates that average prices for the contract increased at [20] She states that individuals with fixed co-pays could not have been harmed by ENH price increases. Plaintiffs concede this and have excluded such individuals from their class definition. See infra at 3.

[21] She notes that there are over 18 MCOs that contract with ENH, that many MCOs have two or three different plans, and that there are over 500 DRGs applicable to admissions at ENH.

a higher rate than average prices at control hospitals across all DRGs, while the prices of several individual DRGs either decreased or did not increase at a statistically significant rate. [22]

Noether further notes that DRGs are not homogeneous. Dranove assumes that all patients within a DRG experience the same price increase because (1) under [62] a discount-off plan, the discount percentage is uniform, and (2) price increases in the chargemaster occur across the board. Though ENH does not retain data on individual list items, Noether states that the underlying composition of list items within a DRG varies widely. She further states that there is also enormous variation in the amount of billed charges within a single DRG. She states that "[s]ince changes to ENH chargemaster prices are not uniform or common, whether a specific patient is impacted by an increase to some ENH chargemaster prices will depend on which chargemaster items were included in the patient's bill. However, even observationally equivalent patients (same DRG, same year) are billed for very different combinations of chargemaster line items. The impact from changes in ENH chargemaster prices is not common across all class members [*76] who paid based on these prices." Id. at 31.

C. Dranove's Methodology Cannot Account for the Complex Relationships Among Class Members

Noether states that Dranove's proposed methodology is insufficient because it cannot account for the interrelationships between different class members and that, as a result, it will not be able to reliably [63] allocate damages across class members. She notes that Dranove does not explain how, for example, he plans to assess the damages that have accrued to a self-funded employer-sponsored plan from an increase in average MCO contract prices. "One cannot assume that a self-funded plan will experience the same percentage change in prices as the average percentage change in prices experienced by the MCO/TPA of that self-funded plan." Id. at 39. In a given year, a self-funded plan will only consume a few services, whereas a MCO will consume many. It is Noether's position, therefore, that whether and by how much a self-insured entity was affected will depend critically on which services its members received.

Noether also notes that in the context of the MCO/TPA-self-insured entity relationship, "additional administrative fees distort the simple relationships between what the MCO/TPA pays and what the self-funded group pays." Id. Indeed, the formula for calculating administrative fees, which affects the total price that a self-insured entity pays a MCO, differs across contracts. Therefore, she reasons, "the impact of changes in the ENH contract price with a MCO/TPA will not be common to the self-funded [64] employer groups who contract with that MCO/TPA." Id.

iv. Named Plaintiffs are Not Typical of the Proposed Class

Finally, Noether opines that "[t]he claims of the named class members, and economic proof of these claims, is not typical of the claims of the broader proposed class." Id. at 40. She states that the vast majority of plaintiffs' claims are on behalf of MCOs that directly negotiated with ENH, and finds problematic the fact that none of the named plaintiffs is a MCO. She further notes that the individual named plaintiffs received a narrow range of services and that none of them received any outpatient services. Finally, she states that Painters Fund is "very different" from a MCO because it never actually negotiated with ENH and notes that it could not have suffered impact because of its contractual relationship with BCBSI. Id. at 41.

v. Summary of Conclusions

In short, Noether's report states that Dranove's proposed method for proving classwide impact is fatally flawed. She highlights the complexity and diversity of payment arrangements between MCOs and hospitals, on the one hand, and between MCOs and their customers, on the other, to argue that a highly specific and individualized

[22] She states that between 1998 and 2002, there were 101 DRGs in the data from Payor B. DID analysis indicated that average prices across all DRGs increased; however, for 47% of the DRGs, ENH prices post-merger increased less than control hospital prices. In 28% of all admissions, the price of the DRGs that corresponded to those admissions have a negative DID estimate (meaning that prices post-merger increased less than control hospital prices). Finally, 33% of all payments were made to compensate for admissions that correspond to DRGs with negative DID estimates.

[65] analysis of each ENH customer's unique circumstances is required to reliably assess impact and damages. She states that because Dranove did not analyze any MCO contracts, he incorrectly concluded that pricing terms within such contracts are relatively uniform and ignored all complexities associated with contractual cost-sharing arrangements. As a result, Dranove further incorrectly concluded that DID analysis would produce a reliable estimate of the damages suffered by each individual class member and that it would be able to easily identify "no-impact" class members. Finally, she opines that even with the requisite data, which could only be obtained through extensive and costly discovery, Dranove's proposed methodology would still be unreliable.

vi. Plaintiffs' Motion to Exclude the Noether Report

Plaintiffs have moved to exclude Noether's report on the grounds that it does not satisfy the standards for admissibility of expert opinion under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 and Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993). In the court's view, as discussed infra, Noether's report does include some misleading information and analysis. In its analysis below, the court gives Noether's report the weight it believes it is due. Accordingly, the court will not undertake a Daubert analysis at this procedural juncture. *See Reed, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89576, 2009 WL 3146999, at 65-66. Moreover, plaintiffs had two opportunities -- in their reply brief and at oral argument -- to respond to the conclusions contained in Noether's report; the court understands its limitations. Accordingly, plaintiffs' motion to exclude Noether's report is denied.

c. Second Dranove Report

Plaintiffs submitted a second report authored by Dranove in support of their reply. In his reply report, Dranove responds to each of Noether's four points.

I. Contract Complexity is Irrelevant to Common Impact

Dranove acknowledges that ENH contracts generally employ a variety of pricing methods, however, he states that his review of such contracts demonstrates that prices increase at the same rate across nearly all services, regardless of such complexities. It is his opinion that "ENH almost invariably increases prices at the same rate for all or nearly all service categories." Expert Reply Report of David Dranove, Dec. 8, 2009, at 2 (hereinafter "Dranove Reply Rep.").

A. Contract Examination and Analysis

Dranove examined ENH contracts with seven major MCOs. His results, [68] outlined in Appendix D of his report, indicate that the majority of contracts consistently apply a common price increase across all or substantially all service categories. [24] For example, with respect to the 2005 Payor B contract highlighted by Noether, Dranove's

---

[23] They specifically argue that Noether's report suffers from "a number of fatal flaws:" (1) it contains irrelevant and misleading analysis of the structure of MCO contracts; (2) its analysis of changes to [67] the ENH chargemaster is incomplete and inaccurate; (3) it "erroneously claims numerous class members . . . were not injured without conducting any economic analysis;" (4) it asserts, without support, that ENH never exercised market power; (5) it offers legal conclusions; and (6) it contains DID analysis that is "fundamentally defective, thus invalidating her opinions." Pls.' Mot. to Strike at 2.

[24] Dranove also reviewed communications (letters, business documents) between ENH and the seven MCOs. From this review, he concluded that the norm was to speak of a single price increase results indicate that the prices of 92 of the 93 service categories increased at the same rate. [25] Appendix D contains a chart for each MCO stating the percentage of prices in a given contract that increased at a uniform rate within a given year. As an example of Dranove's analysis, below is the chart describing price increases within the relevant Payor A contracts.

This chart indicates that the prices in the Payor A contracts increased at a uniform rate for all (100% of) outpatient services. It further indicates that all Payor A PPO contracts increased the prices of all inpatient services at a uniform rate. Finally, it indicates that between 2000 and 2003, all Payor A HMO contracts increased the prices of all inpatient services at a uniform rate. Between 2003 and 2004, price increases were not entirely uniform. Dranove has derived a method to adjust DID analysis to accommodate for variable price increases, however, as discussed below.

In light of these uniform price increases across services, Dranove concludes that the estimate of average price increases for an insurer is also a valid and reliable estimate of the price increases applicable to every patient covered by that insurer. In turn, he concludes that DID analysis, which relies on and calculates average price increases, provides a valid and reliable method for proving classwide impact.

B. DID Analysis Can Accommodate Variable Price Increases

If the evidence [71] eventually demonstrates that prices did not increase at a uniform rate for a MCO or a particular contract, Dranove reiterates that he can perform DID analysis at the service level. For a mixed-model contract with individualized price increases, for example, he will identify all service categories included in the contract and organize them by the rate at which their prices increase. If Dranove determines that there are 10 different rates of increase, he will conduct 10 separate DID analyses. He explains that category-level analysis works because by contract, ENH receives the same reimbursement for all patients in an appropriately [*79] defined service category. To the extent that the average patient visit within a service category faced an overcharge, he believes all patient visits within the service category faced the same overcharge.

Dranove acknowledges that "[t]here are exceptions to the rule that ENH contracts exhibit identical or nearly identical price increases across all service categories. These exceptions arise, on occasion, when ENH contracts redefine service categories." Id. at 20. He notes an "industry-wide pattern of periodically restructuring payment systems" and states that [72] it is "a mistake to conclude that differential price changes of this sort are evidence of a lack of common impact from the exercise of market power. The correct conclusion is that ENH restructured price increases (in some instances) independently of its exercise of market power." Id. at 22-23.

To demonstrate impact for price increases that result from restructuring, Dranove will perform DID analysis at the service level. He relies on an underlying assumption (borne out of his conclusion that ENH increases prices at a uniform rate and across services) that price changes due to the merger would be distributed uniformly across all categories, regardless of variance in individual service pricing. To prove impact, he proposes a four-step calculation: (1) calculate the average price increase across all variable categories; (2) calculate what the price for each service would have been but for the merger (divide the new contract price by 1 plus the average price increase); (3) subtract the "but-for-merger price" from the new price to get the dollar amount by which ENH increased prices due to the merger; and (4) from this dollar amount, calculate how much the percentage increase in price was [73] due to the merger. Dranove opines that this percentage provides a reliable estimate of the overcharge to all patients who received services that experienced variable price increases.

ii. DID Method is Reliable and Establishes BCBSI Impact

Dranove vigorously disputes Noether's assertion that his proposed DID analysis is not a reliable method of proving impact. To prove otherwise, he conducts a DID analysis of recently produced data from BCBSI to demonstrate that (1) DID analysis is a reliable method of proving common impact and damages and (2) BCBSI suffered impact as a result of the merger.

First, Dranove reiterates his position that from the available data sources, he can conduct a reliable DID analysis. In his list of available data sources in his reply report, however, he includes a new data source. The "BCBSI PPO" data set, which BCBSI provided to plaintiffs after ENH filed its response, contains (for BCBSI PPO plans) counts of inpatient and outpatient cases per year, total contractual payments, total discounts, total inpatient days, average case mix index, length of stay, and yearly gross payments per diem and per case.

Dranove performs a DID analysis on the BSBCI PPO data using the [74] control group and time period used by ENH's expert in the FTC proceeding. His analysis demonstrates that BCBSI was injured; specifically, that BCBSI paid a 14% overcharge for outpatient services, a -2.5% overcharge for inpatient services, and a 7.7% overcharge overall. When Dranove extended the analysis through 2008, the analysis demonstrates that BCBSI paid a 17.9% overcharge for outpatient services, a 1.1% overcharge for inpatient services, and an 11.5% overcharge overall.

Dranove performs one additional round of DID analysis on the BCBSI PPO data using his own control group. He disagrees with Noether's assertion that a reliable control group must contain hospitals that are identical to ENH. He states that "[t]he economics profession has long understood that exact matching is not remotely necessary for a reliable DID regression analysis, as evidenced by even a cursory examination of the published literature." Id. at 5. Accordingly, he developed his own "systematic method" to select control hospitals. Id. at 42. First, he applies five exclusion criteria. He excludes hospitals that (1) are located outside of Cook, DuPage, and Lake counties, because market conditions outside these areas [75] will likely differ from those that face ENH; (2) have less than 100 beds, because small hospitals face [*80] different supply and demand conditions; (3) are state and county-owned or are navy or veteran's affairs hospitals; (4) do not have comparable shares of inpatient charges to those of ENH; and (5) were party to a merger or acquisition that took place around the same time as the ENH merger. Next, he conducts a statistical test to select and validate control group hospitals. [26] Using a control group of 21 hospitals, Dranove's DID analysis demonstrates that BCBSI paid a 12.1% overcharge for outpatient services, a 6.2% overcharge for inpatient services, and a 9.8% overcharge overall.

Summarizing his results, Dranove states that he is "not claiming that there is common [76] impact solely because prices to BCBSI increased on average as a result of ENH's merger with [Highland Park Hospital]. . . . To be entirely clear, [there are] two distinct sets of analyses that establish both common impact and injury." Id. at 49. The analysis that establishes impact is that which relates to contract structure: "A review of ENH's contracts shows that, with minor variations, ENH increases its inpatient and outpatient prices across the board. . . . [W]hen the average price of inpatient services increases, . . . the prices to insurers and patients" will increase by that same percentage. Id. at 50. The analysis that establishes injury (or damages) is the DID analysis. That is, according to Dranove, common impact is a consequence of contract structure, and damages are quantified through the use of the DID analysis. He will calculate damages by first computing overcharges and then multiplying actual payments by the overcharge percentage.

[26] Inpatient prices at a control hospital should respond to changes in market factors in ways similar to ENH. If changes in length of stay or case mix have a similar effect on pricing at ENH and a potential control hospital, this suggests that the process generating pricing at the two hospitals is similar. Dranove will use a F-test to statistically test whether a candidate's pricing and ENH's pricing respond in a similar manner.

iii. Noether's DID Analysis is Highly Flawed

Dranove states that Noether's DID analysis is "uninformative as a test of common impact" due to two conceptual errors and several technical errors. Id. at 52. The first conceptual error is that she [77] failed to account for contract restructuring in her analysis, which led her to "misleadingly conclude" that prices for some services decreased over time. Id. He again notes that variable price increases were likely the result of routine contract restructuring separate from the merger. He further notes that including such variable changes in a calculation of averages (such as the DID analysis) will skew the results.

Noether's second conceptual error is that she conducted her analysis at the DRG level, without reference to the relevant contract structures. For example, even if a contract specified a single per diem rate across all DRGs, Noether performed her analysis at the DRG level. As a result, many of her analyses were performed on very few admissions and generated statistically insignificant results. Depending on the payer, between 32% and 78% of the individual DRGs she analyzed had three or fewer admissions in either the pre- or the post-merger period. Further, between 6% and 36% of the DRGs she analyzed had more than ten admissions in either the pre-or post- merger periods (or both). Dranove states that "[t]his is a thin basis upon which to identify statistically significant price [78] changes, whether negative or positive." Id. at 54.

iv. Noether's "No-Impact" Class Members

Lastly, Dranove takes issue with Noether's conclusion that several members of the proposed class suffered no impact as a result of the ENH merger. With respect to BCBSI, he states that Noether's reliance on Arango's declaration is unwarranted because Arango is not an economist and because Dranove's own analysis demonstrates that BCBSI suffered impact.

With respect to MCOs acting as TPAs, Dranove states that "[a]lthough [he] [is] not an expert in the law, [he] understand[s] that considerations associated with pass-on and pass-through are not relevant in this matter." Id. at 59. With respect to individuals with [*81] supplemental insurance, [27] individuals subject to out-of-pocket maximums, [28] and entities with stop-loss insurance, [29] Dranove states that the issue of whether these individuals and entities were injured "involves claims allocation and does not affect the total amount of incurred damages." Id. at 60.

v. Summary of Conclusions

Throughout his report, Dranove disputes Noether's main argument that complexities within ENH's contracts and within the relationships of the potential class members preclude the application of DID analysis to prove common

[27] Dranove also points out that the majority of individuals who purchase secondary coverage are traditional Medicare patients, who are excluded from the class. Further, his analysis of ENH contracts [79] demonstrates that 1% of all non-government patients at ENH involve multiple commercial insurers.

[28] Dranove's analysis of ENH contracts demonstrates that out-of-pocket maximums affect 2% of visits

[29] Dranove states that economic theory "suggests that if a self-funded group reached its stop-loss threshold in a given year, an event made more probable by an ENH price increase, the cost to that group of obtaining stop-loss insurance would increase." Id. at 60.

impact. He states that such complexities do not preclude the use of a common framework to study the rate at which prices increase over time. Because contracts between insurers and hospitals consistently apply uniform price increases, and because prices that change at variable rates usually do so as a result of contract restructuring, Dranove opines that all customers covered by a given insurer will be impacted in the same way. He reiterates his thesis from his initial report that DID analysis [80] is a reliable method to calculate the amount of damages incurred by commonly-impacted customers and relies on his recent DID analysis of BCBSI claims as evidence of this fact.

vi. ENH's Motion to Exclude the Dranove Reply Report

ENH has moved to exclude Dranove's reply report because it contains new analysis not included in his original report. See TAS Distrib. Co. v. Cumming Engine Co., 491 F.3d 625, 630-31 (7th Cir. 2007). ENH argues that by including new analyses in the reply, plaintiffs deprived ENH of its right to respond to all of their arguments. Because the court afforded ENH an opportunity to respond at oral argument and with Noether's supplemental report, however, ENH's argument is moot and its motion to exclude Dranove's reply report is denied.

d. Oral Argument

The court held oral argument on February 23, 2010 to allow ENH to respond to the new issues and analyses contained in Dranove's reply report, specifically Dranove's examination of ENH contracts, his DID analysis of BCBSI data, and his method for selecting a control group.

I. Noether's Testimony

Noether testified to three main conclusions: (1) Dranove's DID analysis cannot identify "no-impact" class members; (2) Dranove's [81] contract review is incomplete because it focuses on price changes within contracts rather than changes across contracts; and (3) Dranove's analysis of BCBSI's injury is unreliable because his control group is unreliable.

Noether's testimony regarding "no-impact" groups repeated the conclusions contained in her response report. Regarding Dranove's contract analysis, she testified that it was incomplete because it only examined price changes within contracts, which are usually attributable to escalator clauses, rather than price changes across contracts, which are more likely to be due to, inter alia, an exercise of market power at the time of contract renegotiation. Tr. 67:1-5. She testified that each of the MCOs examined by Dranove went through at least one contract renegotiation, and that many went through several, during the relevant time period. Id. 77:17-20.

Noether further testified that she performed her own contract examination to assess the validity of Dranove's conclusion with [*82] respect to changes across contracts. She testified that her examination indicated there were "several examples" of variable price increases after a contract renegotiation. Id. 84:17. Specifically, she [82] noted that a "large proportion of the contract renewals that [she] looked at showed non-uniform changes in prices from one contract to the next. It's really quite common. . . . [It] [cannot] be ignored." Id. 85:2-15. She highlighted three examples. First, she noted the difference between the 2000 and 2002 Payor A contracts. In 2002, the prices of the nine cardiac services listed in the contract increased and decreased at seven different rates. Second, she noted the differences between the three BCBSI contracts. The second BCBSI contract instituted uniform price increases across all services, but the third contract had different price increases for each of the ten included services. Finally, she examined the relevant Payor B contracts. She first noted that Dranove's analysis of the contracts only identified price increases within contracts; that is, he reported on the effects of escalator clauses, which are usually uniform and apply across services. She then noted that she actually "looked at what happened when contracts were renewed . . . . [T]he patterns were, as varied as they are, for the ENH contracts." Id. 89:9-13. Based on these three examples and her overall examination of MCO [83] contracts, Noether testified that "by focusing exclusively on within contract price changes, Dr. Dranove was unable to find the fairly widespread variation in price changes when contracts were renewed and therefore his conclusion that a use of average in his [DID] methodology is . . . not correct." Id. 89:21-90:1.

Noether also testified about the viability of Dranove's control DID analysis, focusing on his analysis of BCBSI's purported injury. She testified that she performed her own analysis to test the reliability of his control group, whereby she "did a simple switch of each hospital in the control group with ENH . . . . to see what [Dranove's] model would do if [she] pretended that one of his control group hospitals was the hospital of interest." Id. 90:14-18. Her analysis indicated that of the 21 control hospitals, for inpatient services, 17 of them had overcharges in at least one year during the relevant time period and that 9 had overcharges in at least as many years as ENH did. Id. 92:10-18. She testified that the results were similar for outpatient services and that such results cast "great suspicion on [Dranove's] model because . . . it's suggesting that these . . . control [84] group hospitals in fact also had market power and [were] . . . overcharging." Id. 92:21-24. She testified that his model generated a lot of "false-positives," which occur when a test "indicates that something of interest has happened even when it really hasn't." Id. 93:21-22. Noether concluded that Dranove's control group is "inadequate" because it "isn't really measuring what it was supposed to be measuring." Id. 99:10-12.

ii. Dranove's Testimony

Dranove offered two rebuttal points. First, he testified that he "did, in fact, look at both within contract changes and changes across contracts." Id. 103:24-25. He stated that two of the three contracts highlighted by Noether help prove his thesis that, on the whole, ENH increased prices at uniform rates across services. For the Payor A contract, he pointed out that the prices of the eight non-cardiac services in the contract increased at a uniform rate of 6.1%. For the Payor B contract, he noted that the first renegotiation produced a uniform price increase across all services. More generally, he testified that across the contracts he examined, there was "at least a 75 percent commonality in price increase across the elements. So at least [85] 75 percent of the services had exactly the same price increase." Id. 105:8-12. He noted that for several MCOs, the percent of common price increases was even higher than 75.

Dranove further testified his control group is valid. He stated that Noether's analysis and argument regarding his control group would allow her to conclude that all published research using DID analysis is wrong, "which suggests that either the entire field has got it wrong or there's something wrong with what Dr. Noether has done that requires a little further inquiry." Id. 106:4-8. He reiterated the purpose of DID analysis: to compare the pricing at ENH against the [*83] average pricing of a large control group. Each of the hospitals in the control group is supposed to provide "some representation of what would have happened [at ENH] but for the merger." Id. 106:12-13. He testified that "naturally in a group of 20 hospitals, they're not all going to have exactly the same price increase . . . . [P]rices tend to increase by different amounts at different hospitals. And naturally, one of those hospitals is going to have the biggest increase versus the other 19." Id. 106:17-23.

He testified that Noether's analysis proved [86] only that "in a group of 20, some hospitals grew faster than average and others grew less fast[]." Id. 107:2-3. He criticized Noether of engaging in "ex-post data picking," stating that "if [she] want[ed] to single out [a hospital] for testing, [she] better have a reason before [she] looked at the data to do that. [Noether] offered no such reason." Id. 107:6, 16-19. He explained that his control group is "calibrated to match the economic environment that ENH was facing." Id. 109:12-13. As a final point, he stated that "DID analysis is a very, very commonly used methodology," and that "[t]he notion that DID methodology is unreliable would be surprising to someone in mainstream economics who uses this as a matter of course." Id. 111:2-3, 9-11.

e. Noether's Supplemental Report

On March 4, 2010, ENH submitted a supplemental report prepared by Noether supporting her testimony that variable price increases were common at ENH. Subsequent to oral argument, Noether completed an analysis of price changes across contracts, which led her to conclude that "[i]n every instance during the class period where a contract between ENH and a MCO was renegotiated, a majority of the price changed at a non-uniform [87] rate." Supplemental Report of Monica Noether, March 4, 2010, at 2 (hereinafter "Noether Supp. Rep."). Her report states that Dranove's contract analysis focused almost exclusively on price changes within contracts, "effectively ignoring nearly all instances of contract renegotiations . . . . [and] exaggerat[ing] substantially the extent of uniformity of price changes over the class period." Id.

Noether examined the same contracts that Dranove examined in his Appendix D and determined that during the class period, 56 contract renegotiations took place. In her report, she performs an analysis of the prices contained in the relevant contracts before and after each renegotiation. For each renegotiation, she identifies the services that were included in both the old and new contracts ("comparable services") and then calculates the corresponding percentage change in price for each comparable service. She next calculates the percentage of services with prices that changed at a uniform rate and, for each contract, reports her results in a table. [30] Her results indicate that "in 55 of the 56 renegotiations[,] prices change non-uniformly," the lone exception being the 2004-2005 BCBSI contract [88] highlighted at oral argument. Id. at 3-4.

Her report highlights the 2005 Payor B contract, which both she and Dranove address in their reports. See Noether Rep. at 16; Dranove Reply Rep. at 11. Dranove's analysis indicates that prices for 92 of the 93 inpatient services increased at a uniform rate; however, Noether states that his analysis fails to analyze the change between the prices in the 2005 contract and the prices in the previous contracts [89] and instead focuses solely on price changes within contracts. Noether performs this analysis, which indicates that "prices changed a very non-uniform rates between the previous contract and the contract that Dranove analyzed, with many prices declining." Noether Supp. Rep. at 5. Indeed, her comparison of the 2002 [*84] Payor B HMO contract and the 2005 Payor B contract indicates that the 11 comparable inpatient services each increased at a unique rate. Id. at Table 8a. Her comparison of the 2002 Payor B POS contract and the 2005 Payor B contract indicates that the 9 comparable inpatient services also each increased at a unique rate. Id. at Table 8b.

Noether's report also highlights the 2000 and 2002 Payor A contracts, which she addressed at oral argument. The report indicates that of the 18 comparable services, the prices for 10 of them increased at non-uniform rates; this stands in contrast to Dranove's conclusion that all prices increased as a uniform rate. See supra at 40-41, Dranove Reply Rep. at Appendix D. It further states that the percentage of uniform changes across these two contracts was 44.4%. Her Payor A chart is replicated below:

[30] Noether excluded from her analysis services that were priced using discount-off or case rate pricing, classifying these services as having non-uniform price increases. See Noether Supp. Rep. at 9 ("[E]ven if the discount or base rate changes uniformly . . . the price . . . does not change uniformly because changes in DRG weights and charges are not uniform."). She also excluded services that were subject to different pricing methodologies in the new and old contracts, classifying such services as having non-uniform price increases as well. See id. ("[I]t is completely reasonable to assume that these price changes are non-uniform, since it would be completely fortuitous if changing methodologies led to uniform increases across services.").

Based [90] on her findings, Noether concludes that Dranove's analysis could not have looked at changes across contracts, but rather, only at changes within contracts. She is able to find only two examples of changes across contracts within his analysis and claims that both examples are deficient: "One of these examples is well outside of the relevant class period, and is for a very minor payor . . . . [while] [t]he other example is for PHCS, which is exclusively a [TPA], which as Plaintiffs now acknowledge, cannot be a member of the class." Id. at 6. Accordingly, she concludes that Dranove's analysis "does not contain any example of price changes between contracts for any class member" and that, as a result, it grossly exaggerates the number of uniform price increases within the relevant contracts. Id.

f. Common Impact Analysis

In the antitrust context, "impact is often critically important for the purpose of evaluating Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement because it is an element of the claim that may call for individual, as opposed to common, proof." Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311 (citing, inter alia, Bell Atl. Corp. v. AT&T Corp., 339 F.3d 294, 302 (5th Cir. 2003)). Here, plaintiffs [91] argue that Dranove's proposed method for proving impact -- a combination of his conclusions about contract structure and his proposed DID analysis -- can establish classwide impact by using evidence [*85] common to the class. The viability of his method turns on four issues: (1) whether Dranove's control group is reliable; (2) whether ENH increased prices at a uniform rate across services; (3) whether the data needed to perform Dranove's analysis exists; and (4) whether Dranove's method can identify and exclude class members that were not impacted.

i. Dranove's Control Group

ENH argues that Dranove's method is flawed because, inter alia, his control group is unreliable. As support, ENH relies on the analysis in Noether's report and on her testimony, both of which indicate that the majority of the hospitals in Dranove's control group had overcharges during the relevant time period. ENH argues that these "false-positives" prove that Dranove's control group is unreliable. Plaintiffs rely on Dranove's responsive testimony that Noether's analysis and accompanying arguments, if accepted, would invalidate the majority of published DID analysis. Specifically, they rely on his testimony that, within [92] every control group, there will be hospitals that grow at a faster rate than others. He testified that this fact does not undermine the validity of a control group, which is designed to generate an average growth rate.

The court finds Dranove's responsive testimony persuasive. The control group exists to provide a measure of the average growth rate of prices at hospitals similar to ENH. The fact that prices at a large number of Dranove's control hospitals grew at a rapid rate may have the effect of increasing the average growth rate, but it does not invalidate the average.

Noether's analysis and ENH's corresponding argument rest on an assumption that the control hospitals must be virtually identical to ENH. See Noether Rep. at 25 (stating that the control group must be "identical to the merging facilities in all dimensions that affect prices both before and after the merger"). This assumption, however, is inconsistent with the purpose and design of DID analysis. At the most basic level, DID analysis is a comparison of averages -- the average prices at ENH are compared with the average prices hospitals similar to ENH. If DID analysis required control hospitals to be identical to ENH, [93] it would not make sense to have more than one hospital in the control group, as they would all provide the exact same data. Of course, the court acknowledges that the control group must be composed of hospitals sufficiently similar to ENH. Because the court is satisfied that here, Dranove's five exclusion criteria and test for robustness are able to identify such hospitals, it finds his control group to be valid and reliable.

Finally, to the extent Noether's analysis and supporting testimony attacks the soundness of DID analysis as a statistical method, the court finds it to be incredible. DID analysis is a respected statistical regression model that, in the current context, will provide a reliable estimate of the difference (if any) between the average price increases at a treatment hospital and the average price increases at a control hospital. Nevertheless, as discussed below, the court cannot rely on DID analysis to prove classwide impact in the instant case, as neither Dranove nor plaintiffs have demonstrated that an increase in average prices at ENH is also a reliable estimate of the price increases (if any) that each individual class member faced.

ii. Price Increases at ENH

Dranove's [94] method of proving classwide impact -- a combination of his conclusions about contract structure and DID analysis -- rests on an assumption that ENH increased prices at a uniform rate across services. See Dranove Reply Rep. at 50 ("[Dranove] [is] not claiming that there is common impact solely because prices . . . increased on average as a result of ENH's merger . . . . Instead, the compelling evidence of common impact stems from [his] separate analyses of contracts between ENH and insurers."). The parties agree that the viability of his method depends on this assumption, however, they disagree as to its correctness. Plaintiffs argue that ENH did increase prices at a uniform rate across services, relying on the contract analysis in Appendix D of Dranove's reply report as evidence of this fact. Dranove testified that his analysis shows that for each contract, at least 75% of the prices increased [*86] at a uniform rate. He further testified that this conclusion was with respect to changes within contracts and across contracts.

By contrast, ENH argues that the majority of ENH's price increases were non-uniform. It relies on Noether's testimony and supplemental report, which both claim that Dranove's [95] analysis focuses only on price changes within contracts rather than changes across contracts, to discredit Dranove's analysis. Noether testified that ENH had the opportunity to exercise market power not within a contract period, but only at the time of renegotiation. She further testified that any price increases within a contract were not due to an exercise of market power, but rather were the result of escalator clauses. As a result, she testified that Dranove's analysis, which focuses on within-contract price changes, greatly exaggerates the frequency of uniform price increases. Noether's supplemental report corroborates her testimony; it indicates that across contracts, the majority of price increases were non-uniform.

HN17[] "Resolving expert disputes to determine whether a class certification requirement has been met is always a task for the court -- no matter whether a dispute might appear to implicate the 'credibility' of one or more experts, a matter resembling those usually reserved for a trier of fact." Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 324; see also *Reed, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89576, 2009 WL 3146999, at * 21* (rejecting plaintiffs' argument that "the battle of the experts is strictly for the jury.") (internal [96] quotation marks omitted). While both Dranove's Appendix D and Noether's supplemental report rely on assumptions that are, in the court's opinion, of questionable validity, [31] both reports evaluated the prices of the same 18 services within the 2002 Payor A contract, a contract that the court also had the opportunity to review.

Dranove's analysis indicates [97] that between the years 2001 and 2002, the Payor A contract listed 18 prices, all of which increased at the same rate. It further indicates that between the years 2002 and 2003, each of these 18 prices again increased at a uniform rate. By contrast, Noether's analysis indicates that on September 22, 2002, a new contract went into effect and, as a result, 10 of the 18 prices increased at variable rates. The court's own examination of the contract indicates that of the 18 prices listed in the renegotiated September 22, 2002 contract, 6 increased at a uniform rate, 9 increased at variable rates, and 3 changed pricing methodologies from the previous contract, making it difficult to draw a comparison.

Despite the weaknesses of Noether's presentation in other respects, Noether's analysis here does cast doubt on Dranove's representation that his contract analysis encompassed both within and across contract price changes. If he had examined both within and across contract price changes, he could not have reported a 100% uniform price increase across all 18 services between 2002 and 2003. Indeed, even a cursory examination of the 2000 Payor A contract and the September 22, 2002 Payor A contract [98] makes clear that the prices of some services changed at a variable rate. This fact, coupled with the assertions in Noether's supplemental report, suggest to the court that Dranove's analysis focused primarily on price changes within contracts -- changes that are usually attributable to escalator clauses. Indeed, both the old and the new Payor A contracts contained escalator clauses, which increased prices by a certain percentage each year the contracts were in effect. Accordingly, the court cannot accept Dranove's contract analysis contained in Appendix D as credible evidence that ENH increased prices [*87] across contracts at uniform rates across services.

[31] For example, Dranove's Appendix D "excludes contracts that restructure payment categories from prior contracts." Dranove Reply Rep. at 6. While the court understands his point with respect to restructuring, it is not convinced that every variable price increase was due to restructuring such that it should have been excluded from the analysis. Additionally, Noether's supplemental report classifies services that were subject to (1) case rate pricing, (2) discount-off pricing, and (3) different pricing methodologies across contracts as being subject to non-uniform price increases because they are not capable of comparison. See Noether Supp. Rep. at 9. The court is not convinced that no reliable comparison can be drawn between these services such that an automatic classification as being subject to non-uniform price increases is warranted.

The court acknowledges that in his reply report, Dranove presents a method for adjusting DID analysis to accommodate variable price increases. Dranove outlines a two-step approach: (1) calculate the average percentage increase (or decrease) across all variably priced services and (2) calculate how much of a service's new price (if any) was the result of this average increase. He acknowledges, however, that this calculation rests on an assumption that any price increase due to the merger was distributed evenly across services, which is [99] borne out of an assumption that ENH increased prices at uniform rates across services. See Dranove Reply Rep. at 23 ("[A] uniform increase is not the exception but rather the rule . . . . [T]his is compelling evidence that a price change that is due to the merger would be distributed uniformly over all service categories."). Because plaintiffs have not put forth credible evidence to validate these assumptions, the court does not find this two-step approach to be a reliable method of proving classwide impact in those instances where ENH increased prices at a variable rate.

CONCLUSION AND ORDER

For the reasons discussed above, plaintiffs' motion for class certification [# 240] is denied. Plaintiffs' motion to strike the report of Dr. Monica Noether [# 317] and ENH's motion to strike the reply report of Dr. David Dranove [# 321] are also denied [32] Because plaintiffs have not shown that ENH increased prices at a uniform rate across services, the court need not consider the parties' arguments with respect to the two remaining issues. Furthermore, because plaintiffs fail to establish predominance, the court need not undertake an analysis of whether they have satisfied superiority, the second requirement of Rule 23(b)(3).

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Dismissal is appropriate under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) when a plaintiff's allegations fail to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. In ruling on a motion to dismiss, the court must accept all material allegations of fact as true and construe the complaint in a light most favorable to the non-moving party. Courts are not, however, bound to accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A complaint must contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2), in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. A Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) dismissal can be based on the lack of a cognizable legal theory or the absence of sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory. To survive a motion to dismiss, a plaintiff must plead enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Plausibility does not equate to probability, but it requires more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. Dismissal of claims that fail to meet this standard should be with leave to amend unless it is clear that amendment could not possibly cure the complaint's deficiencies.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(3) governs a motion to dismiss for improper venue. When resolving motions to dismiss based on a forum selection clause, the pleadings are not accepted as true, as would be required under a Rule 12(b)(6) analysis. To the contrary, it is consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court standard for resolving forum selection clause cases for the district court to consider facts outside of the pleadings.

The so-called "Holder Rule" was adopted by the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) in 1975 to stem the unfair practice of separating the buyer's duty to pay for goods or services from the seller's reciprocal duty to perform as promised in the financing of consumer sales. 40 Fed. Reg. 53,522 (Nov. 18, 1975). The Holder Rule makes it an unfair or deceptive act or practice under § 5 of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 45, for a seller, directly or indirectly, to: (a) take or receive a consumer credit contract which fails to contain the Holder Notice; or (b) accept, as full or partial payment for such sale or lease, the proceeds of any purchase money loan (as purchase money loan is defined herein), unless any consumer credit contract made in connection with such purchase money loan contains the Holder Notice. 16 C.F.R. § 433.2. The Holder Notice must be written in at least ten point, bold face, type and read as follows: ANY HOLDER OF THIS CONSUMER CREDIT CONTRACT IS SUBJECT TO ALL CLAIMS AND DEFENSES WHICH THE DEBTOR COULD ASSERT AGAINST THE SELLER OF GOODS OR SERVICES OBTAINED [PURSUANT HERETO OR] WITH THE PROCEEDS HEREOF. RECOVERY HEREUNDER BY THE DEBTOR SHALL NOT EXCEED AMOUNTS PAID BY THE DEBTOR HEREUNDER.

The onus is placed on the seller to ensure the inclusion of the Holder Rule notice under 16 C.F.R. § 433.2 in consumer credit contracts, either by refusing a contract that omits the notice, or by refusing proceeds of a loan made pursuant to such a contract. When the Holder Notice appears in a consumer credit contract, a debtor can assert the same defenses against his lender as he could against the seller. For example, if a used car dealer who fraudulently sells a lemon also arranges the buyer's financing through a bank, the buyer may rely on the dealer's fraud as a defense against repaying the bank loan. No private right of action exists to enforce the Holder Rule, violations of which can only be pursued by the Federal Trade Commission. 15 U.S.C.S. § 45(a)(2).

For purposes of the Holder Rule under 16 C.F.R. § 433.2, a "seller" is a person who, in the ordinary course of business, sells or leases goods or services to consumers, 16 C.F.R. § 433.1(j), and a "consumer credit contract" is any instrument which evidences or embodies a debt arising from a Purchase Money Loan transaction or a financed sale as defined in § 433.1(d) and (e). 16 C.F.R. § 433.1(i). A "purchase money loan" is a cash advance which is received by a consumer in return for a Finance Charge within the meaning of the Truth in Lending Act and Regulation Z, which is applied, in whole or substantial part, to a purchase of goods or services from a seller who (1) refers consumers to the creditor or (2) is affiliated with the creditor by common control, contract, or business arrangement. 16 C.F.R. § 433.1(d). "Financing a sale" means extending credit to a consumer in connection with a Credit Sale within the meaning of the Truth in Lending Act and Regulation Z. 16 C.F.R. § 433.1(e).

The California Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., characterizes any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice as "unfair competition." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. The UCL's coverage is sweeping, embracing anything that can properly be called a business practice and that at the same time is forbidden by law. The UCL allows civil actions for injunctions to be brought by any person who has suffered injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204, against any person who engages, has engaged, or proposes to engage in unfair competition, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17203. Available relief may include orders necessary to restore to any person in interest any money or property acquired by means of such unfair competition. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17203. Since Cal. Bus. & Prof.

Code § 17200 is written in the disjunctive, it establishes three varieties of unfair competition--acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent.

Although a seller violates the Holder Rule by taking a consumer credit contract--or by accepting proceeds of a purchase money loan made pursuant to a contract--that omits the notice, the same cannot be said of a lender or creditor.

HN12[] Trade Practices & Unfair Competition, Federal Trade Commission Act

Recognizing the difficulty of determining whether the challenged conduct is unfair within the meaning of the California Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., the California Supreme Court devised a more precise test to avoid reliance on purely subjective notions of fairness. The California Supreme Court drew guidance from § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 45(a), based on the similarity of language and obvious identity of purpose between that statute and the UCL. Requiring that any finding of unfairness to competitors under § 17200 be tethered to some legislatively declared policy or proof of some actual or threatened impact on competition, the California Supreme Court found conduct to be "unfair" if it threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition. In a footnote, however, the California Supreme Court limited the application of its test to actions by a competitor alleging anticompetitive practices. Its newly articulated standard expressly did not relate to actions by consumers or by competitors alleging other kinds of violations of the unfair competition law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > State Regulation > Scope

HN13[] Trade Practices & Unfair Competition, State Regulation

The California Supreme Court's decision in Cel-Tech has produced confusion among the California appellate courts over whether the clarified definition of "unfair" is properly applied to consumer cases. Since the test Cel-Tech prescribed was, by the California Supreme Court's own admission, not intended for consumer actions, the natural question was what test to apply in such cases under the Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq. To resolve the conflict, the Second Appellate Division turned to § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 45, which the California Supreme Court had identified in Cel-Tech as a source of guidance for interpreting the UCL--and adopted its three-factor test for determining unfairness. For conduct to be unfair under the UCL: (1) the consumer injury must be substantial; (2) the injury must not be outweighed by any countervailing benefits to consumers or competition; and (3) it must be an injury that consumers themselves could not reasonably have avoided. The California Court of Appeal has continued to endorse that standard since its first articulation in Camacho.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > State Regulation > Claims

HN14[] State Regulation, Claims

The fraudulent business practice prong of the California Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq. has been understood to be distinct from common law fraud. A UCL claim need not plead the elements of common law fraudulent deception, which must be actually false, known to be false by the perpetrator and reasonably relied upon by a victim who incurs damages. What does need to be pled is the existence of a duty to disclose. Absent a duty to disclose, the failure to do so does not support a claim under the fraudulent prong of the UCL. There are four circumstances under which nondisclosure or concealment may constitute actionable fraud: (1) when the defendant is in a fiduciary relationship with the plaintiff; (2) when the defendant had exclusive knowledge of material facts not known to the plaintiff; (3) when the defendant actively conceals a material fact from the plaintiff; and (4) when the defendant makes partial representations but also suppresses some material facts. Under the last three circumstances that may constitute fraud, some relationship must exist between the parties to give rise to a duty to disclose such known facts. Such a relationship can only come into being as a result of some sort of transaction between the parties.

HN16[] State Law, Federal Preemption

Congress enacted the National Bank Act (NBA), 12 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., in 1864, establishing the system of national banking still in place today. The NBA vested in nationally chartered banks enumerated powers and all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking. 12 U.S.C.S. § 24 (Seventh). The U.S. Supreme Court has, in the years since the NBA's enactment, repeatedly made clear that federal control shields national banking from unduly burdensome and duplicative state regulation. While states are permitted to regulate the activities of national banks where doing so does not prevent or significantly interfere with the national bank's or the national bank regulator's exercise of its powers, state regulations must give way when state prescriptions significantly impair the exercise of authority, enumerated or incidental under the NBA. Among their incidental powers, national banks are charged with discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt. 12 U.S.C.S. § 24 (Seventh).

HN17[] Federal Acts, National Bank Act

If a plaintiff's state law claims would significantly impair a national bank's exercise of its enumerated or incidental powers under the National Bank Act, 12 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., state law must give way to federal law because the Supremacy Clause enshrines the Constitution, and the Laws of the United States, as the supreme Law of the Land. U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. In determining whether a state statute is pre-empted by federal law and therefore invalid under the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution, the court's sole task is to ascertain the intent of Congress. If Congress, in enacting a federal statute, intended to exercise its constitutionally delegated authority to set aside the laws of a state, then the Supremacy Clause requires courts to follow federal, not state, law.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN18[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

State law can be preempted by federal law in three contexts: where (1) Congress enacts a statute that explicitly preempts state law; (2) state law actually conflicts with federal law; or (3) federal law occupies a legislative field to such an extent that it is reasonable to conclude that Congress left no room for state regulation in that field. For purposes of conflict preemption, the court considers whether federal and state law are in irreconcilable conflict. Such a conflict may arise where compliance with both statutes is a physical impossibility or where the state law stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress.

The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency (OCC), as the agency charged by Congress with supervision of the National Bank Act (NBA), 12 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., oversees the operations of national banks and their interactions with customers. In its regulations, the OCC attempts to delineate the boundaries of NBA preemption. State laws that obstruct, impair, or condition a national bank's ability to fully exercise its Federally authorized non-real estate lending powers are not applicable to national banks. 12 C.F.R. § 7.4008(d)(1). Specifically, a national bank may make non-real estate loans without regard to state law limitations concerning the terms of credit, including the schedule for repayment of principal and interest, payments due, minimum payments, or terms to maturity of the loan. 12 C.F.R. § 7.4008(d)(2)(iv). However, the regulations are explicit that state laws governing contracts, torts, and criminal activity are not preempted, nor are state laws whose effects are incidental to the non-real estate lending operations of national banks. 12 C.F.R. § 7.4008(e). National banks are expressly barred from engaging in unfair or deceptive practices within the meaning of § 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 45. 12 C.F.R. § 7.4008(c).

[*944] ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO DISMISS THIRD AMENDED COMPLAINT

This matter came before the Court on March 29, 2010, on the motion to dismiss filed by Defendants KeyBank, National Association and Great Lakes Educational Loan Services, Inc. For the reasons set forth below, the motion is GRANTED.

BACKGROUND

Plaintiffs and putative class representatives Matthew C. Kilgore and William Bruce Fuller ("Plaintiffs") are California residents who enrolled in a helicopter flight academy operated in Oakland, California by Silver State Helicopters, LLC ("Silver State"). The Third Amended Complaint alleges that Plaintiffs -- and the class of student loan borrowers they seek to represent -- paid Silver State nearly $ 60,000 in tuition to be trained as commercial helicopter pilots, but failed to complete the educational program before Silver State filed for bankruptcy on February [3] 4, 2008. Plaintiffs financed their tuition by obtaining student loans from KeyBank, National Association and its education lending division, Key Education Resources (collectively "KeyBank"). Plaintiffs allege that KeyBank defied its own risk management policies to partner with Silver State, ignoring red flags -- including the school's recent founding, deficient credentials, and poor student placement rates -- that should have signaled Silver State's risk of failure.

Plaintiffs now seek to enjoin KeyBank and Great Lakes Educational Loan Services, Inc. ("Great Lakes") -- which services their loans -- from collecting the loans or reporting the loan balances to credit reporting agencies.

Plaintiffs instituted this putative class action in Alameda County Superior Court on May 12, 2008, against KeyBank and Great Lakes. Student Loan Xpress, Inc. ("SLX") and American Education Services ("AES") -- which allegedly made and serviced loans to Silver State students -- were added as defendants in a First Amended Complaint filed four days later. After Plaintiffs filed a Second Amended Complaint ("SAC"), KeyBank removed the action to federal court, and a settlement with SLX led to its and AES's dismissal [4] on October 27, 2009.

After an unsuccessful mediation, KeyBank and Great Lakes (collectively "Defendants") responded to the SAC on April 24, 2009 by moving to dismiss and to compel arbitration. The Court denied the motion to compel arbitration on July 8, 2009 -- a ruling Defendants have appealed to the Ninth Circuit -- and continued the motion to dismiss. On August 17, 2009, this matter was stayed except for document discovery and the motion to dismiss. Defendants filed a new motion to dismiss on October 5, 2009, in response to which Plaintiffs amended the complaint. Defendants moved to dismiss the Third Amended Complaint ("TAC") pursuant to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) and 12(b)(3) on January 11, 2010. Plaintiffs opposed the motion.

LEGAL STANDARD

HN1[] Dismissal is appropriate under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) when a plaintiff's allegations fail "to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." In ruling on a motion to dismiss, the Court must "accept all material allegations of fact as true and construe the complaint in a light most favorable to the non-moving party." Vasquez v. L.A. County, 487 F.3d 1246, 1249 (9th Cir. 2007). Courts are not, however, "bound to [5] accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation." [*945] Ashcroft v. Iqbal, ___ U.S. ___, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949-50, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009).

HN2[] A complaint must contain "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief," Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2), in order to "'give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'" Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (quoting Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957)). A Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal "can be based on the lack of a cognizable legal theory or the absence of sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory." Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). To survive a motion to dismiss, a plaintiff must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. Plausibility does not equate to probability, but it requires "more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949. "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for [6] the misconduct alleged." Id. Dismissal of claims that fail to meet this standard should be with leave to amend unless it is clear that amendment could not possibly cure the complaint's deficiencies. Steckman v. Hart Brewing, Inc., 143 F.3d 1293, 1296 (9th Cir. 1998).

HN3[] Rule 12(b)(3) governs a motion to dismiss for improper venue. When "resolving motions to dismiss based on a forum selection clause, the pleadings are not accepted as true, as would be required under a Rule 12(b)(6) analysis." Argueta v. Banco Mexicano, S.A., 87 F.3d 320, 324 (9th Cir. 1996). To the contrary, it "is consistent with the Supreme Court standard for resolving forum selection clause cases" for "the district court to consider facts outside of the pleadings." Id.

DISCUSSION

Plaintiffs bring six causes of actions under California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. The claims are all premised on the Federal Trade Commission's "Holder Rule," 16 C.F.R. § 433.2, which "requires purchase money loan agreements (loans supplying money for the purchase of goods or services) arranged by sellers to contain a notice to all loan holders that preserves the borrower's ability to raise claims and defenses [7] against the lender arising from the seller's misconduct." Armstrong v. Accrediting Council for Continuing Educ. & Training, Inc., 168 F.3d 1362, 1365, 335 U.S. App. D.C. 62 (D.C. Cir. 1999). Defendants argue that all six of Plaintiffs' causes of action fail to state a claim for relief, and are preempted by the National Bank Act. They also urge the Court to dismiss pursuant to a forum selection clause that calls for an Ohio venue, and argue that Plaintiffs' claims are barred by the economic loss doctrine.

The Court begins by examining the Holder Rule and determining whether any of Plaintiffs' six causes of action state plausible claims for relief under the Rule 12(b)(6) standard. For any claims that overcome that hurdle, the Court will then assess whether they must nevertheless be dismissed due to federal preemption. Since the Court finds that all of Plaintiffs' causes of action falter at one of those two steps, it is unnecessary to address KeyBank's other arguments. [1]

[*946] I. Plaintiffs' Claims Under the [8] Holder Rule and California's Unfair Competition Law

HN4[] The so-called "Holder Rule" was adopted by the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") in 1975 to stem the "unfair practice" of separating "the buyer's duty to pay for goods or services from the seller's reciprocal duty to perform as promised" in the financing of consumer sales. 40 Fed. Reg. 53,522 (Nov. 18, 1975). The Rule makes it an "unfair or deceptive act or practice" under section 5 of the FTC Act "for a seller, directly or indirectly, to":

> (a) Take or receive a consumer credit contract which fails to contain the [Holder Notice], or,
> (b) Accept, as full or partial payment for such sale or lease, the proceeds of any purchase money loan (as purchase money loan is defined herein), unless any consumer credit contract made in connection with such purchase money loan contains the [Holder Notice].

16 C.F.R. § 433.2. [2] The "Holder Notice" must be written "in at least ten point, bold face, type" and read as follows:

> ANY HOLDER OF THIS CONSUMER CREDIT CONTRACT IS SUBJECT TO ALL CLAIMS AND DEFENSES WHICH THE DEBTOR COULD ASSERT AGAINST THE SELLER OF GOODS OR SERVICES OBTAINED [PURSUANT HERETO OR] WITH THE PROCEEDS HEREOF. RECOVERY HEREUNDER BY THE [9] DEBTOR SHALL NOT EXCEED AMOUNTS PAID BY THE DEBTOR HEREUNDER. [3]

Id. HN5[] The onus is therefore placed on the seller to ensure the Holder Notice's inclusion in consumer credit contracts, either by refusing a contract that omits the Notice, or by refusing proceeds of a loan made pursuant to such a contract. [4] When the Holder Notice appears in a consumer credit contract, a debtor can assert the same

[1] Defendants also argue that Great Lakes must be dismissed because Plaintiffs fail to allege any facts concerning it. The Court need not address this argument as all claims are to be dismissed on other grounds.

[2] HN6[] A "seller" is a "person who, in the ordinary course of business, sells or leases goods or services to consumers," 16 C.F.R. § 433.1(j), and a "consumer credit contract" is any "instrument which evidences or embodies a debt arising from a 'Purchase Money Loan' transaction or a 'financed sale' as defined in paragraphs (d) and (e) of this section," id. § 433.1(i). A "purchase money loan" is a "cash advance which is received by a consumer in return for a 'Finance Charge' within the meaning of the Truth in Lending Act and Regulation Z, which is applied, in whole or substantial part, to a purchase of goods or services from a seller who (1) refers consumers to the creditor or (2) is affiliated with the creditor by common control, contract, or business arrangement." Id. § 433.1(d). "Financing a sale" means "[e]xtending credit to a consumer in connection with a 'Credit Sale' within the meaning of the Truth in Lending Act and Regulation Z." Id. § 433.1(e).

[3] The bracketed language -- "pursuant hereto or" -- appears only in the Holder Notice required by 16 C.F.R. § 433.2(a), but not in § 433.2(b). Aside from that difference, the language required by [11] subsections (a) and (b) is identical.

[4] On the same day the Holder Rule was officially promulgated, the FTC also proposed an amendment that would have applied the rule to lenders, as well. See Heastie v. Cmty. Bank of Greater Peoria, 727 F. Supp. 1133, 1137 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (reviewing history of amendment). However, the proposed amendment was never adopted.

defenses against his lender as he could against the seller. "For example, if a used car dealer who fraudulently sells a lemon also arranges the buyer's financing through a bank, the buyer may rely on the dealer's fraud as a defense against repaying the bank loan." Armstrong, 168 F.3d at 1365. No private right of action exists to enforce the Holder Rule, violations of which can only be pursued by the FTC. See 15 U.S.C. § 45(a)(2) (section 5 of the FTC Act, empowering the FTC "to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations . . . from using unfair methods of competition [*947] in or affecting commerce and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in or affecting commerce"); Holloway v. Bristol-Myers Corp., 485 F.2d 986, 987, 158 U.S. App. D.C. 207 (D.C. Cir. 1973) ("[P]rivate actions to vindicate rights asserted under the Federal [10] Trade Commission Act may not be maintained.").

Plaintiffs allege that they and every member of the proposed class executed a "service contract" with Silver State, in which the school "agreed to provide specific education and training for each student to become a commercial helicopter pilot within a specified period of time." TAC P 9. Class members financed all or part of Silver State's nearly $ 60,000 per-student tuition by executing promissory notes with KeyBank. Silver State filed for bankruptcy and shuttered before any of them had completed their promised training, but after KeyBank had disbursed their loans in their entirety. Plaintiffs contend that the service contracts and the promissory notes are both "consumer credit contracts" under the Holder Rule, and that Silver State was a "seller" required to comply with the Rule. However, neither the service contracts nor the promissory [12] notes included the Holder Notice, an omission that underlies this action.

As the Holder Rule provides no private right of action, Plaintiffs bring their claims under HN7[] the UCL, which characterizes "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice" as "unfair competition." Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. The statute's coverage is "sweeping, embracing 'anything that can properly be called a business practice and that at the same time is forbidden by law.'" Rubin v. Green, 4 Cal. 4th 1187, 1200, 17 Cal. Rptr. 2d 828, 847 P.2d 1044 (1993) (quoting Barquis v. Merchants Collection Assn., 7 Cal. 3d 94, 113, 101 Cal. Rptr. 745, 496 P.2d 817 (1972)). The UCL allows civil actions for injunctions to be brought by any "person who has suffered injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition," Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204, against "[a]ny person who engages, has engaged, or proposes to engage in unfair competition," id. § 17203. Available relief "may include orders necessary 'to restore to any person in interest any money or property … acquired by means of such unfair competition.'" Wells v. One2One Learning Found., 39 Cal. 4th 1164, 1189, 48 Cal. Rptr. 3d 108, 141 P.3d 225 (2006) (quoting Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17203).

Since section 17200 is "written in [13] the disjunctive," it "establishes three varieties of unfair competition -- acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent." Podolsky v. First Healthcare Corp., 50 Cal. App. 4th 632, 647, 58 Cal. Rptr. 2d 89 (1996). Plaintiffs bring claims under each of the prongs. They claim that KeyBank directly violated both parts of the Holder Rule by omitting the Holder Notice from their promissory notes (Claims 1 and 2), and that it is also liable for aiding and abetting Silver State's violation of the Rule (Claims 3 and 4). Plaintiffs' last two causes of action invoke the unfair and fraudulent prongs of the UCL. Defendants argue that none of the six causes of action succeed in stating a claim.

A. "Unlawful" Prong: Direct Violation of the Holder Rule

HN8[] "By proscribing 'any unlawful' business practice, section 17200 'borrows' violations of other laws and treats them as unlawful practices that the unfair competition law makes independently actionable." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tele. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999) (internal citations and quotation marks omitted). "Violations of federal as well as state and local law may serve as the predicate for an unlawful practice claim under" section 17200. [14] [*948] Munson v. Del Taco, Inc., 46 Cal. 4th 661, 676, 94 Cal. Rptr. 3d 685, 208 P.3d 623 (2009). Plaintiffs contend that KeyBank breached both parts of the Holder Rule, by "taking" the promissory notes that omitted the Holder Notice, 16 C.F.R. § 433.2(a), and by providing Silver State with purchase money loan proceeds despite that omission from the notes and service contracts, id. § 433.2(b). Defendants respond that KeyBank cannot have directly violated the Holder Rule, which applies only to "sellers."

The Holder Rule has never been subject to close scrutiny by the Ninth Circuit, and other circuits have likewise had little opportunity to explore its scope. As a result, both parties draw support from opinions by federal district and state courts outside the Ninth Circuit, none of which are binding on this Court. Plaintiffs rely on Gonzalez v. Old Kent Mortgage Co., where a court in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania -- after concluding that "contract terms may be implied where public policy so requires" -- read the Holder Notice into a contract that omitted it. *No. 99-5959, 2000 U.S. Dist. Lexis 14530, at 13 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 19, 2000). The court found that "it would turn the law on its head to allow [the defendant mortgage [15] company] to avoid the consequences of [the Holder Notice] by its own failure" to include the notice in its loan documents. Id. However, the Gonzalez court did not acknowledge that the Holder Rule, by its own language, makes only sellers responsible for the inclusion of the notice in contracts. The court also never concluded that the defendant mortgage company's failure to include the notice was unlawful; it only decided to proceed as though the Holder Notice had been included in the loan documents. Gonzalez is therefore not only unpersuasive, but also unsupportive of Plaintiffs' position.

Plaintiffs' other authorities fare no better. The Common Pleas Court of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, recognized that the creditor bank had committed "no violation" of the Holder Rule because "the rule, as presently drafted, places a duty only on the seller to insure that the preservation of defenses provisions is included within the loan agreement." Iron & Glass Bank v. Franz, 9 Pa. D. & C. 3d 419, 427 (Pa. C.P. 1978). Although the court still refused to insulate the creditor "from the seller's wrongdoing," it did so despite its conclusion that no direct violation of the Holder Rule had occurred. [16] Id. Heastie v. Community Bank of Greater Peoria suffers the same infirmity: the court acknowledged that "part 433 does not apply by its terms to lenders," but found that a lender's addition of a non-responsibility provision contrary to the Holder Notice -- which was included in the contract -- could be an unfair or deceptive practice under Illinois' Consumer Fraud Act. 727 F. Supp. 1133, 1138 (N.D. Ill. 1989). Heastie does not demonstrate that KeyBank's conduct was unlawful.

HN9[] The Holder Rule imposes obligations only on the seller. Its language is "explicit in stating the consequences of a failure to include the notice and notably incur a penalty is solely visited upon the seller." *In re Vincent Crisomia, Sr., No. 00-35085DWS, 2001 Bankr. Lexis 1469, at 11 (E.D. Pa. Bankr. 2001). "[T]he clear and unambiguous language contained in the regulation places no liability on the part of a lender for failing to include the term in its loan documents." *Abel v. KeyBank USA, N.A., No. 1:03 CV 524, 2003 U.S. Dist. Lexis 27175, at 26-27 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 24, 2003). Although a seller violates the Holder Rule by taking a consumer credit contract -- or by accepting proceeds of a purchase money loan made [17] pursuant to a contract -- that [*949] omits the notice, the same cannot be said of a lender or creditor. With no obligation to include the Holder Notice in its promissory notes, KeyBank has not contravened any law. KeyBank's actions therefore cannot, by themselves, satisfy the "unlawful" prong of the UCL. These claims are DISMISSED without leave to amend, as Plaintiffs cannot -- as a matter of law -- allege that KeyBank directly violated the Holder Rule.

B. "Unlawful" Prong: Aiding and Abetting Silver State's Violation of the Holder Rule

Plaintiffs' third and fourth claims are also brought under the UCL's "unlawful" prong, but the Holder Rule violation alleged is that of Silver State, with KeyBank's liability premised on aiding and abetting that violation. Defendants contend -- incorrectly -- that California law precludes actions for "aiding and abetting" under section 17200. HN10[] California courts have held only that a section 17200 claim "cannot be predicated on vicarious liability," which is based on an agency relationship. Emery v. Visa Int'l Serv. Ass'n, 95 Cal. App. 4th 952, 960, 116 Cal. Rptr. 2d 25 (2002) (emphasis added). Aiding and abetting a section 17200 violation is actionable and assessed using the same [18] standard for aiding and abetting an intentional tort. Schulz v. Neovi Data Corp., 152 Cal. App. 4th 86, 93, 60 Cal. Rptr. 3d 810 (2007). Liability may be imposed if the defendant "'knows the other's conduct constitutes a breach . . . and gives substantial assistance or encouragement to the other to so act.'" Id. (quoting Fiol v. Doellstedt, 50 Cal. App. 4th 1318, 1325, 58 Cal. Rptr. 2d 308 (1996)).

Plaintiffs allege that Silver State violated both parts of the Holder Rule by receiving the service contracts and accepting the proceeds of KeyBank's loans when neither the service contracts nor the promissory notes included the Holder Notice. See 16 C.F.R. § 433.2(a)-(b). HN11[] Violations of federal regulations may constitute "unlawful" activity under the UCL. Smith v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 135 Cal. App. 4th 1463, 1480, 38 Cal. Rptr. 3d 653 (2005). For KeyBank to be liable on an aiding and abetting theory, it must have not only known about the alleged Holder Rule violations, but also provided substantial assistance or encouragement. First, however, Plaintiffs must have stated a plausible claim that Silver State violated the Holder Rule -- which they do. The TAC alleges that the Plaintiffs' service contracts with Silver State, and their promissory notes with KeyBank, [19] are both "consumer credit contracts" -- defined by regulation as "[a]ny instrument which evidences or embodies a debt arising from a 'Purchase Money Loan' transaction," 16 C.F.R. § 433.1(i) -- and that the Holder Notice was omitted from both. [5] Silver State therefore would have violated the Holder Rule by receiving the service contracts, and by accepting the proceeds of KeyBank's purchase money loans. See id. § 433.2(a)-(b).

[*950] The Court therefore turns its attention to whether KeyBank's conduct, as alleged, meets the standard for aiding and abetting. In Schulz, the California Court of Appeal ruled that a plaintiff had properly pleaded an aiding and abetting claim under section 17200. 152 Cal. App. 4th at 88. The Schulz plaintiff alleged that two defendants aided and abetted an illegal online lottery by performing credit card processing and billing services for its operator. The court found the knowledge requirement satisfied by the allegations that the defendants had "reviewed EZ's Web site and 'recognized that the site was an illegal lottery, but also realized that it generated substantial revenue and could be very profitable for [them].'" Id. at 94. The defendants also provided "substantial assistance or encouragement" by authorizing "EZ to configure its site to display their respective logos so that consumers could link directly to their sites to process credit card payments." Id. The complaint alleged that the defendants realized their [21] participation would not only enable "more persons . . . to participate in the illegal lottery" -- thus increasing their revenue -- but that it would also "lend an aura of respectability and further encourage participation." Id.

Plaintiffs' allegations meet Schulz's threshold for pleading an aiding and abetting claim under the UCL. The TAC alleges that KeyBank was "keenly aware that . . . if it permitted the Holder Rule Notice to be included in the consumer credit transaction documentation, KeyBank would be unable to sell the loans into the secondary market and would necessarily be obligated to return those unused funds to the students if the school closed prior to the students obtaining all of the promised education." TAC P 27. Plaintiffs characterize KeyBank as a sophisticated player, well aware of the Holder Rule and consciously seeking to avoid it. They claim that KeyBank developed strategies to enhance "its ability to aggressively pursue collection of loans made to students scammed by vocational schools," such as "omitting the Holder Rule Notice from its promissory notes" and "ensuring that the contracts between the vocational school partner and its students omitted" the notice. [22] Id. P 25. KeyBank had specific knowledge of Silver State's violations because, according to the TAC, it reviewed and approved exemplar copies of its service contract, and disbursed loans to Silver State despite the omission of the Holder Notice. The knowledge requirement is therefore satisfied.

As for substantial assistance, the TAC alleges that KeyBank was Silver State's "preferred lender," and that "KeyBank's marketing and sales personnel helped create, review, approve and ratify [Silver State's] marketing and sales presentation, at least as it related to KeyBank's Key Alternative Loan program." TAC P 32. Silver State could not have violated section 433.2(b) -- accepting loan funds despite omission of the Holder Notice -- had KeyBank not disbursed the loans. The TAC likewise alleges that KeyBank encouraged the violation of section 433.2(a), by reviewing and approving exemplar copies of the service contract, and ensuring the Holder Rule's omission. TAC PP 25, 49. The pleading establishes substantial assistance or encouragement.

[5] Defendants argued for the first time at hearing that Silver State's service contracts are not consumer credit contracts. At the motion to dismiss stage, the Court finds Plaintiffs' allegation that the service contracts constitute consumer credit contracts to be sufficient without examining the contract to determine whether it "evidences or embodies a debt." 16 C.F.R. § 433.1(i). Defendants also asserted -- for the first time -- that KeyBank's promissory notes are not consumer credit contracts, because education loans above $ 25,000 were exempt from the Truth in Lending Act ("TILA") and Regulation Z at the time Plaintiffs' loans were made. See 15 U.S.C. § 1603(3). The Court agrees with Plaintiffs that the Holder Rule merely borrows the definitions of "finance charge" [20] and "credit sale" from TILA and Regulation Z; it does not import the restrictions to which Defendants refer. See note 2, supra (quoting provisions of OCC regulations).

By alleging that KeyBank knew of and encouraged Silver State's violations of the Holder Rule, Plaintiffs have stated plausible claims for aiding and abetting [23] Silver State's "unlawful" activity under the UCL.

C. "Unfair" Prong

Plaintiffs allege, in their fifth claim, that KeyBank violated the "unfair" prong of the UCL by omitting the Holder Notice from its own promissory notes, by facilitating [*951] Silver State's violation of the Holder Rule, and by partnering with Silver State despite numerous red flags about the school's viability. Defendants argue that KeyBank's conduct cannot satisfy the unfair prong because it did not violate the provisions of any statute, regulation, or case law.

The parties advance different standards for determining what is unfair, a discrepancy arising from conflicting California authority on this question. HN12[] Recognizing the difficulty of determining "whether the challenged conduct is unfair within the meaning of the unfair competition law," the California Supreme Court devised a "more precise test" to avoid reliance on "purely subjective notions of fairness." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tele. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 184-85, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999). The court drew guidance from section 5 of the FTC Act, 15 U.S.C. § 45(a), based on "the similarity of language and obvious identity of purpose" between that statute and the UCL. Cel-Tech, 20 Cal. 4th at 185. [24] Requiring "that any finding of unfairness to competitors under section 17200 be tethered to some legislatively declared policy or proof of some actual or threatened impact on competition," the court found conduct to be "unfair" if it "threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Id. at 186-87. In a footnote, however, the court limited the application of its test to actions "by a competitor alleging anticompetitive practices." Id. at 187 n.12. Its newly articulated standard expressly did not relate "to actions by consumers or by competitors alleging other kinds of violations of the unfair competition law." Id.

HN13[] Cel-Tech has produced confusion among the California appellate courts over whether the clarified definition of "unfair" is properly applied to consumer cases. Compare Gregory v. Albertson's, Inc., 104 Cal. App. 4th 845, 854, 128 Cal. Rptr. 2d 389 (Cal. App. 1st Dist. 2002) (reading Cel-Tech "to require that the public policy which is a predicate to the action must be 'tethered' to specific constitutional, [25] statutory or regulatory provisions" in consumer cases), with Smith v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 93 Cal. App. 4th 700, 720 n.23, 113 Cal. Rptr. 2d 399 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. 2001) ("[W]e are not to read Cel-Tech as suggesting that such a restrictive definition of 'unfair' should be applied in the case of an alleged consumer injury[.]"). Since the test Cel-Tech prescribed was, by the California Supreme Court's own admission, not intended for consumer actions, the natural question was what test to apply in such cases.

To resolve the conflict, the Second Appellate Division turned to section 5 of the FTC Act -- which the California Supreme Court had identified in Cel-Tech as a source of guidance for interpreting the UCL -- and adopted its three-factor test for determining unfairness. For conduct to be unfair under the UCL, "(1) [t]he consumer injury must be substantial; (2) the injury must not be outweighed by any countervailing benefits to consumers or competition; and (3) it must be an injury that consumers themselves could not reasonably have avoided." Camacho v. Auto. Club of S. Cal., 142 Cal. App. 4th 1394, 1403, 48 Cal. Rptr. 3d 770 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. 2006). The California Court of Appeal has continued to endorse that standard [26] since its first articulation in Camacho, see Davis v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 179 Cal. App. 4th 581, 596-98, 101 Cal. Rptr. 3d 697 (Cal. App. 2d Dist. 2009), and this is the standard advanced by Plaintiffs. Defendants seek to [*952] apply the Cel-Tech standard, arguing that unfair conduct must be tethered to a specific statutory, regulatory, or case authority. Since the California Supreme Court declared that its Cel-Tech standard does not apply in consumer actions, this Court will follow the Court of Appeal's approach in Camacho.

Plaintiffs are able to satisfy this standard. Their injury is substantial: Plaintiffs owe tens of thousands of dollars to KeyBank but, due to the omission of the Holder Notice, cannot assert Silver State's failure to provide the bargained-for education as a defense to the collection of their debt. On oral argument, Defendants suggested that requiring lenders to include the Holder Notice would cause lenders to exit the student loan market for vocational schools and limit the availability of credit to Plaintiffs and similarly situated individuals. Under Defendants' theory, KeyBank's conduct offers a countervailing benefit by making credit more available. However, the Court cannot conclude [27] on motion to dismiss that such a benefit outweighs Plaintiffs' injury. Finally, Plaintiffs could not have reasonably done anything to avoid this injury, which was brought on by Silver State's closure -- a turn of events they could not have anticipated. Plaintiffs therefore state a plausible claim under the unfair prong of the UCL.

D. "Fraud" Prong

Plaintiffs' sixth and final cause of action alleges a violation of the "fraud" prong of section 17200 based on KeyBank's failure to disclose material facts about Silver State's risk of failure. Plaintiffs allege that KeyBank intentionally concealed information from loan customers because it relied on the Silver State loans to offset losses from other failed partner schools and to create publicly offered securities backed by education loans. Defendants argue that Plaintiffs fail to state a claim because KeyBank had no duty to disclose, and the "facts" that went undisclosed were not material.

HN14[] "The fraudulent business practice prong of the UCL has been understood to be distinct from common law fraud." In re Tobacco II Cases, 46 Cal. 4th 298, 312, 93 Cal. Rptr. 3d 559, 207 P.3d 20 (2009). A UCL claim need not plead the elements of common law fraudulent deception, which "must be actually [28] false, known to be false by the perpetrator and reasonably relied upon by a victim who incurs damages." Id. What does need to be pled is the existence of a duty to disclose. "Absent a duty to disclose, the failure to do so does not support a claim under the fraudulent prong of the UCL." Berryman v. Merit Prop. Mgmt., Inc., 152 Cal. App. 4th 1544, 1557, 62 Cal. Rptr. 3d 177 (2007). There are four circumstances under which "[n]ondisclosure or concealment may constitute actionable fraud":

> (1) when the defendant is in a fiduciary relationship with the plaintiff; (2) when the defendant had exclusive knowledge of material facts not known to the plaintiff; (3) when the defendant actively conceals a material fact from the plaintiff; and (4) when the defendant makes partial representations but also suppresses some material facts.

Heliotis v. Schuman, 181 Cal. App. 3d 646, 651, 226 Cal. Rptr. 509 (1986).

Plaintiffs do not contend that they and KeyBank had any type of fiduciary relationship. Even under the remaining three circumstances that may constitute fraud, "some relationship" must exist "between the parties [to] give[] rise to a duty to disclose such known facts." LiMandri v. Judkins, 52 Cal. App. 4th 326, 337, 60 Cal. Rptr. 2d 539 (1997). Such a relationship [29] "can only come into being as a result of some sort of transaction between the parties." [*953] Id. Plaintiffs and KeyBank, as "parties entering into [a] contractual agreement," had such a relationship. Id. Plaintiffs' theory is that material facts about the viability of Silver State were in KeyBank's exclusive knowledge, thereby triggering KeyBank's obligation to disclose them.

This claim falters on two fronts. First, none of the facts that Plaintiffs allege as the basis for fraud could plausibly have been in the "exclusive knowledge" of KeyBank. Such "red flags" as Silver State's lack of affiliation with a college or university, its failure to obtain certification from the Federal Aviation Administration, or its relatively recent founding are not facts known only to KeyBank. Plaintiffs had a relationship with Silver State itself, which could have disclosed such details or responded to inquiries by Plaintiffs. Nor is it plausible that Silver State and KeyBank were the only sources of this information. Such basic facts as the existence of government certifications or the date a corporation began operating are matters of public record. Although the Court recognizes that KeyBank is the more sophisticated [30] party, Plaintiffs cannot establish fraud by alleging facts that could not plausibly have been in KeyBank's exclusive knowledge.

Second, other "facts" on which Plaintiffs premise their fraud allegations are not facts at all, but rather opinions about Silver State's viability. For example, Plaintiffs allege that KeyBank was aware that an aviation school expert had predicted Silver State's failure. HN15[] "[P]redictions as to future events are ordinarily non-actionable expressions of opinion under basic principles of the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation." Bayview Hunters Point Cmty. Advocates v. Metro. Transp. Comm'n, 366 F.3d 692, 698 (9th Cir. 2004). The failure to disclose predictions or other opinions about Silver State's viability cannot be actionable because they are not facts and therefore do not trigger a duty to disclose. Plaintiffs therefore fail to state a claim under the UCL's fraud prong, which is DISMISSED. As Plaintiffs previously augmented their fraud allegations in response to Defendants' prior motion to dismiss, the Court concludes that further amendment would be futile and denies leave to amend.

II. Preemption by the National Bank Act

Three of Plaintiffs' six causes of action [31] -- two claims for aiding and abetting under the UCL's "unlawful" prong, and one claim under the "unfair" prong -- state plausible claims under the Rule 12(b)(6) standard. However, Defendants further argue that those claims must be dismissed as preempted by federal law, which exclusively governs the terms of credit extended by a national bank such as KeyBank. Plaintiffs respond that preemption does not reach as far as KeyBank suggests, as laws of general application -- like those invoked here -- are not preempted by federal law.

KeyBank is a national bank created and operated under the National Bank Act ("NBA"), 12 U.S.C. § 1 et seq. HN16[] Congress enacted the NBA in 1864, "establishing the system of national banking still in place today." Watters v. Wachovia Bank, N.A., 550 U.S. 1, 10, 127 S. Ct. 1559, 167 L. Ed. 2d 389 (2007). "The Act vested in nationally chartered banks enumerated powers and 'all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking.'" Id. at 11 (quoting 12 U.S.C. § 24 (Seventh)). The Supreme Court has, in "the years since the NBA's enactment, . . . repeatedly made clear that federal control shields national banking from unduly burdensome and duplicative state regulation." Id. [32] While states "are permitted to regulate the activities of national banks where doing so does [*954] not prevent or significantly interfere with the national bank's or the national bank regulator's exercise of its powers," state regulations "must give way" when "state prescriptions significantly impair the exercise of authority, enumerated or incidental under the NBA." Id. at 12. Among their incidental powers, national banks are charged with "discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt." 12 U.S.C. § 24 (Seventh).

HN17[] At issue here is whether Plaintiffs' state law claims would "significantly impair" KeyBank's exercise of its "enumerated or incidental" powers under the NBA. If that is so, state law must give way to federal, because the Supremacy Clause enshrines the "Constitution, and the Laws of the United States," as "the supreme Law of the Land." U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2. "In determining whether a state statute is pre-empted by federal law and therefore invalid under the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution, our sole task is to ascertain the intent of Congress." Cal. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Guerra, 479 U.S. 272, 280, 107 S. Ct. 683, 93 L. Ed. 2d 613 (1987). If Congress, [33] in enacting a federal statute, intended "to exercise its constitutionally delegated authority to set aside the laws of a State," then "the Supremacy Clause requires courts to follow federal, not state, law." Barnett Bank of Marion County, N. A. v. Nelson, 517 U.S. 25, 30, 116 S. Ct. 1103, 134 L. Ed. 2d 237 (1996).

HN18[] State law can be preempted by federal law in three contexts: where "(1) Congress enacts a statute that explicitly preempts state law; (2) state law actually conflicts with federal law; or (3) federal law occupies a legislative field to such an extent that it is reasonable to conclude that Congress left no room for state regulation in that field." Engine Mfrs. Ass'n v. S. Coast Air Quality Maint. Dist., 498 F.3d 1031, 1039 (9th Cir. 2007). The parties agree that only conflict preemption is in play here: whether federal and state law are "in 'irreconcilable conflict.'" Barnett Bank, 517 U.S. at 31 (quoting Rice v. Norman Williams Co., 458 U.S. 654, 659, 102 S. Ct. 3294, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1042 (1982)). Such a conflict may arise where compliance with both statutes is a "'physical impossibility,'" id. (quoting Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142-43, 83 S. Ct. 1210, 10 L. Ed. 2d 248 (1963)), or where the state law "'stand[s] as an obstacle to the accomplishment [34] and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress,'" id. (quoting Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67, 61 S. Ct. 399, 85 L. Ed. 581 (1941)).

HN19[] The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency ("OCC"), as "the agency charged by Congress with supervision of the NBA," "oversees the operations of national banks and their interactions with customers." Watters, 550 U.S. at 6. In its regulations, the OCC attempts to delineate the boundaries of NBA preemption. [6] "[S]tate laws that obstruct, impair, or condition a national bank's ability to fully exercise its Federally authorized non-real estate lending powers are not applicable to national banks." 12 C.F.R. § 7.4008(d)(1). Specifically, a "national bank may make non-real estate loans without regard to state law limitations concerning . . . [t]he terms of credit, including the schedule for repayment of principal and interest, . . . payments due, [*955] minimum payments, or terms to maturity of the loan[.]" Id. § 7.4008(d)(2)(iv). However, the regulations are explicit that state laws governing contracts, torts, and criminal activity are not preempted, nor are state laws whose effects are "incidental to the non-real estate lending operations of national banks." Id. § 7.4008(e). [35] National banks are expressly barred from engaging in "unfair or deceptive practices within the meaning of section 5" of the FTC Act. Id. § 7.4008(c).

The broad contours of NBA preemption are not in dispute. HN21[] States have "the power to regulate national banks" where "doing so does not prevent or significantly interfere with the national bank's exercise of its powers." Barnett Bank, 517 U.S. at 33; see also Bank of Am. v. City & County of S.F., 309 F.3d 551, 558-59 (9th Cir. 2002) ("[S]tates retain some power to regulate national banks in areas such as contracts, debt collection, acquisition and transfer of property, and taxation, zoning, criminal, and tort law."). States cannot, on the other hand, "significantly impair" a national bank's "exercise of authority, enumerated or incidental under the NBA." Watters, 550 U.S. at 12. "[G]rants of both enumerated [36] and incidental 'powers' to national banks" are "grants of authority not normally limited by, but rather ordinarily preempting, contrary state law." Barnett Bank, 517 U.S. at 32.

Defendants do not contend that California's UCL is preempted by the NBA. As this Court has previously noted, HN22[] "California courts have long held that consumer protection laws of general application are not preempted by federal banking laws." *Jefferson v. Chase Home Finance, No. C06-6510 TEH, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101031, at 29 (N.D. Cal. April 29, 2008). Rather, Defendants argue that Plaintiffs' application of the UCL -- which they are wielding to "modify federal law" and "impose a non-existent obligation on KeyBank with regard to the FTC Holder Notice" -- is preempted. Defs.' Mot. at 17. The injunctive relief demanded by Plaintiffs would effectively read the Holder Notice into KeyBank's promissory notes, thereby -- according to Defendants -- imposing a "state law limitation[]" on its "terms of credit." 12 C.F.R. § 7.4008(d)(2)(iv). Plaintiffs respond that they are simply predicating the violation of "a state consumer protection statute of general application" on "a federal consumer protection regulation of general [37] application," neither of which are preempted. Pls.' Opp'n at 20.

The Court has already concluded that the Holder Rule does not directly apply to KeyBank; the regulation provides only that a seller commits an unfair business practice by omitting the Holder Notice from a consumer credit contract, or by accepting loan proceeds made pursuant to such a contract. KeyBank was not required to include the Holder Notice in its promissory notes. However, Plaintiffs' surviving claims -- which are all premised on KeyBank's complicity in Silver State's alleged Holder Rule violation -- would compel KeyBank to add the Holder Notice to its consumer credit contracts. For example, Plaintiffs allege that KeyBank aided and abetted Silver State's violation by dispersing loan funds to Silver State -- which was therefore "[a]ccept[ing] . . . the proceeds of a[] purchase money loan" made pursuant to a "consumer credit contract" that did not contain the Holder Notice. 16 C.F.R. § 433.2(b). KeyBank could only avoid aiding and abetting liability under that theory by including the Holder Notice in its promissory notes, or by not making the loan in the first place.

The relief Plaintiffs request would also, in effect, [38] read the Holder Notice into KeyBank's [*956] promissory notes. Plaintiffs seek to enjoin KeyBank from enforcing its promissory notes with Plaintiffs, or from reporting Plaintiffs to credit reporting agencies. Had KeyBank included the Holder Notice in its promissory notes, Plaintiffs could have defended against KeyBank's collection efforts by claiming Silver State had breached their contract -- as inclusion of the Holder Notice "preserves the borrower's ability to raise claims and defenses against the lender arising from the seller's misconduct." Armstrong v. Accrediting Council for Continuing Educ. & Training, Inc., 168

[6] HN20[] "Federal regulations have no less pre-emptive effect than federal statutes." Fid. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. de la Cuesta, 458 U.S. 141, 153, 102 S. Ct. 3014, 73 L. Ed. 2d 664 (1982). That preemptive effect may only be disturbed if the regulation "is not one that Congress would have sanctioned." Id. at 154. Neither party disputes the force of the OCC regulations here.

F.3d 1362, 1365, 335 U.S. App. D.C. 62 (D.C. Cir. 1999). The basis for Plaintiffs' claims is their obligation to pay KeyBank for an education that Silver State never delivered. Enjoining KeyBank from collecting on Plaintiffs' loans would impose on KeyBank a remedy premised on Silver State's failure to perform -- which, again, amounts to reading the Holder Notice into KeyBank's promissory notes. HN23[] A consumer's rights "come into existence only when the [Holder Notice] is in fact included in the consumer credit contract." Vietnam Veterans of Am., Inc. v. Guerdon Indus., Inc., 644 F. Supp. 951, 964 (D. Del. 1986). [39] Although the Holder Notice was not in KeyBank's promissory notes, Plaintiffs demand a remedy that would grant them the same rights as if it had been.

HN24[] State law cannot obstruct or impair "a national bank's ability to fully exercise its Federally authorized non-real estate lending powers." 12 C.F.R. § 7.4008(d)(1). States are explicitly barred from imposing limits on the "terms of credit" extended by a national bank. Id. § 7.4008(d)(2)(iv). KeyBank's promissory notes embody the terms of credit extended to Plaintiffs to finance their education at Silver State. Plaintiffs' theory would deploy state law to alter those terms of credit and bar KeyBank from collecting on Plaintiffs' debts. It is difficult to conceive how Plaintiffs' action can survive in light of its clear interference with powers conferred on KeyBank by federal law.

Plaintiffs contend that this Court's decision in Jefferson v. Chase Home Finance, No. C06-6510 TEH, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 101031 (N.D. Cal. April 29, 2008), dictates that there is no preemption here. [7] The plaintiff in Jefferson alleged that Chase Home Finance, which serviced the loan he obtained to refinance his home, had misrepresented how it would credit prepayments [40] to his account. Although Chase stated on its payment coupons that undesignated funds would "first pay outstanding late charges and fees, then principal," Chase consistently failed to apply Jefferson's prepayments to the loan principal, placing the prepaid amount instead in "suspense." *Id. at 5-6. Jefferson asserted, among other causes of action, that Chase's misrepresentation violated all three prongs of the UCL. Chase argued that Jefferson's claims were preempted by the NBA, relying on OCC [*957] regulations that permit banks to "make real estate loans without [regard to] state law limitations [concern]ing terms of credit, disclosure and advertising, processing and servicing of mortgages, repayments, and rates of interest on loans." *Id. at 28-29 (citing 12 C.F.R. § 34.4(a)(4), (9), (10), (11), and (12)).

The Court found that the plaintiff's claims were not preempted, holding that "laws of general application, which merely require all businesses (including banks) to refrain from misrepresentations and abide by contracts and representations to customers do not impair a bank's ability to exercise its lending powers." *Id. at 29. In reaching that conclusion, the Court observed that "California courts have long held that consumer protection laws of general application are not preempted by federal banking laws." *Id. at 29. Plaintiffs highlight this language to argue that their claims -- brought under the UCL, a "consumer protection law[] of general application" -- [42] cannot be preempted.

However, the result in Jefferson hinged on the nature of the claim asserted: misrepresentation. HN25[] "The duty to refrain from misrepresentation falls on all businesses." *Id. at 37. Barring a national bank from making misrepresentations to customers does not in any way impair the exercise of its enumerated or implied powers; rather, it is precisely the kind of generally applicable duty that cannot be preempted. Indeed, the Court contrasted the misrepresentation claim from others that would be preempted:

> Plaintiff does not claim that California consumer protection laws require Chase to service or process loans, include specific content in its disclosures, or handle repayment of loans in any particular manner --

[7] Plaintiffs also contend that the Supreme Court's decision in Cuomo v. Clearing House Ass'n, __ U.S. __, 129 S. Ct. 2710, 174 L. Ed. 2d 464 (2009), is supportive. However, the Court in Cuomo addressed an unrelated provision of the National Bank Act, which provides that "[n]o national bank shall be subject to any visitorial powers except as authorized by Federal law" and other limited circumstances. 12 U.S.C. § 484(A). [41] The Court found only that the OCC erred in "extending the definition of 'visitorial powers' to include 'prosecuting enforcement actions' in state courts." 129 S. Ct. at 2721 (quoting 12 C.F.R. § 7.4000). The term properly refers, the Court held, "to a sovereign's supervisory powers over corporations," including "any form of administrative oversight that allows a sovereign to inspect books and records." Id. Since a state's visitorial powers are not at issue here, this Court does not see how Cuomo is controlling or even relevant.

> requirements that would be preempted. See 12 C.F.R. § 34.4(a). Instead Plaintiff claims that the laws require Chase to refrain from misrepresenting the manner in which it does service loans.

*Id. at 36. The hypothetical claims that this Court suggested would be preempted -- those requiring that "specific content" be included, or that repayment be handled in a "specific manner" -- look remarkably similar to the claims Plaintiffs are now asserting.

In Martinez v. Wells [43] Fargo Bank, N.A., a sister court dismissed the plaintiffs' section 17200 claims alleging improprieties in the fees charged by a national bank for the plaintiffs' home mortgage refinancing. No. C06-03327 RMW, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58758 (N.D. Cal. July 31, 2007). The court found that determinations of charges and fees were "incidental powers to the express power of engaging in real estate lending" conferred by the NBA, and that claims challenging such fees were therefore preempted. *Id. at 10, 16. Allowing the section 17200 claims to advance "would essentially be allowing the superimposition of state law requirements upon the OCC's exclusive superintendence of [the national bank's] exercise of its federally-conferred powers." *Id. at 16. The court stressed that it was not concluding "that § 17200 claims are per se preempted by the NBA and regulations thereunder," but found preemption only "to the extent a § 17200 claim seeks to contest the exercise of a national bank's enumerated or incidental authority." *Id. at 16-17 n.6.

That is precisely the type of claim before this Court. Plaintiffs are not asking [*958] that KeyBank be held liable for defying its own contracts or committing a tort, nor [44] are they alleging the violation of a state law that directly infringes on its powers as a national bank. Rather, Plaintiffs' theory would deploy the UCL to require KeyBank to comply with a federal regulation that does not itself require KeyBank's compliance. Abiding by the Holder Rule would directly affect the terms of credit extended by KeyBank, infringing on a power that national banks are meant to exercise free from state authority. The Court therefore concludes that Plaintiffs' remaining claims are preempted by the National Bank Act. The remaining causes of action are DISMISSED without leave to amend, as Plaintiffs cannot plead around federal preemption.

CONCLUSION

Defendants' motion to dismiss is GRANTED. Plaintiffs' first, second, and sixth causes of action are dismissed for failure to state a claim, and their third, fourth, and fifth claims are dismissed based on federal preemption. The TAC is DISMISSED without leave to amend.

The Clerk shall enter judgment and close the file.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A motion to dismiss pursuant to Fed R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) is a challenge to the sufficiency of the pleadings set forth in the complaint. A Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) dismissal is proper where there is either a lack of a cognizable legal theory or the absence of sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory. In considering a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, the court generally accepts as true the allegations of the complaint, construes the pleading in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion, and resolves all doubts in the pleader's favor.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

To survive a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, the plaintiff must allege enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. The plausibility standard is not akin to a probability requirement, but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. Where a complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility for entitlement to relief.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

While a complaint attacked by a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Thus, bare assertions amounting to nothing more than a formulaic recitation of the elements are not entitled to an assumption of truth. A court is free to ignore legal conclusions, unsupported conclusions, unwarranted inferences and sweeping legal conclusions cast in the form of factual allegations.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN4[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A court will dismiss any claim that, even when construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, fails to plead sufficiently all required elements of a cause of action. In practice, a complaint must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN5[] Sherman Act, Claims

To state an antitrust claim, the need at the pleading stage for allegations plausibly suggesting (not merely consistent with) agreement reflects the threshold requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) that the plain statement possess enough heft to show that the pleader is entitled to relief. It is one thing to be cautious before dismissing an antitrust complaint in advance of discovery, but quite another to forget that proceeding to antitrust discovery can be expensive. As judicial precedent indicated over 20 years ago, a district court must retain the power to insist upon some specificity in pleading before allowing a potentially massive factual controversy to proceed.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

HN6[] Sherman Act, Scope

The purpose the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., is not to protect businesses from the working of the market; it is to protect the public from the failure of the market. The law directs itself not against the conduct which is competitive, even severely so, but against conduct which unfairly tends to destroy competition itself. To protect the public from anticompetitive conduct, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits every contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states. 15 U.S.C. § 2 of the Sherman Act prohibits antitrust activity of a single entity to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > Monopolization Offenses

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN7[] Scope, Monopolization Offenses

15 U.S.C.S. § 2 prohibits a single entity from combining or conspiring with other entities. "y making a conspiracy to monopolize unlawful, § 2 does reach both concerted and unilateral behavior.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN8[] Sherman Act, Claims

15 U.S.C.S. § 1, like the tango, requires multiplicity: A company cannot conspire with itself. Judicial precedent rules that a parent corporation and its wholly-owned subsidiary are incapable of conspiring for antitrust purposes because the two entities are not separate economic actors pursuing separate economic interests. Since that precedent, the single-entity rule has been extended beyond the parent corporation and wholly-owned subsidiary context. In considering whether the defendants are a single entity or capable of conspiring for § 1 purposes, the crucial question is whether the entities alleged to have conspired maintain an economic unity, and whether the entities were either actual or potential competitors.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN9[] Sherman Act, Claims

Physicians, including members of an independent practice association, are independent entities who can conspire with each other and others for antitrust purposes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN10[] Sherman Act, Claims

In the context of an antitrust claim, whether a hospital and a group of physicians have divergent economic interests to allow a conspiracy is a question of fact.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN11[] Sherman Act, Claims

Where at least some participants in the alleged conspiracy may have had economic interests that were different from a hospital and the physician group were not employees or officers of the hospital but rather independent contractors, then the court draws the inference in favor of the nonmoving party that the members of the physician group may have had an independent personal stake in any decision by the hospital. Under these circumstances, the court cannot decide, as a matter of law, that the members of the physician group are incapable of forming a contract, combination, or conspiracy for 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 purposes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN12[] Sherman Act, Claims

Although 15 U.S.C.S. §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., differ, both sections require allegations of anticompetitive activity to state a claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

The United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit ruled that a hospital's refusal to deal with a physician who ran a competing nephrology clinic does not constitute anticompetitive conduct within the meaning of 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq. The Tenth Circuit based its conclusion on the well-settled rule that the Sherman Act does not restrict the long recognized right of a trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal.

The mere possession of monopoly power, and the concomitant charging of monopoly prices, is not only not unlawful; it is an important element of the free-market system. The opportunity to charge monopoly prices, at least for a short period, is what attracts business acumen in the first place; it induces risk taking that produces innovation and economic growth. To safeguard the incentive to innovate, the possession of monopoly power will not be found unlawful unless it is accompanied by an element of anticompetitive conduct.

A competitor's right to refuse to deal with a competitor is not without limits. The high value that judicial precedent places on the right to refuse to deal with other firms does not mean that the right is unqualified.

HN16[] Sherman Act, Claims

A state law or regulation that imposes a duty on a party is inapposite to a court's analysis of a Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., claim. For example, although a regulation required a party to deal with a competitor, judicial precedent ruled that the party had no duty to deal with the competitor under the Sherman Act. Any such duty to deal arises only from FCC regulations, not from the Sherman Act. Thus, a duty to deal arising from state law does not establish a duty to deal for antitrust purposes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN17[] Sherman Act, Claims

Antitrust law requires a court to consider the specific industry and regulatory framework, if any, to consider whether a party's actions harm competition. Thus, the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit's direct application of business cases to a health care industry dispute is questionable without further analysis: The fact that a restraint operates upon a profession as distinguished from a business is, of course, relevant in determining whether that particular restraint violates the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq. It would be unrealistic to view the practice of professions as interchangeable with other business activities, and automatically to apply to the professions antitrust concepts which originated in other areas.

Ordinarily, whether particular concerted action violates 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., is determined through case-by-case application of the so-called rule of reason, that is, the factfinder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition.

The offense of monopoly has two factual elements: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.

Under certain factual circumstances, an exclusive contract between a hospital and specialty group of physicians, that requires every patient treated at the hospital to use the services of that firm of physicians, may violate 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq. In addition, group boycotts of individual physicians are against antitrust doctrine. Finally, certain restrictive rules incorporated in a hospital's bylaws may also violate the Sherman Act.

HN21[] Subject Matter Jurisdiction, Supplemental Jurisdiction

Pursuant to 28 U.S.C.S. § 1367(c), district courts may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim if, inter alia, (1) the claim substantially predominates over the claim or claims over which the district court has original jurisdiction, (2) the district court has dismissed all claims over which it has original jurisdiction, or (3) in exceptional circumstances, there are other compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction. Supplemental jurisdiction is a doctrine of discretion, not of plaintiff's right. Congress intended the exercise of discretion to be triggered by the court's identification of a factual predicate that corresponds to one of the § 1367(c) categories. Once the factual predicate identified, the exercise of discretion, of course, is still informed by whether remanding the pendent state claims comports with the underlying objective of most sensibly accommodating the values of economy, convenience, fairness, and comity. The ultimate inquiry for the courts is whether the assertion of pendent jurisdiction is best accommodates the values of economy, convenience, fairness, and comity.

Generally, a related state court action that cannot be removed would justify a decline of supplemental jurisdiction based on the principles of comity and fairness.

ORDER ON DEFENDANT'S MOTION TO DISMISS (Doc. 41)

INTRODUCTION

Defendant Central California Neonatology Group, Inc. ("CCNG") moves to dismiss two antitrust [*2] asserted by plaintiffs Perinatal Medical Group, Inc., ("PMG"), Krishnakumar Rajani, M.D. ("Dr. Rajani"), and Stephen Elliot, M.D. ("Dr. Elliot") (collectively "Plaintiffs"), pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). CCNG contends that because defendants cannot conspire with each other for antitrust purposes and have no duty to deal with Plaintiffs, Plaintiffs' 15 U.S.C. § 1 ("Section 1") and 15 U.S.C. § 2 ("Section 2") claims must be dismissed. In addition, CCNG argues that this Court should decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' state law claims pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c). For the following reasons, this Court DENIES CCNG's motion to dismiss.

Factual Allegations

Dr. Rajani and Dr. Elliot are neonatologists who have practiced neonatology in the Fresno area for 30 and 25 years, respectively. Dr. Rajani and Dr. Elliot [*3] are shareholders in PMG, a professional medical corporation that has provided services in and for various Fresno and Madera county hospitals since 1980. Dr. Rajani is the PMG President. Dr. Vinod Bansal, Dr. Chetan Patel, and Dr. Kajori Thusu ("former shareholders") were also PMG shareholders.

Until February 28, 2009, Dr. Rajani was the Medical Director of the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit ("NICU") at defendant Children's Hospital Central California ("Children's"). Children's is a nonprofit corporation that serves pediatric patients from approximately 35 cities in a geographic area of approximately 45,000 square miles. Children's NICU has a "regional" designation, the highest of three designations under California law. Certain critically ill infants must be treated at a regional facility. Through February 2009, PMG had a contract with Children's to provide 24/7 coverage at, and administrative services for, Children's NICU. Through this contract, Plaintiffs maintained staff privileges at Children's.

Dr. Rajani and Dr. Elliot also enjoy privileges at Community Medical Center ("Community"), the local teaching hospital. In December 2008, Community, with the assistance of Drs. Rajani and Elliot, [*4] opened a new 65 bed NICU. Community's NICU does not have a "regional" designation. Critically ill infants with certain medical conditions, therefore, must be transferred from Community to Children's for treatment.

While Drs. Rajani and Elliot were assisting with the development of Community's NICU, Children's and defendant Specialty Medical Group Central California, Inc. ("SMG") [2] complained about two doctors. First, Children's disapproved of Dr. Rajani's referral of pediatric surgery cases to Dr. David Hodge, who had left SMG to practice independently, because SMG doctors lost business when referrals were made to him. Children's asked Dr. Rajani to restrict his specialty referrals to physicians affiliated with the Hospital. Second, Children's criticized Dr. Virdina Meade for spending time at Community rather than Children's. Because Children's contributed funds toward recruiting this neonatologist to the area, the hospital believed it had a superior right to her services.

[1] The facts from the amended complaint are taken as true. Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). Despite this well-settled rule, CCNG injects multiple "facts" outside of the amended complaint in its statement of facts and argument. The Court shall not consider facts outside of the complaint for this motion.

[2] SMG is a professional medical corporation of approximately 70 specialty physicians who practice medicine in the area. SMG and Children's have a contractual relationship in which SMG provides physician services and [*5] Children's provides facilities and patient support services.

In addition to these complaints, Children's was concerned that Community was building a "flagship NICU" that would compete with Children's NICU. To address these concerns, Children's and CCNG conspired to close Children's NICU to neonatologists who were not affiliated with CCNG or SMG. Specifically, defendants conspired to exclude Plaintiffs from admitting or treating their patients at Children's.

According to the amended complaint, the conspiracy began in mid-2008. Children's approached PMG's former shareholders and promised to assist the former shareholders in the transition of their practices if they would leave PMG. In late 2008, Children's told Dr. Rajani that if PMG did not agree to practice exclusively through Children's, and in particular not at Community, then Children's would not renew PMG's contract. Children's demanded that PMG sign an amendment to their contract to prohibit the physicians from admitting or treating patients at competing hospitals. In addition, the contract amendment prohibits a physician from referring a patient to any specialist who is not a member of SMG. Plaintiffs refused to sign the amended [*6] contract. PMG's contract with Children's expired in February 2009. The former shareholders agreed to the amendment, and left PMG to form CCNG when PMG's contract with Children's expired. CCNG then entered into an exclusive contract with Children's to provide Medical Director and related services at Hospital's NICU. Under the terms of the agreement between CCNG and Children's, CCNG physicians make all specialty referrals to SMG physicians and practice exclusively at, and admit all of their patients to, Children's NICU.

After Children's terminated PMG's contract, beginning March 2009, Plaintiffs made numerous unsuccessful attempts to admit and care for patients in Children's NICU. Each time, notwithstanding Plaintiffs' privileges, Plaintiffs were told that they could not admit patients unless either they, or another physician, was present physically in Children's NICU during the entire hospital stay of each patient, 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. Children's Medical Executive Committee formalized this rule and regulation on March 21, 2009 to require an admitting neonatologist, or a substitute, to provide 24/7 coverage for all patients admitted ("24/7 rule") .

Plaintiffs contend that the [*7] 24/7 rule presents a financial obstacle to them and forces them to relinquish care of their patients to CCNG, the group of neonatologists that "runs" Children's NICU. Plaintiffs maintain that the 24/7 rule effectively means that no neonatologist who is not a member of CCNG can admit patients to Children's NICU. The 24/7 rule further deprives patients of the right to choose a physician. In addition to the 24/7 rule, Children's continues to refuse to enter into a coverage contract with Plaintiffs. The 24/7 rule and Children's refusal to deal with PMG have caused Plaintiffs harm in the form of lost patients, revenue, and physician referral base.

State Court Action

PMG initiated a state court action against its former shareholders on April 29, 2009 in the Fresno County Superior Court, Case No. 09 CE CG 01478 DSB ("state court action"). In the state court action, PMG alleges that the defendants "engaged in discussions and/or negotiations with [Children's], Kaiser, and other entities or individuals designed to divert business, assets and corporate opportunities of Plaintiff to Defendant for their personal benefit and profit." [3] In its first amended complaint, PMG asserts the following claims: [*8] (1) breach of fiduciary duty; (2) breach of "corporate provider agreements"; (3) breach of employment agreement; (4) intentional interference with economic advantage; and (5) negligent interference with economic advantage.

Procedural History

Plaintiffs initiated this action on July 21, 2009. In the amended complaint, Plaintiffs assert eight causes of action defendants: (1) Violation of Sherman Antitrust Act § 1; (2) Violation of Sherman Antitrust Act § 2; (3) Intentional Inference with Economic Relation (Physician Contract); (4) Intentional Interference with Economic Relation (Kaiser Contract); (5) Intentional Interference with Economic Relation (Physician Referral Base); (6) Violation of Cartwright Act; (7) Interference with Right to Practice Profession; and (8) Unfair Competition.

CCNG moved to dismiss Plaintiffs' amended complaint on March 12, 2010. [4] Plaintiffs opposed the motion on March 29, 2010. CCNG replied on April 5, 2010. This Court found this motion suitable for a decision without oral argument, vacated the April 13, 2010 hearing pursuant [*9] to Local Rule 230(g), and issues the following order.

DISCUSSION

Motion to Dismiss Antitrust Claims

Pleading And Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) Motion Standards

HN1[] A motion to dismiss pursuant to Fed R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) is a challenge to the sufficiency of the pleadings set forth in the complaint. A Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) dismissal is proper where there is either a "lack of a cognizable legal theory" or "the absence of sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory." Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). In considering a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, the court generally accepts as true the allegations of the complaint, construes the pleading in the light most favorable to the party opposing the motion, and resolves all doubts in the pleader's favor. Lazy Y. Ranch LTD v. Behrens, 546 F.3d 580, 588 (9th Cir. 2008).

HN2[] To survive a motion to dismiss, the plaintiff must allege "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1974, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "A claim [*10] has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). "The plausibility standard is not akin to a 'probability requirement,' but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). "Where a complaint pleads facts that are 'merely consistent with' a defendant's liability, it 'stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility for entitlement to relief." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557).

HN3[] "While a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitlement to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. 554, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1964-65 (internal citations omitted). Thus, "bare assertions…amounting to nothing more than a 'formulaic recitation of the elements'…are not entitled to an assumption of truth." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1951 [*11] (quoted in *Moss v. United States Secret Serv., 572 F.3d 962, 2009 U.S. App. LEXIS 15694, 14 (9th Cir. 2009)). A court is "free to ignore legal conclusions, unsupported conclusions, unwarranted inferences and sweeping legal conclusions cast in the form of factual allegations." Farm Credit Services v. American State Bank, 339 F.3d 764, 767 (8th Cir. 2003) (citation omitted).

Moreover, HN4[] a court "will dismiss any claim that, even when construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, fails to plead sufficiently all required elements of a cause of action." Student Loan Marketing Ass'n v. Hanes, 181 F.R.D. 629, 634 (S.D. Cal. 1998). In practice, "a complaint . . . must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 562, 127 S.Ct. at 1969 (quoting Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1106 (7th Cir. 1984)).

HN5[] To state an antitrust claim, "the need at the pleading stage for allegations plausibly suggesting (not merely consistent with) agreement reflects the threshold requirement of Rule 8(a)(2) that the 'plain statement' possess enough heft to 'show that the pleader is [*12] entitled to relief.'" Id. at 1966. In Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1966-67, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929, the Court further ruled

> [I]t is one thing to be cautious before dismissing an antitrust complaint in advance of discovery, but quite another to forget that proceeding to antitrust discovery can be expensive. As we indicated over 20 years ago…a district court must retain the power to insist upon some specificity in pleading before allowing a potentially massive factual controversy to proceed (internal citations and quotations omitted).

With these standards in mind, this Court turns to the CCNG's challenges to Plaintiffs' antitrust claims.

Sherman Act Antitrust Claims

HN6[] The purpose the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq., "is not to protect businesses from the working of the market; it is to protect the public from the failure of the market." Spectrum Sports v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993). "The law directs itself not against the conduct which is competitive, even severely so, but against conduct which unfairly tends to destroy competition itself." Id. To protect the public from anti-competitive conduct, Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits "[e]very contract, combination…or conspiracy in restraint of trade or [*13] commerce among the several States." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Section 2 of the Sherman Act prohibits antitrust activity of a single entity to "monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states."

CCNG presents two arguments to support its motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims. First, CCNG argues that Plaintiffs' Section 1 claim fails because defendants are not "separate entities pursuing different economic goals, capable of conspiring for Sherman Act purposes." Jack Russell Terrier Network v. Am. Kennel Club, Inc., 407 F.3d 1027, 1035 (9th Cir. 2005). [5] In response, Plaintiffs maintain that the amended complaint contains sufficient allegations to support a conspiracy. Second, CCNG contends that under antitrust law, Children's has no duty to make its facilities available to Plaintiffs and antitrust law "is not concerned with the kind of injury that plaintiff PNG is claiming." To oppose this position, Plaintiffs cite California Welfare & Institutions Code section 14087.28 to argue that Children's has a duty to make available its facilities to Plaintiffs. Moreover, Plaintiffs maintain [*14] that the amended complaint sufficiently alleges a vertical agreement proscribed by the Sherman Act. The Court considers each argument below.

Conspiracy

HN8[] "Section 1, like the tango, requires multiplicity: A company cannot conspire with itself." Freeman v. San Diego Ass'n of Realtors, 322 F.3d 1133, 1147 (9th Cir. 2005) (citing Copperweld Co. v. Independence Tube Co., 467 U.S. 752, 769, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984)). In Copperweld, the United States Supreme Court ruled that a parent corporation and its wholly-owned [*15] subsidiary are incapable of conspiring for antitrust purposes because the two entities are not "separate economic actors pursuing separate economic interests." 467 U.S. at 768. Since Copperweld, the "single-entity" rule has been extended beyond the parent corporation and wholly-owned subsidiary context. Freeman, 322 F.3d at 1147-48. In considering whether the defendants are a "single entity" or capable of conspiring for Section 1 purposes, the "crucial question" is "whether the entities alleged to have conspired maintain an 'economic unity,' and whether the entities were either actual or potential competitors." Jack Russell Terrier Network, 407 F.3d at 1034. CCNG argues that the "provision of the neonatal unit and the provision of physician services are complementary, not competitive." Therefore, CCNG concludes that Plaintiffs do not satisfy the pleading requirements to state an antitrust claim for conspiracy.

[5] Additionally, CCNG argues that because Plaintiffs' Section 2 claim alleges a conspiracy rather than a unilateral action, the Section 2 claim necessarily fails. This Court previously rejected this argument in its Order on Children's Motion to Dismiss (Doc. 19), explaining that although the Sherman Act contains a "basic distinction between concerted and independent action," Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Service Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 761, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984), HN7[] Section 2 prohibits a single entity from combining or conspiring with other entities. "By making a conspiracy to monopolize unlawful, § 2 does reach both concerted and unilateral behavior." Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 768 n. 13. Accordingly, CCNG's argument is incorrect.

HN9[] Physicians, including members of an independent practice association, are independent entities who can conspire with each other and others for antitrust purposes. Capital Imaging Assocs. v. Mokawk Valley Med. Assocs., 996 F.2d 537, 544 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 947, 114 S. Ct. 388, 126 L. Ed. 2d 337 (1993) [*16] (member physicians of an independent practice association are legally capable of conspiring among themselves); Nanavati v. Burdette Tomlin Mem'l Hosp., 857 F.2d 96 (3rd Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1078, 109 S. Ct. 1528, 103 L. Ed. 2d 834 (1989); Bolt v. Halifax Hosp. Med. Ctr., 891 F.2d 810, 819 (11th Cir.), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 924, 110 S. Ct. 1960, 109 L. Ed. 2d 322 (1990), vacated, in part, remanded, 980 F.2d 1381, reh'g en banc denied, 988 F.2d 1220 (11th Cir. 1993) ("Bolt") ("Each member practices medicine in his individual capacity; each is a separate economic entity potentially in competition with other physicians."). Accordingly, CCNG can conspire legally within the group and with co-defendant SMG to satisfy Plaintiffs' Section 1 claim.

Whether physicians and a hospital can conspire for antitrust purposes is an unresolved question among the circuits. Some courts have ruled that medical staff members cannot conspire with a hospital. Weiss v. York Hosp., 745 F.2d 786 (3rd Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 470 U.S. 1060, 105 S. Ct. 1777, 84 L. Ed. 2d 836 (1985) (medical staff empowered to make decisions regarding staff privileges "operated as an officer of a corporation would in relation to the corporation. Although the members of the medical staff had independent economic interests [*17] in competition with each other, the staff as an entity had no interest in competition with the hospital."); Oksanen v. Page Memorial Hosp., 945 F.2d 696 (4th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 1074, 112 S. Ct. 973, 117 L. Ed. 2d 137 (1992) (hospital and medical staff enjoyed "unity of interest" in peer review process and, thus, unable to conspire). Others have concluded that "a hospital and the members of its medical staff are all legally capable of conspiring with one another." Bolt, 891 F.2d at 819; Boczar v. Manatee Hosps. & Health Sys.., Inc., 993 F.2d 1514, 1517-18, reh'g denied, 11 F.3d 169 (11th Cir. 1993) (hospital capable of conspiring with physicians to boycott a physician).

Based on the law and allegations of the amended complaint, this Court rejects CCNG's position that it is unable to conspire with Children's as a matter of law. HN10[] Whether a hospital and a group of physicians have divergent economic interests to allow a conspiracy is a question of fact. Bhan v. NME Hospitals, Inc., 669 F. Supp. 998, 1016 (E.D. Cal. 1987), aff'd, 929 F.2d 1404 (9th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 994, 112 S. Ct. 617, 116 L. Ed. 2d 639 (1991); Boczar, 993 F.2d at 1518. Plaintiffs allege that CCNG and Children's have different economic interests; namely, the Hospital's [*18] interest is to protect the market share of its regional NICU, whereas CCNG's interest is to benefit from restricted specialty neonatology. In addition, and significantly, CCNG is an independent organization that contracts its services to Children's. The facts distinguish this matter from cases in which the physicians are members of a hospital's medical staff "operating as an officer of a corporation would in relation to the corporation." Weiss, 745 F.2d 786. HN11[] Where, as here, "at least some participants in the alleged conspiracy may have had economic interests that were different from the Hospital" and the physician group "were not employees or officers of the hospital but rather independent contractors," then the Court draws the inference in favor of the nonmoving party that the defendants "may have had an independent personal stake in any decision by the Hospital." Bhan, 669 F.Supp. at 1016-17. Under these circumstances, this Court cannot decide, as a matter of law, that defendants are incapable of forming a contract, combination, or conspiracy for Section 1 purposes. Id. Accordingly, CCNG's motion to dismiss is denied on these grounds.

Antitrust Injury

Next, the Court determines whether [*19] antitrust law prohibits the type of activity alleged in Plaintiffs' amended complaint. HN12[] Although Section 1 and Section 2 of the Sherman Act differ, both sections require allegations of anti-competitive activity to state a claim. 15 U.S.C. § 15; see also, Business Electronics v. Sharp Electronics Corp., 485 U.S. 717, 723, 108 S. Ct. 1515, 99 L. Ed. 2d 808 (1988) (Section 1); Pac Bell Tel. Co. v. Linkline Communs., Inc., 129 S.Ct. 1109, 1115, 172 L. Ed. 2d 836 (2009) ("Linkline") (Section 2). Thus, if Plaintiffs' fails to allege a "restraint of trade," Plaintiffs' fail to state Sherman Act claims.

Plaintiffs allege that from approximately mid-2008 through the present, Children's, SMG, and CCNG have combined, conspired, and agreed to retrain trade by prohibiting neonatologists who will not agree to practice exclusively at Children's and who will not agree to make all specialty referrals exclusively to SMG physicians from practicing neonatology in the region. To further the conspiracy, defendants have: (1) unlawfully required, as a condition of renewal of PMG's contract with Children's, that PMG's physicians agree to refer patients to SMG for specialist services; (2) unlawfully required, as a condition of contract renewal, that PMG physicians [*20] practice exclusively at Children's; (3) induced the former shareholders of PMG to form CCNG; (4) granted CCNG an exclusive NICU contract under which CCNG agreed to work exclusively at Children's and refer patients exclusively to SMG physicians; and (5) attempted to prevent, and did prevent, non-CCNG physicians from admitting patients to, and treating patients in, Children's NICU unless they agreed to the 24/7 rule.

Plaintiffs contend that the alleged conspiracy between the defendants has harmed competition in a number of ways. According to Plaintiffs, other physicians and health plans in the region, including Kaiser Permanente, that would otherwise refer patients to non-CCNG physicians, are now reluctant to refer their patients to non-CCNG physicians given the possibility that such patients may require services that can be provided only at Children's regional NICU. In addition, the ability of non-CCNG and non-SMG physicians to practice their profession has been limited unlawfully and their ability to provide services in the relevant market has been restrained. As a further consequence, certain critically ill infants have been deprived of the advantage of free and open competition in [*21] the purchase of physician services. Moreover, both patients and referring physicians in the region have been deprived of the right to a choice of physician providers. Plaintiffs allege that defendants' conspiracy has negatively impacted competition regarding the price and quality of physician services in the region.

CCNG relies on Four Corners Nephrology Assocs. v. Mercy Medical Center of Durango, 582 F.3d 1216 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Four Corners") to argue that a hospital's refusal to share its facilities with a doctor is insufficient to sustain a Section 1 or Section 2 claim. In Four Corners, HN13[] the United States Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit ruled that a hospital's refusal to deal with a physician who ran a competing nephrology clinic "does not constitute anticompetitive conduct within the meaning of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. 582 F.3d at 1221 (emphasis in original). The Four Corners court based its conclusion on the well-settled rule that the Sherman Act "does not restrict the long recognized right of [a] trader or manufacturer engaged in an entirely private business, freely to exercise his own independent discretion as to parties with whom he will deal." United States v. Colgate & Co., 250 U.S. 300, 307, 39 S. Ct. 465, 63 L. Ed. 992, 1919 Dec. Comm'r Pat. 460 (1919); [*22] Linkline, 129 S.Ct. at 1115 (2009) (A business has "no antitrust duty to deal with its rivals at all"). As the United States Supreme Court explained in Verizon Communs., Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis v. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004) ("Trinko"):

> HN14[] The mere possession of monopoly power, and the concomitant charging of monopoly prices, is not only not unlawful; it is an important element of the free-market system. The opportunity to charge monopoly prices--at least for a short period--is what attracts "business acumen" in the first place; it induces risk taking that produces innovation and economic growth. To safeguard the incentive to innovate, the possession of monopoly power will not be found unlawful unless it is accompanied by an element of anticompetitive conduct.

In rejecting claims that a refusal to deal runs afoul of antitrust law, the Trinko court explained that a competitor's right to deal freely promotes innovation while protecting against true antitrust activity such as collusion. Trinko, 540 U.S. at 407-08. [6]

Plaintiffs' reliance on California Welfare and Institutions Code section 14087.28 to oppose CCNG's argument is unavailing. HN16[] A state law or regulation that imposes a duty on Children's is inapposite to a court's analysis of Sherman Act claims. For example, although a regulation required a party to deal with a competitor in Trinko, the [6] HN15[] A competitor's right to refuse to deal with a competitor is not without limits. "The high value that [the Supreme Court has] placed on the right to refuse to deal [*23] with other firms does not mean that the right is unqualified." Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 601, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467, 105 S. Ct. 2847 (1985). Aspen Skiing, the exception to this century-old rule, "is at or near the outer boundary" of Sherman Act liability. Trinko, 540 U.S. at 409.

Court ruled that the party had no duty to deal with the competitor under the Sherman Act. 129 S.Ct. at 1119. The Court reasoned that "any such duty [to deal] arises only from FCC regulations, not from the Sherman Act." 129 S.Ct. at 1119. Thus, a duty to deal arising from state law does not establish a duty to deal for antitrust purposes.

Similarly, the Court finds CCNG's reliance on Four Corners misplaced, as the non-binding decision is distinguishable on both factual and legal grounds. Factually, the parties in Four Corners were direct competitors. [*24] The physician, who operated a private nephrology clinic, sought to require the hospital to share its newly-built nephrology clinic facilities with him. Based on this fact, the Four Corners court ruled that the hospital "was entitled to recoup its investment [in the competing nephrology clinic] without sharing its facilities with a competitor." 582 F.3d at 1223. In addition, the court found that requiring the hospital to share its facilities with a direct competitor would threaten competition, rather than promote it. Id. Here, Plaintiffs do not allege that they are direct competitors with Children's or its NICU. Because Plaintiffs and Children's are not competitors, the refusal to deal doctrine--upon which the Four Corners ruling was based--is inapplicable. [7]

The procedural posture of this matter provides a further distinction. The Tenth Circuit decided Four Corners on a fully-developed record, and based its decision on the evidence or lack thereof. Development of the record is important, because each element of each Sherman Act claim presents a question of fact. HN18[] "Ordinarily, whether particular concerted action violates § 1 of the Sherman Act is determined through case-by-case application of the so-called rule of reason--that is, "the factfinder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition." Continental T. V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 49, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977). Similarly, HN19[] the offense of monopoly has two factual elements: (1) the possession of monopoly power in [*26] the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident. United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966). CCNG leaves unaddressed the elements of the Sherman Act claims in this motion.

Having considered the applicable standards and allegations, this Court finds that Plaintiffs' amended complaint sufficiently and plausibly alleges its Sherman Act claims. Plaintiffs allege that defendants have entered into a vertical agreement that, when considered with inferences drawn in favor of Plaintiffs, is proscribed by the Sherman Act. HN20[] Under certain factual circumstances, an exclusive contract between a hospital and specialty group of physicians, that requires every patient treated at the hospital to use the services of that firm of physicians, may violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Jefferson Parish Hospital Dist. No. 2 v Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984) (superseded by statute as stated in Texas Instruments, Inc. v Hyundai Elecs. Indus., 49 F Supp 2d 893 (E.D. Tex 1999)); see also, Bhan, 669 F. Supp. at 1016. In addition, group boycotts of individual [*27] physicians are against antitrust doctrine. Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. 2, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2.; United States v. Columbia Steel Co., 334 U.S. 495, 522-23, 68 S. Ct. 1107, 92 L. Ed. 1533 (1948). Finally, certain restrictive rules incorporated in a hospital's bylaws may also violate the Sherman Act. Quinn v Kent General Hospital, Inc., 673 F Supp 1367 (D.C. Del. 1987) (physician states a claim in antitrust action challenging nonprofit hospital bylaw that required active staff members with privileges to admit patients must reside within 12 miles of [7] HN17[] Antitrust law requires a court to consider the specific industry and regulatory framework, if any, to consider whether a party's actions harm competition. Trinko, 540 U.S. at 412-13. Thus, the Tenth Circuit's direct application of business cases to a health care industry dispute is questionable without further analysis:

> The fact that a restraint operates upon a profession as distinguished from a business is, of course, relevant [*25] in determining whether that particular restraint violates the Sherman Act. It would be unrealistic to view the practice of professions as interchangeable with other business activities, and automatically to apply to the professions antitrust concepts which originated in other areas.

hospital). Because Plaintiffs' amended complaint contains allegations which plausibly state a claim for Section 1 and Section 2 of the Sherman Act, CCNG's motion to dismiss is denied.

Motion to Decline Supplemental Jurisdiction Over State Law Claims

CCNG argues that this Court should decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the state law claims in this action. HN21[] Pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c), "district courts may decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim…if …(2) the claim substantially predominates over the claim or claims over which the district court has original jurisdiction, (3) the district court has dismissed all claims over which it has original jurisdiction, or [*28] (4) in exceptional circumstances, there are other compelling reasons for declining jurisdiction." Supplemental jurisdiction is a "doctrine of discretion, not of plaintiff's right[.]" City of Chicago v. Int'l College of Surgeons, 522 U.S. 156, 172, 118 S. Ct. 523, 139 L. Ed. 2d 525 (1997) (internal quotations omitted). "Congress intended the exercise of discretion to be triggered by the court's identification of a factual predicate that corresponds to one of the section 1367(c) categories. Once the factual predicate identified, the exercise of discretion, of course, is still informed by whether remanding the pendent state claims comports with the underlying objective of 'most sensibly accommadat[ing] the values of economy, convenience, fairness, and comity." Executive Software No. America, Inc. v. United States Dist. Ct., 24 F.3d 1545, 1557 (9th Cir. 1994) (overruled on other grounds in Cal. Dept. of Water Resources v. Powerex Corp., 533 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 2008)). The "ultimate inquiry for the courts [is] whether the assertion of pendent jurisdiction is best accommodate[s] the values of economy, convenience, fairness, and comity." Id. at 1556.

None of the 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c) factors justifies a decline of supplemental [*29] jurisdiction over the state law claims. This Court does not agree with CCNG's characterization that Plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims are merely the "tail of the dog" in this action. The federal and state law claims arise out of the same underlying facts, and the claims are closely tied. As the allegations focus on the defendants' alleged anti-competitive activities, the state law claims do not "predominate" this action. Thus, this Court will not decline supplemental jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(2). As set forth above, this Court does not grant CCNG's motion to dismiss the federal claims from this action. Accordingly, 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(3) is inapplicable. Finally, this Court is not persuaded that "compelling reasons" and "exceptional circumstances" exist to decline supplemental jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(4). HN22[] Generally, a related state court action that cannot be removed would justify a decline of supplemental jurisdiction based on the principles of comity and fairness. However, defendants point out that the state court action is based on distinct facts and legal claims. Whereas Plaintiffs' challenge the defendants' alleged antitrust activities in this [*30] federal action, they challenge the former shareholders' decision to break away from PMG in the state court action. In addition, the state court action is against one of three defendants. Even if this Court dismissed the state law claims against CCNG, those claims--which are based on the same allegations as the federal claims and involve CCNG--would continue in the federal action against the other two defendants. Based on these considerations, dismissal of the state law claims against one defendant would not promote judicial economy, convenience, fairness, and comity. Accordingly, this Court denies CCNG's motion to decline the exercise of supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' state law claims as to CCNG.

CONCLUSION AND ORDER

For the foregoing reasons, this Court DENIES CCNG's motion to dismiss.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Opinion

PER CURIAM

Appellants are owners and tenants of commercial properties in the Broadway Corridor, which is a section of the City of Long Branch (the City) that, in 1996, the City's governing body (Council) declared to be in need of redevelopment. [*2] Later that year, the City adopted a redevelopment plan that included the Broadway Corridor. The City took no further action toward redevelopment of the area until 2002, when it adopted a superseding ordinance, which again included the Broadway Corridor. In 2005, the City named defendant Broadway Arts Center (BAC) as the redeveloper.

After the Law Division upheld the validity of the blight designation and the redevelopment plan for the Broadway Corridor in 2007, the City filed condemnation actions against appellants' properties in 2008. The judge again upheld the validity of the blight designation and redevelopment plan and appointed condemnation commissioners.

Appellants argue that the trial court erred by (1) finding substantial evidence to support the City's determination that the area was in need of redevelopment; (2) finding that the condition of the zone in question (study area) satisfied the requirements of N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(a), (c), (d) and (e); (3) finding that appellants' challenges to the blight designation and redevelopment plan were time-barred; (4) denying their requests for pretrial discovery concerning the allegedly conflict-ridden relationship between the City and its [*3] chosen redeveloper, BAC; (5) failing to find a violation of appellant The Lighthouse Mission's rights under the Federal Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA); and (6) failing to find that the inclusion of their properties in the redevelopment zone violated their civil rights and tortiously interfered with their contractual rights and prospective economic advantage. [3]

We conclude that the City's designation of the study area properties as in need of redevelopment does not satisfy the heightened standard made applicable to such determinations by the Supreme Court's decision in Gallenthin Realty Development, Inc. v. Borough of Paulsboro, 191 N.J. 344, 924 A.2d 447 (2007). Therefore, because the record does not contain substantial evidence to support the City's findings under any of the subsections upon which it relied, we reverse the judgment appointing condemnation commissioners and vacate the declarations [*4] of taking.

We recognize, as we will discuss in this opinion, that the redevelopment study on which the City relied in 1996 when it declared the area in question blighted was prepared long before Gallenthin was decided. Although we attribute to these cases pipeline retroactivity of the Gallenthin holding, we conclude that the City should be afforded the benefit of a remand to permit it to amplify the record in an effort to meet the Gallenthin standard. Harrison Redev. Agency v. DeRose, 398 N.J. Super. 361, 420, 942 A.2d 59 (App. Div. 2008). As to appellants' remaining claims, we reject The Mission's contention that the trial court committed reversible error in its findings regarding RLUIPA. We decline to consider appellants' contentions regarding the denial of pretrial discovery and their claims of conflict of interest, tortious interference and violation of civil rights, as our disposition of this appeal renders such issues moot.

[3] At appellate oral argument, appellants abandoned their additional claim that the Local Redevelopment and Housing Law, N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-1 to -49 (the LRHL), upon which the City had relied, is unconstitutional, as the Court had, in the interim, held to the contrary.

I.

The first group of appellants is the Lighthouse Institute for Evangelism, which is located at 162 Broadway, and which operates under the name of The Lighthouse Mission under the auspices of its minister, Reverend Kevin Brown, who resides on the premises. The second group [*5] of appellants consists of CGR Holding Corporation, L.L.C., which owns a property at 9 Memorial Parkway, just south of Broadway, in which appellant Carlos Rivera, M.D. operates his medical practice.

Appellants' properties are located in the portion of the redevelopment zone known as the Broadway Corridor. Spanning an area of eighty-six acres, and consisting of 134 commercial properties and 154 residential properties, the Broadway Corridor is dissected by Broadway, one of the City's principal commercial thoroughfares. Broadway runs in an east-west direction.

The Broadway Corridor is bordered on the east by Second Avenue and Long Branch Avenue, on the north in an irregular fashion in part by Lewis Alley, and then continuing in a westerly direction to Seventh Avenue and ending at the abandoned Conrail railroad tracks. The abandoned railway tracks are outside the Broadway Corridor, but are immediately adjacent to its westernmost edge. At its southern edge the Broadway Corridor's boundary is in an irregular shape and traverses Jane Street and Chelsea Avenue. At its eastern edge, the Broadway Corridor does not abut the shoreline, but is instead adjacent to areas designated Oceanfront North [*6] and Oceanfront South. We shall discuss the City's treatment of Oceanfront North and Oceanfront South later in this opinion.

On July 26, 1994, Council adopted a report prepared by the City's Planning Department, in which the Planning Department re-examined the City's Master Plan. The 1994 report noted that the 1988 Master Plan had established as a goal for the Central Business District (CBD), which included Broadway, the "removal of deterioration and overall upgrading of physical environment" by using a "combined public-private action program [that would] secure new stores in the CBD." The 1994 report observed that the stated need to remove deteriorated buildings from the business district, and to upgrade the overall physical environment, was necessitated by the CBD's "unattractive and deteriorating physical condition," a "linear pattern of stores along Broadway with less than optimum clustering of compatible shops," and a "lack of stores with strong regional drawing power."

After Council completed its 1994 re-examination of the City's Master Plan, on August 8, 1995, the City adopted a resolution authorizing its Planning Board to conduct a preliminary investigation to determine whether [*7] all or part of the City's waterfront property should be designated as an area in need of redevelopment pursuant to N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-6(a). The study area included properties from Seven Presidents Park to South Takanassee Lake and Broadway.

In accordance with Council's resolution, the Planning Board directed the City's Planning Department to commence an investigation of the study area, in conjunction with the planning firm Thompson and Wood and an urban development consulting firm known as The Atlantic Group. Their resulting January 1996 report (1996 Report) divided the study area into three sections: (1) Oceanfront South; (2) Oceanfront North; and (3) The Broadway Corridor. The 1996 Report described the Broadway Corridor in the following terms:

> This area suffers from its historic location near the blighting effects of the abandoned Jersey Southern railroad right-of-way, the shift of traffic to Ocean Boulevard, the shift of shopping to Route 36 locations out-of-town and decades of public and private neglect and inadequate reinvestment. Similarly, the nearby industrial area, with obsolete buildings oriented to the abandoned rail right-of-way, deters residential development and discourages [*8] maintenance in nearby blocks.

The 1996 Report concluded that the Broadway Corridor satisfied the statutory criteria for "an area in need of redevelopment" and "should be designated as same." The 1996 Report also concluded that the "Oceanfront North" residential area met the statutory criteria for an area in need of redevelopment, while the "Oceanfront South" residential area did not.

Before analyzing each of the subsections of N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(a), (c), (d) and (e), the Planning Department and its consultants prepared a survey of the condition of the 237 parcels of land within the Broadway Corridor. [4] To accomplish that task, the Planning Department used the city and state building codes to devise six assessment criteria:

. Broken windows
. Deteriorating paint
. Falling, rotten, exterior columns
. Cracked, chipped masonry veneer
. Siding, walls, roof, stairs, porches, balconies and other structural parts showing evidence of deterioration
. Gutters, leaders, drains, window frames and doors showing evidence of apparent defects.

Based on visual inspection, which was conducted only from the exterior of the buildings, and which was recorded by a photographic inventory, the structures were assigned a condition of "good" if the building was free from all forms of deterioration listed above, "fair" if the building had no more than two deficiencies, or "poor" if the building had three or more.

Applying that rating system, forty-eight buildings in the Broadway Corridor (or 20%) were assigned a rating of "good"; seventy-four (or 31%) were found to be in "fair" condition; and sixty-eight (or 29%) were found to be in "poor" condition. The remaining forty-seven properties (or 20%) were vacant land. Of the 237 parcels in the Broadway Corridor, the City owned twenty-four, eight of which were vacant parcels. Many of the remaining sixteen were in poor condition.

Turning to the statutory criteria, the 1996 Report made findings to support its conclusion that subsections (a), (c), (d) and (e) of N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5 were satisfied. In particular, on the basis of the six assessment criteria and the photographic survey we have described, the 1996 Report concluded that the Broadway Corridor satisfied the subsection (a) [*10] redevelopment criterion that "[t]he generality of buildings" were in sufficiently "substandard" or "dilapidated" condition "as to be conducive to unwholesome living or working conditions." The Report justified that finding by pointing to the survey's conclusion that only twenty percent of the buildings in the Broadway Corridor were in "good condition."

In its analysis of subsection (c), the 1996 Report focused on "unimproved vacant land that has remained so for a period of ten years prior to the adoption of the resolution, and that by reason of its location, remoteness, lack of means of access to developed sections or portions of such municipality, or topography, or nature of the soil, is not likely to be developed through the instrumentality of private capital." The Report observed that land vacant for ten or more years in the Broadway Corridor totaled 12.79 acres, or fifteen percent of the total area. The Report observed that "[t]his large amount of long term vacant land in a moderate size city is a very clear and significant indicator" that private capital alone was unlikely to develop that land. The 1996 Report did not determine the reasons for the vacancy rate, such as remoteness, [*11] topography, or soil conditions, nor did the Report distinguish between "vacant" properties that consisted merely of an undeveloped parcel of land and "vacant" properties that consisted of an empty building. The Report made no effort to address the requirement of subsection (c) that such vacancy be attributable to the specific causes mentioned there. Instead, the 1996 Report merely commented that:

> Industrial properties which once were adequately served by the now abandoned Jersey Southern Railroad are today confined to use by trucks in a series of residential and commercial streets unsuited to today's standards for manufacturing and distribution facilities. Direct highway access is required to save time. Large trucks require abundant roadway to make turns. Special zoning to encourage this type of development was adopted > several years ago and proved unsuccessful. The entire HTLI Zone is unsuitable for private development because of inadequate road access, i.e. "remoteness" and "lack of means of access."

[4] Although there were 134 commercial buildings and 154 residential structures, which totals 289, due to common ownership and garden apartments, the actual number of parcels [*9] was only 237.

For the N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(d) criterion of conditions that are "detrimental to the safety, health, morals, or welfare of the community," the 1996 Report noted the dilapidation of the buildings [*12] and the obsolete location of the Broadway Corridor. It described the obsolescence and dilapidation as follows:

> The Broadway Corridor was an historic route to the oceanfront, the ferry piers, amusements and hotels. With the passage of time, public investments in Route 36 and Ocean Boulevard took vehicular traffic away from Broadway. Stores closed, buildings were demolished, and the strength of the businesses remaining diminished, reducing Broadway's commercial strip as a destination. Moreover, many of the buildings with retail space are obsolete in terms of their physical arrangements, in contrast to the requirements of modern merchandising. Chain stores and strong independents want high traffic counts, which Broadway no longer has. Today's retail renters want stores with more window space, rather than the long narrow stores built 75 or more years ago.

The Report commented that the Broadway Corridor's notably poor showing in the photographic survey, also described as the "commercial area image analysis," reflected "major problems in terms of parking lots, facades, vacant lots and buildings, street trees [sic], sidewalk conditions, and graffiti." Those conditions kept the area from being [*13] "the kind of commercial environment that a prospective business operator will consider for running a profitable enterprise." The study declared that those conditions "have remained for more than five years, with the result that high vacancy rates and marginal enterprises predominate." The Report noted that "[l]ocal business operators believe that the negative image" of the study area tended to taint all of the City by association, in particular the other commercial areas.

The final statutory criterion that the 1996 Report analyzed was N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(e), namely, a "growing lack" or "total lack" of proper land utilization due to "diverse ownership" or other conditions, with the result that land "potentially useful and valuable for contributing to and serving the public health, safety and welfare" is instead left "in a stagnant and unproductive condition." The Report declared the Broadway Corridor to be "very significantly under-productive" and "capable of improvement," as evidenced by average property taxes per square foot that were twenty percent lower than in Oceanfront North and more than four times lower than in Oceanfront South. The preponderance of small lots was "preventing [*14] the assemblage of land for development by private investors," as only two construction permits had been issued during the preceding six years in the proposed redevelopment area. The study cited no instance of an individual parcel with unclear title or otherwise problematic ownership.

On January 23, 1996, Council adopted a resolution in which it accepted the Planning Board's recommendation that Oceanfront North and the Broadway Corridor be deemed areas in need of redevelopment.

In April 1996, the Planning Department, along with Thompson and Wood, The Atlantic Group, and the City's redevelopment counsel, issued the "Oceanfront-Broadway Redevelopment Plan." The redevelopment plan's "overall goal [was] to bring about a compact and integrated ensemble of public and private places that support year-round uses related to living, working, and recreation and visitation."

The plan's general redevelopment objectives included the encouragement of greater density, "in order to create a walkable environment and an enlarged base population to sustain a lively, year-round retail and residential core on Long Branch's Oceanfront." The vehicle for doing so, and for increasing the value of "land and enterprise [*15] for public and private interests," would be "high-yield projects that exploit ocean views from residential and commercial development and public spaces." Narrower goals included "[i]mprov[ing] the City's image by replacing vacant lots and poorly maintained buildings with new, carefully designed buildings, both commercial and residential." In sum, the redevelopment plan was designed to "improve the total living and working conditions of the City through improvement of a blighted area, removal of structures in poor condition and the provision of land for new commercial and residential development."

The redevelopment plan thus "encouraged" commercial and retail uses in the Broadway Corridor with "larger square footage requirements." It proposed closing North Broadway and making South Broadway "the gateway to downtown," with "a four-building gateway complex that attracts daily commuters, shoppers, and residents."

The redevelopment plan noted the City's intention of directing its redeveloper to acquire necessary properties through negotiation with their owners, and the City's expectation that the need for relocation would be "moderate at most." However, the City reserved the right to exercise [*16] eminent domain for properties that "are judged essential to achieve objectives intended by the Plan," upon the redeveloper's request and "as a last resort after other means have been exhausted." The redevelopment plan did not specify or explain how the determination that a property was essential to the redevelopment project would be made.

On April 16, 1996, Council found "substantial evidence in support of a determination that the areas delineated as Oceanfront North and Broadway Corridor individually qualify as redevelopment areas and collectively also qualify as a redevelopment area." It accordingly passed a resolution that adopted the plan and declared Broadway Corridor, along with Oceanfront North, to be areas "in need of redevelopment pursuant to the statutory criteria set forth in" N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(a), (c), (d) and (e). On May 14, 1996, Council codified the plan as Ordinance 15-96.

Six years later, in October 2002, the Planning Department, along with the Thompson Design Group, issued the "Broadway Redevelopment Plan" (the Broadway Plan), which incorporated the 1996 redevelopment plan. The Broadway Plan identified the subject properties, including appellants', by block and lot. [*17] The Broadway Plan repeated prior representations that the need for relocation would be minor, and that the City intended the subject properties to be acquired by negotiation, while reserving the use of condemnation "as a last resort."

The Broadway Plan included detailed "Design Guidelines" that named permitted primary and secondary uses. "Any uses not specifically listed" were prohibited. On the blocks fronting Broadway, the primary uses included performance, exhibition, and instructional and workshop spaces for theater, cinema, dance, music, art, and fashion design. The secondary uses included restaurants, clubs, bars, specialty retail, and small professional offices. Churches were not listed even among the tertiary and conditional uses.

On October 22, 2002, Council adopted Ordinance 47-02, which approved the Broadway Plan and declared it to be the superseding ordinance and standard for land use regulation in the Broadway Corridor. On June 28, 2005, Council authorized the City to enter into a redevelopment agreement with BAC for a portion of the Broadway Corridor. Thereafter, the Mission sought to be named as the redeveloper of its property. As we shall discuss further, the federal [*18] court upheld Council's rejection of The Mission's application on the ground that the Broadway Plan excluded church uses. See The Lighthouse Inst. for Evangelism, Inc. v. City of Long Branch, 510 F.3d 253, 259 (3d Cir. 2007), cert. denied, __ U.S. __, 128 S. Ct. 2503, 171 L. Ed. 2d 787 (2008). Specifically, the Third Circuit approved Council's finding that "'a storefront church would jeopardize' the development of" an area that was "envisioned as 'an entertainment/commercial zone with businesses that are for profit,'" and that a church would also "'destroy the ability of the block to be used as a high end entertainment and recreation area,'" due to the unavoidable operation of "a New Jersey statute which prohibits the issuance of liquor licenses within two hundred feet of a house of worship." Ibid.

On February 28, 2006, Council adopted Ordinance 5-06, which listed appellants' properties among those to be acquired and authorized the City to condemn them if necessary. Within weeks, Cottage Emporium, the Pandays, The Lighthouse Mission, and its minister, Reverend Kevin Brown, began the action denominated L-1786-06 by filing a complaint in lieu of prerogative writs against the City, the [*19] Mayor and Council of Long Branch and BAC. They sought revocation of the 2006 ordinance that gave the City authority to condemn their properties for redevelopment (count one), a declaration that the ordinance was invalid (count two), and a declaration that the redevelopment statutes were unconstitutional (count three). They also claimed that the inclusion of their properties in the redevelopment zone violated their civil rights, violated defendants' fiduciary duties, and tortiously interfered with their contractual rights and prospective economic advantage (counts four through seven, nine, and ten). In addition, The Mission sought a declaration that condemnation would violate RLUIPA, 42 U.S.C.A. §§ 2000cc to 2000cc-5 (count thirteen). [5] On September 12, 2006, an amended complaint in lieu of prerogative writs was filed that named CGR Holding Corporation and one of its commercial tenants, Carlos Rivera, M.D. as additional plaintiffs.

The City and Council moved for summary judgment, and BAC and the State joined the motion. On December 19, 2006, the court issued its opinion, and on January 22, 2007, entered a judgment that dismissed all counts [*20] against the State. As to the City, Council and BAC, the judgment partially granted the motion by denying dismissal of count one, while dismissing count two without prejudice and dismissing the remaining counts with prejudice. Thus, portions of plaintiffs' complaint survived defendants' summary judgment motions.

On February 28 and July 28, 2007, the Law Division issued orders denying appellants' requests for discovery relating to the 1996 and 2002 ordinances, in which Council had found a need for redevelopment due to blight and adopted the redevelopment plan. The judge reasoned that appellants had not filed their challenge to the blight designation within the forty-five days prescribed by Rule 4:69-6(a), and there was no basis for granting the "interest of justice" exception to the Rule's forty-five day limitations period. In particular, the judge concluded that because he had already upheld the validity of the City's redevelopment plans in City of Long Branch v. Brower, Docket No. L-4987 (Law Div. June 12, 2006), [6] there was "no reason to relax the forty-five day statute of limitations on bringing actions in lieu of prerogative writs." The judge held "that ship has sailed," and as such, [*21] he refused to entertain appellants' challenge to the 1996 and 2002 redevelopment plan or blight designations and refused to permit pretrial discovery as to those ordinances.

The judge then turned to the 2006 ordinance, Ordinance No. 5-06, which listed appellants' properties among those to be acquired, and authorized the City to condemn them if necessary. The judge concluded that appellants' challenge to the 2006 ordinance was, in reality, a challenge to the 1996 and 2002 redevelopment plan, and "once again, that ship has sailed." For that reason, he declined to permit appellants to conduct discovery on the 2006 ordinance either. Addressing appellants' challenge to the 2006 ordinance, the judge again relied on his opinion in Brower as a basis for concluding [*22] that the redevelopment plan was valid and that appellants had not satisfied their heavy burden of proving the contrary. The judge therefore upheld the City's 2006 decision to authorize the use of eminent domain against appellants' properties. On August 1, 2007, the judge entered a confirming order dismissing L-1786-06 with prejudice. The August 1, 2007 order removed all remaining impediments to the City's ability to file condemnation actions against the properties located in the Broadway Corridor.

Consequently, in October 2007, the City filed a condemnation action against The Mission (L-4778-07); in January 2008, it filed a similar action against Cottage Emporium and the Pandays (L-307-08). [7] On April 2, 2008, the Law Division issued an opinion, which we shall describe shortly, that upheld the City's authority in L-307-08 and L-4778-07 to condemn. On April 14, 2008, the judge entered confirming judgments appointing condemnation commissioners, after which the City filed declarations of taking. The Lighthouse and CGR Holdings filed separate appeals, which we have consolidated for purposes of disposition.

In his April 2, 2008 condemnation opinion, the judge found that the City's blight determination properly relied upon "an amalgamation of data outlined from various City agencies, including the Fire Marshal, Building Department, Code Enforcement, Tax Assessor, Tax Collector, Police Department, Health Department and Public Works." That data "included the vacancy rates of properties, the general conditions of all the individual properties located in the study area, and other information derived from on-site inspections and inspections of municipal records conducted by the Planning Department."

[5] There were no counts eight, eleven, or twelve.

[6] The Brower litigation involved a residential section of the City which, like the Broadway Corridor, was part of the area the City deemed blighted and in need of redevelopment in 1996. We reversed the Law Division's June 12, 2006 order sub nom City of Long Branch v. Anzalone, Nos. A-0067-06, A-0191-06, A-0192-06, A-0195-06, A-0196-06, A-0197-06, A-0198-06 and A-0654-06, 2008 N.J. Super. Unpub. LEXIS 2204 (App. Div. August 7, 2008), certif. denied, 199 N.J. 134, 970 A.2d 1050 (2009).

[7] As we have noted, Cottage Emporium and the Pandays subsequently submitted a stipulation [*23] of dismissal.

Specifically, the judge relied upon the site inspections conducted by the City's Fire Marshal and Planning Department to determine that only twenty percent of the buildings in the Broadway Corridor were in "good" condition, with the rest "fair" or "poor." In the judge's view, that assessment justified the finding of a need for redevelopment under the N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(a) criterion of a predominance of unwholesome conditions.

Turning to subsection (c) of N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5, the judge found that the high proportion of land that was vacant for ten years, representing fifteen percent of [*24] the Broadway Corridor, satisfied the N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(c) criterion of vacant land that is unlikely to be developed privately "'by reason of its location, remoteness, [or] lack of means of access to developed sections or portions of the municipality.'" The court also noted that industrial properties formerly served by the railroad had become effectively remote because they lacked direct highway access.

The court then found that the unfavorable results of the commercial area image analysis, as contained in the photographic survey, established the commercial obsolescence and dilapidation needed to satisfy the requirements of N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(d), which requires a detriment to the community's safety or welfare due to dilapidated or obsolete conditions of the buildings, or to poor layout and land use. Finally, the conjunction of vacancies and low tax revenues compared to Oceanfront South established the stagnancy of land, thereby satisfying N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(e).

On that basis the court ruled that all the findings of a need for redevelopment were supported by substantial evidence. The judge distinguished Gallenthin on the grounds that his finding under N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(e) was not simply [*25] that land use in the Broadway Corridor was less than fully optimal, but rather that the area had become affirmatively stagnant, and that no improvement could occur without redevelopment.

II.

We turn first to Point II, in which appellants argue that the court erred by upholding the blight findings and redevelopment plan [8] affecting their properties. They argue that the blight findings were based solely on aesthetic concerns, with no evidence of additional elements that our case law requires, namely, structural dilapidation, degraded living conditions, or a threat to the health, safety, and welfare of neighboring areas.

The statute upon which the City relied in declaring the Broadway Corridor blighted, and in need of redevelopment, is N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5, which is a portion of the Local Housing and Redevelopment Law (LRHL), N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-1 to -49. N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5 [*26] provides as follows:

> A delineated area may be determined to be in need of redevelopment if, after investigation, notice and hearing as provided in [N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-6], the governing body of the municipality by resolution concludes that within the delineated area any of the following conditions is found:
> a. The generality of buildings are substandard, unsafe, unsanitary, dilapidated, or obsolescent, or possess any of such characteristics, or are so lacking in light, air, or space, as to be conducive to unwholesome living or working conditions.
> c. Land that is owned by the municipality, the county, a local housing authority, redevelopment agency or redevelopment entity, or unimproved vacant land that has remained so for a period of ten years prior to adoption of the resolution, and that by reason of its location, remoteness, lack of means of access to developed sections or portions of the municipality, or topography, or nature of the soil, is not likely to be developed through the instrumentality of private capital.
> d. Areas with buildings or improvements which, by reason of dilapidation, obsolescence, overcrowding, faulty arrangement or design, lack of ventilation, light and sanitary [*27] facilities, excessive land coverage,

[8] As we have noted, the City's findings were made in 1996 and 2002, which led the Law Division to consider appellants' challenges time-barred. On appeal, the City concedes that appellants' challenges were timely under DeRose, supra, 398 N.J. Super. at 413, which had not yet been decided when the judge rendered his decision.

> deleterious land use or obsolete layout, or any combination of these or other factors, are detrimental to the safety, health, morals, or welfare of the community.
> e. A growing lack or total lack of proper utilization of areas caused by the condition of the title, diverse ownership of the real property therein or other conditions, resulting in a stagnant or not fully productive condition of land potentially useful and valuable for contributing to and serving the public health, safety and welfare.

A city's decision that a particular area is "blighted" is "invested with a presumption of validity." Levin v. Twp. Comm. of Bridgewater, 57 N.J. 506, 537, 274 A.2d 1, appeal dismissed, 404 U.S. 803, 92 S. Ct. 58, 30 L. Ed. 2d 35 (1971). It "will be upheld where any state of facts may reasonably be conceived to justify the action." Vineland Constr. Co. v. Twp. of Pennsauken, 395 N.J. Super. 230, 255, 928 A.2d 856 (App. Div. 2007), appeal dismissed, 195 N.J. 513, 950 A.2d 902 (2008). Challengers have "the burden of overcoming that presumption and demonstrating that the blight determination was not supported by substantial evidence." Levin, supra, 57 N.J. at 537. Accord Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 372; [*28] Concerned Citizens of Princeton, Inc. v. Mayor of Princeton, 370 N.J. Super. 429, 452-53, 851 A.2d 685 (App. Div.) ("Redevelopment designations, like all municipal actions, are vested with a presumption of validity."), certif. denied, 182 N.J. 139, 861 A.2d 844 (2004). The Legislature has codified the "substantial evidence" standard. ERETC, L.L.C. v. City of Perth Amboy, 381 N.J. Super. 268, 277-78, 885 A.2d 512 (App. Div. 2005).

However, our courts have cautioned that the "substantial evidence" standard requires "a record that contains more than a bland recitation of applicable statutory criteria and a declaration that those criteria are met." Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 373. That standard similarly prohibits a municipality from exercising eminent domain on findings that are "supported by only the net opinion of an expert." Ibid. Instead of simply describing the physical and financial status of the properties to be taken, the municipality or its expert must perform "an analysis of the statutory criteria as [they] applied to each of the properties in the designated" redevelopment area, and of how each property's condition reflected or contributed to the area's blight. ERETC, supra, 381 N.J. Super. at 279-80.

Furthermore, [*29] questions of law are reviewed de novo. Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 372; Manalapan Realty, L.P. v. Twp. Comm. of Manalapan, 140 N.J. 366, 378, 658 A.2d 1230 (1995).

The New Jersey Constitution's general provision on eminent domain requires only a "public use" and "just compensation," N.J. Const. art. I, P 20, plus adherence to due process. Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 356. The provision that specifically addresses the taking of private property for redevelopment declares such takings to be a public purpose, and to be eligible for preferential tax treatment, as long as the property is "blighted":

> The clearance, replanning, development or redevelopment of blighted areas shall be a public purpose and public use, for which private property may be taken or acquired. Municipal, public or private corporations may be authorized by law to undertake such clearance, replanning, development or redevelopment; and improvements made for these purposes and uses, or for any of them, may be exempted from taxation, in whole or in part, for a limited period of time during which the profits of and dividends payable by any private corporation enjoying such tax exemption shall be limited by law. The conditions of use, [*30] ownership, management and control of such improvements shall be regulated by law.

Pursuant to the fundamental principle of giving effect to all constitutional provisions, State v. Muhammad, 145 N.J. 23, 75-76, 678 A.2d 164 (1996), "the general provisions of the Constitution must give way to its particular provisions." Kervick v. Bontempo, 29 N.J. 469, 479, 150 A.2d 34 (1959). Accord Behnke v. N.J. Highway Auth., 13 N.J. 14, 31, 97 A.2d 647 (1953). The Blighted Areas Clause thus controls when redevelopment is the sole public purpose for a taking.

Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 360, explained that the ordinary meaning of "blight" did not extend to an area in which the only negative condition was suboptimal land use. Instead, the word "blight," and thus the Blighted Areas Clause, required the area to be characterized by physical or social deterioration that threatened to become intractable. Ibid. The clause could not allow a property to be declared "blighted" for the sole reason that it was being "operated in a less than optimal manner," because if it did, "most property in the State would be eligible for redevelopment." Id. at 365. The Court further illustrated [*31] the meaning of "blight" with similar language that the sponsor of the Blighted Areas Clause had used, after which the delegates to the 1947 Constitutional Convention passed the amendment containing the clause as proposed. Id. at 360-61; Proceedings of the New Jersey Constitutional Convention of 1947, vol. I at 744-45. On that basis, it held that the Blighted Areas Clause was intended to cover only "deterioration or stagnation that negatively affects surrounding areas." Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 360. [9]

The Blighted Areas Clause also had the related intent of ensuring the constitutionality of statutes that allowed local governments to use tax preferences as incentives for private companies to participate in redevelopment projects. Id. at 360-62; Proceedings, supra, vol. I at 743-44. In 1949, the Legislature substantially replaced those statutes with the Blighted Areas Act, which authorized local governments to find that an area was "blighted"; amendments to the Local Housing Authorities Law, authorizing local housing authorities to redevelop such areas; and the Redevelopment Agencies Law, which allowed local governments to create redevelopment authorities. L. 1949, c. 187; L. 1949, c. 300; L. 1949, c. 306; Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 361-62.

In both the Local Housing Authorities Law and the Redevelopment Agencies Law, the Legislature set out five subsections that were nearly identical to what would later appear as the first five alternative criteria in the current redevelopment statute, N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5. [*33] L. 1949, c. 300, § 2, and L. 1949, c. 306, § 3. In 1951, it inserted those five subsections into the Blighted Areas Act as well, and deleted the provisions that had addressed only the kinds of conditions currently treated in N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(a) and (d). L. 1951, c. 248, § 1; Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 369-70; Forbes v. Bd. of Trs., 312 N.J. Super. 519, 527, 712 A.2d 255 (App. Div.), certif. denied, 156 N.J. 411, 719 A.2d 642 (1998).

In 1992, the Legislature replaced the Blighted Areas Act and the other enactments with the LRHL. Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 369. The five subsections that previously defined "blight" were included in the LRHL as subsections (a) through (e) of N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5.

In addition to the general change of replacing the word "blight" with the term "in need of redevelopment," the LRHL made two changes in the fifth subsection. The first was that improper land utilization may now be found to arise from a title problem, diverse ownership, "or" other conditions, whereas previously it had to arise from a title problem or diverse ownership "and" other conditions. L. 1951, c. 248, § 1(e); N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(e). The second was that the result of such conditions only has to be "a stagnant or [*34] not fully productive condition" of the land, rather than "a stagnant and unproductive condition." Ibid. (emphasis added). However, "the definitional standards were not changed in any material respect," which meant that those two changes, along with lesser changes in the other subsections, were "cosmetic only." Forbes, supra, 312 N.J. Super. at 529, 526.

Indeed, the Legislature expressly recognized that findings under the LRHL that an area was "in need of redevelopment," just like findings under the prior statutes that an area was "blighted," would be made "pursuant to [9] The sponsor's statement, which was delivered without challenge or criticism, included the following:

> Certain sections of [the older cities in the State] have fallen in value, and have [become] what [are] known as "blighted" or "depressed" areas. . . .
> These depressed areas go steadily down hill. . . . It's impossible to keep the properties in good condition, the houses deteriorate more and more, and what was once a good section of the town is on the way to becoming a slum.
> Naturally, this slump in value is not confined to the original area affected. It spreads to neighboring blocks. No one person . . . can counteract this spread, because no one can afford to sink money into a blighted [*32] area . . . because the improvement is so small that it cannot turn the tide of deterioration.

the authority of" the Blighted Areas Clause and "for the purposes of" satisfying its requirement of a "blighted area." N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-3, -6(c).

The municipality in Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 348, relied solely on N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(e) to find that an area including the plaintiffs' property was in need of redevelopment. The Court observed that the Legislature had intended that subsection's precursor to include more than just actual slum conditions, and then explained that the intention was constitutional because the precursor's use of the term "blight" still "retain[ed] its essential characteristic: deterioration or [*35] stagnation that negatively affects surrounding properties." Id. at 363. Under the presumption that the Legislature intended N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(e) to remain constitutional, the Court held that the provision was "reasonably susceptible" of the only construction that would preserve its validity: that the named conditions do not establish blight by themselves, but are among the recognized paths for an area to reach the level of degradation that the Blighted Areas Clause requires. Id. at 365-70.

In short, the Legislature relied on the Blighted Areas Clause as the authority for all of the statutes in the prior acts that it would later incorporate in the LRHL, including the provisions that were reenacted with only "cosmetic" changes as N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(a) through (e). While those five provisions might not be equally evocative of decay, they nonetheless share the "essential characteristic" of naming kinds of deterioration or other conditions by which an area can reach a degree of degeneration that threatens to degrade other areas, and which are unlikely to be remedied by private investment. We believe the Court would have used the same analysis and applied the Blighted Areas Clause in the [*36] same manner if the municipality had relied on N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(a), (b), (c), or (d) instead of (e).

This reading of Gallenthin, and thus of N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5, requires a municipality to find that the physical condition of the properties at issue was contributing to social problems not only within the redevelopment area, but also in nearby areas. Even though redevelopment would be expected to result in higher property tax payments and more spending for local businesses, the difference between the actual level of economic activity in the redevelopment area and the level that might be achieved after its transformation does not amount to blight by itself. Eminent domain based solely on such a difference would instead amount to condemnation due to the area's perceived insufficiency of wealth, and it would exemplify the Court's fear that most property would be continuously subject to forced redevelopment if the threshold requirement were nothing more than the possibility of a more profitable use of the land. Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 365.

Focusing more specifically on the language in N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(e), the Court explained that the phrase "or not fully productive" could not justify [*37] a taking for redevelopment purposes because such a criterion by itself would not satisfy the constitutional requirement of actual blight. Id. at 367. Furthermore, to respect the statutory construction principles of ejusdem generis and to "avoid rendering any part of a statute meaningless," the Court deemed the specific condition of "stagnant" to be "the operative criterion." Id. at 367-68. The placement of the more general phrase "or not fully productive" after "stagnant" meant that the phrase can serve to elaborate "stagnant," but not to expand its meaning. Id. at 368. For similar reasons, the undesirable condition of a "growing lack or total lack of proper utilization" must be caused by one of the specific problems named in the preceding clause, which are "the condition of the title" and the "diverse ownership of the real property"; the subsequent generalized phrase "or other conditions" cannot serve as a catch-all that allows unnamed causes of improper land utilization to be an independent basis for finding that an area is in need of redevelopment. Id. at 367.

With these considerations serving as the framework for our analysis, we proceed to a review of the quality of the evidence [*38] underlying the City's findings concerning N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(a), (c), (d) and (e). The 1996 redevelopment study based its subsection (a) finding on a survey of the 237 properties in the Broadway Corridor conducted by the City's Planning Department in conjunction with Thompson and Wood and the Atlantic Group. That survey was based only on exterior observation. The criteria utilized, although purportedly drawn from city and state building codes, are of a nature that, in many instances, might well be deemed more cosmetic than substantial. In particular, the 1996 Report assigned a building a rating of "poor" condition if it presented deficiencies in three or more of the six assessment criteria the 1996 Report adopted. By that standard, a building could be tagged as in "poor" condition even if its deficiencies were entirely cosmetic and superficial in nature. For example, if a building had "broken windows," "deteriorating paint" and "cracked, chipped masonry veneer," those three cosmetic violations would result in a score of "poor." Additionally, only twenty-nine percent of the buildings in the Broadway Corridor were even in "poor" condition, which is not sufficient to satisfy subsection (a)'s [*39] standard of a "generality of buildings" (emphasis added).

Moreover, nothing in the City's evidence of claimed substandard and dilapidated buildings within the meaning of subsection (a) of N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5 attempted, even in small part, to establish what Gallenthin requires, namely a degree of "deterioration or stagnation that negatively affects surrounding areas" by promoting conditions there that can develop into blight. Id. at 360. As we have noted, the survey of property conditions was limited to a visual inspection of their exteriors, with no indication that it included interior or structural inspections. There is also no indication that the survey was based on investigations by local officials in response to complaints about health or structural violations; indeed, the record does not even contain information on whether the properties in the Broadway Corridor had ever been so investigated. In that regard, the survey failed to satisfy even the pre-Gallenthin test of showing how each property in the redevelopment area reflected or contributed to the kind of blight in question. ERETC, supra, 381 N.J. Super. at 279-80.

The survey did not resemble the one in Lyons v. City of Camden, 52 N.J. 89, 95, 243 A.2d 817 (1968), [*40] which was a series of "exterior and interior investigations" conducted "structure-by-structure" by three engineers and an architect, who then applied "extensive testing criteria . . . to the critical or intermediate deficiencies" that they found before they decided whether the property was indeed in "substandard condition." The survey also did not resemble the one in Hirth v. City of Hoboken, 337 N.J. Super. 149, 162-63, 766 A.2d 803 (App. Div. 2001), in which the findings about building conditions were accompanied by findings of "the nature and level of the economic activity being conducted there," which were particularized and not simply general inferences from the vacancy rate or the decline in assessed value for the redevelopment zone as a whole.

The 1996 Report concluded with the net opinion that criterion (a) was satisfied because "[t]he generality of the buildings are substandard, unsafe, unsanitary, dilapidated or obsolescent, or possess any of such characteristics." This bland recitation of statutory criteria, with a net opinion that fails to explain its basis, was expressly disapproved in Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 373. Nowhere did the 1996 Report explain how the condition of the buildings [*41] contributed to the "unwholesome living or working conditions," as required by subsection (a). We thus conclude that the City's subsection (a) findings cannot survive constitutional scrutiny.

We turn to the City's findings under subsection (c), which requires not only a high proportion of land that was vacant for ten years, but also a finding that the impediment to a parcel's redevelopment by private capital was its remoteness or lack of access. The subsection (c) criterion was deemed satisfied based upon the vacancy of fifteen percent of the land area of the Broadway Corridor for at least ten years. The 1996 Report considered the vacancy rate to be the result of the Broadway Corridor being no longer suited "to today's standards for manufacturing and distribution facilities." This unsuitability was caused by a lack of "[d]irect highway access," which the 1996 Report found was necessary "to save time," and by a high proportion of streets too narrow to permit "large trucks . . . to make turns." The City found that this "inadequate road access" made the entire Broadway Corridor "unsuitable for private development."

However, the only evidence of this described condition concerned the industrial [*42] zone along the railroad tracks, which was west of the Broadway Corridor rather than inside it. Unquestionably, subsection (c) requires more. It must be shown that because of certain conditions the land is not likely to be developed through the instrumentality of private capital. Those conditions are "location, remoteness, lack of means of access to developed sections or portions of the municipality, or topography, or nature of the soil." N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(c). No basis was provided to satisfy that condition as the 1996 Report's findings on remoteness of location all pertained to the area surrounding the abandoned railroad right-of-way, which is located outside of the Broadway Corridor.

The 1996 Report addressed subsection (d) by describing standard aesthetic conditions that created a "negative image" adversely affecting the other commercial areas in the City. This is insufficient. Subsection (d) also requires that such dilapidation must be "detrimental to the safety, health, morals, or welfare of the community." N.J.S.A. 40A:12A-5(d). No basis was provided to satisfy that condition.

The evidence was also inadequate for subsection (e), a "stagnant or not fully productive condition of [*43] land." As Gallenthin explained, the land must be stagnant rather than simply at less than its highest possible use, and the stagnancy must be caused by either a problem with title or the "diverse ownership" of the parcels in question. Gallenthin, supra, 191 N.J. at 365, 367. There was no evidence that private redevelopment in the Broadway Corridor was being frustrated by diverse ownership of an individual property or other problems with its title. Thus the City's subsection (e) findings were also inadequate.

We thus agree with appellants' claim in Point II that the 1996 and 2002 redevelopment plans for the Broadway Corridor, upon which the 2006 ordinance was based, do not satisfy the substantial evidence standard that Gallenthin, Hirth, Lyons and ERETC require. Consequently, we invalidate the blight designation and the redevelopment plan for the Broadway Corridor, and reverse the August 1, 2007 order that upheld them.

The City based the 2006 ordinance authorizing the City to take appellants' properties by eminent domain on the same 1996 and 2002 ordinances that we have now invalidated. Therefore, our reversal of the August 1, 2007 order invalidates the predicate for the April 14, 2008 [*44] order that gave the City the authority to condemn. Consequently, we reverse the April 14, 2008 order and vacate the May 9, 2008 declarations of taking as to the remaining appellants.

We recognize that the 1996 Report upon which the City relied when it declared the Broadway Corridor blighted was prepared more than a decade before Gallenthin was decided. Appellants' appeal from the dismissal of their complaint in lieu of prerogative writs was pending at the time Gallenthin was decided. Consequently, we have afforded them the benefit of its holding. In fairness to the City, it should be afforded the opportunity for a remand to permit it to amplify the record in an effort to meet the Gallenthin standard. DeRose, supra, 398 N.J. Super. at 420. We thus remand to the Law Division for the entry of an order so providing.

III.

We turn next to The Mission's claim that the Law Division committed reversible error by rejecting its contention that the Broadway Plan violated the "equal terms" provision of RLUIPA. The Mission argues that the Broadway Plan discriminates against church uses by disfavoring "religious assemblies" while encouraging non-religious assemblies. A divided panel of the Third Circuit [*45] Court of Appeals ruled against The Mission on this claim. Lighthouse Inst., supra, 510 F.3d at 275-76.

Nonetheless, The Mission argues that the Law Division should have rejected the Third Circuit majority's statutory interpretation and reasoning, and should have refrained from applying the doctrine of res judicata.

The failure to regulate religious uses of land on "equal terms" with non-religious uses violates a section of RLUIPA, namely 42 U.S.C.A. § 2000cc(b)(1). The Third Circuit held that RLUIPA is violated only when a religious use is able to identify a "better-treated secular comparator that is similarly situated in regard to the objectives of the challenged regulation." Lighthouse Inst., supra, 510 F.3d at 268.

A reviewing court considers only whether the regulation treats the religious use differently from the nonreligious use when both would have the same effect on what the regulation seeks to protect. Id. at 264-66. "Heightened scrutiny [is] warranted only when a principled distinction could not be made between the prohibited religious behavior and its secular comparator in terms of their effects on the regulatory objectives." Id. at 266. Because the comparison is limited to [*46] uses, it is irrelevant whether the person or entity with the nonreligious uses resembles the party with the religious use in any other regard. Id. at 267.

The Third Circuit correctly observed that the Broadway Plan named theaters, restaurants, bars, and other nonreligious assemblies as permitted uses, while excluding churches. Id. at 270. It found that the "well documented" objective of the Broadway Plan was to make the Broadway Corridor the anchor of "a 'vibrant' and 'vital' downtown community centered on an entertainment and retail district." Ibid. It then observed that N.J.S.A. 33:1-76 prohibited the issuance of a new liquor license to any establishment within 200 feet of a church or nonprofit schoolhouse, and found that "[i]t would be very difficult for Long Branch to create the kind of entertainment area envisaged by the Plan -- one full of restaurants, bars, and clubs -- if sizeable areas of the Broadway Corridor were not available for the issuance of liquor licenses." Id. at 270-71. The court added that the Broadway Plan "exhibits internal consistency" by excluding nonprofit schools along with churches. Id. at 272. The judges therefore concluded that "churches are not similarly [*47] situated to the other allowed assemblies with respect to the aims of the Plan," which made the "equal terms" provision inapplicable. Id. at 270.

While the decisions of the United States District Courts and Courts of Appeal on questions of federal law are not binding "per se" on New Jersey courts, they should nonetheless receive the "due respect" of appropriate observance of "the principle of 'judicial comity.'" Dewey v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 121 N.J. 69, 78-80, 577 A.2d 1239 (1990). Comity includes res judicata and other doctrines of claim preclusion. Hinfey v. Matawan Reg'l Bd. of Educ., 77 N.J. 514, 532, 391 A.2d 899 (1978). We reject The Mission's contention that the Law Division's application of claim preclusion was error. The Third Circuit's decision was a final judgment on the merits; the City and The Mission, the only plaintiff with RLUIPA standing, were present in both the federal and state litigation; and the RLUIPA question was identical. See Watkins v. Resorts Int'l Hotel & Casino, 124 N.J. 398, 412, 591 A.2d 592 (1991).

We therefore affirm the Law Division's January 22, 2007 dismissal of the RLUIPA claim under the doctrine of res judicata.

IV.

In Point VI, appellants claim that the condemnation of their properties [*48] for redevelopment without sufficient evidence of blight violated their rights under federal and state civil rights statutes, tortiously interfered with their occupations, and violated their rights under the United States Constitution and state antitrust law to participate in interstate commerce. In light of our determination that the 1996 and 2002 ordinances are invalid, and in light of the remand we have ordered, these claims are moot and need not be decided. See Hous. Auth. v. Suydam Investors, L.L.C., 177 N.J. 2, 28, 826 A.2d 673 (2003).

V.

Next, we analyze appellants' claim in Point I that the Law Division's July 20, 2007 order denying them the right to conduct discovery concerning the 1996 and 2002 ordinances was error. In light of our conclusion that the 1996 and 2002 ordinances cannot withstand the heightened scrutiny of Gallenthin and that a remand is required, the judge's denial of appellants' request for discovery as to the 1996 and 2002 ordinances has now become moot. Thus, we need not address the claim appellants have advanced in Point I concerning their right to discovery on those two ordinances.

Appellants also maintain that they were wrongly denied discovery to support their claim that [*49] the 2005 ordinance appointing BAC as the redeveloper was the result of political favoritism and not BAC's competence. They maintain that the Law Division wrongly held their challenge to the 2005 ordinance time-barred. In light of our conclusion that the 1996 and 2002 ordinances are invalid, the City will, on remand, be required to start anew if it chooses to redevelop the Broadway Corridor. If it does so, and again declares the area blighted, new ordinances will be needed to accomplish that result. Likewise, a new ordinance will be required to appoint a redeveloper.

If appellants file a challenge to such action by way of a complaint in lieu of prerogative writs, they will be entitled to discovery "in the same manner as other civil litigation." Hirth, supra, 337 N.J. Super. at 166. We therefore perceive no need to determine if the judge erred when he deemed appellants' discovery requests concerning BAC time-barred, as that issue too is now moot.

However, we note in passing that in DeRose, we vastly limited a municipality's ability to characterize as untimely a plaintiff's challenge to blight designation. Supra, 398 N.J. Super. at 413. DeRose had not yet been decided when, in 2007, the [*50] judge deemed appellants' challenges time-barred, and he therefore did not have the benefit of its reasoning when he rendered his decision.

VI.

The Interstate Commerce Commission Termination Act of 1995 did add the exclusive remedies clause to 49 U.S.C.S. § 10501, along with the caveat that it would apply "except as otherwise provided in this part." But, this provision was merely a reorganization of pre-1995 law, under which federal remedies with respect to rail transportation were already exclusive, subject to parties' rights to contract enforcement.

There was no change, by virtue of the Interstate Commerce Commission Termination Act of 1995, in 49 U.S.C.S. § 10709(c)'s provision that contract rail transport "shall not be subject" to the provisions of the Act, meaning that the 1995 Act did not effect any substantive change on that score.

HN8[] Railroads & Rail Transportation, Rates & Tariffs

In one respect, with the Interstate Commerce Commission Termination Act of 1995, Congress explicitly expanded the scope of preemption: it deleted from the exclusive jurisdiction clause any reference to Interstate Commerce Commission-certified state authorities and the associated certification procedures. 49 U.S.C.S. § 10501(b). This of course was a deregulatory move -- not an invitation to states to fill the regulatory void created by federal deregulation.

HN9[] Railroads & Rail Transportation, Rates & Tariffs

The Interstate Commerce Commission Termination Act of 1995, in 49 U.S.C.S. § 10501(b), does not preempt all state and local regulations. The Circuit Courts appear generally, for example, to find preemption of environmental regulations, or similar exercises of police powers relating to public health or safety, only when the state regulations are either discriminatory or unduly burdensome.

49 U.S.C.S. § 10709(c)(1) explicitly makes actions in state or federal court the exclusive remedy for any alleged breach of a contract entered into under § 10709. This provision for conventional contract enforcement obviously is an "exception otherwise provided in this part" contemplated by the exclusive remedies clause, the last sentence in 49 U.S.C.S. § 10501(b). And courts readily provide such remedies. By contrast, the Circuit Courts have found shippers' quests for non-contractual relief to be preempted as would-be invasions of the regulatory domain.

Congress sought, in 49 U.S.C.S. §§ 10501(b), 10709(c)(1), to avert the sort of frustration of its deregulatory purpose potentially inflicted by state rights and remedies outside the specifically preserved realm of contract breach.

Allowing indirect purchasers to use an indirect purchaser theory offensively, while prohibiting railroads from using the theory defensively, would create a serious risk of multiple liability for the railroads. and the possibility of inconsistent adjudications. Full recovery for direct purchasers would generate more effective enforcement of the law. Application of state laws rejecting this reasoning would jeopardize the federal interest in protecting railroad regulation from inefficient norms and balkanization.

[*445] [214] WILLIAMS, Senior Circuit Judge: Plaintiff-appellants are firms that have indirectly purchased rail freight service from one or more of the defendant railroads. The traffic moves under railroad-shipper contracts that, pursuant to 49 U.S.C. § 10709, are generally not subject to challenge before the Surface Transportation Board

("STB" or "Board"). [1] Plaintiffs allege that since 2003 the railroads conspired to impose fuel surcharges on the [2] freight in a way that raised the shipping rates above competitive levels. Plaintiffs seek a judicial remedy for contract traffic that would match--and extend-- the remedy that the Board gave common carrier traffic in Rail Fuel Surcharges, Ex Parte No. 661, 2007 STB LEXIS 39, 2007 WL 201205 (S.T.B. Jan. 25, 2007), but which it explicitly withheld from contract traffic, see *2007 STB LEXIS 39, [WL] at 10.

Plaintiffs' antitrust allegations are part of at least eighteen separate class actions, consolidated before the district court, involving various putative classes of direct and indirect purchasers of rail freight services. In re Rail Freight Fuel Surcharge Antitrust Litig., 593 F. Supp. 2d 29, 32 (D.D.C. 2008). (The direct purchasers raise only federal antitrust claims, which are still pending before the district court. Id. at 35-36.) The indirect purchasers sought injunctive relief for their antitrust claims under federal law; in addition, in order to secure damages precluded under federal law, see Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977), [4] they asserted various state law claims under theories of antitrust, consumer protection, unfair competition, and unjust enrichment and disgorgement of profits.

The district court dismissed the indirect purchasers' state law claims as preempted by the Interstate Commerce Commission Termination Act of 1995, 49 U.S.C. §§ 701-727, 10101-16106 ("ICCTA"). [2] In re Rail Freight Fuel Surcharge Antitrust Litig., 593 F. Supp. 2d at 40. In the district court's view, "permit[ting] plaintiffs to pursue their state [law claims] . . . would require the application of different state antitrust and consumer protection laws to decide what defendants' fuel surcharges should have been--creating just the patchwork of railroad regulation that ICCTA sought to preempt." Id. at 38. The district court allowed the indirect purchaser plaintiffs to pursue their federal antitrust claim for injunctive relief, id. at 43, a claim still pending along with that of the direct purchasers. At the request of the parties, the court entered a final judgment for [*446] [215] defendants on the state law claims under Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(b), thereby enabling an immediate appeal that would otherwise have been impermissibly interlocutory. This [5] appeal duly followed.

The statute's express pre-emption clause obviously is the best available reflection of Congress's intent on the subject. Sprietsma v. Mercury Marine, 537 U.S. 51, 62-63, 123 S. Ct. 518, 154 L. Ed. 2d 466 (2002). The section reads as follows:

> HN3[] The jurisdiction of the Board over--
> (1) transportation by rail carriers, and the remedies provided in this part with respect to rates, classifications, rules (including car service, interchange, and other operating rules), practices, routes, services, and facilities of such carriers; and
> (2) the construction, acquisition, operation, abandonment, or discontinuance of spur, industrial, team, switching, or side tracks, or facilities, even if the tracks are located, or intended to be located, entirely in one State,

[1] 49 U.S.C. § 10709(c)(1) (2006) (HN1[] "A contract that is authorized by this section, and transportation under such contract, shall not be subject to this part, and may not be subsequently challenged before the Board or in any court on the grounds that such contract violates a provision of this part."). Shippers not wishing to enter into contracts can ship pursuant to common carrier rates that railroads must provide on request pursuant to 49 U.S.C. § 11101(b) (2006). HN2[] The Board has authority to regulate the rates of common carrier traffic if the railroad has "market dominance" with respect to such traffic, id. §§ 10701(d), 10702(1), 10707, and to regulate the reasonableness of the railroad's "rules and practices" regardless of market dominance, id. § 10702(2). The Board can also "exempt" "a person, class of persons, or a transaction [3] or service" when it finds that application of the regulatory regime "(1) is not necessary to carry out the transportation policy of [49 U.S.C. § 10101]; and (2) either--(A) the transaction or service is of limited scope; or (B) the application in whole or in part of the provision is not needed to protect shippers from the abuse of market power." Id. § 10502(a). Plaintiffs originally sought to challenge both § 10709 contract freight and § 10502(a) exempt freight, but they abandoned their claims involving § 10502(a) exempt freight in briefing before the district court and on appeal.

[2] There are also two sections not codified at the citation above, namely, 11 U.S.C. § 1162 and 45 U.S.C. § 797I.

> is exclusive. Except as otherwise provided in this part, the remedies provided under this part with respect to regulation of rail transportation are exclusive and preempt the remedies provided under Federal or State law.

49 U.S.C. § 10501(b) (2006). In this opinion, we will refer to the first sentence (ending with "is exclusive") as the exclusive [6] jurisdiction clause, and to the second sentence (beginning with "Except as otherwise provided") as the exclusive remedies clause.

In an argument that would, if it were sound, likely apply to all elements of their statutory analysis, plaintiffs invoke the following sentence uttered by the Board: "When Congress removed rail transportation contracts from the Board's regulatory purview, it expressly stated that not only state contract laws but also federal and state antitrust laws would apply fully to those agreements." *Kan. City Power & Light Co. v. Union Pac. R.R. Co., No. 42095, 2007 STB LEXIS 137, 2007 WL 934378, at 3 (S.T.B. Mar. 26, 2007). Plaintiffs argue in a footnote that we should defer to this statement under Chevron, U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Res. Def. Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 104 S. Ct. 2778, 81 L. Ed. 2d 694 (1984).

Lest there be any confusion on the point, we note at the outset that Congress did not "expressly state" what the Board said it had. The Board in fact cited only the House committee report, which on the page referred to by the Board merely stated, "If anti-competitive behavior is alleged, under this section, the antitrust laws are the appropriate and only remedy available." Comm. on Interstate & Foreign Commerce, [7] Staggers Rail Act of 1980, H.R. Rep. No. 96-1035, at 58 (1980), as reprinted in 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. 3978, 4003.

In any event plaintiffs' conclusory assertion that we owe the statement Chevron deference encounters insuperable hurdles. First, we've several times noted that whether an agency decision against preemption of a state or local law receives Chevron deference is an open question in this circuit. See Riffin v. Surface Transportation Bd., 592 F.3d 195, 197, 389 U.S. App. D.C. 142 (D.C. Cir. 2010); Albany Eng'g Corp. v. FERC, 548 F.3d 1071, 1074-75, 383 U.S. App. D.C. 384 (2008). Yet plaintiffs offer no argument on the question; we commonly treat such an omission as a waiver. See, e.g., United States v. Hughes, 514 F.3d 15, 18, 379 U.S. App. D.C. 332 (D.C. Cir. 2008). The Supreme Court's recent treatment of the issue in Wyeth v. Levine, 129 S. Ct. 1187, 173 L. Ed. 2d 51 (2009), declaring that HN4[] "agencies have no special authority to pronounce on pre-emption absent delegation by Congress," id. at 1201, which several circuits have invoked in declining deference, see, e.g., *Franks [447] [216] Inv. Co. v. Union Pac. R.R. Co., 593 F.3d 404, 414 (5th Cir. 2010); Barrientos v. 1801-1825 Morton LLC, 583 F.3d 1197, 1214 (9th Cir. 2009), obviously puts the Chevron [8] deference claim in further doubt.

But assuming in plaintiffs' favor that agencies are due Chevron deference for their rulings on preemption of state law, the Board's inaccurate remark in Kansas City Power & Light would not be due such deference. The Board was engaged in resolving whether it had jurisdiction over a shipper's complaint: it would if the rates in question were common carrier tariff rates subject to 49 U.S.C. § 10701(d)(1) (2006); id. § 10702, but would not if they were "contract rates" under § 10709. Because the rates fell into the common carrier classification under Board precedent, and the parties had reasonably relied thereon, it found jurisdiction but started a rulemaking to clarify the boundary between the two. It made the quoted observation about state antitrust claims only to illustrate the undisputed proposition that the classification had consequences. Such a dictum is plainly not entitled to Chevron deference. See United States v. Mead Corp., 533 U.S. 218, 228, 121 S. Ct. 2164, 150 L. Ed. 2d 292 (2001). What we have just said also disposes of any possible claim that we owe the remark deference under Skidmore v. Swift & Co., 323 U.S. 134, 140, 65 S. Ct. 161, 89 L. Ed. 124 (1944).

Thus we address the parties' arguments de novo.

* [9] * *

Plaintiffs object to the district court's preemption decision on two principal grounds. First, they say that § 10501(b)'s preemption provisions do not apply at all to freight transported pursuant to private contracts that are not generally subject to challenge before the Board. Second, they say that even if those provisions apply to such transportation, the state law remedies they seek are not remedies "with respect to regulation of rail transportation" and are therefore not the sort of remedies that § 10501(b) preempts.

Plaintiffs' argument that the preemption language of § 10501(b) does not apply to freight transported under private rail contracts has two related aspects: First, in plaintiffs' view, only the exclusive remedies clause is relevant to ICCTA preemption analysis; they criticize the district court for relying on cases discussing the exclusive jurisdiction clause to support its preemption holding, noting that the clause does not use the word "preemption." Second, the exclusive remedies clause has an express provision for exceptions "as otherwise provided in this part," and plaintiffs argue that their state law claims fall within that exception. We will start with § 10709(c)'s [10] provision of an exception:

> HN5[] (1) A contract that is authorized by this section, and transportation under such contract, shall not be subject to this part, and may not be subsequently challenged before the Board or in any court on the grounds that such contract violates a provision of this part.
> (2) The exclusive remedy for any alleged breach of a contract entered into under this section shall be an action in an appropriate State court or United States district court, unless the parties otherwise agree. This section does not confer original jurisdiction on the district courts of the United States based on section 1331 or 1337 of title 28, United States Code.

49 U.S.C. § 10709(c) (2006).

Plaintiffs read § 10709(c)(1) as taking private contracts completely outside the federal regulatory regime and as permitting plenary state regulation of freight moving under such contracts. This is a [217] plainly [*448] erroneous reading. The provision merely limits the Board's authority over the terms of private contracts. [3] The limitation was imposed as part of surface freight deregulation legislation adopted over the past several decades. It was not intended to restore any regulatory authority to the states.

Both the exclusive jurisdiction clause of the provision now found in § 10501(b), and the rule removing private contracts from federal regulation, were originally added to the U.S. Code as part of the Staggers Rail Act of 1980. See Pub. L. No. 96-448, § 208, 94 Stat. 1895, 1909 (originally codified at 49 U.S.C. § 10713(i) (1994), now codified as amended at 49 U.S.C. § 10709(c) (2006)) (private contracts); id. § 214(c)(5), 94 Stat. at 1915 (originally codified at 49 U.S.C. § 10501(d) (1994), now codified as amended at 49 U.S.C. § 10501(b) (2006)) (preemption). Contrary to plaintiffs' assertions that federal preemption of state remedies was first introduced in 1995, see Appellants' Br. at 29 (asserting that "[u]nder the Interstate Commerce Act remedies were not exclusive, but rather cumulative"), in fact the Staggers Act's exclusive jurisdiction clause gave preemption of state remedies an explicit statutory basis. G. & T. Terminal Packaging Co. v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 830 F.2d 1230, 1234 (3d Cir. 1987) [12] (so holding, but noting that longstanding judicial interpretations of pre-Staggers Act legislation also had much preemptive effect).

Indeed, courts found many state laws respecting rail transportation to be preempted following the Staggers Act even though it contained only the exclusive jurisdiction clause and not a separate exclusive remedies clause such as exists today. Thus G. & T. Terminal Packaging Co. held, "Since [§ 10501(d) (1982)], as illuminated by legislative history, makes clear that the only remedies regarding rail rates are those provided by federal statutes, the savings clause, 49 U.S.C. § 10103 (1982) [which preserved common law "[e]xcept as otherwise provided in this subtitle"], has no application to this case." *Id.; Gendron v. Chi. & N. W. Transp. Co., 139 Ill. 2d 422, 564 N.E. 2d 1207, 1218, 151 Ill. [3] A quite [11] separate way in which Board authority may be curtailed is through the Board's exercise of its authority under 49 U.S.C. § 10502(a) to "exempt a person, class of persons, or a transaction or service" on the making of certain findings.

reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. 850, 852 ("[S]ince 1980, former section 10501(d) [predecessor of the current exclusive jurisdiction clause] and 11501(b) [a provision dropped in 1995, providing for limited state regulation under strict ICC supervision], with respect to rail transportation, had already replaced the former standard of cumulative remedies with an exclusive Federal standard, in order to assure uniform administration of the regulatory standards of the Staggers Act."); cf. People v. Consolidated Rail Corp.., 245 Ill. App. 3d 167, 613 N.E.2d 784, 793-94, 184 Ill. Dec. 467 (Ill. App. Ct. 1993) (arguing that former § 10501(d) "merely provides that to the extent of the jurisdiction conferred by the Commerce Act, the ICC and State authorities have exclusive jurisdiction with respect to transportation by rail carriers"; but the context was a claim that the Staggers Act preempted state environmental regulation, [*449] [218] an issue which, as we explain below, is quite distinct from regulation of railroad-shipper relations).

This pulls both legs out from under plaintiffs' argument that § 10501(b)'s [14] exclusivity provisions do not apply to the contract traffic in question. The exclusive jurisdiction clause and the cases construing it are relevant to the present issue, and § 10709's exception, whatever its ultimate effect, leaves § 10501(b) applicable to contract traffic.

The current provision largely removing private contracts from federal regulation (§ 10709(c)) also had its genesis in the Staggers Act. Railroads were authorized to enter into such contracts, and required to file them with the ICC, consistent with tariff rules to be developed by the Commission so as to make their essential terms available to the public. The Staggers Act directed the Commission to approve such contracts except in very limited circumstances. See Pub. L. No. 96-448, § 208, 94 Stat. at 1908-10 (originally codified as amended at 49 U.S.C. § 10713 (1994), now codified as amended at 49 U.S.C. § 10709 (2006)). Once so approved, a contract could not be challenged for violation of "this subtitle [subtitle IV, governing economic regulation of railroads]." Id. at 1909 (originally codified at 49 U.S.C. § 10713(i)(1) (1994), now codified as amended at 49 U.S.C. § 10709(c)(1) (2006)). Congress intended in 1980 [15] to "clarif[y] the status of contract rate and service agreements in an effort to encourage carriers and purchasers of rail service to make widespread use of such agreements." H.R. Rep. No. 96-1430, at 98-99 (1980) (Conf. Rep.), as reprinted in 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 4130-31. In its Rail Fuel Surcharges decision, the Board said that § 10709 left the ICC with "no authority to regulate rail rates and services that are governed by a contract." *2007 WL 201205, at 10.

Summarizing the Staggers Act's impact on the overall role of state law, the conference report said: "The remedies available against rail carriers with respect to rail rates, classifications, rules and practices are exclusively those provided by the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, and any other federal statutes which are not inconsistent with the Interstate Commerce Act. No state law or federal or state common law remedies are available." H.R. Rep. No. 96-1430, at 106 (emphasis added), as reprinted in 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 4138. Discussing the new private contracts provision, the report noted, "The existing Federal antitrust laws apply to this section," see id. at 101, as reprinted in 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 4133, suggesting [16] by negative inference that state antitrust laws generally did not apply. By that stage, then, Congress had clearly preempted state regulation of rail transportation, both for ICC-regulated freight and freight moving under private contracts.

We then must consider whether any of the changes wrought by the ICCTA itself reduced the scope of Staggers Act preemption. They did not. HN6[] The ICCTA did add the exclusive remedies clause to § 10501, along with the caveat that it would apply "[e]xcept as otherwise provided in this part." But, as we said earlier, this provision was merely a reorganization of pre-1995 law, under which federal remedies with respect to rail transportation were already exclusive, subject to parties' rights to contract enforcement. H.R. Rep. No. 104-422, at 167, as reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 852 ("[S]ince 1980, former section 10501(d) and 11501(b), with respect to rail transportation, had already replaced the former standard of cumulative remedies with an exclusive Federal standard, in order to assure uniform administration of the regulatory standards of the Staggers Act."). Plaintiffs' view would require us to infer that the addition of the general "[e]xcept [*450] [219] as otherwise [17] provided in this part" clause somehow converted § 10709(c)(1)'s pre-existing provision for private contracts into a new source of state regulatory authority. See 49 U.S.C. § 10709(c)(1) (2006) (originally codified prior to amendment at 49 U.S.C. § 10713(i)(1) (1994)). They offer no reason supporting such a transformation.

The ICCTA, to be sure, altered the context slightly, but entirely in a deregulatory direction, making it most improbable that Congress intended to invite state regulatory authority into the picture. First, Congress further narrowed the authority of the regulatory agency (now the STB) to regulate private contracts, principally by eliminating certain procedures that allowed rather limited challenges before the old ICC. See H.R. Rep. No. 104-422, at 174, as reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 859 (describing the eliminated procedures as "very limited and seldom utilized"). But HN7[] there was no change in § 10709(c)'s provision that contract rail transport "shall not be subject" to the provisions of the Act, meaning that the 1995 Act did not effect any substantive change on that score. See Pub. L. No. 104-88, § 102(a), 109 Stat. at 817 (codified at 49 U.S.C. § 10709(c)(1) (2006)).

Further, [18] HN8[] in one respect Congress explicitly expanded the scope of preemption: it deleted from the exclusive jurisdiction clause any reference to ICC-certified state authorities and the associated certification procedures. See Pub. L. No. 96-448, § 214(c)(5), 94 Stat. at 1915 (originally codified at 49 U.S.C. § 10501(d) (1994), now codified as amended at 49 U.S.C. § 10501(b) (2006)) ("The jurisdiction of the Commission and of State authorities (to the extent such authorities are authorized to administer the standards and procedures of this title pursuant to this section and section 11501(b) of this title) over transportation by rail carriers, and the remedies provided in this title with respect to the rates, classifications, rules, and practices of such carriers, is exclusive."). This of course was a deregulatory move--not, as plaintiffs would have us believe, an invitation to states to fill the regulatory void created by federal deregulation. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 104-176, at 6 (1995) ("The bill would also eliminate Federal certification and review procedures for State regulation of intrastate rail transportation. However, nothing in this bill should be construed to authorize States to regulate [19] railroads in areas where Federal regulation has been repealed by this bill.").

In short, the ICCTA left the exclusive jurisdiction clause in full force, supplementing it with the exclusive remedies clause and its explicit exception, expressly alluding to the pre-existing § 10709(c)'s provision for contract actions.

Plaintiffs' fallback argument is that their state law claims do not involve "regulation of rail transportation" and therefore are not preempted by § 10501(b). The district court discussed the state law claims of each type as a general class without discussing any state-to-state differences among the laws, see In re Rail Freight Fuel Surcharge Antitrust Litig., 593 F. Supp. 2d at 37-39, and on appeal both parties have generally followed the same approach. We therefore treat the plaintiffs as having waived any argument that unique aspects of certain states' law governing consumer protection, unjust enrichment, or antitrust might compel a different result for a class of plaintiffs whose claims would be governed by such laws. We will proceed, as the parties have, on the assumption that any differences in individual states' laws are immaterial to the preemption analysis.

[*451] [220] Plaintiffs [20] correctly point out that HN9[] the ICCTA does not preempt all state and local regulations. The circuits appear generally, for example, to find preemption of environmental regulations, or similar exercises of police powers relating to public health or safety, only when the state regulations are either discriminatory or unduly burdensome. See, e.g., Adrian & Blissfield R.R. Co. v. Village of Blissfield, 550 F.3d 533, 539 (6th Cir. 2008); Green Mountain R.R. Corp. v. Vermont, 404 F.3d 638, 643-44 (2d Cir. 2005) (including risk of permitting delay in assessment of burden); N.Y. Susquehanna & W. Ry. Corp. v. Jackson, 500 F.3d 238, 252-55 (3d Cir. 2007); Friberg v. Kansas City S. Ry. Co., 267 F.3d 439 (5th Cir. 2001) (finding common law nuisance preempted); Fla. E. Coast Ry. Co. v. City of W. Palm Beach, 266 F.3d 1324, 1331 (11th Cir. 2001)); cf. City of Auburn v. U.S. Gov't, 154 F.3d 1025, 1030 (9th Cir. 1998) (seeming to apply a broader preemption rule). Several of the cases, in addressing these environmental regulations, note that the ICCTA "does not preempt only explicit economic regulation." N.Y. Susquehanna & W. Ry. Corp., 500 F.3d at 252; see also City of Auburn, 154 F.3d at 1030 (similar). [21] By implication, such cases recognize that the core of ICCTA preemption is "economic regulation," which we take to refer to regulation of the relationship before us here, that of shippers and carriers.

Railroad-shipper transactions indeed pose a problem quite different from environmental regulation. As we have seen, HN10[] § 10709(c)(1) explicitly makes actions in state or federal court the "exclusive remedy for any alleged breach of a contract entered into under this section." This provision for conventional contract enforcement obviously is an "[e]xcept[ion] . . . otherwise provided in this part" contemplated by the exclusive remedies clause. And courts readily provide such remedies. See PCS Phosphate Co. v. Norfolk S. Corp., 559 F.3d 212 (4th Cir. 2009) (affirming contract enforcement); PCI Transp., Inc. v. Fort Worth & W. R.R. Co., 418 F.3d 535, 545-46 (5th Cir. 2005) (recognizing propriety of state law contract claim but denying relief on the merits).

By contrast, the circuits have found shippers' quests for non-contractual relief to be preempted as would-be invasions of the regulatory domain. Thus in Port City Props. v. Union Pac. R.R., 518 F.3d 1186 (10th Cir. 2008), the court preserved [22] a shipper's contract claim against a railroad for ceasing service on a spur but found its tort claim to be completely preempted by ICCTA. Id. at 1188-91. And in G. & T. Terminal Packaging Co., the court found that, for shipments exempted from regulation, the Staggers Act had completely preempted state common law remedies for railroad price discrimination among shippers. 830 F.2d at 1233-36.

The legislative history supports the courts' refusal to let non-contract state law intrude into the statutorily preserved shipper-carrier remedies. As the House Report on ICCTA said, "Although States retain the police powers reserved by the Constitution, the Federal scheme of economic regulation and deregulation is intended to address and encompass all such regulation and to be completely exclusive." H.R. Rep. No. 104-311, at 95-96 (1995) (emphasis in original), as reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. 793, 808; see also H.R. Rep. No. 104-422, at 167, as reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 852 (noting that some criminal statutes are not preempted by the ICCTA "because they do not generally collide with the scheme of economic regulation (and deregulation) of rail transportation" (emphasis added)); H.R. Rep. [23] No. 96-1430, at 105, as reprinted in 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 4137 (noting that the Staggers Act "reaffirms that where the commission has withdrawn its jurisdiction [*452] [221] to regulate, the State could not assume such jurisdiction"). [4] As the legislative comments quoted above make clear, HN11[] Congress sought to avert the sort of frustration of its deregulatory purpose potentially inflicted by state rights and remedies outside the specifically preserved realm of contract breach.

Congress also recognized that enforcement of state law outside the contract realm could easily lead to balkanization, with shipments subject to fluctuating rules as they crossed state lines. As the House Report on ICCTA said: "Although States retain the police powers reserved by the Constitution, the Federal scheme of economic regulation and deregulation is intended to address and encompass all such regulation and to be completely exclusive. Any other construction would undermine the uniformity of Federal standards and risk the balkanization and subversion of the Federal scheme of minimal regulation for this intrinsically interstate form of transportation." H.R. Rep. No. 104-311, at 96, as reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 808. [5] State antitrust claims obviously present a risk of balkanized legal norms, a risk not posed by federal antitrust law.

As pitched in this litigation, plaintiffs' state law claims would directly interfere with the ICCTA's deregulatory objectives. Plaintiffs left the basis for many of these claims unclear in their complaint, asserting only conclusorily that the defendants had violated various state laws. E.g., Indirect Purchasers' Consol. Am. Compl. P 155 (alleging, without further elaboration, that "[d]efendants have engaged in unfair competition or unfair or deceptive acts or practices in violation of New York Gen. Bus. Law § 349 et seq.; and New York common law against restraints of trade"). But the legal theories plaintiffs have presented in briefing make clear that these claims are designed as a means of getting the district court to apply state law to assess the substantive "fairness" of the contracts the railroads entered into, including with reference to the manner in which the rates were computed. See Davis v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co. Consol., 516 F.3d 955, 982 (11th Cir. 2008) (suggesting that if necessary a district [26] court may use Rule 12(c) motions and the parties' memoranda to make sense of plaintiffs' allegations).

[4] This Report is addressed to the original Senate proposal, which explicitly stated the point made in the report with language omitted from the ultimate version, but that in other respects did not go as far as the ultimate version in curtailing state regulatory authority. Compare S. Rep. No. 96-470, at 77-78 (1979) (Senate proposing that the statute contain a subsection making clear that "[f]ederal withdrawal from certain areas of regulation shall not be construed as relinquishing Federal jurisdiction"), with H.R. Rep. No. 96-1430, at 106, as reprinted in 1980 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 4138 (discussing House proposals, all adopted in the final version, that "only State authorities whose standards and procedures have been certified by the [24] Commission may exercise jurisdiction over intrastate rail," that "[d]ecisions of State authorities may be appealed to the Commission," and that "where the Interstate Commerce Act provides an exclusive remedy, such remedy is not in addition to remedies under another law or at common law").

[5] Although the House Report is addressing a bill that lacks [25] the phrase "with respect to rail transportation," there is no reason to suppose that inclusion of that phrase in the final bill reflected a congressional embrace of balkanization.

Thus, plaintiffs relied extensively before the district court on the argument that the Board, in Rail Fuel Surcharges, the proceeding that addressed fuel surcharges applied to common carrier freight, had found aspects of the rate computation "unfair" or "unreasonable." See Indirect Purchase Pls.' Mem. Opp'n Defs.' Joint Mot. Dismiss 40 ("[T]he STB has already determined that the fuel surcharges at issue [*453] [222] here are 'unreasonable,' 'misleading' and 'unfair' as contemplated by the consumer protection laws."); id. at 21 (describing this litigation as "seek[ing] recovery for conspiratorial and unfair overcharges" (emphasis added)); id. at 42 (characterizing the plaintiffs' claims as "challeng[ing] only the unfair and/or misleading nature of Defendants' fuel surcharges" (emphasis added)). And plaintiffs made no bones about their goal of extending the remedies that the STB ordered for regulated freight to freight over which Congress deliberately stripped the STB--and states--of any regulatory authority. See id. at 40 ("By raising consumer protection claims, Plaintiffs merely seek to enforce [27] the STB's ruling . . . for claims arising in private contract."); id. at 29 ("[T]he court is asked only to enforce the STB's finding of unreasonableness such that Plaintiffs may obtain adequate redress.").

The law applicable to § 10709(c) contracts, of course, may involve state common law doctrines such as fraud and consideration, doctrines that will in some cases cause a contract to be negated or even modified. But whatever the circumstances in which unjust enrichment, consumer protection, or antitrust claims may be unpreempted, they do not include those before us, where those claims are advanced as a means of challenging the substantive reasonableness of the rates charged under private contracts.

We should say a few additional words about plaintiffs' state law antitrust claims, because plaintiffs make one argument against preemption unique to such claims: They point out that a provision of the ICCTA, by creating a rule of evidence applicable to state law antitrust suits (as well as to federal ones), arguably contemplates preservation of state antitrust actions. The statute provides: HN12[] "In any proceeding in which it is alleged that a carrier was a party to an agreement, conspiracy, or [28] combination in violation of a Federal [antitrust] law . . . or of any similar State law, proof of an agreement, conspiracy, or combination may not be inferred from evidence that two or more rail carriers acted together with respect to an interline rate . . . [approved in accordance with § 10706(a)(2)]." 49 U.S.C. § 10706(a)(3)(B)(ii) (2006) (emphasis added). Plaintiffs also point to legislative history that seemed to contemplate the applicability of at least some antitrust law. For example: "The Conference provision retains this general rule, while clarifying that [§ 10501(b)'s] exclusivity is limited to remedies with respect to rail regulation--not State and Federal law generally. For example, criminal statutes governing antitrust matters not pre-empted by this Act, and laws defining such criminal offenses as bribery and extortion, remain fully applicable unless specifically displaced, because they do not generally collide with the scheme of economic regulation (and deregulation) of rail transportation." H.R. Rep. No. 104-422, at 167, as reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. 850, 852.

Although the question is not before us, there is nothing in our reasoning inconsistent with the notion that [29] some subset of state or federal antitrust claims might permissibly be brought against railroads, for price-fixing or other violations. The relevant question is not whether all potential antitrust suits are preempted, but rather whether this antitrust suit, as formulated by the plaintiffs, impermissibly infringes the federal deregulatory interests in the ICCTA.

There has been a tension--and in federal antitrust law a radical change over time--between the goal of increasing consumer welfare in the economic efficiency sense and contrasting goals such as protecting small competitors or preventing the concentration of economic or political [*454] [223] power without regard to economic efficiency. See Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 224, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993); Coastal Fuels of P.R., Inc. v. Caribbean Petrol. Corp., 79 F.3d 182, 192 (1st Cir. 1996). It is far from clear that state antitrust law has, as a general matter, made the transition that has marked federal law. See, e.g., Robert H. Bork, The Antitrust Paradox: A Policy at War with Itself 73-74 (Free Press 1993) (1978) (describing the movement to "consumer welfare orientation" under federal antitrust law); id. at 74-77 (discussing [30] early U.S. Supreme Court cases striking down state antitrust laws in which liability turned on the unreasonableness of prices); Richard A. Duncan & Alison K. Illinois Brick, which plaintiffs' suit expressly seeks to avoid, represents the Supreme Court's judgment that HN13[] allowing plaintiffs to use an indirect purchaser theory offensively, while prohibiting defendants from using the theory defensively, "would create a serious risk of multiple liability for defendants," and "the possibility of inconsistent adjudications." 431 U.S. at 730. Illinois Brick also rested on the proposition that full recovery for direct purchasers would generate more effective enforcement of the law. Id. at 734-35. Application of state laws rejecting Illinois Brick would jeopardize the federal interest in protecting railroad regulation from inefficient norms and balkanization.

We are presented in [31] this case with an antitrust claim that was unambiguously concerned not just with strict "economic efficiency" but also with resurrecting in a different form state-level regulation of railroads, by inviting judicial supervision of the reasonableness and fairness of rates charged to shippers. Allowing state law antitrust claims of this nature would undermine the deregulatory and anti-balkanization policies underlying the ICCTA. We need not address imaginable state antitrust claims that might not run afoul of either of those congressional policies.

Affirmed.

ORDER GRANTING DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS PLAINTIFFS' SECOND AMENDED COMPLAINT

Before the Court is defendants Pfizer Inc. and Wyeth's motion, filed January 22, 2010, to dismiss plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint. Plaintiffs Golden Gate Pharmacy Services, Inc., James Clayworth, R.Ph., Marin Apothecaries, Pediatric Care Pharmacy, Inc., Tony Mavrantonis, R.Ph., John O'Connell, R.Ph., and Tilley Apothecaries, Inc. have filed opposition, to which defendants have replied. Having read and considered the papers filed in support of and in opposition to the motion, the Court rules as follows. [1]

BACKGROUND

In their Second Amended Complaint ("SAC"), plaintiffs allege that each defendant is "engaged, inter alia, in the research, development, manufacture, distribution, and sale of pharmaceuticals products" (see SAC PP 11, 13), and that defendants "consummated [a] merger" on October 15, 2009 (see SAC P 81). Plaintiffs further allege: "The effect of the combination may be to lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly, and has already lessened competition and tended to create a monopoly, in numerous markets and submarkets . . . involving the manufacture and sale of pharmaceuticals and involving research, development, and innovation with respect to pharmaceuticals." (See SAC P 82.) Based on said allegations, plaintiffs assert a claim against defendants under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, and Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1.

LEGAL STANDARD

Dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure can be based [*4] on the lack of a cognizable legal theory or the absence of sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory. See Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990). Rule 8(a)(2), however, "requires only 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'" See Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (quoting Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2)). Consequently, "a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations." See id. Nonetheless, "a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." See id. (internal quotation, citation, and alteration omitted).

In analyzing a motion to dismiss, a district court must accept as true all material allegations in the complaint, and construe them in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. See NL Industries, Inc. v. Kaplan, 792 F.2d 896, 898 (9th Cir. 1986). "To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual material, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to [*5] relief that is plausible on its face.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570). "Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level[.]" Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Courts "are not bound to accept as true a legal conclusion couched as a factual allegation." See Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1950 (internal quotation and citation omitted); see, e.g., Kendall v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 518 F.3d 1042, 1047-48 (9th Cir. 2008) (holding plaintiff who alleged "only ultimate facts" and "legal conclusions," rather than "evidentiary facts," failed to state claim under Sherman Act).

DISCUSSION

As noted, plaintiffs allege defendants' merger violates Section 7 of the Clayton Act and Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Section 7 of the Clayton Act prohibits mergers or acquisitions "in any line of commerce or in any activity

[1] By order filed March 11, 2010, the Court took the matter under submission. Plaintiffs' Motion to Request Oral Argument, filed March 15, 2010, is hereby DENIED for the reasons stated in defendants' opposition thereto, specifically, that all parties have had an adequate opportunity to submit their respective arguments in writing. [*3] See, e.g., Partridge v. Reich, 141 F.3d 920, 926 (9th Cir. 1988) (holding, in context of motion for summary judgment, "a district court can decide the issue without oral argument if the parties can submit their papers to the court").

affecting commerce in any section of the country, [where] the effect of such acquisition may be substantially to lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly." See 15 U.S.C. § 18. Section 1 of the Sherman Act provides that any "contract, combination . . ., or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce" is "illegal." [*6] See 15 U.S.C. § 1.

In the SAC, plaintiffs allege that the merger has or will have "anticompetitive effects" in "the pharmaceutical market" and in "submarkets." (See SAC P 127.) Defendants argue that plaintiffs have failed to sufficiently allege a product market or market.

"Antitrust law requires [an] allegation of both a product market and a geographic market." Newcal Indus., Inc. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1045 n.4 (9th Cir. 2008). [2] "The outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it." Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962). "Interchangeability implies that one product is roughly equivalent to another for the use to which it is put," Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 437 (3rd Cir. 1997) (noting "while there may be some degree of preference for the one over the other, either would work effectively") (internal quotation and citation omitted), while "[c]ross-elasticity of demand is a measure of the substitutability of products from the point of view of buyers," see id. at 438 n.6 (internal quotation [*7] and citation omitted); see also White & White, Inc. v. American Hospital Supply Corp., 723 F.2d 495, 501 (6th Cir. 1983) (holding "a product market is [] defined by 'reasonable interchangeability' as gauged by the interchangeability of other products for the same use, and by consumer sensitivity and response to price fluctuations among available substitutes"). In short, a cognizable product market consists of "commodities reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes." See United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 395, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956).

"[A] complaint may be dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) if the complaint's 'relevant market' definition is facially unsustainable." Newcal Indus., 513 F.3d at 1045 (citing Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 436-37). "Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed [*8] relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted." Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 436; see, e.g., Tanaka v. University of Southern California, 252 F.3d 1059, 1063-64 (9th Cir. 2001) (affirming dismissal of antitrust claims where plaintiff athlete identified product market as "UCLA women's soccer program" but failed to allege any facts to support "conclusory" assertion that such market existed); Big Bear Lodging Ass'n v. Snow Summit, Inc., 182 F.3d 1096, 1105 (9th Cir. 1999) (holding, where plaintiffs alleged existence of "product markets for lodging accommodations and ski packages" in Big Bear Valley, district court properly dismissed antitrust claims because plaintiffs failed to allege "there are no other goods or services that are reasonably interchangeable with lodging accommodations or ski packages within [the] geographic market" of Big Bear Valley).

Here, plaintiffs, in the SAC, identify the product market(s) as follows: "Defendants Pfizer and Wyeth compete in what they describe to be the pharmaceutical [*9] industry which includes, but is not necessarily limited to, the following submarkets: manufacture, sale and innovation of all pharmaceutical products, prescription pharmaceutical products, non-prescription pharmaceutical products, brand name pharmaceutical products and particular pharmaceutical products and therapies specifically noted and identified by Pfizer and Wyeth in their annual reports." (See SAC P 86.)

Plaintiffs fail to allege that all commodities sold by entities who compete in the "pharmaceutical industry" are reasonably interchangeable with one another, or that "all pharmaceutical products," all "prescription pharmaceutical products," all "non-prescription pharmaceutical products," or all "brand-name pharmaceuticals products" are reasonably interchangeable with one another. As the Court noted in its order dismissing the First Amended Complaint, with reference to plaintiffs' allegation included therein that all prescription drugs constituted a product

[2] Plaintiffs allege that the "anticompetitive effects" of the merger will be felt "in the United States." (See SAC P 127.) Defendants have not argued that plaintiffs' allegation of a nationwide market is insufficient to allege a geographic market.

market, the Court cannot "simply assume that all prescription drugs are reasonably interchangeable for the same purposes, such that, for example, if the price of a prescription drug used to treat osteoporosis rises, consumers [*10] may react by switching to a prescription drug used to treat Alzheimer's disease." (See Order, filed December 2, 2009, at 5:1-5.)

Plaintiffs argue that they have sufficiently alleged "interchangeability, both in the pharmaceutical product markets and in the innovation market for pharmaceutical products." (See Pls.' Opp., filed February 5, 2010, at 15:3-4.) In support of such argument, plaintiffs rely on the following allegations in the SAC:

> The prices charged by Pfizer for its pharmaceutical products has a direct effect and impact on the prices charged by Wyeth for its products, whether they are direct substitutes or not.

(See SAC P 52.)

> The prices charged by Wyeth for its pharmaceutical products has a direct effect and impact on the prices charged by Pfizer for its products, whether they are direct substitutes or not.

(See SAC P 53.)

> Wyeth considers the prices charged by Pfizer for pharmaceutical products when Wyeth sets its prices for its pharmaceutical products, whether they be substitute therapies or not.

(See SAC P 54.)

> Pfizer considers the prices charged by Wyeth for pharmaceutical products when Pfizer sets its prices for its pharmaceutical products, whether they be substitute therapies [*11] or not.

(See SAC P 55.)

The above allegations, construed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs and assumed true at the pleading stage, would support a finding that, for example, the price Wyeth charges for a product intended for use to treat depression has some type of effect on the price charged by Pfizer for products intended for use to treat renal-cell carcinoma, or, as another example, a finding that before Wyeth, in determining the price at which Wyeth will sell a product intended for use to treat depression, first considers the price at which Pfizer is selling products that are intended for use to treat renal-cell carcinoma. Plaintiffs fail to allege, however, that any such pricing considerations have any bearing on consumer behavior, e.g., that a consumer who seeks to purchase a product for use to treat depression will react to a price change by purchasing a product used to treat renal-cell carcinoma. See United States v. General Dynamics Corp., 341 F. Supp. 534, 555 (N.D. Ill. 1972) ("Any definition of a line of commerce which ignores the buyers and focuses on what the sellers do, or theoretically can do, is not meaningful."), aff'd, 415 U.S. 486, 94 S. Ct. 1186, 39 L. Ed. 2d 530 (1974). Consequently, the [*12] Court finds the above-quoted allegations on which plaintiffs rely are insufficient to support a finding that "all pharmaceutical products," all "prescription pharmaceutical products," all "non-prescription pharmaceutical products," and all "brand name pharmaceutical products" constitute cognizable product markets for purposes of plaintiffs' antitrust claims. See Apple Inc. v. Psystar Corp., 586 F. Supp. 2d 1190, 1196 (N.D. Cal. 2008) ("Whether products are part of the same or different markets under antitrust law depends on whether consumers view those products as reasonable substitutes for one another and would switch among them in response to changes in relative prices[.]");

As noted, plaintiffs, in the SAC, also identify, as a product market or markets, "particular pharmaceutical products and therapies specifically noted and identified by Pfizer and Wyeth in their annual reports." (See SAC P 86.) The SAC does not state, however, what "particular" products or therapies were so identified in defendants' respective annual reports. In any event, plaintiffs fails to allege that any such products or therapies are, from the point of view of the buyers thereof, reasonably interchangeable. [*13] Consequently, plaintiffs' conclusory reference to the existence of "particular pharmaceutical products and therapies" is insufficient to allege a cognizable product market or markets. See Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 436 (holding where "plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand," complaint is subject to dismissal). [3]

To the extent plaintiffs allege there exists or existed "actual or potential competition between Pfizer and Wyeth" with respect to various "products," such allegations likewise are insufficient to plead a claim. In connection with such allegation, plaintiffs list the following: "'other primary' pharmaceutical products"; "'urological' products"; "'central nervous system' products"; "'cardiovascular' products"; "'capsugel' products"; "'oncological' products"; "'animal health' products"; "'consumer' products"; "'nutritional' products"; "'inflammation' products"; "'infectious disease' products"; and "'other specialty' products." (See SAC PP 39-50.) [4] No further allegations concerning any such "products" are provided by plaintiffs, and, again, plaintiffs fail to allege that the goods included within any such described category, e.g., all "'consumer' products" or all "'infectious disease' products," are reasonably interchangeable by buyers. Accordingly, such references in the SAC, if intended [*15] by plaintiffs to identify product markets or submarkets, are insufficient to state a claim.

Finally, plaintiffs argue that if the Court were to find the instant pleading is subject to dismissal, such a ruling would run counter to five Supreme Court decisions, each of which decisions, according to plaintiffs, "enjoined a merger where the market share pales in comparison to the market share at issue in defendants' merger." (See Pls.' Opp. at 23:14-15.) As defendants correctly observe, however, the issue of "market share" can only be addressed after a cognizable product market has been identified. See United States v. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 353 U.S. 586, 593, 77 S. Ct. 872, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1057 (1957) ("Determination of the relevant market is a necessary predicate to a finding of a violation of the Clayton Act because the threatened monopoly must be one which will substantially lessen competition 'within the area of effective competition.' Substantiality can be [*16] determined only in terms of the market affected.").

Indeed, to the extent the cases cited by plaintiffs address the issue of product market, the Supreme Court, before considering whether the merger at issue therein should have been enjoined, first identified the alleged product market, and then considered whether the commodities or services at issue were reasonably interchangeable by the purchasers of such commodities or services. See United States v. Aluminum Co. of America, 377 U.S. 271, 276-77, 84 S. Ct. 1283, 12 L. Ed. 2d 314 (1964) (finding relevant product market consisted of both "bare and insulated aluminum conductor products," where "[b]oth types [were] used for the purpose of conducting electricity and [were] sold to the same customers, electrical utilities"); United States v. Philadelphia Nat'l Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 335, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915 (1963) (finding personal loans provided by "small-loan companies" and personal loans provided by "commercial banks" were not reasonably interchangeable, because "small-loan companies' rates are invariably much higher than the banks"); Brown Shoe Co., 370 U.S. at 297-99, 326 (affirming district court's finding that, when examining propriety of merger between manufacturers of shoes, relevant "lines [*17] of commerce" were "product lines" of men's, women's and children's shoes, as opposed to "footwear" or "shoes as a whole"). [5]

[3] In their First Amended Complaint ("FAC"), plaintiffs alleged that separate product markets exist for the manufacture and sale of drugs to treat Alzheimer's disease, renal-cell carcinoma, and Methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus infections (see FAC PP 17(f), 17(h)-(i), 27-28), for the research and development of new drugs to treat osteoporosis and to treat Alzheimer's disease (see FAC PP 17(e), 17(g), 29-30), for brand name antidepressants, anti-bacterials, and anti-neoplastics (see FAC PP 17(j)-(l), 24-26), and for the manufacture and sale of drugs to treat specified animal diseases or conditions, such as "canine monovalent vaccines for the prevention and treatment of disease caused by parvovirus" and "equine tapeworm parasiticides containing praziquantel" (see [*14] FAC PP 21(m), 31, Ex. A P 7). Plaintiffs, however, did not include such allegations in the SAC, and, consequently, the Court does not consider whether such alleged product markets would be cognizable.

[4] Plaintiffs attribute the descriptions of such products, e.g., "other primary," "capsugel," and "nutritional," to Pfizer. (See SAC PP 39, 43, 47.) Plaintiffs do not allege the circumstances under which, or the context in which, such descriptions were used.

[5] The other two Supreme Court cases on which plaintiffs rely contain no discussion with respect to the product markets identified therein. See United States v. Pabst Brewing Co., 384 U.S. 546, 548, 86 S. Ct. 1665, 16 L. Ed. 2d 765 (1966) (noting plaintiff had alleged merger at issue would have anticompetitive effect in market for "the production and sale of beer," and deciding whether plaintiff had established geographic market); United States v. Von's Grocery Co., 384 U.S. 270, 271, 278, 86 S. Ct. 1478, 16 L.

In sum, plaintiffs have failed to sufficiently allege the existence of a cognizable product market, because plaintiffs have failed to allege, even as a legal conclusion, let alone with the requisite "evidentiary facts," see Kendall, 518 F.3d at 1047-48, that any of the alleged markets or submarkets identified in the SAC consists of products reasonably interchangeable by consumers. Consequently, the SAC is subject to dismissal. See [*18] id. at 1045 (holding antitrust complaint subject to dismissal where "complaint's 'relevant market' definition is facially unsustainable"); Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 436 (holding "relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted," where "plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand").

CONCLUSION

For the reasons discussed above, defendants' motion to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint is hereby GRANTED, and the Second Amended Complaint is hereby DISMISSED.

The Clerk shall close the file.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

To meet their initial summary judgment burden on their claim for injunctive relief for an alleged Sherman Act violation, the plaintiffs must show (1) threatened loss or injury cognizable in equity; (2) proximately resulting from the alleged antitrust violation. The initial question is whether the plaintiffs have raised a genuine issue of material fact sufficient to show a threat of antitrust injury if the defendant engages in future violations of the type alleged. In other words, to meet their burden the plaintiffs must demonstrate a significant threat of injury from an impending violation of the antitrust laws or from a contemporary violation likely to continue or recur.

HN9[] Standards of Review, Abuse of Discretion

Because the applicability vel non of collateral estoppel is a question of law, an appellate court ordinarily exercise plenary review over a district court's collateral estoppel analysis. However, where a plaintiff seeks to collaterally estop a defendant from relitigating an issue from previous litigation in which the defendant was a party but the plaintiff was not, appellate review is limited to deciding whether the district court abused its discretion.

Civil Procedure > ... > Preclusion of Judgments > Estoppel > Collateral Estoppel

HN10[] Estoppel, Collateral Estoppel

Under the doctrine of collateral estoppel, once an issue is actually and necessarily determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, that determination is conclusive in subsequent suits based on a different cause of action involving a party to the prior litigation. The following four elements are required for the doctrine to apply: (1) the identical issue was previously adjudicated; (2) the issue was actually litigated; (3) the previous determination was necessary to the decision; and (4) the party being precluded from relitigating the issue was fully represented in the prior action.

Civil Procedure > ... > Preclusion of Judgments > Estoppel > Collateral Estoppel

HN11[] Estoppel, Collateral Estoppel

The application of collateral estoppel is inappropriate if any one element is not met.

Civil Procedure > ... > Preclusion of Judgments > Estoppel > Collateral Estoppel

HN12[] Estoppel, Collateral Estoppel

If issues are determined but the judgment is not dependent upon the determinations, relitigation of those issues in a subsequent action between the parties is not precluded by collateral estoppel. Such determinations have the characteristics of dicta, and may not ordinarily be the subject of an appeal by the party against whom they were made. In these circumstances, the interest in providing an opportunity for a considered determination, which if adverse may be the subject of an appeal, outweighs the interest in avoiding the burden of relitigation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Preclusion of Judgments > Estoppel > Collateral Estoppel

HN13[] Estoppel, Collateral Estoppel

In determining whether an issue was essential to the judgment for purposes of collateral estoppel, a court must look to whether the issue was critical to the judgment or merely dicta.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Materiality of Facts

HN17[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Legal Entitlement

A party moving for summary judgment must clear two hurdles to meet its initial burden. It must show that (1) there are no genuine questions of material fact; and (2) the party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c).

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > Altering & Amending Judgments

HN18[] Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

The purpose of a motion for reconsideration is to correct manifest errors of law or fact or to present newly discovered evidence. Accordingly, a judgment may be altered or amended if the party seeking reconsideration shows at least one of the following grounds: (1) an intervening change in the controlling law; (2) the availability of new evidence that was not available when the court granted the motion for summary judgment; or (3) the need to correct a clear error of law or fact or to prevent manifest injustice.

HN19[] Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

"New evidence," for reconsideration purposes, does not refer to evidence that a party obtains or submits to the court after an adverse ruling. Rather, new evidence in this context means evidence that a party could not earlier submit to the court because that evidence was not previously available.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Reviewability of Lower Court Decisions > Preservation for Review

HN31[] Reviewability of Lower Court Decisions, Preservation for Review

In the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, issues that are not specifically presented to the district court ordinarily are waived on appeal. It is true that the court of appeals has the discretionary power to address issues that have been waived, and it sometimes exercise that power when prompted by exceptional circumstances.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Reviewability of Lower Court Decisions > Preservation for Review

HN32[] Reviewability of Lower Court Decisions, Preservation for Review

The doctrine of waiver does not serve as a surprise-avoidance mechanism alone. It ensures that a particular issue is given a full airing, permitting each party to present its views and the trial court to make an initial determination. Most important, the doctrine allows the appellate court to review both those views and that determination in arriving at its own considered judgment.

[*243] OPINION OF THE COURT

FISHER, Circuit Judge.

These two antitrust cases, brought by two dental laboratories against an artificial tooth manufacturer and many of its dealers, are before us for the second time. In the first of the two cases, we must decide whether the District Court properly denied the plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on their monopolization claim against the manufacturer as well as the Court's denial of the plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration of its summary judgment ruling and subsequent dismissal of their complaint. In the second case, we must decide whether the District Court properly dismissed the plaintiffs' conspiracy to restrain trade and conspiracy to monopolize claims against both the manufacturer and its dealers for failure to state a claim. Although for slightly different reasons than those articulated by the [3] District Court, we agree with the District Court's conclusions and will affirm its rulings.

I.

These appeals arise from two related antitrust cases filed in the United States District Court for the District of Delaware: Howard Hess Dental Laboratories, Inc. v. Dentsply International, Inc. ("Hess") and Jersey Dental Laboratories v. Dentsply [*244] International, Inc. ("Jersey Dental"). [1] Because we set forth the factual background of both cases in great detail in a prior appeal, see Howard Hess Dental Labs. Inc. v. Dentsply Int'l, Inc., 424 F.3d 363 (3d Cir. 2005) ("Hess I"), we recite here only those facts required for the resolution of this appeal.

The plaintiffs in both cases are two dental laboratories (referred to in this opinion as the "Plaintiffs"). One of the defendants in both Hess and Jersey Dental, Dentsply International, Inc., manufactures artificial teeth, among other things, which it sells to the Plaintiffs and other laboratories through a network of authorized dealers (referred to in this opinion as the "Dealers"), several of which are named defendants only in Jersey Dental. The Plaintiffs [4] use Dentsply's artificial teeth to make dentures. In both cases, the Plaintiffs essentially allege that Dentsply "foreclosed its competitors' access to [D]ealers by explicitly agreeing with some [D]ealers that they will not carry certain competing brands of teeth and by inducing other [D]ealers not to carry those competing brands of teeth" and that Dentsply, "by agreement [with] its [D]ealers, . . . set[] the [D]ealers' resale prices." Hess I, 424 F.3d at 367. In so doing, the Plaintiffs allege, Dentsply "caused [the] Plaintiffs to purchase Dentsply's teeth at artificially high prices and lose profits from unrealized sales of Dentsply's competitors' teeth." Id.

The Plaintiffs brought the Hess suit against Dentsply in 1999, alleging several antitrust conspiracies and seeking both monetary and injunctive relief. The District Court granted Dentsply's subsequent motion for summary judgment on the Plaintiffs' damages claim, concluding that the Plaintiffs lacked standing under Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977). In 2001, the Plaintiffs brought the Jersey Dental suit against Dentsply as well as several of its Dealers, again alleging several antitrust conspiracies and again [5] asking for damages and injunctive relief, and the District Court again dismissed the Plaintiffs' damages claims on the basis of Illinois Brick. The District Court also denied the Plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend their complaint, concluding that the proposed amendment would be futile. The Plaintiffs thereafter brought an interlocutory appeal in this Court.

On appeal, we affirmed in part and reversed in part. Hess I, 424 F.3d 363. We held that in Hess the Plaintiffs could not recover damages under a coconspirator exception or a control exception to Illinois Brick and could not recover non-overcharge damages. In Jersey Dental, we held that the Plaintiffs did not have statutory standing to recover lost profits damages but that they did have statutory standing to recover damages from Dentsply for its alleged price-fixing conspiracy with its Dealers. While we adopted a "limited" general coconspirator exception to Illinois Brick, we found that exception inapplicable to the Plaintiffs, and thus concluded that they could not pursue damages under the coconspirator exception. Hess I, 424 F.3d at 383-84. In summary, we held that the Plaintiffs could not recover any damages in Hess and most [6] damages in Jersey Dental. We concluded that the Plaintiffs did have standing under the coconspirator exception for overcharge damages "caused by the alleged retail price-fixing conspiracy, although not for the alleged exclusive-dealing conspiracy." Id. at 384 (footnote omitted).

On remand, the Plaintiffs filed a five-count amended complaint in Jersey Dental. [*245] In Count One, they re-alleged their conspiracy to restrain trade claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Counts Two and Three asserted conspiracies to monopolize under Section 2 of the Sherman Act against the Dealers and Dentsply, respectively. Count Two sought damages as well as injunctive and declaratory relief while Count Three sought only injunctive and declaratory relief. Counts Four and Five asserted conspiracies to restrain trade under Section 1 of the Sherman Act against the Dealers and Dentsply, respectively, again seeking both damages as well as injunctive relief as to the Dealers and only injunctive and declaratory relief as to Dentsply. Motion practice ensued. In Jersey Dental, the Dealers moved to dismiss Counts Two and Four of the amended complaint under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), as did Dentsply as [7] to Counts Three and Five. In Hess, the Plaintiffs moved for summary judgment on their monopolization claim under Section 2 of the Sherman Act against Dentsply. The District Court denied the Plaintiffs' summary judgment motion in Hess and granted both the Dealers' and Dentsply's respective motions to dismiss in Jersey Dental, and dismissed Counts Two through Five of the amended complaint. [2] Howard Hess Dental Labs., Inc. v. Dentsply Int'l, Inc., 516 F. Supp. 2d 324 (D. Del. 2007) ("Howard Hess I").

The Plaintiffs in Hess subsequently filed what they styled as a motion to supplement the record and to amend the District Court's summary judgment ruling, asking for permission to provide the District Court with evidence to show the existence of anticompetitive injury. Meanwhile, in Jersey Dental the Plaintiffs moved for certification of appealability of the District Court's dismissal of their claims in the amended complaint. In ruling on the motion to amend [8] and the motion for certification, Howard Hess Dental Labs., Inc. v. Dentsply Int'l, Inc., Nos. 99-255 & 01-267, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1487 (D. Del. Jan. 8, 2008) ("Howard Hess II"), the District Court construed the motion to amend as one for reconsideration and denied it, finding that the Plaintiffs' proposed evidence was not relevant. The District Court granted the motion for certification and certified for appeal the dismissal of Counts Two through Five of the amended complaint in Jersey Dental. The District Court in Hess noted that "the parties, through their litigation strategies, have made it awkward procedurally to close the case for purposes of appellate review, Dentsply having failed to file either a motion to dismiss or a motion for summary judgment." *Howard Hess II, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1487, at 13-14. The Court therefore "order[ed] the parties to either enter a stipulation or, if they are unable to come to agreement, to both submit proposed orders to accomplish closure of Hess, either through dismissal or through the entry of judgment." *Id. at 14. In response to the District Court's order, Dentsply moved for the dismissal of the Hess complaint. The Plaintiffs opposed [9] that motion but, to "accommodate" an appeal as they put it, echoing the District Court's directive, submitted a proposed order dismissing the complaint with prejudice. The District Court approved that order and dismissed the complaint in Hess.

The Plaintiffs have filed timely notices of appeal in both cases. In Hess, they challenge the District Court's denial of [*246] their summary judgment motion on Count Two's monopolization claim, denial of their motion for reconsideration, and dismissal of their complaint. In Jersey Dental, they challenge the District Court's various grounds for dismissal of Counts Two through Five for failure to state a claim.

(citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556).

III.

Our analysis is bifurcated. We begin with the District Court's rulings in Hess and turn next to its rulings in Jersey Dental.

A. Hess

1. Denial of the Motion for Summary Judgment

In Hess, Count Two of the Plaintiffs' complaint asserted a monopolization claim in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act and sought an injunction essentially to prevent Dentsply from both imposing exclusive dealing agreements on the Dealers and retaliating against those Dealers that do not submit to Dentsply's demands.

HN6[] Section 2 of the Sherman Act imposes liability on "[e]very person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States[.]" 15 U.S.C. § 2. HN7[] A private party may pursue injunctive relief against "threatened loss or damage" stemming from a violation of Section 2. 15 U.S.C. § 26. HN8[] To meet their initial summary judgment [*247] burden on their claim for injunctive relief, the Plaintiffs had to show "(1) threatened loss or injury [12] cognizable in equity; (2) proximately resulting from the alleged antitrust violation." McCarthy v. Recordex Serv., Inc., 80 F.3d 842, 856 (3d Cir. 1996) (citations omitted). "[T]he initial question is . . . 'whether [the Plaintiffs] ha[ve] raised a genuine issue of material fact sufficient to show a threat of antitrust injury' if [Dentsply] engage[s] in future violations of the type alleged." B-S Steel of Kan., Inc. v. Tex. Indus., Inc., 439 F.3d 653, 668 (10th Cir. 2006) (quoting R.C. Bigelow, Inc. v. Unilever N.V., 867 F.2d 102, 107 (2d Cir. 1989)). In other words, to meet their burden the Plaintiffs had to "demonstrate a significant threat of injury from an impending violation of the antitrust laws or from a contemporary violation likely to continue or recur." Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 130, 89 S. Ct. 1562, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129 (1969) (citations omitted).

The Plaintiffs sought to meet their burden primarily by relying on the doctrine of collateral estoppel and this Court's decision in United States v. Dentsply International, Inc., 399 F.3d 181 (3d Cir. 2005) ("Dentsply" or the "Government Case"). There the United States sued Dentsply for monopolization in violation of Section 2. This [13] Court reversed the district court's post-trial judgment for Dentsply and remanded with instructions to grant the injunctive relief sought by the government. Id. at 197. We concluded that Dentsply both possessed monopoly power in the artificial tooth market and had used that power to foreclose competition. Id. at 196. Our conclusion was predicated primarily on Dentsply's adoption of "Dealer Criterion 6," a policy that prohibited dealers from "add[ing] further tooth lines [other than those purchased from Dentsply] to their product offering" and that was enforced against most Dealers. Id. at 185 (quotation marks omitted).

In their summary judgment motion in Hess, the Plaintiffs argued that our holding in the Government Case that Dentsply had engaged in anticompetitive practices compelled an inference of antitrust injury to the Plaintiffs. The District Court disagreed, concluding that while such an inference was certainly plausible, a determination of injury-in-fact to the Plaintiffs was not necessary to our decision in the Government Case. As a consequence, the District Court found that collateral estoppel did not apply. [3]

HN10[] Under the doctrine of collateral estoppel, "once an issue is actually and necessarily determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, that determination is conclusive in subsequent suits based on a different cause of action involving a party to the prior litigation." Montana v. United States, 440 U.S. 147, 153, 99 S. Ct. 970, 59 L. Ed. 2d 210 (1979) (citations omitted). The following four elements are required for the doctrine to apply: "(1) the identical [15] issue was previously adjudicated; (2) the issue was actually litigated; (3) the previous [*248] determination was necessary to the decision; and (4) the party being precluded from relitigating the issue was fully represented in the prior action." Szehinskyj v. Attorney Gen. of the United States, 432 F.3d 253, 255 (3d Cir. 2005) (citation omitted).

For interrelated reasons, we do not find that any of the first three elements required for collateral estoppel is met here. But most significantly, we do not find that the third element is satisfied. See Hawksbill Sea Turtle v. Fed. Emergency Mgmt. Agency, 126 F.3d 461, 475, 37 V.I. 526 (3d Cir. 1997) (HN11[] "the application of collateral estoppel is inappropriate" if any one element is not met). The Restatement describes that element as follows:

> HN12[] If issues are determined but the judgment is not dependent upon the determinations, relitigation of those issues in a subsequent action between the parties is not precluded. Such determinations have the characteristics of dicta, and may not ordinarily be the subject of an appeal by the party against whom they were made. In these circumstances, the interest in providing an opportunity for a considered determination, which if [16] adverse may be the subject of an appeal, outweighs the interest in avoiding the burden of relitigation.

Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 27 cmt. h (1982). HN13[] "[I]n determining whether the issue was essential to the judgment, we must look to whether the issue was critical to the judgment or merely dicta." Nat'l R.R. Passenger Corp. v. Pa. Pub. Util. Comm'n, 288 F.3d 519, 527 (3d Cir. 2002) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

Applying these standards to this case, we do not find that any inference of anticompetitive injury to the Plaintiffs was essential to our determination that Dentsply had committed an antitrust violation. The Plaintiffs' claim for injunctive relief hinges on whether they have established antitrust injury. To establish as much, they had to show injury "of the type the antitrust laws were designed to prevent and that flows from that which makes [Dentsply's] acts unlawful." Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colo., Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 113, 107 S. Ct. 484, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1986) (quoting Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977)). In the Government Case, we had to decide, in relevant part, whether Dentsply's conduct was anticompetitive. To that end, our analysis had two [17] focal points: first, whether Dentsply possessed monopoly power; and second, whether Dentsply used that power to edge out competition. See Dentsply, 399 F.3d at 186-87. Our finding that Dentsply's conduct led to price increases in the relevant market did not require us to find that anyone other than Dentsply's competitors was injured. Put another way, we did not need to conclude that any upstream purchasers, such as the Plaintiffs, were threatened with injury. Simply because such a conclusion may be gleaned from the Government Case does not mean that it was essential to our holding. Cf. Lynne Carol Fashions, Inc. v. Cranston Print Works Co., 453 F.2d 1177, 1183 (3d Cir. 1972) ("[P]arties should be estopped only on issues they actually deem important, and not on incidental matters."). Under these circumstances, the District Court did not abuse its "broad discretion" in concluding that Dentsply should not be precluded from defending itself against the Plaintiffs' claim for injunctive relief. See Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322, 331, 99 S. Ct. 645, 58 L. Ed. 2d 552 (1979).

In addition to declining to collaterally estop Dentsply, the District Court concluded that the Plaintiffs did not meet their summary judgment [18] burden because they [*249] made no showing of antitrust injury. The Court reasoned that because the Government Case injunction already prohibited Dentsply from pursuing the very conduct that gave rise to the Plaintiffs' claim, the Plaintiffs had to "demonstrate a need for further, non-duplicative measures to those already in place." Howard Hess I, 516 F. Supp. 2d at 335 (footnote omitted). In the District Court's view, the Plaintiffs failed to present any evidence of a threat of future injury and therefore fell short of that mark.

In United States v. Borden Co., 347 U.S. 514, 74 S. Ct. 703, 98 L. Ed. 903 (1954), the Supreme Court held that a private litigant's award of an antitrust injunction against a defendant does not operate as a bar to the government's right to pursue its own injunction against the same defendant, explaining that the injunctive relief afforded private litigants "supplements government enforcement of the antitrust laws" and that private and public antitrust injunctions "were designed to be cumulative, not mutually exclusive." Id. at 518 (citations omitted); see also id. at 519 ("Different policy considerations govern each of these. They may proceed simultaneously or in disregard of each other. In short, [19] the Government's right and duty to seek an injunction to protect the public interest exist without regard to any private suit or decree." (internal citation omitted)).

The Plaintiffs argue that the District Court "attempted to maneuver around [Borden] on the ground that, in Borden, unlike here, it was the private plaintiff rather than the Government who was first to obtain the requested relief." (Appellants' Br. 32 (record citation omitted).) In their view, under the antitrust laws "relief may be granted to private plaintiffs based on the same threat that justified a prior grant of similar injunctive relief to the Government." (Id. at 33.) It is true that Borden refused to say that the existence of one type of injunction, public or private, cannot at least be taken into account by a trial judge in weighing whether a subsequent plaintiff, whether public or private, has shown the requisite antitrust injury. See 347 U.S. at 520. But we do not understand Borden, or any other antitrust authority, to require the Plaintiffs to have established a need for an injunction that was "non-duplicative," in the District Court's words, as Borden makes clear that private and public injunctions may exist [20] concomitantly. See also N.J. Wood Finishing Co. v. Minn. Mining & Mfg. Co., 332 F.2d 346, 350 (3d Cir. 1964).

Although HN14[] the law is clear that public and private antitrust injunctions may coexist without regard for one another, nothing in Borden intimates that a private litigant is relieved of its evidentiary burden of showing an entitlement to injunctive relief when the government has already obtained its own injunction. We said as much in Mid-West Paper Products Co. v. Continental Group, Inc., 596 F.2d 573 (3d Cir. 1979). There the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on the antitrust claims of private plaintiffs, effectively holding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction. We reversed. We disagreed with the defendants' contention that "remand [was] unnecessary because . . . it [was] evident that the plaintiffs [were] not entitled to injunctive relief." Id. at 594 n.85. In our view, the plaintiffs were not "necessarily foreclosed from injunctive relief by the mere pendency of the government and direct purchaser suits for similar remedies[.]" Id. Under Borden, we thought the plaintiffs' injunction claim could go forward if they were "able to establish [21] a 'significant threat of injury' under general [*250] equity principles." Id. (quoting Borden, 347 U.S. at 519). We further suggested that the district court could "consider whether any meaningful difference exists in the present case 'with respect to the parties capable of enforcing' the injunction, or whether the reality here is that 'one injunction is as effective as 100, and concomitantly, that 100 injunctions are no more effective than one[.]'" Id. (quoting Hawaii v. Standard Oil Co., 405 U.S. 251, 261, 92 S. Ct. 885, 31 L. Ed. 2d 184 (1972)).

For purposes of this appeal, two important principles emerge from Mid-West Paper. First, under Borden HN15[] a trial court faced with an injunction request may factor into its equitable analysis the effect of another injunction on the plaintiff's showing of injury. Therefore, the District Court's consideration of the Government Case injunction in its assessment of the Plaintiffs' right to injunctive relief was not impermissible per se. While the District Court likely ascribed too much weight to the Government Case injunction in assessing the Plaintiffs' right to their own injunction, the Court clearly also found that the Plaintiffs failed to meet their burden of presenting evidence to [22] show that they were entitled to such relief. And that brings us to Mid-West Paper's second important principle: HN16[] a plaintiff bears the obligation of presenting evidence demonstrating injury even where another injunction is already in place. There can be no doubt that the Plaintiffs left that obligation unfulfilled. As they did before the District Court, the Plaintiffs refer us to several factors that, in their view, show why an injunction is necessary. Significantly, however, the Plaintiffs have packaged those factors as mere arguments, not evidence. That approach does not carry the day at summary judgment. Cf. Thornton v. United States, 493 F.2d 164, 167 (3d Cir. 1974).

The Plaintiffs claim, for instance, that the term of the Government Case injunction -- seven and one-half years -- is not long enough to ensure that they will not suffer harm. They assert that Dentsply still retains monopolistic market share despite that injunction and will be able to resume its anticompetitive practices once the injunction expires because, according to them, the market for artificial teeth is relatively stagnant. But even assuming that an antitrust defendant's "ability" to engage in anticompetitive [23] conduct were, standing alone, enough to justify injunctive relief, the Plaintiffs' prognosis of Dentsply's future conduct is unsupported by record evidence. In any event, if the Plaintiffs are threatened with antitrust injury at or near the end of the Government Case injunction's term, nothing prohibits them from petitioning a court for relief at that point. The Plaintiffs also rely on the alleged nationwide presence of 7,000 dental laboratories that are "better situated to monitor Dentsply's exclusive dealing practices[.]" (Appellants' Br. 38.) Tellingly, the Plaintiffs cite no authority for the proposition that a plaintiff may avoid its obligation of showing injury merely by claiming to be a more effective antitrust policeman than the government, and we are aware of no such authority. Cf. Massachusetts v. Microsoft Corp., 373 F.3d 1199, 1245, 362 U.S. App. D.C. 152 (D.C. Cir. 2004). Similarly, the Plaintiffs request that Dentsply be prohibited "from attending any meeting or phone call between any dental dealer and any dental laboratory" (Appellant's Br. 40-41), but have elected not to provide any evidence that any such meetings or phone calls are now injuring them or will soon do so. Finally, the Plaintiffs [24] point to Dentsply's purported unrepentance regarding its past conduct as a basis for injunctive relief. [*251] They assert that "Dentsply still refuses to acknowledge the wrongful nature of its conduct." (Appellants' Br. 44 (internal quotation marks omitted).) The antitrust laws, however, afford no relief on that basis alone. Cf. Sec. & Exch. Comm'n v. Bonastia, 614 F.2d 908, 912 (3d Cir. 1980). In a nutshell, the various examples of alleged injury the Plaintiffs have brought to our attention are purely speculative and thus are insufficient to justify an award of injunctive relief. See, e.g., City of Pittsburgh v. West Penn Power Co., 147 F.3d 256, 269 (3d Cir. 1998).

A review of their pleadings before the District Court reflects that the Plaintiffs for the most part sought to meet their summary judgment burden simply by telling the District Court what they did not need to do. Specifically, in their moving papers the Plaintiffs asserted that they did not need to prove irreparable injury; did not have to show that they had standing to sue for damages; and were not barred from obtaining injunctive relief merely because the government had already secured one against Dentsply. Importantly, following [25] remand from this Court's prior appeal, there is no hint in the record that the Plaintiffs sought to engage in any additional discovery or made any effort to introduce any factual material for the District Court to consider. The Plaintiffs' strategy betrays a misunderstanding of the summary judgment stage of litigation. HN17[] A party moving for summary judgment must clear two hurdles to meet its initial burden. It must show that (1) there are no genuine questions of material fact and (2) the party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c); see McCarthy, 80 F.3d at 847. By telling the District Court what they did not need to establish, the Plaintiffs did not leap high enough. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court's denial of the Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on their monopolization claim against Dentsply.

2. Denial of the Motion for Reconsideration

After the District Court denied their motion for summary judgment, the Plaintiffs asked the Court to amend its summary judgment ruling and for permission to supplement the record with evidence that, in their view, demonstrated the antitrust injury the District Court had found wanting. The District Court construed [26] the motion as one for reconsideration and denied it, concluding that the evidence the Plaintiffs were seeking to introduce would be relevant only if they had shown that Dentsply's anticompetitive conduct would likely recur. [4] Because they had failed to make such a showing, the District Court reasoned, reconsideration was unwarranted.

HN18[] "The purpose of a motion for reconsideration . . . is to correct manifest errors of law or fact or to present newly discovered evidence." Max's Seafood Cafe, 176 F.3d at 677 (quoting Harsco Corp. v. Zlotnicki, 779 F.2d 906, 909 (3d Cir. 1985)). "Accordingly, a judgment may be altered or amended if the party seeking reconsideration shows at least one of the following grounds: (1) an intervening change in the controlling law; (2) the availability of new evidence that was not available when the court granted the motion for summary judgment; or (3) the need to correct a clear error of law or fact or to prevent manifest injustice." Id. (citation omitted).

The stated aim of the Plaintiffs' motion was [27] to submit the very evidence [*252] the District Court had found they had failed to present in their summary judgment motion. However, HN19[] "new evidence," for reconsideration purposes, does not refer to evidence that a party obtains or submits to the court after an adverse ruling. Rather, new evidence in this context means evidence that a party could not earlier submit to the court because that evidence was not previously available. See De Long Corp. v. Raymond Int'l, Inc., 622 F.2d 1135, 1139-40 (3d Cir. 1980), overruled on other grounds by Croker v. Boeing Co., 662 F.2d 975 (3d Cir. 1981) (en banc). Nothing in the record suggests that the evidence the Plaintiffs sought to present post-summary judgment was unavailable to them when they filed their summary judgment motion. Under these circumstances, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the Plaintiffs' motion for reconsideration, and we therefore will not upset that ruling. See Harsco, 779 F.2d at 909 (district court correctly did not consider affidavit filed after summary judgment was granted because it "was available prior to the summary judgment").

3. Dismissal of the complaint

After denying the Plaintiffs' motion for an [28] injunction and their motion for reconsideration, the District Court noted the procedurally "awkward" posture of the case. *Howard Hess II, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1487, at 14. That awkwardness, according to the District Court, stemmed from the fact that the denial of the Plaintiffs' summary judgment motion effectively barred them from pursuing their claim, thus placing their suit on a dead-end road. As a consequence, the District Court directed the parties to "submit either a stipulation or competing orders in Hess and Jersey Dental in order to accommodate a consolidated appeal." *Id. at 16. Dentsply thereafter moved to dismiss the complaint with prejudice in light of that order. The Plaintiffs opposed Dentsply's motion but submitted their own proposed order dismissing the complaint while purporting to reserve their right to appeal any dismissal. The District Court approved that order, thereby dismissing the complaint with prejudice and denying Dentsply's motion to dismiss as moot.

We see no error in the District Court's action. Ordinarily, a district court's denial of a motion for summary judgment means only that there remain genuine questions of material fact for resolution by the fact [29] finder. See Kutner Buick, Inc. v. Am. Motors Corp., 868 F.2d 614, 619 (3d Cir. 1989). But here the District Court denied the Plaintiffs' summary judgment motion because it found that there were no genuine questions of material fact. To the extent the Plaintiffs thought that the District Court's denial of their summary judgment motion entitled them to pursue their claims any further, they were mistaken, as a plaintiff asserting antitrust claims does not get to a jury simply by filing a complaint and hoping for the best. Cf. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 467-69, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992); Town Sound & Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 481 (3d Cir. 1992) (en banc). The District Court concluded that the Plaintiffs could not prevail on their claim for injunctive relief against Dentsply and, as we explained earlier, we agree with that conclusion. And because the Plaintiffs could go no further on that claim, we likewise agree with the District Court's dismissal of their complaint. The Plaintiffs have given us no compelling reason to disturb that disposition. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court's dismissal of the complaint in Hess.

[4] Neither party contests the District Court's interpretation of the Plaintiffs' motion as one for reconsideration, and thus we accept that interpretation as correct.

[*253] B. *Jersey [30] Dental

In Jersey Dental, the Plaintiffs alleged a conspiracy to monopolize in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act in Counts Two and Three of their amended complaint and a conspiracy to restrain trade in violation of Section 1 in Counts Four and Five. HN20[] A Section 2 conspiracy claim has four elements: (1) an agreement to monopolize; (2) an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy; (3) a specific intent to monopolize; and (4) a causal connection between the conspiracy and the injury alleged. See, e.g., United States v. Yellow Cab Co., 332 U.S. 218, 224-25, 67 S. Ct. 1560, 91 L. Ed. 2010 (1947); Am. Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 788, 809, 66 S. Ct. 1125, 90 L. Ed. 1575 (1946). HN21[] A plaintiff asserting a Section 1 claim also must allege four elements: "(1) concerted action by the defendants; (2) that produced anti-competitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets; (3) that the concerted actions were illegal; and (4) that it was injured as a proximate result of the concerted action." Gordon v. Lewistown Hosp., 423 F.3d 184, 207 (3d Cir. 2005) (citations omitted).

The District Court dismissed all four counts on several grounds. The Court dismissed Counts Three and Five, which sought injunctive relief against Dentsply, [31] for the same reasons it denied the Plaintiffs' summary judgment motion in Hess. The Court dismissed Counts Two and Four, to the extent they sought damages from the Dealers, on the basis of Illinois Brick, concluding that the coconspirator exception of that case did not apply because Dentsply and the Dealers were not coequal participants in the conspiracy. The District Court also dismissed Counts Two and Three, against the Dealers and Dentsply, respectively, based on its determination that the Plaintiffs did not sufficiently allege the element of specific intent on the part of the Dealers. Finally, the Court found that the dismissal of Counts Two through Five was proper because of the Plaintiffs' failure to adequately allege the agreement element of the Section 1 and Section 2 claims asserted in those counts. The Plaintiffs dispute nearly all of the District Court's conclusions. [5] Given these overlapping alternative holdings, we find it most expeditious to begin with the District Court's finding as to the agreement element of Counts Two through Five, and then move on to the other portions of the District Court's ruling. [6]

[*254] 1. Allegation of an agreement

The District Court found the dismissal of Counts Two through Five warranted in part based on its conclusion that the Plaintiffs did not adequately allege an agreement among Dentsply and the Dealers. The Plaintiffs seek to revive their conspiracy claims essentially by reference to their allegations that "every Dealer agreed to the same plan -- Dealer Criterion 6"; that "every Dealer knew that every other Dealer agreed, or would agree, to this same plan"; and that "it . . . was obvious to each Dealer that -- only if all of the [34] other Dealers complied -- would the purpose of Dealer Criterion 6 be achieved." (Appellants' Br. 68-69.)

[5] In their briefs, the Plaintiffs do not impugn the District Court's [32] dismissal of their claims for injunctive relief against Dentsply as asserted in Counts Three and Five to the extent the Court found that the Plaintiffs lacked standing to pursue those claims given their failure to allege facts demonstrating antitrust injury. As such, the Plaintiffs have waived any contest to that portion of the District Court's ruling. See Holk v. Snapple Beverage Corp., 575 F.3d 329, 337 n.5 (3d Cir. 2009).

[6] The defendants argue that the Plaintiffs should be judicially estopped from claiming, as they do in their amended complaint, that the Dealers were Dentsply's equals in the alleged conspiracy because of the Plaintiffs' previous allegations in these proceedings that Dentsply coerced the Dealers into participating in its anticompetitive practices. The doctrine of judicial estoppel "bar[s] a party from taking contradictory positions during the course of litigation." G-I Holdings, Inc. v. Reliance Ins. Co., 586 F.3d 247, 261 (3d Cir. 2009) (citations omitted). One of the threshold requirements for judicial estoppel is a finding of bad faith on the part of the party against whom the doctrine is invoked. Chao v. Roy's Constr., Inc., 517 F.3d 180, 186 n.5 (3d Cir. 2008). [33] The applicability vel non of judicial estoppel is fact-specific. McNemar v. Disney Store, Inc., 91 F.3d 610, 613 (3d Cir. 1996). Here, although Dentsply invoked the doctrine before the District Court, the District Court made no mention of it, and we ordinarily do not consider issues not addressed by the district court in the first instance. See, e.g., In re Montgomery Ward & Co., 428 F.3d 154, 166 (3d Cir. 2005). We see no reason to depart from that rule here, as we cannot decide, based on this record and with no findings by the District Court, whether the Plaintiffs have exhibited bad faith. Cf. Reliance Ins., 428 F.3d at 166 & n.25.

HN22[] Section 1 claims are limited to combinations, contracts, and conspiracies, and thus always require the existence of an agreement. See In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 579 F.3d 241, 267 (3d Cir. 2009). HN23[] Section 2 claims, in contrast, do not require an agreement except where, as here, the specific charge is conspiracy to monopolize. See Copperweld Corp. v. Independence Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 767 n.13, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984). Therefore, the viability of the Plaintiffs' Section 1 and Section 2 claims in Counts Two through Five turns on whether the Plaintiffs have adequately alleged an agreement among Dentsply and the Dealers. See Englert v. City of McKeesport, 872 F.2d 1144, 1150 (3d Cir. 1989); Fragale & Sons Beverage Co. v. Dill, 760 F.2d 469, 473-74 (3d Cir. 1985). [7] HN24[] To allege such an agreement between two or more persons or entities, a plaintiff must allege facts plausibly suggesting "a unity of purpose or a common design and understanding, or a meeting of minds in an unlawful arrangement." Copperweld, 467 U.S. at 771 (quotation omitted); see also, e.g., Sunkist Growers, Inc. v. Winckler & Smith Citrus Prods. Co., 370 U.S. 19, 29-30, 82 S. Ct. 1130, 8 L. Ed. 2d 305 (1962).

The amended complaint in this case alleges a two-tiered conspiracy. First, it alleges that the defendants conspired to "maintain Dentsply's monopoly of the manufacture of artificial teeth and/or premium artificial teeth for sale in the United States, to restrain trade for the sale of artificial teeth and/or premium artificial teeth in the United States by the implementation of an exclusive dealing arrangement, and to exclude Dentsply's competitors from the markets for such teeth in the United States[.]" (App. 435.) Second, it alleges that the defendants conspired "to sell such teeth to dental laboratories at anticompetitive prices determined by Dentsply and agreed to by the Dealer Defendants." (Id.) To carry out this conspiracy, Dentsply allegedly has sold teeth to the Dealers on the condition "that [the Dealers] restrict their dealings with rival manufacturers[.]" (Id. at 452.) The Dealers, the Plaintiffs allege, [36] "knew that this exclusive dealing arrangement was and is an illegal restraint of trade designed to maintain Dentsply's monopoly." (Id. at 440.)

In our review of the amended complaint, we understand the Plaintiffs to allege a hybrid of both vertical and horizontal conspiracies. (See, e.g., id. at 435 [*255] ("Defendants, each with all of the others, have entered into two interrelated conspiracies[.]" (emphasis added).) That sort of conspiracy, sometimes dubbed a "hub-and-spoke" conspiracy, see, e.g., Impro Prods., Inc. v. Herrick, 715 F.2d 1267, 1279 (8th Cir. 1983), has a long history in antitrust jurisprudence, see, e.g., Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. United States, 306 U.S. 208, 59 S. Ct. 467, 83 L. Ed. 610 (1939). Such HN25[] a conspiracy > involves a hub, generally the dominant purchaser or supplier in the relevant market, and the spokes, made up of the distributors involved in the conspiracy. The rim of the wheel is the connecting agreements among the horizontal competitors (distributors) that form the spokes.

Total Benefits Planning Agency, Inc. v. Anthem Blue Cross & Blue Shield, 552 F.3d 430, 435 n.3 (6th Cir. 2008); see also 2 Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law*: An Analysis of Antitrust Principles and Their* [37] Application, P 1426, at 188 n.11 (2d ed. 2000); ABA Section of Antitrust Law, Antitrust Law Developments 24 (6th ed. 2007).

Here, even assuming the Plaintiffs have adequately identified the hub (Dentsply) as well as the spokes (the Dealers), we conclude that the amended complaint lacks any allegation of an agreement among the Dealers themselves. The amended complaint states only in a conclusory manner that all of the defendants -- Dentsply and all the Dealers included -- conspired and knew about the alleged plan to maintain Dentsply's market position. The amended complaint alleges, for instance, that "Dentsply made clear to each . . . dealer that every other Dentsply dealer was . . . required to agree to the same exclusive dealing arrangement, and that every other Dentsply dealer had so agreed." (App. 442.) Iterations of this allegation are sprinkled throughout the amended complaint. (E.g., id. at 443, 451, 454, 456, 458-59.) But to survive dismissal it does not suffice to simply say that the defendants had knowledge; there must be factual allegations to plausibly suggest as much. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 564. There are none here. In other words, the "rim" connecting the various "spokes" [38] is missing. Cf. Total Benefits Planning, 552 F.3d at 436; Toys "R" Us, Inc. v. F.T.C., 221 F.3d 928, 934-36 (7th Cir. 2000).

[7] The [35] standard for a Section 2 violation is "the more stringent monopoly standard[,]" Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 481, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992), but only insofar as the practices constituting the alleged violation are concerned, not the existence of an agreement.

Instead of underscoring factual allegations plausibly suggesting the existence of an agreement, the Plaintiffs invite us to infer that the Dealers were aware of each other's involvement in the conspiracy because, as market participants, they all knew that Dentsply was the dominant player in the artificial tooth market and because they all had an economic incentive to create and maintain a regime in which Dentsply reigned and the Dealers did its bidding. In that regime, the Plaintiffs tell us, the Dealers would all benefit from Dentsply's policies because they would all be able to charge dental laboratories artificially inflated prices for teeth in their various regions of operation. We do not disregard the logical appeal of this argument. Certainly, the objective of many antitrust conspiracies is to control pricing with an eye to increasing profits. But simply because each Dealer, on its own, might have been economically motivated to exert efforts to keep Dentsply's business and charge the elevated prices Dentsply imposed does not give rise to a plausible inference [39] of an agreement among the Dealers themselves. Cf. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 566 (noting the "logic" of the complaint's allegation of an agreement but finding it insufficient because it did not suggest actual joint action). Notwithstanding Twombly's requirement that an antitrust plaintiff state "enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation [*256] that discovery will reveal evidence of illegal agreement[,]" id. at 556 (footnote omitted), the Plaintiffs' allegations do not offer even a gossamer inference of any degree of coordination among the Dealers. Those allegations are not "placed in a context that raises a suggestion of a preceding agreement" among the Dealers. Id. at 557. Instead, they do no more than intimate "merely parallel conduct that could just as well be independent action." Id. As a consequence, the Plaintiffs have fallen short of their pleading obligations. [8]

Before both the District Court and us, the Plaintiffs have tried to hedge their bets. They argue that even if they have not adequately alleged an overarching conspiracy between and among Dentsply and all of its Dealers, they at least have adequately alleged several bilateral, [41] vertical conspiracies between Dentsply and the Dealers. There is arguably some support for what amounts to a "rimless" conspiracy. See Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750, 755, 66 S. Ct. 1239, 90 L. Ed. 1557 (1946); Dickson v. Microsoft Corp., 309 F.3d 193, 203 (4th Cir. 2002). However, we need not weigh in on the alternative theory the Plaintiffs now press, for even assuming it is legally viable or even relevant here, the Plaintiffs cannot pursue it under the circumstances of this case because the amended complaint cannot be fairly understood to allege the existence of several unconnected, bilateral, vertical conspiracies between Dentsply and each Dealer. HN26[] While pleading in the alternative is, of course, authorized by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, see Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(3); see also Langer v. Monarch Life Ins. Co., 966 F.2d 786, 802 (3d Cir. 1992), we have an obligation to read allegations not in isolation but as a whole and in context, see Chabal v. Reagan, 822 F.2d 349, 357 (3d Cir. 1987); Pace Res., Inc. v. Shrewsbury Twp., 808 F.2d 1023, 1026 (3d Cir. 1987). As we read the amended complaint, we see no indication of the Plaintiffs' intention to allege that every single agreement between Dentsply [42] and each Dealer had anticompetitive effects. All throughout the amended complaint are substantially similar variations on the allegation that the "Defendants have agreed, each with all of the others, to implement an exclusive dealing arrangement[.]" (App. 439 (emphasis added).) Indeed, the amended complaint is rife with additional references to "the conspiracy" between "[t]he Defendants, . . . each with all of the others[.]" (E.g., id. at 446, 451 (emphasis added).) These allegations are just not the stuff of several mini-agreements lacking a horizontal tether. In other words, the Plaintiffs simply did not draft their amended complaint to encompass their alternative legal theory. [*257] In short, the Plaintiffs are bound by the four corners of their amended complaint, which clearly seeks to allege one conspiracy to which Dentsply and all of the Dealers, as a collective, were parties. To the extent the Plaintiffs are recasting their allegations in an effort to circumvent a motion to dismiss, we must reject that approach. See Leegin Creative Leather Prods. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 907-08, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007); In re New Motor Vehicles Canadian Exp. Antitrust Litig., 533 F.3d 1, 5 (1st Cir. 2008).

The Plaintiffs [43] have failed to allege any facts plausibly suggesting a unity of purpose, a common design and understanding, or a meeting of the minds between and among Dentsply and all of the Dealers. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court's determination that the Plaintiffs have failed to adequately allege the agreement element of their Section 1 and Section 2 claims.

2. Allegation of Specific Intent

The District Court dismissed the conspiracy to monopolize claims asserted in Counts Two and Three on the alternative ground that the Plaintiffs failed to adequately allege specific intent on the part of the Dealers. [9] HN27[] Specific intent is an essential element of a conspiracy to monopolize claim. Bonjorno v. Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp., 752 F.2d 802, 807 (3d Cir. 1984). It means "an intent which goes beyond the mere intent to do the act." Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 602, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985) (discussing specific intent in the attempt to monopolize context) (quoting United States v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 148 F.2d 416, 432 (2d Cir. 1945)). In other words, the defendant must have "intended to achieve an illegal monopoly." Joseph P. Bauer & William H. Page, II Kintner's Federal Antitrust [44] Law § 14.40, at 423 (2002) (footnote omitted); see also Times-Picayune Pub. Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 626, 73 S. Ct. 872, 97 L. Ed. 1277 (1953); Am. Tobacco Co., 328 U.S. at 809. HN28[] Specific intent in the antitrust context may be inferred from a defendant's unlawful conduct. See, e.g., Advo, Inc. v. Phila. Newspapers, Inc., 51 F.3d 1191, 1199 (3d Cir. 1995).

Here, the Plaintiffs point us to their allegations that the defendants "have acted with the specific intent to unlawfully maintain a monopoly[,]" (App. 452); that "the intended effect of th[e] exclusive dealing arrangement . . . has been the elimination of any and all competition[,]" (id. at 440); and that the defendants "knew that this exclusive dealing arrangement was [*258] and is an illegal restraint of trade designed to maintain Dentsply's monopoly[,]" (id.). In essence, the Plaintiffs allege that Dentply's pricing policies were unlawful, that the Dealers knew as much, and that they signed on to those policies knowing full well they were unlawful. But that allegation, in its many iterations, is conclusory. There are no facts behind it, so it does not plausibly suggest knowledge of unlawfulness on the Dealers' part. We could feasibly infer [46] the Dealers' specific intent to further Dentsply's monopolistic ambitions if the Plaintiffs had stated enough factual matter to suggest some coordination among the Dealers, something to suggest that they knew that Dentsply was spearheading an effort to squash its competitors by pressing the Dealers into its service and keeping prices artificially inflated. [10] We have already determined, however, that the Plaintiffs'

[9] The Plaintiffs argue that the District Court erroneously applied a heightened pleading standard by requiring them to allege not only that the Dealers knew that Dentsply would achieve a monopolistic position but, additionally, that they "wanted" Dentsply to obtain a monopoly, thereby "confus[ing] motive with intent." (Appellants' Br. 81-83.) We agree that no authority of which we are aware mandates the conclusion that a defendant's intent to violate the antitrust laws is negated if the defendant was coerced into committing a violation. It is well settled that at the summary judgment stage a court may dispose of an antitrust conspiracy claim in "the absence of any plausible motive to engage in the conduct charged[.]" Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 596, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). We recognize that some courts have made motive-type determinations [45] in antitrust cases at the pleading stage. See, e.g., TV Commc'ns Network, Inc. v. Turner Network Television, Inc., 964 F.2d 1022, 1026-27 (10th Cir. 1992). Other courts, how ever, have disavowed that approach. See, e.g., Jung v. Ass'n of Am. Med. Colleges, 300 F. Supp. 2d 119, 159 (D.D.C. 2004). We need not decide here which line of cases has it right.

[10] As the Plaintiffs correctly note, the agreement element of their conspiracy claims arguably is not negated by their allegation that the Dealers may have been coerced into submitting to Dentsply's pricing policies. See Perma Life Mufflers, Inc. v. Int'l Parts Corp., 392 U.S. 134, 142, 88 S. Ct. 1981, 20 L. Ed. 2d 982 (1968); Albrecht v. Herald Co., 390 U.S. 145, 150, 88 S. Ct. 869, 19 allegations that the Dealers conspired with Dentsply are deficient, so we cannot infer the Dealers' specific intent from their mere participation in the conspiracy, as the Plaintiffs urge. In fact, the only actual conduct the Plaintiffs have alleged on the part of the Dealers is that each one of them, acting on its own, signed a bilateral dealing agreement with Dentsply. The only plausible inference from that conduct is that each Dealer sought to acquire, retain and/or increase its own business. Significantly, the antitrust laws do not prohibit such conduct. See, e.g., U.S. Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enters., Inc., 429 U.S. 610, 612 n.1, 97 S. Ct. 861, 51 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1977). At bottom, the Plaintiffs' allegations of specific intent rest not on facts but on conclusory statements strung together with antitrust [47] jargon. HN29[] It is an axiom of antitrust law, however, that merely saying so does not make it so for pleading-sufficiency purposes. See Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (HN30[] "[A] plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do[.]" (internal quotation marks, alteration and citation omitted)).

Because we find that the Plaintiffs failed to sufficiently allege specific intent, we agree with the District Court's dismissal [48] of Counts Two and Three on this ground.

3. Application of Illinois Brick

In addition to finding that the Plaintiffs did not adequately allege specific intent or an agreement, the District Court dismissed Counts Two and Four under Illinois Brick. The Court recognized that Hess I did not address whether the Plaintiffs could pursue damages claims against the Dealers because the Dealers were not parties to that suit. The District Court concluded, however, that Illinois Brick's general coconspirator exception did not apply here because the Plaintiffs did not allege facts to show that the Dealers were in fact coconspirators with Dentsply.

The Plaintiffs fault the District Court's consideration of any exception at all to Illinois Brick. In the Plaintiffs' view, Illinois Brick is inapposite because they buy directly, not indirectly, from the Dealers. But that circumstance is immaterial because [*259] the amended complaint does not adequately allege that the Dealers are members of a conspiracy with Dentsply. As we explained in Hess I, the Plaintiffs could come within Illinois Brick's coconspirator exception only if the Dealers were precluded from asserting claims against Dentsply because their participation [49] in the conspiracy was "truly complete." Hess I, 424 F.3d at 383. As we have already concluded, however, the amended complaint does not give rise to a plausible inference that the Dealers' involvement in the conspiracy was truly complete. Therefore, to state a viable claim against the Dealers, the Plaintiffs must come within the coconspirator exception -- or some other exception -- to Illinois Brick. Because they have failed to do so, the Plaintiffs in essence are asserting their claims against the Dealers as mere middlemen. This they cannot do. See, e.g., Kansas v. UtiliCorp United Inc., 497 U.S. 199, 204, 207, 110 S. Ct. 2807, 111 L. Ed. 2d 169 (1990); Kendall v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., 518 F.3d 1042, 1044-50 (9th Cir. 2008); McCarthy, 80 F.3d at 855.

The Plaintiffs also argue that, even assuming the District Court's application of Illinois Brick was correct as to their request for overcharge damages, the Court made no finding as to their request for lost profits. In Hess I, we explained that "[w]hen antitrust violators cause prices to increase through monopolization, a price-fixing conspiracy, or exclusionary conduct, the harm they cause members of the distribution chain comes in two forms: (1) overcharges paid for goods [50] actually purchased; and (2) lost profits resulting from the lost opportunity to buy and resell a greater volume of goods." 424 F.3d at 373 (footnote and citations omitted). After canvassing various sources on the subject, we held that the Plaintiffs did not have standing to recover lost profits from Dentsply.Our rationale for barring lost profits damages was based mostly on the Plaintiffs' status as indirect purchasers vis-a-vis Dentsply. See id. at 375. We also explained that lost profits damages are widely "disfavored" and cited approvingly from a law journal article by Judge Easterbrook in which he argued that overcharge damages, as opposed to lost profits damages, "should be the basis of all [antitrust] damages." Id. (quoting Frank H. Easterbrook, Treble What?, 55 Antitrust L.J. 95, 101 (1986)) (quotation marks omitted and alteration in original). The Plaintiffs acknowledge that portion of our holding but assert that we have "not had any occasion to rule on whether lost profits damages may be recovered from the Dealers." (Appellants' Br. 59.)

L. Ed. 2d 998 & n.6 (1968). But that argument does not relieve the Plaintiffs of their obligation to state "sufficient factual matter . . . [that] 'state[s] a claim to relief that is plausible on its face'" as to the specific intent element of their Section 2 claims. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570).

Although Hess I admittedly did not categorically bar lost profits damages in this circuit, we need not explore this issue any further in [51] this case. HN31[] In this Court, issues that are not "specifically presented to the District Court" ordinarily are waived on appeal, see Pension Benefit Guar. Corp. v. White Consol. Indus., Inc., 215 F.3d 407, 418-19 & n.14 (3d Cir. 2000) (collecting cases); see also In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 579 F.3d at 262; Bagot v. Ashcroft, 398 F.3d 252, 256 (3d Cir. 2005), and there is no evidence in the record that the Plaintiffs specifically litigated in the District Court whether they may recover lost profits damages from the Dealers. It is true that we have the "discretionary power to address issues that have been waived[,]" Bagot, 398 F.3d at 256 (citations omitted), and we sometimes exercise that power "when prompted by exceptional circumstances[,]" Selected Risks Ins. Co. v. Bruno, 718 F.2d 67, 69 (3d Cir. 1983) (citations omitted). But no such circumstances are attendant here. A substantial part of Hess I was dedicated to an analysis of whether the Plaintiffs could recoup lost profits damages from Dentsply. See 424 F.3d at 373-76. We concluded that they [*260] could not do so. Id. at 376. Despite how central both that analysis and that conclusion were to Hess I, the Plaintiffs did not leverage [52] our discussion to persuade the District Court on remand to allow them to seek such damages from the Dealers, electing instead to broach this issue in the District Court in only the broadest terms. [11] Accordingly, under these particular circumstances we are convinced that a waiver finding is appropriate. See, e.g., In re Stone & Webster, Inc., 558 F.3d 234, 241 n.8 (3d Cir. 2009).

VI.

For the foregoing reasons, we will affirm the District Court's rulings in their entirety.

End of Document

[11] The Plaintiffs contend that the defendants cannot complain that they were caught unawares by their request for lost profits damages. That may be so, but HN32[] the doctrine of waiver does not serve as a surprise-avoidance mechanism alone. It ensures that a particular issue is given a full airing, permitting each party to present its views and the trial court to make an initial determination. Most important for our purposes, the doctrine allows us to review both those views and that determination in arriving at our own considered judgment.

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER GRANTING DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS

BACKGROUND

On September 18, 2009, Plaintiffs filed an action in the Superior Court of California for the County of Kern. The first cause of action alleges a violation of California Civil Code § 1632. The second cause of action alleges a violation of California Business and Professions Code § 17200 based on Defendants' fraudulent business practices. The third cause of action alleges a violation of California Business and Professions Code § 17200 based on violations of 15 U.S.C. § 1601. The fourth cause of action alleges a violation of [*2] California Business and Professions Code §

17200 based on violations of California Financial Code § 22302. The fifth cause of action alleges fraudulent omission. The sixth cause of action requests injunctive relief. The seventh cause of action alleges breach of the covenant of good faith and failure dealing. The eighth cause of action alleges unjust enrichment. The ninth cause of action alleges failure to provide accounting. The tenth cause of action alleges negligence. The eleventh cause of action alleges breach of fiduciary duty. On October 20, 2009, Defendants removed the complaint to this court.

On October 27, 2009, Defendants filed a motion to dismiss. Defendants contends that none of the causes of action in the complaint can be asserted against Defendants, and as such, the complaint must be dismissed.

Plaintiff did not file an opposition to Defendants' motion.

On January 25, 2010, Defendants filed a reply brief.

LEGAL STANDARD

Under Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure a claim may be dismissed because of the plaintiff's "failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted." Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). A dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) may be based on the lack of [*3] a cognizable legal theory or on the absence of sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory. Johnson v. Riverside Healthcare Sys., 534 F.3d 1116, 1121 (9th Cir. 2008); Navarro v. Block, 250 F.3d 729, 732 (9th Cir. 2001).

In reviewing a complaint under Rule 12(b)(6), all of the complaint's material allegations of fact are taken as true, and the facts are construed in the light most favorable to the non-moving party. Marceau v. Balckfeet Hous. Auth., 540 F.3d 916, 919 (9th Cir. 2008); Vignolo v. Miller, 120 F.3d 1075, 1077 (9th Cir. 1999). The court must also assume that general allegations embrace the necessary, specific facts to support the claim. Smith v. Pacific Prop. and Dev. Corp., 358 F.3d 1097, 1106 (9th Cir. 2004). However, the court is not required "to accept as true allegations that are merely conclusory, unwarranted deductions of fact, or unreasonable inferences." In re Gilead Scis. Sec. Litig., 536 F.3d 1049, 1056-57 (9th Cir. 2008); Sprewell v. Golden State Warriors, 266 F.3d 979, 988 (9th Cir. 2001). Although legal conclusions may provide the framework of a complaint, they are not accepted as true and "[t]hreadbare recitals of elements of a cause of action, [*4] supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949-50, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009); see also Warren v. Fox Family Worldwide, Inc., 328 F.3d 1136, 1139 (9th Cir. 2003). As the Supreme Court has explained:

> While a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitlement to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level, on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true (even if doubtful in fact).

Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). Thus, "a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949.

> The plausibility standard is not akin to a 'probability [*5] requirement,' but it asks more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. Where a complaint pleads facts that are 'merely consistent with' a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of 'entitlement to relief.'
> Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will . . . be a context specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged -- but it has not shown -- that the pleader is entitled to relief.

Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949-50. "In sum, for a complaint to survive a motion to dismiss, the non-conclusory 'factual content,' and reasonable inferences from that content, must be plausibly suggestive of a claim entitling the plaintiff to relief." Moss v. United States Secret Service, 572 F.3d 962, 969 (9th Cir. 2009).

If a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss is granted, "[the] district court should grant leave to amend even if no request to amend the pleading was made, unless it determines that the pleading could not possibly [*6] be cured by the allegation of other facts." Lopez v. Smith, 203 F.3d 1122, 1127 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc). In other words, leave to amend need not be granted when amendment would be futile. Gompper v. VISX, Inc., 298 F.3d 893, 898 (9th Cir. 2002).

JUDICIAL NOTICE

In deciding whether to dismiss a claim under Rule 12(b)(6), the court is generally limited to reviewing only the complaint, but the court may review materials which are properly submitted as part of the complaint and the court may take judicial notice of public records outside the pleadings. Lee v. City of Los Angeles, 250 F.3d 668, 688-89 (9th Cir. 2001); Campanelli v. Bockrath, 100 F.3d 1476, 1479 (9th Cir. 1996); MGIC Indem. Corp. v. Weisman, 803 F.2d 500, 504 (9th Cir. 1986). Further, under the "incorporation by reference" doctrine, courts may review documents "whose contents are alleged in a complaint and whose authenticity no party questions, but which are not physically attached to the plaintiff's pleading." Knievel v. ESPN, 393 F.3d 1068, 1076 (9th Cir. 2005); Lapidus v. Hecht, 232 F.3d 679, 682 (9th Cir. 2000). The "incorporation by reference" doctrine also applies "to situations in which the plaintiff's claim depends [*7] on the contents of a document, the defendant attaches the document to its motion to dismiss, and the parties do not dispute the authenticity of the document, even though the plaintiff does not explicitly allege the contents of that document in the complaint." Knievel, 393 F.3d at 1076 (citing Parrino v. FHP, Inc., 146 F.3d 699, 706 (9th Cir. 1998)).

Defendants request that the court take judicial notice of the deed of trust and other recorded documents concerning the property at issue in this action and the property's title. "In deciding whether to dismiss a claim under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6), a court may look beyond plaintiff's complaint to matters of public record." Shaw v. Hahn, 56 F.3d 1128, 1129 n. 1 (9th Cir. 1995). Thus, the court will take judicial notice of the documents provided by Defendants.

FACTS

A. Complaint's Alleged Facts

The complaint alleges that Defendants sell, procure, and facilitate a variety of home loans. The complaint alleges that the adjustable rate mortgage ("ARM") is the type of loan that is the subject of the complaint.

The complaint alleges that Defendants failed to disclose pertinent information in a clear and conspicuous manner to Plaintiff, in writing, as [*8] required by law when he obtained a loan. The complaint alleges that Defendants failed to inform Plaintiff that he could not actually qualify for the loan.

The complaint alleges that Defendants engaged in unlawful, fraudulent, and unfair business acts and practices and failed to provide Plaintiff pertinent information required by law.

B. Facts of Which the Court Takes Judicial Notice

Plaintiff and his spouse, Claudia Villanueva, recorded a Deed of Trust with the Kern County Recorder's Office on the real property that is the subject of this dispute on or about September 28, 2006, as instrument number 0206240380. The real property is located at 11217 Baron Avenue, Bakersfield, CA 93312 ("Subject Property").

Plaintiff and Ms. Villanueva obtained a loan in the sum of $ 279,200.00 ("Loan") in connection with the Subject Property. The Loan was secured by a Deed of Trust ("DOT") encumbering the Subject Property that was recorded on or about September 28, 2006, with the Kern County Recorder's Office as instrument number 0206240318. The DOT identifies Plaintiff and Ms. Villanueva as the trustors, Jackie Miller as the trustee, Suntrust Mortgage ("Suntrust") as the lender and Mortgage Electronic Registration [*9] Systems, Inc. ("MERS") as the beneficiary.

On April 3, 2009, an Assignment of the Deed of Trust ("Assignment") was recorded with the Kern County Recorder's Office as instrument number 0209047511. The Assignment assigns and transfers to Deutsche Bank National Trust CO as trustee for Long Beach Mortgage Loan Trust 2006-11 all beneficial interest under the DOT.

On April 3, 2009, a Substitution of Trustee ("Substitution") was recorded with the Kern County Recorder's Office as instrument number 0209047512. The Substitution substituted California Reconveyance Company as trustee under the Deed of Trust.

On April 3, 2009, a Notice of Default and Election to Sell Under the DOT ("NOD") was recorded with the Kern County Recorder's Office as instrument number 0209047513. The NOD states that as of April 2, 2009, the amount in arrears was $ 9,365.48.

JPMorgan acquired certain assets and liabilities of Washington Mutual Bank from the FDIC acting as receiver, including Washington Mutual's interest in the Loan pursuant to a Purchase and Assumption Agreement ("Agreement") between the FDIC and JPMorgan dated September 25, 2008.

DISCUSSION

A. Violation of California Civil Code § 1632

The first cause of action [*10] alleges that at the time the DOT and Promissory Note were signed, Plaintiff was not conversationally fluent in English and could not read or understand English. Plaintiff contends that the failure to provide him with the DOT, Promissory Note, and related documents in the Spanish language violated California Civil Code § 1632.

California Civil Code § 1632 provides, in relevant part:

> (b) Any person engaged in a trade or business who negotiates primarily in Spanish, Chinese, Tagalog, Vietnamese, or Korean, orally or in writing, in the course of entering into any of the following, shall deliver to the other party to the contract or agreement and prior to the execution thereof, a translation of the contract or agreement in the language in which the contract or agreement was negotiated, which includes a translation of every term and condition in that contract or agreement:
> (1) A contract or agreement subject to the provisions of Title 2 (commencing with Section 1801) of, and Chapter 2b (commencing with Section 2981) and Chapter 2d (commencing with Section 2985.7) of Title 14 of, Part 4 of Division 3.
> (2) A loan or extension of credit secured other than by real property, or unsecured, for use [*11] primarily for personal, family or household purposes.
> (3) A lease, sublease, rental contract or agreement, or other term of tenancy contract or agreement, for a period of longer than one month, covering a dwelling, an apartment, or mobilehome, or other dwelling unit normally occupied as a residence.
> (4) Notwithstanding paragraph (2), a loan or extension of credit for use primarily for personal, family or household purposes where the loan or extension of credit is subject to the provisions of Article 7 (commencing with Section 10240) of Chapter 3 of Part 1 of Division 4 of the Business and Professions Code, or Division 7 (commencing with Section 18000), or Division 9 (commencing with Section 22000) of the Financial Code.

Cal. Civ.Code § 1632(b). The statute was enacted "to increase consumer information and protections for the state's sizeable and growing Spanish-speaking population." Cal. Civ.Code § 1632(a)(1).

Generally, Section 1632 does not require delivery of Spanish language documents where a loan is secured by real property. However, Section 1632(b)(4) contains an exception, which requires a Spanish translation if the "loan or extension of credit is for use primarily for personal, [*12] family, or household purposes where the loan or extension of credit is subject to the provisions of Article 7 . . ." Cal. Civ.Code § 1632(b)(4). Article 7, in turn, applies to certain loans secured by real property, which are negotiated by a real estate broker. See Cal. Bus. & Prof.Code § 10240. To take advantage of Section 1632(b)(4)'s exception, a plaintiff must allege that a defendant either acted as the real estate broker or had a principal-agent relationship with the broker who negotiated the loan. Patacsil v. Wilshire Credit Corp., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10414, 2010 WL 500466, *8 (E.D.Cal. 2010); Castaneda v. Saxon Mortg. Services, Inc., 687 F.Supp.2d. 1191, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 119241, 2009 WL 4640673, 7 (E.D.Cal. 2009); Ortiz v. Accredited Home Lenders, Inc., 639 F.Supp.2d 1159, 1166 (S.D.Cal. 2009); Delino v. Platinum Cmty. Bank, 628 F.Supp.2d 1226, 1234 (S.D.Cal. 2009); Alvara v. Aurora Loan Serv., Inc., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 50365, 2009 WL 1689640, 3 (N.D.Cal. 2009). "More clearly, California law requiring translation of a contract or agreement for a loan or extension of credit for use primarily for personal, family or household purposes only applies to real estate brokers, rather than to lenders and subsequent services." Patacsil, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10414, 2010 WL 500466 at *8.

Plaintiff [*13] does not allege that Defendants negotiated the loan or were real estate brokers. These parties therefore cannot be liable for disclosure violations at the time of loan origination. Thus, the complaint does not allege sufficient facts showing that the loan at issue falls within the exception stated in Section 1632(b)(4). Accordingly, the first cause of action based on Section 1632 must be dismissed.

B. Section 17200 Causes of Action

The complaint alleges several violations of California Business and Professions Code § 17200. Section 17200 provides: "[U]nfair competition shall mean and include any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising." Cal. Bus. & Prof.Code § 17200. "'Because . . . section 17200 is written in the disjunctive, it establishes three varieties of unfair competition-acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent.'. . . 'A practice is prohibited as 'unfair' or 'deceptive' even if not 'unlawful' or vice versa.'" Lippitt v. Raymond James Fin. Servs., Inc., 340 F.3d 1033, 1043 (9th Cir. 2003) (quoting Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal.4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527(1999)).

A business [*14] act or practice is "unfair" when the conduct "threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to a violation of the law, or that otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal.4th 163, 187, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999). To sufficiently plead an action based on an "unfair" business act or practice, a plaintiff must allege facts showing the "unfair" nature of the conduct and that the harm caused by the conduct outweighs any benefits that the conduct may have. Motors, Inc. v. Times Mirror Co., 102 Cal.App.3d 735, 740, 162 Cal. Rptr. 543(1980).

A "fraudulent" business act or practice is one in which members of the public are likely to be deceived. Hall v. Time, Inc., 158 Cal.App.4th 847, 849, 70 Cal. Rptr. 3d 466 (2008). In order to state a cause of action based on a "fraudulent" business act or practice, the plaintiff must allege that consumers are likely to be deceived by the defendant's conduct. Committee on Children's Television, Inc. v. General Foods Corp., 35 Cal.3d 197, 212, 197 Cal. Rptr. 783, 673 P.2d 660 (1983).

To constitute an "unlawful" business act, Section 17200 "borrows" violations of other laws and treats [*15] them as unlawful business practices independently actionable under Section 17200. Farmers Ins. Exch. v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.4th 377, 383, 6 Cal. Rptr. 2d 487, 826 P.2d 730 (1992). "Violation of almost any federal, state, or local law may serve as the basis for a[n] [unfair competition] claim." Plascencia v. Lending 1st Mortg., 583 F.Supp.2d 1090, 1098 (N.D.Cal. 2008) (citing Saunders v. Superior Court, 27 Cal.App.4th 832, 838-39, 33 Cal. Rptr. 2d 438 (1994)).

1. Unfair and Fraudulent Business Practices - Failure to Research Plaintiff's Ability to Re-Pay the Loan

The complaint contends that Defendants extended to Plaintiff the Loan on stated gross monthly income and did not conduct an adequate due diligence inquiry to determine if Plaintiff could pay the Loan back. The complaint alleges Defendants approved the Loan when they knew Plaintiff could not qualify for the Loan based upon his credit rating, income, and his asset to debt ratio. The complaint states these actions violate Section 17200.

Plaintiff's basic contention is that Defendants should have done more research into Plaintiff's financial condition before making the Loan. "However, no such duty exists for a lender to determine the borrower's ability to repay the loan. The lender's [*16] efforts to determine the creditworthiness and ability to repay by a borrower are for the lender's protection, not the borrower's." *Camillo v. Washington Mut. Bank, F.A., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100077, 2009 WL 3614793, 6 (E.D.Cal. 2009); *Phillips v. MERS Mortgage Electronic Registration Systems, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93277, 2009 WL 3233865, 4 (E.D.Cal. 2009); Renteria v. United States, 452 F. Supp. 2d 910, 922-923 (D. Ariz. 2006)). "[A] lender owes no duty of care to the [borrowers] in approving their loan. Liability to a borrower for negligence arises only when the lender 'actively participates' in the financed enterprise 'beyond the domain of the usual money lender.'" *Phillips, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93277, 2009 WL 3233865, 4; Wagner v. Benson, 101 Cal.App.3d 27, 34, 161 Cal. Rptr. 516 (1980); see also Nymark v. Heart Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn, 231 Cal.App.3d 1089, 1096, 283 Cal. Rptr. 53 (1991). Without factual allegations that show Defendants stand in the place of Plaintiff's agents, there is no violation alleged and dismissal is appropriate.

2. TILA

The complaint alleges that Defendants failed to comply with the disclosure requirements mandated by the Truth in Lending Act ("TILA"), 15 U.S.C. § 1601, et seq. The complaint contends that the failure to comply with TILA constitutes an unlawful business practice within [*17] the meaning of Section 17200.

There is a one-year statute of limitations period in which to file an action for damages under TILA. See 15 U.S.C. § 1640(e); Beach v. Ocwen Federal Bank, 523 U.S. 410, 412, 118 S. Ct. 1408, 140 L. Ed. 2d 566 (1998). The one-year limitations period of 15 U.S.C. § 1640(e) runs from the date of consummation of the transaction. "Consummation" is defined as "the time that a consumer becomes contractually obligated on a credit transaction." 12 C.F.R. § 226.2(a)(13); Grimes v. New Century Mortg. Corp., 340 F.3d 1007, 1009 (9th Cir. 2003). Plaintiff did not file any claim based on the TILA within one-year of the loan's closing. Thus, no TILA claim is available. See 15 U.S.C. § 1640(e); Beach, 523 U.S. at 412.

Because Plaintiff's TILA claim is barred, Plaintiff cannot base his Section 17200 claim on a violation of TILA. "There are limits on the causes of action that can be maintained under section 17200. A court may not allow a plaintiff to 'plead around an absolute bar to relief simply by recasting the cause of action as one for unfair competition.'" Chabner v. United of Omaha Life Ins. Co., 225 F.3d 1042, 1048 (9th Cir. 2000) (quoting Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal.4th 163, 182, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999)); [*18] see also *Morris v. Bank of America, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 24801, 2010 WL 761318, 7 (N.D.Cal. 2010); *Gonzalez v. First Franklin Loan Services, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1657, 2010 WL 144862, 15 (E.D.Cal. 2010); *Garcia v. Wachovia Mortg. Corp., ___ F.Supp.2d ___, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 99308, 2009 WL 3837621, 11 (C.D.Cal. 2009). Because any claim based on the TILA is barred by the statute of limitations, Plaintiff's Section 17200 claim based on the TILA is subject to dismissal.

3. California Financial Code § 22302

The complaint alleges that any consumer loan found to be unconscionable violates Financial Code § 22302, and the Loan is unconscionable because of the relative bargaining positions of the parties. The complaint contends that the violation of Section 22302 constitutes an unlawful business practice within the meaning of Section 17200.

California Financial Code § 22302 incorporates California Civil Code § 1670.5's prohibition on unconscionability into loan agreements. Civil Code Section 1670.5(a) allows the court to refuse to enforce all or part of a contract if the court finds as a matter of law that the contract or any clause of the contract was unconscionable at the time it was made. Cal. Civ. Code § 1670.5(a). The term "unconscionable" is not defined by statute [*19] but has been defined by the California courts. Trend Homes, Inc. v. Superior Court, 131 Cal.App.4th 950, 956, 32 Cal. Rptr. 3d 411 (2005). "[U]nconscionability has both a 'procedural' and a 'substantive' element." Armendariz v. Foundation Health Psychcare Services, Inc., 24 Cal.4th 83, 114, 99 Cal. Rptr. 2d 745, 6 P.3d 669 (2000). The procedural element of unconscionability focuses on oppression and surprise. Discover Bank v. Superior Court, 36 Cal.4th 148, 160, 30 Cal. Rptr. 3d 76, 113 P.3d 1100 (2005). "Oppression' arises from an inequality of bargaining power which results in no real negotiation and 'an absence of meaningful choice." Bruni v. Didion, 160 Cal.App.4th 1272, 1289, 73 Cal. Rptr. 3d 395 (2008); Aron v. U-Haul Co. of California, 143 Cal.App.4th 796, 808, 49 Cal. Rptr. 3d 555 (2006). "Surprise' involves the extent to which the supposedly agreed-upon terms of the bargain are hidden in a prolix printed form drafted by the party seeking to enforce the disputed terms." Bruni, 160 Cal.App.4th at 1289; Aron, 143 Cal.App.4th at 808 (2006). Id. "The substantive element of unconscionability focuses on the actual terms of the agreement and evaluates whether they create 'overly harsh' or 'one-sided' results as to 'shock the conscience.'" Bruni, 160 Cal.App.4th at 1289; Aron, 143 Cal.App.4th at 808. "Both elements [*20] must be present, but the more substantively oppressive the contract term, the less evidence of procedural unconscionability is required to come to the conclusion that the term is unenforceable, and vice versa." Trend Homes, 131 Cal.App.4th at 956 (internal quotes and cites omitted); Woodside Homes of California, Inc. v. Superior Court, 107 Cal.App.4th 723, 736, 132 Cal. Rptr. 2d 35 (2003).

The complaint alleges that the relative bargaining positions between the parties were unequal, Plaintiff could not negotiate or change any of the Loan documents' terms, and the Loan documents were so one-sided that they could only lead to one result -- a significant loss of money to Plaintiff. Plaintiff is describing a contract of adhesion. "The term [contract of adhesion] signifies a standardized contract, which, imposed and drafted by the party of superior bargaining strength, relegates to the subscribing party only the opportunity to adhere to the contract or reject it." Armendariz, 24 Cal.4th at 113. "[A] contract of adhesion is fully enforceable according to its terms unless certain other factors are present which, under established legal rules legislative or judicial operate to render it otherwise." Graham v. Scissor-Tail, Inc., 28 Cal.3d 807, 819-20, 171 Cal. Rptr. 604, 623 P.2d 165 (1981) [*21] (internal cites omitted); DVD Copy Control Ass'n, Inc. v. Kaleidescape, Inc., 176 Cal. App. 4th 697, 716, 97 Cal. Rptr. 3d 856 (2009).

Plaintiff's claim of unconscionability fails. The complaint does not allege that the actual obligations imposed on Plaintiff by the contract were unclear from the Loan documents' terms. In addition, defaulting on a loan or the inability to make payments on a loan after approximately three years time does not "shock the conscience". Finally, the conclusory allegation that the contract was designed to cost Plaintiff a "significant loss of money" also does not show unconscionability. See Camillo v. Washington Mut. Bank, F.A., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 100077, 2009 WL 3614793, *7 (E.D.Cal. 2009). No factual allegations plausibly suggest an unconscionable agreement. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Thus, dismissal is appropriate.

C. Fraudulent Omission

The complaint alleges that Defendants failed to inform Plaintiff that based solely on his stated income, credit rating, and ratio of assets and liabilities, Plaintiff would not qualify for the Loan and Defendants only qualified Plaintiff based on the initial payment amount without including future increased payments. It appears that Plaintiff is alleging this failure to [*22] disclose information constituted fraud under California law.

To state a claim for fraudulent deceit a plaintiff must plead: (a) misrepresentation (false representation, concealment, or nondisclosure); (b) knowledge of falsity (or scienter); (c) intent to defraud, i.e., to induce reliance; (d) justifiable reliance; and (e) resulting damage. In re Napster, Inc. Copyright Litig., 479 F.3d 1078, 1096 (9th Cir. 2007); Small v. Fritz Cos., Inc., 30 Cal.4th 167, 173, 132 Cal. Rptr. 2d 490, 65 P.3d 1255 (2003). Deceit is defined as the "suppression of a fact, by one who is bound to disclose it, or who gives information of other facts which are likely to mislead for want of communication of that fact." Cal. Civ. Code § 1710.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b) requires that, when averments of fraud are made, the circumstances constituting the alleged fraud must be "specific enough to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct . . . so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny that they have done anything wrong." Fed. R. Civ. Pro. 9(b); Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1106 (9th Cir. 2003). Although the substantive elements of fraud may be set by a state law, those elements must be pled in accordance [*23] with the requirements of Rule 9(b). See Vess, 317 F.3d at 1103. Allegations of fraud should specifically include "an account of the time, place, and specific content of the false representations as well as the identities of the parties to the misrepresentations." Swartz v. KPMG LLP, 476 F.3d 756, 764 (9th Cir. 2007). "The plaintiff must set forth what is false or misleading about a statement, and why it is false." Vess, 317 F.3d at 1106. Stated differently, the complaint must identify "the who, what, when, where, and how" of the fraud. Kearns v. Ford Motor Co., 567 F.3d 1120, 1124 (9th Cir. 2009).

The complaint's allegations do not satisfy the heightened pleading requirement for fraud required by Rule 9(b). The complaint does not identify the time, place, and manner of the alleged omissions. The complaint also fails to name any of Defendants' employees who allegedly failed to inform Plaintiff he would be unable to qualify for the Loan if future increased payments were considered. The complaint also fails to allege how Defendants are responsible for any such fraud as they were not parties to the original loan. Finally, Plaintiff has offered no information on how these Defendants owed [*24] Plaintiff a duty to explain the difference between qualifying for the Loan based on the initial payment as opposed to future potential payments. Thus, Plaintiff's fraud claim is subject to dismissal.

D. Injunctive Relief

The complaint's sixth cause of action alleges a claim for injunctive relief. Under Federal law, an injunction is a remedy to another claim or cause of action and not a claim or cause of action in and of itself. *Lima v. American Home Mortg. Servicing, Inc., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6344, 2010 WL 144810 at 2 (N.D.Cal. 2010); see also Washington Toxics Coalition v. Environmental Protection Agency, 413 F.3d 1024, 1034 (9th Cir. 2005) (holding injunction is remedy for violation of the Endangered Species Act); Catholic Social Services, Inc. v. I.N.S., 182 F.3d 1053, 1062 (9th Cir. 1999) (stating injunction is remedy for claims against INS). Similarly, under California law, a claim or cause of action for an injunction is improper because an injunction is a remedy, not a cause of action. Shamsian v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 107 Cal.App.4th 967, 985, 132 Cal. Rptr. 2d 635 (2003); Roberts v. Los Angeles County Bar Ass'n, 105 Cal. App. 4th 604, 618, 129 Cal. Rptr. 2d 546 (2003). Because an injunction is merely a remedy and is not a cause of action, a cause [*25] of action must exist before injunctive relief may be granted. *Tapia v. Aurora Loan Services, LLC, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82063, 2009 WL 2705853 at 3 (E.D.Cal. 2009). Thus, Plaintiff's of action for injunctive relief must be dismissed.

E. Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

The seventh cause of action alleges that Defendants breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The complaint alleges that Defendants breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing when they "used their superior knowledge in the real estate, lending and finance industries to intentionally hide the fact that Plaintiff would not and could not qualify for the ARM loan for which Plaintiff applied, and the LOAN would in fact cost Plaintiff significantly more than what was stated by" Defendants.

There is an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing in every contract that neither party will do anything that will injure the right of the other to receive the benefits of the agreement. Kransco v. American Empire Surplus Lines Ins. Co., 23 Cal.4th 390, 400, 97 Cal. Rptr. 2d 151, 2 P.3d 1 (2000); Rest.2d Contracts, § 205. However, the duty of good faith and fair dealing is "a supplement to an existing contract, and thus it does not require parties [*26] to negotiate in good faith prior to any agreement." McClain v. Octagon Plaza, LLC, 159 Cal.App.4th 784, 799, 71 Cal.

Rptr. 3d 885 (2008). Thus, to the extent the complaint's allegations stem from the formation and negotiation of the Loan, Plaintiff's claim for a breach of the covenant must be dismissed.

Moreover, no implied covenant tort is available to Plaintiff. "Generally, no cause of action for the tortuous breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing can arise unless the parties are in a 'special relationship' with 'fiduciary characteristics.'" Pension Trust Fund v. Federal Ins. Co., 307 F.3d 944, 955 (9th Cir. 2002); Saldate v. Wilshire Credit Corp., 268 F.R.D. 87, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21034, 2010 WL 582069, *18 (E.D. Cal. 2010). The "implied covenant tort is not available to parties in an ordinary commercial transaction where the parties deal at arms' length." Pension Trust Fund, 307 F.3d at 955. California courts do not invoke a special relationship between a lender and borrower. Oaks Management Corp. v. Superior Court, 145 Cal.App.4th 453, 466, 51 Cal. Rptr. 3d 561 (2006); Kim v. Sumitomo Bank, 17 Cal.App.4th 974, 979, 21 Cal. Rptr. 2d 834 (1993). A loan transaction is an arms' length transaction, and there is no fiduciary relationship between the borrower and lender [*27] absent special circumstances with "fiduciary characteristics". Oaks Management Corp., 145 Cal.App.4th at 466; Union Bank v. Superior Court, 31 Cal.App.4th 573, 579 n. 2, 37 Cal. Rptr. 2d 653 (1995); Kim, 17 Cal.App.4th at 979; Mitsui Mfrs. Bank v. Superior Court, 212 Cal.App.3d 726, 730, 260 Cal. Rptr. 793 (1989). The complaint does not allege facts establishing a "special relationship" between Plaintiff and Defendants that could justify extending tort liability. Thus, Plaintiff's claim for a breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing must be dismissed.

F. Unjust Enrichment

The complaint alleges that "Defendants unjustly received and retained benefits and payments at the expense of plaintiff and persons similarly situated, who is therefore entitled to restitution." The complaint contends the complaint's allegations state a cause of action for unjust enrichment.

The elements of an unjust enrichment claim are receipt of a benefit and unjust retention of the benefit at the expense of another. Peterson v. Cellco Partnership, 164 Cal.App.4th 1583, 1593, 80 Cal. Rptr. 3d 316 (2008); Lectrodryer v. SeoulBank, 77 Cal.App.4th 723, 726, 91 Cal. Rptr. 2d 881 (2000). However, "the mere fact that a person benefits another is not of itself sufficient to require the other [*28] to make restitution therefor." Peterson, 164 Cal.App.4th at 1593. Unjust enrichment is typically sought in connection with a "quasi-contractual" claim in order to avoid unjustly conferring a benefit upon a defendant where there is no valid contract. McBride v. Boughton, 123 Cal.App.4th 379, 388, 20 Cal. Rptr. 3d 115 (2004).

The complaint's unjust enrichment claim fails because the complaint fails to state any facts in support of the contention that Defendants received and retained benefits and payments to which they were not entitled. In addition, under California law, an action in quasi-contract does not lie "when an enforceable, binding agreement exists defining the rights of the parties." Paracor Fin. v. Gen. Elec. Capital Corp., 96 F.3d 1151, 1167 (9th Cir. 1996); Hedging Concepts, Inc. v. First Alliance Mortgage Co., 41 Cal.App.4th 1410, 1419-20, 49 Cal. Rptr. 2d 191 (1996). The complaint alleges Plaintiff and Defendants entered into the Loan, and no allegations in the complaint support a claim that no contract exists between the parties. The complaint does not allege sufficient facts to maintain a plausible claim for unjust enrichment.

In addition, most California courts agree that there is no cause of action in California [*29] for unjust enrichment. Walker v. Equity 1 Lenders Group, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40991, 2009 WL 1364430, *9 (S.D. Cal. 2009); Jogani v.Supior Court, 165 Cal.App.4th 901, 911, 81 Cal. Rptr. 3d 503 (2008); Melchior v. New Line Productions, Inc., 106 Cal.App.4th 779, 794, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 347 (2003). "The phrase 'Unjust Enrichment' does not describe a theory of recovery, but an effect: the result of a failure to make restitution under circumstances where it is equitable to do so." Lauriedale Associates, Ltd. v. Wilson, 7 Cal.App.4th 1439, 1448, 9 Cal. Rptr. 2d 774 (1992). "Unjust enrichment is a general principle, underlying various legal doctrines and remedies, rather than a remedy itself." Melchior, 106 Cal.App.4th at 784. Thus, the unjust enrichment claim is subject to dismissal.

G. Accounting

The complaint seeks from Defendants "a detailed accounting calculation and summary of the payoff balance they are demanding, including the unpaid principal balance, accrued interest, unpaid interest, daily interest charges and all other fees, costs or expenses comprising the payoff sum."

"A cause of action for an accounting requires a showing that a relationship exists between the plaintiff and defendant that requires an accounting, and that some balance is due the plaintiff that can only [*30] be ascertained by an accounting." Teselle v. McLoughlin, 173 Cal.App.4th 156, 179, 92 Cal. Rptr. 3d 696 (2009). An accounting will not be awarded if a sum certain is alleged in the complaint. *Lawrence v. Aurora Loan Services LLC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5373, 2010 WL 364276, 10 (E.D.Cal. 2010); Civic Western Corp. v. Zila Industries, Inc., 66 Cal.App.3d 1, 14, 135 Cal. Rptr. 915 (1977); St. James Church v. Superior Court, 135 Cal.App.2d 352, 359, 287 P.2d 387 (1955). A suit for an accounting will also not lie where it appears from the complaint that no accounting is necessary or that there is an adequate remedy at law. *Lawrence, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5373, 2010 WL 364276 at 10; Civic Western, 66 Cal.App.3d at 14.

The complaint does not allege a balance due to Plaintiff. Instead, Plaintiff seeks an accounting to determine how much money he owes. Plaintiff has not cited any authority to support the right to seek an accounting under these circumstances. The failure to plead "some balance is due" to Plaintiff is fatal to Plaintiff's accounting cause of action. See *Fimbres v. Chapel Mortg. Corp., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109261, 2009 WL 4163332, 8 (S.D. Cal. 2009); *Reynoso v. Paul Financial, LLC, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 106555, 2009 WL 3833298, 5 (N.D.Cal. 2009). Accordingly, the claim for an accounting must be dismissed.

H. Negligence

The tenth cause of action [*31] alleges that Defendants were negligent because the finance charge on the Loan was not properly disclosed. Defendants contend that Plaintiff's negligence claim fails because they owed no duty to Plaintiff.

"Under California law, '[t]he elements of negligence are: (1) defendant's obligation to conform to a certain standard of conduct for the protection of others against unreasonable risks (duty); (2) failure to conform to that standard (breach of duty); (3) a reasonably close connection between the defendant's conduct and resulting injuries (proximate cause); and (4) actual loss (damages).'" Corales v. Bennett, 567 F.3d 554, 572 (9th Cir. 2009) (quoting McGarry v. Sax, 158 Cal.App.4th 983, 994, 70 Cal. Rptr. 3d 519, (2008) (internal quotations omitted)). In general, a financial institution owes no duty of care to a borrower when the institution's involvement in the loan transaction does not exceed the scope of its conventional role as a mere lender of money. Nymark v. Heart Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 231 Cal. App. 3d 1089, 1096, 283 Cal. Rptr. 53 (1991); *Bojorquez v. Gutierrez, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28302, 2010 WL 1223144, 7 (N.D. Cal. 2010); *Gonzalez v. First Franklin Loan Services, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1657, 2010 WL 144862, 8 (E.D.Cal. 2010); *Yoo v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121032, 2009 WL 4823376, 4 (C.D.Cal. 2009); [*32] *Fimbres v. Chapel Mortg. Corp., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109261, 2009 WL 4163332, 4 (S.D.Cal. 2009). Parties to a contractual relationship, such as a mortgagor and mortgagee, cannot bring a tort claim for negligence unless a legal duty independent of the contract itself has been violated. *Bojorquez, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28302, 2010 WL 1223144, at 7; *Gaitan v. Mortgage Electronic Registration Systems, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97117, 2009 WL 3244729, 8 (C.D.Cal. 2009).

The complaint fails to allege a special lending relationship or an actionable breach of duty to substantiate a negligence claim. The complaint depicts an arms' length loan transaction. Plaintiff does not allege any facts to support a finding that a fiduciary relationship existed. The complaint only alleges a borrower-lender relationship. Thus, the negligence claim must be dismissed.

I. Breach of Fiduciary Duty

The eleventh cause of action alleges that Defendants breached their fiduciary duty to Plaintiff. The complaint alleges that Defendants were engaged in a fiduciary relationship to Plaintiff and breached the fiduciary duties they owed Plaintiff.

Plaintiff's cause of action for breach of fiduciary duty fails because he cannot plausibly plead the existence of any fiduciary duty between himself and Defendants. [*33] A loan transaction is at arms-length and there is no fiduciary relationship between the borrower and lender. Oaks Management Corp., 145 Cal.App.4th at 466; Union Bank, 31 Cal.App.4th at 579 n. 2; Kim, 17 Cal.App.4th at 979. Neither does a trustee under a Deed of Trust owe fiduciary duties to the borrower. *Justo v. Indymac Bancorp, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22831, 2010 WL 623715, 6 (C.D.Cal. 2010); Abdallah v. United Savings Bank, 43 Cal.App.4th 1101, 1109, 51 Cal. Rptr. 2d 286 (1996); Miller and Starr CALIFORNIA REAL ESTATE § 10:4 (2010). Thus, the breach of fiduciary duty claim is subject to dismissal.

ORDER

Accordingly, for the reasons stated in the above memorandum opinion, the court ORDERS that:

1. Defendants motion to dismiss is GRANTED;
2. The complaint is DISMISSED with leave to amend;
3. Any amended complaint SHALL be filed by May 7, 2010; and
4. Failure to file an amended complaint that is consistent with this court's memorandum opinion will result in this action's dismissal.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

A demurrer tests the sufficiency of a complaint as a matter of law. In reviewing the propriety of the sustaining of a demurrer, the appellate court gives the complaint a reasonable interpretation, and treats the demurrer as admitting all material facts properly pleaded. The appellate court does not, however, assume the truth of contentions, deductions, or conclusions of law. The judgment must be affirmed if any one of the several grounds of demurrer is well taken. However, it is error for a trial court to sustain a demurrer when the plaintiff has stated a cause of action under any possible legal theory. And it is an abuse of discretion to sustain a demurrer without leave to amend if the plaintiff shows there is a reasonable possibility any defect identified by the defendant can be cured by amendment.

Under Civ. Code, § 1780, subd. (a), of the California Consumer Legal Remedies Act (CLRA), Civ. Code, § 1750 et seq., an action may be brought only by a consumer who suffers any damage as a result of the use or employment of a proscribed method, act, or practice. This language does not create an automatic award of statutory damages upon proof of an unlawful act. Relief under the CLRA is specifically limited to those who suffer damage, making causation a necessary element of proof. Accordingly, a plaintiff in a CLRA action must show not only that the defendant's conduct was deceptive but that the deception caused the plaintiff harm. A misrepresentation is material for a plaintiff only if there is reliance, that is, without the misrepresentation, the plaintiff would not have acted as he or she did.

A cause of action for damages for breach of contract is comprised of the following elements: (1) the contract, (2) the plaintiff's performance or excuse for nonperformance, (3) the defendant's breach, and (4) the resulting damages to the plaintiff. One party to a contract cannot compel another to perform while he or she is in default. While the performance of an allegation can be satisfied by allegations in general terms, excuses must be pleaded specifically.

Civ. Code, § 1670.5, subd. (a), provides that the court may refuse to enforce a contract to the extent the court finds it to be unconscionable. The statute does not concern the pleading requirements for the nonperformance of a contract and does not indicate that when a contract is unconscionable in part the plaintiff is excused from all payment obligations.

Contracts Law > Contract Interpretation > Good Faith & Fair Dealing

HN15[] Contracts Law, Standards of Performance

The covenant of good faith and fair dealing, implied by law in every contract, exists merely to prevent one contracting party from unfairly frustrating the other party's right to receive the benefits of the agreement actually made. The covenant cannot be endowed with an existence independent of its contractual underpinnings. It cannot impose substantive duties or limits on the contracting parties beyond those incorporated in the specific terms of their agreement. The covenant is implied as a supplement to the express contractual covenants, to prevent a contracting party from engaging in conduct that frustrates the other party's rights to the benefits of the agreement. A defendant's implied duty of good faith and fair dealing may be entirely independent of the plaintiff's duty to perform under the contract.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Quantum Meruit

Contracts Law > Remedies > Restitution

HN17[] Equitable Relief, Quantum Meruit

There are several potential bases for a cause of action seeking restitution. For example, restitution may be awarded in lieu of breach of contract damages when the parties had an express contract, but it was procured by fraud or is unenforceable or ineffective for some reason. Alternatively, restitution may be awarded where the defendant obtained a benefit from the plaintiff by fraud, duress, conversion, or similar conduct. In such cases, the plaintiff may choose not to sue in tort, but instead to seek restitution on a quasi-contract theory. In such cases, where appropriate, the law will imply a contract (or rather, a quasi-contract), without regard to the parties' intent, in order to avoid unjust enrichment.

Contracts Law > Remedies > Equitable Relief > Quantum Meruit

Contracts Law > Remedies > Restitution

HN18[] Equitable Relief, Quantum Meruit

Under the law of restitution, an individual is required to make restitution if he or she is unjustly enriched at the expense of another. A person is enriched if the person receives a benefit at another's expense. However, the fact that one person benefits another is not, by itself, sufficient to require restitution. The person receiving the benefit is required to make restitution only if the circumstances are such that, as between the two individuals, it is unjust for the person to retain it. As a matter of law, an unjust enrichment claim does not lie where the parties have an enforceable express contract.

Contracts Law > Standards of Performance > General Overview

Contracts Law > Remedies > Restitution

HN19[] Contracts Law, Standards of Performance

There is no equitable reason for invoking restitution when the plaintiff gets the exchange that he or she expected. If money is paid in satisfaction of an obligation actually owed by the plaintiff, he or she is obviously not entitled to restitution even though the performance was induced by mistake or fraud.

An appellate court reviews the denial of leave to amend after the sustaining of a demurrer under an abuse of discretion standard. When a demurrer is sustained without leave to amend, the reviewing court must determine whether there is a reasonable probability that the complaint could have been amended to cure the defect; if so, it will conclude that the trial court abused its discretion by denying the plaintiff leave to amend. The plaintiff bears the burden of establishing that it could have amended the complaint to cure the defect.

Summary

CALIFORNIA OFFICIAL REPORTS SUMMARY

An uninsured patient filed a putative class action against a health care provider, based on its practice of billing uninsured patients its full standardized rates for services. The patient's second amended complaint alleged violation of the unfair competition law (UCL) (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200 et seq.), violation of the Consumers Legal Remedies Act (CLRA) (Civ. Code, § 1750 et seq.), breach of contract, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and unjust enrichment. The trial court sustained the provider's demurrer without leave to amend and entered a judgment of dismissal. (Superior Court of San Diego County, No. 37-2007-00064220-CU-BT-CTL, Luis R. Vargas, Judge.)

The Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment. The court held that to have standing to bring a claim under the “unlawful” prong of the UCL, in which the predicate unlawful conduct is based on misrepresentations, actual reliance is an element of the claim. The patient's second amended complaint did not allege the patient relied on the provider's representations in going to the provider's hospital or in seeking or accepting services once he was transported there. Regarding the “unfair” prong of the patient's UCL claim, the complaint did not allege the provider's conduct was tethered to any underlying constitutional, statutory or regulatory provision, or that it threatened an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violated the policy or spirit of an antitrust law. Regarding the CLRA claim, the complaint did not allege the patient relied on any representations by the provider in seeking or accepting treatment at its hospital. The mere allegation that the patient suffered damages as a proximate result of the provider's deception was insufficient. The patient could not state a cause of action for breach of contract or breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing without adequately pleading an excuse for his nonperformance. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the patient leave to amend his complaint. The patient did not discuss any particular allegations of his proposed third amended complaint or explain how it cured the numerous defects in his second amended complaint. (Opinion by McConnell, P. J., with Nares and Irion, JJ., concurring.) [*1351]

Unfair Competition § 8—Actions—Standing—Misrepresentation—Actual Reliance.

To have standing to bring a claim under the "unlawful" prong of the unfair competition law (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200 et seq.) in which the predicate unlawful conduct is based on misrepresentations, a party must be able to plead actual reliance as an element of the claim.

Unfair Competition § 10—Actions—Remedies—Injunctive Relief and Restitution.

The purpose of the unfair competition law (UCL) (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200 et seq.) is to protect both consumers and competitors by promoting fair competition in commercial markets for goods and services. A UCL action is equitable in nature; damages cannot be recovered. Under the UCL, prevailing plaintiffs are generally limited to injunctive relief and restitution.

The scope of the UCL is quite broad. Because the statute is framed in the disjunctive, a business practice need only meet one of the three criteria to be considered unfair competition. Under the law of restitution, an individual is required to make restitution if he or she is unjustly enriched at the expense of another. A person is enriched if the person receives a benefit at another's expense. However, the fact that one person benefits another is not, by itself, sufficient to require restitution. The person receiving the benefit is required to make restitution only if the circumstances are such that, as between the two individuals, it is unjust for the person to retain it. As a matter of law, an unjust enrichment claim does not lie where the parties have an enforceable express contract.

Contracts § 45—Restitution——Entitlement—.

There is no equitable reason for invoking restitution when the plaintiff gets the exchange that he or she expected. If money is paid in satisfaction of an obligation actually owed by the plaintiff, he or she is obviously not entitled to restitution even though the performance was induced by mistake or fraud.

Each appellate brief must support any reference to a matter in the record by a citation to the volume and page number of the record where the matter [*1355] appears (*Cal. It is entitled to the assistance of counsel. It is the duty of counsel to refer the reviewing court to the portion of the record which supports the appellant's contentions on appeal. If no citation is furnished on a particular point, the court may treat it as waived.

[687] McCONNELL, P. J.—This is a putative class action by Daniel Durell against Sharp Healthcare (Sharp) for violation of the unfair competition law (UCL) (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200 et seq.), violation of the Consumers Legal Remedies Act (CLRA) (Civ. Code, § 1750 et seq.), breach of contract, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and unjust enrichment. Durell's theory is that Sharp engaged in deceptive and unfair practices by billing uninsured patients its full standardized rates for services, when it substantially discounts those rates for patients covered by Medicare or private insurance. Durell appeals a judgment of dismissal entered after the court sustained without leave to amend Sharp's demurrer to his second amended complaint (SAC).

CA(1)[] (1) In In re Tobacco II Cases (2009) 46 Cal.4th 298 [93 Cal.Rptr.3d 559, 207 P.3d 20] [2] (Tobacco II), the California Supreme Court recently held that after the voters? approval of Proposition 64 (Gen. Elec., Nov. 2, 2004), a consumer suing a business under the "fraud" prong of the UCL must show actual reliance on the alleged misrepresentation, rather than a mere factual nexus between the business's conduct and the consumer's injury. (Tobacco II, at p. 326.) In this case we conclude that HN1[] to have standing to bring a claim under the "unlawful" prong of the UCL, in which the predicate unlawful conduct is based on misrepresentations, as here, the reasoning of Tobacco [688] II is equally applicable and actual reliance is an element of the claim. For this and other reasons addressed below we affirm the judgment.

COMPLAINT ALLEGATIONS AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Durell was taken to the emergency room of Sharp Grossmont Hospital and treated five times between October 2000 and May 2005, four times with a severe asthma condition and once with severe foot pain. Durell was uninsured at those times. Sharp requires its patients to sign an "Agreement for Services at a Sharp Facility" (hereafter Agreement for Services), which obligates a patient to pay Sharp's "usual and customary charges for … [3] services." The SAC alleged Sharp billed Durell a total of $ 21,188.12 for his five hospital visits. Durell did not pay his bills and Sharp referred them for collection. [1]

In March 2007 Durell filed a proposed class action against Sharp. Sharp demurred to the complaint, and in November 2007 he filed a first amended complaint (FAC). The FAC included causes of action for (1) violation of the UCL; (2) violation of the CLRA; (3) unjust enrichment; (4) breach of contract; and (5) breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing. The court sustained Sharp's demurrer to the FAC and granted Durell leave to amend.

In April 2008 Durell filed his SAC, which is the subject of this appeal. The SAC includes the same five causes of action as the FAC. [2] The SAC alleges that hospitals, [4] including Sharp Grossmont Hospital, "maintain documents called Chargemasters, which are spreadsheets that list the gross charge for each product and service provided by the hospital. These gross charges, however, rarely bear any relation to the hospital's costs for providing treatment and differ from the actual, lower charges assessed against the overwhelming majority of patients who participate in Medicare or private insurance programs." The "Chargemaster rates often form the starting point for negotiations with insurance companies and managed care organizations to determine reasonable (and lower) reimbursements rates, or for determining Medicare … payments to hospitals. … Significantly, uninsured patients …

[1] The SAC alleged that for a two-night stay in 2000, Sharp charged Durell $ 8,017.33, which had ballooned to $ 13,995.33 with interest and collection charges; in 2001 Sharp charged him $ 689.15, which had grown to $ 1,141.33; in 2003 Sharp charged him $ 876.35, which had grown to $ 1,261.17; in 2004 Sharp charged him $ 1,522.60, which had grown to $ 2,207.10; and in 2005 Sharp charged him $ 1,992.05, which had grown to $ 2,583.19. These amounts total $21,188.12. The SAC alleged a total amount of $21,088.12. We use the larger figure.

[2] The SAC added two new plaintiffs, Jon Bigness and Rami Saltagi, as proposed representatives for the class. They do not appeal the judgment, however, and thus it is binding on them. (Code Civ. Proc., § 906; In re Marriage of Weiss (1996) 42 Cal.App.4th 106, 119 [49 Cal.Rptr.2d 339].) Accordingly, complaint allegations pertaining to them are irrelevant. Further, [5] the SAC added a cause of action for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code, § 51), but Durell does not challenge the judgment as to that claim.

are the only category of payors who are actually obligated to pay the excessive gross Chargemaster rates." (Original italics.)

Sharp allegedly charged uninsured patients "on average, 412% of the Medicare reimbursement rates for non-outlier reimbursements, compared with the national average of 305% for all hospitals." (Fn. omitted.) Sharp charged Durell its Chargemaster rates, which were "excessive, unreasonable, and unconscionable." Additionally, the SAC alleges, "Sharp regularly sends its patients to collections [689] when they are unable to pay," and Durell "has been the victim of Sharp's aggressive, uncaring and mean-spirited collection efforts." The SAC claims damages consisting of "payments made on the Sharp bills, fees and interest, an adverse credit rating and lower credit score, [and] other costs and expenses, including postage, mileage, and telephone expenses and being prevented from obtaining credit."

Sharp demurred to the SAC. After a hearing on July 25, 2008, the court took the matter under submission. On August 21, 2008, the court issued an order granting the demurrer on all causes of action without leave to amend. The court determined the UCL claim fails because the [6] SAC does not sufficiently allege Durell's injury in fact or causation, that he relied on Sharp's alleged misrepresentation; the CLRA claim also fails for lack of causation allegations; the unjust enrichment claim fails because the SAC does not allege he paid Sharp more than the reasonable value of services he received; and the contract claims fail because the SAC does not sufficiently allege Durell performed his contract obligations or that he had an excuse for nonperformance.

Durell moved for reconsideration of the ruling and submitted a proposed third amended complaint (TAC). The proposed TAC, which is dated September 8, 2008, alleges Durell "has expended money in the sum of $ 1,522.60 due to [Sharp's] acts of unfair competition." Durell's attorney filed a supporting declaration, which states that since the date of the court's demurrer ruling "Durell paid to Sharp on his account, the amount of $ 1,522.60." In its opposition, Sharp submitted evidence that Durell had not paid Sharp anything. Durell's counsel admitted his error, and submitted a declaration by Durell that stated on September 29, 2008, "I paid … my Sharp bill that was originally $ 1522 but with 'collection' fees ballooned [7] to $ 2,098.85."

The court granted reconsideration, but reaffirmed its ruling on the demurrer. The court determined the " 'new fact' of … Durell's payment to Sharp does not cure the deficiencies in [his] [SAC]." Judgment was entered in Sharp's favor on January 5, 2009.

[3] In support of his contentions on appeal, Durell cites lower court cases from California and other states that have no precedential value. We do not consider them. Further, we do not consider Sharp's lengthy argument its conduct was legal under applicable statutes and regulations, and that courts should not become embroiled in the highly regulated field of hospital billing practices. Sharp does not argue these laws preclude Durell's action as a matter of law, and rather it admits they are not relevant to the demurrer analysis.

We note that nationwide, purported class actions are being brought against hospitals under a variety of federal and state law theories pertaining to disparate billing practices. It appears that such suits have largely been unsuccessful. (See Burton v. William Beaumont Hospital (E.D.Mich. 2005) 373 F.Supp.2d 707, 712 [discussing dozens of similar federal lawsuits and concluding plaintiffs [8] misguidedly came to the judicial branch for relief that only the legislative branch can grant]; Bobo v. Christus Health (E.D.Tex. 2005) 227 F.R.D. 479, 480 [discussing what court refers to as "latest epidemic" in class action suits].) In Sutter Health Uninsured Pricing Cases (2009) 171 Cal.App.4th 495, 499 [89 Cal.Rptr.3d 615], the health care provider agreed in a proposed settlement to "end[] price discrimination against the uninsured." In affirming the settlement, the court explained the issue of whether the provider "had a duty not to give discounts to insured patients, or, if given, a duty to give the same discounts to uninsured patients," was "hotly contested." (Id. at p. 511.)

Overview of Law

HN4[] CA(2)[] (2) "The purpose of the UCL [citation] 'is to protect both consumers and competitors by promoting fair competition in commercial markets for goods and services. [Citation.]' " (McKell v. Washington Mutual, Inc. (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 1457, 1470 [49 Cal.Rptr.3d 227].) "A UCL action is equitable in nature; damages cannot be recovered. [Citation.] … [U]nder the UCL, '[p]revailing plaintiffs are generally limited [10] to injunctive relief and restitution.' " (Korea Supply Co. v. Lockheed Martin Corp. (2003) 29 Cal.4th 1134, 1144 [131 Cal.Rptr.2d 29, 63 P.3d 937].)

HN5[] CA(3)[] (3) The UCL does not proscribe specific acts, but broadly prohibits "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising … ." (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200.) "The scope of the UCL is quite broad. [Citations.] Because the statute is framed in the disjunctive, a business practice need only meet one of the three criteria to be considered unfair competition." (McKell v. Washington Mutual, Inc., supra, 142 Cal.App.4th at p. 1471.) " 'Therefore, an act or practice is "unfair competition" under the UCL if it is forbidden by law or, even if not specifically prohibited by law, is deemed an unfair act or practice.' " (Troyk v. Farmers Group, Inc. (2009) 171 Cal.App.4th 1305, 1335 [90 Cal.Rptr.3d 589].)

CA(4)[] (4) Historically, the UCL authorized any person acting for the interests of the general public to sue for relief notwithstanding any lack of injury or damages. (Troyk v. Farmers Group, Inc., supra, 171 Cal.App.4th at p. 1335.) At the November 2, 2004, General Election, the voters approved Proposition 64, which amended the UCL to provide that HN6[] a private [11] person has standing to bring a UCL action only if he or she "has suffered [691] injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition." (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17204; see Troyk v. Farmers Group, Inc., supra, at p. 1335.) "A private plaintiff must make a twofold showing: he or she must demonstrate injury in fact and a loss of money or property caused by unfair competition." (Peterson v. Cellco Partnership (2008) 164 Cal.App.4th 1583, 1590 [80 Cal.Rptr.3d 316].)

"The voters' intent in passing Proposition 64 and enacting the changes to the standing rules in Business and Professions Code section 17204 was [*1360] unequivocally to narrow the category of persons who could sue businesses under the UCL." (Hall v. Time Inc. (2008) 158 Cal.App.4th 847, 853 [70 Cal.Rptr.3d 466].) "In Proposition 64, as stated in the measure's preamble, the voters found and declared that the UCL's broad grant of standing had encouraged '[f]rivolous unfair competition lawsuits [that] clog our courts[,] cost taxpayers' and 'threaten[] the survival of small businesses … .' [Citation.] The former law, the voters determined, had been 'misused by some private attorneys who' '[f]ile frivolous lawsuits as a means of generating attorney's fees without [12] creating a corresponding public benefit,' '[f]ile lawsuits where no client has been injured in fact,' '[f]ile lawsuits for clients who have not used the defendant's product or services, viewed the defendant's advertising, or had any other business dealing with the defendant,' and '[f]ile lawsuits on behalf of the general public without any accountability to the public and without adequate court supervision.' [Citation.] '[T]he intent of California voters in enacting' Proposition 64 was to limit such abuses by 'prohibit[ing] private attorneys from filing lawsuits for unfair competition where they have no client who has been injured in fact' [citation] and by providing 'that only the California Attorney General and local public officials be authorized to file and prosecute actions on behalf of the general public' [citation]." (Californians for Disability Rights v. Mervyn's, LLC (2006) 39 Cal.4th 223, 228 [46 Cal.Rptr.3d 57, 138 P.3d 207].) [4]

The SAC alleges that Sharp violated all three prongs of the UCL. On appeal, however, Durell does not raise the "fraud" prong and contends only that the SAC states a cause of action under both the "unlawful" and "unfair" prongs of the UCL.

B

Unlawful Business Practice

HN7[] CA(5)[] (5) "By proscribing 'any unlawful' business practice, '[Business and Professions Code] section 17200 "borrows" violations of other laws and treats them as unlawful practices' that the [UCL] makes independently actionable." (Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co. (1999) 20 Cal.4th 163, 180 [83 Cal.Rptr.2d 548, 973 P.2d 527] (Cel-Tech).) "An unlawful business practice under [*Business and Professions [1361] Code] section 17200 is ' "an act or practice, committed pursuant to business activity, that is at the same time forbidden by law. [692] [Citation.]" ' " (Progressive West Ins. Co. v. Superior Court (2005) 135 Cal.App.4th 263, 287 [37 Cal.Rptr.3d 434].) [14] " 'Virtually any law—federal, state or local—can serve as a predicate for an action under Business and Professions Code section 17200. CA(6)[] (6) The SAC alleges that the predicate for the UCL claim of unlawfulness is Sharp's violation of provisions of the CLRA. [5] "HN8[] ' "The [CLRA], enacted in 1970, 'established a nonexclusive statutory remedy for "unfair methods of competition and unfair or deceptive acts or practices undertaken by any person in a transaction intended to result or which results in the sale or lease of goods or services to any consumer. …" [Citation.]' " [Citation.] "The self-declared purposes of the act are 'to protect consumers against unfair and deceptive

[4] "Proposition 64 also amended Business and Professions Code section 17203, which authorizes courts to enjoin unfair competition, by adding this sentence: 'Any person may pursue representative claims or relief on behalf of others only if the claimant meets the standing requirements [13] of Section 17204 and complies with Section 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but these limitations do not apply to claims brought under this chapter by the Attorney General, or any district attorney, county counsel, city attorney, or city prosecutor in this state.' " (Hall v. Time Inc., supra, 158 Cal.App.4th at p. 852.)

[5] The SAC also alleges as predicates for the UCL claim of unlawfulness, Business and Professions Code section 17500, which pertains to false or misleading advertising, and California's Rosenthal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (Civ. Code, § 1788 et seq.). On appeal, however, Durell has abandoned any issues related to those statutes by not developing any specific argument pertaining to how the SAC supposedly alleges a UCL claim for unlawfulness based on them. (See Buller v. Sutter Health (2008) 160 Cal.App.4th 981, 984 [74 Cal.Rptr.3d 47].)

business practices and to provide efficient and economical procedures to secure such protection.' " ' " (Bardin v. DaimlerChrysler Corp. (2006) 136 Cal.App.4th 1255, 1275 [39 Cal.Rptr.3d 634].) The SAC cites subdivision (a)(5) of Civil Code section 1770, which proscribes "[r]epresenting that goods or services have sponsorship, approval, characteristics, ingredients, uses, benefits, or quantities which they do not have"; subdivision (a)(9) [15] of the statute, which proscribes "[a]dvertising goods or services with intent not to sell them as advertised"; and subdivision (a)(16) of the statute, which proscribes "[r]epresenting that the subject of a transaction has been supplied in accordance with a previous representation when it has not."

The SAC alleges Sharp's Web site includes a number of misrepresentations, including that its " 'goal is to offer quality care and programs that set community standards, exceed patients' expectations and are provided in a caring, convenient, cost-effective and accessible manner.' " (Italics added.) The SAC alleges that "[a]lthough Sharp promises to provide affordable care to [16] members of the community and to put its patients first, these promises are false and intended to induce patients to seek treatment at Sharp facilities. Sharp has engaged, and continues to engage, in a pattern and practice of charging unfair, unreasonable and inflated prices for medical care to its uninsured patients." Additionally, the SAC alleges Sharp violated the CLRA by misrepresenting in its Agreement for Services that it would charge Durell [*1362] the "usual and customary charges for … services," when it actually charged him substantially higher rates it applies only to uninsured patients.

The court sustained the demurrer to the UCL cause of action without leave to amend on the ground Durell lacks standing to pursue the claim. The court found the SAC insufficiently alleges "injury in fact" and causation. (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17204.) As to causation, the court explained the SAC fails to allege Durell was harmed "as a result of" Sharp's conduct. (Ibid.) For instance, the SAC does not allege he "relied on Sharp charging its 'usual and customary rates' in receiving treatment." We turn first to the causation issue, which we find dispositive.

[693] The UCL does not define the phrase "as a result [17] of" in Business and Professions Code section 17204. (Tobacco II, supra, 46 Cal.4th at p. 325.) In Tobacco II, the Supreme Court addressed the issue in the context of a claim under the "fraud" prong of the UCL (46 Cal.4th at p. 311) based on "claims of deceptive advertisements and misrepresentations by the tobacco industry about its products" (id. at p. 312; see also id. at pp. 307–308, fn. 2).

CA(7)[] (7) The court held that after the voters' approval of Proposition 64, representative plaintiffs, but not absent class members, must meet Proposition 64 standing requirements. (Tobacco II, supra, 46 Cal.4th at p. 320.) The parties in Tobacco II agreed HN9[] the phrase "as a result of" in Business and Professions Code section 17204 "indicates there must be some connection between the injury and the defendant's conduct," but they disagreed as to the particular type of causation the plaintiff must plead and prove. (Tobacco II, at p. 325.) The court held the "as a result of" language "imposes an actual reliance requirement on plaintiffs prosecuting a private enforcement action under the UCL's fraud prong." (Id. at p. 326.) The court explained, "there is no doubt that reliance is the causal mechanism of fraud. [Citation.] [18] Additionally, because it is clear that the overriding purpose of Proposition 64 was to impose limits on private enforcement actions under the UCL, we must construe the phrase 'as a result of' in light of this intention to limit such actions." (Ibid.) The court rejected the argument that the phrase "as a result of" "merely requires 'a factual nexus' between a defendant's conduct and a plaintiff's injury: 'the representative plaintiff need only be one of the people from whom the defendant obtained money or property while engaging in its unfair business practice.' " (Id. at p. 325.) [6]

[6] The court expounded: " '[R]eliance is proved by showing that the defendant's misrepresentation or nondisclosure was "an immediate cause" of the plaintiff's injury-producing conduct. [Citation.] A plaintiff may establish that the defendant's misrepresentation is an "immediate cause" of the plaintiff's conduct by showing that in its absence the plaintiff "in all reasonable probability" would not have engaged in the injury-producing conduct.' " (Tobacco II, supra, 46 Cal.4th at p. 326.)

In their briefing, the parties do not address Tobacco II, or whether the court's reasoning there pertaining to reliance applies [19] to Durell's claim under the UCL's "unlawful" prong of the UCL. [7] In Tobacco II, the court announced: ?We emphasize that our discussion of causation in this case is limited to such cases where, as here, a UCL action is based on a fraud theory involving false advertising and misrepresentations to consumers. The UCL defines 'unfair competition' as 'includ[ing] any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice … .' ([Bus. & Prof. Code,] § 17200.) There are doubtless many types of unfair business practices in which the concept of reliance, as discussed here, has no application.? (Tobacco II, supra, 46 Cal.4th at p. 325, fn. 17.)

CA(8)[] (8) Construing the phrase "as a result of" in Business and Professions Code section 17204 [694] in light of Proposition 64's intention to limit private enforcement actions under the UCL, we conclude the reasoning of Tobacco II applies equally to the "unlawful" prong of the UCL when, as here, the predicate unlawfulness is misrepresentation and deception. [20] HN10[] A consumer's burden of pleading causation in a UCL action should hinge on the nature of the alleged wrongdoing rather than the specific prong of the UCL the consumer invokes. This is a case in which the "concept of reliance" unequivocally applies (Tobacco II, supra, 46 Cal.4th at p. 325, fn. 17), and omitting an actual reliance requirement when the defendant's alleged misrepresentation has not deceived the plaintiff "would blunt Proposition 64's intended reforms" (Cattie v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. (S.D.Cal. 2007) 504 F.Supp.2d 939, 948).

CA(9)[] (9) The SAC does not allege Durell relied on either Sharp's Web site representations or on the language in the Agreement for Services in going to Sharp Grossmont Hospital or in seeking or accepting services once he was transported there. Indeed, the SAC does not allege Durell ever visited Sharp's Web site or even that he ever read the Agreement for Services. The SAC merely alleges that as a "proximate result of Sharp's unlawful business practices," Durell and the proposed class "have suffered economic damages in that they are obligated to pay an unreasonable, unfair and unconscionable debt." This is the type of "factual nexus" causation the court rejected [21] in Tobacco II in the context of claimed misrepresentation and deception. (Tobacco II, supra, 46 Cal.4th at p. 325.)

Durell asserts the SAC is sufficient because actual reliance is not a requirement of his UCL claim. His sole authority is the following language from Hall v. Time Inc., supra, 158 Cal.App.4th at page 855: "The phrase 'as a [*1364] result of' [in Business and Professions Code section 17204] in its plain and ordinary sense means 'caused by' and requires a showing of a causal connection or reliance on the alleged misrepresentation." (Italics added.) Durell claims that since the court used the disjunctive term "or," reliance is an optional requirement, and the SAC satisfies the causation requirement merely by pleading Sharp's conduct caused him to incur unreasonable medical bills. We disagree with him based on Tobacco II and its applicability here. We conclude the court properly granted the demurrer as to the "unlawful" prong of the UCL cause of action.

Unfair Business Practice

Durell also contends the demurrer was improper as to the "unfair" prong of his UCL claim. He cites Smith v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Ins. Co. (2001) 93 Cal.App.4th 700, 718 [113 Cal.Rptr.2d 399], for the general proposition [22] that the "unfair" standard of the UCL " 'is intentionally broad, thus allowing courts maximum discretion to prohibit new schemes to defraud.' " Durell summarily asserts the SAC "properly pleads the existence of harm resulting from a business practice that a finder of fact could reasonably determine to be unfair." Although he does not say so, we presume Durell attempts to avoid the demurrer on the ground his claim under the "unfair" prong of the UCL is not fraud based, and thus he is not required to plead reliance.

[7] Tobacco II was filed on May 18, 2009. Durell filed his opening brief in this matter on July 30, 2009. We asked the parties to be ready to address Tobacco II at oral argument, and the opinion was then discussed.

The UCL does not define the term “unfair” as used in Business and Professions Code section 17200. As this court has explained: “The proper definition for the term ‘unfair’ in a consumer action is uncertain. In Cel-Tech, the California [695] Supreme Court held that in the context of an unfair competition claim by a competitor, the term ‘unfair’ in [Business and Professions Code] section 17200 ‘means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.’ (Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 187.) [23] The court also held that ‘to guide courts and the business community adequately and to promote consumer protection, we must require that any finding of unfairness to competitors under section 17200 be tethered to some legislatively declared policy or proof of some actual or threatened impact on competition.’ ” (Puentes v. Wells Fargo Home Mortgage, Inc. (2008) 160 Cal.App.4th 638, 646 [72 Cal.Rptr.3d 903] (Puentes).)

“The Cel-Tech court criticized as ‘too amorphous’ the appellate courts’ previous attempts to define ‘unfair’ within the meaning of the UCL. [Citation.] The court cited People v. Casa Blanca Convalescent Homes, Inc. (1984) [*1365] 159 Cal.App.3d 509, 530 [206 Cal.Rptr. 164], a case by the state against a convalescent home, in which the court held ‘ “[a]n ‘unfair’ business practice occurs when it offends an established public policy or when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers” ’ [citation], and State Farm & Casualty Co. v. Superior Court (1996) 45 Cal.App.4th 1093, 1104 [53 Cal.Rptr.2d 229], a consumer case, in which the court held it ‘ “ ‘must weigh the utility of the defendant’s conduct against the gravity of the harm to the alleged victim.’ ” ’ ” (Puentes, supra, 160 Cal.App.4th at p. 646.)

[696] In Scripps Clinic v. Superior Court (2003) 108 Cal.App.4th 917 [134 Cal.Rptr.2d 101] (Scripps Clinic), this court agreed with the following analysis in Gregory v. Albertson’s, Inc. (2002) 104 Cal.App.4th 845, 854 [128 Cal.Rptr.2d 389] (Gregory), a consumer UCL case: “ ‘Cel-Tech … may signal a narrower interpretation of the prohibition of unfair acts or practices in all unfair competition actions and provides reason for caution in relying on the broad language in earlier decisions that the court found to be “too amorphous.” Moreover, where a claim of [26] an unfair act or practice is [*1366] predicated on public policy, we read Cel-Tech to require that the public policy which is a predicate to the action must be “tethered” to specific constitutional, statutory or regulatory provisions.’ ” (Scripps Clinic, at p. 940.) In Gregory, the court rejected the pre-Cel-Tech definition of “unfair” as conduct that “ ‘ “ ‘ “offends an established public policy or … is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers.” ’ ” ’ ” (Gregory, at p. 854.)

CA(10)[] (10) Shortly after we issued Scripps Clinic, we issued Byars v. SCME Mortgage Bankers, Inc. (2003) 109 Cal.App.4th 1134, 1147 [135 Cal.Rptr.2d 796] (Byars), in which we applied the Cel-Tech test in a consumer

[8] In a third approach, some courts have adopted the following test of the term “unfair” in consumer UCL actions based on section 5 (15 U.S.C. § 45(a)) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C. § 41 et seq.): “(1) [t]he consumer injury must be substantial; (2) the injury must not be outweighed by any countervailing benefits to consumers or competition; and (3) it must be an injury that consumers themselves could not reasonably have avoided.” (Camacho v. Automobile Club of Southern California (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 1394, 1403 [48 Cal.Rptr.3d 770]; accord, Davis v. Ford Motor Credit Co. LLC, supra, 179 Cal.App.4th 581, 595, 596, disagreeing with its earlier post-Cel-Tech opinion that applied a test the Supreme Court criticized in Cel-Tech.)

UCL action. We concluded that HN11[] "[t]o show a business practice is unfair, the plaintiff must show the conduct 'threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.' " (Byars, at p. 1147, quoting Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 187.)

Here, the court's order does not specifically address the "unfair" prong of the [27] UCL. The SAC alleges Sharp's conduct violates public policy, and is "immoral, unethical, oppressive, and unscrupulous," a vague test of unfairness this court rejects. The SAC does not allege the conduct is tethered to any underlying constitutional, statutory or regulatory provision, or that it threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of an antitrust law. In his briefing, Durell does not address Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th 163, and its effect on the definition of "unfair" in consumer UCL cases, or this court's opinions in Scripps Clinic, supra, 108 Cal.App.4th 917, and Byars, supra, 109 Cal.App.4th 1134. We conclude the court properly granted the demurrer as to the claim under the "unfair" prong of the UCL. [9]

HN12[] CA(11)[] (11) Under Civil Code section 1780, subdivision (a), CLRA actions may be brought "only by a consumer 'who suffers [697] any damage as a result of the use or employment' of a proscribed method, act, or practice. (Italics added.) ' [*1367] This language does not create an automatic award of statutory damages upon proof of an unlawful act. Relief under the CLRA is specifically limited to those who suffer damage, making causation a necessary element of proof.' [Citation.] Accordingly, 'plaintiffs in a CLRA action [must] show not only that a defendant's conduct was deceptive but that the deception caused them harm.' " (Buckland v. Threshold Enterprises, Ltd. (2007) 155 Cal.App.4th 798, 809 [66 Cal.Rptr.3d 543].) A "misrepresentation is material for a plaintiff only if there is reliance—that is, ' " 'without the misrepresentation, the plaintiff would not have acted as he did' " ' … ." (Id. at p. 810.)

Again, the SAC does not allege Durell relied on any representation by Sharp in seeking or accepting treatment at its facility. The mere allegation that Durell suffered [29] damages "[a]s a proximate result" of Sharp's deception is insufficient. Thus, the court's ruling is also correct on the CLRA claim.

Contract-based Claims

Breach of Contract

Additionally, Durell contends the court erred by finding the SAC insufficiently pleads a breach of contract cause of action. Specifically, he asserts the SAC adequately alleges Sharp's unreasonable billing practices excuse him from paying its bills.

[9] Given our holdings on the UCL issues, we are not required to address Durell's argument the SAC sufficiently pleads "injury in fact" within the meaning of Business and Professions Code section 17204. (See, however, our discussion of "injury in fact" as including the incurrence of unreasonable hospital bills in our related opinion in Hale v. Sharp Healthcare (2010) 183 Cal.App.4th 1373 [108 Cal.Rptr.3d 669], also filed this date.) In Hale, [28] we conclude the plaintiff's second amended complaint adequately pleaded actual reliance for purposes of the UCL and CLRA. (183 Cal.App.4th at p. 1386–1387.)

HN13[] CA(12)[] (12) "A cause of action for damages for breach of contract is comprised of the following elements: (1) the contract, (2) plaintiff's performance or excuse for nonperformance, (3) defendant's breach, and (4) the resulting damages to plaintiff." (Careau & Co. v. Security Pacific Business Credit, Inc. (1990) 222 Cal.App.3d 1371, 1388 [272 Cal.Rptr. 387], italics added.) "[I]t is elementary that one party to a contract cannot compel another to perform while he himself is in default." (Lewis Publishing Co. v. Henderson (1930) 103 Cal.App. 425, 429 [284 P. 713]; see Karales v. Los Angeles Creamery Co. (1918) 36 Cal.App. 171, 172–173 [171 P. 821].) While the allegation of performance "can be satisfied by allegations in general terms" (Careau & Co. v. Security Pacific Business Credit, Inc., supra, 222 Cal.App.3d at p. 1389), "excuses [30] must be pleaded specifically." (4 Witkin, Cal. Procedure (5th ed. 2008) Pleading, § 532, p. 661; see Kirk v. Culley (1927) 202 Cal. 501, 506 [261 P. 994] ["The rule is well understood that a recovery on proof of excuse for nonperformance cannot be had on an allegation of full performance … ."].)

Durell's assertion that an excuse for the nonperformance of a contract may be generally pleaded is incorrect. He cites Patrick J. Ruane, Inc. v. Parker (1960) 185 Cal.App.2d 488, 492 [8 Cal.Rptr. 379], which states that a general allegation of full performance was sufficient. He also cites Careau & Co. v. Security Pacific Business Credit, Inc., supra, 222 Cal.App.3d at page 1389, which also notes that performance may be alleged in general terms, subject to noted exceptions.

We reject Durell's claim that the SAC sufficiently pleads an excuse for nonperformance. The SAC alleges Durell and the proposed class "have fulfilled their obligations and complied with all conditions of the contract(s) they are required to perform or have been excused from fully performing because Sharp have [sic] prevented them from doing so." Durell also [698] cites the SAC's allegation that "Sharp unfairly and unlawfully charges its uninsured patients unfair, unreasonable [31] and/or discriminatory rates that are significantly higher than those charged to insured patients."

Certainly, Sharp's services to Durell on five different occasions had value to him, and before pursuing a breach of contract action he was required in good faith to compensate Sharp a minimum of the amount he deemed reasonable. The SAC alleges, "Sharp charges uninsured patients more than four times the price of what Medicare pays hospitals for the same treatment," thus he admits he has no quarrel with approximately one-fourth of the total amount Sharp billed him. The SAC does not allege Durell paid Sharp anything toward his bills, and he admitted during his motion for reconsideration of the demurrer ruling that he had belatedly paid Sharp only $ 2,098.85 (a debt of $ 1,522.60 for one visit plus collection fees), which is less than 10 percent of Sharp's total billings. [10] Durell does not assert the $ 2,098.85 payment remotely covers the reasonable value of Sharp's services, even by his own estimation. [11] We agree that the breach of contract cause of action fails for insufficient allegations of excuse for nonperformance.

CA(13)[] (13) Durell's reliance on HN14[] Civil Code section 1670.5 is misplaced, as it provides that the court may refuse to enforce a contract to the extent the court finds it to be unconscionable. (Civ. Code, § 1670.5, subd. (a).) The statute does not concern the pleading requirements for the nonperformance of a contract, and contrary to Durell's position, it does not indicate that when a [*1369] contract is unconscionable in part the plaintiff is excused from all payment obligations. Durell also cites Whitney Inv. Co. v. Westview Dev. Co. (1969) 273 Cal.App.2d 594, 602 [78 Cal.Rptr. 302], which states, "A breach does not terminate a contract as a matter of course [33] but is a ground for termination at the option of the injured party." Durell claims this language means that because "Sharp has breached its contractual obligation to charge reasonable rates," he "is no longer obligated to pay." The general language of Whitney does not mean Durell is excused from paying Sharp any amount whatsoever.

[10] Although on demurrer the court ordinarily looks only at the complaint [32] and matters judicially noticed, "[w]hen a party opposing a demurrer admits that it does not dispute facts extrinsic to the complaint, the trial court may properly treat these facts as judicial admissions for the purpose of testing the sufficiency of the complaint." (Buckland v. Threshold Enterprises, Ltd., supra, 155 Cal.App.4th 798, 806.)

[11] Durell essentially concedes that since he has paid Sharp so little he has no breach of contract damages. He claims he is entitled to nominal damages for breach of contract. (See Sweet v. Johnson (1959) 169 Cal.App.2d 630, 632 [337 P.2d 499].)

Breach of Implied Covenant

HN15[] CA(14)[] (14) "The covenant of good faith and fair dealing, implied by law in every contract, exists merely to prevent one contracting party from unfairly frustrating the other party's right to receive the benefits of the agreement actually made. [Citation.] The covenant thus cannot ' "be endowed with an existence independent of its contractual underpinnings." ' [Citation.] It cannot impose substantive duties or limits on the contracting parties beyond those incorporated in the specific terms of their agreement." (Guz v. Bechtel National Inc. (2000) 24 Cal.4th 317, 349–350 [100 Cal.Rptr.2d 352, 8 P.3d 1089].) The "covenant [699] is implied as a supplement to the express contractual covenants, to prevent a contracting party from engaging in conduct that frustrates the other party's rights to the benefits of the agreement." (Waller v. Truck Ins. Exchange, Inc. (1995) 11 Cal.4th 1, 36 [44 Cal.Rptr.2d 370, 900 P.2d 619].) "Breach [34] of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing gives rise to a contract action … or, in limited contexts, a tort action with the tort measure of compensatory damages and the right to recover punitive damages … ." (1 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (10th ed. 2005) Contracts, § 800, p. 894, citations & italics omitted.)

Although a defendant's implied duty of good faith and fair dealing may be entirely independent of the plaintiff's duty to perform under the contract (see Gruenberg v. Aetna Ins. Co. (1973) 9 Cal.3d 566, 577 [108 Cal.Rptr. 480, 510 P.2d 1032]), such is not the case here when the SAC's implied covenant cause of action is essentially based on the same allegations as the breach of contract cause of action. Under the circumstances, Durell cannot state a cause of action for breach of the implied covenant without adequately pleading an excuse for his nonperformance. The court properly sustained the demurrer to both the breach of contract and breach of implied covenant causes of action on the same ground.

Unjust Enrichment

HN16[] CA(15)[] (15) "[T]here is no cause of action in California for unjust enrichment." (Melchior v. New Line Productions, Inc. (2003) 106 Cal.App.4th 779, 793 [131 Cal.Rptr.2d 347]; see McKell v. Washington Mutual, Inc., supra, 142 Cal.App.4th 1457, 1490.) [35] Unjust enrichment is synonymous with restitution. (Dinosaur Development, Inc. v. White (1989) 216 Cal.App.3d 1310, 1314 [265 Cal.Rptr. 525].)

HN17[] CA(16)[] (16) "There are several potential bases for a cause of action seeking restitution. For example, restitution may be awarded in lieu of breach of contract damages when the parties had an express contract, but it was procured by fraud or is unenforceable or ineffective for some reason. [Citations.] Alternatively, restitution may be awarded where the defendant obtained a benefit from the plaintiff by fraud, duress, conversion, or similar conduct. In such cases, the plaintiff may choose not to sue in tort, but instead to seek restitution on a quasi-contract theory … . [Citations.] In such cases, where appropriate, the law will imply a contract (or rather, a quasi-contract), without regard to the parties' intent, in order to avoid unjust enrichment." (McBride v. Boughton (2004) 123 Cal.App.4th 379, 388 [20 Cal.Rptr.3d 115], fn. omitted.)

HN18[] CA(17)[] (17) "Under the law of restitution, '[a]n individual is required to make restitution if he or she is unjustly enriched at the expense of another. [Citations.] A person is enriched if the person receives a benefit at another's expense. [Citation.]' [Citation.] However, [36] '[t]he fact that one person benefits another is not, by itself, sufficient to require restitution. The person receiving the benefit is required to make restitution only if the circumstances are such that, as between the two individuals, it is unjust for the person to retain it. [Citation.]' "

(McBride v. Boughton, supra, 123 Cal.App.4th at p. 389.) As a matter of law, an unjust enrichment claim does not lie where the parties have an enforceable express contract. (California Medical Assn v. Aetna U.S. Healthcare of California, Inc. (2001) 94 Cal.App.4th 151, 172 [114 Cal.Rptr.2d 109].)

An unjust enrichment theory is inapplicable because Durell alleges the parties entered into express contracts. Further, [700] as the court noted, Durell failed "to allege [he] paid in excess of reasonable value for the services [he] received or that the services were not worth what [he] paid for them." The SAC alleges Sharp charged Durell a total of $ 21,188.12 for services rendered during his five emergency room visits, but it does not allege what amount of those charges Durell has paid. During the hearing on Durell's motion for [*1371] reconsideration of the demurrer ruling, and for leave to filed his proposed TAC, he presented evidence [37] he belatedly paid a bill from Sharp "that was originally $ 1522 but with 'collection' fees ballooned to $ 2,098.85." Durell does not assert Sharp's retention of the $ 2,098.85, less than 10 percent of its total billings, would be unjust.

HN19[] CA(18)[] (18) " 'There is no equitable reason for invoking restitution when the plaintiff gets the exchange which he expected.' " (Peterson v. Cellco Partnership, supra, 164 Cal.App.4th 1583, 1593.) "If the money is paid in satisfaction of an obligation actually owed by the plaintiff, he or she is obviously not entitled to restitution even though the performance was induced by mistake or fraud." (1 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law, supra, Contracts, § 1025, p. 1117.)

VI

Leave to Amend

HN20[] "An appellate court reviews the denial of leave to amend after the sustaining of a demurrer under an abuse of discretion standard. [Citation.] When a demurrer is sustained without leave to amend, the reviewing court must determine whether there is a reasonable probability that the complaint could have been amended to cure the defect; if so, it will conclude that the trial court abused its discretion by denying the plaintiff leave to amend. [Citation.] The plaintiff bears the burden of establishing [38] that it could have amended the complaint to cure the defect." (Align Technology, Inc. v. Tran (2009) 179 Cal.App.4th 949, 958–959 [102 Cal.Rptr.3d 343].)

Durell cursorily argues that if this court "deems any claim inadequately plead [sic], it should grant [him] leave to amend the complaint." He claims the proposed "TAC contained numerous additional and detailed allegations when compared to the allegations of the SAC." In support, he gives a block citation to the portion of the appellant's appendix containing the proposed TAC (citing to pp. 733–754 of the appellant's appendix). He does not discuss any particular allegations of the proposed TAC or explain how it cures the numerous defects in the SAC's five causes of action. Further, he does not explain how yet another amended complaint would cure the defects. For instance, he does not claim he can in good faith amend the complaint to allege actual reliance for purposes of the UCL and CLRA claims, to allege he has paid Sharp a reasonable amount for purposes of his contract-based claims, or that he has paid Sharp even more than it is entitled to for purposes of his unjust enrichment claim.

CA(19)[] (19) Under the circumstances, Durell has not met his burden of showing abuse of discretion. HN21[] Each appellate [39] brief must "[s]upport any reference to a [*1372] matter in the record by a citation to the volume and page number of the record where the matter appears." (Cal. Rules of Court, rule 8.204(a)(1)(C).) "The reviewing court is not required to make an independent, unassisted study of the record in search of error or grounds to support the judgment. It is entitled to the assistance of counsel." (9 Witkin, Cal. Procedure, supra, Appeal, § 701, p. 769.) "It is the duty of counsel to refer the reviewing court to the portion of the record which supports appellant's [701] contentions on appeal. [Citation.] If no citation 'is furnished on a particular point, the court may treat it as waived.' " (Guthrey v. State of California (1998) 63 Cal.App.4th 1108, 1115 [75 Cal.Rptr.2d 27].) Further, Durell has already filed three complaints without being able to state a single cause of action.

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

On a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, a court must accept all factual allegations pleaded in the complaint as true, and construe those facts and draw all reasonable inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A court may dismiss a complaint under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) only if it appears beyond doubt that the alleged facts, even if true, will not entitle the plaintiff to relief on the theories asserted. While a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Moreover, a court is not required to accept as true allegations that are merely conclusory, unwarranted deductions of fact, or unreasonable inferences. Only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. Where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged, but it has not shown, that the pleader is entitled to relief.

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Although a court generally cannot look beyond the pleadings in deciding a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion, it may consider: (1) any documents attached to the pleadings; (2) materials that are properly subject to judicial notice under Fed. R. Evid. 201; and (3) evidence upon which the complaint necessarily relies so long as (a) the complaint refers to the document, (b) the document is central to the plaintiff's claim, and (c) no party questions the authenticity of the document.

HN4[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

The Noerr-Pennington doctrine has been applied to actions petitioning each of the three branches of government, including the courts, and has been expanded beyond its original antitrust context. The essence of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is that those who petition any department of the government for redress are immune from statutory liability for their petitioning conduct. The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held the Noerr-Pennington doctrine applied to the plaintiff's state law intentional interference with prospective economic advantage claims. The court explained, because Noerr-Pennington protects federal constitutional rights, it applies in all contexts, even where a state law doctrine advances a similar goal.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > Scope

HN5[] Exemptions & Immunities, Noerr-Pennington Doctrine

Only litigation activities which constitute communications to the court may be described fairly as petitions. A pre-litigation demand letter directed to a private party, therefore, is not a petition. Nevertheless, in connection with the First Amendment's Petition Clause and protection of the right to access the courts, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit recognizes a breathing space principle which extends immunity under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine to conduct which is incidental to petitioning activities, even if it is not itself petitioning activity. Under that case law, all communications between private parties related to litigation, including pre-suit demand letters and settlement offers, are entitled to immunity.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Exemptions & Immunities > Noerr-Pennington Doctrine > Sham Exception

HN6[] Noerr-Pennington Doctrine, Sham Exception

Noerr-Pennington immunity is not a shield for petitioning conduct that, although ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action, is a mere sham to cover what is actually nothing more than an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor. Accordingly, conduct otherwise protected by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine may nevertheless be restricted by law if it falls within the sham litigation exception. Judicial precedent establishes a two-part test for determining whether the sham litigation exception applies. To establish that a defendant's conduct was a sham, the plaintiff must prove (1) the defendant's alleged threats were objectively baseless in the sense that it could not have reasonably expected to prevail in litigation, and (2) the defendant's subjective motivation was to interfere with the plaintiff's business relationships.

HN12[] Subject Matter Jurisdiction, Supplemental Jurisdiction

In the absence of a viable federal claim, the United States District Court for the Central District of California will decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C.S. § 1367(c)(3).

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

HN13[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

Where a defendant moves to dismiss a complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction, the plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that jurisdiction is appropriate. Where the motion is based on written materials rather than an evidentiary hearing, the plaintiff need only make a prima facie showing of jurisdictional facts. Although the plaintiff cannot simply rest on the bare allegations of its complaint, uncontroverted allegations in the complaint must be taken as true. In addition, the court considers the declarations submitted by the parties. Any factual conflicts in the parties' declarations must be resolved in the plaintiff's favor.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Due Process

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Long Arm Jurisdiction

HN15[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, Constitutional Limits

Because California's long-arm jurisdictional statute is coextensive with federal due process requirements, the jurisdictional analyses under state law and federal due process are the same.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > Constitutional Limits

HN16[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, Constitutional Limits

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that the defendant have minimum contacts with the forum state and that the exercise of jurisdiction be consistent with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > General Overview

HN17[] Jurisdiction, In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction

There are two types of personal jurisdiction: general and specific. Where a defendant's contacts with a forum are substantial, continuous and systematic, a defendant can be deemed to be present in the forum for all purposes. In that case, general jurisdiction is present. Otherwise, a forum may exercise only specific jurisdiction, which is based on the relationship between the defendant's forum contacts and the plaintiff's claim. In both cases, all of a defendant's contacts with the forum state are considered, regardless of whether those contacts involve wrongful activity by the defendant. Finally, the prima facie jurisdictional analysis requires the court to accept the plaintiff's allegations as true.

HN18[] Jurisdiction, In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction

In the event that no state within the United States can exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant, the court may exercise jurisdiction under Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(2).

Civil Procedure > ... > Jurisdiction > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Service of Process > Methods of Service > General Overview

HN19[] Jurisdiction, In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction

Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(2) governs the territorial limits of effective service. As a practical matter, the rule is used to aggregate a foreign defendant's contacts with the country in order to find jurisdiction proper when contacts with any individual state are insufficient.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Service of Process > Methods of Service > General Overview

HN21[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, In Personam Actions

A court may exercise jurisdiction under Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(2) when three requirements are met. First, the claim against the defendant must arise under federal law. Second, the defendant must not be subject to the personal jurisdiction of any state court of general jurisdiction. Third, the federal court's exercise of personal jurisdiction must comport with due process.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Service of Process > Methods of Service > General Overview

HN22[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, In Personam Actions

So long as a defendant does not concede to jurisdiction in another state, a court may use Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(2) to confer jurisdiction.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Due Process

Civil Procedure > ... > Service of Process > Methods of Service > General Overview

HN23[] In Personam Actions, Due Process

The due process analysis under Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(2) is identical to the traditional personal jurisdiction analysis, however, the contacts are measured with respect to the United States rather than an individual forum state.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Due Process

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Minimum Contacts

HN24[] In Personam Actions, Due Process

California law does not recognize conspiracy as a basis for acquiring jurisdiction over a foreign defendant. Thus, actions taken by coconspirators in furtherance of the conspiracy cannot be attributed to a conspirator for purposes of establishing personal jurisdiction.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Substantial Contacts

HN25[] In Personam Actions, Substantial Contacts

To be haled into court in the United States in an action unrelated to its contacts with the country, a foreign defendant's contacts must be substantial or continuous and systematic. The standard for establishing general jurisdiction is fairly high and requires that the defendant's contacts be of the sort that approximate physical presence.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Purposeful Availment

HN26[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

Specific jurisdiction is tethered to a relationship between the forum and the claim. Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(2), the United States is the relevant forum. In the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, specific jurisdiction exists when the following three elements are met: (1) the nonresident defendant must purposefully direct his activities or consummate some transaction with the forum or resident thereof; or perform some act by which he purposefully avails himself of the privilege of conducting activities in the forum, thereby invoking the benefits and protections of its laws; (2) the claim must be one which arises out of or relates to the defendant's forum-related activities; and (3) the exercise of jurisdiction must comport with fair play and substantial justice, i.e. it must be reasonable.

HN27[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

The plaintiff bears the burden of satisfying the first two prongs of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit's specific jurisdiction test. If the plaintiff fails to satisfy either of these prongs, personal jurisdiction is not established in the forum state. Only after the plaintiff succeeds in satisfying both of the first two prongs does the burden shift to the defendant to present a compelling case that the exercise of jurisdiction would not be reasonable.

HN28[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit treats the purposeful availment prong as a purposeful direction prong in a tort case. Where the defendant is accused of a tort, the inquiry is whether the defendant purposefully directed its activities at the forum state, applying an effect test that focuses on the forum in which the defendant's actions were felt, whether or not the actions themselves occurred within the forum. The effect test has three requirements: the defendant allegedly must have (1) committed an intentional act, (2) expressly aimed at the forum state, (3) causing harm that the defendant knows is likely to be suffered in the forum state.

HN29[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit clarifies that, for purposes of the purposeful availment prong of the specific jurisdiction test, the brunt of the harm need not be suffered in the forum state. If a jurisdictionally sufficient amount of harm is suffered in the forum state, it does not matter that even more harm might have been suffered in another state.

HN30[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has emphasized that a foreign act with foreseeable effects on the forum state does not always give rise to specific jurisdiction; there must be express aiming at the forum state. The court explained that the express aiming requirement is satisfied when the defendant is alleged to have engaged in wrongful conduct targeted at a plaintiff whom the defendant knows to be a resident of the forum state.

HN31[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

For purposes of the purposeful availment prong of the specific jurisdiction test, express aiming encompasses conduct expressly aimed at the forum state. While such conduct can include specifically targeting the plaintiff whom the defendant knows to be a resident of the forum state, it can also include specifically targeting the state itself.

HN32[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

In the context of the intentional act test of specific jurisdiction, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit construes the term intent as referring to an intent to perform an actual, physical act in the real world, rather than an intent to accomplish a result or consequence of that act.

HN33[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

The result or consequence of the act is relevant for purposes of the purposeful availment prong of the specific jurisdiction test, but with respect to the third part of the Calder test, i.e., harm suffered in the forum.

HN34[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

It is beyond dispute in the Ninth Circuit that maintenance of a passive website alone cannot satisfy the express aiming prong of the purposeful direction test. However, if there is something more, i.e., other conduct targeting the forum, the contacts can be sufficient to confer personal jurisdiction.

HN35[] In Personam Actions, Purposeful Availment

For a court properly to exercise specific jurisdiction, the contacts constituting purposeful availment must be the ones that give rise to the current suit. This prong is met if but for the contacts between the defendant and the forum state, the cause of action would not have arisen.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Due Process

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > Purposeful Availment

HN36[] In Personam Actions, Due Process

The final requirement for specific jurisdiction is that it comport with fair play and substantial justice.

Civil Procedure > Discovery & Disclosure > Disclosure > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN37[] Discovery & Disclosure, Disclosure

A court may permit discovery to aid in determining whether it has personal jurisdiction. Discovery is appropriately granted where pertinent facts bearing on the question of jurisdiction are controverted or where a more satisfactory showing of the facts is necessary. On the other hand, where a plaintiff's claim of personal jurisdiction appears to be both attenuated and based on bare allegations in the face of specific denials made by the defendants, the court need not permit even limited discovery.

Civil Procedure > ... > In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction > In Personam Actions > General Overview

HN38[] In Rem & Personal Jurisdiction, In Personam Actions

As the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has explained, where the defendant is from a foreign nation rather than another state, the sovereignty barrier is high and undermines the reasonableness of personal jurisdiction.

[*1076] ORDER RE: MOTIONS TO DISMISS

I. INTRODUCTION

In this unfair competition case, the licensor of a new technology for manufacturing thin optical discs (EcoDisc Technology AG or "Plaintiff") sues the optical disc standard-setting organization ("DVD Forum") and the corporation that licenses that DVD Format standard and DVD Logo (DVD Format/Logo Licensing Corporation or "DVDFLLC")(collectively, [2] "Defendants") to disc replicators worldwide. The First Supplemental Complaint ("FSC") alleges Defendants have threatened [*1077] all disc replicators that if they manufacture the new thinner disc--the EcoDisc--they will be in breach of their license agreement with DVDFLLC and will no longer be permitted to manufacture standard DVDs or use the DVD Logo. The FSC further alleges that Defendants have placed in the marketplace false information regarding the EcoDisc. Plaintiff contends Defendants are conspiring to keep EcoDiscs out of the market to preserve the predominance of their own DVD formats and specifications.

Plaintiff filed this lawsuit in late October 2009, alleging Defendants have engaged in: a conspiracy to restrain trade in violation of state and federal antitrust law; false advertising in violation of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act; tortious interference with contractual relations; tortious interference with prospective economic advantage; trade libel; and unfair business practices in violation of California Business & Professions Code § 17200 et seq.

Defendants each filed a motion to dismiss the claims against them on separate grounds. DVD Forum, a Japanese trade association, filed [3] a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure ("FRCP") 12(b)(2) motion, contending the Court should dismiss the FSC for lack of personal jurisdiction. DVDFLLC, the licensing corporation, moved to dismiss under FRCP 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. DVDFLLC argues Plaintiff's claims are barred under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, which protects the right to petition the government, and Plaintiff otherwise fails to allege cognizable antitrust and false advertising claims. DVDFLLC further argues the Court should decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over Plaintiff's state law claims upon dismissal of the federal causes of action. Plaintiff opposes these motions.

After the Court heard oral argument on Defendants' motions, DVDFLLC filed an ex parte application for leave to file a supplemental declaration. Docket No. 42. Plaintiff opposed. The Court DENIES the application and proceeds to adjudicate the motions to dismiss.

For the reasons outlined in greater detail below, the Court GRANTS DVDFLLC's motion to dismiss the federal antitrust claim on the basis of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine and the false advertising claim on the basis of Plaintiff's failure to [4] plead with the particularity required by FRCP 9(b). The dismissal is with leave to amend. The Court declines to address the merits of the state law claims until Plaintiff has pleaded a viable federal cause of action. With respect to DVD Forum's motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, the motion is GRANTED without leave to amend.

The Court addresses DVDFLLC's motion first.

II. THE RULE 12(b)(6) MOTION

HN1[] On a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, a court must accept all factual allegations pleaded in the complaint as true, and construe those facts and draw all reasonable inferences therefrom "in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party." Cahill v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 80 F.3d 336, 337-38 (9th Cir. 1996); see also Stoner v. Santa Clara County Office of Educ., 502 F.3d 1116, 1120-21 (9th Cir. 2007). The Court recites the factual background of the case as alleged by Plaintiff.

A. BACKGROUND

Defendant DVD Forum is a standard-setting organization that developed a technical standard for optical discs, which it calls the "DVD Format," and which it promotes internationally. FSC P16. Defendant DVDFLLC is a Japanese corporation which is the exclusive licensor [5] of the DVD [*1078] Format standard and the DVD Logo worldwide. [1] FSC PP5, 26. DVDFLLC implements policies and procedures that DVD Forum sets through DVD Forum's Steering Committee. FSC P27. For example, DVDFLLC produces, maintains and issues DVD Format books; registers trademarks and maintains DVD Logos; and polices pirate manufacturers, non-compliant products, and the incorrect usage of DVD Logos. FSC P25.

[1] DVDFLLC has ten shareholders: Hitachi, Philips, Mitsubishi, Panasonic, Pioneer, Sony, Thomson, Time Warner, Toshiba and JVC. FSC P25.

DVDFLLC enters into license agreements with disc replicators to allow replicators to manufacture optical discs in compliance with the accepted DVD Format. The license agreements mandate that the proprietary technology may not be used to manufacture, sell or distribute any products that do not comply fully with the specifications set forth in the DVD Format Book. FSC P56; Saito Decl., Ex. 1 [DVDFLLC License Agreement Art. 2.8]. [2] The heart of this dispute is whether disc replicators, licensed by DVDFLLC, are using the specifications in the DVD Format Book to create EcoDiscs that do not fully comply with the technical standard adopted by DVD Forum and required [6] to use the DVD Logo. Plaintiff alleges its 0.6mm discs are compatible with standard DVD players and can be played in 132 different playback systems. See FSC P52.

Plaintiff is a research and development company that licenses "EcoDisc Technology" in Europe and in the United States. FSC P39. EcoDisc Technology consists of a thin 0.6mm disc that is essentially one-half the thickness of the standard DVD (1.2mm disc) and more flexible. FSC P40. In addition, an EcoDisc is recyclable and environmentally-friendly. Id. Plaintiff alleges Defendants, along with certain of their respective members and shareholders, acted intentionally to suppress the use of innovative EcoDisc Technology and prevent EcoDiscs from competing with the standard DVD promoted by the DVD Forum and DVDFLLC. FSC P45.

For example, Plaintiff alleges that in 2008 a DVD Forum Working Group, WG-2, conducted a technical study of 0.6mm discs. FSC P47. At a September 17, 2008 DVD Forum Steering [8] Committee meeting, the DVDFLLC representative reported DVDFLLC was awaiting the WG-2's final report on its technical study to determine "what should be done as to 0.6mm discs." Id. Two months later, the Steering Committee met and heard the WG-2's report [*1079] on 0.6mm discs, which judged the EcoDisc non-compliant with DVD Forum's specifications. FSC PP47, 51. At this meeting, "[t]here was a further discussion of the issue of 0.6mm discs in the marketplace in Europe." FSC P47.

Plaintiff further alleges in March 2009, DVDFLLC sent a written communication to all of its licensed replicators throughout the world. FSC P48. Plaintiff characterizes this communication as a threat to each replicator with a DVDFLLC License Agreement ("License Agreement") that if the replicator manufactures any 0.6mm discs, including an EcoDisc, the manufacture would be a serious breach of the DVDFLLC License Agreement and may lead to early termination. FSC P48. The letter stated "0.6mm Optical Discs are Not DVD Format Complaint" and "in some instances, such 0.6mm discs have caused damages to the playback apparatus." Id. The letter quoted from Article 2.8 of the License Agreement which states, "[t]he License Agreement [9] requires that all DVD products manufactured by Licensees comply with the specifications set forth in the applicable DVD Format Books." Id. Moreover, "[t]he manufacturer of non-compliant products, including but not limited to the manufacture of 0.6mm discs, is a serious breach of the DVD Format/Logo License Agreement and may lead to early termination of the DVD Format/Logo License Agreement." Id.

DVDFLLC also posted a warning about 0.6mm discs on its website. FSC P49. The posting stated that the 0.6mm disc does not use DVD Format in a proper manner and "is only imperfectly and inappropriately using the Format. The DVD Forum judged that such a Disc is not compliant with the DVD Specifications. To use DVD Formats for products that do not conform to the Specifications is NOT admissible." Id. The posting also states that 0.6mm discs "often cannot be properly played on existing players and drives, and there have been reports of damages to the [2] Article 2.1 of the License Agreement provides the license "shall not under any circumstance authorize Licensee or its Affiliates to use the DVD Format Book(s) or the information contained therein in connection with the manufacture, sale or distribution of any Product other than the DVD Products(s) and DVD Product Category(ies) that have been designated by Licensee in Annex A-1 and for which the appropriate license fee has been paid." Saito Decl., Ex. 1. Article 1.17 defines "Product" as "any disc, device or other product that uses information disclosed in a DVD Format Book." Article 1.10 defines "DVD Product" as "a Product identified in Annex A-2 that conforms to the applicable DVD Format Book(s) specified in Annex A-1." The definition of DVD Product thus appears to be limited to products that use information disclosed in a DVD Format Book. See Saito Decl., Ex. 1 [DVDFLLC License Agreement Arts. 1.10, 1.17, 2.1]. As EcoDisc points out in the FSC, Blue-ray discs and DVD+RW discs are not considered DVD Products because they [7] require unique playback systems, different from those of standard DVDs, and the DVDFLLC License Agreement does not prohibit licensees from manufacturing discs in those alternative formats. It is a disputed question of fact, one which is at the heart of this controversy, whether an EcoDisc is a DVD Product, i.e., whether it is replicated using information disclosed in DVDFLLC's proprietary DVD Format Book.

discs and/or the hardware. . . . Licensees are warned that manufacturing non-compliant DVD Products could lead to termination of the License." Id.

In response to at least one e-mail from a licensee regarding the March 2009 letter, DVDFLLC reiterated that [10] the 0.6mm disc does not use DVD Format in a proper manner and is non-compliant with DVD Specifications. FSC P55. DVDFLLC explained that because it "strive[s] to contain non-compliant products from appearing in the market" and in order to "minimize the problems between disc products and hardware," DVDFLLC must instruct its licensees to manufacture compliant DVD Products as stipulated in Articles 2.8 and 2.9 of the License Agreement. Id.

On June 12, 2009, DVDFLLC filed a complaint in federal court in the Southern District of New York against two licensees for producing EcoDiscs, which were marketed as identical to standard DVD discs in all respects other than thickness. FSC P60. DVDFLLC later distributed copies of the complaint to other licensees. FSC P62.

Plaintiff filed this lawsuit in October 2009, contending Defendants are attempting to suppress and prevent competition from EcoDisc "by making knowingly unfounded and unwarranted statements about the reliability of the EcoDiscs and, more importantly, by threatening all of DVD FLLC's licensed replicators that if they make an EcoDisc, they may lose the ability to make standard DVD discs and use the DVD logo." FSC P54. Subsequent to the [11] filing of this lawsuit, on December 15, 2009, DVDFLLC sent a written communication to licensees offering an amendment to the License Agreement that would allow replication of 0.6mm discs if the licensee places the following warning [*1080] on 0.6mm disc packaging: "This disc is not a standard DVD, and may not operate in some drives or players." FSC P76. Further, the licensee must agree to indemnify DVDFLLC with respect to any costs or liabilities incurred in relation to the manufacture or sale of such discs. Id.

DVDFLLC explains that it does not seek to prevent its licensees from manufacturing EcoDiscs at all; it only seeks to prevent them from using the DVD Format and proprietary technology to manufacture an optical disc that is not fully compliant with its specifications. DVDFLLC contends the playability problems that accompany the non-compliant discs damage the brand and diminish the value of the DVD Logo. Plaintiff, on the other hand, alleges the EcoDisc was awarded a 99.2% playability rating and can be safely played in the same manner as a standard DVD. FSC P52. Plaintiff recognizes there were some ejection problems with certain Apple Mac notebook computers but explains that the slot-in [12] drives on those computers did not meet DVD specifications. FSC P52. In addition, Plaintiff states EcoDisc had a printed visual warning on each EcoDisc stating it should not be used on an Apple Mac slot-in drive. Id. However, Plaintiff has taken steps to change the design of the EcoDisc to avoid this issue. "As of approximately November 2009 [after this lawsuit was filed], EcoDiscs no longer have any known ejection issue on any disc drives." FSC P70. Plaintiff no longer places warnings on its product. Id.

Plaintiff brings two claims for conspiracy to restrain trade. The first is a federal claim for violation of the Section 1 of the Sherman Act, FSC PP78-82, and the second is a state claim for violation of the Cartwright Act, FSC PP83-86. Plaintiff's third claim is for false advertising in violation of Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act, FSC PP87-94, and alleges defendants have made false statement of fact about EcoDisc products. The remaining four claims for tortious interference with contractual relations, tortious interference with prospective economic advantage, trade libel, and violation of California Business & Professions Code § 17200 et seq. are state law claims over which the Court [13] will exercise supplemental jurisdiction only if the federal claims survive dismissal.

B. THE LEGAL STANDARD

HN2[] A court may dismiss a complaint under Rule 12(b)(6) only if it appears beyond doubt that the alleged facts, even if true, will not entitle the plaintiff to relief on the theories asserted. See Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 561, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007); Stoner v. Santa Clara County Office of Educ., 502 F.3d 1116, 1120-21 (9th Cir. 2007); see also Cahill v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 80 F.3d 336, 338 (9th Cir. 1996). While a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations, "a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555 (citation, alteration, and internal quotation marks omitted). Moreover, a court is not "required to accept as true allegations that are merely conclusory, unwarranted deductions of fact, or unreasonable inferences." Sprewell v. Golden State Warriors, 266 F.3d 979, 988 (9th Cir. 2001). The Supreme Court has stated, "only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to [14] dismiss . . . . [W]here the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged--but it has not 'shown'--that the pleader is entitled to relief." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1950, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009).

Finally, HN3[] although a court generally cannot look beyond the pleadings, it may consider: [*1081] (1) any documents attached to the pleadings, Lee v. City of Los Angeles, 250 F.3d 668, 688 (9th Cir. 2001); (2) materials that are properly subject to judicial notice under Rule 201 of the Federal Rules of Evidence, id. at 688-89; and (3) evidence upon which the complaint "necessarily relies" so long as (a) the complaint refers to the document, (b) the document is central to the plaintiff's claim, and (c) no party questions the authenticity of the document, Marder v. Lopez, 450 F.3d 445, 448 (9th Cir. 2006). Here, the Court considers the following documents referenced in and relied upon by the FSC: (1) the DVDFLLC standard Licensing Agreement, Saito Decl., Ex. 1, (2) the complaint filed by DVDFLLC against its licensee, U-Tech, in the Southern District of New York, Saito Decl., Ex. 2, (3) the December 15, 2009 communication re: supplemental [15] licensing agreement, Saito Decl., Ex. 3, and (4) the DVDFLLC supplemental licensing agreement, Saito Decl., Ex. 4.

C. DISCUSSION

The Court begins by considering the threshold question of whether DVDFLLC is entitled to immunity from liability under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine.

1. Noerr-Pennington Immunity

The Noerr-Pennington doctrine derives from two Supreme Court cases holding that the First Amendment Petition Clause immunizes acts of petitioning the legislature from antitrust liability. See United Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657, 85 S. Ct. 1585, 14 L. Ed. 2d 626 (1965); Eastern R.R. Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127, 81 S. Ct. 523, 5 L. Ed. 2d 464 (1961). HN4[] The doctrine has since been applied to actions petitioning each of the three branches of government, including the courts, and has been expanded beyond its original antitrust context. Theme Promotions, Inc. v. News Am. Mktg. FSI, 546 F.3d 991, 1007 (9th Cir. 2008). "The essence of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is that those who petition any department of the government for redress are immune from statutory liability for their petitioning conduct." Id. at 1006 (9th Cir. 2008); Sosa v. DIRECTV, Inc., 437 F.3d 923, 929 (9th Cir. 2006). In Theme Promotions, Inc., [16] the Ninth Circuit held the Noerr-Pennington doctrine applied to the plaintiff's state law intentional interference with prospective economic advantage claims. Theme Promotions, 546 F.3d at 1007. The court explained, "because Noerr-Pennington protects federal constitutional rights, it applies in all contexts, even where a state law doctrine advances a similar goal." Id. (second emphasis added); see also White v. Lee, 227 F.3d 1214, 1231 (9th Cir. 2000)(stating the Noerr-Pennington doctrine is not limited to the antitrust context, but "applies equally in all contexts.") Relying on Theme Promotions, Inc. and White v. Lee, DVDFLLC thus contends the Noerr-Pennington doctrine applies here to bar all of Plaintiff's state and federal law claims. At this time, the Court does not consider whether the doctrine extends to all of Plaintiff's claims because the answer is not necessary to the resolution of the pending motion. [3] The [*1082] Court considers the Noerr-Pennington doctrine only in connection with Plaintiff's federal antitrust claim.

a. Protected Petitioning Activity

HN5[] Only litigation activities which constitute communications to the court may be described fairly as petitions. Sosa, 437 F.3d at 933. A pre-litigation demand letter directed to a private party, therefore, is not a petition. Id. Nevertheless, in connection with the First Amendment's Petition Clause and protection of the right to access the courts, the Ninth Circuit recognizes a breathing space principle which extends immunity under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine to conduct which is incidental to petitioning activities, [18] even if it is not itself petitioning activity. Id. at 934-35; see also Columbia Pictures Indus., Inc. v. Prof'l Real Estate Investors, Inc., 944 F.2d 1525, 1528-29 (9th Cir. 1991), aff'd 508 U.S. 49, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1993). [4] Under Sosa, all communications between private parties related to litigation--including presuit demand letters and settlement offers--are entitled to immunity. Sosa, 437 F.3d at 936-37. [5]

DVDFLLC argues its communications with licensees and its website announcements, which were intended to enforce and protect its intellectual property, are sufficiently related to petitioning activity to trigger the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. See id. at 935. Plaintiff disagrees, insisting "[t]he threat to cancel a license to make standard DVDs has nothing to do with the First Amendment's Petition Clause and is not conduct incidental to any lawsuit." Opp. Br. at 10. Plaintiff's argument is insincere because the FSC itself recognizes that DVDFLLC did file a lawsuit against licensees that failed to satisfactorily respond to DVDFLLC's warnings. FSC P60. The communications at issue in this case asserted DVDFLLC's rights under the License Agreement and warned licensees that manufacturing 0.6mm discs using specifications licensed under the License Agreement could result in litigation. This conduct can be accurately characterized as sufficiently related to litigation to fall within the scope of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine.

b. Sham Litigation

HN6[] "Noerr-Pennington immunity is not a shield for petitioning conduct that, although [20] 'ostensibly directed toward influencing governmental action, is a mere sham to cover what is actually nothing more than an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor.'" Sosa, 437 F.3d at 938 (quoting Noerr, 365 U.S. at 144). Accordingly, conduct otherwise protected by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine may nevertheless be restricted by law if it falls within the "sham litigation" exception. [*1083] Theme Promotions, Inc., 546 F.3d at 1007. In Professional Real Estate Investors, Inc. v. Columbia Pictures Indus., Inc., the Supreme Court established a two-part test for determining whether the sham litigation exception applies. 508 U.S. 49, 60-61, 113 S. Ct. 1920, 123 L. Ed. 2d 611 (1993). To establish DVDFLLC's conduct here was a "sham," Plaintiff must prove (1) DVDFLLC's alleged threats were objectively baseless in the sense that it could not have reasonably expected to prevail in litigation and (2) DVDFLLC's subjective motivation was to interfere with Plaintiff's business relationships. See id.

Plaintiff argues DVDFLLC's alleged threats to revoke licenses were baseless because no licensee was using DVDFLLC's format to manufacture EcoDiscs. Thus, EcoDisc claims that because the alleged threats were [21] a "sham," DVDFLLC is not entitled to the antitrust immunity that generally accompanies petitioning conduct. At this stage in the litigation, the Court need not conclude whether DVDFLLC's conduct was a sham. It must decide only whether Plaintiff has properly pleaded that the conduct was a sham, i.e., objectively unreasonable and subjectively motivated to interfere with Plaintiff's business relationships. Plaintiff must meet a heightened pleading standard because it seeks damages based on conduct that implicates the First Amendment. Kottle v. N.W. Kidney Centers, 146 F.3d 1056, 1063 (9th Cir. 1998); Franchise Realty Interstate Corp. v. San Francisco Local Joint Exec. Bd. of

[4] The FSC recites details of DVDFLLC's lawsuit against U-Tech under the heading "Defendants' Efforts To Suppress EcoDisc Technology and EcoDiscs." FSC PP60-63. However, Plaintiff's opposition to DVDFLLC's motion to dismiss indicates that the pursuit of the U-Tech lawsuit is not alleged to be anticompetitive conduct, but merely evidence showing malice toward Plaintiff in particular. Opp. Br. at 10 n.1.

[5] The Ninth Circuit explained, "preceding the formal filing of litigation with an invitation to engage in negotiations to settle legal claims is a common, if not universal, feature of modern litigation. . . . Restricting such prelitigation conduct when the same demands asserted in a petition to the court is protected would render the entire litigation process more onerous, imposing a substantial burden [19] on a party's ability to seek redress from the courts." Sosa, 437 F.3d at 936.

Culinary Workers, 542 F.2d 1076, 1082-83 (9th Cir. 1976)(HN7[]) "[W]here a plaintiff seeks damages or injunctive relief, or both, for conduct which is prima facie protected by the First Amendment, the danger that the mere pendency of the action will chill the exercise of First Amendment rights requires more specific allegations than would otherwise be required.")

DVDFLLC relies on the "objectively reasonable" prong. It contends there are no allegations in the FSC that, if true, would demonstrate DVDFLLC's assertion of its [22] rights against its licensees was completely unfounded. In fact, Plaintiff concedes that the use of the DVD Format book to produce non-compliant discs violates the License Agreement, FSC P56, and further admits that the EcoDisc does not comply, FSC P42. Plaintiff insists that licensees do not need to use DVDFLLC's format to create an EcoDisc. However, Plaintiff has not adequately explained in its FSC how it is that EcoDiscs can be played on a standard DVD player if manufacturers are not employing DVDFLLC's format standards. DVDFLLC quotes Plaintiff's own allegations that its discs have "the same data structure and same data layer as a conventional DVD-5," FSC P41, which DVDFLLC contends means EcoDiscs use the same specifications that were developed by DVD Forum and licensed by DVDFLLC.

Plaintiff alleges industry standards exist in the public domain from which a basic DVD can be created in a read-only format. FSC PP31-32. The FSC refers to the ECMA standards and implies that replicator licensees could use an ECMA standard instead of Defendants' standard to replicate an EcoDisc, but does not allege that they do. Id. Plaintiff alleges:

> The EcoDisc does not use the DVD Logo, but rather uses [23] the EcoDisc Logo. An EcoDisc does not use any of the Format standards of the DVD Forum and is not compliant with any DVD Format. The EcoDisc is not a standard DVD. A number of patents of different patent pools are used in the manufacture of an EcoDisc and EcoDisc manufacturers are to pay royalties to these patent pools for the manufacture of an EcoDisc.

[*1084] FSC P42. Plaintiff further alleges that an EcoDisc "uses different molds, different specifications, is subject to different patents and patents pending, does not use the DVD Logo, and does not claim to be compliant with any of the specifications of the DVD Forum." Id. P50. Thus, Plaintiff implies Defendants' standards are never used in the manufacture of EcoDiscs and DVDFLLC's license agreements are therefore irrelevant to the production of EcoDiscs.

An important factual question, of course, is whether EcoDiscs are replicated by licensees using DVDFLLC's proprietary information from their DVD Format Book. For our immediate purpose, the crucial truth is that Plaintiff has not adequately alleged directly that replicators are not using Defendants' proprietary information in the manufacture of EcoDiscs. Plaintiff clearly alleges that it does [24] not use Defendants' standards or format, but as to the replicators, the representations are lacking. The FSC contains no allegations that suggest Defendants' belief that their proprietary standards were being improperly utilized by replicators to manufacture EcoDiscs was unreasonable. Thus, EcoDisc has not passed the heightened pleading hurdle that the First Amendment requires.

Accordingly, the motion to dismiss is GRANTED with leave to amend under the doctrine of Noerr-Pennington immunity. To qualify for the sham litigation exception and survive the motion to dismiss, Plaintiff must allege DVDFLLC did not have a reasonable basis to believe its licensees were using its proprietary technology and specifications to make EcoDiscs, but nevertheless threatened its licensees with termination for the improper purpose of interfering with Plaintiff's business.

2. Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act

Neither the United States Supreme Court nor the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has addressed the applicability of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine specifically to claims that arise under Section 43(a) of the Lanham Act. Although the Court may ultimately determine that the Noerr-Pennington doctrine applies [25] to the claim, at this time the Court will not address the issue because it concludes the Lanham Act was not pleaded with the particularity required by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 9(b). See supra n.3; Santana Prods. v. Bobrick Washroom Equipment, Inc., 401

F.3d 123, 135 (3d Cir. 2005)("We will not address at this time the Noerr/Pennington doctrine's applicability to Lanham Act claims because we conclude that Santana's Lanham Act claim is barred by laches.")

Plaintiff claims that DVDFLLC disseminated false statements of fact about plaintiff's EcoDisc product in violation of the false advertising provisions of the Lanham Act. See 15 U.S.C. § 1125(a)(1)(B). HN8[] To support a claim for false advertising under the Lanham Act, a plaintiff must show:

(1) a false statement of fact by the defendant in a commercial advertisement about its own or another's product;
(2) the statement actually deceived or has the tendency to deceive a substantial segment of its audience;
(3) the deception is material, in that it is likely to influence the purchasing decision;

(4) the defendant caused its false statement to enter interstate commerce; and

(5) the plaintiff has been or is likely to be injured as a result [26] of the false statement, either by direct diversion of sales from itself to defendant or by a lessening of the goodwill associated with its products.

Southland Sod Farms v. Stover Seed Co., 108 F.3d 1134, 1139 (9th Cir. 1997).

[*1085] DVDFLLC argues Plaintiff must meet the heightened pleading standard of Rule 9(b) because the claim for false advertising is grounded in fraud. Rule 9(b) sets forth: HN9[] "In alleging fraud or mistake, a party must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake." Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). HN10[] Although the Ninth Circuit has not concluded that Rule 9(b) applies to Lanham Act claims, many district courts have applied this heightened pleading standard to claims that are grounded in fraud, such as misrepresentation claims. See Meridian Project Sys., Inc. v. Hardin Constr. Co., LLC, 404 F. Supp. 2d 1214, 1219-20 (E.D. Cal. 2005). The Court agrees that Plaintiff's false advertising claims are grounded in fraud and that Rule 9(b) applies to the pleading of this claim. HN11[] To satisfy Rule 9(b), Plaintiff must state the "time, place, and specific content of the false representations as well as the identities of the parties to the misrepresentation." Schreiber Distrib. Co. v. Serv-Well Furniture Co., 806 F.2d 1393, 1401 (9th Cir. 1986). [27] Further, Plaintiff must set forth what is false or misleading about a statement, and why it is false. Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1106 (9th Cir. 2003) (citations omitted).

The Court finds Plaintiff has not met the burden of pleading the claim for false advertising according to the standards of Rule 9(b). Plaintiff identifies three separate communications by DVDFLLC that include alleged false statements without specifying which statements are allegedly false or setting forth what is false or misleading about such statements. First, Plaintiff describes a letter from DVDFLLC to its licensees regarding manufacture of 0.6mm discs such as the EcoDisc under the DVDFLLC License Agreement. FSC P48. Second, Plaintiff describes information posted on its website regarding 0.6mm discs. FSC P49. Third, Plaintiff describes a second letter from DVDFLLC to its licensees with a proposed Supplemental Agreement for licensees interested in replicating 0.6mm discs such as the EcoDisc. FSC PP75-76. With respect to each of these three communications, Plaintiff has adequately described the time, place and parties to the alleged misrepresentations. However, Plaintiff has failed to identify the [28] specific content of the alleged false representations, set forth what is false about each statement and explain why it is false. DVDFLLC's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's false advertising claim is GRANTED. Plaintiff is permitted leave to amend the claims in conformity with Rule 9(b) and this order.

3. The State Law Claims

The Court will not address the sufficiency of the state law claims until Plaintiff has adequately pleaded a federal claim. HN12[] In the absence of a viable federal claim, the Court will decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction. See 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(3).

D. CONCLUSION REGARDING THE RULE 12(B)(6) MOTION

The motion is GRANTED in its entirety with leave to amend. Plaintiff may file an amended complaint no later than thirty days from the date of this Order. No further supplemental complaints will be allowed.

III. THE RULE 12(b)(2) MOTION

Plaintiff alleged in its FSC that the Court has personal jurisdiction over Defendants because they "do substantial business in the State of California and within this District and are transacting and doing business and conducting or otherwise transacting their affairs in this District, and the defendants have performed acts in furtherance of [29] their illegal and wrongful conduct as alleged herein, which have had a substantial effect in this District." FSC [*1086] P3. DVD Forum refutes this statement with respect to itself and has moved to dismiss the complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction.

A. THE LEGAL FRAMEWORK

As the Ninth Circuit explained in Schwarzenegger v. Fred Martin Motor Co., HN13[] "[w]here a defendant moves to dismiss a complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction, the plaintiff bears the burden of demonstrating that jurisdiction is appropriate. Where, as here, the motion is based on written materials rather than an evidentiary hearing, the plaintiff need only make a prima facie showing of jurisdictional facts." 374 F.3d 797, 800 (9th Cir. 2004)(internal quotation and citations omitted). Although the plaintiff cannot "simply rest on the bare allegations of its complaint," Amba Mktg. Sys., Inc. v. Jobar Int'l, Inc., 551 F.2d 784, 787 (9th Cir. 1977), uncontroverted allegations in the complaint must be taken as true, AT&T v. Compagnie Bruxelles Lambert, 94 F.3d 586, 588 (9th Cir. 1996). In addition, the Court considers the declarations submitted by the parties. Any factual conflicts in the parties' declarations must be resolved [30] in Plaintiff's favor. Harris Rutsky & Co. Ins. Servs. Inc. v. Bell & Clements Ltd., 328 F.3d 1122, 1129 (9th Cir. 2003). However, here there are no conflicts.

HN14[] Where, as here, there is no applicable federal statute governing personal jurisdiction, the district court applies the law of the state in which the district court sits. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 4(k)(1)(A); Panavision Int'l, L.P. v. Toeppen, 141 F.3d 1316, 1320 (9th Cir. 1998). HN15[] Because California's long-arm jurisdictional statute is coextensive with federal due process requirements, the jurisdictional analyses under state law and federal due process are the same. Id. at 1320 (citing Cal. Civ. Proc. Code § 410.10). HN16[] The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires that the defendant have minimum contacts with the forum state and that the exercise of jurisdiction be consistent with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. Int'l Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316, 66 S. Ct. 154, 90 L. Ed. 95 (1945).

HN17[] There are two types of personal jurisdiction: general and specific. Where a defendant's contacts with a forum are substantial, continuous and systematic, a defendant can be deemed to be "present" in the forum for all purposes. In that [31] case, general jurisdiction is present. Otherwise, a forum may exercise only "specific" jurisdiction, which is based on the relationship between the defendant's forum contacts and the plaintiff's claim. In both cases, all of a defendant's contacts with the forum state are considered, regardless of whether those contacts involve wrongful activity by the defendant. Yahoo! Inc. v. La Ligue Contre Le Racisme Et L'Antisemitisme, 433 F.3d 1199, 1207 (9th Cir. 2006). Finally, the prima facie jurisdictional analysis requires the Court to accept the plaintiff's allegations as true. See Rio Props., Inc. v. Rio Int'l Interlink, 284 F.3d 1007, 1019 (9th Cir. 2002); Bancroft & Masters, Inc. v. Augusta Nat'l Inc., 223 F.3d 1082, 1087 (9th Cir. 2000).

HN18[] In the event that no state within the United States can exercise personal jurisdiction over a defendant, the Court may exercise jurisdiction under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 4(k)(2). [6] Plaintiff [*1087] now concedes that

[6] Rule 4(k)(2) applies in rare situations. In fact, three years ago, the Ninth Circuit remarked that none of its cases thus far had countenanced jurisdiction under the rule. Holland Am. Line v. Wartsila N. Am., Inc., 485 F.3d 450, 462 (9th Cir. 2007). The Circuits that [33] have concluded Rule 4(k)(2) conferred jurisdiction did so in cases where the defendants had extensive neither California nor any other state may exercise personal jurisdiction over DVD Forum and it urges the Court to apply HN19[] Rule 4(k)(2), which governs the territorial limits of effective service. As a practical matter, the rule is used to [32] aggregate a foreign defendant's contacts with the country in order to find jurisdiction proper when contacts with any individual state are insufficient. Rule 4(k)(2) provides:

> HN20[] For a claim that arises under federal law, serving a summons or filing a waiver of service establishes personal jurisdiction over a defendant if: (A) the defendant is not subject to jurisdiction in any state's courts of general jurisdiction; and (B) exercising jurisdiction is consistent with the United States Constitution and laws.

Accordingly, HN21[] a court may exercise jurisdiction when three requirements are met. First, the claim against the defendant must arise under federal law. Pebble Beach Co. v. Caddy, 453 F.3d 1151, 1159 (9th Cir. 2006). Second, the defendant must not be subject to the personal jurisdiction of any state court of general jurisdiction. Id. Third, the federal court's exercise of personal jurisdiction must comport with due process. Id.

With respect to the first requirement, two of Plaintiff's claims arise under federal law, the Sherman Act and the Lanham Act. With respect to the second requirement, Plaintiff now contends jurisdiction is not proper in any state court. [7] DVD Forum itself has not conceded to jurisdiction in any state. HN22[] So long as a defendant does not concede to jurisdiction in another state, a court may use Rule 4(k)(2) to confer jurisdiction. See Holland Am. Line v. Wartsila N. Am., Inc., 485 F.3d 450, 461-62 (9th Cir. 2007). Accordingly, the second requirement of Rule 4(k)(2) is met.

It is the third requirement, [34] the due process requirement, that is not satisfied. HN23[] The due process analysis under Rule 4(k)(2) is identical to the traditional personal jurisdiction analysis, however, the contacts are measured with respect to the United States rather than an individual forum state. Pebble Beach Co., 453 F.3d at 1159. Importantly, Plaintiff offers no examples of contacts between DVD Forum and another state that are different from DVD Forum's contacts with California. In other words, DVD Forum's aggregated contacts with the United States are no greater than, and not meaningfully different from, its contacts with California.

B. THE PARTIES

1. EcoDisc

Plaintiff EcoDisc Technology AG is a Swiss corporation with its principal place of business in Switzerland. FSC P4. Plaintiff describes itself as a research and development company that licenses certain technology relating to optical discs with a thickness of 0.6mm rather than the standard 1.2mm of the DVD Format. FSC PP38-39. Plaintiff licenses its technology to replicators which manufacture EcoDiscs with EcoDisc Technology. Id.

2. DVD Forum

Defendant DVD Forum is an unincorporated DVD industry association, comprised of over one hundred members worldwide, with [35] its principal place of business in Japan. 01/08/10 Irie Decl. PP1, 3; FSC P7. [*1088] DVD Forum is governed by a Steering Committee which meets at least twice a year. 01/08/10 Irie Decl. P3, Ex. A at 7 [DVD Forum Charter, Art. 8(3)]. The Steering Committee approves all decisions relating to the licensing of DVD Formats and the DVD Logo to third parties, including terms and conditions. 01/08/10 Irie Decl., Ex. A at 8 [DVD contacts to the country. See id.; e.g., Mwani v. bin Laden, 417 F.3d 1, 13, 368 U.S. App. D.C. 1 (D.C. Cir. 2005)(defendants engaged in numerous conspiracies to bomb U.S. landmarks); Adams v. Unione Mediterranea Di Sicurta, 364 F.3d 646, 651 (5th Cir. 2004)(defendant directly insured hundreds of claims in the U.S.).

[7] Plaintiff's opposition brief declares that jurisdiction is proper under Rule 4(k)(2) and presents its argument within that framework. At oral argument, counsel again urged the Court to apply Rule 4(k)(2).

Forum Charter, Art. 8(5)(b)]. DVD Forum also has Working Groups, which develop physical specifications for the DVD Format. Id. at 9-10 [DVD Forum Charter, Art. 10].

DVD Forum periodically holds meetings throughout the world, a few each year; the meetings typically last one or two days. See 01/08/10 Irie Decl. P6. Over the course of the last twelve years, nine meetings have been held in the state of California, seven of which were held in the Central District of California. Id. The record does not indicate any meetings were held anywhere else in the United States. See Opp. Br., Exs. 11-15. DVD Forum has charged a registration fee at its conferences, which Plaintiff implies is equivalent to transacting business in California, but DVD Forum is a non-profit organization. 03/08/10 [36] Irie Decl. PP2-3. In an effort to link specific acts of DVD Forum to the claims in this case, the FSC alleges the subject of "0.6 mm discs in the marketplace in Europe" was discussed at the meetings of the DVD Forum Steering Committee held in September and November 2008. FSC P47. However, neither of those meetings were held in the United States. 01/08/10 Irie Decl. P7.

DVD Forum has limited contacts with the United States. It does not make or sell any products or engage in commercial business activities. Id. P3. It does not have a bank account, employees, an office, or any assets or property in California. Id. P5. It does not have an agent designated for service of process in California. Id. Upon advancing its Rule 4(k)(2) theory of jurisdiction, Plaintiff did not additionally allege any of the aforementioned indicators of presence in any other state.

Finally, DVD Forum maintains an informational website on which it posts informational announcements. 01/08/10 Irie Decl. P4. The announcements are passive, are not addressed to any particular recipient, and do not invite comment or response. Id. One announcement DVD Forum posted states, "0.6mm Thick Optical Disc does not use the DVD Format [37] in a proper manner. It is only imperfectly and inappropriately using the Format. The DVD Forum judged that such a disc is not compliant with the DVD Specifications." FSC P53. DVD Forum does list two verification laboratories on its website, which it approves as Class-A labs and which are located in the Central District of California. 03/08/10 Irie Decl. P4. However, DVD Forum does not own or administer those laboratories. Id.

The FSC alleges no actions taken by DVD Forum in the United States, or directed at the United States, related to 0.6 mm discs. There is no evidence that any of the content on DVD Forum's website is designed specifically for the California or the United States market, and, as explained further below, mere web presence is insufficient to establish personal jurisdiction. Panavision Int'l, 141 F.3d at 1322 (9th Cir. 1998).

3. DVDFLLC

DVD Forum publishes and licenses its DVD Format throughout the United States through DVDFLLC, a Japanese corporation. DVDFLLC issues DVD Format Books, registers trademarks and maintains DVD logos, and polices pirate manufacturers. FSC P25. DVDFLLC, not DVD Forum, is alleged to have sent threatening, written communications to disc replicators. [38] FSC PP48, 75. [*1089] DVDFLLC, not DVD Forum, is alleged to have posted on its website information regarding 0.6mm thick optical discs that such discs are not DVD Format compliant and the manufacture of non-compliant products "is a serious breach of the DVD Format/Logo License Agreement and may lead to early termination" of the License Agreement. FSC PP48-49. DVDFLLC, not DVD Forum, is alleged to have filed a complaint in the Southern District of New York against licensees. FSC PP60-61.

C. RELEVANT CONTACTS

Plaintiff seeks to impute the activities of DVDFLLC to DVD Forum for the purposes of personal jurisdiction. For example, Plaintiff alleges that DVD Forum "made the determinations that form the basis for this lawsuit"--concluding EcoDiscs and other 0.6mm discs do not use the DVD Forum's DVD Format in a proper manner--and DVDFLLC used this judgment to threaten disc replicators worldwide. Opp. Br. at 1-2. Plaintiff also argues the DVD Forum Steering Committee directs the activities of DVDFLLC and attributes to DVD Forum the lawsuit DVDFLLC filed against its licensee, U-Tech. Id. at 9. Importantly, Plaintiff never alleges DVDFLLC is an agent or the alter ego of

DVD Forum. If the two entities [39] are separate and distinct, DVDFLLC's presence in a forum state may not be attributed to DVD Forum. Doe v. Unocal Corp., 248 F.3d 915, 925-26 (9th Cir. 2001); AT&T Co., 94 F.3d at 591 ("A parent corporation's relationship with its subsidiary may confer personal jurisdiction over the parent if the subsidiary is acting as the parent company's alter ego, so as to justify disregard of the corporate entity, but AT&T failed to make out a prima facie case that Keystone was GBL's alter ego." (internal citations and quotation marks omitted)); Holland Am. Line, 485 F.3d at 459 ("It is well established that, as a general rule, where a parent and a subsidiary are separate and distinct corporate entities, the presence of one [] in a forum state may not be attributed to the other [].")

Plaintiff also seeks to piggy-back off DVDFLLC's contacts by employing a conspiracy theory of jurisdiction. Plaintiff argues, "[u]nder the circumstance of an alleged conspiracy, the minimum contacts test has been met." Opp. Br. at 17. However, HN24[] California law does not recognize conspiracy as a basis for acquiring jurisdiction over a foreign defendant. U.S. Vestor, LLC v. Biodata Info. Tech., AG, 290 F. Supp. 2d 1057, 1065 (N.D. Cal. 2003); [40] Mansour v. Superior Court, 38 Cal. App.4th 1750, 1760, 46 Cal. Rptr. 2d 191 (1995). Thus, actions taken by co-conspirators in furtherance of the conspiracy cannot be attributed to a conspirator for purposes of establishing personal jurisdiction. CenterPoint Energy, Inc. v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. App.4th 1101, 1118, 69 Cal. Rptr. 3d 202 (2007); see 12 California Jurisprudence 3d Civil Conspiracy § 3; *Morris v. Atchity, No. CV 08-5321-RSWL, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14581, 2009 WL 463971, 3 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 13, 2009).

The only relevant contacts here are DVD Forum's contacts. DVD Forum's contacts with the United States are the same as its contacts with California, which is to say that Plaintiff has not proffered any additional contacts between DVD Forum itself and states other than California. Thus, the jurisdictional analysis under Rule 4(k)(2) is essentially identical to the analysis of personal jurisdiction in California. It therefore follows that by Plaintiff's concession that DVD Forum is not subject to personal jurisdiction in California, and its failure to offer any additional contacts with any other state, Plaintiff has admitted DVD Forum does not have the requisite contacts with the United States either. The Court cannot conclude otherwise.

[*1090] Nevertheless, [41] the Court will conduct a Rule 4(k)(2) analysis of personal jurisdiction, considering the contacts of DVD Forum only; DVDFLLC's contacts are not relevant. DVD Forum's purpose, website, and meetings are evidence of its contacts with the United States. First, the purpose of DVD Forum is to propagate its standards and encourage their adoption worldwide. Second, DVD Forum maintains an informational, non-interactive website, which also contains announcements related to the DVD Format and its use. Third, DVD Forum occasionally holds meetings in the United States, but there is no allegation that 0.6mm discs were discussed at any meeting in the United States.

D. JURISDICTIONAL ANALYSIS

1. General Jurisdiction

HN25[] To be haled into court in the United States in an action unrelated to its contacts with the country, DVD Forum's contacts must be substantial or "continuous and systematic." See Helicopteros Nacionales de Colombia, S.A. v. Hall, 466 U.S. 408, 415-16, 104 S. Ct. 1868, 80 L. Ed. 2d 404 (1984). "The standard for establishing general jurisdiction is 'fairly high' and requires that the defendant's contacts be of the sort that approximate physical presence." Bancroft & Masters, Inc., 223 F.3d at 1086 (quoting Brand v. Menlove Dodge, 796 F.2d 1070, 1073 (9th Cir. 1986)).

DVD [42] Forum's contacts with the United States are insufficient to qualify as either substantial or continuous and systematic. As outlined above, DVD Forum does not make or sell any products or engage in commercial business activities anywhere. 01/08/10 Irie Decl. P3. It does not have a bank account, employees, an office, an agent designated for service of process, or any assets or property in California. Id. P5. Plaintiff has not alleged, and there is no indication in the record, that any of these factors are present in any other state either. The absence of these factors indicates DVD Forum has not established a physical presence in the United States. See Bancroft & Masters, Inc., 223 F.3d at 1086 (reciting factors to be taken into consideration); Glencore Grain Rotterdam B.V. v. Shivnath Rai Harnarain Co., 284 F.3d 1114, 1124-25 (9th Cir. 2002).

2. Specific Jurisdiction

Plaintiff has failed to establish a prima facie case of general jurisdiction. However, the Court may still exercise personal jurisdiction if the case arises out of certain forum-related acts. HN26[] "[S]pecific jurisdiction is tethered to a relationship between the forum and the claim." Holland Am. Line Inc., 485 F.3d at 460. Under [43] Rule 4(k)(2), the United States is the relevant forum. In the Ninth Circuit, specific jurisdiction exists when the following three elements are met:

> (1) The non-resident defendant must purposefully direct his activities or consummate some transaction with the forum or resident thereof; or perform some act by which he purposefully avails himself of the privilege of conducting activities in the forum, thereby invoking the benefits and protections of its laws;
> (2) the claim must be one which arises out of or relates to the defendant's forum-related activities; and
> (3) the exercise of jurisdiction must comport with fair play and substantial justice, i.e. it must be reasonable.

Schwarzenegger, 374 F.3d at 802 (quoting Lake v. Lake, 817 F.2d 1416, 1421 (9th Cir. 1987)); Brayton Purcell LLP v. Recordon & Recordon, 575 F.3d 981, 985 (9th Cir. 2009). HN27[] "The plaintiff bears the burden of satisfying the first two prongs of the test. If the plaintiff fails to satisfy either of these prongs, personal jurisdiction is not established in the forum state." Schwarzenegger, 374 F.3d at 802. Only after the [*1091] plaintiff succeeds in satisfying both of the first two prongs does the burden shift to the defendant to [44] present a compelling case that the exercise of jurisdiction would not be reasonable. Id. Because the Court finds Plaintiff has failed to satisfy the first two prongs, the Court will not reach the third.

a. Purposeful Direction

HN28[] The Ninth Circuit treats the purposeful availment prong as a purposeful direction prong in a tort case. Where the defendant is accused of a tort, the inquiry is whether the defendant purposefully directed its activities at the forum state, applying an "effect" test that focuses on the forum in which the defendant's actions were felt, whether or not the actions themselves occurred within the forum. See Schwarzenegger, 374 F.3d at 802; Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 789-90, 104 S. Ct. 1482, 79 L. Ed. 2d 804 (1984). The effect test has three requirements: the defendant allegedly must have "'(1) committed an intentional act, (2) expressly aimed at the forum state, (3) causing harm that the defendant knows is likely to be suffered in the forum state.'" Schwarzenegger, 374 F.3d at 803 (quoting Dole Food Co., Inc. v. Watts, 303 F.3d 1104, 1111 (9th Cir. 2002)). [8]

HN30[] The Ninth Circuit has emphasized that a foreign act with foreseeable effects on the forum state does not always give rise to specific jurisdiction; there must be "express aiming" at the forum state. Bancroft & Masters, Inc., 223 F.3d at 1087. The court explained that the express aiming requirement is satisfied when the defendant is alleged to have engaged in wrongful conduct targeted at a plaintiff whom the defendant knows to be a resident of the forum state. Id. at 1087-88 (citing five prior Ninth Circuit cases which "bear out the conclusion that 'express aiming' encompasses wrongful conduct individually targeting a known forum resident."); accord Rio Props., Inc., 284 F.3d at 1020-21 (defendant targeted its marketing campaign toward Nevada, which was plaintiff's principal place of business).

[8] Later, HN29[] the Ninth Circuit clarified that the "brunt" of the harm need not be suffered in the forum state. Yahoo! Inc. v. La Ligue Contre Le Racisme Et L'Antisemitisme, 433 F.3d 1199, 1207 (9th Cir. 2006)(en [45] banc). "If a jurisdictionally sufficient amount of harm is suffered in the forum state, it does not matter that even more harm might have been suffered in another state." Id.

DVD Forum takes the position that the express aiming requirement is satisfied only when a defendant targets a plaintiff who is a resident of the forum state and, therefore, there can be no express aiming at the United States [46] in this case because Plaintiff is a Swiss corporation and not a U.S. resident. DVD Forum is incorrect. HN31[] Express aiming encompasses conduct "expressly aimed at the forum state." Schwarzenegger, 374 F.3d at 803. While such conduct can include specifically targeting the plaintiff whom the defendant knows to be a resident of the forum state, it can also include specifically targeting the state itself. For example, in Schwarzenegger, the Ninth Circuit found the defendant expressly aimed its conduct at Ohio, the state in which he circulated offending advertisements, rather than at California, the state in which the plaintiff was known to reside. Id. at 807. Accordingly, the Court rejects DVD Forum's argument that express aiming at the United States is foreclosed due to Plaintiff's Swiss residency. [9]

[*1092] i. Intentional Act

Here, the effect test falters at the first prong because Plaintiff has not offered an intentional act upon which purposeful direction can be based. Plaintiff contends DVD Forum aims its conduct to the United States by seeking to have its standards and formats used for [48] all DVD discs replicated in the United States. However, HN32[] in the context of the "intentional act" test, the Ninth Circuit construes the term intent "as referring to an intent to perform an actual, physical act in the real world, rather than an intent to accomplish a result or consequence of that act." [10] Id. at 806. Therefore, DVD Forum's purpose of having its standard DVD formats and specifications accepted and used on a worldwide basis cannot be considered an intentional act for the purpose of express aiming. For the same reason, the alleged conspiracy to foreclose EcoDisc from the optical disc market cannot qualify as an intentional act because it constitutes an intent to accomplish a result. Plaintiff is left only with the website, website announcements, and the Steering Committee meetings as possible intentional acts.

ii. Express Aiming

DVD Forum's website is informational and passive, making it insufficient for the assertion of specific jurisdiction in the absence of other targeting activities. Pebble Beach, 453 F.3d at 1158; [49] Cybersell, Inc. v. Cybersell, Inc., 130 F.3d 414, 418 (9th Cir. 1997). HN34[] "It is beyond dispute in this circuit that maintenance of a passive website alone cannot satisfy the express aiming prong." Brayton Purcell LLP, 575 F.3d at 986. However, if there were "something more," i.e., other conduct targeting the forum, the contacts could be sufficient to confer personal jurisdiction. Cf. Panavision Int'l, L.P., 141 F.3d at 1321-22 (use of plaintiff's domain name was part of a plan to target and extort competitor plaintiff, creating personal jurisdiction over defendant in the state where plaintiff resided); Pebble Beach, 453 F.3d at 1156-57 (plaintiff and defendant were not competitors and defendant's use of plaintiff's name in his domain name was part of a legitimate operation not a plan targeting plaintiff). Here, Plaintiff argues the posting of the announcement regarding 0.6mm discs on the DVD Forum website constitutes an intentional act. However, the announcement regarding 0.6mm discs did not target California or American residents

[9] The distinction between Schwarzenegger and cases in which courts have found express aiming at a forum by virtue of plaintiff's known residency may lie in the nature of the intentional act. In Calder v. Jones, where the plaintiff claimed she was libeled, and Panavision Int'l, L.P. v. Toeppen, where the plaintiff was a competitor, the plaintiffs were the target of the intentional act and thus the [47] acts were expressly aimed at the plaintiffs and the states in which the defendant knew the plaintiffs resided. Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 104 S. Ct. 1482, 79 L. Ed. 2d 804 (1984); Panavision Int'l, L.P. v. Toeppen, 141 F.3d 1316 (9th Cir. 1998). In Schwarzenegger, the effect on the plaintiff was incidental; he was not the target of the conduct. 374 F.3d at 807. Likewise, in Pebble Beach, the Ninth Circuit found the defendant did not expressly aim its conduct at California or the United States, despite his knowledge that plaintiff resided there, because the only acts identified as being directed at California or the United States were the maintenance of a website that could be accessed worldwide and the use of the name "Pebble Beach" in the domain name. 453 F.3d at 1156. The passive website did not target a particular audience, and it did not target the plaintiff because the two were not competitors; the "something more" was missing.

[10] HN33[] "The result or consequence of the act is relevant, but with respect to the third part of the Calder test--'harm suffered in the forum.'" Schwarzenegger, 374 F.3d at 806.

in particular. It applied, and was viewed, internationally. To the extent the announcement targeted Plaintiff as a competitor, Plaintiff is a Swiss corporation [50] that would be injured--if at all--in Switzerland.

Plaintiff contends the DVD Forum Steering Committee meetings held in Fall 2008 constitute intentional acts and give rise to the current suit because 0.6mm discs were discussed. But both of those meetings were held in Europe, not in the [*1093] United States, and the discussion was regarding "the issue of 0.6 mm discs in the marketplace in Europe." See FSC P47. Neither the topic nor the location of the meetings have anything to do with the United States. This allegation also fails to show express aiming at the United States.

iii. Foreseeable Harm

With respect to the meetings that DVD Forum Steering Committee held in California as intentional acts expressly aimed at the United States, Plaintiff has not linked any of those meetings to the claims in this case. Plaintiff therefore fails to properly allege how the meetings have caused foreseeable harm in the forum state, as the third prong of the effects test. Moreover, because the California meetings do not give rise to the current suit, they fail the "but for" causation prong -- the second prong -- of the specific jurisdiction test.

b. "Arising Out Of" Activities In California

HN35[] For a court properly to [51] exercise specific jurisdiction, "the contacts constituting purposeful availment must be the ones that give rise to the current suit." Bancroft & Masters, Inc., 223 F.3d at 1088. This prong is met if "but for" the contacts between the defendant and the forum state, the cause of action would not have arisen. Id.; Terracom v. Valley Nat'l Bank, 49 F.3d 555, 561 (9th Cir. 1995). Plaintiff has not alleged any of the meetings DVD Forum held in California gave rise to its claims. And, as already explained, the announcement posted on the passive globally accessible website cannot confer jurisdiction simply because California residents can access it. Such a result would cast the jurisdictional net of California in an unconstitutionally broad manner. Thus, the second element of the specific jurisdiction test is not satisfied.

c. Due Process Considerations

HN36[] The final requirement for specific jurisdiction is that it comport with fair play and substantial justice. See Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 476, 105 S. Ct. 2174, 85 L. Ed. 2d 528 (1985). Because the Court finds Plaintiff has failed to satisfy the first two prongs, the Court need not engage in such a reasonableness determination.

D. [52] REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL DISCOVERY

HN37[] A court may permit discovery to aid in determining whether it has personal jurisdiction. Wells Fargo & Co. v. Wells Fargo Express Co., 556 F.2d 406, 430 n.24 (9th Cir. 1977). Discovery is appropriately granted where pertinent facts bearing on the question of jurisdiction are controverted or where a more satisfactory showing of the facts is necessary. See id. On the other hand, "'where a plaintiff's claim of personal jurisdiction appears to be both attenuated and based on bare allegations in the face of specific denials made by the defendants, the Court need not permit even limited discovery. . . .'" Pebble Beach Co., 453 F.3d at 1160 (quoting Terracom, 49 F.3d at 562).

The declarations of Hideyuki Irie, submitted by DVD Forum, address the few relevant facts put at issue, and were not controverted by the Plaintiff. Plaintiff requests extensive and burdensome jurisdictional discovery but has failed to demonstrate how further discovery would allow it to contradict the Irie declaration. The Court concludes that additional discovery would be futile and will not yield any facts relevant to jurisdictional issues. Accordingly, the request for additional discovery [53] is DENIED.

E. CONCLUSION REGARDING THE RULE 12(B)(2) MOTION

The Court concludes the contacts between DVD Forum and the United States are random and attenuated. DVD Forum does not have an office or employees in the [*1094] United States. It does not sell products to the United States. Nothing in the record links DVD Forum to the United States except for a few conferences in California. A defendant should not be haled into court as a result of such random, fortuitous or attenuated contacts. See Burger King Corp., 471 U.S. at 475. Moreover, HN38[] as the Ninth Circuit has explained, "[w]here, as here, the defendant is from a foreign nation rather than another state, the sovereignty barrier is high and undermines the reasonableness of personal jurisdiction." Amoco Egypt Oil Co. v. Leonis Nav. Co., Inc., 1 F.3d 848, 852 (9th Cir. 1983), quoted by Glencore Grain Rotterdam B.V., 284 F.3d at 1126. Accordingly, the Court GRANTS DVD Forum's motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction. The complaint is DISMISSED against DVD Forum WITH PREJUDICE.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the Court GRANTS DVDFLLC's motion to dismiss in its entirety WITH LEAVE TO AMEND. Plaintiff may file [54] an amended complaint no later than thirty (30) days from the date of this Order. No further supplemental complaints will be allowed.

The Court DENIES Plaintiff's request for jurisdictional discovery and GRANTS DVD Forum's motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction. The complaint is DISMISSED against DVD Forum WITH PREJUDICE.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A complaint will survive a motion to dismiss if it contains sufficient factual matter to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. The reviewing court's inquiry is limited to the allegations in the complaint, which are accepted as true and construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. A court need not, however, accept as true the complaint's legal conclusions. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. Thus, a reviewing court may begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Courts must then determine whether the factual allegations in the complaint plausibly give rise to an entitlement of relief. Though the plausibility inquiry is not akin to a probability requirement, a complaint will not survive a motion to dismiss if its factual allegations do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct. That is to say, plaintiffs must nudge their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

On a motion to dismiss, a court normally may not look to matters beyond the complaint without converting the motion into one for summary judgment. There are two exceptions to this rule: (1) a court may take judicial notice of material which is either submitted as part of the complaint or necessarily relied upon by the complaint; and (2) a court may take judicial notice of matters of public record. Under Fed. R. Evid. 201(b), a judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either: (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court; or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. Furthermore, a court shall take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information. Fed. R. Evid. 201(d).

Evidence > Judicial Notice > General Overview

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Judicial notice appropriate where the plaintiff's claim depends on the contents of a document. The Ninth Circuit has extended the incorporation by reference doctrine to situations in which the plaintiff's claim depends on the contents of a document, the defendant attaches the document to its motion to dismiss, and the parties do not dispute the authenticity of the document, even though the plaintiff does not explicitly allege the contents of that document in the complaint.

Evidence > Judicial Notice > General Overview

HN4[] Evidence, Judicial Notice

Courts may take judicial notice of publications introduced to indicate what was in the public realm at the time, not whether the contents of those articles were in fact true.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN5[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

In general, single brand markets do not constitute a relevant market for purposes of a claim under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq. However, there is an exception where aftermarket restrictions are not disclosed or agreed to by the customers at the time of purchase of a product or service from the primary market.

HN6[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

To establish a single-brand aftermarket under the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Kodak and the Ninth Circuit's decision in Newcal, the restriction in the aftermarket must not have been sufficiently disclosed to consumers in advance to enable them to bind themselves to the restriction knowingly and voluntarily.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN7[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

For purposes of a relevant market, competition in the initial market does not necessarily suffice to discipline anticompetitive practices in the aftermarket.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN10[] Standing, Requirements

To establish standing under the federal antitrust laws, a plaintiff must have suffered an antitrust injury, that is, an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendant's acts unlawful. In Associated General Contractors of America v. California State Council of Carpenters, the U.S. Supreme Court set forth a multi-factor test for analyzing antitrust standing, but the Supreme Court subsequently determined that the essential element is antitrust injury: a showing of antitrust injury is necessary, but not always sufficient, to establish standing.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Private Actions > Standing > Requirements

HN11[] Standing, Requirements

Antitrust injury requires the plaintiff to have suffered an injury in the market where competition is being restrained. Parties whose injuries, though flowing from that which makes the defendant's conduct unlawful, are experienced in another market do not suffer an antitrust injury. There is no rigid "consumer or competitor" test for standing. Rather, while consumers and competitors are most likely to suffer antitrust injury, there are situations in which other market participants can suffer antitrust injury. Further, it is not the status as a consumer or competitor that confers antitrust standing, but the relationship between the defendant's alleged unlawful conduct and the resulting harm to the plaintiff. Therefore, the fact that a plaintiff is not a consumer or competitor does not resolve the issue.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN12[] Tying Arrangements, Sherman Act Violations

A tying arrangement is an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier. Not all tying arrangements are illegal. Rather, ties are prohibited where a seller exploits, controls, forces, or coerces a buyer of a tying product into purchasing a tied product. The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. When such "forcing" is present, competition on the merits in the market for the tied item is restrained and the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., is violated. An essential element of a tying claim is market power in the tying product--the tying market. Failure to allege power in the relevant market is a sufficient ground to dismiss an antitrust complaint. Further, a tying claim generally requires that the defendant's economic power be derived from the market, not from a voluntary contractual relationship.

HN13[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

In order to state a claim under the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., a plaintiff must allege that the defendant has market power in a "relevant market." A relevant market must be a product market, and must encompass the product at issue as well as all reasonable substitutes for the product. A relevant market can be based on a submarket, which must be economically distinct from the general product market.

HN14[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

In Newcal, the Ninth Circuit noted that three principles emerged from the leading cases: (1) the law permits an antitrust claimant to restrict the relevant market to a single brand of the product at issue; (2) the law prohibits a claimant from resting on market power that arises solely from contractual rights that consumers knowingly and voluntarily give to the defendant; and (3) in determining whether the defendant's market power falls within the category of contractually-based market power or in the category of economic market power, the law permits an inquiry into whether a consumer's selection of a particular brand in the competitive market is the functional equivalent of a contractual commitment, giving that brand an agreed-upon right to monopolize its consumers in an aftermarket.

HN15[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

For purposes of the relevant market in the antitrust context, reasonable interchangeability means all products which could be used for the same general purpose, despite functional or price differences among them.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

Civil Procedure > Trials > Jury Trials > Province of Court & Jury

HN16[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

The question of whether the market should include other products is better resolved at the summary judgment stage, rather than on a motion to dismiss. Ultimately what constitutes a relevant market is a factual determination for the jury. The definition of the relevant market is basically a fact question dependent upon the special characteristics of the industry involved. For antitrust purposes, defining the product market involves identification of the field of competition: the group or groups of sellers or producers who have actual or potential ability to deprive each other of significant levels of business. This definitional process is a factual inquiry for the jury.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN17[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

There is no requirement to plead with specificity the existence of market power in a relevant market. Market definition involves a deeply fact-intensive inquiry and, for this reason, a court must be hesitant to grant a motion to dismiss for failure to plead a relevant market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Per Se Rule

HN18[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

In Jefferson Parish, the U.S. Supreme Court determined that per se condemnation--condemnation without inquiry into actual market conditions--is only appropriate if the existence of forcing is probable. Specifically, the application of the per se rule focuses on the probability of anticompetitive consequences. Of course, as a threshold matter there must be a substantial potential for impact on competition in order to justify per se condemnation. It is for this reason that the Supreme Court has refused to condemn tying arrangements unless a substantial volume of commerce is foreclosed thereby. Once this threshold is surmounted, per se prohibition is appropriate if anticompetitive forcing is likely.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > State Regulation > Claims

HN19[] State Regulation, Claims

Where a plaintiff fails to state an antitrust claim, and where an unfair competition claim is based upon the same allegations, such state claims are properly dismissed.

[*978] ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART DEFENDANT'S MOTION TO DISMISS

Plaintiff Datel Holdings filed this action against Defendant Microsoft for violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2, and Section 3 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14, alleging that Defendant unlawfully monopolized the relevant markets for the Xbox 360 online video [*979] game system and Xbox 360 accessories. The complaint contains six claims: (1) violation of the Sherman Act: Monopolization and Attempted Monopolization of the Aftermarket for Xbox [2] 360 Accessories and Add-ons; (2) violation of the Sherman Act: Monopolization and Attempted Monopolization of the Multiplayer Online Dedicated Gaming Systems Market; (3) violation of the Sherman Act and Clayton Act: tying arrangement; (4) violation of California Business & Professions Code section 17200; (5) common law unfair competition ; and (6) Intentional Interference with Prospective Economic Advantage. On January 22, 2010, Defendant filed this motion to dismiss, which Plaintiff opposed. On March 9, 2010, the Court held a hearing on Defendant's motion. For the reasons stated at the hearing and in this Order, Defendant's motion is granted in part and denied in part.

One of Plaintiff's leading products is a memory card for the Xbox known as the MAX Memory card. Id. Plaintiff's two gigabyte MAX Memory card retails for approximately $ 39.99. Id. Defendant is the only other supplier of memory cards for the Xbox 360. Id. Defendant's memory card, which has only 512 megabytes of memory, also retails for approximately $ 39.99. [3] Id.

Defendant released the Xbox in 2001, and launched the second generation console, Xbox 360, in 2005. Compl. P 11. Various models of the Xbox 360 sell for $ 199.99 to $ 299.99. Id. In addition to the functionality of the Xbox 360, Defendant attracts customers with its Xbox Live program, which is a subscription-based online multiplayer gaming service. Id. P 12. As of May 2009, Defendant reported more than 20 million active members of Xbox Live. Id.

The Xbox 360 reached the market one year before Sony, Defendant's competitor, released its Playstation 3 in November 2006. Compl. P 13. The Xbox 360 continues to control a larger share of the market that Sony's Playstation 3. Id. In January 2009, Defendant reported that total sales of Xbox 360 had reached 28 million, as compared to 20 million for Playstation 3. Id. In May 2009, Defendant's unit sales passed the 30 million mark for the Xbox 360, and analysts reported sales of 23 million for the Playstation 3. Id.

There is a considerable aftermarket for Xbox 360 accessories and add-ons, apart from Xbox 360 games. Compl. P 14. Plaintiff, which has been developing and manufacturing electronics and video game console peripherals since the late [4] 1980s, offers several aftermarket products for the Xbox 360: (1) the XSATA and Xport (for transferring data between an Xbox 360 and a personal computer, allowing users to store Xbox demos, game saves and other materials on personal computer); (2) MAX Memory card (memory cards compatible with the Xbox 360 available in 2GB and 4GB versions); (3) MAX Drive 160 (an external 160GB hard drive for use with the Xbox 360 console); and (4) other accessories designed for use with the Xbox 360 or Xbox Live such as game headsets and rechargers for wireless controllers. Compl. P 15. Plaintiff has announced, but not yet released, a Joypad controller to compete with Defendant's wireless controllers. Id. P 16.

Plaintiff is the only source for Xbox 360-compatible memory cards other than Defendant itself. Compl. P 17. Plaintiff's cards were first released in May 2009. Id. As of November 1, 2009, Plaintiff's 2 gigabyte MAX Memory card ("DMMC") for the Xbox 360 console was available for [*980] purchase at a retail price of $ 39.99, and Plaintiff's 4 gigabyte DMMC was available for $ 49.99. Id. P 18. The DMMCs may be purchased online or in stores, sometimes at a discount. Id. Plaintiff's memory card is described [5] at a retailer's website as follows: "Ensure that you have enough memory to save vital game information from your Xbox 360 games. The Max Memory 2GB Memory Card provides 2 gigabytes of reliable storage. Easily save levels, characters, and high scores with speed and security." Id. P 18.

As of November 1, 2009, Defendant's 512 MB memory card, the only size Defendant offers, retailed for approximately $ 39.99, and was described at xbox.com as follows: "Take your games everywhere you go with eight times the space of the original Xbox 360 Memory Unit. With 512 MB of memory and a keychain carrying case, it's a snap to bring your game saves, Xbox Live gamer profiles, Arcade game downloads and even exclusive kiosk content." Compl. P 19.

On October 16, 2009, Defendant issued a notice to Xbox users through a blog entitled "Major Nelson." Compl. P 20. The notice stated that when users receive a software update in the following week, unauthorized memory cards (such as Plaintiff's) would no longer work with the Xbox 360. Id. The blog suggested moving information from an unauthorized memory card to an authorized one. Id.

Defendant informed Plaintiff that the disabling of third party memory cards was [6] an unintentional effect of a software update. Compl. P 21. Later, however, Defendant stated in an October 23, 2009 article that it goes to great lengths to protect the Xbox service from cheating that comes from use of unauthorized memory cards, and that use of those cards could cause compatibility and safety issues. Id. The move from unauthorized cards has created discussion online, and Plaintiff alleges that Defendant has not explained how a larger memory card promotes cheating, nor has it identified a compatibility or safety issue between a DMMC and an Xbox console. Id. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's justification for disabling unauthorized memory cards based on cheating is a pretext, and that the true purpose behind disablement of the DMMCs is to exclude competition from the Xbox 360 aftermarket for memory cards and to force consumers to buy Defendant's memory cards. Id. P 24. Plaintiff alleges that there is no benefit to consumers from Defendant's decision to target Plaintiff's product that will leave approximately 50,000 consumers with useless memory cards, and will forestall innovation and deprive consumers of the benefits of competition. Id. at P 3.

Plaintiff alleges that [7] Defendant has modified the Xbox 360's authorization protocols to prevent the interoperability of Plaintiff's other products, including the as-yet-unreleased Joypad. Compl. P 25. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's intention is to block the use of Plaintiff's competitive devices. Id. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's update does not constitute an improvement of the product, but is instead an arbitrary contrivance intended to perpetuate Defendant's market power. Id. at P 4.

Relevant markets

Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's anticompetitive conduct has affected two relevant product markets: (1) the aftermarket for accessories and add-ons specific to the Xbox brand; and (2) the primary market for video game systems that feature multiplayer online gaming in addition to personal gaming. Compl. P 26.

Aftermarket for Xbox 360 Accessories and Add-ons ("Aftermarket")

Plaintiff alleges that the Aftermarket is a relevant market that is wholly derivative of and dependent upon the primary market for the Xbox 360 gaming system. [*981] Compl. P 27. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant dominates this Aftermarket. Id. Defendant's add-ons are designed specifically for the Xbox 360 and are not interchangeable with [8] products outside the Aftermarket. Id. P 28. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant controls the Aftermarket, and has effected policies and practices designed to retain its control, including: (1) tying the sale of aftermarket accessories and add-ons to the sale of the Xbox 360 console; (2) erecting technological barriers to restrict the interoperability of third party accessories and add-ons; (3) using software updates to disable otherwise functional third party add-ons and accessories; and (4) using its special access to purchasers of an Xbox gaming system to promote its own add-ons and accessories and to advise customers against purchasing third party products. Id. P 29.

Plaintiff alleges that the efficacy of Defendant's techniques is indicated by the fact that Plaintiff is the only firm that has been able to overcome Defendant's technical barriers and bring to market a competing memory card for the Xbox 360. Compl. P 30. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's market power in the Aftermarket derives from Defendant's control over the Xbox 360 hardware and software, and from its special access to purchasers of the gaming system, and does not derive from contractual rights that consumers knowingly [9] and voluntarily gave Defendant at the time of purchase. Id. P 31. Plaintiff alleges that market imperfections have prevented consumers from realizing the impact that their choice in the primary market would have on their freedom in the Aftermarket. Id. P 32 (for example, the presence of a USB port in the Xbox 360 console suggests to consumers that third party accessories and add-ons would be compatible and permissible).

Plaintiff alleges that Defendant misled customers into a reasonable belief at the time of purchasing an Xbox 360 console that third party accessories and add-ons are available. Compl. P 33 (for example, Defendant's spokesperson stated that the Xbox 360 "also drives a ton of third-party spend," and noted the availability of "a lot of third party alternatives."). Plaintiff alleges that Defendant has touted its "accessories attach rate" as higher than any other manufacturer, including Sony. Id. P 34. Defendant attributed this high rate to customer loyalty and trust. Id. However, Plaintiff alleges that the real reason is Defendant's anticompetitive conduct, including tying and predatory design, that drives the accessories attach rate. Id.

Plaintiff alleges that Defendant [10] has used its power in the Aftermarket to charge supra-competitive prices. Compl. P 35 (for example, although prices for memory cards in general have decreased steadily since 2005, Defendant's proprietary Xbox 360 memory card held steady at $ 59.99 across a two-year period, until Plaintiff introduced its memory card, at which time Defendant reduced its price). Plaintiff alleges that even if there were meaningful competition in the primary market for multiplayer online dedicated gaming systems, that would not check Defendant's monopoly power in the Aftermarket due to: (1) the high switching costs associated with switching gaming systems; (2) the high information costs; (3) the large ratio of installed customer base relative to potential new customers; and (4) the substantial ability to exploit customers. Id. P 36.

Multiplayer Online Dedicated Gaming Systems Market ("Online Market")

The Multiplayer Online Dedicated Gaming Systems Market is a specific market for dedicated gaming systems with a meaningful capacity for online multiplayer gaming. Compl. P 37. Plaintiff alleges that only two systems, the Xbox 360 and [*982] the Playstation 3, compete in the Online Market. Id. P 37, 42.

Plaintiff alleges [11] that Nintendo's Wii system has limited multiplayer gaming functionality, and that the reduced functionality and lower price point reflect a target market that is distinct from that of Xbox 360 and the Playstation 3. Id. at P 38. Therefore, the Wii system should not be considered reasonably interchangeable with the Xbox 360 and the Playstation 3. Id.

Plaintiff alleges that personal computers may offer multiplayer online functionality, but at a higher price for a system that tends to lack other features usually included in dedicated gaming systems. Compl. P 39. Therefore, personal computers should not be considered reasonably interchangeable with the Xbox 360 and the Playstation 3. Id.

Plaintiff alleges that Defendant has measured the success of the Xbox 360 against the Playstation 3, to the exclusion of other products or platforms. Compl. P 40 (for example, on December 1, 2008, Defendant issued a press release comparing Xbox 360 sales against Playstation 3 sales, and did not address Wii sales or personal computer sales). Plaintiff also alleges that Defendant's pricing of the Xbox 360 line has influenced Sony's pricing of the Playstation 3 line, and vice versa, but such pricing has not [12] tracked or influenced the pricing of the Wii or personal computers. Id. P 41.

Plaintiff alleges that Defendant enjoys market power within the Online Market. Compl. P 43. Specifically, sales statistics reported by Defendant establish that the Xbox 360 console has significantly more total unit sales than the Playstation 3 console. Id. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's share of the Online Market was approximately 66% as of July 2009, and that in June 2009, the Xbox 360 outsold the Playstation 3 by approximately 1.5 to 1. Id. Plaintiff alleges that this disparity shows that Defendant's market dominance is continuing and stable. Id.

Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's market power in the Online Market is unchecked by the potential for competition from new market entrants due to substantial barriers to market entry other than anticompetitive conduct, such as: (1) the extremely high costs of development and production of a competing video game system; (2) the established libraries of games and online gaming communities of Defendant and Sony, which tend to entrench consumers in a particular system; and (3) the massive monetary, technological and human resources at the disposal of Defendant and [13] Sony and their ability to sell at below cost. Compl. P 45.

Legal standard

HN1[] A complaint will survive a motion to dismiss if it contains "sufficient factual matter . . . to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (citing Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1974, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)). The reviewing court's "inquiry is limited to the allegations in the complaint, which are accepted as true and construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff." Lazy Y Ranch LTD v. Behrens, 546 F.3d 580, 588 (9th Cir. 2008).

A court need not, however, accept as true the complaint's "legal conclusions." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949. "While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations." Id. at 1950. Thus, a reviewing court may begin "by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth." Id.

[*983] Courts must then determine whether the factual allegations in the complaint "plausibly give rise to an entitlement of relief." Id. Though the plausibility inquiry "is not akin to a probability requirement," a complaint will not survive [14] a motion to dismiss if its factual allegations "do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct . . . ." Id. at 1949 (internal quotation marks omitted) & 1950. That is to say, plaintiffs must "nudge[] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570.

Request for Judicial Notice

HN2[] On a motion to dismiss, a court normally may not look to matters beyond the complaint without converting the motion into one for summary judgment. See Mack v. South Bay Beer Distributors, 798 F.2d 1279, 1282 (9th Cir. 1986), overruled on other grounds by Astoria Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Solimino, 501 U.S. 104, 111 S. Ct. 2166, 115 L. Ed. 2d 96 (1991). There are two exceptions to this rule: (1) a court may take judicial notice of material which is either submitted as part of the complaint or necessarily relied upon by the complaint; and (2) a court may take judicial notice of matters of public record. See Lee v. City of Los Angeles, 250 F.3d 668, 688-89 (9th Cir. 2001). Under Fed. R. Evid. 201(b), a "judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either: (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court; [15] or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned." Furthermore, a court "shall take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information." See Fed. R. Evid. 201(d); Mullis v. United States Bank, 828 F.2d 1385, 1388 fn. 9 (9th Cir. 1987).

Defendant seeks judicial notice of three documents: (1) the Xbox 360 "Limited Warranty and Return Information," which includes the Xbox 360 software license; (2) the Xbox Live Terms of Use; and (3) a portion of the Xbox 360 console packaging. The first two documents are publicly available online and the third is available in any Xbox 360 console packaging. Plaintiff has objected to judicial notice of these documents, and has filed a conditional request for judicial notice of other documents if the Court grants judicial notice of Defendant's documents. Defendant has filed a response to Plaintiff's objections, but did not file objections to Plaintiff's conditional request for judicial notice.

Not reasonably in dispute

Defendant argues that its three documents are judicially noticeable because they are publicly available and not subject to reasonable dispute. [16] The first two documents are available online and the third can be obtained from the purchase of any Xbox 360 system. See, e.g., Mayfield. Sara Lee Corp., 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42458, 2005 WL 88965, at 3, n. 2 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 13, 2005) (taking judicial notice of photocopies of various bread product packages displaying the Sara Lee brand"); *Wright v, Gen. Mill, Inc., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 90576, 2009 WL 3247148 at 5 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 30, 2009) (taking judicial notice of various labels and packaging associated with the Nature Valley products). Defendant further argues that the documents are easily verifiable, and that documents found on the Internet have been held to constitute public records subject to judicial notice. See, e.g., Wible v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 375 F. Supp. 2d 956, 965-66 (C.D. Cal. 2005) (taking judicial notice of admissions on a website associated with a witness as well as the contents of Amazon.com web pages describing books related to the case); but cf., e.g., Experian Info. Solutions, Inc. v. Lifelock, 633 F. Supp. 2d 1104, 1107 (C.D. Cal. 2009) (finding that Governor of Connecticut's webpage was not judicially noticeable because [*984] material on website not capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose [17] accuracy cannot be questioned); Ruiz v. Gap, Inc., 540 F. Supp. 2d 1121, 1124 (N.D. Cal. 2008) (declining to take judicial notice of webpage containing list of reported identity theft breaches in California because materials "not remotely akin to the type of facts which may be appropriately judicially noticed."). Here, the documents sought to be judicially noticed are capable of accurate and ready determination because they are standard documents. These documents are judicially noticeable for the fact that they exist, not whether, for example, the documents are valid or binding contracts.

Plaintiff argues that several issues relating to these documents are in dispute. Although Plaintiff argues that there has been no showing that the documents cover the entire relevant market, Defendant has submitted a follow-up declaration from Patrick King attaching additional packaging information since 2005, which resolves this issue. See King Decl. Ex. 1-4.

Plaintiff also argues that the Terms of Use document is dated September 2008, so Defendant cannot argue that it was provided to all Xbox customers during the relevant period since 2005. Plaintiff's argument, however, goes to the weight of the [18] evidence, not to whether the documents are judicially noticeable. See *In re NVIDIA GPU Litig., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 108500, 2009 WL 4020104 at 8 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 19, 2009) (taking judicial notice of certain documents (including web pages), even though the defendant failed to demonstrate that the documents were the warranties that applied to all of the class computers purchased during the class period or even whether the warranties comprised the full extent of the applicable warranties).

Necessarily relied on in complaint

Defendant also argues that judicial notice is appropriate because Plaintiff's claim depends on these documents. See Knievel v. ESPN, Inc., 393 F.3d 1068, 1076 (9th Cir. 2005) (HN3[] judicial notice appropriate where the plaintiff's claim depends on the contents of a document, stating: "We have extended the 'incorporation by reference' doctrine to situations in which the plaintiff's claim depends on the contents of a document, the defendant attaches the document to its motion to dismiss, and the parties do not dispute the authenticity of the document, even though the plaintiff does not explicitly allege the contents of that document in the complaint."); see also *Berenblat v. Apple, Inc., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80734, 2009 WL 2591366 at 1, n.3 (N.D. Cal. Aug, 21, 2009) [19] ("Apple's Request for Judicial Notice of the terms of the express warranty is granted, as the FAC references the warranty and at least two of the Berenblat Plaintiffs exercised their rights under the express warranty.").

Here, the complaint alleges that Defendant's market power does not derive from a contractual right with its customers that was knowingly given at the time of purchase. Compl. P 31. Therefore, judicial notice is appropriate because Plaintiff's complaint depends, at least in part, on the contents of the documents. See *In re Samsung Elecs. Am., Inc. Blu-Ray Class Action Litig., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105199, 2008 WL 5451024, at 4 n. 2 (D. N.J. Dec. 31, 2008) ("In the Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs specifically acknowledge the existence of warranty information in each Player's packaging. Those documents are integral to Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint, as the warranty language serves, as a matter or law, to either support or erode Plaintiffs' claims. As a result, this Court will consider the warranty information, without converting Defendant's motion to dismiss into one for summary judgment.").

[20] The Court takes judicial notice of the existence and content of these documents, though not of their legal effect.

[*985] Plaintiff's conditional request for judicial notice

Plaintiff filed a conditional request for judicial notice, seeking judicial notice of ten documents. The documents are: (1) a screen shot from the game "Mass Effect 2" showing an Xbox update prompt (Exhibit A); (2) packaging for Horipad EX2 Turbo controller and a Wal-Mart printout for sale of the controller (Exhibit B); (3) webpages for the game Battlefield: Bad Company (Exhibit C); (4) printout of the website of IGN Entertainment (Exhibit D); (5) printout from Defendant's website link to the IGN Entertainment webpage (Exhibit E); (6) game disc and screen shots from game disc in the March 2004 Official Xbox magazine (Exhibit F); (7) printout from website showing a third party cable for transferring data between Xbox 360 memory unit and a personal computer (Exhibit G); (8) printouts of tutorials on connecting third party accessories to the Xbox (Exhibit H); (9) copy of Xbox 360 console packaging purchased in November 2009 (Exhibit I); and (10) printout from website showing a news article entitled "Wii is for Babies" (Exhibit [21] J).

Exhibits E and H are printouts from Defendant's own website, which are judicially noticeable. See *Blue Lake Rancheria v. United States, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 1428, 2010 WL 144989 at 2 n.4 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 8, 2010) (taking judicial notice of printout from tribe's website in part because it was reliable since it was maintained by the tribe). To the extent that the other printouts (exhibits B, C, D, G) are from third parties, they are judicially noticeable as described above.

Exhibit A is a screen shot from a game showing the requirement that a user update the game. This document is judicially noticeable because it is capable of accurate and ready determination using sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. See Fed. R. Evid. 201(b). Plaintiff notes that the fact of the update cannot be reasonably disputed because inserting the Mass Effect 2 disc in any Xbox game player will show the update.

Exhibit F contains copies of and screens shots from a game disc distributed in Defendant's magazine as evidence of what was in the public domain at the time of the magazine in 2004. The Court takes judicial notice of the existence of these documents that were in the public realm at that time. See Von Saher v. Norton Simon Museum of Art at Pasadena, 2010 WL 114959, at *4 (9th Cir. Jan. 14, 2010) [22] (HN4[] "Courts may take judicial notice of publications introduced to 'indicate what was in the public realm at the time, not whether the contents of those articles were in fact true.'") (internal citation omitted).

Exhibit I is the console packaging from an Xbox 360 console. This is the same document submitted for judicial notice by Defendant, except Exhibit I contains the full text of the packaging. The Court takes judicial notice of this document for the same reasons that it took notice of Defendant's version of this packaging.

Discussion

1. First claim for violation of Sherman Act based on Aftermarket for Xbox 360 Accessories and Add-ons

Plaintiff alleges that Defendant possesses substantial market power in the secondary Aftermarket, or that a dangerous probability exists that Defendant will gain such power, and that Defendant has deployed that power to charge customers supra-competitive prices in the Aftermarket. Compl. P 48. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant "controls access to the Aftermarket for Xbox 360 Accessories and Add-ons by way of technological barriers and by way of its special access to customers arising from their purchase of the Xbox 360. Microsoft can then leverage [23] its control over the Xbox 360 console, [*986] and its power in the primary market, into monopoly power in the Aftermarket. . . ." Compl. P 49. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant has committed exclusionary, predatory and anticompetitive acts with the specific intent to maintain monopoly power in the Aftermarket. Compl. P 51. According to Plaintiff, maintaining a monopoly in the Aftermarket allows Defendant not only to charge supra-competitive prices for Xbox 360 accessories, but also to supply inferior Xbox 360 accessories and force customers to purchase and use those inferior accessories. Compl. P 55. Further, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's disabling of Plaintiff's DMMCs and the anticipated imposition of new technological barriers to block Plaintiff's accessories "reduces choices available to customers, bars access to high quality accessories for lower prices than those offered by Microsoft, and has no legitimate technological or business justification." Compl. P 52.

Defendant argues that Plaintiff's first claim should be dismissed on the ground that Plaintiff has failed to plead a legally cognizable Aftermarket because Plaintiff cannot pursue antitrust claims based on a single-brand market. [24] HN5[] In general, single brand markets do not constitute a relevant market. See, e.g., Green Country Food Mkt., Inc. v. Bottling Group, 371 F.3d 1275, 1282 (10th Cir. 2004). However, there is an exception where aftermarket restrictions are not disclosed or agreed to by the customers at the time of purchase of a product or service from the primary market. See Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Tech. Servs., 504 U.S. 451, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992).

In Kodak, Eastman Kodak manufactured and sold photocopiers and micrographic equipment. Kodak also sold service and replacement parts for the equipment. The plaintiffs, a group of independent service organizations that serviced Kodak's equipment, challenged Kodak's policies that made it more difficult for them to compete with Kodak in servicing equipment, including Kodak's practice of limiting the availability of Kodak parts. The plaintiffs alleged that Kodak unlawfully tied the sale of service for Kodak machines to the sale of Kodak-compatible parts, a market in which Kodak had a monopoly. Kodak parts were not compatible with competitors' machines and vice versa. The Court held that in certain circumstances, a single brand can constitute a separate market: "because service [25] and parts for Kodak equipment are not interchangeable with other manufacturers' service and parts, the relevant market from the Kodak equipment owner's perspective is composed of only those companies that service Kodak machines." Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 482. The Court found that the single-brand aftermarket for parts and service for Kodak equipment arose once customers had already purchased and were "locked in" to Kodak photocopiers or equipment.

Defendant argues that the Kodak exception does not apply because purchasers of the Xbox 360 knew and agreed at the time they purchased their systems that they could only use Defendant's authorized accessories with their systems. Thus, Defendant argues that its power in the market derives from contract, not from exclusionary conduct, so Eastman Kodak does not apply. See Newcal Indus. v. IKON Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1045 (9th Cir. 2008); id. at 1043 ("Second, the law prohibits an antitrust claimant from resting on market power that arises solely from contractual rights that consumers knowingly and voluntarily gave to the defendant."). The Newcal court stated:

> The critical distinction between Eastman Kodak and the two circuit court opinions [26] [Queen City Pizza and Forsyth] was that the Kodak customers did [*987] not knowingly enter a contract that gave Kodak the exclusive right to provide parts and service for the life of the equipment. In other words, the simple purchase of Kodak-brand equipment (unlike the signing of a Domino's franchise agreement or the purchase of a Humana insurance policy) did not constitute a binding contractual agreement to consume Kodak parts and services in the aftermarket. Equally critically, the Supreme Court found that market imperfections, including information and switching costs, prevented consumers from discovering, as they were shopping for equipment, that the Kodak brand would include a de facto commitment to consume only supracompetitively priced Kodak-brand service contracts.

In Newcal, the court permitted a single-brand aftermarket because the defendant, which leased office equipment, allegedly defrauded its customers by amending the lease agreements after the customers had already signed up for service without disclosing that the amendments would lengthen the service contract. See id. at 1043; see also In re Apple and AT&TM Antitrust Litig., 596 F. Supp. 2d 1288 (N.D. Cal. 2008) [27] (finding that there was an aftermarket for iPhone voice and data services because the aftermarket restriction of iPhone users to AT&T services for five years was not disclosed to customers; instead only a two year contract with AT&T was disclosed). In In re Apple, the court stated: "Ultimately, the dispositive issue is whether Plaintiffs knowingly placed Defendants in a monopoly position in the alleged voice and data services aftermarket." Id. Therefore, HN6[] to establish a single-brand aftermarket under Kodak and Newcal, the restriction in the aftermarket must not have been sufficiently disclosed to consumers in advance to enable them to bind themselves to the restriction knowingly and voluntarily.

In Queen City Pizza v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430 (3d Cir. 1997), the Third Circuit rejected a single brand aftermarket relating to pizza making ingredients for Domino's franchisees, where the restriction was disclosed and agreed to in advance. There, franchisees signed an agreement to operate a Domino's Pizza location, and under the agreement were required to purchase pizza ingredients from Domino's or authorized vendors. Distinguishing Kodak, the court noted that the plaintiffs in Queen [28] City Pizza did not need to become franchisees if they did not like the terms of the franchise agreement, while the challenged restraint in Kodak was not authorized by the original contract terms and the change in policy was not foreseen at the time of sale, so buyers had no ability to calculate the risk. Similarly, in Forsyth v. Humana, 114 F.3d 1467, 1476 (9th Cir. 1997), the court rejected a claim for monopolization of the market for hospital services for a single company's insureds because the purported restraint arose from contract provisions disclosed in advance in the plaintiffs' insurance policies under which the insurance company realized discounts from medical providers allegedly in the nature of kickbacks. Further, in Apple v. Psystar, 586 F. Supp. 2d 1190, 1194-95 (N.D. Cal. 2008), the court held that the defendant had failed to plead a plausible aftermarket for hardware that could be used with the Mac OS because through "its End User License Agreement and other means, Apple specifically restricts the use of Mac OS to Apple-labeled computer hardware systems," and "customers, therefore, knowingly agree to the challenged restraint." See Psystar, 586 F. Supp. 2d at 1201. The [29] Psystar court stressed that the restriction there was unlike Kodak "where customers did not knowingly bind themselves to a single brand of the aftermarket and market imperfections (information costs and switching [*988] cost) prohibited customers from imposing market discipline in the aftermarket by switching among competitors in the primary market," because "Apple asks its customers to purchase Mac OS knowing that it is to be used only with Apple computers." Id.

Defendant argues that this case is more like Queen City Pizza, Forsyth, and Psystar, than Kodak, Newcal, and In re Apple, because Xbox purchasers knowingly gave Defendant the right to prohibit the use of unauthorized accessories through the warranty and software license that is included in the Xbox 360 packaging, as well as through the Xbox Live Terms of Use. The shrinkwrap license in the packaging states: "The software included in the Xbox product [Xbox 360 Video Game System or Xbox 360-compatible hardware accessories manufactured by or for Defendant whether included or purchased separately] is licensed to you, not sold. You are licensed to use such software only in your Xbox product and you may not reverse engineer it, except as [30] expressly permitted by applicable law notwithstanding this limitation." Def's RJN Ex. A at 7. This language, however, is arguably ambiguous. Further, it may not be applicable to using external accessories to boost memory, which may not involve a prohibited use of the software and does not constitute reverse engineering. Defendant also points to the Xbox Live Terms of Use presented to consumers when they sign up for the service, which requires customers to "agree that you are using only authorized software and hardware to access the Service." Def.'s RJN Ex. B at 10. But this language is also arguably ambiguous in that use of accessories such as a memory card is not necessarily "using . . . software and hardware" to access the service. The Terms of Use also permit Defendant to, among other things, issue automatic software updates to prevent a customer from using unauthorized hardware peripheral devices. See id. at 10-11. However, this statement is somewhat ambiguous with respect to the meaning of peripheral device because the phrase is used earlier in the same paragraph to refer to devices used to log on to the Service, which may not include accessories such as memory cards. Further, [31] the Terms of Use could not have informed a customer's purchasing decision because the Xbox Live is a separate optional service that a user may join after purchasing the Xbox 360. See Def.'s RJN Ex. C.

Plaintiff argues that customers did not knowingly agree at the time of purchase that their use of aftermarket accessories would be restricted. Plaintiff alleges in the complaint that the monopolization of the Aftermarket "does not derive from contractual rights that consumers knowingly and voluntarily gave Microsoft at the time of purchase," and that "market imperfections have prevented customers from realizing the impact that their choice in the primary market would have on their freedom in the aftermarket." Compl. PP 31-32. In Newcal, the plaintiff made allegations to rebut a presumption that the equipment customers made a knowing choice to restrict their aftermarket options when they decided to purchase a product in the primary market. The Newcal court stated: HN7[] "Competition in the initial market, therefore, does not necessarily suffice to discipline anticompetitive practices in the aftermarket." Newcal, 513 F.3d at 1050. Here, Plaintiff has made even stronger allegations insofar as it [32] alleges that the primary market is also not very competitive. While Defendant would dismiss these allegations as conclusory, Plaintiff also includes specific allegations that there are built-in USB ports that suggest that third party accessories may be used (Compl. P 32) and that Defendant's spokesperson noted the existence of many third [*989] party alternatives for accessories (Compl. PP 33-34).

Plaintiff argues that the Warranty could not have been discovered by consumers until the box was opened, and that therefore, a consumer could not have knowingly and voluntarily accepted it prior to purchase. See Opp. at 7. HN8[] The weight of authority, however, including in this district, is that shrinkwrap licenses are enforceable. See, e.g., ProCD, Inc. v. Zeidenberg, 86 F.3d 1447, 1451-52 (7th Cir. 1996) (enforcing shrinkwrap license because "any buyer . . . can prevent formation of the contract by returning the package, as can any consumer who concludes that the terms of the license make the software worth less than the purchase price."); *Novell, Inc. v. Unicom Sales, Inc., 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16861, 2004 WL 1839117, at 11 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 17, 2004), but see, e.g., Klocek v. Gateway, Inc., 104 F. Supp. 2d 1332, 1341 (D. Kan. 2000) [33] ("The Court finds that the act of keeping the computer past five days was not sufficient to demonstrate that plaintiff expressly agreed to the Standard Terms.").

Plaintiff argues that Defendant's interpretation of the definition of "Xbox Product" in the Warranty is not reasonable. Xbox Product is defined as:

> either (1) the Microsoft Xbox 360 Video Game System console including the Microsoft software stored on the separate Xbox 360 hard disk and/or embedded in the microprocessors within the Xbox 360 console; or (2) Microsoft branded Xbox 360-compatible hardware accessories manufactured by or for Microsoft whether included with the console or purchased separately.

Def.'s RJN Ex. A at 5. According to Plaintiff, only by reading the definition in the conjunctive can Defendant support the argument that the Warranty language prohibits unauthorized third party accessories. See Pl.'s Opp. to Def.'s Mot. to Dismiss at 8-9. Defendant responds that the terms in the definition are not mutually exclusive (see Federation of Fly Fishers v. Daley, 131 F. Supp. 2d 1158, 1164 (N.D. Cal. 2000) ("These factors are listed in the disjunctive; any one or a combination can be sufficient.")), and that Plaintiff's [34] reading of the definition is unreasonable. For example, Defendant notes that reading the Warranty language where "Xbox Product" means only "Xbox 360 console" would implausibly disallow use of all accessories made by anyone. Plaintiff counters that other inconsistencies would arise if the definition covered third party accessories. For example, elsewhere in the Warranty, Defendant is obligated to repair or replace a defective "Xbox Product," so under Defendant's interpretation, Defendant would be obligated to repair an unauthorized third party accessory. See Def.'s RJN Ex. A at 6. Further, Plaintiff argues that adopting Defendant's interpretation of the language would implausibly make authorized accessories that are approved, but not manufactured, by Defendant improper for the Xbox 360 console. Accordingly, Plaintiff argues that it is highly unlikely that a customer purchasing an Xbox 360 console would understand the contract as prohibiting unauthorized accessories. At the very least, Plaintiff has shown an ambiguity in the relevant contract language which counsels against granting a motion to dismiss premised on Defendant's contested interpretation of the provision, which customers [35] may not have understood.

Defendant further argues that this case is like Psystar because there, the defendant argued that the plaintiff erected technical barriers to prevent Mac OS from operating on non-Apple computers (Psystar, 586 F. Supp. 2d at 1194), similar to Plaintiff's allegations here that Xbox accessories are unique and that Defendant used an authentication technique to block the use of Plaintiff's products. Further, [*990] Defendant argues that in Psystar, the defendant alleged that the Mac hardware aftermarket was a distinct aftermarket that was derivative from and dependent on the primary market for the Mac OS (Id. at 1202), and here, Plaintiff alleges that the accessories Aftermarket is derivative from and dependent on the primary market for the gaming system (Compl. P 27).

In Psystar, however, unlike Kodak and its progeny, the plaintiff alleged "not a single-brand aftermarket dependent on and derivative of a specific company's primary product but instead that a single brand of primary product (Apple's operating system) constitutes an independent market." Psystar, 586 F. Supp. 2d at 1197. Further, the plaintiff's pleadings "do not suggest market imperfections such as switching [36] costs and customer 'lock in.'" Id.

at 1197, n.3. Finally, Psystar specifically alleged that Apple's End User License Agreement restricted use of the Mac operating system to Apple-labeled computer hardware systems. Id. at 1201. By contrast, in this case, Plaintiff alleges, as in Kodak, that there is a single-brand Aftermarket that is dependent on the primary market. Further, Plaintiff here alleges market imperfections such as switching costs. Finally, as described above, the license agreement in this case is not as clear as the license in Psystar. Thus, the reasoning in Psystar is not applicable to this case as pled.

In the absence of a clearly binding contractual restriction on the market, Plaintiff points to the factors applied by the Newcal court to determine whether a consumer's selection of a brand in the market is the functional equivalent of a contractual commitment, or instead allows the plaintiff to pursue a claim based on a single-product aftermarket as in Kodak. First, here, as in Newcal and Kodak, and unlike in Queen City Pizza, the Aftermarket is "wholly derivative and dependant on the primary market," (Newcal, 513 F.3d at 1049), so Defendant allegedly may exploit its unique [37] position in the primary market to gain market power in the derivative market. Second, however, in Newcal the flex agreements were only obtained after the initial contract, whereas here, the effect of the original contract is ambiguous. Third, the complaint here, as in Newcal, alleges that the contractual relationship, rather than any contractual provision, gives Defendant special access to its customers. Fourth, the complaint here, as in Newcal, alleges that Defendant's representations and market imperfections lead its customers to mistakenly believe that they will be free to shop in the Aftermarket despite their choice in the primary market. On balance, the Newcal factors weigh in favor of denying the motion to dismiss this claim. Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, and because HN9[] contract ambiguities are interpreted against the drafter (see Cal.Civ. Code § 1654), shopping for competing products in the Aftermarket is not clearly precluded by any contractual provision into which customers knowingly and voluntarily entered. Therefore, Defendant's motion to dismiss the first claim is denied.

2. Second claim for violation of Sherman Act based on Multiplayer Online [38] Dedicated Gaming Systems Market

Plaintiff argues that Defendant either has significant market power in the primary Online Market, or there is a dangerous probability that Defendant will obtain that market power. Compl. P 63, 65. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant "has deployed this market power to control related and subsidiary markets," and "to impede the development of a vibrant competitive Aftermarket. . . ." Compl. P 62. Plaintiff alleges that by using its power in the Online Market to curb competition [*991] and innovation in the Aftermarket, Defendant is able to facilitate price discrimination, increase switching costs and erect substantial barriers to potential entrants of the primary market. Compl. P 63. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant committed these exclusionary, predatory or anticompetitive acts with the specific intent to acquire or maintain monopoly power in the Online Market. Compl. P 66. Further, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant has "intentionally impeded the development of a vibrant competitive Aftermarket for Xbox 360 Accessories and Add-ons, removed functionality, reduced the choices available to consumers, raised its competitors' costs and has raised barriers to entry in [39] the Multiplayer Online Dedicated Gaming Systems, Market." Compl. P 67.

Defendant argues that this claim must be dismissed because: (1) Plaintiff lacks antitrust injury and thus lacks standing to bring the claim because it is not a participant in the primary market; (2) Plaintiff has not pled a legally tenable market because it has excluded certain products; and (3) Plaintiff does not plead any exclusionary acts by Defendant in the online gaming systems market. Because the Court concludes that Plaintiff has not adequately alleged standing, the Court need not reach the remaining bases for Defendant's motion.

HN10[] To establish standing under the federal antitrust laws, Plaintiff must have suffered an antitrust injury, that is, "an injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes Defendant's acts unlawful." Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977); see also William C. Holmes, Antitrust Law Handbook, at p. 885 (West 2009) ("Implicit in this definition are two separate conceptual issues. First, the claimed injury must be of a type that the antitrust laws were meant to discourage (e.g., a business' lost profits from a [40] reduced ability to compete, as opposed to lost profits from increased competition in the market). And second, the plaintiff's injury must have been proximately caused by the defendant's antitrust violation, and not by some other act or event."). In Associated General Contractors of America v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 103 S. Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983), the Supreme Court set forth a multi-factor test for analyzing antitrust standing, but the Court subsequently determined that the essential element is antitrust injury: "a showing of antitrust injury is necessary, but not always sufficient, to establish standing." Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colo., Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 110 n.5, 107 S. Ct. 484, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1986); see also Bhan v. NME Hosp., Inc., 772 F.2d 1467, 1470 n.3 (9th Cir. 1985) ("Although the Supreme Court did not explicitly state that a plaintiff must satisfy all of the Associated General Contractors factors or, indeed, any particular factor, the inquiry whether the plaintiff has suffered an injury of the type which the antitrust statute was intended to forestall is a factor of tremendous significance.").

HN11[] "Antitrust injury requires the plaintiff to have suffered an injury in the market where competition is [41] being restrained. Parties whose injuries, though flowing from that which makes the defendant's conduct unlawful, are experienced in another market do not suffer an antitrust injury." American Ad Mgmt., Inc. v. General Telephone Co. of Cal., 190 F.3d 1051, 1057 (9th Cir. 1999). The parties do not dispute that there is no rigid "consumer or competitor" test for standing. Rather, "[w]hile consumers and competitors are most likely to suffer antitrust injury, there are situations in which other market participants can suffer antitrust injury. . . . [*992] Further, it is not the status as a consumer or competitor that confers antitrust standing, but the relationship between the defendant's alleged unlawful conduct and the resulting harm to the plaintiff." American Ad, 190 F.3d at 1057-58 (rejecting Exhibitors' Serv., Inc. v. American Multi-Cinema, Inc., 788 F.2d 574 (9th Cir. 1986) (which rejected the claim of a market participant simply because the plaintiff was not a consumer or competitor of the defendant)). Therefore, the fact that Plaintiff is not a consumer or competitor does not resolve the issue.

Defendant argues that Plaintiff is not a market participant and so lacks standing. Plaintiff [42] responds that even though it does not directly compete with Defendant, it participates in the Online Market by "offering aftermarket products that have the capacity to lower barriers of entry and switching costs in the relevant market." Pl.'s Opp. to Def.'s Mot. to Dismiss at 22; see Novell, Inc. v. Microsoft, Inc., 505 F.3d 302 (4th Cir. 2007) (finding that the plaintiff, a maker of software applications to be used on a PC, had standing to assert monopolization claim against the defendant: "Taking Novell's allegations as true, as we must, the injury that Novell alleges here is plainly an injury to competition that the anti-trust laws were intended to forestall. Microsoft's activities, Novell claims, were intended to and did restrain competition in the PC operating-system market by keeping the barriers to entry into that market high.") (emphasis in original). Novell, however, is from another circuit, and is factually distinguishable. Unlike here, in Novell, the court found that there was no better situated party to bring the antitrust claims because Novell was "one of the few private plaintiffs whose claims . . . are neither time-barred nor too tenuous to support antitrust standing." [43] Novell, 505 F.3d at 319.

Defendant points out that Plaintiff has not suffered any injury in the Online Market because Plaintiff's allegations of harm regarding disablement of its memory cards and the technical barriers to Plaintiff's other products occurred in the secondary Aftermarket, not in the primary market. See *Ticketmaster LLC v. Designer Tickets & Tours, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22236, 2008 WL 649804 at 3-4 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 10, 2008) (finding that the defendant, who bought tickets from the plaintiff in the primary market to be sold by the defendant in the secondary market, lacked standing because it did not have an antitrust injury, as the defendant did not allege that it participated in the primary ticket distribution market); R.C. Dick v. Geothermal Corp. v. Thermogenics, 890 F.2d 139 (9th Cir. 1989) (holding that the plaintiff lacked antitrust standing where it was not a participant in the primary market for geothermal steam, even though it participated in a closely related market of land leasing for geothermal steam production, which could affect the market for geothermal steam).

Plaintiff attempts to distinguish Ticketmaster on the grounds that there, the defendant advanced inconsistent claims, and conceded [44] that the injury was in the secondary market. Here, by contrast, Plaintiff argues that it participates in the relevant market and was injured as a necessary step in Defendant's monopolization of that market. See Pl.'s Opp. to Def.'s Mot. to Dismiss at n. 19. Specifically, Plaintiff argues that even if it is not a participant in the primary market, its injury was the "necessary step" and "means" by which the anticompetitive conduct was carried out, relying on Blue Shield of Virginia v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 479, 483-84, 102 S. Ct.

2540, 73 L. Ed. 2d 149 (1982). In Blue Shield, the plaintiff, a member of a group health plan, sued the insurer for antitrust damages arising from the insurer's refusal to reimburse medical expenses for psychotherapy received from psychologists [*993] rather than psychiatrists. The plaintiff alleged that the insurer entered into a conspiracy with psychiatrists to restrain competition in the psychotherapy market. The Court rejected the argument that because the conspiracy was directed against psychologists instead of subscribers to the health plan like the plaintiff, the injury to the plaintiff was too remote. The Court reasoned that denial of reimbursement to patients of psychologists was "the very [45] means by which it is alleged that Blue Shield sought to achieve its illegal ends. The harm to McCready . . . was a necessary step in effecting the ends of the alleged illegal conspiracy" and an "integral . . . aspect of the conspiracy alleged." Blue Shield, 457 U.S. at 479, 483-84 (holding that the plaintiff was entitled to sue because the defendant was charged with a "purposefully anti-competitive scheme," and the injury the plaintiff suffered "was inextricably intertwined with the injury the conspirators sought to inflict on psychologists and the psychotherapy market."). [1]

The Ninth Circuit explained the limited scope of the Blue Shield exception in Exhibitors' Service. See Exhibitors' Serv., 788 F.2d at 580; [47] see also American Ad., 190 F.3d at 1057, n.5 (recognizing that the Blue Shield exception was narrow). In Exhibitors' Service, the plaintiff, a motion picture licensing agent, sued two motion picture exhibitors that had entered into a splitting agreement under which they allocated films between themselves, resulting in lower cost of films for both exhibitors (to the detriment of film distributors), and terminated the plaintiff's services. The court determined that the plaintiff, a film licensing agent, did not come within the Blue Shield exception because the plaintiff's injury was not inextricably intertwined with the injury inflicted upon film distributors. Although the conspirators terminated the plaintiff's services, its injury was not necessary for the creation or implementation of the trade-restraining scheme, whose intended victim was the film distributors. The court determined that the plaintiff's interest was not in enhanced competition between exhibitors, but instead was in continuing to assist the conspiring exhibitors: "At best, [the plaintiff] was neutral on the question whether trade was restrained or not." Exhibitors' Service, 788 F.2d at 580; see also Chelson [*994] v. Oregonian Publishing Co., 715 F.2d 1368, 1371 (9th Cir. 1983) [48] (reversing summary judgment where there was a triable issue of fact as to whether a group of newsdealers had antitrust standing against the defendant, which was alleged to have interfered with the dealers' attempts to reach agreement with the defendant's competitor to distribute advertising circulars in the restrained market of advertising distribution, because there was a triable issue of fact as to whether their injury was inextricably intertwined: "although the dealers were neither consumers nor competitors in the relevant market, it is clear that their interests would directly be served by enhanced competition in the market."). Further, like the plaintiff in Exhibitors' Service, Plaintiff here would not appear to have a stake in whether Defendant monopolizes the primary market for online gaming, because Plaintiff sells accessories that only function with the Xbox 360 system;

[1] Plaintiff's reliance on the Ninth Circuit's interpretation of Blue Shield in Ostrofe v. H.S. Crocker Co., 740 F.2d 739, 745 (9th Cir. 1984) is misplaced. In Ostrofe, the court found that the plaintiff, a former employee in the paper lithograph label industry who alleged that he had been discharged and boycotted because of his refusal to participate in bid rigging scheme, had standing because his discharge furthered the anticompetitive scheme in the labels market even though he was not a consumer or a competitor in the market. Ostrofe stated:

> As sales manager of one of the label manufacturers, Ostrofe was an essential [46] participant in the scheme to eliminate competition in the marketing of labels by fixing prices and allocating customers. It could not succeed without his active cooperation. When Ostrofe sold labels to customers not allocated to his employer and at prices below those agreed upon, his discharge was a necessary means to achieve the conspirators' illegal end as well as an integral and inextricable part of the anticompetitive scheme.

Ostrofe, 740 F.2d at 746. Ostrofe, however, is limited to cases in which a dismissed employee is an essential participant in the antitrust scheme and the dismissal is the necessary means to accomplish the anticompetitive scheme. See Vinci v. Waste Management, Inc., 80 F.3d 1372, 1376 (9th Cir. 1996) ("The exception recognized in Ostrofe II is limited to those cases in which a dismissed employee is an 'essential participant' in an antitrust scheme, the dismissal is a 'necessary means' to accomplish the scheme, and the employee has the greatest incentive to challenge the antitrust violation."). Those circumstances are not present here.

increased market share for the Xbox 360 system would result in more sales of Plaintiff's accessories, other things being equal, as long as Defendant did not block Plaintiff's products in the Aftermarket.

The allegations in the complaint do not support Plaintiff's argument that its injury was inextricably intertwined [49] with Defendant's anticompetitive conduct in the primary market such that it comes within the Blue Shield exception. Plaintiff's allegations center on its injury in the secondary market, even though Plaintiff attempts to convert spillover effects in the secondary market into an injury in the primary market. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant profited from blocking Plaintiff's accessories, and that the extension of Defendant's proprietary interests in the secondary market served to "reinforce" Defendant's power in the Online Market. Compl. P 62. Plaintiff alleges that by using this power, Defendant curbed competition in the Aftermarket and thereby erected substantial barriers to potential entrants to the primary Online Market. Compl. P 63. These allegations are not sufficient to come within the narrow Blue Shield exception. Further, it is questionable whether Plaintiff could allege in good faith that it was necessary for Defendant to exclude Plaintiff's unauthorized accessories from the Aftermarket in order to gain a monopoly in the Online Market, in light of other allegations in the complaint. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that there are other barriers to the Online Market, such as [50] cost, other established libraries of games, and the massive resources available to Defendant. Compl. P 45. Further, Plaintiff introduced its memory cards in May 2009, but alleges that Defendant dominated the market since 2006 (Compl. P 13). Thus, it does not appear that blocking Plaintiff's products in October 2009 (Compl. P 20) was a necessary step in Defendant's alleged market dominance, which is alleged to have started much earlier. Rather, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant possessed substantial power in the Online Market and then "deployed" that power to control subsidiary markets. Compl. P 62. Therefore, Plaintiff has not adequately pled the narrow Blue Shield exception.

Accordingly, Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's second claim is granted for lack of standing. Plaintiff has stated that if the Court determined that Plaintiff lacked standing, Plaintiff would seek to amend the complaint to allege a combined market consisting of the Online Market and the Aftermarket in the alternative. It is possible that if Plaintiff does so, it will undermine its other claims, but that is a choice for Plaintiff to make. The Court grants Plaintiff leave to amend the complaint no later than [51] May 14, 2010.

3. Third claim for violation of Sherman Act based on tying

Plaintiff alleges that Defendant illegally "ties the sale of the Xbox 360 console to a [*995] separate product or products, namely accessories and add-ons to sales of a separate product, including memory cards." Compl. P 74. Plaintiff alleges that by using a technological tie, such as the dashboard update, Defendant sells the Xbox 360 console only on the condition that consumers purchase memory cards solely from Defendant. Id.

HN12[] "A tying arrangement is 'an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier.'" Kodak, 504 U.S. at 461 (internal citation omitted). "Not all tying arrangements are illegal. Rather, ties are prohibited where a seller 'exploits,' 'controls,' 'forces,' or 'coerces' a buyer of a tying product into purchasing a tied product." Rick-Mik Enters., Inc. v. Equilon Enters., LLC, 532 F.3d 963, 972 (9th Cir. 2008). "The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force [52] the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. When such 'forcing' is present, competition on the merits in the market for the tied item is restrained and the Sherman Act is violated." Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 12, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984). An essential element of a tying claim is market power in the tying product -- the tying market. See Rick-Mik, 532 F.3d at 972; see also Illinois Tool Works Inc. v. Independent Ink, Inc., 547 U.S. 28, 36, 43, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26 (2006) (tying arrangements no longer viewed an inherently anticompetitive, but holding that tying "must be supported by proof of power in the relevant market rather than by a presumption thereof."). Failure to allege power in the relevant market is a sufficient ground to dismiss an antitrust complaint. See Rick-Mik, 532 F.3d at 972. Further, a tying claim generally requires that the defendant's economic power be derived from the market, not from a voluntary contractual relationship. See Rick-Mik, 532 F.3d at 973 ("While the allegation of a contractual relationship does not necessarily doom a tying claim at the pleading stage, [53] it also does not remedy a complaint's failure to properly plead market power.").

Defendant argues that Plaintiff's tying claim fails because Plaintiff has failed to plead a viable primary market and aftermarket. HN13[] In order to state a claim under the Sherman Act, Plaintiff must allege that Defendant has market power in a "relevant market." Newcal, 513 F.3d at 1044-45 ("An antitrust complaint therefore survives a Rule 12(b)(6) motion unless it is apparent from the face of the complaint that the alleged market suffers a fatal legal defect. And since the validity of the 'relevant market' is typically a factual element rather than a legal element, alleged markets may survive scrutiny under Rule 12(b)(6) subject to factual testing by summary judgment or trial."). A relevant market must be a product market, and must encompass the product at issue as well as all reasonable substitutes for the product. Newcal, 513 F.3d at 1045 (citing Brown Shoe v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962) ("The outer boundaries of a product market are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product itself and substitutes for it."). A relevant market can [54] be based on a submarket, which must be economically distinct from the general product market. Id. (citing Brown Shoe).

In Newcal, the Ninth Circuit reversed the district court's decision that [*996] the plaintiff failed to plead legally cognizable relevant markets for: "replacement copier equipment for IKON and GE customers with Flexed IKON contracts," and "copier service for IKON and GE customers with Flexed IKON contracts." HN14[] The court noted that three principles emerged from the leading cases: (1) "the law permits an antitrust claimant to restrict the relevant market to a single brand of the product at issue;" (2) "the law prohibits a claimant from resting on market power that arises solely from contractual rights that consumers knowingly and voluntarily give to the defendant;" and (3) "in determining whether the defendant's market power falls within the . . . category of contractually-based market power or in the . . . category of economic market power, the law permits an inquiry into whether a consumer's selection of a particular brand in the competitive market is the functional equivalent of a contractual commitment, giving that brand an agreed-upon right to monopolize its consumers in [55] an aftermarket." Id. at 1048-49; cf., e.g., Apani Southwest v. Coa-Cola Enterprises, 300 F.3d 620 (5th Cir. 2002) (failure to allege a relevant geographical market, stating that an antitrust claim should be dismissed when market definition does not encompass all interchangeable substitutes even when all factual inferences are made in the plaintiff's favor); Tanaka v. Univ. of S. Cal., 252 F.3d 1059 (9th Cir. 2001) (failure to state a claim based on market of one university's athletic program for one sport); Hack v. President and Fellows of Yale College, 237 F.3d 81 (2d Cir. 2000) (failure to state a claim of relevant market because the market was actually a contractually-created class of consumers); Star Tobacco v. Darilek, 298 F. Supp 2d 436 (E.D. Tex. 2003) (failure to state a claim based on discount cigarettes market because of the high elasticity between discount and name-brand cigarettes).

Defendant first argues that Plaintiff has not adequately pled power in the tying market, here, the Online Market, because Plaintiff's allegation of a primary market limited to Multiplayer Online Dedicated Gaming Systems is impermissibly narrow. See, e.g., Rick-Mik Enters., Inc. v. Equilon Enters., LLC, 532 F.3d 963, 972 (9th Cir. 2008) [56] (stating that: "If Equilon lacks market power in the gasoline-franchise market, there can be no cognizable tying claim," because Equilon would have no power to force, exploit or coerce a franchisee to purchase the tied product, credit-card processing services). Specifically, Defendant argues that the exclusion of other gaming systems such as the Wii, Playstation 2, handheld devices and personal computers, makes the Online Market legally untenable.

Defendant argues that the market must contain the product at issue and all economic substitutes, which can be determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product and substitutes for it. Newcal, 513 F.3d at 1045. HN15[] Reasonable interchangeability means all products which could be used for the same general purpose, despite functional or price differences among them. United States v. E.I. du Pont Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 396, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956). Defendant argues that the only reasons for excluding the Wii, Playstation 2 and personal computers from the relevant market are price and quality, which are not proper bases for their exclusion, and therefore, the market definition fails. See In re Super Premium Ice Cream Distribution Antitrust Litig., 691 F.Supp. 1262, 1268 (N.D. Cal. 1988) [57] ("Courts have repeatedly rejected efforts to define markets by price variances or product quality variances. Such distinctions are economically meaningless where the differences are actually a spectrum of price and quality differences.") [*997] (emphasis in original); Psystar, 586 F. Supp. 2d at 1199 ("The mere existence of a price differential, however, does not necessarily mean that a product is unconstrained by competition . . . .").

Plaintiff responds that the market is not defined solely by price and quality. Instead, Plaintiff points to the allegations that other products, such as the Wii and personal computers, have a distinct core functionality (Compl. P 38), distinct perceptions by consumers (Compl. PP 38, 39), distinct customer targeting by manufacturers (Compl. P 38), distinct analyses by industry analysts (Compl. P 39), and distinct pricing and pricing patterns (Compl. P 39). At least some of these allegations do not relate to price and quality, and therefore, are appropriate differentiations at the pleading stage to demonstrate that there is no reasonable interchangeability between the Xbox 360 and the Playstation 3 on the one hand, and the Wii, Playstation 2 and personal computers [58] on the other hand. Further, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant itself "has measured the success of the Xbox 360 against the Playstation 3, to the exclusion of other products or platforms." Compl. P 40. Finally, HN16[] the question of whether the market should include other products is better resolved at the summary judgment stage, rather than on a motion to dismiss. See Pl.'s Opp. at 18, n.15; Image Tech. Servs. v. Eastman Kodak, 125 F.3d 1195, 1203 (9th Cir. 1997) ("Ultimately what constitutes a relevant market is a factual determination for the jury."): Twin City Sportservice, Inc. v. Charles O. Finley & Co., 676 F.2d 1291, 1299 (9th Cir. 1982) ("The definition of the relevant market is basically a fact question dependent upon the special characteristics of the industry involved . . . ."); Thurman Indus., Inc. v. Pay 'n Pak Stores, Inc., 875 F.2d 1369 (9th Cir. 1989) (stating that "For antitrust purposes, defining the product market involves identification of the field of competition: the group or groups of sellers or producers who have actual or potential ability to deprive each other of significant levels of business. . . . This definitional process is a factual inquiry for the jury . . . .").

Viewing [59] the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Court concludes that Plaintiff has not improperly ignored products that may be reasonably interchangeable ones, but instead has included two products in the alleged market and alleged differences regarding others that plausibly exclude them from the relevant market. See Newcal, 513 F.3d at 1045 (stating that HN17[] there is no requirement to plead with specificity the existence of market power in a relevant market); see also *Jamsports & Entm't, LLC v. Paradama Prods., Inc., 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6100, 2003 WL 1873563, at 6 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 15, 2003) ("Market definition, however, involves a deeply fact-intensive inquiry, . . . and for this reason a court must be hesitant to grant a motion to dismiss for failure to plead a relevant market.") (internal citations omitted). Moreover, as Plaintiff notes, the market power requirement for a tying claim appears to be more lenient than for a monopolization claim:

> . . . the law of both tying and exclusive dealing was intended to apply to firms falling short of the § 2 market share requirements for monopolization. Indeed, only recently have the courts put real teeth into the market power requirements for exclusive dealing [60] and tying, and even today the minimum market share hovers in the range of 30-40%, which is roughly half of the amount needed for a § 2 violation.

Hoverkamp, Federal Antitrust Law, § 7.6c.

Here, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant's share of the Online Market was approximately 66% as of July 2009. Compl. P 44. Further, Plaintiff alleges that "in June 2009, the Xbox 360 outsold the Playstation [*998] 3 by approximately 1.5 to 1, indicating that Defendant's market dominance is continuing and stable." Compl. P 44. Plaintiff also alleges that Defendant controls over 50% of both markets, and has virtually complete control in the Aftermarket. Compl. P 73. Defendant allegedly ties the sale of Xbox 360 consoles to accessory products, including memory cards, by implementing the dashboard update that conditioned use of the Xbox 360 system on purchasing memory cards solely from Defendant. Compl. P 74. Plaintiff alleges that the tying arrangement harms competition in the Aftermarket in many ways, including by "decreasing competitors' ability to compete in the aftermarket;" "increasing the barriers to entry in the aftermarket;" "increasing the barriers to entry on the market for Multiplayer Online Dedicated [61] Gaming Systems;" "facilitating price discrimination in the markets for Multiplayer Online Dedicated Gaming Systems and the Aftermarket for Xbox 360 Accessories and Add-ons by permitting Microsoft to extract a higher, supra-competitive price from certain users;" "exploiting locked-in customers who are deprived of the benefits of competition in the aftermarket;" and "forcing consumers, who would otherwise prefer third-party accessories and add-ons for the Xbox 360, including the DMMCs and other Datel accessories, to nonetheless use Microsoft's accessories and add-ons." Compl. P 76. Plaintiff alleges that there are no procompetitive benefits derived from Defendant's conduct. Compl. P 77. Further, Plaintiff alleges that the tying arrangement reinforces Defendant's market power and improperly prevents competition. Compl. P 78. In addition, Plaintiff alleges that the tying arrangement affects a substantial volume of interstate commerce. Compl. P 75. Accordingly, to the extent that there is a lower threshold to support the market power requirement for purposes of a tying claim, Plaintiff has met that threshold.

Plaintiff also argues that it has alleged a per se tying claim (Compl. P 76), that [62] affects a substantial volume of commerce (Compl. PP 73, 75), and therefore, it is not necessary to rigorously define a market for the product. See Fortner Enters. v. United States Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 501, 89 S. Ct. 1252, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495 (1969) (stating that "the controlling consideration is simply whether a total amount of business, substantial enough in terms of dollar-volume so as not to be merely de minimis, is foreclosed to competitors by the tie, for as we said in International Salt, it is 'unreasonable, per se, to foreclose competitors from any substantial market' by a tying arrangement."); Kodak, 504 U.S. at 464 (finding that there was a triable issue of fact as to the claim of market power where there was evidence that, among other things, certain parts were available exclusively from Kodak, Kodak had control over the availability of parts it did not manufacture, Kodak had prohibited independent manufacturers from selling Kodak parts, and Kodak taken steps to restrict the availability of used machines); Phillip Areeda & Herbert Hovencamp, Antitrust Law, § 1721 (2d ed. 2004) (stating that tying is unlawful under a special per se rule that requires both power over the tying product and coverage of a "not [63] insubstantial" volume of commerce in the tied product, and the volume of commerce is the dollar value of tied sales rather than the share of any defined market.). Further, HN18[] in Jefferson Parish, the Court determined that "per se condemnation -- condemnation without inquiry into actual market conditions -- is only appropriate if the existence of forcing is probable." Id. at 15. Specifically, the application of the per se rule "focuses on the probability of anticompetitive consequences. Of course, as a threshold matter there must [*999] be a substantial potential for impact on competition in order to justify per se condemnation. . . . It is for this reason that we have refused to condemn tying arrangements unless a substantial volume of commerce if foreclosed thereby. . . . Once this threshold is surmounted, per se prohibition is appropriate if anticompetitive forcing is likely." Id. at 16.

Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Plaintiff has adequately pled a per se tying claim. For all of the reasons stated above, Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's tying claim based on the viability of the primary market is denied.

Defendant also seeks dismissal of the tying [64] claim on the ground that there is no legally plausible definition of the tied product because the Aftermarket claim is legally improper. See Jefferson Parish Hosp., 466 U.S. at 20-21 (tying arrangement requires two separate product markets that have been linked). However, as set forth above, Plaintiff's Aftermarket claim is adequately pled.

4. Fourth and Fifth claims for unfair competition

Defendant argues that these claims fail because the antitrust claims fail. See *Formula One Licensing v. Purple Interactive, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2968, 2001 WL 34792530, at 4 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 6, 2001) (HN19[] " Where a plaintiff fails to state an antitrust claim, and where an unfair competition claim is based upon the same allegations, such state claims are properly dismissed."). Because at least one of Plaintiff's Sherman Act claims survive dismissal, Plaintiff's unfair competition claims also survive.

Conclusion

Defendant's motion to dismiss is granted in part with leave to amend and denied in part. A further case management conference is set for June 2, 2010 at 10:00 a.m. As discussed at the motion hearing, the parties shall meet and confer and file a joint case management conference statement on later than May 25, 2010 with proposed [65] agreed pretrial and trial dates.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

HN3[] Standards of Review, De Novo Review

A Tenn. R. Civ. P. 12.02(6) motion to dismiss seeks to determine whether the pleadings state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Such a motion tests only the legal sufficiency of the complaint, not the strength of the proof. The resolution of the motion is determined by an examination of the pleadings alone. In considering a motion to dismiss, courts must construe the assertions in the complaint liberally; the motion cannot be sustained unless it appears that there are no facts warranting relief. On appeal, all allegations of fact by the plaintiffs must be taken as true. The scope of review is de novo with no presumption of correctness.

HN4[] Federal Common Law, Preemption

Whether a state statute or common law cause of action is preempted by federal law is a question of law that the appellate courts review de novo. In determining whether a statute expressly or implicitly preempts state law, courts must look to the principles of statutory construction. When interpreting a statute, courts must first ascertain and then give full effect to the legislature's intent and purpose in drafting those sections. The chief concern is to carry out the legislature's intent without unduly broadening or restricting the statute. Courts presume that every word in a statute has meaning and purpose and should be given full effect if so doing does not violate the legislature's obvious intent. When the statutory language is clear and unambiguous, courts simply apply its plain meaning. When a statute is ambiguous, however, courts may refer to the broader statutory scheme, the history of the legislation, or other sources to discern its meaning. Courts presume that a legislative body was aware of its prior enactments and knew the state of the law at the time it passed the legislation.

The Tennessee Trade Practices Act (TTPA), Tenn. Code Ann. §§ 47-25-101, -102. Tenn. Code Ann. § 47-25-106 creates a private cause of action for persons harmed by violations of the TTPA.

Indirect purchasers may recover under Tenn. Code Ann. § 47-25-106 (2001). In other words, when a wholesaler violates the Tennessee Trade Practices Act, *Tenn. Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Supreme Law of the Land

HN10[] Supremacy Clause, Supreme Law of the Land

See U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2.

HN11[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

Pursuant to the Supremacy Clause, U.S. Const. art. VI, cl. 2, federal law sometimes preempts otherwise permissible state laws, rendering the state laws without force. When Congress legislates in an area within the federal domain, it may, if it chooses, take for itself all regulatory authority over the subject, share the task with the states, or adopt as federal policy the state scheme of regulations. Courts recognize both express preemption and implied preemption. Express preemption occurs when Congress defines explicitly the extent to which its enactments preempt state law. When Congress has made its intent known through explicit statutory language, the courts' task is an easy one. In practice, however, an express preemption clause is no guarantee that the scope of the preemption is clearly defined. Even when there is no explicit textual reference to preempting state law, preemption may be implicit.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN12[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

Implied preemption typically falls into one of three categories: direct conflict preemption; purposes and objectives conflict preemption; and field preemption. Conflict preemption is based on the rule that state law is preempted to the extent that it actually conflicts with federal law. Direct conflict preemption occurs when there is an inescapable contradiction between state and federal law - for example, where it is impossible for a private party to comply with both state and federal law. Even when there is no direct contradiction, however, state law may be preempted by federal law when it stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress. Field preemption occurs when federal regulation of a field is so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it. If the context and substance of the congressional enactments indicate an intent to occupy a given field to the exclusion of state law, field preemption precludes intrusion by the state.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN13[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

Despite the variety of opportunities for federal preeminence, courts should never assume lightly that Congress has derogated state regulation. When addressing questions of express or implied preemption, a court begins its analysis with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States are not to be superseded by the Federal Act unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress. Federal regulation of a field of commerce should not be deemed preemptive of state regulatory power in the absence of persuasive reasons - either that the nature of the regulated subject matter permits no other conclusion, or that the Congress has unmistakably so ordained. That presumption is especially strong when Congress has legislated in a field which the States have traditionally occupied. Finally, because preemption is always a federal question, the court's conclusion in a preemption case must fall within the boundaries prescribed by United States Supreme Court precedent. The court is not empowered to second-guess that the U.S. Supreme Court's wisdom or to disregard its earlier edicts solely because it suspects that the result might be different today.

Constitutional Law > Congressional Duties & Powers > Commerce Clause > Dormant Commerce Clause

HN14[] Commerce Clause, Dormant Commerce Clause

The Commerce Clause provides that Congress shall have the power to regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3. Although the clause is primarily a grant of authority to Congress, courts have long recognized that it also imposes restrictions on the authority of states through what is called the dormant Commerce Clause doctrine.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Act > General Overview

Energy & Utilities Law > Natural Gas Industry > Natural Gas Policy Act > General Overview

HN15[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

The Natural Gas Act (NGA), 15 U.S.C.S. § 717 et seq. (2009), establishes field preemption for interstate wholesales of natural gas. The Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, 15 U.S.C.S. § 3301 et seq. (2009), deregulates first sales of much of the gas that is subject to price controls under the NGA, but that deregulation does not disturb the field preemption. The Natural Gas Wellhead Decontrol Act of 1989 (WDA), Pub. L. No. 101-60, 103 Stat. 157, deregulates the remaining regulated first sales, and subsequent Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) action eliminates rate-filing requirements for sales within its jurisdiction through blanket pre-approvals. Nevertheless, neither the WDA or the FERC deregulation affects the field preemption.

HN16[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

There are no precise guidelines for determining whether or how broadly field preemption has occurred, because each case turns on the peculiarities and special features of the federal regulatory scheme in question. The ultimate question, however, is one of congressional intent: did Congress intend to leave no room for the States to supplement the federal system of regulation in a particular field.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN17[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

A federal determination that deregulation was appropriate is entitled to as much weight in determining preemption as a federal decision to regulate actively.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN18[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

Field preemption cases that involve statutes with a history of deregulation present unique challenges that more traditional field preemption cases do not. For example, courts typically look to whether Congress has enacted an intricate web of statutory provisions that affords no room for the imposition of state-law requirements. A chief purpose of deregulation, however, is to ensure that an industry is not overburdened by an intricate web of restrictive requirements. In a field preemption case involving deregulation, therefore, the scope and complexity of the relevant federal statutes are less helpful indicators of congressional intent than they would ordinarily be. Instead, we must ascertain congressional intent from other indicators as to whether the deregulatory legislation altogether precludes states from regulation. An assumption of non-preemption is not triggered when the State regulates in an area where there has been a history of significant federal presence.

Governments > Legislation > Expiration, Repeal & Suspension

HN19[] Legislation, Expiration, Repeal & Suspension

Repeals by implication are not favored.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

HN20[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

When Congress has taken the particular subject matter in hand coincidence is as ineffective as opposition, and a state law is not to be declared a help because it attempts to go farther than Congress has seen fit to go.

Constitutional Law > Supremacy Clause > Federal Preemption

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedent

HN21[] Supremacy Clause, Federal Preemption

The Supreme Court of the United States has appellate jurisdiction over federal questions arising either in state or federal proceedings, and by reason of the supremacy clause the decisions of that court on national law have binding effect on all lower courts whether state or federal. On the other hand, because lower federal courts exercise no appellate jurisdiction over state tribunals, decisions of lower federal courts are not conclusive on state courts.

Opinion

[*847] The plaintiffs, commercial and residential consumers of natural gas, purchased natural gas from utilities, which had acquired [*848] the product wholesale from the defendants. In this class action antitrust suit, the plaintiffs allege that the defendants engaged in various anti-competitive practices, including [3] making false statements about natural gas transactions and engaging in "wash trades" and "churning." After the defendants filed a motion to dismiss, contending that the claims were barred by both field pre-emption and the filed rate doctrine, the chancellor dismissed the claims. The plaintiff appealed and the Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the claims were not subject to dismissal. Because the Natural Gas Act and subsequent federal legislation pre-empt state actions in this particular field of regulation, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed and all claims are dismissed.

Facts and Procedural History

This litigation represents a single component of a complex, nationwide effort by consumers and other purchasers challenging the pricing practices of wholesalers of natural gas. Williams Companies, Inc., Williams Energy Marketing & Trading Company, Inc., Williams Merchant Services, Reliant Energy Services, Inc., Reliant Energy, Inc., ONEOK, Inc., ONEOK Energy Marketing and Trading Company, L.P., Dynegy Marketing & Trade, CMS Energy Corporation, CMS Field Services, [4] CMS Marketing Services & Trading Company, El Paso Corporation, El Paso Merchant Energy, LP, Duke Energy Corporation, Duke Energy Trading and Marketing Company, LLC, American Electric Power Co., and AEP Energy Services, Inc. (the "Defendants") sold natural gas at wholesale to Tennessee utilities (the "Utilities"), which then sold the product at retail to a variety of individuals and businesses in Tennessee, including Samuel D. Leggett, Frank H. Colvett, Jr., Bing's Stop & Shop, Wolfe River Cafe, and others, who make up the class filing this suit (the "Plaintiffs"). The Plaintiffs claim that, from at least January 1, 2000, through October 31, 2002, the Defendants engaged in a pervasive and widespread scheme to artificially inflate the price of wholesale natural gas, and that the Utilities passed along those costs to the Plaintiffs.

Reporting firms such as Platts, a division of the McGraw-Hill Companies, gather information about volume and pricing from those in the natural gas market and publish indices reflecting their data, such as Gas Daily and the monthly Inside FERC Gas Market Report ("IFERC"). In turn, natural gas sellers, purchasers, and futures traders rely on the indices to evaluate [5] market conditions and set prices. The Plaintiffs allege that the various Defendants reported thousands of natural gas trades to these firms containing false or misleading information designed to influence the price of gas in their favor. The Plaintiffs contend that, as a part of their efforts to manipulate pricing, the Defendants reported sales that did not exist, failed to report sales that did occur, and reported actual sales accompanied by false information regarding the volume and the price.

The Plaintiffs further assert that certain of the Defendants engaged in "wash trades" and "churning" in an effort to inflate the price of natural gas. HN1[] "A wash trade is a transaction where two parties simultaneously buy and sell the same quantity of natural gas at the same price and on the same day[,] creat[ing] a false appearance of demand for and short supply [*849] of natural gas." E. & J. Gallo Winery v. EnCana Corp., 503 F.3d 1027, 1032 n.3 (9th Cir. 2007). HN2[] "In churning, volumes of natural gas are sequentially bought and sold by a trader and counterparty so that each time a buy/sell cycle is complete, the basis price has been incrementally increased without the net exchange of any actual natural [6] gas." *E. & J. Gallo Winery v. EnCana Energy Servs., Inc., No. CV F 03-5412 AWI LJO, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80734, 2008 WL 4224492, at 7 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 12, 2008). The Plaintiffs allege that as a result of these practices, the Defendants caused further artificial inflation of the wholesale prices at which the Utilities purchased natural gas. Because the Utilities, in turn, passed those prices on to retail customers such as the Plaintiffs, the Plaintiffs experienced substantial, unwarranted expense.

All in all, the Plaintiffs contend that more than three-quarters of the trades reported to three of IFERC's "trading desks," [2] as well as thousands of trades reported to Gas Daily, were false, misleading, or knowingly inaccurate.

[1] Because this case was decided on a motion to dismiss, the following facts were taken from the pleadings.

[2] Reporting firms have divided the natural gas market - often by region - into various "trading desks," to reflect variation among different segments of the national market.

Since 2002, several of the Defendants have been subjected to civil penalties associated with false reporting and market manipulation. For example, ONEOK, Inc. and ONEOK Energy Marketing and Trading Company, L.P. each paid $ 3 million in penalties to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (the "CFTC") in October of 2002; Dynegy Marketing and Trade and non-partyWest Coast Power LLC paid $ 5 million to the CFTC in December of 2002; El Paso Corporation and El Paso Merchant Energy, LP paid $ 20 [7] million in penalties to the CFTC in March of 2003; Williams Companies, Inc., and Williams Energy Marketing & Trading Company, Inc., paid $ 20 million in civil penalties to the CFTC in July of 2003; Duke Energy Corporation and Duke Energy Trading and Marketing Company, LLC, paid $ 28 million to the CFTC in September of 2003; CMS Energy Corporation, CMS Marketing Services & Trading Company, and CMS Field Services paid $ 16 million to the CFTC in November of 2003; during the same month, Reliant Energy Services, Inc. [3] paid $ 18 million to the CFTC; and American Electric Power Company and AEP Energy Services, Inc., paid $ 30 million to the CFTC in January of 2005. Further, AEP Energy Services, Inc., paid an additional $ 30 million to the United States Department of Justice.

In January of 2005, the Plaintiffs filed a complaint for damages under [8] the Tennessee Trade Practices Act ("TTPA") alleging an unlawful conspiracy to increase the wholesale price of natural gas. Later, the case was removed to federal court and referred to a Multi-District Litigation Panel, which assigned the suit to the U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada. The Defendants sought a dismissal for failure to state a claim, but before ruling on the motion, the district court remanded the case to the Chancery Court of Fayette County. On September 18, 2006, the Plaintiffs filed a motion for class certification in the chancery court, seeking certification for two subclasses - first, the "Indirect Residential Class," as represented by Leggett and Colvett, and secondly, the "Indirect Business Class," as represented by Bing's Stop & Shop and Wolfe River Cafe. See generally Tenn. R. Civ. P. 23 [*850] (governing class actions). They defined the proposed subclasses as follows:

> All persons in Tennessee who made indirect purchases of natural gas from any municipality (city, town, or county) or any utility district for a residence, household, apartment, or place of dwelling at any time during the period January 1, 2000 through October 31, 2002. [9] Excluded from the class are indirect business purchasers of any municipality or utility district, direct purchasers, federal government agencies, defendants, defendants' affiliates, or sellers or resellers of natural gas.
> Indirect Business Class
> All persons, partnerships, associations, private firms, public entities, corporations, and other business entities in Tennessee who made indirect purchases of natural gas from any municipality (city, town, or county) or any utility district for use by their business at any time during the period January 1, 2000 through October 31, 2002. Excluded from the class are indirect residential purchasers of any municipality or utility district, direct purchasers, federal government agencies, defendants, defendants' affiliates, or sellers or resellers of natural gas.

Afterward, the Defendants renewed the motion to dismiss that had initially been filed in the federal district court, arguing first that under the "filed rate doctrine," the cause of action, if allowed to proceed, would invade the exclusive rate-making authority of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission ("FERC"); and, in the alternative, that any state cause of action would be pre-empted insofar [10] as it applied to "the field of transportation and sales of natural gas in interstate commerce," regardless of whether it specifically violated the filed rate doctrine. In response, the Plaintiffs asserted that the prices at issue were never filed with FERC and thus were not subject to the filed rate doctrine and, further, that pre-emption applies only to wholesale natural gas sales, and the Plaintiffs were retail-level customers. [4] The Defendants, in reply, claimed that the filed rate doctrine continues to apply even when deregulation has ended the practice of formally filing rates, if the rates remain subject to federal policy. In addition, they contended that although the Plaintiffs were retail customers, the conduct at issue occurred in the wholesale market, and thus within the field pre-empted by federal governance. The chancellor conducted a hearing on the motion, and afterwards, both the Plaintiffs and the Defendants filed supplemental pleadings.

On February 2, 2007, at the closing of a subsequent hearing on issues relating to jurisdiction, the chancellor [11] concluded that the claims were barred by federal pre-emption and dismissed the complaint:

> [O]nce the [Natural Gas Act] began the regulation [of pricing of natural gas wholesales in the interstate market], . . . the United States [g]overnment kept it. They had the ability to regulate it. Nobody else had the ability to regulate it. And therefore that regulation is still under the United States [g]overnment, and . . . if it's . . . under the auspices of the [f]ederal [g]overnment, this [s]tate [c]ourt has absolutely no authority to do anything concerning . . . the change in the rates of the wholesale gas. That's [*851] up to the [f]ederal [g]overnment. They regulate it; you go to them.

On appeal by the Plaintiffs, the Court of Appeals reversed, relying heavily on E. & J. Gallo Winery, 503 F.3d at 1034, in which the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the denial of summary judgment to various natural gas wholesalers facing similar claims under state and federal antitrust law. Our Court of Appeals ruled as follows:

> [W]e find that the trial court erred in concluding that all of the Tennessee Purchasers' claims were preempted by federal law. . . . [S]ome of the transactions may be subject to FERC's [12] exclusive jurisdiction, some may not be. From the record before us, it is impossible to make a definitive determination. Because FERC's jurisdiction is predicated upon the nature of each transaction, it was premature to dismiss the case at this early stage of the lawsuit.

*Leggett v. Duke Energy Corp., No. W2007-00788-COA-R3-CV, 2008 Tenn. App. LEXIS 684, 2008 WL 4756653, at 7 (Tenn. Ct. App. Oct. 29, 2008). Because of the nature and complexity of the issues presented, this Court granted the Defendants' application for permission to appeal.

Standard of Review and Statutory Interpretation

HN3[] A Rule 12.02(6) motion to dismiss under the Tennessee Rules of Civil Procedure seeks "to determine whether the pleadings state a claim upon which relief can be granted." Edwards v. Allen, 216 S.W.3d 278, 284 (Tenn. 2007). Such a motion tests only the legal sufficiency of the complaint, not the strength of the proof. The resolution of the motion is determined by an examination of the pleadings alone. Cook ex rel. Uithoven v. Spinnaker's of Rivergate, Inc*., 878 S.W.2d 934, 938 (Tenn. 1994)* (citing Wolcotts Fin. Servs., Inc. v. McReynolds, 807 S.W.2d 708, 710 (Tenn. Ct. App. 1990)). In considering a motion to dismiss, courts must [13] construe the assertions in the complaint liberally; the motion cannot be sustained unless it appears that there are no facts warranting relief. Id. (citing Fuerst v. Methodist Hosp. S., 566 S.W.2d 847, 848-49 (Tenn. 1978)). On appeal, all allegations of fact by the Plaintiffs must be taken as true. Stein v. Davidson Hotel Co., 945 S.W.2d 714, 716 (Tenn. 1997). Our scope of review is de novo with no presumption of correctness. *Colonial Pipeline Co. v. We presume that every word in a statute has meaning and purpose and should be given full effect if so doing does not violate the legislature's obvious intent. Colonial Pipeline, 263 S.W.3d at 836 (citing In re C.K.G., 173 S.W.3d 714, 722 (Tenn. 2005)). When the statutory language is clear and unambiguous, we simply apply its plain meaning. Eastman Chem. Co. v. Johnson, 151 S.W.3d 503, 507 (Tenn. 2004). When a statute is ambiguous, however, [*852] we may refer to the broader statutory scheme, the history of the legislation, or other sources to discern its meaning. Colonial Pipeline, 263 S.W.3d at 836. We presume that a legislative body was aware of its prior enactments and knew the state of the law at the time it passed the legislation. Owens, 908 S.W.2d at 926.

Analysis

I. The Tennessee Trade Practices Act

HN5[] The Tennessee Trade Practices Act ("TTPA"), Tenn. Code Ann. §§ 47-25-101 to -112 (2001), is a general antitrust statute establishing that various anti-competitive [15] practices are "against public policy, unlawful, and void" in the State of Tennessee. Tenn. Code Ann. §§ 47-25-101, -102. [5] Tennessee Code Annotated section 47-25-106 creates a private cause of action for persons harmed by violations of the TTPA:

> HN6[] Any person who is injured or damaged by any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination described in this part may sue for and recover, in any court of competent jurisdiction, from any person operating such trust or combination, the full consideration or sum paid by the person for any goods, wares, merchandise, or articles, the sale of which is controlled by such combination or trust.

In Freeman Industries, LLC v. Eastman Chemical Co., we held that HN7[] "indirect purchasers" may recover under Tennessee Code Annotated section 47-25-106. 172 S.W.3d 512, 519-20 (Tenn. 2005). In other words, when a wholesaler violates the TTPA and the cost of that violation is passed through a retailer to a consumer, that consumer can seek to recover from the wholesaler, despite the fact that the two parties never directly conducted business with each other. In contrast, federal antitrust law does not permit indirect purchasers to recover for antitrust [16] violations. Ill. Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 729, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977). In consequence, the Plaintiffs in this case would not likely have a cognizable claim under federal antitrust law, but might be able to sustain a claim under the TTPA.

> HN8[] All arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations made with a view to lessen, or which tend to lessen, full and free competition in the importation or sale of articles imported into this state, or in the manufacture or sale of articles of domestic growth or of domestic raw material, and all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations designed, or which tend, to advance, reduce, or control the price or the cost to the producer or the consumer of any such product or article, are declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

Tenn. Code Ann. § 47-25-101.

> HN9[] Any arrangements, contracts, and agreements that may be made by any corporation or person, or by and between its agents and subagents, to sell and market its products and articles, manufactured in this state, or imported into this state, to any producer or consumer at prices reduced below the cost of production [17] or importation into this state, including the cost of marketing, and a reasonable and just marginal profit, to cover wages or management, and necessary incidentals, as is observed in the usual course of general business, and the continuance of such practice under such contracts and arrangements for an unreasonable length of time, to the injury of full and free competition, or any other arrangements, contracts, or agreements, by and between its agents and subagents, which tend to lessen full and free competition in the sale of all such articles manufactured and imported into the state, and which amount to a subterfuge for the purpose of obtaining the same advantage and purposes are declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void.

Tenn. Code Ann. § 47-25-102.

Article VI, paragraph 2 of the United States Constitution (the "Supremacy Clause") provides as follows:

> [*853] HN10[] This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or [18] Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding.

(Emphasis added.) HN11[] Pursuant to the Supremacy Clause, federal law sometimes pre-empts otherwise permissible state laws, rendering the state laws without force. E.g., Riegel v. Medtronic, Inc., 552 U.S. 312, 323-25, 128 S. Ct. 999, 169 L. Ed. 2d 892 (2008) (holding that state law claims of negligence, strict liability, and implied warranty against manufacturer were pre-empted by federal law governing approval of medical devices). "When Congress legislates in an area within the federal domain, it may, if it chooses, take for itself all regulatory authority over the subject, share the task with the states, or adopt as federal policy the state scheme of regulations." Narragansett Elec. Co. v. Burke, 119 R.I. 559, 381 A.2d 1358, 1361 (R.I. 1977) (citing Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 230, 67 S. Ct. 1146, 91 L. Ed. 1447 (1947)).

Courts have historically recognized both "express pre-emption" and "implied preemption." Express pre-emption occurs when Congress "define[s] explicitly the extent to which its enactments pre-empt state law." English v. Gen. Elec. Co., 496 U.S. 72, 78, 110 S. Ct. 2270, 110 L. Ed. 2d 65 (1990); see, e.g., 29 U.S.C. § 1144(a) (2009) (expressly pre-empting "any and all State laws insofar as they may now or hereafter relate [19] to any employee benefit plan described" by 29 U.S.C. § 1003(a) and not exempt under 29 U.S.C. § 1003(b)). The United States Supreme Court has suggested that "when Congress has made its intent known through explicit statutory language, the courts' task is an easy one." English, 496 U.S. at 79. In practice, however, an express pre-emption clause is no guarantee that the scope of the pre-emption is clearly defined. Compare Altria Group, Inc. v. Good, 555 U.S. 70, 129 S.Ct. 538, 546, 172 L. Ed. 2d 398 (2008) (holding, via a 5-4 majority, that the express pre-emption clause of the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act does not pre-empt state fraud claims based on labels describing cigarettesas "light" cigarettes) with Brown v.Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp.,479 F.3d 383, 393 (5th Cir. 2007) ("[B]y the express terms of the pre-emption clause . . . fraudulent misrepresentation claims based on the use of [the 'light'] descriptors are pre-empted.").

Even when there is no explicit textual reference to pre-empting state law, pre-emption may be implicit. See Geier v. Am. Honda Motor Co.., 529 U.S. 861, 884, 120 S. Ct. 1913, 146 L. Ed. 2d 914 (2000) (quoting English, 496 U.S. at 78) (noting that "[p]re-emption fundamentally is a question [20] of congressional intent" and discussing implied pre-emption). HN12[] Implied pre-emption typically falls into one of three categories: direct conflict pre-emption; "purposes and objectives" conflict pre-emption; and field pre-emption. Conflict pre-emption is based on the rule that "state law is pre-empted to the extent that it actually conflicts with federal law." English, 496 U.S. at 79. Direct conflict pre-emption occurs when there is an inescapable contradiction between state and federal law - for example, "where it is impossible for a private party to comply with both state and federal law." Crosby v. Nat'l Foreign Trade Council, 530 U.S. 363, 372-73, 120 S. Ct. 2288, 147 L. Ed. 2d 352 (2000). Even when there is no direct contradiction, however, state law [*854] may be pre-empted by federal law when it "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress." Hines v. Davidowitz, 312 U.S. 52, 67, 61 S. Ct. 399, 85 L. Ed. 581 (1941). Field pre-emption occurs when federal regulation of a field is "so pervasive as to make reasonable the inference that Congress left no room for the States to supplement it." Rice, 331 U.S. at 230. If the context and substance of the congressional enactments "indicate an intent [21] to occupy a given field to the exclusion of state law," field pre-emption precludes intrusion by the state. Schneidewind v. ANR Pipeline Co., 485 U.S. 293, 300, 108 S. Ct. 1145, 99 L. Ed. 2d 316 (1988).

HN13[] "[D]espite the variety of . . . opportunities for federal preeminence, [courts should] never assume[] lightly that Congress has derogated state regulation . . . ." N.Y. State Conference of Blue Cross & Blue Shield Plans v. Travelers Ins. Co., 514 U.S. 645, 654, 115 S. Ct. 1671, 131 L. Ed. 2d 695 (1995). "When addressing questions of express or implied pre-emption, we begin our analysis with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States are not to be superseded by the Federal Act unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress." Altria Group, Inc., 129 S.Ct. at 543 (internal quotation omitted). "[F]ederal regulation of a field of commerce should not be deemed preemptive of state regulatory power in the absence of persuasive reasons - either that the nature of the regulated subject matter permits no other conclusion, or that the Congress has unmistakably so ordained." Fla. Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 142, 83 S. Ct. 1210, 10 L. Ed. 2d 248 (1963) (citing Huron Portland Cement Co. v. Detroit, 362 U.S. 440, 447-48, 80 S. Ct. 813, 4 L. Ed. 2d 852 (1960)). That presumption is [22] especially strong when Congress has "legislated . . . in [a] field which the States have traditionally occupied." Rice, 331 U.S. at 230 (citing Davies Warehouse Co. v. Bowles, 321 U.S. 144, 148-49, 64 S. Ct. 474, 88 L. Ed. 635 (1944); Munn v. Illinois, 94 U.S. 113, 24 L. Ed. 77 (1876)).

Finally, because "[p]re-emption . . . is always a federal question," Int'l Longshoremen's Ass'n, AFL-CIO v. Davis, 476 U.S. 380, 388, 106 S. Ct. 1904, 90 L. Ed. 2d 389 (1986), our conclusion in a pre-emption case must fall within the boundaries prescribed by United States Supreme Court precedent. See South Carolina v. Bailey, 289 U.S. 412, 420, 53 S. Ct. 667, 77 L. Ed. 1292 (1933) ("[I]t was the duty of [the state] court to administer the law prescribed by the Constitution and statute of the United States, as construed by this Court."). We are not empowered to second-guess that Court's wisdom or to disregard its earlier edicts solely because we suspect that the result might be different today.

III. History of the State/Federal Relationship in Natural Gas

Federal regulation of the natural gas market has had a unique and storied history. On several occasions, the United States Supreme Court has considered the extent of state regulatory authority on the subject. A synopsis of the history may provide context for our [23] consideration of the issues presented in this litigation.

A. The "Attleboro Doctrine" and the Natural Gas Act of 1938

A 1925 breakthrough in pipeline technology triggered a boom in the interstate natural gas market. Dozier A. DeVane, Highlights of Legislative History of the Federal Power Act of 1935 and the Natural Gas Act of 1938, 14 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. [*855] 30, 31 (1945-46). Even before that, however, the Supreme Court had already laid the groundwork for its treatment of an interstate natural gas market. In West v. Kansas Natural Gas Co., the Court considered various challenges to a 1907 Oklahoma statute (1) forbidding out-of-state corporations from engaging in their natural gas market and (2) denying "a charter or right of eminent domain, or right to use the highways of this state" to any corporation transmitting natural gas unless the charter "expressly stipulated" that it would neither transport nor transmit the gas out of the state, nor provide the gas to any "individuals, associations, copartnership companies, or corporations engaged in transporting or furnishing natural gas . . . outside of th[e] State." 221 U.S. 229, 239-40, 31 S. Ct. 564, 55 L. Ed. 716 (1911) (quoting Act of Dec. 21, 1907, ch. 67, § 2, 1907 Okla. Sess. Laws) [24] . The Supreme Court ruled that the statute so severely limited any party's ability to move natural gas out of the state, that it "absolutely prevented - prohibited in effect" - interstate commerce in natural gas in violation of Article I, section 8, clause 3 of the U.S. Constitution (the "Commerce Clause"). [6] Id. at 249-50. The Court rejected the argument that the Oklahoma legislation was permissible because there was no federal legislation on the subject:

> [T]his overlooks the affirmative force of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. The inaction of Congress is a declaration of freedom from state interference with the transportation of articles of legitimate > interstate commerce, and this has been the answer of the courts to contentions like those made in the case at bar.

[6] HN14[] The Commerce Clause provides that Congress shall have the power "[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3. [25] Although the clause is primarily a grant of authority to Congress, courts have long recognized that it also imposes restrictions on the authority of states through what has been called the "dormant Commerce Clause doctrine." See United Haulers Ass'n v. Oneida-Herkimer Solid Waste Mgmt. Auth., 550 U.S. 330, 338, 127 S. Ct. 1786, 167 L. Ed. 2d 655 (2007) ("Although the Constitution does not in terms limit the power of States to regulate commerce, we have long interpreted the Commerce Clause as an implicit restraint on state authority, even in the absence of a conflicting federal statute."); Brannon P. Denning, Reconstructing the Dormant Commerce Clause Doctrine, 50 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 417, 421 (2008) ("In some form, the dormant Commerce Clause doctrine . . . has been a feature of American constitutional law for nearly two centuries.").

Id. at 261 (citations omitted). Soon thereafter, the Court confirmed its intention to strike down the Oklahoma statute in its entirety. Haskell v. Kan. Natural Gas Co., 224 U.S. 217, 223-24, 32 S. Ct. 442, 56 L. Ed. 738 (1912).

Although the West decision signaled the Court's willingness to provide a constitutional framework for distinguishing between state and federal interests in the field of natural gas, it did not draw a bright line for those states having legislation less transparently protectionist than the Oklahoma statute. In Public Utilities Commission for Kansas v. Landon, 249 U.S. 236, 39 S. Ct. 268, 63 L. Ed. 577, 17 Ohio L. Rep. 8 (1919), however, the [26] Court began to provide clarity on the subject. The Kansas Public Utilities Commission and the Missouri Public Service Commission had set rates for natural gas sales at the consumer level - that is to say, "prices for gas at burner-tips." Id. at 246. When the Kansas Natural Gas Company challenged the Commissions' orders as unconstitutional under West and Haskell, the Court rejected the claim, distinguishing [*856] non-retail sales from those at the consumer level:

> That the transportation of gas through pipe lines from one State to another is interstate commerce may not be doubted. . . . But in no proper sense can it be said, under the facts here disclosed, that sale and delivery of gas to their customers at burner-tips by the local companies operating under special franchises constituted any part of interstate commerce. The companies received supplies which had moved in such commerce and then disposed thereof at retail in due course of their own local business. . . . Interstate movement ended when the gas passed into local mains.

Id. at 245.

In 1924, the Court, relying on its Landon decision, struck down Kansas and Missouri laws asserting power to regulate rates for upstream sales of natural [27] gas:

> [The] sale and delivery . . . to . . . customers at retail is intrastate business and subject to state regulation. In such case the effect on interstate commerce, if there be any, is indirect and incidental. But the sale and delivery here is an inseparable part of a transaction in interstate commerce-not local, but essentially national, in character-and enforcement of a selling price in such a transaction places a direct burden upon such commerce inconsistent with that freedom of interstate trade which it was the purpose of the commerce clause to secure and preserve.

Missouri ex rel. Barrett v. Kan. Natural Gas Co., 265 U.S. 298, 308, 44 S. Ct. 544, 68 L. Ed. 1027 (1924). The Court rejected the argument by the states that its holding would leave portions of the natural gas market under-regulated:

> The contention that, in the public interest, the business is one requiring regulation, need not be challenged. But Congress thus far has not seen fit to regulate it, and its silence, where it has the sole power to speak, is equivalent to a declaration that that particular commerce shall be free from regulation. . . .
> The paramount interest is not local but national, admitting of and requiring uniformity of regulation. [28] Such uniformity, even though it be the uniformity of governmental nonaction, may be highly necessary to preserve equality of opportunity and treatment among the various communities and States concerned.

Barrett, 265 U.S. at 308-10 (citing Robbins v. Taxing Dist. of Shelby County, Tenn., 120 U.S. 489, 493, 7 S. Ct. 592, 30 L. Ed. 694 (1887); Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U.S. 485, 490, 24 L. Ed. 547 (1878); Welton v. Missouri, 91 U.S. 275, 282, 23 L. Ed. 347 (1876)). The rule enunciated by Landon and Barrett came to be embodied in "the Attleboro doctrine," as set forth in Public Utilities Commission of Rhode Island v. Attleboro Steam & Electric Co., 273 U.S. 83, 47 S. Ct. 294, 71 L. Ed. 549 (1927). See Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Wisconsin, 347 U.S. 672, 687, 74 S. Ct. 794, 98 L. Ed. 1035 (1954) (discussing "the Attleboro doctrine"). In Attleboro, the Court considered the power of the states to regulate the market for electrical current, establishing the bright-line rule that the states could regulate retail sales but not the wholesale market. 273 U.S. at 90; see also Frank R. Lindh, Federal Preemption of State Regulation in the Field of Electricity and Natural Gas: A Supreme Court Chronicle, 10 Energy L.J. 277, 279-85 (1989).

The natural gas boom sparked in 1925, [7] however, rendered the "uniformity of governmental [29] [*857] nonaction" imposed by the Attleboro doctrine problematic in the eyes of both Congress and the public. By 1928, Congress had adopted a resolution authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the electricity and natural gas industries, despite opposition from the industries themselves. S. Res. 83, 70th Cong., 1st Sess. (1928); see DeVane, 14 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. at 32-33. The report to Congress "documented numerous abuses by natural gas companies . . . and recommended federal regulation of interstate natural gas prices." Rodney L. J. 695, 696-97 (1955-56) (discussing Federal Trade Commission reports and their role in the passage of the Natural Gas Act). State commissions, which had been denied the ability to regulate the interstate wholesale natural gas market by the Supreme Court, applied their own pressure, urging Congress to introduce a federal statute for the regulation of natural gas. DeVane, 14 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. at 38. In response, Congress enacted the Natural Gas Act of 1938, ch. 556, 52 Stat. [30] 821 (1938) (codified as amended at 15 U.S.C. § 717 et seq. (2009)) (the "NGA").

The NGA defined its scope as follows:

> The provisions of this Act shall apply to the transportation of natural gas in interstate commerce, to the sale in interstate commerce of natural gas for resale for ultimate public consumption for . . . any . . . use, and to natural-gas companies engaged in such transportation or sale, but shall not apply to any other transportation or sale of natural gas or to the local distribution of natural gas or to the facilities used for such distribution or to the production or gathering of natural gas.

NGA § 1(b) (emphasis added). The act required that the prices for the regulated gas sales be filed with and approved by the Federal Power Commission ("FPC") (later FERC). NGA §§ 2(9), 4.

The original purpose of the NGA, which was restricted to the regulation of interstate [31] sales for resale, was to fill the gap in natural gas regulation created by the Attleboro doctrine:

> An avowed purpose of the Natural Gas Act of June 21, 1938, was to afford, through the exercise of the national power over interstate commerce, an agency for regulating the wholesale distribution to public service companies of natural gas moving interstate, which this Court had declared to be interstate commerce not subject to certain types of state regulation.

Ill. Natural Gas Co. v. Cent. Ill. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 314 U.S. 498, 506, 62 S. Ct. 384, 86 L. Ed. 371 (1942); see also Fed. Power Comm'n v. Panhandle E. Pipe Line Co., 337 U.S. 498, 502-03, 69 S. Ct. 1251, 93 L. Ed. 1499 (1949) ("[The NGA] contemplated the exercise of federal power as specified in the Act, particularly in that interstate segment which the states were powerless to regulate because of the Commerce Clause of the Federal Constitution."); Interstate Natural Gas Co. v. Fed. Power Comm'n, 331 U.S. 682, 690, 67 S. Ct. 1482, 91 L. Ed. 1742 (1947) (discussing congressional intent to occupy a field where the Court had held that states could not act); Fed. Power Comm'n v. Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. 591, 609-10, 64 S. Ct. 281, 88 L. Ed. 333 (1944) ("[T]he 'basic purpose' of this legislation was 'to occupy' [*858] the field in which such cases as [Barrett [32] and Attleboro] had held the States might not act."); Lindh, 10 Energy L.J. at 285-86 (discussing intent to fill "the Attleboro gap"); Brown, 59 Tex. L. Rev. at 106 ("Congress began efforts to establish a national regulatory scheme because the lack of state power to control the activities of interstate pipelines left an uncontrolled regulatory gap."). As a result, early cases interpreting the scope of the NGA looked to the line set forth in the Attleboro doctrine for guidance. See, e.g., Panhandle E. Pipe Line Co., 337 U.S. at 502-03; Interstate Natural Gas Co., 331 U.S. at 689-90; Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. at 609-10; Ill. Natural Gas Co., 314 U.S. at 506-07.

The Attleboro doctrine itself, however, soon fell out of favor as a rule of constitutional law. In Illinois Natural Gas Co., the Supreme Court observed that its prior rulings endorsing the Attleboro doctrine were in conflict with the rationale expressed in other decisions pertaining to the dormant Commerce Clause doctrine and implied that, if the NGA had not rendered the wholesale/resale distinction in natural gas a question of statutory law, it might reconsider the Attleboro doctrine altogether:

> In the absence of any controlling [33] act of Congress, we should now be faced with the question whether the [test set forth in non-Attleboro cases] is a more reliable touchstone for ascertaining state power than the mechanical distinctions on which appellee relies. But we are under no necessity of making that choice here, for Congress, by the Natural Gas Act, has brought under national control the very matters which the state has undertaken to regulate [in this case].

314 U.S. at 506; see also Fed. Power Comm'n v. E. Ohio Gas Co., 338 U.S. 464, 472, 70 S. Ct. 266, 94 L. Ed. 268 (1950) ("[P]rior constitutional decisions, not what we have since decided or would decide today, form the measure of the gap which Congress intended to close by this Act." (emphasis added)). In 1983, the Supreme Court formally recognized that the Attleboro doctrine had been abrogated as contrary to "roughly the past 45 years" of Commerce Clause jurisprudence. Ark. Elec. Coop. Corp. v. Ark. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 461 U.S. 375, 390-91, 103 S. Ct. 1905, 76 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1983). The result of this course of events is that, although the influence of Attleboro had rapidly waned in the field of constitutional law, it retained significance in the interpretation of the scope of the NGA, because the doctrine had provided the [34] legal background against which Congress originally legislated the boundaries of federal statutory authority.

B. Pre-Emption Under the NGA

In the years following its enactment, the Supreme Court began to consider the degree to which the NGA pre-empted state law. See, e.g., Natural Gas Pipeline Co. of Am. v. Panoma Corp., 349 U.S. 44, 44-45, 75 S. Ct. 576, 99 L. Ed. 866 (1955) (holding that Oklahoma law was pre-empted); Phillips, 347 U.S. at 684 (considering whether "states may regulate" certain natural gas sales under the NGA); Ill. Natural Gas Co., 314 U.S. at 509-10 (holding that Illinois law was preempted). Although these early cases provided some guidance for courts considering preemption claims under the NGA, the Court did not articulate the full extent of that preemption until Northern Natural Gas Co. v. State Corporation Commission, 372 U.S. 84, 83 S. Ct. 646, 9 L. Ed. 2d 601 (1963). The Northern Natural Gas Company ("Northern Natural") operated a "pipeline system . . . connected to some 1,100 natural gas wells in the Kansas Hugoton Field [natural gas [*859] source] under about 125 purchase contracts." Id. at 86 (footnote omitted). One contract with Republic Natural Gas Company ("Republic") required Northern Natural to purchase "up to the maximum [35] production allowables for Republic's Kansas wells connected to [Northern Natural]'s system." Id. at 86-87. For several years, Northern Natural's demand was so great that it not only met the purchasing obligations to Republic, but it also purchased similar amounts of gas from other Hugoton Field well owners. After 1958, however, Northern Natural's demand fell below the maximum allowables for the field as a whole. In order to comply with its Republic contract, Northern Natural had to purchase far more natural gas from Republic than from the other well owners. Id. at 87-88. In response to the plight of the non-Republic well operators, the Kansas State Corporation Commission entered an order requiring Northern Natural to purchase a ratable (or, in other words, proportional) amount from each of the wells connected to that source. Id. at 86 n.1. Shortly thereafter, that order was superseded by a second order extending the ratable taking requirement to all purchasers. Id. at 89. Unable to comply simultaneously with both its Republic contract and the directives of the Commission, Northern Natural challenged the orders in Kansas state court. The Kansas Supreme Court upheld the orders, concluding [36] that there was no conflict with the NGA because "the matters dealt with in [the orders did not] affect interstate transportation or sale [of natural gas] in any respect." N. Natural Gas Co. v. State Corp. Comm'n, 188 Kan. 355, 362 P.2d 599, 604 (Kan. 1961).

The Supreme Court reversed, employing a classic field pre-emption rationale:

> The Congress enacted a comprehensive scheme of federal regulation of "all wholesales of natural gas in interstate commerce, whether by a pipeline company or not and whether occurring before, during, or after transmission by an interstate pipeline company."

> The federal regulatory scheme leaves no room either for direct state regulation of the prices of interstate wholesales of natural gas, or for state regulations which would indirectly achieve the same result.

Northern Natural, 372 U.S. at 91 (quoting Phillips, 347 U.S. at 682) (citations and footnotes omitted). This broad pre-emption, the Court observed, was a result of Congress's desire "to achieve . . . uniformity of regulation," id., and did not, the Court stressed, "arise from an asserted actual and immediate conflict between the federal and state regulations," id. at 97. Instead, the determinative question was "whether [37] the state orders may stand in the face of the pervasive scope of federal occupation of the field." Id. at 98 (citing San Diego Bldg. Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 241-44, 79 S. Ct. 773, 3 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1959)). The Court concluded they could not.

C. Deregulation and the Transcon Era

In the 1970s, the United States experienced a natural gas shortage that has been widely attributed to the supply-suppressing effects of the NGA's stringent price controls. Pub. Serv. Comm'n v. Mid-La. Gas Co., 463 U.S. 319, 330-31, 103 S. Ct. 3024, 77 L. Ed. 2d 668 (1983); see also Stephen Breyer & Paul W. MacAvoy, The Natural Gas Shortage and the Regulation of Natural Gas Producers, 86 Harv. L. Rev. 941, 965-79 (1973); Brown, 59 Tex. L. Rev. at 110-16; Richard J. Pierce, Jr., Natural Gas Regulation, Deregulation, and Contracts, 68 Va. L. Rev. 63, 69-72 [*860] (1982). In response to the shortage, Congress enacted the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, Pub. L. No. 95-621, 92 Stat. 3350 (1978) (codified as amended at 15 U.S.C. §§ 3301-3432 (2009)) (the "NGPA"), which introduced elements of deregulation into the framework established by the NGA. The core reform of the NGPA was to "replace[] the federal price controls that had been established under the [NGA] with price ceilings [38] that rise monthly based on 'an inflation adjustment factor' and other considerations." Energy Reserves Group, Inc. v. Kan. Power & Light Co., 459 U.S. 400, 405, 103 S. Ct. 697, 74 L. Ed. 2d 569 (1983). The NGPA determined which ceiling would apply to a given transaction by subdividing natural gas into various classifications that would be treated differently under the act. Mid-La. Gas Co., 463 U.S. at 332-33; Energy Reserves Group, 459 U.S. at 406. Generally, these classifications could be broken down into three major types of gas: high-cost, new, and old. NGPA §§ 102-109; see Steven M. Spaeth, Our Experience Under the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, and Its Relevance to the Natural Gas Wellhead Decontrol Act of 1989, 12 U. Ark. Little Rock L. Rev. 265, 27-721 (1989) (discussing the distinctions between high-cost, new, and old gas); Kevin L. Ward, Note, Preemption Survives Deregulation of Natural Gas: Transcontinental Gas Pipe Line Corp. v. State Oil and Gas Board of Mississippi, 22 Tulsa L.J. 639, 646-47 (1987) (same). Although the specific definitions of new, old, and high-cost gas are complex, what is relevant to our inquiry is that "first sales," see infra, of most high-cost gas and new gas were gradually deregulated [39] under the NGPA. Specifically, the act removed the price of first sales of high-cost gas from the jurisdiction of FERC shortly after it was enacted, while deregulating first sales of most new gas over a span of years. NGPA § 121; see also Spaeth, 12 U. Ark. Little Rock L. Rev. at 271-72. The NGPA also modified the boundaries of the state/federal balance in natural gas regulation. Section 105(a) of the NGPA extended the federal price ceilings to some aspects of the intrastate natural gas market; section 602(a), however, explicitly preserved state authority to impose maximum prices on intrastate sales that were below the federal maximums. In other words, the NGPA expressly provided for overlapping state and federal jurisdiction in the intrastate market. See Exxon Corp. v. Eagerton, 462 U.S. 176, 186, 103 S. Ct. 2296, 76 L. Ed. 2d 497 (1983).

The Supreme Court quickly confirmed that field pre-emption survived the enactment of the NGPA, at least in some form. In Exxon Corp. v. Eagerton, for example, several natural gas producers challenged an Alabama law prohibiting them from passing the state severance tax along to consumers. While conceding that there was no direct conflict between the pass-through prohibition and the NGPA, [40] id. at 183, the Court nevertheless found that the Alabama law was "pre-empted by federal law insofar as it applied to sales of gas in interstate commerce" because "the pass-through prohibition represented an attempt to legislate in a field that Congress has chosen to occupy." Id. at 184. The Court explained:

> The Alabama pass-through prohibition trespassed upon FERC's authority over wholesale sales of gas in interstate commerce, for it barred gas producers from increasing their prices to pass on a particular expense--the increase in the severance tax--to their purchasers. Whether or not producers should be permitted to > recover this expense from [*861] their purchasers is a matter within the sphere of FERC's regulatory authority.

Id. at 185.

In Transcontinental Gas Pipe Line Corp. v. State Oil & Gas Board, ("Transcon") the Court went a step further, holding that field pre-emption under the NGPA extended even to high-cost gas sales that had been deregulated. 474 U.S. 409, 424-25, 106 S. Ct. 709, 88 L. Ed. 2d 732 (1986). Transcon, like Northern Natural, involved a ratable taking requirement. A Mississippi law "requir[ed] an interstate pipeline to purchase gas from all the parties owning interests in a common gas pool . . . in proportion [41] to the owners' respective interests in the pool." Id. at 411. Interstate pipeline operator Transcon contracted to purchase gas from Marion County, Mississippi's Harper Sand gas pool, which yielded gas classified as high-cost under the NGPA. When the Mississippi Oil and Gas Board found that Transcon's Harper Sand purchases violated the ratable taking law, Transcon, arguing pre-emption, challenged the ruling in the state court. The Board conceded that the ratable taking law, prior to the enactment of the NGPA, would have been pre-empted, but argued that Congress, in deregulating high-cost gas, had subjected that product to state regulation. Transcont'l Gas Pipeline Corp. v. State Oil & Gas Bd., 457 So. 2d 1298, 1314 (Miss. 1984). The Mississippi Supreme Court agreed with the Board, holding that "[w]ith respect to [high-cost] gas, the regulatory situation existing at the time Northern Natural was decided ha[d] . . . been altered radically." Id. at 1316. In upholding the ratable taking requirement of the Harper Sand wells, the court concluded that "[i]f the NGA and FERC's jurisdiction under the NGA no longer extend to deregulated gas, and FERC has no authority to regulate the first sales [42] and purchases of deregulated gas either directly or indirectly, then [the holding in] Northern Natural does not dictate a preemption of otherwise existing state authority." Id. at 1316-17.

In a 5-4 decision, the Supreme Court reversed, observing, as an initial matter, that based on content and legislative history, the NGPA did not signal a retreat from a comprehensive federal gas policy and, "in some respects expanded federal control, since it granted FERC jurisdiction over the intrastate market for the first time." Transcon, 474 U.S. at 421 (citing NGPA §§ 311-12). After examining the congressional intent behind the decision to deregulate first sale prices of high-cost gas, the Court concluded that "[t]o the extent that Congress denied FERC the power to regulate affirmatively particular aspects of the first sale of gas, it did so because it wanted to leave determination of supply and first-sale price to the market." Id. at 422. The Court then reasoned that "[a] federal decision to forgo regulation in a given area may imply an authoritative federal determination that the area is best left unregulated, and in that event would have as much pre-emptive force as a decision to regulate." [43] Id. (quoting Ark. Elec. Coop. Corp., 461 U.S. at 384). Based on that principle, the Court ruled that the Board's ratable taking rule was pre-empted:

> The proper question in this case is not whether FERC has affirmative regulatory power over wellhead sales of [deregulated] gas, but whether Congress, in revising a comprehensive federal regulatory scheme to give market forces a more significant role in determining the supply, the demand, and the price of natural gas, intended to give the States the power it had denied FERC. The answer to the latter question must be in the negative. First, when Congress meant to vest additional regulatory authority [*862] in the States it did so explicitly. Second, although FERC may now possess less regulatory jurisdiction over the "intricate relationship between the purchasers' cost structures and eventual costs to wholesale customers who sell to consumers in other States," than it did under the old regime, that relationship is still a subject of deep federal concern. FERC still must review Transco's pricing practices, even though its review of Transco's purchasing behavior has been circumscribed. In light of Congress' intent to move toward a less regulated national [44] natural gas market, its decision to remove jurisdiction from FERC cannot be interpreted as an invitation to the States to impose additional regulations.

Id. at 422-23 (quoting Northern Natural, 372 U.S. at 92) (emphasis added) (citations omitted). The Court further concluded that the ratable taking rule "runs afoul of other concerns identified in Northern Natural. First, it disturbs the uniformity of the federal scheme . . . . Second, Mississippi's order would have the effect of increasing the ultimate price to consumers." Id. at 423. The Court, therefore, held that the ratable taking requirement was preempted under the NGA as amended by the NGPA, just as it would have been pre-empted under the NGA before the amendments. Id. at 425.

Two years later, the Court had the opportunity to clarify the full scope of pre-emption under Northern Natural and Transcon. A Michigan statute ("Act 144") required certain natural gas companies to obtain approval from the Michigan Public Service Commission ("MPSC") before issuing long-term securities. As part of the approval process, the MPSC was empowered to "conduct an investigation, including an appraisal of the company's property at the company's expense." [45] Schneidewind, 485 U.S. at 298. The MPSC would not approve an issuance of long-term securities until "satisfied that the funds derived . . . are to be applied to lawful purposes and that the issue and amount is essential to the successful carrying out of the purposes or that the issue of the stock fairly represents accumulated and undistributed earnings invested in capital assets and not previously capitalized." Id. (quoting Mich. Comp. L. Ann. § 460.301(3) (1967 & Supp. 1987)). In Schneidewind v. ANR Pipeline Co., the Supreme Court considered pipeline operators' challenges to Act 144, concluding that it was pre-empted by the NGA and NGPA. Id. at 310. First, however, the Court rejected the pipeline operators' argument that the state law was necessarily pre-empted because it would have violated the dormant Commerce Clause doctrine at the time of the enactment of the NGA:

> Even if Commerce Clause jurisprudence would have barred Act 144's regulation at the time of the enactment of the NGA, an issue never directly settled by the Court, that would not decide this case. The authorities on which respondents rely state only [that] Congress occupied the field of matters relating to wholesale sales [46] and transportation of natural gas in interstate commerce. The question remains, however, whether Act 144 regulates within this exclusively federal domain. . . . An intent to pre-empt state regulation thus cannot be inferred from the mere fact that States were precluded from such regulation at the time of the NGA's enactment.

Id. at 305-06 (citation omitted). The Court did not disavow its earlier reliance on the Attleboro doctrine as an interpretive guide in construing the scope of federal authority intended by Congress [*863] at the time of the enactment of the NGA; instead, its reasoning made clear that, regardless of the role Attleboro-era jurisprudence played in Congress's initial drafting, when a court considers whether a state law is pre-empted by the NGA and NGPA, it cannot simply place itself in the shoes of a 1938 court and decide the statutory case as if it were a constitutional one. It is the specific content of the federal natural gas statutes that determines the scope of the field of pre-emption.

The Court concluded that the "crux of the issue" was "whether Act 144 is a regulation of the rates and facilities of natural gas companies used in transportation and sale for resale of [47] natural gas in interstate commerce. Since . . . it [was], . . . it [was] pre-empted." Id . at 306. The Court also noted that the Michigan Supreme Court had previously held that Act 144 was intended to protect both investors, who would purchase the securities, and consumers, who demanded "efficient and uninterrupted service at reasonable rates." Id. at 307 (citing Attorney Gen. v. MPSC, 412 Mich. 385, 459, 316 N.W.2d 187 (Mich. 1982), and quoting Ind. & Mich. Power Co. v. Pub. Serv. Comm'n, 405 Mich. 400, 275 N.W.2d 450, 453 (Mich. 1979)). In light of the consumer protection purpose, the Court concluded that "when applied to natural gas companies, Act 144 amounts to a regulation of rates and facilities, a field occupied by federal regulation." Id. Moreover, the Court held that the aim of "ensur[ing] that a company is financed in a way that will allow proper maintenance of its facilities and continuance of its services . . . also falls within FERC's exclusive purview since those facilities are a critical part of the transportation of natural gas and sale for resale in interstate commerce." Id. at 308. When considered in these terms, Schneidewind appears to stake out a broader interpretation of the pre-emptive force [48] of the NGA and NGPA than had been apparent in earlier cases. See Peter Wirth, Note, Schneidewind v. ANR Pipeline Co., 30 Nat. Resources J. 227, 233 (1990) ("By invalidating the Michigan securities statute, the Court extended its reasoning in Transco and Northern Natural to a statute that does not address any of the . . . areas Congress sought to regulate in passing the Natural Gas Act."). Indeed, compared to a ratable taking requirement, which would directly regulate the transactions targeted by the NGA, see Northern Natural, 372 U.S. at 92, the Michigan statute's relevance to wholesale rate-making seems attenuated and incidental; nevertheless, the broad scope of pre-emption laid out in Schneidewind remains good law. But see Nw. Cent. Pipeline Corp. v. State Corp. Comm'n, 489 U.S. 493, 496, 512-13, 109 S. Ct. 1262, 103 L.

Ed. 2d 509 (1989) (holding that a regulation "govern[ing] the timing of production of natural gas from" a certain field was not pre-empted because the NGA explicitly does not regulate "production and gathering" of gas).

D. The Wellhead Decontrol Act

The NGPA did not end federal deregulation of natural gas. Many observers felt that the more modest price controls under the NGPA, like the stronger controls [49] that preceded them, were having a damaging effect on the natural gas market. Judith M. Matlock, The Natural Gas Wellhead Decontrol Act of 1989, 19 Colo. Law. 655, 655-56 (1990) (discussing criticisms of the post-NGPA price controls). In response to calls for further deregulation, Congress enacted the Natural Gas Wellhead Decontrol Act of 1989, Pub. L. No. 101-60, 103 Stat. 157 (the "WDA"). The WDA "completely eliminated FERC's authority to set prices at the wellhead by removing 'first sales' from FERC's rate-setting jurisdiction." [*864] E. & J. Gallo Winery, 503 F.3d at 1037. The Plaintiffs and Defendants in this case disagree on how to interpret the statutory definition of "first sales." According to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, "first sales are, in essence, merely sales of natural gas that are not preceded by a sale to an interstate pipeline, intrastate pipeline, local distribution company, or retail customer." Id. (citing 15 U.S.C. § 3301(21)(B)) (emphasis added). "Additionally, to give effect to the North American Free Trade Agreement . . . all sales of Canadian and Mexican natural gas are also first sales." Id. (citing Energy Policy Act of 1992, Pub. L. No. 102-486, 106 Stat. 2866 (codified at 15 U.S.C. § 717b(b)) [50] . The precise definition of what is and is not a first sale has been and will continue to be a source of disagreement in the natural gas industry. Suffice it to say that at this juncture, however, Congress has by deregulating first sale pricing substantially increased the number of natural gas transactions that are wholly free of federal price controls.

Finally, FERC itself took additional steps to further deregulate the natural gas transactions within its remaining jurisdiction in hopes of developing a more competitive market. In December of 1992, FERC effectively suspended the rate-filing requirements for all sales for resale within its jurisdiction by offering "blanket marketer certificates" for sales for resale other than sales to interstate pipelines (which themselves were already subject to blanket approval). Regulations Governing Blanket Marketer Sales Certificates, 57 Fed. Reg. 57,952, 57,957-58 (Dec. 8, 1992) (codified at 18 C.F.R. pt. 284); see E. & J. Gallo Winery, 503 F.3d at 1038. After revelations of price manipulation, FERC amended the blanket certificates to include a prohibition on anti-competitive acts. Amendments to Blanket Sales Certificates, 68 Fed. Reg. 66,323 (Nov. 26, 2003) [51] (codified at 18 C.F.R. pr. 284); see E. & J. Gallo Winery, 503 F.3d at 1038.

Historical Summary

In the early days of the natural gas industry, the Supreme Court recognized and enforced a rigid distinction between federal and state authority over the natural gas market, based primarily around the wholesale/retail distinction embodied in the Attleboro doctrine. In response, Congress enacted the NGA, which was designed to fill the "Attleboro gap" (the regulation of the interstate wholesale market) without interfering in states' constitutionally permitted authority to regulate the retail and intrastate natural gas market. Because, however, the Attleboro doctrine itself fell quickly out of favor, the wholesale/retail distinction in the NGA became an issue of statutory rather than constitutional law. In Northern Natural, the Supreme Court held that HN15[] the NGA established field pre-emption for interstate wholesales of natural gas. The NGPA deregulated first sales of much of the gas that had been subject to price controls under the NGA, but the Court held in Transcon that deregulation did not disturb the field pre-emption recognized in Northern Natural. Finally, the WDA deregulated the remaining [52] regulated first sales, and subsequent FERC action eliminated rate-filing requirements for sales within its jurisdiction through blanket pre-approvals. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has not suggested that either the WDA or the FERC deregulation has affected the import of the holding in Transcon.

IV. Analysis

The Plaintiffs do not contest that broad field pre-emption has been a cardinal feature of natural gas regulation for much of the previous century. Instead, they argue that under the current federal regime -- [*865] and especially in light of the deregulatory steps taken in the WDA -- their claims are not pre-empted because they arise, at least in part, out of transactions that are not within FERC jurisdiction. For the reasons set out below, we disagree.

As the United States Supreme Court has observed,

> [m]aintaining the proper balance between federal and state authority in the regulation of . . . energy utilities has long been a serious challenge to both judicial and congressional wisdom. On the one hand, the regulation of utilities is one of the most important of the functions traditionally associated with the police power of the States. On the other hand, the production and transmission [53] of energy is an activity particularly likely to affect more than one State, and its effect on interstate commerce is often significant enough that uncontrolled regulation by the States can patently interfere with broader national interests.

Ark. Elec. Coop. Corp., 461 U.S. at 377 (citation omitted).

When considering a claim that a Tennessee statute is subject to field pre-emption, we must first determine whether Congress intended to enact a system of field pre-emption, or if, in the alternative, Congress intended to limit state authority more narrowly -- by pre-empting, for example, only those state regulations in actual conflict with the relevant federal law. If we conclude that field pre-emption exists, whatever the area of law, the second step in our analysis is to determine whether the Tennessee law intrudes upon that field. The Tennessee law survives only if it does not fall within the pre-empted field. Schneidewind, 485 U.S. at 305 ("The question remains . . . whether Act 144 regulates within th[e] exclusively federal domain.").

A. Field Pre-emption and its Scope under the WDA

HN16[] There are no "precise guidelines" for determining whether or how broadly field pre-emption has occurred, [54] because "each case turns on the peculiarities and special features of the federal regulatory scheme in question." City of Burbank v. Lockheed Air Terminal Inc., 411 U.S. 624, 638, 93 S. Ct. 1854, 36 L. Ed. 2d 547 (1973) (citing Hines, 312 U.S. at 52; Huron Portland Cement Co., 362 U.S. at 440)). The ultimate question, however, is one of congressional intent: did Congress intend to "le[ave] no room for the States to supplement" the federal system of regulation in a particular field? Rice, 331 U.S. at 230.

The Plaintiffs assert that, due to the enactment of the WDA, many of the wholesale natural gas transactions that were subject to FERC jurisdiction at the time of Transcon and Northern Natural no longer are. This, they argue, demonstrates that Congress did not intend to exclude those transactions from state regulation. As the Supreme Court has noted, however, HN17[] "a federal determination that deregulation was appropriate [is] entitled to as much weight in determining pre-emption as a federal decision to regulate actively." Transcon, 474 U.S. at 415 (citing Ark. Elec. Coop. Corp., 461 U.S. at 384).

Nevertheless, the Plaintiffs are right to suggest that deregulation complicates our inquiry. HN18[] Field pre-emption cases that involve [55] statutes with a history of deregulation present unique challenges that more traditional field pre-emption cases do not. For example, courts typically look to whether Congress has enacted an "intricate web of statutory provisions [*866] [that] affords no room for the imposition of state-law" requirements. French v. Pan Am Exp., Inc., 869 F.2d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 1989). A chief purpose of deregulation, however, is to ensure that an industry is not overburdened by an "intricate web" of restrictive requirements. In a field pre-emption case involving deregulation, therefore, the scope and complexity of the relevant federal statutes are less helpful indicators of congressional intent than they would ordinarily be. Instead, we must ascertain congressional intent from other indicators as to whether the deregulatory legislation -- in this case, the WDA, when read in the context of the NGA and NGPA -- altogether precludes states from regulation. Because it is well-established under Transcon that Congress had enacted broad field pre-emption prior to the WDA, our inquiry is whether Congress repealed or reduced the scope of the pre-emptive regime, not whether it intended to implement an entirely new system [56] of pre-emption. Cf. United States v. Locke, 529 U.S. 89, 108, 120 S. Ct. 1135, 146 L. Ed. 2d 69 (2000) ("[A]n 'assumption' of nonpre-emption is not triggered when the State regulates in an area where there has been a history of significant federal presence.").

That question is almost identical to the question that faced the Supreme Court in Transcon. In that case, the Court considered whether the pre-emption ruling in Northern Natural could be applied to gas that had been removed from FERC jurisdiction by the NGPA. In the case before us, we consider whether pre-emption continues to apply to gas that was removed from FERC jurisdiction by the WDA. If there is anything about the WDA that would dictate a different conclusion than that reached in Transcon regarding the NGPA, the Plaintiffs would prevail.

In our view, the Plaintiffs have not provided any persuasive reason to treat the preemptive effect of the two acts differently. Instead, they argue that this case is distinguishable from Transcon due to differences between the TTPA and the Transcon ratable taking requirement. We take that argument as relevant to the second step in our field pre-emption analysis -- whether the Plaintiffs' TTPA claims intrude on the field of [57] pre-emption -- but irrelevant to the question of whether the WDA, unlike the NGPA, reduced the pre-emptive force of the NGA.

When rejecting the argument that the NGPA reduced the pre-emptive effect of the NGA, the Court in Transcon made the following observation:

> The aim of federal regulation remains to assure adequate supplies of natural gas at fair prices, but the NGPA reflects a congressional belief that a new system of natural gas pricing was needed to balance supply and demand. The new federal role is to "overse[e] a national market price regulatory scheme." The NGPA therefore does not constitute a federal retreat from a comprehensive gas policy.

474 U.S. at 421 (quoting Barry L. Haase, The Federal Role in Implementing the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, 16 Hou. L. Rev. 1067, 1079 (1979)) (citations omitted) (emphasis added). In other words, the purpose of the NGPA was not to withdraw from the regulation of the wholesale natural gas market, but instead to replace the older, more direct method of exercising that responsibility with a newer, more hands-off approach. Because the NGPA was merely a change in approach, the scope of pre-emption did not contract. The same logic applies in [58] this instance. Congress appears to have been driven by the same desire to deregulate in the enactment of the NGPA and the WDA. Like the NGPA, however, the WDA did not put an end to federal oversight. As evidenced by [*867] FERC's own efforts to refine its pricing policy in the decades since the WDA, the federal government is still an active regulator of the wholesale market in natural gas. A tool has merely been eliminated by the Congress -- the ability to regulate directly the price of first sales -- just as Congress eliminated the direct regulation of the first sale price of new and high-cost gas in the NGPA.

Furthermore, if indeed Congress intended by the WDA to reduce the amount of regulation of the natural gas market, it would make little sense to conclude that Congress simultaneously intended to expand states' authority to regulate that same market. The last three decades of federal natural gas policy -- from the NGPA to the more recent FERC orders -- demonstrate a desire to lessen regulations in the natural gas market; nothing, however, suggests a congressional aim to benefit the market by yielding to more intrusive legislation by the states. Moreover, HN19[] "[r]epeals by implication are [59] not favored." Sullivan ex rel. Wrongful Death Beneficiaries of Sullivan v. Chattanooga Med. Investors, LP, 221 S.W.3d 506, 512 (Tenn. 2007) (quoting Cronin v. Howe, 906 S.W.2d 910, 912 (Tenn. 1995)). Although the WDA did repeal some of the affirmative powers laid out in the NGA, nothing in the enactment implies that Congress intended to repeal the well-established policy of pre-emption laid out in Transcon.

In our view, therefore, the field of pre-emption today is identical to the field recognized by the Supreme Court in pre-WDA cases: "the field of wholesale sales of natural gas in interstate commerce." Exxon Corp., 462 U.S. at 184; see also Schneidewind, 485 U.S. at 301 ("the transportation and sale of natural gas in interstate commerce for resale"); Northern Natural, 372 U.S. at 91 ("all wholesales of natural gas in interstate commerce" (quoting Phillips, 347 U.S. at 682)). Because there is field pre-emption, we turn to whether our state legislation intrudes upon the field.

B. Application to the TTPA Claims

Our next step is to consider whether enforcing the Plaintiffs' claims under the TTPA would improperly intrude upon the federal field of pre-emption. [8] Two electrical power cases [60] from the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, Public Utility District No. 1 of Grays Harbor County Washington v. IDACORP Inc., 379 F.3d 641 (9th Cir. 2004) and Public Utility District No. 1 of Snohomish County v. Dynegy Power Marketing Inc., 384 F.3d 756 (9th Cir. 2004), provide helpful guidance. In Grays Harbor, that court considered a complaint by a local utility district seeking damages for unjust enrichment and the rescission of its contract with an electricity wholesaler. The utility alleged, among other things, that the defendants had engaged in market manipulation that inflated the price at which they sold electricity. 379 F.3d at 645. The court held that the claims were barred on three grounds: (1) field pre-emption, (2) conflict pre-emption, and (3) the filed rate doctrine. Id. at 647. As to field pre-emption, the court held that [*868] because the "fundamental thrust" of the claim alleging market manipulation was "to determine the fair price of the electricity," id. at 648, that claim was barred by field pre-emption under the Federal Power Act ("FPA"), which "grants FERC 'exclusive [61] authority to regulate the transmission and sale at wholesale of electric energy in interstate commerce,'" id. at 646 (quoting Transmission Agency of N. Cal. v. Sierra Pac. Power Co., 295 F.3d 918, 928 (9th Cir. 2002)); see also id. at 649-52 (discussing conflict pre-emption and the filed rate doctrine). In Snohomish County, the Ninth Circuit extended the rationale in Grays Harbor to pre-empt state antitrust claims. 384 F.3d at 761.

Grays Harbor and Snohomish County are, admittedly, distinguishable. First, of course, they consider electrical power, rather than natural gas, and thus [62] are based on the FPA, not the NGA. The underlying principle, however -- that price manipulation claims are preempted insofar as the field of price regulation is itself pre-empted -- is equally applicable to natural gas under the NGA. Cf. DeVane, 14 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. passim (discussing shared history of the NGA and the FPA). Second, the market-based rates at issue in those cases were the result of deregulation by FERC, whereas some of the market-based rates in this case were the result of deregulation by statute. Compare Grays Harbor, 379 F.3d at 649 ("Idaho Power Company's authority to charge market-based rates comes from FERC.") with discussion of high-cost gas and first sales under the NGPA and WDA, supra. We express no opinion on whether that difference would be relevant to the conflict pre-emption and filed rate doctrine rationales in Grays Harbor. As we have already determined, however, the NGPA and WDA did not alter the broad scope of statutory field pre-emption under the pre-deregulation NGA. For that reason, whether deregulation was statutory or administrative is immaterial. We, therefore, believe that Grays Harbor and Snohomish County [63] provide useful guidance by way of analogy.

Nevertheless, the Plaintiffs argue that the TTPA claims are not pre-empted because the TTPA is "complementary" to the NGA and its amending acts. The TTPA, they submit, is intended only to assure that goods are priced competitively, a goal consistent with the NGA, NGPA, and WDA. For that reason, they argue, there is no pre-emption. We disagree. Even if we were to assume that the TTPA claims would not be pre-empted if they were purely "complementary" to the federal regulatory regime, [9] our inquiry would not [*869] end there, because an [8] As an initial matter, the Plaintiffs go to great lengths to distinguish their TTPA claims from the ratable taking requirements at issue in Northern Natural and Transcon. As we have discussed, however, Northern Natural and Transcon do not define the outer bounds of natural gas field pre-emption. The securities regulation struck down in Schneidewind was significantly more attenuated from the core concerns of the NGA than the ratable taking requirements, and the Supreme Court still found pre-emption. Whether the TTPA claims can be distinguished from a ratable taking requirement is, therefore, not determinative.

[9] To the contrary, however, it is highly questionable that complementarity can ever be a defense against field pre-emption. See Locke, 529 U.S. at 115 (HN20[]) "When Congress has taken the particular subject matter in hand coincidence is as ineffective as opposition, and a state law is not to be declared a help because it attempts to go farther [64] than Congress has seen fit to go." (quoting Charleston & W. Carolina Ry. Co. v. Varnville Furniture Co., 237 U.S. 597, 604, 35 S. Ct. 715, 59 L. Ed. 1137 (1915)); Rice, 331 U.S. at 236 ("[I]f a licensed warehouseman complied with each requirement [of the federal statute that pre-empted the relevant field], he did all that he need do. He could not be required by a State to do more or additional things or conform to added regulations, even though they in no way conflicted with what was demanded of him under the Federal Act."). It is true that, in Transcon and Northern Natural, the Supreme Court considered the degree to which ratable taking requirements would conflict with the goals of the federal price regulations found in the NGA and NGPA. See Transcon, 474 U.S. at 420 ("[I]n the absence of ratable-take requirements, purchasers would choose a different, and presumably less costly, purchasing pattern."); Northern Natural, 372 U.S. at 92 ("Moreover, any readjustment of purchasing patterns which such orders might abstract preference for "competitive" pricing was not the only goal of the federal enactments. Rather, the Plaintiffs' argument would fail because it ignores two of the additional purposes of the federal statutory scheme: national uniformity and freedom from burdensome government intervention.

For decades, the Supreme Court has consistently identified uniformity as a central purpose of the NGA. See Schneidewind, 485 U.S. at 310 (referring to "the uniformity of regulation which was an objective of the Natural Gas Act" (quoting Northern Natural, 372 U.S. at 91-92)); [66] Transcon, 474 U.S. at 423 ("Mississippi's order . . . disturbs the uniformity of the federal scheme, since interstate pipelines will be forced to comply with varied state regulations of their purchasing practices."). If we were to hold that this state could impose restrictions on the interstate wholesale natural gas market by way of its antitrust laws, we would imply that every other state could do so as well. There is much disagreement as to the meaning of a "competitive" market, and, therefore, when antitrust law should intervene. See Robert H. Bork, The Antitrust Paradox: A Policy at War with Itself 58-61 (1978) (discussing different models of "competitive" markets). If we were to conclude that there is no pre-emption, interstate natural gas wholesalers could be forced to comply with the rules of fifty different states regarding what reporting practices or transactions might qualify as anti-competitive. To avoid such an outcome, Congress is free to legislate when one "need serve but one master." Rice, 331 U.S. at 234. In our assessment, Congress has chosen to adopt a single, uniform system of regulation. A separate system of state regulation is not "complementary," regardless of [67] whether it shares other goals of the federal legislation, because it conflicts with the federal policy of uniformity.

Moreover, to hold that applying the TTPA would be complementary to the purposes of the NGA, NGPA, and WDA would ignore a key aim of the Congress in the passage of the latter two of those acts: the removal of restrictive regulations on the interstate market for natural gas wholesales. The common thread within the NGPA and the WDA -- as well as subsequent FERC actions -- is an overriding skepticism of government's ability to intervene beneficially in the wholesale natural gas market. Whether Congress and FERC have gone too far is not for us to decide.

It is true that a goal of the TTPA is to assure that market forces function in a competitive manner -- a purpose also attributable to NGPA and WDA deregulation, [*870] insofar (and only insofar) as Tennessee and federal law share the same view of what it means for a market to be competitive. Congress's decision to deregulate, however, was not simply a decision to endorse some abstract ideal of "competitive" markets; rather, Congress made specific decisions about what it viewed as threats to competition, what tools were necessary [68] to counter those threats, and which portions of the market did not require government intervention. Since the enactment of the NGA, the policy of Congress appears to be the result of careful deliberation and revision -- a balance between regulation and deregulation that we are not free to disturb simply because we feel that our laws also promote competition within the market.

The stated purpose of the original Natural Gas Act price controls was to assure that the regulated prices were "just and reasonable." NGA § 4(a). As Stephen Breyer and Paul W. McAvoy have written, at the core of the concern that unregulated rates were not just and reasonable was the belief that natural gas producers had exercised monopolistic or oligopolistic "market power" permitting them "to raise the price of gas to the interstate pipelines above the level that competition would otherwise dictate." Breyer & MacAvoy, 86 Harv. L. Rev. at 945 (emphasis added). As the Supreme Court observed in Hope Natural Gas Co., "the investigations of the Federal Trade Commission had disclosed that the majority of the pipe-line mileage in the country used to transport natural gas, require of purchasers who previously took unratably could seriously impair the Federal Commission's authority to regulate the intricate relationship between the purchasers' cost structures and eventual costs [65] to wholesale customers who sell to consumers in other States."). However, the core concern in both cases was the comprehensive nature of the federal policy. See Transcon, 474 U.S. at 422 ("The proper question in this case is . . . whether Congress, in revising a comprehensive federal regulatory scheme to give market forces a more significant role in determining the supply, the demand, and the price of natural gas, intended to give the States the power it had denied FERC."); Northern Natural, 372 U.S. at 91 ("The federal regulatory scheme leaves no room either for direct state regulation of the prices of interstate wholesales of natural gas, or for state regulations which would indirectly achieve the same result." (citation omitted)). Because, however, the Supreme Court discussed possible conflicts between the state and federal laws in those cases, we will proceed as if such conflicts are at least relevant to the pre-emption analysis.

together with an increasing percentage of the [69] natural gas supply for pipe-line transportation, had been acquired by a handful of holding companies," and "[s]tate commissions, independent producers, and communities . . . were growing quite helpless against these combinations." 320 U.S. at 610 (emphasis added). In other words, a driving force in the enactment of the NGA was the perception of an anti-competitive, oligopolistic market, combined with the belief that direct price regulation was an appropriate remedy. The NGA, therefore, embodied a federal determination regarding the competitiveness of the wholesale natural gas market, the threats to that competitiveness, and the appropriate remedy to those threats.

The push to deregulate first sales was also the product of changing attitudes as to whether the natural gas market -- specifically the natural gas market at the wellhead -- was competitive and what regulatory framework would best enable competition. "[W]hile the question of market power played an important role in the early history of the debate over producer regulation, it ha[d] become less significant [by the early 1970s] as accumulated evidence . . . created a strong presumption that gas producers d[id] not possess monopolistic [70] or oligopolistic market power." Breyer & MacAvoy, 86 Harv. L. Rev. at 945-46. This evidence guided Congress, in the enactment of the NGPA and the WDA, to deregulate first sales while retaining regulatory authority over other aspects of the market. Although the natural gas market has a multitude of participants -- from producers to pipelines to utilities to consumers -- the ultimate goal of the NGA was the "protection of consumers against exploitation at the hands of natural-gas companies." Phillips Petroleum Co., 347 U.S. at 685 (citing Hope Natural Gas Co., 320 U.S. at 610) (emphasis added). Under the original terms of the NGA, the federal government pursued this consumer protection rationale indirectly by intervening at all stages of the interstate wholesale market. The NGPA and WDA reflect a later decision that the consumer would be better served, and with fewer unwanted negative [*871] consequences, by the regulation of only a portion of the wholesale market, while leaving unregulated the aspects of the wholesale market -- first sales -- that appeared to be adequately competitive. Those later enactments, therefore, also reflected a detailed federal determination of the appropriate posture [71] toward competition in the wholesale market.

In short, the NGA, the NGPA, and the WDA were the result of Congress's resolution of three core issues: first, what it means for a market to be competitive; second, whether the wholesale natural gas market, if free from regulation, would comply with that definition of "competitive"; and third, what the best mechanism was for correcting any flaws in that market. It is not, therefore, enough to say that both state and federal government are interested in "competition" and conclude that our laws are complementary. The relevant federal legislation reflects not just a broad commitment to competition, but specific policy answers to a number of difficult questions, such as when government intervention will be more damaging than nonintervention and which methods of intervention will be most effective without causing too much disruption. Because, as we have found, Congress enacted a broad regime of field pre-emption, we cannot substitute our judgment for that of Congress on those issues any more than we could substitute our judgment on the question of whether competition is desirable at all.

Our Court of Appeals based its holding on another Ninth Circuit [72] case, E. & J. Gallo Winery v. EnCana Corp. In that case, the Ninth Circuit considered claims much like the claims here, explicitly rejecting a similar field pre-emption argument, 503 F.3d at 1046, and remanding the case to "consider Gallo's claims to the extent they are based on rates that are not FERC-authorized rates," id. at 1049. If, therefore, we were bound to follow E. & J. Gallo Winery, we would be inclined to agree with the Court of Appeals; however, > HN21[] [t]he Supreme Court of the United States has appellate jurisdiction over federal questions arising either in state or federal proceedings, and by reason of the supremacy clause the decisions of that court on national law have binding effect on all lower courts whether state or federal. On the other hand, because lower federal courts exercise no appellate jurisdiction over state tribunals, decisions of lower federal courts are not conclusive on state courts.

United States ex rel. Lawrence v. Woods, 432 F.2d 1072, 1075-76 (7th Cir. 1970). E. & J. Gallo Winery, therefore, is only persuasive authority.

In that case, the Ninth Circuit dealt primarily with the filed rate doctrine, addressing only briefly the topic of field pre-emption and [73] the holding in Transcon. Compare 503 F.3d 1033-46 with id. at 1046. The court relied on an argument we have rejected here, that antitrust law is complementary to the purposes of the NGA, NGPA, and WDA. Id. at 1046. Our view is different. The application of our state's antitrust law to the circumstances here would undermine two essential purposes of the federal legislation: uniformity and freedom from government interference. Moreover, we believe that the Ninth Circuit mistakenly framed the relevant issue as whether "Congress's removal of FERC's jurisdiction over first sales . . . preempt[s] the type of claims brought by Gallo." Id. As previously stated, the determinative issue is not whether Congress enacted a new regime of field pre-emption through the NGPA or WDA. Instead, the question is whether Congress eliminated or reduced the scope of the field pre-emption established decades earlier by the NGA, and -- if the revisions did not eliminate [*872] or reduce the field of pre-emption -- whether the claims would be pre-empted as infringing upon that long-standing, broad field of exclusive federal legislation. For these reasons, we decline to adopt the rationale of the Ninth Circuit Court [74] of Appeals as to their determination that field pre-emption did not preclude a state action.

Finally, although the Plaintiffs have focused chiefly on the arguments that prevailed in E. & J. Gallo Winery, we will address an argument that they advanced both in the trial court and in our Court of Appeals; that is, that their claims are not pre-empted because they are based on consumer transactions, rather than sales for resale. We simply disagree. As indirect purchasers, they are ultimately challenging wholesale prices. See Freeman Indus., 172 S.W.3d at 517-20. Their claims, therefore, necessarily intrude upon the federal domain, even if the transactions to which they were direct parties fell outside the scope of the NGA. Such claims are pre-empted.

Conclusion

We conclude, therefore, that the Plaintiffs' claims under the TTPA have been pre-empted by federal law. [10] As a result, they have not stated a claim upon which relief can be granted. The chancery court properly dismissed their complaint. In reaching this conclusion, we are acutely aware that field pre-emption is a powerful tool by which the federal government may constrain the exercise of state authority, and that, therefore, courts [75] must exercise the utmost caution before application of the doctrine. Nevertheless, our overriding duty is fealty to the decisions of the Supreme Court in an area of law that is undeniably federal in character. In Northern Natural, the Supreme Court set forth a broad field of pre-emption in natural gas cases. In Transcon, using logic that is no less applicable to the WDA, the Supreme Court ruled that field pre-emption continued to reach transactions that had been deregulated by the NGPA. Finally, in Schneidewind, the Supreme Court held that the field of pre-emption not only precluded direct price controls and ratable taking requirements, but extended to many regulations with an indirect bearing on prices. Although plausible arguments were made in each of these cases for a broader reading of state authority, we are bound to follow the path set out by the Supreme Court.

For that reason, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed and costs are assessed [76] to the Plaintiffs, for which execution may issue if necessary.

End of Document

[10] Because we decide this case on the question of field pre-emption, we have not considered the parties' filed rate doctrine arguments. We also decline to reconsider Tennessee's pleading standards, as some of the Defendants have urged.

HN1[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Appropriateness

Summary judgment is appropriate only where the record, read in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, indicates that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(2). The burden initially is on the moving party to demonstrate an absence of a genuine issue of material fact. If the moving party meets its burden, then the nonmoving party must produce enough evidence to rebut the moving party's claim and create a genuine issue of material fact. If the nonmoving party meets this burden, then the motion will be denied.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Materiality of Facts

HN2[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Materiality of Facts

With respect to a motion for summary judgment, material facts are those necessary to the proof or defense of a claim, and are determined by reference to substantive law. A complete failure of proof concerning an essential element of the nonmoving party's case necessarily renders all other facts immaterial.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN3[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Genuine Disputes

With respect to a motion for summary judgment, a fact issue is genuine if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party. To demonstrate a genuine issue, the opposing party must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. The nonmoving party must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. In deciding a motion for summary judgment, the evidence of the nonmovant is to be believed, and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor. Nevertheless, inferences are not drawn out of the air, and it is the opposing party's obligation to produce a factual predicate from which the inference may be drawn.

For a disparagement-based antitrust claim, the Ninth Circuit sets a high burden of proof—the Ninth Circuit insists on a preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer) before these practices can rise to the level of exclusionary conduct.

An antitrust plaintiff must demonstrate that the false statement was made in commercial advertising or promotion, as under the Lanham Act. The Ninth Circuit's rationale for allowing false advertising-based antitrust claims—to prevent the deception of buyers to the detriment of rivals—is the same as the policy behind the Lanham Act. Indeed, Harcourt Brace's de minimis presumption test closely tracks the elements of a Lanham Act claim. Compare (antitrust plaintiff must show statements are (1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization), with (Lanham Act plaintiff must show that statement is (1) false, (2) in commercial advertising or promotion, (3) deceptive, (4) material, (5) in interstate commerce, and (6) that plaintiff had been injured).

HN9[] False Advertising, Puffery

Whether a statement is puffery does not depend on the truth or falsity of a statement; it depends on the degree of generality or specificity. The puffing rule amounts to a seller's privilege to lie his head off, so long as he says nothing specific.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Unfair Competition > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Advertising

HN10[] Sherman Act, Claims

In order to state a valid Sherman Act claim under a false advertising theory, the plaintiff must make a preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer). Because of the difficulties in distinguishing actionable false statements from puffing, the speculative effect that advertising has on consuming behavior, and buyer distrust of seller's disparaging comments, the Ninth Circuit has set forth a presumption that commercial speech or advertising has a de minimis effect on competition. A plaintiff may overcome this presumption by showing that the charged speech meets a six-factor test: the statements must be (1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset by rivals.

HN11[] Sherman Act, Claims

With respect to an antitrust false advertising claim, the plaintiff has the burden of proving a significant and enduring impact in order to proceed on the claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Unfair Competition > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Advertising

HN12[] Sherman Act, Claims

Antitrust claims based on false advertising should presumptively be ignored—that is, the defendant is entitled to a presumption that false advertising has a de minimis effect on competition before the introduction of any evidence of actual market impact. The six-factor test—which focuses on the characteristics of the charged speech and not on any evidence of actual market effect—is the plaintiff's means of overcoming this first hurdle. It does not, however, satisfy the plaintiff's burden of proving an actual significant and enduring adverse impact on competition. In other words, a plaintiff that has discharged the de minimis presumption is not automatically entitled to its own presumption of significant market effect. In addition to showing that the speech is of the type that could have a significant effect on competition, the plaintiff has the burden of showing that it actually did affect competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Unfair Competition > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Advertising

HN13[] Sherman Act, Claims

The Harcourt Brace presumption rested partially on the rationale that buyers generally do not trust comments made by competitors. However, the Ninth Circuit also relied on the difficulty in distinguishing actionable false statements from puffery and the speculative nature of the effects of false advertising, especially when it is not systematic. That circumstance may be considered within the Harcourt Brace factors, such as the likelihood of inducing reliance or susceptibility of neutralization, but the Court does not find that it negates the application of the presumption entirely.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Unfair Competition > Federal Unfair Competition Law > False Advertising

HN14[] Sherman Act, Claims

With respect to an antitrust claim for false advertising, it is not enough to show that there was a long period between the statements; the advertising must be continued, i.e., sustained, for a prolonged period.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN15[] Sherman Act, Claims

Where Cartwright Act claims are premised on the same facts as Sherman Act claims, and summary judgment is granted on the Sherman Act claims, summary judgment is also appropriate for Cartwright Act claims.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > State Regulation > Scope

HN16[] Trade Practices & Unfair Competition, State Regulation

The California Unfair Competition Law (UCL) prohibits three separate categories of conduct—acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Conduct is unfair if it threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition. Thus, in most cases, where plaintiff's UCL claim is predicated on antitrust violations that fail to withstand summary judgment, the UCL claim must also fail.

HN17[] Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 59(e), a party may move to alter or amend a judgment within 28 days. A motion for reconsideration of the decision on any motion may be made only on the grounds of (a) a material difference in fact or law from that presented to the Court before such decision that in the exercise of reasonable diligence could not have been known to the party moving for reconsideration at the time of such decision, or (b) the emergence of new material facts or a change of law occurring after the time of such decision, or (c) a manifest showing of a failure to consider material facts presented to the Court before such decision. No motion for reconsideration shall in any manner repeat any oral or written argument made in support of or in opposition to the original motion. The Court may disregard evidence or arguments on a motion for reconsideration that could reasonably have been presented prior to the Court's ruling.

Plaintiff's Motion for reconsideration re Order on Motion for summary Judgment (fld 3-22-10)

The Court, having been informed that the parties submit on the Court's tentative ruling previously filed, hereby GRANTS the referenced Motions for Summary Judgment and DENIES the Motion for Reconsideration in accordance with the tentative ruling as follows:

Defendant Warnaco Swimwear, Inc. dba Speedo USA ("Speedo") moves for for summary judgment under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56 on the remaining claims for relief asserted against it by Plaintiff TYR Sport, Inc. ("TYR"). Defendants United States Swimming, Inc. ("USA Swimming") and Mark Schubert ("Schubert") also move for summary judgment under Rule 56 on TYR's remaining claims. Speedo and USA Swimming and Schubert (collectively, "Defendants") join each others' respective motions. TYR opposes both motions.

TYR also [*2] moves under Rule 59 and Local Rule 7-18 for reconsideration of the Court's order granting summary judgment on TYR's Fourth claim for relief under the Lanham Act. Speedo opposes.

I. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

On March 3, 2010, the Court granted in part and denied in part the Defendants' initial motions for summary judgment. (Docket Nos. 149, 154.) The Court granted summary judgment on TYR's claims for false advertising under the Lanham Act and intentional interference with contractual relations. (Docket No. 154 at 28, 32.) The Court also granted summary adjudication on the remaining antitrust claims to the extent they were based on a coercion theory of antitrust liability—that the Defendants conspired to force or coerce swimmers to purchase Speedo swimsuits. (Id. at 24.) However, because the Defendants had failed to address TYR's disparagement theory of liability, the Court denied summary judgment on the antitrust claims. (Id. at 20.) Recognizing the high threshold that a plaintiff must overcome to show that speech rises to the level of an antitrust violation, the Court invited a second round of briefing on the disparagement issue before the matter went to trial. (Id. at 33.) The Defendants now seek summary judgment on the remaining disparagement [*3] theory.

As set forth in the Court's prior order on summary judgment, this case revolves around the "swimsuit wars" of 2008 and 2009. (Id. at 2.) Speedo and TYR are competing manufacturers of high-end swimwear and accessories. (Id.) USA Swimming is the national governing body of the sport of swimming in the United States and has an exclusive sponsorship agreement with Speedo. (Id.) Schubert was, at all relevant times, employed by USA Swimming as the National and Olympic Team head coach and general manager. (Id.)

TYR's antitrust claims, under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 & 2, the Cartwright Act, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720 et seQ., and the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seQ., rest on TYR's theory that Speedo, USA Swimming, and Schubert all conspired to unfairly promote Speedo's products and disparage competitors' from Schubert's position of clout within the swimming community.

II. SUMMARY JUDGMENT

A. Legal Standard

HN1[] Summary judgment is appropriate only where the record, read in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, indicates "that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(2); see also Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323-24, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986). The burden initially is on the moving party to demonstrate an [*4] absence of a genuine issue of material fact. Celotex, 477 U.S. at 323. If the moving party meets its burden, then the nonmoving party must produce enough evidence to rebut the moving party's claim and create a genuine issue of material fact. See id. at 322-23. If the nonmoving party meets this burden, then the motion will be denied. Nissan Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Fritz Co., Inc., 210 F.3d 1099, 1103 (9th Cir. 2000).

HN2[] Material facts are those necessary to the proof or defense of a claim, and are determined by reference to substantive law. Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 248, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). "[A] complete failure of proof concerning an essential element of the nonmoving party's case necessarily renders all other facts immaterial." Celotex, 477 U.S. at 322.

HN3[] A fact issue is genuine "if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party." Anderson, 477 U.S. at 248. To demonstrate a genuine issue, the opposing party "must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. . . . [T]he nonmoving party must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 586-87, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). In deciding a motion for summary judgment, "[t]he evidence of the nonmovant is to be believed, and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor." Id. at 255. Nevertheless, inferences are not drawn [*5] out of the air, and it is the opposing party's obligation to produce a factual predicate from which the inference may be drawn. Am. Int'l Group, Inc. v. Am. Int'l Bank, 926 F.2d 829, 837 (9th Cir. 1991).

B. Discussion

As discussed above, TYR's remaining claims against Speedo, USA Swimming, and Schubert all depend on its disparagement theory of antitrust liability. TYR bases this claim on a series of statements made by Schubert to elite swimmers and coaches touting the benefits of Speedo's LZR Racer swimsuit and disparaging the suits of Speedo's competitors.

TYR points to five sets of statements that it contends amount to violations of the antitrust laws: (1) a statement by Schubert at the December 2007 National Team Coaches Meeting that "athletes [should] wear the Speedo equipment if they wanted to compete at the highest level," and references made by Schubert and a fellow USA Swimming employee to NASA testing and "4% less drag"; (2) a March 2008 email from Schubert to twenty swimming coaches stating that "only one company [Speedo] is putting millions into research and development" and "the trailing companies . . . [offer] an inferior product"; (3) a statement by Schubert to swimmers at a National Team meeting before an April 2008 swim meet in Manchester, England, [*6] that the Speedo LZR Racer "would give you a 2% advantage"; (4) a statement by Schubert to reporter Craig Lord at the same April 2008 meet that "if you take the best times of world record holders and their new times [in the Speedo LZR], the difference is 2 percent," and that "some [swimmers] are contracted to an inferior product"; and (5) a statement by Schubert in January 2009 to two Junior National Team swimmers in Guam that they should wear the Speedo LZR because it was "faster" than the non-Speedo suits they were wearing.

1. False Advertising Under Section 1

As a preliminary matter, USA Swimming and Schubert contend that TYR cannot maintain an antitrust claim for false advertising under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. They note the Court's previous order on a motion to dismiss that, in order to distinguish Schachar v. American Academy of Ophthalmology, Inc., 870 F.2d 397 (7th Cir. 1989), TYR would have to prove that Schubert used his influence to coerce swimmers into wearing Speedo products. (Docket No. 72 at 8-9.) However, as pointed out by TYR, Schachar's analysis rests partially on the fact that the Seventh Circuit does not recognize a theory of antitrust liability based on false advertising. 870 F.2d at 399; see also Sanderson v. Culligan Int'l Co., 415 F.3d 620, 623 (7th Cir. 2005). In contrast, the Ninth Circuit does. See Am. Prof'l Testing Serv., Inc. v. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich Legal & Prof'l Publ'ns, Inc., 108 F.3d 1147, 1151-52 (9th Cir. 1997). Thus Schachar, which is only [*7] persuasive authority in this Court, need not be entirely distinguished, especially where it may conflict with Harcourt Brace. This leaves open the question of whether a Section 1 claim can be based on false advertising in the Ninth Circuit.

USA Swimming and Schubert note that Harcourt Brace is a Section 2 decision and that no Ninth Circuit decision has extended it to a Section 1 conspiracy claim. However, the Ninth Circuit has never expressly precluded false advertising as a Section 1 claim either. And to the extent that Harcourt Brace recognizes that false advertising may constitute exclusionary conduct under Section 2, the Court is hesitant to find that it can never constitute a restraint of trade under Section 1.

In fact, the Eighth Circuit has recognized a Section 1 claim based on a conspiracy between a market participant and an ostensibly neutral non-market participant to disparage a competitor. See Impro Prods., Inc. v. Herrick, 715 F.2d 1267, 1271, 1273 (8th Cir. 1983). In Impro, the plaintiff alleged that:

> in return for compensation from the corporate defendants, [defendant] Dr. Herrick used his various positions [as a U.S. Department of Agriculture veterinarian and an Iowa State University professor] to promote the products of the corporate defendants, to disparage [plaintiff's] products, and to influence various [*8] federal and state governmental officials to deny [plaintiff] necessary licensing for its products.

Id. at 1271. The court recognized this as a cognizable theory under Section 1, though it granted summary judgment because there was no evidence of a conspiracy. Id. at 1273, 1279-80.

HN4[] However, for a disparagement-based antitrust claim, Harcourt Brace sets a high burden of proof—the Ninth Circuit "insist[s] on a preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer) before these practices can rise to the level of exclusionary conduct." 108 F.3d at 1151 (citing 3 Phillip Areeda & Donald F. Turner, Antitrust Law ¶ 737b (1978)) (emphasis in original) (internal quotation marks omitted). Because TYR has not made this requisite preliminary showing, the Court need not decide whether a Section 1 claim can ever be based on false advertising.[1]

2. Disparagement Versus Promotion

The Defendants argue that many of the statements TYR complains of involve only promotion of Speedo and do not directly disparage TYR or other competitors. HN5[] Although Harcourt Brace itself involved the direct disparagement of a rival, the Court sees no reason why false statements of [*9] promotion could not be actionable under similar reasoning. "[M]isrepresentations encouraging the purchase of [a] product can fit [the] general test for an exclusionary practice when the impact on rivals is significant; deception of buyers can impede the opportunities of rivals." 3A Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 782b (2007). The claims should not be dismissed on this basis.

3. Protected Statements

The Defendants also argue that several of the statements upon which TYR rests its claims are protected by the First Amendment or constitute puffery and thus cannot be the basis for an antitrust claim. See Jefferson County Sch. Dist. No. R-1 v. Moody's Investor's Servs., Inc., 175 F.3d 848, 860 (10th Cir. 1999) ("[T]he First Amendment does not allow antitrust claims to be predicated solely on protected speech."). For example, in the order on the initial motions for summary judgment, the Court found that Schubert's statements to reporter Craig Lord ("Lord") were not commercial speech and thus not actionable under the Lanham Act. (Docket No. 154 at 26-28.) The Court also previously found several statements by Schubert to be puffery. (Docket No. 72 at 16-18.)

Statements to Lord

[1] USA Swimming and Schubert also argue that TYR did not plead a Section 1 false advertising or disparagement claim against them. This is incorrect. (See Compl. ¶ 13 ("USA SWIMMING, SPEEDO and SCHUBERT have also combined to engage in a campaign of falsely disparaging the products of SPEEDO'S competitors, including TYR . . . .").)

USA Swimming and Schubert also appear to contend that TYR should be estopped from asserting a disparagement-based claim against them under Section 1 because in TYR's opposition to a motion to dismiss, it stated that Harcourt Brace "is irrelevant to the standards for pleading a Section 1 claim." (Docket No. 49 at 13.) However, TYR appears to have been arguing that the limitations set forth in Harcourt Brace do not apply to a Section 1 claim, not that the Section 1 claim was not based on disparagement. Because this argument is not inconsistent with its current argument, TYR is not estopped from asserting a disparagement-based theory against USA Swimming and Schubert. See Hamilton v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 270 F.3d 778, 782 (9th Cir. 2001).

TYR contends that Schubert's statements to Lord are commercial speech actionable under the antitrust laws.[2] That ship has sailed; the [*10] Court already made the determination the statements to Lord did not constitute commercial speech in the context of TYR's Lanham Act claim—TYR failed to even oppose Speedo's argument. (Docket No. 154 at 26-28.) TYR cannot resurrect these statements as a basis for its antitrust claim absent some grounds for reconsideration, see Local Rule 7-18, which TYR has not provided.

In any case, the Court is not persuaded by TYR's attempt to distinguish Boule v. Hutton, 328 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 2003), which the Court relied upon in granting summary judgment on TYR's Lanham Act claim. As discussed in the Court's prior order, Boule involved allegedly false statements made by art collectors about the authenticity of another collection. Id. at 86, 88. The statements were made to a reporter for an industry publication writing about the prevalence of fraud in the art market. Id. The Second Circuit found that the statements were not commercial speech and therefore not actionable under the Lanham Act. Id. at 91-92.

TYR argues that Schubert's statements to Lord promoting the virtues of Speedo and stated that competitors had "inferior products" are distinguishable because they are not "inextricably intertwined" with the issue of public concern that Lord was writing [*11] about—"the evolution of swimsuit technology and its impact on the sport of competitive swimming." (TYR's Compendium of Exs. ("COE"), Ex. 12 ¶ 13.) The Court disagrees. Schubert's discussion of the Speedo LZR Racer, its effect on swimming times, and his concern that swimmers who wore what he considered "inferior products" would be at a competitive disadvantage all closely relate to the to topic of swimsuit technology and the impact on the sport. Indeed, when read in the full context and not just as carefully plucked snippets, Schubert's statements reflect a desire for more competition in swimsuit technology, which he hoped would prolong the careers of swimmers.[3]

The Court is not persuaded by the two cases cited by TYR. In Semco, Inc. v. Amcast, Inc., 52 F.3d 108 (6th Cir. 1995), the Sixth Circuit found that an article in a trade journal written by a manufacturer could constitute commercial speech because it contained gratuitous promotions of the manufacturer's product, "which [did] not contribute to [the article's] intellectual or technical value." Id. at 113. Here, in contrast, the SwimNews.com article was written by Lord, not Schubert; Lord chose what to include in the article, and Schubert's comments came only in response to Lord's apparently unsolicited [*12] questions. See Boule, 328 F.3d at 91. Moreover, unlike the comments at issue in Semco, Schubert's comments about competing swimsuit manufacturers are inextricably related to the subject of Lord's article—the evolution of swimsuit technology. It is difficult to fathom how Schubert could have discussed the subject without addressing the products currently on the market.

In Fuente Cigar Ltd. v. Opus One, 985 F. Supp. 1448 (M.D. Fla. 1997), the court, on a motion for leave to amend a pleading, held that a competitor's statements made to a reporter in a trade publication about pending litigation was

[2] HN6[] Though the parties do not explicitly address the issue and assume that Lanham Act cases are applicable to a false advertising-based antitrust claim, the Court finds that an antitrust plaintiff must demonstrate that the false statement was made in commercial advertising or promotion, as under the Lanham Act. See Newcal Indus., Inc. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1052 (9th Cir. 2008). The Ninth Circuit's rationale for allowing false advertising-based antitrust claims—to prevent the deception of buyers to the detriment of rivals—is the same as the policy behind the Lanham Act. Indeed, Harcourt Brace's de minimis presumption test closely tracks the elements of a Lanham Act claim. Compare Harcourt Brace, 108 F.3d at 1152 (antitrust plaintiff must show statements are "(1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization"), with Newcal Indus., 513 F.3d at 1052 (Lanham Act plaintiff must show that statement is (1) false, (2) in commercial advertising or promotion, (3) deceptive, (4) material, (5) in interstate commerce, and (6) that plaintiff had been injured).

[3] "The fact is that there is nothing more important than having the manufacturers be competitive because they do provide the living for the athletes and that's what's really helped the sport of swimming to allow the athletes to swim to older ages, more like track and field. I have always felt that swimming should be like track and field (in terms of the ages and longevity of athletes) but the problem we have now is that everyone is contracted to one suit and some are contracted to an inferior product and those manufacturers need to let go and everyone can compete on a level playing field with a product that is the same and then they need to put the effort in and catch up." (COE, Ex. 13.)

commercial speech actionable under the Lanham Act. Id. at 1450, 1456. The court primarily relied on the fact that the comments were made in a trade publication and not general news publications or magazines. Id. at 1456. The Court finds this case distinguishable because SwimNews.com is not a trade publication. Fuente Cigar involved statements in a cigar industry publication about competing cigar manufacturers. Id. at 1450. SwimNews.com, by contrast, is a general news publication about the sport of swimming, providing news about swim meets, specific swimmers and coaches, controversies in the swimming community, and other relevant news.[4] Its intended audience is not swimsuit manufacturers or vendors. No reasonable juror [*13] would mistake the website for a trade journal or industry publication. Moreover, to the extent Fuente Cigar's reasoning conflicts with Boule—which also involved an industry publication—the Court finds Boule, a more recent Court of Appeals decision, to be more persuasive.

Accordingly, the Court affirms its prior decision that the statements to Lord are not commercial speech and therefore not actionable as an antitrust violation.

The Defendants contend that the comments made by Schubert at the December 2007 coaches meeting and Schubert's March 2008 email to coaches constitute puffery. One of the coaches at the 2007 meeting recalls "Coach Schubert stat[ing] that coaches should advise their athletes to wear Speedo equipment if they wanted to compete at the highest level."[5] (COE, Ex. 7 ¶ 3.) The Court finds this to be HN7[] classic puffery—"exaggerated advertising, blustering, and boasting upon which no reasonable buyer would rely." Southland Sod Farms v. Stover Seed Co., 108 F.3d 1134, 1145 (9th Cir. 1997) (citing 3 J. Thomas McCarthy, McCarthy on Trademarks and Unfair Competition § 27.04[4][d] at 27-52 (3d ed. 1994). For a statement to be actionable,[6] it must make a "specific and measurable advertisement claim of product superiority." [*14] Id. at 1145. The statement attributed to Schubert is a general statement of superiority and contains nothing about the specific attributes of Speedo equipment. No reasonable buyer would rely on this statement in making a purchasing decision.

TYR argues that the statement is not puffery because it is capable being proven false, as demonstrated by the fact that swimmers wearing TYR suits successfully competed at the Olympics, "the highest level." TYR misses the point. HN9[] Whether a statement is puffery does not depend on the truth or falsity of a statement; it depends on the degree of generality or specificity. "The "puffing" rule amounts to a seller's privilege to lie his head off, so long as he says nothing specific." Castrol Inc. v. Pennzoil Co., 987 F.2d 939, 945 (3d Cir. 1993) (quoting W. Page Keeton, et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts § 109, at 756-57 (5th ed. 1984)); Pizza Hut, Inc. v. Papa John's Int'l, Inc., 227 F.3d 489, 497 (5th Cir. 2000). The statement here is unquestionably a statement of hyperbole, but it is a general one. No reasonable person would think that they would be incapable of competing without the Speedo suit.

TYR also attempts to analogize to two Second Circuit decisions, Castrol and Time Warner Cable, Inc. v. DIRECTV, Inc., 497 F.3d 144 (2d Cir. 2007). In Castrol, the defendant claimed that its motor oil "outperforms any leading motor oil against viscosity breakdown." 987 F.3d at 941. The [*15] court found this to be literally false, as demonstrated by a battery of comparative tests of viscosity breakdown. Id. at 943-44. The analogy to this case is very weak: the Castrol statement singled out a specific attribute of motor oil—viscosity breakdown—that could be proven false by specific testing, whereas the statement here amounts to a general statement that Speedo's swimsuits are superior without any comparisons of any specific attributes of the suits.

[5] Although TYR has a video recording of the coaches meeting, (see Hilton Decl. ¶ 2), it is unable to point out where Schubert actually made such an assertion. The only evidence of this statement is the coach's declaration, executed over two years after the meeting took place. However, because this is a motion for summary judgment, the Court may not weigh this evidence against the actual recording of the coaches meeting. Balint v. Carson City, Nev., 180 F.3d 1047, 1054 (9th Cir. 1999).

[6] HN8[] As noted above, the Court finds that an alleged false advertisement must, at a minimum, be actionable non-puffery under the Lanham Act. See Harcourt Brace, 108 F.3d at 1152 (noting the difficulty of distinguishing actionable false statements from puffing in setting for the de minimis presumption).

Likewise, the analogy to Time Warner Cable is weak. There, the court found that the statements in television advertisements that "[y]ou're just not gonna get the best picture out of some fancy big screen TV without DIRECTV. It's broadcast in 1080i," and that "settling for cable would be illogical," were likely to be shown literally false on a motion for a preliminary injunction. 497 F.3d at 154, 158. The court found that, in the context of the advertisements, the statements made the claim that the picture quality of satellite was better than cable. Id. Again, this case is distinguishable because the statements made assertions about a specific attribute of the product—picture quality—whereas the general statement attributed to Schubert does not.

The Defendants also [*16] argue that the statements in Schubert's March 2008 email are puffery. Schubert giving his "personal opinion" on the swimsuit controversy, stated that:

> [Speedo] is putting millions into research and development. . . . To combat this, the trailing companies [TYR and Nike] pay more money to sign our new pros to big contracts wearing an inferior product. We need our coaches and athletes to pressure the other manufacturers to "get in the game." Three competitive companies (or more) is to all our advantage.

(COE, Ex. 10 (emphasis in original).) The statement that TYR provided "an inferior product" is clearly puffery. See, e.g., U.S. Healthcare, Inc. v. Blue Cross of Greater Philadelphia, 898 F.2d 914, 926 (3d Cir. 1990) (finding "better than" statement to be "the most innocuous kind of 'puffing'").

However, TYR argues that the "inferior product" statement is actionable because it came within the context of previous statements about testing and therefore gave the impression that the claim was based on independent testing. See Southland Sod, 108 F.3d at 1145; Pizza Hut, 227 F.3d at 495 n.5 ("Where the context of an advertising statement may lend greater specificity to an otherwise vague representation, the court should not succumb to the temptation to hastily rule a phrase to be unactionable under the Lanham Act." (quotation omitted)). TYR points [*17] to comments made by Jonty Skinner ("Skinner"), a USA Swimming employee, at the December 2007 coaches meeting that the Speedo suit was tested by NASA and achieved a 4% reduction in drag, (Hilton Decl. ¶ 2), a reference in Schubert's email to research and development, (COE, Ex. 10), and a note in Craig Lord's SwimNews.com article that the technology was developed by NASA, (COE, Ex. 13).

The Court finds that none of these references even remotely implies that the "inferior product" statement was based on any testing. First of all, Skinner's statements were clearly based on comparative testing of previous generations of swimsuits and could not be reasonably interpreted as comparative testing of Speedo's current products against competitors' current products.[7] They are irrelevant to Schubert's statement months later about "inferior products."[8] Second, Schubert's reference to Speedo spending millions on research in no way implies any sort of comparative testing. And finally, Lord's article can give no context to the March 13 email as it was published nearly a month after the email. (COE, Ex. 13.) Moreover, it was written by Lord, a swim reporter who is not alleged to be an agent of Speedo, [*18] USA Swimming, or Schubert.

Accordingly, the Court finds that Schubert's statements at the December 2007 coaches meeting and the March 2008 email are non-actionable puffery.[9]

[7] "In the testing that they [Speedo] do, and they go all the way to NASA and they test with a device at NASA, test the friction of the suit . . . . And you quantify the suit that evolved in Melbourne as being 4% less friction as the one that they had in Sydney . . . . And they quantify the suit that's going to come out in Beijing as being 3% faster than the suit that came out in Melbourne, or 3% less friction than the suit that came out in Melbourne." (COE, Ex. 8, [Recording of National Team Coaches Meeting, Dec. 16-17, 2007, Disk 4] at 39:05.)

[8] The Court reads TYR's argument as using Skinner's comments to provide the context for statements by Schubert, and not as providing a separate instance of false advertising. (See Opp'n Br. 9.) In any case, Defendants would be entitled to summary judgment, as TYR admits that it cannot prove

4. Effect on Competition

HN10[] In order to state a valid Sherman Act claim under a false advertising theory, the plaintiff must make a "preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer)." Harcourt Brace, 108 F.3d at 1151 (emphasis in original). Because of the difficulties in distinguishing actionable false statements from puffing, the speculative effect that advertising has on consuming behavior, and buyer distrust of seller's disparaging comments, the Ninth Circuit has set forth a presumption that commercial speech or advertising has a de minimis effect on competition. Id. at 1152. A plaintiff may overcome this presumption by showing that the charged speech meets a six-factor test: the statements must be "(1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset by rivals." Id. (citation [*19] omitted).

TYR argues that it must only demonstrate that the speech here meets the Harcourt Brace six-factor test. In other words, TYR's position is that the de minimis presumption is the only hurdle that an antitrust plaintiff must overcome to get to a jury on a false advertising claim. The Court disagrees with TYR's reading of Harcourt Brace.

Harcourt Brace HN11[] first sets out the requirement that disparagement "must have a significant and enduring adverse impact on competition itself in the relevant markets to that Skinner's statements are false. (Id. at 5:13-15; COE, Exs. 22, 23.) rise to the level of an antitrust violation." Id. at 1152. The plaintiff has the burden of proving this "significant and enduring impact" in order to proceed on the claim. Id. at 1151.

HN12[] The court then specified that antitrust claims based on false advertising "should presumptively be ignored"—that is, the defendant is entitled to a presumption that false advertising has a de minimis effect on competition before the introduction of any evidence of actual market impact. See id. at 1152. The six-factor test—which focuses on the characteristics of the charged speech and not on any evidence of actual market effect—is the plaintiff's means of overcoming [*20] this first hurdle. It does not, however, satisfy the plaintiff's burden of proving an actual "significant and enduring adverse impact on competition." In other words, a plaintiff that has discharged the de minimis presumption is not automatically entitled to its own presumption of significant market effect. In addition to showing that the speech is of the type that could have a significant effect on competition, the plaintiff has the burden of showing that it actually did affect competition.[10]

Therefore, the Defendants having asserted TYR's lack of evidence of a "significant and enduring adverse impact," TYR has the burden of coming forward with evidence to create a triable issue of fact. Celotex, 477 U.S. at 323. TYR points to four alleged market circumstances it puts forth as evidence of an adverse effect on competition: (1) from February 2008 to June 2009, Speedo increased market share while charging a higher price than TYR; (2) Speedo controlled 95% of the market by June 2009; (3) during that time period, TYR lost market share; and (4) Nike completely exited the market in September 2009.

The first three circumstances are based on a report prepared by Robin Cantor ("Cantor"). (COE, Ex. 1.) Cantor's report [*21] compared the sales of "championship suits," such as the Speedo LZR Racer and the TYR Tracer Rise, in periods prior to the alleged unlawful conduct against the "injury period" of February 2008 to July 2009. (Id. PP 15, 18.) Cantor limited her analysis to sales to "Team Dealers," retailers who sell suits to competitive swimmers and teams, where TYR and Speedo generated a majority of their championship suit revenue. (Id. PP 15, 19.) Cantor studied the sales data from three Team Dealers. (Id. ¶ 20.) Cantor also limited her analysis to sales of TYR and Speedo products only, because those two manufacturers "dominated" the Team Dealer market. (Id. ¶ 20.) Cantor found that Speedo increased its relative share of the Team Dealer market after the introduction of the LZR Racer

[9] The Defendants do not argue that the statement at the 2008 Manchester team meeting and the statement to the junior swimmers in 2009 are puffery.

[10] This holding is supported by the fact that the Ninth Circuit has applied the "significant and enduring impact" test for claims outside the context of false advertising. Adaptive Power Solutions, LLC v. Hughes Missile Sys. Co., 141 F.3d 947, 952 (9th Cir. 1998)

while charging higher prices than TYR's Tracer Rise. (Id. PP 48-50.) Cantor concludes that this is "consistent with the conclusion that the challenged conduct injured TYR sales and competition in championship suits." (Id. ¶ 50.)

The one major flaw in Cantor's analysis—and the reason it does not provide evidence of significant injury to competition—is that it completely omits the sales of any other swimsuit manufacturers. Cantor defined a market where TYR is Speedo's [*22] only competitor, thereby allowing her to assert that injury to TYR is injury to competition. The supposed "market share" is actually a measure of the relative sales volume of Speedo as compared to TYR, and says nothing about Speedo's of TYR's actual market share because there is no evidence of the sales of other competitors like Nike, blueseventy, Arena, Jaked, or Adidas.

Cantor justifies the exclusion of other competitors from the analysis on the assertion that TYR and Speedo "dominate" the Team Dealer market. (Id. ¶ 20.) Cantor notes that, over the five year period from 2004 to 2009, Speedo and TYR accounted for 77% and 17% of the sales to Team Dealers of suits costing at least $40. (Id.) However, this is very misleading. Throughout the report, Cantor tallies the sales of championship and "high-end" championship suits; yet, in order to exclude all competitors other than TYR and Speedo, she tallies all suits costing more than $40, rather than the relevant championship suits. This has the effect of minimizing the relevant market share of manufacturers that concentrate on the higher-priced championship suits. Moreover, by averaging sales over a five-year period, Cantor minimizes the [*23] market share of recent entrants like blueseventy, which entered the market in the summer of 2008. (USA Swimming Reply Br., Ex. B ¶ 5.) Finally, by limiting the analysis to Team Dealer sales, Cantor excludes the relevant sales of manufacturers like Jaked and Arena, which concentrate on direct internet sales or on-site sales at swim competitions. (Id. ¶ 5.)

Thus, Cantor's report shows only that Speedo's sales in the Team Dealer market increased relative to TYR's sales. TYR has presented no evidence of the sales or market shares of any of the competitors. On this record, there is no way to determine whether TYR's lost sales were picked up by new entrants or whether Speedo actually lost overall market share to new entrants at any time during the relevant period. At best, Cantor's report is evidence of injury to TYR, Speedo's competitor, but does not show injury to competition, which is what the law requires.[11] Pool Water Prods. v. Olin Corp., 258 F.3d 1024, 1036 (9th Cir. 2001) (finding no antitrust injury because "[a] decrease in one competitor's market share . . . affects competitors, not competition"); see also Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 906, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007) ("The purpose of the antitrust laws, by contrast, is 'the protection of competition, not competitors.'" (quoting Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 338, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990) (emphasis in original)).

The Court also finds that Cantor's report should be excluded under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 as unreliable and not based on sufficient facts or data. See Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 589-95, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993). By not considering any data on the pricing, sales volume, or market share of manufacturers other than Speedo and TYR, Cantor simply cannot make a reliable analysis as to market impact. The report is therefore irrelevant to the issue of market impact.

Although not necessary to support the Court's conclusion, the Defendants have offered evidence that competition in the championship swimsuit market actually increased after Schubert's statements, in the form of new market entrants like blueseventy, Jaked, Arena, and Adidas. The success of the LZR Racer at the 2008 Olympics spurred

[11] Because the supplemental export report by Jules H. Kamin ("Kamin") relies entirely on Cantor's report, it suffers from the same flaws. (See COE, Ex. 3 ¶ 1.) Kamin opines that:

> [*24] [t]he fact that Speedo was able to increase its market share, the absolute quantity of units sold, and its prices while the quality of its championship suits was not superior to that of TYR's . . . [shows] that the conduct of the defendants cause economic injury to consumers, sometimes called injury to competition.

(Id. ¶ 5.) However, as discussed above, Cantor's report does not measure actual market share; it only measures Speedo's sales relative to TYR's. And Cantor's report does not support the claim that Speedo increased prices. Cantor merely found that Speedo charged higher prices than TYR. (COE, Ex. 1. ¶¶ 39-40 & tbl. 8.) Thus, Kamin's assertion of "allocative inefficiency" is based on faulty assumptions. (See Kamin Decl. ¶ 5(b) & (c).)

these companies to produce new suits for the American market. (See Lord Decl. PP 26-28; Schubert Depo. at 94:3-96:8, 182:2-25; USA Swimming Reply Br., Ex. B ¶ 5; Furniss [*25] Decl. 85:20-86:8; Bielak Decl., Exs. L ¶ 4-7, M, N, P, V.) By the time of the U.S. World Championship trials in July 2009, one year after the 2008 Olympic Trials, these new entrants had made very significant traction among elite swimmers, as shown by the suit choice of swimmers in the finals of several competitions:

TYR	7	13	10
Nike	12	1	0
Arena	0	0	19
blueseventy	0	6	9
Jaked	0	0	32

(Supp. Isaac Decl. ¶ 4, Exs. A-C.)

In addition, one of the country's largest swimsuit retailers noticed the dramatic penetration of blueseventy into the high-end swimsuit market. (See USA Swimming Reply Br., Ex. B PP 1, 4-7.) From May 2007 to May 2008, the retailer estimated its sales by manufactuer in the following percentages: 70% for Speedo, 15% for TYR, and 15% for Nike. (Id. ¶ 4.) After blueseventy entered the market in the summer of 2008, the retailer estimated its sales in the second half of 2008 and the first half of 2009 according to the following percentages: 75% for blueseventy, 12% for Speedo, and 3% combined for TYR and Nike.[12] (Id. ¶ 5.) The retailer estimates that the total sales volume [*26] for blueseventy during that period was $600,000. (Id. ¶ 7.) In that time period, the retailer sold to roughly 20% of all collegiate swim teams and between 85% to 90% of those customers purchased the blueseventy suit. (Id. ¶ 6.)

Finally, Speedo presents evidence that TYR had difficulty keeping up with demand for its championship suit. If Schubert's comments actually had the effect of excluding TYR from the market, one would ordinarily expect to see excess inventory, or greater supply than demand for TYR's goods, rather than the opposite. However, in January 2008, Steve Furniss, TYR's Executive Vice President, noted in an email that, "[o]n Tracer Light [TYR's high-end suit at the time] we are already behind in production schedule and Sales has already sold out initial allocation plus they are behind sample and promotional needs." (Richter Decl., Ex. E.) These production delays were confirmed by Matt Zimmer, TYR's Promotions Director, who laid out a plan of rationing the available inventory of Tracer Light suits among college teams, noting the "extremely frustrating situation [of] hav[ing] so few championship suits available for our many teams." (Id., Ex. F.) However, he also noted the [*27] high demand, stating that "we've got teams clammoring [sic] for our newest suits." (Id.) A month later, in March 2008, Zimmer stated—in an email titled "Tracer allocation"—that "our Tracer inventory is still well below what we hoped it would be," though "the demand has really ramped up once again." (Id., Ex. G.) Even after the Beijing Olympics, TYR acknowledged the limited availability of its championship suits to NCAA coaches, noting that "[w]e have experienced strong demand [for the Tracer Light] and continue to chase availability," and that the TYR Tracer Rise "will not be available until early 2009" due to a temporary NCAA ban. (Id., Ex. I.)

The Defendants' evidence of elite swimmers using suits by new entrants, significant sales volume and market share, and TYR's inability to keep up with demand appears to show not only that there was no significant impact on competition (as opposed to TYR individually), but also that any adverse effect on competition was short-lived and not enduring.[13]

[12] These estimates also demonstrate the fallacy of the Cantor report. By excluding the sales of blueseventy, the new entrant, Cantor's analysis completely fails to account for 75% of the market, at least at this retailer.

[13] TYR contends that the "enduring impact" test is a low bar, citing In re Remeron Antitrust Litigation, 335 F. Supp. 2d 522 (D.N.J. 2004) and Indiana Grocery Co. v. Super Valu Stores, 647 F. Supp. 254 (S.D. Ind. 1986), both of which allowed antitrust

TYR argues that evidence that top swimmers are wearing competitors' suits is not necessarily indicative of healthy competition in the Team Dealer market, where Speedo [*28] sells roughly 95% of its championship suits. (COE, Ex. 1 ¶ 19; Brommer Depo. at 90:5 17.) This may be true, but TYR misunderstands its burden on summary judgment—it must provide affirmative evidence of harm to competition. It has provided no evidence of Team Dealer sales of manufacturers other than Speedo and TYR, failing to meet its burden and also failing to rebut the Defendants evidence of major penetration by at least one new entrant at a major retailer.[14]

TYR also tries to dismiss the impact of new entrants by noting that many of the new suits have been banned by FINA, the international governing body of swimming. The Court fails to see the relevance of the FINA ban. TYR's theory was that the Defendants restrained trade and monopolized the high-end swimsuit market through Schubert's alleged false statements promoting the LZR Racer. The Defendants have presented some evidence that new competitors entered and took significant market share from both Speedo and TYR, thereby showing that the statements had little effect on competition and that any effect was short-lived. The fact that FINA banned all the suits—including Speedo's and TYR's—effectively terminating that entire market, [*29] does not rebut the Defendants' evidence of new competition prior to the ban. TYR does not allege any false statements regarding the post-ban suits. That market is simply irrelevant.[15]

Nor does Nike's exit from the market in September 2008 demonstrate that Schubert's statements had a significant and enduring impact on competition. (See COE, Ex. 28.) Ordinarily, the loss of a significant competitor from the market would signal a major adverse effect on competition and would harm consumers. However, the Defendants have shown evidence, unrebutted by TYR, that new entrants were producing suits of better quality that even Speedo's and TYR's by the time Nike exited. (See Lord Decl. PP 26-28; Schubert Depo. at 94:3-96:8, 182:2-25; USA Swimming Reply Br., Ex. B ¶ 5; Furniss Decl. 85:20-86:8; Bielak Decl., Exs. L ¶ 4-7, M, N, P, V.) These new suits were apparently gaining widespread acceptance among elite swimmers less than a year after Nike exited. (Supp. Isaac Decl. ¶ 4, Exs. A-C.)

Moreover, TYR fails to show any link between Schubert's statements and Nike's exit. On this record, Nike's exit is entirely consistent with normal competition: the well-publicized Olympic success of the LZR [*30] Racer combined with new suits developed by blueseventy, Arena, and Jaked may have forced Nike out. There is no allegation or evidence that Nike had a championship suit comparable to the Speedo LZR Racer, TYR Tracer Rise, or any of the new suits by the new entrants. Indeed, its willingness to let its top sponsored swimmers swim in Speedo suits at the Olympics suggests otherwise. (COE, Ex. 28.)

The Court also finds that the alleged false advertising does not even overcome the Harcourt Brace de minimis presumption. At the pleading stage, the Court was hesitant to apply the presumption because TYR had alleged that Schubert's position with USA Swimming gave his statements the appearance of objectivity. (See Docket No. 72 at 10.) HN13[] The Harcourt Brace presumption rested partially on the rationale that buyers generally do not trust comments made by competitors. Id. at 1152. However, the Ninth Circuit also relied on the difficulty in distinguishing claims to proceed for relatively short periods of alleged unlawful conduct. However, neither of these cases involved a false advertising antitrust claim and, thus, neither applied the "significant and enduring impact" test set forth in Harcourt Brace. See Remeron, 335 F. Supp. 2d at 526-27; Indiana Grocery, 647 F. Supp. at 256-57. And although Thompson's Gas & Elec. Serv. v. BP Am., 691 F. Supp. 2d 860 (N.D. Ill. 2010), cites the Harcourt Brace test, it neither applies the test, nor does it involve a false advertising claim. 691 F. Supp. 2d 860 at 862-865.

[14] TYR also presents the declaration of Dean Jackson, Sales Director at blueseventy, noting that, for all of blueseventy's success, it has been unable to sign any NCAA teams to sponsorship contracts. (Jackson Decl. ¶ 5.) Jackson states that "Coach Schubert's influence and his relationship with Speedo created a barrier that was 'insurmountable.'" (Id. ¶ 6.) Jackson does not purport to be an expert on economics and, in any case, attributes the "insurmountable" barrier to Schubert's influence rather than any false advertising. This declaration is far from demonstrating a significant impact on competition.

[15] TYR does not rebut evidence that it had trouble meeting demand for its championship suits. It does submit a declaration that it has the capacity to produce 10,000-12,000 Tracer Light or Tracer Rise swimsuits per month, (Meng Decl. ¶ 2), but this hardly rebuts Speedo's evidence that the demand for TYR's suits outpaced its ability to supply the suits, despite its apparently strenuous efforts to do so.

actionable false statements from puffery and the speculative nature of the effects of false advertising, "especially when [it] is not systematic." Id. This would apply regardless of whether the speaker had the appearance of objectivity. That circumstance may be [*31] considered within the Harcourt Brace factors, such as the likelihood of inducing reliance or susceptibility of neutralization, but the Court does not find that it negates the application of the presumption entirely.

The Court finds that TYR cannot demonstrate that the statements "continued for prolonged periods." Id. at 1152. The only two actionable statements are Schubert's comment at the Manchester swim meet in April 2008 and his statement to two junior swimmers in January 2009. Two isolated statements to very limited audiences spaced by nearly a year are not the sort of sustained, systematic false advertising that would have more than a de minimis effect on competition. HN14[] It is not enough to show that there was a long period between the statements; the advertising must be "continued," i.e., sustained, for a prolonged period. See id. at 1152.

Even if all five of the charged statements were considered, the Court still finds they does not meet the necessary test of sustained advertisement. One statement was made at a coaches meeting in December 2008, one in an email in March 2008, two at a swim meet in April 2008, and the last to two junior swimmers in January 2009. Five sporadic statements spread out over [*32] the course of more than a year are not the sort of systematic advertising capable of significantly affecting competition.

TYR argues that the "prolonged period" test is a very low burden to meet. However, it has no authority for this proposition. It argues that National Ass'n of Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, Inc. v. Ayerst Laboratories, Division of/and American Home Products Corp., 850 F.2d 904 (2d Cir. 1988), allowed an antitrust disparagement claim to overcome the de minimis presumption despite the fact that the disparagement was contained in a single letter. Id. at 916-17. However, unlike the Ninth Circuit, which requires a plaintiff to satisfy all of the six Harcourt Brace elements, 108 F.3d at 1152, the Second Circuit apparently does not find each element mandatory. Ayerst, 850 F.2d at 916-17; see also Am. Council of Certified Podiatric Physicians & Surgeons v. Am. Bd. of Podiatric Surgery, Inc., 323 F.3d 366, 371 & n.6 (6th Cir. 2003) (noting the ambiguity of the Second Circuit's test and declining to decide whether all elements must be met in Sixth Circuit). Ayerst did not find that the single letter was sufficient to meet the "prolonged period" requirement; rather, it allowed the case to proceed despite not meeting that element. 850 F.2d at 917. Here in the Ninth Circuit, that is not a option. TYR must demonstrate that the statements continued for a prolonged period.

Because TYR has not provided evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer a "significant and enduring adverse impact on competition," the Defendants are entitled [*33] to summary judgment on the Sherman Act claims. Additionally, no triable issue of fact exists as to whether Schubert's "continued for a prolonged period." Therefore, TYR cannot overcome the presumption that Schubert's statements had only a de minimis effect on competition and the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on that ground as well.

5. Remaining State Claims

TYR's remaining causes of action are brought under the Cartwright Act and the UCL, and TYR brings a separate claim for injunctive relief.

HN15[] "Where Cartwright Act claims are premised on the same facts as Sherman Act claims, and summary judgment is granted on the Sherman Act claims, summary judgment is also appropriate for Cartwright Act claims." Breakdown Servs., Ltd. v. Now Casting, Inc., 550 F. Supp. 2d 1123, 1141 (C.D. Cal. 2007) (citing County of Tuolumne v. Sonora Cmty. Hosp., 236 F.3d 1148, 1160 (9th Cir. 2001).) Here, the Cartwright Act claim is identical to TYR's Sherman Act claims. Because the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on the Sherman Act claims, they are entitled to summary judgment on the Cartwright Act claim as well.

HN16[] The UCL prohibits three separate categories of conduct—"acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999); Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Conduct is "unfair" if it "threatens an incipient violation of an* antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of [*34] one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Id. at 187. Thus, in most cases, "where plaintiff's [UCL] claim is predicated on antitrust violations that fail to withstand summary judgment, the [UCL] claim must also fail." Breakdown Servs., 550 F. Supp. 2d at 1142. Because TYR's UCL claim is based on the same facts as its same failed antitrust claims, the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on the UCL claim.

TYR's final remaining claim seeks only injunctive relief and does not state an independent cause of action. Because the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on TYR's remaining claims, the injunctive relief claim fails as well.

III. RECONSIDERATION

TYR seeks reconsideration of the Court's order granting summary judgment on its false advertising claim under the Lanham Act. The Court granted summary judgment on the grounds that TYR did not have evidence of injury traceable to the alleged false statements. (Docket No. 154 at 25-26.)

A. Legal Standard

HN17[] Under Rule 59(e), a party may move to alter or amend a judgment within 28 days. The grounds for reconsideration are set forth in Local Rule 7-18, which provides:

> A motion for reconsideration of [*35] the decision on any motion may be made only on the grounds of (a) a material difference in fact or law from that presented to the Court before such decision that in the exercise of reasonable diligence could not have been known to the party moving for reconsideration at the time of such decision, or (b) the emergence of new material facts or a change of law occurring after the time of such decision, or (c) a manifest showing of a failure to consider material facts presented to the Court before such decision. No motion for reconsideration shall in any manner repeat any oral or written argument made in support of or in opposition to the original motion.

L.R. 7-18. The Court may disregard evidence or arguments on a motion for reconsideration that could reasonably have been presented prior to this Court's ruling. Hopkins v. Andaya, 958 F.2d 881, 887 n.5 (9th Cir. 1992).

B. Discussion

TYR moves for reconsideration based on an expert report that it received after the due date for its opposition papers in the original round of summary judgment briefing. It contends that this report could not, with reasonable diligence, have been completed and submitted with TYR's opposition papers because the expert, Cantor, did not receive necessary data from Speedo until [*36] a week before TYR's opposition was due. (Cantor Decl. ¶ 7.) Speedo disputes this assertion and argues that TYR could have submitted the report prior to the Court's final order. The Court need not resolve this dispute, however, because the Court finds no prejudice in considering the new evidence given the second round of summary judgment briefing. The Court also finds that, even considering the new evidence, Speedo is entitled to summary judgment on the Lanham Act claim.

TYR's Lanham Act claim is premised on two remaining sets of statements: (1) Schubert's claim at the April 2008 Manchester meeting that the Speedo LZR Racer provided a 2% advantage, and (2) his statement to two junior swimmers in Guam in January 2009 that the LZR Racer was "faster" than the non-Speedo suits they were wearing.[16] (See Docket No. 154 at 24-28.) Given that both statements were made to a limited audience and none of those present switched to Speedo products as a result of the statement, the Court found that TYR had failed to demonstrate any actual deception or any actual injury as a result of the statements. (Id. at 25-26.) TYR now argues that Cantor's report demonstrates a loss of sales that can be attributed to "the challenged [*37] conduct." (Cantor Decl., Ex. A.)

[16] Speedo was granted summary judgment with respect to Schubert's statement to reporter Craig Lord because that statement was not commercial speech or advertising. (Docket No. 154 at 26-28.) TYR provides no grounds for reconsidering that ruling. The other statements that form the basis of TYR's antitrust disparagement claim were either not alleged to be the basis for the Lanham Act claim or were not raised by TYR in opposition to Speedo's prior summary judgment motion. (See Compl.; Docket No. 127 at 24-30.) It is too late for them to amend its Lanham Act now, on a motion to reconsider a grant of summary judgment.

In the previous summary judgment order, the Court did not consider whether there was a triable issue as to whether Schubert's statements were false or misleading. (Docket No. 154 at 28 n.19.) With respect to the "2% advantage" statement in Manchester, there is some ambiguity as to what Schubert actually said. One of the swimmers testified that Schubert told him that the LZR Racer "was a two percent improvement on performance from other suits," but "[i]t wasn't specifically made clear that it was two percent in relation to anything else. It was just two percent improvement." (Marshall Depo. at 16:8-17.) Another swimmer who heard the 2% advantage statement at the meeting took it to mean that the LZR Racer was "2 percent better than any suit," but admitted that "[it] wasn't clear" what the 2 percent was being compared to. (Van Wie Depo. at 49:2-14.) A third swimmer testified that Schubert stated that the LZR Racer "would give you like a 2 percent advantage," and took that to mean "[t]he 2 percent advantage was 2 percent advantage over all the suits. It was the fastest suit on the market or something." (Descenza Depo. at 18:17-20, 19:8-12.) Schubert claims [*38] that he was referring to a 2% advantage over the prior generation of Speedo suits, the Speedo FS Pro. (Schubert Decl. ¶ 11; Supp. Schubert Decl. ¶ 6.) Schubert clarified what he was talking about during his interview with Craig Lord: "If you take [the] best times of world record holders and their new times [wearing the LZR Racer], the difference is 2 per cent." (COE Ex. 13.)

TYR argues that Schubert's statements at the Manchester meet are false because the LZR Racer does not offer a 2% advantage or is not 2% faster than the Tracer Rise. However, the Tracer Rise was not commercially available—not "on the market"—until later in April 2008, after Schubert's 2% advantage comment. (Furniss 9/3/09 Depo., Ex. 4.) Thus, even if it is accepted that Schubert was claiming a 2% advantage over all suit currently on the market, it is not reasonable to infer that Schubert was making a direct comparison to the Tracer Rise.[17] Indeed, in a TYR internal memorandum in April 2008, Matt Zimmer admitted that "very few people even know we have a new product such as Rise." (Richter Decl., Ex. H.)

TYR also argues that the statements can be shown to be literally false because they imply that testing was done to [*39] support the claim. See Castrol, Inc. v. Quaker State Corp., 977 F.2d 57, 62 (2d Cir. 1992). However, TYR does not have evidence to rebut Schubert's claim to have analyzed the swimming times of world record holders wearing the LZR Racer and found a 2% difference.[18] (Supp. Schubert Decl. PP 3-5.) In fact, Schubert's analysis was confirmed by USA Swimming statistician Larry Herr, who found a average swim time improvement of 1.55%,[19] (Herr Decl. ¶ 3), by Craig Lord, who found that time improvements in a larger sample clustered in the range of 1.6% to 2.3%, (Lord Decl. ¶ 19), and by TYR-sponsored coach Steve Hutchinson, who also found a roughly 2% time improvement in his own review of swim times, (Zimmer 9/30/09 Depo. at 85:2-86:19, 87:2-88:9, 202:20-203:14).

Because TYR cannot show that Schubert's statement could be reasonably interpreted as a comparison of the LZR Racer against the Tracer Rise or that Schubert's statement was not backed by an informal statistical analysis, TYR has not raised a triable issue of fact as to whether the "2% advantage" statement was false or misleading.

Moreover, the newly-introduced expert report does not remedy TYR's inability to show a link between Schubert's statements and injury to TYR. TYR must show that the charged [*40] statements "actually deceived or [had] the [17] In fact, Schubert claims not to have known about the Tracer Rise at the time, (Supp. Schubert Decl. ¶ 6), though this is disputed.

[18] The testimony of Genadijus Sokolovas and Russell Mark that USA Swimming and Speedo did not do internal "testing" on swimsuits prior to Schubert's comments, (Sokolovas Depo. at 16:11-25; Mark Depo. at 30:18-31:12), does not rebut Schubert's claim to have informally analyzed swim times involving the LZR Racer.

[19] TYR argues that Schubert's statement is literally false because of the difference between 1.55% and 2%. The Court does not think that a statement can reasonably be found to be false because a number is rounded up to an integer according to commonly-accepted rules for rounding, the same used in the federal tax code. See, e.g., 26 U.S.C. § 3402(b)(4) (allowing rounding to the nearest dollar for calculating withholding). More precisely, the Court does not think that the difference between 1.55% and the rounded number of 2% is a material difference.

tendency to deceive a substantial segment of its audience [and] is likely to influence the purchasing decision."[20] Southland Sod, 108 F.3d at 1139. Cantor's report states that its "results are consistent with the conclusion that the challenged conduct injured TYR sales." (Cantor Decl., Ex. A ¶ 50.) The "challenged conduct" is everything that TYR alleged in the Complaint, including the allegations of coercion, TYR's exclusion from Splash magazine, the exclusion of advertising at certain events, and all of the disparaging statements that have been dismissed as puffing or otherwise non-actionable. (See id. ¶ 18; Compl. PP 10-16.) Thus, Cantor never specifically links the Manchester statement or the Guam statement to the alleged injury, other than as part of the entire range of "challenged conduct." In other words, Cantor has failed to factor out any of the "challenged conduct,"—such as the alleged coercion, the exclusion from Splash magazine and events, the puffing statements, or the statement made to Craig Lord—that is not actionable under the Lanham Act. No reasonable juror could find, based on Cantor's report, that the loss of sales indentified in the report were caused by [*41] the statement at the closed meeting in Manchester or the statement to two junior swimmers in Guam. This is especially true where, as here, none of the audience to the charged statements changed their buying behavior as a result of the statements. (Docket No. 154 at 25-26.)

To avoid this failure of proof of actual causation, TYR argues that proof that the statement was spread by word-of-mouth creates a triable issue as to whether any customers were actually deceived.[21] TYR cites two unpublished district court cases for the proposition that injury can be presumed based on word-of-mouth dissemination in certain instances. PBM Prods., LLC v. Mead Johnson & Co., No. 3:09-CV-269, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18460 (E.D. Va. March 2, 2010); Fla. Breckenridge, Inc. v. Solvay Pharms., Inc., No. 97-8417-CIV-RYSKAMP, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14742 (S.D. Fla. March 18, 1998). Neither case is applicable here.

In PBM Products, the false advertising was disseminated through a mailer sent to roughly 1.6 million customers. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18460, at 12-13. In upholding the jury's damage award, the court noted that "[t]he jury heard evidence on the lost profits [the plaintiff] saw near the time the mailer was sent, [and] the 1.6 million individuals who received the mailer as well as those that would learn about it via word-of-mouth." Id. That case involved very [*42] widespread dissemination such that it can be assumed that a substantial section of the customer base heard the false statements, either directly or indirectly. Here, in contrast, the two statements were made to very limited audiences. The same presumption of widespread dissemination by word-of-mouth cannot be made.

In Florida Breckinridge, the defendant moved for summary judgment on a Lanham Act claim on the ground that oral statements are not commercial advertising. *1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14742, at 20. The court rejected the argument, noting testimony that, in the relevant market, the "product could not be adequately promoted without . . . in-person and word-of-mouth promotion." *1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14742 at 21. Thus, Florida Breckinridge merely stands for the proposition that oral statements, such as in-person or telephone sales calls, can constitute commercial advertising within the meaning of the Lanham Act. *1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14742 at 20-22. It does not stand for the proposition that a plaintiff can merely invoke "word-of-mouth" to overcome its burden of showing that customers actually heard and were deceived by the alleged false statement.

Here, TYR has evidence that Schubert made the "2% advantage" comment twice, both times at the 2008 Manchester meeting. (Marshall Depo. at 16:8-17; Descenza [*43] Depo. at 18:17-20.) Both were to a limited audience of 27 elite swimmers and several coaches, none of whom switched to Speedo as a result of the statement. TYR argues that it has evidence of dissemination through word-of-mouth, because one swimmer "heard from other swimmers and read in media articles that . . . Schubert[] was telling swimmers that the Speedo LZR would provide a 2% advantage to swimmers as compared to other swimsuits." (Florea Decl. ¶ 4.) However, this only establishes that one other swimmer heard the statement (and possibly from media sources like the Lord article, which is not actionable), and even he continued to wear TYR after a single experiment with the LZR.[22] (Id. PP 6-7.)

[20] The Lanham Act also requires that the plaintiff prove that the defendant "caused its false statement to enter interstate commerce." Southland Sod, 108 F.3d at 1139. Given that the two charged statements were given personally at a closed meeting in Manchester and to two junior swimmers in Guam, respectively, it is doubtful that TYR could satisfy this requirement either.

[21] The Court rejects this new argument because it is not grounds for reconsideration. TYR has not demonstrated that it could not have raised this argument—which has nothing to do with the new expert report—on summary judgment.

TYR also argues that word-of-mouth is an important part of the swimsuit industry. (See COE, Ex. 14; Jackson Decl. ¶ 2; Bielak Decl., Ex. M.) This does not, however, meet TYR's burden of proving that Schubert's statement was actually disseminated.

Finally, even if TYR could show that the statement was disseminated, it has no evidence of deception, particularly in light of the fact that, of all those who actually heard the statement, not one switched to using the Speedo suit as a result. (Docket [*44] No. 154 at 25-26; Florea Decl. PP 6-7.)

Clearly, the statement by Schubert to the two junior swimmers in Guam fails on same grounds. There is no evidence that the statement was heard by anybody other than the two swimmers and their coach. As noted in the Court's prior order, neither of those two swimmers switched to Speedo. (Docket No. 154 at 26.)

Accordingly, Speedo is entitled to summary judgment on TYR's Lanham Act claim.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the motions for summary judgment are GRANTED. TYR's motion for reconsideration is DENIED.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[22] TYR argues that it would be impossible to track "word-of-mouth" dissemination. However, the impact and dissemination of the statement could potentially be measured by consumer surveys, as recognized by courts in other Lanham Act claims. See, e.g., Brunswick Corp. v. Spinit Reel Co., 832 F.2d 513, 525 (10th Cir. 1987) ("Actual consumer confusion may be shown by direct evidence, a diversion of sales or direct testimony from the public, or by circumstantial evidence such as consumer surveys."). TYR has provided no such evidence.

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

When ruling on a motion to dismiss brought under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), the court must accept as true all well-pleaded facts, and give the plaintiff the benefit of all reasonable inferences. Ordinarily, a court may not consider any documents that are outside of the complaint, or not expressly incorporated therein, unless the motion is converted into one for summary judgment. There is, however, a narrow exception for documents the authenticity of which are not disputed by the parties; for official public records; for documents central to the plaintiff's claim; or for documents sufficiently referred to in the complaint.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Motions to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) test the sufficiency of the pleadings. Thus, when confronted with a motion to dismiss, the court accepts as true all well-pleaded facts and draws all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. Dismissal is only appropriate if the pleadings, so viewed, fail to support a plausible entitlement to relief. Two underlying principles must guide the court's assessment as to the adequacy of the pleadings to support a claim for relief. First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. Such conclusory statements are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. This second principle recognizes that the court's assessment of the pleadings is context specific, requiring the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. Where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged -- but it has not shown -- that the pleader is entitled to relief.

A patentee who brings an infringement suit may be subject to antitrust liability for the anticompetitive effects of that suit if the alleged infringer (the antitrust plaintiff) proves (1) that the asserted patent was obtained through knowing and willful fraud or (2) that the infringement suit was a mere sham to cover what is actually nothing more than an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of a competitor.

The first barrier for a Walker Process claimant to clear is the requirement that a patent be obtained through actual fraud upon the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office. This requires higher threshold showings of both materiality and intent than are required to show inequitable conduct. As applied to patent prosecution, fraud requires (1) a false representation or deliberate omission of a fact material to patentability, (2) made with the intent to deceive the patent examiner, (3) on which the examiner justifiably relied in granting the patent, and (4) but for which misrepresentation or deliberate omission the patent would not have been granted.

HN7[] Bad Faith, Fraud & Nonuse, Fraud

Fraud-related claims arising in a patent context must be pled with the specificity required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). This means that the complaint must specify the time, place, and content of an alleged false representation. It also must identify the basis for inferring scienter. Thus, the courts have uniformly held inadequate a complaint's general averment of a defendant's knowledge of material falsity, unless the complaint also sets forth specific facts that make it reasonable to believe that the defendant knew that a statement was materially false or misleading. Where the case involves an alleged failure to disclose information to the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (PTO), Walker Process and Rule 9(b) require that the plaintiff identify with particularity the reference or group of references that, but for their omission from the patentee's patent applications, the PTO would not have granted the applications.

A private antitrust plaintiff, in addition to having to show injury-in-fact and proximate cause, must allege, and eventually prove, antitrust injury. Antitrust injury is injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes the defendants' acts unlawful. The injury should reflect the anticompetitive effect either of the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation. It should, in short, be the type of loss that the claimed violations would be likely to cause. A practice is not anticompetitive simply because it harms competitors. After all, almost all business activity, desirable and undesirable alike, seeks to advance a firm's fortunes at the expense of its competitor's. Rather, a practice is anticompetitive only if it harms the competitive process. It harms that process when it obstructs the achievement of competition's basic goals -- lower prices, better products, and more efficient production methods.

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION ON DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS

DEIN, U.S.M.J.

I. INTRODUCTION

Plaintiff [2] Advanced Ion Beam Technology, Inc. ("AIBT") has brought this action against the defendants, Varian Semiconductor Equipment Associates, Inc. and the owners of U.S. Patent No. 7,301,156 (the "'156 Patent") (collectively, "Varian"), [1] claiming that Varian engaged in anti-competitive conduct, in violation of the Sherman Act, by filing a baseless patent infringement action (the "infringement action"). More specifically, AIBT asserts that Varian unlawfully attempted to create or maintain a monopoly in the ion implantation equipment market, and block AIBT from entering that market, by attempting to enforce a patent against AIBT that was known by Varian to be invalid and unenforceable because it was procured by fraud on the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office ("PTO").

This matter is presently before the court on "Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff's Complaint" (Docket No. 8). For the reasons detailed herein, this court recommends to the District Judge to whom this case is assigned that the motion be ALLOWED IN PART and DENIED IN PART. [3] Specifically, this court recommends that the plaintiff's claim that the defendants misled the PTO in connection with their disclosures concerning U.S. Patent No. 3,541,328 and an article authored by W.K.H. Panofsky, et al. be dismissed for failure to state a claim, as should the plaintiff's claim of conspiracy to monopolize. Since this is the second time the plaintiff has attempted to state a claim based on these grounds, this court recommends that these claims be dismissed with prejudice. However, this court further recommends that the motion to dismiss be denied with respect to plaintiff's claim that the defendants committed fraud on the PTO by failing to disclose a publication by Nicholas White, et al., the Ionex Quad Magnet, an offer by Nicholas White to sell certain technology to Varian, and the identity of Nicholas White as allegedly one of the inventors of the '156 Patent.

Background

Varian initiated the infringement action giving rise to this case on March 25, 2008. By its complaint in that action, Varian alleged that AIBT had infringed, contributed to, or induced infringement of the '156 Patent entitled "Controlling the Characteristics of Implanter Ion-Beams." AIBT responded [4] by denying liability, asserting various affirmative defenses and filing three counterclaims consisting of claims for invalidity, non-infringement and [*65] unenforceability. On November 25, 2008, after the parties had engaged in initial discovery, Varian, for reasons that are in dispute, unilaterally granted AIBT a covenant not to sue on the '156 Patent, and moved to dismiss both its claims and AIBT's three counterclaims. Ultimately, the court allowed the parties' joint motion to dismiss, thereby dismissing Varian's claims with prejudice pursuant to its covenant not to sue, and dismissing AIBT's counterclaims with prejudice to the extent that those claims were directed to products that were the subject of Varian's covenant not to sue.

On December 24, 2008, after Varian had granted the covenant not to sue and while the motion to dismiss Varian's claim and AIBT's three counterclaims remained pending, AIBT filed a First Amended Answer and First Amended Counterclaims. Therein, AIBT reasserted its original counterclaims for invalidity, non-infringement and unenforceability, and added five antitrust counterclaims. The additional claims included Walker Process claims [2] and "sham litigation" claims [5] for monopolization and attempted monopolization, as well as a claim for conspiracy to monopolize. In support of these claims, AIBT alleged among other things that Varian had engaged in monopolization and attempted monopolization by seeking, through the infringement action, to enforce a patent that it knew was obtained by fraud on the PTO, and that it knew was invalid or otherwise unenforceable.

[1] The individual defendants include Norman L. Turner, Kenneth H. Purser, and Alice W. Enge and Elizabeth Dill, as Co-Executrixes of the Estate of Harald A. Enge.

Varian moved to dismiss AIBT's amended counterclaims for failure to state a claim pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), and on July 20, 2009, this court issued a Report and Recommendation (the "2009 R&R") in which it recommended that Varian's motion be allowed. (See Docket No. 72 in C.A. No. 08-10487). In particular, this court determined that AIBT had failed to allege sufficient facts to establish an antitrust injury and [6] therefore lacked standing to pursue its antitrust counterclaims. This court also concluded that AIBT had failed to allege fraud with sufficient particularity to support its Walker Process and "sham litigation" claims, and that AIBT had failed to allege adequate facts to support its claim for conspiracy to monopolize. Accordingly, this court recommended that all of AIBT's counterclaims be dismissed. [3] However, it also concluded that the record did not establish that AIBT would be unable to allege a cause of action. Therefore, this court further recommended that the dismissal be without prejudice. The 2009 R&R was adopted by the District Judge to whom this case is assigned on August 4, 2009.

Instead of filing a motion for leave to amend its counterclaims in the infringement action, AIBT chose to pursue its antitrust claims by filing a new action against Varian. Thus, on August 31, 2009, AIBT filed the instant action against Varian. The [7] Complaint expands the factual allegations, but contains the same five antitrust claims that AIBT had asserted against Varian by way of its counterclaims [*66] in the infringement action. Accordingly, AIBT continues to contend that Varian engaged in anti-competitive conduct, in violation of federal antitrust law, by "alleging infringement of a patent that they knew was obtained by fraud on the [PTO]." (Compl. (Docket No. 1) P 1). Varian has again filed a motion to dismiss, asserting that AIBT has failed to cure the deficiencies identified by this court with respect to AIBT's antitrust counterclaims in the infringement action, and that the Complaint in this action should be dismissed on the same grounds articulated in the 2009 R&R.

As detailed below, this court finds that the expanded factual allegations cure some, but not all of the deficiencies in AIBT's original counterclaims. Therefore, this court recommends that Varian's motion to dismiss be ALLOWED IN PART and DENIED IN PART.

II. STATEMENT OF FACTS

HN1[] When ruling on a motion to dismiss brought under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), the court must accept as true all well-pleaded facts, and give the plaintiff the benefit of all reasonable inferences. [8] See Cooperman v. Individual, Inc., 171 F.3d 43, 46 (1st Cir. 1999). "Ordinarily, a court may not consider any documents that are outside of the complaint, or not expressly incorporated therein, unless the motion is converted into one for summary judgment." Alternative Energy, Inc. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 267 F.3d 30, 33 (1st Cir. 2001). "There is, however, a narrow exception 'for documents the authenticity of which are not disputed by the parties; for official public records; for documents central to plaintiff['s] claim; or for documents sufficiently referred to in the complaint.'" Id. (quoting Watterson v. Page, 987 F.2d 1, 3 (1st Cir. 1993)). [4] Applying these standards to the instant case, the relevant facts are as follows.

[2] "A Walker Process claim arises when a patentee baselessly institutes litigation to enforce a patent known to be unenforceable because the patent was procured by fraud." Novo Nordisk of N. Am., Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 885 F. Supp. 522, 526 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (citing Walker Process Equip., Inc. v. Food Mach. & Chem. Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1965)).

[3] Because AIBT's counterclaims for invalidity, non-infringement and non-enforceability had been dismissed by the District Court prior to this court's issuance of its R&R, this court addressed only the remaining five antitrust counterclaims in its decision.

[4] Consistent with the relevant standard, this court has considered the documents attached to AIBT's Complaint, as well as the exhibits attached to the Declaration of Christopher G. Lim ("Def. Ex. __"), which is attached to the defendants' memorandum in support of their motion to dismiss. (Docket No. 9). This court has also considered two letters from Kenneth H. Purser to Harald

The Ion Implantation Device Market

Varian manufactures and sells ion beam implantation devices, which are used to implant ions into a target, such as semiconductor wafers, and into materials on glass substrates used in Liquid Crystal Display screens. (Compl. (Docket No. 1) PP 11, 15). AIBT alleges, based on information and belief, that on or about 2003, Varian acquired the technology that is the subject matter of the '156 Patent pursuant to a technology license agreement with the inventors. (Id. P 90). The plaintiff contends, again on information and belief, that "Varian acquired the 156 Patent in an effort to obtain blocking intellectual property rights in order to increase its dominant market share and stifle competition." (Id.).

Varian allegedly has held a dominant position in the ion implantation equipment market since at least 2007, when it controlled 64% of the worldwide market. (Id. PP 16, 98). Moreover, according to AIBT, Varian is one of only three major competitors in the United States, which compete for a billion dollars worth of sales. (Id. P 16). Allegedly, one of the other two competitors is in the process [10] of withdrawing from the market, and the remaining competitor has suffered a substantial reduction [*67] in market share. (Id.). AIBT claims that due to Varian's dominant position in the relevant market, it has been able to raise and maintain prices above competitive levels. (Id. P 100).

AIBT contends that there are significant barriers to entry into the ion implantation equipment market, such as the need for large capital costs and advanced technical know-how. (Id. P 97). Additionally, the plaintiff claims that "[i]on implantation equipment is very complicated to design and build and requires long lead times to obtain customer qualification for use in fabrication facilities. There are also very few customers, most of whom are tied to their existing suppliers. This makes it difficult for new competitors to enter the market." (Id. P 17). Notwithstanding these hurdles, AIBT has developed a product called iPulsar, which allegedly "offers the purest ion beam at the optimum beam current." (Id. P 20). AIBT has offered its product for sale, and is in the process of completing customer qualification. (Id.).

The '156 Patent Application

The application that resulted in the '156 Patent was filed on June [11] 16, 2005, and the Patent was issued on November 27, 2007. (Id. PP 22, 28). The named inventors include defendants Kenneth H. Purser ("Purser"), Harald A. Enge ("Enge") and Norman L. Turner ("Turner") (collectively, the "defendant inventors"). (Compl. Ex. A at p.1). The '156 Patent issued from a continuation of U.S. Patent Application No. 11/154,085 (the "'085 Continuation Patent Application"), which claimed the benefit of U.S. Patent Application No. 10/619,702 (the "'702 Patent Application") filed on July 15, 2003. (Compl. PP 23, 25). The '702 Patent Application in turn claimed the benefit of U.S. Patent Application No. 60/396,322 (the "'322 Provisional Application"), which was filed on July 17, 2002. (Id. PP 23, 24).

The PTO allowed the claims in the '156 Patent because the Patent Examiner could not find a number of features of the claimed invention in the prior art. (Id. P 31; Compl. Ex. B at 2-5). Those features included but were not limited to "an upper magnetic core member," "a lower magnetic core member spaced apart from said upper core member," and "a plurality of focusing coil units distributed along" the core members. (Id.). AIBT claims that features of this "dual bar system" [12] described in the '156 Patent were disclosed in the prior art, but that the Examiner was unable to find them due to the defendants' intentional misrepresentations and omissions. (See Compl. PP 32-33). In particular, AIBT alleges, based on information and belief, that > since at least 2002 the Defendant inventors were aware of material prior art affecting the patentability of the claims applied for. The Defendant inventors included false and misleading statements regarding known invalidating prior art in their 322 Provisional Application, filed on July 17, 2002. The Defendant inventors repeated these same false and misleading statements in their 702 Patent Application, filed on July 15, 2003, as well as in their continuation application filed on June 16, 2005. Moreover, during the prosecution of the 702

A. Enge dated October 3, 2002 and February 12, 2003. Those letters are described [9] in the Complaint and were submitted to the court during oral argument.

> Patent Application and the 085 Continuation Application which resulted in the 156 Patent, the Defendant inventors intentionally decided not to disclose their knowledge that certain inventions, including the dual bar configuration being claimed in the 085 Continuation Application, were not patentable in light of known prior art.

(Compl. P 29). As detailed below, the plaintiff contends that [13] the alleged misstatements and omissions concerned U.S. Patent No. 3,541,328 (the "'328 Patent") [*68] that had been issued to Enge in 1970, as well as publications by Nicholas White, et al. and W.K.H. Panofsky, et al., a lens for ion beam control commonly known as the "Quad Magnet," an offer by Nicholas White to sell certain technology to Varian, and the identity of the inventors of the '156 Patent.

Alleged Misrepresentations Concerning the '328 Patent

The record shows that each of the applications submitted to the PTO contained references to the '328 Patent, and that the Patent Examiner considered the '328 Patent in connection with the issuance of the '156 Patent. (See Compl. Exs. E at 5 and G at 5; Def. Exs. 1-3). Nevertheless, AIBT alleges that the defendant inventors misled the PTO regarding the significance and scope of the '328 Patent.

AIBT claims, based on information and belief, that the inventors knew the '328 Patent anticipated one or more of the pending claims of the '156 Patent, but submitted Inventor Declarations to the PTO in which they attested that they were the true inventors of the subject matter claimed in the '156 Patent. (Compl. P 34). AIBT's belief is based upon two letters [14] that Purser sent to Enge years before the issuance of the '156 Patent. (Id. PP 36-37). The first letter, which is dated October 3, 2002, provides in relevant part as follows:

> I have been talking to Varian about the possibility of acquiring the patents that we have worked on during the last year ....
> One of the things that they are concerned about is whether there may be patent problems. Some time ago Vandepot or Berrian went to Varian wanting to sell intellectual property, which included some type of focusing element probably that I sense was centered around your dual bar-type quadrupole system, described in your 1970 patent 3,541,328.
> Although our patent application, which has been filed as a provisional in the form that is attached, is based upon the Panofsky frame structure, the feature that distinguishes our system from Panofsky's is the inclusion of a multiplicity of independent windings that can be [sic] independently excite a variety of correcting fields. (see claims 1, 9 and 10).
> ... When I reviewed your 1970 patent 3,541,328 it clearly refers to a plurality of coil units (claim 5) and a plurality of power supplies. So that for us to claim this feature, as [15] applied to a dual bar structure, as a feature of our most recent invention, is not possible ....

(Ltr. from Purser to Enge dated 10/03/02; see also Compl. P 36). The second letter, dated February 12, 2003, reads in relevant part:

> A review of a patent by you ... has turned up the distressing fact that while figure 6 within the patent shows individual multipole windings wound across the whole length of the corrector each of which is driven by an individual dedicated power supply, claim 4 clearly states that the currents through each of the individual primary coil modules is independently controllable.
> While I guess that this feature was never incorporated into an actual manufactured spectrograph, finding this claim at this late hour is unfortunate for our negotiations. The words, written so long ago, eliminate a major unique feature of the patent we have filed and are presently negotiating with Varian to purchase.

(Ltr. from Purser to Enge dated 2/12/03; see also Compl. P 37).

AIBT alleges that the inventors intentionally misled the PTO by failing to disclose [*69] their understanding, as revealed by the letters, that one or more of the claims of the '156 Patent were anticipated by the '328 Patent. [16] (Compl. P 43). Additionally, the plaintiff claims that the inventors intentionally deceived the PTO when they executed the Inventor Declarations attesting to their status as the true and only inventors of the inventions claimed in the '156 Patent. (Id. P 38). According to AIBT, the PTO reasonably relied on the false and misleading statements and Declarations, and would not have issued the '156 Patent with coverage that included the dual bar system described therein if the inventors had not misled it about the '328 Patent. (Id. PP 41-42, 44).

In addition to its claims that the inventors misled the PTO concerning their belief that claims of the '156 Patent were anticipated by the '328 Patent, AIBT alleges that the inventors deliberately misrepresented the scope of the '328 Patent to the PTO. In particular, AIBT alleges that during the prosecution of the '156 Patent, questions were raised as to whether the prior art included "apparatus[es] used for ion implanting comprising: a structure of magnetic material with an upper core and a lower core having long dimensions between their ends and with parallel axis" and having "a plurality of independent current excited coil units." (Id. P 45 (quotations [17] and citation omitted)). According to the plaintiff, the defendants were aware that the '328 Patent describes coils that are independently powered and controllable. (Id. P 47). However, because of the defendants' alleged misrepresentations, the PTO Examiner was unable to find this feature in the prior art. (Id. P 49).

AIBT contends that the defendant inventors carried out their deception by altering their description of the '328 Patent in the '085 Continuation Patent Application. [5] (Id. P 46). Originally, in their '322 Provisional Application, the inventors described Figure 6 of the '328 Patent as follows: "Referring to figure 6 of [the '328 Patent] it can be seen that for at least one embodiment the coils for each multipole are connected in series and powered as a single unit." (Compl., Ex. E at 5). According to AIBT, the defendants' use of the phrase "for at least one embodiment" illustrates their awareness that the '328 Patent describes two embodiments: one shown in Figure 6, and a second, more relevant embodiment, which is depicted in Figures 4 and 5 and described in Claim 4 of the '328 Patent as an apparatus "'wherein said variable magnetic means is arranged so that the current [18] in each of said plurality of electromagnet means is independently controllable.'" (Compl. P 46 (emphasis in original)). However, in their '085 Continuation Patent Application, the defendant inventors altered their description of the prior art by removing the phrase "for at least one embodiment" and describing Figure 6 of the '328 Patent as follows: "Specifically, in figure 6 of this patent it can be seen the coils for each multipole are connected in series and powered as a single unit." (Compl., Ex. G at 5). AIBT contends that by doing so, the inventors misleadingly suggested to the PTO "that the '328 Patent as a whole only describes coils that must be powered as a single unit" and prevented the Patent Examiner from discovering that the prior art disclosed a dual bar system with coils that are independently powered and controllable. [*70] (Compl. PP 47, 49). It further claims that the PTO "would not have issued the 156 Patent with coverage that included the dual bar system as described in the 156 Patent" if the defendant inventors had not made these alleged misrepresentations. (Id. P 50).

Alleged Misrepresentations Regarding the White and Panofsky Publications

AIBT also claims that the defendant inventors made misrepresentations and omissions regarding a 1999 article by Nicholas White, et al. entitled "The Control of Uniformity in Parallel Ribbon Ion Beams up to 24 Inches in Size" (the "White Reference") and an article by L.N. Hand and W.K.H. Panofsky entitled "Magnetic Quadrupole with Rectangular Aperture" (the "Panofsky Reference"), which was published in 1959. (Id. PP 51-61; see also Compl. Exs. H & I). The record shows that the defendant inventors referred to both the White Reference and the Panofsky Reference in the specification of the '156 Patent, and that the inventors listed the Panofsky Reference on disclosure statements filed with the PTO. (Id. P 51; Compl. Ex. 1 at Col. 2, ll. 24-27; Def. Exs. 2 & 3). Nevertheless, the plaintiff [20] contends that the defendant inventors failed to disclose these materials to the PTO as prior art and made material misrepresentations regarding their scope. (Compl. P 61).

AIBT claims that the White Reference discusses ion implantation devices comprised of "a structure of magnetic material with an upper core and a lower core having long dimensions between their ends and with a parallel axis and having a plurality of independent current excited coil units." (Id. P 51). It further claims that despite their knowledge of the White Reference, the defendant inventors misled the PTO about the contents and scope of the article in the '156 Patent specification and otherwise failed to disclose the relevant portions of the Reference to the PTO. (Id. PP 53-55). Specifically, AIBT alleges that the full White Reference "was and remains material to the patentability of the 156 Patent" but that "[t]he Defendant inventors intentionally failed to disclose this reference to the PTO as required by 37 C.F.R. § 1.56(a) [6] [R-2] in any Information Disclosure Statement PTO form 1449, including those filed on August 25, 2005 and November 7, 2006." (Id. PP 54-55). It also alleges, based on information and belief, [21] that "the Defendant inventors intentionally failed to provide the PTO with a complete copy of this material reference." (Id.).

[5] Although the plaintiff alleges that the defendants misled the PTO by changing their description of the [19] '328 Patent in the "'702 Patent Application," the exhibits attached to the Complaint demonstrate that the defendants changed their description of the '328 Patent in the '085 Continuation Patent Application. (See Compl. PP 46-47; Compl. Exs. E at 5 and G at 5). This court has construed AIBT's allegations in accordance with the exhibits.

The Complaint contains nearly identical allegations concerning the Panofsky Reference. (See id. PP 56-60). Thus, AIBT claims that although the Panofsky Reference disclosed the same types of devices as the White Reference, and was material to the patentability of the '156 Patent, the defendant inventors misrepresented the contents and scope of the Panofsky Reference in their patent specification, and intentionally failed to disclose it to the PTO in connection with the patent application process. (Id.). AIBT contends that as a result of the defendant inventors' intentional misrepresentations and omissions regarding the White and Panofsky References, the PTO was unaware that the prior art disclosed a dual bar system with coils that are independently powered and controllable, and the defendant inventors were able "to fraudulently obtain [22] issuance of the 156 Patent." (Id. PP 61, 63). It also asserts [*71] that the PTO "would not have issued the 156 Patent with coverage that included the dual bar system as described in the 156 Patent" if the defendant inventors had not misled it about these publications or if they had provided full copies of the References to the PTO. (Id. P 64).

Alleged Omissions Concerning the Quad Magnet and Offer to Sell Technology

In addition to the alleged misrepresentations and omissions described above, AIBT claims that the defendants acted fraudulently by failing to disclose material prior art known as the "Quad Magnet" and by failing to disclose information regarding Nicholas White's offer to sell Varian certain technology, which AIBT refers to as the "White 2 Bar Lens." It asserts that the PTO would not have issued the '156 Patent with coverage that included the dual bar system described in the Patent if the defendants had provided this information to the PTO. (Id. PP 73, 86).

According to the plaintiff, the Quad Magnet is a rectangular lens used for ion beam control, "which allowed the user to steer, deflect, or focus an ion beam, and to shut-off current to the excitable coils wrapping the short [23] parallel magnetic cores that separated and joined the long parallel magnetic cores of the lens frame." (Id. P 65). AIBT claims that the Quad Magnet was manufactured and sold by General Ionex Corporation, a company that AIBT believes was founded and run by defendant Purser. (Id.). Purser allegedly sold a Quad Magnet to Nicholas White ("White") in 1984. (Id. P 66).

AIBT contends that the Quad Magnet was and remains material to the patentability of the '156 Patent because it anticipates or renders obvious the invention disclosed in the '156 Patent. (Id. PP 67-68). In particular, it alleges that the Quad Magnet discloses features that are found in the claimed invention, including "an upper magnetic core member, a lower magnetic core member, and a plurality of focusing coil units distributed along these core members." (Id. PP 71-72 (internal quotations omitted)). AIBT claims that despite Purser's and the other inventors' knowledge that the Quad Magnet constituted material prior art, they intentionally failed to list it on their disclosure statements filed with the PTO. (Id. P 69). According to the plaintiff, the defendant inventors were able to obtain issuance of the '156 Patent as a result [24] of this omission. (Id. P 70).

The White 2 Bar Lens was invented by White and allegedly consists of "an apparatus for focusing, deflecting and aberration-correcting of ion optical components comprising a structure manufactured from only two magnetic cores." (Id. P 74). AIBT alleges that in about February 2003, White authored a PowerPoint presentation in which he described the White 2 Bar Lens, and that on March 6, 2003, White delivered the PowerPoint presentation to Varian, thereby disclosing his invention to the defendants. (Id. PP 76-77). AIBT further alleges that from February to August 2003, White offered to sell the technology to Varian. (Id. P 78). Thus, Varian allegedly became aware of the invention, and White's offer to sell, prior to the July 15, 2003 priority date of the claims of the '156 Patent. (Id. P 80).

[6] 37 C.F.R. § 1.56(a) addresses the duty of "[e]ach individual associated with the filing and prosecution of a patent application … to disclose to the [PTO] all information known to that individual to be material to patentability …."

AIBT asserts that White's offer to sell "anticipates or renders obvious the purported invention(s) disclosed in the 156 Patent because it described an invention described in the 156 Patent, and, as such, was and remains highly material to the patentability of the 156 Patent." (Id. P 81). In particular, AIBT claims that as in the case of the Quad Magnet, the White 2 Bar [25] Lens discloses "an upper magnetic core member, a lower magnetic core member [*72] spaced apart from said upper core member, and a plurality of coil units distributed along these core members." (Id. P 84 (internal quotations omitted)). Furthermore, AIBT contends that the defendants intentionally failed to include White's offer to sell his technology on its disclosure statements, as required by 37 C.F.R. § 1.56(a). (Id. P 82). According to the plaintiff, the defendant inventors were able "to fraudulently obtain issuance of the 156 Patent" as a result of this omission. (Id. PP 82-83).

Alleged Misrepresentations Regarding Identity of Inventors

Finally, AIBT claims that the defendant inventors misled the PTO by failing to identify White as one of the inventors of the subject matter claimed in the '156 Patent. Specifically, AIBT alleges that the defendants "knew, or should have known, that Nicholas White contributed to the conception of at least one claim limitation of the 702 Patent Application, the 085 Continuation Patent Application, and the 156 Patent." (Id. P 88). It further alleges, based upon information and belief, that the defendant inventors deliberately and knowingly, and with an intent [26] to deceive the PTO, omitted to list White as a contributing inventor during prosecution of the '156 Patent, and failed to correct their omission thereafter. (Id. P 87). AIBT contends that as a result, Varian knew that the '156 Patent was unenforceable at the time it filed the infringement action. (Id. P 89).

The Infringement Action

As indicated above, Varian initiated its infringement action against AIBT on March 25, 2008. (See Docket No. 1 in C.A. No. 08-10487-NG). AIBT alleges, based on information and belief, that at the time it filed its lawsuit, Varian was aware that the defendant inventors had procured the '156 Patent by fraud on the PTO and that the Patent was invalid. (Compl. PP 91-93). However, Varian allegedly elected to proceed with the lawsuit in order to block AIBT, a start-up company, from competing in the ion beam equipment market and to preserve or increase its monopoly position in that market. (Id. PP 91, 101). In fact, according to the plaintiff, Varian filed the infringement action almost immediately after AIBT's only existing customer, Taiwan Semiconductor Manufacturing Company Limited ("TSMC"), agreed to purchase iPulsar equipment from AIBT. (Id. P 102). AIBT claims [27] that TSMC is one of the biggest and most important customers in the market for ion beam equipment, and that AIBT competes directly with Varian for TSMC's business. (Id.).

At issue in this case is whether AIBT has alleged that it suffered antitrust harm as a result of Varian's infringement action. As detailed above, Varian's claims against AIBT in that action were dismissed with prejudice pursuant to a covenant not to sue. (See Docket No. 62 in C.A. No. 08-10487-NG). Nevertheless, AIBT alleges that it suffered harm because "the Defendants' baseless suit delayed AIBT's entry into the relevant market." (Compl. P 103).

Specifically, the plaintiff alleges that as a result of Varian's infringement action, its sole customer, TSMC, required the plaintiff to perform an in-depth analysis of its iPulsar product in order to demonstrate that there were no infringement issues. (Id. P 104). AIBT claims that this requirement delayed qualification of its product, and consequently, postponed AIBT's entry into the ion beam equipment market. (Id. PP 103-104). Additionally, AIBT allegedly had to divert personnel from its work integrating the iPulsar into TSMC's system in order to respond to Varian's infringement [28] claims. (Id.). Thus, Varian's infringement action allegedly hindered AIBT's [*73] ability to provide TSMC with technical service and assistance. (Id. P 103).

Although TSMC was AIBT's only existing customer, the plaintiff alleges that Varian's infringement action also caused delay in the potential sale to an entity known as PowerChip Semiconductor Corporation ("PSC"). (Id. P 105). Specifically, AIBT claims that in 2008, it provided PSC with a demonstration plan of the iPulsar product. (Id.). However, due to PSC's concerns about AIBT's possible infringement of the '156 Patent, the demonstration plan was not activated until after the infringement action was dismissed. (Id.).

AIBT contends that the alleged delays caused by Varian's infringement action > caused injury to AIBT and the relevant market by: (1) subjecting AIBT to the costs and burdens of defending itself against a patent infringement action based on the fraudulently-procured and invalid 156 Patent, the costs associated with providing its customer an analysis of AIBT's technology, and the costs created by AIBT's delayed entry into the relevant market, (2) creating doubt in the minds of AIBT's sole current customer, (3) causing delay to [29] AIBT's negotiations with its sole current customer and slowing down AIBT's technical service and assistance to its sole current customer and the progress of research and development by depleting AIBT's human resources, (4) hindering AIBT's ability to convince its sole current customer to accept and purchase AIBT's product, thereby damaging AIBT's relationship with its sole current customer, which may ultimately prevent the qualification of AIBT's current product, and therefore, eliminate AIBT's current product from the market-place, (5) potentially preventing the introduction of a superior product with lower sale price into the marketplace, and (6) providing Defendant Varian with the ability to raise and maintain prices above competitive levels.

(Id. P 103). According to AIBT, it was only after the court dismissed Varian's infringement claims against it that TSMC began to accept its iPulsar product and PSC resumed its interest in evaluating AIBT's product. (Id. P 106).

III. ANALYSIS

A. Motion to Dismiss Standard of Review

HN2[] Motions to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) test the sufficiency of the pleadings. Thus, when [30] confronted with a motion to dismiss, the court accepts as true all well-pleaded facts and draws all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. Cooperman, 171 F.3d at 46. Dismissal is only appropriate if the pleadings, so viewed, fail to support "'a plausible entitlement to relief.'" Rodriguez-Ortiz v. Margo Caribe, Inc., 490 F.3d 92, 95 (1st Cir. 2007) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 559, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1967, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007)).

Two underlying principles must guide the court's assessment as to the adequacy of the pleadings to support a claim for relief. Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 268 (1st Cir. 2009). "'First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice.' Such conclusory statements are 'not entitled to the assumption of truth.'" Id. (quoting Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009)) (internal citations omitted). "Second, only a [*74] complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss." Id. [31] (quoting Ashcroft, 129 S. Ct. at 1950). "This second principle recognizes that the court's assessment of the pleadings is 'context specific,' requiring 'the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense.' '[W]here the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged -- but it has not show[n] -- that the pleader is entitled to relief.'" Id. (quoting Ashcroft, 129 S. Ct. at 1950) (internal quotations and citation omitted; alterations in original).

B. Sufficiency of AIBT's Fraud Allegations

Under the law of the Federal Circuit,

> HN3[] [a] patentee who brings an infringement suit may be subject to antitrust liability for the anti-competitive effects of that suit if the alleged infringer (the antitrust plaintiff) proves (1) that the asserted patent was obtained through knowing and willful fraud within the meaning of Walker Process Equipment, Inc. v. Food Machinery & Chemical Corp., 382 U.S. 172, 177, 86 S. Ct. at 350, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247, 147 USPQ 404, 407 (1965), or (2) that the infringement suit was a mere sham to cover what is actually nothing more than an attempt to interfere directly with the business relationships of [32] a competitor.

Nobelpharma AB v. Implant Innovations, Inc., 141 F.3d 1059, 1068 (Fed. Cir. 1998) (quotations and citations omitted). [7] In the instant case, AIBT claims that Varian is liable for Walker Process fraud and "sham litigation" because it attempted by way of its infringement action to enforce a patent that was procured by fraud on the PTO. (See Compl. PP 1, 90-93). By its motion to dismiss, Varian contends that all of AIBT's antitrust claims must be dismissed because AIBT has failed to plead fraud with particularity. For the reasons that follow, this court concludes that AIBT's allegations regarding the '328 Patent and the Panofsky Reference are insufficient to support a claim of fraud on the PTO, but that the plaintiff has stated a claim for fraud based on the defendants' alleged failure to disclose the White Reference, the Quad Magnet, White's offer to sell, and White's identity as an inventor. [8]

[*75] Requirements for Pleading Fraud

HN6[] "The first barrier for a Walker Process claimant to clear is the requirement that the patent be obtained through actual fraud upon the PTO." Dippin' Dots, Inc. v. Mosey, 476 F.3d 1337, 1346 (Fed. Cir. 2007). This requires "higher threshold showings of both materiality and intent than are required to show inequitable [35] conduct." Id. Accordingly,

> [as a]pplied to patent prosecution, fraud requires (1) a false representation or deliberate omission of a fact material to patentability, (2) made with the intent to deceive the patent examiner, (3) on which the examiner justifiably relied in granting the patent, and (4) but for which misrepresentation or deliberate omission the patent would not have been granted.

C.R. Bard, Inc. v. M3 Sys., Inc., 157 F.3d 1340, 1364 (Fed. Cir. 1998).

Additionally, "[i]t is undisputed that HN7[] fraud-related claims arising in a patent context must be pled with the specificity required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b)." The Hertz Corp. v. Enter. Rent-A-Car Co., 557 F. Supp. 2d 185, 194 (D. Mass. 2008). This "means that [the] complaint must specify the time, place, and content of an alleged false

[7] HN4[] The issue "whether conduct in procuring or enforcing a patent is sufficient to strip a patentee of its immunity from the antitrust laws is to be decided as a question of Federal Circuit law." Nobelpharma AB, 141 F.3d at 1068. However, "issues involving other elements of antitrust [33] law such as relevant market, market power, damages, etc.," which "are not unique to patent law," are governed by the law of the regional circuit. Id.

[8] In arguing that all of AIBT's antitrust claims are subject to dismissal for failure to plead fraud with particularity, Varian makes no distinction between AIBT's Walker Process claims and its sham litigation claims. (See Def. Mem. (Docket No. 9) at 10). Similarly, AIBT has made no such distinction in the body of its memorandum in opposition to the motion to dismiss, arguing instead that its Complaint contains sufficient allegations to plead fraud on the PTO. (See Pl. Opp. Mem. (Docket No. 11) at 6-15). Contrary to its position in the earlier litigation, AIBT argues in a footnote that the standards for these claims differ, and that it is not required to establish fraud in order to prevail on its sham litigation claims. (See id. at 7 n.3). However, the First Circuit has "repeatedly held that HN5[] arguments raised only in a footnote or in a perfunctory manner are waived." Nat'l Foreign Trade Council v. Natsios, 181 F.3d 38, 61 n.17 (1st Cir. 1999), aff'd sub nom. Crosby v. Nat'l Foreign Trade Council, 530 U.S. 363, 120 S. Ct. 2288, 147 L. Ed. 2d 352 (2000). [34] See also Redondo-Borges v. U.S. Dep't of Housing & Urban Dev., 421 F.3d 1, 6 (1st Cir. 2005) ("Few principles are more sacrosanct in this circuit than the principle that 'issues adverted to in a perfunctory manner, unaccompanied by some effort at developed argumentation, are deemed waived.'") (quoting United States v. Zannino, 895 F.2d 1, 17 (1st Cir. 1990)). Accordingly, AIBT's passing argument is insufficient to warrant separate analyses of AIBT's fraud claims and its sham litigation claims. In any event, it is clear from the Complaint that the factual basis for all of AIBT's claims is that Varian, by its infringement action, was attempting to enforce a patent that it knew had been obtained by fraud on the PTO. (See Compl. PP 90-93). Therefore, the parties' arguments relating to AIBT's fraud claims control the sham litigation claims as well.

Allegations Concerning the '328 Patent

Varian contends that AIBT's allegations regarding the '328 Patent do not allege fraud as a matter of law because the inventors disclosed and accurately described the '328 Patent to the PTO. [9] This [*76] court agrees, and finds that the plaintiff cannot sustain a claim based on allegations that the inventors misled the PTO about the '328 Patent.

As described above, AIBT claims that the defendant inventors engaged in fraud by filing false Inventor Declarations with the PTO. It claims [38] that the Declarations were false and misleading because by executing them, the individual defendants attested to their status as the true inventors of the '156 Patent even though they knew that one or more of the claims contained therein was anticipated by the '328 Patent. This court finds that any suggestion that the defendants were attempting to mislead or otherwise deceive the PTO by their conduct in filing the Inventor Declarations is defeated by the undisputed fact that they disclosed the '328 Patent to the PTO, and the Patent Examiner considered the '328 Patent before allowing the claims of the '156 Patent.

The record shows that the defendant inventors disclosed the '328 Patent in each of the applications that they submitted to the PTO, and in disclosure statements filed with the PTO. (See Compl. Exs. E at 5 and G at 5; Def. Exs. 1-3). The inventors even alerted the PTO to the fact that the '328 Patent described a "dual rod design" similar to the alleged configuration of the invention of the '156 Patent. (See Def. Ex. 1 at 5). In addition, the record shows that on March 31, 2005, and again on March 4, 2007, the Patent Examiner initialed references to the '328 Patent on the defendants' [39] disclosure statements. (Def. Exs. 2-3). These facts compel the presumption "that the examiner did consider the reference." Molins PLC v. Textron, Inc., 48 F.3d 1172, 1184 (Fed. Cir. 1995). See also C.R. Bard, Inc., 157 F.3d at 1366-67 (rejecting charge of fraud where prosecution history revealed that patent holder disclosed prior art before issuance of patent and patent examiner initialed that he had considered the reference). Thus, the PTO was able to make a determination, based on the defendant inventors' own disclosures of the prior art, as to whether the '328 Patent anticipated the claims of the '156 Patent. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff has not stated a plausible claim that the defendant inventors, by signing and filing the Inventor Declarations, were attempting to deceive the PTO regarding the significance of the '328 Patent. See Nobelpharma AB, 141 F.3d at 1070 (HN9[]) to establish Walker Process fraud, "a misrepresentation or omission must evidence a clear intent to deceive the examiner and thereby cause the PTO to grant an invalid patent").

[9] In its Reply memorandum, Varian suggests that collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion, applies to AIBT's claims concerning the '328 Patent "because AIBT has not added any substantively [37] new facts or arguments about the '328 patent beyond those already held insufficient as a matter of law to allege fraud[.]" (Def. Reply Mem. (Docket No. 15) at 4-5). This court disagrees. The Complaint contains new factual allegations regarding the '328 Patent, including facts regarding the substance of two letters from Purser to Enge, as well as facts regarding the changes to the description of Figure 6 of the '328 Patent. No such allegations were included in Varian's counterclaim in the infringement action, and this court has not previously considered whether they support AIBT's claims of fraud on the PTO. Accordingly, application of collateral estoppel principles would not be appropriate. See Keystone Shipping Co. v. New England Power Co., 109 F.3d 46, 51 (1st Cir. 1997) (HN8[]) "The principle of collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion … bars relitigation of any factual or legal issue that was actually decided in previous litigation between the parties, whether on the same or a different claim.") (emphasis in original; quotations and citations omitted).

AIBT's reliance on the October 3, 2002 and February 12, 2003 letters from Purser to Enge does not compel a different conclusion. HN10[] "An [40] inventor's opinions regarding a prior art device known to the examiner are not within the domain of material that must be submitted to the PTO." Mentor H/S, Inc. v. Med. Device Alliance, Inc., 244 F.3d 1365, 1378 (Fed. Cir. 2001). Therefore, the defendants' conduct in submitting the Inventor Declarations without divulging any earlier doubts about the patentability of their invention did not render their statements to the PTO misleading. See id. (district court erred by inferring an intent to deceive PTO based on applicant's failure to provide [*77] PTO with inventor opinions about prior art device). [10]

Nor do AIBT's allegations regarding the inventors' removal of the phrase "for at least one embodiment" from their description of Figure 6 of the '328 Patent support a plausible claim of fraud on the PTO. To the extent AIBT claims that the defendants chose to describe a less relevant embodiment, while remaining silent about other, more relevant embodiments, "[AIBT] has provided no support for the proposition that a patent holder who discloses a reference to the PTO can be found liable for Walker Process fraud solely based on an alleged failure to bring every detail of the disclosed reference to the examiner's attention." *Chip-Mender, Inc. v. Sherwin-Williams Co., No. C 05-3465 PJH, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2176, 2006 WL 13058, at 7 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 3, 2006). Moreover, to the extent AIBT contends that the defendants' removal of language from the '085 Continuation Patent Application constituted an affirmative effort to deceive the Patent Examiner regarding the scope of the invention, [42] this too is insufficient to support a claim of fraud on the PTO in this case. The inventors' original description of Figure 6 was before the PTO as part of the '322 Provisional Application, and nothing about the inventors' altered description of Figure 6 in their '085 Continuation Patent Application suggests that the '328 Patent describes only one embodiment. (See Compl. Exs. E at 5; G at 5). Moreover, as detailed above, it is undisputed that the entire Patent was before the PTO, and that the Patent Examiner considered it. Thus, the Patent Examiner would have seen that the '328 Patent describes more than one embodiment, including the alleged "more relevant embodiment" depicted in Figures 4 and 5, which appear on the same page of the Patent as Figure 6. (See Compl. Ex. F; Compl. P 46).

The facts alleged in this case are not analogous to the circumstances described in Semiconductor Energy Lab. Co. v. Samsung Elecs. Co., 204 F.3d 1368 (Fed. Cir. 2000), on which AIBT relies. In Semiconductor Energy Lab., the applicant submitted a 29-page reference in its original Japanese, "along with a one-page, partial translation focusing on less material portions and a concise statement directed to [43] these less material portions[.]" Id. at 1377. Based on this conduct, the court determined that the applicant had "left the examiner with the impression that the examiner did not need to conduct any further translation or investigation", and it concluded that the applicant had "deliberately deceived the examiner" and "constructively withheld the reference from the PTO." Id. The court also rejected the applicant's contention that the patent examiner must have read and understood the untranslated reference, stating > [t]hough the examiner is indeed presumed to have done his job correctly, there is no support in the law for a presumption that the examiner will understand foreign languages such as Japanese or will request a costly complete [*78] translation of every submitted foreign language document, particularly in the absence of any reason to do so. Rather, as MPEP § 609C(2) reveals, the examiner's understanding of a foreign reference is generally limited to that which he or she can glean from the applicant's concise statement ….

Id. No similar situation would have restricted the Patent Examiner's ability to review the entire '328 Patent in this case, and there are no alleged facts to defeat [44] the presumption that the Patent Examiner did just that.

[10] The Inventor Declarations submitted to the PTO in this case are not comparable to declarations submitted to the PTO in eSpeed, Inc. v. Brokertec USA, L.L.C., 480 F.3d 1129 (Fed. Cir. 2007), on which AIBT relies. There the court upheld the district court's conclusion that there was an intent to deceive the PTO where the applicant had filed a "blizzard of paper" describing the prior art, along with a declaration containing "an outright false statement" regarding that art. eSpeed, Inc., 480 F.3d at 1137-38. Here, the plaintiff alleges that the Declarations were false only because they were [41] inconsistent with an opinion that had been expressed by an inventor, which opinion was not required to be disclosed to the PTO. Moreover, as detailed above, the facts provided to the PTO regarding the '328 Patent were not "outright false."

The plaintiff points to other cases in which the courts have found fraud based on the misleading disclosures of English language references. However, the applicants' deceptive conduct in those cases consisted of burying the most pertinent prior art among large volumes of less relevant prior art. See eSpeed, Inc. v. BrokerTec USA, L.L.C., 480 F.3d 1129, 1137 (Fed. Cir. 2007) ("blizzard of paper" submitted to PTO in conjunction with declaration containing outright false statement regarding significance of prior art "left the examiner with the impression that the examiner did not need to conduct any further … investigation") (quotations and citation omitted; punctuation in original); Golden Valley Microwave Foods, Inc. v. Weaver Popcorn Co., Inc., 837 F. Supp. 1444, 1477 (N.D. Ind. 1992) (holding that it is "a violation of the duty of candor and fair dealing with the [PTO] for an applicant … to disclose a pertinent prior art patent reference to the examiner in such a way as to 'bury' it or its disclosures in a series of disclosures of less relevant prior art references, so that the examiner would be likely to ignore the entire list [45] and permit the application to issue"), aff'd, 11 F.3d 1072 (Fed. Cir. 1993); Penn Yan Boats, Inc. v. Sea Lark Boats, Inc., 359 F. Supp. 948, 964-65 (S.D. Fla. 1972) (failure to cite most pertinent prior art, and attempt "to bury" relevant patent "in a long list of allegedly old prior art patents in the hope that the Patent Examiner … would ignore the list and permit the [applicant's] patent to issue" constituted deliberate misrepresentations to the patent office), aff'd, 479 F.2d 1328 (5th Cir. 1973). No such comparable conduct has been alleged here with respect to the '328 Patent. Accordingly, this court concludes that AIBT's allegations regarding the '328 Patent do not state a claim for fraud.

Allegations Regarding Other Prior Art References

Varian argues that this court should dismiss AIBT's fraud claims to the extent that they rely on allegations concerning the White and Panofsky References, the Quad Magnet, White's offer to sell and the failure to disclose White as an inventor. Specifically, it contends that the court has already considered these allegations in connection with the motion to dismiss AIBT's counterclaims in the infringement action, and found them insufficient to support [46] a claim for fraud. (Def. Mem. at 14-15). Furthermore, Varian asserts that in any event, AIBT has failed to allege facts showing that the defendants "misrepresented or omitted material facts concerning these items with the specific intent to deceive the PTO." (Id. at 15). AIBT's Complaint, including its allegations relating to the various prior art references, is more detailed than its counterclaims in the infringement action. Moreover, in contrast to its memorandum in opposition to the motion to dismiss its counterclaims in the prior action, in the instant case AIBT has specifically addressed all of the prior art references, and not simply the '328 Patent, in its brief in opposition to the present motion to dismiss. Thus, the issue as to the sufficiency of the allegations regarding these other prior art references is squarely before the court for the first time [*79] here, and this court finds that it is appropriate to address it. For the reasons detailed below, this court concludes that the plaintiff's allegations regarding the Panofsky Reference fail to support a claim of fraud on the PTO, but its allegations regarding the remaining references are adequate to survive Varian's motion to [47] dismiss.

The Panofsky Reference is attached as Exhibit I to the Complaint. It consists of an article entitled "Magnetic Quadrupole with Rectangular Aperture," which was written by L.N. Hand and W.K.H. Panofsky, and was published in the October 1959 issue of The Review of Scientific Instruments at Volume 30, Number 10. (Compl. Ex. I). Notwithstanding the plaintiff's allegations to the contrary, the record establishes that the defendant inventors included the Panofsky Reference on their list of prior art references disclosed to the PTO, and that the Patent Examiner considered it in connection with the application for the '156 Patent. (Def. Exs. 2-3). For the reasons detailed previously with respect to the '328 Patent, these facts belie the plaintiff's claim that the defendant inventors intended to mislead the PTO and defeat the plaintiff's effort to allege fraud on the PTO.

With respect to the White Reference, it is undisputed that the defendant inventors discussed it briefly in the background to the invention section of the '156 Patent. (See Compl. P 52; Compl. Ex. A at Col. 2, ll. 24-31). While this might suggest that the defendants did not intend to withhold the Reference from the PTO, [48] AIBT claims that the inventors were obligated to disclose the full publication to the PTO, and that their failure to do so constituted fraud. (See Compl. P 64). Varian argues that AIBT's claims must be dismissed because it has failed to allege facts manifesting an intent to deceive the PTO. (Def. Mem. at 9; Def. Reply Mem. at 7). However, this court finds that the plaintiff's allegations are sufficient to support an inference that the defendants acted with the requisite intent.

AIBT claims that the full White Reference was material to the patentability of the '156 Patent because it disclosed a dual bar system with independently powered and controllable coils. (See Compl. PP 51, 54, 63). The fact that the inventors discussed the Reference in the '156 Patent specification indicates that they were aware of its contents, and consequently, its relevance. However, nothing in their discussion addressed the dual bar structure allegedly disclosed by the White Reference. (See Compl. Ex. A at Col. 2, ll. 24-31). Furthermore, as alleged in the Complaint, "[t]he Defendant inventors intentionally failed to disclose this reference to the PTO as required by 37 C.F.R. § 1.56(a) . . . in any Information [49] Disclosure Statement PTO form 1449 . . . ." (Compl. P 55). Thus, although it is undisputed that the defendant inventors disclosed the existence of the White Reference in their patent specification, this court concludes that the allegations of their failure to include it on their disclosure statements or to otherwise bring pertinent parts of the Reference to the Patent Examiner's attention, despite their knowledge of its significance, are sufficient to state a claim that the defendants intended to mislead the PTO. See Golden Valley Microwave Foods, Inc., 837 F. Supp. at 1477 (HN11[] "prior art has to be brought to the attention of the examiner in an adequate fashion") (quotations and citations omitted).

This court also concludes that the plaintiff's allegations regarding the defendant inventors' failure to disclose the Quad Magnet and White's offer to sell the White 2 Bar Lens are sufficient to state a claim [*80] for fraud on the PTO. In both cases, AIBT has alleged facts indicating that the undisclosed information concerned technology containing features which anticipated the '156 Patent or would have rendered it obvious. (See Compl. PP 65, 67, 72, 74, 81, 85). It has also alleged facts showing [50] that the defendant inventors knew of those features, and consequently, knew that the Quad Magnet and the offer to sell the White 2 Bar Lens were relevant to the patentability of the '156 Patent. (See id. PP 65-66, 69, 74-79). AIBT claims that nevertheless, the defendant inventors intentionally failed to cite the Quad Magnet and White's offer for sale "to the PTO as required by 37 C.F.R. § 1.56(a) [R-2] in any Information Disclosure Statement PTO form 1449, . . . and did so with the intent to deceive." (Id. PP 69, 82). It also claims that the PTO would not have allowed the '156 Patent "with coverage that included the dual bar system as described in the 156 Patent" if the inventors had made the requisite disclosures. (Id. PP 73, 86). These allegations go "beyond a simple failure to disclose to the Patent Office prior art that the examiner would have deemed material." Hydril Co. LP v. Grant Prideco LP, 474 F.3d 1344, 1349 (Fed. Cir. 2007). As the Federal Circuit determined when presented with similar claims in Hydril Co., such allegations are adequate to support a claim for Walker Process fraud. See id. (allegations that defendant had fraudulently obtained issuance of its patent "by failing [51] to disclose to the USPTO material prior art of which it was aware (which the complaint described) and that the . . . Patent as issued would not have been granted to [defendant] had [defendant] not omitted from its disclosures such known information on the prior art" stated claim for violation of antitrust law) (internal quotations and punctuation omitted).

Varian argues that Hydril is not controlling here because the Federal Circuit was not faced with a direct challenge to the suffficiency of the allegations of fraud, but, rather, had to determine whether the Hydril complaint alleged the minimal level of enforcement activity by the patent holder against the plaintiff to state a claim for Walker Process fraud. (Def. Reply Mem. at 6). Therefore, Varian contends, the Federal Circuit's analysis of the factual allegations of fraud and its conclusion that "the conduct alleged in Hydril's complaint could constitute Walker Process fraud is 'nothing more than dicta.'" Id.; see Hydril, 474 F.3d at 1349. This argument is without merit. Regardless whether the Hydril court's analysis of the fraud allegations before it is binding as precedent, its conclusion that the plaintiff had stated a claim [52] for Walker Process fraud based on similar allegations as those alleged here is persuasive. This court finds that at this initial stage in the litigation, AIBT has pled enough to pursue its claims for fraud based on the alleged failure to disclose the Quad Magnet and White's offer to sell.

Varian also contends that Hydril is "legally irrelevant" because it was decided before the Supreme Court issued its decision in Bell Atl. Corp., which toughened the requirements for stating a cause of action under Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a) by requiring plaintiffs to allege "a plausible entitlement to relief." (Def. Reply Mem. at 6-7). Again, Varian's argument is unpersuasive. As an initial matter, the fraud allegations in Hydril would have been subject to the heightened pleading requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b). Moreover, Varian has not shown that AIBT's allegations fail to state "a plausible entitlement to relief." Bell Atl. Corp., 550 U.S. 559, 127 S. Ct. at 1967. As described above, AIBT has alleged facts, not merely conclusions, to show why the defendant inventors would have understood the relevance of the Quad Magnet [*81] and White's offer to sell to the patentability of their invention. It has also [53] alleged facts showing that despite their disclosure obligations, the defendant inventors failed to include this information in their list of references submitted to the PTO. Those facts make it possible for a reasonable fact finder to conclude that the defendants were attempting to hide pertinent information from the PTO. Thus, they support a claim for relief under the applicable pleading standards.

Finally, this court concludes that AIBT has stated a claim based on the defendant inventors' failure to name White as an inventor of at least one claim limitation of the '156 Patent. In its Complaint, the plaintiff alleges that the White 2 Bar Lens consisted of a "structure manufactured from only two magnetic cores" and "described an invention described in the 156 Patent[.]" (Compl. PP 81, 85). Allegedly, defendant Purser became aware of these features when White disclosed his invention in a PowerPoint presentation that was delivered to Varian in March 2003. (Id. PP 76-77). However, the defendant inventors "knowingly and intentionally failed to name Nicholas White as a co-inventor of at least one claim limitation of the 156 Patent," thereby rendering it unenforceable. (Id. P 89). This court [54] finds that the defendants' alleged failure to name White as a co-inventor despite their knowledge of his contribution to the claims of the '156 Patent is sufficient to state a claim that the defendants were attempting to deceive the PTO.

C. Sufficiency of Allegations of Antitrust Injury

Varian has also moved to dismiss all of AIBT's antitrust claims for failure to allege antitrust harm. As detailed below, this court finds that in its new Complaint AIBT has sufficiently alleged that Varian's infringement action harmed the competitive process by delaying AIBT's entry into the ion implantation equipment market. Therefore, this court recommends that Varian's motion to dismiss for failure to allege antitrust injury be denied.

HN12[] "A private antitrust plaintiff, in addition to having to show injury-in-fact and proximate cause, must allege, and eventually prove, 'antitrust injury.'" In re Cardizem CD Antitrust Litig., 332 F.3d 896, 909 (6th Cir. 2003) (quoting Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 697, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977)). "Antitrust injury" is "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' [55] acts unlawful. The injury should reflect the anticompetitive effect either of the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation. It should, in short, be 'the type of loss that the claimed violations . . . would be likely to cause.'" Brunswick Corp., 429 U.S. at 489, 97 S. Ct. at 697-98 (quoting Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, 395 U.S. 100, 125, 89 S. Ct. 1562, 1577, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129 (1969)). As the First Circuit has explained, > a practice is not "anticompetitive" simply because it harms competitors. After all, almost all business activity, desirable and undesirable alike, seeks to advance a firm's fortunes at the expense of its competitor's. Rather, a practice is "anticompetitive" only if it harms the competitive process. It harms that process when it obstructs the achievement of competition's basic goals -- lower prices, better products, and more efficient production methods.

Town of Concord, Mass. v. Boston Edison Co., 915 F.2d 17, 21-22 (1st Cir. 1990) (internal citations omitted).

AIBT argues that "Defendants' objectively baseless infringement lawsuit, seeking [*82] to enforce a patent that they knew was fraudulently obtained and invalid, harmed competition [56] by delaying AIBT's entry into the relevant market." (Pl. Opp. Mem. at 15). It is undisputed that "one may violate the antitrust laws by bringing baseless litigation intended to delay entry into the market by a competitor." In re Richard Roe, Inc., 168 F.3d 69, 72 (2d Cir. 1999). Nevertheless, Varian asserts that AIBT's claims must be dismissed because its Complaint fails to allege facts showing that any delay actually resulted in harm to the competitive process. (Docket No. 24 at 1). This court disagrees, and finds that AIBT has sufficiently alleged that the delay caused by Varian's infringement action had an anticompetitive impact on the market.

In its Complaint, AIBT has greatly expanded its allegations of harm. Specifically, AIBT alleges that as a result of the infringement suit, AIBT's sole customer, TSMC, required AIBT to conduct an in-depth analysis of its iPulsar product to assure it that there were no infringement issues. (Compl. P 104). This allegedly caused delay in the qualification process and in TSMC's ultimate acceptance of AIBT's product. (Id.). AIBT also alleges that TSMC's acceptance process was further delayed by the fact that AIBT had to divert personnel away from [57] their work integrating the iPulsar product into the client's system in order to respond to the infringement action. (Id.). According to AIBT, the iPulsar is superior to Varian's products, and enables manufacturers "to produce consumer electronics in a more efficient and cost effective manner." (Id. P 106). Thus, by its infringement action, Varian allegedly was able to postpone its competitor's ability to compete in the ion implantation device market and to introduce a superior product to that market. In addition, Varian allegedly was able to "raise and maintain prices above competitive levels." (Id. P 103). This is the type of injury that the antitrust laws were intended to prevent. See In re Cardizem CD Antitrust Litig., 332 F.3d at 910 (agreement that "effectively eliminated generic [drug] competition in the market for Cardizem CD from July 1998 through July 1999" constituted "'type of injury' the antitrust laws were meant to prevent"); Abbott Labs. v. Teva Pharms. USA, Inc., 432 F. Supp. 2d 408, 431 (D. Del. 2006) (allegations that market entry was delayed as a result of infringement litigation reflected "injury to competition" and alleged antitrust harm). Accordingly, AIBT has [58] adequately alleged antitrust injury. [11]

Varian argues that "AIBT's new allegations of antitrust harm improperly include purported concerns expressed by AIBT's [*83] customers after Varian granted AIBT a covenant not to sue on November 25, 2008," and that "[a]s the Court previously found, post-November 25, 2008 events such as these are irrelevant to an antitrust harm analysis." (Def. Mem. at 17). Varian's argument does not alter this court's conclusion that AIBT has stated a claim for antitrust injury. As an initial matter, this court did not determine that post-November 25, 2008 events are irrelevant to the issue of antitrust harm. Rather, in its 2009 R&R, this court merely concluded that litigation expenses incurred by AIBT in connection with the prosecution of its own antitrust claims in the infringement action could not constitute harm resulting from having to defend against Varian's allegedly baseless infringement claims. (See 2009 R&R at 12). Furthermore, AIBT's allegations that TSMC expressed concern about the infringement action even after Varian [60] granted AIBT a covenant not to sue, and did not begin to accept the plaintiff's iPulsar products until after Varian's claims in that action had been dismissed, (see Compl. PP 104, 106), support the plaintiff's claim that its entry into the market was delayed as a result of Varian's lawsuit. Therefore, Varian has not established that AIBT's claims should be dismissed for failure to allege antitrust harm.

D. Insufficiency of Conspiracy Allegations

In the infringement action, this court found that AIBT had failed to state a claim for conspiracy to monopolize because it had not alleged "any facts, as opposed to conclusory statements, indicating that the inventors and Varian entered into any agreement with the specific intent to monopolize the market." (2009 R&R at 21-22). Because AIBT has failed to cure this deficiency in its present Complaint, this court recommends that its conspiracy claim be dismissed with prejudice.

As it did in the infringement action, AIBT relies on allegations that the defendants filed a baseless patent infringement action as evidence of a conspiracy to monopolize. In particular, the plaintiff alleges in relevant part that > Defendants agreed to engage in improper exclusionary [61] conduct with the intent to monopolize the ion implantation equipment market. In particular, despite Defendants' knowledge that the 156 Patent was procured through fraud and is invalid, the Defendants agreed to file and then filed the baseless patent infringement

[11] AIBT's allegations regarding its potential customer, PSC, do not on their own allege antitrust injury. Although AIBT alleges that the infringement action caused a delay in the implementation of a demonstration plan that the plaintiff had planned for PSC, it does not allege that the delay resulted in harm to the competitive process. In particular, but without limitation, AIBT has not alleged facts showing that PSC ultimately accepted AIBT's product. Therefore, it has not shown that the infringement action, rather than AIBT's own inability to consummate a deal with PSC, impeded the plaintiff's ability to compete in the marketplace and deprived manufacturers of a superior product. Similarly, to the extent AIBT alleges other types of harm, such as increased costs or harm to its good will, it will need to show how any such harm obstructed the competitive process. It will also need to show that any damages it suffered occurred a result of Varian's conduct in pursuing baseless infringement claims and not as a result of its own decision to extend the infringement action by pursuing its antitrust counterclaims. In any event, because this court concludes [59] that AIBT has alleged antitrust harm based on its allegations regarding its sale to TSMC, the precise contours of AIBT's antitrust injury do not need to be defined at this time.

> action against AIBT in Civil Action No. 08-10487-NG asserting the invalid 156 Patent with the intent to create and/or maintain a monopoly in the ion implantation market.

(Compl. P 137). AIBT argues that these facts, when taken as true, demonstrate "a conscious commitment to the common scheme of thwarting competition through the institution of baseless infringement litigation." (Pl. Opp. Mem. at 19). Once again, AIBT has provided no support for its position that the defendants' agreement to bring a lawsuit, without more, constitutes evidence of a conspiracy.

HN13[] To withstand a motion to dismiss a claim for conspiracy to monopolize, the plaintiff must allege facts showing a "specific intent to monopolize." Boston Scientific Corp. v. Schneider (Europe) AG, 983 F. Supp. 245, 268 (D. Mass. 1997). See also Standfacts Credit Servs., Inc. v. Experian Info. Solutions, Inc., 405 F. Supp. 2d 1141, 1152-53 (C.D. Cal. 2005) (dismissing claim [62] for conspiracy to monopolize where plaintiffs failed "to allege a specific intent by Defendants to empower one of them with monopoly power"). However, under AIBT's theory, there would be no need for a specific agreement to monopolize. Rather, [*84] any time two or more parties initiated an allegedly baseless infringement lawsuit against a competitor, that conduct standing alone would establish a specific intent to monopolize. As this court previously concluded in its 2009 R&R, "this is inconsistent with the applicable law." (2009 R&R at 22).

AIBT does allege that Varian entered into the technology license with the inventors and acquired the 156 Patent "in an effort to obtain blocking intellectual property rights in order to increase its dominant market share and stifle competition." (Compl. P 90). To the extent AIBT relies on these allegations to support its claim for conspiracy, they are merely conclusory and are insufficient to state a claim. See Ashcroft, 129 S. Ct. at 1950 (pleadings that "are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth"). There is nothing inherently suspect about a license agreement and AIBT has not provided any factual basis to support its [63] contention of a sinister motive. Similarly, AIBT's allegations that "Defendants have conspired with one another in a deliberate effort to further Varian's monopoly power in the relevant market, exclude AIBT from the relevant market, and stifle competition" are equally inadequate to plead the necessary intent. "While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations." Id. Because AIBT has not alleged any facts which would support even the inference of a specific intent to monopolize, it has not stated a "plausible claim for relief[.]" Id.

IV. CONCLUSION

For all the reasons detailed herein, this court finds that AIBT's allegations that the defendants misled the PTO concerning the '328 Patent and the Panofsky Reference fail to support its claim for fraud on the PTO, and should be dismissed with prejudice, as should AIBT's renewed claim of conspiracy to monopolize, which also fails to state a claim. However, this court finds that AIBT has otherwise stated a claim for violation of the antitrust laws based on the defendants' alleged failure to disclose to the PTO the White Reference, the Ionex Quad Magnet, White's offer to sell Varian [64] certain technology, and White's identity as allegedly one of the inventors of the '156 Patent. This court recommends to the District Judge to whom this case is assigned that the "Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff's Complaint" (Docket No. 8) be ALLOWED IN PART and DENIED IN PART accordingly. A court's review of preliminary objections in the nature of a demurrer is limited to a determination of whether on the facts alleged the law states with certainty that no recovery is necessary. Further, the court must accept as true all well-pled facts, which are material and relevant, as well as all inferences reasonably deducible therefrom. And, in deciding whether to sustain a demurrer, the court is not required to accept as true legal conclusions, unwarranted factual inferences, allegations that constitute argument, or mere opinion. Moreover, a demurrer will not be sustained unless the court finds that on the face of the complaint the law will not allow recovery; furthermore, any doubts are to be resolved against sustaining the demurrer.

The Pennsylvania Supreme Court has reviewed the Statutory Construction Act of 1972, 1 Pa.C.S. § 1926, and has noted that it is well settled, however, that legislation concerning purely procedural matters will be applied not only to litigation commenced after its passage, but also to litigation existing at the time of passage. The general rule in determining whether a statute will be applied retroactively is as follows: Legislation which affects rights will not be construed to be retroactive unless it is declared so in the act. But, where it concerns merely the mode of procedure, it is applied, as of course, to litigation existing at the time of its passage. In general terms, substantive laws are those which affect rights, while procedural laws are those which address methods by which rights are enforced.

The Pennsylvania General Assembly's intent with the enactment of the Loan Interest and Protection Law (LIPL), 41 Pa. Stat. Ann. § 506(c)(3), is to provide the Pennsylvania Department and the Attorney General with the authority to issue an enforcement action. In essence, a borrower may now proceed before the Department and seek restitution for his or her actual damages. The Department would then investigate the alleged illegal activity of the lender and pursuant to § 506(b), issue subpoenas and require the production of documents. If the Department concludes that the lender violated the LIPL, it may order restitution of the borrower's actual damages under § 506(c)(3). The lender then may request a hearing before the hearing officer who may review or revise determinations made by the department. 71 Pa. Stat. Ann. § 733-503E.(8). Last, the lender and/or the Department, as an aggrieved party, may appeal to the Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania. 2 Pa.C.S. § 702.

HN13[] Constitutional Law, Separation of Powers

A basic precept of our form of government is that the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary are independent, co-equal branches of government. The dividing lines among the three branches are sometimes indistinct and are probably incapable of any precise definition. Under the principle of separation of powers of government, however, no branch should exercise the functions exclusively committed to another branch. Pa. Const. art. II, § 1 provides that the legislative power of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania shall be vested in the Pennsylvania General Assembly which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. Pa. Const. art. IV, § 1 provides that the Executive Department of the Commonwealth shall consist of an Attorney General and such other officers as the General Assembly may from time to time prescribe. Pa. Const. art. IV, § 4.1 provides that an Attorney General shall be the chief law officer of the Commonwealth and shall exercise such powers and perform such duties as imposed by law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

HN14[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

The Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania has enunciated the necessary criteria in order for the Commonwealth to have parens patriae standing: The key to resolving this question is determining whether the Commonwealth has pleaded a quasi-sovereign interest rather than simply representing the interests of individuals who could have pursued their own claims. A state must assert an injury to what has been characterized as a quasi-sovereign interest, which is a judicial construct that does not lend itself to a simple or exact definition. The United States Supreme Court has noted that states may have three types of interest: those purely sovereign, those non-sovereign, and those that are quasi-sovereign. The first type consists of the state's power to develop and enforce civil and criminal codes, and the right to demand recognition from other sovereigns, such as might occur in a border dispute. The second type encompasses a state's proprietary interests and its pursuit of the interest of private parties, in which case the state is only a nominal party. The third category, quasi-sovereign interests, consist of a set of interests that the State has in the well-being of its populace.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Public Enforcement > State Civil Actions

Governments > State & Territorial Governments > Claims By & Against

HN15[] Public Enforcement, State Civil Actions

As noted by the United States Supreme Court, within the spectrum of interests that the Court has regarded as quasi-sovereign is included a state's interest in the economic well-being of its people. The United States Supreme Court, while pointing out that a state claiming such standing must allege more than injury to an identifiable group of individuals residents, also has stated that the indirect effects of the injury must be considered as well in determining whether the State has alleged injury to a sufficiently substantial segment of its population.

Although the Loan Interest and Protection Law (LIPL) does provide numerous remedies for the borrower, in addition to injunctive relief, the LIPL does not contain a provision that authorizes voiding the principal loan. As the Pennsylvania Supreme Court has noted, there is no doubt that the note loan called for a usurious rate of interest that defect, however, rendered the note loan not void, but only voidable as to the interest specified beyond the lawful rate.

It is a principle of statutory construction that when a legislature adopts a statute it must be presumed that it does so with full knowledge of existing statutes relating to the same subject. In order to state a claim under Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law (UTPCPL), a plaintiff must allege one of the unfair or deceptive practices set forth in *73 Pa. Stat. The general purpose of the UTPCPL is to protect the public from fraud and unfair or deceptive business practices, and the statute is the principal means for doing so in the Commonwealth. The elements of common law fraud that must be proven in order to recover under the catchall provisions of § 2(4)(xxi) of the UTPCPL: A plaintiff must demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence: (1) a representation; (2) which is material to the transaction at hand; (3) made falsely, with knowledge of its falsity or recklessness as to whether it is true or false; (4) with the intent of misleading another into relying on it; (5) justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation; and (6) the resulting injury was proximately caused by the reliance.

The Commonwealth Court of Pennsylvania has adopted a less restrictive interpretation for pleading fraud after the 1996 amendments to the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law than pleading common law fraud.

HN26[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

An act or a practice is deceptive or unfair if it has the capacity or tendency to deceive. Neither the intention to deceive nor actual deception must be proved; rather, it need only be shown that the acts and practices are capable of being interpreted in a misleading way. The test for the court is to determine the overall impression arising from the totality of what is said, as well as what is reasonably implied, in the advertisement or solicitation. Moreover, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court has set forth a directive that the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law is to be construed liberally to effectuate its objective of protecting consumers of the Commonwealth from fraud and unfair or deceptive business practices.

[*424] OPINION BY JUDGE McGINLEY

Presently before this Court are the preliminary objections (P.O.s) of NCAS of Delaware, LLC (NCAS) [1], Advance America Cash Advance Centers (Advance America) [2], and Advance America Cash Advance Centers, Inc (AA) [3] (collectively, Defendants) [*425] to the amended complaint filed by the Department and the Attorney General (collectively, Plaintiffs). [4]

I. Prior Matter: Original Complaint.

This matter first commenced on September 27, 2006, when the Department filed a complaint against NCAS d/b/a Cash Advance Centers and alleged Cash Advance Centers violated the Consumer Discount Company Act (CDCA) [5] and the Loan Interest and Protection Law (LIPL). [6]

> The complaint further alleges that on June 20, 2006, the Cash Advance Centers began to offer a new line of credit product in Pennsylvania that was not in partnership with a bank. Under Cash Advance Centers' new line of credit product, a $ 500 credit line is provided to qualifying Pennsylvania borrowers. Cash Advance Centers charges interest on the advances in the form of simple interest at a daily periodic rate that corresponds to an annual percentage rate of 5.98%. In addition, Cash Advance Centers charges borrowers a monthly participation [4] fee of $ 149.50 per month (the Monthly Participation Fee).
> . . . Specifically, Section 3(A) of CDCA, 7 P.S. § 6203(A) prohibits, with respect to loans or advances of money or credit of $ 25,000 or less, any business that has not obtained a license from the Secretary of Banking under the CDCA from charging, collecting, contracting for or receiving 'interest . . . . fees . . . charges or other consideration' which aggregate in excess of the maximum allowable interest rate that an unlicensed lender would be permitted to charge under Pennsylvania law on the amount loaned or advanced. The Department avers that the line of credit product offered by Cash Advance Centers is a loan or advance of money or credit within the meaning of section [*426] 3(A) of the CDCA, 7 P.S. § 6203(A). Cash Advance Centers has not obtained a license from the Secretary of Banking pursuant to the CDCA.
> Additionally, the Department alleges pursuant to Section 201 of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 201, that Cash Advance Centers is prohibited from charging for its line of credit products interest, fees, charges or other consideration which aggregate in excess of six percent (6%). (footnote omitted).

Before this Court in NCAS I were the Department's motion for judgment on the pleadings and Cash Advance Centers' cross-motion for judgment on the pleadings:

> This Court must disagree with Cash Advance Centers' assertions. While Section 3(A) of the CDCA, 7 P.S. § 6203(A), limits charges on the 'amount actually loaned or advanced', clearly, the Monthly Participation Fee is a necessary condition before Cash Advance Centers provides a credit advance and is paid in connection with any advance. It is a charge inextricably related to the 'amount actually loaned or advanced.' Accordingly, Cash Advance Centers' unlicensed lending practices violate Section 3(A) of the CDCA, 7 P.S. § 6203(A). Department's motion for judgment on the pleadings with regard to the CDCA is granted and Cash Advance Centers' [Advance America's] cross-motion for judgment on the pleadings is denied as to the CDCA.
> Unlike Section 3(A) of the CDCA, which provides for the aggregation of fees and charges, the plain language of Section 201 of the LIPL, [6] 41 P.S. § 201, makes no mention of the aggregation of fees and charges, but instead refers only to the 'lawful rate of interest'. . . .
> Without the development of an evidentiary record, this Court is constrained to conclude at this early stage of the proceedings, the record does not establish that the Monthly Participation Fee of $ 149.95 should be considered sham interest which, combined with the stated interest rate of 5.98%, establishes a violation of Section 201 of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 201. Therefore, the Department's motion for judgment on the pleadings with regard to the LIPL is denied. Similarly, this Court does not have sufficient information before it to conclude that the LIPL does not prohibit Cash Advance Centers' current lending activities in Pennsylvania and therefore, Cash Advance Centers' cross-motion for judgment on the pleadings is denied as to the LIPL.
> The Department has requested injunctive relief to permanently enjoin Cash Advance Centers from continuing its lending activities in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and from collecting on lines of credit or loans currently outstanding in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania pursuant to the CDCA violation. The Department's [7] requested injunctive relief is granted for as long as the violation of the CDCA continues. [7] (emphasis in original and added and footnote omitted).

> 15. Until March 27, 2006, AA operated in Pennsylvania through the Subsidiary that had registered as a loan broker under the Credit Services Act [8] . . . 73 P.S. §§ 2181-2192, in which capacity AA described itself as having operated "as marketing, processing, and servicing [*427] agent of a Federal Deposit Insurance

[7] In NCAS I, the permanent injunction enjoined Cash Advance Centers [Advance America] from charging Pennsylvania consumers Monthly Participation Fees and from engaging in any other business practice that violated the maximum interest rate or fee limitations under Pennsylvania law.

[8] Act of December 16, 1992, P.L. 1144, as amended.

Corporation ("FDIC") supervised institution that offered payday cash advances and installment loans." (Quoting from AA Form 8-K, filed with United States [8] Securities and Exchange Commission June 19, 2006).
16. The FDIC-supervised institution described in paragraph 15, above, was a bank located outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and AA operated in the above-described manner on the theory that the out-of-state location of the bank would permit the Subsidiary to broker payday loans with interest rates determined by the laws of a state other than the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania pursuant to federal law and to avoid interest rate and fee caps imposed by Pennsylvania law on payday loans that the Subsidiary offered to Pennsylvania residents using this method.
17. As reported in the AA Form . . . "the FDIC instructed the lending bank for Pennsylvania ... to discontinue offering payday cash advances and alternative credit products if they could not adequately address the FDIC's concerns. In response to the FDIC's instructions, the lending bank for Pennsylvania ceased its payday cash advance and installment loan originations as of the close of business on March 27, 2006."

DEFENDANTS' BUSINESS PRACTICES

18. On June 20, 2006, Advance America began offering in Pennsylvania a new line of credit product, not in partnership with a bank, in place of [9] its prior payday loan products. (emphasis added).
19. Under Advance America's line of credit product, Advance America provided a $ 500 credit line to qualifying Pennsylvania borrowers. Advance America charged interest on these advances in the form of simple interest at a daily periodic rate that corresponds to an annual percentage rate of 5.98%. In addition, Advance America charged borrowers a "Monthly Participation Fee" of $ 149.95 per month.
. . . .

22. At all times Advance America offered its line of credit product in Pennsylvania, Advance America was acting as AA's agent. (emphasis added).

23. AA directed, supervised, controlled, approved, formulated, authorized, ratified, benefitted from, and participated in Advance America's acts and practices in Pennsylvania. (emphasis added).

24. Advance America offered the line of credit product acting in concert with AA in furtherance of their common efforts and pursuant to a common design with AA to circumvent the maximum interest rate and fee limitations under Pennsylvania law, and with AA's substantial assistance toward this objective. (emphasis added).

25. Both Advance America and AA benefited financially through Advance America's offering [10] of the line of credit products in Pennsylvania. (emphasis added).
COUNT I:

VIOLATION OF THE CONSUMER DISCOUNT COMPANY ACT
(Commonwealth vs. All Defendants)
. . . .

28. The line of credit product offered by Advance America was a loan or advance of money or credit within the meaning of Section 3.A of the Consumer Discount Company Act, . . . 7 P.S. § 6203.A (supp.2006). (emphasis added).

[*428] 29. Advance America has never obtained a license from the Secretary of Banking pursuant to the Consumer Discount Company Act. (emphasis added).
30. No other Pennsylvania or federal law applicable to Advance America authorized Advance America to charge a "Monthly Participation Fee" of $ 149.50 together with an interest rate of approximately 5.98% to consumers for a line of credit product.

31. Because Advance America was not licensed pursuant to the Consumer Discount Company Act, Advance America was prohibited from charging for its line of credit product interest, fees, charges or other consideration with aggregate in excess of the annual interest rate of 6 per cent under Section 201 of the Loan Interest and Protection Law, Act of January 30, 1974, P.L. 13, 41 P.S. § 201. (emphasis added).

36. AA is bound [11] by the claims or issues determined by the Order [July 31, 2007], because AA is in privity with Advance America and because Advance America acted as the agent of AA, under AA's control, with AA's authority, and at AA's direction. (emphasis added).

. . . .

38. Until the Commonwealth Court entered the Order of July 31, 2007, Advance America continued to do business at loan centers throughout the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

39. By illegally charging consumers of its line of credit product a "Monthly Participation Fee" of $ 149.50 together with an interest rate of approximately 5.98%, Advance America has injured the economic health and well-being of the Commonwealth's citizens.

. . . .

COUNT II:

VIOLATION OF THE LOAN INTEREST AND PROTECTION LAW

. . . .

42. Section 201 of the Loan Interest and Protection Law, . . . 41 P.S. § 201, provides that the maximum lawful rate of annual interest for the loan or use of money in an amount of $ 50,000 or less is 6 per cent.

44. In fact, the interest Advance America charged under the line of credit product was much higher than an annual percentage rate of 5.98% because the "Monthly Participation Fee" was a sham, the true [12] nature of which was illegal, usurious interest in violation of the maximum allowable annual interest rate under Section 201 of the Loan Interest and Protection Law, . . . 41 P.S. § 201. (emphasis added).

45. AA rendered substantial assistance to Advance America to establish loan centers and offer the line of credit product in the Commonwealth knowing that, through the line of credit product, Advance America was charging illegal, usurious interest in violation of the Loan Interest and Protection Law. (emphasis added).

COUNT III:

VIOLATION OF THE CONSUMER PROTECTION LAW

. . . .

49. Advance America's violation of the Consumer Discount Company Act, as found by the Commonwealth Court, as well as the violations of the Loan Interest and Protection Law, as set forth [*429] above, constitute per se violations of Section 2 of the Consumer Protection Law, 73 P.S. § 201-2. (emphasis added).

. . . .

52. The above acts and practices constitute unfair methods of competition and unfair and deceptive acts and practices prohibited by Section 201-3 of the Consumer Protection Law [9] by, among other things (emphasis added):

> (a) Causing likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding [13] as to the source, sponsorship, approval or certification of goods or services;
> (b) Causing likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding as to affiliation, connection or association with, or certification by, another;

[9] Act of December 17, 1968, P.L. 1224, as amended, 73 P.S. § 201-1-201-9.3.

(c) Representing that goods or services have sponsorship, approval, characteristics, ingredients, uses, benefits or quantities that they do not have or that a person has a sponsorship, approval, status, affiliation, or connection that he does not have; and,

(d) Engaging in other fraudulent or deceptive conduct which creates a likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding. (emphasis added).

56. Advance America and AA have benefited by Advance America's unfair methods of competition and unfair and deceptive acts and practices in the Commonwealth and have retained these benefits unjustly. (emphasis added).

. . . .

COUNT IV:

VIOLATIONS OF THE CONSUMER PROTECTION LAW

. . . .

58. Defendants represented to consumers that the finance charge under the line of credit product was 5.98% when in fact the rate was much higher and was disguised as the $ 149.95 "Monthly Participation Fee" to hide the higher actual rate of interest.

. . . .

61. Defendants [14] have injured the economic health and well-being of the Commonwealth's citizens by illegally charging Pennsylvania consumers an interest rate in excess of that allowed under the Loan Interest and Protection Law and by disguising the actual interest rate as a "Monthly Participation Fee" of $ 149.50.

62. Advance America and AA have benefited financially, to the detriment of Pennsylvania consumers, by operating illegally in the Commonwealth and have retained these benefits unjustly.

65. The above acts and practices constitute unfair methods of competition and/or unfair and deceptive acts or practices prohibited by Section 201-3 of the Consumer Protection Law by, among other things (emphasis added):

(a) Causing likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding as to the source, sponsorship, approval or certification of goods or services;

(b) Causing likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding as to affiliation, connection or association with, or certification by, another;

(c) Representing that goods or services have sponsorship, approval, characteristics, ingredients, uses, benefits or quantities that they do not have or that a person has a sponsorship, approval, status, affiliation, [15] or connection that he does not have;

[*430] (d) Representing that goods or services are of a particular standard, quality or grade, or that goods are of a particular style or model, if they are of another;

(e) Advertising goods and services with intent to sell them as advertised; and,

(f) Engaging in any other fraudulent or deceptive conduct which creates a likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding. (emphasis added).

73 P.S. §§ 201-2(4)(ii), (iii), (v), (vii), (ix) & (xxi).

63. [sic] [10] The above conduct on the part of Defendants is illegal and in violation of Section 201-3 of the Consumer Protection Law, 73 P.S. § 201-3. . . . (emphasis added).

III. Defendants' Preliminary Objections.

Defendants preliminarily objected to the amended complaint and asserted:

> 3. No statute authorizes the Commonwealth [Department] to seek the monetary relief [16] associated with the violations alleged in Counts I and II of the Amended Complaint. The statute underlying Count I, the CDCA, does not provide the Commonwealth [Department] with the authority to seek monetary relief in a civil proceeding. The statute underlying Count II, the LIPL, authorizes monetary damages, including triple the amount of any excess interest charges a borrower may pay, attorneys' fees, and court costs, but only when awarded in connection with an action brought by an individual borrower acting on his or her own behalf and not on behalf of other borrowers . . . . The LIPL also relieves individual borrowers of the obligation to pay interest on an outstanding loan in excess of that permitted by law . . . . Additionally, the LIPL permits the AG [Attorney General] to seek injunctive relief, but not monetary damages or a declaratory judgment, and only when such relief is necessary "to secure compliance with this act" . . . . (emphasis in original and added and citations omitted).
> 4. The other statutes cited in the Amended Complaint in connection with Counts I and II similarly provide no authority for the relief the Commonwealth [Department] seeks. The Department of Banking [17] Code [11] . . . merely authorizes an action by the Department for an injunction to restrain a violation of any of the laws under the Department's jurisdiction . . . . The DOB Code in no way authorizes suits for monetary damages or declaratory judgments. Similarly, the Commonwealth Attorneys Act . . . authorizes the AG [Attorney General] to represent the Commonwealth in lawsuits, but does not provide any affirmative authority to seek damages or declaratory judgments. (citations omitted and emphasis added).
> 5. The object of the Commonwealth's [Department's] requested declaratory judgment, i.e., preventing NCAS [Advance America] from collecting principal and interest in the amount of 5.98 percent on its loans, also completely lacks statutory and case support. The CDCA does not create a civil cause of action in [*431] favor of the Commonwealth [Department] and the LIPL merely authorizes the AG [Attorney General] to seek an injunction "to secure compliance with this act . . ." (and not to prohibit the collection of principal or lawful interest) . . . . Similarly, the DOB Code only authorizes the Department to seek an injunction necessary to restrain and prevent a regulated party "from engaging in [18] any activity violating [any law under the Department's jurisdiction]" . . . . While these statutes permit the Commonwealth [Department] to bring lenders into compliance with the CDCA and the LIPL, they do not authorize the Commonwealth to seek the sweeping declaratory judgment the Commonwealth requests. (emphasis added and citations omitted).
> 10. The Commonwealth [Department] lacks the capacity to sue in parens patriae because it has no quasi-sovereign interest at stake that justifies such standing. (emphasis added).
> 11. The law is clear that a state bringing a suit in parens patriae must establish a quasi-sovereign interest apart from the individual interests of a single citizen or group of citizens. . . . (emphasis in original and added and citations omitted).
> 12. The Commonwealth has failed to articulate any interest that is remotely quasi-sovereign to justify its parens patriae standing . . . . (citations omitted and emphasis added).

[11] Act of May 15, 1933, P.L. 565, as amended, 71 P.S. §§ 733-1-733-1101.

13. If the potential claims of NCAS' [Advance America] borrowers are set aside, as the parens patriae case law directs, the Commonwealth is left with no "concrete," "independent" and "direct" interests to protect . . . . (citations omitted).

. . [19] . .

15. Parens patriae standing is inappropriate in this case because the recognition of a quasi-sovereign interest under the facts as pled could expose NCAS [Advance America] to double liability. Individual customers who have already sued or seek to sue NCAS [Advance America] will surely argue that there is no privity between them and the Commonwealth [Department] and, as a result, any judgment in this litigation would not limit remedies available in such individual litigation
. . . .

PRELIMINARY OBJECTIONS TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S CLAIMS IN COUNTS III AND IV OF THE AMENDED COMPLAINT ALLEGING VIOLATIONS OF THE UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES AND CONSUMER PROTECTION LAW

Demurrer Under Pa. R. Civ. P. 1028 (a)(4): Counts III and IV Fail to State Claims Under the UTPCPL

18. In Counts III and IV of the Amended Complaint, the AG [Attorney General] alleges violations of the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law ("UTPCPL") . . . . Specifically, in Count III, the AG [Attorney General] alleges that NCAS' violation of the CDCA, as found by this Court, and NCAS' alleged violation of the LIPL, on which this Court has not ruled, [20] "constitute per se violations of [the UTPCPL]" . . . . (citations omitted).

20. In Count III of the Amended Complaint, the AG [Attorney General] alleges that a violation of CDCA and the LIPL is a per se violation of the UTPCPL . . . .

21. This Court has previously rejected the AG's [Attorney General's] theory [*432] that violation of a consumer credit statute constitutes a per se violation of the UTPCPL . . . . (citations omitted and emphasis added).
. . . .

24. The General Assembly ensured that consumers' rights under the CDCA and the LIPL could be vindicated by including in those laws (and the Department of Banking Code) a variety of enforcement mechanisms, including a private right of action for consumers who pay interest or charges in excess of those permitted under Pennsylvania law. See, e.g., 41 P.S. §§ 501-504. However, neither the CDCA, the LIPL nor the Department of Banking Code provides that a violation of one of those laws is automatically and without more a violation of the UTPCPL . . . . (emphasis added).

26. This Court has made clear that where a particular provision is omitted from a statute but provided for in other similar statutes, the omission of the provision [21] is deemed intentional . . . .
. . . .

30. The AG claims that NCAS [Advance America] "held itself out" as a lawful lender offering a lawful credit product, see Exhibit A hereto, at [Paragraphs] 50-51, and that by doing so NCAS [Advance America] employed an unfair or deceptive act or practice as defined in subparagraphs (ii),(iii), (v) and (xxi) of 73 P.S. § 201-2(4). See id. at [Paragraph] 52. This claim is completely without legal merit, since: (1) the AG has not identified--and cannot identify--any representation that NCAS made about the lawfulness of its operation or product; and (2) such a representation cannot be implied from NCAS' placing its product on the market. (emphasis added).

34. Pursuant to TILA [Truth-in-Lending Act] [12], state law disclosure requirements are preempted to the extent they are inconsistent with TILA [Truth-in-Lending Act] disclosure requirements . . . .

. . . .

38. Even if the AG had asserted potentially actionable misrepresentations under the UTPCPL, he would still need to allege that these misrepresentations actually made a difference in the decision of Pennsylvania consumers to obtain a loan from NCAS. He has not done so.

. . . .

43. The Commonwealth [22] has not pled and cannot show the facts necessary to permit this Court to exercise personal jurisdiction over AA, Inc. and, as a result, AA, Inc. should be dismissed from this case.

47. Neither general nor specific jurisdiction over AA, Inc. exists. AA, Inc.'s contacts with Pennsylvania are far from "continuous and systematic" or even "minimum": They are completely non-existent . . . . (emphasis in original).

48. Given the absence of a single fact in the Amended Complaint that would show some minimal contact between AA, Inc. and Pennsylvania, the Commonwealth must necessarily argue that in personam jurisdiction over AA, Inc. can be premised on the alleged actions of its subsidiary, NCAS. However, the Commonwealth has failed to plead and will be unable to demonstrate the requisite facts showing the improper relationship between the two separate entities necessary to justify imputed jurisdiction.

49. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court has instructed that "there is a strong [*433] presumption in Pennsylvania against piercing the corporate veil" . . . . (citations omitted and emphasis added).

52. The Commonwealth has failed to allege (and will not be able to show) that the relationship between [23] AA, Inc. and NCAS [Advance America] justifies intrusion into the "sanctity of the corporate structure" . . . . There are no allegations in the Amended Complaint that NCAS and AA, Inc. failed to follow corporate formalities, operated without proper levels of capital, intermingled their affairs or used the corporate form to perpetrate fraud. Nor does the Commonwealth [Department] allege AA, Inc. completely dominated and controlled NCAS such that the latter was merely a sham corporation.

Preliminary Objections of Defendants, February 13, 2009, Paragraphs 3-5, 10-13, 15, 18, 20-21, 24, 26, 30, 34, 38, 43, 47-49, and 52 at 2-6, 8-9, 12, 14-15, 17-19, and 21.

Plaintiffs filed a brief in opposition to Defendants' preliminary objections to the amended complaint.

IV. Whether The Department Can Recover Damages From Advance America For Violation Of The CDCA And The LIPL As Alleged In Count 1 And Count 2

Initially, Advance America asserts that any violation of either the CDCA or the LIPL as alleged in Count 1 and Count 2 of the Amended Complaint fails to afford the Department monetary relief and the recovery of damages. [13]

[13] HN1[] This Court's review [24] of preliminary objections in the nature of a demurrer is limited to a determination of whether on the facts alleged the law states with certainty that no recovery is necessary. Hawks by Hawks v. Livermore, 157 Pa. Commw. 243, 629 A.2d 270, 271 n.3 (Pa. Cmwlth. 1993). Further, this Court must accept as "true all well-pled facts, which are material and relevant, as well as all inferences reasonably deducible therefrom." Cohen v. City of Philadelphia, 806 A.2d 905, 912 (Pa. Cmwlth. 2002). "And, in deciding whether to sustain a demurrer, this Court is not required to accept as true legal conclusions, unwarranted factual inferences, allegations that constitute argument, or mere opinion." Id. at 912. "Moreover, a demurrer will not be sustained unless the Court finds that on the face of the complaint the law will not allow recovery; furthermore, any doubts are to be resolved against sustaining the demurrer." Id. at 912.

A. Did Advance America's Alleged Violation Of The CDCA Afford The Department The Requested Monetary Relief

The Department alleges in Count 1 of the Amended Complaint that Advance America violated Section 3.A of the CDCA, 7 P.S. § 6203.A, when it offered "loans or advances of money on credit" without [25] "obtaining a license from the Secretary of Banking." The Department seeks, in addition to the injunctive relief granted in NCAS I, that "Advanced America is barred from collecting any principal, interest, or other charges in connection with the line of credit product . . . [and] [d]isgorgement of all revenues Advanced America and AA earned by Advance America's illegal operations . . . ." Count 1 of the Amended Complaint, Wherefore Clauses A. and C. at 10.

Defendants preliminarily object and assert that there is no provision in the CDCA that provides for the monetary relief requested by the Department for Advance America's violation of the CDCA. This Court agrees.

Section 18 (Penalties) of the CDCA, 7 P.S. § 6218, provides:

> HN2[] Any person who has not obtained a license from the Secretary of Banking . . . [*434] in accordance with the provisions of this act, and who shall engage in the business of negotiating or making loans or advances of money or credit, in the amount or value of fifteen thousand dollars ($ 15,000) or less, and charge, collect, contract for or receive interest, discount, bonus, fees, fines, commissions, charges or other considerations which aggregate in excess of the interest that [26] the lender would otherwise be permitted by law to charge if not licensed under this act on the amount actually loaned or advanced, or on the unpaid principal balances when the contract is payable by stated installments, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, upon conviction thereof shall be sentenced to pay a fine of not less than five hundred dollars ($ 500) or more than five thousand dollars ($ 5,000), and/or suffer imprisonment not less than six (6) months nor more than three (3) years, in the discretion of the court. (emphasis added).

Clearly, Section 18 of the CDCA, 7 P.S. § 6218, HN3[] only provides for criminal sanctions for a violation of the CDCA and not a monetary remedy in the nature of damages as requested by the Department. Therefore, this Court sustains Defendants' preliminary objections to Count 1 of the Amended Complaint.

B. Would Advance America's Alleged Violation Of The LIPL, If Established, Authorize The Requested Monetary Relief

The Department alleges in Count 2 of the Amended Complaint that Advance America violated Section 201 of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 201, when it charged interest on loans in excess of "six per cent per annum." The Department seeks, among other things, "damages [27] in an amount three times the damages sustained by Advance America's customers in connection with Advance America's violation" of the LIPL and "[d]isgorgement of all revenues Advance America and AA earned . . . ." Count 2 of the Amended Complaint, Wherefore Clauses C. and D. at 12.

Defendants preliminarily object and assert that only individual borrowers can institute an action against Advance America for interest on the loan in excess of the six percent maximum mandated under Section 201 of LIPL, 41 P.S. § 201.

Initially, Section 504 (Individual actions permitted) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 504, provides:

> HN4[] Any person affected by a violation of the act shall have the substantive right to bring an action on behalf of himself individually for damages by reason of such conduct or violation, together with costs including reasonable attorney fees and such other relief to which such person may be entitled under law." (emphasis added).

Further, Section 502 (Usury and excess charges recoverable) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 502, provides:

> HN5[] A person who has paid a rate of interest for the loan or use of money at a rate in excess of that provided for by this act or otherwise by law or has paid charges prohibited [28] or in excess of those allowed by this act or otherwise by law may recover triple the amount of such excess interest or charges in a suit at law > against the person who has collected such excess interest or charges . . . . Recovery of triple the amount of such excess interest or charges, but not the actual amount of such excess interest or charges, shall be limited to a four-year period of the contract. (emphasis added).

Finally, Section 505 (Penalties) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 505, HN6[] provides that "[a]ny person who knowingly and intentionally violates the provisions of this act shall be [*435] guilty of a misdemeanor of the third degree." (emphasis added).

Defendants again preliminarily object to Count 2 of the Amended Complaint and assert that there is also no promulgated authority under the LIPL that authorizes the Department to seek declaratory relief and recovery of the principal and interest earned from loans to Pennsylvania borrowers from Advance America.

In opposition to Defendants' preliminary objection to Count 2 of the Amended Complaint, the Department presents a four-prong argument in support of its position that the Department is entitled to monetary relief under the LIPL.

First, the Department [29] cites to Section 506(c)(3) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 506(c)(3), for the statutory authority to seek monetary relief in the nature of damages against Advance America. Second, the Department alleges that it possesses an inherent "sovereign interest" to protect the Pennsylvania borrower and recover damages from Advance America. Third, the Department cites to parens patriae standing as authority to seek monetary relief in order to protect the economic well-being of the citizens of the Commonwealth. Fourth, the Department claims that it is entitled to a declaratory judgment against Advance America. This Court shall seriately address the Department's arguments.

1. Whether Section 506(c)(3) Of The LIPL, 41 P.S. § 506(c)(3), Provides The Statutory Authority For The Department To Obtain Monetary Relief

Section 506(c)(3) of the LIPL HN7[] provides that "[i]f the department determines that a person has violated the provisions of this act, the department may . . . [o]rder the person to cease and desist any violation of this act and to make restitution for actual damages to any aggrieved person." (emphasis added). Here, the Department contends that the General Assembly statutorily authorized the Department [30] "to order restitution itself" and therefore the Department may seek restitution as a judicial remedy in an enforcement action. See Plaintiffs' Brief in Opposition to Defendants' Preliminary Objections to Amended Complaint at 11. This Court disagrees.

First, Section 506(c)(3) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 506(c)(3), was added by the Act of July 8, 2008, P.L. 824, No. 57, effective in sixty days or September 8, 2008, more than one year after Advance America ceased operation in Pennsylvania. See Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint, Paragraph 38 at 10 (Advanced America ceased doing business in Pennsylvania pursuant to this Court's order of July 31, 2007).

Second, the retroactive application of Section 506(c)(3) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 506(c)(3) to the present controversy would increase Advance America's exposure to civil penalties. Section 1926 of the Statutory Construction Act of 1972 (Act), 1 Pa. C.S. § 1926, HN8[] provides that "[n]o statute shall be construed to be retroactive unless clearly and manifestly so intended by the General Assembly." [14] (emphasis added).

In Morabito's Auto Sales v. Department of Transportation, 552 Pa. 291, 715 A.2d 384 (1998), HN10[] our Pennsylvania Supreme Court reviewed Section 1926 of the Act, 1 Pa. C.S. § 1926, and noted:

> It is well settled, however, that legislation concerning purely procedural matters will be applied not only to litigation commenced after its passage, but also to [*436] litigation existing at the time of passage . . . .

[14] Also, Article I, Section 17 of the Pennsylvania Constitution HN9[] provides that "[n]o ex post facto law, nor any law impairing the obligation of [31] contracts, or making irrevocable any grant of special privileges or immunities, shall be passed." (emphasis added).

> As stated in Galant [v. Department of Environmental Resources, 534 Pa. 17, 21-22, 626 A.2d 496, 498-99 (1993)], The general rule in determining whether a statute will be applied retroactively is as follows: "Legislation which affects rights will not be construed to be retroactive unless it is declared so in the act. But, where it concerns merely the mode of procedure, it is applied, as of course, to litigation existing at the time of its passage . . . ." . . . .
> . . . In general terms, substantive laws are those which affect rights, while procedural laws are those which address methods by which rights are enforced . . . .

Morabito's Auto Sales, 552 Pa. at 295, 715 A.2d at 386. [32] (citations omitted and emphasis added).

Obviously, the Department's attempt to apply Section 506(c)(3) of the LIPL affects Advance America's substantive rights because it would increase its potential liability. [15] Presently, each individual borrower may institute an action against Advance America for monetary damages, costs, and attorney fees pursuant to Section 504 of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 504. Additionally, individual borrowers may recover triple the amount of the excessive interest or charges paid to Advance America pursuant to Section 502 of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 502. This Court will not conclude, without an express legislative intent by the General Assembly, that the Department possesses the same legal rights as an individual borrower. The retroactive application of Section 506(c)(3) of the LIPL would be unfair and highly prejudicial to Advance America's rights. Therefore, this Court must reject this argument.

2. Whether The Department Has An Inherent Sovereign Interest To Seek Monetary Relief Under The LIPL

The Department alleges [34] that its ability to seek monetary relief is derived from its sovereign interest in enforcing Pennsylvania law. Specifically, the Department cites to Section 503.C of the Banking Code, 71 P.S. § 733-503.C for the proposition that the General Assembly granted it broad discretion to determine what judicial remedies to pursue to protect the citizens of Pennsylvania. [16]

[*437] Contrary to the Department's position, it may not claim an "inherent sovereign interest" as a basis to seek monetary relief against Advance America under the provisions of the LIPL. Such an interpretation runs afoul of the separation of powers under the Pennsylvania Constitution and would vest the Department and the Attorney General with [35] unconstrained authority.

In Sweeney v. Tucker, 473 Pa. 493, 507, 375 A.2d 698, 705 (1977) our Pennsylvania Supreme Court cogently defined the separation of powers [17]:

[15] HN11[] The General Assembly's intent with the enactment of Section 506(c)(3) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 506(c)(3), was to provide the Department with the authority to issue an enforcement action. In essence, a borrower may now proceed before the Department and seek restitution for his [33] or her actual damages. The Department would then investigate the alleged illegal activity of the lender and pursuant to Section 506(b) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 506(b), issue subpoenas and require the production of documents. If the Department concludes that that the lender violated the LIPL, it may order restitution of the borrower's actual damages under Section 506(c)(3) of the LIPL. The lender then may request a hearing before the hearing officer who "may review or revise determinations made by the department." See Section 503E.(8) of the Department of Banking Code, 71 P.S. § 733-503E.(8). Last, the lender and/or the Department, as an aggrieved party, may appeal to this Court. See 2 Pa. C.S. § 702. Obviously, this procedure was not followed in the present matter. Section 1953 of the Act, 1 Pa. C.S. § 1953, HN12[] provides that "the portions of statute which were not altered by the amendment shall be construed as effective from the time of their original enactment, and the new provisions shall be construed as effective only from the date when the amendment became effective."

[16] The Department contends that it may not ignore the fact that the Defendants have kept millions of dollars that were illegal obtained in violation of the CDCA and the LIPL which were promulgated to protect "weak and needy borrowers from extortion and outrageous demands of unscrupulous lenders." Pollice v. National Tax Funding, L.P., 225 F.3d 379 (3d Cir. 2000) (quoting 47 C.J.S. "Interest & Usury § 88 (1982)). See Plaintiffs' Brief In Opposition to Defendants' Preliminary Objections at 8.

> HN13[] A basic precept of our form of government is that the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary are independent, co-equal branches of government. Carroll v. Tate, 442 Pa. 45, 274 A.2d 193 (1971) (plurality opinion). The dividing lines among the three branches 'are sometimes indistinct and are probably incapable of any precise definition.' . . . . Under the principle of separation of powers of government, however, no branch should exercise the functions exclusively committed to another branch. (citations and footnote omitted and emphasis added).

Here, the General Assembly expressly granted the Department under the LIPL, and for that matter the CDCA, the authority to seek an injunction and to pursue criminal sanctions against a lender who violates these statutes. There is no express authority granted to the Department to seek monetary relief against a lender to recover alleged unlawful and ill gotten gains. The only inherent authority the Department retains is that "power which is inherent in the sense of being necessarily implied in an express grant of power." (emphasis added). Penn Anthracite Mining Co. v. Anthracite Miners of Pennsylvania, 318 Pa. 401, 416-17, 178 A. 291, 297 (1935). This Court must reject the Department's argument.

3. Whether The Department Has Parens Patriae Standing To Seek Monetary Relief Under The LIPL

The Department next claims that it has parens patriae standing to pursue an action for monetary relief and seek damages on behalf of individual borrowers in Pennsylvania. Advance America counters that there is no parens patriae standing on [37] the behalf of individual borrowers.

In Commonwealth v. TAP Pharmaceutical Products. Inc. (TAP II), 885 A.2d 1127 (Pa. Cmwlth. 2005) [18], HN14[] this Court enunciated [*438] the necessary criteria in order for the Commonwealth to have parens patriae standing:

> The key to resolving this question is determining whether the Commonwealth has pleaded a quasi-sovereign interest rather than simply representing the interests of individuals who could have pursued their own claims. A

[17] Article II, Section 1 of the Pennsylvania Constitution provides that "[t]he legislative power of this Commonwealth shall be vested in General Assembly which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Article IV, Section 1 of the Pennsylvania Constitution provides that "[t]he Executive Department of this Commonwealth shall consist of a[n] . . . Attorney General . . . and such other officers as the General Assembly may from time to time prescribe." Article IV, Section 4.1 of the Pennsylvania Constitution [36] provides that "[a]n Attorney General . . . shall be the chief law officer of the Commonwealth and shall exercise such powers and perform such duties as imposed by law."

[18] In TAP II, the factual situation was as follows:

> As noted in this Court's earlier decision in this [39] matter, TAP I [Commonwealth v. TAP Pharmaceutical Products, Inc., 868 A.2d 624 (Pa. Cmwlth. 2005) (TAP I)], the present controversy arose around the use of a pricing standard know as the Average Wholesale Price (AWP). The Commonwealth's claims are based generally on its assertion that all the Defendants knowingly inflated this self-reported AWP for inclusion in a pharmaceutical publication upon which the Commonwealth relied. The Commonwealth alleges that the reason the Defendants inflated the AWP, which in some cases reflected a price hundreds of times higher than what would constitute an actual average wholesale price, is that the Defendants would generate revenue by virtue of direct purchasers paying more for their products and such systematic inflation would also result increased market share.
> As stated above, AWPs are used by the Commonwealth to establish a basis for reimbursement to the middleman-such as physicians who administer drugs to patients directly (such as intravenous cancer drugs) and pharmacy benefit managers who buy in quantity for resale to customers . . . .
> The Commonwealth further points out that the AWP plays a significant role in budgeting strategies, and [40] that it affects administrative decisions, we presume such as eligibility standards based on income and the scope of coverage.

Id. at 1132-33.

> "state must assert an injury to what has been characterized as a 'quasi-sovereign' interest, which is a judicial construct that does not lend itself to a simple or exact definition. Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. v. Puerto Rico, 458 U.S. 592, 601, 102 S. Ct. 3260, 73 L. Ed. 2d 995 . . . (1982). [19] In Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. the [United States] Supreme Court noted that states may have three types of interest: those purely sovereign, those non-sovereign, and those that are quasi-sovereign. The first type consists of the state's power to develop and enforce civil and criminal codes, and the right to demand recognition from other sovereigns, such as might occur in a border dispute. The second type encompasses a state's proprietary interests and its pursuit of the interest [38] of private parties, in which case the state is only a nominal party. The third category, quasi-sovereign interests, "consist of a set of interests that the State has in the well-being of its populace." 458 U.S. at 601-602 . . . .
> HN15[] As noted by the [United States Supreme] Court in that opinion, within the spectrum of interests that the Court has regarded as quasi-sovereign is included a state's interest in the economic well-being of its people. 458 U.S. at 606 (quoting Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 324 U.S. 439, 65 S. Ct. 716, 89 L. Ed. 1051 . . . (1945) (in which the state of Georgia had asserted that a large number of railroad companies had conspired to fix rates in a discriminatory way that violated antitrust laws)). The [United States Supreme] Court, while pointing out that a state claiming such standing must allege more "than injury to an identifiable group of individuals residents[,]" also stated that "the indirect effects of the injury must be considered as well in determining whether the State has alleged injury to a sufficiently substantial segment of its population." 458 U.S. at 607.

TAP II, 885 A.2d at 1143.

In TAP II, this Court determined that the Commonwealth asserted its own quasi-sovereign interest because "[t]he Complaint contends that the use of AWPs has affected the economic health and well-being of its citizens by requiring those purchasers and reimbursers of the Defendants' [*439] drugs to pay inflated amounts for the Defendants' drugs." Id. at 1144. Critical to this Court's determination that the Commonwealth had parens patriae standing was that had the drug companies not "inflated the AWPs the Commonwealth may have been better able to provide needed medications to more citizens than it has" and that the "inflated AWPs affected the extent of benefits to which those covered under the Commonwealth's programs could claim entitlement." Id. at 1144 n.9.

Here, this Court must conclude that the Department lacks parens patriae standing. First, unlike TAP II, the Department fails to allege that the violations of the CDCA and the LIPL affected the efficacy or reach [41] of a Commonwealth-sponsored benefits program or government entitlement. Also, the Department fails to allege any other legitimate quasi-sovereign governmental interest. Specifically, if the potential claims of Advance America's borrowers are set aside, as the parens patriae case law directs, the Department is left without a concrete, independent, and direct interest to protect.

Second, the damages sought by the Department do not represent a quasi-sovereign interest but that of the individual borrower. The monetary relief the Department seeks in Count 2 of the Amended Complaint is premised on the numerous remedies available to individual borrowers under the LIPL. Specifically, an action for unlawful interest under Section 501 of the LIPL, with the right to claim three times the amount of unlawful interest charged under Section 502 of the LIPL, and finally, attorney fees and costs under Section 503(a) of the LIPL.

Last, if this Court were to conclude that the Department has parens patriae standing, Advance America would be exposed to liability once from the Department, and second from individual borrowers that have either filed an action or plan to file an action. [20] Again, the LIPL mandates [42] a particular remedy for the wronged party. HN16[]

[19] The Department cites this case to support its argument that it has parens patraie standing.

[20] Additionally, there are serious due process questions as to whether Advance America may face litigation a second time based upon the same transaction. In fact, Advance America directs this Court's attention to "[t]he Commonwealth's [Department's] concern about NCAS [Advance America] escaping with ill-gotten gains ignores pending class action lawsuits seeking to recover

"Where . . . there is a clear statutory remedy, which is adequate, it is exclusive." (footnote omitted). Department of Environmental Resources v. Williams, 57 Pa. Commw. 8, 425 A.2d 871, 872-73 (Pa. Cmwlth. 1981).

4. Whether The Department May Seek Declaratory Relief To Enforce The CDCA And The LIPL

The Department alleges in Count 2 of the Amended Complaint that it is entitled to the following relief:

> A. declaratory [43] judgment that (1) Advance America offered its line of credit product in violation of the Loan Interest and Protection Law; (2) the loan agreements that Advance America entered into with consumers [borrowers] in connection with its line of credit products were illegal, void, and unenforceable; and (3) Advance America is barred from collecting any principal, interest, or other charges in connection with the line of credit product.

[*440] Amended Complaint, the Wherefore Clause A. at 12. Alternatively, the Department asserts that Advance America waived its argument that the Department lacked the statutory authority to request declaratory relief [21] once there was a failure to object to the Department's request for declaratory relief in the original complaint.

Section 506(a) of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 506(a), HN18[] provides that "[w]hen the Attorney General has reason to believe that any person has violated the provisions of this act . . . he shall have standing to bring a civil action for injunctive relief and other such relief as may be appropriate to secure compliance with this act . . . ." (emphasis added).

Section 503.C of the Banking Code, 71 P.S. § 733-503.C., HN19[] provides that "[t]he department may maintain an action in Commonwealth Court, or any other court of competent jurisdiction for an injunction or other process against any person to restrain and prevent the person from engaging in any activity violating this act or any other statute . . . ." (emphasis added).

Advance America responds that the above-stated statutes clearly provide only such necessary relief as to bring a lender into compliance with the law. The LIPL and the Banking Code do not authorize "the backward-looking relief the Department is seeking." Reply Memorandum Brief of Defendants' Preliminary Objections to Amended Complaint at 21. This Court agrees.

The Department, under the LIPL and the Banking Code, sought and was granted injunctive relief to [45] enjoin Advance America from continuing to offer its credit line of products to Pennsylvania borrowers. HN20[] Although, as referred to earlier, the LIPL does provide numerous remedies for the borrower, in addition to injunctive relief, the LIPL does not contain a provision that authorizes voiding the principal loan. As our Pennsylvania Supreme Court noted, "[t]here is no doubt that the note [loan] called for a usurious rate of interest . . . this defect, however, rendered the note [loan] not void, but only voidable as to the interest specified beyond the lawful rate." (citation omitted and emphasis added). Mulcahy v. Loftus, 439 Pa. 111, 112, 267 A.2d 872, 873 (1970). [22] three times the alleged overcharges NCAS [Advance America] generated in its loan program." Johnson v. Advance America, Cash Advance Centers, Inc., No. 07-3142 (E.D. Pa. filed August 1, 2007); and Clerk v. Cash America Net of Nevada, LLC, No. 09-02245 (E.D. Pa. filed May 19, 2009). See Defendants' Reply Memorandum in Support of Preliminary Objections to Amended Complaint at 19 n.10.

[21] 42 Pa. C.S. § 7532 provides:

> HN17[] Courts of record, within their respective jurisdictions, shall have power to declare rights, status, and other legal relations whether or not further relief is or could be claimed. No action or proceeding shall be open to objection on the ground that a declaratory judgment or degree is prayed for. The declaration may be either affirmative or negative in form and effect, and such declarations shall have the force [44] and effect of a final judgment.

[22] In Mulcahy, our Pennsylvania Supreme Court interpreted Section 1 of the Act of May 28, 1858, P.L. 622, 41 P.S. § 3 which was the predecessor to the LIPL.

Alternatively, Advance America rebuts that its failure to object to the request for declaratory relief in the original complaint precludes Advance America from now objecting. Cogently, Advance America maintains that "[t]he original Complaint was amended to include, inter alia, a new defendant, a new plaintiff and a new and different declaratory judgment request [where] [t]he [46] original complaint sought only a 'declaratory judgment that Advance America's Monthly Participation Fee is not authorized by Pennsylvania law . . . .'" See Defendants' Reply Memorandum in Support of Preliminary Objections to the Amended Complaint at 20. Advance America properly concludes that "[given the radically different relief the Commonwealth [Department] now requests [*441] against both defendants [Advance America and AA] in the Amended Complaint, defendants [Advance America and AA] clearly did not waive the right to assert their Objection." See Reply Memorandum at 20. This Court rejects the Department's final argument and sustains Defendants' preliminary objection to Count 2 of the Amended Complaint.

V. Whether The Attorney General Has Adequately Pled A Per Se Violation Of The Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law (UTPCPL) Under Count 3 Of the Amended Complaint

The Attorney General [23] first alleges in Count 3 of the Amended Complaint that Advance America's violation of the CDCA, as found by this Court in NCAS I, and Advance America's alleged violation of the LIPL in the present matter constitutes a per se violation of the UTPCPL. See Defendants' Memorandum of Law in Support [47] of Preliminary Objections at 17 and Amended Complaint, Paragraph 49 at 13. Specifically, the Attorney General alleges that Advance America engaged in providing loans to Pennsylvania consumers/borrowers without a license and charged an interest rate to Pennsylvania consumers/borrowers in excess of the maximum lawful rate of six percent in violation of Section 3 of the CDCA, 7 P.S. § 6203, and Section 201 of the LIPL, 41 P.S. § 201, respectively.

A review of the provisions of the UTPCPL fail to establish that a violation of either the CDCA or the LIPL constitutes a per se violation of the UTPCPL. The Attorney General also fails to direct this Court to such a provision in the UTPCPL, or for that matter, any provision in the CDCA, the LIPL, or the Banking Code that expressly states a violation of these statutes automatically [48] constitutes a per se violation of the UTPCPL.

To the contrary, Advance America directs this Court to numerous statutes [24] that specifically provide that a violation of a certain statute amounts to a violation of the UTPCPL. For example, 42 Pa. C.S. § 2524 (penalty for unauthorized practice of law) provides that (c) "[i]n addition to criminal prosecution, unauthorized practice of law may be enjoined in any county court of common pleas having personal jurisdiction over the defendant . . . [a] violation of subsection (a) is also a violation of the . . . Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law." (emphasis added).

66 Pa. C.S. § 2905(g)(enforcement) provides that (3) "[f]ailure of a telephone message service to comply with this section shall be a violation of the . . . Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law . . . and 18 Pa.C.S. Ch. 39 (relating to theft and related offenses). (emphasis added).

Also, 42 Pa. C.S. § 6909 (Lessor's liability for noncompliance) (a) [49] (violation of the law) provides that "[a] violation of this chapter shall constitute a violation of the . . . Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law, and shall be subject to [*442] the enforcement provisions and private rights of action contained in that act as limited in this section" and (e) (counterclaim or defense) "[a] lessee may not take any action to offset any amount for which a lessor is potentially liable under the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law . . . ." (emphasis added).

[23] Section 4 of the UTPCPL, 73 P.S. § 201-4, HN21[] provides that "[w]henever the Attorney General . . . has reason to believe that any person is using or about to use any method, act or practice declared by section 3 of this act to be unlawful, and that proceeding would be in the public interest, he may bring an action in the name of the Commonwealth against such person . . . ."

[24] Defendants cite to nineteen other statutes that explicitly state a violation of that particular statute is a violation of UTPCPL. See Defendants' Memorandum of Law in Support of Preliminary Objections at 21-22.

HN22[] "It is a principle of statutory construction that when a legislature adopts a statute it must be presumed that it does so with full knowledge of existing statutes relating to the same subject." (citations omitted). Seliga v. State Employes' Retirement System, 682 A.2d 77, 79 (Pa. Cmwlth. 1996). "Thus, where a section of a statute contains a given provision, the omission of that provision from a similar section is significant to show a different intention existed." (citation omitted). Id. at 79. HN23[] This Court concludes the General Assembly did not intend for a violation of either the CDCA or the LIPL to constitute a per se violation of the UTPCPL. [25] Therefore, this Court must reject [50] the Attorney General's position and sustain Defendants' preliminary objection to the per se violation allegations in Count 3 of the Amended Complaint.

VI. Whether The Attorney General Adequately Pled A Violation Of The UTPCPL Under Count 3 And Count 4 Of The Amended Complaint

Next, the Attorney General alleges in Count 3 of the Amended Complaint that Advance America "held itself out" as a lawful lender offering a lawful credit product and as a result Advance America employed an unfair or deceptive act or practice as defined in Section 2(4)(ii)-(iii), (v), and (xxi) of the UTPCPL, [52] 73 P.S. § 201-2(4)(ii)-(iii), (v), and (xxi). See Amended Complaint, Count 3, Paragraphs 51 and 52 at 13-14. [26]

[*443] Additionally, in Count 4 of the Amended Complaint, the Attorney General alleges that Advance America represented to Pennsylvania consumers/borrowers that the finance charge on the loan was at a 5.98% interest when in fact it was at a much higher interest rate after the $ 149.95 monthly participation fee was added. See Amended Complaint, Count 4, Paragraphs 58-61 at 16. Again, the Attorney General alleges that Advance

[25] Defendants in the reply brief memorandum persuasively distinguish the four cases that the Attorney General cites in support of the per se violation argument:

> The AG [Attorney General] relies on four cases to support that 'violation of other consumer protection legislation are deemed a violation of the CPL.' (Pl. Br. 32.) None of those cases, however, stands for so broad a proposition. Hammer v. Nikol, 659 A.2d 617 (Pa. Commw. Ct. 1995), merely held that unlawful conduct that is also fraudulent violates the UTPCPL. Id. at 620 (conduct that violated a city ordinance also violated the UTPCPL because the trial court record showed all the elements of common fraud). And the three remaining cases, Commonwealth v. Peoples Benefit Services, 923 A.2d 1230 (Pa. Commw. Ct. 2007), Commonwealth v. Tolleson, . . . 14 Pa. Commw. 72, 321 A.2d 664 [(Pa. Cmwlth. 1974)], and Commonwealth v. Armstrong, 74 Pa. D. & C.2d 579, 583 (C.P. Phila. Co. 1974), all involved violations of the Fictitious Names Act ("FNA") [the FNA is presently codified at 54 Pa. C.S. § [§] 301. . . [-332] [51] a law that is aimed at preventing one of the chief wrongdoings identified in the UTPCPL-confusing consumers about the 'source' of a good or service. 73 P.S. § 201-2(4)(ii)].
> Unlike the FNA, neither the CDCA nor the LIPL has as its primary aim the prevention of fraud or deceit. The AG [Attorney General] concedes this, acknowledging that these laws protect consumers from paying too much interest. (footnotes and citations omitted and emphasis in original).

See Defendants' Reply Memorandum in Support of Preliminary Objections to the Amended Complaint at 29.

Defendants also distinguish the other cases cited by the Attorney General in support of per se liability. See Defendants' Reply Memorandum in Support of Preliminary Objections to the Amended Complaint at 30-32.

[26] The Attorney General also alleges in Count 3 of the Amended Complaint:

> 54. In furtherance of their common interests and pursuant to a common design, AA created Advance America and established its loan centers to offer the line of credit product in the Commonwealth, when it knew or should have known that Advance America was thereby violating the Consumer Protection Law [UTPCPL].
> 55. AA rendered substantial assistance to Advance America to establish and operate loan centers and offer the line of credit product in the Commonwealth . . . .

Amended Complaint, Paragraphs 54 and 55 at 14.

America's conduct was unfair and deceptive as defined in Section 2(4)(ii)-(iii), [53] (v), and (xxi) of the UTPCPL, 73 P.S. § 201-2(4)(ii)-(iii), (v), and (xxi). [27]

Defendants preliminarily object and assert that the Attorney General has not identified any representation that Advance America made concerning the lawfulness of its operation or product and that such a representation may not be implied from Advance America's placement of its product on the market. This Court disagrees.

In Feeney v. Disston Manor Personal Care Home, 2004 PA Super 114, 849 A.2d 590, 597 (Pa. Super.), appeal denied, 581 Pa. 691, 864 A.2d 529 (2004), our Pennsylvania Superior Court noted:

> HN24[] In order to state a claim under UTPCPL, a plaintiff must allege one of the 'unfair or deceptive practices' set forth in 73 P.S. § 201-2(4)(i)-(xxi) . . . .
> The general purpose of the UTPCPL is to protect the public from fraud and unfair or deceptive business practices, and the statute is the principal means for doing so in the Commonwealth . . . . [28] (citations omitted and emphasis added).

[*444] Further, in Commonwealth v. Peoples Benefit Services, Inc., 923 A.2d 1230, 1236-37 (Pa. Cmwlth. 2007), this Court also noted:

[27] The Attorney General again alleges that AA rendered substantial assistance to Advance America with knowledge that Advance America was violating the UTPCPL. Amended Complaint, Paragraphs 63 and 64 at 16-17.

[28] In Feeney, our Superior Court stated [54] the elements of common law fraud that must be proven in order to recover under the catchall provisions of Section 2(4)(xxi) of the UTPCPL:

> [A] plaintiff must demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence: (1) a representation; (2) which is material to the transaction at hand; (3) made falsely, with knowledge of its falsity or recklessness as to whether it is true or false; (4) with the intent of misleading another into relying on it; (5) justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation; and (6) the resulting injury was proximately caused by the reliance . . . .

Id. at 597.

However, HN25[] this Court has adopted a less restrictive interpretation for pleading fraud after the 1996 amendments to the UTPCPL than pleading common law fraud. In Commonwealth v. Percudani, 825 A.2d 743 (Pa. Cmwlth. 2004), this Court stated:

> This Court has not addressed the 1996 amendments to the Law [UTPCPL] and their effect on pleading fraud under Section 2(4)(xxi). In our research, we have uncovered two divergent views. The Superior Court of Pennsylvania has issued several opinions after the 1996 amendments in which it continues to state that a plaintiff must allege the elements of common law fraud in order to recover under [55] the catchall provisions of Section 2(4)(xxi) . . . .
> Conversely, several decisions of the Bankruptcy Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania have rejected the Superior Court's adherence to the pre-1996 pleadings requirement . . . .In Rodriguez v. Mellon Bank, N.A., 218 B.R. 764 (Bankr.E.D.Pa.1998) . . . the Bankruptcy Court rejected the pre-1996 pleadings requirements noting that the Legislature's addition of the words 'or deceptive conduct' signals an approval of a less restrictive interpretation of the law and affirms the Supreme Court's position that the Law [UTPCPL] should be liberally construed.
> In Flores [v. Shapiro & Kreisman, 246 F.Supp.2d 427 Bankr.E.D. 2002] the Bankruptcy Court . . . noted that maintaining the pre-1996 pleading requirements would render the words 'or deceptive conduct' redundant and superfluous, which is contrary to the rules of statutory construction . . . .
> Prior to 1996, the Law [UTPCPL] merely prohibited 'other fraudulent conduct.' The Legislature's intervention in 1996 in conjunction with the Supreme Court's pronouncement that the Law [UTPCPL] is to be liberally construed and the Superior Court's continuing . . . restrictive view of the Law [UTPCPL] [56] leads us to conclude that the position adopted by the Bankruptcy Court is that which would be espoused by the Supreme Court. (citations omitted and emphasis added)

Id. at 746-47.

> HN26[] An act or a practice is deceptive or unfair if it has the 'capacity or tendency to deceive' . . . . Neither the intention to deceive nor actual deception must be proved; rather, it need only be shown that the acts and practices are capable of being interpreted in a misleading way . . . . The test for the court is to determine the overall impression arising from the totality of what is said, as well as what is reasonably implied, in the advertisement or solicitation . . . . Moreover, we are cognizant of our [S]upreme [C]ourt's directive that the UTPCPL is to be construed liberally to effectuate its objective of protecting consumers of this Commonwealth from fraud and unfair or deceptive business practices. (citations omitted and emphasis added).

Here, the Attorney General specifically alleges that Advance America's offering a line of credit product to the Pennsylvania consumer/borrower at [57] an excessive rate of interest was unfair and deceptive conduct in violation of Section 2(4)(ii)-(iii), (v), and (xxi) of the UTPCPL, 73 P.S. § 201-2(4)(ii)-(iii), (v), and (xxi).

Section 2(4) of the UTPCPL, 73 P.S. § 201-2(4), provides:

> HN27[] (ii) Causing likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding as to the source, sponsorship, approval or certification of goods or services; (emphasis added).
> (iii) Causing likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding as to affiliation, connection or association with, or certification by another;
> . . . .
> (v) Representing that goods or services have sponsorship, approval, characteristics, ingredients, uses, benefits or quantities that they do not have or that a person has a sponsorship, approval, status, affiliation or connection that he does not have; (emphasis added).
> . . . .
> (xxi) Engaging in any other fraudulent or deceptive conduct which creates a likelihood of confusion or of misunderstanding. (emphasis added)

A fair reading of the Amended Complaint states that Advance America injured the economic health and well-being of the Pennsylvania consumer/borrower by illegally charging sham interest. The Attorney General's allegations strike at the core of Advance [58] America's credit loan, i.e. that the monthly participation fee, as a matter of law, was tantamount to sham interest in excess of six percent. [29] Therefore, this Court must overrule Defendants' preliminary objections to Count 3 of the Amended Complaint. This Court concludes that the Attorney General adequately pled a violation of the UTPCPL. The same conclusion [*445] is reached regarding Count 4 of the Amended Complaint. [30]

[29] The Attorney General illustrates to this Court that Defendants conduct was deceptive in that the use of the phony monthly participation fee resulted "in a real interest rate of 368%" which is plainly "unfair." See Plaintiffs' Brief in Opposition to Defendants' Preliminary Objections at 43.

[30] Defendants contend that "any disclosure of the Monthly Participation Fee by Advance America as part of the finance charge would violate the disclosure requirements of TILA and Reg Z [12 C.F.R. § 226.5(b)]. The AG's [Attorney General's] claim is therefore, preempted by federal law." See Defendants' Preliminary Objections to Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint at 28.

Section 1610(b) of the TILA, 15 U.S.C. § 1610(b) provides:

> HN28[] State credit charge statues. Except as provided in section 129 [15 USCS § 1639], [59] this title . . . does not otherwise annul, alter or affect in any manner, scope or applicability of the laws of any State, including, but not limited to, laws relating to the types, amounts or rates of charges, or any element or charges, permissible under such laws in connection with the extension or use of credit, nor does this title . . . extend the applicability of those laws to any class of persons or transactions to which they would otherwise apply . . . . (emphasis added).
> Regulation Z, 12 CFR § 226.1 provides that "[t]he regulation does not govern charges for consumer credit." (emphasis added).

VII. Conclusion.

Accordingly, this Court sustains Defendants' preliminary objections to Count 1 and Count 2 of the Amended Complaint. Additionally, this Court sustains Defendants' preliminary objections to Count 3 of the Amended Complaint that Advance America's violation of the UTPCPL constituted a per se violation of the CDCA and the LIPL. Last, this Court overrules Defendants' preliminary objections to Count 3 and Count 4 of the Amended Complaint that the Attorney General failed to adequately plead a violation of the UTPCPL.

Corbett, Jr.'s (Plaintiffs') Amended Complaint are sustained; (2) Defendants' preliminary objection to Count 3 of Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint is sustained as to the Attorney General's allegations that Advance America's violation of the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law (UTPCPL) was a per se violation of the Consumer Discount Company Act and the Loan Interest Protection Law; (3) Defendants' preliminary objection to Count 3 and Count 4 of the Amended Complaint that the Attorney General failed to adequately plead a violation of the UTPCPL are overruled; and (4) Defendants are directed to file a responsive pleading within twenty (20) days of this order concerning the violation of the UTPCPL.

CONCURRING OPINION BY JUDGE LEAVITT

I join the majority's opinion, which I admire for its thorough and well reasoned analysis. I write separately to explain further why the Attorney General does not enjoy parens patriae authority in a usury case to seek damages on behalf of individual citizens, who may wish to pursue such actions on their own [62] behalf.

The Attorney General cogently responds that there is "no claim that the Defendants [Advance America] failed to comply with TILA or the accompanying Reg Z with respect to its disclosure . . . Defendants' [Advance America's] argument assumes that the so-called 'Monthly Participation Fee' was in fact 'charged for participation in a credit plan on a monthly basis.'" See Plaintiffs' Brief in Opposition to Defendants' Preliminary Objections at 43. "The Commonwealth, on the other hand, contends that this 'fee' was nothing more than a ruse, artifice, and a subterfuge that was actually 'interest' [60] as defined by Pennsylvania law." See Plaintiffs' Brief in Opposition to Defendants' Preliminary Objections at 43. This Court agrees with the Attorney General that Advance America may not raise the provisions of the TILA as a defense to avoid liability under the UTPCPL.

The powers of the Attorney General begin with the Pennsylvania Constitution, and it states, in relevant part, as follows:

> An Attorney General shall be chosen by the qualified electors of the Commonwealth …[.] [H]e shall be the chief law [*448] officer of the Commonwealth and shall exercise such powers and perform such duties as may be imposed by law.

PA. CONST. art. IV, § 4.1 (emphasis added). The law that imposes those powers and duties is the Commonwealth Attorneys Act, Act of October 15, 1980, P.L. 950, as amended, 71 P.S. §§ 732-101 - 732-506. Further, that act is the exclusive source of the Attorney General's powers; stated otherwise, the Attorney General's powers and duties have no basis in the common law, which is the source of the parens patriae doctrine. [1]

This was not always the case. Article IV, section 4.1 was added to the Pennsylvania Constitution by amendment in 1978. Prior to that amendment, the Attorney General was appointed by the governor; he, or she, served as a member of the governor's cabinet as head of the Department of Justice. Then, the Attorney General's powers and duties were set forth in the Administrative Code of 1929, Act of April 9, 1929, P.L. 177, as amended, 71 P.S. §§ 51 - 732, and they were augmented by common law powers. In a landmark case, Minerd v. Margiotti, 325 Pa. 17, 188 A. 524 (1936), our Supreme Court expounded at some length on the historic antecedents of the Attorney General's common law power. It concluded [64] that Pennsylvania's Attorney General > is clothed with the powers and attributes which enveloped Attorneys General at common law, including the right … to supersede and set aside the district attorney when in the Attorney General's judgment such action may be necessary.

Id. at 30-31, 188 A. at 530 (emphasis added).

The Attorney General's common law powers were not limited to the power to supersede a district attorney. The Attorney General also enjoyed the common law power to intervene in charitable trust cases on behalf of the citizens of Pennsylvania. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. The Barnes Foundation, 398 Pa. 458, 467, 159 A.2d 500, 505 (1960) (holding that the Attorney General enjoys the common law power to participate in litigation involving charitable trusts).

In 1978, our Supreme Court overruled Minerd, finding "the reasoning in this line of decisions to be erroneous…." Commonwealth v. Schab, 477 Pa. 55, 60, 383 A.2d 819, 821 (1978). Accordingly, the Supreme Court held that the Attorney General lacked the power to supersede a district attorney in a criminal law enforcement matter. That same year the voters adopted Article IV, section 4.1 to institute the selection of our Attorney General [65] by election, as opposed to gubernatorial appointment.

Thereafter, the newly elected Attorney General attempted to supersede a district attorney in a criminal case, arguing that the holding in Schab was no longer viable in light of the constitutional amendment. Specifically, in Commonwealth v. Carsia, [*449] 512 Pa. 509, 517 A.2d 956 (1986), the Attorney General argued that the > Commonwealth Attorneys Act is but one source of the Attorney General's powers, and that, moreover, the language of Article 4, section 4.1, of our state constitution and that of the Act evidence an intent to retain the common law powers of the Attorney General.

[1] The origin of the parens patriae doctrine can be traced to medieval England. Conceptually, the doctrine is derived from the king's royal prerogative to act as the guardian of an individual unable to protect his own interests. The attorney general, at common law, was the chief legal representative of the sovereign in the courts and was the only officer who could prosecute on behalf of the people in order to protect the interests [63] of the crown. As in England, a colonial attorney general, acting as the chief legal officer of a British colony, enjoyed broad common law power to bring suit in parens patriae on behalf of colonial citizens. Jay L. Himes, State Parens Patriae Authority: The Evolution of the State Attorney General's Authority 1-2, 18-19 (The Institute for Law and Economic Policy Symposium paper, Apr. 23, 2004), available at http://www.abanet.org/antitrust/at-committees/at-state/pdf/publications/other-pubs/parens.pdf.

Id. at 512, 517 A.2d at 957-958 (emphasis added). The Supreme Court soundly rejected the claim that the Pennsylvania Constitution conferred any common law powers upon the elected Attorney General.

Our Supreme Court explained the meaning of Article IV, section 4.1 of the Pennsylvania Constitution as follows:

> In our view, the use of the language "as may be imposed" clearly shows an extension of power to the legislature to statutorily define and regulate the powers and duties of the Attorney General.
> The General Assembly utilized that grant of constitutional powers in [66] 1980, and enacted the Commonwealth Attorneys Act. That Act made it clear that the powers of the state Attorney General are no longer an emanation from some bed of common law precepts, but are now strictly a matter of legislative designation and enumeration.

Id. at 513, 517 A.2d at 958 (emphasis added). In sum, under the Pennsylvania Constitution, the powers of the Attorney General are "strictly a matter of legislative designation and enumeration." Id.

In reaching this conclusion, the Supreme Court relied expressly upon a report of the Joint State Government Commission that had been prepared on the legislation needed to establish the scope and powers of the new Office of Attorney General. The Commission's final report explained that > [l]egislation enacted by the General Assembly is the exclusive source of the powers and duties of the elected Attorney General pursuant to Article IV, Section 4.1....

JOINT STATE GOV'T COMM'N, OFFICE OF ELECTED ATTORNEY GENERAL, FINAL REPORT 4 (1978). The legislation that was the subject of the Joint State Government Commission's report became the Commonwealth Attorneys Act.

The Commonwealth Attorneys Act does not invest the Attorney General with the parens patriae [67] power that may have existed as a matter of common law prior to the Schab decision. However, the Act has invested the Attorney General with this type of power, i.e., the power to initiate actions on behalf of citizens, in two circumstances. The Attorney General is invested with authority to intervene in charitable matters on behalf of citizens. 71 P.S. § 732-204(c). [2] Likewise, the Attorney General is authorized to represent the Commonwealth "and its citizens in any action brought for violation of the antitrust laws of the United States and the Commonwealth." Id. (emphasis added). The Commonwealth has not enacted a state antitrust statute, as expected. [3]

[*450] In Commonwealth v. TAP Pharmaceutical Products, Inc., 885 A.2d 1127 (Pa. Cmwlth. 2005) (TAP II), the Attorney General filed suit against pharmaceutical companies under the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law, Act of December 17, 1968, P.L. 1224, as amended, 73 P.S. §§ 201-1 - 201-9.3. The Attorney General asserted that he had parens patriae authority to pursue damages on behalf of Pennsylvania's citizens for "common law claims and claims under [the Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law]." Attorney General Brief, TAP II, at 48. In preliminary objections, the respondents asserted that the Attorney General had

[2] It states, in relevant part:

> The Attorney General shall represent the Commonwealth and all Commonwealth agencies and upon request, the Departments of Auditor General and State Treasury and the Public Utility Commission in any action brought by or against the Commonwealth or its agencies, and may intervene in any other action, including those involving charitable bequests and trusts or the constitutionality of any statute.

71 P.S. § 732-204(c) (emphasis added).

[3] At the time the Joint State Government Commission filed its report, the General [68] Assembly was considering 1977 House Bill 845, intended to create intrastate antitrust enforcement authority for the Attorney General. JOINT STATE GOV'T COMM'N, OFFICE OF ELECTED ATTORNEY GENERAL, FINAL REPORT 11 (1978). The bill died in committee and never passed the House. Pennsylvania General Assembly, Bill Information, Regular Session 1977-1978, House Bill 845, available at http://www.legis.state.pa.us/cfdocs/billinfo/billinfo.cfm?syear=1977&sind=0&body=H&type=B&BN=0845.

improperly invoked parens patriae powers because he had not identified a sovereign [69] interest in the challenged conduct, i.e, overpricing. Finding that the Attorney General's complaint identified a quasi-sovereign interest in his claim for damages, we overruled the respondents' preliminary objections.

In considering the respondents' preliminary objections in TAP II, this Court relied upon the parens patriae analysis of Snapp v. Puerto Rico, 458 U.S. 592, 102 S. Ct. 3260, 73 L. Ed. 2d 995 (1982), the leading case on the scope of a state's parens patriae authority. Briefly, the United States Supreme Court held in Snapp that, generally, a state may not sue on behalf of its citizens without showing that a separate sovereign interest will also be served. Id. at 607. In this case, the majority concludes, correctly, that the Attorney General's complaint exceeds the bounds of parens patriae as enunciated in Snapp because the sovereign interest is not implicated in the complaint.

Snapp explains the ambit of a state's parens patriae powers. However, it does not require a state to exercise parens patriae authority on behalf of its citizens, and it does not identify which state official will exercise those powers. These questions can only be determined by each state in accordance with its own constitution. In Pennsylvania, [70] our Constitution has limited the Attorney General's powers to those established by "legislative designation and enumeration." Carsia, 512 Pa. at 513, 517 A.2d at 958. [4] The legislature has authorized the Attorney General to bring suit "on behalf of citizens," a parens patriae power, but only for violations of the Federal antitrust laws. [5] Neither the Commonwealth Attorneys Act nor any of Pennsylvania's usury laws authorize the Attorney General to seek damages "on behalf of citizens" for violations of our usury statutes. [6]

[*451] The General Assembly has charged the Attorney General with responsibility for enforcement of the Commonwealth's usury laws. Notably absent from that authority is the power to recover damages on behalf of individual borrowers. Absent this legislative "designation and enumeration," the conclusion that the Attorney General lacks parens patriae authority in this case could not be clearer given our Supreme Court's holding in Carsia, 512 Pa. 509, 517 A.2d 956.

[*446] CONCURRING and DISSENTING OPINION BY JUDGE SIMPSON

I concur in the thoughtful majority opinion regarding Counts III and IV of the Amended Complaint. I respectfully dissent, however, as to Counts I (violation of the Consumer Discount Company Act (CDCA) [1]) and II (violation of

[4] State agencies, which are creatures of statute, do not enjoy common law powers. See Aetna Casualty and Surety Company v. Insurance Department, 536 Pa. 105, 118, 638 A.2d 194, 200 (1994) (holding that an agency can "only exercise those powers which have been conferred upon it by the Legislature in clear and unmistakable language") (quotation omitted).

[5] Should Pennsylvania ever enact a state antitrust law, the Attorney General's power to bring suit on behalf of citizens will extend to that law as well.

[1] Act of April 8, 1973, P.L. 262, as amended, 7 P.S. §§ 6201-6219.

the act commonly known as Loan Interest and Protection Law (LIPL) [2]). For the following reasons, I would overrule objections to those Counts, thereby allowing all the Counts to proceed through [72] the pleadings.

I part company with the majority over whether the Plaintiffs, both of which are Commonwealth parties, may assert claims for declaratory relief and recovery of excessive interest from loans to Pennsylvania borrowers from Advance America. I believe claims for these types of relief are sufficiently stated.

Among other arguments, the Plaintiff Commonwealth parties assert statutory authority for their claims under Section 503(C) of the Department of Banking Code (Quo warranto or injunction proceedings; conduct of administrative proceedings relating to institutions and credit unions). [3] That Section provides:

> The [D]epartment may maintain an action in Commonwealth Court or any other court of competent jurisdiction for an injunction or other process against any person to restrain and prevent the person from engaging in any activity violating this act or any other statute or regulation within the [D]epartment's jurisdiction to administer or enforce.

71 P.S. § 733-503(C) (emphasis added). This provision expressly grants the Department of Banking authority [73] to seek remedies beyond injunctions for statutes it is required to administer. The CDCA is such a statute.

Further, the Plaintiff Commonwealth parties assert statutory authority for their claims under Section 506(a) of the LIPL (Enforcement), which provides:

> (a) When the Attorney General has reason to believe that any person has violated the provisions of this act, or the regulations promulgated hereunder, he shall have standing to bring a civil action for injunctive relief and such other relief as may be appropriate to secure compliance with this act or the regulations promulgated hereunder.

41 P.S. § 506(a) (emphasis added). This provision expressly gives the Attorney General authority to seek remedies beyond injunctions.

The majority concludes that remedies beyond those seeking compliance are not authorized. Because prospective compliance has been secured by a previously entered injunction, no further remedies are available. Respectfully, I disagree.

The Plaintiff Commonwealth parties aver that Advance America collected tens of millions of dollars of illegal revenue from thousands of Pennsylvania residents. Am. Compl. [74] at PP 21, 25. At this early stage of the litigation, we must accept [*447] these averments as true. I believe the ongoing retention by Advance America of tens of millions of dollars of revenue collected in violation of the CDCA and the LIPL is not in compliance with the statutes. Therefore, I would overrule the preliminary objections to Counts I and II.

II.

[2] Act of January 30, 1974, P.L. 13, as amended, 41 P.S. §§ 101-605.

[3] Act of May 15, 1933, P.L. 565, as amended, 71 P.S. § 733.503(C).

Furthermore, I believe the Plaintiff Commonwealth parties enjoy parens patriae standing to recover monetary damages in Counts I and II on behalf of the citizens of the Commonwealth. Our Court recently discussed parens patriae standing in Commonwealth ex rel. Pappert v. TAP Pharmaceutical Products, Inc. 885 A.2d 1127, 1143-44 (Pa. Cmwlth. 2005) (suit by Attorney General in parens patriae on behalf of Pennsylvania citizens injured by pharmaceutical companies through allegedly improper conduct that caused Commonwealth entities and citizens to pay inflated prices for pharmaceuticals).

Here, as in TAP Pharmaceutical Products, the Commonwealth's Amended Complaint alleges sufficient facts supporting the Commonwealth's position. Specifically, the Amended Complaint contains averments that the Commonwealth brought suit to protect its sovereign interest [75] in enforcing the statutory scheme enacted by the General Assembly for the regulation of lenders and the Commonwealth's quasi-sovereign interest in the economic well-being of its citizens. Am. Compl. at P4. The Commonwealth further avers its belief that Advance America offered its line of credit product to thousands of customers in Pennsylvania, and that by illegally charging consumers the Monthly Participation Fee on its line of credit product, together with an interest rate of 5.98%, Advance America injured the economic health and well-being of the Commonwealth's citizens. Am. Compl. at PP21, 39.

Also, in TAP Pharmaceutical Products this Court relied heavily on a United States Supreme Court decision in Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. v. Puerto Rico, 458 U.S. 592, 102 S. Ct. 3260, 73 L. Ed. 2d 995 (1982). In that case, the United States Supreme Court offered an indication helpful in determining whether an alleged injury to the welfare of its citizens suffices to give a State standing to sue as parens patriae: whether the injury is one that the State, if it could, would likely attempt to address through its sovereign lawmaking powers. Id. at 607. Here, the injury alleged, excessive interest and related charges, is one which [76] the Commonwealth attempted to address through its sovereign lawmaking powers. Applying the indication suggested by the United States Supreme Court, standing to sue as parens patriae is sufficiently stated.

For all these reasons, I would overrule preliminary objections to Counts I and II of the Amended Complaint, thus allowing all the Counts to proceed through pleadings.

Prior History: [1] Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York (Trager, J.) granting summary judgment for defendants, manufacturers of the antibiotic ciprofloxacin hydrochloride ("Cipro") or generic bioequivalents of Cipro. Bayer agreed to pay the generic challengers, and in exchange the generic firms conceded the validity of the Cipro patent.

After the district court entered judgment below, a panel of this Court held that reverse payment settlements of patent lawsuits do not violate antitrust laws. See *Joblove v. Although by its terms, the Sherman Act prohibits "every" restraint of trade, the United States Supreme Court has long recognized that Congress intended to outlaw only unreasonable restraints. Agreements that have a predictable and pernicious anticompetitive effect, and limited potential for pro-competitive benefit are deemed per se unlawful. Most conduct, however, is subject to so-called "rule of reason" analysis.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Per Se Rule Tests > Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Burden Shifting

HN8[] Per Se Rule Tests, Manifestly Anticompetitive Effects

Rule of reason antitrust analysis proceeds in three steps. First, the plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that the defendant's conduct had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market. If the plaintiff satisfies this burden, the burden then shifts to the defendant to offer evidence that its conduct had pro-competitive effects. If the defendant is able to offer such proof, the burden shifts back to the plaintiff, who must prove that any legitimate competitive effects could have been achieved through less restrictive alternatives.

HN9[] Sherman Act, Scope

Patent settlements, like all private contracts, are subject to antitrust scrutiny. The limited monopolies granted to patent owners do not exempt them from the prohibitions of the Sherman Act. The Sherman Act prevents patentees from obtaining a greater monopoly than was inherent in the relevant patent grant. Thus, like ordinary contracts, patent settlements cannot take the form of "market-sharing agreements." A market-sharing agreement is unlawful on its face. The law does not condone the purchase of protection from uncertain competition any more than it condones the elimination of actual competition.

[*1909] [*100] PER CURIAM:

Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York (Trager, J.) granting summary judgment for defendants. Defendants Bayer AG and its subsidiary Bayer Corporation (collectively "Bayer") own the patent for the active ingredient in the antibiotic ciprofloxacin hydrochloride ("Cipro"). Defendants Barr Laboratories, Inc. ("Barr"), Hoechst Marion Roussel, Inc. ("HMR"), and Watson Pharmaceuticals, Inc. ("Watson") were potential generic manufacturers of Cipro. Plaintiffs are direct purchasers of Cipro, who allege that defendants violated federal antitrust law when they settled a patent infringement lawsuit by entering into collusive agreements that blocked the entry of low-cost [1910] generic [4] versions of Cipro into the prescription drug market.

Hatch-Waxman Settlement Agreements

Bayer is the owner of the patent relating to the active ingredient in Cipro, which has been described as the most prescribed antibiotic in the world. The Cipro patent, U.S. Patent No. 4,670,444, was issued on June 2, 1987 and was scheduled to expire on December 9, 2003. [1]

In 1991, Barr sought to market a generic version of Cipro pursuant to the expedited FDA approval process established by the Drug Price Competition and Patent [*101] Term Restoration Act of 1984 (the "Hatch-Waxman Act"), Pub. L. No. 98-417, 98 Stat. 1585. HN1[] Under the Hatch-Waxman Act, a pharmaceutical company can seek approval to market generic versions of an approved branded drug without having to re-establish the drug's safety and effectiveness by filing an Abbreviated New Drug Application ("ANDA"). 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(A), (8)(B). Where, as here, a generic manufacturer seeks to enter the market before the expiration of the branded firm's patent, it must file [5] a pre-expiration challenge ("paragraph IV" or "ANDA-IV" certification). 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(A)(vii)(IV). The ANDA-IV certification requires the generic firm to demonstrate the bioequivalence of its proposed version of the drug, see 21 C.F.R. § 314.94(a)(9), and to state the basis for its claim of invalidity or noninfringement of the branded firm's patent, see 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(B)(iv)(II).

HN2[] An ANDA-IV certification itself constitutes an act of infringement, triggering the branded manufacturer's right to sue. 35 U.S.C. § 271(e)(2)(A). Indeed, the branded manufacturer must sue within 45 days of receiving notice of the ANDA-IV in order to stay the generic firm's entry into the market. 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iii). [2] Thus, the Hatch-Waxman Act redistributes the relative risks between the patent holder and the generic manufacturer, allowing generic manufacturers to challenge the validity of the patent without incurring the costs of market entry or the risks of damages from infringement. See Ark. Carpenters Health & Welfare Fund v. Bayer AG (In re Ciprofloxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litig.), 544 F.3d 1323, 1338 (Fed. Cir. 2008).

HN3[] The first generic firm to file an ANDA-IV is rewarded with a 180-day exclusive right to market its generic version of the drug. 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iv). [3] However, only the first-filed ANDA-IV is eligible for the 180-day exclusivity period: even if the first filer loses, withdraws, or settles its challenge, subsequent filers do not become eligible for the exclusivity period. [4]

The Bayer-Barr Lawsuit

Barr filed an ANDA-IV challenging Bayer's Cipro patent in October 1991. [5] [*102] Bayer sued Barr for patent infringement in the Southern District of New York within 45 days of its receipt of notice of Barr's filing, triggering the Hatch-Waxman statutory stay. [6] Barr subsequently entered into an agreement with other defendants herein, also potential generic manufacturers of Cipro, to share the costs and benefits of the patent litigation. [1911]

In June 1996, the district court denied the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. In January 1997 -- approximately two weeks prior to the scheduled trial -- Bayer and Barr entered into a "reverse exclusionary payment" (or "pay-for-delay") settlement: that is, the patent holder (Bayer) agreed to pay the alleged infringer to settle the lawsuit, and in exchange, the alleged infringer agreed not to enter the market. [7] Under the terms of the settlement agreement, Bayer agreed to (1) pay $ 49.1 million immediately; (2) make quarterly payments of between $ 12.5 and $ 17.125 million for the duration of the patent except for the last six months prior to the patent's

[2] Although this statutory stay is typically called the [6] "thirty-month stay," in fact the stay can last for over four years. Compare 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(B)(iii) (default maximum duration of stay is thirty months provided notice of ANDA IV is received more than five years after ANDA approval) with § 355(j)(5)(F)(ii) (result of earlier-filed ANDA IV is that stay is lengthened, ending five years plus thirty months after FDA approval of the branded drug).

[3] This 180-day exclusivity period became law without discussion in the relevant House Report and without debate. See H.R. Rep. No. 98-857, p. 1, at 28 (1984), reprinted in 1984 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2647, 2661. Moreover, it was apparently not contemplated at the time of passage that the regulatory scheme would facilitate collusion between branded and generic firms. See e.g., S. Rep. No. 107-167, at 4 (2002) ("Agreeing with [7] smaller rivals to delay or limit competition is an abuse of the Hatch-Waxman law . . . .").

[4] In Joblove v. Barr Labs. Inc, (In re Tamoxifen Citrate Antitrust Litig.), 466 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 2005) (Tamoxifen"), the panel majority suggested otherwise, repeating the district court's claim that the exclusivity period cedes to the first ANDA filer to successfully defend. Compare Tamoxifen, 466 F.3d at 214, with In re Tamoxifen Citrate Antitrust Litig., 277 F. Supp. 2d 121, 134 (E.D.N.Y. 2003). As we discuss in Section 5, infra, this aspect of our Tamoxifen decision was erroneous. See C. Scott Hemphill, Paying for Delay: Pharmaceutical Patent Settlement As a Regulatory Design Problem, 81 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1553, 1583-86 (2006).

[5] Barr claimed that the [8] patent was invalid on the following grounds: (1) obviousness; (2) obviousness type double counting; and (3) inequitable conduct.

[6] The parties subsequently agreed to extend the stay until after the entry of final judgment.

[7] To [9] be more precise, the parties executed separate settlement agreements between: (1) Bayer and Barr, and (2) Bayer and HMR/Rugby, which was subsequently acquired by Watson. Bayer, Barr, and HMR also executed a supply agreement.

expiration; [8] and (3) provide the generic manufacturers a guaranteed license to sell brand-name Cipro at a reduced rate for six months prior to the patent's expiration. In exchange, Barr conceded the patent's validity and agreed not to market a generic version of Cipro prior to the patent's expiration. [9]

Plaintiffs' [10] Antitrust Lawsuit

In 2000, direct and indirect purchasers of Cipro filed over thirty antitrust lawsuits against Bayer under federal and state law. These cases were consolidated by the Multi-District Litigation Panel in the Eastern District of New York. See In re Ciprofloxacin Hydrocholoride Antitrust Litig., 166 F. Supp. 2d 740, 745 (E.D.N.Y. 2001) ("Cipro I"). Plaintiffs allege that defendants' settlement exceeded the scope of Bayer's patent rights because Bayer effectively paid its potential competitors hundreds of millions of dollars not to challenge its patent. Plaintiffs also allege that the agreements were unlawful because Barr was permitted to reclaim the 180-day market exclusivity period if a subsequent challenger was successful in having the patent invalidated, and because the generic manufacturers agreed not to file any ANDA-IV certifications for products that relate to Cipro. But for the challenged agreements, plaintiffs assert that (1) Barr would have entered the market pending resolution of the patent litigation; (2) Barr would have prevailed in the litigation and entered the market; or (3) Bayer would have granted Barr a license to market a generic version [*103] of Cipro to [11] avoid a trial on the patent's validity. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. In re Ciprofloxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litig., 363 F. Supp. 2d 514, 548 (E.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Cipro III"). The court stated:

> The ultimate question -- and this is the crux of the matter -- is not whether Bayer and Barr had the power to adversely affect competition for ciprofloxacin as a whole, but whether any adverse effects on competition stemming from the Agreements were outside the exclusionary zone of the '444 Patent. It goes without saying that patents have adverse effects on competition. However, any adverse effects within the scope of a patent cannot be redressed by antitrust law.

Id. at 523-24 (citations omitted). In eschewing a "post hoc determination of the potential validity of the underlying patent," the court reasoned that "such an approach would undermine the presumption of validity of patents in all cases, as it could not logically be limited to drug patents, and would work a revolution in patent law." Id. at 529.

The district court also found that the agreements did not allow Barr to manipulate the exclusivity period to obstruct [12] subsequent challengers of the patent. Id. at 540-41; see also Cipro II, 261 F. Supp. 2d at 243-47. The court summarized as follows:

> [I]n the absence of any evidence that the Agreements created a bottleneck on challenges to the '444 Patent, or that they otherwise restrained competition beyond the scope of the claims of the '444 Patent, the Agreements have not had any anti-competitive effects on the market for ciprofloxacin beyond that which are permitted [1912] under the '444 Patent. The fact that Bayer paid what in absolute numbers is a handsome sum to Barr to settle its lawsuit does not necessarily reflect a lack of confidence in the '444 Patent, but rather the economic realities of what was at risk. There is simply no precedent for plaintiffs' argument that the parties to a settlement are required to preserve the public's interest in lower prices. Such a rule would only result in parties being less likely to reach settlements, aside from undermining well-settled principles of patent law.

[8] As an alternative to quarterly payments, the settlement gave Bayer the right to either provide Barr with a license to sell Bayer-manufactured Cipro at a royalty rate of 70% of Bayer's average selling price for brand-name Cipro. Bayer elected to make quarterly payments instead. Settlement payments ultimately totaled $ 398.1 million.

[9] Barr reserved its right to reinstate its ANDA-IV if Bayer's patent were later held to be invalid. Four generic manufacturers -- Ranbaxy, Schein, Mylan, and Carlsbad -- subsequently challenged the Cipro patent. Ranbaxy's challenge was dismissed as moot in October 1999. Mylan's and Schein's consolidated challenges were dismissed at summary judgment and this dismissal was affirmed on appeal. Bayer AG v. Schein Pharm., Inc., 129 F. Supp. 2d 705 (D.N.J. 2001), aff'd, 301 F.3d 1306 (Fed. Cir. 2002). Carlsbad's challenge was rejected after a nine-day bench trial. Bayer AG v. Carlsbad Tech., Inc., No. Civ. 01-867-B (S.D. Cal. Aug. 26, 2002).

> Finally, to even attempt to quantify the public's interest in a patent settlement between private parties would require devaluing patents across the board, a result that would contravene the presumption [13] of validity afforded by Congress and impact the very way patent licenses are handled in countless daily transactions.

Cipro III, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 540-41.

Plaintiffs timely appealed. This Court retained jurisdiction over the direct purchaser plaintiffs' appeals, but transferred the indirect purchaser plaintiffs' appeal to the Federal Circuit. [10]

[*104] DISCUSSION

HN4[] We [14] review the district court's grant of summary judgment de novo, construing evidence in the manner most favorable to the nonmoving party. Horvath v. Westport Library Ass'n, 362 F.3d 147, 151 (2d Cir. 2004) (citation omitted). HN5[] Summary judgment is appropriate only where "there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and . . . the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c).

1. Section 1 of the Sherman Act

The Sherman Act provides that HN6[] "[e]very contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1. HN7[] Although by its terms, the Act prohibits "every" restraint of trade, the Supreme Court "has long recognized that Congress intended to outlaw only unreasonable restraints." State Oil Co. v. Khan, 522 U.S. 3, 10, 118 S. Ct. 275, 139 L. Ed. 2d 199 (1997). Agreements that have a "predictable and pernicious anticompetitive effect, and . . . limited potential for pro-competitive benefit" are deemed per se unlawful. Id. Most conduct, however, is subject to so-called "rule of reason" analysis. See Texaco Inc. v. Dagher, 547 U.S. 1, 5, 126 S. Ct. 1276, 164 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2006).

HN8[] Rule of reason analysis [15] proceeds in three steps. First, the plaintiff bears the initial burden of showing that the defendant's conduct "had an actual adverse effect on competition as a whole in the relevant market." Capital Imaging Assocs., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs., Inc., 996 F.2d 537, 543 (2d Cir. 1993) (emphasis in original). If plaintiff satisfies this burden, the burden then shifts to defendant to offer evidence that its conduct had pro-competitive effects. Id. If defendant is able to offer such proof, the burden shifts back to plaintiff, who must prove that any legitimate competitive effects could have been achieved through less restrictive alternatives. Id.

2. Reverse Exclusionary Payment Settlements, Antitrust Law, and Tamoxifen

Plaintiffs argue that when Bayer paid Barr to withdraw its challenge to the Cipro patent, defendants effectively entered into a market-sharing agreement in restraint of trade. HN9[] Patent settlements, like all private contracts, are subject to antitrust scrutiny. Cf. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 283 U.S. 163, 169, 51 S. Ct. 421, 75 L. Ed. 926 (1931) ("The limited monopolies granted to patent owners do not exempt them from the prohibitions of the Sherman Act . . . ."); see also B. Braun Med., Inc. v. Abbott Labs., 124 F.3d 1419, 1426-27 (Fed. Cir. 1997)

[10] The indirect purchaser plaintiffs amended their complaint to add state-law, Walker Process antitrust claims, so-called based on the Supreme Court's decision in Walker Process Equip., Inc. v. Food Mach. & Chem. Corp., which recognized an antitrust claim when patents are obtained by fraud. 382 U.S. 172, 177, 86 S. Ct. 347, 15 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1965). Because the Walker Process claims are preempted by patent law, see Cipro III, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 543-44, we transferred the indirect purchaser plaintiffs' appeal to the Federal Circuit, while retaining jurisdiction over the direct purchaser plaintiffs' appeals. The Federal Circuit ultimately affirmed the district court on the indirect purchaser plaintiffs' claims, agreeing with the district court's conclusion that the settlement did not restrain competition beyond the exclusionary zone of the Cipro patent. 544 F.3d 1323, 1333 (Fed. Cir. 2008).

[16] (the Sherman Act prevents patentees from obtaining a greater monopoly than was inherent in the relevant patent grant). Thus, like ordinary contracts, patent settlements cannot take the form of "market-sharing agreements." See Palmer v. BRG of Georgia, Inc., 498 U.S. 46, 49, 111 S. Ct. 401, 112 L. Ed. 2d 349 (1990) (per curiam) (market-sharing agreement is unlawful on its face); United States v. Sealy, Inc., 388 U.S. 350, [1913] 357-58, 87 S. Ct. 1847, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1238 (1967) (same); see also 12 Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 2030b, at 213 (2d ed. 2005) ("[T]he law does not condone the purchase of protection from uncertain competition any more than it condones the elimination of actual competition").

The question, therefore, is whether patent settlements in which the generic firm agrees to delay entry into the market in exchange for payment fall within the scope of the patent holder's property rights, or whether such settlements are properly characterized as illegal market-sharing [*105] agreements. Authorities are divided on this question. The Federal Trade Commission ("FTC"), the U.S. antitrust enforcement agency charged with supervising the pharmaceutical industry, has long insisted that reverse exclusionary payment settlements violate antitrust law and has [17] challenged numerous agreements as unreasonable restraints of trade. [11] Although it initially took a different view, the United States has since maintained that reverse exclusionary payment settlements may violate antitrust laws. See Brief for the United States as Amicus at 12, Joblove v. Barr Labs., Inc., No. 06-830, 2007 WL 1511527 (U.S. May 23, 2007). Many academic commentators share the United States's view. [12]

Most courts, by contrast, including this Court, Joblove v. Barr Labs. Inc, (In re Tamoxifen Citrate Antitrust Litig.), 466 F.3d 187, 216 (2d Cir. 2005) ("Tamoxifen"), have held that HN10[] the right to enter into reverse exclusionary [19] payment agreements fall within the terms of the exclusionary grant conferred by the branded manufacturer's patent. See In re Ciprofloxacin Antitrust Litig., 544 F.3d at 1333; Schering-Plough Corp. v. FTC, 402 F.3d 1056, 1076 (11th Cir. 2005). But see La. Wholesale Drug Co. v. Hoechst Marion Roussel, Inc. (In re Cardizem CD Antitrust Litig.), 332 F.3d 896, 908 (6th Cir. 2003) (holding such agreements to be per se illegal); In re Terazosin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litig., 352 F. Supp. 2d 1279 (S.D. Fla. 2005) (same).

Particularly relevant here is this Court's decision in Tamoxifen. The plaintiffs in Tamoxifen challenged a reverse exclusionary payment settlement between Zeneca and Barr that the parties entered into after a district court had declared Zeneca's patent invalid. 466 F.3d at 193. At the 12(b)(6) stage, Tamoxifen rejected as speculative plaintiffs' allegation that Barr would have prevailed on appeal but for the settlement agreement. Id. at 203-04. Assuming the truth of plaintiffs' allegation that the exclusion payments exceeded the profits Barr would have obtained upon entering the market as a generic competitor, the Tamoxifen court determined that the plaintiffs had no antitrust [20] claim because HN11[] a patent holder is entitled to protect its "lawful monopoly over the manufacture [*106] and distribution of the patented product." Id. at 205, 208-09.

Lemley, Anticompetitive Settlement of Intellectual Property Disputes, 87 Minn. L. Rev. 1719, 1759-60 (2003) (proposing that a defendant would overcome the presumptive unlawfulness of a reverse payment settlement by "showing both (1) that the ex ante likelihood of prevailing in its infringement lawsuit is significant, and (2) the size of the payment is no more than the expected value of litigation and collateral costs attending the lawsuit"). But see Alan Devlin, The Stochastic Relationship Between Patents and Antitrust, 5 J. Competition L. & Econ. 75, 108 (2009) ("uncritical application of standard principles of competition law to information markets may be myopic.").

Notably, Tamoxifen expressly adopted aspects of the lower court's summary judgment decision in this case, holding:

> HN12[] Unless and until the patent is shown to have been procured by fraud, or a suit for its enforcement is shown to be objectively baseless, there is no injury to the market cognizable under existing antitrust law, as long as competition is restrained only within the scope of the patent.

Id. at 213 (citing Cipro III, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 535). The Tamoxifen court ruled that HN13[] the settlement agreement did not exceed the scope of the patent where (1) there was no restriction on marketing non-infringing products; (2) [1914] a generic version of the branded drug would necessarily infringe the branded firm's patent; and (3) the agreement did not bar other generic manufacturers from challenging the patent. Id. at 213-15; cf. Cipro III, 363 F. Supp. 2d at 540-41; Cipro II, 261 F. Supp. 2d at 241-47.

Since Tamoxifen rejected antitrust challenges to reverse payments as a matter of law, we are bound to review the Cipro court's rulings under the [21] standard adopted in Tamoxifen. See 466 F.3d at 208-12. We therefore proceed to evaluate plaintiffs' claims under Tamoxifen. [13] Plaintiffs do not argue that the patent infringement lawsuit was a sham or that the Cipro patent was procured by fraud. Thus, the only reasonable basis for distinguishing Tamoxifen would be if plaintiffs demonstrated that the settlement agreement here, unlike in Tamoxifen, exceeded the scope of the Cipro patent. Plaintiffs cannot establish this because a generic version of Cipro would necessarily infringe Bayer's patent. Tamoxifen explained that HN14[] unlike "formulation patents," which cover only specific formulations or delivery methods for a compound, a "compound patent" "by its nature, excludes all generic versions of the drug." 466 F.3d at 214. Bayer's Cipro patent is a compound patent. Id. Thus, Barr's agreement to refrain from manufacturing generic Cipro encompasses only conduct that would infringe Bayer's patent rights.

Plaintiffs also claim that the challenged agreements contained ancillary restraints outside the scope of the patent: (1) Barr was permitted [22] under the agreements to manipulate its rights to the 180-day market exclusivity period; and (2) Barr and HMR agreed to refrain from filing future ANDA-IV certifications related to Cipro. [14] Tamoxifen recognized that HN15[] a plaintiff can have antitrust claims where a Hatch-Waxman settlement allows the generic manufacturer to manipulate the 180-day exclusivity period in a manner that bars subsequent challenges to the patent or precludes the generic manufacturer from marketing non-infringing products unrelated to the patent. See Tamoxifen, 466 F.3d at 213-19; see also Cardizem CD, 332 F.3d at 907-09. In this case, however, plaintiffs have not shown that the settlement agreements allowed manipulation of the exclusivity period or prohibited the marketing of non-infringing products.

Plaintiffs contend that Barr's insistence on its right to reclaim the 180-day exclusivity period caused other generic manufacturers [*107] to delay subsequent challenges. Specifically, they [23] maintain that Mylan delayed its challenge because it perceived Barr's continued assertion of a right to the 180-day exclusivity as an obstruction to their entry into the market. This argument is unpersuasive. Although the settlement agreement allows Barr to reinstate its ANDA-IV if a subsequent patent challenge were successful, a reinstated ANDA-IV certification would not have entitled Barr to the 180-day exclusivity period based on the law in effect at the time of settlement. [15] Thus, [13] Our jurisdiction over plaintiffs' claims is also established by Tamoxifen. See 466 F.3d at 199-200.

[14] Plaintiffs argued below that the agreements were unlawful because Barr and HMR conceded the validity of several additional patents related to Cipro. See Cipro II, 261 F. Supp. 2d at 254. Plaintiffs do not press this argument on appeal.

[15] When Bayer and Barr entered the settlement HN16[] in January 1997, an ANDA filer's right to 180-day exclusivity was contingent on their "successful defense" of a patent infringement suit. See 21 C.F.R. § 314.107(c)(1). Since Barr did not successfully defend the lawsuit by entering a settlement, the court found it had no [24] claim to the exclusivity period. Cipro II, 261 F. Supp. 2d at 243, 247. After courts rejected the FDA's "successful defense" requirement, see, e.g., Mova Pharm. Corp. v. Shalala, 140 F.3d 1060, 329 U.S. App. D.C. 341 (D.C. Cir. 1998), the FDA permanently removed it. See Effective Date and Approval of an Abbreviated New Drug Application, 63 Fed. Reg. 59710, 57911 (Nov. 5, 1998). But this occurred after the agreements in this case were executed. Plaintiffs argue that the questionable validity of the regulation suggests that Barr tried to the district court properly determined that Barr forfeited its challenge to the patent and thus any right to 180-day exclusivity, and that other generic manufacturers were able to subsequently challenge the Cipro patent. See Cipro II, 261 F. Supp.2d at 243; [16] cf. Tamoxifen, [1915] 466 F.3d at 218-19 (rejecting a claim that Barr manipulated the 180-day exclusivity period based on similar analysis).

Finally, plaintiffs argue that Barr and HMR unlawfully agreed to refrain from filing ANDA-IVs even after the Cipro patent expired. The agreement states that Barr and HMR are "not to . . . file any [ANDA] relating to Cipro with . . . a certification made pursuant to Paragraph IV of the Act." The district court reasonably interpreted the agreement to mean that Barr and HMR would not file any ANDA-IV certifications challenging the validity [26] of the Cipro patent. See Cipro II, 261 F. Supp. 2d at 253. This reading was consistent with Barr's concession of validity and with the fact that there could not be an ANDA-IV certification for a non-infringing version of the drug since Bayer had a compound patent.

Plaintiffs contend that Tamoxifen is distinguishable because, by relying on the district court's Cipro III decision, Tamoxifen adopted an erroneous view of the facts [*108] of this case i.e.22, Tamoxifen was based on an erroneous view of the facts of Cipro. This argument is not persuasive. Tamoxifen relied on Cipro III not for its facts, but rather for its legal and policy analysis. The Tamoxifen majority urged against addressing the probability that a patent was invalid and deferred to a patent holder's desire to settle patent challenges, concluding that a patent holder could reasonably decide to pay money, even more than a generic manufacturer would make on the market, to guarantee protection of its patent. See Tamoxifen, 466 F.3d at 210 ("[A] rule [limiting the amount of exclusion payments] would . . . fail to give sufficient consideration to the patent holder's incentive to settle . . . .").

Plaintiffs and amici also argue that [27] Tamoxifen runs afoul of the purpose of the Hatch-Waxman Act. The purpose of the Hatch-Waxman Act, 21 U.S.C. § 355, was "to make available more low cost generic drugs." H.R. Rep. No. 98-857, pt. 1, at 14 (1984), reprinted in 1984 U.S.C.C.A.N. 2647, 2647. The Act sought to accomplish this objective by providing an incentive through the ANDA-IV certification procedure for generic manufacturers to challenge presumptively valid patents, which, if successful, would result in exclusivity for the first successful challenger and the entry of generic drugs into the market. The market entry of generic drugs arising from successful Hatch-Waxman challenges can result in significant savings to consumers. See Brief for AARP as Amicus at 8-9 (discussing generic manufacturers' challenges to the Prozac patent and Paxil patent where generic entry resulted in $ 2.5 and $ 2 billion in consumer savings, respectively). [17]

These [28] policy arguments cannot be addressed here. As defendants note, HN17[] this panel is bound by Tamoxifen "absent a change in law by higher authority or by way of an in banc proceeding." United States v. Snow, 462 F.3d 55, 65 n.11 (2d Cir. 2006). However, there are several reasons why this case might be appropriate for reexamination by our full Court.

exploit it in order to keep other manufacturers from the market, but Tamoxifen specifically rejected this argument. 466 F.3d at 218-19. Plaintiffs assert that the Tamoxifen panel did not consider a district court case that found an earlier FDA exclusivity requirement contrary to the Hatch-Waxman statute. See Inwood Labs., Inc. v. Young, 723 F. Supp. 1523 (D.D.C. 1989), vacated as moot, 43 F.3d 712, 310 U.S. App. D.C. 61 (D.C. Cir. 1989). However, this argument is unavailing because the FDA promulgated the "successful defense" requirement in effect at the time of the agreements here after the Inwood Labs decision. See Abbreviated New Drug Application Regulations; Patent and Exclusivity Provision, 59 Fed. Reg. 50338 (Oct. 3, 1994). [25] The established law at the time of the agreement precluded Barr from retaining a right to exclusivity.

[16] Plaintiffs contend that the district court erred in Cipro III when it admitted that, based on its ruling in Cipro II, it need not consider this claim "anew." See 363 F. Supp. 2d at 540 (citing Cipro II, 261 F. Supp. 2d at 243-47). Cipro II considered the claim in the context of plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment. When addressing defendants' motion for summary judgment in Cipro III, the district court was required to view the evidence in plaintiffs' favor. Because the district court's analysis is consistent with Tamoxifen, which was decided at the 12(b)(6) stage, the district court did not err by incorporating its analysis from Cipro II.

[17] One study found that generic manufacturers prevailed in 73% of the Hatch-Waxman lawsuits that were tried to verdict. See Brief for American Antitrust Institute ("AAI") as Amicus at 3 (citing Generic Drug Entry Prior to Patent Expiration, at vii (2002), available at http://www.ftc.gov/os/2002/07/genericdrugstudy.pdf).

First, the United States has itself urged us to repudiate Tamoxifen, arguing that Tamoxifen adopted an improper standard that fails to subject reverse exclusionary payment settlements to appropriate antitrust scrutiny. Brief for the United States as Amicus at 6, 14-15; [18] see also Brief for the United States as Amicus in Joblove v. Barr Labs., Inc., No. 06-830, 2007 WL 1511527, at *1 (U.S. May 23, 2007) (describing the Tamoxifen standard as "incorrect"). In the pending case, the United States argues:

> This Court's Tamoxifen standard inappropriately permits patent holders to contract their way out of the statutorily imposed risk that patent litigation could lead to invalidation of the patent while claiming antitrust immunity for that private contract. . . . [T]his standard effectively bars considering whether the agreement might violate the antitrust [29] laws, and so offers no protection to the public interest in eliminating undeserved patents.

[*109] Brief for the United States as Amicus at 14-15. [19] While acknowledging that patent-holders [1916] are entitled to settle disputes over the validity of their patent, the United States proposes that excessive reverse payment settlements be deemed presumptively unlawful unless a patent-holder can show that settlement payments do not greatly exceed anticipated litigation costs. Id. at 27-32.

Second, there is evidence that the practice of entering into reverse exclusionary payment settlements has increased since we decided Tamoxifen. Prior to our Tamoxifen decision, there were fourteen settlements of Hatch-Waxman lawsuits, none of which involved reverse payments to a generic manufacturer. Brief for American Antitrust Institute as Amicus at 3 (citing Fed. Trade Comm'n, Generic Drug Entry: Prior to Patent Expiration 31-32, 34 (July 2002), available at http://www.ftc.gov/os/2002/07/genericdrugstudy.pdf). After Tamoxifen, however, plaintiffs represent that twenty of twenty-seven Hatch-Waxman settlements have involved reverse payments.

Third, after Tamoxifen was decided, a principal drafter of the Hatch-Waxman Act criticized the settlement practice at issue here. See 148 Cong. Rec. S7565 (July 30, 2002) (remarks of Sen. Hatch) ("As coauthor of the [Hatch-Waxman Act], I can tell you that I find these type[s] [31] of reverse payment collusive arrangements appalling"); see also 146 Cong. Rec. E1538-02 (Sept 20, 2000) (remarks of Rep. Waxman) ("[R]equir[ing] companies seeking to reach secret, anticompetitive agreements to disclose them to the FTC . . . . [would] ensure that existing antitrust and drug approval laws are enforced to the letter."). [20]

Fourth and finally, Tamoxifen relied on an unambiguous mischaracterization of the Hatch-Waxman Act. Tamoxifen was based in no small part on the panel majority's belief that reverse exclusionary settlements "open[] the [relevant] patent to immediate challenge by other potential generic manufacturers . . . spurred by the [32] additional incentive . . . of potentially securing the 180-day exclusivity period available upon a victory in a subsequent infringement lawsuit." 466 F.3d at 214. The panel majority's claim that the statutory exclusivity period cedes to the first ANDA filer to successfully defend was erroneous. See C. Scott Hemphill, Paying for Delay: Pharmaceutical

[18] The Department of Justice provided a brief at the request of the panel. Though the United States argues that our Tamoxifen decision was wrongly decided, it "takes no position on the ultimate merits of this appeal." Brief for the United States as Amicus at 9.

[19] Amici similarly argue that the Tamoxifen court's permissive approach to reverse payments offers protection to patent holders beyond that envisioned by patent law, is inconsistent with the principle that antitrust cases be decided "based upon demonstrable economic effect rather than . . . formalistic line drawing," Brief for AAI as Amicus at 5, (quoting Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 97 S. Ct. 2549, 53 L. Ed. 2d 568 (1977)), and did not give sufficient consideration [30] to the public interest in "authoritative testing of patent validity." Brief for Nat'l Assoc. of Chain Drug Stores, Inc. as Amicus at 20 (quoting Blonder-Tongue Lab. v. University of Illinois Found., 402 U.S. 313, 343, 91 S. Ct. 1434, 28 L. Ed. 2d 788 (1971)).

[20] We are not insensitive to "the oft-repeated warning that the views of a subsequent Congress form a hazardous basis for inferring the intent of an earlier one." Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 447 U.S. 102, 117, 100 S. Ct. 2051, 64 L. Ed. 2d 766 (1980) (quotation marks omitted). However, remarks by an Act's author do not trigger the typical concern about post-enactment legislative history, namely that "the losers in the legislative arena hope to persuade the courts to give them the victory after all." Richard A. Posner, How Judges Think 344 (2008).

Patent Settlement As a Regulatory Design Problem, 81 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1553, 1583-86 (2006). Contrary to our suggestion in Tamoxifen, later [*110] ANDA-IV filers are not eligible for the 180-day exclusivity period. Id. at 1584; cf. 21 C.F.R. § 314.107(c)(1)-(2) (only first-filer eligible for exclusivity period); 180-Day Generic Drug Exclusivity for Abbreviated New Drug Applications, 64 Fed. Reg. 42,873, 42,874 (Aug. 6, 1999) (revisiting and re-endorsing FDA interpretation of exclusivity provisions); 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(5)(D)(iii) (codifying FDA interpretation).

In addition, unlike Tamoxifen, which was decided at the 12(b)(6) stage, this case involves a summary judgment decision based on a full record. This case could provide our full Court with an opportunity to revisit the issues in play in Tamoxifen and to analyze the competing interests that underlie [33] antitrust challenges to reverse payment settlements in light of the full record and the arguments of the parties and amici, including the United States, that have been raised in this appeal. We therefore invite plaintiffs-appellants to petition for in banc rehearing.

CONCLUSION

In sum, as long as Tamoxifen is controlling law, plaintiffs' claims cannot survive. Accordingly, we AFFIRM the judgment of the district court. However, we believe there are compelling reasons to revisit Tamoxifen with the benefit of the full Court's consideration of the difficult questions at issue and the important interests at stake. We therefore invite the plaintiffs-appellants to petition for rehearing in banc. [1917]

ORDER

Pending before the Court is Defendant's Motion to Dismiss (Dkt. # 8.) For the following reasons, the Court grants Defendant's Motion to Dismiss with leave to amend.

BACKGROUND

Defendant KitchenAid ("KitchenAid") manufactures and sells stand mixers and mixer attachments directly to consumers and through retailers. (Dkt. # 1 at 2.) Plaintiff POURfect Products ("POURfect") makes and sells an aftermarket beater attachment (the "Scrape-A-Bowl") for use with KitchenAid stand mixers. (Id.) In early 2009, POURfect had existing and prospective contracts with unspecified retailers to supply Scrape-A-Bowl. (Id.)

POURfect alleges that these existing and prospective contracts would have resulted [*2] in sales of not less than $ 8,000,000 in 2010. (Id.) But, in May 2009, KitchenAid advised its trade customers (i.e., retailers) that "bowl-scraper accessories" may shorten the life of the stand mixer motor and cause damage that would be excluded from warranty coverage. (Id.) KitchenAid advised its retailers that it had performed tests that showed that the use of bowl-scraper accessories caused motor temperatures to exceed those allowed under the Underwriter Laboratories' requirements. (Id. at 3.) The Complaint alleges, however, that KitchenAid's tests did not conform to the Underwriter Laboratories' testing requirements and did not fairly test the bowl-scraper beaters in a manner generally representative of actual service conditions. (Id.) Further, the Complaint alleges that the use of KitchenAid attachments caused greater motor problems than did Scrape-A-Bowl beaters under actual service conditions. (Id.) POURfect claims that KitchenAid's false and misleading statements to its retailers, with a specific intent to destroy competition, has caused POURfect to lose profits of an amount not less than $ 6,000,000. (Id. at 4.)

Count One of POURfect's Complaint alleges that KitchenAid violated [*3] Section 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. § 2). It seeks both injunctive relief and treble damages as authorized by Section 4 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. § 15). (Id.) Counts Two and Three allege state law claims based on product disparagement and interference with contractual relations. (Id.)

LEGAL STANDARD FOR MOTION TO DISMISS

To survive dismissal for failure to state a claim pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), a complaint must contain more than "labels and conclusions" or a "formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action"; it must contain factual allegations sufficient to "raise a right of relief above the speculative level." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). While "a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations . . . it must plead 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Clemens v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 534 F.3d 1017, 1022 (9th Cir. 2008) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) [*4] (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). The plausibility standard "asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. Where a complaint pleads facts that are 'merely consistent with' a defendant's liability, it 'stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555) (internal citations omitted). Similarly, legal conclusions couched as factual allegations are not given a presumption of truthfulness, and "conclusory allegations of law and unwarranted inferences are not sufficient to defeat a motion to dismiss." Pareto v. FDIC, 139 F.3d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1998).

DISCUSSION

I. The Court Grants KitchenAid's Motion to Dismiss

POURfect's Complaint fails to plead facts sufficient to make any of its federal claims plausible.

A. POURfect Fails to State a Plausible Claim For Relief Under Section 2 of the Sherman Act For Actual Monopolization.

To show actual monopolization under § 2 of the Sherman Act, a Plaintiff must show "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market, and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence [*5] of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966). The first prong can be broken down into two parts: (1) whether the defendant possessed monopoly power (2) in a properly defined relevant market. The Supreme Court has clarified that the second Grinnell factor applies only where the defendant engaged in "anticompetitive conduct." Verizon Commc'ns Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis v. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004). In addition to the above elements, a plaintiff who, as here, seeks damages under Section 4 of the Clayton Act must allege "causal antitrust injury," indicating that the plaintiff's "loss flows from an anticompetitive aspect or effect of the defendant's behavior." Rebel Oil Co., Inc., v. Atl. Richfield Co., 51 F.3d 1421, 1433 (9th Cir. 1995). The Complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to support any of these elements.

i. POURfect's Complaint Fails To Allege Plausible Facts With Sufficient Detail To Show That KitchenAid Possesses Monopoly Power.

"Monopoly power, for the purpose of section 2 of the Sherman Act, is "'the power to control prices or exclude competition.'" Forsyth v. Humana, Inc., 114 F.3d 1467, 1475 (9th Cir. 1997) [*6] (quoting Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571). "A plaintiff may demonstrate market power either by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence." Forsyth, 114 F.3d at 1475 (citing Rebel Oil, 51 F.3d at 1434). "Direct proof of market power may be shown by evidence of restricted output and supracompetitive prices." Forsyth, 114 F.3d at 1475. Here, POURfect has not alleged any facts showing direct proof of market power.

Meanwhile, "[c]ircumstantial evidence . . . requires the plaintiff to: (1) define the relevant market, (2) show that the defendant owns a dominant share of that market, and (3) show that there are significant barriers to entry and show that existing competitors lack the capacity to increase their output in the short run." Id. at 1476 (internal quotations omitted). POURfect fails to allege facts sufficient to meet any of these elements. First, as discussed infra Section I-A-ii, POURfect does not allege facts defining the relevant market. Furthermore, POURfect does not allege facts showing that the defendant owns a dominant share of the market, that there are significant barriers to entry into the relevant market, or that existing competitors lack the capacity to increase their output [*7] in the short run. Instead, POURfect makes only a conclusory allegation regarding monopoly power, stating, "By virtue of its influence over its trade customers at the retail level of the market, KitchenAid possessed monopoly power in the relevant market of aftermarket attachments." (Dkt. # 1 at 3.) This type of "formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action" is insufficient under the Twombly pleading requirements. 550 U.S. at 555; see also *Korea Kumho Petrochem. v. Flexsys America LP, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 68559, 2008 WL 686834, at 9 (N.D. Cal. March 11, 2008) (dismissing plaintiff's attempted monopolization claim because the complaint made only a blanket allegation that the defendants had a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power).

ii. POURfect's Complaint Fails To Allege a Relevant Market.

"Failure to identify a relevant market is a proper ground for dismissing a Sherman Act claim." Tanaka v. Univ. of S. Cal., 252 F.3d 1059, 1063 (9th Cir. 2001). The "relevant market" includes both the relevant geographic market, as well as the relevant product market, including "product use, quality, and description." Id. (internal quotation omitted).

First, the Complaint does not sufficiently allege the geographic [*8] market. "The geographic market extends to the area of effective competition . . . where buyers can turn for alternative sources of supply." Tanaka, 252 F.3d at 1063 (internal quotation omitted). Only one paragraph of the Complaint refers to the geographic market, alleging that "KitchenAid has market power to exclude competition in the aftermarket for stand mixer attachments in the United States and other countries." (Dkt. # 1 at 2.) This statement, by not alleging which other countries or which parts of the United States are included in the geographic market, fails to set the parameters for a relevant geographic market necessary to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion.

In addition to the geographic market, the Complaint fails to allege sufficient facts relating to the relevant product market. In general, a product market is "the pool of goods or services that qualify as economic substitutes because they enjoy reasonable interchangeability of use and cross-elasticity of demand[,]" although "[i]n limited settings . . . the relevant product market may be narrowed beyond the boundaries of physical interchangeability and cross-price elasticity to account for identifiable submarkets or product [*9] clusters." Thurman Indus., Inc. v. Pay 'N Pak Stores, Inc., 875 F.2d 1369, 1374 (9th Cir. 1989). In other words, a product market typically exists where a group of products may be used interchangeably and where an increase in the price of one good causes a corresponding increase in the demand for other goods.

A single brand of product, such as attachments for a single brand of product, may constitute the relevant product market in limited circumstances. Univ. Avionics Sys. Corp. v. Rockwell Int'l Corp., 184 F. Supp. 2d 947, 954 (D. Ariz. 2001). POURfect's Response urges the Court to define the relevant product market as only aftermarket products for KitchenAid stand mixers. (Dkt. # 12 at 3.) While under certain conditions, a plaintiff may limit the relevant market to the aftermarket for a single brand of product, the rule is not as broad as POURfect implies. The relevant product market may be limited to the aftermarket for a single brand of product only in "very limited circumstances." Univ. Avionics, 184 F. Supp. 2d at 954. The very limited circumstances will occur when "'switching costs,' 'information costs,' and a 'lock-in' [] create a potential for aftermarket power in the derivative [*10] aftermarkets for the manufacturer's own equipment[,]" such as where a manufacturer markets its own equipment and subsequently changes its policies to "lock-in" existing customers. Id. (citing Kodak, 504 U.S. at 477); see also PSI Repair Servs., Inc. v. Honeywell, Inc., 104 F.3d 811, 820 (6th Cir. 1997). Specifically, for such a lock-in to occur, the Complaint must allege facts making the following four factors plausible:

1. High "switching costs": A substantial number of customers must have made brand-specific investments that still have a useful life but that are substantially unrecoverable if they shift to other brands;
2. High "information costs": A substantial number of those customers must be too ignorant of "lifecycle" prices to protect themselves by judicious interbrand comparisons or by contract before they become locked in;
3. Ability to exploit ignorant customers: The knowledgeable customers who can protect themselves must either be unimportant to the defendant or be protected by effective price discrimination from above market prices paid by the ignorant; and

4. Ability to exploit must be "substantial": The defendant's resulting ability to exploit the ignorant must be "substantial."

Univ. Avionics, 184 F. Supp. 2d at 955 [*11] (citing Kodak, 504 U.S. at 467-73; X Areeda et al., Antitrust Law P 1740 at 138 (1996)). Here, POURfect fails to allege a KitchenAid policy shift that would "lock-in" customers. An unfavorable report regarding POURfect's attachment does not, of itself, constitute a change in policy that would require the owners of KitchenAid mixers to purchase only KitchenAid aftermarket attachments. Moreover, POURfect has not plausibly alleged facts that would make any of the above four factors plausible. Therefore, the "very limited circumstances" in which courts may limit the relevant product market to the aftermarket for a single brand of product does not apply to this case. [1]

iii. POURfect's Complaint Fails To Allege Plausible Facts Indicating That KitchenAid Engaged In Anticompetitive Conduct.

An act is deemed anticompetitive under the Sherman Act only when it harms both the overall efficiency in the market and either raises the prices of goods or diminishes their quality. Rebel Oil, 51 F.3d at 1433. [*13] Here, POURfect's Complaint does not properly allege anticompetitive conduct because it fails to allege facts showing that KitchenAid's conduct either raised prices or diminished quality.

POURfect alleges that KitchenAid disparaged POURfect's product to trade customers. The Ninth Circuit, however, has held that "[w]hile the disparagement of a rival or compromising a rival's employee may be unethical and even

[1] The Complaint also fails to allege a relevant market that extends beyond the KitchenAid attachment aftermarket. "'Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted.'" [*12] In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig., 545 F. Supp. 2d 1027, 1031 (N. D. Cal. 2008) (quoting Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 436 (3d Cir.1997)). Here, POURfect has failed to allege any facts indicating that the Scrape-a-Bowl is interchangeable with either the KitchenAid brand or other similar products on the market, nor has POURfect alleged facts regarding how the prices of some aftermarket attachments affect the demand for other attachments. Therefore, POURfect's Complaint does not survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. See Big Bear Lodging Ass'n v. Snow Summit, Inc., 182 F.3d 1096, 1105 (9th Cir. 1999) (affirming dismissal of plaintiff's antitrust complaint where plaintiff failed to allege "that there are no other goods or services that are reasonably interchangeable with lodging accommodations or ski packages within this geographic market").

impair the opportunities of a rival, its harmful effects on competitors are ordinarily not significant enough to warrant recognition under § 2 of the Sherman Act." Am. Prof'l Testing Servs., Inc. v. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich Legal and Prof'l Publ'n, Inc., 108 F.3d 1147, 1151 (9th Cir. 1997). The Ninth Circuit requires a "'preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer)' before [disparaging comments about a rival's product] can rise to the level of [anticompetitive] conduct." Id. (quoting 3 P. Areeda & D. Turner, Antitrust Law P 737b at 278 (1978)).

Specifically, Am. Prof'l Testing laid out six elements that a plaintiff making an antitrust claim based on disparaging comments must affirmatively [*14] allege through specific facts in order to overcome the presumption that defendant's disparaging comments had only a "de minimus" effect on competition. Id. at 1152. Plaintiff must allege facts showing that Defendant's comments about the Scrape-a-Bowl were "'(1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset by rivals.'" Id. at 1152 (quoting Nat'l Ass'n of Pharm. Mfrs. v. Ayerest Labs., 850 F.2d 904, 916 (2d Cir. 1988)).

POURfect has not alleged that KitchenAid caused significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition generally (as opposed to alleging harmful effects merely on itself). See LiveUniverse, Inc. v. MySpace, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43739, 2007 WL 6865852, at *11 (C.D. Cal. June 5, 2007) (granting a Rule 12(b)(6) motion for failure to allege anticompetitive conduct and explaining that "'[t]o be condemned as exclusionary, a monopolist's act must have an 'anticompetitive effect[,]'" meaning that it "'must harm the competitive process and thereby harm consumers[,]'" but mere "'harm to [*15] one or more competitors will not suffice'") (quoting United States v. Microsoft Corp., 253 F.3d 34, 58, 346 U.S. App. D.C. 330 (D.C. Cir. 2001)), aff'd, 304 F. App'x 554 (9th Cir. 2008).

Nor has POURfect sufficiently pleaded facts constituting the fifth element that the disparagement "continued for prolonged periods" because the Complaint alleges only that KitchenAid made disparaging comments to its trade customers in May 2009. POURfect also does not plead the sixth element that the comments were "not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset by rivals." For example, POURfect has not stated in its Complaint why it would be unable to communicate statements about its product quality to KitchenAid retailers, thus offsetting the effect of KitchenAid's allegedly faulty tests. See, e.g., Tate v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 230 F. Supp. 2d 1072, 1080 (N.D. Cal. 2002) (dismissing claims where plaintiff did not allege that the violations were not readily susceptible to neutralization or offsets by rivals). Therefore, POURfect has not properly alleged anticompetitive conduct.

iv. POURfect's Complaint Fails To Allege With Sufficient Detail That Show KitchenAid Has Caused Antitrust Injury.

Because POURfect seeks damages [*16] under Section 4 of the Clayton Act for violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, POURfect must allege "causal antitrust injury," indicating that its "loss flows from an anticompetitive aspect or effect of the defendant's behavior." Rebel Oil, 51 F.3d at 1433. The Ninth Circuit has identified four requirements for antitrust injury: "(1) unlawful conduct, (2) causing an injury to the plaintiff, (3) that flows from that which makes the conduct unlawful, and (4) that is of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent." Am. Ad Mgmt., Inc. v. Gen. Tel. Co. of Cal., 190 F.3d 1051, 1055 (9th Cir. 1999). Here, the Complaint does not allege any injury to competition or consumer welfare. Rather, POURfect alleges only harm to itself. Harm to a competitor, however, without harm either to competition or to consumer welfare, is not sufficient to establish antitrust injury. See LiveUniverse, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43739, 2007 WL 6865852, at *15 (granting defendant's Rule 12(b)(6) motion and stating that "[h]arm to one or more competitors is not sufficient to constitute antitrust injury unless a plaintiff alleges harm to the competitive process, which in turn harms consumers"). [2]

[2] To the extent POURfect alleges attempted [*17] monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, that claim also fails because an attempted monopolization claim also requires a plaintiff to allege predatory or anticompetitive conduct and causal antitrust injury, which, as discussed above, POURfect has not done. See Rebel Oil Co., 51 F.3d at 1433 (stating that an attempted monopolization claim includes four elements: (1) specific intent to control prices or destroy competition; (2) predatory

II. The Court Declines To Exercise Pendant Jurisdiction.

When a district court "dismisses [federal claims] leaving only state claims for resolution, the court should decline jurisdiction over the state claims and dismiss them without prejudice." Les Shockley Racing, Inc. v. Nat'l Hot Rod Ass'n, 884 F.2d 504, 509 (9th Cir. 1989). Only in the "unusual case" should federal courts retain jurisdiction over the state law claims. Gini v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dept., 40 F.3d 1041, 1046 (9th Cir. 1994). In this determination, courts consider "economy, convenience, fairness, and comity." Carnegie-Mellon Univ. v. Cohill, 484 U.S. 343, 350, 108 S. Ct. 614, 98 L. Ed. 2d 720 (1988). [*18] This is not an unusual case, and it is appropriate to dismiss the state law claims without prejudice to allow state courts to decide state law. Moreover, economy, convenience, and fairness all favor remand because this case is only at the motion-to-dismiss stage, so presumably the parties have not yet conducted substantial discovery. [3]

III. Dismissal Is Without Prejudice.

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a) "declares that leave to amend 'shall be freely given when justice so requires'; this mandate is to be heeded." Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 182, 83 S. Ct. 227, 9 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1962) (citing Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)). The Court finds that amendment may cure some of the Complaint's defects.

CONCLUSION

POURfect's Complaint does not set forth sufficient facts to state a claim for a Sherman Act violation.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED that KitchenAid's Motion to Dismiss (Dkt. # 8) is GRANTED with leave to file an amended complaint on or before May 14, 2010 at 5:00 p.m.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that If no amended complaint [*19] is filed by that date, the Clerk of the Court is directed to terminate this action.

DATED this 3rd day of May, 2010.

or anticompetitive conduct directed at accomplishing that purpose; (3) a dangerous probability of achieving 'monopoly power'; and (4) causal antitrust injury").

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Appropriateness

HN1[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Appropriateness

Summary judgment is appropriate only where the record, read in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, indicates that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(2).

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Movant Persuasion & Proof

HN2[] Burdens of Proof, Movant Persuasion & Proof

The burden initially is on the party moving for summary judgment to demonstrate an absence of a genuine issue of material fact.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Nonmovant Persuasion & Proof

HN3[] Burdens of Proof, Nonmovant Persuasion & Proof

If the party moving for summary judgment meets its burden, then the nonmoving party must produce enough evidence to rebut the moving party's claim and create a genuine issue of material fact. If the nonmoving party meets this burden, then the motion will be denied.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Materiality of Facts

HN4[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Materiality of Facts

For summary judgment purposes, material facts are those necessary to the proof or defense of a claim, and are determined by reference to substantive law. A complete failure of proof concerning an essential element of the nonmoving party's case necessarily renders all other facts immaterial.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Entitlement as Matter of Law > Genuine Disputes

HN5[] Entitlement as Matter of Law, Genuine Disputes

For summary judgment purposes, a fact issue is genuine if the evidence is such that a reasonable jury could return a verdict for the nonmoving party.

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Nonmovant Persuasion & Proof

Civil Procedure > ... > Summary Judgment > Burdens of Proof > Scintilla Rule

HN6[] Burdens of Proof, Nonmovant Persuasion & Proof

To demonstrate a genuine issue, the party opposing summary judgment must do more than simply show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. The nonmoving party must come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Summary Judgment > Evidentiary Considerations

HN7[] Summary Judgment, Evidentiary Considerations

In deciding a motion for summary judgment, the evidence of the nonmovant is to be believed, and all justifiable inferences are to be drawn in his favor. Nevertheless, inferences are not drawn out of the air, and it is the opposing party's obligation to produce a factual predicate from which the inference may be drawn.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Scope > General Overview

HN8[] Sherman Act, Scope

For a disparagement-based antitrust claim, case law sets a high burden of proof; the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit insists on a preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer) before these practices can rise to the level of exclusionary conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN9[] Sherman Act, Claims

The First Amendment does not allow antitrust claims to be predicated solely on protected speech.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN10[] Sherman Act, Claims

An antitrust plaintiff must demonstrate that the false statement was made in commercial advertising or promotion, as under the Lanham Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

HN11[] Consumer Protection, False Advertising

Classic puffery include exaggerated advertising, blustering, and boasting upon which no reasonable buyer would rely. For a statement to be actionable, it must make a specific and measurable advertisement claim of product superiority.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > General Overview

HN12[] Consumer Protection, False Advertising

Whether a statement is puffery does not depend on the truth or falsity of a statement; it depends on the degree of generality or specificity. The puffing rule amounts to a seller's privilege to lie his head off, so long as he says nothing specific.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > Lanham Act

HN13[] False Advertising, Lanham Act

Where the context of an advertising statement may lend greater specificity to an otherwise vague representation, the court should not succumb to the temptation to hastily rule a phrase to be unactionable under the Lanham Act.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN14[] Sherman Act, Claims

In order to state a valid Sherman Act claim under a false advertising theory, the plaintiff must make a preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer). Because of the difficulties in distinguishing actionable false statements from puffing, the speculative effect that advertising has on consuming behavior, and buyer distrust of a seller's disparaging comments, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has set forth a presumption that commercial speech or advertising has a de minimis effect on competition. A plaintiff may overcome this presumption by showing that the charged speech meets a six-factor test: the statements must be (1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset by rivals.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN15[] Sherman Act, Claims

United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit's case law first sets out the requirement that disparagement must have a significant and enduring adverse impact on competition itself in the relevant markets to rise to the level of an antitrust violation. The plaintiff has the burden of proving this significant and enduring impact in order to proceed on the claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN16[] Sherman Act, Claims

According to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, antitrust claims based on false advertising should presumptively be ignored; that is, the defendant is entitled to a presumption that false advertising has a de minimis effect on competition before the introduction of any evidence of actual market impact. The six-factor test, which focuses on the characteristics of the charged speech and not on any evidence of actual market effect, is the plaintiff's means of overcoming this first hurdle. It does not, however, satisfy the plaintiff's burden of proving an actual significant and enduring adverse impact on competition. In other words, a plaintiff that has discharged the de minimis presumption is not automatically entitled to its own presumption of significant market effect. In addition to showing that the speech is of the type that could have a significant effect on competition, the plaintiff has the burden of showing that it actually did affect competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Sherman Act > Claims

HN17[] Sherman Act, Claims

The Harcourt Brace presumption rests partially on the rationale that buyers generally do not trust comments made by competitors. However, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit also relied on the difficulty in distinguishing actionable false statements from puffery and the speculative nature of the effects of false advertising, especially when it is not systematic. This would apply regardless of whether the speaker had the appearance of objectivity. That circumstance may be considered within the Harcourt Brace factors, such as the likelihood of inducing reliance or susceptibility of neutralization, but the United States District Court for the Central District of California does not find that it negates the application of the presumption entirely.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > State Regulation > Claims

HN18[] State Regulation, Claims

Where Cartwright Act, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720 et seq., claims are premised on the same facts as Sherman Act claims, and summary judgment is granted on the Sherman Act claims, summary judgment is also appropriate for Cartwright Act claims.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Trade Practices & Unfair Competition > State Regulation > Claims

HN19[] State Regulation, Claims

California's Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., prohibits three separate categories of conduct: acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent. Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Conduct is unfair if it threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition. Thus, in most cases, where a plaintiff's UCL claim is predicated on antitrust violations that fail to withstand summary judgment, the UCL claim must also fail.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > Altering & Amending Judgments

HN20[] Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 59(e), a party may move to alter or amend a judgment within 28 days.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > Altering & Amending Judgments

HN21[] Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

See C.D. Cal. Civ. R. 7-18.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Relief From Judgments > Altering & Amending Judgments

HN22[] Relief From Judgments, Altering & Amending Judgments

A court may disregard evidence or arguments on a motion for reconsideration that could reasonably have been presented prior to the court's ruling.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > Lanham Act

HN23[] False Advertising, Lanham Act

A plaintiff asserting a false advertising claim under the Lanham Act must show that the charged statements actually deceived or had the tendency to deceive a substantial segment of its audience and is likely to influence the purchasing decision.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > Lanham Act

HN24[] False Advertising, Lanham Act

The Lanham Act requires that the plaintiff asserting a false advertising claim prove that the defendant caused its false statement to enter interstate commerce.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > False Advertising > Lanham Act

HN25[] False Advertising, Lanham Act

Case law from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida merely stands for the proposition that oral statements, such as in-person or telephone sales calls, can constitute commercial advertising within the meaning of the Lanham Act. It does not stand for the proposition that a plaintiff can merely invoke word-of-mouth to overcome its burden of showing that customers actually heard and were deceived by the alleged false statement.

[*825] ORDER RE MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT AND RECONSIDERATION

Defendant Warnaco Swimwear, Inc. dba Speedo USA ("Speedo") moves for for summary judgment under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56 on the remaining claims for relief asserted [2] against it by Plaintiff TYR Sport, Inc. ("TYR"). Defendants United States Swimming, Inc. ("USA Swimming") and Mark Schubert ("Schubert") also move for summary judgment under Rule 56 on TYR's remaining claims. Speedo and USA Swimming and Schubert (collectively, "Defendants") join each others' respective motions. TYR opposes both motions.

TYR also moves under Rule 59 and Local Rule 7-18 for reconsideration of the Court's order granting summary judgment on TYR's Fourth claim for relief under the Lanham Act. Speedo opposes.

I. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

On March 3, 2010, the Court granted in part and denied in part the Defendants' initial motions for summary judgment. (Docket Nos. 149, 154.) The Court granted summary judgment on TYR's claims for false advertising under the Lanham Act and intentional interference with contractual relations. (Docket No. 154 at 28, 32.) The Court also granted summary adjudication on the remaining antitrust claims to the extent they were based on a coercion theory of antitrust liability--that the Defendants conspired to force or coerce swimmers to purchase Speedo swimsuits. (Id. at 24.) However, because the Defendants had failed to address TYR's disparagement theory [3] of liability, the Court denied summary judgment on the antitrust claims. (Id. at 20.) Recognizing the high threshold that a plaintiff must overcome to show that speech rises to the level of an antitrust violation, the Court invited a second round of briefing on the disparagement issue before the matter went to trial. (Id. at 33.) The Defendants now seek summary judgment on the remaining disparagement theory.

As set forth in the Court's prior order on summary judgment, this case revolves around the "swimsuit wars" of 2008 and 2009. (Id. at 2.) Speedo and TYR are competing manufacturers of high-end swimwear and accessories. (Id.) USA Swimming is the national governing body of the sport of swimming in the United States and has an exclusive sponsorship agreement with Speedo. (Id.) Schubert was, at all relevant times, employed by USA Swimming as the National and Olympic Team head coach and general manager and a paid spokesperson for Speedo. (Id.)

TYR's antitrust claims, under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 & 2, the Cartwright Act, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720 et seq., and the California Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., rest on [4] TYR's theory that Speedo, USA Swimming, and Schubert all conspired to unfairly promote Speedo's products and disparage competitors from Schubert's position of clout within the swimming community.

II. SUMMARY JUDGMENT

A. Legal Standard

HN1[] Summary judgment is appropriate only where the record, read in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, indicates "that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c)(2); see also *Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323-24, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. B. Discussion

As discussed above, TYR's remaining claims against [6] Speedo, USA Swimming, and Schubert all depend on its disparagement theory of antitrust liability. TYR bases this claim on a series of statements made by Schubert to elite swimmers and coaches touting the benefits of Speedo's LZR Racer swimsuit and disparaging the suits of Speedo's competitors.

TYR points to five sets of statements that it contends violate the antitrust laws: (1) a statement by Schubert at the December 2007 National Team Coaches Meeting that "athletes [should] wear the Speedo equipment if they wanted to compete at the highest level," and references made by a fellow USA Swimming employee to NASA testing and "4% less drag"; (2) a March 2008 email from Schubert to twenty swimming coaches stating that "only one company [Speedo] is putting millions into research and development" and "the trailing companies . . . [offer] an inferior product"; (3) a statement by Schubert to swimmers at a National Team meeting before an April 2008 swim meet in Manchester, England, that the Speedo LZR Racer "would give you a 2% advantage"; (4) a statement by Schubert to reporter Craig Lord at the same April 2008 meet that "if you take the best times of world record holders and their new times [7] [in the Speedo LZR], the difference is 2 percent," and that "some [swimmers] are contracted to an inferior product"; and (5) a statement by Schubert in January 2009 to two Junior National Team swimmers in Guam that they should wear the Speedo LZR because it was "faster" than the non-Speedo suits they were wearing.

1. False Advertising Under Section 1

As a preliminary matter, USA Swimming and Schubert contend that TYR cannot [*827] maintain an antitrust claim for false advertising under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. They note the Court's previous order on a motion to dismiss that, in order to distinguish Schachar v. American Academy of Ophthalmology, Inc., 870 F.2d 397 (7th Cir. 1989), TYR would have to prove that Schubert used his influence to coerce swimmers into wearing Speedo products. (Docket No. 72 at 8-9.) However, as pointed out by TYR, Schachar's analysis rests partially on the fact that the Seventh Circuit does not recognize a theory of antitrust liability based on false advertising. 870 F.2d at 399; see also Sanderson v. Culligan Int'l Co., 415 F.3d 620, 623 (7th Cir. 2005). In contrast, the Ninth Circuit does. See Am. Prof'l Testing Serv., Inc. v. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich Legal & Prof'l Publ'ns, Inc., 108 F.3d 1147, 1151-52 (9th Cir. 1997). [8] Thus Schachar, which is only persuasive authority in this Court, need not be entirely distinguished, especially where it may conflict with Harcourt Brace. This leaves open the question of whether a Section 1 claim can be based on false advertising in the Ninth Circuit.

USA Swimming and Schubert note that Harcourt Brace is a Section 2 decision and that no Ninth Circuit decision has extended it to a Section 1 conspiracy claim. However, the Ninth Circuit has never expressly precluded false advertising as a Section 1 claim either. And to the extent that Harcourt Brace recognizes that false advertising may constitute exclusionary conduct under Section 2, the Court is hesitant to find that it can never constitute a restraint of trade under Section 1.

In fact, the Eighth Circuit has recognized a Section 1 claim based on a conspiracy between a market participant and an ostensibly neutral non-market participant to disparage a competitor. See Impro Prods., Inc. v. Herrick, 715 F.2d 1267, 1271, 1273 (8th Cir. 1983). In Impro, the plaintiff alleged that:

> in return for compensation from the corporate defendants, [defendant] Dr. Herrick used his various positions [as a U.S. Department of Agriculture [9] veterinarian and an Iowa State University professor] to promote the products of the corporate defendants, to disparage [plaintiff's] products, and to influence various federal and state governmental officials to deny [plaintiff] necessary licensing for its products.

Id. at 1271. The court recognized this as a cognizable theory under Section 1, though it granted summary judgment because there was no evidence of a conspiracy. Id. at 1273, 1279-80.

However, HN8[] for a disparagement-based antitrust claim, Harcourt Brace sets a high burden of proof--the Ninth Circuit "insist[s] on a preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer) before these practices can rise to the level of exclusionary conduct." 108 F.3d at 1151 (citing 3 Phillip Areeda & Donald F. Turner, Antitrust Law P 737b (1978)) (emphasis in original) (internal quotation marks omitted). Because TYR has not made this requisite preliminary showing, the Court need not decide whether a Section 1 claim can ever be based on false advertising. [1]

[1] USA Swimming and Schubert also argue that TYR did not plead a Section 1 false advertising or disparagement claim [10] against them. This is incorrect. (See Compl. P 13 ("USA SWIMMING, SPEEDO and SCHUBERT have also combined to engage in a campaign of falsely disparaging the products of SPEEDO'S competitors, including TYR . . . .").)

USA Swimming and Schubert also appear to contend that TYR should be estopped from asserting a disparagement-based claim against them under Section 1 because in TYR's opposition to a motion to dismiss, it stated that Harcourt Brace "is irrelevant to the standards for pleading a Section 1 claim." (Docket No. 49 at 13.) However, TYR appears to have been arguing that the limitations set forth in Harcourt Brace do not apply to a Section 1 claim, not that the Section 1 claim was not based on disparagement. Because this argument is not inconsistent with its current argument, TYR is not estopped from asserting a

[*828] 2. Disparagement Versus Promotion

The Defendants argue that many of the statements TYR complains of only involve promotion of Speedo and do not directly disparage TYR or other competitors. Although Harcourt Brace itself involved the direct [11] disparagement of a rival, the Court sees no reason why false statements of promotion could not be actionable under similar reasoning. "[M]isrepresentations encouraging the purchase of [a] product can fit [the] general test for an exclusionary practice when the impact on rivals is significant; deception of buyers can impede the opportunities of rivals." 3A Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law P 782b (2007). The claims should not be dismissed on this basis.

3. Protected Statements

The Defendants also argue that several of the statements upon which TYR rests its claims are protected by the First Amendment or constitute puffery and thus cannot be the basis for an antitrust claim. See Jefferson County Sch. Dist. No. R-1 v. Moody's Investor's Servs., Inc., 175 F.3d 848, 860 (10th Cir. 1999) (HN9[] "[T]he First Amendment does not allow antitrust claims to be predicated solely on protected speech."). For example, in the order on the initial motions for summary judgment, the Court found that Schubert's statements to reporter Craig Lord ("Lord") were not commercial speech and thus not actionable under the Lanham Act. (Docket No. 154 at 26-28.) The Court also previously found several [12] statements by Schubert to be puffery. (Docket No. 72 at 16-18.)

Statements to Lord

TYR contends that Schubert's statements to Lord are commercial speech actionable under the antitrust laws. [2] That ship has sailed; the Court already made the determination that the statements to Lord did not constitute commercial speech in the context of TYR's Lanham Act claim--TYR failed to even oppose Speedo's argument. (Docket No. 154 at 26-28.) TYR cannot resurrect these statements as a basis for its antitrust claim absent some grounds for reconsideration, see Local Rule 7-18, which TYR has not provided.

In any case, the Court is not persuaded by TYR's attempt to distinguish Boule v. Hutton, 328 F.3d 84 (2d Cir. 2003), which [*829] the Court relied upon in granting summary judgment on TYR's Lanham Act claim. As discussed in the Court's prior order, Boule involved allegedly false statements made by art collectors about the authenticity of another collection. Id. at 86, 88. The statements were made to a reporter writing an article in an industry publication about the prevalence of fraud in the art market. Id. The Second Circuit [14] found that the statements were not commercial speech and therefore not actionable under the Lanham Act. Id. at 91-92.

TYR argues that Schubert's statements to Lord promoting the virtues of Speedo and stating that competitors had "inferior products" are distinguishable because they are not "inextricably intertwined" with the issue of public concern that Lord was writing about--"the evolution of swimsuit technology and its impact on the sport of disparagement-based theory against USA Swimming and Schubert. See Hamilton v. State Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 270 F.3d 778, 782 (9th Cir. 2001).

[2] Though the parties do not explicitly address the issue and assume that Lanham Act cases are applicable to a false advertising-based antitrust claim, the Court finds that HN10[] an antitrust plaintiff must demonstrate that the false statement was made in commercial advertising or promotion, as under the Lanham Act. See, e.g., Newcal Indus., Inc. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1052 (9th Cir. 2008). The Ninth Circuit's rationale for allowing false advertising-based antitrust claims--to prevent the deception of buyers to the detriment of rivals--is the same as the policy behind the Lanham Act. Indeed, [13] Harcourt Brace's de minimis presumption test tracks several of the elements of a Lanham Act claim. Compare Harcourt Brace, 108 F.3d at 1152 (antitrust plaintiff must show statements are "(1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization"), with Newcal Indus., 513 F.3d at 1052 (Lanham Act plaintiff must show that statement is (1) false, (2) in commercial advertising or promotion, (3) likely to deceive, (4) material, (5) in interstate commerce, and (6) that plaintiff had been injured).

competitive swimming." (TYR's Compendium of Exs. ("COE"), Ex. 12 P 13.) The Court disagrees. Schubert's discussion of the Speedo LZR Racer, its effect on swimming times, and his concern that swimmers who wore what he considered "inferior products" would be at a competitive disadvantage closely relates to the topic of swimsuit technology and its impact on the sport. Indeed, when read in the full context and not just as carefully plucked snippets, Schubert's statements reflect a desire for more competition in swimsuit technology, which he hoped would prolong the careers of swimmers. [3]

The Court is not persuaded by the two cases cited by TYR. In Semco, Inc. v. Amcast, Inc., 52 F.3d 108 (6th Cir. 1995), the Sixth Circuit found that an article in a trade journal written by a manufacturer could constitute commercial speech because it contained gratuitous promotions of the manufacturer's product, "which [did] not contribute to [the article's] intellectual or technical value." Id. at 113. Here, in contrast, the SwimNews.com article was written by Lord, not Schubert; Lord chose what to include in the article, and Schubert's comments came only in response to Lord's apparently unsolicited questions. [16] See Boule, 328 F.3d at 91. Moreover, unlike the comments at issue in Semco, Schubert's comments about competing swimsuit manufacturers are inextricably related to the subject of Lord's article--the evolution of swimsuit technology. It is difficult to fathom how Schubert could have discussed the subject without addressing the products currently on the market.

In Fuente Cigar Ltd. v. Opus One, 985 F. Supp. 1448 (M.D. Fla. 1997), the court, on a motion for leave to amend a pleading, held that a competitor's statements made to a reporter in a trade publication about pending litigation was commercial speech actionable under the Lanham Act. Id. at 1450, 1456. The court primarily relied on the fact that the comments were made in a trade publication and not a general news publication or magazine. Id. at 1456. The Court finds this case distinguishable because SwimNews.com is not a trade publication. Fuente Cigar involved statements in a cigar industry publication about competing [*830] cigar manufacturers. Id. at 1450. SwimNews.com, by contrast, is a general news publication about the sport of swimming, providing news about swim meets, specific swimmers and coaches, controversies in the swimming community, [17] and other relevant news. [4] Its intended audience is not swimsuit manufacturers or vendors. No reasonable juror would mistake the website for a trade journal or industry publication. Moreover, to the extent Fuente Cigar's reasoning conflicts with Boule--which also involved an industry publication--the Court finds Boule, a more recent Court of Appeals decision, more persuasive.

Accordingly, the Court affirms its prior decision that the statements to Lord are not commercial speech and therefore not actionable as an antitrust violation.

2007 Coaches Meeting and 2008 Email

The Defendants contend that the comments made by Schubert at the December 2007 coaches meeting and Schubert's March 2008 email to coaches constitute puffery. One of the coaches at the 2007 meeting recalls "Coach Schubert stat[ing] that coaches should advise their athletes to wear Speedo equipment if they wanted to compete at the highest level." [5] (COE, Ex. 7 P 3.) The Court finds this to be HN11[] classic puffery--"exaggerated advertising,

[3] Schubert's full statement, as quoted by Lord, is as follows;

> The fact is that there is nothing more important than having the manufacturers be competitive because they [15] do provide the living for the athletes and that's what's really helped the sport of swimming to allow the athletes to swim to older ages, more like track and field. I have always felt that swimming should be like track and field (in terms of the ages and longevity of athletes) but the problem we have now is that everyone is contracted to one suit and some are contracted to an inferior product and those manufacturers need to let go and everyone can compete on a level playing field with a product that is the same and then they need to put the effort in and catch up.

(COE, Ex. 13.)

blustering, and boasting upon which no reasonable buyer would rely." Southland Sod Farms v. Stover Seed Co., 108 F.3d 1134, 1145 (9th Cir. 1997) [18] (citing 3 J. Thomas McCarthy, McCarthy on Trademarks and Unfair Competition § 27.04[4][d] at 27-52 (3d ed. 1994)). For a statement to be actionable, [6] it must make a "specific and measurable advertisement claim of product superiority." Id. at 1145. The statement attributed to Schubert is a general statement of superiority and contains nothing about the specific attributes of Speedo equipment. No reasonable buyer would rely on this statement in making a purchasing decision.

TYR argues that the statement is not puffery because it is capable of being proven false, as demonstrated by the fact that swimmers wearing TYR suits successfully competed at the Olympics, "the highest level." TYR misses the point. HN12[] Whether a statement is puffery does not depend on the truth or falsity of a statement; it depends on the degree of generality or specificity. "The 'puffing' rule amounts to a seller's privilege to lie his head off, so long as he says nothing specific." Castrol Inc. v. Pennzoil Co., 987 F.2d 939, 945 (3d Cir. 1993) (quoting W. Page Keeton, et al., Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts § 109, at 756-57 (5th ed. 1984)); accord Pizza Hut, Inc. v. Papa John's Int'l, Inc., 227 F.3d 489, 497 (5th Cir. 2000). The statement here is unquestionably hyperbole, but it is a general one. No reasonable person would think that they would be incapable of competing without the Speedo suit.

TYR also attempts to analogize to two Second Circuit decisions, Castrol and Time [*831] Warner Cable, Inc. v. DIRECTV, Inc., 497 F.3d 144 (2d Cir. 2007). In Castrol, the defendant claimed that its motor oil "outperforms any leading [20] motor oil against viscosity breakdown." 987 F.3d at 941. The court found this to be literally false, as demonstrated by a battery of comparative tests of viscosity breakdown. Id. at 943-44. The analogy to this case is very weak; the Castrol statement singled out a specific attribute of motor oil--viscosity breakdown--that could be proven false by specific testing, whereas the statement here amounts to a general statement that Speedo's swimsuits are superior without any comparisons of any specific attributes of the suits.

Likewise, the analogy to Time Warner Cable is weak. There, the court found that statements in television advertisements that "[y]ou're just not gonna get the best picture out of some fancy big screen TV without DIRECTV. It's broadcast in 1080i," and that "settling for cable would be illogical," were likely to be shown literally false on a motion for a preliminary injunction. 497 F.3d at 154, 158. The court found that, in the context of the advertisements, the statements made the claim that the picture quality of satellite was better than cable. Id. Again, this case is distinguishable because the statements made assertions about a specific attribute of the product--picture [21] quality--whereas the general statement attributed to Schubert does not.

The Defendants also argue that the statements in Schubert's March 2008 email are puffery. Schubert, giving his "personal opinion" on the swimsuit controversy, stated that:

> [Speedo] is putting millions into research and development. . . . To combat this, the trailing companies [TYR and Nike] pay more money to sign our new pros to big contracts wearing an inferior product. We need our coaches and athletes to pressure the other manufacturers to "get in the game." Three competitive companies (or more) is to all our advantage.

[5] Although TYR has a video recording of the coaches meeting, (see Hilton Decl. P 2), it is unable to point out where Schubert actually made such an assertion. The only evidence of this statement is the coach's declaration, executed over two years after the meeting took place. However, because this is a motion for summary judgment, the Court may not weigh this evidence against the actual recording of the coaches meeting. Balint v. Carson City, Nev., 180 F.3d 1047, 1054 (9th Cir. 1999).

[6] As discussed above, the Court finds that an alleged false advertisement must, at a minimum, be actionable non-puffery under the Lanham Act. See Harcourt Brace, 108 F.3d at 1152 (noting the difficulty of distinguishing actionable false [19] statements from puffing in setting for the de minimis presumption).

However, TYR argues that the "inferior product" statement is actionable because it came within the context of previous statements about testing and therefore gave the impression that the claim was based on independent testing. See Southland Sod, 108 F.3d at 1145; Pizza Hut, 227 F.3d at 495 n.5 (HN13[] "Where the context [22] of an advertising statement may lend greater specificity to an otherwise vague representation, the court should not succumb to the temptation to hastily rule a phrase to be unactionable under the Lanham Act." (quotation omitted)). TYR points to comments made by Jonty Skinner ("Skinner"), a USA Swimming employee, at the December 2007 coaches meeting that the Speedo suit was tested by NASA and achieved a 4% reduction in drag, (Hilton Decl. P 2), a reference in Schubert's email to research and development, (COE, Ex. 10), and a note in Craig Lord's SwimNews.com article that the technology was developed by NASA, (COE, Ex. 13).

The Court finds that none of these references even remotely implies that the "inferior product" statement was based on any testing. First of all, Skinner's statements were clearly based on comparative testing of previous generations of swimsuits and could not be reasonably interpreted as comparative testing of Speedo's current products against competitors' current products. [7] They are irrelevant to [*832] Schubert's statement months later about "inferior products." [8] Second, Schubert's reference to Speedo spending millions on research in no way implies any sort of comparative [23] testing. And finally, Lord's article can give no context to the March 13 email because it was published nearly a month after the email. (COE, Ex. 13.) Moreover, it was written by Lord, a swimming reporter who is not alleged to be an agent of Speedo, USA Swimming, or Schubert.

Accordingly, the Court finds that Schubert's statements at the December 2007 coaches meeting and the March 2008 email are non-actionable puffery. [9]

4. Effect on Competition

HN14[] In order to state a valid Sherman Act claim under a false advertising theory, the plaintiff must make a "preliminary showing of significant and more-than-temporary harmful effects on competition (and not merely upon a competitor or customer)." Harcourt Brace, 108 F.3d at 1151 (emphasis in original). Because of the difficulties in distinguishing actionable false statements from puffing, the speculative effect that advertising has on consuming behavior, and buyer distrust of a seller's disparaging comments, the Ninth Circuit has set forth a presumption that commercial speech or advertising has a de minimis effect on competition. Id. at 1152. A plaintiff may overcome this presumption by showing that the charged speech meets a six-factor test: the statements must be "(1) clearly false, (2) clearly material, (3) clearly likely to induce reasonable [25] reliance, (4) made to buyers without knowledge of the subject matter, (5) continued for prolonged periods, and (6) not readily susceptible of neutralization or other offset by rivals." Id. (citation omitted).

TYR argues that it must only demonstrate that the charged speech meets the Harcourt Brace six-factor test. In other words, TYR's position is that the de minimis presumption is the only hurdle that an antitrust plaintiff must overcome to get to a jury on a false advertising claim. The Court disagrees with TYR's reading of Harcourt Brace.

[7] Skinner's full statement at the meeting is as follows;

> In the testing that they [Speedo] do, and they go all the way to NASA and they test with a device at NASA, test the friction of the suit . . . . And you quantify the suit that evolved in Melbourne as being 4% less friction as the one that they had in Sydney . . . . And they quantify the suit that's going to come out in Beijing as being 3% faster than the suit that came out in Melbourne, or 3% less friction than the suit that came out in Melbourne.

(COE, Ex. 8 [Recording of National Team Coaches Meeting, Dec. 16-17, 2007, Disk 4] at 39:05.)

[8] The Court reads TYR's argument as using Skinner's comments to provide the context for statements by Schubert, and not as providing a separate instance of false advertising. (See Opp'n Br. 9.) In any case, Defendants would be entitled to summary judgment, as TYR admits that it cannot prove that Skinner's statements are false. [24] (Id. at 5:13-15; COE, Exs. 22, 23.)

[9] The Defendants do not argue that the statement at the 2008 Manchester team meeting and the statement to the junior swimmers in 2009 are puffery.

HN15[] Harcourt Brace first sets out the requirement that disparagement "must have a significant and enduring adverse impact on competition itself in the relevant markets to rise to the level of an antitrust violation." Id. at 1152. The plaintiff has the burden of proving this "significant and enduring impact" in order to proceed on the claim. Id. at 1151.

The court then specified that HN16[] antitrust claims based on false advertising "should presumptively be ignored"--that is, the defendant is entitled to a presumption that false advertising has a de minimis effect on competition before the introduction [*833] of any evidence of actual market impact. See id. at 1152. [26] The six-factor test--which focuses on the characteristics of the charged speech and not on any evidence of actual market effect--is the plaintiff's means of overcoming this first hurdle. It does not, however, satisfy the plaintiff's burden of proving an actual "significant and enduring adverse impact on competition." In other words, a plaintiff that has discharged the de minimis presumption is not automatically entitled to its own presumption of significant market effect. In addition to showing that the speech is of the type that could have a significant effect on competition, the plaintiff has the burden of showing that it actually did affect competition. [10]

Therefore, the Defendants having asserted TYR's lack of evidence of a "significant and enduring adverse impact," TYR has the burden of coming forward with evidence to create a triable issue of fact. Celotex, 477 U.S. at 323. TYR points to four alleged market circumstances [27] as evidence of an adverse effect on competition: (1) from February 2008 to June 2009, Speedo increased market share while charging a higher price than TYR; (2) Speedo controlled 95% of the market by June 2009; (3) during that time period, TYR lost market share; and (4) Nike completely exited the market in September 2009.

The first three circumstances are based on a report prepared by Robin Cantor ("Cantor"). (COE, Ex. 1.) Cantor's report compared the sales of "championship suits," such as the Speedo LZR Racer and the TYR Tracer Rise, in "benchmark periods" prior to the alleged unlawful conduct against the "injury period" of February 2008 to July 2009. (Id. PP 15, 18.) Cantor limited her analysis to sales to "Team Dealers"--retailers who sell suits to competitive swimmers and teams--where TYR and Speedo generated a majority of their championship suit revenue. (Id. PP 15, 19.) Cantor studied the sales data from three Team Dealers. (Id. P 20.) Cantor also limited her analysis to sales of TYR and Speedo products only, because those two manufacturers "dominated" the Team Dealer market. (Id.) Cantor found that Speedo increased its relative share of the Team Dealer market after the introduction [28] of the LZR Racer while charging higher prices than TYR's Tracer Rise. (Id. PP 48-50.) Cantor concludes that this is "consistent with the conclusion that the challenged conduct injured TYR sales and competition in championship suits." (Id. P 50.)

The one major flaw in Cantor's analysis--and the reason it does not provide evidence of significant injury to competition--is that it completely omits the sales of any other swimsuit manufacturers. Cantor defined a market where TYR is Speedo's only competitor, thereby allowing her to assert that injury to TYR is injury to competition. The supposed "market share" is actually a measure of the relative sales volume of Speedo as compared to TYR, and says nothing about Speedo's or TYR's actual market share because there is no evidence of the sales of other competitors like Nike, blueseventy, Arena, Jaked, or Adidas.

Cantor justifies the exclusion of other competitors from the analysis on the assertion that TYR and Speedo "dominate" the Team Dealer market. (Id. P 20.) Cantor notes that, over the five year period from 2004 to 2009, Speedo and TYR accounted for 77% and 17% of the sales to Team Dealers of suits costing at least $ 40. (Id.) [*834] However, this [29] is very misleading. Throughout the report, Cantor tallies the sales of championship and "high-end" championship suits; yet, in order to exclude all competitors other than TYR and Speedo, she tallies all suits costing more than $ 40, rather than the relevant championship suits. This has the effect of minimizing the relevant market share of manufacturers that concentrate on the higher-priced championship suits. Moreover, by averaging sales over a five-year period, Cantor minimizes the market share of recent entrants like blueseventy, which entered the market in the summer of 2008. (USA Swimming Reply Br., Ex. B P 5.) Finally, by limiting the analysis to Team Dealer sales, Cantor excludes the relevant sales of manufacturers like Jaked and Arena, which concentrate on direct internet sales or on-site sales at swim competitions. (Id. P 5.)

[10] This holding is supported by the fact that the Ninth Circuit has applied the "significant and enduring impact" test for claims outside the context of false advertising. Adaptive Power Solutions, LLC v. Hughes Missile Sys. Co., 141 F.3d 947, 952 (9th Cir. 1998)

Thus, Cantor's report shows only that Speedo's sales in the Team Dealer market increased relative to TYR's sales. TYR has presented no evidence of the sales or market shares of any of the competitors. On this record, there is no way to determine whether TYR's lost sales were picked up by new entrants or whether Speedo actually lost overall market share [30] to new entrants at any time during the relevant period. At best, Cantor's report is evidence of injury to TYR, Speedo's competitor, but does not show injury to competition, which is what the law requires. [11] Pool Water Prods, v. Olin Corp., 258 F.3d 1024, 1036 (9th Cir. 2001) (finding no antitrust injury because "[a] decrease in one competitor's market share . . . affects competitors, not competition"); see also Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 906, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007) ("The purpose of the antitrust laws, by contrast, is 'the protection of competition, not competitors.'" (quoting Atlantic Richfield Co. v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 338, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990) (emphasis in original)).

The Court also finds that Cantor's report should be excluded under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 as unreliable and not based on sufficient facts or data. See Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 589-95, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993). By not considering any data on the pricing, sales volume, or market share of manufacturers other than Speedo and TYR, Cantor simply cannot make a reliable analysis as to market impact. The report is therefore irrelevant to the issue of market impact.

Although not necessary to support the Court's conclusion, the Defendants have offered evidence that competition in the championship swimsuit market actually increased after Schubert's statements, in the form of [32] new market entrants like blueseventy, Jaked, Arena, and Adidas. The success of the LZR Racer at the 2008 [*835] Olympics spurred these companies to produce new suits for the American market. (See Lord Decl. PP 26-28; Schubert Depo. at 94:3-96:8, 182:2-25; USA Swimming Reply Br., Ex. B P 5; Furniss Depo. at 85:20-86:8; Bielak Decl., Exs. L P 4-7, M, N, P, V.) By the time of the U.S. World Championship trials in July 2009, one year after the 2008 Olympic Trials, these new entrants had gained very significant traction among elite swimmers, as shown by the suit choice of swimmers in the finals of several competitions:

Speedo	77	80	30
TYR	7	13	10
Nike	12	1	0
Arena	0	0	19
blueseventy	0	6	9
Jaked	0	0	32

[11] Because the supplemental export report by Jules H. Kamin ("Kamin") relies entirely on Cantor's report, it suffers from the same flaws. (See COE, Ex. 3 P 1.) Kamin opines that:

> [t]he fact that Speedo was able to increase its market share, the absolute quantity of units sold, and its prices while the quality of its championship suits was not superior to that of TYR's . . . [shows] that the conduct of the defendants cause economic injury to consumers, sometimes called injury to competition.

(Id. P 5.) [31] However, as discussed above, Cantor's report does not measure actual market share; it only measures Speedo's sales relative to TYR's. And Cantor's report does not support the claim that Speedo increased prices. Cantor merely found that Speedo charged higher prices than TYR. (COE, Ex. 1. PP 39-40 & tbl. 8.) Moreover, there is nothing in the record indicating the prices charged by other competitors. Thus, Kamin's assertion of "allocative inefficiency" is based on faulty assumptions. (See Kamin Decl. P 5(b) & (c).)

(Supp. Isaac Decl. P 4, Exs. A-C.)

In addition, one of the country's largest swimsuit retailers noticed the dramatic penetration of blueseventy into the high-end swimsuit market. (See USA Swimming Reply Br., Ex. B PP 1, 4-7.) From May 2007 to May 2008, the retailer estimated its sales by manufactuer in the following percentages: 70% for Speedo, 15% for TYR, and 15% for Nike. (Id. P 4.) After blueseventy entered [33] the market in the summer of 2008, the retailer estimated its sales in the second half of 2008 and the first half of 2009 according to the following percentages: 75% for blueseventy, 12% for Speedo, and 3% combined for TYR and Nike. [12] (Id. P 5.) The retailer estimates that the total sales volume for blueseventy during that period was $ 600,000. (Id. P 7.) In that time period, the retailer sold to roughly 20% of all collegiate swim teams and between 85% to 90% of those customers purchased the blueseventy suit. (Id. P 6.)

Finally, Speedo presents evidence that TYR had difficulty keeping up with demand for its championship suit. If Schubert's comments actually had the effect of excluding TYR from the market, one would ordinarily expect to see excess inventory, or greater supply than demand for TYR's goods, rather than the opposite. However, in January 2008, Steve Furniss, TYR's Executive Vice President, noted in an email that, "[o]n Tracer Light [TYR's high-end suit at [34] the time] we are already behind in production schedule and Sales has already sold out initial allocation plus they are behind sample and promotional needs." (Richter Decl., Ex. E.) These production delays were confirmed by Matt Zimmer, TYR's Promotions Director, who laid out a plan of rationing the available inventory of Tracer Light suits among college teams, noting the "extremely frustrating situation [of] hav[ing] so few championship suits available for our many teams." (Id., Ex. F.) However, he also noted the high demand, stating that "we've got teams clammoring [sic] for our newest suits." (Id.) A month later, in March 2008, Zimmer stated--in an email titled "Tracer allocation"--that "our Tracer inventory is still well below what we hoped it would be," though "the demand has really ramped up once again." (Id., Ex. G.) Even after the Beijing Olympics, TYR acknowledged the limited availability of its championship suits to NCAA coaches, noting that "[w]e have experienced strong demand [for the Tracer Light] and continue to chase availability," and that the TYR Tracer Rise "will not be available until early 2009" [*836] due to a temporary NCAA ban. (Id., Ex. I.)

The Defendants' evidence of [35] elite swimmers using suits by new entrants, significant sales volume and market share, and TYR's inability to keep up with demand appears to show not only that there was no significant impact on competition (as opposed to TYR individually), but also that any adverse effect on competition was short-lived and not enduring. [13]

TYR argues that evidence that [36] top swimmers are wearing competitors' suits is not necessarily indicative of healthy competition in the Team Dealer market, where Speedo sells roughly 95% of its championship suits. (COE, Ex. 1 P 19; Brommer Depo. at 90:5-17.) This may be true, but TYR misunderstands its burden on summary

[12] These estimates also demonstrate the fallacy of the Cantor report. By excluding the sales of blueseventy, the new entrant, Cantor's analysis completely fails to account for 75% of the market, at least at this retailer.

[13] TYR contends that the "enduring impact" test is a low bar, citing In re Remeron Antitrust Litigation, 335 F. Supp. 2d 522 (D.N.J. 2004) and Indiana Grocery Co. v. Super Valu Stores, 647 F. Supp. 254 (S.D. Ind. 1986), both of which allowed antitrust claims to proceed on the basis of relatively short periods of alleged unlawful conduct. However, neither of these cases involved a false advertising antitrust claim and, thus, neither applied the "significant and enduring impact" test set forth in Harcourt Brace. See Remeron, 335 F. Supp. 2d at 526-27; Indiana Grocery, 647 F. Supp. at 256-57. And although Thompson's Gas & Elec. Serv. v. BP Am., No. 08 CV 2693, 691 F. Supp. 2d 860, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16906 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 25, 2010), cites the Harcourt Brace test, it neither applies the test, nor does it involve a false advertising claim. *Id. at *2-4, 7-10.

judgment--it must provide affirmative evidence of harm to competition. It has provided no evidence of Team Dealer sales of manufacturers other than Speedo and TYR, failing to meet its burden and also failing to rebut the Defendants evidence of major penetration by at least one new entrant at a major retailer. [14]

TYR also tries to dismiss the impact of new entrants by noting that many of the new suits have been banned by FINA, the international governing body of swimming. The Court fails to see the relevance of the FINA ban. TYR's theory was that the Defendants restrained trade and monopolized the high-end swimsuit market through Schubert's alleged false statements promoting the LZR Racer. The Defendants have presented some evidence that new competitors entered and took significant market share from both Speedo and TYR, thereby showing that the statements had little effect on competition and that any effect was short-lived. The fact that FINA banned all the suits--including Speedo's and TYR's--effectively terminating that entire market, does not rebut the Defendants' evidence of new competition prior to the ban. TYR does not allege any false statements regarding the post-ban suits. That market is simply irrelevant. [15]

Nor does Nike's exit from the market in September 2008 demonstrate that Schubert's statements had a significant and enduring impact on competition. (See [*837] COE, Ex. 28.) Ordinarily, the loss of a significant competitor from the market would signal a major adverse effect on competition and would harm consumers. However, the Defendants have shown evidence, unrebutted by TYR, that new entrants were producing suits of better quality than even Speedo's and TYR's by the time Nike exited. (See Lord Decl. PP 26-28; Schubert Depo. at 94:3-96:8, 182:2-25; USA Swimming Reply Br., Ex. B P 5; Furniss Decl. 85:20-86:8; Bielak Decl., Exs. L P 4-7, M, N, P, V.) These new suits were apparently gaining widespread acceptance among elite swimmers less than a year after Nike exited. (Supp. Isaac Decl. P 4, Exs. A-C.)

Moreover, TYR fails to show any link between Schubert's statements and Nike's exit. On this record, Nike's exit is entirely consistent [39] with normal competition: the well-publicized Olympic success of the LZR Racer combined with new suits developed by blueseventy, Arena, and Jaked may have forced Nike out. There is no allegation or evidence that Nike had a championship suit comparable to the Speedo LZR Racer, TYR Tracer Rise, or any of the new suits by the new entrants. Indeed, its willingness to let its top sponsored swimmers swim in Speedo suits at the Olympics suggests otherwise. (COE, Ex. 28.)

The Court also finds that the alleged false advertising does not even overcome the Harcourt Brace de minimis presumption. At the pleading stage, the Court was hesitant to apply the presumption because TYR had alleged that Schubert's position with USA Swimming gave his statements the appearance of objectivity. (See Docket No. 72 at 10.) HN17[] The Harcourt Brace presumption rested partially on the rationale that buyers generally do not trust comments made by competitors. 108 F.3d at 1152. However, the Ninth Circuit also relied on the difficulty in distinguishing actionable false statements from puffery and the speculative nature of the effects of false advertising, "especially when [it] is not systematic." Id. This would apply regardless [40] of whether the speaker had the appearance of objectivity. That circumstance may be considered within the Harcourt Brace factors, such as the likelihood of inducing reliance or susceptibility of neutralization, but the Court does not find that it negates the application of the presumption entirely.

The Court finds that the alleged misrepresentations fail the Harcourt Brace test because TYR cannot demonstrate that the statements "continued for prolonged periods." Id. at 1152. The only two actionable statements are [14] TYR also presents the declaration of Dean Jackson, Sales Director at blueseventy, noting that, for all of blueseventy's success, it has been unable to sign any NCAA teams to sponsorship contracts. (Jackson Decl. P 5.) Jackson states that "Coach Schubert's influence and his relationship with Speedo created a barrier that was 'insurmountable.'" (Id. P 6.) Jackson does not purport to be an expert on economics and, in any case, attributes the "insurmountable" barrier [37] to Schubert's influence rather than any false advertising. This declaration is far from demonstrating a significant impact on competition.

[15] TYR also does not rebut evidence that it had trouble meeting demand for its championship suits. It does submit a declaration that it has the [38] capacity to produce 10,000-12,000 Tracer Light or Tracer Rise swimsuits per month, (Meng Decl. P 2), but this hardly rebuts Speedo's evidence that the demand for TYR's suits outpaced its ability to supply the suits, despite its apparently strenuous efforts to do so.

Schubert's comment at the Manchester swim meet in April 2008 and his statement to two junior swimmers in January 2009. Two isolated statements to very limited audiences spaced by nearly a year are not the sort of sustained, systematic false advertising that would have more than a de minimis effect on competition. TYR cannot meet its burden where the statements it relies upon are separated by long periods; the advertising must be "continued," i.e., sustained, for a prolonged period. See id. at 1152.

Even if all five of the charged statements were considered, the Court still finds they does not meet the necessary test of sustained advertisement. One statement was made at a coaches [41] meeting in December 2008, one in an email in March 2008, two at a swim meet in April 2008, and the last to two junior swimmers in January 2009. Five sporadic statements spread out over the course of more than a year are not the sort of systematic advertising capable of significantly affecting competition.

TYR argues that the "prolonged period" test is a very low burden to meet. However, it has no authority for this proposition. It argues that *National Ass'n of Pharmaceutical [838] Manufacturers, Inc. v. Ayerst Laboratories, Division of/and American Home Products Corp., 850 F.2d 904 (2d Cir. 1988), allowed an antitrust disparagement claim to overcome the de minimis presumption despite the fact that the disparagement was contained in a single letter. Id. at 916-17. However, unlike the Ninth Circuit, which requires a plaintiff to satisfy all of the six Harcourt Brace elements, 108 F.3d at 1152, the Second Circuit apparently does not find each element mandatory. Ayerst, 850 F.2d at 916-17; see also Am. Council of Certified Podiatric Physicians & Surgeons v. Am. Bd. of Podiatric Surgery. Inc., 323 F.3d 366, 371 & n.6 (6th Cir. 2003) (noting the ambiguity of the Second Circuit's test and declining [42] to decide whether all elements must be met in Sixth Circuit). Ayerst did not find that the single letter was sufficient to meet the "prolonged period" requirement; rather, it allowed the case to proceed despite not meeting that element. See 850 F.2d at 917. This is not an option in the Ninth Circuit. TYR must demonstrate that the statements continued for a prolonged period.

Because TYR has not provided evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer a "significant and enduring adverse impact on competition," the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on the Sherman Act claims. Additionally, no triable issue of fact exists as to whether Schubert's statements "continued for a prolonged period." Therefore, TYR cannot overcome the presumption that Schubert's statements had only a de minimis effect on competition and the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on that ground as well.

5. Remaining State Claims

TYR's remaining causes of action are brought under the Cartwright Act and the UCL, and TYR brings a separate claim for injunctive relief.

HN18[] "Where Cartwright Act claims are premised on the same facts as Sherman Act claims, and summary judgment is granted on the Sherman Act claims, [43] summary judgment is also appropriate for Cartwright Act claims." Breakdown Servs., Ltd. v. Now Casting, Inc., 550 F. Supp. 2d 1123, 1141 (C.D. Cal. 2007) (citing County of Tuolumne v. Sonora Cmty. Hosp., 236 F.3d 1148, 1160 (9th Cir. 2001)). Here, the Cartwright Act claim is identical to TYR's Sherman Act claims. Because the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on the Sherman Act claims, they are entitled to summary judgment on the Cartwright Act claim as well.

HN19[] The UCL prohibits three separate categories of conduct--"acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent." Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. L.A. Cellular Tel. Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999); Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Conduct is "unfair" if it "threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Id. at 187. Thus, in most cases, "where plaintiff's [UCL] claim is predicated on antitrust violations that fail to withstand summary judgment, the [UCL] claim must also fail." Breakdown Servs., 550 F. Supp. 2d at 1142. Because [44] TYR's UCL claim is based on the same facts as its same failed antitrust claims, the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on the UCL claim.

TYR's final remaining claim seeks only injunctive relief and does not state an independent cause of action. Because the Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on TYR's remaining claims, the injunctive relief claim fails as well.

[*839] III. RECONSIDERATION

TYR seeks reconsideration of the Court's order granting summary judgment on its false advertising claim under the Lanham Act. The Court granted summary judgment on the grounds that TYR did not have evidence of injury traceable to the alleged false statements. (Docket No. 154 at 25-26.)

A. Legal Standard

HN20[] Under Rule 59(e), a party may move to alter or amend a judgment within 28 days. The grounds for reconsideration are set forth in Local Rule 7-18, which provides:

> HN21[] A motion for reconsideration of the decision on any motion may be made only on the grounds of (a) a material difference in fact or law from that presented to the Court before such decision that in the exercise of reasonable diligence could not have been known to the party moving for reconsideration at the time of such decision, or (b) the [45] emergence of new material facts or a change of law occurring after the time of such decision, or (c) a manifest showing of a failure to consider material facts presented to the Court before such decision. No motion for reconsideration shall in any manner repeat any oral or written argument made in support of or in opposition to the original motion.

L.R. 7-18. HN22[] The Court may disregard evidence or arguments on a motion for reconsideration that could reasonably have been presented prior to this Court's ruling. Hopkins v. Andaya, 958 F.2d 881, 887 n.5 (9th Cir. 1992).

B. Discussion

TYR moves for reconsideration based on an expert report that it received after the due date for its opposition papers in the original round of summary judgment briefing. It contends that this report could not, with reasonable diligence, have been completed and submitted with TYR's opposition papers because the expert, Cantor, did not receive necessary data from Speedo until a week before TYR's opposition was due. (Cantor Decl. P 7.) Speedo disputes this assertion and argues that TYR could have submitted the report prior to the Court's final order. The Court need not resolve this dispute, however, because the Court [46] finds no prejudice in considering the new evidence given the second round of summary judgment briefing. The Court also finds that, even considering the new evidence, Speedo is entitled to summary judgment on the Lanham Act claim.

TYR's Lanham Act claim is premised on two remaining sets of statements: (1) Schubert's claim at the April 2008 Manchester meeting that the Speedo LZR Racer provided a 2% advantage, and (2) his statement to two junior swimmers in Guam in January 2009 that the LZR Racer was "faster" than the non-Speedo suits they were wearing.[16] (See Docket No. 154 at 24-28.) Given that both statements were made to a limited audience and none of those present switched to Speedo products as a result of the statement, the Court found that TYR had failed to demonstrate any actual deception or any actual injury [*840] as a result of the statements. (Id. at 25-26.) TYR now argues that Cantor's report demonstrates a loss of sales that can be attributed to "the challenged conduct." (Cantor Decl., Ex. A.)

[16] Speedo was granted summary judgment with respect to Schubert's statement to reporter Craig Lord because that statement was not commercial speech or advertising. (Docket No. 154 at 26-28.) [47] TYR provides no grounds for reconsidering that ruling. The other statements that form the basis of TYR's antitrust disparagement claim were either not alleged to be the basis for the Lanham Act claim or were not raised by TYR in opposition to Speedo's prior summary judgment motion. (See Compl.; Docket No. 127 at 24-30.) It is too late to amend the Lanham Act claim now, on a motion to reconsider a grant of summary judgment.

In the previous summary judgment order, the Court did not consider whether there was a triable issue as to whether Schubert's statements were false or misleading. (Docket No. 154 at 28 n. 19.) With respect to the "2% advantage" statement in Manchester, there is some ambiguity as to what Schubert actually said. One of the swimmers testified that Schubert told him that the LZR Racer "was a two percent improvement on performance from other suits," but "[i]t wasn't specifically made clear that it was two percent in relation to anything else. It was just two percent improvement." (Marshall Depo. at 16:8-17.) Another swimmer who heard the 2% advantage statement at the meeting took it to mean that the LZR Racer was "2 percent better than any suit," but admitted that "[it] [48] wasn't clear" what the 2 percent was being compared to. (Van Wie Depo. at 49:2-14.) A third swimmer testified that Schubert stated that the LZR Racer "would give you like a 2 percent advantage," and took that to mean "[t]he 2 percent advantage was 2 percent advantage over all the suits. It was the fastest suit on the market or something." (Descenza Depo. at 18:17-20, 19:8-12.) Schubert claims that he was referring to a 2% advantage over the prior generation of Speedo suits, the Speedo FS Pro. (Schubert Decl. P 11; Supp. Schubert Decl. P 6.) Schubert clarified what he was talking about during his interview with Craig Lord: "If you take [the] best times of world record holders and their new times [wearing the LZR Racer], the difference is 2 per cent." (COE Ex. 13.)

TYR argues that Schubert's statements at the Manchester meet are false because the LZR Racer does not offer a 2% advantage or is not 2% faster than the Tracer Rise. However, the Tracer Rise was not commercially available--not "on the market"--until later in April 2008, after Schubert's 2% advantage comment. (Furniss 9/3/09 Depo., Ex. 4.) Thus, even if it is accepted that Schubert was claiming a 2% advantage over all suits currently [49] on the market, it is not reasonable to infer that Schubert was making a direct comparison to the Tracer Rise. [17] Indeed, in a TYR internal memorandum in April 2008, Matt Zimmer admitted that "very few people even know we have a new product such as Rise." (Richter Decl., Ex. H.)

TYR also argues that the statements can be shown to be literally false because they imply that testing was done to support the claim. See Castrol, Inc. v. Quaker State Corp., 977 F.2d 57, 62 (2d Cir. 1992). However, TYR does not have evidence to rebut Schubert's claim to have analyzed the swimming times of world record holders wearing the LZR Racer and found a 2% difference. [18] (Supp. Schubert Decl. PP 3-5.) In fact, Schubert's analysis was confirmed by USA. Swimming statistician Larry Herr, who found a average swim time improvement of 1.55%, [19] (Herr [*841] Decl. P 3), by Craig Lord, who found that time improvements in a larger sample clustered in the range of 1.6% to 2.3%, (Lord Decl. P 19), and by TYR-sponsored coach Steve Hutchinson, who also found a roughly 2% time improvement in his [50] own review of swim times, (Zimmer 9/30/09 Depo. at 85:2-86:19, 87:2-88:9, 202:20-203:14).

Because TYR cannot show that Schubert's statement could be reasonably interpreted as a comparison of the LZR Racer against the Tracer Rise or that Schubert's statement was not backed by an informal statistical analysis, TYR has not raised a triable [51] issue of fact as to whether the "2% advantage" statement was false or misleading.

Moreover, the newly-introduced expert report does not remedy TYR's inability to show a link between Schubert's statements and injury to TYR. HN23[] TYR must show that the charged statements "actually deceived or [had] the tendency to deceive a substantial segment of its audience [and] is likely to influence the purchasing decision." [20] Southland Sod, 108 F.3d at 1139. Cantor's report states that its "results are consistent with the conclusion that [17] In fact, Schubert claims not to have known about the Tracer Rise at the time, (Supp. Schubert Decl. P 6), though this is disputed.

[18] The testimony of Genadijus Sokolovas and Russell Mark that USA Swimming and Speedo did not do internal "testing" on swimsuits prior to Schubert's comments, (Sokolovas Depo. at 16:11-25; Mark Depo. at 30:18-31:12), does not rebut Schubert's claim to have informally analyzed swim times involving the LZR Racer.

[19] TYR argues that Schubert's statement is literally false because of the difference between 1.55% and 2%. The Court does not think that a statement can reasonably be found to be false because a number is rounded up to an integer according to commonly-accepted rules for rounding, the same used in the federal tax code. See, e.g., 26 U.S.C. § 3402(b)(5) (allowing rounding to the nearest dollar for calculating withholding). More precisely, the Court does not think that the difference between 1.55% and the rounded number of 2% is a material difference.

the challenged conduct injured TYR sales." (Cantor Decl., Ex. A P 50.) The "challenged conduct" is everything that TYR alleged in the Complaint, including the allegations of coercion, TYR's exclusion from Splash magazine, the exclusion of advertising at certain events, and all of the disparaging statements that have been dismissed as puffing or otherwise non-actionable. (See id. P 18; Compl. PP 10-16.) Thus, Cantor never specifically links the Manchester statement or the Guam statement to the alleged injury, other than as part of the entire range of "challenged conduct." In other words, Cantor has failed to factor out any of the "challenged conduct,"--such as the alleged [52] coercion, the exclusion from Splash magazine and events, the puffing statements, or the statement made to Craig Lord--that is not actionable under the Lanham Act. No reasonable juror could find, based on Cantor's report, that the loss of sales indentified in the report were caused by the statement at the closed meeting in Manchester or the statement to two junior swimmers in Guam. This is especially true where, as here, none of the audience to the charged statements changed their buying behavior as a result of the statements. (Docket No. 154 at 25-26.)

To avoid this failure of proof of actual causation, TYR argues that proof that the statement was spread by word-of-mouth creates a triable issue as to whether any customers were actually deceived. [21] TYR cites two unpublished district court cases for the proposition that injury [53] can be presumed based on word-of-mouth dissemination in certain instances. PBM Prods., LLC v. Mead Johnson & Co., No. 3:09-CV-269, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18460 (E.D. Va. March 2, 2010); [*842] Fla. Breckenridge, Inc. v. Solvay Pharms., Inc., No. 97-8417-CIV-RYSKAMP, 1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14742 (S.D. Fla. March 18, 1998). Neither case is applicable here.

In PBM Products, the false advertising was disseminated through a mailer sent to roughly 1.6 million customers. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18460, at 12-13. In upholding the jury's damage award, the court noted that "[t]he jury heard evidence on the lost profits [the plaintiff] saw near the time the mailer was sent, [and] the 1.6 million individuals who received the mailer as well as those that would learn about it via word-of-mouth." Id. That case involved very widespread dissemination such that it can be assumed that a substantial section of the customer base heard the false statements, either directly or indirectly. Here, [54] in contrast, the two statements were made to very limited audiences. The same presumption of widespread dissemination by word-of-mouth cannot be made.

In Florida Breckinridge, the defendant moved for summary judgment on a Lanham Act claim on the ground that oral statements are not commercial advertising. *1998 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14742, at 20. The court rejected the argument, noting testimony that, in the relevant market, the "product could not be adequately promoted without . . . in-person and word-of-mouth promotion." *Id. at 21. Thus, HN25[] Florida Breckinridge merely stands for the proposition that oral statements, such as in-person or telephone sales calls, can constitute commercial advertising within the meaning of the Lanham Act. *Id. at 20-22. It does not stand for the proposition that a plaintiff can merely invoke "word-of-mouth" to overcome its burden of showing that customers actually heard and were deceived by the alleged false statement.

Here, TYR has evidence that Schubert made the "2% advantage" comment twice, both times at the 2008 Manchester meeting. (Marshall Depo. at 16:8-17; Descenza Depo. at 18:17-20.) Both were to a limited audience of 27 elite swimmers and several coaches, [55] none of whom switched to Speedo as a result of the statement. TYR argues that it has evidence of dissemination through word-of-mouth, because one swimmer "heard from other swimmers and read in media articles that . . . Schubert[] was telling swimmers that the Speedo LZR would provide a 2% advantage to swimmers as compared to other swimsuits." (Florea Decl. P 4.) However, this only establishes that one other swimmer heard the statement (and possibly from media sources like the Lord article, which is not actionable), and even he continued to wear TYR after a single experiment with the LZR. [22] (Id. PP 6-7.) TYR also [20] HN24[] The Lanham Act also requires that the plaintiff prove that the defendant "caused its false statement to enter interstate commerce." Southland Sod, 108 F.3d at 1139. Given that the two charged statements were given personally at a closed meeting in Manchester and to two junior swimmers in Guam, respectively, it is doubtful that TYR could satisfy this requirement.

[21] The Court rejects this new argument because it is not grounds for reconsideration. TYR has not demonstrated that it could not have raised this argument--which has nothing to do with the new expert report--on summary judgment.

argues that word-of-mouth is an important part of the swimsuit industry. (See COE, Ex. 14; Jackson Decl. P 2; Bielak Decl., Ex. M.) This does not, however, meet TYR's burden of proving that Schubert's statement was actually disseminated.

Finally, even if TYR could show that the statement was disseminated, it has no evidence of deception, particularly in light of the fact that, of all those who actually heard the statement, not one switched to [*843] using the Speedo suit as a result. (Docket No. 154 at 25-26; Florea Decl. PP 6-7.)

For the same reasons, the statement by Schubert to the two junior swimmers in Guam fails as a Lanham Act claim. There is no evidence that the statement was heard by anybody other than the two swimmers and their coach. As noted in the Court's prior order, neither of those two swimmers switched to Speedo. (Docket No. 154 at 26.)

Accordingly, Speedo is entitled to summary judgment on TYR's Lanham Act claim.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the motions for summary judgment are GRANTED. TYR's motion for reconsideration is DENIED.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[22] TYR argues that it would be impossible to track "word-of-mouth" dissemination. However, the impact and dissemination of the statement could potentially be measured by consumer surveys, as recognized by courts in other Lanham Act claims. See, e.g., Brunswick Corp. v. Spinit Reel Co., 832 F.2d 513, 525 (10th Cir. 1987) ("Actual consumer confusion [56] may be shown by direct evidence, a diversion of sales or direct testimony from the public, or by circumstantial evidence such as consumer surveys."). TYR has provided no such evidence.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In reviewing a motion to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), the court must assume the truth of all factual allegations and must construe all inferences from them in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. However, legal conclusions need not be taken as true merely because they are cast in the form of factual allegations.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN3[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A district court should grant a motion to dismiss if plaintiffs have not pled enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. While a complaint attacked by a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. The plausibility standard is not akin to a probability requirement, but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. Where a complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN4[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

The tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitations of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 marks a notable and generous departure from the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era, but it does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN5[] Complaints, Requirements for Complaint

Only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged, but it has not shown, that the pleader is entitled to relief.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN6[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

A court considering a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN7[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Immunities and other affirmative defenses may be upheld on a motion to dismiss only when they are established on the face of the complaint.

HN8[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

When ruling on a motion to dismiss, the court may consider the facts alleged in the complaint, documents attached to the complaint, documents relied upon but not attached to the complaint when authenticity is not contested, and matters of which the court takes judicial notice.

HN10[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

Where the facts and dates alleged in a complaint demonstrate that the complaint is barred by the statute of limitations, a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion should be granted. There is no requirement, however, that affirmative defenses, including statutes of limitation, appear on the face of the complaint. When a motion to dismiss is based on the running of the statute of limitations, it can be granted only if the assertions of the complaint, read with the required liberality, would not permit the plaintiff to prove that the statute was tolled.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Heightened Pleading Requirements > Fraud Claims

HN11[] Heightened Pleading Requirements, Fraud Claims

Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) requires that, in all averments of fraud, the circumstances constituting fraud be stated with particularity. One of the purposes behind Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading requirement is to put defendants on notice of the specific fraudulent conduct in order to enable them to adequately defend against such allegations. Furthermore, Rule 9(b) serves to deter the filing of complaints as a pretext for the discovery of unknown wrongs, to protect defendants from the harm that comes from being subject to fraud charges, and to prohibit plaintiffs from unilaterally imposing upon the court, the parties and society enormous social and economic costs absent some factual basis.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Heightened Pleading Requirements > Fraud Claims

HN12[] Heightened Pleading Requirements, Fraud Claims

Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) requires that allegations of fraud be specific enough to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct which is alleged to constitute the fraud charged so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny that they have done anything wrong. As a general rule, fraud allegations must state the time, place and specific content of the false representations as well as the identities of the parties to the misrepresentation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Heightened Pleading Requirements > Fraud Claims

HN13[] Heightened Pleading Requirements, Fraud Claims

The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has held that the general rule that allegations of fraud based on information and belief do not satisfy Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) may be relaxed with respect to matters within the opposing party's knowledge. In such situations, plaintiffs cannot be expected to have personal knowledge of the relevant facts. However, this exception does not nullify Rule 9(b); a plaintiff who makes allegations on information and belief must state the factual basis for the belief.

Torts > Intentional Torts > Conversion > Elements

HN19[] Conversion, Elements

A cause of action for conversion requires allegations of plaintiff's ownership or right to possession of property; defendant's wrongful act toward or disposition of the property, interfering with plaintiff's possession; and damage to plaintiff. Money cannot be the subject of a cause of action for conversion unless there is a specific, identifiable sum involved, such as where an agent accepts a sum of money to be paid to another and fails to make the payment.

Torts > Intentional Torts > Conversion > Elements

HN20[] Conversion, Elements

According to the California Court of Appeals, conversion is the wrongful exercise of dominion over the property of another. The elements of a conversion are the plaintiff's ownership or right to possession of the property at the time of the conversion; the defendant's conversion by a wrongful act or disposition of property rights; and damages. It is not necessary that there be a manual taking of the property; it is only necessary to show an assumption of control or ownership over the property or that the alleged converter has applied the property to his own use. Money can be the subject of an action for conversion if a specific sum capable of identification is involved.

Torts > Intentional Torts > Conversion > Elements

HN21[] Conversion, Elements

For purposes of a conversion claim, neither legal title nor absolute ownership of the property is necessary. A party need only allege it is entitled to immediate possession at the time of conversion. However, a mere contractual right of payment, without more, will not suffice.

HN22[] Enforceability, Undue Influence

See Cal. Civ. Code § 1575.

Real Property Law > Title Quality > Adverse Claim Actions > Quiet Title Actions

HN23[] Adverse Claim Actions, Quiet Title Actions

Quiet title is an equitable claim, a plaintiff in equity must do equity in order to obtain relief. In these circumstances, this means repaying the money borrowed before voiding the security for the loan.

Real Property Law > Title Quality > Adverse Claim Actions > Quiet Title Actions

HN24[] Adverse Claim Actions, Quiet Title Actions

A basic requirement of an action to quiet title is an allegation that the plaintiffs are the rightful owners of the property, i.e., that they have satisfied their obligations under the deed of trust. A mortgagor cannot quiet his title against the mortgagee without paying the debt secured.

Torts > ... > Defamation > Elements > General Overview

Torts > ... > Defamation > Defenses > Truth

HN28[] Defamation, Elements

Defamation is the intentional publication of a statement of fact which is false, unprivileged, and has a natural tendency to injury or which causes special damage. A credit report, even one that causes harm, is not defamatory if it is true. A plaintiff's admission of truth will bar a claim for defamation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN29[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

California's Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., prohibits any unlawful, unfair, or fraudulent business act or practice. Because § 17200 is written in the disjunctive, it establishes three varieties of unfair competition, acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent. An act can be alleged to violate any or all of the three prongs of the UCL: unlawful, unfair, or fraudulent.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN30[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

Under its unlawful prong, California's Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., borrows violations of other laws and makes those unlawful practices actionable under the UCL. Thus, a violation of another law is a predicate for stating a cause of action under the UCL's unlawful prong.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN31[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

The independent unfairness prong of California's Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., intentionally broad, thus allowing courts maximum discretion to prohibit new schemes to defraud. It has been said that a business practice may be unfair within the meaning of the UCL even if it is not unlawful; it is enough if the conduct in question offends an established public policy or when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers. However, the Supreme Court of California recently found that this formulation of unfairness is too amorphous and disapproved its use, at least with respect to claims of unfair competition between two direct competitors. The court required that any finding of unfairness to competitors under § 17200 be tethered to some legislatively declared policy or proof of some actual or threatened impact on competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN32[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

For purposes of California's Unfair Competition Law, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., when a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's unfair act or practice invokes § 17200, the word unfair in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN33[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

A fraudulent business practice is one in which members of the public are likely to be deceived. The fraudulent business practice prong of California's Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., has been understood to be distinct from common law fraud. A common law fraudulent deception must be actually false, known to be false by the perpetrator and reasonably relied upon by a victim who incurs damages. None of these elements are required to state a claim for injunctive relief under the UCL. This distinction reflects the UCL's focus on the defendant's conduct, rather than the plaintiff's damages, in service of the statute's larger purpose of protecting the general public against unscrupulous business practices.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN34[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

An action under California's Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., is equitable in nature; damages cannot be recovered. The California Court of Appeals has stated under the UCL, prevailing plaintiffs are generally limited to injunctive relief and restitution.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Consumer Protection > Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices > State Regulation

HN35[] Deceptive & Unfair Trade Practices, State Regulation

To establish a claim under the fraudulent prong of California's Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq., a plaintiff must demonstrate that members of the public are likely to be deceived. The gravamen of plaintiff's claim is that defendant fraudulently failed to disclose all the terms of her loan. However, absent a duty to disclose, the failure to do so does not support a claim under the fraudulent prong of the UCL.

Torts > ... > Concerted Action > Civil Conspiracy > General Overview

HN36[] Concerted Action, Civil Conspiracy

Conspiracy is not a cause of action, but a legal doctrine that imposes liability on persons who, although not actually committing a tort themselves, share with the immediate tortfeasors a common plan or design in its perpetration. By participation in a civil conspiracy, a coconspirator effectively adopts as his or her own the torts of other conspirators within the ambit of the conspiracy. In this way, a coconspirator incurs tort liability coequal with the immediate tortfeasors.

Torts > ... > Concerted Action > Civil Conspiracy > General Overview

HN37[] Concerted Action, Civil Conspiracy

Standing alone, a conspiracy does no harm and engenders no tort liability. It must be activated by the commission of an actual tort. A civil conspiracy, however atrocious, does not per se give rise to a cause of action unless a civil wrong has been committed resulting in damage.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Heightened Pleading Requirements > Fraud Claims

HN38[] Heightened Pleading Requirements, Fraud Claims

As to allegations of conspiracy, heightened pleading is required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 9(b) when the object of the conspiracy is fraudulent. To survive a motion to dismiss, plaintiff must allege with sufficient factual particularity that defendants reached some explicit or tacit understanding or agreement. It is not enough to show that defendants might have had a common goal unless there is a factually specific allegation that they directed themselves towards the wrongful goal by virtue of a mutual understanding or agreement.

MEMORANDUM DECISION GRANTING IN PART WITH LEAVE TO AMEND AND DENYING IN PART DEFENDANTS' MOTION TO DISMISS (Doc. 8)

On October 16, 2009, Plaintiffs Juvenal and Veronica Chavez, represented by Chapin Fitzgerald Sullivan LLP (formerly Chapin Wheeler LLP), filed in the Merced County Superior Court a Complaint for Damages and Equitable Relief for (1) fraud, (2) fraud in the inducement, (3) conversion, (4) quiet title, (5) defamation, (6) violation of California Business and Professions Code §§ 17200, and (7) civil conspiracy. The Complaint also contains a "Petition for Interlocutory Injunctive Relief," which seeks to enjoin foreclosure of the Subject Property. Defendants are the Bank of America and PRLAP, Inc., and Does 1-50. The action was removed to this Court on December 4, 2009.

Plaintiffs allege that they own property at 1231 Center Lane, Los Banos, California (the "Subject Property"). [*2] Paragraphs 19-56 of the Complaint set forth allegations concerning subprime loans and Defendants' alleged participation in that market. Paragraphs 57-77 set forth allegations pertaining to Plaintiffs:

> 57. The loans at issue were the product of a home purchase, through which Plaintiffs were attempting to obtain a safe, affordable residential mortgage loan. Plaintiffs had received advertisement for refinancing from Defendant BoA marketing its ability to refinance quickly, purportedly at the best interest rates and with the best loan terms. This marketing prompted Plaintiffs to contact and speak with a representative of BoA, whose name is Ms. Fong, primarily over the telephone.
> 58. From the outset of these conversations, Defendants' representative aggressively marketed the company's stated-income lending program and made clear to Plaintiffs that Defendants required no verification of their financial status to issue a quick approval for a refinance. Defendants' representative reassured Plaintiffs that, even without any financial verification, they would obtain a loan package appropriate for their financial status, that they would obtain the loan package with the best terms available, and [*3] that they had no other options.
> 59. Defendants' representative submitted a loan application on Plaintiffs' behalf on merely a stated-income basis, which Defendants approved. This approval, communicated by BoA's representative, with the full knowledge and consent of its trustees, insurers, underwriters, servicers, and assignees, constituted a misrepresentation to Plaintiffs that the loan package they obtained was in fact appropriate for their financial condition.
> 60. On April 25, 2006, Plaintiffs purchased the Subject Property, through a primary loan they purchased from BoA for $ 260,000 and a secondary loan, also with BoA, for $ 32,500, with 100% financing. Defendants induced Plaintiffs to purchase a hybrid ARM with a piggyback balloon loan, even though Plaintiffs qualified for other loan options that were safer and more reasonable. This piggyback balloon loan provided for payments that covered only interest during the entire loan term meaning that Plaintiffs could find themselves owing the entire original loan balance at the end of the interest-only period.
> 61. As was typical of piggyback balloon loans Defendants sold, the length of Plaintiffs' secondary loan here was fifteen years, [*4] shorter than the thirty year term of Plaintiffs' primary loan. This meant that Plaintiffs' balloon payment, for the entire balance of the secondary loan, would come due while Plaintiffs were still making payments on their primary loan.
> 62. Defendants steered Plaintiffs into such a risky loan package in order to increase their own profits, knowing that the loan package provided to Plaintiffs was complicated and deceiving, the actual cost and risk of a default inherent in which Plaintiffs would not understand.
> 63. Plaintiffs' primary loan provided for an initial 'teaser' interest rate of 6.375% for a temporary period of five years. Thereafter, Plaintiffs' yearly interest rate could adjust up to 11.375% with a margin of 2.25% plus prime.

64. Plaintiffs' secondary loan provided for an interest rate of 8.25% with interest-only payments for ten years, at which time a balloon payment for the total amount of the loan was due.
65. Defendant PRLAP served as the trustee for the loans BoA originated to Plaintiffs.

66. Defendants offered Plaintiffs only this single lending option. By offering Plaintiffs only one lending option and then approving, closing on, and servicing these loans, Defendants misrepresented [*5] that this loan package, with its particular terms, was the only one available, was appropriate, and was the most effective for Plaintiffs.
67. Contrary to these representations, Defendants offered Plaintiffs only this risky lending package even though Plaintiffs qualified for other lending options that were safer and more reasonable. Defendants bundled this package with additional risky features that made it ever riskier, including illusory interest rates, a high LTV ratio, loan qualification based on a 'teaser' interest rate, and illusory underwriting procedures. These features all worked together to guarantee Plaintiffs' eventual default and foreclosure.

68. Defendants' representative misrepresented to Plaintiffs that the loans' rate structure was extremely cheap and low-risk, focusing on the temporary, fixed 'teaser' rate period and falsely stating that the adjustable interest rate structure was not relevant to what Plaintiffs would later have to pay. Defendants made this representation despite their awareness that this adjustable rate structure would cause Plaintiffs' monthly payment amount to increase sharply, setting Plaintiffs up for default and foreclosure. Defendants did this [*6] to induce Plaintiffs into purchasing the loans for Defendants' own immediate profit.
69. None of Defendants ever provided Plaintiffs with any disclosures or estimates prior to closing. In addition, no one ever explained to them the inherent risks of an Option ARM loan coupled with an initial 'teaser' interest rate, interest-only payments, and a piggyback balloon loan, especially the devastating effect of negative amortization.
70. When entered into loan agreements with Plaintiffs, Defendants, by and through their representatives, employees, fiduciaries, and agents, again failed to disclose and knowingly misrepresented key terms of the loans sold to Plaintiffs, including the risks inherent in a Hybrid ARM coupled with an initial 'teaser' interest rate, interest-only payments, and a piggyback balloon loan. At closing, Defendants simply told Plaintiffs to sign without any explanation, brief or otherwise, as to the terms and risks of such a loan package.

71. Defendants disregarded and ignored Plaintiffs' actual ability to pay off the loans they sold by failing to conduct meaningful underwriting. Plaintiffs did not realize or understand that they were being sold a loan package that they could [*7] not afford and were not qualified to receive until they were facing default and foreclosure.
72. Defendants also grossly inflated the value of the Subject Property in order to give Plaintiffs the false impression that they had substantial equity above and beyond the loan amounts. Defendants never provided Plaintiffs with documentation supporting their valuation.
73. When Plaintiffs expressed any apprehension about their ability to afford the loans long-term, Defendants misrepresented to Plaintiffs their ability to afford the loans, should the terms later become unaffordable. Defendants told Plaintiffs, throughout the loan application and approval process, that their purported equity in the property would allow then to refinance with a lower interest rate and at a principal amount lower than the property's market value. Defendants also assured Plaintiffs that the Subject Property's value would continue to rise, and that Defendants would approve any subsequent refinance request due to the inevitable and perpetual rise of Plaintiffs' property value.

74. Defendants knew or should have known that Plaintiffs' loans would likely result in default and foreclosure, particularly in light of their [*8] qualifying Plaintiffs in reliance on a false promise of serial refinancing, which in turn relied on a false promise of perpetual property price appreciation. In conjunction with their employees, agents, sale representatives, and mortgage brokers, Defendants failed to meaningfully account for payment adjustments in approving and selling Plaintiffs' loans, thereby failing to meaningfully account for Plaintiffs' ability to repay the loans long-term. This illusory underwriting inevitably led to Plaintiffs' defaulting on their loans.

75. Defendants, along with their employees, agents, brokers, appraisers, and co-defendants, sold these loans to Plaintiffs with the intent and design to fraudulently maximize profits. Defendants, along with their employees, > agents, brokers, appraisers, and co-defendants, induced Plaintiffs to accept this risky loan package with misleading and false statements and by withholding material information as to the loans' true costs and risks. For their role, Defendants rewarded their agents and brokers with excessive commissions and passed this compensation on to Plaintiffs in the form of increased origination fees, higher interest rates, and credit spreads above [*9] the index value of their loans.

> 76. These activities of Defendants combined to inflate the value of the Subject Property, further increasing Defendants' revenues at the severe expense of Plaintiffs' financial health. Because of the high LTV ratio on the loans Defendants sold and the characteristics of Plaintiffs' loan package, Plaintiffs were acutely susceptible to being turned 'upside down' on their mortgage and incurring substantial negative equity in their property, which is precisely what occurred as soon as the real estate market flattened. Plaintiffs are now faced with monthly payments that they cannot afford, and are unable to refinance the Subject Property.
> 77. Defendants, and each of them, acted with full knowledge of the terms of Plaintiffs' loans and that these terms were inappropriate given the Subject Property's actual value and Plaintiffs' actual financial qualifications. In particular, Defendants, and each of them, acted with full knowledge as to how misleading, deceptive, and unduly risky such loan packages were, particularly when sold on a stated-income basis with only illusory underwriting procedures. Defendants where [sic] therefore fully aware that Plaintiffs were [*10] likely to become trapped in a loan for which they were not appropriately qualified and would certainly become unaffordable once the 'teaser' period reset. Most importantly for Defendants, they had full knowledge of the opportunities available to them on the securities market, where the transfer and dispersal of risk meant that profits derived from indiscriminate volume and costly loan terms [sic].

Defendants move to dismiss the Complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Defendants did not file a reply brief. The parties submitted the motion for resolution on the papers without oral argument.

B. FIRST CAUSE OF ACTION FOR FRAUD AND SECOND CAUSE OF ACTION FOR FRAUD IN THE INDUCEMENT.

The First and Second Causes of Action for fraud and fraud in the inducement allege:

79. As set forth herein, Defendants misrepresented and concealed from Plaintiffs, via advertisements, conduct, and affirmative statements, key facts related to the loans here at issue. When Defendants made these misrepresentations to Plaintiffs, Defendants made them without regard for the truth, with knowledge of their falsity, and deceptive nature, and with the intent that Plaintiffs would rely on these misrepresentations and, as a product of this reliance, sign loan documents and secure the Subject Property for said loans.

80. Each defendant, by and through its agents and representatives, engaged in these misrepresentations and/or concealments and profited from this deception. Defendants, and all of them, acted in concert, participated in, had full knowledge of, and wrongfully benefitted from the fraudulent acts described in this Complaint.

81. Specifically, [*15] Defendants fraudulently induced Plaintiffs to accept Defendants' risky loan products by (1) failing to clearly and conspicuously disclose the risks and eventual 'payment shock' inherent in a Hybrid ARM that provided an initial 'teaser' interest rate and interest-only payments coupled with a piggyback balloon loan; (2) failing to clearly and conspicuously disclose whether Plaintiffs' stated monthly payments included amounts due for insurance and taxes, which they generally did not; (3) failing to clearly and conspicuously disclose closing costs and fees; (4) making false promises that Defendants would refinance the loan prior to a rate increase; (5) failing to disclose the true costs and risks associated with the false promise that refinancing would be available as an exit strategy when Plaintiffs' loans became unaffordable; (6) fraudulently promising that the value of the Subject Property would increase and, therefore, that Plaintiffs could easily refinance; (7) steering Plaintiffs away form safer, fixed interest rate prime loans that they could afford and instead toward a Hybrid ARM providing for an initial 'teaser' interest rate and interest-only payments, coupled with a piggyback [*16] balloon loan that was based on an inflated loan amount; (8) false marketing acts designed to mask the true costs and risks of Plaintiffs' loans and to hide the benefits of other, safer loan products, and (9) inducing Plaintiffs to accept an adjustable, teaser interest rate loan, coupled with interred-only payments and a piggyback loan, with the false promise of a lower interest rate.

82. Defendants represented to Plaintiffs that all the statements made to them during the origination and underwriting of the loans at issue, including those concerning the purported value of the property supporting the loans, were true, and Defendants did so while concealing their mortgage lending scheme from Plaintiffs.

83. These misrepresentations, deceptions, false promises, and concealments of material information occurred during the loan application process, the underwriting process, at the time of the loans' subsequent approval, at the loans' closing, and even post-closing. These misrepresentations and concealments in fact continue, as

> Defendants insist on collecting on the loans and pursuing their purported interest in the Subject Property based on loans that Defendants know were and continue to be [*17] fraudulent.
> 84. Plaintiffs justifiably relied on Defendants' statements as true and complete because Defendants purported to be duly licensed professionals and corporations authorized to broker, issue, process, and purchase residential mortgage loans, subject to and purportedly following the laws and regulations particular to their practice of engaging consumers in mortgage lending. Defendants had resources, knowledge, and expertise in mortgage lending far surpassing that of Plaintiffs and, moreover, Defendants represented themselves, their employees, and their agents to be experts in the field.
> 85. Defendants, and all of them, knew of and participated in this system of fraud, acting in concert to communicate their misrepresentations to Plaintiffs via conduct, lack of disclosure, and false statements. Defendants effectuated this fraud via a system obsessed with their own profit, rewarding agents, brokers, and fiduciaries that produced the highest volume of loans with the most costly terms as to borrowers, while turning a blind eye to reckless and desceptive misconduct via their illusory underwriting procedures. The secondary mortgage market enabled and incentivized this systemized fraud [*18] by enabling Defendants o she the risk of the loans at issue and maximize their own short terms gain, all at Plaintiffs' expense. Without Defendants working together, such a fraud would have been neither possible nor profitable.

Defendants move to dismiss these causes of action on the grounds that they are barred by the statute of limitations and the Complaint does not allege any fraudulent conduct with the required particularity.

1. Statute of Limitations.

Defendants move to dismiss these causes of action as barred by the three year statute of limitations in California Code of Civil Procedure § 338(d): [1]

> HN9[] Within three years:
> (d) An action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake. The cause of action in that case is not deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake.

Defendants note that the loans were originated on April 25, 2006 and that this action was not filed until October 16, 2009, more than three years later.

Plaintiffs [*19] respond that dismissal on this ground is not appropriate because Plaintiffs were not aware of Defendants' allegedly fraudulent conduct until on or about September of 2009.

As explained in Neveu v. City of Fresno, 392 F. Supp. 2d 1159, 1169 (E.D.Cal.2005):

> HN10[] 'Where the facts and dates alleged in a complaint demonstrate that the complaint is barred by the statute of limitations, a Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) motion should be granted.' … There is no requirement, however, that affirmative defenses, including statutes of limitation, appear on the face of the complaint … 'When a motion to dismiss is based on the running of the statute of limitations, it can be granted only if the assertions of the complaint, read with the required liberality, would not permit the plaintiff to prove that the statute was tolled.'

Defendants' motion to dismiss the First and Second Causes of Action as barred by the statute of limitations is DENIED because the allegations present factual issues to be resolved at summary judgment or trial.

2. Particularity.

[1] Defendants' brief refers to Section 338(j), which provides for a three year statute of limitations for "[a]n action to recover for physical damage to private property under Section 19 of Article I of the California Constitution."

Defendants move to dismiss these causes of action on the ground that the alleged fraud is not pleaded with the particularity required by Rule 9(b), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

HN11[] Rule 9(b) [*20] requires that, in all averments of fraud, the circumstances constituting fraud be stated with particularity. One of the purposes behind Rule 9(b)'s heightened pleading requirement is to put defendants on notice of the specific fraudulent conduct in order to enable them to adequately defend against such allegations. See In re Stac Elecs. Litig., 89 F.3d 1399, 1405 (9th Cir.1996). Furthermore, Rule 9(b) serves "to deter the filing of complaints as a pretext for the discovery of unknown wrongs, to protect [defendants] from the harm that comes from being subject to fraud charges, and to prohibit plaintiffs from unilaterally imposing upon the court, the parties and society enormous social and economic costs absent some factual basis." Id.

HN12[] Rule 9(b) requires that allegations of fraud be specific enough to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct which is alleged to constitute the fraud charged so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny that they have done anything wrong. Celador Int'l, Ltd. v. Walt Disney Co., 347 F. Supp. 2d 846, 855 (C.D.Cal.2004); see also Neubronner v. Milken, 6 F.3d 666, 671 (9th Cir.1993). As a general rule, fraud allegations must state "the [*21] time, place and specific content of the false representations as well as the identities of the parties to the misrepresentation." Schreiber Distrib. v. Serv-Well Furniture Co., 806 F.2d 1393, 1401 (9th Cir.1986). As explained in Neubronner v. Milken, supra, 6 F.3d at 672:

> HN13[] This court has held that the general rule that allegations of fraud based on information and belief do not satisfy Rule 9(b) may be relaxed with respect to matters within the opposing party's knowledge. In such situations, plaintiffs cannot be expected to have personal knowledge of the relevant facts ... However, this exception does not nullify Rule 9(b); a plaintiff who makes allegations on information and belief must state the factual basis for the belief.

Defendants assert that Plaintiffs' fraud allegations lack any of the "who, what, when, where, and how" required for pleading fraud and that the Complaint "simply sets forth allegations that appear, often verbatim, in countless other complaints involving different borrowers and different lenders." Defendants contend that, other than the allegations in Paragraphs 57-77 quoted above:

> The remaining allegations are mere filler that appear in every complaint that Chapin [*22] Wheeler [sic] has filed against mortgage lenders in California this year, including the following: Diaz v. America's Servicing Co., et al., (Super.Ct. Santa Clara Co., 2009, No. 109-CV-155020); Lim v. HSBC Mortgage Corp, (USA), et al. (Super.Ct.San Joaquin Co., 2009 39-2009-00215519-CU-OR-STK); Nguyen v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., et al. (Super.Ct. Santa Clara Co., 2009, No. 199-CV-144605); Parent v. Bank of America, N.A., et al. (Super.Ct. Santa Clara Co., 2009, No. 109-CV-143479); Va v. Wells Fargo Bank (Super.Ct. Santa Clara Co., 2009 No. 109-CV-143478).

Defendants do not request the Court take judicial notice of the Complaints filed in these other listed actions and do not provide copies of these Complaints. Plaintiffs, citing Stop Youth Addiction, Inc. v. Lucky Stores, Inc., 17 Cal.4th 553, 577 n.13, 71 Cal. Rptr. 2d 731, 950 P.2d 1086), that """[m]atters otherwise subject to judicial notice must be relevant to an issue in the action,""" argue that Defendants should not be allowed to request judicial notice of these Complaints:

> Defendants cannot show that the other complaints are relevant to the present action. Defendants have failed to explicitly assert or prove that the facts, circumstances, or legal issues in the present [*23] case are similar to the facts, circumstances, or legal issues presented in other complaint [sic]. Indeed, Defendants' action in referencing other complaints that have no bearing to this case is a deliberate distortion of the facts, is highly and improperly prejudicial to Plaintiffs' case, and should not be permitted. Contrary to the Defendants' implicit allegation of similarity, this case is distinguishable in numerous regards, including the facts, loans at issue, and parties from other complaints. Indeed, it is readily apparent that there is no co-relation between the other complaints and the present action, other than loans being made by lenders on a broad level.

Rule 201, Federal Rules of Evidence, provides:

HN14[] (b) Kinds of facts. A judicially noticed fact must be one not dispute in that it is either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned.

> HN15[] (c) When discretionary. A court may take judicial notice, whether requested or not.
> HN16[] (d) When [*24] mandatory. A court shall take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information.
> HN17[] (e) Opportunity to be heard. A party is entitled upon timely request to an opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. In the absence of prior notification, the request may be made after judicial notice has been taken.

HN18[] The Court may take judicial notice of matters of public record, including duly recorded documents, and court records available to the public through the PACER system via the internet. See Fed. R. Evid. Rule 201(b); United States v. Howard, 381 F.3d 873, 876, fn.1 (9th Cir. 2004).

Because the Court is not provided copies of the Complaints in the described actions, Defendants' assertions concerning them are unverifiable. If these Complaints contain allegations similar to those in this action, that does not, ipso facto, establish that Plaintiffs have not pleaded fraud in this action with the specificity required by Rule 9(b).

Plaintiffs argue that the Complaint sufficiently alleges fraud pursuant to the Rule 9(b) standards.

Plaintiffs have not satisfied Rule 9(b). Other than Ms. Fong, no one associated [*25] with Defendants is named and the alleged misrepresentations are very generically described as are the times when the misrepresentations were made, i.e., at every stage of the loan process and thereafter. As an example, it is alleged that Defendants promised that the value of the Subject Property would increase and that Plaintiffs could then refinance; who made this promise and when. Plaintiffs allege that Defendants inflated the value of the Subject Property; who did so and when (and do Plaintiffs mean that the market value was incorrectly stated at the time of the appraisal or are they stating that the market value subsequently fell and Defendants should have anticipated that).

Defendants' motion to dismiss the First and Second Causes of Action is GRANTED WITH LEAVE TO AMEND to specifically allege fraud and fraud in the inducement in compliance with Rule 9(b).

C. THIRD CAUSE OF ACTION FOR CONVERSION.

The Third Cause of Action, after incorporating all preceding allegations, alleges:

> 89. As set forth herein, Defendants induced Plaintiffs to accept the unduly risky loans at issue in this case through fraud, deceit, and unfair business practices, in violation of California law. Defendants [*26] also set the interest rate on Plaintiffs' loans unjustly high and artificially inflated the value of the Subject Property so as to fraudulently justify larger loans, increasing Plaintiffs' monthly mortgage payments in the process.
> 90. By increasing Plaintiffs' monthly mortgage payments, Defendants extracted from Plaintiffs more money than they legitimately should have paid. Further, as Defendants' own policies require, any payments Plaintiffs made in excess of the amount they owed should have been applied directly to the loans' principal. Defendants violated California law, and their own policies, by applying the excess amount of Plaintiffs' monthly payments to interest that they did not legitimately owe and improperly converting said funds to Defendants' own use and benefit.
> 91. Defendants knew that Plaintiffs' loans posed a very high risk of default, and Defendants mitigated this risk for themselves by simply calculating uncollected interest on Plaintiffs' loans as additional principal. In so doing, Defendants violated California law, as well as their own policies, by applying a portion of Plaintiffs' monthly payments to interest that Plaintiffs did not legitimately owe, improperly [*27] converting said funds for their own use and benefit.

97. Defendants' conversion has caused Plaintiffs to suffer severe financial hardship resulting in damages to be proved at trial.

Defendants move to dismiss the Third Cause of Action. Defendants cite McKell v. Washington Mutual, Inc., 142 Cal.App.4th 1457, 49 Cal. Rptr. 3d 227 (2006). In McKell, home mortgagors brought a class action against the lender, alleging various causes of action, including conversion, in connection with alleged overcharging of underwriting, tax services, and wire transfer fees in connection with their home loans. The Court of Appeal ruled:

> HN19[] A cause of action for conversion requires allegations of plaintiff's ownership or right to possession of property; defendant's wrongful act toward or disposition of the property, interfering with plaintiff's possession; and damage to plaintiff … Money cannot be the subject of a cause of action for conversion unless there is a specific, identifiable sum involved, such as where an agent accepts a sum of money to be paid to another and fails to make the payment … Thus, in Chavez v. Centennial Bank (1998) 61 Cal.App.4th 532, 542, 71 Cal. Rptr. 2d 462 …, the plaintiffs stated a cause of action for conversion where the bank [*28] took funds from trust accounts to pay the trustee's personal indebtedness.
> Here …. plaintiffs did not allege that defendants were holding their payments on behalf of another, in essence in trust for the third party vendors. Plaintiffs cite no authority for the proposition that a cause of action for conversion may be based on an overcharge. Consequently, they have failed to demonstrate that they have stated a cause of action for conversion.

Defendants assert that Plaintiffs owed their loan payments to Bank of America and lost title to the payments when they were made and cannot recover their loan payments because they no longer have title to the money.

Plaintiffs respond that California Courts recognize that "[m]oney can be the subject of an action for conversion if a specific sum capable of identification is involved." Farmers Ins. Exchange v. Zerin, 53 Cal.App.4th 445, 452, 61 Cal. Rptr. 2d 707 (1997). Plaintiff also cite McCaffey Canning Co. v. Bank of America, 109 Cal.App. 415, 424, 294 P. 45 (1930), that "[a]n unjustified claim of title may amount to conversion." Plaintiffs argue:

> Plaintiffs specifically plead that they are the owners of the [Subject Property] … Plaintiffs also state that, 'by increasing Plaintiffs' [*29] monthly payments, Defendants extracted from Plaintiffs more money than they legitimately should have paid.' … Because of Defendants' conduct, Plaintiffs have a right to the monies that were unlawfully converted as payments to Defendants. Each time Plaintiffs rendered payments under the loans, Defendants took such inflated payments under their control for their own profit. Plaintiffs argue that the initial rate and principal on the loans were inflated and did not correlate with Plaintiffs' income. BOA is liable for conversion because it is the originator and servicer of both the primary and secondary loans if a more specific amount of conversion is warranted then Plaintiff [sic] should be allow [sic] to amend the complaint. Moreover, BOA continues to demand payments from the Plaintiffs pursuant to the unlawful loans. PRLAP is named as trustee of the subject loans.

In Zerin, Farmers Insurance Exchange sued an attorney for reimbursement of money received from third-party tortfeasors on behalf of defendant clients injured in automobile accidents involving plaintiff's insureds, who had been paid medical benefits by plaintiff, pursuant to a policy provision stating: "When a person has been [*30] paid damages by us under this policy and also recovers from another, the amount recovered from the other shall be held by that person in trust for us and reimbursed to us to the extent of our payment." The trial court sustained a demurrer to the cause of action for conversion. The Court of Appeals ruled:

> HN20[] 'Conversion is the wrongful exercise of dominion over the property of another. The elements of a conversion are the plaintiff's ownership or right to possession of the property at the time of the conversion; the defendant's conversion by a wrongful act or disposition of property rights; and damages. It is not necessary that there be a manual taking of the property; it is only necessary to show an assumption of control or ownership over the property or that the alleged converter has applied the property to his own use …' … Money can be the subject of an action for conversion if a specific sum capable of identification is involved ….

> HN21[] Neither legal title nor absolute ownership of the property is necessary … A party need only allege it is 'entitled to immediate possession at the time of conversion …' … However, a mere contractual right of payment, without more, will not suffice ….

53 Cal.App.4th at 451-452. [*31] The Court of Appeals rejected Farmers' contention that it had a sufficient property interest in the third party recoveries by virtue of the policy language which, it argued, created an actual or equitable lien on the funds and sustained the demurrer to the conversion causes of action. Id. at 452-457.

In McCaffey, the plaintiff had brought an action in which it obtained a judgment and had caused a writ of attachment to issue to the sheriff to attach certain enumerated canned goods in the judgment debtor's possession. The sheriff took custody of the canned goods pursuant to the writ. Thereafter, the Bank of America made a third-party claim to certain of the canned goods, averring that it had a security interest in those goods. Upon receipt of the bank's claim the sheriff notified plaintiff. The plaintiff refused to furnish an indemnity bond to the sheriff on the ground that the bank's claim was legally insufficient and that there had been no change of possession required by law for consummation of a pledge. The sheriff released from his custody all of the canned goods, including those subject to the writ of attachment. The canned goods were subsequently sold by the bank for its own account, [*32] the entire proceeds being applied toward satisfaction of its loans. The Court of Appeals held that "unless the Bank of America was in fact legally justified in claiming as a pledgee, the plaintiff should be entitled to recover in conversion for the nullification of its attachment lien." Id. at 426.

In Kelley v. Mortgage Electronic Registration Systems, Inc., 642 F.Supp.2d 1048, 1057 (N.D.Cal.2009), the District Court held:

> Here, the alleged conversion is that defendants 'established an unwarranted high monthly payment by artificially inflating the value of the property to fraudulently justify a larger mortgage.' … This is not a conversion because it does not constitute an exercise of dominion by defendants over plaintiffs' property. Plaintiffs have not alleged any of the elements of a conversion.

In *Montoya v. Countrywide Bank, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53920, 2009 WL 1813973 at 8-9 (N.D.Cal., June 25, 2009), the District Court addressed a motion to dismiss a claim for conversion:

>> Defendants … entered a conspiracy to induce the Plaintiffs to agree to the [residential mortgage loan] through fraud, deceit, and unfair business practices … Defendant Countrywide, at the direction [*33] of all Defendants as part of this conspiracy, set an unjustly high monthly payment by artificially inflating the value of the property to fraudulently justify a larger mortgage.
>> By raising the monthly payment rate, Defendants extracted from the Plaintiffs Montoya [sic] a higher amount than the Plaintiffs legitimately should have paid … [A]s required by Defendant Countrywide's own policies, any payments made in excess of the amount owed should [have been] applied directly to the principle of the account. Defendant Countrywide violated the RML contract and their own policies by applying the extra payments to interest that was not legitimately owed by the Plaintiff. The Defendants as part of their conspiracy, improperly converted said funds of Plaintiffs Montoya for their own use.
> … Plaintiffs' conversion allegations fails to allege facts that make it plausible that Defendants exercised dominion and control over Plaintiffs' personal property in manner [sic] that was inconsistent with Plaintiffs' rights at the time. Plaintiffs' claim is premised on a fraudulently obtained loan by Defendants. However, as discussed above, Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged any causes of action sounding [*34] in fraud. Further, the allegations of the Complaint make it clear that Plaintiffs entered into multiple loans that required interest-only payments to Defendants for the first ten years … Based on these allegations, Defendants' acceptance of Plaintiffs' monthly payments could not plausibly be deemed wrongful. Thus, the Court finds Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged a claim for conversion.

In *Somsanith v. Bank of America, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 103488, 2009 WL 3755593 at 4 (E.D.Cal., Nov. 6, 2009), the District Court ruled:

> [P]laintiff's conversion allegations fail to allege facts that make it plausible that Bank of America exercised dominion over plaintiff's personal property in manner [sic] that was inconsistent with plaintiff's rights at the time. Plaintiff's claim is premised on a fraudulently obtained loan by defendants … While plaintiff does allege that Bank of America 'set an unjustly high monthly payment by artificially inflating the value to the property to fraudulently justify a larger mortgage,' … this allegation does not constitute an exercise of dominion by Bank of America over plaintiff's property.

Plaintiffs' allegations are no different from those in McKell. The cases upon which Plaintiffs rely are [*35] significantly different from Plaintiffs' claimed conversion in this action. As noted, District Courts addressing similar allegations have ruled that a conversion claim does not lie. Plaintiffs have not stated a claim for conversion. The motion to dismiss is GRANTED WITH LEAVE TO AMEND.

D. FOURTH CAUSE OF ACTION FOR QUIET TITLE.

The Fourth Cause of Action is for quiet title. Plaintiff alleges that they own the Subject Property and further allege:

> 96. As described herein, Defendants have committed acts of misrepresentation and fraud with respect to the terms of Plaintiffs' loans and the value of the Subject Property, with the intent to exert undue influence.
> 97. Defendants' acts subjected Plaintiffs to unfair persuasion amounting to undue influence because the parties had a relationship by which Plaintiffs were justified in assuming that Defendants would not act in a manner inconsistent with Plaintiffs' welfare and best interests.
> 98. Defendants gained unfair persuasion over and undue influence of Plaintiffs by improper means, including but not limited to misrepresentation, undue flattery, and fraud.
> 99. As a result of this unfair persuasion over and undue influence of Plaintiffs, Defendants [*36] received a Deed of Trust to the Subject Property for loans that Plaintiffs should not ever have been given or allowed to take. Plaintiffs would not have received these loans but for Defendants' wrongful deceptive conduct.
> 100. Defendants have all worked and colluded together, acting individually in their respective roles as lender, trustee, fiduciary agent, beneficiary, debt collector, and foreclosing agent in clouding Plaintiffs' title to the Subject Property. Defendants now seek possession of the Subject Property via default and foreclosure. In the process, they seek to cloud title and/or have already clouded Plaintiffs' title by acting on a wrongful security deed that is based on wrongful loans, specifically by recording notices of default and notices of sale on the Subject Property's deed records, thus creating wrongful title.
> 101. Defendants' actions were intentional, oppressive, and conducted with fraud or malice, in conscious disregard of Plaintiffs' consumer protection rights, justifying an award of punitive damages ….
> 102. Defendants' unfair persuasion over and undue influence of Plaintiffs has caused Plaintiffs to suffer severe financial hardship and forced Plaintiffs to grant [*37] deeds of trust to Defendants. Plaintiffs request that this Court invalidate the deeds of trust on the Subject Property.

Defendants move to dismiss the Fourth Cause of Action on several grounds.

Defendants argue that the Complaint does not allege facts sufficient to demonstrate undue influence, citing California Civil Code § 1575:

> HN22[] Undue influence consists:
> 1. In the use, by one in whom a confidence is reposed by another, or who holds a real or apparent authority over him, of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage over him;
> 2. In taking an unfair advantage of another's weakness of mind; or,
> 3. In taking a grossly oppressive and unfair advantage of another's necessities or distress.

Defendants contend that the Complaint does not allege that Plaintiffs were of unsound mind or that they had "necessities or distress" that Defendants to grossly oppressive and unfair advantage. With respect to the allegation that "the parties had a relationship by which Plaintiffs were justified in assuming that Defendants would not act in a manner inconsistent with Plaintiffs' welfare and best interests," Defendants note that, under California law, no such special relationship [*38] exists between a bank and a borrower from a bank. See Kim v. Sumitomo Bank, 17

Cal.App.4th 974, 979-981, 21 Cal. Rptr. 2d 834 (1993); Nymark v. Heart Fed. Savings & Loan Assn., 231 Cal.App.3d 1089, 1093, 283 Cal. Rptr. 53 n.l (1991); Price v. Wells Fargo Bank, 213 Cal.App.3d 465, 476, 261 Cal. Rptr. 735 (1989).

Plaintiffs do not respond to this aspect of the motion to dismiss the Fourth Cause of Action and thereby concede that the Complaint does not allege facts from which undue influence within the meaning of Section 1575 may be inferred or that a special relationship existed between them and the Bank of America.

Defendants further argue that Plaintiffs cannot rescind their loans or the Deeds of Trust securing those loans without repaying the money they borrowed. See California Civil Code § 1691. HN23[] Quiet title is an equitable claim, a plaintiff in equity must do equity in order to obtain relief. In these circumstances, this means repaying the money borrowed before voiding the security for the loan. See 4 Miller & Starr, Cal. Real Estate § 10:212, pp. 686-87 (3d ed. 2003). As explained in Gaitan v. Mortgage Electronic Registration System, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 97117, 2009 WL 3244729 at *12 (C.D.Cal.2009):

> HN24[] A basic requirement of an action to quiet title is an allegation that [*39] plaintiffs 'are the rightful owners of the property, i.e., that they have satisfied their obligations under the Deed of Trust.' Kelley v. Mortgage Elec. Reg. Sys., Inc. ..., 642 F. Supp. 2d 1048, 2009 WL 2475703 at *7 (N.D.Cal., 2009). '[A] mortgagor cannot quiet his title against the mortgagee without paying the debt secured.' Watson v. MTC Financial, Inc. ..., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63997, 2009 WL 2151782 (E.D.Cal., Jul. 17, 2009), quoting Shimpones v. Stickney, 219 Cal. 637, 649, 28 P.2d 673 (1934).

Plaintiffs respond:

> [I]t would be inequitable to require Plaintiffs to first tender amounts owed in order to quiet title in this instance since Plaintiffs' consent to the alleged security deed was procured by Defendants through fraud and violation of California's unfair Competition laws. Thus, Plaintiff's tender obligations are excused. In essence, Defendants are wrongfully attempting to prevent Plaintiffs from having their day in court by attempting to dismiss Plaintiffs' case on the basis that they have failed to tender amounts owed on a fraudulent loan. Moreover, such an argument is not the basis for dismissal but at a minimum requires a hearing on Plaintiffs' grounds for temporary injunctive relief and Defendants to prove which if any damage [*40] they may incur by the prevention of foreclosure during the resolution of the issues at hand.

Plaintiffs cite no authority for their position that their tender obligation is excused and that Plaintiffs can keep both the Subject Property and the loan amounts. Plaintiffs' response infers that they are unable to make the tender, i.e., they do not have the present financial ability to make it.

Defendants' motion to dismiss the Fourth Cause of Action is GRANTED WITH LEAVE TO AMEND. Plaintiffs shall plead facts, if they can, from which it may be ascertained, consistent with Rule 11, Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, that they were subjected to undue influence or had a legally cognizable special relationship with the Bank of America, and that they have the present ability to tender the loan payments.

E. FIFTH CAUSE OF ACTION FOR DEFAMATION.

The Fifth Cause of Action for defamation, after incorporating all preceding allegations, alleges:

> 104. Defendants threatened to report and actually reported to credit agencies and other third parties that Plaintiffs were in default on their loans with respect to monthly payments that Defendants incorrectly assessed.
> 105. These reports were false, and Defendants [*41] made these statements with clear knowledge of their wrongful acts: that they issued Plaintiffs loans illegally: and that they incorrectly assessed Plaintiffs' monthly payments.
> 106. Despite this knowledge, Defendants made false statements to third parties concerning the amount Plaintiffs owed and did not pay. Defendants made these false statements in an attempt to defame Plaintiffs' reputations and lower their credit scores.

107. Defendants' purported right to report to credit bureaus as creditors does not bestow upon them a right to report to credit bureaus as creditors of wrongfully obtained debt upon which a borrower exercises its legal right not to pay. Reporting to credit agencies late payment or nonpayment on a loan known to be fraudulent manifests a specific intent to defame, with malice against the borrower.

108. Defendants have also attempted to foreclose by recording a notice of default on the Subject Property's deed records, publicizing false and very damaging information about Plaintiffs in the process. Defendants conducted these acts with the specific intent to damage Plaintiffs, knowing their false statements would be exposed to the public, for not making monthly mortgage [*42] payments that Plaintiffs believe in good faith to be fraudulent.

Defendants move to dismiss the Fifth Cause of Action on the ground that "the federal Fair Credit Reporting Act preempts state law defamation claims arising from inaccurate reports to credit reporting agencies, at least absent a pleading of facts showing malice - i.e., publication with knowledge that the defamatory credit report was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not."

15 U.S.C. § 1681h(e) provides:

HN25[] Except as provided in sections 1681n and 16810 of this title, no consumer may bring any action or proceeding in the nature of defamation … with respect to the reporting of information against any … person who furnishes information to a consumer reporting agency, based on information disclosed pursuant to section 1681g, 1681h, or 1681m of this title …, except as to false information furnished with malice or willful intent to injure such consumer.

15 U.S.C. §§ 1681t(a) and (b)(1)(F) provide:

HN27[] (b) No requirement or prohibition may be imposed under the laws of any State -

Defendants cite Gorman v. Wolpoff & Abramson, LLP, 584 F.3d 1147, 1165-1168 (9th Cir.2009), petition for cert. filed March 15, 2010 (No. 09-1142). [2] In Gorman, a cardholder instituted a lawsuit against his credit card issuer, alleging violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA), libel, and violations of California's credit reporting law. The Ninth Circuit, addressing FCRA preemption, stated in dicta:

Although § 1681t(b)(1)(F) appears to preempt all state law claims based on a creditor's [*44] responsibilities under § 1681s-2, § 1681h(e) suggests that defamation claims can proceed against creditors as long as the plaintiff alleges falsity and malice. Attempting to reconcile the two sections has left district courts in disarray.

[2] Defendants cited Gorman as 552 F.3d 1008. However, the opinion at that citation was amended and superseded by the opinion reported at 584 F.3d 1147.

> The district court in this case held that § 1681h(e), the more specific preemption provision, trumped the more general preemption provision of § 1681t(b)(1)(F) … Other district courts have followed different approaches. Some have concluded that the later-enacted § 1681t(b)(1)(F) effectively repeals the earlier preemption provision, § 1681h(e) … Attempting to give meaning to both sections, other courts have observed that § 1681t(b)(1)(F) relates to 'any subject matter regulated under section 1681s-2,' the section which regulates the responses to furnishers to notices of dispute. Hence, these courts apply a 'temporal approach,' holding that 'causes of action predicated on acts that occurred before a furnisher of information had notice of any inaccuracies are not preempted by § 1681t(b)(1)(F), but are instead governed by § 1681h(e).' ….
> Gorman advocates a still different 'statutory' analysis, under which 't(b)(1)(F) preempts only state law claims against [*45] credit information furnishers brought under state statutes, just as 1681h(e) preempts only state tort claims.' … Finally, MBNA argues that § 1681h(e) is not a broad preemption provision at all, but simply a 'grant of protection for statutorily required disclosures.' … But, of course, granting entities immunity from state law tort suits is just another way of saying that certain state law claims are preempted.
> In the end, we need not decide this issue. As we conclude below, even if Gorman could bring a state law libel claim under § 1681h(e), and such a claim were not preempted by § 1681t(b)(1)(F), he has not introduced sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment on this claim.

Id. at 1166-1167. The Ninth Circuit further ruled:

> The FCRA does not define the appropriate standard for 'malice.' The two circuits that have interpreted § 1681h(e) have applied the standard enunciated in New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279-80, 84 S. Ct. 710, 11 L. Ed. 2d 686 … (1964), requiring the publication be made 'with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not.' … Under New York Times, to show 'reckless disregard,' a plaintiff must put forth 'sufficient evidence to permit the conclusion [*46] that the defendant in fact entertained serious doubts as to the truth of his publication.' … We agree with the courts that have adopted the New York Times standard for purposes of § 1681h(e) and so apply it here.

Id. at 1168.

Plaintiffs, relying on Section 1681t(a) and Sanai v. Saltz, 170 Cal.App.4th 746, 88 Cal. Rptr. 3d 673 (2009), argues that there is no implied or field preemption under the FCRA.

In Sanai, the Court of Appeals held that the trial court erred in granting a motion for judgment on the pleadings as to plaintiff's cause of action for violation of the California Consumer Reporting Agencies Act, California Civil Code § 1785.1, et seq., but properly granted the motion as to the state common law causes of action for slander, libel, intentional and negligent interference with prospective economic advantage, and intentional and negligent infliction of emotional distress. Because Plaintiffs have not alleged a violation of Section 1785.1, Sanai is of no assistance to Plaintiffs. Nonetheless, the law concerning preemption by the FCRA of Plaintiffs' defamation [*47] claim is too unsettled to resolve at this stage of the proceedings. Defendants' motion to dismiss on this ground is DENIED WITHOUT PREJUDICE.

Defendants further argue that, even if the Fifth Cause of Action is not preempted by the FCRA, Plaintiffs have not stated a claim upon which relief can be granted:

> The defamation claim is based on their contention that the loans were issued illegally … As explained above, there is no factual allegation of illegality or other wrongful conduct in the origination of these loans.
> Plaintiffs are now faced with monthly payments that they cannot afford, and are unable to refinance the Subject Property.

In *Montoya v. Countrywide Bank, supra, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 53920, 2009 WL 1813973 at 10-11, the Northern District held:

> Defendants move to dismiss Plaintiffs' defamation claim on the ground that reporting a true statement to a credit agency is not defamation ….
> HN28[] Defamation is 'the intentional publication of a statement of fact which is false, unprivileged, and has a natural tendency to injury or which causes special damage.' … A credit report, even one that causes harm, is not defamatory if it is true … A plaintiff's admission of truth will bar a claim for defamation ….
> Here, Plaintiffs [*48] allege that they 'are no longer able to make the required payments' on their loans … Plaintiffs also allege that:
>> [i]n an attempt to coerce payments out of the Plaintiffs in regards to the fraudulently obtained [residential mortgage loans], the Defendant Countrywide threatened and actually reported to credit agencies and other third parties that Plaintiffs were in default on the [residential mortgage loan] for a payment that was incorrectly assessed.
>> Defendants … conspired to make these statements with full knowledge of Defendants' wrongful and fraudulent conduct and the Defendants were full [sic] aware that the [residential mortgage loan] was obtained illicitly.
> Based on these allegations, Plaintiffs' defamation claim is premised on Defendants' statements to credit agencies that Plaintiffs were in default on their loan despite knowing the loan was obtained illicitly. However, as the Complaint also alleges, Plaintiffs were unable to pay their mortgage, and therefore, regardless of how the loan was obtained, Defendants' reports to credit agencies, as alleged, are true. Thus, the Court finds Plaintiffs have failed to allege a publication of a false statement.

See also Fortaleza v. PNC Financial Services Group, Inc., 642 F.Supp.2d 1012, 1026 (N.D.Cal.2009) [*49] ("Critically, however, plaintiff does not allege, and has not contested, the truthfulness of the fact of plaintiff's default on the subject loans … Thus, plaintiff cannot demonstrate the requisite 'falsity' of any alleged statements by defendants.'). Here, the Complaint alleges "Plaintiffs are now faced with monthly payments that they cannot afford, and are unable to refinance the Subject Property." This allegation implies that Plaintiffs are in default on the loan, thereby making the reports to the credits agencies true. This pleads the Plaintiffs out of a defamation claim.

Defendants' motion to dismiss the Fifth Cause of Action on this ground is GRANTED WITH LEAVE TO AMEND.

F. SIXTH CAUSE OF ACTION FOR VIOLATIONS OF CALIFORNIA BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONS CODE.

The Sixth Cause of Action, after incorporating all preceding allegations, alleges:

> 112. As described herein, Defendants, via deceptive and misleading advertising and sales practices, misrepresentations, deceptive conduct, and the withholding of information, unfairly, unlawfully, and fraudulently induced Plaintiffs into purchasing the mortgage loans here at issue, to Plaintiffs' great detriment and Defendants' wrongful profit.
> 113. [*50] Defendants' fraudulent acts, business model, and illusory underwriting standards were designed to perpetuate a scheme of unfair business practices, in violation of California Business and Professions Code §§ 17200 et seq., through which Defendants wrongfully profited. The components of this scheme as applied to Plaintiffs included, but were not limited to, artificially inflating the Subject Property's value in order to increase the loan amount and misleading Plaintiffs through the use of a Hybrid ARM that provided an initial 'teaser' interest rate and interest only payments coupled with a piggyback balloon loan. Defendants' intended for their misrepresentations to unfairly prejudice Plaintiffs in order that Defendants would profit from Plaintiffs' loss.
> 114. When issuing this loan package, Defendants disregarded Plaintiffs' ability to repay the loans and failed to disclose the true cost of the loans, as required by law.
> 115. Defendants have violated and continue to violate California Business and Professions Code §§ 17200 et seq. by making untrue or misleading statements, or by causing untrue or misleading statements to be made to Plaintiffs, with the intent of inducing Plaintiffs to [*51] enter into the risky loans that are the subject of this Complaint. These untrue or misleading statements include but are not limited to:

a. statements regarding the true terms and payment obligations pertaining to the loans, including statements obfuscating the risks of Plaintiffs' loan package;

b. statements as to the Subject Property's value at the time of origination, when the stated value was in fact inflated, and to the effect that said property value would continue to rise and enable Plaintiffs to refinance; and

c. statements indicating that Defendants did not render any illegal kickbacks, fees, or other things of value.

116. Defendants knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care should have known that these statements or omissions were untrue or misleading at the time they were made.

117. Defendants' unfair business practices have caused Plaintiffs to suffer severe financial hardship resulting in damages in an amount to be proven at trial.

"The UCL is codified in Business and Professions Code section 17200 et seq. HN29[] The UCL prohibits any 'unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice.' Because Business and Professions Code section 17200 is written in the disjunctive, it establishes [*52] three varieties of unfair competition - acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent … An act can be alleged to violate any or all of the three prongs of the UCLA - unlawful, unfair, or fraudulent." Berryman v. Merit Property Management, 152 Cal.App.4th 1544, 1554, 62 Cal. Rptr. 3d 177 (2007), citing Podolsky v. First Healthcare Corp., 50 Cal.App.4th 632, 647, 58 Cal. Rptr. 2d 89 (1996).

Defendants move to dismiss the Sixth Cause of Action to the extent it alleges that Defendants' practices were "unlawful." As explained in Berryman, supra:

HN30[] Under its 'unlawful' prong, 'the UCL borrows violations of other laws … and makes those unlawful practices actionable under the UCL.' … Thus, a violation of another law is a predicate for stating a cause of action under the UCL's unlawful prong.

Here, the Complaint does not specifically allege a violation of another law. Defendants motion to dismiss is GRANTED WITH LEAVE TO AMEND to the extent the Sixth Cause of Action alleges that Defendants' acts were "unlawful" within the meaning of the UCL.

As to the unfairness prong, as explained in Schnall v. Hertz Corp., 78 Cal.App.4th 1144, 1166-1167, 93 Cal. Rptr. 2d 439 (2000):

HN31[] 'The independent "unfairness" prong of the UC[L] 'intentionally broad, thus allowing [*53] courts maximum discretion to prohibit new schemes to defraud …' … It has been said that a business practice may be 'unfair' within the meaning of the UCL even if it is not 'unlawful'; it is enough if the conduct in question ""offends an established public policy or when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers.' …"' … However, in Cel-Tech, our Supreme Court recently found that this formulation of unfairness is 'too amorphous' and disapproved its use, at least with respect to claims of unfair competition between two direct competitors. (Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th at pp. 184-185.) The Cel-Tech court required 'that any finding of unfairness to competitors under section 17200 be tethered to some legislatively declared policy or proof of some actual or threatened impact on competition.' (Id. at pp. 186-187.)<<FN 14>

<<FN 14> The Cel-Tech court adopted the following test: HN32[] 'When a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury from a direct competitor's "unfair' act or practice invokes section 17200, the word "unfair" in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or [*54] spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition.' (Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p.187.).

Plaintiff citing Scripps Clinic v. Superior Court, 108 Cal.App. 4th 917, 939, 134 Cal. Rptr. 2d 101 (2003), asserts that "unfair" conduct is conduct that "offends an established public policy or … is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers."

There is a conflict among the California Courts of Appeal whether the Cel-Tech standard of "unfairness" applies to consumer cases. See, e.g., Gregory v. Albertson's, Inc., 104 Cal.App.4th 845, 854, 128 Cal. Rptr. 2d 389 (2002) (reading Cel-Tech 'to require that the public policy which is a predicate to the action must be "tethered" to specific constitutional, statutory or regulatory provisions' in consumer cases'); Smith v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins., Co., 93 Cal.App.4th 700, 720 n.23, 113 Cal. Rptr. 2d 399 (2001) ('[W]e are not to read Cel-Tech as suggesting that such a restrictive definition of "unfair" should be applied in the case of an alleged consumer injury[.]'); see also *Kilgore v. Keybank, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35592, 2010 WL 1461577 at 8 (N.D.Cal., April 12, 2010); Davis v. Ford Motor Credit Co., 179 Cal.App.4th 581, 594-597, 101 Cal. Rptr. 3d 697 (2009).

HN33[] "A [*55] fraudulent business practice is one in which ""members of the public are likely to be "deceived."""' Morgan v. AT & T Wireless Services, Inc., 177 Cal.App.4th 1235, 1254, 99 Cal. Rptr. 3d 768 (2009). As explained in In re Tobacco II Cases, 46 Cal.4th 298, 312, 93 Cal. Rptr. 3d 559, 207 P.3d 20 (2009):

> The fraudulent business practice prong of the UCL has been understood to be distinct from common law fraud. 'A [common law] fraudulent deception must be actually false, known to be false by the perpetrator and reasonably relied upon by a victim who incurs damages. None of these elements are required to state a claim for injunctive relief' under the UCL … This distinction reflects the UCL's focus on the defendant's conduct, rather than the plaintiff's damages, in service of the statute's larger purpose of protecting the general public against unscrupulous business practices.

Plaintiffs cite and quote In re Tobacco Cases II but delete by ellipsis "injunctive" and imply that this standard applies to all claims for fraudulent business practices under the UCL. However, as stated in In re Tobacco II Cases, HN34[] "'[a] UCL action is equitable in nature; damages cannot be recovered … We have stated under the UCL, "[p]revailing plaintiffs are generally limited [*56] to injunctive relief and restitution." ….'" 46 Cal.4th at 312. See also Korea Supply Co. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 29 Cal.4th 1134, 1144, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 29, 63 P.3d 937 (2003):

> While the scope of conduct covered by the UCL is broad, its remedies are limited … A UCL action is equitable in nature; damages cannot be recovered … We have stated that under the UCL, '[p]revailing plaintiffs are generally limited to injunctive relief and restitution.'

Defendants cite *Rangel v. DHI Mortg. Co., Ltd., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 65674, 2009 WL 2190210 at 4 (E.D.Cal., July 21, 2009), where Judge O'Neill, in dismissing a claim for negligence, alleging that defendants breached their "professional services" duty in that "plaintiff was placed into a loan that were [sic] inappropriate for her personal financial circumstances," ruled:
